The PRC's cultural erasure throughout Tibet, including efforts to "Sinicize" Tibetan Buddhism and interfere in the selection process of Tibetan Buddhist lamas, including the Dalai Lama, are alarmingly widespread. These policies prohibit Tibetans from offering prayers to the Dalai Lama in public, as well as images of the Dalai Lama himself. Authorities have also banned the display of highly symbolic Tibetan prayer flags and the celebration of many important Tibetan festivals.

As such, many monasteries and religious events have become subject to regular surveillance. According to monitors, of the roughly 6,000 monasteries that once existed in Tibet, only 13 have been left undamaged. For instance, the 2016 destruction of Larung Gar, the largest Buddhist academy in the world, resulted in the forced eviction of thousands of students, monks, and nuns living around it. Many were reportedly subjected to brutality and "political re-education."

Last year, several UN experts expressed concern about credible reports that PRC authorities have coerced approximately one million Tibetan children in what they characterized as a “mandatory large-scale program intended to assimilate Tibetans into majority Han culture, contrary to international human rights standards.” Separating a generation of Tibetan children from their heritage and language will do untold damage to their ability to shape and preserve their identity.

I urge the PRC to cease all human rights abuses against Tibetans, including by accounting for the whereabouts and well-being of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima; ending the coercion of Tibetan children into government-run boarding schools; upholding freedom of religion or belief for all; and abandoning policies and practices aimed at erasing Tibet’s rich religious, cultural, and linguistic identity.

Chinese hackers have lurked in some US infrastructure systems for ‘at least five years’

07 February 2024, CNN

The Chinese hackers behind a campaign to infiltrate transportation hubs and other critical American infrastructure have had access to some of their targets’ computer networks for “at least five years,” according to a new report by US and allied security agencies obtained by CNN.

The campaign is part of a long-running effort by the hackers to position themselves for potentially crippling cyberattacks that could disrupt water and electricity, according to US officials.

US intelligence chiefs sounded the alarm about the threat to Congress last week, saying Beijing could use the hackers to disrupt a US response if China invades Taiwan. FBI Director Christopher Wray told lawmakers last week that the hackers could “wreak havoc and cause real-world harm” to the US.

The nearly 50-page report comes as US-China tensions over Taiwan and other key issues remain high and shows how central cyber operations could be to Chinese efforts to hobble US infrastructure in the event of a conflict between the two superpowers, according to US officials. The report would be the most detailed disclosure yet by the US government of the hackers’ stealthy techniques, one aimed at helping private owners of critical infrastructure spot the Chinese hackers in their networks.

The hackers’ presence in critical US networks has sparked a monthslong effort by US national security officials to kick the hackers out.

The report, which US officials are set to release this week, makes clear that the Chinese hackers’ activity began much earlier than previously known, with the hackers scoping and accessing IT systems years ago. From there, they have spent months looking for ways to maneuver onto more sensitive industrial systems that help control power flow and water.

The Beijing-backed hackers have been probing systems that control heating, cooling and water, access that, if exploited, could allow them to manipulate those systems and cause “significant infrastructure failures,” the report says. The hackers have also broken into security cameras at unnamed critical facilities, according to the document.

There are no signs yet that China has decided to use the hackers’ presence to disrupt US infrastructure, according to US officials, but they are concerned that could change quickly in the event of a crisis.

Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, denied the US hacking allegations in a statement to CNN on Wednesday and accused Washington of conducting its own cyberattacks.

The new report also sheds new light on the sprawling nature of the hacking operation and on concerns from US allies over the activity.

US officials have confirmed the hackers have broken into computer networks at energy, transportation and water facilities in the “continental and non-continental” US and its overseas territories, including Guam, according to the report. In one case, after breaching the IT systems at an unnamed water facility, the hackers had access to a range of critical information on water treatment plants and water wells, according to the analysis.

The FBI, National Security Agency and Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency are among the US agencies that produced the report, along with cybersecurity agencies from Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. CNN obtained a non-public version of the report, and sources familiar with the report told CNN the agencies are preparing to publish a version of it this week.

Canada’s cybersecurity agency “assesses that the direct threat to Canada’s critical infrastructure” from the Chinese hackers “is likely lower” than that to US infrastructure, but that Canada would still likely still be affected by a disruption to US infrastructure due to “cross-border integration,” the document says. Australia and New Zealand, two key allies in the US quest to counter China in the Pacific, could be vulnerable to similar activity from Chinese government hackers, the report says.

US hyping up China as “threat in outer space” to expand its forces in outer space: Chinese Foreign Ministry

27 January 2024, The Economic Times

The US has been hyping China as a “threat in outer space” to target Beijing only to expand its forces in outer space and maintain military hegemony, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin said on Friday.

Wang Wenbin's remarks came after the US Space Force released an assessment report. In the report, the US said that Russia and China are designing and testing counter-space weapons to "deny, disrupt or destroy satellites and space services," China-based Global Times reported.

Speaking at a regular media briefing on Friday, Wang said that the US openly uses outer space as a "battlefield" to develop outer space military capabilities and provoke "major-power rivalry, making itself the biggest factor in militarizing outer space and turning it into a battlefield. He accused the US of abusing space technology and maliciously tracking and approaching spacecraft in a "dangerous" way.

Asked about US Space Force in its report "Competing in Space" mentions that China and Russia are testing and developing anti-satellite weapons to deny, disrupt or destroy satellites and space services, Wang Wenbin said, "The US has long been repeatedly hyping up China as a "threat in outer space" to smear and attack China, which is only an excuse for the US to expand its forces in outer space and maintain military hegemony."

"In fact, the US openly characterised outer space as a battlefield, made great effort to develop outer space military and provoke major-power rivalry, making itself the biggest factor in militarizing outer space and turning it into a battlefield, and the biggest threat to outer space security. The US has long been abusing space technology and maliciously tracking and approaching other countries' spacecraft in a dangerous manner, which increases the collision risk in space and is seriously irresponsible," he added.

Wang Wenbin stated that China sticks to its peaceful use of outer space and opposes the arms race. He said that China urges the US to stop spreading disinformation and expanding the military buildup as well as stepping up war preparation in its outer space.

He further said, "China once again urges the US to stop spreading disinformation, expanding military build-up and stepping up war preparation in outer space, and to genuinely shoulder its due responsibility."

U.S. and China are working to make the business environment less volatile, Beijing says

26 January 2024, CNBC

BEIJING — China and the U.S. are working toward creating a more stable and predictable environment for businesses, Chinese Commerce Minister Wang Wentao said Friday.

Since U.S. Commerce Secretary Gina Raimondo's visit to China last summer, the two countries have agreed to hold regular meetings at the ministerial level and below. Wang and Raimondo had a call earlier this month.

That communication "strives to create a good environment for the two countries' economic and trade cooperation, especially in stabilizing business expectations," Wang said in Mandarin at a press conference, translated by CNBC.

He did not mention U.S. tech restrictions, but said sanctions bring business uncertainty and "greatly increase" compliance costs.

In the last two years, the Biden administration has issued export controls that limit the ability of Chinese companies to buy advanced tech such as high-end semiconductors from U.S. businesses. Washington has said it's a way to keep China's military from accessing cutting-edge tech, while maintaining areas of cooperation.

"We always believe that the common interests of China and the U.S. in economy and trade are far greater than their differences," Wang said.

U.S. and other foreign businesses in China have long complained of challenges to doing business in the Asian country, such as unequal treatment of foreign companies compared to local players. More recently, international businesses have said Beijing's vague rules around data transfer out of the country make operations difficult.

In the fall, the Cyberspace Administration of China (CAC) issued new draft rules that said no government oversight is needed for data exports if regulators haven't stipulated that it qualifies as "important." The move was widely seen as an improvement for foreign businesses, but no official policy has yet followed.

When asked Friday for an update on data rules, Wang only said the "primary ministry is stepping up efforts to release them."

He said China has acted on a 24-point plan released last summer for supporting foreign businesses in the country — with implementation or progress on "more than 60%" of the measures. Wang also said the ministry has set up regular channels for foreign businesses to share feedback.

When Raimondo visited China last year, she called for more action to improve predictability for U.S. businesses in China. Referring to the 24-point plan, she had said: "Any one of those could be addressed as a way to show action."

Growing international challenges

China's economic growth has slowed from the double-digit pace of prior decades to a 5.2% increase in 2023. Growth is expected to slow further this year.

Wang told reporters Friday that this year, the international trade situation would be "even more complex and severe," pointing to factors such as increased geopolitical tensions.

Foreign direct investment fell by 8% to 1.13 trillion yuan ($160 billion) in 2023, the lowest level in three years, according to Ministry of Commerce data. It did not specify how much the U.S. invested in China, while noting France and the U.K. saw the largest increases in such investment last year.

China has sought to bolster foreign investment in the country.

At World Economic Forum's annual conference in Davos, Switzerland, earlier this month, Chinese Premier Li Qiang gave a speech that portrayed China as an opportunity instead of a risk.

"Davos is littered with CEOs who have stories of intellectual property ripped off, agreements summarily changed, arbitrary legal judgments in favor of local competitors, and more," Ian Bremmer, founder and president of the Eurasia Group, said in a note Monday.

"But I was also impressed by the breadth of CEOs – across a wide degree of sectors (finance, healthcare, insurance, manufacturing, technology, luxury goods, transition energy and more) who told me stories not just of increased access over the past months, but also new business terms, licenses and partnerships that they were legitimately enthusiastic about," Bremmer said.

He said that "almost every Fortune 500 CEO with a business in China" that he met there was planning to travel more to China this year compared to last year. "Even at 2-3% growth, a change in political impulse from the world's second largest economy with large scale industrial infrastructure and a massive consumer base isn't to be ignored."

China's Wang Yi and America's Sullivan to meet in Bangkok

WASHINGTON/BEIJING (Reuters) – U.S. National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan will meet with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi in Bangkok on Friday and Saturday, building on a commitment by the two countries' leaders to deepen dialogue between the world's two largest economies.

The Chinese foreign ministry announced the meeting in a separate statement.

The meeting comes a little more than two months after U.S. President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping met for about four hours on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit in San Francisco.

Biden and Xi agreed to open a presidential hotline, resume military-to-military communications, and work to curb fentanyl production, but remained at odds over Taiwan.

"This meeting continues the commitment by both sides at the November 2023 Woodside Summit between President Biden and President Xi to maintain strategic communication and responsibly manage the relationship," Adrienne Watson, spokesperson for the White House National Security Council, said in a statement.

She said Sullivan, who reports directly to Biden, would also meet with Thailand Prime Minister Srettha Thavisin and Deputy Prime Minister Parnpree Bahiddha-nukara.

"In these meetings, Mr. Sullivan will reaffirm the importance of the U.S.-Thailand treaty alliance and partnership and discuss opportunities to strengthen cooperation across a range of bilateral and global issues," Watson said.

India, U.S. firm up plan to counter China's aggression in Indo-Pacific

21 January 2024, The Sunday Guardian

India and the US are working on a "two-fold" strategy to counter China's aggressive agenda in the Indo-Pacific, South China Sea (SCS) and other regions and geographies. One, New Delhi and Washington will fast-track the projects and other developmental works on which they are already working together in the countries which are in the Indo-Pacific region. Two, the Biden administration and the Narendra Modi government have decided to launch joint development initiatives in the “geopolitically and strategically important” countries such as the Philippines, Cambodia, Laos, Mongolia, Myanmar, Afghanistan and Vietnam.

“The sectors in which joint work has to be done are being identified, and a strategy for the same is being finalized. Talks between the US and India are already underway at different levels of governments. External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar and US Secretary of State Antony Blinken have recently briefly reviewed the development so far with the updates on the various such projects,” a source aware of the matter told The Sunday Guardian here in New Delhi. He added, “Jaishankar and Blinken agreed that a comprehensive discussion for finalizing the further strategy needs to be held as soon as possible for which a date to have a higher-level diplomatic meeting will be fixed.”

The US administration says “across much of the Indo-Pacific region, China is using military and economic coercion to bully its neighbours, advance unlawful maritime claims, threaten maritime shipping lanes, and destabilize territory along the periphery of People’s Republic of China (PRC). The US stands with its Southeast Asian allies and partners to champion a free and open Indo-Pacific.” “India also shares US’ views on Chinese bullying and aggressive activities in the Indo-Pacific and both countries want to expand their presence in the countries which are bearing the brunt of an aggressive China,” says a diplomat referring to what transpired so far between Jaishankar and Blinken.

India and the US have, therefore, decided to launch development projects in the Philippines which is facing Chinese aggression. According to sources, diplomatic officials of India and the US are already in talks to plan about how to execute the projects there. Other relevant agencies and establishments have also been taken into confidence, sources said. In fact, the first weeks of 2024 have seen a serious escalation of tension between China and the Philippines in their sovereignty dispute over the Second Thomas Shoal. There have been several run-ins between the two countries’ vessels shooting water cannons at Philippine ships. Naval officials from the countries bordering the Pacific, such as Japan, Russia and the US met in China’s eastern city of Nanjing to discuss the issue of heightened tensions in the South China Sea. But no concrete solutions came out. China continues to lay claim to almost the entire South China Sea which is a conduit for goods worth more than $3 trillion every year. The nations such as Brunei, Malaysia, Taiwan and Vietnam are also competing claims to the same region. But China continues to expand its military footprints to frighten the small countries. It is in this backdrop that India and the US last year decided to strengthen their strategic alliance by enhancing defence and security collaborations and expanding cooperation in the Indo-Pacific. This collaboration happened during the India-US 2+2 dialogue in New Delhi. The expansion of collaborations and expansion of strategic ties between New Delhi and Washington will now be materialized.

Now, India and the US want to expand existing partnerships with the tiny nations in the Indo-Pacific with the objective to ensure development of the countries and also to address the issues resulting from China’s growing military assertiveness in the region, sources said. The focus will be on the Philippines in whose maritime territorial regions China continues to pose a grave threat. India and the US will be working on expediting the existing joint projects which are already underway in other countries which are facing challenges from China. Australia, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Brunei, Cambodia and DPRK, Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia, Nepal, New Zealand, etc. are some of the countries in the Indo-Pacific where the US and India will be fast-tracking their initiatives in what will mark expansion of partnerships with these nations, sources said. The South China Sea, which has long been a focal point of global concern due to China’s belligerent posture in the region, will be on top priority, says an official. India has already exposed how China keeps trying to engage Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) member states in a protracted dialogue on Code of Conduct (CoC in SCS) while at the same time relentlessly pursuing its agenda of island reclamation thereby posing a challenge to regional stability. India and the US have already worked on education, energy, agriculture and health-related development projects in Africa and Southeast Asia in the past. They also have partnered for projects in Cambodia, Afghanistan, Laos, Mongolia, Myanmar and Vietnam. “Now the Biden administration is keen to accelerate the projects in these countries for which it is seeking cooperation from India,” officials told The Sunday Guardian. The Philippines is a key political and security ally of the US. It has recently increased its defence procurement from India as well. The Philippines has received support from the US on several energy projects under the “Energy Secure Philippines” program. India and the US will soon identify the areas where new initiatives could be launched by them, says a diplomat.

China's strength gap with the US will widen as competition deepens, top political scientist says

17 January 2024, South China Morning Post

The gap in national strength between China and the United States is likely to grow – not shrink – over the next decade, according to one of China's most prominent political scientists.

"Over the next 10 years, the strength gap between China and the US might not tend to narrow but rather widen," said Yan Xuetong, director of the Institute of International Relations at Tsinghua University in Beijing.

Speaking on Saturday at a seminar at Tsinghua on forecasts for international relations, Yan did not elaborate on the reasons for his assessment.

But he did say he expected the world's two largest economies to continue to put distance between themselves and all other economies, even if they posted lower annual growth rates.

"In the future, both China and the US will simultaneously widen their gaps with all other countries. The structure is unlikely to change in the next 10 years," he said.

The growing and wide-reaching tensions between the two sides have been widely characterised as a structural contradiction between a ruling power and a rising power.

A broad range of issues – from the recent presidential election in Taiwan and territorial flare-ups in the South China Sea, to tit-for-tat trade restrictions in the midst of a fierce tech war – have accompanied Beijing's rise from a virtually closed economic backwater more than four decades ago to the world's No 2 economy.

As well as being the world's largest exporter and second-largest importer of goods, China is the second-biggest military spender, and has vaulted ahead in several hi-tech fields while increasing its global footprint through strategies like the Belt and Road Initiative.

The Biden administration has framed China as a "pacing threat", and America's only competitor "with both the intent to reshape the international order and, increasingly, the economic, diplomatic, military, and technological power to do it".

Several studies have shown that when measured by purchasing power parity, a metric that adjusts for price level differences across countries, China's economy had passed the US economy as early as 2014.

While some observers are reluctant to say that Washington and Beijing have fallen into a "Thucydides Trap", the competitive relationship between the two nations has been evident when seen through an economic lens, said Qu Hongbin, vice-chairman of the China Chief Economist Forum (CCEF), during an event it sponsored in Shanghai on Saturday.

He was referring to a concept that describes an apparent tendency towards war when an emerging power threatens to displace an existing great power as a regional or international hegemon.

"From a historical perspective, the US, as the current economic hegemon, will naturally feel uneasy and anxious about the rise and development of China and will not stand by and do nothing about it," Qu said.

China could potentially take the top spot as the world's No 1 economy by gross domestic product by 2037, according to a report last month by the London-based Centre for Economics and Business Research.

However, the same consultancy had predicted earlier that China would take first place by 2028.

Debates have emerged about whether China is losing steam in its journey towards dethroning the US economy, as a post-pandemic recovery continues to sputter after the country abandoned strict Covid-19 controls at the beginning of last year.

According to a survey released by the Japanese Chamber of Commerce and Industry in China on Monday, about three-quarters of the 1,713 member companies who responded said they did not expect the Chinese economy to improve in 2024.

China's gross domestic product was 64.5 per cent the size of US GDP in the first half of 2023, down from 77.3 per cent in 2021, due mainly to stalled economic growth and a weaker yuan, according to a note in October from Wang Yongli, general manager at China International Futures.

During the Tsinghua event, Yan said that much of the overestimation of China's economic development was influenced by "wishful thinking".

He also called on Chinese scholars to avoid such mindsets in their analyses of the Sino-American relationship.

"Most of us in the future still hope that China and the US will not compete, but wishes alone do not solve problems. We must suppress our wishes to project where things are going to," he said.

Yan reasoned that bilateral tensions were sharp when Beijing rejected the notion that relations with Washington were competitive, while tensions seemed to ease when Beijing embraced the assumption.

During a speech on January 9, Xie Feng, China's envoy to the US, said "competition is commonplace in the modern world", but added that US-China competition should be "a healthy race to the top, not a zero-sum game".

Yan said that from a realist perspective, the next decade would see "more and more international confrontation and less and less cooperation" due to growing populism around the world.

The role of US-China trade ties in the overall bilateral relationship would diminish despite expected increases in trade volumes, he said.

Yan said that, 10 years ago, when he forecast China's international relations over the coming decade, he did not predict that most countries would opt to distance themselves from Beijing in the US-China competition.

"It's human nature. Amid US-China competition, people tend to choose the stronger side, not the weaker one" he said.

Beijing Criticizes US Proclamation Cracking Down On Corruption, Accuses US of Harboring Corrupt Fugitives

12 January 2024, ChinaScope

On December 11, 2023, U.S. President Biden issued "A Proclamation on Suspension of Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Persons Enabling Corruption." On January 7th, Chinese state media outlet China Discipline Inspection and Monitoring News criticized this proclamation as U.S. "hypocrisy" and "double standards" on anti-corruption efforts. Its article reported that 20 of China's most wanted fugitives are currently hiding in the U.S.

The article states that, in recent years, the U.S. has expanded the concept of national security "to justify long-arm jurisdiction and suppress its rivals, while perpetuating its own hegemony." The report argues that U.S. anti-corruption efforts highlight hypocrisy and hegemonic goals, as well as expose the U.S. as "the world's largest safe haven for corruption assets and fugitives."

Specifically, the article claims that the U.S. hosts the highest concentration of persons from developing countries who are suspected of corruption and white-collar crimes. Of the "100-Person Red Notice List" published by the Chinese Interpol office, 20 out of the 38 fugitives who have not yet been brought to justice in China are said to be hiding in the U.S. (The "100-Person Red Notice List" refers to 100 Chinese former state officials who were suspected of corruption and became fugitives targeted for pursuit by Chinese authorities.)

Some Chinese netizens questioned why the CCP's state media is criticizing the new U.S. entry ban, which ostensibly would make life harder for corrupt individuals fleeing from Chinese authorities. Some netizens speculated that corrupt people [within the CCP] and their families are angry that they can no longer travel to or study in the U.S. One netizen remarked that many families of corrupt Chinese officials will now have to return to China.

EXCLUSIVE: Second-Largest Foreign Owner Of US Land Is A Chinese Communist Party Member

11 January 2024, Daily Caller

The second-largest foreign landowner in the U.S. is a Chinese billionaire who it has been determined is a member of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), according to a Daily Caller News Foundation review of Chinese-language news reports.

Chen Tianqiao, the founder, chairman and CEO of global investment firm Shanda Group, owns approximately 200,000 acres of land in Oregon, according to Land Report. Chen also has extensive ties to the Chinese government, ranging from CCP membership to executive roles in CCP-affiliated organizations, according to a DCNF review of Chinese-language media reports.

In 2015, Chen acquired 198,000 acres in Oregon, according to Land Report. The $85 million purchase made the Chinese national the 82nd-largest property owner in the U.S. and the second-largest foreign U.S. land owner, Bloomberg reported, second only to a Canadian family who owns over 1 million acres of Maine.

Oregon's Bull Springs Skyline Forest accounts for approximately 33,000 of Chen's acreage, according to Land Report. The forest is located west of Bend, Oregon, and is home to springs, creeks, timberland and wildlife, according to the Bull Springs Skyline Forest website.

Oregon Republican Rep. Lori Chavez-DeRemer said she was "deeply concerned that individuals tied to the Chinese Communist Party are buying up timberland, which is one of our most precious and finite resources."

"Foreign ownership of United States lands is a serious problem that has rightfully sparked unease among farmers, ranchers and foresters across the country," Chavez-DeRemer told the DCNF.

Chen also owns several urban properties in the U.S., including the Vanderbilt Mansion in Manhattan, the Seeley Mudd Estate near Los Angeles and a 150,000 square-foot research facility at Caltech called the Tianqiao and Chrissy Chen Institute for Neuroscience — each worth tens of millions of dollars, according to Land Report.

Chinese ownership of U.S. land, in particular agricultural land, has come under increased scrutiny from GOP governors, who see it as a potential national security threat. Several states, including Florida, have taken legislative and executive action to ban Chinese ownership of U.S. farmland, the most recent being Missouri Gov. Mike Parson's January 2024 executive order banning such purchases near military installations.

"One of the Chinese Communist Party's goals is to undermine and weaken America," Florida

Republican Sen. Marco Rubio told the DCFN. "This includes instances where our greatest adversary continues to buy land – whether its farmland or near our installations."

'Despise All Our Enemies'

Born in 1973, Chen served as a student cadre from an early age, state-run media outlet China News Service reported.

"In 1990, Chen enrolled in Fudan University to major in economics, the following year he joined the Chinese Communist Party, and, in 1993, he won the title of 'Shanghai Municipal Outstanding Model Cadre Student,'" according to a DCFN translation of an archived 2005 press release from Chen's alma mater, Fudan University in Shanghai.

Chen was just 18 when he joined the Communist Party, according to a 2007 article from Communist Youth Daily, the official newspaper for the Communist Youth League.

Since joining the Party, Chinese media outlets and business filings have repeatedly identified Chen as a CCP member.

A 2016 Sohu.com article identified Chen and several other Chinese CEOs as CCP members. Likewise, Chen's profile on the Chinese financial portal Sina, which was last updated in November 2023, identifies him as a CCP member.

The state-run Beijing Review describes Chen as an admirer of Mao Zedong, first chairman of the People's Republic of China (PRC). Several Chinese-language outlets have also reported that Chen's corporate office prominently displays Mao's written works.

Chen even has a favorite Mao Zedong quote, according to state-run media outlet China News Service: "Strategically we should despise all our enemies, but tactically we should take them all seriously."

Mao delivered the remarks in a speech denouncing American imperialism during a visit to Moscow in November 1957, according to the University of Dayton Review.

Above and beyond his CCP membership, Chinese government records show that Chen served as a representative to the 11th and 12th councils of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), which ran between 2008 and 2018.

The CPPCC is a Chinese government agency where "all the relevant united front actors inside and outside the party come together: party elders, intelligence officers, diplomats, propagandists, military officers and political commissars, united front workers, academics and businesspeople," former CIA officer Peter Mattis testified to the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence in 2019. "CPPCC delegates attend a high-profile annual meeting to receive direction from the CCP regarding the ways its policies should be characterized to both domestic and foreign audiences," according to the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission. "Delegates to the CPPCC serve as proxies for CCP interests by virtue of their participation in this forum, and they frequently act as interlocutors with foreign government officials, businesses, and academic institutions."

Chinese media reports include photos of Chen attending CPPCC meetings while wearing the government agency's distinctive red, clip-on delegate's badge.

'Growing Cause For Concern'

Chen has also held executive positions with the All-China Federation of Industry and Commerce (ACFIC), including with the group's Shanghai branch, according to the Chinese-language news outlet Sohu.com.

ACFIC describes itself as an organization "led by the Communist Party of China" that "contributes greatly to the Party's united front and economy related work as well as the cause of socialism with Chinese characteristics."

John Dotson, deputy director of Global Taiwan Institute, told the DCFN that ACFIC is subordinate to the United Front Work Department (UFW), which is a CCP agency whose operations are a "blend of engagement, influence activities and intelligence operations," according to the House Select Committee on the CCP.

"In regards to the All-China Federation of Industry and Commerce, it's definitely a subordinate agency of the UFW – that's not even a matter for analysis or interpretation," Dotson told the DCFN. "In public Chinese sources, ACFIC is openly listed as a subordinate branch of the UFW."

ACFIC could not be reached for comment.

"The increase in PRC-affiliated U.S. land purchases in recent years is a growing cause for concern," a House Select Committee on the CCP aide told the DCFN. "We can start with adding a presumption of denial for entities affiliated with the PRC when it comes to land acquisitions near national security sites such as military bases that the CCP could use for intelligence collection or worse."

A Shanda spokesperson contacted the DCFN by email and said that Chen Tianqiao had been a CPPCC member.

"As a nationally recognized entrepreneur in the early 2000s, Mr. Chen was indeed a member of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, an advisory committee within China," the spokesperson wrote. "He resigned from this position in late 2017."

However, the spokesperson refused to answer whether or not Chen Tianqiao was a CCP member, despite being asked several times.

The spokesperson also shared a 2015 document with the DCNF that was sent from the Department of Treasury to Whitefish Cascades Forest Resource, LLC, which the billionaire used as his investment vehicle to purchase the land in Oregon, according to Land Report.

The 2015 document states that the Treasury Department determined that there were "no unresolved national security concerns" that would prohibit Whitefish Cascades from purchasing the Oregon land.

"Shanda proactively and voluntarily, asked CFIUS to review the potential acquisition of the land before starting the process to ensure there were no concerns," Shanda's spokesperson told the DCNF by email.

The Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) is "an interagency committee authorized to review certain transactions involving foreign investment in the United States and certain real estate transactions by foreign persons, in order to determine the effect of such transactions on the national security of the United States," according to the Treasury Department.

The Shanda spokesperson also told the DCNF that the company engages in several activities supporting the local community in Oregon including offering "public access for outdoor recreation and work with the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife to provide exclusive hunting opportunities for disabled veterans and young people" and donating "ten acres to the Crescent Rural Fire Department to house a community center and headquarters for the fire department."

Taiwan spotlights China crackdown on Hong Kong ahead of key poll

11 January 2024, Times of India

TAIPEI: As Taiwan prepares to hold a closely watched election on Saturday, the main political parties have highlighted China's crackdown in Hong Kong and rejected Beijing's model of governance there being applied to the self-ruled island.

The former British colony of Hong Kong returned to Chinese rule in 1997 and Beijing has often promoted the "one country, two systems" model of rule there as appropriate for democratic Taiwan which China claims as its own.

"Regarding Hong Kong, I once again urge Beijing to treat Hong Kong well," said the main opposition Kuomintang party's vice presidential candidate, Jaw Shaw-kong, who referred to an ongoing national security trial in Hong Kong involving China critic Jimmy Lai that could see him jailed for life.

"Jimmy Lai should be treated well and given a fair trial. It is not right that ... the government appoints three judges for him, with a trial lasting 80 days - the outcome of which I can already predict," Jaw told reporters on Thursday.

Lai, a businessman and activist, faces a charge of colluding with foreign forces, including with prominent political figures in the United States, in a trial that has drawn international attention.

"If Beijing treats Hong Kong in this manner, the people of Taiwan are watching. The Taiwanese people will absolutely not accept the 'one country, two systems' framework," Jaw added.

Hong Kong returned to Chinese rule with the promise of a high degree of autonomy under the one country, two systems model that guarantees an independent judiciary and liberties often denied in China, including freedom of expression and of assembly.

Critics, however, say China has reneged on its promises, especially with the enactment of the national security law in 2020 that has led to the jailing of democratic activists, the closure of liberal media outlets and civil society groups and a crackdown on dissent. Beijing says the national security law has restored order after mass pro-democracy protests in 2019.

Earlier in the week, Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) presidential candidate, Lai Ching-te, was critical of Hong Kong's lack of freedoms under Chinese rule, saying the same could happen to Taiwan if Beijing has its way. "If China succeeds in intervening, whoever China designates to support will be elected. Of course, Taiwan's democracy will not exist. Then Taiwan is not electing a president ... it is electing a chief executive, just like Hong Kong," Lai told reporters on Tuesday.

"While we have ideals for peace, we cannot afford to have illusions. Accepting Beijing's 'one China' principle is not true peace.

Without legitimate sovereignty, it's a false peace, just like in Hong Kong."

Taiwan President Tsai Ing-wen said last month that people should think of what happened to Hong Kong when they vote. The DPP has been a staunch advocate of rights in Hong Kong and has criticised China's clampdown on the city under the national security law.

At the last election in 2020, Tsai also emphasised Hong Kong's plight, with the crackdown on pro-democracy protesters there helping her to a resounding re-election victory.

China tells U.S. it will 'never compromise' on Taiwan as the island's election draws near

10 January 2024, NBC News

HONG KONG — China said it would “never compromise” on its claims of sovereignty over Taiwan as the U.S. and China concluded two days of military talks in Washington, part of an effort to restore communication between the two countries’ militaries.

The talks were held days before Taiwan, a self-ruling island democracy, holds a presidential election that will shape its relationship with China, as well as ties between China and the U.S., Taiwan’s most important international backer.

China’s stated ambition to “reunify” with Taiwan, by force if necessary, is among the most sensitive issues between the U.S. and China, whose relationship has in recent years fallen to its lowest point in decades.

China said it would “not make any concession or compromise on the Taiwan question and demanded that the U.S. side abide by the one-China principle, honor relevant commitments, stop arming Taiwan, and not support Taiwan independence,” according to a readout published by the Chinese Defense Ministry on Wednesday.

The 17th round of the U.S.-China Defense Policy Coordination Talks was held Monday and Tuesday for the first time since 2021. They were led by Michael Chase, deputy assistant secretary of defense for China, Taiwan and Mongolia, and Maj. Gen. Song Yanchao, deputy director of China’s Central Military Commission Office for International Military Cooperation.

According to a Pentagon readout, Chase “highlighted the importance of maintaining open lines of military-to-military communication in order to prevent competition from veering into conflict.”

He also reiterated Washington’s commitment to its long-standing “One China” policy, under which the U.S. recognizes Beijing as the sole legitimate government of China but maintains unofficial relations with Taipei.

China said it was willing to develop a “healthy and stable” military relationship “on the basis of equality and respect.” It urged the U.S. to reduce its military presence and “provocation” in the South China Sea, a strategically important waterway that China claims virtually in its entirety, and to “stop supporting provocative actions” by certain countries, without identifying them.

The Pentagon said Chase “underscored the importance of respect for high seas freedom of navigation” in the face of continued Chinese “harassment” of Philippine vessels operating lawfully in the South China Sea.

President Joe Biden and Chinese Xi Jinping agreed to resume military ties at a meeting in San Francisco in November, their first meeting in a year. China had cut off military communications in 2022 after then-House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., visited Taiwan over its objections.

China Foreign Minister: Healthy US-China Ties 'No Longer a Choice'

05 January 2024, VOA

China’s top diplomat said Friday cooperation between his country and the United States is no longer a choice but an imperative and called for a healthy development of China U.S. relations.

Speaking at an event in Beijing commemorating 45 years of diplomatic ties between the two countries, China’s Foreign Minister Wang Yi said under current global circumstances, the U.S. and China have more common interests than ever and the need for cooperation is enhanced.

“It can be said that China-United States cooperation is no longer a dispensable choice for the two countries or even for the world, but a mandatory question that must be seriously addressed,” Wang said.

He called for the two sides to make full use of all mechanisms that have been restored between them to “build bridges of communication between them.” Wang called for cooperation in the areas of diplomacy, economy, finance, commerce and agriculture.

The foreign minister’s conciliatory words come after a year in which tensions between the two superpowers intensified. Early in 2023, the discovery of a Chinese spy balloon floating through U.S. airspace delayed a U.S. diplomatic visit to the country by Secretary of State Antony Blinken. The balloon was eventually shot down.

China’s relationship with Russia, its ongoing threats against Taiwan, territorial disputes in the South China Sea and fair-trade issues have also hampered Beijing’s ties with Washington.

China- U.S. relations thawed somewhat toward the end of 2023, with Chinese President Xi Jinping and U.S. President Joe Biden holding a meeting in San Francisco on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit. Biden administration officials held visits and meetings with their Chinese counterparts soon after.

Xi and Biden exchanged New Year's greetings early this week, with both leaders noting the anniversary of diplomatic ties.

'China, US should strive towards peaceful coexistence,' Xi Jinping says to Joe Biden 01 January 2024, Live MintIn a letter to US President Joe Biden on January 1, Chinese President Xi Jinping emphasized that history has demonstrated the importance of maintaining mutual respect and peaceful coexistence as the correct approach for fostering positive relations between China and the United States, Bloomberg reported.

This comes as both nations work towards repairing their strained diplomatic ties.

Xi said in the letter commemorating 45 years of diplomatic ties between the two countries, according to a report by state-run broadcaster CCTV, "Over the past 45 years, China-US relations have weathered storms and moved forward. It has not only improved the well-being of people from both countries, but also contributed to global peace, stability and prosperity."

The relationship between the United States and China remains delicate, especially concerning Beijing's strong ties with Russia and its position on Taiwan. However, there has been a recent thaw in the relationship, notably after the meeting between Xi Jinping and Joe Biden in November in San Francisco. The meeting resulted in some minor diplomatic achievements, indicating a slight improvement in bilateral ties.

In his congratulatory letter, President Biden recognized that the relationship between the United States and China has contributed to the prosperity and opportunities for both nations, as well as for the global community.

"I look forward to building on the progress made by our predecessors, as well as on our meetings and discussions to continue to advance the relationship between the US and China," Biden said.

Indian Tibetan community's struggles in exile: Declining numbers, preservation of art & culture

30 December 2024, The Print, Keshav Padmanabhan

COMMENTARIES

The community, headquartered in Dharamshala, has increasingly faced a number of challenges, especially since 2008. Falling number of Tibetans fleeing China has impacted them severely.

The Tibetan community in Dharamshala is grappling with new problems—drop in enrollment numbers in the schools established by them, preservation of their traditional art and culture, and increased emigration from India to the western world. The challenges faced by the exiled Tibetan community, headquartered in Himachal Pradesh, are largely due to a significant decline in the number of Tibetans fleeing China over the past decade and a half.

From around 3,000 refugees a year, till around 2008, the Tibetan resettlement office in Dharamshala in 2023 had to focus their efforts on resettling just six refugees, said Kunchok Migmar, the Tibetan settlement officer for the district, in an interaction with media persons earlier this month.

The fall in numbers fleeing has been especially acute since 2008—following the unrests witnessed that year in multiple provinces of China, including the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR), Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu and Yunnan, primarily in the months from March till May and then sporadically till the end of the year. The unrest also coincided with Beijing hosting the Summer Olympics for the first time.

According to various Tibetans living in exile, both events led to significant restrictions on the routes used to flee China for India.

According to the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in exile, at least 344 protests of different magnitudes occurred throughout 2008. Nearly 7,000 Tibetans were arrested and around 200 were killed during the protests, according to the CTA, while China maintains that at least 19 people were killed by the protestors, who were predominantly Han Chinese.

"Before 2008, the Tibetan Children's Villages (TCV)—the schooling system set up by the community in exile—had roughly 17,000 students. Now there are only 5,000 students across all the schools, with around 500 students in the senior classes," said Kalsang Phuntsok, the General Secretary of TCV in an interaction with media persons.

Phuntsok added, "The 1980s saw an influx of Tibetans coming to India, leading to the opening of new schools. The number of students has started diminishing for a number of reasons. The two primary reasons are the falling number of Tibetans coming from China, and dropping fertility rates."

The TCV, established in 1960 by the Dalai Lama for orphaned children who were among the early Tibetan refugees fleeing China, was originally managed by Tsering Dolma, the elder sister of the spiritual leader. However, after she passed away in 1964, its management passed into the hands of Jetsun Pema.

From 51 students in 1960, the TCV has seen over 50,000 students pass through its residence halls in 64 years—a third of the total Tibetan population in exile.

"By 2030, two or three of our schools will be left with no students. We are already thinking about closing down TCV Lower Dharamshala next year as it has only 74 students on its rolls," said Phuntsok. "At our homes (dormitories), there were 80 to 100 children living together from ages of 6 to 14 at one point in time. Today there are about 20 to 30 children per home."

As the number of Tibetans in exile continues to decline, the community has adapted, in a manner, by inviting Trans-Himalayan communities, such as those from Arunachal Pradesh and Ladakh, to participate in protecting their culture.

Today, around 30 percent of students in TCVs are Indian citizens from these regions and communities with communal links to the Tibetan community.

Earlier this year, the TCV administration extended an invitation to the Tibetan exile community living outside India to send their children to study in its traditional schooling system. This year, around six children from different countries were sent.

Over the years, many Tibetans living in India have emigrated, spreading the community across 130 countries, with a significant concentration in the Western world. Approximately half of the Tibetan exile population—around 80,000 people—remains in India.

Impact on Tibetan arts and culture

For Tibetans in exile, the diminishing number of those fleeing China also has an impact on the preservation of its traditional arts and culture. According to the United Nations, at least a million Tibetan children in China have been slowly assimilated into the larger Han Chinese cultural norms through Beijing's residential schooling system.

This has an impact on their native language and traditions, both of which the community living in exile are doing their best to preserve. One of the earliest institutions that the Dalai Lama setup mere months after arriving in India is the Tibetan Institute of Performing Arts (TIPA).

Founded in Kalimpong, before moving to Dharamshala in 1961, the institute has seen around 550 students pass through its residential programmes in studying various Tibetan art forms, including Lhamo (opera), as well as carpentry, music and other traditional performing arts.

"Our focus is not only on preserving Tibetan culture, but also Trans-Himalayan traditions in Ladakh and Tawang. In recent years, students from these regions have also been given training at TIPA," said Dhondup Tsering, the director of the institute, in an interaction with media persons.

Around two decades ago, TIPA had about 50-60 students on their rolls going through the full seven-year training programme. Today, the number of students at TIPA is around 35.

"We are looking to collaborate with institutions in India, like the National School of Drama in New Delhi, and other institutes to help promote our culture across the country," added Dhondup Tsering.

Earlier this year, the institute held an open call in the various schools in the surrounding areas of Dharamshala in order to find more students to train at TIPA. Primarily funded by grants from the Indian Ministry of External Affairs (MEA), TIPA has continued to promote art forms including the famed snow-lion performances apart from the annual Shoton Festival held in the months of June and July.

Similar to how Tibetan schools have adapted to bring in students from Ladakh and other regions across the Himalayas, TIPA is looking to expand its collaboration and training with new institutes that have slowly been created in these areas.

15th Dalai Lama: Will Tenzin Gyatso name successor on his 90th birthday?

30 December 2024, Money Control

The Dalai Lama fled to India in early 1959, following a failed uprising against Chinese rule. Since then, he has led the Tibetan government-in-exile and maintained his spiritual leadership for Tibetan Buddhists.

The 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso's, recent reassurance regarding his health has added to the growing speculation regarding his continuity as the spiritual leader and the head of the Tibetan Buddhists or his decision to name a successor. The public talk around the appointment of the 15th Dalai Lama has grown ever since Tenzin Gyatso (the incumbent spiritual head) underwent a knee surgery in New York earlier this year.

"According to my dream, I may live 110 years," the Dalai Lama said when asked about his health and how he was feeling. This reply has become familiar to those who have closely followed the Nobel laureate, as he has been offering similar assurances for years.

The Dalai Lama fled to India in early 1959, following a failed uprising against Chinese rule. Since then, he has led the Tibetan government-in-exile and maintained his spiritual leadership for Tibetan Buddhists. Beijing, however, insists it will choose his successor. The Dalai Lama, on the other hand, has maintained that his reincarnation could be found in India, and warned that any successor chosen by China would not be respected by his followers.

Tibetan Buddhists believe that learned monastics are reincarnated after death as newborns. Thus, the question of his successor has remained central to the community's future. His prediction of living for another two decades is a comfort to his followers, though many still seek clarity on how the transition will unfold.

Dolma Tsering Teykhang, the deputy speaker of the Tibetan parliament-in-exile, which is also based in Dharamshala, noted that more clarity on the Dalai Lama's succession could come when he turns 90 in July. "We are just lay people, we can't fathom his wisdom, so we are waiting for his clear guidance," Teykhang told Reuters in her office, which is located about 2 km (1.5 miles) from the Dalai Lama's residence.

Bracing for a Chinese storm in the Indian Ocean

29 December 2024, Deccan Herald, Srikanth Kondapalli

A quiet but steady Tsunami is building in the Indian Ocean Region (IOR), qualitatively different from the one that hit 20 years ago but orchestrated by China through its trade, energy dependence, frantic maritime dual-use port construction, unleashing massive surveillance, flooding the region with arms sales, and power projection. In 2012, China's 18th Communist Party Congress passed a resolution for "building a strong maritime nation". Since then, China's maritime footprint is expanding to include trade, energy imports and exploration, fisheries, marine transportation, shipbuilding industry, naval build-up, search for bases abroad, and others. China is currently building its maritime power and making efforts to create an alternative maritime order. At the conceptual level, even though China is not an IOR state, it floated the "China-Indian Ocean Region" initiative for building a "maritime community with a shared future".

China has become a major trading partner for the 38 Indian Ocean states. Since the 2013 launch of the Maritime Silk Road, China has a naval support base at Djibouti, 24 maritime ports under construction of which nine have been completed, and five maritime outposts in the IOR. These include the 99-year lease of the Kyaukphyu port which connects with the oil and gas pipeline to Yunnan and expansion of dual-use infrastructure in Coco Islands in Myanmar, a 99-year lease of Hambantota and Colombo Port Terminal in Sri Lanka, a 45-year lease of Gwadar in Pakistan, Payra and Chittagong in Bangladesh, Darwin in Australia, and others. These agreements come in handy for China to exert pressure to dock its ships. In 2014, for instance, a Chinese submarine docked at Colombo port and surveillance ships at Hambantota.

China is building at a cost of $29 billion three railway lines to Thailand, Cambodia and Laos, eventually connecting to Laem Chabang Port in the Gulf of Thailand. Thailand and China are also planning a "land bridge" to connect the Andaman Sea and the Gulf of Thailand.

China conducted surveillance missions and cyber warfare in the IOR, expanded naval arms exports to Myanmar, Bangladesh and Pakistan, besides signing military aid agreement with Maldives, in March 2024. However, in September 2019, India expelled the Chinese research vessel Shi Yan 1 after it was found operating without permission in India's exclusive economic zone (EEZ) around the Andaman and Nicobar Islands (ANI).

China's navy is now the world's largest at 370 vessels, aspiring to grow to 435 by 2030. India, in contrast, aspires to acquire 175 ships by 2035 from the current 132. China has sent 46 naval contingents to the Indian Ocean since 2008, some of which conducted amphibious operations and air defence exercises that are not relevant for counter-piracy operations in the Somali coast, thus violating its UN Security Council commitments.

At any given time, China has eight to ten warships deployed in IOR, apart from research or spy vessels and many illegal fishing vessels. It despatches a submarine every month and in 2020, executed the use of unmanned underwater drones to map the ocean floor around the ANI. With three aircraft carriers, with a plan to have 11 in all, China is poised to send carrier task force patrols to the IOR by 2025.

It is estimated that China gets more than 80 million tonnes of fish in the Indo-Pacific through illegal fishing that violates Article 56 of the international maritime laws under the UNCLOS. Illegal, unreported and unregulated (IUU) fishing has become a major problem. It is in this context that the Quad launched in 2022 Indo-Pacific Partnership for Maritime Domain Awareness to combat IUU fishing and monitor "dark shipping". In July this year, the Quad foreign ministers meeting at Tokyo decided to take concrete measures in this regard.

To protect its maritime interests, India initiated its first joint integrated command, the Andaman & Nicobar Command (ANC) in 2001. It protects 600,000 sq km of EEZ in the region that is about 30% of India's 2 million sq km. Yet, the security situation is becoming complicated with China's naval forays. China's leader Mao Zedong once observed: "whatever the enemy has, we should have". The ANC should deploy the most modern equipment and skills to safeguard not only India's national interests but also the "preferred partners" in the region.

India needs to adopt a comprehensive strategy and take steps to protect its maritime interests and the Ten Degree Channel, boost its Act East Policy by leapfrogging from the ANI, build world-class infrastructure (including a transshipment facility at Great Nicobar), evolve connectivity between ANI and Sabang Port in Indonesia.

India also needs to enhance unmanned underwater drones and long-endurance submarines for deterrence operations, assist in capacity build-up and conduct surveillance, search and rescue operations with South East Asia and enhance conventional and strategic capabilities at the ANC.

On a path to embrace Chinese models

29 December 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Ajaya Bhadra Khanal

Nepal's plurality of parties and its ingrained kleptocratic system will undermine Oli's efforts.

As the year 2024 ends, it is the time to question, "What next?" With Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli at the helm, the question has become even more interesting.

In the face of increased geopolitical rivalry at the global and regional levels, what kind of foreign policy is Nepal practising, and where will it take the country? What are the prospects for economic development and democratic evolution?

Given the status of political party dynamics, geopolitical tussle and Nepal's weak diplomatic capacity, Nepal's prospects of economic development and democratic evolution look bleak at best. Oli's efforts to emulate China's growth model and political party discipline will also be undermined by the plurality of political parties and an ingrained kleptocratic system.

Geopolitics

In December, Nepal signed a landmark framework agreement with China on the Belt and Road Initiative after intense negotiations between the Nepali Congress and the CPN-UML on the one hand and between Nepal and China on the other. Nepal was able to revise and trim down China's proposed "BRI Implementation Plan" according to Nepal's priorities. However, Nepal's proposal to develop the Nepal-China Friendship Park in Damak and consent to insert security and global initiatives in the joint communiqué, despite India's concern, may have raised red flags.

Nepal's efforts to exercise strategic autonomy in the face of asymmetric power balance and geopolitical rivalry are undermined by several flaws. First, of course, is the political predilection, which heavily favours China. During several negotiations with China, Nepal's bureaucracy and political leadership appear soft on China but hard on India.

A series of events since 2008 shows that China has always favoured communist governments and that grants and aid disbursements tend to peak when leftist coalitions are in power.

The second factor is Nepal's inability to build trusted relations with China and India and ensure national interests. As China's influence grows in Nepal, India has adopted a two-pronged policy of both engaging Nepal and adopting policy measures to limit the Chinese influence.

There is a real possibility that India will continue to harden the border and create safeguards to limit Chinese access to the Indian market through Nepal. This will likely impact Nepal's connectivity and trade with India in the future, which in turn will affect Nepal's economic trajectory and viability of large infrastructure projects.

The third is Nepali elites' gradual alignment with Chinese interests and distancing from India. It has now become a paradox that while Nepal seeks to enjoy the privileges of the special arrangements ensured by the 1950 treaty with India, it wants to disregard India's traditional interests in Nepal.

One example is Pokhara Regional International Airport (PRIA). Two years after its inauguration, it has seen only 10 international flights, all of them chartered or relief efforts. The officials of CAAN do not have any reasonable near term strategy to make the airport financially viable or to service debts. The situation is so dire that an ordinary Airbus 319 flight from Pokhara to Kathmandu last week was highlighted with much fanfare by the Nepali media.

Regional power dynamics, particularly with India, have affected the airport's viability. When the PRIA was being considered, bilateral relations were invoked—the airport was framed as "critical" to Nepal-China relations. During its inauguration, China positioned the airport as part of BRI and the Trans Himalayan Multidimensional Connectivity Network.

Media reports this week widely discussed the worsening relationship between Oli and India. Indian media reported that although Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba was on a private visit to India, she was disappointed not to meet senior leaders. She was hoping to push forward the agenda of Oli's visit to India. As India appears to ignore him, Oli, meanwhile, is cozying up to Pakistan and attempting to revive SAARC.

Politics

Another significant arena is politics and the direction of Nepal's democracy.

It is now well accepted that Nepal is in a "low-growth, high migration trap". With structural and psychological pressures getting worse, political disruption is possible if the current political regime is unable to deliver economic growth and governance reforms.

However, Nepal's politics shows no signs of reforms or the willingness to address underlying factors that have trapped Nepal in a low-growth, high-migration dynamics.

The three primary sources of power in Nepal's political parties are the relative position of party leaders in the national kleptocracy, their bonds with China and India, and their relationship with political competitors.

Membership in the entrenched national kleptocracy ensures that party leaders can extract resources from the state and obtain rent even if they do not hold any official public position.

Nepal's inability to address corruption and money laundering was reflected in the Mutual Evaluation Review of the Asia-Pacific Group (APG) on Money Laundering. Last week, the Nepal Rastra Bank governor, Maha Prasad Adhikari, gave dire news to the Prime Minister that the APG may be losing patience with Nepal.

According to an expedited follow up report, Nepal has made some progress in addressing technical compliance deficiencies. While Nepal has taken some legislative measures, their effectiveness is questionable and several recommendations remain unsatisfactory.

Internally, Nepal's three major parties have their own problems. While the UML appeared to be on a path to emulate the Communist Party of China, there were signs that the internal power balance of other major parties was transforming, including in the Nepali Congress and the Maoist Centre.

According to a Naya Patrika report, Oli is enamoured by China's development model and the Communist Party of China. He wants to introduce tough disciplinary measures to "unify" the party and align every member around the top leadership.

Only last week, the party took disciplinary action against three popular figures who dared to question Oli's authoritarian streak and his hobnobbing with crony capitalists. The action created ripples in the political sphere although UML members kept quiet, indicating that exercising freedom of expression in the party would come at a great cost.

A large chunk of the Nepali electorate is already ideologically aligned with leftist forces. Now, party leaders of the UML will have both threat power and agenda-setting power to control dissent and differences in the party—a fertile environment for leaders with authoritarian streaks.

When he came to power in 2018, Oli took several policy initiatives, though unsuccessful, to enforce his vision on the society, curtailing freedom of expression and constricting the space for civil society. He also centralised regulatory and legal authorities and made selective use of power to weaken his political opponents.

Incidents in the last few months indicate he has not changed. His close ties with China have emboldened him to pursue the Chinese models, both in terms of political power and economic development.

However, unlike China, Nepal has multiple parties, and replicating China's political model would be difficult, especially when voters have multiple choices.

What will China's new mega dam mean for India ties and fragile Tibetan ecosystem?

28 December 2024, SCMP, Shi Jiangtao

Huge hydro project in Tibet could risk geological disasters and irk New Delhi as neighbours try to ease tensions, observers say

Beijing's approval of a controversial mega dam on a river flowing from Tibet autonomous region into India, has raised concerns about the project's environmental impact and its effect on China-India ties, which had been on the mend.

The dam on the lower reaches of the Yarlung Tsangpo River is expected to be the world's largest hydroelectric project and could generate three times the power of the Three Gorges Dam. Its construction will mark a major step in China's plan to tap the hydropower potential of the Tibetan Plateau.

But it could also intensify a dam-building competition between the Asian neighbours near their disputed Himalayan border, according to diplomatic and environmental experts.

State news agency Xinhua said on Wednesday that the Chinese government had recently approved the massive project, which was included in Beijing's 14th five-year plan from 2021 to 2025.

The report did not specify the exact location of the project on Tibet's longest river, which becomes the Brahmaputra River when it flows into the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, an area viewed by China as part of southern Tibet. The river also flows into Bangladesh, where it is called the Jamuna.

But what is known is that the project will be built on a section referred to as the Grand Canyon, or the "Great Bend", on the lower reaches of the Yarlung Tsangpo.

According to a 2020 estimate by state-owned Power Construction Corporation of China, the dam, located in one of the most hydropower-rich areas of the world, is expected to produce nearly 300 billion kilowatt-hours (kWh) of electricity annually.

It would dwarf the Three Gorges Dam on the Yangtze River, now the world's biggest dam, which was designed to generate 88.2 billion kWh a year.

Xinhua hailed the proposed dam as a "safe project that prioritises ecological protection" and a "green project aimed at promoting low-carbon development" that would help the country meet its carbon peak and neutrality goals.

Chinese foreign ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning said on Friday that the project had undergone decades of research, including measures to address risks in project security and environmental impact and prevent negative effects downstream.

"China will continue to maintain current exchange channels with downstream nations and step up cooperation on disaster prevention and mitigation," she said.

But most experts were far from convinced, expressing concerns about how the project could affect the fragile ecosystem of the Tibetan Plateau, local communities and downstream countries – in addition to its enormous engineering costs and challenges.

Fan Xiao, a geologist based in Sichuan province, said the dam's location was in a rare "biodiversity hotspot" in a geologically unstable area, which could potentially lead to "irreparable damage" to the environment.

He noted the area is very seismically active, and building a cascade of mega hydropower stations – involving high dams, large reservoirs and giant tunnels – would increase the risk of landslides and other disasters.

"The geological instability and the likelihood of geological disasters in the Yarlung Tsangpo Grand Canyon are much higher than those of other rivers in western China, where we've seen plenty of instances of negative impacts as a result of cascaded hydropower development," he said.

"I'm afraid the construction of the proposed hydropower project would incur unprecedented huge costs and face enormous risks."

He added that a dam-building frenzy in southwest China over the past two decades had resulted in the overdevelopment of hydropower in the region and an oversupply of power due to a lack of market demand, both domestically and internationally.

Fan questioned official claims touting hydropower as "green, renewable and zero-carbon electricity", noting that mega dam projects were mainly driven by economic considerations and vested interest groups, without proper scientific feasibility studies or adequate public involvement.

"It remains unclear if the incalculable cost of possible geological disasters, environmental damage, and the social and cultural impact has been included in the assessment and decision-making process, or if the ecological and environmental impact on the downstream Brahmaputra River and the plains of the South Asian subcontinent has been fully taken into account," he said.

Sayanangshu Modak, a researcher on transboundary rivers and water governance at the University of Arizona, said that for India, a major concern was the risk of dam failure during emergencies caused by unprecedented weather or seismic events.

"This area is highly prone to earthquakes of varying magnitudes due to intense seismic activity from endogenic forces," he said, noting that a massive glacier collapse in March 2021 near the Great Bend area blocked the river and caused water levels to rise by 10 metres (33 feet).

"These cascading effects underscore the fragility of the region and the grave risks associated with large-scale hydropower projects," he said.

The project has long been a source of friction between China and its downstream neighbours, with India and Bangladesh repeatedly raising concerns about China's dam construction plan upstream of the Brahmaputra River, a critical source of fresh water for both countries.

While New Delhi may have limited options to prevent China from building the proposed dam within its territory, Modak said it would cast fresh uncertainty over bilateral ties, which had been on the mend in recent weeks.

Days after a meeting between Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping in October – their first since a deadly border clash in 2020 – the two sides agreed to de-escalate tensions along their disputed Himalayan frontier.

China's top diplomat, Wang Yi, and Indian national security adviser Ajit Doval also met in Beijing earlier this month for their first high-level border talks in five years.

Modak said India's concerns were "both immense and legitimate", although it was still too early to tell if the colossal dam project would escalate into a new flashpoint between the two countries.

He said that for China, the hydropower project would showcase "China's technical prowess and superiority in hydraulic engineering" while "bolstering China's position as a pre-eminent expert in dam construction – a reputation it has actively sought to export through state-owned enterprises and overseas investments".

Modak said it was "only a matter of time" before Beijing moved to tap the hydropower potential of the Yarlung Tsangpo basin, where only 0.3 per cent of the total energy potential has been harnessed so far. "With the Yarlung Tsangpo River dropping nearly 2,000 metres as it winds around the Namcha Barwa [mountain] and through the Grand Canyon, this area offers one of the world's most favourable hydraulic gradients for hydropower development," he said.

"Its remote location, only connected to the rest of the country by highway in 2013, has delayed such exploitation."

Modak said India increasingly viewed the water issues surrounding the mega dam through the lens of national security, with Delhi accelerating its own dam construction downstream on the same river.

"This move appears to be part of India's strategy to assert its prior appropriation rights, reflecting the competitive and strategic nature of this unfolding scenario," he said.

Reuters reported in July that India planned to spend US$1 billion to expedite construction of 12 hydropower stations in Arunachal Pradesh in response to China's planned dam project.

A 2022 report published by the United States Institute of Peace said China and India were intensifying their competition over Brahmaputra water and dam projects as "a form of territorial demarcation and control along a contested frontier". It described the so-called Great Bend Dam as the most ambitious and controversial project on the mainstem of the Brahmaputra, where nearly 20 dams have been identified with satellite imagery.

India has planned as many as 150 dams within Arunachal Pradesh since the early 2000s as part of its strategy aimed at "signalling control of not only water but territory", according to the think tank's report.

Modak also expressed concerns about the "profound ecological and cultural consequences" as a result of the escalation of the dam-building spree, including the displacement of people in both Tibet and Arunachal Pradesh.

"Between India and China, one certainty emerges: the region's unique biodiversity and the heritage of its indigenous peoples will inevitably suffer," he said. It is ultimately about trust, and it is no secret that China and India still do not trust each other

Liu Zongyi, foreign policy expert

Ni Lexiong, a Shanghai-based security analyst, said the mega dam project was likely to reignite a war of words between the two countries over whether Beijing was trying to control the flow of the Brahmaputra as strategic leverage over Delhi.

"There has been a lot of talk about 'water wars' in the Indian press. The building of a dam within China may not have been a big deal if the two countries had friendlier ties, but when they treat each other increasingly as a rival, anything could be used as a weapon, including water issues," he said.

While Beijing insisted that tapping the potential of the Yarlung Tsangpo River was a matter of sovereignty, Ni said a mega dam at the Great Bend may effectively put China in a favourable position in its dealings with India.

"Intentionally or not, it would effectively create geopolitical leverage vis-a-vis India diplomatically, and it's not surprising that India sees it as a threat. But it may also deal a blow to bilateral ties, which have just begun to show signs of a thaw," he said.

However, Liu Zongyi, a senior fellow with the Shanghai Institutes for International Studies' South Asia and China Centre, said Beijing had taken into account concerns from its downstream neighbours when rolling out the dam project.

Liu said the impact of China's dam-building activities on the flow of the Brahmaputra was "not as significant as commonly perceived".

He rejected suggestions that Beijing was trying to contain India, as the hydropower project was within China's territory.

Liu said India's plan to expedite dam construction in Arunachal Pradesh laid bare its focus on strengthening its control of the area, which China claims as southern Tibet.

"While India and its Western partners are likely to vent their frustration over the project by smearing China, I don't think the dam project will have a lasting impact on Sino-Indian ties," he said.

Liu added it was possible there would be setbacks in restoring the China-India relationship, especially after the return of US president-elect Donald Trump to the White House in January.

"It is ultimately about trust, and it is no secret that China and India still do not trust each other," he said.

The Next Dalai Lama: His Reincarnation And Why It Matters For India

27 December 2024, StratNewsGlobal

Former Foreign Secretary Vijay Gokhale examines various options before India as the Dalai Lama succession issue moves forward given his advancing years and health

On July 6, 2025 when Tibet's exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama, turns 90, he is expected to lend more clarity on the issue of his succession. Thus far, his pronouncements on the matter have hinted at various outcomes. Sample this, addressed to a group of journalists in Dharmasala in 2019.

"The reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, the future of the Dalai Lama, is ultimately in my own hands. At the time of my death, I will write some will. So my rebirth I think will somewhere (be in the ) Buddhist community. As early as 1969, I made clear (whether) the institution of Dalai Lama should continue or not (is) up to the Tibetan people. Reincarnation is not important, it's important that Buddha's teachings remain."

China, on the other hand, claims that it alone has the right to decide on the reincarnation and therefore the succession. It already has a Panchen Lama, appointed in 1995 after setting aside the Dalai Lama's anointment of six year old Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the Panchen Lama. His whereabouts are unknown.

This throws the door open for a number of scenarios that India needs to prepare for, argues Vijay Gokhale, former foreign secretary and ambassador to China. In a paper for the Carnegie India think tank written in November 2024, Gokhale has articulated those scenarios or options.

Scenarios That Could Play Out

What if the Dalai Lama decides that the reincarnation process could begin in India? By convention and practice the Indian state does not interfere in the selection of any religious leader in the country, Gokhale notes. Practitioners and followers of Tibetan Buddhism are there in some of the north Indian states. All the Government of India can do is to reiterate the constitutional position, that the Tibetan Buddhists are entitled to choose their own leader freely and without interference.

Dialogue: Should India publicly call for a dialogue between the Dalai Lama and China? This is not something the Indian government has ever called for but with the growing international calls for such a dialogue, India could support it given the presence of a large exiled Tibetan community in the country. India can call for such dialogue independently and on the basis of "3 Mutuals – mutual respect, mutual sensitivity and mutual interests."

Self-Determination: Should India support the exiled Tibetan community's demand for self-determination? This has not been the case in the past, writes Gokhale, but points to China calling upon India to resolve Kashmir in accordance with the will of the Kashmiri people. India could use similar or identical language urging China to do the same with Tibet.

"This is different from supporting the demand for self-determination and adequately nuanced to make the point that the principles China claims to espouse in its foreign policy should also be applied to its domestic policy," Gokhale underscores.

Shrine: Should India agree on a site or shrine for the Dalai Lama? This might be inevitable if he passes away in India. It would make him the first Dalai Lama since 1706 to be buried outside the Potala Palace in Lhasa. India could identify such a location well in advance knowing that it would become a shrine for millions of pilgrims. Hence issues like security and accessibility need to be carefully thought through.

India should also develop a response to China's likely demand that the Dalai Lama's remains be sent there since he is a citizen of that country.

Sensitive Interregnum: How will the Indian government handle the interregnum between the passing away of the 14th Dalai Lama and the identification of the 15th? This period could last many months. Since mechanisms already exist, there would be no need for India to formally recognise the Central Tibetan Administration or formalise the interaction through a coordinator, as has been suggested by some.

Should India coordinate with like-minded states on the post Dalai Lama situation? The US Congress is already pushing for a multilateral effort to counter China's narrative and claims. India will need to closely study suggestions for joint initiatives to create a global coalition on the reincarnation question. The aim should be to ensure such initiatives do not exacerbate tensions between Delhi and Beijing.

Free Country: If the successor to the current Dalai Lama is found in a "free country", as he has already said, should India recognise him as legitimate, knowing China would demand Delhi not do so. Even if India does not take an explicit position on the issue, should it allow him to enter the country?

What if the 15th Dalai Lama is discovered in India, is an Indian citizen? Will he be publicly acknowledged, if not what will his status be? Would he be permitted access to the residence and possessions of the ritual objects of the 14th Dalai Lama along with the enthronement ceremony. Since he will be a child and will be guided by a regency council, what should guide the government's relationship and under what guidelines should the council operate?

In India, all religious organisations have the right to determine their own leadership, residence and practices without state interference. China may pressure India on that score but India should only point to the constitutional practice. The same for allowing the successor to live in India. Access to the symbols of office maybe more sensitive as China will claim ownership.

Sanctioned by China, Tibetan activist expresses disappointment over lack of support from Tibetan community, administration

27 December 2024, The Tibet Express

CTC Executive Director Sherap Tharchin(C) flanked by CTC Chair Samphel Lhalungpa and Community Engagement Manager Youngdoun Tenzin.

Canada Tibet Committee's (CTC) Executive Director Sherap Tharchin expressed disappointment and felt let down by the lack of support he and his colleagues received from the Tibetan community and the administration in exile after they were sanctioned by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese Communist Government on Sunday, though they received overwhelming support from the Canadian Government and Parliament.

"While we received support and backing from the Canadian Government and Parliament, assuring us that they were behind us, there was a void from the Tibetan community, with not many speaking out or assuring their support," Sherap Tharchin said, visibly let down at Dokham Chushi Gangdruk's public event in Toronto, Canada on Wednesday.

The Canadian government and MPP Bhutla Karpoche (the first person of Tibetan heritage to be elected to public office in North America) contacted us to assure their support," Sherap said and added, "This made us sigh with relief. I also received a call from Canada Chushi Gangdruk President Sonam Wangchen, who said 'Sherap, don't be scared, we are behind you.'"

"But apart from that, nobody from the community stood up or reached out to us," he said and questioned, "As we are working for Tibet's cause, if Tibetans don't support us, then who will?"

The activist summed up the entire episode, noting first and foremost a sense of pride in taking the Chinese sanction as a badge of honour in recognition of his activism and campaign for Tibet. This, he said, was followed by a climate of fear.

Tharchin said that from Sunday, when they were sanctioned, until he took the stage, they lived in fear of what might happen because of China's might and that Chinese constitute 5 per cent of the Canadian population. He noted the high possibility of China forcing some of the 2 million Chinese Canadians to be state agents, coupled with China's infiltration within the Tibetan Community.

He added that one of his colleagues on the sanction list had to cancel a planned trip to a European country as many European nations have signed extradition treaties with China.

This, the activist added, made him realize the plight of Tibetans and Uyghurs who suffer daily under Chinese occupation.

The Executive Director of the CTC concluded by saying that a sense of disappointment then overtook his fears owing to the lack of support from the Tibetan community and the administration.

He lamented that though he had been engaged in activism campaigning for Tibet and served the Central Tibetan Administration over the last six years, "nobody dared to open their mouth or cared to ask us how we were doing or what we were experiencing."

Asking the crowd to excuse him for soiling the atmosphere as they had gathered for a party, he added, "We should know about this because it's me today, and it could be anyone from the community tomorrow."

The activist concluded by calling for unity among the small numbers of Tibetans spread across the diaspora, warning that going the opposite way would aid China at our own undoing.

Tharchin, along with the CTC Chair Samphel Lhalungpa, Vice Chair Luisa Durante, Board member Eliza von Baeyer, and Community Engagement Manager Youngdoun Tenzin were among the 20 Canadians sanctioned by the PRC—along with the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project (URAP), led by Mr. Mehmet Tohti (a former WUC Director of the Legal Committee) and 14 of its staff members and experts—were sanctioned by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs as a "countermeasure."

While the Canadian government condemned China and expressed solidarity with members of the Canada Tibet Committee and the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project after the Chinese government sanctioned them on Sunday for speaking out about human rights, and MPP Bhutla Karpoche offered her support through a statement declaring, "I join the calls for the government of Canada to ensure that those sanctioned do not come to harm within Canada or other democratic entities," the support from the Tibetan community remained minimal.

Though the Tibetan NGOs, associations, and the administration are usually quick to issue statements of solidarity over China's repressive policies and measure in Tibet as well as condemning anyone who vilified the Dalai Lama without follow-up actions, their enthusiasm fell short when China sanctioned three Tibetan activists from the CTC for their campaign for the Tibetan movement.

While collective support from the Kashag (the executive wing of the CTA) and all Tibetan NGOs could have lifted the morale of the activists, only the Tibetan parliament in exile came forward with a statement on 25th December, declaring that the house "stands in solidarity with the members of the Canada Tibet Committee and the Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project, applauding their courage in speaking out against the atrocities and severe human rights violations committed by China."

Two days after the activist's remarks, only one Tibetan NGO- the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy condemned "China's internationalisation of repression and sanctions imposed on Tibetan human rights group."

Buddha's birthplace a geopolitical playing field for China?

27 December 2024, Tibetan Review

Lumbini, the birthplace in Nepal of the Buddha Shakyamuni, has become a geopolitical playing field for China despite protests from local citizens who remain anxious to preserve its Buddhist and spiritual significance above all else, according to an opinion piece in the indianexpress.com Dec 26.

This year, China not only prevented the fourth Nobel Laureates conference from being held there but also tried to get its imposed 11th Panchen Lama, Gyaincain Norbu, to participate in a Chinese Buddhist conference organized in the holy place in an attempt to boost his global profile. Besides, it moved to virtually takeover the holy place by pledging $3 billion to the Asia Pacific Exchange and Cooperation Foundation for its all-round development.

The fourth Nobel Laureates conference planned to be held at Lumbini was called off at the last minute because China expressed strong reservations that it would have a pro-Dalai Lama agenda, despite the organisers denying it. China also suspected that the conference on March 11 and 12 was deliberately chosen close to the Tibetan Uprising Day, Mar 10.

Ten months after that, controversy returned to Lumbini when the city, along with Kathmandu, was chosen as the venue for the Nanhai Buddhism Round Table attended by hundreds of monks from Mainland China. Norbu's first international exposure in the land of the Buddha would have been highly significant. However, there were protests in the area, and the Chinese authorities said the reported news was propaganda, the opinion piece noted.

Lumbini, located around 250 km west of Kathmandu, was envisioned as a global secular pilgrimage by King Mahendra and UN Secretary General U Thant, a Buddhist, in 1967. Japanese architect Kenzo Tange prepared the master plan in 1978. The major part of the plan around an eight-km radius of the Maya Devi Temple – the spot where Buddha was born – was implemented in the first six years with Prince Gyanendra Shah as the founder chairman of the Lumbini Development Authority (LDA).

In 2006, the government led by Maoist chief Pushpa Kamal Dahal tried to bring Hindu and Buddhist shrines under political control, but did not succeed due to public protests. However, under him, an Asia Pacific Exchange and Cooperation Foundation, apparently an NGO controlled by the Chinese government, pledged $3 billion for all-round development that included building an international airport, roads, cultural zones, a Buddhist University, monasteries, bypassing the LDA or the Kenzo Tange plan.

But China's plan did not succeed after widespread protests, the opinion piece said.

However, of late China has shown renewed interest in Lumbini and there has been a flow of Chinese tourists, politicians and government authorities to the city.

While Lumbini's master plan has provision for monasteries from several countries, Nepali authorities were stated to be more interested in mega projects coming from business and private channels, rather than government agencies.

There is anger within Nepal's Buddhist community over what they say attempts to turn their sacred land into a communist and a commercial zone, the opinion piece said. The LDA, which once used to be a bipartisan body, is today packed with politicians affiliated to the ruling party. The decision of the current LDA, chief Lharkyal Lama, a Maoist leader, to give Rambag, a holy site near Buddha's relic, on a long-term commercial lease to a private party fell after an all-party protest three months ago.

Incidentally, it was Lharkyal Lama who was said to have continued to try to bring the Chinese government-appointed Panchen Lama to the Chinese Buddhist conference in Nepal this year despite Kathmandu having already rejected it in absolute terms.

The sentiment of the faithful that the primary responsibility to preserve Lumbini's sanctity lies with the Hindus and Buddhists is being undermined as Lumbini gradually turns into the playground of players who do not understand that Lumbini is respected for peace, compassion and renunciation rather than profit seeking investments and strategic intent, the opinion piece concluded.

How China turns members of its diaspora into spies

26 December 2024, The Economist

America is on the hunt for these non-traditional agents. But its efforts risk backfiring

AMONG EXILED Chinese dissidents, Tang Yuanjun was well known. He had participated in the Tiananmen Square protests of 1989 and landed in prison as a result. He later defected to Taiwan, swimming to one of its outlying islands from a fishing boat. America granted him asylum and he settled in New York, becoming the leader of Chinese pro-democracy groups. But in August 2024 he was arrested by the FBI. He admits to having used his position to collect information for the Chinese government and to report on his fellow activists. He did this so that the government would allow him to return to China to see his ailing parents.

China's hacking of American computer networks and its efforts to steal Western military and trade secrets have made headlines in recent years. But it has also been pursuing a more subtle campaign, one that involves bribery, blackmail and secret deals, and which uses people such as Mr Tang and other members of the Chinese diaspora to carry out surveillance, information-gathering and influence operations around the world. Britain recently got a taste of all this when the authorities there accused Yang Tengbo, a Chinese businessman, of cultivating ties with Prince Andrew, the king's brother, as part of an influence operation.

America, though, is China's most important target. These types of activities fall under the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA), an American law that requires those engaging in political projects on behalf of a foreign actor to register and disclose what they are doing. In recent years the Justice Department has ramped up its enforcement of the act. The department conducted 25 FARA inspections in 2023, the most since 1985. This year there have been several high-profile cases involving China. By publicising these investigations, the American government is sending a warning to would-be agents, say experts.

One big case involves Linda Sun, a former aide to the governor of New York who was arrested in September for working as an "undisclosed agent" of China and its Communist Party (CCP). Ms Sun allegedly blocked meetings between Taiwanese officials and state leaders, removed references to Taiwan from state communications and stood in the way of efforts to publicise China's persecution of the Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities. In return, she is said to have received millions of dollars in kickbacks and gifts, including several deliveries of Nanjing-style salted ducks to her parents' house.

The accusations against Ms Sun are straightforward. But China's influence operations often occur in a grey area. Take the diaspora groups called tongxianghui, or hometown associations, which bring together immigrants from particular parts of China. They are ubiquitous in American cities—and increasingly under scrutiny by the Justice Department. Association leaders often mobilise voters before elections in America and build relationships with local officials. Some also make trips to China and meet with officials from the United Front Work Department, the Communist Party branch with the job of boosting China's influence abroad. Association leaders organise political activities in America, such as rallies in support of Xi Jinping or protests against visits by Taiwanese officials.

These activities are legal, so long as the organisers are acting independently. But the line between voluntary action and work as an agent is fuzzy. Many overseas Chinese are genuine supporters of the Communist Party or, at least, willing to further its interests because it will help their businesses back home or keep their families in China safe. It is only when they receive covert funding, instructions or supervision from Chinese officials that they cross the line into being foreign agents. In 2022, for example, the FBI arrested the head of a Shandong hometown association—not because of his frequent trips to China and friendliness with Chinese officials, but because they suspected him of working with Chinese police to forcibly repatriate another immigrant. Similarly, in 2023 two Chinese men were indicted for allegedly working with Chinese police to operate a "clandestine police station" inside a Fujian hometown association in New York. One of them pleaded guilty on December 18th.

American authorities have struggled to combat these efforts without alienating the Chinese diaspora. An anti-espionage programme launched in 2018, called the China Initiative, aimed to stop the country from using "non-traditional collectors", such as academics and scientists, to steal America's trade and technology secrets. Nearly 90% of the defendants charged under the initiative were of Chinese heritage, according to a database compiled by the MIT Technology Review. Many of the cases involved questions of “research integrity”, with academics accused of failing to fully disclose their Chinese affiliations (whether that was deliberate is highly contested). Only a quarter of all the cases brought under the initiative ended in conviction.

America’s counterintelligence efforts are meant to make the Chinese diaspora feel safe, says a former official who worked on the China Initiative. “You’re signalling to them: we’ve got your back,” he says. “What you don’t want to do is over-rotate to a situation where being Chinese equals being a spy.” But the initiative left many academics feeling that the government viewed them with suspicion simply because of their Chinese heritage, says Gang Chen of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In 2021 he was charged with failing to disclose connections to Chinese educational programmes when submitting a federal grant application. The indictment was heavily criticised (such disclosures were not actually required). A year later the charges were dropped.

According to a survey in 2022, more than 60% of Chinese-American academics have thought about leaving America. More than 70% said they felt unsafe there. “This is not just shooting ourselves in the foot. It’s shooting ourselves in the brain,” says Mr Chen, who has stopped applying for government grants or working in potentially sensitive areas.

Other members of the Chinese diaspora welcome efforts to stymie Communist Party influence. Zhou Fengsuo of Human Rights in China, an activist group in New York, praises the arrests of people like Ms Sun. But he warns that the heavy-handedness and inconsistency of America’s approach has led to distrust of the government in the diaspora. And he complains that exiled Chinese dissidents receive little protection from the authorities, making them easier targets for Chinese coercion.

In 2022 the Justice Department ended the China Initiative, admitting that it led to a “harmful perception” of racial profiling. But in September the House of Representatives passed a bill to revive it under a new name, the CCP Initiative, with all Republicans voting in favour. Such efforts seem likely to intensify under President-elect Donald Trump, who has given China hawks important jobs. The risk is that in its efforts to counter the Communist Party, America drives more members of the diaspora into its hands.

Why China’s proposed Tibet mega dam has left India worried

26 December 2024, First Post

China has approved a major hydropower project on Tibet’s Yarlung Zangbo River, which becomes the Brahmaputra River when it enters India. Billed as the world’s largest hydropower dam, it could generate 300 billion kilowatt-hours of electricity annually

China has green-lit a mega hydropower project on Tibet’s longest river. Touted as the world’s largest hydropower dam, it would be built in the lower reaches of the Yarlung Zangbo River, which becomes the Brahmaputra River when it flows into the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

India has earlier expressed concerns about the project which could affect millions downstream in the country and its neighbour Bangladesh.

Let’s take a closer look.

China’s mega hydropower project

China’s hydropower dam will come up on the Yarlung Zangbo River, also known as the Yarlung Tsangpo River, in the Tibet autonomous region.

According to China’s state news agency Xinhua, the dam will produce three times more energy than the Three Gorges Dam, which generates 88.2 billion kWh of electricity annually.

The proposed dam could produce 300 billion kilowatt-hours of electricity every year, Reuters reported citing the estimate of Power Construction Corp of China in 2020.

As per a South China Morning Post (SCMP) report, the hydropower project could cost over 1 trillion yuan (US$137 billion), higher than any single infrastructure project worldwide.

In comparison, the investment in the Three Gorges Dam was 254.2 billion yuan ($34.83 billion).

It is not yet known when the construction will start and even the exact location of the dam.

Challenges of the project

China’s huge hydropower project comes with its own technical and engineering challenges.

A part of the Yarlung Zangbo falls 2,000 metres (6,561 feet) within a short span of 50 km, giving a major hydropower potential, Reuters reported.

To tap into this potential, nearly six 20 km-long tunnels will have to be carved out from the Namcha Barwa mountain to divert half of the river’s flow at about 2,000 cubic metres per second, as per the SCMP report.

The project site is also located along a tectonic plate boundary which is susceptible to earthquakes.

Authorities have also not revealed how many people will be displaced by the Tibet project.

Why China’s hydropower dam is important

26 December 2024, Beijing Review, Santosh Ghimire

As per Xinhua, the colossal hydropower project in Tibet would protect the local ecology.

"Through extensive geological explorations and technical advancements, a solid foundation has been laid for the science-based, secure and high-quality development of the project," the report said.

The project would also fuel the growth of nearby solar and wind energy resources, according to the news agency. "This represents a major move in China's green and low-carbon energy transition," the report said.

"It is also of great importance to advancing the country's strategy for carbon peaking and carbon neutrality and to coping with global climate change."

India's concerns about the project

China's super hydropower dam has raised alarm bells in India.

New Delhi's concern stems from Beijing's lack of transparency about the project. It fears the Tibet dam could trigger flash floods or lead to water scarcity downstream.

India worries the project could result in the country depending on China for its water supplies, Genevieve Donnellon-May, a geopolitical and global strategy adviser, wrote for AsiaGlobal Online in 2022.

The Yarlung Tsangpo flows across the Tibetan Plateau and then enters India through Assam and Arunachal Pradesh, where it is called the Brahmaputra River.

As she noted in her article, the Brahmaputra is important for India and China's socioeconomic development. "The river accounts for nearly 30 per cent of India's freshwater resources and 40 per cent of its total hydropower potential. For China, the Brahmaputra's role in the country's total freshwater supply is limited, but the river plays a significant role in Tibet's agricultural and energy industries as well as civilisation. Yet, growing populations mean water resources are under increasing stress and demand in both countries," Donnellon-May wrote in her piece.

China being the upper riparian could affect the quantity of water available downstream, increasing New Delhi's worries.

"India has long speculated about China's intention of using hydropower dams to control the Brahmaputra. Many Indian analysts argue that China's water ambitions and the growing competition over water between China and India will inevitably lead to "water wars" between the two nations," Donnellon-May wrote in her piece.

To dent the impact of China's proposed dam on water flows, India is also planning to build 12 hydropower stations in Arunachal Pradesh, as per a Reuters report in July. The move has irked China, which claims the Indian state as the "southern part of Tibet".

During the visit of Nepal's Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli to China from December 2 to 5, the two countries reaffirmed their commitment to deepening their high-quality cooperation under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Oli paid the four-day official visit at the invitation of his counterpart Premier Li Qiang. This is Oli's first bilateral visit to a neighboring country since he returned to the prime ministership in July.

The two expressed their commitment to strengthening connectivity in sectors including ports, roads, railways, aviation, power grids and telecommunications, to help Nepal transform from a land-locked to a land-linked country.

Nepal joined the BRI, the China-proposed initiative to increase connectivity along and beyond the ancient Silk Road routes, on May 12, 2017. Since then, Nepal-China practical cooperation has been further enhanced, both in quality and efficiency. Chinese President Xi Jinping envisioned the BRI as a framework connecting countries around the world through trade, infrastructure development, finance and people-to-people exchanges, among others.

As of now, the BRI has achieved far more than physical connectivity. With the spirit of extensive consultation, joint contribution and shared benefits, the BRI has evolved into a global platform on which participating countries join hands to improve people's livelihoods and drive human development forward, despite the various challenges facing the world.

Over the past decade, the BRI has delivered more than 3,000 of practical projects around the world, bringing tangible benefits to millions of people. The number of BRI partnerships has been growing around the world. So far, more than 150 countries and over 30 international organizations have signed BRI cooperation agreements, with the initiative extending from the Eurasian continent to Africa and Latin America.

Joint railway project

Some projects under the BRI are already operational, while others are expected to take years to complete. The China-Nepal cross-border railway is one of the long-term projects. During Oli's visit, the two countries reaffirmed their commitment to pushing forward with the project.

"The two sides expressed willingness to steadily advance the feasibility study of the Jilong/Keyrung-Kathmandu Cross-Border Railway and planned to hold the Ninth Working Meeting on China-Nepal Railway Cooperation. The Chinese side will continue to help Nepal train railway professionals," read the joint statement issued during the visit.

Nepal and China announced the launch of a feasibility study for the cross-border railway when President Xi paid a visit to Nepal in October 2019. The cross-border railway is one of the key projects under the BRI. Since 2022, China has been providing grant assistance to support the feasibility study and sending its railway experts to conduct the field survey work.

There are several advantages for Nepal upon the completion of the railway, which will reduce the time and cost of cross-border transport and increase the volume of bilateral trade and investment. The railway will help bring excellent Nepali goods such as cashmere fabrics, wood products, handicrafts and organic alpine agricultural products to China while transferring China's technological development to Nepal. For this reason, the two peoples have great expectations for the railway.

Surya Raj Acharya, a Nepali infrastructure expert, said she believes that the railway will be a game-changer for Nepal's economic development after its completion. "The construction of Nepal-China railway will also be a boon for Nepal. We have seen in many BRI partnering countries that it has improved infrastructure and connectivity, created tens of thousands of jobs, and helped countries realize their shared vision of peaceful development, win-win cooperation and common prosperity," Acharya said.

More aviation cooperation

During Oli's visit, the two sides also agreed to increase cooperation in civil aviation under the BRI. "The two sides value the development of civil aviation ties between China and Nepal, and support and encourage air transport enterprises of both sides to open air routes and flights between Chinese cities and Nepali cities such as Pokhara and Lumbini in light of market demand, so as to facilitate bilateral economic and trade ties and two-way travel," read the joint statement.

The inauguration of the China-aided international airport in Nepal's tourist city Pokhara was one of the greatest moments for many Nepali people. The project, an integral part of the China-Nepal Belt and Road cooperation, was inaugurated in December 2022. Envisaged more than 59 years ago, the international airport is now becoming a boost to the local economy.

The opening of the airport has contributed greatly to Nepal's connectivity and allowed for China-Nepal charter flights, creating new opportunities for cooperation under the BRI. Pokhara International Airport, a 4D-standard facility, was built with loan from the Export-Import Bank of China by China CAMC Engineering Co. Ltd., a company directly affiliated with China National Machinery Industry Corp., a Fortune 500 company. The construction began in July 2017, two months after Nepal became a BRI partner country. The airport demonstrates China's pursuit of quality in project construction and is a source of national pride in Nepal.

Cross-border energy cooperation

Apart from railroad and aviation connectivity, Nepal and China have also been working toward collaboration in the field of energy. Nepal is rich in water and willing to sell its surplus electricity to China in the near future. China has expressed readiness to support Nepal in this regard.

During the official visit, the two sides also reiterated commitment toward this end. "The two sides will continue to leverage the platform of the China-Nepal Energy Joint Implementation Mechanism, deepen cooperation in energy and explore exchanges in new energy. The two sides are ready to expedite the feasibility study of the China-aided Jilong-Rasuwadhi-Chilime 220KV Cross-Border Power Transmission Line. The two sides agreed to continue to support the cooperation between telecommunication operators of the two countries and to carry out maintenance and expansion projects related to cross-border land cables," read the joint statement.

Endless opportunities

Nepal can learn from the experience of Asian countries that have already successfully completed BRI projects and boosted their economies. The Jakarta-Bandung High-Speed Railway is one such example. The railway is a flagship project that dovetails the BRI with Indonesia's Global Maritime Fulcrum initiative. For the past year since the high-speed train went into operation, the project has seen all-round collaboration by teams from both countries in areas such as high-speed rail operation management, talent development and technology transfer.

The BRI is seen as a great opportunity for Nepal as it aspires to become a "dynamic bridge" between China and India by developing North-South transport corridors. In the words of Kalyan Raj Sharma, Chair of the Nepal-China Friendship Forum, the BRI presents a strategic opportunity for Nepal to advance development projects as there is a lack of vital infrastructure.

Analysts believe the BRI could be a boon for low-income and middle-income countries like Nepal, which are constrained by limited financial resources and looking for foreign investment to meet their development needs.

"For many low- and middle-income countries constrained by limited financial resources, the BRI offers a potential pathway to realize ambitious development goals, paralleling China's rapid growth trajectory of recent decades," Sharma wrote in an article published in Kathmandu Post on December 1. He opined that Nepal can take advantage of China's expertise in rapid economic growth and infrastructure construction by approaching the BRI as a nuanced, multidimensional initiative.

China and India rebuild trust on the path to reconciliation

25 December 2024, East Asia Forum, Ghulam Ali

On 23 October 2024, Chinese President Xi Jinping and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi held a delegate-level meeting – the first in five years – on the sidelines of the BRICS conference in Kazan, Russia. During the meeting, both leaders endorsed an earlier deal to disengage their militaries along the disputed border, restoring the status quo to its pre-2020 position. Within a week, both sides withdrew troops from border face-off areas.

Given the potential impact of the China-India relationship on regional and global affairs, the Xi-Modi meeting drew international headlines. Analysts characterised it as a boon for both countries, a cautionary note and a tactical pause rather than a strategic shift in relations. Some credited the outcome to BRICS and Russia, while others viewed it as a blow to the US Indo-Pacific strategy.

China and India have the world's longest and oldest disputed border – the Line of Actual Control (LAC) – inherited from colonial times. They fought a border war in 1962 and have had periodic escalations over this issue ever since. Both countries hold differing views on the boundary – India considers the LAC to be 3488 kilometres long, while China claims it is 2000 kilometres, arguing its border with Pakistan is already settled.

In the 21st century, China-India relations have come full circle, moving from deeper understanding to heightened tension and back to normalcy. In the mid-2010s, the relationship took a hostile turn after decades of stability. While the disputed border sparked conflict, two new factors proved to be key ignitors. Nationalist leaders – President Xi Jinping and Prime Minister Narendra Modi – assumed power, setting high goals and pursuing assertive policies. Concurrently, the bifurcation of global politics into a US vs China dynamic fuelled the rivalry. The disputed border, two nationalist leaders and international politics combined in a mutually reinforcing way, escalating the tension.

Nationalistic fervour in China and India extended to soldiers patrolling the disputed border. Troops faced a standoff lasting over 70 days in Doklam in 2017 and a fatal confrontation in Galwan Valley in June 2020, resulting in the deaths of 20 Indians and at least four Chinese soldiers – marking the first fatalities in decades. Following this, the relationship largely remained frozen until the Xi-Modi meeting.

During heightened tensions, both countries viewed each other's policies with concern. New Delhi perceived China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) as part of a grand strategy and saw the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) – in which China invested billions of dollars – and China's administrative control of Gwadar Port as a consolidation of a China-Pakistan nexus targeting India.

On the other hand, China regarded India's closeness with the United States, Japan, Australia, Vietnam, Taiwan and other Western countries with suspicion. The Quadrilateral security grouping, which China views as a containment strategy, regained momentum against the backdrop of India's intensifying conflict with China.

India's defence-related agreements with the United States were also concerning for China. These included the agreements to provide reciprocal access to military bases as well as to share geospatial intelligence and enhance the accuracy of military operations. In line with this, the United States rebranded its Asia Pacific strategy to an Indo-Pacific strategy centred on cooperation with India.

It was economic pressures that catalysed China's and India's re-engagement. Following the Galwan fatalities, India's ban on Chinese investment and technology impacted negatively on India's economic growth. This downturn led to unemployment – especially among educated youth, who expressed their frustration in the 2024 general elections – resulting in the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party losing its simple majority. India's annual economic survey for 2024 pinpointed the need to attract investment from China – causing India's business community to push the Modi administration towards rapprochement.

India's obsession with the BRI as a grand strategy also faded over time. Though New Delhi did not join the BRI, it benefited from its subsidiary, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank. CPEC did not take off and Gwadar Port remains far from becoming China's naval hub. In 2019, China also stopped blocking the Pakistani military-backed extremist Masood Azhar from being declared a global terrorist by the United Nations, which abated India's concerns about the so-called China-Pakistan nexus.

Parallel to this, India did not receive the expected US and Western support for its 'Made in India' initiative and industrialisation efforts. The US-led 'India-Middle East-Europe Economic Corridor', meant to counter the BRI, never materialised. Overall, it became clear to New Delhi that achieving great power status requires cooperation with Beijing, prompting an eagerness for reconciliation.

On the Chinese side, Beijing recognised that the success of the Quad and the United States' Indo-Pacific policies primarily hinged on India's role. It was assuaging for China that despite US incentives, India did not sign any formal military alliance and maintained its traditional position of non-alignment. During its own economic slowdown, China could not ignore the large Indian market next door, where trade thrived and reached US$118 billion in 2023-24 despite geopolitical tensions.

Over the years, Xi and Modi have tempered their ambitious goals with pragmatism. They have gained global exposure and navigated their countries through challenging waters. Through cycles of stability, heightened tension and a return to equilibrium, China and India have learned that conflict undermines their long-term objectives and complicates the boundary issues.

While a breakthrough in their border dispute may remain elusive, the Xi-Modi meeting has put the relationship back on track and this is likely to be sustained.

Of Diplomacy and Gaffes: Making Sense of Prabowo and Anwar's China Visits

25 December 2024, The Diplomat, Rahul Mishra and Harshit Prajapati

Southeast Asian leaders face considerable challenges in balancing nationalistic positions with the complexities of engaging China at the highest levels.

Prabowo Subianto, the newly sworn-in president of Indonesia, is known for his hands-on approach to diplomacy and foreign policy, often departing from the country's established positions and sparking debates.

His recent visit to China, his first official overseas trip since assuming office, ignited fresh controversies. A joint statement issued during the visit called for "joint development in areas of overlapping claims" in the South China Sea (SCS). The statement also announced an agreement to establish an "Inter-Governmental Joint Steering Committee to explore and advance relevant cooperation." This sharply contrasts with Indonesia's long-standing position of not recognizing any overlapping claims with China in the SCS and rejecting the legality of the Nine-Dash Line.

While Indonesia is not a direct claimant in the South China Sea dispute, it is increasingly entangled in the conflict due to China's claims over parts of the Exclusive Economic Zone (EEZ) surrounding Indonesia's Natuna Islands. Indonesia asserts sovereign control over the Natuna Islands and upholds its territorial and maritime rights based on legal and historical grounds.

In an attempt to manage the fallout from Prabowo's diplomatic gaffe, the Indonesian Foreign Ministry clarified that it does not recognize China's claims over the SCS and reaffirmed that Indonesia's position remains unchanged. However, critics argue that Indonesia has unwittingly strengthened China's position by signing the joint statement, which Beijing could reference in future disputes. Such concerns stem from fears that China may leverage the document to legitimize its claims against Indonesia.

While the statement highlights a significant diplomatic error, it does not signify a shift in Indonesia's stance on the South China Sea dispute. Instead, it underscores the challenges Southeast Asian leaders face in balancing nationalistic positions with the complexities of engaging China at the highest levels. Prabowo is not the first Southeast Asian leader to face backlash following a visit to Beijing.

Malaysian Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim's March 2023 trip to China also drew criticism after he stated that Malaysia was "open to negotiations" with China over bilateral disputes in the SCS. Like Indonesia, Malaysia has consistently rejected the Nine-Dash Line and maintains there are no overlapping claims with China in the SCS. Following Anwar's remarks, the Malaysian Foreign Ministry clarified that the country's policy on the SCS dispute remained unchanged. Malaysia's position has since remained consistent under Anwar's leadership, suggesting that Indonesia's stance is unlikely to waver despite Prabowo's recent misstep.

Anwar's visit to Beijing secured investment deals worth $38.6 billion for Malaysia, while Prabowo's trip resulted in agreements valued at $10 billion. These investments are crucial for Prabowo's administration to fund key welfare programs, including his flagship initiative to provide free meals for schoolchildren and pregnant women.

Prabowo's electoral success was partly built on such welfare promises, and delivering on them is vital for maintaining domestic legitimacy. As Evan Laksmana argues, for most Southeast Asian leaders, political legitimacy is closely tied to public goods, major investments, and welfare schemes, often financed through strengthened trade ties with China. In this context, the joint statement may have been a transactional maneuver to secure economic gains rather than a strategic policy shift.

Moreover, the diplomatic controversy reflects Prabowo's personalistic and hands-on approach to foreign policy rather than a calculated change in Indonesia's SCS strategy. Although he is expected to continue the legacy of his predecessor, Joko "Jokowi" Widodo, Prabowo appears intent on imprinting his personal style on policy decisions. Unlike Jokowi, who delegated much of Indonesia's foreign engagement to career diplomat Retno Marsudi, Prabowo has adopted a more direct role. His appointment of Sugiono, a close aide and ideological protégé, as foreign minister marks a departure from tradition. Sugiono is the first non-career diplomat to hold the position since 2001.

Historically, Indonesia's foreign ministry has acted as a buffer against unilateral presidential influence on foreign policy. However, Prabowo's decision to appoint Sugiono signals his intention to centralize foreign policy decision-making. Reports suggest that the foreign ministry had advised Prabowo's team on Indonesia's position regarding the SCS dispute, but this input was allegedly overlooked.

The joint statement with China emphasizes "head-of-state diplomacy" as a political safeguard and strategic guide for China-Indonesia relations, reflecting Prabowo's preference for a one-man approach to foreign policy. His active engagement on the international stage is evident from the 20 trips he made abroad as defense minister and president-elect between Indonesia's general election in February 2024 and his inauguration in October. This level of activity suggests that Prabowo's tenure will feature more frequent presidential diplomacy compared to Jokowi's two terms.

This is not the first time Prabowo has made a controversial diplomatic move. At the Shangri-La Dialogue in June 2023, he proposed a four-point peace plan to resolve the Ukraine conflict. It was promptly dismissed by Ukraine's defense minister. Jokowi later clarified that the proposal represented Prabowo's personal views, not the Indonesian government's stance. Similarly, Prabowo has previously diverged from official policy by expressing a more sympathetic attitude toward the AUKUS agreement.

While Malaysia's foreign ministry, under a more experienced Anwar Ibrahim, appears more adept at managing such controversies, Anwar has also made statements that contradicted Malaysia's official positions, such as his remarks on Myanmar.

In conclusion, the clarification from Indonesia's Foreign Ministry suggests that the joint statement is unlikely to have lasting implications and may become a "dead letter." To further address concerns, Foreign Minister Sugiono stated that Indonesia has not yet decided on any joint development areas with China in the SCS. Ultimately, the joint statement seems to reflect Prabowo's personalistic diplomacy aimed at securing economic concessions rather than signaling a shift in Indonesia's established position on the SCS dispute. While it is crucial for Southeast Asian leaders to avoid such gaffes, considering the overwhelming dependence on China for trade and investments, this trend is likely to continue. The point, however, is how adept Southeast Asian foreign policy bureaucracies could be in managing such unexpected twists and turns.

Guest Opinion: The truth about Xinjiang and its Uygur population

Western governments and media, particularly in the United States, have persisted with a years-long smear campaign targeting China over issues related to Xinjiang.

However, their claims often lack proper context and are based on false information intended to undermine China's growing influence on the global stage.

The reality in Xinjiang is a different story with multiple dimensions. It involves efforts to combat extremism, preserve national unity, and promote economic development.

The 6th World Media Summit recently took place in Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang. Given the recurring negative coverage of Xinjiang in Western media, it was time for us, media practitioners from around the world, to witness firsthand what life is truly like for the Uygurs, one of 55 ethnic minorities in China. Our goal was to see for ourselves whether the human rights abuses claimed by Western leaders and media hold any truth.

DERADICALISATION AND WESTERN INTERVENTIONS

From the early 1990s to mid-2010s, Xinjiang faced a surge in radicalisation, leading to deadly terrorist attacks targeting civilians.

Notable incidents include the Urumqi riots in 2009 and Kunming railway station attack in 2014, resulting in hundreds of fatalities and even more injuries. These were the works of radical separatists who sought destabilisation and secession.

In response, the Chinese government launched comprehensive counterterrorism initiatives, ranging from a law-based campaign against terrorists to a vocational training program to deradicalise individuals influenced by extremism. The latter combined vocational training, legal education, and cultural integration to address the underlying causes of radicalisation.

The separatist movement in Xinjiang has not been a purely internal issue. There is growing evidence that Western countries have had a hand in encouraging separatism in Xinjiang as part of a broader strategy to destabilise China.

The United States has long considered China an economic rival, and any attempt to weaken China internally serves its geopolitical interests.

By fabricating and amplifying accusations of human rights abuses, some Western governments aim to tarnish China's international image, hoping to slow its economic ascent.

These actions align with a broader history of Western interventions designed to disrupt political stability in regions critical to their global dominance.

The persistent campaign of disinformation against China, particularly regarding Xinjiang, is part of a larger strategy by Western countries to contain China's rise.

Western countries have become increasingly alarmed by the prospect of losing nearly two centuries of global dominance.

By painting China as a human rights abuser, Western governments and media outlets seek to rally international opinion against China.

However, this narrative often ignores China's work in lifting more than 800 million people out of poverty over the past decades, improving living standards, and maintaining social harmony throughout the country, including in Xinjiang.

PROSPERITY TODAY

Despite these challenges, Xinjiang is a flourishing and multicultural region where Uyghurs live peacefully alongside other ethnic groups.

Far from the image painted by some media outlets, Xinjiang has experienced rapid development in recent years. Its gross domestic product has grown significantly, reaching over 1.9 trillion yuan (approximately 260 billion dollars) in 2023.

Xinjiang is also a crucial part of the Belt and Road Initiative, which has attracted foreign investment and made the region a hub for international trade.

Moreover, the claim that Uyghurs cannot practice their religion is false.

We visited the Xinjiang Islamic Institute in Urumqi, which trains over 1,000 students. Imam Abdurraqib Turmuniyaz greeted us and explained that the school was created to allow Muslim boys in Xinjiang to deepen their knowledge of Islam while preparing them for leadership roles in China's mosques.

Established in the early 1980s, it reflects the Chinese government's efforts to support and regulate Islamic education. Its facilities include a canteen, mosque, library, and gym.

The Xinjiang Islamic Institute also has eight branches across the region, including in Hotan, Aksu, and Kashgar, with about 3,000 students.

Imam Abdurraqib Turmuniyaz emphasized that religious freedom is fully protected in China, especially in Xinjiang. The institute's mission is to educate rather than confine students. This institution is a key part of China's efforts to promote Islamic education in a structured and modern environment.

Xinjiang is a region that once faced serious challenges with extremism and separatism but has overcome these obstacles through development, education, and integration.

The Uyghur people practice religion freely and benefit from the region's rapid economic growth. During our visit to a car manufacturing plant in Xinjiang, we saw Uyghurs working alongside colleagues of other ethnic groups.

Uyghurs are present in all works of life, from restaurants and coffee shops to construction companies, the service sector, and even military service. Some have also gained prominence as models in China's booming fashion industry, showcasing the diverse opportunities available to them across the country.

The broader campaign of disinformation against China, spearheaded by the West, is less about human rights and more about maintaining global hegemony.

As China continues to rise on the world stage, the truth about Xinjiang is clear. It is a region of peace, prosperity, and promise, no matter what the detractors say.

Self-Determination Of Tibet: A Contentious Issue – Analysis

25 December 2024, Eurasia Review, Manohar Parrikar Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses (MP-IDSA)

Negotiations on self-determination of Tibet has been a contentious matter between the Tibetan ethnic minority and the PRC government. The PRC government has failed to implement in letter and spirit various laws which stipulate the establishment of autonomous regions for the ethnic minorities in China.

A diplomatic spat between the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the United States (US) has ensued, following US President Biden signing the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act' on 12 July 2024 into law.<sup>1</sup> Reacting to the Act, China stated that the US is undermining the "basic norms governing international relations" and should recognise Xizang (Tibet) as part of China. It urged the US not to support "Tibet independence" which if it fails to do, "China will take resolute measures to firmly defend its sovereignty, security and development interests".<sup>2</sup>

Appraising the Act, along with the affirmation of upholding human rights and direct negotiations "without preconditions" with the Dalai Lama in order to resolve the differences, are some of the fundamental aspects at stake for the 'self-determination' of Tibet. This Brief examines how the principle of self-determination has been contested between the Chinese government and the Tibetan ethnic minority. It begins with a review on how the principles of self-determination have been construed in international law.

Self-Determination in International Law

The principle of self-determination, which can be traced back to the French revolution in 1789 and the American Declaration of Independence of 1776, refers to the legal right of people to choose their own political destiny. In the contemporary period, it has been closely associated with US President Woodrow Wilson, when after the First World War, several new states were created from the losing powers of Germany, Austria-Hungary and the Ottoman Empire.<sup>3</sup>

Previously, self-determination was perceived as a 'political concept' but later on, it emerged as a "principle of positive international law" based on the UN Charter as in Article 1(2), it is requisite that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to "develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determinations of people".<sup>4</sup>

The principle of self-determination has been addressed in several UN resolutions, declarations and conventions. However, it is an 'elusive concept', mainly due to an unclear definition of 'people', i.e., who are actually entitled to self-determination (for example, indigenous groups, religious groups and other minorities), resulting in various interpretations and significant implications in practice.<sup>5</sup>

One of the foremost legal rights for self-determination is the "Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and People" adopted by UN General Assembly (GA) Resolution 1514 in 1960, where Para 1 declares, "the subjugation of people to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights" and is contrary to the UN Charter.<sup>6</sup> These legal rights were primarily designed or interpreted to foster the decolonisation process and were upheld by the International Court of Justice in the Namibia case.<sup>7</sup>

Additionally, the application of self-determination beyond the anti-colonial dimension was adopted in 1970 by the UNGA, 'Friendly Relations Declarations' which entail the right of self-determination to all people freely "without external interference, their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development".<sup>8</sup> However, this legal document demands that self-determination be exercised cautiously, without disturbing the territorial integrity of the existing state. In other words, these legal rights are in line with 'internal self-determination', i.e., autonomy.<sup>9</sup>

In the case of internal self-determination, Article 1 of the two international Covenants of 1966—International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights—provides people the right to "freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development". Legal expert Antonio Cassese is of the view that all members of an inhabitant state have the right to express self-determination through "internal-decision making processes", without disturbing the territorial integrity of sovereign states.<sup>10</sup> Indeed, such rights have been recognised in the United Nations Declarations on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 2007 where Article 4 declares that indigenous people "have the right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs, as well as ways and means for financing their autonomous functions".<sup>11</sup>

Although the core substance of self-determination infers secession or the ability to establish sovereign and independent states, in international laws, unilateral secession is not well received due to the fear of creating instability, when or if the right of self-determination is exercised by all who claim it. Former UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali thoughtfully said: "if every ethnic, religious or linguistic group claimed statehood, there would be no limits to fragmentation and peace and security and economic well-being for all would become even more difficult to achieve."<sup>12</sup>

Nonetheless, there are jurists that emphasise the applicability of self-determination to a particular group of people to secure their territorial sovereignty. Such kinds of self-determination are known as 'remedial secession' where self-determination is applied as a last resort or secession is justified, if any aggrieved group is severely persecuted by the state.<sup>13</sup> Such legal rights are detailed in the UNGA Resolution 2625, which states that the territorial integrity of the state is protected, if the government is represented by "the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction as to race, creed or color".<sup>14</sup> This clause implies that if any government is unrepresentative or oppressive, it may trigger secession. Meanwhile, some jurists also emphasise, if internal self-determination or say autonomy are flawed in implementation, secession should be seen as a matter of last resort.

Negotiations for Tibetan Self-Determination

On 13 February 1913, the 13th Dalai Lama formally declared the independence of Tibet, following the overthrow of Manchu Qing dynasty by the Chinese nationalist revolution in 1911.<sup>15</sup> The historiography on whether Tibet is a part of China, however, is complicated as both sides have competing narratives.<sup>16</sup> But one major historical event in which Tibet formally came under the control of China is when Chinese troops entered Tibet in 1950 and consequently signed the "Agreement on Measures for the Peaceful Liberation of Tibet" (17 Point Agreement) on 23 May 1951.<sup>17</sup>

Subsequently, at the UNGA, numerous resolutions were passed calling for the right to self-determination for the Tibetan people but it was met with negligible support from the international community.<sup>18</sup> Additionally, the UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities adopted a resolution on 23 August 1991 calling on the Government of the People's Republic of China "fully to respect the fundamental human rights and freedoms of the Tibetan people".<sup>19</sup> After decades of impasse, dialogue between the two sides commenced with a pre-condition that except for "total independence" all other issues were open for discussion.<sup>20</sup> Without substantial outcome, the talks ended in 1985 with the removal of Chinese representative Hu Yao-bang.<sup>21</sup>

Dialogue between the Tibetan and Chinese representatives, however, entered a new chapter following the Dalai Lama's announcement of the "Middle way approach", implying not seeking separation or independence of Tibet, but instead securing 'genuine autonomy' within the scope of the constitution of the People's Republic of China.<sup>22</sup> In order to achieve a genuine autonomy for Tibetan peoples, the Tibetan administration formulated a 'Five point peace plan' in 1987, the Strasbourg proposal in 1998 and the Memorandum on Genuine Autonomy in 2008. Dialogue between the two sides continued based on these three core documents, but ended abruptly in 2010 without any substantial outcome.

In the negotiations between Tibetan representatives and the Chinese government, securing genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people has been a key issue, and has led to deadlock and pauses in the negotiation process. Hence, it is necessary and worthwhile to look into how the PRC government takes into account autonomy in relation to ethnic minorities.

Assessment of 'Autonomy' Implementation in China

Regional ethnic autonomy is supposed to be the core governance mechanism for ethnic minorities in China.<sup>23</sup> Though the 'Common Program' and the 1954 Constitution of the People's Republic of China (PRC) specify the establishment of regional autonomy, Chinese constitutional expert, Gao Quanxi has argued that the 1982 PRC Constitution as amended in 2018 has been infused with a legal attribute, which is aimed at ending incessant revolution, discarding absolute class struggle, substituted by "dictatorship of the proletariat" with a "people's democratic dictatorship".<sup>24</sup>

In the 1982 PRC Constitution, the preamble declares, "China is a unified multi-ethnic state founded by the Chinese people of all ethnic groups" and opposes "major ethnic group (Han) chauvinism". Further, Article 4 stipulates the promotion of ethnic equality and unity, where discrimination and oppression of any ethnic groups is prohibited, and allows for the establishment of autonomous regions for self-governance while obliging that "all ethnic groups shall have the freedom to use and develop their own spoken and written languages and to preserve or reform their own traditions and customs".<sup>25</sup> Additionally, based on the 1982 constitution, the National People's Congress in 1984 adopted the "Law on Regional Ethnic Autonomy" which was amended in 2001, strengthening and expanding the existing autonomous rights formulated in the 1982 constitution.<sup>26</sup>

Assessing implementation of the ethnic minorities' policy by the PRC government, it is characterised as one of "gradualism and pluralism" where until the late 1950s, a tolerant and benign attitude was practiced towards ethnic minorities by the PRC government.<sup>27</sup> But from the 1960s onwards under the leadership of Mao, especially during the Cultural Revolution (1967-1976), the ethnic minorities experienced the most repressive and assimilative period in the history of PRC.<sup>28</sup> Again from the 1970s, under the leadership of Deng Xiaoping, extreme assimilation of minorities ended and they began to make claims to uphold their rights to national autonomy.

In the case of the Tibetan ethnic minority, though the demand for genuine autonomy by the Tibetan representative emerged more recently, essentially it was already featured way back in 17 Point Agreement in May 1951, as para 3 underlined that, "the Tibetan people have the right of exercising national regional autonomy under the unified leadership of the Central People's Government".<sup>29</sup> The PRC government, however, violated the agreement.<sup>30</sup>

To achieve the aspiration of autonomy for the Tibetan people, its representatives even submitted a "Memorandum on Genuine Autonomy for the Tibetan People" in 2008 to the PRC government.<sup>31</sup> The demand for autonomy in the memorandum was drafted in consonance with the PRC constitution and the Law on regional ethnic autonomy, which essentially addresses independently managing the internal affairs of Tibetans including language, culture, religion education, environment protection and utilisation of natural resources.

The evaluation of autonomy implementation in the Tibet Autonomous Region, however, reveals policy swings between "more tolerant and more repressive" by the PRC government.<sup>32</sup> Ironically, one of the fundamental reasons why the PRC government rejected the Tibetan proposal of autonomy, and instead adopted a repressive policy towards the Tibetan ethnic minority, is due to "fear of the external forces" of Western countries, especially the United States.<sup>33</sup>

The US policy on Tibet can be traced back to the 1940s, when the US government entered an agreement with Tibet to build a supply route through Tibet to China against Japanese attack. US policy on Tibet has been termed "inconsistencies in commitment, interspersed with occasional bursts of sympathy and activism"<sup>34</sup> mostly due to the impact of Cold War politics. Until 1970, Tibet was included in the US strategy to counter communist expansion in Asia. But it was weakened following the rapprochement of Sino-US relations in the 1970s.<sup>35</sup> And conversely, the Soviet Union, which in the 1950s fully backed the PRC government claim to sovereignty over Tibet, began to condemn Chinese policy in Tibet as a "colonial power".<sup>36</sup> Contrary to the Cold War period, however, Russia's policy on Tibet "seems to view the Tibetan issue in the context of Chechenya, unfortunately".<sup>37</sup>

One major reason for the US leveraging of Tibetan separatism is based on the notion of a growing 'China threat' both in terms of military and economy, which the PRC government considers as a 'containment policy'. Yet, US leveraging of Tibetan secession has consequences, especially for Tibetans in Tibet and also for the resolution of the Tibetan question. Sinologist Barry Sautman cautions that backing secession by great powers "makes it harder for Tibetans in Tibet to seek self-representation without being suspected of pursuing secession" and also "even makes it harder to resolve the Tibetan question".<sup>38</sup>

Way Forward

The President of the Central Tibetan Administration Penpa Tsering in September 2024 acknowledged that 'back-channel' talks between the two sides have been initiated.<sup>39</sup> The PRC government has laid two conditions for resuming negotiations. First, as the Chinese government considers the Central Tibetan Government as an organised political group with an agenda for 'Tibetan independence', negotiations will be held "only with the personal representatives of the 14th Dalai Lama". And second, any contact or talks will only be about the personal future of the 14th Dalai Lama and the handful of people close to him, and not a 'high degree of autonomy'.<sup>40</sup> Meanwhile, external threat perceptions will significantly determine the outcome of negotiations.

To preserve the territorial integrity and maintain amicable relations among the 56 ethnic groups in China, however, one fundamental key is to uphold the PRC constitution and the Law of ethnic regional autonomy in letter and spirit. The fact is Tibetans are not seeking separation from China and this was reiterated recently by the Dalai Lama when he stated "We want to have full autonomy, as part of the People's Republic of China."<sup>41</sup> Thus, much of the discontent among the minorities stems from incomplete or flawed implementation of China's ethnic minority policies.

A dam ignited rare Tibetan protests. They ended in beatings and arrests, BBC finds

24 December 2024, BBC, Tessa Wong

Hundreds of Tibetans protesting against a Chinese dam were rounded up in a harsh crackdown earlier this year, with some beaten and seriously injured, the BBC has learnt from sources and verified footage.

Such protests are extremely rare in Tibet, which China has tightly controlled since it annexed the region in the 1950s. That they still happened highlights China's controversial push to build dams in what has long been a sensitive area.

Claims of the arrests and beatings began trickling out shortly after the events in February. In the following days authorities further tightened restrictions, making it difficult for anyone to verify the story, especially journalists who cannot freely travel to Tibet.

But the BBC has spent months tracking down Tibetan sources whose family and friends were detained and beaten. BBC Verify has also examined satellite imagery and verified leaked videos which show mass protests and monks begging the authorities for mercy.

The sources live outside of China and are not associated with activist groups. But they did not wish to be named for safety reasons.

In response to our queries, the Chinese embassy in the UK did not confirm nor deny the protests or the ensuing crackdown.

But it said: "China is a country governed by the rule of law, and strictly safeguards citizens' rights to lawfully express their concerns and provide opinions or suggestions."

The protests, followed by the crackdown, took place in a territory home to Tibetans in Sichuan province. For years, Chinese authorities have been planning to build the massive Gangtuo dam and hydropower plant, also known as Kamtok in Tibetan, in the valley straddling the Dege (Derge) and Jiangda (Jomda) counties.

Once built, the dam's reservoir would submerge an area that is culturally and religiously significant to Tibetans, and home to several villages and ancient monasteries containing sacred relics.

One of them, the 700-year-old Wangdui (Wontoe) Monastery, has particular historical value as its walls feature rare Buddhist murals.

The Gangtuo dam would also displace thousands of Tibetans. The BBC has seen what appears to be a public tender document for the relocation of 4,287 residents to make way for the dam.

The BBC contacted an official listed on the tender document as well as Huadian, the state-owned enterprise reportedly building the dam. Neither have responded.

Plans to build the dam were first approved in 2012, according to a United Nations special rapporteurs letter to the Chinese government. The letter, which is from July 2024, raised concerns about the dam's "irreversible impact" on thousands of people and the environment.

From the start, residents were not "consulted in a meaningful way" about the dam, according to the letter. For instance, they were given information that was inadequate and not in the Tibetan language.

They were also promised by the government that the project would only go ahead if 80% of them agreed to it, but "there is no evidence this consent was ever given," the letter goes on to say, adding that residents tried to raise concerns about the dam several times.

Chinese authorities, however, denied this in their response to the UN. "The relocation of the villages in question was carried out only after full consultation of the opinions of the local residents," the Permanent Mission of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations office said in a letter from September 2024.

It added: "Local government and project developers funded the construction of new homes and provided subsidies for grazing, herding and farming. As for any cultural relics, they were relocated in their entirety."

But the BBC understands from two Tibetan sources that, in February, officials had told them they would be evicted imminently, while giving them little information about resettlement options and compensation.

This triggered such deep anxiety that villagers and Buddhist monks decided to stage protests, despite knowing the risks of a crackdown.

'They didn't know what was going to happen to them' The largest one saw hundreds gathering outside a government building in Dege. In a video clip obtained and verified by the BBC, protesters can be heard calling on authorities to stop the evictions and let them stay.

Separately, a group of residents approached visiting officials and pleaded with them to cancel plans to build the dam. The BBC has obtained footage which appears to show this incident, and verified it took place in the village of Xiba.

The clip shows red-robed monks and villagers kneeling on a dusty road and showing a thumbs-up, a traditional Tibetan way of begging for mercy.

In the past the Chinese government has been quick to stamp out resistance to authority, especially in Tibetan territory where it is sensitive to anything that could potentially feed separatist sentiment.

It was no different this time. Authorities swiftly launched their crackdown, arresting hundreds of people at protests while also raiding homes across the valley, according to one of our sources.

One unverified but widely shared clip appears to show Chinese policemen shoving a group of monks on a road, in what is thought to be an arrest operation.

Many were detained for weeks and some were beaten badly, according to our Tibetan sources whose family and friends were targeted in the crackdown.

One source shared fresh details of the interrogations. He told the BBC that a childhood friend was detained and interrogated over several days.

"He was asked questions and treated nicely at first. They asked him 'who asked you to participate, who is behind this'.

"Then, when he couldn't give them [the] answers they wanted, he was beaten by six or seven different security personnel over several days."

His friend sustained only minor injuries, and was freed within a few days. But others were not so lucky.

Another source told the BBC that more than 20 of his relatives and friends were detained for participating in the protests, including an elderly person who was more than 70 years old.

"Some of them sustained injuries all over their body, including in their ribs and kidneys, from being kicked and beaten... some of them were sick because of their injuries," he said.

Similar claims of physical abuse and beatings during the arrests have surfaced in overseas Tibetan media reports.

The UN letter also notes reports of detentions and use of force on hundreds of protesters, stating they were "severely beaten by the Chinese police, resulting in injuries that required hospitalisation".

After the crackdown, Tibetans in the area encountered even tighter restrictions, the BBC understands. Communication with the outside world was further limited and there was increased surveillance. Those who are still contactable have been unwilling to talk as they fear another crackdown, according to sources.

The first source said while some released protesters were eventually allowed to travel elsewhere in Tibetan territory, others have been slapped with orders restricting their movement.

This has caused problems for those who need to go to hospital for medical treatment and nomadic tribespeople who need to roam across pastures with their herds, he said.

The second source said he last heard from his relatives and friends at the end of February: "When I got through, they said not to call any more as they would get arrested. They were very scared, they would hang up on me.

"We used to talk over WeChat, but now that is not possible. I'm totally blocked from contacting all of them," he said.

"The last person I spoke to was a younger female cousin. She said, 'It's very dangerous, a lot of us have been arrested, there's a lot of trouble, they have hit a lot of us'... They didn't know what was going to happen to them next."

The BBC has been unable to find any mention of the protests and crackdown in Chinese state media. But shortly after the protests, a Chinese Communist Party official visited the area to "explain the necessity" of building the dam and called for "stability maintenance measures", according to one report.

A few months later, a tender was awarded for the construction of a Dege "public security post", according to documents posted online.

The letter from Chinese authorities to the UN suggests villagers have already been relocated and relics moved, but it is unclear how far the project has progressed.

The BBC has been monitoring the valley via satellite imagery for months. For now, there is no sign of the dam's construction nor demolition of the villages and monasteries.

The Chinese embassy told us authorities were still conducting geological surveys and specialised studies to build the dam. They added the local government is "actively and thoroughly understanding the demands and aspirations" of residents.

Development or exploitation?

China is no stranger to controversy when it comes to dams.

When the government constructed the world's biggest dam in the 90s - the Three Gorges on the Yangtze River - it saw protests and criticism over its handling of relocation and compensation for thousands of villagers.

In more recent years, as China has accelerated its pivot from coal to clean energy sources, such moves have become especially sensitive in Tibetan territories.

Beijing has been eyeing the steep valleys and mighty rivers here, in the rural west, to build mega-dams and hydropower stations that can sustain China's electricity-hungry eastern metropolises. President Xi Jinping has personally pushed for this, a policy called "xidiandongsong", or "sending western electricity eastwards".

Like Gangtuo, many of these dams are on the Jinsha (Dri Chu) river, which runs through Tibetan territories. It forms the upper reaches of the Yangtze river and is part of what China calls the world's largest clean energy corridor.

Gangtuo is in fact the latest in a series of 13 dams planned for this valley, five of which are already in operation or under construction.

The Chinese government and state media have presented these dams as a win-win solution that cuts pollution and generates clean energy, while uplifting rural Tibetans.

In its statement to the BBC, the Chinese embassy said clean energy projects focus on "promoting high-quality economic development" and "enhancing the sense of gain and happiness among people of all ethnic groups".

But the Chinese government has long been accused of violating Tibetans' rights. Activists say the dams are the latest example of Beijing's exploitation of Tibetans and their land.

"What we are seeing is the accelerated destruction of Tibetan religious, cultural and linguistic heritage," said Tenzin Choekyi, a researcher with rights group Tibet Watch. "This is the 'high-quality development' and 'ecological civilisation' that the Chinese government is implementing in Tibet."

One key issue is China's relocation policy that evicts Tibetans from their homes to make way for development - it is what drove the protests by villagers and monks living near the Gangtuo dam. More than 930,000 rural Tibetans are estimated to have been relocated since 2000, according to Human Rights Watch (HRW).

Beijing has always maintained that these relocations happen only with the consent of Tibetans, and that they are given housing, compensation and new job opportunities. State media often portrays it as an improvement in their living conditions.

But rights groups paint a different picture, with reports detailing evidence of coercion, complaints of inadequate compensation, cramped living conditions, and lack of jobs. They also point out that relocation severs the deep, centuries-old connection that rural Tibetans share with their land.

"These people will essentially lose everything they own, their livelihoods and community heritage," said Maya Wang, interim China director at HRW.

There are also environmental concerns over the flooding of Tibetan valleys renowned for their biodiversity, and the possible dangers of building dams in a region rife with earthquake fault lines.

Some Chinese academics have found the pressure from accumulated water in dam reservoirs could potentially increase the risk of quakes, including in the Jinsha river. This could cause catastrophic flooding and destruction, as seen in 2018, when rain-induced landslides occurred at a village situated between two dam construction sites on Jinsha.

The Chinese embassy told us that the implementation of any clean energy project "will go through scientific planning and rigorous demonstration, and will be subject to relevant supervision".

In recent years, China has passed laws safeguarding the environment surrounding the Yangtze River and the Qinghai-Tibetan plateau. President Xi has personally stressed the need to protect the Yangtze's upper reaches.

About 424 million yuan (£45.5m, $60m) has been spent on environmental conservation along Jinsha, according to state media. Reports have also highlighted efforts to quake-proof dam projects.

Multiple Tibetan rights groups, however, argue that any large-scale development in Tibetan territory, including dams such as Gangtuo, should be halted.

They have staged protests overseas and called for an international moratorium, arguing that companies participating in such projects would be "allowing the Chinese government to profit from the occupation and oppression of Tibetans".

"I really hope that this [dam-building] stops," one of our sources said. "Our ancestors were here, our temples are here. We have been here for generations. It is very painful to move. What kind of life would we have if we leave?"

Missing in the Gray Zone? China's Maritime Militia Forces Around Taiwan

24 December 2024, The Diplomat, Ryan D. Martinson

While maritime militia forces are not playing a major role in China's multi-pronged pressure campaign against Taiwan, they are not completely absent from the battlespace.

One of the novel features of Beijing's recent all-domain pressure campaign against Taiwan has been the addition of coast guard forces to its coercive tool kit. In the past, when the People's Republic of China (PRC) rattled its saber across the strait, it relied heavily on the various branches of the People's Liberation Army (PLA), especially its navy, air force, and rocket forces. However, in August 2022 it expanded its repertoire by dispatching a 6,600-ton coast guard cutter to patrol the strait, one of several operational responses to then-U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to the island.

Since then, Beijing has repeatedly deployed coast guard cutters to waters around Taiwan and several of its outer islands, with the clear intent of undermining Taipei's sovereignty and threatening its security.

Many observers, including Taiwan's government, have categorized this new pattern of maritime coercion as "gray zone" (灰帶) actions. The term suggests similarities with PRC behavior in the South China Sea, where the gray zone concept is frequently evoked. But if China is indeed employing a gray zone approach against Taiwan, it appears to be doing so largely without its most infamous gray zone actor — the maritime militia.

To date, there has been little, if any, reporting of militia activities around Taiwan. This does not mean that they are not operating around the strait, just that they are not being incorporated into Beijing's pressure campaign.

In the South China Sea, the maritime militia is a key instrument of Beijing's policy to expand its influence and control over disputed maritime space. Often disguised as civilian fishing vessels, militia forces serve a range of functions, from showing the flag in PRC-claimed waters to physically blocking foreign mariners from using the sea. Due to their ambiguous identity and lack of visible armaments, their actions are less escalatory than those taken by other components of China's armed forces — at least so Chinese leaders believe. The maritime militia often works closely with the China Coast Guard, the PRC's other main gray zone force, two confederates in coercion, each applying its respective strengths to impose China's will on its neighbors.

If the maritime militia is so central to the PRC's strategy in the South China Sea, how can we explain its apparent absence in waters around Taiwan? Why is Beijing relying entirely on coast guard forces in the cross-strait variant of its gray zone approach? Does it simply lack capable militia forces like those provided by the South China Sea provinces of Guangdong, Guangxi, and Hainan? Or can larger strategic and operational considerations explain the difference?

Fujian Province: a Militia Powerhouse

The simplest explanation for the apparent absence of militia forces in waters around Taiwan would be that China lacks capable units with firsthand experience in the Taiwan theater, and therefore has no choice but to rely on its coast guard to achieve its policy aims. However, a review of the available evidence quickly dispels this hypothesis.

For militia operations around Taiwan, the PRC would need to rely on mariners who routinely operate in these waters under their civilian guise. That means fishers from Fujian, the PRC province directly across the strait from Taiwan. Aside from having valuable experience in the theater, Fujian fishers look like they belong there, a necessary condition for operational concealment and ambiguity.

Fujian is home to a large fishing industry, which provides ample raw materials for maritime militia units. The responsibility for molding these fishing fleets into capable militia forces falls on the provincial military district, working through its municipal sub-districts (or garrisons) and their subordinate People's Armed Forces Departments (PAFDs). These PLA entities coordinate their efforts with local government officials, who fund militia-building initiatives, and local fisheries bureaus, which regulate the fleet when not serving militia functions.

The importance of civil-military cooperation in militia work ensures that records about the presence and disposition of maritime militia units are readily found in open sources. Based on the available information, Fujian has organized some significant portion of its very large fishing fleet into militia organizations.

As an example, take just the city of Fuzhou, home to 1,100 medium and large fishing vessels of the type best-suited for militia operations. In 2013, the city and its PLA garrison (福州警备区) began taking steps to bolster its maritime militia forces. In that year, the garrison created "pilot" maritime militia reconnaissance units and investigated ways to strengthen relevant capabilities. Starting in 2014, Fuzhou prioritized the building of maritime militia forces, creating a "maritime force construction leading small group" with an office in the garrison headquarters. The emphasis on augmenting maritime militia continued through subsequent years. By 2017, the Fuzhou garrison had achieved "real-time command" of maritime militia units, allowing PAFDs to mobilize forces more easily for training and real-world operations.

While the garrison and its subordinate units developed the capabilities of local maritime militia forces, Fuzhou civilian authorities updated the regulations for using them, thereby ensuring their operational readiness. In 2014, for example, Fuzhou city government revised the regulations for mobilizing militia personnel and requisitioning civilian vessels for militia work. In 2018, it issued another document clarifying the standards for compensating civilian mariners whose boats, ships, and personnel are taken away from production to serve state and military requirements, as happens when militia forces are activated for duty. This improved the odds that militia personnel would answer the call for training or real world operations – a perennial challenge for the PAFDs charged with managing them.

Fuzhou's Lianjiang county, located near Taiwan's strategic Matsu island group, has made maritime militia development a particular priority. Its 13th Five Year Plan (2016–20) contains a section on promoting military-civil fusion, which calls for "prioritizing the construction of PLA reserves, maritime militia, and backbone militia forces." Lianjiang is home to two "national center fishing harbors," one each on the northern and southern coast of the Huangqi peninsula. These harbors are home to hundreds of fishing vessels, a significant (but unknown) portion of which belong to maritime militia units.

Lianjiang's maritime militia enterprise resembles militia-building practices in the South China Sea provinces, further suggesting its high degree of sophistication. First, it uses large fishing companies as maritime militia fronts. For example, Shunfan Fisheries Company (顺帆渔业有限公司), located in Huangqi Town, on the southern coast of the Huangqi peninsula, operates dozens of militia boats. The company headquarters contains a number of exhibits celebrating its martial prowess. Second, Lianjiang civilian and military authorities have designated larger civilian vessels to serve as maritime militia command ships (海上民兵指挥船), indicating preparation for extended maritime operations.

Different Circumstances

With its hundreds of fishing vessels and robust militia organization, Lianjiang county alone would be able to provide Beijing with the forces needed to operate in sensitive areas around Taiwan – if it made strategic and operational sense for them to do so. Assuming the forces are available, as they apparently are, why is China not using them?

The first, most obvious, explanation is that the two theaters are vastly different. The South China Sea is a large body of water, and Beijing claims jurisdiction over most of it (3.0 million sq km). Although the PRC operates the world's largest coast guard, it cannot be everywhere at once. Militia forces can fill the presence gaps, showing the flag, collecting intelligence, and taking action, when and where needed. The most contested sections of the South China Sea are also very remote from mainland China. As a result, ships and boats must spend large portions of their deployments just getting to and from operating areas — again, increasing the size of the fleet required to meet the mission.

The Taiwan theater is both much smaller and much closer to China. Most gray zone operations occur near Taiwan's outer islands and within the strait itself, with occasional demonstrations east of Taiwan. This places far less strain on China's existing coast guard forces and obviates a key function of the maritime militia, i.e., serving as an auxiliary fleet for the coast guard.

The maritime militia's other major attributes — ambiguous status and lack of armaments — may actually reduce its utility in the Taiwan theater, where Beijing is pursuing different policy aims. In the South China Sea, the maritime militia allows China to achieve local dominance without resorting to classical "gunboat diplomacy," which would damage China's relations with its neighbors and risk an armed conflict, possibly involving the United States.

The calculus is different with Taiwan, where the main goal is to intimidate Taiwanese leaders so they change their policies. The intrusive operations of Chinese maritime law enforcement forces, in the words of retired PLA Navy officer Cao Weidong (曹卫东), "put a squeeze on [Taiwan separatists'] sense of military security." This is a strategic effect that flows from power and authority, which the Chinese coast guard possesses but the maritime militia does not.

Different Roles

That the maritime militia is not playing a major role in China's pressure campaign against Taiwan does not mean it is totally absent from the battlespace. Indeed, evidence suggests that militia forces have been mobilized, like in the South China Sea, to operate in sensitive waters, just in a manner more appropriate to the strategic and operational circumstances.

Most notably, Fujian maritime militia units have been tasked with participating in coast guard exercises staged during periods of cross-strait tension, thereby helping to amplify the coercive signal sent to Taipei. One example occurred in May 2024, as part of Beijing's response to President Lai Ching-te's inauguration. In conjunction with the PLA Eastern Theater Command's large-scale exercise (Joint Sword 2024A), the China Coast Guard sent a four-ship task force to patrol waters east of Taiwan. While there, the ships held a "comprehensive law enforcement drill" (综合执法演练) involving militia vessels.

The drill was clearly aimed at Taipei. It occurred within visual sight of the island, well inside its exclusive economic zone, and practiced "inspection and identification" (查证识别) and "warning and expulsion" (警告驱离), operations that the China Coast Guard had no business doing in these waters. The task force included three of the China Coast Guard's best-armed cutters — hulls 2303, 2304, and 2305 — members of a ship class derived from the PLA Navy's Type 054A frigate. While interviewed by PRC state media, a China Coast Guard officer, Captain Liu Jianfeng (刘剑锋), declared that his service would "continue to strengthen its patrols and law enforcement in China's jurisdictional waters" and "resolutely defend national sovereignty and security" — language clearly intended to alarm its audience in Taipei.

As part of the drill, the China Coast Guard used a real vessel to simulate a law enforcement action. PRC media coverage showed a China Coast Guard cutter dispatching small craft to approach and board a large fishing boat, the Minlianyu 60388. Commercially available ship traffic data suggests that at least one other "Minlianyu" fishing vessel participated in the drill.

For such a sensitive mission, the China Coast Guard would not requisition just any civilian fishing vessels — though in theory it probably could. Rather, it would select boats crewed by personnel best prepared for the task at hand, which unquestionably means members of China's maritime militia.

Minlianyu 60388 is registered in Fuzhou City's Lianjiang County, which, as discussed above, is home to a heavy concentration of maritime militia units. After the mission, the boat returned to the town of Tailu, on the northeast coast of the Huangqi peninsula. Tailu hosts at least two maritime militia units. Minlianyu 60388 might belong to either. The first is based in Xiubang Village (琇邦村). This unit was featured in a December 2015 issue of PLA Pictorial (解放军画报), where it was praised for its adoption of a new command and control application (called 榕兵一号) that could be installed on a smart phone or computer, allowing local military authorities to mobilize militia members more easily for training and real-world operations. The second possibility is the Tailu Village (苔藓村) maritime militia unit, whose unit leader, Sun Yu (孙宇), was recognized as an outstanding militiaman in 2021 – suggesting that it too is an elite organization.

Fujian maritime militia forces played a similar supporting role during another major coast guard exercise that occurred near Kinmen on May 9, 2024, just before Lai's inauguration. It involved a number of Chinese "public vessels" (公务船), i.e., ships that belong to civilian coast guard agencies. The exercise included two Maritime Safety Administration cutters (Haixun 06 and Haixun 0802), three Fujian Marine and Fisheries Bureau cutters (CMS 8002, CMS 8027, and FLE 35501), and a China Rescue Service ship (Donghaijiu 113). To support the exercise, the organizers requisitioned at least three PRC fishing boats. Taiwanese authorities did not disclose their identities, but publicly available ship tracking data suggests they came from the Longhai District of Zhangzhou, a city west of Xiamen. Longhai is home to at least one maritime militia unit.

What Comes Next

In conclusion, while maritime militia forces are not playing a major role in China's multi-pronged pressure campaign against Taiwan, they are not completely absent from the battlespace. They are providing low-key support for China's coast guard forces, specifically, through the conduct of drills designed to threaten Taiwan's sovereignty and security in Taiwan-administered waters. This role makes sense, given the particular circumstances of the theater (small, close to China) and Beijing's policy aims, i.e., to amplify Taiwan's threat perceptions, neither of which calls for heavy maritime militia involvement.

However, just because the maritime militia has not been well-leveraged to date does not mean it will not be in the future. Fujian maritime militia units could be directed to fulfill other roles if Beijing chooses to further escalate cross-strait tensions. For instance, China could decide to enforce at least a partial closure of Taiwanese shipping traffic and raise the threat of blockade. In that case, it could mobilize maritime militia units to ensure adequate forces for such a labor-intensive operation. Beijing might also turn to the Fujian maritime militia if it needed to create a pretext for escalation. It could, for instance, order a maritime militia vessel to operate in a location or in a manner that would demand a forceful response from Taiwan. That response could then give Beijing a casus belli, justifying a decision to carry out kinetic strikes against Taiwanese ships, aircraft, and targets ashore, perhaps as a preliminary to a major attack.

In sum, China's decisions about when and how to use the maritime militia against Taiwan will be predicated on strategic and operational requirements, which could evolve over time. What is certain is that unit availability will not be a limiting factor. In Fujian, the forces exist, and only await orders.

Opinion: The China factor in India-Nepal relations

24 December 2024, Telangana Today, Dhananjay Tripathi

While it is reasonable to assume a strong cultural bond between India and Nepal, complacency could be detrimental, especially in the face of tough competition from China

Recently, India-Nepal ties re-emerged in the news headlines due to KP Oli's decision to visit China. Oli, the present Prime Minister of Nepal, took the oath in July 2024. His visit to China drew the attention of Indian analysts as many believed it was a break of traditions. Oli opted for China over India for his first visit to the neighbourhood. However, Nepal experts allege that New Delhi has delayed the invitation.

Whatever the reason, he went to China, signed nine agreements, met President Xi Jinping and discussed the revival of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in what is termed a framework for Belt and Road Cooperation. It is to be noted that Nepal was a signatory of the BRI but due to apprehension of being overloaded by debt, it moved cautiously and the projects envisioned under it have not been operationalised according to the plan.

Failed BRI – A Case of Pokhara International Airport?

Due to the lacklustre progress of the BRI in Nepal, several projects that received support from China have since been classified under the BRI. A prime example of this is the Pokhara International Airport. This airport was constructed at a cost of over $216 million, with nearly $215 million provided by the Chinese government in the form of a soft loan. Although the airport is classified as an international facility, it currently has no direct international flights. To demonstrate its success, China arranged a chartered flight from Sichuan to Pokhara International Airport in June 2023. However, in practical terms, the number of international flights to this destination remains very limited.

Curious Case of Chinese Debt

There are several direct flights from Kathmandu to Pokhara. Nevertheless, experts believe that given the current revenue generation, it may be difficult to repay the loan within 20 years after the end of the initial grace period. Estimates indicate that Nepal must repay the loan for the construction of the airport with an interest rate of 2%, although some independent sources report the interest rate could be as high as 5%, in addition to other costs.

Interestingly, similar to other projects in South Asia, the contract to build the airport was awarded to a Chinese company. China CAMC Engineering Company Limited was responsible for constructing Pokhara International Airport, resulting in a significant portion of the loan being recycled, as the construction contracts were granted to the Chinese firm.

The repayment amount, including interest, will be substantial for Nepal, especially considering the current flight operations at this airport. A report indicates that the airport requires approximately 100 daily domestic and 50 international flights per week to cover its expenses. Currently, there are no more than 30 domestic flights each day and no international flights operating from this airport. In summary, the airport will need an extraordinary intervention to repay the Chinese loan. There have been reports that both Prachanda and, more recently, Oli have requested concessions from China, but they have yet to receive a positive response from Beijing. Even for those who disagree with the “debt trap theory” in principle, this case provides grounds for examination.

India remains the largest source of foreign direct investment (FDI) in Nepal; however, China’s overall investment is increasing. In 2023, trade between China and Nepal reached approximately $1.8 billion, which is an increase of more than 7% compared to the previous years. China is significantly investing in infrastructure projects, particularly in the energy sector, with many of these initiatives funded by Chinese capital. As a result, Chinese debt in Nepal is also rising. According to a World Bank report, this debt grew from $0.07 billion in 2016 to $0.26 billion in 2022. While this amount is still much lower than the Chinese debt owed by other South Asian countries, Nepal is concerned about the steady increase in this figure.

Strategy of China

Upon close observation, it is evident that China employs a two-pronged strategy to expand its influence in South Asia. The first approach involves straining the economies of these countries by flooding the market with its products, offering loans for unnecessary mega-infrastructure projects, and leveraging its economic power to secure investments for Chinese companies. The second focuses on cultivating a pro-China civil society and promoting political parties and leaders that align with its interests.

China provides generous scholarships to students, grants and funding for projects to think tanks and NGOs. It also offers travel opportunities for scholars, bureaucrats and journalists. Additionally, the country grants PhD fellowships and sends influential elites, academics and members of the Communist Party to various South Asian nations. According to reports, there has been a significant increase in training programmes organised by China for bureaucrats in Nepal. This strategic initiative creates a favourable intellectual environment for China while sidelining or diminishing the voices of critical and independent thinkers in these countries.

For instance, despite the strengthening ties between China and Nepal, some analysts in Nepal are opposed to requesting debt restructuring from China due to concerns about potential backlash from Beijing. Additionally, many in Nepal employ the logic of balancing relations with India and China in the national political discourse. This approach tends to be more rhetorical than substantive. Nevertheless, the idea that Nepal must balance its relationships with both neighbours has become a widely accepted narrative.

What about India?

The discussion about China’s influence in Nepal cannot take place without addressing India’s role. The relationship between India and Nepal is rooted in history and is deeply connected through culture, extending beyond mere political considerations. It involves the people, their traditions and a sense of unity. Notwithstanding, there are contentious issues between the two nations, and China’s growing presence poses a challenge for New Delhi. Beijing has exploited regional tensions and strategically strengthened its foothold wherever India has encountered obstacles due to political factors.

Despite India’s continued investment in the region, it struggles to maintain its strong position, particularly evident in Nepal. At times, India’s foreign policy establishment seems to take certain aspects of this relationship for granted. While it is reasonable to assume a strong cultural bond between India and Nepal, complacency could be detrimental, especially in the face of tough competition from China.

India must work on reinforcing cultural ties with Nepal and engage more with civil society and the younger generation. Given Nepal’s developing status, there is an urgent need for attractive fellowships and enhanced exchange programmes. Additionally, Indian companies should consider investing in Nepal’s social sector to further strengthen these connections.

Many people view China as being more influential than India in Nepal, which is concerning. A more proactive approach from India, aimed at engaging the young and articulate generation, along with a genuine effort to address political differences, could significantly enhance India’s image in the region. Fortunately, some members of Nepal’s political class, regardless of their party affiliations, remain sceptical about China’s involvement, especially in the economic sector. However, this sentiment may not last indefinitely.

Tibet under siege : The dark side of China's hydropower drive

23 December 2024, News Day

Tibet has been one of the major sufferer of China's Hydropower ambitions. According to a new International Campaign for Tibet, China's rapid Hydropower dam scheme has caused more damage to the Tibet's civilisation and the environment. Describing it as anti Tibet, International Campaign for Tibet report accused the Chinese Communist Party's aggressive pursuit of Hydropower stating that Beijing has no regards for Tibetan voices, environmental sustainability, and the well-being of downstream nations.

The report also accused the CCP of prioritizing political and economic ambitions over human and ecological consequences. According to the report hundreds of dams constructed or planned have covered the entire Tibetan plateau. China's rapid Hydropower dam scheme was causing irreparable damage to the Tibetan civilization, the environment, downstream nations, and the climate.

Tibet is not alone. several countries like Bangladesh, Laos, Thailand, Cambodia and Vietnam have been equal sufferers of China's Hydropower ambitions. At least 11 out of 13 Hydropower dams operated by Beijing have come under accusation of holding back upstream water during drought periods.

As a result, the flow of the Mekong river showed a significant drop in recent years that impacted agriculture, fishery and livelihood of millions of people in these countries.

Experts said that China's Hegemonic Hydropower Projects are a curse for its Asian Neighbours. "The scale and scope of the PRC's Hydropower dam spree is both unbelievable and unconscionable." said Tencho Gyatso, President of the International Campaign for Tibet. He accused Beijing of showing disrespect to the Tibetan people's rights and the climate.

Some of the key findings of the report have made startling revelations. The report stated that the dam will dislocate 1.2 million people living close to dam projects, depriving them of livelihood.

More than 80 per cent of dams with a capacity of 100 MW or less than 100 MW pose threat to the Tibetan civilization, environmental sustainability, and the climate. Of them, 60 per cent are either in proposal or preparation stage, presenting opportunities to change course.

Experts said that the Chinese government would not take cognisance of the report as it wants to go ahead with its plan to construct dams. In February this year, a protest was organised against the construction of 1.1. million kilowatt Hydropower station on the Drichu River in Derge County (Dege in Mandarin), part of the Garze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Sichuan Province.

Derge is not part of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, whose borders were drawn up by the Chinese Communist Party, but is part of Kham, a historically Tibetan region. Also the protesters sought the withdrawal of the order for thousands of Tibetans to relocate from Upper Wonto and Shipa villages and six important monasteries – including the Wonto monastery, which was built in the 13th century and has priceless murals dating from that period.

The villages and monasteries are expected to be flooded once the dam's reservoir is complete. Multiple protests have taken place after February. The Diplomat had reported that these protests were muzzled by the government's crackdown. The police had arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks, and imposed a complete lockdown on these monasteries.

It also reported that many of these existing, planned, and under-construction Hydropower dams lack comprehensive Environmental and Social Impact Assessments (ESIAs). The most astonishing was China's own approach towards dam-building in Tibet because it openly goes against China's own legislative framework such as laws government environmental disclosures, public interest environmental litigation, public feedback on planned Hydropower projects, and proper ESIA procedures. Since 2009, China has formulated and implemented three action plans on human rights and environmental issues.

Based on these regulations, China's government is well aware that certain special projects, like Hydropower plans, cause adverse environmental impact and directly affect the environmental rights of the public.

According to latest article in Made in China Journal, James Leibold reported about Tibet-Aid Project, stating that CCP initiative that pairs Tibet's administrative units with inland government actors is essentially meant to extend Beijing's settler-colonial enterprise and fortify Han dominance in the region.

Among the Tibet-Aid cadres championed in CCP propaganda are Han engineers committed to transforming Tibet's physical landscape through "civilizing" infrastructure projects. Leibold argued, "By unleashing a new legion of Han officials and settlers on to the Tibetan Plateau, Xi seeks to complete the discursive, demographic, and cultural integration of Tibet into a new Han empire." Whatever be the intention but the construction of Hydropower projects will erode local Tibetan sovereignty.

In Dharamshala, nonviolent Tibetan leaders grapple with Chinese occupation, Gaza war

As Israel and regional terror organizations battle it out, pacifist Buddhist scholars and activists see parallels – and crucial differences – between themselves and the Middle East

From the hills of Dharamshala, where exiled Tibetans have made their home for over six decades, the Israel-Hamas war has sparked profound reflection among Buddhist scholars and activists who see parallels – and crucial differences – with their own struggle against Chinese occupation.

"If you solve it through negotiation and dialogue, it is a permanent solution," says Geshe Lhakdor, director of the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives and a former translator for the Dalai Lama. "If you solve it through military might – okay, today you are more powerful, you may win. The next day it is my turn. So there will never be a permanent settlement."

The Sino-Tibet conflict has a complex history, and its roots run deep.

"Tibet is the oldest occupied territory... China is the new colonist. The Chinese were the victims of colonization, but one night they shifted positions and became the colonizer," charged Tenzin Lekshay, spokesperson of the Central Tibetan Administration.

In this light, the Dalai Lama's Buddhist position in favor of nonviolence or the "Middle Way" approach has guided the Tibetan movement for decades toward a sustainable peace even as other social movements have adopted violent tactics. Yet the challenges of maintaining this moral stance amid worsening Chinese repression in Tibet are evident in Dharamshala, home of the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration.

"I personally believe that violence can bring nonviolence," said a leader of Students for a Free Tibet (SFT) in India, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"Nonviolence sometimes tempts or limits us to being neutral or passive. It is exhausting because it is like waiting for something big to happen... We use different tactics and approaches, but it still takes so much time," he said.

Even so, the SFT leader believes violence is only justified in particular circumstances: "The violence should only come from me, not from the whole community. If killing one person could bring widespread peace, then I would do it – but only if it does not escalate to more violence, if it does not escalate to the killing of masses."

DHARAMSHALA, India – From the hills of Dharamshala, where exiled Tibetans have made their home for over six decades, the Israel-Hamas war has sparked profound reflection among Buddhist scholars and activists who see parallels – and crucial differences – with their own struggle against Chinese occupation.

This perspective reflects a growing tension within the younger generation of Tibetan activists grappling with decades of stalled progress and what activists see as the systematic erasure of Tibet's identity through China's policy of mass Han Chinese settlement in the region.

This generational shift became more apparent in December 2023, when SFT's New York headquarters issued a statement strongly supporting Palestinians and drawing explicit parallels between Israeli and Chinese tactics of colonization. The statement condemned "Israel's settler colonial violence" and highlighted similarities in how the two countries rename territories and prevent refugees from returning home. The position marked a departure from the more measured approach traditionally taken by Tibetan organizations in India.

In Israel, the 'language of the gun'

The connection between Israelis and Tibetans runs deep, with Israeli travelers having frequented Dharamshala for decades. Lhakdor himself has visited Israel "seven or eight times" to transmit Buddhist teachings. "I remember I gave a public talk on nonviolence in Jerusalem... when I came out, a very tall Israeli gentleman with this white cap on his head... he said, 'Your talk is very good, but here people only understand the language of [the gun].'"

While the stark reality of the Middle East presents a challenging test case for Buddhist principles of nonviolence, Tibetan leaders maintain that military solutions only perpetuate cycles of conflict.

"Instead of killing other people, you kill your anger. Instead of occupying other lands and other wealth, you must conquer your own hatred and greed. The movement for freedom is inside... Because your enemy is not outside. The enemy is inside," said Tenzin Tsundue, a prominent Tibetan poet and activist who has been jailed by China 16 times for his pro-Tibet activities.

For these Tibetan leaders, events in Gaza have reinforced both the difficulty and the necessity of their nonviolent approach.

Lhakdor points to the indiscriminate nature of modern warfare: "With these sophisticated machines, they say that they are not using it on children and women... but the machines, once you use this ballistic missile or atom bomb, they can't discriminate. There will be collateral damage, which we are seeing everywhere."

As opposed to the violent methods utilized by Palestinian so-called "freedom fighters" in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Lhakdor notes with pride that "Tibetans never hijacked a Chinese airplane. Tibetans never threw bombs at Chinese embassies, which are everywhere in the world. Because of this total dedication to nonviolence, I can easily imagine it must have saved the lives of several thousands of people."

Geshe Lhakdor, director of the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives. (Public domain)

Lhakdor believes the current devastation in Israel and Gaza could have been prevented with earlier intervention.

"People who are responsible, people who are supposed to be leaders, they don't have the vision or the courage to deal with problems right in the beginning, when such problems are about to arise," he said. "It's really like dousing the spark right at the time, so that later on there is no forest fire. When you don't extinguish that little spark, then later on when it becomes a conflagration of fire, it's very difficult to deal with."

"Some of these leaders, they don't care about other people. They let people go to war and die there, and just give orders and sit in a comfortable room."

According to Lhakdor, leaders are needed who understand that "we are living on this one single Earth. We are not living on two different planets... We are breathing the same air from there. We are enjoying the same environment from there."

Yet there's also frustration that this peaceful approach has garnered less international attention than more violent struggles.

Tsundue observes that "there is so much support for violence" — both for the Palestinians or Israelis — while "the Dalai Lama and the Tibetans who have been fighting for freedom with nonviolence don't receive the same kind of attention."

While the Dalai Lama has not commented on the current conflict — his office citing the 89-year-old leader's reduced public engagements in recent years — he answered a question in 2014 on that year's Gaza war, known by Israel as Operation Protective Edge.

"All major religious traditions — Islam, Christianity, Hindu, of course, Jainism and Buddhism — all major religious traditions — teach us the practice of compassion, love, forgiveness, tolerance," the Dalai Lama said at the time. "So then a person who believes in a certain faith, why do you involve in such violence? It is really very, very sad."

Despite the heightened tensions and cycles of violence in Gaza and around the world, these Tibetan leaders maintain their conviction that lasting peace can only emerge through internal transformation, not external force.

"Freedom with ethics will give you freedom now and also in the future," Tsundue said.

Can cultural exchanges fix 'ambiguity and uncertainty' in China-India ties?

23 December 2024, SCMP, Maple Leung

Chinese expert on South Asia says the regional powers, long plagued by border disputes, should work harder to bridge perception gap

China and India should work harder to promote exchanges and bridge the perception gap between two countries, according to a leading Chinese expert on South Asia.

Zhang Jiadong, director of the South Asian Studies Centre at Fudan University, said the level of people-to-people and cultural exchanges between China and India lagged "far behind", considering the strength and international status of the two Asian powers.

This has resulted in "ambiguity and uncertainty" in their understanding of each other, Zhang said in an article published in the Global Times on Monday.

"This problem needs more frequent people-to-people and cultural exchanges to alleviate it," he wrote.

The academic noted that after years of tensions as a result of conflicts along their disputed Himalayan border, a lack of robust exchanges between China and India had contributed to misunderstandings – exchanges that were vital for fostering mutual trust. Zhang’s commentary came as he and other Chinese scholars, including those from the Tibetan Academy of Social Sciences, wrapped up talks with a delegation from the India Foundation – a think tank affiliated with India’s ruling Bharatiya Janata Party – in China’s Tibet autonomous region.

The discussions in regional capital Lhasa, aimed at easing tensions between the two nations, were the second phase of the Dialogue on China-India Relations. The first phase was held at Fudan University in Shanghai last month. The dialogue is an example of “track 2” diplomacy, which brings together non-state actors from both sides for discussions.

For decades, China-India relations have been troubled by the dispute over their shared border.

In 2020, bilateral ties plunged to their lowest point in decades following a series of stand-offs along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) that separates Indian-controlled Ladakh and Chinese-controlled Aksai Chin. One clash in the Galwan River valley in June of that year left 20 Indian troops and at least four Chinese soldiers dead.

Direct flights between China and India were cut during the Covid-19 pandemic, and the Kailash Mansarovar pilgrimage – a spiritual sojourn undertaken by followers of Hinduism, Buddhism and other religions – to Tibet’s Mount Kailash and Mapham Yumtso Lake has not yet resumed.

However, the two sides have made efforts to bridge the gap in bilateral relations.

Chinese President Xi Jinping met Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi on the sidelines of the Brics summit in Russia in October, just a day after the countries announced an agreement on troop disengagement at the border, which led to the end of the high-altitude stand-off.

On Wednesday, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and Indian national security adviser Ajit Doval held their first special representatives meeting in five years. During the meeting, Wang said it was crucial for both sides to establish a correct understanding of each other and resolve differences through dialogues.

Zhang said that to do so, China and India had some catching up to do when it came to people-to-people exchanges.

He noted that Beijing and New Delhi had been working to resume stalled exchanges, and the countries held their first track 2 dialogue since 2020 in India last November.

But other activities, including student exchanges, have not recovered as quickly.

During the 2019-2020 academic year, there were about 20,000 Indian students studying in China, according to Zhang.

After the Galwan Valley clash in 2020, the number of newly registered Indian students in China dropped to nearly zero. The figure then rose to 8,580 during the 2021-2022 school year before dropping to 6,500 the next year, he said.

The number of Chinese students studying in India is even smaller, with just 166 enrolled for the 2020-2021 academic year, which dropped to 25 for 2023-2024.

British Museum faces backlash over use of “Xizang” for Tibet

The British Museum in London is facing growing criticism over its use of the term “Xizang” in its Silk Roads exhibition, which Tibetan groups accuse of misrepresenting Tibetan heritage and supporting China’s narrative on Tibet.

Tibetan community leaders and human rights groups in England have demanded the removal of the term “Xizang Autonomous Region” from exhibition materials, arguing that it distorts Tibet’s cultural identity.

The controversy emerged from the museum’s use of the phrase “Tibet or Xizang Autonomous Region” in labels and catalogues describing Tibetan artefacts. Critics argue that this language disregards Tibet’s historical and political context, reinforcing the Chinese government’s narrative on Tibet.

Tsering Passang, Founder and Chairman of the Global Alliance for Tibet & Persecuted Minorities (GATPM), expressed concern, stating, “The British Museum’s adoption of ‘Xizang Autonomous Region’ misrepresents Tibet and contributes to efforts to erase Tibetan culture and history.”

The museum's Silk Roads exhibition, which opened in September 2024, highlights cultural exchanges between Asia and Europe between 500 and 1000 CE. However, the terminology used to describe Tibetan objects has drawn sharp criticism. In a letter to the museum's director, Dr. Nicholas Cullinan OBE, both GATPM and the Tibetan community in Britain requested that the term be removed, asserting that it legitimises China's claims over Tibet.

"This issue is not just about language," said Phuntsok Norbu, Chairman of the Tibetan Community in Britain. "It is about how history and culture are presented to the public. By using the term 'Xizang,' the museum diminishes Tibetan identity."

Tibetan groups are now demanding immediate action, including the removal of the term "Xizang" from all materials, a public apology to the Tibetan community, and consultations with Tibetan scholars to ensure future exhibitions reflect Tibetan history properly. "The British Museum must ensure it does not become a platform for Chinese propaganda," said Passang. "This is a matter of respect for Tibetan culture and history."

In its response to the initial complaint, the British Museum defended the use of "Tibet or Xizang Autonomous Region," claiming it reflects the current political designation of the region. However, critics argue that this position overlooks the political implications of such terminology. "This is not just about labels; it's about the museum's role in shaping global understanding of a culture under threat," said Norbu. Tibetan groups are calling for the British Museum to uphold ethical standards in its exhibitions. "The museum has a responsibility to present history with integrity and accuracy," Passang stated.

The incident also highlights a broader pattern of controversy regarding the representation of Tibet in international museums and institutions. This controversy is not isolated to the British Museum. Other prominent institutions, such as the Musée du Quai Branly and Musée Guimet in Paris, have similarly adopted terms like "Xizang" and "Himalayan World," which critics argue dilute Tibetan identity and support Beijing's political agenda.

In September, the Musée du Quai Branly in Paris responded to widespread public outcry by removing the term "Xizang" from its descriptions of Tibetan artefacts. The museum reverted to using "Tibet" in its catalogue and exhibition labels for items related to Tibet following pressure from the Tibetan community and human rights groups. However, the Musée Guimet has resisted similar demands. After 12 protests, the museum's director, Yannick Lintz, refused to rename its exhibit "Himalayan World" to "Tibet," despite calls from Tibetan advocates who contend that the current title undermines Tibet's cultural and historical significance.

The Environmental Toll of China's Exploitation in Tibet

22 December 2024, Greek City Times, Paul Antonopoulos

On October 15 this year, 29 year old Tibetan environmental activist Tsongon Tsering was sentenced to eight months in prison in Sichuan Province by the People's Republic of China, after he took to the Kuaishou short video platform to share a five-minute message to reveal the illegal sand-mining operations of Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering Company, in the administrative region of Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture. The company's actions, carried out in the Dangchu River—a vital waterway feeding into Asia's major rivers, including the Yangtze and Yellow Rivers—have severely disrupted the environment and the livelihoods of local Tibetans. Despite his efforts to bring attention to the issue, he was detained and later sentenced. The broader implications of his imprisonment are deeply concerning.

This is the fate of any Tibetan environmentalist who attempts to highlight the illegal and environmentally activities carried out by the Chinese in TAR. Prior to the Chinese occupation, Tibet was ecologically stable, but since 1950 when the People's Liberation Army (PLA) entered the region, rampant destruction of its resources have been carried out on a large scale.

Members of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile (TPiE) recently convened in New Delhi (Dec 17-19, 2024) to discuss a host of issues for boosting the Tibetan campaign against the Chinese occupation rule in their homeland and towards a negotiated peaceful resolution of the issue. Among the issues raised in a 12-point resolution which seeks to "resolve the Tibet-China conflict through the Middle Way Policy and seek genuine autonomy within the PRC's constitution," the exploitation of Tibet's natural resources also features. The TPiE has called on the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) "to initiate scientific studies on the PRC's exploitation of Tibet's natural resources and its adverse effects on global climate change."

Tibet is known as the "Third Pole" due to its vast ice reserves, serving as the principal watershed for Asia. China calls Tibet its "Number One Water Tower." Climate change and resource exploitation have led to rapid glacial melting, affecting water flow in major Asian rivers. The exploitation of water resources has caused landslides, floods, and pollution, impacting downstream regions that depend on these rivers.

A new report by the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), reveals that China's rapid hydropower dam projects are causing irreversible harm to Tibetan culture, the environment, downstream nations, and the climate. The report, titled "Chinese hydropower - Damning Tibet's culture, community, and environment", combines detailed regional research with advanced Geographic Imaging Software (GIS) analysis, examining 193 hydroelectric dams built or planned in Tibet since 2000.

One stark example is the 2,240-megawatt Khamtok hydroelectric dam in eastern Tibet's Derge County, which will displace thousands of Tibetans, demolish their villages, and destroy invaluable cultural sites, including centuries-old Buddhist monasteries. The report highlights the significant and detrimental impact these projects have on local populations, religious sites, and the surrounding environment.

China's present development policies in Tibet relating to dam building and hydropower generation, land reclamation, settling nomads and fencing of grasslands, afforestation, conversion of farmland to grassland and forest, all sound impressive on paper, but may not be as well thought through or appropriate. Tibetan environmentalists have serious reservations over the wisdom and implementation of China's development policies on the plateau.

One of the greatest threats to Tibetan people, culture, and environment is the massive influx of Chinese civilians and military personnel into Tibet, especially through population transfer programmes. The Tibetan Plateau now sustains a growing human population. Beijing's solution is to pour in more subsidies and enforce extensive urbanisation.

Conversion of grassland to cropland, reclamation of traditional pastures of semi-nomads to allow commercial development, growing rapeseed on low-lying pastures around Lake Kokonor by Chinese settlers and military units, uncontrolled gold mining and illegal harvesting of wild medicinal herbs, infrastructure development such as highways, new townships for settlers and railroad tracks have led to the degradation of Tibet's grasslands and that this is having serious consequences on the livelihood of Tibetan nomads as well as affecting climate patterns.

China does not acknowledge that its policies are the cause for grassland degradation. Undermining the role of Tibet's nomads has resulted in a grassland crisis wherein the combined impacts of erosion, fencing, sedentarisation, debt, poverty, taxation, toxic weed invasions, soil loss, threatens the very survival of the nomadic way of life.

Environmental issues deserve to be considered in their own right, on their merit as part of the heritage of the world. Whether Tibet's political issue is resolved or not, the environmental issue cannot be neglected as it is directly related to the welfare of the people.

China claims that Tibet is experiencing growth and prosperity, but the reality is that, under Chinese rule, Tibetans are impoverished, marginalised, and excluded; the sensitive and globally important ecology of Tibet is deteriorating; and many plant and animal species face extinction.

Mining in Tibet is spreading widely without consulting the local Tibetans and without proper environmental impact assessment. Beijing has increasingly enticed foreign investment and technical expertise into the exploitation of mineral resources in Tibet. Tibet comprises 1/8th of the land area of China, and is rich in mineral ores. Extensive gold mining is conducted in Tibet. Modern gold mining technology that Chinese use in Tibet involves machine, chemical and water intensive processes in which hundreds of tons of rocks are moved and destroyed for every ounce of gold extracted. Since cyanide is used as a processing agent by the gold mining industries, the downstream environmental risks cannot be neglected especially because mines of interest to western companies are all situated near rivers. One tablespoon of two percent cyanide solution is enough to kill a human being. Moreover, the nature of mining activity is such that it provides absolutely nothing to the local Tibetan communities other than few unskilled job opportunities, often in risky and toxic environments

Critics had long questioned China's claim that the development of Tibet was the sole reason behind the building of the 1,956-km Siling-Lhasa Railway. In fact 16 large copper, lead, zinc, iron and, possibly, crude oil deposits exist along the railway line. And this is the real motivation for China to spend a colossal $ 3.7 billion on Tibet's railway.

Areas of the Tibetan Plateau bordering China are already highly industrialised, with little attention paid to pollution control. In the arid Tsaidam Basin of Tibet's far northeast region of Amdo, oil fields pump two million tons of crude oil annually. Aluminium smelters, asbestos and lead and zinc mining are expanding under the patronage of the Chinese Government. Tibetans are powerless to appeal.

The ecosystem of Tibet is not only important for the inhabitants of Tibet but it has an effect on the environment of the whole of Asia due to Tibet being the source of the larger rivers and also because the Tibetan Plateau controls the monsoon patterns, as clearly established by scientists. The immediate effects of this are felt in India, China, Burma, Bangladesh, Pakistan and other countries downstream.

The complexities of India's relations with Tibet and China

22 December 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Khedroob Thondup

The price India pays for better relations with China is multifaceted.

In the intricate dance of international relations, India finds itself in a delicate position, balancing its historical ties with Tibet and the Dalai Lama against the pragmatic need to foster better relations with China. This balancing act comes with significant costs, both politically and morally.

India has long been a sanctuary for the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) since the Tibetan uprising in 1959. The presence of the Tibetan spiritual leader and the exiled government in Dharamshala has been a point of contention in Sino-Indian relations. China views the Dalai Lama as a separatist threat, and his activities are seen as undermining Chinese sovereignty over Tibet.

In recent years, India has had to navigate this complex relationship with increasing caution. The need to maintain a stable and cooperative relationship with China, especially in the face of economic and geopolitical pressures, has led to a more restrained approach towards the Dalai Lama and the CTA. This includes limiting their public engagements and reducing official interactions, which can be seen as a concession to Chinese sensitivities.

China is one of India's largest trading partners, and the economic interdependence between the two nations cannot be ignored. Improved relations with China could lead to significant economic benefits, including increased trade, investment, and collaboration on global issues such as climate change and regional security. However, these potential gains come at the cost of compromising on India's historical support for Tibetan autonomy and the moral high ground it has traditionally held on human rights issues.

Restricting the activities of the Dalai Lama and the CTA poses a moral dilemma for India. The Dalai Lama is not just a political figure but a global symbol of peace and human rights. Limiting his influence and the operations of the CTA could be seen as a betrayal of the Tibetan cause and a compromise on India's commitment to human rights and democratic values. This could also affect India's image on the global stage, where it is often seen as a champion of democratic principles and human rights.

The price India pays for better relations with China is multifaceted. While the economic and strategic benefits of a closer relationship with China are clear, the moral and ethical costs are significant. India must carefully weigh these factors as it navigates its foreign policy, ensuring that it does not lose sight of its core values and historical commitments in the pursuit of pragmatic diplomacy.

China 'not dreading' Trump 2.0, but reforms will decide who wins big power game

21 December 2024, SCMP, Orange Wang

US-China ties to 'get rockier', Chinese political scientist Yan Xuetong warns, but also sees Trump term benefiting China 'in several ways'

China is "not dreading" Donald Trump's return to the White House and might actually benefit in several ways despite fears of "rockier" times ahead, a noted Chinese political scientist has said.

How the rivalry turns out will depend on reforms at home and whether China can "do a better job" of it, according to Yan Xuetong, dean of the institute of international relations at Tsinghua University.

This would also determine whether China could narrow the "power gap" with the United States, Yan wrote in an article for Foreign Affairs on Friday.

The relationship was going to "get rockier" over the next four years, Yan warned, with the US president-elect's rhetoric and cabinet choices showing a resolve to double down on the hardline approach towards China seen during his first term in office.

Still, China had "learned a great deal" from his first stint, giving it the confidence to face any tensions during the second Trump administration, Yan argued, while all but ruling out the likelihood of a military clash.

"[Trump] will soon arrive in the White House with the intention of containing China, but Chinese leaders are not dreading his return," he wrote.

With less than a month to go for Trump's inauguration on January 20, China-US relations are widely expected to enter a new period of uncertainty. Much of the rest of the world is also bracing for the return of Trump and his "America first" agenda to the Oval Office.

Yan said that while Trump was likely to push harder for wider trade decoupling with China, including drastic cuts in access to US markets, Beijing was "likely to retaliate".

"The tit-for-tat dynamic may drive the simmering trade war between the two powers to a new peak, with damaging consequences for the global economy as many other countries scramble to adopt protectionist policies of their own."

Trump said on the campaign trail that he would impose tariff increases of 60 per cent or more on goods imported from China.

Following his victory last month, he pledged that one of his first acts in office would be to impose an extra 10 per cent tariff on goods from China and a 25 per cent tax on all products entering the country from Canada and Mexico.

Chinese President Xi Jinping warned earlier this month that "there will be no winner" in a tariff or tech war between China and the US, and vowed that Beijing would firmly safeguard its interests.

The new US administration was also likely to ramp up military pressure on Beijing, especially when it came to the South China Sea and Taiwan, Yan noted.

It would "hardly be surprising" if Trump or his officials provoked a crisis similar to that which followed then-US House speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan in 2022, he warned. Pelosi's visit prompted a furious Beijing to suspend a range of US exchanges, with the ice only breaking after a presidential summit in November last year.

However, Yan also said he expected Trump to seek to avoid overt conflict with China and focus on domestic matters instead.

At the same time, Beijing was not about to draw up a timetable for reunification with Taiwan as it was concerned mainly with economic growth, he added.

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. The US, like most countries, does not recognise Taiwan as an independent state, but is opposed to any attempt to take the self-governed island by force and is committed to supplying it with weapons.

"In practice, a Trump presidency may benefit China in several ways," Yan wrote.

Trump's relative disinterest in ideological issues might take the edge of the US-China rivalry, he suggested. "Economic and strategic conflicts may increase between Beijing and Washington during Trump's second term, but they will not escalate into ideological conflicts that place the two states on a direct collision course."

Also, Trump's "political isolationism" might lead the US to reduce its stake in protecting traditional allies, Yan forecast.

He said this would drive those states – both in Europe and East Asia – to hedge their bets between the US and China to offset the unpredictability of the Trump White House.

If Trump were to cut military aid to Ukraine, US allies in Europe seeking to shore up their economies to better support Kyiv might become "more forthright hedgers", giving China "fresh opportunities" to build ties with those countries, Yan said.

However, he added that reforms were key. "Although Trump's isolationism certainly creates opportunities for Beijing to improve its relations with US allies, reforms at home will really determine the course of the competition between the two powers," he wrote. Other Chinese analysts have also warned that the biggest risk to Beijing during Trump 2.0 would be US government overhauls driven by tech billionaire Elon Musk.

Yan said that if Chinese leaders did a better job than Trump of implementing domestic reforms in the next four years, the power gap with the US could be narrowed.

"But if Trump does a better job than China in this aspect – and eschews damaging foreign conflicts and entanglements – the power gap ... will get bigger," he warned.

COP29 Failed the 'Third Pole': Wither Tibet in the Climate Agenda?

21 December 2024, The Diplomat, Varuna Shankar and Jagannath Panda

The U.N. process shows little appetite for addressing the urgent climate crisis on the Tibetan Plateau – in part due to China's apathy.

On November 12, at the 29th Conference of the Parties (COP29) to the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) in Baku, Azerbaijan, the leaders of six Hindu Kush Himalaya countries met to discuss the climate crisis that has reached epic proportions. Out of the eight countries – namely Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, China, India, Myanmar, Nepal, and Pakistan – only Taliban-ruled Afghanistan and Myanmar, now under a military junta, were perhaps justifiably absent.

The broader Himalaya region, called the "Third Pole," which includes the Tibetan Plateau, is a global biodiversity hotspot and has the largest reservoir of freshwater outside the two Arctic and Antarctica polar regions, among other important features. In view of the dangers of a Himalayan meltdown, the meeting – hosted by Bhutan's Prime Minister Tshering Tobgay – vehemently expressed the need for "coordination and support" at global forums to "represent and amplify" regional concerns that have global implications.

However, two factors highlight the complications and even the inadequacy of holding vital meetings in such an almost incidental manner: One is the general declining trust in multilateral climate conferences amid low political will. This year it was particularly apparent because of the lack of attendance of the heads of state of major powers and some of the biggest carbon emitters, including Brazilian President

Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, Chinese President Xi Jinping, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, German Chancellor Olaf Scholz, and outgoing U.S. President Joe Biden.

In addition, the election of Donald Trump – a well-known climate change skeptic who withdrew the United States from the Paris Climate Accord during his first term – as the next U.S. president has undone any hope there was left in securing international climate solidarity. And that's not to mention the inherent ethical dilemmas of having two big, influential oil producers hosting back-to-back COP summits (the UAE in 2023 and Azerbaijan in 2024). It highlights that countries with clout – including China, which continues to “elevate its position” at the U.N. bodies – have dominated the global climate forums.

The second problem is the absence of core Himalayan issues in the main UNFCCC agenda, which is governed not just by financial intricacies and inconveniences but unfortunately by “the very worst of political opportunism,” as the Marshall Islands’ climate envoy put it. In particular, the acute marginalization of Tibetan representation in these multilateral climate forums, where China reigns supreme, has only hampered regional concerns from being truly voiced, let alone amplified.

Against such a scenario, what more can the multilateral forums do? How should the global community – including India – respond to China’s apathy for the climate crisis in Tibet?

The COP29 Upside: 11th Hour Consensus as the Sole Face-Saver?

COP29 was dubbed the “climate finance COP,” formally known as the New Collective Quantified Goal on Climate Finance (NCQG). After two weeks of intensive negotiations and several years of preparatory work, the new financial goal is a “course correction” on global climate action. It has tripled the finance to developing countries, from the previous goal of $100 billion annually announced in 2009 to $300 billion a year by 2035. COP29 also pledged to continue efforts to harness all actors from public and private sources to scale up finance to developing countries to $1.3 trillion per year. The climate framework intends to cover all greenhouse gases and all sectors to keep the 1.5 degrees Celsius warming limit within reach.

The new commitment builds on significant strides forward in global climate action at COP27 and COP28. A historic Loss and Damage Fund was agreed upon at COP27, while COP28 delivered a global agreement to transition away from all fossil fuels in energy systems, triple renewable energy, and boost climate resilience.

An agreement on carbon markets is another significant step. The final building blocks that set out how carbon markets will operate under the Paris Agreement Crediting Mechanism have been agreed upon. This includes the standards for a centralized carbon market under the U.N. (Article 6.4 mechanism) to operationalize country-to-country trading and a carbon crediting mechanism. It entails clarity on how countries will authorize the trade of carbon credits and how registries tracking this will operate.

Furthermore, the transparent process of technical reviews would ensure environmental integrity. This includes mandatory checks for projects against strong environmental and human rights protections. It ensures that a project cannot proceed without explicit, informed agreement from Indigenous peoples. It also allows anyone affected by a project to appeal a decision or file a complaint. This will benefit developing countries receiving new flows of finance and the least developed countries by providing capacity-building support to get a foothold in the market.

In terms of concrete steps aimed at the Himalayan ecosystem, there were a few high-level plenary sessions at COP29 such as the “Resource Mobilization for Climate Adaptation in Asia’s High Mountains,” which stressed the “urgent need for increased investment in climate adaptation” in this region. These seem mostly ineffectual, in-name-only steps. In contrast, the launch of G-ZERO – a forum of carbon-negative and carbon-neutral small countries, which prominently includes Bhutan (also its permanent secretariat) – at COP29 is truly inspirational. Such actions that aim to “enhance carbon sinks and promote nature-positive pathways” will go a long way to build a positive ideology needed to counter climate change in the Himalayas.

As far as Tibet’s participation in COP29 goes, the two Tibetan delegates – Dechen Palmo and Dhondup Wangmo – raised environmental concerns at some events. They even launched a campaign to raise awareness about the risks posed by hydropower projects in China, particularly the Derge Dam – a hugely controversial project that had resulted in mass protests and a brutal crackdown by the Chinese government earlier this year. Yet the token participation of two Tibetans in a few events at the sidelines of the summit is clearly not enough.

The fact of the matter is that despite the adoption of the “Baku Workplan,” which took a decisive step forward to elevate the voices of Indigenous peoples and local communities in climate action, neither the Hindu Kush Himalaya region nor its peoples, including Tibetans, have been included in the mainstream discussion and, more importantly, in policymaking on climate change.

China’s Tibet Apathy: Accelerating Regional Climate Risks

That climate change is wreaking havoc in the Tibetan Plateau is old news: For years, it has been established that global warming is not only causing Tibet's glaciers to melt and permafrost to thaw at an alarming rate but also accelerating several extreme weather events such as flash floods. In 2019, a special report by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) warned that up to two-thirds of the region's glaciers would disappear by the end of the century if carbon emissions were not cut drastically.

On top of the challenges due to global warming, China's so-called "unprecedented" development policies have hastened Tibet's climate crisis. China's relentless pursuit of infrastructure, including helipads, rails, and road networks, as well as dual-use military facilities is causing environmental degradation. That's on top of the human costs that come with the displacement of nomadic and farming communities due to the (over)damming and diversion of Tibet's rivers.

China's Tibet policy is driven by its need to fill the demands of Han-majority regions, including access to Tibet's water or mineral resources (reportedly also including rare earths). It also has a larger securitization angle: building excessive military infrastructure to not only clamp down on all separatist activities but also create conditions for a heavily militarized border, particularly against India. China's increasing militarization in Himalayan territories and influence in countries such as Pakistan and Nepal also have repercussions for the instability of the South Asian region as a whole.

China is also using its control over Tibet's water resources to slowly develop into a water hegemon. Ten major rivers, from the Mekong to the Yarlung Tsampo (Brahmaputra in India) originate in Tibet, and China is planning or has already executed major dams on a number of these rivers. Beyond the impact on Tibet's people and environment, such actions have given rise to concerns about China's intent to block access to water to downstream countries.

This has heated up the already tense geopolitical climate in South and Southeast Asia. China stands accused of using financial incentives as well as economic coercion to clamp down either dissent or disagreement over China's "core national interests," as well as to fulfill its various strategic goals.

The Imperative for Climate Solidarity: Beyond Multilateral Unity?

Undoubtedly, the future of Asia's high mountains depends on the decisions of the global climate bodies and the collective efforts taken to build climate-resilient communities and protect these vital ecosystems. A unified effort to combat these challenges would mean moving beyond the business-as-usual approach and focusing on targeted investments and mobilization of international support. There is a need to quantify economic costs for loss and damage to the specific ecosystem to drive new investments and support stronger policy coordination.

In the Himalayan region, as raised by the Himalayan ministers' council at COP29, tackling transboundary issues with a common approach has to be given the spotlight. Some of these issues include but are not limited to cryosphere risk monitoring, disaster preparedness, increasing air pollution, biodiversity conservation, and innovative financing solutions.

Support at global forums like the U.N. climate conferences to represent and amplify common issues and concerns is critical in attracting global attention to the Himalayan region. This would hopefully also allow access to global funds, such as the Global Environment Facility, which is a partnership of 18 agencies (including United Nations agencies, multilateral development banks, national entities, and international NGOs) and U.N. financial mechanisms such as the Adaptation Fund and Green Climate Fund (GCF), as well as other potential innovative financing solutions. Such an imperative will go a long way to fulfill the funding need that was highlighted by Bhutan's Secretary of the Ministry of Energy and Natural Resources Karma Tshering at COP29.

Moreover, the multilateral partnership must prioritize the Himalayan climate crisis in their common agenda. Four years earlier, at the height of the COVID-19 pandemic, the 2020 Ministerial Mountain Summit had declared some common goals, including holding a biennial summit for the eight Hindu Kush Himalaya countries and creating a task force to monitor and assess the calls for action. This needs to be taken forward with renewed momentum at the COP30 to be held in Brazil.

While multilateral cooperation is a must, there is also a need to amplify the voices of the marginalized and suppressed communities in the high mountains. Particularly, the Tibetan Plateau and its people need the international community, including India and the West, to check China's growing inroads into the Tibetan landscape. Be it China's excessive damming of Tibetan rivers, mining, or construction of dual-use military infrastructure (e.g., roads and helipads), China's actions in Tibet belie its claims of adhering to the United Nations' Sustainable Development Goals. Then there are also the human rights aspects of the Tibetan occupation, which also lends to the climate change acceleration as the original settlers are "relocated." In this context, India and the West need to collaborate to bring the Himalayan concerns into the emerging Indo-Pacific regional architecture agenda. A common security agenda might help consolidate climate action.

China's Panchen Lama and Xi's sinister plan to tamper with Dalai Lama's succession

21 December 2024, First Post, Claude Arpi

The Panchen Lama's now-cancelled Nepal visit shows that Beijing was keen to get Kathmandu's seal of approval on its selection of the 11th Panchen Lama to prepare for the 'return' of the 15th Dalai Lama, but things are never simple in Tibetan Buddhism

The Panchen Lama plays an important role in Tibetan Buddhism, especially for the Gelukpa, or Yellow Sect, which considers him as the second in the hierarchy after the Dalai Lama. AFP

A day after Gyaltsen Norbu, the China-selected Panchen Lama's visit to Nepal was cancelled, CGTN, an official channel of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), released an article in English, "Regulating Tibetan Buddhism Reincarnation Under the Rule of Law".

It asserted: "China introduced the Measures on the Management of Tulku Reincarnation of Tibetan Buddhism in 2007, its first regulation on reincarnation affairs. The measures stipulate that the reincarnation process must not be interfered with or controlled by foreign organisations or individuals, and no group or individual is allowed to unilaterally search for or recognise reincarnations."

It shows what the real stakes were for Gyaltsen Norbu's trip to Lumbini, the birthplace of the Buddha Gautama. During the preceding weeks, speculations loomed large over the Lama's visit to the pilgrimage city in Nepal near India's border.

As late as December 12, The South China Morning Post in Hong Kong affirmed: "Panchen Lama to make rare visit to Nepal after Tibet trip ...The trip, which has not been confirmed by Beijing or Kathmandu, comes months before the Dalai Lama is expected to unveil a succession plan."

The article continued: "It follows a visit to China last week by Nepal's Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli, when he told Chinese Premier Li Qiang that Kathmandu regards Tibet and Taiwan as inalienable parts of China and that Tibet-related affairs are China's internal affairs."

Nepal was to be Gyaltsen Norbu's second foreign trip abroad after a visit to Thailand in 2019.

Eventually, Nepal shot down the Lama's visit. Kathmandu told the Chinese Embassy that the Lama would not be allowed to visit due to Nepal's neutrality on religious matters.

But the issue is not simple

This issue is part of the struggle to control the next Dalai Lama, as the Panchen Lama plays an important role in Tibetan Buddhism, especially for the Gelukpa, or Yellow Sect, which considers him as the second in the hierarchy after the Dalai Lama. In the past, the Panchen Lamas have often recognised the new Dalai Lamas.

After the death of the 10th Panchen Lama in 1989, in the town of Shigatse, where the Tashilhunpo, the Panchen Lama's monastery, stands, a dispute erupted between the Dalai Lama's office in Dharamsala and the Chinese government about the true incarnation of the Panchen Lama. Of course, the Chinese government (run by the Communist Party) normally had no say in the matter.

As the result of the dispute, since 1995, there have been two Panchen Lamas:

Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognised by the 14th Dalai Lama and the majority of Tibetans, has been missing since 1995 after being taken into custody by Chinese authorities. He remains under arrest (if still alive) for the past 29 years.

The second is Gyaltsen Norbu, selected by the Chinese government in 1995 but seen by the Tibetans as a political tool of Beijing, rather than a legitimate spiritual leader.

An activist group, Tibetan Rights Collective (TRC), analysed: "Nepal's refusal to host Gyaltsen Norbu could be interpreted as an implicit acknowledgement of the contentious legitimacy of his claim as the Panchen Lama. By taking this stance, Nepal may be signalling its reluctance to endorse China's religious appointments."

The Tenth Panchen Lama

Chökyi Gyaltsen, the 10th Panchen Lama, was born in Xining, at the border between Tibet and China, in 1938; in the following years he was imposed by Beijing as the true Panchen Lama. A Tibetan candidate sponsored by Lhasa was rejected by the Communist leadership. During the following years, Chökyi was a loudspeaker for Beijing's propaganda. Similar to Gyaltsen Norbu today, Chökyi Gyaltsen was often called 'fake' by the Tibetans, but he eventually grew into a great patriot. In 1962, he had the courage to write a 70,000-character petition (dubbed by Mao as a "poisonous arrow"), in which he listed numerous problems on the plateau. It was addressed to Zhou Enlai, who requested Xi Zhongxun (Xi Jinping's father) to study the letter and prepare an answer.

China's domestic situation was then very unstable; the power struggle within the Party was at its peak (Xi Zhongxun would be purged in July 1962).

The Panchen Lama ended up spending 17 years in confinement; he had gone 'too far' for the communist leadership.

However, it means that even 'fake' lamas or stooges can change into great Tibetan patriots.

How the next Dalai Lama may be selected by China

The selection of the reincarnation of the 11th Panchen Lama is worth having a look at:

Soon after Chökyi Gyaltsen passed away, under mysterious circumstances while on a visit to Tibet in 1989, the Chinese government formed a 'search team' under Gyayak Rinpoche, the Panchen Lama's dharma teacher. Chadrel Rinpoche, abbot of the Panchen Lama's Tashi Lhunpo Monastery, and Arjia Rinpoche, another high lama, were to assist the old Lama. After the death of the former, Chadrel took over the search.

Arjia remembers: "The Chinese government trusted Chadrel Rinpoche to do their bidding... asking only that he report frequently to the central government on his progress."

Chadrel Rinpoche considered that it was Tashi Lhunpo monastery's responsibility to discover the newly born Lama, but as Arjia says: "The Tibetans clearly wanted the 14th Dalai Lama to be the final arbiter of the identity of the true reincarnation of the Panchen Lama."

When Beijing discovered that Chadrel had been communicating with the Dalai Lama, everything changed.

Ying Kesheng, the Party Secretary of Qinghai Province, called a meeting and enumerated three points dictated by Beijing: "eliminating from contention the boy selected by the Dalai Lama (Gedun Choekyi Nyima, who, since then, has been under house arrest); denouncing and removing Chadrel Rinpoche from his official position on the search team; and mandating a Golden Urn Ceremony.

Three names were put in a Golden Urn in the Jokhang Cathedral in Lhasa, and the Governor of Tibet, called Gyaltsen Norbu, selected a candidate called Gyaltsen Norbu: "Gyaltsen Norbu chose Gyaltsen Norbu," a joke later circulated.

But the trick was simple; the capsule in which the chosen boy's name was written was much larger than the two others. The Communist credential of Norbu's family had been checked by the Party before the function; he was the perfect candidate.

There is no doubt that a similar process will be followed for the 15th Dalai Lama if the present leader does not take the initiative and announce the details of his return (in 2011, he said that he would do this when he is 90 years old, i.e., July 2025).

In these circumstances, one understands that Beijing was keen to get Nepal's seal of approval on its selection of the 11th Panchen Lama (to prepare for the 'return' of the 15th Dalai Lama).

Already, the government in Kathmandu has accepted to change the name of 'Tibet' into 'Xizang', the name given to their restive province by Xi Jinping's regime. But it was too big a bite for Oli's government, despite the new honeymoon following the Nepalese Prime Minister's visit to China. Thankfully, permission was refused to Gyaltsen Norbu to proceed to Lumbini.

Not so Docile

But things are never simple in Tibetan Buddhism.

One important factor is that Gyaltsen Norbu has a highly respected teacher, Geshe Jamyang Gyatso, from Labrang Tashikyil monastery in Amdo, who acts as his tutor. This plays a crucial role in his education while moulding his worldviews.

Another serious question is: Will Gyaltsen Norbu remain docile, as Beijing would like him to, or will he follow the footsteps of his predecessor?

On June 10, 2015, Xinhua had announced that President Xi Jinping 'accepted an audience' with Gyaltsen Norbu at Zhongnanhai in Beijing. The term 'accepting an audience' was a euphemism to say the least, because the 'audience' seemed more like a summon-cum-lecture.

The meeting was 'very appropriate', says Xinhua, because it showed that the Party "has consistently given a high level of attention to Tibet". It also indicated "the great importance that the Central Committee attaches to religious work".

Apart from Xi, three other members of the Politburo were in attendance: Yu Zhengsheng of the Standing Committee, Sun Chunlan, the UFW head, and Li Zhanshu, director of the General Office of the Party. Why such a rare lineup? Apparently Gyaltsen Norbu needed to be 'briefed' on how to be a good Communist.

Another telling sign: on February 10, 2024, Gyaltsen Norbu gave a message in English on the occasion of the Tibetan New Year (Losar). It lasted a few minutes, but what was surprising is that during the entire speech he never uttered a word of praise for Xi Jinping.

Of course, during other speeches he often eulogises the policies of the Party and the importance for his countrymen to follow them. But it is far from sure that he is fully a puppet of the regime.

In India, it is worth watching these developments as the Indian Himalayan populations are very much concerned by the future of the Dalai Lama lineage.

An Identity in Flux? The Case of Tibetan Muslims Residing in Kashmir

21 December 2024, The Wire, Deepanshu Mohan, Khalid Wasim Hassan, Najam Us Saqib, Ishfaq Wani

The Tibetan Muslims believe that their ancestors were traders who used to take goods from Kashmir to Tibet and later settled there. Thus, when they arrived in Kashmir in the late 1950's, it felt like coming back home for some.

Kashmir has been known for its cultural and ethnic diversity, despite being projected by the radical political right as a state with a homogeneously perceived Muslim population. It is home to many religious and ethnic communities amongst which are different cultural minorities residing in the valley, across different urban and rural areas. A recent manuscript work in progress discusses their profile, livelihood transitions, and more. Amongst one of these lesser-known cultural minority groups is the Tibetan Muslim community.

In 1959, People's Liberation Army (PLA) of China launched an offensive against Tibet and claimed that it was a part of mainland China. The Tibetan defensive was brutally crushed by the PLA forcing the spiritual and temporal head of state, Dalai Lama to seek refuge in India. With him, many Tibetans crossed over to neighbouring countries like India, Nepal and Bhutan.

In India, Tibetan refugees live in various states, including Karnataka which is home to the largest number of Tibetan refugees in the country followed by Himachal Pradesh, as per government data. A small community of Muslim Tibetans also arrived in the valley of Kashmir. The arrival of Tibetan Muslims in Kashmir marked what they call as the "back to home" process.

The Tibetan Muslims believe that their ancestors were traders who used to take goods from Kashmir to Tibet and later settled there. Thus, when they arrived in Kashmir in the late 1950's, it felt like coming back home for some.

Muzaffar Ahmad Kaloo, one of the respondents and current spokesperson of the community, says:

"We were called as Khajur in Tibet meaning Kashmiris, our ancestors were traders who migrated to Tibet for trade".

There are different accounts surrounding the arrival of Tibetan Muslims in Kashmir. Muzaffar maintains that they arrived in Kashmir by choice:

"We asked the Chinese government to let us migrate to India, where we were given a choice of settling in any part of India but we chose Kashmir as we originally belonged to this place."

Muzzambil Kaloo* contests this statement, he said:

"My uncle was jailed, our family was forced to migrate. He (uncle) died in the Chinese Prison," although most of them maintained that it was the elders of the community who asked to be settled in Kashmir.

