Zheng said they would continue to act as the "super liaison officer" and "super server", and work with Guangdong to deepen cooperation in fields such as the economy, trade, science and technology. The bay area is Beijing's scheme to link Hong Kong, Macau and nine Guangdong cities into an economic powerhouse.

Lawmaker Michael Tien Puk-sun said he expected Hong Kong would bring back the visa scheme ahead of the holiday period in February, which would allow visitors from neighbouring Shenzhen to travel to the city more than the current once a week.

But Tien, who is also the convenor of political group Roundtable, said the negotiations could be complicated by Shenzhen not wanting to lose spending to Hong Kong.

"It's something Hong Kong really wants, but it becomes a concern for Shenzhen as both sides need to boost their economy," he said on a radio show. "If half of their population comes to Hong Kong to spend, this reduces their domestic consumption."

The multi-entry visa scheme was introduced in 2009 to allow Shenzhen residents to make as many trips as they wanted to Hong Kong within a year. It was replaced by once-a-week visit permits in 2015 amid concerns over parallel trading and Hong Kong's capacity to handle surges in single-day visitors.

"But now the situation is not balanced," Tien said. "Hongkongers can go to the mainland as frequently as they wish, but mainlanders can only come once a week."

He added that the current entry restrictions caused the city to lose out on tourist dollars over peak holiday periods, as many mainland visitors made day trips but could not return soon after they left.

He referred to a recent incident where thousands of mainland visitors became stranded as they tried to return home from Hong Kong on New Year's Day.

"Rooms were expensive or sold out, so mainland tourists had to leave," he said. "But after they leave, they cannot re-enter the city. So even if the government organises many events throughout the holidays, tourists cannot come back to participate."

More flexible entry requirements are not the only moves in the spotlight to boost tourism numbers and retail sales.

North district councillor Ko Wai-kei echoed recent calls by Starry Lee Wai-king, the city's sole delegate to the nation's top legislative body, for the central government to increase the duty-free goods allowance for mainland visitors returning home from 5,000 yuan (US$702) to 30,000 yuan.

According to Chinese customs data, items exceeding the 5,000 yuan duty-free concession will be taxed from 13 to 50 per cent.

A 20 per cent duty is set to be levied on personal items, such as bags, watches and clothes, while jewellery, tobacco products and alcohol will be taxed at 50 per cent.

Tien raised the visa issue at a Legislative Council meeting on Wednesday, saying that while Hongkongers had been flocking to the mainland, the number of visitors coming from across the border had decreased significantly, which had dealt a heavy blow to local consumption.

Raistlin Lau Chun, acting secretary for culture, sports and tourism, told lawmakers the government had been in close communication with mainland authorities, but had nothing to add "at this stage".

The Hong Kong Department Stores and Commercial Staff General Union said a survey of 392 members between December 28 and January 5 showed that almost 70 per cent supported the resumption of the multiple-entry scheme, as the move would boost the local retail sector.

More than 65 per cent of members supported expanding the visa scheme to other parts of the Greater Bay Area, and half agreed the government should manage crowds better to prevent traffic jams and pedestrians blocking roads.

Lam Chi-chung, chairman of the Electrical and Audio Visual Trades Employees Association, told the same radio show on Thursday that the industry supported the return of multiple-entry visas, even if consumer habits had changed and mainland tourists were no longer spending as heavily.

"They will publicise their positive experience in Hong Kong on social media and promote the city to their friends, who might want to come and see for themselves," he said. "This is helpful to Hong Kong's tourism."

Ko welcomed the news of the talks and said he believed the issue of parallel trading would not resurface after the relaxation.

"During the pandemic, many of these parallel trading businesses folded and workers switched jobs. The variety and price of goods available on the mainland are also competitive, I believe the demand for parallel traded items has fallen."

China Urges Countries to Fully Respect Fact that Hong Kong Has Returned To China: FM Spokesperson

05 January 2024, Macau Daily Times

A Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson this week urged relevant countries to fully respect the fact that Hong Kong has already returned to China and abandon their colonial mentality.

Spokesperson Wang Wenbin made the remarks at a daily press briefing when asked to comment on a Hong Kong-related statement recently issued by countries including the United Kingdom and the United States in the name of "Media Freedom Coalition".

Noting this is a smear against press freedom in Hong Kong, an attack on the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR) Government's legitimate law enforcement and a move to embolden those who are anti-China and engaged in destabilizing Hong Kong such as Jimmy Lai, Wang said China deplores and firmly rejects this so-called statement from a handful of countries in the name of "Media Freedom Coalition".

The cases of Julian Assange and Edward Snowden have already shown the world that the so-called "freedom of press" is just a tool some countries use to attack and smear others, Wang said.

"These countries care little about the freedom of press when their selfish interests are involved. They made irresponsible remarks on matters concerning Hong Kong in the name of freedom of press only because they are not happy that Hong Kong is prospering, and they still hope to keep their past privileges and influence in Hong Kong but to no avail," Wang said.

Wang said Hong Kong follows the rule of law, and all laws in Hong Kong must be observed and those who break the law must be held accountable.

"Since the national security law entered into effect in Hong Kong, Hong Kong has restored order and is set to thrive.

The rule of law has been upheld and justice served. The lawful rights and freedoms including the freedom of press and freedom of speech of Hong Kong residents have been protected in a safe and stable environment under the rule of law," Wang said.

The spokesperson said that the number of international media outlets and journalists in Hong Kong has increased from before the national security law was introduced. "This is a fact that could not be denied by any unbiased person," he added.

"In recent years, over 100 countries spoke up in multilateral fora, including the third committee of UNGA and Human Rights Council, to voice their support for China in various ways on matters concerning Hong Kong. This fully shows that the world is not blind to the truth," Wang said.

"Any attempt to interfere in Hong Kong affairs in the name of the freedom of press is doomed to fail," he said.

the number of books indicated the detained practitioners intended to distribute them to others, which called for heavier penalties.

While four women were prosecuted separately, the two men, Sun and Guo, were tried in the Yakeshi City court and received their sentences on September 23, 2024. That defense arguments were not examined seriously was something so obvious that even the Hulunbuir Intermediate Court had to agree uncharacteristically with the defendants and order a retrial.

However, the retrial ended with the sentences confirmed. The defendants appealed again but this time the Hulunbuir Intermediate Court did not hold a public hearing. It decided in chambers on September 23, 2024, that the appeal was rejected.

This decision remained unknown to the defendants' relatives until last week. They hired lawyers to know more but they were told that they cannot visit their clients at the Yakeshi City Detention Center.

The case was plagued by repeated irregularities. The only certainty is that Sun and Guo should spend long years in jail just for having being caught with Falun Gong literature in their homes.

Heavy Jail Sentences Against Falun Gong Practitioners in Southern Mongolia

05 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Yang Feng

Amid claims of legal irregularities, two men got respectively seven and seven and a half years for keeping books of the banned movement in their homes.

We should not become accustomed to it. Spending seven years or more in a Chinese jail just for practicing one's faith and (perhaps) sharing it is not "normal." Considering also how prisoners of conscience are mistreated in Chinese prisons, these verdicts are just unacceptable. Yet, they are now so frequent that the world scarcely pays attention.

Trials are also conducted in a cavalier way. This was the case for two Falun Gong practitioners of Yakeshi City, Inner Mongolia, Sun Wentian and Guo Changsuo, sentenced respectively to seven and a half and seven years in jail after a strange trial.

Sun and Guo were part of a group of six Falun Gong practitioners whose houses were raided by the Yakeshi City Public Security on April 8 and 19, 2023. Police claimed that they found "several" Falun Gong books in their homes. Although a list of the books was never provided, the police claimed that

After 'Xizang' for 'Tibet', is it 'Northern frontier' for 'Inner Mongolia'?

04 September 2024, Tibetan Review

After a new insistence on using the Chinese term "Xizang" (western treasure) to refer to Tibet (and Tibet Autonomous Region) even in English-language media, party authorities in China are now calling for the phrase "northern frontier culture" rather than "Mongolian" for China's Inner Mongolia region, said US-based journal Foreign Policy in its weekly China Brief email service Sep 3.

The linguistic change may signal another target in ongoing attempts by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to crush minority cultures in (People's Republic of) China, especially those in the border regions, the report said.

The report noted that until 1911, all of Mongolia was under the control of the Qing Empire, which also ruled China. Out of ecological and cultural concerns, the Qing's Manchu rulers blocked Han Chinese settlement in Mongolia.

However, after the 1850-64 Taiping rebellion and the resulting sharp decline in Qing power, Han settlers flooded into Inner Mongolia. And the region continued to remain under Chinese control.

On the other hand, the present-day Mongolia became a Soviet satellite and later on an independent country.

The report noted that although clashes between Han Chinese and Mongols left tensions that lasted through the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, until recently, Inner Mongolia was seen as a model of relative peace and assimilation.

However, in the last four years, educational changes have targeted Mongolian language and culture, and protests in the region in 2020 were met with repression, the report noted.

China tries 11 Mongol herders for defending traditional land

06 August 2024, UCA News

The families of nearly a dozen herders branded "criminals" and standing trial in Inner Mongolia have accused local Chinese authorities of aiding and abetting a mining company to illegally occupy their traditional grazing lands.

The trial which has dragged on for more than 90 days is expected to end next week.

In a statement, the families said they "have lived on the grasslands of Urad Front Banner and maintained a pastoralist way of life for generations," the Southern Mongolian Human Rights Information Center (SMHRIC) reported on Aug. 5

"Jiranhoyor [their head] has appealed to the relevant [authority] multiple times. The destruction of grassland has never been resolved. Now, these 11 herders have become 'criminals' overnight," the families added.

Jiranhoyor is the former head of the Taigiin-Enger Gachaa of Bayanhuaa Township who led the local herders to defend their legal rights, the families said. The Bayannuur League Public Security Bureau also reportedly arrested Sumyaa, Sumbur, Daichin, Munkhsumbur, Nars, Naranbat, Hurwaa, Wei Meili, Hong Wuyi, and Aldart for the first time in August 2020 and detained them multiple times since. The herders have been detained for periods ranging from 37 days to 18 months without "legal due process," the SMHRIC said.

Photographs and videos posted on the SMHRIC website showed sick and elderly herders being taken into custody in wheelchairs and some being handcuffed and shackled to hospital beds.

The herders have been defending the alleged illegal occupation of their lands and environmental destruction by multiple Chinese mining companies, including Huo Tuo Mine, for more than a decade, the SMHRIC said.

In a statement issued in 2020, the Bayannuur security bureau called the herders "gangs" and alleged they were "long engaged in evil deeds and illegal activities, seriously sabotaging the local economy, disturbing public orders, and creating adverse social effects." Urnaa, a daughter of Jiranhoyor, told SMHRIC that her father and the other herders were only protesting the mining companies for illegally occupying and destroying their grazing lands.

"As mining companies beating up and abusing local herders become commonplace, herders from our community often gathered together to block the mining trucks," Urnaa said.

"These peaceful and legal activities are now labeled as 'crimes,'" Urnaa lamented.

Urnaa pointed out that Jiranhoyor was diagnosed with bladder cancer before his arrest in 2020 and he had to undergo several surgeries and chemotherapy before he was arrested again for the second time in 2021.

Sumyaa, Urnaa's mother, was detained for more than 17 months for signing the petition against the mining company.

Sumbur, a herder, who has been suffering from serious rheumatoid arthritis was handcuffed and shackled on a hospital bed during the detention, according to photos and video footage shared by Urnaa, SMHRIC said.

"Sumbur was not even able to walk and hold a teacup by himself. But he was taken away in a wheelchair by the police," Urnaa alleged.

Naranbat, another local herder, was the longest-serving detainee at the Urad Front Banner Detention Center.

The center in a release notice said Naranbat was released on bail pending trial on Dec. 1, 2022, after serving an 18-month detention without trial, SMHRIC said.

Reportedly, the local public prosecution authorities have revised the indictment against the 11 herders four times in over four years due to insufficient evidence and legal basis.

The latest revision took place on July 25 during the most recent trial.

Meanwhile, Jiranhoyor's family members alleged that the mining companies had bribed the local police and authorities.

SMHRIC pointed out that Chinese authorities have accelerated the resource extraction from Southern Mongolia which has prompted giants like Shenhua and Changqing to arrive in the country. Allegedly, many have opened mines without the consent of locals sparking tensions in the region. In 2011, a large-scale protest erupted after a Mongolian herder was brutally killed by a Chinese coal-hauling truck. Thousands of herders were arrested and detained, and their leaders have been imprisoned, SMHRIC said.

A Letter to UN Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers by the Southern Mongolian Human Rights Information Center

20 May 2024, SMHRIC

Her Excellency Ms. Margaret Satterthwaite United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers OHCHR-UNOG

Your Excellency Ms. Margaret Satterthwaite,
We write to you once again, following up on our previous correspondence from last autumn. We trust this letter finds you well. We extend our heartfelt gratitude to you for your impactful visit to Mongolia last autumn, followed by your insightful report. Your efforts have undoubtedly shed light on the critical need to fortify judicial independence and uphold human rights within the country.

As a coalition of organisations, comprising individuals of Mongolian heritage residing abroad and advocating for the rights of our respective Mongolian heritage communities, we are deeply troubled by the worsening state of democracy, civil rights, and judicial independence in Mongolia. Our collective concern extends to the enduring adverse impact on individuals of Mongolian heritage residing outside Mongolia, particularly those under the jurisdictions of authoritarian regimes such as China, Russia, and others. It is therefore imperative that we address these pressing issues to safeguard the rights and well-being of our communities. Currently subjected to colonisation and authoritarian rule, our communities face further adversity due to Mongolia's deteriorating democracy and the encroaching influence of authoritarianism from its immediate neighbours.

Recent developments indicate grave interference in electoral processes by the Mongolian People's Party (MPP), led by Prime Minister Oyun-Erdene Luvsannamsrai, in anticipation of the upcoming parliamentary elections. The actions of the MPP appear aimed at solidifying their victory and severely kinking dissent. Political interference in the judiciary, reminiscent of old Communist tactics, is intensifying. This interference has led to a crackdown on journalists and citizens under the guise of national security, utilising restrictive tort laws excessively and abusively. Of particular concern is the ease with which individuals, including journalists, can be charged with crimes such as defamation against the Prime Minister, the President, and infringement of others' rights, in effect stifling dissent and criticism. Prime Minister Oyun-Erdene Luvsannamsrai has gained notoriety for exploiting these laws to suppress dissenting voices. The erosion of democratic values and principles is evident, with the use of tort laws to silence dissent posing a grave threat to freedom of expression and the rule of law in Mongolia.

We urge the international community, including your esteemed office, to intensify efforts to closely monitor the situation in Mongolia and to take decisive action to address our concerns. Specifically, we call for condemnation of political interference in the judiciary, advocacy for the protection of journalists and freedom of the press, support for initiatives promoting transparency and accountability, and consideration of targeted sanctions against individuals responsible for human rights abuses. Finally, we call upon the international community to bring pressure on the Mongolian government to uphold the rule of law abiding by international conventions of freedom and justice.

Furthermore, we draw your attention once again to the case of Mr. Munkhbayar Chuluundorj, whose unjust imprisonment symbolises the broader challenges facing Mongolia's judiciary system as well as the transnational repression exerted by the government of the neighbouring People's Republic of China (PRC). Mr. Chuluundorj's journalism, which includes critiques of the Chinese government's treatment of Mongols in China and the Mongol-Sino relationship, has long irritated the Communist authorities in Peking. The timing of his arrest, closely following the Prime Minister's return from Peking, begs the question of whether it was truly coincidental. An especially alarming recent development in this case is the suspension of legal licenses of two of Mr. Chuluundorj's attorneys without due process, terminating their ability to earn a living in their profession. Additionally, it is worth noting that aside from the potential persecution of Mr. Chuluundorj at China's behest, the Prime Minister harbours personal animosity towards Chuluundorj due to his outspoken criticism of the Prime Minister's politics and conduct, as well as calls for his resignation. We implore you to prioritise this case and utilise your platform to advocate for Mr. Chuluundorj's release and the restoration of justice.

Thank you for your attention to these urgent matters. We trust in your dedication to upholding the principles of democracy, freedom, and justice, and eagerly anticipate your continued efforts to support the democratic aspirations of the Mongolian people.

Sincerely,

China recruits Mandarin-speaking teachers to move to Inner Mongolia

06 May 2024, RFA, Qian lang

Mongolians protest against China's plan to introduce Mandarin-only classes at schools in the Chinese province of Inner Mongolia, at Sukhbaatar Square in Ulaanbaatar, the capital of Mongolia on September 15, 2020.

Chinese authorities in the northern part of Inner Mongolia are hiring teachers from across China, offering attractive packages to encourage fresh graduates who are native Mandarin speakers to settle in the region, according to recent recruitment notices.

The move appears to be part of a nationwide move to eradicate the use of Mongolian in primary and secondary education, overseas activists said.

Primary and secondary schools across the region were ordered to end Mongolian-medium instruction and to offer only Chinese-medium teaching from Sept. 1, 2023.

Authorities in Otog Front Banner, a county-like administrative division outside Ordos city, are looking to recruit 40 high-school teachers of Chinese, math, science, English as well teachers of history, geography and "ideology and politics," according to a recruitment ad dated April 25 posted to the Gaoxiaojob.com jobs board.

They are also looking for 30 primary school teachers, nine to teach Chinese, with other vacancies available for teachers of math, English, science and other subjects, the notice said.

It added that successful applicants from top-tier universities can expect to receive a "resettlement allowance," with accommodation provided. Applicants must be under 30 years of age, according to the ad.

Similar advertisements have also been posted by authorities looking for 70 primary and secondary teachers to fill posts in Ordos city, and 20 people to teach preschool in Shilingol Banner, near the border with the independent country of Mongolia.

The recruitment drive comes as Inner Mongolia Vice Gov. Bao Xianhua called in a signed opinion article in the ruling Chinese Communist Party's official mouthpiece, the People's Daily, for "a team of teachers with excellent skills, providing a strong guarantee for the building of a strong regional education system, who will write the next chapter of the modernization of Inner Mongolia, Chinese-style."

Phasing out Mongolian

Activists said the move is part of the government's bid to erase Mongolian language and culture from the region's schools.

It comes as schools complete the phasing out of Mongolian in favor of Mandarin as a medium of instruction for non-language classes including history, math and science — a policy that sparked mass protests by parents and students followed by a regionwide crackdown when it was announced in September 2020.

An ethnic Mongolian teacher from Shilingol League who gave only one name, Tana, said that ethnic Mongolian teachers in the region's primary and secondary have been left out in the cold by the switch to Mandarin across the board, and are struggling with delivering class in their second language.

"It's a bit easier in primary schools, but junior high school teachers who used to teach in Mongolian are suddenly having to teach in Mandarin," Tana said.

"This generation of teachers finds it very hard to teach certain subjects now that they suddenly have to teach in Chinese."

Tana said her school had informed teachers who are unable to make the transition to Mandarin would need to retire early or be redeployed in the pastoral team.

"They called a meeting of ethnic Mongolian teachers and said that either we have to teach in Chinese, or take jobs in the dormitories or the canteen," she said.

Nearly impossible expectation

Ordos-born Yang Haiying, a professor at Japan's Shizuoka University who has written a history of the "genocide" of ethnic Mongolians during the political violence of the Chinese Communist Party's 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, said it's almost impossible for many native speakers of Mongolian to suddenly switch to teaching their subjects in Mandarin.

"They are expected to teach chemistry in Chinese. Equations, physics, theory, etc.," he said. "This is tantamount to forced layoffs, because [the government] knows very well that the ethnic Mongolians won't be able to do this."

The fact that authorities in the region are recruiting heavily for the next academic year suggests that many ethnic Mongolians have either left, or are on their way out of, the workforce.

"They're recruiting from the rest of China for young people to bring their families, which is a disguised settlement program," Yang said.

Japan-based ethnic Mongolian activist Haas, who goes by a single name, said the aim is to marginalize ethnic Mongolians, who were trained in their native language to teach in that language.

"The Chinese Communist Party's policy is not to allow them to stay on [in their posts]," Haas said. "They want to separate them from mainstream society, because the authorities fear they will obstruct the policy when it comes to be implemented."

"So they're trying to kick all of the ethnic Mongolian teachers out."

'Colonial policy'

Authorities began merging Chinese-medium and Mongolian-medium schools across the region, forcing around 1 million ethnic Mongolian children from rural areas into more than 2,000 boarding schools, according to a Feb. 21, 2024, report by the head of the New York-based Southern Mongolia Human Rights and Information Center, Enghebatu Togocho. "[The] boarding school system ... is an integral part of China's overall colonial policy of wiping out the language, culture and identity of the entire Southern Mongolian population as a whole," the report said, adding that it had gone hand-in-hand with government policies aimed at ending Mongolian herders' nomadic way of life.

"Now the Chinese government is targeting the Southern Mongolians' last defense of national identity that is the language," Enghebatu Togocho wrote. "From kindergartners to college students, from teachers to professors, from ordinary herders to party members, the entire [ethnic] Mongolian population is subjected to [a] massive training program."

During the "training" sessions, ethnic Mongolians are condemned for expressing their ethnic identity, for singing Mongolian songs and wearing Mongolian clothes, as well as for not having enough Han Chinese friends or being nice to Chinese people, he said.

Instead, they are expected to embrace Han Chinese language, culture and traditions.

Nepal, China universities sign collaboration agreement

30 December 2024, Kathmandu Post

Lumbini Buddhist University and Beijing Language and Culture University to work together on cultural exchange, language education, and research.

Lumbini Buddhist University and Beijing Language and Culture University have signed a collaboration agreement in the presence of Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli.

At an event held at the Prime Minister's official residence in Baluwatar, officials from Lumbini Buddhist University and Beijing Language and Culture University exchanged the agreement documents.

As per the agreement, both universities will collaborate on cultural exchange, language teaching, and research initiatives. Additionally, a Nepal Institute of China will be established in Beijing, and a China Institute of Nepal will be set up in Lumbini.

This agreement builds on an earlier understanding between Nepal and China to promote volunteer-based Chinese language teaching during PM Oli's official visit to China from December 2–5.

Speaking on the occasion, Prime Minister Oli, who is also the Chancellor of Lumbini Buddhist University, expressed happiness over the growing academic and cultural ties between Nepal and China. "The two nations share a centuries-old bond, and this collaboration marks another step forward in strengthening our relationship," Oli said.

The event was attended by National Planning Commission member Geeta Kumari Paudyal Adhikari, Lumbini University's Registrar Dr Tilak Ram Acharya, and officials from the Chinese Embassy in Nepal, among others.

Himalayan Yak: No more treasure for mountain people as Tibet restricts trade

24 December 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Ananda Gautam

Due to the restrictions that started since Covid, yak population has risen significantly, causing a burden for herders along the Nepal-China border.

Nupu Sherpa of Tokpegola, situated around 4,100 meters above sea level in Mikwakhola Rural Municipality in Taplejung, sold 20 yaks in Tibet, China, back in 2019.

He earned Rs110,000 per head, as there were no border restrictions on taking yaks to the Chinese market.

Sherpa and five other herders in Thudam, Sankhuwasabha, a higher pass known as a centre for yak herding, used to sell yaks by crossing the Chinese border.

During the pre-Covid period in 2019, the last time they traded yaks to Tibet, they brought Rs5 million each.

But since then, they have not been able to export yaks to Tibet.

"While trading in Tibet at that time, the 1 Chinese yuan was equivalent to Rs16," said Sherpa. "I have heard that the rate has increased, but sadly, we cannot sell yaks anymore."

Sherpa currently owns 75 yaks, and all are mature enough to be sold. Normally, yaks have a life expectancy of 15-20 years, and after that, they turn thin and old. So, the commercial value of yak is at the age of 12.

"The old yak does not fetch a good price, so selling them while they are still valuable is important," said Sherpa. Now, to make ends meet, Sherpa has been making dog chews from yak milk.

In the upper reaches, when the market in Tibet was open and vibrant, yaks were used as pack animals. "But now, rearing yaks has become a burden for many people," said Sherpa.

Nearly 180 households like Sherpa's have the same problem—no market access.

According to the Yak Farmers Federation, Taplejung, each family is rearing between five to 400 yaks.

Sherpa, also president of the federation, said that their only alternative is to let yaks die.

Yak farmers have requested Netra Prasad Sharma, chief district officer, to raise the issue with the officials on the other side of the border.

Accordingly, on December 14, a meeting was held between the key officials of Taplejung and Dinggye County in southwest Tibet.

"We have raised the issue, including to allow trade of agricultural products. It was the main agenda from our side at the meeting, but Tibet showed reluctance to resolve the issue faced by Nepalis living at the Nepal-China border point," said Sharma.

During the meeting, the Chinese representative said that Beijing would make the decision regarding livestock trade and that they would make requests to the higher authority.

"We are hopeful the issue will be addressed," said Sharma.

The border people tried to export yak, milk, dog chew and ghee on different occasions but were returned, said Sharma.

Kimathanka in Sankhuwasabha and 13 other trans-Himalayan trade points along the Nepal-China border were reopened in May after four years of closure.

In May, then Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha reached Tibet through the Kimathanka border point, and Vice-chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region Silang Nima jointly opened the traditional trading points amid a function in the Tibetan town of Chentang.

They announced the reopening of 14 of the 21 trading points in various districts along Nepal's mountain range.

Chinese authorities closed the border passes in January 2020 to prevent the spread of the coronavirus, which severely disrupted the livelihoods of Nepalis living in remote mountain villages close to Tibet.

"We have raised the issue at Nepal's home ministry," said Sharma.

The locals who lost one of the crucial markets after Covid-19 were hopeful that the reopening of the border in May for people and trade movements would revive the yak trade.

The residents in far-flung northern borders believe that the trade restrictions have also affected Tibet.

Mingma Diki of Olangchung Gola said her family would buy yak calves from Tibet, rear them in Nepal and sell them back to Tibet after they matured.

"It's strange that free trade with Tibet has stopped altogether."

Locals suspected that China might have stopped the yak trade due to lumpy skin disease that spread in Nepal in 2023. The first outbreak of lumpy skin disease in Nepal started in June 2020. By 2023, more than 48,000 cattle have died from the disease that has affected all of the country's 77 districts. More than 3,000 livestock were affected by lumpy skin in Taplejung, according to the Livestock Service Office.

Tibet, however, has not officially made any statement about stopping yaks from coming from Nepal.

"We submitted a special proposal on this issue, but Beijing declined it," said Chheten Sherpa Lama, ward chairman of Phaktalung rural municipality, who was in the Nepali delegation with chief district officer Sharma, to Tibet as a translator.

The population of yak has been increasing and causing additional burden to farmers, said Lama.

"Feeding yaks is becoming increasingly difficult, and fodder shortages are adding to our hardship."

As per the District Livestock Office statistics, there are around 8,000 yaks in Taplejung.

The federation said that even if a yak is priced at Rs50,000, Taplejung has yaks worth Rs400 million.

Around 60 percent of yaks are at the age to be sold.

Locals of the mountain region have been rearing yaks at 3,000 to 5,000 metres as their traditional occupation. They are reared particularly in the higher passes of Sirijunga, Phaktalung, Mikwakhola, Meringden and Phungling.

According to the locals, yaks have also become prey to snow leopards, bears and wolves.

China-Nepal railway to be a game changer, transform Nepal from landlocked to landlinked:
former envoy

23 December 2024, People's Daily Online, Yin Yeping

The China-Nepal cross-border railway project will be a game changer in the trans-Himalayan region connecting not only Nepal and China but also China and South Asia as a whole, Leela Mani Paudyal, a former Nepali ambassador to China, told the Global Times in an exclusive interview.

The remarks came as China-Nepal ties have been further strengthened after the visit of Nepali Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli to China earlier this month. During the visit, important consensuses were reached, including a pledge to "steadily advance the feasibility study of the Jilong/Keyrung-Kathmandu Cross-Border Railway, and planning to hold the 9th Working Meeting on China-Nepal Railway Cooperation," per a joint statement.

The Chinese side will continue to help Nepal train professionals in the field of railways. Both sides also expressed their readiness to sign the memorandum of understanding on building the Trans-Himalayan Multi-Dimensional Connectivity Network, according to the joint statement.

Talking about the significance of this project for China-Nepal bilateral trade and Nepal's economic development, Paudyal said that "the railway will enable Nepal to utilize the transit facility available to Nepal via China... The railway will transform Nepal from a landlocked country to land-linked one," the former envoy said.

China-Nepal bilateral trade has seen robust growth. From January to November 2024, it amounted to 13.50 billion yuan, a year-on-year increase of 18.1 percent, according to the latest data released by China's General Administration of Customs. Both imports and exports saw steady growth.

Given what has already been achieved, there is still potential for bilateral trade to be further boosted after the railway project is launched, the former Nepali ambassador said, adding that the railway will help link some of Nepal's industries to the value chain of Chinese production. "The railway will certainly boost trade and investment in Nepal," he said.

The railway project will not only support trade but also tourism, Paudyal said, as Nepal has become a popular travel destination for many Chinese visitors. According to data from the Nepali tourism authority, in November alone, at least 114,501 tourists visited the country, 9,458 of whom were from China.

During the Nepali Prime Minister's visit to China, the Chinese side expressed support for Nepal's declaration of 2025 as Nepal Visit Year in China, the Xinhua News Agency reported, indicating closer ties in the tourism sector between China and the South Asian country.

In a previous interview with the Global Times, Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song said that the China-Nepal railway comprises both a Chinese and Nepali section, and both sides were accelerating efforts to promote the project.

Meanwhile, Southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region is steadfastly promoting the Xigaze-Jilong section of the railway according to its 14th Five-Year Plan (2021-25), which includes planning and building a stretch of railway at Jilong Port, Chen said, noting that related projects will constantly enhance the autogenic capacity of Nepal's economy and give wings to Nepal's development.

The railway project is just one example of growing China-Nepal bilateral cooperation. Paudyal said that China's support for Nepal's development efforts is commendable.

"Both the Belt and Road Initiative and Chinese support were aimed at facilitating the socio-economic development of Nepal; therefore, we reject any attempt to make this development initiative a geopolitical issue," Paudyal said, referring to some foreign media reports smearing China-Nepal cooperation.

Nepal embraces China's BRI

18 December 2024, The Pioneer, Parul Chandra

Nepal's deepening ties with China through the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) have set alarm bells ringing in New Delhi

India has cause for extreme worry. In yet another indicator of China's growing sway over Nepal, the two are moving forward to implement Beijing's ambitious Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in the Himalayan nation. India is not only opposed to this in principle on grounds of sovereignty but also fears it will enable China to increase its already considerable inroads into Nepal.

If 2017 marked Nepal's initial step to coming on board the BRI with an MoU, the year 2024 marks a giant leap for the Himalayan nation in that direction. A framework agreement for cooperation on the BRI was signed during Nepalese PM K P Sharma Oli's visit to China in early December, apart from nine other pacts. With the strategically located Himalayan nation having become a hub for Great Powers contestation, the US too would be uneasy with the latest Beijing-Kathmandu tango. While the US had managed to get Nepal on board its own Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) Compact to fund Kathmandu's power and transport infrastructure, the BRI seems far broader. Kathmandu is trying to play down the framework as just a continuation of the 2017 MoU. The framework, however, underlines Kathmandu and Beijing's renewed push for the BRI, an initiative on which New Delhi harbours deep suspicions for what it perceives as China's hegemonic ambitions through debt-trap diplomacy. Sovereignty is another major concern, with the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), another project under BRI, passing through Pakistan-occupied Kashmir.

India is certainly worried about PM Oli-led Nepal once again moving into China's sphere of influence. The CPN-UML leader is widely seen as being pro-China, and bilateral ties with India were prickly during his previous stints as the PM. India has yet to host Oli since he took charge as PM in July this year for the fourth time, with him first heading for Beijing, in a break from the tradition of visiting New Delhi. Also, showing scant regard for New Delhi's sensitivities, the Oli government recently allowed 220 Buddhist monks from China to travel to Lumbini, the birthplace of Gautam Buddha even as the Nanhai Buddhism Shenzhen roundtable was being held in Kathmandu.

Oli delivered the inaugural address at this roundtable. There were also reports the China-appointed Panchen Lama would travel to Lumbini, though it did not eventually happen.

The Oli government's encouragement of Beijing's concerted moves to claim Buddhism as a shared heritage will not go down well with New Delhi, which has been making its efforts to build on its shared Buddhist heritage with Nepal.

Kathmandu's thrust on greater economic cooperation with Beijing – the BRI is part of this endeavour – would also whittle down India's influence over Nepal. The BRI framework agreement, incidentally, also envisages the opening of branches of Chinese banks and financial institutions in Nepal. India has traditionally had deep economic linkages with Nepal, nurtured in no small measure due to reasons of geography – the two neighbours share a long and porous 1,751-km-long border.

This, along with the landlocked nature of Nepal, has helped India become its largest trading partner. During the 2022-23 fiscal, bilateral trade was pegged at $8.85 billion. This included $8 billion of exports from India to Nepal, with $840 million of exports in the reverse direction. As per the Nepal Rastra Bank, India's share in Nepal's trade accounted for 64.1% in 2022-23. PM Oli sees cooperation on BRI as a means to forge closer economic ties with China, with the framework agreement resolving to deepen the economic partnership by "injecting new momentum to trade, infrastructure and connectivity cooperation".

Not a single project under the BRI rubric has been executed in Nepal since the 2017 MoU. Nepal would be hoping that the 10 initial projects, including those meant to boost regional connectivity, will now see the light of day. India has its work cut out and should ensure it does not come across as overbearing. India's approach in the Kalapani-Lipulekh-Limpiyadhura border dispute, where New Delhi ignored Kathmandu's request for foreign secretary-level talks, is a case in point.

It led Oli, in his earlier stint as the PM, to cock a snook at New Delhi by changing his country's map showing the disputed territories as part of Nepal.

Neither did New Delhi show respect due to a close neighbour when it decided to give a quiet burial to the joint 2018 Eminent Persons Group (EPG) report, which suggested that the 1950 Treaty of Peace And Friendship be replaced with a new one?

Nepal has also been unhappy with India's refusal to give overflight rights for aircraft using the Chinese-built Gautam Buddha International Airport in Lumbini.

India would do well to remember that its domineering approach only serves to alienate a close neighbour further and push it into China's ever-willing embrace. India should not lose sight of its strategic imperatives.

Chinese class restarted for Nepali journalists

16 December 2024, Xinhua

The Chinese class was relaunched on Monday for 40 Nepalese journalists from different media outlets.

In addition to basic Chinese language knowledge, special courses catering to journalistic work were offered as well, said Li Shuangcheng, director of the Confucius Institute at Kathmandu University.

Addressing the opening ceremony held at the Confucius Institute situated in Lalitpur, Li noted that Chinese cultural elements were integrated into the course, allowing the learners to appreciate the charm of Chinese culture and enhance their comprehensive understanding of Chinese society and people.

Kishor Shrestha, chairman of the Nepal-China Media Forum, recalled that the Chinese class was first started in May 2019 and had to be halted due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

Sharing his own experiences, Shrestha urged the learners to learn both the Chinese language and characters, stressing that Chinese is becoming an international language gradually.

"The Chinese language is one of the most spoken languages in the world and I'm really excited to be a part of this class," said Shristi Kafle, one of the learners.

"I believe that if I master this language, it will help me understand China, Chinese history and Chinese society better, and it will also help me to enhance my reporting skills about China," she added.

Nepal media note absence of Beijing's Panchen Lama

16 December 2024, Free Tibet

Gyaltzen Norbu, was reportedly due to travel to a Chinese-organised Buddhist conference in Nepal

Over the weekend, Nanhai Buddhism Shenzhen Roundtable took place in Nepal. 220 Chinese Buddhist monks arrived on a chartered flight for the Chinese-organised Buddhist events in Kathmandu and Lumbini.

Tibet watchers were paying particular attention to this delegation after reports last week that the Chinese-imposed Panchen Lama, Gyaltzen Norbu, would be among them.

One report in the online newspaper Nepal Aaja, suggested that Gyaltzen Norbu would arrive in Nepal on 14 December. The article noted that the visit of Beijing's Panchen Lama was "part of China's effort to extend its influence over Buddhist communities in South Asia", with the Chinese government appearing to be "leveraging cultural and religious diplomacy to reinforce its soft power." Reports from Nepal over the weekend state that Gyaltzen Norbu never made the trip to Nepal. These follow reports last week from Nepal that the government of Nepal itself blocked the trip.

The Kathmandu Post reported that due to the sensitivity of Gyaltzen Norbu's visit, the Government of Nepal told the Chinese embassy that he would not be welcome, citing Nepal's "neutrality on religious matters". The Chinese embassy has since denied that it was ever the intention for Gyaltzen Norbu to travel to Nepal.

Security sources quoted in Nepalese media even raised the possibility that Gyaltzen Norbu may attempt to enter Nepal with an assumed identity or in disguise, risking a geopolitical crisis. Rigorous checks were therefore carried out on each passenger.

Nepal is located between Chinese-occupied Tibet and India, with Lumbini located close to the Indian border. Lumbini is also significant as the birthplace of Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha.

The Kathmandu Post article last Thursday quoted Lyarkal Lama, vice-chairman of the Lumbini Development Trust, who said that the Panchen Lama “has been trying to visit Nepal for the past ten years [...] He is such a powerful person, he can come here only with the permission of our prime minister.”

Born in 1990 and raised in Beijing, Gyaltsen Norbu has been promoted as the 11th Panchen Lama by the Chinese government since 1995, when he was enthroned at Tashilhunpo Monastery in Shigatse.

At 16, he addressed the 2006 World Buddhist Forum in 2006, which was the first major international religious conference in the People’s Republic of China since its founding in 1949. Ten years later, he returned to Shigatse, the historic seat of the Panchen Lama, to carry out the Kalachakra, a major religious teaching. It was the first time in half a century that the Kalachakra initiation had been held in occupied Tibet.

While Beijing has attempted to promote Gyaltsen Norbu, he remains widely rejected among Tibetans, who instead continue to demand information about Gedhun Choekyi Nyima.

Gedhun Choekyi Nyima was identified by the 14th Dalai Lama as the Panchen Lama in 1995 but was detained by Chinese authorities days later and has not been seen since. He had only recently turned six years old, making him the world’s youngest political prisoner.

government to exert control over Tibetan Buddhism, which is central to Tibet’s identity and closely intertwined with the struggle against its occupation.

Monks and nuns have been at the forefront of protests against the occupation and human rights abuses, notably in the 2008 Tibetan uprising, where one of the key catalysts was a march by 200 monks from Labrang Monastery.

The Chinese government closely regulates Tibetan monasteries, which are required to display loyalty to the Chinese state and the Chinese Communist Party. CCP members have stated on numerous occasions that the Chinese government is the ultimate authority on aspects of Tibetan Buddhism such as reincarnation and the identification and certification of Tibetan lamas and religious teachers. This includes the Panchen Lama and also the lineage of the Dalai Lama.

Chinese officials have stated clearly that Beijing’s control over the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama is strategic. In 2015 Zhu Weiqun, then the Chairman of China’s Committee for Ethnic and Religious Affairs, wrote in the state-run Global Times that the succession “is first and foremost an important political matter” adding that “whoever has the name of Dalai Lama will control political power in Tibet.”

“For this reason,” Zhu concluded, “since historical times, the central government has never given up, and will never give up, the right to decide the reincarnation affairs of the Dalai Lama.”

Despite the public rejection, Nepal’s Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli inaugurated the Chinese-organised event on Friday and was recently in China to sign a Belt and Road Initiative Framework Agreement.

The government of Nepal also continues to prevent any visit from the 14th Dalai Lama, a point reiterated by a senior security official in Nepal: “We have not allowed the Dalai Lama to come to Nepal. By the same token, we also can’t allow a similar China-backed religious figure to visit Nepal.”

Gyaltsen Norbu conducting the Kalachakra in Shigatse, Tibet, in 2016

Nepal is likely to continue to come under pressure from its larger neighbours. Rishi Gupta, Assistant Director of the Asia Society Policy Institute, wrote on Friday: “While the government of Nepal may have refused entry to the Panchen Lama this time [...] this decision is far from a permanent safeguard.” He concluded that the “risk of Nepal becoming a staging ground for Beijing’s Sinicisation efforts remains alarmingly real.”

Following the reports that Gyaltsen Norbu was visiting Nepal, Free Tibet joined its partners in the Tibet movement in drafting a letter to Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli, urging him to disinvite him. The letter was also submitted by Tibetans to Nepalese embassies around the world, including the UK embassy in London. The letter can be read here.

Controversial monk behind attempts to bring China-appointed Panchen to Nepal?

15 December 2024, Tibetan Review

While the Government of Nepal permitted the holding of the Nanhai (South China Sea) Buddhism Shenzhen Roundtable in the country, but pointedly rejected any idea of the China-appointed Panchen Lama Gyaincain Norbu attending it, Lyarkar Lama, the controversial Vice Chairman of the Lumbini Development Trust, kept looking to bring him to the conference, according to Nepali media reports.

The visit has been halted, but the issue has raised critical questions, particularly about the role of Lyarkar Lama in facilitating such a controversial visit, noted nepalaja.com Dec 13.

It said that despite preparations by Chinese stakeholders to bring the “Panchen Lama” to Lumbini, senior government officials actively worked to address the issue’s sensitivity and prevent the visit. This situation has placed a spotlight on Lyarkar Lama, who has been criticized for his involvement in managing the arrangements for the “Panchen Lama’s” visit, the report said.

The report cited Lyarkar Lama’s history as one fraught with legal, moral, and professional controversies, making his role in the Lumbini Development Trust highly contentious.

Earlier, on Dec 15, 2015, Kathmandu police discovered 14 bullets in Lyarkar Lama’s locker at the Nepal Investment Bank. The possession of such items by a Buddhist monk raised severe legal and ethical concerns, the report said.

His appointment as Vice Chairman of the Lumbini Development Trust was stated to be equally controversial.

Nepal’s Ministry of Culture, Tourism, and Civil Aviation regulations say individuals with proven criminal records are ineligible for such positions. Nevertheless, the then Tourism Minister Sudan Kirati recommended Lama for the role, and the appointment was approved by the cabinet under Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal (Prachanda).

It was at that time reported by the kathmandupost.com Aug 6, 2023, that Lama was appointed to the post (for a five-year term) despite the fact that he had earlier been charged with several crimes, including foreign employment fraud, possession of illegal firearms, accumulating property disproportionate to his known source of income, and possession of dual citizenship and passport.

He was stated to be a central committee member of the CPN (Maoist Centre) headed by Prachanda.

Before that, he was CPN-UML member, and became the state minister for finance in the Jhala Nath Khanal-led government in 2011. The party had made him a lawmaker under the proportional representation category after the first Constituent Assembly election.

However, he was reported to have resigned from the post on Apr 21, 2011, just 11 days after assuming office, after he ran into controversy for possessing a Nepali citizenship certificate, an Indian passport and a Tibetan refugee identity card.

The report continued that he then quit the UML and later joined Prachanda’s Maoist party, which in Feb 2015 made him a lawmaker.

He was also, earlier, appointed the chairman of the then Monastery Management and Development Committee (later renamed as the Buddhist Philosophy Promotion and Monastery Development Committee), by the Nepali Congress in 2001-02, the report said.

Li Qiang Holds Talks with Prime Minister of Nepal KP Sharma Oli

13 December 2024, Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in the United States of America

On the morning of December 3, 2024, Premier Li Qiang of the State Council held talks with Prime Minister of Nepal KP Sharma Oli, who is on an official visit to China, at the Great Hall of the People in Beijing.

Li Qiang said that China and Nepal are traditional friendly neighbors linked by mountains and rivers. Since the establishment of diplomatic relations nearly 70 years ago, China-Nepal relations have maintained sound and steady development. In 2019, in particular, the bilateral relationship was elevated to the strategic partnership of cooperation featuring ever-lasting friendship for development and prosperity, which has driven the vigorous expansion of exchanges and cooperation in various fields between the two sides and brought tangible benefits to the two peoples. President Xi Jinping will meet with Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli to make a new strategic plan for further deepening bilateral relations. China is ready to work with Nepal to follow through on the important common understandings reached between the leaders of the two countries, continue to consolidate and deepen political mutual trust, push for deeper development of bilateral relations and cooperation, and build an even closer China-Nepal community with a shared future to provide more benefits to the two peoples.

Li Qiang pointed out that China firmly supports Nepal in exploring a development path suited to its national conditions, and is ready to work with Nepal to enhance the synergy of development strategies, leverage the leading role of high-quality Belt and Road cooperation in bilateral cooperation, and actively expand two-way trade and investment, and strengthen connectivity through ports, roads, railways, airlines and telecommunications, adding impetus to Nepal's transformation from a "land-locked country" to a "land-linked country". China encourages competent Chinese enterprises to invest and do business in Nepal and is ready to import more quality products from Nepal. Li Qiang called on the two sides to successfully hold a series of commemorative activities through joint efforts to mark the 70th anniversary of diplomatic relations next year, deepen people-to-people exchanges and sub-national cooperation in tourism, education and medical care, and promote better understanding and amity between the two peoples. China supports Nepal in playing a greater role in international and regional affairs and is ready to fortify coordination and cooperation with Nepal in multilateral fields.

KP Sharma Oli said that under the strong leadership of President Xi Jinping, China has made great achievements in promoting Chinese modernization, high-quality development, and poverty alleviation. The all-round friendly relations between Nepal and China are based on the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence and have grown from strength to strength, setting a fine example of friendly relations between countries with different social systems and of different sizes. Nepal's determination to abide by the one-China principle will not waver, and it will not allow any force to use Nepal's territory for anti-China activities. Nepal believes that Taiwan and Xizang are inalienable parts of China and Xizang-related affairs are China's internal affairs. Nepal appreciates China's long-term support for Nepal's economic and social development and has always regarded China as a reliable partner. Nepal is ready to take the opportunity of the 70th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations next year to further strengthen high-level exchanges with China, consolidate traditional friendship, promote practical cooperation in connectivity, trade, investment, energy, agriculture, tourism, healthcare, people-to-people exchanges and other fields, jointly address common challenges such as climate change, and strengthen coordination on multilateral affairs, so as to achieve greater development in bilateral relations. After the talks, Premier Li Qiang and Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli jointly witnessed the signing of a number of bilateral cooperation documents on economy, technology and trade.

Prior to the talks, Li Qiang held a welcoming ceremony for KP Sharma Oli at the North Hall of the Great Hall of the People.

Nepal shoots down the prospect of Panchen Lama's visit

12 December 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Anil Giri

Foreign ministry told Chinese Embassy the Lama would not be allowed due to Nepal's neutrality on religious matters.

Last week, there was an undercurrent of tension in certain diplomatic circles in Kathmandu after information of the China-backed Panchen Lama visiting Nepal was leaked. Beijing has projected Panchen Lama as the successor to Dalai Lama, a characterisation rejected by Western countries as well as Tibetans refugees in exile.

According to three government officials from different ministries and agencies, as soon as the information of the Panchen Lama's likely visit in mid-December—to attend a function in Lumbini and later an event in Kathmandu—was leaked, officials from Home and Tourism ministries started poring over the list of each and every passenger travelling in chartered flights from Chengdu to Lumbini via Air China. (The tip-off was that he would be travelling via Air China.)

The Panchen Lama was supposed to fly to Lumbini directly from Beijing, along with his security guards and other officials. As of Wednesday evening, no new approval has been sought to land an aircraft in Lumbini with Beijing as its point of origin. Instead, a pre-approved flight on the route was cancelled on the same day, said officials at the Ministry of Tourism.

The Ministry of Culture, Tourism and Civil Aviation gave the approval to organise the religious function in Lumbini and in Kathmandu under the banner of Nanhai Buddhism Round Table-2024.

"We could not spot his name anywhere but he might have multiple passports with multiple names and identities," one home ministry official who was involved in the verification process said. "There are several ways to disguise identity and so we were cautious as well as alert."

Even on Wednesday morning, Home Minister Ramesh Lekhak, Home Secretary Gokarna Mani Duwadi, and acting foreign secretary Amrit Bahadur Rai, among other senior officials, were engaged in a verification process to ascertain whether the Panchen Lama, whose name is Gyaincin Norbu, was actually travelling to Nepal to attend some function.

"He [Panchen Lama] has been trying to visit Nepal for the past ten years and he especially wanted to come here on Buddha Jayanti," Lyarkal Lama, vice-chairman of the Lumbini Development Trust, told the Post. "He is such a powerful person, he can come here only with the permission of our prime minister." Lyarkal will be in Lumbini on December 14 where a special religious function is being held. "As the Panchen Lama is a high-profile Chinese leader equivalent in rank to the Chinese vice president it was impossible for us to give him security," said Lyarkal. "Such security arrangements are a matter to be settled between two governments."

Lyarkal said that the Panchen Lama's visit could add to Nepal's geopolitical challenges and as such he might not visit this time.

After pressure started piling up on the government from both in and outside the country, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs wrote a diplomatic note to the Chinese Embassy and sought a clarification on whether the Panchen Lama was actually visiting Nepal. It also said that the government would not permit him to visit Nepal due to its policy of maintaining neutrality in religious matters.

"We have not allowed the Dalai Lama to come to Nepal," a senior security official said. "By the same token, we also can't allow a similar China-backed religious figure to visit Nepal." The Dalai Lama as well as the Panchen Lama have tried to visit Nepal several times in the past but each time the Nepal government has stopped them from coming.

The Dalai Lama has the backing of Western countries and most of the Tibetan communities in exile, even though China calls him a "separatist".

The foreign minister communicated via the Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu that it cannot permit Norbu, the Chinese Communist Party-backed Panchen Lama, to visit Lumbini to attend a religious function on December 14, said a senior foreign ministry official.

"At least I have not heard about this," Home Minister Lekhak told the Post. "There is no information on his visit."

But it was Lekhak who first came to know about the Panchen Lama's impending visit to Kathmandu and communicated the same to Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba when she was part of Prime Minister KP Oli's delegation in China.

At least 227 Chinese monks and officials of the Buddhist Association of China are arriving in Lumbini on chartered Airbus A330 flight later this week. (The Post has seen the flight details.) The Chinese side had asked for the permission for the chartered flight with the Civil Aviation Authority of Nepal on November 18.

Security sources told the Post that they had the information that the Panchen Lama was likely to visit Lumbini in disguise by hiding among the 227 Chinese monks and officials. If this happened, they feared, it could create a diplomatic and geopolitical crisis.

Four persons aware of this development told the Post that as soon as Prime Minister Oli landed in China on December 2, a communication was received that an Air China chartered flight was coming from Chengdu to Kathmandu in mid-December carrying VIP Buddhist monks.

Later, the information was forwarded to Home Minister Lekhak and Tourism Minister Badri Pandey. Then, Home Minister Lekhak called Foreign Minister Deuba in Beijing to inform her that the China-backed Panchen Lama was visiting Nepal—reportedly, with Prime Minister Oli himself giving the permission for his visit.

After this, Foreign Minister Deuba spoke to Prime Minister Oli and later told Nepali officials that the prime minister was in fact unaware of the Panchen Lama's visit and he had given no such permission.

The Lumbini Development Trust also flagged the matter with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. After the trust wrote a letter to foreign ministry about a possible visit of the Panchen Lama to Nepal, the ministry had sent a diplomatic note to the Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu and sought details of the visit.

The Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu denied that the Panchen Lama was visiting Kathmandu. The government of Nepal also told the Chinese Embassy that it will not allow him to visit for multiple reasons, said foreign ministry officials familiar with the development. Bishnu Rimal, chief political advisor to the Prime Minister Oli, said the information that the Panchen Lama is visiting Nepal is "one hundred percent false."

Foreign Minister Deuba, who is currently on a tour of Europe, told the Post over the phone that news about the visit of the Panchen Lama to Nepal is absolutely incorrect and the government would not allow him to come. "He is not coming," she said. "When we sought clarification from the Chinese Embassy, it also denied that he was coming."

Deuba added, "As soon as we got the information about this, we enquired about it with the Chinese Embassy. Even the home minister and other senior officials were trying to fix the issue but they could not verify that the particular person was coming."

On Tuesday, a 10-member delegation of Chinese monks led by Yin Shun, vice president of the Buddhist Association of China, arrived in Kathmandu and left for Lumbini to lay the ground for the visit of other dignitaries.

They will later join at a function in Kathmandu named 2024 Nanhai Buddhism Round Table on Friday, according to an invitation sent by the Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu.

The 2024 Nanhai Buddhism Round Table will convene on December 13, 2024, reads the Chinese Embassy notice sent to the media.

The event, which will be attended by Buddhists from 20 countries, will end on Sunday.

Correction:

An earlier version of this report erroneously mentioned Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the China-appointed Panchen Lama. In fact, Nyima was appointed by the Dalai Lama. The name of China-appointed Panchen Lama is Gyaincain Norbu. The report has been corrected.

Panchen Lama to make rare visit to Nepal after Tibet trip, reports say

12 December 2024, SCMP, Sylvie Zhuang

The trip, which has not been confirmed by Beijing or Kathmandu, comes months before the Dalai Lama is expected to unveil a succession plan

The Panchen Lama, Tibet's second highest religious figure who sits on China's top political advisory body, will make a rare visit to Nepal, according to Nepalese media reports.

It comes just months before the Dalai Lama, the exiled spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, is expected to reveal a succession plan. That plan is likely to be contested by Beijing, which sees the Dalai Lama as a separatist pushing for Tibetan independence.

Gyaincain Norbu – the Panchen Lama chosen by Chinese authorities – will visit Nepal on a four-day trip from Saturday to attend the South China Sea Buddhism Round Table, news site Nepal Aaja reported on Tuesday.

The visit to Nepal, which is home to a large population of ethnic Tibetans, has not been confirmed by either the Chinese or Nepalese governments.

It follows a visit to China last week by Nepal's Prime Minister K.P. Sharma Oli, when he told Chinese Premier Li Qiang that Kathmandu regards Tibet and Taiwan as inalienable parts of China and that Tibet-related affairs are China's internal affairs.

The purpose of the Panchen Lama's visit is "religious harmony", an official with the Nepalese government's Lumbini Development Trust told news site My Republica on Wednesday.

The Panchen Lama is a member of the Standing Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, as well as vice-president of the state-backed Buddhist Association.

He has just spent five months in Tibet promoting traditional Chinese culture and national unity, state news agency Xinhua reported last week.

Nepal will be just his second foreign trip after a visit to Thailand in 2019.

It comes as the Dalai Lama could soon unveil a succession plan. He has previously said that he would address the issue of his reincarnation – a constant source of tension between Beijing and the Dalai Lama – after he turns 90 in July.

Beijing has accused the Nobel peace laureate of being a "separatist" and of inciting unrest among Tibetans in China in the 1980s and in 2008. There are also concerns that the Dalai Lama's death may trigger social tensions.

The People's Liberation Army seized Tibet in 1950, a year after the Communist Party won the Chinese civil war. The Dalai Lama fled a failed uprising against Chinese rule in 1959 and has lived in exile in India since then.

According to Tibetan Buddhist tradition, when the Dalai Lama dies, he will be reincarnated as a young child. This child must be found through a series of searches and rituals.

The next Dalai Lama must also be recognised by the current Panchen Lama. After the previous Panchen Lama died in 1989, a government-led search team identified a child as his reincarnation through a ritual in 1995 – but the Dalai Lama has refused to recognise the current Panchen Lama.

The Dalai Lama previously proposed ending his reincarnation, which would avoid Beijing's involvement in the matter. But Beijing has insisted that his reincarnation must follow Chinese law.

BRI Cooperation Framework made public

10 December 2024, The Rising Nepal

The Framework for Belt and Road Cooperation signed between Nepal and China on December 4 during Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli's China visit has been made public on Tuesday.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs released the document of the BRI Cooperation Framework.

As stated in the document, the BRI Cooperation Framework was formulated to establish a structured basis to undertake further negotiations on the projects.

"The two sides shall respect each other's sovereignty and common interests and work together to improve people's livelihoods through mutually beneficial and win-win cooperation. This Cooperation Framework will accord due consideration to the developmental stages of China and Nepal, with particular emphasis to Nepal's specific development requirements and priorities," according to the document released.

On cooperation principle, joint consultation for common development, pragmatic cooperation for meaningful effects and policy environment for increased investment have been highlighted.

Likewise, the two sides have concluded this Cooperation Framework to establish and deepen economic partnership to promote the common development of China and Nepal by injecting new momentum to trade, infrastructure and connectivity cooperation by accelerating the development of priority projects; to realize the mutual interests shared by the two sides to give effect to the MoU by providing a structured guidance to undertake negotiations for the implementation of the prospective projects and to identify and develop projects that fall within the scope of the area of cooperation.

The Chinese side will support Nepal's development efforts under the framework of jointly building the Belt and Road, by providing technical and financial assistance. The two sides will work to ensure technical support, and aid financing modalities that suit the need of the two sides and of the requirements for sovereign initiated projects. "The two sides will conduct objective analysis of technical, financial, commercial and economic feasibility and ensure value for money for the prioritized projects. The two sides will continue to call upon international multilateral financial development institutions or mechanisms to provide more financial support for promoting connectivity and development," the Cooperation Framework states.

Similarly, Nepal and China agreed to jointly build the Trans-Himalayan Multidimensional Connectivity Network through the construction of ports, roads including bridges and tunnels, railways, aviation infrastructure, telecommunication projects, electricity transmission lines to upgrade the level of connectivity.

Tokha-Chhahare Tunnel, Hilsa-Simikot Road Project, Kimathanka-Khandbari Road and Kimathanka Bridge and Integrated Check Post Project, Nepali section of the China-Nepal Cross-Border Railway Project, Amargadhi City Hall Project, Jilong-Rasuwasgadhi-Chilime 220 KV Cross Border Power Transmission Line, Madan Bhandari University of Science and Technology, Kathmandu Scientific Center and Science Museum, China-Nepal Friendship Industrial Park and Jhapa Sports and Athletics Complex have been listed as the projects to be developed in the BRI Cooperation Framework.

Nepal referred to Tibet as "Xizang" in a statement issued after its new Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli completed a four-day visit to Beijing this week, his first trip outside the country after his election – not India, as is traditionally the case.

Xizang is a term promoted by Beijing, but Tibetan advocates say it is yet another attempt by China to erase their distinct cultural heritage.

Both moves highlight China's growing influence in Nepal – and its hopes to reap the economic benefits of closer ties to Beijing, experts and Tibetan advocates said.

"The joint declaration between Nepal and China in which the word 'Xizang' is used instead of Tibet shows the lengths to which Nepal is willing to go to appease China," said Sriparna Pathak, an associate professor of China studies at the O.P. Jindal Global University in Haryana, India, and a former consultant at India's foreign ministry.

"This is a complete disregard of the Tibetan cause, the struggle and the history," she told Radio Free Asia.

"This does not augur well at all for Tibetans living in Nepal."

China experts cite the promises of millions of dollars of Chinese investment as a reason for the Nepalese government restricting Tibetan activities in the country.

Oli's extended visit, which ended Thursday, also included an agreement related to China's ambitious Belt and Road Initiative, or BRI, a grand plan to boost global trade through infrastructure development.

In other signs of China's influence, Nepali police regularly detain Tibetans in Kathmandu for "questioning" during high profile visits by Chinese officials.

Authorities also increase surveillance on Tibetan refugee settlements during cultural celebrations like the Tibetan New Year or the birthday of Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama.

Stalled BRI projects

In the joint statement issued this week by Nepal and China, the two sides emphasized the importance of "law enforcement cooperation."

China said it is "willing to provide support for Nepal to the best of its capacity through capacity building, including trainings in the field of combating cyber crimes, and assistance of police supplies."

Nepal signed an initial agreement to join the BRI in 2017, but highway construction and other projects have stalled since then.

Oli's visit included the signing of a framework agreement to get those projects off the ground with feasibility studies.

China has previously promised to transform Nepal from a "landlocked nation into a land-linked hub."

Nepal, in turn, has reaffirmed its allegiance to China, particularly on issues related to Taiwan and Tibet, with the use of Xizang in official documents as the latest example.

'Serving Beijing's agenda'

The term "Xizang" was first used in official Chinese government diplomatic documents in 2023. Chinese Communist Party scholars had advocated for the use of "Xizang," which they have said would help promote China's legitimate occupation and rule of Tibet.

In this week's joint statement, Nepal "reiterated that Xizang affairs are internal affairs of China, and that it will never allow any separatist activities against China on Nepal's soil."

That was another example of China "using its power to make a smaller country serve its political agenda," said Tencho Gyatso, president of Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet.

"Whatever name is used does not alter the fact that the Tibetan people are suffering under China's misrule," she told RFA.

Economic diplomacy

The previous prime minister, Pushpa Kamal Dahal, visited Beijing in September 2023.

The joint statement issued afterward only referred to Tibet – not Xizang – but it did state that Nepal would "never allow any separatist activities against China on Nepal's soil."

Similarly, just after Xi Jinping's visit to Nepal in 2019, Nepal reiterated its "determination on not allowing any anti-China activities on its soil."

"Over the years, the space for Tibetans in Nepal has continued to remain constrained," said Manoj Kewalramani, a China Studies fellow at Bengaluru, India-based Takshashila Institution.

"I think this trend is likely to continue. Beijing has always used economic diplomacy to serve such political ends," he said. "These are among the strings that come with Chinese money."

The BRI framework cooperation agreement highlighted Nepal's preference for grants instead of loans to fund the projects. That issue delayed the signing of the deal for a day, but both countries eventually agreed on Wednesday to a combination of grants and loans in the framework.

Critics have accused China of "debt diplomacy" – trapping nations with financial liabilities for major infrastructure projects they can ill-afford and which then could be leveraged for Beijing's political benefit.

Nepal's Multimillion-Dollar Pilgrimage Industry Crumbles Under China's Tibet Restrictions

07 December 2024, Republic, Yuvraj Tyagi

Nepal's tourism faces a severe setback due to declining tourist arrivals, primarily caused by China's continued ban on Indian pilgrims entering Tibet.