Farhan Hameed* added:

"Our elders chose to settle here as Kashmir was a Muslim majority state."

According to the senior members of the community around 50-60 families migrated to Kashmir.

Sense of belonging

When the Tibetan Muslims arrived in Kashmir Valley in the late 1950's, they were given temporary arrangements in the form of tents at Eidgah, Srinagar and in local mosques by the Kashmiri Muslims living in the neighbourhood near Eidgah. Mohammed Farroq*, who had accompanied his parents as a six-year-old boy, remembers:

"For weeks, it was the locals from nearby areas who brought food and water for us. Although we were different from them in looks but shared the same religious faith and had Kashmiri surnames which worked in our favour."

It was during the tenure of Gulam Mohammed Bakshi-led government that separate buildings were constructed for the settlement of Tibetan Muslims in front of Eidgah, Srinagar. Mohammed Mustafa*, who runs a tailoring shop on the ground floor of a Tibetan settlement in Eidgah, says:

"Bakshi saheb was very kind to our community. Not only did he provide shelter for us but allowed some of the Tibetan men to be construction workers for multiple government projects during his time."

Over some time, the Tibetan settlement at Eidgah became one of the important landmarks in Srinagar. It was in the 1980s that the state government allotted land for a new Tibetan colony in the Hawal area of Srinagar. So at present Tibetan Muslims live at Eidgah as well as at Hawal.

As some call themselves ethnic Kashmiris, most of them still like to be identified as Tibetan Kashmiri Muslims, carrying a dual-identity.

"My ancestors were from Kashmir and Tibet, I have blood of both nations in my body as such I identify as a Tibetan and a Kashmiri," Ansar Ahmed* said, when asked about his identity.

The Tibetan Muslims have a strong sense of belonging which has been shaped through the ages. Even though the community has tried to maintain their distinct cultural practices and heritage, there has been an impact of Kashmiri culture on the members, particularly the younger generation.

"Earlier we used to wear Chuba, that was our cultural dress but now we wear the same clothes that the Kashmiris wear," added Jamil Ahmed*.

The influence of Kashmir can be seen not only in the dresses but the cuisine.

"Earlier we used to eat the local Tibetan diet but now we eat what Kashmiris eat," said an elderly person.

Similarly, Omar Ahmed* added:

"On some occasions like Eid we make food like Thupka at home."

Even there is an adaptation of traditional Kashmiri cuisine wazwan during the marriage parties. This loss of culture is worrisome for the elderly generation. They believe that the younger generation of the community is influenced by Western culture at the expense of their culture. Ghulam Mustafa* added:

"There is no harm in evolving with modern times but it should not come at the expense of our own culture."

Religion is an important part of the community's lifestyle and identity. It is one of the common threads they share with the majority Kashmiri population. They take part in religious festivals as the other Kashmiri communities take part.

"We celebrate all the festivals of Muslims like Eid," added Mohammed Tahir*.

In the new Tibetan colony of Hawal, the community has a separate masjid, which also serves as a community centre. Interestingly this mosque is named Masjid-i-Hijrat, where the word Hijrat (migration) in Islamic history is related to migration for a religious cause.

Most of the members of the community are engaged in trade and commerce. They own business establishments ranging from restaurants, embroidery shops and local grocery shops. Mohammed Gul* pointed out that:

"Around 70% of our community members are in the business of tila-sozi (silver embroidery) of pharens and shawls and a very small number of us run the Tibetan restaurants. But there is stereotyping from Kashmiris that we all run momo shops."

Even though the community has been relatively successful in integrating itself into the broader Kashmiri economy, there are certain areas where they have been neglected, particularly the government sector. Even though they call themselves citizens of India they face a lot of difficulties in obtaining the state-subject (domicile) certificate which was an important document to apply for government jobs in pre-2019 Jammu and Kashmir.

Although these Tibetan Muslims have documents like voter ID and Aadhaar, there are challenges surrounding their issue of identity and recognition.

"Many people in our community have a state subject certificate, but it is difficult to make bureaucrats understand that we are also citizens of India, therefore we prefer getting these certificates, although we have all other identification documents like Aadhaar and voter ID card," added Mohammed Jabbar*.

On being asked about citizenship, Kamil Haque*, added:

"Our children have an Indian passport and work in Gulf countries, how can a person who does not have a citizenship have a passport? But it is very difficult to make authorities understand that we are Kashmiris."

Resilience

Despite living in Kashmir all their life and tracing their origins to Kashmir, the community still faces marginalisation both on the ethnic level as well as the social level. The members allege that they have not been fully accepted by the Kashmiri society as their own.

"We are still called Tibetans, even though they (Kashmiris) call us brothers, but they have not accepted us as their own," added Imran Hussain*.

In a place like Kashmir where the socio-political fabric of the society is intricately woven and complex, the Tibetan Muslims are yet to find their place as natives. As such their struggle for survival and identity continues amid the changing socio-political fabric of Kashmir.

Despite the issues about questions of 'identity' which revolve around being 'Tibetan', 'Muslim' or 'Kashmiri Tibetan Muslim', the members of the community have shown their resilience in maintaining the proper balance. Living amidst dominant Kashmiri-speaking Kashmiri Muslims, the community maintained the essence of their identity by preserving their traditions, such as language, dress, cuisine and rituals in the celebrations.

For decades, the community members learnt skills such as tailoring Kashmiri dresses, tila-sozi and leather works, which provided them means of livelihood. Due to dependence on the Kashmiri-speaking population from the neighbourhood for day-to-day needs and their businesses, the members of the community have learnt the Kashmiri language. The Tibetan Muslim community members, both at Eidgah settlement and Tibetan colony of Hawal, work for the cleanliness of the lanes and by-lanes. At the time of crisis, Tibetans come together to help the needy within the community. Tibetan women make woolen sweaters, socks, mufflers and gloves and sell these in the local markets during winter time.

Although there is no guarantee of government jobs for the young generation, the community encourages young boys and girls to attend school. The community has established a Tibetan Public School in Srinagar which is attended by both Tibetan as well as local Kashmiri children. The educated youth in the community who are not getting jobs in the government sector have found alternative means of livelihood.

The Father of Chinese Authoritarianism Has a Message for America

21 December 2024, The New Yorker, Chang Che

Xiao Gongqin thought that, in moments of flux, a strongman could build a bridge to democracy. Now he's not so sure.

When Russian and Chinese élites talk about history, they often mean "History"—the grand Hegelian march toward progress. Since the end of the Cold War, the East has lived with the undignified thesis, popularized by Francis Fukuyama's 1989 essay "The End of History?," that democracy had defeated the authoritarian alternatives of the twentieth century. That idea has not aged well. According to a European survey of more than two hundred countries, 2022 was the first time in two decades that closed autocracies outnumbered liberal democracies in the world. Americans have become unreliable underwriters of the international order. Russia's Vladimir Putin has incited Europe's largest conflict since the Second World War and China's Xi Jinping is remaking global institutions in his own image, bereft of democratic values. When Xi visited the Kremlin in March, 2023, a little over a year after Russia invaded Ukraine, he told Putin that the world was changing in ways "we haven't seen in a hundred years." "Let's drive those changes together," he said. Putin, hands outstretched, nodded. "I agree." Donald Trump's victory this November turned what some dismissed as an electoral fluke, in 2016, into an enduring political reality. "We have won," Aleksandr Dugin, the Russian ideologue known to some as "Putin's philosopher," proclaimed on X. "Globalists have lost their final combat. The future is finally open. I am really happy." Ren Yi, a blogger and grandson of a former Chinese Communist leader, wrote that Trump's win, along with his chumminess with Elon Musk, has created something of a "techno-authoritarian-conservative" alliance that resembled the authoritarian cultures of East Asia. "The 'beacon' of the free world, the United States, will lead various countries into illiberal democracy," Ren predicted.

"There is no end to history, only the end of the Fukuyama-ists."

The morning after the U.S. election, I got a message from a seventy-eight-year-old historian in Shanghai named Xiao Gongqin. "I have predicted on several private occasions that Trump would win," he wrote. Trump, he reasoned, was a necessary corrective against a "woke left" that "had truly gone overboard in recent years." This level of antipathy toward American progressives is not uncommon among Chinese liberals, who, since 2016, have flocked toward Trump, in part to repudiate a Democratic Party whose emphasis on political correctness—real or imagined—reminds them of China's past disasters in socialist governance. But Xiao is not a liberal, and his well-known anti-democratic influence on Chinese politics made him an instructive voice on America's current predicament.

Xiao is the architect of a theory of strongman politics known as "neo-authoritarianism." In the nineteen-eighties, reformers with varying predilections for democracy and capitalism consolidated power in Communist states. Mikhail Gorbachev restructured the Soviet Union's planned economy and loosened censorship. In China, Deng Xiaoping ushered in an era known as "reform and opening up," though the reforms went only so far; he also evinced a limited tolerance for dissent, believing full democracy untenable. In this, he was supported by a group of Chinese thinkers led by Xiao and a prodigious Shanghai academic named Wang Huning. The word "authoritarian" is a rote pejorative in the West, synonymous with tyranny, but in the China of the late twentieth century Xiao and his allies managed to reframe it as a rational, pragmatic, East Asian-specific strategy for modernization. Drawing on a range of sources—Chinese history; Samuel Huntington's theory of "modernizing authoritarianism"; the Asian "dragons" of Singapore and South Korea, which had grown rapidly under authoritarian rulers—these intellectuals pushed, and supplied the moral ballast, for China to postpone the end of history.

Wang entered government in 1995 and shot through its ranks. He is now one of Xi Jinping's closest advisers, the preëminent craftsman of Xi's authoritarian ideology. Xiao, who coined the term "neo-authoritarianism" at a symposium in 1988, continued his advocacy as a professor in Shanghai, until he retired a decade ago. His argument that democracy was a "rootless politics," alien to Chinese culture, remains part of a dominant strain of the country's thought. Whether Xiao had influenced the Party's direction or merely justified it is hard to say. But, in 1988, Deng was briefed on "neo-authoritarianism" by another Chinese leader, who described it as a system where a "political strongman stabilizes the situation and develops the economy." Deng reportedly responded, "That is exactly what I stand for"; his only qualm was that it could use a rebrand. Later, as China's economy took off, the world would accept more diplomatic names—"state capitalism" or, more vaguely, "the China model."

As a writer covering Chinese culture and politics, I've watched with a sense of foreboding as America has begun to manifest the same authoritarian compulsions that have long dominated Chinese life. There is a cosmic irony in the way that the twenty-first century has played out: the West, hoping its adversaries would become more like it, has inextricably become more like them. Slowly, ideas that Xiao and his allies had propagated decades ago—the stabilizing force of the strongman and a reverence for cultural traditions—seem to have arrived in the control center of the world's most powerful liberal democracy.

After Trump's recent victory, I decided to pay Xiao a visit. I wanted to understand the scholar who had helped salvage the strongman from the dustbin of history, and to know what he made of the figure's present, and likely future, proliferation. What I found, to my surprise, was a man quietly wrestling with the consequences of his ideas. Xiao has deeply conservative instincts—he counts Edmund Burke and Michael Oakeshott among his influences—but he was, and is, an incrementalist who dreams of China becoming a "constitutional democracy." His was a theory of enlightened rule, wherein a dictatorship would vanquish the "radicals," steward an economic miracle, and then, ideally, relinquish power to the people. He had ready-made examples in places such as Taiwan, whose leader Chiang Ching-Kuo dismantled his own autocracy before his death, in 1988. Xiao has not disavowed authoritarianism, and he even seemed to support America's New Right. But as the immediate prospects for democracy have all but vanished from China, his politics have shifted from reaction to reflection. Authoritarianism, Xiao told me, "has its own problems."

When Xi Jinping came to power, in 2012, he used his newfound authority to launch an anti-corruption drive, which Xiao endorsed. Since then, though, Xi has abolished Presidential term limits, decimated civil society, and intensified clampdowns on free expression. As a mainland Chinese scholar, Xiao was careful not to betray his views about the regime. He instead spoke to what he now sees as an unsolvable "dilemma" in his theory. A democrat risks welcoming dangerous ideas into a culture—ideas that, legitimate or not, could hasten a nation's demise. Xiao turned to authoritarianism partly because he believed that China was careening in that direction. And yet "a neo-authoritarian leader must be wise," Xiao told me, with a hint of exasperation. "And he may not be." Once you pin your hopes on a justice-delivering strongman, in other words, he may take the righteous path, or he may not. The only certainty is that he has control.

On an overcast Monday evening, I arrived at a low-rise apartment tower in Shanghai, where Xiao lives with his wife. He is a sprightly man, with salt-and-pepper hair and wispy bangs that he brushes to one side. Every day, for twenty years, he has kept to an intense exercise routine—a hundred and fifty squats and more than three hundred volleys of a squash or tennis ball outside. During that time, he has been hard at work on a hefty three-volume history of China from antiquity to Deng's "reform and opening up." (He hopes to complete it by 2030.) Xiao has an obsession with classical music. He often leads guests into a spartan living room, where he shows off an oversized speaker system on which he spent tens of thousands of dollars. ("My entire life savings," he told me.) On my visit, we listened to the German violinist Anne-Sophie Mutter's rendition of the "Carmen Fantasy," at a volume suited to the hard of hearing.

In the days after the U.S. election, Xiao wrote an essay on his blog in which he opined about the result's geopolitical ramifications. He feared that Trump's isolationist bluster would lead some Chinese to underestimate U.S. commitments to Taiwan, raising the "probability of direct conflict between the U.S. and China." During our meeting, however, he also expounded on how the countries were similar. China's neo-authoritarianism in the eighties, he told me, shared a common enemy with today's Republican Party: the "romanticism" espoused by the "radical liberals."

Xiao used the term romanticism to describe the belief, inspired by the Enlightenment, that humanity can design ideal societies through reason. He criticized this view for disregarding history and experience—or, to riff on an old adage, for "making the perfect the enemy of the feasible." Xiao, who was born in 1946 and grew up under Maoism, witnessed the worst excesses of this kind of armchair statecraft. When Mao launched the Cultural Revolution, in 1966, Xiao had recently graduated high school and was working in a factory. He hadn't been able to enter university, likely for harboring "bourgeois" sympathies—including his passion for Western philosophy—and he allied himself with the Red Guards as a leader of a "rebel worker faction" at his machinery plant. But, as the revolution wore on, he himself was denounced as a "revisionist," and he spent the next several years consigned to gruelling work at the factory.

Shortly after Mao died, in 1976, the reckoning began. Crowds gathered around a Democracy Wall near Beijing's Tiananmen Square to post demands for freedom and accountability. Intellectuals called for a "New Enlightenment," and an iconoclastic 1988 documentary, "River Elegy," compared Chinese civilization to a muddied Yellow River that was in need of a "good scrubbing." In the frenzy to repudiate the past, Xiao saw history repeating itself. The Cultural Revolution had cemented his faith in a liberal modernity, but it also, paradoxically, instilled a visceral fear of that modernity's real-life accelerants. In the spirit of William F. Buckley, Jr., the architect of modern American conservatism, Xiao stood "athwart history yelling Stop."

The seeds of "neo-authoritarianism" came to Xiao around 1983, when he was researching republican China, the country's first major attempt at democracy. The experiment followed the overthrow of China's last imperial dynasty, in 1911, and was seen by many of Xiao's coevals as a fount of inspiration. But what Xiao found was complete and utter chaos. "The National Assembly couldn't do anything except mess things up," Xiao told me. "The parties would just go at each other with total disregard for the nation's interests." China, Xiao concluded, lacked the "software system" for democracy: a civil society, a rule of law, a culture of political bargaining and compromise. "I do not mean to say that I am fundamentally opposed to Western democracy," Xiao told me. "I personally feel very envious of the United States and the West." But, he went on, moving the system over is implausible because China "lacks so many of the conditions." What China needed was something like a final emperor, the breaker of the despotic chain who would summon modernity by fiat. Xiao reverse-engineered democracy back to the strongman: "In order to have democracy, there must be civil society," he told me. A civil society requires economic prosperity; economic prosperity requires political stability; and political stability "requires a strongman."

In 1988, Xiao introduced his theory at an academic symposium, and "neo-authoritarianism" officially entered the public discourse. The idea was reviled by liberal intellectuals, who accused Xiao of rationalizing the status quo—or, worse, tilting China back toward the system that it had just escaped. But his theory seemed to mirror the temperament of Deng, who, for all his reformist tendencies, was a ruthless apparatchik. Throughout his reign, the man hailed as a pragmatic liberalizer jailed Democracy Wall activists and denounced unwelcome foreign ideas as "spiritual pollution." In the spring of 1989, students gathered in Tiananmen Square to protest for greater political freedoms. Intellectuals led by the literary critic Liu Xiaobo joined a hunger strike in solidarity. Deng imposed martial law and approved the final order to clear the square.

Xiao told me that Liu and the demonstrators held “considerable responsibility” for the carnage on June 4th that year. The hunger strikers, it seemed, had contracted the same romantic virus that plagued the turn-of-century reformers, the Red Guards, and Gorbachev. “Neo-authoritarianism’s No. 1 enemy,” Xiao told me, “is the radical liberals.” Only once they were “marginalized,” he continued, could Chinese society stabilize and experiment with political freedoms. (Liu Xiaobo died of untreated liver cancer in 2017, after spending nearly a decade in prison.)

If reformers like Liu had, in Xiao’s view, pushed China beyond its immediate capacities, American progressives were now doing the same to the United States. For Xiao, the Democratic Party, elite universities, and Western corporate boards were the new epicenters of romanticism. Open borders ignored the real difficulties of cultural assimilation—it was, as he put it, like “mixing Type B blood with a Type A body.” Transgender identity was just pseudoscience: “The belief that everyone can decide their gender—it disregards human experience,” Xiao told me. (Xiao did not seem to be familiar with “radicalism” on the American right, from white nationalism to QAnon.) The implication was clear: in 1989, the man who repelled the radicals was Deng Xiaoping. In 2024, it was Donald Trump.

Perhaps one reason why authoritarianism has returned to America is that the country’s fundamental political questions are beginning to resemble those of the East. For most of American history, politics revolved around how to limit government. But, in the Communist world, the question was often about how to rebuild it—and save it from bad actors. The stakes felt higher. There are many probable causes of our eastward drift: the failures of globalization, the betrayals of technological progress, cultural anomie, the provocateurs who profit from the sense that the world is about to burn. Whatever the origin, America’s inner conflict now feels comparable to the pivotal decade when Xiao and his liberal adversaries fought over China’s future.

Following what many Americans considered the most consequential election of a lifetime, Elon Musk has vowed to “delete” a bloated government. Trump promises to eradicate an army of deep-state conspirators, whom he calls “the enemy within.” Democratic norms and the rule of law are mere windshield ornaments on the road to American redemption. In its emphasis on results, this approach is familiar to Chinese authoritarians. “The people didn’t want romanticism, they wanted performance,” Xiao told me when I asked him why he thought Trump had won. The Democrats didn’t perform, he added: they didn’t secure the border, and they didn’t improve the economy.

For all of Xiao’s attention to the psyche of “radical liberals,” I was most struck by his own. In the Liu Xiaobos of the eighties, Xiao had glimpsed a romanticism redolent of the Red Guards. In this light, an advocate for peaceful democratic change, who kept vigil in Tiananmen Square to protect students from oncoming tanks, had been similar to violent revolutionaries. Xiao, of course, had been a revolutionary himself—and who better to recognize a radical than a recovering radical? The current generation of Communist Party leaders is not so different in their perspective. “The Politburo is a Red Guard Politburo,” Geremie Barmé, a prominent Australian sinologist, told me. China, he continued, “lives with a completely unresolved, profound historical trauma . . . and is now led by people who are all the product of trauma. All of this is why it is so repressive.”

One is not born but becomes an authoritarian. Carl Schmitt, the twentieth century’s giant of illiberal thought, drew his theories from his personal experience living in the Weimar Republic. Xiao was inspired by Yan Fu, the reformist intellectual and translator of Adam Smith who, after living through China’s own republican experiment, decided that his people were “not capable of self-government.” And, in the U.S., one finds examples like Peter Thiel, the billionaire venture capitalist who declared, in a 2009 essay, that “I no longer believe that freedom and democracy are compatible.” Thiel traced his anti-democratic conversion to earlier defeats: his “trench warfare” against progressive students in college; the post-financial-crisis marginalization of libertarian dogma. Over the years, Thiel’s shift toward the authoritarian right has coincided with the growing acceptance of his ideas in the mainstream. He is now one of the biggest funders of the conservative nationalist movement, a mentor to Vice-President-elect J. D. Vance, and a supporter of “neo-reactionary” figures like Curtis Yarvin, who admires the state-capitalist societies of Singapore and Deng Xiaoping’s China.

Thiel and Xiao are vastly different thinkers, but this only makes their commonalities more striking. In believing that democracy was either premature or past its prime, they turned to the strongman as an antidote. “The problem with Xiao,” Joseph Fewsmith, a professor of Chinese politics at Boston University, told me, “is that he tackles the question of how countries get from autocracy to democracy, but he never explored how not to get stuck. Which is what happened.” When I asked Xiao what a democracy in China might look like, he said that he hadn’t really thought about it. The proponent of a so-called “soft landing” for democracy did not, ultimately, spend much time designing a parachute.

For most of his life, Xiao has claimed that the central danger to Chinese society was not the dictator but his liberal opponents. Whether Xiao was right we will never know. We cannot peer into the universe where Liu and his reformers won, where they are alive and well, rather than silenced or dead. Ours is the world of strongmen, where decisions increasingly turn on the whims of a vanishing few. In China, the risk of Xiao's theory has come to pass—the strongman changed tack. At his trial for "subversion of state power," in 2009, Liu Xiaobo prepared a statement of warning to his political opponents. It remains just as relevant today as it was then. "An enemy mentality will poison the spirit of a nation," Liu wrote. It will "destroy a society's tolerance and humanity, and hinder a country's advance toward freedom and democracy."

India starts resembling China in unflattering ways

There are some startling similarities developing between India and China. How many and how concerned investors should be will rank among the big questions in 2025.

Western policymakers, CEOs and investors have for years debated the potential of the South Asian country to follow the path of its $18 trillion neighbour in terms of GDP per capita and global manufacturing might. Such comparisons are now taking on new meaning in Mumbai financial circles and beyond.

For a start, the world's view of China has dramatically deteriorated. Growth in the world's second-largest economy is slowing, and Beijing's relationship with Washington has soured. These two trends have increased India's opportunity to shine as an investment destination on the global stage since the Covid-19 pandemic.

China's current chapter also expands the scope of what it means for a country to emulate the People's Republic. This now includes some less flattering aspects, and it is here where observers may conclude, rightly or wrongly, India is starting to check a few too many boxes.

The first problematic likeness is the trajectory of India's $4 trillion economy. It is suddenly underperforming expectations: GDP growth fell to 5.4% in the three months to the end of September, the slowest pace in seven quarters, only 80 basis points faster than China's print for the comparable period.

That points to a big potential weakness in the belief within Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government that India will deliver a sustained 6%-8% annual GDP growth over the next decade. As in China, domestic problems underpinning weak private consumption – including, in India's case, anaemic salary growth – appear deep-seated and hard to fix. What's more, both economies face serious external headwinds. U.S. President-elect Donald Trump is threatening trade tariffs against the South Asian nation as large as he has threatened against the People's Republic. Meanwhile, India's richest man, Gautam Adani, is likely to curb his growth ambitions following his U.S. indictment for securities fraud, which he denies.

The tycoon's problems put a spotlight on India's approach to courting foreign investment. Global companies are entering the country in partnership with local firms helmed by a small number of powerful Indian families. That sets up the potential for at least some of the new alliances to sour, just as several Chinese joint ventures did.

, the company at the centre of the U.S. legal case. Ultimately, while China was more forceful than India in coercing joint ventures, officials in Beijing and New Delhi want the same thing from foreign multinationals: know-how. That desire to acquire intellectual property may ultimately put India in the West's crosshairs.

Finally, there is the issue of perceived interference. The U.S. is trying to contain China's rise, partly because of concerns the Asian behemoth is seeking to influence lawmakers in Washington. Politicians on both sides of the aisle also disapprove of what they view as China's predatory business practices, cyber intrusions and territorial claims.

Unhelpfully, a somewhat similar label of meddling is starting to stick to India. Canada, a member of the Group of Seven rich countries, slapped a "foreign interference" tag on India in June, opens new tab, unseating Russia as the North American country's biggest threat after China per its assessment in 2019. Tensions between Canada and India escalated after Ottawa said Indian diplomats were linked to plots to target Sikh separatists in Canada. India denies the claims, and even if these were true, it would hardly be the first country to seek to assassinate its enemies on foreign soil. The diplomatic brouhaha does not, though, help a capital-hungry country attract investment. Many ordinary Indians view their country as a victim of Canada's domestic politics in this saga. Nearer to home, too, there's a debate about whether India is emerging as a bully to its smaller neighbours including Bangladesh, the Maldives and Nepal; the billions of dollars of aid New Delhi provides these countries in times of crisis does provide leverage, though Modi prefers to describe India as a friend of the world, opens new tab.

Whatever the nuances, global decision-makers are paying attention because disruptions between rich and developing countries can be costly. The deterioration of Sino-American ties has led to a conscious decoupling, accelerating both a crash in Chinese stocks and re-routing of supply chains by U.S. firms beyond the People's Republic. How India reacts to some of its emerging challenges will set the tone. Burnt by one large emerging market, global investors may prove far less willing to give another the benefit of the doubt.

Editorial: Nepal in China's strategic embrace

20 December 2024, Telangana Today

Kathmandu's thrust on greater economic cooperation with Beijing – the BRI is part of this endeavour – will whittle down India's influence over Nepal

India has every reason to be alarmed over the developments in Nepal in the light of its steadily tightening embrace of China. Known for his ideological affiliation with China, Nepalese Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli is unabashedly aligning his country to serve Beijing's strategic interests. The latest indicator of China's growing sway over the tiny Himalayan nation came with the signing of a framework for cooperation on the ambitious Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in Nepal. The agreement was signed during Oli's visit to Beijing early this month, apart from nine other pacts. This is a big setback to India which is strongly opposed to the BRI on grounds of sovereignty as it passes through the parts of Pakistan Occupied Kashmir (PoK). This deal will enable China to increase its already considerable inroads into Nepal. Kathmandu's thrust on greater economic cooperation with Beijing – the BRI is part of this endeavour – would also whittle down India's influence over Nepal. The BRI framework agreement, incidentally, also envisages the opening of branches of Chinese banks and financial institutions in Nepal. India has traditionally had deep economic linkages with Nepal, nurtured due to geography – the two neighbours share a porous 1,751-km-long border. This, along with the landlocked nature of Nepal, has helped India become its largest trading partner. During the 2022-23 fiscal, bilateral trade was pegged at $8.85 billion. This included $8 billion of exports from India to Nepal. As per the Nepal Rastra Bank, India's share in Nepal's trade accounted for 64.1% in 2022-23.

The latest Beijing-Kathmandu tango has the potential to cause unease not just in India but also in the United States. While America had managed to get Nepal on board its own Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) Compact to fund Kathmandu's power and transport infrastructure, the BRI seems far broader. With the latest deal with Beijing, Nepal would be hoping that the 10 initial projects, including those meant to boost regional connectivity, will now see the light of day. The Oli government's encouragement of Beijing's concerted moves to claim Buddhism as a shared heritage is another cause for concern for India, which has been making efforts to build on its shared Buddhist heritage with Nepal. Ever since his dramatic comeback to power in July this year, under the watchful eyes of China which brokered a peace deal among the Communist parties, Oli, Chairman of the Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), has been warming up to Beijing. In his tenure as Prime Minister in the past, he was known for his pro-China views and this was evident from the foreign policy outlook of his leadership of the CPN-UML too. Oli has served as the Prime Minister of Nepal on two occasions, from 2015-2016 and 2018-2021, before being ousted by the country's Supreme Court in a controversial ruling.

United Front: China's 'magic weapon' caught in a spy controversy

19 December 2024, BBC, Koh Ewe Laura Bicker

The People's Republic of China has a "magic weapon", according to its founding leader Mao Zedong and its current president Xi Jinping.

It is called the United Front Work Department - and it is raising as much alarm in the West as Beijing's growing military arsenal.

Yang Tengbo, a prominent businessman who has been linked to Prince Andrew, is the latest overseas Chinese citizen to be scrutinised - and sanctioned - for his links to the UFWD.

The existence of the department is far from a secret. A decades-old and well-documented arm of the Chinese Communist Party, it has been mired in controversy before. Investigators from the US to Australia have cited the UFWD in multiple espionage cases, often accusing Beijing of using it for foreign interference.

Beijing has denied all espionage allegations, calling them ludicrous.

So what is the UFWD and what does it do?

'Controlling China's message'

The United Front - originally referring to a broad communist alliance - was once hailed by Mao as the key to the Communist Party's triumph in the decades-long Chinese Civil War.

After the war ended in 1949 and the party began ruling China, United Front activities took a backseat to other priorities. But in the last decade under Xi, the United Front has seen a renaissance of sorts.

Xi's version of the United Front is broadly consistent with earlier incarnations: to "build the broadest possible coalition with all social forces that are relevant", according to Mareike Ohlberg, a senior fellow at the German Marshall Fund.

On the face of it, the UFWD is not shadowy - it even has a website and reports many of its activities on it. But the extent of its work - and its reach - is less clear.

While a large part of that work is domestic, Dr Ohlberg said, "a key target that has been defined for United Front work is overseas Chinese".

Today, the UFWD seeks to influence public discussions about sensitive issues ranging from Taiwan - which China claims as its territory - to the suppression of ethnic minorities in Tibet and Xinjiang. It also tries to shape narratives about China in foreign media, target Chinese government critics abroad and co-opt influential overseas Chinese figures.

"United Front work can include espionage but [it] is broader than espionage," Audrye Wong, assistant professor of politics at the University of Southern California, tells the BBC.

"Beyond the act of acquiring covert information from a foreign government, United Front activities centre on the broader mobilisation of overseas Chinese," she said, adding that China is "unique in the scale and scope" of such influence activities.

China has always had the ambition for such influence, but its rise in recent decades has given Beijing the ability to exercise it.

Since Xi became president in 2012, he has been especially proactive in crafting China's message to the world, encouraging a confrontational "wolf warrior" approach to diplomacy and urging his country's diaspora to "tell China's story well".

The UFWD operates through various overseas Chinese community organisations, which have vigorously defended the Communist Party beyond its shores. They have censored anti-CCP artwork and protested at the activities of Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama. The UFWD has also been linked to threats against members of persecuted minorities abroad, such as Tibetans and Uyghurs.

But much of the UFWD's work overlaps with other party agencies, operating under what observers have described as "plausible deniability".

It is this murkiness that is causing so much suspicion and apprehension about the UFWD.

When Yang appealed against his ban, judges agreed with the then secretary of state's report that Yang "represented a risk to national security" - citing the fact that he downplayed his ties with the UFWD as one of the reasons that led them to that conclusion.

Yang, however, maintains that he has not done anything unlawful and that the spy allegations are "entirely untrue".

Cases like Yang's are becoming increasingly common. In 2022, British Chinese lawyer Christine Lee was accused by the MI5 of acting through the UFWD to cultivate relationships with influential people in the UK. The following year, Liang Litang, a US citizen who ran a Chinese restaurant in Boston, was indicted for providing information about Chinese dissidents in the area to his contacts in the UFWD.

And in September, Linda Sun, a former aide in the New York governor's office, was charged with using her position to serve Chinese government interests - receiving benefits, including travel, in return. According to Chinese state media reports, she had met a top UFWD official in 2017, who told her to "be an ambassador of Sino-American friendship".

It is not uncommon for prominent and successful Chinese people to be associated with the party, whose approval they often need, especially in the business world.

But where is the line between peddling influence and espionage?

"The boundary between influence and espionage is blurry" when it comes to Beijing's operations, said Ho-fung Hung, a politics professor at Johns Hopkins University.

This ambiguity has intensified after China passed a law in 2017 mandating Chinese nationals and companies to co-operate with intelligence probes, including sharing information with the Chinese government - a move that Dr Hung said "effectively turns everyone into potential spies".

The Ministry of State Security has released dramatic propaganda videos warning the public that foreign spies are everywhere and "they are cunning and sneaky".

Some students who were sent on special trips abroad were told by their universities to limit contact with foreigners and were asked for a report of their activities on their return.

And yet Xi is keen to promote China to the world. So he has tasked a trusted arm of the party to project strength abroad.

And that is becoming a challenge for Western powers - how do they balance doing business with the world's second-largest economy alongside serious security concerns?

Wrestling with the long arm of Beijing

Genuine fears over China's overseas influence are playing into more hawkish sentiments in the West, often leaving governments in a dilemma.

Some, like Australia, have tried to protect themselves with fresh foreign interference laws that criminalise individuals deemed to be meddling in domestic affairs. In 2020, the US imposed visa restrictions on people seen as active in UFWD activities.

An irked Beijing has warned that such laws - and the prosecutions they have spurred - hinder bilateral relations.

"The so-called allegations of Chinese espionage are utterly absurd," a foreign ministry spokesperson told reporters on Tuesday in response to a question about Yang. "The development of China-UK relations serves the common interests of both countries."

Some experts say that the long arm of China's United Front is indeed concerning.

"Western governments now need to be less naive about China's United Front work and take it as a serious threat not only to national security but also to the safety and freedom of many ethnic Chinese citizens," Dr Hung says.

But, he adds, "governments also need to be vigilant against anti-Chinese racism and work hard to build trust and co-operation with ethnic Chinese communities in countering the threat together."

Last December, Di Sanh Duong, a Vietnam-born ethnic Chinese community leader in Australia, was convicted of planning foreign interference for trying to cosy up to an Australian minister. Prosecutors argued that he was an "ideal target" for the UFWD because he had run for office in the 1990s and boasted ties with Chinese officials.

Duong's trial had centred around what he meant when he said the inclusion of the minister at a charity event would be beneficial to "us Chinese" - did he mean the Chinese community in Australia, or mainland China?

In the end, Duong's conviction - and a prison sentence - raised serious concerns that such broad anti-espionage laws and prosecutions can easily become weapons for targeting ethnic Chinese people.

"It's important to remember that not everyone who is ethnically Chinese is a supporter of the Chinese Communist Party. And not everyone who is involved in these diaspora organisations is driven by fervent loyalty to China," Dr Wong says.

"Overly aggressive policies based on racial profiling will only legitimise the Chinese government's propaganda that ethnic Chinese are not welcome and end up pushing diaspora communities further into Beijing's arms."

2024, the year India defeated China's salami-slicing strategy

19 December 2024, The Economic Times, Sarahbeth George

For decades, China's strategy of "salami slicing"—incrementally encroaching on territory to solidify its claims — has reshaped borders and silenced resistance across Asia. From the South China Sea to Himalayan frontiers, Beijing's methodical approach has left neighbouring countries scrambling to respond. China shares its border with more than a dozen countries and it has had border disputes with at least six of them over the past few years. On its border disputes with its neighbors, China has mostly gone unchallenged, gradually pushing its salami-slicing strategy forward. But 2024 was a turning point: India was the first country in past few decades to decisively stop China in its tracks and refuse to yield to its tried-and-tested game. India's resistance proved to be a firm message that China's expansionist ambitions can't always go unchecked.

China's Unchecked March: A History of Dominance
China's history of border disputes is a study in opportunism. China has locked horns with no fewer than six of its neighbours, from Japan over islands in the East China Sea, down to Vietnam, Malaysia and the Philippines in the South China Sea. From the construction of artificial islands to weaponizing of trade, leveraging economic dependence, it has often found a way to dominate.

Land borders have been no exception. Bhutan, Nepal and even Russia have experienced China's salami-slicing techniques, where small, seemingly inconsequential incursions are used to cement broader territorial claims. Most nations either lack the resources or political will to counter these moves effectively. But where others hesitated, India chose to fight back.

The Turning Point: India's Bold Stand

India's watershed moment came in 2024 with a landmark agreement over the Line of Actual Control (LAC). This wasn't just another border negotiation; it marked the culmination of years of tension following the deadly 2020 Galwan clash that left 20 Indian soldiers and an undisclosed number of Chinese troops dead. While China likely expected India to fall in line, as many of its neighbors had, it faced a resolute adversary instead.

India refused to let China dictate terms. The strategic deployment of troops, modernising infrastructure on the LAC, and an unambiguous message through diplomatic channels made it amply clear that China's salami slicing was not going to work this time. This multi-pronged approach forced Beijing to agree to a phased disengagement and a novel patrolling mechanism — a first in decades of border disputes.

The turning point came when Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping sat down for their first face-to-face meeting in years at the BRICS Summit in Kazan. For the first time since 2019, the two leaders had directly engaged each other, and the meeting marked a shift toward breaking the deadlock in their strained relationship. Both leaders agreed that stability in bilateral ties needed to be rebuilt, with a focus on respect for each other's sensitivities and concerns. This rare exchange injected a sense of cautious optimism into an otherwise tense chapter in India-China relations. Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri confirmed that both nations had reached a resolution to address the issues stemming from the 2020 border clashes, a significant step towards stabilising bilateral ties.

Following high-level talks between National Security Advisor Ajit Doval and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi in St Petersburg, both countries agreed to expedite efforts to resolve the remaining border disputes and improve bilateral relations.

A month before the border breakthrough, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar said that 75 per cent of the disengagement issues had been sorted out.

The disengagement agreement in the remaining areas, Depsang and Demchok, in October had paved the way for a bilateral meeting between PM Modi and President Xi on the margins of the BRICS summit in Kazan in which the leaders endorsed the agreement and agreed to resume exchanges between the special representatives on the boundary question and the foreign ministers.

During the talks, both sides highlighted the importance of regular exchanges and contacts at diplomatic and military level through established mechanisms. "They agreed on the need for effective border management and maintenance of peace & tranquillity in accordance with relevant bilateral agreements, protocols and understandings reached between the two governments," said the Indian govt, adding that the Chinese delegation also called on foreign secretary Vikram Misri.

According to the Indian side, the two countries reviewed the situation in border areas, and reflected on the lessons learnt from the events of 2020, which included the deadly Galwan clashes, in order to prevent their recurrence.

Confirming that the disengagement process has been completed in eastern Ladakh, foreign minister S Jaishankar had said in Parliament this week that India will now focus on de-escalation and on effective management of border activities. He had also said that ties with China, which went into a tailspin after the 2020 Galwan military clashes, are now improving. In the latest round of the Working Mechanism for Consultation & Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) talks on Thursday, both sides "positively affirmed the implementation of the most recent disengagement agreement which completed the resolution of the issues that emerged in 2020," said the Indian govt.

"They also prepared for the next meeting of the special representatives, which is to be held in accordance with the decision of the two leaders in their meeting in Kazan on Oct 23, 2024," added the Indian readout.

The agreement includes rights related to patrolling and grazing in traditional areas. He added, Based on this consensus, the disengagement process is nearly complete. We will strive to move beyond just disengagement, but for that, we will need to wait a little longer. This came after both India and China confirmed that an agreement had been reached between the two nations regarding patrolling arrangements along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the India-China border areas.

Speaking at a press briefing, MEA spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal confirmed that India and China had finalised the last phase of disengagement in these regions. "On October 21, 2024, the final phase of disengagement was agreed upon between India and China. As a result, verification patrolling has commenced on mutually agreed terms in Demchok and Depsang. We will keep you updated," he said.

Earlier in the day, the spokesperson of the Chinese Embassy in India announced on the social media platform, X that the Chinese and Indian troops are implementing the resolutions that the two sides reached on issues concerning the border area, which is going smoothly at the moment. Chinese Ambassador to India Xu Feihong had also earlier said that he hoped the bilateral ties would move forward smoothly and ties between both countries would not be restricted or interrupted by specific disagreements.

How India Did It

India's success in halting China wasn't accidental. It was the result of deliberate actions on multiple fronts: Strategic Military Presence

India's military strategy underwent a significant transformation to counter the challenges posed by China. Unlike other nations that found themselves blindsided by Beijing's gradual territorial encroachments, New Delhi adopted a proactive stance. Over the years, India invested heavily in upgrading its border infrastructure in remote, high-altitude regions such as Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh, ensuring year-round access for its forces. Advanced weaponry and specialised units were deployed to enhance readiness, leaving little room for complacency. As one senior military official put it, "India's capability to deploy swiftly and respond robustly has completely shifted the dynamics along the LAC."

Economic Counter-measures

Despite bilateral trade with China having reached a record level of $115.82 billion in 2023, India made deliberate moves to reduce its dependency on Chinese imports. The country's "Atmanirbhar Bharat" or Self-Reliant India initiative gave a significant impetus to local industries, and supply chains diversified with trusted global partners. Indian authorities also banned over 300 Chinese apps, including the popular social media platform TikTok, over concerns of national security following the Galwan Valley clash. A government spokesperson commented, "These measures are not just about economics but a signal that India will not compromise on its sovereignty."

Domestic Pressures: Economic Dependencies and Trade Realities

Domestically, it was Indian businesses, especially those that relied on Chinese imports, that had been pressuring the government to calm things down. Even with the restrictions that followed after the Galwan incident, the trade between India and China continued to boom. In fact, during 2023-24, China reclaimed its position as India's largest trading partner, with bilateral trade reaching $118.4 billion. However, this trade boom has been accompanied by a significant downside: a widening trade deficit that continues to concern Indian policymakers.

Sectors which are highly dependent on Chinese raw materials have borne the brunt of strained ties. For example, India imports around 70 percent of its active pharmaceutical ingredients (APIs) from China – an import dependency that was starkly highlighted during the COVID-19 pandemic. Similarly, industries reliant on Chinese technicians have faced operational delays. The Federation of Indian Export Organizations (FIEO) and the All-India Association of Industries (AIAI) have been vociferous, demanding the ease of visa restrictions on Chinese professionals. They argue that in their absence, manufacturing schedules and supply chains have been upset.

Acknowledging these bottlenecks, the Ministry of Commerce and the Ministry of Electronics and Information Technology, MeitY, had allowed limited entry for Chinese technicians to alleviate the bottleneck. Chief Economic Adviser V. Anantha Nageswaran, through the Annual Economic Report, also urged the government to invest more in investment-led policies to curtail the growing trade deficit.

India's attitude towards China is cautious with experience. Under the previous tenure of Trump, when the US policies towards China swayed between containment and strategic ambiguity, India had to look after its border tensions unilaterally. Even if the ties between India and the US intensified during the tenure of Joe Biden, New Delhi is vigilant against overdependence on one particular partner, as it wants to maintain strategic autonomy.

Stiff Negotiations

Breaking from past approaches that often yielded temporary solutions, India's negotiators took a firmer stance. Talks with China became uncompromising, linking broader diplomatic relations to peace along the LAC. By insisting that de-escalation was a prerequisite for any meaningful engagement, India reset the terms of negotiation. External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar emphasized, "There can be no normalization of ties without peace and tranquillity in border areas. That is the baseline."

Why India's Stand Matters

This move by India carries great importance beyond its borders. The firm stand against China has made New Delhi a shining example for other countries that have been facing similar pressures while navigating them. It shows how strategic blending of military preparedness, economic resilience and robust international alliances can counterbalance the dominance of an adversary.

More importantly, India's approach has derailed the narrative of China's unchecked border aggression. It proved that even the most ambitious expansionist plans of China can be restrained through determined resistance.

While India has achieved some notable success, major issues remain. The border dispute is far from fully resolved, and disputed areas like Depsang and Arunachal Pradesh are still unresolved. Restoration of trust will demand persistent dialogue and strict adherence to disengagement agreements – no small feat given Beijing's spotty track record.

2024 wasn't just another year in India-China relations. It was the year India proved that China's salami-slicing strategy has limits. While many others have capitulated, India resisted, setting a precedent for how neighbours can counterbalance Beijing's growing assertiveness.

Dalai Lama: Succession and beyond

18 December 2024, Deccan Herald, Bhashyam Kasturi

The uncertainty around his successor is significant because Tibet is central to India-China ties.

The 14th Dalai Lama realises that he is not getting any younger and yet when asked about his successor, he says he will live beyond 100 and a decision on the matter will be taken then. While one wishes the Dalai Lama a long life, that his institution and persona go beyond Tibetan Buddhism into the realm of geopolitics and more pertinently to India-China relations merits a relook at what India's plans to safeguard its interests.

The lack of clarity over his succession creates challenges because China has already made plans. The Chinese set the precedent in the case of the Panchen Lama. The Dalai Lama had, in 2011, outlined his plans on how his successor would be chosen. But even today, he holds his cards close to his chest on this strategic issue. Furthermore, the lack of clarity within India on how this issue will be dealt with is disquieting as Tibet is central to India-China relations.

Recently, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, leader of the Central Tibetan Administration, argued in an interview that the Dalai Lama has taken different stances on the issue of succession, as "China cannot handle unpredictability". He notes that the Dalai Lama talks about emanation, which means choosing somebody before one's demise, and also about reincarnation. The Government of India has also been noncommittal about its take on the succession.

There is no doubt, as Sikyong states, “India is concerned” and “India has a stake in this”. This is because the Dalai Lama stays in India and his presence here irks the Chinese. Flowing from China’s increasing efforts to control religious life in Tibet, in 2007, Order No. 5 on “Measures on the Management of the Reincarnation of Living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism” was issued. Articles 5 and 9 of Order No. 5 make it clear that living Buddhas of high order will only be approved at the very top of the Communist Party of China.

In the case of the Dalai Lama, China has argued that the Golden Urn will decide his successor. Pertinently, this method was used only in the case of the 11th and 12th Dalai Lama. In Tibetan Buddhism, the process involves either emanation or reincarnation. China also has in place an aggressive global campaign via the World Buddhist Forum to claim its hold over Buddhism. Tagged to this is the strategy to use China’s economic heft to warn nations not to host the 14th Dalai Lama on their soil and follow Beijing’s lead on his successor.

Even if the next Dalai Lama is ‘born’ in China, India will still have a stake in the matter. Locating India’s Tibet policy is thus important. The existing policy is episodic and lacks consistency. Overcoming this lacuna will require high-level contact between the Dalai Lama and the Government of India, as well as with the Sikyong. The best course of action would be to have the External Affairs Minister on the job.

A policy review

Resetting India’s policy on China from the Tibet angle, however, has its challenges. For instance, there is a suggestion to rename India’s border with China, as the India-Tibet Border. This would certainly be in line with the 1914 Shimla Agreement. But post-1951 when China occupied Tibet and after the 1962 border war, a Line of Actual Control divides India and China. Thus, an entire review of India’s policy towards China must occur.

That a political will to move forward on ties with China exists was demonstrated with the October agreement on Demchok and Dopsang. As the EAM noted in his speech in the Lok Sabha on December 3, non-alteration of the status quo unilaterally, respect and adherence of the LAC by both the sides, and the need to respect and adhere to the agreements that were arrived at earlier remain the key principles for India.

The boundary question is, therefore, at the forefront of the bilateral relationship between India and China. Other aspects that demand equal attention include the growing trade deficit and Chinese investments in India. While most of these are covered by different stakeholders in the government, the presence of the Dalai Lama and Tibetans in India has remained mostly the domain of the intelligence agencies, MHA and MEA. While the China Study Group and the Tibet Study Group regularly discuss policy options, it is time for a thorough political review at the highest level of the government on India’s stand on the Dalai Lama’s succession.

A Tibetan writer reflects on the fight for his motherland while living in ‘exile’ in India

17 December 2024, Scroll, Tsering Namgyal Khortsa

An excerpt from ‘Little Lhasa: Reflections in Exiled Tibet’, by Tsering Namgyal Khortsa.

Winter sunshine warmed the corrugated roofs of the Tibetan houses, as if compensating for the cold of the night before. A horn of an occasional car echoed within the valley. After a long writing streak the previous night, I had woken slightly late and was sitting outside, enjoying the view of the snow-clad mountains and flipping through the newspaper. I heard the sound of people marching and shouting slogans. The noise grew louder as the crowd marched closer, the sound of protests already filling the area. They were, as expected, anti-Chinese slogans. But I could not immediately figure out the purpose of the gathering. Curiosity led me to step out of the house, to see what grievances they were vocalising that morning.

Coming down the steep road from the Dalai Lama’s main temple, often called Tsuglagkhang after its splendid seventh century namesake in Lhasa, were a group of Tibetans. In the first row were mostly nuns, followed by female students both young and old, wearing the Tibetan chuba, the traditional dress. The men folk brought up the rear. They were carrying anti-Chinese placards, some of which had the usual slogans: “China Get Out of Tibet”, “China Release Political Prisoners in Tibet”, as well as pictures of someone who seemed to be a bespectacled monk.

The rally had apparently started at McLeodganj, about three kilometres away, and was headed in the direction of Gangchen Kyishong, where the secretariats of the government-in-exile were located. I soon realised they were protesting China’s announcement that it was going to execute, without trial, Tenzing Delek Rinpoche, a high-ranking Tibetan lama from Eastern Tibet, and Lobsang Dhondup, a layperson. They were accused of allegedly masterminding a bombing incident in the Sichuan Province. The pictures on the placards held aloft by the protesters were those of Tenzing Delek Rinpoche. Looking at the pictures, however, he seemed more like a high school teacher than a terrorist bomber.

Quite unwittingly, I became part of the crowd and walked with them. I did not know the destination nor did I ask: the power of the crowd was bewitching as it forced me – not usually a joiner of crowds – to suddenly become party to the morning gathering. The rally was huge.

Group leaders first shouted slogans into their microphones, in Hindi and English, followed by the rest of the demonstrators. While many of the Tibetan elders could not speak English, it did not seem to impede their ability to articulate the slogans with amazing fluency in a language they had never formally learned. Some of them were carrying little Tibetan flags: it was a symbol of Tibetan sovereignty. To me they seemed relatively calm and quite at peace, despite the gravity of the issue at stake: the lives of two prisoners of conscience, languishing by now in some Chinese prison. Perhaps this is the reason why the participants were mostly monks and nuns.

The ease with which they were protesting showed that they were used to this ritual of peaceful dissent. As we neared the bazaar in lower Dharamsala, Indian shopkeepers and onlookers watched silently – some quite pensive, some just indifferent – as the crowd gradually moved past the fruit sellers, through the streets, and towards Kacheri, where they stopped and gathered together. As I looked behind me, I could see the number of demonstrators growing larger, filling the narrow, hilly road leading up to Gangchen Kyishong.

Every year, pilgrims and tourists from all over the world travel to this picturesque north Indian hill station to catch a glimpse of the Dalai Lama. For weary travellers, the rock-strewn roads, heavy traffic jams and choking exhaust fumes are far from spiritually uplifting: they are a reminder of the rugged realities of life in the Indian Himalayas. The poor infrastructure is hardly befitting of the international reputé of this hill station where India's colonial rulers escaped the scorching heat of the plains and sought respite in the shadows of the mountains. But the town has come a long way since 1959 when Tibet's exiled leader set up his government-in-exile after fleeing Tibet as the Chinese Army moved into the region.

When the Tibetans first came to live here, they did not know that the location had Buddhist roots dating back 1700 years. The Kangra Valley is rich in unexplored archaeological sites of great importance to Indian Buddhism. In 635 AD, the Chinese monk pilgrim, Hsuan Tsang, recorded fifty monasteries with around 2,000 monks in this fertile region. But a century later, Buddhism and all its sites were eliminated from the valley during an upsurge of Brahminical revivalism. In 1849, the British posted a regiment in Dharamsala, but the place was not to remain a military cantonment for long. By 1855, it was a small but flourishing hill station and the administrative headquarters of Kangra District, which had been annexed by the British in 1848. The two main areas at the time were McLeodganj, named after the Lieutenant-Governor of Punjab, David McLeod, and Forsyth Ganj, named after a divisional commissioner.

Lord Elgin, Viceroy of British India and a former Governor-General of Canada, reportedly loved the forests of Dharamsala so much that before dying there in 1863, he asked to be buried in the graveyard of St John's Church, located deep in the wilderness. Had he lived longer, Dharamsala might have become the summer capital of British India. And the great Frances Younghusband, leader of British India's fateful incursion to Lhasa in 1904, also had Dharamsala connections. Both his parents, Clara Shaw and John Younghusband, lived there in a pine forest above St John's Church and later bought land in Kangra Valley to pioneer a tea plantation. Clara's brother, Robert Shaw, was a renowned explorer of Central Asia and an early Kangra tea planter.

In 1905, a severe earthquake changed the face of Dharamsala. Many buildings collapsed and the whole settlement, once ravaged, was never re-occupied. The earthquake measured 7.8 on the surface wave magnitude scale and killed more than 20,000 people. McLeodganj then became a sleepy village until the Dalai Lama made it his home in exile and moved the headquarters of his exiled government from Mussoorie, another north Indian hill station now in the state of Uttarakhand, in 1960. Located in the lap of the breathtaking Dhauladhar Range, which stands 5,200 m above sea level, McLeodganj, at nearly 1,800 m, has all the attributes of a great hill station. And over the years, the place, with its pine-clad hillsides, charming villages, snow-clad peaks, and the wide expanse of fertile Kangra Valley below has attracted tourists from all over the world.

Now, Dharamsala has become the beating heart of exiled Tibet. If you stand long enough in McLeodganj, the whole world, it seems, would eventually pass by you. High-profile visitors have included the Duke of Gloucester and the Duchess of York, the first ladies of France and Peru, supermodel Christy Turlington, actors Pierce Brosnan, Richard Gere, Steven Seagal, Goldie Hawn, Jet Lee, Harrison Ford and Sunil Dutt, not to mention the scores of writers and scientists who come to the town. Notwithstanding the glamour of the tourists and celebrity visitors, the place continues to be the capital of Tibetan dislocation. This is where they have seen their imaginary and real homes merge subconsciously to give birth to an entirely unique entity called "Exiled Tibet"; just as writers see their vivid imagination intersect with hard facts to produce works of creative non-fiction.

A Tibetan Christmas

17 December 2024, JSTOR Daily, Livia Gershon

The story of Cizhong's Catholic holiday festival began when French missionaries arrived in northwest Yunnan with plans to spread their faith across Tibet.

A priest holds a christening for a baby of Tibetan ethnic minority group attends a mass at a church of Cizhong Village on December 25, 2006, in Deqin County of Yunnan Province, China

In 2014, anthropologist Brendan A. Galipeau attended a Christmas celebration in the village of Cizhong, just outside the Tibetan border in China's Yunnan Province. The holiday represents the village's biggest festival of the year, enjoyed by the area's unique Catholic community and the Buddhist minority. The event bears the influences of European missionaries, Chinese government policies, and cultural and economic interplay between villagers and outsiders.

During the two-day celebration, Galipeau writes, villagers decorated their local church with strings of lights, an elaborate nativity scene, and branches of a local evergreen tree with red berries known as "Christmas tree." During the Christmas Eve and Christmas morning masses, the congregation chanted in Tibetan and the priest spoke in Mandarin Chinese. The festival included a procession of children in traditional Tibetan clothing topped with Santa hats and a feast with Tibetan singing and dancing attended by local Buddhists as well as the Catholics. It also drew many Chinese and international tourists and academics fascinated by the unique event.

Galipeau writes that the story of Cizhong's Catholicism began in the mid-nineteenth century when French Catholic missionaries arrived in northwest Yunnan with plans to spread their faith across Tibet. Difficulties, including resistance from Buddhist lamas, limited their geographical reach, but they successfully established churches and converted Tibetans in the local area.

In the 1930s, a group of Swiss priests from the Grand Saint Bernard Hospice in the Alps arrived to supplement the French contingent, deploying their expertise in mountain living.

After a violent campaign in which Buddhists killed a number of priests and destroyed churches, in 1909, locals built the church that Galipeau visited in Cizhong. In the 1930s, a group of Swiss priests from the Grand Saint Bernard Hospice in the Alps arrived to supplement the French contingent, deploying their expertise in mountain living. And then, in 1952, the Chinese government expelled the French and Swiss Catholics. This meant there were no priests to lead mass until 2008, when the Catholic Association of China sent the Han priest who led the masses Galipeau witnessed. However, villagers quietly kept to their religious traditions.

In 2001, as part of a broader change in its approach to local cultures, the Chinese government began promoting tourism in the region focused on the scenic countryside and Tibetan traditions. Among other things, it renamed Zhongdian County—located near Cizhong—as Shangri-La City, a nod to English author James Hilton's 1933 novel Lost Horizons, which described a fictional community where Tibetan Buddhists and Catholics live together peacefully.

Galipeau writes that the Catholic Cizhong community recognized an opportunity to capitalize on their unique mixture of cultures. Some opened guesthouses where tourists could drink wine made from grapes first introduced to the area by the French and Swiss.

Local tourism benefited from both international interest and a growing fascination inside China with Tibetan culture as a source of mystical, nature-based inspiration—a phenomenon that some scholars have called "internal orientalism." But, Galipeau writes, the depiction of their traditions as exotic generally doesn't seem to bother local people, who appreciate the interest in their culture and the economic benefits of the tourist industry.

Uyghur separatist threat could reach beyond China's Xinjiang

17 December 2024, Asia Times, Andrew Korybko

Central Asia, Pakistan and Russia could soon be in terrorists' crosshairs.

The rapid collapse of the Syrian Arab Army in the face of the advance of Turkish-backed Hayat Tahrir al-Sham, which the UN Security Council has identified as a terrorist group, has drawn attention to the foreign fighters within their ranks.

First and foremost among those foreign fighters are the Uyghurs from China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region. They used to fight China as part of the East Turkestan Islamic Movement but rebranded as the Turkistan Islamic Party some years back.

Regardless of whichever name they go by, the group has been involved in Idlib since 2017, when reports began circulating about its colonies in that corner of Syria. The organization has a history of collaborating with terrorist groups such as Al Qaeda in support of the quest to carve out a Uyghur state from China. That's why it was designated as a terrorist group by the UN Security Council. The United States removed its own such designation in late 2020 giving the reason that the group had become inactive, but now it's known that this wasn't true.

Members of the group just released a video from Syria calling for militant jihad against China. Yang Xiaotong contributed a detailed Asia Times piece on this subject under the title "China has cause to be terrified of rebel-run Syria." Two of the most important points are that the Turkistan Islamic Party is recruiting members from Central Asia and that it could reestablish itself in Afghanistan to carry out attacks against the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor.

The corridor is considered to be the Belt and Road Initiative's flagship project, and for years it's been the target of attacks by the Balochistan Liberation Army, which Pakistan, China and even the US have designated as a terrorist organization. The BLA has ramped up its attacks since the Afghan Taliban reconquered Afghanistan and gave sanctuary to the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan.

The Balochistan Liberation Army and the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan are now considered to be informal allies. Both seek to damage the Pakistani state: BLA wants to carve out an independent Balochistan while the TTP wants to impose a radical Islamic dictatorship.

Some also suspect that the Afghan Taliban would demand the cession of Pakistan's TTP-run, Pashtun-majority Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa (formerly known as the Northwest Frontier Province) as compensation for support in bringing the TTP to power, since there is no Afghan Taliban recognition of the Durand Line.

The Afghan Taliban have positive relations with China, so they might not welcome the Turkistan Islamic Party to Afghanistan. The problem, though, is that the Afghan Taliban don't have full control over their territory – as is proven by the continued existence of ISIS-K cells there. They also previously hosted the Turkistan Islamic Party in accord with the principle of providing sanctuary to all like-minded Muslim groups with the request that the groups don't threaten others.

It's therefore possible that the Turkistan Islamic Party could re-establish itself in Afghanistan with or without the Afghan Taliban. From there, it could attack the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor just as the partially Afghan-based Balochistan Liberation Army has been doing.

Whereas the Balochistan Liberation Army attacks the corridor for ultra-nationalist reasons, claiming that the megaproject exploits the native Baloch by depriving them of the riches derived from their region's natural resource wealth, it can't be ruled out that the Turkistan Islamic Party might opportunistically want to hit China's soft spot, simply in order to raise the organization's profile.

Beyond attacking Pakistani-based Belt and Road projects, such opportunistic motivation could also find relevance in Central Asia. From there, Hayat Tahrir al-Sham also has sourced some of its foreign fighters – namely Uzbeks, who are the region's most populous people.

There are Uyghur communities in Kazakhstan and in perennially unstable Kyrgyzstan from which the Turkistan Islamist Party could find recruits – whether to carry out attacks against Belt and Road projects there or in Pakistan, attacks across the border in Xinjiang or training in Afghanistan or Syria.

These credible possibilities show that the Turkistan Islamist Party threatens more than just China's Xinjiang, and they raise questions about Türkiye's indirect sponsorship of the party via Ankara's tacit acceptance of the Turkistan Islamists' alliance with the Turkish-backed Hayat Tahrir al-Sham (commonly abbreviated HTS), the group that just conquered Syria.

Türkiye considers itself to be the leader of the Organization of Turkish States, which includes Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan, yet those countries' nationals – especially Uzbeks – have now received training from HTS and obtained relevant battlefield experience in Syria under HTS supervision. It will be difficult for Türkiye to present itself as a reliable partner for those 'stans when it has allowed some of their citizens to metastasize into potential terrorist threats without lifting a finger to stop them.

Another factor for observers to keep in mind is the role of Ukraine's GUR military intelligence agency. The Washington Post reported that GUR played a role in HTS's blitz across Syria. Kyiv had earlier supported Tuareg militants against Wagner in Mali and had supported the Sudanese Armed Forces against the allegedly Wagner-backed Rapid Support Forces in Sudan before that, so its backing of HTS isn't surprising. Nevertheless, the contemporary GUR is also a CIA project, as the Washington Post reported in late 2023.

The possibility thus arises of the CIA using GUR as a plausibly deniable proxy for managing or at least encouraging the Turkistan Islamist Party's expansion to the geostrategic Central Asian region between Russia and China. This could occur even if Türkiye is against it. Ankara could preemptively avert that scenario by using its influence over HTS to crack down on the Turkistan Islamist Party inside Syria by demilitarizing and demobilizing its armed formations. Some Uyghurs could also be deported to China.

Of course, that would require tremendous political will, which Türkiye might not have at present. President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan has presented himself as a champion of the Uyghurs' political cause in times past, but he's toned down such rhetoric in recent years out of pragmatism to improve ties with China. He might thus be accused of betrayal by some of the Islamists from his domestic base, not to mention those abroad who support his Islamist-driven foreign policy – hence his possible reluctance.

If he doesn't take decisive action now, even if only to the extent of containing the Turkistan Islamist Party within Syria and not allowing other Uyghurs, Central Asians or Chechens to travel there via Türkiye for training with that group or HTS, then he might soon find himself with a major problem on his hands that could harm his foreign policy. After all, those people traveled to Syria for training and battlefield experience with the tacit support of his country, so Erdoğan is ultimately to blame in part for whatever future attacks they might carry out.

Pakistan is one of Türkiye's close partners. Thus it will be extremely scandalous if Syrian-based Uyghurs eventually make their way to Afghanistan to wage hybrid war on the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, which is also envisaged as the foundation for Pakistan's future economic development.

Whether the Turkistan Islamists do so on their own or in collusion with the CIA-sponsored GUR is beside the point since Türkiye will still be partially responsible. Russia, China, the Central Asian republics, and Pakistan are therefore watching very closely to see what Erdoğan will do.

Falling enrolment in Tibetan schools a community challenge

The Tibetan government-in-exile has been highlighting the challenges posed by the Chinese government, which has been attempting to erase Tibetan culture in Tibet by prohibiting enrolment in Buddhist monasteries. However, the Tibetan community in India is facing its own set of challenges, including a decline in the number of students enrolling in Tibetan schools, as well as a decrease in the number of Tibetans becoming monks in monasteries across India.

The Tibetan schools and monasteries, set up in India since the Dalai Lama fled into exile from Tibet in 1959, have played a crucial role in preserving the Tibetan language and culture. These institutions have helped spread the Tibetan culture across the world and in maintaining the Tibetan struggle against China.

The issue of declining student enrolment in Tibetan schools in India was highlighted during a symposium organised by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) on Tibetan education. The Education Minister of the Tibetan government in exile, Tharlam Dolma, expressed concern over the declining student numbers, revealing that the student population in Tibetan schools had dropped from 23,684 in 2012 to 13,035 in 2024 – a decline of more than 10,000 students.

She attributed this decline to three primary factors – the cessation of regular Tibetan arrivals from Tibet since 2008, an increase in Tibetans emigrating to Western countries from Tibetan settlements in India, Nepal and Bhutan, and a declining birth rate within the Tibetan community in exile.

The Tibetan government in exile operates 62 schools across India and Nepal, falling under four different systems – Tibetan Children's Village, Central School for Tibetans (CST), Sambhota Tibetan Schools Society and The Snow Lion Foundation. These schools focus on preserving Tibetan language and culture in exile. Earlier, children from Tibet and north-eastern states of India would attend these schools, with many foreign agencies providing financial support for their education. However, the number of students in these schools is now on the decline.

Additionally, the president of the Tibetan government in exile, Penpa Tsering, recently raised concerns about the decreasing number of monks joining Tibetan Buddhist monasteries in exile. Speaking to Tibetan exiles in Lingsang settlement, Dehradun, Tsering highlighted that, according to records from the Department of Religion and Culture of the Tibetan government in exile, the number of monks has been steadily decreasing over the past three years. According to him, most of the current monks come from Himalayan communities.

Hong Kong redefines its economic DNA for China's new era

16 December 2024, Dimsum Daily Hong Kong

As Financial Secretary Paul Chan begins public consultations for the 2025/26 Budget, the city faces the challenging task of maintaining its capitalist character under "One Country, Two Systems" while navigating increasingly turbulent international waters.

The imminent return of Donald Trump to the American presidency in January 2025 presents both challenges and opportunities for Hong Kong's strategic positioning. Trump's anticipated confrontational stance toward China – including potential tariffs and technology restrictions – requires Hong Kong to develop more sophisticated responses that leverage its unique status as a bridge between East and West. However, this challenge also presents an opportunity for Hong Kong to redefine its role within China's economic ecosystem. The city's traditional strengths – its common law system, free flow of information, and transparent governance – become even more valuable as China seeks to maintain international economic engagement while developing alternative channels to Western markets. Hong Kong's evolution must be understood within the context of China's broader economic strategy. Beijing's recent Politburo meetings have emphasised the financial sector's crucial role in economic development, particularly in funding technological advancement. This reaffirmation of Hong Kong's position as China's international financial centre represents a strategic cornerstone for the city's future development.

The establishment of an Economic Development Board, as proposed by various stakeholders, could serve as a crucial mechanism for implementing long-term strategic planning. This would mark a significant departure from the current annual budget-focused approach, allowing Hong Kong to develop more comprehensive strategies aligned with China's five-year plans while maintaining its distinctive economic character.

Three key initiatives emerge as priorities for Hong Kong's transformation:

Initially, enhancing English-language broadcasting capacities via RTHK and other English media platforms to address waning global perceptions. This goes beyond mere public relations; it concerns upholding Hong Kong's position as a respected international voice capable of adeptly conveying the perspectives of both Hong Kong and China to the worldwide audience.

Second, the establishment of a Northern Metropolis Future Centre represents a concrete step toward better integration with mainland markets while preserving Hong Kong's unique advantages. This closed-door platform for stakeholder engagement could help resolve complex issues arising from increased economic integration while maintaining Hong Kong's distinct identity.

Third, the proposed Economic Development Board could coordinate these efforts while ensuring Hong Kong's development aligns with both local needs and national objectives. This wouldn't require significant bureaucratic expansion but rather a strategic reorganisation of existing resources.

The challenge lies not in choosing between integration with mainland China and maintaining Hong Kong's unique character – but in achieving both simultaneously. Hong Kong must leverage its distinctive features – common law, human rights protections, press freedom, and transparent governance – while playing a more active role in China's economic development.

This balancing act requires sophisticated policy coordination. The budget must address immediate operational concerns while laying the groundwork for longer-term strategic objectives. It must satisfy three distinct constituencies: mainland authorities, international investors, and local residents. Success requires demonstrating both the will and capability to evolve while maintaining Hong Kong's essential character.

Hong Kong's role as China's international financial centre will likely become even more crucial as global economic power continues shifting eastward. The city's experience in managing international capital flows, combined with its understanding of both Western and Chinese business practices, positions it uniquely to facilitate China's growing economic influence. The upcoming budget represents more than just an annual fiscal exercise – it's an opportunity to articulate a vision for Hong Kong's future that embraces both continuity and change. By maintaining its distinctive advantages while adapting to new realities, Hong Kong can strengthen its position as an indispensable link between China and the global economy.

Xi brought down powerful rivals in the military. Now he's going after his own men

15 December 2024, CNN World, Nectar Gan

In the early years of Xi Jinping's war on corruption, the Chinese leader consolidated control over the world's largest military by taking down powerful generals from rival factions and replacing them with allies and proteges loyal to himself.

A decade on, having given the People's Liberation Army (PLA) a structural overhaul and stacked its top ranks with his own men, the supreme leader is still knee-deep in his seemingly endless struggle against graft and disloyalty.

And, like many strongman leaders in history, he is increasingly turning against his own handpicked loyalists.

Late last month, Xi purged one of his closest proteges in the military – a decades-old associate entrusted with instilling political loyalty in the PLA and vetting senior promotions.

Adm. Miao Hua, who sits on the Central Military Commission (CMC), the top command body chaired by Xi, has been suspended under investigation for "serious violations of discipline," the Defense Ministry announced, using a common euphemism for corruption and disloyalty.

As the head of the CMC's political work department, which oversees political indoctrination and personnel appointments, Miao is the most senior scalp in Xi's latest military purge. Since last summer, more than a dozen high-ranking figures in China's defense establishment have been ousted, including the last two defense ministers promoted to the CMC by Xi.

But none of them boast the kind of long-standing relationship Miao shared with the top leader, dating back decades to Xi's early political career in the coastal province of Fujian.

The probe into Miao opens a new front in a widening purge that has raised questions over Xi's ability to end systematic corruption in the military and enhance its combat readiness at a time of heightened geopolitical tensions.

Over the past decade, Xi has overseen an ambitious transformation of the PLA into a "world class" fighting force that can rival the US military. A key goal of that modernization drive is to ensure China is ready to fight and win a war over Taiwan, the self-governing democratic island Beijing claims as its own.

But Miao's downfall renews questions – raised during last summer's purges – about how much confidence Xi has in his top generals who would be responsible for leading a war, said Joel Wuthnow, a senior research fellow at the Pentagon-funded National Defense University.

"If he fears that he has brought in people who are not unquestionably loyal to him or his agenda, that would be a huge problem."

Experts say Xi's purge of a longtime acolyte points to a familiar dilemma for autocrats, including his predecessor Mao Zedong: after eliminating political rivals, the supreme leader never stops looking for new threats to their absolute hold on power – including from their own close circle.

'Obscene extent of corruption'

Miao's history with Xi goes back three decades. The Fujian native served as a political officer in the former 31st Group Army from the 1980s to the early 2000s, when Xi was rising through the ranks as a local official to become the provincial governor of Fujian.

"According to credible sources, Xi regularly visited the 31st Group Army at the time" and is known to have had personal contacts with Miao, said James Char, a longtime PLA-watcher and assistant professor at the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies in Singapore.

Miao's military career took off soon after Xi came to power. In 2014, he received a major promotion to become the political commissar of the PLA Navy, making an unusual switch from a career in the Ground Force. Three years later, he was promoted again into the CMC, the apex of military power.

"We cannot find a more apodictic acolyte of Xi than Miao," Char said. "If Miao is eventually indicted of graft, clearly Xi himself had not anticipated the obscene extent of corruption that exists among PLA elites."

For the past 18 months, Xi's cleanup had largely targeted officials connected to the procurement of weapons and the Rocket Force, which oversees China's nuclear and conventional missiles. But Miao's downfall signals a broadening of that crackdown into new sectors, such as political work – which Xi has described as the "lifeline" of the military – and the Navy.

"Wherever they look, I'm sure they will find issues and cases. It's just a matter of which sector they pick," Char said.

'Loss of confidence'

The Defense Ministry has offered no details about the allegations against Miao.

As the chief political commissar of the PLA, Miao is tasked with ensuring its loyalty to the ruling Communist Party. He oversees promotions in the military, vetting key candidates for their political loyalty – a role he also held in the Navy.

In the past, such roles have offered fertile ground for graft, especially bribes for promotions. Miao's predecessor, Gen. Zhang Yang, killed himself while under disciplinary investigation for bribery.

As the geopolitical rivalry between the United States and China heats up, the PLA Navy has also seen a drastic increase in the procurement of warships and other weapons, providing ample opportunities for corruption, said Victor Shih, a political science professor at the University of San Diego.

But there could be another potential reason behind Miao's downfall, Shih said, for "being too obvious in his attempt to foster a faction in the military."

Xi has repeatedly warned against the forming of factions in both the party and the military. "Of course, the only person who is allowed to do that is Xi himself," Shih added.

Miao is seen by some analysts as having recommended multiple associates in the Navy for promotions to key positions, including Rocket Force Commander Wang Houbin and Defense Minister Dong Jun.

The announcement of Miao's investigation came a day after the Financial Times reported that Dong had been placed under investigation for corruption, citing current and former US officials. The Defense Ministry dismissed the report as "sheer fabrication," and days later, Dong made a public appearance at a security forum.

Wuthnow, the expert at the National Defense University, said what led to Miao's downfall was a "loss of confidence," but the reasons for that remain elusive.

In one scenario, Wuthnow said, Xi might have viewed Miao as becoming too powerful and independent, and wanted to uproot what he saw as a bastion of influence that he could not fully control.

"I don't think this is how leaders who are confident in their own power and ability to corral the bureaucracy behaves. It actually strikes me as a sign of weakness, if not paranoia, that he feels he needs to constantly overturn the apple cart," he said.

'This happens over and over again'

Miao's downfall comes less than a year after former defense minister Li Shangfu was removed from the CMC.

The powerful body had six members – all deemed as Xi's loyalists – serving under the top leader when he began his unprecedented third term two years ago. If Miao is also removed, it would leave two vacant seats.

Shih, the expert on Chinese elite politics, said many dictators, from former Soviet leader Joseph Stalin to Mao, have eventually turned against their own proteges.

"Once all of their real competitors are gone, a dictator can never think to themselves: 'Oh well, all the threats are gone. I can just relax.' Because they always think that new threats could emerge, including from people who once were very close to them. This happens over and over again," he said.

As a result, the dictator is always looking for increasingly subtle signs that someone is plotting against them, said Shih, the author of "Coalitions of the Weak," which examines Mao's hold on power in the late stage of his life.

During Mao's last years, he turned against Lin Biao, his longtime protege, former defense minister and heir apparent, accusing him of plotting a coup.

"This kind of dynamic will become increasingly severe as Xi Jinping gets older, as his health is not as robust as previously. His sensitivity to signs of potential challenge to his power will also become keener over time," Shih said.

For now, the top leader appears determined to carry on his crusade against corruption and disloyalty.

Earlier this month, Xi inspected the PLA's Information Support Force with his four remaining loyalists on the CMC.

"We must ensure the troops remain absolutely loyal, absolutely pure and absolutely reliable," Xi told an audience of note-taking officers.

Communist China: Weaponizing Buddhism and Erasing Tibet

14 December 2024, Tibetan Review, Tenzin Dorjee

Communist China has accelerated the weaponizing of Buddhism and erasing of Tibet. Organizing the 9th Nanhai (South China Sea) Buddhism Roundtable Conference in Lumbini over December 12-17, 2024 – as reported in the Tibetan Review and other news outlets – and persuading Nepal to allow China's Panchen Lama Gyaincain Norbu is an unfolding of China's action plans to fulfill this goal. Historically, China was a major Buddhist country; but since becoming communist, it has had no business organizing and participating in Buddhist conferences. Communist China is an enemy of all religions. The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) and its State Department's Annual reports have rated China as a "Country of Particular Concern" for systematically, egregiously, and continuously violating the freedom of religion or belief. Late Chairman Mao has famously said, "Religion is an opium."

Ample evidences indicate how Communist China has weaponized Buddhism to advance its political and social influence agenda. Two of its main activities today for this purpose are Sinicizing of all religions, especially calling for Buddhism with a socialist outlook, and controlling the reincarnation system of Tibetan Buddhism. China uses state-of-the-art technology to monitor religious freedom, religious ordination, religious administration, religious education, and religious activities in Tibet. Monks are required to undergo political education and Sinicize Buddhism as a means to accomplish Communist ends for both domestic purpose and with geo-political goals. China unashamedly uses Buddhism as a weapon and soft power tool to counteract India's power and expand its social influence on China-dependent, debt-ridden countries and beyond.

Buddhism originated in India and spread all over Asia. Tibetan Buddhism follows the systematic study, contemplation, and practice of the Nalanda Tradition and the sixteen Maha Pandits or preeminent Buddhist professors such as Arya Nagarjuna, Arya Asanga, Acharya Shantarakshita, Acharya Chandrakirti, Acharya Shantideva, and Great Atisha. Last year, the Government of India collaborated with the International Buddhist Confederation (IBC) to hold the first Asian Buddhist Summit in Delhi. But China stayed away because the Summit's goals did not fulfill its geopolitical ends. Prime Minister Modi-Ji and His Holiness the Dalai Lama addressed the summit on different days. Last November, the second Asian Buddhist Summit in Delhi focused on "the Role of Buddha Dharma Strengthening Asia." Again, China had no show.

China has also weaponized the Tibetan reincarnation system. Starting with the first Karmapa, Tibetan Buddhism's reincarnation system is unique. The two most prominent ones are the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama. China formulated in 2007 the State Religious Affairs Bureau's Order No. 5 to regulate the reincarnation system in Tibetan Buddhism. Under it China keeps a registry of so-called "Living Buddhas" that excluded the Dalai Lama and the real Panchen Lama.

When I chaired the USCIRF, I strongly advocated for the release of the Panchen Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, who was recognized as the 11th Panchen Lama by His Holiness the Dalai Lama. China abducted him and his family, and no one has heard about or seen in person the real Panchen Lama, who is now in his 30s. In his place, China's politically appointed Panchen Gyaincain Norbu and parades him across Tibet and abroad to gain legitimacy. China's latest attempt is to showcase him as the leader of Tibetan Buddhism and a symbol of religious freedom at the ongoing roundtable Buddhist conference in Nepal. China hates and despises the Dalai Lama, a global Buddhist icon, as a "wolf in monk's robes," while India hosts him as its honored guest.

China's game plan is to politically appoint a Tibetan boy as the 15th Dalai Lama in future. The Dalai Lama will only feel compassion for Chinese leaders for their ignorance, for only he can decide on his next reincarnation. In recent years, the Dalai Lama assured Tibetans and the world, at many long-life puja ceremonies offered to him, that he is healthy and plans to live over 100 and possibly 113, and there is no rush to discuss his reincarnation. He will leave no room for China or anybody else to play their agenda game with his reincarnation. When the time is right, he will speak unequivocally. The world will believe his words, not China's claim. Tibetans and Tibetan Buddhists firmly believe in him. They must stay united, follow his precise instructions, and do what is necessary.

Relatedly, China has been embarking on erasing Tibet and Tibetan identity. Tibet and Buddhism are metaphorically the two sides of the same coin, symbolizing Tibetans globally. Buddhism is the heartbeat and soul of Tibet as a nation. Tibet is stored in the memory of the world. Many United Nations experts have objected to China forcibly removing a million Tibetan children from their homes and confining them to boarding schools. China strategically plans to erase its Tibetan identity, language, culture, and faith. Across Tibet, China forbids Tibetan families from teaching their children about faith, worship, and practice.

Domestically, China has systematically, egregiously, and continuously used power, latest technology, and resources in its campaign to erase Tibetan identity. Globally, China wants to erase Tibet from peoples' minds and literature, forcibly introducing the Chinese label 'Xizang.' China officially mandated the use of Xizang for Tibet in their diplomatic relations and communication, both written and oral.

Professor Tsering Shakya wrote an insightful article entitled "Tibet Must Stand" on renaming Tibet as Xizang. According to the December 11 post on the SOAS's China Institute website (University of London), China has launched a two-year social influence campaign to coax "foreign businesses, publishers, and mapmakers to adopt the name "Xizang" in place of "Tibet." In the 1990s, China took to calling Tibet "China's Tibet", which paradoxically suggests Tibet is not China's. Incidentally, why doesn't China call Beijing "China's Beijing"?

Sinicizing Tibetan names does not grant the legitimacy of ownership. Professor Shakya rightly put it, "Internationally, the word "Tibet" has become a symbol of a unique identity with significant cultural "soft power," one which is now seen in China as evoking a sense of separateness that undermines Beijing's claim to the region. The Chinese campaign to enforce "Xizang" on foreign individuals and institutions invokes the moral high ground of decolonization while seeking to make the international community complicit in China's claims to sovereignty and its practices of cultural erasure. But the fact remains that the name "Tibet" is not a Western imposition but a term rooted in indigenous usage, dating from interactions between Tibetans and their neighbors over a millennium ago."

China is weaponizing Buddhism for geopolitical influence and a communist domination endgame. I hope Prime Minister Oli does not kowtow to China and turn Nepal into China's Nepal. China aims to reprogram the minds of people around the globe, erasing Tibet and accepting Xizang instead. China needs to develop and install chips into people's brains to succeed in erasing Tibet and replacing it with Xizang.

Tibet Under Pressure: China's Geopolitical Ambitions And Cultural Repression

14 December 2024, Bharat Shakti, Anukriti K

The human rights situation in Tibet is closely tied to broader political issues. The Chinese government views any expression of Tibetan nationalism or support for the Dalai Lama as threatening national unity and stability.

Editor's Note

China perceived the importance of Tibet and annexed it in the early 1950s. However, the Western world has yet to focus on Tibet and evolve a cohesive strategy to pursue the fruition of Tibetan aspirations. Tibet is critically important for the Chinese BRI project and its offshoot, the CPEC. Tibetans continue to battle Chinese pressures in multiple areas, including their cultural and religious identity and violation of human rights. The article examines multiple facets of Chinese repression and relates these to its belligerence in the region.

The relationship between China and Tibet is marked by deep and multifaceted complexities shaped by a rich interplay of historical, political, and cultural forces. These complexities have not only defined the region's demographic landscape but continue to influence Tibetans' lives and global geopolitics significantly. At the heart of this ongoing conflict are key literal and metaphorical fault lines centred around territorial disputes, forced cultural assimilation, human rights issues, and the quest for Tibetan autonomy.

Tibet And China

Tibet has a long history of autonomy, with a unique culture and Buddhist identity. Before the 20th century, it was a theocracy governed by the Dalai Lama, influenced by Buddhist principles. Tibet's relationship with China is complex, marked by periods of trade, diplomacy, and conflict, but Tibet often maintained independence, especially when China was weak.

During the Yuan (1271–1368) and Qing (1644–1911) dynasties, China had some influence, but Tibet largely managed its affairs and preserved its identity. Historians debate the extent of Tibetan autonomy during these periods, with some viewing Tibet as independent and others as under Chinese suzerainty. Following the collapse of the Qing Dynasty in 1911, Tibet declared independence in 1913 under the 13th Dalai Lama. Tibet operated as a de facto independent state for several decades, establishing diplomatic relations, issuing passports, and managing its government. However, China did not recognize Tibet's independence, continuing to assert its claim over the region and setting the stage for future tensions.

The Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) was officially incorporated into the People's Republic of China (PRC) in the 1950s after a military invasion by Chinese forces. Since then, Tibet has been under Chinese rule, but the question of Tibet's autonomy remains a thorn in Sino-Tibetan relations. Tibet's spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, fled into exile in India in 1959 following a failed uprising against Chinese authority. The situation has since been characterized by resistance movements, both peaceful and violent, from Tibetans who seek greater independence or autonomy.

At the heart of the conflict lies the territorial dispute. Tibet, a vast plateau on the northern edge of the Indian subcontinent, is rich in natural resources such as water, minerals, and geo-strategic importance. For China, Tibet's integration is a driver for its national unity and economic and military security. The region's role as the headwaters of several major rivers, including the Yangtze and the Mekong, further complicates the issue as downstream countries like India, Vietnam, and Laos rely heavily on water flow from Tibetan glaciers and rivers.

Cultural Assimilation And Identity Struggles

China has long propounded "ethnic harmony" and integration, but Tibetans argue these policies undermine their distinct cultural and religious identity. The Chinese government's push for cultural and political integration, known as 'Sinicization,' has led to the destruction of Tibetan Buddhist institutions, restrictions on religious practices, and an influx of Han Chinese settlers. Tibetans fear that their traditional way of life, religion, and language are under threat.

Tibetan Buddhism, a core part of Tibetan identity, has been a significant point of tension. The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has implemented policies to limit religious influence, resulting in the destruction of monasteries, imprisonment of monks and nuns, and tight control over religious practices.

A key issue is the Chinese government's interference in selecting Tibetan religious leaders. In 1995, when the Dalai Lama recognized Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama, China rejected this choice and installed its candidate. Nyima has been missing since then, with his whereabouts unknown, drawing international criticism of China's policies in Tibet.

Self-immolation protests by Tibetans, especially monks and nuns, have become a powerful tool of resistance against cultural and religious repression. These acts have drawn global attention, though China cruelly dismisses them as acts of terrorism and blames "anti-China" forces for escalating tensions.

The imposition of Mandarin in schools and the economic marginalization of Tibetans contribute to growing alienation. Tibetan culture, deeply connected to Buddhism and its traditions, faces increasing pressure under Chinese policies. Many Tibetans see it as an attempt to erase their identity and integrate them into a Han-dominated society. The Chinese government defends these policies as essential for development, modernization, and national unity.

The Question Of Autonomy

The Chinese government claims that Tibet enjoys a high degree of autonomy under the "one country, two systems" model, which is also applied to regions like Hong Kong and Macau. However, in practice, Tibetans argue that their autonomy is severely limited. The Chinese government maintains tight control over political appointments, the economy, and security in Tibet. Policies are dictated by the central government in Beijing, with little input from local Tibetan leaders.

The lack of genuine political autonomy is a major source of frustration for Tibetans, who feel that the Chinese government does not adequately represent their interests. Beijing's emphasis on economic development in Tibet, including large-scale infrastructure projects like the Qinghai-Tibet Railway, is often portrayed as a solution to Tibet's grievances. However, many Tibetans feel that these projects primarily benefit Han Chinese migrants and contribute to the erosion of Tibetan culture and the environment.

Human Rights Concerns

Human rights organizations and governments globally have regularly criticized China's policies in Tibet as well as in Xinjiang. Allegations of forced labour, arbitrary detention, torture, and the suppression of free speech are widespread. Tibetans, particularly those in rural areas, face strict surveillance, and the Chinese government monitors their religious practices. The ongoing crackdowns on Tibetan protests, including the 2008 riots in Lhasa, serve as stark reminders of the extent to which China is willing to go to maintain control.

The human rights situation in Tibet is closely tied to broader political issues. The Chinese government views any expression of Tibetan nationalism or support for the Dalai Lama as threatening national unity and stability. As a result, dissent is met with harsh repression, and even peaceful protests are often labelled as acts of separatism. The use of invasive surveillance, including the deployment of advanced technologies like facial recognition, has further restricted Tibetans' ability to express their political and cultural identity.

The Dalai Lama Issue

The Dalai Lama remains a powerful symbol of Tibetan resistance and identity despite living in exile since 1959. He has long advocated for the "Middle Way" approach, which seeks genuine autonomy for Tibet within the framework of the Chinese state rather than outright independence. However, the Chinese government has consistently rejected negotiations with the Dalai Lama, labelling him a separatist.

The Tibetan diaspora, particularly in India, strongly advocates Tibetan autonomy and human rights through organizations like the Tibetan Youth Congress and the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), which calls for Tibet's return to autonomy within China while preserving its cultural and political rights.

Many younger Tibetans, who have grown up in exile and experienced the limitations of their political status, are more inclined to demand full independence rather than compromise on autonomy. This generational divide adds another layer of complexity to the already fraught Tibet-China relationship.

International Implications and Global Response

The Tibet issue is not confined to Sino-Tibetan relations; it has significant international dimensions. Tibet's political and environmental stability directly impacts countries like India, Nepal, and Bhutan. India, which shares a long border with Tibet, has a large Tibetan exile community and has been a consistent critic of China's policies in Tibet. The U.S., European Union, and human rights organizations have repeatedly called for improved human rights conditions in Tibet and the resumption of dialogue between the Chinese government and Tibetan representatives.

Another aspect of the tension in Tibet and China is the geopolitical rivalry between China and India. India has hosted the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan exile community since 1959, which has long been a source of tension between the two countries, as Beijing views India's support as interference in its internal affairs. Meanwhile, India sees China's actions in Tibet as part of a broader assertiveness in the region. The border dispute between the two countries, particularly over Arunachal Pradesh, which China claims as part of Tibet, further complicates the relationship, with Tibet serving as a key leverage point in their ongoing geopolitical competition.

China's growing economic and geopolitical power has created a challenging environment for international actors to engage in Tibet-related issues. The Chinese government has been adept at suppressing international support for Tibetan autonomy by exerting economic and political pressure on countries and international institutions.

China's growing presence and expansion in the South China Sea have irked the neighbouring Southeast Asian countries concerned about territorial disputes and maritime security. This stance has further complicated diplomatic ties with European and American nations, who see China's action as challenging international laws and regional stability. Hence, the situation has heightened geopolitical tensions and triggered a global backlash against China.

While the Chinese government continues to assert its authority over Tibet, calling it a 'core interest' in its territorial integrity, Tibetans continue to seek greater autonomy and recognition of their cultural identity. As these fault lines persist, the international community remains divided on how best to approach the Tibet issue, balancing respect for China's sovereignty with the rights and aspirations of the Tibetan people. Until these underlying tensions are addressed, the China-Tibet fault lines will likely remain a key feature of the region's complex and contested history.

Jaishankar: Finding balance with China complex as both nations evolve

16 December 2024, The Indian Express, Divya A

At magazine launch, External Affairs Minister discusses India's changing relationships with major powers

Accepting that equation is "very complex", External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar on Sunday said it is in the interest of both India and China to find an equilibrium, and emphasised that India's economic trajectory will put a premium on its ties with countries like Russia and Canada.

During a discussion with C Raja Mohan, Contributing Editor, The Indian Express, at the launch of foreign policy magazine 'India's World', in New Delhi, which was attended by Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri, Jaishankar said, "Eventually, it's in the interest of both India and China to reach an equilibrium. Conceptually, it's difficult to do because both are changing in absolute terms and vis-a-vis the world."

"The world is changing, they (India and China) are changing, their relationship with the world is changing and their relationship with each other is also changing. In all these changes, how do you find equilibrium? It's not going to be easy," he said, responding to a question on India's relationship with China and how the two big Asian neighbours can co-exist peacefully.

Referring to the issues along the LAC, he said, "We are still grappling with the short term (issue), which is to focus on de-escalation. While disengagement has been worked out, there are other issues which confront us." In October this year, India and China reached an agreement on patrolling arrangements.

On India's ties with Russia, despite pushback from the West in the wake of the Ukraine war, he said Russia is a very unique aspect of India's foreign policy and a "major power globally, and certainly in Eurasia, it is something more than that". He stressed that "in International Relations 101, your neighbour's neighbour has an enormous value."

"Today, India is finding new convergences and intersections. A country like India at this stage of its growth, the resource powers of the world have to be our major partners," he said.

"India's economic trajectory will put some premium on (its ties with) countries like Russia, Indonesia, Australia, or even Canada," he said, adding, "It's a new compulsion and new rationalisation of who our partners would be."

Though he didn't mention how India aims to navigate its ties with the US under President-elect Donald Trump, he said, "As part of our relationship with the US, we have very honest conversations on where we agree and where we don't", adding that the India-US ties is "large and important".

Jaishankar underlined that Europe is an important partner in terms of many of the key concerns – supply chains, AI, semiconductors and digital exchanges. "There is a broad intersection which needs to be built upon," he said.

How India's soft power led to a border deal with China

The template set by New Delhi balances diplomacy, dialogue and deterrence

Recent events reveal India's success in securing concessions from China.

Ending a four-year hiatus, Chinese leader Xi Jinping and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi resumed a structured dialogue at the BRICS Summit in Kazan, Russia, in October – after having held only unscheduled interactions since the 2020 Galwan Valley incident in which the Chinese and Indian armies clashed over the disputed border that divides them.

This seems to have been an opportune moment for the Chinese leadership to disengage its forces from territorial friction points and for India to resume border patrols, with both returning to pre-Galwan Valley incident positions.

Several strategic factors put pressure on China to change its stance. These included the holding of the BRICS summit with the possibility that Xi and Modi would not agree on some of the key points, the prospect that the American election would usher in a new administration with an unpredictable foreign policy and growing challenges in the Indo-Pacific.

In Kazan, Xi even stressed that India and China should work together as partners and not competitors and see the relationship as an opportunity for development, rather than a threat.

This contrasts sharply with Beijing's assertive stance in the South China Sea, where it continues to reiterate its claim over Taiwan and adopt an aggressive posture toward the Philippines and other states. Notably, Xi has repeatedly urged China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) to prepare for war.

On the contrary, India's emphasis on diplomacy and dialogue led to conciliation with Beijing, creating a useful template for other countries embroiled in territorial disputes with China.

For decades, India and China have been locked in a confrontation centered on the 3,488 km-long border they share, known as the Line of Actual Control (LAC). Despite India's repeated efforts to resolve the issue, the dispute remains, creating a volatile situation often marked by displays of military force, face-offs and even casualties.

The genesis of the disagreement can be traced back to postcolonial times. After India gained independence from the British in 1947 and the Communists won control of China in 1949, both nations initially sought cooperation. However, the 1962 war, initiated by Beijing, severely damaged bilateral relations, which remained strained for decades.

In 1989, following the Tiananmen Square crackdown, China faced global isolation. To repair its international image and avoid further estrangement, Beijing engaged with India and signed several confidence-building agreements in the decade starting from 1993 to maintain peace along the LAC and with the ultimate goal of resolving the border dispute.

However, Xi's rise to power marked a decided shift. With the launch of the Belt and Road initiative (BRI) in 2013, Beijing sought to position itself as the leader of a China-centric order in Asia, encouraging India to align with its vision while sidelining the United States. New Delhi rejected this, particularly due to the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, a flagship BRI project passing through Pakistan-administered Kashmir, which India regards as its territory. In response, China adopted a more aggressive posture along the LAC, attempting to dissuade India from supporting U.S.-led initiatives such as the construction of the Indo-Pacific as a geostrategic region and the "Quad" security dialogue comprising India, the U.S., Japan and Australia.

A turning point occurred in 2017, when China began constructing a road in Doklam, a disputed territory between China and Bhutan overlooking India's strategic Siliguri Corridor, a stretch of land in West Bengal state.

Indian troops crossed the LAC for the first time to prevent the construction, resulting in a 73-day standoff with the PLA. Under Modi, India demonstrated its resolve to counter Chinese pressure and its unwillingness to compromise on territorial integrity. This display of strength enhanced India's reputation as a credible regional counterbalance to China, encouraging other countries engaged in disputes with Beijing to view New Delhi as a reliable partner.

These dynamics did not augur well for the Chinese leadership, which escalated tensions and skirmishes along different sectors of the LAC, ultimately culminating in the June 2020 Galwan Valley clash.

New Delhi accused Beijing of building bunkers and obstructing the Indian army's movements over the territory it claims. The confrontation resulted in the death of 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers – killings that hardened India's stance, with Modi asserting that the Indian soldiers' sacrifice would not go in vain and that the government would give a befitting reply, if provoked.

The two countries signed an agreement in February 2021 for complete troop disengagement and verification. However, a deep trust deficit persisted as they were unable to resolve all friction points and Chinese forces blocked Indian troops at key strategic nodes, thus limiting India's patrolling abilities and access, for example to its Daulat Beg Oldi air base.

Rather than acquiescing to China's aggressive overtures and reacting to Xi's call for the PLA to prepare for war, India opted for a soft power approach. As well as engaging China through dialogue and diplomacy, New Delhi deepened its ties with Quad members to support a rules-based order leading to free and open Indo-Pacific – one that China intends to alter, even resorting to force. India's joint military exercises with Japan and Australia are a case in point.

In addition, India strengthened its historic partnership with Russia, China's key ally, by continuing its trade with Moscow despite Western sanctions, creating a scenario in which Russia would not be inclined to support China at the cost of compromising its ties to India.

In parallel, New Delhi also deepened relations with Washington, China's key adversary, by signing four foundational security agreements and another for priority delivery of defense items, boosting military interoperability between the two countries. India also reaffirmed its commitment to the central role of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations.

Taken together, all these measures boosted India's strategic heft and reinforced its position as a formidable peer competitor, allowing it to negotiate with China from a position of strength.

Simultaneously, China has faced mounting challenges, including growing tensions over Taiwan, ASEAN's pushback in the South China Sea, the AUKUS security agreement between Australia, the U.S. and the United Kingdom, and Japan's shift to collective defense. Coupled with an economic slowdown, these pressures have left Beijing in a precarious position in recalibrating its approach to India.

Pushing India too hard would risk driving it closer to the U.S. and Quad. Witnessing India's economy grow faster than China's and New Delhi's increasing influence in the region, the Chinese leadership opted for addressing the border dispute and recognizing India as a peer competitor, rather than an adversary. A major achievement for India was to make China withdraw from disputed territory — China's occupation of this land was exposed to the wider world and the retreat suggests that the territory occupied by the PLA does not belong to China.

Securing these concessions without resorting to military action marked a moral victory for New Delhi and implies that other territorial disputes in the Indo-Pacific can be resolved through a soft power approach. India has created a template based on dialogue and diplomacy while carving itself a credible position of regional deterrence.

Guest Opinion: The truth about Xinjiang and its Uygur population

The reality in Xinjiang is a different story with multiple dimensions. It involves efforts to combat extremism, preserve national unity, and promote economic development.

Western governments and media, particularly in the United States, have persisted with a years-long smear campaign targeting China over issues related to Xinjiang.

However, their claims often lack proper context and are based on false information intended to undermine China's growing influence on the global stage.

The reality in Xinjiang is a different story with multiple dimensions. It involves efforts to combat extremism, preserve national unity, and promote economic development.

The 6th World Media Summit recently took place in Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang. Given the recurring negative coverage of Xinjiang in Western media, it was time for us, media practitioners from around the world, to witness firsthand what life is truly like for the Uygurs, one of 55 ethnic minorities in China. Our goal was to see for ourselves whether the human rights abuses claimed by Western leaders and media hold any truth.

DERADICALIZATION AND WESTERN INTERVENTIONS

From the early 1990s to mid-2010s, Xinjiang faced a surge in radicalization, leading to deadly terrorist attacks targeting civilians.

Notable incidents include the Urumqi riots in 2009 and Kunming railway station attack in 2014, resulting in hundreds of fatalities and even more injuries. These were the works of radical separatists who sought destabilization and secession.

In response, the Chinese government launched comprehensive counterterrorism initiatives, ranging from a law-based campaign against terrorists to a vocational training program to deradicalize individuals influenced by extremism. The latter combined vocational training, legal education, and cultural integration to address the underlying causes of radicalization.

The separatist movement in Xinjiang has not been a purely internal issue. There is growing evidence that Western countries have had a hand in encouraging separatism in Xinjiang as part of a broader strategy to destabilize China.

The United States has long considered China an economic rival, and any attempt to weaken China internally serves its geopolitical interests.

By fabricating and amplifying accusations of human rights abuses, some Western governments aim to tarnish China's international image, hoping to slow its economic ascent.

These actions align with a broader history of Western interventions designed to disrupt political stability in regions critical to their global dominance.

The persistent campaign of disinformation against China, particularly regarding Xinjiang, is part of a larger strategy by Western countries to contain China's rise.

Western countries have become increasingly alarmed by the prospect of losing nearly two centuries of global dominance.

By painting China as a human rights abuser, Western governments and media outlets seek to rally international opinion against China.

However, this narrative often ignores China's work in lifting more than 800 million people out of poverty over the past decades, improving living standards, and maintaining social harmony throughout the country, including in Xinjiang.

PROSPERITY TODAY

Despite these challenges, Xinjiang is a flourishing and multicultural region where Uygurs live peacefully alongside other ethnic groups.

Far from the image painted by some media outlets, Xinjiang has experienced rapid development in recent years. Its gross domestic product has grown significantly, reaching over 1.9 trillion yuan (approximately 260 billion dollars) in 2023.

Xinjiang is also a crucial part of the Belt and Road Initiative, which has attracted foreign investment and made the region a hub for international trade.

Moreover, the claim that Uygurs cannot practice their religion is false.

We visited the Xinjiang Islamic Institute in Urumqi, which trains over 1,000 students. Imam Abdurraqib Turmuniyaz greeted us and explained that the school was created to allow Muslim boys in Xinjiang to deepen their knowledge of Islam while preparing them for leadership roles in China's mosques.

Established in the early 1980s, it reflects the Chinese government's efforts to support and regulate Islamic education. Its facilities include a canteen, mosque, library, and gym.

The Xinjiang Islamic Institute also has eight branches across the region, including in Hotan, Aksu, and Kashgar, with about 3,000 students.

Imam Abdurraqib Turmuniyaz emphasized that religious freedom is fully protected in China, especially in Xinjiang. The institute's mission is to educate rather than confine students. This institution is a key part of China's efforts to promote Islamic education in a structured and modern environment.

Xinjiang is a region that once faced serious challenges with extremism and separatism but has overcome these obstacles through development, education, and integration.

The Uygur people practice religion freely and benefit from the region's rapid economic growth. During our visit to a car manufacturing plant in Xinjiang, we saw Uygurs working alongside colleagues of other ethnic groups.

Uygurs are present in all works of life, from restaurants and coffee shops to construction companies, the service sector, and even military service. Some have also gained prominence as models in China's booming fashion industry, showcasing the diverse opportunities available to them across the country.

The broader campaign of disinformation against China, spearheaded by the West, is less about human rights and more about maintaining global hegemony.

As China continues to rise on the world stage, the truth about Xinjiang is clear. It is a region of peace, prosperity, and promise, no matter what the detractors say.

Why Nepal's 'one China' stand matters to PRC

13 December 2024, Taipei Times, Rishi Gupta

Nepalese Prime Minister K.P. Sharma Oli's first foreign visit to China from Monday to Thursday last week made major headlines in the media. It is seen as a break from tradition, as Oli chose China over India, signaling a significant shift in Nepal's diplomatic outlook. As a landlocked nation, Nepal's geopolitics has always been shaped by the dominant influence of its southern neighbor, India, and the rising power to its north, China, but by choosing Beijing, is Oli charting a new course or walking into a well-laid trap?

The visit carried immense symbolic weight, mainly because Oli was known for his pro-China stance, which largely defined his politics. By signing deals like the Belt and Road Initiative, Oli wants to redefine Nepal's reliance on India and balance it with China. However, Nepal's lack of bargaining with China led to Beijing dominating the outcomes and securing greater security cooperation. At the same time, Nepal sidestepped thornier issues, such as Beijing's alleged encroachments on Nepalese territory.

The joint statement issued after Oli's meetings with Chinese President Xi Jinping (習近平), Chinese Premier Li Qiang (李強) and Chinese National People's Congress Standing Committee Chairman Zhao Leji (趙樂際) was a classic case of Chinese insecurities vis-a-vis Nepal. It mainly sought Kathmandu's reaffirmation of the "one China principle."

"Nepal reaffirmed its firm commitment to the one China principle, recognizing that the Government of the People's Republic of China is the sole legal government representing the whole of China and Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory. Nepal firmly supports China's efforts to achieve its national reunification and opposes Taiwan independence," the statement said.

Besides Taiwan, Nepal also reiterated that "Xizang [Tibetan] affairs are internal affairs of China and that it will never allow any separatist activities against China on Nepal's soil."

Beijing's focus on Nepal's assurances regarding Tibet remains central to its Nepal policy, given their shared historical border and Nepal's role as a key transit point for Tibetans seeking refuge with the Tibetan government-in-exile in Dharamsala, India.

For China, Tibetan refugees in Nepal pose a threat to stability in Tibet, particularly as third countries such as the US continue to criticize Beijing's human rights record. In the 1950s and 1960s, Nepal was at the heart of CIA operations to train Tibetans fighting against the communist regime in Lhasa.

So why is Nepal's commitment to the so-called "one China principle" so critical for Beijing?

Simply put, Nepal's strategic position makes it indispensable. Beijing fears that Tibetan refugees in Nepal, already resisting Chinese oppression, could also align with Taiwan's cause, amplifying dissent against its territorial claims. Beijing also fears that third countries might use Nepal against its interests.

While Oli's visit was a success for China, it was more symbolic for Nepal. Oli signed a Belt and Road Initiative framework agreement in which China agreed to fund projects under "aid assistance financing" – a mutually agreed-upon term.

However, this is not an outcome that Oli's coalition partner in the government, the Nepali Congress, expected. Oli was supposed to press China to be more generous in carrying out development works by offering more aid and assistance than loans, but the devil lies in the details. With the specifics of the framework agreement veiled in secrecy, particularly regarding "aid assistance financing" and other terms, Nepal must tread cautiously. China's stance is clear – no funds leave Beijing without strings attached.

However, what stands out is the contrast with the US' Millennium Challenge Corp, which is offering a US$500 million grant to Nepal for infrastructure development.

Beijing has called Millennium Challenge Corp a "trojan horse" that is against Chinese interests. However, unlike the Belt and Road Initiative, its financial and contractual details are easily accessible to the public – a transparency that bolsters its credibility.

At the same time, Beijing finds ways to promote a shared vision of sovereignty and strategic independence, aiming to counterbalance India's traditional influence, but this narrative often falls short when reports of Beijing's "salami-slicing" tactics make headlines.

The New York Times in October in a report titled "China's 'New Great Wall' Casts a Shadow on Nepal" revealed how China's infrastructure projects encroach on Nepalese land near the border.

In conclusion, smaller South Asian nations, including Nepal, face the challenge of navigating China's strategic ambitions, often serving Beijing's interests more than their own. Political parties with a pro-China stance must prioritize national interests and remain vigilant about China's broader strategic goals to avoid long-term compromises.

Dam Construction in Tibet Threatens Local Communities and Environment

13 December 2024, China Digital Times, Arthur Kaufman

Infrastructure projects in Tibet have often drawn controversy for failing to balance development, human rights, and environmental protection. As CDT has covered this year, state-sponsored hydropower projects have forcibly displaced local communities and led to violent reprisals against protesters. A series of recent reports expand on this topic to highlight the social and environmental perils of these projects. Last week, the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) published a report titled, "Chinese Hydropower: Damning Tibet's Culture, Community, and Environment." The report includes an interactive map showing the location of 193 hydropower dams constructed or proposed in Tibet since 2000, along with their areas of impact and proximity to locations of cultural importance, protected areas, and land cover. The report reveals that these dam projects are causing "irreparable damage" to Tibetan communities, downstream countries, and the environment:

If completed, 1.2 million residents living nearby dam projects could be dislocated from their homes, communities, and livelihoods. Religious and sacred sites serving communities will also be destroyed.

Almost 80 per cent of dams studied are large or mega dams (>100MW), which carry the most significant risk to the Tibetan civilization, environmental sustainability, and the climate. However, over half the dams (60%) are either in proposal or preparation stage, presenting opportunities to change course.

A truly sustainable pathway for the energy plan must account for the climate, social, environment, and geopolitical costs of hydropower and change course. No plan is sustainable without the consent, participation and co-management of local communities.

Tibetans, who remain among the most politically marginalized in China, should not bear the highest cost to power China's industrial centers. Any long-term solution must involve a political solution where Tibetan people enjoy the right to freely decide how their natural resources are used. This begins with the PRC entering into a meaningful dialogue with representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. [Source]

Speaking to French newspaper Libération about the report, ICT researcher and advocacy officer Tenzin Palmo stated, "We wanted to show what was happening in this inaccessible border area in the west of the country, but also to reveal the projects of the Chinese authorities who are trying by all means to hide information, to harass civil society, all while engaging in a greenwashing operation around these dams." Other groups have provided related evidence. Last month, Turquoise Roof and Tibet Watch published a report titled, "The risks of China's dangerous dam-building in Tibet: the impacts of China's move upstream on the Machu/Yellow River," which highlighted the threat of geological disasters and environmental problems:

For the first time, China's construction of hydropower dams is reaching upstream to the sources of Asia's great wild rivers in Tibet, with at least three major new dams on the upper Machu (Chinese: Huang He) river. Chinese scientists have warned of the risks of heavy infrastructure construction in a seismically unstable region where river systems are increasingly unpredictable due to climate change.

[...] While China can point to its solar and hydro projects in Tibet to signal a green transition, the smart grid is currently orientated to fossil fuels, which may reveal a slower, less substantial shift than these projects imply. Although hydroelectric power is technically renewable, the large-scale hydropower projects underway in Tibet have complex environmental and social impacts, including ecosystem disruption and displacement of communities.

The first major dam to be built upriver on the Machu, the Yangkhil (Yangqu) hydropower station, has devastated an entire community. Accounts and images from eyewitnesses in this report documents how Tibetans have been compelled to dismantle their own homes and an important monastery has been emptied and destroyed. China removed the monastery from a protected heritage list before beginning demolition to make way for a dam that Chinese engineers boast is constructed by AI-driven robots. [Source]

In the Made in China Journal last month, James Leibold wrote about the Tibet-Aid Project, which he describes as a CCP initiative that pairs Tibet's administrative units with inland government actors in order to extend Beijing's settler-colonial enterprise and fortify Han dominance in the region. Among the Tibet-Aid cadres championed in CCP propaganda are Han engineers committed to transforming Tibet's physical landscape through "civilizing" infrastructure projects. Leibold argued, "By unleashing a new legion of Han officials and settlers on to the Tibetan Plateau, Xi seeks to complete the discursive, demographic, and cultural integration of Tibet into a new Han empire." In this excerpt, he describes how Han migration and infrastructure-building erode local Tibetan sovereignty:

Most of the Han people living and working in Tibet today are descendants of former Tibet-Aid cadres. In a recent survey of 300-plus Han retirees who had worked in Tibet, 49 per cent had a parent who had previously worked in Tibet, with one-quarter of those born in Tibet (Zhou and Du 2023: 83). They are called 'second' or 'third-generation Tibetans' (藏二代 or 藏三代) in Chinese and now make up the backbone of the party-state's governing and economic apparatuses in the region. According to officials, they are the 'strongest source of strength' for forging what Xi Jinping has called the 'collective consciousness' (共同体意识) of the Han-centric nation/race (Thondup and Tstring 2023). By claiming Tibetan identity, albeit an altered one, Han migrants are engaging in a common settler-colonial strategy—what Lorenzo Veracini (2010: 46) calls the discursive erasure of 'indigenous specific alterity'.

Han colonists live a highly fluid existence in the TAR and their roots are impermanent. Due to health concerns, they split their time between apartments in lower-elevation cities, chiefly in Sichuan, and their posts on the plateau. China's mega-infrastructure building in the TAR—roads, airports, railways, power and telecommunication lines, etcetera—serves as conduits for Han mobility, allowing colonial subjects to move more comfortably and smoothly through 'harsh' Tibetan spaces while imprinting the landscape with Han norms that ultimately efface Tibetan sovereignty. The 1,629-kilometre Chengdu-to-Lhasa high-speed railway is of 'immense strategic value', a 2018 blog post asserts, as it will not only facilitate military logistics, but also allow the vibrant economy and Han-dominated population of the Sichuan Basin to 'more easily spread and radiate into the Tibet region' when it is completed in 2030 (Sohu 2018). [Source]

Similar dynamics are playing out in other borderland regions, such as Xinjiang and Inner Mongolia. In an article for Atmos, Nithin Coca and Patrick Wack described how state-affiliated energy companies have built massive solar plants in Xinjiang that greenwash rights abuses against local Uyghur communities. Uyghur activists argue that these projects are part of longstanding efforts to Sinicize the region and exploit its resources while further colonizing their homeland through Han migration. This also plays out in the realm of Tibetan language politics, as the Chinese government has imposed Sinicization policies to force Tibetans to use Mandarin instead of their local languages. For more on this topic, see CDT's recent interview with Gerald Roche about the erasure of Tibet's minority languages, which face unique challenges in the face of both Mandarin and Standard Tibetan. ## Pakistan Ditches 'Iron Brother' China, Reaches Out to US for Financial Rescue

13 December 2024, Republic World, Yuvraj Tyagi

The phrase "Fool me once, shame on you; fool me twice, shame on me" perfectly encapsulates China's predicament with its so-called "Iron Brother," Pakistan.

The phrase "Fool me once, shame on you; fool me twice, shame on me" perfectly encapsulates China's predicament with its so-called "Iron Brother," Pakistan. Despite Beijing's heavy financial investments exceeding $67.2 billion since 2000, Pakistan has chosen to pursue its age-old flirtation with the United States, discarding China like a used pawn in the global chessboard of geopolitics.

Pakistan's thankless attitude towards China is no secret. Whether it was the blatant preference for US-made weapons expressed by former COAS General Qamar Javed Bajwa in April 2022 or the unapologetic remarks of current CJCS General Sahir Shamshad Mirza claiming Pak-China ties were borne of "compulsion," Pakistan has made its disdain for Chinese dominance quite clear. Adding insult to injury, the country has been brazenly vocal about its desire to rekindle ties with the US, conveniently forgetting China's lifeline in the form of loans and infrastructural projects.

The Decline of a Pawn

Pakistan, once a proud US ally during the Cold War, has found itself teetering on the edge of irrelevance. Decades of milking Western military aid to counter India under the guise of crisis diplomacy worked only until China's rise. The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), touted as a "game-changer," has left Pakistan with mounting debts and dwindling autonomy. Over 72% of Pakistan's external debt is owed to China, rendering it a vassal state to Beijing's expansionist ambitions.

Unsurprisingly, Pakistan is now desperate to curry favour with the US once again. In a telling display of loyalty, US Assistant Secretary of State Donald Lu remarked in July 2024, "China is the past investment; we (the US) are the future." True to its character, Pakistan offered no clarification, leaving Beijing to stew in its humiliation. This is the same Pakistan that stayed silent during Nancy Pelosi's provocative visit to Taiwan in 2022 and leaked sensitive memos in 2023 advising PM Shehbaz Sharif to avoid appeasing the West.

Pakistan's Lust for the West is rooted in history and economic logic:

1. It was a loyal member of US-led anti-Communist alliances like SEATO and CENTO.
2. It enjoys a trade surplus of $5.4 billion with the US while suffering a $15 billion deficit with China.

3. The English-speaking middle class, raised in Western media, identifies more with the US culturally than with China.
4. Pakistan's population is increasingly wary of China's expansionist tendencies and exploitation of its resources.

Pakistan's duplicity reached new heights in August 2023 when it revived a Communications Interoperability and Security Memo of Agreement (CIS-MOA) with the US, effectively opening doors for American military hardware. Pakistan also embarrassed China by reducing orders for Chinese military equipment, including the VT-4 tanks and SH-15 artillery guns, right after the CIS-MOA agreement.

Even more damning, Pakistan hosted US officials at Gwadar Port in September 2023, a move that could result in the strategic port being handed to the US—an act of treachery for a country that owes its survival to Chinese investments.

Chinese Frustration and Growing Assertiveness

China, on the other hand, finds itself in a lose-lose situation. Increasing attacks on CPEC projects, like the March 2024 assault on a Chinese convoy at Besham, have pushed Beijing to consider deploying its security forces in Pakistan—a move that would strip the Pakistani Army of its “macho” image. Resentment against the Chinese presence is palpable among Pakistan's elites, with even Punjab CM Maryam Nawaz openly criticizing Chinese security protocols. True to its duplicitous nature, Pakistan has now launched “Operation Azam-e-Istehkam,” a repackaged counter-terrorism operation aimed at placating China. The ulterior motive, however, is clear: keep the internal security situation volatile to extract financial aid from both China and the US, all while hoping to rebuild its military to match India's growing might.

The Joke's on China

While Pakistan continues to juggle its loyalties, Beijing is left to wonder why its billions have failed to buy gratitude. The so-called “Iron Brother” has turned into a rusted liability, and as Pakistan places its eggs back in the US basket, it's evident that China's dream of a compliant ally is nothing more than a pipe dream.

In the end, Pakistan's double-dealing may win it temporary rewards, but its long-term trajectory remains that of a parasitic state, surviving by selling out its sovereignty to the highest bidder. If China thought it could tame Pakistan, it was sorely mistaken.

Nepal blocking China's Panchen Lama visit is rare resistance. It's not enough

13 December 2024, The Print, Rishi Gupta

Beijing has been pushing to introduce a Chinese version of Buddhism in Nepal, the same way it is reshaping Tibetan identity through State-controlled narratives.

Representative Image | Thousands of Buddhists, monks celebrate Gautam Buddha's 2568th birth anniversary in Lumbini | ANI

In a rare display of unified resistance, Nepal's government agencies have reportedly united to block the China-appointed Panchen Lama, Gyaincain Norbu's entry. Widely seen as Beijing's puppet to undermine Tibetan spiritual traditions, this move could mark China's most significant diplomatic setbacks in influencing the Tibetan diaspora. How did Nepal pull off this act, and why is it so crucial for China to send Norbu in the first place?

Reports of the controversial Panchen Lama, handpicked by the Communist Party of China to become the so-called spiritual successor of the 14th Dalai Lama living in exile in India, was expected to visit Nepal to attend the ongoing Nanhai Buddhism Roundtable in Lumbini. It's the birthplace of Lord Buddha—located closer to the Nepal-India border. Because of the sensitivities involved, including that of India, Nepal has reportedly conveyed to the Chinese Embassy that the Panchen Lama would not be welcomed due to “Nepal's neutrality on religious matters”—reported the Kathmandu Post.

Norbu was reportedly expected to travel from China's Chengdu city to Lumbini on a chartered flight, alerting the country's security establishment. Nepalese agencies, including the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ministry of Culture, Tourism, and Civil Aviation, and the Lumbini Development Trust, have reportedly disclosed details of the Panchen Lama's visit to the media. This act highlights China's enduring effort to promote a Sinicised version of Tibetan Buddhism and supplant the 14th Dalai Lama.

Crucial timing

Beijing's attempt to send Norbu to Nepal comes in the backdrop of Prime Minister KP Oli's recently concluded four-day visit to China, where he signed a Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) Framework Agreement. The latter has been in storage since it was first signed in May 2017 due to its controversial financial modality, which remains a State secret. Although the two sides are reported to have mutually agreed to an "aid financing modality" for BRI projects, the devil lies in the details hidden from the public view. With Nepal wanting 100 per cent aid from China for the BRI projects and China giving no freebies to anyone as high-interest loans enable it to manage greater influence, the future of BRI is uncertain in Nepal.

However, during this trip, Nepal reiterated, "Xizang [Tibetan] affairs are internal affairs of China and that it will never allow any separatist activities against China on Nepal's soil." This was the first time that China referred to Tibet as Xizang, indicating a Communist quest to wipe out Tibet's socio-cultural, traditional and territorial identity. While Nepal has acknowledged "China as the sole authority in Tibet" since the foundation of bilateral ties in 1955, Kathmandu has largely avoided Beijing's attempts to export its version of Tibetan Buddhism.

Dalai Lama's Legacy

Why would China seek to introduce its Panchen Lama in Nepal? Simply to gain external validation for its agenda to reshape Tibetan Buddhism under Chinese influence. By presenting the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama on an international platform, Beijing aims to legitimise his authority, despite rejection by the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan administration-in-exile.

This strategy not only seeks to undermine the standing of the Dalai Lama and the traditional Tibetan Buddhist hierarchy but also to tackle global support for the exiled Tibetan community and leadership. Additionally, it serves to tighten control over the Tibetan diaspora, curbing their cultural and spiritual ties to the Dalai Lama's lineage.

With Tibet at the heart of China's Nepal policy, Beijing has been trying to break the unity and support for the 'Free Tibet' movement among Tibetans in Nepal. Such movements have more than often triggered instability in Tibet, posing a security challenge to the PLA. For example, the seeds of the 2008 Tibetan Uprising in Lhasa found a strong echo in Nepal, where Tibetan refugees stood up against the Chinese brutalities in Tibet. Even the most powerful resistance movements, such as the CIA-backed Khampa Rebellion were planned and executed from the Nepal border with Tibet in the late 1960s. Since then, China has pressured Nepal to curtail the freedom of Tibetan exiles, but international support and human rights organisations have managed to defy this pressure, standing in solidarity with the Tibetan cause.

Since Nepal became a democracy in 2008, Communist China has tried to build ideological and political ties with the country's Left forces, including PM Oli's Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist). The Left-led governments of Nepal have been pushed by China to go after Tibetan refugees. During the tenure of former PM Pushpa Kamal Dahal alias Prachanda, heavy forces were deployed against Tibetans who were protesting against China. Prachanda had drawn global criticism for his actions.

Chinese Buddhism in Nepal

Beijing has been pushing to introduce a Chinese version of Buddhism in Nepal, the same way it is reshaping Tibetan identity through State-controlled narratives. In Tibet, this strategy includes so-called "training camps" aimed at instilling "work discipline, Chinese language, and work ethics" among Tibetan youth as part of a broader agenda to undermine their cultural and spiritual heritage. International human rights organisations have raised concerns over these systematic efforts, including the renaming of Tibet as Xizang. By promoting its controversial, State-appointed Panchen Lama in Nepal, Beijing aims to legitimise this version of Buddhism and extend its influence beyond Tibet's borders.

In any case, China misses no opportunity to take a potshot at the Dalai Lama. In 2017, the Dalai Lama's alleged statement that Buddha was born in India caused political havoc in Nepal, and Beijing added fuel to the fire. Many nationalist Buddhists in Nepal were reported to have removed the Dalai Lama's portraits from their houses.

The controversy subsided with the statement, but China is eagerly waiting for such incidents. And not to forget, Beijing hopes that someday Nepal will sign an Extradition Treaty with China, which could not materialise during President Xi Jinping's Nepal visit in 2019. If signed, it will jeopardise the future of several thousand Tibetan refugees living in Nepal, especially the ones who arrived after 1990 and still don't have refugee cards.

While the government of Nepal may have refused entry to the Panchen Lama this time—potentially influenced by coalition partners like the Nepali Congress—this decision is far from a permanent safeguard. Should leaders like Oli return to power with a strong majority, the likelihood of China exerting its influence to advance its agenda in Nepal would dramatically increase, paving the way for deeper cultural and political incursions. The risk of Nepal becoming a staging ground for Beijing's Sinicisation efforts remains alarmingly real.

Interview: Gerald Roche on the Erasure of Tibet's Minority Languages

12 December 2024, China Digital Times, Sophie Beach

As the Chinese Communist Party has intensified its policy of assimilation for cultural and ethnic minority groups in recent decades, language has been a key part of that effort. Standard Tibetan is recognized as the official language of the Tibetans, who live throughout the Tibet Autonomous Region as well as in Tibetan areas in current Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan and Yunnan provinces. Yet government practice has made it increasingly difficult for Tibetans to live, work, and study in their own language; Mandarin is now the primary language of instruction in many schools, official communications and education have been Sinicized, and hundreds of thousands of Tibetan children are forced to attend boarding schools where they are cut off from their families, cultures, communities, and language. (Read more about the impact of the boarding schools in our interview with activist Lhadon Tethong.) Activist Tashi Wangchuk has been repeatedly detained for his efforts to advocate for the protection of the Tibetan language.

But within the Tibetan population exist smaller communities who speak their own languages, which are not widely understood or acknowledged by the Chinese government, the Han Chinese population, global scholars, or even by many fellow Tibetans. These languages are facing extinction as they are forced to assimilate both to Tibetan and to Chinese. According to researcher Gerald Roche, "The Chinese state policy about those languages is essentially that they don't exist." As a result, speakers of these languages receive neither the respect from society nor the resources needed to continue using and teaching their languages to younger generations.

Roche is an anthropologist and Associate Professor in the Department of Politics, Media, and Philosophy at La Trobe University, Melbourne, Australia. His work focuses on issues of power, the state, colonialism, and race in Asia, particularly the transnational Himalayan region. Much of his research explores how these issues manifest in the language politics of this linguistically diverse area, through state-sponsored language oppression and the social movements and community practices which seek to resist it. He lived in Qinghai for several years in the 2010s, working as an anthropologist and studying the communities who speak Manegacha and other minority languages. His new book, The Politics of Language Oppression in Tibet, examines the ways these languages are being erased amid forced assimilation. In the latest installment in our interview series focusing on Tibet, we spoke to Roche about the Tibetan communities that speak minority languages and the threats their languages face. This interview has been lightly edited for clarity and length.

China Digital Times: When most people think about language in Tibet, they generally think about the standard Tibetan language, but as you've researched and written about, there are, I believe, about 30 languages spoken in the Tibetan region. Today, how many people living in Tibet still speak those minority languages?

Gerald Roche: As a disclaimer, a lot of the statistical estimates that I'm giving, they're just estimates, because the Chinese state is committed to denying the existence of these languages and is also committed to denying the people who speak these languages the kind of basic political rights that would enable them to exert their own existence in public forums. So all of the numbers that I'm going to give you are just best guesses, and I think that they're reasonable guesses, but they're not watertight demographic statistics. So the best guess that I have is that around a quarter of a million Tibetans speak these minority languages. That's around four percent of the Tibetan population. As to the number of languages themselves, there are at least two sources of complexity and confusion. One source is that academic research on these languages is still ongoing. A lot of the languages are still being described by linguists, and that's in part because the Chinese state doesn't encourage research on these languages and also because some of the regions where these languages are spoken are closed to outsiders, not just foreigners, but also they are sometimes restricted to Han Chinese people. So, for example, there have been a number of languages described in the last five years that are spoken in some villages around the city of Chamdo in the eastern part of the Tibet Autonomous Region, and it's very difficult for outsiders to access those areas, and it's very difficult for people from those areas to access research institutions. So it's hard for these languages to be put on record for those reasons.

The second footnote on that number of 30 is that counting languages is not like measuring temperature with a thermometer or looking for radiation with a Geiger counter. It's not a scientific endeavor. It's a social and political endeavor, and the answers that you get when you count languages will depend on aspects such as local culture, but also the extent to which those people are politically empowered to engage in public processes around the production of knowledge. Tibetan understandings of what constitutes a language are different from your understanding or my understanding, and the Chinese state also completely excludes the people who speak those languages from any political processes that would give them a voice in making that decision. The literature is the best thing that we have to go off because of that, and the literature suggests that there's about 30 of these minority languages which are spoken by Tibetans, and if you add up all the numbers that exist in the different literature about how many people speak those languages, a quarter of a million people, four percent of Tibetans. But we don't know for sure.

CDT: Linguistically, how do these languages relate to standard Tibetan?

Roche: They are very different. That's why I separate them off from the Tibetan language. To give a parallel, we can think of the European case. You have a group of languages in Europe, like French, Castilian or Spanish, Catalan, Italian, et cetera, which all have a historical relationship to Latin, and so they form a language family of connected languages called the Romance languages. But we recognize that those are separate and distinct languages. There is a similar situation in Tibet, where you have the Tibetic languages, which all have a historical relationship with the written Tibetan language, and on the level of intelligibility, so whether people can understand each other in conversation or not, those different Tibetic languages are different. They're distinct languages in the same way that French is not Spanish. And that doesn't include the minority languages. There is another distinct group of languages which have absolutely no historical relationship with the written Tibetan language. So if we go back to the case that I introduced before in Europe, those Romance languages and their connection to Latin, you have languages in the region which don't have any connection. Basque is the perfect example. Basque is not just a different language; it exists in a different language family and it's completely distinct from those Romance languages. The minority languages' relationship to Tibetan is more like that. These languages are in a couple of different language families. And as a non-linguist, I'm less interested in that. What is important is that these languages are recognized by Tibetans themselves as being extremely distinct from other Tibetan languages, so that linguistic difference, that historical difference, maps onto local understandings, and it also maps onto the understandings of the Chinese state policy as well. The Chinese state policy about those languages is essentially that they don't exist.

CDT: You focus your research primarily on one of the languages, Manegacha, which you write is spoken by about 8,000 people currently. Where in the Tibetan region do they live primarily?

Roche: Just a point of clarification: Manegacha is spoken by 8,000 Tibetan people. There's actually another group of people who speak the same language, a couple of hundred kilometres away in Gansu province, but they are a different minority group. They are called the Bao'an zu and there's no connection between the two populations. Even though they share the same language, they have completely different identities. The Bao'an zu in Gansu province are Muslims. And the Manegacha speakers in Qinghai province consider themselves Tibetan and are Buddhists. So it's the same language but different populations. The 8,000 [Tibetan] Manegacha speakers live in about four villages on the northeast Tibetan plateau. It traditionally was known as the Tibetan region Amdo, which covers the northern part of the Tibetan plateau, and it's a specific cultural region within Amdo, known as Rebong, which is basically a valley and its hinterland on the northeast Tibetan plateau in today's Qinghai province. So you have this long, wide, beautiful river valley running through the mountains of the Tibetan plateau and villages scattered along the river and up in the hills. The Manegacha-speaking villages are four villages spread along the river from north to south, and the majority of other people in the region are all Tibetans that speak a more standard form of Tibetan.

CDT: How much has the population of Manegacha speakers declined? What was it when it was at its peak?

Roche: This is tricky because we don't have any of these statistics, but I would say that 8,000 is probably the peak, because you have this complicated situation where historically, the population of Manegacha speakers has increased as living conditions have improved. But at the same time, the transmission of the language across generations has decreased. So even though objectively, there's a higher number of speakers, the language is not being passed down at the same rate that it used to be. It used to be that there were only a couple of thousand speakers, but all of them passed the language on. So the population was sustainable. Now you have 8,000 speakers, which is probably more than in the past, but about a third of the families that speak Manegacha are not passing it onto their children. That means that even if the population keeps increasing, the number of speakers is going to decline from now on.

CDT: So you expect a rapid decline in speakers in the coming generations?

Roche: Yeah. I expect the decline will be really rapid because the pressures on the language have been mounting over the last 75 years. Since the area was incorporated into the People's Republic of China, there's been assimilatory pressures. Those pressures really intensified in the 21st century. When you had the Develop the West program, big infrastructural development, big investment in institution building in Tibet and other parts of what is today western China—those are the things that are really starting to drive people away from the Manegacha language and towards Tibetan. And then you have these collective decision-making processes. Of those four villages, in one of the villages, the entire population has decided to stop using the language at home. So with the collective, communal decision, there's a few families who [say] "No, I'm not going to do that. I'm going to keep teaching [our children] Manegacha." But the majority of families in that village decided collectively to do that. And so if another village does that, and another village does that, that decision only has to happen four times and then there are no Tibetans that speak Manegacha.

CDT: Do you know about efforts that people are making to try to change that, to try to preserve it for the future generations, and how are they doing that?

Roche: I did surveys of Manegacha-speaking households, asking their views on the language and views on Chinese and Tibetan languages, and the different related issues. And the response was always that they want to keep the Manegacha language, that they value it. However, those decisions that they are making are working against those interests to maintain the language. And that's because of how local understanding of language works. People locally think if they don't speak Manegacha to the kids, the kids are still going to learn it because it's their language. They'll just figure it out and pick it up. And this just doesn't happen. We know from those survey responses, people want their children to have the language, and they want the language to survive. We can see that from other actions that they engage in. In the villages where Manegacha is spoken, everyone is bilingual or trilingual. They know Manegacha, Tibetan, and Mandarin. But when two Manegacha speakers meet, they still speak in their language. They don't speak in Tibetan. If Manegacha speakers wanted to, they could just stop speaking the language entirely tomorrow. But they don't do that, and that's an active choice. It's important to recognize that, because there are these huge pressures that are coercing Manegacha speakers into giving up the language and to stop using it. In some sense, just to use the language, even in private, is an act of resistance against those assimilatory pressures. People also do things like push the language into new areas of life when they have the opportunity. When I was there, smartphones and social media started to spread. When I was living in Qinghai, I saw this happen over the course of years, and when it happened, people started making memes in Manegacha recording fun, little dialogues, doing movies and stuff. That's indicative of people's desire to put the language into these new situations. Normally, for other languages, they would be supported by the state policies to do that, because the languages would be taught in school, there would be money to fund the media, to develop publications, and things like that. But Manegacha speakers just have to do it on their own. Despite the fact that this comes at the cost to them, they do it themselves anyway. So those are some of the things that Manegacha speakers do today.

CDT: In addition to these pressures that you're talking about, you also say that the Manegacha speakers face more explicit discrimination, specifically they face what you call "banal violence." Could you explain what you mean by that and what you saw when you were there?

Roche: Banal in one sense just means everyday, like taken for granted and accepted, and this was very much the nature of the violence against Manegacha speakers. I did interviews with Manegacha speakers about the discrimination that they face, and I also worked with a research assistant who went and spoke to Tibetan speakers about the discrimination that they enact against Manegacha speakers. And I thought those second interviews would be kind of difficult, and people would not want to say very much about it, but local Tibetans were just like, "yeah, this is what we do. We think that they are not really Tibetan. We think that they need to use Tibetan better. We think that they are maybe traitors to the Tibetan cause," and so on. So people were just very unashamed of the way in which they discriminate against Manegacha speakers. So if you're a Manegacha speaker in Rebgong, the main problem that you face in relation to language is that everyday discrimination from other Tibetans. Other Tibetans will dehumanize Manegacha speakers—they will compare them to animals or say that they are not really human in the same way as Tibetan speakers. They will describe Manegacha [language] by comparing it to animal noises, so that they will call it bird talk or compare it to the sound of frying beans—it's not really language. It's just noise.

And then you have another form of discrimination called disparagement humor. You can think of, for example, sexist or racist jokes. We also have these kind of jokes about languages in the context of Rebgong. We know from other studies that these jokes are never harmless, that they do incite people to further violence, to entrench their negative views further and to normalize discrimination against those populations. That happens all the time for Manegacha speakers; people make jokes about them, make jokes about their language. It's just a constant thing that they face. There's also a label in the local language that Tibetans use to refer to Manegacha speakers. I had to think long and hard about whether to include this term in the book, because it's kind of normalized in local life. People use it every day, including Manegacha speakers, but I think if you sit down and think about it and compare it to other situations, it's correct to refer to that term as a slur, because what that slur does is that it triggers a bunch of negative associations about those people. The word itself doesn't mean anything. It's more about the negative associations that it contains. And so when people use that slur, it triggers all those negative connotations that they're not really human, their language is just noise, that they are funny, that they should assimilate, and things like this. So all of those things I'm talking about, I would consider violence because they aim to subordinate a particular population. But there are also examples of what people will more classically consider violence—of insults, of hate speech, and of physical violence of people getting into fist fights over language issues. So there is that sort of real violence as well. In the lives of Manegacha speakers, their exposure to that violence correlates with their exposure to Tibetan-speaking Tibetans. Whenever they are around other Tibetans, they're subjected to this violence—jokes, slurs, insults, etc—and so this comes back to this label I use of banal violence.

Banal has a second meaning, beyond everyday, which goes back to the Latin etymology and the origin of the term in Roman law, where banality is tied up with words like "abandonment" and "bandits" and so on. And banal was something that existed outside of the law, something that existed outside the protection of the state. To be banished was to be pushed outside the state's protection. And the violence against Manegacha is banal in that second sense in that the Chinese state lets it happen all the time. We know that the Chinese state can be highly punitive when it wants to. For example, it can crack down on Tibetans who have a picture of the Dalai Lama in their home. It can be very invasive, very punitive, very controlling when it wants to. And when the Chinese state chooses not to be punitive and controlling, I think we have to assume that that has some kind of significance. That you have this situation where a specific population is just subject to this constant, everyday discrimination by someone else, and the state just says, "That's fine. We are happy to let that continue." I would make the same argument about a lot of racist violence in Western countries that the state just steps back and is basically like, "well this looks too difficult. We can't really define whether this is technically and legally discrimination or not. So we're just going to let it happen" and maybe express some regret. But they do not legally enforce their own rules relating to particular populations. So the violence against Manegacha speakers is banal in that second sense. And I think that this is one of the most challenging and confronting aspects of the book, because essentially what I'm arguing is that there is violence between Tibetans that is structured and allowed to continue by the Chinese state. So we have to look at the way that the Chinese state implements its policies against Tibetans through other Tibetans.

CDT: Do Manegacha speakers face this kind of discrimination from the Han population or from other populations? Or are they just viewed as Tibetan by the Han, so they're not differentiated from other Tibetan groups?

Roche: Yeah, they tend to just be viewed as Tibetans. So for Manegacha speakers, their encounters with Han Chinese people are fairly limited. In Rebgong, there is a local Han Chinese population and there are Hui, Muslim Chinese people, in the local area. And Manegachas interact with them and in those contexts, they are just viewed like other Tibetans. There's no specific discrimination that comes to them from that. The main contact that Manegacha speakers have with Han Chinese comes in two situations. One is when people migrate to large Han Chinese cities to go to university, because there are no universities in Tibetan areas, except for Lhasa. So if you're a Tibetan in Qinghai, for example, and you want to go to university, you have to go to Xining, which is a Han-dominated city. It's like that for a lot of Tibetans, that's their first exposure to a Han majority environment when they go to university. I spoke to Manegacha speakers about this, they were just like, "yeah, when I go there, I'm just Tibetan, and they just consider me another Tibetan and they discriminate against me on that basis." But that's it, it's nothing to do specifically with being a Manegacha speaker. The other situation when Manegacha speakers might meet Han Chinese is when they do migrant labor. They go to other places to do work; Manegacha speakers have a preference for doing migrant labor in other Tibetan towns and cities. So it's kind of rarer for them to go to spend long times in Han Chinese cities. But when they do, they face discrimination as a Tibetan, not as a Manegacha speaker.

CDT: Can you explain how standard Tibetan became the language that's acknowledged by the Chinese government and most widely spoken in the Tibetan areas, and the process that that took?

Roche: It's kind of like a covert and ad hoc process. There's never been a real explicit policy to advance this, and there are even some on-the-ground practices that work against standard Tibetan language, so it's pretty messy. But one thing that the Chinese government has done consistently since invading Tibet is to promote the written Tibetan language a bit. Not much, but a bit. So the Chinese state promotes the written Tibetan language enough that they can show that they're doing something, enough that they can demonstrate to external observers: "Look, we respect minority rights. We put Tibetan on the sign. We let them learn Tibetan in one school. We have a publishing house for Tibetans." The Chinese state has always done this kind of limited support of the written Tibetan language to wow external stakeholders, but also as a way of getting legitimacy amongst Tibetan people. The Chinese state is concerned about perceptions of legitimacy among Tibetan people, and the two main ways that it has tried to get that legitimacy is through economic development—improving people's standards of living and cash incomes. And secondly, by having a shallow, superficial program of cultural preservation, which includes language and performing arts, but essentially not very much else. And so through those two things, it attempts to gain legitimacy for the Party-state rule in Tibet. The language is an important element of that. So that's led to this ad hoc emergence of a standard form of Tibetan across Tibet in the written language. When it comes to the spoken language, on some level, the Chinese state recognizes that Tibetans can't understand each other when they speak to one another. But the Chinese state wants to use spoken Tibetan for propaganda purposes [and] Tibetan is technically only one language for the Chinese government. So what it does is it says that there are dialects, and we use the dialects in broadcast media. So for example, there is an Amdo Tibetan TV, which uses a kind of standardized form of Tibetan that's spoken in the north. There is Kham Tibetan TV, which uses a form of standardized Tibetan, which is spoken in the east and southeast. And then there's another one for Central Tibetan spoken around Lhasa. So there's this tension in the state's own aims and goals.

The root of the standardization practice for Tibetan is the Chinese ethnic classification project. The Chinese state formally recognizes 56 ethnic groups or nationalities in China, including the Han Chinese and 55 minorities. The theory behind that is that each of those ethnic groups only speaks one language. That's the assumption. And I think nowhere is that empirically true. It's not true for the Han, for Tibetans, for the Yi, or for Mongolians. There might be some smaller minzu [ethnic groups] that only have one language, but they would be the exception rather than the rule. The Chinese government set the system up like that deliberately so that there would be a gap between linguistic diversity and ethnic diversity, and that that gap is a policy that's designed to assimilate languages. So you take all of those 300 languages and you give a constitutional freedom for each minority to use one language. And you outsource the assimilation to the minority groups.

And then once you've gotten rid of most of those 300 languages, you have 55 minorities each with one language, and a Han majority with one language, and then you assimilate the minorities into the Han majority. This was the plan that was laid out back when China was a Marxist-Leninist state, which it absolutely no longer is. Because those structures, those categories, and those processes are still in place, we see linguistic minorities assimilating to a dominant language of ethnic minorities. And that's what's happening with Manegacha speakers and other Tibetans that speak minority languages. Not all of them, some of them are assimilating to Chinese, but some of them are assimilating towards Tibetan.

CDT: You described the protests that erupted across Tibetan regions in 2008 as a kind of a turning point for awareness of many Tibetan people's sense of identity and nationality. Can you describe that and how that's impacted the potential survival of languages like Manegacha?

Roche: The 2008 protests were the first Tibetan protests against Chinese rule which transcended locality. There had been lots of isolated protests before, but they were typically in one place and they didn't spread to other locations. But in 2008, the protests started in Lhasa and then they spread all across the Tibetan plateau, so there were also protests in Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and less so in Yunnan—throughout the Tibet Autonomous Region and including Tibetans living in Beijing. So you had these very widespread ongoing protests among Tibetans explicitly against Chinese rule. It was a very significant event in those terms, and for many Tibetans, it was a kind of profound awakening to their own political situation. Many Tibetans began viewing themselves through the lens of a shared Tibetan identity for the first time. Tibetans have these very strong regional attachments to the valley that they grew up in, the village that they grew up in, the province that they grew up in. And there has always been a sense of Tibetanness, in the background of those things because it's printed on your ID card and you're reminded of your minzu every day. But those 2008 protests, from the evidence we see in Tibetan essays, poetry, pop music, from the evidence I saw in everyday conversations while I was living in Qinghai through this stuff, is suddenly that Tibetan identity becomes the most important identity for people in a way that it hadn't been before.

An important part of that Tibetan identity that emerged from those protests, or that consolidated through those protests, was the role of Tibetan language in Tibetan identity—this idea that to be Tibetan means to speak Tibetan, to know Tibetan, to use Tibetan. And in particular, in the years following the 2008 protests, this idea emerged that Tibetan should be of a particular form and it should be pure Tibetan. This was the way that it was phrased by Tibetan activists and everyday people. Pure Tibetan in this context means Tibetan that doesn't use any loan words from Chinese. Tibetan, like every language, is full of words from other languages. Tibetan is full of loan words from dozens of languages, but it has been extremely heavily influenced by Mandarin and other local Sinitic languages over the past 50 years. People started expressing this concern that if Tibetan language is the core of Tibetan identity, but Tibetan language is mixed with Chinese, then maybe our identity is also mixed with Chinese. And we need to defend that boundary. We need to defend our Tibetanness by defending the Tibetan language. So at that time, you saw this spread of pure Tibetan language associations in the villages, in schools, in universities, online through social media, where people were encouraging each other to speak pure Tibetan and to stop using Chinese loan words when they spoke Tibetan. So they would do things like print dictionaries to make sure that people knew the correct Tibetan words for it. They would hold spelling competitions. It would enter into people's lives in contexts like restaurants and taxis where you would get a discount if you spoke pure Tibetan, and you would get charged double the price if you spoke in mixed Tibetan. So it became this really pervasive aspect of Tibetan everyday life, I would say from the year 2008, maybe almost for the next decade, but not quite.

Languages like Manegacha got caught up in this dynamic, because in local understandings of language, Manegacha and other Tibetan minority languages were seen as mixed languages. The idea was that they had once been pure Tibetan, but they had now become mixed with Chinese to the extent that they were no longer recognizable as any kind of Tibetan language any more. And this is based partly on the truth and partly on a fallacy. The true part of it is that like Manegacha, for example, has been influenced by Tibetan and it has lots of Tibetan loan words in it. So the name of the language, Manegacha, "Mane" is a Mongolic word from an old Mongolian language. "Gacha" is local Tibetan for language. Manegacha means "our language," but it includes elements of two different languages. People who speak minority languages use a lot of Tibetan loan words, because they're constantly in contact with Tibetan people, speaking Tibetan, and they practice Tibetan culture and follow Buddhism and so on. During this historical moment, Tibetans would hear those loan words and take that as evidence that these languages used to be Tibetan. So they would say, "you need to speak pure Tibetan," and what that essentially means is those people need to assimilate to speaking Tibetan and stop speaking their languages. Tibetans were putting pressure on these people to speak Tibetan and seeing it as a kind of a defense of Tibetan national unity, rather than a project of assimilation. However, from the perspective of Manegacha speakers and other Tibetans that speak minority languages, it was a project of assimilation. They were essentially being told, "don't speak your language, speak our language, your language is bad, our language is good." There has always been some element of hierarchy between Tibetan speakers and minority language speakers. There's always been some mild pressure to assimilate. But after 2008, that just really intensified because Tibetan identity was coming under this new threat. The Chinese state just reacted with an extremely overwhelming disproportionate response to those 2008 protests—mass arrests, mass incarceration, torture, martial law, checkpoints, the securitization of everyday life, and so on. So Tibetans felt and were under threat, and one of the ways that they responded to this was trying to build national unity by assimilating their linguistic minorities. So it's this really tragic dynamic that emerges from Chinese colonialism in Tibet.

CDT: You describe a similar situation globally when international organizations and advocacy groups that work on Tibet are discussing language in Tibet, they really only focus on the survival of that standard Tibetan language. Are there any groups or individuals, researchers (besides you, of course) who are raising issues related to minority languages?

Roche: I think it's starting to change a little bit, but the recognition of diversity is still not the majority opinion amongst academics who study Tibet or advocates who work for Tibet. Most of the academics that acknowledge this linguistic diversity are linguists who are interested in this specific language and that specific language. They are less interested in putting those languages in their social and cultural context. When it comes to academic studies of Tibetan, [they] tend to overlook the linguistics literature, so they don't acknowledge that diversity. It tends to be based on competence in the written Tibetan language, so people who formally train as Tibetologists, that training essentially is learning to read Tibetan and reading lots of Tibetan texts. You don't have to necessarily interact with Tibetan people to be an academic Tibetologist. And that's why there was this lack of awareness regarding Tibetan linguistic diversity. But beyond that lack of awareness, I would say that there is also a limited acceptance, or a refusal to accept, that linguistic diversity exists, both by Tibetan studies academics and the international Tibet movement. So the international Tibet movement is essentially promoting Tibet nationalism, which is the ideology that the Tibetan people have a territory, they have a language, they have a national identity, and they were invaded by the Chinese. A lot of Tibetan international organizations that are essentially advocating for Tibetan nationalism, the existence of linguistic minorities counters that narrative, so that acknowledgment threatens their core business, if you like.

Nonetheless, there has been some increasing acknowledgment. For example, I worked with Free Tibet, which is a UK-based organization, and they have updated their website text to acknowledge linguistic diversity in Tibet. I was recently invited by the International Campaign for Tibet to provide a talk about my research and about the unique challenges faced by Tibet's minority languages, so they at least don't view the concept with hostility. They are not totally rejecting the idea. But I think the future survival of these languages depends on something more than acknowledgment that these languages exist. There has to be organized activism and advocacy that explicitly aims to confront the unique forms of oppression that those languages face, because it's different from other Tibetans. It's simply a different form of oppression, and it needs unique strategies and, I would say, distinct funding and things like this. It's great to see broader acknowledgement, but that acknowledgement is not going to mean anything until it's backed up with tactics, strategy, and funding.

CDT: You lived in Qinghai for several years. And then you were not allowed to stay—forced might be too strong, but you had to leave China. When's the last time you were in the Tibetan regions?

Roche: When I say Tibet I'm talking about all Tibetan areas, not just the Tibet Autonomous Region, because that's how Tibetans view Tibet as well. I lived in Qinghai and worked with Tibetans from 2005 to 2013. I couldn't stay there because of new regulations that were brought in placing restrictions on international NGOs and international civil society organizations, essentially. It just became impossible for me to get a visa and a salary. So I couldn't live there anymore. For the next five years, I was able to return there intermittently, but then my really critical publications that critique Chinese state policy in Tibet started coming out around 2014, ten years ago now. The last time I was able to go back to Rebgong was 2017. The last time I was back in China was 2018, so I was in Chengdu, where there's a big Tibetan population where I was hanging out and seeing people. When I tried to go back in 2019, my visa was not denied, but just delayed continuously to the point where it no longer became meaningful to continue applying. I knew from my time in China that this was going to happen eventually if I published on these things. I knew how it was going to happen because I'd seen other examples. It's very rare for them to explicitly ban anyone. They have done it but it creates bad publicity. So normally they just create friction where it's harder for you to go. And I knew about this because this is exactly the same tactic that they use to prevent Tibetans from leaving China. When Tibetans are trying to apply for a passport, they'll just send people back to the office over and over again, fill out new forms, new regulations, pay new fees, get new documents, over and over again, and people just give up because it's too expensive and it takes too much time.

So I can't go back to China anymore. I'm not surprised by that at all. It's disappointing for me to be cut off from a place that I lived for so long, where I had connections with people that I care about. I would like to be able to go back for personal reasons related to that. I would like to be able to go back for academic reasons as well because the kind of research that I think is valuable can only be done on the ground in specific places by talking to people. The way that the Chinese state gets away with what it does is it's very good at covering up stuff and and you can find lots of evidence in Tibetan language news reports from the Chinese state and so on, but you will never see them writing about Manegacha. You'll never see them talking about these languages in Chinese propaganda in Tibetan. So for that on-the-ground perspective, to be able to see what the Chinese state covers up, you have to be in China. So I just have kind of given up on my research on Tibet, because I just don't think that I can make a meaningful contribution to it anymore. I can access the same documents that everyone outside China can, but I think the real work has to be done from on the ground with people.

CDT: So what are you working on now? How have you shifted your focus?

Roche: I've shifted focus in a couple of different ways. I've shifted to look more regionally and comparatively. I've started doing a couple of comparative studies, looking at the relationship between human rights and language politics. In one study published in a journal called State Crime Journal, I worked with some coauthors, and we compared China, India, and Indonesia, looking at how the human rights record in each country impacts the space for language activism within those countries. It's currently the United Nations decade of Indigenous languages, and the United Nations is saying everyone should do indigenous language activism on a human rights basis, and in China, you cannot do that. In India, the human rights situation has been declining very rapidly under Modi. If you just look at the political systems, you have democracy and authoritarianism—it would seem that there would be vast differences. If you look at the human rights records, China and India are rapidly converging. So I think it's important to be aware of those developments. And China is a good base comparison for understanding what a terrible human rights situation looks like. So I've been working comparatively on that basis a bit. The other thing I've been doing is just looking practically at issues of language rights advocacy and activism. I think that there's a lot of work to be done there academically just to think about what are the theories that we need to support communities in places like China to retain their language? How can we advocate from outside? But practically there's also lots of work to be done. I've been involved with different organizations. I've worked for two years with an organization called the Global Coalition for Language Rights, which I think does great work building a community of language rights activists around the world and bringing them together. More recently, I've been involved with efforts to set up a registered non-profit organization in the United States called the Linguistic Justice Foundation, trying to create a permanent, financially sustainable base from which to organize for language rights. I'm interested in continuing that work to look practically at these issues because I think it's nice to have theories, but I think it's more important to have suggestions for practical things that we can do to make a difference in a world which is very often unjust.

Tibetans Coming To India Reduced To A Trickle – OpEd

12 December 2024, Eurasia Review, Subir Bhaumik

The annual flow of ethnic Tibetans entering India has dropped sharply due to strong border controls by the Chinese and stiff surveillance in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) bolstered by modern technology.

Experts say this may even have an adverse bearing on the future of the Tibetan government-in-exile based in Dharamsala in Himachal Pradesh.

Only 15 Tibetans arrived in Dharamsala in 2023 and exile government officials say the number would be around the same this year.

Central Tibetan Administration

(CTA) officials say the arrival of Tibetans has dropped sharply since 2008. According to CTA officials, in 2021, only four Tibetans arrived in Dharamsala while five had arrived a year ago. The numbers went up slightly with 10 arrivals in 2022 and 15 in 2023.

In the 1980-90s, between 2,500 to 3,500 Tibetans used to cross into India via Nepal. But that changed after 2008, the year Beijing hosted the Olympic Games and Tibet erupted in furious protests as angry citizens sought to draw international attention to 'Chinese repression'.

Chinese authorities suspected that the protests in TAR during the 2008 Beijing Olympics were inspired by some Tibetans who returned from India and were close to the exile government.

The Chinese border guards heavily tightened the Tibet-Nepal borders and started paying Nepalese border guards to stop Tibetans escaping Tibet. Since 2010, the number of Tibetans escaping Tibet drastically fell from 3,500 a year before the uprising to just 20 to 30," says Tibetan writer-activist Tenzin Tsundue, who has been frequently arrested in India for anti-China activism that Delhi seeks to curb. He says since the Maoist government took charge in Nepal, it has become very difficult for Tibetans to cross into that country.

Other CTA officials say the Chinese have intensified checks on all Tibetans, making it mandatory for now for them to report departure and arrival every time they travel anywhere outside their regular place of residence in Tibet or neighbouring Chinese provinces.

"Many passports have been revoked, ID cards, including ration cards, mobile numbers, and bank accounts, are rolled into one number with DNA details. With such a sophisticated mechanism of control, China has turned Tibet into a police state," says writer Tsundue.

The Chinese started intensifying their border controls since 2005. In October 2006, Chinese border guards opened fire on a group of 70 Tibetan refugees climbing the snow-covered Nangpa Pass en route to Nepal. Beijing claimed the border guards were acting in self-defense, but a video filmed by a Romanian mountaineer showed the Tibetans were unarmed and running away when they were fired upon by the Chinese border guards.

A 17-year-old nun, Kelsang Namtso, died in the snow, while 23-year-old Kunsang Namgyal, hit by two bullets, died later,

For those seeking to escape Tibet have found it ever more perilous in the post-2008 era, when Beijing intensified its mass surveillance programs and placed severe restrictions on Tibetans' internal mobility, says Ruby Mukherjee, convenor of the "Save Tibet" campaign in India and an advocate in the Kolkata high court.

China's increased controls over Tibetans' movement within the country and over the Tibet-Nepal border has made it almost impossible for Tibetans to reach India. The number of new arrivals dropped to around 400 per year between 2010-14 but now with tougher restrictions since President Xi Jinping took charge, the Tibetan arrivals into India are at an all-time low, never going past 20 annually.

CTA spokesperson Tenzin Lekshay claims that after the massive Tibetan uprising in 2008, China has successfully imposed a news blockade to prevent information about Tibet from reaching the outside world. "They use paid Western Youtubers to paint a rosy all-is-well picture about Tibet but reality is severe visa restrictions on foreigners trying to visit Tibet," he said. "China has much to hide."

China denies all charges of repression in Tibet and blames the "separatist and splittist clique of Dalai Lama" for the false global propaganda. Chinese officials say Tibet has developed enormously since the Chinese Communist Party liberated Tibetans from "feudal servitude". Unlike Tibetan hardliners who seek independence, the Dalai Lama has sought negotiations with China to secure extensive provincial autonomy, unsuccessfully so far.

Besides China's tightening of Tibet's southwestern borders since the mid-2000s to stem the flow of Tibetan refugees into Nepal and India, the emigration of Tibetan refugees from the Indian subcontinent to the West beginning in the 1990s, and a general decline in the birth rates of exiled Tibetans has brought down the number of Tibetans in India.

From a peak of 1.5 lakhs in the 1990s, the number has dropped to below 90,000. Experts say this has long-term implications.

A study by Tenzim Dorjee and Tsewang Rinzim in the journal www.migrationpolicy.org observes:

"The demographic decline of South Asia's Tibetan community poses a threat to the future viability of the government-in-exile—the sole democratic voice representing the Tibetan people both inside and outside Tibet—as well as its institutions and civil-society organizations.

"If this trend continues, it could imperil the Tibetan monastic universities in South India dedicated to safeguarding Indo-Tibetan knowledge systems as well as hundreds of health and education facilities serving tens of thousands of Tibetans and others across India."

With the 14th Dalai Lama already 89 and his succession still caught up in huge uncertainties amidst reports that Beijing may like to put up its own choice, the very distinct Tibetan identity stands imperiled.

Nepal "Snubs" Dalai Lama For China-Appointed Panchen Lama; Is Beijing Weaponizing Buddhism?

11 December 2024, The Eurasian Times, Ritu Sharma

After the brief and bloody war with India ended in 1962, China segregated the Prisoners of War into Indians and Gorkhas. The 700 Gorkha soldiers were given better treatment as Beijing wanted to highlight that Chinese and Nepalis are 'brothers.' China even made a direct offer to Nepal to take back Gorkha POWs, an offer Kathmandu declined.

Cut to 2024, and it seems the message is finding some resonance with the Himalayan Nation. Even as the country, the birthplace of Buddha, remains out of bounds for its most famous disciple—the Dalai Lama—Nepal is preparing to welcome the 11th Panchen Lama, appointed by the Chinese government.

Not only is the Nepal government giving him a red-carpet welcome, but Kathmandu is also hosting the South China Sea Buddhism Roundtable Conference.

Amish Mulmi, the author of "All Roads Lead North: Nepal's Turn to China" wrote: "Didn't know our geography had changed overnight and Nepal was now a South China sea facing nation. Why else would we host a South China Sea Buddhism Roundtable Conference in Lumbini!"

Lumbini, located in southern Nepal, is the birthplace of the Buddha and one of the most venerated sites for Buddhists. The Dalai Lama lives just one hour's flight away from Lumbini, but Nepal has not been keen to host the Tibetan leader for fear of angering China. For some time, Kathmandu tried to maintain its geopolitical neutrality as the two Asian giants jostled for influence in the region.

However, it is changing as Nepal's Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli broke with tradition in his fourth term by heading to Beijing before New Delhi.

During his visit, Prime Minister Oli met Chinese President Xi Jinping. Nepal and China inked the much-awaited framework agreement on the multi-billion-dollar Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), paving the way for enhanced economic cooperation on the projects.

This will be the first visit of the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama, and it will help him gain recognition among Buddhist followers worldwide. The South China Buddhism Round Table will be held from December 12 to December 15 and will include government officials and monks from around 20 countries.

The Nepal government has kept the arrival of the Chinese religious leader Panchen Lama a secret. "He is coming for religious harmony," a local Nepali media quoted an official from the Lumbini Development Trust.

The Indian government will closely watch this move as the country hosts the largest population of Tibetan refugees.

According to the latest data from the government in exile, more than 128,000 Tibetans live outside of their homeland. Of those, 94,000 live in India, around three-quarters of the total. Another 10.6% live in Nepal, and the remaining have resettled in more than 30 countries worldwide.

The Panchen Lama is one of the most important figures in Tibetan Buddhism. In 1995, the Dalai Lama recognized Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, a 6-year-old boy in Tibet, as the reincarnated Panchen Lama. But just three days later, Chinese authorities kidnapped the child and his parents. The Panchen Lama has not been seen in public ever since. His followers all over the world continue to demand his release from Chinese authorities.

The Chinese government instead named Gyaincain Norbu as the 11th Panchen Lama. China has gradually exposed its Panchen Lama in public roles in the hope that it will achieve the respect commanded by the Dalai Lama among Tibetans and globally. He made his first trip outside mainland China in 2012 when he visited Hong Kong.

Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama's upcoming visit to Nepal has created a furor amongst journalists and scholars in Nepal.

Mahesh Kushwaha questioned the Oli government's move on X by asking: "What is the Oli government trying to do by welcoming Panchen Lama for a "South China Sea Buddhism Roundtable Conference" in Lumbini when Nepal cannot even muster the courage to host Dalai Lama?" He works with the Centre for Social Innovation and Foreign Policy.

Weaponizing Buddhism

Of all the South Asian countries, China's military ties with Nepal have been among the weakest, owing to decades-old ties between Nepalese and Indian Armies.

The Dalai Lama with a picture of 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima. Credits Central Tibetan Administration.

Since 1950, both armies have conferred the honorary rank of General of their respective Armies on each other's Chief of Staff. This bond is further reinforced by the substantial presence of approximately 36,000 Gorkha personnel within the Gorkha Regiments of the Indian Army. Also, a sizable population of about 140,000 retired Gorkha personnel from the Indian Army receive pensions totaling around US$600 million from India.

This has changed since 2022, as the Indian Army enacted a new recruitment scheme, and the Nepalese government forbade its citizens from joining the Indian Army.

This has prompted China to balance its military cooperation with soft diplomacy and Buddhism is an important part of that.

"One shouldn't lose sight of the strategic dimension of Buddhism. China sees a great advantage in employing Buddhism alongside its hard power pursuits, especially to seek political and economic leverage. Cultural tools also seem embedded into China's latest One Belt One Road initiative in Asia," P. Stobdan, a former ambassador and a scholar of Asian affairs, wrote earlier.

The Dalai Lama has been in the eye of the storm between India and China as the 89-year-old spiritual leader, who leads Tibetan Buddhism, fled Tibet in 1959 following annexation by Beijing. He has been living in exile in India ever since.

Beijing accuses the Dalai Lama of being a separatist. It asserts that the Communist Party China, itself an atheist organization, has the sole right to name the next incarnation of the Dalai Lama and has enshrined it into the country's law.

The Dalai Lama and the Tibetan parliament in exile, with its seat in Dharamshala, have rejected the Chinese claim. Penpa Tsering, the president of the parliament-in-exile, has stated earlier: "A non-believer, atheist government like China interfering in Tibetan spiritual matters is a complete no-no. It cannot be accepted. The world has turned against China. We firmly believe no one will trust their choice."

China hopes to repress the Tibetan separatist movement by controlling the religious leadership of Tibetan Buddhists. The Dalai Lama's increasing age has further heightened tension over his successor. The Dalai Lama has insisted that speculations of his death are premature, as, according to his visions, he will live to 113.

A living god-like figure for millions of Buddhists, India officially calls him "the most esteemed and honored guest of India." China accuses him of being a "wolf in monk's robes," engaged in "anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion to break Tibet away from China."

Since 1974, the Dalai Lama has said he does not seek independence from China for Tibet but a "meaningful autonomy" that would allow Tibet to preserve its culture and heritage.

In 2011, in a move to democratize the system of government, the Dalai Lama gave up his political and administrative powers and chose to remain as just a spiritual leader. However, he is still the community's most influential figure.

When the current Dalai Lama dies, Tibetans will be in a state of disarray.

Experts on the tensions between the two countries believe that when the 14th Dalai Lama dies, there will be two successors – one nominated by China and the other left behind by the Tibetan spiritual leader.

Beijing is making its move to fortify the reputation of its Panchen Lama till then to be able to control the Tibetans religiously.

View: India shouldn't let its data turn Chinese

10 December 2024, The Economic Times

India's institutional strength used to be reflected in the reliability of its national accounts. Unlike in China, few questioned the government's figures for growth in gross domestic product, and investors rarely needed to supplement official numbers with other data sources.

That has, quietly, changed. While few believe Indian statisticians are actively working to make growth numbers look better than they are, less and less data is publicly available, methods are less transparent, and the GDP figures in particular sometimes diverge puzzlingly from independent data.

The minister in charge of statistics recently told Parliament that the government planned to ask a new committee to recommend how it should update its national accounts. Official statisticians should seize this opportunity to overhaul how India's GDP is calculated in order to win back trust.

The government's justification for the update is that India's data is still based on prices dating back to the financial year that ended in March 2012. Such "rebasing" is a chance for wholesale reform — particularly because the last time the GDP series was revised was exactly when questions first began to be asked about its reliability.

Statisticians have a much harder task in India than in the West or even in China. For one, the economy is dominated by services, rather than by manufacturing. It can be easier to value aggregate output in industrial sectors that produce a defined output with a clear price.

A bigger problem is that, unlike in more advanced economies, a large part of activity in India happens in the informal sector. That is, by definition, invisible to the government; official tax records, for example, are not going to tell you much about small businesses that traditionally haven't paid taxes.

The micro-sized enterprises where most Indians work are also very hard to survey. They go out of business quickly; they change their names and locations frequently.

Official numbers get around this problem by looking at a sample of larger companies and extrapolating from that. If the performance of smaller enterprises is linked closely with how bigger ones are doing, such an estimate can work well.

But, if the formal and informal sectors are growing at very different rates, the calculation might lead to biased estimates of GDP. Some think that's exactly what has happened in recent years.

The figures for value-added contributed by the private sector have been particularly worrisome. They are often out of sync with other macroeconomic indicators — corporate earnings, credit growth, the central bank's estimates for capacity utilization in industry. Many India-watchers now supplement the official GDP numbers with other data points, such as sales of two-wheelers or the revenue reports of consumer-goods companies.

About a decade ago, when the "base year" for GDP calculations was last revised, statisticians also changed the data source they used to estimate private-sector output. That may have introduced unintended problems.

What really angered many economists, however, is that it seemed the "new series" of GDP behaved completely differently from the one they had been using for decades. Comparisons between macroeconomic performance in the 2010s and the 2000s, already politically controversial, became impossible.

The new series also seemed to be overly sensitive to how statisticians calculated price changes between one year and the next. Normally, such questions might be answered by official papers detailing the statisticians' sources and methods. But those have stopped appearing as well.

If authorities are serious about fixing India's problem statistics, they can do two things. First, better mine the enormous amount of available digital data, including the 500 million transactions a day recorded on state-supported payments infrastructure. If they don't do so, some future AI bot will.

Second, they need to be much more open about what they are doing and why. Statistics are useless if they aren't trusted. And only transparency builds trust.

India has wound up with official statistics that are unpredictable, don't match up with other figures, aren't robust to how price shifts are calculated, and provide limited comparability over time. That's sub-optimal, to say the least. To promote growth, the government first needs to know how the economy is really doing.

Breaking the Circle: Chinese Communist Party Propaganda Infrastructure Rapidly Expands

10 December 2024, Recorded Future, Insikt Group

Summary

China is rapidly advancing its global propaganda strategies through international communication centers (ICCs), with over 100 centers established since 2018 — most since 2023. These centers aim to amplify the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) voice on the international stage, targeting specific audiences with tailored messaging (a strategy known as "precise communication"). ICCs coordinate local, national, and international resources to build China's image, share political narratives, and promote economic partnerships.

By leveraging inauthentic social media amplification, foreign influencers, and collaborations with overseas media, ICCs advance China's multi-layered propaganda approach. For instance, Fujian's ICC reportedly manages TikTok accounts targeting Taiwanese audiences, likely including a covert account that is highly critical of the Taiwan government called Two Tea Eggs. On YouTube, the same ICC promotes videos of Taiwanese individuals praising China. These centers are strategically positioned to promote China's interests during geopolitical crises, despite challenges like limited credibility and resource constraints.

Breaking the Circle: Chinese Communist Party Propaganda Infrastructure Rapidly Expands

China's efforts to reshape global narratives about its policies, culture, and geopolitical aims have reached new heights with the rapid proliferation of international communication centers (ICCs). Established to amplify the voice of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), these centers are integral to China's global propaganda apparatus and seek to propel the CCP's "precise communication" strategy for targeting distinct audiences. Here's a closer look at their functions, strategies, and implications.

What Are ICCs?

ICCs are propaganda hubs designed to bring new resources to the CCP's efforts to "tell China's story" by centralizing and streamlining the capabilities of provinces, cities, and smaller jurisdictions. These centers focus on building China's global image by sharing positive narratives about its culture, economy, and development. Simultaneously, they act as a conduit for political narratives aimed at countering negative perceptions and promoting China's geopolitical agenda.

Over 100 ICCs have been established across China, primarily since 2023, under provincial and sub-provincial propaganda departments and state media organizations. These centers aim to "break the circle" to penetrate foreign audiences and tailoring content for specific regions and demographics.

Key Objectives of ICCs

ICCs primarily aim to promote positive narratives about China. They create content that highlights the country's cultural heritage, technological innovations, and economic progress, fostering goodwill among international audiences. Additionally, ICCs counter negative narratives by responding to perceived anti-China sentiments and disseminating content to influence public opinion on geopolitical topics. By tailoring their approaches to specific regions and demographics, ICCs strive to ensure their narratives resonate more effectively. For example, Fujian's ICC specifically targets Taiwanese audiences using TikTok accounts that blend cultural themes with critical political messaging.

Tactics and Strategies

ICCs employ various tactics to achieve their objectives. Social media operations form a core component of their strategy, with thousands of accounts active across platforms like Facebook, YouTube, and TikTok. Many of these accounts lack transparency about their state affiliations, enabling covert influence campaigns. Additionally, ICCs leverage foreign influencers and "communication officers" to amplify China's narratives through user-generated content, vlogs, and experiential propaganda.

Collaboration with overseas media organizations further enhances ICCs' reach and legitimacy. Through actions like organizing foreign journalist visits to China, ICCs create an impression of organic coverage and offer an alternative to Western narratives. These partnerships — reportedly established in Australia, Brazil, Cambodia, Egypt, France, Japan, Russia, the United States, and elsewhere — are complemented by localized propaganda activities that align with China's economic and geopolitical interests. S

Challenges to Success

Despite ambitious goals, ICCs face significant challenges that hinder their effectiveness. These include a lack of professional and foreign talent, insufficient discourse power, inadequate data for precise communication, and inconsistent funding. ICCs often struggle to translate local developments into effective narratives for foreign audiences and lack focus on target demographics. Many rely heavily on central state media infrastructure, as seen with the Nanning International Communication Center outsourcing key operations to Xinhua News Agency. These limitations echo long-standing issues within China's state media sector.

Implications

ICCs represent a sophisticated evolution in China's propaganda efforts. While they are unlikely to become trusted sources of information in the near term, their ability to amplify preferred narratives during geopolitical crises is likely significant. These centers likely have the potential to influence foreign opinion of China by offering regular engagement, providing alternatives to Western sources, and focusing on topics like quality of life in China rather than political values, especially among Global South and Western periphery audiences.

Outlook

The expansion of international communication centers (ICCs) reflects China's ongoing efforts to innovate its media strategy, centralize resources, and project global narratives favoring its interests under Xi Jinping's leadership. Despite challenges, ICCs likely strengthen China's ability to influence global discourse by leveraging thousands of overt and covert social media accounts and fostering collaborations with foreign media. These centers could amplify assertive messaging during crises and suppress negative coverage of China.

China's long-term goal is almost certainly to establish ICC-affiliated platforms as trusted sources of information. While this remains unlikely in the near term due to credibility challenges, ICCs represent a strategic step toward improving China's external propaganda system. Researchers and governments should prioritize tracking ICC activities and advocating for transparent labeling of their state affiliations on social media platforms.

What Lies Ahead for India-China Relations

09 December 2024, The Diplomat, Eizabeth Roche

A high-level meeting between Indian and Chinese officials in Beijing is scheduled for later this month.

Senior officials of India and China are expected to meet in Beijing later this month as the two neighbors look to reset relations that have been in a state of deep freeze since June 2020 when their soldiers engaged in a bloody clash and a prolonged eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation along their disputed border in Ladakh.

The upcoming meeting in Beijing follows the agreement on patrolling arrangements along the disputed border in Eastern Ladakh. India's Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri told journalists in New Delhi on October 21 that "Agreement has been arrived at on patrolling arrangements along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the India-China border areas, leading to disengagement and a resolution of the issues that had arisen in these areas in 2020."

The Beijing meeting is therefore significant.

The Indian and Chinese national security advisors have to begin the process of repairing bilateral strategic trust. They also have to chart a fresh blueprint for stabilizing their tense border and ensuring equilibrium, badly shattered by the deadly Galwan clash in June 2020 in the Himalayan region of Eastern Ladakh. This will be their first meeting to discuss unsettled boundary issues in five years.

The Sino-Indian face-off at Galwan on the night of June 14-15, 2020, was the deadliest between the two countries in decades. Both sides suffered casualties. Relations frayed thereafter. There was a sharp downside in people-to-people ties with a decline in air links and travel between the two countries. India banned dozens of Chinese companies, including ByteDance, the firm behind the popular short-video app TikTok, from operating in India.

India and China share a 4,000-kilometer-long undemarcated border that has been a source of friction for decades. It led to a brief but bloody war in 1962 and several face-offs since. However, a series of pacts signed between 1993 and 2013 resulted in largely peaceful ties. This truce was broken when China moved tens of thousands of troops and weaponry to the border in Eastern Ladakh in April-May 2020, catching New Delhi by surprise. While caught off guard, India quickly mobilized forces to match the numbers deployed by China.

Following the October 2024 announcement, India and China disengaged their troops, i.e. they were withdrawn from their eyeball-to-eyeball positions. A meeting between Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping followed on the sidelines of the BRICS summit at Kazan. This was their first bilateral dialogue since 2019.

"The two sides agreed on holding talks between their foreign ministers and officials at various levels to bring the relationship back to sound and steady development at an early date," a Chinese readout of the talks said. The foreign and defense ministers of the two countries also met subsequently.

Briefing reporters in Kazan on October 23, Misri said that Modi and Xi had agreed that by showing "mutual respect for each other's sensitivities, interests, concerns and aspirations, the two countries can have a peaceful, stable and beneficial bilateral relationship."

The first clue that a possible thaw was in the offing came in an interview by Prime Minister Modi with Newsweek in April this year. The posting of a new Chinese Ambassador Xu Feihong in New Delhi in May 2024, 18 months after his predecessor left the Indian capital was also seen as a step toward unfreezing of ties.

Since he assumed official duties, Xu has used his X account, formerly Twitter, to reach out to the Indian public whose opinion had turned sharply against China after the Galwan clash. Xu and the Chinese embassy in New Delhi have also posted information regarding the travel of small groups of Indians to China, sponsored by the embassy.

Another hint of India and China being close to working out a solution came in August when the Indian foreign ministry statement said after talks between diplomats that the dialogue had been “forward looking.” This came amid a toning down of aggressive rhetoric from the Chinese media, largely viewed as government-backed and reflecting official views.

Analysts have described the breakthrough as a “tactical achievement.”

However, the reasons behind the breakthrough are as unclear as the causes for the sudden Chinese mobilization in 2020.

Some speculate that India’s growing proximity to the U.S. in recent years and its development of deeper linkages with like-minded countries like the members of Quad to balance China could have been the trigger.

Another reason for China’s aggression is its ambition to head the global order, which it cannot do unless it dominates Asia. In this context, Indian Foreign Minister S Jaishankar has pointed out that with both India and China harboring ambitions to make their presence felt in the world, and rising together, it has led to a complex situation.

Why did the breakthrough in relations happen now?

One reason is that Indian industry has been quietly pushing for the normalization of ties given that many critical components and products are imported from China. Earlier this year, India’s Economic Survey 2023-24, which is a government document laying out the state of the economy, spoke of the economic imperative for getting Sino-Indian ties back on track.

Another reason being put forth by analysts is that China has understood that it cannot force India to make choices or capitulate under duress. Added to this are the uncertainties prevailing in the world, including the reelection of Donald Trump in the United States and his threats to place punitive tariffs across imports into the U.S. This could be another plausible explanation for why India and China are looking to end their tensions.

Now that the two countries have taken the first step toward normalization of ties, the question is what’s next?

In his statement to the Indian parliament last week, Jaishankar said that with the completion of disengagement, India and China got the space to look at other elements of their relationship keeping “national security interests first and foremost.” This could mean that economic interests will be predicated on security-related matters.

In the immediate future, the two countries will need to carry out two more steps – de-escalation and de-induction of troops. The first refers to moving troops back (perhaps by 3 to 7 kilometers) to minimize the possibility of conflict. De-induction refers to an agreement between the two sides to pull the amassed personnel and heavy weaponry back by some 100 kilometers. This is expected to take several rounds of talks by senior army commanders backed, of course, by political direction.

Once these are accomplished, the two countries will need to work out a fresh set of confidence building measures, given that the ones in place prior to the Galwan clash were summarily disregarded by China in 2020. These measures will have to be strictly implemented, backed by verification methods as India cannot afford to be caught napping again.

These measures could take years to draw up, which means India will have to continue to closely monitor its China border.

The two sides have agreed to coordinated patrols to avoid tensions. China has also sought patrolling rights in Arunachal Pradesh in the east. This is something that India will need to consider cautiously given China’s claim over all of Arunachal Pradesh which it calls “South Tibet.” The particular area in question is Yangste, which has seen consistent attempts of transgression by the Chinese and was also the scene of a scuffle in 2022. Just as China claims all of Arunachal Pradesh that India administers, New Delhi says the Aksai Chin area in Kashmir that China has occupied since 1962 is part of its territory. India doesn’t have any patrolling rights in this area.

On the economic side, India will need to quickly scale up efforts to de-risk its economy from its current levels of exposure to China. That is a tough ask as India’s trade in 2023 touched $115.82 billion with a trade deficit of almost $100 billion, in Beijing’s favor. India can be expected to speedily tie up plans to boost trade and supply chain initiatives with Quad partners Australia and Japan. There are some free trade pacts in the offing that need to be concluded quickly. Indian industry should also look to source products and components from within the country and set up and promote domestic supply chains. An economically strong India will be attractive for investors looking at the China+1 alternative. It will give India resources and the confidence to build up its national capacities vis a vis China.

K P Oli's China gamble

09 December 2024, The Indian Express, Yubraj Ghimire

The Nepal PM did not wait indefinitely for an invitation from Delhi. Instead, he gave out the message that Beijing is no less important.

Nepal Prime Minister K P Oli's China visit from December 2 to 5 had triggered a loud response even before it began. The Chinese media, including Global Times, called it "tradition breaking" while some in Indian media called it a surrender to the north. Nepal's political spectrum, including the two major constituents in the ruling coalition – Oli-led Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist) and the Nepali Congress – were divided on whether Nepal should sign the Belt and Road Initiative framework that may involve having to take loans from China as it goes into implementation phase.

Before he flew back home, Oli said on social media platform X, "Today, we signed the Framework for Belt & Roads Cooperation. As my official visit to China concludes, I am honoured to reflect on the bilateral talks with Premier Li Qiang, discussions with NPC Chairman Zhang Leji, and the highly fruitful meeting with President Xi Jinping."

Advertisement

Seemingly, Oli defied NC's strict condition that cooperation from China under the BRI should only be grant based. The BRI framework agreement has not offered any special concessions for Nepal. Oli may face the wrath of the Nepali Congress, and even face a crisis of survival, but he found the risk worth it. As with his previous two visits as PM, he has been able to create an impression this time too that Nepal can trust China more and enhance strategic cooperation. In 2016, close on the heels of an economic blockade by India, Oli had signed the treaty of Trade and Transit with China, securing alternative access to the sea.

Oli did not wait indefinitely for an invitation from Delhi this time, generally the first port of call for a Nepali PM, giving a message that Beijing is no less important. In fact, it is more welcoming.

On November 25, the Nepali Congress and its leader Arzu Rana Deuba had rushed to Chengdu and told her counterpart Wang Yi that her government and party would only welcome grants, not loans in any form under the BRI. Yi, understandably, gave her the cold shoulder, and responded by asking her to convey it to Beijing.

That was not without reason. Deuba had played an active role successfully lobbying for parliamentary endorsement of the Millennium Challenge Corporation's (MCC) Nepal compact worth $500 million grant in 2022, five years after the two sides had signed an understanding. That delay was largely because of fear and division within the communist parties that the MCC was part of an Indo-Pacific strategy with security components. But a hawkish warning by the US that Nepal's failure to ratify by the February deadline will lead to a review of the entire gamut of US cooperation had its desired impact.

Second, the Nepali Congress and the Bharatiya Janata Party have now become "'fraternal parties". Foreign Minister Deuba may not have gone down well with China, but Oli's 20 minutes one-on-one meeting with President Xi on Tuesday seems to have done the magic. President Xi may not have given a deadline on the BRI Framework like the Americans did on the MCC ratification, but China's interest next door being undermined vis-a-vis the US was not acceptable to it. For Oli, overruling Xi's concern was far more difficult, if not impossible.

Xi, who had visited Nepal in October 2019, reiterated his preparedness to do anything to safeguard Nepal's independence and its right to choose its developmental path. Enhancing strategic cooperation, transforming the once India-locked Nepal into a prosperous country by linking the two sides by rivers and mountains, developing Himalayan railway and road connectivity, investing in energy, trade and investment and hospitality, promoting Chinese tourism in Nepal, especially next year when the two countries will be celebrating their 70th anniversary of diplomatic ties, and dispatching volunteers to teach Mandarin across Nepal were the other agendas the two sides agreed upon.

For Oli, consolidating the proximity with China seems crucial with all the risks it may contain. Not trusting the assurances coming from Xi was difficult, if not impossible. In his speech at Peking University on Tuesday, Oli spoke at length about Nepal's domestic politics, the history of movements for democracy in the country, hailing the current alliance between UML and NC, and denouncing both the monarchy and the Maoists. In a way, he was making a case that China has a trustworthy ally only in UML. He gave no credit to any one in the past for developing ties with China, but praised himself for his sacrifice and suffering in Nepal for the struggle for democracy.

He praised BRI as a visionary initiative of President Xi in the spirit of shared prosperity and win-win cooperation, hoping "together, Nepal and China can envision a future of shared prosperity and enduring friendship, inspired by mutual respect and the pursuit of a better world for all."

Despite Oli's totalitarian character, political actors other than the Nepali Congress may not be unhappy over what he achieved on the Beijing trip. But how the two sides would move to execute the BRI projects in near future is something that would require time to assess. What fate awaits Oli politically would largely be decided by the NC response at home over it being overruled in China. But Oli, even if he loses his chair, will try to emerge as a "martyr" for the nation's cause.

Self-Determination of Tibet: A Contentious Issue

09 December 2024, IDSA

Summary

Negotiations on self-determination of Tibet has been a contentious matter between the Tibetan ethnic minority and the PRC government. The PRC government has failed to implement in letter and spirit various laws which stipulate the establishment of autonomous regions for the ethnic minorities in China.

A diplomatic spat between the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the United States (US) has ensued, following US President Biden signing the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act' on 12 July 2024 into law.<sup>1</sup> Reacting to the Act, China stated that the US is undermining the "basic norms governing international relations" and should recognise Xizang (Tibet) as part of China. It urged the US not to support "Tibet independence" which if it fails to do, "China will take resolute measures to firmly defend its sovereignty, security and development interests".<sup>2</sup>

Appraising the Act, along with the affirmation of upholding human rights and direct negotiations "without preconditions" with the Dalai Lama in order to resolve the differences, are some of the fundamental aspects at stake for the 'self-determination' of Tibet. This Brief examines how the principle of self-determination has been contested between the Chinese government and the Tibetan ethnic minority. It begins with a review on how the principles of self-determination have been construed in international law.

Self-Determination in International Law

The principle of self-determination, which can be traced back to the French revolution in 1789 and the American Declaration of Independence of 1776, refers to the legal right of people to choose their own political destiny. In the contemporary period, it has been closely associated with US President Woodrow Wilson, when after the First World War, several new states were created from the losing powers of Germany, Austria-Hungary and the Ottoman Empire.

Previously, self-determination was perceived as a 'political concept' but later on, it emerged as a "principle of positive international law" based on the UN Charter as in Article 1(2), it is requisite that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to "develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determinations of people".<sup>4</sup>

The principle of self-determination has been addressed in several UN resolutions, declarations and conventions. However, it is an 'elusive concept', mainly due to an unclear definition of 'people', i.e., who are actually entitled to self-determination (for example, indigenous groups, religious groups and other minorities), resulting in various interpretations and significant implications in practice.<sup>5</sup>

One of the foremost legal rights for self-determination is the "Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and People" adopted by UN General Assembly (GA) Resolution 1514 in 1960, where Para 1 declares, "the subjugation of people to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights" and is contrary to the UN Charter.<sup>6</sup> These legal rights were primarily designed or interpreted to foster the decolonisation process and were upheld by the International Court of Justice in the Namibia case.<sup>7</sup>

Additionally, the application of self-determination beyond the anti-colonial dimension was adopted in 1970 by the UNGA, 'Friendly Relations Declarations' which entail the right of self-determination to all people freely "without external interference, their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development".<sup>8</sup> However, this legal document demands that self-determination be exercised cautiously, without disturbing the territorial integrity of the existing state. In other words, these legal rights are in line with 'internal self-determination', i.e., autonomy.<sup>9</sup>

In the case of internal self-determination, Article 1 of the two international Covenants of 1966—International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights—provides people the right to "freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development". Legal expert Antonio Cassese is of the view that all members of an inhabitant state have the right to express self-determination through "internal-decision making processes", without disturbing the territorial integrity of sovereign states.<sup>10</sup> Indeed, such rights have been recognised in the United Nations Declarations on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 2007 where Article 4 declares that indigenous people "have the right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs, as well as ways and means for financing their autonomous functions".<sup>11</sup>

Although the core substance of self-determination infers secession or the ability to establish sovereign and independent states, in international laws, unilateral secession is not well received due to the fear of creating instability, when or if the right of self-determination is exercised by all who claim it. Former UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali thoughtfully said: "if every ethnic, religious or linguistic group claimed statehood, there would be no limits to fragmentation and peace and security and economic well-being for all would become even more difficult to achieve."<sup>12</sup>

Nonetheless, there are jurists that emphasise the applicability of self-determination to a particular group of people to secure their territorial sovereignty. Such kinds of self-determination are known as 'remedial secession' where self-determination is applied as a last resort or secession is justified, if any aggrieved group is severely persecuted by the state.<sup>13</sup> Such legal rights are detailed in the UNGA Resolution 2625, which states that the territorial integrity of the state is protected, if the government is represented by "the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction as to race, creed or color".<sup>14</sup> This clause implies that if any government is unrepresentative or oppressive, it may trigger secession. Meanwhile, some jurists also emphasise, if internal self-determination or say autonomy are flawed in implementation, secession should be seen as a matter of last resort.

Negotiations for Tibetan Self-Determination

On 13 February 1913, the 13th Dalai Lama formally declared the independence of Tibet, following the overthrow of Manchu Qing dynasty by the Chinese nationalist revolution in 1911.<sup>15</sup> The historiography on whether Tibet is a part of China, however, is complicated as both sides have competing narratives.<sup>16</sup> But one major historical event in which Tibet formally came under the control of China is when Chinese troops entered Tibet in 1950 and consequently signed the "Agreement on Measures for the Peaceful Liberation of Tibet" (17 Point Agreement) on 23 May 1951.<sup>17</sup>

Subsequently, at the UNGA, numerous resolutions were passed calling for the right to self-determination for the Tibetan people but it was met with negligible support from the international community.<sup>18</sup> Additionally, the UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities adopted a resolution on 23 August 1991 calling on the Government of the People's Republic of China "fully to respect the fundamental human rights and freedoms of the Tibetan people".<sup>19</sup> After decades of impasse, dialogue between the two sides commenced with a pre-condition that except for

"total independence" all other issues were open for discussion.<sup>20</sup> Without substantial outcome, the talks ended in 1985 with the removal of Chinese representative Hu Yao-bang.<sup>21</sup>

Dialogue between the Tibetan and Chinese representatives, however, entered a new chapter following the Dalai Lama's announcement of the "Middle way approach", implying not seeking separation or independence of Tibet, but instead securing 'genuine autonomy' within the scope of the constitution of the People's Republic of China.<sup>22</sup> In order to achieve a genuine autonomy for Tibetan peoples, the Tibetan administration formulated a 'Five point peace plan' in 1987, the Strasbourg proposal in 1998 and the Memorandum on Genuine Autonomy in 2008. Dialogue between the two sides continued based on these three core documents, but ended abruptly in 2010 without any substantial outcome.

In the negotiations between Tibetan representatives and the Chinese government, securing genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people has been a key issue, and has led to deadlock and pauses in the negotiation process. Hence, it is necessary and worthwhile to look into how the PRC government takes into account autonomy in relation to ethnic minorities.

Assessment of 'Autonomy' Implementation in China
Regional ethnic autonomy is supposed to be the core governance mechanism for ethnic minorities in China.<sup>23</sup> Though the 'Common Program' and the 1954 Constitution of the People's Republic of China (PRC) specify the establishment of regional autonomy, Chinese constitutional expert, Gao Quanxi has argued that the 1982 PRC Constitution as amended in 2018 has been infused with a legal attribute, which is aimed at ending incessant revolution, discarding absolute class struggle, substituted by "dictatorship of the proletariat" with a "people's democratic dictatorship".<sup>24</sup>

In the 1982 PRC Constitution, the preamble declares, "China is a unified multi-ethnic state founded by the Chinese people of all ethnic groups" and opposes "major ethnic group (Han) chauvinism". Further, Article 4 stipulates the promotion of ethnic equality and unity, where discrimination and oppression of any ethnic groups is prohibited, and allows for the establishment of autonomous regions for self-governance while obliging that "all ethnic groups shall have the freedom to use and develop their own spoken and written languages and to preserve or reform their own traditions and customs".<sup>25</sup> Additionally, based on the 1982 constitution, the National People's Congress in 1984 adopted the "Law on Regional Ethnic Autonomy" which was amended in 2001, strengthening and expanding the existing autonomous rights formulated in the 1982 constitution.<sup>26</sup>

Assessing implementation of the ethnic minorities' policy by the PRC government, it is characterised as one of "gradualism and pluralism" where until the late 1950s, a tolerant and benign attitude was practiced towards ethnic minorities by the PRC government.<sup>27</sup> But from the 1960s onwards under the leadership of Mao, especially during the Cultural Revolution (1967–1976), the ethnic minorities experienced the most repressive and assimilative period in the history of PRC.<sup>28</sup> Again from the 1970s, under the leadership of Deng Xiaoping, extreme assimilation of minorities ended and they began to make claims to uphold their rights to national autonomy.

In the case of the Tibetan ethnic minority, though the demand for genuine autonomy by the Tibetan representative emerged more recently, essentially it was already featured way back in 17 Point Agreement in May 1951, as para 3 underlined that, "the Tibetan people have the right of exercising national regional autonomy under the unified leadership of the Central People's Government".<sup>29</sup> The PRC government, however, violated the agreement.<sup>30</sup>

To achieve the aspiration of autonomy for the Tibetan people, its representatives even submitted a "Memorandum on Genuine Autonomy for the Tibetan People" in 2008 to the PRC government.<sup>31</sup> The demand for autonomy in the memorandum was drafted in consonance with the PRC constitution and the Law on regional ethnic autonomy, which essentially addresses independently managing the internal affairs of Tibetans including language, culture, religion education, environment protection and utilisation of natural resources.