Nepal's tourism industry faces a severe downturn as a significant decline in Indian tourist arrivals continues, attributed in part to China's ban on Indian pilgrims entering Tibet for the Kailash-Manasarovar pilgrimage. According to a report by Kathmandupost.com on December 2, 2024, Nepal

Tourism Board officials highlighted that the ongoing restrictions have dealt a devastating blow to the nation's economy, particularly its tourism-dependent sectors.

For decades, Nepal served as a gateway for Indian pilgrims travelling to Mount Kailash and Lake Manasarovar, sacred destinations in Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism, and Bonism. Despite the reopening of Nepal-Tibet border points in May, Beijing has maintained strict restrictions on Indian nationals wishing to undertake this pilgrimage. Analysts believe these restrictions stem from lingering geopolitical tensions between India and China, leaving Nepal caught in the crossfire of strained bilateral relations.

Impact on Nepal's Economy

The disruption of the Kailash-Manasarovar pilgrimage has wreaked havoc on Nepal's tourism economy. The pilgrimage, typically held from April to October, once brought an influx of Indian tourists, generating significant revenue for multiple sectors, including tour operators, hotels, airlines, and helicopter services.

"The absence of Indian pilgrims has devastated the multimillion-dollar businesses of hotels, porters, and transport operators," said Basu Adhikari, Managing Director of Touch Kailash Travel and Treks, a report by Kathmandu Post stated.

The downturn has created a ripple effect, pushing businesses to the brink of collapse. Many stakeholders have urged urgent action to address the financial shortfall and support affected communities.

Broader Challenges in Nepal's Tourism Sector

China's restrictions are not the only hurdles facing Nepal's tourism industry. Rising airfares have made travel to Nepal cost-prohibitive for many potential visitors. Additionally, a spate of high-profile bus and aeroplane accidents has raised safety concerns, further deterring international travellers.

These compounded challenges have significantly reduced visitor arrivals, exacerbating the financial strain on an industry already grappling with the aftermath of the COVID-19 pandemic. Stakeholders warn that without immediate intervention to enhance safety standards and reduce travel costs, Nepal risks losing its foothold as a favoured destination for global travellers.

Diversifying Nepal's Tourism Offerings

In response to the crisis, Nepal is working to diversify its tourism sector by promoting alternative attractions and experiences. However, stakeholders agree that the potential reopening of Tibet to Indian pilgrims remains pivotal to reviving the industry.

The Kailash-Manasarovar pilgrimage has long been a cornerstone of Nepal's tourism revenue. Its absence underscores the urgent need for long-term strategies to reduce dependency on pilgrimage tourism. Efforts are underway to promote Nepal's adventure tourism, heritage sites, and eco-tourism opportunities.

A Difficult Path to Recovery

The future of Nepal's tourism industry depends heavily on China's willingness to lift its ban on Indian pilgrims travelling to Tibet. Without this critical source of revenue, Nepal faces an uphill battle in stabilizing its tourism-dependent economy.

Beyond geopolitical factors, Nepal must address internal issues, including safety concerns and high travel costs, to regain the trust of international visitors. The current crisis highlights the fragile nature of Nepal's tourism sector and its vulnerability to external influences.

While stakeholders remain hopeful for a resurgence, Nepal's path to recovery will require concerted efforts from the government, private sector, and international partners. The lifting of restrictions on the Kailash-Manasarovar pilgrimage could serve as a turning point, revitalizing the industry and bringing much-needed economic relief to the nation.

Nepal PM Oli reaffirms 'One China' policy, bans anti-China activities

Nepal's Prime minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli, on Tuesday, reiterated the country's strong commitment to the 'One China' policy, stating that no anti-China activities will be permitted on Nepali soil. Oli made these remarks during an official visit to China, where he met with Chinese President Xi Jinping at the State Hall in Beijing.

In the meeting, Oli emphasized Nepal's position that issues concerning Tibet and Taiwan are internal affairs of China and that both regions are integral to Chinese sovereignty. The leaders discussed a wide range of bilateral topics, including connectivity, industrial and infrastructural development, medical and agricultural cooperation, trade and tourism, investment, science and technology, disaster management, sports, and poverty alleviation. Krishna Prasad Dhakal, spokesperson for Nepal's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, disclosed that the discussions culminated in the signing of a nine-point agreement encompassing several Memorandums of Understanding (MoUs).

The agreements include projects like the Tokha-Chhare tunnel to connect Nepal with the Tibet border, reconstruction of the Basantpur Durbar damaged in the 2015 earthquake, export of buffalo meat, deployment of Chinese language teachers, cash assistance worth $41 million, and initiatives in economic and technical cooperation, as well as media exchanges.

Oli, a pro-China leader and chair of the Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), has consistently praised Xi Jinping's policies, particularly in poverty alleviation and development. However, the deepening ties between Nepal and China have sparked concerns over the treatment of Tibetan refugees in Nepal, whose rights have been increasingly curtailed in recent years.

A 2023 report by the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) and the Asian Dignity Initiative, titled Languishing in Limbo: Tibetan Refugees in Nepal, revealed a marked deterioration in the rights of Tibetan refugees. The report highlighted that Nepal's economic dependence on China, tied to its adherence to the 'One China' policy, has led to restrictive measures such as halting the issuance of Refugee Cards (RCs), banning cultural and religious celebrations, and prohibiting public commemorations of the Dalai Lama's birthday.

This is not the first time Oli has affirmed Nepal's commitment to the 'One China' policy. He made similar statements in October 2024 during a high-level meeting in Kathmandu with a Chinese delegation led by Chen Jining, a senior Communist Party official. Similar commitments were also expressed during Xi Jinping's 2019 visit to Nepal and Oli's 2018 official trip to China.

Oli, serving his fourth term as Prime Minister since succeeding Pushpa Kamal Dahal (Prachanda) in July, has visited Beijing twice during previous terms. In a break from tradition, his first visit during his new term was to China instead of India, reportedly due to the absence of an invitation from New Delhi. The visit occurs against the backdrop of stalled Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects between Nepal and China, originally signed in 2017 with much enthusiasm but with little progress to date.

November

Nepal Foreign Minister to visit China tomorrow to lay grounds for PM Oli's visit

27 November 2024, ANI

Nepal's Foreign Minister, Arzu Rana Deuba, is set to embark on an official visit to China from tomorrow, Nepal's Ministry of Foreign Affairs announced on Wednesday.

The Ministry said that Rana will be holding a meeting with Chinese counterpart during her three-day visits along with the preparatory talks about Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli's expected visit on the first week of December.

"Foreign Minister is scheduled to hold a bilateral talk with Wang Yi, Minister for Foreign Affairs of China on 29 November 2024. The two leaders will have comprehensive discussions on matters of mutual interest between the two countries including the preparation of the upcoming official visit of Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli to China," the release stated. Nepal PM Oli is expected to visit China from December 2, which he had announced during a public gathering in the capital Kathmandu last week. It comes at a heel when debate about signing the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) pact needs to be signed or not. The Nepali Congress and the CPN-UML government, led by Prime Minister Oli himself, have not been able to build trust over the issue.

Nepali Congress, the largest party in the federal parliament and the ruling coalition member on Wednesday also advised Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli to proceed cautiously with China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), arguing that the projects should not increase Nepal's debt burden.

The party conveyed this message during a high-level meeting held at party president Sher Bahadur Deuba's residence in Budhanilkantha on Wednesday. Top Nepali Congress leaders, including Foreign Minister Arzu Rana, Home Minister Ramesh Lekhak, and party spokesperson Prakash Sharan Mahat, were in attendance.

Mahat, who served as Foreign Minister when Nepal signed the BRI Framework Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) in 2017, clarified the Nepali Congress's stance to reporters after the meeting.

"We have no reservations about implementing BRI projects," he said. "But taking on unsustainable debt is not acceptable. The projects must align with the country's financial capacity and long-term interests." Nepal has identified nine projects under the BRI, including tunnel construction, road development, and a railway connection to the northern border with China.

Mahat said that the Nepali Congress is in favour of seeking assistance from China, including grants and technical support, but warned against dependency on loans that could strain the national economy.

Highlighting Nepal's delicate geopolitical position, Mahat stressed the need for balanced foreign policy. "China is Nepal's neighbour, and we must maintain excellent and friendly relations with them. However, agreements should prioritize Nepal's national interests, ensuring long-term benefits for the country," he said.

The BRI initiative, introduced by China in 2014, is an ambitious global infrastructure project aiming to enhance connectivity. Nepal became part of the initiative after signing the MoU on May 12, 2017.

However, concerns about the financial implications of such large-scale projects have been a point of debate among policymakers. President Deuba and other senior Congress leaders reiterated the importance of Nepal maintaining strong ties with both China and India, focusing on agreements that bolster national interests regardless of changes in political leadership.

The Nepali Congress's recommendations now rest with Prime Minister Oli, who holds the authority to make the final decision on moving forward with the BRI projects. As Nepal navigates its involvement in this ambitious initiative, balancing opportunities with economic prudence will remain a key challenge.

Nepal readies new BRI deal ahead of PM's China visit

26 November 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Anil Giri

Chinese Ambassador Chen irked by Prime Minister Oli's public remarks on loans, media's debt trap accusations.

Seven years after the signing of the framework of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), Nepal and China could ink another framework for cooperation on the BRI during Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli's upcoming visit to China in the first week of December.

A Cabinet meeting on Monday approved the China visit of Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba, which starts Thursday. She will be accompanied by some foreign ministry officials during the visit and meet Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi on Friday in Beijing, according to a minister.

Nepal and China had signed the first framework (Memorandum of Understanding) on the BRI in May 2017, but not a single project under it has been implemented. The new framework will prevail over the 2017 agreement in case of disputes or conflicts.

Both sides are now preparing to sign the second framework, an extended version of cooperation document that explicitly focuses on seeking grants from China to fund the projects identified therein.

A top government official told the Post that the document which was prepared by the four-member Nepali Congress and CPN-UML taskforce has landed for final approval at the Office of the Prime Minister and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. This Nepali version of the framework on jointly building BRI projects has inputs from various government agencies and the Nepali Congress in particular.

"If Prime Minister Oli and Congress President Sher Bahadur Deuba agree to it, the text prepared by the Nepali side will be sent to the Chinese side for final approval. If they also approve, the document will be signed during Oli's meeting with Chinese President Xi Jinping in Beijing on December 3 or 4," said the source.

Prime Minister Oli, who is under pressure even from within his party, other leftist parties, and China itself, to sign a BRI-related agreement, has now set aside the BRI implementation plan initially proposed by the Chinese side in early 2020. Instead he has prepared this new counter document titled "Framework for Cooperation on jointly building the BRI," which will be shared with the Chinese side after the Cabinet's approval.

According to a foreign ministry official, during a meeting with Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba on Sunday, Chinese ambassador to Nepal Chen Song had criticised Prime Minister Oli and the Nepali media for commenting on various issues of Nepal-China relations.

Ambassador Chen expressed displeasure over Prime Minister Oli's remarks at a rally in Durbarmarg, where Oli, in front of thousands of people, declared that Nepal would not seek loans from any country. Oli, at the rally on Friday, had also declared that his visit to China would be successful on multiple fronts.

The Chinese envoy was also unhappy with certain media reports in Nepal and India commenting on the latest status of Nepal-China relations, Oli's upcoming visit, and accusations of a debt trap, an official who was present at the meeting told the Post.

The manner in which the Chinese ambassador expressed his dissatisfaction prompted the Nepali side to come to some kind of agreement with China, said officials and leaders in the know. They were trying to explain why Nepal became ready to sign an amended version of the BRI implementation plan. Oli had received a green signal from the Nepali Congress, a key ally in the government, to modify the BRI implementation plan into a new framework for cooperation. This four-member taskforce amended several clauses proposed by the Chinese side, according to ruling party leaders, who refused to divulge the actual content.

A meeting between Oli and Congress chief Sher Bahadur Deuba last Tuesday had decided to revise the text of the BRI implementation plan. The title of the document was also changed from "Implementation Plan of the BRI" to "Framework for Cooperation on Jointly Building the BRI," according to a pair of Congress and UML leaders.

Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba told the Post that the Congress and UML leaders are in the final stages of negotiations on the framework document. The agendas and joint communique of the visit are yet to be finalised.

Prime Minister Oli is scheduled to visit China on December 2, while Foreign Minister Deuba will head for China on Thursday to lay the groundwork for his trip.

On Monday, Oli consulted former prime ministers and foreign ministers at his office and sought advice on Nepal-China relations. While most spoke in favour of strengthening ties with China and maintaining balance with neighbours and major powers, they did not offer any concrete suggestions for the visit.

They were divided on the type of cooperation and assistance Nepal should seek, while some advised that Nepal's focus should be on implementing past accords and agreements rather than signing new ones.

Several Congress leaders including Dr Shekhar Koirala and former foreign minister NP Saud have been saying that Nepal should not sign an "umbrella agreement" or an agreement covering "comprehensive" issues and that Nepal should not align with any powers.

According to leaders privy to the revised draft, the document retains the areas that were proposed in the BRI implementation plan, but has modified and expanded the content.

The new draft has sections on cooperation background; cooperation principles (joint consultation for common development, pragmatic cooperation for meaningful effects, market orientation with government guidance); cooperation priorities (transport, connectivity and logistic cooperation, trade industrial capacity and investment cooperation); and economic and financial sector cooperation.

Other areas covered are education, science and technology cooperation; intellectual property, measurement, standards, and conformity assessment cooperation; agriculture, forestry and water conservation sector; energy saving and environment protection; geosciences sector; customs clearance; health sector cooperation; and cultural and tourism exchange.

Both the texts—the one from 2017 and the current one—have provisions for cooperation mechanisms.

The new document prioritises grants for sovereign-initiated projects, as instructed by Oli and Deuba.

Earlier China had proposed several financing modalities for BRI projects depending on their financial viability. These included multi-channel funding, innovation of financing models and diversified financing tools.

"The two sides will explore the possibilities of implementing new and innovative project financing instruments, as appropriate, such as public private partnership and blended financing," according to the BRI implementation plan proposed by the Chinese side.

Ahead of the visit of Prime Minister Oli to China, there was widespread interest about whether Nepal will sign the plan originally proposed by Beijing. A second issue was whether Nepal would accept loans. Despite reservations from different quarters and communist party leaders, after intense pressure from the Congress, the prime minister had made it clear in public forums as well as during Monday's consultations with former prime ministers and foreign ministers that Nepal is not going to take loans to finance BRI projects.

During Monday's meeting, some former foreign ministers including NP Saud had cautioned the prime minister not to sign a comprehensive implementation plan of the BRI. "But there was a tacit understanding even within the Congress that we needed to make some kind of an arrangement on the BRI so that the party could continue in the government," said one Congress leader. "As we have not seen the content of the new cooperation framework, we cannot comment on that."

On the day, Congress chief Deuba had discussed the new framework agreement with Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba and Nepali Congress General Secretary Gagan Thapa. Later, the Congress chief flew to Janakpur where he reiterated that while Nepal should accept grants under the BRI, it should avoid taking loans.

"Our debt is now 41 percent of the GDP, which is alarming," said Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba. "The private sector can take loans but the government is not in a position to do so."

Security deals related to Tibet-border on agenda of Nepali PM's visit to China

23 November 2024, Tibetan Review

As Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli of Nepal prepares to visit China from Dec 2, proposed items on his agenda under consideration include a proposal to sign an agreement related to boundary management and security cooperation agreed during Chinese President Xi Jinping's visit to Nepal in 2019, reported the kathmandupost.com Nov 23.

The report cited an official as saying the implementation agreement between the governments of China and Nepal on the Boundary Management System is also part of the agreement, with a copy of the proposed agreement having already been submitted to the House of Representatives.

Also on Oli's agenda is stated to be a plan to sign a memorandum of understanding between the Ministry of Public Security of China and Nepal's Ministry of Home Affairs on the establishment of a Boundary Contact System at three levels.

The Chinese side—and especially security officials from Tibet—has for long been pushing for Nepal to accept the boundary contact system at federal, provincial and local levels, the report said.

Another proposal is said to include signing a memorandum of understanding on law enforcement cooperation between Nepal and China, with provisions for Chinese support in immigration and security on the Nepali side of the border.

The reports cites a long list of items on Oli's China visit agenda, topped by some key cross-border infrastructure and connectivity projects, including joint projects under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI).

Among the proposals exchanged between the two sides is China's offer of a $20 million grant as budgetary support to Nepal, even as the latter's Ministry of Finance expressed dissatisfaction with the amount, the report said.

The report cited officials from various ministries as saying Nepal was preparing a long list of projects to be developed under the framework of the BRI as well as other cross-border infrastructure and connectivity-related projects. This also includes implementing projects agreed during past high-level visits.

The funding modality of these projects is yet to be discussed, the report cited officials as saying, adding that the final list would be handed over to the Chinese.

Nepali Congress, the main coalition partner of Oli's CPN (UML), is known to be opposed to the latter's willingness to accept normal funding for the BRI projects being insisted upon by China, as it entails high interest rates and the danger of debt trap.

My visit to China won't harm Nepal's ties with India: PM Oli

21 November 2024, Asia News

Traditionally, Nepali prime ministers have made India their first port of call after assuming office. However, after failing to receive an invitation from India for several weeks, PM Oli went to New York to attend the 79th session of the UN General Assembly where he met Indian PM Modi, Chinese FM Yi, and several other world leaders.

Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli said that his upcoming China visit will not hurt Nepal's ties with India.

Speaking at the concluding session of the Kantipur Conclave in Kathmandu on Thursday, the prime minister, who is set to visit China in the first week of December, stated there is no reason for his visit to harm relations with India just because he is going to China first than India.

"We are a sovereign nation and we have never said that we won't visit India," the prime minister said, adding, "We choose to go where it is convenient."

Traditionally, Nepali prime ministers have made India their first port of call after assuming office. However, after failing to receive an invitation from India for several weeks, the prime minister went to New York to attend the 79th session of the UN General Assembly where he met Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi, and several other world leaders.

"I went to the US to attend the UN General Assembly because the UN is [headquartered] in the US, where I met several world leaders, but it does not mean that I wanted to visit the US first," said Oli, adding, "We are surrounded by two great neighbours and we have to maintain good relations with them."

"And my visit to China will not damage our relations with India. Our relations with India are deep, historical, based on culture and tradition, and predate the formation of modern states. We are sovereign nations and make foreign trips as per our convenience," said Oli.

Oli was speaking at the Kantipur Conclave's concluding session moderated by Kantipur Editor-in-Chief Umesh Chauhan on Thursday.

During the interaction, Oli discussed a range of domestic issues including the country's economy, national politics, issue of constitution amendment, relations between the federal and provincial governments, and the arrest of Rastriya Swatantra Party chairman and former deputy prime minister Rabi Lamichhane, among other things.

Responding to the ongoing street protests by Rastriya Swatantra Party supporters opposing the arrest of their party chief, and the calls by some groups calling for the restoration of monarchy and dissolution of the current constitution, the prime minister said he is ready for any kind of open discussion on these issues.

He said he welcomes dialogues on the future of the political system, but won't allow the constitution to be torn down.

Oli also defended the progress made over the last three decades (since the restoration of democracy in 1990), highlighting significant strides in infrastructure. "Road networks have now reached 98 percent of the country."

On the arrest of Lamichhane, who is in police custody on charges of cooperatives fraud, the prime minister stated that he cannot protect Lamichhane if he had committed wrongdoings.

"The court will look into his case...if someone makes mistakes and blames others, it is unacceptable," said Oli.

Oli also gave some background on how he had helped Lamichhane and hired him as a television anchor when he was jobless. "I gave him the job, and he later joined politics," said Oli, adding that he would not tolerate corruption.

I favoured him, but I never thought that Rabi was involved in cooperative scam," said Oli, and claimed that he was initially against forming the parliamentary probe, but Pushpa Kamal Dahal and Lamichhane himself requested such a probe.

Rastriya Swatantra Party's protests and demonstrations "aimed at pressuring the court" are unacceptable, Oli said, adding, "Let the law take its course."

The prime minister also dismissed the allegations that the government was working on a new law on political parties to facilitate party splits. "There is a void so we have to bring a new law," he said, adding "The UML does not need to be the largest party to claim the premiership." It is believed that the government wants to make party splits easier, because the UML wants to merge dissident groups in a few parties including the CPN (Unified Socialist) and the Janata Samajbadi Party into its fold.

Speaking at the conclave, the prime minister said the government will bring laws to support provincial governments.

"We will review the constitution. We will enact laws. We will provide them [provinces] the required rights."

BRI debate drags on as Chinese envoy lobbies Congress

19 November 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Anil Giri

The conundrum over signing of the Implementation Plan of the Belt and Road Initiative during Prime Minister KP Oli's upcoming China visit persists. Two key ruling parties—the Nepali Congress and the CPN-UML—remain at odds over several proposals in the implementation plan.

Besides holding regular communications with Prime Minister Oli and senior UML leaders, Chinese Ambassador Chen Song has intensified diplomatic lobbying within the Nepali Congress in order to drum up support for the signing of the implementation plan during Oli's visit, which is scheduled for the first week of December. An official announcement of the visit, however, is yet to be made.

Recently, according to Congress leaders, the Chinese envoy has met Congress Vice President Purna Bahadur Khadka, senior leaders Shekhar Koirala, Bimalendra Nidhi, and Minendra Rijal, among others, to get the desired support.

Oli and his party have expressed their intent to sign the BRI implementation plan, but the Congress remains wary about signing such a document. The party, however, recognises the BRI and is keen to develop connectivity and infrastructure projects on a project-by-project basis.

During his first visit to China in 2018, Prime Minister Oli had proposed 35 projects under the BRI and these were later whittled down to nine at China's request, an office bearer of the Nepali Congress said. "We want to follow the same modality of negotiating individual projects under the BRI, and the investment model should be decided through such negotiations," he said.

Congress General Secretary Gagan Thapa said the party's position on BRI projects is clear. "Be it a loan or a grant, we prefer negotiating individual projects with China."

Several Congress leaders familiar with the BRI implementation plan document have said that Nepal should not sign any document with broader strategic and geopolitical implications.

The draft of the BRI implementation plan seen by the Post reads: "As per the understanding reached during Chinese President Xi Jinping's state visit to Nepal in October 2021, the two sides decided to, on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence, the UN charter and principles of good neighbourliness, elevate Nepal-China Comprehensive Partnership of Cooperation Featuring Ever-lasting Friendship to Strategic Partnership of Cooperation Featuring Ever-lasting Friendship for Development and Prosperity."

The draft document further says "the two sides also decided to strengthen the all-round cooperation and promote the overall development of the bilateral relations and based on consensus reached at the highest political level."

Prime Minister Oli and Nepali Congress President Sher Bahadur Deuba met on Monday to discuss the BRI implementation plan before giving their final word to the Chinese side.

Officials at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of Finance urged the political leadership to quickly decide on the plan, with Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba heading to China on November 28 to meet her Chinese counterpart Wang Yi in Beijing on November 29. The two sides are expected to finalise the agenda of Prime Minister Oli's visit and the agreements and MoUs to be signed.

"We are waiting for the political leadership to take a final call," a joint secretary at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said. "A counter proposal will be sent, seeking some amendments to the implementation plan."

"We have reservations as the document mainly reflects Chinese priorities rather than ours. The plan should be such that we too can own it up and be able to derive tangible benefits. We want to see our projects, priorities and terms reflected in any discussion on the BRI," said an official at the Ministry of Finance, and his ideas were seconded by another official at the foreign ministry.

Officials at the two ministries said they want to narrow down differences between Nepal and China on the BRI implementation plan and propose changes in areas such as cooperation among law enforcement agencies, cooperation in science and technology, and a common position between Nepal and China in international forums.

Under the "cooperation principles" in the draft agreement, the Chinese side has proposed joint consultation for common development where both sides will uphold the spirit of the Silk Road, respect each other's sovereignty and core national interests, and work together to improve people's livelihoods through mutually beneficial cooperation.

The Chinese side has proposed several initiatives under the subtitles "pragmatic cooperation for meaningful effects" and "market orientation with government guidance" and offered to jointly develop the Trans-Himalayan Multi Dimensional Connectivity Network through the construction of ports, roads (including bridges and tunnels), railways, aviation infrastructure, telecom projects, and electricity transmission lines.

"The two sides will utilise existing China-Nepal intergovernmental consultation and cooperation mechanisms for advancing cooperation under the BRI, and carry out the China-Nepal cross border railway project, including tunnels along the roads (Kerung-Kathmandu) after the accomplishment of feasibility study," the Chinese proposal reads.

It also mentions that the two sides will cooperate on the construction of cross-border road and tunnel projects, dry ports, integrated check posts, a China-Nepal friendship industrial park, and enhance cross border economic cooperation.

During Oli's visit, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs plans to sign a memorandum of understanding for the construction of the Tokha-Chhahare tunnel project, with Nepal's Ministry of Finance and China International Development Cooperation Agency (CIDCA) as signatories.

Similarly, the Chinese side has proposed co-building the 'Air Silk Route', which will involve close communication on traffic rights agreements, the development of and opening of additional air routes, and the enhancement of aviation logistics infrastructure. "Both sides aim to expedite efforts to implement relevant transit transport agreements by improving infrastructures, procedures and coordination," said the draft plan.

Under the subtitle "Trade, industrial capacity and investment modality," the plan proposes enhancing cooperation in bilateral trade and trade infrastructure, improving border cargo facility, promoting e-commerce, promoting capacity building, and sharing best practices and innovative experiences.

"The two sides will strengthen cooperation in energy development by doing feasibility studies, building cross-border transmission lines and carrying out power trade for the utilisation of energy resources," said the plan where it is also stated that the Chinese side will facilitate Nepal's participation in the China International Import Export Expo and similar expos.

Under the title "Economic and financial sector cooperation," the Chinese side will support Nepal's development efforts under the BRI by providing financial and governmental assistance. Both sides will, under the Guiding Principles on Financing the Development of the Belt and Road Principles and green investment principles for the BRI, explore various financing cooperation modalities.

The financial institutions of the two countries will be mobilised, innovative financial models will be developed, and the opportunity for the utilisation of diversified financing tools will be explored to finance bilateral projects.

"The two sides will explore the possibilities of implementing new and innovative project financing instruments, as appropriate, such as public private partnership and blended financing," states the plan document seen by the Post.

The plan also proposes a long list of cooperation models between the central banks of Nepal and China, including the possibility of trading in local currencies for bilateral trade transactions.

Other areas of cooperation identified in the BRI implementation plan include education, science and technology; intellectual property, measurement, standards and conformity assessment cooperation; agriculture, forestry and water conservation sector; energy saving and environmental protection; geosciences sector; customs clearance; health sector cooperation; and cultural and tourism exchange.

The Chinese side has proposed numerous new projects and programs under the framework of BRI and other forums. It also stated that the leaders of the two countries will continue to meet, and close communication will be maintained between the government sectors of the two countries at multilateral and bilateral events—an approach that, according to Nepali officials, the Nepali side has objected to.

The plan will be effective from the date of signature and will remain in effect for five years, upon the expiry of which it will be automatically renewed for successive five-year periods unless either side notifies the other side in writing of its intention to terminate it—at least three months before its expiry.

Amrit Rai, spokesman of the foreign ministry, said the status of the BRI implementation plan is under discussion at the top political level and he thus has no updates. He added that the ministry has been receiving dozens of project proposals from line ministries in lieu of Prime Minister Oli's impending China visit.

China's BRI rattles Nepal's ruling coalition

13 November 2024, The Annapurna Express,
Kamal Dev Bhattarai

The China factor risks widening the rift between the Congress and the UML

China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) has once again unsettled Nepal's coalition government, formed in July. Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli is preparing for an official visit to China, but two key coalition partners—the CPN-UML and the Nepali Congress (NC)—remain divided on advancing BRI projects. While Oli, who leads the UML, advocates for BRI projects, the NC opposes taking loans under BRI, fearing it could lead Nepal into debt.

Since 2022, the NC has consistently communicated its opposition to financing BRI projects through loans, a stance championed by NC President Sher Bahadur Deuba during his tenure as prime minister. Conversely, the UML and other leftist factions argue that Nepal should make headway on BRI to balance its acceptance of the US-backed Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) and to maintain geopolitical equilibrium.

To reconcile these differences, Prime Minister Oli is negotiating with the NC. Currently, there are three major issues regarding BRI. First is the signing of the BRI implementation plan, which was drafted during former Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal's visit to China in September last year.. Second, although Nepal has proposed four projects under BRI, the coalition partners have yet to agree on an investment model. Third, Nepal has requested China to waive the loan for constructing the Pokhara International Airport, where alleged corruption in the airport's construction has also become a point of contention.

To date, Nepal has only signed a BRI framework agreement in 2017, outlining general directions for the initiative. However, debates have since persisted, particularly around China's claim that certain infrastructure projects, like the Pokhara airport, are part of BRI, a claim rejected by Dahal's administration. Additionally, Nepal wants Chinese grants for BRI projects, but China's official position states that BRI funding only involves loans, not grants, facilitated by the Chinese government. Nepal has proposed that, if loans are necessary, the interest rates should align with those of the World Bank and other international lenders.

The 2017 BRI agreement outlines cooperation in policy exchange, connectivity, trade, financial integration and people-to-people interactions. Although the agreement allows for flexibility in cooperation areas, the debate in Nepal has focused largely on infrastructure and financial arrangements. A recent 2023 Chinese white paper describes BRI as a joint venture rather than a form of foreign aid, emphasizing collaborative development. "The principle of extensive consultation signifies that the BRI is not a solo endeavor by China, but a collaborative effort involving all stakeholders. The principle of joint contribution highlights that the BRI is not one of China's international aid programs or a geopolitical tool, but a collaborative effort for shared development."

According to the MoU signed in 2017, the BRI does not include grants and primarily involves loans, with a possible contribution from Nepal. Nevertheless, the framework agreement does leave room for mutual agreements on funding sources.

The document states: "Adaptation of appropriate modes of cooperation for mutual benefit to support development and implementation of major programs in the BRI and provisions of investment, financing and technological support for these programs through mutually agreed sources of funds, and strengthening of exchange and cooperation to ensure program's sustainability and safety."

There is also contention regarding China's integration of numerous activities under the BRI umbrella. However, the 2017 framework does explicitly include areas like cultural exchange, media, health, tourism, agriculture, parliamentary visits and cross-border exchanges—reflecting the current scope of China's involvement in Nepal. Thus, while BRI has become a significant component of bilateral cooperation, other forms of collaboration can still occur outside BRI's framework.

Comparing China's current engagement with the BRI document, there is a common ground between the two countries. In that sense, it seems that Nepal is already a part of BRI and scores of programs are in progress under the BRI. But it does not mean that bilateral cooperation can happen only under the BRI. The document has clearly mentioned that even if the MoU signed in 2017 is terminated, it will not affect any ongoing projects between two countries.

As for the BRI implementation plan and project selection, officials indicate that these steps primarily signify another principle agreement, not one that includes financing details or loan agreements. A senior UML leader said, "It's similar to the 2017 MoU, without raising the loan concerns voiced by the Nepali Congress." Although a final investment structure may not be concluded during Oli's visit, there could be a consensus to include specific projects under BRI, though the NC may resist finalizing these agreements.

The China factor is a sensitive issue that risks widening the rift between NC and UML leaders. Oli is actively engaging with NC and Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba to manage these differences. Tensions between the NC and China have escalated recently, driven by the NC's stance on alleged border encroachments in Humla and its critical position on BRI. Additionally, external pressures may be influencing the NC to limit Nepal's engagement with China, complicating the situation further. NC leaders have openly stated that BRI should also follow the model of MCC, which involves primarily US grants with minimal Nepali investment.

Prime Minister's prioritizing of China visit becomes political issue in Nepal

18 November 2024, Tibetan Review

Nepal's ruling coalition partner CPN-UML has condemned remarks made by former prime minister and the CPN (Maoist Centre) Chairman Pushpa Kamal Dahal regarding Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli's upcoming visit to China. The issue arises from the fact that the planned trip is a departure from the established tradition where the Prime Minister first visits the country's historical ally India after assuming office.

In an interview with Indian newspaper The Hindu earlier this week, Dahal claimed that Oli was "playing the China card" in relation to his planned trip, noted the kathmandupost.com Nov 16.

Oli is scheduled to make a five-day official visit to China from Dec 2 to 6 at the invitation of his Chinese counterpart, Li Qiang, although an official announcement is awaited, the report said.

Oli's breach of tradition was also covered in an indianexpress.com report on Nov 3, and it was not clear whether he had received an invitation from India before approaching Beijing for his China trip.

The kathmandupost.com report cited the ruling UML party as calling Dahal's accusation "baseless, irresponsible, and damaging to Nepal's sovereignty and foreign policy".

"Nepal does not require external approval for its diplomatic relations," UML Secretary Raghubir

Mahaseth, who also heads the party's foreign affairs department, has said in a statement. He has maintained that Oli's visit is a reflection of Nepal's independent foreign policy, not a "card diplomacy" as Dahal suggested.

The UML was also stated to have stressed the importance of maintaining balanced relationships with both India and China for Nepal's development and prosperity. The party has warned that Dahal's comments could jeopardise Nepal's strong and equitable ties with both nations.

Oli is seen as the most pro-China of Nepali leaders and has on occasions taken pot-shots at New Delhi, including during the Covid-19 pandemic.

The UML statement was further cited as saying Dahal's comments undermined Nepal's sovereignty and national pride, suggesting Dahal was "using political manoeuvres that compromise the nation's integrity."

Still, many have described Oli's decision to go to China in his first bilateral visit after assuming office in mid-July as his preference for the northern neighbour and fear the move may irk the southern neighbour, the report noted.

In general, Nepali prime ministers traditionally chose New Delhi as their first bilateral visit after assuming the office, the report added.

"We are a sovereign nation and we have never said that we won't visit India," Oli himself was quoted as saying. "We choose to go where it is convenient."

Dahal led a collation government with Oli's UML until he was ousted when the latter ditched it to partner with Nepali Congress and other, small parties in mid-July this year.

Meanwhile, amid reports of discord within the UML leadership, Dahal has expressed confidence that his party will be back in power again.

"Our party is the government in waiting. The government that will be formed by overthrowing this one will be ours, so there is nothing to worry about," english.khabarhub.com Nov 16 quoted him as saying, speaking at a meeting of the Maoists' Kavre-Kathmandu Liaison Committee that day.

CPN-UML Condemns Former PM Prachanda's Remarks on PM Oli's China Visit

17 November 2024, Radio Nepal Online

The Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist) (CPN-UML) has strongly condemned remarks made by former Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal, leader of the CPN-Maoist, in a recent interview with The Hindu. Dahal accused Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli of "using the China card" and labelled his decision to visit China as "proof of immaturity."

In a statement issued on Thursday, CPN-UML's Secretary and Chief of the Department of Foreign Affairs, Raghuraj Mahaseth, termed the comments baseless and irresponsible. He argued that they undermine Nepal's sovereignty and disregard its independent foreign policy.

The party emphasized that Nepal's diplomatic decisions are a sovereign matter and require no external validation. It further accused Dahal of jeopardizing Nepal's balanced relationships with its neighbours, India and China, with his remarks.

The statement highlighted PM Oli's leadership in maintaining Nepal's neutral and pragmatic foreign policy, which aligns with principles of non-alignment and peaceful coexistence. The CPN-UML also called on Dahal to retract his statements and apologize for what it described as a breach of diplomatic decorum. The controversy has sparked debate over Nepal's foreign policy amid efforts to maintain balanced ties with its neighbors.

Chinese VP offers help to overcome security challenges in Pakistan

14 November 2024, The Express Tribune
Shehbaz vows to root out terrorism from country.

Chinese Vice Premier Ding Xuexiang offered to work with Pakistan to overcome security challenges and further expand Pak-China cooperation during a meeting with Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif on the sidelines of the COP29 Climate Action Summit on Wednesday.

On Tuesday, Reuters quoted sources as saying that Beijing is pushing Islamabad to allow its own security staff to provide protection to thousands of Chinese citizens working in Pakistan during the bilateral talks after a car bombing in Karachi killed two Chinese engineers on October 6.

In the Baku meeting, the prime minister and the Chinese vice premier discussed bilateral cooperation in various fields. During the meeting, Shehbaz highlighted the steps taken by the government for the security of the Chinese nationals in Pakistan.

He also highlighted the steps taken by the government to completely eradicate the menace of terrorism and reiterated that the government was committed to root out terrorism from the country, according to a press release issued by the Prime Minister Office Media Wing.

Last month's airport bombing in Karachi killed two Chinese engineers, the latest in a string of attacks against the Beijing's interests. The attacks have worried China, which has pushed Pakistan to begin formal negotiations for a joint security management system.

Reuters spoke to five Pakistani security and government sources with direct knowledge of the previously unreported negotiations and demands.

"They (Chinese) want to bring in their own security," one official, who sat in on a recent meeting, said on condition of anonymity.

Talking to The Express Tribune, Planning Minister Ahsan Iqbal said that the events which occurred in the recent past were the acts of terrorism, which aimed at disrupting the Pakistan-China relations and stop the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

However, he added that both the countries were in contact with each other to deal with the security related issues and agree on a framework. "It is possible for both the countries to improve the security situation of the Chinese citizens," he said.

The minister cautioned against speculations on the issues related to the security, stressing that the security system would be made more effective where necessary. "Speculations about the security of Chinese citizens must be avoided," he said.

"The Chinese citizens working in Pakistan are our guests. Providing security to Chinese nationals in Pakistan is our primary responsibility," he added. "Where necessary, the security system will be made more effective," he said.

Climate finance

Prime Minister Shehbaz visited Baku on Tuesday and Wednesday to participate in the "World Leaders' Climate Action Summit" of the 29th Conference of the Parties to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (COP29).

Addressing the summit on Wednesday, Shehbaz sensitised the global community on the risks posed by climate change and the vulnerabilities of developing countries. He called for grant-based climate finance that should not add to the debt burden of the developing nations.

"I strongly feel, that climate finance must be grant-based and not an addition to the debt burden of vulnerable developing countries. Here is the opportunity that the COP29 should make an understanding loud and clear that we will have to fulfil those financial pledges of COP27 and COP28," he said.

"Ten years ago in Paris, we had failed to stop the rise in emissions and catastrophic global warming. The Paris pledges made 10 years ago have yet to see the light of the day," he added. He highlighted the devastation faced by the people of Pakistan caused by the climate change-induced floods in 2022.

To meet the needs of the populations hit by the impacts of climate change and avert such devastations in the future, Shehbaz reiterated his call for the fulfilment of the pledges made in previous COP summits.

"Without climate justice, there can be no real resilience and I don't want other countries to face what Pakistan faced in 2022. Pakistan is a resilient, hardworking and responsible nation. We are fully committed to becoming part of the global climate solutions," he assured.

Shehbaz told the summit that Pakistan was going through a renewable energy revolution. He mentioned last year's a comprehensive National Adaptation Plan and this year's the National Carbon Market Framework.

"But we cannot do it alone. Pakistan needs international support to deliver on its climate ambition," he said. "We believe that COP29 can transform into Finance COP by restoring confidence in scaling up climate finance," he remarked.

On the sidelines of the summit, Shehbaz also held a meeting with the Azerbaijan President Ilham Aliyev and discussed bilateral matters with him. Later in the day, Prime Minister Shehbaz left Baku for Islamabad.

Nepal PM picks Beijing over New Delhi for maiden visit, urged to bolster economic ties

14 November 2024, SCMP, Bibek Bhandari

K.P. Sharma Oli's visit reflects Nepal's intention to strengthen ties with China and rebalance traditionally India-centric relations

Nepal Prime Minister K.P. Sharma Oli is preparing for an official visit to China in early December, signalling his country's interest in strengthening ties with its northern neighbour, with experts noting its potential to rebalance Kathmandu's historically India-centric foreign policy.

Nepal's newly appointed leaders traditionally make India their first foreign trip, however, Oli did not receive the invitation from New Delhi usually extended after the formation of a new government.

Oli formed a coalition government between his Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist) and the Nepali Congress in July after his predecessor Pushpa Kamal Dahal, known as Prachanda, lost a vote of confidence in parliament in July.

Nepal has not officially announced the prime minister's visit from December 2 to 6, despite Beijing's invitation. The deputy chairman of Oli's party said during a meeting this week, the trip will "emphasise on implementing the high-level agreements" signed between the two countries and prioritising Nepal's national interests.

Oli's visit is being closely watched in New Delhi, though analysts say the trip is less about breaking traditions – Prachanda visited China before India in 2008 – and more about sending a signal to its southern neighbour.

While Nepal has closer ties with India historically and culturally, a notable shift occurred after India objected to the country's new constitution and enforced an unofficial blockade in 2015, pushing Nepal to seek help from China for fuel.

Geeta Kochhar, assistant professor at Jawaharlal Nehru University's Centre for Chinese and South East Asian Studies in New Delhi, said though India-Nepal relations are "steady", issues like border disputes and nationalist rhetoric need to be addressed to prevent them from becoming long-term problems. She described India's decision not to invite Oli as a "schedule issue" of India Prime Minister Narendra Modi, who did meet Oli on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly in September.

"There is a certain kind of hesitancy on the Indian part to immediately invite Oli because he is always creating some theoretical or practical problems for India-Nepal relations," she said. "In the name of nationalism, he has given authority to publish new notes to China with the new map."

In October, Nepal granted a contract for printing 100-rupee banknotes with its controversial map to a Chinese company. India has rejected Nepal's map, released in 2020, with territories that Kathmandu claims as its own.

She said Nepal should balance the relationship with the two countries and gain equally from both sides in terms of economic and infrastructure development.

Those issues are likely to be discussed in Oli's Beijing visit.

The two countries have agreed to several important projects, including road expansions, hydropower developments, and a railway from Tibet to Kathmandu under China's Belt and Road Initiative established in 2017. However, announcements of non-belt and road projects as Belt and Road Initiative ventures from China have often caused confusion.

Last year, former foreign minister NP Saud informed parliament that the Belt and Road Initiative project implementation plan was "at a stage of discussion", with no projects executed in Nepal.

Amish Raj Mulmi, author of All Roads Lead North: Nepal's Turn to China, said while the Chinese have been clear about the Belt and Road Initiative, Nepal needs to understand that it is not project-specific but a policy mechanism.

"Nepal has not done adequate homework in understanding what the Belt and Road Initiative entails," he said. "Nepal's position that Belt and Road Initiative has to be project specific is contrary to how the Chinese have defined it."

Since signing the Belt and Road Initiative agreements, Nepal's exports to China fell annually by 16.7 per cent from US$27.5 million in 2017 to US$11 million in 2022, according to the Observatory of Economic Complexity. However, customs data shows exports to China increased by 77 percent in 2023, rising from US$9.7 million in 2022 to US$17.5 million.

Mulmi says the decline in Nepali exports after signing the Belt and Road Initiative indicates that Nepal is not taking advantage of the project's connectivity and has failed to invest economically in its relationship with China.

Mulmi also added that China should help operationalise key infrastructure projects, referring to the Pokhara International Airport built with a US$200 million Chinese loan, which has yet to see any scheduled international flights since its 2023 opening. Local media reports indicate that Nepal is seeking to convert the loan into a grant during Oli's visit to China.

"Nepal will have to take the relationship with China – this matter to India as well – beyond the political side of affairs," he said. "China relations cannot be dictated by political aspects."

Analysts say Nepal should use Oli's visit to bolster economic ties.

Huang Zhengduo, director of the Center of Nepal Studies at the Institute of South Asia Studies of Sichuan University, said Nepal has the potential to become a transport link between India and China. The proposed railway would reduce Nepal's dependence on India and help promote trade and tourism.

Huang highlighted the Nepali prime minister's domestic significance, as Oli needs Chinese resources to fulfil his development-related political promises. Choosing China for his first trip indicates Oli's intention to balance relationships with both Delhi and Beijing, Huang said.

"Oli wants to send a clear signal that China-Nepal relations are at least as important as Nepal's relations with India.

"Given the increasing involvement of India and the United States in Nepal and their desire to counter Chinese influence in Nepal, Oli's visit to China undoubtedly represents a phased failure of these intentions."

China should show magnanimity and waive off the Pokhara airport loan

11 November 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli is preparing to visit China in the first week of December. It will be his first bilateral visit after assuming the office in mid-July. Nepali prime ministers generally go to New Delhi first. Sudheer Sharma, former editor-in-chief of Kantipur daily, has recently published a pair of books on Nepal-China relations—'Himalpari ko Huri' and 'Bhikshu, Byapar ra Bidroha'. He also frequently writes on Nepal's relations with its two big neighbours. The Post's Thira Lal Bhusal sat down with Sharma on the eve of Oli's China visit.

Prime Minister Oli is all set to visit China next month. Many find it curious that he decided to go to Beijing first before visiting New Delhi. How do you see this development?

Traditionally, Nepali prime ministers have given high priority to visits and engagements with our two neighbours—India and China. This is natural. Generally, the prime ministers first visited India and then went to China. I believe Prime Minister Oli tried to do the same. We see regular engagements with New Delhi at various levels. Prime Minister Oli had met his Indian counterpart Narendra Modi on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly in New York in the last week of September. In August, Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba visited India and met Prime Minister Modi and her counterpart S Jaishankar, among other key officials there. But Delhi has yet to extend the invitation to the prime minister. So he seems to have decided not to defer his foreign visits for long and chose to visit Beijing first.

We have to see this in two perspectives. Prime Minister Oli is visiting China at the invitation of Chinese Prime Minister Li Qiang and he is also going to meet Chinese President Xi Jinping. Even in the past, Oli developed good relations with Chinese leaders. So, there are expectations that he may make the visit fruitful. An equally important concern is whether this visit impacts our relations with the southern neighbour India. I think the prime minister should focus on implementing the agreements reached during his previous visits to Beijing and during Chinese leaders' Nepal visits. He should be mindful of not irking the southern neighbour while reaching any agreement with the northern one. I believe the prime minister is conscious of this.

India often seems anxious about Chinese involvement in Nepal. Do you see any risk of this visit increasing the distance between Oli and India?

Maoist leader Pushpa Kamal Dahal visited China first after he became prime minister in 2008. Even in the past, some Nepali prime ministers including Tanka Prasad Acharya went to China on their first official visit. This is not unusual. The two prime ministers—Oli and Modi—recently met in New York. India doesn't seem ready to intensify bilateral engagements with Nepal immediately. So it is natural for the prime minister to increase engagements with China, without taking any steps that could provoke India. We should stop seeking Indian signals when dealing with China, and vice versa. We should maintain parallel relations with both the neighbours without antagonising any side.

In this context, what should be the prime minister's priorities during his China visit?

We have to end our chronic problem of signing agreements and not implementing them. We make announcements and forget them. There are also some infrastructure projects China pledged to develop but there is little progress. So the prime minister should draw the Chinese leadership's attention and press them to complete the projects on time. Some important projects such as Mugling-Pokhara and Narayanghat-Butwal road upgradation by the Chinese side have been slow, causing hardships to people. Even such issues should be communicated to the political level. Also, there are several commitments made by the Chinese government but left unimplemented. This creates an impression that China makes big promises but doesn't keep them.

Prime Minister Oli often highlights the Tokha-Chhahare road upgrade project under Chinese support but there is no satisfactory progress. Progress on preparing the detailed project report (DPR) on Nepal-China cross-border railway is unclear as well. Nepal expected some substantive support from China to make the Pokhara international airport financially feasible. Some concrete steps are needed to operate this airport. There are reports that the government has requested China to convert the loan taken to develop the airport into a grant and the prime minister will push for this during his visit. It will be an achievement if the prime minister succeeds in this.

In the course of writing your recent books, you extensively interacted with Chinese officials and experts, as well as with their Nepali counterparts. What are the major factors delaying the projects? Is it lack of preparation on the Nepali side or is there any problem on the Chinese side?

First, we [Nepalis] sign agreements but don't work seriously to implement them. This is true in the case of agreements with other countries as well. We are negligent. Red tape is another problem. Third, China gives less priority to small countries like Nepal as it has so many big issues with other countries. We have to constantly follow up with them to speed things up. In the past, the two sides agreed to open more border points. This should be expedited. The people-to-people relations on the border areas were historically based on social interactions at the community level. People used to trade, marry those from the other side and interact in various ways. Of late, despite progress on infrastructure development, social engagement has been hindered. This should be rectified and new border points should be opened at Dolpa, Mustang, Gorkha, Dolakha, Taplejung, and Sankhuwasabha. We should think beyond the Capital-centric approach. This will help strengthen relations at the people's level and give alternatives in our connectivity. We should put connectivity at the core of our relations with the two neighbours.

In the past decade, we have made good progress in improving connectivity with India. A study report has been prepared on the Raxaul-Kathmandu railway project. We are building an expressway linking Kathmandu and the southern belt of the country. Integrated check posts (ICPs) have come into operation along Nepal-India border points. Cross border electricity transmission lines have been built and we have increased energy trade with India. We have thus progressed in deepening connectivity with India. We lack reliable north-south highways. Therefore, the prime minister should make connectivity a major agenda of his China visit.

Given the lacklustre performance of past projects, can we be optimistic about big cross-border infrastructure projects under Chinese help?

Nepal and China have committed to run some projects under the Trans-Himalayan Multi Dimensional Connectivity Network (THMDCN) concept. A key component of this concept is to upgrade connectivity between Kathmandu and Kerung that includes roads as well as a railway. The concept also envisions operating other border points. The railway project requires more study and investment and needs to consider various other factors. For now, we should prioritise opening the aforementioned border points. The Korala border point at Mustang has huge potential. Nepal is making a road that connects Mustang with the Sunauli border point with India.

Centuries ago, people from Banaras used to travel to Tibet via Mustang through this route. It can be revived and made a trilateral trade route between Nepal, India and China. Similarly, Limi in Humla, Olangchugola in Taplejung, among others places, can be developed as alternative routes. As far as Kerung-Kathmandu connection is concerned, let's first give priority to building a reliable highway. The railway project should be developed with a broader understanding between Nepal, India and China. Beijing will develop such a big project only with the big Indian markets in mind. More importantly, there are some signs of improvements in India-China relations. We have to use this as an opportunity.

Hemanta Shrestha/TKP

There are differences in the way we work and the Chinese do and there are systemic and linguistic differences as well. These factors are often blamed for lack of progress in development activities carried out with Chinese support. Can Nepalis work closely with Chinese, just like we do with Indians?

Until a decade ago, several projects developed under Indian support were left in limbo. In 2015, India imposed a blockade against Nepal and that sparked anti-India sentiment. Then, India expedited several projects. This drastic change became possible as the political leadership in India realised its mistake and showed the commitment to improve things.

But the same thing is not happening with China because there is a "great wall" between Nepal and China when it comes to understanding each other. The Chinese haven't understood Nepali context. The northern neighbour should be more open and liberal in helping Nepal. Second, Nepal should also stop approaching China only when our relations with India sour. We have left this impression on the Chinese psyche. First, we should be clear about what exactly we want from China, forge consensus among major political forces and hold talks with the Chinese leaders. Then, we should be equally committed to implementing the agreements reached this way. People now take announcements of building big projects under Chinese support as propaganda. Therefore, this time the prime minister should stress on pushing the pending projects. The prime minister should tell them that even the projects announced during President Xi's visit have not progressed and that has created a bad impression of China in Nepal. There are some differences between the coalition partners—the CPN-UML and the Nepali Congress—about the funding modality of projects under the Belt and Road Initiatives (BRI). Do you think this may cause a problem?

The UML wants to expedite the BRI projects while the Congress has insisted that we should accept only grants and not loans under the BRI. The prime minister should clear such dilemmas and come up with common views before he leaves for Beijing. Once they come up with a common view on such key issues, it will give a positive and strong message. The Chinese side will take it more seriously because the strong government led by the two largest parties can implement bilateral agreements.

We have instances of Nepal's political parties standing for and against important projects funded by other countries. This was seen in the case of the US-funded Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), and China's BRI. Moreover, in the past, the Chinese leaders created an impression that they preferred working with communist parties and leaders. This is neither in the interest of Nepal nor of China.

There are also discussions on signing the BRI implementation plan during the visit. What are the things Nepal should be careful about while signing BRI-related agreements?

Trying to get grants instead of loans is in itself good. But there is no need to be prejudiced against the BRI per se. Nepal reportedly wants to include some points specifying waivers in specific projects. We should be very careful while signing project-based agreements. For instance, what will be the conditions and funding modality of a project, will it be developed under grants or loans etcetera. All our technical experts and other brains should be engaged while signing project-based agreements and specifying conditions and other nitty-gritty to ensure that we will not have unnecessary liability and debt burden in the future.

Hemanta Shrestha/TKP

Over time, Nepal has rightly adopted a steadfast position saying that we don't join a strategic alliance proposed by any country. It stayed away from the US government's State Partnership Programme (SPP) and China's Global Security Initiative (GSI) as well as from India's security umbrella. But we can't be isolated in development initiatives. We have to take support from India, China, the US and other countries based on our needs.

Do you think the Chinese side will show magnanimity on Nepal's requests, for instance on waiving off the loan to develop Pokhara international airport?

Though the Chinese ambassador to Nepal last year claimed the airport project to be under the BRI, the case is different because it was signed years before we joined the BRI. And, converting that loan into a grant is not a big deal for China. They should show magnanimity given the support we have been providing to China for a long time. If you see things historically, Nepal has helped China by suppressing Khampa revolt, preventing free Tibet movements on our soil and showing a steadfast commitment to One-China policy. China, which is now prosperous, should definitely show magnanimity and waive off loan of Pokhara airport. They shouldn't see relations with Nepal through a purely transactional lens.

In your book, you describe 2008 as a watershed after which the engagements between Nepal and China increased drastically. But why couldn't we benefit from the northern neighbour in terms of development?

The Chinese side looks more interested in increasing engagement. They like to showcase their development before foreigners. But more than lavish hospitality, we need substantive support from the neighbour, which has emerged as the world's second-largest economy. But we should be clear about what we want from our engagements with China.

The Nepali side doesn't present its proposals clearly. On certain issues, our politicians give mixed signals. This time, if this government of two largest parties reaches a certain agreement with China and remains committed to implement it, other forces can't hinder it. The same approach can be replicated while dealing with India, the US, Japan or other friendly countries.

Is difficult geography still a barrier in developing cross-border infrastructure projects and deepening relations between Nepal and China?

In our textbooks we read that the Himalayan range is a natural barrier between the two countries. In my book 'Bhikshu Byapar ra Bidroha', I have explored and described how people from Nepal and northern India had been traversing through these mountains and there were interactions and engagements between the people in this part of the world since the 5th and 6th centuries. So, the mountains weren't barriers even at that time. Now technology has made things easier. We have to think about how to connect with these two big economies. We have multiple east-west highways. Now we need north-south highways connecting the three countries that will help us reap benefits from India and China.

At present, relations between these two countries have improved and it is an opportunity for us. We have to forge understanding with both India and China if we have to materialise big projects based on trilateral agreement. One thing we can't accept is the concept of two-plus-one (India, China plus Nepal). That is unacceptable because it downgrades Nepal to a junior partner. We need trilateral agreements to develop mega connectivity-related and other investment projects but such agreements should be made on an equal-footing between the three countries.

Chinese envoy: We support Nepal's infrastructure development

08 November 2024, The Himalayan, Rastriya Samachar Samiti

Chinese Ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, expressed the Chinese government's readiness to support Nepal's development and prosperity.

Ambassador Song highlighted the harmonious relationship between Nepal and China and reaffirmed China's willingness to aid Nepal's development efforts.

Speaking at a program held today at Bhawani Vidyapeeth Secondary School in Falebas Municipality, Parbat, the ambassador underscored China's commitment to assisting in Nepal's growth and progress.

He noted that since the establishment of diplomatic ties, the two countries, connected by mountains and rivers, have consistently supported each other on matters of core interest.

Ambassador Song further pledged cooperation in upgrading Nepal's road, electricity, and education sectors, adding that China wishes for Nepal to become a self-reliant, advancing nation.

He also mentioned China's readiness to operationalize the Korala border crossing and emphasized ongoing Chinese support for infrastructure development at the crossing. Song expressed optimism that the bilateral relationship would strengthen further with the opening of this border crossing.

China reported to have banned Nepal-Tibet borderland marriages

05 November 2024, Tibetan Review

China has an issue with the people on the two sides of the Tibet-Nepal border marrying each other and has banned it but not bothered to explain why, according to thediplomat.com Nov 4. The people on the two sides of this border share ethnic, Buddhist cultural heritage and linguistic ties; but cross-border marriage doesn't exist anymore. The centuries-old borderlands marriage has been halted thanks to the Chinese side, the report said.

"Cross-border marriage was not an issue until 2008," the report quoted a Nepali local in Olangchung Gola village in Nepal's eastern Taplejung district, which borders Tibet and India, as saying. It was "halted from the Chinese side after 2012."

As a result, cross-border marriages, once the norm in Olangchung Gola, are now a rarity, the report said. While a Nepali from any part of Nepal can marry a Chinese in any part of mainland China, Beijing has forbidden cross-border marriages between people who live in the Tibet-Nepal borderlands, within walking distance of each other, and with strong linguistic and cultural ties. Beijing has provided no explanation for this policy, the report said.

Chumbe Sherpa, a former deputy chair of the erstwhile Olangchung Gola Village Development Committee (local government), has said that previously Tibetan women were drawn to Nepal as the latter was comparatively well-developed and the source of their food and other supplies. A marriage with a Nepali man was therefore an attractive option.

However, in recent decades, China has developed the Tibetan region, and the Tibetan border regions are more developed than the Nepali ones. Hence, the situation has reversed and commodities now flow into Nepal from Riu in Dinggye County of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). Almost all daily essentials being used by residents of Olangchung Gola are now from TAR and sport Mandarin characters. Olangchung Gola is closer to Riu bazaar than Taplejung's district headquarters of Phungling bazaar, the report noted.

The report also said that even meeting relatives on the Tibet side of the border had become tougher post-pandemic. "We can't go to our relatives' homes on the other side," Chhilamo Lama, whose maternal house is on the Tibetan side, has said. She has "to stay at a quarantine-like home," where her "relatives come to meet and greet" her. "This was not the case in the past," she has said.

Trade and other relationships between the two sides on the borderland continued to be excellent, however, the report noted.

Local residents as well as security personnel view the Chinese positively. Madhab Khatri, the recently deployed Border Outpost chief of Nepal's Armed Police Force has said, "Chinese counterparts often ask if we need anything from them."

"We mostly go to Riu to sell our products and buy theirs. If we can't sell all our products in the Riu bazaar, Chinese policemen purchase our unsold items," Chhilamo Lama has told The Diplomat.

Also, Chheten Sherpa, a local leader of the Nepali Congress and a former local government member, has said that the Chinese are helpful and are eager to have better road connectivity with Nepal. Chinese-sent bulldozers and oil tankers with Chinese number plates are visible at Olangchung Gola bazaar.

And so, the big question is, when border trade and crossings have resumed, why are traditional borderland marriages being blocked? Why are marriages between people who have to fly long distances across the Himalayas permitted when those who live just within walking distance of each other are forbidden, the report asked.

Nepal opens Lomanthang to all citizens travelling to Chinese ruled Tibet

30 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Nepal has opened on Oct 30 a new immigration office at Lomanthang Rural Municipality-1, Nechung, of Mustang district in the Gandaki Province, to help streamline cross-border travel and operations at Korala Dry Port, reported the kathmandupost.com Oct 29 and 30.

Lomanthang, or Lo, the northern two-thirds of Mustang district, is culturally and linguistically Tibetan, while the southern third is called Thak, the homeland of Thakali people who speak a different language and have a synthesis of Tibetan and Nepalese culture. It is 20 kilometres (12 miles) by unpaved road from a border crossing into Drongpa (Chinese: Zhongba) County of Shigatse City, Tibet.

The Nepalese Department of Immigration requires foreign visitors to Lomanthang to obtain a special permit and liaison (guide) to protect local tradition from outside influence as well as to protect their environment.

Previously, only Mustang locals with permits issued by the District Administration Office could cross the Korala border for trade. The new office now allows easier access for all Nepali citizens intending to travel through this point, the report said.

Inaugurating the new immigration office at Korala, Nepal's Home Minister Ramesh Lekhak has expressed optimism that the initiation will strengthen Nepal's bilateral ties with China.

"The immigration facility will be instrumental in easing the movement of citizens and fostering bilateral trade, further cementing the bond between Nepal and China," Lekhak has said.

The inauguration followed the installation of a prefabricated 10-room immigration and security post at the border, equipped with electricity, internet, and mobile phone connectivity. The government has extended the central transmission line to Korala and provided Nepal Telecom's internet services, the report said.

The Chinese side has also constructed essential infrastructure, including customs facilities, quarantine areas, accommodations, a laboratory, and truck parking. These facilities aim to enhance efficiency at the Korala dry port, for which the Nepal Intermodal Transport Development Board has prepared a detailed project report for further development, the report said.

Located at an altitude of 4,650 metres, the Korala border was officially inaugurated on Nov 13 last year in a joint ceremony between Mustang's Chief District Officer and an official from Shigatse City. Expansion of trade activities in this border has been deemed a landmark step towards economic prosperity by connecting with both northern and southern trade routes, the report said.

The report also said that following the commencement of the operation of the Korala border point, Nepal, India and China trade can now be operated through this route as well.

The Kaligandaki Corridor that reaches up to the Korala border point is connected with Siddhartha Highway in Syngja district and the road ends at the Sunauli border point with India in Rupandehi district. The route from Nepal-India border point at Sunauli to Nepal-Tibet border point at Korala through Siddhartha Highway and Kaligandaki corridor is taken as a possible alternative trilateral trade route between the three countries, the report said.

Nepal entrusts China to print Rs 100 notes with map laying claim over Indian territory

29 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Nepal under Prime Minister KPS Oli appears to be making common cause with China on its territorial dispute with India by awarding the contract for the printing of its controversial new Rs 100 note to a Chinese company. Oli is seen as the most pro-China Nepali leader and has in the past taken potshots at India as if to make that point.

Nepal has been laying claim over three Indian territories in the Indian state of Uttarakhand in the recent past – Limpiyadhura-Kalapani-Lipulekh. And its claim over the Limpiyadhura Pass area arises from its claim over Kalapani. The disputed area, a 370-square-kilometre stretch situated to the northwestern corner of Nepal, has been administered by India for hundreds of years.