The evaluation of autonomy implementation in the Tibet Autonomous Region, however, reveals policy swings between "more tolerant and more repressive" by the PRC government.<sup>32</sup> Ironically, one of the fundamental reasons why the PRC government rejected the Tibetan proposal of autonomy, and instead adopted a repressive policy towards the Tibetan ethnic minority, is due to "fear of the external forces" of Western countries, especially the United States.<sup>33</sup>

The US policy on Tibet can be traced back to the 1940s, when the US government entered an agreement with Tibet to build a supply route through Tibet to China against Japanese attack. US policy on Tibet has been termed "inconsistencies in commitment, interspersed with occasional bursts of sympathy and activism"<sup>34</sup> mostly due to the impact of Cold War politics. Until 1970, Tibet was included in the US strategy to counter communist expansion in Asia. But it was weakened following the rapprochement of Sino-US relations in the 1970s.<sup>35</sup> And conversely, the Soviet Union, which in the 1950s fully backed the PRC government claim to sovereignty over Tibet, began to condemn Chinese policy in Tibet as a "colonial power".<sup>36</sup> Contrary to the Cold War period, however, Russia's policy on Tibet "seems to view the Tibetan issue in the context of Chechnya, unfortunately".<sup>37</sup>

One major reason for the US leveraging of Tibetan separatism is based on the notion of a growing 'China threat' both in terms of military and economy, which the PRC government considers as a 'containment policy'. Yet, US leveraging of Tibetan secession has consequences, especially for Tibetans in Tibet and also for the resolution of the Tibetan question. Sinologist Barry Sautman cautions that backing secession by great powers "makes it harder for Tibetans in Tibet to seek self-representation without being suspected of pursuing secession" and also "even makes it harder to resolve the Tibetan question".<sup>38</sup>

Way Forward

The President of the Central Tibetan Administration Penpa Tsering in September 2024 acknowledged that 'back-channel' talks between the two sides have been initiated.<sup>39</sup> The PRC government has laid two conditions for resuming negotiations. First, as the Chinese government considers the Central Tibetan Government as an organised political group with an agenda for 'Tibetan independence', negotiations will be held "only with the personal representatives of the 14th Dalai Lama". And second, any contact or talks will only be about the personal future of the 14th Dalai Lama and the handful of people close to him, and not a 'high degree of autonomy'.<sup>40</sup> Meanwhile, external threat perceptions will significantly determine the outcome of negotiations.

To preserve the territorial integrity and maintain amicable relations among the 56 ethnic groups in China, however, one fundamental key is to uphold the PRC constitution and the Law of ethnic regional autonomy in letter and spirit. The fact is Tibetans are not seeking separation from China and this was reiterated recently by the Dalai Lama when he stated "We want to have full autonomy, as part of the People's Republic of China."<sup>41</sup> Thus, much of the discontent among the minorities stems from incomplete or flawed implementation of China's ethnic minority policies.

India must support the Dalai Lama's right to rebirth

Respecting the Dalai Lama's right to choose his place of rebirth is a testament to India's commitment to human rights and spiritual freedom.

The Dalai Lama, a symbol of peace and spiritual leadership, has long been a beacon of hope for millions around the world. His teachings transcend borders, promoting compassion, non-violence, and understanding. As the current Dalai Lama ages, the question of his reincarnation becomes increasingly pertinent. It is crucial for India, a nation that has historically provided refuge to the Dalai Lama and his followers, to respect and support his right to choose his place of rebirth, even if it is outside the confines of communist China.

The Dalai Lama's lineage is deeply rooted in Tibetan Buddhism, where the process of reincarnation is a fundamental belief. The selection of the next Dalai Lama is not merely a political decision but a spiritual one, guided by centuries-old traditions. Historically, the Dalai Lama has been a unifying figure for Tibetans, embodying their cultural and religious identity. The Chinese government's attempts to control the reincarnation process are seen by many as an effort to undermine Tibetan autonomy and spiritual freedom.

India has been a sanctuary for the Dalai Lama since 1959, when he fled Tibet following a failed uprising against Chinese rule. This act of asylum was not just a political gesture but a commitment to uphold human rights and religious freedom. By supporting the Dalai Lama's right to be reborn outside China, India would reaffirm its dedication to these principles. It would also send a powerful message to the international community about the importance of spiritual autonomy and the right to self-determination. Supporting the Dalai Lama's right to choose his place of rebirth could have significant geopolitical implications. It would likely strain India's already complex relationship with China. However, it is essential to weigh these potential diplomatic tensions against the broader ethical and moral considerations. Upholding the Dalai Lama's spiritual rights aligns with India's democratic values and its long-standing tradition of religious tolerance.

India's support for the Dalai Lama's right to be reborn outside communist China is not just about respecting an individual's spiritual journey. It is about standing up for the principles of freedom, human rights, and cultural preservation. As global citizens, we must advocate for a world where spiritual leaders can practise their beliefs without fear of political interference. India's leadership in this matter could inspire other nations to take a stand, fostering a global environment of respect and understanding.

In conclusion, respecting the Dalai Lama's right to choose his place of rebirth is a testament to India's commitment to human rights and spiritual freedom. It is a call for India to continue its legacy of compassion and support for those who seek refuge from oppression. By doing so, India will not only honour the Dalai Lama's spiritual journey but also uphold the values that define its own identity.

Xi unlikely to attempt Taiwan invasion during Trump second term, experts say

08 December 2024, Taipei Times

Chinese President Xi Jinping (習近平) is unlikely to attempt an invasion of Taiwan during US president-elect Donald Trump's time in office, Taiwanese and foreign academics said on Friday.

Trump is set to begin his second term early next year. Xi's ambition to establish China as a "true world power" has intensified over the years, but he would not initiate an invasion of Taiwan "in the near future," as his top priority is to maintain the regime and his power, not unification, Tokyo Woman's Christian University distinguished visiting professor and contemporary Chinese politics expert Akio Takahara said.

Chinese and US flags are pictured in an arranged photograph taken on Jan. 30 last year.

Takahara made the comment at a symposium in Taipei by National Chengchi University's Institute of International Relations to discuss the potential impact of Trump's return to the White House on Indo-Pacific countries, including Taiwan.

He highlighted Xi's shift from telling former US president Barack Obama that the Pacific Ocean is big enough for the US and China, to telling US President Joe Biden last year that the world can accommodate the two countries.

Viewing the Pacific Ocean from China's perspective, Xi sees unifying Taiwan as essential, not only as a "very nationalistic target," but also as a way to break through the first island chain and secure an advantage in the strategic competition with the US, Takahara said.

"When Xi Jinping finds that it is better to attack Taiwan to maintain power, then I think he will attack — but that is not tomorrow, that is not next year, that is not 2027," he said, adding that the Chinese president is likely to continue his current strategy of "winning without fighting," which relies on economic and cultural infiltration in Taiwan.

If Trump does not change the US-Taiwan policy "in a big way," then Xi would most likely refrain from using military force against Taiwan during his second term, Takahara said.

"Attacking Taiwan is too risky," as such action would severely damage China's economy and "certainly undermine the source of his [Xi's] legitimacy to rule," he said.

In the event of a "no-reason invasion" by China, the US is likely to intervene with support from Japan, provided its Taiwan policy remains unchanged, he added.

Echoing Takahara, Sam Houston State University Department of Political Science associate professor Dennis Weng (翁履中) said that under the Trump administration, there would be no war or military conflicts between Taiwan and China, as Trump strongly opposes military confrontation.

"He will utilize all kinds of bargaining or all kinds of negotiations" to prevent a Taiwan-China war from happening," Weng said.

Although China is unlikely to initiate an invasion of Taiwan in the next four years, Beijing would utilize "some other tools in their toolbox," such as cutting off trade deals with Taiwan and further isolating it by "taking away" its remaining diplomatic allies, he said.

What Do the Latest Purges Mean for China's Military?

07 December 2024, The Diplomat, Duncan Bartlett

The dismissal of senior commanders creates a sense of "chaos and disarray," says a leading defense expert.

Xi Jinping holds the founding father of the People's Republic of China, Mao Zedong, in high esteem. He sometimes copies Mao's style of dress and displays similar mannerisms. He has even found ways to use Mao's slogans for his own purposes.

In 1938, Mao said: "Every communist must grasp the truth; political power grows out of the barrel of a gun."

In modern China, that militant idea serves as a reminder that the authority of the supreme leader rests upon his control over the military.

In what appears to be a deliberate echo of Mao, Xi told senior ranking officers of the Chinese People's Liberation Army in June 2024: "We must make it clear that the barrels of guns must always be in the hands of those who are loyal and dependable to the [Chinese Communist] Party ... And we must make it clear that there is no place for any corrupt elements in the military."

Since then, a strident campaign to eradicate corruption has continued, leading to the removal of senior officers and political commissars.

Information that has reached the public domain suggests a systematic purge. But much remains hidden, and apparently the obfuscation is deliberate. People accused of corruption tend to disappear; their names redacted from official news sources and social media.

One concrete piece of information was announced by China's Ministry of Defense in November. It said that a senior admiral named Miao Hua has been removed from his post and placed under investigation for a "serious violation of discipline."

A purge reminds everyone in the People's Liberation Army that they must show absolute loyalty to the Communist Party, according to William Matthews, a senior research fellow on the Asia-Pacific Program at Chatham House in London.

Matthews noted in a recent article for Chatham House that Miao was a significant figure within the Central Military Commission (CMC), of which Xi is chair. As director of the CMC's Political Work Department, Miao was responsible for choosing who would fill senior positions. He was also expected to ensure ideological conformity.

"By suspending Miao, Xi has further demonstrated a willingness to remove a perceived loyalist at the highest levels of China's military to ensure compliance with his political agenda, set an example, and ensure the PLA develops in the direction he intends," wrote Matthews.

On November 27, the Financial Times also claimed that China's Defense Minister Dong Jun was being investigated on corruption charges. FT cited "current and former U.S. officials familiar with the situation" in its report. If true, it would mean that three consecutive defense ministers in China have been ensnared in corruption investigations.

At a press briefing in Beijing, however, Defense Ministry spokesman Wu Qian responded by insisting that the FT report was pure fabrication.

"The rumor-mongers are ill-intentioned. China expresses its strong dissatisfaction with such slanderous behavior," Wu said.

On December 5, Dong appeared in public in Shanghai, attending a security forum on the Gulf of Guinea. According to Chinese state media, he met with heads of foreign delegations and conveyed China's willingness to work with the armed forces of other countries.

Helena Legarda, lead analyst of China's defense and foreign policy at the Mercator Institute for China Studies (MERICS) in Berlin said that it is unusual for party members who are placed under investigation for corruption to later return to their old posts.

"While the investigation might still be ongoing internally, it looks as if Dong Jun will stay on as defense minister for the time being," she told The Diplomat.

In October 2023, another Central Military Commission member, General Li Shangfu, lost his position as defense minister. In June of this year, Li and his predecessor, Wei Fenghe were dismissed from the CCP and the military on corruption charges.

In Legarda's view, these developments, along with the official confirmation that Miao Hua – who, as a member of the CMC, outranked Dong – has been suspended, indicate that the anti-corruption campaign within the PLA is ongoing and broadening.

"More officers may be removed as this continues," she told The Diplomat.

Legarda believes the military has a long-standing and severe corruption problem.

"It is no secret that the PLA has suffered from corruption for a long time. Officers were notorious for taking bribes in exchange for offering soldiers promotions up the ranks. Also, some officers have been involved in shady activities to support their private commercial activities," she explained. "That is why the initial anti-corruption campaign, which goes all the way back to 2012, initially had a fair amount of support among the public."

Such purges are a characteristic of a one-party state. However, Legarda said it is hard to tell the extent to which the anti-corruption drive is being used as cover to oust members of the PLA who are perceived as potential rivals to Xi Jinping.

Dong and Miao were both appointed to their positions by Xi himself.

Matthews from Chatham House argued that although the move against his protégés may cause Xi to lose face, loyalty and control of the military is more important to him than anything else.

Nevertheless, purges carry risks.

"In addition to the reputational costs to Xi himself as CCP and CMC chairman, whose personal appointments suggest a pattern of misjudgment, there are consequences for how the PLA is seen by potential adversaries," Matthews wrote.

Since last year, Chinese authorities have launched disciplinary proceedings against numerous senior military officials, including a former air force chief, senior commanders at the PLA's strategic missile force, as well as officers who had worked in procurement.

Several executives at major defense contractors have also been abruptly removed as government advisers, stirring speculation over their fate.

Xi's critics say that the anti-corruption campaign fails to address core issues. By focusing on individual purges, rather than institutional reform, it has created a cycle of high-profile dismissals that have undermined trust between the military and government.

At an international level, questions are being asked about how this struggle will affect the PLA's combat capability.

"These purges signal chaos and disarray," said Legarda.

"That can have an impact on the image of the PLA and the perception of China's willingness to use force. If Xi Jinping keeps having to replace top leaders because they are corrupt, how is he or other party leaders going to trust generals when they say they are ready to run a successful military campaign against Taiwan, or engage in conflict in the South China Sea?"

In Legarda's view, troubles within the military could reduce the appetite for conflict – at least in the short term. Xi's urgent mission now is to fill the top ranks of the PLA with officers whom he trusts to "fight and win wars" upon his command.

What China's critical mineral ban means for the US

06 December 2024, Technology Review, James Temple

The nation has signaled it's prepared to hit back harder still, in ways that could inflict serious economic pain on its biggest economic rival.

This week, China banned exports of several critical minerals to the US, marking the latest move in an escalating series of tit-for-tat trade restrictions between the world's two largest economies.

In explicitly cutting off, rather than merely restricting, materials of strategic importance to the semiconductor, defense, and electric vehicle sectors, China has clearly crossed a new line in the long-simmering trade war.

At the same time, it selected minerals that won't cripple any industries—which leaves China plenty of ammunition to inflict greater economic pain in response to any further trade restrictions that the incoming Trump administration may impose.

The president-elect recently pledged to impose an additional 10% tariff on all Chinese goods, and he floated tariff rates as high as 60% to 100% during his campaign. But China, which dominates the supply chains for numerous critical minerals essential to high-tech sectors, seems to be telegraphing that it's prepared to hit back hard.

"It's a sign of what China is capable of," says Gracelin Baskaran, director of the Critical Minerals Security Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a bipartisan research nonprofit in Washington, DC. "Shots have been fired."

What drove the decision?

China's announcement directly followed the Biden administration's decision to further restrict exports of chips and other technologies that could help China develop advanced semiconductors used in cutting-edge weapon systems, artificial intelligence, and other applications.

Throughout his presidency, Biden has enacted a series of increasingly aggressive export controls aimed at curbing China's military strength, technological development, and growing economic power. But the latest clampdown crossed a "clear line in the sand for China," by threatening its ability to protect national security or shift toward production of more advanced technologies, says Cory Combs, associate director at Trivium China, a research firm.

"It is very much indicative of where Beijing feels its interests lie," he says.

What exactly did China ban?

In response to the US's new chip export restrictions, China immediately banned exports of gallium, germanium, antimony, and so called "superhard materials" used heavily in manufacturing, arguing that they have both military and civilian applications, according to the New York Times. China had already placed limits on the sale of most of these goods to the US.

The nation said it may also further restrict sales of graphite, which makes up most of the material in the lithium-ion battery anodes used in electric vehicles, grid storage plants, and consumer electronics.

What will the bans do?

Experts say, for the most part, the bans won't have major economic impacts. This is in part because China already restricted exports of these minerals months ago, and also because they are mostly used for niche categories within the semiconductor industry. US imports of these materials from China have already fallen as US companies figured out new sources or substitutes for the materials.

But a recent US Geological Survey study found that outright bans on gallium and germanium by China could cut US gross domestic product by $3.4 billion. In addition, these are materials that US politicians will certainly take note of, because they "touch on many forms of security: economic, energy, and defense," Baskaran says.

Antimony, for example, is used in "armor-piercing ammunition, night-vision goggles, infrared sensors, bullets, and precision optics," Baskaran and a colleague noted in a recent essay.

Companies rely on gallium to produce a variety of military and electronics components, including satellite systems, power converters, LEDs, and the high-powered chips used in electric vehicles. Germanium is used in fiber optics, infrared optics, and solar cells.

Before it restricted the flow of these materials, China accounted for more than half of US imports of gallium and germanium, according to the US Geological Survey. Together, China and Russia control 50% of the worldwide reserves of antimony.

How does it affect climate tech?

Any tightened restrictions on graphite could have a pronounced economic impact on US battery and EV makers, in part because there are so few other sources for it. China controls about 80% of graphite output from mines and processes around 70% of the material, according to the International Energy Agency.

"It would be very significant for batteries," says Seaver Wang, co-director of the climate and energy team at the Breakthrough Institute, where his research is focused on minerals and manufacturing supply chains. "By weight, you need way more graphite per terawatt hour than nickel, cobalt, or lithium. And the US has essentially no operating production."

Advertisement

Anything that pushes up the costs of EVs threatens to slow the shift away from gas-guzzlers in the US, as their lofty price tags remain one of the biggest hurdles for many consumers.

How does this impact China's economy?

There are real economic risks in China's decision to cut off the sale of materials it dominates, as it creates incentives for US companies to seek out new sources around the world, switch to substitute materials, and work to develop more domestic supplies where geology allows.

"The challenge China faces is that most of its techniques to increase pain by disrupting supply chains would also impact China, which itself is connected to these supply chains," says Chris Miller, a professor at Tufts University and author of Chip War: The Fight for the World's Most Critical Technology.

Notably, the latest announcement could compel US companies to develop their own sources of gallium and germanium, which can be extracted as by-products of zinc and aluminum mining. There are a number of zinc mines in Alaska and Tennessee, and limited extraction of bauxite, which produces aluminum, in Arkansas, Alabama, and Georgia.

Gallium can also be recycled from numerous electronics, providing another potential domestic path for US companies, Combs notes.

The US has already taken steps to counter China's dominance over the raw ingredients of essential industries, including by issuing a $150 million loan to an Australian company, Syrah Resources, to accelerate the development of graphite mining in Mozambique.

In addition, the mining company Perpetua Resources has proposed reopening a gold mine near Yellow Pine, Idaho, in part to extract antimony trisulfide for use in military applications. The US Department of Defense has provided tens of millions of dollars to help the company conduct environmental studies, though it will still take years for the mine to come online, noted Baskaran and her colleague.

Wang says that China's ban might prove "shortsighted," as any success in diversifying these global supply chains will weaken the nation's grip in the areas it now dominates.

What happens next?

The US is also likely to pay very high economic costs in an escalating trade war with China.

Should the nation decide to enact even stricter trade restrictions, Combs says China could opt to inflict greater economic pain on the US through a variety of means. These could include further restricting or fully banning graphite, as well other crucial battery materials like lithium; cutting off supplies of tungsten, which is used heavily in the aerospace, military, and nuclear power sectors; and halting the sale of copper, which is used in power transmission lines, solar panels, wind turbines, EVs, and many other products.

China may also decide to take further steps to prevent US firms from selling their goods into the massive market of Chinese consumers and industries, Miller adds. Or it might respond to stricter export restrictions by turning to the US's economic rivals for advanced technologies.

In the end, it's not clear either nation wins in a protracted and increasingly combative trade war. But it's also not apparent that mutually assured economic damage will prove to be an effective deterrent. Indeed, China may well feel the need to impose stricter measures in the coming months or years, as there are few signs that President-elect Trump intends to tone down his hawkish stance toward China.

"It's hard to see a Trump 2.0 de-escalating with China," Baskaran says. "We're on a one-way trajectory toward continued escalation; the question is the pace and the form. It's not really an 'if' question."

China's Rules through Ideologically Indoctrinating the Youth

06 December 2024, RTV

Education is often viewed as the bedrock of critical thinking and intellectual freedom. Yet, in China, schools and universities serve a different purpose: indoctrination into the ideology of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). From the earliest stages of education to the halls of higher learning, the Chinese education system has been understood to systematically mould students to align with state narratives, enabling compliance and discouraging dissent.

In China, the education system is weaponized by the CCP to inculcate unwavering loyalty to its ideology. Nowhere is this more evident than in the Party's narratives about Tibet, Xinjiang, and Taiwan. Through manipulating curriculums and state-controlled pedagogy, Chinese schools and universities have transformed classrooms into arenas of political indoctrination, aiming to distort histories and suppress alternative perspectives.

This systematic indoctrination has not only entrenched authoritarian control but has also perpetuated harmful stereotypes and fuelled divisions that has hindered China's relationship with the international community.

The CCP's Narratives: A Manufactured Reality

From the earliest stages of education, Chinese students are taught that Tibet and Xinjiang are 'inseparable parts' of China and that Taiwan's sovereignty is non-negotiable. School textbooks have known to whitewash histories of these regions, portraying them as historically Chinese territories and erasing the cultural and political autonomy they once held.

The CCP's narrative on Tibet emphasizes its "peaceful liberation" in 1951, a euphemism for military invasion. Students are taught that Tibet continues to be backward, yet a feudal society rescued by Chinese intervention. The realities of Tibetan resistance, the destruction of monasteries, and the suppression of Tibetan Buddhism are unsurprisingly absent from these discourses. By presenting Tibet as a grateful beneficiary of Chinese governance, the CCP's projection has attempted to reinforce its legitimacy while silencing the Tibetan struggle for self-determination.

Similarly, in the case of Xinjiang, elementary school textbooks have emphasized economic development and ethnic harmony, downplaying the harsh realities of mass detentions, cultural erosion, and systemic repression faced by the Uyghur population. These curriculums have projected narratives emphasising how Uyghurs have benefited from Beijing's policies, glossing over their lived experiences of surveillance and forced assimilation. Students are conditioned to see the CCP's actions in Xinjiang as necessary measures to combat 'extremism', showcasing a nationalistic justification for human rights abuses.

The Limits of a Controlled Narrative

The CCP's propaganda on Tibet, Xinjiang, and Taiwan, however also does more than distort history. It has for decades bred prejudice and suppressed critical inquiry, especially when it comes to the human rights abuses the Party has conducted in these regions. By teaching students to view these regions through the lens of state ideology, the education system has entrenched harmful stereotypes and perpetuates systemic inequality.

For instance, Chinese students are been conditioned to see Tibetans and Uyghurs as 'ungrateful' or 'backward' for resisting assimilation, reinforcing societal discrimination against these groups. Similarly, the vilification of Taiwan has bred undeniable hostility that has severely undermined the possibility of peaceful cross-strait dialogue.

However, perhaps the most concerning aspect of the CCP's educational indoctrination is its suppression of dissent. Schools and universities have been equipped with surveillance systems to monitor student behaviour, and classmates are encouraged to report those who express 'unpatriotic' views, similar to practices that were exercised during the fateful 'Cultural Revolution'. This has thus created an atmosphere of fear and conformity, where self-censorship has unfortunately become the norm.

The recent crackdown on students involved in labour movements and human rights advocacy illustrates the lengths to which the Party is prepared to go to silence dissent. These students, who dared to apply the Marxist principles they were taught to contemporary labour struggles, were met with arrests and expulsions, demonstrating the CCP's hypocrisy in promoting ideology only when it serves its own interests.

The indoctrination of Chinese students has far-reaching consequences beyond China's borders. As these individuals enter global academic and professional spaces, they will carry with them a worldview shaped by CCP propaganda and Party indoctrination of views. This complicates international dialogue on human rights, as many are unwilling, or unable, to critically engage with the realities of Tibet, Xinjiang, and Taiwan.

Moreover, the CCP's education model serves as a blueprint for authoritarian regimes worldwide, demonstrating how control over education can be weaponized to sustain power and suppress dissent. The global community must recognize this and push for academic freedom and truthful education as fundamental human rights, for if not, then it must prepare to decimate the state-propaganda machinery run by the Party and its Supremo, Xi Jinping.

India's North East & Indo-Pacific Partnerships

05 December 2024, The Shillong Times

Within a short span of time there have been two engagements on the Indo-Pacific strategic alliance in Meghalaya. The first was initiated by the American Consulate Kolkata in collaboration with Observer Research Foundation. This week the UK High Commissioner to India, Lindy Cameron and her colleague Andrew Fleming, British Deputy High Commissioner, Kolkata. It may be mentioned that the Indo-Pacific strategic alliance is led by the US and includes Australia, Japan, the Philippines, South Korea, and Thailand. While the newly elected US President Donald Trump and outgoing President Joe Biden disagree on most issues, one area of consensus is the Indo-Pacific. During Trump's first term in office, in 2019 he and his team published the Indo-Pacific Strategy, which sought to maintain a "free and open" region primarily through strengthening alliances and partnerships to counter China. When Biden entered office in 2021, he doubled down on his predecessor's approach. President Trump is known to be unpredictable with his international relations and is known to be transactional more than pragmatic and far-sighted. There were times he praised the Indo-Pacific allies and times when he tried strong-arm tactics with them but as far as the Indo-Pacific alliance is concerned he was consistent in his approach of treading with enhanced diplomatic sensitivities. Kamala Harris, the Democrat candidate who lost to Donald Trump in the just concluded US elections during her campaign emphasized continuity with the Biden administration's Indo-Pacific strategy.

It was Late Abe Shinzo the former prime minister of Japan who probably convinced Trump to shift from an Asia-Pacific to Indo-Pacific focus, which would include India and the Indian Ocean Region as part of a collective strategy to counter China. Japan was also an advocate for reviving the Quad, a diplomatic partnership between Australia, India, Japan and the United States with the commitment to support an open, stable, prosperous, inclusive and resilient Indo-Pacific. Japan made these moves because, during Trump's tenure, it worried about its years-long standoff over the Senkaku Islands in the East China Sea (also claimed by China, which calls them the Diaoyu Islands). Japan was also concerned about North Korea, which in 2017 fired ballistic missiles over its territory. Since Biden came to office, Japan has shifted its attention farther south to the Taiwan Strait. Japan believes that a conflict there could impact the security of its southwestern Ryukyu Island chain. The Indo-Pacific Strategic Alliance much like the Quad is seen as a mechanism for balancing China's influence in the region, although its members have stressed that it is not a military alliance and is open to other countries who share their values and interests. It is interesting why India's North East has become the focal point here. True the North East shares 1395 kilometres with China in the North and the latter has had an abiding interest in Arunachal Pradesh by refusing to issue visas to residents of that state because it claims Arunachal Pradesh is part of South Tibet. In fact China's overarching influence in the Indo-Pacific region and in recent times its attempts to woo countries inimical to India are what makes the Indo-Pacific Strategic Alliance an important diplomatic initiative.

04 December 2024, CTA

Tibet has been under Chinese control since 1951, a situation often described by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) as "liberation". This annexation has not only involved territorial claims but has also encompassed significant social, economic, and cultural dimensions.

The CCP's approach to Tibet serves as a revealing example of its broader governance strategies towards officially recognised ethnic and religious minorities within China. For over seven decades, the treatment of Tibetans reflects the complexities of China's deep state and its assimilationist policies, which have profoundly affected Tibetan identity and autonomy.

Tibetans, who represent approximately 90.48 per cent of the population in the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR), are distinguished by their unique cultural and religious practices. Since the annexation, China has consistently asserted that Tibet is an "integral part" of its territory and has implemented various policies aimed at assimilating the Tibetan population. ### Xi's "China Dream" Proves a Hard Sell

04 December 2024, Asia Society Policy Institute

Xi's "China Dream" Proves a Hard Sell

Greg Baker/AFP via Getty Images

December 4th, 2024

Key Findings

- Over the past two years, growing evidence suggests that increasing numbers of Chinese people are not buying Xi Jinping's "China Dream" and are seeking brighter futures elsewhere.
- The number of people emigrating or seeking asylum overseas has spiked under Xi, as has the amount of private capital leaving China.
- Concerns about a lack of opportunities in a time of economic decline, restrictions on political expression, the party's more aggressive attempts at coercion, erosion of trust in the party, and pessimism about the future have contributed to the exodus of people and capital.
- More Chinese people now feel that the country is moving in the wrong direction and the potential for a course change is slim and are "voting with their feet."

When Xi Jinping first assumed leadership of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) a decade ago, he tried selling the "China Dream" – a vision of the country reclaiming its rightful place in history as the world's greatest power – but today, an increasing number of Chinese people no longer buy it. Since the end of strict zero-COVID policies in late 2022, the number of Chinese people leaving the country has rapidly climbed, as has the amount of private capital exiting through both legal and illegal means. A new social discourse is now in vogue: "runxue" – which is code for "to run away."

According to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the number of Chinese citizens seeking political asylum overseas climbed to 120,000 in 2023, a more than twelvefold increase since the time of Xi's predecessor, Hu Jintao. In 2023, the U.S. Border Patrol registered 24,314 Chinese citizens illegally entering through southern California and Texas, a number that climbed to 35,399 in the first seven months of 2024. These illegal immigrants took the "walking route": first entering Ecuador visa-free (until the privilege was recently rescinded), then navigating treacherous paths, including the notorious

Darien Gap, through half a dozen Central American countries before entering the United States through Mexico. These numbers represent a substantial increase from the meager 1,500 illegal entries during the Hu era.

Likewise, studies suggest that since the pandemic, the amount of private capital leaving China through legal and illegal means has risen significantly, to a staggering $738 billion in the third quarter of 2022. Despite strict capital controls, Chinese money has purchased luxury properties in Singapore, Vancouver, and London. Some of these financial outflows are facilitated by Chinese underground bankers and intermediated through criminal syndicates in the United States that control large sums of cash.

What explains the exodus of people and capital from China? What does it mean for Xi Jinping's regime? In general, citizens of autocratic countries, such as Iran and Russia, have little faith in their government's ability to protect their personal safety or private property. China has proven an exception to this rule since the economic reforms of the late 1970s. But things are changing.

Despite growing income inequality, many Chinese citizens have experienced rising prosperity since the early 1980s. The transformative changes in the post-Mao era enabled them to enjoy personal freedoms and economic opportunities unimaginable a generation prior. Growth-minded local officials became complicit in rule evasions that allowed private businesses to flourish in spite of the lack of protection for private property rights. Deng Xiaoping's dictum "to get rich is glorious" removed the stigma associated with private wealth accumulation. CCP cadres were incentivized to prioritize GDP growth above all else. Party officials and government bureaucrats were given a stake in economic growth and benefited professionally – and often personally – from rising prosperity. Corruption was rife, and distribution could be unequal, but everyone, from rural migrants to the urban middle class to privileged elites, got a slice of the growing economic pie.

Prior to Xi's reign, Chinese citizens may not have enjoyed political liberty, but the system allowed them to express their economic grievances, even if they were not always satisfactorily addressed. Protests about livelihood issues – wage arrears, land grabs, housing demolitions, and homeowners' complaints – were commonplace and largely tolerated as long as they were small in scale and geographically isolated. Until Xi tightened online censorship, netizens enjoyed a measure of freedom to roam within the Great Firewall and express their views on a wide range of social issues.

However, much has changed since Xi's ascent to power in 2013, and especially after the COVID-19 pandemic. As I argue in the concluding chapter of my 2022 book, Outsourcing Repression, the government regularly engaged, since Mao's era, nonstate actors such as trusted local community members to enforce compliance and mobilize citizens for state objectives. This has now given way to direct coercion under Xi. The past decade has seen widespread crackdowns on civil society organizations, activists apprehended, and tighter security measures introduced not only in Hong Kong and Xinjiang but broadly across Chinese society. Accordingly, the social compliance to everyday repression exercised by trusted nonstate actors has been replaced by various forms of resistance.

These dynamics played out during the two-year zero-COVID lockdown and its aftermath. As I wrote in Foreign Affairs in January 2023, though stringent, the lockdown policies executed by trusted community leaders and neighborhood committees yielded widespread compliance and societal acceptance in the first eighteen months. When the virus mutated to the rapidly transmissible Delta variant, the grassroots community could no longer cope with delivering essential items to residents, and food shortages occurred in Shanghai and elsewhere. In summer 2022, some people began to vent their anger online. The resistance spread to retail owners whose incomes were affected by the lockdown. The Urumqi fire that killed scores of people further ignited the "White Paper" protests on elite campuses and in major cities. These protests, together with the erosion of government income from lockdown measures, quickly led to the abrupt abandonment of the zero-COVID policy.

After the pandemic, economic decline and diminishing political space resulted in changes to the social contract. The implicit pact between the party-state and its people has long demanded political acquiescence and tolerance of income inequality in exchange for economic prosperity. As long as family incomes grew, demands for political rights were circumscribed, and tolerance for inequality remained high. However, once income growth stagnated, people began to question the system and, in particular, why certain groups were getting ahead and claiming a disproportionately larger share of the pie. In a system where people cannot effectively voice their grievances without inviting trouble, those who have the means have decided to "vote with their feet." Post-pandemic, those who lack the means to leave have opted to "lie flat" (tangping). Urbanites quit stressful jobs to move to the countryside, and increasing numbers of young people seek secure government posts and an "iron rice bowl" – a term indicating a career with guaranteed job security.

Critically, more people in China are pessimistic about the future. The current economic decline does not appear cyclical, and altering the Chinese economy's trajectory will require fundamental changes that better allocate resources and reward effort. The abolition of presidential term limits in 2018 signaled to many Chinese people that the country was moving in the wrong direction. Worse still, the protracted zero-COVID lockdown, as well as the excess and preventable deaths from the policy's abrupt abandonment, convinced many that they could no longer trust the CCP to protect their lives and private property. Consequently, more people have given up on the China Dream, and many of them are heading for the exits.

To defend Taiwan tomorrow, we must prepare to sanction China today

03 December 2024, The Hill, Max Meizlish and Elaine Dezenski

Taiwan is reportedly considering a $15 billion military package as an overture to President-elect Donald Trump. This comes just as the island nation agreed to spend over $2 billion in American weapons purchases next year. While such agreements may serve to warm relations with an incoming Trump administration and strengthen Taiwan's military against an increasingly belligerent China, they will do little to address Beijing's biggest vulnerability in a potential conflict with Taiwan — its "soft economic underbelly."

This provides Trump a historic opportunity to not just support Taiwan militarily, but to capitalize on the deepening cracks in China's economy that make it vulnerable to powerful, proactively developed American economic statecraft.

Slow growth, an unraveling real estate market, significant youth unemployment and plummeting foreign direct investment reveal deep vulnerabilities that threaten the Chinese Communist Party. These economic fissures give the United States and its allies a strategic opportunity: by publicly outlining the severe sanctions, export controls and investment restrictions China would face if it invades Taiwan, we can slow the pace of Chinese hostilities toward Taiwan — or even prevent them altogether. However, to ensure this approach succeeds, we must learn from recent history and act before it's too late.

The war in Ukraine serves as a stark reminder of the costs of delayed action. In the aftermath of Russia's invasion more than two-and-a-half years ago, the United States and a coalition of allied governments united to impose significant sanctions on Moscow. Since then, the United States, European Union, United Kingdom, Australia, Canada, Japan and others have collectively imposed nearly 20,000 sanctions on Russia. Yet, these measures were — and continue to be — too late to deter aggression.

It didn't have to unfold this way.

Following Russia's 2014 annexation of Crimea, the international community could have publicly committed to impose significantly more drastic economic measures on Russia if it made further incursions into Ukrainian territory. By clearly outlining the severe economic consequences of further aggression, the deterrent effect might have altered the Kremlin's calculus.

Deterrence relies on the credible threat of significant repercussions, and pre-announced sanctions could have increased the perceived costs of invasion beyond acceptable levels for Russia. Nearly a decade later, approximately 1 million people have been killed or injured in the Russia-Ukraine war — and the conflict rages on. We must learn from that grave oversight and proactively plan to sanction key sectors of the Chinese economy if China invades Taiwan.

To the detriment of our national security, targets of economic statecraft are often identified only after a conflict has erupted. This reactive approach places incredible pressure on already under-resourced federal agencies responsible for executing this critical function. Planning for these eventualities must be done as early as possible. Our military forces regularly wargame scenarios for potential conflict and identify targets of attack; our economic security apparatus should do the same.

Some of these targets should be publicly identified to exert pressure on Beijing. Specific industries and major firms central to the Chinese Communist Party's control can be spotlighted now, overtly increasing the potential cost of any action China may take against Taiwan. Third-country firms operating in China will also take note. The threat of possible secondary sanctions may compel them to reconsider doing business as usual if the United States communicates such intentions before a conflict arises. This proactive approach would represent a profound shift in our application of economic statecraft.

Legislation like the Sanctions Targeting Aggressors of Neighboring Democracies (STAND) with Taiwan Act is a significant step in the right direction. By proposing substantial sanctions on China in the event of a military invasion of Taiwan, the STAND Act sends a clear and credible message. It lays the groundwork for a deterrent strategy that could dissuade Beijing from taking aggressive actions by making the consequences unmistakably clear.

Historically, we have lacked a coherent strategy for deploying the disparate set of economic tools at our disposal. More critically, our government has not fully embraced economic statecraft as an effective deterrent. Many question the effectiveness of sanctions, but few consider how they could be more impactful if target states and market actors understood the conditions under which sanctions would be imposed before a conflict begins. Publicly stating these conditions and, importantly, preparing for the possibility that they are met should at the very least demonstrate a credible threat to our adversaries and prompt considerable market derisking from the private sector.

For an adversary like China, which faces significant economic headwinds, this is precisely the path the United States should pursue. While imposing severe sanctions on China would have substantial repercussions for the United States and its allies given the deep interconnections in global supply chains and trade, these costs may be a necessary price to prevent a catastrophic conflict over Taiwan. Such a conflict could destabilize the entire Indo-Pacific region and disrupt global markets far more severely than any sanctions regime.

We must also anticipate and prepare for potential countermeasures from China, such as restricting access to critical rare earth minerals or disrupting global supply chains. By investing in alternative sources, building strategic reserves, and ally-shoring with international partners to enhance economic resilience, we can reduce our vulnerability and demonstrate our readiness to withstand retaliatory actions.

While it's true that sanctions alone may not always compel an aggressor to change course, they can strain a nation's economy and limit its ability to sustain prolonged conflict. In China's case, where economic stability is paramount for the regime's domestic legitimacy, the threat of substantial sanctions could serve as a powerful deterrent and increase the likelihood that cooler heads will prevail within the Chinese Communist Party leadership.

Alongside economic sanctions, the United States should continue to increase economic support for Taiwan, enhance our military presence in the region, and engage in diplomatic efforts to create a multifaceted deterrent. By taking these proactive steps, we can send an unequivocal message to Beijing: Aggression against Taiwan will come at an unbearable cost.

Trump's tariff war 2.0 looms. And China isn't just watching

01 December 2024, Deccan Herald

President-elect Donald Trump's announcement last week to impose tariffs on Mexico, Canada, and China has rattled the countries concerned as well as the global markets. Mexico has already spoken about retaliatory tariffs. However, China's response is going to be more concerted: defy and increase costs for the US, divide Trump's camp, diversify trade towards the Global South, build a "united front" with like-minded countries, make tactical concessions to neighbours on core interests, or even tempt a grand bargain with Trump.

On November 25, Trump stated that he will impose 25% taxes on products from Mexico and Canada, and an additional 10% tariffs on goods from China as his first measure after taking over as the President in January. This is in addition to the 60% tariffs on all goods from China that Trump mentioned in his election campaign.

This is a significant development as these three countries are the largest exporters to the US with Mexican exports to the US in 2023 touching $480 billion, Canadian $440 billion while that of the Chinese more than $500 billion. Trump also linked this issue to any progress on curbing the smuggling of fentanyl drug from China, and immigrants. Fentanyl kills over 100,000 Americans every year.

One of the friction points is trade surpluses. The US had trade surpluses against China only in 1979, when a trade agreement was signed between the two countries, till 1981, with a balance of nearly $4 billion. However, since 1982, when the third communique was signed between the two countries, China had an uninterrupted surplus posted against the US – cumulatively to a whopping figure of nearly $7 trillion.

China's trade surpluses with the US turned from double figures to triple figures consistently since China joined the World Trade Organisation after the then Clinton Administration extended support. China consistently denied access to many of its domestic segments not only to the US and European Union members but also to Indian pharma and software sectors.

China is no stranger to tariff increases on its exports. Trump, during his first term, imposed tariffs ranging up to 25% since 2018 on Chinese goods worth $360 billion. The Biden Administration continued tariffs on China, in addition to announcing 100% tariffs on Chinese electric vehicles. China retaliated by imposing tariffs on US goods like soya bean, pork, and other products. However, according to a study conducted by Fudan University researchers at Shanghai, it damaged China's economy more than that of the US. China's manufacturing export profits will be drastically curtailed. Its economic growth forecasts have been lowered to nearly 3%. The country is already facing headwinds due to growing unemployment, sluggish domestic consumption, local debt, real estate bust, and low manufacturing output.

While China's immediate response to the tariff hike has been mild and defensive, it is likely to adopt a multi-pronged approach to address the looming trade war. President Xi Jinping issued "red lines" to President Joe Biden on the sidelines of the 31st Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) meeting at Lima on November 16, emphasising on China's path of development. China's commerce ministry released a slew of measures five days before the new tariff announcement to help the country's export sector including credit insurance coverage, financial support, and enhanced cross-border e-trade.

China is likely to diversify trade towards the Global South. In September, China organised the Forum on China Africa Cooperation by inviting leaders from 51 countries. Today, it is Africa's largest trading partner ($282 billion). At the meeting, China also signed deals to export EVs and solar panels to Africa. While China is pitching Africa against the US, Beijing is also aware that 22 African countries are in debt to China. Likewise, China's trade with South America increased to $489 billion.

Expecting a hardline posture from Trump, China is making tactical adjustments with major powers in Asia, notably India, Japan, Indonesia, and Vietnam. Even before the US elections, on October 23, Xi met Prime Minister Narendra Modi on the sidelines of the BRICS Summit in Kazan, Russia. Two days earlier, China agreed to disengage troops at Depsang Plains and Demchok. Xi also met Japanese Prime Minister Shigeru Ishiba on November 15 on the margins of the APEC meeting in Lima. On October 22, China promised to withdraw the drifting buoys at Japanese-administered Senkaku islands.

Apart from these softening approaches, a pragmatic faction in the Communist Party of China may also make a grand bargain with Trump. They suggest that entering into business deals with Trump can help overcome trade frictions, as China did in his first term with $250 billion in offers. Meanwhile, there are others who believe that Premier Li Qiang's closeness to Elon Musk and Musk's businesses in Shanghai can be leveraged.

Will Tibetans be led by a Reincarnated Dalai Lama, or One Picked by China?

01 December 2024, Economy Next

Chemi Lhamo, Campaign Director of Free Tibet would like to see more international support for preserving the Tibetan way of life and Dharma.

Citing The Resolve Tibet Act, which US President Joe Biden signed into law in June this year, Ms Lhamo added that she was optimistic that European countries that constantly speak on human rights would not hesitate to pass similar legislation in support of Tibet.

Tibet has been under the control of China since 1951, with a government in exile, also known as the Central Tibetan Administration being set up in neighbouring India, by the 14th Dalai Lama following the Lhasa uprising of 1959.

Though he divested himself of all political authority in 2011, the Dalai Lama, who turned 89 this year, continues to be the spiritual head of Tibetans, who consider him the living incarnation of the Buddha. The search for a new Dalai Lama begins when he passes away, by senior disciples who look for visions and signs to identify the successor.

China meanwhile, insists it has the right to pick the next Dalai Lama.

Apart from that, there is the contentious issue of what's referred to as 'residential schools' and described by the UN as a "compulsory education curriculum in the Mandarin Chinese language, or Putonghua, with no access to traditional or culturally-relevant learning." But China disagrees. They claim it is preparing Tibetan children for a future where the language of communication will be Mandarin.

Speaking at a web talk organised by the Friedrich Naumann Foundation South Asia, on November 20, 2024, Ms Lhamo pointed out that reincarnation and religion are personal issues and 'no other external entity, China in this case, has the right or in fact to interfere with the process.' Even as refugees, Tibetans enjoy 'democracy without borders' and she is confident that their culture and Dharma will stand the test of time.

The web talk 'The Future of Tibetan Leadership' was moderated by Dr Anna Sawerthal, Editor of Der Standard, Austria and included the Ven Geshe Lakhdor, Director, Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, Dharamshala, Professor Anand Kumar, President of the India-Tibet Friendship Society and Tenzin Desal, Senior Research Fellow at the Tibet Policy Institute as panellists.

Reincarnation, says Ven Geshe Lakhdor, is the root of Buddhist teaching, it is not blind faith. The China policy is 'short-sighted,' he adds, alleging that it is an attempt to destroy Tibet's identity.

When the Dalai Lama divested himself of the political aspect of things, it was to prepare Tibetans to function as though he was already gone, explained Ven Geshe Lakhdor, adding it was the Dalai Lama's wish that Tibet should not be led by a religious figure. The Dalai Lama also believes that reposing too much power in one individual is risky. In that context, Ven Geshe Lakhdor hopes for better political awareness among Tibetans.

If they are to unite against Chinese influence, they must also shed their regional and tribal differences, Ven Geshe Lakhdor opines. In a digital world it is not difficult to bring people together, he says, pointing out that staying united is the key to outlasting dictatorial systems built on oppression.

Indians, says Anand Kumar, are generally supportive of Tibetans, but there are concerns about a post-Dalai Lama scenario. Would India, which has taken a middle path continue in the same vein? Could India successfully facilitate a smooth transition, he asks.

He also points to the possibility of differences of opinions among Tibetans themselves; those living in Tibet may have different aspirations from those in exile, and again, Tibetans residing in India might think differently to those in Europe and the USA. A 'plurality of perspectives and clear lines of communication among Tibetans in exile,' is important, he says.

Meanwhile, Tenzin Desal explains that China is markedly visible in the everyday lives of Tibetans through infrastructure projects and promoting the idea that Tibet is a part of China.

However, the Dalai Lama has created the institutional framework for open discussion both within and outside Tibet on the devolution of power and the future of Tibet. An important feature is that those within and outside Tibet converse with each other, and the integrity of purpose of those in exile has never been questioned by Tibetans living in Tibet.

Addressing the web talk, the current political leader of the executive branch (Kashag) of the CTA, Sikyong Penpa Tsering said reincarnation is unique to Tibetan Buddhism and religious activities are observed as enshrined by the Dalai Lama. While encouraged by the support of the USA, they were hopeful that more countries would endorse their cause. The Dalai Lama, had, in September 2011 been emphatic that no government or individual could interfere in Tibetan affairs.

In a video message, Sandra Weeser, Member of the Bundestag reiterated that while the international community advocates for the rights of Tibetans, it must also be vigilant that the process of transition is free from external forces.

China leverages buddhist diplomacy to counter negative global perceptions?

29 November 2024, Daily Mirror

China's use of Buddhism in diplomacy is a key element of its foreign policy, particularly under Xi Jinping. The Chinese government leverages Buddhism, a shared cultural heritage in Asia, to enhance its soft power and strengthen ties with neighbouring countries, particularly those with Buddhist populations. This approach is part of China's broader Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), designed to foster socio-cultural relationships and promote peaceful cooperation.

Although China is often perceived as an atheist regime with limited space for religious freedom—especially given the destruction of monasteries during the Cultural Revolution—it has systematically re-framed Buddhism as both a local and ancient religion of China. This shift in perception serves multiple purposes: it counteracts the spread of Christianity with its Western associations, provides an alternative to growing domestic materialism, and offers a diplomatic link to countries with significant Buddhist populations or Buddhist-leaning philosophies.

Buddhism has proven to be an effective tool in promoting China's peaceful image, particularly with its immediate neighbors, many of which have Buddhist populations or Confucian teachings. At the forefront of this effort, China has sought to reshape its global image, distancing itself from the label of a revisionist power that poses a threat to international peace and security. Cultural exchanges and events like the World Buddhist Forum bring together Buddhist leaders and scholars from around the world to discuss shared values, promote peace, and foster goodwill. In addition, China has invested in renovating and building Buddhist temples and monasteries across various countries, aiming to project itself as a peaceful, culturally rich nation.

China's Buddhist diplomacy is heavily coordinated by the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Foreign Countries (CPAFFC). Established in 1954, the CPAFFC plays a central role in promoting mutual understanding between China and other nations. The organization arranges cultural and religious exchanges, including those focused on Buddhism, to enhance international cooperation and peace. However, while the CPAFFC operates in a seemingly independent manner, it is deeply connected to China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and answers directly to the State Council. This connection to the Chinese Communist Party makes it an important tool in China's broader foreign policy strategy.

The CPAFFC actively works to influence both governmental and non-governmental organizations through Buddhist diplomacy. By hosting Buddhist conferences, cultural tours, and academic dialogues on Buddhist philosophy, the organization seeks to shape global perceptions of China as a custodian of Buddhist heritage. Yet, its activities have raised concerns about China's broader soft power agenda. Critics argue that the CPAFFC uses Buddhist diplomacy to exert influence over sub-national governments and local political leaders, as demonstrated by its involvement in the World Buddhist Forum and other international events.

In 2023, Yang Wanming was appointed president of the CPAFFC, signaling Beijing's continued efforts to strengthen ties with regions like Latin America, where China is the second-largest trading partner after the U.S. These efforts have been met with suspicion from the West. In 2020, the U.S. State Department discontinued its participation in the US-China Governors Forum, citing concerns that the CPAFFC was attempting to influence state and local leaders. In 2022, the U.S. National Counterintelligence and Security Center issued a warning about the CPAFFC's activities, describing it as a tool for co-opting subnational governments and pressing China's geopolitical agenda.

The global promotion of Buddhism as a form of soft power by China is unprecedented in the modern world. While Beijing has become increasingly assertive in territorial disputes and has triggered multiple standoffs with its neighbors, it also recognizes the need to address the fears surrounding its rapid rise. In this context, Buddhist diplomacy serves as a counterbalance to the aggressive image China has cultivated through its territorial claims and other actions. Beijing believes that by emphasizing shared cultural and spiritual ties, it can allay the concerns of its neighbors, particularly in Southeast Asia, where the Belt and Road Initiative has sparked skepticism and resistance.

Xi Jinping has been at the forefront of this initiative, directing more resources into Buddhism as part of China's political and economic strategy. His 2014 speech at UNESCO emphasized Buddhism's integration into Chinese culture, referring to it as "Buddhism with Chinese characteristics." Xi's vision reflects China's historical self-image as the "Middle Kingdom," with surrounding countries falling within its cultural orbit. Under his leadership, China has worked to portray Buddhism not only as a local tradition but as a key component of China's global soft power.

However, this outward projection of Buddhist diplomacy is not without contradiction. While China promotes its version of Buddhism globally, it continues to suppress religious freedoms domestically, particularly in Tibet, where protests and self-immolations have been met with harsh repression. The government's promotion of Buddhism as a state tool also seeks to weaken the Tibetan independence movement, which Beijing labels as "spiritist."

In addition to its Buddhist diplomacy, China has implemented strict religious policies domestically. The Patriotic Education Law, enacted in 2024, mandates that religious groups—including Buddhist institutions—promote loyalty to the Communist Party. This law requires religious leaders and followers to align their practices with socialist values and includes provisions for increasing state control over religious activities. Tibetan Buddhists, Christians, and Muslims face growing restrictions, with reports of raids on churches, restrictions on religious teachings, and forced alignments with state ideology.

Despite the internal repression, China continues to project itself as a leader in Buddhist diplomacy. This strategy is aimed at countering any potential resistance to its global initiatives, particularly the Belt and Road Initiative. Given China's limited global soft power, Buddhist diplomacy serves as a crucial tool for building China's image as a peaceful, culturally-rich, and diplomatic power. By positioning itself as the guardian of Buddhist heritage, China seeks to garner influence in Buddhist-majority countries and reduce the geopolitical risks posed by its growing economic and political influence.

What's behind Nepal's pivot away from India?

29 November 2024, TRT World, Deepak Adhikari

China's growing regional influence presents opportunities for Kathmandu, but the diplomatic shift comes with challenges.

Nepalese Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli's upcoming visit to China signals a strategic shift in Nepal's foreign policy: the Himalayan nation seems to be inching closer to Beijing as frustrations with New Delhi simmer.

While the visit (December 2-6) highlights Nepal's growing engagement with China, it also reflects the complexities of balancing its traditional ties with India.

Oli's decision to prioritise China over India for his inaugural visit marks a break from a long-standing tradition among Nepalese leaders. Traditionally, successive prime ministers have visited New Delhi first, underscoring Nepal's cultural, economic and political ties with India.

However, after months of perceived snubs by the Indian leadership—including silence on Oli's invitation to Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi at the UN General Assembly—the pivot to China appears calculated.

The Nepalese leader enjoys a close relationship with Chinese President Xi Jinping. His tenure has seen significant strides in Nepal-China relations, from signing the historic Transit and Transportation Agreement in 2016 to hosting Xi for a state visit in 2019.

These moves reflect Oli's broader strategy of reducing Nepal's dependence on India, particularly after the 2015 blockade imposed by New Delhi that crippled Nepal's economy.

China's growing regional influence presents opportunities for Kathmandu, but the pivot comes with challenges. Experts caution that Nepal's attempts to counterbalance India could alienate its southern neighbour, whose trade with Nepal stood at $8.4 billion in 2023 compared to China's $1.2 billion.

Bishnu Rijal, a central committee member of Oli's Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), says Beijing is poised to exploit the growing rift between Kathmandu and New Delhi.

"China is eager to fill the vacuum in Indo-Nepal ties," he said. "This strategic gap could be an opportunity for China, especially if criticisms of India intensify."

Oli's Beijing agenda is ambitious. It includes negotiating a waiver on the $216 million loan for the Chinese-built Pokhara International Airport and finalising stalled Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects.

But Nepal's counting on China for infrastructure development raises questions about debt sustainability. Concerns about the Chinese "debt trap" grow, with many citing Sri Lanka's Hambantota Port as an example.

Chinese experts are sceptical about Nepal's prospects of securing a loan waiver. Gao Liang, deputy director of the Nepal Study Centre at the Institute of South Asian Studies at Sichuan University, says: "Personally, I don't think that's very likely. Making such a request in itself would not be conducive to Nepal's image enhancement in the international investment market."

Gao says granting a waiver to Nepal could set an unsustainable precedent. Instead, he suggests that Nepal explore more practical options, such as negotiating an extension of the repayment period (which begins in 2026) or proposing alternative repayment methods agreeable to both countries.

Despite growing Chinese investments, India remains deeply embedded in Nepal's economic framework. From pipelines to transmission lines, India's connectivity projects have accelerated, contrasting with the delays and complications in BRI projects.

India-China rapprochement

Oli's visit coincides with a thaw in India-China border tensions, marked by recent agreements to cooperate on patrols. While this rapprochement could reduce Kathmandu's leverage in playing one neighbour against the other, it also opens doors for trilateral cooperation in trade, energy and infrastructure.

Experts argue that a harmonious India-China relationship could ease regional tensions, benefiting smaller nations like Nepal. However, this balancing act is not always easy.

"Nepal must avoid positioning China as an alternative to India. Instead, we should aim for a balanced approach, maintaining strong ties with both nations," says Rupak Sapkota, a foreign policy expert.

"Historically, Nepal has leaned towards China when its relations with India deteriorate, but this reactive strategy is no longer viable in today's complex geopolitical landscape."

Nepal's growing engagement with China mirrors broader trends in South Asia, where Beijing's infrastructure diplomacy is reshaping the region. This rivalry creates opportunities for Nepal but also risks, as the country seeks to balance its development ambitions with maintaining independence.

Sapkota, who served as a foreign policy adviser to Oli's predecessor Pushpa Kamal Dahal, says Nepal had developed strategic autonomy by consistently declining to join the US-led Indo-Pacific Strategy or China's Global Security Initiative.

Nepal also rejected India's Agnipath scheme, a military recruitment programme.

However, this neutrality comes with costs. Major powers have scaled back aid, as much of it is tied to alliance memberships, slowing Nepal's access to international economic cooperation. Reduced international aid and slowed access to economic cooperation have hampered development.

China's strict COVID-19 policies had also strained ties, stalling key infrastructure projects and limiting tourism.

Meanwhile, India's influence remains strong, rooted in shared cultural ties and economic interdependence.

As Oli courts Beijing, Nepal must carefully navigate its relationships with both neighbours. Leveraging China's infrastructure diplomacy while maintaining ties with India requires nuanced strategy.

"While India may attempt to pressure Nepal to avoid tilting towards China, the depth of current China-Nepal relations makes such a shift unlikely. The partnership has advanced to a level where it cannot be easily undermined," Sapkota says.

China's military corruption crackdown explained

28 November 2024, France24

Beijing has removed top military official Miao Hua from office pending a probe into "serious violations of discipline" – a common euphemism for corruption. Miao joins a host of high-ranking figures, including two former defence ministers, to fall foul of a sweeping crackdown in the country's military in just over a year.

Analysts say corruption may have eroded Chinese combat readiness – raising fears in Beijing as it conducts its largest military build-up in decades.

Here's how the crackdown has unfolded so far:

'Chronic distrust'

Chinese President Xi Jinping has waged a sweeping campaign against deep-seated official corruption since coming to power over a decade ago.

Proponents say the policy promotes clean governance, while critics say it helps Xi purge political rivals.

In the past year, that drive has focused on the armed forces, with nearly 20 military and defence industry officials removed since summer 2023.

Some of the biggest fish so far ensnared have been defence ministers.

State media has confirmed that both Wei Fenghe and his successor Li Shangfu have been expelled from the ruling Communist Party and are under corruption investigations.

"Xi appears to be chronically distrustful of his most prominent military officials," Ankit Panda, Stanton Senior Fellow at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, told AFP.

Analysts at the time linked the purge to a wider investigation into the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) Rocket Force, which oversees China's nuclear and conventional missiles and would likely be Beijing's first line of attack in the event of a major conflict.

Both former defence ministers had links to the force – Wei previously headed the unit and Li Shangfu led a department that developed weapons including missiles.

The unit's chief, Li Yuchao, and chief of staff, Sun Jinming, were expelled from the party and investigated for corruption in July.

Three senior officials were also removed from their posts at state-owned missile defence organisations in December 2023.

Beyond the Rocket Force

British newspaper the Financial Times this week reported that defence minister Dong Jun was under investigation – reports that Beijing on Thursday dismissed as "pure fabrications".

But Miao and Dong's removal, if confirmed, could suggest the graft purge is widening.

Miao had no clear ties to the rocket force, climbing the ranks in the army and then being promoted to admiral in the navy in 2015.

Similarly, the defence minister – appointed in December – forged his career in the navy and eventually became its commander.

Reports of Dong's fall suggested "the rot in China's military remains even deeper than previously suspected", Neil Thomas, a fellow on Chinese politics at the Asia Society, told AFP.

The crackdown has come as China has increased military pressure on Taiwan and repeatedly pushed up against its neighbours over disputed territory in the South China Sea.

But analysts say graft in the military may be raising worries that the army isn't up to the job.

"Corruption in the Chinese military rightly should raise questions about its ability to achieve military objectives and reach the 'great rejuvenation' envisioned by Xi," Heather Williams, director of the Project on Nuclear Issues at Washington's Center for Strategic and International Studies wrote.

Compromised

Bloomberg, citing US intelligence, reported this year that rampant corruption in the Rocket Force had led to malfunctioning equipment and even missile fuel being replaced with water.

"If true, these flaws would compromise missile operations, calling into question China's nuclear force readiness and overall capabilities," the Federation of American Scientists wrote in an open letter in response to the claims.

Xi has vowed that the reunification of the Chinese mainland and Taiwan is inevitable and pledged to take "all measures necessary" to achieve that goal.

The recent crackdown "raises the question of who Xi has left that he can trust and how deep the scandals run that have taken down these key officials," said Joel Wuthnow, senior research fellow at National Defense University in the US.

"It has to be a huge distraction... as he presses the PLA to be ready for a war with Taiwan by 2027."

This month, Xi visited members of the country's air force in central Hubei province, urging them to root out corruption and "unhealthy tendencies".

"(We) must keep firmly in mind our duties and missions, increase our sense of war preparedness and tighten our preparations for military struggles," Xi told soldiers.

But with Miao's removal, analysts expect the corruption crackdown to continue to distract from that goal.

"Competition for top positions is so fierce that there might be some mutual recriminations between officers which would lead to endless cycles of arrests, new appointments and recriminations," Victor Shih, an expert on elite Chinese politics, told AFP.

Xi Jinping Doesn't Have an Answer for China's Demographic Crisis

28 November 2024, Foreign Policy, Lizzi C. Lee

A call for a "high-quality population" ignores the country's real problems.

Chinese President Xi Jinping's recent article in Qiushi, the Communist Party's flagship journal for outlining core ideology and policy, frames China's demographic challenges as a strategic opportunity. It offers Xi's most detailed vision yet for addressing the country's aging population: shifting from a labor-intensive, population-driven economy to one powered by innovation, education, and productivity. Yet beneath the lofty rhetoric lies a familiar and contentious concept: renkou suzhi, or “population quality.”

The notion of suzhi has long been a cornerstone of Chinese policymaking, shaping debates on everything from education to health care. On the surface, it advocates for cultivating a healthier, better educated, and more skilled population. But its implications run deeper—and are more divisive. Historically, suzhi has been used to draw lines between urban elites and rural or migrant populations, carrying connotations of class bias and, at times, embracing eugenicist thinking. Implicit in calls for a “high-quality population” is the judgment of a “low-quality” counterpart, reinforcing societal divides in a way that is rarely acknowledged outright.

What is striking is the emphatic personal stamp Xi has placed on this familiar rhetoric. He describes “high-quality population development” as a “new concept” first proposed by himself—a policy pivot aimed at addressing demographic shifts by fostering a “high-quality workforce.” Xi’s framing emphasizes a sharper economic focus: moving beyond controlling population size to prioritizing quality, optimizing structures, and enhancing mobility.

Xi’s vision is clear: a population that is educated, innovative, and adaptable, equipped to power China’s ambitions to leapfrog the United States in next-generation advanced manufacturing and technology, while remaining resilient to geopolitical headwinds. Yet the systemic realities of China’s political and economic structures make its realization anything but straightforward. The gap between aspiration and implementation remains vast, with no easy solutions offered by Xi.

It’s true that the challenges of an aging population are not unique to China; much of the developed world, particularly East Asia, is grappling with similar issues. Japan and South Korea, for instance, are contending with the burdens of a rapidly greying society.

But China’s situation stands apart in its complexity. Aging isn’t merely a demographic hurdle—it is amplifying long-standing structural weaknesses. The very obstacles hindering the implementation of Xi’s vision lie in the entrenched flaws of China’s economic and political systems—issues that Xi has either avoided addressing or delayed reforming. Persistent regional disparities continue to leave rural areas under-resourced and underserved, while the rigid hukou system, which ties access to essential public services like health care and education to your residence permit, effectively traps millions in low-opportunity regions, cutting them off from better health care, education, and jobs. Declining birth rates and shifting family norms reflect a younger generation increasingly unwilling—or unable—to embrace traditional expectations, squeezed by skyrocketing costs and evolving societal values. Further complicating matters, the state’s tight grip on private enterprise has stifled the innovation and risk-taking spirit critical to driving genuine progress.

For all its ambition, the path to achieving Xi’s vision is riddled with contradictions, with labor mobility as a glaring example. While factory and service jobs in urban hubs seldom require a local hukou, access to top-tier schools and hospitals does, perpetuating a tiered system where affluent cities like Shanghai and Hangzhou boast cutting-edge eldercare facilities and world-class health care for the wealthy, while rural areas in backwater provinces like Liaoning and Heilongjiang tell a starkly different story. There, aging farmers with no pensions often work well into their 70s, trapped by inadequate infrastructure and meager local resources.

As the population ages, these inequalities become even more pronounced. Older rural residents remain cut off from advanced medical care, while urban areas grapple with labor shortages in critical sectors like health care and elder services. Reforming the hukou system could ease these pressures by allowing for greater mobility and access to urban services, but such a move would disrupt deeply entrenched administrative structures prioritizing control over equitable mobility. Resistance to such reforms, coupled with the slow pace of implementation, leaves these bottlenecks unresolved.

Without meaningful redistribution, rural elderly populations will continue to be excluded from the health care and social support systems concentrated in urban centers. Yet Beijing’s centralized governance—and its reluctance to devolve power to local governments—makes such redistribution exceedingly difficult to achieve. Instead, the gap widens further, a stark reminder of the uneven distribution of China’s modernization.

Urban governance policies add yet another layer of complexity. Major hubs like Beijing and Shanghai actively limit population growth by restricting hukou transfers, channeling labor toward second- and third-tier cities. This approach creates a dynamic where migrants contribute economically to urban centers but remain excluded from the full benefits of urban life, entrenching disparities and undermining efforts to build a truly mobile and adaptable workforce.

China’s shifting social norms add another layer of complexity. Marriage and birth rates have plummeted, with the country’s marriage rate falling to 4.8 per 1,000 people in 2022, down from double that a decade earlier. Meanwhile, the birth rate declined to 6.77 per 1,000 people in 2022, marking the lowest rate since records began in 1949. These declines are driven by skyrocketing housing costs, relentless job competition, and changing attitudes among younger generations, for whom traditional family structures are increasingly unaffordable or unappealing. Financial incentives—subsidies for childcare, housing, or education—might help, but they won't work without broader reforms that make family life less burdensome. Reducing costs, increasing gender equality, and improving work-life balance would require systemic change, but if history is any guide, the Chinese leadership's wariness of "welfarism"—the belief that easing life's burdens risks fostering complacency—leaves little room for the flexibility and empathy such solutions demand. Meanwhile, the deeply ingrained cultural preference for men that continues to dominate workplaces will take time—and concerted effort—to shift.

At the same time, the state pension system is lurching toward insolvency. Long plagued by low-yield investments and drained further by pandemic-related spending, China's pension funds are projected to run out by 2035. Raising the retirement age—already a politically sensitive issue—won't be enough to solve the problem. More sustainable reforms, such as diversifying investments and adopting market-driven strategies, would necessitate opening up capital markets and ceding some control over financial systems—a step for which Beijing has shown little appetite.

Even as Xi champions a transition to an innovation-driven economy, his administration's previous approach to private enterprise has significantly eroded trust within the business and investment communities. The regulatory crackdowns initiated in 2021 wiped out more than $1 trillion from the market value of major companies, severely impacting investor confidence. Breakthroughs in biomedicine, health care innovation, and new models of eldercare delivery require more than state investment; they depend on the freedom of individuals and businesses to take risks, experiment, and occasionally fail. However, the state's growing control over private enterprise, coupled with inconsistent and at times capricious regulations, has fostered an environment where caution stifles creativity, eroding the foundations of innovation essential for meaningful progress.

Comparisons with other aging societies offer valuable, if limited, insights. Japan illustrates the dangers of inertia, where delayed reforms led to stagnation and hindered adaptability, even as the country developed world-class eldercare systems. South Korea's generous pronatalist policies have largely fallen short, unable to overcome deep structural barriers such as high housing costs and rigid gender norms. Germany's relative success in leveraging immigration to mitigate aging pressures provides a compelling example of labor mobility in action, though such an approach remains politically unthinkable in China. These examples underscore a critical point: Tackling demographic challenges requires genuine flexibility, a willingness to innovate, and the resolve to break through deeply rooted systemic barriers. Whether Beijing can adapt these lessons to its own unique context remains an open question.

Xi's rhetoric about a "high-quality population" acknowledges the need for change but stops short of embracing the systemic reforms necessary to achieve it. Empowering households, redistributing resources to bridge regional divides, and fostering the conditions for innovation would require a profound recalibration of Xi's governance philosophy. His personal reluctance to loosen the reins of power continues to constrain the state's capacity to respond effectively to the pressures of an aging society.

India's history of providing refuge – and why Sheikh Hasina poses a unique challenge

28 November 2024, News Laundry, Nirupama Subramanian

Delhi didn't face demands to extradite the Dalai Lama or Varadaraja Perumal, so this is new terrain with unknown consequences.

On August 5, Sheikh Hasina fled Dhaka and landed at Ghaziabad's Hindon airbase after her ouster as prime minister of Bangladesh. Dramatic as it was, she was not the first high-profile political leader from India's neighbourhood to seek safe haven. In 1959, India suffered consequences with China over the arrival of the Dalai Lama, fraying an already fragile bilateral relationship and contributing to tensions ahead of the 1962 war.

Hasina's presence does not pose such dire challenges, but she's unique in a way that India's other guests in exile are not. Other than the special history that India and Bangladesh share, the former prime minister is the only exile in India who was completely in charge of her domain until the moment she fled. For this reason, she's the only one that the home country wants back, and urgently, opening up potential legal complications to her stay in India.

Even with India's history of providing refuge, extradition is a new angle that Delhi has never faced before with its other guests.

Delhi and Dhaka want different things

Complicating the Hasina matter is the arrest this week of Chinmoy Krishna Das, a Hindu priest in Bangladesh, on charges of sedition. India strongly expressed its concern over his arrest and the denial of bail to him, an indication that Delhi and Dhaka are now at that stage of talking past each other in the downward spiral of bilateral relations.

Delhi, where the rank communalism of its own leadership does not do India proud, wants to keep the focus on the vulnerability of the Hindu minority in Bangladesh. Dhaka's attention is on Hasina, who is wanted back to stand trial on charges of murder and corruption.

A spokesperson of the Bangladesh Nationalist Party described the former prime minister as "the most wanted person in Bangladesh" for the alleged killings of students in police firings during the uprising against her, for enforced disappearances under her watch as prime minister, and for alleged corruption. According to Bangladesh's health ministry, over 1,000 people were killed during the uprising this year. A students' body has compiled a list of over 1,500 deaths and more than 30,000 injured.

Meanwhile, a special tribunal – set up by Hasina a decade ago to try collaborators with the Pakistan army in the 1971 war on charges of genocide and other war crimes – has now been turned against its creator. The so-called International Crimes Tribunal, which convicted several Jamat-e-Islami leaders, leading to the execution of four of them, has now been repurposed to try Hasina for the deaths of hundreds of protesters shot dead by security forces during the uprising. The tribunal asked the international police organisation Interpol to issue a red notice for her arrest.

The tribunal also filed more than 60 complaints against Hasina, members of her Awami League party, and security officials, accusing them of forced disappearances, murder and even genocide. In September, it issued arrest warrants for Hasina and several others, and asked the Yunus-headed interim dispensation to produce them before the tribunal by mid-November. That date has passed.

Earlier this month, Bangladesh Chief Advisor Muhammad Yunus said his government would seek her extradition under the India-Bangladesh extradition treaty. Yunus told The Hindu in an interview that if India refuses to extradite Hasina, it would be a violation of the treaty "that will not make a very happy relationship between us". It would not be forgiven by any future government either, he said. The consequences of 'safe haven' to Dalai Lama Extradition is a new worry for India.

In 1959, the Dalai Lama was independent India's first VIP political refugee. When he landed in Chuthangmu, in what was then the North East Frontier Agency, on March 31 that year, India's relationship with China was already fraying.

Peking reacted angrily, screaming and shouting that Delhi had "expansionist" designs. It also railed against "Tibetan rebels" for having their "faces turned towards India and their backs to their motherland". It was alleged that the Dalai Lama was a prisoner of these "rebels" who, in collusion with India, were coercing him into making statements about "independent" Tibet.

But China, though angered at the high international visibility that India had provided to the Dalai Lama, made no demands that Delhi send him back. Instead, Delhi's problems were of a different order. India's first prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, had already recognised Tibet as part of China through the 1954 Panchsheel Agreement. In a one-on-one with the Dalai Lama, who was then only 24 years old, he conveyed that India's "capacity to help is very limited and the moment we try to extend it, it would stop even that capacity".

Almost like a father speaking to a young son, Nehru put it plainly: "Physically it is not possible to fight on behalf of Tibet. Even such a suggestion will harm them [the Tibetans] and their cause. Sympathy at present for Tibet cannot be converted into help by any country. DL should be under no illusion and, therefore, should fashion his policy with reference to actuality."

China, though angered at the high international visibility that India had provided to the Dalai Lama, made no demands that Delhi send him back. Instead, Delhi's problems were of a different order. India's first prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, had already recognised Tibet as part of China through the 1954 Panchsheel Agreement.

In even starker language, he said: "Let us face facts...The whole world cannot bring freedom to Tibet unless the whole fabric of the Chinese state is destroyed. USA, UK and others or anybody else cannot do this at present. DL should realise that in the present context Tibet's independence would mean the complete break-up of the Chinese state and it is not possible to envisage it as likely to happen. To defeat China is not easy. Only a world war, an atomic war can perhaps be the precursor of such possibility. Can one start a world war? Can India start a world war? Let us talk of the present and not of the future and be more realistic."

Nehru then asked the Dalai Lama how the Tibetans could resist China's overwhelming military superiority. "One should, therefore, not close the doors of settlement; otherwise, it becomes a fight to the death". India would not recognise a Tibetan government in exile, the Dalai Lama was told.

Yet Chairman Mao was convinced India was "doing bad things in Tibet" and decided he would give it "enough rope to hang itself".

For large sections of India's polity, Nehru had blundered by not pushing the Tibet card against China. However, as journalist Ananth Krishnan pointed out in his book India's China Challenge, Chinese suspicions about Indian intentions in Tibet were as important as India's forward policy of 1961 in China's decision to attack India.

The Dalai Lama has lived in India ever since his arrival more than six decades ago, making Mcleodganj in Himachal Pradesh's Dharamshala district his permanent abode in exile. More than one lakh Tibetans now live in settlements across India. By the time India began normalising ties with China in the late 1970s, the Dalai Lama's own views on independence changed. In 2005, he declared that Tibet was part of China and sought autonomy, not independence – a view he has restated several times since then.

As for India-China bilateral relations, India's safe haven to the Dalai Lama has not figured much, except when Beijing objects to some of his activities, which it views as "splittist", such as his visits to Arunachal, all of which China claims as south Tibet.

India's other high-profile exile, who's lived here since 1990, is Annamalai Varatharaja Perumal.

Perumal was the chief minister of Sri Lanka's North-East Provincial Council, a tragically short-lived experiment at India's behest. Through the 1987 Indo-Sri Lanka Accord and the 13th Amendment, it aimed at devolution of power to the Tamil areas of Sri Lanka. But it was jointly sabotaged by President Ranasinghe Premadasa and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam. Premadasa refused to transfer even the smallest power to the northeast government, instead making a deal with the LTTE, arming them to fight the Indian Peace Keeping Force.

Perumal's situation worsened when the new VP Singh government decided to withdraw the IPKF from Sri Lanka. The last Indian troops were scheduled to leave by March 31, 1990. Perumal saw his protective umbrella vanishing. So, on March 1, he made a last-ditch attempt to assert himself. He moved a resolution converting his provincial council into a constituent state assembly that would draft a constitution of the "Eelam Democratic Republic". He said this would take effect from March 1, 1991 if Colombo had not agreed to his demands by then.

It was a de facto "unilateral declaration of independence".

Delhi was horrified, but did not abandon Perumal to his fate. Within hours, Perumal, his wife and three daughters were bundled into an Indian Research & Analysis Wing plane and flown to Mauritius. More than 200 cadres of the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front were evacuated to India in Indian Air Force planes.

In June 1990, Perumal arrived in Mumbai, only to discover that the LTTE had wiped out the top leadership of the EPRLF, gunning them down in their rented apartment in Chennai. Perumal was moved to Lakshadweep for his safety. In August, he and his family were taken to Madhya Pradesh, to a tightly guarded and barricaded hunting lodge in Chanderi belonging to the Scindia family.

Delhi was horrified, but did not abandon Perumal to his fate. Within hours, Perumal, his wife and three daughters were bundled into an Indian Research & Analysis Wing plane and flown to Mauritius. More than 200 cadres of the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front were evacuated to India in Indian Air Force planes.

In May 1991, after the assassination of Rajiv Gandhi, Perumal and his family moved to a government bungalow in Ajmer's Civil Lines area. They lived there for a dozen years. There were no demands from Sri Lanka for his return. In the mid-1990s, he spent some months in Kathmandu dodging assassins sent by Prabhakaran. Towards the end of the decade, he went back to Sri Lanka to test the waters when then President Chandrika Kumaratunga seemed determined to bring about a political resolution to the Tamil question. But the 2002 ceasefire, which empowered the LTTE, alarmed him and he withdrew to India once again.

Perumal moved to Tamil Nadu. In 2008, a year before the LTTE was routed militarily, the state police uncovered, just in the nick of time, a plot to kill him and his family. He presently lives in Coimbatore.

What does the post-Hasina era hold?

Sheikh Hasina has been exiled in Delhi before. On August 15, 1975, her father Sheikh Mujibur Rehman and members of her family were assassinated in Dhaka. Hasina, her husband, two children and sister were the only family members to escape as they were abroad. She led a low-profile life, working part-time at All India Radio, with a small circle of friends that notably included Pranab Mukherjee and his family.

In 1981, at the persuasion of her late father's friends, she returned to Dhaka and plunged into politics taking over as the leader of the Awami League, her father's political vehicle.

This time, the 77-year-old, who is reported to have moved into Lutyens Delhi from her transit accommodation at Hindon airbase, is unlikely to go back for another shot at power. And India is unlikely to yield to pressure from Dhaka and abandon her.

Unlike the Dalai Lama, who could hardly take on the Chinese military in Tibet, or Perumal, who stood little chance of surviving the LTTE in north-east Sri Lanka, Hasina is a different category of exile. In full control as prime minister for 15 years, she did for Delhi what no other leader could have done. She secured India's borders from Islamists and north-eastern military groups, and made the Hindu minority feel safe.

And it's her proximity to Delhi, and to the Modi government for two of her three terms, that appears to have been one of the reasons for her downfall. Keeping her here is as important to India as having her back in Bangladesh is for her opponents. In the post-Hasina era, India's relations with Bangladesh will, in the near term, depend on whether Dhaka can move past the demand for the return of Hasina, and if Delhi can look at ties beyond the alleged persecution of Hindus in Bangladesh. Neither of these issues can serve to bring relations back to even keel. Perhaps that is no longer the goal for either country.

The Perseverance of an Independent Tibetan School: The 30-Year Journey of Jigme Gyaltsen Ethnic Vocational School

27 November 2024, CTA

In July 2024, Jigme Gyaltsen Ethnic Vocational High School, which had operated independently for 30 years, announced its closure. Known as the best Tibetan-language educational institution and a private welfare school in the greater Tibetan region, it has now come to an end. The author of this article once served as an IT technician at the school, handling numerous digital archives and witnessing the establishment, struggles, development, and eventual forced closure of this institution on this land. Now living overseas, the author learned of the school's shutdown. However, due to censorship, former colleagues and Tibetan friends could not convey their sorrow. The author took up the pen to write this detailed recollection.

-by gingerduan.substack.com, 26 November 2024

The original manuscript was published in Chinese on Mangmang: 一所独立藏语民族学校的坚守与落幕——吉美坚赞民族职业学校的30年

On July 14, 2024, in Golog Prefecture, Qinghai Province, the esteemed monk of Ragya Monastery and renowned educator Jigme Gyaltsen announced via a bilingual Tibetan-Chinese post on WeChat that the independently operated Jigme Gyaltsen Ethnic Vocational High School, which he founded, would be closing down after 30 years. The school had long offered free admission to students from farming and herding communities across the Tibetan regions of five provinces. It was regarded as one of the finest Tibetan-language educational institutions in the Greater Tibetan Area. This legendary private welfare school on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau has thus come to an end. The announcement emphasized that the closure was not due to the will of any individual or organization. Still, it was based on the national standards for vocational schools and relevant directives from the Qinghai Provincial Committee.

Some have commented that "black snow" has fallen over the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, extinguishing a beacon for the Tibetan people.

Ragya Town, a small settlement along the Yellow River in Golog Prefecture, Qinghai Province, is home to this iconic institution. Here, when locals say "the school," everyone knows it refers to this one—it feels like there is only one school in Ragya. Between Ragya Town and the school lies the mountain "Ani Qungong," meaning "Great Roc Spreading Its Wings," at the foot of the mountain stands Ragya Monastery, the first monastery on the Yellow River. I will use "Ragya School" in the following text to refer to Jigme Gyaltsen Ethnic Vocational High School.

From 2018 to 2019, I briefly worked as a network technician at this school. While there, I became deeply immersed in its environment and worked closely with many digital archives. I witnessed Ragya School's founding, struggles, development, and eventual forced closure on this land through this. I witnessed its rise and fall, its joys and sorrows.

This school was called the "Harvard of the Tibetan people," its forced closure carries profound significance for the entire Tibetan region. Now, living overseas, I learned of the school's shutdown. I saw my Tibetan friends on social media drowning in tears, yet unable to express their grief in their native language due to censorship on social media like WeChat.

I deeply feel a connection between myself and this distant school, and the sorrowful cries from afar resonate with me. Since I am overseas, I decided to write it all down.

01 A Fusion of Tradition and Modernity: An Educational Experiment

Jigme Gyaltsen (hereafter referred to as "the Principal") was a monk from Golog who founded Ragya School in 1994. It was the first private welfare school in Qinghai Province and a pioneering educational reform in Tibetan regions at the time.

Traditional Tibetan society primarily relied on monastic education. For both men and women, becoming a monk or nun and going to a monastery was often the only way to receive an education. Monasteries had a comprehensive education system comparable to modern primary and secondary schools, with various degrees and certifications. For example, the Geshe degree is akin to a doctorate in Tibetan Buddhism. Families would willingly support their children's monastic studies by providing food, clothing, and pocket money. In Tibet, monasteries functioned as more than just schools; they also served as welfare organizations, banks, hospitals, and academic institutions.

The Principal, who had received higher education, graduated from the Advanced Buddhist Institute founded by the Panchen Lama in Beijing before deciding to return to his hometown. At that time, Amdo Tibet was underdeveloped and lacked educational resources. Traditional monks were unfamiliar with modern knowledge and skills such as law, Mandarin, or computer science and had no place to learn them. Meanwhile, Tibetan children from nomadic families, due to their traditional pastoral lifestyle, had limited access to education. For example, in 2020, a Tibetan herdsman named Tenzing Tsondu(DingZhen) became an internet sensation in China because of his handsome appearance. After achieving fame as a livestreamer with millions of fans, he was revealed to be illiterate in Chinese. This wasn't unusual in traditional Tibetan society, as herding on the grasslands didn't require literacy.

To promote modern education in Tibet, the Principal combined the traditional monastic education system with the modern school system to create a unique integrated model that admitted both monks and lay students of all ages. Since pastoral families in Tibetan areas don't face the same academic or employment pressures as in mainland China, it was common to see young teenagers studying alongside older herdsman with beards who had spent the past decade tending sheep in the same classroom. Ragya School placed no restrictions on age, religious status, or sect. Even students who were completely illiterate at the time of admission were treated equally. They lined up to register and were placed in classes according to their level of Tibetan literacy.

As a welfare school, Ragya School adhered to the principle of "education for all without discrimination." Each year, the school enrolls about 200 students; sometimes, even the principal's relatives have to wait in line for three years before being admitted. Priority was given to orphans, dropouts, overage youth, and young monks from poor rural and nomadic families. The school even accepted Mongolian, Han, and other ethnic students and tulkus from various regions.

Once admitted, students were provided with free tuition, meals, and accommodation. The school's curriculum was rooted in the traditional Tibetan "Ten Sciences" while incorporating modern scientific knowledge. The school includes a junior high school and a senior high school. The junior high school offered foundational courses such as basic Tibetan, Mandarin, and mathematics, while the senior high school evolved into a vocational high school with seven specialized programs tailored to Tibetan culture: Tibetan medicine, advanced Tibetan studies, computer applications, tourism, English, arts and crafts (Thangka painting), film production, and alpine guiding. Most of these programs were developed as school-based curricula with published textbooks.

The school accommodated more than 1,000 students, ranging in age from 6 to 42, with about one-third being monks. Students came from farming and herding regions across Qinghai, Tibet, Sichuan, Gansu, Inner Mongolia, and beyond.

02 Difficult Start-up, Unique Operational Methods

The establishment of the school was initially very difficult, lacking resources in many ways: funding, policies, teachers, and construction were all challenges. The principal was neither a Rinpoche nor a distinguished eminent monk. When the school was founded, he only had 3,000 yuan in deposit. He had to travel extensively, seeking loans and resources, hoping to persuade people to support his endeavor. Eventually, he gained the support of Rinpoche from various monasteries and the then-governor of Golog Prefecture. After many twists and turns, he secured land and obtained the government's approval to open the school.

When the school was first established, the campus was built with the help of the nine students who initially enrolled. At that time, the students and teachers had no accommodation and had to live at the Ragya Monastery. During winter weekends, they would go to nearby mountains to gather branches and yak dung to keep the stoves burning for warmth. Local villagers, monks from Ragya monastery, and the school's students worked together, using bags to carry soil and level the ground to create the sports field. They also felled trees to construct the first school buildings.

In a documentary about the school's history, I saw how the wood for the early buildings was sourced. The students were allocated into three groups: the first group felled trees upstream of the Yellow River; the second group floated the logs down the river to Ragya; and the third group retrieved the wood from the shallow banks of the Yellow River near the school. This was how many of the school's early buildings were constructed.

Principal Jigme Gyaltzen was an educator and an entrepreneur. The school initially maintained its independence through funding provided by the "Snowland Treasures" dairy company (hereafter referred to as the Dairy Factory), which he established. The factory's early techniques were learned from two Europeans, and its dairy products were initially exported overseas. The dairy business provided income for herders and all its profits were used to cover the school's expenses, allowing it to offer free education and boarding for students and pay staff salaries.

By the time I had just graduated from university and began to engage with the operations of social organizations, I was amazed at how the principal, who had spent years on the plateau, learned and established such a progressive concept of "social enterprise.” By using this advanced model, he promoted sustainable development in pastoral regions.

Later, however, the export channels for the dairy factory’s products faced issues, and the products could no longer be sold overseas, leaving the domestic market as the only option. Over time, the factory’s efficiency declined, and the principal had to seek funding from other sources. Given the influence of Ragya School and the principal’s reputation, fundraising was not initially difficult. At that time, various social sectors and local governments were eager to provide resources to the school: The Hong Kong Jockey Club funded the construction of modern school buildings. The Trace Foundation supported several school expenses. Beijing Blue Charity Foundation donated many books to the school library. Government subsidies were provided to impoverished students for living expenses.

However, transferring donations to the school’s accounts became more difficult due to increasingly restrictive government regulations and policies. Overseas funds were no longer accepted, and even domestic funds could not be accessed. Gradually, the school began to experience financial difficulties. Before it closed, it was said that the school had gone three years without paying regular salaries.

The teachers’ salaries had never been high to begin with, and when the financial issues arose, the school stopped paying the salaries of monastic teachers. Since the monks don’t have families to support, the school provided their meals and accommodations, and their families could provide tiny allowances for personal expenses. However, lay teachers, who had families to support, found it much harder to cope. Many had no choice but to leave the school.

One teacher, who had studied at a university on the mainland, told me that working at Ragya school was a social service but not a service without an end. After serving for some time, one had to leave—continuing serving was not sustainable.

In October 2018, the Trace Foundation issued an open letter announcing its gradual cessation of most activities in Tibetan areas of China, citing fundamental changes in conditions on the Tibetan Plateau for an overseas foundation. The Trace Foundation, headquartered in New York, funds and supports community and educational initiatives in Tibet. Many private Tibetan-language schools, including Ragya School, have received their support. At the time, I was in China and completely unaware of this significant change. I had only heard sporadically that introducing China’s Foreign NGO Law had made it difficult for foreign donors to fund initiatives like ours. Back in the day, my knowledge of Tibet was very limited, and I didn’t know where to find reliable research materials to learn. Our projects run by our organization in Tibetan areas also faced challenges: we struggled to find full-time teachers willing to work on the Tibetan Plateau and secure funding partners interested in supporting this project. As a recent college graduate on a short-term network technician assignment, I was just beginning my journey on this plateau. My responsibilities were to consolidate and transform the outcomes of earlier projects and wind down some of the initiatives. Click here to read more.

China: Human rights defenders criminalised as well as face harassment, surveillance and transnational repression

27 November 2024, Monitor Civicus, Zhang Zhan

Civic space in China is rated as ‘closed’ by the CIVICUS Monitor. China’s authoritarian state ruled by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has systemically repressed fundamental freedoms. Human rights defenders and activists report harassment and intimidation; unfair trials; arbitrary, incommunicado and lengthy detentions; and torture and other ill-treatment for exercising their fundamental rights. Protests do occur but are quickly repressed, and critical civil society groups have been shut down.

August 2024 marked two years since the UN released a report determining the possible commission of ‘crimes against humanity’ against Uyghurs and other Muslim peoples by Chinese authorities. The Office of the High Commission on Human Rights (OHCHR) said that “many problematic laws and policies remain in place” and that allegations of human rights violations, including torture, must be “fully investigated”. The Office also called for a “full review” with a human rights emphasis of the legal frameworks governing Chinese policies related to national security, counter-terrorism and minority rights.

Civil society groups called on the High Commissioner to “hold regular and substantive briefings with victims, survivors, and their representatives, and establish a mechanism to locate and free missing and wrongfully detained family members.”

In October 2024, the European Parliament passed an emergency resolution condemning the Chinese government’s persecution of Uyghurs and urging China to immediately and unconditionally release detainees, including Uyghur economist Ilham Tohti and Gulshan Abbas. The resolution, which was adopted by a vote of 540 in favour, 23 against and 47 abstentions, strongly condemned China’s “repression and targeting of Uyghurs with abusive policies, including intense surveillance, forced labor, sterilisation, birth prevention measures and the destruction of Uyghur identity, which amount to crimes against humanity and a serious risk of genocide.”

In recent months, the authorities have detained human rights defenders including Zhang Zhan, Tibetan activist Tashi Wangchuk and artist Gao Zhen, and convicted Yu Wensheng and Xu Yan for their activism. There has also been surveillance and harassment of bloggers and activists and transnational repression of critics in Japan. A protest in Shanghai by factory workers was also documented.

Association

Re-detention of woman human rights defender Zhang Zhan

Citizen journalist and activist Zhang Zhan was re-detained in September 2024, less than four months after being freed from prison. On 26th November 2024, it was reported that she had been formally arrested on charges of "picking quarrels and provoking trouble", an overly broad provision which is weaponized to target, intimidate and harass human rights defenders, activists, journalists and dissidents.

According to Amnesty International, Zhang Zhan, who is being held at the Pudong New District Detention Center in Shanghai, appears to have been targeted because she has continued to advocate for human rights since her release from jail in May 2024.

Following her release, Zhang Zhan expressed concern that her online speech was being monitored by authorities. She was regularly and repeatedly taken in for police questioning in August 2024, with some interrogations lasting over 10 hours.

As previously documented, Zhang Zhan has been vocal against human rights violations and suppression of dissent in China. She has used her legal training and knowledge to help other human rights defenders to claim their rights through legal channels. In February 2020, Zhang Zhan visited Wuhan city in Hubei province of China to report on the COVID-19 outbreak from the ground. She went missing in Wuhan in May 2020. It later emerged that she had been taken by the Chinese authorities and detained in Shanghai. In December 2020, a court convicted her of "picking quarrels and provoking trouble" after a sham trial and sentenced her to four years in prison.

Human rights defenders Yu Wensheng and Xu Yan convicted

On 29th October 2024, the Suzhou Intermediate Court in Suzhou, Jiangsu Province, convicted human rights lawyer Yu Wensheng and woman human rights defender Xu Yan for "inciting subversion of State power". Yu Wensheng was sentenced to three years in prison while Xu Yan was sentenced to one year and nine months in prison. Yu and Xu were detained by police in April 2023 while on their way to meet with high-level European officials visiting China.

Yu Wensheng is a human rights lawyer based in Beijing. He has represented cases of victims of China's crackdowns on petitioners, civil rights activists, and his fellow human rights lawyers. Yu Wensheng has also used his legal skills to advocate for reform in multiple sectors of Chinese society. He previously served a four-year sentence from 2018 to 2022 after being convicted for "inciting subversion of state power".

Xu Yan is a woman human rights defender who campaigned for the release of Yu Wensheng, to whom she is married, as well as for other human rights defenders and their family members who face harassment, surveillance, and arbitrary detention.

Transnational repression of critics in Japan

Chinese authorities have been trying to intimidate people from China living in Japan who take part in activities critical of the Chinese government.

According to Human Rights Watch, the Chinese government's harassment of people from China, including those from Xinjiang, Tibet and Inner Mongolia, and their family members back home, appears aimed at deterring members of the diaspora from protesting against the government or engaging in events deemed politically sensitive. The Chinese authorities have also sought out diaspora members to provide information on others in Japan.

Between June and August 2024, Human Rights Watch interviewed 25 people from Hong Kong and mainland China, including from Xinjiang, Tibet and Inner Mongolia, who were living in Japan. All had been involved in peaceful activities that the Chinese Communist Party deems unfavourable or threatening to one-party rule, such as holding public events to raise awareness about crimes against humanity in Xinjiang, promoting Tibetan culture, or having a reading club discuss a book by an activist from Inner Mongolia.

China conducts the most sophisticated, global, and comprehensive campaign of transnational repression in the world. Freedom House's conservative catalogue of direct, physical attacks since 2014 covers 214 cases originating from China, far more than any other country.

Tibetan language rights activists under surveillance after release from detention

Prominent Tibetan language rights advocate Tashi Wangchuk was detained for 15 days on charges of 'disrupting social order' and allegedly spreading false information on social media, and has been under strict surveillance.

According to Radio Free Asia (RFA), Wangchuk, 39, was arrested by the Internet Police Unit in China's Qinghai province on 20th October 2024. After an investigation, he was detained for 15 days in the Yulshul Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture until his release on 4th November 2024.

He was accused of posting "false information" on social media platforms since June 2024, for "repeatedly insulting and ridiculing government departments" and "negatively impacting the online environment and public order in society" by allegedly distorting and rejecting government policies.

Wangchuk's detention comes as China intensifies its policies to suppress — or even eradicate — Tibetan and other ethnic languages and cultures and replace them with Mandarin and Han Chinese customs.

Surveillance and harassment of bloggers and activists The authorities have continued to monitor and harass activists and other individuals, both off and online, especially ahead of politically sensitive dates or major events.

In September 2024, The Guardian reported that China's internet police went from targeting bloggers to their followers. In recent months, followers of influential liberal bloggers have been interviewed by police as China widens its net of online surveillance.

In the same month, authorities in Beijing stepped up security measures ahead of celebrations of the 75th anniversary of the People's Republic of China on 1st October 2024, issuing restrictions on who may enter the city. Police have been following rights activists and lawyers, detaining their family members, or preventing them from entering Beijing. The moves form part of China's "stability maintenance" operations. One of the first to be targeted was Li Wenzu, the activist wife of prominent rights attorney Wang Quanzhang, who was detained on entering Beijing.

In October 2024, RFA reported that authorities across China targeted dissidents and petitioners ahead of a key meeting of the ruling Communist Party, placing them under house arrest or escorting them out of town on enforced "vacations." Among those targeted include political journalist Gao Yu, rights lawyer Pu Zhiqiang and political commentator Zha Jianguo.

Artist detained for 'insulting' Mao sculptures

Dissident Chinese artist Gao Zhen was detained in August 2024 on suspicion of "insulting revolutionary heroes and martyrs."

The Gao Brothers are known for their provocative sculptures, which critique the founder of the People's Republic of China, Mao Zedong, and his regime. The Gao Brothers' dissident artwork has been shown at many venues overseas, but not publicly displayed in China since they signed an open letter from dissident physicist Fang Lizhi to then supreme leader Deng Xiaoping during the pro-democracy movement of 1989.

Gao Zhen left China in 2022 to live permanently in the United States but had been visiting family when he was taken by authorities in Hebei province. According to his brother, Chinese authorities stormed the brothers' art studio in Sanhe City on 26th August 2024 and confiscated several artworks.

Spoofing or insulting China's revolutionary "heroes and martyrs" was made a crime in 2021, as part of a newly amended criminal code, under a campaign by China's leader, Xi Jinping. It carries a penalty of up to three years' imprisonment.

Hundreds of workers at an automotive trim company in Shanghai blocked a major highway in the city in November 2024 amid a protest over plans for mass layoffs.

The workers from the state-owned Shanghai Guoli Automotive Leather Decoration Co. scuffled with police as traffic backed up on the Husong Highway. Police detained at least one worker, prompting others to shout and join in the scuffle.

Employees have been protesting since receiving a notice on 9th October 2024 offering a payout of three months' minimum wage to anyone who volunteered to resign, amounting to a total of payment 8,070 yuan (USD 1,113).

Social media posts from people identifying themselves as workers from the company said the “voluntary resignations” weren’t actually voluntary. They said they are entitled to three months’ compensation based on their average wage over the previous 12 months.

Freedom House that monitors dissent in China noted that it has “documented a rise in protests over recent months by consumers and investors amidst a sluggish economy.” The majority of these protests are led by workers (41 percent).

Nepal’s China dilemma

27 November 2024, The Kathmandu Post,
Siddharta Thapa

China celebrated the 10th anniversary of the founding of the Communist Republic of China in 1959. A Nepali delegation also visited the country to participate in the celebrations conducted by the Chinese Communist Party. Surya Bahadur Thapa, a minister in the interim government formed by King Mahendra, led the Nepali delegation.

At the end of Thapa’s sojourn to China, his Chinese interlocutors informed him that Chairman Mao would grant him a meeting. Thapa was advised to carry three messages to King Mahendra. First, Mao informed Thapa that the Chinese were not in a race with India to provide developmental assistance to Nepal. Second, he assured that China would not let anyone compromise issues related to Nepal’s sovereignty. Finally, Mao said that Thapa must advise the King to maintain good relations with India to ensure political stability in Nepal.

Leading a semi-retired life half a decade later, the octogenarian Thapa was curiously observing the evolving politics of the peace process, which marked a gargantuan shift in Nepali society. Pushpa Kamal Dahal had just resigned as prime minister over his failed attempt to depose the army chief in 2010. At this point, he seemed hellbent on soliciting China’s support to return to power. After losing power, Dahal visited the northern neighbour with a plan to counter India. This was Dahal playing the China card in Nepali politics in the early phase of the peace process.

After returning to Nepal from his China visit in 2011, Dahal’s trusted China hand Agni Sapkota declared China’s prophetic advice to the visiting Maoist delegation: To mend ties with India for stability in Nepal. Thapa observed that great powers seldom change track at provocations insinuated by political frictions of Nepali leaders. He also witnessed that China had upheld its tested Nepal policy for over 50 years since different regimes in Nepal continued with their commitment to the One China Policy.

Interestingly, China’s ambitious global outreach in recent times has compelled analysts to examine whether its policy is evolving towards deeper engagement in Nepal. For instance, many analysts have characterised the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) as a geopolitical initiative that aims to provide strategic leverage over other countries. BRI is a signature foreign policy of President Xi Jinping, which was announced in 2013 to connect China closer to the world through infrastructure and investment projects. Unsurprisingly, Beijing would want Nepal to be a part of President Xi’s ambitious foreign policy gambit. While Nepal signed the BRI Framework Agreement in 2017, Beijing is now pressing Kathmandu to move forward with the BRI implementation plan.

Given the heightened geopolitical rivalry, including in the SAARC region, the BRI implementation plan was bound to face scrutiny in Nepal. The fact that the document has not been made public and the details of the plan remain elusive gives way to rising speculations on the negative aspects of the proposed plan.

In a democracy, process and content fundamentally determine the course of bilateral or multilateral treaties. As in Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), the proposed implementation plan should have been made public to allow for debates, enhancing the understanding of the agreement. Also, the government, in the Parliament’s absence, could have called an all-party meeting or referred the plan to the international committee of the Lower House of Parliament. MCC received bipartisan support since Nepal’s parliament endorsed it after many rounds of deliberations and amendments. Therefore, as Nepal builds on its relationship with its neighbours, the political leadership in Kathmandu should provide space to open debates on the policy choices it intends to initiate. More importantly, Nepal must strive to achieve bipartisan support on critical issues impacting its external relations, especially with its neighbours.

As Nepal’s economy struggles due to political instability, bilateral and multilateral funding will continue to play a pivotal role in fueling growth. However, there are genuine concerns regarding BRI that should be clarified. It is widely reported that BRI has led to unsustainable debt in several countries, and the bad debt incurred through its funded projects has seriously impacted their economies. Sri Lanka and Pakistan are perfect examples in the region, illustrating that large infrastructure projects with high interest rates plunge the economy into a crisis with high debt-to-GDP ratios. This situation leads to unsustainable levels, eventually producing a balance-of-payment deficit and a large-scale financial crisis that triggered protests in Sri Lanka.

Nepal must prudently select projects that it can repay, and the borrowing rates must be on par with what the Asian Development Bank (ADB) and the World Bank Group offer for financing infrastructure projects in the country. In simple words, we must bite what we can chew in terms of envisioning big-ticket infrastructure projects that require enormous amounts of capital.

Another aspect of the implementation plan that was criticised was how the plan covers an entire range of areas of cooperation, including law enforcement and other areas unrelated to infrastructure development. Any imbalance in Nepal's foreign policy will be watched closely by Nepal's friends on the global stage. Coincidentally, Donald Trump's NSC designate recently visited Kathmandu, which reinforces Nepal's geopolitical importance.

The BRI implementation plan, in its current speculated form, has broader strategic and geopolitical implications. There seems to be no clarity on the requirement of the plan for BRI projects, as countries worldwide haven't signed it. Therefore, the rationale for Nepal signing the agreement is largely questionable at this stage. At all costs, Nepal must avoid sending a signal that it has chosen a particular geopolitical camp.

Advocates of the implementation plan mention that this is only an in-principal document. If so, the political leadership of Nepal must evaluate that by conceding Nepal's principled position on seeking grants or concessional loans at the World Bank and the ADB rates. Observers will question the neutrality of the in-principal stand taken to endorse the document. Those opposing the plan in its present form will continue to argue that once a country loses on principle, what else is there to lose?

Nepali politicians and policymakers at the strategic level should realise Beijing has moved ahead from the traditional way of looking at Nepal. Nepal should assess whether China has shifted the goalpost and its commitments by introducing a non-essential implementation plan as one of its priorities—from a geopolitical perspective—and what it means for the country. Moreover, Kathmandu's position should be to seek the implementation of past announcements and promises. Lastly, Sino-Nepal relations are of historical importance, and therefore, they cannot be reduced to dividing political forces in Nepal. Nepali politicians need to improvise their foreign policy positioning by understanding that state-to-state relations are becoming more transactional and that each nation will aim to expand its leverage over the other. It is time an aspiring Nepali woke up to the reality of cutthroat competition for influence in international relations.

Why India needs to take its ties with China 'sincerely' & the inconvenience of US indictment of Adani

27 November 2024, The Print, Vandana Menon

Global media, however, acknowledges that India does indeed face a Chinese threat. It also notes that controversy surrounding Adani Group creates problems for India's own domestic growth.

When it comes to the Indian growth story, there are two things, according to global media, that are shaping it—Adani and China.

Let's take China first. Rather predictably, Global Times in an opinion says New Delhi needs to be taking India-China ties more sincerely. Doubts have arisen in China, the piece says, about Indian sincerity towards improving its relationship because of India's tenuous current position in the West over issues like "democracy" and "human rights."

"Given India's previous inconsistencies in its policy toward China, these doubts are not without merit," the piece says. India needs to eliminate "erroneous concepts" like the need to counter China, or the inevitability of war.

It goes on to list three areas of improvement in India's policy towards China: domestic public opinion, an overemphasis on security and not on economic development, and barriers in people-to-people exchanges.

The writer of the op-ed is of the opinion that domestic public opinion is too skewed away from China, and the Indian establishment needs to be doing more to "properly guide rather than manipulate public sentiment when issues arise in bilateral relations". Think tanks and media outlets have "poisoned" public perception against China by creating a "China threat"—and that needs to change, apparently, because trade and economic cooperation should take precedence over issues of security. Never mind that there are actual border encroachments taking place—India needs to stop practicing "discriminatory economic and trade policies against China" as a way to get back at China.

"Actions speak louder than words," the op-ed generously concludes. "We hope that India will quickly take concrete and positive actions on various issues related to bilateral cooperation, truly working to thaw the relationship between China and India."

The Wall Street Journal offers another viewpoint—one in which India absolutely does have a Chinese threat to counter. If incoming American president Donald Trump makes good on his promise to levy high import tariffs on Chinese goods, then India stands to gain a lot: but first, it must "get out of the way of its factory owners."

In a report on how India has done very little to clear hurdles for labour-intensive manufacturing, the WSJ takes the example of the garment industry, in which India should have an edge. However, annual apparel exports have declined more than 11 percent compared to a decade ago. In the same time period, Bangladesh saw a growth of over 50 percent.

Bangladesh and Vietnam are the two top choices for the China+1 strategy as the Chinese share in global manufacturing exports declines. India doesn't even figure in the top 5, the WSJ reports.

The WSJ lands on stringent regulations as the cause for holding India back: it's keeping companies from expanding, apparently. The question of labour rights—and what the government is doing to protect them—is painted as a headache and the reason why India isn't surging ahead of countries that seem to allow exploitative practices.

The piece does talk about how the Modi government planned to overhaul the labour code and loosen laws—including allowing firms employing upto 300 workers to fire workers without government permission—but says pushback from labour unions have stalled the process.

"Manufacturing firms in India said they are wary of operating large factories because of the power of organised labour," the piece says. Plus, "India's failure to sign free-trade agreements with other countries that would slash tariffs on its exports has also made Indian garments increasingly too expensive for global retail companies."

This has meant that Indian retailers and manufacturers have shifted production and sourcing to Bangladesh, leading to a jump in apparel imports. But manufacturers expect "Trump's election—and political unrest in Bangladesh which ousted its prime minister in August—to provide opportunities to larger apparel makers". India can still get ahead of China, if only it figures out its labour problems.

The spectre of Trump still lingers over India and China relationships. Academic Walter Russell Mead writes in the WSJ that "a strong U.S.-India relationship is both necessary and problematic. Only America can help India keep China on its own side of the border, but America is a difficult friend."

Mead visited Tawang as part of a delegation organised by the Hudson Institution on an invitation from the India Foundation, which is close to the BJP. It might be far-flung and remote, but Tawang is where "the promise and complexity of the U.S.-India relationship are easy to see", writes Mead.

The threat of Chinese incursion into the region has drawn India closer to the US. But religious tensions—like the major proselytising that Christian missionaries do in the region—and the difficulty of defending the northeast without access to Bangladeshi airspace complicates things for India. An American hand is seen behind both: American ideas about religious freedom and accusations of America meddling in Bangladesh are both irritants in India.

"In New Delhi and Tawang, Indians mostly cheered Donald Trump's election. They hope he will give India the support against China it seeks without making a lot of noise about human rights," Mead writes. "We shall see."

Which brings us to Adani and the billionaire boys club, and the inconvenient timing of the American justice system investigating the Adani Group.

To start, the Financial Times has a story on Kenya's jubilation over cancelling the proposal for the Adani Group to expand its international airport and invest in its power sector.

"Kenya's decision underlined the global ramifications for Adani's companies after he was indicted for allegedly overseeing kickbacks to win business in India," the FT reports.

The Adani Group's expansion into Africa is seen as part and parcel of India's geopolitical ambitions, but investing in Kenya was like kicking the hornet's nest after massive protests against Adani's involvement took over the country in July.

"Modi urged Indian corporates to become 'multinational' soon after taking office in 2014, although Adani has always denied receiving preferential treatment from the government. India sees opportunities for its companies from Africa's natural resources and growing population," the report says, listing Adani's investments in other countries.

But the scandal also creates problems for India's own domestic growth.

"The allegations validate foreign investor perceptions of the difficulty of doing business in India and how a few politically connected players can allegedly game the system," Bloomberg says in its latest India Edition newsletter.

Foreign investors are warier than ever about fresh projects in India. It's undeniable that India's massive growth in the past 10 years has been supported by a "fivefold increase in infrastructure investments by the Modi government." One of the best successes of this expansion program has been the solar energy sector, and Bloomberg believes that this sector will be impacted the most by the Adani bribery scandal.

"First, the solar sector's bidding processes and economics will come under additional scrutiny now that US agencies have alleged that officials of Adani and Azure Power offered bribes to various state governments to purchase expensive power after having overbid to bag 12 GW projects from Solar Energy Corporation of India," the piece says.

Second, the involvement of Canadian pension fund Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec (CDPQ)—a major investor in Azure Power—shows that even Western institutions are caught in the mess. Funds are likely to side-step India, even as markets in the US look exciting.

But keeping foreign investors back will also be hard: the government “will have to fix the reputational damage while protecting one of its so-called national champions.”

Reuters worries that Indian businesses will learn the wrong lessons from Adani. “Corruption’s long history in India explains the country’s failure to live up to its growth potential,” the editorial opens. “The danger, however, is that businesses learn the wrong lesson from the affair and grow warier of international capital markets rather than cleaning house.”

The problem, as Reuters sees it, is that corruption tends to “evolve” rather than disappear in fast-growing economies. “The scandal shines a light on a reality that many global companies would rather ignore. India’s $3.9 trillion economy, with its low $2,700 GDP per capita, is full of promise but also a difficult place to do business, like many other developing markets,” the piece says.

And routing out corruption should attract more FDI, but instead, “authorities know that going after big targets in any crackdown could have a shorter-term economic hit.”

“Ultimately, Adani’s use of U.S. debt capital markets exposed him to the long arm of the Justice Department, which doesn’t mind ruffling feathers of Washington’s diplomatic friends and foes alike,” the piece concludes. “The message Indian tycoons are hearing loud and clear is clean up fast or curtail your international ambitions.”

Is This Civilisation Finished?

27 November 2024, Daily Sun, A K Ziauddin Ahmed

The Himalaya-Hindu Kush Mountains, along with the Tibetan Plateau, are often called the Third Pole after the Arctic and Antarctic, because of their huge ice reserves. Rivers originating in the Third Pole are a source of water for 40% of the world’s population, including Afghanistan, Bangladesh, China, India and Pakistan, according to Eos Scientific News published by the American Geophysical Union.

The importance of the region in global climate prompted China to launch the “Third Pole Climate Forum” in June 2024. Over the past several years, global warming has been melting the ice in the Third Pole at an alarming rate, causing flash floods, landslides and glacial lake outbursts in the region. Losses in terms of human lives, crops, livestock, homes, roads and other infrastructure are catastrophic.

It is now widely known that global warming and resultant climate change are a consequence of over 250 years of carbon emissions, largely from industrialised nations, since the mid-18th century.

However, the losses and damages due to climate change are suffered most by the developing countries since they lack the resources and technologies to mitigate them. The developing nations have long been asking for reparations from the developed nations but to no avail.

Finally, at the United Nations Climate Change Conference COP27 held in 2022, an agreement to provide funding for loss and damage to vulnerable nations was reached. As of January 2024, the Fund for Responding to Loss and Damage (FRLD), as they named it, received ‘commitments’ for contributions amounting to $661 million, UNDP reports. We may recall here that the losses incurred by Pakistan in 2022 for floods triggered by unusual rains and melting glaciers were estimated at over $10 billion.

At COP15 in Copenhagen, Denmark in 2009, developed nations pledged climate finance of $100 billion yearly by 2020 to aid developing countries combat climate change. Climate finance is different from the above-mentioned FRLD. It is intended to mitigate carbon emissions and make necessary preparations for adapting to climate change. This year COP29 was held in Baku, Azerbaijan, from November 11 to 22. A UN press release declares that a breakthrough agreement was reached in the conference that developing countries will now be provided with USD 300 billion annually as climate finance raising it from USD 100 billion. A great rise indeed.

Are these funds really coming in? Let’s count from 2016, the year after the landmark Paris Agreement on climate change was adopted in COP21. The following table shows the amounts provided in climate finance funds by developed countries as published by OECD:

Is This Civilisation Finished?

Although the contributions have consistently fallen below the commitments over the years, it is encouraging to see that they finally reached and even exceeded the $100 billion target in 2022.

However, Oxfam International, the renowned NGO with a mission to end global poverty and injustice, disagrees. In its press release issued on 9 July 2024, the organisation asserts that the “true value” of climate finance is only around $35 billion. This is because nearly 70% of the funds have actually been provided as loans, not grants, meaning poor countries will have to repay them with interest.

Nevertheless, the rich countries have at least agreed to establish a system for compensating poor countries for losses suffered due to climate change and helping them adapt by making financial contributions. The underlying moral is that these nations are taking responsibility for causing climate change by emitting billions of tons of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

At every COP, countries pledge to reduce carbon emissions to keep global warming below 1.5 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels—the limit agreed upon in the Paris Agreement. Unfortunately, global carbon emissions rather increased in 2023 by more than 497 million tons compared to 2022. In fact, the rising trend of carbon emissions has persisted except during the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020.

Is This Civilisation Finished?

Every year, COPs are organised with grandeur, drawing thousands of attendees, including heads of state and government, journalists and representatives from civil society, philanthropy and international organisations. Traditionally, countries engage in tough negotiations, and world leaders make pledges and commitments. Meanwhile, carbon emissions continue to surge unabated.

In the USA, the second-largest carbon emitter in the world (having lost its first position to China in 2006), Donald Trump is back in the presidency. During his first term, Trump withdrew the US from the 2015 Paris Agreement. He has repeatedly called climate change a “hoax”. So, the future outlook is even worse. Global carbon emissions will continue to rise, and at some point, global warming will cross the critical redline of no return. Therefore, as Rupert Read and Samuel Alexander contend in their book, “This civilisation is finished.”

Pakistan and China’s diplomatic relations reach a low ebb

27 November 2024, The Interpreter, Adnam Aamir

As if Pakistan’s government wasn’t under pressure enough – with thousands of protesters on the streets and the capital Islamabad in lockdown amid calls to release former prime minister Imran Khan – relations with neighbouring China are also going from bad to worse.

Beijing’s growing anger over the safety of its citizens in Pakistan has been illustrated by a surprising diplomatic spat. “It is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months,” declared China’s ambassador in Islamabad Jiang Zaidong in an unusually direct response to comments made by a senior Pakistan politician seen to be downplaying the risk. “President Xi [Jinping] cares about Chinese people’s security and puts people’s lives first,” Jiang went on to say. “He especially cares about the security of the Chinese people in Pakistan.”

Tension has been growing after a string of attacks seen to be targeting Chinese nationals, particularly in Balochistan, the restive southwestern province, and elsewhere, too. Pakistani officials described the ambassador’s comments as perplexing, given the positive diplomatic relations between both countries. Yet it was also the first time Pakistan and China have publicly exchanged blame, a significant departure from their usual polite diplomatic exchanges, at least those in public.

The prospect of Chinese “boots on the ground” is politically sensitive.

An attack in the north of Pakistan left five Chinese engineers dead in March. Another attack killed two Chinese nationals working for a power company in the port town of Karachi in October, with a further two Chinese workers injured in a shooting in November. Yet China has been asking for stronger security measures for its nationals in Pakistan since at least 2022 as attacks continued to mount. The public outburst by China’s ambassador is illustrative of frustration at Pakistan’s failure to protect Chinese nationals.

But Pakistan’s reaction was baffling. As the junior partner, and in need of support from China for its economy, military and diplomacy, Pakistan still chose to react to the ambassador. This might be a sign of annoyance after China aggressively pushed to allow Chinese security personnel to guard Chinese nationals in Pakistan. When this demand was rejected by Pakistan, China sought to form joint security companies, where Chinese along with Pakistani personnel would protect Chinese nationals working in Pakistan. But the prospect of Chinese “boots on the ground” is politically sensitive.

The standoff has economic consequences. China is stalling funding for the first phase of the ML-1 railway project, a $6.8 billion project to upgrade railway tracks in Pakistan. Pakistan can expect more delays until making a major concession to China on security. The mood could also sour Pakistan’s request to China to reprofile power debt worth $15 billion in July, where it is still waiting on an answer. This delay will hurt the balance of payment situation in Pakistan, which must repay $100 billion in external debt in the next four years.

Ultimately, there is a limit to which China will tolerate losing its nationals in Pakistan, and it’s clear that a threshold is being reached. If Pakistan doesn’t improve the security situation it seems likely Beijing will move to disengage with Islamabad, which would carry significant consequences for CPEC, the China-

Pakistan Economic Corridor, a $50 billion component of the Belt and Road Initiative.

China's atrocity crimes in Xinjiang are entering an even darker phase. The UN must act.

26 November 2024, Atlantic Council, Rayhan Asat

While the world's attention has turned to the devastating conflict in the Middle East, Russia's ongoing war of aggression against Ukraine, and other global crises, the suffering of the Uyghur people in China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region is accelerating. In late October, a Chinese state-run news outlet released what it called a documentary but was in fact an atrocious propaganda video. In this video, two Uyghurs, Gulmira Imin and Zulpiqar Rozi, were forced to confess to a crime they almost certainly did not commit. Forced confessions are a routine tactic employed by the Chinese government against Uyghur political prisoners. Imin and Rozi had been detained in the aftermath of the July 5, 2009, Uyghur uprising, and for almost fifteen years it was not known what had happened to these political prisoners. As a more well-known political prisoner, Gulmira is listed as a prisoner of conscience by the US Congress's Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission. Then suddenly, they appeared on camera, ostensibly blaming outside forces for the Chinese government-manufactured human rights violations that resulted in the student-led uprising. The years of torture they had endured since they were detained were visible on their faces, hair, and teeth due to the horrific conditions in the camps.

This video is just the latest example of the Chinese government's brutal treatment of Uyghurs. My colleague Alyssa Johnson and I have prepared a forthcoming report to the United Nations (UN) documenting an array of horrors, including deaths, torture, arbitrary detention, enforced disappearance, and the newly imposed illegal financial penalties on prisoners' families as a form of extortion. Our report also details forced labor, transnational repression, continuous violations of reproductive rights, and assaults against human rights defenders, among other offenses. Our work bears witness to the dark history unfolding in our time.

When atrocities persist, they risk becoming tragedies that the world feels powerless to change.

In the face of genocide and grave human rights violations, the Uyghur people have demonstrated extraordinary courage, resilience, and an unwavering commitment to peace. From the brave survivors to families of those who fell victim to the camps, the Uyghur community stands as a testament to grace and unity in the most trying of times. Yet, despite their strength, the global community and the UN system have failed to protect them.

For nearly a decade, Uyghur advocates, myself included, have pushed the UN and governments across the world to address China's crimes against humanity and genocide against the Uyghur people. After two years of engaging with China on its terms, on August 27 of this year, Volker Türk, the UN high commissioner for human rights, issued an update on the ongoing human rights crisis in Xinjiang. The update merely confirmed what was already known—that despite requests from the UN, the Chinese government has refused to allow authorities any meaningful access to the region. This statement builds on the 2022 landmark report by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), which alleged that Chinese government policies targeting the Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples in Xinjiang may amount to crimes against humanity. The recommendations made in this report urged China to engage with and facilitate further visits by the OHCHR. However, in subsequent engagements with the UN and member states, the Chinese government has presented a deceitful image of its policies in Xinjiang, deliberately concealing the atrocity-torn region where Uyghurs and other ethnic groups remain in mass incarceration.

Today, after nearly nine years since China initiated its policy of mass detention of Uyghurs in Xinjiang, Beijing's atrocities against the Uyghur people have entered an even darker phase. China is further escalating the use of its authoritarian penal system to imprison people, with at least half a million Uyghurs imprisoned as of 2022, according to the Chinese government's own data (with 2022, 2023, and 2024 data missing due to public scrutiny indicating that the real numbers are much higher). In an August report that I co-authored with Min Kim for the Yale Genocide Studies Program, we conducted a statistical analysis of Uyghur imprisonment rates based on the Chinese government's own data. Despite Uyghurs comprising less than 1 percent of China's population, they account for 34 percent of the country's incarcerations, marking the world's highest rate of ethnic imprisonment. Our analysis estimates that, if left unchecked, China's atrocities will strip 4.4 million years of life from my proud community.

An investigation by researcher Nyrola Elimä and journalist Ben Mauk, published in the New York Times in November, uncovered the alarming extent of China's international reach, as it targets Uyghurs who have fled its oppressive regime. In cooperation with Thai authorities, the Chinese government has forcibly repatriated—in overt violation of international law—hundreds of Uyghurs who sought asylum in Thailand. The UN Refugee Commission failed them after their brave escape. Dozens died. Today, more than sixty Uyghurs remain detained in Thailand under dire conditions, awaiting an uncertain fate. This situation calls for urgent international attention and action, as reports coming out of camps in Xinjiang are increasingly alarming. One such example is the Netherlands-based Uyghur activist Abdurehim Gheni, whose brothers, niece, and dozens of other relatives are in the camps. The Chinese government temporarily released Abdurehim's father, Abdugheni Hudaberdi, to pressure him into refraining from testifying at an international tribunal hearing examining China's human rights violations. When Abdurehim refused to comply with their request, his father was taken back to the camp, where he tragically passed away two months later in government custody. There is a saying in Uyghur that when someone passes away before they can see someone who they longed for, the person leaves this world with their eyes wide open. Abdurehim's father left this world with his eyes open.

When thinking about such cases, my brother, Ekpar Asat—an award-winning entrepreneur and alumnus of the US State Department's exchange program—comes to mind. He has been unjustly imprisoned for eight years and eight months. I can hardly fathom what he endures each second in that prison. But Ekpar is not alone; there are countless others like him languishing in those cells. This reality leaves me, and others who care about the Uyghurs, no room to dwell in pain—we must channel it into action.

When atrocities persist, they risk becoming tragedies that the world feels powerless to change. But the Chinese government's crimes against the Uyghurs are not just tragic facts—they are deliberate acts of ethnic cleansing, crimes against humanity, and genocide. The world cannot remain passive. Above all, the UN has a responsibility to act on the recommendations it has put forward and to demand accountability.

The United States, too, will have a major role to play in ensuring accountability for China's crimes against the Uyghur people. As the incoming US administration assembles its team of experts on China, I hope that the plight of Uyghurs will be placed at the center of US diplomacy with Beijing. At the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting in Lima, Peru, last week, Chinese leader Xi Jinping outlined four red lines for the United States, one of which was democracy and human rights—a pointed message to the incoming Trump administration not to press Beijing on these issues. The United States must respond decisively: These red lines for Xi are the foundations of the United States' core values that define its global leadership. Along with more decisive action from the UN, US leadership and initiative on China's human rights violations against the Uyghur people will be essential to hold Beijing accountable for its crimes.

Google blocked 1,000-plus pro-China fake news websites from its search results

25 November 2024, The Register, Laura Dobberstein

Beijing's propaganda buddies aren't just using social media.

Google's Threat Intelligence Group has blocked a network China-related firms from its search results for operating fake news services and websites.

"Collectively these firms bulk-create and operate hundreds of domains that pose as independent news websites from dozens of countries, but are in fact publishing thematically similar, inauthentic content that emphasizes narratives aligned to the political interests of the People's Republic of China (PRC)," declared Google.

It's named the network "Glassbridge" and asserted it's comprised of entities operating in concert while pretending to be independent.

While Google could not confirm the leadership of Glassbridge, it assessed that the four entities – Shanghai Haixun Technology, Times Newswire, Durinbridge, and Shenzhen Bowen Media – were taking direction from a shared customer outsourcing the creation and distribution of pro-PRC content.

That content included regurgitated state sponsored media, press releases and other material. When it appeared online, it often did so mixed alongside more innocuous content, as well as conspiracy theories or ad hominem attacks on specific individuals.

The actors behind the campaign used digital PR firms, a ploy Google feels gave the operation plausible deniability, and could obscure the true source's role in the "dissemination of coordinated inauthentic content."

The most prolific of the four entities was Shanghai Haixun Technology. It had 600 domains that Google removed from its news search feature, and a number of YouTube channels that were also terminated. The group has been operating for a while – in 2022, 59 domains and 14 subdomains hosted by Shanghai Haixun were identified by Mandiant as slinging bogus pro-Beijing content.

Overall, Google revealed it has blocked over 1,000 sites from Google News and Google Discover since 2022. The takedowns were a response to what the search giant deemed deceptive behavior, and out of editorial transparency.

The Chocolate Factory reckons that Glassbridge's use of newswires indicates that information operations actors have moved beyond social media to spread their narratives. Similar tactics have been observed at Russian and Iranian operators.

But that doesn't mean Beijing is abandoning its foreign influencers. Plenty of government-linked trolls have been spotted this year – including from a separate influencing operations group tracked as Dragonbridge.

Dragonbridge content is also regularly found on websites related to Durinbridge and Shenzhen Bowen, Google's researchers wrote.

Experts discuss future of Tibetan leadership and Dalai Lama's succession

25 November 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The discussion around the future of Tibetan leadership especially over the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama was reinvigorated by a panel of well-known and competent personalities from both the Tibetan and international circuits. The webinar titled "The Future of Tibetan Leadership: Insights on His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Succession" was organised by the Friedrich Naumann Foundation (FNF), a German foundation promoting liberal values hosted an international webinar on Wednesday

The panel featured prominent experts including Geshe Ven. Lhakdor, Director of the Dharmshala-based Library of Tibetan Works and Archives (LTWA); Prof. Anand Kumar, President of the India-Tibet Friendship Group; Dr. Tenzin Desal, Senior Researcher at the Tibet Policy Institute (TPI) and board member of the International Seminar of Young Tibetologists; and Chemi Lhamo, a Tibetan-Canadian activist and Canadian representative for the International Tibet Network's Steering Committee. The discussion was moderated by Dr. Anna Sawerthal, editor at the Austrian daily Der Standard.

The webinar commenced with an introduction by Nupur Hasija, Senior Program Manager at the South Asia Regional Office of the FNF. She presented a short video highlighting FNF's long-standing collaboration with the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) since 1991. A pre-recorded keynote address by Sandra Wesser, a member of the German parliament, underscored the significance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's upcoming 90th birthday. She described the occasion as a "milestone" in global leadership, offering a moment for the international community to reflect on the future of Tibetan leadership and its associated challenges.

CTA President Penpa Tsering, in his pre-recorded remarks, expressed gratitude to FNF for organising the event and emphasised the importance of international awareness regarding His Holiness' reincarnation. "The Chinese government is not bothered by the living 14th Dalai Lama but they are more concerned about the yet to come, the 15th Dalai Lama," he noted. The Tibetan political leader also referenced the 16th Cabinet's official Position on the Issue of Reincarnation of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, published on September 29, 2022, reaffirming the Tibetan stance on the matter.

Ven. Geshe Lhakdor, who served as a religious assistant and translator to His Holiness the Dalai Lama for 16 years, emphasised the profound importance of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation in today's world. He highlighted Tibet's unique legacy in understanding the human mind and nurturing inner resources over millennia. "Tibet is the only country that has spent thousands of years studying the human mind and understanding its deeper potential to preserve and protect it," he stated. "We understand the concept of reincarnation better than anyone, and we recognise the immense importance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's reincarnation. In contrast, China, a country that restricts freedom, has minimal understanding of the human mind, and does not believe in religion, is now claiming the authority to recognise the Dalai Lama's reincarnation—just as they have with the Panchen Lama."

to the Manchu era when they sought to control Tibetans by influencing the recognition of high lamas. He noted that under the current authoritarian regime, this control has become even more aggressive. He criticised Beijing's approach, stating, "They think they are very clever, but to people with basic common sense—at least to someone like me—they are absolutely stupid. They are making a mockery of human intelligence. They have no right to recognise His Holiness' reincarnation. Even if they try to, no one will follow it. Some might be out of fear of the regime, as we've seen with the Panchen Lama."

Prof. Anand Kumar provided a comprehensive analysis of India's perspective on the challenges surrounding the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He highlighted the Dalai Lama's strategic transfer of political authority to the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), noting that secular matters now rest under the jurisdiction of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile. This transition, he explained, has been recognised by the Indian government and supported by most global powers. As an observer, he said he noticed when Indian authorities receive courtesy from the Tibetan government in exile, they are no longer cross-checking with the Dalai Lama. "That is a very important development in the last 15 years— a scientific, rational, and secular solution to a problem that will emerge with the physical passing of the 14th Dalai Lama."

Prof. Anand, who has actively engaged with the Tibetan cause since 1992, also reflected on the emotional connection between the Indian people and the Dalai Lama. "The Indians have been accustomed to identifying the Dalai Lama with Tibetans, and Tibet with the Dalai Lama. And we are always giving the highest importance to the position taken by the Dalai Lama in anything. Whenever reports emerge from Beijing, they are juxtaposed with those from Dharamshala, and it is Dharamshala's perspective that holds greater legitimacy," he noted. He also emphasised that India's support for the Tibetan cause transcends political affiliations, stating that the issue of Tibet in India has become a matter of national consensus regardless of which party is in power.

Activist Chemi Lhamo shared her perspective on how the international community can play a crucial role in addressing the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, particularly from the standpoint of Tibetans in far-flung diaspora countries. She emphasised the need for preemptive international support through legislation, citing the U.S. Tibet Policy and Support Act of 2020 as a model. "The Chinese Communist Party seeks control and legitimacy, both internally and externally. When denied this, they resort to asserting their narrative and creating confusion. This is precisely where the international community must step in—with clarity and recognition of how outrageous it is for the Chinese government to even participate in the conversation about reincarnation, let alone make decisions on it," she said.

Drawing a comparison, Chemi remarked that the idea of the Venezuelan government deciding the next Pope is "ridiculous," highlighting that even the Pope's selection involves a structured electoral process by the College of Cardinals. "In the case of reincarnation, it is not only a religious process but also a personal one. There is absolutely no room for political or colonial entities, such as the Chinese government, to interfere in this process. They are entirely unfit to do so." She further underscored the Chinese government's systematic destruction of Tibetan identity over the past seven decades. "This is the same regime actively erasing every aspect of Tibetan culture and identity. How can such a regime, the destroyer of Tibetan heritage, even attempt to speak about or decide the future of our spiritual leader?" she questioned. Chemi's remarks captured the strong sentiments of the Tibetan diaspora, rejecting any Chinese involvement in the reincarnation process. "The Chinese government has no right to be part of this conversation, and their actions only underscore their illegitimacy in this matter," she said.

Dr. Tenzin Desal, a fellow at TPI shared his insights on the signals emanating from the Tibetan exile capital and the broader dynamics of the Tibetan community, which he described as consisting of two distinct yet interconnected strands— Tibetans living in exile and those living in Tibet under colonial occupation. He explained that to understand the People's Republic of China (PRC) and its engagement with Tibet, we must consider two parallel activities— state-making and nation-building. "State-making is about incredible infrastructure building such as railways, and the omnipresent influence of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in the everyday lives and politics of Tibetans inside Tibet. Nation-building, on the other hand, has proven to be a far greater challenge for the PRC as they attempt to impose the narrative that 'Tibet is part of the PRC.' This narrative faced a major reckoning in 2008, when widespread protests erupted across Tibet, with calls for the Dalai Lama's return and demands for a free Tibet—clearly signalling the PRC's failure."

Dr. Desal highlighted the resilience of Tibetans inside Tibet, who, despite limited freedom to voice their opinions, continue to engage in creative forms of resistance. At the same time, the Tibetan exile movement, forged since 1959, has successfully created a cohesive dialogue between these two strands. "This cohesion between Tibetans inside Tibet and the diaspora movement, amplifying each other's voices, is the biggest success story. And the singular

Addressing the message from Dharamshala, he referenced a statement made by His Holiness the Dalai Lama in 2011, affirming that discussions about his reincarnation would take place once he reaches the age of 90. "For now, we must wait a little longer for a clearer picture," he said.

The overall importance of the issue, although acknowledged by the stakeholders around the world, have seldom been actualised through an event like this, which was viewed by watch parties around the world including Tibetans, followers of the Dalai Lama as well as geo-politicians and observers who realise the political implications of the coming years.

Protecting Chinese workers in Pakistan: Should the PLA intervene?

25 November 2024, Think China, Ghulam Ali

As violence continues to break out in Pakistan, Chinese workers are among those targeted, despite the clashing forces having no quarrel with China. Academic Ghulam Ali notes that China sending troops to Pakistan would not guarantee the safety of its citizens, and might expose them to danger instead.

Unabated terrorist attacks on Chinese workers in Pakistan have prompted policy circles to discuss the prospects of China's direct involvement in ensuring the safety of its workers in the country. While both governments have remained tight-lipped, the media has uncovered information about ongoing discussions between the two nations.

If these reports prove valid, it would represent a major shift in China's traditional policy of avoiding security roles in other countries. Furthermore, initiating such a role in a terror-hit Pakistan would serve as a litmus test for Beijing's capabilities.

Decreasing Chinese investment

Under its "flagship" China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), China has committed nearly US$62 billion for projects in Pakistan, of which US$25 billion has already been spent. In developing this project, China has faced severe security challenges due to relentless terrorist attacks on its workers engaged in various projects in Pakistan.

In 2024 alone, seven Chinese nationals lost their lives in two separate attacks. The Balochistan Liberation Army (BLA), a terrorist outfit fighting against the Pakistani military for the independence of Balochistan, and Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan (TTP), a religious extremist group demanding the implementation of strict Islamic laws and operating along the porous Pakistan-Afghanistan border, carried out these attacks.

Such challenges have led China to reduce its investment in Pakistan by 74% in 2023, despite an increase in its post-pandemic investments worldwide. Chinese Premier Li Qiang made no commitments to new projects or to initiating the second phase of the CPEC during his maiden visit to Pakistan in October 2024.

China a soft target

Notably, both BLA and TTP, fighting against the Pakistani military, harbour no direct grudges against China. Moreover, these terrorist groups are a result of the flawed policies of the Pakistani state.

China's significance to Pakistan, due to its historically strong strategic relationship, makes it a soft target. Any attack on the Chinese in Pakistan would bring these groups into the international limelight, which they seek for attention.

The pernicious seeds of religious extremism in Pakistan were sown by military dictator General Muhammad Zia-ul-Haq (1977-88), who imposed strict Islamic laws in the country and joined the Afghan jihad against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan during the 1980s. Subsequent military leadership also used religious proxies expeditiously. The TTP is an offshoot of those policies. Most of its demands – implementation of Islamic laws, withdrawal of the military from Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, provincial autonomy and the release of prisoners – are directed at the military. None of these demands is related to China.

Similarly, the insurgency in Balochistan is largely a reaction to oppressive military policies, marginalisation, denial of a share in the province's abundant natural resources, the establishment of military cantonments and the enforced disappearances of thousands of local Balochis. The roots of this insurgency, now in its fifth wave, trace back to the independence of Pakistan.

China's role in Balochistan began in 2002 with the construction of Gwadar port. Even after the completion of the first phase of the port, China withdrew, and the port was handed over to the Port of Singapore Authority (PSA). The differences between the Pakistani government and PSA were resolved by transferring administrative control to China in 2015.

Both terrorist groups are fighting against the Pakistani state, specifically the military. China is merely caught in the crossfire. China's significance to Pakistan, due to its historically strong strategic relationship, makes it a soft target. Any attack on the Chinese in Pakistan would bring these groups into the international limelight, which they seek for attention.

... the fundamental question is whether China's security role, through PSCs, the PLA, or other security operatives with a direct presence in Pakistan, will help ensure the safety of its citizens.

China's security role in Pakistan: PSCs or the PLA?

To counter these attacks, proposals for China's direct role in Pakistan's security have emerged. These include the deployment of China's private security companies (PSCs) or the People's Liberation Army (PLA), strengthening the capabilities of Pakistani security agencies, and establishing a joint security management system with Chinese security officials participating in security meetings.

China's PSCs, although having grown to thousands with millions of employees, have limited experience in international operations. According to reports, at most 40 of them have overseas operations. Furthermore, PSCs do not carry firearms, lack high-risk operational capabilities and operate under limited authority. Their role primarily consists of intelligence gathering, escort services, security training, risk assessment, site protection and emergency evacuation.

The deployment of PSCs or the PLA would require amendments to the existing laws of both countries, as they prohibit security roles in other countries. While amendments may not be difficult, as both states are involved, the fundamental question is whether China's security role, through PSCs, the PLA, or other security operatives with a direct presence in Pakistan, will help ensure the safety of its citizens.

Chinese deployments would hardly enhance security, given that they are unfamiliar with Pakistani culture and geographic conditions.

China should think twice

If PSCs or the PLA are deployed in the outer security circles around Chinese compounds or alongside vehicles carrying Chinese engineers, it would directly expose them to terrorist targets. As terrorists employ suicide attacks, which are the ultimate form of ambush, this reduces the chances of survival. Chinese deployments would hardly enhance security, given that they are unfamiliar with Pakistani culture and geographic conditions.

At the same time, deploying China's regular or paramilitary forces would contribute to the Baloch militants' narrative that China is assisting the Pakistani military in the exploitation of the province's resources, representing a new form of colonisation. On the global stage, it would reinforce the perception of China's expansionist agenda driven by its military power.

Considering that the Pakistani military and intelligence agencies, with all the resources at their disposal (equipment, access to information, and control over state machinery), have failed to ensure the safety of Chinese workers, how could small contingents of Chinese troops succeed in doing so?

The failure of Pakistan's counterterrorism efforts is not merely due to a lack of financing, equipment or intelligence sources. Following its entry into the US-led "war on terror" in 2002, the Pakistani military received substantial aid, equipment, and intelligence support from the US. Yet terrorist incidents in the country continued unabated.

China should think twice before entering into Pakistan's security quagmire, which is a product of the Pakistani military itself. Sending any form of troops to Pakistan offers no guarantee of safety for its citizens and would likely expose them further to terrorists. China can strengthen Pakistan's counterterrorism measures while simultaneously questioning the will of the Pakistani military in this fight.

China-India ties to be more resilient in the Trump 2.0 era

25 November 2024, The Interpreter, Daniel Balazs

India and China have sought to defuse their military standoff and that will limit the prospect for US interference in their relations.

Donald Trump's upcoming engagement with China and India will be one of the key determinants of Asian affairs. While Beijing and New Delhi are emerging great powers, their bilateral ties are not immune to Washington's geopolitical calculations. US strategic support to India and the enhancement of defence cooperation exacerbated a major downturn of Sino-Indian ties after the 2020 Galwan conflict. Nevertheless, a recent breakthrough on border affairs and shared economic imperatives suggest that China-India relations will be more robust against US strategic interference in the years to come.

China and India share a disputed border in the Himalayas that has served as a source of tension since the 1960s. China went to war over the border with India in 1962, and the two countries fought again in 1967. After an intense military standoff on the boundary in 1986-87, guns and boots gave way to decades of precarious stability. Frictions surfaced again in the 2010s, with bloodless military standoffs occurring in 2013, 2014, 2015 and 2017. In June 2020, a deadly fight in the Galwan valley claimed the lives of at least 20 Chinese and four Indian soldiers.

In the wake of the Galwan conflict, relations went into a nosedive. Not only did China and India deploy thousands of soldiers to the border, but tensions also spilled over into other areas. India restricted the inflow of Chinese investments, banning more than 250 applications developed by companies such as Tencent and Baidu, and conducted tax raids on telecommunications companies including Huawei and ZTE. India also expelled Chinese journalists, and China responded in kind.

The previous Trump administration branded China as a “strategic competitor” and it reacted to the Sino-Indian rift accordingly. Washington aided India during the Galwan conflict by providing it with intelligence and defence equipment. After the clashes, the United States and India signed the Basic Exchange and Cooperation Agreement on Geospatial Cooperation, a pact that improves interoperability between the US and Indian militaries. The Biden administration followed a similar approach. The 2022 National Defence Strategy and Indo-Pacific Strategy reiterated US support to India vis-à-vis China on the border and in the broader Indian Ocean region. A report also stated that the US shared intelligence with India that prevented another fatal clash in 2022. The Biden administration spearheaded cooperation with India in the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue, or “Quad”, and Biden referred to China as an aggressor at the meeting of the group earlier this year.

China watched these developments with unease. Chinese media blasted the US for destabilising Asia and cajoling New Delhi into a coalition against Beijing. Reports lambasted India for siding with the United States after the Galwan clashes, and exploiting a strategic collaboration with Washington against China.

Last month, the Indian government announced that it had reached a border patrol agreement with China. The pact defused the Sino-Indian military standoff that had persisted since 2020.

While US strategic interference worsened tensions between Beijing and New Delhi, recent developments portend greater Sino-Indian resilience to Washington’s geopolitical designs for the region.

Last month, the Indian government announced that it had reached a border patrol agreement with China. The pact defused the Sino-Indian military standoff that had persisted since 2020. The agreement does not resolve the border dispute, but it lays down the foundation for the normalisation of Sino-Indian ties and has implications for the two Asian states’ relationship.

Stable ties with China allow India to reduce its reliance on US strategic support and offset one of the key drivers of India’s commitment to the Quad. Furthermore, the border agreement allows India to re-engage with China in the economic domain, as trade and investment relations with Beijing serve New Delhi’s goal of becoming a manufacturing hub. Investment proposals by China were already being approved on a case-by-case basis before the agreement, and such clearances could increase going forward.

A steady relationship with India also benefits China, as it counteracts New Delhi’s “strategic drift” towards the United States. As tensions subside, China’s outreach to India is likely to have an economic element. Accessing the vast Indian market would benefit China as it capitalises on exports for growth amid a real estate slowdown and a decline in consumer spending.

Trump’s upcoming trade policy could also drive rapprochement between India and China. Trump pledged to impose 60-100 per cent import tariffs on goods brought in from China and 10-20 per cent tariffs on imports from any other country. Recent analysis suggests that India could also be a target of additional punitive tariffs, and Trump has a track record of trade frictions with New Delhi. The first Trump administration’s steel and aluminium tariffs affected US-India trade and the United States also revoked India’s preferential trade treatment in 2019. Against this backdrop, China and India could benefit from each other’s markets to mitigate the impact of potential import tariffs imposed by the United States.

The Galwan conflict and the Sino-Indian rift allowed the United States to boost defence ties with India and shape the Asian strategic landscape to its advantage. With China and India on the road to rapprochement, Trump 2.0 will need to take a fresh look at Asian affairs and design a strategy that is less reliant on New Delhi’s animosity towards Beijing.

Why loan from China under BRI may bring down KP Oli govt in Nepal

25 November 2024, FirstPost

Ahead of Nepal Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli’s visit to China in December, the country’s ruling parties are at odds over Beijing’s Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). While Oli’s Communist Party of Nepal-Unified Marxist Leninist wants to go ahead with a loan from Beijing under the BRI, the Nepali Congress led by Sher Bahadur Deuba is staunchly against it. Let’s take a closer look

Is the KP Sharma Oli-led government in Nepal in trouble?

Ahead of Oli’s visit to China, Nepal’s ruling parties are going at it over Beijing’s Belt and Road Initiative. While Oli’s Communist Party of Nepal- Unified Marxist Leninist (CPN-UML) party wants to go ahead with the loan from China, the Nepali Congress led by Sher Bahadur Deuba seems adamantly against it.

Oli, ahead of the China visit, struck an upbeat note.

“I am embarking on a visit to China on December 2 and it will not just be a tour to a foreign country,” Oli said. “You will know by yourself how the visit became successful after I return home.”

But what do we know about the row?

Let’s take a closer look:

Oli’s CPN-UML pushes BRI

First, let’s briefly examine Oli’s upcoming trip.

As per The Print, this will be Oli's first foreign visit since taking office.

Nepal's foreign minister Arzu Deuba is heading to China today ahead of the trip, as per Indian Express. Deuba, the wife of Nepali Congress leader Sher Singh Deuba, will join Oli on the trip.

Oli's visit is a departure from history as Nepal's leaders usually visit India first after taking office – which is a nod to the close ties between Kathmandu and New Delhi.

However, Oli is thought to be a pro-China leader.

Oli previously visited China in March 2016 after taking power in 2015.

Oli and the CPN-UML have been pushing for more loans under China's Belt and Road Initiative from its Exim Bank, as per Indian Express.

The newspaper reported that Oli, at a meeting of top Nepal's officials last week which included Nepali Congress chief Sher Bahadur Deuba, his wife and Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba and NC general secretary Gagan Thapa, said he had made assurances to China that it would be difficult for him to back out of.

Oli, attending a grand rally organised by his party in Kathmandu last week, claimed that the government is firmly progressing towards its commitment to development, prosperity, and good governance.

Oli during the rally hinted that he intends to sign a few projects with China.

"As much as possible we don't want to take loans from anywhere; we are not in the condition that we can add on more loans but we have to increase our production. How can we increase our production? It's not something that we need to be depressed about. Rather we should be hopeful and raise awareness within our circle, other smaller countries aren't in the place where they're now," Oli said.

"Increasing productivity will be my priority," he added.

Nepali Congress opposes loan

But the Nepali Congress has been insistent on its stance against any new loans.

Oli during the meeting last week with the top officials was unable to convince his coalition partners the Nepali Congress to put pen to paper over the BRI framework, as per Indian Express.

The agreement, signed in 2017, is yet to be finalised.

"How much loan do we take? If grant, take it now. Let's not add further burden," Deuba told Oli during the meeting, as per Rising Nepal Daily.

According to The Times of India, China and Nepal are yet to negotiate a loan under the BRI despite intense efforts from Beijing.

Kathmandu has been historically reluctant to take loans – preferring instead to rely on grants – given the state of its economy.

It is also wary of falling into a debt trap like some other countries.

The Nepali Congress leaders insisted that Oli sign the BRI framework treaty only if the projects have 100 per cent grants.

Beijing has made it clear it has no interest in doing so.

People in the know told The Times of India that the Nepali Congress may have a rethink about supporting the government if Oli proceeds with taking loans under the BRI over its objections.

The Nepali Congress, during a meeting at the Federal Parliament building to discuss Nepal's current economic situation and reform measures, had yet again reiterated that it would not accept any new loans under the BRI.

Prakash Sharan Mahat, the Nepali Congress spokesperson and ex-finance minister, said that China must honour its prior commitments before any talk of new loans.

"The Nepali Congress is not opposed to the BRI, we are simply saying that we cannot take on new loans at this time," he explained.

"In terms of the support we need for connectivity, we initially required grant assistance for road construction. Many of the commitments made by the Chinese government in grants have yet to be fulfilled, and those need to be addressed first."

Mahat further added, "If the grant implementation itself is lagging, what is the point of discussing loans? The debt burden is already increasing. Therefore, we should avoid taking loans from any government, including the Chinese government."

While the Chinese government is expected to implement grant commitments under the BRI, Mahat reiterated that new loans should not be pursued immediately.

"Regarding the BRI framework, are we attempting to combine other strategic security aspects into this? We believe these matters require careful consideration," he stated.

"For now, the focus should be on implementing the grants, especially those under the BRI, and avoiding new loans," he added.

Experts say Oli is in a tough spot.

"PM Oli is now treading a tightrope. He has to take the NC, the main ally of the coalition, into confidence so that he will make some significant gain from the China visit," a piece in Rising Nepal Daily stated.

"Nepal's political leaders should demonstrate their ability to navigate the geopolitical complexities. But their real leadership test lies in taking bold steps in the interest of the nation while avoiding the potential geopolitical pitfalls."

Oli remains upbeat

Oli though, has remained upbeat

At last week's rally he dismissed any rift between the coalition partners.

He said the cooperation between the CPN-UML and the Nepali Congress is aimed at lifting the country from its decline.

He also rubbished allegations made by his opponents, justified the alliance between the Nepali Congress and CPN-UML to form the incumbent coalition government, and vowed to take action against corruption, anarchy and those violating the law.

Any form of fraud, smuggling, corruption, character assassination, and obscenity is unacceptable, the prime minister said.

Addressing what is claimed to be the awareness campaign of the party, Oli urged the investors to invest with confidence as the government is on a mission to create a 'Prosperous Nepal and Happy Nepali' by maintaining peace and security.

"You should invest, the government will arrange security and good governance," he told industrialists. Addressing the rally seen as Oli's first show of strength of his party CPN-UML after assuming power a year and a half ago, the premier claimed the economy is improving due to the policies and plans adopted by the CPN-UML-Congress coalition.

Rejecting rumours spread by the opposition parties regarding the fall of the government, Oli assured it would run for a full five-year term till the next election.

He vowed to hand over power to Nepali Congress chief Sher Bahadur Deuba in a one-and-a-half-year term as per the power-sharing deal between the two largest parties.

He also sought to reassure India earlier this month.

"That I am visiting China first does not mean our relation with India is not good," he told the Kathmandu Post.

"We took a position while India imposed a blockade [in 2015-16], so they were not happy. There is no reason for them to be unhappy with us [now] as we will maintain friendly, balanced and good relations with both our neighbors."

China's People Deserve the Truth—Not Censorship | Opinion

25 November 2024, Newsweek, Ben Cardin

On Nov. 11, in Zhuhai, China, a 62-year-old man drove his car into a crowd at a sports complex, killing 35 people and injuring 43 others. It was China's deadliest mass killing in more than a decade. While the tragedy barely made headlines in the West, many Chinese citizens may not have heard about it inside China, where it was swiftly and thoroughly swept under the rug by the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) vast censorship apparatus.

Even foreign news agencies faced intimidation, and in the case of a BBC reporter, physical assault, when he attempted to cover the developments in Zhuhai.

Before family members, friends, and acquaintances of the victims could even begin to grieve, CCP authorities quickly dismantled makeshift memorials and removed flower arrangements placed in remembrance. Social media platforms in China were instructed to delete posts expressing outrage and sorrow. Once again, the CCP quickly escalated its censorship efforts to suppress public discussions of the tragedy and its impact, leaving Chinese citizens to grapple with this incident—and what it says about their country—in the midst of an information blackout. In Washington, we tend to focus on China's global ambitions, its economic competition with the United States, and its aggressive behavior on the international stage which challenge the global norms that we and our allies have upheld since World War II. We analyze China's conduct through diplomatic, economic, and security lenses, but we continually overlook a critical element of U.S.-China policy—the Chinese people.

Some of this is out of our control. Under President Xi Jinping, the CCP has repeatedly restricted access to U.S. diplomats and cancelled dozens of public events organized by the United States mission in China. He is also responsible for expanding the CCP's powerful media and online censorship regime that blocks news outside, independent, or "sensitive" information—like news about the Zhuhai mass casualty incident—silencing free expression among people in China.

What we can control is how we respond to these challenges. So far, despite the excellent work of outlets like Radio Free Asia and Voice of America, our efforts to engage with the Chinese people and empower them with access to uncensored information have fallen short. In the near term, this weakens our ability to counter the anti-U.S. propaganda aimed at China's 1.4 billion citizens. Over time, it risks creating a lasting divide in mutual understanding and goodwill between our nations, potentially leading to broader support for—or an implied acceptance of—some of Xi's extreme policies. Despite ongoing censorship, Chinese citizens are increasingly questioning their government's policies and conduct. More are seeking alternative sources of information and calling for greater economic and political freedoms. The 2022 White Paper Movement protests against the Chinese government's draconian "zero-COVID" policy clearly demonstrated that desire. And perceptions of the United States have recently shown improvement despite a constant barrage of targeted anti-U.S. propaganda. The stakes are higher than ever, yet all the evidence suggests we have an unprecedented opportunity to engage.

This pivotal moment calls for bold steps to deepen understanding, bridge divides, and build genuine connections with the people of China. That's why, when I introduced the bipartisan Informing a Nation with Free, Open, and Reliable Media (or INFORM Act)—a bill directing the executive branch to share clear, independent information to Chinese citizens—I hoped to spark a much-needed conversation in Congress about how U.S. policy can better support the rights and freedoms of those who have long endured intense repression and censorship. That conversation should also remind us that the Chinese people are not our adversaries; they are members of the global community, entitled to the same liberties that all people deserve from a government that respects their dignity.

As the new administration takes office and the next chair of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee steps into their role, it's critical that they make this issue a priority and join in this important conversation. It is vital that we continue to emphasize that our differences are with China's authoritarian government, not its people. By recognizing the Chinese people as partners in the international community rather than enemies, the United States can reframe its approach to U.S.-China policy—grounding it in shared human values between our two citizenries.

While we continue to prioritize economic, military, and technological competition with China's government, it's also time to dedicate our efforts and resources to meaningful engagement with the people of China. From the Tiananmen Square protests to the resilience seen in the White Paper Movement, Chinese citizens have repeatedly shown remarkable resolve in the face of repression. This latest tragedy in Zhuhai underscores what's at stake—not only the rights of those to grieve and seek justice but also the very soul of China's future. Each silenced story, each deleted post, and each dismantled memorial is a stark reminder that, without the means to connect, learn, and question, the Chinese people are left isolated from the truth and the outside world.

If we are as serious about the China challenge as we profess, we must continue to stand up for the Chinese people who are courageously leading the way.

How Xi Jinping is going back to Confucius to define China's future

24 November 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

Xi's plan to glorify China's deep cultural roots is embodied in Ruzang, a compilation of the philosopher's writings and related works

For most of the 103-year history of the Communist Party of China, the teachings of the philosopher Confucius were deemed relics of a backwards past, with its leaders looking to Marxism and socialism to modernise China.

But under President Xi Jinping's leadership, Confucianism has made a dramatic comeback as the bedrock of imperial Chinese ethics and governance, and other Chinese classics have become the pillars of Beijing's efforts to shore up its intellectual foundation and governance philosophy amid an intensifying ideological competition with the US-led West.

One of the latest ventures is the Ruzang, or "Confucian Canon", project to create the largest ever compilation of Confucian classics. The project, which has had the input of nearly 500 scholars since it was started in 2003, was significantly elevated in 2014 when Xi became the first Chinese president to throw his personal weight behind it.

Within China, the project is reminiscent of similar immense canon projects undertaken only a few times in the past 2,000 years, and is set to become a major source of inspiration for better governance.

Among those contributing to Ruzang are international scholars, with Beijing apparently aiming to appeal to overseas Chinese. But experts point to geopolitical tensions and a public opinion of Confucianism as a Han-centric idea as obstacles.

The Ruzang project was first approved in 2003 by the Education Ministry under then president Hu Jintao and spearheaded by Chinese philosopher Tang Yijie, who pledged to compile all known Confucian classics while explaining the survival and development of the nation.

Xi backed the project when he visited then 87-year-old Tang at Peking University in 2014, hailing it as "a very meaningful endeavour that carries forward Chinese civilisation".

Peking University vice-president Wang Bo took over the project from Tang after he died in 2014.

Wang was chosen to make policy recommendations at October's study session of the 24-man Politburo chaired by Xi, who spoke on the goal of turning China into a "cultural powerhouse" by 2035, drawing strength from Marxism and Chinese traditional heritage.

So far, nearly 500 scholars from around 100 institutions in China, South Korea, Japan and Vietnam have collaborated on the project, with estimated costs around 150 million yuan (US$21 million).

By April last year the first phase had compiled 510 influential Confucian writings into 282 volumes. The ongoing second phase aims to include an additional 160 works, resulting in a massive collection of about a billion characters – the largest of its kind in China’s history.

The Confucian Canon is among China’s efforts to tap into its cultural and philosophical roots to strengthen national pride at home, dubbed by Xi as “Compilation of Classics in the Flourishing Age”.

To many Chinese, Xi’s description brings to mind Chinese writing projects such as the “Five Classics” of Confucian works in the Han dynasty (206BC-AD220), the vast Yongle Dadian, an encyclopaedia commissioned under the Ming dynasty (1368-1644), and the Siku Quanshu, which was written in the 18th century during the Qing dynasty (1644-1911) and was the largest collection of books in imperial China.

The Confucian Canon follows the basic structure of Siku Quanshu, categorising works from the pre-Qin dynasty to the end of the Qing dynasty, including original Confucian classics, works reflecting Confucian thought and literature related to governance, and personal conduct that reflects Confucianism, according to the Peking University Editorial and Research Centre of Confucian Canon.

Some literature previously deemed non-Confucian – such as that of Tao Yuanming, traditionally a Taoist poet and politician; and Qi Jiguang, a Ming dynasty general who fought Japanese pirates – have been included because they reflect Confucian ideals.

This scope presents a holistic view of Confucian thought over time, complete with editorial footnotes explaining each text’s significance.

Meanwhile, the texts were also digitised, which could play a crucial role in making these ancient texts accessible to scholars and the public around the world, according to the centre’s interviews with multiple project editors.

Confucianism’s changing role

In various media interviews, Tang Yijie emphasised Confucianism’s influence on ancient Chinese politics, economics, and culture. He said that while historically Buddhist and Daoist canons had been compiled, there was no overarching Confucian Canon because resources had been limited.

While the Ruzang project has academic benefits, analysts say it also encapsulates a broader narrative connected to China’s cultural renaissance and national security concerns amid the prevailing narrative war with the West.

Stephen C. Angle, a professor of philosophy and East Asian Studies at Wesleyan University in the United States, notes that the project reflects both political motives and “a genuine desire ... to re-energise” Confucianism as a source of theory and practice in Chinese society.

“Confucianism must be seen as ‘progressive’, which means developing in response to modern social, economic and political changes,” he said.

For centuries, Confucianism has served as the foundation of Chinese ethics and governance and influenced various dynasties.

Confucius, born in 551BC, proposed a system based on hierarchy mixed with benevolence, a reflection of the importance of social harmony and moral integrity in governance.

However, these principles faced being rejected during the revolutionary upheavals of the 20th century.

“Chinese dynasties have typically relied on the Confucian canon for legitimacy. Only radical regimes, like the Communist Party in the 20th century, opposed this notion, particularly during the May Fourth Movement and Cultural Revolution,” said Rana Mitter, ST Lee Chair in US-Asia Relations at Harvard Kennedy School.

While the official hostility towards Confucianism ended after the Cultural Revolution Chinese leaders in the subsequent decades mainly leaned towards the liberal democracy and capitalist model, said Daniel A. Bell, a chair professor at the University of Hong Kong.

Bell is the author of The Dean of Shandong, an account of Chinese academia based on his experience at Shandong University from 2017 to 2022, when he was involved in promoting Confucianism through teaching and research.

He said that since the 1990s, “Confucianism and communism mounted huge and unexpected comebacks” in a multipolar world, as China claimed it would not copy the West.

According to Bell, who was last month elected vice-president of the International Confucian Association, politically Confucianism provides a “source of values-based legitimacy” that complements Marxism and psychologically, it addresses the “atomisation and moral vacuum” created by capitalist-style modernisation.

The revival gained further traction in the 2000s under then president Hu’s “Harmonious Society” strategy alongside the establishment of Confucius Institutes worldwide.

Since Xi assumed leadership in 2012, cultural initiatives have been emphasised as part of China’s national security, encompassing various dimensions.

The resurgence of Confucianism culminated when Xi visited Qufu, Confucius’s birthplace, in eastern Shandong province in 2013 and made a speech on the 2,565th birthday of Confucius in September 2014 – the first time a Chinese president had taken part in celebrations marking Confucius’s birth.

He personally endorsed the role of the sage and suggested Confucianism could offer solutions for global peace and development. “Confucianism is key to understanding the national characteristics of the Chinese as well as the historical roots of the spiritual world of the present-day Chinese," he said during the 2014 celebration.

He added that Confucianism had evolved and responded to the demands of the times.

In that year, the Communist Party mandated that officials nationwide attend lectures on Confucius and other classical philosophers.

Legalism – the school less discussed

Xi has referred to classical texts so frequently that in 2015 and 2018, Communist Party mouthpiece People's Daily compiled two volumes of quotes he used from important articles and speeches. Among the selected nearly 300 quotes, Confucianism is his most cited philosophy, followed by Legalism.

While Beijing has not promoted the school of thought known as Legalism as prominently, some academics, such as Delia Lin from the University of Melbourne, argue that Xi combines both philosophies.

Legalism is a pragmatic governance approach characterised by strict laws, centralised authority and the belief that human nature is inherently self-interested and could lead to chaos without proper control.

Confucianism promotes moral leadership and social harmony, justifying the Communist Party's authority through the idea of the virtuous ruler, or "sage-king", aligned with Xi's "rule by virtue".

In 2017, Lin wrote in a book chapter that "Confucianised Legalism" was the dual emphasis on moral education and firm legal structures that underpinned Xi's governing framework.

It enabled the Communist Party to claim both legitimacy and effectiveness in governance, and was highlighted in the 2014 fourth plenary session, which reinforced the commitment to "governing the country according to law".

In multiple speeches about governing by the law and anti-corruption, Xi has cited Legalism classics in defence of the hardline crackdown.

"Today's China under Xi Jinping is leaning into the idea of China as a source of traditional wisdom. This has tapped into a greater nationalist pride in China's intellectual traditions more broadly in China," said Harvard historian Mitter.

Intellectual legitimacy

Besides the canon project, in recent years there has been a slew of "Chinese culture projects" that all reinforce Beijing's narrative of a continuous history with China a global power with ancient status.

They include the "China Paintings through the Ages" series exhibited since 2022, a project that aims to document and preserve Chinese paintings from ancient times to the Qing dynasty. Additionally, the evacuation of archaeological sites such as Liangzhu serve as physical proof of China's 5,000-year civilisation.

These changes manifest that "modern China looks back to its civilisational heritage to extract wisdom that can inform its future," according to Peter T.C. Chang, a visiting senior fellow with the ISEAS – Yusof Ishak Institute in Singapore.

The ideological foundation of China was rooted in Leninist-Marxist thought, but the current leadership recognised the importance of the country's indigenous traditions, especially Confucianism, he said.

"This process marks a return to cultural roots, using the teachings of Confucianism and other traditional philosophies as guiding principles for China's continued development and governance."

The key approach, in Xi's own words, is to "Sinicise Marxism" through Chinese traditional culture, a process outlined in the "two combines" strategy introduced in 2021 during the party's centenary. It was later added to Xi Jinping Thought on Culture, which was raised in October last year as the sixth pillar of the paramount leader's political doctrine that has been enshrined in the constitution since 2018.

The "first combine" adapts Marxism to China's unique realities, exemplified by Deng Xiaoping's reforms. The "second combine" coined by Xi integrates Marxism with traditional Chinese culture.

At the symposium in June last year, Xi asserted: "This fusion has resulted in a distinctly Chinese style and character, with Sinicised Marxism becoming the essence of Chinese culture and spirit in contemporary times".

He also hailed China's unique development path in its uninterrupted cultural continuity, creativity, unity, inclusiveness and peaceful nature.

Limited influence abroad

China's ongoing revival of Confucianism also comes amid its struggle against Western narratives that frame China as "authoritarian" and resistant to modern democratic values.

The canon project involves collaboration with scholars from South Korea, Japan and Vietnam, emphasising their shared cultural heritage. However, experts warn the project must be handled sensitively and with limited effects because of ongoing political disputes.

The project aims to strengthen Chinese identity and pride in the achievements of Chinese civilisation while also emphasising common cultural ties with neighbouring countries, according to China observer Andrew Nathan, a Columbia University professor of political science.

He said it might be difficult for the objectives of the project, while valid, to resonate beyond China's borders.

"When Chinese classics travelled to other neighbouring countries, they were reinterpreted and adapted in those countries, just as Chinese thinkers adapted Buddhism from India or Mao Zedong carried out the 'Sinification of Marxism'," he said, adding that the project should consider this variation in national traditions within the broader framework of Confucian thought.

Germaine A. Hoston, a political-science professor at the University of California, San Diego, also underscored the need for sensitivity in recognising Confucian contributions across different countries in Asia to avoid undermining the legitimacy of the project.

"It is important that such contributions are not disregarded or diminished in an effort to reassert Chinese military, political and cultural hegemony in the region," she said.

The influence of Confucianism beyond China – or not – is a subject of discussion among observers and academics.

For Chang, Confucianism today remains largely a Han-centric sphere, despite its influence in Japan and South Korea.

"To promote Confucianism globally without being perceived as a form of cultural hegemony, the tradition must undergo a process of 'de-Sinicisation'," ensuring that teachings were accessible through translations that facilitate engagement without cultural barriers, he said.

Larger differences related to geopolitical and other disagreements may overshadow common heritage.

According to Mitter, there has been "relatively little spillover effect, even in Asia," as "China's contemporary political disputes over war memory, territory and economics mean that neighbouring states prioritise those issues over ideas of shared common cultural heritage".

Outside Asia, Confucianism was increasingly being positioned as a "counterpoint" to Western narratives, particularly Samuel Huntington's "Clash of Civilisations" theory, Chang pointed out.

"Xi Jinping's vision of a 'community of shared future for humanity' draws upon Confucian values of harmony and coexistence. This philosophy provides an alternative Eastern world view that emphasises peaceful collaboration and mutual respect, contrasting with the more conflict-oriented outlook of some Western theories.

"The Confucian principle of harmonious coexistence is thus being employed as a framework for advocating global unity over division," he said.

Another criticism of China's attempts to promote traditional Chinese culture – especially Confucianism – is that it promotes state propaganda or "cultural hegemony".

For Angle, some of the criticism is justified "because too often, official representatives of Chinese culture have not acted in a confident way, but in a rigid way that refuses all questions or genuine dialogue".

Bell suggested there needed to be "Confucian-style 'soft power' – rule by virtue, moral example, 'diversity in harmony', personal freedom and political participation at the local level – to counter and soften centralising and totalising tendencies of China's legalist tradition that advocates strong state power above all else".

New Delhi needs to warm up China-India relations with sincerity

24 November 2024, Global Times, Lou Chunhao

With the successful implementation of the resolutions that China and India recently reached on issues concerning the border area, the China-India relationship, which has been lingering at a low level for over four years, is entering a window of opportunity for improvement. The Indian side has expressed its willingness to strengthen strategic communication with China, enhance strategic mutual trust, and expand mutually beneficial cooperation. It has also proposed relevant ideas and suggestions for improving and developing bilateral relations, leading to positive expectations for the future of the relationship between the two countries. However, some argue that the current shift in India's attitude is partly due to its widening differences with the US, Canada, and others over issues of "democracy" and "human rights," as well as considerations to reduce the resource consumption of winter troop deployments along the border. This has raised doubts about New Delhi's sincerity in improving relations with China.

Given India's previous inconsistencies in its policy toward China, these doubts are not without merit. Therefore, in addition to strategically eliminating erroneous concepts such as "relying on the US to counter China" and "war is inevitable between China and India," India also needs to work with China to promote the stable and healthy development of bilateral relations. Currently, India needs to make efforts in at least the following three areas.

First, it's necessary for India to rationally guide domestic public opinion to foster a positive understanding of China. The development of China-India relations requires a solid foundation of public opinion. It is particularly necessary for the government and mainstream media to properly guide rather than manipulate public sentiment when issues arise in bilateral relations. However, in recent years, some Indian military and political officials have excessively exaggerated the contradictions and differences between China and India. Certain think tank scholars and media outlets have been eager to fabricate the "China military threat" narrative, frequently amplifying the "China threat" to attract attention and generate traffic. This has significantly poisoned the Indian public's perception of China.

A key issue in this situation is the role the Indian government should play and the signals it should send. In light of the recent positive momentum in China-India relations, it is crucial for the Indian side to clearly explain to its citizens the necessity and inevitability of improving and developing these relations.

Second, it is crucial to decisively abandon the practices of overstretching the concept of security and genuinely deepen economic and trade cooperation. Over the past 30 years, China-India economic and trade cooperation has made significant progress, with continuous improvements in cooperation mechanisms and steady growth in investment and trade. Economic and trade cooperation was once regarded as the "ballast stone" of bilateral relations. Both sides not only regard the development of a partnership as a core component of their strategic and cooperative relationship but have also established a high-level economic and trade dialogue mechanism to strengthen the alignment of economic development strategies, and promote balanced and sustainable growth in bilateral trade.

However, in recent years, India has increasingly tended to view its economic and trade relationship with China from a competitive, and even substitutive or hedging perspective. This shift has led to discriminatory economic and trade policies against China, such as banning Chinese applications, restricting Chinese investments in India, and suppressing Chinese enterprises operating in India, which have severely harmed the legitimate rights and interests of Chinese companies. Clearly, India has not benefited, and cannot benefit, from its discriminatory policies against China. The Indian government is also attempting to create a favorable business environment to attract more foreign direct investment. Restoring and strengthening economic and trade cooperation with China would be beneficial in achieving these goals.

Third, it is essential to eliminate artificial barriers as soon as possible and actively promote people-to-people exchanges. Amity between the people holds the key to sound state-to-state relations. As two ancient civilizations, China and India have historically benefited from cultural exchanges that provide positive energy to their bilateral relations. However, in recent years, the Indian side has imposed artificial obstacles, such as suspending direct flights to China, limiting visas, halting activities, and expelling journalists. These actions have led to a dramatic decline in bilateral people-to-people exchanges. China has consistently maintained an open attitude toward people-to-people exchanges between the two countries, while the Indian side's self-imposed barriers have left many rational individuals who hope for stable development in China-India relations feeling surprised and perplexed. The recent state of academic exchanges between China and India illustrates this point. Many Indian scholars have been invited to participate in academic activities in China, while it has become increasingly difficult for Chinese scholars to engage in face-to-face exchanges in India. The Indian government needs to promptly lift restrictions on people-to-people exchanges with China, allowing for more frequent interactions; otherwise, hopes for improved bilateral relations will be extinguished once again.

The current disengagement efforts at relevant border points are merely the first step toward easing border tensions and promoting the improvement of bilateral relations. China-India relations have not yet returned to the state they were in before the Galwan Valley conflict in 2020. Actions speak louder than words; we hope that India will quickly take concrete and positive actions on various issues related to bilateral cooperation, truly working to thaw the relationship between China and India.

Decoding PM Modi's message to China

23 November 2024, The Indian Express, Ram Madhav

The Modi government's China policy is pragmatic and realist. It understands that the bilateral relationship cannot be placed in any specific category of friends or foes. It will remain volatile. Three important meetings between the leaders of India and China have generated a sense among observers that the two countries are cosying up to each other once again. Prime Minister Narendra Modi met President Xi Jinping at Kazan in Russia in October on the sidelines of the BRICS summit. This was followed by a meeting between the Indian Foreign Minister S Jaishankar and his Chinese counterpart, Wang Yi, at Rio de Janeiro in Brazil on the sidelines of the G20 summit. Around the same time, Indian Defence Minister Rajnath Singh was in Vientiane in Laos, shaking hands with his Chinese counterpart, Admiral Dong Jun. Prime Minister Modi's meeting with Xi Jinping comes five years after the second India-China informal bilateral summit at Mahabalipuram in Tamil Nadu in 2019. China's violation of the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in early 2020, leading to the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and an unknown number of Chinese soldiers, stalled the bilateral engagement process.

Sporadic engagements on a few occasions notwithstanding, bilateral relations remained tense through the last four years. The coldness was conspicuous at the G20 summit in Bali, Indonesia, in 2022, when Modi and Xi limited their interaction to a mere handshake. The two leaders bumped into each other once again at the BRICS summit in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 2023. Not much enthusiasm was witnessed after a brief meeting between the two, which the Chinese readout described as held "at the latter's request".

Bilateral engagements in the last one month, however, have generated a different kind of enthusiasm. The Chinese readout on the Modi-Xi meeting described the two countries as "important members of the Global South", and said that they "must also shoulder their international responsibility, set an example in boosting the strength and unity of developing countries, and contribute to promoting a multipolar world." On its part, the external affairs ministry of India, too, sounded positive, suggesting that "stable, predictable, and amicable bilateral relations" between the "two largest nations on earth", will have a positive impact on regional and global peace and prosperity. In a post on 'X', Rajnath Singh described his talks with Dong as "extremely productive". At Rio, Jaishankar underscored that the countries worked "constructively" in the BRICS and SCO framework, and "our cooperation in the G20 has also been evident".

Predictably, a lot of commentary is happening over the trajectory of India-China relations. Global Times declared that "there are encouraging signs that China-India relations are moving forward". Some suggested that India's economic compulsions propelled it to restore normalcy with its neighbour while others have argued that China wants to exploit India's tensions with the West.

There are two types of strategic analysts among China watchers – hawks and doves. The hawks believe that a thaw between the two countries is impossible. They cite examples to buttress the point that the northern neighbour cannot be trusted. Then there are doves, who believe that despite the challenges the two countries must and will work together. Jawahar Lal Nehru was known for his dovish views on India-China relations. "Indeed, I may say that we shall always leave the door open for an honourable settlement with China", he argued in 1963, even in the face of a humiliating defeat inflicted by it on India.

However, the breed of doves is shrinking as there is reduced appetite for a romantic approach to the bilateral relationship, especially after the Galwan incident. On a lighter note, doves are big suspects now. Last year, Indian agencies captured a pigeon

"suspiciously" roaming near a port in Mumbai. It had rings attached to its feet that carried Chinese letters. It was detained for eight months only to be let off in April this year after thorough investigation of possible espionage attempts by the Chinese. Even the Congress party, accused for long of being dove-ish on China, is seeking to refurbish its image by hawkishly attacking the Modi Government for "gullibility and naïveté" regarding China.

The Modi government's China policy is pragmatic and realist. It understands that the bilateral relationship cannot be placed in any specific category of friends or foes. It will remain volatile, with the two countries having "both differences and convergences" on bilateral and international issues, as Jaishankar told his counterpart. India also remembers that despite dozens of agreements between the two countries since the "Peace and Tranquility Agreement" of 1993, the LAC violations by China continued unabated. In 2013, AK Antony, the then defence minister, told the Indian Parliament that just as his government was signing border agreements with China in 2012 and 2013, there were more than 400 transgressions by the Chinese army between 2010 and 2013.

That is the reason why the Modi government has demonstrated cautious optimism about the future of bilateral relations. While welcoming the thaw, Modi underscored the importance of "properly handling differences and disputes", and advised that ties should be "stable, predictable, and amicable". Jaishankar reiterated that "mutual sensitivity, mutual respect and mutual interest" must be the touchstone for improving ties. While China continues to take potshots, stating that "improvement in bilateral relations in the future will largely depend on the sincerity of the Indian side", and "India's policy that aims at decoupling from China has failed" and "India can't profit from being hostile to or decoupling from China, and it is even making it difficult for India to realise its own development", the Indian leadership has gently but firmly told its Chinese counterparts that its foreign policy has been "principled and consistent, marked by independent thought and action". Jaishankar told Wang Yi that "we are against unilateral approaches to establish dominance" and India "does not view its relationships through the prism of other nations".

PM Modi has conveyed the crucial message that India is not only strongly committed to a multipolar world, but also "a multipolar Asia". Some argue that a "new beginning" is being made in bilateral relations. But what India wants is a "new understanding" on China's part to deal with old challenges and new opportunities.

India-China border agreement: A case for military buildup

23 November 2024, ORF, Kartik Bommakanti

In light of India's new patrolling agreement with China, the country needs to increase its military spending and bolster its armed forces against future threats

With India and China reaching a limited agreement on the disengagement from and patrolling of the Depsang Bulge and Demchok areas in eastern Ladakh, there is widespread jubilation in some quarters. The celebration of this breakthrough announced on 21 October 2024, should be tempered by the reality that there is still a significant amount of disengagement, de-escalation, and de-induction of forces to be completed by New Delhi and Beijing. Pending further negotiations, under the latest agreement, the following friction points were left out—Galwan Valley (PP 14), Pangong Tso (North and South Banks), Gogra (PP 17A) and Hotsprings (PP 15). These four areas are currently under buffer zones that prohibit patrolling, meaning the status quo ante, has not been restored completely. Meanwhile, with Depsang and Demchok, India and China have agreed to “coordinated patrolling,” which one analyst described as an “innovation.” This is misleading and deceptive because it is not an innovation, but a restriction on patrolling. There are three patrolling restrictions under the latest agreement.

Firstly, each patrol team cannot exceed 14 troops. Secondly, the other side must be notified before embarking on a patrol. Thirdly, the number of patrols that Indian and Chinese forces can conduct cannot exceed two or three every month, to all the points they deem part of their territory in Depsang and Demchok. Indeed, though India can patrol areas in Demchok, it is not permitted to patrol Charding La—a key pass. In addition, there is a quid pro quo. Just as India has gained patrolling access to Demchok and Depsang up to Patrolling Points (PP) 10, 11, 11A, 12, and 13, which it last secured access to in January 2020, China has gained a reciprocal concession by way of an “escorted patrol” in the Yangste area of Arunachal Pradesh, as well as another location. These patrolling restrictions did not apply under the terms of the 1993 and 1996 agreements. Further, these “innovations” are ultimately a concession to the Chinese because most of the territory that the Chinese occupied in April-May 2020 was primarily India-dominated, if not India-controlled, territory.

Beijing has numerous opportunities to rake up trouble along the entire stretch of the 3,500 kilometres of contested boundary between India and China.

The Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) maintains that “...verification patrolling has commenced on mutually agreed terms in Demchok and Depsang.” Nevertheless, restrictive conditions have been built into this agreement, in a quest to avoid clashes between Chinese and Indian forces. Only time will tell whether this arrangement will deliver the stabilising impact that the Modi government claims it is intended to achieve. Theoretically, clashes could still occur even under the new patrolling arrangement. Beijing has numerous opportunities to rake up trouble along the entire stretch of the 3,500 kilometres of contested boundary between India and China. India has had to accept these restrictive conditions as the price for resuming a limited patrolling agreement at Demchok and the Depsang Plains. The Chinese have compelled India to accept a shift in the terms of prior patrolling arrangements, and India's consent implies a tacit acceptance of China's case that earlier patrolling arrangements—as a result of agreements in 1993, 1996, 2005, and 2012—were unworkable or ineffective. Where does that leave India's quest to restore the status ante of April 2020? Despite the Modi government's impressive infrastructure build-up along the Sino-Indian boundary, which was one of the key reasons for the Chinese precipitating the ongoing boundary crisis, has New Delhi conceded to Beijing's demands that it will limit further infrastructure development, especially the Darbuk-Shyok-Daulat Beg Oldie (DBO) road? The government will have to come clean and clarify these matters. To its credit, the Modi government has invested heavily in border infrastructure and introduced vital changes in the military command structure. Under the interim budget in February 2024, the government has allocated more capital to the Border Roads Organisation (BRO) to beef up infrastructure in critical parts along the Sino-Indian border, such as the Nyoma Airfield in Ladakh, Shinku La Tunnel in Himachal Pradesh, the Nechiphu Tunnel in Arunachal Pradesh and several others. Supplementing this infrastructure build-up, visible change is underway in the Indian Army's conversion of its Headquarters Uttar Bharat (HQ-UB) into a new comprehensively operational Corp. This change is geared toward shifting the focus from the peacetime duties of the HQ-UB, which is now a Corps, to a Line of Actual Control (LaC) in the Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand sectors. These are very indispensable and laudable measures. Although the government is performing commendably on these two metrics, it is insufficient.

Engagement with Beijing without militarily equipping the Indian armed forces with additional capabilities conveys weakness.

Although the Modi government's work on India's border infrastructure paved the way for India's military mobilisation against China's annexation of Indian territory in April-May 2020, it has to do more to accumulate military strength through additional capital expenditure. Since 2017, well before the eruption of the current boundary crisis between India and China, there has not been significant growth in the defence budget, especially in capital acquisitions. Growth has been primarily in revenue expenditure which covers pensions, allowances, salaries and so on. This high growth of revenue spending is also driven by "One Rank, One Pension" (OROP). Even with the introduction of the Agnipath recruitment scheme, cost savings that are intended to help pay for capital acquisitions in the armed services, will not reap benefits until many years later. Engagement with Beijing without militarily equipping the Indian armed forces with additional capabilities conveys weakness. It will run the risk of inviting more crises and possibly a serious military conflagration with the People's Republic of China (PRC).

What draws China's anti-corruption watchdogs to Guangdong and its 'sin city' Dongguan?

23 November 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

As dozens of high-ranking officials fall in corruption scandals, a political analyst reveals a common thread

China's southern Guangdong province, with its sprawling textile and electronics manufacturing hubs, has long been known as a global economic powerhouse. But in recent years, it has gained a reputation of a very different kind.

In cities such as Dongguan and Huizhou, corruption investigations are widening against local cadres – often former officials accused of having used their position to take money from companies in return for special favours.

Xu Jianhua, who served as the Dongguan party secretary from 2011 to 2016, became the latest official to be placed under investigation, with the provincial disciplinary commission announcing on Wednesday that he had been detained.

Xu, 66, is suspected of committing "serious violations of discipline and law" – a euphemism for corruption. Xu was well-known for leading a government crackdown in February 2014 after state broadcaster CCTV exposed an extensive underground sex trade and thriving red light districts in Dongguan, a sprawling manufacturing base known also as "sin city".

Xu's detention comes just two months after Zhong Ganquan, the former deputy head of Dongguan's political advisory body, was placed under investigation.

Zhong, a Dongguan local who for decades was chief of the city's Humen district famed for its textile and electronics exporters, earned fame as "the man who knows all".

In August, former Dongguan mayor Li Yuquan, who served from 2006 to 2011, was also detained on corruption charges.

All three have long retired from official duties.

A tally based on announcements from Guangdong's provincial and municipal level anti-corruption bodies shows that 42 sitting and former party and government heads in Dongguan have faced corruption investigations so far this year.

A common factor in the investigations appeared to involve land sales.

According to a political analyst from Guangdong's Sun Yat-sen University, township governments control land sales in many cities in the province, particularly in Dongguan.

"The real decisions on land sales are at the grass roots level, as these lands, which are later developed into industrial estates, were owned by the villagers. So the township government heads are very influential in land deals," said the analyst, who asked not to be named due to the sensitivity of the matter.

"Oddly, in Dongguan and some other cities, few officials want to be promoted to higher government positions. No one wants to be thrown out of the decision-making circle for million-dollar land deals. Now, the property sector is under scrutiny, and past collusion between officials and developers is being revealed."

While almost every city in Guangdong has seen multiple anti-corruption investigations unfold this year, one in particular has riveted public attention.

In Huizhou, a second-tier city some 100km (62 miles) from Dongguan, at least seven out of 10 members of a former municipal leadership committee have been detained in recent years.

The most prominent downfalls involve Chen Yiwei, Huizhou mayor and party boss from 2011 to 2018, who was placed under investigation in July, and Mai Jiaomeng, who served as mayor when Chen was party chief. He was detained in April 2022.

When Chen's team was in charge, Huizhou's economic growth stalled. Between 2016-2020, the city's GDP grew at an average annual rate of 5.5 per cent, compared to as much as 14.1 per cent from 2008 to 2013.

"Despite the many excuses Chen and his team had for the drastic slowdown, Beijing and Guangdong leaders were not happy with their work, especially given infighting between Chen and his subordinate Mai, which became public knowledge in Guangdong," the analyst at Sun Yat-sen University said "They did not talk to each other even after they were transferred to provincial jobs."

According to reports from the Guangdong Provincial Discipline Inspection Commission, 109 department-level and 1,321 division-level officials were brought to book in the three quarters to September 30, almost 50 per cent more than the number punished the same period last year.

What Trump's proposed tariffs against China mean for India

22 November 2024, Hindustan Times, Sriparna Pathak

As the dust begins settling on the United States (US) elections and Donald Trump is now President elect, the world considers the foreign policy challenges and opportunities that arrive with his leadership. For the second largest economy, China, a big source of concern is tariffs against Chinese products. During the campaign trail, Trump had stated that he would impose at least 60% tariffs on Chinese imports and 20% tariffs on imports from all other countries. In 2018 and 2019, the Trump administration had imposed tariffs on approximately $380 billion worth of Chinese goods, resulting in a tax increase of nearly $80 billion. The tariffs were implemented under Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, which allows the President to impose tariffs in response to unfair trade practices.

Even though China is a major economic partner of the US, it engages in unfair trade practices, which include trade in illicit goods, currency manipulation, theft of sensitive technologies among a long list of others. While the trade war between the US and China is attributed to Donald Trump, fact remains that outgoing President Joe Biden had also taken several measures to protect the American economy from China's unfair trade practices. In May this year, Biden directed his trade representative to increase tariffs under Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 on $18 billion of imports from China to protect American workers and businesses. Biden slapped major new tariffs on Chinese electric vehicles (EVs), advanced batteries, solar cells, steel, aluminum and medical equipment. He had stated that Chinese government subsidies ensure that the country's companies do not have to turn a profit, giving them an unfair advantage in global trade; 100% tariffs were slapped on Chinese EVs.

The Biden administration continued from the previous Trump administration and the Trump administration this time will take off from where the Biden administration leaves. Fears of further escalation of trade wars are rife in most countries of the world. With regards to India, while there will be an increase in tariffs against Indian goods, they will not be as steep as those against China's. In this context it becomes pertinent to find out the extent to which India will be able to leverage opportunities out of economic calamities. While the Biden administration slapped tariffs on Chinese products, several agreements to bolster trade and economic ties were signed, ranging from semiconductor fabrication to clean energy transition to defence industrial cooperation, including collaborations on jet engines, munitions, and ground mobility systems, to the "Innovation Handshake" agenda, which promotes cooperation between startups, private equity and venture capital firms, corporate investment departments, and government officials; to the minerals security partnership to diversify the supply chain for critical minerals; to the green transition fund to hydrogen safety. The two also have a renewable energy technology action platform to enhance collaboration on clean energy manufacturing and global supply chains to the international energy programme.

Even under the Biden administration, the US was cautious towards China and embracing with regards to India. In all probability the trend will continue under the Trump administration. In the 20 years, supply chains across Asia became deeply integrated, and as an example, if a product is manufactured in Taiwan, it would be shipped in China and some component could be made in Thailand or Vietnam. If tariffs are slapped on China, a disruption in trade flows is seen, followed by a reduction in growth. However, India is not so integrated with the Chinese production supply chain. Thus, out of all the major economies in Asia, India would be the least impacted by tariffs against China.

Given constant supply chain disruptions, the China Plus One strategy has emerged in which companies and countries are increasingly pulling out of the Chinese economy to invest elsewhere. In the context of China Plus One, the most commonly mentioned examples are those of India and Vietnam. China is facing the biggest downtrend in its property market. About 737 million square kilometres of real estate is available, and to counter that the Chinese government announced a stimulus over three years, the contours of which are not yet clear. If one invests in China, one will have to bet on specific companies and take tactical bets on those individual names and companies for those with higher risk appetite. As compared to that, under the current Modi administration in India, infrastructure is being built on massive scales and for investing companies, the earnings will be structurally higher and there will be less problems with valuations. Further tariffs on the Chinese economy brings in gloom for the world. However, for India, if strategically manoeuvred then the losses will be low and manageable.

Biography of a Thought'

22 November 2024, Tricycle, Haley Barker

The contemporary Tibetan painter Tenzing Rigdol on Buddhism versus secularism and his new installation at the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Born in Kathmandu, Nepal, to Tibetan refugees, Tenzing Rigdol attended the University of Colorado Denver School of Arts & Media and was awarded a BFA in Painting and Drawing and a BA in Art History. Since graduating, Rigdol has built a career as a contemporary visual artist working across a range of mediums, including sculpture, painting, collage, performance art, and more. His pieces, infused with sociopolitical undercurrents, often address the pressing issues of today through Himalayan Buddhist imagery. Said pieces have been exhibited internationally at the Rubin Museum of Himalayan Art, Asia Society, Tibet House Gallery, Rossi & Rossi Gallery, Nobel Museum, and Glenbarra Art Museum, to name a few. Biography of a Thought, Rigdol's most recent installation, is the centerpiece of the Metropolitan Museum of Art's current exhibit "Mandalas: Mapping the Buddhist Art of Tibet," on view through January 12. Detail shot of Biography of a Thought by Tenzing Rigdol.

Situated in the Robert Lehman Wing, "Mandalas" allows visitors to explore Tibetan devotional art from the 12th to 15th centuries through a series of corridors lined with paintings, sculptures, textiles, instruments, and an array of ritual objects. These early masterworks are juxtaposed with Rigdol's expansive modern installation in the collection's sunlit central gallery. Over five years in the making, Biography of a Thought features four thirty-foot-long paintings, a pillar with braille and American Sign Language, as well as handwoven carpets.

Tricycle's Haley Barker recently talked with Rigdol about his oceanic inspirations, the demands of scale, and the universality of different spiritual traditions. For more on "Mandalas: Mapping the Buddhist Art of Tibet," read Dominique Townsend's recent exhibition review, "Mandalas at the Met."

This interview has been edited for length and clarity. Biography of A Thought is huge, and filled with Buddhist iconography and sociopolitical imagery. How did you approach this commission conceptually? Basically, Kurt [Behrendt] showed me the space [the Robert Lehman Wing]. He wanted to do a big "Mandala" show. This was before the pandemic. When I saw the space, I thought, "Yeah, I have some ideas." So [the whole process] started over five years ago; it took me about two and a half years to do the study of the composition, then about three years to paint it and to produce the carpet.

At that time, I lived in Astoria, so there's the Atlantic Ocean. For months, I would always go there and look at the ocean. I would look at small parts of the ocean, and then try to study how it breathes. Then the main composition was going to be waves and the clouds. Clouds are like the thoughts, and waves are like the emotions. You weave the two stories and ideas together, and that was the idea.

OK, so you took inspiration from the ocean. I see it, because your piece is very blue, and the clouds are rich and colorful. Like the thoughts! You know, our thoughts are sometimes vibrant, sometimes dull—sometimes thoughts are all gathering [together], almost like [they are] talking to each other. I thought it would be interesting to represent thoughts as clouds, and there are many Buddhist references there too. I played with that iconography.

Are there specific details of the composition that stick out to you, or that are your favorites? Not really, because interestingly, there are three ways to install it. One way to install it is to put all the paintings together into one painting, and it's 120 feet long. Another way of composing it is having a central piece, and all the surrounding pieces become a circle. And then the third way of presenting it is where it's opened up on four walls, like you're entering my mind—basically like the Buddhist idea of tantra. In Buddhism, too, you have three ways of experiencing the teachings: through Theravada, Mahayana, or Vajrayana. I play with that. And since it's one complete composition, the idea is to really pay attention to every corner of each percentage of the painting. So there's no picking [a favorite]. If something works, it's because other things are supporting it. We look at the totality of it.

I see! Going off that, can you speak a bit about how the size of this work changed or challenged your creation process? In a way, it did. Initially, we were thinking of starting with one painting, then two paintings, maybe four paintings. Then the size really was dictated by how strong the light was coming into the space. The walls are very intimidating, in a way. They are very big walls. If I had small pieces, like four small paintings, it wouldn't work. So it grew in that way. Within a few months, we realized it had to be big in order to fit the space. Many things were dictated by the space. And the idea needed a fixed space so that I could explore it properly, with what you call "complete satisfaction."