The area is currently administration as part of Pithoragarh district in the Kumaon Division of the Uttarakhand state. However, Nepal has been claiming it since 1997, saying it lies within its Darchula district, Sudurpashchim Province.

Nepal added these regions to its map via a constitutional amendment in 2020, though they have been under Indian control for over 200 years, noted zeenews.india.com Oct 29. Nepal shares a border of over 1,800 km with five Indian states – Sikkim, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Uttarakhand and West Bengal.

Oli's cabinet recently approved the inclusion of its new map with these three Indian territories on its new currency note of Nepali Rs 100. The printing of the notes will test Kathmandu's relations with India, the report noted.

The contract for printing the new currency notes has been awarded to China Banknote Printing and Minting Corporation. Nepal's central bank – Nepal Rashtira Bank – has issued its letter of intent to the Chinese firm on Oct 27, the report said.

Amid this development, Oli is planning to pay an official visit to China between mid-November and mid-December, though China is yet to extend an official invitation to him, the report said.

In Nepal's frequently changing alignment of parties in constant jostling for power, Oli assumed his fourth tenure as Prime Minister of Nepal in mid-July.

Oli held a meeting with Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly (UNGA) in New York last month. During the meeting, he extended an invitation to Modi to visit Nepal, the report said.

Oli's Communist Party of Nepal (UML) is a coalition partner with Nepali Congress, which is seen as pro-India.

China lays claim to territories across much of India's northern borders with Tibet which the former annexed in 1951 through armed aggression.

Nepal's claim is based on the Sugauli Treaty signed with British East India Company in 1815. Under it, the India-western Nepal border is marked by the course of the Kali River, called the Mahakali downstream. But there was no map attached to it.

The Mahakali has two tributaries—one starting at Lipulekh and the other at Limpiyadhura further west. The treaty did not specify which of these two tributaries would be considered the Kali for the purpose of delineating the boundary. India says the Kali starts at Lipulekh, while Nepal says Limpiyadhura is the river's source, noted a Kathmandupost.com report Jun 4, 2020.

China-aided public welfare projects handed over to Nepal's community

25 October 2024, Xinhua

A solar-powered community bathroom and a rooftop photovoltaic power generation facility constructed in the Kathmandu Valley with Chinese aid were handed over to the local community on Friday.

The bathroom in Lalitpur, a city in the valley, has hot water generated by solar energy and three shower rooms for males and females, respectively, and can accommodate some 100 people per day.

The bathroom is described as a sustainable development project, as the waste water is filtered for storage to flush bathroom toilets, a shop serving customers generates income, and job opportunities are created.

The rooftop photovoltaic power generation facility nearby has 36 kilowatts in total installed capacity and is expected to generate around 60,000 kWh of electricity per year, providing green power to the bathroom and the community.

Addressing the handover ceremony, Lalitpur Mayor Chiri Babu Maharjan expressed his gratitude for "this state-of-the-art" bathroom facility.

"Thank you very much for your good assistance and support," he said. "Hopefully, there will be a lot of avenues where we can work together."

Insufficient water supply and frequent power outage are challenges facing the Kathmandu Valley and other parts of Nepal.

The community bathroom is the first under the "Happy Community" program launched by the Chinese Embassy in Nepal, noted Ambassador Chen Song.

The two projects were constructed under the public welfare program implemented by the Yunnan

Commercial Representative Office in Kathmandu, Nepal.

The Chinese side is confident that it can implement more of such small yet smart people-centered programs which are popular with the Nepali people, Chen said at the handover ceremony.

In addition, the Chinese side has launched poverty reduction projects in rural Nepal, including cultivating vegetables in greenhouses, making clean drinking water available at schools and installing solar streetlights, added the ambassador.

CPC holds meeting of Nepali political parties, PM Oli reiterates 'no anti-China activities' stand

21 October 2024, Tibetan Review

After a slowdown in activity for quite some time, the Communist Party of China (CPC) has resumed high-level visits to Nepal and received reassurance from Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli on Oct 20 that no 'anti-China activities' will be allowed in the country, reported the kathmandupost.com and the PTI news agency Oct 20.

Controversially, a CPC delegation has called a meeting of Nepali political parties having presence in the country's parliament without bothering to seek Kathmandu's permission.

The assurance was given as a reaffirmation of the Himalayan nation's commitment to China's 'One China' policy, said the PTI report.

The 'One China' policy usually refers to China's claim that there is only one China and Taiwan is part of it as a way to counter the latter's increasingly strident claim to be a separate sovereign entity. China claims that Taiwan is part of it and makes it mandatory for all the countries having diplomatic ties with it to follow the 'One China' policy.

However, in Nepal, the policy is more distinctively observed by cracking down on the Tibetan refugee community whenever it engages in any activity not approved by China. Besides, around 20,000 Tibetan refugees in the country have remained undocumented for decades as a result of pressure from China.

Oli, Chairman of the CPN (UML) and seen as the most pro-China leader of Nepal, has made the remarks in a meeting with a high-level Chinese delegation led by Chen Jining, a member of the Communist Party of China Central Committee. The meeting took place at his official residence in Baluwatar, Kathmandu.

Reaffirming Nepal's commitment to the 'One China' policy, Oli told the visiting delegation that no anti-China activities would be allowed to operate within Nepal's territory, the report said.

Oli has also expressed hopes for continued support from China for Nepal's economic development. He has underscored the role of the CPC and President Xi Jinping's leadership in "alleviating poverty and driving holistic development in China" and expressed Nepal's interest in benefiting from such advancements.

Chen, who is also the Secretary of the CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee, has reiterated China's support for Nepal's "happiness and prosperity", adding Beijing will always respect decisions made by Nepal's political parties.

Chen's delegation was stated to include Peng Xiubin, director-general of International Department of CPC (IDCPC); Wang Zhizhong, director-general of Foreign Affairs Office (FAO), CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Liu Chang, deputy director-general of FAO, CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Zheng Dengke, director of Policy Research Office, CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Du DU Xiaoli, director of FAO, CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Zheng Youya, deputy director and Nepali Translator at IDCPC; Wang Siqi, deputy director at IDCPC; and Chen Yongpei, first-level principal staff member of IDCPC.

Chen's delegation had arrived in Kathmandu on Oct 19. Until that day, Zhang Meizhi, member of the Standing Committee of the 14th National People's Congress of the People's Republic of China, and vice chairperson of the Standing Committee of Hebei Provincial People's Congress (Vice Minister Level), was in Kathmandu, said the kathmandupost.com report.

The former arrived in Kathmandu on the day the latter left the country, the report said.

The Chen's CPC delegation was stated to have invited at least 15 leaders each from all Nepali political parties that were represented in the country's House of Representatives on Oct 20 to brief them about the outcome of the recent CPC Central Committee meeting held in Beijing.

Fourteen political parties are represented in Nepal's 275-strong House of Representatives and the delegations' visits were meant to strengthen party-to-party relationships between the two sides.

The Chinese side did not seek permission to hold the event, but informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about its plan to host the function, to be inaugurated by Narayan Dahal, chairman of the National Assembly, who was invited as the chief guest at the function, the report cited a ministry official as saying. The 20th Central Committee of the CPC had convened its third plenary session in Beijing from Jul 15 to 18 earlier this year.

Chen had started meeting with top Nepali political leaders soon after his arrival, including Nepali Congress President Sher Bahadur Deuba and CPN (Maoist Centre) Chairman Pushpa Kamal Dahal, the report said.

The CPC delegation will brief Nepali party leaders on the 3rd Plenary Session of the 20th CPC Central Committee.

After a slowdown in activity for quite some time, the Communist Party of China has resumed high-level visits to Nepal.

A delegation led by members of the CPC Central Committee and Chen Gang, who is also the secretary of CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee, arrived in Kathmandu on Saturday.

Until Saturday, Zhang Meizhi, member of the Standing Committee of the 14th National People's Congress of the People's Republic of China, and vice chairperson of the Standing Committee of Hebei Provincial People's Congress (Vice Minister Level), was in Kathmandu.

The day Zhang left for China, Chen arrived in Kathmandu. Zhang met with Deputy Speaker Indira Rana Magar and went to Pokhara, according to security sources.

Rajendra Gautam, head of publicity department of the CPN-UML, and Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song, among others, received the Chinese delegation at Tribhuvan International Airport.

The CPC delegation led by Chen will brief the Nepali party leaders about the 3rd Plenary Session of the 20th CPC Central Committee on Sunday in Kathmandu, according to the itinerary. The IDCPC and CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee plan to co-host the briefing on the 3rd Plenary Session of the 20th CPC Central Committee at 14:30 pm on Sunday, at the Hotel Yak and Yeti in Kathmandu, said the invitation letter sent out to the various political parties that are represented at the Federal Parliament of Nepal.

Narayan Dahal, chairman of the National Assembly, is invited as chief guest at the function.

According to the security sources, apart from Chen, the delegation includes Penng Xiubin, director-general of International Department of CPC (IDCPC); Wang Zhizhong, director-general of Foreign Affairs Office (FAO), CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Liu Chang, deputy director-general of FAO, CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Zheng Dengke, director of Policy Research Office, CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Du DU Xiaoli, director of FAO, CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee; Zheng Youya, deputy director and Nepali Translator at IDCPC; Wang Siqi, deputy director at IDCPC; and Chen Yongpei, first-level principal staff member of IDCPC.

The CPC has invited at least 15 leaders each from all Nepali political parties that are represented in the House of Representatives in a rare party briefing on Sunday to brief about the outcome of the recent party meeting held in Beijing.

Fourteen political parties are represented in Nepal's 275-strong House of Representatives.

The Chinese side did not seek permission to hold the event but informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about its plan to host the function to be inaugurated by Dahal, according to a ministry official. The 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China convened its third plenary session in Beijing from July 15 to 18 earlier this year.

Soon after Chen arrived in Kathmandu on Saturday, he started meeting with top political leaders, including Nepali Congress President Sher Bahadur Deuba and CPN (Maoist Centre) Chairman Pushpa Kamal Dahal. Shankar Pokhrel, general secretary of the CPN-UML, organised a dinner in honour of the visiting Chinese leaders on Saturday evening.

On Sunday, Chen and the Chinese delegation will meet Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli at his residence in Baluwatar and will brief Nepali leaders on the outcome of the recently held CPC's plenary session.

Chairman Prachanda stresses for implementation of agreements signed between Nepal, China

19 October 2024, The Rising Nepal

CPN (Maoist Centre) Chairman Pushpa Kamal Dahal 'Prachanda' has said that Nepal was willing to learn several things from the development of modern China.

During a meeting with the leaders of the Communist Party of China (CPC) at his residence in Khumaltar on Saturday, the former Prime Minister said that China's development is a learning for Nepal.

Likewise, Chairman Prachanda thanked the Chinese government, CPC and CPC Secretary General Xi

Jinping for China's support to Nepal's development priority.

On the occasion, he stressed the need to implement the agreements signed between Nepal and China during the high-level visit from China to Nepal in 2019.

Chairman Prachanda shared that Nepal was expecting effective operation of Nepal-China border points, advancement of railway construction, ensuring effective air connectivity and cooperation in the areas of health, education and others.

CPC Central Committee Member and CPC Secretary of Qinghai Province Committee Chen Gang, the leader of the Chinese delegation visiting Nepal, also shared his views on deepening Nepal-China relations.

Sharing that this was his first visit to Nepal, Gang said that the CPC has given importance to the relations of government and political parties based on their co-existence.

During the meeting, CPN (Maoist Centre) Senior Vice-Chairman Narayankaji Shrestha, Vice-Chairperson Pampha Bhusal, leaders Janardan Sharma, Shakti Bahadur Basnet and others were present.

Likewise, CPC Secretary of Qinghai Province Committee Chen Gang, Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song and others were present from the side of the Chinese delegation.(RSS)

CPC invites 15 leaders each from Nepali parties in House for its briefing in Kathmandu

19 October 2024, The Kathmandu Post

The Chinese side did not seek permission to hold the event but informed Foreign Ministry about its plan, according to an official.

The Communist Party of China (CPC) has invited at least 15 leaders each from all Nepali political parties that are represented in the House of Representatives in a rare party briefing on Sunday. The International Department of the CPC sent the invitation to the Nepali political parties.

"The International Department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (IDCPC) and CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee presents its compliments to your party and has the honour to advise the following," reads the letter sent to one national party which was seen by the Post. "The IDCPC and CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee plans to co-host the briefing on the 3rd Plenary Session of the 20th CPC Central Committee at 14:30 p.m. on October 20th, at the Hotel Yak and Yeti in Kathmandu, Nepal."

Fourteen political parties are represented in Nepal's 275-strong House of Representatives. And there are two independent lawmakers.

National Assembly Chairman Narayan Dahal has been invited as chief guest in the function. The Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu had informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about the function and the ministry allowed them to organise the programme without further consultation, said a joint secretary at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

"We are hearing of such practice for the first time in Nepal," a CPN-UML leader said. "Since they invited us, we have to attend the event but it is up to the government to decide whether the political party from another country should invite us for internal party meetings. It is up to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to decide."

But a joint secretary at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said that since China practices a different political system, the ministry did not reject holding such an event in Kathmandu.

In China, the CPC unilaterally runs the government, so the ministry did not urge them to stop the function, said the joint secretary. The Chinese side did not seek permission to hold the event but informed the ministry about its plan to host the function to be inaugurated by Dahal, according to the ministry official.

The 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China convened its third plenary session in Beijing from July 15 to 18 earlier this year. The session had endorsed several proposals related to development strategy of China, development and security, promotion of high-quality development, deepening reform in various sectors, advancing socialist democracy and rule of law, improving public communication and cultural work, safeguarding national security and social stability, promoting the development of national defense and the armed forces, advancing work related to Hong Kong, Macao, and Taiwan, pursuing major-country diplomacy with Chinese characteristics, and strengthening full and rigorous party self-governance, among others, according to the CPC document.

Arjun Thapa, head of the international department of Janata Samajbadi Party-Nepal, confirmed to the Post that his party has received an invitation to attend the briefing. But he said he is not participating. "Someone from the party including some half a dozen party leaders will attend the briefing," Thapa said.

"It's a kind of propaganda meeting," he added. But the letter sent by the Chinese side did not mention who from the International Department of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (IDCPC) and CPC Qinghai Provincial Committee will brief the Nepali leaders.

Earlier, in January end, Sun Haiyan, the vice minister of the International Liaison Department of the CPC, also did a similar kind of briefing to the second-rung leaders of the major Nepali political parties during a consultative conference in Kathmandu between Nepali political leaders and the CPC.

In the meeting, Sun had accused that certain countries were trying to destabilise the good relations between Nepal and China, while some elements were also defaming the Belt and Road Initiative by calling it a 'debt trap'. But the theme of Sunday's briefing is 'Sharing the Opportunities Brought by Chinese Modernisation and Deepening the Trans-Himalaya Cooperation.'

"We cordially invite 15 representatives of your party/organisation to participate in this event," reads the invitation letter.

Meanwhile, China also donated seven electric vehicle cars to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Friday. But both sides have not released any formal statement about it.

"These cars were stuck at the Nepal-China border for a long time," said Amrit Bahadur Rai, spokesperson at the foreign ministry. "Finally, the Chinese side handed it over to us on Friday."

The seven electric vehicles were stuck in customs due to Nepali side's failure to pay the customs duty, another foreign ministry official said. "They were released after the finance ministry agreed to pay the tax amounting to over Rs10.5 million," the official said.

China expands territorial claims with new fence along Nepal-Tibet border

China has increased its territorial ambitions by building a fence along the Nepal-Tibet border. This new structure, reinforced with barbed wire and concrete barriers, clearly ignores the internationally recognised boundary between China and Nepal, extending deep into Nepalese territory. This action has raised concerns about China's growing disregard for sovereign borders.

Recent satellite images have revealed a large inscription near the fence, which reads "Long Live the Chinese Communist Party." This message stretches 600 feet across a hillside and is so enormous that it can be seen from space, serving as a clear act of intimidation towards Nepal and its neighbouring countries. The New York Times has reported on these satellite images, bringing further global attention to this incursion.

This incident mirrors previous reports of Chinese territorial aggression. In 2021, Nepalese lawmaker Jeevan Bahadur Shahi published a report detailing Chinese military encroachments in the Humla district, which borders China. The report claimed that Chinese forces had destroyed eight border pillars and built infrastructure deep within Nepal's territory.

However, the Nepalese government suppressed these findings due to pressure from Beijing. The details of this report later leaked to the BBC, sparking public outrage but resulting in no significant action from the government. Meanwhile, China has continued its expansionist policies, with reports indicating that over 11 regions along the Nepal-China border have been affected by similar land grabs. This latest fencing is consistent with China's long-standing "salami-slicing" strategy, which involves making small, incremental territorial gains that ultimately lead to significant land grabs.

China has employed this method in other areas, including the South China Sea and along the contentious India-China border. Recently, tensions have escalated along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in Ladakh, where a standoff with Indian forces has continued for over four years.

Adding to regional tensions, China has also renamed locations in Arunachal Pradesh, claiming them as Chinese territory, a claim firmly rejected by India. Additionally, Chinese authorities have increased pressure on ethnic Tibetan Nepalis living near the border, reportedly coercing villagers to avoid public displays of the Dalai Lama's image under the threat of reprisals. This is part of a broader effort by China to suppress Tibetan culture and identity, extending its repressive measures into Nepalese territory.

Despite these clear violations of sovereignty, the Nepalese government has largely remained silent. The country's leadership, increasingly dependent on China for economic and ideological support, has chosen to overlook these encroachments to maintain good relations with Beijing.

China's ongoing border incursions in Nepal raise serious questions about the future of Nepal's sovereignty. It remains to be seen whether Nepal's leaders will find the courage to resist Chinese expansionism or continue to submit to pressure from Beijing. The global community should also pay attention; if China's actions in Nepal go unchallenged, they may encourage similar aggression in other regions, particularly in India and the South China Sea.

China fails to push BRI implementation plan in Nepal

16 October 2024, ORF, Arpan Gelal

The Chinese intention seems clear—until Nepal signs the BRI Implementation Plan, Chinese cooperation in mega projects will remain in limbo.

The finalisation of the 'Implementation Plan' for the execution of projects under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) has remained the central component of China's Nepal policy in the last few years. Recently, China has taken a more assertive stance to portray the success of BRI in Nepal as not a single project under BRI has been executed in its immediate neighbour. Although the negotiation on BRI projects stuck soon after signing the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on cooperation under the Belt and Road Initiative in 2017, the push for the BRI Implementation Plan has remained the major agenda of all high-level visits from China in recent years.

China has taken a more assertive stance to portray the success of BRI in Nepal as not a single project under BRI has been executed in its immediate neighbour.

China had taken the Implementation Plan forward in early 2020 but negotiations on the plan saw minimal progress. The COVID-19 pandemic and firm stance of the then Nepali Congress (NC)-led government that the projects under BRI be funded through grants and concessional loans, rather than China's proposal for commercial loans, stalled the progress. After the general election in November 2022, with the formation of a left coalition government in Kathmandu, China intensified its efforts to advance the Implementation Plan. The joint statement issued during then Prime Minister Prachanda's visit to China in September 2023 mentioned that the two sides will accelerate the discussion to finalise the BRI Implementation Plan at the earliest. Soon after assuming office as Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha, an influential high-ranking CPN (Maoist-Centre) leader with a close ties to China, made a nine-day long visit to China, reportedly with the objective of finalising the Implementation Plan. The plan could not be signed; however, Shrestha expressed his commitment to finalize it soon.

The BRI Implementation Plan gained traction from across the spectrum in Nepal when the outgoing government under Prachanda expedited the final preparations to sign the document during the 16th round of the Nepal-China diplomatic consultation meeting last June. The text of the agreement forwarded by China was finalised by the National Planning Commission with inputs from the relevant ministries. On the eve of the consultation meeting, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs forwarded the draft of the plan for final approval to the prime minister's office. The lawmakers of Nepali Congress (NC) and Rastriya Swatantra Party (RSP) along with other parties strongly condemned the government's preparation to sign the plan without consultation with the opposition parties and wider consensus on the text of the plan. The government ultimately had to back off.

The joint statement issued during then Prime Minister Prachanda's visit to China in September 2023 mentioned that the two sides will accelerate the discussion to finalise the BRI Implementation Plan at the earliest.

This stalled China's tendency to leverage the left government in Nepal to promote its agenda. China often uses left parties with close ideological inclination to advance its interests. This is evident from the fact that most of the infrastructure projects in Nepal have been contracted to Chinese firms under the left-led administrations in Kathmandu.

The recent realignment in the ruling coalition under CPN-UML chair KP Sharma Oli, with Nepali Congress taking the role of key alliance partner and control of the Foreign Ministry, signals uncertainty about any deal on the Implementation Plan soon. Although Beijing will make attempts to move forward with the plan through Oli and his confidants, the strong reservation of the Nepali Congress on the funding modality and governance mechanisms of the projects under BRI will impede further developments. At least, until the current coalition remains intact, BRI implementation in Nepal will remain on hold.

The fuss of Implementation Plan

After signing the MoU on cooperation under the BRI in 2017, Nepal proposed a list of 35 projects to implement under the initiative as early as 2018 under the KP Oli administration. The number of projects was eventually trimmed to nine after the insistence of the Chinese side to reduce the number to a single digit. The negotiations on the project selection and their funding and implementation modality could not move forward. Amid the deadlock, Nepal last year contracted a hydropower project proposed under BRI to an Indian contractor, and another is being awarded to an Indian state-owned enterprise.

Chinese rationale for seeking another agreement on BRI is puzzling. As per media reports, the recently finalised draft of the Implementation Plan includes a few priority sectors of cooperation under the BRI framework, lacking any details on the funding mechanisms and implementation modalities. Chinese officials contend that the Implementation Plan would open a pathway for advancing bilateral cooperation and serve as a catalyst for the implementation of projects under BRI in Nepal. However, it is unclear how yet another generic agreement without negotiations on project selection and funding mechanisms would facilitate the execution of projects.

Amid the deadlock, Nepal last year contracted a hydropower project proposed under BRI to an Indian contractor, and another is being awarded to an Indian state-owned enterprise.

While the lack of transparency is a generic feature of Chinese engagements in Nepal's infrastructure landscape, the bilateral BRI dealings have been shrouded in secrecy since the beginning. The initial MoU on BRI is still kept confidential by both countries. Certain contentious provisions in the MoU came under scrutiny after a media house leaked the document in 2022. The recent outgoing government under Prachanda yet again took a similar step, concluding the draft of the Implementation Plan without deliberation, despite multiple calls from the lawmakers for parliamentary discussions. The left-led governments tend to override democratic norms, transparency, accountability, and processes while dealing with their Chinese counterpart, prioritising their ideological affinity with the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). BRI hasn't remained an excuse.

China's unilateral claims

After joining the initiative in 2017 with much fanfare, BRI was seen as a panacea to solve Nepal's infrastructure deficit. The majority of Nepalis perceived BRI as a project-led infrastructure initiative with little realisation of strategic and geopolitical motives attached to it. China's unilateral labelling of certain projects in Nepal under BRI increased the scepticism and has prompted a more cautionary approach.

Last month, the ambassador of China to Nepal took to social site X (formerly Twitter) to make a controversial claim to announce a 'new batch' of BRI projects in Nepal. The two countries signed the letters of exchange during the visit of the Vice Chairman of China International Development Cooperation Agency (CIDCA) for the initiation of four long-standing stalled projects, committed to be assisted by China. Earlier, the Chinese embassy had surprisingly announced Pokhara International Airport, built with a Chinese loan as a flagship project under the BRI. Nepali officials straightforwardly rejected the claim, given the loan negotiations for the airport began before the BRI was conceptualised in 2013.

China's unilateral labelling of certain projects in Nepal under BRI increased the scepticism and has prompted a more cautionary approach.

Amidst the stalemate in cooperation on large-scale infrastructure projects in recent years, China has expanded engagements through 'small yet smart' projects, allegedly under the BRI framework. In July 2023, the Communist Party of China (CPC) announced the 'Silk Roadster' platform coinciding with the tenth anniversary of BRI. Silk Roadster is stated to foster practical cooperation and people-to-people exchanges through training, skills development, scholarships and other short-term exchanges. Further, later the same year, the outcome document of the third BRI Forum for International Cooperation mentioned two smaller projects related to education and sanitation implemented by Chinese NGOs as a part of China's flagship initiative.

While Nepal officially mentions that not a single project has taken off in Nepal under the BRI due to unfinalised funding and implementation modalities, China appears keen to categorise any bilateral engagements in Nepal as a part of the BRI initiative. China has publicly stated its intention to establish the neighbourhood as a demonstration zone for the success of the Belt and Road initiative along with other global initiatives, and as a strategically important neighbour, Nepal is a priority. For Beijing, ensuring the implementation of an agreement reached during President Xi Jinping's state visit to Nepal in 2019 has also been a matter of prestige. The agreement was aimed at accelerating the implementation of BRI within the broader framework of the Trans-Himalayan Multidimensional Connectivity Network. Further, China is eager to reaffirm its strategic influence to counter the US influence, particularly in light of its unsuccessful attempt to block the ratification of the Millennium Challenge Cooperation (MCC) compact in Nepal. China has publicly stated its intention to establish the neighbourhood as a demonstration zone for the success of the Belt and Road initiative along with other global initiatives, and as a strategically important neighbour, Nepal is a priority.

Conclusion

China claims BRI has been implemented in Nepal, while Nepal has asserted that none of the projects under BRI has materialised. The Chinese intention seems clear—until Nepal signs the BRI Implementation Plan, Chinese cooperation in mega projects will remain in limbo, and engagements will continue to be limited to certain small-scale projects. However, finalising the financial and implementation modalities, and China's willingness to accommodate Nepal's interests, particularly its preference for grants and soft loans on par with other multilateral financial institutions, will remain critical for the implementation of BRI. Although the initial optimism regarding BRI has gradually waned, BRI may still move forward if China shows flexibility to address Nepal's concerns. However, in current circumstances, BRI is bound to remain in limbo.

China's economic and political ties with Nepal affecting lives of Tibetan refugee community

14 October 2024, NorthEast Herald

China's growing influence in Nepal is no longer just a geopolitical concern; it has evolved into a critical human rights issue, directly impacting the Tibetan refugee community, according to an article published on online magazine Bitter Winter.

Writer of the article Tsering Passang, who is the founder and Chair of Global Alliance for Tibet and Persecuted Minorities, said he spent a month in Nepal over the past summer, visiting Tibetan refugee camps, where he witnessed the intensifying struggles these refugees face as China's presence in the country becomes stronger.

The situation goes beyond economic development—it's a story of increasing repression, echoing the very circumstances that forced Tibetans to flee their homeland more than 65 years ago, Passang shared his experience.

One of the most visible signs of China's involvement in Nepal is the rapid transformation of the country's infrastructure.

From the introduction of Chinese-funded electric buses to the construction of airports in Lumbini and Pokhara, China's projects are reshaping the landscape and shifting public perception of China.

However, these economic developments come at a cost: the erosion of Nepal's sovereignty.

For years, Nepal has walked a fine line between India and China, maintaining a delicate balance in its foreign relations.

Yet, with an increasing number of Chinese-backed projects, concerns are growing about Nepal's long-term independence.

Despite the creation of new airports, foreign airlines remain cautious about using them, largely due to India's concerns about China's expanding role in Nepal's internal affairs.

As Nepal becomes more dependent on Chinese investments, its foreign policy risks tilting in Beijing's favor, potentially undermining its autonomy.

This shift in Nepal's geopolitical stance has even graver consequences for the 10,000 Tibetan refugees still living in exile in the country.

Having fled persecution and cultural suppression in Tibet after China's occupation, many Tibetans are now confronting similar restrictions in Nepal, where they had hoped to find safety, according to the article.

Expressions of Tibetan identity—whether through wearing a "Free Tibet" t-shirt, raising the Tibetan flag, or practicing traditional customs—are increasingly met with resistance.

Passang said that during his visit, he learned that local authorities, possibly under Chinese pressure, have begun restricting Tibetan cultural practices.

Events like Gorshey, once a public celebration of Tibetan heritage, are now forced underground in the Kathmandu Valley, he said, adding that the suppression of these cultural activities is a painful reminder of the repression Tibetans believed they had escaped.

Even the symbolic tradition of Lhakar (White Wednesday) is now in jeopardy.

This weekly movement, which began after the 2008 protests in Tibet, allows Tibetans to express pride in their identity by speaking their language, wearing traditional clothing, and supporting Tibetan-owned businesses.

Yet even these peaceful acts of cultural resistance are being stifled.

As China's influence deepens in Nepal, Tibetans are finding it harder to gather and celebrate their traditions without fear of reprisal, the article read.

What is particularly distressing is that the very freedoms Tibetan refugees sought in exile—freedom of expression, freedom from fear, and the preservation of their identity—are being stripped away.

The parallels between the repression they fled in Tibet and the growing pressure they now face in Nepal are becoming alarmingly clear.

This mounting threat to the rights of Tibetan refugees must be addressed on the global stage.

"The international community cannot remain silent. China's expanding role in Nepal is not just about infrastructure—it's about human rights and cultural survival," Passang wrote in the article.

"Tibetan refugees deserve the right to express their cultural identity without fear of persecution or interference," he added.

"Now is the time for action. Media outlets, human rights organizations, and governments worldwide must bring attention to this urgent issue," Passang mentioned.

"As China continues to reshape Nepal's political and social landscape, the global community has a responsibility to ensure that Tibetans in exile can live free from oppression and preserve their cultural heritage," he added. "Their struggle is not just about one displaced community—it is a fight for universal values like freedom, dignity, and the right to exist as a people."

"The struggle for Tibetan freedom continues," Passang noted.

He also urged the international community to stand with the Tibetan refugees in Nepal and recognize the growing threat of China's influence.

"Defending their cultural identity and their right to live free from oppression is a fight for the fundamental human rights we all hold dear," Passang wrote in the article.

Nepal Urges China to Share Data Required for Flood Management

09 October 2024, NewsWire

More than 200 people have died in Nepal as a result of extreme weather conditions during this year's monsoon season. Incessant rain lashed much of eastern and central Nepal, causing devastating floods. The Kathmandu Valley was badly hit. On October 2, Nepal's government said 224 people had so far been confirmed dead, while more than 150 others were injured and 24 people were missing.

In addition to the loss of life, many homes, power plants, and roads have been damaged by floods and landslides.

"I've never before seen flooding on this scale in Kathmandu," said Arun Bhakta Shrestha, the climate and environmental risks lead at the Hindu Kush Himalayan knowledge center, part of the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD).

The disaster serves as a reminder of Nepal's vulnerability to climate change, including the risks associated with melting glaciers.

In recent years, many glaciers in the Himalayan region have retreated, with melt water collection in glacial lakes. If these lakes burst, they have the potential to cause massive floods, endangering downstream communities.

And Nepal's Department of Hydrology and Meteorology claims that China has been withholding vital information on glacial lakes under its control in Tibet.

Department head Jagadishwor Karmacharya told the website Climate News that it is essential to obtain transparent information from the Chinese government in order to reduce the impact of floods.

Karmacharya said that China, Nepal, and India must collaborate to prevent disasters, adding that Nepal has been asking China for many years to supply data about its glacial lakes but China has not met promises to do so.

Tibet – which the People's Republic of China manages as the Tibet Autonomous Region – has sometimes been described by geologists as Asia's water tower. Many major rivers start there, which supply water to nearly two billion people downstream.

China is sensitive to external criticism that its governance of Tibet is marked by an irresponsible approach toward the environment.

"Poor environmental tactics have displaced Tibetan communities, destroyed religious sites, and degraded local ecosystems," according to International Campaign for Tibet President, Tencho Gyatso. In his view, climate change – as well as an expansive hydropower dam network, extractive industries, and grassland degradation – threaten sustainable water management of Tibet's water resources.

"China's occupation and isolation of Tibet creates a global blind spot, which puts at risk the lives and livelihoods of 1.8 billion people downstream," said Gyatso.

Earlier this year, a team of scientists published an article in the scientific journal Nature Geoscience that warned of the widespread societal and economic impact of expansion of the glacial lakes on the Tibetan Plateau.

The researchers said that “in the absence of hazard mitigation measures, lake expansion is projected to submerge critical human infrastructure, including more than 1,000 km of roads, approximately 500 settlements and around 10,000 sq km of ecological components, such as grasslands, wetlands and croplands.”

The scientists called for an international effort involving many countries, including China and Nepal, to address the problem.

Chinese Communist Party's direct aid to Nepali parties comes under fire

A relief initiative launched by the International Department of the Chinese Communist Party Central Committee on Friday for flood victims in Nepal, to be carried out through Nepali political parties, has drawn flak.

The Chinese Communist Party collaborated with the China Foundation for Rural Development Nepal Office to launch the initiative ‘Join hands to face the difficulties and overcome the difficulties together,’ aimed at providing humanitarian assistance to the flood-affected people in the Kathmandu Valley.

During the event, the relief materials were handed over to the representatives of various political parties of Nepal including the Nepali Congress, the CPN-UML and others.

Attendees included Wang Xin, counselor of the Chinese Embassy in Nepal, representatives from major political parties of Nepal, representatives from the China Foundation for Rural Development Nepal office and its partners, as well as local residents and government officials, said a press statement.

“In response to the disaster, the Central Committee of the CPC International Department quickly took action and supported flood-affected communities through Nepali parties,” the statement reads. “They collaborated with the China Foundation for Rural Development Nepal Office to launch the initiative ‘Join hands to face the difficulties and overcome the difficulties together and the International Department of CPC Central Committee action to comfort affected people in the 2024 Nepal flood disaster.”

It is rare for a foreign political party to provide direct aid and support to political parties in Nepal.

A leader who attended Friday's event told the Post that such practice does not do well for the host country and that it was not an event that required inviting representatives from various political parties.

“First, the amount was not significant,” said the leader requesting anonymity. “Second, extending direct support from foreign political parties to the political parties of another country is a very bad practice. But we were told by the party’s senior leaders to attend the event, so we went there but none of us were comfortable while receiving the support.”

At a time when the government has decided not to receive the support bilaterally from any country for the floods and landslide victims, receiving such donation from a political party of a foreign country sets a very wrong precedent, said the leader of a ruling party who attended the event on Friday.

“Now, if the Bharatiya Janata Party or Indian National Congress or any other political parties of other countries extend a similar kind of support to us, then what should we do?” the leader said.

According to the Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu, the relief materials including rice, blankets, food packages and other daily necessities worth Rs19.70 million were distributed to the households affected by the recent floods and landslide through Nepali political parties.

Former vice-chair of the National Planning Commission, Govind Raj Pokharel, has said that the support provided at the time of a disaster should be welcomed but that it should be received only through an effective and transparent one-door policy.

“If the BJP of India will give us cash, then should we accept it or not?” Pokharel said. “We have to be cautious while accepting such support.”

He also pointed out the need for a timely discussion about the policy of political parties about accepting support provided by other countries directly to them.

“Assistance at the time of disaster is welcome but such assistance should be accepted through one-door policy of the government,” Pokharel writes on X. “We need to think on time regarding political parties of other countries providing assistance to our political parties directly.”

After the launch of the emergency relief action, as many as 1,242 sets of carefully prepared relief supplies were swiftly distributed, including toothpaste, toothbrushes, towels, soap, sanitary pads, pressure cookers, plastic containers for packaging, blankets, mosquito nets, sleeping mats, water jar dispensers with mugs, rice, oil, lentil—essential items for the affected communities, said the Chinese Embassy.

Emergency family kits and food packages were distributed to 60 affected households during an event at Shree Mahendra Saraswati Sewa School in Teku, Kathmandu Metropolitan City-12.

Social media users have also criticised the manner in which the relief material was provided.

Vijay Kant Karna, a former ambassador, describes it as a very dangerous practice. Karna says that it gave opportunities for other countries' diplomatic missions to distribute anything to Nepali political parties. "I have never seen this practice before in Nepal," Karna writes on X.

China's withholding of vital information on glacial lakes in Tibet may have contributed to Nepal's flood disaster

Some 224 people had died, more than 150 others were injured and 24 missing as of Oct 2 due to disasters caused by incessant rain in much of eastern and central Nepal, including the capital Kathmandu, and China's withholding of vital information on glacial lakes under its control in Tibet could be partly responsible for it, according to thediplomat.com Oct 5.

In addition to the loss of life, many homes, power plants, and roads have been damaged by floods and landslides, serving as a reminder of Nepal's vulnerability to climate change, the report said.

"I've never before seen flooding on this scale in Kathmandu," Arun Bhakta Shrestha, the climate and environmental risks lead at the Hindu Kush Himalayan knowledge centre, part of the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development (ICIMOD), has said.

Many glaciers in the Himalayan region have retreated in recent years, with melt water collecting in glacial lakes. These lakes could breach – and have breached – with the potential to cause massive floods, endangering downstream communities.

And Nepal's Department of Hydrology and Meteorology has expressed disappointment that China has been withholding vital information on glacial lakes under its control in Tibet, the report noted.

The report cited the department's head, Jagadishwor Karmacharya, as having told the website Climate

News that it is essential to obtain transparent information from the Chinese government in order to reduce the impact of floods.

Karmacharya has said that China, Nepal, and India must collaborate to prevent disasters. However, despite Nepal having asked it for many years to supply data about its glacial lakes, China has not met promises to do so.

Tibet has sometimes been described by geologists as Asia's water tower, with many major rivers starting there, supplying water to nearly two billion people downstream.

China's environmentally unsustainable development and related activities have partly been blamed for the worsening situation in Tibet, with devastating consequences both for the local Tibetan people and in downstream countries, including China itself.

"Poor environmental tactics have displaced Tibetan communities, destroyed religious sites, and degraded local ecosystems," Tencho Gyatso, President of Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet, has said.

"China's occupation and isolation of Tibet creates a global blind spot, which puts at risk the lives and livelihoods of 1.8 billion people downstream," she has said.

India too has been complaining about China's failure to provide hydrological data from Tibet that should enable it to take measures to avoid or minimize disasters.

Chinese Communist Party launches relief initiative for Nepal flood victims

The International Department of the Chinese Communist Party Central Committee on Friday launched a relief initiative for flood victims.

It collaborated with the China Foundation for Rural Development Nepal Office to launch the initiative 'Join hands to face the difficulties and overcome the difficulties together,' providing humanitarian assistance to the flood-affected people in the Kathmandu Valley.

Many compassionate enterprises and individuals have expressed their willingness to provide material and financial assistance for the rescue efforts in Nepal, working together to help the Nepali people overcome this difficult time, it said.

Red Cross Society of China donates $100,000 to disaster victims of Nepal

The Red Cross Society of China has donated $100,000 to assist victims affected by the disaster in Nepal.

Chen Song, Chinese Ambassador to Nepal, handed over the amount to the Nepal Red Cross Society through the Ministry of Home Affairs on Wednesday. According to the Ministry of Home Affairs, the funds have been transferred to the Nepal Red Cross Society through the home ministry for the assistance of victims affected by natural disasters such as floods, landslides and inundation.

Ambassador Song expressed the commitment that the Chinese government will provide additional support for the disaster victims. So far, the death toll from the recent floods and landslides has reached 228, with 25 people still missing in floods and landslides triggered by heavy rains.

Nepal surveys damage after deadly floods kill at least 193 people

30 September 2024, Aljazeera

Search and rescue teams in Nepal's capital have been picking through wrecked homes as floodwaters have started to recede.

Officials reported on Monday that the death toll from the monsoon floods and landslides had risen to 193 around the Himalayan nation. At least 31 others were missing and many others injured, police said.

Entire neighbourhoods in Kathmandu were inundated after the heaviest rains in more than two decades, with the capital temporarily cut off from the rest of the country after landslides blocked highways.

"Our focus is on search and rescue, including people who have been stranded on highways," said Ministry of Home Affairs spokesman Rishi Ram Tiwari.

Deadly floods and landslides are common across South Asia during the monsoon season, lasting from June to September, but experts say climate change is making them worse. The International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development, a Nepal-based think tank, said the disaster had been made worse by unplanned urban encroachment around the Bagmati River, which courses through the capital.

Nepal's army said more than 4,000 people had been rescued using helicopters, motorboats and rafts.

Bulldozers were being used to clear nearly two dozen sections of main highways leading into Kathmandu that had been blocked by debris.

Nepal's weather bureau said preliminary data from stations in 14 districts measured record-breaking rain in the 24 hours to Saturday morning.

A monitoring station at the Kathmandu airport recorded about 240mm (9.4 inches) of rain, the highest since 2002.

The monsoon season brings 70-80 percent of South Asia's annual rainfall and is vital for agriculture and food production in a region home to about two billion people.

But monsoon rains also bring widespread death and destruction in the form of floods and landslides.

Experts say climate change has worsened their frequency and intensity.

More than 300 people have died in Nepal in rain-related disasters this year.

Nepalese Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli Meets with Wang Yi

27 September 2024, MFA

On September 26, 2024 local time, Nepalese Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli met with Member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and Foreign Minister Wang Yi on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly in New York.

Wang Yi conveyed Chinese leaders' cordial greetings to Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli. He said, China and Nepal are linked by mountains and rivers with a shared future and have established a strategic partnership of cooperation featuring everlasting friendship for development and prosperity, which builds on history and heralds a bright future. China has always placed Nepal in an important position in its neighborhood diplomacy and is committed to building an even closer China-Nepal community with a shared future. Next year marks the 70th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Nepal. The two sides should take this opportunity to push for more fruitful results from Belt and Road cooperation and other cooperation programs to benefit the two peoples.

Wang Yi said, China will, as always, support Nepal in safeguarding its sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity. China hopes that Nepal will find a successful development path suited to its national conditions. China appreciates Nepal's reiteration on many occasions that it will not allow any force to use its territory for anti-China activities. China has decided to grant zero-tariff treatment on 100 percent of taxable items from the least developed countries that have diplomatic relations with China, which will facilitate the entry of more Nepalese specialty products to China. China welcomes Nepal's declaration in China of 2025 as the Year of Tourism in Nepal and is ready to work with Nepal to jointly plan a series of activities to promote people-to-people exchanges.

Nepal's Deputy Prime Minister Bishnu Prasad Paudel and China's Vice Premier Ding Xuexiang agreed on accelerating the timely implementation of bilateral agreements, including key infrastructure projects like the Kathmandu-Kerung railway and cross-border transmission lines.

Nepal's Deputy Prime Minister Bishnu Prasad Paudel held a bilateral meeting with China's Vice Premier Ding Xuexiang where the two leaders discussed the entire gamut of bilateral relations, including the implementation of projects in a time-bound manner.

Paudel, who is also Nepal's Finance Minister, during Thursday's discussion stressed the need for working collectively to accelerate the implementation of agreements signed between the two governments in a time-bound manner, a Foreign Ministry statement said. Appreciating the excellent bilateral relations between the two countries, Ding stressed on the importance of practical cooperation between Nepal and China for mutual benefit.

The Chinese vice premier also responded positively to the proposal for time-bound implementation of the agreements, the statement said. "The two leaders further agreed to advance the projects under the Trans-Himalayan Multi-dimensional Connectivity Network, particularly Kathmandu-Kerung railway, cross-border transmission line, Kimathanka-Hile, and Hilsa-Simikot roads," it said.

They also discussed the ways of enhancing cooperation in various sectors, including infrastructure, tourism, education, cultural exchanges, and people-to-people relations, the statement said.

Earlier, Paudel met China International Development Cooperation Agency Chairman Luo Zhaohui to discuss various aspects of Nepal-China development cooperation. During the meeting, Paudel highlighted the need to further deepen cooperation in the areas of infrastructure development, connectivity, trade and transport, and dry ports, among others.

Luo expressed support for the Chinese government in accelerating the ongoing projects as well as those relating to livelihood and good governance. The two leaders also discussed cooperation on agricultural and industrial parks as well as Madan Bhandari University of Science and Technology, according to the statement. Paudel, who was on a six-day visit to China, will return to Kathmandu on Saturday.

China committed to building closer China-Nepal community with shared future: Chinese FM

27 September 2024, Xinhua

China has always placed Nepal at an important position in its neighboring diplomacy, and is committed to building a closer China-Nepal community with a shared future, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi said on Thursday.

Wang, also a member of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee, made the remarks at a meeting with Nepalese Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly session in New York.

Wang said that China will continue to support Nepal in safeguarding its sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity, and hopes Nepal will find a successful development path that suits its national conditions.

China's decision to grant zero-tariff treatment to 100 percent of tariff items of products from all the least developed countries having diplomatic relations with China will facilitate more Nepalese specialty products to enter China, Wang added.

For his part, Oli said Nepal firmly adheres to the one-China policy, and is committed to enhancing cooperation with China.

Nepal, China see surge in border trade

Nepal-China trade through border routes rose around 70 percent during the first two months of Nepal's current 2024-25 fiscal year starting in mid-July, official figures showed.

Garments, footwear, electronic items, smartphones and electric vehicles are among goods imported from China through Rasuwagadhi and Tatopani border crossings ahead of Dashain and Tihar, two major festivals in Nepal which fall in mid-October and November.

"We're seeing good growth in trade through Rasuwagadhi border point in the last two months," said Rabindra Prasad Pyakurel, information officer at Rasuwa Customs Office.

"One obstacle to increasing trade through this route is, however, the poor road and customs infrastructure on the Nepal side," he told Xinhua.

China, Nepal launch joint military training

23 September 2024, AA

Exercise to focus on counter-terrorism and disaster relief operations

China and Nepal began a joint military exercise Sunday in southwestern China's Chongqing Municipality.

It marks the fourth joint training session between the two countries' armed forces, with the last one held in 2019.

Under the theme of "joint counter-terrorism operations in urban blocks," the training involves activities such as small arms shooting for special operations, counter-terrorism squad tactics, drone operations, emergency rescue drills and comprehensive counter-terrorism exercises.

Scheduled to run until Oct. 1, the training also includes joint research and exchanges on disaster response strategies, particularly concerning earthquakes, avalanches and landslides.

Cultural exchange events will further promote mutual trust and understanding between the two military forces.

Nepal and China set to resume military drill

10 September 2024, The Annapurna Express, Shambhu Kattel

Nepal and China are set to resume their joint military drill, which had been stalled since 2019 due to the Covid-19 pandemic. The fourth edition of the drill will be held in China later this month. According to sources at the Nepali Army headquarters, the exercise will begin on Sept 21 and last for 10 days. Although China had been hesitant to restart the drill in the early years following the pandemic due to strict health restrictions, it has now agreed to move forward.

Outgoing Army chief Prabhu Ram Sharma played a key role in reviving the joint drill between the Nepal Army and China's People's Liberation Army, according to officials. Army spokesperson Brig Gen Gaurav Kumar KC confirmed that discussions are ongoing to finalize the details, although he did not provide further specifics.

Sharma has reportedly proposed to the Chinese side that the dates for the exercise be confirmed before his retirement. Sharma officially retired on Monday, passing the leadership of the Nepali Army to Ashok Raj Sigdel. In preparation for the exercise, Sharma had earlier dispatched senior official Prem Dhoj Adhikari to Beijing for discussions. The final dates were set shortly after Adhikari's return.

The drill, known as the Sagarmatha Friendship exercise, first began in 2017, drawing attention from both New Delhi and Beijing. This year's edition will take place in Chengdu, China. Prior to 2017, while Nepal and China had engaged in training and exchanges, no joint military drills had been held between the two countries.

India, the US, and other nations have expressed concerns about the growing military cooperation between Nepal and China, viewing it through the lens of rising geopolitical tensions. Recently, China has introduced new global initiatives in both the development and security sectors, such as the Global Security Initiative (GSI), which has raised further apprehension in India and Western nations. Nepal, however, has informed China that it cannot be part of the GSI.

The Nepali Army maintains that these joint drills are routine, similar to the military exercises it conducts with other nations, including India and the US. For example, Nepal and India hold the Surya Kiran military drill annually, rotating the location between the two countries.

A special team from the Nepal Army, including an observer group led by senior official Pradeep Jung KC, will visit China to participate in the drill, which will focus on counterterrorism and disaster management. Each country will send a delegation of 18 members. The previous three editions of the drill were held in 2017, 2018, and 2019.

Nepal trade point of Khasa opens for cargo trucks to Kathmandu after 2 week closure

04 September 2024, News On Air

In Nepal, the trade point of Khasa opens for cargo trucks to Kathmandu after closure for two weeks on Tuesday. Due to the construction of a tunnel in the Nyalam and Khasa regions of Tibet in China as part of the Chinese smart city project, goods containers to Nepal were restricted from entering the Khasa border trade point with Nepal from August 30. The trade points north of Bagmati Province were opened, giving a sense of relief to traders in Nepal.

As Nepal's biggest festival, Dashain, is scheduled for next month, the restriction in these trade points stressed Nepali businesses whose consignments were in cargos to Kathmandu. Nepal's trade deficit with China remained negative at Rs 296.18 billion.

Since March, 14 trans-Himalayan trade points have reopened after four years that were closed during COVID-19 times, but there is no cross-border trade taking place from these points. Rasuwagadhi-Kerung and Tatopani-Zhangmu/Khasa are two international trade routes connecting Nepal and China. Tatopani-Khasa has historically been the main land route for trade with China.

The Rasuwagadhi-Kerung customs point was being used as an alternative route after the closure of the Tatopani-Khasa point in 2015.

China–Nepal strategic partnership stumbles over BRI and boundary issues

31 August 2024, East Asia Forum

In 2019, Xi Jinping visited Nepal and declared that China–Nepal relations would change from a comprehensive partnership to a strategic partnership. The focus of relations has shifted towards enhancing strategic and security. But neither country can come to an agreement on the two most important pillars of this new relationship, calling its sustainability into question.

These pillars are the Boundary Management System (BMS) and the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Xi proposed the BMS – which commits both countries to return people who are found crossing the border illegally. Nepal signed an agreement, but it has yet to be ratified. In 2017, Nepal signed the Memorandum of Understanding to join the BRI, but some point out Nepal's failure to implement projects. In June 2024, China and Nepal conducted two important meetings to discuss border-related issues and BRI implementation. The outcome of these meetings was bleak, partially because of disagreements over the BRI and BMS.

On 20 June 2024, representatives of China and Nepal met in Beijing for a meeting of the Joint Expert Group to conduct a discussion related to border issues, but did not produce a bilateral statement. The lack of a bilateral statement encourages speculation. One particular speculation is that this meeting failed to yield positive outcomes to resolve border issues, which could be because of the failure to reach a consensus on ratifying the BMS.

While the Chinese side pressed Nepal to ratify the BMS, Nepal urged China to follow the mandates of the boundary protocol, which require both sides to first engage in border investigation, then meet and resolve border issues and finally ratify the BMS. In Nepal, border inspection is a priority because there have been increased cases of encroachment, illegal construction and missing border pillars.

China's push for a BMS is driven by the need to establish a comprehensive security mechanism at the border as soon as possible, to guard the political stability of Tibet. Since the Tibetans' 2008 protest in Nepal, Chinese scholars and leaders have pushed for border pacification to be China's top priority in Nepal. Tibetans are one of the primary targets of the BMS. Reports claim that the BMS also sought to repatriate Tibetans fleeing Tibet within a week, though the content of the agreement is yet to be made public.

Following the border talk, on 26 June 2024 China and Nepal held the 16th Meeting of the Nepal–China Diplomatic Consultation Mechanism. Instead of joint statements, after the meeting Nepal made a press release, while China published news about the meeting. It is evident that a lack of agreement on the BRI is a major issue. For instance, the Chinese side mentioned the BRI twice in approximately 300 news reports. In contrast, Nepal's press releases do not mention the BRI at all.

The BRI has become a sensitive issue in Nepal. Nepal is reluctant to accept high-interest loans because it is wary of getting trapped in unsustainable debts owed to China, which has happened with Sri Lanka and other countries. In 2023 the above concerns spurred a controversy in Nepal, when the Chinese embassy mentioned that Pokhara International Airport was built under the BRI.

Some Nepalese lawmakers also expressed concern over the lack of transparency in the implementation of BRI projects. But China is not interested in providing grants, which has led to BRI diplomatic stagnation. Nepal also worries about maintaining strategic balance with India, which is Nepal's largest trading partner.

Amidst the contention over these issues, it is interesting to observe other aspects of the press releases. The Chinese side highlighted: 'The Nepali side reiterated its firm adherence to the one-China principle and will never allow any force to use its territory for anti-China activities'.

But this commitment, usually evident in press releases or joint statements, is missing from the Nepali side. Nepal only mentioned that 'Vice Minister Weidong appreciated Nepal's commitment to the One China Principle'. There is no mention of zero tolerance for anti-China activities, and no mention of Tibet or Taiwan as integral parts of China. This departure from tradition underscores contention in the relationship. With the change from bilateral relations to a strategic partnership, China's pressure to sign the BMS underlines its role in China's overall strategic and security objectives in Nepal. These two meetings revealed that the BRI and BMS constitute China's two most important diplomatic and security elements, driving its interest in Nepal.

Without consensus on these two issues, the strategic partnership between the two remains peripheral. Nepal's avoidance of mentioning the BRI and its commitment to anti-China activities is a small but significant gesture of resistance to China's hegemony. In July 2024, Nepal witnessed the formation of a new government that catapulted Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli, chairman of the Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), to the prime ministership in a coalition government with the Nepali Congress party. The Chinese government have already pressured Oli on the BRI.

But the situation is different this time. Nepali Congress has long been opposed to Nepal accepting BRI loans because of Nepal's high debt burden and argue Nepal should only accept BRI grants. Oli needs Nepali Congress support and will not be easily swayed by China, which further complicates the implementation of the BRI.

Nepal, China to issue five-year passes for Himalayan districts

29 August 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Nepal and China have agreed to issue five-year entry and exit passes for people in 15 districts of northern Nepal abutting China. After incorporating Chinese feedback, the Department of Immigration, under the the Ministry of Home Affairs, has recently redesigned the entry/exit pass and come with an operating procedure, which was first approved on June 19 by the ministry.

The new arrangement, which is in line with the bilateral agreement and immigration regulations, will allow Nepali citizens living near the Chinese border to enter and exit from China's Autonomous Region, Tibet, states one of the objectives of the operating procedure issued by the government.

Nepali citizens living in northern districts who depend on Tibet for trade, pilgrimage, work, health checks and other daily activities, have long been complaining of hassles in visiting Tibet due to lack of mandatory passes.

However, this arrangement was suspended after the onset of Covid pandemic at the end of 2019. And after China started reopening 14 traditional entry points, some local units on the Nepali side started issuing temporary "China Departure and Entry Permits" locally. Now, to streamline the entry and exit permission, the Department of Immigration is all set to issue digital passes to residents of the 15 districts. However, Nepali citizens from other districts will need a visa to enter Chinese territory.

According to the operating procedure, the 15 districts where the passes would be distributed are Taplejung, Sankhuwasabha, Solukumbhu, Dolakha, Sindhupalchok, Rasuwa, Dhading, Gorkha, Manang, Mustang, Dolpa, Mugu, Humla, Bajhang and Darchula. Those 14 dedicated trading/entry/exit points between Nepal and China are Tiptala (Taplejung); Kimathnaka (Sankhuwasabha); Falak and Lapchi of Dolakha; Tatopani and Gumba of Sindhupalchok; Lazing and Chhekampar (Gorkha); Korala of Mustang; Hilsa (Humla); Nakcha (Mugu); Maringla Bhanjyang (Dolpa); Urai (Bajhang); and Tinkar of Darchula district.

According to the Department of Immigration, the entry pass will, however, not be issued immediately in Solukumbhu, Dhading, and Manang districts due to ongoing adverse weather conditions.

"A decision has already been made to issue digital passes. It is in the implementation process," said Koshahari Niraula, Director General at the Department of Immigration. "Necessary instructions have been given to the immigration and district administration offices for implementation."

Before 2007, Nepali and Chinese nationals from border districts could travel up to 30 kilometres inside each other's territory without restrictions. However, in January 2007, both sides reached a new agreement under which an identity card with one year validity was made mandatory, said noted cartographer Buddhi Narayan Shrestha. Now, both sides have developed a digital identity card.

Nepal and China first entered an 'Agreement on Trade and other Related Matters between the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) of China and Nepal' on September 30, 1956, which was last renewed on July 10, 2002.

The agreement says those wishing to travel to the other country must hold valid passports issued by the sending country and a visa issued by the receiving country. Inhabitants of the border districts shall hold exit-entry passes with photo-affixed ID cards for border trade, pilgrimage and to visit relatives and friends, according to the agreement.

Shrestha said those with the entry/exit passes are not allowed to travel beyond the border districts into the interior of the other country.

"Generally, the limit is 30 km from the borderline. And those with permits for pilgrimage can travel through the designated routes and allotted entry points. They are not permitted to stay in the border districts of the receiving country for more than a month. Either party has the right to refuse entry into its territory of anyone deemed persona non-grata," according to Shrestha.

A senior foreign ministry official confided to the Post that the Chinese side initially expressed some reservations about the proposed operating procedure, particularly the issuance of five-year passes to Nepali citizens in the 15 northern districts. They had also called for making the passes digital.

After considering the Chinese request, the foreign ministry official said that the home ministry had redesigned the new pass, revisiting some conditions that were initially proposed.

Niraula said the Chinese side has agreed to issue the pass for five years. "With their consent, we have finalised and issued the new operating procedure." According to one Home Ministry official, the ministry and the Department of Immigration agreed to incorporate biometric security features into the pass, as requested by Chinese officials. The new pass with biometric information is intended to curb illegal and criminal activities across the Nepal-Tibet border.

The five-year pass will be issued exclusively to Nepali citizens living in the 15 border districts, their siblings, and those who are married and living permanently in these districts.

Also, those who have migrated from other districts and are now permanently living in these 15 districts are eligible for the pass.

However, if someone gets married and migrates to another district, they will not get the pass.

To obtain the entry pass, one should fill out a form and provide required documents including a copy of the citizenship, a recommendation letter from the ward office, a migration letter if the service seeker has migrated from another district, a marriage certificate (for those coming from another district after marriage) and a passport-sized photo, according to the operating procedure.

After verifying all the documents and information, the immigration office issues the permit, said the work plan. In case a district does not have immigration office, the service seekers should visit the district administration offices to receive the pass.

"The permit is not transferable and will remain valid for up to five years from the date of issuance. Once it expires, one should reapply. If the card is lost or destroyed, the same process should be followed to get a copy of the permit," according to the operating procedure.

Madav Sapkota, a CPN (Maoist Centre) lawmaker from Sindhupalchok district, lauded the development and said it will benefit the people living in bordering districts.

"The process was started when Pushpa Kamal Dahal was the prime minister, and now it is set to be formalised. Earlier, the Chinese authorities would issue one-year entry permits, and after Covid, they limited it to a day-long pass. If the entry process is simplified further, it will benefit the citizens from both sides even more," said Sapkota.

China-Nepal agricultural technology park launched in southern Nepal

28 August 2024, Xinhua

Nepal Southern Agricultural Science and Technology Park was launched on Tuesday in the south-central city of Bharatpur to increase rice production in the South Asian country.

The park will improve Nepal's rice yield per unit area and increase grain production by conducting experimental demonstrations of Chongqing hybrid rice varieties and rice cultivation techniques in the country, said Wang Shijie, deputy chief of Chongqing municipal agriculture and rural affairs committee.

China and Nepal will also carry out cooperation in greenhouse vegetable cultivation and livestock and fish breeding in Kubhinde village of Nepal's Sindhupalchok district as well as in Jhapa district, Wang noted in addressing the launch ceremony.

The park was developed with the support of China-South Asian Countries Poverty Alleviation and Cooperative Development Center, which was officially launched in Chongqing in southwestern China in July 2021. The center aims to pool strength, integrate resources and exchange insights to support and help in the South Asian countries' economic development and livelihood improvement, thus jointly advancing poverty reduction.

Mayor of Bharatpur Renu Dahal described the park's launch as an important move toward poverty alleviation through innovation and sustainable development.

Agriculture is the backbone of Nepal's economy and provides livelihood to a large portion of the population, she noted at the launch ceremony.

"We believe that the project would help address challenges such as climate change, food security and sustainable agricultural development," she said.

The project is implemented by Nepal's Agriculture and Forestry University based in Bharatpur and Chongqing Academy of Agricultural Sciences.

Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song called the park a milestone in agricultural cooperation between the two countries.

Bharatpur is one of the most important traditional agricultural towns in Nepal with excellent natural conditions for agricultural development, while Chongqing has advanced agricultural sciences and abundant resources, and thousands of technical experts in the city could convert technology innovation into practical application, Chen said at the launch ceremony.

"Further agricultural cooperation could stimulate greater potential for Bharatpur, contributing to common development and shared prosperity for both cities and both countries," he added.

Benighat-Manaslu-China road brings promises of economic shift

27 August 2024, Online Khabar

The Nepali public has almost forgotten the economic block that was imposed by India and protestors from Madhesh in 2015. However, the shift in the national economy after this six-month-long economic crisis has impacted many lives. There was a shift from Indian to Chinese trade in 2015, which led to the construction of multiple road networks connecting Nepal to China. One of those actions by the Government of Nepal during the 2015 economic blockade was letting the Nepal Army open a 180 km road linking China to Benighat via Gorkha's Sama Gaun. Another stretch of the same track passed through Chekampar village of TSUM, leading to China's Border. That's two roads to the Border of China, less than 50 km apart.

The construction project of the Benighat-China road was approved in January 2015, and the lower section from Benighat to Hawa Dada was done by the Departments of Road. The responsibility of a 120 km road section from Hawa Dada to the border was then handed over to the Nepal Army.

According to the Defence Ministry of that time, the army received Rs 35 million for opening the track back in 2017; after that, the army started the work. The construction was supposed to be completed in 2027.

Importance of Benighat- China Road

The long-due project of Benighat connecting the Border of Tibet opens a new trading route that is closer to Kathmandu Valley, Pokhara, and Chitwan, Nepal's three largest cities. The road goes via Samdo village of Darchre Rural Municipality directly into the Ruila Naka of Tibet.