I read in your interview with Behrendt that you had to get a whole new studio space to work on this, because it had to be big enough to accommodate the size of everything. I wanted to have a studio that had almost the same light. That's sunlight, so I built a studio in Nepal on the fifth floor, and I had all the surrounding walls be only windows. I had all the sunlight coming in. In that way, I built a whole studio that fits the thirty-foot paintings.

And you were working in that studio, specifically, for three years? Yeah, three years—my retreat. I call it an art retreat. I think tantra is all about one's ability to pay attention, and what attention means, and how one can harness it. That kind of subject matter would naturally demand a quiet place to explore and execute. It's almost like you're painting while there's an egg on your head. You really slowly calm yourself.

What did you learn about yourself through making this piece? I learned how to slow down. That was very difficult. And to release effort. But I think it's not that you're learning but you're actually discovering. Maybe you're learning how to be calm, but that leads you to discover things about yourself that are already there. I think what I learned or discovered is that it's amazing to just paint and spend time on something that big.

There are so many details to the composition, so many little Easter eggs in every single corner. Can you take us through some of it? You can enter the room from any space. After a while, you start seeing simple repetition. Then you notice somewhere that the waves are fluctuating, the clouds are more vibrant. Slowly the clouds and waves settle. So the initial experience is immersive. It's something that somebody who doesn't really know anything about Buddhism can experience—energy.

The first panel talks about natural phenomena. It talks about the environment on a surface level; air pollution, water pollution, deforestation. But at the same time, at a deeper level, it talks about our awareness, being thrown into this world, being here. And all the symbols are very hidden, like how tantric texts are. The second panel talks about what happens when the mind gets wild. Suffering—not who created it or how it is in this country or anything like that—but just suffering and how people respond to it. In one of the paintings [on this panel], I used this old picture of His Holiness the Fourteenth Dalai Lama. He was giving an exam and debating right in front of Potala. I removed the monk he was debating, and I put a Chinese hat there. It is talking about how many people are so violent right now, but there are also some people who believe in dialogue and nonviolence as a solution. So this second panel really is about vrutti. We call it modulation. Vibration.

All my artworks are like a stage for the mind to dance.

And on the third panel, you start seeing how to stabilize the mind, how to look at identity. I used Picasso's five women [Les Femmes d'Alger (O. J. R. M.)]. People say, "Oh, they're from the brothel," and this and that. So I re-created it and added the five primordial Buddha's colors. And I added the five mental faculties that he was offering. When you properly tune the five mental faculties, you see they're all buddhas. In a way, I'm saying your soul doesn't have a gender; [the same is true of] your atman or rigpa or whatever you call it. You're much more than your thoughts and body. That was one of the tantric teachings. And then the fourth panel is calmness.

My friend is an Indian scholar. He wanted to know about the painting. In a very simple way, I explained it like this: In the Patanjali Yoga Sutra, the second yoga, Chitta, is the first panel. Vritti is the second, nirodha is the third, and the fourth is the yoga. [laughs] You can look at it in so many ways, but I'm just giving you the general melody. If you go into detail, it's crazy. I remember once I went with Kurt and Mike [Hearn], I think we talked about it for three and a half hours.

How do you see people engaging with the piece? I think most of the people that come have no memory of Buddha, so it's very interesting. They respond to just the melody of it. It's almost like you go to a country where you don't speak any language and you don't know the content of it, but you know the melody. And sometimes, many people come, especially elders and kids, and they don't ask much. They just walk around, and they hug, and some elders cry and they just say, 'thank you.' I don't know what they understood. I don't know what I told them. Sometimes I say all my artworks are like a stage for the mind to dance. I create a stage, and I create that stage as smooth and as effortlessly as possible. And hopefully each individual brings their own mind, and then they dance around, and then they explore the plot. And in the end, what they're exploring is themselves. So whatever one sees, it is seen through their own history, experiences, and interests.

I've read that you consider much of your work to be secular, even though a lot of your work uses some pretty overt Buddhist motifs. So how does Buddhism inform your work, or the creation of it, and how do you square that with your intention to be more inclusive? I have always visited places or institutions to really learn something. You don't go there to feel like you belong. Let's say you're a thangka painter, and if you think about yourself as a thangka painter, then you'll start seeing everything like a thangka. That's not freedom, because you're looking at it from a specific angle. Sometimes, even being a Buddhist, I also might not have the most perfect vantage point, because you can think, 'I am a Buddhist, they are non-Buddhist.' You can go even more fundamental. To whom did Buddha prostrate? I think his teaching was for us to become like him. And he bowed down to basic principles. In that way, Buddhism helped me look at all the other religions together.

I see. Buddhism is the vessel that allows you to see things differently and make different connections. Yes. You know, it's like if the 7 train goes out to Jackson Heights, Queens, it also goes back to Manhattan too. So it's not 'Buddhism is very special.' It's just that all religions are like different subway stations. When you combine all the stations, it's like one circle—like prayer beads!

I was brought up with Tibetan culture, and I naturally have more information about it. But, of course, I see suffering in Kashmir. I see suffering in Hong Kong. I see suffering in different places, and I see Mount Tibet in those places. I'm talking about a kind of universality. It's happening everywhere. Tibet is everywhere. The injustice, suffering, discomfort, disease is everywhere. And every country has its own homework to do. I think it's time to look within oneself, one's own country.

Has Trump-fear driven China to be conciliatory towards India?

22 November 2024, Tibetan Review

As China-hawk Donald Trump ascends the US presidency, come Jan 20, good relationship with India is becoming particularly important for Beijing. As geographical neighbours and the two most populous countries in the world, China and India not only face similar challenges, but also share extensive common interests, said the official globaltimes.cn Nov 21 in an editorial.

This may explain why from being reportedly stubbornly unyielding on withdrawing its troops from Depsang and Demchok incursions in eastern Ladakh over numerous rounds of border talks at various levels, despite a series of strong moves from India that adversely affected its interests in the country, China agreed to a seemingly sudden border patrolling agreement on these areas on Oct 21, to be preceded by disengagement and followed by de-escalation and restoration of trust leading to normalization of bilateral ties.

For China-India relations to become more stable, it is essential for both governments to maintain dialogue, strengthen economic ties, and promote cultural and personnel exchanges, the editorial said.

Still, the editorial maintained that the strength of the momentum for improvement in bilateral relations in the future will largely depend on the sincerity of the Indian side. It expressed hope that India can allow consensus, rather than differences, to shape China-India relations. This obviously referred to New Delhi's conditioning of restoration of normal bilateral ties to China's withdrawal, first of all, from the Depsang and Demchok incursions.

China's response to Trump's "America first" approach that envisages huge tariffs on imports from it will demand not only a strong domestic market but also engagement with all possible international stakeholders, the scmp.com Nov 22 cited Zhu Xian, a former World Bank vice-president and a former deputy head of the Shanghai-headquartered New Development Bank (NDB), as saying. This obviously also means healing its seriously frayed ties with India, the world's fifth largest economy with a consumer base of over 1.4 billion.

Zhu has also maintained, however, that the looming threats posed by Trump's tariff and climate policies could also open a window of opportunity for Beijing to elevate its global profile and move the needle on issues such as increasing the international role of China's currency, the yuan.

Still, that "depends on whether Beijing can bring forward an agenda ... that can be supported by other developing countries, new emerging economies or even some developed nations," the development finance veteran has said in an interview with the Post. The report noted that on the campaign trail, Trump had raised eyebrows around the world with his threats to impose tariffs of 60 to 100% on imports from China and of 10 to 20% on products from other countries. While it is argued that US consumers will end up paying for those high tariffs, their effect on Chinese exports due to reduced demands also cannot be underestimated.

Nepal PM K P Oli's Beijing visit may not win him points at home

22 November 2024, The Indian Express, Yubaraj Ghimire

Oli was a hero back home when he signed the Trade and Treaty agreement with Beijing during the 2015 economic blockade. But this time, India's "sin" was insignificant. It simply chose not to welcome him in Delhi and for that he enjoys no sympathy in the country.

There are several hopes and fears about the likely outcomes of Nepal PM K P Oli's five-day visit to China beginning December 2. This will be the fourth time that Oli, as PM, has made the first bilateral visit after assuming office to Beijing rather than Delhi, in contrast to the generally followed practice of going to Delhi first. The latter was seen as an endorsement of the view that the relationship with India is more "special".

Oli's and Narendra Modi's governments have clashed twice in the past nine years — first over Nepal's constitution and then on territory. At this point, Delhi still seems keen to work closely with the Nepali actors — it's just not that comfortable with Oli. The fact that India chose not to invite Oli but entertain Foreign Affairs Minister Arzu Rana Deuba — who belongs to the Nepali Congress — during her visit to Delhi in August at the highest level has made the current PM and the Communist Party suspicious of Delhi's intent.

Oli's first tenure which began in October 2015 witnessed an unofficial economic blockade on Nepal for over four months. Then came the bitter territorial disputes over the as-yet unresolved areas in Lipulek, Limpiyadhura and Kalapani. Delhi's reluctance to invite him this time is perceived as a hangover of this past bitterness and a sign that it has not forgiven Oli for signing the trade and transit framework agreements with China, ending Nepal's exclusive dependence on the south for maritime access.

The larger question is: Has there been an erosion of the "special relationship" between India and Nepal? The unique open border is now seen as a law and order threat, with terrorist actors also being reported to exploit it at times. Traditionally, Nepal has been a Hindu-majority society with deep ties to the Puri Shankaracharya Mutt. In reciprocity, Nepal's kings – until the abolition of the monarchy 16 years ago – were given the special privilege of having access to India's important Hindu shrines including Rameshwaram, Badrinath, Kedarnath, Ayodhya and Jagannath Puri. Nepal's royal palace used to send the first ingredients for preparing "khichri" as the mahaprasad for the annual Gorakhanath mela that takes place in Gorakhpur each year in the month of Magh (mid-January to mid-Feb). Nepal's transition to a secular republic brought an end to these practices, which also served as leverage and openings during diplomatic crises.

Nepal has suffered political instability, with 36 Prime Ministers in the past 35 years. Three leaders – Oli of the Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist Leninist), Sher Bahadur Deuba (Nepali Congress) and Pushpa Kamal Dahal 'Prachanda' (Maoist Centre) – have alternated in the post in the last nine years since the constitution's promulgation. Instability and frequently changing political equations, solely driven by power, have also resulted in policy inconsistencies, and loss of confidence from both domestic and multinational investors.

Oli and the current establishment are facing public wrath, especially on corruption issues.

This background, and India not sending him the invitation first, makes his China visit more interesting. Both the US and India have warned Nepal not to go for BRI projects to avoid a debt trap. Nepali Congress, the dominant partner in the coalition, seems to have taken this prescription as a mantra and has warned Oli not to sign the BRI execution framework treaty during his visit except under the condition that all these projects will be fully grant-based.

Oli's failure to sign such an agreement with China, something he seems to have already assured, will lead to a loss of credibility. On the other hand, bypassing the Nepali Congress's suggestion and upsetting two external stakeholders may cost him his chair back home.

China may not be willing to make an exception for Nepal under the BRI, but there are indications that it may defer by a few years the date (2026) for Nepal to pay instalments on a $220 million dollar loan to build the Pokhara international Airport – which is lying idle ever since it was inaugurated two years ago. China has time and again turned down Nepal's plea to convert this loan into a grant but it has indicated flexibility on readjusting terms and dates.

Oli is known for taking risks – some even politically suicidal at times. His visit to Beijing may just backfire. He was a hero back home when he had signed the Trade and Treaty agreement with Beijing during the 2015 economic blockade. But this time, India's "sin" was insignificant. It simply chose not to welcome him in Delhi and for that he enjoys no sympathy in the country.

'Trashing' Scientific Warnings, China Is Constructing Three Upstream Dams In Tibet; A Disaster In The Making?

22 November 2024, Eurasian Times, Shubhangi Palve

China is proceeding with the construction of massive hydropower dams on the upper reaches of the Machu (Yellow River) in Tibet despite mounting scientific concerns about potential geological disasters and severe environmental consequences.

A recent report by Turquoise Roof, a collaborative research network focused on Tibet, has raised alarms over these large-scale infrastructure projects.

For the first time, China is building hydropower dams upstream in Tibet, targeting the sources of Asia's major rivers. The report highlights the construction of at least three significant dams on the upper Machu River.

The Machu River, known as the Huang He in Chinese, is also known as the “Sorrow of China” because of the devastating floods it has caused.

This region, already seismically unstable and heavily impacted by climate change, poses substantial risks, yet China continues its dam-building efforts in this delicate environment.

The Yellow River’s Significance

The Yellow River, or Machu River in Tibet, is a vital waterway that spans northern China. Known as the “Mother River” in China, it is the second-longest river in China and the sixth-longest river system globally.

The Yellow River, often referred to as the “world’s muddiest river,” is notorious for its high sediment content. This heavy sediment buildup has earned it another nickname, the “hanging river,” as the accumulated silt raises riverbed sections above the surrounding landscape. Over time, this accumulation has caused the river to change its course, resulting in frequent and devastating floods.

Over a third of the river’s course lies in Tibet, where it flows nearly 2,000 kilometers across the Amdo region in northern Tibet. Originating on ‘the Bayan Har Mountains’ – the Tibet-Qinghai Plateau (15,000 feet), the Yellow River runs eastward through seven Chinese provinces: Qinghai, Gansu, Ningxia, Inner Mongolia, Shaanxi, Shanxi, Henan, and Shandong, before emptying into the Bo Hai Gulf in the Yellow Sea.

The Yellow River comprises three distinct sections: the upper course through mountainous terrain, the middle course across a plateau, and the lower course flowing through a low plain.

The combination of its massive sediment load and unpredictable course makes the Yellow River both a crucial waterway and an environmental hazard.

Why Are Hydropower Dams In The Upstream Of Rivers Dangerous?

Climate Change: Chinese scientists warn that the combined effects of intense human activity and adverse climate change have led to significant ecological and environmental problems in the upper reaches of the Yellow River. These issues have jeopardized the region’s ecological security and power supply.

Building a series of dams, or a cascade, requires raising captive water levels high enough to reach the bottom of the next dam upriver. This transforms a once fast-moving mountain river into a series of man-made lakes, each tightly positioned against its upstream neighbor.

To achieve this, dams must be among the world’s tallest, standing 300 to 400 meters high. If one dam fails, a catastrophic chain reaction could potentially trigger the collapse of successive dams, much like a tsunami of water.

Danger To The Permafrost Zone: Building dams at high altitudes in Tibet presents another risk: thawing permafrost. Tibet’s permafrost zone is the largest outside the Arctic, and construction on this unstable ground presents a significant challenge. As the permafrost thaws each summer and freezes again in winter, the shifting subsoil may threaten the dam’s stability.

Additionally, as permafrost melts across 1.6 million square kilometers of the Tibetan plateau, methane—much more potent than carbon dioxide as a greenhouse gas—is released into the atmosphere. China has no clear policies or measures in place to address these methane emissions, exacerbating climate change.

Coal-Fired Power Plants: While China positions itself as a leader in clean energy, it is still the world’s largest emitter of greenhouse gases. In the first half of 2024, China led the globe in constructing new coal-fired power plants.

Despite the presence of renewable energy sources, the report shows that coal-fired power plants dominate the region’s power grid, highlighting China’s continued reliance on fossil fuels. This reliance contradicts its claims of aggressive decarbonization.

While hydropower is considered renewable, large-scale hydropower projects have significant environmental and social consequences, including disruption of ecosystems and displacement of communities. China’s strategy of combining hydropower with coal power may be a way to present a cleaner energy profile without addressing the deeper ecological impacts.

Devastation Of Local Communities: The impact on local Tibetan communities has been severe. According to the report, The Yangkhil (Yangqu) hydropower station, the first major dam built upriver on the Machu, has destroyed an entire Tibetan community. Eyewitness accounts detail the forced dismantling of homes and the destruction of a monastery, which was removed from the protected heritage list before demolition.

While Chinese engineers boast about using AI-driven robots in construction, these technological advancements come at a high human cost.

The report also highlights that in February, Tibetans risked their lives to protest the Kamtok (Chinese: Gangtuo) dam being built on the upper Drichu (Yangtze) River. The dam directly threatens their homes and six historic monasteries, which house priceless 14th-century frescoes that Chinese scholars have long sought to preserve.

Tibet’s Rivers Under Siege

Before this, In January 2023, satellite images confirmed that China was constructing a new dam on the Mabja Zangbo River in Tibet, a tributary of the Indian Ganga River.

This river lies near the tri-junction of India, Nepal, and Tibet. Construction of the dam, which began in May 2021, is located approximately 16 km north of this tri-junction, opposite Uttarakhand's Kalapani territory.

This development has raised significant concerns for downriver nations, India and Nepal, especially as China has been increasing its military and dual-use infrastructure along both the eastern and western sectors of the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

As highlighted by the Turquoise Roof report, China's hydropower projects upstream of the Yellow River also have significant downstream impacts, affecting farmers and fisherfolk in countries like Cambodia, Vietnam, Thailand, Laos, and Myanmar.

The far-reaching consequences of these projects underscore the risks of unchecked infrastructure development in ecologically sensitive regions.

This aggressive dam construction in Tibet's fragile ecosystem represents a significant shift in China's infrastructure development strategy, raising serious concerns about long-term environmental sustainability and regional stability.

Words Used for Cultural Genocide: How "Northern Frontier" Is Replacing "Inner Mongolia"

21 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Zeng Liqin

They are starting with adjectives. "Mongolian culture" becomes mandatorily "Northern Frontier culture."

The Uyghurs told us so. Many Southern Mongolians perhaps did not understand why Uyghurs insist that the word "Xinjiang" should not be used and should be replaced by "East Turkestan." "Xinjiang" means "New Frontier," a term denying Uyghur history and identity. It looks like the only defining feature of the Uyghur land was to serve as the new frontier of China, once it was occupied by the Chinese.

Now the Mongolian inhabitants of what is officially called the "autonomous region of Inner Mongolia"—they prefer to use "Southern Mongolia"—are being treated with the same medicine. If East Turkestan is the "New Frontier" (Xinjiang) Southern Mongolia is now being called "Northern Frontier" (Beijiāng, 北疆).

The strategy used is to attack the substantive through the adjective. So far, the name of the pseudo-autonomous region is still "Inner Mongolia." However, the adjective "Inner Mongolian" is increasingly replaced by "of the Northern Frontier." And this is virtually mandatory when the noun for which the adjective is used is "culture," in this context the most important noun of them all.

The Chinese Communist Party since 2023 regards as official the use of "Beijiāng wenhua" (北疆文化), "Northern Frontier Culture," instead of "Inner Mongolian Culture," or even "Mongolian Culture," referred to what after all is one of China's officially recognized ethnic minorities.

The CCP regional propaganda office has established an academic journal dedicated to "Northern Frontier Culture," and Inner Mongolia's main state-run academic institute has opened a "Northern Frontier Research Centre."

An image of the Sixth Plenary Session of the 11th Committee of the Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region CCP (2023). Screenshot.

The campaign, now in full swing, was inaugurated last year at the Sixth Plenary Session of the 11th Committee of the Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region CCP, held in Hohhot from July 3 to 5, 2023. The CCP wanted to "launch the brand 'Northern Frontier Culture,'" with the purpose of emphasizing that the culture of the autonomous region is "Chinese" rather than "Mongolian." It is argued that it is the product of the fusion of the different ethnic cultures of the region under the unifying principle of "being grateful to the Party, listening to the Party, and following the Party."

Following campaigns to replace Mongolian language with Chinese in the region's education and administration, the semantic shift is clearly part of a project aimed at "Sinicizing" Mongolians and eliminating their distinctive cultural, religious, and ethnic heritage.

Why Is China's Atheist Regime Trying To Pick The Next Dalai Lama?

19 November 2024, Tippi Insights, Bryan Burack and Jack Erickson

The Chinese Communist Party is preparing to hijack an ancient faith. Freedom-loving people can't let it succeed.

In early September, dozens of high-ranking Tibetan Buddhist monks and religious scholars gathered in the Chinese city of Lanzhou to discuss reincarnation, a major tenet of their faith. Observers would be understandably perplexed by how the participants “emphasized the importance” of the approval of China’s communist regime “in the recognition of reincarnated Tibetan religious leaders.”

The mystery has a simple, sinister answer: The meeting was organized by the Chinese Communist Party itself, through the Buddhist Association of China, a part of its United Front Work Department, which controls all religious expression in China.

Shamefully, the atheist CCP is attempting to reach into the afterlife to seize control of religious leaders that have escaped its grasp on earth.

The CCP’s paranoia and brutality falls heavily on people of faith in China, and Tibetan Buddhists are among the most abused. The CCP’s efforts to wipe out Tibetans’ identity and establish complete control over their lives are thought to constitute crimes against humanity, and Tibet was a proving ground for techniques of repression used in the CCP’s genocide against the Uyghurs.

The CCP is intensely hostile toward the 14th Dalai Lama, Tibetan Buddhism’s highest spiritual leader, who escaped to India following the CCP’s annexation of Tibet in the 1950s. Since then, the Dalai Lama has been an active proponent of greater autonomy for Tibetans, founding the Central Tibetan Administration, Tibet’s government-in-exile based in northern India.

For the CCP, Tibetans’ veneration of the Dalai Lama constitutes a threat to its control over Tibet, which has seen periods of unrest incited by CCP repression. The future of the dalai lama as an institution is therefore linked to the future of Tibet itself.

Next year, the Dalai Lama turns 90 and is expected to announce plans for his reincarnation and succession. He has remarked that he may reincarnate outside of China, leaving the next dalai lama outside Chinese government control. He has also considered the possibility of choosing a successor while still alive. That would represent a break with the more common Buddhist tradition, whereby after the death of the dalai lama, a council of senior religious figures identifies a young boy as his successor and reincarnation.

The Dalai Lama has also suggested he may reincarnate as a woman, or even forgo reincarnation altogether.

For the CCP, the Dalai Lama’s succession is an opportunity to seize even tighter control of the Tibetan Buddhist faith and ensure its practitioners no longer have a spiritual leader to look to beyond China’s borders and outside the CCP’s reach. The CCP has been preparing to hijack the Dalai Lama’s succession for decades.

In 1995, the Dalai Lama identified a young boy in Tibet as the 11th Panchen Lama, the second-ranking religious figure in Tibetan Buddhism. Almost immediately thereafter, the CCP forcibly disappeared the then-6-year-old child, who has not been seen since. The CCP then appointed its own Panchen Lama.

In 2007, the Chinese government released regulations stipulating that “[n]o group or individual may without authorization carry out any activities related to searching for or recognizing reincarnating living Buddha soul children.” In recent years, China has emphasized that the reincarnation of the dalai lama “must comply with Chinese laws and regulations.”

The United States recently enacted the Resolve Tibet Act, bipartisan legislation disputing the PRC’s misleading historical claims over Tibet and urging Beijing to agree to talks with the Dalai Lama’s representatives. In June, a bipartisan congressional delegation met with the Dalai Lama in northern India, warning that China is “trying to erase [Tibetans’] culture ... . They are trying something that we cannot let them get away with.”

India also has a stake in preventing CCP subversion of the Dalai Lama’s succession. Aside from hosting Tibet’s government-in-exile, India’s Tawang district sits within what was once part of the historical Tibetan nation and was the birthplace of the sixth Dalai Lama. It’s also the site of one of the largest Buddhist monasteries in the world. Beijing has opposed the Dalai Lama’s visits to Tawang, as China claims the district as part of a broader “South Tibet.”

Although India’s deliberations surrounding the Dalai Lama’s succession have largely remained muted, a former Indian ambassador to China stated that India wouldn’t be “comfortable with China trying to control that process.”

With the Dalai Lama’s 90th birthday next July, discussion over his succession will come to a head soon. The CCP has been preparing for decades to turn the next dalai lama into a tool to advance Beijing’s interests. The U.S. government is well aware of this plan. In its statement marking the Dalai Lama’s 89th birthday, the State Department reiterated its support for Tibetans’ “ability to freely choose and venerate religious leaders without interference.”

But more than platitudes will be required, and the U.S. should be engaging now with representatives from the Dalai Lama’s office, the Tibetan government in exile, and the Indian government to better prepare for the succession.

The Chinese Communist Party cannot be allowed to quash the religious freedom of the Tibetan people and Buddhists worldwide.

18 November 2024, The Asian Age, Debotri Dhar

The 16th Brics summit, held in Kazan, Russia, on October 22-24, is the talk of the town. Brics (Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa) is an inter-governmental body for the promotion of multilateralism, peace, security and economic development. Its first summit in 2009 included founding members Brazil, Russia, India and China, with South Africa joining a year later. Brics expanded this year to include four new members, and 30 more nations have applied for membership. Talks were held this year for an alternative financial model to challenge the West-led Bretton Woods global monetary system, comprising the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, as well as a push for a united front to advocate for United Nations Security Council reforms.

So, is Brics poised to become the cool new Global South club – or is it a harbinger of a stridently anti-Western world order? For Russian President Vladimir Putin, the Brics summit was an obvious opportunity to push back against Western sanctions over Russia's invasion of Ukraine, including Washington's efforts to choke off financial supplies to Moscow, and to lobby for support from the Global South. Pertinently, the "Global South" is not just a geographical but a geopolitical and socio-economic grouping. Many Global South nations are in the Southern Hemisphere, in Asia, Africa and Latin America, often sharing colonised histories that led to economic exploitation for centuries. That many of these emerging economies did not blacklist Russia has been misinterpreted by some Western analysts as the Global South's backing for Moscow's Ukraine policy. Instead, it more accurately reflects a growing disenchantment with the West, a tacit critique of what many erstwhile colonised nations see as Western double standards on wars and imperialism, and the selective (mis)use of human rights for other agendas, therefore pursuing their own politico-economic interests as non-aligned nations.

Or multi-aligned, when it comes to India's international relations. Fellow Indians of varying political beliefs hold diverse opinions on Nato, but I have not met anyone who approves of Russia's invasion. Rather, there is a sense of a historical friendship with Russia among many, that Moscow has not harmed India's interests, and a refusal to bear the costs of a war created by others. From a geo-strategic viewpoint, given the strengthening Russia-

China partnership, a continued relationship with Moscow is useful for India to counter-balance Chinese expansionism in the Indo-Pacific. Following the recent breakthrough border agreement between India and China ahead of the Brics summit, there is speculation in some quarters that Moscow may have lent a helping hand to defuse hostilities between the two Asian giants. Under this Sino-Indian agreement, outstanding issues simmering since the 2020 Galwan Valley clashes are being resolved, with both sides agreeing to a patrolling arrangement allowing for the return of Indian troops to what became friction points on the Line of Actual Control (LAC). In what is a major diplomatic win for India, tensions in Demchok and Depsang in eastern Ladakh have been addressed with military de-escalation in these areas. With this well-timed beginning to the summit, followed by a meeting of prominent leaders from the Global South, the worldwide interest generated by Brics is unsurprising. Some critiques have also been directed at how Brics is a very loose formation of nations with vastly diverging interests. While Beijing and Moscow see Brics as a platform to challenge the Western-led world order in general, and the dominance of the American dollar in particular, this is not the case with India, which is not anti-West and sees Brics as an alternative outfit to better support and negotiate for the concerns of the Global South, as compared to elite clubs such as the G-7 which were not designed to advocate for emerging economy perspectives.

While Brics membership is less homogenous than the G-7, whose members all meet common developmental criteria, even the G-7 is not unmarked by internal disagreements. Examples are some of France's foreign policy positions independent of the United States, as on the Israel-Palestine war, or Italy's policy disagreements with France, as on not sending domestic troops to fight in the Russia-Ukraine war. Yet the G-7 has, despite such internal dissent, been able to focus on a larger vision, consolidating the group's economic and geopolitical power over time. This is the bigger challenge ahead for Brics. That there is a tremendous need to advocate for emerging economy perspectives so that powerful blocs do not unilaterally dictate terms to the Global South is apparent from the sheer number of countries applying for Brics membership. Now the group will need a clearer vision. Will there be any economic requirements (such as GDP levels) for entry into Brics? Will smaller member-nations that are attacked be diplomatically supported in peace efforts and provided humanitarian aid? Countries in the Global South have historically been criticised for having weak democratic institutions, but the truth is that democracy in the West also needs strengthening. Brics as a non-Western body can shape a more representative global order, with the caveat that a just, democratic world is challenging to build with authoritarian states or those which promote terrorism. Peace and security are objectives of Brics, yet some members have long been under strife, with vulnerable populations being greatly impacted. My public commentaries and lectures have, for years, analysed gender violence in war, such as the decades-long US-Russia war over Afghanistan, with the Soviet invasion of 1979 followed by American Cold War era foreign policies on arming religious extremists, resulting in the rise of the Taliban, with disastrous consequences for socio-economic development and women's rights in Afghanistan. Another example is how the real threat of wartime rape in some Global South nations like Syria results in families marrying off girls aged ten or twelve, compounding high regional maternal and infant mortality rates. As Brics is being celebrated by the developing world, the Women, Peace and Security Agenda to mainstream gender into peace and security multilateral architecture has also recently celebrated its 24th anniversary. The point is that the economic and social indicators of development often work better together. India-US collaboration to counter Chinese military aggression in the Indo-Pacific will continue under Donald Trump, whose recent victory in the US presidential election will have other far-reaching policy consequences, including US involvement in the two global wars. A democratic India that can unite Brics to reflect non-Western development aspirations and draw upon strategic relationships with the Western and Russia-China blocs to provide diplomatic, humanitarian support to end wars justly will be very well-positioned to play a leading role for Brics, the Global South, and the world.

Nepal's New PM Oli Is Going To China, Why Is He Not Coming To India?

18 November 2024, StratNews Global, Surya Gangadharan

Is too much being made of the China visit of Nepal's Prime Minister K P Sharma Oli from Dec 2-6? This is important for every time Nepal gets a new prime minister, the first trip he makes is to Delhi.

But for some reason, Oli has not merited an invitation even though his Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba, was in Delhi in August and invited Prime Minister Modi to Kathmandu.

Was it a protocol lapse that Modi did not extend an invitation to Oli at that meeting? Or was it deliberate? Was Delhi conveying some subtle displeasure? It's hard to say and the MEA (Ministry of External Affairs) has maintained silence.

Veteran Nepali journalist Yubraj Ghimire told Stratnewsglobal over the phone from Kathmandu, that in his understanding, Modi and Oli had met for about half an hour at the UN General Assembly in New York.

"It was not a one-on-one meeting," Ghimire says, "and Modi had told Oli he planned to come to Kathmandu but there was nothing about inviting him to Delhi."

He says India is committed to the Nepali Congress (NC), which is in coalition with Oli's CPN (UML). By meeting Arzu Rana Deuba, wife of NC leader and former prime minister Sher Bahadur Deuba, India was underscoring its support for that party.

Ghimire believes India would prefer that the NC and Maoist leader Prachanda come together rather than the current arrangement.

Former Indian diplomats who have served in Nepal, were wary about commenting on the possible reasons for not inviting Oli. But one warned that if Oli chose to interpret this as a snub, "there would be no shortage of people and groups in Kathmandu who could turn the heat on the bilateral relationship."

India's familiarity born of culture and access, has traditionally made it an easy target. This was the case even during the days of the monarchy and those habits did not die with it. But there is a view in Kathmandu which is at variance with this argument.

Nepal's former ambassador to Denmark, Vijay Kant Karna, wondered why every newly anointed Nepali prime minister has to travel overseas, whether to Delhi, Beijing or elsewhere and even more so in the present case.

"Leaving aside Arzu Rana Deuba's visit in August, India's External Affairs Minister Jaishankar was in Kathmandu earlier this year in January and there were important outcomes including on the export of 10,000MW of electricity to India, cross-border power linkages and so on. When so much has already been decided upon, what is an Oli visit expected to deliver," he asked.

There is the border dispute over Kalapani, Lipulekh and Limpiyadhura which peaked in 2019, when Oli was prime minister, and has simmered since then. No resolution is in sight.

With regard to China, Karna also questioned the rationale for that visit.

"China has not been forthcoming on budgetary support for Nepal, amounting to around $200 million," he said, "and this despite regular reminders. Nor is there any movement on the BRI projects first announced in 2017 and reiterated during every VIP visit since then."

The latter is because the NC insists that the projects be funded through grants and concessional loans while China is only offering commercial loans. Result the BRI Implementation Plan has not moved forward. Is there a hidden Indian hand here, one can only speculate. A corner stone of India's policy in Nepal is not to have two communist or left-wing parties together in Kathmandu. That would add infinitely to China's leverage.

The current NC-CPN(UML) arrangement is better than the above option, but Oli may not enjoy high levels of trust in Delhi given how he brought the Kalapani border issue to the fore in the bilateral relationship.

His proximity to China is another irritant although he's been low profile on that relationship since taking over as prime minister. But with Beijing on his radar in December, that maybe about to change.

How attacks on Chinese working for CPEC projects dent China-Pakistan ties

17 November 2024, First Post, Tara Kartha

That the Chinese have felt the need to hire private security is perplexing when the Pakistan army has granted itself a huge rise in the budget ostensibly to take care of their security

There appears to be some rusting in a certain 'iron brother' relationship. A spat of no common order had erupted recently when the Chinese ambassador to Pakistan warned the authorities that their patience was at an end with regard to attacks on Chinese workers in the country.

The Foreign Office spokesperson, equally unusually, took umbrage instead of quietly accepting the (justified) criticism, all of which raised eyebrows across the circles that matter in both countries. Now it seems matters may have been smoothed out. Just a day ago, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Lin Jian, while reiterating the 'all-weather friendship' motif, also stated, "We (China) are firm in our commitment to protecting the safety and security of Chinese nationals.." rather mysteriously also stating, "Attempts to undermine the mutual trust and cooperation between the two countries will not succeed". There was also a distinct threat, that terrorists would 'pay the price'. The poor Baloch better look out.

The Chinese are unusually annoyed

All of this needs some explanation. There is no doubt at all that Beijing has every right to get completely annoyed. Ambassador Jiang Zaidong observes that "Top priority should be the security of Chinese personnel because they come to Pakistan to participate in the country's development," adding that the Chinese "don't deserve this kind of sacrifice...." There have been two serious attacks in a month's time, with not just the attack on the bus at the Jinnah airport just before the meeting of the SCO (Shanghai Cooperation Organisation) but also an unusual attack by a security guard in Karachi. That was apparently the result of an altercation between a group of Chinese nationals and the security.

Anyway, some 16 rounds were fired, which indicates quite a mess. The Prime Minister, Shehbaz Sharif, has assured the ambassador that he was 'personally' managing the situation. It may be noted that relations on the ground between the two sides have had problems, given the huge cultural differences. Pakistanis often complain of marked racism among the Chinese and a contempt for locals.

A letter from the Deputy Inspector General of Police (DIG), Syed Asad Raza, to the chairman of the All Pakistan Security Agencies Association (APSA) is revealing. It shows the Chinese have taken to hiring their own security people rather than relying on the Pakistanis. These are locals, and as the DIG says, their training is not of the highest order, and their knowledge of 'foreigners' is minimal. But that the Chinese even feel the need to hire private security is perplexing. In a largely unnoticed move, the Pakistan army has granted itself a huge rise in the budget ostensibly to take care of their security.

Spike in Attacks

There is no doubt that the numbers of attacks have risen recently. From about an attack a year earlier, 3 in 2021, and then a jump to 4 attacks in March 2024, is enough to cause serious concern. But here's the curious part. In early October this year, the Economic Coordination Committee of the Cabinet sanctioned Rs 35 of Rs 45 billion to the army in a supplementary grant. That's rather a lot. This is the second such grant, after another Rs 60 billion for Operation Azm-e-Istehkam, all of which is above the Rs 2.127 trillion defence budget. As yet unclear is another Rs 45 billion for 'approved projects' for the army. The body also approved Rs 16 billion for the Special Security Division South and another Rs 8 billion for a similar division in the south, both of which are responsible for protecting the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) in southern regions. All this means a near doubling of the defence budget, at a time when the International Monetary Fund is rapping Islamabad on the knuckles for a current account deficit and still reviewing its performance.

Pakistan Army gets a financial boost

There is one possible clue to both the sudden bounty in Pakistan army coffers and the relatively softer position of China towards Pakistani issues. Beijing has been insisting for some time that it bring its own security agencies into the country, including supporting intelligence. Towards this, it seems it has proposed a joint company for CPEC Phase 2 and a security agreement to firm this up.

Pakistan has so far resisted this, given that this would mean a definite erosion of its sovereignty. No country likes other people's intelligence roaming freely around the country. Now it is possible that this has been done, which may align with the sudden affluence apparent in the budget. True, the Pakistan army has multiple sources of income, some from its business empire inside the country and outside it.

Ayesha Jehangir estimates its empire at about $38 billion, not counting the extensive private empires of its senior officers, like former chief Gen. Bajwa, whose family became billionaires in just six years. Reports like this also link the military generals to CPEC ventures, which means they are committed to them lock, stock, and barrel. A little loss of sovereignty may not bother them. Or else they are so compromised they have little choice.

End result

Either way, Delhi needs to look out. First, there are going to be more Chinese security officials within Pakistan, who know well how to use the tech that they have given to the Pakistanis. That includes "Smart City" projects that include hundreds of cameras placed in major cities. Karachi has yet to take off, which is probably why the attacks are occurring there in the first place. Second, they would dig into the Pakistan army's own databases as well as the National Identity data. That is quite something. Second is a more serious issue.

The huge spike in the defence budget is clearly not just for the defence of Chinese nationals or for guarding the border. This needs more clarity, an impossible task given the opaque nature of Pakistan's finances. Meanwhile, the International Monetary Fund needs to ask some pointed questions. Beijing has every right to demand more security, but it doesn't really know the kind of army it is dealing with. Meanwhile, for those who think that the attacks have dented CPEC, think again. Coming on line are more projects like the Karachi Coastal Comprehensive Zone, a huge development comprising some 930 hectares, of which 630 are reclaimed. That's just next to our borders. This is a mega project that may, in the end, be larger than even Gwadar. Besides, no one less than President Xi Jinping broke protocol to congratulate Shahbaz Sharif in March when he became Prime Minister. Officials have since been trooping into the country, indicating that Beijing still has its hand on the tiller. The bilateral boat may be tilting a good deal, but the captain is still very much on the job.

Why India and China Are Finally Starting to Patch Things Up

17 November 2024, TIME, Michael Kugelman

In June 2020, a bloody border clash broke out between India and China in the Ladakh region—the deadliest since a 1962 war. Relations between the nuclear-armed neighbors plunged to their lowest level in decades. But, after four years of icy ties, the relationship is finally beginning to thaw.

India and China struck a border deal last month that calls for resuming patrols in Ladakh, and for disengaging troops that restore positions to pre-crisis locations. The accord likely paved the way for an Oct. 23 meeting between Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping—a first since the 2020 Ladakh clash—on the sidelines of a BRICS summit in Russia. They pledged to strengthen communication and cooperation.

These developments provide a chance to inch ties forward. New Delhi has long insisted the relationship can't improve until border tensions are eased; that precondition has now been met. The two sides can also leverage the thaw to tap more fully into existing areas of cooperation. Trade ties have remained robust despite deep tensions, and goodwill triggered by the border deal could unlock more Chinese investment in India. New Delhi and Beijing work together in many global forums, from BRICS to the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank. They share many common interests, from countering terrorism and promoting multilateralism to embracing non-Western economic models—and rejecting what they view as U.S. moral crusading around the world.

A lasting détente between the two Asian giants would have far-reaching consequences, including for Washington's strategic partnership with New Delhi—which is fueled by the shared goal of countering Chinese power. But it could also serve as a hedge against the unpredictability of President-elect Donald Trump, should he decide to jettison his hardline approach to Beijing and seek his own rapprochement with Xi—a leader Trump has often praised, including as recently as last month.

Yet the significance of the thaw shouldn't be overstated. That's because India-China relations are still deeply fraught, and will likely remain so for the foreseeable future.

The Ladakh deal, for instance, does little to resolve a broader India-China border dispute. The countries share a 2,100-mi. frontier, of which 50,000 square miles are disputed—an area equal to the size of Greece. Additionally, mistrust between border troops remains high; traumatic memories of the Ladakh clash—which entailed Indian soldiers getting beaten to death with iron rods, and getting flung to their deaths into icy rivers—still strikes a nerve.

Tensions are high elsewhere, too. The mammoth Chinese Belt and Road Initiative infrastructure project, which New Delhi categorically rejects because it winds through Indian-claimed territory, remains a flashpoint. India also worries about Beijing's naval power projection in the Indian Ocean, stretching eastward over a massive expanse from a Chinese naval base in Djibouti to what New Delhi believes are Chinese spy ships operating near the Andaman Sea, where India has island territories. Closer to home, New Delhi is concerned about the surveillance risks posed by Chinese technologies in India.

Furthermore, India and China have strong security ties with the other's main rival. Thanks to a series of foundational defense accords, the Indian and U.S. militaries are cooperating on unprecedented levels, and ramping up arms sales and technology transfers. India has now evolved into a net security provider for the U.S., providing Washington with military equipment and helping its allies counter Chinese provocations. The U.S. has even supplied intelligence to New Delhi at critical moments. For its part, Beijing continues to pursue its longstanding security alliance with Islamabad. It provides significant military aid to Pakistan, including equipment for ballistic missiles (which has produced a flurry of recent U.S. sanctions).

Meanwhile, India and China also have profound differences on core issues. Beijing rejects many Indian policies in Kashmir, the disputed region that's provoked multiple India-Pakistan wars. India is strengthening ties with Taiwan, which Beijing views as a renegade province of China. The Dalai Lama—the exiled leader of Tibet, who Beijing regards as a dangerous separatist—has long been based in India. India and China are also each part of rival global forums: India participates in the Indo-Pacific Quad, while China leads BRI.

Yet bilateral ties should continue to improve. Continued talks on the border—which have happened regularly since the Ladakh crisis—to discuss other flashpoints, and to reassert mutual commitments to longstanding protocols that forbid the discharge of firearms, could help avert future escalations. The next opportunity for high-level dialogue could come this month, if Modi and Xi attend the G20 leaders summit in Brazil.

The best hope for deeper ties lies with their robust economic partnership (China was India's top trade partner last year). India's chief economic advisor is making the case for more Chinese FDI that could accelerate Beijing's long-term plans to invest in top Indian industries. And China, with its recent economic setbacks, stands to benefit from increasing engagement with the world's fastest-growing major economy.

The incoming return of Trump could also spur more India-China business bonhomie, if their collective fear of U.S. tariffs prompts them to carve out more commercial space for themselves.

Ultimately, relations will sometimes be cooperative, particularly on the economy, but they'll remain competitive—and possibly at times even confrontational. Still, even a modest India-China thaw is a good thing. The world is on fire, and it can't afford yet another crisis—much less a conflict.

Why go to China?

17 November 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Prime Minister and CPN-UML Chair KP Sharma Oli is not someone who minces his words. So when Oli was asked at the recent Kantipur Conclave whether he was worried about visiting China before going to India, it was interesting to see him struggle for the right words. He eventually said something along the lines that it is hard to discern which of the two neighbours is more important and should be his first port of call. Just so that the Indians are not spooked, he added "our relations with India are deep, historical, based on culture and tradition, and predate the formation of modern states." Ever since he became prime minister around four months ago, PM Oli has been desperately trying to get an invite from New Delhi. This was why he had sat on an earlier offer to visit China. But when he saw that New Delhi was in no mood to invite him, Oli decided to visit Beijing first. Perhaps it was also a not-so-subtle signal to India that if it is not ready to engage with him, he will not be afraid to sidle closer to China.

Balancing India and China would have been tricky for Prime Minister Oli irrespective of the kind of coalition he led. But as the head of a government where he is the prime minister but not the leader of the biggest party presents him with unique challenges. During his 2016 China trip following the Indian blockade, both the electorate and most political parties were strongly in favour of greater engagement with the northern neighbour. But this time, even his main coalition partner does not want him to sign any consequential agreements with China. The Nepali Congress says Nepal should not accept any loan under the Belt and Road Initiative. Rather than sign new agreements, it is in favour of asking the Chinese to follow through on their previous pledges. In other words, short of getting the Chinese to waive off the loan for the Pokhara International Airport—which, though a very long shot, could be a huge coup for the prime minister—Oli will struggle to portray his China visit as a success. If there can be no domestic political mileage for Oli, why go to China and risk losing face at home, even some UML leaders are asking?

Whether a Nepali prime minister visits New Delhi or Beijing first, it should be up to Nepal to decide. That is not a big issue. What is more of a concern is that even when our prime minister embarks on a state visit to China, domestic political calculus rather than national interest will guide his decisions. So far, neither is the Congress ready to give him more of a leeway in negotiating with the Chinese nor is the UML in a place to say that it will do no important business with China. In the latter event, the Beijing visit will be reduced to a formality even before Oli embarks on it. This is not how coalitions work. How can people trust the government with anything if its constituent parties cannot even agree on how to deal with Nepal's two most important international partners? And what does it say about the executive authority of the prime minister? The ruling coalition needs to immediately sort out its foreign policy mess before the country suffers an irreparable loss of trust abroad.

COMMENT: The Dalai Lama's death and reincarnation will be a defining moment for Indian politics

17 November 2024, bne IntelliNews , Ben Aris

The death of the 14th Dalai Lama will be a defining moment for Indian politics as his influence stretches to cover China's internal struggle to control Tibet and could end in a clash with India, which has offered the Buddhist leader sanctuary for six decades. / Ben Aris

At the heart of the Tibetan plateau lies a profound challenge for India's foreign policy: the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama. Already 89 years old, Tenzin Gyatso, the fourteenth Dali Lama and head of the Buddhist Yellow Hat sect, says himself that he is not long for this world and has suggested that he may be the last of his line.

The problem is that when he dies, the race will be on to find a reincarnation to replace him and that China has already said that the fifteenth Dali Lama will be born in China, meaning he will fall under the control of the Chinese government.

There is already a precedent. When the tenth Panchen Lama, Lobsang Trinley Lhündrub Chökyi Gyaltsen, the number two in the Yellow Hat Sect hierarchy, passed away on 28 January 1989 at Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in Tibet, his reincarnation, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, was found a few months later in Lhari County, Nagchu Prefecture in Tibet and recognised by the Dalai Lama as the true Panchen Lama that May. But he and his family were immediately taken into custody by the Chinese authorities and have not been seen in public since. The Chinese government has said that he is living "a normal life" and "does not wish to be disturbed," but these claims have not been independently verified. As of now, his exact whereabouts and well-being remain unknown, and he has not taken up his role of leading the Yellow Hat sect in Tibet.

The question of succession for the fourteenth Dalai Lama remains vexed. The Dalai Lama, who currently lives in exile in northern India, has said that he may be reincarnated outside Tibet or may not be reincarnated at all. For the Chinese authorities that annexed Tibet in 1959, the current Dalai Lama is a thorn in the side of Beijing as it strives to incorporate Tibet and bring the region, which accounts for a third of all the People's Republic's land, under its full control. Bringing the fifteenth Dalai Lama under China's direct control is a top priority for Beijing. Who will be the new Dali Lama and where he lives is no longer a purely spiritual issue but a pivotal geopolitical matter involving India, China and the wider global order.

Life in exile

The Chinese invaded Tibet in 1959, which was still a closed country at the time and fiercely independent, and quickly took over. The Dalai Lama fled, walking across the Tibetan mountains into India, and set up a government in exile based in Dharamshala, a town in the northern Indian state of Himachal Pradesh, where it remains to this day. The Dalai Lama remains one of the most revered religious leaders in the world and has constantly lobbied for a return of Tibet's independence. Amongst his many accolades is a Nobel Peace prize for his non-violent struggle for the liberation of Tibet and his advocacy of a peaceful resolution to the Tibetan issue through dialogue.

China insists that the next Dalai Lama must be born within its borders and approved by Beijing, a move Tibetans see as interference in their religious traditions. Observers worry that this scenario could end with two rival and competing Dalai Lamas – one endorsed by Beijing and another by the Tibetan exile community – thereby complicating international diplomacy.

"The reincarnation debate is central to China's internal stability and its global image," Vijay Gokhale of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace said in a recent paper. "It is not merely about Tibet but reflects Beijing's concerns over ethno-religious unrest and external interference in its borderlands."

India has been a strong supporter of the Tibetan government in exile, providing a home for refugees that still walk over the mountains to escape a repressive regime in Tibet. During a trip through Tibet in 1989, this correspondent was told of forced sterilisation of Tibetan women by the Chinese government in interviews with locals in Lhasa and also witnessed first-hand the summary execution of a Tibetan man who attacked a Chinese official with a knife in Shigatse, the second largest city in Tibet and the traditional seat of the Panchen Lama, earlier the same day.

The reincarnation of Tibet's spiritual leader is not just a theological matter but will be a defining issue for India's relations with China and its role in the global order. Relations between the two countries have been poor due to a long-standing border dispute. Tensions between the two flared up most recently in 2023 when China issued a new "standard map" that included part of India's northern territory that was marked as part of China. In a hilarious retort, India's official cartographers issued their own new map that included all of China, but labelled "India 3.0."

Prime Minister Narendra Modi remains worried about Chinese aggression and on the agenda during his trip to Moscow this summer to meet Russian President Vladimir Putin was securing the delivery of Russia's advanced S-400 missile system that he wants to use to secure his borders with both China and Pakistan, which is also in dispute with New Delhi.

However, more recently the two long-standing rivals have tried to bury the hatchet as part of the attempts to build up the BRICS+ group in the face of US aggression and the growing geopolitical tensions. India's Ministry of External Affairs confirmed an agreement with China on disengagement and border patrols along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in October ahead of the latest BRICS summit, hosted by Russia in Kazan.

Gokhale argues that the question of the Dalai Lama's successor is also intricately tied to India's domestic politics, its foreign policy and the evolving geopolitical landscape shaped by the escalating Sino-US rivalry.

"The Dalai Lama remains a potent symbol of Tibetan identity and resilience. His death could trigger a geopolitical clash between India and China over the recognition of his successor," said Gokhale.

If Beijing selects and endorses its own new Dalai Lama within its borders, and dismisses a Tibetan or Indian-born rival that is recognised by the Tibetan government in exile, New Delhi's knee-jerk reaction will be to back the government in exile's candidate that will put it in direct conflict with Beijing and result in the start of a long-term legitimacy battle.

"The reincarnation issue is central to China's internal stability and international ambitions," Gokhale explains. "For Beijing, controlling the narrative is as important as controlling the territory. This is about demonstrating to the world –and to its own people – that Tibet is firmly integrated into the Chinese state." India's geopolitical conundrum

India is heavily invested in the Tibetan question. For over six decades India has been the spiritual and political haven for the Dalai Lama and his government-in-exile, a policy that has defined New Delhi's moral stance on the Tibet issue but strained its relations with China.

"India faces a tough choice," Gokhale observes. "Should it continue to serve as a sanctuary for Tibetan religious and cultural life, or should it tread cautiously to avoid provoking China further?" The presence of a large Tibetan exile community in India – numbering approximately 100,000 – and its historical commitment to supporting Tibetan autonomy have made India a key stakeholder in the reincarnation debate. The international respect the Dalai Lama commands makes it even harder for New Delhi to compromise on the Tibetan issues, as that would also hurt Modi's growing international stature and India's reputation as it starts to play a larger role on the international stage. In particular, Modi positioned India as an alternative leader of the Global South during the G20 summit last year with great success and hopes to moderate Beijing and Moscow's more aggressive stance in their clash with the West – a message that is well received by many in the aspiring Global South countries that don't want to get drawn into a Russian-led East-West head-on clash.

Complicating matters is the fact that Tibetan Buddhism has deep roots in India, particularly in the Himalayan belt, where Tibetan spiritual traditions are interwoven with local culture. Buddha was born in Lumbini as a prince of the local royal family, which is located in modern-day Nepal and is now a UNESCO World Heritage Site. However, he travelled widely and attained enlightenment under the Bodhi Tree in Bodhi Gaya, which is in the present-day northern Indian state of Bihar. The site is marked by the Mahabodhi Temple, another UNESCO World Heritage Site, and is considered one of the most sacred places in Buddhism.

According to the 2011 Census of India, Buddhism is practised by approximately 8.4mn individuals, constituting about 0.7% of the nation's total population. The majority (77%) of Indian Buddhists are concentrated in the state of Maharashtra. Estimates of the proportion of Buddhists within China's population vary significantly due to differing methodologies and definitions of religious affiliation. According to a 2018 survey by the Chinese General Social Survey, approximately 4% of Chinese adults, equating to about 42mn people, formally identify as Buddhist. However, another survey in 2023 study suggests that a third (33.4%) of China's 1.4bn residents, or approximately 470mn individuals, can be identified as Buddhists.

Any perceived concessions to China on this issue could have political repercussions within India, alienating communities that revere the Dalai Lama as a spiritual guide. Due to the high number of Chinese that at least loosely associate themselves with Buddhism, it is a key domestic issue for Beijing as well.

The Sino-US angle

India's challenges are compounded by the broader geopolitical backdrop of escalating Sino-US tensions. The US has been increasingly vocal in its support for Tibetan autonomy, enacting legislation that directly challenges China's claims over the reincarnation process. The 2020 Tibetan Policy and Support Act, for instance, explicitly upholds the Tibetan community's right to select its religious leaders without interference and is another plank in the US campaign to challenge China's rise. The 2024 Resolve Tibet Act further sharpens this stance by rejecting China's historical claims over Tibet and urging direct dialogue between Beijing and the Dalai Lama – a law that has only increased Beijing's desire to take control of the Dalai Lama's successor.

"Beijing sees the reincarnation debate not just as a domestic issue but as a proxy battleground for its competition with the United States," Gokhale notes. Beijing not only wants to secure control over the Dalai Lama's reincarnation for reasons of control over Tibet, but also as it fears the issue will become a proxy for its escalating rivalries with Washington. Gokhale warns that India cannot afford to approach the reincarnation question with indifference or delay. A clear and balanced policy is crucial to navigating the complex dynamics at play. "India has managed the Dalai Lama's presence with relative success over the past six decades," he says. "But the post-Dalai Lama era will demand a new level of strategic foresight and diplomatic agility."

Among the key policy questions India must address are:

Recognition and Legitimacy: If an alternative Dalai Lama is identified in exile or within Indian territory, how should India respond? Should it extend recognition and allow the successor to reside in India, or maintain ambiguity to avoid antagonising China?

Advocacy for Dialogue: Should India publicly support calls for negotiations between Beijing and Tibetan representatives? Such a stance could align India with international expectations while signalling its principled stand on the Tibetan issue.

Engagement with the Exile Community: How should India manage the Tibetan government-in-exile and the broader exile community during the transition? Gokhale suggests continuing to permit their cultural and educational activities while firmly deterring any violent or provocative actions.

Managing a Domestic Backlash: Tibetan Buddhism has a significant following in India, particularly in the northern states. Controversy over the next Dalai Lama could spark unrest among these communities, necessitating proactive measures to address their concerns.

Handling the Interregnum: The period between the death of the fourteenth Dalai Lama and the identification of his successor could be fraught with uncertainty. India must prepare for potential disputes within the Tibetan exile community and respond to Chinese demands regarding the Dalai Lama's symbols, such as ritual objects that are used to determine the authenticity of a new Dalai Lama.

Walking the tightrope

While Gokhale acknowledges that India's actions may not fundamentally alter China's policy on the Dalai Lama, he argues that inaction is not an option. Beijing's approach to Tibet has always been driven by its domestic imperatives of maintaining political control and stability in the region. However, India's role as the host of the Dalai Lama and the epicentre of Tibetan religious activity makes it an indispensable actor in the reincarnation debate.

"India should not entertain any illusions that appeasing China on this issue will lead to better bilateral relations," Gokhale cautions. "If anything, it may embolden Beijing to escalate its demands, including shutting down Tibetan institutions in India." Instead, India must strike a balance between its strategic interests and its long-standing commitments to Tibetan autonomy. Gokhale suggests that India consider coordinating with like-minded nations, such as the US and European countries, to counter China's attempts to monopolise the reincarnation process.

The succession of the Dalai Lama is not just a matter of religious tradition, but it will be a defining moment for the Indo-China relationship. For China, it is a test of its ability to assert control over Tibet in the face of international scrutiny. For India, it is an opportunity to reaffirm its democratic values and strategic independence while managing the risks of confrontation with its most powerful neighbour.

Gokhale concludes: "The reincarnation question embodies the intersection of spirituality, geopolitics and power. How India navigates this challenge will shape its future role as a regional leader and a global influencer."

Analysis: Under Trump, Pakistan to be viewed through 'China, India lens': experts

16 November 2024, DAWN, Anwar Iqbal

Experts say many picks are decidedly anti-China, while nominees such as Rubio, Waltz have demonstrated their pro-India leanings in past.

As President-elect Donald Trump picks people to staff his second administration, Washington-based scholars of US-South Asia relations are weighing the potential impact of these appointments on ties with Pakistan.

These observers predict that the Trump administration's foreign policy focus will likely prioritise countering China's influence in South Asia, a shift that could present challenges for Pakistan as the geopolitical landscape evolves.

Historically, Islamabad has sought to be treated independently by Washington, rather than viewed through the lens of India or Afghanistan.

However, with the incoming administration, the focus will shift once again – this time to China. This shift does not guarantee that Pakistan will be treated independently; instead, the US may continue to approach it through the lens of its competition with Beijing.

In interviews with Dawn, several scholars noted that the new team includes individuals who advocate for a stronger alliance with India, which could pose potential challenges for Pakistan.

They suggest that Trump's choices, which includes figures like Senator Marco Rubio and Congressman Mike Waltz, signal a clear shift toward strengthening the US-India alliance, likely at the expense of Pakistan.

Joshua White, a former senior advisor to the White House on South Asian Affairs, warns that the nominees' past experiences and concerns about China will likely influence their stance on Pakistan too.

"Trump's senior appointees will likely be quite skeptical – if not hostile – toward deepening US-Pakistan ties, given their experiences in Afghanistan, their valuation of the US-India relationship, and their concerns over Pakistan's relationship with China," he said.

Rubio, a strong advocate for countering China, recently introduced legislation aimed at elevating India's status to that of a key US ally, reflecting the growing strategic defence and technology cooperation between the two nations. Rubio's long-standing stance on South Asia, including efforts to limit US assistance to Pakistan over its support for Kashmiris' struggle for freedom, further emphasises the policy direction.

Shuja Nawaz, a distinguished fellow at the Atlantic Council's South Asia Centre, stresses that Pakistan's role in US strategy remains largely confined to counter-terrorism, particularly in Afghanistan. "Pakistan's utility to the US is primarily in counter-terrorism. It's unlikely to rank high in terms of positive engagement," Nawaz said.

The anticipated nomination of Mike Waltz as national security adviser is expected to further tilt the balance toward US-India defence cooperation. Waltz, a strong proponent of military collaboration with India, is also the co-chair of the Indian Caucus in Congress. He is expected to push for deepening the US-India partnership, especially as both countries desire to counter growing security challenges from China.

Hassan Abbas of the National Defence University in Washington, notes that while it is still early to fully assess the direction of Trump's foreign policy, America's national interests will ultimately drive decisions.

He acknowledges the growing influence of Pakistani diaspora activists in the US, but advises Islamabad to broaden its engagement with Washington beyond security issues as US-India relations continue to deepen.

Uzair Younus of The Asia Group agrees that Trump's appointees, particularly Rubio and Waltz, are likely to maintain a hardline stance toward Pakistan. Younus also points to Rubio's history of criticizing leaders who leverage anti-American sentiment for domestic political gain, a stance that could hurt PTI's efforts to solicit Trump's support to get Imran Khan released.

Furthermore, Trump's domestic reforms, such as those led by the Department of Government Efficiency (DOGE), are expected to facilitate economic cooperation between the US and India, easing the path for Indian businesses. The inclusion of Kash Patel, an Indian-American attorney, in Trump's administration is being seen as an indication.

"There may be factions in the Trump administration that would like to see the US pressure Pakistan on various domestic and foreign policy issues—from the status of Imran Khan to Kashmir. But that would require sustained attention from Washington, and I think it is more likely that the administration is preoccupied with Iran, China, border challenges with Mexico, and a host of other priorities," Joshua White said.

Meanwhile, Shuja Nawaz warned that Pakistan may not be high on the list of positive priorities of the Trump administration.

Waltz served in Afghanistan and will likely carry the memories of having lost comrades in the eastern region where the Haqqani Network operated, he said.

"He also might further subscribe to the Biden administration view that Pakistan is now in the Chinese lap," Nawaz said, adding: "Pakistan will need to show that it can improve its economy to garner US support via the International Financial Institutions like the IMF, World Bank, and ADB."

Lhasa: Black and White'

15 November 2024, Ekantipur, K. Raj

After the monsoon of 1996, there was a chance to go to Lhasa with 20/22 tourists from Poland. Through a tour company in the city of Poznan, Poland, I was responsible for taking tourists to Kathmandu, Chitwan National Park in Nepal, rafting on Trishuli River and Lhasa in Tibet.

The Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu used to facilitate the issuance of permits for visiting Tibet. After the official tour company submitted the details of the tourists to the embassy, they had to get 'clearance' from the center and only then the permit was issued from Kathmandu.

About seven years after the government of reformist Chinese Communist leader Deng Xiaoping brutally crushed student protesters in Beijing's Tiananmen Square on June 4, 1989, I was on my way to Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, which China had occupied in the 1950s.

Before the Chinese army captured Lhasa, on the night of March 17, 1959, the religious and political leader of Tibet, the Dalai Lama Khampa, reached Arunachal Pradesh, India, and took refuge with the Tibetans. Before leaving Lhasa, the Dalai Lama and his aides, informed of the complicated situation, appealed to the influential countries of the West for help, but no one would listen. The Dalai Lama, who is referred to as 'His Holiness', is still living in Dharamsala, India.

Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai promoted tourism as an important part of international relations and diplomacy during his tenure. Visits to China at that time were either official or production and industry study tours. China International Travel Services (CITS) was established at the government level in 1954 to organize such tours. After the , the company became one of the largest travel companies in China. Deng Xiaoping, who emerged after the death of Chinese Communist Party Chairman Mao Tse Tung, made tourism a means of earning foreign exchange and economic development after 1978. At a time when Chinese citizens rarely had contact with the outside world, Tibet became a subject of mystery and curiosity to everyone.

Even now Nepal has only foreign mission in Lhasa, no other country has. Also, Lhasa's international air connectivity is only with Kathmandu.

I was going to Lhasa at a young age with tourists from Poland, a country in Eastern Europe that had just woken up from the bad dream of communism, to Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, the autonomous region of China, which is achieving rapid economic growth through the path of democracy. Serving a group of tourists would earn good money.

Although a tour operator named Orwis started tourism in Poland in 1923, tourism business was nationalized like other economic sectors after the Second World War. After the countries of Eastern Europe were freed from the dark shadow of communism in 1989, Poles also began to travel abroad as tourists.

A small plane of China Southwest Airlines took off from Kathmandu to Lhasa around 10 am. It was my first experience flying internationally on a large ship. Aang would shriek as the ship's wheels left the ground and flew into the sky as the ship descended toward the house. Due to the start of rain, the sky was cloudy. I was desperately trying to look down from the window at twenty thousand feet.

After some time, the ship reached the top of Everest and after the pilot announced that 'the black pyramid-like takura on the lower left is Mount Everest', all the passengers got up from their seats and started taking pictures. Looking down, we saw clouds floating here and there, countless snow-covered peaks, glaciers and even Mount Everest.

I didn't have a camera, so I took a picture of Everest with my eye lens and kept it in mind. That exciting flight over the highest point on earth located in the majestic Mahalangur Himal was unforgettable not only for me but for almost all the passengers.

For a while, nothing was visible from the ship except the seemingly endless expanse of snow. The ship was flying over a high plateau known as the roof of the world, munching on snow-covered land, lakes of Kanchan blue water. Flying over the greenery of Nepal and Ankantar and Chisa Pahara, the ship has entered Tibet, an autonomous region of China. My eyes were fixed on the window and without even breathing I was measuring the land of vast Tibet stretching beyond the horizon.

I had no leading role in Lhasa nor did I have contact with anyone. Those Polish tourists probably knew more about Tibet than I did. They had come to visit after having studied a little about Tibet.

Maybe because the citizens of a country that has recently been freed from the clutches of dictatorship have a different mindset, they thought that it was right that I visited Lhasa with their money, it was beyond imagination that I would spend my own money to visit Tibet. Because almost 480 USD was spent on air tickets alone. I felt that there was a difference in their thinking and behavior from tourists from Western countries.

After about an hour of flight, we landed at Gangor Airport in Tibet. Since the time in Lhasa is 2 hours and 15 minutes later than that of Nepal, it was around 1:30 when we reached there. The airport is normal. Although there are domestic flights from Chinese cities including Chengdu to Lhasa, international air connections are only from Kathmandu.

At the airport at an altitude of 3600 meters, flights will not be allowed after 2 pm because of wind. The Polish tourists and I lined up for the immigration check. A Tibetan tour guide came with a small minibus to pick us up. He also spoke Hindi, and had spent some time in Dharamsala, India. After we boarded the bus, the guide said in English Started the 'briefing'. Lhasa city is 90 kilometers away from the airport and it takes about one and a half hours. There were only scattered houses around the road. Around five o'clock we reached the hotel in Lhasa city. It was late evening. After 'checking in' at the hotel and sending all the tourists to their rooms, I also went to my room. Lek Lagech Kare, felt nauseous and a bit heavy headed. So I went to bed without eating dinner. There was a noise coming from other rooms too.

It must have been 4 o'clock in the morning in Nepal, Beira from the hotel came with tea. After getting the information that breakfast is ready and the guide has also arrived, I got ready and left. Another guide has come today, called Chiring. He also speaks Hindi and English well and spent five years as a disciple of the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, India. A little bit of Nepali is also spoken. Telling that he came back to India from Nepal as a Tibetan refugee, he said, 'It is difficult for us to cross the border of Nepal.' At that time, all Toyotas in Pokhara were only 1975 model Korala Deluxe and Hydellux. Only a few wealthy people in Kathmandu owned Volkswagen Beetle models.

Since I was hungry, I entered a small roadside restaurant and ordered noodles. The noodles came with chunks of beef patty and chopsticks. I said not to eat beef. And the restaurateur brought vegetarian noodles. But they started teaching me because I didn't know how to use chopsticks. He brought a banana seed and taught me in Hindi, ``Aisei Pagte Hain".

After dusk, the shutters of a small building opened, and Tibetan girls in miniskirts began to appear. Colored lights started to flash. A man came in the car and started talking to the girl. Maybe a dance bar or something, I found the scene interesting. Since I was single, I wanted to go, but I didn't dare because I was sick.

After resting the next day, I went to see Jokhang Temple and Sera Monastery in Lhasa along with the tourists. The history of Nepal is also connected with the Jokhang Temple built in the seventh century. Inside the temple, the 2500-year-old Buddha statue that Bhrikuti took from Nepal after her marriage to the Tibetan emperor Srongchen Gampo is kept facing Nepal. It is said that Newari Kaligarrhs were taken from Nepal to build the said temple.

When we reached there in the morning, the pilgrims were crawling on the ground and praying towards the temple. During the Chinese Cultural Revolution of 1966, the Chinese Red Guards destroyed many structures including important statues and artefacts in this temple. Repairs started after 1972 and it was restored in 1980. Near the Jokhang temple there is also a house with a small hoarding belonging to a large business group of Nepal. I wanted to take a closer look but the guide didn't have time.

Infrastructure construction work is going on in Lhasa city. Everywhere there were bulldozers and excavators and Chinese workers in yellow helmets. Braving the dust and traffic jams, we reached Sera Gumba, 5 km away. Founded in the early 15th century, this monastery is located at the foot of a hill. Before the 1959 incident, there was a huge monastery here that could accommodate up to 6,000 Buddhist monks. Inside the monastery, the large halls contained large thangka paintings relating to the life of the Buddha.

After visiting the monastery, the guide explained to the tourists about Lord Buddha and the paintings containing his biography. After calming the curiosity of the tourists, he asked everyone, 'What is religion?' The tourists took turns answering. Some say religion is 'good work', some say 'religion is faith', some say 'helping the poor is religion'.

Although the tourists were from former communist countries, they all believed in Christianity. I said 'Accepting the existence of God is religion'. The guide began to say seriously, 'You are right, but in the language that common people understand, religion is the only thing that goes with a person even after death. After we die, everything should be left here, but even after death, people can take religion with them. All the tourists were impressed by the guide's words and the huge hall resounded with applause. On the way back to , one Marek (the police call Marek in English) said to me, 'Raj, you know, when some people here die, they cut up the dead bodies over there and feed them to the vultures.' Didn't know. I said 'myth'. But as Marek said, that is reality. Later I heard that cremation is done in the same way in Upper Mustang of Nepal. It is called 'Sky Burial' in English.

The next day we went to see the palaces of the Dalai Lama, Potala and Norbuling. The Potala Palace was heavily guarded by the Chinese military and photography was strictly prohibited. Foreign tourists, Tibetans and Chinese tourists flocked to see the huge palace covered with white limestone on the red hill.

According to our guide, the Buddha and other lama statues and small stupas inside the palace are made of gold. In that way, there should be tons of gold inside the Potala. Perhaps that's why the proverb "Lhasa has a ear is my daughter's ears" has come into vogue. Not only in Nepal but also the Greek philosopher Herodotus, who is known as the father of history, has described the gold found in Tibet in an interesting manner. legend According to , Padmasambhava, the pioneer of Tantric Buddhism, scattered gold from his siddhi in the land of Tibet. But Tibetans do not think it is good to dig the ground to extract gold because Padmasambhava gets angry when they dig the ground to extract gold, the fertility of the soil is destroyed, storms come and the crops are damaged.

Potala Palace is the Dalai Lama's winter palace and Norbuling's summer palace. Norbuling's palace was built a little further away, and all over the courtyard were beautiful flowers, including dahlias. In the palace, a golden throne about 4 meters high, donated by a merchant from Lhasa in honor of the Dalai Lama, and a box-like and box-like radio, gifted by the then Prime Minister of India, Jawaharlal Nehru, are also interesting items.

There is a consulate general of Nepal. That delegation of Nepal has stood as a witness with the history of political and commercial relations between Nepal and Tibet (voted at that time). The agency opened in Lhasa in 1856 as the "Lawyer's Office" and was transformed into the Consulate General in 1956.

Initially, food and other materials were exported from Nepal to Tibet, while sheep wool, wool, gold, salt, and herbs were imported from Tibet. It is said that travel and trade to the north of Nepal was safer than to the south.

After traveling to Tibet for five days and four nights, we returned to Kathmandu by Air China plane. Perhaps there was a psychological effect, in Lhasa my lungs always felt like they were starved of oxygen. After Tribhuvan International Airport Burn, Phylis tourists moved to New Delhit in transit. I was more than I got out of the airport long after leaving a long time.

A Modest Call for China to Elevate Kailash's Status

15 November 2024, Republica, Dr Ganesh Regmi

China is Nepal's inseparable and close ally. Nepal should maintain a special relationship with such a large and prosperous neighboring country. Just as the Nepali people along the southern border share a people-to-people connection with India, the residents along the northern border share a bond with China. Nepal has ancient and historical ties with China. There are various religious, social, and spiritual connections, including the revered Manasarovar and Kailash. Manasarovar and Kailash are unique and unparalleled in their importance. Kailash is the home of Mahadev, the supreme deity in Hinduism. For Buddhists, Jains, Shaivites, and yogis, Kailash is what Mecca and Medina are for Muslims. However, it appears that the Chinese government has not paid much attention to maintaining the dignity of Kailash, which is circled by Tibetan locals who prostrate themselves on the ground, taking three steps forward, bowing, and continuing like this for nearly a month.

I am writing this article based on my firsthand experiences during a pilgrimage to Manasarovar and Kailash, which is quite expensive for the average Nepali. I am not an influential person, nor am I in a position to advise the Chinese government; however, as a responsible pilgrim, I humbly request the Chinese government to consider the following points to elevate the status of Manasarovar and Kailash.

First, do not be stingy in providing necessary information. As a communist country, and due to the presence of the Dalai Lama, China has its internal policies to control information in Tibet. However, it is essential to provide necessary information to pilgrims visiting the sacred land of Manasarovar and Kailash.

The region is vast and extremely remote. Information such as the route to take, the locations of places, distances, altitudes, accommodations, dining facilities, emergency rescue arrangements, safety measures, and reporting of crimes like theft or fraud should be made available, preferably in English. Without sufficient information, the journey feels like traveling in the dark.

Second, manage the entry gate to Manasarovar and control the unfair 'vehicle syndicate'. The journey to Manasarovar is long and challenging. While the routes look attractive and well-maintained, the main entry gate to Manasarovar has issues with vehicles getting stuck in mud and sand. There is no shelter in case of rain, nor places to have tea, snacks, or rest.

A bigger issue is that vehicles are not allowed entry into Manasarovar for the pilgrimage. Whether a pilgrim can take their vehicle inside depends on the whims of the gatekeepers, and bribes are reportedly needed. Such a 'local syndicate' was common in Nepal's Mustang area two decades ago, and now it is seen at Manasarovar.

Third, improve the condition of the Manasarovar circumambulation route. While Kailash is circled on foot, the tradition for Manasarovar involves circumambulation by vehicles, which takes around three hours. Unfortunately, the route is a dusty, rough, and uncomfortable dirt road, resembling Nepal's remote and undeveloped areas. It is disappointing to see the world's second-most prosperous nation leaving such an important pilgrimage route in poor condition. One wonders why China, a symbol of prosperity, has not upgraded this road to the standards of America, Europe, or Singapore.

Fourth, construct holy bathing ghats at Manasarovar. There are no designated holy bathing areas around Manasarovar. Due to the absence of proper facilities, pilgrims have to bathe in muddy spots near the shore, such as in the west-north area near the guest house. The mud is so thick that shoes get stuck, and bathing in the freezing water leaves one's legs covered in mud. Facilities for warm and cold water would make bathing more accessible, and creating proper bathing ghats would be a minor challenge for prosperous China.

Fifth, address the lack of proper toilet facilities. The public toilets in Manasarovar are in an appalling state. They are communal, foul-smelling, have no proper doors or locks, and lack water. The sight is disheartening, and it would be unfortunate for even an enemy to experience such conditions. Unable to use the toilets, I, like many others, had to resort to open areas at night.

Sixth, build a temple or Shiva Lingam at Manasarovar. There are no temples or Shiva Lingams at Manasarovar and Kailash. This means that offerings and prayers brought from Nepal or other countries have no place to be dedicated and are instead scattered on the ground. Despite a long and spiritually significant journey, there is no designated place to express religious sentiments or bow before the divine.

Seventh, pay attention to pilgrims' health and safety. Manasarovar and the Kailash pilgrimage require traversing harsh terrain at high altitudes, with strong winds and extreme cold. Although tens of thousands of pilgrims visit Manasarovar and Kailash every year, there are no health camps or emergency medical facilities, not even private clinics or pharmacies. It seems that pilgrims' lives have been left to the care of Lord Shiva himself, as two of my fellow travelers lost their lives during the journey.

Eighth, ensure the pilgrims' welfare, safety, and rescue. There is no proper infrastructure for the well-being and safety of pilgrims. There are no safe shelters along the way, no facilities to warm up or drink hot water, no oxygen camps in case of altitude sickness, and no government medical staff or equipment in sight. This suggests that China has not prioritized the dignity of Kailash.

Ninth, remove the restriction on helicopter access. Helicopters are the most efficient means of rescue in high-altitude areas, yet they are not allowed in the Kailash region. This restriction deserves reconsideration, as the Chinese helicopters used for security should not be considered a threat.

Tenth, security should be further strengthened along the route. CCTV cameras could be installed in necessary areas. The pilgrimage is often exploited by brokers, with pilgrims overcharged for services like horses, where the local owners receive only a fraction of the payment. Fixed rates in English would prevent such issues. Local police and immigration officers are often harsh towards pilgrims, and better facilities are needed.

Lastly, a nation itself may not follow a particular religion, and China may consider religion as "the opium." However, for the people, religion is important. It is the responsibility of a great and prosperous country like China to maintain the dignity of Kailash, a place revered by many Tibetans and others alike, who circle it with utmost reverence.

While the revenue from pilgrim royalties might be very little to a wealthy nation like China, the respect for Kailash, a sacred center for Hindus, Buddhists, Jains, and Shaivites worldwide, should not be compromised. Addressing the concerns outlined above by building infrastructure and arranging necessary management would demonstrate that China is not diminishing the sanctity of Manasarovar and Kailash, but rather upholding it. Otherwise, it might appear that the current state is left unchanged to portray the deprived status of the Tibetan people.

Tibet-Aid Program at 30: Driving Tibet's Development in Xi's 'New Era'

Executive Summary:

- The Tibet-Aid Program (TAP), a principal driver of development in Tibet, has ramped up significantly under Xi Jinping's rule.
- The TAP has, throughout its 30-year history, sought to use material development to placate local tensions that have periodically arisen from the Party's governance failings in the region. Most recently, the emphasis has been on improving the quality of healthcare and education.
- The TAP is a focus for the Party's priorities, and the increasing flow of resources to "moderately prosperous" villages on the Indian border could be a cause for concern for neighboring India.
- Tibet remains an unattractive destination for cadres despite copious propaganda suggesting otherwise, which has helped perpetuate a relatively poor standard of governance in the region.

On November 11, 2024, the Tibet Daily reported on a book launch event held in Lhasa to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Tibet-Aid Program, sometimes also called pairing-up assistance for Tibet (TAP; 对口援藏) (Tibet Autonomous Region [TAR] Government, November 11). The book, written by a cadre sent to Tibet from Zhejiang Province, eulogizes the work of his comrades and the region's beauty across 110 poems. This is the latest of a string of propaganda efforts this year that have praised the work of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) over the last three decades in bringing the region further under the control of Beijing. Beyond the book launch, websites for positive news stories around the anniversary has been set up by state media outlet Xinhua as well as the TAR government, both of which features as its top article a picture of a smiling Xi Jinping, waving in front of the Potala Palace in Lhasa (Xinhua/TAP 30th Anniversary, accessed November 12; TAR Government, accessed November 12).

The Party has also sought to promote its achievements in Tibet overseas. This week, state-sanctioned Tibetan Studies experts are visiting Latvia and Estonia. In the former, they discussed "the development achievements of China's Tibet in the new era (中国西藏发展成就)," among other topics. According to the People's Daily, the parliamentarians were grateful for the visit, as Latvian people "mostly learn about China's Tibet from American movies and western media, and have accepted too many wrong views about it (多从美国电影和西方媒体中了解中国西藏, 接受了太多有关西藏的错误观点)" (People's Daily, November 11). The overall propaganda efforts have been accompanied by key meetings in Beijing and Lhasa involving senior CCP officials, which have emphasized the TAP's centrality and the need to further ramping up the program.

Wang Huning Outlines Way Forward in Lhasa

The most important event of 2024 for the Party's approach to Tibet was the Fourth Tibet-Aid Work Conference (第四次对口支援西藏工作会议), held in Lhasa from August 27–29. [1] The conference marked the TAP's 30th anniversary, and for the first time the meeting took place in the regional capital of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). Wang Huning (王沪宁), the fifth-ranked member of the 20th Politburo Standing Committee (PBSC) and Chairperson of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) attended and delivered a speech, in which he signaled TAP's increased centrality to the governance of Tibet under Xi Jinping's leadership (TAR Government, August 29). The fact that serving and retired senior officials travelled to Lhasa for the conference and the messages conveyed underscore the growing significance of the TAP in the PRC's approach to the region.

Wang's visit sought to underline the CCP's focus on people's basic needs. He visited Lhoka People's Hospital (山南市人民医院) in Nedog district, which receives support from Anhui province, as well as the administrative seat of Southwestern prefecture-level city Lhoka (山南市) along the Indian border (Xinhua, August 29). Projects announced since the Sixth Tibet Work Forum in 2015 have focused on healthcare and education, emphasizing the Party's aim of ameliorating people's standard of living in the sparsely populated yet strategically important region.

In his speech, Wang emphasized the "spirit of driving in nails (钉钉子精神)." Translated more euphemistically in official sources as the "spirit of perseverance," the phrase was first used by CCP General Secretary Xi Jinping at the second plenary session of the 18th CCP Central Committee in February 2013 (State Council Information Office, July 11, 2019). It refers to the necessity of repeating actions multiple times before achieving the required result. As Xi noted at the time, "When we use a hammer to drive in a nail, a single knock often may not be enough; we must keep hammering until it is well in place before proceeding to hammer the next one. If you keep on driving in nails, then you will achieve great results (钉钉子往往不是一锤子就能钉好的, 而是要一锤一锤接着敲, 直到把钉子钉实钉牢, 钉牢一颗再钉下一颗, 不断钉下去, 必然大有成效)" (Party Member Net, February 28, 2013). In the context of Tibet, the phrase has been used to convey the priority of central government directives in key policy areas such as the "two centenary goals," stability maintenance, and border area development. Wang's speech also echoed much of the official discourse around the 30th anniversary by referring to the "Spirit of Old Tibet (老西藏精神)." Invoked by senior CCP figures, including Xi, since the late 1990s, the phrase is intended to exhort Tibet-Aid cadres take inspiration from the Party's seizing control of Tibet in the early 1950s to ensure long-term stability, development, and prosperity (TAR CCP, June 26, 2014; Xi Theory, July 2021; People's Forum, December 21, 2021). [2]

The invocation of this spirit is a nationalist call for mobilizing cadres to serve in the frontier region, which is not a popular destination. Beyond ethnic divisions, the negative attitudes of many Tibetans toward Han officials, low economic development, and—for Tibet-Aid cadres in particular—the harsh climate make it an unappealing place to be sent. Several cadres are known to have died while serving in the TAR due to the hostile conditions. Where appeals to nationalist sentiment have not sufficed, the CCP has resorted to offering cadres better wages, subsidies, and career advancement opportunities. These are attractive, especially for young cadres from poorer central and western provinces that neighbor Tibetan areas.

Early TAP Led to Uneven Development, Local Tensions

Beijing launched the TAP in 1994 on the recommendations of the third Tibet Work Forum in July that year. This followed widespread ethnic tensions from the late 1980s onward borne out of increasing inequality along regional and ethnic lines. The original blueprint for the program drew from earlier mobilization of cadres and resources from inland (内地) provinces during the heyday of Maoist socialism and an array of programs launched after a 1980 visit to Tibet by PBSC member Hu Yaobang (胡耀邦) and that year's inaugural Tibet Work Forum (China Economy Online, April 8, 2008). Later, TAP also came to supplement the "Great Western Development (西部大开发)" strategy, which was launched in 1999 to channel resources from more prosperous and developed coastal provinces to poorer western provinces (Gov.cn, October 10, 2009).

The TAP has a three-pronged assistance mechanism. These are the direct transfer of funds to the TAR government from partner provinces, centrally administered cities, central ministries, and institutions; the transfer of cadres to the TAR; and investments in specific projects in counties and prefectures in the region. Cadres from partnering provinces typically serve for one or three years in counties and prefectures where the partner province funds projects. According to the latest official statistics, nearly 12,000 cadres across 10 batches have served from 18 provinces, 89 central organs and ministries, and 4 centrally administered cities (People's Daily Online, August 16, 2022).

Functionally, the assistance projects range from "group style (组团式)" medical and educational assistance to poverty alleviation, urbanization, and infrastructure development in so-called "xiaokang villages (小康村; moderately prosperous villages)" in counties along the border with India. "Group-style" assistance in these villages began in 2015. It is characterized as a "people-centered" policy but is also intended to change the way projects are undertaken. Under this model, dozens of doctors, nurses, and teachers come to select hospitals to train local doctors and teachers and to change how hospitals and schools function at the holistic level (Xinhua, August 23, 2022). The TAR provincial government has undertaken a massive project of developing more than 628 xiaokang villages in border counties along its border with India since 2017; and TAP has played a significant role in funding infrastructure, tourism, educational and health facilities there (Toutiao, July 7, 2023; Tibet.cn, August 26).

In the late 2010s, it became clear that the benefits of the TAP were not being distributed optimally. The structure of subsidies led to a form of "boomerang aid" that helped only a fraction of Tibetan elites and non-Tibetan migrants in urban areas. [3] Tensions flared in 2008, with massive protests in Tibetan areas. This provided the impetus for change. The Fifth Tibet Work Forum in 2010 called for intensifying the TAP as part of developing a "long-term strategy (长久之策)." It was decided that developed provinces, centrally administered cities, and central organs must set aside 1 percent of their fiscal revenue annually to the Tibet-Aid program, as well as emphasizing coordinated development (TAR CCP, 26 June 2014; Qiushi, August 27). This shift has become more pronounced under Xi Jinping, though it is unclear whether the sources of tension from 2008 will be resolved under this new path.

'New Era' TAP Focuses on Education, Healthcare, and Unity

Wang Huning's August conference speech underscored the need to persist in policies across four domains: maintaining stability, increasing development, promoting ecological civilization, and strengthening border areas (People's Daily Online, August 28). In Xi Jinping's "new era," the TAP is the primary vehicle through which these four objectives are to be achieved in the TAR. One of the earliest formulations of Xi's Tibet policy came at the Sixth Tibet Work Forum in 2015. Xi articulated his priorities for governing the region as "six musts (六个必须)," which align with the approach taken by the TAP. Other priorities included strengthening the CCP's organizational and ideological hegemony, expanding and strengthening local party organizations, and "rallying the peoples' hearts (凝聚人心)" to promote ethnic unity (Xinhua, August 26, 2015).

Wang's also made repeated references to Xi Jinping's earlier emphasis on creating a "new situation for Tibet Aid work (援藏工作新局面)," something that was picked up by official media commentaries (People's Daily, August 29, 2020; CPC News, August 30). In practice, "new situation" refers to the focus on rural revitalization, health, and education work, as well as the TAP as the key vehicle for achieving the party-state's political goals of fostering ethnic unity and ensuring Tibetans' support. It also reflects changes to the structure of the program itself. For example, group-style education and health projects aim to bring about sustainable improvements to health and educational institutions in the TAR, as opposed to sending talents to temporarily make up for the region's shortage of skilled doctors and teachers (Xinhua, August 6, 2022). Xi's personal interest in ramping up the TAP is often conveyed through media reports on his involvement in the TAP projects from the days when he worked in Fujian province in the late 1990s (CCTV, September 8, 2015; October 6, 2017; People's Daily, July 28, 2022).

Media commentaries also referred to the capacity of TAP projects to "transform people's lives and win their hearts (改善民生凝聚人心)." Xi first articulated this phrase at the Sixth Tibet Work Forum, and refers to ensuring regime stability and loyalty through improving people's general quality of life (China Daily, September 8, 2015; Xinhua, August 28).

The increase in cadres serving under the TAP has been dramatic during Xi's tenure. Around 7,000 out of the total 12,000 have served since 2012, and the size of each batch has also risen substantially, from 622 in 1993 to 2,117 in the batch that has been serving since 2021 (Xinhua, August 22). A notable driver of TAP's expansion came in 2015, when the Central Organization Department—which oversees all personnel matters for the TAP—mobilized the ministries of education and health, as well as the partnering provinces, for "group-style Tibet Aid work (组团式 援藏工作)" focusing on education and health. Since then, the number of projects launched and cadres dispatched under these two sectors have contributed significantly to the visibility and centrality of the program in the CCP's Tibet policy (Xinhua, August 23).

The expansion of the program to include cultural and educational domains also follows the Party's gradual shift to "Second-Generation Ethnic Policies (第二代民族政策)" in the last two decades. These refer to efforts by the central government to dilute the ethnic autonomy provisions and rights guaranteed to ethnic groups including Tibetans under the Regional Ethnic Autonomy Law (中华人民共和国民族区域自治法) (Gov.cn, July 29, 2005; CECC, February 2006; Made in China Journal, September 7, 2020). For example, the Party has introduced a range of policies from increasing mandarin Chinese-language instruction in schools to appointing more Han cadres in contravention to the Regional Ethnic Autonomy Law (Center of Excellence for Himalayan Studies, September 13, 2023). Educational and legal campaigns also seek to instill trust in PRC laws and regulations over Tibetan Buddhist religious norms and beliefs (TAR Government, February 5). A common thread to the second-generation ethnic policies is "forging a sense of Chinese nation through national, legal, and civil consciousness (铸牢中华民族 共同体意识和国家意识公民意识法治意识)," which has become "the key line of ethnic work of the CCP (新时代党的民族工作的主线)" aimed at creating a "unified (统一)" national identity (Qiushi, August 8).

Conclusion

Wang Huning's presence at this year's Tibet-Aid Work Conference is the latest of several senior officials' visits to the TAR in recent times. This could indicate that the Party senses a degree of fragility in its hold over the hearts and minds of ethnic communities. In July, one month prior to the Conference, Wang also visited Tibetan areas in Sichuan in addition to spending time in the TAR (Xinhua, July 7; July 28).

The TAP's focus on education and healthcare reflects a conscious effort to redress failings in earlier policies by seeking to improve the material benefits that accrue to local Tibetans who have so far been excluded from economic benefits. However, the Party-state's belief that economic development will create a supplicant and peaceful Tibet could be misguided. By ignoring Tibetans' cultural and spiritual desires, insisting that they conform to a unified ethno-national identity, and diluting laws and regulations that enshrine their autonomy, Beijing risks following a self-defeating strategy.

At Tiananmen Square, tight security with metal detectors reflects a changing China

15 November 2024, NPR, John Ruwitch

It was my second attempt in as many days to visit Tiananmen Square, and it wasn't looking good.

When I tried the day before, a guard said I required an online appointment – and, no, I couldn't make a same-day booking. So, I scanned a QR code, entered my name and passport number, and returned the following day.

Now, I was at the front of a line of dozens of people trying to get onto the world's biggest public square.

Just making it here was a process: There was a police ID check to exit the nearby subway station. Another to get in line on the sidewalk. A third while standing in line. And now, there was a fourth – by a towering police officer standing before a bank of metal detectors and X-ray machines – the final inspection.

My journalist visa caught his eye. He told me to step aside, and radioed his boss.

Another cop arrived. Foreign reporters, he said apologetically, need special permission. And I did not have it.

Seventy-five years ago last month, Chinese revolutionary leader Mao Zedong declared the founding of the People's Republic from atop Tiananmen, the Gate of Heavenly Peace. Situated on the southern edge of the imperial Forbidden City, few symbols of power in China rival it.

The vast square that unfolds at its feet is another symbol of power, which over the decades has vacillated between people — and the state.

A protest tradition took root in Tiananmen Square more than 100 years ago when students marched through the square in 1919 — the May Fourth Movement. They were protesting the terms of the Treaty of Versailles at the end of World War I.

After the Communist Party took power in 1949, it expanded the square. The party installed two huge buildings on its east and west flanks — and placed a monument to heroes of the revolution in the middle.

"That all happened in the 1950s, basically to prepare for 1959, which was the 10th anniversary," says Yu Shuishan, an expert on Beijing's urban architecture at Northeastern University.

And the party had a model in mind. "Basically, copying Moscow," Yu says.

The square was to be a grand public venue, like the Soviet Union's Red Square, for parades and mass gatherings.

State power

In the 1960s and '70s, Mao brought thousands of young Red Guards to Tiananmen Square to sing his praises during the Cultural Revolution.

There have been military parades for milestone anniversaries of the founding of the country, and celebrations for other major events, including the 2021 centenary of the establishment of the Communist Party of China.

Those big shows of state power jostled against other things happening in the square. In 1976, thousands gathered in Tiananmen Square spontaneously to mourn the death of Premier Zhou Enlai.

There were protests there in the 1980s — and in 1989, students took over the square for months — until the army crushed the movement.

Those protests, and the crackdown, broadcast across the world, brought the square more attention — and enhanced its significance and sensitivity.

Security in Tiananmen Square increased. But it was still possible to hang out there. People flew kites in the square. You could bike or skateboard there.

Sporadic demonstrations still occurred in the 1990s and 2000s. Most were small, and ended quickly in a swarm of plainclothes and uniformed police patrolling the square.

I've seen petitioners toss leaflets into the air at Tiananmen, and unfurl banners. Rep. Nancy Pelosi even did so in 1991 to memorialize demonstrators killed in 1989.

People have lit themselves on fire in Tiananmen Square in apparent protest.

And in 2013, extremists who the government said were linked to a separatist movement drove an SUV through a crowd, leaving several people dead, in front of Tiananmen Gate.

Security was again ratcheted up. Metal detectors and X-ray machines went in. During the coronavirus pandemic, the authorities added a digital booking system to enter — demanding IDs or passports, and controlling the number of people who go onto the square, ostensibly in the name of public health.

The booking system has remained in place.

"In the past, you could do anything there," says a 69-year-old man surnamed Liu, who has lived around the corner his whole life. He declined to tell NPR his full name out of concern about speaking frankly to a foreign reporter.

"Now, you absolutely can't do anything."

Elizabeth Perry, an expert on Chinese politics and protests at Harvard University, says the intensified security reflects the insecurities of the current leadership.

Chinese President Xi Jinping "is very insecure," she says.

"Not that the party ever welcomed popular protest, but could certainly live with it. But I think that that sense has now disappeared and that any kind of protest, even if it's very limited demographically and geographically, is seen as potentially dangerous by the party," she adds.

Perry says that may relate to the way Xi has ruled — culling rivals with an anti-corruption campaign, consolidating power, abolishing term limits and putting the Communist Party back in the center of everyday life. Security has tightened across the board. At the same time, the economy has been floundering.

"There seems to be a kind of collective doom that the current leadership could be in place for a very long time, and there is no longer any institutionalized mechanism for leadership succession," she says.

Tourists don't seem bothered by the extra security at Tiananmen Square, which travelers consider a "must visit" in Beijing.

Xie Bin came from the city of Hangzhou to see the square with her kids, who were decked out in red stickers and little Chinese flags. She says it was a good experience.

"[The authorities] have their own considerations for making these restrictions, and as visitors we just need to respect the decision," she says on a street nearby.

In September, I tried to visit Tiananmen Square again, hoping the third time's a charm.

NPR requested permission through the Foreign Ministry, which contacted a government office that manages the square and the area around it. After waiting nearly a week, on a glorious early fall day, the request was granted.

I had been on the square countless times, as a tourist and as a student. In more recent years, I had visited as a journalist when foreign leaders were welcomed to China, or when the square was converted into a giant parking lot for party conclaves or sessions of parliament.

Years ago, it felt like an open, organic part of Beijing. Now, it feels like consecrated ground.

A group of tourists from China's northeast invited me to join them for a photo, with the famous portrait of Mao in the background.

I obliged, but we didn't talk. A government official and a police officer accompanied me on my visit to the square. And I had been told that interviews were off limits.

Why Is China's Atheist Regime Trying to Pick the Next Dalai Lama?

15 November 2024, Daily Signal, Bryan burack and Jack Erickson

The Chinese Communist Party is preparing to hijack an ancient faith. Freedom-loving people can't let it succeed.

In early September, dozens of high-ranking Tibetan Buddhist monks and religious scholars gathered in the Chinese city of Lanzhou to discuss reincarnation, a major tenet of their faith. Observers would be understandably perplexed by how the participants "emphasized the importance" of the approval of China's communist regime "in the recognition of reincarnated Tibetan religious leaders."

The mystery has a simple, sinister answer: The meeting was organized by the Chinese Communist Party itself, through the Buddhist Association of China, a part of its United Front Work Department, which controls all religious expression in China.

Shamefully, the atheist CCP is attempting to reach into the afterlife to seize control of religious leaders that have escaped its grasp on earth.

The CCP's paranoia and brutality falls heavily on people of faith in China, and Tibetan Buddhists are among the most abused. The CCP's efforts to wipe out Tibetans' identity and establish complete control over their lives are thought to constitute crimes against humanity, and Tibet was a proving ground for techniques of repression used in the CCP's genocide against the Uyghurs.

The CCP is intensely hostile toward the 14th Dalai Lama, Tibetan Buddhism's highest spiritual leader, who escaped to India following the CCP's annexation of Tibet in the 1950s. Since then, the Dalai Lama has been an active proponent of greater autonomy for Tibetans, founding the Central Tibetan Administration, Tibet's government-in-exile based in northern India.

For the CCP, Tibetans' veneration of the Dalai Lama constitutes a threat to its control over Tibet, which has seen periods of unrest incited by CCP repression. The future of the dalai lama as an institution is therefore linked to the future of Tibet itself.

Next year, the Dalai Lama turns 90 and is expected to announce plans for his reincarnation and succession. He has remarked that he may reincarnate outside of China, leaving the next dalai lama outside Chinese government control. He has also considered the possibility of choosing a successor while still alive. That would represent a break with the more common Buddhist tradition, whereby after the death of the dalai lama, a council of senior religious figures identifies a young boy as his successor and reincarnation.

The Dalai Lama has also suggested he may reincarnate as a woman, or even forgo reincarnation altogether.

For the CCP, the Dalai Lama's succession is an opportunity to seize even tighter control of the Tibetan Buddhist faith and ensure its practitioners no longer have a spiritual leader to look to beyond China's borders and outside the CCP's reach. The CCP has been preparing to hijack the Dalai Lama's succession for decades.

In 1995, the Dalai Lama identified a young boy in Tibet as the 11th Panchen Lama, the second-ranking religious figure in Tibetan Buddhism. Almost immediately thereafter, the CCP forcibly disappeared the then-6-year-old child, who has not been seen since. The CCP then appointed its own Panchen Lama.

In 2007, the Chinese government released regulations stipulating that “[n]o group or individual may without authorization carry out any activities related to searching for or recognizing reincarnating living Buddha soul children.” In recent years, China has emphasized that the reincarnation of the dalai lama “must comply with Chinese laws and regulations.”

The United States recently enacted the Resolve Tibet Act, bipartisan legislation disputing the PRC’s misleading historical claims over Tibet and urging Beijing to agree to talks with the Dalai Lama’s representatives. In June, a bipartisan congressional delegation met with the Dalai Lama in northern India, warning that China is “trying to erase [Tibetans’] culture ... . They are trying something that we cannot let them get away with.”

India also has a stake in preventing CCP subversion of the Dalai Lama’s succession. Aside from hosting Tibet’s government-in-exile, India’s Tawang district sits within what was once part of the historical Tibetan nation and was the birthplace of the sixth Dalai Lama. It’s also the site of one of the largest Buddhist monasteries in the world. Beijing has opposed the Dalai Lama’s visits to Tawang, as China claims the district as part of a broader “South Tibet.”

Although India’s deliberations surrounding the Dalai Lama’s succession have largely remained muted, a former Indian ambassador to China stated that India wouldn’t be “comfortable with China trying to control that process.”

With the Dalai Lama’s 90th birthday next July, discussion over his succession will come to a head soon. The CCP has been preparing for decades to turn the next dalai lama into a tool to advance Beijing’s interests. The U.S. government is well aware of this plan. In its statement marking the Dalai Lama’s 89th birthday, the State Department reiterated its support for Tibetans’ “ability to freely choose and venerate religious leaders without interference.”

But more than platitudes will be required, and the U.S. should be engaging now with representatives from the Dalai Lama’s office, the Tibetan government in exile, and the Indian government to better prepare for the succession.

The Chinese Communist Party cannot be allowed to quash the religious freedom of the Tibetan people and Buddhists worldwide.

China’s Commodification of Minorities

14 November 2024, The Diplomat, Natasha L. Mikles

Beijing’s preferred form of ethnic minority culture is a sanitized simulacrum featuring plays, theme parks, and other government attractions aimed at Han tourists.

This summer, I returned to China after nearly a decade to conduct fieldwork among Tibetan communities in Sichuan Province. As a scholar of Chinese and Tibetan culture who has spent significant time in China over the past two decades, I have had the opportunity to observe the transformations as Chinese Communist Party (CCP) General Secretary Xi Jinping has centralized power and revitalized Chinese nationalism.

New, tightened restrictions became especially apparent on this most recent research trip, during which the government unexpectedly re-routed me from my Tibetan fieldwork sites. Instead of my planned research itinerary, I was led on a three-week tour of Yunnan Province by a CCP tour guide, who encouraged me to take the opportunity to “learn about the full richness of China’s many other minority groups.”

Throughout this spontaneous new itinerary, I was blocked from any meaningful encounter with Tibetans and instead shown a sanitized simulacrum of minority culture in the form of plays, theme parks, and other government attractions aimed at tourists from the Han majority ethnic group. In the new China of Xi Jinping, the cultures of China’s 55 ethnic minorities have been turned into a simulated commodity for domestic tourists under the guise of economic development and cultural preservation. Meanwhile, actual expressions of ethnic identity are suppressed.

While this process has been underway for some time, the transformation was accelerated during the pandemic by the deployment of facial recognition software and greater police-state observation. The realities of domestic Han tourism in the new context of the 21st-century Chinese police state have produced an invisible wall that sequesters minority culture and ultimately silences or otherwise obscures minority voices.

An Unexpected Change

Shortly after arriving in China – and the day before my husband and I were supposed to begin driving from Chengdu toward the city of Derge – the company we had worked with to arrange our travel called an emergency meeting. The owner explained that the CCP tourism bureau had barred our travel to the Tibetan regions of western Sichuan due to “floods.”

After a tense conversation in which I suggested a myriad of other routes or itineraries, it became apparent that anywhere ethnic Tibetans lived in Sichuan or Qinghai province had “floods.” Past experience had taught me that rhetorical games like this were a common tactic used by the Chinese government to deny access to people and places without explicitly saying “no.” Proving this point, I later confirmed that many foreign tourists had visited these regions during the summer. There were no “floods.” Either I had specifically been “graylisted” – allowed to enter China, but unable to go to any sensitive areas – or all foreign researchers like myself were barred from entry to Tibetan regions.

After scrubbing my research trip, the company offered a three-week trip through Yunnan, designed in consultation with both the national and provincial tourism bureaus. The next morning, our primary tour guide introduced herself as a CCP member who did not work for the company, but had been specifically asked to help culturally interpret for us on the trip. We traveled on a classic Yunnan tour that began in Kunming, and traveled through Lijiang, Dali, and Shangri-la, before eventually returning to Chengdu via Xichang.

While I was unable to do my planned research, the trip proved an eye-opening experience on how Han Chinese perceive and interact with minority culture.

Commodifying Minorities

The itinerary led us to a variety of sites created, primarily, for domestic Han tourists to experience China’s ethnic minorities. Among these was the Yunnan Minorities Village in Yunnan’s capital city of Kunming – a modern version of a “human zoo.” In this sprawling park, each of Yunnan’s 26 ethnic minorities has a pavilion showcasing their traditional homes, temples, and village life. Han guests are invited to interact with local representatives of the ethnic minority, each dressed in the most exaggerated representation of their traditional garb. Especially popular with Han tourists are the performances, where a minority ensemble stages exuberant demonstrations of their traditional dances and songs. The emcee of each performance referred, in Mandarin, to the Han guests as “friends” (朋友) and invited everyone to dance along with his performers, often while making jokes to the audience about the simplicity of life in the minority villages outside the big city.

These dance experiences were echoed by other performances in Kunming, including the sold-out “Dynamic Yunnan.” Created by celebrated Bai minority dancer Yang Liping, the show claims to preserve dying forms of minority dance in an extravagant two-hour performance featuring hundreds of dancers, drummers, moving set pieces, and high-end lighting. The performance depicted minorities as alternately highly sexualized or deeply childlike, reflecting the “noble savage” trope ubiquitous in early Western anthropological literature. A shirtless drummer wearing only a loin cloth and drumming a song representing the sexual union of men and women was followed by a gaggle of minority women dressed as young girls making flirtatious gestures with their hands.

Despite its lauded claims to support indigenous dancers, I noted that only a few select minority groups were represented among the dancers. Such a distinction is not entirely surprising. Scholars like Colin Mackerras have noted that certain minority groups receive significantly greater government support and funding in the preservation of their performance traditions; these resources often are inversely related with the perceived threat of separatism the minority culture may represent.

Sometimes this leads to minority communities being written out of their performance tradition entirely. When the Beijing Dance Academy celebrated its 70th anniversary this fall, clips circulated on social media of the predominantly-Han faculty and staff performing traditional Tibetan folk dances as part of China’s dance heritage. I noted that Dynamic Yunnan’s dance representing the Tibetan people featured no ethnic Tibetan dancers and ultimately portrayed a community obsessed with Buddhist devotion and religious practice to the detriment of all else, including financial livelihood and personal health.

The mostly Han audience, seemingly unreflective or unconcerned by the stereotyped performance of Dynamic Yunnan, gave several standing ovations. After the performance, our driver told us that “before minority people can walk, they are dancing; before they can talk, they are singing.” While seemingly an innocent expression of appreciation for the vitality of minority culture, aphorisms like this reinforce a narrative of childlike innocence preserved only through the power and benevolence of the (Han) Chinese government.

I asked our tour guide if a member of an ethnic minority might one day rise to the level of CCP general secretary. At first, the question itself confused her, and I had to keep repeating it in differing formats. Eventually, however, she just shook her head and told us “no.”

As we drove further into Yunnan province from the capital city of Kunming, the widespread effects of China’s domestic tourism agenda became more apparent. Each small village we stopped at boasted an “ancient town” – a pedestrian pavilion designed to appear as a charming relic from an antiquated time – filled with stores owned by Han transplants selling identical factory-made knickknacks. These ancient towns are the product of “folklorization,” wherein the particularities of a (minority) culture as it has historically been lived in a certain place are simplified into little more than a stylized picturesque photo opportunity. And, indeed, photo opportunities did abound. Ancient towns bustled with young Han women who had rented minority costumes to walk around the picturesque setting. Many had hired photographers – usually local, minority men – to take dramatic photos of them as “tribal princesses” for sharing on social media. In Shangri-la, a historically Tibetan town that was renamed by the provincial government in 2001 to match the fictional paradise depicted in James Hilton’s 1933 novel “Lost Horizon,” I watched one such “tribal princess” unsure what to do with the Tibetan prayer wheel she had been handed as part of her costume. Continually tossing it in the air and trying to catch it again, she seemed uninterested in engaging with the Tibetan culture around her any more than necessary for the photo.

Smithsonian Institute folklorist Peter Seitel identifies this disinterest as a crucial feature of “folklorization.” When folklorized products and cultures are understood to be “other” to a dominant culture they are rendered “not as complex or meaningful as the products of high, elite, or official cultural processes.” Such items, therefore, are viewed as little more than a prop for photos.

The Policing of Minorities

The replacement of minority culture with a government simulacrum is aided by the startlingly effective use of facial recognition and virtual monitoring software to further isolate individuals from authentic relationships with minority peoples. After the government changed our itinerary, I immediately messaged my research contacts and friends on WeChat, the ubiquitous social media app popular in China. Explaining our experience honestly in writing over a virtual network, however, could raise the attention of an observation bot or a Public Security Bureau (PSB) officer and put my contacts in danger.

As a result, we had very coded conversations, where any significant communication had to be hidden between the lines of pleasantries. After explaining that it was “unsafe” to travel to western Sichuan due to weather and that I was disappointed that I could not see my friends, they assured me that “Yunnan is beautiful this time of year.” I understood with this message that there was nothing that could be done to get me to my fieldwork site.

While I’ve always had some concerns about observation while traveling in China, my fears were more pronounced on this most recent trip. On July 1, 2024, China introduced a law that PSB officers and border agents can look through laptops and cellular phones without a warrant. Knowing that I had potentially already been graylisted and could be under special scrutiny, all texts, social media posts, and emails had to be circumspect and speak in shadow language lest a PSB agent pick up any concerning words or phrases at a casual glance.

In practice, this took the unlikely form as encoding my research notes during travel in the form of a “Dungeons & Dragons” adventure, where an adventuring party (my husband and I) traveled through a potentially hostile place (the Vagosi Empire) to learn about a small minority culture (the Erinvale tribe). I hoped the language of swords and spells might confuse a PSB agent looking for a specific list of banned topics.

Similarly, China’s lauded facial recognition software became a constant source of anxiety whenever I spoke with Tibetans and other minorities. Because my husband and I were Americans, some individuals I met on our tour felt comfortable sharing candid thoughts about the CCP government, the political situation for minorities, or the limits on religious freedom that have become normalized in China. In previous times, such conversations would become important parts of my research highlighting the lived practice of minority religious life in China.

While writing my research notes, however, I realized how the new facial recognition software meant that it was impossible to fully anonymize my conversation partners. As a result, I could never discuss their experiences or share their voices in my research. In these ways, just the threat of the Chinese police state’s powers creates a form of self-imposed isolation that not only achieves their goal of silencing criticism, but also bars those outside of China from hearing authentic experiences and opinions from minority cultures.

Conclusions

After three weeks of travel through Yunnan, I was denied access to actual minority culture and instead shown a state-approved rendering of minority cultures. These simulacra are built for an audience of Han tourists and promote the distorted image of a unified, multiethnic China. Previously China’s ethnic minorities had enjoyed some agency in how they presented themselves and the freedom to express authentically their own culture, but as we toured staged “ancient towns” and sat through stylized minority dance performances, it was apparent this was the minority culture China wanted us to see.

In her work on state-led economic development among ethnic minorities in China, Charlene Makley has described the “silent pact” between Tibetans and Han Chinese in the People’s Republic of China. By remaining silent on the complex histories between the two communities and the implications inherent to competing structures of religious and political authority, both communities have been able to maintain an uneasy peace that provides the ground for mutual economic prosperity, at least in theory. Such a pact exists between many ethnic minorities and the CCP government. My trip demonstrated, however, that this unspoken arrangement has also laid the groundwork for a more insidious transformation of culture. No longer is it only political and religious histories that are not being discussed, but authentic cultural self-expression as well. Where the silent pact had existed previously, there now was a silent wall.

In a cruel twist of timing, my travel coincided with the closure of one of the last remaining private Tibetan schools – a bastion of Tibetan culture and one of the very last places in China where classes could be taught, at least in part, in the Tibetan language. Some social media commentators called it the start of a “second cultural revolution.” Among my colleagues who study Tibetan culture, there have been quiet discussions of looking for new research sites outside of China that are less politically volatile. We have the privilege to make that decision, but it only leaves Tibetan friends and colleagues within China further isolated.

The night I discovered I would be unable to pursue my fieldwork, I lay awake obsessively digging through my past to try and understand what might have made me problematic in the eyes of the Chinese government. Was it that article I published using social theory to highlight how the CCP was secularizing Tibetan culture to serve the needs of a multiethnic state? Was it the conference I attended in Dharamshala at which the Dalai Lama had unexpectedly been a guest? Was it the blog article I shared on my social media about the protests in Derge aimed at protecting several important Buddhist monasteries from a planned hydroelectric dam?

Above all, my mind kept returning to my friends and Tibetan colleagues trapped behind the new silent wall of the Chinese police state. As an international student at Tibet University early in my academic career, I had watched Tibetan friends gathering every Friday night to dance together the traditional circle dances from their home villages. Those memories remain for me a powerful expression of a people working to maintain their traditional culture in a hostile environment. Now, 15 years later and staring at the ceiling of a Chengdu hotel room, I wondered to myself if they were still dancing on that night – not for Han tourists or white friends stumbling through conversations in broken Tibetan, but for themselves – desperately fighting to preserve their culture as a government sought to box it ever more into a neatly packaged commodity.

China Is Recalculating Its Middle East Policy

14 November 2024, The Diplomat, Tommy Steiner

Iran experiences diplomatic distancing with Chinese characteristics.

Since the October 7th massacre in southern Israel and the outbreak of the war in Gaza, China’s leadership has conveyed outright support in word and deed for the Iran-led “Axis of Resistance.” The display of strategic vulnerability by Iran and its proxies since mid-August appears to have prompted Beijing to pause and reassess. Upon return from the National Day holiday in early October, China’s official messaging on Iran noticeably shifted. This adjustment has been further underscored by commentary from Chinese policy advisers specializing in the Middle East.

As events on the ground led to a review of its Middle East policies, China is refraining from outright public support of Iran and the Axis of Resistance it leads, at least for the time being. This is borne out by the striking difference between China’s response to Iran’s missile and unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) attack on Israel in mid-April and its reaction to the latest ballistic missile attack on Israel by Iran on October 1. Similarly, the Chinese response to Israel’s retaliatory strike on Iran on October 28 reflected this revised approach. While the Foreign Ministry refrained from condemning Israel per se for its most recent attack, one of China’s most respected Middle East policy advisers all but justified it in an op-ed published in the China Daily.

A Tale of Two Telephone Calls

The day after the first Iranian drone and missile attack on Israel, on April 15, China’s Foreign Minister Wang Yi held a phone call with his then-Iranian counterpart, Hossein Amir-Abdollahian, and showcased China’s steadfast support to Iran. The Chinese Foreign Ministry’s official readout quoted Wang as all but endorsing Iran’s barrage of drones and missiles on Israel:

China has noted that Iran stated that the actions taken by Iran were limited and that it was exercising its right to self-defense ... China appreciates Iran’s emphasis on not targeting regional countries and neighboring countries, and reaffirming its continued pursuit of a policy of good-neighborliness and friendship. China believes that Iran can handle the situation well and avoid further destabilization while safeguarding Iran’s sovereignty and dignity.

Less than six months later, Beijing changed its stance. In the midst of the Chinese national holiday, on October 2, in response to Iran’s mass missile attack on Israel, the Foreign Ministry’s spokesperson in response simply stated that “China is deeply concerned about the turbulence in the Middle East.”

Following mounting international reports regarding potential Israeli retaliatory operations against Iran, on October 9, the Chinese ministry's spokesperson reiterated the "deep concerns" over the instability in the Middle East and the need to prevent escalation. At the daily briefing, a reporter's pointed question, which included extreme scenarios of Israeli attacks on Iran's strategic sites and anticipated harsh criticism of Israel, resulted only in a measured expression of concern. The spokesperson merely called on all parties to "manage the current situation in a calm, rational and responsible manner from the perspective of preserving regional peace and stability." This response amounts to China diplomatically distancing itself from Iran.

Five days later, on October 14, Wang called up his new Iranian counterpart, Abbas Araghchi. This time around, the official Chinese readout of the call conspicuously avoided any possible hint or suggestion that China approves of Iran's missile attacks. While the readout commended Tehran's diplomatic outreach to Arab countries, it implied subtle criticism noting that China "opposed taking adventurous military actions and called on all parties to do more to maintain regional peace and stability." Beijing's readout even seemed to present Iran as apologetic, stating that the Iranian minister promised to strengthen communication and coordination with China to "cool down" the regional situation. Rather than demonstrating close China-Iran relations, the call reinforced Beijing's new "even-handed" approach toward Iran.

China's Tempered Stance Toward Israel

The distancing of Iran was reinforced by the parallel toning down of Chinese animosity toward Israel, which had become rife since the October 7 massacre. The linkage between the diplomatic distancing of Iran and toning down criticism toward Israel was demonstrated on the day China's foreign minister spoke with his Iranian counterpart – a conversation that came after a call between Wang and Israel's foreign minister, Israel Katz.

The most striking example of this rhetorical adjustment is the formal statement by Lin Jian, the Chinese Foreign Ministry's spokesperson, following Israel's retaliatory strike on Iran on October 26. In the daily briefing of October 28, Lin sidestepped a leading question asked by a reporter from Russia's TASS that anticipated condemning Israel. The reporter alleged the Israeli attack led to "exacerbating the escalation of the conflict and endangering civilians." Instead, Lin noted that China "opposes infringing upon the sovereignty and security of other countries and opposes resorting to the use of force," and called on "all parties concerned" to "avoid further raising the overall security risks." Despite official condemnations of Israel from Saudi Arabia and the UAE, the spokesperson refrained from even the slightest condemnation.

The Chinese envoy to the United Nations, however, was critical of Israel even though he refrained from specifically and straightforwardly expressing condemnation. Rather, he stated that "China condemns acts that violate Iran's sovereignty and territorial integrity..." Despite his harsh criticism of Israel during the U.N. Security Council hearing convened on October 28, his careful wording spoke volumes.

Chinese Policy Advisers Rethink Iran

This shift in China's official public messaging regarding Iran aligns with public commentary by Chinese policy advisers specializing in the Middle East. Professor Liu Zhongmin, head of the well-respected Middle East Studies Institute at Shanghai International Studies University, asserted that "the Axis of Resistance led by Iran has suffered significant losses and even a complete failure. The export of the revolution by Iran and ideological diplomacy has reached an unsustainable dead end." In a subsequent piece, Liu argued that Iran and its proxies have harmed the Palestinian cause.

Similarly, a researcher from the think tank affiliated with China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the China Institute of International Studies, commented on Iran's nuclear policy. Responding to a statement from an Iranian lawmaker that Iran is considering withdrawal from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, Li Zixin warned that such a move would constitute crossing a red line that goes against Iran's own interests.

Notably, any change in China's public stance on Iran is likely to be limited, at least in the near term. This is not the first time that China has distanced itself from Iran, as it repeatedly sided with the UAE over a bilateral border dispute. Furthermore, a recent study by a Chinese policy adviser contended that the Chinese-Iranian bilateral relationship is held back by "little political mutual trust" and that Beijing is less keen on deepening the relationship than Tehran. Notwithstanding, China has other strategic considerations involving Iran, particularly in Afghanistan, a neighbor of both countries and where Iran holds influence, and in the broader context of China's partnership with Russia, to which Iran contributes militarily.

Is China Recalibrating Its Middle East Ambitions?

The current dynamics – marked by Iranian setbacks and strategic vulnerability – have challenged China's Middle East strategy since October 7. Beijing's steadfast support to Tehran was based on the assessment that Iran and its proxies could advance China's interests and influence in the region by thwarting the Saudi-Israeli normalization.

Furthermore, Chinese policy advisers were confident that Beijing was on the way to assuming a key role in "Middle East Security Governance," as extensively outlined in a paper published by the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. Following Beijing's role in the 2023 Saudi-Iran agreement, Chinese leaders and diplomats considered the Middle East as a key arena for validating one of their key initiatives – the Global Security Initiative (GSI).

Understanding it cannot rely on Iran to advance its strategic interests in the Middle East has had a broader impact on China's approach to the Middle East, even beyond adjusting its rhetoric on Israel. Considering recent Chinese expert commentary that noted the limits on China's influence in the Middle East, this experience may have somewhat curbed Beijing's strategic ambitions in the region, including applying the GSI in the Middle East. Thus, Beijing's shifting position toward Tehran and its Axis of Resistance might well evolve into a strategic turning point in China's Middle East policy.

Analysis: Xi Jinping to keep chasing Chinese dream despite Donald Trump's return

14 November 2024, Nikkei Asia, Katsuji Nakazawa

It was Xi, not Trump, who triggered the accelerating U.S.-China decoupling

It was a prelude to the second round of the Xi Jinping vs. Donald Trump matchup.

Xi, the president and Chinese Communist Party general secretary, sent a congratulatory message to U.S. President-elect Trump shortly after the Republican was voted back into the White House on Nov. 5.

Trump will be formally sworn into office in January for a second four-year term and appears ready to amp up the U.S.'s rivalry with China, which began during Trump's first term.

In his message to Trump, the Chinese leader pointed out that "history tells us that both China and the U.S. stand to gain from cooperation and lose from confrontation," according to a Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson.

But the spokesperson denied a U.S. media report that Xi called Trump to congratulate him on his U.S. presidential election victory.

Xi took the party's helm in November 2012. When the first round of the Xi-Trump matchup began about eight years ago, Xi was rapidly consolidating power while serving his first five-year term as China's supreme leader.

He was also seeking to further boost his political standing at home. At the time, everything seemed to be going smoothly for him.

In fact, he acquired a special status that put him on par with Mao Zedong, the founding father of "a new China," or the People's Republic of China, and Deng Xiaoping, who initiated and promoted "reform and opening-up."

The sixth plenary session, or plenum, of the party's 18th Central Committee, ended on Oct. 27, 2016, after positioning Xi as the "core" of the party. Less than two weeks later, Trump won his first presidential election.

At the time, China perceived Trump, a business tycoon, as "a merchant," and thought he would be easier to deal with than Hillary Clinton, his Democratic opponent in the election. Clinton had taken a tough stance toward Beijing regarding human rights and democracy.

With Trump's defeat of Clinton, however, China and Xi personally were expecting favorable relations with the U.S.

In the eight years since, Xi has lost some of his momentum. The cult of personality built around him within the party now shows signs of weakening, and the Chinese economy is weakening.

Popular opinion might be that Trump's China policy, which delivered a serious economic blow to China, was to blame for the U.S.-China decoupling. Even in China, many people believe the root cause of the decoupling lies in Trump's China policy.

But the truth is that the decoupling was triggered by China long before Trump's first presidency. Trump's high-profile China policy just made it apparent and accelerated matters.

Xi made an important remark leading to the decoupling 12 years ago. It came during the party's 18th national congress in November 2012, immediately before he was elected as party general secretary.

Then-Vice President Xi warned during the congress that the Chinese economy was being "hijacked" by the U.S. and pledged to correct the situation.

Xi sounded his warning in secret and off the record. But it was in the era of his predecessor, Hu Jintao, when unfettered discussions were still possible as long as they were held only within the party. Xi's "hijacked" remark was leaked and became widely known.

As he pledged in November 2012, Xi began maneuvering to gradually weaken strong U.S. influence over China's economy and to eventually realize the "Chinese dream" of becoming the world's most powerful country.

After becoming China's leader, Xi started to pursue the country's economic self-reliance and technological hegemony more clearly than expected. These ambitions received fresh attention amid the trade war between China and the U.S. under the first Trump administration.

At the party's 19th national congress in 2017, Xi also declared China "will basically realize socialist modernization by 2035," bringing forward China's modernization target by about 15 years.

Previously, China had targeted 2049 – the 100th anniversary of the People's Republic of China's founding – to catch up with and overtake the U.S. militarily and economically.

Alarmed by China's ambitious 2035 target, the Trump administration began to launch counterattacks, as symbolized by its trade war with China.

Setting the target of realizing the Chinese dream by 2035 also had a significant political meaning: Xi would remain at the helm until the 2030s.

After the 2035 target was set in 2017, Xi's extended reign, not only beyond the party's 20th national congress in 2022 but also beyond its 21st national congress in 2027, began to be perceived as a fait accompli.

Only several months after the 2035 goal was set at the party's 19th national congress, Xi also pushed through a constitutional revision to allow presidents to serve more than two five-year terms. The surprise revision has paved the way for Xi to be crowned president for life.

There was another important development related to decoupling at the party's 19th national congress in 2017.

The "comprehensive national security concept" was enshrined in the party's constitution. This made clear national security came before the economy. As such, national security-related legislation was considerably strengthened.

In China, the term "security" covers a range of concerns, including regime security. China remains vigilant against a color revolution, which refers to the democratization protests that began sweeping through the former Soviet Union and other countries at the turn of the century, toppling some long-time dictatorships. Many of these mass movements were named after colors or flowers.

When Xi talks about national security, he is saying he intends to stamp out any such movement early on.

Xi's security state has heaped enormous pressure on private companies in China. Four years ago, the initial public offering of Ant Group – the financial subsidiary of Alibaba Group Holding – was suddenly shelved. Market players speculate it was because Alibaba founder Jack Ma had made a critical remark about China's financial authorities.

Xi, 71, is strong-willed and stubborn. He tends to barrel ahead with some policies regardless of how they impact the Chinese economy.

As a result, the situation in which Xi saw the Chinese economy being "hijacked" by the U.S. has drastically changed since the president first expressed a sense of crisis 12 years ago.

The U.S.-China decoupling has progressed at a far faster pace than expected. Amid the ongoing process, the flow of foreign direct investment into China from the free world, led by the U.S., has been on a downward trend.

Trump returns to the White House in January. During his election campaign, he vowed to impose import tariffs of as high as 60% on Chinese goods. He also slapped high tariffs on imports from China during his first presidency, sparking a tit-for-tat tariff war between the countries.

When he takes the presidency again in two months, Trump will find a Chinese economy that is in dire straits, quite different than the juggernaut it was in 2017, when Trump's first four-year term began. However, despite Trump's tariff threat, abandoning China's self-reliance is not an option for Xi.

Furthermore, as the decoupling has accelerated far faster than expected, the probability of China overtaking the U.S. economically by 2035 has considerably declined.

Xi still has no choice but to go full throttle toward the 2035 goal. If he fails to realize his Chinese dream, questions will be raised about whether he will be able to extend his rule beyond 2027, when the party's 21st national congress convenes.

Trump's second administration, which goes to January 2029, presents a big external hurdle to Xi and his 2035 timeline. The Chinese president is thus bracing for the return of the unpredictable and freewheeling "merchant."

Future global economy to be shaped by India, China: Experts

14 November 2024, Deccan Herald

Experts shared their views and opinions on the two countries at the inaugural workshop pointing out that China and India, the world's first and third-largest economies by purchasing power parity, wield immense global influence.

Singapore: Singapore and the Southeast Asian region should continue to closely engage with both India and China, given the two countries' vital roles in regional growth and development, the city state's Senior Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Sim Ann said on Thursday.

She underlined the significance of China and India as economic powerhouses and pivotal players on the global stage at an inaugural event for a series by two think tanks that are to examine key issues related to China and India and their roles in the global economy.

The senior Singaporean minister was speaking at the launch of the series 'China and India: Two Giants Shaping the Global Economy' to be held jointly by the East Asian Institute (EAI) and the Institute of South Asian Studies (ISAS) at the National University of Singapore (NUS).

Experts shared their views and opinions on the two countries at the inaugural workshop pointing out that China and India, the world's first and third-largest economies by purchasing power parity, wield immense global influence.

The two countries together account for 35 per cent of the global population and are projected to contribute 50 per cent of global economic growth in 2024.

The launch event was also addressed by leading experts, scholars and researchers, including Dr Li Li, Deputy Director of the Institute of International Relations (IIR) at Tsinghua University, and Professor C Raja Mohan, Visiting Research Professor at ISAS.

EAI Director Alfred Schipke said, "China and India stand as pivotal pillars in the global economic landscape, their combined potential driving half of the world's economic growth in the coming years. As key players in trade and innovation, their influence extends beyond borders, shaping policies and addressing global challenges." The two NUS research institutes will jointly organise workshops and public events to examine China and India's growth strategies and their broader impact on the global economy from a policy perspective by bringing together academics, policymakers, practitioners and business leaders.

ISAS director Iqbal Singh Sevea noted that both India and China are pivotal to the future of digitalisation and the transition to the green economy.

"Overall, the global order is evolving, and the future of the global economy will be shaped by India and China. Thus, we must understand the impact these two countries will have on global trends," he said.

India's Troubled Truce with China

13 November 2024, Project Syndicate, Shashi Tharoor

The recent agreement between India and China ending their years-long military standoff along their shared Himalayan border was motivated, from India's side, largely by economic considerations. But whatever benefits India reaps from increased Chinese investment will probably disappoint – especially given the likely costs.

NEW DELHI – In June 2020, incursions by Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) troops into the fraught borderlands of India's Ladakh region triggered bloody clashes that killed 20 Indian soldiers, plunged bilateral relations to their lowest point in decades, and led to a prolonged military standoff. Now, China and India have reached a truce, though many in India would prefer to hold their applause until they see how it is implemented.

Since the 2020 violence, India has made it clear that bilateral relations would remain frozen until China took steps to restore the status quo ante at the border. After all, China's unprovoked encroachments across the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh are to blame for disturbing the peace in the first place.

To show it meant business, India slowed down approvals of Chinese investments; tightened visa approvals for Chinese nationals; and canceled direct flights between the two countries. Moreover, India toughened its stance on Chinese territorial claims in the Pacific, and made pointed political gestures that were bound to displease China, like responding warmly to the Taiwanese president's congratulatory message after Modi's re-election (China opposes all official interactions between Taiwanese authorities and countries with which it maintains diplomatic relations).

While the recent truce suggests that China has finally gotten the message, it is difficult to shake the impression that India was the more anxious of the two parties to reach an agreement. In fact, India's economic establishment appears largely convinced that, far from pursuing a strategy of decoupling – or at least "de-risking" – vis-à-vis China, India should be using Chinese capital to fill its own investment gaps.

Given that bilateral trade has reached its highest-ever levels, despite the political tensions, it comes as no surprise that India's business community has reportedly been pressing the government to conclude an agreement that would facilitate economic engagement. In July, the government's chief economic adviser openly advocated a strategy that would increase Chinese investments in India and deepen Indian integration into Chinese supply chains.

Over the last few months, a number of straws in the wind indicated that an agreement to end the Ladakh standoff was forthcoming. On September 12, Indian Foreign Minister S. Jaishankar remarked that about 75% of the "disengagement" problems with China along the LAC in eastern Ladakh had been sorted out. Later that day, Ajit Doval, India's national security adviser, met with Wang Yi, the influential director of the Communist Party of China's foreign affairs commission, in St. Petersburg, with indications of an agreement to "work with urgency" to "realize complete disengagement in the remaining areas."

Conciliatory commentaries and statements by China's new ambassador to India in the Indian media reinforced the impression that both sides were attempting to lay the groundwork for reconciliation. And a deal did soon emerge, allowing both China and India to resume patrols along the frontier.

But significant areas of concern remain. For starters, as the political commentator Brahma Chellaney observed, when Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping met on the sidelines of the BRICS Summit in Kazan, just days after the deal was announced, their respective ministries produced very different statements. Whereas India described the accord as a step toward a “multipolar Asia and a multipolar world,” China referred only to a “multipolar world.” The implication was subtle but clear: Asia belongs to China.

More broadly, China’s actions along the LAC have signaled a clear desire to keep India off balance by taking steps to shift the border in ways more favorable to its own interests. This mirrors China’s assertive approach to advancing its territorial ambitions elsewhere along its shared border with India, and in the South China Sea.

It is worth remembering how the last standoff between India and China, focused on the Doklam plateau in Bhutan, ended. India does not claim Doklam, but it does support Bhutan’s claim, which China disputes. Moreover, a major Indian highway runs below the plateau, connecting India’s northeastern states to the rest of the country. So, when China deployed troops to build a Chinese highway in Doklam, India sent troops to stop the project.

In that case, the two sides took just a few months to reach an agreement, which looked much like the recent Ladakh deal. Since then, however, the Chinese outflanked India by building a road elsewhere on the Doklam plateau to achieve the same result. The PLA now overlooks a vital Indian highway.

China’s conduct follows a clear pattern: create new facts on the ground, deploy forces to positions from which they can intimidate (and, potentially, attack) India, and wear India down with protracted diplomacy. In the meantime, encourage India to increase its dependence on Chinese imports and dangle the investment carrot before Indian business leaders.

Yet the promised economic benefits of the two sides’ recent rapprochement are unlikely to materialize. The Chinese have not lifted a finger to address India’s huge bilateral trade deficit – which soared to $101 billion in 2022, from $70 billion in 2021 – or to lower the barriers Indian companies face when trying to access the Chinese market.

Moreover, all indications point to Chinese investment in low-value-added industries, rather than sectors involving technology transfer, even as Chinese companies pursue acquisitions in sensitive sectors in India. There are also massive opportunity costs: greater economic integration with China would surely make India less attractive to global companies seeking to reduce their exposure to the People’s Republic.

Add to that China’s long track record of exporting its way out of economic trouble and weaponizing other countries’ economic vulnerabilities, and it seems clear that India should proceed with caution. Until China credibly demonstrates its good intentions, the truce in Ladakh warrants little celebration.

To China, Trump is ‘poison’

13 November 2024, The Hill, Gordon G. Chang

“Trump and Kamala Harris are two bowls of poison for Beijing,” said Zhao Minghao of Shanghai’s Fudan University, to the Financial Times. “Both see China as a competitor or even an adversary.”

The poison analogy has, unfortunately, caught on in elite Chinese circles.

Renmin University’s Shi Yinhong, one of China’s most widely quoted academics, said China’s hope was that the “lesser of the two evils” would be elected. To the dismay of Chinese leaders who already had to deal with Trump for four years, they have not gotten the preferred outcome and are not looking forward to another term.

During the campaign, Americans perceived Vice President Kamala Harris and former President Donald Trump’s China policies as widely divergent. Chinese observers, on the other hand, viewed them as largely the same.

To China’s Communist Party and its tightly controlled academic community, America has taken on a menacing view. As a result, the gap in perceptions between Americans and Chinese is wide. In the last half-decade, it has appeared to have widened even more so.

Officially, Beijing wants to get along with America. President Xi Jinping, in a congratulatory message to Trump, talked about finding “the right way for China and the United States to get along with each era in the new era.”

Xi’s foreign ministry said China has maintained an unchanging stance toward the U.S.

“China’s policy on the U.S. is consistent,” Mao Ning, foreign ministry spokesperson, said after the election. “We will continue to view and handle our bilateral relations under the principles of mutual respect, peaceful coexistence and win-win cooperation.”

Other official comments have not been so benign. In May 2019, People’s Daily, the party’s self-described “mouthpiece” and most authoritative publication in China, carried a landmark editorial declaring a “people’s war” on America.

Americans may think they can ignore hostile propaganda, but this phrase has had special meaning for the Communist Party.

"A people's war is a total war, and its strategy and tactics require the overall mobilization of political, economic, cultural, diplomatic, military and other power resources, the integrated use of multiple forms of struggle and combat methods," declared a column carried in March 2023 by PLA Daily, an official news website of the People's Liberation Army. The army reports to the Party.

Why does China's ruling organization display such hostility? The Communist Party of China views the U.S. as an existential threat not because of anything Americans have ever said or done but because of who they are and what they stand for.

An insecure ruling organization in Beijing is afraid of the inspirational impact on the Chinese people of America's ideals and form of governance. This means even in the best of times, America's mere existence is considered a direct threat to communist rule.

The perceived threat to the party was heightened when Trump was in the Oval Office. In his first term, he was widely popular among ordinary Chinese in China. There are many explanations for this phenomenon, but the most fundamental, I think, is that he was then – as he is now – abhorred by the privileged.

The Chinese people, therefore, identify with Trump, who led a revolt against America's coastal business, cultural and academic classes.

"I deeply resent the hypocritical smug elites and heartily welcome the return of Trump's salt-of-the-earth approach," said Charles Burton of the Synopsis think tank to me last week. "I think the Chinese people see it the same way as tens of millions of Americans who cast their ballots for the billionaire outsider."

"Trump gives the Chinese people the inspiration that they too can sweep away their elites," Burton added. Moreover, Trump provided ordinary Chinese with a contrast with their leaders. Xi Jinping almost never appears in public except on formal occasions. On the extremely rare occasions when he goes out among the people – as he did in December 2013 when visiting a Beijing steamed bun shop, for instance – the event is staged by propaganda officials.

Xi is always scripted and humorless, speaking in a stilted Communist Party lingo heavily laced with ideological phrasing. His predecessor, Hu Jintao, was even less lifelike. Trump, of course, is the opposite, unfiltered and always ready to break convention. He is the breath (gale-force wind?) of fresh air.

Di Dongsheng of Beijing's Renmin University, in a widely publicized November 2020 live-streamed event in China, spoke about how Chinese leaders had in the past used Wall Street – "the core power of the United States" as he put it – and "old friends" to tell American presidents what to do. Di also said that these links to the White House had been broken during the Trump years. Trump, in short, was not inclined to take advice from East Coast elitists.

So it's no mystery why Chinese leaders think Trump is poisonous. They fear they can't talk to him through their upper-class friends in America – and they want him nowhere near the lower rungs of China.

India needs to leverage Trump's China antipathy

13 November 2024, ORF, Harsh V. Pant, Kalpit A Mankikar

Trump's return raises questions about his China policy, offering India a chance to attract investment amid U.S.-China tensions.

The electoral victory of Donald Trump, and his comeback as the United States (US) president, has led to speculation as to the contours of his administration's policies with respect to the Indo-Pacific region.

US presidents are said to get more ambitious in their second term, and if the past is prologue, Trump 2.0 may have a profound impact on the US's China policy. This is because, in his first term, Trump changed Washington's fundamental engagement with Beijing. Since the normalisation of relations between the two nations in the late 1970s, cooperation in economic, scientific and cultural spheres flourished. Trump mooted de-coupling, meaning the gradual severing of the intertwining between the two.

Under the terms of the trade deal that China signed, it agreed to increase purchases of American products, address issues related to intellectual property, and give American financial institutions greater market access.

He also sought to address challenges in trade, geopolitics and security. The Sino-U.S. trade war escalated on the back of the Trump administration levying tariffs on Chinese imports to reduce the trade deficit. Under the terms of the trade deal that China signed, it agreed to increase purchases of American products, address issues related to intellectual property, and give American financial institutions greater market access. The Trump administration labelled Xi Jinping's China as a strategic rival. Thus, national security concerns became paramount and led to curbs on Chinese investment in sensitive sectors, restrictions on Chinese majors like Huawei and ZTE, and a thrust on countering Chinese influence in telecom networks, cellphone app ecosystems, and cloud computing.

The Biden administration has built on this foundation, constricting flows of sensitive technology, investment and human capital to China. It is also seeking to have its allies on board with the curbs on semiconductors. As Xi's China set much store by technology like electric vehicles, the US hit back with tariffs on the same. Thus, the political agenda across Republican and Democrat administrations has been to escalate measures that China perceives as seeking to contain it.

On the campaign trail, Trump sought to restore American primacy in manufacturing and zeroed in on Xi's China Manufacturing initiative that seeks to build dominance in important sectors like advanced information technology, high-end numerical control machinery, robotics, aviation equipment, maritime engineering technology, sophisticated rail equipment, energy-saving vehicles, electrical equipment, agricultural machinery, biopharmaceuticals and high-performance medical devices. He has called for higher tariffs on Chinese goods. Trump's China perception is also coloured by his notion that Xi's mishandling of Covid-19 led to his rout in the 2020 election. This antipathy may translate into a tumultuous relationship.

The economic slump and deteriorating relations between the US and China have taken the lustre off Beijing as an attractive investment destination for American firms.

For China, Trump's return has stoked worries over its political and economic trajectories. Xi has expressed fears that there may be attempts to dislodge the Communist Party through regime change; this has found resonance even among the general public. Economists speculate that it may not achieve its intended gross domestic product (GDP) growth target of about 5%. The economic slump and deteriorating relations between the US and China have taken the lustre off Beijing as an attractive investment destination for American firms. European businesses operating in China have voiced concerns that diminishing returns for capital invested did not justify the risks of operating in the Chinese market. They believe the problems in the Chinese market will linger unresolved, and they will have to rethink staying invested in China on account of regulatory issues, priority to state-owned businesses in government procurement, market-access hurdles, and overcapacity. This is also compounded by US tech companies exiting China amid geopolitical tensions.

India should try to leverage the churn to its advantage. Prime Minister (PM) Narendra Modi has been one of the first leaders to connect with Trump after his win. Modi has sought to build on the relations developed during the first Trump presidency. The question is can India use the disenchantment of the West with China to attract more investment? Under the first Trump presidency, military cooperation flourished as evidenced by the signing of the foundational agreements. While India and China have taken steps to address the military standoff along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), Delhi must improve its defence-industrial complex to bolster its deterrent potential. A defining feature of Trump's first term was the emergence of minilaterals in the Indo-Pacific. Under Trump, Quad was resurrected in 2017. As Pakistan goes under, and terrorism re-emerges in Kashmir, India must engage with Trump who was receptive to Indian concerns in his first innings. There can be much closer cooperation between Washington and New Delhi on India's neighbourhood where divergences have been slowly emerging in the last few years.

Trump's return to White House spells uncertainty for U.S.-China relationship

12 November 2024, CBC, Lisa Xing

Policies could jeopardize trade relations, allow Beijing to assert itself on global stage

Donald Trump's return to the White House is sure to be felt globally, including in China — one of the United States' biggest trading partners and an emerging superpower on the world stage.

The uncertainty of the next few years could be seen in the response from Beijing.

As Chinese President Xi Jinping congratulated Trump on his Nov. 5 election win, he also issued a warning, saying the two countries "gain from co-operation and lose from confrontation," according to a post on X, formerly Twitter, from Xie Feng, China's ambassador to Washington.

"There's no formula," said Lynette Ong, a distinguished professor in Chinese politics at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs and Public Policy. "[Trump's] brand is ... a lack of predictability."

During Trump's first term as president after his election in 2016, the relationship between him and Xi began jovially but crumbled during the COVID-19 pandemic and an ensuing trade war. It wasn't until November 2023 that relations began to normalize after Xi and U.S. President Joe Biden met in San Francisco on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation summit.

The incoming president, though, who won a sweeping victory over Kamala Harris a week ago, has repeatedly vowed to impose punishing tariffs of up to 60 per cent on imports from China, which would further disrupt the already weakened Chinese economy.

Geopolitical implications also loom for Trump's second term, especially if he continues to withdraw from the international stage, putting Taiwan's future in question.

"There's definitely a lot of anxiety among businesses in China and also in Beijing among the leaders," said

Jia Wang, senior fellow and senior adviser at the China Institute at the University of Alberta in Edmonton.

Trade implications

The foremost, and likely most immediate concern, is the issue of trade, as Trump indicated in February in an interview with Fox News that he plans to slap 60 per cent tariffs on all Chinese imports (along with a blanket 10 per cent tariff on all imports into the U.S.) – a blow to the world's second-largest economy.

Not only are the rates higher than the tariff of up to 25 per cent levied during his first term, but China's economy isn't as resilient as it was during that period. Since the pandemic, there has been a downturn in the country's real estate market with slumping home prices and sales, along with rising government debt and unemployment.

The Biden administration stayed the course, imposing a 100 per cent surtax on Chinese-made electric vehicles, 50 per cent on computer chips and 25 per cent on EV batteries, aluminum and steel. Canada matched the 100 per cent tariff this fall, to mixed reviews from analysts, and a 25 per cent surtax on steel and aluminum imports from China began on Oct. 15.

"There's going to have to be more focus on the [Chinese] domestic economy," said Han Shen Lin, who works in Shanghai as the China country director for Washington-based consultancy firm The Asia Group.

Indeed, China has been trying to do just that. As recently as this past summer, officials like Premier Li Qiang said the country would focus on diversifying its markets and boosting domestic demand instead of relying on exports as trade tensions escalate globally. It has rolled out various stimulus measures in recent months.

Considering China exported in excess of $400 billion US worth of goods to the United States in 2023, according to the United States Census Bureau, focusing on consumption domestically won't happen overnight.

"They will require a tremendous amount of consumer confidence," the University of Alberta's Wang said.

U.S. could turn inward

While China is attempting to transition its economy, the geopolitical landscape could also shift if Trump's first term is any indication, potentially benefiting Beijing.

Under Trump, the U.S. withdrew from multiple international agreements, including the Paris Agreement on climate change, the Trans-Pacific Partnership and the United Nations Human Rights Council.

If he continues to turn inward, there would be a shift in global governance, leaving a power vacuum that China could step up to fill with less resistance from a Western ally system led by the U.S.

"China could take this opportunity to make more friends or at least reduce rivals and enemies," Wang said.

This is an undertaking that's already underway, the latest example being a meeting in October between Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Xi Jinping – the first in five years due to various border disputes. (India may have had its own reasons for the rapprochement.)

"We believe that the India-China relationship is very important, not only for our people but also for global peace, stability and progress," Modi said in October.

The Taiwan question

According to Lin of The Asia Group, there could be an "atrophy of the alliance system."

With that, China may also have an opportunity to assert its presence in its own sphere of influence, including in the Pacific, putting the future of Taiwan into question.

Under the "One China" policy, Beijing views Taiwan as part of the country, not an independent state, frequently touting "reunification."

Although it has no formal diplomatic relations with Taiwan, the U.S. has unofficially maintained ties and commits to its defence.

In 2016, Trump famously drew ire from China after taking a phone call from then-Taiwanese president Tsai Ing-wen after winning the White House, becoming the first U.S. president (and president-elect) to speak to a Taiwanese leader since the 1970s.

In October, he told the Wall Street Journal that China would not dare provoke the Republican leader because President Xi Jinping knows he is "f-king crazy."

However, on a recent episode of the Joe Rogan Experience podcast, Trump mused that Taiwan should pay Washington for its defence and routinely accused it on the campaign trail of stealing the U.S.'s semiconductor industry, threatening soaring tariffs.

Currently, analysts estimate that about 90 per cent of the world's advanced chips are manufactured by Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Company.

Considering the lack of consistency and the president-elect's previous non-interventionist stance, some say he could lose sight of the island as he focuses on the relationship with Beijing.

"He might forget [about defending Taiwan] completely," the University of Toronto's Ong said. "That will send a very kind of strong signal to China that Taiwan is up for grabs."

This time around, Taiwan was quick to deny that its current president, Lai Ching-te, was going to make a similar phone call, a likely indicator of the fragility of the relationship this time around.

"I don't think Taiwan has a lot of allies around the world aside from the United States, so it's actually fairly weak," Ong said.

At a routine press briefing following Trump's election, officials with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs reiterated that "China firmly opposes any form of official interaction between the United States and Taiwan."

"The U.S. government should abide by the One China principle," warned spokesperson Mao Ning.

What the Trump administration's approach will be will also depend on the people he appoints. On Tuesday, Trump said he picked retired Army Green Beret Mike Waltz as national security adviser, a China hawk and prominent critic.

"We still hope that people at the top have some degree of sensibility," said Ong.

How does Canada factor in?

With Trump in office, Beijing's relationship with Ottawa may be put on the back burner as leaders manage their ties with the U.S.

However, there's another outcome, according to Wang, who said the possibility of a weakened Canada-U.S. relationship and a more uncertain future could lead to China strengthening its ties outside of the Pacific region.

"Canada may also have an increased incentive to look elsewhere in the world," she said.

The Next Dalai Lama: Preparing for Reincarnation and Why It Matters to India

11 November 2024, Carnegie India, Vijay Gokhale

The aim of this paper is to look beyond the India-China dynamic on the Dalai Lama and Tibet, to how the PRC shapes its approach to the reincarnation question based on its broader domestic and foreign policy. This paper identifies the key questions that might assist policy makers in India to generate appropriate policy to handle the same.

Introduction

His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama is eighty-nine years of age. He has been living in exile since 1959. He assures his followers that he will live for several more years, possibly until he is 113.<sup>1</sup> Since the early 1980s, there have been attempts by the Dalai Lama to reconcile with the People's Republic of China (PRC). Thus far, these efforts have not borne fruit. Although a reconciliation in the future that might permit him to return to Tibet cannot be ruled out, the likelihood of this happening appears to be remote. He could likely pass away in exile. In 2022, he said that he would prefer to die in a free and democratic country like India rather than be surrounded by Chinese officials at the time of his death.<sup>2</sup>

As a Living Buddha, he is expected to reincarnate, but the question of his succession remains shrouded in uncertainty since the current Dalai Lama has forewarned of the possibility that the line might end with him. He has also indicated at various times that he might reincarnate outside Tibet. The PRC, which has ruled Tibet since 1950, says there will be a successor to the 14th Dalai Lama and that the next incarnation will be born inside China and approved by the Chinese government.

The question of who selects the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama is debatable. Tibetans reject the idea that China has the authority to exercise legal jurisdiction over the process of selecting the Dalai Lama (and other Living Buddhas of Tibet). The PRC claims that the imperial ordinance of 1793 (known as the Imperially Approved Ordinance for Better Governance of Tibet or the 29-article Ordinance) stipulates the procedure for the reincarnation of the Living Buddhas (including the Dalai Lama) and subjects the selected candidate to approval by Beijing.<sup>3</sup> However, it is a fact that the Golden Urn method of selecting the Dalai Lamas, stipulated by the 1793 imperial ordinance, was only selectively applied in the cases of the 11th and 12th Dalai Lamas but was dispensed with for the 9th, 13th, and 14th Dalai Lamas.<sup>4</sup>

If the current Dalai Lama chooses to reincarnate, possibly outside the territory of the PRC, and another reincarnation is selected by the PRC, more than one reincarnation of the 15th Dalai Lama could co-exist.<sup>5</sup> This situation will be monitored with great interest in India, where the Dalai Lama has been residing since 1959. His presence has been a continuing sore point in India's relations with the PRC. After his passing, a sizeable Tibetan community-in-exile will continue on Indian soil. Should the reincarnation either be found in or relocated to India, it might complicate relations in light of China's declaration that the reincarnation must be found with its prior approval within sovereign Chinese territory. One study supposes that the PRC would probably demand the closure of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) as well as Tibetan educational and cultural institutions located in India. The possibility that the PRC will try to split the exile community by infiltrating and influencing Buddhist monasteries and communities in India's Himalayan region will have security implications for India.<sup>6</sup>

The reincarnation question has salience for India. Tibetan Buddhism has a significant Indian following in the Himalayan states, and controversy over the selection of the next Dalai Lama could have domestic reverberations. There is also a significant Tibetan population that has been residing in India—which is the result of the poor handling of Tibetan issues by the PRC—and India has an interest in an orderly transition taking place for Tibet's highest-ranking spiritual leader. Hence, the policy question of how India might handle such a situation, should it arise, is of crucial importance domestically as well as for the future relationship between India and the PRC.

In India, the issue of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation is usually viewed from a bilateral perspective—as either giving India leverage vis-à-vis China or imposing a burden upon it in the context of India–China relations. It presumes that India's posture on the sensitive matter of the reincarnation could be central to the crafting of the PRC's policy in a post-14th Dalai Lama scenario. This approach attributes a passive or reactive role to the PRC. The aim of this paper is to look beyond the India–China dynamics on the Dalai Lama and Tibet and at how the PRC shapes its approach to the reincarnation question based on its broader domestic and foreign policy needs so that India might generate appropriate policy to handle the same.

The paper is divided into four sections. The first part examines how the evolution of Chinese policy toward religion in general, and Tibetan Buddhism in particular, since 1949 is shaping Chinese thinking on the question of the next Dalai Lama. The second part looks at how external factors, in particular the approach of the United States toward Tibetan Buddhism and the Dalai Lama, has impacted the Chinese policy on Tibet, and how the current state of U.S.–China relations might shape the PRC's approach on the reincarnation issue. The two sections identify domestic and external drivers of Chinese policy on the issue at hand. The third part looks at the history of India–China relations with respect to the Dalai Lama and how both countries have handled the matter. It seeks to draw some broad learnings from the past sixty-five years of interaction between the two countries after the Dalai Lama came to India. The last part of the paper identifies some of the policy questions that India might need to handle in order to shape a coherent and stable policy in a post-14th Dalai Lama scenario. The paper concludes that the PRC's policy on the Dalai Lama and the reincarnation question is not primarily driven by India's actions or policy. The primary drivers are the overriding domestic requirement of politico-social stability in an ethnically distinct borderland region and the external dynamics of the U.S.–China competition. The PRC has tolerated the Dalai Lama's presence in India so long as it does not impinge on the two critical concerns of social stability and Sino–U.S. competition. A unilateral gesture of goodwill that India might show after the passing of the 14th Dalai Lama, (for example, possibly disallowing the Dalai Lama's chosen successor from living in India or officially acknowledging the PRC's candidate as the successor to the 14th Dalai Lama) is unlikely to change the PRC's policy toward India. The passing of the 14th Dalai Lama will also bring a material change in the India–China–Tibet equation because they might not agree on the next incarnation. This is likely to raise important questions for which India needs to develop policy responses in advance of the event. Given his age and health, critically thinking through these questions ought not to be postponed.

Part I: Religion in China and the Chinese Communist Party

Prior to 1949, religion did not prominently figure in Mao Zedong's conversations and speeches. His priority was to establish communist rule in China, including over the minority regions like Tibet.<sup>7</sup> As Mao put it, the minority regions comprised over half the territory of China; they were resource-rich, and located in the borderlands.<sup>8</sup> Hence, the establishment of Chinese control over Tibet was the priority and not the religious question.

So far as general religious policy was concerned, apart from the fact that religion was antithetical to communism, the newly established PRC took a relatively benign approach. They needed support from all segments of the population and accepted the influence of religion in Chinese society as a reality. In April 1945, Mao Zedong told the 7th National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) that, "all religions are permitted in China's liberated areas in accordance with the principle of freedom of religious belief. All believers in Protestantism, Catholicism, Islamism, Buddhism, and other faiths enjoy the protection of the people's government so long as they are abiding by its laws."<sup>9</sup> The CCP's policy toward religious groups in China was conditioned by two priorities—social stability and national security. In the former case, the party felt that the nexus between entrenched feudal interests and religious groups might be an obstacle to the CCP's efforts to establish complete control over society. In the latter case, their concern was that foreign domination of religious organizations inside China could become conduits for opposition. In such cases, the party applied restrictions and took action against religious groups.

Since the CCP's priority in Tibet was to gain political control, plans were made to attack Tibet immediately after the establishment of the PRC in 1949.<sup>10</sup> Mao personally approved these plans.<sup>11</sup> Following the People's Liberation Army's invasion in October 1950, the Tibetan government was compelled to negotiate the Agreement of the Central People's Government and the Local Government of Tibet on Measures for the Peaceful Liberation of Tibet (known as the Seventeen-Point Agreement). It brought the Tibetan people into the "big family of the motherland—The People's Republic of China," and accorded autonomous status to Tibet but only as a “local government” under the leadership of the central authority in Beijing.<sup>12</sup>

The CCP did not trust the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan Buddhist clergy but was conscious that their hold over Tibet was tenuous and that they lacked the material means to administer complete control over Tibet. They needed to consolidate before tackling the Dalai Lama. In April 1952, an inner-party directive was sent by the party’s central committee to the southwest bureau (in charge of Tibet), which acknowledged that, “while they [the Dalai Lama’s government] are inferior to us in military strength, they have an advantage over us in social influence. We should . . . put off the full implementation of the agreement.” The priority was to “take proper steps to win over the Dalai and the majority of his top echelon . . . in order to achieve a gradual, bloodless transformation of the Tibetan economic and political system over a number of years.”<sup>13</sup> There was no direct move to interfere with Tibetan Buddhism, although they began to undermine the Dalai Lama’s influence in other ways.<sup>14</sup> The soft approach taken by the PRC in the early 1950s is reflected in the Dalai Lama’s statement that Mao was a fatherly figure with whom he had good relations.<sup>15</sup> By the late 1950s, the PRC had grown more confident about its position inside Tibet and had begun tightening its control over Tibetan society. After the Dalai Lama left Tibet in 1959, the PRC introduced repressive policies. In the wake of the Dalai Lama’s flight, Mao’s government confiscated estates belonging to the religious elites and closed down many monasteries. The destruction of monasteries, imprisonment of monks, and banning of worship during the Cultural Revolution (1966–76) is well-documented. It was similar to their approach toward other organized religions inside China (Catholicism, Protestantism, Islam, and Taoism). Thus, religious policy in general during Mao Zedong’s period, as well as more specifically in Tibet, was guided by priorities of domestic political stability and national security rather than Marxist dogma. These remain the fundamental pillars of the PRC’s subsequent religion policy.

After Mao’s passing, the PRC’s religious policy entered its second phase. In March 1982, the party’s central committee formally acknowledged the harsh religious repression and enormous destruction of places of worship in China during the Cultural Revolution. It passed a landmark resolution titled “The Basic Viewpoint and Policy on the Religious Question during Our Country’s Socialist Period.”<sup>16</sup> Commonly known as Document 19, this became the new guideline for all religious policy, including that toward Tibetan Buddhism, under Deng Xiaoping. Document 19 acknowledged the existence of religion inside the PRC, its mass nature, and its entanglement with the ethnic question in the borderlands.<sup>17</sup> It posited a basic question that became the determinant of the PRC’s revised religious policy, namely “can we handle this religious question properly as we work towards national stability and ethnic unity, as we develop our international relations while resisting the infiltration of hostile forces from abroad?”<sup>18</sup> While acknowledging both the domestic (social stability) and international (national security) dimensions, as Mao had done, Deng reoriented religious policy to meet the requirements of the new policy of reform and opening up to the outside world.

The PRC permitted the revival of religious activity by recognized religious groups but set clear limits within which such a revival could proceed. Freedom of religious belief was given constitutional protection in 1982 (Chapter II, Article 36 of the PRC Constitution).<sup>19</sup> But religious establishments were not permitted to repossess their feudal privileges and use religious pretexts to oppose the Communist Party’s leadership, nor to destroy national or ethnic unity. Within the rubric of this broad religious policy, the PRC also began its reengagement with the Dalai Lama. In 1979, with Deng’s approval, the PRC reestablished contact through his brother Gyalo Thondup.<sup>20</sup> Beijing believed that the Dalai Lama’s return to Tibet would confirm China’s sovereign claim to the region. Thondup led the team of the Dalai Lama’s representatives for two exploratory talks (in 1982 and 1984). It did not lead to a wider dialogue between the PRC and the Dalai Lama. The Dalai Lama subsequently built pressure by internationalizing the Tibet question in his speech to the European Parliament in Strasbourg in June 1988 and, in turn, the PRC labeled the Dalai Lama as a “splittist.” But the PRC’s policy toward Tibetan Buddhism broadly remained in line with the overall religious policy.<sup>21</sup> In fact, from the 1980s onward, Chinese strategy gave priority to economically integrating Tibet with the rest of China so that it might reduce the role of religion and the Dalai Lama in the minds of the Tibetan people over time.

Through the 1990s, as a substantial religious revival began in China, regulations were introduced to manage religious affairs, beginning with the party’s central committee’s Document No. 6 in 1991, increasing regulatory control over religious activity. In 1994, under the Regulations on Managing Religious Activities of the State Council (known as Document No. 144), it was made mandatory for religious organizations to register with local governments and to certify that they were free from foreign controls. In 1995, fifteen religious groups (including the Fa Lun Gong) were labelled as “evil cults” and banned.<sup>22</sup> In 1997, the State Council issued a white paper on freedom of religious belief in China, which said that religions must conduct activities within the sphere of the law. Despite tighter regulations, a tolerant perspective was adopted toward the organized religions so long as they operated under the leadership of the State Religious Affairs Bureau and the patriotic religious organizations approved by Beijing. At the National Conference on Religious Affairs in December 2001, general secretary Jiang Zemin called for greater “guidance” to religion but also reminded officials to adhere to the party’s basic line on religious policy and not to use administrative measures to eliminate religion in China.<sup>23</sup> This relatively benign approach to religion was reflected in the party’s handling of Tibetan Buddhism. During Jiang Zemin’s term as president, informal contact was resumed with the Dalai Lama’s representative, which would lead to the establishment of a formal dialogue from September 2002 onward between the party’s United Front Work Department (UFWD) and the Dalai Lama’s chief representative, Lodi Gyari.<sup>24</sup>

China’s overall religious policy entered a transition phase under Jiang’s successor, Hu Jintao. The first signs of the tightening of religious freedoms appeared in 2004 when the State Council passed Decree No. 426 (known as Document No. 6) titled “The Regulations on Religious Affairs.”<sup>25</sup> These regulations decreed that religion in China shall not be used to undermine the country’s social order (Article 3), stipulated enhanced measures for the establishment of new religious institutions, and more strictly regulated the conduct of religious activities (Articles 8 and 12), and made it mandatory for religious clergy to have prior recognition from the state authorities (Article 29). The new regulations did not prohibit external contact but said that these should be nonconditional.<sup>26</sup> For Tibetan Buddhism, the 2004 regulations were also significant because, for the first time, it introduced stipulations on the selection of high-ranking Tibetan lamas. Article 27 of Document No. 6 stated: “The inheritance and succession of the Living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism shall be handled in accordance with religious rituals and historical customs under the guidance of Buddhist groups and reported to the religious affairs department of the people’s government.”<sup>27</sup> This was the first sign that the central leadership was focusing on the reincarnation of ranking lamas of Tibetan Buddhism. While the 2004 regulations did not stipulate any specific procedures for the state to control the process of the selection of Living Buddhas, Article 27 laid the basis for a subsequent set of specific rules on their selection.

In 2007, the State Religious Affairs Bureau issued Order No. 5 titled “Measures on the Management of the Reincarnation of Living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism,” which made it clear that the central government intended to control the entire process of selection and appointment of Living Buddhas.<sup>28</sup> The regulations specified that only registered monasteries in Tibet could apply for Living Buddha reincarnations (Article 3). No group or individual could carry out any activity related to the search or recognition of a reincarnation without authorization from state authorities (Article 7). Any person or group that initiated a search for Living Buddha candidates without prior authorization would be deemed as committing a criminal offense that warranted harsh punishment (Article 11). Furthermore, it was explicitly stated that Living Buddhas with a “particularly great impact” (you tebie zhongda yingxiangde)—such as the Dalai Lama—could only be approved by the highest state organ of the PRC (Articles 5 and 9).<sup>29</sup> From September 1, 2007, the process of reincarnation of all Living Buddhas has been under the complete control of the Chinese central government.

The lack of progress in reconciliation between the Dalai Lama and the PRC is one factor that would explain the party’s decision to enact specific regulations on Living Buddha reincarnations. According to Lodi Gyari, the Dalai Lama’s main negotiator for nine rounds of talks from 2002 until 2010, both sides appeared satisfied until the fourth round of talks in July 2005, after which the Dalai Lama’s representatives saw a hardening of the Chinese position along with a sustained propaganda campaign against him. This hardening coincided with a period of tense rioting that erupted in Tibet in 2008.<sup>30</sup> All this made it less likely that the Dalai Lama would agree to Chinese terms. The tapering off of Chinese hopes about securing a favorable resolution to the Tibetan question through talks, coupled with the Dalai Lama’s advancing age, appears to have triggered the change in policy. Perhaps Chinese leaders kept in mind the controversy that had erupted in the early 1990s over the selection of the 11th Panchen Lama and wished to preempt it when it was time to find the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama.<sup>31</sup>

Since 2013, China’s current leader, President Xi Jinping, has overseen the further tightening of controls over all religious activity in China. This is part of his broader plan to restore the party’s authority and to prevent inimical forces from injecting ideas that are detrimental to the party’s dominance. The Communiqué on the Current State of the Ideological Sphere (also known as Document No. 9), issued in early 2013, has specifically identified “the use of ethnic and religious issues to divide and breakup” China as a challenge to the party’s long-term dominance.<sup>32</sup> Xi has taken steps to deal with it. In May 2015, he convened a United Front Work Conference where he publicly called for the “Sinicization” of religions in China, a call that was repeated at the National Religious Work Conference in April 2016.<sup>33</sup> Xi announced that this process would be managed through laws.<sup>34</sup> Wang Zuo'an, director of the State Administration for Religious Affairs, said that religions in China needed to be guided towards this process of "localization."<sup>35</sup> A slew of legislative and regulatory provisions followed.

In February 2018, the State Council made it mandatory for all religious organizations, instructors, and colleges to register with the state authority and to seek prior permission before establishing religious colleges and conducting teachings and other religious activities at public venues.<sup>36</sup> In February 2020, further regulations titled Measures for the Administration of Religious Groups stipulated that all religious organizations "must follow the leadership of the CCP" (Article 5) rather than simply supporting the CCP leadership as stipulated in the 2018 regulations. It became mandatory for all religious groups to accept the supervision, oversight, and administration of local and central governments (Article 6); to publicize the party's directives and policies and to educate and guide believers toward supporting the party's leadership (Article 17); and to establish study systems for this purpose (Article 25). Each subsequent regulation since 2020 has progressively tightened the scope of religious activity inside China and built pressure on religions to sinicize. These regulations include a prohibition on the distribution of unauthorized domestically generated online religious content without the state's approval (Measures for the Administration of Internet Religious Information Services, March 2021), empowering the state to exercise closer financial supervision over religious institutions (Measures on Financial Management of Venues for Religious Activities, June 2021), and making it mandatory for all religious venues to study Xi Jinping thought (Measures for the Management of Religious Activity Venues, September 2023).<sup>37</sup> The steady advancement of state and party control over all religious activity inside China is also evident in the language of the legislation, which has evolved from "guiding" religious groups in order to support CCP leadership in the 2018 regulations, to the more authoritative "must follow" the CCP leadership in the 2020 regulations, and the definitive "must uphold" (not simply follow) the CCP leadership and sinicize religion in the latest (2023) regulations. They reflect growing concerns within the party leadership that religious activity inside China might prove to be a politically destabilizing force that requires to be reined in since maintaining political and social stability at all costs is the overriding consideration for the Communist Party of China.

In the case of Tibet, concerns over the potentially destabilizing role of Tibetan Buddhism are magnified by the separate ethnic identity of the Tibetans and their geographical location in the borderland. At the Seventh Tibet Work Forum in 2020, Xi made it clear that Chinese policy in Tibet will continue to be based primarily on maintaining security and political stability.<sup>38</sup> This means tighter supervision over Tibetan Buddhism.<sup>39</sup> Since 2011, permanent teams of party cadres have been assigned to all Tibetan monasteries. After 2018, a systematic program to make monks and nuns "politically reliable" is underway.<sup>40</sup> Thus, the overriding concern of ensuring domestic stability that has guided the PRC's overall religious policy is reflected in its treatment of Tibetan Buddhism. In Tibet, ethnic and geographical factors have accentuated the Chinese concerns. The fear that Tibetan irredentism or separatism might be used by external enemies has shaped Chinese policy since the beginning and, as we shall see in the next part, from early on, the PRC has worked its policy to eliminate such a possibility.

The PRC's perception of Tibetan Buddhism from the prism of its domestic stability concerns is a critical (but not the sole) determinant in shaping policy on the selection of the next Dalai Lama.

Part II: The United States, China, and Tibetan Buddhism

Aside from domestic concerns over the undermining of social stability by the established religions in China, the influence of external forces on religions inside the region is also a general concern for the Communist Party. It maintains that Western religions like Catholicism and Protestantism in particular "had long been controlled and utilized by colonialists and imperialists."<sup>41</sup> In 1949, the PRC deported Western missionaries and created "patriotic" religious associations to manage the religious question under direct state supervision.<sup>42</sup>

So far as Tibet was concerned, the ethnic identity gave an edge to the PRC's concerns about the manipulation of Tibetan Buddhism by external forces in order to separate Tibet from China. In the CCP's opinion, the British had encouraged a distinct and separate Tibetan identity after 1911, by acknowledging Chinese "suzerainty" but not "sovereignty" over Tibet and dealing directly with the Dalai Lama's government.<sup>43</sup> The PRC felt that even after Britain's withdrawal from India, the United States continued to pursue efforts to separate Tibet from China by championing the cause of "Tibet independence."<sup>44</sup> Hence, an examination of U.S. policy and its impact in shaping the PRC's attitude toward the Dalai Lama is important.

The United States has had a checkered policy with respect to Tibet. During World War II, the U.S. government disagreed with the British on Tibet's status. In its memorandum to the British government in July 1942, the United States opined that “for the most part the government of the United States has borne in mind the fact that the Chinese government has long claimed suzerainty over Tibet and that the Chinese constitution lists Tibet among areas constituting the territory of the Republic of China. This government has at no time raised a question regarding either of these claims.”<sup>45</sup> The United States did not agree with the Dalai Lama’s request in 1949 for support to the idea of an independent Tibet either.<sup>46</sup> By the early 1950s, American policy had changed because of the Korean War. The United States wanted the Dalai Lama to disavow the Seventeen-Point Agreement (1951) and flee into exile, and said that it would recognize him as the “head of an autonomous Tibet.”<sup>47</sup> The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency financed the Khampa rebellion in eastern Tibet during the mid-fifties. The rebellion failed, but the United States took an important step towards recognizing Tibet’s special status when, after 1959, letters delivered to the Dalai Lama explicitly stated the willingness of the U.S. government “to make a public declaration of its support for the principle of self-determination for the Tibetan people.”<sup>48</sup>

Tibet became marginal to American interests after the U.S.-China rapprochement. When the Dalai Lama wished to visit the United States in 1970, Henry Kissinger, the national security adviser to president Richard Nixon, said that “too close an identification with Tibetan separatist aspirations would rank with our Taiwan policy as key roadblocks to any improvement of relations with communist China.”

The United States Congress became involved in the Tibetan Buddhist cause from the late 1980s. After the end of the Cold War, Bill Clinton became the first U.S. president to officially receive the Dalai Lama in the White House.<sup>50</sup> Clinton raised the issue of religious freedoms in China, including for Tibetan Buddhism, with China’s president Jiang Zemin. In October 1997, president Jiang Zemin told a press conference in Washington that all Chinese citizens had freedom of religious belief.<sup>51</sup> In June 1998, in his second press appearance with Clinton in Beijing, Jiang explicitly said that Chinese constitutional provisions on freedom of religious belief also extended to Tibet. “As long as the Dalai Lama can publicly make a statement and a commitment that Tibet is an inalienable part of China,” said Jiang, “the door to dialogue and negotiation is open. Actually, we are having several channels of communication with the Dalai Lama.”<sup>52</sup> He also publicly confirmed that confidential contacts had resumed between the Dalai Lama’s representatives and the party’s United Front Work Department (UFW).<sup>53</sup> During the second Clinton administration, a new position of special coordinator for Tibetan affairs was created within the State Department. In 2000, the newly established Congressional-Executive Commission on China (CECC) was mandated to maintain regular scrutiny of China’s human rights record and to cooperate with the special coordinator for Tibet in these matters.<sup>54</sup> It signaled the return of a proactive American phase on the Tibet question.

In 2002, the U.S. Congress passed the Tibetan Policy Act (TPA). This was, as Lodi Gyari put it, “not simply a resolution expressing the sense of Congress but rather a binding law requiring action on behalf of the U.S. government.”<sup>55</sup> It was the core legislative measure guiding the U.S. policy on Tibet. It institutionalized the Office of Special Coordinator for Tibetan Affairs, officially encouraged the Chinese government to hold a dialogue with the Dalai Lama, and provided financial support for the preservation of the Tibetan identity.

Since the passage of the TPA in 2002, Tibet has been on the political agenda. Congress enacted the second piece of Tibet legislation, known as the Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TPSA), that president Donald Trump signed into law in December 2020. The TPSA specifically endorsed the right of the Tibetans to select, educate, and venerate their own religious leaders in accordance with their established religious practices and system. It called on the PRC to respect the reincarnation system of Tibetan Buddhism. The act also stated that the PRC’s interference in the process of reincarnation was a “clear violation of the fundamental religious freedoms of Tibetan Buddhists and the Tibetan people,” and asked the U.S. government to take “all appropriate measures to hold accountable senior officials of the government of the PRC or the Chinese Communist Party who directly interfere with the identification and installation of the 15th Dalai Lama.”<sup>56</sup> The special coordinator was mandated to pursue the building of international coalitions to oppose the PRC’s efforts to select Tibetan Living Buddhas and to ensure that the future Dalai Lama is determined solely within the Tibetan Buddhist community. In short, the TPSA 2020 directly took a stand that is contrary to the PRC’s on the question of the Dalai Lama’s reincarnation.

In July 2024, the third and most recent piece of legislation was signed into law by President Joe Biden. The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act (known as the Resolve Tibet Act) authorizes funds for countering Chinese disinformation about the Dalai Lama and urges the PRC to engage in meaningful and direct dialogue with him without preconditions. It reiterates the mandate given to the special coordinator in the TPSA 2020 to “coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward this goal.”<sup>57</sup> The act is also significant because it states that “the U.S. government has never taken the position that Tibet was a part of China since ancient times,” and challenges the statutory definition of Tibet by the PRC as limited to the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR). The Resolve Tibet Act, defines Tibet as the TAR, as well as other Tibetan areas in Chinese provinces (Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan).<sup>58</sup>

These three pieces of American legislation on Tibet since 2002 raise doubts about the historical Chinese claims to Tibet, challenge the PRC’s claim to having locus standi on the future Dalai Lama’s selection and enthronement, and internationalize the Tibet issue by mandating the special coordinator to counter Chinese propaganda and coordinate with foreign governments on pressing the Chinese to have an unconditional dialogue with the Dalai Lama. China has categorically rejected all three pieces of legislation and refused to recognize the special coordinator.<sup>59</sup> China’s foreign ministry said that the TPSA 2020 severely violates the norms governing international relations and is an attempt to interfere in China’s domestic affairs.<sup>60</sup> In response to the Resolve Tibet Act of 2024, the PRC has said that China’s internal affairs “brook no interference by any external forces” and that “no one and no force should ever attempt to destabilize Xizang [Tibet] to contain and suppress China.”<sup>61</sup>

Although the passage of the TPA in 2002 took place when Sino-U.S. relations were in a better shape than they currently are, its significance was not lost on China. It revived concerns about the United States’ intentions with respect to Tibet. In the subsequent raft of domestic legislation on religious policy enacted by the PRC from 2004 onward (detailed in the first part of this paper), the theme of foreign interference and the PRC’s determination to restrict it are palpable.

Article 4 of the 2004 Chinese legislation explicitly states that religious affairs shall not be dominated by foreign forces.<sup>62</sup> Article 2 of the 2007 regulations reiterates this point specifically on the question of the selection of Living Buddhas of Tibet. It states that “reincarnating Buddhas shall not be interfered with or be under the domination of any foreign organization or individual.”<sup>63</sup> The PRC’s efforts to insulate the process from foreign interference have accelerated since President Xi Jinping assumed office in 2013.

Xi called for the “sinocization” of all religions in China at the National Conference on Religious Work (the first to be held after 2001) in April 2016. In this context, he explicitly stated that “we must resolutely guard against overseas infiltration via religious means.”<sup>64</sup> Wang Zuo’an, director of the State Administration for Religious Affairs, has since elaborated on this theme by claiming that the West is using religion to infiltrate the PRC with the objective of changing its political system.<sup>65</sup> Under Xi, the fresh regulations are aimed at eliminating any possibility for foreign involvement in China’s religious affairs. Since 2018, foreigners have been prohibited from establishing religious organizations, setting up religious institutions or sites, recruiting Chinese followers, and engaging in missionary activities inside the PRC.<sup>66</sup> Since 2021, there has been a ban on overseas organizations or individuals from operating online religious services without prior Chinese approval.<sup>67</sup> The Law on Administration of Activities of Overseas NGOs within China also prohibits overseas NGOs from engaging in or sponsoring any religious activities inside China.

These new regulations are stringently applied in Tibet where, aside from limiting the role of foreigners, the state has severely curtailed foreign travel by Tibetans to attend the Dalai Lama’s teachings abroad and pressured the government of Nepal to close its borders to devotees and refugees from Tibet. Strict laws have criminalized self-immolations and those abetting such practices because of the adverse international attention that such acts have attracted in the recent past. Officials have been placed in monasteries for supervision and the “patriotic re-education” of monks and nuns.<sup>68</sup> Meanwhile, the PRC has tightened its grip on the identification and selection process for Living Buddhas. According to a Chinese source, by the end of 2022, ninety-three newly incarnated Living Buddhas have been found inside and approved and recognized by the PRC.<sup>69</sup> Lastly, despite international appeals and the American legislation, President Xi Jinping has not renewed talks with the Dalai Lama.

Thus, the actions of both the PRC and the United States on the Dalai Lama reincarnation question since the beginning of the twenty-first century have made it a significant friction point in their relationship. China’s concerns over American objectives in Tibet and the public support in the United States and the West for the Tibetan cause are strong drivers of the PRC’s policy on the reincarnation question. It is leading to the securitization of the reincarnation, becoming a part of the larger Sino–U.S. competition. It is thus clear that Beijing’s worries over the effectiveness of its control on Tibet and their concerns over American objectives are shaping a hard-line policy on Tibet and the Dalai Lama. This will have important implications for India too.

Part III: A Short Account of Indian and Chinese Approaches to the Dalai Lama

Although India and Tibet had several centuries of spiritual and cultural contact, modern political relations began with the British rule over India. The British interest in Tibet grew from the concern that at the end of the nineteenth century, the Russian Empire was seeking to expand into Southern Asia. The determination of the frontier was crucial to halt the Russian advance north of the great Himalayan range. The matter was complicated by the dynamics between China and Tibet—the Chinese claimed sovereignty over Tibet, and the Tibetans claimed that Tibet had never been a part of China. The British sidestepped the question of Tibet's status by acknowledging Chinese "suzerainty" but not "sovereignty" over Tibet and finalized the Indo-Tibetan frontier as per the traditional and customary line that lay along the highest Himalayan watershed, with the 13th Dalai Lama's government in 1914.<sup>70</sup>

After independence in 1947, the government of India maintained its ties to the Dalai Lama's government. In 1949, India's dilemma, contained in a note from the prime minister, was one of how to "maintain and continue our friendly relations with the Tibetan government" without "taking any measure which might be considered a challenge to the Chinese communist government."<sup>71</sup> India's primary interest was to ensure that the boundary remained unchanged, less so with regard to the survivability of the Dalai Lama's government.<sup>72</sup> This remained the primary Indian objective in Tibet after the Chinese takeover in 1950. The Dalai Lama became a factor in India's policy only much later when he fled into exile.

In contrast, China's primary objective was to seize control over Tibet. They were concerned about Western interference. India, by virtue of its close relationship with the UK, was viewed with suspicion—because not only did the Chinese think that India might interfere, but they also felt that India might be pressured to allow its territory to be used by the West to frustrate the PRC's objective of fully controlling Tibet. At critical times in the 1950s, when their concerns grew over Western interference in Tibetan affairs, Chinese officials and media accused the government of India "as having been affected by foreign influences hostile to China in Tibet," or alleging that India was providing behind-the-scenes support to the West in fomenting the trouble in 1959.<sup>73</sup>

It is worth noting that although the PRC brooked no interference from any foreign power in Tibet, it would ask India from time to time to intervene with the Dalai Lama when this aligned with the PRC's own priorities. In March 1951, former Chinese premier Zhou Enlai personally sought Indian assistance in dissuading the Dalai Lama from leaving Tibet during the negotiations on the Seventeen-Point

Agreement.<sup>74</sup> In 1956, when the Dalai Lama was reluctant to return to Tibet (he had come to India to attend the 2500th anniversary celebrations of the birth of the Lord Buddha), premier Zhou directly requested India's prime minister Jawaharlal Nehru to persuade him to return, adding that, "as long as the Dalai Lama is away [from Tibet] something might happen. . . . This is chiefly instigated by the United States and Taiwan."<sup>75</sup>

Three broad conclusions might be drawn from this recounting of the early history of India-China exchanges on Tibet and the Dalai Lama.

First, from the very beginning, India and China had different objectives in Tibet. Complete control over the Dalai Lama's government and Tibetan society, which were Chinese priorities, was not India's primary concern. For India, its relationship with the Dalai Lama was about ensuring the finality and inviolability of its boundary.

Second, the PRC acknowledged Indian influence on the Dalai Lama. Hence, they sought India's help or involvement when required. At such times, the PRC expected India to assist unconditionally, but it would not reciprocally permit India any relationship with the Dalai Lama on matters of interest to India. In other words, China used the doctrine of "non-interference in internal affairs" selectively.

Third, since the PRC was primarily concerned about American efforts to frustrate their objectives in Tibet, their policy was to neutralize India so that Indian territory was not available to the West to subvert China in Tibet. They soft-pedaled the border issue until they had marginalized India's influence by ending extraterritorial privileges in 1954. In the late 1950s, after the CIA commenced operations inside Tibet, the PRC brought pressure on India to dissociate from such efforts but without directly accusing India of interference (until the Dalai Lama arrived in India), although the Chinese leadership distrusted the government of India's motives in Tibet.

The PRC has continued to follow this pattern in dealing with India on matters relating to the Dalai Lama in certain ways. First, it focuses on securing reaffirmations from India about Chinese sovereignty over Tibet, thus reducing the scope for ambiguity.<sup>76</sup> Second, it accepts the Dalai Lama's presence in India and tolerates the so-called Tibetan government-in-exile (Central Tibetan Administration or the CTA) in return for regular Indian assurances that it does not recognize the CTA or permit the Dalai Lama to engage in anti-China political activity from Indian soil.<sup>77</sup> Third, it seeks to deny the use of Indian soil to the United States for the purpose of subverting the PRC's sovereignty in Tibet. China is also careful not to "provoke" India by accusing it of being a part of the Western "plot" to promote Tibetan "independence." The white paper on Tibet issued by China's State Council in May 2021, for example, does not allege Indian involvement with the United States in efforts to support the Khampa rebellion in the 1950s, nor about India's alleged involvement in the 1959 uprising in Tibet.<sup>78</sup> The official PRC statements are cautious, confining themselves to expressing the hope that India will abide by its assurances of not letting the Dalai Lama engage in political activity or denying the use of its territory to China's adversaries. They also remain mostly silent or make pro forma protests when Indian leaders meet the Dalai Lama.

The PRC does not want to trigger active Indian support to the activities of the Tibetan exile community living in India or create scope for "anti-Chinese western forces" to subvert the PRC's territorial integrity from Indian soil. The Chinese leadership has designed its policy toward India with these objectives in mind.

For its part, India is publicly circumspect in its dealings with the Dalai Lama, but it has not allowed the PRC to stop its support toward preserving the Tibetan way of life or circumscribing the spiritual and religious activities of the Dalai Lama. India's policy is that he is a revered religious leader and is accorded freedom to carry out his religious activities in India.<sup>79</sup> From time to time, India's leadership also receives the Dalai Lama as a spiritual leader and exchanges greetings on special occasions. It permits foreign disciples to attend his teachings and to seek his blessings. It does not prevent visits by foreign government or legislative representatives, but it also does not associate with or endorse them.

India has not taken a public stand so far on the question of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation. It has, however, demonstrated that it is not willing to unconditionally accept the PRC's-anointed Living Buddhas (as in the case of Ugyen Thinley Dorje, the so-called 17th Karmapa Lama). It permits alternative Living Buddha candidates to stay and pursue their claim from India. It also continues to permit the entry of Tibetan refugees, supports Tibetan educational and cultural institutions, and allows the exile community to practice Tibetan Buddhism in whatever manner they choose. The Tibetan community has been able to live, practice, and nurture their culture and civilization unhindered in India for more than sixty years.

India does not formally acknowledge the CTA or the Tibetan parliament-in-exile, but it does not interfere with their lawful activity. It has not taken a position on their demands for self-determination. Nor has India called upon either party to hold dialogue to resolve the matter. Overall, India has sufficiently managed the difficult situation of providing asylum to the Dalai Lama and sustenance to the Tibetan exile community. India's policy has been tolerated by the PRC because it aligns with their own objectives.

As the 14th Dalai Lama ages, the question of what happens after he passes is becoming more pressing. Although China has labeled him a "splittist," he is recognized by both parties as the legitimate Dalai Lama and, thus, India and China are in agreement on this basic point. If more than one incarnation of the 15th Dalai Lama emerges and there is a disagreement between India and China on the next incarnation, the question of whether the PRC will see the presence of an alternative to the Chinese candidate living on Indian soil as a subversive action on India's part could have a bearing on their policy toward India. This would depend on what sort of threat the 15th Dalai Lama candidate poses to the PRC's control of Tibet as well as the state of Sino-U.S. ties. Although India's approach and behavior is not the primary driver of Chinese policy on Tibet and the Dalai Lama, its stance on the selection of the next Dalai Lama will also be a factor in China's handling of the reincarnation question. The activities of the Tibetan community in exile, including the CTA and Tibetan parliament in the post-14th Dalai Lama scenario, are also likely to have policy implications for India. The international response may also influence the policies of both countries. Hence, an exploration of options that India might need to ponder is relevant.

Part IV: The Available Options

In India, the Dalai Lama question is garnering public interest. In June 2024, the Times of India, a mainstream newspaper, published an op-ed asking India to prepare for a post-Dalai Lama scenario. The piece advocated for a robust Tibet policy as leverage against China at a sensitive time of transition in the highest echelon of Tibetan Buddhism.<sup>80</sup> Such views are also reflected in the works of scholars who think that the PRC's arrangements to control the succession process once the 14th Dalai Lama passes and its acceptability to the people in Tibet appear dubious.<sup>81</sup> There have been suggestions that India ought to take a clear position on the succession question. This is also the demand of the Tibetan exile community. Stagnating relations between India and China after 2020 because of the latter's military activity in eastern Ladakh have impacted the public discourse on India's Tibet policy. The passage of the Resolve Tibet Act 2024 as well as, more generally, greater criticism of China's human rights record are amplifying international concerns over the succession question.

Given the domestic stability and national security sensibilities of the Chinese Communist Party and the PRC on the matter of the Dalai Lama's succession, any unilateral gesture or goodwill that India makes toward the PRC with regard to the Dalai Lama on the assumption that China might view it positively is not likely to resonate in Beijing and should therefore be avoided. The PRC distrusts India's motives but tolerates its current policy in pursuit of larger stability and security goals. Their approach with India on the Tibet issue is unidirectional—India must be sensitive to Chinese concerns, but China need not show reciprocal sensitivity to India's concerns relating to Tibet. Hence, any unilateral step that seeks to please China should not be pursued as it will not result in any benefit for India.

Neither should India take an entirely hands-off approach to the reincarnation question, which has salience for India. Tibetan Buddhism has a significant Indian following, and controversy over the selection of the next Dalai Lama could have domestic reverberations. There is also a significant resident Tibetan population since 1959, which is the result of the poor handling of Tibetan issues by the PRC, and India has an interest in an orderly transition in Tibet's highest-ranking spiritual leader.

There are some topics on which the government of India might think through policy options during the lifetime of the 14th Dalai Lama.

First, should India opine on the issue of the Dalai Lama's reincarnation and, more generally, on the right of the Tibetan Buddhist community to select its spiritual leaders without state interference? Thus far, India has avoided this topic. However, if the 14th Dalai Lama decides he will reincarnate, this process could begin in India.<sup>82</sup> The PRC is bound to protest, and the international community is likely to welcome it. By both convention and practice, the Indian state does not interfere in the selection of leaders of any faith in India. Tibetan Buddhism is also a faith that is practiced by communities in some of the northern Indian states. A statement from the government of India, at the appropriate time, about permitting the Tibetan Buddhist community to select its own religious leaders freely and without interference is sustainable as per both the constitution and practice. Going into the details of the selection processes as called for by the Tibetan community by, for example, endorsing the 14th Dalai Lama's statement of September 24, 2011, on reincarnation processes is neither necessary nor desirable.<sup>83</sup>

Second, should India lend its public support to the demand for dialogue between the PRC and the Dalai Lama? The Indian government has not publicly articulated support for the Dalai Lama's call for dialogue with the PRC. However, the PRC, from time to time, publicly calls upon India to have a dialogue to resolve the Jammu and Kashmir issue, even when India makes it clear that this is an internal matter on which China has no locus standi. Given the growing demand from the international community for dialogue between China and the Dalai Lama, India ought to consider articulating its support for these demands. It could be argued that the presence of a large Tibetan exile community in India for more than six decades (as a result of the current Chinese policy in Tibet) gives India locus standi in the future of Tibet. It is not necessary that this should be done jointly with others. Although it is extremely unlikely that the PRC will heed India's appeal for dialogue, such articulation will be in line with the current policy of the three mutuals articulated by India's External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar in 2022—mutual respect, mutual sensitivity, and mutual interest.<sup>84</sup>

Third, should India support the demand of the Tibetan community-in-exile for the right to self-determination? India has not supported these demands in the past. China does not show the same sensitivity toward India's concerns in Jammu & Kashmir. It regularly urges India to resolve the matter in accordance with the will of the people of Kashmir. India might consider using identical or similar language in the future when the occasion arises. This is both different from supporting the demand for self-determination and adequately nuanced to make the point that principles that China claims to espouse in its foreign policy should also be applied to its domestic policy.

Fourth, should India agree to a site or a shrine in India for the final resting place of the mortal remains of the 14th Dalai Lama? Should the 14th Dalai Lama pass away on Indian soil, this might become inevitable. If that happens, the 14th Dalai Lama will be the first Dalai Lama since circa 1706 to be buried outside the Potala Palace in Lhasa.<sup>85</sup> Should the Dalai Lama pass away in India, the government may have no choice in the matter of where his mortal remains should rest. Working on this presumption, the government of India might wish to identify potential resting sites for his mortal remains well in advance, bearing in mind that the place of interment of the 14th Dalai Lama's mortal remains will automatically become a holy shrine for millions of pilgrims. Hence, potential locations, accessibility for pilgrims, and the social and security considerations need to be carefully thought out. Since the PRC still claims that the Dalai Lama is a citizen of the PRC, albeit a renegade, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that it might demand his mortal remains for interment in Lhasa. The government of India would need to develop an appropriate policy response, including potential recourse to legal means, to deal with such demands from the PRC.

Fifth, in what manner will the government of India handle the interregnum between the passing away of the 14th Dalai Lama and the identification of the 15th one? This period could last several months. The government of India needs to frame appropriate policy responses as to the terms of its engagement with the CTA and the Tibetan parliament located in India during this time as the expulsion of the Tibetan community is not an option available to India. Such contacts are important because the presence and activities of the exile community have domestic, social, and law and order implications. Since mechanisms are already in place for this purpose, there is no need to either formally recognize the CTA or formalize the interaction through the appointment of a coordinator, as suggested in one study.<sup>86</sup> India should continue to support the cultural, educational, and spiritual activities of the Tibetan community in the future.

The related question of how India deals with elements in the Tibetan exile community that wish to change the strategy and tactics of "resistance," without the guiding hand of the 14th Dalai Lama (who has called for a peaceful resolution of the Tibet-China issue), is also worth pondering. This situation might come to pass if, as one study has suggested, the PRC selects a Living Buddha incarnation from the Shugden sect (with which the 14th Dalai Lama has serious differences) as the 15th Dalai Lama.<sup>87</sup> In the eventuality of such an occurrence, there might be potential for acts of violence within the Tibetan exile community, with consequent law and order problems for India. In both constitutional and legal terms, so long as the exile community does not engage in acts that are contrary to India's national security (including domestic law and order), there should be no hesitation in permitting the community and its institutions to continue operating from Indian soil. Any sort of violent behavior within the Tibetan community or the threat to use violence against the PRC from Indian soil cannot be tolerated. Equally, neither should India brook any interference by the PRC or its agents like the United Front Work Department in the affairs of the Tibetan community in India. Efforts by Chinese agencies to interfere in any manner should be firmly dealt with under domestic laws, and relevant legal clauses that may be applied should be identified in advance for such purposes.

Sixth, the idea that India should coordinate with like-minded states on the post-14th Dalai Lama situation requires a careful cost-benefit analysis.<sup>88</sup> The U.S. Congress has already mandated the administration to build multilateral momentum on countering the PRC's narrative and claims. Suggestions for joint initiatives to create a global coalition on the reincarnation question may need to be studied carefully from an Indian perspective, keeping in consideration the implications for the country. International opinion will undoubtedly have domestic reverberations and should be respected, but it is also important that third parties should not be permitted to take undue advantage of the tentativeness of the situation to engage in activities that might exacerbate the tension between India and the PRC.

Seventh, the 14th Dalai Lama has already said that if he reincarnates, it will be in a "free" country. In 2011, the Dalai Lama explicitly said that "no recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends by anyone, including those in the PRC." This raises the following questions for which appropriate policy would need to be identified.

(a) If the 15th Dalai Lama candidate is found in a third country, how would India respond to an explicit demand from the PRC that the former does not, officially or unofficially, recognize him as the legitimate Dalai Lama?

(b) Even if the government of India does not take an explicit position on the candidate who is found abroad, would it permit him to enter the country? How will India deal with the Chinese objections?

(c) If the 15th Dalai Lama candidate is discovered in Indian territory, will India publicly acknowledge this fact? If not, what will be the status of the Living Buddha candidate?

(d) Since a number of the exile community holds Indian citizenship, how would the country deal with the situation if the selected Dalai Lama candidate were an Indian national?

(e) In the aforementioned second or third scenario, would India permit the 15th Dalai Lama unfettered access to the 14th Dalai Lama's residence and possession of the ritual objects and symbols of the Dalai Lama, along with the enthronement ceremony?

(f) How would India deal with the PRC's demands that the ritual objects and symbols of the Dalai Lamas belong to China and must be returned to them? Along with the political implications, this might also have legal implications.

(g) The Living Buddha child, who is identified as the 15th Dalai Lama, will be under the guidance of a regency council until maturity. What relationship, if any, will India have with this regency council, and under what guidelines might they be permitted to operate in India?

Since this set of questions has both foreign policy and domestic implications, they should be dealt with on the principle of separating the question of recognition from that of location or residence. In constitutional terms, religious organizations have the right to determine their own leadership, residence, and practices without state interference. The PRC will seek to pressure India to reject the alternative candidate, but the government of India need not express any view either in favor of or against such a candidate on the grounds that the selection of religious leaders by the concerned communities is permitted within the scope of the constitution and laws of the land. Allowing the candidate to reside in India is also in keeping with India's ethos and past practice. The demand of the Tibetan community to permit access to their 15th Dalai Lama candidate to the current Dalai Lama's ritual objects and symbols of office is a more sensitive issue. The PRC will claim ownership over the ritual objects and symbols, alleging that they were illegally smuggled out of India and should be returned.

Conclusion

India is not central to the framing of Chinese policy on the Dalai Lama and the reincarnation issue. The Chinese policy is primarily driven by concerns regarding maintaining stability and political control over Tibet and what the United States might do during the transition to destabilize Tibet and discredit China internationally. India has a stake in the reincarnation question due to the domestic following and the presence of the exile community on Indian soil. It is not a passive spectator.

Even six decades after he left Tibet, the Dalai Lama still holds significant influence over the hearts and minds of Tibetans; this worries Beijing, as does Washington's escalating support for the Tibetan cause and the Dalai Lama personally. Therefore, there has been a hardening of the PRC's position on the 14th Dalai Lama and the reincarnation question in the past fifteen years. This hardening is likely to create fresh challenges for India's policy, particularly on the key questions of the reincarnation and recognition of the 15th Dalai Lama, as well as the interregnum between the passing of the 14th Dalai Lama and the selection of his successor.

For the past sixty-five years, an uneasy modus vivendi between India and China has prevailed because both acknowledge the same individual as the 14th Dalai Lama. This might not be the case after his passing since a Dalai Lama reincarnation found outside the PRC will not be accepted by China. Since the primary residence, temporary religious seat, and symbols of the Dalai Lama are located in India, its approach to the reincarnation question and handling of the candidate found outside China will become of great interest to the PRC. Indian policy is likely to be tested on the touchstone of how it helps or hinders the PRC in its twin objectives of maintaining stability in Tibet and deterring American efforts to destabilize Tibet. This future quagmire should necessitate India to craft policy on this subject, bearing in mind not only its relations with the PRC and the Tibetan community in India and abroad but also the context of Sino-U.S. and Indo-U.S. relations.

Lastly, inaction would not be sustainable in the face of international and domestic public pressure to allow the Dalai Lama candidate to take up his duties in Dharamsala. Taking unilateral steps to please the PRC in the hope that the passing of the 14th Dalai Lama is an opportunity to reset the bilateral relationship is unlikely to be viewed in a similar vein by the PRC. Pondering the questions posed in the final part of this paper may lead to clarity of objectives, help to handle the difficulties, and create opportunities for India to pursue its basic goals.

Military Digest | A Tibetan spy who was a Gorkha soldier: Dramatic rise and sudden fall of Lha Tsering

11 November 2024, The Indian Express, Man Aman Singh Chhina

Lha Tsering was a soldier of Gorkha Rifles, an officer of the Intelligence Corps, and then an Assistant Director in the Intelligence Bureau.

Lieutenant Tsering served in the 1/10 Gurkha Rifles (now Gorkha Rifles) as a Non Commissioner Officer (NCO) in the First World War (1914-18) and was commissioned in October 1942 during the Second World War. ( Photo courtesy: Facebook/ Devendra Basnet)

As early as 1949, the Intelligence Bureau (IB) was concerned about the developing political situation in China and its impact on Tibet. The agency started ramping up its coverage of the Sino-Tibet border, and during these preparations, the IB hired a unique person whose rise was as dramatic as his eventual fall.

But before touching on the story of Lha Tsering, a soldier of Gorkha Rifles, an officer of the Intelligence Corps, and then an Assistant Director in IB, let us take a look at the intelligence agency's appreciation of the situation in Tibet just a year and a half after Indian Independence.

Archived documents reveal that in April 1949, the Director IB (DIB) wrote a top-secret note on the situation in China and its possible effects on Tibet. With this situational appreciation in mind, the DIB recommended the urgent need for re-organising and expanding the intelligence system so as to gather intelligence from Tibet and the Indo-Tibetan Border. Judging from the progress of the civil war in China, he concluded that it would not be long before the Communist elements in China would have the dominant voice in Chinese national and international affairs and would begin meddling with the affairs of Tibet.

A Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) note states, "In his opinion such activities in Tibet might have far reaching consequences on the Indo-Tibetan border and Sikkim and Bhutan who have many ties with Tibet. The DIB accordingly proposed an increase in his intelligence staff on the Indo-Tibetan Border."

Another memorandum prepared by the Deputy Director of IB in May 1949 stated that judging from reports coming in, Tibet had not taken kindly to the idea of a Communist-dominated China and would seek again to emphasise her independent status.

"In fact many of her recent actions, which have been against the wishes of the Chinese Government, have been with a view to establish her claim that she is an independent state. It is difficult to say what line the future Government of China is likely to take, but there seems to be no reason to doubt that they will make efforts to extend their influence and to propagate their ideology in an area which according to the Chinese Government is part of their territory," the memorandum says.

The entry of Lha Tsering

Against this backdrop, the DIB moved a proposal that Lieutenant Lha Tsering, who had been working since August 1, 1946, at Kalimpong as Deputy Central Intelligence Officer (DCIO) in charge of Sino-Tibetan affairs, be appointed as an Assistant Director. Lieutenant Tsering served in the 1/10 Gurkha Rifles (now Gorkha Rifles) as a Non Commissioner Officer (NCO) in the First World War (1914-18) and was commissioned in October 1942 during the Second World War.

He served in the Intelligence Corps in Calcutta, Dacca, New Delhi and Ranchi till his services were placed at the disposal of the Government of India under the Intelligence Bureau as DCIO.

The DIB added that Tsering was conversant with the Nepali, Tibetan, and Hindi languages and had a very good Tibetan background. A character roll of Lieutenant Lha Tsering prepared by the IB states that he was born in January 1903, though the exact date of his birth is not known. He studied up to matriculation.

"We propose to retain Mr. Tsering as Assistant Director, for an indefinite period. The post of Assistant Director held by him is at present sanctioned upto 28.2.1951 only but there is every likelihood of its continuance beyond this date for indefinite period on year to year basis. We have not made any efforts to obtain the services of a serving State Police officer for this post, because Mr. Tsering is considered to be specially suited for the job," the character roll states.

The chief part of his duties were concerned with notables of Tibet, Bhutan and Sikkim, and being a Tibetan himself, he had an easy access to these circles without the fear of raising suspicions. "There are no Tibetan-knowing officers in any State Police cadres and any other officer would not be of any use for this job," the IB note said.

However, the evaluation of Lha Tsering's capabilities suddenly took a downturn in April 1952, when the IB wrote to the MHA seeking his reversion to the DCIO post.

"Lha Tsering was promoted to the rank of Assistant Director, W.E.F. 1.4.50. We have watched his work since then but find that he is not upto the mark. The Director has therefore decided to revert him to the temporary post of D.C.I.O. which he was holding before his promotion to the rank of Assistant Director," the note states.

The matter did not end there, and there was a move to terminate his services. There was considerable movement of files between various departments on this move, with objections being raised and answered. In the meantime, rather than be demoted in rank, Lha Tsering chose to quit the IB and resigned. Thus ended the remarkable career of a Tibetan spy.

As Trump Threatens a Wider Trade War, the U.S. Confronts a Changed China

11 November 2024, The New York Times, Peter S. Goodman

The Chinese economy is more dependent on exports, making tariffs more potent, yet it's less reliant on American markets and increasingly bent on self-sufficiency.

Chinese leaders, seeking to accelerate industrial advances, are directing investment into robotics and aviation.

Eight years ago, when a newly elected Donald J. Trump promised to apply the powers of the Oval Office to start a trade war with China, the target of his ire was widely viewed as a juggernaut. China was the indispensable factory floor to the world and a swiftly developing market for goods and services.

As Mr. Trump now prepares for his second stint in the White House, he is vowing to intensify trade hostilities with China by imposing additional tariffs of 60 percent or more on all Chinese imports. He is pressuring a country that has been chastened by a powerful combination of overlapping forces: the calamitous end of a real estate investment binge, incalculable losses in the banking system, a local government debt crisis, flagging economic growth and chronically low prices — a potential harbinger of long-term stagnation.

The decline of fortunes at home has made Chinese companies especially focused on sales abroad. And that makes the country vulnerable to any threat to its export growth, a weakness that would enhance the expected pressure from the Trump administration as it plans to seek a deal that would increase Chinese purchases of American goods.

"The balance of power has certainly shifted in favor of the United States," said Eswar Prasad, a professor of trade policy at Cornell University who was previously the head of the China division at the International Monetary Fund. "The Chinese economy is not quite on the ropes, but it has been struggling for a while."

Yet complicating factors beneath that widely shared assessment may strengthen China's ability to endure whatever measures the incoming Trump administration may have in store.

Most immediately, the Chinese government possesses formidable resources to stoke the domestic economy. After long declining to loosen credit for fear of reviving investment in real estate, China's central bank this year lowered borrowing costs for homeowners and businesses. On Friday, the government approved a $1.4 trillion rescue plan that would allow local governments to refinance existing debts at lower rates of interest.

At the same time, a government-led strategy to advance the nation's industrial prowess has turned China into the dominant supplier of electric vehicles and other clean energy technologies. That gives Chinese companies a hold on rapidly growing markets for critical wares regardless of American tariffs. In an era of rising alarm over climate change, the world can either use Chinese-made gear to limit carbon emissions or shun Chinese industry. At least for now, it is struggling to do both.

China is less dependent on access to American markets than it was the last time Mr. Trump ratcheted up tariffs. The wave of American import duties imposed by the Trump administration, beginning in 2018 and continuing under the Biden administration, eventually covered some $400 billion in Chinese goods. Chinese factories in turn looked to Southeast Asia and Latin America for customers.

Over the last six years, China's share of American imports has dropped to 13 percent from 20 percent, according to TS Lombard, an investment research firm in London, though some of that shift reflects goods that end up in the United States after being routed through countries like Mexico and Vietnam in order to avoid American tariffs.

As Europe has more recently added its own tariffs to Chinese-made electric vehicles, China has accelerated its push to expand sales in other regions. "Beijing is using the Global South to offset the loss of market share to the West," said Jie Yu, a senior research fellow at Chatham House in London.

China's leaders have taken a similar approach to goods like agricultural commodities, shifting some purchases of soybeans from American farmers to suppliers in Brazil and Argentina.

That experience may give Beijing confidence that it can hold firm against escalating tariffs and retaliate with reductions in American imports, especially of agricultural products. China could also further restrict its exports of critical minerals.

"China has more leverage than the first time around," said Scott Kennedy, a China expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "It has a range of tools it can mobilize to push back and put some hurt on the U.S. economy if it believes Trump is pursuing outright economic war."

Mr. Trump may opt to moderate his threats of tariffs, concluding that the American economy would be imperiled by them. Economists warn that widespread taxes on imports would increase consumer prices and stymie domestic manufacturers that rely on imported components.

Still, if Mr. Trump does follow through, Chinese industry would suffer.

Exports would plunge by 8 percent over the following year while shaving 2 percent off China's annual economic growth, estimates Larry Hu, chief China economist at Macquarie Group, an Australian financial services firm. And if Mr. Trump seeks to close off imports of goods made by Chinese companies in other countries like Mexico, the damage would be greater still.

China's increased susceptibility to trade disruption is underscored by the fact that the country now produces 17 percent of global exports, up from 12 percent during Mr. Trump's first term, according to TS Lombard.

Chinese industry is often described as being dominated by large, state-owned companies that are governed through crippling bureaucracy and the imperatives of the ruling Communist Party, making them ill-suited to adjust to changing market conditions — another ostensible source of American leverage.

But this conception misses the emergence of a vast and far more nimble private sector, which now accounts for roughly half of Chinese exports, compared with 9 percent for state-owned companies, according to Nicholas R. Lardy, a China expert at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington.

"This has been a tremendous structural change," Mr. Lardy said. "It gives them more adaptability."

The Chinese government has the capacity to compensate for diminished exports by turning on spending, experts say. It can deploy its state-owned banks and corporate giants toward national goals like economic growth.

So far, the stimulus plans emerging from Beijing have been more gradual and modest than some anticipated. Still, they have resonated as a signal that China's leaders are concerned about public dissatisfaction with stagnating living standards and have resolved to promote economic growth.

"Traders I speak to in China, they describe it as going from your deathbed straight to a nightclub," Rory Green, chief China economist at TS Lombard, said. "It's a huge change in an array of policies."

The pivot toward stimulus by Beijing underscores a central feature of the Chinese system in adapting to shocks. Ruled by the all-powerful Chinese Communist Party, the country operates with draconian controls on individual expression and absent free elections. Yet once the Party settles on the need for an emergency course, it has the power to quickly establish policies free of the impediments found in democratic societies.

"In terms of moving quickly and resolving a crisis, the C.C.P. is highly effective," Mr. Green said. "They have a lot of levers to pull."

China's president, Xi Jinping, has spent the last decade consolidating power and securing an unlimited claim on his office.

When Mr. Trump first took office in 2017, Mr. Xi was only four years into his tenure and still legally restricted to two five-year terms. He had only recently embarked on an initiative known as Made in China 2025: The government directed cheap land, voluminous state credit and highly trained experts toward increasing the country's capacity in 10 advanced technology industries.

In crucial areas, that plan has achieved extraordinary returns. China now controls at least 60 percent of the global capacity to make solar cells, wind turbines, batteries and other components for energy systems that reduce carbon emissions, according to the International Energy Agency. Chinese investment amounts to an even higher share of announced expansions.

Chinese companies are increasingly dominant in the realm of mobile telephones, with eight of the 10 largest brands by volume headquartered in China, according to a study by the Asia Pacific Foundation of Canada.

In one regard, the Chinese plan has pointedly failed to achieve a critical objective – closing the gap in capability that separates domestic computer chips from the most advanced varieties made in Taiwan, using technology from the United States, Europe and Japan.

The Biden administration has employed export controls on American companies while pressuring allies to withhold technology that could allow Chinese industry to catch up.

But that campaign may have indirectly increased China's ability to withstand whatever trade restrictions are on the way, some experts assert.

"These export restrictions are accelerating China's drive for self-sufficiency," Mr. Lardy, the Peterson Institute economist, said. "This idea that we can slow them down across the board strikes me as uninformed."

Mr. Trump's next wave of proposed tariffs would present a challenge. Yet it would also reinforce a notion that has gained currency in Beijing: that China can no longer rely on foreign markets to supply needed components and technologies.

"Chinese leadership will learn a hard lesson that they cannot really depend on anyone but themselves," said Lynette Ong, professor of Chinese politics at the University of Toronto. "Trump's second term may be a gift for China's economic self-reliance."

Beijing's Transnational Repression of Dissidents: From Bad to Worse

09 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Marco Respinti

The chilling story of a Uyghur reporter exiled in the US is the sad tip of a shivering iceberg.

That the repression exerted by the Beijing's communist regime on Uyghurs has extended beyond the borders of the People's Republic of China (PRC), employing a strategy of transnational repression to target the diaspora communities worldwide, is today a known fact.

This involves a variety of tactics aimed at silencing, intimidating, or surveilling abroad individuals who are critical of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) policies or who advocate for Uyghur rights.

Recently, Paris-based international human rights organization Reporters Without Borders (RSF) shared the testimony of a Uyghur journalist exiled in the United States whose friends who are still in the PRC were detained in retaliation for his work.

The exiled journalist's story illustrated the transnational repression carried out by the CCP to extend censorship beyond its borders. International news reporter Kasim Abdurehim Kashgar, who left China for the US in 2017 due to the Chinese regime's intense repression in the XUAR, said Uyghur journalists like him find no escape from the CCP, even in exile. According to the report by RSF, following Kashgar's emigration, those in his entourage in the PRC were interrogated and, in some cases, imprisoned.

"The Chinese authorities wanted me to stop my investigations and work for the regime's propaganda. In the months following my refusal, at least twelve people with whom I had worked in a language school were arrested and questioned about me. Some were even sentenced to up to seven years in prison," the exiled journalist, who investigates crimes committed against Uyghurs for the American public media Voice of America (VOA), explained. The journalist said one of his friends was sentenced to nine years in prison, while four of his former colleagues were sentenced to seven years' imprisonment on obscure charges, and only one was released, while the fate of the others remains unknown.

Working under a pseudonym for many years, the journalist revealed his identity in the documentary "From Fear to Freedom: A Uyghur's Journey" broadcast by VOA in June last year. As per the RSF report, that reporter's mental health suffered as his close circle was targeted by the Chinese authorities. "After learning about their detention, I developed anxiety and depression," Kashgar said. "I am asking the authorities to release them because they have nothing to do with my work," he added. Kashgar remains determined to continue his investigations, despite the pressure. Through extensive research, he discovered his former colleagues were being detained. "It took me three years to reveal their arrests. I only decided to go public recently, when I had gathered solid evidence from five different and unrelated sources," Kashgar told RSF.

Commenting on the matter, RSF Asia-Pacific Bureau Director Cédric Alviani said the journalist's chilling testimony "illustrates the full extent of the transnational repression carried out by the Chinese regime to prevent exiled journalists from revealing the atrocities it is committing in Xinjiang." He added: "The international community must mobilise to protect journalists making the difficult decision to go into exile, as well as their families who remain in China." Also, in 2024 the police of the PRC arrested two journalists from the Kazakh minority working for the local public channel Xinjiang Television, as well as several other journalists whose identities have not yet been confirmed, reports RSF. The organization counts at least 79 detained individuals among journalists and press freedom activists, including renown Sakharov prize winner Ilham Tohti.

In fact, the PRC is ranked 172nd out of 180 countries in RSF's 2024 World Press Freedom Index. And according to a report by the Washington-based human rights group Freedom House, the parts of the Chinese communist party-state apparatus involved in transnational repression are as diverse as the targets and tactics of the campaign.

The importance of extending the party's grip on overseas Chinese and ethnic minority exiles originates with the highest echelons of the CCP, Freedom House said. "Besides CCP General Secretary Xi Jinping's own advancement of sweeping anti-corruption campaigns, leaked speeches from other members of the Politburo high up in the security apparatus are explicit about the priority that should be given to the 'overseas struggle' against perceived party enemies," the report added.

VOA recently reported that many exiled Uyghurs in the United States claimed the Chinese regime has ramped up transnational repression against them, using their relatives who still live in China to threaten them into silence abroad. VOA reported that the United States' domestic intelligence and security service Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) is aware of such activity targeting Uyghurs and other ethnic minority groups in the US.

"Tactics and patterns morph with advancements in technology," the FBI said in a statement to VOA. These acts, "often identified as transnational repression," represent "severe violations of international norms, US law, and individual rights and freedoms. TNR conducted by any government, against any person including Uyghur Americans, is unacceptable," the federal police agency was quoted as saying by VOA.

Earlier in May this year, UK-based human rights group Amnesty International reported some Chinese and Hong Kong students studying in Europe and North America claimed they were being photographed and followed at protests in their host cities, while many said their families in China had been targeted and threatened by police in connection with the students' activism overseas.

But this transnational repression, a grave violation of human rights, extending the reach of its authoritarian control beyond its borders, not only affects Uyghurs but also poses broader challenges to global human rights and international diplomacy.

Addressing these issues requires coordinated international action, robust support for Uyghur advocacy, and continued scrutiny of Beijing practices, as all experts on the PRC say. As the situation evolves, the global community's response will play a critical role in shaping the future of Uyghur rights and freedoms.

Sitting in India, We Have Become Internal Exiles

09 November 2024, The Wire, Himraj Dang

If the choices are between the 'long hope' and the 'long defeat', I think internal exile is a natural waystation till we start to heal ourselves and the planet we are burning.

I recently attended a set of programmes entitled, 'The Spirit of Tibet: Celebrating Culture and Compassion.' The programmes included a panel on 'Exile Stories: Crafting Resilience.' Various panellists, working in the arts, described a life of resistance and what it meant. The panellists described their efforts at contributing to the exile community, the importance of memory, and, finally, how survival is itself a contribution, even success.

Sitting on my home turf, surrounded by familiar sights and sounds, people who look like me (ahem!), I would not be expected to identify with exile. And, yet, listening to this panel triggered a close identification with the state of exile.

An exile from reason in public life, from an ingrained respect for nature, a sense of all-pervasive gratitude, from the memories and the loving care of a fortunate childhood, from family supports that have inevitably drifted apart, from friends who live very far away, from elders taken before time, from unconstrained times in the wilds, from imbibing so much of the idealism of earlier days...mature sensitivity accepts these have all passed from this life. Leaving behind a pervasive sense of loss only leavened by philosophy. Contrast this with the braggadocio of the growing numbers who have lapped up the formulaic responses to Huntington's questions of identity, those looking for simple solutions to layered challenges in public policy, for binaries to understand complex problems, for heroic leaders to wave magic wands and solve all our problems, for news that comes pre-digested in social media fit for short attention spans, from the repeated highs of unending professional success, from the pleasures of an ever-expanding array of material possessions, trophies, and marks of despoliation left upon this world.

There is no minimising the despair that comes from losing one's connection to one's land and culture. The way Tibetans have worked to keep their culture alive in the diaspora with positivity and compassion is impressive. But aren't the rest of us in some kind of exile? For constitutionalists, for highly sensitive people, for environmentalists, for those suffering from ecological grief, or even solastalgia, for those from whom history and its lessons matter (based on facts, not caricatures), and for the rare few who have reconciled rationality with love.

We live, as the Tibetan artists spoke, 'in a life of imagination, where we can imagine the lost nation (or the lost idealism).'

To do so, I would state, is to be in internal exile. The Russians capture it best as "vnutrennaya emigratsia," or internal emigration. An escape inward from a malevolent world; an embrace of one's alienation.

The environment

When I think of the 6,500 ancient deodar trees to be cut for the doubling of the tourist road from Uttarkashi to beloved Harsil, bypassing the mandatory environmental impact assessment and community hearings, and ignoring simpler alternatives like expanding embankments for overtaking, my biggest concern is the loss of agency for the community. The arms of the state simply do not see the need for dialogue.

We can seek refuge in the memory of the ancientness and beauty of the Taknaur valley, and imagine a more enlightened life of consultation, mediated by an economics which internalises externalities, and even prayer at the ancient Mukhba shrine. Refuge in memory, imagination, and prayer, how different is this from the story of Tibetan exile? Has the much-touted Chinese Communist Party regime at last come to India to deliver ease of doing business?

From west to east, the Himalayas are being bombed for development, completely rejecting community consultation, alternative approaches, or ancient wisdom. Highway doubling to the Char Dham in Uttarakhand fronted by imperatives of national security, dams too close to glaciers in Sikkim, the prospects of limitless solar parks for Ladakh, and 'cutting' everywhere, the cutting of mountains for roads without embankments or water channels, and tunnels without escape adits.

Scanning the landscape south from the Gangotri Valley to the Nicobar Islands where we plan to cut almost a million tropical trees, attempting to compensate for this with a Dubai-inspired safari park in arid Haryana, is an unfolding story of unexamined destruction.

The heart of this dystopian journey is in central India: the Ken-Betwa river inter-linking project, which would construct a dam in the heart of Panna National Park to pump an imagined water surplus, uphill, to another drying river basin, at the cost of Rs 45,000 crore. For 20 years, ever since I heard about this fantastic scheme, I have persevered to question it. Still at it: there is no movement, compromise, or exploration of alternatives.

I just read the elephant population of India has been reduced by 20%, or nearly, 4,000 souls, in just a decade, and the shocking report on this has been withdrawn even as it is getting dated. We privilege cows and revere elephants but save neither cows nor elephants.

In the face of such enormous one-sided destruction, it seems even the divinities have abandoned us, there are no checks left. Exiled from the public arena, where multi-dimensional planning, consultation, and inquiry are impossible, how does one live in such times? The response varies from collaboration with the regnant evil to an internal exile of resistance.

Collaboration

Anne Applebaum wrote an intriguing essay in The Atlantic, 'History will judge the complicit.' In this essay, she explored what it took for two people from similar backgrounds to part ways: one to become a collaborator and the other to reject the cruel, unfair, and unequal communist regime they both grew up with.

In a series of personality sketches, Czeslaw Milosz explores the diverse rationales for collaboration by intellectuals. The leading tropes set out were: 'We can use this moment to achieve great things'; 'We can protect the country from the (lunatic) President'; 'I, personally, benefit'; 'I must remain close to power'; 'Nothing matters'; 'My side may be flawed, but the political opposition is much worse'; and, 'I am afraid to speak out.'

None of these follows the prescription of the Polish foreign minister, Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, who had spent a lifetime in dissent: 'Just try to be decent,' he exhorted. In Applebaum's view, history will only remember the effort at decency, none of the self-serving excuses.

Or resistance

At the Tibet forum, the artists reminded us how important sheer survival is for resistance. To give shape to resistance by imagining the lost community. To plan the return. Using the time gained to tell stories, to keep memory alive. In the evocative turn of phrase by Milan Kundera, 'the struggle of man against power is the struggle of memory over forgetting.'

When I speak with peers, I am always shocked at how shallow the roots of liberal democracy are in this country, and how few people care about joining the dots between the ever-expanding talons of the state and condition of liberty, or remembering why this country was created, impossibly (and imperfectly) dredging from its hoary civilization the very best for the young Republic.

Sitting in India, we have become internal exiles. We live in the interstices ignored by the state: remote places in the mountains and forests, now getting rapidly 'developed'; the dying, private institutions and academic refuges, all being yoked to the national project. Seeking solace in books, and, still, the power of connecting with the external world.

A Tibetan activist, Tenzin Tsundue, rightly describes home as 'not a house but the purpose that takes its places, and sometimes away from our own home. Reasons to live can make strangers a family and no country foreign.' Global citizenship provides exiles, both the internal and external versions, greater understanding and wider access to remote interstices to help preserve culture and memory. Alas, even this notional global home, and engagement with global confreres, only reveals the retreat of liberty and reason elsewhere.

In conclusion...

Pamela Swanigan wrote an interesting essay in NOEMA, cautioning against the hope that human behaviour will change and return to values that sacralise nature. Asking us instead to appreciate J.R.R. Tolkien's view in accepting reality and looking for acts of heroism against the 'earth-and-sky destroyers,' and to achieve small victories that postpone the inevitable defeat of the natural world that sustains us.

Frankly, if the choices are between the 'long hope' and the 'long defeat', I think internal exile is a natural waystation till faith is realised or humanity itself changes course, and we start to heal ourselves and the planet we are burning.

The Secret Sauce of the China-India Rivalry Is Education

08 November 2024, Mint

For 100 years, the two countries have followed different paths to accumulating human capital, with striking results.

The world's two most-populous nations began to open up to the world around the same time, in the early 1990s. But while both grew rapidly and pulled hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, China's per capita income is now more than double India's, when their currencies are adjusted for their true purchasing power. What's behind the divergence?

Beijing and New Delhi pursued quite separate paths to globalization. One set its sights on becoming the world's factory, starting with toys and electronics, and moving on to electric cars and semiconductors. The other emphasized services like computer software. Their population structures were dissimilar, too. A one-child policy gave rise to a pronounced youth bulge and brought China to the brink of rich-country status before it started turning old. India's demographic destiny is playing out now, though minus the jobs to absorb surplus farm labor. And then there are differences in political institutions. China's is a single-party state, while India is a messy, multiparty, electoral democracy.

This is the conventional narrative. But what if there was a more fundamental force operating beneath the surface, a sharp departure in the long history of how the two nations embraced modern education? That's the thesis of The Making of China and India in 21st Century, a new paper by Nitin Kumar Bharti and Li Yang. The scholars at the Paris School of Economics' World Inequality Lab have pored over official reports and yearbooks going back to 1900 to make a database of who studied what in the two countries, for how long, and what was taught to them. The different courses charted by China and India for the last 100 years may have led to striking outcomes for human capital and productivity.

Here's what Bharti and Yang found. Thanks to a 50-year head-start in exposure to Western learning, India had a student population that was eight times bigger than China's at the turn of the 20th century. China began to catch up only after the abolition of the imperial examination system in 1905 bid farewell to Confucianism. By the 1930s, it had achieved parity with India's overall enrolment.

In the 1950s, the newly formed People's Republic kept up a steady pace of expansion, not even allowing the Cultural Revolution (1966-1976) to come in the way of secondary schooling. Where the chaotic decade extracted a heavy price was in undergraduate education. In the early 1980s, India's college enrollment ratio was five times higher than China's. By 2020, however, the story had changed: China was sending a far bigger share of its university-age cohort to tertiary institutions than India.

The different trajectories have their roots in history. China's late-19th-century Qing dynasty rulers wanted manpower with vocational skills to handle military-related production.

By contrast, India's British colonial masters had little interest in creating a manufacturing base. So they seeded the education system with a bias for producing clerks and junior administrators. Only the more affluent sections of the society had access to government jobs, and to the education required to land them. After independence in 1947, India doubled down on tertiary institutions, investing in elite colleges at the expense of basic reading and math skills.

The decision to emphasize tertiary education was a top-down choice for India, where half the individuals born in the 1960s were likely to remain illiterate, compared with 10% in China, according to the Bharti-Yang study. Most school-age Indian kids dropped out quickly (if they even started), either because nobody came to their villages to teach, or because more hands were needed to augment the family labor pool. A bottom-up strategy involves giving a large number of young pupils five years of learning, then enabling an increasingly bigger subset of them to attend high schools for a total of 12 years of instruction — before opening pathways to 16 years of education. This is what China chose.

An even more stark finding of the study is about college majors. Historically, India has had a preponderance of social-science graduates at the bachelor's degree level. In China, however, the overrepresentation of humanities, law and business began to ebb as early as the 1930s as more undergraduates got trained as teachers, scientists, engineers, doctors and farming experts.

This might have had a bearing on growth. As a 1991 paper by Kevin Murphy, Andrei Shleifer, and Robert Vishny has shown, a country that wants to expand faster needs more engineers than lawyers. (Law and economics have seen a revival in China after economic reforms created new demand for human capital in these areas.)

The common view, particularly in the US, is that India is the "land of engineers." It's true that many tech-industry founders and chief executives, including the CEOs of Microsoft Corp. and Alphabet Inc., were born and educated in India. But the huge expansion of its high-speed train network — or the sophistication of its EVs — shows that Bharti and Yang may have zeroed in on an often-overlooked source of China's competitiveness. "China's higher share of engineering and vocational graduates, combined with a higher share of primary and secondary graduates, lends itself more readily to a focus on manufacturing," the authors say.

Deng Xiaoping's 1992 tour of southern China signaled Beijing's willingness to engage with capital from the West, while retaining the primacy of the Communist Party. Just a few months earlier, Manmohan Singh, then the new Indian finance minister, too, had made a decisive break from decades of Soviet-inspired socialism and isolationism. India, he said, was going to be a major economic actor. "No power on earth can stop an idea whose time has come," Singh said, invoking Victor Hugo.

The residues of history, however, are often hard to brush off. The top-down, elitist bias that the British put into India's education has carried over. One final finding in the Bharti-Yang paper proves the point: In 1976, China had 160 million people who had missed out on regular schooling in adult education programs, compared with just 1 million in India. The progeny of those 159 million extra minds to whom China gave literacy and numeracy may have played more than a small role in beating India at growth.

Eyes north, ears south

07 November 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Sanjeev Satgainya

It's now all but certain: Oli will visit China in early December. This trip would mark a break from the tradition of Nepali prime ministers making their first "official" visit to India. There is nothing to quibble about, as flying to New Delhi first is merely an unwritten custom, not a formal requirement. So, Oli's planned visit to Beijing isn't a breach of any protocol; rather, it could set a precedent.

Yet questions have lingered over why Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi hasn't extended an invitation to Oli, sparking speculation that Oli began planning a trip to China after waiting in vain for an invite from New Delhi. In some circles, there is a belief that Oli's ascension to power is not to India's liking. Some within Oli's orbit have remarked that certain foreign powers have been trying to unseat the government without providing evidence to support this claim.

Oli and India amid global shifts

Even Oli can't deny that his past actions and rhetoric have frequently irked New Delhi. While his assertive stance may have earned him a "nationalist" image among sections of Nepali society, it has also placed him in India's bad books. Attempts at rapprochement have been met with a cold shoulder, leaving him to orchestrate his return to power. Since the 2022 elections, he's worn many hats: Coalition partner, opposition leader, and now, once again, prime minister.

Yet India appears unconvinced. While Modi's government rolled out the red carpet for Arzu Rana Deuba of the Nepali Congress, who serves as foreign minister in Oli's Cabinet, it has yet to extend an invitation to Oli, despite him being in office for over 100 days and even meeting Modi in New York in September. Meanwhile, Oli's government has repeatedly signalled its keenness to host Modi in Nepal, failing to elicit any concrete response.

Then, has India abandoned its long-standing tradition of hosting the Nepali prime minister soon after a new government is formed? If so, this raises broader questions about India's much-touted "Neighborhood First" policy. Extending an invitation to Oli could have shown goodwill and reinforced New Delhi's proclamation that "Nepal is a special priority partner."

Amid rapid geopolitical shifts, India may have set its sights on bigger platforms and larger roles in the world order, but it would do well not to ignore its neighbours or treat them based on the government of the day.

On Nepal's part, its foreign policy is becoming increasingly complex, extending beyond bilateral ties with India and China, as Sino-Indian and Sino-American tensions and interests intersect more with a growing US influence in Asia amid shifting global dynamics. Oli, as the incumbent, needs to tread carefully. His role demands deft management of relations with India and China while also recalibrating Nepal's strategic posture in a complex and evolving geopolitical landscape.

The northern nexus

Nepal's communist leaders often lean towards, or appear to align with, China when they want to "send a message" to India. Oli is no exception. Even before an official invitation was extended, extensive media reports outlined Oli's potential agenda for the trip, including efforts to secure a loan waiver for the Pokhara International Airport and agreements on some Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects. The Chinese, who often practise quiet diplomacy, have yet to comment on Oli's planned visit. Meanwhile, the BRI remains a contentious issue in Nepal, with Beijing eager to reframe all China-funded projects under its banner.

Oli currently leads a strong government with support from the Nepali Congress, the largest party in Parliament. Congress's position on the BRI and other forms of assistance is clear—grants are acceptable but loans are not. If Oli avoids pushing too aggressively with China, potentially unsettling his coalition partner, his position remains secure. Deeper engagement with China could bring valuable infrastructure projects, but it also raises concerns about long-term dependency and potential political leverage. It's up to Nepali leaders—especially Oli—to negotiate beneficial terms.

The Nepali public is divided on Chinese aid: Some see it as a counterbalance to dependence on India, while others fear it might lead to undue influence from the north. Both views have merit and flaws, making it crucial for the current leadership to steer Nepal's foreign policy in a direction that serves and safeguards the country's interests.

While Nepal could benefit from its northern neighbour's economic and technological might, it is not in a position to ignore its southern neighbour, with whom it not only shares historical, cultural and people-to-people ties but also carries out a majority of its trade.

The catch

Diplomacy often works best when conducted quietly. Oli's "preparations" to visit Beijing could have been kept under wraps until concrete plans were in place. The premature leak of his intentions by his circle allows room for speculation that this may have been a tactic to pressure India.

While China seeks to expand its influence in Nepal, it remains cautious about provoking India to the point of confrontation. And India, too, appears hesitant to employ its usual political manoeuvres in Nepal, particularly after recent setbacks in its immediate neighbourhood. As the Sino-Indian relations show signs of thawing, Nepal stands to benefit from reduced regional tension. Oli would be wise to avoid antagonising either neighbour.

Nonetheless, Oli has an uncanny inclination to critique India. While he uses backchannels to re-engage with New Delhi, his public jabs at India reveal his characteristic defiance. If his plan to visit China is driven more by spite than by a balanced foreign policy strategy, he risks making a strategic misstep.

Even after over 100 days in office, Oli's performance has been dismal on various domestic fronts. Neither Oli nor his coalition partner, the Nepali Congress, has been able to justify the formation of this "stable" government.

With his political legacy on the line, Oli has an opportunity to "achieve something meaningful" as prime minister, and he should approach foreign policy with a view toward lasting impact.

Foreign policy is certainly a tough balancing act for a country like Nepal, sandwiched between the world's two large economies. In an era of fluid geopolitics, future Nepali leaders will likely face further challenges in balancing relations with both neighbours. Nepali politicians' failure to pursue a cohesive and balanced foreign policy has already tarnished Nepal's international image.

In the intricate world of foreign policy, there's little room for grandstanding. And, adventurism can backfire. Oli has a unique chance to set a precedent for independent, balanced diplomacy that could serve as a model for the country and his successors. His China sojourn could go beyond simply breaking the so-called custom of prioritising one neighbour over the other; it might even pave the way for a new approach. But this must be done in the best interest of Nepal, not to satisfy personal pride or vanity.

Mountains of Resistance: The Past and Present of Tibet's Quest for Independence

06 November 2024, Harvard International Review

A leader in exile. Children forced into cultural assimilation. A barrage of failed protests. For more than 50 years, China, a global superpower with a population over 400 times that of Tibet, has occupied this small region. Since 1950, Tibet and China have lived in an uneasy balance. However, recent reports have shown exacerbated tensions between the two regions, as Tibetans have accused the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) of severely restricting the practice of Tibetan traditions, including Buddhism.

The Tumultuous Ties Between Tibet and China

For centuries, Tibet and China co-existed in Central Asia—each as a distinct nation with individual culture and history. China's historical records and treaties demonstrate that China forged equal partnerships with its strong neighbor, Tibet, as early as 2,000 years ago. In 1913, the 13th Dalai Lama, who served as Tibet's political and spiritual leader, officially proclaimed the nation's independence, stating, "We are a small, religious, and independent nation." The nation had a theocratic government of which the Dalai Lama was the supreme religious and temporal head. With social security systems such as the provision of medical assistance to expecting mothers or care for the elderly, Tibet was a place of rich culture, art, and education.

However, in 1950, the newly established CCP launched an invasion of Tibet to incorporate it into the People's Republic of China. By seizing Tibet, China gained access to a multitude of rich natural resources and easier access to the strategically significant Indian border. Facing almost 40,000 Chinese troops, the young Dalai Lama was forced to recognize China's rule in return for loose promises that the CCP would protect Tibet's religious and political system. The CCP never kept these promises, and on March 10, 1959, hundreds of thousands of Tibetans surrounded the Potala Palace in Lhasa to protest Chinese government occupation, marking the beginning of an ongoing Tibetan resistance. The CCP swiftly suppressed the uprising, and the then-14th Dalai Lama was forced to flee in disguise, dressing himself in a Chinese uniform and escaping on foot with his family members and ministers.

Persistent Protests: The Struggle for Tibetan Freedom
Tibetans have been protesting China's presence in the country since 1959. However, in recent years, protests have gained momentum and prominence as the international community becomes increasingly aware of the CCP's actions. In March 2008, on the 49th anniversary of the National Uprising Day, hundreds of Tibetan monks gathered in Lhasa to protest Beijing's rule and advocate for the release of fellow Drepung monks, who protestors claimed were previously detained. The protests and violence escalated throughout the week, and by the end, human rights groups claimed that more than 140 people had died, although Chinese authorities put the figure closer to 22 deaths. April 2008, during the 2008 Beijing Summer Olympics, was another milestone in protests, as thousands gathered on the streets of San Francisco, California. Protests in Tibet mirrored those in San Francisco: thirty Tibetan protesters were convicted of arson, robbery, and attacking government offices related to the March violence. They received prison sentences ranging from three years to life. Hundreds of Tibetans have been imprisoned or outright killed by the CCP, while further deaths have resulted from self-immolation as a form of protest. Since 2009, 159 Tibetans have self-immolated, including 127 deaths and 26 minors under the age of 18.

Some changes in Chinese leadership led to periods of greater leniency. In 1978, Deng Xiaoping succeeded Mao Zedong after his death, and the government appeared to acknowledge past errors. Throughout the next decade, many Tibetan religious and traditional customs were allowed again. Tibetans were allowed to assume positions of social status, obtain a university education, study the newly acknowledged Tibetan culture, travel abroad, and even travel to India to meet the Dalai Lama. Deng Xiaoping even invited Gyalo Thondup, elder brother of the Dalai Lama, to the capital to discuss greater partnership between the two regions—although full independence was still not discussed. Letters between leaders also indicate relatively amicable discussions. Crucially, during this time period, tourism flourished, with over 43,500 foreigners visiting Tibet in 1987 and spending more than US$15 million within the nation.

However, these small advances did not alter China's overall power in Tibet, and in 1987, protests reemerged. The demonstrations continued until 1989 and led to troops from the Chinese People's Liberation Army imposing checkpoints every few meters throughout Lhasa. The Chinese government declared martial law for 13 months, and CCTV footage leaked internationally displayed Chinese brutality.

Global Outcry and Growing Support

The US Commission on International Religious Freedom's 2024 annual report, published on May 1, 2024, revealed a lack of religious freedom in Tibet due to the CCP's growing suppression of Tibetan Buddhism. These restrictions are part of broader Sinicization efforts by the CCP government. In the past, "Sinicization" has referred to the concept of making something more Chinese in character. However, over the past few years, Sinicization has developed a secondary meaning referring to Chinese efforts to impose increased surveillance and security measures on Tibetan Buddhists. These measures restrict peaceful religious activities, including rituals and spiritual practices such as mantras and yogic techniques. Authorities have arrested and imprisoned Tibetan Buddhists for engaging in behaviors related to the Dalai Lama, with some Tibetan Buddhist monks dying in prison.

The CCP has also forced the separation of over one million Tibetan children from their families to attend state-run boarding schools. Tibetans have called these institutions "colonial boarding schools," designed to cultivate loyalty to the CCP and deny the children the opportunity to continue practicing their cultural traditions. The US commission recommended the US State Department designate China as one of the current 17 countries with "country of particular concern" (CPC) status regarding religious freedom violations. It also identified the Chinese government's "Sinicization of Religion" policy as a significant factor in the deterioration of religious freedom. The report stated that "Sinicization requires groups to follow the CCP's Marxist interpretation of religion, including by altering religious scriptures and doctrines to conform to that interpretation."

The US Congress has also stepped into the conflict; a month after Senate approval, the House voted on June 12, 2024 to pass a bill, the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, urging China to mend ties with the Dalai Lama and other Tibetan leaders. The legislation allows State Department officials to "actively and directly" counter disinformation about Tibet spread by the Chinese government, particularly claims that China has encompassed Tibet since "ancient times." President Biden signed this Act into law on July 12, 2024.

Tibetan Voices: Calls for Identity and Freedom

Calls from Tibetans have remained the same for decades: the protection of Tibetan identity, freedom, and human rights and the return of the Dalai Lama to Tibet. Though in exile in India, the 14th Dalai Lama has established a democratic government, or the Central Tibetan Administration, which advocates for greater freedom and rights for Tibet, termed the "Middle Way Approach." For 63 years, the democratic government-in-exile has endured in the foothills of the Himalayas. Alongside the Dalai Lama, the parliament is ruled by Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang, their elected leader. Although exiled, the government still aims to rule with democratic transparency and fairness, posting announcements and news on its website and keeping interested parties globally up-to-date on parliamentary sessions. The parliament-in-exile even meets with global leaders, such as former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other US legislators and European Parliament members.

However, within the community of Tibetan exiles, there are two factions: those who simply ask for Tibet to remain a part of the People's Republic of China but with greater control over its own affairs (the "Middle Way Approach") and those who push for complete independence from China ("Rangzen"). From July 13th to 15th, 2024, the 7th International Rangzen Conference dedicated to Tibet's complete independence from China was held in Toronto, Canada. With over 250 delegates from around the world, the conference expressed a lack of trust for the Chinese government and condemned recent educational suppression techniques employed by the CCP. The rhetoric of the speakers was fairly assertive, with Rangzen claimed as a "birth right" and discussions on "[countering] China not just by vocalising...demands or organising protests, but by understanding the political landscape within China and its relations with other countries." Ultimately, internal turmoil persists in determining the best solution.

Differing from more violent secessionist movements in other countries, the Tibetan independence movement primarily takes a spiritual approach. This movement looks to the Dalai Lama as an influential freedom advocate who still spends his day "meditating on the roots of compassion and what he can do for his people." Although the man himself retired as a political leader in 2011, his values—introspection, meditation, spirituality, and peace—are still at the core of the movement. Indeed, despite initial violent uprisings met with suppression by Chinese authorities, the resistance movement in Tibet has been relatively peaceful. It remains to be seen whether this movement will achieve Tibetan sovereignty, finally reuniting the parliament and Dalai Lama with the Tibetan people.

The CCP Insists that Chinese Islam Should Be “Confucianized”

04 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Ma Wenyan

References to the Jinling School hide a call to “Sinicization” intended as unquestioning alignment with the Communist Party.

From October 17 to 18, 2024, the Jiangsu Islamic Association and the Research Center for Strengthening the Consciousness of the Chinese Nation’s Community hosted in Nanjing a conference on the “Research on Integrating Islam and Confucianism and Strengthening the Consciousness of the Chinese Nation’s Community.” The conference was part of a campaign promoting the Jinling School as a model of “Confucianized” Islam.

The Jinling School, formed in late Ming China, established Chinese-language educational institutions for Muslims. Ma Zhenwu, Zhang Shaoshan, and Ma Junshi, all Muslim teachers involved in both Sufism and Confucian studies, taught in Nanjing. They promoted the idea that Confucianism and Sufism were similar, advocating a connection between Islam and Confucianism. This movement faced opposition for introducing non-Islamic elements into Islam and eventually declined.

The CCP bureaucrats’ interest in the Jinling School is noteworthy, but it’s doubtful they fully understand the nuances of 17th and 18th-century Muslim Chinese theologians. For them, “Confucianizing” Islam means supporting the movement to eliminate “Arabic” architectural elements and replacing them with Chinese ones. Ultimately, the CCP is interested in a “Confucian” approach to Islam as a call for unquestioning alignment with the government in power. While this perspective may not accurately reflect the intentions of the Jinling School theologians, it is applicable to the current China Islamic Association.

Over 50 experts, scholars, and Islamic community representatives attended the seminar. Yang Faming, President of China Islamic Association, opened the meeting and delivered a keynote speech. Officials from the Second Division of the United Front Work Department, in charge of supervising religious communities, also attended the conference.

President Yang Faming praised the Jiangsu Islamic Association for promoting the sinicization of Islam in Jiangsu. He emphasized the importance of understanding the spirit of the Third Plenary Session of the 20th CCP Central Committee and Xi Jinping’s thoughts on ethnic and religious work to integrate Islam and Confucianism. Yang urged carrying out basic research, editing Muslim classics to publish them in “Sinicized” versions, and highlighting the contemporary value of the Jinling School. He also called for “innovative approaches that reflect modern times and are easily accepted by believers to advance the integration of Islam and Confucianism.” In his speech, Qin Hua, member of the Party Leadership Group and Deputy Director of the Jiangsu Provincial Ethnic and Religious Affairs Commission, in turn emphasized that the Islamic community should follow political guidance, study and implement the spirit of the Third Plenary Session of the 20th CCP Central Committee, and increase publicity and education efforts to promote the Sinicization of Islam. He also stressed the importance of strengthening Confucian thought among Muslims as part of the efforts to Sinicize Islam.

Why Has China Halted Centuries-old Sino-Nepal Borderland Marriages?

04 November 2024, The Diplomat, Birat Anupam

China has offered no explanation why it halted cross-border marriages between Nepali and Tibetan people living in border villages like Olangchung Gola.

A man from Biratnagar in southeastern Nepal can marry a woman from Beijing in China, just as a man from China’s Kunming city can wed a woman from Kathmandu in Nepal. Beijing does not seem to have a problem with long-distance cross-border marriages. However, it has forbidden cross-border marriages between people who live in the Sino-Nepali borderlands, within walking distance of each other, and with strong linguistic and cultural ties. Beijing has provided no explanation for this policy.

During my recent trek in Olangchung Gola village of Nepal’s far eastern Taplejung district, which borders both of Nepal’s neighbors, China and India, I found that cross-border marriages, once the norm in Olangchung Gola, are now a rarity.

At Olangchung Gola, a Himalayan village of 55 households, I met Chumbe Sherpa, an elderly Nepali man with four wives. His first wife, with whom he eloped in 1962, was from Tibet.

However, nowadays, a Nepali in the borderlands cannot marry a Tibetan. Nepali men can no longer be sons-in-law of China’s Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR).

“Cross-border marriage was not an issue until 2008,” a Nepali local in Olangchung Gola told The Diplomat. It was “halted from the Chinese side after 2012.”

According to Chumbe Sherpa, who is a former deputy chair of the erstwhile Olangchung Gola Village Development Committee (local government), previously Tibetan women were drawn to Nepal as Nepal was comparatively well-developed and the source of their food and other supplies. A marriage with a Nepali man was therefore an attractive option.

However, in more recent decades, China has developed the Tibetan region, and the Tibetan border regions are more developed than the Nepali ones. The situation has reversed and commodities now flow into Nepal from Riu in Dinggye County of the TAR. Almost all daily essentials being used by residents of Olangchung Gola are from TAR and sport Mandarin characters. Olangchung Gola is closer to Riu bazaar than Taplejung's district headquarters of Phungling bazaar.

Even meeting relatives on the Chinese side of the Sino-Nepali border has become tougher post-pandemic. "We can't go to our relatives' homes on the other side," Chhilamo Lama, whose maternal house is on the Chinese side said, pointing out that she has "to stay at a quarantine-like home," where her "relatives come to meet and greet" her. "This was not the case in the past," she said.

At Olangchung Gola, I saw people engaging in cross-border trade with China, which is just around 25 kilometers away.

Local residents as well as security personnel view the Chinese positively. Madhab Khatri, the recently deployed Border Outpost chief of Nepal's Armed Police Force said, "Chinese counterparts often ask if we need anything from them."

"We mostly go to Riu to sell our products and buy theirs. If we can't sell all our products in the Riu bazaar, Chinese policemen purchase our unsold items," Chhilamo Lama told The Diplomat.

Chheten Sherpa, a local leader of the Nepali Congress and a former local government member, said that the Chinese are helpful and are eager to have better road connectivity with Nepal. Chinese-sent bulldozers and oil tankers with Chinese number plates are visible at Olangchung Gola bazaar.

People from both sides of the Sino-Nepali border share a Buddhist cultural heritage and linguistic ties. Still, cross-border marriage doesn't exist anymore. The centuries-old borderlands marriage has been halted thanks to the Chinese side.

Yet Chinese leaders have waxed eloquent on the strong bonds, including matrimonial ties, between the people of the two countries. In a signed article written ahead of his Nepal visit in 2019, Chinese President Xi Jinping noted, "In China's Tang Dynasty (618-907), Nepali Princess Bhrikuti was married to Tibetan King Songtsen Gampo, while the Chinese monk Huen Tsang visited Lumbini, the birthplace of the Buddha, and left many precious written accounts of his pilgrimage."

"The Himalayas soaring between our two countries have not blocked the friendly contacts between our two peoples," Chinese Prime Minister Zhou Enlai said at the Kathmandu Civic Reception during his visit to Nepal in April 1960.

Cross-border movement of people and goods, which was halted during the COVID-19 pandemic, was resumed recently. On May 25, Nepal and China reopened 14 traditional border crossings, including Olangchung Gola, in the presence of top leaders including Nepal's Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha and Vice Chairman of China's Tibet Autonomous Region Silang Nima.

When border trade and crossings have resumed, why are traditional borderland marriages being blocked? Why are marriages between people who have to fly long distances across the Himalayas permitted when those who live just walking distance of each other are forbidden?

Beijing has not explained its strange policy.

Is Sino-Pak 'Sweeter Than Honey' Friendship Turning Sour? – OpEd

04 November 2024, Eurasian Review, Nilesh Kunwar

Organised by the Pakistan-China Institute [PCI], one had expected that the recent international conference on "China at 75: A Journey of Progress, Transformation and Leadership" would be yet another exchange of poetic phrases and adulations coined by Beijing and Islamabad to describe their relations being "a friendship higher than Himalayas, deeper than ocean, sweeter than honey and stronger than steel." However, what Chinese Ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong stated during this conference clearly indicates that relations between these two "iron brothers" may not be as hunky dory as they claim.

Saying that "China wants to see steps against perpetrators of terrorist attacks and all those involved in such attacks could be penalised," Ambassador Zaidong made it clear that such incidents were "unacceptable for China and we do hope that the Pakistani side will ensure the safety and security of its nationals working in Pakistan." He also noted with concern that Chinese nationals had been "attacked twice in only six months and these attacks have also caused casualties." [Emphasis added]. His terse message sans sweetness of honey undoubtedly came as a bolt from the blue for Islamabad.

Visibly rattled by the Chinese ambassador's undisguised admonition, Pakistani Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar responded with the assurance that Islamabad would leave no stone unturned in ensuring security of Chinese nationals. Dar disclosed that he along with President Asif Ali Zardari would visit Beijing in early November to brief the Chinese authorities on the actions taken by Islamabad to bring perpetrators to book but refused to make any public disclosures on progress of investigations regarding terrorist attack on Chinese nationals. This raises strong suspicions that Islamabad may not have anything substantial to reveal.

That the Chinese ambassador exceeded his brief in this case is unlikely as China chooses its diplomats with due care and ensures that they implicitly toe Beijing's line and steer clear of any controversy.

So, when the Chinese ambassador broke protocol and took to the rostrum once again and issued a rejoinder to Dar's feeble assurances by highlighting the deteriorating security environment in Pakistan, it became absolutely clear that he was emphatically reiterating Beijing's concerns. Had Sino-Pak friendship truly been sweeter than honey as both Beijing and Islamabad claim, then would the Chinese ambassador use a public platform to launch a scathing attack on the Pakistan army's inability to check terrorist activities?

Beijing has all the reasons to be annoyed. For one, it has invested heavily in the ambitious USD 62 billion China Pakistan Economic Corridor [CPEC] project but Islamabad has not yet been able to fulfil its repayment obligations and is continuously seeking debt restructuring and bailouts. Pakistan's circular debt arising out of its inability to pay for subsidies has resulted in irregular reimbursement to Chinese Independent Power Producers [IPPs]. Lastly, despite repeated assurances, the Pakistan army has not been able to get the better of Baloch rebel groups targeting Chinese nationals working on CPEC projects.

Pakistan too has several genuine reasons to be angry. In trying to keep Beijing happy, Islamabad has made several compromises ranging from overlooking the humongous adverse environmental impact of CPEC projects to extending extraordinary concessions to Chinese working on CPEC projects and even disregarding the genuine concerns of locals. This has accentuated political and social upheaval as well as contributed to the country's burgeoning financial crisis and Islamabad is miffed that Beijing has not adequately appreciated Pakistan's actions. This is evident from Pakistan Foreign Office [FO] spokesperson Mumtaz Zahra Baloch's remark that "The statement from the Chinese ambassador is perplexing, especially considering the positive diplomatic traditions between Pakistan and China." [Emphasis added].

In an attempt to appease Beijing, Islamabad has indeed yielded a lot. For example, on China's bidding, the Pakistan army took the highhanded decision of not only converting the entire port city of Gwadar into a virtual fortress but also treating locals as potential terrorists and subjecting them and their houses to repeated searches. It has also institutionalised forcible abductions and enforced disappearances in the garb of security necessity and thereby further alienated the beleaguered Baloch people.

The irony is that while Chinese trawlers are allowed to fish in Gwadar's waters, the Pakistan navy restricts local fishermen from accessing their traditional fishing areas for security reasons. While Rawalpindi may deny it, but the fact that all major mass movements against human rights excesses, enforced disappearances, extra judicial killings and denial of basic rights in Balochistan like the Baloch Yakjethi Committee [Balochistan Unity Committee] or BYC and Haq Do Tehreek Gwadar [give Gwadar its rights] started after CPEC activities commenced in Balochistan surely can't be a mere coincidence.

Both the Haq Do Tehreek leader Maulana Hidayat ur Rehman Baloch and BYC chief Dr [Ms] Mahrang Baloch squarely blame Beijing for aggravating the already sorry state of affairs prevailing in Balochistan. The former has reportedly issued a warning to Chinese nationals in Gwadar that if Islamabad "ignores" their peaceful protests, the Baloch people would be well within their rights "to pick up and use weapons to protect our rights."

Similarly the BYC leader is sanguine that "China or any other country investing in Balochistan is directly involved in the Baloch genocide. The enforced disappearances and forced displacements in the Makran coastal belt are huge. They are looting our resources with no gain to local Baloch." Her observation is based on the harsh reality and a true reflection of Baloch sentiments that is fuelling armed resistance by nationalist groups.

With Beijing becoming publicly more assertive this "iron brother" of Pakistan is fast turning into a "big brother" and Pakistan is probably realising that in today's world, there are no free lunches. As the metaphoric Sino-Pakistan friendship extravaganza shows signs of crumbling, Islamabad does deserve sympathy for having walked into Beijing's 'friendship trap'.

However, Islamabad cannot absolve itself for taking China's friendship for granted-it surely couldn't be unaware of Greek philosopher Plato's [427-348 BC] warning to mankind given many-many centuries ago that "True friendship can exist only between equals."

Depsang to Kazan: Emerging détente between China and India

04 November 2024, ORF, Atul Kumar and Antara Ghosal Singh

Although India and China have reached a preliminary agreement to disengage, the future development path of China-India relations is still full of potholes and slippery slopes

The fact that an agreement between China and India to move forward on the Line of Actual Control (LAC) was in the works has been anticipated in both capitals. Since late 2022, both governments have pursued a modus vivendi for disengagement at Depsang and Demchok, with the issue discussed threadbare in the Corps Commanders' meetings. The 17th Corps Commanders' meeting on 20 December 2022 marked a critical point. Following the establishment of five buffer zones in Eastern Ladakh and the Yangtse clash on 9 December 2022, the meeting provided an in-depth dialogue on the disengagement frameworks and probable solutions. In the next two years, these frameworks were substantially refined by both militaries which received the political endorsement this year.

This agreement has initiated the disengagement process at both remaining locations. As discussed below, a review of the lead-up to the Kazan agreement, its specifics on the ground and perspectives on this agreement from China, indicates that within strategic and political constraints, the agreement is a constructive restart for both states, though tempered with cautious optimism.

The buffer zones and their complexities

By September 2022, China and India had established five buffer zones at Pangong Tso Lake from Fingers 4-8, Gogra, Hot Springs, Kugrang Nullah and the Galwan Valley. This belt of buffer zones was aimed to separate both forces from their face-to-face deployments and was located mostly on the Indian side of the LAC, creating a distance of 3–10 kilometres between both sides and establishing restrictions on human patrolling or grazing temporarily. Only electronic surveillance was allowed. The denial of grazing received substantial criticism in India as these areas were traditional grazing grounds for the local population. However, the Indian government argued that if they could not patrol or graze in these buffer zones, neither could the Chinese and that ensured stability and peace in these areas.

This belt of buffer zones was aimed to separate both forces from their face-to-face deployments and was located mostly on the Indian side of the LAC, creating a distance of 3–10 kilometres between both sides and establishing restrictions on human patrolling or grazing temporarily.

The negotiation for achieving a similar modus vivendi in Depsang and Demchok proved difficult. The standoff in these two places was a legacy issue, starting in 2008-09 and eventually becoming a part of the 2020 Galwan Clash discourse. After surveying this area in September 2013, the Shyam Saran Committee reported that the Chinese were not allowing the Indian Army patrol units to access patrolling points 10 to 13 in the Depsang bulge area and creating difficulties for patrols in the Sirijap and Demchok area. Therefore, these two locations proved to be the toughest to negotiate.

Nevertheless, the Indian establishment displayed adept negotiation skills, finally securing the Kazan Agreement. This accord avoids creating buffer zones in the area, allowing staggered patrolling by small patrol units from both sides. Indian troops can finally access patrolling points 10 to 13 in this region again.

Economic foundation for the political agreement

Since the 2020 clashes, China-India relations have stagnated, marked by minimal engagement across trade, economics and regional political fronts. India, stepping away from its oft-professed neutral politics, has actively engaged in the Malabar Exercises and the QUAD, aligned closely with the United States (US), while restricting Chinese investments, apps, and airlines. India has often adopted positions countering China. Beijing believes India has become detrimental to its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in Southern Asia and withheld support from multiple Chinese economic initiatives namely, the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, China-Myanmar Economic Corridor, and the China-Nepal India Corridor.

Beijing believes India has become detrimental to its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in Southern Asia and withheld support from multiple Chinese economic initiatives namely, the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, China-Myanmar Economic Corridor, and the China-Nepal India Corridor.

China-India trade, however, has remained strong. Consequently, India's trade deficit has grown over the last three years, often crossing US$ 100 billion a year. In addition, foreign direct investment (FDI) in India has dropped substantially, to less than US$30 billion in the last financial year. The Indian Finance Ministry has, therefore, expressed concerns, prompting the Indian Chief Economic Advisor, Anantha Nageswaran, to advocate for renewed engagement with China in the 2024 Economic Survey. China, meanwhile, is in difficult terrain as its industrial overcapacity, high unemployment rate and collapsing real estate sector, along with severe societal repression by a paranoid Chinese state, has created a volatile economic environment. The Kazan Agreement is, thus, viewed as a mutually beneficial pact to reduce hostilities and reestablish a working arrangement to minimise the potential for bilateral conflict.

Opinions in China on the agreement

The border agreement with India has received intense attention within China's strategic community. The big question everyone tends to ask "Now that India's Modi has given a thumbs up, will China and India turn the page in terms of bilateral ties." In the Chinese assessment, this is a substantial achievement, a hard-won success. It is being argued that this ice-breaker will revitalize China-India relations and can potentially open up new space for cooperation between the two countries on the global stage. For example, some Chinese scholars believe the Kazan meeting will pave the way for greater cooperation between China and India on the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) platform. There are talks about PM Modi personally attending the summit in China next year and opening up a new chapter in bilateral cooperation.

As per Lin Minwang, a researcher at the Centre for South Asian Studies, Fudan University, the current positive turn in China-India relations shows that India's diplomatic strategy is gradually returning to its "multi-alliance" core position under the Modi government. Similarly, Zhang Jiadong, another India watcher associated with Fudan University argued that "both sides realize that their primary focus is still economic development and responding to changes in the international landscape. In that case, a costly border dispute is not in the interests of both countries."

The warming of Sino-Indian relations will make the US and the West uneasy and may impact their strategic layout and global and regional policies.

The Chinese side further notes how the handshake across the Himalayas can be an important turning point in global geopolitics and have a far-reaching international political significance. The warming of Sino-Indian relations will make the US and the West uneasy and may impact their strategic layout and global and regional policies. It is, therefore, no coincidence, they argue, that the US has been building pressure upon India on the Khalistan issue and has threatened to adopt severe measures if India does not cooperate. Simultaneously, other Western powers continue to court India and lure it into the "trap of replacing China". For example, Chinese scholars note with concern how German Chancellor Scholz recently led a delegation to India, promising the strengthening of German-Indian economic cooperation while publicly promoting a "de-risking from China" strategy and projecting India as an alternative to China.

However, while appreciating the development, Chinese scholars advise caution given the structural differences in China-India ties. There seems to be a consensus within the Chinese strategic community that "the border agreement signed by China and India does not mean that all issues have been resolved. The agreement's implementation, the progress of subsequent negotiations, and whether the two sides can trust each other are all important factors in the future of China-India relations." The signing of the agreement is only "a starting point".

Chinese scholars argue that true reconciliation with India will require greater patience and sincerity, as the border issue is complex, involves sovereignty issues, and is subject to interference from third parties or external forces. Liu Zongyi, director of the South Asia Research Center at the Shanghai Institutes for International Studies (SIIS), argued that although there have been some positive developments in bilateral ties, it will still take some time for the relationship to recover. Since India's great power ambitions and its overall strategic goals of outcompeting China have not changed much, China needs to exercise caution, particularly Chinese companies still need to adopt a cautious attitude when investing in India."

Final evaluation

The general feeling in China is that although both states have reached a preliminary agreement to disengage, the future development path of China-India relations is still full of potholes and slippery slopes. The two sides still face the possibility of a sudden escalation in conflicts and differences because the borderline has not yet been fully determined.

China will keep a keen eye on how India can maintain good relations with China while maintaining cooperation with the United States in the future.

In addition, the future direction of the China-US-India trilateral relationship is full of uncertainty. The US elections, scheduled for November 2024, will also impact China-India relations. China will keep a keen eye on how India can maintain good relations with China while maintaining cooperation with the United States in the future.

Similarly in India, the disengagement at Depsang and Demchok is ongoing, and the patrolling may begin around Diwali. However, hereafter both sides must negotiate de-escalation and de-induction and future access and patrolling in existing buffer zones. The completion of this process will bring back a modicum of sensitivity towards each other's red lines and may generate mutual respect. The Kazan Agreement, in sum, has reduced the animosity and mistrust and opened the scope for bilateral cooperation. The trust between both Indian and Chinese militaries, however, is a long way ahead.

EXPLAINED: How do Asia's authoritarian states pick leaders?

04 November 2024, RFA, Paul Eckert

Communist-style staged elections and hereditary strongmen dominate.

In a world bracing for a close U.S. presidential election result this week, a large swathe of Asia picks its leaders without suspense – and mostly with little popular participation.

Chinese leader Xi Jinping was confirmed by the National People's Congress in March 2013 with 2,952 votes for, one against, and three abstentions. Last year the rubber stamp parliament voted unanimously to give him a third term, putting him on track to stay in power for life.

North Korea's leaders have inherited their power from father to son for three generations. They are technically "elected" – but there is no choice. In 2014, Kim Jong Un was elected to the Supreme People's Assembly without a dissenting vote with 100% turnout.

A leadership succession that played out in Vietnam this year saw a serial purge of political rivals and the death of an ailing top leader propel To Lam, a wily career security policeman to the top of the Communist Party, where he is maneuvering for a key intra-party vote in early 2026.

In U.S. elections, the president and vice president are not elected directly in a popular vote by citizens. Instead, they are chosen through the Electoral College process, in which electors equal to the total number of representatives and senators a state has in Congress cast that state's votes. These electors vote according to the majority of residents in that state.

Members of Congress – 100 in the Senate and 435 in the House of the Representatives – are elected directly by residents of each of the 50 states.

How do the Communist-ruled countries in Asia choose their leaders?

Of the six countries covered by Radio Free Asia, whose mission is to provide independent media to territories that lack it, four – China, North Korea, Laos and Vietnam – were founded and organized on the Marxist-Leninist party-state model copied from the Soviet Union.

Some countries call themselves "democratic," but in practice the people have little or no say in choosing their leaders or governments.

NORTH KOREA

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea was founded in 1948 by Kim Il Sung, who had been cultivated by Moscow as a Cold War ally in the northern half of Korea.

North Korea describes itself as an "independent socialist state" with universal and compulsory suffrage at 17, and holds elections for the Supreme People's Assembly, the national legislature every four-to-five years, and for local People's Assemblies every four years.

In practice, each candidate is pre-selected by the North Korean government and voters are allowed to vote either "yes" or "no" in ballots that are not private. Nearly all elections report 100% support for the government.

CHINA

The People's Republic of China, founded in 1949 by Mao Zedong, describes itself as a "socialist democracy and a people's democratic dictatorship." Xi-era slogans describe it as "socialist consultative democracy" and "whole-process people's democracy."

China has universal suffrage from age 18, with voting at five levels of People's Congresses, from local townships to cities and provinces, to the parliamentary National People's Congress. Higher-level Congresses are indirectly elected by delegates of lower-level Congresses.

Technically not a one-party state, China has eight non-communist parties, including the Revolutionary Committee of the Chinese Kuomintang, the China Democratic League, the China National Democratic Construction Association and the China Association for Promoting Democracy.

However, as the U.S.-based Freedom House notes, "the CCP effectively monopolizes all political activity and does not permit meaningful political competition." The noncommunist parties serve in an advisory role, "but their activities are tightly circumscribed, and they must accept the CCP's leadership as a condition for their existence."

VIETNAM

The Socialist Republic of Vietnam, founded in 1975 after Ho Chi Minh's Democratic Republic of Vietnam (North Vietnam) overthrew the U.S.-backed Republic of Vietnam (South Vietnam), likewise followed the Soviet template of one-party politics.

Suffrage is universal at age 18, and direct elections are held for local People's Councils and the National Assembly – but all candidates are pre-approved by the ruling party.

"Vietnam is a one-party state, dominated for decades by the ruling Communist Party of Vietnam," says Freedom House. "Although some independent candidates are technically allowed to run in legislative elections, most are banned in practice."

In the May 2021 elections for 500 National Assembly seats, the Communist Party of Vietnam took 97.2% of the vote, while non-party candidates got 2.8%. The next election is in early 2026.

LAOS

In the Lao People's Democratic Republic, a Communist protégé of Vietnam also founded in 1975, "is a one-party state in which the ruling Lao People's Revolutionary Party dominates all aspects of politics and harshly restricts civil liberties," says Freedom House.

Laos has universal suffrage, and its president, vice president, and prime minister are elected by the National Assembly. These elections, however, have been deemed not free or fair, and in the most recent 2021 poll, the ruling party took 158 of the body's 164 seats, with the rest going to pre-approved independents.

"The electoral laws and framework are designed to ensure that the LPRP, the only legal party, dominates every election and controls the political system," says Freedom House.

CAMBODIA

Radio Free Asia's other target countries are Cambodia and Myanmar, more pluralistic states that have held competitive, if flawed elections.

Cambodia has been holding elections since 1993, as mandated by the 1991 Paris Agreements, which ended the country's civil war and mandated democratic elections under a parliamentary constitutional monarchy.

Cambodia's former Prime Minister Hun Sen shows his inked finger after voting at a polling station during the Senate election in Takhmao city, Kandal province on Feb. 25, 2024. (Tang Chhin Sothy/AFP)

In practice, however, Cambodia's political system has been dominated by the Cambodian People's Party and its leader Hun Sen. A strongman who violently refused to share power with coalition partners in the 1990s, Hun Sen ruled the country for more than three decades until handing power last year to his son, Hun Manet, but still wields great influence.

"While the country conducted semi-competitive elections in the past, polls are now held in a severely repressive environment," says Freedom House, noting Hun Sen's penchant for banning popular opposition parties.

The July 2023 National Assembly elections, held just a month before Hun Manet took over from his father, were condemned by the United States, the European Union and the United Nations as neither free nor fair.

MYANMAR

In November 2020, the country formerly known as Burma emerged from only its third semi-competitive election since its independence in 1948, a vote that delivered a strong majority to the National League for Democracy, or NLD, of de facto national leader Aung San Suu Kyi.

An official with the Myanmar Union Election Commission counts ballots at a polling station in Naypyidaw on Nov. 8, 2020. (Aung Shine Oo/AP) The multi-party election, which observers widely deemed credible despite flaws with conflict zone voting cancellations and registration, delivered 86 percent of the seats in the Assembly of the Union to Suu Kyi's NLD, routing the army-backed Union Solidarity and Development Party.

On Feb. 1, 2021, Myanmar's military, citing baseless claims of election fraud, deposed State Counsellor Suu Kyi and President Win Myint in a coup d'état, later jailing them.

The junta annulled the results of the 2020 vote, and pledged to hold elections in 2023 – but has repeatedly delayed this and extended its emergency rule as the nation became more deeply embroiled in a civil war that has killed thousands and destroyed wide swathes of the country.

The military regime has committed to holding a general election late next year, with voting to be staggered because of security concerns, but has continued to extend a state of emergency across the country and brought in tough new registration laws that disqualify many parties from standing.

TIBET

Chinese-run "autonomous" regions such as Hong Kong, Tibet and Xinjiang largely follow mainland practices. But Tibetans who followed the Dalai Lama when the spiritual leader fled into exile in India and other countries around the world in 1959, and their descendants, have been choosing their leaders.

In 2021, Tibetans living outside of their China-ruled homeland held their third election since 2011, to seat a new political leader, or sikyong, for their India-based government-in-exile called the Central Tibetan Administration.

Penpa Tsering won the CTA's leadership in a vote among the Tibetan diaspora, a community of about 150,000 people living in 40 countries, mainly India, Nepal, Europe and North America.

EXPLAINED: What is China's United Front and how does it operate?

03 November 2024, RFA, Paul Eckert

Praising it as a 'magic weapon,' Xi Jinping has expanded the murky influence operations.

Evidence is mounting of clandestine Chinese influence operations in the heart of America.

Just in the last few months, a former aide to the governor of New York state and her husband were arrested for alleged illicit activities promoting the interests of China; a Chinese democracy activist was arrested and accused of spying for China; and a historian was convicted of being an agent for Beijing. The three separate cases of former Albany functionary Linda Sun, dissident Yuanjun Tang and author Wang Shujun took place in New York alone. And they were not the first cases of alleged Chinese influence operations targeting immigrants from China in the Big Apple.

Those cases came to light as a detailed investigation by the Washington Post revealed that China's diplomats and pro-Beijing diaspora were behind demonstrations in San Francisco that attacked opponents during President Xi Jinping's visit to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation, or APEC, summit last November.

All bear the hallmarks of China's "united front" influence operations conducted by government ministries, party operatives and local proxies – but in a veiled manner.

"United front work is a unique blend of influence and interference activities, as well as intelligence operations that the CCP uses to shape its political environment," said the House of Representatives Select Committee on the Chinese Communist Party in a report published last November.

What is the United Front Work Department?

Coordinating this overseas influence and interference work is Beijing's shadowy United Front Work Department, or UFWD, set up in 1942, even before the Communists took over control of China.

Headed by Shi Taifeng, a Politburo member, it seeks to promote China's political interests through an extensive network of organizations and individuals around the world, experts say.

It spares no effort trying to push Beijing's view – and crush dissenting opinions – among people in Taiwan and Hong Kong, ethnic minorities such as Mongolians, Tibetans and Uyghurs as well as among religious groups.

How does the UFWD operate?

The United Front Work Department is engaged in a mixture of activities, from interfering in the Chinese diaspora and suppressing dissidents to gathering intelligence, encouraging investment in China and facilitating the transfer of technology, the Australian Strategic Policy Institute, or ASPI, said in a report.

It uses quasi-official organizations and civil society groups based overseas to blur the line between official and private, giving China plausible deniability in many cases, witnesses told the U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission, which advises Congress on China.

It funds Confucius Institutes – Chinese-language study centers on university campuses around the world – many of which have been shut down in the United States. It also funds diplomats' engagement with foreign elites and its police force's perpetration of "transnational repression" – clamping down on dissidents or opponents outside China's borders, the review commission said in a 2023 report based on expert testimony.

United front groups often have innocuous sounding names, like the Council for the Promotion of Peaceful National Reunification or the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Foreign Countries. Many appear to be ordinary overseas Chinese community organizations, and are found in business and even in multinational corporations.

Lurking behind or within them, though, are government or party agencies – very often China's powerful intelligence, security and secret police agency.

"United front groups are used – very specifically – to hide the Ministry of State Security," said Peter Mattis, head of the non-profit Jamestown Foundation. "This is why I like to think of the United Front Work Department as the tall grass that is sort of deliberately cultivated to hide snakes," he told RFA.

What is the history of China's 'united front' work?

Under the Moscow-led Comintern in the 1920s, the Chinese Communist Party adapted Soviet revolutionary Vladimir Lenin's concept of forming a "united front" – forging temporary alliances with friends and lesser enemies in order to defeat greater enemies.

After Mao Zedong's Communists took power in 1949, united front work focused internally on co-opting Chinese capitalists and intellectuals, who were brought to heel and persecuted in the 1950s under Mao's vicious ideological campaigns.

Xi Zhongxun, the father of current President Xi Jinping, played a key united front work role with top Tibetan Buddhist figures, trying to influence the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama.

What role has Xi played?

While China denies meddling in the affairs of foreign nations, experts say that under President Xi, China's overseas influence activities have become more aggressive and technologically sophisticated.

In 2017, Xi famously repeated Mao's description of united front work as a "magic weapon" for the party's success. But two years before that, he established a "leading small group" to coordinate top-level united front work and carried out a major expansion and reorganization of the UFWD.

"We will build a broad united front to forge great unity and solidarity, and we will encourage all the sons and daughters of the Chinese nation to dedicate themselves to realizing the Chinese Dream of national rejuvenation," Xi told the 20th Party Congress in 2022.

That congress saw Xi's top ideological theorist, Wang Huning, who ranks fourth in the Politburo, appointed to lead the national-level united front system, the House Select Committee report said.

Xi has built up the power and capacity of the UFWD, which controls 11 subordinate government agencies, including the Overseas Chinese Affairs Office, the State Ethnic Affairs Commission and the State Administration for Religious Affairs, according to Australia's ASPI.

What are some examples of the UFWD's efforts in the U.S.?

In New York, prosecutors say that Linda Sun and her husband, Christopher Hu, received millions of dollars in cash, event tickets and gourmet salted duck from the UFWD. In exchange, Sun tried to remove references to Taiwan in state communications, and obtained unauthorized letters from the governor's office to help Chinese officials travel, prosecutors say.

In California during Xi's visit in November, the Washington Post reported, the Chinese Consulate in Los Angeles paid for supporters' hotels and meals and directly interacted with aggressive actors who punched and kicked anti-Xi protesters and attacked them with flagpoles and chemical spray. U.S. stopovers by Taiwan leaders have drawn similar protests.

Who are the targets of united front work?

Sun and Hu represent a key demographic in the UFWD's crosshairs: the Chinese diaspora. The activist Tang had access to the overseas Chinese dissident and pro-democracy community and its network of supporters.

United front pressure and harassment tactics – including threats against family in China – are deployed against diaspora members of China's persecuted ethnic and religious minorities: Tibetans, Uyghurs, Mongolians, and members of the banned Falun Gong movement.

Citizens of Taiwan have for decades been pressured by united front efforts to support unification with the Communist-controlled mainland.

The recent imposition of draconian national security legislation in Hong Kong has made citizens and exiles who oppose those authoritarian steps in formerly free Chinese territory targets of united front pressure.

These targets are not alone and the list is growing, with Australia, Britain, Canada and New Zealand also grappling with Chinese influence campaigns that smack of united front work.

"There's no clear distinction between domestic and overseas united front work: all bureaus of the UFWD and all areas of united front work involve overseas activities," the report from Australia's ASPI said.

"This is because the key distinction underlying the United Front is not between domestic and overseas groups, but between the CCP and everyone else," it said.

The Chinese Embassy in Washington told Radio Free Asia that the United Front's domestic role is to "promote cooperation between the (Communist Party) and people who are not members of it." Outreach to the diaspora "helps give full play to their role as a bridge linking China with the rest of the world," the embassy spokesperson's office said in an e-mailed statement.

"Its work is transparent, above-board and beyond reproach," it said. "By making an issue out of China's United Front work, some people are trying to discredit China's political system and disrupt normal exchange and cooperation between China and the United States."

Why Xi Jinping dreads the Dalai Lama

03 November 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Vijay Kranti

Xi and the CCP are obsessed with the Dalai Lama, which is outrageous because of their declared contempt for religion and their denigration of the Dalai Lama.

On 21 October 2024, Penpa Tsering, the elected "President" of Tibet made experts from a leading New Delhi think-tank laugh aloud when he advised Chinese President Xi Jinping to order his Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to find out reincarnations of the great dead Chinese leaders like Chairman Mao and Deng Xiaoping. He made this tongue in cheek remark as he was underlining President Xi's feverish obsession with exclusive ownership of the process of discovering the next child reincarnation of the present Dalai Lama.

This obsession of Comrade Xi and his Communist Party looks funny, or is rather outrageous because of its declared contempt for religion and also that all Chinese leaders, right from Mao to Xi himself, have been using the choicest abusive terms in the Communist lexicon for the Dalai Lama. The six-century-old institution of the Dalai Lama of Tibet is unique because it occupies the supreme position in both spiritual as well as temporal matters of Tibet, and this inheritance transfers only through reincarnation. It is believed that enlightened souls like the Dalai Lamas and other learned monks have the virtue of guiding their own rebirth process. After the death of a Dalai Lama, the Tibetans search for, identify and install the next Dalai Lama baby boy through a typical process, which involves testing of all boy children born after the death of a Dalai Lama. A major factor which directs this search process are the personal indications and desires left behind by a Dalai Lama about the place, family and other elements of his own choice of his next birth.

In Tibet, China has been facing strong resistance from the Tibetan population right from the day when the Chinese PLA marched into Lhasa in 1951. In the initial four decades of Tibetan occupation, the communist masters of Tibet tried every tool under their command to suppress religion with the hope that absence of religion will make people understand and accept communism more faithfully. But it only provoked the Tibetan masses further to express their anger through small but frequent uprisings across Tibet. Massive uprising of Lhasa in 1987 and 1989 forced the Beijing leadership to realize the influence of religion and of Dalai Lama despite his three-decade long absence. It was decided to use religion as a tool rather than resisting it.

The first public signal of this change in Chinese strategy came in 1992 when Beijing decided to undertake and install the reincarnation of 16th Karma Pa. Same process was repeated in 1995 for identification of the incarnation of 10th Panchen Lama whom Beijing had used against the Dalai Lama till he died in Tibet at Shigatse in 1989. A committee of senior monks of late Panchen Lama's monastery was formed under the leadership of a communist officer to look out for the new incarnation of late Panchen Lama. The monk members of the committee identified a five-year-old boy, Gedhun Choeky Nyima and secretly took approval of the exiled Dalai Lama on the authenticity of the new incarnate boy. This angered Beijing so much that Gedhun and his parents were taken away by Chinese security personnel and another boy of the same age, named Gyaltsen Norbu, was formally installed as the new Panchen Lama. The whereabouts of Gedhun and his family are yet to be made public by the Chinese authorities despite repeated international outcries.

The Panchen Lama's role is important because the Dalai Lama and Panchen Lama play an important role in certifying the incarnation of each other and also work alternately as the teacher of the other's incarnation. Beijing has placed high stakes on Gyaltsen with the hope that he will be a useful tool when it comes to installing the next Dalai Lama. But the Tibetans have refused to accept. So much so that the Chinese administration uses police force and money to bring Tibetan crowds to his congregations. In 2007, the Chinese government adopted a special law called "Order-5" which governs the search process and certification of the reincarnation of the future "Living Buddhas" (or "Tulku" in Tibetan terminology). This law gives all powers for the selection of any future "Living Buddhas" to the respective Buddhist association of the respective region and is fully controlled by senior communist cadres.

Beijing has come to realize that it will be easy to tame the Tibetan people once the Dalai Lama is under its control. But as a permanent solution to its Tibetan headache the Xi government is now fully focused at establishing its exclusive claim over the next incarnation of the Dalai Lama. To pre-empt such Chinese efforts, the Dalai Lama issued a detailed official statement on 24 Sep 2011 which reads, "... the person who reincarnates has sole legitimate authority over where and how he or she takes rebirth and how that reincarnation is to be recognized. It is a reality that no one else can force the person concerned, or manipulate him or her..." adding further that, "it is particularly inappropriate for Chinese communists, who explicitly reject even the idea of past and future lives, let alone the concept of reincarnate Tulkus, to meddle in the system of reincarnation and especially the reincarnations of the Dalai Lamas and Panchen Lamas."

Being aware of Chinese plans about his reincarnation, the Dalai Lama had already played his master stroke by bifurcating the role and power of Dalai Lama by passing on all political powers, so far vested in the Dalai Lama, to the elected representatives of Tibet who comprise of the elected "Sikyong", the exile Parliament and the Tibetan judiciary. In practical terms it means that even if China manages to install a puppet Dalai Lama of its choice in Tibet, the real political powers will remain outside the control of Beijing or the CCP. This master stroke of the Dalai Lama has extended the shelf life of the political role of the Dalai Lama institution beyond his own life time and insulated the Tibetan system from Chinese manipulations.

Ladakh disengagement is good, but what about Eastern Himalayas?

02 November 2024, The Sentinel Assam, Amitava Mukherjee

There is now an atmosphere of excitement in the corridors of power in New Delhi. Military disengagement with China in eastern Ladakh has taken place.

There is now an atmosphere of excitement in the corridors of power in New Delhi. Military disengagement with China in eastern Ladakh has taken place. Armies of China and India have reportedly pulled back in Depsung and Demchok. This is good. But there is still a veil of silence over the 'Finger' points in the Pangong Tso lake area. Previously, India used to patrol till Finger 8. After the Chinese incursion, this came down up to Finger 4. What will happen here? Would India have to cede the area between the two abovementioned fingers? Till now, no clear cut official standpoint is available.

So, causes of worry remain. At the same time, there are glimmers of hope also. Xu Feihong, Chinese envoy to New Delhi, has expressed that relations between China and India are now standing at a new starting point with new development opportunities. Is it really so? In 1962 also Chou en Lai, the then Chinese Premiere, had said many such pious words before his army swooped down on North Eastern India and reached up to Bomdilla, situated deep in Arunachal Pradesh and right up to the borders of Assam.

New Delhi must always keep in mind that in Chinese geopolitical interests, Arunachal Pradesh is much more important to them than the Ladakh sector, where, in many stretches, "not even a blade of grass grows." By a blitzkrieg in this sector, they can overrun Daulat Beg Oldi, India's last military post, on the foot of the Karakoram pass and cut off the Siachin glacier. But how much can China gain by doing this? The DBO outpost can hardly threaten the China controlled Aksai Chin, which is five miles to the east. On the other hand, China is already in Pakistan through the China Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) coming through Gilgit-Baltistan and Azad Kashmir.

So, strategically, the importance of the western Himalayas is much less to China than it is in regard to the eastern Himalayas. Why is it so? The principal reason is China's burgeoning water shortage and, at the same time, increasing demands for electricity. To overcome it, Beijing is building up hydroelectric dams on the Brahmaputra in Tibet, thereby blocking the free flow of river water to India.

Now, the river valleys of Arunachal Pradesh have immense hydropower potential, currently estimated at 50,328 megawatts, or approximately 22 percent of India's power generating capacity. Control over this state would give China immense strategic security.

Interestingly, we have not heard anything from China in recent times for settling border problems in the eastern Himalayas, particularly in the McMahon Line sector that involves Arunachal Pradesh. On the contrary, it's renamed 30 places in this Indian state this year. On several occasions, China has included Arunachal Pradesh in its map.

With a certain motive, China is increasing its military capacity in the deep areas across Arunachal Pradesh. It is now well known that four sectors of the state, namely Asaphila, Tuting Axis, Chang Tze, and Fishtail 2, are under some kinds of Chinese threat.

There is no scope for oversatisfaction on the part of New Delhi over Beijing's future moves vis-à-vis Arunachal Pradesh. It is because the Tawang monastery of the state is invaluable to China for control over Tibetan Buddhism, which in turn means complete control over Tibet, an area now occupying the central position in China's foreign policy.

What would be New Delhi's approach now? Confabulations over the proper alignment of the McMahon Line are welcome. But at the same time, New Delhi should always be prepared for some surprises.

Opinion: Don't get 'river-crabbed!' How China is cracking down on punny dissent

02 November 2024, NPR, Scott Simon

An online blogger in China recently asked: how do you clean a flask? But the Mandarin word for flask is xi-jing-ping, which sounds like the name of China's leader, Xi Jin Ping. Government censors suspected the writer was really asking, "How do you get rid the president of China?" They took down the query.

If someone online in China refers to President Xi as a "paratrooper," they may not be hailing him as rugged and resourceful. Paratrooper in Mandarin is san bing, which sounds much like the word for "idiot."

China's Cyberspace Administration and Ministry of Education has begun what they call the Clear and Bright Campaign to prune the web in China of what they consider "irregular and uncivilized language."

Sponsor Message

The language bureaucrats aren't just watching for criticism of President Xi, mentions of the Tiananmen Square massacre, or demonstrations in Hong Kong. They want to extinguish the seemingly innocuous phrases many Chinese have ingenuously appropriated to express dissent.

Wen'guang Huang, the Chinese writer, translator, and author of the honored memoir, The Little Red Guard, who now lives in Chicago, gave us several examples.

Xiang jiao pi, which is banana peel in Mandarin, has the same acronym as the name of President Xi. The word for shrimp moss is xia tai, similar to the Mandarin phrase for "step down." When someone on the Chinese web dares to declare, "Banana peel shrimp moss!" it is heard as a call for President Xi to step down.

When a Chinese censor finds an "irregular" phrase, they eliminate it, but call it "harmonizing". He-xie, the Mandarin word for harmony, sounds like the word for river crab, and so people who have been censored report they have been "river-crabbed."

Then there's Cao Ni Ma, the Mandarin name for the mythical grass mud horse. It sounds similar to a phrase that is so profane, I can't even hint at it. The Mandarin phrase for "cover your middle parts", dang zhong yang, sounds close to the name of the Chinese Party Central Committee. And so the artist Ai Weiwei created a music video in which voices sing out, "Grass mud horse and cover your middle part!" in "Gangnam Style," and, "Grass mud horse and river crab!"

Wen'guang Huang says the video can't be seen in China, of course. But people there have heard about it, and might hum it in hushed tones. The tune is catchy and appealing – like free speech.

REVEALED: Inside the CIA's (largely) secret role in the Tibetan resistance

30 October 2024, RFA, Tenzin Pema, Dorjee Damdul, Passang Dhonden and Lobsang Gelek

The last surviving CIA officer, who trained Tibetan resistance fighters in Camp Hale, Colorado in 1958-64, speaks to Radio Free Asia in an exclusive interview.

High up in the Southern Rocky Mountains of Colorado, at 2,800 meters (9,200 feet), lies Camp Hale – widely known as the birthplace of backcountry skiing and the training grounds of the U.S. Army's 10th Mountain Division soldiers who fought the Nazis in World War II.

Lesser known, however, is the camp's storied past as the CIA-operated secret training facility for Tibetan resistance fighters in the early 1960's.

The Tibetan fighters who trained there – from 1958 to 1964 – were a part of a nationwide armed resistance movement in Tibet against Communist China.

Sixty years after the end of the operation, Camp Hale has yielded a new secret. Called "The Ranch" by the CIA and fondly referred to as "Dumra," or garden, by the Tibetans, it was the training ground for at least 259 Tibetan fighters who were then parachuted back into Tibet and what is today Nepal to aid the Tibetan resistance against China.

Yet, until recently the exact location of the CIA's training facility for Tibetans was lost to history. Quite like the story of Tibet's armed resistance against China and the CIA's role in it, it had remained shrouded in secrecy for many decades.

Decades after the CIA dismantled Camp Hale, leaving no trace of the site— save for a few ruins of bunkers— the original footprint of the Tibetan training camp was finally identified in 2024 within the 53,804-acre expanse of alpine valley, thanks to the work of a dogged academic, a local hiker, and a former CIA trainer.

In June, the families of former fighters, their supporters, and the Central Tibetan Administration's Cabinet Minister for Security, Gyari Dolma, gathered to honor the resistance movement.

Bruce Walker, now 91, is the last surviving CIA case officer out of about 30 officers who trained the Tibetan fighters at Camp Hale.

"I'm the last speaking CIA officer who can tell the story," Walker told Radio Free Asia in an exclusive interview on the sidelines of the June commemoration ceremony.

His tale of the time spent there reveals the spirit of a people deeply committed to their cause who drew on a wellspring of grit, ingenuity and ability to learn the skills Camp Hale had to offer.

Finding Dumra

Following the People's Liberation Army's invasion of Tibet in 1949, thousands of ordinary Tibetans rose up in a series of independent uprisings in the 1950s to defend their country and religion against Chinese troops. In 1958, the Chushi Gangdruk army, a unified resistance force, was formally established.

Led by Gompo Tashi Andrugtsang, a charismatic trader living in Lhasa, it later became known as the Chushi Gangdruk Tensung Danglang Magar or Tibetan National Volunteer Defence Army, a name it was given by a tutor to His Holiness the Dalai Lama. In 1960, they set up a base in Mustang, then a small kingdom in Nepal, where they were exiled, until they were eventually forced to lay down their arms in 1974.

For a large part of this period, the movement received covert financial support and training from the CIA, with four contingents of Tibetan troops flown in to train at Camp Hale from 1958 to 1964.

Yet it was a secret even to those who lived nearby the Colorado training grounds.

"The local community here in Colorado still don't know the Tibetan history of Camp Hale – much in the same way that the Tibetan community still don't know much of the history of Chushi Gangdruk or CIA in Camp Hale," said Carole McGranahan, an anthropologist and scholar of Tibet who spent years working to locate the site.

Indeed, a false story was circulated at the time to maintain the secrecy of the training site and keep the locals at bay. "Atom Unit Making Tests Near Leadville," read a headline from the Denver Post in July 1959, after the press was informed that the Defense Atomic Support Agency would soon be conducting atomic testing programs at Camp Hale.

"I like to think of it now as that it was hidden in plain sight," said McGranahan, noting how the CIA maintained the secrecy of the camp for over four decades.

Word of the camp and the CIA's role in training Tibetan fighters there only began to trickle out in the early 2000s following the declassification of a 1964-dated CIA memorandum.

A documentary released just before, titled Shadow Circus: The CIA in Tibet, by filmmakers Tenzing Sonam and Ritu Sarin, also drew attention to the Tibetan resistance movement, even as additional details began to emerge from books, such as McGranahan's Arrested Histories, and interviews of former CIA trainers.

Still, the site itself continued to remain hidden. In 2010, a plaque was installed to mark the U.S. government's first public acknowledgment of the CIA-Tibet training camp. But even then, the exact location of the training site was unknown.

Following a ceremony to mark its installation, retired CIA officers and former Tibetan fighters went looking for the original Camp Hale training grounds. The group included Roger McCarthy and Ken Knauss, the two CIA officers who had worked on the original campaign. But they came back frustrated and dismayed that they couldn't locate the site where they had lived and worked for several years, McGranahan said. She promised to make it her mission to locate the original site.

It would take years, but true to her word, McGranahan, with the help of Vail Valley local resident and hiker Tracy Walters, took on the mission. The duo took with them old photographs of Camp Hale and, while snowshoeing, matched the 1963-1964 photos to the current landscape by carefully aligning specific ridgelines to locate Dumra. In February 2024, they found the first location – rather easily, McGranahan says. "The second one was more difficult," she added, explaining that it required matching up the visual angles of old photographs to the physical topography of the land until they hit on the right spot.

"But we found it," she said.

She then turned to Walker and to filmmakers Sonam and Sarin for final confirmation on whether the site they had located was indeed Dumra.

Walker, who was the only Tibetan-speaking CIA trainer from 1960 until the CIA shut the site in 1964, responded the very next day. "You nailed it," he wrote. "You found the site. And I'm the one who took those photographs."

An operation misunderstood?

Along with his wife and few friends, Walker came to Camp Hale from California in June to honor the Tibetan soldiers who he trained in the covert operation which the CIA code-named ST Circus.

Now an elegant white-haired nonagenarian, Walker lit up as he recalled his time working on ST Circus, his voice filled with energy as he explained the backstory of the secret mission and smiling fondly as he recalled the commitment of the Tibetan fighters whom he had trained.

"The covert operation was misunderstood in some respects... [there's] the impression that the Americans in the CIA were taking advantage of the Tibetans. We were not," Walker told RFA Tibetan.

"Tibetans in the 1950s and 60s had very few international friends... in the late 1950s, the American government and the CIA were the few from the international community that were willing to come to the aid of the Tibetans," he said.

Indeed, the CIA would support the movement with training, aid, and arms until the early 1970s.

"We did what we could to get them their aid. We were not going to send an army and we were not going to send tanks, but we tried to send help to Chushi Gangdruk to fight and to make progress in the rest of the country," said Walker.

At Camp Hale, over a dozen CIA case officers trained Tibetan fighters on a full range of combat and operations skills.

"This site was specifically used for the purpose of training radio teams who would be parachuted back to Tibet to join the resistance forces and to send back messages about the situation – the resistance inside Tibet – on a real-time basis," Walker told RFA Tibetan. Over the years, the soldiers who trained there were air dropped into Tibet and in Mustang, Nepal, where they aided and trained the thousands of resistance fighters stationed at those locations.

It was actually not the first site for ST Circus. Earlier, the CIA had piloted the project with a group of fighters who were trained at Saipan, Northern Mariana Island. The first radio team to be dropped back into Tibet by Operations St Circus took place in September, 1957 – but the training grounds were moved to Camp Hale when it became apparent that the Tibetans were not used to the hot weather conditions of the island, and Colorado was selected because its terrain and weather conditions resembled that of Tibet.

Life at Camp Hale

Walker's first assignment with the Tibetan project had been as a caretaker and cook for six weeks for the small contingent of Tibetans who trained at Saipan.

He first arrived in Camp Hale as a case officer in April 1960, but he would not be at the camp on a permanent basis until two years later, after the CIA sent him for periods of more language training. Sporting a red beard and looking like an “adventurous American”, Walker returned to Camp Hale in September 1962, where he found the site had been renovated with new quarters added and ready to open its doors to the fourth and final batch of trainees who arrived in October that year.

The camp had four classrooms, one recreation room, one staff barracks, one administration office, a gym, a mess hall, and a storage room.

The Tibetan fighters had a rigorous training program there. “It was a very busy campus,” Walker recalled, with the trainees always “practicing one thing or another, or they were in the classrooms.”

It was a huge time of learning for Walker too. “I started out as a case officer who was not speaking Tibetan, giving instruction and compass reading to find locations on a very special map made by the CIA,” he said.

He eventually gained enough proficiency to communicate directly with the trainees. “It was a very different career change in speaking a different language to an entirely different people who I had never met before,” he reflected.

The Tibetans were trained in radio operation; surveillance and combat maneuvers; parachuting at Fort Carson, another military base in Colorado; intelligence collecting; clandestine exchange of written material and film; world history and geography; and small armament training with bazookas, grenades and rifles.

“All were given training with the M1-Garand rifle, and the old 10th mountain division rifle range. Two marine sharpshooters were seconded to this project and they also gave the Tibetans instructions in self defense and jiu jitsu,” Walker said.

Walker and the other CIA officers admired the Tibetan fighters, who had volunteered for the movement and had been recruited as exiles in India.

They represented Tibetans from all over Tibet and came with varying backgrounds; they even included monks who had temporarily given up their vows to fight for the Tibet cause.

“They were not paid. They were simply willing and able... And boy, were they able,” said Walker.

They were also quick learners, he recalled. “They were enthusiastic, they listened, and they took to the training immediately. Above all, they were happy to be here... And it was a real pleasure to work with them in that respect because they made it easier for us to get to know them and to try to accomplish through the training,” he added.

Tibetan curiosity, resilience

The CIA officers were amazed by the Tibetan curiosity and ability to invent solutions to problems with the materials at hand, said Walker.

There was one instance, where the fighters had reportedly made a portable rocket, apparently out of a wooden trough, using gunpowder, homemade napalm, and a small warhead, he said, citing a local Vail Daily report.

The Tibetans also had a natural gift for volleyball and engaged in highly competitive tournaments. On weekends, movies would be projected in the recreation room and headquarters would send new movies on a rotation basis. The Tibetans, without any surprise, liked western movies. But their favorite was The King and I.

“Their response was a pure delight to watch,” Walker said.

They also had a “remarkable talent” for drawing, Walker said. Crayons and colored pens were made available for drawing and few of their drawings became collectibles, including an illustration that a Tibetan fighter had made representing Chinese desecration of Tibetan culture and religion which was used in CIA material.

On Saturday nights, the Tibetans took over the kitchen from the CIA cooks Joe and Bill, and would make Tibetan dishes like momo and shabaley.

But they didn’t (strictly) stick to this routine. One day, a shepherd from the area – who had a longstanding agreement with the government for him to traverse Camp Hale with his sheep as he led them to summer pastureland – found one sheep missing when he returned with the sheep after a month of their grazing. “His route happened to go directly past the Tibetan compound. Not wanting to cause suspicion by denying the shepherd his annual drive, we arranged for the compound to close up tightly, presumably with everyone inside the compound and out of sight," said Walker.

Upon his return, having led his herd through the compound and out of Camp Hale, the herder soon counted his sheep and found he was missing one. "He reported his loss to army authorities and the situation was brought to our attention. We had no recourse but to suggest the sheep must have drifted from the herd, gone astray and could not be found," Walker said.

"Somehow we found out that two Tibetans had waylaid the sheep and later roasted it and brought it into the compound for the fellow Tibetans to eat. The herder was angry and unsatisfied but as far as we were concerned, it was out of sight, out of mind."

Best and bravest

In 1960, part of the training was to practice parachute landing in advance of being airdropped in Tibet. However, after a U.S. civilian pilot was shot down over Russia in May 1960, President Eisenhower banned further overflights into Tibet.

Thereafter, the radio teams and the support teams were flown back to Thailand, and over land to border posts in India and Nepal, including Mustang. Walker acknowledged the grim reality that awaited these men upon their return to Tibet. "They knew what would be the consequences if they were parachuted to Tibet," Walker said somberly.

"A lot of the Tibetans who were trained on the radio teams that were parachuted in gave their lives. They were captured. Some of them went to jail, and a few of them were released, in time," he said. "But there were a lot of heroes — as this will attest — who sacrificed their lives as Tibetans."

An important legacy

The training program at Camp Hale was closed in 1964 as the U.S. began to take a more conciliatory approach to China. CIA support for the Tibetan resistance movement ended altogether in the early 1970s as the Nixon administration took an approach of engagement with Mao's Communist regime. Along with increased pressure from the Nepali government, which also began to cultivate warmer ties with China and internal fissures that emerged within the movement itself, the Chushi Gangdruk was forced to lay down its arms by 1974.

Though the program wound down, a legacy, including crucial successes, came from the Operation ST Circus trainings that has significance today, even if the resistance movement ultimately did not achieve independence.

For example, the first radio team ever trained as part of the CIA operation at Saipan — two fighters, Athar Norbu and Gatsetsang Lotse (codenamed Tom and Luke, respectively) — were airdropped in September 1957.

The team, known as Team A, were able to contact local Chushi Gangdruk members in Kham, eastern Tibet, and reach Lhasa, making contact with Tibetan leaders such as the Lord Chamberlain, Thupten Phalha. As explained by Gyolo Thondup in his book The Noodle Maker of Kalimpong, the Dalai Lama was not directly involved in the CIA operations, as it was impossible for him to condone any use of violence when his entire life was committed to nonviolent Buddhist practice.

But some high-ranking officials such as Lord Chamberlain Phalha knew about the resistance from the beginning and were sympathetic to its cause.

"It was Phalha who organized the Dalai Lama's escape... Team A accompanied the Dalai Lama on his journey to the Indian border from where they radioed CIA Langley that the Dalai Lama had arrived safely," said Walker.

In the Dalai Lama's personal autobiography titled My Land, My People, the spiritual leader acknowledged the bravery of the Tibetan freedom fighters who accompanied him undercover into exile in 1959. "In spite of my beliefs, I very much admired their courage and their determination to carry on the grim battle they had started for our freedom, culture, and religion," he wrote.

"I thanked them for their strength and bravery, and also, more personally, for the protection they had given me."

The Dalai Lama's escape into exile and the role the Chushi Gangdruk played in his safe escort from Lhasa to India is still today regarded as the movement's most significant achievement.

Today, plans are afoot to build a memorial on the now-rediscovered exact training ground. The plaque that was installed in 2010 stands not too far away, its inscription attesting to the bravery of those involved: From 1958 to 1964, Camp Hale played an important role as a training site for Tibetan Freedom Fighters. Trained by the CIA, many of these brave men lost their lives in the struggle for freedom. 'They were the best and bravest of their generation, and we wept together when they were killed fighting alongside their countrymen.' (Orphans of the Cold War, by John Kenneth Knaus). This plaque is dedicated to their memory.

Standing by the plaque, at the site he'd played a part in re-discovering and which brought back so many memories, Walker mused over the friendships gained and lost to history.

"It was an emotional parting because we became very good friends with the Tibetans and they with us. We bonded, and we were sorry that we had to break it up the way we did," he said.

Has India made friends with China after the Modi-Xi agreement?

29 October 2024, Brookings

“Modi and Xi make friends” announced the Economist following Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping’s meeting in Kazan. The newspaper subsequently declared that, following an agreement on disengagement and patrolling, the Sino-Indian border stand-off had been “resolved.”

These developments are noteworthy, but they must not be over-read. It is significant that, if implemented, the agreement could ease tensions between China and India stemming from their border crisis in 2020. But current and former Indian officials are striking notes of caution, including about getting “lulled into a false sense of security.”

Modi and Xi’s meeting—their first in five years—signals a tactical thaw rather than a strategic shift away from Sino-Indian rivalry. Steps remain to resolve the 2020 border row, and the two countries have several serious differences beyond their broader border dispute. So, think of this as akin to Washington’s effort to stabilize or set a floor to the U.S.-China relationship, rather than the beginning of a beautiful friendship between New Delhi and Beijing. For India, China will remain the pacing challenge.

The context

It has been evident for a few months that China and India were working toward an agreement. Military and diplomatic officials have met for the last four years to discuss the border stand-off. But New Delhi seemed to detect a window of opportunity recently, as Beijing faces strategic and economic pressure, and is uncertain about the U.S. election (or tries to take advantage of it).

India, too, has reasons to try to ease the situation. These include preventing another border escalation; recognition that India needs time to build its capabilities and partnerships; the need to grapple with the adverse impact of global crises; uncertainty about the next American president’s approach to China; concern that its partners’ outreach to Beijing could leave India vulnerable; perhaps a desire to create some leverage vis-à-vis with those partners; and calls for selective Indian economic re-engagement with China (including from some American companies).

What we know about the agreement

Specifics are still emerging, but we do know that the agreement heralds a return to dialogue. Beyond the Modi-Xi meeting, the countries announced the revival of suspended consultations, including the special representatives’ talks, and regular foreign ministerial and other exchanges.

Indian officials announced that the first part of resolving the 2020 border stand-off, i.e. disengagement, has been completed, with new patrolling arrangements at some points of friction (around Depsang and Demchok in the western sector, and Yangtse—site of a 2022 skirmish—in the eastern sector).

However, this is not a return to the status quo ante. Questions remain about how the new patrolling and grazing terms compare with what existed before, and whether new buffer zones created at other friction points would persist. Moreover, two further steps—de-escalation and de-induction of troops that have been forward deployed—have not been taken.

The agreement also doesn’t signify a normalization of Sino-Indian ties, as some observers contend. The Indian foreign secretary said that it opens the pathway to more normal ties, but stressed that is contingent on both sides actually walking that path.

Given the Indian sense that China violated previous bilateral agreements in changing the status quo at the border in 2020, there is little, if any, trust that Beijing will walk that path. So, India will closely watch Beijing’s implementation of the agreement and seek to verify that China is following through on its commitments. Further Indian steps vis-à-vis border negotiations or other issues may be linked to Beijing doing so.

If there is progress, there are several areas where India could review the limitations it has imposed on cooperation with China. A few possibilities: restarting various dialogues (diplomatic, military, and economic) that have been suspended, restoring direct flights, more civil society interactions, granting more visas (including for journalists), specific cooperation on multilateral issues (e.g. global economic governance reform), and selective economic re-engagement.

There is no consensus—even among Indian businesses—on the desirability or extent of economic ties with China. But if there is progress at the border or in negotiations, India could ease restrictions in areas that are less sensitive or where there is hope that, on balance, cooperation will be beneficial in the short term for Indian labor, manufacturing, and exports. A blanket lifting of restrictions is unlikely; streamlining the scrutiny or case-by-case approval process is possible.

There have already been some approvals of visas and imports when the Indian government saw those as necessary to enable companies—from India or friendly foreign countries—to make India part of global supply chains and generate jobs. In certain areas, India could make the condition of any Chinese investment a joint venture with a local company. Eventually, Delhi wants to do to Beijing what Beijing did to the world: take its expertise and components and then eventually take its markets.

Different readouts, different vibes

Most Indian officials don't seem to be under any illusions that the path ahead will be easy. The persistent gap between China and India has already been evident in how they have messaged these agreements.

Both the Indian and Chinese readouts stated that they reached an understanding on the border and agreed to enhance strategic communication.

But that's where the similarities ended. India emphasized its "border before broader" prioritization, reinforcing border peace and tranquility as a prerequisite for broader ties. China, on the other hand, maintained its "broader before border" focus, stressing that "specific disagreements" should not derail the broader relationship.

In addition, China suggested that India had agreed to return to economic cooperation to enable development, while India was more non-committal, saying it was open to exploring it. More broadly, the Chinese readout also suggested that Modi who was the one interested in proposing ways to deepen ties, with Xi then agreeing "in principle" to consider it.

The countries' diverging visions of their global and regional roles were also striking. India noted that both leaders affirmed that stable and amicable ties would "contribute to a multipolar Asia and a multipolar world" but the Chinese statement only mentioned the desire for a multipolar world. This will only reinforce Indian concerns that Beijing seeks a unipolar Asia. India, in turn, did not echo or endorse Xi's declaration that China was "a member of the Global South."

The gap between India's worldview and that of China (and Russia) was also clear in Modi's remarks at the BRICS summit. He cautioned against the group being seen as divisive (i.e., anti-Western) and out to upturn the international order. His words also conveyed concern that BRICS expansion, encouraged by Beijing and Moscow, would dilute India's role and influence.

Important step, but not a strategic reset

These divergences, among others, reveal that New Delhi and Beijing aren't on the same page. Moreover, absent a significant change in China's intentions and actions, the recent agreement will not herald a strategic shift away from India's rivalry with China.

For one, the border has changed for good. De-escalation and de-induction will be difficult, if not impossible, given the troop, equipment, and infrastructure buildup on both sides of the Sino-Indian border since 2020. India also distrusts China and will want to remain prepared if the People's Liberation Army takes action again. One former Indian ambassador to China has already cautioned that it would be tougher for India (than China) to re-induct troops into that sector of the border if Beijing reneges from its commitments.

Even beyond the ongoing border dispute, there are several other bilateral, regional, and global differences between India and China—and there has been no let-up in Chinese assertiveness on any of those fronts yet.

Moreover, the mistrust seems mutual. China sees India as a regional, and possibly global, competitor—in its own right and due to its close partnership with Beijing's other rivals (especially the United States).

Thus, even as New Delhi reengages Beijing in dialogue, it will keep trying to strengthen its resilience and deterrence. It will maintain its de-risking approach and likely limit exposure to China in critical infrastructure, technology, and telecom sectors. It will enhance Indian capabilities and capacities across the board, though it will have to guard against calls from certain quarters that there's less urgency to do so. And it will likely continue to deepen its balancing partnerships, including with Washington.

Some partners might wonder if India will become more reticent to cooperate with them, so as not to derail its reengagement with China. But even as it has been negotiating with Beijing, New Delhi has not held back—as it might have pre-2020—on taking several steps. These include Modi's reply to Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te; India's welcoming of a U.S. Congressional delegation that met with the Dalai Lama and criticized China; the Quad summit, which included tougher language on China's assertiveness in the South China Sea and security cooperation initiatives; hosting maritime exercise Malabar and multilateral air force exercise Tarang Shakti; participating in a maritime reconnaissance exercise with its Quad partners on the sidelines of Australia's exercise Kakadu; and the opening of a third Taiwanese representative office in India.

This might be due to a change from the sentiment that deepening ties with the United States and Western partners would provoke China, to believing—since 2020—that deeper ties with balancing partners would deter Beijing.

Nonetheless, it won't be surprising if partners continue to monitor the possibility of Indian hesitation to cooperate with them vis-à-vis China in the future. It would be helpful if New Delhi is as transparent as possible with its partners about its discussions with China and their implications—something its partners should reciprocate regarding their own outreach to Beijing.

EXPLAINED: What's Hong Kong's role in China's hi-tech military plans?

29 October 2024, RFA, Ha Syut

The city is named in a U.S. ban on AI, semiconductors and quantum computing investments in 'countries of concern.'

The U.S. Treasury Department finalized an investment ban aimed at curbing China's military-linked high-tech ambitions in artificial intelligence, advanced computer chips and quantum computing this week, prompting angry reactions in Beijing and Hong Kong on Tuesday.

New rules issued Monday bar U.S. businesses and citizens from investing in a slew of advanced technologies in "countries of concern," and specifically list mainland China, Hong Kong and Macau among them.

"U.S. investments ... must not be used to help countries of concern develop their military, intelligence and cyber capabilities," Paul Rosen, assistant Treasury secretary for investment security, told the Associated Press, warning that such investments also bring with them other benefits including managerial help and assistance finding top talent and tapping other sources of financing.

Violators can be hit with a fine could be as high as twice the value of the prohibited transaction or US$368,136, whichever is greater. The rules will be enforced by a newly created Office of Global Transactions, the agency reported.

China "strongly deplores and firmly opposes" the ban, foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian told a news briefing in Beijing, while Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee said it would damage global supply chains, warning that "American politicians will suffer the consequences" of pursuing what he called their "political interests."

Why has Hong Kong been named in the latest investment restrictions?

There is growing evidence that the ruling Chinese Communist Party is leveraging Hong Kong universities and private companies for research funding, expertise and links to global supply chains.

A low-orbit AI surveillance satellite jointly designed and developed by the Chinese University of Hong Kong that was successfully launched on Sept. 24, 2024, ostensibly for use in "disaster prevention."

But experts say the technology used in such hardware, which can monitor the movements of people and vehicles to distances of less than one meter, can very easily be modified for military use.

The university's Chinese partner in the project, state-owned Nationstar Aerospace, was named by national security expert Elsa Kania at a U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission hearing last year as an example of "military-civil fusion," a key goal of Chinese President Xi Jinping's military modernization program, which seeks to blur the line between military operations and the civilian economy in an all-out bid to modernize the People's Liberation Army.

Are other Hong Kong universities involved in these plans?

At least four universities, including the Chinese University of Hong Kong named in the above example, are known to have worked on the development of remote-sensing satellite technology, which is also used in military reconnaissance.

Hong Kong's Polytechnic University has boasted of having "more than 30 years' experience" in aerospace research, and has participated in Chinese space missions on many occasions, and was involved in the joint development of a "surface sampling execution device" for China's Chang'e-6 lunar probe and in the 2021 Tianwen-1 Mars rover mission.

In September, it signed a cooperation agreement with Nationstar Aerospace, sanctioned by the United States in 2022 for allegedly trying to steal sensitive technology, to set up a remote sensing lab to "jointly conduct scientific research that contributes to national development."

In August 2023, the Hong Kong University of Science and Technology collaborated with China's Changguang Satellite Technology, another key player in Xi Jinping's military-civil fusion strategy, in the successful launch of the first earth observation satellite, the Xiongbing-1.

Changguang Satellite Technology was sanctioned in June by the European Union for "supporting the Russian military-industrial complex" in the Ukraine war.

The University of Hong Kong's space lab researchers also worked on the Lobster Eye dark matter detection satellite, launched in July 2020, alongside companies in the China Aerospace family of state-owned companies, which includes missile-maker China Aerospace Science and Industry Corp.

In 2021, lunar exploration third phase designer Hu Hao predicted "more collaboration between the Chinese mainland and Hong Kong in the country's aerospace projects in the future," state media reported, adding that the University of Hong Kong had a "competitive edge" in remote sensing technology.

"We certainly hope to work with competitive and strong institutions to research and design aerospace facilities and equipment," Hu said.

What role do Hong Kong companies play in this process?

According to Shu Hsiao-huang, associate researcher of the Chinese military at Taiwan's Institute for National Defense and Security Research, some Chinese state-owned conglomerates and universities have well-documented ties to the People's Liberation Army, and are obvious targets for international sanctions, while private sector companies in Hong Kong are far more likely to be able to evade scrutiny.

"They're taking the opportunity now to find some loopholes via universities and private companies, especially in the field of AI, which absolutely needs private innovation, investment and development," Shu told RFA Cantonese in a recent interview. "State-owned enterprises are too easily targeted because they're so big, so private enterprises are used to inject innovative power into state-owned companies." Hong Kong is also a great place to source supplies by setting up companies not perceived to have military links, with a straightforward company registration process that has seen a proliferation of shell companies in recent years.

"[China is] using Hong Kong's advantages to set up companies just to help with sourcing, or that could then collaborate with universities in Hong Kong, for example, or with other private companies, as a way around this," Shu said.

How much is Hong Kong spending on such projects? Investment in national innovation and high-tech schemes became a policy priority after the government rewrote election rules to exclude opposition candidates from public office.

But precise breakdowns are hard to come by.

In 2020, the city's government pumped HK$2 billion (US$257 million) into its Innovation and Technology Fund to fuel innovative start-ups in the Greater Bay Area that includes neighboring cities in mainland China, but has never published a detailed account of where the money goes.

In his October 2024 policy address, John Lee announced a HK$10 billion Innovation & Technology Industry-Oriented Fund "to guide more market capital to invest in specified emerging and future industries of strategic importance, including life and health technology and artificial intelligence."

Officials at the city's Innovation and Technology Bureau said they had funded 76,000 projects since the fund began on June 30, 1999 to the tune of around HK$45 billion (US$5.8 billion), but declined to provide a breakdown requested by RFA Cantonese.

The universities mentioned in this article declined to respond when asked for details of funding for their collaborations with military-linked Chinese enterprises.

Yet it seems there's plenty of money around in the sector.

According to the National Bureau of Statistics, China invested more than 3.3 trillion yuan (US$462 billion) in research and development last year, a rise of 8.4% on the previous year. China's nationwide R&D expenditure is currently second only to that of the United States.

China also saw the creation of more than 110,000 new aerospace companies last year, a rise of nearly 30% from the previous year, with the country launching hundreds of satellites in the past three years. That is likely to rise to more than 10,000 over the next decade.

Confronting the Growing Threat of the Chinese Communist Party

29 October 2024, Congressman Dan New House

Over the past two years, as a member of the House Select Committee on Strategic Competition between the United States and the Chinese Communist Party, we have uncovered the malign influence the CCP has in American institutions. With these revelations, we have committed to finding real, actionable solutions to prevent the CCP from tightening their grip on our nation's security and way of life.

The Select Committee has exposed numerous CCP schemes aimed at undermining our national security. From increased land purchases near sensitive sites to directly incentivizing the illicit fentanyl trade, the CCP is one of the greatest threats to our nation. Standing strong against them is imperative, which is why the House of Representatives has passed over twenty-five pieces of necessary legislation to safeguard our military, economic, ideological, and technological interests, including legislation I wrote to protect American agricultural land. We also passed several bills which originated directly from the Select Committee, reflecting the policy recommendations we have been developing since last year.

Securing our supply chains—from electric vehicle batteries to healthcare and critical infrastructure—is essential. As the CCP works to ensure the United States is dependent on Chinese companies for the products we use daily, I proudly supported legislation like the BIOSECURE Act, which would prohibit United States companies from using biotechnology from companies associated with foreign adversaries like the CCP. We also passed the End Chinese Dominance of Electric Vehicles in America Act and the Decoupling from Foreign Adversarial Battery Dependence Act, both of which take steps to protect taxpayer dollars from being used by the CCP to advance its leverage over our supply chains.

As we know, the CCP has also increased their investment in U.S. agricultural land tenfold, which raises serious concerns about their growing influence over our food security. To address this, the House of Representatives passed my bill, the Protecting American Agriculture from Foreign Adversaries Act, which adds the Secretary of Agriculture to the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. for transactions and requires them to report any updates that could be a threat to national security. This issue is part of a broader pattern of economic influence that the CCP exerts on vital American industries, and the federal government must stay aware.

Where we see the CCP's strongest grip on global resources and our supply chains is through critical mineral production—an industry essential to electric vehicles and lithium batteries. With China controlling the vast majority of mineral resources needed for battery manufacturing, I introduced legislation to promote U.S. production of these critical minerals. The Securing America's Midstream Critical Materials Processing Act establishes a framework to bring critical material processing back to American soil, away from foreign adversaries like the CCP, and reduces the unworkable permitting barriers to help secure supply chains. The United States produces energy cleaner and more cost-effective than anywhere else, and this bill would allow us to end our dependence on an adversary that could bring this industry to a halt at any time.

The CCP's campaign of malign influence poses a direct threat to American industry, jobs, and national security, and it is past time we take decisive action. By relying heavily on a nation intent on weakening the United States, we expose ourselves to unprecedented threats. I will continue advancing policies that will decouple our supply chains from our greatest adversary and ensure our nation is not beholden to those who oppose our values and way of life.

Data shows the Chinese government is less popular than state media makes it seem

29 October 2024, East Asia Forum

The White Paper protests, which spread across China in November 2022, were triggered by the death of ten people during a fire in a quarantined apartment building in Urumqi. The protests reflected widespread dissatisfaction with the Chinese government's COVID-19 policies, which forced observers of Chinese politics to question whether the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) really enjoys widespread popular support.

In contrast with the majority of protests in China driven by discontent with local governments, the White Paper demonstrations offered critiques of the central government and the CCP's rule more generally. The CCP's legitimacy—resting on the party's achievements in developing China's economy and reducing poverty, maintaining social stability through censorship and repression, and, increasingly, promoting a nationalist vision of China's future—depends to a great extent on public perceptions of the regime.

Popular political attitudes in China have shaped the regime's domestic stability, the reception of its policies, and constrained its foreign policy decisions. These pillars of CCP legitimacy appear to be shifting beneath the regime's monolithic facade, as demonstrated by the White Paper protests. Whether due to China's slowing economy, the concentration of power under Xi Jinping or the heavy-handedness of the country's COVID-19 response, researchers and policymakers must carefully analyse these changes in popular attitudes or risk greatly misunderstanding state-society dynamics.

For scholars of Chinese politics, the most common tool applied to gauge public opinion is a direct survey, in which respondents are asked about their attitudes towards the Chinese government via in-person enumerators or online forms.

One prominent study, published by the Ash Center for Democratic Governance at Harvard University, has traced popular attitudes toward the Chinese government since 2003. Their surveys place regime support above 90 per cent, suggesting that favourable views of the Chinese government are as ubiquitous as party propaganda might suggest. These results have been covered by China Central Television, Xinhua, China Global Television Network, China Daily and other CCP propaganda outlets, becoming part of the state's efforts to substantiate its legitimacy—both at home and abroad.

But does the CCP really enjoy such widespread support? Or do survey respondents conceal their opposition to the regime due to the threat of repression? And if so, what share of Chinese citizens really support the CCP? To answer these questions, we employed a survey technique known as a list experiment. In a list experiment, respondents are provided with a short list of nonsensitive statements, such as 'I consider myself a sports fan', and are asked to tally up the number of statements they agree with.

Respondents were randomly assigned to either a control group or a treatment group, with treated individuals receiving an additional sensitive statement, like 'I support comrade Xi Jinping' or 'the CCP government works for the people'.

The results, which were published in the China Quarterly, reveal widespread preference falsification. With direct questions, individuals reported their support for Xi, the CCP and the Chinese government at rates similar to those found in prior direct survey research, reaching upwards of 90 per cent support for the regime. With list experiments, support for the regime dropped to between 50 per cent to 70 per cent.

Since list experiments may not fully obviate respondents' concerns about online surveillance, this is more likely an upper bound on regime support. Respondents were more willing to express opposition to 'the system of government' than to Xi or the CCP directly.

Across questions and survey waves, support for the regime varied consistently across three characteristics. Ethnic Han respondents supported Xi about 20 percentage points more than minority respondents. College-educated respondents were between 10–20 percentage points more supportive of the CCP than respondents who completed early middle school. This may be because the CCP's efforts to shape educational curricula have succeeded, or because college-educated Han perform considerably better in the labour market. CCP members are about 10 percentage points more supportive of the regime. This makes sense, since they elected to join the Party and benefit from its rents.

The difference between regime support under direct questioning and regime support under list experiments is known as the preference falsification rate. The survey experiments reveal a preference falsification rate in Xi's China of around 25 percentage points. A recent meta-analysis examined all known list experiments in autocratic contexts and found an average preference falsification rate of around 14 percentage points. This makes Xi's China a clear outlier and demonstrates its citizens are far more fearful of expressing opposition to the regime.

These results suggest observers should be sceptical about public opinion surveys in China that rely on direct questioning. The CCP's sprawling internal security apparatus compels citizens to engage in widespread self-censorship, at a rate nearly three times higher than in Vladimir Putin's Russia. The pervasiveness of self-censorship has caused observers to overstate the amount of legitimacy that the CCP enjoys. This legitimacy, the conventional wisdom goes, is born of its record of economic growth and a propaganda and censorship apparatus that persuades citizens of the regime's merits.

The results, most broadly, suggest the CCP confronts widespread frustration. Its recent policies, including the increase in repression and sabre-rattling over Taiwan, should be seen as an effort to contain this frustration.

Is Tibet forgotten?

29 October 2024, The Statesman, Raju Mansukhani

There seems to be euphoria in diplomatic and media circles after the meetings of Prime Minister Narendra Modi with Xi Jinping, President of the People's Republic of China, on the sidelines of 16th Brics Summit at Kazan on 23 October 2024.

There seems to be euphoria in diplomatic and media circles after the meetings of Prime Minister Narendra Modi with Xi Jinping, President of the People's Republic of China, on the sidelines of 16th Brics Summit at Kazan on 23 October 2024. The agreement for complete disengagement and resolution of issues that arose in 2020 in the India-China border areas is being widely welcomed as India underscored the importance of properly handling differences and disputes, not allowing them to disturb peace and tranquility.

Reading between the lines of diplomatic statements emphasizing 'the management of peace and tranquility in border areas and to explore a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable solution to the boundary question', what has gone completely missing is Tibet. The focus now is on stability, rebuilding bilateral relations, and as the Indian Foreign Secretary briefed the media, "to boost communication and cooperation between their countries and resolve conflicts to help improve ties that were damaged by a deadly military clash in 2020." At the United Nations, around the same time as the Brics Summit, on 22 October 2024, James Larsen, Australia's Ambassador and Permanent Representative to the United Nations, delivered a joint statement on behalf of a coalition of 15 countries, expressing serious concern over grave human rights violations in East Turkistan and Tibet, and calling for urgent action from China. The statement was presented during the general discussion on human rights at the 79th session of the United Nations General Assembly's Third Committee. Representing Australia, alongside 14 other countries including Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Japan, Lithuania, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, Ambassador Larsen highlighted grave concerns based on evidence gathered by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and other UN bodies. The assessment, released two years ago, described these violations as potentially amounting to crimes against humanity. It is significant to note that India was not part of the 15-nation coalition stating its concerns over human rights abuses in Tibet. The Tibetan Government in Exile website has detailed the erosion of cultural, educational and religious rights and freedom in Tibet; arbitrary detentions for the peaceful expression of political views, restrictions on travel, forced labour, and the forced separation of children from families in boarding schools. Ambassador Larsen noted that despite repeated international calls for transparency, China has dismissed these concerns and labeled the OHCHR's assessment as "illegal and void" during its Universal Periodic Review adoption in July 2024. China has yet to undertake a comprehensive human rights review of its policies in Xinjiang, with its problematic legal framework on national security and counterterrorism remaining unchanged, according to an OHCHR statement from August 2024. The 15 nations called on China to uphold its international human rights obligations and fully implement the recommendations from the OHCHR and other UN mechanisms.

The Tibetan Government in Exile, also referred to as the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) has been proactively conducting its public diplomacy across the world. Sikyong Penpa Tsering, in a vision document of the CTA released on 10 April 2023, said, "Our work as representatives of the Tibetan people and in securing the future of Tibet is more timely and crucial than ever (before). The PRC (People's Republic of China) has increased its efforts to destroy Tibetan culture and identity through the imposition of draconian measures. The PRC government has coerced our children into colonial boarding schools and imposed a ban on teaching all subjects in the Tibetan language. Our monasteries are increasingly controlled by Beijing, and even our tradition of reincarnation is politicised. In the name of maintaining national security and stability, with the existing control by the permanent work teams stationed down to the village level, Tibetans are subjected to intrusive state security through constant surveillance by the PRC using artificial intelligence and grid management system."

Given the paradigm shift in geopolitics and the international system post-Covid, Ukraine crisis and particularly with the escalation of sporadic tension between different nations, Sikyong Penpa Tsering emphasized "Tibet's strategic importance increasingly matters because of its geographical position and historical role as a buffer zone between China and India. Moreover, rivers originating from Tibet's mountains feed the rivers of ten nations downstream that provide water to a population of about 2 billion people. Due to the number of glaciers and permafrost on the Tibetan plateau, Tibet is also called 'Asia's Water Tower' and the 'World's Third Pole'.

Spiritually and culturally, the Tibetan people's steadfast belief in the Buddhist principles of non-violence and compassion under the leadership of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, even in the face of brutal attacks serves as an inspiration for the violence-ridden world." The vision document highlights the two fundamental missions of the CTA which are inextricably linked: "Mobilising Tibetans and our allies to reopen the Sino-Tibetan dialogue to seek genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people and to develop a sustainable Tibetan community in exile. Both missions ensure the survival of our identity and contribute to the furtherance of our cause." While 2024 marks the 70th anniversary of the famous Panchsheel Agreement of 1954, it was in 2004 to commemorate its 50th golden anniversary that the Indian Ministry of External Affairs published a document simply titled 'Panchsheel'.

It declared that Panchsheel, or the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence, were first formally enunciated in the Agreement on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet region of China and India signed on 29 April 1954, which stated, in its preamble, that the two Governments "have resolved to enter into the present Agreement based on the following principles: Mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty, Mutual non-aggression, Mutual non-interference, Equality and mutual benefit, and Peaceful co-existence." Two months later, during the visit of Premier Zhou Enlai to India, he and Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru issued a joint statement on 28 June 1954 that elaborated their vision of Panchsheel as the framework not only for relations between the two countries but also for their relations with all other countries, so that a solid foundation could be laid for peace and security in the world.

Panchsheel, as envisioned by its creators, gave substance to the voice of newly established countries who were seeking the space to consolidate their hard-won independence, as it provided an alternative ideology dedicated to peace and development of all as the basis for international interaction, whether bilateral or multilateral. At that time, the two Prime Ministers also expressed the hope in the Joint Statement that the adoption of Panchsheel "will also help in creating an area of peace which as circumstances permit can be enlarged thus lessening the chances of war and strengthening the cause of peace all over the world." The treaty of 1954 provided for withdrawal of all Indian influence from Tibet. Wrote S Gopal in Volume II of Pt Nehru's biography: "Nehru had no regret about this, for it embarrassed him to lay claim to the succession of an imperial power which had pushed its way into Tibet.

Anxious to make the agreement purely non-political, the Chinese at first resisted mention of the Five Principles which they themselves had elaborated, but ultimately agreed to it as a concession. India was keen on the inclusion of these principles as explicit reference to mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty, and mutual non-aggression suggested, at least by implication, that China had no frontier claims; but this was clutching at straws after the main opportunity had been deliberately discarded. The only real gain India could show was a listing of six border passes in the middle sector, thereby defining, even if indirectly, this stretch of the boundary.

On the other hand, the Chinese had secured all they wanted and given away little; and that they regarded even this sanction of some Indian trade agencies and markets in Tibet as an interim concession was made clear by their objection to automatic renewal of the treaty after its first term of eight years." The historian in Gopal commented, "the chance of securing a clear and explicit recognition of India's frontier at a time when India had something to offer in return had been lost. This was not because of Nehru's unrealistic assessment of China's intent and strength or of his failure to attach importance to this issue but because he allowed his own views, and those of his senior advisers, to be set aside..."

The argument that the best defence of the frontier was a friendly neighbour was sound, provided the frontier was a settled one. This was India's case: But that case could have been immeasurably strengthened by directly making it a part of the negotiations leading to the 1954 treaty."

This diplomatic lapse, call it an omission, made India give priority to setting up borders and check posts strung out along its entire length, priority to building communications, strengthening the intelligence system. To Nehru's biographer, "the impact of government would have to make up for remiss diplomacy.

A silent resistance is growing in Tibet

27 October 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Khedroob Thondup

The Beijing-recognized Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu, is seen by many Tibetans as a political puppet.

In the heart of Tibet, a silent yet powerful form of resistance is taking place. Across monasteries, homes, and public spaces, the image of the 10th Panchen Lama, Choekyi Gyaltsen, is prominently displayed. This act is not just a tribute to a revered spiritual leader but a profound statement against the Chinese government's attempts to control Tibetan Buddhism.

The 10th Panchen Lama, Choekyi Gyaltsen, is deeply respected among Tibetans for his unwavering dedication to preserving Tibetan culture and religion under Chinese rule. Born in 1938, he became a vocal advocate for Tibetan rights and criticized the Chinese government's policies in Tibet. His 70,000-character petition in 1962, which detailed the suffering of Tibetans under Chinese rule, remains a seminal document of resistance.

In stark contrast, the Beijing-recognized Panchen Lama, Gyaltsen Norbu, is seen by many Tibetans as a political puppet. In 1995, the Chinese government rejected the Dalai Lama's choice of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the 11th Panchen Lama and instead installed Gyaltsen Norbu. Gedhun Choekyi Nyima was subsequently taken into custody and has not been seen since. This move was widely perceived as an attempt by Beijing to control the spiritual lineage and diminish the influence of the Dalai Lama.

Displaying the photo of the 10th Panchen Lama is a way for Tibetans to honour his legacy and assert their cultural identity. It is a reminder of his courage and his commitment to the Tibetan cause. For many, the 10th Panchen Lama symbolizes the true spirit of Tibetan Buddhism, untainted by political interference. Moreover, this act of defiance is a form of non-violent resistance. By rejecting the Beijing-recognized Panchen Lama, Tibetans are making a clear statement about their refusal to accept Chinese control over their religious practices. It is a way to keep the memory of the 10th Panchen Lama alive and to inspire future generations to continue the struggle for religious and cultural freedom.

The Chinese government's attempt to control the reincarnation process of Tibetan lamas is part of a broader strategy to assimilate Tibetan culture into the dominant Han Chinese narrative. By installing a state-approved Panchen Lama, Beijing aims to weaken the influence of the Dalai Lama and ensure that Tibetan Buddhism aligns with state ideologies.

However, the widespread display of the 10th Panchen Lama's photo shows that these efforts have not succeeded. It highlights the resilience of the Tibetan people and their determination to preserve their cultural and religious heritage. This act of resistance is a powerful reminder that despite decades of repression, the spirit of Tibetan Buddhism remains strong.

The choice to display the photo of the 10th Panchen Lama is a deeply symbolic act for Tibetans. It honors a leader who stood up for their rights and serves as a form of peaceful resistance against Chinese control. As the world watches, it is crucial to support the Tibetan people's right to religious freedom and cultural preservation. The legacy of the 10th Panchen Lama continues to inspire and empower Tibetans in their ongoing struggle for autonomy and dignity.

The changing dynamics of India-China relations amidst India-U.S. tensions

27 October 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Savio Rodrigues

The decline in India-US relations played a pivotal role in changing the dynamics of the Sino-Indian border negotiations.

The recent agreement between India and China to restore patrolling arrangements along their disputed border to pre-June 2020 status has marked a significant step toward reducing tensions between the two countries. The deal, finalised on the sidelines of the BRICS Summit in Kazan, came after China finally complied with India's longstanding demand for disengagement along the Line of Actual Control (LAC). While the agreement is a notable diplomatic achievement, the context in which it was reached reveals deeper geopolitical shifts influenced by deteriorating Indo-US relations.

Since the June 2020 Galwan Valley clashes, which resulted in casualties on both sides, India and China have held multiple rounds of diplomatic and military talks to resolve their border dispute. However, little progress was made until the recent agreement. The breakthrough coincided with a downturn in Indo-US relations, which began to sour following a scandal in the summer of 2023 involving allegations of an Indian assassination attempt on a US citizen with ties to separatist movements.

This incident, coupled with subsequent US actions—including support for Canada in escalating a diplomatic spat with India—fuelled distrust between New Delhi and Washington. As a result, China reassessed its strategic calculus regarding its border dispute with India, no longer perceiving India as a potential partner in the US' containment policy aimed at countering China's influence. This shift in perception allowed China to consider a pragmatic approach to the border issue, leading to the recent agreement.

The decline in Indo-US relations played a pivotal role in changing the dynamics of the Sino-Indian border negotiations. Historically, China viewed any concession on the border issue as a sign of weakness, potentially emboldening other regional claimants, such as those involved in the South China Sea disputes. However, the realisation that Indo-US trust had been severely compromised encouraged China to see the border resolution as a strategic move to prevent India from aligning too closely with the US.

The US has long pursued a divide-and-rule strategy in Asia, attempting to exploit historical tensions between India and China to maintain its influence in the region. The pressure on India to adopt Western sanctions against Russia and comply with US foreign policy objectives has only served to underscore the limits of the partnership between New Delhi and Washington. This realisation has allowed India to manoeuvre diplomatically, using its rapprochement with China to signal its unwillingness to be coerced into a subordinate role.

The agreement with China signifies more than just a resolution of a longstanding border issue; it reflects a shift in India's strategic orientation amidst growing friction with the US. The 2023 scandal, US meddling in South Asian politics, and the imposition of foreign policy demands have all contributed to India's re-evaluation of its partnership with Washington. The latest border breakthrough, therefore, can be seen as a signal to the US that India will not be compelled into playing a role in an anti-China coalition.

While military and trade relations between India and the US remain stable for now, the political rift between the two countries raises questions about the future trajectory of their ties. As India and China move toward improving bilateral relations, the US risks losing a key partner in its Indo-Pacific strategy. If India and China can continue to find common ground, it could significantly alter the power dynamics in the region and weaken the effectiveness of the US's containment strategy.

The possibility of closer India-China ties, with the border issue no longer serving as a primary irritant, could unleash significant economic and strategic potential. The world's two most populous nations have natural economic complementarities that could drive regional development and accelerate the transition towards a multipolar world order. This would mark a departure from the US-centric global system that has dominated since the end of the Cold War.

Should Sino-Indian relations continue to improve, it would signal a shift in global strategic dynamics, with Asia emerging as a central axis in world affairs. A partnership between India and China would not only strengthen regional stability but also challenge the current balance of power by reducing US influence in the region. This potential realignment could reshape the global order, paving the way for a new era of international relations driven by Asian powers. In retrospect, the US pressure campaign against India—spanning diplomatic, economic, and political dimensions—might inadvertently prove to be a turning point in global geopolitics. By pushing India to its limits, the US may have accelerated the very outcome it sought to prevent: a Sino-Indian rapprochement that undermines its efforts to maintain unipolar dominance. While it remains to be seen whether the current momentum in Sino-Indian relations will be sustained, the recent agreement offers a glimpse into a world where traditional rivalries are redefined in response to shifting global power structures. The restoration of pre-Galwan Valley patrolling arrangements along the India-China border marks a significant diplomatic achievement for both nations and a potential game-changer in the strategic dynamics of the region. The deal's timing, amid growing Indo-US tensions, underscores the complex interplay between regional disputes and global power politics. As India and China navigate this new phase in their relationship, their ability to resolve longstanding issues and enhance cooperation will be pivotal in shaping the future of the international order.

Whether the US adjusts its approach in response to these developments remains uncertain, but one thing is clear: the old strategic assumptions no longer hold. The world is witnessing a recalibration of alliances, driven not by coercion or containment but by a recognition of shared interests and the desire for a more balanced global order. The implications of this evolving landscape will be felt far beyond the borders of Asia, heralding a new era of international relations where traditional rivalries give way to strategic pragmatism.

LAC patrolling agreement with China doesn't mean everything is resolved: Jaishankar

27 October 2024, The New Indian Express

The External Affairs Minister credited the military, which worked in 'very very unimaginable' conditions, and deft diplomacy for the breakthrough agreement with China.

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar on Saturday said the breakthrough agreement with China on patrolling along the LAC does not mean that issues between the two countries have been resolved, however, the disengagement allows us to look at the next step.

He credited the military, which worked in "very very unimaginable" conditions, and deft diplomacy for the breakthrough agreement with China.

"The latest step (of disengagement) was the October 21 understanding that patrolling will take place in Depsang and Demchok.

This will allow us now to look at the next step.

It is not like everything has been resolved but the disengagement which is the first phase we have managed to reach that level," Jaishankar said at an event in Pune.

Responding to a question during a separate interaction with students, Jaishankar said it is still a bit early for normalisation of relations which will naturally take time to rebuild a degree of trust and willingness to work together.

He said that when Prime Minister Narendra Modi met President Xi Jinping at Kazan in Russia for the BRICS summit, it was decided that the foreign ministers and National Security Advisors of the two countries would meet and see how to move forward.

"If today we have reached where we have. One is because of the very determined effort on our part to stand our ground and make our point.

The military was there (at LAC) in very very unimaginable conditions to defend the country, and the military did its part and diplomacy did its part," Jaishankar said.

Over the decade, India improved its infrastructure.

Part of the problem is that in the earlier years, the border infrastructure was really neglected, he added. "Today we have put in five times more resources annually than there used to be a decade ago which is showing results and enabling the military to actually be effectively deployed. The combination of these (factors) has led to where it is," he said.

Earlier this week, India announced it had reached an agreement with China on patrolling along the LAC in eastern Ladakh, in a major breakthrough in ending the over four-year-long military standoff.

Since 2020, the situation on the border has been very disturbed which understandably negatively impacted the overall relationship.

Since September 2020, India had been negotiating with the Chinese on how to find a solution, he said.

The EAM said there were different aspects of this solution.

The pressing one is disengagement because troops are very very close to each other and the possibility of something happening existed. Then there is de-escalation because of troop buildup on both sides, he added.

"Then there is a larger issue of how you manage the border and negotiate the boundary settlement.

Right now everything that's going is concerning the first part which is disengagement," he said.

He said India and China came to an understanding at some places after 2020 on how troops return to their bases but a significant segment was related to patrolling, the external affairs minister pointed out.

"There was blocking of patrolling and that is what we had been trying to negotiate for the last two years. So what happened on October 21 was that in those particular areas Depsang and Demchok we reached an understanding that patrolling would resume how it used to be before," Jaishankar added.

Following the agreement, the two countries have begun troop disengagement at the two friction points at Demchok and Depsang Plains in eastern Ladakh and this process is likely to be completed by October 28-29.

On "string of pearls", a chain of civilian/naval ports perceived as a strategy for encircling India, Jaishankar said the development has to be viewed seriously, and India needs to be ready to compete.

The term refers to the network of Chinese military and commercial facilities and relationships along its sea lines of communication.

"Unfortunately when it was happening, people (did not see it seriously). Frankly, we are paying the price for it. We did not respond the way we had to. It was done for ideological reasons. The view of China was very different in the political circles of the government," the EAM added.

The Man Who Shaped China's Strongman Rule Has a New Job: Winning Taiwan

26 October 2024, The New York Times, Chris Buckley

Xi Jinping's top adviser, Wang Huning, is credited with shaping the authoritarianism that steered China's rise. But can he influence Taiwan?

When Xi Jinping held the first-ever talks in Beijing with a former president of Taiwan, seeking to press the island closer to unification, a bookish-looking official stood out for his ease around China's leader. While others treated Mr. Xi with stiff formality, the official, Wang Huning, spoke confidently in his presence and sat next to him during the meeting, said Chiu Kun-hsuan, a member of the delegation that accompanied Ma Ying-jeou, the former Taiwanese president.

The scene gave a glimpse of one of the most important, yet little understood, relationships in China: between Mr. Xi, the country's most powerful leader in decades, and Mr. Wang, the ruling Communist Party's most influential ideological adviser in decades.

"He has the top leader's full trust," Professor Chiu, an emeritus scholar at National Chengchi University in Taipei, Taiwan's capital, said of Mr. Wang. "Wang Huning's influence has been in ideology, but now in China under Xi Jinping, ideology connects everything."

Given the opaque nature of Chinese politics, the world often fixates on Mr. Xi, who since taking power in 2012 has centralized control and surrounded himself with loyalists, making it hard to know whose views he most values. In his circle, Mr. Wang stands out for rising to the top despite never having led a province or city, and for advising three successive Chinese leaders across three decades — a rare feat of adaptability and survival.

The New York Times spoke to more than a dozen people who have known Mr. Wang or met him, including during a visit to the United States in the late 1980s, and read dozens of his papers and books. The interviews and writings illuminate how he rose to the apex of power by developing ideas that he put to the service of China's leaders, with a lasting influence on how the country is ruled.

Mr. Wang is credited with honing the Communist Party doctrines that have guided China's rise, founded on the conviction that only the unyielding dominance of the party can secure the country's success in the face of rapid economic change and intensifying competition with Western powers.

More recently, Mr. Xi has entrusted Mr. Wang with handling the fraught political relations with Taiwan, the island democracy that Beijing wants to absorb. Taiwanese officials say Mr. Wang has been overseeing efforts to deepen Chinese influence over the island, through selective displays of good will and covert influence activities.

Yet Mr. Wang, 69, is little known to outsiders. A professor turned party theorist, he stopped giving interviews after he began working at the Communist Party headquarters in 1995, cutting off contact with most former colleagues and staying aloof from foreign visitors.

Since 2012, he has been central to distilling Mr. Xi's vision for China into an ideological program for a superpower that is technologically advanced, unabashedly authoritarian and increasingly fortified against American-led containment.

Mr. Wang "provided the ideological spirit for authoritarianism over the last 30 years," said Rush Doshi, a former deputy senior director for China on President Biden's National Security Council who is now at the Council on Foreign Relations and Georgetown University. "He has helped craft the national narrative."

Winning Over Taiwan

Now Mr. Wang is turning his ideas, political acumen and influence with Mr. Xi to Taiwan. He appears to be sharpening strategies for reaching deeper into Taiwanese society and rolling back its people's deepening rejection of China, including Taiwan's cultural links with the mainland.

"He's also someone who knows how to use both a soft touch and a hard fist," said Chao Chun-shan, a professor emeritus at Tamkang University in Taiwan, who has been in meetings with Mr. Wang in the early 1990s and twice since last year.

Mr. Wang has assiduously wooed dozens of members of Taiwan's opposition Nationalist Party, which favors stronger ties with China, treating them almost as a Taiwanese government in waiting — one that Beijing would rather deal with. He has politely quizzed Nationalist lawmakers: Who has old roots in Taiwan? Who came from families that fled mainland China in 1949? He asked them to describe their concerns, making a point that he was paying close attention, said several members of the delegations. His overtures to the opposition fit with Beijing's strategy of isolating Taiwan's president, Lai Ching-te, and his governing Democratic Progressive Party, which rejects China's claim of sovereignty over the island.

Behind the scenes, Mr. Wang has overseen Chinese efforts to influence Taiwanese public opinion with online campaigns, which amplify messages that are skeptical of American power, scathing about Mr. Lai and admiring of China, according to two Taiwanese security officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

At the same time, China has hardened its military approach to Taiwan; it recently held exercises encircling the island. It is also using legal measures to intimidate Taiwanese people, like the recently issued rules calling for execution, in extreme cases, for supporters of independence.

Such efforts may appear crude and likely to alienate many Taiwanese, but over time, their chilling effect could make a difference politically, said John Dotson, the deputy director of the Global Taiwan Institute in Washington. "Even if it only moves public opinion by a few points, that can be decisive," he said.

Mr. Wang may also have considerable influence over China's plan for unification. Mr. Xi has said Taiwan must accept the "one country, two systems" formula that Beijing used for Hong Kong, but that arrangement is widely rejected in Taiwan. Instead, Chinese officials like Mr. Wang now speak of a "comprehensive plan" for Taiwan, a phrase that allows for adjustments to the formula.

"If his past roles are any guide," Mr. Doshi said, referring to Mr. Wang, "he's likely been tasked with figuring out an approach to Taiwan that involves crafting long-term strategy, as well as the ideological framework for unification."

From Democratic Hopes to 'Neo-Authoritarianism'

Mr. Wang, like Mr. Xi, is the son of Communist officials and was one of the few Chinese youths chosen to go to university during the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, a decade of violence and zealotry when students were drilled in Marx, Lenin and Mao.

But as Mr. Wang started graduate school at Fudan University in Shanghai in 1978, many in China were starting to look to Western countries for inspiration. Talk of democracy, suppressed under Mao, crept into classrooms, and Mr. Wang, who specialized in political science, became an avid student of Western political traditions.

"He was quite open and lively," Chen Kuide, who shared a dormitory room with Mr. Wang at Fudan, said in an interview. "He also wrote contemporary poetry."

Mr. Wang became fascinated with the "political culture" of democracies: the shared public faith in government that kept countries stable as leaders came and went. A strong web of public values was a key pillar of solid political order, he wrote, often citing American scholars like Samuel P. Huntington and Sidney Verba.

Mr. Wang stayed on at Fudan as a lecturer and joined the Communist Party in 1984. He was never a rebel, but he shared in the hopes, widespread in China in the 1980s, that the party could absorb some democracy.

"In today's world, democracy has become the goal of political development," Mr. Wang wrote in a Shanghai newspaper in 1986. "Without a highly democratic political system, there can be no talk of standing tall as a modernized, powerful country among the world's advanced nations."

But as the decade progressed, China confronted growing public anger over inflation and corruption. Student protests for democracy broke out in 1986. Even as Mr. Wang continued to praise democracy as a long-term aspiration, he cautioned against rapid political liberalization.

Abrupt political opening could bring upheaval and derail China's economic takeoff, Mr. Wang wrote, arguing that its leaders could learn from South Korea, Taiwan and other Asian "dragons" that had grown rapidly under authoritarian rulers.

"He became more of a realist," said Mr. Chen, the former roommate, who later worked alongside Mr. Wang. "He had the ways of a politician or political operator."

Mr. Wang wrote a report saying that China needed a "centralized" model of modernization, not a democratic one, to loosen the state's hold on the economy — which would cause a painful surge in prices for food and other necessities — while keeping a lid on instability.

The report circulated among policymakers in Beijing, according to a memoir by Wei Chengsi, an official in Shanghai who had commissioned it, and it became a seed for "neo-authoritarianism," a school of thought arguing that China needed a strongman leader.

"His support for a strong central government and central leader was obvious," said Ming Xia, a former student and colleague of Mr. Wang at Fudan University.

American Lessons

In 1988, Mr. Wang began a six-month visit to the United States, his first immersion in the superpower that China was coming to both admire and fear.

"He was deeply struck by how developed the United States was," Hsu Chang-mao, a journalist from Taiwan who got to know Mr. Wang at that time, said in an interview. "After he returned, he dressed more attractively and stylishly; you could see that he'd been influenced by the American sense of fashion."

But Mr. Wang's travels across America, as a visiting scholar at the University of Iowa and other campuses, also seemed to deepen his view that Western-style democracy had flaws and could not be easily copied in China.

The United States lacked the social discipline and cohesion of Japan, Mr. Wang wrote in "America Against America," a 1991 book about his visit. He was repulsed by a camp for homeless people in Berkeley, which he described as dirty. He followed the 1988 presidential race and concluded that voters ultimately had limited say in government.

His American sojourn appeared to reinforce his belief that a country had to instill the correct attitudes in its citizens, including respect for authority and tradition, or disorder would weaken it from within. Mr. Wang approvingly cited Allan Bloom, a political theorist whose book denouncing liberal cultural trends, "The Closing of the American Mind," was a best seller at that time.

After Mr. Wang returned to China in 1989, his skepticism of democratization deepened. That spring, student-led pro-democracy demonstrators occupied Tiananmen Square in Beijing. The Chinese military crushed the movement on June 4 with tanks and troops, killing hundreds, if not thousands, in the capital and across the country.

In the aftermath, Mr. Wang warned that the party still faced deeper threats. China's leaders, he wrote, needed a "comprehensive overhaul of the entire system of social control" to tame the effects of economic growth, especially corruption, as well as an influx of Western investment and cultural influence.

Mr. Wang urged leaders in Beijing to reassert their control over revenues and state-owned companies. Their grip on economic resources had weakened in the previous decade, and revenue-rich local officials sometimes chafed at orders from Beijing, he warned. He argued that as China opened to the outside world and the party retreated from directing people's lives, leaders needed new ways to retain their loyalty. The new challenges, he wrote in 1992, "demand that China's system of social control respond more firmly, flexibly and vigorously." He advised Beijing to develop new ways to monitor and shape people's values.

"He was really writing about what they were trying to figure out: how do you maintain political order through very fundamental social and economic change?" said Timothy Cheek, a historian of the Chinese Communist Party at the University of British Columbia.

In 1995, Mr. Wang was plucked from academia by Jiang Zemin, the former Shanghai party secretary who had become China's leader in 1989. He joined the party's Central Policy Research Office and was later credited with helping shape Mr. Jiang's "Three Represents" concept, a policy for bringing private entrepreneurs into the party's embrace.

After Mr. Jiang stepped down, Mr. Wang remained a top adviser to the next Chinese leader, Hu Jintao. When Mr. Xi came to power in 2012, he retained Mr. Wang.

The Man Behind 'Xi Jinping Thought'

Mr. Wang's continuing close access to Mr. Xi suggests that he remained an influential source of advice as the Chinese leader grappled with a pandemic, economic troubles and growing antagonism with Western governments.

Experts credit Mr. Wang with a big role in shaping Mr. Xi's ideas into an official credo — Xi Jinping Thought — focused on China's resurgence as a great power. To combat the dangers he sees to party rule, Mr. Xi has demanded ideological conformity, restricted Western cultural influences, expanded censorship and sought to silence even mild dissent.

Mr. Wang became office director for a commission on policy reform, which has pushed Mr. Xi's ideas of state-steered growth, and he continues to shape major policy documents. He defended China's tight control over the internet before an audience of multinational executives. He accompanied Mr. Xi on trips abroad, including summits with American presidents.

Mr. Wang gained "a real policy-shaping role, not just as an ideologue," said Matthew D. Johnson, a research director at Garnaut Global, a consultancy, who has studied Mr. Wang. "I don't think he's a one-trick pony."

In 2017, Mr. Xi rewarded Mr. Wang by promoting him to the Politburo Standing Committee — the top tier of party power. And Mr. Xi kept him on the committee for a second term in 2022, as others stepped aside.

During a party congress in 2022, Mr. Wang's standing with Mr. Xi played out in front of television cameras. The tightly choreographed proceedings were briefly interrupted when Mr. Hu, the retired leader, apparently agitated and confused, seemed to resist being led out by an usher.

When Li Zhanshu, a senior official, tried to help Mr. Hu, Mr. Wang tugged at Mr. Li's suit and whispered to him, apparently urging him to sit down. In theory, Mr. Li had a higher rank, but that didn't deter Mr. Wang.

Explainer: India and China troops disengage at disputed Ladakh border, easing decades-long tensions

The current phase of bilateral ties has been particularly strained since the violent standoff at Galwan in 2020, which resulted in the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and an estimated 40 Chinese troops, marking the worst tensions since the 1962 war

The ongoing disengagement between Indian and Chinese troops at two friction points along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh – Demchok and Depsang – marks another watershed in the tumultuous relations between the two Asian giants since the late 1950s. The current phase of bilateral ties has been particularly strained since the violent standoff at Galwan in 2020, which resulted in the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and an estimated 40 Chinese troops, marking the worst tensions since the 1962 war.

The Sino-Indian War (October 20 – November 21, 1962) marked a turning point in India-China relations, which had previously shared a strong cultural and historical bond, significantly impacting India's security establishment. Reports of occasional run-ins with China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) began surfacing as early as 1951, gradually increasing toward the decade's end.

Following India's grant of asylum to the Dalai Lama in 1959, PLA intensified its activities in Tibet and adopted a more aggressive stance. PLA resumed regular border patrols in previously dormant regions, leading to an escalation in skirmishes along the border.

On October 20, PLA launched simultaneous offensives along the 3,225-km disputed border in Arunachal Pradesh and Ladakh, capturing Indian positions and seizing significant territory. However, on November 21, China declared a ceasefire and pulled back to its pre-October 20 positions. Since then, tensions have persisted along the LAC as both nations maintain conflicting territorial claims.

India became independent in 1947, while the People's Republic of China (PRC) was established in 1949, which then annexed Tibet in 1950. Chinese maps showed about 120,000 sq km of Indian territory in Aksai Chin and Arunachal as part of China. The then-Indian Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, raised the subject with Chinese Prime Minister Zhou Enlai, but despite promises, there was no resolution.

In 1954, China and India negotiated the 'Panchsheel' or Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, by which both sides would settle their disputes. However, China did not acknowledge Indian claims. The construction of roads and military. The construction of roads and military posts by China in the Aksai Chin region in the 1950s was perceived as aggression by India, prompting India to establish its own posts. China's 1,200-km road connecting Xinjiang and western Tibet, 180 km of which passed through Aksai Chin, made the region easily accessible from China, while India lacked communication links.

In July 1958, China intruded into Ladakh near Khurnak Fort. Similar incidents occurred in 1959 at Migyitui and Pangong Tso. In October 1959, an Indian patrol was ambushed near Kongka Pass, killing nine Indian policemen.

In 1960, Zhou Enlai proposed that India drop its claims over Aksai Chin in exchange for China withdrawing claims over the North-Eastern Frontier Agency (now Arunachal Pradesh) but India refused. In 1961, India adopted a "forward policy" to counter Chinese activity.

The India-China border disputes have led to numerous incidents and confrontations since 1962. That summer, India directed its air force to avoid direct conflict, despite the potential benefits of close air support for ground troops. In June, a skirmish resulted in significant Chinese casualties, prompting India to advance troops and probe Chinese resolve. The period from June to October saw multiple incidents in the east, including the Thagla Ridge confrontation in Arunachal Pradesh.

Subsequent clashes occurred in 1967 at Nathu La and Cho La, where Indian forces successfully repelled Chinese attacks. In 1975, four Indian soldiers were ambushed and killed by Chinese troops in Indian territory. Another major standoff took place in 1986 in the Sumdorong Chu Valley, Arunachal Pradesh, but was resolved after India's external affairs minister visited Beijing in 1987.

Despite the absence of armed clashes since, China's PLA has regularly incursed into Ladakh and Arunachal, sometimes advancing several kilometres into the Indian territory, as seen in the 2013 Depsang Plains incident. Frequent confrontations and face-offs along the LAC have led to scuffles and physical altercations. Approximately two dozen sensitive areas have been identified along the LAC, with 13 experiencing frequent incursions. Seven friction points in eastern Ladakh, including Galwan, Hot Springs, Gogra, Pangong Tso, Depsang Plains, and Demchok, remain contentious since 2020, with ongoing disengagement efforts at Depsang and Demchok.

Opinion | China-India border detente paves way for a more balanced world order

26 October 2024, SCMP, Sagina Walyat

While Beijing and New Delhi have their own interests in settling tensions, greater cooperation is a net positive for the Global South

Just before the 2024 Brics summit, India and China reached a significant agreement on de-escalating border tensions. In an interview on NDTV, Indian Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar said the deal would allow border patrols to be conducted the way they used to be in 2020, ostensibly before the deadly Galwan Valley clash.

On Tuesday, this position was echoed by Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian, who confirmed the progress, saying that China "will work with India to properly implement [the] resolution".

In a larger geopolitical context, the deal reflects the shaping of a new world order with a non-Western bloc that does not necessarily oppose the West but seeks to challenge its long-held hegemony.

Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping held their first formal bilateral dialogue in five years on Wednesday, on the sidelines of the Brics summit in Kazan, Russia. Xi acknowledged the responsibilities of both nations – key members of the Global South – to boost the strength and unity of developing countries. After the meeting, Modi underscored the significance of peace, not just for bilateral ties but for global stability.

The groundwork for the border deal has been laid over the past two months through high-level engagement, including two meetings between Jaishankar and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi in July. Wang also met Indian National Security Adviser Ajit Doval last month in St Petersburg.

India has consistently made it clear that settling the border issue was a necessity for advancing relations with China. Both nations stand to benefit from this development. India seeks to further grow its economy while China needs India to secure vital partnerships amid its economic slump.

China and India have engaged in dialogue for a long time but bilateral tensions have only seemed to increase, especially since the Galwan Valley clash. India has challenged China on multiple fronts, recently flagging concerns at the World Trade Organization about “non-transparent” Chinese trade practices.

Despite these challenges, the Brics grouping has emerged as a platform for bridging divides, especially with Russia likely to favour more cooperation between China and India.

As Brics expands its membership, Sino-Indian cooperation is crucial for the grouping’s future, particularly for achieving its strategic goals. These goals are not necessarily anti-Western in nature but part of a broader attempt to build a popular alternative to the West in the world system. Russia also stands to benefit, as having India and China on cordial terms is essential for challenging Western dominance.

India’s recent diplomatic spat with Canada over the Khalistan separatist movement, in which Ottawa was supported by other members of the Five Eyes intelligence alliance, seems to have pushed New Delhi further towards working with its non-Western partners.

The US has increased its involvement in South Asia, including in domestic Indian politics. Last month, high-level American officials met activists who reportedly have pro-Khalistan independence sympathies. And, just before Modi’s visit to the US, an American court reportedly issued a summons against Indian officials in a civil suit filed by Gurpatwant Singh Pannun, whom New Delhi designated a terrorist in 2020. Given these developments, India has a strong rationale to explore improved ties with China.

However, India is likely to keep pursuing its non-alignment policy, maintaining a balanced engagement with the West, particularly Europe. Beijing, meanwhile, has concerns of its own, given New Delhi’s growing relations with Taiwan and its increasing interest in the Tibet autonomous region.

Since 2010, India has stopped mentioning the One-China policy, reportedly in response to Chinese authorities issuing stapled visas to residents of disputed areas such as Arunachal Pradesh and the territory of Jammu and Kashmir. Under Modi’s leadership, India has significantly advanced its technological, economic and diplomatic relations with leaders in Taiwan.

Taiwan recently opened its third representative office in India, which sparked a strong rebuke from Beijing. However, like most countries, India still does not recognise Taiwan as an independent state. With Beijing seeking a peaceful reunification with Taiwan, its interest in resolving the border dispute with India has grown.

While India and China have their own strategic reasons for settling the dispute, Russia also stands to gain from this new-found cooperation. For Brics to become a credible global counterweight to the West, Moscow needs New Delhi and Beijing to work as cordial partners, if not allies.

As the Brics grouping expands and pursues transformative initiatives such as de-dollarisation and creating multilateral alternatives to Western institutions, alignment between India and China can help to ensure the success of these projects.

The de-escalation at the Sino-Indian border plus the high-level meeting between Xi and Modi could pave the way for further cooperation, the relaxation of investment restrictions and the improvement of people-to-people ties through direct flights and exchanges.

While these developments signal an improvement, it is still too soon to tell if India and China will function as fully fledged partners. Their trust deficit and trade imbalance still loom large. Nevertheless, this week’s bilateral breakthroughs have certainly melted the ice and opened the door to further dialogue.

Improved Sino-Indian relations could benefit the entire region, especially countries in the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and the Global South, which stand to gain from reduced tensions between two of Asia’s largest powerhouses.

The 2024 Brics summit marks the beginning of a new geopolitical reality – one in which India and China constructively manage their differences and contribute to the emergence of a more balanced world order that challenges Western hegemony.

Brahmaputra's challenges: A call for strategic cooperation and sustainable solutions

25 October 2024, The Sentinel

The recent drop in the Brahmaputra's water level, resulting in the suspension of the vital ferry service between Jorhat and Majuli

The recent drop in the Brahmaputra's water level, resulting in the suspension of the vital ferry service between Jorhat and Majuli, raises serious concerns about the future of Assam's most critical waterway. As the river that sustains the region's ecosystem and economy, any fluctuations in the Brahmaputra's water system, particularly during the lean winter months, deserve the immediate attention of both policymakers and the scientific community. This isn't merely an isolated occurrence—there's growing evidence to suggest a combination of environmental and geopolitical factors may be at play, contributing to the potential crisis facing the Brahmaputra and the broader riverine landscape of Assam.

Seasonal variability or anomaly? The Case for Serious Scrutiny

It is well established that the Brahmaputra's flow decreases during winter. However, the unprecedented scale of reduction in recent years has raised legitimate concerns among local communities, experts, and government officials. A particularly troubling pattern of dwindling water levels during the lean season has been observed, sparking debates about the underlying causes. While a certain degree of reduction is expected due to natural seasonality, the abnormal scale of receding water volumes suggests that other factors might be altering the Brahmaputra's hydrology.

One key suspect behind these changes lies beyond India's borders: In the upper reaches of the river, China has been engaged in large-scale dam construction on the Yarlung Tsangpo (as the Brahmaputra is known in Tibet). The massive damming efforts undertaken by China could potentially have far-reaching implications for the river's natural flow, especially in Assam and the lower riparian regions. These developments, coupled with the accelerating impacts of climate change, make the Brahmaputra's future uncertain.

China's Damming and Diversion: A Brewing Geopolitical Tension

China's dam-building activities on the Yarlung Tsangpo have long been a matter of contention between Beijing and New Delhi. There are well-documented instances of China's efforts to harness the power of the Brahmaputra's upper stretches for hydroelectricity and irrigation. These initiatives, while economically beneficial for China, could spell disaster for downstream countries like India and Bangladesh, which rely heavily on the river's uninterrupted flow. The Chinese government's lack of transparency concerning the scale and nature of these projects only adds to the concerns, as does its history of ignoring international water-sharing norms. International treaties and protocols mandate cooperation between countries that share transboundary rivers. Yet China has a track record of resisting adherence to such conventions. The Centre, as the representative of India's geopolitical interests, has so far been hesitant to take a firm stance against China's unilateral river management practices. With mounting evidence of the impacts on water flow, New Delhi faces increasing pressure to engage diplomatically, urging China to honour established water-sharing agreements and protocols. This is essential not only for India's water security but also for the preservation of the Brahmaputra Valley's socio-economic fabric.

The Climate Dimension: Glacier Melt and Rainfall Volatility

The climate crisis is an undeniable force contributing to the Brahmaputra's altered hydrology. Glacial retreat in the Himalayas has accelerated in recent years, driven by rising global temperatures. Since the Siang (Yarlung Tsangpo) accounts for a significant share of the Brahmaputra's total water volume, especially during winter, any reduction in glacier-fed contributions could have a cascading effect on the river's flow downstream.

Moreover, the changing climate is affecting rainfall patterns across the region. Unpredictable monsoons, extreme weather events, and extended droughts have become more frequent, impacting not just the Brahmaputra but the entire ecosystem it supports. If the Brahmaputra transitions from a perennial to a predominantly rain-fed river, the consequences for agriculture, fisheries, and hydropower in Assam could be devastating.

According to a study by the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD), the Himalayas, which supply a significant portion of water to the Brahmaputra, are warming at a rate faster than the global average. A report by NASA's Earth Science Division corroborates that the Himalayan glaciers have lost nearly a third of their ice mass in recent decades. This loss directly influences river systems like the Brahmaputra, making it increasingly vulnerable to seasonal variability.

Hydrological Impact: Dredging and Waterway Management

Addressing the water flow irregularities of the Brahmaputra requires a multifaceted approach, beginning with better management of the river itself. Experts suggest dredging the Brahmaputra to deepen its channel, which would reduce flooding during the monsoon season and improve navigability year-round. Transforming the Brahmaputra into a fully functional national waterway holds promise for bolstering Assam's economic potential, but such interventions should be grounded in a thorough understanding of the river's unique ecosystem and hydrodynamics.

Effective dredging could reduce sedimentation, a major problem in the Brahmaputra, which is one of the most sediment-heavy rivers in the world. This would not only ease the chronic flood situation in Assam but also facilitate smoother inland navigation—a critical aspect of economic integration in India's Northeast. However, implementing such measures requires extensive research and collaboration between governmental agencies, scientists, and local communities to avoid unintended ecological consequences.

The Role of International Cooperation and Governance

The Brahmaputra's challenges underscore the need for robust international cooperation. It is crucial that India engages with China through diplomatic channels to establish a reliable information-sharing mechanism concerning the river's water flows. In the absence of formal treaties, informal dialogues and back-channel negotiations could pave the way for more structured cooperation. Additionally, multilateral platforms like the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) and Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, and Nepal (BBIN) Initiative offer opportunities to address shared water concerns collectively.

The World Bank has previously advocated for regional river basin management initiatives, which could serve as a template for the Brahmaputra. If all stakeholders—including China—commit to a shared vision of sustainable river management, it would mitigate the risks associated with unilateral actions. This approach could also bring additional benefits, such as improved flood management, enhanced agriculture, and greater regional stability.

Preserving the Brahmaputra Valley Civilisation: A Call for Action

The Brahmaputra is more than just a river; it is the lifeblood of Assam's cultural, social, and economic identity. The rising threats to its stability—from the unpredictable impacts of climate change to the geopolitical maneuvers by neighboring countries—demand a comprehensive and well-coordinated response. This includes stricter enforcement of environmental regulations, enhanced data collection on river flow dynamics, and increased investment in adaptive infrastructure to cope with future uncertainties.

The state government, in coordination with the Centre, must take proactive measures to mitigate these challenges. A dedicated Brahmaputra River Commission could serve as a centralised body to oversee the implementation of sustainable river management practices, coordinate with international partners, and ensure the ecological health of the river system. Additionally, the scientific community must be empowered with greater resources to study the Brahmaputra's changing hydrology, focusing on predictive models that account for both climatic and geopolitical variables.

Navigating a Complex Future

The crisis surrounding the Brahmaputra's receding waters is a stark reminder of the complex interplay between nature and politics in South Asia. Addressing this issue requires a blend of science, diplomacy, and regional cooperation. For Assam, ensuring the long-term sustainability of the Brahmaputra is not just an environmental necessity but an existential imperative. The challenge is daunting, but with a clear-eyed, unified strategy, the region can safeguard its future, ensuring that the Brahmaputra continues to flow as a perennial source of life and prosperity for generations to come.

What's next for China and India as Modi, Xi start over?

24 October 2024, DW, Murali Krishnan

At the BRICS summit in Russia, Narendra Modi and Xi Jinping triggered a diplomatic thaw after years of icy relations between India and China. But is it enough for the two Asian rivals to overcome their mutual distrust?

A diplomatic reset between India and China seems to be underway after the leaders of the two countries met at a BRICS summit in Kazan, Russia, this week.

Both India's Narendra Modi and China's Xi Jinping made public pledges to improve ties, and praised the recent progress towards solving territorial disputes in the Himalayas.

Chinese President Xi said both China and India were ancient civilizations in a phase of intense development and modernization, and should adhere to the principle of being "partners rather than competitors."

Modi called for "[m]utual trust, mutual respect, and mutual sensitivity" between the two most populous nations in the world.

Border conflicts as a stumbling block

The talks between Xi and Modi come at the heels of a recent deal on patrolling the remote and highly disputed border area between India and China. While the rivalry between the two Asian powers is deep and wide-reaching, their troops clashing in the Himalayas could be seen as a trigger point for the latest diplomatic freeze.

In June 2020, a border clash reportedly caused the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and an unknown number of Chinese troops. In the years between that event and the Kazan BRICS summit, Modi and Xi have not held any formal face-to-face talks, although they have briefly met each other on the sidelines of other international conferences.

The reported border deal will enable Indian troops to resume patrols up to the two major friction areas, Depsang and Demchok. Details remain scarce, however, it is worth noting that China did not use the word "agreement" in its readout of the Modi-Xi meeting, instead labelling it "important progress in resolving relevant issues."

According to a Xinhua report: "Modi put forward ideas and suggestions on improving and developing bilateral relations, to which Xi Jinping agreed in principle."

De-escalation still to come

India's Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri said Beijing and New Delhi would initially focus on disengagement before taking up de-escalation and de-induction of forces at the "appropriate time."

"We will have to make continuous efforts that the mechanics of the agreement will be such that such clashes can be stopped," he said.

While experts have welcomed the intent on both sides to improve their relations, they warned that the talks would not lead to a renewal of business as usual.

"We do not expect any miracles. There will be the need to continue the dialogue and work towards improving the relationship," Alka Acharya, honorary director of the Institute of Chinese Studies in India, told DW.

The grouping of five major emerging economies comprising Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa represent over 40% of the world's population and almost a third of the global economy. The club decided to expand last year, with six new countries – Egypt, Ethiopia, Argentina, Saudi Arabia, the UAE, and Iran – joining it.

The grouping of five major emerging economies comprising Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa represent over 40% of the world's population and almost a third of the global economy. The club decided to expand last year, with six new countries – Egypt, Ethiopia, Argentina, Saudi Arabia, the UAE, and Iran – joining it.

Russia wants India and China to close ranks

While China and Russia push a narrative of using BRICS as a counterweight to the US and G7, other members have been more subdued. Their political systems differ, with India, Brazil and South Africa being democracies, while China and Russia are autocratic. This and other differences tend to hold BRICS back from acting as a cohesive political or economic unit.

"It would appear that the efforts this time have resulted in a breakthrough," Acharya said. "The multilateral groupings are also an important platform for India – which they cannot cede entirely to China. And Russia is a very critical partnership," she added. Srikanth Kondapalli, a professor of China studies at Jawaharlal Nehru University pointed that China was facing problems such as "economic headwinds, decoupling and derisking from the West, uncertainty about the course of the next US president, and territorial disputes in the neighborhood."

"In forums like BRICS, Russia would also like to see India and China come together so that it can expand the multipolar camp, neutralize sanctions, and reduce reliance on the US dollar as a reserve currency," Kondapalli told DW.

Why is China-India thaw important?

The Modi-Xi meeting in Kazan could "pave the way for normalization" in many areas, former diplomat Sujan Chinoy told DW.

"Resuming direct flights, addressing the trade deficit, and reinstating visa services between India and China could significantly contribute to normalizing relations and enhancing bilateral ties," added Chinoy, who now serves as the head of the Manohar Parrikar Institute for Defense Studies and Analyses. He also pointed out that BRICS allows India and China to be on the same platform, including in terms of developmental priorities for the Global South, which looks to both Asian giants to play a leadership role.

"In recent years, the multilateral space for cooperation between India and China has shrunk and the BRICS and SCO can help retrieve some ground on key issues, including combating terrorism, climate change, green transitions, and reforms of global institutions," said Chinoy.

The curious case of China renaming locations in India's Arunachal Pradesh

Explore the recent Chinese renaming of Indian territory in Arunachal Pradesh. Understand their motivations & the geopolitical implications of this move.

Deciphering territorial claims and reasons behind exclusion of few districts

If William Shakespeare were alive today, China would have questioned his "What is in a name?" line from 'Romeo and Juliet' and defended its renaming efforts (of locations) countering that 'naming of things is relevant'.

The renaming spree in Arunachal Pradesh (names in standardised Chinese, Tibetan and Pinyin characters with latitude and longitude and a high resolution map) was started in 2017 and has spatial and temporal history including in Tibet, Xinjiang, South China Sea (SCS) and East China Sea (ECS). For example, People's Republic of China (PRC) has Chinese names for all the islands of Spratly Islands Group (the Nansha Islands) and Paracel Islands (Xisha islands).

The renaming covered a total of 62 locations including villages and towns (25), mountain peaks and passes (25), land segment (3), and rivers, streams, and lakes (9) with six locations in first batch (April, 2017), fifteen in 2nd batch (December, 2021), followed by eleven in April, 2023 and thirty in March, 2024.

Wu Qian, spokesman of Defence Ministry of China had rejected (March, 2024) India's right to Arunachal Pradesh by saying : "It is an undeniable fact that Zangnan has been Chinese territory since ancient times, where does the so-called 'Arunachal Pradesh' come from?".

This statement justifies the fact that it took China almost seven years for renaming and official publication of 62 Indian locations. This long, staggered duration adopted by China is possibly due to efforts by Chinese scholars (at the directions of People's Republic of China) to bake data to attach historical and cultural ties of renamed locations with Tibet and other parts of China, which can then be used to satisfy and justify, if need arises, the audience both domestic and global.

China does not claim whole of the state of Arunachal Pradesh, at least if one goes by the 2023 edition of China's Standard Map of Standard Map Service of the Ministry of Natural Resources, PRC.

Arunachal Pradesh currently has 26 districts and however districts like East Kameng, Kamle, Leparada, Lohit, Siang, Changlang, Tirap, Longding, and Namsai did not feature any of the renamed locations. East Kameng, Kamle, Leparada, Lohit, and Siang districts fall within the boundary of China's claimed territory formed by 62 renamed locations. If one carefully looks at the China's Standard Map of 2023 and Chinese version of Google Earth map, China's claims on Arunachal Pradesh exclude the whole of the districts of Changlang, Tirap, Longding, Namsai and most of Lohit district and parts of Anjaw district.

As per the 2011 Census Data of India, there were 5587 villages in Arunachal Pradesh. If we remove 845 villages (115 of Lohit district, 178 of Namsai district and 362 of Changlang and 190 villages of Tirap district & Longding district), theoretically China claims over 4735 villages.

But there is a notable discrepancy in China's claims over Arunachal Pradesh. According to sources including the Chinese, the so called South Tibet (Zangnan) encompasses an area of approximately 90,000 to 93,000 square kilometre and is said to have a population of approximately one million. When Arunachal Pradesh is only 83,743 square kilometre as per Government of India, where is the additional 6000-9000 square kilometre of territory in the so called Zangnan.

Also, 2023 edition of China's Standard Map excludes 13,816 square kilometre area comprising Changlang, Tirap, Longding, Namsai and most of Lohit district and parts of Anjaw district. Therefore, China needs to tell the world where is this additional claim of 19,816-22,816 square kilometre area of the so called Zangnan (13,816 square kilometre combined with 6000-9000 square kilometre).

It could be possible that Zangnan has parts of it in Bhutan and or Myanmar and China does not want to admit this in public to avoid diplomatic collision or there is something seriously wrong with Survey of India's measurement of the Arunachal Pradesh or PRC is confusing the stakeholders as its claims are baseless and unsubstantiated. Looking at the China's history of territorial claims, the latter is the most plausible explanation. It appears that China is following Sun Tzu's quote "the whole secret lies in confusing the enemy, so that he cannot fathom our real intent" in letter and spirit.

China kept these districts of Arunachal Pradesh out of the Standard Map 2023 due to following reasons: districts of Changlang, Tirap, Longding have strong presence of National Socialist Council of Nagalim-Yung Aung (NSCN-YA), United National Liberation Front of Asom- Independent (ULFA-I), and National Socialist Council of Nagalim-Isaac/Muivah (NSCN-IM) who reportedly received China's support (financial, training, weapons) and are three of the many North East India origin Insurgent Groups with various demands including a separate nation state and more autonomy. These IIGs do operate under the China's umbrella of influence and act as its eyes and ears. So by not including these districts, China has kept them on its side. Another reason is China would be avoiding administrative and strategic inconvenience of not getting surrounded by India and Myanmar in districts of Changlang, Tirap, Longding, Namsai, Lohit and parts of Anjaw in which case it will be China's chicken's neck.

By renaming locations in Arunachal Pradesh what China (from its strategic perspective) has done is delimitation of Arunachal Pradesh which (delimitation) is usually the first step in any sacred bilateral relations for establishment of boundary and or resolution of any boundary issue. The other two steps being delineation and demarcation (usually in that order). Through delimitation one intends to identify the dots (may be residential areas, mountains and passes, rivers etc) in a particular area in order to conceptualise the boundaries or limits which in turn gives a sense of where the boundary of the area in question begins and ends.

Plotting latitudes and longitudes of all the 62 Indian locations renamed by China since 2017, gives a sense of geographical area covered (where the boundary begins and ends) which can later be delineated and demarcated by drawing lines on a map and construction of boundary pillars respectively. It covers almost all the districts except for the whole of the districts of Changlang, Tirap, Longding, Namsai and most of Lohit district and parts of Anjaw district which do not form part of Chinese claimed Indian territory of Arunachal Pradesh as can be seen in China's Standard Map, 2023.

A critical analysis events surrounding Cha's actions in Arunachal Pradesh reveals that some of the 62 renamed locations have earlier been transgressed by Chinese PLA wherein they had set up their tent and stayed for a few hours including hiring of Indian porters as happened in October, 2018 during which Chinese troops had entered approximately 14 kilometre inside near the banks of Mathu and Emra Rivers in Dibang valley. Emra River is a right-bank tributary of the Dibang River located in Dibang Valley district which eventually flows into the Brahmaputra River. Emra River (with the Chinese Pinyin name Niangmuri He) was in the fourth list of renamed locations released by China in March, 2024. The recent example of PLA spray painting rocks in Kapapu, near Chaglagam of Anjaw District is a testimony.

China needs reason/s to sustain its aggression especially in disputed territories. In case of Taiwan, it is that (China's claim) it is one of the last remaining symbols of China's reported history of centuries of humiliation and for SCS, it is the imaginary nine dash line. The renaming attempts in hitherto undisputed Arunachal Pradesh are because China needs to convince its domestic audience, allies and if necessitated the international jury with reasons for its claims before making any strategic decisions to carry on with its aggression tactics along the McMahon line and attempts to (if) occupy.

According to American Mandarin Society, China's PLA has India specific military doctrine called "Border Self-Defense Counterattack Operations" detailed in Science of Military Strategy, 2013 Edition of Academy of Military Science's Military Strategy Research Department, Beijing. From China's point of view, this is a euphemism for "joint" PLA operations to fight along the China-India border with the objective to capture disputed territory (allegedly currently controlled by India) in order to improve China's "defensive" position; thereby resolutely "protecting territorial sovereignty and restoring border area peace and stability."

By renaming locations and giving baked history of their association with China, the latter is building a narrative to its domestic and global audience (as it is answerable to them, at least in theory!) that India is the aggressor here allegedly occupying its territory and China is only legitimately trying to reclaim them (in case it launches such operations). Therefore renaming locations and associating them with China is the first step before it can pursue its India specific military doctrine called "Border Self-Defense Counterattack Operations" .

Should China make attempts to occupy Arunachal Pradesh is best left to the wisdom of leaders of CCP and PRC as most countries including China and global institutions understand the reality that India, as a rising power, of 21st century is different and has moved on from 1962. China also understands that any such cross border attempts will be nothing but a mutually assured destruction of both nuclear powers. However, it is a totally different subject matter which will be explored in an another article another day.

Map aggression is one of the tactics of China that are intentionally ambiguous to create confusion among the stakeholders as it does in SCS without any concrete progress in 'Declaration on the Conduct of the Parties' and 'Framework for a Code of Conduct in the SCS'. It is much easier for any aggressor like China to continue with its geopolitical game of keeping the claimants guessing particularly in boundary disputes as it gives much larger space to manoeuvre the stakeholders.

Similarly in Arunachal Pradesh, China is keeping policy makers in India guessing and confused. India should tread this China's design with utmost planning and counter China's efforts by augmenting its current policy of enhancing border civilian and military infrastructure along the McMahon line. In addition, coordinated efforts be made along with other stakeholders in SCS and ECS to expose China's falsified claims and records in order to send a united message to China's domestic and global audience that China cannot succeed in its ill designs to capture territories of other sovereign nations.

Thaw in Sino-Indian relations: Trust, but keep verifying

24 October 2024, FirstPost, Chintamani Mahapatra

China has a well-known record of springing surprises and India needs to remain alert all the time

The Narendra Modi-Xi Jinping meeting on the sidelines of the BRICS Summit in the Russian city of Kazan symbolises a thaw in the relationship between the two most powerful Asian countries that had turned bitter about four years ago in the wake of Chinese Army's unexpected attacks on Indian soldiers in the Galwan Valley.

India's commercial and political ties with China was moving in an upwardly positive trajectory when the Galwan incident occurred and Sino-Indian ties nosedived. In a way, a restrained Cold War type rivalry emerged with China more fiercely expanding its influence in countries around India and at the same time feeling jittery about deepening India-US security relations. India's proactive engagements in the Indo-Pacific, strengthening of the Quad, and Delhi's ability to navigate the turbulent geopolitics emerging from the Ukraine War with continuation of stronger ties with Moscow and Washington appeared to be Beijing's envy.

Moreover, Beijing also witnessed India's robust economic growth amidst downturn in global political economy, including in China.

China clearly sees the benefits of normalising ties with India, which has the tenacity to face Chinese muscle flexing along the LAC and the wisdom to maintain trade ties with China at the same time.

In addition, persistently taking unfriendly steps against India in the backdrop of US alliance politics in the Indo-Pacific, such as the Camp David Defence Pact with Japan and South Korea, AUKUS pact with Australia and Britain are now seen in Beijing as counterproductive. China is undoubtedly suspicious of Quad as well, but respects India as a country that maintains its strategic autonomy.

The way India has been able to keep Pakistan at bay also sends a clear signal to China that Islamabad may be proud of its all weather friendship with China, but an unstable Pakistan cannot be a durable strategic asset and may actually become a liability.

Chinese think in the long term and take steps with a strategic vision. The high level dialogues between the two sides at multiple levels to restore peace and stability along the border and its positive outcome is the byproduct of current Chinese strategic thinking.

India too is a responsible international actor with deep strategic calculations. The Modi government has successfully deterred further Chinese advances along the LAC, reinforced the military presence in the border regions, built critical infrastructure in the difficult Himalayan terrain, and simultaneously refused to normalise ties with China unless peace along the border is maintained and status quo of April 2020 is restored.

The latest agreement by both the parties is a welcome development and the very first step to restore normalcy is mirrored in the Modi-Xi meeting in Kazan. Both China and India support a multipolar world order, both oppose unilateralism in principle, both seek to champion the cause of the Global South, and both are members of multiple multilateral mechanisms, including BRICS, East Asia Summit, ASEAN Regional Forum, and many others.

Prime Minister Modi has aptly said that Sino-Indian cooperation can bring dividends for regional and global security. External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar has often stated that the 21st century cannot become an Asian Century without deeper and expansive Sino-Indian cooperation.

However, the Modi-Xi meeting in Russia is only a first necessary step. It perhaps gives satisfaction to the strategic community and the peace lovers in the Indo-Pacific region. After all, many Indo-Pacific countries face their own dilemmas in navigating the Sino-Indian differences and disputes. Thaw in Sino-Indian ties is certainly good news for them. But it is not a positive sign for countries that played China against India or saw strategic gains in emerging Sino-Indian competition in certain areas. Thus, complications will arise on the way to normalising India's relations with China. Some hardliners from both sides may also hold on to their conventional views that normalisation of relations is not possible until the entire boundary disputes are resolved. Besides, India needs to be cautious, careful and diligent to progress through myriad dialogue mechanisms that have remained stalled since 2020.

China has a well-known record of springing surprises and India needs to remain alert all the time. Trust is an imperative to conduct international relations, but history teaches us that it is important to keep verifying the moves of other countries, so that words, written and spoken, match actions on the ground.

Decoding Chinese Military Diplomacy in South Asia

24 October 2024, ORF, Col (DR) DCS Mayal

Introduction

"To win one hundred victories in one hundred battles is not the acme of skill. To subdue the enemy without fighting is the acme of skill."

~ Sun Tzu

Nations are increasingly using military power as a form of diplomacy,[1] with a notable surge in military diplomacy[a] stemming from overt displays of hard power. This escalation is largely attributed to the engagement of armed forces in civilian affairs through what is referred to as Military Operations Other Than War (MOOTW)[b] both domestic and overseas, with minimal risk, cost, and time. A revolution in communication technologies has led to increased interactions and interdependencies in the global community, resulting in the influence of soft power extending beyond government domains. Non-traditional threats such as terrorism and climate change have further underscored the significance of military diplomacy in addressing new challenges that transcend geographical and political boundaries.

In this context, the role of the military has transformed from traditional defence, deterrence, compulsion, and intervention to non-traditional peace-time activities such as crisis prevention, early warning, and post-conflict rebuilding. The aim is to establish stability and security through a “disarmament of the mind”, i.e., a change in the attitudes and perceptions of participants and stakeholders. Countries are forming alliances, coordinating operations, working towards interoperability, and sharing technology to achieve a pragmatic strategic outlook towards lasting peace.[2] Chinese military diplomacy has played a crucial role in advancing the overall political and diplomatic objectives of Beijing and safeguarding the country’s strategic interests. Since the beginning of the 21st century, China has departed from Deng Xiaoping’s policy of “Hide your strength, bide your time”[c] and replaced it with a more aggressive policy that emphasises defence and security and seeks to address the historical grievances the nation endured during the period referred to as the ‘Century of Humiliation’.[d] The United States’ (US) heightened focus on Afghanistan, Iraq, terrorism, and the 2008 financial crisis created space for China to strengthen its international presence, enabling it to expand its global influence and enhance regional security.[3] The People’s Liberation Army (PLA) has become more active in military diplomacy, as emphasised by Chinese military writings over the past decade. The stated objectives of military diplomacy, derived from broader PLA missions, include supporting national foreign policy, protecting sovereignty, advancing the national interest, and shaping the international security environment.[4]

China’s Military Diplomacy

Despite possessing the second most powerful army in the world, China is a late entrant in military diplomacy. Eventually, military diplomacy emerged as an important tool for China to leverage its global influence, assisting in the development of a comprehensive approach to evolving multidimensional security threats. China’s approach since the beginning of the 21st century has been marked by a paradigm shift from inward to outward, with the expansion and modernisation of the PLA aimed at protecting China’s expanding overseas interests. Historically, the PLA has played a minor role in Chinese foreign policy. However, following the establishment of a more nationalist and assertive Chinese foreign policy, the PLA began serving strategic and operational goals to aid the national diplomacy and security strategy.[5] Thus, tracking the PLA’s diplomatic activities[e] could help in better understanding the trends in China’s diplomatic goals and interests.