Currently, the 108 km Araniko highway that connects Kathmandu to Kodak is the major trading route from Kathmandu to the world's major economy, China. Several factors, such as heavy traffic, poor road maintenance, landslides, political disputes at the Border, and many other factors, often cause trade to be blocked between Nepal and Tibet when we rely on the Araniko Highway only.

Thus, the need for a new highway connecting Nepal to Tibet, especially in the Western zone, closer to other large cities such as Pokhara and Chitwan, is going to play a big role in the import/ export business of Nepal and China. And this project is going to open up some new trade prospects.

Challenges along the road

The Nepali army commenced the construction of a 60- kilometre road in 2017. In five years, the army successfully opened an 18-kilometre-long section and handed it over to the Benighat-Arughat-Larkebhanyang Road Construction Task Force. Another 18.5 km of road track was also almost ready at the end of 2022.

Reports suggest that the road goes via the Ngula Dhajen Pass at a height of 5,093 m (16,709 ft), making it among the highest-altitude roads in Nepal. As the road section will be covered in thick snow for more than half of the year, construction is not easy.

Considering the remoteness of the Samagoan and TUSM area, logistical and engineering issues for cutting off such large cliffs and buildings through a narrow gorge are going to take a lot of work. Although the Nepal Army was supposed to complete the construction by 2027, it might take a few additional years before they are ready to hand over the complete road.

Road and life of Manaslu/ TSUM Valley

TSUM valley is one of the sacred valleys that Guru Rinpoche (also called Padmasambhava) created and named Beyul. In Buddhism, Beyul is a holy place where there will never be war among people, and everyone lives in perfect harmony with nature. Understanding the significance of such a holy place, the government of Nepal has kept TSUM valley as the restricted land of Nepal in an attempt to protect the traditions and culture of this pristine land.

For so many years, even a helicopter could not land in Manaslu without a special permit. So, having such a road network is going to greatly shift people's lifestyles.

Along with a national highway, many financial and social benefits come to the connecting villages. As a well-paved gravel road crosses the pristine TSUM valley, the locals have better access to trade, schools, hospitals, jobs, and more.

However, the locals are worried that it will be difficult to preserve the cultural and traditional values of the TSUM area after such exposure.

A local of Chhokung Paro village, Penarapsing, said, "We were never consulted if we wanted a highway to pass through our villages. They came up with a measuring tape, cut through our land, and ran dozers right next to our holy Monastery. How will we pray right next to the highway with continuous noise? The community's free, prior, and informed consent was not acknowledged while they planned the construction, and the villagers are not happy with it." Another big concern is its impact on the trek tourism incomes of Manaslu and TSUM. Manaslu Trek is currently the third most crowded hiking route in Nepal, right after Everest and Annapurna. Now, as this road passes through the traditional trekking route, the tourism industry here is at severe risk. The dirt, noise, and pollution along the way will surely end Manaslu's tourism shortly.

The local government should start planning to build an alternative trekking route to the villages of Samagaun and TSUM Valley as soon as possible. However, even after an alternative trekking route, the tourists are likely to reduce the duration of the trek. The previously popular Annapurna Circuit Trekking Trail's deserted villages reflect the future of Jagat, Deng, Chumling and more. A long-term sustainable plan must be made to protect the culture and trekking tourism industry of TSUM before bulldozers and heavy trucks start to walk through these "Beyul".

Nepal Asks China to Wipe Away a Loan It Can't Afford to Pay Back

23 August 2024, The New York Times

When Nepal's new international airport opened last year in one of the country's biggest cities, it was the type of landmark project expected to elevate the fortunes of one of Asia's poorest countries while deepening its ties with China, which built and financed the project.

But the Pokhara airport has become a symbol of another sort: the pitfalls of China's international infrastructure projects, which face criticism for sometimes costly and poor-quality construction that leaves borrower countries awash in debt.

On Thursday, Nepal's one-month-old government, led by the country's largest communist party, which has close ties to Beijing, formally asked China to convert a $216 million loan for the airport into a grant, wiping away the debt. It made the request during a visit by a Chinese delegation including Sun Weidong, China's vice foreign minister.

The airport has been beset by problems. A few weeks after it opened in January 2023, a domestic flight headed for the city crashed into a river gorge, killing 72 people. The airport has not attracted any regular international flights, dimming the financial outlook for the project. Over the last year, Nepal's anti-corruption agency and a parliamentary committee started investigations into the airport's construction.

Last year, The New York Times reported that China CAMC Engineering, the construction arm of a state-owned conglomerate, Sinomach, had inflated the cost of the project and undermined Nepal's attempts to keep tabs on construction quality. Through its Belt and Road Initiative, a signature campaign of President Xi Jinping, China has extended more than $1 trillion in loans and grants, according to some estimates, for international infrastructure projects. The initiative is part of Beijing's efforts to forge economic and diplomatic ties with other countries, while building a lucrative portfolio of construction work for its state-owned enterprises. But for some developing countries, the loans have become a financial albatross as they struggle to repay the debt.

In an interview on Friday, Bishnu Prasad Paudel, Nepal's deputy prime minister and finance minister, said it had made the request to China as "our neighboring country" because Nepal was still scrambling to revive its economy.

"We are hopeful," Mr. Paudel said, but he declined to elaborate.

The Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu, Nepal's capital city, did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

If Beijing agrees to Nepal's request, it will be another indication of a strengthening relationship between the country's new government and China. In July, Nepal's biggest communist party joined forces with the Nepali Congress, the largest party in the country's Parliament, to create a coalition government, led by K.P. Sharma Oli. He forged a reputation for opposing the influence of India, Nepal's neighbor to the south and a regional rival to China, during three previous stints as prime minister. His government has wasted no time cozying up to Beijing. On Thursday, he overturned a ban on TikTok, the popular social media app owned by Chinese technology giant ByteDance, that his predecessors had imposed less than a year ago.

On the same day, Nepal also said the two countries had agreed to a series of development projects, including two to upgrade highways that connect to the Chinese border. They also agreed to build integrated check posts along the border between Nepal and China.

Nepal's economy, heavily reliant on overseas remittances and tourism, has struggled to recover since the pandemic. The international airport in Pokhara, a picturesque city in the foothills of the Himalayas, was seen as a way to bolster tourism and breathe new life into the economy.

But so far, the airport has failed to attract any commercial international flights, largely because India has refused to grant permission for its carriers to fly in and out of Pokhara. This has raised fears that the airport would not generate enough revenue to pay back the loan from the Export-Import Bank of China. Nepal is scheduled to start repayment of the loan in 2026.

At the same time, there are two investigations into the airport's construction. Nepal's Commission for the Investigation of Abuse and Authority is looking into reports of corruption by the Chinese construction company for compromising construction quality to maximize profit. Nepali officials are also accused of accepting kickbacks while awarding the contract to CAMC. A separate parliamentary committee was formed to investigate possible irregularities in construction.

CAMC did not respond to a request for comment about the investigations.

Binoj Basnyat, a retired Nepali general working as a researcher with Rangsit University in Thailand, said China would probably convert the loan to a grant because it wanted to build a strong relationship with Nepal's communist party. He also noted another benefit for China if it agreed to the request.

"The investigation into the corruption charges will quickly come to an end," Mr. Basnyat said. "Nobody will talk about that anymore."

In Nepal, the US and India Come Together to Counter China

22 August 2024, The Diplomat

Nepal's new Foreign Minister Arzu Rana Deuba is in India this week for a series of high-profile meetings. Deuba was originally scheduled to fly to New Delhi for a routine health checkup. But given the political circumstances surrounding India-Nepal relations, New Delhi upgraded her visit to an official trip, and Deuba even got a rare audience with India's Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

Deuba's visit to India is her first foreign trip since taking charge of Nepal's Foreign Ministry last month under the country's new Prime Minister K.P. Sharma Oli. That detail is not by itself very significant: Since it became a republic 17 years ago, Nepal has seen a change of prime minister as many as 13 times — often a result of shifting alliances between the three major political parties in the country's divided parliament. Oli himself has now become prime minister for a third time. His two main rivals, Sher Bahadur Deuba (Arzu Rana Deuba's husband) and Pushpa Kamal Dahal, have each been prime minister for five and three terms respectively. None of them has ever completed a full term in office so far.

Yet, Deuba's trip to New Delhi is still significant. The last two times that he was in power, Oli pivoted hard toward China and ran up a long gamut of spats with India. He faced down an economic blockade from New Delhi, raked up old territorial disputes along the border, and signed a landmark agreement with Beijing to reduce his country's dependence on Indian trade routes. With Oli back in power, India is now trying to get out in front, especially as it faces a series of politically unfavorable developments elsewhere in the neighborhood — from Bangladesh to the Maldives.

Nepal is important not just to India but also to the United States. Nestled between India and China in the strategically contested Himalayas, Nepal is an important player in checking China's influence in South Asia.

As in most other parts of Asia, the path to winning influence in Nepal runs through the economy. Much like the rest of the region, Nepal's economy suffered hard during the pandemic. Tourism revenue — a key driver of growth — dried up, causing trade imbalances and inflation. According to a government survey, unemployment stood at 12.6 percent in 2022-23 — up from 11.4 percent in 2017-18 before the pandemic. Not by coincidence, Nepal has become the unlikely source of the largest contingent of foreign mercenaries fighting for the Russians in Ukraine — as many as 15,000 of them, according to some reports. China has already entered and dominated the fray. Like other South Asian economies, Nepal sees economic ties with China as a way to break free from New Delhi's historic hegemony. In recent times, Chinese imports have surged while imports from India have declined. Earlier this year, Nepal and China teamed up to drill for oil in the former's territory as a way to reduce Nepal's dependence on oil imports from India — a key strategic objective for Kathmandu after New Delhi imposed an economic blockade on its fuel imports in 2015 over a political dispute. There have also been reports of possible projects under China's flagship Belt and Road Initiative.

But while Nepal pivots to China, the United States has not stood by idly. In recent years, Washington has tried to build its own presence in Nepal. In 2017, a $500 million compact was signed to build critical infrastructure, including the facilitation of cross-border electricity trade between Nepal and India. Last week, U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Richard Verma was in Kathmandu, pledging $100 million in military support.

Ordinarily, India is very sensitive to such activities in its neighborhood by major world powers. But in the wake of sundry disputes with Nepal and others in the region, New Delhi increasingly recognizes that it might not be able to ward off China's economic influence alone. That has created more space for the U.S. to coordinate with India in neighborhood relations. Perhaps tellingly, after Verma went to Nepal last week, he was warmly welcomed in New Delhi by India's Minister of External Affairs Subrahmanyam Jaishankar.

For New Delhi, such collaboration with the U.S. has become increasingly pivotal. In recent years, India's rise as an emerging power has been accompanied by testy relations with the neighborhood. Countries like Nepal have naturally pursued a policy of strategic autonomy by pivoting to China, to counterbalance India. Washington's entry into the region with economic assistance programs of its own will be to India's benefit.

Nepal government prepares to lift TikTok ban

21 August 2024, Online Khabar

The government of Nepal is preparing to lift the ban on the popular social media platform TikTok, following persistent pressure from the Chinese government. The move comes after repeated inquiries and diplomatic interventions from the Chinese side, urging the Nepali government to reconsider its decision.

The Pushpa Kamal Dahal-led government introduced the Social Media Regulation Guidelines on November 9, 2023. These guidelines mandated that all social media platforms operating in Nepal must register locally and establish a contact point within the country. Just days later, on November 13, the Cabinet decided to ban TikTok, citing concerns over the platform's role in spreading social discord and violating social norms.

Before the ban was implemented, former Prime Minister Dahal consulted with major political parties, including the Nepali Congress and UML, which led to their tacit support for the decision. However, TikTok responded by sending a written commitment to adhere to all of Nepal's laws and regulations and requested the government to lift the ban.

Chinese diplomatic pressure

Despite TikTok's commitments, the ban remained in place, leading to diplomatic pressure from China. Chinese Ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, raised the issue in almost every political meeting with Nepali officials, urging the government to reconsider the ban. Sources from the Office of the Prime Minister and Council of Ministers have confirmed that Prime Minister KP Sharma Oli has instructed officials to prepare the groundwork for lifting the ban. He emphasised that no social media platform should be banned outright and directed the Ministry of Communications and his advisory team to discuss TikTok's commitments and bring a proposal to the Cabinet for approval.

Geopolitical considerations and global context

The TikTok ban is not just a domestic issue but also ties into larger geopolitical dynamics. "Since the TikTok ban is also tied to geopolitics, there is some hesitation in making a decision," an official from the Office of the Prime Minister and Council of Ministers noted. However, the Prime Minister believes that the ban should not be prolonged, and a decision to lift it may come soon from the Cabinet.

Globally, TikTok has faced similar challenges. India imposed a complete ban on TikTok in 2020, while the United States has imposed limited restrictions. Over half of the US states, along with the federal government and various security agencies, have banned the app on employee devices. Currently, TikTok is partially or fully banned in more than 30 countries.

TikTok's compliance and commitment to Nepal's Laws

TikTok has made multiple appeals to the Nepali government to lift the ban. A week ago, TikTok's South Asia Public Policy and Government Relations Unit wrote to Minister for Communication and Information Technology Prithvi Subba Gurung, reiterating its commitment to complying with all of Nepal's laws.

After receiving TikTok's letter, which confirmed its acceptance of all legal provisions in Nepal, the Minister of Communication discussed the matter with the Prime Minister.

Earlier, on May 18, TikTok's Head of Public Policy and Government Relations for South Asia, Ferdous Mottakin, also wrote to the Office of the Prime Minister and Council of Ministers and copied the letter to the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Ministry of Communications. The letter mentioned various efforts by TikTok to address the government's concerns and claimed that the ban had negatively impacted government revenue.

TikTok's initiatives for content regulation and digital literacy

In the nine months since the ban was imposed, TikTok has sent eight letters demanding the lifting of the ban. In response to the government's decision, TikTok committed on November 14 to appoint a focal point to directly address Nepal's concerns regarding content on its platform.

On December 5, 2023, TikTok further committed to enhancing content filtering and moderation by onboarding Nepali language resources and addressing issues with filtering inappropriate content in the Nepali language.

TikTok has also pledged to launch a nationwide internet safety and digital literacy campaign and to support digitising educational content for school and college students to improve educational outcomes. TikTok claimed that it has employed 60 people to oversee the compliance with its "Social Guidelines" in Nepal.

Additionally, TikTok stated that it has opened access to its "Trust and Safety Enforcement Tool (TSET)" for the Nepal government, enabling the reporting of any content that violates the law. TikTok registered as a digital service taxpayer in Nepal, claimed to have removed millions of videos from its platform that violated community guidelines.

Legal challenges against the ban

The TikTok ban has also led to legal challenges in Nepal. Several lawsuits were filed in the Supreme Court, claiming that the ban infringed on constitutional rights to freedom of speech and expression. On November 21, 2023, Judge Binod Sharma's bench issued a show-cause order to the government without granting an interim order. The next hearing for the case is scheduled for September 25.

As the government finalises its decision, it remains to be seen how the lifting of the TikTok ban will unfold and what implications it will have for Nepal's social media landscape and its relations with China.

Locals of Gorkha elated with reopening of Nepal-China border

21 August 2024, The Annapurna Express

After a long wait, both the border points with Tibet of China have been opened.

The Ruila border point in Chumanbri Rural Municipality-1 and Nguila border point in Chumanbri Rural Municipality-7 of Gorkha have been opened, rural municipality Chairman Nima Lama informed.

Ruila border crossing has been open for 15 days and Nguila crossing for a month, Lama said.

The border points, closed by the Chinese side, were opened for a short time after five years.

Locals have been elated after the opening of the border crossings.

"Our border points have been opened. Now, the people can go to the Tibetan markets to buy daily essentials," Chetan Chumbel Lama of Chumanbri-7 said, adding, "We have been asked to bring citizenship and pass. Now, the villagers are preparing to go to Shyak of Tibet."

Though the border points are open, people are allowed to take only horses, not yaks, to transport goods.

Nguila border points were opened from Tuesday and Ruila from Wednesday.

During a meeting between the representatives of Chekampar and Tibetan officials, an understanding was reached that the border points will be opened from May.

The Chinese side had closed all 14 border points including Nguila border in Chumanbri-7 and Ruila border in Chumanbri-1 after the Covid-19 pandemic.

Chinese drones to transport trash from Nepal's Mount Everest in groundbreaking initiative

10 August 2024, The Express Tribune

The initiative aims to reduce the risks faced by Sherpas and improve waste management on the world's tallest peak.

This initiative announced by China's leading drone manufacturer, Da Jiang Innovations (DJI), aims to reduce the risks faced by Sherpas and improve waste management on the world's tallest peak.

Starting this autumn, heavy-lifting drones from DJI, will be used to transport trash from Ama Dablam, a 6,812-meter peak south of Everest.

This initiative announced by China's leading drone manufacturer, Da Jiang Innovations (DJI), aims to reduce the risks faced by Sherpas and improve waste management on the world's tallest peak.

Starting this autumn, heavy-lifting drones from DJI, will be used to transport trash from Ama Dablam, a 6,812-meter peak south of Everest.

The drones, which were successfully tested in April, can ferry up to 234 kg of waste per hour—a task that would typically take 14 porters six hours to complete. In spring 2025, these drones will be put to work on Everest, supplying ropes and ladders to Camp I at 5,943 meters and bringing garbage back to the base camp at 5,364 meters.

This initiative, supported by a tripartite memorandum of understanding (MoU) between the Sagarmatha Pollution Control Committee, the Khumbu Pasang Lhamu Rural Municipality, and Airlift Technology Pvt Ltd, is seen as a critical step in improving safety and environmental conditions on Everest.

"After a successful test in April, we plan to use drones commercially in the Everest region," said Jagat Bhusal, chief administration officer of the rural municipality that hosts Everest.

The drones, which produce a buzzing sound similar to a swarm of bees, offer a safer alternative to the treacherous work traditionally performed by Sherpas, particularly in the dangerous Khumbu Icefall.

The Khumbu Icefall, a notoriously perilous section of the climb to Everest's summit, has claimed nearly 50 lives since 1953, according to the Himalayan Database and government records.

The use of drones is expected to significantly reduce the number of dangerous trips Sherpas must make through the icefall, where avalanches and ice collapses are frequent.

Despite concerns that drones might reduce job opportunities for local Sherpas, Bhusal emphasized that the primary goal is to save lives.

"Yes, there are concerns that the machines may actually cut jobs. But our sole purpose is to reduce potential deaths in the Khumbu Icefall, the danger zone," he said.

Bhusal added that Sherpas would be trained to operate the drones, ensuring they remain an integral part of the operations.

The DJI FlyCart 30, the drone used in the tests, demonstrated its capability to transport up to 18 kg from Camp II and 30 kg from Camp I, although its performance varied with altitude.

The drones' introduction is part of a broader effort to address the growing waste problem on Everest, exacerbated by climate change and the increasing number of climbers.

During the 2024 spring climbing season, nearly 100 tonnes of garbage were collected from Everest and Lhotse, with the Sagarmatha Pollution Control Committee (SPCC) managing 85 tonnes of waste from the base camp and higher camps.

The introduction of drones is expected to streamline waste collection and reduce the environmental impact on the mountain.

As the first commercial agreement under the MoU framework is set to be signed, the Khumbu Pasang Lhamu Rural Municipality has already invested Rs800,000 in the trial phase.

The use of drones is seen as a significant advancement in high-altitude waste management, offering a safer and more efficient solution to the challenges posed by Everest's extreme environment.

Chinese envoy to Nepal kicks up another row via social media

05 August 2024, The Economic Times

The Chinese ambassador to Nepal kicked up another controversy through social media, drawing the ire of the local population. In the latest such instance, Chen Song faced criticism for passing a "joke" about a bus accident in Nepal.

On July 28, while reposting a news article titled "19 kg magnet, brought to search for the lost bus, is itself missing", he wrote on X, "Find the magnet then". He was referring to the July 12 accident, when a bus travelling from Kathmandu to Gaur and another coming from Birgunj to Kathmandu were swept away into the Trishuli river at Simaltal, Chitwan district of Nepal.

Out of 65 passengers, 62 were missing. The whereabouts of the buses and most of the passengers are still unknown. Upon the request of the Nepal government, India sent a 12-member diving team with magnets to assist in the search. The Chinese ambassador's comments appeared to be targeted not only at Nepal but also at the failure of the Indian team, according to Kathmandu-based people.

Nepali Congress MP Ramhari Khatiwada termed Chen's comments 'objectionable' and urged the foreign affairs ministry to seek clarification from the ambassador. Sarvendra Nath Shukla, a lawmaker of the Loktantrik Samajwadi Party, criticised the Chinese ambassador without mentioning his name.

As China drags feet on key project, Nepal says: 'No, thanks. Will fund it ourselves'

24 July 2024, Money Control

Nepal has decided to upgrade Araniko Highway connecting Kathmandu with Kodari itself after the Chinese government delayed the release of an economic and technical package for the project promised nine years ago.

According to a report in The Kathmandu Post, Nepal has finally said "no, thanks" to China and is using its own money to upgrade the crucial highway.

In 2015, Chinese President Xi Jinping had promised then-Nepal President Ram Baran Yadav that Beijing will provide over 900 million RMB ($123 million) during their meeting in Hainan.

The Chinese assistance would have helped upgrade the 115-km highway that connects Nepal with China. According to the report, a major chunk of the Araniko Highway was built by the Chinese government in the 1960s.

However, several sections of the highway were damaged by the April 2015 earthquakes.

Nepalese lawmaker Madhav Sapkota told The Kathmandu Post that China did not release the funds despite multiple reminders.

"This particular Chinese aid was renewed every year by the International Economic Cooperation Coordination Division of the Ministry of Finance, but despite numerous calls, requests and meetings, we haven't received the fund," he said.

He added that Nepal is allocating Rs 3.6 billion from its own budget to carry out maintenance work along a 26-km stretch of the highway and manage landslides based on a detailed project report prepared by the Department of Road.

Sapkota mentioned that he has dedicated much of his parliamentary career to advocating for the full reopening of the Tatopani border and facilitating cross-border movement of goods and people. "Recently, China seems to have recognized that the Tatopani border point is more advantageous for trade than Keyrung," he said. "The true potential of the Tatopani border will be realized once the highway leading up to it is repaired to prevent occasional flooding and landslides."

He also noted that post-Covid automation by four large Chinese companies operating in Nepal, along with the use of loaders and machinery, has led to significant job losses for Nepalis.

Will Nepal's new coalition government tip the scales of India-China rivalry?

21 July 2024, SCMP

Nepal will continue its delicate balancing act between India and China, according to observers, after political manoeuvrings saw a new government coalition formed and a new prime minister sworn in this week.

The changes bring a parliamentary shift away from the previous communist-dominated rule, after the Communist Party of Nepal – Unified Marxist Leninist (CPN-UML) left its alliance with the Communist Party of Nepal – Maoist to form a coalition instead with the centrist, India-leaning Nepali Congress – previously the largest opposition party.

As the new coalition now holds the balance of power, the move meant a change of leader. So Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli of the (CPN-UML) took office on Monday – the fourth time he has served in the position – in place of Pushpa Kamal Dahal, head of the Maoists.

For Nepal's neighbours, this means a shift from a government that was pro-Beijing to one that holds a mixture of allegiances between Beijing and New Delhi.

However, observers say that shift is unlikely to fundamentally change the status quo, as Kathmandu has economic and security dependencies on both Asian powerhouses.

According to Professor Lin Minwang, deputy director of the Centre for South Asian Studies at Shanghai's Fudan University, Nepal's foreign policy is one of "pragmatism".

"In fact, no matter who becomes Nepal's prime minister, Kathmandu's policy towards China and India is very unlikely to change," Lin said.

"Nepalese diplomacy in the past has always been a balance between China and India, which is one of its basic lines. There might be slight differences between India-leaning or China-leaning in different governments, but they would definitely not offend the other one just because they are more friendly to one country."

He added that Nepal's constantly shifting political landscape, with its frequent leadership changes, also made it difficult to nurture any significant policy changes.

"This round of political change in Nepal is quite normal. Nepal hasn't seen a full-term government for a long time," he said. "Currently, Nepalese politicians have become less concerned with promoting their ideologies and more concerned over their party's interests."

In the past 16 years, Nepal has seen 14 such power shifts. Oli has been prime minister four times in 10 years; Dahal was prime minister three times.

Dr Amit Ranjan, a research fellow with the National University of Singapore's Institute of South Asian Studies, said that while Nepal could not afford to cross swords with either country, its pro-China and pro-India governance would be "interesting to watch".

"[The Nepali Congress] is considered to be pro-India and Oli is considered to be pro-China. So it will be interesting to see how they are moving," Ranjan said. The landlocked South Asian country has long been considered by India to be part of its sphere of influence. India borders Nepal on three sides and Kathmandu is heavily dependent on Delhi in terms of trade and energy supply.

India was also a key player in helping to end the Nepalese Civil War, which ran from 1996 to 2006 after Dahal's Maoists attempted to overthrow the Nepalese monarchy. It was Delhi that helped to strike a peace deal that saw the country successfully integrate communist parties into its political system.

Ranjan said that, historically, Nepal had been more dependent on India, with long-held close ties that China could not compete with.

But when Oli first became prime minister in 2015, he angered Delhi over a new constitution that split the country into seven states, resulting in protests by the Madhesi group, mostly of Indian origin, who said they were not getting enough territory. As a result, India imposed an economic blockade on Nepal, stopping medicines and other supplies getting into the country.

Oli is known as a friend of China and also expressed Nepal's willingness to cooperate with Beijing under the Belt and Road Initiative, a global infrastructure project that Delhi has been critical of.

While Nepal joined the initiative in 2017, no belt and road projects have been started as Kathmandu has yet to sign the implementation agreement with Beijing. The possibility of Oli signing the plan is Delhi's main worry, according to The Times of India. But Ranjan doubted that Oli would make any aggressive moves, given his new alliance with the India-leaning Nepali Congress.

"This is an unnatural alliance, as the two parties are completely different. They're polar opposites. They are not ideologically or politically aligned; they have fought against each other. So it's very difficult to manage," he said.

Under the former government and the China-leaning Dahal, there were significant moves to align Nepal with China, with both Dahal and his foreign minister visiting Beijing.

According to Ranjan, while there was no problem with such actions under the previous alliance of two communist parties sharing the same ideologies, under the new coalition with the Nepali Congress, those days are now over.

Ranjan said that, historically, Nepal had been more dependent on India, with long-held close ties that China could not compete with.

But when Oli first became prime minister in 2015, he angered Delhi over a new constitution that split the country into seven states, resulting in protests by the Madhesi group, mostly of Indian origin, who said they were not getting enough territory. ### Outgoing Nepal PM Approved China Rail Deal Ahead Of Trust Vote: Report

12 July 2024, NDTV

Pushpa Kamal Dahal 'Prachanda' lost the vote of confidence in Parliament on Friday after coalition partner Communist Party of Nepal-Unified Marxist Leninist (CPN-UML) withdrew support.

A day before Nepal Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal 'Prachanda' lost a vote of confidence in Parliament, he gave a nod to an agreement to connect the Himalayan nation with China by rail under Beijing's ambitious Belt and Road Initiative.

Quoting government sources, the MyRepublica news portal said this decision carries more operational than political significance and aligns with Nepal's participation in Chinese President Xi Jinping's multi-billion-dollar pet infrastructure project.

"The Cabinet meeting held on Thursday decided to approve the 'Strengthening the Development Cooperation in Building the Trans-Himalayan Multidimensional Connectivity Network' agreement between Nepal and China," the report quoted Communication Minister and the government's spokesperson Rekha Sharma as saying.

However, a minister downplayed its immediate impact, stating, "This is an initial decision; details of project implementation and BRI modalities are yet to be finalised."

'Prachanda' lost the vote of confidence in Parliament on Friday after coalition partner Communist Party of Nepal-Unified Marxist Leninist (CPN-UML) withdrew support for him, a development that will lead to the formation of a new government led by ex-prime minister K P Sharma Oli.

Prachanda received only 63 votes in the 275-member House of Representatives (HoR) and there were 194 votes against the motion. At least 138 votes are needed to win the vote of trust.

A total of 258 HoR members participated in the voting while one abstained.

Prachanda's move, made just before he departed from office, is viewed not only as progress towards implementing BRI projects but also crucial for initiatives like the Kerung-Kathmandu railway and broader infrastructure development along the Nepal-China border, the report said.

Earlier, ahead of signing a power-sharing agreement with UML, the Nepali Congress had resolved to "only accept grants and not loans under the BRI project". The government was also set to decide on implementing the 2017 BRI agreement with China, which has been pending at the cabinet.

The BRI has raised global concerns over China's debt diplomacy of extending huge loans to smaller countries for unsustainable infrastructure projects. The Hambantota port, which was funded by a Chinese loan, was leased to Beijing in a 99-year debt-for-equity swap in 2017 after Sri Lanka failed to pay off the debt.

Storms trap more than 130 near China's Tibetan border with Nepal

10 July 2024, Reuters

More than 130 people including tourists were trapped in Tibet near China's rugged Himalayan border with Nepal on Wednesday after incessant rains unleashed landslides and floods, severing road links, according to Chinese state media.

Many sections of a major highway leading to the remote Tibetan town of Zhentang were either washed away by floods or blocked by landslides amid continuous rainfall since Sunday, Chinese state media reported.

So far, 342 stranded people have been evacuated to other towns by rescuers.

But at least 130 including tourists are still stranded in the vicinity of Zhentang, which lies at an altitude of about 2,000 metres (6,562 feet), due to blocked roads, rains, and "a lack of physical strength" because of the long distances that the stranded would need to traverse, according to state media.

Storms in the area through Thursday will create "a degree of difficulty" in rescue work, state media warned.

Moderate to heavy rainfall is expected in southwest China including parts of Tibet, Sichuan and Yunnan, according to national weather forecasters.

Nepal: Activists protest at China-built Pokhara Airport, denounce BRI as intervention tool

08 July 2024, The Print

A group of protestors comprising locals and activists protested in front of China-built Pokhara International Airport, denouncing the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) as a tool to intervene in the Himalayan nation.

Over 200 people took part in the protest called by the Rashtriya Ekata Abhiyan or National Unity Movement, on Monday afternoon. The protest comes during the visit by a parliamentary committee to inspect and investigate claims of embezzlement at the time of construction of the airport which only operates domestic flights.

Rajendra Prasad Lingden, one of the members of the parliamentary committee met with the protestors at the site.

The protestors also organized a sit-in in front of the airport raising slogans demanding "Full operation of Pokhara International Airport", "Investigate the corruption during the construction of Pokhara International Airport", and "Convert the Chinese loan to grant" amongst others.

Binay Yadav, the chairman of the National Unity Movement, criticised China and alleged that the nation wants to capture the Pokhara International Airport. "China wants to capture the Pokhara International Airport as it did with the Hambantota port of Sri Lanka and Pakistan's Gwadar Port as this place has geological significance," Yadav said.

He added, "Nepal cannot pay back the pricy loans and interest. Embezzlement also needs to be investigated which were made during its construction."

The construction of Nepal's Pokhara airport, primarily funded and executed by Chinese companies, has raised concerns about the quality of work, the manipulation of oversight, and the burden of debt on Nepal.

Additionally, the airport's association with China's BRI has ignited diplomatic tensions with India, making it challenging for the airport to attract international flights.

The Pokhara airport serves as a stark example of the pitfalls associated with importing China's infrastructure development model, highlighting concerns about financial sustainability and transparency, all while fuelling geopolitical rivalries in the region.

On May 12, 2017, Nepal and China signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on bilateral cooperation under the framework of the Belt and Road Initiative. The then Foreign Secretary of Nepal, Shanker Das Bairagi and Chinese Ambassador Yu Hong had signed the MoU.

Notably, on June 27, the lawmakers from the Nepali Congress warned the government against BRI loans and proceeded forward without consultation during the parliamentary meeting.

Opposition lawmaker and former foreign minister Narayan Prakash Saud, while addressing the house session, warned the government not to take loans under the BRI of China. The former foreign minister rather suggested the government accept the grants but in line with the provisions that Nepal has with other countries.

"In regards to BRI, we should be clear that we should accept the grant like we have been doing with other countries. Talking about the loans, there are priorities that determine the need to take them; there should be potential plans, management of the finances, and a feasible market. Until and unless no feasible market has been ensured, big projects shouldn't be taken forward depending on the loans, if we move forward with it, then it would be a trap for ourselves," Saud said.

The former Foreign Minister also took a jibe at the government for recalling the ambassadors despite the dilute geopolitical situation and ongoing tension, claiming it has diluted the image of the nation. Lawmaker Saud also suggested the government make decisions about BRI only after holding consultations with the opposition and all the parties present in parliament. (ANI)

New round of China-Nepal customs exchange held for better cooperation

08 July 2024, Xinhua

China-Nepal customs cooperation is expected to deepen following the conclusion of the weeklong exchange of the two countries' border customs, which ended Monday in Lhasa, the capital of southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region.

A delegation of seven customs officers from Nepal, led by Ramesh Aryal, deputy director general of the customs department of Nepal's Ministry of Finance, started their visit on July 2. The event was the 33rd round of such mutual visits.

Under the framework of the Belt and Road Initiative and the joint statement issued by the two countries, the two sides will promote cooperation in optimizing the business environment at ports and strengthening the supervision over import and export food safety, among other fields.

Aryal said China is an important trade partner of Nepal, with their bilateral trade accounting for 17 percent of Nepal's total.

In 2023, China's foreign trade with Nepal reached 12.69 billion yuan (about 1.78 billion U.S. dollars), up 15.6 percent year on year. Among them, the value of trade between Xizang and Nepal stood at 2.77 billion yuan, representing over one-fifth of the total.

Nepal PM Dahal faces crisis as key ally drops parliamentary support

03 July 2024, Reuters, Gopal Sharma

Nepalese Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal faced a crisis on Wednesday after a key ally in his multi-party coalition withdrew support, pushing his government into a minority in parliament four months after the coalition was formed.

The liberal Communist Unified Marxist Leninist (UML) party, which withdrew support and was the biggest group supporting Dahal's government since March, also said eight ministers it had nominated to the coalition would resign.

Party officials said UML and opposition Nepali Congress party, the two largest groups in parliament, would unite to form a new coalition and replace the one headed by Dahal.

"The new alliance is for stability," UML's Pradeep Gyawali told Reuters, without providing details.

Nepal, a natural buffer between China and India, has long been beset with factional fighting and politicians' egos that have prevented the formation of stable governments. There have been 13 since 2008, when Nepal became a republic and a 239-year monarchy was abolished.

Dahal, 69, a former Maoist rebel chief, has changed allies thrice since becoming prime minister after parliamentary elections in 2022.

His Maoist centre party said Dahal would not resign but would face a vote of confidence in parliament as required within 30 days.

Prakash Sharan Mahat, a spokesman for the Nepali Congress party, said UML chief K.P. Sharma Oli, 72, and Nepali Congress President Sher Bahadur Deuba, 78, would share the prime minister's post until the next election in November 2027.

Govt slammed for BRI agreement with China

27 June 2024, The Himalayan Times

Former foreign minister and Nepali Congress lawmaker Narayan Prakash Saud assailed the government for conducting risky foreign policy vis-à-vis neighbors and powerful countries.

Speaking during the special hour of the House of Representatives, Saud said the prime minister mentioned during China's Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs Sun Weidong's recent Nepal visit that the government could soon sign the Belt and Road Initiative agreement with China.

Stating that there had been no discussion with the opposition party on the BRI agreement, he said the way the government was dealing with neighbors and powerful countries had exposed Nepal's diplomatic capacity. The government had not consulted political parties, especially the opposition, on the level of talks it had been holding with the Chinese government on BRI.

He said foreign policy should be conducted on the basis of consensus among political parties. "Prithvi Narayan Shah had called Nepal a yam between two boulders, which meant two inanimate stones and one animate yam which is dynamic," Saud said and added that the way the government was conducting Nepal's foreign policy made Nepal a dynamite between two boulders. "If dynamite between two boulders explodes, it can damage the two boulders but, in that case, the dynamite will cease to exist," he added. Saud also assailed the government for recalling 11 Nepali ambassadors from foreign missions.

Another Nepali Congress lawmaker Rajendra Bajgain demanded that the government present the BRI agreement Nepal signed with China in Parliament. "The Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), sometimes referred to as the New Silk Road, is China's major strategic program. On May 12, 2017, Nepal and China signed an MoU on the BRI. Why has that framework document not been made public yet?"

He said BRI cannot be a competitive program against Millennium Challenge Corporation, a grant project because China had a plan to provide soft loans for BRI projects at the high-interest rate of 2 to 4 percent. "The MCC was a grant, and it became a subject of parliamentary debate and was approved after a long tug-of-war. The BRI should also be a matter of parliamentary discussion," he added.

"We want to hear the government's view on the BRI funding modality. Nepal is serving internal and external debts amounting to 50% of its GDP. A country serving nearly one and a half trillion in debt cannot bear more." He said the World Bank and Asian Development Bank had been providing loans to Nepal at one percent or less interest rate. He said the country should not take loans from China. "The loan period from the World Bank and ADB is 40/50 years. The situation is that we are borrowing from the World Bank and ADB at an annual interest rate of 0.50% to 1%. China's interest rate ranges from 2% to 4%. In this scenario, we will fall into a debt trap." The BRI needs to be read and understood because it has five declared objectives, among which two are Policy Harmonization & Coordination, Bajgain said while adding that the two objectives of policy harmonization and policy coordination in BRI were not good for Nepal. "Policy Harmonization & Coordination means making the policies of different jurisdictions identical. How is this possible? We are not the same countries!"

"Two countries' policies cannot be similar," he added. Bajgain further stated, "As far as we know, the BRI MoU mentions that the Implementation Plan document does not include a signature clause. How does the government intend to bypass the parliament and sign the BRI Implementation Plan?"

Saud said as the world was witnessing polarization from unipolarity to multipolarity, the world was witnessing conflicts in Europe, the Middle East, and the Asia Pacific region and there was a risk of Asia becoming embroiled in the conflict. At this juncture when we are supposed to adopt mature diplomacy and reliable conduct, we have recalled our ambassadors from 11 powerful countries, he added. He said the prime minister told the HoR that the government recalled Nepali ambassadors as they were appointed on the basis of political quota. Saud said that the government's move to recall ambassadors without any reason had diminished Nepal's credibility in the international community. Stating that new ambassadors were nominated by the government without any accepted criteria, he said one ambassadorial nominee declined the offer as he was not consulted prior to his nomination. Human rights activist Sushil Pyakurel, who was nominated ambassador to South Korea, declined the offer, saying he was not consulted prior to his nomination.

In an oblique reference to Rastriya Swatantra Party, Saud said that a political party had solicited applications from ambassadorial aspirants in the manner NGOs recruited their human resources and the move had undermined Nepal's prestige and diplomatic norms. He urged the government to withdraw its decision to recall Nepali ambassadors from foreign countries.

Nepal seeks Interpol help for two citizens held by China for allegedly helping Tibetans flee

24 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Nepal has requested the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol) to find the whereabouts of two of its youths from its border district of Gorkha, knowing fully well the duo had been called to Tibet on some pretext and then arrested by the Chinese police there. The initial Jun 9 and 12 media reports on their disappearance more than a month earlier suggested that they were suspected of having tried to help Tibetans to flee their Chinese ruled homeland.

It was not clear whether Nepal had raised the matter directly with the Chinese authorities in Tibet who were earlier reported to have admitted having them in coercive custody.

The District Police Office, Gorkha, on Sunday (Jun 23) submitted an application to Interpol urging it to trace the location of Rapke Lama and Karma Cheden Lama of Lama Gaun, Chumanubri Rural Municipality-7, Gorkha, who were nabbed by Tibet police one-and-a-half month ago, reported theannapurnaexpress.com Jun 24.

The Interpol will search for them in coordination with Beijing-based Interpol, the report cited SP Basudev Pathak from the District Police Office as saying.

"The duo had gone to Bhajyupa to search for Yarsagumba on Apr 29, but they did not return home till late night. On May 16, outgoing ward Chairman Pasang Lama got a call from Shigatse Police Office, Tibet, and told him that the missing youths are under the control of Shigatse Police," the report quoted an application submitted by Karma Chetan's wife as saying.

The issue of the duo's disappearance was raised in parliament by on Jun 11 by Nepali Congress lawmaker Rajendra Bajgain who represents the Gorkha constituency.

Narrating the sequence of events of their disappearance, Bajgain had told parliament, "Some one and half months back, they received a call. ... The phone calls were made by Tibetans who were arrested by the Tibetan authorities. While receiving the phone calls, they were asked to come to Tibet. Then they were arrested after reaching there."

Nepali leaders reaffirm commitment to one-China principle

17 June 2024, Xinhua

Nepal's Acting President Ram Sahay Prasad Yadav and Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal Prachanda, in recent separate meetings with a senior Chinese political advisor, reiterated the country's commitment to the one-China principle.

While meeting with Vice Chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference Bateer in Kathmandu on Friday and Sunday respectively, they also vowed not to allow any force to use Nepal's territory to harm China's interests and voiced readiness to continue to deepen mutually beneficial cooperation with China in various fields.

The Nepali leaders expressed their appreciation of China's long-term and valuable support to Nepal's economic and social development.

For his part, Bateer said that as China and Nepal are close neighbors linked by the same mountains and rivers and enjoying a long-standing friendship, the Chinese side is willing to work with the Nepali side to implement the important consensus reached by the leaders of the two countries, expand exchanges and cooperation in various fields, and continuously deepen China-Nepal strategic cooperative partnership.

During his stay in Nepal from Friday to Monday, Bateer also met with Nepal's Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha and Deputy Speaker of the House of Representatives Indira Rana.

No info on two Nepalis called and held by China on suspicion of helping Tibetans flee

12 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Police in Chinese ruled Tibet lured and arrested two Nepali youths on suspicion of trying to help Tibetans flee their occupied homeland. And they have remained missing for the last one month and half, reported kathmandupost.com Jun 12, citing a Nepali lawmaker.

Rapke Lama and Karma Cheden from northern Gorkha district were arrested a month ago and their whereabouts are yet to be known, Nepali Congress lawmaker Rajendra Bajgain has said in Parliament on Jun 11.

"Two youths of Gorkha were detained by the Tibetan security officials but the government has been clueless," Bajgain has said. "I ask for an answer from the government and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs." Stating his position on the issue on X (formerly Twitter), Bajgain has said, "The arbitrary arrest was made allegedly because they helped the Tibetans flee... But to reassure you, we do not play against China here and respect them as our close neighbour. We are only speaking for a better environment within the Himalayan border."

Narrating the sequence of events of their disappearance, Bajgain has told parliament, "Someone and half months back, they received a call. ... The phone calls were made by Tibetans who were arrested by the Tibetan authorities. While receiving the phone calls, they were asked to come to Tibet. Then they were arrested after reaching there."

He has expressed disappointment over the government's ignorance or indifference on the development. "The Nepal government is not aware of this incident. No one knows their condition, whether they are alive or not... I would like to draw the attention of the foreign ministry regarding this incident."

China's "Empty Airport" In Nepal Sparks Online Tensions; Envoy Intimidates Journalist For Reporting Pokhara Airport Loan

03 June 2024, The EurAsian Times, Ritu Sharma

With no international flights, the Pokhara International Airport has become a $215.96 million white elephant for Nepal. Made with Chinese loans, the high-interest rate is soon going to result in a debt problem for the Himalayan country.

A Nepali journalist was at the receiving end of China's 'Wolf Warrior' diplomacy for reporting on the project's pitfalls.

So far, information in the public realm has said that Nepal has to pay a 2 percent interest on the US $215.96 million Chinese loan for building the Pokhara International Airport, which has also been built by Chinese firms. However, a senior Nepali journalist, Gajendra Budhathoki, quoted "a signed official document" that the actual interest rate is 5 percent.

Budhathoki posted on X a social media post asking the Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, for clarification. In an acerbic response, the Chinese envoy asked for the journalist's apologies.

However, a senior Nepalese journalist has said he had a copy of a signed official document showing the actual interest rate is 5%. In seeking clarification on this anomaly in an online post on May 27, the Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, severely scolded senior Nepalese journalist Gajendra Budhathoki, demanding that he apologize.

Song said in his post on X: "Worst lies that I ever saw. It is public information, yet you dare lie about it." In another post, he demanded an apology from Budhathoki, the chief editor of Taksar magazine, and also from "whoever the people you represent."

Budhathoki, in his response, asked Song not to "intimidate" him as he has proof.

Nepal's second-biggest airport, financed and constructed by China, was inaugurated with much fanfare in January 2023. The rate of interest for the loan was earlier reported to be 2 percent. But Budhathoki claims that he had the signed document for the loan agreement showing that the Export-Import Bank of China has given the loan at 5 percent.

The Economic Times has called the Chinese envoy's public spat with the Nepali journalist part of 'Wolf Warrior diplomacy', a brand of hyper-public diplomacy conducted by Chinese diplomats targeting the host governments.

Song's outburst has invited the ire of former diplomats and journalists in Nepal. "It is unusual for a foreign ambassador to demand an apology from a host country journalist for a social media post. He could refute or ask the government to clarify. The foreign ministry should remind the ambassador of the limits of 'public diplomacy' and risks of direct engagement," Acharya opined in his post.

An International Airport With No Flights

Around a decade ago, China agreed to give loans to build the airport. China's CAMC Engineering, the state-owned construction firm, built the airport. However, the airport has failed to attract any regular international flights, barring a few flights from China.

This has raised questions about how the airport will generate revenue to repay the Chinese loan. Kathmandu has been seeking Beijing to change the loan terms to ease the financial burden on the country, but China has not relented so far.

In November 2023, The New York Times published a report that the Chinese construction firm had inflated the cost of the project and undermined Nepal's efforts to maintain quality control, putting its business interests first. The report said that Nepal's Civil Aviation Authority, reluctant to ruffle feathers in Beijing, overlooked the firm's wrongdoings.

In the aftermath of the report, Nepal's Commission for the Investigation of Abuse and Authority raided the Pokhara offices of the Civil Aviation Authority and seized documents related to the project. An investigation has been launched to ascertain the allegations.

A preliminary report shows that narrow-body jets like the Airbus A320 and A319 have payload issues due to obstacles near the airport, which is a 25-minute hop from Kathmandu.

The report indicates that the Pokhara International Airport has a payload penalty ranging from 5 to 10 tonnes, depending on the temperature and distance. The permissible load for an A320 is 77 tonnes, but an A320 taking off from Pokhara will be allowed to carry a maximum load of only 68 tonnes.

This load restriction means that airlines either incur a loss while flying to Pokhara or raise fares to compensate for 50 percent of the seats that have to be left empty. China also pulled the airport into a geopolitical quagmire with India by unilaterally proclaiming it part of its ambitious Belt and Road Initiative (BRI).

Nepal entered the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with China to facilitate transit transport, logistics, and related infrastructure development through cross-border projects, including railway, road, civil aviation, power grid, information, and communication.

Following the signing of the framework, Nepal initially listed 35 projects to be implemented under BRI; later, this number was whittled down to nine.

Even despite the Nepalese government's apprehensions about how the projects will be financed—through soft loans or grants—China has moved to unilaterally claim various projects to have been completed under the framework of BRI.

Last June, Song launched the WeChat Pay Cross-border Payment Service in Nepal during the first Dragon Boat Race Festival between the two countries in June 2023. He posted on X: "Warm congratulations on WeChat Pay Cross-border Payment Service Inauguration in Nepal. A new step forward in financial connectivity, one of the five "connectivities" under the BRI initiative."

The fate of the Pokhara International Airport resembles that of the Mattala Rajapaksa International Airport at Hambantota, which has earned the moniker of "world's emptiest airport."

The airport was built at the cost of US $209 million, out of which China financed US $190 million in the form of soft loans. With no flights, the cost of paying off this loan alone was nearly US $ 17 million per year.

China's Money – A Poisoned Chalice

Countries around the world that have taken large loans to fund infrastructure projects are said to be spiraling down into a debt trap. Sri Lanka is a case in point. China has been lending money for infrastructure projects close to the market interest rate and, in most cases, has insisted on using Chinese firms and contractors.

China uses the loans to seek geopolitical leverage. A 2021 study analyzed over 100 debt financing contracts China signed with foreign governments.

The borrowing countries were bound with absolute confidentiality, and the contract also contained clauses against restructuring the loan from 22 major creditor nations known as the "Paris Club."

China also retained the right to demand repayment anytime and could use it to strong-arm countries to be in line regarding issues like Taiwan.

Govt slammed for BRI agreement with China

27 June 2024, The Himalayan Times

Former foreign minister and Nepali Congress lawmaker Narayan Prakash Saud assailed the government for conducting risky foreign policy vis-à-vis neighbors and powerful countries.

Speaking during the special hour of the House of Representatives, Saud said the prime minister mentioned during China's Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs Sun Weidong's recent Nepal visit that the government could soon sign the Belt and Road Initiative agreement with China.

Stating that there had been no discussion with the opposition party on the BRI agreement, he said the way the government was dealing with neighbors and powerful countries had exposed Nepal's diplomatic capacity. The government had not consulted political parties, especially the opposition, on the level of talks it had been holding with the Chinese government on BRI.

He said foreign policy should be conducted on the basis of consensus among political parties. "Prithvi Narayan Shah had called Nepal a yam between two boulders, which meant two inanimate stones and one animate yam which is dynamic," Saud said and added that the way the government was conducting Nepal's foreign policy made Nepal a dynamite between two boulders. "If dynamite between two boulders explodes, it can damage the two boulders but, in that case, the dynamite will cease to exist," he added. Saud also assailed the government for recalling 11 Nepali ambassadors from foreign missions.

Another Nepali Congress lawmaker Rajendra Bajgain demanded that the government present the BRI agreement Nepal signed with China in Parliament. "The Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), sometimes referred to as the New Silk Road, is China's major strategic program. On May 12, 2017, Nepal and China signed an MoU on the BRI. Why has that framework document not been made public yet?"

He said BRI cannot be a competitive program against Millennium Challenge Corporation, a grant project because China had a plan to provide soft loans for BRI projects at the high-interest rate of 2 to 4 percent. "The MCC was a grant, and it became a subject of parliamentary debate and was approved after a long tug-of-war. The BRI should also be a matter of parliamentary discussion," he added.

"We want to hear the government's view on the BRI funding modality. Nepal is serving internal and external debts amounting to 50% of its GDP. A country serving nearly one and a half trillion in debt cannot bear more." He said the World Bank and Asian Development Bank had been providing loans to Nepal at one percent or less interest rate. He said the country should not take loans from China. "The loan period from the World Bank and ADB is 40/50 years. The situation is that we are borrowing from the World Bank and ADB at an annual interest rate of 0.50% to 1%. China's interest rate ranges from 2% to 4%. In this scenario, we will fall into a debt trap."

The BRI needs to be read and understood because it has five declared objectives, among which two are Policy Harmonization & Coordination, Bajgain said while adding that the two objectives of policy harmonization and policy coordination in BRI were not good for Nepal. "Policy Harmonization & Coordination means making the policies of different jurisdictions identical. How is this possible? We are not the same countries!"

"Two countries' policies cannot be similar," he added. Bajgain further stated, "As far as we know, the BRI MoU mentions that the Implementation Plan document does not include a signature clause. How does the government intend to bypass the parliament and sign the BRI Implementation Plan?"

Saud said as the world was witnessing polarization from unipolarity to multipolarity, the world was witnessing conflicts in Europe, the Middle East, and the Asia Pacific region and there was a risk of Asia becoming embroiled in the conflict. At this juncture when we are supposed to adopt mature diplomacy and reliable conduct, we have recalled our ambassadors from 11 powerful countries, he added. He said the prime minister told the HoR that the government recalled Nepali ambassadors as they were appointed on the basis of political quota. Saud said that the government's move to recall ambassadors without any reason had diminished Nepal's credibility in the international community. Stating that new ambassadors were nominated by the government without any accepted criteria, he said one ambassadorial nominee declined the offer as he was not consulted prior to his nomination. Human rights activist Sushil Pyakurel, who was nominated ambassador to South Korea, declined the offer, saying he was not consulted prior to his nomination.

In an oblique reference to Rastriya Swatantra Party, Saud said that a political party had solicited applications from ambassadorial aspirants in the manner NGOs recruited their human resources and the move had undermined Nepal's prestige and diplomatic norms. He urged the government to withdraw its decision to recall Nepali ambassadors from foreign countries.

24 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Nepal has requested the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol) to find the whereabouts of two of its youths from its border district of Gorkha, knowing fully well the duo had been called to Tibet on some pretext and then arrested by the Chinese police there. The initial Jun 9 and 12 media reports on their disappearance more than a month earlier suggested that they were suspected of having tried to help Tibetans to flee their Chinese ruled homeland.

It was not clear whether Nepal had raised the matter directly with the Chinese authorities in Tibet who were earlier reported to have admitted having them in coercive custody.

The District Police Office, Gorkha, on Sunday (Jun 23) submitted an application to Interpol urging it to trace the location of Rapke Lama and Karma Cheden Lama of Lama Gaun, Chumanubri Rural Municipality-7, Gorkha, who were nabbed by Tibet police one-and-a-half month ago, reported theannapurnaexpress.com Jun 24.

The Interpol will search for them in coordination with Beijing-based Interpol, the report cited SP Basudev Pathak from the District Police Office as saying.

"The duo had gone to Bhajyupa to search for Yarsagumba on Apr 29, but they did not return home till late night. On May 16, outgoing ward Chairman Pasang Lama got a call from Shigatse Police Office, Tibet, and told him that the missing youths are under the control of Shigatse Police," the report quoted an application submitted by Karma Chetan's wife as saying.

The issue of the duo's disappearance was raised in parliament by on Jun 11 by Nepali Congress lawmaker Rajendra Bajgain who represents the Gorkha constituency.

Narrating the sequence of events of their disappearance, Bajgain had told parliament, "Some one and half months back, they received a call. ... The phone calls were made by Tibetans who were arrested by the Tibetan authorities. While receiving the phone calls, they were asked to come to Tibet. Then they were arrested after reaching there."

Nepali leaders reaffirm commitment to one-China principle

17 June 2024, Xinhua

Nepal's Acting President Ram Sahay Prasad Yadav and Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal Prachanda, in recent separate meetings with a senior Chinese political advisor, reiterated the country's commitment to the one-China principle.

While meeting with Vice Chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference Bater in Kathmandu on Friday and Sunday respectively, they also vowed not to allow any force to use Nepal's territory to harm China's interests and voiced readiness to continue to deepen mutually beneficial cooperation with China in various fields.

The Nepali leaders expressed their appreciation of China's long-term and valuable support to Nepal's economic and social development.

For his part, Bater said that as China and Nepal are close neighbors linked by the same mountains and rivers and enjoying a long-standing friendship, the Chinese side is willing to work with the Nepali side to implement the important consensus reached by the leaders of the two countries, expand exchanges and cooperation in various fields, and continuously deepen China-Nepal strategic cooperative partnership.

During his stay in Nepal from Friday to Monday, Bater also met with Nepal's Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha and Deputy Speaker of the House of Representatives Indira Rana.

No info on two Nepalis called and held by China on suspicion of helping Tibetans flee

12 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Police in Chinese ruled Tibet lured and arrested two Nepali youths on suspicion of trying to help Tibetans flee their occupied homeland. And they have remained missing for the last one month and half, reported kathmandupost.com Jun 12, citing a Nepali lawmaker.

Rapke Lama and Karma Cheden from northern Gorkha district were arrested a month ago and their whereabouts are yet to be known, Nepali Congress lawmaker Rajendra Bajgain has said in Parliament on Jun 11.

"Two youths of Gorkha were detained by the Tibetan security officials but the government has been clueless," Bajgain has said. "I ask for an answer from the government and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs." Stating his position on the issue on X (formerly Twitter), Bajgain has said, "The arbitrary arrest was made allegedly because they helped the Tibetans flee... But to reassure you, we do not play against China here and respect them as our close neighbour. We are only speaking for a better environment within the Himalayan border."

Narrating the sequence of events of their disappearance, Bajgain has told parliament, "Someone and half months back, they received a call. ... The phone calls were made by Tibetans who were arrested by the Tibetan authorities. While receiving the phone calls, they were asked to come to Tibet. Then they were arrested after reaching there."

He has expressed disappointment over the government's ignorance or indifference on the development. "The Nepal government is not aware of this incident. No one knows their condition, whether they are alive or not... I would like to draw the attention of the foreign ministry regarding this incident."

China's "Empty Airport" In Nepal Sparks Online Tensions; Envoy Intimidates Journo For Reporting Pokhara Airport Loan

03 June 2024, The EurAsian Times, Ritu Sharma

With no international flights, the Pokhara International Airport has become a $215.96 million white elephant for Nepal. Made with Chinese loans, the high-interest rate is soon going to result in a debt problem for the Himalayan country.

A Nepali journalist was at the receiving end of China's 'Wolf Warrior' diplomacy for reporting on the project's pitfalls.

So far, information in the public realm has said that Nepal has to pay a 2 percent interest on the US $215.96 million Chinese loan for building the Pokhara International Airport, which has also been built by Chinese firms. However, a senior Nepali journalist, Gajendra Budhathoki, quoted "a signed official document" that the actual interest rate is 5 percent.

Budhathoki posted on X a social media post asking the Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, for clarification. In an acerbic response, the Chinese envoy asked for the journalist's apologies.

However, a senior Nepalese journalist has said he had a copy of a signed official document showing the actual interest rate is 5%. In seeking clarification on this anomaly in an online post on May 27, the Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, severely scolded senior Nepalese journalist Gajendra Budhathoki, demanding that he apologize.

Song said in his post on X: "Worst lies that I ever saw. It is public information, yet you dare lie about it." In another post, he demanded an apology from Budhathoki, the chief editor of Taksar magazine, and also from "whoever the people you represent."

Budhathoki, in his response, asked Song not to "intimidate" him as he has proof.

Nepal's second-biggest airport, financed and constructed by China, was inaugurated with much fanfare in January 2023. The rate of interest for the loan was earlier reported to be 2 percent. But Budhathoki claims that he had the signed document for the loan agreement showing that the Export-Import Bank of China has given the loan at 5 percent.

The Economic Times has called the Chinese envoy's public spat with the Nepali journalist part of 'Wolf Warrior diplomacy', a brand of hyper-public diplomacy conducted by Chinese diplomats targeting the host governments.

Song's outburst has invited the ire of former diplomats and journalists in Nepal. "It is unusual for a foreign ambassador to demand an apology from a host country journalist for a social media post. He could refute or ask the government to clarify. The foreign ministry should remind the ambassador of the limits of 'public diplomacy' and risks of direct engagement," Acharya opined in his post.

An International Airport With No Flights

Around a decade ago, China agreed to give loans to build the airport. China's CAMC Engineering, the state-owned construction firm, built the airport. However, the airport has failed to attract any regular international flights, barring a few flights from China. This has raised questions about how the airport will generate revenue to repay the Chinese loan. Kathmandu has been seeking Beijing to change the loan terms to ease the financial burden on the country, but China has not relented so far.

In November 2023, The New York Times published a report that the Chinese construction firm had inflated the cost of the project and undermined Nepal's efforts to maintain quality control, putting its business interests first. The report said that Nepal's Civil Aviation Authority, reluctant to ruffle feathers in Beijing, overlooked the firm's wrongdoings.

In the aftermath of the report, Nepal's Commission for the Investigation of Abuse and Authority raided the Pokhara offices of the Civil Aviation Authority and seized documents related to the project. An investigation has been launched to ascertain the allegations.

A preliminary report shows that narrow-body jets like the Airbus A320 and A319 have payload issues due to obstacles near the airport, which is a 25-minute hop from Kathmandu.

The report indicates that the Pokhara International Airport has a payload penalty ranging from 5 to 10 tonnes, depending on the temperature and distance. The permissible load for an A320 is 77 tonnes, but an A320 taking off from Pokhara will be allowed to carry a maximum load of only 68 tonnes.

'You dare to lie:' Chinese ambassador to Nepal snaps at senior journalist over Pokhara loan claim

29 May 2024, The Print, Keshav Padmanabhan

Chen Song demanded an apology from Gajendra Budhathoki, chief editor of Taksar Magazine, for saying loan interest for Pokhara airport could be higher than reported.

Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Chen Song, verbally sparred with a Nepali editor over his claim that the actual interest rate for the loan given by a Chinese bank to the Pokhara airport was much higher than previously reported.

Song retorted on X with an angry post: “Worst lies that I ever saw. It is public information, yet you dare lie about it.” In a different post, Chen demanded an apology from journalist Gajendra Budhathoki and also from “whoever the people you represent”.

On 27 May, Budhathoki posted that he had the signed document of the $215.96 million loan agreement for the Pokhara International Airport, which shows the interest rate offered by the Export-Import Bank of China (Exim Bank) as 5 percent, despite public reports of it being 2 percent.

The Pokhara airport, first envisioned in 1975, was finally completed and inaugurated on 1 January, 2023 – after a 50-year wait for the second most populous city of Nepal. The project was made possible due to the $215.96 million from the Exim Bank of China.

Opened to much fanfare, the airport has become emblematic of another of Beijing’s white-elephant development projects, saddling the local partner with high debt. There have been no international routes linked to the airport, for more than a year after it opened.

Another controversy surrounding the airport is whether it is part of China’s Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) – the $1 trillion “project of the century” envisioned by Chinese President Xi Jinping to develop two transport routes connecting China to the world.

Navita Srikant, a geopolitical and security analyst and an India-Nepal relations observer, said when the airport was inaugurated on 1 January 2023, the Chinese ambassador had called it “the flagship project of the China-Nepal BRI cooperation”.

“He reiterated this a few months later, after the successful landing of an international flight. Last summer, however, the then Nepalese Foreign Minister, N.P. Saud denied the above-made Chinese assertions and assured in his Parliamentary address that no project under BRI has been implemented thus far,” Srikant said.

Srikant added: “This is a loss of image for China – they have been promoting the BRI for so long but their first project in Nepal did not get that tag.”

The perceived loss of image due to the difficulties faced by the project could be attributed to the Chinese ambassador’s public defensiveness regarding the Pokhara airport, explained Shivam Shekhawat, a junior fellow at the Observer Research Foundation.

Speaking to ThePrint, Shekhawat added that the airport failing to “achieve the kind of traffic that was envisioned” is something that matters for Chinese public diplomacy in Nepal.

In recent months, the Nepalese government has been trying to convert the loan for Pokhara airport into a grant, given that the project has not achieved its goals.

“During the recent nine-day trip of Nepali Foreign Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha to China, discussions included negotiations to convert a portion of the loan to Pokhara Airport as a grant. From 2026, Nepal has to start repaying the loan, including the interest,” explained Srikant.

Habitual offender

This is not the first time that Song has pushed the boundaries of acceptable actions by a diplomat in a foreign country. At a public event in September 2023, Song asserted that India’s “policy” towards Nepal was not “friendly” while adding that New Delhi’s ties are also “not so beneficial” to the country, according to media reports.

“This Twitter spat and use of undiplomatic language hints at a certain BRI-related anxiety of China in Nepal. However, there is a sense that Chinese ambassadors have habitually crossed diplomatic norms in Nepal. Even previously, the statement on India-Nepal trade crossed the line way too far,” Srikant told ThePrint.

“The defensiveness, however, is not proportionate to the response made by the ambassador in a public verbal spat. No country would be okay with an ambassador attempting to intimidate their journalists,” added Shekhawat.

In 2020, the then-Chinese ambassador to Nepal, Hou Yanqui, interfered in the affairs of the Nepal Communist Party (NCP) and attempted to keep the party united during the political split occurring at the time.

After prolonged, tortuous Covid closure, China finally reopens 14 Tibet-Nepal border trade points

26 May 2024, Tibetan Review

There is probably no other part of the world, including in China itself, where Covid-19 restrictions did not end years ago. To the local populations on the two sides of Nepal and Chinese-occupied Tibet border areas, the Covid pandemic restrictions ended only yesterday. China finally decided to reopen most of the border crossings from May 25, with the prolonged, tortuous delay in doing so begging explanations.

The two sides reopened their traditional border trade points on May 25, marking a step forward in enhancing bilateral economic and trade ties, reported China’s official Xinhua news agency May 25. Bilateral ties did not move forward thus far apparently because China failed to restore a left front government in Nepal by cobbling together a coalition of the country’s communist parties despite its strenuous efforts. But politics has once again brought together the two major communist parties of Nepal to form the government at Kathmandu, with support from other, smaller parties.

The border points reopening ceremony took place in Zhentang (Tibetan: Drenthang, Ting-kye County) Township on the Tibet-Nepal border in the city of Shigatse, the report said.

Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha of Nepal and Vice-chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region Silang Nima jointly opened the traditional trading points, reported the kathmandupost.com May 26.

The report said the leaders from the two sides announced the reopening of 14 of the 21 trading points in various districts along Nepal's mountain range after a gap of four years.

The report said Chinese authorities had closed the border passes in Jan 2020 to prevent the spread of the coronavirus, which hugely affected the Nepalis living in the remote mountain villages close to Tibet.

The report cited Shrestha as saying 14 trading points of Taplejung, Sankhuwasabha, Dolakha, Gorkha, Mustang, Dolpa and Darchula districts were reopened on May 25. He has added that the Chinese side would gradually reopen the remaining seven border points as well.

The minister has said talks had been going on at the diplomatic level for long on reopening the border points. "It was agreed during my China visit in March to reopen the 14 traditional border trading points," he has said, adding four such points were reopened in 2023.

The report said the border closure in early 2020 affected a large number of Nepali traders, seasonal workers and residents of several mountain districts. People of the settlements near the Tibet border had difficulties managing essential supplies as they could not travel to the otherwise more accessible markets across the previously open border.

For example, as a result of the border closure "people of several remote settlements in Bhotkhola had to buy food and other supplies from Khandbari, the district headquarters of Sankhuwasabha, paying heavily to transport them." But now "they can buy essential commodities from Dendang and Changa markets in Tibet," Wang Chhedar Bhote, chairman of Bhotkhola Rural Municipality in Sankhuwasabha, has said.

He has said the local unit and the district administration had repeatedly urged the Chinese authorities to reopen the border, but to no avail. But now "the residents of Kimathanka, Chyamtang, Chepuwa, Hatiya and other settlements of Bhotkhola will have a huge relief with the reopening of the border after four years," Bhote has said.

Besides, as a result of the prolonged border closure, hundreds of people on the Nepal side had been unable to meet their relatives in Tibet. People of border villages of Tibet and Nepal have marital links. They will now be able to visit their relatives across the border, the report added.

Tibet traded with 175 countries and regions last year. Its imports from and exports to Nepal, its largest trading partner, totalled approximately 2.77 billion yuan (about 389.5 million US dollars), up 77.2% year-on-year, the report said, citing the customs bureau in Tibet's capital Lhasa.

2 schools rebuilt with China aid handed over to Nepal

16 May 2024, News CN

Two public schools rebuilt with Chinese assistance in Nepal's Dolakha district were handed over to local authorities on Thursday.

The new buildings have well-furnished classrooms, laboratories, computer labs, libraries, dormitories, halls and teacher rooms, noted Shankar Babu Shrestha, chairman of the district's education development and coordination unit.

"These buildings stand as the symbols of friendship between the two friendly nations," Shrestha said at the handover ceremony held in Dolakha. "Now it is our responsibility to manage, protect and use these facilities for the better education of our children."

The schools in Jilu and Singati of the district were damaged in the 2015 massive earthquake, and Sinohydro Bureau 6 Co., Ltd. under the Power Construction Corporation of China undertook their demolition and reconstruction under an assistance agreement signed by the governments of Nepal and China.

Two teaching buildings, one dormitory building and a canteen were built on each campus as the main part of the public school recovery project.

"China has been attaching special importance to our bilateral education and human resources cooperation," said Xie Yu, counsellor at the Chinese Embassy in Nepal.

Noting that China has built other schools in Nepal in recent years, Xie added that "Dolakha schools will also be a life changer for local kids, honoring China's enduring commitment to help Nepal to pursue prosperity and sustained development."

On the occasion, Sinohydro Bureau 6 Co., Ltd. donated bookshelves, books and schoolbags to the schools along with China Foundation for Rural Development and Yunnan Energy Investment Co., Ltd. of China.

The schools in Jilu and Singati have 874 and 570 students, respectively.

China's hand seen in Nepal's new currency-note-map claims on Indian territory

India-Nepal ties may be headed for turbulence as the latter's new left front coalition government, long lobbied for by China, included as belonging to Nepal a set of three strategic pieces of territories in India bordering Tibet in a new map featured in its new Rs 100 currency notes.

Nepal's Prime Minister Pushpakamal Dahal 'Prachanda' decided to print the new map of Nepal, which includes the territory of Lipulekh, Limpiyadhura, and Kalapani in the Rs 100 denomination bank notes, reported the Indian news agency PTI May 4, citing government spokesperson Rekha Sharma.

"The cabinet approved to re-design the banknote of Rs 100 and replace the old map printed in the background of the bank note during the cabinet meetings held on Apr 25 and May 2," Sharma, who is also the Minister for Information and Communication, has said.

All the three contested, interconnected areas lying across western Tibet's Ngari region, have been fully under India's control over the past 60 years or so, with the people living in them being Indian citizens, paying taxes in India, and voting in the Indian elections, the report noted.

Nepal shares a border of over 1,850 km with five Indian states – Sikkim, West Bengal, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, and Uttarakhand.

The three disputed areas cover a total of about 370 sq km (140 square miles), Nepalese officials have said.

Nepal's provocative move came despite the fact that in Jun 2023, Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his Nepalese counterpart vowed to resolve the boundary dispute under the spirit of friendship during the latter's visit to India.

The Kalapani area is strategically significant in South Asian diplomacy as it is at the tri-junction between India, Chinese occupied Tibet, and Nepal. Given that Nepal is a "buffer state" between China and India—both countries have power aspirations in the region, with ramifications on the relations between the three, noted eurasiantimes.com May 4.

The strategic Lipulekh pass connects Uttarakhand with Chinese occupied territory of Tibet. It is a strip of land on the northwestern edge of Nepal, lodged between Nepal, India, and Tibet. It is a far western point near Kalapani, another disputed border area between Nepal and India.

Nepal decided to print the new map of Nepal, which includes the territory of Lipulekh, Limpiyadhura, and Kalapani in its new Rs 100 currency notes.

Nepal's claim to the Limpiyadhura Pass area arises from its claim over Kalapani as it lies adjacent to it in India across Tibet's Ngari border.

The entirety of the Limpiyadhura-Kalapani-Lipulekh area is under Indian administration as part of Pithoragarh district in the Kumaon Division of the Uttarakhand state. However, Nepal has been claiming it since 1997, saying it lies within its Darchula district, Sudurpashchim Province.

Nepal's claim is based on the Sugauli Treaty signed with British East India Company in 1815. Under it, the India-western Nepal border is marked by the course of the Kali River, called the Mahakali downstream. But there was no map attached to it. The Mahakali has two tributaries—one starting at Lipulekh and the other at Limpiyadhura further west. The treaty did not specify which of these two tributaries would be considered the Kali for the purpose of delineating the boundary. India says the Kali starts at Lipulekh, while Nepal says Limpiyadhura is the river's source, noted a Kathmandupost.com report Jun 4, 2020.

In 2020, India inaugurated an 80-km road to facilitate pilgrims visiting Kailash-Mansarovar in Tibet, which is around 90km from the Lipulekh pass. This road originates from Ghatiabgarh and terminates at Lipulekh Pass, the gateway to Kailash-Mansarovar. It was approved by the Indian Cabinet Committee on Security in 2005 and was made following recommendations of an inter-ministerial China Study Group.

The road has strategic value for India as it will be the first to provide connectivity to the Indian troops deployed on the Line of Actual Control with China in Uttarakhand.

The Lipulekh issue flared up in May 2015 when India and China agreed to develop the region for trade and transit. Kathmandu sent diplomatic notes to New Delhi and Beijing, alleging violations of Nepal's territorial integrity.

Then in 2019, India released a new political map showing the disputed territories within its international border. The Nepali public erupted in protests, seeking to amend the Nepali Constitution to include these disputed territories.

India-Nepal relations, which had been under strain since 2015 after India imposed an unofficial economic blockade on Nepal, degraded further, noted eurasiantimes.com May 4.

Then in 2020, Prime Minister Narendra Modi of India underscored the fact that his government had built a road via the disputed Lipulekh to Manas Khand, a gateway to the Mansarovar Hindu pilgrimage site in Tibet.

The speech aimed at the Hindu electorates in Uttarakhand state triggered protests in Nepal. It led the Indian Embassy in Kathmandu to issue a press release on Jan 15, saying New Delhi's position has been "consistent and unambiguous."

This in turn was followed by Nepal's foreign ministry issuing a counter-statement on Jan 17, reaffirming Kathmandu's claim over Limpiyadhura, Lipulekh, and Kalapani, calling on India to cease unilateral construction or development works in those territories.

The then Indian Army Chief General MM Naravane (retired) hinted that the objections by the Nepalese government over the construction of a strategic link road in Uttarakhand on the border with Chinese-occupied Tibet could have been done at the "behest of someone else."

This implied suggestion of Chinese pressure led Nepal to raise the issue with India.

China considers Nepal a key partner in its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) and wants to invest in Nepal's infrastructure as part of its grand plans to boost global trade.

In 2022, it offered Nepal a Trans-Himalayan Multi-Dimensional Connectivity Network which included blasting tunnels through the mountainous Tibetan plateau to build a railway line under its flagship BRI. But no BRI project has taken off so far, marred by delays over financing and other issues. As regards the railway project, a pre-feasibility study suggested that it would be "an engineering feat" and costly but not an "impossible task". But while Nepal insists on China building it as an aid project for fear of becoming debt-trapped otherwise, the latter insists that Kathmandu take a costly BRI loan from it for its building.

China pledges five-year development assistance for Nepal's Tibet-border districts

The Chinese government of Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), which constitutes roughly the western half of Tibet proper, is to fund a five-year initiative in Nepal's northern border districts, offering different kinds of logistical and material support, mostly for social and economic development projects. The inhabitants of these districts are ethnically Tibetan or of Tibetan-origin, with most of them practicing Tibetan religion and culture.

The TAR government will provide 20 million yuan or around Nepali Rs 370 million each year under the initiative for the next five years, reported the kathmandupost.com May 3, citing officials familiar with the development.

In order to execute this initiative, the first preparatory meeting was held in Lhasa over Apr 23-24, co-chaired by Kamal Prasad Bhattarai, joint secretary of Nepal's Ministry of Federal Affairs and General

Administration of Nepal, and Baiman Yangzong, director general of the Foreign Affairs Office of the TAR government, the report said, citing a statement from Nepal's Consulate General in Lhasa.

The report noted that during his Nepal visit in Nov 2023, Wang Junzheng, the Party Secretary of TAR, had informed Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha that Lhasa would provide Nepal 20 million yuan for administrative reform and development needs in Nepal.

The assistance will be used to build schools and health posts, install solar electricity, and fund other small projects in the northern 15 districts of Nepal, a Nepali official who attended the meeting in Lhasa last week has said.

The districts have been named as Taplejung, Solukhumbu, Sankhuwasabha, Dolakha, Sindhupalchok, Rasuwa, Dhading, Gorkha, Manang, Mustang, Bajhang, Dolpa, Mugu, Humla and Darchula.

The two sides will meet twice in the first half of the year with focus on the projects' arrangements and twice in the second half of the year for the implementation and review of the implemented projects, the report said.

The statement has further said the two sides discussed enhancing support for improving the livelihood of the people residing in the border districts through various projects.

Nepal's Ministry of Local Development was stated to be currently compiling a list of projects needed in the 15 districts that share a border with Tibet.

The report noted that China has already been implementing small-scale aid projects in the northern border districts of Nepal, providing each district Nepali Rs 3 million for the development of village development committees (VDCs), then local administrative units, in the districts.

The report suggested that the initiative began in 2014 when China agreed to provide 10 million yuan (USD 1.63 million) annually from 2014 to 2018 through the TAR government in areas like health, education and road sectors to improve the livelihood of the residents in those districts.

Later in Apr 2019, during the state visit of the then Nepali president Bidya Devi Bhandari to China, the two countries signed the Northern Area Infrastructure Development and Livelihood Improvement Project (NAIDLIP), under which Beijing pledged to provide funds for implementing various development projects, which was estimated to be 20 million yuan, the report said.

Nepal Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha visits Tibet; calls for opening 14 traditional border points with China

A press release said that Mr. Shrestha, during the meeting, reiterated the need for reopening of traditional border points.

Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha also underscored the importance of exporting products from Nepal during a meeting with Wang Junzheng, secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Tibet Autonomous Regional Committee of China.

Mr. Shrestha, who is on his first visit to China after taking over office earlier in the month, was in Lhasa on Friday as part of his trip from March 25 to April 1 when he also urged the Chinese side for its cooperation to address issues facing the residents along the Nepal-China borders. A press release from the Consulate General of Nepal in Lhasa said that Mr. Shrestha, during the meeting, reiterated the need for reopening of traditional border points for the promotion of trade and commerce as well as facilitating the movement of people.

He sought cooperation to make arrangements for the use of pastureland along the bordering areas, to provide entry passes for Nepali containers and electrification in Nepal's highlands, according to the MyRepublica news portal. He recalled an agreement to resume 14 Nepal-China traditional transits during his meeting with Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi in Beijing two days ago and expected the facilitating role on behalf of Tibet's administration to implement the understanding.

Mr. Shrestha also called on the Chinese side to make provisions for resuming the Kathmandu-Lhasa bus service, the report said. He also underscored the importance of exporting products, including Haylage, cooked buffalo meat, and medicinal herbs among others to further strengthen economic cooperation. Haylage is a type of nutritious animal feed.

"The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs further expressed the need to cooperate in the areas of infrastructure and connectivity including the transmission lines to further strengthen the bilateral ties,” The Kathmandu Post newspaper reported, quoting the statement. The two leaders also discussed matters relating to expanding socio-economic cooperation, enhancing understanding and goodwill through high-level exchanges, consolidating the ongoing cooperation and exploring new areas of cooperation.

“Both the leaders discussed matters of mutual interest,” reiterated a post on X along with a photo by Nepal’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs late on Friday night after the meeting.

Earlier on March 26, the strategic partnership between the two countries was discussed during Shrestha’s meeting with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang where China has also urged the new dispensation in Nepal to finalise the implementation plan for its ambitious Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects that have struggled to make any headway due to continuous political changes in the Himalayan nation. Posting about the meeting on social media platform X, Ambassador Chen Song, the Chinese Ambassador to Nepal, said: “The two sides agreed to reopen 14 traditional border trade points immediately, strengthen practical cooperation between two counties in such fields as trade, investment, tourism, and advance the bilateral relations to a new height.” Shrestha is also expected to visit the holy pilgrimage site of Kailash Mansarovar in Tibet during his visit, it was announced earlier last week.

China exempts regular visa fee for Nepali travellers

28 April 2024, Kathmandu Post

China has announced exempting visa fees for Nepali travellers with effect from May 1.

In order to promote the friendship and further facilitate the personnel exchange between China and Nepal, visa fees will not be charged from May 1, the Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu said in a statement on Sunday.

The exemption will apply to regular visa processing. However, express fees and service fees will be charged, according to the embassy.

Nepal had been requesting the northern neighbour to exempt visa fees for a long time. Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha during his visit to China last month had requested the Chinese authorities to exempt visa fees.

Nepal has been waiving visa fees for Chinese nationals since 2016 and has been looking for reciprocal treatment from China.

Nepal-China economic relations high as Himalayas: Minister Bhandari

29 April 2024, KhabarHub

Minister for Industry, Commerce and Supplies, Damodar Bhandari, has said the trade relations between Nepal and Tibet, the autonomous region of China, will find a new height in the days to come.

In his address to an opening of the 17th Nepal China (Tibet) Economic and Trade Fair organized by the Trade and Export Promotion Center at Bhrikutmandap today, the Minister said this.

He acknowledged China as a longstanding trade partner for Nepal. The trade and economic relations and cultural ties between Nepal and China are as towering as the Himalaya.”

The high terrains and challenging topography have never hindered the trade relations between Nepal and China, he said, adding that “ Our ancestors utilized such deemed challenges as opportunities to promote the trans-Himalaya trade relations when the means of modern transports were not available.”

He said Nepal and China always treat and recognize themselves as friends of happiness and sadness, adding that China’s stability, unity, and prosperity are always the wish of Nepal.

“Nepal is always committed to a One-China policy and I utilize this moment to reiterate Nepal’s commitments by heart, words, and actions to its unity and integrity,” the Minister said.

He expressed his hope that an escalating railway connectivity and economic boom in China will cross the Himalayas in the future. He also expected the support of China to reduce the increasing trade deficit of Nepal with the northern neighbour.

Expressing that the Fair will be an important means to promote trade between the two countries, he said, “I hope that this kind of trade fair will also help to increase trade between our two neighboring countries and will be beneficial for the business community to find new buyers, new markets and new business destinations.”

Deputy Head of the People’s Government of the Tibet Autonomous Region, Lan Fuquan, emphasized the trade relations between Nepal and Tibet. He suggested that businessmen of the two countries cooperate in import and export by establishing good business relations.

Secretary at the Ministry of Commerce Dinesh Kumar Ghimire said that trade relations between the two countries will accelerate if exports can be managed. He urged Chinese investors to establish industries here to produce export goods to reduce Nepal’s trade deficit with China.

Executive Director of Trade and Export Promotion Center, Sharad Bikram Rana said earlier that according to the Memorandum of Understanding between Nepal and China (Tibet) dated 1990, the Fair is being held alternately with the Nepal Tibet Economic and Trade Fair with the aim of further expanding economic and trade relations between Nepal and China (Tibet).

He expressed his belief that Nepali exporters will use this Fair as an important opportunity to export their goods to China through the concessional system of zero customs rate and will have fruitful business with the business community in Tibet to promote their business.

The Fair, which started today, will continue till May 4. There are 50 Chinese and 15 Nepali business stalls in the fair.

About 40 types of exportable goods exported from Nepal to China are kept in the Nepali stalls.

Nepal and China sign two agreements in the presence of Finance Minister Pun

26 April 2024, My Republica

Nepal and China have signed two agreements focused on human resources development and the improved bone marrow transplantation service.

These two important agreements were signed in the presence of Finance Minister Barshaman Pun during a ceremony at the Ministry of Finance.

One agreement related to human resources development cooperation for global development initiatives, was signed by Finance Secretary Madhu Kumar Marasini and Chairman of the China International Development Cooperation Agency (CIDCA) Luo Zhaohui on behalf of their respective governments.

Another agreement focused on bone marrow transplant services was signed by Health Secretary Dr Roshan Pokharel and Luo Zhaohui of the CIDCA.

The CIDCA has been working on the formulation of China's foreign aid strategy standards related policy and planning and foreign aid reform agenda.

China had expressed commitment to provide support to initiate bone marrow transplant service in Nepal during Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal's visit to China in September 2023.

According to the agreement, China will provide financial assistance to BP Koirala Memorial Cancer Hospital in operating bone marrow transplant services.

Speaking on the occasion, Finance Minister Pun expressed gratitude to China for its ongoing support in Nepal's development. He anticipated further cooperation from China in the days ahead.

Minister Pun noted that Nepal and China have a deep, diverse and sustainable relationship as both the countries respect each other's development aspirations and sensitivity.

Finance Minister Pun laid emphasis on the need of implementing the remaining bilateral agreements signed during high-level visits between the two countries. Stating that they are now on the eve of the Third International Investment Summit, he expressed confidence that Nepal will get the commitment of significant Chinese investment during the summit.

Similarly, CIDCA's Luo Zhaohui, who led the Chinese delegation, stated that China values its friendship with Nepal and remains committed to supporting Nepal's development endeavors. He expressed commitment to implement every issue of agreements signed during the Nepal visit of Chinese President Xi Jinping, and Prime Minister Dahal's China visit.

China-Nepal military relations: Risks and opportunities for India

20 April 2024, ORF Online

On 9 March 2024, a Chinese military delegation headed by Major General Zhang Baoqun visited Nepal. They toured Nepalese military institutions and held discussions with Nepalese Army Chief Prabhuram Sharma on various proposals. The military delegation's arrival closely trailed a political delegation led by Sun Haiyan, Deputy Head of the Chinese Communist Party's International Liaison Department, which made its way to Kathmandu in January 2024. The consecutive visits, coupled with the existing political and military relations between China and Nepal, present a complex scenario.

The military delegation's arrival closely trailed a political delegation led by Sun Haiyan, Deputy Head of the Chinese Communist Party's International Liaison Department, which made its way to Kathmandu in January 2024.

These visits and the public statements of Chinese leaders in Kathmandu seem to project a durable China-Nepal relationship. However, beneath the surface, India's improving relations with Nepal have increased China's unease. It has spurred Chinese leaders to intensify their efforts to woo Nepal's political and military elite. This paper focuses on the military dimension and explores this delegation's proposals while evaluating China's predicament and India's prospects in Nepal.

Nepal-China military ties

China's military relations with Nepal have historically been among the weakest compared to its other South Asian neighbours, despite significant political, economic, and social engagements over recent decades. This underdevelopment persists due to structural factors, with the military aspect playing a pivotal role.

During the initial decades, military connections between China and Nepal were minimal. As the Commander-in-Chief of Nepal's Armed Forces, the Nepalese Monarch addressed most military issues raised by the Chinese. However, Nepal's transition to a republic in 2008 and anti-China protests preceding the Beijing Olympics, prompted China to diversify and strengthen its political and military engagements with Nepal. Nonetheless, this collaboration primarily focused on enhancing Nepal's military capabilities for UN peacekeeping, disaster management, and internal security, facilitated through grants, training, infrastructure development, and joint exercises.

China closed borders during 2020-23 and suspended all military engagements impeding material and personnel exchanges until mid-2023.

Despite these efforts, a lingering hesitation persists in their bilateral military interactions due to Nepal's enduring special military ties with India. These ties, characterised by frequent joint military exercises, material support, and the significant presence of Gurkha soldiers and veterans, are substantial. They have posed challenges for China in establishing an equally influential military partnership with Nepal.

Moreover, the COVID-19 pandemic further strained China-Nepal military relations. China closed borders during 2020-23 and suspended all military engagements impeding material and personnel exchanges until mid-2023. Consequently, this unofficial blockade significantly impacted mutual trust, underscoring the fragility of military ties amidst broader geopolitical dynamics.

Post-COVID military cooperation

Following the relaxation of the COVID-19 restrictions in 2023, a Chinese military delegation led by Major General Yue Ande from the PLA's Tibet Military Command visited Nepal on 16 August 2023. During this visit, agreements were reached to revive the Sagarmatha joint military exercise series, and multiple seats were offered for Nepal Army (NA) officers in Chinese military training academies. China also offered four seats in the annual Defense and Strategic Studies Course at China's College of Defense Studies (CDS). This visit signalled a potential resurgence in bilateral military-to-military interactions.

The Zhang Baoqun delegation is the second one to visit Nepal within seven months. It aimed to bolster military cooperation by advancing an armoured personnel carrier (APC) procurement contract, proposing the installation of an ammunition plant, resuming Sagarmatha joint military exercises, inviting more NA officers for training in Chinese military institutions, and increasing overall military cooperation.

Structural factors: The camouflage At first glance Zhang's proposals appear harmless, seemingly designed to rejuvenate the military camaraderie between China and Nepal. However, it involves enhancing Chinese military influence in Nepal, potentially at India's expense.

For instance, the process to purchase the 26 APCs has been ongoing since the last few Nepalese administrations. The NA finally decided to purchase them from a US-blacklisted Chinese manufacturer, NORINCO, rejecting cheaper Indian bids. In 2023, accusations of corruption and price inflation emerged, leading to the current Nepal PM freezing the contract. Nonetheless, the NA has remained adamant about the decision based on its historical ties with the manufacturer. The Chinese delegations are therefore lobbying hard to convince the Nepalese Administration to conclude it early and ward off any other competitor.

Accusations of corruption and price inflation emerged, leading to the current Nepal PM freezing the contract. Nonetheless, the NA has remained adamant about the decision based on its historical ties with the manufacturer.

Likewise, up to 2022, Chinese manufacturers were preferred ammunition suppliers to Nepal after it switched from its southern neighbour. However, the quality of Chinese ammunition remains subpar. Consequently, in 2022, Nepal decided to procure ammunition from an Indian company, SSS Defence. This Indian company outcompeted Chinese manufacturers in an open bidding contract. As anticipated, Zhang's delegation has proposed installing an ammunition plant for the NA, aimed at undermining the Indian re-entry into the NA's ammunition inventory.

Similarly, the Sagarmatha joint military exercise has been on hiatus since 2019, after being held twice in 2017 and 2018 with enthusiastic support from the KP Sharma Oli government. Oli's administration aimed to bolster its communist credentials with China and diminish India's influence within the NA. However, despite Oli's efforts, changing regional politics and military dynamics thwarted his objectives, leading to the suspension of the joint military exercise with China. Since August 2023, China has endeavoured to revive the joint exercise, without any success.

China's PLA operates around 67 military academies, with nearly half providing training to foreign military personnel.[1] The College of Defense Studies (CDS), part of the PLA's National Defense University (NDU), is the primary institution for graduate-level international military education. Offering short and extended courses, the CDS aims to train officers and foster relationships with trainees from the global south. Its year-long Defense and Strategic Studies Course for Colonels and Brigadiers awards a master's degree to foreign officers, shaping the military elites of participating nations.

However, foreign military graduates are instructed at a satellite campus in northern Beijing, separate from their counterparts in the PLA NDU. This arrangement restricts their opportunities for interaction and relationship-building with PLA officers. Instructors at the CDS curtail discussion opportunities and adhere strictly to the official party line. This segregation between Chinese and foreign officer trainees, including officers from Nepal, combined with the lingering language barrier, constitutes a significant weakness of this training program.

India holds a longstanding advantage over China in the military sphere, which China struggles to diminish.

In contrast, Nepalese officers receive training in Indian academies alongside Indian officer trainees. This shared experience encompasses military language, culture, medium of instruction, and various other aspects, enriching their training and fostering deep connections within the Indian system. Consequently, India holds a longstanding advantage over China in the military sphere, which China struggles to diminish.

Conclusion

The successive Chinese military delegations and their proposals signify a sustained effort to achieve three objectives. China aims to establish a connection between its military-industrial complex and the Nepalese Armed Forces. This entails fostering an extensive military material supply relationship, which would bind Nepal to China for an extended period, particularly for spare parts and service support functions.

Furthermore, China perceives that its focused efforts to strengthen the military capabilities of India's neighbouring countries will facilitate closer ties with them. The improved capabilities, combined with a military elite trained by China, are expected to boost these states' confidence in engaging in dialogue with India. Additionally, there is a possibility that they may be malleable to provoke disputes to divert Indian attention and undermine its capabilities.

The improved capabilities, combined with a military elite trained by China, are expected to boost these states' confidence in engaging in dialogue with India. Finally, the PLA is also delving into safeguarding China's economic interests and expanding its diplomatic relations. Thus, an improved military relationship will also facilitate China's other economic and political initiatives in Nepal. This includes addressing the sluggish progress in the Belt and Road Initiative.

India must elevate its efforts in Nepal, particularly concerning the Nepalese Armed Forces, to counteract these Chinese objectives. Leveraging its traditional strengths and resolving lingering issues can help India mitigate Chinese interference effectively.

Chinese Language Day observed in Nepal

"Learning the Chinese language isn't just learning the language," said 15-year-old Shreyna Shrestha. "It's learning a lot of other skills as well, such as communication skills, and social skills."

KATHMANDU, April 20 (Xinhua) – Learners and teachers of the Chinese language gathered in the Nepali capital on Friday to sing songs and perform dances to mark the 15th United Nations Chinese Language Day.

Animation dubbing and poetry recitation were also performed by learners and teachers from the Confucius Institutes at Tribhuvan University and Kathmandu University and the Confucius Classroom at Learning Realm International School, co-organizers of the event.

Asha Ram Maharjan and his son Alok Maharjan sang a song in Chinese together.

The UN Chinese Language Day, which falls on April 20, is being observed around the world under the theme of "Chinese Language: Connecting Cultures Through the Bridge of Mutual Learning."

Saying all the learners "performed well," Chairman of Nepal Language Commission Gopal Thakur noted that the UN celebrates the Chinese Language Day as a means to promote multilingualism and cultural diversity in the organization and that the Chinese language is now one of the languages of employment among the Nepalese.

Thakur described the Confucius Institute as a "trustworthy institution" to promote mutual cooperation in the field of language and culture, adding "I expect such institutes will help reduce poverty to some extent in Nepal and wish them to flourish."

On the occasion, representatives from Qinghai Nationalities University, East China University of Technology, Hebei University of Economics and Business and Beijing International Chinese College, which are co-building the Confucius Institutes and the Confucius Classroom, voiced readiness to deepen cooperation in Chinese education.

The Chinese learning in Nepal has received strong support from the Nepalese government and people from all walks of life, Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song said, noting that more than 40 primary and secondary schools in the country have offered Chinese language courses as well.

"By learning Chinese, Nepali students and people from all walks of life have not only enhanced mutual understanding and friendship between the two peoples, but also injected new vitality into Nepal's cultural diversity and social development," Chen told the audience.

Asha Ram Maharjan learned Chinese six years ago, while his son Alok did it about one year ago, because it is good for their family business of statues. The Maharjans have been importing and exporting statues to Lhasa, the capital of China's Xizang Autonomous Region.

"I'm very happy to have a chance to sing a Chinese song," said the father.

Krishav Pant, 14, has studied Chinese for more than seven years and did well in past Chinese proficiency competitions.

"I believe that learning Chinese will help me get a scholarship in a college in China, which will help me go towards a brighter future and also help me learn about Chinese culture and learn about how China has become such a powerful nation and bring the technologies and ideologies to my country and help Nepal also develop just like China," he said.

For 15-year-old Shreyna Shrestha, she is getting more from learning Chinese.

"Learning the Chinese language isn't just learning the language," she said. "It's learning a lot of other skills as well, such as communication skills, and social skills."

"So I think by learning Chinese, those skills of mine have definitely been furnished and even going to China in the future will be quite convenient for me due to my familiarity with the language and the culture. So I think learning Chinese has been really effective to me," she added.

Beijing's message: Won't tolerate anti-China activities in Nepal

A senior leader of the Communist Party of China warned that Beijing will not tolerate any third-country activities in Nepal targeting China.

During a meeting on Thursday with the general secretary of the ruling CPN (Maoist Centre), Dev Gurung, who is currently in Beijing on a 10-day visit, Liu Jianchao, minister of the International Department of the CPC Central Committee (IDCPC), told Gurung and the Maoist delegation that Beijing will not tolerate any actions in Nepal by third countries targeted against China.

The IDCPC is in charge of maintaining relations with political parties of other countries, especially fellow communist parties.

A jumbo delegation from the Maoist Centre is currently in China at the invitation of the IDCPC and it held talks with Liu and other leaders in Beijing on Thursday and Friday.

"We are in favour of world peace," Liu told Gurung and the visiting Maoist delegation. "If any country tries to act against China in Nepal, we will not tolerate it."

But Liu, who is being spoken of as the next foreign minister of China, did not name the country, Gurung told the Post over the phone from Beijing.

Earlier in January-end, Sun Haiyan, vice-minister of the IDCPC, made similar remarks in Kathmandu during a roundtable with major party leaders. Sun had alleged that some countries were trying to disrupt development cooperation between Nepal and China and defame bilateral relations.

"...Some criticise our relations. Some are trying to sabotage our bilateral relations and some have increased activity against China," Sun had said during a consultative conference in Kathmandu between Nepali political leaders and the Communist Party of China. Her statement had sparked a controversy in Nepal.

During their Thursday meeting, Gurung told Liu that Nepal is quite aware about the elements trying to destabilise Nepal-China relations and creating misunderstanding and conflict between the two countries.

"Their [Liu's] focus was mostly Western countries but he did not name any particular country," said Gurung, adding that Nepal's priority is stability and it will continue to focus on the principles of Panchasheel.

Besides discussing what China wants to see in Nepal, other issues included Nepal's failure to present a list of projects to be executed under the Belt and Road Initiative, according to Gurung.

Liu also proposed involving political parties and other channels including stakeholders to facilitate the execution of various Chinese initiatives in Nepal, Gurung said.

This is the first-of-its-kind proposal from Beijing whose blueprint remains unknown.

Beijing is also displeased with the progress on the BRI, delays in implementing Chinese-funded projects in Nepal, and the slow progress of projects undertaken by the Chinese contractors and firms.

"We and our party thwarted attempts to destabilise our relations with China in the past, and the current government led by Pushpa Kamal Dahal will check such attempts in the future too," Gurung conveyed to the IDCPC team.

Besides Liu, other senior IDCPC leaders including Sun were present at the meeting.

"Liu said that any military or security activities in Nepal targeting China will not be tolerated. Any move by a third country inside Nepal targeting China is not acceptable to China," Gurung quoted Liu as saying.

Gurung said he assured the Chinese leaders that Nepal is committed to one-China policy and will not allow any activities detrimental to China's security interests.

In his remarks, Liu told the visiting Maoist delegation that Beijing is pleased with the new political equation in Nepal and stressed the need for unity among Nepal's leftists parties, said Gurung.

This is not the first time that China has encouraged unity among leftist parties in Nepal in general and pushed for unity between the CPN-UML and the CPN (Maoist Centre) in particular. In 2018, too, Beijing pushed for the unity between the UML and Maoist Centre.

The two parties merged to be the Nepal Communist Party, but that unity did not last beyond three years. Once again, Beijing is encouraging similar unity after the UML and the Maoist Centre partnered to form a new government in March first week after Prime Minister Dahal ended his alliance with the Nepali Congress.

But UML leaders have been dismissing the chances of a new leftist unity. Recently, UML Chairman KP Oli outright rejected the idea of unity between communist parties of Nepal.

"At present, unity among leftist parties is not a necessity," Oli said while addressing the UML's parliamentary party on Monday.

He, however, said that "there is a need for cooperation among the forces that are in favour of good governance and national unity." There is also an opposition voice in the Maoist Centre on the potential unity between the UML and Maoist Centre.

"We are pleased with the formation of government through partnership between UML, Maoist Centre and other communist parties," Gurung quoted Liu as saying.

"The unity between the two communist parties is good for the Nepali people. We want a stable communist government in Nepal," Gurung said, again quoting Liu.

"We want to see the leftist parties of Nepal united for the greater stability and prosperity of the country. We also believe that Nepal's prosperity lies in the hands of communist forces. We are always in favor of stability and development and stand ready to provide all possible support to Nepal," Gurung quoted Liu as saying at the meeting.

It is natural for any communist party in the world to favour unity among the communist parties in other parts of the world, Gurung said.

"Liu said, in recent years, under the joint leadership of President Xi Jinping and Nepali leaders, relations between the two countries have continued to develop," the IDCPC said in its statement released on Friday.

"The Chinese side supports the Nepali side in exploring a development path that suits its national conditions, and is willing to help Nepal prosper and develop."

"The CPC attaches great importance to its friendly relations with the Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist Center). Under the new situation, it is willing to expand exchanges between the two parties, deepen exchanges and mutual learning of experience in state governance and administration, and promote practical cooperation between the two sides in agriculture, investment, infrastructure, border trade and tourism through 'political party + [plus]' and other channels, so as to push China-Nepal relations to a new level," said the statement.

Liu in the meeting had expressed his displeasure at Nepal's failure to present a list of projects to be developed under the BRI and as per the agreements signed between two sides after 2016 including during the state visit of Chinese President Xi Jinping to Nepal in 2019 October.

Gurung thanked the Chinese side for its long-term support in safeguarding Nepal's sovereignty and independence and achieving economic and social development, according to the Chinese statement.

"The Nepali side firmly adheres to the one-China principle and does not allow any force to use Nepal's territory for anti-China activities. The Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist Center) highly admires the CPC's governance achievements and governance concepts, and is willing to further strengthen exchanges between the two parties, deepen theoretical exchanges, promote Nepal-China relations for healthy development, and promote regional peace, and development and stability," the IDCPC statement read.

Nyingchi apples' first export to Nepal

13 April 2024, China Daily

Customs officers inspect apples loaded for export to Nepal at the Nyingchi Customs, Xizang autonomous region, on Wednesday. CHINA DAILY

More than 23 metric tons of fresh apples produced in Nyingchi of the Xizang autonomous region were exported to Nepal through Gyirong Port on Wednesday.

Xizang Shangcheng Health Industry Co, based in Nyingchi, dispatched its first shipment of apples to Nepal, which were valued at more than 194,100 yuan ($26,800).

The company has signed an agreement to export 99 tons of apples from Nyingchi to Nepal. A second batch of 26 tons has been prepared and will be exported in the next few days, it said.

Renowned for their lustrous red appearance, high sugar content, excellent taste and pristine quality, Nyingchi apples have garnered favor among consumers.

A planting area reaching 2,520 hectares in 2023, an annual yield of approximately 15,000 tons and a production value of around 170 million yuan underscore their substantial export potential.

Lhasa Customs has been emphasizing the transformation of Nyingchi into a pioneering hub for reform and opening-up, and has explored international markets for superior products from Xizang.

By leveraging Nyingchi's geographical advantages, abundant resources and ecological strengths, customs has played a pivotal role in facilitating the successful export of apples, actively engaging in research and guiding companies to venture into international trade.

"We have tailored our support to meet the specific needs of companies, offering personalized business consulting and policy guidance," said Wang Cunrui, deputy director of the Nyingchi Customs under Lhasa Customs

"This has included assisting companies in orchard registrations for export, enhancing their quality management systems for orchard management and production processes, and implementing streamlined customs clearance procedures, effectively reducing associated costs," said Wang.

Trucks laden with apples have set out from Nyingchi and are anticipated to grace the tables of Nepalese households in the coming days.

Li Longjing, head of Xizang Shangcheng Health Industry, expressed optimism about the future and said that customs provided them with extensive professional guidance across various aspects, instilling confidence in their efforts to explore the South Asian market.

"We anticipate exporting 1,000 tons of apples this year and have plans to expand our exports to include apple seedlings, edible fungi and other products," said Li.

This venture holds the promise of transforming small-scale fruit production into a significant industry, driving prosperity and increasing incomes for local communities in Xizang.

Looking ahead, Lhasa Customs is committed to focusing on establishing Nyingchi as a pioneering area for reform and opening-up in the region, thereby contributing to the region's sustainable economic development.

Nepal Sounds Alarm Over Chinese Encroachment, Calls for International Intervention

April 12 2024, Yuvraj Tyagi, Republic World

China's construction of an embankment along the Nepal-Tibet border, diverting the Arun River and encroaching on Nepalese territory, has raised alarm in Nepal.

Kathmandu: China's recent encroachment into Nepalese territory along the Nepal-Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) border has sparked widespread concern and condemnation. The construction of a one-kilometer-long embankment along the Arun River in Kimathanka, a remote hamlet in the North-East of Sankhuwasabha district, has not only diverted the river's natural course but also resulted in the loss of approximately nine hectares of Nepali land. Furthermore, localities in the region now face the imminent threat of submersion during the rainy season due to this construction.

This latest incursion is part of a series of Chinese violations of Nepalese sovereignty that have escalated in recent years. Despite multiple reports and field reconnaissance by Nepalese survey teams confirming these encroachments, the Government of Nepal has yet to formally acknowledge them, possibly out of fear of antagonizing its northern neighbour. However, the lack of acknowledgement has only emboldened China to continue its aggressive expansionist agenda unchecked.

Nepal's struggle against Chinese aggression

China's encroachments extend beyond territorial violations and include a range of nefarious activities by Chinese nationals within Nepal. These include abuse of fair trade practices, wildlife smuggling, human trafficking, gold smuggling, ATM hacking, online fraud, and espionage. Recent data from Nepalese authorities reveal a significant increase in arrests of Chinese nationals for various crimes, highlighting the extent of China's illicit activities within Nepal.

One Chinese media publication had renamed Mount Everest (known in Nepal as Sagarmatha) as Mount Gomolangma, claiming it as part of the Chinese territory. This sparked outrage among Nepalese citizens. In another instance, China unilaterally laid a 150m-long wired fence in the Rui village of Gorkha District in 2020 and restricted the movement of Nepalese nationals in the area. The latest incidents came to light in 2022-23, when the construction of a Chinese road in Surkhang VDC in Mustang District of Gandaki Province was reported.

Diplomatically, Nepal has historically maintained a policy of non-alignment and neutrality, seeking to safeguard its sovereignty while engaging in constructive dialogue with its neighbours. However, China's aggressive behaviour poses a significant challenge to Nepal's diplomatic autonomy and regional stability. Beijing has primarily focused on infrastructural projects since the launch of the Border Roads Initiative. However, China's aggressive economic monopolistic ambitions created more trouble for its Himalayan neighbour. Nepal shares two border points with China and has seen an increasing presence of Chinese nationals in Nepal, a rapid increase since 2014-15 as Chinese-funded projects seemingly grew. By encroaching on Nepalese territory and engaging in illicit activities, China undermines Nepal's sovereignty and territorial integrity, threatening the delicate balance of power in the region.

A strategic buffer zone between India and China
The strategic implications of China's actions in Nepal cannot be overstated. Nepal, nestled amidst the towering peaks of the Himalayas, serves as a vital buffer zone between India and China. Its rugged terrain and geographical features act as a natural barrier, making direct territorial expansion challenging for both countries. Furthermore, Nepal's strategic location and diplomatic relations make it a crucial bridge between South Asia and East Asia, facilitating regional connectivity and economic cooperation.

Ultimately, the preservation of Nepal's sovereignty and territorial integrity is paramount. As a sovereign nation, Nepal has the right to defend its borders and protect its citizens from external threats. By standing firm against Chinese aggression and asserting its rights on the international stage, Nepal can safeguard its sovereignty and uphold the principles of peace, security, and stability in the region.

Increased traffic at Tibet-Nepal border crossing

April 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

Chinese state media reported increased traffic at the Dram border, which connects Tibet and Nepal via the Nyalam Entry-Exit Border Inspection Station. According to reports, a total of 100,716 individuals and 4,450 vehicles have crossed the border since the beginning of the year, up to April 1, 2024.

This surge in traffic comes in the wake of the border's reopening on September 1 last year, following pandemic-related lockdown measures. Since then, a total of 234,634 people and 12,699 vehicles have crossed the border, as reported by Chinese state media.

Authorities have attributed the increase in traffic to heightened police deployment and expedited customs clearance processes for inbound and outbound passengers. While the traffic is largely associated with trade activities, the Dram border has undergone substantial regulation and fortification in recent years to prevent any attempts by Tibetans to seek asylum abroad. As a result, the number of Tibetan refugees has drastically decreased by 99% since 2008.

Deputy PM Shrestha says he proposed new corridors to China

Are the stalled Nepal-China ties finally getting some momentum? Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha has some ideas on that score.

Shrestha says he has proposed building Nepal-China economic and development corridors with Chinese officials. The objective, he said, is to boost economic growth, trade, tourism, and connectivity between Nepal and three Chinese provinces that oversee and engage in various bilateral activities.

Shrestha, who returned home from China on Monday after a nine-day official visit at the invitation of his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi, said he had positive discussions with Chinese leaders and officials on the development of the corridors with three Chinese provinces—Tibet, Sichuan and Chongqing. These three provinces have made significant contributions to nurturing relations with Nepal, according to several Nepali politicians who have recently visited China.

Beijing has entrusted these provinces with engaging, promoting and expanding relations with Nepal under China's "peripheral diplomacy." Of late Nepal has seen a series of back-to-back high-level visits from these provinces, and when Nepali leaders visit China, their first destinations are Tibet, Sichuan and Chongqing.

"We had very positive discussions on developing economic and development corridors between Nepal and China," Shrestha said. "The focus of my visit was economic diplomacy. Nepal has been thinking about this new concept [the idea of corridors] after China introduced the Trans Himalayan Multi Dimensional Connectivity Network (THMDCN), which comprises economic and connectivity corridors to be developed under the Belt and Road Initiative."

The corridor starting from the Nepal-Tibet border will reach Chongqing through Sichuan province, Bishnu Pukar Shrestha, Nepali ambassador to China, told the Post over the phone from Beijing.

"If we can develop such a corridor, that would serve as an economic, trade and developmental vehicle between the two countries and open more vistas of cooperation. The concept is in a nascent phase, and it will take some time to develop its blueprint," said ambassador Shrestha.

Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha said a major achievement of his visit is the reciprocal visa waiver for Nepali citizens travelling to China.

"The Chinese are positive about it."

Nepal has been waiving visa fees for Chinese nationals since 2016 and has been looking for similar reciprocal treatment from China.

Although Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha said that China is ready to reopen the 14 traditional border points closed during the Covid pandemic, an official at the foreign ministry, requesting anonymity, said that is unlikely anytime soon.

While four traditional border points have already reopened since 2023, some are encountering difficulties, said officials.

"Reopening the remaining border points will involve technical challenges. But if they are reopened, it will be easier for our citizens living along the Nepal-China border to do business and sustain their livelihoods," said a member of Shrestha's delegation. During the visit, besides holding delegation-level talks with his Chinese counterpart, Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha also called on the chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), Wang Huning; vice minister of the International Department of the CPC Central Committee, Sun Haiyan; secretary of the Chongqing Municipal Party Committee of CPC, Yuan Jiajun; party secretary of CPC Tibet, Wang Junzheng; and Sichuan province governor Huang Qiang, among others.

DPM Shrestha, who is also the vice-chairman of the CPN (Maoist Centre), had an hour-long one-on-one with Wang and other CPC leaders. They discussed Nepal's political situation, among other things, according to a Nepali official who was part of the visit.

The Chinese leaders wanted to know if the government in Kathmandu would be stable after the entry of the CPN-UML in the ruling coalition, according to the official.

During his meeting with Shrestha, Chinese foreign minister Wang repeatedly emphasised the need for political stability, but Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha explained how Nepali political system is different from the Chinese one, the official said.

"In the Chinese system, one party rules from top to bottom and the decisions made by the leadership are implemented uniformly. But Nepali political system is different, and due to the composition of [hung] Parliament, governments change frequently," Shrestha told the Chinese leaders, according to the official.

"We have to face opposition parties too. But we are moving ahead with good planning."

During the visit, the Nepali side proposed elevating the existing foreign secretary-led bilateral mechanism to the foreign minister level in order to discuss various aspects of Nepal-China relations on a regular basis.

Both sides are said to be positive on setting up the joint commission at the foreign minister level, similar to one Nepal has had with India for decades.

"But, while the Nepali side proposed the mechanism, the Chinese side has yet to officially respond," the official said.

The two sides also discussed finalising the long-due implementation plan for the Belt and Road Initiative. The draft of the plan was first proposed by the Chinese side in late 2019 and both sides have exchanged several comments and amendments.

"One of the main objectives of the visit was to finalise the BRI implementation plan, but that could not happen. We had already agreed on signing the BRI implementation plan during the prime minister's China visit last September," said Shrestha. "We revisited the issue."

"There is also a discussion about whether to take loans or grants under the BRI. Naturally our priority is grants, not loans. Building projects whether with loan or grant comes only in the third stage [following Nepal's selection of projects and then sharing of their details with China]. So we have to select projects carefully," Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha told reporters upon landing at the Tribhuvan International Airport in Kathmandu.

Ambassador Shrestha said Nepal will discuss the project financing modality only after signing the BRI implementation plan.

"Once we give final touches to the BRI implementation plan, we will proceed to the signing stage. It will take some time, probably another two-three months," ambassador Shrestha said

"We have proposed different modalities for the implementation plan including grant and concessional loans. But we are not in a position to accept commercial and costly loans," added the ambassador.

According to a commentary published on China.com, a Chinese news portal, and widely shared in WeChat, a popular Chinese app, the goal of Shrestha's trip was to persuade China to convert the loan given to Nepal to build the Pokhara International Airport into a grant.

During his meeting with the Chinese leader, Shrestha said that if China does not transform the Pokhara airport loan into a grant, then Nepal will not be able to entertain high-interest loans from China in the future, according to the commentary.

The commentary also mentions the ongoing investigation by the Commission for Investigation of Abuse of Authority into the Pokhara International Airport construction.

The Chinese commentary has termed Shrestha's request to convert the loan into grant as 'unreasonable'.

"Now some people in Nepal are claiming that if China does not agree, they will not consider subsequent high-interest loans. In fact, they are threatening us. If the loans are not converted into grants, Nepal may not continue to cooperate with China on the basis of the Belt and Road Initiative. And why is Nepal so bent on challenging China? Then we have to mention India. You know, when it learned that Nepal decided to strengthen cooperation with China, India put pressure on Nepal many times," stated the commentary in Mandarin.

The commentary further went to say that with the outbreak of the "India Quit" movement in Bangladesh and the Maldives' demand for India to withdraw its troops, and the fact that Nepal's pro-Indian Nepali Congress Party was kicked out of the Cabinet not long ago, the People's Liberation Army military delegation also visited the Maldives and Nepal from the beginning to the middle of this month.

"This series of events has intensified the uneasiness of the Modi government, fearing that another South Asian country will seek to escape India's control. Therefore, it cannot be ruled out that India once again coerced and induced Nepal to achieve the purpose of getting them to withdraw from the Belt and Road Initiative and stay away from China," stated the commentary. "Nepal used the BRI as a bargaining chip to blackmail us into waiving loans." "Perhaps it was because it could not withstand the Modi government's intrusion and finally chose to compromise," it added.

"At the same time, there is another possibility, that is Nepal feels that China and India are trying hard to compete for influence in South Asia... But once we agree on Nepal's request, other countries will inevitably follow suit, and won't we be roasted on the fire? Therefore, no matter what motivations Nepal has for wanting to default on China, we refuse to be taken advantage of," writes the Chinese news site in its commentary on Shrestha's visit.

During the visit, China committed to an enhanced level of cooperation in different sectors, said a press note issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs after the visit. It said the two sides also agreed to expedite the implementation of the past accords and will resume regular meetings of the bilateral mechanisms. "China is also ready to provide its pasture areas to the Nepali farmers as per the agreement on trans-frontier pasturing by border inhabitants signed in 2012 and agreed for electrification in some rural areas of Nepal-China border. Both sides are also positive to conduct direct bus service between Kathmandu and Lhasa. We have also requested to facilitate the export of cooked buffalo meat, haylage grass, plant-based medicinal products, vegetable fruits and other Nepali products," reads the press note.

Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha, during his meeting with Chinese leaders and officials, also requested China to set up a multi-functional lab on the Nepal-China border; sought the use of more Chinese capital and technology in Nepal's agriculture sector; proposed more flights to Kathmandu and Pokhara from different Chinese cities; and asked for greater participation of Chinese investors including high-level Chinese leadership at Nepal's third investment summit to be held on April 28 and 29 in Kathmandu, according to the press note.

The two sides are ready to work to expand cross-border railway as well as road and air connectivity, and expand the electricity grid so that connectivity between Nepal and China will increase, the note further said. The two countries have also agreed to come up with specific projects in areas like agriculture, tourism, hydropower and infrastructure.

'China positive to Nepal's request for free visa privilege to Nepali nationals'

Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha has made a request to China for granting free visas to Nepali nationals wishing to visit China. Minister Shrestha reported a favorable reaction from the Chinese authorities to this proposal. Upon his return to Kathmandu on Monday morning after a seven-day official visit to China, Minister Shrestha shared this information at a press conference held at Tribhuvan International Airport (TIA). He stated, "Since 2016, Nepal has been offering free visas to Chinese tourists. In the spirit of reciprocity, I have requested free visa provisions for Nepalis visiting China. The Chinese side has responded positively to our request."

Minister Shrestha's visit to China began on March 24, following an invitation from the Chinese Foreign Minister. The visit included several high-level meetings aimed at bolstering economic diplomacy between the two nations. "My primary focus was on enhancing our economic ties and interdependence with China for Nepal's development and prosperity. I proposed the idea of developing a development corridor linking Nepal with Tibet, Sichuan, and Chongqing in China as a pivotal initiative for our achievements. These discussions were centered around our current economic diplomacy priorities," he elaborated.

The talks also covered finalizing and implementing the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects. Minister Shrestha mentioned discussions on various cooperative ventures, including allowing Nepalis in the border areas access to grazing lands in China's Tibet Autonomous Region, electrification of Nepali border villages, resumption of direct bus services between Kathmandu and Lhasa, and establishing multifunctional labs along the Nepal-China border. The Chinese side showed a positive stance on providing support for the export of Nepali agricultural products and improving the sector's productivity.

An agreement to increase flights between Kathmandu, Pokhara, and various Chinese cities was reached, aiming to boost trade, people-to-people relations, and tourism. Minister Shrestha highlighted the reopening of the Rasuwagadhi-Kerung, Tatopani-Zhangmu, Yari-Purang, and Nechung-Lizi (Korala) trade routes, with China agreeing to reopen 14 traditional trade points closed due to the COVID-19 pandemic as soon as possible.

Furthermore, both nations agreed to establish a joint commission at the foreign minister level to discuss and enhance the friendly relations between Nepal and China regularly.

New township reported coming up in Lhokha in China's Tibet-border build-up

29 April 2024, Tibetan Review

China is strengthening infrastructure close to the line of actual control (LAC) in occupied Tibet, with a major construction project taking place for a new township in Shannan (Tibetan: Lhokha), in south-eastern Tibet, reported the timesnownews.com Apr 28.

A new project is coming up in Luobusha (Tibetan: Lhunpo Zhol Township in Nagartse County) in Shannan Prefecture, a sparsely-populated part of Tibet, with less than four lakh people living in an area of about 80,000 sq km. Importantly, it is about 125 km from the LAC, roughly north of Arunachal Pradesh, the report said.

The housing project is reported to involve the construction of 164 houses to be begun next month to be ready by the end of next year. The report saw this as more evidence of China's increased emphasis on infrastructure build-up close to the LAC. A housing project could of course be for civilians and if necessary, for soldiers, it said.

The report also said that with the onset of spring, work on military infrastructure and training had begun in earnest. These were stated to include:

- The 84th aviation brigade was involved in an exercise involving the Z-19 and Z-18 helicopters.
- The 84th air defence regiment was involved in missile firing in the Aksai Chin area

- The 99th Air Brigade participated in flight training of the J-16 aircraft, a fighter similar to the Indian Air Force's Sukhoi-30. The Chinese air force began using it about ten years ago and is one of its frontline fighters.

Besides, a new 4-km road track was reported to be under construction in the Shaksgam area, which could become "pucca" in the future and may be used to link up with a labour camp in the area.

Reports have also been cited as saying infrastructure in Tashigang (Zhaaxigang), east of Ladakh, in western Tibet, was being upgraded. Located close to Tashigang is Shiquanhe (Tibetan: Sengge Khabab, the main town and administrative seat of Ngari Prefecture); here too, the upgradation of military infrastructure was reported to be evident.

Meanwhile, new Chinese dual-use 'Xiaokang' border villages are also regularly being built and older ones being "populated" along the disputed stretches of the LAC, especially in the eastern sector, to reinforce PLA positions as well as lay claim to territory, reported the timesofindia.com Apr 29.

Previous reports have noted that China has been building as many as 628 such border defence villages to fortify the borders of occupied Tibet with India and Bhutan over the last few years.

"All this clearly indicates PLA will continue to permanently station troops in forward locations along the LAC, even if eventually there is some sort of disengagement at the two major persisting face-off sites at Depsang and Demchok in eastern Ladakh," the report quoted an unnamed Indian source as saying.

There are currently 50,000 to 60,000 PLA troops with heavy weaponry forward deployed in the western (Ladakh) and central sectors (Uttarakhand, Himachal) as well as 90,000 soldiers in the eastern one (Sikkim, Arunachal), the report noted.

March

Nepal Deputy Prime Minister Shrestha visits Tibet; calls for opening 14 traditional border points with China

31 March 2024, PTI

A press release said that Mr. Shrestha, during the meeting, reiterated the need for reopening of traditional border points.

Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha also underscored the importance of exporting products from Nepal during a meeting with Wang Junzheng, secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Tibet Autonomous Regional Committee of China.

Mr. Shrestha, who is on his first visit to China after taking over office earlier in the month, was in Lhasa on Friday as part of his trip from March 25 to April 1 when he also urged the Chinese side for its cooperation to address issues facing the residents along the Nepal-China borders. A press release from the Consulate General of Nepal in Lhasa said that Mr. Shrestha, during the meeting, reiterated the need for reopening of traditional border points for the promotion of trade and commerce as well as facilitating the movement of people.

He sought cooperation to make arrangements for the use of pastureland along the bordering areas, to provide entry passes for Nepali containers and electrification in Nepal's highlands, according to the MyRepublica news portal. He recalled an agreement to resume 14 Nepal-China traditional transits during his meeting with Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi in Beijing two days ago and expected the facilitating role on behalf of Tibet's administration to implement the understanding.

Mr. Shrestha also called on the Chinese side to make provisions for resuming the Kathmandu-Lhasa bus service, the report said. He also underscored the importance of exporting products, including Haylage, cooked buffalo meat, and medicinal herbs among others to further strengthen economic cooperation. Haylage is a type of nutritious animal feed.

"The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs further expressed the need to cooperate in the areas of infrastructure and connectivity including the transmission lines to further strengthen the bilateral ties," The Kathmandu Post newspaper reported, quoting the statement. The two leaders also discussed matters relating to expanding socio-economic cooperation, enhancing understanding and goodwill through high-level exchanges, consolidating the ongoing cooperation and exploring new areas of cooperation.

"Both the leaders discussed matters of mutual interest," reiterated a post on X along with a photo by Nepal's Ministry of Foreign Affairs late on Friday night after the meeting.

Earlier on March 26, the strategic partnership between the two countries was discussed during Shrestha's meeting with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang where China has also urged the new dispensation in Nepal to finalise the implementation plan for its ambitious Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects that have struggled to make any headway due to continuous political changes in the Himalayan nation. Posting about the meeting on social media platform X, Ambassador Chen Song, the Chinese Ambassador to Nepal, said: "The two sides agreed to reopen 14 traditional border trade points immediately, strengthen practical cooperation between two countries in such fields as trade, investment, tourism, and advance the bilateral relations to a new height." Shrestha is also expected to visit the holy pilgrimage site of Kailash Mansarovar in Tibet during his visit, it was announced earlier last week.

China's anti-India, Tibet-pilgrimage restrictions ruining friendly Nepal's tourism industry

22 March 2024, Tibetan Review

Beijing denied access to Mt Kailash in Tibet to nearly 50,000 Indian pilgrims seeking to travel there through Nepal last year and the situation does not seem likely to change, given the state of Sino-India relations, reported the kathmandupost.com Mar 22.

It was hoped that after Beijing opened the Hilsa border point, the gateway to Kailash Manasarovar, last April, the worst was over. However, this was dashed when the Chinese authorities in Tibet restricted Indian pilgrims' movement through the border. As a result, many entrepreneurs in Nepal's tourism industry were forced to close, leaving many people unemployed, the report said.

Even after Beijing reopened some border points to Nepal allowing people and trade movement, it has imposed restrictions, especially for Indian pilgrims, which many say is the fallout of the growing India-China geopolitical rivalry, the report said.

The restrictions were stated to have ruined the million-dollar business of scores of hotels, tour operators, porters, helicopter and airline companies. Around 15,000 tourists used to visit Kailash Manasarovar through the Hilsa border before the Covid pandemic. The border was closed for four years due to the pandemic and reopened in April last year.

Kailash Manasarovar Yatra is one of the most lucrative tour packages for Nepali tour operators and Hilsa is the major point of entry for it, the report said.

"We are expecting our business to be zero this year too. There is no sign of opening the border even as the season is to start after a week," Bijay Lama, a hotel entrepreneur, has said.

Before the Covid pandemic, there used to be a huge movement of Indian tourists on the Hilsa border, Karma Lama, another tourism entrepreneur, has said. "As a result, from porters to hotel operators and from airlines to local groceries used to be busy from early morning."