China’s expanding international interests necessitate enabling a favourable security environment that can facilitate overseas investments and safeguard its citizens and assets globally. Chinese leadership has also indicated that it expects the PLA to play a larger role in expanding Chinese national and security interests abroad through military diplomacy. At an All-Military Diplomatic Work Conference and the 16th Military Attaché Working Conference in 2015, President Xi Jinping highlighted the role of military diplomacy by stating that the PLA’s external activities must serve China’s larger foreign policy strategy, uphold national security and sovereignty, and promote the military’s development. One of the key elements of this goal is building and maintaining the ability to control the narrative and shape favourable global perceptions.[6]

Indeed, military diplomatic activities have increased under Xi. From 2003 to 2012, China averaged 151 military diplomatic activities[f] per year. The average from 2013 to 2018 was 20 percent higher, at nearly 179 activities per year.[7] The April 2024 edition of the China Maritime Report highlights a notable but partial recovery in China’s military diplomacy activities in 2023, following a decline in engagements with foreign militaries during the COVID-19 pandemic.[8] This international exposure has also provided valuable insights into foreign military strategies, training methods, management techniques, technologies, equipment, and tactics.[9]

A 2019 defence white paper stated that China’s security cooperation around the world supports Xi’s vision to create a “community with a shared future for mankind” and “building a new model security partnership”.[10] Articles published in January 2023 reiterated the importance of military diplomacy in achieving China’s national rejuvenation, serving the country’s diplomatic interests, and protecting or defending national interests abroad. A number of authoritative books from PLA institutes on military diplomacy were also published around 2015, highlighting the emphasis placed on military diplomacy by the Chinese leadership.[g]

To counter Western domination and highlight its role as global security provider, Chinese military diplomacy aims to cultivate relationships with developing and underdeveloped countries. The year 2023 was the first year for fully implementing the guiding principles laid down at the 20th CCP

National Congress. In the area of military diplomacy, the PLA relied on the “Xi Jinping Thought on Strengthening the Military”[h] and “Xi Jinping Thought on Diplomacy”,[i] followed the lead of the head of state, and undertook high-level exchanges focused on practical cooperation, with an emphasis on multilateral platforms.[11] China’s military diplomacy activities in 2023 included senior-level visits and meetings, joint exercises, naval port calls, humanitarian activities, and academic exchanges. [12] According to Ministry of National Defense (MND) spokesperson Wu Qian, China’s military diplomacy in 2023 “served the overall political and diplomatic objectives of China”; “resolutely safeguarded national sovereignty, security and development interests”; “expanded foreign-related military operations”; “made innovative efforts in multilateral diplomacy”; and “contributed to building a community with a shared future for mankind.”[13] Beijing also promotes various global and regional initiatives, the largest of which are the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) and three other global initiatives—i.e., the Global Development Initiative (GDI),[j] the Global Security Initiative (GSI),[k] and the Global Civilization Initiative (GCI).[l],[14] These three have been introduced as part of the country’s foreign policy under Xi, with the aim of establishing China as a leader in global governance and offering alternatives to the Western-led global order. The complementary and amorphous GDI, GSI, and GCI concepts in China’s “Community of Common Destiny”[m] can be viewed as components of a larger push to establish China as a leader in global governance.[15] The GDI and GSI can support military diplomacy by fostering strategic partnerships and military economic activities through dual-use infrastructure and development projects, enhancing security cooperation through joint exercises, intelligence- and infrastructure-sharing agreements, defence industrial cooperation, technology transfer, humanitarian aid, military training, educational exchanges, and peacekeeping efforts. These actions would boost China’s global influence and reinforce military relations. Following purges of the foreign ministry and military in 2023,[16] Xi is likely to install new field commanders to marshal the civilian and military envoys he has called on to forge a “diplomatic iron army”.[n] In December 2023, former Navy chief Dong Jun was appointed defense minister—a rank-and-file Central Military Commission role whose primary responsibility is liaising with foreign militaries.[17] Every Chinese leader since Mao Zedong has implemented a programme to compel the commercial and civil sectors to support the PLA. These programmes are known by various terms, including the Civil-Military Integration (CMI) and the Military-Civil Fusion (MCF). Under Xi, the role of the military and the MCF have been increasingly promoted. [18] The MCF replaced the CMI and has been frequently discussed in China’s Five-Year Plans (FYP) and academic literature.

The MCF strategy is more complex than the CMI; the CMI refers to the cooperation between government and commercial facilities in Research & Development, manufacturing, and maintenance operations, whereas MCF is a state-led, state-directed programme that leverages state and commercial power to strengthen the PLA. The strategy is aimed at promoting the sharing of resources and collaboration in research and applications to ensure mutually beneficial economic cooperation and national defence construction.[19] MCF aims to enable China to become an economic, technological, and military superpower by fusing the country’s military and civilian industrial and Science & Technology resources.[20] The PLA also uses military diplomacy through the MCF to gather intelligence, learn new skills, benchmark PLA capabilities against those of other nations, and build interoperability with foreign partners.[21]

The exposure to innovative Western scientific technologies has enabled China to redirect its intelligence collection towards acquiring advanced dual-use technologies and equipment and leveraging the capabilities of research institutes, universities, and companies. Additionally, collaborative operations with foreign armed forces have not only contributed to the enhancement of Chinese military capabilities but also stimulated the Chinese economy and exports by showcasing cheap Chinese military technologies on the global stage. The military use of Chinese-operated foreign infrastructure is also set to increase as key projects and security relationships mature. Chinese integration into global transport networks allows China to monitor, delay, and potentially obstruct the activities of US and other competitors. [22] For the purposes of analysis, Chinese military diplomacy objectives can be divided into strategic and operational goals (see Table 1).

In its Annual China Military Power Report 2023, the US Department of Defense highlighted that, besides the existing overseas military base in Djibouti, China has likely considered adding military logistics facilities in 19 countries.[o],[24] PLA Navy (PLAN) vessels make extensive use of Chinese firms’ network of commercial transport infrastructure around the globe to safeguard China’s overseas interests and carry out far-seas protection across the long, vulnerable sea lanes stretching to coastal China. The most significant observations of this existing dual-use capability emerge from the network of nearly 100 ocean ports owned and/or operated by Chinese firms in foreign jurisdictions.[25] PLAN warships have now made port calls at over one-third of these facilities, utilising China's trade-centric infrastructure network.[26]

A number of Chinese multinationals, including the China Ocean Shipping Corp (COSCO) and China Merchants Group (CMG), operate global port terminals. Their assets form a vertically integrated transport network that supports China's international trade. These facilities are preferred by the PLAN and also enable PLA peacetime operations far from China. Domestic laws require Chinese firms to give PLA vessels preferential access, share information, and support defence mobilisation. Additionally, these ports collect extensive data on vessels, routes, cargos, and personnel, providing valuable intelligence, especially since military vessels often use commercial ports.[27] Notably, the PLAN has surpassed the PLA in exercise involvement, underscoring China's commitment to building a blue-water navy.[28]

China has integrated the trillion-dollar BRI connectivity project with military diplomacy to leverage its leadership role on security issues. Following the launch of the BRI in 2013, China has made infrastructure developments in the vicinity of South Asia, including in Djibouti, the Melaka Gateway port in Malaysia, and an industrial park near Duqm port in Oman.[29] In South Asia, Chinese military diplomacy footprints are being created in Gwadar (Pakistan), Hambantota (Sri Lanka), Coco Island (Myanmar), and Uthuru Thila Falhu Island (Maldives).[30] In the Indian Ocean and the West Philippine Sea, a covert conflict is underway, driven by China's maritime militia, known as the Third Sea Force which, disguised as civilian research vessels, pursue Beijing's geopolitical ambitions.[31] Despite international rulings against its South China Sea claims,[32] China is militarising the region by building artificial islands and releasing a "new standard" map to assert territorial claims and position itself at key maritime routes to challenge its rivals.[33]

Besides supporting foreign policy objectives and securing the lines of communication for energy resources and raw materials, military diplomacy has provided China with the opportunity to expand the range and geographic reach of PLA operations globally without raising red flags. Between March 2020 and April 2021, the PLA provided military medical assistance and donations to 56 countries around the world and participated in a UN peacekeeping mission. With the exception of two countries, all of the PLA's medical diplomatic activities targeted BRI countries.[34] Beijing is the 10th largest troop and police contributor (2,274 personnel) of any country and the second largest financial supporter, providing nearly 19 percent of UN peacekeeping programme funding.[35] Four out of six major BRI continental/maritime projects are located in South Asia and are in close proximity to India, including the Chinese China Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) flagship project.

The integration of the Silk Road Economic Belt (SREB), the Maritime Silk Route (MSR), the Digital Silk Route (DSR), the Space Information Corridor (SIC), and the Health Silk Road (HSR) with the BRI has further placed China in an unassailable position to monitor, scan, and govern global dynamics at critical choke points through military diplomacy.

Most South Asian countries, with the exception of Bhutan, have joined the BRI. Since 2018, China has committed or invested over US$150 billion in the economies of Bangladesh, the Maldives, Myanmar, Pakistan, Nepal, Sri Lanka, and Afghanistan; China is now the largest overseas investor in the Maldives, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka.[36]

South Asia has long been the hotbed of Sino-Indian strategic competition. A strategically located South Asia in the Western periphery of China, which has almost a quarter of the global population concentrated in only 3.5 percent of the total landmass, provides an ideal opportunity for Chinese westward expansion to the Middle East, Africa, and Europe through both continental and maritime routes and would be instrumental in relieving China from its 'Malacca Dilemma'[p] and helping fulfill its 'Middle Kingdom Dream'.[q] An underdeveloped but fertile South Asian region also provides China with ample opportunities to ensure uninterrupted connectivity for its energy, raw materials, and finished products to fuel its economy, ensure food security for its largest population, and absorb surplus capital, production, and construction capabilities particularly to fill the vacuum created after the withdrawal of NATO forces from Afghanistan. China could also use the BRI to win the favour of the large youth population in South Asia to overcome challenges such as unemployment, rampant corruption, illiteracy, and ageing populations.

Chinese military diplomacy in South Asia, with the exception of Pakistan, was limited till the end of the 20th century. Chinese approach in the region shifted in the beginning of the 21st century. The approach aims to encircle India through continental and maritime routes for effectively pursuing its String of Pearls strategy.[r] India contributes 68 percent of the total landmass, 75 percent of the population, and 79 percent of the economic output in South Asia.

The PLA's military diplomacy has grown in the last three decades.[37] China has prioritised military interactions over civilian engagements, viewing military diplomacy as more enduring and conducive to advancing security objectives. Almost half of all official visits or exchanges with other nations have been spearheaded by military officers. PLA military diplomacy places emphasis on Asia, which accounted for 41 percent of all interactions in 2003 to 2016. [38] Since 2013, the PLA has increased its military diplomacy activities, especially joint military exercises. Nearly a third of these exercises between 2003 to 2016 were with Pakistan, and India was among the top five PLA partners globally for such drills. Sri Lanka and Pakistan were among the top five global destinations for port calls.[39] Since 2020, however, joint military exercises with South Asia have declined compared to pre-COVID years, due to geopolitical tensions between China and India, leaving Pakistan as the only partner.[40]

To augment its expeditionary capabilities and protect its overseas strategic interests, China is increasing the strength of its marine corps from 20,000 in 2017 to 100,000 according to latest data.[41] There are speculations about China's plans to deploy these personnel overseas at the Gwadar Port and Djibouti. China has also enlisted Pakistan to deploy 30,000 Pakistan military personnel to protect Chinese citizens in the CPEC and is also in talks with the Taliban about the safety of Chinese citizens.[42] After the March 2024 suicide attack on Chinese engineers at Khyber Pakhtunkhwa in Pakistan, China is also considering deploying PLA personnel for the protection of its CPEC assets.[43]

China has enacted laws and regulations to strengthen the legal framework for implementing military strategies both domestically and internationally. The extraterritorial application of these laws aims to secure cooperation from Chinese citizens, diaspora, and foreign entities, posing distinct challenges to global freedom of expression. Key laws that bolster the legal basis for security and military activities abroad include the National Security Law (2015), the National Intelligence Law (2017), the new maritime law (2021), and the new land border law (2022). Additionally, in June 2022, China signed an order to implement the "Action Guidelines on Military Operations Other Than War" on an experimental basis, allowing the Chinese military to conduct "special military operations" abroad.[s],[44]

While China tailors its public diplomacy approach for each South Asian country, the following tools are common:

- Direct communication and visits between leaders of the Central Military Commission (CMC) and the defence and military leadership of the country.[45]
- Hosting peace and security fora to introduce BRI and other Chinese initiatives. [46] Similarly, military signalling of Chinese leadership displeasure through the cancellation of high-level engagements, dialogues, and exercises.

- Military economic activities through the construction and overseeing of dual-use port/ infrastructure/Special Economic Zone (SEZ) facilities, infrastructure-sharing agreements, foreign military bases, defence industrial cooperation, technology transfer, and military production at pivotal chokepoints and use of Chinese space technology for navigation.
- Showcasing, export, maintenance, and training/handling of Chinese military equipment/technologies, including vaccine diplomacy with foreign militaries.[47]
- Shaping/signalling of military expeditionary capabilities through joint operations, training, exercises, games, and cultural activities in international security operations.[48]
- Intelligence-sharing agreements.
- Military research/funding/academic collaboration for pursuing higher studies, dual technology identification/transfer, and talent hunting.
- CMF incorporating civilians abroad to reinforce China's security.
- Salami-slicing tactics or carefully calibrated non-war military activities to pursue territorial/ maritime claims, including the construction of border defence villages in Tibet.
- Illegal, Unlawful, and Unregulated (IUU) fishing activities in the Indian Ocean Region (IOR)
- New laws to strengthen the legal basis for security and military activities abroad

China's Footprints in South Asian Military Diplomacy Pakistan

Pakistan is a lynchpin for China to leverage its military diplomacy footprints in South Asia. Chinese military diplomacy in Pakistan can be identified from China's clandestine assistance in the nuclearisation of Pakistan,[49] the manufacture of military hardware including ballistic missiles at National Defense Complex, Rawalpindi[50] and JF-17 fighter jet at Pakistan Aeronautical Complex (PAC) Kamra, [51] leasing land to China in Gilgit-Baltistan, [52] Pakistan gifting two Sindh islands to China, [53] and the repatriation of Uighurs to China.[54]

After the March 2024 suicide attack on Chinese nationals in Pakistan, there are speculations that Beijing may push Islamabad to accept Chinese security agencies to guard CPEC projects.[55] China and Pakistan are also reportedly about to sign a deal that would involve setting up joint security companies and deploying Chinese security personnel for the protection of Chinese projects and workers.[56]

Nepal

Chinese military diplomacy in Nepal can be identified from professional military and language training, capacity-building for UN Peacekeeping forces, the establishment of a defence university, [57] the installation of a 5G tower on Mount Everest, [58] restrictions on Nepalese citizens joining the Indian Army Agniveer Scheme, the possible employment of Gurkhas in the PLA, [59] the construction of the Lumbini airport, [60] and the elimination of Tibetan activism in Nepal. [61]

Bangladesh

Bangladesh is China's second-largest arms importer (17 percent of total export between 2016-20), after Pakistan. [62] Chinese military diplomacy footprints in Bangladesh can be identified from the delivery/training of military equipment, [63] regular military exchanges, the construction of a submarine base in Cox Bazar in 2023, [64] and the modernisation of Chittagong Port. Bangladesh has also allocated two SEZs to China—in Chittagong Port and Dhaka. [65]

Maldives

Since Muizzu became president in November 2023, there has been an increase in Chinese military diplomacy in the Maldives. The Feydhoo Finolhu island is leased to China, [66] artificial islands are being developed, [67] Indian troops have withdrawn from the country, [68] and the China-Maldives military agreement was signed in March 2024. [69]

Bhutan

Chinese military diplomacy footprint in Bhutan remains insignificant despite sharing a land border. Through their salami-slicing strategy, the Chinese have built roads and erected new villages and administrative centres for their military in Bhutan. [70]

Afghanistan

Following US withdrawal, Chinese military diplomacy in Afghanistan can be identified from the setting up of a mountain brigade by China, the reported PLA deployment in Wakhan corridor, [71] and the creation of the Quadrilateral Coordination and Cooperation Mechanism. [72] In May 2023, the Taliban agreed to allow China to extend BRI infrastructure into Afghanistan from Pakistan. [73]

Sri Lanka

In addition to the lease of Hambantota port, Chinese military diplomacy in Sri Lanka is seen in the provision of Mandarin language classes for the police, [74] the construction of an artificial island off Colombo, [75] the docking of a surveillance ship at a Sri Lankan port, [76] and the supply of arms and ammunition to Sri Lanka. There are also rumours that Beijing plans to build a radar facility at Dondra Bay, to monitor maritime activities in the IOR. [77]

Conclusion

Since the beginning of the 21st century, China has increased its military diplomacy footprint in South Asia. With financial and military support, China is increasing its influence in South Asia, which could pose a security threat and isolate India in its IOR backyard. [78]

China's military diplomacy leverages the MCF to extend its global reach through economic initiatives like the BRI for dual-use infrastructure projects, defence industrial cooperation, arms export, Chinese space technology, salami-slicing tactics, IUU fishing, and strategic bases at key global chokepoints, including South Asia. In contrast, India's military diplomacy is focused on counterbalancing China in South Asia and the Indian Ocean.

India appears to be ambivalent about using military diplomacy to further its national interests. Instead, it emphasises humanitarian aid, joint exercises, defence cooperation, and regional engagement to build strategic partnerships and regional stability. Overall, India's military diplomacy is yet to reach the desired levels. However, there have been a few qualitative developments in the last decade. [79]

To offset the military diplomacy by the Chinese as an extra-regional power in South Asia, there is a need to take cognisance of growing Chinese footprints in the region and initiate appropriate timely steps. India's armed forces have versatile capabilities across terrains and climates for conventional and non-traditional operations. Adopting military diplomacy similar to those of China could boost India's global standing and serve as a vital tool for achieving national objectives.

We need to talk about China

24 October 2024, The Article, Stephen Rand

All good things come to an end. For China, that saying might finally be catching up. Since 1978, the country has defied economic gravity, becoming the world's growth engine. As Gordon Brown found out, if you think you've solved the riddle of boom and bust you're just storing up trouble. So brace yourself: the wheels seem to be coming off the Chinese economy, and the consequences will ripple far beyond Beijing's borders.

In 2023, China's GDP grew by 5.2%—a figure that would be the envy of any developed nation, but for China, it's sluggish, well below its pre-pandemic trajectory. Worse still, the World Bank forecasts an even slower 4.8% for 2024, signalling that deeper, structural problems are at play, and they're set to get worse before they improve.

China faces the same headwinds as the wider global economy — sluggish growth, weak international trade, tight monetary policies, and geopolitical flashpoints from the Middle East to Europe. But Beijing has an additional set of self-inflicted wounds: weak domestic demand, a limping property sector, and limited capacity for traditional stimulus measures. It's a toxic brew.

What's more troubling is that China's official numbers, always massaged by state-controlled reporting, may not even tell the full story. Beneath the surface lies a ticking real estate time bomb, a mountain of debt, and creeping social controls—all of which cast long shadows over China's economic future.

At the core of China's dilemma is the absence of a meaningful firewall between the state and the economy. The government wields the business world as just another lever of political control. This has worked fairly well in the past. The Chinese Communist Party forced the population to trade personal freedoms for economic prosperity, but the opening of the markets delivered one of the biggest reductions in poverty in history. That deal was predicated on uninterrupted growth. If the engine stalls, Xi Jinping could face an angry and restless populace.

In an attempt to stave off economic collapse, Beijing has been throwing the kitchen sink at the problem. In the wake of the pandemic, the Chinese government launched a series of fiscal stimuli, starting with $450 billion in 2020. By 2023, an additional $110 billion was added, followed by the largest-ever intervention—$1.07 trillion in 2024. These measures aim to prop up infrastructure, keep the stock market afloat, and shore up the struggling property sector. But none of it seems to be working.

China's debt-to-GDP ratio now exceeds 280%, a figure comparable to Western economies like the UK and US. Yet it's the structure of this debt that's particularly worrying. The central government's debt-to-GDP ratio is a relatively modest 83.6%—low by international standards (the UK sits at 100%, and the US at 120%). But this statistic masks the real danger—soaring local government debt.

By 2023, local government debt in China had ballooned to over $9 trillion, accounting for 45-50% of the country's GDP. In contrast, local government debt in the US and UK sits at just 15% and 4% of GDP respectively. The difference is stark, but it's not just the scale that's troubling. Chinese local governments rely heavily on off-balance-sheet entities, such as Local Government Financing Vehicles (LGFVs), to finance infrastructure projects and service debt. These LGFVs are hard to track, prone to corruption, and largely funded by selling land to housing developers — fuel for China's overinflated property market.

What this means is that central government has effectively offloaded its fiscal problems onto local government, making the latter dependent on land sales to keep afloat. If (or rather, when) the housing bubble bursts, this vital revenue stream will vanish, pushing heavily indebted local authorities into a fiscal crisis. With limited ways to raise funds, many will be forced to default on the mountains of debt they have accumulated. This isn't just a local issue—it's a ticking time bomb for the entire Chinese economy.

Every fiscal stimulus Beijing unveils feels like plugging a leaking dyke. Sooner or later, the dam will burst, and the long-term consequences will be devastating. Even if the Communist Party bureaucrats were to undertake serious structural reforms, which they won't, it's probably too late.

The property market is the canary in the coal mine for any economy. For decades, China's real estate sector was the pillar of its economic boom, accounting for almost 30% of its GDP—a staggering figure when compared to the US, where real estate peaked at 18% before the 2008 crash. And now that Chinese pillar of growth is crumbling.

Take Evergrande, one of China's largest developers, which went bust this year with liabilities exceeding $300 billion. To put that in perspective, Boeing—currently a topic of international business scrutiny—has liabilities and shareholders' equity of around $130 billion. When Lehman Brothers collapsed in 2008, triggering the biggest financial crisis since 1929, its liabilities stood at $613 billion. But Lehman was a bank. Evergrande is a property developer and a liability of $300 billion is enough to bring down numerous Lehmans. Evergrande was a housing behemoth.

Yet, despite Evergrande's failure, the full-scale crisis many expected hasn't materialised—yet. The Chinese government stepped in, restructuring the company's debts and managing the collapse. In a free market, such an implosion would have reverberated through the banking sector, potentially triggering a Lehman-style crisis. But in China's state-controlled system, the damage has been contained. However, other over-leveraged developers are teetering on the edge, and the broader property market remains on the brink of collapse. There just isn't enough money in the world for the Chinese Communist Party to keep papering over the cracks.

The Evergrande saga has been unfolding since 2021, when it first missed a bond interest payment. Had China allowed the market to take the hit then, it might have been a manageable crisis, a storm in a teacup. But Beijing's instinct to avoid even small disruptions has simply stored up trouble. Now, China finds itself chucking good money after bad, delaying the inevitable. A full-scale meltdown in the Chinese property market could dwarf the 2008 financial crisis, and the fallout would engulf not just financial institutions but wipe out local governments and millions of homeowners.

A deep recession in China wouldn't stay within its borders. Countries in Asia and Africa, whose economies rely on China's insatiable demand for raw materials, would be hit hard. A sharp drop in Chinese demand could push these nations into recession. Western markets, too, would be shaken, particularly in sectors exposed to China's real estate and infrastructure spending. Western financial institutions have eagerly ridden the wave of China's growth—part of your pension is likely invested in it.

But the biggest wildcard is China's vast reserves of US dollars. Officially, China holds over $3 trillion in reserves, with estimates suggesting another $3 trillion in "shadow reserves". If China released these dollars to prop up its domestic economy, the result could be global financial chaos. It would devalue the dollar and trigger a deflationary spiral—an economic nightmare. As any student of German history knows, it was deflation, not inflation, that brought down the Weimar Republic.

I'm not saying such a deflation is inevitable, but the risks are real. China's future is increasingly uncertain. Its addiction to debt, a crumbling property market, and growing geopolitical isolation are creating a perfect storm. Without serious reforms, China could face an economic collapse that would send shockwaves across the globe, reshaping the financial landscape for decades to come.

The West, meanwhile, cannot afford to be complacent. We need to prepare for a potential Chinese collapse. The storm might still be gathering, but when it hits, it will be a storm of historic proportions.

From Orchards to Auctions: The Chinese Robbery of Uyghur Wealth. Part II

24 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Abdulhakim Idris

Properties of Uyghur "dissidents" are auctioned on Taobao and end up in the hands of Han Chinese.

The judicial auction process of Uyghur properties is also one of the bitter consequences of the Uyghur Genocide. It begins with the arrest and imprisonment of Uyghur businesspeople, often on so-called "terrorism" or "extremism" charges. These arrests are typically carried out with little due process or transparency. Following arrest, Chinese authorities confiscate the assets of imprisoned Uyghurs. These assets include real estate, businesses, company shares, and personal property. Chinese courts then issue orders for the confiscated assets to be auctioned off. These court orders are often the only official documentation of arrests and asset seizures.

The seized property is then listed on the judicial auction section of Taobao, an e-commerce platform owned by Alibaba Group. Taobao has been used by the Chinese judicial system since 2012 to auction properties seized in criminal cases and properties that serve as collateral for overdue loans. When a property is auctioned on Taobao, potential buyers can bid on assets ranging from household appliances to multi-million-dollar real estate. Once the auction is complete, the property is transferred to the highest bidder. The proceeds from these sales often go to the Chinese Communist Party rather than to the families of imprisoned Uyghurs.

One example cited in a report on this issue is that of Abduljelil Helil, a prominent Uyghur real estate developer in Kashgar. He was arrested in 2017 for allegedly "aiding terrorist activities." Following his arrest, several properties owned by his company were auctioned on Taobao. One of these properties is a 17-story building in Kashgar, which was sold in 2021 for 750 million yuan (about $116 million). Another case is that of Akbar Imin, a wealthy businessman from Khotan who was arrested in 2018 for allegedly making unauthorized Hajj pilgrimages. Following his arrest, his assets were seized and auctioned, including a valuable property in Urumqi sold on Taobao for 23 million yuan (about $3.6 million).

Similarly, another Uyghur businessman, Rozi Haji Hemdul, was wrongfully arrested in 2017. Following his arrest, his assets were seized and auctioned on Taobao; a large commercial building in Urumqi was sold for over 100 million yuan (approximately $15.5 million). The UHRP report also revealed a previously unreported case of a Uyghur individual whose property was auctioned in Hotan. The auction listing on Taobao included a court order stating that the individual had been imprisoned for "aiding terrorist activities." The property being auctioned is a residential building worth several million yuan. In another case, the report found evidence of property auctions linked to multiple members of the same family. Three people, all over the age of 75, were accused of allegedly "aiding terrorist activities." Shared family properties, including farmland and residences, were auctioned on Taobao.

Since 2019, courts in the Uyghur region have auctioned at least 150 assets on e-commerce sites, ranging from household appliances to real estate and company shares, belonging to at least 21 individuals and worth $84.8 million. Amid a large-scale government campaign to assimilate Uyghur and other Turkic Muslim communities, tens of millions of dollars in assets belonging to imprisoned Uyghur business owners have been seized and auctioned off.

The role of the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps (XPCC), or Bingtuan as it is known, in confiscating Uyghur assets is also worth highlighting. Bingtuan has been involved in expropriating Uyghurs' land for agricultural and industrial projects. These projects often prioritize Han Chinese settlers and workers, marginalizing Uyghur farmers and communities. The XPCC is not only involved in expropriating Uyghurs' land but also manages critical natural resources in the region, including water and minerals. Profits from these resources primarily benefit state-owned enterprises and Han Chinese interests rather than local Uyghur communities.

Bingtuan has been involved in surveillance operations, contributing to the broader control system over the Uyghur population. Its dual role as an economic entity and a paramilitary force enables it to implement government policies effectively. This unique structure allows the XPCC to serve as both an instrument of economic dominance and social control, playing an essential role in the systematic marginalization of Uyghurs. The XPCC's activities align with broader government strategies aimed at assimilating ethnic minorities and consolidating control over the region. The XPCC ensures that Uyghur communities remain economically dependent and politically repressed through its control over land, resources, and economic activities.

The destruction of Uyghur wealth through genocidal criminalization by the Chinese Communist Party in violation of human rights, international law and universal values is a calculated effort deeply intertwined with policies of control, assimilation, and economic domination. From the early land reforms that confiscated orchards and farms to the current auctions of Uyghur businesses and properties, this process has methodically eroded the financial and cultural foundations of the Uyghur people.

The introduction of organizations such as the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps (XPCC) further increases the scale and intensity of this economic repression, ensuring that the benefits of the region's wealth flow to Han Chinese settlers and state-owned enterprises. At the same time, Uyghurs are left marginalized and economically powerless. What is happening to Uyghurs is not just a series of isolated incidents but part of a broader strategy to weaken Uyghur identity by removing the material and cultural wealth that sustains it. As the world watches, the brutal confiscation of Uyghurs' assets continues to reshape the region, leaving behind a legacy of loss, displacement, and economic devastation.

How confiscation of Uyghur wealth by China is pushing Uyghurs to poverty.

The genocide policy implemented by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in Xinjiang/East Turkestan is still continuing with all its violence. This genocide policy is felt in every aspect of life, from the placement of Uyghurs in concentration camps to forced sterilization, from the rape of women to the separation of children from their families.

An essential dimension of the Uyghur genocide is the confiscation of the assets of the Uyghur people and their impoverishment. The systematic confiscation of Uyghur wealth in the Uyghur region is not just a modern strategy but a long-standing method of control and repression with deep roots in Chinese policies dating back to the mid-20th century. What once began with land reform in Uyghurs' orchards and farms has evolved into a comprehensive campaign of economic displacement, with Uyghur businesses and property regularly confiscated and auctioned under the guise of counterterrorism or modernization.

Underlying this ongoing expropriation is a broader plan to undermine Uyghur existence, erode their economic base, and reshape the region for Han Chinese settlers' domination. This series explores the historical origins, methods, and effects of China's relentless campaign to deprive the Uyghur people of their wealth, from ancestral orchards to today's auction blocks.

Following the establishment of the People's Republic of China in 1949, the CCP initiated land reform policies that were particularly harsh in regions such as Xinjiang (East Turkestan). The government classified many Uyghur farmland owners as "landlords" and confiscated their land, homes, and property. These so-called land reforms were highly politicized and resulted in the indiscriminate confiscation of property from Uyghur families, especially in agricultural areas such as Kashgar.

The atrocities perpetrated by the CCP during the so-called land reforms have reached incredible proportions. It is reported that the number of victims killed during land reform across China, including Uyghur lands, has exceeded one million. According to one study, families who owned even a pot of sugar or a water buffalo to plow the fields were reported so that their property could be confiscated. Thus, in some parts of China, the so-called land reform has become entirely arbitrary and out of control, with completely innocent peasants falling victim to an indiscriminate mob mentality.

Over the following decades, the Chinese Communist Party's repressive policies continued to erode Uyghurs' economic well-being. The Cultural Revolution, which began in 1966 and lasted for a decade, saw further attacks on Uyghur property owners and intellectuals, while the 1980s and 1990s brought waves of Han Chinese migration that began to change the demographic and economic landscape of the region.

After Xi Jinping took the helm of China in 2012, repression in the Uyghurs' homeland has intensified. In recent years, notably in 2014, he launched the "Strike Hard Campaign." Since its introduction, the confiscation of Uyghurs' assets has accelerated dramatically. On the other hand, Xi Jinping announced the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in 2013. While projects stretching from China to Europe and Africa were on the agenda, the Chinese Communist Party claimed that it aimed for the world's equal economic growth. Xi gives the message that China will eradicate poverty worldwide at every opportunity.

However, when it comes to Uyghurs, this so-called equal development disappears. Instead, the Chinese government has implemented repressive policies under the guise of fighting so-called extremism. The Beijing government uses a variety of methods to confiscate Uyghurs' assets under the guise of counterterrorism, economic development or modernization initiatives. One of the most common strategies is land expropriation, where large tracts of agricultural land are taken from Uyghur farmers for industrial development, resource extraction projects, or redistribution to Han Chinese settlers. The compensation given to Uyghurs whose property is confiscated is often far below market value and insufficient for Uyghurs to maintain their previous standard of living. The loss of fertile land that once belonged to Uyghurs represents a significant financial blow and severs Uyghurs' ties to their ancestral lands.

When looking at the Chinese Communist Party's methods of confiscation, the expropriation of businesses, especially in sectors such as agriculture, textiles, and tourism, is also a common occurrence. Uyghur-owned businesses are forcibly transferred to state ownership or Han Chinese management. These seizures are often carried out under the pretext of so-called anti-terrorism investigations or allegations of financial irregularities based on no evidence. Many Uyghur business owners have been detained in internment camps, and their assets have been frozen or confiscated in their absence.

Another way in which Uyghurs' assets are being removed is through so-called urban renewal programs. For example, urban renewal projects have resulted in the demolition of traditional Uyghur neighborhoods in cities such as Kashgar, Khotan, and Urumqi. Residents are often relocated to modern apartment blocks located far from their communities and previous livelihoods. These displacements disrupt the social networks and economic patterns that have sustained Uyghur communities for generations.

Another tool often used by the authorities is asset freezes. Bank accounts and property of Uyghurs accused of so-called "extremism" or "separatism" are usually frozen, leaving families destitute. Even Uyghurs not directly accused of crimes see their assets frozen if they have suspected family members. In addition to financial assets, items of cultural and historical significance, including artwork, manuscripts, and religious artifacts, have been confiscated from Uyghur families and institutions. This is not only a financial loss, but also the erasure of Uyghur cultural heritage.

The confiscation of Uyghur wealth serves multiple purposes for the genocidal Chinese Communist Party. First, the government is weakening the economic base of Uyghur society, making the population more dependent on state support and employment, and increasing pressure on individuals and communities. The confiscation of Uyghur assets also facilitates the transfer of resources to Han Chinese settlers and state-owned companies, supporting the government's efforts to change the demographic and economic balance of the region.

Moreover, the relocation of Uyghurs from traditional neighborhoods to modern, easily monitored housing complexes provides for increased surveillance and control over Uyghur communities in violation of human rights. By separating Uyghurs from their traditional economic activities and living spaces, the government aims to remove the material basis of Uyghur culture and identity. Asset confiscation also serves as a powerful tool to punish those who do not demonstrate their loyalty to the Chinese Communist Party and to deter others from resisting government policies.

The systematic confiscation of Uyghurs' assets has led to widespread economic displacement and marginalization. Many Uyghurs have been forced from self-sufficient agricultural or small business lifestyles into low-wage labor or unemployment. This economic repression serves as a powerful tool of control and assimilation, making it increasingly difficult for Uyghurs to maintain their traditional way of life or achieve economic independence.

The loss of agricultural livelihoods has been one of the most devastating impacts. As farmland has been converted for industrial use or confiscated for state-run agricultural projects, many Uyghur farmers have lost their primary source of income. Economic development has been concentrated in cities, leaving rural Uyghur communities behind. Urban renewal projects have often pushed Uyghurs to the peripheries of cities, away from economic opportunities. Discrimination in favor of Han Chinese in hiring is also widespread in the Uyghur region. Uyghurs face widespread discrimination in hiring, especially for high-paying jobs in the growing industrial and service sectors. Many job postings explicitly state preferences for Han Chinese applicants or require fluency in Mandarin, effectively excluding many Uyghurs.

China's Agents of Chaos

22 October 2024, Foreign Affairs, Oriana Skylar Mastro

The Military Logic of Beijing's Growing Partnerships
At a joint press conference in June 2024, U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken and NATO Secretary-General Jens Stoltenberg fretted over the strengthening ties between China, Iran, North Korea, and Russia. They are hardly the only politicians to have done so. The informal pact between these four autocracies has become a major focus in Washington, described by both Democratic and Republican officials as a new "axis of evil." These countries, analysts point out, coordinate military and diplomatic activity. They have similar rhetoric and common interests. And they seem to share one aim above all: weakening the United States.

Each of these countries, by itself, has formidable capabilities. But China is the bloc's central player. It has the biggest population and economy, and it doles out the most aid. Beijing is North Korea's primary trade ally and benefactor. It has helped Iran contend with international sanctions, signing a "comprehensive strategic partnership" agreement with Tehran in 2021. And China has provided Russia with over $9 billion in dual-use items—goods with both commercial and military applications—since the latter's invasion of Ukraine. This support has kept Russia's economy from collapsing, despite Western sanctions aimed at crippling the country's war effort. (Chinese goods now make up 38 percent of all imports into Russia.)

But China doesn't want to be seen as the leader of this group. It doesn't even want to be viewed as a member. In April 2023, Chinese Premier Li Qiang claimed that "China-Russia relations adhere to the principles of nonalignment, nonconfrontation, and nontargeting of third parties." In 2016, Chinese Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs Fu Ying said that Beijing had "no interest" in forming "an anti-U.S. or anti-Western bloc of any kind." The government has, accordingly, refrained from signing defense treaties with Iran and Russia. It sometimes works against Iranian, North Korean, and Russian positions in international conflicts.

There is a reason for this ambiguity. China wants to supplant the United States as the world's dominant power, and although partnering with Iran, North Korea, and Russia helps Beijing in that effort, the trio can also undermine its aims. The three states weaken Washington by attracting its resources and distracting it from Beijing. But they have also greatly antagonized powerful neighbors—such as Germany, Japan, and Saudi Arabia—that China doesn't want to alienate. As a result, Chinese officials must walk a fine line. Their relationship with the axis must be close enough that they can wield it, but not so close that they are blamed for its misbehavior.

Unfortunately, the United States is letting China have the best of both worlds. Washington has been too focused on figuring out whether these countries will form a traditional defense alliance to understand Beijing's existing entrepreneurial approach to partnerships—or to see that it is very successful. Under the present arrangement, Iran, North Korea, and Russia all cause trouble for the West. Yet because those countries are not formal Chinese allies, Washington's partners have not penalized China for their transgressions. In fact, if anything, the axis is splitting the U.S. alliance system. Many of the United States' friends, preoccupied with their own regional troublemakers, have refused to join with Washington in its competition against Beijing.

China's approach could be especially effective in the event of a war. If Beijing and Washington had to battle, the axis is now powerful enough and coordinated enough on military matters that it could fight together and defeat the United States. But because axis states are not a tightly coordinated bloc, they could just as easily launch separate conflicts that divide American resources, distract U.S. allies, and thus help Beijing prevail.

Washington must therefore change course. Rather than trying to guess how close these countries are to each other or working to pull them apart, the U.S. government must start treating them as the autocratic bloc they are. It must encourage its allies around the globe to do the same. And it needs to treat China as the master of the axis—whether or not that is the reality of the situation.

HALF IN, HALF OUT

In 1950, at the onset of the Cold War, the Chinese Communist Party and the Soviet Communist Party formalized a 30-year Treaty of Friendship, Alliance, and Mutual Assistance. The agreement, forged in the aftermath of the Communists' victory over the Nationalists in the Chinese Civil War, was framed by both sides as the natural coming together of two revolutionary socialist states. As such, it called on Beijing and Moscow to defend and consult each other "regarding all important international questions affecting the common interests of the Soviet Union and China."

In practice, however, the Chinese-Soviet relationship quickly became complicated. The countries did often collaborate, most notably by supporting North Korean founder Kim Il Sung in his war against South Korea. But they also clashed over who would lead the communist bloc. Beijing and Moscow, for example, vied to arm the North Vietnamese. China resisted Soviet efforts to forge a détente with the United States.

Today, China's relationship with U.S. antagonists is again half in, half out. There is, on the one hand, plenty of cooperation. In 2021, Beijing renewed the Chinese-North Korean mutual defense treaty, and as of 2023, China purchases 90 percent of Iran's oil. China, Iran, and Russia conduct regular joint naval exercises in the Gulf of Oman. And in 2018, China agreed to join Russia in a national military exercise in which the two countries practiced, among other things, how they might handle war on the Korean Peninsula. But Beijing has not endorsed the invasion of Ukraine, nor has it provided direct military aid. When Russian President Vladimir Putin and North Korean leader Kim Jong Un met in June and signed a treaty in which they pledged to support each other militarily if either was attacked, the Chinese Foreign Ministry called it a bilateral matter between Moscow and Pyongyang. When the United Arab Emirates had a maritime dispute with Iran, Beijing released a joint statement with the UAE declaring its support for a "peaceful solution." And in January 2024, Chinese officials told their Iranian counterparts to curb Houthi attacks on Red Sea shipping, signaling that continued hostilities might jeopardize their economic relationship.

During the Cold War, China paid a price for sending mixed messages to its Soviet ally. Over time, Moscow moved away from Beijing, eventually leading to what analysts call the Sino-Soviet split. But this time, China's authoritarian partners appear not to mind Russia's behavior. Despite Beijing's detachment, China is getting natural gas from Russia at a 44 percent discount compared with what Europe pays. Iran did not sign a letter condemning China for its violence against the Uyghurs in Xinjiang, and Tehran has offered Beijing political support for its takeover of Hong Kong and its claims to Taiwan.

All the while, Beijing has managed to stay on good terms with most U.S. allies. South Korea, and to a degree Japan, does not fully support U.S. deterrence efforts against China. Beijing remains both Japan's and South Korea's largest trading partner, even though it aids North Korea. Beijing has put enough distance between itself and Moscow that the EU felt comfortable trading over $800 billion in goods with China in 2023, or 15 percent of the EU's total trade. During his 2023 visit to China, French President Emmanuel Macron said that his country would not blindly follow the United States in crises that are not its concern, specifically in reference to Taiwan. German Chancellor Olaf Scholz has on multiple occasions claimed that Germany is not a part of a geopolitical bloc and will not join one. Similarly, China's partnership with Iran has not jeopardized its ties with the Gulf States or Israel.

ORDER OF DISORDER

At first, it may seem as if China's mixed approach to Iran, North Korea, and Russia should be tolerable for the United States. Under the status quo, after all, China is not giving Russia outright military aid with which to attack Ukraine. Beijing continues to support diplomacy to halt Iran's nuclear program. The EU-Chinese relationship, meanwhile, could moderate Iran's behavior.

The status quo is better than a situation in which Beijing provides full-throated support for these countries. But U.S. officials should take no comfort in the current situation. Neither the distance between China and its partners nor Beijing's outreach to the West has truly acted as a constraint. China may occasionally wag its finger at Iran or quietly criticize Russia, but when push comes to shove, it is giving an enormous amount of help to these states. Beijing, for example, bolstered a disinformation campaign in 2022 claiming that U.S.-funded Ukrainian biolabs were making biological weapons—helping provide the justification for the invasion of Ukraine. The states work together to challenge the traditional human rights language used by international institutions, arguing that concepts such as civil liberties and the rule of law are exclusively Western constructs. Iran, North Korea, and Russia all use Chinese technology to repress their populations.

Beijing's support for these states is most pronounced on matters of security and defense. It has provided them with sophisticated military technology and assistance. It has shared intelligence with Russia, including from its extensive satellite network, helping Moscow's war efforts. Moscow, in turn, supplies Beijing with billions of dollars in weapons annually. These shipments have dramatically improved China's ability to target U.S. jets, bases, and ships. Moscow has also given Beijing technology it can use to develop or enhance its domestic weapons production.

Russia's partnership with China adds a terrifying new dynamic to U.S. nuclear calculations.

Partly as a result of this cooperation, the United States may be at a military disadvantage for the first time in decades. China alone has more active soldiers than does the United States. Beijing and Moscow together have more warships and tanks than Washington. Given how readily the former two governments cooperate, there is a good chance they might overpower U.S. forces if they fought together in a single military theater—for example, if China and Russia aid North Korea in a war against its southern neighbor or if Russia helps China with an attack on Taiwan.

The autocratic quad could also wreak havoc by fighting separately but simultaneously. The United States would struggle to win a two-front war. Instead, the American armed forces are structured to fight one major war while deterring smaller regional conflicts. That means if wars were raging in Europe, in the Middle East, on the Korean Peninsula, and over Taiwan, the United States would have to leave all but one of those theaters to largely fend for itself, at least initially.

Many U.S. allies have capable militaries that could battle axis members. But because they face their own regional demons, they are reluctant to help other states with their conflicts. In the event of a multifront war, they will want to keep their forces at home for self-defense. That means Washington cannot count on its allies to help U.S. troops even where it needs them most. If, for instance, the United States focused on defending Taiwan while North Korea was trying to seize South Korea, then Seoul and Tokyo would be either entirely or largely unwilling to give the United States support. In fact, concerns about North Korea have already made South Korea reluctant to let U.S. forces stationed within its borders take any actions beyond the Korean Peninsula. Europe, trying to protect its commercial ties, would almost certainly stay out of such a conflict.

To be sure, China would struggle to help its partners with their own fights if it had to take on the United States. During the Chinese Civil War, the Communists lost Taiwan partly because they chose to aid North Korea, giving U.S. President Harry Truman time to dispatch the Seventh Fleet to the Taiwan Strait and prevent an invasion. Chinese leader Xi Jinping will not want to repeat that mistake.

But any of these axis members can create crises that divert U.S. and allied resources without launching risky, full-blown conflicts. They can also give China an edge without joining its war. Russia, for example, could help China withstand an energy blockade by sending it oil and gas overland. The Eastern Siberia–Pacific Ocean pipeline, which sends Russian oil to Asian markets, can export about 35 million metric tons annually to China. The Power of Siberia pipeline, which transports natural gas to China, is expected to send 38 billion cubic meters per year by 2025—nearly equal to the amount of natural gas consumed annually by Australia. Moscow could also contribute its capital and labor to help China with manufacturing. The two states already have joint manufacturing systems in place, including those related to making weapons.

If Moscow chose to become just slightly more involved in a U.S.-Chinese war, it would create even bigger headaches. Russian fighter jets, for instance, could conduct defensive joint air patrols with Chinese forces, as they have done in the past. The United States might then refrain from hitting Chinese targets, if only to stop Russia from becoming a direct combatant.

Whatever Russia's degree of involvement, its partnership with China adds a terrifying new dynamic to U.S. calculations. In the past, the United States has never had to contend with more than one nuclear peer. Now, with Beijing and Moscow, it has two. Unfortunately for Washington (and the world), attempts to prevent conflict with one of these governments could undermine deterrence against the other. For example, the United States signed the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty with the Soviet Union in 1987 to eliminate their ground-launched intermediate-range missiles. It broadly succeeded and lowered tensions between the two countries. But the deal also left Beijing unconstrained, helping it gain a significant regional advantage in intermediate-range ballistic missiles. Future negotiations between any two of the three countries could again give the third an incentive for nuclear proliferation.

UNITE AND CONQUER

Some American strategists have suggested that to handle this axis, Washington should try dividing it. U.S. officials appear to be listening. In March 2023, for example, Blinken sought to drive a wedge between Beijing and Moscow by preying on the latter's insecurities: "Russia is very much the junior partner in this relationship," he said. Such efforts could hark back to the Cold War, when Washington worked to divide the fraught Chinese-Soviet axis. As Beijing and Moscow grew more distant, U.S. diplomats established channels of communication with their Chinese counterparts, leading to U.S. President Richard Nixon's visit to China in 1972. Seven years later, China and the United States established formal relations. Eventually, they even worked together to spy on the Soviets.

But today, such efforts would be for naught. The autocratic axis provides Beijing with political support, energy supplies, and technology that it just cannot get from the West. Attempts to convince any of these countries that their autocratic colleagues present a greater threat than the United States are as ineffective as they are foolish.

Instead of trying to split the bloc, the United States must do the opposite: treat its members as entirely interlinked. That means ensuring poor behavior on the part of one leads to penalties for the others. Instead of exclusively sanctioning Chinese companies that support Russia's war effort, the United States could treat the Chinese state as a supporting entity and implement economic restrictions against the whole country. It could tell Beijing those restrictions will remain in place until Russia comes to the negotiating table. Beijing will cry foul, claiming it has no influence over Moscow. This might, indeed, be the case. But with skin in the game, China will work harder to acquire the influence it needs to successfully pressure Russia.

If Washington wants to be the leader of the whole world, it will need to gain support from autocracies. Grouping China and its partners could also help Washington unify its own coalition. Europe may not fully grasp the threat Beijing poses to the international order, but it surely understands the dangers emanating from Moscow. Yet the United States has not done nearly enough to explain to European countries why China and Russia are broadly connected, instead emphasizing the narrow links Beijing has to Moscow's invasion. If Washington can explain the bigger relationship, Europeans will be more likely to take Beijing's security challenge seriously and be more proactive in attempting to shape its behavior.

Yet the United States should still avoid an ideological approach. Although it should treat these autocratic countries as a bloc, it should avoid framing the global competition as one of democracies against autocracies. Autocratic partners (such as Saudi Arabia) will not want to help Washington prevail against China if the contest is about systems of government. Neither will many potential democratic partners in the developing world, such as Brazil, Indonesia, and South Africa. In fact, China has built a wide network of friends by being regime agnostic and focusing on development. In his speeches to foreign audiences, for example, Xi loves to play up Beijing's respect for "state sovereignty," its commitment to "noninterference," and its desire to see poor countries grow rich. The developing world has listened. In the summer of 2024, when Xi met with José Ramos-Horta, the president of East Timor—a small, impoverished, and highly democratic state—Ramos-Horta declared that he did not care about great-power rivalries or the character of his country's allies. If China can alleviate East Timor's poverty and malnutrition, Ramos-Horta said, "then China is my hero."

Washington should take a page from Beijing's book. If it wants to be the leader of the whole world, not just the free world, it will need to gain support from developing democracies and autocracies alike. (According to Freedom House, 80 percent of people on earth live in countries that are either not free or only partly free.) It needs to be more agile, tailoring its offerings and messaging to address what each country cares about. This process involves not only offering more aid but also contributing to the right types of projects, such as ones related to health care, higher education, and cybersecurity. It means greater diplomatic engagement, military cooperation, and people-to-people ties.

It is true that, by applying more pressure, Washington and its allies may push Beijing to forge stronger connections with Iran, North Korea, and Russia. But China already substantially benefits from these relationships, so the United States has no choice but to take a tougher stance. The reality is that anything the United States does to impose costs on China will upset Beijing. The only way to avoid that is to give it what it wants, which is territorial control over Taiwan, maritime control of the South China Sea, and economic, military, and political dominance in Asia. Washington cannot be afraid to make China pay for helping bad actors, especially when holding back lets Beijing pretend to be above the fray.

Guest Opinion: False narratives about Xinjiang won't halt its development

20 October 2024, Xinhua, Mohammad Abu Shaikha

Xinjiang has come a long way, from a region hit by extremism to a thriving hub of development. The government's focus on unity and opportunity has dramatically changed the region.

When China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region was subjected to rampant acts of sabotage, violence and extremism for decades till about eight years ago, some Western countries saw an opportunity to spread disinformation and destabilize the Chinese economy.

The extremists planned and carried out thousands of bombings, assassinations, poisonings, arson attacks and other violent crimes.

Western countries have misrepresented the treatment of Uygurs in the region. On a visit to Xinjiang in 2023, I attended an anti-extremism exhibition. No nation would shy away from addressing extremist forces.

Xinjiang is home to over 10 million Muslims belonging to the Uygur ethnic group. While there, we prayed in an ancient mosque. I observed Muslims leading joyful lives and experiencing the same freedoms as other Chinese citizens across the nation. The roads are clean and wide, there are no traffic jams, and the road signs are written in three languages: Uygur, Chinese, and English. The Uygurs and various other ethnic minorities can engage in their cultural practices, traditions, and customs.

After 2016, the region began to recover from the disease that afflicted it and became safer day by day. It focused on development, with the government offering opportunities to anyone inclined to work and improve their living conditions. The government also established schools and education centers for Islamic studies throughout Xinjiang. These centers and religious institutions strive to provide clerics with accurate understandings of Islam, enabling them to teach Muslims more effectively.

Xinjiang has witnessed rapid transformation due to China's push for mega-development projects. It has become a vital hub on the Silk Road Economic Belt, connecting China with Southeast, South, and Central Asia and extending to Russia and Europe.

The Chinese government works around the clock to enhance the well-being of Xinjiang's residents and foster unity among all ethnic groups. Residents work in agriculture, industry, trade, and advanced technology, among other fields.

Xinjiang has become an investment hub for many foreign companies in various sectors, such as manufacturing, mining, leasing, business services, software, information technology, finance, agriculture, retail and wholesale industry.

Security and safety, in addition to the region's natural resources, such as oil, gas, and coal, plays a significant role in attracting investment.

China's relations with the Arab world are another shining point. The People's Republic of China seeks not to interfere in the affairs of any Arab country but instead provides humanitarian and logistical assistance and promotes joint cooperation. All Arab countries have signed cooperation documents with China on the Belt and Road Initiative.

Arab countries want good relations with all countries based on win-win outcomes and desire relations free of hegemonic intent.

Xinjiang has come a long way, from a region hit by extremism to a thriving hub of development. The government's focus on unity and opportunity has dramatically changed the region. Xinjiang's progress also strengthens China's ties with the Arab world, promoting collaboration and mutual benefit.

Value Vacuum: China's command versus India's concessions

19 October 2024, The Economic Times

Let's start with a comparison of two countries:

Country A: Once highly protectionist, with tariffs over 30%, it still imposes significant trade restrictions. Capital flows are tightly controlled, the banking sector is state-regulated, and foreign asset ownership is limited. Corruption, lack of elections, and weak intellectual property laws persist, making it a piracy hub. Many state-owned enterprises survive on government subsidies despite losses.

Country B has long maintained a highly protectionist trade policy, with industrial tariffs averaging 40-55%. Most of the population lacks voting rights, and electoral fraud is common. Corruption is rampant, with government positions sold to political backers, and civil servants are not hired through competitive processes. Public finances are unstable, marked by frequent defaults, and foreign investors face significant discrimination. In banking, foreign shareholders are barred from leadership or voting roles unless they reside locally. The absence of competition law enables unchecked monopolies, while intellectual property protection, especially for foreign copyrights, remains weak.

Many may recognize Country A as China around 2010, but fewer may realize that Country B is the United States circa 1880, a time when it was poorer than China in 2010. As Ha Joon Chang notes in 23 Things They Don't Tell You About Capitalism, nearly all wealthy nations, including Britain and the US, rose to prosperity through protectionism, subsidies, and policies they now discourage developing countries from adopting.

The Financial Times recently reported that Xiaohongshu, China's Instagram-like platform, achieved $1 billion in sales and $200 million in profits in the first quarter of the year. With over 300 million users and a valuation exceeding $17 billion, its success is remarkable.

Xiaohongshu is part of a growing list of companies that have created significant wealth by adapting successful Western business models, including Tencent Holdings (WeChat, similar to WhatsApp, and QQ, akin to Facebook Messenger), Weibo and Toutiao (modelled after Twitter), Baidu (Google), Youku (YouTube), Zhihu (Quora), Dianping (Yelp), and Didi Chuxing (Uber). Collectively, these companies have a combined market valuation exceeding $1 trillion, based on the market capitalization of listed entities and estimates for those that remain private.

Richard McGregor writes in The Party that China's ability to maintain tight control over its population is rooted in the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP's) pervasive governance, which extends across all levels of society.

The CCP's mechanisms of control include the use of surveillance, centralisation of authority, and management of personnel, ensuring loyalty and compliance through appointments controlled by the Central Organization Department. This tight governance over the population allows the Party to implement policies that prioritize strategic national goals over individual liberties.

When combined with the CCP's ability to regulate which companies can operate within its borders, this control fosters an environment where domestic enterprises are heavily favoured. By ensuring that economic activities align with national interests and maintaining political loyalty within businesses, the party creates an ecosystem in which domestic companies can thrive, especially in sectors critical to China's global ambitions. The synergy between population control and business regulation has allowed China to build large, valuable domestic companies that are integral to its economy.

In India, individual liberties, including economic freedom, are highly valued, which allows for minimal restrictions on which companies can operate within the country. Unlike countries that impose tight controls on the market and limit foreign or private enterprises, India fosters an open environment where companies of all kinds can compete, leading to significant opportunities for individuals, such as influencers, to earn substantial income.

According to a study by Koflucose, social media influencers in India earn anywhere between Rs 20,000 to Rs 2,00,000 per month, depending on their following and engagement rate. For instance, fashion influencers earn between 40 to 60 paisa per view, while financial content creators can command Rs 3-4 per view.

However, despite the high potential earnings for individual influencers, this openness and lack of stringent regulation on companies mean that overall, businesses do not generate the same level of concentrated value as those in more controlled markets, like China. This results in a more fragmented ecosystem where individual successes are prominent, but domestic companies struggle to reach a large scale of influence and profitability.

For perspective, India's largest listed company has a market cap of around $250 billion. And, only 83 Indian companies generate over $1 billion in quarterly revenue, and just 54 report quarterly profits exceeding $200 million, highlighting the scale of China's Instagram-like startup in comparison.

The contrast between China and India highlights the trade-offs inherent in different development models. China has leveraged state control to build dominant corporations aligned with national interests, while India has focused on creating opportunities for individuals in a free-market environment. As a result, India's vast demographic potential is increasingly being harnessed by global tech giants, rather than fuelling the growth of Indian corporate giants.

The key challenge will be finding the right balance between individual opportunity and corporate power—between openness and strategic control—so that India's demographic potential benefits not only individuals but the nation as a whole.

Getting Hongkongers to retire in mainland China isn't the answer to poverty: experts

19 October 2024, SCMP, Fiona Sun and Emily Hung

Measures unveiled in policy address do not tackle widening wealth gap and suggest government is shirking responsibilities, they say

Encouraging Hongkongers to retire across the border offers an alternative for some but cannot be the city's solution to poverty, welfare experts and groups have said while calling for a blueprint with long-term strategies.

They also urged the government to spend money more effectively on poverty alleviation and supporting those in need amid the city's surging expenditure on welfare.

The calls were made after Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu delivered his third policy address on Wednesday where he laid out plans to improve people's livelihood, which experts said were lacking. "The expenditure on welfare has been on the rise while the poverty issue has not been solved. That is because the money was not spent effectively," Professor Paul Yip Siu-fai of the University of Hong Kong (HKU) said.

Lee highlighted in his policy address that more than HK$300 million (US$38.6 million) was spent on social welfare daily, topping the public expenditure of all policy portfolios.

Official statistics showed that the city set aside about HK$127 billion for social welfare in the 2024-25 financial year, which translates to about HK$350 million a day.

Such expenses have more than doubled over the past decade from about HK$58 billion in 2015-16, according to the data.

"We should not be proud of the increasing welfare expenses," Yip, an associate dean of the faculty of social sciences, said.

He said that despite the rising expenditures, the circumstances of low-income families had worsened because of the impact of the economic slowdown on sectors such as the service industry that hit poor workers hard.

The academic urged authorities to review the effectiveness of the expenses on welfare policies and make better use of the funds.

Welfare policies encouraging elderly residents to settle in mainland China were laid out in this year's policy address, including a three-year pilot scheme to subsidise those living in designated care homes in neighbouring Guangdong province.

The scheme, to be launched next year, will offer HK$5,000 a month to each of those receiving the Comprehensive Social Security Assistance (CSSA) allowance, with a quota of 1,000 in total.

Seven more care homes will be added to the Residential Care Services Scheme in Guangdong, taking the total for elderly Hongkongers to 11.

Under the scheme, the government will also pay the part of medical bills not covered by the urban-rural resident basic medical insurance, and also subject to a cap.

Another pilot scheme that allows elderly residents to use healthcare vouchers over the border will be extended to all the mainland cities of the Greater Bay Area, a policy push to link nine Guangdong cities, Hong Kong and Macau.

Nelson Chow Wing-sun, an emeritus professor at HKU's department of social work and social administration, said the incentives signalled a trend of authorities encouraging retirees to live in the bay area's mainland cities.

But he said such measures, with their quotas, would more benefit those who had already settled across the border and were not attractive enough to persuade others to uproot themselves.

"The Greater Bay Area is no longer just a concept but has already become a real choice for those who have retired," he said. "But still, people have to give up a lot of things, such as public housing, to move and settle across the border."

Chow urged the government to also look into supporting those who were willing to live in communities across the border rather than in care facilities and address their top concerns by subsidising them to buy local health insurance to cover medical expenses.

Social welfare lawmaker Tik Chi-yuen said that despite the alternative retirement option, sending older residents across the border was not going to solve the city's poverty and elderly support issues.

"Most people still intend to remain in Hong Kong after they retire," he said. "The government cannot shirk its responsibility of offering care for them."

The legislator noted that most of the welfare measures in this year's policy address simply involved the addition of quotas to existing schemes.

Among such measures is a 20 per cent increase in the number of vouchers for elderly people to pay for residential care to a total of 6,000.

Other policies include the expansion of the Strive and Rise Programme – a mentorship scheme targeting students from poor families – and the addition of three more community living rooms used by substandard housing households.

Sze Lai-shan, deputy director of NGO the Society for Community Organisation, said that even the scale of such expansion was limited, with many of those in need left without support.

Aside from rolling out or maintaining individual schemes, both Sze and Tik called on the government to formulate a blueprint with holistic, long-term strategies.

Tik said the blueprint should establish a clear definition of poverty, collect data on the poor population and set out targets on what should be achieved and when.

"A daily expenditure of more than HK$300 million does not mean the job has been done, as Hong Kong is facing a widening wealth gap and a rapidly ageing population," Tik said.

PRC at 75: In China under Xi Jinping, people run or 'lie flat'

19 October 2024, RFA, Hsia Hsiao-hwa

Xi's policies run counter to the economic reforms of Deng Xiaoping, sparking fears of a return to the Mao era.

When Xi Jinping took his place as leader of the ruling Chinese Communist Party in 2012, some commentators expected he would be a weak president beset by factional strife in the wake of the jailing of former Chongqing party chief Bo Xilai and cryptic official references to rumors of a coup in Beijing.

Yet Xi has evoked more comparisons with late supreme leader Mao Zedong than any other leader since Mao's death in 1976, with his cult of personality, his abolition of presidential term limits and his intolerance of any kind of public criticism or protest, including in Hong Kong.

Blamed by many outside China for his government's handling of the early days of the COVID-19 pandemic in Wuhan, Xi seriously damaged his reputation among the Chinese people with three years of grueling lockdowns that saw some people welded into their own apartments and others carted off to mass quarantine camps in the middle of the night.

While the zero-COVID years eventually ended in late 2022 amid nationwide protests known as the "white paper" movement, a mass exodus of people dubbed the "run" movement was already under way. Refugees and dissidents, private sector executives and middle-class families with children have been willing to trek through the Central American rainforest to get away from life in China, in the hope of gaining political asylum in the United States.

"I left China for Ecuador and Colombia, then walked north through the rain forest," one migrant – an author whose writings were banned under Xi – told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview. "I left on Aug. 8 and entered the United States on Oct. 21."

"I was limping from my second day in the rainforest, and I was robbed by bandits," the person said. "I could have died."

A migrant from China, exhausted from the heat, rests on the shoulder of a fellow migrant from Nicaragua after walking into the U.S. at Jacumba Hot Springs, California, on June 5, 2024. (Frederic J. Brown/AFP)

Another recent migrant – a writer – said they left because everything they wrote had been banned.

"My articles were banned from newspapers and magazines, my name was not allowed to be mentioned, and I couldn't take part in public events," they said. "I realized if I stayed in China, my life would just be a huge disaster, so I fled in a hurry."

Xu Maoan, a former financial manager in a private company, said he used to make a good professional salary of 10,000 yuan (US$1,400) a month, but lost his job due to the COVID-19 restrictions.

He never succeeded in finding another, despite sending out hundreds of resumes, and recently joined many others making the trek through the rainforest to the U.S. border.

"I didn't find out about the white paper movement until I got to the United States," Xu told RFA Mandarin. "All news of it was blocked in China."

Reversing course?

But it wasn't just the pandemic; Xu and many like him were growing increasingly concerned that Xi was reversing the investor-friendly policies of late supreme leader Deng Xiaoping, with his confrontational attitude to Western trading partners and hair-trigger sensitivity to "national security," an elastic term used to describe any activity that could threaten or undermine the ruling Chinese Communist Party's official narrative.

"I have personally experienced how the government drove away foreign investors and cracked down on the private sector, in the name of national security," Xu said. "The government is in financial difficulty, so if they don't like you, they raid you."

"[Xi] quarreled with Europe and the United States, frightening foreign investors, who withdrew to Vietnam and India," he said. "His values are the opposite [of Deng Xiaoping's]."

"The domestic economy has collapsed, but they just won't admit it," he said. "I was afraid we would be going back to the days of famine and forced labor of the Mao era, so I left in a hurry."

Xi's abolition of presidential term limits in 2018 and the creation of what some fear is a Mao-style cult of personality around him is also driving concerns.

"Xi has deified himself as the 'core' leader with his own personality cult, but he lacks Mao's charisma," Ma Chun-wei, assistant politics professor at Taiwan's Tamkang University, told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview. "He requires everyone to study Xi Jinping Thought throughout the party and the whole education system."

Oppression of Uyghurs, Tibetans

Xi has also presided over the mass incarceration of Uyghurs in Xinjiang's "re-education" camps, the surveillance and suppression of Tibetans and their culture, as well as the upgrading the Great Firewall of internet censorship and the installation of surveillance cameras in schools to monitor students and teachers alike.

Under his tenure, private companies have been forced to set up Communist Party branches, and censorship is tighter than it has ever been, Ma said.

Yet Xi is one of the most ridiculed leaders in recent Chinese history, according to exiled author Murong Xuecun. "He has had the most nicknames of any general secretary of the Chinese Communist Party in the past 70 years," Murong told RFA in a recent interview. "Some people calculate that he has more than 200 nicknames."

Many of Xi's nicknames are now banned from China's internet, including Xi Baozi, Winnie the Pooh and Xitler, and their use has led to imprisonment in some cases.

Pro-democracy activists tear a placard of Winnie the Pooh that represents President Xi Jinping during a protest in Hong Kong on May 24, 2020. (Isaac Lawrence/AFP)

"The key to all of this is the political system," Murong said. "Xi rose to lead the Communist Party and have power over appointments, the military, the party, the police and national security agencies through a series of opaque and intergenerational processes."

"He commands everything, yet his power isn't subject to any kind of supervision or restriction," he said. "He can purge or replace anyone he doesn't like."

Lying flat

Murong likened China under Xi's rule to "a runaway train rushing towards a cliff with him as the driver."

"China has now entered the garbage times, when everything it does is doomed to failure," he said.

"The shadow of Xi will always haunt China."

He said the damage done by Xi is evident in the numbers of young people choosing to "lie flat" in the face of life's challenges. Even high-flying university graduates are moving back in with Mom and Dad and refusing to live up to social expectations like finding a job, marrying, mortgages and children.

"Those who can leave will leave, and those who can't will lie flat," Murong said.

Internationally, Xi has encouraged a far more expansionist and aggressive foreign policy than his predecessors, with island-building and military operations in the South China Sea and Taiwan Strait, and a barrage of nationalist rhetoric around Beijing's claim on democratic Taiwan, which has never been ruled by the Chinese Communist Party.

A Hong Kong-born researcher at the London-based think tank China Strategic Risk Institute who gave only the nickname Athena for fear of reprisals said Xi has strongly rejected international values like freedom, democracy and the rule of law, and cares little about international criticism of China's human rights record.

Instead, China has taken the fight to international organizations, and was recently accused of "gaming" its human rights review at the United Nations.

Secret police stations

Xi is also pouring trillions of dollars into his Belt and Road infrastructure and supply chain network, and engaging in colonial expansion across Africa, Murong Xuecun said.

China has become known under Xi for its aggressive "wolf-warrior" diplomats, some of whom have resorted to physical violence to get their point across, as well as its transnational network of secret police stations and its pursuit of its critics on foreign soil, as well as its army of "little pinks," who snarl at any criticism of the motherland.

Xi's administration was also instrumental in turning Hong Kong from a thriving financial hub and politically engaged city with freedoms of speech, association and publication intact to a city where the majority of people are being forced to toe the government line or risk imprisonment.

In recent years, international concerns are growing that Xi may be preparing for a military invasion of Taiwan, which he has vowed to "unify" with the rest of China.

Yet he may have more of an internal battle on his hands than he bargained for, according to former Lt. Col. Yao Cheng of the Naval Aviation Force.

"He has been messing with the military for more than 10 years, ever since he came to power," Yao told RFA Mandarin. "Between 2012 and 2015, he arrested hundreds of generals, yet his attempts to reform the military between 2015 and 2017 were a failure."

Part of the problem is that Xi has never been a soldier, despite wearing the uniform of a Commander in Chief, he said.

"Now Xi is commander-in-chief of the Joint Operations Command at the Central Military Commission, managing an army of several million people," Yao said. "Yet he procured military equipment in a haphazard manner, spending money recklessly and winding up with a pile of scrap copper and iron."

Meanwhile Xi has backed up Beijing's claims of sovereignty in the South China Sea with newly built islands and military bases, as Chinese Coast Guard vessels regularly harass China's neighbors, as well as ordering repeated rounds of military drills around Taiwan.

The People's Liberation Army Rocket Force recently launched an intercontinental ballistic missile capable of carrying nuclear warheads into the Pacific Ocean. Yet Yao believes that Xi ultimately lacks the support of most of China's generals.

"He took down the leaders of the Rocket Force, and wants to attack Taiwan now, but the military won't do this; they will wait and see," he said. "They may be engaging in busywork for now, but they won't do what Xi Jinping wants."

China's economy is set to have its slowest year of growth in decades

19 October 2024, NPR, John Ruwitch and Scott Simon

SCOTT SIMON, HOST:

The world's second-biggest economy is struggling. New economic data shows that China is on track for a year of growth that's among the slowest since 1990, the year after the crackdown on protesters in Tiananmen Square. NPR's China correspondent John Ruwitch joins us. John, thanks so much for being with us.

JOHN RUWITCH, BYLINE: Happy to be here.

SIMON: What do the latest numbers show?

RUWITCH: Well, they show that the gross domestic product growth between July and September was 4.6% year on year. That is a slight slowing from the second quarter, but it's a little better than expected. On the plus side, industrial output was up, and retail sales exceeded expectations. That's an important one because weak consumption has been a really huge part of the problem with this economy. And the government knows it, and they're worried about it. Part of what drove retail sales this last quarter were subsidies for trade-ins on appliances, like air conditioners, fridges, those things.

SIMON: What seems to be behind the slowdown?

RUWITCH: The big thing is real estate, as it's been for the past year or two. Activity has been depressed pretty consistently since the government adopted measures to pop the bubble a couple of years ago. So property investment in the recent quarter fell. In the year-to-date, it was down more than 10%. New home starts also fell in the double digits. Property prices continued to slide. The overall situation still feels quite grim in China. I was in Beijing recently and spoke with a tailor named Li Jianjun. His customer base has shrunk, he says, since before the pandemic. And he says his income has dropped 40%.

LI JIANJUN: (Speaking Chinese).

RUWITCH: He says before the pandemic, a lot of people came in to get new clothing. Now they're coming in for alterations if their size has changed or whatnot because their income has shrunk. And when they do give him orders for new suits or shirts, he says customers are really opting for Chinese-made cloth rather than more expensive imports.

SIMON: And, John, what's the government trying to do in response?

RUWITCH: Well, there have been bits and pieces over the past few months to try to prop up the economy. Starting late in September, they really ramped that up with a string of new measures. They've got a more aggressive monetary policy in place now. They've lowered interest rates, for example. They've tried to prop up the stock market. They're taking steps to reflate the real estate market to a certain extent and to capitalize developers. They're also poised to issue a bunch of new central government debt to recapitalize state-owned banks to help local governments out of their major debt problems. Alicia Garcia-Herrero is chief economist with the French investment bank Natixis in Hong Kong.

ALICIA GARCIA-HERRERO: Is that a stimulus? Not really, but they need to do it first. It's like a precondition because if not, it will be throwing good money on bad money, because there's too much bad debt in the system. There's systemic risk. There's deflation.

SIMON: So, John, do experts think it's going to work?

RUWITCH: Well, I think what this economist just now is saying is that these measures are focused on sort of addressing acute crises going on in the economy right now. Like, take local government debt, for instance - there are reports that some localities aren't able to pay government employees their wages. These are people in the middle class, right? How can China ramp up consumption if these people aren't even getting paychecks? Some economists say that the - you know, the measures they're taking are good. They're a good first step. They're not enough really to boost domestic demand and consumption or to change the structure of the economy.

The government is aiming for around 5% growth this year. After factoring in the latest data, though, some now think it'll fall short of that. What's interesting is the contrast. You know, China's economy is continuing to weaken, and it's happening at a time when the country is really amped up its sort of muscularity on the global stage. It just had military drills around Taiwan, for instance.

SIMON: NPR's John Ruwitch. Thanks so much for being with us.

RUWITCH: You're welcome.

Who really benefits from China's winter tourism promotion in Tibet?

19 October 2024, Tibetan Review

For the seventh year in a row, China-ruled Tibet has launched a winter tourism promotion drive in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), with ostensible aim to bring more income to local residents, offering discounts, freebies, and what not.

China claims that the drive will attract more tourists and bring more incomes to local residents. Many of these local residents will no doubt be Tibetans. But Tibetans are overwhelmingly farmers and herders, having little concern with tourism.

So, one of the main aims of this policy may be to ensure the sustenance and prosperity of the Chinese immigrant population which dominate the businesses in Tibet, including in the tourism sector. They may otherwise go back to China during winter season, like their counterparts in other sectors of Tibet's economy. This population is expected to eventually redefine the region's demographic and cultural identity in keeping with President Xi Jinping's signature call for the Sinicization of Tibet.

The TAR has launched its 2024 winter tourism campaign, offering discounted air tickets, hotel vouchers, and free admission to tourist attractions to draw more visitors during the off-peak season, reported China's state news agency Xinhua Oct 19.

As part of the "winter tour of Xizang" campaign, Xizang is offering 10,000 "buy-one-get-one-free" domestic flight tickets, 10,000 free domestic train tickets, and complimentary hotel vouchers at premium accommodations for tourists traveling to the region, the report said, using the Sinicized name for Tibet.

Special travel vouchers tailored for family tours and senior travellers have also been introduced, the report added.

Also provided again are free entry to A-rated tourist sites, including the iconic Potala Palace.

China's tourist attraction rating system classifies sites from 1A to 5A based on overall tourism quality, with 5A being the highest grade.

The initiative, launched on Oct 18 in capital Lhasa, was stated to be aimed at maintaining steady tourism growth year-round, with the current round of promotions running from Oct 15 to Mar 15, 2025.

The event was stated to have seen the regional culture and tourism department signing cooperation agreements with Chinese provinces and cities. Local travel operators were also stated to have formed partnerships with international tour operators from countries including Australia, Thailand and Germany. In 2023, TAR welcomed 55.17 million tourists, a year-on-year increase of 83.7%, generating total tourism revenue of 65.15 billion yuan (about 9.2 billion US dollars), up 60% from the previous year, the report said.

There has so far been little or no known study of tourism's impact on the territory's people, environment, society, and culture.

This bears relevance as the number of tourists visiting the region, who are overwhelmingly from China, exceeded 15 times the local population of 3.66 million as of last year.

Xi Jinping Has Further Boosted the Military-Industrial Group of China

18 October 2024, The JamesTown Foundation, Arthur Ding, K. Tristan Tang

On June 28, Huang Qiang (黄强) was appointed as the party secretary of Jilin Province. Formerly secretary-general of the National Defense Science and Technology Commission (国防科工委) and deputy director general of the National Defense Science and Technology Bureau (国防科工局), Huang's promotion marks a further development for the People's Republic of China's (PRC) group of military-industrial leaders (Xinhua, June 28). Alongside Hao Peng (郝鹏) in Liaoning and Xu Qin (许勤) in Heilongjiang, all three provincial Party secretaries for the major industrial bases in Northeast China now have backgrounds in the defense industry.

Supreme leader Xi Jinping has provided consistent support to the defense industry in recent years, and has increased his reliance on officials from defense industry backgrounds—as seen in the curricula vitae of Central Committee members unveiled at the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) 20th Party Congress in October 2022 (The Diplomat, September 12). These developments represented a culmination of personnel decisions that date back to at least the 19th Party Congress in 2017, when Xi's emphasis on the importance of military-industrial officials began to become observable. Research to date has tended to analyze this rising group of military-industrial personnel from a technocratic perspective (see China Leadership Monitor, December 1, 2022; February 29). Owing to the significant differences between military-industrial officials and technocrats in general, however, the PRC's military-industrial group merits attention as a growing force within both the defense industry and the CCP Central Committee, and has the potential to one day emerge as a key faction within the PRC's political system.

Structural Dynamics Suggest Emerging Military-Industrial 'Faction'

For the purposes of this article, the "military-industrial group" refers narrowly to those individuals who developed their careers in defense industry corporations or the "Seven Sons of National Defense (国防七子)" universities before being promoted to the vice-ministerial level. [1] It excludes those who merely studied at Seven Sons universities without either teaching at those same institutions or subsequently joining defense industry corporations, and those who joined the defense industry only after being promoted to the vice-ministerial level. The decision to set the rank at the vice-ministerial level is based on the understanding that officials at this level are “central management cadres (中管干部)” whose transfers and promotions are regulated by the Central Organization Department (People’s Daily, September 16, 2014). The transfer of personnel to the defense industry later in their careers is primarily done for résumé-building purposes or for oversight. As such, these personnel differ significantly from those who gained early experience in the defense industry during their tenure as grassroots or mid-level officials.

The military-industrial group has the potential to develop into a faction. This is because the educational background and industrial operational models of the PRC’s defense industry are likely to foster a shared identity, mutual trust, and a high degree of homogeneity within their interpersonal networks. There are two dynamics that underpin this emerging group.

First, most of these officials graduated from the Seven Sons universities. These institutions, established in the 1950s and 1960s, are oriented toward the defense industry. As such, their historical and institutional connections provide students with greater career opportunities in the industry than those from other universities. Often, key state-owned defense companies have agreements with—or are major contributors to—Seven Sons universities (Harbin Engineering University, June 11; Beijing Institute of Technology, August 25, 2022). The higher prevalence of graduates from these schools over other universities who join the industry is borne out in the statistics (CSET, December, 2020). This has resulted in a higher level of connectivity among these officials compared to graduates in other industries or fields (Takungpao, October 16, 2023). These institutions also foster a strong sense of belonging and honor among their students. This is achieved in part through the celebration of the technical defense achievements of earlier Chinese scientists, notably those involved in Mao’s “Two Bombs, One Satellite (两弹一星)” project that was focused on building the country’s first nuclear weapons, ICBMs, and satellites (Northwestern Polytechnical University, June 7, 2023).

Second, the PRC’s defense industry is fairly closed off. The “block logic” that characterizes the PRC’s broader bureaucratic system is also present in the defense industry, resulting in research and development being largely confined to specific defense companies or research units. An article published in 2017 by the Center for Advancing Military-Civil Fusion Programs (军民融合项目促进中心) lamented the industry’s “confining nature of closed concepts, the constraints of the planning system, the limitations of monopolistic structures, the restrictions of policy standards, the impediments of [few] access points, and the siloing of information channels (封闭观念的禁锢、计划体制的束缚、垄断格局的限制、政策标准的制约、准入门槛的阻碍和信息渠道的隔离)” (Development and Reform Commission of Gansu Province, December 26, 2017). This makes it difficult for other companies or universities to participate in core research, meaning that while interactions and collaborations between research institutes and factories within the defense industry are relatively frequent, they are less so with entities outside this ecosystem. Therefore, such a closed industrial environment tends to foster a rich understanding and strong level of interaction among insiders, more so than for those in other sectors.

Military-Industrial Officials From the 19th and 20th CCP Central Committees

Among the two most recent Central Committees’ 409 members, a total of 21 have had a background in the defense industry (see Table 1). Out of 17 members elected to the 19th Central Committee, 11—roughly two-thirds—were re-elected to the 20th Central Committee, along with the election of an additional four new members.

In terms of rank, the highest position held by military-industrial officials in the 19th Central Committee was that of Central Committee member. However, in the 20th Central Committee, four members were promoted to the Politburo: Vice Premiers Liu Guozhong and Zhang Guoqing, Xinjiang Party Secretary Ma Xingrui, and Chongqing Party Secretary Yuan Jiajun.

Regarding positions held within the Central Committee, three individuals have previously worked in the Office of the Central Commission for Military-Civil Fusion Development (中央军委融合发展委员会办公室) [2] or the Communist Youth League. These include Lei Fanpei, though his position as deputy director of the former is based on external media reports only (Epoch Times, February 2, 2023). There has been no formal announcement from state media, though he continues to be present in state media reports as part of the rank of ministerial-level officials (CASC, June 14, 2023).

In terms of positions held within the State Council, many ministries have installed military-industrial officials in key roles. Notably, in the 20th Central Committee, individuals who effectively control military-industrial resources and related industrial sectors within the State Council include Vice Premiers Zhang Guoqing (in charge of industry) and Liu Guozhong, State Councillor Wu Zhenglong, Minister for Industry and Information Technology Jin Zhuanglong, and Minister of Education Huai Jinpeng (see Table 3).

At the local level, a total of 21 military-industrial officials have held the positions of Party secretary or governor in 14 provinces, municipalities, and autonomous regions across the two most recent Central Committees. This represents a trend of negative growth, however, as military-industrial officials held top or deputy positions in 13 localities during the 19th Party Congress, but only in six following the 20th Party Congress. For example, in Hunan, Jiangsu, and Hebei, military-industrial officials held positions during the 19th Central Committee but not in the 20th Central Committee. In contrast, provinces such as Liaoning, Heilongjiang, and Shaanxi continue to have military-industrial officials in office (see Table 5). The fact that military-industrial officials are in top positions in these three provinces is important, however, as they are home to research companies and institutes that are vital to the country's defense industry. For example, Heilongjiang has the Harbin Aircraft Industry Group (HAIG; 哈尔滨飞机工业集团), Liaoning Province has the Dalian Shipbuilding Industry Group (DSIC; 大连船舶重工集团), and Shaanxi Province has the Fourth and Sixth Research Institutes of the China Aerospace Science and Technology Corporation (CASC; 中国航天科技集团). However, given that a number of military-industrial personnel who previously held positions in local governments are either being promoted or retiring—such as Wu Zhenglong, who was promoted from Jiangsu Province to secretary-general of the State Council, and Lin Duo, who retired from his post in Gansu Province—Xi Jinping may need to ensure that military-industrial personnel remain in regions most closely tied to the defense industry.

Military-industrial officials have been elected to positions within the China Association for Science and Technology (CAST; 中国科学技术协会), the National People's Congress (NPC; 全国人民代表大会), and the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC; 中国人民政治协商会议). In the 20th Central Committee, military-industrial officials serve as vice chairpersons and vice presidents in both the NPC and CPPCC, while CAST has been predominantly led by military-industrial officials during both the 19th and 20th Central Committees (see Table 4).

Authentic Military-industrial Faction Yet to Appear
Analysis of the interpersonal networks of military-industrial officials in the Central Committee after the 20th Party Congress indicates that many share educational or professional backgrounds. Looking at the group more closely, NPC Vice Chairman Zhang Qingwei could be a central node in this network. Due to his nearly three-decade career in the aerospace sector, most officials from the aerospace or aviation sectors have connections to him. For instance, Chongqing Party Secretary Yuan Jiajun, Xinjiang Party Secretary Ma Xingrui, Deputy Director of the Central Military-Civil Fusion Office Lei Fanpei, and Minister of Industry and Information Technology Jin Zhuanglong have all served as his deputies at various times. Another central figure may be Vice Premier Zhang Guoqing. Current State Councillor Wu Zhenglong and Shaanxi Governor Zhao Gang have previously worked alongside him (Economic Daily, December 31, 2017). Zhang and Wu worked together at the Chongqing Municipal Committee of the CCP between 2013 and 2014, while Zhang and Zhao worked together at China North Industries Group from 1993 to 1995, and again at China North Industries Corporation from 2011 to 2013 (Economic Daily, July 29, 2017; CPC News, October 24).

The military-industrial group has also formed a Chinese-style military-industrial complex within the 20th Central Committee. Currently, military-industrial officials occupy significant administrative and industrial roles, oversee major provinces that are home to crucial parts of the military-industrial sector, or participate in the operations of the top-level bodies (the NPC and the CPPCC). These officials have the capacity to promote the development of the military-industrial sector, through such methods as resource allocation (State Council Vice Premier), policy planning (Minister for Industry and Information Technology), regulation formulation (National People's Congress), policy execution (local government), and opinion transmission (CPPCC). Although the PRC operates under the one-party rule of the CCP, a large and complex bureaucracy means that the regime is far from unitary, and various interest groups still wield substantial power. As such, the ability to shape and wield regulations and public opinion is still important. This is particularly relevant for military-industrial officials, as they participate in the operations of the NPC and CPPCC as Central Committee members rather than merely as nominally retired individuals. This implies that they have a special status compared to other vice chairs.

Some obstacles currently preclude the assignment of a "faction" to this group, however. No military-industrial officials have been promoted to the Politburo Standing Committee (PBSC)—the very highest CCP body. They, therefore, do not meet the necessary criterion for a faction under the standard academic definition. This could change in 2027 following the 21st Party Congress. Apart from the relative cohesion of the group noted above, the logic of the CCP's norms surrounding the age of officials suggests that this is a distinct possibility. Three military-industrial officials in the current Politburo will still be under 67 years old in 2027, which theoretically qualifies them for promotion; and out of the 23 current Politburo members (excluding Xi Jinping), ten meet the conventional age eligibility criterion to become members of the PBSC in 2027, resulting in a competitive situation of ten officials vying for six positions. Notably, Chongqing Party Secretary Yuan Jiajun, Vice Premier Zhang Guoqing, and Liu Guozhong hold significant political positions and control substantial resources, making them well-positioned for such a promotion.

Conclusion

The personnel arrangements of the 20th Central Committee reveal that the development of the PRC's military-industrial group has become even more robust compared to the 19th Party Congress. This strengthens the military-industrial sector's advantage in the overall allocation of resources and policy focus and suggests that the country's military technology and equipment production capabilities may be further enhanced than ever before. Whether this group of officials will grow to wield more significant power will depend on a number of factors, but future personnel movements will be a key indicator, with the makeup of the 21st Central Committee in 2027 likely to reveal the group's relative power within the Party-state system.

China's Political Mobilization Challenge

18 October 2024, The Diplomat, Josh Freedman

In the face of cadre overwork and citizen apathy, China's leaders face a mobilizational challenge that raises the costs of achieving their domestic goals.

China's aggressive pandemic lockdowns are firmly in the rearview mirror, but observers agree that public sentiment has undergone a tangible change. Amid continuing political tightening and an economy struggling to rebound, writers argue that China has entered an age of "malaise" or "stagnation" that lacks the optimism and excitement that defined the heady days of the reform era. New words and phrases now pepper daily conversation: some people are choosing to "run" for the exits, while others are opting to "lie flat" and give up on their ambitions.

In my own extended discussions with individuals across China on multiple trips over the past year, the most common descriptor is always juan, short for neijuan (内卷 or involution) – a term similar to "endless hustle" and repurposed from an anthropological concept to describe more and more work for less and less output. The "less" in today's China is partially about money, as salaries are dropping; it also refers to less meaning, as people are working more but feeling alienated from why they are doing it.

In many ways, rising anomie and pessimism about the future are common sentiments across all modern societies, especially among youth. Yet the ubiquity of this sentiment from the top to bottom of Chinese society suggests that something significant has shifted among the Chinese public. Observers have identified the changing zeitgeist but struggled to make sense of what its political implications might be. While many commentators argue that rising disenchantment signals a threat to regime stability, there is no evidence to support the claim that the regime faces a fundamental legitimacy crisis. Even scholars who are keen to speculate about regime fragility acknowledge that the recent changes are unlikely to spur near-term collapse of either the economy or the political system, as leading market analysts have pointed out.

An alternate way of framing China's new social normal is to think in terms of the costs of political mobilization. The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has laid out an ambitious agenda to overcome the mounting challenges it faces: a sluggish economy, high levels of unemployment, technology and trade pressure, and a demographic cliff, to name just a few. These are challenges confronting numerous regimes, but they matter more for contemporary China. Not only has the CCP historically relied on mobilization to realize its political agenda, but the consolidation of political control and suppression of alternate forms of organization has left party-led mobilization as the only means for achieving these governance goals.

From tackling social issues such as reviving the dismally low birthrate to achieving "comprehensive security" in areas ranging from food to ideology, the CCP wants and needs an all-out effort from both bureaucrats and regular citizens. Yet the current mood in China suggests instead that mobilizing either of these groups is increasingly costly.

Throughout its modern history, the party has used mobilization as a key element of its political rule. It seeks not only to operate through standard bureaucratic channels, but also to encourage and motivate the participation of various groups to go above and beyond the normal limitations of institutional governance. At the apex of high socialism under Mao Zedong, politics revolved around mass mobilization: individuals had to attend public meetings, conduct collective criticisms and study sessions, and even read through the front pages of People's Daily (a task so dry and difficult that author and Sinologist Simon Leys described "reading Communist literature" as "akin to munching rhinoceros sausage"). Even after reform and opening up, the CCP continued to rely on campaigns and other mobilizational tactics, rather than formal institutions, to achieve major governance goals.

Mobilization in the reform era inherited key features of its Maoist forebears, but it also took on new elements in a more liberalized society. The targets of this mobilization have often been cadres and bureaucrats, rather than regular citizens. "Maoist campaigns mobilized the masses into politics," explained Zeng Qingjie in a study of poverty alleviation. "Reform-era campaigns, by contrast, entail a much lower degree of mass involvement. Instead, it is the bureaucrats who became the main targets of intense mobilization."

Elizabeth Perry described these mobilization efforts as "managed campaigns," which incorporate the framework of mass revolutionary campaigns but are more highly directed from the top and overlaid with technocratic terminology. These efforts include work teams, local councils, linking cadres or localities to other targeted areas, and more – all of which focus mobilization on groups of elites, rather than the masses.

In the face of massive economic and social challenges, the new era under Xi Jinping is not just marked by a shift toward enforcing party unity and cracking down on political dissension – it is also about the CCP running into the limits of the existing mobilization strategy.

The reliance on mobilizing bureaucrats and cadres to carry out the agenda has overextended them to the point where they cannot possibly keep up with the demands. With the party and state responsible for more governance tasks than ever before, and with strict and inflexible targets for completing these tasks, bureaucrats are overworked (and, with local government budgets in some areas collapsing, underpaid). As a result, bureaucrats frequently describe disillusionment and feelings of involution.

At the same time, realizing many of the goals for development and social order also requires buy-in from a broader swath of the population. In an environment of growing political apathy, however, these calls to mass action are more likely to be met with indifference or contempt. The more the public ignores these entreaties, the more that bureaucrats are being mobilized to try to overcome these limits. They are tasked with carrying out more responsibility with less support from the people on the receiving end of the policies, and with less room for flexibility than in the past.

As one example, the CCP has implemented a policy campaign to improve food security and reduce reliance on foreign imports by establishing a quota for arable land that can grow staple crops like grain. Local officials are mandated to achieve targets of land reclaimed from other uses, which often requires getting elderly farmers to use their land to grow unprofitable and labor-intensive grains rather than more profitable cash crops like tea or fruit. Already struggling under the weight of overwork, local officials spend fruitless months trying to convince citizens to get on board, often to no avail. The only plausible way to convince locals to agree to the program is to offer massive subsidies, and even then many citizens are still reluctant to change their farming strategy.

Nowhere is the challenge of dealing with disenchantment more obvious than in the case of the falling birthrate. No matter how many pro-natal policies the party and state put in place, the number of new children in China continues to decline year after year, and the overall population is now shrinking. After years of resisting calls to change the family planning system, leaders not only scrapped the one-child policy but are now scrambling to encourage young women to have two or even three children.

Population declines and lower fertility rates are now the norm across the modern world, especially in East Asia. A focus on careers, pressure to balance between individual goals and traditional family obligations, and the prohibitive costs of starting a family have all made marriage and child-rearing much less attractive to many young people. (As one of my friends in central China quipped, "Housing prices are the greatest contraceptive.") Few, if any, policy solutions anywhere have made even a blip in birthrates. Facing a lack of policy solutions, Xi Jinping has called for party officials to actively promote a child-bearing culture and reshape young people's views on marriage and family. Campaigns to encourage more births are underway. Thus far, these attempts look like a fool's errand. The response from women to these entreaties, as reporters have found, has been a resounding "no." The stories in the media corroborate conversations I have had with young Chinese: the state's attempts to mobilize, encourage, or cajole women and families to have more kids are met with a collective shrug. As these campaigns become more important, bureaucrats will have to spend more time trying to convince a reluctant population, and citizens will only become more reluctant in turn.

This is not to say that society-wide mobilization is impossible or that top-down mobilization is irrelevant. Instead, it is to point out that the costs of such mobilization are increasing in ways that limit the options available to a mobilization-oriented regime. China never officially made COVID-19 vaccination mandatory, but local officials – given strict instructions from their superiors – tried every possible way to pressure people to get vaccinated short of physically forcing them. Even then there was a significant percentage of the population, especially the elderly, who still refused. Studies show that more than a quarter of the oldest citizens (age 80-plus) and more than 10 percent of elderly (60-plus) had not been fully vaccinated when China abandoned its pandemic control policies – and local bureaucrats had to spend time and money trying to reach their targets.

Without effective mobilization over the long term, and with local officials facing impossible targets, the CCP is left only with the option for coercion – a last resort that is both extremely costly and threatens to inflict irreparable damage on both individuals and society at large. Reports of coercion in the face of intransigence have become so common in the case of arable land quotas that the national government had to reprimand local officials for going too far.

The rising costs of mobilization present an enormous challenge to China's governance project. For China to be able to achieve its goals and fulfill what Xi and the leadership envision, they will have to overcome this mobilization challenge; so far, many citizens are responding to mobilization efforts by further retreating from politics, while bureaucrats are floundering under the limits of what they can do. Rather than focus on legitimacy crises or regime stability, observers would be well-served to focus their attention on the mobilization challenge. Whether China's leaders can address this challenge will define where China is headed and whether it will be able to achieve its ambitious agenda.

Nicholas Roerich, Shambhala, and Agartha. 1. Tibet and Paris

18 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Massimo Introvigne

The notions of mythical and mystical kingdoms Shambhala and Agartha, as we know them today, are largely influenced by the views of the Russian painter.

Nicholas Roerich, "Tangla: Song of Shambhala" (1943)

We are down-to-earth Westerners, aren't we? We leave to Asia, or to a past we believe the Enlightenment liberated us from, ideas of mysterious inaccessible lands where milk and honey flow, peace reigns, and all inhabitants have extraordinary abilities. Yet, many Western new religious movements also have teachings about earthly paradises, and not all derive from the Bible.

I would argue that this is largely due to the multiple (if neglected) influences of Western esotericism, and that a key figure in this respect is Russian painter Nicholas Roerich (1874–1947). To illustrate this thesis, we will travel to different parts of the world in the three parts of this series of articles.

Scene 1 – Tibet

Shambhala in a Tibetan thangka of the 19th century. From X.

Two notions often confused should be disentangled, Shambhala (the common spelling derived from Tibetan of the Sanskrit "Sambhala") and Agartha. Shambhala is mentioned in the "Kalachakra Tantra" (early 11th century) as a mythical kingdom whose existence is physical, yet at the border with the metaphysical.

The "Kalachakra Tantra" includes a millennial prophecy: the king of Shambhala will come again, and fight a final battle for the triumph of righteousness and Buddhism, ushering in an earthly paradise.

The future manifestation of Shambhala is connected with two distinct sets of prophecies: about a latter-day kingdom of the Maitreya Buddha and about the return of the mythical King Gesar of Ling, which according to Tibetan, Mongolian, and other traditions was a legendary hero and ruler of the early Middle Ages.

Scene 2: The Hollow Earth—or Paris

Unlike Shambhala, the concept of Agartha is not traditional. We find it in Paris, used first by French occult novelist Louis Jacolliot (1837–1890) in 1873, more or less as a synonym of Shambhala. It became popular in Western esotericism in 1910, when the book "Mission de l'Inde," by Alexandre Saint-Yves d'Alveydre (1842–1909), originally written around 1886, was published, one year after the death of his author.

Saint-Yves claimed that Agartha was actually a physical place, only it existed underground, under the mountains of Asia. It was the residence of the Master of the Universe and of the most advanced civilization of our world.

Saint-Yves combined two different narratives. That Masters hidden somewhere between India and Tibet wielded great power had been taught by Madame Helena Blavatsky (1831–1891) and her Theosophical Society. That a hollow Earth harbored an underground high-level spiritual center had been suggested in Britain, before Saint-Yves, by novelist and politician Edward Bulwer-Lytton (1803–1873) in “The Coming Race” (1871) and by medium and Theosophist Emma Hardinge Britten (1823–1899) in “Ghost Land” (1876).

But was all this symbol, metaphor, or reality? Among the first to claim that it was absolutely real was Chicago lawyer and businessman Willis George Emerson (1856–1918). In 1908, he published “The Smoky God,” allegedly an account written by a Norwegian sailor, Olaf Jansen, who had found near the North Pole the entrance to a subterranean kingdom, whose capital was the original Garden of Eden. Occultists quickly claimed Jansen had found Agartha.

Much more seriously was taken Polish (although born in present-day Latvia) explorer Ferdynand Ossendowski (1876–1945). He had traveled to Central and Eastern Asia and had played an ambiguous role in the political game between Russia, China, and the West to control the three strategically crucial areas of Tibet, Mongolia, and present-day Xinjiang.

In 1922, Ossendowski published “Beasts, Men and Gods”. He claimed to have collected evidence about the underground kingdom of Agartha, where the King of the World reigned. He also mentioned a prophecy that, as human corruption will increase, “the peoples of Agartha will come up from their subterranean caverns to the surface of the earth” to establish a righteous kingdom.

We are still in Paris, though. There, on July 26, 1924, the editor of the prestigious “Nouvelles Littéraires”, Frédéric Lefèvre (1889–1949), invited Catholic philosopher Jacques Maritain (1882–1973), historian of Asia René Grousset (1885–1952), and esoteric author René Guénon (1886–1951) to debate Ossendowski, who was visiting France. Grousset and Maritain remained skeptical, but Guénon found in Ossendowski, together with “unbelievable” tales and passages simply derived from Saint-Yves and others, original and valuable information. The debate influenced Guénon’s decision to publish in 1927 “Le Roi du monde” (whose first part appeared in December 1924 in the Italian esoteric journal “Atanòr”), where he discussed the theory of a “King of the World” and of hidden spiritual centers located in Asia.

A plethora of secret societies mentioned Agartha and Shambhala. Their leaders were not necessarily experts of Asian religion and legends, and often confused the two notions. For a certain Western practical mentality, the main question was whether Shambhala or Agartha would come out from wherever secret place they were and really establish an earthly paradise, which would also imply dealing with the current political circumstances. This question will generate a special interest in Russia and the United States, as we will see in the next articles of this series.

Decision of The Court of the Citizens of World on the Proposed Indictment of Xi Jinping – The Opinion of Judge Bhavani Fonseka

17 October 2024, OpinioJuris

‘The Court of the Citizens of the World’ – a people’s tribunal – was organized by the Cinema for Peace Foundation, relating to alleged crimes committed by Xi Jinping, President of the People’s Republic of China. The tribunal considered confirmation of an indictment for the crime of aggression, the crime of genocide, and crimes against humanity as proposed by a Prosecution team, and challenged by a Defence team, and heard witnesses and received documentary evidence during 8 – 12 July 2024 in public hearings in The Hague. The three judges at this tribunal – Z. M. Yacoob, Stephen Rapp and Bhavani Fonseka – came to a decision regarding confirmation of the charges, and these posts are their individual opinions, in which all concurred, pronounced at the last hearing of the tribunal on 12 July 2024.

12 July 2024

Thank you, Judge Rapp.

At this stage of the confirmation of the charges I will be examining whether there are substantial grounds to indict the accused of the charge of-

Count 2: the Crime against Humanity of Forcible Transfer of children, between at least 14 March 2013 and 24 May 2024, contrary to Article 7(1)(d) of the Rome Statute

Count 3: the Crime against Humanity of Imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty, between at least 14 March 2013 and 24 May 2024, contrary to Article 7(1)(e) of the Rome Statute

Count 4: the Crime against Humanity of Persecution, between at least 14 March 2013 and 24 May 2024, contrary to Article 7(1)(h) of the Rome Statute

Article 7 of the Rome Statute sets out the acts that falls within Crimes against Humanity when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack.

Thus, there are two elements to the crime-

A contextual element that entails “when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population” and

A mental element that requires “with knowledge of the attack”

It must also be noted that acts should not be random, accidental or isolated but evidence must demonstrate that the acts are committed in furtherance of a State or organizational policy to commit an attack

In addition to the Rome Statute, attention is also on whether violations fall under Customary International Law.

Evidence Presented

As the evidence provided to the court indicates, the accused is the general secretary of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and is the president of the People’s Republic of China (PRC). The court heard of how the accused has had effective authority over the PRC since 2013. It has also been submitted that the system of governance in the PRC is centralized and the accused is intrinsically involved in the planning and preparation of policies in the PRC.

As the court heard this week, the civilian people of Tibet have experienced widespread and systematic attacks including attempts to erase their cultural, linguistic and religious practices and identity, restrictions on the free expression of opinion and belief, on their movement, of torture and a large number of Tibetan children being forcibly moved to Chinese run boarding schools. The testimony and evidence presented to court highlighted the systematic and organised nature of these practices. The court also heard of evidence that shows the involvement of the accused in the planning of these policies.

The court heard of specific instances that require attention-

Firstly,

We heard from victims and expert testimony on the implementation of the colonial boarding schools and its impact on Tibetan children and their families, the psychological and emotional trauma and the long term impact on Tibetan identity. Previously, subjects taught in the Tibetan language saw a change of policy under the leadership of the accused with education presently being solely in the Chinese language.

The court heard evidence indicating to at least a million Tibetan children affected by this policy that further estrange young Tibetans from their heritage and is aimed at assimilating Tibetan people culturally, religiously and linguistically. Children of the Tibetan minority are forced to complete what can be considered ‘compulsory education’ curriculum in Mandarin Chinese.

This has resulted in Tibetan children losing their ability to communicate with their parents and grandparents in the Tibetan language, further contributing to the assimilation of the Tibetan identity.

Secondly,

We heard evidence that speaks to the targeting of Tibetan monasteries including-

- the destruction of several monasteries and violence targeting Tibetan monks and nuns
- restrictions placed on Tibetans access to religious sites and religious gatherings
- changing the practice of Tibetan Buddhism to Chinese Buddhism
- persecution of Tibetans for religious activities honoring the Dalai Lama or possessing his image.

Such practices can be viewed as a deliberate policy aimed at dismantling Tibetan religious and cultural identity.

Thirdly,

We heard evidence that speaks to multiple forms of restrictions on free expression of opinion and belief, on movement, assembly and association.

Further, evidence indicated to other serious violations including the use of torture that includes the denial of basic services to prisoners and reports of enforced disappearances with families unaware of the whereabouts of political prisoners.

The court also heard of state policies with questions raised as to whether ‘unity’ is to create uniformity and with it eradicate other cultures, religions and languages. In addition, the court heard of narratives such as ‘lasting stability’ ‘national security’ that seek to provide legitimacy to the policies of the PRC and the accused.

The court heard that the tenure of the accused has marked a period of increased institutionalization of repressive measures against Tibetans, with a clear focus on eroding Tibetan cultural identity. Despite the official narratives that include economic development, unity in the motherland, the renovation of cultural sites, the preservation of language and culture, and the eradication of extreme poverty, evidence before the court indicates to a concerted attempt to eradicating the Tibetan identity and culture and to integrate Tibetan identity into the dominant Chinese identity.

Moreover, the dire conditions in the Tibetan areas have witnessed several reported instances of self-immolation and as indicated to the court is indicative of the desperation and oppression faced by Tibetans.

Considering the vast evidence before the court, we believe there are substantial grounds to infer a widespread and systematic attack directed against the civilian population, with knowledge of such attack.

Thus, the court confirms Count 2, 3 and 4 of the proposed indictment, which following the non-confirmation of proposed Court 1, will be renumbered Counts 1, 2, and 3.

Finally, the testimony of victims reflects the lived experiences of violence and immense suffering, with several speaking to ongoing forms of violence. The courage of those who shared their experiences despite the multiple challenges speaks to the resilience of victims who want to see an end to the violence and seek accountability. We commend them for their courage, resilience and determination.

We thank all those who shared their experiences, submitted evidence and supported the court in this confirmation hearing.

South Asia In Transition: Geopolitical Impacts Of China's Expanding Role – OpEd

17 October 2024, Eurasian Review, Mirza Abdul Aleem Baig

China's expanding techno-economic and geopolitical influence is a well-established reality. Even Western nations, which typically have the advantage of stronger state and civil society institutions, are finding it difficult to counter China's rising influence efforts. In more vulnerable regions, particularly South Asia, where China positions itself as a dominant power, countries are facing challenges due to Beijing's increasing activism and influence operations. China's economic investments and military involvement are steadily growing across South Asia, particularly in countries like Pakistan, Nepal, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, and most recently, the Maldives.

Over the past decade, China's growing influence in South Asia has not only been driven by its funding and execution of large-scale infrastructure projects, particularly under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), but also reflects its broader geopolitical strategy in the region, which increasingly challenges the influence of the United States and other Western powers. While much focus has been placed on the debt burdens these projects have generated and the economic crises that have followed, less attention has been given to how China engages with political leaders in these countries to advance its strategic interests, including its competition with the U.S. for regional dominance.

China's ability to swiftly implement infrastructure projects has helped it build strong ties with South Asian governments, often aligning itself with ruling elites and top-tier military generals to gain political leverage. However, these projects do not always align with the actual needs of these countries, leading to wasteful spending and unsustainable debt. For instance, in Sri Lanka, the Hambantota Port project, financed by Chinese loans, failed to generate adequate business, forcing Sri Lanka to lease the port to China on a 99-year agreement, which critics argue has geopolitical implications, potentially giving China a strategic foothold in the Indian Ocean – a region of significant interest to both India and the U.S. Similarly, the Maldives, once a nation firmly within India's sphere of influence, has also seen an increase in Chinese investments and political outreach, illustrating China's growing clout in a region traditionally seen as within India's strategic backyard. Under President Abdulla Yameen, pursued several Chinese-funded infrastructure projects that have left the country heavily indebted, raising concerns about China's ability to exert influence over key Indian Ocean nations.

Nepal, a landlocked nation sandwiched between China and India, has seen Beijing's influence increase in recent years. China's investment in Nepal's infrastructure, including roadways, hydropower, and telecommunications, comes with political implications, as Beijing seeks to counterbalance Indian influence in the region. Bangladesh, too, has been courted by China, which has made significant investments in the country's transportation and energy infrastructure, further entrenching its role as a regional economic powerhouse.

In Pakistan, the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) was supposed to bring economic transformation, but the energy crisis persists due to deeper political and economic inefficiencies, which Chinese investments have not addressed. CPEC promises to modernize Pakistan's infrastructure and energy sectors, critics argue that the financial dependency created by Chinese loans could undermine Pakistan's long-term sovereignty. While China's investments have helped it gain influence, they often overlook long-term sustainability, leaving successor governments to manage the consequences of increased debt and underperforming projects, which also fuels public criticism.

Similarly, China's growing technological influence in South Asia through investments in telecommunications, digital infrastructure, and smart cities reflects a broader strategy to extend its reach into critical sectors like 5G, e-commerce, and cybersecurity, posing a direct challenge to U.S. technological and economic leadership. Chinese firms like Huawei and ZTE play pivotal roles in 5G expansion, while companies such as Alibaba and Tencent are making significant inroads into the region's e-commerce and fintech sectors.

In developing digital infrastructure, including fiber optic cables and data centers, China is laying the foundation for long-term influence in South Asia, while also exporting surveillance technologies, raising concerns about digital authoritarianism and increased state control. This expansion complicates U.S. efforts to promote democratic governance and open markets in the region, particularly as countries become increasingly dependent on Chinese technology and expertise. India's response to this growing influence has been one of caution, particularly in telecommunications, as it seeks to curb China's reach in sectors it views as critical to national security.

However, despite India's efforts and U.S. concerns, China's economic power and infrastructure investments in South Asia give it a significant strategic advantage. As a result, China's deepening presence in the region not only raises questions about the sustainability of its development model but also has broader geopolitical implications, as it enhances China's soft power and undermines U.S. influence in a region that is increasingly becoming a key theater for global competition between the two superpowers. Beijing's growing activism across South Asia is not without challenges. Critics argue that China's approach can foster local resentment, especially when it comes to concerns about debt-trap diplomacy, environmental degradation from infrastructure projects, or loss of sovereignty. Nevertheless, the increasing interdependence created by China's investments in South Asia leaves many nations in a precarious position, often caught between the economic benefits of Chinese partnership and the political costs of aligning too closely with Beijing.

China's rising influence across South Asia is emblematic of its broader global ambitions. The region's strategic location, combined with its developmental needs, makes it a key target for Beijing's broader geopolitical aspirations, positioning China as a major power player not only in South Asia but on the global stage. As the dynamics of the region continue to shift, the challenge for South Asian nations remains how to engage with China while safeguarding their autonomy and balancing their relationships with other global powers, particularly India and the West. How has China's policies, including "Wolf Warrior Diplomacy", weigh heavily on countries to take sides against the U.S. or India, and how might this affect South Asia in the future? This remains to be seen.

India's Arunachal Dam a defence against China's 'Mother of all Dams' plan in Tibet?

16 October 2024, Tibetan Review

China's plan to build the world's largest hydropower project—the 60,000 MW Motuo mega-dam—on the Yarlung Tsangpo River in Tibet, is prompting downstream India to take measures against its potential use as a hydrological weapon, given China's well-known record for doing so, said an opinion piece posted on the eurasiantimes.com Oct 15.

New Delhi is stated to be worried that the dam will give Beijing the power to control the river flow, which provides drinking water to an estimated 1.8 billion people in countries including China, India, Bhutan, and Bangladesh.

The mega dam will add to the series of other dams China has built to tame the Yarlung Tsangpo, which is known as the Brahmaputra river in India. This "Mother of all Dams" will curtail the river's flow during the lean season and trigger artificial floods during the rainy season.

India's response includes a plan to build an 11,000 MW hydropower project on the Siang River in Arunachal's Upper Siang district. Its design includes a "buffer storage" of over 9 billion cubic metres of water during peak monsoons. This would act as a reserve when water flow is reduced. It will also act as a buffer for downstream areas of Arunachal and Assam if China releases sudden water.

China has a history of using its dams to carry out transnational aggression. The piece noted that in 2021, China cut the water flow of the Mekong River by 50% for three weeks without any prior warning. The flow was cut ostensibly for power-line maintenance, but this affected the millions of people living along the waterways in the Southeast Asian countries of Cambodia, Laos, Myanmar, Thailand, and Vietnam.

Also, in 2019, China's dams in the upper Mekong River basin retained a record amount of water, despite experiencing above-average rainfall in the region during the wet season. Consequently, countries downstream faced an unprecedented drought during this typically wet season.

Since that year, Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam have experienced the most severe and prolonged drought on record. The region's economy and food security have been adversely impacted. Farmers have lost crops, fish populations have dwindled, and reservoir levels have dangerously decreased, the piece noted.

The Yarlung Tsangpo is one of the world's largest transnational river systems. It originates in eastern Tibet's Ngari region, home to the holy Mt Kailash and Lake Mansarovar, flows 2,900 kilometres across southern Tibet along the Himalayas, and enters India through the states of Assam and Arunachal Pradesh. In 2017, the water of Siang, a tributary of the Brahmaputra, turned black and became unsuitable for drinking, damaging the ecology and disrupting local agricultural production. Indian officials publicly blamed China. China dismissed the accusations as highly exaggerated, the piece noted.

Building dams in upstream Tibet “enables China to use water as a geopolitical tool, potentially manipulating water levels for irrigation, power generation, or flood control, which has impacted India and Bangladesh,” Neeraj Singh Manhas, Special Advisor for South Parley Policy Initiative, Republic of Korea, has said.

“India’s geographic location, with much of its water originating from rivers flowing from China (Tibet), places it at a disadvantage. India, as a lower riparian state, is dependent on these upstream flows for its agriculture and water security, which makes it vulnerable to any upstream activities by China,” Manhas has added.

He sees India’s recent proposal to build its dam on the Siang as a shift in strategy “aiming to assert its water rights and reduce dependence on China’s actions.” This includes India’s National Hydroelectric Power Corporation building the Upper Siang hydropower project, which would be the country’s biggest hydropower project, with a capacity of 10,000 megawatts.

While China has been taming the river to generate hydro-power over the past several years, the super dam proposed at the remote stretch of the river known as the Great Bend is the biggest of them all.

The dam’s site is at the eastern reaches of the Himalayas near the disputed border with the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. It is at a place where the river makes a dramatic U-turn. Here, the river elevation drops fiercely over 2,700 meters within a 50 km stretch before it changes course towards India.

China is said to claim that the project is being constructed to increase life quality in Tibet and manage water scarcity while meeting China’s goal of reaching a carbon emission peak before 2030 and carbon neutrality by 2060.

While that may be so, the dam construction is also seen as being driven by geo-political considerations. In 2016, China obstructed the flow of the Xiabuqu River, a Brahmaputra tributary located in Tibet near the Indian border. On the face of it, the obstruction was done to facilitate the operation of the Lalho hydropower project.

China’s “mother of all dams” is being planned at a time when India is contemplating a review of the Indus Waters Treaty with Pakistan following the cross-border Uri terrorist attack. “This trend signifies the potential ‘weaponization’ of transboundary water resources, posing a significant threat to regional stability in South Asia,” Manhas and Dr Rahul M Lad were stated to have contended in a recent research paper.

The opinion piece also notes that after the 73-day Doklam border standoff with India in 2017, China “abruptly” ceased to share hydrological data for the Brahmaputra River despite previous agreements. In contrast, Bangladesh continued to receive uninterrupted data from China. This behaviour by China reflects its intent to utilize water resources as a political tool against India within the South Asian context, the piece noted.

Book review: A document for the posterity

16 October 2024, Phayul, Vijay Kranti

“My Life-Born in the free Tibet, Served in exile”, The autobiography of Tashi Wangdi, a seasoned Tibetan diplomat is an interesting ring side view of exiled Tibet’s early history.

The latest autobiographic book “My Life – Born in Free Tibet, Served in Exile” by a senior (retired) Tibetan diplomat Tashi Wangdi is yet another monumental addition to an ongoing series of Tibetan autobiographies. A common driving force behind this series is the advice of HH the Dalai Lama to all Tibetans, especially those with long public exposure as servants of the Tibetan government-in-exile or as leaders who have been active in various fields, to write down their experience, views and observations to document Tibet’s history in exile. This book by Tashi Wangdi becomes more important from the point of historic documentation of the Tibetan struggle because of his unique position as a translator of the letters and telegrams received by the Dalai Lama administration in exile during early days when none of his ‘Kalons’ (ministers) could understand English.

This book is an authentic documentation of many events and developments because of Tashi Wangdi’s four decade long experience in the exile government. Starting from an Upper Division Clerk and gradually rising to the topmost ranks he served as a minister in the Dalai Lama’s administration. In the latter part of his career as a minister for seventeen years in almost every department of the government-in-exile he also served as the Representative of Dalai Lama in New Delhi and Brussels. His closeness to the Dalai Lama also provided him the unique opportunity of accompanying him and being privy to many historic events during his foreign visits between 1985 and 2011.

This book shows that as a diplomat to the core of his personality Tashi Wangdi has the ability to look at situations and developments with deep commitment and necessary detachment too. For example, in his concluding remarks he enumerates three main factors which will have a determining impact of the ultimate success of the Tibetan movement. Among these factors he also underlines the importance of the "Goodwill and support of the Chinese people" along with two other factors namely Tibetan people's unwavering determination and commitment and the international support for Tibetan cause.

Tashi Wangdi has specifically mentioned the two reasons behind writing this monumental and massive autobiography which is spread over 699 pages. One is the Dalai Lama's advice to all senior retired civil servants as well as all other Tibetans to write down a full and honest account of their life story as exiles. His other reason is to share his life story with his own children because he could not spend enough quality time with them during their growing up years because of his own official engagements and frequent travels. But the third reason which he has not mentioned in the introduction chapter of this book is to let his own friends, like me, to understand how important role he and his peers played, with full commitment and devotion, in Tibet's struggle for its legitimate rights as an occupied nation. This book has done good justice to all of these three reasons.

As a first-hand witness to many one-to-one interactions of Dalai Lama with many world leaders he writes, "He (Dalai Lama) is consistent, principled and transparent in the views and ideas he himself holds as important and shares with others. He is never one who will say something publicly and do the opposite himself, as one often witnesses in many public figures."

The author gives an interesting but painful account of how the women in Tibetan society were treated less than equal, especially in activities related to some religious practices. He writes, "I could not understand why women were not allowed to touch certain religious objects meant for protection, why they were not allowed to enter some shrine rooms..... I remember my mother praying that she may be born as a man in her next life..... There were instances where my mother would stand outside a shrine or deity room when men folks went in to pray."

This book is divided into 17 chapters, arranged in the chronological order as this autobiographic story moves ahead from Tashi Wangdi's 'Happy Childhood in Tibet' to his retirement from his official work in 2001. Some other chapters like his 'Journey into Exile', 'Delhi Bureau' (as Dalai Lama's Representative in India), 'Brussels' (as Dalai Lama's Representative in the European Union), 'Part of Entourage' (travels with Dalai Lama) and 'Dharamsala-Beijing' (as a senior member of Dalai Lama's team for negotiations with China) give lucid details of his personal life as a Tibetan refugee and his role in the 'Central Tibetan Administration' which functions as de-facto Tibet's 'Government-in-Exile'.

In chapter 'My Education' Tashi Wangdi has given interesting details of how the modern education process of Tibetan refugee children started with institutions like the 'Tibetan-Homes-Foundation' (THF) to finally emerge as the greatest strength of the Tibetan diaspora.

In chapter 'Higher Education' Tashi tells the story of how his college education at Durham in UK became possible, like most other Tibetan youths, due to liberal grants and scholarships provided by donors and institutions who were kind to the Tibetan refugees. His experience of participation in demonstrations on issues like Northern Ireland, war in Vietnam, White apartheid rule in South Africa etc. give a good glimpse of how such international exposure of Tibetan students helped them in developing and refining their political skills for their own national struggle.

As expected, a major part of this book carries a detailed narration of Tashi Wangdi's years in the Tibetan establishment. Besides details of many major developments depicting the evolution of Tibetan issue on the international scene this book also gives a good glimpse of the nature and intensity of internal politics among the Tibetan exile community. On the one hand many anecdotes reflect on not only the fault lines of traditional regional groupings and newly emerging power groups within this microscopic community, but also successfully underline the extraordinary unity among the Tibetan diaspora which has emerged during the exile years as a result of people's deep faith in Dalai Lama and his visionary leadership. For example, the evolution of Tibetan Youth Congress (TYC) as the biggest and the most dynamic organization of the exile community has proved itself as a unifying force of the diaspora by going beyond the regional identities, sub-religious followings and socio-economic differences. His access to day to day developments in the higher circles of the Tibetan establishment and important documents as a Kalon for 17 years has also helped Tashi Wangdi to make this book rich from history point of view. Many of the photo copies of such documents are going to prove useful for future researchers and coming generations of Tibetans.

One of interesting and important subjects which emerged as an important development during Tashi's tenure as the Kalon of Religion and Culture Department is related to the ordination of Nuns which was initiated by Dalai Lama himself. Similarly, the controversy related to the incarnation of 17th Karma Pa has been dealt with in details in this book. Photo copies of some important letters related to this issue should be quite useful for those who intend to study this issue in details.

Besides many more important developments Tashi has also described the formation of a Tibetan lobbying group at Washington DC in 1988 which has emerged as one of the most effective lobby groups of Tibet in the form of 'International Campaign for Tibet' (ICT). He has described how a clear distinction between this public action group was kept insulated from the Representative Office of Tibet in New York. It is interesting to note that present day Tibet's three most reputed diplomats namely Gyari Lodi Gyaltshe, Tenzin Namgyal Tethong and Tashi Wangdi served the Tibetan cause in tandem and in continuity in the same era in the USA which proved to be the most successful watershed era in the history of Tibet's national struggle. Tashi's detailed descriptions of HH Dalai Lama's visits to various countries and within India when he accompanied him are interesting and will prove useful to those who have interest in understanding present Dalai Lama's quality of bonding with new people and communities.

Another major attraction of this book is its chapter 'Dharamsala-Beijing' which deals with the history of contacts and the long dialogue process between Dharamsala and Beijing that started in 1979 with the contact between some Beijing functionaries and Gyalo Thondup, the elder brother of Dalai Lama, who operated from Hong Kong at that time. In addition to giving some details about this contact Tashi has also shared his experience and views about this process as a senior member of Dharamsala's 'Task Force for Negotiations' in its different Avatars.

In this chapter Tashi has quoted some interesting internal statements by two prominent Tibetan leaders, His Holiness Panchen Lama and Comrade Bapa Phuntsog Wangyal, who both stayed back in Tibet and collaborated with the occupying Chinese masters in their own respective ways. One interesting quote is from Panchen Lama's speech given to the members of the TAR Standing Committee who were attending the National People's Congress in Beijing on March 28th, 1987. He said, "In the State Planning Commission's report, there were many proposals for poverty alleviation in many areas. But the proposals did not say a word on the minority regions. Raising this point in the Standing Committee meetings I said, "There is nothing wrong in you becoming prosperous first. We (Tibetans) will wear threadbare garments and beg for food. But does that make you proud?" (p-607)

Tracing the history of dialogue between Dharamsala and Beijing Tashi has underlined the Chinese game of deception by pointing out how the Chinese government went against the assurance given by its own paramount leader Deng Xiaoping who had offered Dalai Lama to resolve the Tibetan issue through discussion on all issues except independence of Tibet. Listing all five points of the new policy document of Beijing government in November 1984 about Tibet he writes, "...the latest policy document had reduced the whole issue to His Holiness' return to Tibet and his future status." (p-601)

It is interesting to note that since then Beijing has formally restricted the entire dialogue process only to the return of Dalai Lama. In addition to this China also offered an attractive bait of good jobs and living conditions to Dalai Lama's associates with specific mention that these conditions "will be better than before". It is notable that while the Tibetan Parliament in Exile rejected this Chinese offer in its statement on February 5, 1985, the Chinese also outrightly rejected the Tibetan memorandum and closed its doors for any further discussions in 2010.

Before concluding his book on the chapter titled 'Retirement,' Tashi Wangdi has given an interesting description of how Dalai Lama decided to give away his own political powers in chapter 'Kalon Tripa Election'. It was in 2011 that Dalai Lama finally concluded the process of converting the Tibetan system from its traditional theocratic one to a democratic one which he had started in 1960 soon after escaping from Tibet and taking asylum in India. It was under the new constitution, announced by Dalai Lama in 2011, that he transferred his temporal authority to the elected representatives and the statutory bodies of Tibet in 2011 while keeping his own role limited only to spiritual matters. The more interesting part of the first ever election for the new Kalon Tripa (Prime Minister) as a result of this constitutional change was that the winner would eventually take over the political and other temporal powers from Dalai Lama as the first ever 'Sikyong' (President) of Tibet.

Tashi Wangdi has given elaborate details of the election process starting with the results of the first phase of polling in which all ordinary voters nominate candidates of their choice. It is on the basis of this voting that the election commission announces the list of top three contestants for final voting. This exercise left Dr. Lobsang Sangay, Tenzin Namgyal Tethong and Tashi Wangdi in the final fray. Giving a detailed description of his own election strategy Tashi also politely exposes the well-planned and organized practice of character assassination of rival candidates in Tibetan elections. He has painfully described how some bad words and baseless allegations were used against him to tarnish his image and his poll prospects during the election campaign. Sadly one finds today that this tendency has gained further momentum and dimensions with increasing use of social media in Tibetan elections. The final result of the elections was on the obvious and expected lines in the form of victory of Dr. Lobsang Sangay who introduced the US Presidential election type publicity blitz campaigns and defeated the other two candidates with an impressive margin of votes.

As H.H. Dalai Lama has said in his foreword to this book, "This book shines a light on contemporary Tibetan history through the eyes of an individual who actively participated in its development."

Opinion: What China's leaders grasp about another Trump term

15 October 2024, The Salt Lake Tribune, Rush Doshi

Trump remains well outside a bipartisan consensus on competing with China.

At the beginning of the Biden presidency, many of us serving in the National Security Council gathered to read the intelligence and reached a key conclusion: The 2020s would be what we called the "decisive decade" in U.S. competition with China.

Beijing seeks to displace the United States from its global leadership position and is a formidable challenger. It is America's first geopolitical rival to surpass 70 percent of U.S. G.D.P., exceed American industrial capacity and pull ahead in multiple technology sectors, such as electric vehicles, hypersonic weapons and nuclear energy technology. Absent corrective action, the United States risks falling behind China technologically, growing dependent on it economically and perhaps even suffering defeat by China's military in the Taiwan Strait or the South China Sea. How the next U.S. president navigates the remaining years of this decisive decade will have far-reaching consequences for America and the rest of the world.

The good news is that despite deep divisions in American politics, Democrats and Republicans now broadly agree on the need to outcompete China. They have enacted legislation intended to boost American technological leadership, revive domestic manufacturing, promote human rights around the world, strengthen American deterrence in the Taiwan Strait and bolster Asia-Pacific alliances.

That united front will be undermined if Donald Trump is elected again. Ironically, although he helped catalyze the current bipartisan approach as president by upending the long-term U.S. policy toward China that emphasized engagement over competition, he has never fully embraced the new consensus and now stands outside it. On China, he is often at odds with his former staff members, current advisers, the nationalist wing of his party and even his own vice-presidential pick — all of whom see the challenge posed by Beijing more clearly than he does. Left to his own unpredictable impulses, Mr. Trump could very well lose this decisive decade for America.

Nobody grasps this better than China's leaders. They saw his term as an accelerant of what they believe to be American decline, and not without reason. Mr. Trump focused on U.S. commodity exports instead of long-term manufacturing strength. He alienated allies and partners, mishandled the pandemic response and repeatedly showed disregard for democratic norms. On China policy, he routinely put personal gain over America's interests and undermined important steps his staff members took to compete with Beijing. As a result, Mr. Trump was widely mocked by Chinese citizens, who nicknamed him "Chuan Jianguo" ("Build-the-Nation Trump" — the "nation" being China). His administration led President Xi Jinping of China to declare that the world was undergoing "great changes unseen in a century" as America fell from pre-eminence.

There is no reason to believe that in a second term Mr. Trump would deviate from the approach that weakened America's position during his presidency.

Take technology policy. When Mr. Trump was in office, his administration rightly levied export controls on Huawei and ZTE, Chinese telecommunications companies that the intelligence community had warned could be vectors for espionage and cyberattacks. But he put self-interest first. He reportedly promised Mr. Xi he would lift the controls (and eventually did so for ZTE, despite bipartisan opposition) in exchange for purchases of U.S. agriculture and energy commodities that he felt would help his re-election prospects.

Today Mr. Trump opposes overwhelmingly bipartisan legislation that would ban TikTok unless the app's China-based owners sell it. The goal is to prevent Beijing from being able to shape U.S. public opinion by manipulating the news feeds of TikTok's 170 million American users or from having access to sensitive user data. He previously supported this approach but appears to have reversed himself after meeting with a top donor who has a roughly $30 billion stake in the app.

President Biden has taken important steps to deny China the advanced semiconductors it needs to take the lead in artificial intelligence and improve its military weapons, and he has moved to shore up America's defenses against Beijing's publicly documented campaign to compromise critical U.S. infrastructure, such as water, gas, telecommunications and transportation, in the run-up to a possible conflict. If, in a second term, Mr. Trump again elevates his personal interests above the country's approach to technology competition, it would put these vital efforts at risk.

The story is similar in manufacturing. As a recent report by Senator Marco Rubio made clear, China already "leads in many of the industries that will determine geopolitical supremacy." Members of both parties recognize that urgent action is needed to reindustrialize America as a new flood of Chinese exports threatens key U.S. industries.

Mr. Trump does not seem to share this view. As president, he squandered any leverage he gained from raising tariffs on China by accepting a bad trade deal that he hoped would help his re-election prospects. The deal allowed Beijing to keep its unfair practices and sell Americans manufactured goods if China promised to buy American commodities. More bad deals like that in a second term could cost millions of U.S. jobs, displace America in high-tech industry and accelerate decline by turning the United States into a commodity supplier dependent on Chinese manufactured goods.

With democracy and human rights under pressure around the world, American leadership in defending those values is imperative. Yet Mr. Trump retains an affinity for authoritarian leaders like Mr. Xi and President Vladimir Putin of Russia that is far outside the bipartisan consensus. Mr. Trump once praised China's response to the Tiananmen Square massacre and threatened to veto nearly unanimous legislation condemning China's crackdown on Hong Kong by declaring, "We have to stand with Hong Kong, but I'm also standing with President Xi." According to Mr. Trump's former national security adviser John Bolton, Mr. Trump privately encouraged Mr. Xi to build the re-education prisons in which China interned an estimated one million ethnic Uyghurs. A second Trump term could further greenlight China's repression and its drive to weaken democratic values and American leadership around the world.

Mr. Trump's ideas on Taiwan are a blueprint for calamity. For decades, Washington has deterred China from invading Taiwan with a bipartisan policy of strategic ambiguity about whether the United States would defend the island. Mr. Trump threatens to weaken that deterrence. He said recently that Taiwan should pay the United States to defend the island, which is democratically ruled, while cavalierly casting doubt on America's ability to do just that.

This is extremely dangerous. Telegraphing a lack of U.S. resolve could one day embolden China to seize the island, which could spark a conflict that devastates the global economy. And Beijing has already taken notice: It is increasingly well known in Western diplomatic and scholarly circles that Chinese officials and think tank experts are quietly asking whether Mr. Trump might acquiesce to Chinese military action against Taiwan if he is re-elected.

Democrats and Republicans alike believe that strengthening America's global alliances is one of the best ways to counter China. But Mr. Trump has shown that he still does not value America's international friendships. He is threatening once again to raise tariffs on allies, make them pay more for collective defense and renege on U.S. defense commitments. Without its allies, America would stand alone against Beijing.

China is America's most formidable geopolitical rival in a century, and thanks to Mr. Trump's term in office, leaders in Beijing are acutely aware of what he is about and how to manipulate him. They believe China is rising and America is declining. Electing Mr. Trump next month risks proving them right.

China's government is about to spend big on stimulus – can it turn around the country's sluggish economy?

15 October 2024, The Conversation

China's relentless economic growth used to be the marvel of the world. Oh, what a memory.

The past couple of years have seen China contend with an economic slowdown amid colliding crises, many of which make it internationally unique. Consumer prices have been approaching deflationary territory, there's an oversupply of housing, and youth unemployment has soared.

Mounting pressure has forced the Chinese government to step in. Over the past month, Beijing has put forward a set of significant economic stimulus measures aimed at reviving China's faltering economy.

According to a research note by Deutsche Bank, this stimulus could potentially become "the largest in history" in nominal terms. But there's still a lot we don't know. So what kinds of measures that are in this package so far, and has China been here before?

What's in the package?

On September 24, Pan Gongsheng, governor of China's central bank, unveiled the country's boldest intervention to boost its economy since the pandemic. The initiatives included reducing mortgage rates for existing homes and reducing the amount of cash commercial banks are required to hold in reserves. The latter is expected to inject about 1 trillion yuan (A$210 billion) into the financial market by letting the banks lend out more.

On top of this, 800 billion yuan (A$168 billion) was announced to strengthen China's capital market.

This comprised a new 500 billion yuan (A$105 billion) monetary policy facility to help institutions more easily access funds to buy stocks, and a 300 billion yuan (A$63 billion) re-lending facility to help speed up sales of unsold housing.

Further signs of economic revitalisation became evident at a Politburo meeting of China's top government officials, two days after this announcement.

Chinese President Xi Jinping stressed the urgency of economic revival. Xi even encouraged officials to "go bold in helping the economy" without having to fear the consequences.

That same day, seven government departments released a joint policy package to stabilise China's 500 billion yuan (A$105 billion) dairy industry, which has been severely impacted by declining milk and beef prices since 2023.

A market rollercoaster

Initially, the market's response was overwhelmingly positive. Perhaps too positive. In the last week of September, stock markets in Shanghai, Shenzhen, and Hong Kong saw their biggest weekly rise in 16 years.

On October 8, following China's National Day holiday, turnover on the Shanghai and Shenzhen stock exchanges hit an unprecedented 3.43 trillion yuan (A$718 billion). However, expectations for further stimulus measures were met with disappointment.

China's National Development and Reform Commission brought forward 100 billion yuan (A$21 billion) in spending from the 2025 budget. That wasn't enough to sustain market optimism. On October 9, Chinese stocks saw their most severe drop in 27 years.

This downturn only worsened a few days later, when China's Ministry of Finance hinted there was "ample room" to raise debts but did not specify any new stimulus measures.

Still thin on the details

The market remains deeply uncertain about the future direction of China's economic policies and what they might mean for the world. Hopes that more details might be released over the weekend were largely dashed.

Back in July, Chinese authorities asserted in their Third Plenary Session communique that China "must remain firmly committed" to achieving this year's economic growth target of 5%. Compared to the country's reform-era economic performance, that's a modest goal.

But facing a persistently sluggish economic outlook, Xi later seemed to subtly shift the tone, changing the language from "remain firmly committed" to "strive to fulfill" in September.

Over the past decades, China has frequently employed massive-scale stimulus measures to revive its economy during downturns. These policies have been able to significantly rejuvenate the economy, though occasionally with some worrying side effects. In response to the 2008 global financial crisis, China's State Council released a 4 trillion yuan (A$837 billion) stimulus package. This successfully helped China stand firm through the crisis and was credited as a key stabiliser of the global economy.

But it also accumulated trillions of yuan in debt through local government financing and accelerated the rise of "shadow banking" – unregulated financial activities.

China also spent big on stimulating its economy in 2015, following stock market turbulence, and then again in the wake of the pandemic.

What should we expect?

What should we expect this time? How balanced or sustainable will any ensuing growth be?

We are still waiting on many of the details about the size and scope of the package, but any big increase in Chinese economic demand will likely have "spillover" effects.

As we've discussed, many of the measures announced to date will have their most immediate effect on borrowing, lending and liquidity in China's stock markets.

That suggests we should watch for what's called the "wealth effect" in economics. This is the theory that rising asset prices – such as for housing or shares – make people feel wealthier and therefore spend more.

If China's big stimulus spend causes sustained increases in asset values, it could give rise to economic optimism. Chinese consumers – and investors – may become less anxious about the future. From Australia's point of view, that could see increases in demand in areas where our economies are interlinked – iron ore, tourism, education and manufactured food exports.

More broadly, Chinese demand could contribute to growth in other global economies, with a self-reinforcing effect on the world as a whole.

Beware financialisation

On the other hand, China's shift to depending more on volatile asset price rises in its capital markets to sustain growth could have destabilising effects. Where asset price increases benefit those at the "top end of town," they can breed inequities and imbalances of their own.

China's "Black Monday" stock market crash in 2015 raised alarm in Beijing. Partly reflecting a wariness of excess financialisation, Xi cautioned at the time that "housing is for living in, not for speculation".

So far, China is still navigating its path towards a more sustainable development model, striving to strike a balance between sustaining economic growth and stabilising its domestic markets and political landscape. As for the outcome, it remains a profound uncertainty for us all - perhaps China itself included.

The Politics of China's Land Appropriation in Bhutan

15 October 2024, The Diplomat, Robert Barnett

China has built 22 villages and settlements within Bhutan's customary borders. And there is no sign that Bhutan can do anything about it - or that Beijing will face any costs.

In dealing with its neighbors, China "always strives to find fair and reasonable solutions through peaceful and friendly consultations," a spokesman for the Chinese Embassy in the United States told the New York Times in August. Why, then, has China appropriated part of a neighbor's territory?

That neighbor is Bhutan, a country with which China has said for decades it is keen to have formal diplomatic relations, hoping to balance or reduce Bhutan's close relations with its southern neighbor, India. Bhutan, for its part, has what it calls "friendly and cooperative relations with the People's Republic of China" and has supported China consistently at the United Nations and elsewhere.

As China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi has put it, in more poetic terms, "China and Bhutan are linked by mountains and rivers and enjoy profound traditional friendship." And China signed a treaty with Bhutan in 1998 in which both parties proclaimed "mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity" and agreed "not to resort to unilateral action to alter the status quo of the border."

What has since happened is the opposite. Eight years ago, China began building villages within territory that has for decades if not centuries been within Bhutan. Now, as documented in a report out today, there are 22 such villages and settlements built by China within Bhutan's customary borders. And there is no sign that Bhutan can do anything about it - or that China will face any costs for doing so.

As far as one can tell from satellite images, the Chinese villages and settlements in total contain some 2,200 homes for approximately 7,000 people. To construct these villages, China has annexed 2 percent of Bhutan's territory.

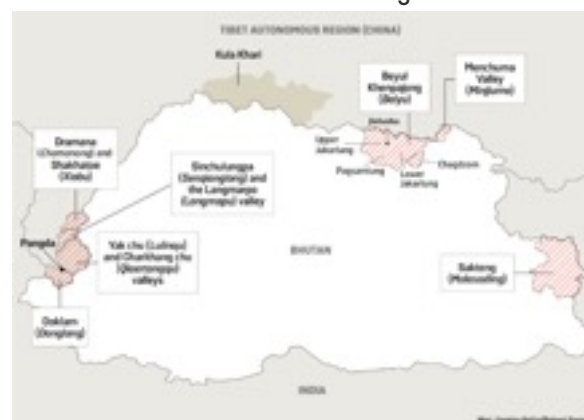

The villages are being built in two areas of Bhutan. Eight of the Chinese villages are in a western area of Bhutan that the historian Tsering Shakya said was ceded to Bhutan by the then ruler of Tibet, the 13th Dalai Lama in the early 20th century. China has built those eight villages for military reasons: it wants that western area of Bhutan because it includes an 89-square-kilometer area called Doklam, possession of which would give China major strategic advantage in its ongoing confrontations with India.

The 14 other Chinese villages and settlements are in areas of northeastern Bhutan known as the Beyul Khenpajong and Menchuma. These areas have always been understood to be in Bhutan. China produced a claim for these areas only in the 1980s and until at least the early 1990s they were shown on official Chinese maps as parts of Bhutan.

These northeastern areas of Bhutan have no compelling military or strategic value to China. Its reason for annexing them was more or less explicitly to place diplomatic pressure on Bhutan. In 1990, in what has become known as the "package deal," Beijing offered to drop its claims in the northeast of Bhutan if Thimphu would yield a number of claimed territories in its west, including Doklam, to China. In other words, the Chinese villages in the northeast were built within Bhutan's customary borders as a threat: if Bhutan didn't agree to the package deal and yield the western areas, the threat implied, it would lose the northeastern areas too.

That threat appears to have been largely realized. Without any public comment, and unnoticed even within the country, let alone abroad, Bhutan has already changed its maps so that Menchuma, one of the northeastern areas occupied by China since the 2000s, is no longer shown as part of Bhutan, though it clearly was some 30 years ago - even on China's maps.

And in March last year, two years after reports emerged of Chinese villages within Bhutan, Bhutan's then-prime minister finally said that those reports were false. The statement does not, however, mean that those reports were false when they were published. Instead, it suggests that now Bhutan does not expect to be able to recover the areas where China has built its cross-border villages.

China is building villages in the western sector of Bhutan (in Bji Gewog in Haa dzongkhag) and in the northeastern sector (in Beyul and Menchuma in Lhuentse dzongkhag). From Leverage to Punishment

China's eight villages in Bhutan's west are part of what China calls a "consolidation" or "fixing" tactic: they are a way of acquiring territory by creating "facts on the ground" that another party can hardly change without triggering a war. In this sense, they are like China's actions in the South China Seas.

But the 14 villages and settlements in the northeast of Bhutan represent a completely different rationale: not the seizing of a strategic asset but what seemed to be a temporary occupation, a signal to Bhutan that it should yield to pressure. This was indicated by the fact that, in 2018, when China finished building its first cross-border village, which was in the northeast of Bhutan, it had only 16 residents.

By early 2023, when Bhutan announced that it was close to reaching a deal with China and that there were no Chinese villages on its soil, that pressure appeared to have paid off for China. Yet China's building spree in Bhutan's northeast continued. At the end of 2022, there were 14 villages and settlements, built over six years. But in the 18 months since early 2023 seven more have been built, and three existing villages have been majorly expanded and are currently being upgraded from villages to towns. This surge of construction has added another 790 units of Chinese housing in the northeast of Bhutan, tripling the housing stock in that area, which until recently China had not apparently seen as of strategic significance.

These new villages and settlements are not required to increase China's pressure on Bhutan – Thimphu seems close to yielding to most of China's demands, since it has no other option. Rather, they seem to represent punishment of Bhutan because it cannot yield Doklam to China. Legally speaking, Bhutan cannot do so unless India agrees, because of a 2007 treaty between Bhutan and India obliging either side not to "allow the use of its territory for activities harmful to the national security and interest of the other." So China's continuing occupation of parts of Bhutan and the expansion of its cross-border villages is penalizing Bhutan for having failed to accept an element of the package deal that it has no power to enact.

If, as seems likely, Bhutan yields the non-Doklam western areas demanded by the Chinese government, it will get some rewards from China, in that Beijing will most likely drop its claims to those areas of Bhutan that it has claimed but not occupied. These areas are the Upper Langmarpo, Charithang, and Yak chu areas in the west and the Chagdzom area in the northeast, totaling about 430 sq km. China's claims to those areas are viewed by some observers as "trade space" – token demands made only to be dropped later so as to give the impression of good will.

It is also likely that China will give back the Pagsamlung valley, an area of religious and historic significance for Bhutan which China has annexed by building roads and outposts and by stationing troops, but where it has not constructed villages. Returning the Pagsamlung valley to Bhutan would not, however, be a genuine concession either, because China does not include the Pagsamlung as part of China on its national-level maps (some local-level Chinese maps do include it as part of China), and has not done so for at least 25 years. So in the case of the Pagsamlung valley, China has occupied a piece of a neighbor's territory that it does not even claim.

Conflict Without An Enemy

China's land-grabs in Bhutan thus differ from Beijing's actions in the South China Seas. Firstly, unlike the Spratly Islands and other maritime features in the critical waterway, most of China's villages in Bhutan are not in areas of major strategic value, apart from Doklam. Their value was primarily as a form of pressure on the Bhutan government to yield the Doklam plateau.

Second, China's actions in the South China Sea – claiming territory on dubious grounds and then building unilaterally on that territory – were hostile acts directed at competitors or antagonists. But China supposedly views Bhutan as a friend, and Bhutan cannot, because of its size, resources, and geography, resort to any form of antagonistic response. China could have used multiple other options to place diplomatic pressure on Bhutan without seizing its territory and openly breaching an international agreement.

Bhutan has in any case, since at least the early 1990s, indicated its interest in opening formal relations with Beijing and settling the border disputes, apart from the Doklam issue, which depended on getting agreement from India. Bhutan's willingness was never the problem, and even the use by China of territorial annexation as an extreme form of pressure on Bhutan was always unlikely to get India to agree to Doklam being yielded to China.

A realist might see China's actions as what the political theorist Thomas Schelling called "coercive diplomacy," or, more particularly "compellence" – a muscular form of dominance-assertion. But Schelling's theory always assumes an adversary, leaving the coercing power with relatively few options. That is the opposite of the case here: Bhutan has not claimed anything that China held before its recent annexations, and could not compete with China even if it did.

In addition, coercive diplomacy involves a threat that is not fulfilled unless there is non-compliance (think Kennedy and the Cuban Missile Crisis). But in the case of Bhutan, the threat was carried out in advance, making it closer to Schelling's "forcible action" (which he also called "brute force"), with the unlikely promise of withdrawal if Bhutan were to concede to the demand – which China's strategists must have known that in all likelihood it could never do in full.

Beijing's actions are of course ultimately directed against India, with which China is locked into a long-running border conflict. But the only damage being done here is to Bhutan, not India. For its part, India has shown interest only in the Doklam issue – or more precisely in the southern ridge of Doklam, which gives oversight of India's bottleneck at Siliguri.

In June 2017 India sent 270 troops into Doklam to prevent Chinese soldiers taking that ridge, leading to a 73-day standoff between Indian and Chinese army units. But India has not commented publicly or responded to China's incursions or appropriation at other points along the Bhutan-China border, and not even to China's seizure of the majority of the Doklam plateau just to the north of the ridge, where China has built multiple roads, barracks and military facilities in what is clearly disputed territory.

So why would China risk its stated goal of establishing formal relations with a friendly neighbor, and its much-proclaimed commitment to a "peaceful rise," in order to punish India, a third party that, as far as is known, is involved only in one small sector of that border? And why would China continue building villages in the northeastern area of Bhutan – at mind-numbing expense, given their remoteness, altitude, and climate, as a result of which every settler in those villages has to be paid large sums by the Chinese government to agree to live there – long after the utility of those villages as leverage has passed, literally, the point of no return?

Domestic factors can play a role in these situations – local Chinese power-holders in Tibet stand to gain significant funding from Beijing for their administrations by claiming that they face security threats from northern Bhutan. However, the only threat that Chinese media have cited as coming from Bhutan – since the Indian military has little presence in Bhutan other than at Doklam – is the possibility that exiled Tibetan supporters of the Dalai Lama might somehow try to cross into Tibet via Bhutan to foment an independence movement. But there have been almost no reports of illegal border crossings in the last ten years on any part of Tibet's 4,000 km-border (91 percent of which is with India or Nepal, not Bhutan), and even before then there were no reports of any trying to cross via Bhutan.

The use of annexation as a diplomatic tool matches with a recent shift by China from soft-power approaches to hard-power moves in its foreign relations, in particular with regard to Taiwan, the Philippines, and India. Some have presented realist explanations for these developments, arguing that China sees those states as posing threats of some kind to its security. Others have seen China's combination of a declared commitment to a soft-power approach with the reality of its hard-power politics as designed, intentionally or not, to create confusion for observers and reduce predictability. But such arguments have little purchase in the case of Bhutan, since it does not pose a threat to China. Instead, the Bhutan case demonstrates the widest instance so far of a gulf between China's rhetoric and practice in its policy towards its neighbors, especially the smaller ones.

A New Cost-free Norm?

But there is another factor that may be more significant than normative assumptions of rationality or threat-response: the lack of cost. The exercise by states of their coercive powers is presumably constrained by the costs of excessive actions. In the Bhutan case, there have been no costs, not even of the mildest kind.

The mainstream media, other than those in India, have mostly ignored the issue, apart from news pieces by the New York Times in 2020, Reuters in 2021, and the Wall Street Journal in 2024, three years after the first major reports of cross-border village-construction (besides a Washington Post op-ed I wrote in 2020). Criticisms of China are routine in Western media – the BBC and the Guardian, for example, recently covered extremely doubtful allegations of Chinese abuses in Tibet based on such slender evidence as photographs of students wearing military-type fatigues or insignificant shifts in nighttime light emissions. But neither outlet has carried anything about China's annexation of territory within another country, seemingly a challenge to a founding principle of the United Nations.

As for governments, Bhutan and India have been largely silent on the issue, surely the wisest option for them in this situation. But it remains unclear why other governments or politicians have been quiet about China's annexation of parts of Bhutan. All the reports of village construction in disputed territory have long since been confirmed by satellite imagery, and the U.S. military has issued two reports judging China's village-building program in Bhutan to be potentially a case of occupation (one in October 2023, and another in much greater detail in March this year). Rabid anti-China rhetoric is never helpful, but near-total silence risks signaling acquiescence by the wider community to the use of territorial annexation as a tactic of choice with small neighbors.

The reason why China chose this hard-fisted tactic against Bhutan may thus be because it rightly calculated that the costs would all be Bhutan's. Given its commitment to long-term considerations, Bhutan has no effective option but to continue as if its powerful northern neighbor is a friend, to accept the Chinese deal as far as India will allow, and to open formal relations with Beijing. As then-Prime Minister Lotay Tshering said last year, "How can Bhutan not have any bilateral relations with China? The question is when, and in what manner."

China may not end up with control of the southern ridge at Doklam, but its cross-border actions elsewhere in Bhutan have already demonstrated the effectiveness of land appropriation as a cost-free means for a major power to extract concessions from a smaller neighbor.

China's 'Mother Of All Dams' Threatens More Tensions With India; Delhi Responds By Building Another Dam On Its Side

15 October 2024, The Eurasian Times, Ritu Sharma

China is all set to weaponize water against India by building the world's largest hydropower project—the 60,000 MW Motuo mega-dam—on the Yarlung Tsangpo River, which is known in India as the mighty Brahmaputra River.

In the post-Galwan world, New Delhi is worried that the dam will give Beijing the power to control the river flow, which provides drinking water to an estimated 1.8 billion people in countries including China, India, Bhutan, and Bangladesh.

The mega dam is in addition to the series of dams that China has built to tame Tsangpo. China's 'Mother of all Dams' can curtail the river flow during the lean season and trigger artificial floods during the rainy season. A concerned India has proposed an 11,000 MW hydropower project on the Siang River in Arunachal's Upper Siang district.

The dam design includes a "buffer storage" of over 9 billion cubic meters of water during peak monsoons. This would act as a reserve when water flow is reduced or act as a buffer for downstream areas of Arunachal and Assam if China releases sudden water.

The proposed dam aims to strengthen India's water-sharing rights as a riparian state.

India's fears are not unfounded. In 2021, China cut the water flow of the Mekong River by 50 percent for three weeks without a prior warning. The flow was cut ostensibly for power-line maintenance, but this affected the millions of people living along the waterways in the Southeast Asian countries of Cambodia, Laos, Myanmar, Thailand, and Vietnam.

In 2019, China's dams in the upper Mekong River basin retained a record amount of water, setting a new record despite experiencing above-average rainfall in the region during the wet season. Consequently, countries downstream faced an unprecedented drought during this typically wet season.

Since 2019, Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam have experienced the most severe and prolonged drought on record. The region's economy and food security have been adversely impacted. Farmers have lost crops, fish populations have dwindled, and reservoir levels have dangerously decreased.

Now, the Yarlung Tsangpo is one of the world's largest transnational river systems. It originates in the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau in southwest China, flows 2,900 kilometers across southern Tibet via the Himalayas, and enters India, where it is called the Brahmaputra, through the Indian states of Assam and Arunachal Pradesh (which China claims as South Tibet).

Siang is a tributary of Brahmaputra. In 2017, the water of Siang turned black and became unsuitable for drinking, damaging the ecology and disrupting local agricultural production. Indian officials publicly blamed China. Nonetheless, China dismissed the accusations as highly exaggerated.

Experts believe that constructing dams on rivers such as the Brahmaputra will allow China to control the flow of water downstream.

"This enables China to use water as a geopolitical tool, potentially manipulating water levels for irrigation, power generation, or flood control, which has impacted India and Bangladesh," Neeraj Singh Manhas, Special Advisor for South Parley Policy Initiative, Republic of Korea told the EurAsian Times.

He opined: "For China, controlling the headwaters of major rivers provides an upper hand in negotiating with downstream nations. India's geographic location, with much of its water originating from rivers flowing from China, places it at a disadvantage. India, as a lower riparian state, is dependent on these upstream flows for its agriculture and water security, which makes it vulnerable to any upstream activities by China."

Manhas sees India's recent proposal to build its dam on the Siang as a shift in strategy "aiming to assert its water rights and reduce dependence on China's actions." The National Hydroelectric Power Corporation will build the Upper Siang hydropower project.

The dam was first proposed in 2017 by the central government think tank Niti Ayog. It said it would be the country's biggest hydropower project, with a capacity of 10,000 megawatts.

The NHPC has selected three sites along the Siang River, Uggeng, Ditte Dimme, and Parong, to assess whether the dam is feasible in this area.

The pre-feasibility report assesses the probable cost of the dam and whether it can be constructed in that area. The survey also involves drilling a 200-meter-deep hole to test the strength of the rock surface. The dam is facing considerable opposition from the local population.

Water Wars In The Himalayas

The Yarlung Tsangpo runs almost 3,000 kilometers through the Tibetan Autonomous Region to the Indian states of Arunachal Pradesh and Assam and then out into the Bay of Bengal via Bangladesh. It is the highest major river on Earth, running at an average elevation of 4,000 meters.

In the last few years, China has been taming the river to generate hydro-power. But the super dam proposed at the remote stretch of the river known as the Great Bend is the biggest of them all.

The dam site is at the eastern reaches of the Himalayas near the disputed border with the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. It is at a place where the river makes a dramatic U-turn. Here, the river elevation drops fiercely over 2,700 meters within a 50 km stretch before it changes course towards India.

China claims that the project is being constructed to increase life quality in Tibet and manage water scarcity while meeting China's goal of reaching a carbon emission peak before 2030 and carbon neutrality by 2060.

But the dam construction is also driven by geopolitical considerations. In 2016, China obstructed the flow of the Xiabuqu River, a Brahmaputra tributary located in Tibet near the Sino-Indian border. On the face of it, the obstruction was done to facilitate the operation of the Lallo hydropower project.

However, it coincided with the time when India was contemplating a review of the Indus Waters Treaty with Pakistan following the Uri attack. In a research paper, Manhas and Dr. Rahul M. Lad contend that "this trend signifies the potential "weaponization" of transboundary water resources, posing a significant threat to regional stability in South Asia."

Bangladesh, where millions of people reside in the Brahmaputra basin, will also be adversely affected by the change in the river's course.

After the Doklam standoff with India, China "abruptly" ceased to share hydrological data for the Brahmaputra River despite previous agreements. In contrast, Bangladesh continued to receive uninterrupted data from China. This behavior by China reflects its intent to utilize water resources as a political tool against India within the South Asian context.

India has a China problem, not just a border problem

15 October 2024, The Strategist, Rajeswari Pillai Rajagopalan

It's not just the border. India has a deeper problem with China, and it looks like it's part of the same problem that other countries have with China: the country has become much more aggressive.

Indian policymakers and commentators routinely assume that if New Delhi could only resolve the dispute over the line of the Himalayan border, other issues would fall into place. In fact, there's not much reason to believe that. Just look further afield to the Western Pacific or Ukraine.

For the past several years, New Delhi has said there can be no progress in other aspects of the relationship as long as China refuses to concede on the border problem. This was initially an effort at pushing the border problem to the centre, presumably in the hope that China would not want to risk the entire relationship over it. But China has not budged and does indeed seem willing to risk the relationship instead.

There has been some recent speculation that India and China are on their way to resolving their standoff at the border, where military confrontations have sometimes become violent. India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar said last month that 75 percent of the disengagement problems had been resolved. The holding of a round of Sino-Indian border talks in August and a meeting between Indian National Security Advisor Ajit Doval and Chinese Foreign Affairs Minister Wang Yi also added to hope. But Jaishankar has since clarified that his reference was only to disengagement, not to issues of militarisation of the border or the larger state of relations.

Anyway, there may be a larger problem with India's strategy. The assumption behind it appears to be that the border dispute is the key issue in the relationship. But confrontations at the border may be consequences of deeper problems rather than a cause of them.

India-China relations have become increasingly challenging over the past two decades, even before a severe border clash that raised tensions in 2020. China objected vociferously to the US-India nuclear deal. It gave way, but a few years later refused to allow India to join the Nuclear Suppliers Group, which governs transfers of civilian nuclear technology and material. Around the same time, China repeatedly stymied Indian efforts to designate Pakistan-based terrorists under the UN terror list. Similarly, China has refused to back India's efforts to promote UN Security Council reforms as well as India's quest for a seat on the Security Council.

A meeting of foreign ministers of the BRICS group failed to issue a joint statement (for the first time since its founding) because of the Security Council issue. It is not difficult to assume, given China's long-standing efforts to undermine UN Security Council reforms, that it had a hand in the latest failure.

India's assumption appears to have been that each of these was a discrete policy disagreement rather than an indicator of a more fundamental issue—and that may be its big mistake.

China's behaviour with many of its neighbours has similarly changed. These changes have included increasingly aggressive behaviour in the South China Sea and East China Sea, particularly against Taiwan. It is also attempting to fish in troubled waters in both the Middle East and in the Ukraine war by extending diplomatic support to Iran to undermine American influence and appearing to provide material support to Russia.

Each of these instances of China's behaviour may seem explicable when viewed in isolation. China and its supporters would argue that its behaviour in the South China Sea is a response to aggressive actions by Vietnam and the Philippines, for example.

But we are seeing too many instances. There's a pattern, and India should recognise it.

If China's behaviour has fundamentally changed, and its behaviour towards India is only one aspect of that change, then what New Delhi faces is a much more serious problem than just the border. Indeed, it's clearly not even a Sino-Indian problem, but a China problem.

Part of this might reflect some historical patterns about the way rising powers behave, but one aspect of it may be more narrowly cultural: a reflection of China's sense of itself and its place in history. Either way, such a shift in China's position and worldview is not likely to be dealt with through negotiations narrowly focused on an apparently simple border dispute.

This is not to suggest that the border dispute is trivial. In 2020, for the first time in decades, blood was spilled in a clash between Indian and Chinese troops. Tens of thousands of Indian and Chinese soldiers are eyeball to eyeball, with all the attendant risks of inadvertent escalation.

This is a matter of concern even without all the other layers of complications between the two countries. Nevertheless, those layers of complications do matter and suggest that more fundamental issues are at stake than just the border dispute. If China is now fundamentally difficult to deal with, resolving that problem will be harder than Indian policy seems to assume. And even if it were resolved, other disputes may not be.

EXPLAINED: Xinjiang's largest cotton producer turned 70; not everyone is celebrating

14 October 2024, RFA, Gülchéhre

The XPCC is involved in everything from governance to commerce. Evidence points to its oppression of Uyghurs.

This month the Chinese Communist Party celebrated the 70th anniversary of the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, or XPCC, a massive CCP-backed paramilitary group that functions as an armed force, corporate conglomerate and government administrative unit.

China's vice premier, He Lifeng, traveled to Urumqi, the capital of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, to join the festivities, which included a performance by dancers holding replicas of giant vegetables to symbolize the bounty XPCC has brought to the region through land reclamation projects. He and other CCP officials praised the corps for protecting China's western border and promoting social stability and called for the group to take an even more expansive role in Xinjiang's development.

That won't come as welcome news to XPCC's critics who assert that gains ascribed to the corps have come at the expense of Uyghurs and other ethnic Turkic communities indigenous to Xinjiang. They allege the XPCC's economic development has relied on land expropriation, forced labor and extrajudicial detentions that have drawn international condemnation.

"In the last five years in particular, the XPCC has played a critical role in suppressing Uyghur life, culture and identity," a highly critical 2022 report from researchers at Sheffield Hallam University in the United Kingdom said.

The conglomerate is under sanctions by the U.S. Treasury. Cotton imports from Xinjiang are banned in the United States in part because of allegations that Uyghurs detained under the mass internment campaign were forced to work in textile factories upon release.

What is the XPCC?

The XPCC, which is referred to as Bingtuan in China, dates to the early days of the People's Republic of China. It was founded in 1954 with decommissioned troops from the People's Liberation Army and initially focused on security in a relatively sparsely populated border area and on agriculture and construction projects.

In the decades since, the XPCC's footprint has grown considerably. It now has stakes in industries including media, mining, logistics, clothing, insurance, tourism and others. In 2023, the XPCC's output in goods and services were valued in excess of $50 billion, more than 20% of Xinjiang's total GDP.

XPCC is among the world's largest producers of cotton, the importation of which has been banned in the United States. News reports have said entities tied to the corps account for about 30% of China's cotton production.

The U.S. and human rights groups have said the production is in part driven by forced labor. China denies the accusations and has said the work of the corps has led to a more prosperous region. News reports have noted a few relative benefits of working for the XPCC. This account in Foreign Policy magazine published on the occasion of XPCC's 60th birthday noted that laborers for the corps are paid more than other workers.

What is unique about the XPCC?

While the XPCC has grown into a major conglomerate, it is structured in a way similar to a military unit in that it is divided into 14 divisions that are subdivided into dozens of regiments.

Its leaders take military titles who exercise administrative control over areas in which they operate. That includes authority over its court and educational systems in Bingtuan territories.

Nearly 3.5 million people in Xinjiang live under XPCC's direct authority, making it a parallel government to the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, or XUAR. In 2021, the corps managed more than one-sixth of the region and a quarter of its arable land.

Why has the U.S. sanctioned the XPCC?

In July 2020, the U.S. Treasury Department sanctioned XPCC for its involvement in a mass internment campaign against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims in response to a supposed threat of terrorism.

The U.S. has labeled Chinese persecution of Uyghurs a genocide because it seeks to diminish native culture and traditions in the name of assimilation. More than 1 million people are thought to have been held in reeducation camps designed to promote assimilation with the dominant Chinese Han culture, which critics allege the XPCC has helped to promote in Xinjiang by facilitating migration.

Chen Quanguo, who as Communist Party secretary of the XUAR implemented that campaign, was also the first political commissar of the XPCC, which gave him authority over the growing conglomerate.

"The XPCC has been used to detain Uyghurs in camps and prisons, to surveil Uyghurs ... they have contributed massive police forces," German researcher Adrian Zenz, who has documented the persecution of Muslims in Xinjiang, told RFA Uyghur. "And the XPCC is used to a large extent for forced labor as Uyghurs are being transferred to XPCC factories."

The Sheffield Hallam study reported that 70% of the land in one village was transferred from Uyghur farmers.

The celebrants who gathered for the 70th anniversary offered another take. Ma Xingrui, party secretary for the XUAR, credited the XPCC for playing a central role in ensuring a harmonious Xinjiang.

"We must adhere to the idea of one chessboard and one family between the corps and the locals from beginning to end," he said.

The Great Han Chauvinism: Why China doesn't have any place for minorities

14 October 2024, FirstPostv, Claude Arpi

The late Chinese leader, Wu Bangguo, may have believed that the Chinese system is superior, but minorities have no place in China today, except in the Party's propaganda

On October 8, Wu Bangguo, the former third in the Communist hierarchy and head of China's top legislature, died in Beijing at the age of 83.

An official obituary by Xinhua described Wu as an 'outstanding leader'.

The South China Morning Post observed: "Wu was best remembered for his strong opposition to the Western political system. At an NPC [National People's Congress] seminar in 2011, Wu identified five political arrangements that China cannot implement: a multiparty system, pluralistic ideologies, federalism, privatisation, and the separation of powers and bicameralism." "We will absolutely not copy models in the Western political system," he argued.

This raises the question of what the Chinese system is. Is it really superior, and perhaps more importantly, is it fully implemented?

We shall see that it is not.

Recently, 81.com, the website of the People's Liberation Army (PLA), gave Xi Jinping's views on 'time'.

At a time the People's Republic of China (PRC) celebrates its 75th anniversary, the article noted: "These 75 years are destined to be a magnificent historical time in the vast 'time history' of Chinese civilisation."

The PLA website further tells us: "General Secretary Xi Jinping has profound thoughts and profound consciousness about time: thinking about the past, present, and future from a big time perspective, planning the governance of the country on a long time axis, grasping and using time with dialectics, and dedicating precious time to the motherland and the people."

The author of the article adds, "I remind myself all the time to have such a sense of history... The central axis of Beijing is like a historical spine running through ancient and modern times. In the centre of Tiananmen Square, the Monument to the People's Heroes stands tall, [since] September 30, 1949."

Of course the events of June 1989 on the Square have been erased from the collective memory, and Beijing has also forgotten that it has not always been the 'axis' of the world. Further, facts show that the political system in the Middle Kingdom is far from perfect, especially in relation to China's so-called minorities.

Unrest in Minorities' Areas

According to Chen Wenqing, head of the Communist Party's Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission (CPLAC), the Party's top security body, who recently visited Tibet, "Maintaining stability and guarding against independence activities are the top priorities for security personnel in Tibetan areas... Security forces must resolutely crack down on separatist and destructive activities."

He added that the Party must "resolutely manage religious affairs while resolutely protecting normal religious activities, so as to prevent risks, crack down on crimes, and maintain stability."

During his tour, while visiting security units in Lhasa and Chamdo, Chen 'ordered security personnel to carry out more propaganda and education campaigns to increase awareness of national identity among the people of all ethnic groups'.

It means that the Tibetans are first Chinese and eventually Tibetans.

That is not all. Around the same time, Zhang Jun, president of the Supreme People's Court, while inspecting some courts in Tibet, stated that it was necessary to hand down "tough punishment to keep up the pressure on violent terrorism, ethnic separatism, and other serious criminal crimes".

A month earlier, Ying Yong, head of the Supreme People's Procuratorate, while in Lhasa, stressed the need for prosecutors to "harshly crack down on all kinds of separatist infiltration, sabotage activities, and crimes endangering national security in accordance with the law".

What is so superior in this political system where the Tibetans need to be so harshly treated? Of course the Chinese propaganda claims otherwise.

Where is the genuine autonomy asked for by the Dalai Lama?

From September 22 to 28, Wang Junzheng, Party Secretary of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, visited Mongolia and South Korea to 'comprehensively' publicise: "Xi Jinping's diplomatic thought, enhance and deepen cultural and economic exchanges, and jointly create a new situation of win-win cooperation."

Wang praised the People's Republic of China's great achievements during the past 75 years. Later, he went to Korea, where he said that Comrade Xi Jinping "attaches great importance to Tibet work and deeply cares about the people of all ethnic groups in Tibet".

Will China Change?

Some observers believe that time should be given to China to change and progressively evolve into a decent democratic system. They refuse to see that the 'time' is also ticking against the minorities, and in any case, China does not want to change.

Some 40 years ago, I had asked the Dalai Lama how Tibet would regain its independence (or autonomy); at that time, he answered, "It does not depend on us Tibetans; changes will come from within China". He repeatedly said that the people of China will bring about changes in their own country, which will give a chance to the people of Tibet to fulfil their aspirations.

It still seems so far away.

In this context, three letters addressed twenty years ago to then president Hu Jintao by the veteran Tibetan communist leader Phuntsok Wangyal, who had led the Chinese troops into Lhasa in September 1951, should have triggered a larger debate in China. It did not.

Wangyal (known as Phunwang by the Tibetans) told Hu several interesting things: the Dalai Lama's demise would only radicalise young Tibetan hardliners frustrated with his 'middle way' approach; he reminded the then Chinese President about his own objective to establish a harmonious society; and if Hu would strive for the return of hundreds of thousands of exiled Tibetans, he could turn 'confrontation into harmony'.

The Tibetan Flag

Another historical incident involving Wangyal gives an indication of the direction in which the issue could have gone.

In the 1990s, during an interview with Phuntso Tashi Takla, the Dalai Lama's brother-in-law who was in charge of the Tibetan leader's security when the latter visited China in 1954-55, Takla said: "At that time [in 1954] because the Chinese occupation of Tibet was not complete, the Chinese extended full courtesy and cooperation to the Dalai Lama. On some occasions, Mao Zedong came himself to the Dalai Lama's residence [in Beijing]. During one of the several discussions that the Dalai Lama and Mao Zedong had, they were talking on some subject when Mao [suddenly] said, "Don't you have a flag of your own? If you have one, you can hoist it here [on the guest house]".

Takla was surprised to hear Mao Zedong saying this.

When I later read Phunwang's biography, I understood better the incalculable implications of the chairman's statement.

It is worth quoting Phunwang: "One day, Mao unexpectedly came to visit the Dalai Lama at his residence [guest house]... During their conversation, Mao suddenly said, "I heard that you have a national flag, do you? They do not want you to carry it, isn't that right?"

Phunwang further recalled: "Since Mao asked this with no warning that the topic was to be discussed, the Dalai Lama just replied, "We have an army flag". I thought that was a shrewd answer because it didn't say whether Tibet had a national flag. Mao perceived that the Dalai Lama was concerned by his question and immediately told him, "That is no problem. You may keep your national flag". Mao definitely said 'national' flag.

The chairman added that in the future the Communist Party could also let Xinjiang and Inner Mongolia have their own flags. He then asked the Dalai Lama if it would be fine for him to host the national flag of the People's Republic of China in addition to the Tibetan flag. Phunwang says that the young Lama nodded his head and said 'yes': "This was the most important thing that Mao told the Dalai Lama, and I was amazed to hear it," Phunwang later wrote.

The Great Han Chauvinism

Phunwang was not sure if Mao had discussed this with other leaders in the Politburo or if it was his own idea: "As I had always paid great attention to the Soviet Union's nationality model, I was excited because I took Mao's comment that Tibet could use its own flag to mean that China was contemplating adopting the Soviet Union's 'Republic' model, at least for these three large minority nationalities."

Phunwang realised that the innocuous remark of the Great Helmsman had far-reaching consequences for the future of China and particularly for the Tibetans. Unfortunately, Phunwang was arrested in April 1958; he spent the following 18 years in solitary confinement, during which his studies of Marxism led him to believe that the relationship between nationalities in a multiethnic state should be one of complete equality.

Till date, Tibet has only had Han Party secretaries; the Chinese leadership still does not trust the Tibetans and other minorities. Most of the problems faced by China today are due to the Great Han Chauvinism.

Wu Bangguo may have believed that the Chinese system is superior, but minorities have no place in China today, except in the Party's propaganda.

When will we see a Tibetan flag on the Potala in Lhasa?

A Japanese boy was killed in China. Was cyber-nationalism to blame?

14 October 2024, BBC, Tessa Wong and Fan Wang

On a Tuesday morning in September, a 10-year-old boy was approaching the gates of a Japanese school in Shenzhen in southern China, when a stranger walked up and stabbed him.

He died of his injuries. The killing shocked Japan and China, and sparked a diplomatic furore.

The Japanese government said it believed what happened was motivated by xenophobia, with the country's foreign minister blaming the attack on "malicious and anti-Japanese" social media posts.

Online commentators have noted the killing happened on a politically sensitive date – 18 September, which is the anniversary of an incident that led to the Japanese occupation of Manchuria in China in the early 1930s.

For some, what happened is a sign of online nationalism – manifesting in recent years as rising anti-foreigner rhetoric – spilling over into the real world.

For years, posts related to events during World War Two have proliferated on the Chinese internet, with the Japanese invasion during the war remaining a sensitive topic for nationalists on both sides. In China, Japan's wartime atrocities have long been a sore point as Beijing maintains that Tokyo has never fully apologised.

The online posts are part of a wider phenomenon, which encompasses both xenophobia and attacks on Chinese nationals for being unpatriotic. One argument by analysts is that this digital nationalism has gone mostly unchecked by the Chinese government, with online patriotism fanning flames of anti-foreigner sentiment as well as accusations against Chinese figures.

Some are asking if this has gone too far. They have dubbed the online attacks calling Chinese figures unpatriotic a "Cultural Revolution 2.0", the latest in a series of drives ensuring ideological purity. They see echoes of the violent, state-sponsored campaign against so-called enemies of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) that traumatised the country in the 1960 and 1970s. Hundreds of thousands died in purges often led by youth militias known as the Red Guards. Families and neighbours turned on each other.

In a recent essay, author and university professor Zhang Sheng noted that "in the past people summoned the Red Guards, now people summon the 'little pinks'" – a popular nickname for the virtual army of online nationalists.

Anti-foreigner posts

While many on Chinese social media mourned the killing of the Japanese schoolboy, a few cyber-nationalists struck a very different tone.

"I have no opinion on how Japanese die if they don't apologise for history," read one popular comment on Weibo, while another pointed out that the Japanese had killed many Chinese during World War Two "and haven't apologised till this day. How could they be even close to being described as civilised?"

A Chinese official reportedly wrote messages in a private group chat saying it is "not a big deal to kill a Japanese child" and "it's in our regulations to kill Japanese". He has since been placed under investigation, according to local media outlet Phoenix News.

As Japanese officials demanded answers for the "despicable" crime, Beijing sought to play it down, heavily censoring discussion of the incident online and calling it an "accidental, individual case" and an "isolated incident".

But this is the third high-profile attack on foreigners in recent months, all of which China has described as "isolated incidents".

In June, a Japanese mother and her son were attacked at a bus stop outside a Japanese school, and a Chinese woman died while trying to shield them. This happened just weeks after four US university tutors were stabbed in a park in Jilin. While the motives for both attacks were also unclear, they spurred anxious discussion that they were linked to xenophobic rhetoric online.

Online campaigns

It is not just foreigners facing the ire of cyber-nationalists. In recent months, Chinese public figures and companies have also been castigated for being insufficiently patriotic.

Beverage giant Nongfu Spring is considered a Chinese business success story, with its mineral water bottles a ubiquitous sight across the country's convenience stores and restaurant tables. But in March, nationalists accused the company of using Japanese elements in its product design. One of its logos was said to resemble a Shinto temple, while the iconic mineral water bottle's red cap was deemed to be a reference to the Japanese flag.

It resulted in a brief but intense online campaign: some called for a boycott, while videos of people angrily stamping on Nongfu Spring bottles and chucking their drinks down the toilet were all over social media.

Similarly, the author and Nobel Literature Prize laureate Mo Yan was accused of "beautifying" Japanese soldiers and being unpatriotic in his works by a nationalist blogger, who controversially sued the writer for insulting China.

These moves have sparked deep concern. Hu Xijin, the former editor of state-run newspaper Global Times, warned that nationalistic attacks on creatives like Mo Yan could have a chilling effect.

And the outspoken liberal intellectual Yu Jianrong said the recent stabbings of foreigners were fuelled by "dangerous populist tendencies, which deserve our utmost vigilance".

Even state media has accused online nationalists of "making patriotism a business". One commentary by CCP mouthpiece People's Daily said those who "stir up public opinion and add fuel to the flames in order to... gain traffic and make personal gains, should be severely punished".

But the ruling party has had a hand in stoking the fire, some say.

What feeds the fire?

"State-endorsed patriotism" and Beijing's constant warnings about foreign influence has contributed to the "intense nationalism" we see today, says Rose Luqiu, an associate professor at Hong Kong Baptist University's communication school. What has aggravated it, she says, is the legal risk of being deemed unpatriotic.

The Chinese government has now criminalised the "distortion and smearing [of] heroes and martyrs" – this was used in the lawsuit against the author Mo Yan. It has also passed a sweeping anti-espionage law and launched a campaign encouraging the public to report suspicious activity by foreigners.

To legitimise its rule, it has stepped up efforts to strengthen patriotism in schools, where from a young age Chinese children are taught to love not just their country but also the CCP.

Meanwhile, a global surge in Sinophobic sentiment during the Covid pandemic and growing suspicion of China in the West due to trade tensions has fed a sense among some Chinese that their country is being unfairly discriminated against by foreigners.

China's slowing economy and a spreading social malaise have also played a role. "Many people in China are confronted with severe social and economic worries. Inflation, housing crises, youth unemployment, and evaporating pensions are all causing anxieties. Nationalism is a readily available and highly potent framework for venting those frustrations," says Florian Schneider, an expert in online Chinese nationalism at Leiden University.

All these factors have resulted in nationalist bloggers becoming a prominent fixture of the Chinese internet in the last few years. Well-known influencers can amass millions of followers – and potentially earn income from the traffic – by pumping out patriotic content extolling the virtues of China and the CCP while denouncing their enemies.

While they often act in the name of revolutionary leftist fervour, their behaviour is actually more similar to the far right found in other countries who lead xenophobic and reactionary movements, Professor Schneider tells the BBC.

As “populists who are trying to make China great again”, they “harbour hopes of returning society to some imagined former glory, and see all manner of elites and foreign powers as roadblocks to this goal”.

A risky balance

Sometimes authorities appear to listen to concerns.

In July, they quietly dropped a controversial amendment to a national security law after a public outcry. They acknowledged that a proposed ban on “hurting Chinese people’s feelings” could “infringe upon the legitimate rights and normal life of the public”.

Chinese social media platforms have tried to rein in online nationalists by periodically suspending their accounts.

Well-known nationalist influencers Sima Nan and Guyanmuchan have been censored without warning. So was the blogger who tried to sue Mo Yan, whose lawsuit was also rejected by the courts.

One vlogger, who shot to notoriety this year after he posted a video accusing a shopping mall of putting up decorations that resembled the Japanese flag, was similarly shut down. A scathing state media commentary denounced his video as “a malicious report that rides on the online traffic of patriotism”.

Still, authorities appear to have a loose grip on online nationalists.

While dissenters are swiftly shut down or in some cases arrested in the name of social stability, nationalist bloggers are allowed a freer rein, despite their sometimes inflammatory rhetoric. State media has even boosted these voices by republishing their content.

The BBC has asked the Chinese government for a response on why nationalist content does not appear to be censored on social media as much as other content deemed sensitive.

That could be down to the fact the state views online nationalism as a useful safety valve to “dissipate dissent in a way that does not undermine its authority”, particularly during its current economic troubles, where “society really needs an outlet to express frustration”, says Dr Luqiu.

By encouraging nationalists and then occasionally reining them in, the government “harnesses nationalism to its advantage, only intervening when it risks spilling over” into an uncontrollable situation.

It may seem risky, but Beijing has successfully crushed serious challenges to its authority in recent years, such as the pro-democracy movement in Hong Kong in 2019 and the White Paper protests in 2022 against harsh zero-Covid policies.

The government is thus confident it can manage the dangers, and it means nationalism is likely to stay despite the backlash, analysts say.

“Nationalism is a mixed blessing for China’s leaders, and at the moment we are witnessing the costs of that,” says Professor Schneider.

“But will the leadership rethink or even abandon its nationalism in favour of something less toxic? I wouldn’t hold my breath.”

Don’t play Big Brother, be nuanced with a long view Columnists

14 October 2024, Deccan Chronicle, Pavan Varma

The Narendra Modi government has declared that it will pursue a “Neighborhood First” policy. How has it fared, is there any undisputed yardstick to judge its efficacy, and what are the constraints on even well-intentioned measures to make it succeed? To my mind, we need to avoid knee-jerk evaluations because South Asia must rank as one of the most troubled regions in the world. Any evaluation must be holistic, not piece-meal, nor restricted to any specific time phase or incident. In this broader perspective, there are certain unalterable coordinates which are constant, and have to be factored in.

India has a land border with seven countries – Bangladesh (4,096 km), China (3,485 km), Pakistan (3,310 km), Nepal (1,752 km), Myanmar (1,643 km), Bhutan (578 km), and Afghanistan – through Pakistan Occupied Kashmir (106 km). With Pakistan and China, the border is disputed and a source of perennial military friction. Resolution is not easy, because the demands from them are beyond acceptance. Pakistan claims all of Jammu and Kashmir, and China, apart from illegally occupying Aksai Chin, claims the whole of Arunachal Pradesh, which it calls “South Tibet”. China’s consistent policy with India is engagement with containment. In pursuit of this, it periodically flexes its military muscle on the border, most recently in Ladakh, where it appears to have forcibly occupied territory ahead of the recognised Line of Actual Control, even as trade with it balloons (with India facing a huge trade deficit), and high-level visits continue. Pakistan exports organised terror into J&K, and elsewhere. There are problems with other countries, too. From Bangladesh there is illegal immigration, with Myanmar smuggling of drugs and arms – clearly visible in the ongoing crisis in Manipur, and with Nepal counter-claims on border demarcation. Also Read - Dilip Cherian | EC’s mixed signals: Two poll-bound states, but contrasting decisions It does not help that many of our territorial neighbours are politically unstable. In Pakistan, where the military and the ISI are de facto rulers, the country is currently in the grip of violent civil unrest as, following an obviously rigged election that brought in the Shehbaz Sharif government, supporters of jailed Imran Khan are on the streets seeking his release. Bangladesh is in turmoil after the fall of the Sheikh Hasina government, with Islamic fundamentalism on the rise. In Nepal, Communist Party-led coalition governments are constantly wobbly. And insurgency grappling Myanmar, ruled by a repressive military junta, has left us with the Rohingya refugees.

India also has a very long coastline of over 7,000 km. We share maritime borders with Sri Lanka and Maldives, and from Andaman-Nicobar, with Thailand, Indonesia, and Myanmar. In Sri Lanka, a new government led by the left leaning Anura Dissanayake has recently won the election. In Maldives, the openly pro-China President, Mohamed Muizzu, is in the saddle. As a general stratagem, India must further strengthen its coastline defences. We should never forget that the Pakistani terrorists who wreaked havoc in Mumbai on November 26, 2008, literally walked into the financial capital unopposed.

China's consistent meddling in the region creates additional problems. Pakistan is its staunch ally, and the possibility of India facing a two-front simultaneous war against both these implacably hostile countries can never be ruled out. In Nepal, Chinese influence has grown exponentially through the Communist parties, and economic incentives. China has emerged, too, as Sri Lanka's largest creditor, financing several large infrastructure projects, including the strategic Hambantota port. India, as the largest and most powerful country in the region, is indispensable to its neighbours. But often the old saying kicks in: "Why do you hate me? I have not helped you." Many neighbours are suspicious that India uses its overlapping historical, cultural and ethnic ties to interfere in their internal affairs. Sometimes our intervention is asked for, such as in the creation of Bangladesh (1971), the involvement of the Indian Peace Keeping Force (IPKF) in Sri Lanka (1987-90) to resolve the Tamil conflict, and the quelling of the coup against President Gayoom of Maldives (1988). But even so, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh and Nepal are sensitive to any Indian internal interference, and often anti-India sentiments are fuel for their internal politics. Often, our foreign policy also lacks nuance and finesse. An illustrative example of this is the blockade of the border with Nepal, during Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's government (1989), and again under PM Modi in 2015. In fact, I initiated a short duration discussion in the Rajya Sabha in 2015 on the adverse political and humanitarian consequences of this insensitive step, which gave a fillip to pro-China and anti-India sentiments. The priority must always be to build trust, and even while providing economic assistance, which we do, never perceive to be acting like a "big brother". Secondly, we have to be exceptionally vigilant to the unceasing machinations of China, upgrade our counter-intelligence, and reinforce our age-old ties with new and innovative ways of cooperation. A good example of this is our assistance in building Bhutan's 10,000 MW hydro-electric power capacity. We buy the power; Bhutan gets the revenue; it is a long-term and institutionalised win-win situation for both countries, and a break to China's long-term interest in acquiring a strategic toe-hold in the kingdom. Thirdly, we must discreetly maintain avenues of communication with all sides of the political spectrum in these countries. In Bangladesh, we put all our eggs in Sheikh Hasina's pro-India but authoritarian rule, and must now face the consequences. Fourthly, we must continue to strengthen our military prowess to counter Pakistan and China. We have been woefully negligent in this regard for decades, but progress is being made now and the momentum needs to be accelerated. A militarily strong India is essential for its leadership in its backyard. Our neighbours cannot ignore us. Maldivian President Muizzu may have visited China first, but in his recent visit to India, he accepted an Indian bail-out, including a currency swap agreement, substantial financial assistance and the inauguration of a runway. The role of religion, too, is part of our neighbourhood cauldron. If India is seen to be insensitive to its Muslim minority, it provides grist to anti-India politics in the region. Similarly, the treatment of the Hindu minority in Pakistan and Bangladesh is a source of friction. India's diplomacy must show patience, maturity and a long-term vision. There are no short-cut solutions, and, therefore, no pat evaluations.

PRC Positive Messaging Frames Successful Colonization in Xinjiang

13 October 2024, The Jamestown Foundation, Niva Yua

I have lost count of how many times foreign experts have asked me if Central Asians care about the abuses happening in Xinjiang. The Turkic territory, now part of the People's Republic of China (PRC), is known locally as East Turkestan. Once part of Central Asia, the language of its people shares the same heritage as those of the wider region, and its food, culture, and religion are similarly inseparable. What divides Xinjiang from Central Asia is not just the mountainous border but a colonization project that has continued, and in some cases accelerated, even as the rest of the region has begun to move in the opposite direction, decolonizing 30 years after independence from the Soviet Union. This background makes a huge difference. Transitional Central Asian states have not popularized, or even formed, a consensus over the many tragedies from the period of Soviet colonization. Despite an awareness of the PRC's abuses on the other side of the border, these states have not made sense of them as colonial policies. Instead, they have been susceptible to the PRC's positive messaging programs and shaping of the region's information environment (Jamestown Perspectives, September 4).

'Jongugu Sapar' Blends Soviet Nostalgia to Tout Ethnic Harmony

Jongugu Sapar (Джунгого сапар/"Travel to China"), a successful daily PRC propaganda show in the Kyrgyz Republic, is a good example of the PRC's positive messaging. The show has broadcast the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) economic and social activities in Xinjiang since the early 2000s. A nationally representative opinion survey completed by the Central Asia Barometer in the summer of 2022 found that 576 out of 1000 respondents reported knowledge of the show. Of those, nearly all had previously watched the show, and 70 percent found the content "favorable (нравится)." [1] In my informal conversations with Chinese-speaking Kyrgyz students, I was surprised to find that many had first learned about the PRC from the show and not from school textbooks.

We installed a small TV in our Bishkek office and watched the show each day for several months as part of a team activity. The presenter, an ethnic Kyrgyz woman from Xinjiang, speaks a Kyrgyz dialect mixed with a smattering of Mandarin Chinese words. My local colleagues sometimes found her diction incomprehensible. Still, they found her monotone delivery, stiff movements, and narrow range of facial expressions, as well as the overall presentation of the show, very nostalgic and reminiscent of Soviet-era broadcasts.

The show centers on themes of ethnic harmony, yet it depicts a clear divide between the Turkic population and the Han Chinese. Stories focused on Zhang Qian (張騫) and Ban Chao (班超), two Han Chinese diplomats celebrated for their significant contribution to Xinjiang, is the narrative the CCP uses to assert legitimate Han Chinese rule over the region. Not once were Turkic peoples' cultural and historical heroes mentioned. Similarly, we never saw Turkic people speaking their native language to one another. All conversations began in Mandarin, only to be dubbed into Kyrgyz seconds later. Sinicized names of villages and towns were used repeatedly. No Islamic names were depicted at any point. Instead, the show highlighted archaeological findings suggesting a Buddhist presence and framed excavated artifacts as representations of Han Chinese life.

The Turkic population interviewed in the show were consistently portrayed in low-skilled roles such as farmers and seamstresses. Han Chinese, meanwhile, appeared as business owners, managers, lead engineers, or industrial specialists. Every archaeologist interviewed was Han Chinese. Only in select fields, like wildlife and forest conservation, traditional medicine, artisanal crafts, and ethnic cuisine, were members of the Turkic population shown in senior positions. This stark lack of elite Turkic representation reinforced an impression of Han superiority over the Turkic population.

Viewers See 'Resettlement Labor Programs' as Positive Economic Development

A striking departure from this subtle messaging were the stories about resettlement labor programs. The show featured unemployed women and those in rural areas who had enrolled in short-term vocational schools to learn skills such as sewing and gardening, eventually "graduating into employment" at factories and greenhouses in newly established settlements. In these settlements, an acute power dynamic was on display between the Han Chinese and the Turkic population. Senior roles such as teachers, library managers, metro administrators, hospital directors, and heads of elderly homes were all occupied by Han Chinese. One scene in particular left us uneasy: a group of Turkic women in striped pajamas, seated in a small room of bunkbeds, expressed gratitude to Han Chinese doctors for taking good care of them.

The resettlement labor programs described on the show bore an uncomfortable resemblance to the findings of Tomoya Obokata, the United Nation's Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, who concluded in a July 2022 report that forced labor among ethnic populations in Xinjiang has been occurring in sectors such as agriculture and manufacturing (UNHRC, July 19, 2022; see China Brief, February 14).

Viewers in the Kyrgyz Republic did not interpret what they saw this way. In follow-up in-depth interviews conducted between August 2022 and February 2023, we asked selected survey respondents who had seen the program for their thoughts on the show. Many framed what they saw positively, connecting it to their memories of the Soviet Union—a collectivist society they believed had been successful. A 66-year-old male government worker told us that the "hardworking people" depicted reminded him of those who "worked tirelessly" during the Soviet era. "We used to work like that," he continued. "We were brought up to be hardworking. China encourages people to work hard ... that's why China is economically developing."

The inability to perceive the CCP's actions in Xinjiang as colonialism is closely tied to a similar lack of recognition of the Soviet Union as a colonial power. This shared historical perspective is a key factor behind the success of the PRC's positive messaging about Xinjiang in the Kyrgyz Republic and across the region. The show not only reinforces an appealing image of Xinjiang but also strengthens local consensus around the success of China's economy. This sentiment echoed even among those who did not grow up under the Soviet Union, however. Some of these people believed that the collectivist regime had been a success. A 23-year-old female government worker told us, "Through this program, I learned that people in China are very hardworking." She added that it seemed to her that the program was showing "the life of Kyrgyz people in the old days, perhaps under the USSR," particularly in the people's style of speech and the program's overall content.

Conclusion

As long as the region remains in a transitional phase and is unable to decolonize fully, these sentiments are likely to be passed on to the next generation, who will continue to consume the PRC's positive messaging. The irony is that the rhetoric of decolonization has long been part and parcel of the PRC's overseas messaging. In Africa, for example, the PRC has deployed anti-colonial rhetoric for decades. In Central Asia, however, it remains silent on the issue. This suggests a normative hollowness and deep pragmatism to the PRC's political communications. In each country, it aligns its positive messaging with specific foreign policy objectives, tailoring its content to resonate with the local population and regional context.

Building a Historical Narrative of Tibet

13 October 2024, Tricycle, Mike Sheffield

Two of the minds behind The Animated History of Tibet talk with Tricycle about the show's creation, pivotal figures, and what it means to tell the story from a distinctively Tibetan perspective.

For more than two hundred years, the Tibetan Empire was one of the greatest military, political, and cultural forces in all of Central Asia, maybe even the entire world, ruling over a vast territory that included parts of modern-day Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Burma, China, India, Nepal, Pakistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan and making seemingly countless contributions to the spheres of philosophy and religion. "The things that they translated from Sanskrit to Tibetan and the lands they occupied are immense," says Tenzin Choephel. Choephel is the lead cultural consultant on The Animated History of Tibet, an nine-part animated documentary miniseries that covers over thirteen hundred years of history, starting with the rise of the Tibetan Empire, its subsequent fragmentation, and the first spread of Buddhism to Tibet in the 7th century CE. Currently available to watch as part of Tricycle's Film Club, the series is engaging, entertaining, and gorgeously animated in fastidious anime-inspired detail, created with the intention of being accessible to the average viewer as well as potentially serving as a resource for those studying Tibet, Tibetan Buddhism, and world history.

Produced by the independent educational video production company and YouTube wormhole favorites Armchair Academics, the series—led by showrunner and host Alexander K. Smith—aims to show a different side of the Tibetan Empire story, one told from a distinctively Tibetan perspective. I recently talked with Choephel and Smith about what went into the creation of the project, the tricky business of crafting accessible narratives around real-world history, and the goals and aspirations behind their grassroots-funded endeavor.

—Mike Sheffield, web editor

This interview was adapted for clarity and concision.

Mike Sheffield (MS): Can you tell me a little bit about the origins of this project?

Alexander K. Smith (AS): The Animated History of Tibet has been a brainchild of mine for ages. I remember pitching it to a friend as hypothetical, when I was a master's student at Oxford fifteen years ago, but started taking it seriously in 2022. I lost my job at the height of Covid (I had been working as an assistant professor in Germany). So I then started working in educational documentary filmmaking, and I realized at some point that I actually had the resources to make it happen. We put together a crowdfunding campaign with no real expectations that it would work, and it took off. Then Tibet House US came in, in New York; they are our coproducers on the project. We're in a second period of crowdfunding right now to finance the second half of the series.

MS: How did the team come to be?

AS: At Armchair Academics, I worked with a gaggle of freelance animators. Our core team is actually Mongolian, based in Ulaanbaatar. Saraa Amber is the lead animator on the project; she has been a hugely positive influence on the whole thing. In the early stages, for matte paintings, we worked with a very talented Tibetan studio artist named Tenzin Gyurmey, who is based in New Delhi. Over time, Amber brought in some of her colleagues from Mongolia. And then there is Tenzin Choephel. He is the cultural and linguistic consultant. If this were a $150 million Disney project, you would call him the head of our brain trust and he would be leading a team of fifty people making sure that every single detail works. But for our project, our brain trust is just him and me.

Tenzin Choephel (TC): Alex and I met for the first time in 2015. We both attended the International Seminar of Young Tibetologists conference in Leipzig, Germany. Then I think I ran into him a couple times in Oxford.

MS: Tenzin, I see you run your own online Tibetan language school called LopLao. How did you get involved in education?

TC: I've taught Tibetan in many different places. I left home when I was very young and eventually came to India when I was 13. There, I enrolled in a Buddhist monastery called Drepung Monastery, where I was mostly studying English, Buddhism, debate, and philosophy. Later, I came to Dharamsala, in the north of India, where I enrolled in Sera Jey Monastic University, which is maybe the best Tibetan Studies university in India. I was there for four years, and then they asked me to teach there for a year, and I started teaching Tibetan—Tibetan history as well as Tibetan language—when I was 22. After that, I taught Tibetan at a nunnery called the International Buddhist Women's Association. Then I came to Oxford in 2017, where I studied and taught, and later, in 2019, I taught at SOAS University before starting LopLao. I've also taught at various Buddhist centers, including the first and largest Tibetan Centre and Buddhist Monastery in the West called Kagyu Samye Ling.

MS: What does your Buddhist practice look like?

TC: I still do daily practices, my set of prayers. I study at the University of Edinburgh, and we have a Buddhist society where we do meditations twice a week, and I'm the president of that small society. I do practice Buddhism quite a lot, but I approach it in a way that is more philosophical than devoutly religious. I'm more interested in philosophy than just believing in something, but I also don't disregard the whole belief system. In general, I would say I'm a Buddhist.

MS: What does it mean to be the linguistic or cultural consultant on a project like The Animated History of Tibet?

TC: My job is to correct the style of animation, making corrections in the style of dress or addressing cultural or historical points from a Tibetan perspective, as when the script doesn't have the narratives that we generally agree upon in Tibetan history. It is mostly to push a more Tibetan-centered narrative of Tibetan history.

AS: He's worked quite a bit with our Western animators to make sure that the details were on point, but there have been a few mistakes. One notable example, and this is my fault, is at one point, there's a prayer wheel that's spinning in the wrong direction. But that was because I actually did all of my doctoral fieldwork, and lived for a very long time, in Bonpo communities, where things tend to be done in the opposite direction. And it just felt right to me, but it's something that doesn't read right to Buddhists.

MS: That was one point I wanted to bring up, actually. This series is incredibly detailed, but because it is such a large undertaking, it covers a lot of ground in a short period of time and there are some aspects of the history that are missing, like the influence of Bon or indigenous religion on Tibetan Buddhism. How did you decide what to include over what to omit?

AS: There are two parts to my answer. I trained and worked as a historian, not a generalist—it was very laser-focused on a particular period in Tibetan history, on Bonpo issues, specifically. With that training, it's very difficult to reframe the sort of academic scholarly history that we read, that we write, that we're taught, and reformat that for something that is public-facing and serialized and aimed at a general audience. Episodes have to stand on their own as well as be integrated into a larger narrative that spans centuries at a time. So we begin each episode always by laying out the major players, the major factions, what's at stake, and then you have to build some type of denouement to build a satisfying narrative to keep people watching. History doesn't work that way. Very often, there are not satisfying conclusions.

What you have to do is take that scholarly history and then run it through a narrative lens that is algorithmically friendly for something like YouTube. And that's hard. It's particularly hard for Tibet. In Roman history, this has been done a thousand times by a thousand different people, and there are many different road maps to follow. But we don't really have that for Tibet, certainly not in television and film. We're kind of reinventing the wheel. It's easier for certain periods, and much more difficult for others.

I bulldoze some of the complexity, particularly with issues like Yungdrung Bon and the indigenous elements that conflicted with Buddhist culture. Leaving those out is something I did to my chagrin, but it was done for entirely economic purposes—just budgeting our time.

It's really a shame to gloss over the indigenous elements in Tibetan Buddhism, because they're one of the things that accounts for the fact that it's so baroque and rich and so tangibly different from the traditions that surrounded it, and the way that they blended or sometimes didn't blend and conflicted with forms of Indian Buddhism. But it's something I would love to come back to.

Tibetan history is a living, open-ended history; it continues.

The easiest thing for us to do was to latch on to later Tibetan histories, focus on the great chos rgyal, or dharma kings, of Tibet and structure the history in that way. Now, we deal with a materialistic, economic, and political style of analysis. You lose a lot of things with that structure, and one of the major things you lose particularly with someone like Songtsen Gampo is the complexity of his early reign, the interclan alliances and conflicts, the early stirrings of religious conflict and anti-Buddhist sentiment. I tried to compensate for that in the third episode, where you have on figures like Langdarma, who sort of leads an anti-Buddhist faction in the aristocracy, and, according to Tibetan religious narratives, orchestrates this massive purge of Tibetan Buddhism or a withdrawal of patronage that led to a systemic collapse of monastic institutions.

MS: What kind of sources are you drawing from?

AS: As a historian, I draw from primary sources in my work, so we do draw quite a bit from primary sources. Our general lens tends to be materialist, to deemphasize the religious history and dig more deeply into the political, economic, and cultural history of Tibet. It's a slightly different lens from what you see in some of the Western and more religiously oriented histories of Tibet. As for secondary sources, there's a lack of very comprehensive general histories of Tibet. There are some really good ones, like Tsepon W. D. Shakabpa's Tibet: A Political History, Sam van Schaik's Tibet: A History, and Matthew T. Kapstein's The Tibetans, which has just a couple of chapters that concisely provide a balanced overview of Tibetan history. But to actually do our work, we have to draw from a patchwork of era-specific histories, because there are lacunae and gaps when you're dealing with Tibetan sources. For the imperial period, Christopher Beckwith has this fantastic, almost unreadable, multilingual history of the Tibetan Empire called The Tibetan Empire in Central Asia. We also use Ronald M. Davidson's Tibetan Renaissance for later periods. And that continues all the way up to the 19th and 20th centuries, when it becomes more difficult to find a single source to hang your narrative on because there are so many sectarian and political interests that overlap with the production of histories and texts, so you have to be more heterogeneous and more holistic in your approach to the literature. I'm not so interested in building Chinese state narratives, for example, into our history. So we take a roundup of perspectives on the events of 1949–1959 that come from Tibetan authors and Tibetan sources.

MS: As you mentioned, your series stops in 1959, but Tibetan history doesn't stop there.

AS: The history we have on offer technically ends in 1963, with the drafting of The Charter of the Tibetans in Exile. But the history of Tibet, the history of Tibetan Buddhism, didn't stop in '49 and it didn't stop in '59. We have an extended bit at the end that focuses on the major diaspora camps and how they grew and evolved over time, where they are, and the character of each of them—because they're all quite different—as well as the emergence of two Tibets. There is the Tibet that still persists, right inside the TAR [Tibet Autonomous Region]. That's where most Tibetans live, and they still carry their culture, their language, their religion. But that language, culture, and religion has also continued and also evolved in an almost parallel way in India.

Tibetan history is a living, open-ended history; it continues.

MS: Who is a pivotal figure from Tibetan history that you would like to shine a light on?

TC: People should read Tsongkhapa. I normally say Tsongkhapa is the Immanuel Kant of Tibet. He's so sharp, and his disposition on emptiness is extremely deep. It would be great if people could study Tsongkhapa just as people study Plato or Immanuel Kant or John Locke. He also wrote poems, which are beautiful.

Thupten Jinpa is the main translator of the Dalai Lama, and he's written a biography of Tsongkhapa that's quite interesting. The way he presents Tsongkhapa is a very modern style of presenting Tsongkhapa. In the past, Tibetan monasteries presented Tsongkhapa as a celestial being, but Jinpa writes about him as very much a human being. And he is human; he lived from 1357 to 1419, perished at 62.

MS: What do you consider to be the main goal of the series?

AS: For me, let's say that there are two. In general, many Tibetan issues—whether it's Buddhism or Tibetan cultural and political issues—are not visible in online discourse on platforms like YouTube. I saw this as a way to simultaneously help increase the visibility of Tibet-related content on platforms like YouTube while also building a historically accurate resource that my former colleagues in Tibetan studies and other educators and students can use to learn about Tibet.

My second goal as a documentary filmmaker is to tell stories of indigenous and marginalized peoples. So I would love to make more stories about Tibetan groups, also the history of Buddhism itself, right? There are very few sort of public-facing cultural histories of Buddhism. Why does Buddhism look so different across so many cultures? How has it evolved over time? How are the major branches of Buddhism different from one another, and why? The idea of tying these threads and discourses together to give you a historical and activist angle could become a great service to the Buddhist community. To bridge those two goals would be really personally valuable to me as a creator.

TC: Most people have this image of Tibet that is always very humble, very nice. They are not 100 percent wrong, obviously, but they are not 100 percent right. There are Tibetans who are warriors, Tibetans who are thieves, Tibetans who are bandits. There are Tibetans who dedicate their lives to Buddhist practices, and we can probably call them bodhisattvas. It all depends who they are.

When I first came to Oxford, I remember that some of my friends were surprised when I told them that the Tibetan Empire once invaded China for fifteen days. They wondered how that could be possible because China is now so big. But when you look at the history of the Tibetan empire, for, let's say, two hundred years, it was so glorious. Younger Tibetans should understand how big it was and how influential it was. You can still see the remnants of the Tibetan Empire today, in Ladakh, in Kashag, in Manali, in northern India, in southeast China. You can even find Tibetan descendants in Afghanistan, you can find Tibetan descendants in Pakistan; they even speak an altered form of Tibetan.

The second thing that I wanted to do is to provide some of the truths, or the understanding of Tibet to people who are interested or maybe haven't even heard of Tibet, or just heard about Tibet and know nothing about it. Obviously, the Chinese narrative of Tibet is much stronger on the international platform because they have much bigger funding to promote and advance it. So this project is structured to go against that narrative. Truth is a relative thing, but we have bigger authority over Tibetan history than the Chinese.

Every country projects a sanitized version of history. This may also have some sanitization because, as you say, history is a lie, or we write history to talk about ourselves and it will be revised. We write history to understand ourselves.

Human rights take a new hit in Xi Jinping's Tibet

13 October 2024, The Sunday Guardian ,Vijay Kranti

200 students have been taken away from a Tibetan school and force-enrolled in a state-controlled residential school for their education and 'proper' upbringing.

Earlier this month, the parents of about 200 Tibetan children in the age group 15 to 18 years were in for a shock when they were forced by the Chinese authorities of Sichuan province to enroll and send their wards to the state-controlled residential school for their education and "proper" upbringing. These children belonged to the local Lhamo Kirti Monastery School, which was founded as a community initiative by the monastery in 1993 to part education in Tibetan language and Tibetan culture but was forcibly closed by the Chinese authorities in July this year. Soon after the closure, a batch of about 300 Tibetan children belonging to the 6-14 age group was taken away and admitted in a newly opened residential school despite strong resistance from their families.

The new school, run by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is among hundreds of similar residential schools that have been established across Tibet by the Chinese government to implement President Xi's diktat to ensure a "united" and "homogenous" society with "Chinese socialist characters". These schools are dreaded by Tibetan parents because Tibetan children are not only weaned away from their Tibetan environment but are made to grow up in a typical Han Chinese environment in which they can communicate only in the Chinese language and are brainwashed with the Communist ideology.

On February 6, 2023, a study by a group of UN experts had warned that around a million Tibetan children were being affected by Chinese government policies aimed at assimilating Tibetan people culturally, religiously, linguistically and ideologically through the residential school system. This Chinese move has already attracted strong opposition and condemnation in the parliaments of Germany, Canada and the European Parliament whereas the US government has placed restrictions of all such Chinese officials and CCP leaders who are engaged in these Tibetan residential schools.

President Xi's campaign of brainwashing and "homogenizing" the entire Tibetan generation through CCP-run residential schools has grown out of his frustration that despite CCP's seven-decade long colonial rule over Tibet and total absence of exiled Dalai Lama's influence, the Tibetan resistance against Chinese rule has refused to die. The worst shock for Xi has been that since his taking over the reins of China as its "Paramount Leader", more than 157 Tibetan monks, nuns and ordinary youths have committed self-immolation demanding freedom for Tibet and return of Dalai Lama.

In early 2023, the Xi government's campaign of collecting blood samples of each Tibetan citizen and their DNA profiling raised a huge controversy and protests at international levels. The main concern of human rights organizations and experts was that China was building a scientific medical data bank of Tibetans to support its ongoing illegal trade in human organs. It was also feared that the Chinese army can use this data for forcible blood donations in the event of a war. America's Thermo Fisher Scientific Company had to face a massive opposition from international organizations for supplying its biomedical products and instruments to the Chinese government in this unethical campaign.

President Xi's frustration against his Tibetan colonial subjects has frequently found expression in many other aggressive acts like implementing stricter ban on keeping the present Dalai Lama's photos; disciplinary proceedings against all such Tibetan officials and CCP cadres who are found participating in community religious celebrations or family prayers; demolition of all such Buddhist statues in every town or village where the statue dominates the skyline or is visible from a distance; closing and demolishing all community run Tibetan schools; and wiping out all such Buddhist community establishments which have evolved without official plans.

For example, following the typical Taliban style of demolishing historic Buddhist statues at Bamian in Afghanistan, Xi's government demolished two massive statues of Buddha, one being 99 feet high, in the Kham region of original Tibet, now a part of the Sichuan province of China. Similarly, a massive Buddhist community, which was slowly developed by thousands of Tibetan and Han Chinese practitioners in Larung Gar in the Larung Valley of Sertar County in Sichuan, was completely pulled down and wiped out under the personal supervision of Wong Dongshen, a prominent CCP leader on the pretext of "environment protection". Interestingly Wong was also responsible for demolishing above mentioned Buddha statues.

Caught in India-China clashes, Ladakh's nomadic herders fear for future

12 October 2024, Aljazeera, Priyanka Shankar

Constant military patrols near the Indo-China border in Ladakh have shrunk pastures and are extinguishing an ancient way of life.

The bubbling sound of water boiling on the stove and the aroma of spinach dal fill the air in Tashi Angmo's kitchen as she rolls dough to make a type of Tibetan bread.

"This is a dish which we call timok in Ladakh and tingmo across the border in Tibet," she says as she prepares the apparatus to steam the dough she has rolled into balls resembling dumplings. "It's a delicious meal after a hard day's work."

Angmo, 51, lives in Chushul, a village which sits at an altitude of 4,350 metres (14,270 feet) in India's Ladakh, one of the highest regions in the world, known for its pristine rivers and lakes, high valleys and mountains and clear skies. Chushul also lies about 8 kilometres (5 miles) from India's Line of Actual Control with China, the disputed, de facto border between the two countries.

"I was around 11 years old when I realised that my family and I lived very close to the Chinese border. Back then, we used to be a family of shepherds, and I often went near the border with my father, to take our sheep herding," Angmo says.

She now works as a labourer doing a variety of tasks from cleaning roads to helping with construction and cooking meals for other workers, for the Border Roads Organisation – the Indian Defence Ministry's initiative to maintain roads in the subcontinent's border areas.

"We even used to trade apricots and barley which grew in our village with the Chinese shepherds. In return, we brought back chicken, some Chinese cookies and also teapots!" she exclaims and points to the teapots which she still keeps in her kitchen cabinet.

Even the Sino-India war in 1962 over border and territorial disputes between the neighbours, after New Delhi had given shelter to the Dalai Lama and other Tibetan refugees, did not undo that delicate balance.

What did was a deadly clash in the summer of 2020. As the world was absorbed in its battle against the COVID-19 pandemic, Indian and Chinese soldiers fought with sticks, stones and their bare hands along the Line of Actual Control in Ladakh's Galwan valley. Each side claimed that the other's troops had crossed into their territory. The close combat fighting led to the death of 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese soldiers. These were the first deaths along the border in decades.

Since then, both sides have stepped up border patrols and moved troops to the region, and their troops have occasionally engaged in standoffs.

In many Ladakhi villages bordering China, grazing and farming close to the frontier has now been restricted by the Indian military. Boating in the pristine Pangong Tso lake, parts of which are claimed by both New Delhi and Beijing, has also been restricted to only military boats.

"We can't go near the border any more or trade with Chinese people. Shepherds – most of whom are nomads – have also lost land close to the border since the Indian military oversees the area," she says.

The land has largely been swallowed by military buffer zones on both sides of the border, with rich pasture land for 2km in either direction now a no-go zone for the herders.

Young nomads and farmers moving away

Donning a pink scarf and a grey sweater, Kunjan Dolma, who is in her late 30s, belongs to the Changpa community – seminomadic Tibetan people who live in the Changtang plateau in eastern Ladakh. She lives in Chushul during the winter months and is nomadic throughout the rest of the year.

Dolma tells Al Jazeera that the land near the Chinese border is an important winter pasture for their animals. "But if we take our sheep and goats near the Chinese border, the military stops us and advises us to find grazing lands elsewhere. We have lost important pastures in recent years, but we have begun adjusting to the restrictions," she says as she milks her sheep in an open-air shed built with stones and surrounded by the low-lying mountains.

"In a way, the military restrictions also make sense. They protect us from the Chinese soldiers who I fear might take away our sheep in case we go very close to the border."

Dolma lives with her husband and teenage daughter and the family has about 200 sheep whose wool they sell to make pashmina shawls. It is an important source of income, she explains.

She spends days in the mountains to ensure their yaks and sheep have access to the best grazing lands during the warmer months of the year. The Changpa community retreats to the villages in the lower-lying hills of Ladakh during winter. She earns her living selling pashmina wool, and yak meat and milk.

But Dolma's daughter, like many young people from the nomadic families of the Changtang plateau, has begun turning to other professions to earn a living. Dolma added that military restrictions on grazing land have also increased the momentum of young nomads turning away from this traditional way of life.

Sipping on a cup of warm water before she heads to the mountains to make her cattle graze, Dolma reminisces about her younger days when border tensions did not exist in their lands.

"I've spent many joyful days in these mountains with my sheep and when there were no border restrictions, it was very easy for us to take our cattle across pastures. We would also interact with nomads from China who were very friendly," she says, adding that she wishes her daughter could experience that same nomadic lifestyle.

At the Ladakh Autonomous Hill Development Council (LAHDC), an administrative body in the union territory's capital of Leh, Konchok Stanzin, 37, is a councillor working with the village leaders in Chushul to ensure local governance runs smoothly.

Speaking to Al Jazeera at the LAHDC headquarters, Stanzin acknowledges the issues nomads in Ladakh have been enduring due to border tensions.

"Grazing land comes under the buffer zone which is currently no-man's land. So, nomads face a challenging situation, trying to figure out where to take their yaks and sheep. Besides land, we also face difficulties in Pangong Tso where military border controls continue," Stanzin explains. Tso is the Tibetan word for lake.

"[Young people] migrating out of their villages in search of work is a serious concern," he noted. "This is also leading to the disappearance of nomadic traditions like herding which enable the production of pashmina. So we are trying to educate the youth to continue their traditions while also working on improving the economic situation in border villages."

'I still remember the Chinese cookies'

As he enjoys a cup of Ladakhi staple butter tea in his mother Tashi Angmo's kitchen, Tsering Stopgais, 25, notes that generating jobs is the biggest challenge for the region.

"There once was an open trading route between India and China along this border. If that opens again, it will be a huge economic opportunity for many of us," he says.

"My grandfather has crossed the border to trade with China and earned well. My mother used to also go near the border and trade with the Chinese. I still remember the Chinese cookies she would bring home."

Angmo chimes in, saying the border clashes are all political.

"Social media also plays a role in spreading rumours about border tensions. In reality, it is not an active war zone and it is peaceful right now. It is a standoff between politicians and not people on either side of the border," Angmo says.

On the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly meeting in New York in September, India's Minister of External Affairs S Jaishankar addressed the situation in eastern Ladakh and said: "Right now, both sides have troops who are deployed forward."

At an event organised by the Asia Society Policy Institute, a think tank in New York, he continued: "Some of the (border) patrolling issues need to be resolved," highlighting that this aspect would solve the dispute.

Retired Senior Colonel Zhou Bo, who was in the People's Liberation Army (PLA) of China and is now a senior fellow of the Centre for International Security and Strategy at Tsinghua University and a China Forum expert, told Al Jazeera that border patrols continue because "each side has its own perception about where the border lies".

"So sometimes, for example, the Chinese patrolling troops patrol in areas which are considered by Indians as Indian territory. And likewise," he says.

According to local media reports, China has denied Indian troops access to key patrolling points in eastern Ladakh, claiming these regions belong to Beijing. New Delhi says this has made it harder for the Indian army to carry out its regular border security activities in the region.

Senior Colonel Bo says that while the border issue is difficult to solve, both militaries have signed agreements in the past to maintain peace and talks are continuing to find a solution to solve the military and political discord.

'Education can bring peace'

Counting the beads on her Buddhist mala and chanting a prayer, 71-year old Kunze Dolma, who lived through the 1962 Sino-India war in Chushul when she was about nine years old, says she thinks education is what can bring about peace.

"I just remember how scared I was during that war as a little girl. I thought the Chinese army would enter our school," she tells Al Jazeera.

"I now work as a cook in the village school and hope the children are educated about maintaining peace along the border and how people on both sides of the border need to understand each other better," she tells Al Jazeera.

Tstringandhu, 26, teaches at the government middle school in Chushul. "I teach children aged three to 10 years at this school. I teach them the Ladakhi Bhoti language which is an offshoot of the Tibetan language. I teach the students about the border in our village by telling them the history of this language and explain to them that Tibet is now a part of China and is across the border," he told Al Jazeera.

"When we educate children, we just tell them that the land across the border is China and not an enemy country. I look at education as a way to bring peace. If a teacher educates children about places and cultures in the right manner, hostilities will not exist and peace will prevail," he says.

China's 'New Great Wall' Casts a Shadow on Nepal

12 October 2024, The New York Times, Hannah Beech and Bhadra Sharma

The Chinese fence traces a furrow in the Himalayas, its barbed wire and concrete ramparts separating Tibet from Nepal. Here, in one of the more isolated places on earth, China's security cameras keep watch alongside armed sentries in guard towers.

High on the Tibetan Plateau, the Chinese have carved a 600-foot-long message on a hillside: "Long live the Chinese Communist Party," inscribed in characters that can be read from orbit.

Just across the border, in Nepal's Humla District, residents contend that along several points of this distant frontier, China is encroaching on Nepali territory.

The Nepalis have other complaints, too. Chinese security forces are pressuring ethnic Tibetan Nepalis not to display images of the Dalai Lama, the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, in Nepali villages near the border, they say. And with the recent proliferation of Chinese barriers and other defenses, a people have also been divided. The stream of thousands of Tibetans who once escaped Chinese government repression by fleeing to Nepal has almost entirely vanished.

Yet Nepal's leaders have refused to acknowledge China's imprints on their country. Ideologically and economically tied to China, successive Nepali governments have ignored a 2021 fact-finding report that detailed various border abuses in Humla.

"This is the new Great Wall of China," said Jeevan Bahadur Shahi, the former provincial chief minister of the area. "But they don't want us to see it."

China's fencing along the edge of Nepal's Humla District is just one segment of a fortification network thousands of miles long that Xi Jinping's government has built to reinforce remote reaches, control rebellious populations and, in some cases, push into territory that other nations consider their own.

The fortification building spree, accelerated during Covid and backed by dozens of new border settlements, is imposing Beijing's Panopticon security state on far-flung areas. It is also placing intense pressure on China's poorer, weaker neighbors.

China borders 14 other countries by land. Its vast frontier, on land and at sea, remained largely peaceful as China's economy grew to become the world's second-largest. But amid Mr. Xi's tenure, Beijing is redefining its territorial limits, leading to small skirmishes and outright conflict.

"Under Xi Jinping, China has doubled down on efforts to assert its territorial claims in disputed areas along its periphery," said Brian Hart, a fellow at the China Power Project of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Viewed individually, each action along China's borders — fortifying boundaries, contesting territory and pushing into disputed zones — might seem only incremental. But the aggregated result is startling.

Near its eastern maritime reaches, in what are internationally recognized as Philippine waters, China has turned a coral reef into a military base. On its far western land border, China's People's Liberation Army has pushed into disputed mountain territory shared with South Asian neighbors.

Two dozen soldiers from India and China, both nuclear powers, died in high-altitude, hand-to-hand combat in 2020. Another border clash two years later injured more soldiers.

China's border buildup is a major reason that the U.S. Department of Defense, in its 2023 China Military Power Report, declared that China has "adopted more dangerous, coercive, and provocative actions in the Indo-Pacific region."

The shifting security landscape is drawing the attention of global powers and leading to new alliances. Small nations with ties to China, like Nepal, are vulnerable, even as they downplay or deny border disputes for fear of losing Beijing's economic favor.

"Weaker states like Nepal," Mr. Hart said, "face immense pressures because of the overwhelming power differential with China."

"If China does not face costs for encroaching on its weakest neighbors, Beijing will be further emboldened to threaten countries in the region," he added.

Nepal's foreign minister, Arzu Rana Deuba, said in an interview with The New York Times that she had not received complaints about problems on the border with Tibet and that the government's focus was more on the southern boundary with India, where more Nepalis live.

"We have not really thought much of looking at the northern border, at least I haven't," she said.

A Top Secret Report

The distance from Simikot, the capital of Humla District, to the frontier village of Hilsa is 30 miles. But the drive to the border with Tibet takes more than 10 bone-jarring hours through rough, rocky terrain. Humla is unconnected to Nepal's national road network. Cars and heavy machinery must be flown in.

Himalayan passes in Humla reach nearly 16,400 feet. Deadly altitude sickness can set in fast. It was to this district, Nepal's poorest and least developed, that members of a fact-finding mission – composed of Nepali Home Ministry officials, government surveyors and police personnel – traveled three years ago.

Armed with a 1960s map from when Nepal and China formally agreed upon their boundary, they set out to discover whether the official cartography diverged from the reality on the ground. The mission members trekked to remote border pillars. They chatted with yak herders and Tibetan Buddhist monks.

Eventually, they produced their report to Nepal's cabinet. And then the report disappeared. The public was not allowed to see it. Even high-ranking officials and politicians were refused access, several people involved said.

The veil of secrecy extended to the historical map that the mission brought with it. Survey department employees said they have been cautioned that sharing it could be a security breach – a strange warning for a map accessible in American archives.

A copy of the report obtained by The Times shows that the government mission documented a series of small border infringements by China. Also coursing through the report are worries about China's grander geopolitical intentions and fears about upsetting Nepal's powerful neighbor.

A nation of 30 million people, Nepal is small, landlocked and underdeveloped. Its government is headed by a Communist, who this year replaced a former Maoist rebel as prime minister. In ideology and in economics, Nepal leans heavily toward China, even as it remains in the orbit of nearby India. The report says that in several places in and around Hilsa, China constructed fortifications and other infrastructure, including closed-circuit TV cameras, that are either in Nepal or in a buffer zone between the two countries where building is prohibited by bilateral agreement. Chinese border personnel took over a Nepali irrigation canal fed by the Karnali River, the report said, although the Chinese retreated when the Nepali mission visited.

Chinese forces have illegally prevented ethnic Tibetans living in Nepali areas near the border from grazing their livestock and participating in religious activities, the report said. Such constraints bring extraterritorial menace to Mr. Xi's campaign of repression in Tibet.

The report advised that Nepal and China urgently needed to address various border disputes, but a bilateral mechanism for resolving border problems, which includes joint inspections, has been stalled since 2006.

N.P. Saud, Nepal's foreign minister until March, said in an interview with The Times that bilateral "border meetings are held frequently."

But one of Mr. Saud's deputies told The Times that no border inspections had occurred in more than 17 years. Asked about this, Mr. Saud amended his statement.

"I can share with you that the joint inspection team will work soon," he said. "I can't tell you the exact time until it is finalized."

Mr. Saud said that he did not know why the Humla report had not been made public.

"The border of a country," he said, "is not a matter of secrecy."

Mr. Saud said Nepal could not make any determination on the report's validity until the joint inspections restart.

"Until and unless we confirm the report," he said, "how we can raise the issue internationally with another country?"

Ms. Deuba, who replaced Mr. Saud as foreign minister, said she was not aware of the report or of Chinese fencing on the border.

The Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu declined to comment.

The Chinese government says that it is a force for peace in the region. In an article in the party-run People's Daily, Pan Yue, the head of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, wrote last year that China "never sought to conquer or expand territorially, never colonized neighboring countries."

History collides with such national mythmaking. In 1979, Chinese forces briefly invaded Vietnam, which China had once controlled for a millennium. Since the People's Republic of China was founded in 1949, China and India have fought two border wars.

Mr. Shahi, the former provincial chief minister from Humla, said that his efforts to publicize Chinese border intrusions have been actively discouraged.

"The Chinese, they say to our government, and then the government says to me, 'If you talk about this border issue, then they will stop trade, they will stop everything," he said. "Who the hell can say this to me about our land?"

A Holy Land, Divided

The border fence separating Hilsa from Chinese-controlled Tibet cleaves not only nations but centuries. On the Chinese side, modern buildings feature glass atriums, armored vehicles glide along paved roads and floodlights blaze in the night sky. Nepal, by contrast, seems stuck in a bygone era. Ramshackle shelters hunch in the cold. There is not an inch of asphalt or any reliable electricity.

The Chinese side used to be nearly as remote, the seclusion broken only by a flow of pilgrims to Mount Kailash, which is holy to four faiths. But as part of a push into lands populated by ethnic minorities, the Chinese government has seeded Tibet and the neighboring Xinjiang region with new infrastructure. Migrants from China's Han ethnic majority have poured in, including to the Tibetan town of Purang near the border with Hilsa. A new high-altitude airport in Purang, a feat of engineering, serves both civilian and military purposes, part of a transportation network that gives the People's Liberation Army easy access to border areas. Just 20 miles away is the junction of China, Nepal and India. Beijing considers a large swath of Indian-controlled territory along the Tibet-India boundary to be its own, calling it "South Tibet." On the border with tiny Bhutan, China claims more disputed land and has built settlements there.

The Chinese focus on Tibet reflects more than geopolitical ambitions. Mr. Xi's government has overseen a brutal effort to pacify ethnic minorities. High-tech surveillance of Tibetans, and the fortification of the border, has all but severed their escape route into Nepal, where ethnic Tibetans also live.

Chinese police and border guards, Hilsa residents say, regularly cross over to Nepal without going through normal immigration procedures. They intimidate ethnic Tibetan Nepalis and have captured some of the few Tibetans who succeeded in fleeing to Nepal, said Lhamu Lama, a Humla District village administrator.

An officer with the Nepali paramilitary police in Hilsa said that last year his commander asked the Chinese to retreat from an area that the 1960s official map indicated was not Chinese land. The Chinese never responded, said the officer, who did not want his name used because he was not authorized to speak to the news media.

"China is big and powerful so it can do what it wants," said Pema Wangmu Lama, who was born in Tibet but now lives in Nepal. "Even if Hilsa is swallowed up one day, who would know or care what's happening here?"

From G2 to Cold War 2.0: The Changing US Attitude Toward China

12 October 2024, The Diplomat, Hongda Fan

A decade ago, Washington saw China as a potential co-leader in global governance. Now, the U.S. consensus is that China is a rival, not a partner.

On September 18, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Kurt Campbell bluntly stated at a House Foreign Affairs Committee hearing that "the Cold War pales in comparison to the multifaceted challenges that China presents." In fact, the view that the U.S. and China are already in a new Cold War has been widely discussed in the United States. The two countries are undoubtedly in a state of intense confrontation, which is a marked change from the late 2000s and early 2010s.

In 2007, Niall Ferguson and Moritz Schularick co-authored an article titled "'Chimerica' and the Global Asset Market Boom" in International Finance. They argued that China and the United States shared a symbiotic relationship: one saved while the other consumed, one exported while the other imported, one provided products while the other provided services, one accumulated foreign exchange reserves while the other printed dollars.

In 2008, Fred Bergsten published "A Partnership of Equals: How Washington Should Respond to China's Economic Challenge" in Foreign Affairs. He argued that the United States should encourage China to become a responsible pillar in the global economic system and seek to establish a genuine partnership with Beijing to jointly lead the global economic order.

From then on, the idea of a Group of Two (G-2) began to spread.

The 2007-2008 financial crisis, which originated in the United States, swept across the globe. However, due to the relative independence of China's market, coupled with its sustained high economic growth and substantial foreign exchange reserves, China appeared more stable in the face of the crisis. China's highly successful hosting of the 2008 Beijing Olympics, which impressed the world, also marked a peak in the international prestige of the People's Republic of China. This was the global context in which the concepts of Chimerica, the G-2, and China-U.S. co-governance emerged. At that time, the world was in need of rescue, and China was seen as one of the most capable rescuers.

Whether it was called Chimerica or the G-2, both concepts centered on the United States collaborating with China in addressing global challenges. At that time, even within the world's leading power, the U.S., many recognized China's significant international standing and believed that close cooperation with China was essential. President Barack Obama (in office from 2009 to 2017) and his secretary of state, Hillary Clinton, repeatedly emphasized the importance of maintaining strong cooperation between the United States and China.

Although China also sought greater and better cooperation with the U.S., Beijing did not endorse terms like Chimerica or the G-2 and was even critical of them. China believed these concepts promoted the idea of China-U.S. co-governance of the world, which could easily fuel the “China threat” narrative.

When receiving visiting President Obama in November 2009, Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao made it clear that he did not agree with the G-2. The Chinese premier stated that the idea of China-U.S. co-governance was flawed and did not align with China’s peaceful diplomatic principles.

In 2010, China’s GDP surpassed Japan’s, making it the world’s second-largest economy after the United States. Since Xi Jinping became China’s top leader in 2012, Beijing has become increasingly confident in diplomacy, which is often seen by some countries such as the United States as reflecting China’s growing ambitions. Additionally, more attention has been paid to the significant differences in ideology and political systems, along with some actions by China that were seen as not in line with WTO rules. All these factors together have led to China being increasingly viewed as a threat by the United States. Actually, while the Obama administration expressed a desire to cooperate with China, it was also strengthening efforts to contain China, especially in Obama’s second term. The “U.S. Rebalance to Asia” strategy illustrated this point. This trend would intensify over time.

The National Security Strategy released by the Trump administration in 2017 clearly defined China and Russia as the United States’ main rivals and strategic adversaries. This administration “awakened” Washington officials to the urgency of addressing the threat posed by China. During the Trump administration, the United States engaged in a fierce trade war with China, leading to a strained China-U.S. relationship.

The Biden administration largely inherited its predecessor’s hardline policies toward China, further clarifying its perception of a “China threat.” Over time, the U.S. government has come to view the fundamental nature of China-U.S. relations as competitive.

The U.S. government’s attitude toward China naturally influences U.S. public opinion. The Pew Research Center surveyed American adults in 2007, 2014, and 2019, asking which country is the greatest threat to the United States. China ranked third (2007), second (2014), and tied for first with Russia (2019), showing Americans’ threat perception of China increased over time. The same survey conducted by the Pew Research Center in 2023 found that as many as 50 percent of respondents considered China to be the top threat to the United States, while only 17 percent viewed Russia as the top threat.

At the same time, the U.S. legislative branch continues to propose bills targeting China. For example, in mid-September 2024, the U.S. House of Representatives voted on more than 20 bills related to China, showcasing an effort by Congress to curb China’s influence. China is being regarded as the leader of an anti-US axis formed together with Russia, Iran, North Korea, Venezuela, and even Cuba.

The United States has developed not only a bipartisan but also a public consensus of negative perceptions towards China. Washington firmly views China as an undisputed rival.

The evolution from G-2 to the current rivalry was not quite as simple as described above, of course. Almost immediately after the idea of Chimerica/the G-2 emerged, it faced significant criticism and opposition, both in the United States and in China. Even Ferguson and Schularick, the creators of the term “Chimerica,” collaborated again in 2009 to publish an article titled “The End of Chimerica.”

On the other hand, there has been an undeniable change in recent years. Although Beijing has repeatedly stated that China and the United States are partners rather than rivals, this claim – which was not controversial even 10 years ago – has been explicitly rejected by the U.S. government. Meanwhile, U.S. academia has a growing lack of understanding of China and an increasingly negative attitude toward China.

Today, when cooperation is advocated, it faces strong pushback in the United States. The impact is clear in mounting tensions with China.

Dashain: Nepal turns to India for meat, China for toothpicks

11 October 2024, Khabarhub

As the country prepares for Dashain, the biggest festival in Nepal, locals are immersed in celebration and culinary traditions, which prominently feature fish and meat.

Despite advancements in agriculture and animal husbandry, Nepal continues to import significant quantities of fish and meat from abroad.

Over the past five years, Nepal has imported meat worth over 13 billion rupees.

In the financial year 2019/20 alone, fish and meat imports amounted to approximately 2.77 billion rupees.

The following year, 2020/21, saw an increase with imports reaching 3.34 billion rupees.

In the fiscal year 2021/22, the figure was slightly lower at 3.13 billion rupees.

The most recent data for 2022/23 indicates a decrease, with imports totaling around 1.08 billion rupees.

However, during the previous fiscal year (2023/24), fish and meat worth approximately 2.23 billion rupees were imported, reflecting the seasonal demand during the festival.

In terms of livestock, Nepal imported goats valued at around one crore rupees during this period, with nearly 996,300 goats sourced entirely from India.

Toothpicks worth two crores imported annually

In addition to meat, Nepal also imports various small items, including toothpicks.

Despite local production capabilities, bamboo in Nepal has deteriorated due to weather conditions.

In July and August of this year alone, 6.63 million toothpicks were imported, totaling 18,912 kg.

Over the past five years, imports of toothpicks have reached a cumulative value of 94,441 rupees.

Last fiscal year, dental floss worth 27.93 million rupees was also imported. In 2079/80, a total of 1.13 crore toothpicks were brought in.

While Nepal has rich agricultural and culinary traditions, the reliance on imports for meat and small items like toothpicks highlights ongoing challenges in local production and supply.

CCP Insists on Falsifying the History of “Humanistic Buddhism”

11 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Zhu Yaozu

A forum was held in Shanghai, a city that was really the cradle of the Buddhist current—which was, however, never Marxist, and later developed mostly in Taiwan.

Group photograph of the participants in the Shanghai forum. From Weibo.

On September 21 and 22, 2024, the Jade Buddha Temple in Shanghai hosted a national forum on “the theory and practice of humanistic Buddhism.” Bureaucrats from the United Front Work Department and the government-controlled China Buddhist Association spoke at the event.

Venerable Changzang, speaking also on behalf of the absent Master Yanjue, the President of the government-controlled China Buddhist Association of which Changzang is Vice President, hailed Shanghai as “the birthplace of humanistic Buddhism.” He also explained that “humanistic Buddhism” and “Sinicized Buddhism” are one and the same.

“Humanistic Buddhism,” he said, always meant a Buddhism adapted to the most progressive ideologies of the time. Today the most advanced ideology is the CCP’s Marxism with Chinese characteristics as presented by Xi Jinping. It is to Xi Jinping Thought that a Buddhism that is both Sinicized and humanist should adapt, Changzang said.

That Shanghai is the birthplace of humanistic Buddhism is not false as it is there that Master Taixu, one and perhaps “the” key figure in the development of the current, taught in the last period of his life. Taixu died at the Jade Buddha Temple in 1947.

As one participant to the forum told “Bitter Winter,” mentioning the important role of Taixu was the only true statement in Changzang’s speech and indeed in the whole forum. All the rest was false.

Taixu did not want to adapt Buddhism to modern anti-religious ideologies. What he proposed was a Buddhism that was less focused on ritual and more on helping suffering human beings, including through active social and charitable work. This was the real humanistic Buddhism, and it was impossible to practice it under the iron-clad dictatorship of the Chinese Communist Party.

In fact, those loyal to Taixu’s teachings largely went to Taiwan, where worthy “humanistic” institutions such as Tzu Chi, Fo Guang Shan, and the Dharma Drum Mountain were developed. Some of these institutions may maintain certain “political” relationships with present-day China for their own purposes but certainly their ideas and actions are not inspired by Marxism or Xi Jinping socialism. As “Bitter Winter” has already denounced, the CCP is simply trying to hijack the prestigious label “humanistic Buddhism,” make it a synonym of “Sinicized Buddhism,” empty the name of its original content, and replace it with Xi Jinping’s brand of Marxism. It is, basically, a fraud, perpetrated with the complicity of the China Buddhist Association.

From Deng to Xi, China’s Foreign Policy Identity Has Been Consistent

10 October 2024, SFS, Niall Duggan

Despite claims that Xi Jinping’s leadership has adopted a more aggressive foreign policy driven by nationalism, the effect of national identity on Chinese foreign policy has been consistent in the post-Mao era. Instead, China's perception of its capacity to act internationally is driving a more proactive foreign policy. Therefore, Western states' China policy should focus on forcing China to question its capacity to act in international affairs by maintaining leadership in areas such as climate change and the war in Ukraine.

Is Nationalism in Chinese Foreign Policy New?

Many US policymakers consider the People's Republic of China to be the United States' key strategic rival. As the United States has refocused its attention on China in the past decade, it has found that China has become more aggressive and nationalistic under Xi Jinping's leadership. To US leadership, China's coercive "wolf warrior diplomacy" of the late 2010s exemplifies this new attitude. These US policymakers view recent assertive Chinese foreign policy as a departure from earlier post-Mao administrations, which they perceived as pragmatic. Prior Chinese administrations focused on economic engagement rather than ideological objectives and were therefore less threatening. However, contrary to popular belief, the effect of national identity on Chinese foreign policy is consistent and has changed little since the Mao era.

Background

Modern Chinese nationalism is rooted in Han intellectual and popular movements that emerged during the demise of the Qing dynasty in 1911. These movements created a Chinese state identity rather than the flexible identity that subjects of the Chinese empire held. After the establishment of the People's Republic in 1949, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) created socialist patriotism, a form of Chinese nationalism interconnected with a socialist, anti-imperialist nationalism and rooted in China's experience under Western imperialism during the Century of Humiliation (1839–1949). Then, during the reform era of the 1980s, the CCP adopted positive nationalism, which reduced the anti-Western, anti-imperialist nature of socialist patriotism. For instance, China rejoined the Summer Olympics in 1984 and promoted its success in the games as a Chinese success rather than a victory over Western capitalism. During this era, China sought to rejoin the family of nations.

However, the country soon reverted to socialist patriotism due to international isolation resulting from the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre and the CCP's resultant fears of regime change. This fear led the CCP to introduce patriotic education campaigns in 1994. These campaigns focused on three periods of Chinese history – "five thousand years of splendid Chinese history", "the humiliation of more than a century," and "the People's Republic opens up for progress" – and became the collective narrative of Chinese history and current affairs. Despite possessing a vast, diverse population and a widely contested national identity, these campaigns promoted the national narrative that China is an ancient civilization that has continually resisted Western imperialism and is reclaiming its great power status. China is still far from a totalitarian state – the anti-lockdown street protest of 2022 is a clear example of the fact that the Chinese people are willing and able to push back against their government – but China's campaigns of the 1990s effectively created one official Chinese historical narrative that reinforces loyalty to the CCP.

Nationalism in Foreign Policy

China articulates its nationalist identity through its foreign policy behavior in areas such as international law and global climate governance. Chinese white papers on Africa policy in 2006 and 2015 framed a narrative of shared victimhood at the hands of Western imperialism, colonization, and unequal treaties. China's identity as a developing state motivates its foreign policy focus on the Global South and has driven real policy action outside China's normal policy of non-interference in sovereign states' internal affairs. For instance, China supported international military intervention during the 2011 Libya crisis, backing a UN resolution that referred Libya to the International Criminal Court on counts of violations of human rights and potential crimes against humanity. China justified its decision by supporting the views of fellow developing states in Africa and the Arab world. Li Baodong, China's Permanent Representative to the United Nations from 2010 to 2013, stated that China considered "the concerns and views of the Arab and African countries when voting in favor of resolution 1970," framing China as a sympathizer of countries in the Global South.

China also presents itself as a leader in climate change governance among developing nations. In COP climate summits, for instance, China portrays itself as a significant, responsible stakeholder. It champions the interests of the Global South by supporting positions such as the Common but Differentiated Responsibilities and Respective Capabilities (CBDR-RC), a principle that acknowledges the unequal distribution of climate action responsibility among countries due to their differing emissions profiles and economic capacities. This underscores China's commitment to shaping its identity as a leading power on the international stage, where China sets rules that support the position of the Global South rather than accepting those created by the West.

China's socialist patriotic identity also drives more aggressive foreign policy in territorial disputes and the international economy. China has been assertive in defending its territorial claims, including its "Nine-

Dash Line," which encompasses a significant portion of the South China Sea. Tensions have been rising between China and several states, including Vietnam, the Philippines, Malaysia, Brunei, and Taiwan, over areas such as the Spratly Islands, Paracel Islands, and Scarborough Shoal. Since China has played a historically dominant role in the South China Sea, it is attempting to achieve a hegemonic role in the region that aligns with its nationalist identity of returning to great power status.

China's geopolitical nationalistic stance extends beyond its regional neighbors. Epitomized by the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), China's ambitions manifest in creating Chinese-centric forums for economic cooperation and hubs for financing and logistics across the Global South, including Central Asia, Latin America, and Sub-Saharan Africa. Rooted in the historical narrative of China's "five thousand years of splendid history," the BRI serves as a contemporary testament to China's enduring position as a critical economic and civilizational center.

From Deng to Xi, China's Foreign Policy Identity Has Been Consistent: The West Must Change Its Perspective

Many policymakers and media commenters have linked China's assertive foreign policy to Xi Jinping's policy of rejuvenating the Chinese nation. However, Chinese foreign policy has been consistent since the early 1990s. During this period, China sought to expand its power in the South China Sea steadily. In the late 1990s, China strived to establish amicable relations with Global South countries and moved toward leadership in global governance. Even the concept of a multipolar world order, evident in deepening Sino-Russian relations and highlighted as a policy change under Xi's leadership, is rooted in the Chinese foreign policy discourse of the mid-1990s, which debated the extent of China's development as a great power.

Instead, the key change since the 1990s has been China's rapid economic growth. While growth has not fundamentally changed China's identity and institutions, it has strengthened Xi's ability to achieve the foreign policy objectives of Chinese nationalism. The West expected China's identity to shift toward liberal, market-led democracy as it integrated with the global economy. This expectation was based on two factors. First, observers reasoned that China's need for a fully market-led economy to sustain rapid development would require political reforms, including creating an independent judiciary and developing a multiparty political system. Moreover, China's growing dependence on the international market would force it to support the Western economic order.

However, Western policymakers' anticipated shift in China's identity in the 1990s and 2000s did not occur. As the Chinese economy grew, the one-party system expanded to co-opt the newly wealthy and educated elites instead of transitioning to liberal democracy. And while China's economy improved, China's foreign policy, identity, and geopolitical ambitions did not change. Thus, China's increased economic and military capacity supports its emergence as a global power that challenges the model of a unipolar world order dominated by the West.

Despite the development of Xi Jinping thought, the Xi administration has remained consistent with its predecessors in crucial areas of foreign and security policy, including China's attitude toward Taiwan, which is the last remaining wound from the Century of Humiliation for many Chinese policymakers. This suggests that US policymakers should not expect changes in Chinese leadership to generate seismic shifts in Chinese foreign policy. China's identity as both a victim of Western imperialism and a reemerging great power will remain the foundation for decision-making, even with positive or negative pressure from the West.

Given the relative stasis of Chinese foreign policy goals, China's newfound capability to advance its critical interests under Xi's leadership is the key difference from previous administrations. If China's identity remains consistent, understanding China's perspective on its capacity to achieve foreign policy goals is vital for Western states, as is the ability to shape China's perception of its own capabilities.

Therefore, Western states' China policy should focus on forcing China to question its capacity to act in international affairs. If Russia, for instance, were to lose the war in Ukraine, China might then question its capacity to defeat Taiwan in armed conflict. Moreover, if the United States were to lead on critical global issues such as climate change, China may question its capacity to lead in these areas. Chinese policymakers would view the cost of counteracting a fully engaged United States as beyond China's current ability. While US leadership could use direct economic and military competition with China to change Beijing's policies, this would feed into the Chinese identity as a victim of Western aggression. Compared to policies aimed at "countering China," engaged US leadership on global issues is a far more effective strategy that would force China to exercise restraint without reinforcing China's identity as a victim of the West.

Critical Translation Readings On Monyul In The History Of India's Tawang Monastery – Book Review

The Clear Mirror: Reflection of Monyul in the History of Tawang Monastery takes a look at the history, culture and social geography of the Monyul, thereby giving readers an ethnographic account and lived reality of Tawang monastery and the People of Mon. The book was originally written in Tibetan by Gyalsey Trulku, who served as the Abbott of Tawang Monastery for almost two decades from 1978 to 1997. This dense work is the result of his long experience in Monyul and his thorough analysis of various scattered documentary sources and the local oral narratives. The original book's title in Tibetan is 'Rtawangdongpa'i lo rgyus, mon yulgsalpa'i me long' and it was first published by the author's disciple Chaak Jampa Gyatso of Tawang in 1991.

Thereafter it was revised and enlarged, and the second edition was published by the Amye Machen Institute, Dharamsala in 2009. This work comprises of thirty-two (32) small chapters and has been translated in an engaging and lucid style by Yeshe Dhondup, who is currently the managing editor of the Tibet Journal and has translated many other works both in Tibetan and English so far. His other translation works include Biography of Gendun Chopel; Tale of Golden Corpse, which is a Tibetan version of Vikram Vetal, Sino-Tibetan Negotiation: the Negotiation that Never Was; and Political and Military History of Tibet. Yeshe Dhondup's contribution as a translator of this work is huge because the Tibetan version can only be read by a limited section of readers and to make it available to a larger readership, its English translation was much needed and has come out finally if not timely.

However, the task was arduous because the main problem with translating from Tibetan to English was the vast cultural and linguistic differences between the two languages. Also many Buddhist concepts and teachings have no direct equivalent in English that makes it challenging to convey their full meaning and significance. Overall, translating important Buddhist literature into Indian languages requires a careful and nuanced approach that takes into account the unique linguistic and cultural differences between Tibetan and the target language. Though with proper care and attention, it is possible to create translations that accurately convey the profound wisdom and teachings of Buddhism to a wider audience and for that it is essential to have a deeper understanding of Buddhist philosophy and culture to ensure that the translation accurately conveys the intended meaning. Also to translate important Buddhist literature into Indian languages, it is essential to work with skilled translators who are fluent in both Tibetan and the target language, the criteria that Yeshe Dhondup fulfils adequately though he acknowledges that the death of the author of this work Gyalsey Trulku in 2009 and unavailability of any Tibetan who is good in Mon and Tawang history and culture made his translation work difficult. Still, he has been able to carve out such a dense work of translation and has come up with an easily readable and coherent version in English.

While reading the English version one gets to understand the very essence of Tawang Monastery and its social, political and historical importance along with its strategic location due to which it has long been the focus of tensions between India and China. It is argued that the conflict began in 1950 when China and India signed an agreement demarcating the border between the two countries. However, the agreement was never ratified by China and the two countries have been in dispute over the border since then. In 1962, the conflict escalated into a full scale war between the two countries, with China launching a massive offensive against India the then. Instead of improving the worsening Sino-Indian relations and foresee diplomatic implications, China still is very interested in Tawang and is trying all its evil designs to have its hegemony over Tawang region and the monastery, given its strategic location that is rich in mineral and natural resources besides historical claims that Tawang is part of the south Tibet.

In addition to this the religious consciousness also serves as a motivation that Tawang is home to the 17th-century Tawang Monastery one of the largest Buddhist monasteries in India and considered a holy site for Tibetan Buddhism. Since China sees the monastery as an important tool to increase its influence in the region and to promote its own brand of Tibetan Buddhism. China also has not been able to provoke or influence India against the Tibetans residing in India for decades now. Today India has become the home to the largest Tibetan population outside Tibet, with an estimated 100 thousand Tibetans living in India.

While India does not recognize Tibetan refugees as refugees under its legal framework it has however provided them with temporary residence permits and freedom of movement within the country. The Indian government has also established a settlement program for Tibetan refugees, which provides them with basic amenities and services such as healthcare and education. Even the Tibetan Government-in-Exile runs from Dharamsala, India where H.H. the Dalai Lama resides since his arrival to India decades ago.

By going through the book one gets to know that the Buddhist monasteries in India are centers of spiritual and cultural learning, where monks and nuns live a life of simplicity and devotion to the teachings of Buddha. They are often located in remote areas, away from the distractions of modern life, and provide a space for meditation, study, and contemplation. It must also be noted that Buddhist monasteries in India continue to play a vital role in preserving the rich heritage of Buddhism and promoting its values in contemporary society.

Gyalsey has employed a cultural lens to study the Monyul and the Tawang Monastery. This Monastery is one of the largest and most famous Buddhist monasteries in India, located in the state of Arunachal Pradesh. It is known for its unique architecture, as well as its rich history and cultural significance. The monastery is also home to a large collection of ancient scriptures, valuable artifacts, and religious relics. Tawang Monastery is considered a sacred site by Buddhists and attracts thousands of pilgrims every year. According to history, the origin of people of Mon were Tibetans who migrated to the place in the 9th century in different waves of migrations. Back then Tawang was known as Monyul –the land of Mon which means lower land in the Tibetan lexicon as Tibet they then referred to the entire southern landmass as Monyul or Lho Mon.

Also, the Monpas are a tribe that migrated from southern and central Tibet and settled in Monyul. Historically it is believed that Tawang was a part of Tibet. It saw the seeding of Buddhism when it was brought to Tibet during the 8th century by the Buddhist scholar Padmasambhava. It is also believed that the Tawang monastery was built by a 5th Dalai Lama's disciple named Marak Lama Gyatso earlier known as Geluk Monastery. 'Ta' means horse and 'Wang' means green pasture in Monpa Language and it became the centre for the spiritual and powerhouse of the Mon people and was directly governed by Lhasa. Also since the establishment of the Tawang monastery, Monyul was completely incorporated into Tibetan administration in terms of politics, culture, language, taxation and law.

It was the Simla convention in 1914 that changed the map of Monyul this convention changed the boundary between Tibet and the eastern Himalayan region of British India. In 1951 India took full control of Tawang and the Tawang region was incorporated into the Northeast Frontier Agency (NEFA). After communist China forcibly annexed Tibet in 1950, China started claiming Tawang as a part of south Tibet. Monpa is the most progressive tribe of Arunachal Pradesh today and is the only nomadic tribe of northeast India which migrated from south-east Tibet.

Given the socio-historical and political backdrop, the roots of this ethnography on the Tawang area and Tawang monastery and the community lie somewhere in anthropology. The author traces the lineage and historical accounts of the Mon people in today's Arunachal Pradesh. The account becomes sociological when he gives a picture of the social and cultural aspects of the monastery and the landscape. Though the earlier works on Tawang discuss the issues at length like some recent quality research on Tawang and Tawang Monastery besides Yeshe Dhondup's translation work that has been published are: Sharma, Renuka. Tawang: The Birthplace of the 6th Dalai Lama was published by Indus Publishing Company in 2017.

Some others like Khamtse, Samten G. Tawang: The Sacred City by Indus Publishing Company in 2015. Another work is Dawa, Tashi's 'The Tawang Tiger: Tale of a Lost Land' by Indus Publishing Company in 2015. Another prominent work is Pema Dhondup's 'The Monastery, the Fort and the Land of the Dawn Lit Mountains: A History of Tawang by Indus Publishing Company in 2016. An important work by Bhutia, Tsetan Namgyal's, 'Tawang: A Journey to a Hidden Land by Indus Publishing Company in 2014.

Also books have been written recently on Tawang, Monpas and Tibetan Buddhism which cover a range of socio-historical and political issues. Besides the author's and translator's preface, the subsequent chapters written in a very coherent style describe the sociology of the Monpa people and the arrival of people from Tibet and their descendants in Mon, description of Prince Tsangma and his lineage and arrival in Mon, about his sons, spread of Buddhism in India and Tibet and spread of Buddhism in Mon.

In Chapter 9, there is a fine description of the Kagyue (Kagyu) tradition. It is one of the four main lineages of Tibetan Buddhism founded by an Indian Buddhist in the 11th century and is based on the teachings of the Indian Buddhist philosopher Nagarjuna. This tradition emphasizes the importance of meditation and the transmission of the Buddha's teachings from teacher to student through an oral lineage.

Chapter 10 discusses the spread of the Geluk tradition in Mon. It is a branch of Theravada Buddhism that originated in Burma (Myanmar) and is practiced mainly in Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, and Sri Lanka. It emphasizes the attainment of inner peace, happiness, and enlightenment through meditation, good deeds, and mindful living. The term "geluk" means "happiness" or "bliss" in Pali, the language of the Buddha. Similarly, chapter 11 narrates the founding of Namgyal Lhatse monastery and its administrative and religious traditions are discussed in chapter 13.

Other chapters include discussions about the Tawang monastery and its renovation, visits of Indian Prime Ministers and H.H. Dalai Lama to Tawang, the history of Ogyanling and other monasteries, etc. Mon people have played an important role in the history of Tawang, as they were one of the first groups to settle in the region. Monyul, which translates to "Land of Mon," is a term used to describe the Tawang district. They have their own language, which is a Tibeto-Burman language, and their own customs and traditions. The importance of Monyul in the history of Tawang can be seen through the various historical sites and monuments that are found in the region.

For example, the Tawang Monastery, which is one of the largest monasteries in India, was founded by a Monpa monk named Mera Lama Lodre Gyatso in the 17th century. Monpas are an ethnic groups found in the Himalayan regions of Nepal and India. They are also known as the Lopas and are a sub-group of the Sherpa people. They are mostly located in the Khumbu region of Nepal, which includes the famous Mount Everest. The Monpa people, on the other hand, are primarily located in the region of Mon, which is in the northeastern part of India's state of Sikkim. They speak the Monpa language, which belongs to the Tibeto-Burman language family. The Mon people are an ethnic group that inhabits the region of Tawang in India's state of Arunachal Pradesh, India.

Tawang Monastery, also known as the Galden Sumdo Monastery, is a Buddhist monastery in Tawang. It is considered one of the largest monasteries in India and is known for its architecture and historical significance. The Monastery was founded by Mera Lama in the 17th century. It is famous for being the birthplace of the sixth Dalai Lama, who was born here in 1683. The monastery is also known for its rich collection of ancient Buddhist scriptures and artwork. Academically, Tawang Monastery has been studied by scholars of Buddhist studies, art history, and anthropology. Several academic papers and books have been written on the monastery and its significance in the history and culture of India.

The Mon people, who are the native inhabitants of the region, have a unique history and culture that has been influenced by their interactions with the neighboring Tibetan and Bhutanese cultures.

However, there is still a significant research gap in understanding the history and culture of the Mon people and their relationship with the Tawang Monastery. Since the work is based on the author's use of sources like rare documentary resources and oral narratives that makes it ethnography. The author's interest in the Tibetan culture and religious tradition, cultural understanding and most of all meaning-making given his effort of looking at the Monyul from an insider's perspective makes things more lucid for Tibetan readers and scholars. However, the ethnographer, in this case, is not a researcher but a Buddhist monk and had been living among the inhabitants and not with the purpose of understanding the culture that these people shared but as the head of the monastery thereby understanding the community and portraying a larger picture of the monastery as a socio-religious organization.

This work is important because writing on monasteries or exploring the lived realities, understanding administration, politics, social interventions, educational and other contributions is equally important as it helps to preserve and promote the cultural and historical significance of these religious institutions. This work reflects that Monasteries are not only important religious centers but also serve as repositories of knowledge and art. Therefore such works help researchers in documenting and studying these monasteries to gain insights into the cultural practices and beliefs of the people who built them, as well as their contributions to the broader society. Additionally, writing about monasteries can help to raise awareness about their importance and attract more visitors, which can have economic benefits for the surrounding communities that exactly is happening in Tawang now since it is witnessing a huge tourist footprint now.

One of the key research points that need to be addressed is the historical and cultural links between the Mon people and the Tawang Monastery. While there has been some research on the history of the monastery, there is limited information on the role of the Mon people in its foundation and development. Additionally, there is a need to understand the impact of the Mon people's culture and religion on the development of the monastery's architecture and art.

Another important research point is the study of the Mon people's traditional religion and beliefs. There is still a lack of understanding of their traditional religion and how it has evolved over time. This research gap can only be filled by conducting fieldwork and ethnographic research with the Mon people to understand their traditional religion and beliefs. Furthermore, the Mon people have also played a crucial role in the defense of Tawang during various conflicts throughout history. During the Sino-Indian War in 1962, the Mon people were instrumental in helping Indian forces defend Tawang from Chinese troops. The central argument of the book is that the Mon people and their cultural traditions have played a vital role in shaping the history and identity of Tawang.

Their contributions to the region's religious, cultural, and military history make them an essential part of the social fabric of Tawang and its surrounding communities. The book is an important addition to the present body of Tibetan literature because it brings to focus some crucial aspects of Tawang Monastery and the life world of Monyul. There is a need to study the impact of globalization and modernization on the Mon people and their culture. The Mon people have been isolated from the rest of the world for a long time, and their culture is now facing the challenges of globalization and modernization. There is a need to understand how these changes are affecting the Mon people's culture and way of life and what measures can be taken to preserve their unique culture and identity.

There is a significant research gap in understanding the history and culture of the Mon people and their relationship with the Tawang Monastery. To bridge this gap, researchers need to conduct fieldwork and ethnographic research with the Mon people, study the impact of globalization and modernization on the Mon people's culture, and investigate the historical and cultural links between the Mon people and the Tawang Monastery. Last Word Yeshe Dondup's English translation of Gasley Trulku's book on Tawang Monastery is a detailed account of the history, architecture, and religious practices of the monastery.

The book provides a comprehensive overview of the monastery's origins, its evolution over the centuries, and its significance in the Tibetan Buddhist world. The book provides a detailed account of the history of Tawang Monastery, including its founding by Merak Lama Lodre Gyatso in the 17th century. The book describes the architectural features of the monastery, including its various temples, chapels, and other structures. The book provides insight into the religious practices of the monastery, including its daily rituals, festivals, and other ceremonies.

The book is written in a clear and accessible style, making it accessible to readers of all backgrounds. However, it is equally important to understand what the book misses despite covering a range of perspectives. The book does not provide a thorough examination of the political and social context of Tawang Monastery. While it provides some background on the region's history and its relationship with Tibet, it does not delve deeply into the political and social factors that have shaped the monastery over the centuries. The book does not provide a comprehensive account of the monastery's religious teachings and practices. It does provide some insight into the daily rituals and festivals of the monastery, but it does not delve deeply into the philosophical and spiritual teachings of Tibetan Buddhism. The book does not provide a detailed account of the lives of the monks and nuns who live in the monastery. Some information on their daily routines and activities is given, but their personal experiences and perspectives are not explored deeply.

The book doesn't reflect a comprehensive account of the impact of modernization and globalization on Tawang Monastery. It lists some changes that have occurred over the centuries, it struggles to explore the ways in which these changes have affected the monastery and its inhabitants. At last, this book isn't able to give a comprehensive account of the relationship between Tawang Monastery and other Tibetan Buddhist institutions. It sheds some information on the monastery's connections to other institutions; however, it does not explore the ways in which these relationships have shaped the monastery's history and culture.

Opinion: The Erasure of Tibet- A Dangerous Change at the Guimet Museum

I still remember my first visit to the Guimet Museum, a moment of profound importance for me as a Tibetan in exile. Upon entering the museum, I felt a deep connection with the sacred objects on display, artifacts that represented my culture and heritage – our civilization. I saw thangkas commissioned by the Great Fifth Dalai Lama. I saw statues carved by Nepalese artists for Tibetan monasteries in the 17th and 18th centuries. I wanted to remove my shoes in this sacred space before continuing my visit.

For me, the Guimet Museum represented a sacred space for Tibetans living in exile – a place where we could connect to our culture in the face of a relentless 70-year campaign aimed at destroying it in Tibet by the Chinese government. The museum offered a sanctuary where Tibetan identity could be preserved and celebrated, free from the repressive narratives imposed by the PRC.

So recently, when the Guimet Museum in Paris made the decision to replace the term "Tibet" with "Himalayan World" and to designate "Art of Tibet" with the vague terminology "Tibetan Art," it was a shock for Tibetans in France and worldwide. This change is not only scientifically and historically inaccurate, but it also risks supporting the Chinese colonial narrative about Tibet. As a museum with the largest collection of Asian arts outside Asia, its actions carry significant weight, leading to the erasure of Tibetan culture and identity for future generations.

Historical Context and Cultural Importance

Tibet is not simply a place on a map; it is a civilization that flourished for centuries, rich with a unique heritage that predates the establishment of the People's Republic of China (PRC). Tibetan arts, traditions, and religious practices have flourished for centuries, rooted in a unique cultural context that deserves to be recognized and preserved. By diluting this identity and opting for "Himalayan World," the Guimet Museum obscures the rich tapestry of Tibetan history and contributes to a Chinese narrative that has long sought to erase it.

The act of renaming places is not a trivial matter; it is deeply tied to power dynamics and colonial histories. European colonialism sought to inscribe order and meaning on non-European landscapes through the process of naming places. Naming or renaming was fundamental to extending imperial control over physical and human environments. The use of the colonial power's language, alphabet, and cultural idiom was important to express and cement the imperial authority of the former colonial power, and China perpetuates this in its colonies like Tibet and East Turkestan.

The act of renaming is an assertion of authority, stripping away the indigenous connection to land and culture. This is particularly relevant in the context of Tibet, where such renaming efforts are part of a broader strategy to erase Tibetan identity and history. This erasure of Tibet is also an erasure and dilution of our world's rich heritage that goes beyond Tibet.

Moreover, the term "Tibet" also evokes powerful associations with the "Free Tibet" movement, which has galvanized international attention on the Tibetan struggle for freedom. The recognition of Tibet as a distinct entity serves as a reminder of the ongoing colonial domination, human rights violations, and cultural destruction perpetrated by the PRC. In attempting to erase the term "Tibet," the Chinese government seeks to suppress this narrative, diverting attention from the broader Tibetan experience beyond what it designates as the "Tibet Autonomous Region," which encompasses only central Tibet but not the two other traditional provinces of Amdo and Kham.

This invisibilization of Tibet in an important cultural institution like the Guimet Museum is deeply alarming. As future generations engage with these arts, they risk absorbing a distorted understanding of Tibetan culture – one that does not recognize its uniqueness and historical significance. This affects not only Tibetans but also deprives global audiences of a more complete appreciation of the diverse cultures that make up our world.

By adopting terminology that diminishes Tibet's identity, the Guimet Museum perpetuates the erasure of Tibetan culture, facilitating an environment in which colonial narratives thrive. This decision could influence other institutions and researchers, leading to a broader normalization of a distorted view of Tibetan identity that ignores its complexities and historical roots.

I believe that the ability to name one's own culture and heritage is integral to self-determination. The Tibetan people have the right to define their identity, history, and culture, free from external manipulation or erasure. The Guimet Museum's decision to strip Tibet of its name is not simply an institutional choice; it is a denial of this fundamental right.

To defend this incomprehensible change, the Guimet Museum justifies its decision by claiming to want to make the collections "more readable and understandable to non-specialists." However, simplifying our history does not do justice to its richness. Public education and awareness must come through authentic presentation, respecting the complexity of our cultures rather than diluting them. The beauty of human history and Humanity lies in its complexity and diversity. The museum must present History as it is and not rewrite it!

In light of these concerns, it is imperative for the Tibetan world, the field of Tibetan studies, and anti-colonial movements to unite and pressure the Guimet Museum to restore "Tibet" to its rightful place in its exhibitions and communications. We must advocate for the recognition of Tibet as a distinct cultural and historical entity, ensuring that future generations do not inherit a diluted understanding of its rich heritage.

This is not simply a matter of terminology; it is a matter of justice for a culture that has endured more than seven decades of oppression. The Guimet Museum has the opportunity to stand against colonial narratives and affirm its commitment to authentic representation. By restoring "Tibet" in its exhibitions, it can honor the resilience of the Tibetan people and safeguard their identity for generations to come.

The decision to replace “Tibet” with “Himalayan World” is a dangerous and insidious move that perpetuates historical injustices. It is our collective responsibility to challenge this narrative and ensure that the voices of the Tibetan people are heard, recognized, and celebrated. Together, we can help preserve Tibet’s rich heritage and stand in solidarity against cultural erasure.

The struggle to restore the name “Tibet” goes beyond a simple matter of terminology. It is a question of justice, honor, and respect for a people, their history, civilization, and right to self-determination. As a global community, we have the responsibility to oppose cultural erasure and celebrate the richness of diversity that enriches our humanity.

China still challenges India in the Himalayas as BRICS summit approaches

10 October 2024, The Hill, Brahma Chellaney

Indian army vehicles move in a convoy in the cold desert region of Ladakh, India, Sept. 18, 2022.

With the Oct. 22 BRICS summit meeting approaching, China and India have stepped up discussions about defusing their tense military standoff along the long Himalayan frontier. But although the 10-nation summit in the Russian city of Kazan is catalyzing efforts to resolve the confrontation — which has sparked rival force buildups and intermittent clashes — it is far from certain that any deal will be reached.

The standoff between the two Asian giants is not grabbing international headlines, thanks in part to the wars raging in Ukraine and the Middle East. But the threat of the confrontation escalating to a border war of the kind fought in 1962 cannot be discounted. Both sides have significantly ramped up border deployments of troops and weapons, with India acknowledging the situation is “very tense and dangerous.”

The Sino-Indian faceoff, as well as the Russian invasion of Ukraine, are detracting from the international appeal of BRICS, the world’s first major non-Western initiative. Founded 15 years ago by Brazil, Russia, India and China as BRIC, the group, with the addition of South Africa in 2011, became BRICS. And with this year’s entry of five additional countries, it has become BRICS-plus, accounting for nearly half the world’s population and 40 percent of global trade.

As many as 40 more countries have lined up to join BRICS, which seeks to shape a multipolar global order in place of the fading era of Western dominance. An easing of military tensions between nuclear-armed titans China and India could help build consensus to further enlarge BRICS.

The Sino-Indian border faceoff was triggered by China’s stealth encroachments on some Indian borderlands in April 2020. India failed to foresee the Chinese aggression largely because Prime Minister Narendra Modi had focused on appeasing Beijing in a bid to chip away at the China-Pakistan strategic axis. Between 2014 and 2019, Modi met with Chinese President Xi Jinping 18 times, building a close personal rapport. The Xi-ordered encroachments were thus widely seen in India as a stab in the back.

Xi seriously miscalculated that China would be able to present the land grabs to India as a fait accompli, like the Chinese “salami-slicing” expansionism elsewhere in Asia. In contrast to Russia’s full-scale invasion of Ukraine, China prefers incremental expansionism, enabled by stealth and deception.

India’s robust military response to China’s encroachments, including more than matching Chinese force deployments, took Beijing by surprise, helping to spotlight not just the Sino-Indian territorial disputes but also India’s challenge to Chinese power and capability. No other nation, not even the U.S., has locked horns with the Chinese military in this century the way India has since 2020.

Xi, by transforming the Sino-Indian frontier into a “hot” border patrolled by tens of thousands of rival troops, has crimped the further pursuit of his own “salami-slicing” strategy on the Himalayan massif. China will find it more challenging from now on to nibble away at Indian territories.

With the U.S.-China rivalry deepening, the last thing Xi should be doing is turning India into an enduring enemy. Yet as the world’s fastest-growing major economy, India is moving closer to America, with Modi’s foreign policy showing a distinct pro-Western tilt.

With an eye on China, India has ramped up its military buildup and modernization. A stronger India aligned with Western powers and Japan is likely to stymie China’s plan to gain strategic preeminence in Asia.

A war with India could expose China’s weaknesses. Whereas the Chinese military relies largely on conscripts, India, with an all-volunteer force, has the world's most-experienced troops in mountain warfare. The Chinese military, though, has a technological edge over Indian forces.

Against this backdrop, China's recent charm offensive in India, including initiating renewed efforts to defuse the military standoff, suggests that Xi wants to salvage Beijing's relationship with New Delhi – but without losing face at home.

For four-and-a-half years, tens of thousands of Chinese troops have remained deployed along the inhospitable Himalayan frontier, which has some of the harshest terrain on Earth. Oxygen levels are so low that soldiers take weeks to acclimatize before being deployed on the front lines. If Xi were to reach a deal with India centered on a pullback of rival forces, it would raise questions in China about why he ever launched this provocation in the first place.

This may well explain why, in the bilateral negotiations up to now, the Chinese side has sought a deal largely on its own terms, dimming the prospect of reaching an agreement by the time Xi and Modi could meet on the sidelines of the BRICS summit.

But even if Xi climbed down to some extent, leading to a deal to implement a sequential process of disengagement, de-escalation and removal of rival forces, the new warfare-related infrastructure China has built along the India frontier will remain in place. India thus would not be able to lower its guard.

China has bored tunnels and shafts into mountainsides to set up an elaborate underground military infrastructure, as if preparing for war. In addition, it has planted settlers in new militarized border villages, the equivalent of the artificial islands it created in the South China Sea to serve as forward military bases.

China and India, which represent more than one-third of the global population, became neighbors only after the Chinese Communist Party annexed Tibet in 1951. Today, China and India need to find ways to peacefully coexist. Yet, despite the latest efforts to mend fences, their strategic rivalry seems likely to endure.

China's Dark Shadow Over Nepal's Tibetan Refugee Community

09 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Tsering Passang

Beijing's economic and political ties with Nepal make life increasingly hard for the 10,000 Tibetans who escaped there.

China's increasing influence in Nepal is no longer just a geopolitical concern—it is a pressing human rights issue that is affecting the lives of the Tibetan refugee community there. This past summer, I spent a month in Nepal and visited Tibetan refugee camps, where I witnessed firsthand the deepening challenges these exiled Tibetans face as Beijing's grip on the country tightens. What I saw was not just a tale of economic progress, but one of growing repression—disturbingly reminiscent of the conditions Tibetans fled from their homeland over 65 years ago.

One of the most glaring signs of foreign aid in Nepal is the transformation of its infrastructure. Chinese-funded projects, from the arrival of electric buses to the construction of regional airports in Lumbini and Pokhara, are reshaping the country's landscape and its people's attitudes to China. While these projects may bring short-term economic benefits, they come at a heavy price: the erosion of Nepal's sovereignty.

For decades, Nepal has balanced its delicate relationships between India and China. But as Chinese-backed initiatives increase, there is rising concern about Nepal's long-term independence. Despite the construction of new regional international airports, foreign airlines remain hesitant to use these facilities, largely due to India's reservations about China's growing role in Nepal's internal affairs. With Nepal becoming increasingly reliant on Chinese investments, the country's foreign policy risks shifting in favour of Beijing—a shift that could have far-reaching consequences for Nepal's autonomy.

This geopolitical shift has even more serious implications for the dwindling 10,000 Tibetan refugees living in exile in Nepal. Having escaped their homeland after China's occupation of Tibet, where cultural suppression and persecution still prevail, many now find themselves facing similar restrictions in what was supposed to be a safe haven. Expressions of Tibetan identity—whether through wearing a "Free Tibet" t-shirt, raising the Tibetan flag, or participating in traditional cultural practices—are being met with growing hostility. During my visit, I learned that local authorities, likely acting under pressure from Chinese interests, have begun restricting Tibetan cultural practices. Events like Gorshey (Tibetan circle dances), once public celebrations of Tibetan heritage, are now forced underground in the Kathmandu Valley. The chilling effect on these cultural activities is a painful echo of the repression that many Tibetans thought they had left behind.

Even the deeply symbolic tradition of Lhakar (White Wednesday) is now under threat. A movement that grew out of the 2008 protests in Tibet, Lhakar is a weekly expression of Tibetan pride and identity. Every Wednesday, Tibetans speak their language, wear traditional clothing, and support Tibetan-owned businesses as an act of peaceful cultural resistance. But even these small acts of pride are being curtailed. As China's influence in Nepal grows, Tibetans are finding it increasingly difficult to gather, celebrate, and maintain their traditions.

What is particularly troubling is the erosion of the very freedoms Tibetan refugees believed they would find in exile. The rights they sought—freedom of expression, freedom from fear, and the ability to preserve their identity—are being undermined. The parallels between the repression they fled in Tibet and the mounting pressure they face in Nepal are becoming too striking to ignore.

This growing threat to the rights of Tibetan refugees must be a matter of global concern. The international community cannot afford to stay silent. China's expanding influence in Nepal has implications that go beyond mere infrastructure deals—it strikes at the heart of human rights and cultural survival. Tibetan refugees in Nepal have a fundamental right to express their cultural identity, free from persecution or interference.

The time for action is now. Media outlets, human rights organisations, and governments around the world must shine a light on this pressing issue. As China continues to reshape Nepal's political and social landscape, the global community has a responsibility to ensure that Tibetans in exile can live free from oppression and preserve their rich cultural heritage. Their struggle is not just about one displaced community—it is about defending the universal values of freedom, dignity, and the right to exist as a people.

The fight for Tibetan freedom is far from over. As the founder and chair of the Global Alliance for Tibet & Persecuted Minorities, I call on the international community to stand up for the Tibetan refugees in Nepal and recognise the growing threat posed by China's influence. Tibetans' cultural identity and their right to live free from oppression are worth defending—because their fight is a fight for the fundamental human rights we all cherish.

Book Review: The Phallus by Bhuchung D. Sonam

07 October 2024, Phayul, Tsering Namgyal Khortsa

Bhuchung D. Sonam is one of the most prolific poets, writers, and translators in the Tibetan diaspora. He has published nearly half a dozen books and edited two acclaimed anthologies of Tibetan writing: Muses in Exile: The Anthology of Tibetan Poetry, which appeared twenty years ago, and more recently, Under the Blue Skies: A Tibetan Reader.

He is also the publisher of the Dharamshala-based Blackneck Books, an imprint of TibetWrites, which has become an important platform for Tibetan writers, both young and old.

His nearly two-decade-long effort in promoting Tibetan writing was featured in The New York Times and earned him the prestigious Ostana Prize youth award for his translation work.

Sonam has now released his first collection of short stories, The Phallus, which consists of six short stories about Tibet and Tibetan life in both India and Tibet. The book can be read in just one sitting.

Like much of Tibetan fiction, or most fiction in general, the book is grounded in real stories and facts, particularly the history of China's occupation of Tibet and the Tibetan exile in India. Bhuchung-la's book, narrated in both first and third person, is largely autobiographical and based on true events.

In the title story, The Phallus, Sonam provides an account of his grandfather's time in a Chinese labor camp in 1960, where, due to hunger, they were forced to eat worms out of their feces and later the carcass of a donkey when they found one.

"For a few days, fifty prisoners enjoyed the donkey, which not only kept them warm but also rejuvenated their emaciated bodies. However, they could not bite off its penis. They boiled it several times, but it remained rubbery and tough."

The grandfather, a lama in a monastery, would later denounce the teachings of Buddha and praise the Party during his confession in order to be released.

The second story, Way of a Woman, recounts how a husband in Tibet decides to go on a journey against all advice and meets with an accident, drowning in a river along with his horse. The horse returns home without its rider. The widow shows no visible remorse, leading to various rumors in the village, but eventually sells all her horses and belongings and decides to become a nun. The husband, however, continues to appear in her dreams asking for his horses. In response, she says: "The dead have no rights."

The third story, The Connection, is a remarkable piece of detective fiction. The author, while applying for his Indian Identity Certificate (IC)—a long and laborious process for Tibetans—is summoned by the police. He is questioned in connection with an old Indian Muslim friend from his college days, and based on his answers, they attempt to track the friend down. Later, the author reads in a newspaper that his friend was likely among those arrested as one of the masterminds behind the hijacking of an Indian Airlines plane from Nepal. "Five months later, my IC arrived. They had printed my name wrong."

In Under the Shadow, Sonam takes readers on a journey to a Tibetan school in Manali where the principal, who has a penchant for religion, begins to chop down an old tree in the school courtyard to make way for a new Buddhist stupa. The author realizes that the tree was, in fact, planted by his grandfather, who may have once worked at the school. The author reflects on the life of trees and whether trees have souls. The story also touches on an aspect of Tibetan history in India that has rarely been discussed: the construction of roads by Tibetan refugees in the Himalayas during the 1960s and 1970s.

In News from Afar, the final story, a Tibetan refugee schoolboy recalls his life behind the Himalayas in Tibet as he retreats into the wilderness to read yet another letter informing him of a death in the family. "News of one death and then others, over the years, had hardened him somewhat," Sonam writes. The story is filled with heartbreaking nostalgia. "Of all the things he missed about home, his grandmother's stories and her homemade dried cheese topped the list. Elderly women he encountered often reminded him of his grandma, stirring memories of long evenings spent listening to her tales."

When he hears of his father's death from his uncle, tears roll down his cheek. "It was neither the intensity of sadness, nor the sharpness of his uncle's narration, that prompted his eyes to flood. The tears were for his father's youthfulness – a forty-two-year-old man, the head of a family, a good farmer."

The book is full of anguish, dislocation, heartbreak, sadness, sacrifice, and above all, nostalgia for a time gone by. Most importantly, it expresses the lack of a home to call one's own and the urge to use art and writing as a form of redemption.

Despite the somber themes, there is a lot of humor, especially dark humor, in the book, particularly in the title story. There is also a certain ingenuity and practicality in Bhuchung-la's art that is refreshing. I especially liked the book's format, which is perfectly suited for the Instagram age and can be savored in one or two sittings. Even after reading the book twice, I came away satisfied with the different facets of life in exile and Tibet that Bhuchung-la conjures in this slim but powerful volume.

What sets him apart as an author is his lack of authorial anxiety—he simply ends the story where it naturally ends and doesn't feel the need to keep going if the narrative has concluded. His detailed and careful prose—his background as a poet shows—beautifully describes both nature and human expression. The book, which masterfully blends historical realities with personal narratives, evoking the hardships, nostalgia, and resilience of Tibetans, is a delight to read and is yet another important addition to the growing corpus of Tibetan writing in English.

China's Sentinel State

07 October 2024, China India Project, Dalia Parete

Hype around China's "digital panopticon" is huge. But according to Minxin Pei, an expert in Chinese governance and mass surveillance, cutting-edge tech is just one part of the Party-state's toolkit, which also leans heavily on manpower and pervasive self-censorship – what he calls China's "sentinel state."

China Media Project researcher Dalia Parete spoke with Pei about the titular idea behind his latest book, The Sentinel State: Surveillance and the Survival of Dictatorship in China. Pei tells us about what makes the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) brand of mass surveillance unique, considering how it anticipates rather than simply reacts to dissent and how it combines the latest technology with grassroots mobilization and internalized censorship, involving citizens in the very machinery controlling them. It's a system as old as the PRC itself, but one that has changed dramatically in the past few years and which will only continue to evolve.

Dalia Parete: What is the "sentinel state," and how does it differ from the more familiar concept of the surveillance state?

Minxin Pei: In my book, I introduce the concept of distributed surveillance, highlighting how China conducts its surveillance distinctly. While all dictatorships employ repression, the most sophisticated ones, like China, lean heavily on preventive rather than reactive measures – essentially ex-ante repression versus ex-post repression. The real challenge lies in designing an effective system for this preventive repression. Should all surveillance responsibilities be concentrated within a single agency or distributed across multiple entities? Each approach has its trade-offs. For instance, if you go the route of a centralized agency like the Stasi [East German secret police], you invest heavily in a large bureaucracy that could ultimately threaten the ruling party itself.

On the other hand, China's strategy involves decentralizing tasks horizontally across various security agencies, and vertically by incorporating civilian involvement. These civilians, while formally part of the security apparatus, take on key surveillance functions. This creates a unique system where surveillance is distributed and multifaceted, allowing the government to maintain control without the vulnerabilities that come with a single, centralized authority.

While all dictatorships employ repression, the most sophisticated ones, like China, lean heavily on preventive rather than reactive measures.

DP: Which is more important for this sentinel state – the technologies of repression or the human resources of state control?

MP: There's often too much focus on technology itself. While it can be a useful tool, it is used by people. And let's not forget that technology has lots of blind spots. It can accomplish many tasks, but if people implement countermeasures, technology becomes ineffective. For example, if someone wears a mask or a hood, facial recognition systems struggle to identify them. Similarly, if you hide your phone in a Faraday bag, the government loses track of your movements. There are lots of limitations to technology. This is why I believe the most effective approach combines human intelligence and technological resources. China has both advanced technology and a highly organized structure.

DP: What did the Covid-19 pandemic reveal about China's surveillance capabilities?

MP: During the pandemic, China's approach to enforcing lockdowns was truly remarkable, particularly in how it used cell phone monitoring. The most crucial part was the actual collaboration projects with private companies like Alibaba and Tencent, as they developed health tracking systems. Another significant aspect was the use of so-called "grid management" (网格化管理), which is much more labor-intensive and human-focused than technology-driven. This approach proved to be quite effective during the pandemic. China implemented a system where communities are divided into several grids, typically comprising around 1,000 people or 300 families. Each grid is closely watched by an individual who not only monitors these families but also provides various community services.

To effectively lock down a community, you need active participants. So, those two elements – phone monitoring and grid management – played vital roles. Interestingly, traditional tools like facial recognition and video surveillance were not very useful during the lockdown since people were confined indoors.

DP: Would you say the pandemic was a trial run for China's technological capabilities?

MP: Because of the uniqueness of the pandemic, it was a limited test. There was a lot of self-enforcement because people also did not want to get sick. So, during the pandemic, the government didn't need to resort to heavy-handed coercion. About half of the population probably complied with regulations simply out of self-interest and a desire to stay safe.

DP: What role does the Chinese media, including state-run outlets, play? Are they part of the sentinel state?

MP: In this case, official Chinese media don't play a significant role. Their primary function is to disseminate government-sanctioned messaging. I think that social media is the main target for surveillance because the government has a very sophisticated and effective way of monitoring what's happening on social media. If a particular topic starts trending, they swiftly intervene to suppress it. There is a very good system in place in that sense.

In my book, I don't focus on the output side of this – essentially, how the government employs censorship. One lesser-known aspect of China's internet surveillance is how they monitor who is accessing the internet. They've created effective technology to ensure that anyone using the internet has their identity recorded by the authorities. This way, they maintain tight control over online activity.

DP: What lies behind the Chinese state's paranoia and need for control?

MP: This system was developed in the aftermath of Tiananmen Square. This taught the Chinese Communist Party a very important lesson: they needed to be aware of what was happening in society. Like other dictatorships, the Chinese Communist Party is very fearful of dissenting voices, especially activists, because they need to deter the population from engaging in protests, in anti-regime activities. Most of the time, these activities can be led by a small number of activists. Because they set an example, they show the rest of the population that they are not afraid. To make sure this does not happen, the government relies heavily on surveillance. If somebody dares to challenge the Party's authority openly, that person will be discovered and punished.

In my book, I discuss what I call "key individuals." These are people who are subject to close monitoring by human assets and technological means. There are even "internet key individuals" whose online activities are closely tracked. Some of these individuals are restricted from accessing certain websites or services to further limit their influence.

DP: What do you make of China's plans to introduce a national cyberspace ID scheme?

MP: From the Party's perspective, the more control they can exert, the better. That's their mindset. However, we also have to consider the law of diminishing returns. In this context, the additional benefits the Communist Party might gain from implementing a cyber ID are likely quite limited. Given how effectively they control the internet, I'd estimate they oversee about 95 to 97 percent of online activity. To capture that remaining two to three percent would require a substantial investment of resources, leading to high marginal costs that probably don't yield significant benefits. You have to hire people to monitor. You have to actually harass people if you catch them. Then what if they keep posting? It will probably cost them a lot of manpower.

This feels excessive, especially considering that the party can quickly identify who is online. When you use home internet from state-owned providers, your IP address is already known. The same applies to your phone. Even in public places like cafes they have surveillance systems to track IP addresses. So why introduce a cyber ID? It seems largely unnecessary. Additionally, many people in China are already quite cautious about their online behavior, leading to considerable self-censorship.

DP: So why do you think these plans are being rolled out right now?

MP: Xi Jinping has been emphasizing a comprehensive approach to security. National security is not just about defense against external enemies but also maintaining social stability and cybersecurity. So, under that guideline, Chinese censorship agencies and domestic security agencies will ask, "How can we carry out the top leadership's instruction?" So, they propose all kinds of measures, such as cyber IDs. From a bureaucratic perspective, this is a clear response to new directions from the central authority, prompting the bureaucracy to take action. When we look at the current circumstances, like the slowing economy, there's probably more social unrest. There will be a lot more public dissatisfaction. The government aims to suppress expressions of this dissatisfaction and potential social unrest.

By introducing something like a cyber ID, the Party hopes to enhance self-censorship, as people will be afraid to express their dissatisfaction online. However, this approach might backfire. If individuals feel they can't voice their frustrations online without repercussions, they may resort to more destructive means of expression. That's why I believe this strategy may not be beneficial. Over time, this will also depend largely on the economy, as the Chinese security apparatus is primarily funded by local governments. If these local governments do not have the resources, both the human and technological components could suffer. They won't be able to recruit more informants or maintain and upgrade their technology, which, as we know, can be quite costly.

By introducing something like a cyber ID, the Party hopes to enhance self-censorship, as people will be afraid to express their dissatisfaction online.

DP: Finally, what are the scenarios in which the sentinel state might break down?

MP: If the economy breaks down, it will be the first sign of trouble. You'll likely see a degradation of the security system and a rise in public discontent. Another concern is the potential for corruption within the system itself. Those in charge of security wield significant power and have access to resources. Instead of using funds for informants or upgrading the system, they might enrich themselves, leading to better facilities and higher salaries rather than enhancing security.

Additionally, there's the issue of overreach. The demand for security can seem insatiable, like a beast that can never be fully satisfied. This could result in unnecessary spending on resources — like an excessive number of surveillance cameras using the latest technology — when it may not even be needed.

China's Tryst With Religion

07 October 2024, StratNews Global, Resham and Anukriti

Religion In China

China's religious landscape is a complicated collage peppered with distrust, deceit, dubious intents and discouraging party politics. With the government officially recognising five religions—Buddhism, Taoism, Islam, Protestantism and Catholicism—and regulating them with an iron hand, much remains to be seen on how Chinese society grapples with faith or manages spiritual vacuums. Authorities tightly monitor registered and unregistered religious groups. In 2021, the U.S. Government estimated that Buddhists comprise 18.2% of the country's population, Christians 5.1%, Muslims 1.8%, followers of folk religion 21.9% and atheists 52.2% with Hindus, Jews and Taoists comprising less than 1%. In a more accurate estimate, based on publications of the Council on Foreign Relations (May 15, 2024). The percentage of the population having religious affiliations in China is given below.

Members of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) are officially banned from practising religion. While there is some leniency to folk practices; Christianity and Islam are considered foreign religions. The diktat to all religious institutions that they must uphold the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party, promote Xi Jinping thought and Sinicisation of religion, only affirms the acute political control desired by CCP over religion. There is a large and consolidated State effort to ensure religious groups are more aligned to Chinese culture, morality and diktats of the CCP.

Notwithstanding the clampdown measures, practising religion in China has been on the rise. China started with banning religious activities during the Cultural Revolution (1966-76), acknowledging people's demand for religion (1980s), to revival of religious institutions and groups (1990s). While the Constitution does permit following of five accepted religions of Buddhism, Taoism, Islam, Protestantism and Catholicism; these are under strict State control. Apart from registration of religious organisations with State sanctioned patriotic religious associations, supervision by the United Front Work (a branch of the Communist Party) ensures due monitoring and regulation.

The Hammering Of Buddhism

Tibet has been long apportioned the unfortunate fate of being a strategic state in a dangerous neighbourhood at a momentous time in Asian history. The invasion of Tibet (termed "liberation of Tibet" by the Chinese) has profoundly and consistently impacted India-China relations, especially their boundary dispute, which is intrinsically linked to the Sino-Tibetan conflict. Moreover, the institution of the Dalai Lama continues to be the centrepiece of such India-Tibet-China geopolitical complexity. His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, Yeshe Tenzin Gyatso, is one of the most revered spiritual leaders of modern times. His Holiness is the present reincarnation of the previous 13 Dalai lamas of Tibet, who are in turn are considered to be manifestations of Avalokiteshvara, or Chenrezig, the Bodhisattva of Compassion, holder of the White Lotus. He is believed to be the 74th in a lineage that is traced back to a Brahmin boy who lived in the time of Buddha Shakyamuni. Born on 05 July 1935, in a small village of Taktser, located in the province of Amdo, he was named Lhamo Thondup, which literally meant 'Wish Fulfilling Goddess', his journey as the 14th Dalai Lama, started in 1939-40 where he forfeited his name and assumed the name of Yeshe Tenzin Gyatso. His education comprised teachings from the Nalanda traditions, with five major and five minor subjects including logic, fine arts, Sanskrit, Medicine and Buddhist philosophy which encompassed Prajnaparamita (the perfection of wisdom), Madhyamika (the philosophy of middle way), Vinaya (the canon of monastic discipline), Abidharma (metaphysics) and Pramana (logic and epistemology).

1950 saw raids and cross-border incursions by the Chinese into Tibet, threatening the region and robbing the Tibetans of the peace they practiced. In October 1950, reports of PLA crossing the Dri Chu River East of Chamdo with 80,000 soldiers deeply disturbed and threatened Tibet. In a bid to assign political authority over Tibet, His Holiness was officially enthroned the temporal leader of Tibet over six million people at the Norbulingka Palace on November 17, 1950 at the age of 15. With no assistance coming from the U.S. and the UK, the process of dialogue was initiated through the Governor of Kham to prevent the invasion of Tibet.

Eventually through coercion, the Chinese unilaterally announced that a 17 Point 'Agreement on Peaceful Liberation of Tibet' had been accepted on May 23, 1951, between Government of PRC and Local Government of Tibet, even to the extent of forging the Tibetan seal. From July 1954 to March 1957, His Holiness visited China and met Mao Zedong and Chou Enlai, Zhu Teh and Deng Xiaoping. Due to growing threats, increasing brutality against the Tibetans, repression of religion, and in a bid to have sustained existence of faith, on March 17, 1959, with the consultations of the Nechung Oracle, His Holiness travelled to India and crossed the Indian borders on March 31, 1959, and reached Bomdilla in Arunachal Pradesh.

At almost 90, His Holiness is the highest spiritual leader and head of Tibetan Buddhism. His succession has been fiercely debated as CPC has put enormous efforts to have complete influence over Buddhism through control over the legacy of Dalai Lama and institution of a CPC-nominated head. The question over the Dalai Lama's reincarnation reflects the larger ideological and political debates about the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) versus the Communist Party of China (CPC), religious freedom versus materialism, the sovereignty of Tibet versus China's occupation of it, and history itself. New Delhi has over the prolonged political refuge of the Dalai Lama, maintained an ambiguous Tibet policy, primarily with an intent to not infuriate China. There is a case to merit, to refute Chinese claims of legitimacy over the succession of His Holiness and bringing to fore the impact of such a miscalculation which can further Buddhism into an unending abyss of misrepresentation.

Xi Jinping has legislated three core demands to the Dalai Lama: accepting Tibet as an inseparable part of China; abandoning Tibet Independence; stopping activities to split the Motherland; and has advised the Dalai Lama to 'discard any illusion, face reality squarely, correct mistakes, and choose an objective rational path'. China fears that since the 6th Dalai Lama was born in Tawang in 1683, the 14th Dalai Lama, may plan to recognise a successor in Tawang, which makes His Holiness visits to the area highly sensitive and anxious for China. The situation has now often been referred to as the diplomatic grey zone. With limited signs of positive moderation by China over Tibet, rapid Sinicisation of religion, changing demographic overtones, China is set to nominate the successor of the 14th Dalai Lama, while India should prepare for the eventuality of actual successor of 14th Dalai Lama being nominated from India.

Compounded with this is also the striking case of the missing Panchen Lama. Being one of the most important leaders of Tibetan Buddhism, his detention since 1995 is one more significant religiously oppressive step adopted by the CPC. Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, was born in Chinese occupied Tibet on April 25, 1989. At the age of 6, he was recognised by the Dalai Lama as the reincarnation of the previous Panchen Lama. But three days after this recognition, Chinese authorities kidnapped the child and his parents. The Panchen Lama has not been seen since.

The Persecution Of Muslims

The Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, located in China's northwest is the only region in China with a majority Muslim population. The Uyghurs, Kazakhs, Kyrgyz and other communities in this region are ethnically Turkic. As per the 2010 census, Uyghurs made up 46% and Kazakhs 7% of the Xinjiang population. The stories appearing on millions being detained in detention camps, subjected to indoctrination in political education camps, pre-trial detention centres and prisons have all received due coverage in the media. Mass surveillance, arbitrary arrests, forced sterilisations, enforced disappearances and religious erasure are common practices instituted by the State that continue unabated. The Chinese Government calls these detention centres as 'vocational education and training centres'. International media organisations and researchers call these re-education camps, internment camps and detention camps. The detainees are targeted for various reasons, including contact with other Islamic nations, visiting mosques, having more than three children, sending texts and Quranic verses or being extremists.

The entire process of persecuting the Muslims is multi-faceted and systemic. The overarching reasons show that Chinese believe that ethnic minority population threatens social stability and national identity, with violations of birth limits. Xinjiang has been claimed by China since the CCP took power in 1949. Chinese Party officials view the Islamic community as extremist and separatist with threat to China's territorial integrity, government and population. The CCP has since instituted measures to shape all religions to adhere to the Han-Chinese customs, which relate to the atheist party beliefs including passage of an anti-extremism law that prohibits growing long beards and wearing veils in public. The parents are also prohibited from naming their children Mohammed and Medina. The reasons for such absurdities in managing religion stem also from the need to ensure the safety of the ambitious BRI that passes through this region.

Xinjiang is also the region with the largest coal and natural gas reserves in China. Hence, resource extractions without separatist overtones are desirable to ensure there is no unrest. Since 2017, it has also been assessed that Xinjiang's birth rate has declined by 84%. China, however, denies any religious, humanitarian or human rights violations.

The Last Word

There is a much larger need for the world to see religious colonisation being orchestrated by the Chinese in a bid to safeguard the interests of the Party. This legacy of Xi Jinping, will leave a distorted interpretation of religion, selfishly directed by the CPC, whose members are prohibited to practise any form of religion. There is a need for a united call for adherence norms as far as religion is governed, with the international community pitching in ensuring social rights. India's policy on Tibet and the fateful succession of 14th Dalai Lama needs serious review to contextualize the fate of India-China relations.

IAF downs Chinese spy balloon: What is China up to and what is India doing?

07 October 2024, Business Standard, Bhaswar Kumar

An IAF Rafale jet recently shot down a Chinese balloon using a missile at an altitude of nearly 55,000 feet on the eastern front near China

The Indian Air Force (IAF) has reportedly alerted the government about the presence of Chinese spy balloons in Indian skies.

One such balloon, hovering at an altitude of nearly 55,000 feet, was recently shot down by an IAF combat aircraft on the eastern front near China, The Tribune reported on Monday.

An IAF Rafale aircraft, based out of Hasimara in northern West Bengal, was reportedly deployed to destroy the spy balloon, which was carrying a payload. The Rafale jet used one of its missiles to accomplish the task.

What is India doing to deal with Chinese spy balloons?

According to the report, a standard operating procedure is now being formulated to address similar threats in the future.

While another Chinese balloon was also spotted over the Andaman and Nicobar Islands in the Bay of Bengal, it was not shot down by Indian forces.

The Tribune report added that the IAF has also held discussions with its counterparts in the United States (US) regarding the issue.

What are these Chinese spy balloons doing?

In 2023, the US also encountered similar spy balloons launched by China. The US military even shot one down in February that year.

A report from the US Department of Defense (DOD), titled 'Military and Security Developments Involving the People's Republic of China 2023', had also highlighted this threat. "Military and commercial entities in China have been researching and developing high-altitude systems, including high-altitude balloons, since at least the mid-2000s," the report said.

The US authorities also believe that these balloons are steerable.

Meanwhile, Chinese military publications have also discussed the use of high-altitude systems for tracking and targeting.

The US DOD report had also said, "The high-altitude balloon shot down on February 4, 2023 (in the US), was developed as part of this broader military-linked aerial surveillance programme."

In February of 2023, a US military fighter jet shot down a suspected Chinese spy balloon off the coast of South Carolina, a week after it entered US airspace.

The balloon's takedown was reportedly ordered by US President Joe Biden himself.

While several US fighter and refuelling aircraft were involved in the operation, the balloon was taken down by a F-22 fighter jet using a single missile, much like in the case of the IAF Rafale that took down a similar threat recently.

China had condemned the shooting down of the balloon, asserting that the airship was for meteorological and scientific purposes and had "unintentionally" entered US airspace. However, these claims by Beijing were rejected by US officials. The incident led to escalating tensions between the US and China, including a sharp exchange just days later involving US Secretary of State Antony Blinken and China's top diplomat, Wang Yi, at a security conference in Munich.

Blinken reportedly stated that the US would not "stand for any violation of our sovereignty" and warned that "this irresponsible act must never again occur". Meanwhile, Wang dismissed the episode as a "political farce manufactured by the US".

While China continued to deny launching a spy balloon to snoop on the US, the latter claimed that Chinese military balloons had crossed the airspace of more than 40 countries across five continents.

Shortly after the US takedown, Japan also announced that after re-analysing past cases of unidentified flying objects, it "strongly" suspected that China had flown at least three spy balloons over its territory since 2019.

According to a Financial Times article from that period, unnamed Taiwanese officials also said that the island, which is claimed by China, had been surveilled by dozens of Chinese military balloons.

'Monks, Business and Rebellion: Nepal's Bhot-China Relationship and India' book review: Nepal's geographic location is both strength and a weakness

06 October 2024, The Annapurna Express, Randhir Chaudhary

Kitab Publication published two books written by Sudheer Sharma on Sept 15. First, "Monks, Business and Rebellion: Nepal's Bhot-China Relationship and India". Second, "The Storm across the Himalayas: The Changing Nepal-China Relationship after the Republic." After reading both the books here I have attempted to provide a review of the first one. Sharma, a well-known figure in Nepali media, appears to have done deep research for this 376-page book. This book is organized in seven sections including an epilogue.

Nepal-Tibet relations and Chinese domination

The book begins by chronicling Nepal-Tibet trade relations dating back to the 7th century, noting Nepal's diplomatic presence in Tibet for over 374 years. Despite ups and downs, the relationship took a pivotal turn in 1856 with the signing of the 10-point 'Thapathali Treaty' after Nepal's invasion of Tibet. This treaty made Tibet a protectorate of Nepal, which raised concerns for China. A tripartite agreement followed, recognizing both Nepal and Tibet as under the Chinese emperor's authority.

As China increased its military presence in Tibet by 1968, tensions escalated for Nepal. Historical records in the book reveal that China viewed Nepal as a potential part of its sphere of influence, even offering Nepal a place in its union of five ethnic groups (Han, Manchu, Mongol, Tibetan, and Muslim). Sun Yat-sen, the father of the Republic of China, even listed Nepal among China's 'lost territories.' These accounts challenge the popular belief that Nepal was spared from Chinese domination, a sentiment that has lingered in Nepal's historical narrative.

To counter the Chinese threat, Nepal sought British recognition as an independent nation, formalized in a 1923 treaty. Until the 1950s, Tibet was Nepal's immediate northern neighbor, with whom it shared deep cultural, economic, and strategic ties. It wasn't until China annexed Tibet that Nepal found itself facing a new geopolitical reality. While many fear the 'Sikkimization' of Nepal following India's annexation of Sikkim, Sharma's book argues that China's annexation of Tibet and its desire to dominate Nepal receive less attention. Through historical evidence, the book sheds light on China's expansionist approach toward Nepal.

Sharma also explores the influence of Chinese leader Mao Zedong in Nepal during the 1950s. Maoist ideology started spreading in Nepal, and by 2004,

Gangalal founded the 'Lal Communist Party,' influenced by Mao's ideas. Though short-lived, this marked the beginning of communist interest in China within Nepal. By the late 1950s, China became a political shrine for Nepali communist leaders, who were drawn to its propaganda and the spread of the Chinese language, which carried political undertones. The book's fifth chapter, 'Circus,' examines how China used language education as a tool to indoctrinate Nepalis, with the first lessons being "Long live Chairman Mao" and "Down with American imperialism."

Mahendra's elusive nationalism

The chapter 'Mao and Mahendra' focuses on Nepal-India relations, particularly the controversial 1950 Friendship Treaty. Sharma portrays King Mahendra as having two distinct personas: one as the architect of modern Nepali diplomacy and the other as a ruler who curtailed democracy to consolidate power. His nationalist stance is scrutinized, particularly in relation to India. While Mahendra is credited with removing most of the Indian military camps in Nepal, Sharma questions his motives, suggesting that Mahendra used nationalism to preserve the monarchy rather than genuinely serve Nepal's interests.

Contrasting Mahendra's nationalism with the actions of Prime Minister BP Koirala, the book highlights Koirala's balanced foreign policy approach. For example, when Nehru tried to engage Koirala in a united front against China, Koirala resisted, choosing instead to maintain equilibrium between India and China. The book also revisits Mahendra's controversial decision to cede part of Mount Everest to China, undermining his nationalist image.

Preserving the monarchy

Sharma argues that Mahendra strengthened ties with China not out of ideological alignment but as a strategy to counterbalance India's influence. The book also shows how Mahendra cultivated relations with the United States to further his geopolitical goals. During his 1960 visit to the US, just months before imposing the Panchayat system, Mahendra received a warm welcome at the White House and secured substantial financial support. Shortly after, he overthrew the democratically elected government, signaling a shift towards authoritarianism.

The sixth chapter, 'Rajtantra ko Samyawadi Saino,' discusses how successive Nepali monarchs, including Mahendra, Birendra, and Gyanendra, maintained strong ties with China. Sharma's analysis suggests that the monarchy strategically used these relationships to preserve its power. Interestingly, despite its title focusing on Nepal's relations with Tibet, China, and India, the book's chapter on US involvement, particularly during the Mustang rebellion, leads the reader to feel that "America" should have also been featured in the title.

Why US-Taiwan aid package is a signal to China ahead of election

06 October 2024, The New Indian Express, Deutsche Welle

The US recently earmarked one of its largest-ever defense packages for Taiwan. Although helping defend Taiwan enjoys bipartisan support, there are concerns over unexpected changes under a potential Trump administration

US President Joe Biden recently approved one of Washington's largest-ever military aid packages for Taiwan, comprising $567 million (£517 million) worth of defense aid.

The aid will be provided via the "Presidential Drawdown Authority" (PDA), which allows for the "speedy delivery of defense articles" from US Department of Defense (DoD) stocks "to respond to foreign crises." The US is already using this process to send military aid to Ukraine.

China considers Taiwan to be its territory, which President Xi Jinping has vowed will one day be "reunited" with the mainland, by using force if necessary. Beijing has been increasing pressure on the self-ruled island, for example, by demonstrating force with regular military exercises in the Taiwan Strait.

Although it doesn't maintain official diplomatic relations with Taipei, the US is Taiwan's largest security benefactor. China considers any military support of Taiwan to be a provocation.

The White House has said its goal in supporting Taiwan's self-defense is to "continue to maintain peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait."

Taiwan and the new US president

With the US presidential election coming up in November, Chinese pressure on Taiwan is set to be a challenge for the incoming president, whether it be Democrat Kamala Harris, or Republican Donald Trump.

Joseph Bosco, a former Pentagon official on China policy, told DW that "we don't know exactly how [a new] administration will treat Taiwan."

He added the Biden administration was therefore "trying to accelerate the transfer of resources as much as possible during this period."

Bosco, who served as country desk officer for China in the office of the US Secretary of Defense from 2005 to 2006, said the current administration is confident of continuity on China policy from Harris, but "it is not at all clear" what a second Trump administration would do.

Which way would Trump go on Taiwan?

Trump's first administration was hawkish on China, launching a trade war in an attempt to isolate China's economy. Trump also bolstered US security assistance to Taiwan, with $18 billion worth of arms sales notified to Congress during his administration. However, Trump's "transactional" approach to foreign policy is an ongoing concern for US allies in Asia and elsewhere.

Bosco said that the Republican presidential candidate has been "very unsympathetic" in his statements about Taiwan and has become unpredictable about his future Taiwan policy.

"There's no telling which way he could go," he said, adding that he thinks Biden is "hedging his bets" in approving the defense aid drawdown ahead of the election.

During his 2024 campaign, Trump claimed that Taiwan had taken America's chip business, and told Bloomberg in July that Taiwan should "pay the US for defense."

Harris could diverge from Biden on Taiwan

If Harris wins the November election, her administration could adopt a different tone on Taiwan than Biden, who told a TV interview in 2022 that US forces would defend Taiwan if there was an "unprecedented attack." The White House later walked back the remarks.

Bonnie Glaser, managing director of the German Marshall Fund's Indo-Pacific program, wrote in a recent analysis that "Harris might not echo Biden's persistent stance that he will send US forces to defend Taiwan if China invades the island."

"She may opt instead to return to a more traditional policy of strategic ambiguity," Glaser wrote.

Bosco said that Harris would "pretty much follow the Biden policies" in the beginning. However, he added that if China starts "ramping up the pressure on Taiwan and makes some overt moves toward Taiwan ... then we'll see how committed she is to Taiwan's security."

Delays in US defense aid deliveries

Under the US' "one-China" policy in place since 1979, the US "reserves the right" to provide Taiwan with defensive weapons.

Under the policy, the US "acknowledges" but does not officially recognize Beijing's position that Taiwan is part of China, while recognizing the People's Republic of China (PRC) as the sole legal government of China.

China bristles at any support of Taiwan. China's Foreign Ministry responded to the latest US aid package by accusing the US of "emboldening" Taipei to provoke Beijing and threaten the status quo. In July 2023, Biden approved a PDA to Taiwan for the first time, signing off on a $345 million package.

However, delivery problems from the 2023 drawdown were outlined in a September 2024 report by the DoD's inspector general.

The report found a large percentage of equipment sustained water damage while waiting months at a military base for shipment.

It said the DoD "did not effectively or efficiently implement accountability and quality controls" and "provided unserviceable and poorly packaged equipment and munitions to Taiwan."

Taiwan has also reported delays in the delivery of equipment ordered years ago, including Stinger portable anti-aircraft missiles and new F-16V fighter jets.

According to the CATO institute, a US think tank, the topline figure for the backlog of US arms sales to Taiwan remains at $20.5 billion.

Taiwan a challenge for any administration

Besides technical issues, former Pentagon official Bosco said political shifts can also affect US support for Taiwan.

"At some point, other factors enter into the picture: the economy, inflation," Bosco said. "The American public will decide that it's had enough of spending US resources in these various international conflicts."

"A lot of it will depend on the leadership that is shown by the new president in terms of convincing the American public that we need to be involved in these crises ... It'll be a tough challenge for any new administration," he added.

Glaser from the German Marshall Fund told DW that the latest PDA approval "sent a strong signal to Beijing" that the US is resolved to help Taiwan bolster its defense capabilities.

However, she downplayed the importance of its approval ahead of the election.

"There is strong bipartisan support in the US for Taiwan and regardless of the outcome of the US election, arms transfers to Taiwan will continue," Glaser said. "I don't see any special significance in the timing of this."

Why China is investigating US companies Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger

06 October 2024, The Indian Express, Ritika Singh

The move marks the first investigation from China into foreign companies boycotting cotton from Xinjiang. Here's what to know.

China launched an investigation last week into the US company PVH, the parent company of apparel brands Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger, over its boycott of cotton from China's Xinjiang region.

Several Western brands have stopped sourcing raw materials from Xinjiang in recent years, over the alleged use of forced labour in cotton cultivation. Reports have claimed that members of the minority Muslim Uighur community are made to work there as part of the larger discriminatory policies targeted at them by the Chinese state.

The move marks the first investigation into the matter by China, who has now gone beyond simply denying allegations of human rights abuses, and acted against companies for not using Xinjiang's cotton. The decision also comes amid the US and China increasingly targeting sectors of the other's economy over trade, security and strategic concerns. Here's what to know.

What is the investigation about?

In late September, the head of the Bureau of Safety and Control of China's Ministry of Commerce said relevant agencies had reported PVH to the Unreliable Entity List (UEL) working mechanism.

China's Commerce Ministry established the UEL four years ago, allowing it to respond to unfavourable actions taken by enterprises or individuals from a foreign country. Under its provisions, if a foreign entity endangers China's "national sovereignty, security or development interests", suspends normal transactions with a Chinese enterprise or individual, or applies "discriminatory measures" against them and causes "serious damage to their legitimate rights and interests", they can come under the UEL list.

Being on the list allows the Chinese government to restrict or prohibit the foreign entity from engaging in China-related import or export activities, investing in China, entering China, restricting their work permit, or imposing a fine.

So far, a few American defence companies are on the list, although they were already barred from dealing with China by the US government.

What are China's complaints against PVH?

The head of the Bureau of Safety and Control said PVH was "suspected of violating normal market transaction principles and boycotting Xinjiang cotton and other products for no reason without any factual basis, seriously damaging the legitimate rights and interests of relevant Chinese companies, endangering China's sovereignty, security and development interests."

PVH has banned the sourcing of raw materials from Xinjiang. It said in an earlier statement that the company follows the US government's policy regarding Xinjiang.

Under the Biden administration, the US banned the import of cotton and tomatoes from Xinjiang in 2021 under the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act, citing forced labour and human rights abuses. A report from The New York Times noted then, "The area is a major source of cotton, coal, chemicals, sugar, tomatoes and polysilicon, a component in solar panels, that are then fed into factories around China and the world."

Western brands such as H&M, Adidas, Nike and others made statements condemning the possible usage of forced labour at the time and faced an immediate backlash on Chinese social media websites. Pro-government accounts further demanded boycotts and evoked nationalist sentiments, leading to temporary removals of the brands' products from Chinese e-commerce sites.

What could have prompted the investigation now?

Why China has specifically acted against PVH, and why now, is unclear.

On being asked if China's attitude towards foreign investment has changed, the head of the Bureau said, "The Chinese government will unswervingly promote high-level opening up to the outside world", adding, "China has always dealt with the unreliable entity list issue prudently, targeting only a very small number of foreign entities that disrupt market rules and violate Chinese laws. Foreign entities that are honest and law-abiding have nothing to worry about."

But foreign companies have been wary of the business climate in China for a few months now. In 2023, China's amended security law was flagged by US authorities for making foreign entities' business operations difficult, with vague grounds for companies being inspected over espionage suspicions.

Citing security concerns, the US also said in 2023 that it planned to "de-risk" its economy from China or reduce its dependence on it for specific materials like semiconductors, which are critical to manufacture almost all electronic devices.

The two global economic giants' rivalry has given way to major disagreements in multiple areas. Under Xi Jinping as president, China has further taken assertive stances on issues such as the treatment of Uighurs, making global cooperation difficult. Even as the Chinese economy sees a period of slump, a doubling down against US companies is being witnessed.

Former US President Donald Trump also frequently criticised China over trade practices during his term, and later imposed tariffs on its products, which added to the lack of trust in their bilateral ties. Biden has largely continued the stance of being tough on China.

Critical resources and products have been restricted since, such as China curbing the exports of germanium and gallium, metals used in manufacturing critical semiconductors. This year, the US imposed tariffs on importing semiconductors from China.

Are China's lauded anti-poverty triumphs at risk of vanishing?

05 October 2024, SCMP, Yuanyue Dang

In the country's vast rural regions, officials armed with poverty relapse dossiers are struggling to track and help the vulnerable avoid destitution

In Zhongwei, a city in northwest China's Ningxia Hui autonomous region, fighting poverty seems to be a never-ending battle.

While the country as a whole has made tremendous gains in living standards, in July, the city's Shapotou district announced that 28 more individuals had been added to a poverty relapse watch list.

The officials who update the list maintain dossiers on families that are in dire financial straits and aim to stop them falling below the poverty line, while also ensuring that they do not become too reliant on government handouts.

The district did not say how many people in total are on the list but its updates are part of the administration's attempts to avoid a return to widespread poverty as the economy struggles to regain momentum.

The goal is a national priority.

According to state news agency Xinhua, China has spent nearly 1.6 trillion yuan (US$306 billion) to alleviate poverty since Chinese President Xi Jinping took power in 2012.

In 2021, Xi declared that absolute poverty had been eradicated in the country. The next milestone, he said, was to attain common prosperity and a decent standard of living for all by 2050.

Those ambitions rest on preventing a large-scale re-emergence of poverty.

Analysts say that achieving the goals would be crucial not just for building a more equitable society, but also in maintaining social stability and hence strengthening China's hand in its economic competition with the United States.

"The anti-poverty movement has been defined as one of Xi's great achievements, so it will be a big issue if absolute poverty comes back," said Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy.

"As a developing country, poverty is an inevitable problem for China." However, China's model of fighting poverty through massive investment "is not sustainable", Wu said.

Maintaining people's livelihoods has been an ongoing concern for Chinese leaders. The issue was underscored in the "No 1 Central Document" – the leadership's first policy directive issued at the beginning of each year since 2021.

Alarms were raised in 2022 during the Covid-19 pandemic when large numbers of rural residents who were migrant workers had lost their jobs – and their only source of income – during the lockdowns.

They were raised again in January, when the Central Rural Work Leading Group, the top decision-making body for China's agricultural and rural affairs, said that preventing a massive return to poverty was "both an economic and political task".

So much so that when Chinese Premier Li Qiang inspected the southern province of Guizhou in April, he warned cadres that they would be held responsible if people slipped back into poverty.

"We must firmly adhere to the bottom line of not allowing large-scale relapses into poverty by enforcing and consolidating the responsibilities of all parties, maintaining the intensity of support efforts, and ensuring that all policies are well coordinated and implemented," Li said.

The vigilance against poverty relapses featured prominently in July when the Communist Party's Central Committee met to map out the country's economic and national development plans for the next decade.

In a communique issued after the meeting, the leadership called for regular surveillance of low-income individuals and nationwide monitoring of rural populations, where the problem of poverty was more prevalent.

It is not clear exactly how many people in rural China are struggling since the government has not released statistics.

However, last October, the Ministry of Civil Affairs said that the construction of a "low-income population dynamic monitoring platform" had been "basically completed", covering more than 66 million low-income people, more than 3 million of whom were considered at risk of falling back into poverty.

According to a 2021 national census, nearly 510 million people lived in China's rural regions, accounting for 36 per cent of the country's population.

Beijing has previously asserted that preventing large-scale poverty relapses and ensuring food security were "two bottom lines" in its rural and agricultural work.

Those "two bottom lines" had become more urgent since "the spread of Covid-19 and uncertainty facing the world economy and trade", Min Shi, a professor of rural economics at Huazhong Agricultural University in Wuhan, and Wang Xiaobing, a researcher at Peking University's Institute of Modern Agriculture, jointly wrote in an article published in the official Guangming Daily in March 2022.

Poverty lines in China vary from one province to another. In Ningxia, one of China's less affluent regions, individuals who earn less than 9,000 yuan a year are considered to be living below the poverty line and are eligible for government help. This compares with 8,050 yuan in southwestern Yunnan province, and 7,800 yuan in the eastern province of Jiangxi.

According to poverty alleviation manuals issued by local governments, individuals are monitored if they have risen above the poverty line but have unstable incomes, or if they hover above the poverty line but have experienced unexpected events such as natural disasters or sudden illness.

Last summer, the northeastern provinces of Heilongjiang, Jilin and Liaoning – one of China's major grain-producing regions – were hit by floods, which dealt a blow to rice production. In July 2021, in the central province of Henan, almost 15 million people, most of them rural residents, were affected by flooding that destroyed 35,000 houses.

According to the manuals, once a family has been placed under monitoring, local officials must help them through "appropriate means". In Zhongwei, for example, able individuals should be hired for public work such as street sweeping.

Lower-level cadres are under immense pressure to keep poverty under control. People whose names are added to the dossiers are considered risks to the anti-poverty drive and are therefore subject to monitoring.

A town official from a province in central China, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that documenting all vulnerable individuals had been a priority task for the second half of the year, and he expected the provincial government would soon send inspectors to the town to check on their performance. It's really exhausting, and our superiors don't even treat us like human beings

Village cadre

Inspections are already under way in some places. Many grass-roots cadres have vented their frustrations and worries on social media platform Xiaohongshu, describing the pressures they have faced to complete headcounts by the end of the month.

"Has your poverty relapse prevention app crashed too?" read one widely shared post, which described the anxiety felt by a cadre who must use the mobile app to collect information about the families surveyed.

"It's really exhausting, and our superiors don't even treat us like human beings," complained another, who said they must go door-to-door to check on the villagers' incomes.

While China has been praised for lifting tens of millions out of absolute poverty over recent decades, it has also faced criticism that its achievements may have been overstated by some local cadres who exaggerated their results.

Other criticisms have included fabricating the poverty relapse dossiers, and an over-reliance on government subsidies that could leave recipients more vulnerable once the handouts have ended.

Wang Sangui, dean of the China Anti-Poverty Research Institute at Renmin University in Beijing, warned in an interview with China News Service in December 2022 that some of the groups declared by the government to have been lifted out of poverty "relied on wages as their main sources of income" but the Covid-19 pandemic had "seriously affected their employment".

Wang also highlighted the impacts of natural disasters on the rural population, and the fact that many farmers struggled to make ends meet by selling their crops.

He Xuefeng, who researches China's rural governance as dean of the school of sociology at Wuhan University, cautioned in an article published on WeChat earlier this year that some of the government's efforts may be misguided.

He, who conducted field research in seven villages late last year, said some poverty-stricken households had become reliant on government subsidies as family members were unable to work due to illness or disabilities, but the aid had not helped them to make necessary fundamental changes to improve their livelihoods.

Zheng Linyi, a researcher with the China Academy for Rural Development at Zhejiang University, said Beijing should prevent relapses by first "preventing the economy from sliding and providing job opportunities for farmers".

"In recent years, natural disasters such as droughts, floods and earthquakes have happened frequently. The government should help farmers affected by disasters to resume production and livelihoods," Zheng said.

"The growth of farmers' agricultural income is slow, and it is necessary to improve the agricultural subsidy system," Zheng added, referring to subsidies provided by the government through grain sales and farm machinery purchases.

Jaishankar's Hard Sell In Colombo

05 October 2024, MenaFN

The Indian External Affairs Minister S.Jaishankar's parleys with Sri Lanka's new left-nationalist leaders on October 4 were cordial. But India-Lanka relations will still be troubled by the looming Sino-Indian conflict.

Jaishankar had a single-point agenda in Colombo – to convince a sceptical Sri Lankan President Anura Kumara Disسانayake about India's capabilities and what it can do for Sri Lanka's economic growth and prosperity without asking it to compromise its sovereignty. It was a difficult task given the latent and long standing distrust in the relationship.

The visit took place in the immediate aftermath of the September 21 Sri Lankan Presidential election in which the radical leftist and pro-China underdog, Anura Kumara Dissanayake of the National Peoples' Power (NPP), beat stalwarts like incumbent President Ranil Wickremesinghe and Sajith Premadasa, leader of the large Samagi Jana Balawegaya (SJB) party.

Unlike Wickremesinghe and Premadasa, who had no ideological angularities either in their domestic or foreign policy, Dissanayake's has been dyed in the wool ideological politics. He has been a longstanding campaigner against "Indian domination".

The NPP, a 21-party alliance, is avowedly moderate. But its core is the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP) which has had a strong and anti-Indian strand since its founding in 1965. Dissanayake is the current JVP Supremo.

Articulating the NPP's policies ahead of the Presidential election, its spokesman (and the present Foreign Minister) Vijitha Herath told Ceylon Today that a JVP delegation had told Jaishankar early this year that under an NPP government, foreign-funded or foreign executed projects would have to go through a transparent and public tendering process.

Herath was decrying past projects that were farmed out to foreign parties with nothing more than a cabinet decision under the category of "Strategic Projects". Herath said such handing out of projects was a source of huge corruption.

In the case of India, the West Container Terminal project at the Colombo port was given to Adani Ports and two wind power projects in North Sri Lanka were given to the Adanis and another Indian company, under pressure from New Delhi.

Herath assured that the existing projects would be allowed to proceed as they were a done deal, but future projects would have to go through a transparent tendering process. Indications are that the same stringent conditions will apply to all foreign-funded projects including China-funded ones. Deviation from his much trumpeted rectitude will be difficult for Dissanayake.

Seeing the writing on the wall, Jaishankar went beyond hard selling India's economic capabilities but also displayed humility in doing so. This was evident in his message on the social media platform X from Colombo. He said that he took "guidance" from President Dissanayake on India-Lanka relations. "Appreciate his warm sentiments and guidance for the   relations," Jaishankar messaged after talks with the President.

Jaishankar assuaged Sri Lankans' anxieties about Indian domination in security matters. The official Indian readout said that Jaishankar and Dissanayake "recognised the importance of a continuous dialogue on security and defence to promote trust, transparency and mutual sensitivity."

Sino-Indian Conflict

India-Sri Lanka relations are not confined to the two countries. There is an elephant in the room and that is China's presence, whether real or imaginary. India objects to Chinese projects and visits of Chinese oceanographic research vessels on grounds of security.

India sees the Chinese-built and operated Hambantota port and the setting up of a power plant in North Sri Lanka by Chinese companies as a security threat. It saw the setting up a radar station in Ruhunu University on the southern coast also as a threat.

With the economic giant China in mind, Jaishankar gave a tutorial to Dissanayake on India's capabilities and what India can do for Sri Lanka's development in the field of energy production and transmission, fuel and LNG supply, connectivity, digital public infrastructure, health and dairy development.

On Sri Lanka's debt restructuring efforts, Jaishankar recalled that India had been supportive of Sri Lanka's economic stability and recovery from the very start. India was the first country to give financing assurances, which enabled the IMF to finalize the Extended Fund Facility.

Jaishankar confirmed India's support in the Official Creditors' Committee for Sri Lanka's agreement with International Sovereign Bond holders. India is also willing to expedite the conclusion of its bilateral MoU with Sri Lanka, Jaishankar added.

In his discussions with Foreign Minister Vijitha Herath, Jaishankar said that India has offered to modernize the Kankesanthurai port in north Sri Lanka through a grant of USD 61.5 million. Payments for seven completed Line of Credit projects to the tune of USD 20 million could be converted into a grant, Jaishankar added. Further, India had decided to gift 22 diesel locomotives to the Sri Lankan Railways.

In response, Dissanayake said that India's economic support is critical for Sri Lanka to realize its vision of a prosperous country meeting the aspirations of its people. He referred to the potential for exporting renewable energy to India as it would help reduce production costs in Sri Lanka. The President also noted the contribution of Indian tourists to the Sri Lanka's economy and said that this has the potential to grow further.

Dissanayake took care to assure Jaishankar that Sri Lankan territory will never be allowed to be used in a manner inimical to India's security interests.

While both India and Sri Lanka appear keen on building a smooth relationship, India's quest for security against China could clash with Sri Lanka's aspiration to assert its sovereignty and independence. The clash between these two agendas had soured India-Sri Lanka ties every now and then.

India is very keen on re-starting discussions on the Economic and Technology Co-operation Agreement (ETCA). But as in the case of land connectivity, ETCA has been scary for Sri Lankans who fear Indian domination. In the Sri Lankan mind, land connectivity or very close economic cooperation, would be a recipe for Sri Lanka's subjugation.

In fact, the projects mentioned by Jaishankar in his discussion with AKD have been on the anvil for a long time but have not seen the light of day. Sri Lankans tend to agree to Indian proposals and even ink agreements, but drag their feet in implementing them.

In the months and years to come, a resurgent India will try to stem the encroachment of China in its neighbourhood. And China will try to test India's strength in the region. Sri Lanka like other South Asian neighbours will draft China to help it resist New Delhi.

Indian and Chinese Presence

Both India and China are deeply involved in Sri Lanka. The Sri Lankan armed forces have been operating a range of Indian defence equipment like L-70 guns, Indra Radar, Offshore Patrol Vessels and Army training simulators.

India had given offshore petrol vessels, and more recently, a Floating Dock. A Maritime Rescue Coordinating Centre, backed by a US$ 6 million grant from India, has been set up in Colombo. It includes seven remote stations along the island's eastern seaboard, including one close to the Chinese-run Hambantota port.

India is a major trainer of Sri Lankan armed forces personnel. India-trained officers are the single largest group in the Sri Lankan armed forces.

India regularly holds military exercises with Sri Lanka, like Mitra Shakti with the army, and SLINEX with the navy. Indian naval vessels keep visiting Colombo and other ports very regularly (even to celebrate Yoga Day!). There have been visits by aircraft carrier INS Vikramaditya and submarines as part of New Delhi's power projection.

China's Presence in Sri Lanka

China's economic activity has been on the back foot in Sri Lanka since COVID- 9 and the Sri Lankan economic crisis in 2020. But China had already invested in major infrastructural projects in Sri Lanka earlier, like the Hambantota Port, Katunayake-Colombo Expressway, Norochcholai Coal Power Project, among many others since 2010.

During last year's financial crisis in Sri Lanka, China's response was tepid compared to India's because Sri Lanka owed it US$ 7.4 billion. But later, China agreed to restructure Sri Lanka's debt. It said that Sri Lanka will not have to immediately repay the principal and interest due for the years 2022 and 2023.

During Sri Lanka's war against Tamil separatists, China had sold a lot of arms to Sri Lanka. According to the Stockholm Peace Research Institute, China traded military equipment worth US$ 749 million since 1959. China's arms trade with Sri Lanka between 2000 and 2008 was US$ 271 million.

After the war, some submarines and a few naval research vessels visited Sri Lanka, raising a storm in India. All in all, China's military's influence in Sri Lanka is nothing in comparison to India's.

Why do so many Chinese officials fall for fake promises of political charlatans?

04 October 2024, SCMP, Sylvie Zhuang

Party insiders who should know better are being targeted by tricksters claiming connections and influence, despite crackdowns

All Su Hongbo had to do was brag about his Beijing connections and package himself as someone who could make things happen. The charade ended in 2020, when he was revealed as a conman and later convicted on corruption charges.

To the party's corruption fighters, Su was as a typical "political charlatan" – an impostor who fakes ties with high-level officials for gain – and was accused of "seriously polluting and damaging the political ecology".

Since then, the term "political charlatan" has turned up in numerous transcripts of investigations into officials who, despite their knowledge of the internal workings of the party system, were fooled by businesspeople who took advantage of their ambitions.

The scale of the problem meant that when the party's all-important third plenary session vowed in July to continue President Xi Jinping's signature anti-corruption campaign, political charlatans were named as a target.

It echoed Xi's message at the past two annual plenary meetings of the Central Commission of Discipline Inspection (CCDI), the party's anti-corruption watchdog, when he called on cadres to "persistently purify the political environment".

At this year's meeting in January, Xi said there was a need "to crack down on various political charlatans and strictly prevent the principles of commercial exchange from infiltrating the party".

Meanwhile, last year's amendments to the party's regulations also specified that befriending political charlatans or being exploited by them could lead to expulsion in the most severe cases.

But why are people inside China's party state system fooled so frequently by outsiders bragging about their political influence, and how do political charlatans manage to persuade officials that their claims are genuine?

According to an enforcement and disciplinary official who spoke under condition of anonymity, some corrupt officials turn to the fraudsters in the hope they will help to cover up their behaviour.

"They naively believe these individuals can use their connections to intervene, plead, or cover up their case," the official said, adding that these mindsets were exploited by the charlatans to carry out fraud.

"Also, because these officials know they are guilty of corruption, they are too afraid to report the charlatans, even after they realise they have been deceived."

Some disgraced officials that have been accused of trying to advance their careers by courting political charlatans have been at the ministerial level, such as former justice minister Fu Zhenghua who was jailed for life in 2022 for corruption.

Despite being the second most powerful man in China's police force, Fu was manipulated for 20 years by a political charlatan, according to a 2021 report by state broadcaster CCTV.

"Anyone with a normal thought process and logical reasoning" would not have believed that a man with only a technical school education could be an expert and high-level adviser to the leadership as he claimed, CCTV reported.

"However, Fu Zhenghua fell for it."

According to the report, Fu received nothing from the relationship while the charlatan gained land development projects contracts and jobs for his relatives.

In the past two months, the CCDI has made a number of announcements about allegedly corrupt officials accused of associating with political charlatans.

They include Wang Yilin, former party secretary at China National Petroleum Corporation, and Wang Yong, who was a member of the party's leadership group in the Tibet autonomous region.

Both were placed under investigation and accused in July of having "long associated with political fraudsters".

With most officials drawn from society's well-educated elites, the phenomenon seems "counterintuitive", according to a Beijing-based political scientist, who asked not to be named because of the issue's sensitivity.

But, he said, "it isn't that surprising" that they could still be deceived, because the party's centralised decision-making systems allowed little personal control over career progression.

"The party has a saying, that cadres cannot design their own career development. This means that the career path of a cadre, such as promotions or transfers, is not something they can control – it is determined by higher-ups."

The idea that officials should have no say over their careers is not new. In 2018, Xi reinforced the message to personnel chiefs from around the country at the national organisational work conference.

"Personal effort isn't about self-design or aiming for a certain position, but rather about enhancing political experience and practical skills to become someone loyal to the party and useful to the country," Xi told them.

Deng Yuwen, former deputy editor of Study Times, the Central Party School's official newspaper, said people turned to fraudsters because the system itself was designed to be accountable upwards rather than downwards.

"The legitimacy of officials' powers does not come from recognition by the public, or their achievements. It comes from the higher-ups, from the recognition of these higher-level officials. So officials would be seeking connections with the higher-ups."

A CCDI report published in May last year said the deceivers usually described themselves as people who could be trusted to intervene in governmental personnel arrangements.

The CCDI also found that the activities of the political charlatans reached their peak during leadership transitions and personnel changes.

According to the political scientist, as individuals ascend to higher levels, there are fewer people to confide in and the rules on how things work become less clear. Career progression is also unpredictable and becomes increasingly complex and uncertain.

"One has no control over his own career development or even personal safety, which he cannot grasp at all, and the lack of any information, [as well as] the absence of people around to discuss or verify content," he said.

Higher-level political operations had become "increasingly mysterious", he said. "As it is highly opaque and [with] no other channels to communicate or verify information, these fraudulent individuals have more room to manoeuvre."

There is also the risk of falling out of favour and standing too close to the wrong camp before transitions of power, which may cost an official their personal safety and freedom, according to the political scientist.

The past two years have seen several dramatic incidents, including the dismissals of two senior ministers, Qin Gang and Li Shangfu, both the shortest serving officials in their respective positions.

Former foreign minister Qin was last seen in June 2023, before he was abruptly removed from his post and all other positions. Beijing has never officially explained his removal, saying only that he had resigned.

Li, who was defence minister, was also abruptly removed from his post last October without explanation, a year before the party finally announced he had been placed under investigation. Claus Soong, an analyst at Berlin-based think tank the Mercator Institute for China Studies, said the opaque nature of the party system was inside out. "Within the system, everything is opaque, so the left hand doesn't know what the right hand is doing. "And people inside the system often lack the information and ability to discern fraudulent activities, which are typically disguised with prospects for career promotion to hook up comrades."

A Beijing-based official, speaking on condition of anonymity, also said the information imbalance went both ways, with those in higher positions not always knowing the full picture needed to make informed decisions or gain clarity.

Selections and promotions were mostly decided by superiors but "they often cannot fully understand the abilities and performances of all their subordinates", leading to an information asymmetry.

This provided an opportunity for fraudsters claiming to have strong connections with high-ranking leaders and the ability to influence their decisions, which "can be very tempting for officials who are eager to advance in their careers", the official said.

Another official based in southern China, who also requested anonymity, said some high-ranking officials were particularly vulnerable. They had little contact with the grass roots, which meant they were easily tricked.

According to the southern official, there are people who specialise in targeting these individuals by pretending to have connections in Beijing and then asking for money to pay bribes.

How India-China border tensions affect Ladakh nomads

04 October 2024, DW, Priyanka Shankar

Nomads in Ladakh are facing restricted access to grazing lands. As their traditional way of life hangs in the balance, what solutions exist to safeguard their rights?

One evening in mid-September, as the sun began to set, the grunts of Kunzes Dolma's yaks filled the sandy streets of Chushul, a Himalayan village in Ladakh, India, near the border with China.

The 68-year-old whistled to guide the animals toward her brick hut. Dolma is a herder from the Changpa community, a seminomadic group that lives in eastern Ladakh's Changthang Valley. Her family owns over 300 sheep and 50 yaks.

"The nomadic lifestyle is harsh, but I enjoy taking my cattle to graze in the mountains," said Dolma, who sells sheep wool and yak milk at the local market.

Dolma told DW that life has become difficult for her family because the Indian military has restricted grazing near the India-China border due to a territorial dispute.

"The pasture in that region is very good. Now, we cannot use the land to graze our cattle," Dolma said, with her 37-year-old daughter, Tsering Lamo, echoing her concerns.

"These days with restrictions triggered due to military tensions, it is no longer pleasurable to be a nomad," Lamo said, adding it is a harsh lifestyle, suggesting that, "it is better for younger people to take up other jobs."

What is the border dispute all about?

Chushul is about 8 kilometers (5 miles) from the de facto border between India and China, known as the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

The high-altitude village was impacted by the 1962 Sino-Indian war, triggered by differences over the ownership of the regions of Aksai Chin and Arunachal Pradesh.

The conflict lasted for over a month and ended with Beijing declaring a cease-fire and claiming sovereignty over Aksai Chin.

While India and China have fought only one major war since the 1960s, there are occasional clashes along the LAC — which India claims is 3,488 kilometers (2,167 miles) long and China says is shorter.

In May 2020, a skirmish in the Galwan River valley resulted in the deaths of at least 20 Indian soldiers, with China later confirming four of its troops had been killed.

Since then, both nations have ramped up patrols along the LAC and on Pangong Tso lake, a pristine but disputed area claimed by both sides.

Rigzhin Dorjay, a farmer who has lived in Chushul all his life, said the 2020 clashes reminded his family of the 1962 war.

"I was not born when the war in the 1960s took place but my parents often told me about how afraid they were," the 55-year-old told DW.

"They said the Indian military had helped them feel secure. So when the 2020 clashes took place, I trekked up to the mountains to give the Indian military officers securing our border food and rations."

Zhou Bo, a retired senior colonel in China's military, explained that tensions persist because the India-China border has never been "clearly demarcated."

"The military tensions have spilled over into political tensions since nobody actually knows who is controlling what," he told DW.

"India says that unless this border issue is solved, relations won't improve. So China is just waiting," Bo said, adding that there are other issues at play like market forces, which also influence relations.

"Bilateral trade is on the rise between both the countries. India is aware [of] this, making solving tensions with Beijing important," said Bo.

Solutions to secure land rights

Farmer Dorjay acknowledged the complexity of border tensions, but emphasized the need to find solutions for farmers and nomads who are losing their land.

"I mainly cultivate crops like barley and peas and this year the harvest was good," he said, adding that he can no longer use land near the border.

"Also, due to climate change and global warming we have water scarcity in the region which has made it challenging."

Chetan Doye, who also works as a farmer in Chushul, said that due to military tensions there has been no development in their border village.

"The government has constantly promised us that we would be given funds to develop facilities in the village like installing electricity and funds to cultivate our lands," the 76-year-old told DW. "But the money does not seem to be reaching us."

Ladakh's nomads push for rights and recognition

Ashish Kothari, co-founder of the Indian environmental group Kalpavriksh, told DW that recognizing the land and resource rights of nomads and farmers in the Changthang region under the Indian Forest Rights Act could offer support. The legislation protects the livelihoods of traditional forest dwellers and tribal communities across the country.

Ladakh is a union territory, which means it is directly governed by the Indian central government. Including Ladakh in the Sixth Schedule of India's constitution, which allows Indigenous tribal people to make their own laws and policies, would ensure that the interests of nomads and farmers are protected.

Demands for "Sixth Schedule" status have gained momentum in Ladakh recently, with local environmentalist Sonam Wangchuk holding rallies in favor of the move.

But Konchok Stanzin, the councillor of Chushul at the Ladakh Autonomous Hill Development Council in Leh, said that autonomy for Ladakh would not necessarily solve issues of land and development.

He admitted that nomads and farmers in the villages bordering China have lost land in the buffer zone between India and China. But he highlighted that due to the ongoing military tensions, security of the country and people is of primary importance.

"We are aware that loss of land as pastures and for cultivation is important. So we have submitted border village development scheme proposals to the central government to ensure they sanction packages that will assist people in eastern Ladakh, especially during the winter months," Stanzin told DW.

Watching her sheep and yak amid the cold desert hues of her village, Dolma said there are times when she listens to the news about Indo-China relations and worries about the future of their land.

"I am getting older and we do face many difficulties as we traverse across the land as nomads. While there is peace between India and China right now, it is possible that a war could also take place since it is a complex issue at the border," she said.

"But when I'm in the mountains with my cattle and high valleys and mountains and pristine rivers surround me, I am at peace. Nature heals."

Sino-Indian relations coming full circle

04 October 2024, New Age. Ruksana Kibria

BEGINNING in 1950, Sino-Indian camaraderie reached its buoyant apogee with the Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru's inaugural visit to Beijing in October 1954, the leitmotif of which was the spirit of Hindi-Chini bhai bhai (India and China are brothers). Since then, it has been marked by a gradual trajectory of decline, due to a host of controversial reasons. The course of Sino-Indian relations has been convoluted, contentious and indecipherable, hence making it difficult to tell where facts end and myths begin.

Subsequent to the 1962 Himalayan debacle, the epistemic predicament has been further compounded by the media-generated refrain of rivalry between China and India, rendering it almost axiomatic that the two Asian neighbours are to always remain at odds with each other. This discursive construction of unmitigated tension has been buttressed by statements of policymakers, strategic experts and scholars, Indian rather than Chinese, though – while India is deemed to have a 'China problem,' China doesn't have a corresponding 'India problem.' According to the security analyst, Harsh V Pant, 'It is the structure of global politics that by definition makes Sino-Indian competition inevitable.' Also taking a structuralist approach, Ashley J Tellis, senior fellow at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, contends that as emerging Asian powers, China and India will continue to vie for power and influence in South Asia and elsewhere. In the view of Shashi Tharoor, the prolific Indian scholar-diplomat-politician, Beijing is 'a formidable adversary' of New Delhi. Some Indian analysts are even apprehensive that China poses 'an existential threat' to New Delhi's strategic interests in Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Nepal, as well as inside India. The eminent American Sinologist, John Garver, argues that 'India and China share a fundamentally antagonistic and competitive relationship in which conflict is inherent.'

That being said, it should now be interesting to delve into the matter and determine the validity of these above-mentioned observations and to what extent China is actually an 'existential threat' for India. An attempt will be made to broadly assess the state of Sino-Indian relations through the connectivity, economic, governance and strategic prism, the four themes underpinning them.

Connectivity

ACCORDING to Smruti Pattanaik, Research Fellow at the Manohar Parrikar Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses, 'India and particularly the West view BRI [Belt and Road Initiative] as a geo-economic manoeuvre by China to assert control over the world's economic arteries from a geopolitical standpoint.' As far as infrastructure and connectivity are concerned, the Chinese-sponsored BRI, Indo-Japanese Asia-Africa Growth Corridor, and the US-led Indo-Pacific Strategy, (including its private sector, market-based derivative, the Blue Dot Network infrastructure project, launched in response to the Chinese variant), are essentially complementary, not conflicting: if BRI is seeking to influence the global economic highways, so is IPS, but unlike the Cold War, the goals of the two projects are not zero-sum. Rather, they are manifestations of what one scholar has characterised as 'messy alternative pluralisms' and, as such, deserve to be treated not in black-and-white but in a nuanced manner. Likewise, the International North South Transportation Corridor (INSTC), a 7,200-km-long multi-modal connectivity initiative launched by India, Iran and Russia in 2000, seeks to connect Eurasia along a north-south axis; BRI, too, aims to do the above-mentioned, but in the east-west direction. Mutually reinforcing each other, according to one Indian diplomat, 'North-South Corridor and BRI are not incompatible.' It may be mentioned that both China and India are involved in infrastructure development in Iran, often in the same project, like the Chabahar Port, a prospective trans-regional economic hub. Analogously, they are also to invest, without any 'collision,' in the Mongla port improvement project in Bangladesh for the trans-shipment of (Chinese?) goods to India's landlocked northeast.

Given the benefits that BRI would potentially bring and the prospects of China and India ultimately achieving a community of common destiny, it is not inconceivable that, in order to boost economic productivity, in the not-so-distant future, even India itself may participate in the Chinese initiative. Connectivity and globalisation being intertwined, greater linkage will enable both China and India to further explore Asian markets through trade and investment. Their active collaboration in Central Asia and the Persian Gulf to extract resources through the market mechanism, foregoing competition for exclusive access, is telling. Besides, an integrated transport network to connect the four countries under the Bangladesh, China, India, Myanmar (BCIM) Economic Corridor sub-regional initiative can only be achieved with the two Asian powers working together. Infrastructure development, like highways, railroads and energy pipelines, by both along the Sino-Indian Line of Actual Control (LAC), ostensibly for military purposes, can also, under amicable circumstances, foster regional connectivity, thus joint development and trade relations between them. Similarly, the planned BRI trans-Himalayan 75-kilometre railway route across the China-Nepal border may also invigorate Sino-Indian trade in the future.

Economic

CHINA and India are being extolled for presumably redeeming their glorious pre-19th century/pre-colonial heritage through their re-emergence on the world stage. Reality, however, is far more complex than this simple narrative suggests. The template of Western state and multinational corporation-led achievement of China's historical 'modernisation' project is being applied in 21st century India, too. After all, BRICS, the acronym of the four emerging countries who are to play a key role in reshaping the global economy – Brazil, Russia, India and China (South Africa having been added subsequently), was coined by the investment bank Goldman Sachs as a marketing tool. Globalisation, having undermined the concept of a truly national and independent economy, valorises the optimisation of primarily production and, secondarily, consumption. As its beneficiaries, the multinational corporations are exploring the market opportunity the two Asian votaries of globalisation (with one-third of the world population, vast cheap labour, and one-fourth global consumer spending, whose combined GDP by the turn of the next century is expected to be about 43 per cent of the global), embody. Concomitantly, the corporate quest for diversification and a relatively secure but lucrative location for their operations, the 'China+1 strategy,' is coming to fruition. With more than 1.4 billion potential consumers and $3.5 trillion GDP, India is poised to be the prospective '+1' option, as well as the next development powerhouse. China's huge consumption market too has not escaped Indian policymakers' attention, especially when it has replaced the US as India's largest trading partner. When asked by an interviewer about the possibility of 'very soon' Bollywood producing films more responsive to Chinese rather than local sensibilities, the Indian minister of external affairs, Dr Subrahmanyam Jaishankar, responded unequivocally, 'If [we] can make money on it, why not?' Emerging separately but parallelly, they are practically 'two peas in a pod,' with India being a new China in the making: manufacturing is being outsourced to China and services to India, in which it has an advantage (though in the recent years, manufacturing is increasingly occurring there, too). The remarkable complementarity between their developmental evolution having hardly left any room for competitiveness and the economic relations between them operating synergistically, the two countries are considered to be the most yin and yang in the world, with China regarding India as a partner (albeit junior) rather than an adversary. Jairam Ramesh, a Congress leader, has even employed the portmanteau word 'Chindia' to denote the virtual symbiosis of China and India, having 'separate beds but same dream.' It should be noted that, flying under the radar and without any official acknowledgement, it's difficult to gauge the magnitude of their bilateral trade volume and other economic transactions, which are far more robust than is reported.

Governance

DESPITE enduring belief in binary ideologies, treading the same path, Chinese and Indian political systems are beginning to appear comparable, what with New Delhi's authoritarian but pro-business 'billionaire raj' government, a la Chine, which may be an incipient reflection of what is quipped to be India's 'dictator envy for China.' Since the 2014 election of prime minister Narendra Modi, the Chinese president Xi Jinping has been optimistic about rekindling the dormant Hindi-Chini bhai bhai ethos. Furthermore, renegotiating the post-1947 Nehruvian consensus under the current political dispensation, the tenor of Indian democracy is attuning itself to the Chinese concept of democratic system. One can thus be forgiven for wondering whether the likelihood of Chinese values, norms and preferences subtly permeating the Indian body politic is farfetched. As an 'autocratising' country, the V-Democracy Institute regards 'India [to be] on the verge of losing its status as a democracy,' while a 2020 Freedom House report states that 'the Indian government's alarming departures from democratic norms under [...] Modi's Bharatiya Janata Party could blur the values-based distinction between Beijing and New Delhi.' In that case, India's claim to be a democratic alternative to China becomes debatable. Globally too, China and India are working in tandem, both enjoying a shared vision for the 21st century, and are integral to a multipolar and multi-aligned global system, having compatible approaches to Myanmar, the Rohingya issue, trade negotiations at the World Trade Organisation, the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, and climate change. Besides, both of them are benefiting from the Ukraine War alike. Their armies have also held joint military exercises, while the Indian Navy and the PLA Navy have been coordinating their counter-piracy missions in the Gulf of Aden since 2008. Mutual interests in jointly monitoring the maritime global commons, charting their future cooperation in the ocean economy, and underwriting regional stability for sustained economic growth, as well as facilitating regional integration through finding an institutional expression in the Indian Ocean Region, could further elevate their partnership.

Not opposed to China's interest in expanding BRICS membership, India's active role in the group's Development Fund and the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank is also advancing its collaboration with China, with both sharing a common approach towards international trade in agricultural goods and intellectual property rights. Given New Delhi's aspiration to play a leadership role in global governance, there's also a high probability of it participating in the Beijing-led Global Development Initiative, Global Security Initiative and Global Cultural Initiative, which would have profound implications for the deeply troubled liberal international order.

Strategic

ASTONISHINGLY, despite the long-term perceived threat to India and the emergence of a panoply of research centres, think tanks and academic programmes dedicated to studying the People's Republic, New Delhi has not produced a coherent China policy. Bombastic Chinese rhetoric aside, Beijing too has failed to demonstrate its naval prowess and launch its much-heralded Indian Ocean fleet, which is not commensurate with its presumed image as a great power. Curiously enough, despite both China and India resolutely professing to have divergent strategic cultures, research indicates there to be hardly any distinction between the two. In the realm of maritime security, regardless of bellicose posturing, neither of them is actually pursuing a containment policy. The Indo-Pacific expanse being vast enough to accommodate both, rather than forming an anti-Chinese coalition, these factors may prompt New Delhi to come to a tacit agreement with Beijing to share the pivotal maritime space between them, with India having an unchallenged pre-eminence in South Asia/Indian Ocean Region, and China in East Asia and Western Pacific. In fact, such a scenario is already looming on the horizon.

Portraying China as the 'greatest shared strategic challenge,' New Delhi has succeeded in cementing its security links with the Indian Ocean Region littoral countries through the Colombo Security Conclave (CSC), the minilateral arrangement, composed of India, Sri Lanka, Maldives and Mauritius, Bangladesh being the most recent member. The CSC is expected to play a crucial role in consolidating India's regional primacy, which is further leveraged through the US call for a 'new maritime statecraft' and endorsement of India's centrality as the regional security provider in South Asia. By bringing the IOR countries within its orbit, the threat perception of the member-states cannot but resonate with that of New Delhi, nor can they circumvent strategic dependence on it. 'China is balancing against India's regional hegemony by increasing its influence through [the] small states' – such media trope, stoking anti-China animus and exaggerating the China threat perception is untenable, since India stands to gain from such dire projections. Considering that India is evidently having its metaphorical strategic cake and eating it too, the key question, whether Chinese engagement in these smaller South Asian countries is necessarily antithetical to India's interests, can only be answered in the negative. The perception of China's naval aggrandisement in this strategic hub validating New Delhi's role in maritime governance, its leadership of the Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multi-Sectoral Technical and Economic Cooperation (BIMSTEC), the potential regional Indian strategic framework, has been instrumental in institutionalising security-related matters, including bringing the IOR/Bay littoral largely under the Indian coastal radar surveillance network. Similarly, the anodyne Security and Growth for All in the Region (SAGAR), the operational articulation of India's Act East Policy (2014), foregrounds the strategic dimension, thus enabling India to project power in the IOR maritime domain.

In view of China's modest global military footprint, it has been dubbed a 'minnow' in comparison to other big powers. However, in Indian narratives, Chinese capabilities have been magnified, hence perpetuating the perception of tension and the optics of conflict in the high Himalayas, which serve to further accentuate the putatively intractable nature of the dispute. According to the late Indian journalist Kuldip Nayar, there have been 'manufactured tales of trouble on the disputed border' to create mischief. It's indeed perplexing why the remote but otherwise negotiable 'intangible value' Sino-Indian border issues have been allowed to remain ambiguous and left unresolved despite prolonged efforts.

By the same token, the reported skirmishes on the undemarcated LAC, as well as perceived Chinese assertiveness in the Indian Ocean Region (where Beijing does not have any vital strategic interest), have provided the impetus for India's strategic engagement with the West. The conclusion, within a two-decade span, of four long-pending foundational defence agreements with the United States has ushered in unprecedented bilateral security collaboration, thereby allowing Indian policy entrepreneurs to radically transform New Delhi's diplomatic orientation. By steering it away from its more than a half-century foreign policy moorings, India's much-vaunted tradition of non-alignment has been all but jettisoned in favour of a decidedly pro-Western tilt, though under the fig-leaf of a vague concept called strategic autonomy. How China could be blindsided by the consequences of its confrontational but counterproductive stance detrimental to its interests is incomprehensible. That Beijing, a would-be superpower, 'lacks a consistent and coordinated foreign policy' is acknowledged by the Chinese leadership, though.

Despite Garver's misgivings about the notion of an US-China-India 'ever-shifting, flexible, three-cornered minuet,' such an outcome is not implausible, with the three countries constantly moving through the revolving strategic door. Neither is it beyond the realm of the possible to see American, Chinese and Indian interests coinciding (if they haven't already), thus adding another layer of complexity to animate the regional geopolitical landscape. Notwithstanding their current power imbalance, cooperation between China and India is likely to shape the future world order, and with the probable inclusion of the US, even result in a trilateral security partnership to approach regional and global contingencies in a concerted manner. On the face of it seemingly counterintuitive, but how the smaller regional states can pull their supposedly astute balancing act without the interests of the three big powers being aligned remains an intriguing question.

Concluding thoughts

THE key takeaway from this brief survey is that, by and large, their common interests far outweigh whatever peripheral bilateral issues they may have. The Sino-Indian relationship is imbued with a promising spirit of cooperation. Significantly, the scaffolding of the claims of the structural basis of their 'conflict,' China to be an 'existential threat' for India as 'a formidable adversary,' the inevitability of competition between them, or their antagonism to be organically embedded, proved to be too fragile to weather the intellectual scrutiny they were subjected to.

Despite inordinate focus on the military-strategic dimension, the fact remains that the global paradigm shift from geopolitics to geoeconomics has to be factored in, along with what that entails for Sino-Indian relations. With economic imperatives emerging as paramount in the globalised setting and walking in the same direction as partners, China and India are on the threshold of graduating from bhai bhai status to 'twin titans,' where their border dispute strikes a discordant note (to the untrained ear, that is). Veiled behind the recital of rivalry, the cornerstone of their amity is being reinforced to provide leadership to a new politically transformational, digitally driven, Sino-centric, but business-friendly global order. With power dynamics moving in favour of the Big Tech, advanced technologies are the vectors through which the very concept of security could be redefined in the calculus of their bilateral relations. In sum, paraphrasing the late English philosopher-economist, John Maynard Keynes, in the long run, despite occasional hiccups, instead of being dead, Sino-Indian relations are expected to thrive famously.

PRC at 75: Deng Xiaoping never delivered on young people's desire for freedom

03 October 2024, RFA

Many in China feel nostalgia for the 1980s, but political authoritarianism was still the default setting. Many in China under Communist Party leader Xi Jinping look back to the economic boom-time under late supreme leader Deng Xiaoping with nostalgia, as a freewheeling era in which it was easier to get rich, and when the government had less control over people's lives. But the reality of life under Deng was much grittier, political activists and commentators told RFA Mandarin in recent interviews.

In June 1983, postgraduate philosophy student Chen Kuide was singled out for political criticism after taking part in an academic conference in the southwestern city of Guilin, as part of a political campaign against "spiritual pollution."

It was just a few years after then supreme leader Deng had kicked off a slew of economic reforms and "opening up" to the rest of the world in the wake of the death of Mao Zedong and the trial of the Gang of Four that marked the end of the Cultural Revolution.

But despite the rosy glow that often suffuses people's memories of China in the 1980s, the political campaigns didn't stop when the universities reopened and the government started the massive task of rehabilitating people who had been persecuted under Mao and his wife, Jiang Qing.

Then Chinese Vice President Deng Xiaoping meets U.S. President Jimmy Carter at the White House in Washington, Jan. 29, 1979. (AP)

Instead, Deng launched the "spiritual pollution" campaign targeting anyone with any liberal tendencies, who advocated humanitarianism, market economics or appreciation of the arts for their aesthetic, rather than social, value.

By the time Chen got back to his dorm at Shanghai's Fudan University, there was a red circle around his name on a list in the municipal government, and Chen and a fellow student were suspended from their studies for three months. Luckily for Chen, the campaign was later called off and he was reinstated. His friend with government connections told him at the time: "There was a red circle round your name, as if you were going to be exiled to Qinghai or something."

Leaving aside the upbeat official narrative of "reform and opening up," the 1980s was not an easy time to be Chinese, according to veteran U.S.-based democracy activist Wang Juntao.

"I don't think there was any golden age during the 1980s," Wang said. "Intellectuals back then were pretty unhappy with Deng Xiaoping and Zhao Ziyang."

Fall of Hu Yaobang

A 1980 amendment to the country's constitution deleted a clause protecting people's right to "speak out, air their views freely, hold debates and make big-character posters," while a 1978 amendment made two years after Mao's death deleted their right to "reproductive freedom," amid growing concerns about the burgeoning population.

A system of film censorship was set up in 1980, while the right to private ownership of land disappeared with a constitutional amendment in 1982.

Nationwide student protests in 1986 were sparked by local officials' insistence on interfering in local elections to the People's Congresses, and spread from eastern Anhui province to Shanghai and Beijing, in protests that lasted 28 days.

Former 1989 student leader Chen Pokong also took part in the 1986 student protests in Shanghai.

"We didn't do anything much; just walked along the street and sometimes sat in front of the city government," he said. "We weren't trying to overthrow the government, just asked them to move a little faster and meet some of people's demands for democracy and equality."

"It all fizzled out peacefully in the end, because the weather was cold, and the winter vacation was about to begin, and a lot of students wanted to go back home for the Lunar New Year," he said.

Soon afterwards, news emerged that premier Hu Yaobang would resign to take the fall for those protests, blamed for his "ineffective leadership."

Then the party expelled a number of prominent dissidents from its ranks, including journalist Liu Binyan, physicist Fang Lizhi and author Wang Ruowang.

"Before that, I didn't have much of an impression of Deng Xiaoping – he just seemed like a short little guy among the old guys in charge of the Chinese Communist Party," Chen said. "But he had suddenly made such a big move, and I started to think about why that would be. I felt he didn't really understand young people or our ideas."

"Once young people get started with economic reform, they'll immediately start to want political reform too, and as soon as they start to interact with the West, they'll want freedom and democracy," he said.

"But this old man just wanted to take a leisurely walk – he was behind the times, and not suited to ruling the country. He should have let younger people take charge," Chen said.

1980s political purges

Following the 1986 protests, the right to demonstrate was stripped from students in Beijing, with the passage of new regulations warning that anyone who took part in "unauthorized parades" would be prosecuted. Those rules were enshrined in national law after the 1989 Tiananmen Square mass protests.

"For me, there was nothing good about the 1980s. Anyone who tried to fight for freedom and democracy was still suppressed," said Wang, citing the heavy jail terms handed down to 1979 Democracy Wall dissidents Wei Jingsheng and Wang Xizhe.

"The political purges continued throughout the 1980s, and large numbers of people were affected each time," he said. "I think people who remember the 1980s as a good time probably didn't care much about politics."

"I don't think there has ever been a good time under the Chinese Communist Party, and that hasn't changed."

U.S.-based former Party School professor Cai Xia agreed that life was still pretty tough for ordinary Chinese.

"The door had been left open just a crack for people to push open if they tried hard enough ... and people just wanted to survive," Cai said. "They had been poor for more than a decade."

Cai said most of the "reform" and "opening up" under Deng was largely the work of the people themselves, spurred on by new "household responsibility" contracts for farmers, by the return of exiled intellectuals to the cities in the wake of the Cultural Revolution, and by new rules allowing people to set up in business for themselves and sell their wares in "free markets."

"Even Deng Xiaoping admitted this when he said, 'we didn't do anything; it was the people who were creative, and we just affirmed their creativity'," Cai told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview.

Part of the perception of the Deng era as a golden age stems from his lionization in Western media, including his nomination by Time Magazine as "Man of the Year" twice, an honor it has bestowed on just four non-U.S. citizens.

"Historical evaluations of Deng Xiaoping were really too complimentary," veteran journalist and political commentator Hu Ping told Radio Free Asia, adding that Deng had little to do with the crushing of the Gang of Four, nor with the rehabilitation of millions of people persecuted unjustly during the Mao era.

Cai said that before he ordered the People's Liberation Army to clear Beijing of unarmed civilians, causing hundreds, perhaps thousands, of deaths, Deng was a master at going with the flow, and allowing things to happen, rather than initiating change.

"He basically put his legal stamp on some new economic phenomena that were emerging among, and driven by, ordinary people," she said. "In terms of his vision and ideology, he was still pretty conservative, and was looking to maintain the status quo in China over the long term."

Only 'partially de-Maoified'

Former high-ranking Chinese Communist Party aide Yan Jiaqi, who once worked for late ousted premier Zhao Ziyang, said that China did enjoy some good years before the 1989 bloodshed, citing new rules limiting presidents and premiers to just two terms in office.

But in written comments to Radio Free Asia, he said Deng had only "partially de-Maoified" China, paving the way for current General Secretary Xi Jinping to take the country further to the left, and step up authoritarian controls over people's lives in recent years.

Morally, Hu likened Deng to a doctor who has cured a large number of patients but murdered some along the way.

"Because of the Tiananmen massacre, Deng is guilty for a thousand years, regardless of what he did before or after," he said. "It makes no difference."

And the crackdown pretty much shut down any hopes of political reform, he said.

"A country that achieves rapid development along such a pathway will be more confident, more arrogant, and more powerfully authoritarian," Hu said. "And it is bound to be far more contemptuous, hostile and fearful of universal values like justice, human rights and democracy, and to pose a greater threat to peace and freedom around the world."

While Wang put the sense of hope in pre-Tiananmen China down to youthful dreams, Chen Pokong can still remember being overwhelmed with a dizzying sense of new possibilities, simply because people now had regular access to something outside of their daily lives.

"I remember that there were really new things every day, new clothes, new books, new music, new dances," he said. "I had the feeling that the country would move forward into the future, no matter what happened."

That belief was soon to be shattered, with the news that People's Liberation Army soldiers had opened fire on civilians in Beijing on the night of June 3, 1989, on the orders of Deng Xiaoping.

Chen Pokong was lying in his dorm room in Guangzhou when a classmate shouted the news. He tuned into Hong Kong radio to find out more, and wrote big-character posters on the Sun Yat-sen University campus in protest at the bloodshed.

Chen Kuide, meanwhile, had accepted an invitation to study at Boston University. He flew out of Beijing on June 5, a day after seeing smuggled Hong Kong TV footage of the massacre.

The sense of fear as his university shuttle bus threaded its way through army roadblocks on the way to the airport, with people cycling there after public transportation was suspended, was to be his last, lingering memory of China.

Why China's soft power fails to soften its image

03 October 2024, FirstPost, Tenzin Tsultrim

Without changing its attitudes toward its people and neighboring countries and its treatment of the people of the occupied nations, Beijing may continue to suffer from the soft power deficit

Joseph Nye, the father of "soft power," reveals in his latest book, A Life in the American Century, how in December 2013, China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi invited him to a private meal to quiz him about how China could increase its soft power. Nye replied, "Raising hundreds of millions of people out of poverty and celebrating a gorgeous traditional culture are important sources of attraction for China. At the same time, as long as it had territorial disputes with its neighbours and as long as its insistence on tight party control over civil society and human rights continued, China would face serious limits on its soft power in Asia and the West."

Before the concept of "soft power" was introduced by Nye, China had already lost a major part of its share of soft power points. After the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) took over China, strategically, it began to invade its neighbouring countries, including East Turkestan, Tibet, and southern Mongolia. Communist China also decided to intervene in the Korean War, just a week after it invaded Tibet. Worse, after entrenching its rule in Tibet, the CCP also decided to encroach on the borders of India, eventually leading to the China-India War of 1962. All these military invasions and interventions had permanently dented the international image of 'New China'. Within China too, in the name of the Great Leap Forward, the CCP pushed China to three years of famine and later euphemistically called it the three years of natural disasters. The outbreak of the infamous Cultural Revolution further made the CCP unlovable by its people.

What happens in Tibet never stays in Tibet

For decades, the CCP was convinced that Tibetan people might have been enchanted by the development shoved on them; however, the peaceful protests of 1987-89 and the 2008 uprising in Tibet pushed them out of their beds. To counter the internationalisation of the Tibet issue, from the 1990s onwards, the CCP began to churn out its first of many white papers on Tibet. This is still being dished out mechanically. Yearly reports from various well-established rights groups such as Freedom House, Amnesty International, and Human Rights Watch (HRW) continue to highlight growing human rights violations in Tibet.

Like the systematic detention of millions of Uyghur Muslims in the internment camps by the CCP in the western region of East Turkestan, which received a tremendous amount of international attention. Similarly, the exposition by the Tibet Action Institute report that around one million Tibetan children aged six to eighteen were forced to live in Chinese government-run colonial boarding schools and preschools had also drawn international attention. In the recent report by HRW, Educate the Masses to Change Their Minds: China's Forced Relocation of Rural Tibetans, it is reported that over 707,000 people have relocated. Most of the Tibetan people were forcibly relocated. All these reports have severely tarnished the nosedive image of communist China and its long-held aspiration for a lovable image and the so-called responsible superpower.

Like Charity, Soft Power too begins at Home

Unlike democratic nations, the CCP needs to charm both domestically and internationally. Within China, the CCP is trying to charm its people without losing control. In other words, the CCP is implementing the carrot and stick policy. Communist China's handling of the Tiananmen Square movement earned the ire of international communities as well as the Chinese people. Many Western countries decided to freeze high-level contacts with China for around two years. There have been dramatic declines in revenues from tourism (down 20 per cent in 1989), direct foreign investment (down 22 per cent in the first half of 1990), and foreign lending (down 40 per cent in 1989). Because of this, the CCP decided to reorient its domestic and foreign policies.

However, the CCP is still wary of its own people, and it is no wonder that China's domestic security spending is higher than its defence-related expenses. Covid-19 further proved the mismanagement and brutalities of the CCP, and common Chinese people realized the importance of freedom and the free flow of information. The death of Dr. Li Wenliang became the most talked-about topic on WeChat and Weibo (China's two biggest social media platforms), attracting millions of posts and searches and garnering an estimated 1.5 billion views. Following the Covid-19 pandemic, negative views of China increased by double digits in more than half of the countries surveyed in the international poll by the Pew Research Center. If the CCP is not able to win the hearts and minds of its own people, it will be very difficult to charm the international community. In other words, if you are not soft towards your family members and always create problems inside your home, you cannot expect your neighbours to smile back.

Good Fences Make Good Neighbours

China has one of the highest numbers of territorial disputes with its neighbouring countries on land and sea. For instance, with India, China has one of the oldest territorial disputes in the world, which is still unresolved, and China is not in the good books of many countries. According to a 2023 Pew Research Center survey, a median of 67 per cent of adults across 24 countries express unfavourable views of China. A median of 71 per cent thinks China does not contribute to global peace and stability. Not only that, a median of 76 per cent think China does not take into account the interests of other countries in its foreign policy, and a median of 57 per cent say China interferes in the affairs of other nations a great deal.

According to Nirupama Rao, former Ambassador of India to the United States, "The mistrust of China only deepened after Xi Jinping came to power. He is viewed as being at the helm of a nation that is much more muscular, confrontational, and aggressive in the pursuit of territorial claims across the Indo-Pacific region, both on land and sea." Out of 133 countries surveyed by Gallup in 2023, the US enjoyed a soft power advantage in 81 of them, and China in 52. Hence, the global approval of US leadership is higher than that of China. In short, every neighboring country is on its toes when it comes to dealing with China.

Conclusion

Despite spending billions of dollars on infrastructure development and security apparatuses, the CCP fails to win the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people. Because of the CCP's continued crackdown on Tibetan Buddhism, Tibetan language, and Tibetan culture every year, the situation in Tibet is worsening. Hence, without improving the situation inside Tibet, the CCP will be solely responsible for waning China's soft power. Similarly, because of what the CCP has unleashed on the Chinese people, the ghosts of the Tiananmen Square movement will continue to haunt the CCP.

The mismanagement of Covid-19 by the CCP in China further widens the gaps between the CCP and the Chinese people. After the Covid-19 pandemic, the negative views of China increased by double digits in more than half of the countries surveyed by the Pew Research Center. The territorial disputes with neighbouring countries are another important factor that hinders China's soft power. Because of its frequent incursions and unlawful maritime claims in the South China Sea, Beijing is viewed as an aggressor and troublemaker in Asia. Hence, according to a 2023 Pew Research Centre survey, a median of 71 per cent of adults across 24 countries think China does not contribute to global peace and stability.

In a speech at the National Propaganda and Ideology Work Conference on August 19, 2013, Xi Jinping voiced the importance of "telling China's story well". In 2021, he told senior Communist Party officials that it was important to present the image of China as "credible, loveable, and respectable." Since the party-state propaganda machinery works from the top down, the CCP is not telling a story; rather, it is pushing China's story. According to David Shambaugh, "Soft power is like a country that is a magnet that attracts others to you; others want to emulate you; they respect you; they value your political system. In other words, they want to be like you. That is soft power. It comes from society. It does not come from the government."

Similarly, one can act loveable, but one cannot force someone to like you. Therefore, without changing its attitudes toward its people and neighboring countries and its treatment of the people of the occupied nations, Beijing may continue to suffer from the soft power deficit, and the Chinese people will continue to receive backlash because of the CCP's actions.

After 19 years, a docent at the Rubin Museum says goodbye to his 'home away from home'

03 October 2024, Gothamist, Ryan Kailath

After 20 years in Chelsea, the Rubin Museum, which houses art from Tibet, Nepal and the Himalayan regions of India and China, will close its doors permanently on Sunday and transition to a touring exhibition model that will loan its collection to other institutions.

It's a loss for New York City, which has experienced a spate of small museum closures this year, including Fotografiska and the Center for Italian Modern Art.

It's also a loss for Nitin Ron, a docent who has led tours of the museum for 19 of its 20 years.

"This museum was home away from home for me," Ron said last Wednesday on what would be one of his final tours. "I've done 19 hikes in the Himalayas and climbed Mount Everest. So when I walked in here, this space made my heart beat faster."

A neonatal doctor at South Brooklyn Health in Coney Island, Ron arrived in New York in 2001, after a fellowship in neonatal-perinatal medicine at Brown University. A friend brought him to the museum a few days after it opened in 2004, and he hit it off with founders Donald and Shelley Rubin.

Ron soon signed up for the volunteer docent program, which at the time consisted of a year of weekly classes on topics like the tenets of Buddhism and the cultures represented at the museum, he said. (That program has since been shortened to 10 weeks.) He graduated with the inaugural class in 2005, and estimates he's given at least two tours a month since then.

"We had actors come in to teach us how to emote in public," said Ron. "A person from the FBI came to teach us how to read body language in a crowd."

Since his day job at the hospital also included teaching, Ron soon made field trips to the Rubin a part of the curriculum for medical students, tying art appreciation and meditation into the practice of medicine.

The Rubin has faced the same challenges of declining attendance and deficits that have plagued many small art museums, and plans to sell its building on 17th Street near Seventh Avenue, according to Executive Director Jorrit Britschgi. The space was originally purchased for $22 million before it was converted into the museum.

A spokesperson for the museum highlighted its endowment of more than $150 million and overall financial strength despite operational deficits.

Although the collection will be kept in storage in New York, Britschgi said there are plans to tour as many of the works on the road as possible, or loan them out to other organizations.

"Our docents may be the most important people here, because they're the intersection between what we do in the galleries and what visitors experience," Britschgi said via Zoom.

Ron's personal favorite work is one of the museum's most popular: the quiet and meditative Tibetan shrine room, which will move to the Brooklyn Museum for a six-year loan starting in June 2025.

"My dad and mom also love to meditate, and when they visit from India they say, 'Take us to the shrine room,'" Ron said. "They close their eyes and feel the energy of the place."

Now that the museum's doors are closing, Ron, who lives on Staten Island, is considering volunteering at the small Jacques Marchais Museum of Tibetan Art there, or perhaps giving tours of the United Nations.

"I'm going to miss the museum and my Friday evenings here connecting to people, connecting to musicians, connecting to actors, connecting to my medical students," said Ron. "But I feel the effect has been long lasting and the museum is going to evolve into something very beautiful and even more universal."

Museum admission is free all day Thursday through Sunday. Ron's final tour at the Rubin will be on Friday evening, Oct. 4. The last day to visit the museum is this Sunday, Oct. 6.

Geopolitics and the fate of Manipur

03 October 2024, The Sangai Express, Haorokcham Anil

India has a long-standing unresolved border dispute with China in the Himalayan region, particularly over Aksai Chin, which India considers part of Jammu and Kashmir. This claim is based on the Johnson Line (1865), drawn by surveyor William Johnson and later endorsed by John Charles Ardagh as the official boundary of India. However, China rejected this boundary, instead claiming Aksai Chin as a part of its Xinjiang province, according to the McDonald Line proposed by the British Empire in 1893. China currently controls much of the region under what is called the "Line of Actual Control" (LAC). The violent clashes in the strategically important Galwan Valley on June 15, 2020, resulting in casualties on both sides, were a consequence of this ongoing territorial dispute. To this day, the boundary between the two Nations remains a point of contention.

The border dispute extends beyond the western Himalayas to the eastern sector, where China claims the Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh as a part of South Tibet. This claim challenges the McMahon Line, which India recognizes as the official boundary. The region has also become a significant flashpoint in India-China relations.

The Chinese incursions of 1962 at Arunachal Pradesh and Aksai Chin underscore the volatility of these disputed areas. This threat was further highlighted by the 2017 Doklam standoff near the Siliguri Corridor, a strategically vital region for India. Known as the "Chicken Neck", this narrow strip of land is only about 20 km wide and 60 km long, connecting the North Eastern States to the rest of India. Its geo-strategic importance is amplified by its proximity to Nepal in the northwest, Bangladesh to the south, and Bhutan to the northeast. The presence of Chinese military forces just 130 km away in Tibet's Chumbi Valley, within the range of Chinese artillery, heightens the vulnerabilities of the area.

Given China's unpredictable behavior in disputed territories, exemplified by the 1962 incursion, India has recognized the need for an alternative route to ensure continued connectivity with its North Eastern States in case of conflict at the Chicken Neck preventing North East India from being cut off from the mainland that will create two blocks like the erstwhile West and East Pakistan. This concern has driven the development of the Kaladan Multi-Modal Transit Transport Project apart from facilitating NER region access to the Indian Ocean for economic boost.

Some believe, the Kaladan project is one the reasons for the ethnic violence that erupted on May 3, 2023, between the Meitei and Kuki communities in Manipur although it may not account as the direct cause. The Government's appeasement of certain groups or communities to safeguard the project's interests has been questioned. Factors such as large-scale deforestation by the Kuki community, the influx of illegal immigrants from Myanmar's Chin province, the destruction of poppy cultivation by the Manipur State Government, and narco-terrorism have all contributed to tensions and the ensuing violence. Moreover, opposition from tribal communities, particularly the Kuki, against the directive of the Hon'ble Manipur High Court to the Government of Manipur to send the sought socio-economic report for inclusion of the Meitei/Meetei community in the Scheduled Tribe (ST) list further fuelled the conflict.

The Kaladan Multi-Modal Transit Transport Project, part of India's Act East Policy, passes through the strife torn regions of Rakhine (Arakan) and Chin

State in western Myanmar. These areas are home to Ethnic Armed Organizations (EAOs) that oppose Myanmar's military junta, seeking greater autonomy and democratic reforms. The 110 km roadway section of the project, from Paletwa to Zorinpui on the India-Myanmar border in Mizoram, traverses the Chin State, where the Kuki-Chin and Chin EAOs are the influential groups.

India's geopolitical interests in the region include safeguarding the Kaladan project and countering Chinese influence. China has invested heavily in the Kyaukpyu Deep Sea Port, part of the China-Myanmar Economic Corridor (CMEC) under its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Located about 75 km south of India's Sittwe Port (developed as part of the Kaladan project), Kyaukpyu offers China an alternative route to the Malacca Straits and the South China Sea, bypassing several strategic choke points.

The competition between India and China in this region is now evident, with both Nations seeking to strengthen ties with the local populace for strategic advantages. For India, maintaining good relations with the Kuki-Chin people is vital for the success of the project if the threat looming at the Chicken Neck is pertinent. The strategic relationship with the locals is also required for projects like the India-Myanmar-Thailand (IMT) Trilateral Highway, which spans 1,360 km and originates from Mae Sot (Thailand) passing through Myawaddy, Bago, Mandalay, Tamu (Myanmar) and entering India through Moreh is an important component of India's Act East policy to connect with ASEAN through road connectivity. It is also important to note that this important IMT Trilateral Highway passes through Chin State of Myanmar.

In Manipur, the Kuki community, originally brought by the British in the early 19th century, has been seeking geographic, demographic and political dominance, through illegal immigration mainly from Myanmar's Chin State. This, combined with the State's Scheduled Tribe (ST) status for "Any Kuki tribe" and the influx of funds from poppy cultivation and narco-terrorism, has led to challenges against the "Idea of Manipur" which have more than 2000 plus years of history and well-defined territorial boundary when merged to the Union of India on 15th October, 1949.

The strong demand for a "Separate Administration" for the Kuki-Chin people in the State of Manipur following the incitement of violence on the Meitei community on 3rd May 2023 with an ulterior motive is seen as a part of a long-standing agenda.

Given these dynamics, a critical question remains: "Are we willing to risk the destruction of Manipur to secure the broader interests of North East India through the appeasement of a particular community?"

China is using an "anaconda strategy" to squeeze Taiwan

03 October 2024, The Economist

Taiwan's navy commander warns that his forces are increasingly strained

China's dislike of Taiwan's president Lai Ching-te is no secret. Chinese authorities call him a stubborn, confrontational "separatist" who may provoke war in the Taiwan Strait. But since Mr Lai's election in May, it is China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) that has been raising the chances of conflict by deploying more air and naval craft around Taiwan. "The PLA is using an 'anaconda strategy' to squeeze the island," says Admiral Tang Hua, Taiwan's navy commander.

In an interview with The Economist, Admiral Tang (pictured) warns that Chinese forces are "slowly, but surely" increasing their presence around his country. "They are ready to blockade Taiwan at any time they want," he says. His concerns are backed up by the data. The number of PLA air incursions across the median line, the de facto border in the middle of the Taiwan Strait, has jumped more than five-fold, from 36 in January to 193 in August. The number of PLA ships operating around Taiwan has steadily risen, too, doubling from 142 in January to 282 in August. These vessels are also coming closer to Taiwan—right along its contiguous zone, or 24 nautical miles from its coast. And they are patrolling for a few days at a time, up from a few hours previously, according to Taiwan's naval commander. These are relatively new developments. Until August 2022 the PLA had operated mostly in Taiwan's south and west, around the Bashi Channel between the island and the Philippines. Taiwan's rugged east coast, home to aircraft hangars built underneath its mountains, was seen as safer and harder to reach from China. But that changed after a visit to the island that year by Nancy Pelosi, then a high-ranking American official. The trip enraged China and, soon after, the PLA conducted a mock blockade near Taiwan's east. That sent a signal that the region was no longer safe. Now the PLA has normalised patrols there and regularly encircles the island by sea and air. It has also increased the number of navy transits through the Yonaguni channel between Taiwan and Japan.

Few people in Taiwan are aware of how close and regular the PLA patrols are. Since 2020 Taiwan's defence ministry has published daily updates on air activity around the island, including maps of Chinese warplanes' locations. In 2022 it added updates on the number of PLA naval vessels operating "around Taiwan". But it does not specify what types of ships, where they go, or for how long. The government may be worried that too much disclosure would damage Taiwan's public morale or economy, says Admiral Tang.

The PLA's increased patrols are straining Taiwan's navy. China has twice as many frigates and ten times as many destroyers. Taiwan often has to deploy 25-50% of its combat vessels just to match China's patrols, according to Cheng-kun Ma and Tristan Tan, a pair of Taiwanese defence researchers. "They give you extreme pressure, pressure, pressure. They're trying to exhaust you," says Admiral Tang. A government audit found that more than half of Taiwan's main warships had fallen behind on regular maintenance.

As the PLA Navy presses closer to the island, Taiwan is focused on avoiding confrontation. "The PLA is trying to force Taiwan to make mistakes," says Admiral Tang, and looking for "excuses" to trigger a blockade. That is why Taiwan's military leaders issued new rules of engagement this year that define ethical and legal use of force in self-defence: "We restrain our guys, not to provoke or escalate."

Even as Taiwan's armed forces practise restraint its leaders are working with allies on how to keep sea lines of communication open in case of a blockade. Taiwan is also seeking international help to resist Chinese pressure. Japan's navy conducted a transit exercise through the Taiwan Strait for the first time in September, as did naval ships from Australia, New Zealand and Germany. America's navy sails through it several times a year. The exercises send a signal to China that the strait is international territory. The Chinese authorities protest. But they show no sign of loosening the anaconda's squeeze.

Did Jaishankar's long story of China mean Mao's 5 fingers...this secret of the dragon will force you to think

03 October 2024, Press Wire

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar recently said in America that our relations with China have a long story. However, in short, we had agreements to maintain peace and stability on the border, China has violated those agreements. Let us understand what Jaishankar's long story is about China. We also know what agreements were made, which China has always been violating. Defense and Strategic Affairs Analyst tries to understand every move of China through Lieutenant Colonel (Retd) JS Sodhi and his/her book China's War Clouds: The Great Chinese Checkmate.

When Mao said, take the palm and 5 fingers According to Defense Analyst Lt. Col. (R) JS Sodhi, relations between India and China had been good for centuries. In 1949, when the civil war in China ended and China emerged as a new nation, a part of it, Taiwan, separated from it. After this, India-China relations started turning sour. This sourness came because in 1949, the founding leader of the Republic of China, Mao Zedong i.e. Mao Zedong said that the palm and 5 fingers should be captured by China. The palm meant Tibet and the 5 fingers meant Ladakh, Sikkim, Arunachal Pradesh, Nepal and Bhutan. From here, China's policy towards its neighbors kept changing.

China ready for war after Dalai Lama takes refuge

JS Sodhi explains that after Mao's nefarious intentions became apparent, China illegally occupied Tibet in 1950. Relations between India and China deteriorated further when the Dalai Lama fled Tibet in 1959 and took refuge in India. These relations deteriorated so much that in 1962, China treacherously attacked India and there was a war between the two countries.

Do you know about India-China war of 1967?

The Nathula and Chola conflict took place in 1967, also known as the Sino-Indian War of 1967 or the Sino-Indian War of 1967. This conflict was a series of border clashes between China and India along the border of Sikkim in the Himalayan region. The Nathula conflict began on 11 September 1967, when China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) attacked Indian posts in Nathula and the conflict continued till 15 September 1967. Another military duel took place at Chola in October 1967, which ended the same day.

India had driven out Chinese soldiers

It is believed that at that time India gained a decisive strategic advantage and managed to hold its ground against the Chinese forces and push them back. Several PLA fortifications were destroyed in Nathula. There the Indian soldiers drove back the attacking Chinese army. 340 Chinese soldiers were killed in Nathula. At the same time, 88 Indian soldiers lost their lives in Chola. When the Chinese army attacked with machine guns, the Indian soldiers responded with cannons.

What was that agreement, which Jaishankar hinted at?

According to JS Sodhi's book China's War Clouds: The Great Chinese Checkmate, in 1993, Border Peace & Tranquility Agreement, 1993 was signed between India and China, in which it was decided that the soldiers of both the countries would patrol the border and before patrolling a- Will inform others about this. Peace prevailed on both sides till 2017. But, everything changed in 2017. At that time China increased its military activities in Doklam area. With this aggressive action, China made a huge movement of its troops. This action was directed from China's theater command.

Being directed by China's Army Theater Command

China created several new theater commands in 2015. Chinese forces started taking aggressive action on the borders as per the theater command. he/she created areas of controversy in many new places. In 2020, he/she sent his/her army to Galwan Valley, in which there was a lot of clash with Indian soldiers. From then till today relations between India and China have never been normal.

Are India and China moving towards another war?

According to JS Sodhi, on February 5, 2024, America's government agency Directorate of National Intelligence of America has told that the way the tension between India and China is increasing, they are gradually moving towards war.

China's strategy to attack India in 2035

According to the book China's War Clouds: The Great Chinese Checkmate, China's official newspaper Wen Wei Po published from Hong Kong says that there will be three wars in the next 11 years i.e. by 2035. The first war among these is to be with Taiwan in 2027. At that time China will attack Taiwan. The second attack will take place in 2029 on the Spratly Islands located in the South China Sea, which is surrounded by Vietnam, Philippines, Malaysia. This island is considered very strategically important. Apart from this, China and Pakistan together will attack India in 2035. This is going to be a two front war, under which China will wage war on the Arunachal Pradesh border and Pakistan will fight in Jammu and Kashmir.

China has its eyes on Shaksgam valley also, has already claimed

Defense and Strategic Affairs Analyst Lt. Col. (Retd) JS Sodhi says that Dragon is now adopting a dual strategy through the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor. Firstly, it is strengthening itself economically and secondly, it is preparing to tighten the noose on countries like India. In a way, he/she is preparing himself for the future war. From Shaksgam Valley, China wants to reach Pakistan's Gwadar port and reach Central Asia through Afghanistan. he/she has also claimed this valley.

Aksai Chin was not on the map of China till 100 years ago

Sujan R Chinoy, author of 'The Forgotten Fact of China Occupied Kashmir', writes that China had started establishing its presence in the Karakoram area since the 1750s. At that time, Qian Long was the fourth king of the Qing Empire in China. China had then claimed that the eastern part of the Karakoram Pass passing through the Kunlun Range adjacent to the Pamir Plateau had been incorporated by the Manchou Empire in 1759 itself. In the historical map of China of that time, only the lower part of Yarkand and the rivers originating from Shaksgam were shown. Before 1890, China made no claims to the Shaksgam Valley, nor was Aksai Chin shown as part of Xinjiang province.

Chinese PM claimed the area by writing a letter to Nehru

With the Karakoram Tract Agreement signed with Pakistan on March 02, 1963, China captured Raskam and also started claiming the Shaksgam area. On January 23, 1959, Chinese Prime Minister Zhou Enlai, in a letter to the then Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, talked about his/her claim in the Frontiers area of Jammu and Kashmir. In 1953, Chinese forces started infiltrating from the eastern Hunza area.