"We incurred heavy losses when the border was closed. But despite the reopening last year, the tourist movement has been almost zero," he has said. The report cited tour operators as saying that last year Chinese authorities in Tibet denied access to nearly 50,000 Indian pilgrims who had booked for the Kailash Manasarovar Yatra that included journeying through different border points, including the Kathmandu-Lhasa flight.

In 2023, Nepal welcomed an all-time high number of Indian visitors, crossing the 300,000 mark for the first time. The major draw was the Kailash Manasarovar Yatra. But they were forced to reschedule their tour package and visit, instead, Nepal's holy places like Muktinath and Lumbini.

"Until China allows Indian pilgrims, there is little likelihood of tourists returning and business bouncing back," Yakyung Lama, a guard at Manasarovar Hotel in Hilsa, has said, adding he has been deployed to look after the hotel alone as there were no visitors.

Willing to work with new Nepali government, says Beijing

07 March 2024, ANN

As a friendly neighbour and cooperative partner, China attaches great importance to Nepal-China relations and is willing to work with the new Nepali government to adhere to the five principles of peaceful coexistence, according to Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson.

China has said it is willing to work with the new Nepali government, a day after Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal ditched the Nepali Congress-led alliance and formed a new government with the support of CPN-UML, Rastriya Swatantra Party and Janata Samajbadi Party.

Speaking during a regular press briefing in Beijing on Tuesday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said, "China has noticed that Nepal has recently formed a new ruling coalition and reorganised its cabinet. We sincerely hope that all parties in Nepal will unite and cooperate to smoothly advance the work related to the formation of a new government and achieve political stability, economic development, and improvement of people's livelihood."

As a friendly neighbour and cooperative partner, China attaches great importance to Nepal-China relations and is willing to work with the new Nepali government to adhere to the five principles of peaceful coexistence, enhance traditional friendship, deepen pragmatic cooperation, and promote Nepal-China strategic cooperation for ever-lasting friendship oriented toward development and prosperity, she said.

The partnership will further develop and create more benefits for the people of the two countries, Mao added.

Nepal's other neighbour, India is yet to speak about the recent political development in Kathmandu.

Nepali ambassador to China interests in two sessions

04 March 2024, ChinaDaily

This is the second time I will be attending the opening meeting of the annual session of the National People's Congress. The two sessions are China's important annual parliamentary meetings where the Chinese premier presents the annual report of the government of China.

The uniqueness of the two sessions is the presence of more than 2,000 deputies across the country showcasing the democratic parliamentary system of Chinese characteristics. I am also interested to learn about the target of China for 2024 in various areas including trade, investment, tourism, digital technology, science and innovation, green energy. Furthering the Belt and Road Initiative, Global Development Initiative and other initiatives would be another aspect of interest. I also look forward to the priority of the Chinese government toward its neighboring countries like Nepal in its approach to high-quality development and higher level of opening-up.

For the envoys attending it, the two sessions will be an opportunity to witness the solidarity and commitment of the Chinese government for development, progress and prosperity.

As a close and friendly neighbor, Nepal also looks forward to see how China prioritizes neighborhood policies and implements the South-South cooperation and triangular cooperation in areas such as economic cooperation, people-to-people relations, green and low-carbon development, artificial intelligence, digital economy, climate change and BRI implementation.

Enhancing trade, tourism, investment, people-to-people relations, connectivity and other areas of cooperation would be our prime interest. Therefore, the plan, program and targets in that direction will be our focus.

Digital economy is another particular area. Nepal is also leaping towards digital development. Cooperation on digital infrastructure, digital technology transfer, capacity building, e-governance infrastructure development, e-commerce and raising awareness about innovative digital technology will be more advantageous in Nepal. Such cooperation will be useful in the areas of aviation, tourism, service sectors and so on. Assistance to building smart city, robotic growth, IT based development in the areas of trade and data management would be more effective as well.

Nepal and China to renew talks on cross-border transmission lines

03 March 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Building a pair of Nepal-China cross-border transmission lines will again be on the agenda of a bilateral Joint Working Group meeting scheduled for later this month, two officials of the Nepal Electricity Authority said.

The meeting of the Joint Working Group comprising representatives of the NEA and the State Grid Corporation of China is scheduled to be held in the northern neighbour in the last week of March.

When Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal visited China in September last year, the two sides had signed an agreement on building the Nepal section of the proposed 220kV Jilong/Kerung-Rasuwasadhi-Chilime cross-border transmission line with Chinese grant.

"The two sides will launch the construction of the Jilong/Kerung-Rasuwasadhi-Chilime 220kV cross-border power transmission line at an early date," said the joint statement issued during the visit.

The two sides agreed to build the first transmission line connecting the two neighbours. Without grid connectivity with the other neighbour, Nepal fully relies on India to import electricity in the dry season and export its excess power in the wet season.

In the meantime, around a dozen cross-border transmission lines including one of 400kV capacity with India are in operation while four 400kV cross-border grids extending southward are in the pipeline.

The Nepal section is 16 km from the China border to the Chilime hub, while the Chinese will have to build around 80km from the border on their side as well, according to the NEA officials.

"During the meeting, we will also request them to build the project on the Nepal side as agreed earlier," said Dirghayu Kumar Shrestha, chief of the transmission directorate at the NEA. "We expect them to build the power line on their sides at the earliest as well."

Even though the Chinese side agreed to fund the Nepal section of the project, there has not been a further study on the proposed Ratamate-Rasuwasadhi-Kerung Cross-Border Transmission Line since its capacity was brought down to 220kV from 400kV.

"As the alignment will be the same on the Nepal side, a little update on the existing detailed feasibility study of the Ratamate-Rasuwasadhi-Kerung line will be enough to build the Nepal section," said Shrestha. "We plan to request the Chinese side to conclude the detailed feasibility study on their side within six months."

While designing the project under 400kV capacity, the cross-border transmission line was supposed to carry 5,000MW power, according to the NEA.

"There will be a discussion on how to synchronise the two power systems to enable cross-border transmission of power," said Komal Nath Atreya, chief of the Ratmate-Rasuwasadhi-Kerung Transmission Line Project, who has also been entrusted with coordinating with the Chinese side for building the proposed 220kV cross-border line.

Nepal also plans to propose another cross-border power line connecting the bordering village of Kimathanka in Sankhuwasabha district to the Chinese side. "We will convey to them that it is also our priority agenda," said Shrestha.

Kimathanka is located in Bhotkhola Rural Municipality of Sankhuwasabha in Koshi Province. "As several power projects are under construction on the Arun corridor, new cross-border transmission lines in eastern Nepal would help with the export of power from the projects in the region to China," said Atreya.

According to NEA officials, the two sides will also discuss powering up some of Nepal's bordering villages with the Chinese grid.

As per the joint statement issued after the prime minister's visit, the Chinese side agreed to positively consider Nepal's request for supplying grid power to electrify northern remote villages of Nepal from the Xizang (Tibet) Autonomous Region of China, and take overall consideration of providing equipment or technology on commercial terms.

Nepal had sought the neighbour's help to light up several bordering villages in around half a dozen districts.

Kimathanka in Sankhuwasabha, Lapchi in Dolakha, Chumubri in Gorkha, and Hilsa in Humla were some villages proposed for electrification with Chinese assistance, according to the NEA officials.

According to the power utility, over 5,000 households in several bordering villages are without electricity. Nepal had proposed using Chinese electricity as connecting the mountain villages to the domestic grid will be expensive because of the difficult terrain.

"The Chinese side has expressed its readiness to provide electricity to two bordering villages as a pilot initiative," said Atreya.

Nepal is ready to welcome back Chinese travelers

01 March 2024, Beijing Review

On February 27, an event promoting exchanges between China and Nepal's tourism sectors was held at the Embassy of Nepal in Beijing. Some 100 industry insiders from the World Tourism Alliance, China Association of Travel Services and travel agencies in both countries were in attendance.

"The government of Nepal and the government of China have decided to jointly celebrate tourism," Bishu Pukar Shrestha, Nepal's ambassador to China, said in his welcome address. Highlighting the natural wonders, cultural heritage sites and unparalleled hospitality of Nepal, he stressed that now is the perfect time to promote tourism between the two countries. "It is imperative that we add up the comprehensive and collaborative efforts to unlock the potential of tourism in Nepal," he said.

With high peaks, deep canyons and rolling hills, Nepal, a landlocked country lying along the southern slopes of the Himalayan mountain ranges, has always been a popular destination for trekkers, adventurers and yoga enthusiasts worldwide.

Before the onset of the COVID-19 pandemic, China was Nepal's second-largest tourist source market, the first being India. The pandemic, however, took a heavy toll on the inbound flow of Chinese tourists. In 2019, Nepal received a record 169,534 Chinese tourists. In 2022, that number fell to 9,599.

Things took a favorable turn in 2023, the year in which China fully reopened its borders. Last March, Nepal was added to China's list of approved outbound tourist destinations for Chinese citizens. Last November, a new land port serving as a gateway between southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region went into operation. Several Chinese cities, including Beijing, Shanghai, Chengdu, Chongqing and Lhasa, have also resumed direct flights with Nepal.

"In 2024, we will increase the capacity of our flights to accommodate 80,000 passengers traveling between China and Nepal," An Yongshen, general manager of Himalaya Airlines, said during the event. Himalaya Airlines, a joint venture between Nepal and China, was the first airline to resume direct flights between Beijing and Kathmandu, capital of Nepal, in January 2023. The airline is also planning to invite a group of Chinese travel and outdoor sports influencers to visit Nepal this March as a way of promoting local tourism on Chinese social media. With the gradual resumption of flights and tourism activities, hopes are high that arrivals from China will foster cultural as well as business connections between the two countries. This is especially significant under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), a strategy to boost global connectivity along and beyond the ancient Silk Road, first proposed by China in 2013.

"By jointly pursuing the BRI, China and Nepal have continued to foster ties, especially through tourism," Liu Shijun, vice-chair and secretary-general of the World Tourism Alliance, said. "I hope that we can all participate in strengthening the initiative and facilitating genuine connection between China and Nepal at a human level."

China's continued Covid closure of Nepal-Tibet border separates families, affects livelihoods

14 February 2024, Tibetan Review

The Covid-19 pandemic may have long ceased to be a matter of serious concern across the world, but not so to the Chinese government as far as its occupied Tibet's border area with Nepal is concerned. Officials in Tibet say they are still awaiting Beijing's permission to reopen the border, which was shut in Jan 2020 to tame the Covid pandemic, reported the kathmandupost.com Feb 14.

The Chinese government closed Tiptala Bhanjyang near the Nepal-Tibet border in Taplejung amid the coronavirus threat in Jan 2020. Due to the protracted border closure, hundreds of locals in the northern villages of Taplejung have been unable to meet their relatives in Tibet for four years now, the report said.

The Riu settlement of Dinggye County of Tibet lies just across the border – 35 km from the border. "But I have not been able to visit my maternal home for the past four years. The way to my maternal village is inaccessible as the Nepal-China border remains closed for a long time," the report quoted Paten Sherpa, wife of Temba and a permanent resident of Olangchungola in ward 7 of Phaktanglung Rural Municipality, as saying.

Bhomo Sherpa of Mauwatar in Olangchungola share a similar ordeal. She was born in Tibet, married Bhujung of Nepal's Bhotkhola Rural Municipality in Sankhuwasabha district. The couple later migrated to Mauwatar and began rearing yaks. While they are happy with their income and three children's education, Bhomo's only complaint is that the border has become a barrier preventing her from meeting her parents in Tibet.

Before the pandemic, both Temba and Bhujung frequently visited Tibetan markets for trade, transporting various goods on yaks. During their visits, they formed connections with Tibetan girls, whom they eventually brought back as life partners. "We never imagined that the border would close some day leaving us unable to visit our relatives," Bhujung has said.

"We have to walk for five to seven hours just to make a phone call to my maternal relatives in Rivu. It would take me less time to reach my maternal home than to get to Olangchungtola. But the closed border is a barrier in my way," Paten, who is in her mid-forties, has said.

Tsering Kipa, in her early seventies and living in Olangchungtola with her husband Dandu Sherpa, also has a strong desire to reunite with her maternal family in Tibet, the report said. But the close of the border remains an agonizing barrier standing in her way.

Chhete Sherpa Lama, ward chairman of ward 7 of Phaktalung Rural Municipality, has said there are at least 18 women in Olangchungtola and Yangma settlements who have their maternal homes in Tibet. He has said there are many Tibetan women married to Nepali men from Ghunsa, Phale, Mikkakhola among other settlements as well.

"We have discussions with the representatives of the (Dinggye County in Tibet) county. They tell us that the border will reopen once they get permission from the centre (Beijing). The government of Nepal should talk to the central government of China," Chhete has said, adding his own efforts thus far have been unsuccessful.

The report said trans-border trade and animal husbandry had been hugely affected by the border closure. People living near the Nepal-China border rely on Tibet for their daily essential commodities, as the area has yet to be connected to Nepal's national road network. Tibet also serves as a major market for them to sell a variety of products including medicinal herbs and domesticated animals, the report said.

Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal 'Prachanda' has asserted that his government has undertaken special initiatives in the operation of trade routes with China. Addressing the 24th general assembly of the Nepal Trans Himalaya Border Commerce Association, Prime Minister Dahal emphasized the increased priority given to the initiation and systematic management of international and commercial routes between Nepal and China.

He claimed that since becoming the Prime Minister for the third time, he has given more priority than ever to initiating and organizing international and commercial routes between Nepal and China.

The Prime Minister also revealed plans to open traditional trade routes, develop the DPR of the Tokha-Chhahare-Tunnel Way, and prioritize immediate advancements in relation to the construction of the Hilsa-Simikot road.

The President of the Federation of Nepalese Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FNCCI), Chandra Prasad Dhakal, also urged the government to prioritize the construction of the Kerung-Tatopani road, considering it crucial for cross-border trade.

Dhakal pointed out the comparative weakness of Nepal's road infrastructure leading to trade routes with China.

He expressed the need for the government to expedite and organize the first road network systematically, making it more convenient for business and trade with China.

Chinese Citizen Found Dead in Kathmandu Hostel: Investigation Underway

04 February 2024, BNN

In a grim revelation from the heart of Kathmandu, a 47-year-old Chinese citizen, Bao Guanglai, was found dead at the Nepalaya Home Hostel in Thamel on February 3. Having resided there since January 10, Bao's death has sent shockwaves through the hostel's community and beyond. The hostel staff, who discovered the lifeless body, promptly notified the police.

Police Investigation Underway

Upon arrival, law enforcement embarked on initial investigations into the circumstances of Bao's demise. Thus far, nothing suspicious has been unearthed. Police officials have been meticulous in their probe, leaving no stone unturned to unravel the circumstances leading to this unfortunate event. Bao's recent use of medication has been noted, though its relevance to his death remains unclear.

Chinese Embassy Notified

In the wake of Bao's death, the Chinese embassy in Nepal has been informed. This marks an essential step in the protocol, ensuring that the deceased's home country is aware of the tragic incident. It also enables them to provide any necessary support to the investigation and in dealing with the aftermath of the event.

Autopsy to Determine Cause of Death

With the cause of death still shrouded in uncertainty, Bao's body has been transferred to the Tribhuvan University Teaching Hospital in Maharajgunj. An autopsy is scheduled, aiming to shed light on the events leading to his sudden demise. The results of the autopsy will provide crucial insights into the actual cause of death.

While the investigation continues, this incident has thrown a spotlight on the safety of Chinese citizens in Nepal, sparking discussions and concerns among both local and international communities. As the story unfolds, the hope is that clarity will prevail, providing closure for all those affected by Bao's untimely passing.

Nepali leaders privately complain about China's aggressive public diplomacy

29 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan29'24) – In what is seen as an unprecedented move, visiting Chinese leaders have publicly claimed that certain countries were trying to destabilise the good relations between Nepal and China, while some elements were also defaming the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) by calling it a 'debt trap', reported the kathmandupost.com Jan 29. The occasion was a consultative conference in Kathmandu between Nepali political leaders and Communist Party of China, during which Nepal was also asked to improve its investment climate.

The report said that during an interaction with second-rung leaders of major political parties represented in the country's Parliament, Sun Haiyan, the vice minister of the International Liaison Department of the Communist Party of China, alleged that some countries were trying to disrupt development cooperation between Nepal and China and defame bilateral relations.

"...Some criticise our relations. Some are trying to sabotage our bilateral relations and some have increased activity against China," Sun was quoted as saying during the first conference of its kind.

The report said some Nepali leaders afterwards labelled Sun's statement as "belligerent", noting that Chinese leaders typically would not use such direct language in public discussions.

Yes, they would use such 'direct and aggressive' language during private conversations, but never in public forums like this, the report cited two leaders who took part in the conference as saying.

"It seems the Chinese are not happy with the current state of relations with Nepal or the way they are being publicly projected, both in and outside Nepal," one of the participants has said.

"They may feel a threat from Nepal, or they could have sensed that some external forces are trying to create a rift between Kathmandu and Beijing."

Sun skillfully asked Nepali leaders to avoid being too close to Americans and Indians, a CPN (Maoist Centre) leader from the ruling coalition has said. "Earlier they used to convey such concerns behind closed doors, but now they are saying it in public."

Sun was stated to have asked a leader from each party to speak by focusing on three things: Nepal-China ties, and fostering and enhancing these ties in the changing context; the type of relations needed in the future; and the role Nepali political parties can play to strengthen bilateral ties.

But except for the most pro-China UML's General Secretary Shankar Pokhrel, no other leader was stated to have directly addressed Sun's topics. However, they all have committed to boosting relations with China, expressed Nepal's desire to benefit from China's economic growth, and reaffirmed their commitment to 'One China' policy as well as the BRI.

Sun has also complained about Nepal's investment climate, saying it was not favourable for investors, and urged party leaders to diversify infrastructure and facilitate Chinese investment.

Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song, has also spoken in a combative tone, asking why the same Chinese companies, which were completing projects in other countries within set deadlines, had been unable to do so in Nepal.

"We have to find out why projects undertaken by the Chinese are getting delayed," Chen has said, adding, "Is it only due to us? No. You have to assess it."

Chen also expressed concerns over "negative reporting on the BRI" and on Sino-Nepal ties but did not specify which of the Nepali media was doing it, the report said.

These attacks have not gone down well with a UML leader who has told the Post "An ambassador should not speak so frivolously without clear evidence to back up his words. ... Making such unfounded statements is unbecoming of an ambassador. They should understand that Nepali media is free and they report by keeping in mind the fundamental interests of the country. The same is true of Nepali political parties."

China says rivals trying to sabotage its ties with Nepal

29 January 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Visiting Chinese leader asserts BRI is not a debt trap and expresses concerns over investment climate.

In an unprecedented move, visiting Chinese leaders have publicly claimed that certain countries are trying to destabilise the good relations between Nepal and China, while some elements are also defaming the Belt and Road Initiative by calling it a 'debt trap'.

During an interaction with second-rung leaders of major political parties represented in Parliament, Sun Haiyan, the vice minister of the International Liaison Department of the Communist Party of China, alleged that some countries are trying to disrupt development cooperation between Nepal and China and defame bilateral relations.

"...Some criticise our relations. Some are trying to sabotage our bilateral relations and some have increased activity against China," Sun said during a consultative conference in Kathmandu between Nepali political leaders and Communist Party of China. The conference was the first of its kind to happen in Kathmandu.

Some Nepali leaders, after the conference, labelled Sun's statement "belligerent" and stated that the Chinese leaders typically would not use such direct language in public discussions.

Yes they would use such 'direct and aggressive' language during private conversations, but never in public forums like this, two leaders who took part in the conference told the Post. "It seems the Chinese are not happy with the current state of relations with Nepal or the way they are being publicly projected, both in and outside Nepal," one of the participants said.

"They may feel a threat from Nepal, or they could have sensed that some external forces are trying to create a rift between Kathmandu and Beijing."

She also quietly communicated to Nepali leaders not to take sides while pursuing foreign policy.

Sun skillfully asked Nepali leaders to avoid being too close to Americans and Indians, a CPN (Maoist Centre) leader said. "Earlier they used to convey such concerns behind closed doors, but now they are saying it in public."

"We have good relations with political parties of Nepal, but some elements do not want to see them flourish," Sun said.

Second-rung leaders from all national parties and members of the international and foreign relations departments of major parties were present at the conference, where one leader of each party represented was asked to speak on Nepal-China ties. In her speech, Sun told party leaders to focus on three things: Nepal-China ties, and fostering and enhancing these ties in the changing context; the type of relations needed in the future; and the role Nepali political parties can play to strengthen bilateral ties.

Except for UML General Secretary Shankar Pokhrel, no other leader at the conference directly addressed Sun's topics, even as they committed to boosting relations with China, expressed Nepal's desire to benefit from China's economic growth, and reaffirmed their commitment to 'One China' policy as well as the Belt and Road Initiative.

Sun also expressed concerns over Nepal's investment climate, saying it is not favourable for investors, and urged party leaders to diversify infrastructure and facilitate Chinese investment.

Both before coming to Kathmandu and after she landed here, Sun held two separate rounds of talks with Chinese investors as well as Nepali traders doing business with China.

While complaining about growing geopolitical competition in Nepal, she tried to give a message that some powers do not want good relations between Nepal and China, but both sides have to maintain unity, trust and mutual relations so that they can collaborate in the face of challenges.

Without naming the US, Sun said that some are building alliances and fueling regional tensions.

"Some have increased their activities against China, and these external forces come and go, but Nepal-China relations should be strengthened. We are capable of addressing those challenges," Sun said without mentioning any specific geopolitical tensions in different parts of the world and their possible implications on the Sino-Nepalese ties.

Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song, while highlighting the details and economic status of cooperation between Nepal and China, stated that China is ready to invest in game-changing projects.

He queried the Nepali leaders about why the same Chinese companies, which were completing projects in other countries within set deadlines, have been unable to do so in Nepal.

"We have to find out why projects undertaken by the Chinese are getting delayed," said Chen, adding, "Is it only due to us? No. You have to assess it."

Sun had earlier said that there were other factors behind the Covid pandemic for the delay in projects. Ambassador Chen also expressed concerns over 'negative reporting on the BRI' by a section of the Nepali media. Chen said there is negative information about China and the BRI, "but we don't want to disclose where they are coming from." Also, he did not mention which media outlets have been spreading wrong messages about the BRI or Nepal-China ties.

"An ambassador should not speak so frivolously without clear evidence to back up his words," a UML leader told the Post. "Making such unfounded statements is unbecoming of an ambassador. They should understand that Nepali media is free and reports by keeping in mind the fundamental interests of the country. The same is true of Nepali political parties."

"Many wrong and negative messages are spreading in Nepali media. Several misleading and baseless news are there about Nepal-China relations. Very wrong messages are spreading outside about Nepal-China relations. BRI is a grant also, it is not entirely debt. Nepal's external debt is only three percent of its GDP, but there is misinformation circulating that Nepal is falling into a debt trap," he said.

Particularly in relation to the Pokhara International Airport built with a Chinese loan, some national and international media outlets have reported that the project could turn into a 'white elephant' due to Nepal's inability to pay back Chinese loan and interest.

While expressing his concerns over timely completion of China-funded projects or those undertaken by Chinese contractors, the Chinese envoy suggested major parties of Nepal to come together and collectively find a way out.

At the same time, the ambassador announced that China has approved 150 new scholarships for Nepali students at various Chinese institutions.

It was UML General Secretary Pokhrel who later tried to assuage Chinese concerns. "Not only the Chinese, other development partners and donors have also faced similar problems in Nepal," said Pokhrel.

"We need to resolve our structural problems that are hindering developmental efforts. There are ups and downs in international relations, but we are committed to advancing our relations with our neighbours. We accept their support and assistance. You need not be worried," said Pokhrel while suggesting Chinese leaders to complete the projects committed by them, be it road or rail or infrastructure related projects.

He told the Chinese leaders that Nepal expects commencement of committed projects, including the second Ring Road expansion (in Kathmandu), outer Ring Road, hydropower projects, transmission lines, and the Tokha-Chhahare tunnel. Pokhrel also urged the government to take initiatives to execute projects under the BRI.

"If you have any confusion regarding our stance on international relations, it is our responsibility to give clarification," said Pokhrel. "Nepali leaders may compete during elections, but they also hold regular discussions and collectively reach nuanced conclusions on key issues."

Vice-chairman of the National Assembly Urmila Aryal, UML's Pokhrel, Nepali Congress leader Shashank Koirala, Shishir Khanal of the Rastriya Swatantra Party, Sagun Sundar Lawoti of the Rastriya Prajatantra Party as well as Arjun Thapa of Janata Samajbadi Party reaffirmed Nepal's commitment to One China policy. All of them said Nepal was prepared to benefit from China's economic success and to seek more of its support in Nepal's development endeavours.

Koirala said the Congress is willing to work with China in order to further Nepal's development initiatives.

Nepal & China to sign plan of Beijing BRI projects: Nepal's Deputy PM

29 January 2024, The Economic Times

"Once we sign the implementation plan, we will move into the implementation phase," Shrestha, also the Minister for Home Affairs said while addressing an event here that is part of the Silk Road Youth Forum and South Asian Cooperation Conference.

KATHMANDU: Nepal and China will sign the implementation plan of the Belt and Road Initiative "very soon", Deputy Prime Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha said on Saturday, nearly seven years after the two neighbours inked an agreement to undertake ambitious Beijing-backed infrastructure projects in the Himalayan nation.

"Once we sign the implementation plan, we will move into the implementation phase," Shrestha, also the Minister for Home Affairs said while addressing an event here that is part of the Silk Road Youth Forum and South Asian Cooperation Conference.

He said the two countries will sign the implementation plan of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) "very soon" without specifying any date.

His statement came as Sun Haiyan, a senior leader of China's ruling Communist Party, was visiting Nepal and meeting the country's top leaders.

The signing of the BRI implementation plan is the key to negotiate and execute the projects under the initiative.

Nepal and China signed a Memorandum of Understanding on the BRI in 2017. However, not a single project under the initiative, a pet project of Chinese President Xi Jinping, has either been executed or negotiated.

The BRI, which aims to enhance connectivity and promote economic cooperation, has opened up new avenues for collaboration between the two nations, Shrestha said, adding that one of the cornerstones of Nepal-China cooperation is infrastructure development. "For nations like Nepal, nestled in the heart of the Himalayas, these initiatives open up possibilities for enhanced connectivity that can transform the economic landscape," he said.

"China's support in building critical infrastructure, such as roads, bridges, and energy projects, has been instrumental in propelling Nepal towards economic growth and stability," Shrestha said.

The signing of the BRI implementation plan between Nepal and China has been one of the prime agenda since early 2020 but an agreement has been elusive due to differences between the two sides over investment modality, The Kathmandu Post newspaper reported.

Meanwhile, speaking during an interaction programme with various political leaders of Nepal that was organised here, Sun Haiyan, the Vice Minister of the International Liaison Department of the Communist Party of China, urged the stakeholders of both nations to not get affected by the attempts by other countries to spoil ties between China and Nepal.

Without naming any nation, Sun said that countries come and go but it was the people of Nepal and China who were affected.

"There are other countries trying to play with the Nepal-China relations. They come and go. It is the people of Nepal and China who are affected by their activities," said Sun.

Sun, who is on a three-day visit to Nepal, said: "It is therefore necessary to move forward setting up targets. We have to work in unison to face the difficulties, and make cooperation more practical".

Senior leader of the ruling Nepali Congress Shashanka Koirala said that his party is willing to collaborate with China in the area of Nepal's development.

He also expressed gratitude to China for assisting the 2015 earthquake and also during the coronavirus pandemic.

The signing of the BRI implementation plan is the key to negotiating and implementing the projects under the initiative. Nepal and China signed the memorandum of understanding on BRI in 2017 but not a single project under the initiative has been implemented.

"Once we sign the agreement, we will move into the implementation phase," Shrestha said while addressing an event that is part of the Silk Road

Youth Forum and South Asian Cooperation Conference.

Chinese Vice Minister Sun Haiyan arrives in Kathmandu

26 January 2024, My Republica

KATHMANDU, Jan 26: Chinese Vice Minister Sun Haiyan, representing the International Department of the Communist Party of China, has arrived in Kathmandu for a significant four-day official visit.

According to sources at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Minister Sun is leading a Chinese delegation engaging in meetings with key figures, including President Ram Chandra Paudel, Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal, and prominent leaders from various political parties.

This visit is anticipated to reinforce the bilateral ties between China and Nepal and foster collaborative discussions on matters of mutual interest.

The diplomatic engagement aims to further solidify the diplomatic relationship between the two nations. Earlier in the week, Minister Sun led a Chinese delegation that visited the Maldives, showcasing China's diplomatic outreach in the region.

Communist unity top on agenda as Chinese flock to Nepal

19 January 2024, The Kathmandu Post

Barely a week after a delegation from Yunnan Province of China left the country, another Chinese contingent is currently in Lumbini.

Shi Yugang, deputy secretary of the Standing Committee of the Communist Party of China Yunnan Provincial Committee, recently wrapped up his Nepal visit after meeting Vice President Ramsahaya Prasad Yadav and some ministers.

The vice minister-level visit was officially a low-key exchange as Nepal at the time was busy hosting the External Minister of India S Jaishankar. As soon as the delegation from Yunnan concluded the Nepal visit, Master Yinshun, Vice President of the Buddhist Association of China, arrived on a chartered flight in Lumbini on Monday.

He met Lharkyal Lama, vice-chairman of the Lumbini Development Fund. Yinshun, who leads a delegation of 40 people, held talks with Lama about possible support for completing the Lumbini Development Master Plan, according to media reports.

What's more, another delegation from the International Liaison Department of the Communist Party of China led by Vice Minister Sun Haiyan is arriving on a three-day Nepal visit starting January 26. The purpose of the visit is said to be to strengthen party-to-party relations through a joint consultative conference with Nepali political leaders. After China lifted Covid-related restrictions at the start of last year, the number of visits and junkets between China and Nepal saw a significant uptick. The reasons are many, said observers and leaders who have frequently hosted Chinese delegations to Kathmandu.

Coming from Beijing and other provinces of China are the delegates of the Chinese government, civil society, military, think tanks, and academia. On the other hand, the Chinese have sponsored the visits of over two dozen Nepali groups from different walks of life in the past one year.

Altogether, there have been over five dozen big and small delegations to and from China, a senior Nepali intelligence officer who keeps tabs on the engagements with the north, told the Post. The frequency of visits from China is many times those originating in Nepal, the officer said.

Besides Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal, who was on an official visit, separate political delegations from the CPN-UML and the CPN (Maoist Centre), one parliamentary and several other small- and medium-sized delegations went to China.

Those visiting the northern neighbour included Deputy Speaker Indira Ranamagar, Deputy Prime Minister Narayan Kaji Shrestha, Chief Justice Bishowambhar Prasad Shrestha, Chief of the Army Staff General Prabhu Ram Sharma, besides several other ministers, political leaders, government officials and individuals.

Sun, who met UML Deputy General Secretary Pradeep Gyawali in November last year in China, is known as a Nepal hand in the International Liaison Department of the CPC. "Had an in-depth discussion on Nepal-China relations, new areas of cooperation between CPN-UML and CPC, and a review of the implementation process of previous agreements between the two governments," Gyawali had Tweeted after his meeting with Sun. During her upcoming visit, leaders of major political parties have been invited for a joint consultation conference on January 28 at Hotel Soaltee, Kathmandu.

"I am also invited to the event but I will be in Biratnagar on that date as I am busy with the National Assembly election," said Shekhar Koirala, a senior Nepali Congress leader. The Chinese side, in their communication to political leaders, has called for ten more leaders from each party to the event. Speakers will be given five minutes each to speak on ways to strengthen Nepal-China as well as party-to-party relations.

"I do not know much about why they are coming so frequently but we can say that they must have some concerns related to security and other [issues]. We need to be cautious," said Koirala.

Expressing his reservations over Prime Minister Dahal's recent statement on the Taiwan issue, Koirala said, we are surprised why the prime minister made such a statement on Taiwan's independence. The Nepali Congress has expressed its reservations over the Dahal administration's departure from one-China "policy" to one-China "principle" but has not made its position public.

On increasing foreign engagements in the country, according to Koirala, if the Nepali parties, state and government remain alert to—and conscious of—the nation's interests, no power can cause us any harm.

Days after the presidential election in Taiwan, the prime minister said Nepal upholds the "one-China principle" and stands against the "independence of Taiwan". Nepal, following the Sino-India war of 1962, has been supporting "One China", but after Prime Minister Dahal's visit in September last year there seems to be a departure from that policy to the "one-China principle".

"More and more Americans are coming, and the same with the Chinese. But Indians are not coming in the same number and frequency," said Koirala. "I see these visits as natural but the thing is we have to remain cautious and continue to promote our interests."

Given the relatively small size of Nepal's foreign ministry and the failure of successive governments to implement the diplomatic code of conduct, many such visits go unnoticed. "We do not know what transpires during these visits and meetings. Nor we know who sanctions these visits," a senior foreign ministry official said. "There is an increasing trend of foreigners inviting themselves to Nepal."

These visits from China have multiple meanings, reasons and objectives, according to leaders and individuals who have interacted with the Chinese delegations to Kathmandu.

One is geopolitical competition as the Chinese think that recent Indian and American engagements with Nepal have direct implications on their relations with Nepal, said Anand Pokhrel, a UML leader who runs a nongovernmental organisation and has hosted several Chinese delegations.

"The Chinese worry that Nepal has become a playground of big actors and players. The China-led Belt and Road Initiative is not making strides in Nepal due to the manoeuvrings of external forces, or this is what the Chinese believe," said Pokhrel. "The growing strategic alliance between India and the US, and its impact on Nepal-China relations, also seems to bother the Chinese."

After the formation of the Dahal government, Chinese suspicions have increased manifold, he added.

Much earlier, the passage of Washington's Millennium Challenge Corporation from the Nepal parliament had given the Chinese a cause for concern, another UML leader who maintains contact with Beijing, told the Post.

"Of late, the Dahal government seems to have tilted towards India, resulting in unprecedented results in energy and other sectors, only adding to Chinese suspicions," the leader added. "The ultimate goal of the Chinese is a reunion between Dahal and UML Chairman KP Oli, which they want to happen before the next elections. They are now examining the possibility."

Mrigendra Bahadur Karki, executive director of the Centre for Nepal and Asian Studies (CNAS) at Tribhuvan University, echoes the UML leader's view that the quick succession of visiting delegations from China could mean they are exploring possible unity between the communist parties of Nepal—or more precisely to again bring Oli and Dahal together.

"They [Chinese] are trying to influence Nepali politics. They are exploring another modality of uniting the communist parties," said Karki. With Beijing's "encouragement", the UML and the Maoist Centre formed an alliance and jointly fought the 2017 parliamentary elections. Later, they merged the parties to form the Nepal Communist Party, which later dissolved following a 2021 verdict of the Supreme Court. The two communist leaders revived their respective parties, and now the original party has been split into three different forces.

"Earlier, between 2017 and 2022, the Chinese used their soft power, and tools like culture, language and optics to bring the two communist parties together. As that approach has failed, they are working with a different modus operandi this time," said Karki.

An aspiring superpower needs to have considerable influence in its own region, CD Bhatta, an observer of geopolitics in South Asia, said. China and other contending powers have scaled up their engagements and are trying to rally smaller states like Nepal behind them. This not only helps to advance their geopolitical goals but also to win the confidence of the nations through economic and other forms of cooperation.

"There is more to come," the aforementioned UML leader said. "The Chinese will continue with their visits and engagements until they feel more secure."

In the process, they want to pave the way for engaging with all three layers of government and implement past accords and agreements signed between Nepal and China, according to the leader. "Most importantly, they want to ensure there is no danger emanating from Nepal as other foreign forces compete here."

Nepal and China are close neighbors, trusted friends, and reliable partners: PM

16 January 2024, My Republica

KATHMANDU, Jan 16: Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal has said that Nepal-China relations stand on the solid foundation of the 'Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence' and the two sides understand each other's aspirations and sensitivities and extend support to each other in times of need in the spirit of true friendship.

"Nepal and China are close neighbors, trusted friends, and reliable partners. We understand each other's aspirations and sensitivities and extend support to each other in times of need in the spirit of true friendship. Nepal firmly adheres to the one-China principle," PM Dahal stated.

"Our commitment is strong, unequivocal, straightforward, and unshakable. The change in domestic and external situations has not influenced and affected this principled position of Nepal," the PM said during the inaugural ceremony of the First Chinese New Year Celebrations in Kathmandu on Sunday.

On the occasion, PM Dahal said Nepal recognizes the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal Government representing the whole of China, and Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory.

"We have already made our position clear on 'Taiwan Independence' in the joint statement issued during my recent visit to China," the PM reiterated.

The PM said Nepal is against "Taiwan Independence".

He also said that Nepal is committed not to allow any activities in our nation that are inimical to the interest of China.

Likewise, China also always stands firm in respect of Nepal's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and dignity, the PM believed.

On the occasion, the PM said that our two civilizations are connected not only by rivers and mountains but also by shared culture and people-to-people contacts and stated that people in both countries follow the Lunar Calendar and celebrate the Lunar New Year and that this is the best example of this.

In his speech, the PM also recalled the recent meeting with Chinese President Xi Jinping during the PM's official China visit in September last year.

Likewise, the PM expressed his satisfaction towards the gradual implementation of the agreements and consensus reached during his recent China visit.

In regard to Nepal-China relations, the PM underscored that our common path was to promote the development of the international order in a more just and reasonable direction, safeguard the common interests of developing countries, and make an effort in building a community with a shared future for humankind.

During the event, PM Dahal and Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song jointly unveiled the logo of the First Chinese New Year.

Also speaking at the event, Chinese Ambassador to Nepal Chen Song urged the Nepali side to benefit more from Nepal-China cooperation and pledged to support Nepal's development endeavors. He also pledged to forge partnership to implement Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in Nepal.

The event was organized by the Chinese Embassy in Kathmandu, the Information Office of China's Yunnan Province and Foreign Affairs Office of Yunnan Province.

Present on the occasion, former Prime Minister Jhala Nath Khanal, ministers, senior leaders of different political parties, security officials, government officials, diplomats and a large number of Chinese communities living in Kathmandu.

I am confident, these connections between Nepal and China shall grow from strength to strength in the coming days."

CPSC inaugurates 'China Corner' at ISSI library

27 December 2024, Business Recorder

China Pakistan Study Centre (CPSC) at the Institute of Strategic Studies Islamabad (ISSI) organised the inaugural ceremony of "China Corner" at the ISSI Library.

The event was graced by Ambassador Syed Tariq Fatemi, Special Assistant to Prime Minister/Minister of State (Foreign Affairs), Pakistan Ambassador to China Khalil Hashmi and Shi Yuanqiang, Deputy Head of Mission at Embassy of China in Pakistan.

Ambassador Sohail Mahmood highlighted that ISSI has been serving as an important hub for research on China in Pakistan with multiple institutional collaborations with Chinese think tanks and universities. The ISSI is also a dialogue partner for the Pakistan-China Think Tank Forum with the China Institute of Contemporary International Relations (CICIR) as part of the Joint Working Group of CPEC on International Cooperation.

During his remarks, Ambassador Khalil Hashmi stated that Pakistan-China relationship has surpassed the traditional construct of inter-state relations and is now a comprehensive and unique partnership built on mutual trust, mutual support and mutual respect as its foundational principles.

Shi Yuanqiang, Deputy Head of Mission at Embassy of China, emphasised that ISSI has made outstanding efforts to promote mutual understanding and information about China. Chinese Embassy has been cooperating with ISSI and also contributed books and CDs for the "China Corner".

He added that Pakistan and China are all-weather strategic cooperative partners and iron-clad friends and that the friendship between the two countries has stood the test of time and is as solid as rock and as stable as Mount Tai. The salience of bilateral relationship is shared by highest level of leadership of both countries, and China is ready to work with Pakistan to help build a China-Pakistan community of shared future.

In his address, the chief guest, Ambassador Syed Tariq Fatemi, elaborated that there is something very fascinating about Pakistan-China relations that has perplexed scholars of international relations abroad for years. The history of both countries shows that despite huge differences between the people and philosophies of the two countries the relationship continued to strengthen.

Pakistan was among the first to recognise China, it was also the first to advocate for Chinese membership in the UN. In the shape of CPEC, Pakistan has been fortunate enough to be the first symphony in the Chinese orchestra of BRI.

To recognise the cooperation between two countries is not only good for the two countries but for the entire region. He added that the Chinese leadership had reaffirmed to the prime minister in their latest meetings that CPEC will not only continue to go forward but would also be enlarged and expanded. Earlier, in his opening remarks Dr Talat Shabbir, director CPSC, stated that the "China Corner" will provide comprehensive access to information and resources about China's governance model, economic policies, and diplomatic strategies. This repository will be a resource for fostering knowledge, dialogue, and collaboration.

Pakistan plans to acquire 40 planes of China's latest stealth fighter J-35: Report

23 December 2024, The Economic Times

Pakistan plans to procure 40 jets of advanced Chinese stealth fighter J-35, which, if materialised, will mark the first export of China's latest jet, according to a media report on Monday. The sale would mark Beijing's first export of fifth-generation jets to a foreign ally and is expected to recalibrate regional dynamics, particularly in relation to Pakistan's rival India, the Hong Kong-based South China Morning Post reported.

The Post quoted Pakistan media reports stating that the Pakistan Air Force (PAF) had approved the purchase of 40 aircraft, expected to be delivered within two years, to replace its ageing fleet of American F-16s and French Mirage fighters.

The acquisition of new aircraft was pursued despite the serious economic crisis faced by Pakistan.

There is no official confirmation in Beijing or mention of such a deal in the official media here, though speculation is rife since the J-35, primarily regarded as a jet fighter meant for Chinese aircraft carriers, was exhibited at the prestigious annual air show at Zhuhai city last month attended by top PAF officials. The land-based version of J-35 was called J-31, according to previous reports. China is currently the only country in the region to have developed stealth aircraft.

PAF chief Air Marshal Zaheer Ahmed Baber Sidhu said in January that "the foundation for acquiring the J-31 stealth fighter aircraft has already been laid", according to the Post report.

All weather allies, China and Pakistan, shared a deep military relationship shrouded in secrecy. Beijing has been helping the modernisation of all three wings of the Pakistan military as it modernised its own armed forces with billions of dollars of defence expenditure.

China has helped Pakistan to jointly develop and operate the J-17 Thunder fighter jet, the mainstay of the PAF.

China has delivered four advanced naval frigates to the Pakistan Navy in the last few years to enable it to play a bigger role along with its navy in the Indian Ocean and Arabian Sea.

The reports of Pakistan's plans to acquire China's latest fighter jets come in the backdrop of the visit of top PLA General Zhang Youxia to Pakistan last month, during which he held one-on-one talks with Pakistan's Army chief Gen Asim Munir.

Gen Zhang is Vice Chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), the overall command of the Chinese military headed by President Xi Jinping.

A readout issued by the ISPR after the talks said their engagements focused on "matters of mutual interest, regional security dynamics, measures for regional stability, and enhancing bilateral defence cooperation".

Gen Zhang's visit coincided with the arrival of 300 Chinese troops to Pakistan to take part in counter-terrorism drills.

According to Pakistan media reports, China is pressing Pakistan to allow its security firms to protect about 20,000 Chinese personnel working on the projects of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), who are increasingly coming under attacks from militant groups in Pakistan.

For its part, Pakistan says it has deployed over 30,000 military and para-military personnel to protect the Chinese workers.

Pakistan has been reportedly resisting Beijing's pressure to deploy Chinese troops over sovereignty concerns, according to the reports.

Pakistan slams U.S. official's remarks on its missile capabilities

21 December 2024, Xinhua

Pakistan on Saturday slammed a senior U.S. official's statement on the country's missile capabilities and delivery means, calling it "unfortunate."

"The allegations are unfounded, devoid of rationality and sense of history. The recent spate of U.S. allegations towards a major non-NATO ally would be unhelpful for the overall relationship, especially in the absence of any evidence in this regard," said Mumtaz Zahra Baloch, spokesperson of Pakistan's Foreign Ministry.

Baloch said that Pakistan's strategic capabilities are meant to defend its sovereignty and preserve peace and stability in South Asia, and any irrational assumption of hostile intent from Pakistan by any other country, including the United States, is perplexing as well as illogical.

Pakistan has always sought to engage constructively with the United States on all issues, including the need to pursue a balanced approach to security and stability in the region, she said.

China, Pakistan wrap up counterterror drills amid concerns over attacks

20 December 2024, SCMP, Hayley Wong

More than 300 PLA troops took part in the exercise, which was held as Beijing is pressing Islamabad to do more to protect Chinese nationals

China has wrapped up nearly three weeks of joint counterterrorism drills with Pakistan and signalled future "cross-border strategic projection" between the two militaries.

It comes as Beijing has stepped up pressure on Islamabad to do more to stop attacks targeting its nationals in the neighbouring South Asian country.

The People's Liberation Army sent troops to Pakistan for the exercise – dubbed Warrior-8 – which focused on "joint counterterrorism clearance operations", state broadcaster CCTV reported on Wednesday.

"Through this exercise, our strategic projection and inter-force combat capabilities were tested, laying the foundation for the upcoming cross-border strategic projection and joint combat missions," a PLA Air Force officer told CCTV.

The exercise, which finished on Saturday, also involved live-fire simulations, the use of drones for reconnaissance and counter-attack, as well as airborne assault, according to the report.

It included footage of troops disembarking from helicopters, and said missions had been coordinated between the two militaries as well as between their air and ground forces.

The PLA sent more than 300 troops to Pakistan from its Western Theatre Command in mid-November, weeks after a suicide bombing near Jinnah International Airport in the southern city of Karachi killed two Chinese nationals.

The exercise was the two countries' eighth joint counterterrorism drill and their first since 2019. The Pakistan Army said the exercise was launched at a northwestern counterterrorism facility.

China has increased diplomatic pressure on Islamabad after a series of attacks in Pakistan targeting Chinese infrastructure and citizens in recent years.

After the Karachi attack, China's foreign ministry demanded efforts by Islamabad to "effectively close the security loopholes".

A ministry spokesperson said Islamabad should also introduce "more targeted measures to provide full protection for the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor and the safety and security of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions in Pakistan".

Thousands of Chinese nationals are working on infrastructure projects in Pakistan as part of the economic corridor – a flagship Belt and Road Initiative project – and Beijing has also reportedly pushed Islamabad to allow its own security staff to provide protection for Chinese nationals there.

Reuters reported last month that Beijing had sent a written proposal to Islamabad with a clause allowing security agencies and military forces into each others' territory to assist in counterterrorism missions and conduct joint strikes. Neither side has confirmed the proposal.

Islamabad has carried out military offensives against separatist insurgents in Pakistan, including one in late November that killed four terrorists in three separate incidents in Balochistan province – home to major projects under China's belt and road scheme.

Those efforts are aimed at deterring militant groups like the separatist Balochistan Liberation Army, which has accused Pakistan's military of colonising the province with the help of China.

No groups have claimed responsibility for some of the attacks targeting China, including a suicide bombing near a Chinese dam project in Pakistan's northwest in March. Five Chinese engineers and their Pakistani driver were killed in that attack while they were on the way from their camp to the construction site in Dasu in the province of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa.

China Refuses Nuclear 'Second Strike' Capability for Pakistan

18 December 2024, The Defense Post, Inder Singh Bisht

China turned down Pakistan's request for a nuclear second-strike capability earlier this year in return for a military base in the strategic port city of Gwadar. The request was made during bilateral talks over the Chinese base interest, Drop Site revealed, citing sources.

According to the investigative outlet, Islamabad had already "privately" promised Beijing the facility in return for economic and military assistance.

The assistance has been framed as insulation against a potential US backlash in response to the decision. It includes modernization of Pakistan's military and intelligence capabilities to keep pace with traditional rival India.

Pakistan has strong economic ties with both the West and China and has sought to strike a delicate balance between the two.

Over a period of time, however, China has been projected as a more "natural ally" of Islamabad, necessitating greater integration with Beijing.

China is already Pakistan's biggest monetary lender and defense supplier.

However, Islamabad's latest request for a "second" nuclear strike capability has not gone down well with Beijing, according to Drop Site.

The chief concern over such a move is becoming a party to nuclear proliferation and potentially violating international laws.

China is classified a nuclear weapon state (NWS) under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), which bars it from transferring nuclear weapons, technology, and material to a non-NWS state.

Despite possessing a proven nuclear arsenal, Pakistan is a non-NWS country as it is not a signatory to the NPT.

A violation of NPT could draw sanctions and economic and diplomatic consequences.

Nuclear 'Second-Strike' Capability

A nuclear "second-strike" capability is assured retaliation to a nuclear first strike. It is a perceived deterrence to an adversary's attempt to win a war with a decisive first nuclear strike.

"Second strike is designed to call a bluff and check a threat," Drop Site quoted military technology expert Kelsey Atherton as saying.

"If a country devotes significant resources to not just a nuclear arsenal, but a nuclear arsenal that can still be put into use even if some of it is destroyed, then the stakes of a first strike become too high to contemplate."

Pakistan's quest for the second-strike capability was reported soon after India's recent testing of a submarine-launched nuclear-capable ballistic missile (SLBM).

The 3,500-kilometer- (2,175 miles) range K4 SLBM was tested from the newly commissioned INS

Arighat, which is the country's second indigenous nuclear ballistic missile submarine.

An SLBM is considered the most reliable "second-strike" capability as it remains hidden from adversaries' sensors for longer, unlike the other branches of the nuclear triad: land-based nuclear missiles and air-launched assets.

The K4 is capable of striking all of Pakistan and most of China. A longer-range K5 with a range of 5,000 kilometers (3,107 miles) is also expected in the coming years.

Another mode of second strike could be a hardened underground silo, which could withstand even a nuclear strike.

Gwadar

China is investing billions in the South Asian country's infrastructure as part of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, a key component of the larger Belt and Road Initiative.

The Gwadar deep-water port is at the end of a 3,000-kilometer (1,864 miles) land corridor connecting China's Xinjiang province to the Arabian Sea.

The corridor is designed to allow Chinese trade to bypass the vulnerable Malacca Strait, a narrow sea lane between Malaysia and Indonesia which could be blockaded by the US Navy during a conflict.

Not just an alternative to the Malacca choke point, a militarized Gwadar could allow China to impose its own blockades on Western energy shipments in the Middle East as a tit-for-tat move.

The city lies in the restive Balochistan province, which has been beset with protests and militant attacks for years.

A large part of the backlash is against the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, which is perceived to be aiding the siphoning off of the province's natural resources.

Many Chinese nationals working on the project have been killed and injured in militant attacks, straining relations between the two strategic allies.

CHINA: Pakistan, China's diplomatic relations deteriorates

17 December 2024, Daily Trust

Pakistan and China, long hailed as "all-weather allies," are experiencing significant strain in their diplomatic relations.

Beijing's growing frustration with Islamabad's inability to ensure the safety of Chinese nationals and projects within Pakistan has come to the fore.

This tension, marked by an unusually public diplomatic spat, reflects deeper issues in the partnership between these two nations, which have historically prided themselves on their strategic and economic alignment.

"As if Pakistan's government wasn't under pressure enough – with thousands of protesters on the streets and the capital Islamabad in lockdown amid calls to release former prime minister Imran Khan – relations with neighbouring China are also going from bad to worse," according to The Interpreter, an Australia-based think tank.

Recently, a rare diplomatic dispute has highlighted Beijing's increasing frustration over the safety of its citizens in Pakistan.

"It is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months," stated China's ambassador in Islamabad, Jiang Zaidong, in a notably candid reaction to remarks by a senior Pakistani politician perceived as downplaying the threat.

"President Xi [Jinping] cares about Chinese people's security and puts people's lives first," Jiang added. "He especially cares about the security of the Chinese people in Pakistan."

China and Pakistan share a relationship rooted in mutual interests, strategic necessity, and economic collaboration.

Since the 1960s, the two countries have fostered ties in various domains, including military cooperation, infrastructure development, and countering regional rivals, primarily India.

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a cornerstone of China's ambitious Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), epitomizes the partnership.

Launched in 2015, CPEC has seen investments exceeding $62 billion, promising infrastructure development, energy projects, and trade connectivity.

In return, China has reaped access to strategic ports like Gwadar and an economic corridor to the Arabian Sea.

However, the partnership has increasingly been tested, especially as security threats in Pakistan have escalated, directly impacting Chinese interests.

Beijing's anger stems primarily from repeated attacks targeting Chinese nationals and projects in Pakistan, particularly in the volatile Balochistan province.

Over the past few years, separatist groups like the Balochistan Liberation Army (BLA) have claimed responsibility for attacks on Chinese engineers, workers, and infrastructure.

These groups view China's investments in the region as exploitative, accusing it of neglecting local communities while profiting from the province's resources.

China's patience appears to be wearing thin. The lack of tangible progress in curbing attacks on its citizens and infrastructure projects has led to unusually pointed remarks from Beijing.

In recent months, the Chinese government has explicitly voiced concerns over Pakistan's inability to provide adequate protection.

In a rare public rebuke, Chinese diplomats criticized Pakistan's handling of security arrangements.

This comes amidst reports that Beijing has considered withholding further CPEC investments until tangible improvements are made.

Such a stance is unprecedented, considering China's historically cautious approach to publicly addressing issues with its allies.

The safety of its citizens has become a top priority for Beijing. Reports suggest that China has pushed for greater involvement in Pakistan's internal security measures, including deploying Chinese private security firms to protect its assets and nationals.

While Pakistan has allowed some degree of external security presence, such measures are often met with domestic resistance, complicating the situation further.

Beyond security, economic tensions have also emerged.

Pakistan's ongoing financial crisis has raised concerns about its ability to repay Chinese loans under CPEC.

Beijing, facing its own economic challenges post-COVID-19, appears reluctant to provide unconditional bailouts.

This has led to a more transactional dynamic in their relationship, replacing the earlier camaraderie with pragmatism.

Balochistan remains a flashpoint in the Pakistan-China relationship.

While the region is critical to CPEC, its socio-political challenges—ranging from separatist insurgency to local discontent—pose significant hurdles.

Pakistan's inability to address these issues undermines its credibility as a partner, frustrating Beijing.

China's growing interest in balancing its regional partnerships has also contributed to the evolving dynamic.

While Pakistan remains important, Beijing has been exploring closer ties with India, particularly in trade and technology.

This shift, however subtle, may signal a recalibration of China's South Asia strategy, further complicating its ties with Pakistan.

On the other hand, faced with mounting pressure, Pakistan has taken steps to reassure Beijing.

The Pakistani government has promised enhanced security measures, including establishing special security forces dedicated to protecting CPEC projects.

However, systemic challenges such as political instability, economic constraints, and persistent insurgency limit Islamabad's ability to deliver.

The Pakistani military, a key stakeholder in CPEC, has intensified efforts to secure Chinese investments. Joint military drills and counterterrorism operations have been conducted to address security threats. Despite these measures, attacks continue, underscoring the complexity of the issue.

The growing rift between Pakistan and China raises questions about the future of their partnership.

While mutual interests remain strong, the relationship will likely see a shift from one based on unconditional support to a more conditional, performance-driven alliance.

The deterioration in Pakistan-China relations underscores the challenges of maintaining a strategic partnership amid growing security concerns.

For Pakistan, the stakes are high; losing China's support would significantly impact its economic and geopolitical standing, while for China, the situation serves as a cautionary tale about the risks of large-scale investments in volatile regions.

While the partnership is unlikely to collapse entirely, it is poised to undergo significant recalibration, according to experts.

CPEC Phase 2.0: Pakistan-China partnership enters new era with high-level engagements in Beijing

15 December 2024, The Express Tribune

Contrary to slowdown rumors, recent developments signal renewed vigor strategic focus on advancing next phase of CPEC

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), the flagship project of the Belt and Road Initiative, remains the cornerstone of economic cooperation between China and Pakistan.

Contrary to rumors suggesting a slowdown, recent developments signal a renewed vigor and strategic focus on advancing the next phase of CPEC, dubbed CPEC Phase 2.0. This pivotal phase aims to redefine the framework of bilateral relations through deeper collaboration, advanced technological transfer, and transformative socio-economic projects.

Federal Minister for Planning, Development, and Special Initiatives, Ahsan Iqbal, is spearheading Pakistan's engagement in a series of high-profile events in China, including the High-Level Seminar on CPEC 2.0 in Beijing and the 3rd Forum on China-Indian Ocean Region Development Cooperation in Kunming.

His participation underscores Pakistan's seriousness in revitalizing CPEC, addressing unresolved issues, and charting a robust roadmap for Phase 2.0, which envisions long-term prosperity for both nations.

CPEC Phase 2.0: Strengthening Pakistan-China Ties

At the heart of these engagements lies China's unwavering commitment to transforming CPEC into a strategic partnership that fosters growth, development, and connectivity.

Far from being sidelined, CPEC is evolving into a multi-dimensional framework with five key thematic corridors—Growth Corridor, Livelihood-Enhancing Corridor, Innovation Corridor, Green Corridor, and Opening-Up/Regional Connectivity Corridor.

These initiatives, proposed by Chinese President Xi Jinping, align seamlessly with Pakistan's 5Es framework of Economy, Exports, Environment, Energy, and Equity, conceptualized under Ahsan Iqbal's visionary leadership.

China's eagerness to propel CPEC into Phase 2.0 is evident from its invitation to a 27-member high-level Pakistani delegation to Beijing. This delegation comprises seasoned professionals and experts from diverse fields who will receive specialized training to build their capacity for collaborative projects with Chinese counterparts.

This initiative reflects China's commitment to transferring cutting-edge technologies, modernizing Pakistan's infrastructure, and fostering a knowledge-based economy.

Strategic Focus on Mutual Benefits

During the preparatory orientation session in Islamabad, chaired by Ahsan Iqbal, the Minister stressed the importance of the delegation's mission, describing it as a "once-in-a-lifetime opportunity" to learn from China's transformative journey.

He highlighted how China has lifted over 800 million people out of poverty, achieving unparalleled economic progress. This remarkable transformation serves as an inspiring blueprint for Pakistan, which aims to replicate China's success through sustainable development and poverty alleviation initiatives under CPEC Phase 2.0.

The delegation's agenda includes key focus areas such as:

- Establishing an economic growth corridor with clear priorities.
- Advancing tech-driven industries and fostering innovation.
- Addressing poverty alleviation, education, and healthcare through targeted socio-economic projects.

- Accelerating energy transitions and promoting sustainable economic models.
- Expanding exports and building global supply chain linkages.

This multifaceted approach aims to position Pakistan as a regional manufacturing and trade hub, serving as an economic engine for South Asia.

Minister Ahsan Iqbal's Role in Rebuilding Trust

Ahsan Iqbal's visit to China and participation in these critical engagements are expected to rebuild mutual trust and reassure Chinese leadership of Pakistan's commitment to CPEC.

The Minister has a proven track record in successfully implementing Phase 1 projects, particularly in infrastructure, energy, and Gwadar development. He has also been instrumental in advocating for the establishment of Special Economic Zones (SEZs), paving the way for industrial relocation from China to Pakistan.

Chinese authorities have often acknowledged and praised Ahsan Iqbal's significant role in steering CPEC projects. His presence in Beijing will send a strong message about Pakistan's resolve to resolve outstanding issues from Phase 1, particularly regarding project security and operational challenges.

A key highlight will be his assurance to Chinese counterparts about prioritizing the security of Chinese nationals working in Pakistan, a critical concern for the Chinese government.

Charting the Path for Future Success

The seminar in Beijing, co-organized by Pakistan's Ministry of Planning and China's National Development and Reform Commission (NDRC), will mark the official launch of CPEC Phase 2.0. This high-level event symbolizes the deep-rooted partnership between the two countries and their shared vision for a prosperous future.

With the emphasis on capacity building, this exercise aims to equip Pakistani experts with the skills and strategic vision needed to collaborate effectively with their Chinese counterparts.

The delegation's findings and recommendations will form the cornerstone of a comprehensive blueprint for CPEC Phase 2.0, ensuring its alignment with global sustainable development goals.

A Bright Future Ahead

CPEC Phase 2.0 represents a paradigm shift in Pakistan-China relations. With a focus on innovation, technology transfer, and sustainable development, this new phase promises to unlock Pakistan's economic potential and position it as a regional leader.

The visit of Ahsan Iqbal and the active participation of Pakistani experts in these high-level engagements reflect Pakistan's unwavering commitment to the success of CPEC. Despite efforts to jeopardise this golden partnership, the China-Pakistan brotherhood is only becoming stronger.

As the two nations strengthen their partnership through initiatives like these, the world will witness CPEC Phase 2.0 emerge as a model of international cooperation and economic integration, benefiting not only China and Pakistan but the entire region.

China keen to invest $1 billion in Pakistan to establish medical city

14 December 2024, Times of India

A Chinese business delegation has met with President Asif Ali Zardari here and expressed interest in investing $ 1 billion to establish a medical city in Pakistan, according to a media report. Pakistan has held strong bilateral relations with China which has supported it through many investments and development projects such as the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor project which was termed as a "lifeline" for the country's economy.

The delegation of Chinese investors during a meeting with Zardari on Thursday outlined their plans to invest $ 1 billion into creating the medical city in Karachi's Dhabeji Economic Zone which is outside Pakistan's biggest city and financial hub.

The medical city would be Pakistan's first fully integrated pharmaceutical and medical ecosystem.

Korangi Association of Trade and Industry (KATI) which is tasked with the running of the Dhabeji Economic Zone said in a statement that the pledge by the Chinese investors is an example of the growing economic ties between the two countries.

The meeting which was also attended by Sindh Chief Minister, Syed Murad Ali Shah and the Chinese Consul General was held after successful negotiations between the Sindh government and the conglomerate of Chinese investors.

President Zardari, according to the statement, highlighted the importance of fostering deeper economic and trade cooperation between Pakistan and China.

The statement said that the Chinese delegation also showed interest not only in the health sector but also in several other key areas, including agriculture, livestock, energy, transport, and manufacturing.

The President also told the government is committed to facilitate and provide cooperation to Chinese investments in Pakistan.

"We welcome Chinese investors and are determined to provide them with every possible support," he added.

The Sindh Chief Minister also told the investors that the government had introduced Chinese language courses in the province to remove language barriers and enhance cultural ties between the two countries.

Pakistan Requested Nuclear Weapons Assistance From China in Talks Over Strategic Port

13 December 2024, Drop Site, Murtaza Hussain and Ryan Grim

In bilateral talks this year, Pakistan asked China for a nuclear second-strike capability in exchange for the Gwadar Port—a demand that was rebuffed by China. Negotiations between the Pakistani military and China over the future use of a strategic port in the city of Gwadar have stalled over major demands made by Islamabad for support from Beijing, including the provision of a second-strike nuclear capability that would significantly upgrade Pakistan's nuclear weapons program.

The breakdown of talks with China comes amid a broader crisis facing the military, with public discontent over a failing economy, rigged elections, and the imprisonment of former prime minister Imran Khan triggering mass public protests in the capital this November. China has been long cited as a potential savior for the country's flailing economy. But, as Drop Site News has learned, that relationship appears to be in free fall over public and private disputes over security concerns, as well as China's demand to build a military base inside Pakistan.

Earlier this year, Drop Site reported on negotiations over the creation of a Chinese military base at the strategic Pakistani port city of Gwadar. According to classified Pakistani military documents, Pakistan had given private assurances to China that it would be permitted to transform Gwadar into a permanent base for the Chinese military.

As part of those ongoing talks, as Drop Site has learned from sources informed about the conversations, Pakistan's military-backed government has asked China to provide it sweeping concessions, including economic and military aid to insulate it from Western backlash over the strategically located port. But the request for a nuclear second-strike capability to be provided to Islamabad by Beijing goes well beyond previously known demands.

A second-strike capability is a highly prized form of military deterrent, as it allows a country to retaliate even if it suffers an attack that cripples other components of its nuclear triad. Possession of a second-strike capability is intended to deter hostile powers from attempting to win a war with a decisive nuclear first strike of their own, by guaranteeing that they would also face some form of nuclear retaliation regardless, whether from attacks carried out by nuclear-armed submarines or missiles stored in hardened silos.

"Second strike is designed to call a bluff and check a threat," said Kelsey Atherton, a military technology expert who has published on nuclear weapons, speaking generally. "If a country devotes significant resources to not just a nuclear arsenal, but a nuclear arsenal that can still be put into use even if some of it is destroyed, then the stakes of a first strike become too high to contemplate."

In the already select group of nuclear-armed countries worldwide, China is part of a small subset that maintains this capacity. According to sources with knowledge of the talks between Beijing and Islamabad, the demand for a second-strike capacity in exchange for Gwadar was deemed unreasonable by the Chinese side, leading to a stalling of negotiations. The failure to reach an agreement on the subject seems to have further soured the turbulent relations between the two allies and pushed back any agreement on militarization of Gwadar, despite Pakistan's repeated promises that it would be made available for Chinese use.

The ongoing talks between the two countries have taken place in a format known as the Consultation on Strategic Defense and Security Cooperation, or the 2+2 Dialogue. Previous rounds of 2+2 talks had been held in Beijing and the city of Urumqi, in China's Xinjiang region. The last round was held in Islamabad this January.

The Pakistani consulate in New York and the Chinese embassy in Islamabad did not respond to requests for comment for this story.

The Pakistani military has now found itself stuck with an increasingly difficult balancing act, as it attempts to maintain good ties with both the U.S. and China, even as the relationship between Beijing and Washington grows more and more hostile. With Donald Trump set to take office in the U.S. in January 2025, his expected hawkish stance on China and potential skepticism toward the Biden-era alliance with the Pakistani military junta could further complicate Pakistan's position and risk crucial support from both countries.

"The food is already on the plate"

The status of Gwadar, prized by China for strategic reasons, has long been a particular area of concern for the U.S., which is in the midst of a broad campaign to contain China in the Indo-Pacific region. The view held in Chinese security circles is that militarization of Gwadar is inevitable. Or, as a People's Liberation Army officer quoted in a 2020 study published by the U.S. Naval War College said, "The food is already on the plate; we'll eat it whenever we want to."

Beijing has pushed Pakistan hard to allow it access to Gwadar, currently the site of joint economic cooperation between the two countries, for military purposes—including, according to Drop Site's sources, the ability to permanently station troops, military equipment, and resources for maintenance and logistics at the port.

Access to Gwadar would allow China to break free from U.S. naval blockades on its vital energy shipments in the Strait of Malacca, while potentially allowing the People's Liberation Navy to conduct its own blockades on Western energy shipments in the Middle East should a war break out.

In return for Gwadar, Pakistani officials taking part in the talks have asked Beijing to provide sweeping indemnification against any political, economic, and diplomatic blowback that Islamabad may suffer from the U.S. over granting the port to China, as well as support with modernizing its military and intelligence capacities to keep pace with rival India.

Yet it is the demand for second-strike capacity that reportedly antagonized China the most. Granting the demand would represent a major upgrade to Pakistan's own nuclear capability, but would also require China to become party to nuclear proliferation in the subcontinent and potentially violate international law.

As a signatory of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, China is classified as a nuclear-weapon state (NWS). The treaty explicitly prohibits NWS parties from transferring nuclear weapons, technology, or materials to any non-nuclear weapon state for the purpose of developing nuclear weapons. Pakistan, which is not a party to the NPT, is considered a non-nuclear-weapon state under the treaty framework.

A second-strike capability would be a huge and expensive augmentation to Pakistan's nuclear weapons program, entailing significant costs and technical complexity. Since the early 1990s, Pakistan has invested heavily in expanding and modernizing the nature of its nuclear arsenal, maintaining the fastest growing nuclear weapons stockpile in the world.

A 2016 report by the Carnegie Endowment for Peace noted that Pakistan's "ongoing arms buildup, continuing fissile material production, and investment in sea-based second-strike capabilities suggest a shift toward a complex deterrence posture rooted in the notion of maintaining a strategic balance," while citing retired senior Pakistani officers who stated, "a second strike capability is being developed by equipping the conventional submarines with nuclear-tipped ballistic missiles."

Providing nuclear weapons technology to another country would not only risk damaging China's global reputation, but also trigger likely diplomatic and economic consequences, including possible nonproliferation sanctions.

Despite longstanding security and political ties, relations between Pakistan and China have come under severe strain in recent years. In another decision that reportedly infuriated Beijing, during a joint naval exercise last year known as Sea Guardians III, Pakistan did not allow Chinese ships to make a port call at Gwadar, in apparent deference to American sensitivity about China's presence at the site.

Protests and Insurgents

The 2+2 negotiations have taken place against the backdrop of a deteriorating political, economic, and social situation in Pakistan. Mass protests in Islamabad in November by supporters of former Prime Minister Imran Khan—who was deposed by Pakistan's military in 2022—paralyzed the capital for days, before a violent crackdown by the military killed an unknown number of protestors and dispersed the demonstrations. Militant and separatist violence in multiple provinces have also killed dozens of Pakistani security forces in recent months, while the country's leadership struggles to find solutions for widespread inflation and energy shortages.

The continued deterioration of Pakistan's relationship with China in this climate could cost it dearly. Pakistan today owes China billions of dollars in loans, Chinese energy companies power much of Pakistan, and, in the past few decades, Pakistan's major weapon purchases, including fighter jets and naval ships, have originated from China. So far these investments have not paid dividends for Pakistani citizens, who have continued to struggle with inflation and shortages despite China's increasingly visible footprint in the country. And terrorist factions in certain regions of the country have lashed out against China's presence, killing several Chinese engineers and citizens in repeated attacks.

In recent months, China has also aired rare public criticism of Pakistan over its failure to protect Chinese nationals in the country from terrorist attacks carried out by separatist insurgents in the province of Balochistan.

"China prioritizes the safety of its citizens globally," Chinese Ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong said in a heated public exchange recently. "We cannot proceed with our projects if security concerns remain unresolved."

Balochistan is an important part of a major Chinese infrastructure project known as the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), as well as the Gwadar port that China has sought to augment its own military capacity in the Indian Ocean. While CPEC was launched with grand promises of economic revival, it has so far proven to be a disappointment to both Islamabad and Beijing, partly due to ongoing militant violence and political instability inside Pakistan.

Militants in Balochistan have accused China of helping facilitate the exploitation of their province, by carrying out development projects aimed at sapping its resources for the benefit of the government in Islamabad. They are also motivated by longstanding grievances with the Pakistani state, whom they accuse of neglecting their economic and political rights. The Baloch are an ethnic group spanning multiple countries in the region, including Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Iran, and insurgents have sought to secede and form a new state from these contingent parts. The insurgency in Pakistan is also believed to be supported by India, whom Pakistan also accuses of helping orchestrate terrorist attacks inside the country aimed at undermining foreign investment.

This week, Pakistani media reported that the National Assembly's Standing Committee on Planning Development was informed that Pakistan and China were entering into a joint security agreement to combat the terror attacks. Drop Site reported the existence of this proposed arrangement this September, in an article that was attacked by representatives of the Pakistani government at the time as fake news intended to harm the country's institutions.

The Pakistani military now finds it in a position where it is alienating its closest ally in Beijing, while also failing to reap meaningful benefits from the U.S., where the Biden administration has shown limited appetite for reengagement. A growing upsurge of criticism from lawmakers over the military's crackdown on democracy and imprisonment of Khan is now threatening to turn the country into a pariah in Washington, with little prospect that the incoming Trump administration will act to intervene in Pakistan's favor.

As the Pakistani government reels from these overlapping economic and political crises under military rule, it now faces the prospect of isolation from the majority of its own public, the U.S. government, and its closest foreign allies in Beijing. Far from helping guarantee its economic and security interests as had once been hoped, the stalled negotiations over Gwadar now threaten to add one more insolvable item to the military's growing list of dilemmas.

CM Maryam hails Pak-China ties as time-tested

10 December 2024, Dunya News

Pakistan becomes third-largest buyer of Chinese solar panels

09 December 2024, The Express Tribune

Pakistan imported 13 gigawatts of solar panels during the first half of the current fiscal year.

Pakistan's energy landscape is undergoing a dramatic transformation as the country becomes the third-largest importer of Chinese solar panels, fueled by soaring electricity prices and a growing shift toward renewable energy, according to a World Economic Forum report.

In a remarkable development, Pakistan's push toward solar adoption is rapidly accelerating, driven largely by market dynamics and external pressures, with minimal political backing.

As a result, Pakistan now ranks as the world's sixth-largest solar market, and is the third-largest buyer of Chinese-made solar panels, with imports surging to 13 gigawatts (GW) in the first half of 2024. The total expected imports for the year could reach 22GW, marking a significant leap forward in the country's transition to solar power.

The country's growing reliance on solar energy has been largely influenced by the dramatic rise in electricity tariffs, which have increased by 155% over the past three years. With grid electricity costs spiraling, many consumers, industries, and businesses have turned to solar power as a more cost-effective and reliable solution. This shift is reshaping the energy landscape and offering a glimpse into the future of energy use in emerging markets.

The surge in solar adoption has been significantly aided by China's overproduction of solar panels, which has driven down costs, making solar power more accessible to countries like Pakistan. Solar power now serves as an attractive alternative to the country's strained national grid, which has long struggled with reliability issues and inefficiencies.

In response to the growing demand for solar power, Pakistan has seen industrial, agricultural, and residential sectors embrace solar energy in a big way. The first half of 2024 alone saw the import of 13GW of solar panels from China, with estimates suggesting total imports could reach 22GW by year-end. This marks a major milestone in Pakistan's energy transition, positioning the country as one of the fastest-growing solar markets globally.

The shift to solar energy has been largely market-driven, with little direct political intervention. While the Pakistani government has shown limited support for the transition, factors such as the rising cost of grid electricity and the overproduction of solar panels in China have played a key role in accelerating the shift toward solarization.

One of the driving forces behind the solar boom is the country's mounting electricity costs. With grid electricity prices having risen by more than 150% in just three years, many businesses and consumers have sought to reduce their reliance on the national grid by installing solar power systems. In addition to the financial incentives, the declining cost of solar panels, primarily driven by China's production surplus, has made solar power more affordable and accessible.

The rapid rise in solar adoption, however, comes with challenges. As more consumers and businesses disconnect from the national grid, the demand for grid electricity declines, pushing up the fixed costs that those who remain connected must bear. These rising capacity payments are straining Pakistan's already fragile financial system, contributing to further instability in the energy sector.

Pakistan's power grid, which has long been plagued by inefficiencies and underinvestment, is struggling to cope with the growing integration of solar power. The country's national grid, unable to provide consistent and reliable electricity, is facing the risk of further deterioration as more and more consumers abandon it in favor of self-generation via solar panels.

The need for grid modernization has become more urgent as solar power adoption accelerates. The integration of distributed renewable energy sources like solar is creating new challenges for Pakistan's electricity infrastructure, and experts warn that without significant upgrades, the national grid could face a downward debt spiral, exacerbated by the rising costs of capacity payments.

In addition to these challenges, the country's inconsistent energy policy, which has been marred by inefficiencies in electricity production, pricing, and regulation, is further deepening the energy crisis. Recent electricity price hikes, which some see as an alternative tax on consumers, have led to a sharp decline in grid electricity consumption, prompting more industries and businesses to turn to solar energy.

Despite these difficulties, Pakistan's energy transition offers significant lessons for other emerging economies. The country's experience demonstrates the importance of reducing reliance on traditional energy sources while balancing the need for grid stability and economic sustainability. With China playing a central role in Pakistan's solar energy shift, both as a key supplier of solar panels and an investor in the country's energy projects, the global nature of this transition is clear.

The momentum toward solar energy adoption in Pakistan has been further accelerated by falling battery costs, which are enabling more consumers to adopt solar-plus-storage solutions. This trend is expected to continue, with solar power expected to play an increasingly vital role in the country's energy mix.

However, experts warn that the rapid transition to solar energy, if not managed effectively, could have unintended consequences for the national grid. The growing reliance on distributed solar power systems is raising questions about the long-term viability of traditional state-run grids, which have been unable to meet the country's rising demand for energy.

Pakistan's experience highlights the urgent need for grid modernization, investment in smart energy infrastructure, and comprehensive market reforms to ensure the smooth integration of renewable energy sources. Additionally, as the global demand for clean energy continues to rise, emerging economies like Pakistan will need to rethink their energy strategies to avoid falling behind in the global race to decarbonize.

China, Pakistan flexing military muscle at anti-BRI militants

04 December 2024, Asia Times, Richard S Ehrlich

Joint Warrior VIII exercise practices protecting Belt and Road Initiative projects from anti-Chinese insurgent attacks in Baluchistan

China's joint, three-week anti-terrorism exercise in Pakistan from November 20-December 11 aims to help defend Beijing's $70 billion Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) projects against deadly anti-Chinese insurgents in Baluchistan province.

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), which includes upgrading Pakistan's north-south roads and Karakoram Highway to link Kashgar in China's landlocked Xinjiang province directly to Pakistan's hammerhead-shaped peninsula and port of Gwadar in Baluchistan on the Arabian Sea, close to the Persian Gulf, is under threat.

The CPEC is also expanding Gwadar's deep-water port so large Chinese vessels will have a much shorter route for shipping petroleum from the Persian Gulf to oil-hungry China. Currently, oil-laden ships bound for China depart the Middle East through the Persian Gulf into the Arabian Sea and then route south around India toward Singapore.

To reach China's east coast ports, those ships must pass through the congested Malacca Strait, where US-backed Singapore monitors its narrow waters. Before docking in China, they then must sail up the South China Sea, which is wracked by US-China and regional rivalry to control its shipping lanes, islands and undersea resources.

The CPEC, however, would enable oil vessels from the Persian Gulf to stay in the Arabian Sea and unload their cargo at Gwadar for overland vehicle transport north to China's Xinjiang. "The deepening relationship between China and Pakistan through CPEC could strain US-Pakistani relations, driving Islamabad closer to Beijing," Washington-based Newlines Institute reported on November 14.

In addition to a sleek 1,860-mile (3,000-kilometer) highway and upgraded port, the CPEC projects at Gwadar include construction of a new Gwadar International Airport, a desalination plant, a coal-fired power plant, container berths and terminals for bulk cargo, grain, oil and liquified natural gas.

The Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) sent more than 300 special operations, army aviation and logistic support troops from its Western Theater Command to the Pakistan-China Joint Exercise, Warrior VIII, which ends on December 11, China Military online reported.

China's Western Command "guards the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with India and the China-Pakistan boundary," the Press Trust of India news agency reported on November 19.

It also emphasises the promotion of deep mutual ties and friendship between the neighbouring countries.

During the visit, collaboration on matters related to information technology, healthcare, industry, smog, and climate change will be reviewed.

There will also be discussions on business and trade relations between the private sectors of Punjab and China.

During the visit, Maryam Nawaz Sharif will be briefed on China's development model, governance system, and the promotion of bilateral cooperation.

The Punjab CM will also meet prominent Chinese leaders and key government officials during the visit.

Pakistani exercises show how Chinese investments fuel military mission creep

30 November 2024, The Washington Times

Port, transport projects with Islamabad face attacks from local insurgent groups

China's joint, three-week, anti-terrorism exercise in Pakistan, which kicked off November 20, is a stark illustration of an emerging new strategic reality.

While China's Communist leaders build up the country's military strength to challenge the global U.S.-established world order and to become the dominant power in East Asia, there are also more mundane reasons to beef up the power of the People's Liberation Army, such as protecting one's investment portfolio.

A major thrust of the new joint exercise is to help defend Beijing's $70 billion Belt and Road Initiative projects, which have faced a series of deadly attacks by anti-Chinese insurgents in Pakistan's Balochistan province.

Under threat is the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a massive infrastructure undertaking that includes upgrading Pakistan's north-south roads and Karakoram Highway, linking Kashgar in China's landlocked Xinjiang province directly to Pakistan's hammerhead-shaped peninsula and the port of Gwadar in Balochistan on the Arabian Sea, close to the Persian Gulf.

Drawing on Chinese investment funding through the Belt and Road Initiative, the CPEC has been expanding Gwadar's deep-water port so large Chinese vessels will have a much shorter route for shipping petroleum from the Persian Gulf back to the oil-ravenous domestic market.

Currently, oil-laden ships bound for China depart the Middle East through the Persian Gulf into the Arabian Sea, and then head south around India toward Singapore. To reach China's east coast ports, those ships must pass through the congested Malacca Strait, where U.S.-backed Singapore monitors its narrow waters.

Before docking in China, they then must sail up the South China Sea, which is the scene of mounting

U.S.-China tensions and clashing claims by China and countries around the region for control of shipping lanes, strategic islands, and undersea resources.

The Pakistan corridor, however, would enable oil vessels from the Persian Gulf to stay in the Arabian Sea and unload their cargo at Gwadar for overland vehicle transport north to China's Xinjiang region.

And that in turn has sparked new tensions with the United States, which has cultivated its own ties to Pakistan and watched with alarm as China's investment and security footprint in the country have grown in recent years.

"The deepening relationship between China and Pakistan through CPEC could strain U.S.-Pakistani relations, driving Islamabad closer to Beijing," the Washington-based Newlines Institute warned in an analysis published November 14.

Roads, ports, plants and airports

In addition to a sleek 1,860-mile highway and upgraded port, the CPEC projects at Gwadar include the construction of a new Gwadar International Airport, a desalination plant, a coal-fired power plant, container berths, and terminals for bulk cargo, grain, oil and liquefied natural gas.

To practice protecting that investment, China's People's Liberation Army sent more than 300 special operations, army aviation and logistic support troops from its Western Theater Command to the Pakistan-China Joint Exercise, Warrior VIII, which is set to run through December 11, China Military Online reported. In addition to protecting the corridor, China's troops are also being touted as a support force for Pakistan as it deals with jihadist and separatist threats within its own borders. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Lin Jian said on Nov. 20, as the exercises were just getting underway, that "China firmly supports Pakistan's effort of fighting terrorism." The 300 Chinese troops joined special operations forces from the Pakistan Army's Special Service Group (SSG).

"The exercise will focus on joint counter-terrorism clean-up and strike operations," Chinese-government-controlled Xinhua News Agency reported. "The two sides will engage in multi-level and mixed training across various specialties, and organize live troop drills in accordance with the actual combat process." China's Ministry of Defense said in its own statement that the exercise "aims to consolidate and deepen practical exchanges and cooperation between the two militaries, as well as to strengthen their joint anti-terrorism capabilities."

The drills began at Pakistan's National Counter-Terrorism Center in Pabbi, in mountainous northwest Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province which borders

Afghanistan near the Khyber Pass canyon, Radio Pakistan reported.

The Chinese troops and their equipment arrived in batches on Y-20 transport aircraft and marched onto Pakistan's tarmac in desert combat camouflage, including steel helmets topped with what appeared to be camera and telescopic lenses, according to online news videos.

They joined bearded Pakistani forces, similarly uniformed, at a joint flag-raising ceremony before deployment, field surveys, and setting up a command post.

But there is a subtext to the exercises, as China finds its workers and projects the target of a fierce separatist force that has long clashed with the central government in Islamabad.

"Significantly, the military drills, the eighth edition between the all-weather friends, are being held amid reports that China is pressing Pakistan to permit its forces to provide security for hundreds of Chinese personnel working in the $70 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor," reported India-based Raksha Anirveda magazine which monitors defense and aerospace industries.

"The Baluch Liberation Army (BLA) along with the Islamic militant group Tehreek-e-Taliban Pakistan (TTP) stepped up attacks against the Chinese nationals and the Pakistan military in Baluchistan and neighboring Khyber Pakhtunkhwa bordering the Taliban-ruled Afghanistan," the magazine said.

Ethnic insurgents have been fighting for decades for impoverished Balochistan's autonomy or independence. They claim Pakistan has carried out extrajudicial killings and enforced disappearances in Balochistan in order to quash the rebellion, and exploits the province's natural resources while neglecting to provide the funds to develop the region's economy.

The insurgent forces have become increasingly anti-Chinese during the past 10 years, amid allegations that the province and Gwadar port will profit Beijing and Islamabad, but not Balochistan. Gwadar's port is administered by Pakistan's Maritime Secretary, and operated by the China Overseas Port Holding Co.

Hot, arid Balochistan borders similarly dry, bleak, undeveloped zones in southeast Afghanistan and southeast Iran. That Muslim-dominated triangle forms a Pakistan-Afghanistan-Iran tinderbox of competing feuds by tribes and governments.

Pakistani officials argue China's Belt and Road investments will benefit the very regions that are trying to undermine the projects now underway.

"CPEC will not only benefit China and Pakistan but will have a positive impact on Iran, Afghanistan, Central Asian republics, and the region," said the Pakistan government's CPEC Secretariat on its website.

Beijing reportedly has pressed Islamabad to allow China's security forces to have boots on the ground to protect its workers, but Pakistan instead promised to boost security.

"Pakistan has decided to launch a comprehensive military operation to curb active terrorist organizations in the country's southwest Baluchistan province, the [Pakistani] Prime Minister's Office said in a statement," Xinhua reported on Nov. 21.

Difficult struggle

Pakistan and China however are expected to face difficulty upgrading Gwadar and the CPEC highway while grappling with bloody assaults by ethnic Baloch and other separatist forces.

In October, the separatist Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) claimed a suicide bombing that killed two Chinese engineers outside Karachi's international airport, 240 miles east of Gwadar.

"It is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months," an angry Chinese Ambassador Jiang Zaidong publicly stated after the bombing.

The earlier attack killed five Chinese engineers working on China's Dasu Hydropower Project in March when a suicide bomber rammed their convoy in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province.

"We are solid in our commitment to the safety and security of Chinese nationals, institutions and projects overseas," the Chinese Foreign Ministry said at the time. "China and Pakistan have the resolve and capability to make the terrorists pay the price," the ministry's spokesman Mr. Lin said.

Also in March, security officials killed eight armed insurgents who were trying to enter the Gwadar Port Authority complex.

Pakistan has declared the Balochistan Liberation Army, the Balochistan Liberation Front and other Baluchi insurgents as terrorist organizations.

Balochistan's gold meanwhile has attracted China Metallurgical Group Corp (MCC), which opened gold mining sites in 2023 under Beijing's Copper-Gold Project in Baluchistan's Saindak region and nearby locations.

Baluchistan's natural resources also include oil, coal, and natural gas.

Balochistan's insurgents "perceive Chinese investments — the CPEC, in this case — as exploitative, on the grounds that the Balochi people allegedly have not benefited from socioeconomic development or improvement in their living conditions," Newlines Institute said. "In response, Beijing has demanded the Pakistani government conduct thorough investigations and increase security measures."

Pakistan said CPEC, which began construction in 2015, will streamline Balochistan's road, rail, port, air and data communication systems, attract industries and agricultural development, improve medical facilities, vocational training, tourism, and create jobs.

The ambitious investment plans have even sparked an effort by Washington not to be left behind.

In September 2023, U.S. Ambassador to Pakistan Donald Blome "visited Gwadar's port and met with Port Authority Chairman Pasand Khan Buledi to learn about port operations and development plans, Gwadar's potential as a regional trans-shipment hub, and ways to connect with Pakistan's largest export market: the United States," the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad said in a statement at the time.

"In a meeting with Pakistan Naval West Command, Ambassador Blome discussed regional issues and emphasized a continued partnership in the years ahead," the embassy said.

Pakistani officials say they have tried to assure the U.S. that Gwadar will remain a commercial port open to all.

China, Pakistan talk security as they target terrorism against belt and road projects

28 November 2024, SCMP, Meredith Chen and William Zheng

Top Chinese military official meets Pakistani counterpart in wake of attacks against Chinese interests in the South Asian country

China's top military official held security talks with his Pakistani counterpart on Wednesday amid joint counterterrorism drills in the wake of several attacks targeting Chinese interests and citizens in the South Asian country.

Zhang Youxia, vice-chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), met Pakistani Chief of Army Staff Syed Asim Munir during a visit to Pakistan, vowing to strengthen ties as the two countries held their first joint anti-terrorism drills in five years.

Their talks focused on "regional security dynamics, measures for regional stability, and enhancing bilateral defence cooperation", according to Pakistan's military.

The Warrior-8 joint counterterrorism exercise began in Pakistan last week and will continue until mid-December, focusing on clean-up and strike operations.

China sent more than 300 troops from the People's Liberation Army (PLA) Western Theatre Command to take part, with the Chinese defence ministry saying the exercises were aimed at "testing and enhancing joint counterterrorism capabilities" and "consolidating and deepening pragmatic exchanges and cooperation" between the two militaries.

The ministry added that the drills involved “multilevel, multi-speciality integrated training” and simulating real combat scenarios.

The exercise comes in the aftermath of a string of deadly attacks targeting Chinese citizens and interests over the past year, attacks that have deepened concerns about regional security and overshadowed economic cooperation.

On November 19, when China unveiled the plan for the joint exercise, Islamabad announced a new military offensive against separatist insurgents in Balochistan.

Four terrorists were killed from November 20-22 in three separate incidents in Balochistan province, home to major projects under China’s Belt and Road Initiative, the Pakistan Armed Forces said.

Chinese military analyst Song Zhongping said joint counterterrorism exercises could deter terrorist groups and improve bilateral political and economic ties.

“China-Pakistan economic cooperation requires a strong security guarantee, as the security situation in Pakistan has been relatively complicated in recent years,” he said.

Song noted that the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor – a flagship project under Beijing’s belt and road plan to grow global trade – had been particularly vulnerable to attacks and interference by local terror groups.

A suicide bombing outside Jinnah International Airport in Karachi killed two Chinese citizens and wounded another in early October. A separatist group, the Balochistan Liberation Army, has claimed responsibility for the attack.

Following the attack, China sent a task force to Pakistan and urged authorities to step up security measures and ensure the safety of Chinese citizens working on projects in the country.

The joint drill is the eighth in the Warrior series of exercises between the Chinese and Pakistani militaries and the first since 2019.

Song noted that the PLA had brought more unmanned devices to recent joint exercises, saying it was a way for China to showcase its military advancements while testing the equipment in different environments.

He added that the Ukraine war and other conflicts showed that unmanned equipment was crucial to counterterrorism operations and full-fledged military conflicts, and the PLA wanted to be a leader in this area.

On Tuesday, China concluded joint army training with Singapore focused on urban counterterrorism operations.

The drills, held in central China, featured window-breaking drones, wall-climbing robots, explosive ordnance disposal robots, and unmanned reconnaissance and strike vehicles, according to the PLA’s official news portal.

Drones also featured heavily in joint exercises between China and Laos in July, according to state-owned Global Times. Those drills included training on drone countermeasures.

“China has a large amount of unmanned equipment already,” Song said. “It is necessary for the PLA to test it comprehensively in combat-like environments in these joint drills so we can improve it.”

Hong Kong-based military commentator Liang Guoliang said that unlike the US, which had taken a “high-end and expensive path” in its drone strategy, China “strives to develop both high-end and value-for-money drones”.

“The PLA has numerous drones and robot fighters with varying performance and quality,” Liang said.

“This will not only help the PLA to reduce casualties, but also greatly improve the combat effectiveness of Chinese soldiers.

“One soldier equipped with various unmanned equipment can take on many more enemies.

“By showcasing the latest unmanned weapons, China can help its neighbours to improve their understanding of the latest military tech and gain a better footing.”

Any attempt to harm Sino-Pak ties bound to fail: Chinese envoy

28 November 2024, The Express Tribune

Says China's cooperation in Pakistan's development will continue unhindered

Consul General of People's Republic of China in Karachi, Yang Yundong has said that all-weather strategic cooperation between Pakistan and China has continued to deepen under the joint guidance and promotion of President Xi Jinping and Pakistani leaders.

Speaking at the media briefing at the consulate, organised to mark this year the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China, Yundong said, iron-clad friendship between Pakistan and China is everlasting and ever-refreshing. The Pakistan-China relationship is of strategic significance. Any attempt to disrupt or undermine Pakistan-China cooperation is bound to fail.

He said, the two sides will continuously strengthen practical cooperation across various fields, jointly upgrade the CPEC and accelerate the construction of major projects in railways, highways, and ports. The two sides are ready to build Karachi-Hyderabad section in line with the modality of "implementing in a phased manner." The two sides will work together to refine and optimise the construction plan of Karachi-Hyderabad section and formulate financing and implementation plans that are feasible and sustainable at the earliest.

The two sides will speed up the development of the auxiliary infrastructure of the Gwadar Port, steadily attract more cargo shipments to the port, find a solution to inadequate water and power supply at an early date, accelerate the development of the port's industrial zone, and solidly enhance connectivity between the port and other parts of Pakistan. The New Gwadar International Airport project aided by China has been completed.

Yundong said, China firmly supports Pakistan's efforts in combating terrorism and asks Pakistan to take targeted security measures to comprehensively safeguard the safety and security of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions in Pakistan, so as to create a safe and secure environment for the cooperation between the two countries. About China's achievement and remarkable social and economic development, the consul general said, China maintained an average annual economic growth rate of 8.9% for 45 consecutive years, increasing its economic scale by 47 times.

Rising Violence Threatens Chinese-Funded Projects In South And Central Asia

27 November 2024, Radio Free Europe, Bashir Ahmad Gwakh and Frud Bezhan

Scores of multimillion-dollar Chinese-funded development projects dot South and Central Asia.

But rising violence is threatening to derail China's investments in the region, which is key to Beijing's global Belt and Road Initiative (BRI).

In Pakistan, militants have killed seven Chinese workers so far this year. In Tajikistan, a Chinese worker was killed this month in the first attack of its kind.

The killing of Chinese nationals has highlighted the growing fighting capabilities of extremist groups in the region, which has long been a hotbed of militancy.

'The Chinese Are So Frustrated'

Thousands of Chinese nationals work in Pakistan, which is home to the $60 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), an integral part of the BRI.

To protect Chinese workers, Islamabad has created a special police force, installed hundreds of checkpoints, and erected numerous barriers around the megaprojects. But the measures have failed to curb the rising number of attacks on Chinese workers in recent years.

Experts have put that down largely to Pakistani security and intelligence lapses as well as the increasing capabilities of the Baloch Liberation Army, the largest armed group in the southwestern province of Balochistan.

"China believes in safe investments, meaning they do not like conflicts around their projects," said Jalal Bazwan, a researcher at China's Zhejiang University. "The Chinese are so frustrated because of the inability of the Pakistan government to provide security that they will not invest in further projects," he added.

Balochistan, an impoverished but energy-rich region, is the site of dozens of Chinese-funded infrastructure, energy, and trade projects. The vast province borders Afghanistan and Iran and is home to Pakistan's Baluch ethnic minority, who accuse Islamabad of exploiting the province's natural wealth.

In October, the BLA killed two Chinese citizens in a bombing outside the airport in Pakistan's largest city, Karachi. In March, a suicide bomber drove an explosives-laden car into a bus carrying Chinese workers in northwestern Pakistan, killing five of them. No group claimed responsibility.

The fighting capabilities of the BLA, a separatist militant group, have increased in recent years.

Estimated to have around 5,000 fighters, the BLA has been boosted by the influx of U.S. weapons to Pakistan since the Taliban takeover of neighboring Afghanistan in 2021.

The BLA has also evolved in recent years, adopting tactics used by militant Islamist groups like suicide bombings. The BLA has also boosted its ranks by recruiting women.

Besides attacking Chinese nationals, the BLA has also rapidly increased its attacks on Pakistani security forces.

"Generous donations, tax and extortion of local projects, and the purchase of modern weapons have helped the BLA carry out more attacks with precision," said Bahot Baloch, a researcher on armed groups in Balochistan.

Experts say China is concerned that rising violence in Balochistan could disrupt its projects in Pakistan.

In a sign of Beijing's worries, China said on November 19 that it will send troops to Pakistan later this month for their first joint counterterrorism military exercise in five years.

Pakistan on November 19 announced plans to launch a new military offensive against militants in Balochistan.

"No doubt that the attacks have increased," said Abdullah Khan, managing director of the Pakistan Institute of Conflict and Security Studies think tank. "However, this will not deter China or make it wind down its projects and leave Pakistan. The billion-dollars investment is too big to pause. China is here to stay."

First Known Attack In Tajikistan

On November 18, one Chinese national was killed and four injured in a cross-border attack in Tajikistan's south, sources told RFE/RL's Tajik Service. The sources said the attackers crossed from Afghanistan. But it was unclear if they were criminals possibly involved in drug trafficking, a crime that is common in the area, or members of a militant group. The Chinese nationals were reportedly working at a gold mine in the Zarbuzi Gorge.

Significantly, the attack marked the first known incident resulting in the death of a Chinese national in Tajikistan, home to major Chinese-funded energy and transport projects.

The deadly attack underscored the persistent security concerns along Tajikistan's southern frontier. Dozens of extremist groups are active inside Afghanistan, including the Islamic State-Khorasan (IS-K), the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan (IMU), and Jamaat Ansarullah, which is comprised mainly of Tajik citizens.

Edward Lemon, a Central Asia expert at Texas A&M University, says China has long been concerned over the security of its operations in Tajikistan and it has invested significantly in bolstering the Tajik military and law enforcement.

"Rather than derailing China's investments in the country, I think this attack will only strengthen China's role in security in the country," he said. "We can expect further military aid, training, and potentially an expanded role for Chinese private security companies operating in the country to protect Chinese investments."

One killed, dozens injured in clashes with Imran Khan's supporters near Pakistan's capital

26 November 2024, Reuters, Asif Shahzad

At least one police officer was killed and dozens of people injured in Pakistan as supporters of jailed former Prime Minister Imran Khan clashed with security forces outside the capital Islamabad on Monday, officials and Khan's party said.

Authorities have enforced a security lockdown for the last two days after Khan called for a march on parliament for a sit-in demonstration to demand his release, while highways into the city have been barricaded.

One police officer was shot and killed, at least 119 others were injured, and 22 police vehicles were torched in clashes just outside Islamabad and elsewhere in the Punjab province, provincial police chief Usman Anwar said. Two officers were in critical condition, he said.

Khan's party said scores of its workers were also hurt.

It said the jailed leader's third wife, Bushra Bibi, and a key aide, Ali Amin Gandapur, who is the chief minister of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province, were leading a march that arrived almost inside Islamabad on Monday night.

The government has used shipping containers to block major roads and streets in Islamabad, with patrols of police and paramilitary personnel in riot gear.

Officials and witnesses said all public transport between cities and terminals had also been shut down in the eastern province to keep away the protesters, Provincial Information Minister Uzma Bukhari said about 80 of Khan's supporters had been arrested.

Defence Minister Khawaja Muhammad Asif told local Geo News TV that the government sought talks with leaders of Khan's Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) party to calm the situation. "It was a sincere attempt I must say but it didn't yield any results," he said.

BULLET FOR BULLET

Interior Minister Mohsin Naqvi said security forces showed "extreme restraint" in confronting the protesters, some of whom he said had fired live rounds, while police only used rubber bullets and fired teargas canisters.

"It is easy to respond a bullet with a bullet," he said.

He said the government had offered Khan's party permission to hold a sit-in protest at an open field on Islamabad's outskirts, adding the party's leaders took this offer to Khan at his prison cell, but, "we haven't yet heard back on it."

Naqvi added the protesters would not be allowed to reach outside parliament, warning the government will be forced to use "extreme" steps if they did not budge, which could include imposing curfew or calling in army troops.

"We will not let them cross our red lines," he said

But Khan's party accused the government of using excessive violence to block the protesters and said hundreds of workers and leaders had been arrested.

"They are even firing live bullets," one of Khan's aides, Shaukat Yousafzai, told Geo News.

Reuters TV and local TV footage showed police firing teargas canisters at Khan's supporters, who were pelting them with stones and bricks.

The videos showed vehicles and trees ablaze along the main march just outside Islamabad as the protesters at some places pushed shipment containers to make their way.

The capital has bolstered security for Monday's arrival of the president of Belarus, Aleksandr Lukashenko for a three day visit, a Pakistan prime minister office statement said.

Gatherings in Islamabad have been banned, while all schools in the capital and the adjacent city of Rawalpindi were to remain closed on Monday and Tuesday, the authorities said,

The protest march, which Khan has described as the "final call", is one of many his party had held to seek his release since he was jailed in August last year. The party's most recent protest in Islamabad, early in October, turned violent.

Voted out of power by parliament in 2022 after he fell out with Pakistan's powerful military, Khan faces charges ranging from corruption to instigation of violence, all of which he and his party deny.

Pakistan tests secret China-like 'firewall' to tighten online surveillance

26 November 2024, Aljazeera, Abid Hussain

The new monitoring system could give the government unprecedented insights into citizens' online use. It could also slow down the internet.

Pakistan's government has deployed Chinese technology to build what some senior officials familiar with the project are calling a new, national internet "firewall" that will allow authorities to monitor online traffic and regulate the use of popular apps with greater control than before.

The project aims to upgrade the government's web monitoring capabilities at the country's main internet gateways, as well as at the data centres of mobile service and major internet service providers.

Senior executives from two internet service providers (ISPs) and an official from the country's security establishment told Al Jazeera that trials of this new firewall, installed as part of Pakistan's internet infrastructure, were responsible for a spate of complaints of poor internet connectivity in the country in recent months.

Officially, though, government officials, while acknowledging that they are tightening the country's online monitoring structure, have denied that this is to blame for slowdowns in internet speed.

The trial of the new firewall comes at a time of heightened political tensions in Pakistan. The country's authorities have suspended mobile internet and blocked several VPNs amid a massive protest launched by supporters of former Prime Minister Imran Khan, who is under arrest since August 2023 over a spate of charges. The protesters, who have arrived in Islamabad despite court orders against their agitation, are demanding Khan's release. At least six security personnel have died in clashes with the protesters so far.

The new monitoring system – the trials started well before the latest protest march – cost between 20 to 30 billion rupees ($72m to $107m), according to officials aware of the project.

Since mid-July, internet users in Pakistan have reported frequent slowdowns, degraded service quality and occasional disruptions to multimedia features on WhatsApp, the widely used messaging app.

"The issues internet users faced in July were due to the firewall testing, which also affected WhatsApp's multimedia functions, such as sending photos, videos, voice notes and making audio/video calls," said a senior official from one of the country's leading ISPs. A firewall is a combination of hardware and software used by governments or organisations to control and monitor internet traffic, acting as a digital gatekeeper that decides what data to allow or block.

According to the ISP official, Pakistan's previous technology lacked the ability to manage applications or websites at a "granular level" – a capability that the recently acquired Chinese technology provides.

"The new firewall also allows specific features within an app or website to be blocked or throttled," he explained, citing the example of WhatsApp in several Middle Eastern nations, where users cannot make audio or video calls on the platform but can use other multimedia features.

A Ministry of Defence official, familiar with the new deployments, also confirmed that Pakistan had acquired a new "firewall system" from China, which was first tested in mid-July.

"Typically, such systems are tested in a sandbox environment to avoid widespread service disruptions," the official told Al Jazeera, requesting anonymity as he was not authorised to speak to the media.

However, Pakistan's internet infrastructure – such as fibre optics, network-related equipment, switches and routers – has been built using technology from a range of countries including France, Finland, the United States and China.

"Due to the diverse equipment in Pakistan's internet infrastructure, testing on a live system was necessary, leading to some initial connectivity and service issues," the official explained.

The official added that the new system has the ability to block VPNs and significantly enhance real-time monitoring through a range of content filtering methods.

A VPN is a tool that creates a secure connection between a device and a network by encrypting internet traffic and masking the user's online identity. Pakistani authorities have long struggled with attempts to block specific articles, videos or other content online without needing to pull the plug on an entire website.

In a particularly notorious incident in 2008, Pakistan wanted to block a YouTube link that the government argued contained a blasphemous documentary. Instead, Pakistan ended up crashing YouTube globally.

The new system, the Defence Ministry official said, would be the first to help Pakistan get around that frustrating challenge. "Instead of blocking an entire platform like YouTube or a website, we can now restrict access to a single video or article," the official said.

Shifting explanations for internet slowdown

In July and August, when instances of internet slowdown were at their peak, the government offered a range of explanations: Excessive VPN use, faulty submarine cables, global internet collapse after an outage at the US cybersecurity firm CrowdStrike, a cyberattack and routine failures.

On August 15, following a parliamentary committee meeting, Shaza Fatima Khawaja, Pakistan's minister for information technology, said she was "not aware" of any firewall testing but added that Pakistan was upgrading its existing "Web Management System" (WMS) due to cybersecurity threats.

"Every government in the world takes measures to implement cybersecurity measures. We previously had a WMS, and now there is an upgrade of the same," Khawaja told reporters.

Three days later, during a news conference, Khawaja robustly denied any allegations of government tampering with the internet, saying there was no order to "throttle" the web. She blamed excessive VPN use.

"A large number of people in the country now use VPN, which leads to pressure on the internet resulting in a slowdown," she told the media.

On August 21, Hafeez-ur-Rehman, a retired major general and the head of the Pakistan Telecommunication Authority (PTA), the country's telecom regulatory body, told a group of parliamentarians that faults in one of the seven submarine cables connecting Pakistan to the global internet were responsible for the slow speeds.

Rehman firmly denied that the installation of a new monitoring system was behind the disruptions.

"Every country has some mechanism to monitor internet content or services. Whether you call it a firewall, a web monitoring system, or content filtering, it exists everywhere. We are also upgrading our system, but it is not the reason for the slow internet," Rehman told parliamentarians during the meeting.

In a written response to Al Jazeera, the regulator reiterated that a WMS had been operational in the country for several years to "monitor and mitigate" illegal telecom activities, commonly known as grey traffic, but was not responsible for the degraded internet quality. "WMS is continuously upgraded to cater for the increasing usage of the internet. It has never caused a slowness in internet services," the PTA said.

Khawaja also submitted a response to the National Assembly on August 26 [PDF], in which she confirmed that the PTA was using a WMS for "internet content management", through which applications or websites were blocked in Pakistan.

Despite several attempts to contact Khawaja, the minister did not respond to Al Jazeera's questions regarding the capabilities, objectives, origins, procurement details, or costs of the new firewall – or any details about the WMS.

However, in a written response submitted to Pakistan's Senate, Khawaja said that the PTA, as the regulatory body, was not involved with the firewall project.

The "PTA is not involved in the funding, procurement, deployment, or operations of any firewall project at the national level," Khawaja said [PDF] on September 12, responding to questions from senators.

Confusingly, Khawaja has over the months used the terms "management" and "monitoring" alternatively on various occasions, while referring to the monitoring system which, according to the military official and the ISP executives Al Jazeera spoke with, has surveillance capabilities.

A 'national firewall' for 'national security'

Pakistan, a country of 241 million people, has nearly 140 million broadband users and 190 million mobile subscribers. However, it relies on just two major internet gateway points, both located in Karachi, the country's largest city and economic hub.

These gateways, operated by the state-owned Pakistan Telecommunication Company Limited (PTCL) and private-sector firm Transworld Associates (TWA), are connected by seven submarine cables that provide internet connectivity.

According to a statement from the PTA in January, upgrades to Pakistan's web monitoring system at these gateways began in December 2023.

This announcement came after then-Prime Minister Anwaar-ul-Haq Kakar revealed the imminent introduction of what he described as a "national firewall" to regulate the country's social media.

"We are working on technology-based solutions to address our challenges and threats," Kakar said in a late January interview, just before the February 8 general elections.

On the morning of February 8, the Ministry of Interior announced the closure of mobile internet services across the country to "maintain the law and order situation and to deal with potential threats".

But the first signs of a broader internet crackdown appeared on February 17, when users found themselves unable to access the social media platform X.

Simon Migliano, head of research at Top10VPN.com, an independent VPN review website, noted that after the X ban, VPN use in Pakistan more than doubled compared with the previous four weeks.

The newly elected government, led by Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif, initially remained silent on the issue but later disclosed that X had been blocked under orders from the Interior Ministry for non-compliance with government directives to take down content.

"The decision to ban X was made to uphold national security, maintain public order, and preserve the nation's integrity," the ministry stated in its report to the Islamabad High Court in April.

While statements from various government officials continued to hint at the introduction of a new "firewall", it wasn't until mid-July that widespread internet service disruptions began. Users across the country reported sluggish speeds, degraded service quality and frequent connectivity issues.

Most notably, WhatsApp's multimedia services were disrupted, though text messaging on the platform continued without issues.

Arturo Filasto, co-founder of the Open Observatory of Network Interference (OONI), confirmed that WhatsApp multimedia features had been "throttled" on July 17.

OONI data from August revealed similar interference, showing that internet traffic was "monitored" and that user attempts to connect with Signal, another encrypted communications app, were also impeded.

Jazz, the country's largest mobile service provider, acknowledged receiving complaints about degraded internet services.

"We have received reports of disruptions affecting some users on certain social media platforms. Our team is actively investigating the issue and remains committed to ensuring uninterrupted service," a Jazz spokesperson said in a statement emailed to Al Jazeera in early September.

Al Jazeera also reached out to more than two dozen officials across several ISPs, telecommunications companies and government departments. Only a few responded, and those who did spoke on condition of anonymity, while most declined to comment.

Like a security checkpoint, slowdowns are inevitable. For nearly two decades, Pakistan has deployed monitoring hardware and software solutions, primarily to combat grey traffic and counter "offensive material" online.

The country has a longstanding ban on pornographic and blasphemous content. It also regularly issues content takedown requests to social media platforms under national laws.

In the 2010s, the government began seeking more sophisticated surveillance technologies, capable of intercepting mobile phone calls and monitoring internet activity.

In December 2018, Pakistan signed a five-year contract worth $18m with Canadian firm Sandvine for a WMS.

The Sandvine WMS, like other similar surveillance systems, could perform various content filtering measures such as Uniform Resource Locator (URL) filtering, Internet Protocol (IP) filtering, Domain Name System (DNS) filtering and keyword filtering – all designed to manage the internet traffic passing through the WMS, which was installed on the country's internet gateway points.

However, the most powerful tool in its repertoire was Deep Packet Inspection (DPI) – a method that intercepts and analyses data transmitted over a network and is capable of decrypting and monitoring traffic between users and servers.

DPI works like an airport scanner, allowing authorities to look inside the data packets travelling across the internet and check their contents for sensitive information.

Monitoring systems like Sandvine "heavily rely on DPI", explained Haroon Ali, a cybersecurity expert and director at the Australian Cyber Corporation, a Sydney-based private organisation specialising in cybersecurity for businesses and government clients.

"DPI examines data packets at a granular level, identifying the type of traffic and allowing for blocking or deeper inspection based on the rules set within the WMS," Ali told Al Jazeera.

According to two employees at a major ISP, the Sandvine contract ended in November 2023: The system had struggled to handle Pakistan's growing internet traffic and increasing monitoring demands.

"The system became overloaded due to the constant addition of new rules. Each rule consumes bandwidth and capacity," one ISP employee told Al Jazeera.

Meanwhile, the Defence Ministry official said that the new firewall system being implemented will offer more advanced surveillance capabilities.

"The goal is to monitor everything without shutting down or restricting the entire system. A powerful DPI-enabled system can gather metadata from users, even if their primary data traffic remains encrypted,” the official said.

Metadata, or “data about data”, includes crucial information such as a user’s network, device, timestamps and location, and plays a key role in identifying individuals.

WhatsApp, for example, collects various types of metadata, including timestamps, IP addresses, device information, timing of use, and sender and recipient details.

While metadata does not contain actual message content, and no WMS system can read the messages themselves, Ali, the cybersecurity expert, explained that metadata still holds enough information to compromise user anonymity.

“A WMS can be a powerful surveillance tool, using DPI to analyse metadata and potentially breach user privacy,” he said.

But the manner in which Pakistan plans to deploy the new system could inevitably slow internet speeds, warn some experts – not as a bug but as a feature.

Major websites and services like Google, Netflix and Meta store copies of frequently requested online content locally, reducing the need to fetch data from distant servers. That, however, means that a WMS that monitors only internet gateways to the country does not capture use details of locally stored data.

To get around that, a senior ISP executive said the new web monitoring system was being deployed not only at the country’s internet gateway but also at local data centres of mobile service providers and ISPs.

“Unlike the Sandvine system, the new DPI-based system is now capable of monitoring local internet traffic,” the executive added.

But to monitor local traffic, the new firewall will use what is known as an “in-line network”, which acts like a security checkpoint, where each data packet must be inspected and either allowed to pass or be blocked – as opposed to an alternative mechanism that simply observed and records traffic without interfering with its flow.

The use of an in-line network “will inevitably slow down internet speeds”, the ISP official said.

It could lead to “slower internet and delays, affecting real-time applications like video conferencing and degrading the overall user experience”, said Usman Ilyas, an assistant professor at the University of Birmingham.

So, why would any government employ an in-line network? The answer is simple, said Ilyas: This mechanism is necessary for surveillance and censorship.

Could VPNs be responsible for slow speeds?

Both the PTA and the IT Ministry have repeatedly denied that internet slowdown concerns are linked to the new firewall deployment or testing.

On September 6, the IT Ministry submitted a written response to the National Assembly, detailing three major submarine cable faults in 2024 that affected internet services in the country. The ministry said that all but one fault, which occurred in June, had been resolved.

Research by Bytes for All, an Islamabad-based organisation focused on information and communication technologies, recorded at least 15 major internet and mobile service disruptions in Pakistan this year.

Aftab Siddiqui, a senior manager at the Internet Society, an international advocacy group, also confirmed the cable fault disrupting Pakistan’s internet services in June, but added that this alone did not fully explain the widespread service degradation.

Often, he said, the government does not even explain reasons for slowdowns and disruptions, “showing a notable lack of transparency”.

Bytes for All also challenged Khwaja’s, the IT minister, claims blaming excessive VPN use for internet slowdowns, in a detailed technical report.

Published on August 27, the report contradicted Khawaja’s assertion, showing that using a VPN often improved internet quality.

The report further observed that this improvement in service quality suggested that a VPN allowed users to bypass “throttling or DPI measures”.

According to data by Top10VPN, Pakistan’s VPN use in July and August 2024 was 63 percent higher than in the same period in 2023. Migliano of Top10VPN said that the claim that excessive VPN use was causing internet slowdown was “absolutely absurd”.

Advertisement

“Whether it is a case of ignorance or wilful misinformation is not for me to say,” he told Al Jazeera. While VPNs consume a marginally greater bandwidth than regular connections, “it is simply not possible for a VPN to impact the wider network beyond the device where it is installed”.

Meanwhile, Arturo Filasto, co-founder of OONI, said that the internet degradation data collected by his organisation was “very inconsistent” with the government narrative that a submarine cable cut could alone have caused the internet disruption suffered by the country.

“If that were the case, you would not see failures affecting only specific services but rather, many services indiscriminately,” Filasto explained. “What we see in the data is consistent with the hypothesis of this being the result of the rollout of newly acquired technology.”

Expanding internet control

Over the years, the Pakistani government has expanded its control over the internet, using both technological means and legislation to regulate what users can access and consume.

But the latest attempt at a firewall comes at a time when the government has been accused by critics of particularly targeting former Prime Minister Khan's Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) – the country's most popular political party.

Advertisement

Ironically, Khan's PTI government itself had authorised the purchase of the Sandvine WMS and was accused of censorship during its time in government, between August 2018 and April 2022.

According to Freedom House, a political advocacy group based in Washington, DC, during that time, Pakistan's net freedom score hovered between 27 and 25 out of 100.

Its latest 2024 Freedom on the Net report shows no improvement, with Pakistan scoring 27 out of 100, maintaining its "not free" status.

However, since Khan was removed from power two years ago through a parliamentary vote of no confidence, the party has faced a crackdown. Khan has spent 15 months behind bars facing numerous charges, and his party has faced mass arrests of leaders and workers, as well as online restrictions.

In December last year, PTI held a "virtual rally" as part of its election campaign, drawing more than 5 million views across social media platforms, with imprisoned Khan delivering a four-minute speech which was generated with the help of artificial intelligence.

Internet users reported service outages during livestreaming of the speech, a disruption confirmed by NetBlocks, an internet tracking company. The party's website remains inaccessible in Pakistan at the time of writing.

On November 24, PTI supporters launched a protest march towards Islamabad to seek Khan's release from jail, during which the government once again restricted access to VPNs while shutting down mobile internet services across the country.

WhatsApp multimedia services were also disrupted, leaving disgruntled users unable to download photos and videos, or exchange voice notes without VPNs. The restriction on services was also confirmed by Netblocks in a message on X.

Digital rights activist Farieha Aziz linked the "tremendous secrecy" and "palpable sense of urgency" surrounding the deployment of Pakistan's new firewall system to the country's political climate.

"This rush seems tied to the current political environment, aimed at controlling the flow of information and narrative building," Aziz told Al Jazeera.

Advertisement

The urgency behind these secretive firewall trials also comes at a time when Pakistan's powerful military has described threats from what it calls "digital terrorism".

The military, which has governed the country directly for more than three decades and continues to wield significant political and social influence, introduced the term earlier this year.

Inter-Services Public Relations (ISPR), the military's media wing, claimed that "politically motivated and vested digital terrorism" was being used to spread despondency within the country.

"It is to sow discord among national institutions, especially the armed forces, and the people of Pakistan by peddling blatant lies, fake news, and propaganda," the military said in a press release in May this year.

The military's statement was widely interpreted as an allusion to PTI, a party which is considered technologically the savviest in the country and whose supporters often dominate social media narratives.

Party supporters have been targeted for running "anti-state digital campaigns" while raids on PTI offices, including its headquarters in Islamabad, have resulted in arrests on charges of "digital terrorism" and "false propaganda" via social media.

However, Aziz argued that the concept of "digital terrorism" had no legal standing.

Advertisement

"This term was coined in a political context and holds no legal validity. The narrative being built around it suggests that it's more about controlling political discourse than addressing any genuine cybersecurity threats," she said.

Turning to China

None of this is entirely new, say analysts. During the PTI's tenure in government – the party was widely seen as close to the military at the time – numerous critics were arrested for their views on social media. Websites and pages were blocked, and social media platforms were pressured to remove content deemed to violate the "integrity, security and defence of Pakistan", among other reasons.

Under Khan, both the PTI government and the military began using the phrase "fifth-generation warfare", suggesting that "anti-state propaganda" was being spread against Pakistan on social media, necessitating a robust digital defence. It was a precursor to the concept of "digital terrorism".

But some things have changed.

Advertisement

Previously, Pakistan relied heavily on Western technology for regulating its internet, using hardware and software solutions from companies like Sandvine, FinFisher, and Netsweeper. However, facing pressure from digital rights groups, many of these companies stopped providing services to Pakistan, leaving fewer options available.

As Pakistan's ties with China, its neighbour and closest ally, further strengthened, particularly following the launch of the $62bn China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) infrastructure project, China has also emerged as its new technological partner.

During the last few years, the idea of replicating China's Great Firewall – its sophisticated internet censorship and surveillance system – also began to take hold within Pakistan's security establishment.

Any firewall is only as good as its ability to stop leakages. Like China, where only government-approved VPNs can legally be used to get around online barriers, Pakistan, too, is moving towards banning the use of "illegal" VPNs.

In its written response to Al Jazeera in September, the PTA said it was "in touch with stakeholders to adopt a viable solution to facilitate legitimate VPN usage while fulfilling its obligations under our laws".

Advertisement

However, in early November, several VPN services became inaccessible in Pakistan for a few hours before being restored. PTA, the regulator, did not directly address the sudden outage, or the resumption.

Then, on November 15, the Interior Ministry asked the PTA in a letter to "block illegal VPNs" across the country, saying they were being used to "facilitate violent activities" as well as to access "pornographic and blasphemous content", both of which are banned in the country.

"Of late, an alarming fact has been identified, wherein VPNs are used by terrorists to obscure and conceal their communications," the letter by the ministry, seen by Al Jazeera, said.

Economic risks

While the vendors behind Pakistan's new firewall remain unconfirmed, analysts agree that the country's internet infrastructure is centralised and fairly restrictive.

According to Ilyas, the academic, Pakistan's censorship capabilities were modest before the latest disruptions began.

Advertisement

"But the new system, rumoured to be deployed this year, is a lot less transparent and far more disruptive to productivity and user experience," he said.

Ali, the Sydney-based cybersecurity expert, explained that while many countries deploy web monitoring systems, they do so with legal oversight.

"Countries like the US or UK use similar systems, but they often have legal guardrails – such as court orders and procedural checks – to protect privacy and freedom of speech," he said.

Experts say there is little guarantee that Pakistan will ensure similar safeguards while using its new firewall.

For a country striving to improve its struggling economy with export revenue from its growing IT industry, the implications of a more intrusive firewall are economically significant, too.

Advertisement

Any system that disrupts internet services, hampers business operations or raises privacy concerns could pose a serious threat to both private individuals and the broader business community, digital rights activist Aziz said.

"Pakistani businesses rely on global platforms for services like web hosting, and many have contracts requiring confidentiality. If the new system inspects network traffic, blocks VPNs, or imposes a registration regime, it could create more obstacles," she warned.

Pakistan then risks being perceived as an unstable and unattractive market for investment, she said – precisely at a time when Prime Minister Sharif and his team have been desperately wooing countries like Saudi Arabia, China and the United Arab Emirates for big-ticket projects.

"Lack of transparency, invasive technology and regressive policies are creating an environment where there is no guarantee of service, the rule of law is weak, and even court actions don't necessarily lead to relief," Aziz said.

"This doesn't bode well."

Pakistan's military to launch new offensive against separatist militants

20 November 2024, Reuters, Asif Shahzad

Pakistan plans a new military offensive against separatist insurgents in southwestern Balochistan province, home to key Chinese Belt and Road projects, but it was not immediately clear if the plan would be a joint effort with its giant neighbour.

Following a string of deadly attacks that targeted its citizens in recent months, China has pushed to join security efforts to protect them, and on Tuesday unveiled a plan for joint counter-terrorism exercises in Pakistan.

The exercise, which both the sides called Warrior-VIII between the Pakistan Army and Peoples' Liberation Army of China, was launched at a northwestern Pakistani counter-terrorism facility, a Pakistani army statement said.

"The exercise is aimed at refining professional skills through joint training, besides harnessing (our) historic military-to-military relations," said the statement, largely echoing a Chinese defence ministry announcement the day before.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif chaired a meeting of civil and military leaders who gave the go-ahead for the "comprehensive operation", his office said in a statement.

But it stopped short of saying whether the effort was limited to ground operations, or could involve the air force, and whether it was prompted by China's disquiet at the separatist attacks.

Pakistan's information ministry and the military did not immediately respond to requests for details on the nature of the offensive.

Asked whether China was involved in Pakistan's planned offensive against Balochistan insurgents, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said on Wednesday, "I do not understand the situation you mentioned."

He added: "As a matter of principle, China firmly supports the anti-terrorism efforts of the Pakistani side and is willing to deepen pragmatic cooperation with (it) in various fields to better benefit the two countries and (their) peoples..."

Pakistan's military already has a huge presence in the rugged region bordering Afghanistan and Iran, where insurgent groups have been fighting for a separate homeland for decades to win a larger share of benefits from the resource-rich province.

The military has long run intelligence-based operations against the insurgent groups, the most prominent being the Baloch Liberation Army (BLA), which escalated attacks in recent months on the military and nationals from longtime ally China.

The region is home to Gwadar Port, built by China as part of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a $65 billion investment in President Xi Jinping's Belt and Road infrastructure initiative to expand China's global reach.

In addition to the recent attacks, the BLA claimed a suicide bombing last month outside the international airport in the southern port city of Karachi that killed two Chinese engineers.

China's PLA Sends Troops To Joint Anti-Terrorism Exercise In Pakistan

20 November 2024, Memri TV

The Western Theater Command of the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) has sent troops to Pakistan to participate in a joint anti-terrorism exercise from late November to mid-December, amid reports that Beijing is increasingly concerned about recurring attacks by Baloch militants targeting its nationals working on the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) projects, which exploit resources in Pakistan-controlled Balochistan. This clip is a video report about the exercise, published on November 20, 2024 on YouTube by China's CCTV Video News Agency.

Onscreen text: "The Western Theater Command of the Chinese People's Liberation Army have sent troops to Pakistan to participate in a joint anti-terrorism exercise from late November to mid-December."