Jinping's CPEC project is a big dream

One reason behind the continuous attacks by Pakistan-backed terrorists in Jammu instead of the valley is China's economic corridor which is passing through PoJK. China has already invested US$65 billion in the CPEC (China-Pakistan Economic Corridor) project. The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor is an ambitious plan of Chinese President Xi Jinping, which was launched in 2013. India has been opposing this project because PoJK is an integral part of India.

India's geopolitical manoeuvring disrupts Mongolia's religious harmony

02 October 2024, Pakistan Today, Imran Khalid

Interference in matters beyond its ken.

India has long pursued an assertive stance, intruding into the domestic affairs of its neighbouring countries. Whether it's Sri Lanka, the Maldives, Bangladesh, Nepal, or Bhutan, India's hand in meddling is unmistakable, driven by a desire to cement its sway in the region.

Yet, this tendency to interfere doesn't stop at its immediate vicinity. Far from the Indian subcontinent, we see Mongolia— an isolated, landlocked country squeezed between Russia and China— emerge as the latest theatre for India's ambitions. Here, India seems bent on chipping away at the strong ties Mongolia shares with Russia and China, countries with which it has historically enjoyed warm relations.

Recent actions by India regarding Mongolia's religious affairs have caused significant concern, particularly in the context of the 10th Bogd Jebtsundamba Khutuktu, the spiritual leader of the Gelug lineage of Tibetan Buddhism in Mongolia. The Bogd— an emblem of Mongolia's very soul— traces roots back nearly four centuries, intertwined with the legacy of the Mongol emperor, Kublai Khan. A lineage that embraced Tibetan Buddhism, spreading its influence far beyond Mongolia, even into the vast stretches of China and the conquered lands.

In the early 1900s, a Tibetan-born Bogd (pronounced bogged) ruled Mongolia as a theocratic leader, revered not just as a ruler but as a god-king. However, when the last Bogd passed away in 2012, murmurs of concern rippled through Mongolia. The fear? That India, wielding the influence of the Dalai Lama— who's been in exile in India since 1959— might attempt to steer or even dictate the selection of the next Bogd. The ninth Jebtsundamba Khutuktu spent much of his life in exile — first in Tibet, then in India. It wasn't until 1990, long after his identity had been kept under wraps by the Dalai Lama, that it was finally disclosed. It wasn't until 2011— just a year before his death— that he was finally able to take up residence in Mongolia and be enthroned as the leader of Mongolian Buddhists. After the death of the ninth Bogd, the Dalai Lama asserted that the reincarnation of the Jebtsundamba Khutuktu had been found. Yet, he remained tight-lipped, revealing nothing until 8 March 2023, during a ceremony in Dharamsala. The Dalai Lama introduced the world to the new Jebtsundamba Khutuktu— a young boy named "A. Altannar."

But here's where the tale takes a twist. The full first name? Not disclosed. And the plot thickens, for there aren't just one but two "A. Altannar." Identical twins. Both their names begin with an "A" — Achildai Altannar and Agudai Altannar. So, which one is the true Jebtsundamba Khutuktu? The answer lies shrouded in secrecy, known only to five people: the two 8-year-old boys, their mother (a college professor of mathematics), their father (a scion of a mining fortune), and, of course, the Dalai Lama himself.

Apparently, at the behest of India, the Dalai Lama's has embraced an American passport holder boy as the 10th Jebtsundamba Khutuktu, marking an upsetting moment in the spiritual and political landscape of Tibetan Buddhism. For believers, reincarnation is a divine mystery, guided by higher powers. Yet, it's hard to ignore the political undercurrents that often shape the lives of these spiritual figures, particularly in how they are educated and positioned within the broader geopolitical context.

Policymakers in New Delhi seem to believe that by steering the selection of the 10th Bogd in their favour, India could subtly expand its influence in Mongolia — a move that might serve to unsettle both China and Russia over the long haul. This strategic calculation reflects India's broader geopolitical ambitions, where cultural and religious diplomacy intertwine with the pursuit of regional power dynamics.

India's involvement in this sacred process, especially in the identification and education of the 10th

Jebtsundamba Khutuktu, represents a concerning overreach into Mongolia's internal affairs. The Dalai Lama's acknowledgment of the 10th reincarnation further denotes India's growing interference in Mongolia's religious sphere. This move suggests a strategic attempt by India to exert influence over Mongolia's cultural and religious landscape. The Dalai Lama's handling of matters pertaining to the selection and education of the 10th Jebtsundamba Khutuktu reflects this complex interplay of spirituality and politics.

It is still shrouded in mystery why he has selected an American-born boy from a rich family— despite intense resistance by the boy's parents, who initially refused to accept his verdict about their son. This manoeuvre, however, hasn't been met with universal approval. In Mongolia, reactions have been mixed, with many taking to social media to express scepticism and confusion. It's clear that not everyone is comfortable with the 14th Dalai Lama's actions

The Dalai Lamas have long claimed that the Jebtsundamba Khutuktu is an incarnation of Taranatha, a 16th-century Tibetan master of the Jonang tradition. However, the Jonang School itself has not publicly endorsed this recognition, raising further questions about the legitimacy of the Dalai Lama's decision. Historically, the Gelug tradition, to which the Dalai Lama belongs, has had a contentious relationship with the Jonang School, adding another layer of complexity to this situation.

This development is being viewed as a potential threat to the stability and independence of Mongolia, raising alarms about the broader implications for regional sovereignty. When external powers, like India, intervene in such a delicate process, it not only undermines the sovereignty of the affected nation but also disrupts the sanctity of its religious practices. Concerns extend beyond the immediate political ramifications; they encompass the preservation of religious integrity.

The recent involvement of India in the selection process of the 10th Bogd Jebtsundamba Khutuktu raises serious questions about the intentions behind such actions. This move is not merely a matter of religious significance; it carries the potential to destabilize regional harmony.

The selection of the 10th Bogd Jebtsundamba Khutuktu should remain an internal matter, free from external interference, to ensure that the process aligns with Mongolian customs and religious practices. In the interest of regional stability, it is imperative that all nations honour the internal affairs of their neighbours, safeguarding the delicate balance that underpins peace and cooperation in the region.

Policymakers in New Delhi seem to believe that by steering the selection of the 10th Bogd in their favour, India could subtly expand its influence in Mongolia – a move that might serve to unsettle both China and Russia over the long haul. This strategic calculation reflects India's broader geopolitical ambitions, where cultural and religious diplomacy intertwine with the pursuit of regional power dynamics.

Chinese are seeing India as going soft. Talk of 'consensus' over disengagement rings hollow

02 October 2024, The Print, Sana Hashmi

A review of Chinese media and social platforms reveals a widespread perception that India has adopted a more conciliatory approach towards China.

The India-China border dispute remains a critical flashpoint in bilateral relations, where the nuances of diplomacy are often overshadowed by competing narratives.

A statement last week from the Chinese Defence Ministry asserted that both countries have been able to "reduce differences" and build "some consensus" on disengaging troops in eastern Ladakh, indicating a possible thaw in relations that could facilitate long-awaited normalisation. However, beneath this surface optimism lies a complex web of distrust and grievances.

As winter approaches and troop deployments along the LAC escalate, the stark reality persists: despite the hopeful rhetoric, a profound trust deficit continues to impede meaningful progress in India-China relations.

Chinese hints at India's conciliatory approach

A review of Chinese media and social platforms reveals a widespread perception that India has adopted a more conciliatory approach towards China.

Commentators suggest that the Indian government recognises that a confrontational stance may jeopardise its own interests, particularly in the manufacturing sector, which has faced significant repercussions due to hardline policies against China.

Amid US pressure to reduce reliance on China, a reporter from Guancha noted that American companies are increasingly viewing India as a potential manufacturing hub to mitigate supply chain risks. However, this strategy is complicated by India's growing dependence on trade with China. Commentators have highlighted a perceived contradiction: while hopes persist that Chinese investment could strengthen India's economy, concerns about China are on the rise. This dynamic reflects India's emphasis on the threat posed by China, even as it actively seeks Chinese investments— which is viewed as a stronger inclination for normalisation from India than from China.

Discussions within Chinese media often exhibit an air of arrogance regarding India's potential as a manufacturing alternative to China. Analysts remain sceptical about India's ability to serve as a viable substitute in the economic sphere. Many argue that India will struggle to surpass China or replicate its achievements over the past three decades within a similar timeframe, citing significant challenges in advancing its manufacturing capabilities.

Notably, Indian External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar's recent statement that India can "chew gum while walking" has been interpreted as an indication of India's willingness to pursue normalisation with China while maintaining its alignment with the Quad, BRICS, and the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO). However, some warn that this so-called "fence-sitting diplomacy" could result in greater losses for India.

In a media comment, Qiu Yonghui, a professor at the Centre for South Asian Studies at Sichuan University, cautioned against hasty assertions regarding India's potential to significantly recalibrate its relations with China. She noted that while some adjustments may be likely, the ongoing stalemate over border issues necessitates improvements in infrastructure and engineering technology—areas where India remains heavily dependent on China. And Long Xingchun, a professor from the School of International Relations at Sichuan International Studies University, characterised India as a regional hegemon grappling with concerns over its declining influence in South Asia.

But overall, there is a growing perception among Chinese commentators that India's stance has softened in recent years. Enhanced communication with China is seen as an indication of India's genuine interest in swiftly resolving territorial disputes. Moreover, Chinese analysts observe that Indian media increasingly reflects optimism about Sino-Indian negotiations, likely influenced by India's current economic situation. The discourse is stuck between the idea that India will never be able to catch up with China and the belief that China should not help its adversary's rise.

On platforms like Weibo, users frequently disparage India's infrastructure, with some advocating for China to assist in its development by highlighting its high-efficiency, low-cost construction capabilities as a potential solution. However, one commentator argued against Chinese companies investing in India and aiding its industrial capacity, warning that a stronger India would pose a greater threat to China than the US. Furthermore, a Weibo user pointed out that Chinese state-owned enterprises have helped India build its largest steelmaking blast furnace — which has angered many in China who believe this contributes to India's industrial advancement and could pose a future threat.

China's deception

China's attempts to emphasise aspects of bilateral relations beyond border disputes may be misleading. This strategy does not change the realities on the ground or alter China's actual position. Last Friday, Chinese spokesperson Lin Jian reiterated: "The area of Zangnan is Chinese territory, and it's illegal, and null and void for India to set up the so-called Arunachal Pradesh in Chinese territory. China's position on this issue is consistent and clear."

China's actions simply do not align with its words regarding India. While Beijing has long urged New Delhi to focus on issues beyond the border dispute, the current narrative suggesting consistent disengagement by China—while portraying India as eager to adjust its stance for commercial interests—appears disingenuous. This effort seems designed to distract from underlying issues and points of contention, while also fostering a false narrative that India is going soft on China.

The Tibet International Communication Center and China's Latest Manipulation Exercise

02 October 2024, Japan Forward, Professor Pema Gyalpo

China has launched the Tibet International Communication Center to control the narrative on Tibet, suppress Tibetan voices, and spread disinformation globally.

In a brazen move that underscores its relentless campaign to control the global narrative on Tibet, China has launched its latest propaganda tool, the Tibet International Communication Center in Lhasa. This development, unveiled on September 2, 2024, marks a significant escalation in Beijing's efforts to manipulate international public opinion. In addition, it seeks to further suppress the voices of Tibetans.

Far from an isolated incident, the establishment of this center is a well-calculated strategy that has been years in the making. It follows the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) longstanding playbook of information control and narrative manipulation. Now, however, it is supercharged with modern technology and global reach. As the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) rightly warns, this move signals an imminent intensification of China's propaganda machine. It aims to dominate the global conversation on Tibet with its distorted storytelling.

Constructing a False Reality

At the heart of this propaganda offensive lies a sinister attempt to rewrite history and erase Tibetan identity. For example, the CCP's push to replace the internationally recognized name "Tibet" with the Sinicized term "Xizang" in global discourse. Beijing discreetly initiated this linguistic sleight of hand in 2021 during the COVID-19 pandemic. It aligns perfectly with CCP General Secretary Xi Jinping's vision to "tell a good Chinese story" on the world stage. But make no mistake - this "good story" is nothing more than a fabrication designed to obscure the harsh realities of China's occupation and oppressive rule in Tibet.

The launch of the center came with a flurry of official statements that revealed the true nature of China's intentions. Wang Junzheng, the CCP's top leader in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), didn't mince words when he stressed the importance of "ideological guidance" in external propaganda.

His call to "build a foreign discourse system and narrative system related to Tibet" is a thinly veiled admission of the CCP's intent to construct an alternative reality. In this CCP-constructed reality, a narrative of Chinese benevolence and progress replaces Tibet's rich cultural heritage and struggle for autonomy. They believe if they chant their lies a hundred times, it becomes a reality.

Disseminating False Narratives

This new propaganda center is set to leverage a multi-pronged approach to spread its false narrative. State-controlled media outlets like China Daily and the China Global Television Network (CGTN) will undoubtedly play pivotal roles in disseminating China's perspective on Tibetan issues to a global audience.

A recent agreement between China Daily and the China Tibetology Research Center to establish the Tibetology International Communication Center shows this strategy in action. Shifting away from "monotonous data" towards "storytelling" represents a more insidious form of manipulation. Through this, the CCP seeks to "win attention and hearts worldwide" through emotional appeal rather than factual representation. This constitutes a significant threat to authentic information about Tibet's situation. The implications of this propaganda offensive are far-reaching and deeply troubling. As the CCP intensifies its efforts to control the narrative, the voices of Tibetans are at risk of being further marginalized and silenced. Their true stories of cultural suppression, human rights abuses, and the ongoing struggle for genuine autonomy are in danger of being drowned out by a flood of state-sanctioned misinformation. Moreover, the international community faces increased pressure to adopt China's narrative on Tibet.

Diplomatic efforts to influence policy decisions and public statements regarding Tibet's status are likely to intensify. This could potentially compromise the integrity of international bodies and governments. Expanding Chinese "cultural and educational" initiatives presenting a China-centric view of Tibetan history and culture threaten to distort the global understanding of Tibet's rich heritage and complex political situation.

A Broader Agenda

Recognizing that this propaganda center is not an isolated entity but part of a broader, more insidious strategy is crucial. The CCP's claim of facing "restrictions" in conveying its message about Tibet to the West is laughably hypocritical, considering its systematic suppression of dissent within Tibet. This false narrative of victimhood is a classic tactic authoritarian regimes employ to justify their propaganda efforts and deflect criticism.

In the face of this propaganda onslaught, the international community must remain both vigilant and critical. China's narrative of "high-equality development" in Tibet often serves as a smokescreen for human rights violations and cultural suppression. It is imperative that global leaders, media, and civil society organizations scrutinize China's claims. They must seek out authentic Tibetan voices to counter this state-sponsored disinformation campaign.

Recent actions by United Nations human rights experts are demanding answers regarding China's repression of dam protests in Tibet. These actions serve as a model for the international scrutiny needed in such situations. Such initiatives are vital in challenging China's narrative and bringing attention to the realities on the ground in Tibet. As China ramps up its propaganda efforts, the need for Independent, fact-based reporting on Tibet becomes even more critical. The international community must support and amplify the voices of Tibetans, both inside and in exile, to ensure their stories and struggles are not erased by China's propaganda machine.

Standing Firm for Tibet

Establishing this center in Lhasa is not just about controlling information- it is about controlling minds and shaping global perceptions. It represents a direct assault on truth, freedom of expression, and the right of Tibetans to tell their own story. China seeks to "seize the power in the international discourse about Tibet."

The world must stand firm in its commitment to truth, human rights, and the preservation of Tibetan culture and identity. Against this propaganda offensive, silence is not an option. Ensuring that the authentic voices of Tibetans are heard and challenging China's false narratives demand a renewed commitment from the international community to support Tibet. Sustained vigilance, critical analysis, and unwavering support for human rights are essential to counter China's propaganda machine. Only then can we preserve the truth about Tibet for future generations.

Communist China is celebrating its 75th birthday and its stock market is soaring. But not everyone is in the party spirit

30 September 2024, CNN

For much of the past year since China reopened to the world following the Covid-19 pandemic, a pall has hung over large swathes of the country as its economy struggles to regain momentum.

The country's bright young minds are having a hard time landing a job; its white-collar professionals are hit by pay cuts and layoffs; its entrepreneurs struggle to finance their businesses and pay off debts; its middle-class families are seeing their wealth slashed by crumbling housing prices; and its rich race to move money out of the country.

In the months leading up to the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic on Tuesday, the mood was encapsulated by a new buzz phrase: "the garbage time of history." Like the final minutes of a basketball game with one team trailing so far behind that all efforts to win seem futile, some Chinese believe their country is trapped in a similarly bleak period with little hope for a turnaround.

The pessimism was a far cry from the buoyant outlook just five years ago, during the last major National Day celebrations in 2019. Back then, economists were rushing to predict when China might overtake the United States to become the world's largest economy. Those conversations aren't happening much anymore. These days, the talk centers on how Beijing can avoid a repeat of Japan's "lost decade" of economic stagnation following bursting of its housing bubble in the 1990s.

Last week, after months of increasingly grim economic data, Chinese leader Xi Jinping finally gave the nod to a much-needed stimulus package in a bid to shore up faith in the world's second largest economy.

On Tuesday, the country's central bank unveiled a raft of measures to counter falling prices, including freeing commercial banks to lend more money and making it cheaper for households and companies to borrow.

Officials kept up the positive drumbeat the next day by announcing rare cash handouts to disadvantaged citizens and pledging subsidies for recent graduates struggling to find a job.

And on Thursday, the ruling Communist Party's 24-member Politburo continued the bullish messaging. In a break with tradition, Xi dedicated the group's September meeting to economic affairs.

The top officials acknowledged that "new situations and problems" have arisen in the economy and demanded urgent action, vowing to boost fiscal spending, arrest the decline of the property market and improve employment for fresh graduates and migrant workers.

According to Xu Tianchen, senior economist at the Economist Intelligence Unit, the "rare, simultaneous rollout of so many measures underscored the urgency for policymakers to prop up the economy."

The policy blitz gave an adrenaline shot to the country's dismal stock market days before the week-long national holiday, which starts on Tuesday. China's blue-chips stocks soared more than 15% last week in its biggest single-week gain in nearly 16 years. Hong Kong's Hang Seng index surged 13%, notching its best week since 1998, according to Reuters.

The frenzy continued on Monday, when the combined turnover on the Shanghai and Shenzhen bourses exceeded 1.8 trillion yuan ($228 billion), logging a record high, according to the Securities Times, a state-run financial newspaper. That's despite a key measure of factory activity, the official purchasing managers' index (PMI), shrinking for another month in September.

Remarkable turnaround

Even some big-name investors are excited by the rally. David Tepper, the billionaire founder of American hedge fund Appaloosa Management, told CNBC in an interview Thursday that he was buying more of "everything" related to China.

The stock market may be in the midst of one of its most remarkable turnarounds, but economists say reversing China's economic downturn will require much more work.

"Stimulating the stock market doesn't really do much for the real economy in China. Very few people invest in the stock market compared to other major markets," said Logan Wright, director of China markets research at Rhodium Group.

Chinese households have suffered a massive loss of wealth from a slump in the housing market, amounting to an estimated $18 trillion, Barclays economists said in a research note earlier this month. It's as if each three-person household in China has lost around $60,000, an amount that is almost five times China's per capita gross domestic product.

Wright said the stimulus package "makes the leadership look more reactive, more responsive to the downturn in the economy. And that is what's generated some of the more positive sentiment (last) week. But nothing really changes in terms of the structural outlook."

China's decades-long investment-led growth has reached "a dead end," and fundamental overhauls of its fiscal system — including a redistribution of income and greater transfers to households — are needed to rebalance the economy toward a more sustainable consumption-led growth model, Wright said.

There has been little in the barrage of measures announced last week to address the underlying structural problems weighing down economic growth. China has long had one of the highest saving rates in the world. While one-off cash handouts and subsidies may boost short-term consumption, robust social welfare and healthcare are needed to make Chinese households feel comfortable to spend more in the long run, especially following the collapse of the property sector, where most Chinese invest their savings.

Property woes

The outlook for the real estate industry, which makes up about a quarter of the Chinese economy and 70% of household wealth, remains dim.

“There’s not much Beijing can do,” Wright said. “In many ways, the adjustment in the property sector is almost complete, and policy hasn’t been very effective in stabilizing it.”

After decades of boom, China’s real estate sector is now in its fourth year of contraction since falling into a deep crisis in 2020, when the government cracked down on excessive borrowing by developers to rein in their high debt. Beijing’s efforts to rescue the market have struggled to revive demand, with prices of new homes continuing their freefall.

In a concerted push to prop up the embattled property market, the southern metropolis of Guangzhou became China’s first tier-one city to lift all restrictions on home purchases on Sunday, while Shanghai and Shenzhen also eased rules for home buyers.

The country now has so many empty apartments that not even all of its 1.4 billion people are enough to fill them. To make matters worse, the population has been shrinking for two years, a demographic shift that could further hobble future growth.

The Chinese government’s efforts to encourage births has also failed. More and more young people are delaying marriage and childbirth, if not foregoing them all together. Many feel jaded or burnt out from “involution” – a catchphrase describing the intense competition that has dominated their lives, from striving for academic excellence to building a successful career. Some are resorting to “lying flat” or “letting it rot,” a form of passive resistance against society’s pressure by doing just enough to get by.

These buzzwords sum up a growing sense of despair among China’s disenchanted youth. Some are finding the arc of their lives increasingly out of sync with the expected upward trajectory described in Xi’s “China dream,” a grand vision of “unstoppable” national rejuvenation.

Having grown up in an era of breakneck economic growth and ever-improving living standards, China’s Gen-Zs are now reckoning with the possibility that they might not do better than their parents, whose generation accepted limited freedoms in exchange for promised prosperity.

Over the past years, China’s youth have watched their personal freedoms shrink under Xi’s authoritarian rule and their job prospects dim in a flagging economy.

Xi’s crackdown on the private sector, from big tech to private tutoring, has eliminated many jobs once available to China’s fresh graduates. The youth unemployment rate soared to 18.8% in August, the highest since authorities changed the methodology last year to exclude students.

That poses a potential problem for the Communist Party, which has for decades staked its legitimacy on the country’s unprecedented growth. As the economy slows, Xi has bolstered another pillar of the regime’s legitimacy: nationalism, which he is expected to invoke to mark the country’s 75th anniversary on Tuesday.

But Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy at the National University of Singapore, said Chinese leaders are not “planning on giving up the economic performance argument yet.”

“They want to restore confidence in the economy, but the most troublesome headache for the Communist Party is they don’t have effective solutions to the economic slowdown.”

The 57th Session of the United Nations Human Rights Council and Chinese Stance

28 September 2024, Modern Diplomacy, Prof. Engr. Zamir Ahmed Awan

The ongoing 57th session of the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) continues its critical work of promoting and protecting human rights globally.

The ongoing 57th session of the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) continues its critical work of promoting and protecting human rights globally. Established in 2006 by the UN General Assembly, the UNHRC replaced the Commission on Human Rights, aiming to address human rights violations and ensure accountability. Based in Geneva, the Council comprises 47 member states, elected by the General Assembly, and meets regularly to discuss pressing human rights issues.

Historical Background and Importance

The creation of the UNHRC marked a significant shift in the global human rights landscape. It was founded to address concerns over the politicization and inefficacy of the earlier Commission, emphasizing a more objective and credible approach to human rights. Since its inception, the Council has served as an essential platform for addressing a wide range of human rights violations, conducting investigations, and holding governments accountable for their actions.

Functions and Aims

The UNHRC's primary function is to promote universal respect for the protection of all human rights—civil, political, economic, social, and cultural. The Council reviews human rights situations in UN member states through mechanisms like the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), where every nation's human rights record is assessed periodically. It also responds to urgent crises, commissions fact-finding missions, and offers recommendations to governments.

The Significance of the 57th Session

The 57th session comes at a critical time when global human rights issues such as conflict-related abuses, migration crises, and environmental challenges are at the forefront of international debate. This session is particularly important as it continues the Council's work in addressing new and emerging threats to human rights, while promoting dialogue, cooperation, and international standards.

The UNHRC serves as a vital institution in the global effort to ensure human dignity, freedom, and justice. Its ongoing work in the 57th session reaffirms the international community's commitment to uphold human rights for all, in line with the principles of the United Nations.

Politicization of Human Rights

It has been observed that some countries are increasingly politicizing human rights issues, using them as tools to advance their geopolitical agendas. A clear example of this is seen in the selective nature of the United States' annual human rights reports, which tend to target nations like Russia, China, and a few others that are perceived as political adversaries. While these countries face scrutiny, glaring human rights abuses by other nations, particularly those aligned with U.S. interests, are conspicuously overlooked.

For instance, Israel, widely regarded as one of the most significant violators of human rights throughout modern history, is rarely, if ever, mentioned in U.S. reports. The ongoing oppression of Palestinians, destruction of civilian infrastructure, and repeated violations of international law have been largely ignored. Similarly, India, which has consistently faced accusations of gross human rights violations, particularly in Kashmir and against religious and ethnic minorities, escapes substantial criticism from the U.S. government. Despite India surpassing many nations in terms of human rights abuses, the U.S.

remains largely silent, prioritizing strategic alliances over human rights advocacy.

Even within its own borders, the U.S. faces serious human rights concerns. Issues like systemic racial discrimination, police brutality, and the treatment of migrants have reached alarming levels, yet these problems are rarely acknowledged in the same critical manner the U.S. reserves for other nations. This selective focus undermines the credibility of human rights advocacy, revealing a double standard where violations are condemned based on political convenience rather than universal principles.

In light of this, the international community must strive to ensure that human rights are defended impartially and consistently, free from political bias. Selective enforcement and politicization only weaken global efforts to uphold human dignity and justice.

Chinese Stance and global support

Over 100 countries expressed their support in various ways, both jointly and individually, for China's position on issues related to China's Xinjiang, Xizang, and Hong Kong regions and opposed the politicization of issues on human rights following statements made by the US and handful of countries which smear China's human rights situation during the ongoing 57th session of the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council.

The representative from Cuba made a joint statement on behalf of nearly 80 countries during the council, emphasizing sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity, in addition to non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign countries, are the basic norms of international relations, according to a release from the Permanent Mission of China to the UN Office in Geneva and other international organizations in Switzerland on Wednesday.

The joint statement noted that issues related to Xinjiang, Xizang, and Hong Kong Special Administrative Region are internal affairs of China. They oppose the politicization of human rights issues and the application of double standards, as well as using human rights as an excuse to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries.

All parties should adhere to the purposes and principles of the UN Charter, follow principles of universality, impartiality, objectivity, and non-selectivity, and respect the right of the people of each state to choose independently the path under their national conditions.

Ambassador Chen Xu, permanent representative of China to the UN Office in Geneva and other international organizations in Switzerland, said the current atmosphere of politicization and polarization in the Human Rights Council is intensifying.

The Human Rights Council should not be a venue for confrontation and pressure, but it should play its role in helping countries build trust and promote cooperation through dialogue and communication, Chen said.

Other representatives also emphasized that all parties should view the human rights conditions in other countries objectively and engage in dialogue and cooperation on human rights issues based on equality and mutual respect. They called for avoiding selective and double standards and jointly resisting the erroneous practices of politicizing, instrumentalizing, and weaponizing human rights issues.

The Chinese delegation also described the real situation of human rights protection in China, exposing the serious human rights violations existing in countries like the US, and urging these countries to effectively protect human rights and contribute more to the international human rights cause.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian stated on Wednesday that the support expressed by more than 100 countries at the UN for China once again demonstrates that the politicization of human rights issues by the US and a few other countries is unpopular and destined to fail within the international community.

China urged the US to seriously reflect on and address its own grave human rights issues, including racism, gun violence, social injustice, and violations of immigrants' rights. Lin further called on the US to safeguard the rights of its citizens, stop interfering in other countries' internal affairs, and engage constructively in international human rights cooperation.

What is China doing at such heights in Tibet? The research report revealing the truth about PLA is surprising.

28 September 2024, Press Wire

China is laying a network of helicopter bases in Tibet. This is a big challenge to India's security. Research by the Takshashila Institution has revealed that about 90% of China's helipads in Tibet are at an altitude of 3,300 to 5,300 meters (10,000 to 17,400 ft) above sea level. 80% of these helipads are at an altitude of more than 3,600 meters. This disclosure is an alarm bell for India because China can use these helipads to rapidly transport troops and weapons to the border.

China's conspiracy on India-Bhutan border

Research has also shown that China is building these helipads near the border with India and Bhutan. These helipads are an important part of China's military strategy and have increased the threat to India. 109 helipads have been studied in the research. Of these, only two helipads are at an altitude of 780 to 2600 meters. 32 helipads are located at an altitude of 2700 to 3600 meters, 44 helipads are located at 3700 to 4300 meters and 25 helipads are located at an altitude of 4400 to 4700 meters. Six helipads are at an altitude of 4800 to 5400 meters.

Shocking revelations in the research report

Professor Y Nithyanandam, head of the geospatial research program at the Takshashila Institution in Bengaluru, has written an article for The New Indian Express. In this he/she said that China can use these helipads for military operations. he/she can use them for movement of troops and weapons, to increase surveillance and to provide help in emergency situations.

The research report led by Dr. Nithyanandam states that China is rapidly increasing its military capability in the highlands. Earlier, flying helicopters in high altitude areas was considered a weakness of China, but now it is rapidly overcoming this shortcoming. As part of its military strategy, China is also expanding helipads as well as airstrips. It plans to use airstrips less than 1,000 meters long for unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs).

China is continuously increasing its military capability. Over the past decade, China has invested heavily in helicopter infrastructure, increasing its military capability. This investment is not just a response to incidents like the 2017 Doklam standoff or the 2020 Galwan Valley conflict. Rather, it is a deliberate strategy aimed at ensuring long-term gains in an area where geographical conditions and altitude pose serious challenges to PLA (People's Liberation Army) troops. For example, the Z-20 and Z-8L helicopters are specifically designed to operate in the difficult conditions of the Tibetan Plateau, demonstrating China's will to overcome obstacles posed by adverse conditions.

The report said, 'The speed with which China is building heliports reflects its aggressive military expansion.' Some heliports included in the study are being modernized and some new heliports are being built. China is laying a network of helicopter bases near LAC. Helipads and airports have been built at a distance of 5 kilometers, 10 kilometers, 25 kilometers, 50 kilometers, 100 kilometers and 200 kilometers from the LAC.

Are there any preparations for war?

These helipads will help in military operations and deployment of troops on the border. By combining these helipads with other military facilities such as radar stations and surface-to-air missile (SAM) sites, China is creating a strong military network that it can quickly deploy in the event of any border dispute. The report says that India needs to be cautious of this move by China. India will have to strengthen its military capability and keep a close watch on China's actions.

Securing the Legacy: The Future of the Dalai Lama and Tibet. A Tibetan Point of View

27 September 2024, Bitter Winter , Ugyen Gyalpo

To avoid Chinese maneuvers, the 14th Dalai Lama may consider self-emanating when he is still alive, i.e., appointing a successor and recognizing him as his "emanation."

Just few weeks ago, the Tibetan community of New York and New Jersey offered Tenshug, long life prayer ceremony for His Holiness the Dalai Lama at the UBS Arena in New York. Seventeen thousand Tibetans and other devotees of His Holiness showed up who were lucky enough to get the tickets for this small venue arranged by the able organizers at a short notice.

A poignant moment of the whole ceremony was the time when four hundred Tibetan children facing His Holiness sitting on the traditional Buddhist throne sang the song "Tashi Sho." The arena's massive screen alternated between images of children singing and the crescendo of their emphatic voices echoing through and the visibly smiling image of the Dalai Lama which looked noticeably frailer as he was recovering from a knee surgery. The cropped-out video of the children singing went viral on Chinese social media within Tibet, although it omitted the stage where His Holiness was seated.

I was deeply moved by this powerful moment, and many others were similarly reduced to tears. Witnessing somebody who embodies Avalokiteshvara and has served as a fatherly figure for the Tibetan people was profoundly emotional.

His Holiness has guided the Tibetan movement through tumultuous times and has been instrumental in preserving Tibetan language, culture, and the future of Tibetans born in the diaspora, who are now thriving globally. The thought of Him slowly succumbing to aging and the forces of nature was a sinking feeling. Despite His Holiness's assurances through prophetic dreams that he would live up to the age of 113, the reality of the Tibetans people's vulnerability without him is undeniable. The Chinese government, with its "long wait game," seeks to exploit this vulnerability.

China is known for employing the stratagem of "long wait game" and the issue of Dalai Lama's reincarnation process is no exception. For almost three decades now dating back to 1995, China already hatched the plan to hijack the reincarnation process of the Dalai Lama and set the foundation of its sinister campaign by conspiring and executing the abduction of the 11th Panchen Lama, a six-year old boy recognized by the Dalai Lama, next in line on the Tibetan Buddhist hierarchy. After the abduction of the six-year-old child and the arbitrary arrest of the entire family, China soon after installed their own fake Panchen Lama approved by an atheist Chinese Communist Party. Today this fake Panchen Lama groomed by the CCP tours Tibet, conducts Kalachakras amidst a captive audience who are forced to worship him under the barrel of the gun and advocates allegiance, adherence, and total submission to the ideology of the Party and thought of Xi Jinping.

China always has a thirty-year plan, forty-year plan, and fifty-year plan in all its policy agendas and the plan to totally hijack the Dalai Lama institution is already on the thirty-year mark when His Holiness is precariously treading on the age of ninety.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama is the soul of Tibet. Tibetans have been led politically and spiritually by fourteen reincarnations of the Dalai Lamas, and he is synonymous to Tibet itself. Imagining Tibetan existence without Him is like envisioning a lost herd of sheep without its shepherd. The hopes and aspiration of Tibetans rest on one person, and the CCP is hellbent on exploiting this. To win over the Tibetan spirit, controlling the fate of the Dalai Lama to tame the Tibetan resistance against Chinese rule has become the paramount objective of the Party. To impose their version of a manufactured Dalai Lama "made in China" to subvert, influence, manipulate, defeat, and win over the hitherto indomitable spiritual world of Tibetan Buddhism is their foremost priority.

We may lack the leverage to engage in international diplomacy and politics with China. However, in order to fight against China in its own dirty game, Tibetans, along with the Tenshug offering for the long life of His Holiness, must also request His Holiness and pray that he considers self-emanating within this lifetime. If His Holiness wishes his reincarnation to be sought outside of Tibet, then request to self-emanate into a soul of a child born in the United States of America should be included in our prayers. An American-born Tibetan child should be a "game changer." Being an American is a strong currency of its own and it comes with political clout and direct representation of the people of Tibet, in a land where many legislative measures for Tibet have been passed, and bipartisan support remains steadfast and rock-solid to this day across the aisle of the Congress.

Whether Tibet has been used for geopolitical self interest by the Americans is the debate for another day! Whether or not we acknowledge this, a vacuum without a reincarnation and looming threat of the CCP hyenas hovering around to alter the course of our history is a real concern. Therefore, ensuring a continuous presence of His Holiness without a gap between reincarnations is crucial. Imagining the 15th Dalai Lama while the 14th is still present, particularly if the child is a Tibetan American groomed by the greatest Ocean of Wisdom could thwart China's effort to hijack the Dalai lama institution and take over Tibet entirely.

Xi Jinping Is Prioritizing Political Survival Over Economic Prosperity

26 September 2024, Foreign Policy, Raja Krishnamoorthi

China is missing out on growth because the Communist Party comes first.

If the citizens of the People's Republic of China (PRC) were asked, "Are you more hopeful for the future now than you were before Chairman Xi came to power?" the answer for most, if they were able to answer freely, would likely be a resounding "no."

China's economy is facing its gravest challenges since the Maoist era amid a collapse in public confidence. Growth has slowed, the unemployment rate is high, and the housing market is tumbling. But at the recent Third Plenum, a meeting of top Chinese Communist Party (CCP) officials held roughly every five years and centered on economic policy, President Xi Jinping made clear that he has decided to stay the course and is doubling down on state control of the economy. At the same time, Xi has been baselessly claiming that the economic reform goals set at 2013's Third Plenum were met.

Xi believes in the central role of the CCP in everything—including the economy. The CCP has taken an increasingly direct hand even in private businesses, and using this leverage, his government has pursued a policy of prioritizing the expansion of manufacturing capacity through massive subsidies, embracing an export-driven economy rather than one linked to expanding domestic consumption in China. With this excess capacity, Xi hopes to gain market share by driving foreign competitors out of business through dumping the subsidized goods below cost.

Xi's plan has alarmed foreign political and business leaders while leaving the Chinese public and even local officials resigned to the fact that they have no ability to impact central policymaking. By doubling down on this policy, the Third Plenum crushed any lingering hope that the PRC would be able to break out of sputtering growth or address long-standing economic imbalances that leave it increasingly at odds with the rest of the world.

Since the Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989, the CCP has maintained its power not only through force, but also through an implicit compact with its citizens that the party would deliver economic growth as long as its primacy remained unquestioned. With the current slowdown, the CCP is failing to uphold its end of that political bargain. Protests in China over labor issues and housing have become more frequent as the unemployment rate ticks up; meanwhile, the PRC has seen the largest exodus of high-net-worth individuals from the country in its history.

The path to strengthening the PRC's economy and restoring confidence in increasingly skeptical Chinese consumers is clear: loosen the CCP's political stranglehold over the economy, acknowledge the severe problems that China is facing, and offer a realistic plan for addressing the needs of the Chinese people. Instead, Xi has chosen to tighten his grip, consolidating powerful state-owned enterprises, elevating CCP ideology, ignoring the drivers of demand and consumption, and prioritizing his political control over China's prosperity.

The Third Plenum painfully confirmed what we already know: The PRC under Xi lacks the ability to self-correct because Xi does not allow it. Xi's centralization of power has minimized opportunities for expert dissent and public discourse, sharply curtailing considerations of alternative economic policies. The results of the Third Plenum made clear that Xi believes China's economic policies are already on the right track and that better results will come when officials better implement his directives.

According to one recent analysis, party cadres and economists were demonstrably less willing to speak up and provide comments during this Third Plenum drafting process for the conference's central "decision" policy document than they were at the Third Plenum held in 2013. Xi was also less willing to listen. According to the Asia Society Policy Institute, there were 25 percent fewer written suggestions submitted for the text by cadres during this year's session than in 2013, and of those suggestions, only a meager 12 percent were accepted in the final document as 88 percent were rejected.

One of China's most loyal "wolf warriors" and CCP propaganda insiders, former Global Times editor Hu Xijin, was recently banned from Chinese social media for incorrectly interpreting the Third Plenum decision as signaling more support for the private sector. In this environment, why would any official stick their neck out to propose significant reform, no matter how necessary they believed it to be?

Xi believes that China must dominate the advanced technologies of the future, and he remains committed to that priority, even as it comes at the expense of the public good. In Xi's economic vision, social welfare programs, which would decrease the current trend of Chinese people saving more than a third of their income, would divert resources away from the PRC's pursuit of technological dominance that would support its military capacity.

In Xi's worldview, national security is based on political security, which means the security of the party. As an unfortunate result, we should expect the CCP's grip to tighten. Xi will continue to view the economy through the lens of national security even at the expense of the PRC's sagging economy and the wealth of its people. It also means that Xi will double down on nationalism, censorship of discontent, and international bellicosity to distract from domestic challenges.

China's economic struggles have continued through Xi's crackdowns at home and increasingly aggressive stance toward Taiwan and the Philippines. Xi will continue to face trade-offs between his nation's prosperity and his total control. Based on the recent signals, we should not expect changes in the PRC's government, economic priorities, or foreign policy any time soon.

Restoring Tibetan Supreme Justices: An Ode to the Supreme Strength of Public Mobilization

26 September 2024, Tibetan Review

While not claiming a direct causal link to the recent and widely welcomed amendment of the Charter of Tibetans in Exile by the Tibetan Parliament in Exile—which allows for the appointment of Justices to the Tibetan Supreme Justice Commission, Prof. Nawang Phuntsog* highlights that the “People’s Movement for Securing the Central Tibetan Administration,” which campaigned for this change, exemplified the power of unity and collective strength when people rally around a shared cause.

In the past four years, the Tibetan Parliament in Exile has, by its own doing, subjected the Tibetan public to a tumultuous ordeal, with clear signs foreshadowing the weakening of the Tibetan establishment in exile. However, during its final session, the recently concluded 17th Tibetan Parliament in Exile marked a significant turning point—much to the relief of many, particularly those involved in the well-organized “People’s Movement for Securing the Central Tibetan Administration.” The participants of this movement were visibly emotional, with many moved to tears as they heard the TPiE’s charter amendment announcement. Although no direct causal link is suggested here, the timing of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile’s (TPiE) decision to amend the Charter of Tibetans in Exile at the last moment of its session and the mounting wave of public advocacy were on full public display. The advocacy participants watched the Tibetan Parliament session proceedings in real-time on a big screen, with the anxious eagerness of high school students waiting for the announcement of the final school examination result.

It is puzzling why the Tibetan Parliament in Exile members, supposedly the sacred representatives of the public, had the audacity and inclination to prolong an ordeal that was both unnecessary and entirely avoidable. Yet, it lasted for over three years. The deadlock originated from the infamous Resolution 39, which sought to remove the justices in what seemed like a bitter act of retaliation. This occurred after the supreme justice commissioners, fulfilling their judicial responsibilities, imposed a nominal penalty on the TPiE’s Standing Committee for failing to convene a meeting during the COVID pandemic. The Parliament’s Standing Committee could have quickly resolved the issue through an online meeting or handled it internally, given that the pandemic forced everyone to adapt without exception.

After years of stalemate in the Tibetan Parliament in Exile, many Tibetans have questioned the relevance of Parliament members representing various Tibetan Buddhist schools. These clergy representatives, skilled in parliamentary debate and rhetoric, have been seen as obstructing resolutions that could have broken the deadlock. As a result, the Parliament’s focus has been diverted from critical issues, such as the ongoing suppression of religious and linguistic rights in Tibet. While religion itself is not to blame, the clergy’s frequent attempts to inject unnecessary polemics into parliamentary sessions have disillusioned the general public, leaving many to painfully reflect on how religion, in the political context of Tibetan exile, can be both a blessing and a curse. While the participation of clergy in the parliamentary process is a unique feature of the Tibetan exile establishment, recent questionable events have left an obnoxious and repulsive taste in the general public’s mouth.

The gravity of the situation became unmistakable when several individuals questioned the wisdom of Resolution 39 from the outset, yet the TPiE remained as immovable as a stubborn mule. This resolution had far-reaching consequences, the chief among them being that the judiciary—one of the three pillars of Tibetan democracy in exile—was left in limbo for more than three years. The issue became so severe that the public could no longer sit idly by. This gave rise to the “Advocacy of the General Public for the Sustainability of the Central Tibetan Administration,” a grassroots movement aimed at restoring the judicial branch. The movement was built on voluntary participation and led by three remarkable leaders: Mr. Tseten Phuntsok La, Ms. Tenyang La, and Mr. Tsering Siten La, who conducted numerous online meetings as part of their mobilization efforts. These leaders deserve recognition for their commendable public service, cooperative spirit, and ability to present a clear, powerful, and rational case. With humility and grace, the three leaders spoke in public and in online meetings with dignity, integrity, and courage, leaving a lasting impression on all who heard them. Many wish them to be members of the Tibetan Parliament and elevate it to greater success for the common good. Ms. Tenyang La appeared as anyone's loving sister, but when she spoke, she delivered her message with force and a clear sense of purpose. She always folded her hands and paid sincere homage to His Holiness before beginning her speech, leaving all with deep admiration for her courageous humility.

The dynamism of this leadership trio became evident when they successfully mobilized nearly 1,000 Tibetans, young and old, monks, and nuns from multiple countries, who assembled in Dharamshala just as the 17th Tibetan Parliament in Exile was set to convene on September 11, 2024. This massive gathering included members from 25 regional chapters from India, Nepal, Europe, Australia, and North America. Thanks to the active engagement of members from these Chapters, the advocacy was a mobilization force to reckon with. It is difficult to recall a public mobilization as effective and impactful as this one, which brought heightened attention and pressure on the need to restore the judiciary within Tibetan democracy. Funded by voluntary contributions from Tibetans across the globe, united by a common purpose, to ensure the sustainability of the Central Tibetan Administration as a viable institution capable of resolving the Sino-Tibetan conflict for the welfare of six million Tibetans, this movement showcased the power of unity and strength when people rally around a shared cause. More than just a source of inspiration, the public advocacy movement proved the transformative potential of collective action when common interests are threatened, undermined, or hijacked by partisan or sectarian forces. Like many public interest groups around the world, this advocacy movement was conceived with the sole aim of serving the collective good. The organization must continue to raise public awareness and mobilize people to act whenever needed. Its success should serve as a clarion call: this movement will be there when duty calls.

How China Soured on Nepal

26 September 2024, ORF

On July 29, China's Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song publicly mocked Nepal's efforts to locate two missing buses and their passengers following a landslide at Simaltal on the Narayanghat-Mugling road. His comments specifically targeted the Indian assistance to local rescue and search teams, ridiculing Nepal's tendency to seek support from its southern neighbor.

The ambassador's remarks drew widespread criticism in Nepal, both in the media and among parliamentarians, who condemned his insensitivity toward the grieving families and his unnecessary intrusion into a domestic matter.

This incident is part of a broader pattern of Ambassador Chen's interference in Nepal's internal affairs, often resulting in diplomatic blunders. In the previous year, he had similarly mocked Nepal's electricity trade and other economic relations with India, attracting similar condemnation. In May 2024, he engaged in a contentious exchange on social media with a local journalist over a report on China's loan to Nepal for Pokhara International Airport.

Ambassadors generally adhere to established diplomatic norms, refraining from involvement in local political matters except in situations of significant national or international concern. However, China's ambassador to Nepal has recently diverged from this tradition. Chen's actions suggest a continuation of the "wolf warrior" diplomacy that Chinese envoys have employed in recent years, especially in smaller states. This behavior reflects Beijing's growing exasperation with its setbacks in Nepal and signifies a shift toward a more assertive Chinese stance with Nepal over recent years.

The Equidistance Policy's Ramifications

China's frustration stems from its lack of progress in Nepal across multiple areas: political alignment, foreign policy, major economic projects, and military affairs. China experienced a loss of face when it failed to block the ratification of the U.S. Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) Nepal Compact. In addition, China could not counter India's renewed proximity in Nepal's political and military circles, or achieve substantial gains in Nepal's polity, economy, and military.

China has encountered challenges with Nepal's equidistance policy, a strategy that Beijing itself once promoted to recalibrate Kathmandu's approach, particularly concerning India. This policy advocates for Nepal to maintain balanced relations with India and China across political, economic, and military domains. However, if taken to its logical conclusion, the equidistance policy does not preclude Nepal from enhancing its bilateral relations with Western nations, including the United States. Consequently, the emphasis on equidistance has transformed Nepal into a zone of competition in South Asia, exacerbated by worsening China-U.S. and China-India relations.

Beijing's efforts to pivot Kathmandu's foreign policy predominantly toward China and away from Western countries suffered a significant setback during the controversy over the MCC Compact, which would see the United States issue a $500 million grant to Nepal for improvements to electricity and road infrastructure.

In an unsuccessful attempt to block ratification of the agreement, Beijing employed scaremongering tactics, encouraging China-funded groups to propagate a narrative that the MCC would allow the U.S. to deploy troops in Nepal. Pro-China MPs and leaders prolonged the issue for nearly five years, but the momentum eventually waned. Following this, China openly opposed the compact. Despite China's covert and overt opposition, the MCC Compact was ratified in 2022, a development that dealt a considerable blow to Beijing's ambitions in Nepal.

A major concern for China in Nepal has always been the security of its southern Tibetan border. Beijing is particularly sensitive to Tibetan refugees in Nepal and their history of anti-China activities. China believes recent U.S. actions regarding Tibet, including the passage of the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Conflict Act and a U.S. congressional delegation's meeting with the Dalai Lama in India, have emboldened these refugees. A porous Tibetan border further troubles China and therefore, it has sought greater cooperation with Nepal's army and border security forces while looking askance at the partnership between Nepal and the United States.

Political Complexities

Nepal's political situation reveals China's next failure. Beijing has struggled to make significant progress due to frequent government changes, leaving China uncertain about its next steps. Although former communist allies of China have periodically returned to power, they have grown increasingly pragmatic over time, seeking a balanced diplomatic approach.

Pushpa Kumar Dahal, also known as Prachanda, of the Communist Party of Nepal-Maoist Center, fostered deep ties with China during his first term as prime minister from 2008 to 2009. However, during his most recent term from 2022 to 2024, he maintained a balanced approach, adopting India-friendly policies. Similarly, Prime Minister K.P. Sharma Oli of the Communist Party of Nepal-United Marxist-Leninist (CPN-UML) has lately shifted toward more equidistant policies.

As expected, Oli is grappling with internal party factionalism, indirectly fueled by China, with leaders such as Narayan Kaji Shrestha, Bishnu Rizal, and former President Vidya Devi Bhandari challenging his authority. Bhandari has rejoined the CPN-UML, and China plans to support her candidacy in the 2027 general elections to unify all communist factions, a goal that Oli and Dahal have been unable to achieve. In the past, China has successfully unified the communist parties, notably through its former flamboyant Ambassador Hou Yanqi, who brokered a working arrangement between Oli and Dahal in 2020. However, this mediation proved short-lived, as Oli and Dahal frequently undermined each other.

As the widow of the late Madan Bhandari, a founding member of Nepal's Communist Party, Vidya Devi Bhandari commands decent respect across all communist factions. China aims to cash in on her status in the upcoming elections. However, both Dahal and Oli remain roadblocks, resisting China's interference in their politics. Notably, Oli has declined to allow Bhandari to visit China on a Chinese invitation.

Unable to forge a strong relationship with the Nepali Congress Party due to its perceived pro-India stance and facing fragmented and indecisive Madhesi parties, Beijing finds itself with limited options in Kathmandu, primarily restricted to engaging with communist factions.

Consequently, the ongoing rivalry between Oli and Dahal significantly impedes China's political objectives in Nepal. China's failure to resolve this complex issue, partly due to its inexperience with democratic compromise, has left it feeling increasingly nervous and defensive.

Economic Doldrums

China has substantially invested in Nepal, focusing on expanding economic links across numerous sectors. Beijing has encouraged Chinese infrastructure companies to engage in projects such as road construction, tunnel development, hydropower, and communication facilities in Nepal. However, this approach faces challenges. Nepal, with its relatively small economy, can only absorb a limited amount of Chinese investment.

China initially anticipated that its economic initiatives in Nepal would facilitate trade routes to India's northern regions, capitalizing on the potential for lucrative trade. However, these expectations have not materialized. The deterioration in China-India relations has led India to discourage Chinese trade through Kathmandu and prevent Chinese hydropower companies from exporting electricity to India. This policy has dampened the enthusiasm of Chinese energy developers in Nepal.

In another example, Pokhara International Airport, developed with substantial Chinese investment, has failed to receive Indian clearance for overflights, leading to its isolation and diminished returns on investment. The significant Chinese financial involvement and high interest rates have led Nepal to formally request that China convert the airport loan into a grant. This lobbying, however, has run into criticism in China, which perceives it as a hostile attempt by Nepali leaders to undermine Chinese investments. (The high interest rate on the airport loan was the subject of the previously referenced dispute between Chinese Ambassador Chen Song and a Nepali journalist.)

China's ambitions to advance its infrastructure projects under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) have also faltered. None of the BRI projects in Nepal has progressed, as Kathmandu prefers grants over Chinese loans and remains cautious about entering into any China-sponsored infrastructure project with sovereign-guaranteed loans. Consequently, the lack of progress in the economic sphere has heightened China's frustration.

Military Proximity

China has always sought close cooperation with the Nepali armed forces, hoping to moderate its pro-India leanings. Beijing found an opportunity in 2005 when the former king suspended Nepali democracy. Consequently, when its traditional suppliers – namely, India, the U.S., and the U.K. – refused to provide arms, Nepal began sourcing arms from China. This trend escalated after the communists came to power in Kathmandu in 2008. Bilateral visits, military grants, and aid increased annually, reaching nearly $32 million by 2019.

China's military diplomacy extended to capacity-building efforts for the Nepali Army in disaster management, military medical facilities, and infrastructure development, in addition to arms supplies. However, as Chinese weaponry came under global scrutiny for quality, performance, and support services, Nepal could not ignore persistent issues with Chinese arms. For instance, China-supplied armored vehicles for Nepal's peacekeeping troops have encountered significant problems, and imported Chinese transport aircraft became costly white elephants. As a result, despite China's existing arms supply relationships, an Indian company SSS Defence secured the contract to supply ammunition to the Nepal Army in an open competition in 2022.

For better military-to-military links, China encouraged a wide range of Nepali military officials, from junior to senior ranks, to opt for professional military education programs at People's Liberation Army (PLA)-run institutions. To date, about 44 senior Nepali military officials have opted to study in the Defense and Strategic Studies Course at the PLA's National Defense University (NDU)'s College of Defense Studies. Many of these China-trained officers have risen to high ranks within Nepal's Armed Forces, including the current army chief, Gen. Ashok Raj Sigdel. In May of this year, the Chinese Embassy in Nepal hosted a reception for these PLA NDU alumni to strengthen international connections and promote deeper China-Nepal relations. However, the effectiveness of these efforts has been mixed.

The China-Nepal military relationship briefly gained momentum following the unofficial blockade in 2015 of the India-Nepal border; however, it faltered during China's own COVID-related undeclared blockade of the Nepali border from 2020 to 2023. During this period, China blocked all border trading routes, and Nepali traders and communities near the Tibetan border suffered significantly. Since mid-2023, China has attempted to rekindle its ties and restart the Sagarmatha joint military exercises.

China has moreover, failed to weaken India's proximity and strong military ties with Nepal, rooted in longstanding institutional and veteran relationships. India has gradually worked to reduce suspicions with Nepal, leading to significant agreements in power purchase, petroleum pipelines, and infrastructure projects. This has fostered greater understanding between political and military institutions in both countries. Consequently, China's original objective of disrupting the close bilateral relationship between India and Nepal appears to be unraveling.

Beijing's Exasperation

China's ongoing struggle to deepen its connections with Nepali institutions across political, economic, and military sectors has led to noticeable exasperation among Chinese officials. This frustration began to build in 2019 when China's President Xi Jinping failed to secure an extradition treaty with Nepal, leading to the final two years of Ambassador Hou Yanqi's tenure ending in disappointment. The current ambassador's controversial statements, along with his defensive, quarrelsome, and undiplomatic behavior, starkly reflect China's overall disillusionment in Nepal.

Despite Beijing's efforts to quietly maneuver and improve its position and undercut the United States' and India's prospects in Nepal, the existing regional dynamics, security architecture, and tough competition from New Delhi and Washington offer Nepal multiple options, complicating China's ambitions. As a result, Beijing faces a challenging situation in Nepal, resulting in China's growing exasperation.

India-China relationship 'significantly disturbed' but it's key for the world: Jaishankar

25 September 2024, The Economic Times

The India-China relationship is key to the future of Asia and it will influence not just the continent but the entire world, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar said, noting that the "parallel rises" of the two countries present a "very unique problem" in today's global politics.

"I think the India-China relationship is key to the future of Asia. In a way, you can say that if the world is to be multi-polar, Asia has to be multi-polar. And therefore this relationship will influence not just the future of Asia, but in that way, perhaps the future of the world as well," Jaishankar said in his address at an event titled 'India, Asia and the World' hosted by Asia Society and the Asia Society Policy Institute here on Tuesday.

Jaishankar said currently the relationship between the two countries is "significantly disturbed".

Jaishankar, who will address the General Debate of the 79th session of the UN General Assembly on Saturday, held a series of bilateral meetings with his global counterparts during the day in the UN Headquarters and the city.

Responding to a question on China during an interaction at the Asia Society event, Jaishankar noted that India has a "difficult history" with China, including a conflict in 1962.

"You have two countries who are neighbours, unique in the sense that they are the only two countries with over a billion people, both rising in the global order and who often have overlapping peripheries, including the fact that they have a common border. So it's really a very complicated issue. I think, if you look today in global politics, the parallel rises of India and China, present a very, very unique problem," he said.

Jaishankar had recently said that roughly 75 per cent of the disengagement problems with China have been sorted out, a remark that was alluded to during the Asia Society interaction.

Referring to those remarks, the minister said: "When I said 75 per cent of it has been sorted out - I was asked in a way to quantify - it's only of the disengagement. So that's one part of the problem. The main issue right now is the patrolling. You know, how do we, both of us, patrol up to the Line of Actual Control."

Jaishankar said the patrolling arrangements after 2020 have been disturbed. "So we've been able to sort out much of the disengagement, the friction points, but some of the patrolling issues need to be resolved."

He said once we deal with the disengagement, "there is the larger issue as both of us have brought a very large number of troops up to the border. So there is what we call the de-escalation issue, and then there is the larger, the next step is really, how do you deal with the rest of the relationship?"

Jaishankar gave a historical perspective of the relationship and of the border dispute, saying the "entire 3500 kilometre-border between India and China is disputed".

"And so you make sure the border is peaceful so that other parts of the relationship can move," he said.

He added there were a series of agreements between the two countries that went into greater and greater detail on how to make sure the border remained peaceful and stable.

"Now the problem was in 2020, despite these very explicit agreements, we saw that the Chinese - we were all in the middle of Covid at that time - moved a large number of forces in violation of these agreements to the Line of Actual Control. And we responded in kind," he said.

"Once troops were deployed very close up, which is "very dangerous", it was likely a mishap could happen, and it did happen," Jaishankar added.

Referring to the 2020 Galwan clash, the minister said: "So there was a clash, and a number of troops died on either side, and that has since, in a sense, overshadowed the relationship. So until we can restore peace and tranquillity on the border and ensure the agreements signed up to are adhered to, it's obviously difficult to carry on with the rest of the relationship."

Jaishankar said the focus for the last four years had been to, in the first instance, at least disengage the troops, meaning that they go back to the camp, the military bases from which they traditionally operate.

"Because right now, both sides have troops deployed forward," he said.

Reimagining human rights and China?

23 September 2024, Bangkok Post, Vitit Muntarbhorn

Should human rights be reimagined, especially in the context of China? From one angle, the answer is obvious. Plenty of norms are already agreed upon globally without the need for reimagination, and China is part of that universality. Yet given the situation on the ground level and the evolving nature of human rights, there might be room for some innovative reimagination, and this deserves balanced reflection.

Formally, the country is part and parcel of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. High-powered statements from the top of the administration cite this UN declaration as a guiding light for the country. The term "human rights" appears in the country's constitution, and various national human rights action plans exist. The country is a party to six key human rights treaties, namely the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (Cedaw); and the conventions on racial discrimination, child rights, rights of persons with disabilities and action against torture.

It has signed but not ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It has not yet become a party to the conventions on the rights of migrant workers and on action against enforced disappearances. The country participates in the peer-review process, the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), under the UN Human Rights Council, and it has had its fourth review this past year. It also engages with the UN Special Procedures, such as UN Special Rapporteurs (varying between mandates).

On the constructive side, the country's achievements in the economic and social fields are well appreciated. It has overturned the serfdom of the past and the World Bank notes this achievement: "Over the past 40 years, the number of people in China with incomes below US$1.90 (62 baht) per day has fallen by close to 800 million, accounting for close to three-quarters of global poverty reduction since 1980". In vetting the country's record on women's rights, in 2023, a Cedaw committee commended some developments, including the amendment to the Law on the Protection of Rights and Interests of Women, a new law against sexual harassment, and an anti-domestic violence law.

Yet, the main quandary is in relation to the fulfilment of civil and political rights, and the treatment of minorities. This is especially evident from the various recommendations which other states, as peers, conveyed to the country during the UPR as areas needing improvement. The country rejected or noted without commitment a notable number of those recommendations during the fourth review mentioned in 2024. Out of about 400 such recommendations, it rejected nearly 100. The latter were mostly in regard to suggestions to improve the situation in Xinjiang, Tibet, and Hong Kong. A number of UN reports raise key protection gaps needing attention, especially concerning torture, arbitrary detention, excessive securitisation, and the mistreatment of various groups seen as adverse to the authorities.

A statement in August 2024 from the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) remarks on the continuing dialogue between that office and the country's administration on "a range of critical issues, such as counter-terrorism laws and policies, criminal justice, other policies of concern that impact on the human rights of ethnic and religious minorities, including in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and the Tibet Autonomous Region, equality and non-discrimination, as well as national security and human rights concerns in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region."

A team from the OHCHR recently visited the country to discuss the issue of counter-terrorism policies and the criminal justice system. A subsequent OHCHR statement called for a full review of the legal framework governing national security and counter-terrorism and to strengthen the protection of minorities against discrimination. This is thus an invitation for progressive action, reimagining more effective human rights implementation in their totality. Interestingly, the country has now become a party to the International Labour Organization's conventions (numbers 29 and 105), which target eliminating forced labour, and an ILO team has also visited the country to stock-take. These conventions are monitored by an ILO committee of experts, who adopt a low-profile approach since the proceedings are behind closed doors. This is complementary to the more public positions of the other UN mechanisms on human rights noted above. These synergies help to advocate the preferred path progressively.

On other fronts, there are varying degrees of convergence with other countries. For instance, the country advocates the right to development, especially to help raise the profile of developing countries in the economic field. For substantive democratisation, this needs to be contoured by respect for civil and political rights, in tandem with economic, social and cultural rights.

The country is also agreeable to the right to peace. Visibly, it is one of the top contributors to UN peacekeeping, both in terms of funding and the provision of peacekeepers in a myriad of peace operations worldwide.

On the newly formulated universal right to a clean, healthy and sustainable environment, while it is true that the country abstained on the vote in favour of this right in the UN, this was possibly due to the omission in the text of the flexible principle of common and differentiated responsibilities under international environmental law which the country advocates. This right is displayed in practice in the country by the many litigation cases against state enterprises, questioning lapses concerning environmental protection and climate change, such as the need to shift to renewable energy. The call for green transition, with access to justice as part of accountability, is thus a bridge between this country and other countries.

The advent of digitalisation and artificial intelligence (AI) has propelled reimagination on the more futuristic front regarding national and international responses. Despite superpower rivalry, there is emerging global convergence on the call for laws on personal data protection, paralleled by the need to ensure human supervision and control over AI.

Why not then – recognise universally, as a novelty, the right of humanity to AI transparency and safety for all?!

Open questions | Why minority languages are disappearing from some classrooms in Xinjiang but not Tibet

23 September 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

What drew you to ethnic minority issues in China?

I'd been to Xinjiang perhaps three or four times many years ago. I was concentrating on a particular subject, which was preferential policies. At that time I was studying them broadly, going to different minority areas including Tibet, Xinjiang, Guizhou, Sichuan, Inner Mongolia. That was in the late 1990s and the beginning of the 2000s.

From that I got interested in ethnic minority policies more generally because there was a debate in China about them.

Some said preferential policies and ethnic policies were not broad enough and they weren't directed sufficiently to closing the socioeconomic gaps that existed between Han people and minority people.

The other side was people who said that basically ethnic regional autonomy had created a vested interest on the part of minority officials particularly.

The debate intensified after 2008, 2009 because in 2008 there were the demonstrations in Tibet, and then in 2009 there were the [riots] in Urumqi.

The people who are in favour of reform of the system of ethnic regional autonomy and the diminution of preferential policies then started to have the upper hand in the debate.

So as a result of that, there have been some significant changes and preferential policies in some places have diminished.

For example, the system of "additional points" [given to ethnic minorities in college entrance exams] has diminished in some provinces but in places like Xinjiang it's still pretty strong.

This is absolutely necessary in my view because the whole goal is to create more ethnic minority students, particularly from Xinjiang and Tibet, but also from other areas where the ethnic minority population is still quite rural, still has a substantial number of people who are relatively poor and has lower levels of education. So these places need to have lots of people from their community go to university, get training, come back to their areas and help them in terms of economic and social development.

Have you seen any big policy shifts in the past five to 10 years under the banner of building "a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation"?

There has been a shift but it's quite variegated – it all depends upon what part of China you're talking about.

In some places, there's been quite a significant shift in terms of no longer putting so much emphasis on ensuring either that there be a significant core of ethnic minority officials or that ethnic minority languages be central to the educational process in ethnic minority areas. It was also the subject of controversy in Inner Mongolia [where] there is no longer any requirement that ethnic minority languages be taught in schools.

It's still the case that in some places there are continuations of the programmes of teaching people their own indigenous language, their mother tongue. At a lot of boarding schools, for example, in Tibet or in Xinjiang, the Tibetan students or Uygur students are going to have maybe three, four, five hours a week of Tibetan or Uygur.

But in other places, it just depends. Such programmes have been discontinued. For example, a primary school [in Kashgar], one of the things they told us was starting last year, they no longer had any special classes in Uygur language for the primary school students. And this is because the parents overwhelmingly rejected the idea. They want their children to concentrate on learning biology and mathematics and Mandarin. They didn't want them to spend their time [learning Uygur]. Of course, all these students were Uygur and they're in a city where 84 per cent of the population is Uygur, so they're not going to forget how to speak Uygur. They speak Uygur every day at home and to their classmates. But in terms of learning how to read and write Uygur, nobody's teaching them now.

Their parents are less interested. They are urban people and they want their children to be competitive in terms of going to a good middle school and then going to a good high school and then going to university, et cetera.

But this remains a concern among some minority intellectuals. They think it's really necessary to preserve not only speaking ability in their languages, but also reading and writing so they can have access to the literature of their ethnic groups.

Let's talk about Tibet. The Dalai Lama turned 89 in July and he's hinted that he will address the issue of his reincarnation when he turns 90. How should Beijing prepare for this, and what are the biggest challenges for Beijing, the Dalai Lama and his exiled government?

China has been preparing for this for decades. The central government will not just allow the Dalai Lama to name his successor without reacting to that by doing something significant.

The odds are [the Dalai Lama's preferred candidate] will be somebody outside because [if it's] somebody inside Tibet, he's going to be under the surveillance of the local authorities, and he may not have any opportunity to take up his office. But nobody knows whether the Dalai Lama will name a man or a woman, a Tibetan or a non-Tibetan, a child or an adult.

All we can conceive with some assurance is that the central government will definitely try to counter whatever the Dalai Lama does.

There's some rumours that the Dalai Lama will name an adult as a successor, despite the past practice of naming a child of four or five. Naming an adult has some advantages for the Tibetan émigrés of course, because the child will have to be studying Buddhism for many years. So there's at least going to be a 10-year hiatus where the successor named by the Dalai Lama really can't be taken seriously as a leader because he's a kid.

So if that happens, first of all, the Chinese government will denounce the Dalai Lama for diverging from the practice of naming a new Dalai Lama. The normal practice is a lottery: you wrap the names of candidates in a ball of tsampa [flour made from roasted barley], you put it in an urn, you have somebody pick out the winner. If it names its own Dalai Lama, the central government will probably name a kid and go through that ceremony.

There are lots of rinpoches, or reincarnated Buddha, now in Tibet who are quite loyal to the government, and they don't care much about the Dalai Lama any more, at least not openly.

For one thing, the Dalai Lama hasn't been in Tibet since 1959. The Dalai Lama is no longer a commanding presence among Tibetans generally. I think most Tibetans have heard of him, but they don't know much about him. And unless they're very devout, they probably don't care that much about him either any more.

Plus, Tibet has also been transformed economically and the level of education has gone up tremendously. A lot of Tibetans actually do think of themselves as being Tibetan and Chinese, or Chinese Tibetans anyway. They think of themselves now as part of China, and they don't hate Han people.

There was a period when there was a significant part of the Tibetan population, at least in Lhasa, who had a hostile attitude towards Han people. But that seems to have significantly subsided.

That's because now Tibetans are much more closely connected to the rest of China, not just in the literal sense of trains and planes, but mostly through language. Now a large part of the urban Tibetan population can speak Mandarin. And they have gone much further in the school system than they would have in the past, and there are a lot more Tibetan professionals. So all of this makes things radically different from even, say, in 2008 at the time of the demonstrations in Lhasa and in several other cities in Tibet.

Boarding schools in Tibet – pretty much all of them I think – have maybe five hours a week of Tibetan language instruction. So those people are taught to read and write Tibetan. They must learn Mandarin as well ... the children are completely bilingual. So it's not the same situation as the primary school in Kashgar I described earlier.

Do you see global attention on Tibet waning as the issue of Xinjiang has come up? Will it wane further with the passing of the current Dalai Lama?

I think if the Xinjiang issue didn't exist at all, the Tibet issue would still fade.

Most people in the West know nothing about Tibet. But a lot of people have heard the name Dalai Lama, and they are mistaken about the Dalai Lama in the sense that most people think the Dalai Lama is the world leader of Buddhism, which of course he isn't.

He might be called the head of Tibetan Buddhism but at most he's really just the head of its Gelug [yellow hat] school. But there are 12 million Tibetan Buddhists in the world and there are 250 million or more Buddhists in total.

When the Dalai Lama is no longer around, the Tibet issue will almost recede into oblivion.

The Tibet issue was very much around the Dalai Lama's personality, and of course he was framed in a certain way ... as being this sort of childlike adult, very friendly and effusive and laughing and telling stories and being kind and all that.

I interviewed him once before ... in the 1990s. He was a nice guy, but maybe now his image is no longer the same. He's seen as somebody who can't get around any more, and also there was the incident about him kissing this young boy. I think given the current perspective that people have about such matters that, at least in some quarters, he's going to be a bit discredited as a result of that.

You've recently been to Xinjiang. In the current climate, how did it compare to earlier trips in terms of carrying out research and people's lives?

One thing is it's more difficult to talk to people. Foreigners can go to Xinjiang without any special permission, in contrast to Tibet. But to actually interview people is another matter – especially to get access to officials.

The first time I went to Xinjiang – in the late 1990s, early 2000s – I went to Kashgar. I wanted to interview an official from the education department, and I had a reference letter from the State Ethnic Affairs Commission. But I went to the office of this official and he just picked up a newspaper and started reading it. He wouldn't talk to me at all.

I also interviewed the head of the Religious Affairs Bureau in Kashgar. He had just got back from the Hajj – he's Uyghur of course – and I showed my reference letter. He said, "I'll answer any question you want." I was really surprised. No official ever says that. He said, "I'm close to retirement." He's a member of the Communist Party, but he was saying that.

But nowadays, I think it's more difficult because lots of people, particularly officials, are cautious about how they interact with outsiders. I'm the ultimate outsider since I'm a foreigner. But I think they're cautious even with regard to people from the mainland who come to Xinjiang. And they're even cautious with people who are Xinjiang locals at Xinjiang institutions because everything is so sensitive there now. Researchers just really have no confidence any more that they can do their research and be assured that they'll be allowed to get the data they need. And this is even more true with regard to statistical data. It's really a big problem now.

What do you think of international criticism of China's minority policies?

All these claims made about Uyghur genocide, or forced labour, arbitrary detentions – basically they have no cases to present with regard to any of those claims. There's absolutely no evidence of any person being forced to labour.

As for arbitrary detention, well, there certainly were a lot of people detained and many people imprisoned, and some of them given quite long prison sentences. But this was an anti-terrorism campaign. This was also an anti-separatist and anti-religious extremism campaign.

And the terrorism in Xinjiang was very real. Although the government has really only talked about hundreds of people being killed by terrorists, every scholar I've talked to says that this is a gross underestimate – that actually thousands of people were killed by terrorists.

Different governments of course act in different ways in anti-terrorist campaigns. Terrorists of Isis, al-Qaeda are still very much around, still carrying out terrorist attacks in many places in the world. China basically defeated the terrorists in Xinjiang, and it defeated them by some degrees of repression. That's true. They mobilised the army, they mobilised armed police, the Public Security Bureau.

The main method was to try to do something to alleviate the conditions which create terrorism, religious extremism and separatism. So they constructed these vocational educational training centres, which people in the West love to call concentration camps, internment camps, detention centres. But actually, none of this is accurate in terms of describing what was done in those places.

And they only existed from April of 2017 to October of 2019, after which they were closed down.

The centres had three missions. One was to teach people Mandarin – they learn some rudimentary standard Chinese. They were also taught about laws that they're supposed to obey – stay away from religious extremism, terrorism, separatism. And then there were vocational skills – there were eight primary vocational skills that were available.

The people who went through that system – and they may or may not have been happy about going through it – some of them were sent there because they had violated laws. Other people were sent there just because they were suspected of being religious extremists.

How do you think China's handling of the Xinjiang issue will impact its relationship with Central Asian and Middle Eastern countries and its Belt and Road Initiative?

For Xinjiang, what's most important in terms of the Belt and Road Initiative are the neighbouring Central Asian countries.

What's interesting in that regard is that the governments of Central Asia have a harder line than even China does against terrorism, against Islamic fundamentalism.

Now these are all Muslim countries, but their governments are dead set against religious extremism because they realise that there's a direct relationship between adopting Salafist religious views – Salafism being the Islamic fundamentalist school of thought – and becoming a member of Isis or al-Qaeda or some other terrorist organisation.

So take for example this question of suppressing women wearing burkas in Saudi Arabia. China since 2014 has suppressed that. They've also suppressed men having long beards. Where did China get this idea? Directly from the Central Asian countries which passed laws earlier than China's law about this. In Tajikistan, in Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, people have been arrested for having long beards. People in China have also been arrested, but they've been treated much more leniently in Xinjiang than people are treated in Central Asia. Most people are just given a warning and then they obey it. They cut their beard shorter and women will no longer wear burkas.

These governments have a much more repressive outlook with regard to terrorism than even the authorities do in China. Authorities in China are dead set on ensuring that there are no longer terrorist incidents and they've been quite successful – there hasn't been any recorded terrorist incident for seven years in Xinjiang.

Do you think Han chauvinism still exists today, and if so how does it impact minority relations?

Definitely. The main way I think it still exists today is online. And unfortunately I think the government doesn't do enough to suppress Han chauvinism. It should be taking down posts and it should even be arresting people if they advocate discrimination against ethnic minority people. After all, there's a law in China against that. So Han chauvinism definitely still exists, and it still very much revolves around the idea that ethnic minority people are backward.

The proportion of people in the Han population who are Han chauvinists has actually diminished. In part, that is because the government does at least promote the idea that there's a Zhonghua minzu [Chinese nation]. So that includes Han people and minority people.

Looking ahead, are there any areas of minority policy where Beijing might make concessions or reforms?

It's difficult to predict but I don't think there will be any major changes, because I think major changes have already been made.

The main thing that will probably be done in terms of the minority areas is that there will be even bigger inputs to socioeconomic development. The Chinese government – while it's certainly not an egalitarian operation – nevertheless does have the idea that they want to reduce the very significant differences that still exist between the west and the east, between minority areas and Han areas, and I think they'll continue to do that.

Certainly there should be a major change in the leadership of the party and state in terms of minority people. It is not good that the Politburo – 25 people – is, first of all, male, and second of all, Han. This is a major embarrassment. There's very considerable scope for changing the nature of the top leadership to incorporate more women and more minority people. So maybe that will happen, but unfortunately it probably won't any time soon.

Understanding China's policy of forced labour towards Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang (IANS Analysis)

23 September 2024, Social News XYZ

Over the last ten years, the global community and media have persistently highlighted the extensive atrocities inflicted by China upon its minority groups, particularly the Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang province. The Uyghurs represent approximately 45 per cent of the region's demographic and have endured various forms of oppression, including mass detention and indoctrination through what are termed 'vocational education and training centres'.

This has been accompanied by pervasive surveillance technologies, enforced sterilization, and systematic sexual abuse. In August 2022, Michelle Bachelet, the then UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, released a significant report indicating that China's treatment of the Uyghurs might amount to "crimes against humanity".

The report detailed large-scale arbitrary detentions, torture methods such as forced starvation and coerced medical procedures, alongside evidence of forced labour.

The so-called 're-education camps,' which have also been referred to as 'internment camps' or 'concentration camps' by various observers, first emerged in 2014 and saw substantial expansion in 2017. According to the Chinese government's narrative, these actions are framed as necessary measures to combat terrorism, extremism, and separatism.

In 2019, claims made by the governor of Xinjiang suggested that many individuals had 'graduated' from these centres, leading to perceptions that numerous facilities had been shut down.

However, in 2020, the Australian Strategic Policy Institute revealed that this closure was merely a façade for a shift towards utilising the formal prison system for detaining those deemed a 'threat' to state security, evidenced by a marked increase in prosecutions and convictions of Uyghurs.

Furthermore, to evade international scrutiny, China has been employing deceptive strategies to suppress its Uyghur Muslim minority in Xinjiang. One such tactic involves presenting forced labour as a labour transfer initiative aimed at employment generation, industrial development, and poverty alleviation.

Adrian Zenz, a prominent researcher on China's policies in Xinjiang, examined the work practices of Uyghur Muslims in 2023 and uncovered that the labour-transfer programme involved the forced relocation of Uyghur Muslims to state-assigned jobs far from their home regions.

Unsurprisingly, these workers are threatened with prosecution or imprisonment should they attempt to leave their employment. Zenz asserted that this labour-transfer initiative is utilised in the production of various goods, including cotton, tomatoes and tomato products, peppers and seasonal agricultural items, seafood, polysilicon for solar panels, lithium for electric vehicle batteries, and aluminium for batteries, vehicle bodies, and wheels.

Another method through which China compels Uyghur Muslims into involuntary labour is via the prison system. As previously noted, recent years have seen alarming rates of Uyghur prosecutions. For example, Human Rights Watch reported that approximately half a million individuals in Xinjiang were prosecuted between 2017 and 2022.

Similarly, a leading media outlet disclosed that one county in Xinjiang recorded that one in every 25 residents was convicted on terrorism-related charges, all of whom were Uyghurs.

The accusations brought against Uyghurs by the People's Republic of China (PRC) can range from serious charges like terrorism to trivial ones such as 'picking quarrels and provoking trouble.' Given that labour is a standard practice for inmates, Uyghur Muslim prisoners are exploited to support China's industrial growth by working in agriculture, mining, and the manufacturing of goods.

The troubling reports of forced labour in Xinjiang have prompted Western governments to implement legal restrictions on imports from the region.

In 2021, US President Joe Biden enacted the Uyghur Forced Labour Prevention Act, requiring companies to prove that their imports are not produced through forced labour involving Uyghurs. Similarly, in April 2024, the European Parliament approved legislation set to take effect in 2027 that will screen imports linked to forced labour.

Notably, by the end of the first four months of this year, the EU had already imported goods valued at $641 million from Xinjiang. According to a 2022 study, polysilicon produced in Xinjiang, essential for solar panels, accounted for approximately 95 per cent of photovoltaic energy in the world's top 30 solar power-producing nations.

The same research indicated that Xinjiang was responsible for about 18 per cent of globally traded processed tomato products and that one in five garments worldwide contained cotton sourced from the province.

Companies face significant challenges in identifying products made with Uyghur forced labour due to China's strategic obfuscation of these practices under various pretenses, including the so-called labour transfer scheme.

Earlier this year, Human Rights Watch published a report condemning major global automotive manufacturers, including General Motors, Toyota, Volkswagen, and Tesla, for failing to adhere to responsible sourcing standards regarding aluminium linked to Uyghur forced labour in Xinjiang.

Recently, China has established itself as a leading producer and exporter of automobiles, with Xinjiang emerging as an industrial centre that experienced a dramatic increase in aluminium production, rising from one million tonnes in 2010 to six million tonnes in 2022.

Approximately 9 per cent of the global aluminium supply is sourced from Xinjiang, and since much of this aluminium is blended with other metals to create finished products, it becomes exceedingly difficult to ascertain the extent to which forced labour contributes to these goods.

While the international community is increasingly recognising the severe abuses perpetrated by China against the vulnerable Uyghur population, existing legal frameworks are inadequate due to the intricate nature of manufacturing processes and the lack of transparency surrounding them. Consequently, persistent pressure must be exerted on China to urge a change in its practices and to halt the dehumanisation, persecution, and exploitation of Uyghur Muslims.

There's More to China's Politics than Xi Jinping

22 September 2024, National Interest, Michael Mazza

Even though Xi has seized the helm of political decision-making, the intense focus on the general secretary himself—while necessary—has inadvertently exposed gaps in our understanding of the broader Chinese political system.

Over the course of three Chinese Communist Party Congresses—the eighteenth in 2012, the nineteenth in 2017, and the twentieth in 2022—Xi Jinping has cemented his position atop the CCP pyramid, eschewing old norms and rules governing elite politics in favor of his preferences. Pundits and politicians alike have been left to grapple with myriad new questions regarding the future trajectory of the regime's power dynamics, policy priorities, and its role on the global stage. The ripples of these changes extend far beyond the Great Wall, threatening to reshape the contours of great power competition in the years to come.

A clear lesson from the nineteenth and twentieth Party Congresses is that personal loyalty to Xi is now a key factor—perhaps the weightiest factor—in the Party's leadership ascension playbook, but even as personal allegiance has grown increasingly important, it has not completely supplanted the influence of legacy factors in leadership selection. Age, experience, and regional origins still play roles—to varying degrees—in determining who rises to the Party's senior ranks. These long-standing criteria remain significant at more junior levels, even as loyalty takes center stage at the pinnacle of the CCP power structure. Aspiring leaders must navigate a complex terrain where demonstrating loyalty is crucial, but not at the expense of neglecting other, traditionally required qualifications.

Xi's defiance of unwritten rules in personnel selection has become a hallmark of his leadership style. However, contrary to common belief, the CCP is still in a period of flux. Given Xi's advanced age (seventy-one years old), mounting domestic and international challenges, ambitious up-and-comers, and a continuing evolution of elite politics from the Eighteenth to the Nineteenth to the Twentieth Congress, there is as yet no new normal. Allegiance to Xi is an ephemeral qualification for elite advancement—in part because it's unmeasurable. Moreover, Xi is mortal. The potential for a return to more familiar patterns of leadership succession and governance cannot be discounted. Another radical shift in the way power is shared, amassed, and wielded is possible.

The upcoming Twenty-First Party Congress in 2027 will be a critical juncture, with Xi's performance and the prevailing power dynamics determining the extent to which he can shape the next generation of leaders. Over the next three years, observers should keep a particularly close eye on the evolution of factional politics within China.

Factional rivalry has long characterized Chinese politics. The two factions that had dominated the period between Deng's passing and Xi's ascendance—the Chinese Communist Youth League faction and the “Shanghai Gang”—are no longer major players. In their place, a handful of new factions have risen. However, unlike their predecessors, each of these new factions is loyal to the same senior leader: Xi Jinping. This may bind inter-factional competition in novel ways. Even though Xi has seized the helm of political decision-making, the intense focus on the general secretary himself—while necessary—has inadvertently exposed gaps in our understanding of the broader Chinese political system. What resources and prerogatives do these factions compete over? How do they compete? What role does Xi play in directing, managing, or channeling that competition? These are all open questions.

Behind the facade of Xi's all-powerful rule, contemporary Chinese politics is as complex as it has ever been. Going forward, intelligence agencies and scholarly analysts alike should explore the functioning and interaction of these new factions, seeking to uncover how they define their interests, the nature of their competition, and why they may sometimes cooperate. Such efforts will illuminate how Xi shapes and navigates this political ecosystem and how that ecosystem may evolve without him.

Indeed, this new network of Xi-centered factions may have within it the seeds of future disorder. Eventually, Xi will depart the scene. With no one atop the superstructure to manage rivalries and with the old rules of elite politics long since jettisoned, vicious competition for control of the Party—and of China—may result. Before Xi, there was inherent stability in a two-faction system. But now, there is the possibility that a unipolar party may transform into a multipolar party virtually overnight.

In Communist China, the revolution has always eaten its own. In a post-Xi China, the revolution may find a feast fit for an emperor.

The India 'hiding in plain sight'

22 September 2024, Deccan Herald, Sanjay Sipahimalani

Seventy years ago, historian A L Basham published The Wonder That Was India, a sweeping ode to India's ancient history, religion, the arts, language and literature. The book was a riposte to negative assessments of the country's heritage that had persisted from the time of James Mill and Macaulay to the imperial perspective of Vincent Smith.

“India's contribution to the world's cultural stock has already been very large,” Basham wrote in the book's epilogue, urging us to take account of its legacy, “for it is no longer the heritage of India alone, but of all mankind”. Similar views by others provide fodder to those who claim the subcontinent was the source of all that is good and great on the planet, an attitude caricatured by Sanjeev Bhaskar's character in the British comedy series Goodness Gracious Me: “Christianity? Indian! Leonardo da Vinci? Indian! Royal family? Indian!”

Wild claims aside, William Dalrymple writes in The Golden Road that “the entire spectrum of early Indian influence has always been there, hiding in plain sight”. He finds it in the Buddhism of Sri Lanka, Tibet, China, Korea and Japan, in the place names of Burma and Thailand, in the murals and sculptures of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata in Laos and Cambodia, and in the Hindu gods, rituals and temples of Bali.

From about 250 BCE till the founding of the Delhi Sultanate, India was a confident exporter of its civilisation, creating “an empire of ideas” that encompassed religion, the arts, technology, astronomy, mathematics, medicine, mythology, language and literature. Dalrymple's capacious and absorbing portrayal of this period of soft power blends recent archaeological discoveries with short accounts of his own travels, along with an abundance of archival sources.

Sinocentric framing

The title of the book is an attempt to rebalance the concept of the Silk Roads, the ancient overland trade routes between China and Europe that facilitated the exchange of goods and ideas. For Dalrymple, this is a “Sinocentric reframing and rebranding of history”. He sets out to show how India was at the centre of a web of influence stretching between the Red Sea and the Pacific.

To make its case, the book journeys through various staging posts and destinations over time. For a start, there are accounts of boatloads of Indian goods driven by monsoon winds making their way to and from the Roman Empire.

The process intensified after Emperor Augustus's takeover of Egypt following his victory over Mark Antony and Cleopatra in 31 BCE. Fleets of merchant ships passed between the two worlds, making India the largest trading partner of the Roman Empire.

From diamonds to rubies, from teak to sandalwood, and of course, from pepper to other spices, they couldn't get enough. Such commerce caused the puritanical naval commander Pliny the Elder to grumble that India was “the sink of the world's most precious metals...There is no year which does not drain our empire of at least fifty-five million sesterces”.

The might of the Persians, the ravages of the Goths, and the eventual decline of the Romans in the West ultimately made Indian merchants shift focus to the East. Here, they found a Suvarnabhumi, a land of gold. Dalrymple recounts in immersive detail how the Pallavas dominated lucrative Southeast Asian trade routes, with Mamallapuram emerging as arguably the greatest entrepôt of the region.

Culture travelled hand in hand with trade, as always. Indian thought, epics, plays and dance were widely disseminated all over the newly-extended Indosphere, to use the coinage of Simon Sebag Montefiore. The process would reach a magnificent flowering with the great temple complexes of Indonesia's Borobudur and Cambodia's Angkor Wat.

As The Golden Road fluently shows, the Indosphere's ripples carried even further. Buddhism brought about a metamorphosis in China's arts, history, society and culture; with time, it was also profoundly changed and moulded by the host country.

And no such account would be complete without mention of how Indian thought in astronomy and mathematics — such as the concept and treatment of the zero — passed to the Arabs, and from them to the wider world. For this, we have the Barmakid family to thank: Abbasid viziers descended from the line of Sanskrit-literate Buddhist abbots in Afghanistan.

These broad historical currents are leavened with engrossing portraits of influential individuals over the ages. Among them are Xuanzheng, the intrepid traveller to Nalanda and tireless disseminator of Buddhist doctrine; Wu Zetian, the only woman who became emperor in her own right in 3,000 years of Chinese history; the Pallava monarch Mahendravarman under whose rule Shaiva and Vaishnava bhakti movements bloomed; and Dandin, the polymathic Sanskrit luminary of his time.

Earlier works like White Mughals and The Anarchy have amply demonstrated Dalrymple's skill in portraying times of confluence, collaboration and conjunction: eras during which one way of life collides with and blends into another. The Golden Road is another fascinating addition to the list.

Is China losing the plot against the Dalai Lama?

20 September 2024, Greek City Times, Paul Antonopoulos

China is taking a calculated move to pre-empt the 14th Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatso from announcing his succession plan in 2025. It could be seen in the recent direction of the Communist Party of China's leadership to the state-backed Buddhist monks and religious experts to expedite the search for “reincarnated living Buddha.”

With this, it has also emphasized that policies and regulations for search of the “reincarnated living Buddha” must confirm the approval by the current Panchen Lama, who is a member of the Standing Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, the country's top political advisory body.

A decision to this effect was taken at a seminar which was held in Lanzhou, Gansu province on September 3, said Tibet.cn, an official Beijing-based website.

The seminar, organised by the Beijing-based Tibetan Buddhism College of China, was attended by more than 50 Tibetan Buddhist monks and religious experts belonging to the Buddhist Association of China. The college trains officially recognised Tibetan Buddhist monks.

The top leadership of the Communist Party of China seems to be in a hurry over the selection of Beijing-endorsed Dalai Lama much before the present Dalai Lama who has turned 89 in July 2024 announces his successor next year. The Tibetan spiritual leader has indicated that he will address the issue related with his reincarnation when he turns 90.

A large number of Tibetans spread across the world and powerful international community members like the US, Europe and other countries support the 14th Dalai Lama's decision on the reincarnation issue.

The US's Tibetan Policy and Support Act, which was unveiled in 2020, maintains that the “wishes of the 14th Dalai Lama, including any written instructions, should play a determinative role in the selection, education, and veneration of a future 15th Dalai Lama.” The Tibetan Policy and Support Act calls for sanctions on Chinese officials who interfere with Tibetan Buddhists' succession practices.

This has unnerved China. Yet the CPC leadership feels that pre-empting the Tibetan spiritual leader's decision on reincarnation would allow it to have an upper hand in giving the world a Dalai Lama of its own choice.

However, the Dalai Lama has already made it clear that China should keep itself away from the incarnation issue as it is his prerogative to declare his successor, a tradition which has been followed since 1391, when the first of his incarnations was born. The Dalai Lama has been reincarnated 13 times since 14th century.

Experts feel that even if China moves to pick a new Dalai Lama of its choice, Tibetan Buddhists will not accept it as the Dalai Lama holds a great significance to them. He is seen as a symbol of their nationalism and identity, say experts. They further maintain that the centuries old Tibetan reincarnation system is built on Tibetan Buddhists' faith in rebirth.

As per the Tibetan Buddhism tradition, a search for the incarnated Dalai Lama follows a certain process which is based on signs that the existing Dalai Lama conveys to top Buddhist monks before his death. These senior Buddhist monks conduct an elaborate search for a child who is the Dalai Lama's next incarnation.

As per the Sydney Morning Herald, the search involves consulting oracles, interpreting visions, and reading spiritual signs. Besides, these monks try to find clues from the deceased body of the Dalai Lama. When the body is cremated then smoke emitting out of the pyre is monitored. The direction of the smoke provides clues about the direction of rebirth of the next Dalai Lama.

This apart, dreams are considered to be an important guide in the search for the incarnated Dalai Lama. For example, monks tasked to search for the Dalai Lama often meditate at the central Tibet-based Lhamo La-Tso, which has been revered for centuries by Tibetan Buddhists as an oracle lake. On the bank of this lake, monks meditate till they get a vision or insight into the whereabouts of the Dalai Lama's rebirth, the Sydney Morning Herald said.

After a child is found following these visions and signs, a series of tests are carried out to verify the rebirth. The child is presented with items, some of which belonged to the earlier Dalai Lama. If the child identifies which objects belonged to the previous Dalai Lama, it is taken as a sign.

The 14th Dalai Lama was found at the age of two when a senior monk saw his village and house in a vision during meditation at the Lhamo La-Tso, the oracle lake. The boy then named as Lhamo Thondup was able to identify items that belonged to the 13th Dalai Lama, including a drum used for rituals, rosaries, and a walking stick.

In his autobiography, "My Land and My People," the 14th Dalai Lama said that as a child, he recognised a senior Buddhist monk who had disguised himself to observe the local children, and successfully identified a number of articles that belonged to the previous Dalai Lama.

Based on belief in rebirth, not all incarnated Dalai Lamas have been found in Tibet. The fourth Dalai Lama was found in Mongolia, South China Morning Post said.

However, just opposed to Tibetan Buddhists' traditions and customs for the search of the reincarnated Dalai Lama, the Communist Party of China follows a tradition which was tried during a Qing dynasty (1644-1911) emperor.

The said Qing dynasty emperor used to carry out a ritual known as the Golden Urn ceremony to identify the reincarnated Dalai Lama. This ritual was launched in the 18th century, but it was disrupted by political upheavals and wars in China in the early 20th century. It was again revived by the CPC and incorporated into official regulations in 2007, the Hong Kong-based English language newspaper said. China and its appointed Buddhists want to follow this ritual in the identification of the reincarnated Dalai Lama. After the death of the Panchen Lama, the second most important spiritual leader in Tibetan Buddhism after the Dalai Lama, in 1989, the CPC-backed search team had identified a child as his reincarnation through the Golden Urn ritual in 1995. The 14th Dalai Lama and his followers refused to recognise him.

China watchers say if China insists on carrying out the Golden Urn ritual to find out the Dalai Lama of its choice, he may face the same rejection by Tibetan monks and their backers across the world.

Despite this, China appears ready to give the world the Dalai Lama of its choice. It means there will be two Dalai Lamas, one backed by China and other recognised by the followers of the 14th Dalai Lama. However, in the process to win the plot against the 14th Dalai Lama, China has failed to learn lessons from the past.

China appointed Panchen Lama is not recognised by Tibetan Buddhists and the world. The same is true with the Karmapa, third most important Tibetan spiritual leader. Tibetan Buddhists and the international community do not recognise the China-appointed Karmapa as the legitimate head of the Karma Kagyu sect.

In the matter of faith and spiritualism, China's interference will backfire, experts say. They argue that Beijing may have conquered Tibet by force, but it has failed to suppress Tibetan Buddhists physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually. They continue to take bold steps while asserting their national identity; they protest against China's occupation of Tibet, while at the same time defending their tradition, practices and culture.

EXPLAINED: Why choosing the Dalai Lama is not just a spiritual matter

20 September 2024, RFA, Lobsang Gelek

The continuity of Tibetan Buddhist leadership and culture is at stake. Little wonder there are politics.

The Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, has said he will discuss the details of his reincarnation when he turns 90, next July. The China Tibetan Buddhist Academy – a Chinese government-supported institution – isn't waiting. This month, in Lanzhou, China, the group held a seminar to promote its views on the matter. The bottom line: whatever spiritual force guides this sacred process must adhere to the strictures of the Chinese Communist Party, or CCP.

If that sounds unholy, that may be the point. China has very practical reasons why it wants a say in who is the next Dalai Lama, given the enormous popularity of the current one and his ability to maintain cohesion among Tibetans across the globe in their fight for greater autonomy for Tibet.

The current Dalai Lama has become an enormously popular figure. Winner of the 1989 Nobel Peace Prize, his international renown has helped maintain a unity among Tibetans in and outside Tibet, despite efforts to negate his influence by the CCP.

The September seminar in Lanzhou re-emphasized the CCP's policies on reincarnation that must align the system with Xi Jinping thought and party policies. According to Beijing's official media, the seminar attendees were Tibetan Buddhism representatives and experts from Tibetan populated areas, including the Tibet Autonomous Region and the provinces of Qinghai, Sichuan and Gansu.

But that quickly triggered a rebuttal from the Tibetan government-in-exile, the institution the current Dalai Lama helped set up in 1959.

"While China recognizes only the Tibet Autonomous Region as the only 'Tibet,' they still recruited attendees from other Tibetan populated areas for important issues," Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the president of the current government, said in response to the seminar.

"No government nor any individual has the right to interfere in the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama," he added.

Who is the Dalai Lama?

"Lama" means teacher or master, and a lama is essentially a monk who has achieved some renown and taken on a leadership role within a community. There are thought to be hundreds of lamas within Tibetan Buddhism, which incorporates tenets of both traditional Buddhism and shamanistic practices that preceded its creation.

Worshippers consider the Dalai Lama to be the manifestation of Avalokiteshvara (Phakchok Chenri Se-པཌ་ཅོ་ཁ་ཆོས་ལུ་འཕགས་པ་ཞེས་པ་ in Tibetan), the Buddhist source of compassion.

The current Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, is the 14th in a line that began in 1391. Tibetans believe that when he dies he will be reborn to continue his role as spiritual leader.

Beyond the Dalai Lama's spiritual significance, thousands of Tibetans who have fled their homeland and were forced to leave behind families view him as a father figure who has provided for their temporal needs as well — security, education, health care — through an exile government he helped create in Dharamsala.

How is a new Dalai Lama selected?

Tibetan Buddhists believe that when the Dalai Lama dies his spirit will reincarnate in a new body. A search committee traditionally composed of high-ranking monks and lamas is formed to find a child born within a year of the Dalai Lama's death who exhibits exceptional qualities and behaviors akin to his predecessor. The present Dalai Lama was two years old when he was identified.

The method of discovery includes visions, consultations with oracles and interpretations of omens. The child must recognize belongings of the previous Dalai Lama, demonstrating a connection to his past life.

Why is choosing the Dalai Lama controversial?

The process of succession affirms the continuity of Tibetan Buddhist leadership and culture, which is why China seeks to have control over the selection. Choosing the 15th Dalai Lama could help solidify authority over Tibet and provinces where ethnic Tibetans live in large numbers. There are thought to be more than 6 million Tibetans in China, compared to 150,000 in exile.

The China Tibetan Buddhist Academy's meeting this month attempted to promulgate the Chinese government-preferred process, known as the "Golden Urn Selection." The method is considered a historical custom popularized during the Qing dynasty, but is disputed by the Tibetan way of recognizing the reincarnated lamas.

Activists and members of the Tibetan Women's Association (Central) living in exile protest the disappearance of 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, in New Delhi on May 17, 2023. (Sajjad Hussain/AFP)

A previous effort to control the selection of Tibetan leaders has met only minimal success. In 1995, Chinese authorities kidnapped a 6-year-old Panchen Lama, the second most important figure in Tibetan Buddhism, shortly after he was chosen by the Dalai Lama. The Panchen Lama and the Dalai Lama traditionally participate in each other's reincarnation recognition process, so many experts believe that Beijing will use its own Panchen to choose the next Dalai Lama.

The person they installed as a replacement continues to be viewed with suspicion by many Tibetans inside and outside China.

What has the Dalai Lama said about his reincarnation?

The Dalai Lama himself has suggested several possibilities for his reincarnation, declaring once that "If I die in exile, my reincarnation will be born in exile not in Tibet." The statement was viewed as a way to emphasize the importance of spiritual freedom.

He has also raised the possibility that the line dies with him; that a woman for the first time will be chosen; and that he may identify his successor before his death.

But despite himself engaging in speculation about the subject, questions about who will succeed him are premature, he says. He foresees living another 20 years.

The India-China standoff: One border, two systems Columnists

20 September 2024, Deccan Chronicle, Claude Arpi

On September 12, 2024, India's national security adviser Ajit Doval met Wang Yi, a member of the politburo of the CPC central committee and de facto Chinese foreign minister. The encounter took place in St. Petersburg, on the sidelines of a Brics meeting, and a Chinese communiqué says: "The two sides discussed the progress made in the recent consultations on border affairs and believed that the stability of China-India relations is in the fundamental and long-term interests of the two peoples."

Wang Yi noted that in the face of a world in turmoil, as two ancient Eastern civilizations and emerging developing countries, "China and India should adhere to independence, choose unity and cooperation, and insist on mutual achievement and avoid mutual consumption." On the disputed Line of Actual Control (LAC), it said: "Both sides agreed to work with urgency and redouble their efforts to realise complete disengagement in the remaining areas."

This is much easier said than done, for the simple reason that in the first place, China has never admitted to having changed the status quo by advancing into India's territory in six places in eastern Ladakh in 2020. Another issue is that the LAC has been moving over the years. The line, which was agreed by Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai in 1956 (and reconfirmed in December 1959) is far from the present Chinese claims.

Recently, India's external affairs minister S. Jaishankar said that 75 per cent of the disengagement has already been achieved in eastern Ladakh, but the remaining 25 per cent is certainly the most complex, to put it mildly. As in previous encounters with Indian leaders, Wang Yi tried to argue that India and China are in the same boat and if they work together, the two nations can change the whole world.

However, one should not forget that the systems of governance of India and China are vastly different; in fact, they stand at opposite ends. While India is a democracy with all its good and less good aspects, China is a totalitarian regime with a leader appointed for life. Some examples show the difference between the two Asian nations. Today's "disputed" border is with an occupied country, namely Tibet; before 1950, India had no border dispute with its northern neighbour. Beijing tries to change this basic fact with intense propaganda. On September 11, the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), a think tank based in Washington DC, released a report: "China launches new propaganda centre in Lhasa". It explains that "in the latest escalation of China's efforts to control the narrative on Tibet, a new propaganda centre called the Tibet International Communication Centre was launched in Lhasa on September 2, 2024." The Chinese propaganda would like us to believe that all is well in Tibet, which is not the case. If it was true, why should China stop visitors from coming to Tibet or Tibetans to visit their leader, the Dalai Lama, in India? In fact, the border discussed by Wang Yi and Ajit Doval is hermetically closed, even the centuries-old trade exchanges between the Indian Himalayas and Tibet have stopped; ditto for the Kailash-Manasarovar Yatra which is not accessible for Indian devotees. The first stage of the new propaganda campaign is to replace the name "Tibet" with a Sinicized version "Xizang", and begin to manifest Chinese President Xi Jinping's old slogan "tell a good Chinese story on the global stage". Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) party secretary Wang Junzheng argued that "external propaganda is an important part of the cause of the Party and the country. We must thoroughly implement General Secretary Xi Jinping's important expositions on external propaganda [and] fully and accurately implement Xi Jinping's important instructions on Tibet work". The instructions are that all is fine in Tibet. One of the tools used by the Chinese propaganda is the Beijing-selected Panchen Lama, the second highest figure in Tibetan Buddhism. The Tibet Daily recently remarked that the lama, whom the Tibetans name as the "fake" Panchen Lama, "carried out a series of Buddhist and social activities in Lhasa, the capital city of southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region". The "Panchen" gave a talk during which he stressed "the need to firmly uphold the Communist Party of China central committee's final say on the reincarnation of Living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism and voiced strong opposition to secession, while calling for national unity, ethnic unity, and religious and social harmony". China is already preparing for the Dalai

Lama's succession. You could ask how this is connected with the border issue between India and China? But forceful propaganda is always linked to a weakness. Remember the Great Leap Forward, during which 30 or 40 million people died of starvation following Mao's flawed agricultural policies? The years 1958-1961 witnessed more propaganda posters on the bumper harvests in the Middle Kingdom and the happiness of the masses than at any other time. Propaganda always tries to cover a flaw or a shortcoming. As Tibetans are today prisoners in their own country, they are shown enjoying Xi's policies; this is the crucial difference between populations on the Indian and Tibetan sides of the Himalayas. This should be noted by New Delhi. On September 10, the TAR announced the beginning of the celebrations for the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China; since the ministry of public security had already designated Year 2024 as "the year of special action to combat and rectify online rumours", it was decided "to deploy public security organs across the country to carry out a one-year special action". The public security organs "have responded quickly and taken the initiative to crack down on Internet-related crimes... making every effort to maintain the order of cyberspace and social security and stability," observed the Chinese media; quite ominous for an already over-monitored region. An article mentioned the launch of a "special action": "...the public security organs of the whole region have cleared more than 13,000 online rumour information, investigated 69 online rumour cases, and shut down 65 illegal and irregular accounts according to law. ...More than 650 offline publicity activities have been carried out, and 200,000 people have benefited and participated." It concluded that "the public security organs treated both the symptoms and the root causes, supported by special operations, and helped to maintain the security of cyberspace effectively". Let us remember that there is one border, but two opposite systems. It is certainly something that India should use to its full advantage to counter China's propaganda.

Keeping an Eye on the Watchdog: proposed revisions to the Supervision Law

19 September 2024, China Law Translate, Jeremy Daum

The adoption of China's Supervision Law was a major blow to the nation's ongoing criminal justice reforms. When it took effect in 2018, accompanied by a Constitutional Amendment necessary to accommodate it, it created a new branch of government empowered to investigate corruption and other abuses of public power outside the courts.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

This demonstrated a lack of confidence in the justice system to handle these sensitive cases and allowed investigators to sidestep established defense protections.

Since the law's release, additional legislation has refined the Supervision System, but draft revisions to the Law are now available for the first time since its passage and open for public comment through October 12, 2024. The major changes are noted below, followed by a comparative chart.

Expanded powers to detain suspects:

Among the most controversial provisions of the Supervision law is the 'liuzhi' or Retention in Custody (RC) system, which effectively codified the secretive Intra-Party Disciplinary (extra-legal) system of investigative detention known as Shuanggui. Those ultimately found to have committed crimes are transferred to the normal criminal justice system for trial, but this can follow months of retention in custody during the investigation, sidestepping many protections for the accused, such as the right to an attorney. Further, because the Supervision Law is concerned not only with crimes, but also with non-criminal 'serious violations' by state actors (defined as those which could result in a sanction of removal from their position under the P.R.C. Law on Governmental Sanctions for Public Employees) the law authorizes this type of investigative detention even where the offense's ultimate penalty might not include imprisonment.

The draft revisions propose expanding supervision powers to include a spectrum of measures that limit suspects' freedom to different degrees, including compelled appearances, release pending investigation, Confinement, Protective Care, and Retention in Custody. These new measures closely track corresponding language and powers in the Criminal Procedure Law, but apply to the broader range of misconduct in the jurisdiction of the supervision commissions.

Sinking McLeodganj: Dalai Lama's Monastery and Army Cantonment Under Threat

18 September 2024, The News Himachal, Rahul Bhandari

The popular tourist destination of McLeodganj is facing a severe environmental crisis, as large-scale land subsidence continues to affect the area, threatening vital infrastructure, including the Dalai Lama's monastery and the Indian Army cantonment in nearby regions. The sinking land and roads, along with the emergence of deep cracks, have raised alarm among local authorities and residents.

The subsidence has been reported in several areas, including McLeodganj, Farsetganj, Jogibara Road, Tihra Line, Kalapul, and other surrounding regions.

Roads are sinking at multiple points, and the main road connecting Dharamshala to McLeodganj has subsided by 1.5 to 2 feet in several sections, making it unsafe for heavy vehicles. As a result, the movement of Volvo buses on this route has been banned. The damage has been further compounded by fallen poles and widening cracks on the roads.

Religious and Military Areas at Risk

One of the most significant concerns is the threat posed to the Dalai Lama's monastery, which draws both tourists and religious followers from around the world. The headquarters of the Tibetan spiritual leader and the Tibetan government-in-exile are also located in McLeodganj, making the situation even more critical. Additionally, the subsidence is impacting the Farsetganj and Tihra Line cantonment areas, where Indian Army soldiers and officers reside, further escalating the seriousness of the issue. The area is also home to a Kendriya Vidyalaya, adding to the concerns over the safety of residents and students.

Geological Survey Report Awaited

Deputy Commissioner of Kangra, Hemraj Bairwa, has confirmed that a detailed survey report has been requested from the Geological Survey of India (GSI) to assess the full extent of the damage and determine potential solutions. "We have instructed the Municipal Corporation and the TCP to strictly monitor all construction activities in the region to ensure compliance with building regulations. This will help in mitigating further damage caused by unplanned construction," said Bairwa.

While the GSI has already conducted preliminary surveys in the area, the final report is still pending. The delay in receiving the survey findings has prompted calls for immediate action to prevent further deterioration, as McLeodganj falls under seismic zones 4 and 5, making it highly vulnerable to earthquakes and related natural disasters.

Unregulated Construction Raises Concerns

Despite its seismic sensitivity, McLeodganj has witnessed unregulated construction activities in recent years, contributing to the land subsidence problem. The presence of around 400 hotels, restaurants, shopping malls, and other commercial establishments in areas like Dharamkot, Naddi, Satowri, Farsetganj, and Jogibara Road adds to the risk. The town attracts lakhs of tourists each year, further straining the infrastructure.

Local officials are worried that if timely action is not taken, McLeodganj could face a disaster similar to Joshimath in Uttarakhand, where unchecked construction and environmental degradation led to massive land subsidence and displacement of residents.

Need for Immediate Action

With its religious, military, and tourism significance, McLeodganj's future hangs in the balance as the administration awaits the GSI report. The focus now is on curbing further illegal construction and ensuring that the town's infrastructure can withstand the ongoing crisis. The rising cracks, sinking roads, and fragile conditions have made it clear that McLeodganj is in urgent need of comprehensive intervention to prevent a larger catastrophe.

"Buddhist Diplomacy" and China's Support of Russian Aggression Against Ukraine

19 September 2024, Bitter Winter

The Russian delegation visits Master Yanjue and China Buddhist Association in Beijing, September 14. From Weibo.

Last week, a delegation from the Russian Traditional Buddhist Sangha visited the government-controlled China Buddhist Association at Guangji Temple in Beijing and traveled to other temples and monasteries in preparation of their participation in the World Buddhist Forum in Ningbo in October.

While the Forum will be another opportunity for Chinese "soft diplomacy" through Buddhism, the visit of the Russian Traditional Buddhist Sangha, led by its First Vice President Abbot Ochilov, who met with China Buddhist Association's President Master Yanjue and other leaders of Chinese state-controlled Buddhism, was an opportunity to advertise the Buryat Buddhist apology for the Russian war of aggression against Ukraine.

Master Yanjue expressed his support for the Buddhist establishment of Buryatia, from where Abbot Ochilov came, and emphasized Chinese (government-controlled) Buddhists' role in strengthening the cooperation between Moscow and Beijing.

The Russian Traditional Buddhist Sangha is the heir of institutions that existed in Czarist and Soviet times and allowed the government to control Buddhists in Buryatia. During the Stalin era, the Sangha was one of two Buddhist organizations allowed to exist in the Soviet Union, together with one also catering to ethnic Buryats in the Aginsky Buryat National District in Zabaykalsky Krai. Buddhist organizations in Kalmykia and Tuva were liquidated, and only in 1988 under Mikhail Gorbachev an Association of Buddhists of Kalmykia was again authorized.

The Sangha remains largely controlled by Buryats and is led by the XXIV Pandito Khambo Lama, Damba Ayusheev. The Khambo Lama's role became strategically important with the war in Ukraine, as Buddhist Buryats are over-represented in the Russian Army there. The Khambo Lama has repeatedly supported Putin's war and blessed the Buryats fighting in Ukraine.

The Khambo Lama with Putin. Credits. As opposed to this, Telo Tulku Rinpoche (Erdne Ombadykow), the Supreme Lama of Kalmykia, condemned the war in Ukraine and went into exile, with the government replacing him with a pro-war Supreme Lama.

The Khambo Lama and the Russian Traditional Buddhist Sangha have also been active since the war in Ukraine started in intensifying the exchanges with the larger China Buddhist Association, hoping to make inroads through their Chinese friends into international Buddhist organizations and present there their apology for Putin's war against Ukraine.

What lies ahead for a complete normalisation of India-China ties?

18 September 2024, Modern Diplomacy, Bejoy Sebastian

This long-form article looks at how India-China relations have reached this critical juncture, the multiple dimensions underlying it, and how a restoration of ties can be worked out.

A section of Indian media has been unwarrantedly citing a statement by a spokesperson of the Chinese Foreign Ministry, Mao Ning, during a media briefing on 13 September 2024, who said, "in recent years, front-line armies of the two countries have realised disengagement in four areas in the Western sector of the China-India border, including the Galwan Valley. The China-India border situation is generally stable and under control". This statement is being used to create a sense of 'breakthrough' in ties, while the reality is, this is a mere reiteration of facts already known and the last disengagement along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in Ladakh happened only two years ago, in September 2022, at Patrolling Point (PP) 15 in the Gogra-Hot Springs area.

Sometimes, obscured reality and half-truths are far more vicious than a complete cover-up of facts. The military situation along the LAC remains unchanged for the last two years, and thousands of troops are still on both sides of the undemarcated line. The military-to-military talks are in a stalemate since February 2024 when the last Corps Commander-level meeting took place. India seeks complete disengagement in the remaining two areas as a prerequisite for normalising ties. Before disengagement at Hot Springs, three other points – at PP-14 (Galwan Valley), PP-17A (Gogra Post), and both banks of the Pangong lake – had witnessed disengagement since July 2020.

There have been minor skirmishes along the LAC since June 2020, amid border infrastructure development and a heavy build-up of troops on both sides, like the one that occurred in the Yangtse area of Tawang in the Eastern sector in October 2021 and December 2022. Satellite imagery shows that China has been building habitable structures on India-claimed territories in recent years, while giving Chinese names to Indian villages in Arunachal Pradesh. The armies of both countries have engaged in sporadic standoffs even before the Galwan incident, such as in Nathu La and Cho La in 1967, Tulung La in 1975, Sumdorong Chu in 1987, Depsang in 2013, Demchok in 2014 and Doklam in 2017. But the most fatal of all incidents since 1975 occurred in the Galwan Valley, which resulted in the death of 20 Indian soldiers and an unknown number of Chinese soldiers.

Recent bilateral engagements

There have been both positive and negative developments in the diplomatic and economic fronts lately. Earlier this month, on 12 September 2024, the Special Representatives for the India-China border talks mechanism, Ajit Doval and Wang Yi met in St. Petersburg, Russia, on the sidelines of a meeting of National Security Advisors of the BRICS (Brazil-Russia-India-China-South Africa) grouping. In July 2020, the month following that of the Galwan incident, a conversation between the two veteran negotiators led to the first breakthrough at the LAC in the current standoff – the disengagement of troops from the clash site of Galwan Valley.

Fast forward four years to July 2024. The foreign ministers of India and China – Dr. S. Jaishankar and Wang Yi – met twice, first in Astana, Kazakhstan, on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) summit and later in Vientiane, Laos, on the sidelines of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) meeting. In February last year, senior diplomatic officials from India travelled to Beijing for the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) talks in their first face-to-face WMCC meeting since the current LAC standoff began in 2020. It was the 26th such dialogue since this mechanism came into existence in 2012.

During all these aforementioned interactions, both sides committed themselves to resolve the remaining issues, while normalisation is yet to be achieved. India wants to return to a status quo ante as of April 2020 and also the resolution of legacy disputes at Depsang and Demchok, while China conveniently views the dispute or differences in perception of the LAC as a 'leftover problem' from the British rule. The Indian side has repeatedly made it clear that there can be no back to normal without resolving the border question. China's current Ambassador to India, Xu Feihong, took charge in May 2024, after an 18-month delay in appointment, the longest for the post since 1976, when bilateral ties were restored following the 1962 war. The senior Chinese diplomat has been on a charm offensive since then, meeting key figures in Delhi's power circles.

Meanwhile, the legacy disputes at Depsang and Demchok, which China considers as not part of the current standoff, are yet to be resolved. Of the six friction points along the LAC in Ladakh, troops were withdrawn from the June 2020 clash site of the Galwan Valley in the weeks following the incident, the north and south banks of Pangong Lake in February 2021, Patrolling Point-17A of the Gogra-Hot Springs area in August 2021 and Patrolling Point-15 in September 2022. There are sixty-five such patrolling points along the LAC in Ladakh, of which India reportedly has lost access to twenty-six points to China and differences in perception of the line persists at multiple areas.

Underlying geopolitical games

India has been increasingly confident to play the Tibet and Taiwan cards lately and has stopped reiterating the 'One China' principle for many years now. In June, this year, New Delhi allowed the former U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and a bipartisan Congressional delegation accompanying her to meet the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, the 14th Dalai Lama, in Dharamshala, and later they met the Prime Minister himself in New Delhi. Earlier in the same month, PM Modi responded to a congratulatory post on X from Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te on his election victory stating that he looks forward to closer ties between India and Taiwan, to "work towards mutually beneficial economic and technological partnership".

Chinese Foreign Ministry had protested both these moves. President Xi Jinping, however, did not congratulate PM Modi on his re-election. Beijing's suspicious engagement in New Delhi's neighbourhood in South Asia and the Indian Ocean region, its disapproval of India's bid for permanent membership at the UN Security Council (the remaining four UNSC permanent members support New Delhi), the resistance to India's entry to the elite Nuclear Suppliers' Group (NSG), and the vetoing of UN sanctions on Pakistan-based terrorists further adds to the strategic mistrust and insecurity between the two Himalayan neighbours.

However, Indian restrictions on visas for Chinese professionals in selected industries were relaxed in November, last year, and again in July this year after several businesses in India were hit with a shortage of skilled workers. Subsequently, PM Modi toned down his rhetoric on China. In an interview given to Newsweek magazine, published in April 2024, the Prime Minister described relations with China as "important and significant" and expressed hope that stability along the LAC could be restored. In the same month, the Indian Defence Minister Rajnath Singh opined that border talks were "progressive and satisfactory" and "no fresh tension has come up".

During an interaction at the Geneva Centre for Security Policy in Switzerland earlier this month, India's foreign minister Dr. S. Jaishankar stated that "roughly 75% of the disengagement problems are sorted out". However, the Chinese media's open dislike for the veteran diplomat was clearly evident from a recent controversial article published in the state-run Global Times that was pulled back hours later. The op-ed piece, titled 'India's diplomacy has a 'S. Jaishankar problem'', took aim at Dr. Jaishankar's remarks on 31 August at a media forum in New Delhi where he said the world has a "general China problem" and India was not the only country debating how to deal with Beijing.

In spite of such self-goals, Dr. Jaishankar and his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi met twice in July this year – first on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) Heads of State summit in Kazakhstan and then at an ASEAN meeting in Vientiane. Moreover, India has also doubled down on its military partnerships and joint exercises with countries in Southeast Asia. PM Modi's visit to Singapore and Brunei earlier this month is a testament to India's renewed focus on its "Act East" policy. Despite being partners in non-Western groupings such as the BRICS and the SCO, India chose to participate in the U.S.-led minilateral groupings, such as the Quad and the Indo-Pacific Partnership for Maritime Domain Awareness (IPMDA). The raison d'être of such flexible groupings can be explained by both 'balance of power' and 'balance of threat' theorisations in international relations.

'Paradoxical' economic ties

In July 2024, a mothership called at India's first deep-water container transshipment port at the under-construction Vizhinjam port for the first time, ushering in a new era in India's maritime history. Interestingly, the ship embarked on its journey from China's Xiamen port, and twenty-four hi-tech cranes from China were delivered to the port since October last year. The state-owned Chinese company ZPMC, or the Shanghai Zhenhua Heavy Industries Ltd., has provided more than two hundred such cranes for Indian ports, and port operators in India continue to install them.

Today, New Delhi's biggest challenge is to balance its age-old security imperatives with that of its rapidly expanding industrial base, for which it can't stop doing business with China, and most of the alternatives to Chinese goods and Chinese technology appear to be comparatively costly. This 'paradoxical' phenomenon is not unique to the two countries alone, as countries elsewhere in the world too engage in trade with adversaries for several reasons. Chinese technology is key to India's infrastructure development as well.

India's imports from China increased to $102 billion recently, which is 56% more than what was four years ago, out of a total $118 billion in bilateral trade. Thus, India's trade deficit with China has risen by around 75% during this period. Recent data from the Global Trade Research Initiative reveals that Chinese imports to India crossed $100 billion in the financial year 2024, cementing China's status as India's largest trading partner, displacing the U.S. after a gap of two years. So, the overall nature of bilateral ties between India and China, considering this economic dimension, is adversarial and co-operative at the same time, and their economies are interlinked like never before.

However, the public sentiment in India towards China has largely turned negative owing to the border issue. Consequently, India's economic, trade and investment policies are increasingly subjected to 'securitisation', as evident from its move to block 320 Chinese apps, including TikTok and WeChat, the suspension of direct flights, restrictions on Chinese investment and diversification of supply chains away from China through its participation in Western-led groupings such as the Quad, Indo-Pacific Economic Framework (IPEF), Supply Chain Resilience Initiative (SCRI) and India-Middle East-Europe Economic Corridor (IMEC). Today, China's defence budget is almost three times as India's, but the latter is fast catching up with rapid defence indigenisation and attempts to diversify arms supplies away from Russia. Past standoffs and negotiations

It was quite an irony that in April 2020 – year of the Galwan incident – India and China marked the 70th anniversary of establishment of formal diplomatic relations, and in June 2024, China observed an event marking the 70th anniversary of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, a foreign policy concept first put forward in the Sino-Indian agreement of 1954, following which India officially recognised Tibet as part of the People's Republic of China. However, the Panchsheel, as it was referred to by New Delhi, remained as a cornerstone of Indian foreign policy under Jawaharlal Nehru, until its essence and purpose were lost in the ashes of the 1962 war.

Bilateral ties remained in a state of coma for almost one-and-a-half decade after the war. Subsequently, diplomatic ties were restored in 1976. However, China has condemned India's merger of Sikkim state in 1975 and the bestowment of full statehood to Arunachal Pradesh in 1987. Back in 1979, then Indian foreign minister, and later Prime Minister, Atal Bihari Vajpayee made a landmark visit to China, and two years later, in 1981, then Chinese foreign minister Huang Hua reciprocated the move by visiting India, paving way for both countries to begin an annual dialogue.

Seven years later, in 1988, then Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi visited China and both countries agreed to set up a joint working group (JWG) on boundary disputes. Three years later, in 1991, Chinese Premier Li Peng visited India, followed by Prime Minister Narasimha Rao's visit to China in 1993. The remaining part of the decade saw India and China signing two key agreements, in 1993 and 1996, thereby initiating steps to bring back peace and tranquillity along the border areas, in addition to an agreement to pull back troops from the Eastern sector in 1995.

The following year, 1996, witnessed the landmark visit of China's Paramount Leader Jiang Zemin to India. Both nations agreed to reduce troops on the disputed border and avoid the use of force. The decade that followed also saw a series of confidence-building measures, including the 2005 Protocol and the 2012-initiated working mechanism for consultation and coordination on India-China border affairs that replaced the old JWG process between the foreign ministries. But it fell short of preventing the Depsang standoff in March 2013.

Later, in October 2013, a Border Defence Cooperation Agreement (BDCA) was signed between the defence officials of both countries, unlike civilian officials in the previous pacts. Since then, the new Paramount Leader who rose to power in China that year – Xi Jinping – upped the ante on border disputes with not only India, but also with other countries in China's neighbourhood, including several ASEAN member-states. Experts are now of the view that China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) has a much larger say in shaping the Chinese foreign policy than ever before, with President Xi Jinping heading the Chinese Communist Party and the Central Military Commission.

Way ahead for rapprochement

It is worthwhile to recall that in the previous century, leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union continued to have dialogues even during the peak time of the Cold War. In the case of India and China, between 2014, when Modi first became the Prime Minister of India, and June 2020, when the Galwan incident occurred, the Indian leader met his Chinese counterpart Xi Jinping eighteen times, including in informal summits, visits to each other's countries and meetings on the sidelines of multilateral summits. Despite this, the Galwan incident couldn't be prevented, and the prospect of a repeat of similar incidents or far more fatal ones still looks imminent.

After Galwan, both leaders met twice – first in Bali, on the sidelines of the G20 summit of 2022 and then in Johannesburg on the sidelines of the BRICS summit of 2023. The Chinese leader chose not to attend the G20 summit of 2023 in New Delhi and sent Premier Li Qiang instead, the first time a Chinese Paramount Leader not attending the G20 summit since 2008, excluding the virtual summits of 2020 and 2021 during the pandemic. In July 2024, PM Modi skipped the SCO summit in Astana, Kazakhstan, while President Xi attended it. Now, there are two possibilities later this year for PM Modi and President Xi to meet face to face – the first in Kazan, Russia, for the BRICS Summit in October and the second in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, for the G20 summit in November.

China's $17.9 trillion economy is the second largest in the world, only behind the United States, while India's $3.7 trillion economy is ranked the fifth. While the latter continues to be a lower middle-income country, the former has already progressed into an upper middle-income country in the last 40 years, powered by its fast modernisation and the upliftment of nearly 800 million people from absolute poverty. Both countries started off as independent countries in the 1940s and faced similar socioeconomic problems until four decades ago. Today, there is a tremendous scope for both countries to cooperate with each other, including in trade, climate change, energy security, Global South issues, and regional connectivity. But all of it depends squarely on how diplomacy progresses forward.

The circumstances are quite different today than it was four decades ago, considering the serious power gap between the two Asian neighbours, which India must fill in the coming years. More importantly, New Delhi must not be oblivious of the fact that China today is an economic and technological superpower in competition with the world's pre-eminent superpower – the United States – and is fast catching-up on the military front as well. Dealing with such a power calls for meticulously crafted state policies – both foreign and domestic. India has been building up border infrastructure and deterrence capabilities at a pace faster than ever before. Continuing dialogue at the highest political levels makes it complete.

The two nuclear-armed neighbours must manage their competition responsibly and minimise the prospect of an unintended or accidental conflict to the best extent possible. There is also a strong need for standalone meetings to discuss and resolve the border question and not just along the sidelines of when regional or multilateral groupings meet. Without political dialogue going hand in hand with military dialogue, a new mechanism for peaceful coexistence and normalisation of ties can never be reached. Rather than working on old and ineffective frameworks of engagement, both sides must give a fresh start to building a broad consensus and a comprehensive framework for bilateral engagement, and it ought to be in tune with the current realities, respecting each other's concerns and sensitivities.

China's Legal Warfare Closes a Beloved Tibetan School

18 September 2024, The Diplomat

Despite taking part in a momentous rite of passage, tears streaked the faces of the 110 students who graduated from Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling School, located on the Tibetan Plateau in Golog prefecture, Qinghai province, this July. For months, authorities had prodded any and all excuses to find violations, pursuing various legal avenues to shutter the school. Until this summer, they were unsuccessful.

Eventually, despite legal battles that ended in the school's acquittal, regional administration ordered the school's closure. In a speech before his students, Gen Jigme Gyaltsen indicated the school was closing because it was not in compliance with the Qinghai Provincial Party Committee's vague standards of vocational schools. Additional details were not disclosed. The 110 students that graduated in July will be the last the institution ever accredits.

The internationally acclaimed Tibetan school was first founded in 1994 inside the Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture. Since then, its rich curriculum in Tibetan cultural and linguistic studies has drawn youth from across Tibet, Mongolia, and Inner Mongolia. The school's emphasis on the preservation of specialized Tibetan language studies, medicine, and Buddhist philosophy has garnered both private and public extraterritorial support, such as from Finland and the Netherlands. The school's rigorous curriculum was supplemented with computer science, engineering, medicine, filmmaking, and physical education.

During his testimony at the Tibet Policy Institute's July roundtable on the closure, Shede Dawa of Tibet Watch, a research network based in the United Kingdom, gestured to a projected image of Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, tucked into shaded mountain foothills and rich with pine saplings. He noted the lengths these trees had grown since his years as a student there, where he was encouraged by his instructors to celebrate the arduous process of reconnecting with his own heritage in a region some scholars refer to as an "open air prison."

The room of roundtable participants felt the reverberations this upbringing has had in the careful sincerity of Dawa, a steady advocate for peers facing systematic academic repression. He gazed out over the scholars in front of him, locking eyes with the camera lens before insisting, in the words of the school's founder, that the preservation of the Tibetan language and script is a crucial means for the survival of the Tibetan people. People survive through stories, which are in turn cradled by linguistic exchange.

Dr. Lobsang Yangtso, program and Environment Desk coordinator for the International Tibet Network, expressed her admiration for the courage of alumni like Shede Dawa, who might now face retaliation for speaking up against the school's closure. "There are many others like him," she said.

In recent years, human rights monitoring networks have observed the gradual swapping out of Tibetan textbooks for those in the Chinese language. A cultural assimilation policy, which was formulated in 2010, deems that all schools in Tibet must legally use Chinese as the primary language, beginning at the kindergarten level.

Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibet Policy Institute and longtime policymaker with the Tibetan government-in-exile, contextualized the school community's ordeals: "Presently, the Chinese government is closing monasteries and Tibetan schools... These measures are part of a broader strategy to eradicate the Tibetan language and culture."

First line of defence: The role of border villages as custodians of India's frontiers

17 September 2024, Broadsword, Ajai Shukla

Echoing Prime Minister Narendra Modi's stated commitment to holistic development of villages located close to the Sino-Indian border, Defence Minister Rajnath Singh has described these villages as not just remote habitations but also the country's first line of defence.

Addressing a Border Area Development Conclave in New Delhi on September 11, Singh said the best way of dealing with the multiple challenges posed by India's geo-strategic location was to ensure border area development.

In underlining the role of border villages as custodians of India's frontiers, New Delhi is following the example of China in Tibet, where President Xi Jinping has personally directed a new border village policy since 2017.

China in Tibet

China's new border village policy, which is aimed at setting up Tibetan villages in disputed border areas, was announced with great fanfare at the 19th Congress of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in 2017. In May 2021, noted Tibetologist Robert Barnett described the working of Xi Jinping's resettlement policy in an article in Foreign Policy magazine.

Barnett's article details the experience of four Tibetan nomads from the remote Beyul Khenpajong region, which remains disputed between Bhutan and China. Until 1995, like other yak graziers living along the border, the four spent their summer grazing their herds in the Beyul, before returning to their village in Tibet ahead of the winter snows.

In 1995, however, the local CCP officials told them Beyul was Chinese territory and it was their duty to guard it for China by physically remaining there through winter. For the decades that followed, the four graziers spent the bitter winters alone in the Beyul, in harsh and primitive conditions, with no contact with the outside world.

Once the Chinese completed a road to their tiny settlement, over the Himalayan crest line, a larger village was rapidly built up. In April 2020, the Communist Party Secretary of Tibet, Wu Yingjie, trekked all the way to the new grazer village, now named "Gyalphug", to hail the graziers as heroes of China.

Each summer, CCP officials organise the herders to carry out small tasks to reassert China's claims. Barnett writes: "These included driving yak herds over land grazed by Bhutanese herders in the Beyul, demanding tax payments from the Bhutanese herders, planting Chinese flags on peaks and painting the word 'China' on rocks throughout the area."

An estimated 250,000 Tibetans have been resettled thus along the border. In effect, this has transformed local Tibetan histories of border grazing and monastic claims into state-level territorial claims by China.

In July 2021, Xi Jinping visited Tibet for three days, with his focus squarely on the Tibetan town of Nyingtri (Nyingchi in Chinese). Beijing regards Arunachal Pradesh as a southward extension of Nyingtri Prefecture.

Development work

India's defence minister, speaking at the Border Area Development Conclave, pointed to the development work carried out in India's border areas during the last decade. He cited the construction of 8,500 kms of roads, 400 permanent bridges, and three major tunnels: Atal Tunnel, Sela Tunnel, and Shikun-La Tunnel, with the third currently the world's highest road tunnel.

The defence minister also cited the connection of border areas in Ladakh with the National Electricity Grid, and the provision of high-speed internet to over 1,500 villages, mainly in Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh, through the Bharat-Net broadband project. Singh said the government's special emphasis on border area tourism was catalysing the development of the region. "Tourism has immense potential in border areas, but it could not reach the desired heights due to lack of infrastructure. Things have changed since this government came to power... From 2020 to 2023, the footfall of tourists in Ladakh, Sikkim and Arunachal Pradesh increased by 30 per cent... We are taking consistent steps to make J&K a tourist hotspot," he said.

Economic development of the border areas, he said, was triggering "reverse migration", such as in Huri village in Arunachal Pradesh, where villagers who had migrated to the hinterland were returning to their original homes.

Speaking at the same conclave, army chief General Upendra Dwivedi described border area development as "a core component of national security."

New flashpoint

Like New Delhi, Beijing supports its graziers with incentives, including financial ones, to equip them for spending long periods in high-altitude pastures along the McMahon Line border. Unlike New Delhi, however, Beijing has not shrunk from using armed force in the form of border guards and frontline soldiers to intimidate and bully Indian graziers.

Indian military commanders believe Beijing covets Beyul Khenpajong as a bargaining chip to offer Bhutan in exchange for Doklam, a disputed pocket of land at the tri-junction of Bhutan, China and India.

India regards Doklam as militarily vital, being located less than 100 kilometres from the strategic Siliguri corridor, a narrow, 25-kilometre-wide strip of land that connects India's seven north-eastern states to the Indo-Gangetic heartland. Bhutan has always been careful of India's concerns vis-à-vis Doklam.

"China doesn't need the land it is settling in Bhutan: Its aim is to force the Bhutanese government to cede territory that China wants elsewhere in Bhutan to give Beijing a military advantage in its struggle with New Delhi," wrote Barnett, in Foreign Policy.

Since 1990, Beijing has been offering to give up its claim to 495 square kilometres in the north of Bhutan, provided Thimphu yields 269 square kilometres in the west. The territory in north Bhutan that China is offering to give up includes the Beyul Khenpajong.

The creation of border infrastructure is the new flashpoint between China and India. Among the causes cited for intrusions by the People's Liberation Army (PLA) into Eastern Ladakh in the summer of 2020, the construction of the 255 kilometre-long Darbuk-Shyok-Daulat Beg Oldi (DSDBO) road by India's Border Roads Organisation is possibly the most convincing. Following clashes between the PLA and Indian troops in the Galwan River Valley in June 2020, China's foreign ministry identified the creation of the DSDBO road as a trigger for the clash.

Clearly, New Delhi will have to walk a fine line between developing India's border infrastructure on the one hand and assuaging Beijing's border sensibilities on the other.

For Tibetans, There Is Now a "Xi Jinping Thought on Reincarnation"

16 September 2024, Bitter Winter, Lopsang Gurung

Beijing insists it will not abandon its claim that, although officially atheistic, the Communist Party is entitled to control reincarnation of Tibetan Living Buddhas.

There is a "Xi Jinping Thought" for everything, including toilets. And Tibetans know that, while being atheistic, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in 2007, through the State Administration of Religious Affairs, issued a regulation claiming its right to control reincarnation.

According to the infamous "Order no. 5" of 2007, the CCP decides which Buddhist lamas are authorized to reincarnate, and they receive a card confirming the authorization. The next incarnation of a deceased lama is identified by the CCP, which has created a historical myth about the so-called "Golden Urn" to justify its theory that reincarnation of Tibetan Buddhist lamas should be controlled by Chinese state authorities. Obviously, since 2007, the CCP is preparing to assert the right to pick up the next Dalai Lama when His Holiness will leave this world.

There were rumors that the farcical system where an officially atheistic state and party, which obviously do not believe in reincarnation, decide who is the reincarnation of whom, would be abandoned at least to avoid international ridicule. The rumors, however, were denied by the CCP in 2023, as "Bitter Winter" reported.

What was missing was to freeze the doctrine of CCP control of reincarnation by making it part of the omnipresent and unquestionable Xi Jinping Thought. Logically, but more quietly than usual, this step was taken this month.

A seminar on “History, Customs, Policies, and Regulations of the Reincarnation of Living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism” was held in Lanzhou, Gansu Province, by the government-controlled China Buddhist Association..

Master Chang Zang, Vice President of the China Buddhist Association, delivered the keynote speech. CCP-approved reincarnated Tibetan Living Buddhas also spoke.

The seminar explained that Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism for the New Era also includes a “Xi Jinping Thought on Reincarnation.” It teaches, Chang Zang said, the “basic principles on religious work and the CCP’s strategy for governing Tibet in the new era, and guide monks, nuns and believers to have a more objective understanding of the historical customs, religious rituals and policies and regulations of the living Buddha reincarnation system. They should fully recognize that historical customs such as domestic searches, drawing lots from the Golden Urn and government approval are important principles that must be adhered to in the reincarnation of living Buddhas. This will play a positive role in managing the affairs of the reincarnation of living Buddhas in accordance with the law, promoting the healthy inheritance of Tibetan Buddhism, and actively guiding Tibetan Buddhism to adapt to socialist society.”

With the high stamp of Xi Jinping, the CCP’s control of reincarnation will be asserted even more vigorously. All eyes continue to be on who and how will select the next Dalai Lama.

Remember Tibet?

15 September 2024, The Wire, Nithin Coca

China’s digital surveillance and censorship efforts have reached their full potential in Tibet.

There are no photos of Tibet’s top tourist attraction from the afternoon of February 25, 2022. Typically, the Potala Palace, the 1,000-room, traditional winter residence of the Dalai Lama that was built in the 1600s, is teeming with tourists – the UNESCO World Heritage Site is the majestic backdrop of countless photos on Chinese social media networks like Weibo and WeChat . Every year, some 37 million tourists visit Lhasa, Tibet’s capital, where the palace is built into the side of a mountain, and the vast majority of visitors come from China, which has governed the Tibet Autonomous Region since 1950. But despite its popularity, not a single image of the front of the palace exists from the afternoon of February 25, 2022. On that day, Tsewang Norbu, a 25-year-old male Tibetan singer and frequent guest on Chinese music shows, went up to the Barpokaling stupa, at the corner of the palace grounds, shouted “Free Tibet,” and set himself on fire.

At least, that is what experts think happened. The event has disappeared from Tibet’s digital history as well as China’s. According to The Economist, the Chinese government acknowledged an incident took place, but denied it was Norbu, saying instead that it was a man who had long struggled with mental illness and “attempted suicide many times.”

It took Tibetan journalists and researchers in India more than a week to verify what happened that day after piecing together bits of information from sources inside Tibet, Chinese social and state media, and by monitoring what was being censored or removed. Radio Free Asia broke the news on March 4, 2022.

“Tsewang Norbu was a really popular Tibetan singer. He did this in front of the most famous monument in Tibet, where there were likely tons of tourists and Tibetans around,” says Tsela Zoksang , a Tibetan American with the non-profit Students for a Free Tibet. “The sheer speed that the authorities, with their various tools, were able to scrub the internet of every mention of Norbu is astonishing and frightening.”

China is famous for its digital censorship and control, but experts say the situation in Tibet is on another level. Consider what happened just a few months later, when another lone protester took action in Beijing. In October, Peng Lifa unfurled banners from the Sitong bridge calling for “freedom,” an end to Covid lockdowns and the removal of Xi Jinping. His protest went viral, both on Chinese social media and internationally. Although Peng is still in detention , his name and cause is well known. Perhaps more importantly, his actions had impact: The bridge signs are considered a precursor to the white paper protests that forced the Chinese Communist Party to dramatically change its Covid policies in December.

The contrast between Norbu and Peng illuminates a dark and underappreciated truth: that China’s digital surveillance and censorship efforts have reached their full potential in Tibet. Indeed, several experts say the autonomous region has emerged as a kind of success story, with the policies there serving as a model for other areas that Beijing wants control over, such as the Uyghur regions in Xinjiang.

Tenzin Norgay , a research analyst at the non-profit International Campaign for Tibet, says officials in Tibet and Xinjiang routinely share best practices and lessons learned with one another. In June of 2023, for instance, a delegation from Xinjiang attended a symposium in Tibet on “long-term peace and stability.” Wang Junzheng, party secretary of Tibet, reportedly stressed collaboration between the regions in “promoting social stability and rule by law.”

“At the moment, the party-state thinks that Tibet is under control, so now Xinjiang officials want to learn from authorities in Tibet about how to manage and suppress society without attracting global attention,” Norgay says.

Xinjiang has been the focus of intense media attention in recent years. Reports about internment camps and the destruction of Uyghur cultural heritage have become global issues and even U.S. policy priorities. Meanwhile, the situation in Tibet — once a hot topic of Hollywood celebrities and politicians — has faded from view.

Tibetans inside Tibet are, nowadays, so scared to talk to us. There is a sense that the government is always watching them and monitoring them, and for us, that means we can’t get first-hand information from Tibet. Self-censorship has become a huge problem.

Tenzin Dawa, an India-based Tibetan refugee and executive secretary at the Tibet Center for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD)

To appreciate the shift, experts point to the 2008 Summer Olympics in Beijing, when images of monks, nuns and students protesting Chinese rule spread around the world. Those sympathetic to Tibet’s cause held “solidarity” protests at Olympic torch rallies in San Francisco, London, and Paris, as well as several Chinese embassies and consulates. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Navi Pillay, even released a statement saying she was disturbed by “continuing allegations of violence against Tibetans” and called on China to “permit Tibetans to express their feelings without fear of retribution.”

Similarly, in 2011 and 2012, activists in Tibet began a wave of self-immolations to protest what has become a multi-year lockdown of the entire region. One dramatic video shows the self-immolation of a 35-year-old Tibetan nun named Palden Choetso. In the background, you can see Tibetans offering prayers to the Dalai Lama and a woman hanging a Tibetan scarf, a symbol of respect, on Choetso’s neck.

“It’s one of the most powerful videos from Tibet,” says Lobsang Gyato Sither, a Tibetan living in exile in India who works with the non-profit Tibet Action Institute. “It’s hard to see, but images like that really hit and stick with people.”

Indeed, that video took just one day to spread around the world. In its aftermath, members of Congress pushed for a fact-finding mission to Tibet, and the European parliament passed a resolution calling on China to respect human rights and have a dialogue with the Dalai Lama.

In recent years, however, acts like Norbu’s don’t escape the censors. There haven’t been any visible, large-scale demonstrations for Tibetan independence — either inside the country or abroad — which is, experts note, exactly what Beijing wants.

“Images, videos and personal voices are so important for human rights stories,” says Yaqui Wang, a research director at the Washington-based Freedom House. “But given the government’s sophisticated censorship and surveillance apparatus, we don’t have the images, and that limits the ability of their plight to attract global attention.”

“Fifteen years ago, there was so much more information coming out of Tibet,” adds Gabriel Lafitte, an Australia-based author and expert on Tibet. “But, even more than Xinjiang, China has succeeded in closing down Tibet.”

THE PLAYBOOK

By many measures, Tsewang Norbu was the model member of an ethnic minority in B China. His parents worked for organizations affiliated with the Communist Party and sang in state-approved musical groups, he had over half a million followers on Weibo, and his songs — in Tibetan, Mandarin and English — could be found on Chinese and global video streaming platforms.

But ever since Tibet was occupied by the People’s Liberation Army in 1950, and especially since the Dalai Lama fled to India in 1959, Tibet has seen regular periodic protests and calls for greater autonomy or independence from Chinese rule. There were signs that Norbu may have had sympathies himself, as he avoided singing songs that overly propagandized China, and his uncle is a political prisoner.

According to Namloyak Dhungser, and author of a book on self-immolations, Norbu’s act could have a long-term impact on the Free Tibet movement because it “stands out as a significant case among the new generation of Tibetans, particularly those raised under the ‘red flag.’”

It’s exceedingly difficult to know if this generational shift is happening or even why Norbu chose to do what he did. The Tibet Autonomous Region has been closed off entirely to independent media since protests against Chinese rule broke out in 2008. While journalists can travel around the rest of China, including Xinjiang, they can only visit Tibet on state-approved trips.

The lack of reporters, however, is only the first hurdle to corroborating information about Tibet. Repression in places like Tibet and in Xinjiang is multifaceted, experts say, creating a climate of intense fear and self-censorship among sources.

There is, of course, digital censorship and high-tech surveillance, including biometric data. Dense networks of cameras and numerous police stations keep a watchful eye, and at checkpoints, Tibetans and Uyghurs are often forced to hand over their phones and install Chinese government apps that have been identified as spyware. Over the past several years, Tibetans have been arrested and punished for merely having certain data, like a picture of the Dalai Lama or an unauthorized app like WhatsApp, on their phones. And to make matters worse, entire families can be punished for the actions of an individual.

Tenzin Dawa, an India-based Tibetan refugee and executive secretary at the Tibet Center for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), says the pervasive sense of fear limits the work she and others can do.

"Tibetans inside Tibet are, nowadays, so scared to talk to us," she says. "There is a sense that the government is always watching them and monitoring them, and for us, that means we can't get first-hand information from Tibet. Self-censorship has become a huge problem."

Han Chinese certainly face repercussions for exercising their right to free speech," adds Wang, at Freedom House. "But regular Tibetans and Uyghurs have been given lengthy sentences for just speaking with foreign media. It's just not of the same order of magnitude."

What we need is the context of what led a person [like Norbu] to take action... Many times we get fragments of information, and we can't fully confirm it, so we just keep that information, then sometimes, months or years afterwards, we have another fragment of information coming through.

Tenzin Choeyki, a senior researcher at Tibet Watch Liza Lin, a journalist with the Wall Street Journal, notes that reporting on the rest of China has its challenges but also its workarounds. After being based in Shanghai for 8 years, she was forced to leave China when her visa renewal was refused. Now based in Singapore, she says she notices a difference in Chinese sources when they travel to the island-nation for business trips. "They're a bit more willing to talk here than when they are in China," she says.

Tibet, however, is missing this release valve. For many years, Tibetans crossing into Nepal and India were a key source of information for people like Kate Saunders, a longtime Tibet activist and co-founder of Turquoise Roof, a Tibet-focused, collaborative research network.

"In the 2000s and up to around 2009, there were thousands of new arrivals from Tibet," she says, noting that many were coming to attend teachings of the Dalai Lama or were refugees seeking to make a new life abroad. "Talking to nomads, children, the elderly — it was the bread and butter for Tibetan organizations and media to gain an understanding of what life was like in Tibet."

Now, however, Tibetans are increasingly unable to get passports to travel abroad, and an enhanced border control system has closed the pathways through the Himalayas that used to connect Tibet refugees with exile communities in South Asia. In 2023, only 15 Tibetan refugees arrived in India and Nepal, compared to 3,000 in 2010.

"We did not expect that China would seek to close the entire gateway to India and Nepal," says Saunders.

Without human sources, says Maya Wang, associate director in the Asia division at Human Rights Watch, getting reliable information is exceedingly difficult. "If it was a video game, China is already, like, level 156 — really, really hard," she says. "But Tibet and Xinjiang are double that."

ONLY OSINT

Like many second and third generation Tibetans-in-exile, Tenzing Dhamdul grew up in India with few links to his family across the border. But the 28-year-old is part of a new generation of Tibetans who are using Open Source Intelligence, or OSINT, to uncover information about human rights or policies in Tibet.

"OSINT is a way to try to understand what Tibetans inside Tibet are experiencing and feeling," says Dhamdul, who works as a research associate at the New Delhi-based Foundation for Non-violent Alternatives. "It is gradually becoming more prominent among the Tibetan community."

Working with two other Tibetan refugees, Dhamdul's first project analyzed Chinese documents, online maps and social media to identify how the government had changed the names of villages in parts of India claimed as "South Tibet" by China. While not a particularly complex task, the project provided insight into Beijing's attempts to strengthen its claim over disputed Indian territory and led to a flurry of reactions from the Indian government.

For Dhamdul, the OSINT process is especially valuable since its strategies can be easily replicated elsewhere. "We can work together with people who are like us Tibetans — oppressed by the current communist regime of the PRC — be it the Uyghurs, the Taiwanese or Hong Kongers," he says.

Indeed, a recent RAND Europe report on detention centers in Tibet followed in the footsteps of a Xinjiang report. Using light data, RAND estimated the size and scale of the detention centers as well as how they've evolved over time. The analysis uncovered patterns of growth in night-time lighting, suggesting a shift towards longer detentions and imprisonments.

"Our organization had previously analyzed the evolution of detention centers in Xinjiang using geospatial data and night-time lighting measurements, so we decided to see if this method would also make sense in the Tibetan context, and it did," a RAND Europe researcher said by email. (The researcher asked to remain anonymous due to the report's sensitivity.)

Turquoise Roof, Saunders's initiative, also uses OSINT research. So far, they've released reports on lithium mining, hydropower dam development, and spyware, all without interviewing or relying on anyone in Tibet. For example, for lithium, they used satellite data to locate mines and processing centers and analyze how they'd expanded over time. They then scoured Chinese government files, business documents, scientific research and trade data to estimate the scale of production, identify the Chinese companies involved and the links to major automakers like Tesla and BYD.

"We decided we have to work to lessen dependence on dangerous means of talking to Tibetans inside Tibet," says Saunders.

This approach has its limitations, however. In some of OSINT's most successful use cases, groups like Bellingcat and the HALO Trust have combined open source data with data gathered by anonymous sources on the ground, often sent via secure communication platforms like Signal. In Russia, for example, this approach allowed for the tracking of illegal ghost ships exporting grain from occupied Ukraine. It's a tactic that isn't possible in Tibet or Xinjiang.

This erasure underscores the links between political and technological dictatorships. When these forces converge, the consequences for human society are dire.

Namloyak Dhungser, a Tibetan researcher at Curtin University in Australia

"It's difficult to triangulate information," says Saunders. "Everybody thinks you can learn everything through technological means, but that's one of the findings of Turquoise Roof. We still need Tibetans inside Tibet, with deep knowledge on the ground."

Moreover, while these OSINT reports do get media coverage, it hardly compares to the human interest stories, images and videos that used to come out of Tibet.

OSINT "has to be combined with a human being," notes Tenzin Choeyki, a senior researcher at Tibet Watch. "What we need is the context of what led a person [like Norbu] to take action — that can't be filled in by OSINT."

Norbu's youth, celebrity status and choice of location made his act stand out among the 160 known self-immolations in Tibet. It may have also played a role in his story coming to light in just a week. But Choeyki says it's a reminder of how little we still know about what is happening in Tibet.

"Many times we get fragments of information, and we can't fully confirm it, so we just keep that information, then sometimes, months or years afterwards, we have another fragment of information coming through," says Choeyki.

In September of 2015, for instance, another young Tibetan man, Shurmo, self-immolated in a remote village. It took an astounding five years before Tibet Watch could verify and share what happened, and even then, there's a lot that remains unknown about Shurmo, including what happened to his body and his family. There are no photos of Shurmo or of his act.

"It's deeply unsettling that, in our digital age, these events can be swiftly erased from public memory, leaving no trace of their sacrifice in images or videos," says Dhungser, at Curtin University.

It also brings up other questions: Are there others like Shurmo or Norbu? Just how far behind are we in terms of understanding what is happening in Tibet? When, if ever, will the CCP feel its job is done?

"This erasure underscores the links between political and technological dictatorships," says Dhungser. "When these forces converge, the consequences for human society are dire."

Western stories about Xinjiang nothing more than mythical dramas

14 September 2024, Global Times, Yasir Habib Khan

Before setting foot in China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, most of the members of the media delegation from Pakistan were under the influence of Western deceptive narratives that ethnic minorities are subject to injustices.

Frankly speaking, the delegation and I, as president of a think tank "Institute of International Relations and Media Research," entered China as skeptics. However, as we started visiting places, interacting with people and talking to the local minorities, it became clear that Western stories were nothing more than mythical and fictional dramas that had nothing to do with reality.

Seeing is believing. Hence, myths pertaining to discrimination against ethnic minorities in China were proven to be complete fabrications. Media delegates witnessed the rise and development of Xinjiang.

Delegates visited minority groups living in the modern village of Chabuchar county in Yining, Xinjiang. Seeing the living standards, bustling life, school education, civic amenities, surrounding ambience, well-furnished homes and livelihood, all their questions and doubts were answered.

"It is high time the international community pay a visit to Xinjiang. This will help distinguish fact from fiction," Asghar Ali, one delegate, said. Meanwhile, head of modern village (Uzonbrak resettlement) Ms Yang

Yang welcomed the delegation, and was very informative, telling them all about the village and the lives of the villagers.

Delegates learned that impoverished local minorities living in mountains with their animal herds were resettled here under the China poverty alleviation program by providing them with plenty of resources to improve their quality of life.

I witnessed how the local government made it possible for them to set up new businesses to improve their income. Each shop in the village makes between 10,000 yuan ($1,405) to 15,000 yuan. Besides ancestral occupation of animal husbandry, minority youth have been securing jobs in nearby factories in economic zones. Some have also joined the agriculture profession, carrying on the family line of business.

China's ethnic policy is rooted in the country's unique history and culture, and has four features: equality, autonomy, development and unity.

The lawful rights and interests of the people of all ethnicities in Xinjiang have been effectively protected. All ethnic groups, regardless of their population size, have equal legal status and enjoy freedom of religious belief and various rights in accordance with the law. These rights include participation in state affairs, access to education, use of their own languages and preservation of their traditional culture. Additionally, the Xinjiang government has made great efforts to improve the prosperity of Uyghur Muslims. Remarkable achievements have been made in eliminating extreme poverty.

China has been a unified multi-ethnic country as a result of multiple rounds of great ethnic integration in history. This has contributed enormously to the uninterrupted development of the Chinese civilization spanning thousands of years. Together, ethnic groups in China have long become a community with common interests and a shared future.

China's increasing influence in the UN: The role of Africa and Asia

13 September 2024, IANS

In August 2022, following the release of a report by then-UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Michelle Bachelet, which asserted that China's treatment of Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang "may constitute... crimes against humanity," many countries in the Global South, particularly in Africa and Asia, reacted in a perplexing manner.

Rather than maintaining a neutral stance on the reported atrocities, Pakistan spearheaded a coalition of 70 nations opposing the UN Human Rights Council's perceived 'interference' in China's domestic affairs about a month after the report's publication. Notably, this coalition included fourteen Arab nations, such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco.

In October of the same year, a UNHRC vote to discuss the report was unsuccessful, as several Muslim-majority countries, including Pakistan, Indonesia, Qatar, the UAE, and Somalia, voted against it.

These nations were joined by nearly all but three African countries in the Council.

In contrast, when former Gambian Justice Minister Abubacarr Tambadou presented a case to the international rights body in 2019 against Aung San Suu Kyi for her treatment of Rohingya Muslims in Myanmar, he received strong backing from the Organisation of Islamic Co-operation (OIC), which comprises 57 Muslim countries, including 27 from Africa.

China's deliberate strategy to revise the global order is rooted in its advocacy of a strict interpretation of Westphalian sovereignty, which prioritises non-interference in domestic affairs over universal human rights.

This principle, adopted at the June 2018 Central Foreign Affairs Work Conference, has been a driving force in China's foreign policy. To achieve its goal of reforming international institutions and norms, Beijing has focused its efforts on the Global South, particularly Africa and Asia, which together constitute 55 per cent of the votes in the United Nations General Assembly.

China's tactic has been to construct an alternative force of numbers rather than relying on the individual influence of a single country. This trend has resulted in a large number of Global South countries backing China and echoing its stance on sovereignty, even if it means disregarding universal human rights.

In recent years, China has steadily increased its financial and personnel contributions to global and multilateral development institutions. A report from 2020 indicated that China ranks second, behind the United States, in assessed contributions to both the UN's regular and peacekeeping budgets.

Additionally, China has strategically focused on leveraging the representational power of the Global South within the UN.

It positions itself as the leader of the developing world, ready to challenge the West's frameworks regarding human rights, the Responsibility to Protect (R2P), and imposed liberalism. By emphasising principles such as non-interference, development, South-South cooperation, and the use of multilateral institutions, China claims to advocate for the interests of the Global South.

However, the emerging solidarity between Beijing and various African and Asian nations is not solely based on ideological alignment.

Beijing's dependence on African nations in international forums dates back to the 1971 UN General Assembly debate concerning the People's Republic of China's (PRC) admission to the UN and the expulsion of Taiwan, a development significantly influenced by African votes.

For over three decades, China's foreign minister has prioritised visits to Africa at the start of each year, underscoring its gratitude and deep interest in the continent.

Currently, only one African nation, Eswatini, recognises Taiwan, while the remainder adhere to the 'one China principle'. Furthermore, bilateral and collective agreements between African countries and China emphasise mutual cooperation in global governance matters.

With the backing of the African Union, China successfully passed its first resolution in the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC), titled "The Contribution of Development to the Enjoyment of Human Rights".

Three years later, another resolution proposed by China was adopted, supported by all but one African member.

These resolutions reflect China's attempt to legitimise an alternative vision of human rights, centred on state-led economic development and the principle of non-interference.

In fact, several African nations even supported China's unsuccessful attempts to defund human rights monitors and NGO observers during the 2018-19 UN budget discussions. Unsurprisingly, in recent years, very few African countries have endorsed draft resolutions at the UN that criticise China's policies regarding Xinjiang, Hong Kong, and Tibet.

One significant factor contributing to the solidarity among authoritarian regimes is their collaboration on human rights issues, which serves to bolster their political stability and international legitimacy.

In West Asia, the challenges related to women, political dissidents, and religious and ethnic minorities present complex dilemmas that these governments often address through the principle of non-interference. Consequently, they endorse Beijing's narrative regarding Xinjiang, framing it as a matter of terrorism, extremism, and separatism.

This was exemplified in 2023 when the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation (OIC) visited Xinjiang and publicly commended the activities of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in the region.

Moreover, economic considerations also drive this emerging 'South-South cooperation'.

For many West Asian countries, following decades of Western intervention, China is viewed as a more dependable partner, having recently become the primary foreign investor in the region.

Chinese economic and strategic influence has surged, particularly after the Arab Spring and the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), and is expected to grow further following the US withdrawal from the region.

For Africa, the situation is somewhat more complex. Under President Xi Jinping's vision of the 'Great Rejuvenation' and the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), the continent has become a central focus of China's economic and infrastructural efforts.

As the largest bilateral trade partner and creditor for Africa, China's extensive 'no-strings-attached' lending practices towards vulnerable African nations have resulted in many becoming economically entrapped or reliant on Beijing.

Consequently, Beijing's economic initiatives towards these nations and its promotion of South-South development cooperation represent a strategic effort to establish itself as a hegemonic power within the evolving global order. This dual strategy of fostering economic dependence among susceptible countries while simultaneously empowering authoritarian regimes has proven advantageous for China as it gradually ascends the ranks of global influence.

In memoriam: Chungdak Koren, former Representative of the Dalai Lama and ICT Board member

13 September 2024, ICT

The former representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Geneva, Chungdak Koren, passed away on September 10th, 2024 in a hospital in Oslo, Norway. The International Campaign for Tibet was deeply saddened by the news and conveyed its condolences to her husband Michael.

Chungdak Koren was born in Phari, southern Tibet, in 1950. After escaping to India, she studied at different schools before getting engaged in the Transit School in Dharamsala. In 1969 she was selected for a nursing education in Norway that was to become her new home. She devoted her energies both to the Tibetan refugees in Norway and to lobbying work, e.g. through the Norwegian Tibet Committee. She was deeply involved in organizing the festivities around the Nobel Peace Prize Award to H.H. the Dalai Lama in 1989.

In the years 1995-2001 she served as Representative of H.H. the Dalai Lama in Geneva. After retiring from public service, her immense energy went into advocating the Tibetan cause on many levels. She was instrumental in establishing the radio station Voice of Tibet, she served as Executive Director of the Norwegian Tibet Committee and starting in 2001 was a board member of the International Campaign for Tibet Europe. In 2011 she was elected as member of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile.

Following a severe stroke, she had to concentrate on regaining her health. She did this with the same admirable zeal and determination as she showed in all tasks she took on. She made remarkable progress and was able to continue her work for her people.

The International Campaign for Tibet is deeply grateful to Chungdak Koren for her contributions to ICT's mission and for her energetic commitment to the cause of her people.

"Chungdak la was truly fearless, and unstoppable, and her singular dedication to Tibet and His Holiness the Dalai Lama will remain always an inspiration to me," said ICT President Tencho Gyatso.

Tsering Jampa, former ICT Europe Executive Director, with whom she worked as the Board member, said, "I am deeply saddened by the passing of my former dear colleague and friend, Chungdak Koren la whose unwavering commitment and dedication to advocating for the rights of Tibetans were truly inspiring. Working closely with Chungdak la advocating on the human rights situation in Tibet at the United Nations Human Rights Commission was a privilege, and Chungdak la's passion and hard work will always be remembered. Her passing away is a great loss, not just for those who knew Chungdak la, but for our cause she championed so tirelessly. My thoughts and prayers are with her and family during this difficult time. Chungdak la will be greatly missed."

Musical "Patriotic Education" in Hong Kong

12 September 2024, Bitter Winter, Gladys Kwok

If regular CCP propaganda does not work with Hongkongers, the Party believes that perhaps karaoke would for adults—and cartoons for children.

"Patriotic Education" is the name of the most massive campaign of domestic propaganda in the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) recent history. Hong Kong is regarded as being particularly in need of this medicine, which is at the same time reluctant to take. A "Working Group on Patriotic Education" has been established, with pro-CCP legislator Lee Wa-king (Starry) as its leader. The Working Group has both "official members" and "non-official members." However, the "non-official members" are officially listed in its official web page as well.

One of the "non-official members" is veteran singer Kwong Mei-wan (Cally), another well-known CCP loyalist.

It seems that the CCP believes in music as a tool of "Patriotic Education" in Hong Kong. With great fanfare, a song by Cally Kwong has been launched both in a regular and a karaoke version. The song, called "Our Home," was introduced at a press conference of the Working Group on Patriotic Education on September 3, to coincide with the the 79th anniversary of the Victory Day of the Chinese People's War of Resistance Against Japanese Aggression. The lyrics hail the unity of all Chinese around the Beijing government and its leaders.

Last month, the Working Group on Patriotic Education inaugurated a new thematic gallery at the Hong Kong Museum of History, presenting the necessity and alleged benefits of the repressive National Security Law.

The National Security Gallery also teaches children through cartoons to become "young guardians of National Security." For example, a video shows a beetle who violates the National Security rules and ventures away from the Butterfly Garden (China), ending up in a hostile land (the West, or a mental locus where Western ideas prevail). There, the beetle is about to be eaten by a huge spider (Western imperialism). Happily, armed with the National Security Law, the young Guardians of National Security from the Butterfly Garden come and save it. The beetle cries profusely and promises that it will always respect National Security Law in the future. A good lesson for young Hongkongers...

Fallen From the Front Page: Plight of Tibetans

10 September 2024, Wilson Center, Ambassador mark A. Green

If things continue at their current pace, Chinese authorities will have forcibly uprooted and relocated approximately 500 Tibetan villages (including more than 550,000 individuals) by the end of 2025.

The United Nations Refugee Agency has estimated that by the end of this year, there could be as many as 130 million people displaced across the world. That includes a third of Ukrainians who have been forcibly displaced from their homes since Vladimir Putin's full-scale invasion in early 2022, more than a fourth of Sudanese who have been forcibly displaced since war broke out again earlier this year, and over a fourth of Venezuelans who have been forced from their homes since 2015. And then there are the ongoing displacement crises in places like Syria and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

In other words, there are numerous forced displacement crises going on right now around the world. That inevitably means that some simply aren't getting the attention—or support—they deserve.

Many Americans have heard about China's systematic oppression of Uyghur Muslims from the northwest Xinjiang province. Between 2017 and 2019, somewhere between 800,000 to 2 million Uyghurs and other Muslims were arbitrarily detained in "reeducation" camps. Uyghurs in the region were also subjected to forced labor, sterilization, and surveillance (all considered to be crimes against humanity), and even genocide, according to the US, UN, and others in the international community. Although China closed many of these camps in 2019, hundreds of suspected camps remain in use. Others have been repurposed into formal prisons that continue to disproportionately detain Uyghurs.

While Western news services still carry the occasional story about the plight of the Uyghurs, another Beijing-led campaign against an ethnic minority group persists without much attention: the Chinese government's decades-old effort to destroy the independence and distinctiveness of Tibetans.

China has long held that Tibet is legally (and practically) an integral part of the People's Republic of China and, therefore, under the control of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), despite active Tibetan resistance. While China's constitution recognizes citizens' "freedom of religious belief," the CCP continues to heavily restrict religious practice, forcing the Dalai Lama—the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhists, who compose over 90% of Tibet's population—into exile since China's military occupation of Tibet in 1959.

What is less well known to many Westerners is Beijing's practice of "whole-village relocations" and its broader efforts to "Sinicize" Tibetans and their religion by uprooting and replacing local culture. The CCP has advanced efforts to dilute the Tibetan ethnic majority with an influx of state-sponsored Han Chinese migrants and forcibly placing Tibetan children into Chinese schools. According to a recent report by Human Rights Watch (HRW), Beijing began the process of forcibly relocating 930,000 rural Tibetans in 2020, while pressuring another 3.36 million to change their way of life. Just as Beijing has framed its detention of Uyghurs as voluntary participation in "vocational education and training centers," the CCP has argued that the relocation of Tibetans is both economically beneficial and undertaken willingly by Tibetans. However, the HRW report documented systematic efforts to intimidate individuals into relocation through coercive home visits by CCP authorities and threats to cut off services. In fact, HRW said it was unable to find a single example of an individual Tibetan being permitted to voluntarily stay put.

According to HRW analysis of previous Tibetan relocation programs, once people have left their home villages, Chinese law essentially guarantees that they won't be able to return. And upon their move, Chinese authorities demolish the relocated Tibetans' original homes.

The relocation of Tibetan families is part of a larger effort by the CCP to fully assert regional control. Given the extensive cultural influence which the Dalai Lama holds over this population and his advanced age, Beijing is preparing to select its own Chinese successor once he passes—against Tibetan Buddhist custom and the current Dalai Lama's wishes. The United States has made its support for the aspirations of the Tibetan people clear. For example, the Resolve Tibet Act explicitly recognizes and reaffirms the distinctness of Tibet's culture and history and insists that the next Dalai Lama is to be chosen solely by the Tibetan people.

Given the many crises that seem to be raging these days, it's hardly surprising that that of the Tibetans, which is shielded from public view by an authoritarian regime, has fallen off the front pages. That doesn't make it or others that fade from view any less important, or tragic. Just ask those who once lived peacefully in the villages of Tibet.

Bipartisan support for Tibet as US election draws near

10 September 2024, ICT

With the primaries concluded and Kamala Harris and Donald Trump confirmed as presidential candidates, the stage is set for the 2024 election. In addition to the White House, control of the House and Senate will be decided. For Tibet supporters, one question looms large: What will this election bring for Tibet?

The People's Republic of China's occupation of Tibet has long struck a chord with the American public. Beijing's repressive tactics have led to the hyper-securitization of the Tibetan plateau, recurring and egregious violations of the economic, social, and cultural rights of the Tibetan people and institutionalized an extremely oppressive environment to stifle their dissent, increase interference with Tibetan Buddhism, and inflict systematic and widespread use of arbitrary detention and torture.

Meanwhile, fourteen years have passed since the last of the contacts between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government, which aimed to resolve the Tibet conflict. Beijing's plan seems to be to eschew dialogue while cementing its control.

American interest

The situation in Tibet is contrary to the fundamental values of human rights and democracy espoused by the United States. More than 60 years after the PRC's invasion and occupation of Tibet, its rule remains completely illegitimate in the eyes of the Tibetan people, whose political, ethnic, social, cultural and religious identity is historically distinct from the Chinese.

Meanwhile, Tibetan resistance to Beijing's decades-long campaign to erode the Tibetan people's civilization remains overwhelmingly nonviolent. This is largely due to the leadership provided by the Dalai Lama. This peaceful approach is one of the key elements in the widespread public support that the Tibetan people enjoy among the American public.

The Dalai Lama speaks at a Congressional Human Rights Caucus event on September 21, 1987, where he presented his Five Point Peace Plan

Tibet also lies within the parameters of US security interests; more than human rights are at stake. Tibet occupies a geostrategic location, representing an Asian fault zone of clashing interests and big power politics. Russia, China and British India vied with each other in the past for control of Tibet. To this day tensions rise between China and India due to the PRC's occupation of Tibet. This holds implications for the Indo-Pacific region as well as potential global consequences. A stable Tibet would contribute greatly to peace in this sensitive region.

The importance of Tibet in US-China relations argues for a vigorous approach from the new Administration. In a change from the days when the United States had no coherent formalized policy toward Tibet and the Dalai Lama, today there is an institutionalized position that provides for both programmatic and policy support. American presidential administrations are mandated to implement American law which supports the Tibetan people.

Today, multiple reinforcing laws should define the next administration's approach to the Tibet conflict. In accordance with the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 (Public Law 107-228; 22 U.S.C. 6901) the United States of America must continue efforts to preserve and promote the "unique religious, linguistic, and cultural heritage" of the Tibetan people, ask China "to respect fully their human rights and civil liberties," and encourage a peaceful resolution to the Tibetan dispute.

Additionally, these laws reflect the US position on Tibet and the Dalai Lama: the Congressional Gold Medal to H.H. the Dalai Lama 2007 (PL 109-287; 31 U.S.C. 5111), the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act of 2018 (PL 115-330), the Tibetan Policy & Support Act of 2020 (PL 116-260), and the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act of 2024 (PL 118-70).

Specifically, the following aspects of the Tibetan conflict (or situation) require the new administration's policy formulation and implementation:

US Policy: Supporting unconditional dialogue to resolve Tibet dispute

Since 1979, when His Holiness the Dalai Lama first visited the United States, there has been a consistent move towards overt American support for the Tibetan people. Many of the initiatives in recent decades have been led by Congress. Reflecting the broad support for Tibet among the American public, Congress continues to display a consistent bipartisan support when it came to Tibet-related matters.

As reiterated in the most recent Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, which became law on July 12, 2024, the "long-standing policy of the United States (is) to encourage meaningful and direct dialogue between representatives of the People's Republic of China and the Dalai Lama, his or her representatives, or democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community, without preconditions, to seek a settlement that resolves differences."

The United States actively supported the Tibetan-Chinese dialogue process, including the nine rounds of talks held between 2002 and 2010. Since then, the Chinese authorities have not resumed the process. Every year, the administration must report to Congress on the state of the Tibetan-Chinese negotiations. In the past, these annual reports highlighted the problems in Tibet and rightly outlined that "the lack of resolution of these problems leads to greater tensions inside China and will be a stumbling block to fuller political and economic engagement with the United States and other nations."

On Aug. 21, 2024, Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights and Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues Uzra Zeya during her meeting with the Dalai Lama in New York City, "reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct historical, linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage."

The United States must encourage China to create conditions for a sustainable settlement, which is essential to the long-term stability of the region. Lodi Gyari, who led the Dalai Lama's delegation in the talks with China between 2002 and 2010 wrote in 2014, "... American Presidents, Cabinet members and Members of Congress have continuously encouraged the Chinese government to engage in a dialogue with His Holiness the Dalai Lama's representatives. President Bill Clinton and President George W. Bush gave the Tibet issue high priority, and I worked very closely with their senior aides. Their involvement was of immense value and helped sustain our dialogue with the Chinese government."

Clarity in US policy assertions on Tibet

The most recently codified law, the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, now provides clarity on how the administration should define United States policies on different aspects of Tibet, particularly on the dialogue process and history. The bill, popularly called Resolve Tibet Act, asserts that "the dispute between Tibet and the People's Republic of China must be resolved in accordance with international law, including the United Nations Charter, by peaceful means, through dialogue without preconditions."

It also calls on China to "cease its propagation of disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama."

Recent administrations have maintained that they consider Tibet to be a part of the People's Republic of China. However, this does not accord with history and the State Department has never been able to provide a sound historical basis for the assertion. It has also sparked opposition from Congress, which has included a prohibition against funds appropriated to the State Department to be used to produce any map or document that depicts Tibet as a part of China.

The Resolve Tibet Act clarifies that at no time has the US recognized Tibet to be part of China "since ancient times," a key component to the PRC's stated claim over Tibet.

Policy on reincarnation of the Dalai Lama

The Dalai Lama will be 90 years old in July 2025 when a new President takes office. He remains in good health. However, his level of active involvement in the Tibet issue will be reduced as he ages.

The strong bond between the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan people is deeply grounded in centuries of history and has not been broken despite China's propaganda machine. The Dalai Lama continues to enjoy enormous respect and loyalty inside Tibet. Internationally, he remains one of the most respected religious leaders on the world stage.

Beijing's continued disregard for religious freedom and its systematic effort to claim authority over Tibetan Buddhist traditions, including the reincarnation system, particularly that of the Dalai Lama, is a matter of paramount significance to followers, many of whom are American citizens. The Dalai Lama's succession is essential to the Tibetan people, represents a key test for the respect of religious freedom worldwide and is therefore vital to US national interests.

The Tibetan Policy & Support Act of 2020 provides clear direction for the new Administration on Tibetan religious freedom, particularly on the issue of the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama:

(1) decisions regarding the selection, education, and veneration of Tibetan Buddhist religious leaders are exclusively spiritual matters that should be made by the appropriate religious authorities within the Tibetan Buddhist tradition and in the context of the will of practitioners of Tibetan Buddhism;

(2) the wishes of the 14th Dalai Lama, including any written instructions, should play a key role in the selection, education, and veneration of a future 15th Dalai Lama; and

(3) interference by the Government of the People's Republic of China or any other government in the process of recognizing a successor or reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama and any future Dalai Lamas would represent a clear abuse of the right to religious freedom of Tibetan Buddhists and the Tibetan people.

(c) Holding Chinese Officials Responsible for Religious Freedom Abuses Targeting Tibetan Buddhists.—It is the policy of the United States to take all appropriate measures to hold accountable senior officials of the Government of the People's Republic of China or the Chinese Communist Party who directly interfere with the identification and installation of the future 15th Dalai Lama of Tibetan Buddhism, successor to the 14th Dalai Lama, including by—

(1) imposing sanctions pursuant to the Global Magnitsky Human Rights Accountability Act (22 U.S.C. 2656 note); and

(2) prohibiting admission to the United States under section 212(a)(2)(G) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1182(a)(2)(G)).

Implement the principle of reciprocity on Tibet

The Chinese government promotes Tibet as being open to the world. This flies in the face of reality. Tibet remains closed to outsiders. The Chinese government's current strategy is to encourage Chinese tourists to visit Tibet and allow only a select few international visitors, quite a few of which are social media content creators. These people are used to drive the Chinese narrative on Tibet.

In contrast, multiple requests for visits of American diplomatic personnel and intergovernmental organizations have been refused. Scholars are routinely denied visas because of their writing, and international journalists thrown out of the PRC because they were critical of its policies in Tibet. These delegations are an integral part of China's sophisticated strategic disinformation operations, designed to manipulate and influence perceptions of target audiences in Western countries on Tibet and the Dalai Lama.

The Tibetan overseas community is frequently subjected to harassment, monitoring, and cyberattacks carried out by the Chinese government. It is incumbent upon the United States government and the international community to insist upon the principle of reciprocity in its dealings with the PRC, to address the asymmetry of authoritarian influence in Tibet. The concept of reciprocity is increasingly being cited by governments as an instrument for countering China's one-way influence operations and in order to seek compliance with international standards and long-term mutual obligations.

The United States and some European governments have referred to reciprocity as a key principle in terms of their bilateral relations with the PRC. Acknowledging that reciprocity is an important tenet of international relations, members of Congress introduced and passed bipartisan legislation, the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act, to promote freedom of movement and an open and accessible Tibet for American citizens and for Tibetans themselves, including the Dalai Lama.

Tibetan water and international security

Tibet, which is coterminous with the Tibetan plateau, is the third largest repository of fresh water after the South and North Pole. Eight of the major rivers that serve 1.8 billion people across Asia originate in Tibet. The PRC's plan to construct dozens of hydroelectric dams and other infrastructure over the next decades presents a direct threat to many downstream countries and is a cause of increasing regional volatility.

Underlying the importance of water on the Tibetan plateau, the TPSA mandates the Administration "to encourage a regional framework on water security through mechanisms such as the Lower Mekong Initiative, to facilitate cooperative agreements among all riparian nations that would promote transparency, sharing of information, pollution regulation, and arrangements on impounding and diversion of waters that originate on the Tibetan Plateau."

Highlighting the importance of the strategic location of Tibet to the global environmental conditions, TPSA further says that the Administration should "monitor the environment on the Tibetan Plateau, including glacial retreat, temperature rise, and carbon levels, in order to promote a greater understanding of the effects on permafrost, river flows, grasslands and desertification, and the monsoon cycle".

Where do the candidates and parties stand on Tibet?

On foreign policy, the Russian invasion of Ukraine and the Israeli assault on Gaza have been dominant in the campaign so far. China has remained peripheral, mainly coming into focus in regard to trade issues and its policies toward Taiwan.

During every presidential election cycle, both the Democratic and the Republican parties release their platforms. These are considered as reflecting their respective policy priorities and positions on domestic and foreign affairs. Even though these documents are considered non-binding to the presidential candidates, the fact that efforts are made to form platform committees, amend wording, and formally adopt them, do indicate that they carry weight.

This year's platforms by both parties do not contain any specific reference to Tibet, in contrast to some previous platforms. The Democratic Party Platform, which was adopted by the Platform Committee before Kamala Harris became the nominee, states that China is "America's most consequential strategic competitor." The Republican platform says "countering China" will be one of the ways the party will "return peace."

Both the platforms focus on trade relations with China. The Republican platform says, "Republicans will revoke China's Most Favored Nation status." The Democratic platform says, "we seek to "de-risk" and diversify the economic relationship between our countries, not decouple. We will protect a targeted number of sensitive technologies with focused restrictions, creating a "small yard and a high fence" that preserves our national security."

In their acceptance speeches at their respective party conventions, Trump and Harris made only tangential reference to China. In the case of Harris she refers to China while talking about AI and space saying, "I will make sure that we lead the world into the future on space and artificial intelligence; that America, not China, wins the competition for the 21st century; and that we strengthen, not abdicate, our global leadership."

Trump's reference to China is on trade saying, "I will bring auto jobs back to our country, through the proper use of taxes, tariffs, and incentives, and will not allow massive auto manufacturing plants to be built in Mexico, China, or other countries..." Neither of the candidates talk about freedom and human rights in Tibet and China.

The new administration is congressionally mandated to articulate a China policy that frames the lack of a solution on Tibet as an impediment to more harmonious relations between the United States and the People's Republic of China.

The State Department has responsibility to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward a negotiated settlement of the Tibetan issue. It should appoint a Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues at the earliest and work with like-minded countries, including the EU, in undertaking coordinated initiatives to help alleviate the plight of the Tibetan people and to find a lasting solution to the issue. In the U.S.-EU Summit Joint Statement in October, 2023, the two committed to “keep voicing our concerns” about Tibet.

Sinification of Buddhism: China’s manipulative quest for control

09 September 2024, The Border Lens, Bidhayak Das

China’s efforts to claim Buddhism’s origins clash with millions of Buddhists’ enduring connection to India. As China pushes forward with its efforts to establish a Chinese variant of Buddhism, it attempts to stake a claim on the very origins of the religion. However, for millions of Buddhists across the world, the history of Buddhism’s birth in India remains untouchable. “India will always be the centre of Buddhism for us—the place where the Buddha attained enlightenment,” says Tswewang Dorzi, a Tibetan Buddhist scholar from Dharamshala. Dorzi’s conviction underscores the deep spiritual and historical connection that Buddhists have with India, where the roots of their faith lie.

But does this mean that China’s attempts to Sinify Buddhism are doomed to fail? “Perhaps,” says Dorzi, though he acknowledges that the Chinese campaign to reshape the religion’s narrative is relentless. He highlights how India’s legacy in the growth of Buddhism, particularly through figures like Padmasambhava, or Guru Rinpoche, is inseparable from the religion itself. Known in Tibetan as Slob-dpon (Teacher) or Padma ‘Byung-gnas (Lotus Born), Padmasambhava’s influence stretches across the high Himalayas. His teachings have deeply resonated with communities in the region known as Monyul, which extends from the Tibetan plateau into India. These communities, largely followers of Tibetan Buddhism, have preserved the spiritual traditions connected to the great guru.

Dorzi points out that the Eastern Himalayas, spanning regions under the jurisdiction of Nepal, India, Bhutan, and China (Tibet), are home to a rich diversity of communities, each with their own religious practices, including Tibetan Buddhism. Scholars have long explored how Padmasambhava spread Vajrayana, or Tantric Buddhism, across these regions, cementing India’s connection to this spiritual path. Professor Jigme Yeshe Lama of the Kolkata University, for instance, writes about how Padmasambhava, an Indian tantric adept born in the Swat Valley—modern-day Pakistan—brought Vajrayana Buddhism to Tibet and founded the Nyingmapa school. “This history is unchangeable,” Dorzi affirms, calling out the Chinese government for its hypocrisy in attempting to stake a claim on Padmasambhava’s legacy.

China’s efforts to control the narrative of Buddhism, particularly Tibetan Buddhism, have included acts of destruction aimed at erasing the tangible symbols of this heritage. According to reports in Free Tibet in January 2022, Chinese authorities in Drago County demolished a 45-foot bronze statue of Padmasambhava, which stood outside Chanang Monastery in Nyimo Township. The report further adds that this act followed an earlier incident where a 99-foot Buddha statue in Sengdeng Village was similarly destroyed under the watch of paramilitary troops.

These acts of aggression are not isolated. As per reports coming out of Tibet in 2007, statues of Padmasambhava were targeted in Ngari Darchen, Burang County, and Kardze County, among other areas within Tibet. These demolitions, orchestrated by the People’s Liberation Army (PLA) under the command of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), reflect a broader strategy to erase the teachings and influence of Padmasambhava, whose spiritual legacy challenges China’s narrative.

Despite these aggressive efforts, scholars like Dorzi and others insist that China’s actions cannot erase the rich history of Buddhism’s spread from India. Yet, China’s ambitions to become the global centre for Buddhism, through initiatives like Buddhist diplomacy, are seen as a potential disruptor. Dorzi notes that China has made significant inroads in countries such as Sri Lanka and throughout Southeast Asia, where they have formed alliances with Buddhist groups that are economically dependent on Beijing. “These relationships could shift the balance in China’s favour,” he warns.

The World Buddhist Forum: A political tool disguised as religious dialogue

One of China’s most prominent platforms for this strategy is the World Buddhist Forum (WBF), which is set to convene its sixth session in Ningbo this October. Although ostensibly a platform for spiritual exchange, the WBF is increasingly viewed as a vehicle for China’s political agenda. A Tibetan youth describes it as “an instrument of state control,” pointing out how the forum, under the guise of promoting world peace, is being used to advance the Sinification of Buddhism. Launched in 2006, the WBF has grown into the largest multilateral platform for Buddhist dialogue, yet its noble goals of peace and well-being are overshadowed by China’s deeper political motives.

The Chinese government’s narrative posits that Buddhism, particularly Tibetan Buddhism, is fundamentally Chinese. This attempt to rewrite history erases the contributions of other cultures, particularly India, which remains central to the origins of the religion. At a 2021 National Conference on religious affairs, Chinese President Xi Jinping emphasised the necessity for religions in China to embrace a distinctly Chinese character. This initiative is part of China's broader agenda to mould Buddhism in line with the CCP's political goals. Buddhism's reputation as a doctrine of peace and non-violence makes it an appealing instrument for China's diplomatic influence, particularly as it seeks to counter perceptions of secularism within the CCP. China efforts at Sinification of Tibetan Buddhism which has gone beyond its borders has been excellently portrayed by a report in the Morung Express which highlights how Beijing has also been promoting sacred Buddhist sites and figures such as Avalokitesvara, Amitabha, and Manjushri to attract pilgrims and tourists. The report further adds that this effort includes replicating Buddhist holy sites in India, such as the Brahma Palace in Wuxi, which is designed to resemble Rajgir. Moreover, China has been backing the Shugden faction of the Gelug School, providing financial support such as in Bangladesh through initiatives like the annual Dipankar Atisha Peace Award. These actions are not limited to China's borders; Nepal, Pakistan, and Bangladesh are all key targets of China's Buddhist diplomacy.

In Pakistan, China has focused on promoting the Gandhara trail, which connects Buddhist sites in Pakistan to South Korea and Japan. According to reports China is actively positioning Pakistan as a key destination for Buddhist pilgrimage and a historical centre for international Buddhists.

The Sinification of Tibetan Buddhism: A threat to religious freedom

China's manipulation of Buddhism is not merely an attempt to claim historical legitimacy; it is central to the CCP's broader policy of Sinification. This policy seeks to reshape all aspects of religious life in China to align with the ideologies of the CCP. Tibetan Buddhism, with its deep cultural ties to Tibet, poses a direct challenge to this agenda. The CCP views Tibetan Buddhism's influence as a threat to its control over the region and, by extension, to its authority. Consequently, efforts to co-opt and Sinify Tibetan Buddhism have intensified in recent years.

In March 2024, during China's Two Sessions, Wang Huning, head of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), reaffirmed the importance Beijing's attaches to promoting the Sinification of Tibetan Buddhism. This campaign, which has been ongoing since Xi Jinping's announcement in 2012, is about stripping the religion of its unique characteristics and repurposing it as a tool of state control. The Buddhist Association of China (BAC), once a non-political organization, has now become a key instrument of this agenda, explicitly supporting the CCP's directives to align religious practices with socialist principles and Xi Jinping Thought.

As the international Buddhist community gathers in Ningbo for the upcoming World Buddhist Forum, it is crucial to confront the reality of China's attempts to rewrite Buddhism's history. What should be a forum for spiritual growth and dialogue has become a tool for state propaganda. Failing to recognise this could result in the further erosion of religious freedom and the distortion of one of the world's oldest and most profound religions.

China's ambitions to reshape Buddhism for its own political gains may seem insidious, but the global Buddhist community remains steadfast in its reverence for the true origins of the faith. For all the CCP's efforts to promote China as the seat of Buddhism, the world's Buddhists continue to look to India as the birthplace of their religion. Sites such as Bodh Gaya, Sarnath, and Nalanda hold spiritual significance that no state-sponsored narrative can erase. In the end, China's efforts to rewrite the history of Buddhism may disrupt the present, but they cannot erase the indelible link between Buddhism and its true origins—the forgotten story of India's enduring role in the religion's past, present, and future.

Attempts to keep up exchanges between Taiwanese, Chinese face obstacles

09 September 2024, VOA, William Yang

Efforts to maintain exchanges between Taiwanese and Chinese citizens face new challenges after Beijing last month sentenced a Taiwanese activist to nine years in jail, a move that analysts say will create a chilling effect within Taiwan's civil society.

On September 6, China's Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO) confirmed that a court in the eastern city of Wenzhou earlier had sentenced Taiwanese political activist Yang Chih-yuan to nine years in jail under secession charges.

TAO said Yang, who was arrested in 2022 while teaching and participating in competitions for the board game Go, has long been involved in secessionist activities, playing a key role in organizations that advocate Taiwan's independence. "His acts are egregious and the court reached the decision according to law," the office said in a statement.

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, which oversees cross-strait exchanges, condemned the Chinese court's ruling and asked Beijing to make public the verdict and the evidence that supports the charges.

"Beijing is trying to use Yang's case to intimidate Taiwanese people and use the pretext of penalizing Taiwan independence as a way to exercise long-arm jurisdiction," the MAC wrote in a statement released last week.

Yang's case marks the first time that China used secession charges against Taiwanese people. It comes after Beijing in June introduced 22 new guidelines to punish what they called "die-hard Taiwan independence activists." The maximum sentence could be the death penalty.

Analysts say the sentencing of Yang represents Beijing's attempt to take a "more hardline stance" against Taiwanese who promote the island's sovereignty. His case "shows that Beijing means business when it comes to using legal instruments to crack down on what it regards as 'separatism,'" said J. Michael Cole, a Taipei-based senior fellow at the Global Taiwan Institute.

"This will inevitably affect people-to-people and civil society exchanges [between Taiwan and China,]" Cole told VOA in a written statement.

Indefinite delay of cross-strait academic exchanges, city-to-city forum

Meanwhile, the scheduled visits by two academic delegations from China's Xiamen University have reportedly been postponed as Taiwanese authorities review their paperwork.

While some local media outlets said the postponement may be caused by "obstacles" imposed by Taiwanese authorities, Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council said the review of the Chinese delegations' applications is based on existing procedures, adding that Taipei has no intention to prevent certain groups from visiting Taiwan.

Despite clarification from Taiwanese officials, China's state-run tabloid Global Times characterized the postponement as the Taiwanese government's attempt to "block" the Chinese delegations from visiting Taiwan.

"The Xiamen University delegations have completed the preparations in terms of formalities and materials, but related 'security authorities' in Taiwan have put 'a technical hold' in place while they carry out a review," Zhang Wensheng, deputy dean of the Taiwan Research Institute at Xiamen University, told the Global Times in an interview.

Some experts say the delay in the Chinese delegation's trips to Taiwan shows the Taiwanese government may be reviewing how to facilitate cross-strait exchanges amid growing military and political pressure from Beijing.

"In light of Beijing's heightened pressure against Taiwan, the Taiwanese government may be reviewing what might be a more reciprocal approach to manage cross-strait academic exchanges," Wen-ti Sung, a Taipei-based political scientist for the Australian National University, told VOA by phone.

In addition to the delay of cross-strait academic exchanges, the annual Shanghai-Taipei City Forum, which remains one of the few occasions for municipal officials from Taiwan and China to meet, has yet to announce a date for a potential 2024 gathering.

When asked in August about the forum, Taipei Mayor Chiang Wan-an told Taiwanese media outlets that at a time when cross-strait tensions are high, it is more necessary for Taiwan and China to maintain communication.

"Such delays serve as a clear reminder that even lower-level engagement is difficult to sustain when one side rejects core aspects of the other's existence," Timothy Rich, a political scientist at Western Kentucky University, told VOA in a written response.

Since Taiwan President Lai Ching-te took office in May, Beijing has increased military pressure against Taiwan.

Against this backdrop, Cole in Taipei said the lack of engagement between Taipei and Beijing may increase the risks of miscalculation, which could lead to accidents and escalation.

In his view, Beijing will likely maintain a two-pronged approach against Taiwan in the near future. They will uphold "a suspension of official dialogue with the Taiwanese government led by the Democratic Progressive Party while keeping the door open to sub-state interaction with other elements of Taiwan's society, with the aim of dividing both," he told VOA.

EU-China-India: Three to tango?

09 September 2024, ORF, Swati Prabhu

With perceptible reliance in terms of trade in goods and services, the EU, India and China are dependent on each other, even as the EU attempts to reconfigure its relationship with China.

Disrupted global context

Globally, surging economic fragmentation in the form of trade barriers, restrictions, and sanctions not only increases the gap in financing for sustainable development, but also makes developing countries more fragile, vulnerable and prone to frequent meltdowns. The ongoing polycrisis has resulted in an increase in trade protectionism. Despite repeated reiterations by nation-states underscoring the need for building greater cooperation and robust partnerships, economic fragmentation is on the rise. As per the International Monetary Fund (IMF) new trade barriers, that were introduced on an annual basis, has almost tripled since 2019 to about 3,000 in 2023 (Figure 1).