Coded 'Warrior-VIII', the exercise will focus on joint counter-terrorism clean-up and strike operations.

"This year's exercise is the eighth joint exercise of the series between the Chinese and Pakistani militaries with the aim to consolidate and deepen practical exchanges and cooperation, as well as enhance the capability for conducting joint counter-terrorism operations."

Zhu Zhenlong, military official: "By taking advantage of the opportunity of joint air delivery, we carried out specialized intensive training of the troops, focusing on improving their joint delivery capabilities including refined measurement, containerized loading and formation under combat conditions."

Onscreen text: "More than 300 Chinese troops are taking part in the exercise."

Deng Yajun, military official: "This joint exercise exemplifies the strong trust and deep friendship between the two countries and their militaries. We will focus on the theme of joint anti-terrorism and continue to deepen exchanges with the Pakistani side in this field. We will work with the Pakistani military to analyze new trends and characteristics of terrorism and develop effective countermeasures."

China, Pakistan to hold first anti-terror drills in 5 years amid rising attacks

19 November 2024, VOA, Ayaz Gul

China said Tuesday it will send troops to Pakistan later this month for the countries first joint counterterrorism military exercise in five years to enhance security cooperation with its South Asian neighbor and close ally.

The announcement follows reports that Beijing is pushing Islamabad to permit its security personnel to safeguard thousands of Chinese nationals working in Pakistan from deadly terrorist attacks. It also comes amid a spike in terrorist attacks against Pakistani security forces attributed to or claimed by the outlawed Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan, commonly known as TTP.

On Tuesday, China's Defense Ministry said that the Pakistan-hosted "Warrior-VIII exercise is set to begin in late November and will run until mid-December "with the aim ... to enhance the capability for conducting joint counterterrorism operations," according to Chinese state media.

The ministry said the exercise will involve troops from the Western Theater Command of China's People's Liberation Army.

"The two sides will engage in multi-level and mixed training across various specialties and organize live troop drills in accordance with the actual combat process," according to the state media report.

China and Pakistan last conducted joint counterterrorism military drills in 2019.

String of attacks

Last month, a suicide car bombing just outside the airport in the southern Pakistani port city of Karachi killed two Chinese engineers. The victims were returning to work after a holiday in Thailand on a project under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, a multibillion-dollar extension of President Xi Jinping's global Belt and Road Initiative.

In March, a suicide car bomb attack in northern Pakistan killed five Chinese workers and their local driver.

The repeated targeting of its nationals reportedly angered China, prompting it to urge Pakistan to negotiate a joint security management system to ensure the safety of Chinese citizens in the country.

The Pakistani government has dismissed the alleged Chinese diplomatic pressure, however, as "media speculation" and an attempt "to create confusion" regarding Islamabad's relationship with Beijing.

"Pakistan and China have a robust dialogue and cooperation on a range of issues, including counterterrorism and security of Chinese nationals in Pakistan," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mumtaz Baloch told reporters last Thursday at her weekly news conference.

"We will continue to work with our Chinese brothers for the safety and security of Chinese nationals, projects, and institutions in Pakistan," she stated.

Shaking ties

Baloch added that attempts to undermine the mutual trust and cooperation between the two countries will not succeed, nor will the two countries "allow any efforts or stories to derail the Pakistan-China strategic partnership."

Speaking at a seminar in Islamabad just days after the Karachi car bomb attack, Chinese Ambassador Jiang Zaidong publicly questioned the host government's safety measures to deter threats to Chinese nationals.

"It is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months," Jiang stated. He urged Islamabad to take "effective remedial measures to prevent the recurrence of such terror acts and ensure that perpetrators are identified, caught, and punished."

Pakistan dismissed the Chinese envoy's remarks as "perplexing" and contrary to established diplomatic traditions between the neighbors.

The Pakistani response was unprecedented, and Jiang's public admonishment of Islamabad highlighted the strains arising from attacks on Chinese nationals that have resulted in the loss of at least 21 lives over the past five years.

'Afghan terror sanctuaries'

The joint drills between Pakistani and Chinese troops come amid a dramatic surge in deadly militant attacks on security forces and civilians in Pakistan, which authorities say are being orchestrated from

"TTP sanctuaries" in neighboring Afghanistan. The country's Islamist Taliban leaders reject the allegations.

Yue Xiaoyong, China's special envoy for Afghan affairs, visited Islamabad this week, where Pakistani officials reportedly shared with him evidence regarding TTP's presence in Afghanistan and the threat it poses to regional stability.

Neither Islamabad nor Beijing has commented on the media reports. A brief post-meeting Pakistani statement said the discussion centered on the Afghan situation, with both sides reaffirming "the vital role of neighboring countries for a peaceful and stable Afghanistan."

Protection of Chinese nationals a recurring headache for Pakistan

17 November 2024, Deccan Herald, Rana Banerji

China has grown increasingly frustrated by the spate of attacks on its nationals working on various infrastructure and power generation projects in Pakistan under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) initiative.

Pakistan has traditionally described its relationship with China in almost reverential terms, often calling it "deeper than the seas and higher than the mountains." However, this sentiment was recently challenged when Chinese Ambassador Jiang Zaidong labelled two attacks on Chinese nationals working in Pakistan, in March and October 2024, as "unacceptable," delivering a clear message to both Pakistan's civilian and military leadership.

Zaidong was speaking at the "China at 75: A Journey of Progress, Transformation & Global Leadership" seminar hosted by the Pakistan-China Institute on October 30. The think tank is headed by ex-Senator Mushahid Hussain, an erstwhile establishment favourite and prominent India baiter who has recently aligned his fortunes with ousted former Prime Minister Imran Khan. The Chinese diplomat's remarks were caustic enough to invite a sharp response from Mumtaz Zahra Baloch, the spokesperson for Pakistan's Foreign Office, a day later on October 31. She termed Zaidong's statement "surprising and not reflective of diplomatic traditions."

The bombing on October 6, 2024, involved a pick-up truck rigged with nearly 100 kg of explosives. The vehicle waited unchecked for about 40 minutes near the outermost security cordon of the heavily guarded Karachi airport before the driver rammed it into a car carrying two Chinese engineers returning to work on a project after a holiday in Thailand. Both engineers were killed, and several others injured. The separatist militant group Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) later claimed responsibility for the attack.

China has grown increasingly frustrated by the spate of attacks on its nationals working on various infrastructure and power generation projects in Pakistan under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) initiative. Officially launched by President Xi Jinping during his visit to Pakistan in April 2015 as part of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), the CPEC has brought an estimated 12,000 Chinese experts, engineers, and technicians to Pakistan. Their work spans projects like the development of Gwadar Port as a dual-use economic and naval hub, the construction of the Gomal Zam Dam in South Waziristan, the Neelum and Kohala hydroelectric projects in Pakistan-occupied Kashmir (PoK), and the Diamer Bhasha Dam in Gilgit-Baltistan (GB).

Chinese technical experts have also been instrumental in keeping the strategically vital Karakoram Highway open by clearing landslides and building tunnels near Hunza Lake. However, Baloch separatists and Tehrik-e-Taliban Pakistan (TTP) militants have intermittently attacked Chinese workers, even kidnapping some. This has necessitated the deployment of two separate divisions of the Pakistan Army to provide security.

Previously known as the 'Karakoram Security Force,' one of these units has been rebranded as the 34 Infantry Division and is now tasked with securing the Punjab and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa segments of the CPEC. Headquartered in Chilas (Gilgit-Baltistan), it operates under the supervision of X Corps in Rawalpindi. A second unit, the 44 Infantry Division, is stationed in Gwadar under XII Corps in Quetta, focusing on securing the Baluchistan and Sindh segments of CPEC. Prime Minister Shahbaz Sharif has reportedly assured Chinese officials of better security measures during recent discussions at the Climate Summit in Baku (12-13 November). However, Islamabad's failure to deter these attacks appears to have angered Beijing, which is reportedly pressuring Pakistan to formalise a joint security management system. This arrangement could involve the long-term deployment of Chinese military personnel in Pakistan. When questioned by Reuters, Lin Jian, the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson, denied familiarity with such discussions, stating only that China would continue strengthening cooperation with Pakistan to maintain the security of its personnel, projects, and institutions. However, Pakistani security sources with direct knowledge of the negotiations have reportedly acknowledged receiving a written proposal from Beijing, which includes a clause permitting the deployment of military forces in each other's territory for counter-terrorism missions and joint strikes.

Last week, Pakistan's Interior Ministry announced that both sides had agreed to develop a joint strategy to prevent similar incidents. However, the Inter-Services Public Relations (ISPR), the information wing of the Pakistan Army, has refrained from commenting on the specifics of potential joint operations. A security official suggested that Pakistan prefers Chinese assistance in improving intelligence and surveillance capabilities rather than direct military involvement, indicating possible reluctance to allow a permanent Chinese military presence.

Responding to media queries during her weekly press briefing in Islamabad on 14 November, Mumtaz Zahra Baloch urged journalists "not to respond" to "media speculations based on unreliable sources" that she claimed were "motivated by an agenda to create confusion about the nature of this relationship." She echoed Lin Jian's assertion that both countries possessed "the resolve and capability to foil any attempt to harm China-Pakistan relations." Chinese military personnel have previously deployed temporarily in PoK and GB. However, a prolonged Chinese military presence in these regions could have adverse diplomatic and military repercussions for India, though it is unlikely to disrupt the ongoing détente along India's northern and northeastern borders.

Pakistan attracts Chinese investors with exclusive incentives in solar and EV sectors

17 November 2024, The Nation

Pakistan is set to attract Chinese investors with exclusive incentives in the booming solar and electric vehicle (EV) sectors, said Pakistan's Trade and Investment Counselor to China Ghulam Qadir.

Addressing the 4th Beijing International Engineering Procurement Conference & Exposition for Engineering Construction Supply Chain (EPC Expo), focused on sustainable trade between China and Pakistan, Ghulam Qadir emphasized that the Pakistani government has introduced special incentives designed to strengthen bilateral cooperation in green technology.

"These sectors are pivotal for Pakistan's sustainable future and present lucrative opportunities for Chinese businesses," Qadir noted according to a report carried by China Economic Net (CEN) on Friday.

He highlighted the potential for collaboration on high-impact projects, including streamlined licensing processes, tax breaks, and favorable import policies aimed at reducing setup costs and accelerating the transfer of EV and solar technology to Pakistan.

"Pakistan offers a consistent 10-year policy framework of tax exemption for import of plant, machinery, and equipment for new and BMRE for manufacturing of solar panels, parts & allied equipment's with equal treatment in sales tax for local manufacturers and importers and ten-year tax holidays. Bank financing loans at low interest rates for setting up local manufacturing and international-standard in-country testing facilities/labs", he added. "Pakistan sees China as a vital partner in transforming its energy and transportation landscape," Qadir stated.

"Our combined efforts in solar power and electric vehicle development can not only meet shared climate goals but also fuel substantial economic growth in both countries."

He said that Pakistan aims for 30% of its local vehicle production to be electric by 2030 whereas comprehensive EV Policy 2020-2025 wherein incentives for local electric vehicle manufacturing are granted to the manufacturers and reduce reliance on imported fuel.

He highlighted potential projects and collaborations, including co-manufacturing initiatives, technology transfer agreements, and joint ventures designed to streamline production and reduce costs.

Qadir mentioned that as countries globally look toward greener solutions, Pakistan aims to leverage Chinese expertise and investment in EV and solar technologies to accelerate its energy transition.

It is to be noted that the 4th Beijing International Engineering Procurement Conference & Exposition for Engineering Construction Supply Chain was scheduled to be held at Beijing Beiren International Exhibition & Convention Center from November 14-16, 2024.

'Don't trust Pak soldiers': Xi faces flak for Chinese deaths in Pakistan

14 November 2024, Business Standard, Bhaswar Kumar

Many Chinese companies in Pakistan have reportedly turned to Chinese security engineers to gather intelligence amid inadequate local security arrangements

Chinese President Xi Jinping is under mounting pressure to better secure his country's interests in volatile regions like Pakistan following a bomb attack by Pakistani separatists last month that killed two Chinese engineers, the Financial Times has reported.

Reflecting the challenges faced by Chinese workers in Pakistan, one businessman in the country's Punjab province told the Financial Times, "We don't trust that more Pakistani soldiers will keep us safe...". Instead, he said, "... We would prefer it was Chinese."

Stating that there's "not as much opportunity" in Pakistan and "the security is bad", the Chinese businessman reportedly added, "Many Chinese want to leave."

Many Chinese companies, facing security gaps in Pakistan, have reportedly turned to Chinese security engineers to develop plans, handle incidents, conduct background checks for local personnel, gather intelligence, and manage armed local guards, underscoring the inadequacy of local security arrangements.

These concerns have come to the fore amid the rising threat to Chinese investments in Pakistan, particularly the $62 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), which is a critical part of Xi's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Recent attacks by the Balochistan Liberation Army (BLA) have highlighted the risks, reportedly sparking debate over Beijing's inability to address these persistent security issues.

Challenges with Local Security Measures

Despite significant allocations by Pakistan to safeguard Chinese investments, including over 15,000 personnel deployed across two special security divisions and additional provincial police units, the measures have failed to meet China's expectations, said the report.

Noting that part of this protection is actually funded by China's defence ministry, the report said that incidents like the recent shooting of two Chinese workers in Karachi by a Pakistani security guard have underscored the limitations of local forces in ensuring safety.

Beijing's dissatisfaction with these arrangements has prompted internal directives for Chinese personnel to oversee security matters. Speaking to the Financial Times, Zhou Chao, a former security manager for the Lahore Metro Orange Line project, explained that Chinese companies often station Chinese officers at project sites while hiring hundreds of local guards to compensate for Pakistan's ban on armed foreign contractors.

According to Zhou, China's central government has issued an internal directive to "let Chinese take care of the security of Chinese". But, these efforts have been hindered by strict regulations that limit the capacity of Chinese private security firms to operate effectively abroad.

Chinese Security Companies Face Constraints

Chinese private security firms have been following their country's state-owned enterprises abroad to safeguard infrastructure and resource projects. While some expected these firms to evolve into global players akin to Blackwater or Wagner Group, the report said that they remain constrained by Beijing's tight grip on military and policing functions.

Pakistan, for its part, also does not allow foreign armed security contractors in the country, further compounding these challenges. As a solution, Zhou told the Financial Times, Chinese companies station Chinese security officers at the project company, "two at a time, and hire 400 to 500 local guards".

According to the report, many executives also rely on what it described as "Chinese security engineers" to design security frameworks, handle incidents, and ensure intelligence-gathering to address risks on the ground.

Diplomatic Push Amid Rising Casualties

A suicide attack near Karachi's airport in October left two Chinese citizens dead and 10 others injured. The BLA has claimed responsibility for the attack.

The October bombing is the latest in a string of attacks that have pushed Chinese officials to adopt a firmer stance on security. During Chinese Premier Li Qiang's visit to Pakistan on October 15, in a joint statement, China "stressed the urgent need to adopt targeted security measures in Pakistan to jointly create a safe environment for co-operation between the two countries".

Days later, Chinese ambassador Jiang Zaidong described the attacks as "unacceptable" and warned that security concerns were becoming a "constraint to CPEC".

In the wake of the October blast, and the string of previous attacks, a Chinese executive reportedly said that Beijing has been in discussions with Islamabad about allowing Chinese security companies to operate in Pakistan. However, the executive added that Beijing has been "explicitly rebuffed" by Pakistan "several times".

Amid these developments, Chinese investments in Pakistan have declined sharply, according to the report. Citing the Frontier Services Group, it said that delays and cancellations of projects have increased due to instability, with many Chinese workers returning home. The group's 2023 annual report reportedly noted that employees of Chinese companies in Pakistan had been encouraged to leave due to safety concerns.

Noting that the challenges in Pakistan have amplified dissatisfaction among Chinese investors and workers, the news report quoted an executive at a large Chinese security firm as saying, "The government is failing to comprehensively solve this security problem."

China pushing to deploy its own security staff to protect citizens in Pak: Report

13 November 2024, Times of India

Beijing is pushing Pakistan to allow its own security staff to provide protection to thousands of Chinese citizens working in the South Asian nation, during talks after a car bombing in Karachi that was seen as a major security breach, sources said.

Last month's airport bombing in the southern port city that killed two Chinese engineers returning to work on a project after a holiday in Thailand was the latest in a string of attacks on Beijing's interests in Pakistan. The attacks, and Islamabad's failure to deter them, have angered China, which has pushed Pakistan to begin formal negotiations for a joint security management system.

Reuters spoke to five Pakistani security and govt sources with direct knowledge of the previously unreported negotiations, and reviewed a written proposal sent by Beijing to Islamabad. "They (Chinese) want to bring in their own security," said one official, who sat in on a recent meeting, adding that Pakistan had not so far agreed to such a step.

A written proposal sent to Islamabad by Beijing, and forwarded to Pakistani security agencies for review, mentioned a clause allowing the dispatching of security agencies and military forces into each others' territory to assist in counter-terrorism missions and conduct joint strikes. The dispatching would be done after discussions, but Pakistani agencies were averse to the proposal, one official said.

Neither Beijing nor Islamabad confirmed the talks officially. The source, and two other officials, said there was a consensus on setting up a joint security management system, and that Pakistan was amenable to Chinese officials sitting in on security meetings and co-ordination. But there was no agreement on their participating in security arrangements on the ground. The first official said Pakistan had asked China for help in improving its intelligence and surveillance capabilities instead of direct involvement.

The nature of the Karachi bombing has angered Beijing: A pick-up truck rigged with nearly 100 kg of explosives waited unchecked for 40 minutes near the outermost security cordon of the heavily guarded airport before its driver rammed it into the vehicle carrying Chinese engineers, officials said. "It was a grave security breach," admitted one of the officials investigating the blast. Investigators believe the attackers had "inside help" in securing details of the itinerary and route.

China to continue support for Pakistan's counter-terrorism efforts

11 November 2024, Reuters

China will continue to support Pakistan in counter-terrorism operations, a foreign ministry spokesperson said on Monday, after two Chinese nationals were wounded in a shooting in the country's commercial hub Karachi last week.

China and Pakistan have the determination and ability to thwart all attempts to undermine China-Pakistan relations and make terrorists pay the price, spokesperson Lin Jian told a regular news conference in Beijing.

At least 26 people killed by bomb blast at southwestern Pakistan rail station

09 November 2024, PBS

A suicide bomber blew himself up at a train station in restive southwestern Pakistan on Saturday, killing at least 26 people, including soldiers and railway staff, and wounding about 62 others, some critically, officials said.

The attack happened when nearly 100 passengers were waiting for a train to travel to the garrison city of Rawalpindi from Quetta, the capital of Balochistan province, according to Hamza Shafqaat, a senior government administrator.

When asked about a security breach that led to the bombing, Shafqaat told reporters that "it is usually very difficult to stop such suicide attacks."

However, Shahid Nawaz, who is in charge of security at Quetta's train station, insisted there was no breach as the attacker was disguised as a passenger and blew himself up among people at the station.

TV footage showed the steel structure of the platform's roof blown apart and a destroyed tea stall. Luggage was strewn everywhere. Most of the victims were taken to a state-owned hospital and some to a military one.

Wasim Baig, a spokesman for the health department and police said over a dozen soldiers and six railway employees were among the dead at the station, where a walk-through gate has been installed to check whether anyone is carrying explosives. Still, there are multiple other entrances to the station without such security.

A separatist group, the Balochistan Liberation Army, claimed the attack in a statement, saying a suicide bomber targeted troops present at the railway station. The outlawed BLA has long waged an insurgency seeking independence from Islamabad.

A senior superintendent of police operations, Muhammad Baloch, said separatists frequently attacked soft targets.

"When their people are arrested, they also attack in retaliation. We all have to fight this war. We are resilient. Our teams are here and trying to save as many lives as we can."

Police said some of the critically wounded passengers had died in the hospital, raising the death toll.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif denounced the bombing in a statement, saying those who orchestrated the attack "will pay a very heavy price for it," adding that security forces were determined to eliminate "the menace of terrorism."

Afghanistan's Foreign Ministry also condemned the bombing and expressed its condolences to the families of the victims, as did the Russian Embassy in Islamabad.

Saturday's assault came a little over a week after a powerful bomb attached to a motorcycle exploded near a vehicle carrying police officers assigned to protect polio workers in the province, killing nine people, including five children who were nearby.

In August, the BLA carried out multiple coordinated attacks on passengers buses, police and security forces across Balochistan, killing more than 50 people, mostly civilians.

Oil- and mineral-rich Balochistan is Pakistan's largest but also least populated province. It is a hub for the country's ethnic Baloch minority whose members say they face discrimination and exploitation by the central government. Along with separatist groups, Islamic militants also operate in the province.

The BLA mostly targets security forces and foreigners, especially Chinese nationals who are in Pakistan as part of Beijing's multibillion-dollar Belt and Road Initiative, which is working on major infrastructure projects. The group often demands the halt of all Chinese-funded projects and for workers to leave Pakistan to avoid further attacks.

Last month, the BLA claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing that targeted a convoy with Chinese nationals outside Karachi airport, killing two. Beijing has asked Pakistan to ensure the safety of its citizens working in Balochistan and other parts of the country.

PM visits Chinese embassy to condemn firing on Chinese nationals in Karachi

06 November 2024, Pakistan Today

Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif on Wednesday visited the Chinese Embassy to condemn the firing incident, in Karachi yesterday, in which Chinese nationals were injured and assured exemplary punishment to those involved in the incident.

Talking to Chinese Ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong, the prime minister said that he came to condemn the yesterday's attack on Chinese nationals and to inquire after the health of those injured in the incident.

The prime minister assured the Chinese ambassador that those responsible in the incident would be apprehended soon and would be awarded exemplary punishment.

He further informed the Chinese ambassador that he was personally supervising the process of arresting those involved in the incident and bringing them to justice.

Moreover, he had directed to provide the best medical facilities to the Chinese citizens injured in the incident, he said, adding that it was a matter of satisfaction that the health of the injured Chinese nationals was improving.

Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Mohammad Ishaq Dar, Minister for Interior Mohsin Raza Naqvi and Special Assistant to PM Tariq Fatemi accompanied the prime minister.

Prime Minister Sharif said that China was a long-standing friend of Pakistan and the attack on the Chinese nationals was a desperate attempt to damage Pakistan-China fraternal relations.

He reiterated that the security of Chinese nationals, working in Pakistan, was the top priority of the government.

The Chinese ambassador thanked the prime minister for his visit and hoped that he would play his role in bringing those responsible for the incident to justice soon.

Pakistan watches China-India border thaw with mixed feelings over Kashmir

03 November 2024, SCMP, Tom Hussain

Pakistan is watching with a mix of relief and concern as its close ally China and arch-rival India seek to de-escalate a four-year stand-off along their disputed Himalayan border.

While Islamabad has remained officially silent on the recent military repositioning, analysts say the easing of tensions at the point in Kashmir where their three frontiers meet is welcomed news.

"Any development that contributes to the stability and security of the region will be welcome in Pakistan," said Maleeha Lodhi, a former Pakistani ambassador to Britain, the United States, and the United Nations.

De-escalation of Sino-Indian tensions is "good news for South Asia at a time when the situation is so fraught elsewhere in the world", she said.

India's Ministry of External Affairs announced an agreement with China on October 21 for "disengagement and resolution of issues" in border areas, following violent clashes that resulted in the deaths of 24 soldiers in June 2020.

The Chinese foreign ministry subsequently confirmed that both sides had "reached a solution" after "close communication" through diplomatic and military channels.

However, analysts say Pakistan remains frustrated by India's refusal to engage over their own border dispute in Kashmir.

Despite a ceasefire agreement in February 2021 aimed at reducing skirmishes along the contested border, diplomatic relations between the South Asian neighbours have remained largely frozen since 2019. In a rare visit, Indian Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar attended a Shanghai Cooperation Organisation conference in Islamabad last month, marking the first ministerial visit since 2015.

He did not engage in formal bilateral dialogue, but during an informal discussion, Pakistan's Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar reportedly urged Jaishankar to allow India's cricket team to play in a major tournament Pakistan is hosting early next year.

India's Ministry of External Affairs later denied that such a request had been made, stating that "nothing of the sort" happened.

Islamabad understands that "shared concerns about India are one of the driving forces" of the China-Pakistan partnership, said Michael Kugelman, director of the South Asia Institute at the Wilson Centre, a Washington think tank.

He cautioned that any signs of a rapprochement between India and China could be "problematic" for Islamabad.

Yet with its own domestic crises, Pakistan has "enough to worry about at home" and may find some solace in the reduced likelihood of a renewed border clash between its two powerful neighbours, "at least for now", Kugelman said.

Farwa Aamer, director of South Asia Initiatives at the New York-based Asia Society Policy Institute, said Pakistan would closely monitor developments between China and India, while prioritising its own internal security issues that "must be addressed urgently".

This year, two suicide attacks by militants on Chinese nationals and Belt and Road Initiative projects have resulted in the deaths of seven Chinese citizens, prompting Beijing last month to advise its citizens against travel to Pakistan's western provinces of Balochistan and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa.

In a public reprimand, China's ambassador to Pakistan, Jiang Zaidong, expressed frustration over the attacks, saying "it is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months".

He urged Pakistan to take action against "all anti-China terrorist groups", emphasising that "security is the biggest concern" for Beijing and crucial for the success of the US$65 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor.

"Without a safe and sound environment, nothing can be achieved," the Chinese envoy warned.

Despite these challenges, analysts are confident China will maintain a close relationship with Pakistan given their economic and strategic alignment.

Pakistan Foreign Office spokeswoman Mumtaz Baloch responded to the Chinese ambassador's comments on Thursday, describing his remarks as "perplexing" and reaffirming Pakistan's commitment to the safety of its "Chinese brothers" within the South Asian nation.

Analysts say Pakistan lacks the political and economic clout necessary to compel India to engage in meaningful dialogue.

India sees "more advantages with knock-on effects from rapprochement with China than it does with Pakistan", Kugelman said.

While better relations with Beijing could enhance investment opportunities, India sees little advantage in expanding commercial ties with Islamabad and "isn't looking for these outcomes", he added.

Yogesh Gupta, a former Indian ambassador, said the "main problem" in the bilateral relationship was that Pakistan "resorts to terrorism to achieve its political objectives and the issue of Kashmir".

India has "paid a huge price to control terrorism" in Jammu and Kashmir and elsewhere, Gupta said, and "can't condone this problem".

"If Pakistan moves ahead on these issues, then a dialogue with India can take place," he added.

However, Pakistan has refused to accept any unilateral change to the status of Kashmir, over which it has fought two major wars with India. In 2020, New Delhi revoked the special status of the parts of Kashmir that it administers, ending the region's own laws and autonomy and sparking widespread protests.

Lodhi, the former Pakistani ambassador, said that the government of Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi had shown "no interest" in resuming talks with Islamabad, "apparently concluding that the absence of dialogue hurts Pakistan and not India".

Consequently, the recent easing of tensions between China and India is "unlikely to have a knock-on effect on Pakistan-India relations", she said.

Aamer noted that the diplomatic dynamics between India and China differ significantly from those with Pakistan. While both China and India have engaged in substantial border negotiations and share economic interests as major players in the Global South, similar motivations for dialogue with Pakistan have yet to emerge.

As both India and China continue work to address their border differences, former Indian ambassador Gupta emphasised that withdrawing troops from "eyeball confrontation" and resuming patrols would be essential for maintaining stability.

"This will help in the maintenance of peace, security, and good neighbourly relations," he said, although he acknowledged that it would "require a lot of patient handling on both sides"

Aamer said that such confidence-building measures from China and India help to signal that the situation in the region "isn't acutely tense", ultimately benefiting South Asia as a whole – "something that should be in the interest of all parties", she said.

Pak missions in China to have 20 new trade posts

04 November 2024, The News, Mariana Baabar

Approval is given in an attempt to expand Pakistan's exports and reduce current trade deficit with China

There has been mixed reaction to the decision by Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif in which he has approved the setting up of 20 new trade posts at the Pakistan Embassy in Beijing and at the different consulates in China.

The approval was given by the prime minister at the Economic Coordination Committee (ECC) meeting on November 2, in an attempt to expand Pakistan's exports and reduce the current trade deficit with China.

"It was during the Business Conference in Shenzhen during the visit of the prime minister when it was evident that with existing less than even modest human resource for investment and trade promotion, the goal of enhancing Pakistan's exports and a robust economic relationship with China will remain elusive," an official tells The News.

Almost all these posts are local (staff level) employees, but not confined to the Embassy alone. In fact these posts will be spread out not only to Pakistan Embassy in Beijing but also to Pakistan's four Consulates in Chengdu, Hong Kong, Guangzhou and Shanghai.

"The Pakistan Embassy will hire local staff as Trade Development Officers and Investment Officers. The Embassy needs this human resource because they are severely deficient in that," the official said adding that this decision has been conveyed to the different ministries in Islamabad.

However, while officials and diplomats The News contacted, welcomed these new decisions saying it will have far reaching results in trade ties with China, there were others who were not so easily convinced. Reacting to the decision by the ECC to create new trade posts in China, renowned economist Dr Kaiser Bengali completely disagreed. Earlier, he had resigned from the Austerity Committee, the high-powered committee for rightsizing in the federal government.

"How inane! Over 20 new trade offices to be set up in China to boost exports! More non-development expenditure! The key to exports is revival of industrial sector to produce more, better n cheaper, not creating more bureaucratic positions," he remarked on Twitter.

But officials insist that having staff with Chinese language skills and knowledge of local business scene, can be helpful in developing linkages with the local businesses. "Given the breadth of China (bigger than Europe) there is a need to reach out to various provinces and municipalities and these new staff will prove useful in reaching out to the breadth of businesses across China", another official remarked.

Pakistan says China's remarks on safety of its citizens 'perplexing'

31 October 2024, VOA, Ayaz Gul and Sarah Zaman

Pakistan pushed back Thursday against China's criticism of the safety of Chinese personnel in the country, calling the comments "perplexing" and contrary to established diplomatic traditions between the neighbors.

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mumtaz Baloch said at a weekly news conference in Islamabad that the government is dedicated to ensuring the security of Chinese nationals, projects, and institutions in Pakistan.

Baloch was responding to a rare public warning from the Chinese ambassador to the country, Jiang Zaidong, who urged Islamabad to take action against militants responsible for several deadly attacks on Chinese workers.

Jiang labeled the violence "unacceptable" and cautioned that it poses "a constraint" on Beijing's investments under its Belt and Road Initiative, or BRI.

"The statement of the Chinese ambassador is perplexing and is not reflective of the diplomatic traditions between Pakistan and China," Baloch said. "We will continue to engage with our Chinese brothers to reassure them of Pakistan's complete commitment to their security and well-being in Pakistan," she added.

Jiang, while addressing a seminar in Islamabad, referenced suicide car bombings in March and October of this year, which resulted in the deaths of seven Chinese personnel. It raised the number of Chinese workers killed in Pakistan to 21 since the countries launched a massive infrastructure project as part of the BRI about a decade ago.

"It is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months," the Chinese diplomat stated, speaking through his interpreter. He stressed the need for Islamabad to take "effective remedial measures to prevent the recurrence of such terror acts and ensure that perpetrators are identified, caught, and punished."

It is unprecedented for Pakistan to respond publicly to China's criticism, and it is extremely rare for the Chinese ambassador to admonish Islamabad for alleged security lapses against Chinese engineers and workers.

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, or CPEC, considered the flagship project of the BRI, has brought more than $25 billion in Chinese investment to enhance Pakistan's infrastructure, facilitating improved bilateral trade and further integrating the broader South Asian region.

Jiang urged Pakistan to take action against "all anti-China terrorist groups," stating that "security is the biggest concern" for Beijing. He added that "without a safe and sound environment, nothing can be achieved."

Baloch said investigations into attacks on Chinese workers are ongoing and said the findings have been communicated to Beijing. She did not elaborate.

CPEC has resulted in roads, highways, primarily coal-fired power plants, and the strategic deepwater Gwadar port on the Arabian Sea in the country's southwestern Balochistan province.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar, while addressing Tuesday's seminar organized by the Islamabad-based independent Pakistan-China Institute, assured the Chinese ambassador that his country was taking action against terrorists and tightening the security of Chinese nationals.

Dar stated that Pakistan would share the progress with China in high-level talks next month.

"The Chinese are very clear; no matter how lucrative an investment is anywhere, if the security issue is there, they do not send Chinese personnel. Your country is the only exception," he told the audience, quoting Chinese leaders as telling Pakistani counterparts in recent meetings.

Critics argue that Pakistan's financial difficulties and political instability have discouraged China from making new investments in the CPEC.

After the launch of CPEC projects, Pakistan's military formed a specially trained unit of over 13,000 troops to safeguard the initiatives nationwide. But the attacks on Chinese nationals have led to doubts about the effectiveness of the military unit.

Most of the recent attacks on Chinese workers and engineers have been claimed by the Baloch Liberation Army, or BLA, a prominent separatist group waging insurgent attacks in Balochistan.

The group, which is made up of militants from the Baloch ethnic minority, accuses China of helping Pakistan exploit the province's natural resources and has been calling for Beijing to withdraw its CPEC and other investments.

Both countries reject the allegations, saying Baloch insurgents are on a mission to subvert development in the impoverished province and undermine Pakistan's close ties with China.

Chinese envoy miffed at CPEC security lapses

In a rare public rebuff, the Chinese envoy to Pakistan on Tuesday said that two deadly terror attacks within only six months were unacceptable and the government should launch a crackdown against all anti-China terrorist groups.

Speaking at a seminar titled 'China at 75', Ambassador Jiang Zaidong further said that security was the biggest constraint to the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) and "without safe and sound environment nothing can be achieved".

The ambassador spoke twice during the seminar, organised by the Pakistan China Institute of stalwart politician Senator Mushahid Hussain. Jiang first spoke before the speech of Deputy Prime Minister Ishaq Dar, and then he used his right to reply after Dar's remarks on the security for the Chinese.

"It is very unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months and these attacks have also caused casualties," Ambassador Jiang said. He added that Beijing hoped that the Pakistani side could further strengthen the security measures to protect Chinese personnel, institutions and projects.

"Pakistan should severely punish the perpetrators and crack down on all anti-China terrorist groups," said the ambassador during his second unusual intervention. "Security is the biggest concern for China and a constraint to CPEC in Pakistan."

Ambassador Jiang remarks came after Deputy Prime Minister Dar said in his speech that "Chinese are very clear no matter how lucrative an investment is anywhere if the security issue is there they do not send Chinese personnel. Your country is the only exception. This is what the Chinese leadership told the Prime Minister of Pakistan in my presence".

Ambassador Jiang clarified that "President Xi cares about Chinese people's security and puts people's lives first. He especially cares about the security of the Chinese people in Pakistan. Every time when he meets with Pakistani leaders he asks for taking measures to ensure the security of Chinese personnel, institutions and projects", said the ambassador.

The terrorists have twice targeted Chinese nationals in the past six months, first in March and then again in October just 10 days before the visit of the Chinese Premier to Pakistan.

It is highly uncommon when a foreign diplomat used his right to reply after the speech of the foreign minister, indicating divergent views on security between the two nations.

Dar said that Pakistan was taking action against the terrorists and the progress would be shared during the next week's meeting between President Asif Zardari and Chinese President Xi Jinping.

Ambassador Jiang said that during his exchanges with the leaders of the Pakistani side, Premier Li also emphasised the importance of security for economic development and cooperation. He emphasised that China would further deepen economic cooperation with Pakistan but "we hope that the Pakistani side could create a conducive and safe environment" for the Chinese people.

"President Xi always says that security is the guarantee of development and development is the guarantee of the security. With joint efforts, we could crack down on those terrorist groups," said Ambassador Jiang.

"There are an increasing number of attacks on the Chinese nationals because the Pak-China friendship has not been digested by certain powers of the world," Dar said. He added that despite these challenging times, in recent meetings, Pakistan and China had agreed to take CPEC to the next level by deepening cooperation in the areas of trade, industrialisation, digital economy, agriculture and renewable energy.

Dar also criticised the United States for its tactics to stop Beijing becoming a global economic power. "China will be the biggest economy in due course despite all the tools that have been used against it, including increasing tariffs on its products up to 200%, said Dar. "Increasing tariffs from 25% to 200% is nothing but politics to use unfair ways to stop China from becoming a global super economic power."

Dar also bitterly criticised the last Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) government and former director general of the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) Faiz Hameed for the current deterioration in the security situation.

"We have to blame ourselves for the resurrection of terrorism" said Dar, while blaming the terror attacks on the PTI's policies of friendship with Afghanistan. "We have to blame ourselves for the cup of tea that we drank in Kabul," he added, referring to Lt-Gen (ret'd) Faiz Hameed's visit to Kabul immediately after the Taliban takeover.

"We have to blame ourselves for 102 hardened criminals, who were involved in various crimes but were freed after the cup of tea", said Dar. "We have to take blame for 35,000 to 40,000 terrorists who had left Pakistan but came back after the last government opened borders with Afghanistan."

On the issue of Dr Aafia Siddiqui, who is incarcerated in an American jail, the deputy prime minister highlighted the government's efforts to persuade the American leadership to pardon her, but said that those efforts could not bear fruit.

He said Prime Minister Shehbaz sent a letter to the US president, requesting to pardon Dr Aafia on humanitarian grounds as the US presidents usually grant certain pardons before relinquishing the office. He added that a three-member committee had been formed to meet the US parliamentarians to lobby in favour of her pardon, release, and sending her back to Pakistan.

Coming to unabated Israel's barbarism in Gaza, he said that Pakistan was one of the rare countries which spoke vocally in favour of the Palestinian people and called for an immediate end to genocide, and implementation of the UNSC resolutions and ICJ rulings.

He said 48, 000 innocent Palestinian people had been killed with the majority of them being women and children and another 80,000 injured.

Expressing concerns over the attacks in Lebanon and Iran, he said Pakistan had sent 10 big consignments of relief goods to Gaza and had started hosting Palestinian medical students in Pakistan's public and private medical colleges to make them complete their education.

China warns security threats to its nationals impede BRI investments in Pakistan

30 October 2024, VOA, Ayaz Gul

China has increased diplomatic pressure on close ally Pakistan to take action against the militants responsible for repeated attacks on Chinese workers, warning that the violence is "unacceptable" and poses "a constraint" on Beijing's investments under its Belt and Road Initiative, or BRI.

The rare public warning accusing Islamabad of consistent security lapses concerning Chinese workers was issued by Beijing's ambassador, Jiang Zaidong, while addressing a seminar in Islamabad this week. Analysts said the remarks reflect China's increasing frustration with the security risks facing its workers in the South Asian nation.

Jiang referenced suicide car bombings in March and October of this year, which resulted in the deaths of seven Chinese personnel. It raised the number of Chinese workers killed in Pakistan to 21 since the countries launched a massive bilateral connectivity project as part of the BRI about a decade ago.

"It is unacceptable for us to be attacked twice in only six months," the Chinese diplomat stated, speaking through his interpreter. He stressed the need for Islamabad to take "effective remedial measures to prevent the recurrence of such terror acts and ensure that perpetrators are identified, caught, and punished."

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, or CPEC, considered the flagship project of the BRI, has brought more than $25 billion in Chinese investment to enhance Pakistan's infrastructure, facilitating improved bilateral trade and further integrating of the broader South Asian region.

Jiang urged Pakistan to take action against "all anti-China terrorist groups," stating that "security is the biggest concern" for Beijing and "a constraint on CPEC" projects. He added that "without a safe and sound environment, nothing can be achieved."

The CPEC has built roads, highways, primarily coal-fired power plants, and the strategic deepwater Gwadar port on the Arabian Sea in the country's southwestern Balochistan province.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar, while addressing Tuesday's seminar organized by the Islamabad-based independent Pakistan-China Institute, assured the Chinese ambassador that his country was taking action against terrorists and tightening the security of Chinese nationals.

Dar stated that Pakistan would share the progress with China in high-level talks next month.

"The Chinese are very clear; no matter how lucrative an investment is anywhere, if the security issue is there, they do not send Chinese personnel. Your country is the only exception," he told the audience, quoting Chinese leaders as telling Pakistani counterparts in recent meetings.

Critics argue that Pakistan's financial difficulties and political instability have discouraged China from making new investments in the CPEC.

Michael Kugelman, an expert on South Asian affairs based in Washington, told VOA that Beijing's security concerns have made it challenging for the mega project to regain momentum anytime soon.

"When the Chinese envoy publicly upbraids Pakistan for not providing proper security, you know there is a big problem," said Kugelman, who directs the South Asia Institute at the Wilson Center.

"I imagine the objective moving forward will be carefully working to maintain and advance existing projects but being cautious about agreeing to new ones until China feels less concerned about security risks," he added.

After the launch of CPEC projects, Pakistan's military formed a specially trained unit of over 13,000 troops to safeguard these initiatives nationwide. But the attacks on Chinese nationals have led to concerns regarding the effectiveness of this military unit.

Hasnain Javed, a Beijing-based Pakistani foreign research associate, noted that China had never before publicly criticized Islamabad.

"This is a strong rebuttal and a serious dissatisfaction over the poor security around CPEC," Javed told VOA in written comments. "Now, when the military is the main guarantor, particularly for security, the Chinese seem to be running on low patience."

Most of the recent attacks on Chinese workers and engineers have been claimed by the Baloch Liberation Army, or BLA, a prominent separatist group waging insurgent attacks in Balochistan.

The group, which is made up of militants from the Baloch ethnic minority, accuses China of helping Pakistan to exploit the province's natural resources and has been calling for Beijing to withdraw its CPEC and other investments.

Both countries reject the allegations, saying Baloch insurgents are on a mission to subvert development in the impoverished province and undermine Pakistan's close ties with China.

The BLA, listed as a global terrorist organization by the United States, has lately intensified guerrilla attacks in Balochistan, killing hundreds of Pakistanis, primarily security force members, in recent months.

During his visit to Pakistan earlier in October, Chinese Premier Li Qiang also highlighted the significance of security for economic development and cooperation.

A post-visit joint statement quoted the Chinese side as stressing "the need and urgency to take targeted security measures in Pakistan to jointly create a safe environment for cooperation between the two countries."

Pakistan requests additional $1.4 billion loan from China amid ongoing financial challenges

27 October 2024, Live Mint

During a meeting with China's Vice Minister of Finance, Liao Min, Pakistan's Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb urged the Chinese side to elevate the limits under the Currency Swap Agreement to CNY 40 billion.

In a bid to address its persistent external financing issues, Pakistan has formally requested a supplementary loan of 10 billion yuan (CNY) (approximately USD 1.4 billion) from China.

The announcement was made on Saturday, underscoring the fiscal pressures the nation continues to face, the Express Tribune reported.

During a meeting with China's Vice Minister of Finance, Liao Min, Pakistan's Finance Minister

Muhammad Aurangzeb urged the Chinese side to elevate the limits under the Currency Swap Agreement to CNY 40 billion. As stated by the Ministry of Finance, Pakistan has already fully utilised the existing CNY 30 billion (USD 4.3 billion) Chinese trade facility for debt repayment and is now seeking to raise this limit by an additional CNY 10 billion, which translates to USD 1.4 billion based on current exchange rates.

The finance minister's appeal occurred on the sidelines of the annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. If approved by Beijing, the total facility would amount to approximately USD 5.7 billion.

This request is not unprecedented; Pakistan has previously sought increases in its debt limit, but Beijing has declined these appeals in the past. Notably, this request follows closely behind China's extension of the current USD 4.3 billion (CNY 30 billion) facility for an additional three years. This extension was formalised during the recent visit of Chinese Prime Minister Li Qiang, which also saw the debt repayment period for Pakistan extended to 2027.

Pakistan has fully consumed the existing trade finance facility of USD 4.3 billion under the China-Pakistan currency swap agreement. Although the Ministry of Finance did not specify the reasons behind the new request, reports suggest that uncertainties regarding some pipeline loans have prompted the need for additional financial support.

In a parallel move to fill the financing gap, Pakistan accepted terms for a costly USD 600 million commercial loan. However, this decision raised concerns, leading the IMF to clarify that the loan was not tied to the requirements of Pakistan's USD 7 billion bailout package. Aurangzeb later informed the National Assembly Standing Committee on Finance that the government secured USD 600 million in financing at an 11 per cent interest rate for IMF program purposes.

The finance ministry confirmed that both ministers reiterated the strength of the all-weather strategic cooperative partnership between Pakistan and China. Originally signed in December 2011, the bilateral currency swap agreement (CSA) aimed to promote bilateral trade, foreign direct investment, and provide short-term liquidity support.

In the fiscal year 2021, the initial limit of the CSA was extended from 20 billion CNY to 30 billion CNY (USD 4.5 billion) for a period of three years, with maturity periods ranging from three months to one year, according to the central bank.

This is not the first instance of Pakistan seeking an increase in its loan limit from China; in November 2022, then-Finance Minister Ishaq Dar also requested an additional 10 billion yuan (USD 1.5 billion) due to delays in loans from other bilateral and multilateral creditors.

Pakistan has primarily utilised the Chinese trade finance facility to repay foreign debts and stabilise its foreign currency reserves, preventing potential market turmoil. The current USD 4.3 billion facility is part of the State Bank of Pakistan's foreign exchange reserves, which are approximately USD 11 billion. Additionally, China has extended USD 4 billion in SAFE deposits, which are included in these reserves, along with another USD 4 billion in commercial loans. Despite these supports, Pakistan's foreign exchange reserves remain insufficient to meet its debt obligations to China.

The finance ministry stated that Aurangzeb expressed gratitude to the Chinese government for its unwavering support in Pakistan's socio-economic development and assistance in securing the IMF's Extended Fund Facility (EFF).

Furthermore, the finance minister highlighted Pakistan's eagerness to learn from China's experience in economic reform and mentioned plans to issue an inaugural Panda bond in the Chinese market to diversify its financing options.

Aurangzeb also assured China of comprehensive security measures for Chinese workers in Pakistan. Both parties emphasised the importance of enhancing online payment settlements and integrating the two nations' payment systems, marking a collaborative step forward in their economic partnership.

Pakistan Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb has requested the Chinese government to raise the limits of the currency swap agreement to 40 billion Chinese Yuan, ARY News reported.

During a meeting with China's Vice Minister of Finance, Liao Min, in Washington, DC, Aurangzeb reaffirmed Islamabad's commitment to enhance the strategic partnership between Pakistan and China, as stated in a press release.

He expressed gratitude to the Chinese government for its steadfast support in Pakistan's socio-economic development and its assistance in securing the IMF's Extended Fund Facility (EFF), ARY News reported.

Aurangzeb indicated that Pakistan is keen to learn from China's economic reform experiences and welcomed Chinese automobile manufacturer BYD's decision to introduce electric vehicles in Pakistan.

He also informed the Chinese representatives about Pakistan's plans to launch its inaugural Panda bond in the Chinese market to diversify its financing options.

The finance minister assured that Pakistani authorities would provide robust security for Chinese workers and noted that many Chinese companies are interested in expanding their investments and creating more jobs in Pakistan, as per ARY News.

"Both sides emphasised the need for online payment settlements and integration of the two countries' payment systems," the statement read.

Meanwhile, the finance minister also met Andrew Torre, the Regional President for VISA, and commended the company's efforts in modernising Pakistan's payments ecosystem, including support for local payment platforms like 1Link.

Aurangzeb praised Visa's launch of the Financial Inclusion Card in partnership with Meezan Bank, emphasising the need for more routing options for clients and ensuring fair competition for domestic transaction processing, as per ARY News.

Additionally, Muhammad Aurangzeb met with Mohammad Kallala, the Global Head of Corporate and Investment Banking at Natixis. Kallala provided insights into Natixis' operations in sectors like infrastructure, renewables, transportation, aviation, telecom, and technology.

The two discussed potential partnerships with Gulf investors, especially from Saudi Arabia, to support financing and advisory services for investments in Pakistan. Kallala mentioned that the bank intends to collaborate with selected leading Pakistani companies to facilitate these investments.

Both parties agreed on the importance of ongoing engagement moving forward. (ANI)

Pakistan Faces Brunt Of US Sanctions; A Total Of 26 Entities Blacklisted For Supporting Weapons Development In Iran, Pak, China

23 October 2024, The Eurasian Times, Ashish Dangwal

The United States has added more than two dozen entities to its export blacklist, accusing them of supporting weapons and drone development programs in Iran and Pakistan, as well as aiding in the modernization of China's military.

The move, announced by the Commerce Department, targets 26 entities, primarily located in Pakistan (16), China (6), the United Arab Emirates (3), and Egypt (1).

These entities are said to have violated US export controls, been involved in "weapons programs of concern," or circumvented sanctions imposed on Russia and Iran. Their inclusion in the "Entity List" restricts their ability to obtain US-made items and technology without government approval.

"We are vigilant in defending US national security from bad actors," said Alan Estevez, Undersecretary of Commerce for Industry and Security, in a statement. He stressed that the US will hold accountable any entity that violates its export controls.

"Six entities under the destination of the PRC were added for acquiring US-origin items in support of the PRC's military modernization, dilatory and evasive conduct during end-use checks, and procurement of US-origin items for Iran's weapons of mass destruction and unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) programs," the statement reads.

Among the companies blacklisted is Beijing Moreget Creative Technology, accused of acquiring US-origin items related to aviation simulation technology in support of China's military modernization.

This move reflects Washington's growing concerns over China's rapid military advancements, which the US sees as a threat to its global standing.

Additionally, Hong Kong-based Small Leopard Electronics and its associated company, Shenzhen Dragonfly Supply Chain, were added to the list for allegedly obstructing Commerce Department investigations.

Small Leopard was involved in a transaction supplying goods to an Iranian procurement network and had previously been on the Unverified List for failing to comply with on-site visits required to receive US-origin technology.

Three other companies, Detail Technology (HK), L-Tong Electronic Technology, and Shenzhen Jiachuang Weiye Technology, were also blacklisted for their involvement in procuring US technology for Iran's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and drone development programs.

The US export blacklist is a powerful tool used to restrict the flow of American technology to foreign companies deemed threats to U.S. national security or foreign policy. Companies on this list are required to obtain a special license to access U.S. technology, a request that is typically denied.

Beijing, in response, has urged Washington to cease its "discriminatory and unfair measures" targeting Chinese companies. The U.S., however, remains firm in its stance, signaling that violations of export controls will not go unpunished.

US Blacklists Pakistani Entities

The latest additions to the US export blacklist include nine entities linked to Pakistan, which were flagged for operating as front companies and procurement agents for the Advanced Engineering Research Organization, a Pakistani firm that has been on the Entity List since 2014.

Additionally, seven more Pakistani companies were blacklisted for their role in supporting the country's ballistic missile development program.

"We will continue to cut off entities that seek to evade our controls and act contrary to US national security," said Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Export Administration Thea D. Rozman Kendler. "Programs such as Iran's WMD program, their unmanned aerial vehicle program, and Pakistan's ballistic missile program pose significant threats to the national security of the United States and will not be aided by US technologies."

Assistant Secretary for Export Enforcement Matthew S. Axelrod further clarified the U.S. approach to enforcement, stating that action would be taken against entities that engage in the transshipment of US items to support WMD and UAV programs in countries like Iran and Pakistan or to aid Russia's military efforts.

Axelrod added that any foreign entities obstructing US end-use checks would face serious repercussions. Earlier this year, the US imposed sanctions on three Chinese firms and one Belarus-based company for their involvement in Pakistan's missile development.

In a continued effort to curb Pakistan's ballistic missile capabilities, the US imposed additional sanctions in September on a Chinese firm linked to Islamabad's missile program as part of a broader non-proliferation initiative, as reported by the EurAsian Times.

At the time, US State Department spokesperson Matthew Miller revealed that Pakistan's National Development Complex (NDC) had collaborated with Beijing's Research Institute of Automation for Machine Building (RIAMB) to obtain equipment for testing rocket motors for the Shaheen-3 and Ababeel missile systems.

Pakistan's Shaheen-III, a two-stage medium-range ballistic missile with a range of 2,750 kilometers, can carry both conventional and nuclear warheads. The Ababeel, with a range of 2,200 kilometers, is also designed for nuclear delivery. Both missiles form a key part of Pakistan's strategic arsenal.

The sanctions were imposed because these entities and individuals transferred equipment and technology governed by the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR), aiding Category I missile programs in a non-MTCR country.

Despite opposing the sanctions, Pakistan has refused to join the MTCR, a pact India signed in 2016, which seeks to limit the proliferation of missile technology.

While the MTCR is not a formal treaty, its goal is to prevent the spread of WMDs by regulating the export of missiles and related technologies. The regime focuses on unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) capable of delivering significant payloads, as well as the hardware and technology associated with these systems.

Pakistan and China have consistently condemned these sanctions. Pakistan's Foreign Office spokesperson Baloch previously criticized the selective enforcement of non-proliferation principles, accusing certain nations of making exceptions to support their geopolitical allies.

In addition to Chinese and Pakistani companies, three entities based in the UAE and one in Egypt were blacklisted for procuring or attempting to procure US-origin parts in violation of US sanctions and export controls implemented after Russia's full-scale invasion of Ukraine in February 2022.

Pakistan gets 'promising response' from China over debt refiling: FinMin

23 October 2024, The Tribune Express

Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb meets Saudi, Turkish counterparts on sidelines of World Bank-IMF summit

Pakistan is advancing economic ties with China, Saudi Arabia, and Türkiye, as Federal Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb held high-level discussions on the sidelines of the World Bank-IMF Annual Meetings in Washington DC.

The meetings focused on debt reprofiling, trade cooperation, and joint ventures to strengthen Pakistan's economic prospects.

Aurangzeb revealed a "promising response" from China over Pakistan's request to reprofile its power sector debt, a move aimed at providing the country with breathing room to lower electricity prices.

"We have just started that discussion, and the response is encouraging," the minister told Bloomberg, while stressing the importance of continuing structural reforms.

He noted that Pakistan seeks to extend the maturity of debt for nine power plants built by Chinese companies under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

China has already rolled over $16 billion in debt from a total of $26 billion in the current fiscal year.

Aurangzeb meets Saudi, Turkish FM's to boost trade and investment

In addition to these negotiations, Aurangzeb met with Saudi Finance Minister Mohammed Aljadaan to discuss enhancing bilateral trade and investment in key sectors.

Both ministers emphasised the historical bonds between Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, agreeing to further cooperation in energy and other areas of mutual interest.

Aljadaan also shared insights into Saudi Arabia's energy reforms, offering valuable lessons for Pakistan as it seeks to overhaul its energy sector.

Aurangzeb also held discussions with Türkiye's Treasury and Finance Minister Mehmet Simsek, where he invited Turkish firms to explore mutually beneficial joint ventures (JVs) with Pakistani counterparts.

Highlighting the strong potential to increase bilateral trade, the minister praised Türkiye's experience in power sector reforms and expressed Pakistan's interest in learning from their success.

These discussions underscore Pakistan's strategic efforts to secure debt relief and deepen economic ties with key global partners, aiming to strengthen its economy and create new opportunities for trade and investment.

Rise in violence against Chinese nationals in Pakistan threatens China's 'Silk Road' vision

21 October 2024, ABC, Libby Hogan

When China's Premier Li Qiang visited Pakistan last week – the first such visit in over a decade – the talks focused on boosting security for Chinese projects.

China is spending billions of dollars on the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor infrastructure project, which spans 3,000 kilometres and includes the strategic Gwadar Port in Balochistan, in the country's south-west.

It's hoped the project will create a new "Silk Road" shortening the trading route between China and the Middle East.

However, Chinese nationals working in Pakistan continue to be targeted by attacks from separatist groups, with nearly 100 killed in recent years.

Earlier this month, two Chinese engineers were killed by a suicide car bomb during an attack by the Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) on a Chinese convoy in Karachi.

Who is behind the recent attacks?

The BLA, made up of militants from the Baloch ethnic minority, is the main group responsible for attacks on Chinese interests in Pakistan.

The terror group first came to prominence in the early 2000s after they claimed responsibility for a series of bombing attacks on the Pakistani authorities. However, its roots are believed to go back to the 1970s, with militants fighting the Pakistan government over the exploitation of local resources.

They say their goal is an independent state for the Baloch people in the Balochistan region.

In recent years, they have begun to target Chinese interests along with the Pakistan government.

Analysts note that these attacks have focused on people tied to China's projects, not random Chinese nationals.

A rise in violence targeting Chinese nationals

Imtiaz Gul, from the Islamabad-based Centre for Research and Security Studies, said that such attacks were part of a longstanding pattern.

"The targets have been directed at Chinese engineers, accountants, professionals [and] business executives over the last few years," he told the ABC.

However, he pointed out that it wasn't just the BLA.

He said groups like Tehrik-e-Taliban Pakistan and Islamic State Khorasan had also carried out attacks on Chinese interests in the region.

In March, five Chinese engineers were killed in a bombing linked to the Pakistani Taliban, though the group denied involvement.

He also noted there had been violent incidents unrelated to Chinese nationals, such as the gunning down of 21 coal miners, including four Afghans, in Balochistan this month.

"Regardless of who is behind these attacks, they are all instruments of terror, to destabilise the region," Mr Gul said.

Why is there opposition to Chinese investment projects?

Resentment against the Chinese presence in Balochistan comes from two main issues.

First, locals feel excluded from the economic benefits of projects like Gwadar Port.

Despite promises of fresh water and jobs, many say these have not materialised.

"We don't even have drinking water," said Mir Sadaat Baloch, a local teacher.

"I've sat in three meetings, and there is a lot of talk and not any action," he added.

Local fishermen are also frustrated with the restricted access to the sea and port expansion into their traditional fishing grounds, impacting their livelihoods.

Secondly, many believe their resources are being exploited without benefiting the province.

Balochistan, the largest province of Pakistan covering almost 44 per cent of the country's land mass, is resource rich yet it is also one of the poorest.

Analyst Sher Baz Khetran, a researcher at the Institute of Strategic Studies in Islamabad, said local communities felt they were not properly consulted before work began on the projects.

"Many Baloch people see it in black and white. They don't want the Chinese to invest anymore while their resources are exploited," Mr Khetran said.

Seema Khan, a professor at Deakin University, argues that the violence stems from broader political instability and lack of representation of Balochistan people, particularly in the lower house of Pakistan's parliament.

Raji Pillai Rajagopalan, a senior research fellow at the Australian Strategic Policy Institute, said Pakistan was grappling with multiple challenges.

"The situation is highly uncertain, with a disturbing domestic political climate, issues with the Taliban and Afghanistan, a deteriorating law and order situation, and an economy in serious trouble," she said.

The Gwadar Port Authority did not immediately respond to questions about the lack of consultation or development around the port.

Accusations Pakistan used for proxy terrorism

Pakistan, meanwhile, blames foreign powers for stoking unrest.

"Pakistani authorities suspect the Balochistan Liberation Army, which has safe havens along Iran's border with Balochistan, is being used as a proxy by India," Syed Fazl-e-Haider, author of Economic Development of Balochistan, told the ABC.

India denies the claims.

Previously, India has directly accused Pakistan's powerful military intelligence agency of involvement in 2008's Mumbai attacks and high commission officials of espionage in Delhi.

According to Ms Rajagopalan, tit-for-tat accusations between the two countries are common.

"I haven't seen any convincing evidence that India is involved in any material sense in the Baluchi struggle," she told the ABC.

"Of course, Indian leaders have publicly supported Baluchis rhetorically, but I am not sure if they have followed up with actual assistance."

Ms Khan pointed to the economic rivalry between India and China and suggested regional actors may want to sabotage the China-Pakistan friendship.

"It's in a lot of foreign powers' interests to keep Pakistan unstable and to target economic partnerships," said Ms Khan.

India opposes China's Belt and Road infrastructure projects and is building its own alternate route via Afghanistan to Iran.

The head of media for Pakistan's armed forces has previously accused India of sponsoring banned UN-designated terrorist groups including Tehrik-e-Taliban Pakistan, Jamaat-ul-Ahrar, and the Baloch Liberation Army.

In 2016, Pakistani authorities arrested Kulbhushan Jadhav, an alleged Indian spy and naval officer who confessed to funding Baloch insurgents to carry out attacks in Pakistan.

Pakistan has accused the BLA of being an instrument of proxy terrorism. (Reuters: Saumya Khandelwal)

Mr Jadhav, operating under the alias Hussein Mubarik Patel, had been running a small business in the Iranian port city of Chabahar.

India's foreign ministry denied the allegations at the time, dismissing them as "fabricated" and "figments of imagination".

"This desperate attempt will find few takers as the international community is aware of Pakistan's tactics," India's foreign ministry spokesperson Anurag Srivastava said.

Local analysts were also sceptical that the recent Karachi attack was carried out without the help of specialised external expertise.

"To know the exact map coordinates, timing of vehicles and movements takes a lot of intelligence," said journalist Essa Naqvi.

"This organised militant activity is beyond the capacity of local indigenous people who are struggling to get electricity and a glass of clean drinking water."

Promises to bolster security

Following the meetings between the Pakistani and Chinese representatives — held on the sidelines of Eurasian security conference — Pakistan agreed to increase security for Chinese workers.

Pakistan would make "comprehensive efforts to ensure the safety and security of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions", a joint statement said.

However, Mr Naqvi criticised the focus on Chinese citizens, saying local needs were being ignored.

"I don't see any effort from the government to look at the safety, right to education, shelter and basic rights of citizens in Balochistan," he said.

"It is more about safety of Chinese citizens."

He added that corruption prevented investment benefits from reaching ordinary people.

How important is Pakistan for China's Belt and Road Initiative?

Despite the security threats, China's investment in Pakistan is crucial for the success of the Belt and Road Initiative.

Experts agree that the project is too important for China to abandon.

Gwadar Port, in particular, is central to China's regional ambitions, competing with major hubs like Iran and Dubai.

It was envisioned as the crown jewel of President Xi Jinping's infrastructure plan, linking China's Xinjiang region to the Arabian Sea, and shortening vital trade routes.

Ms Khan argues that Gwadar's strategic importance lies in its ability to bypass the Malacca Strait, to avoid any possible blockages.

"Once fully operational, it will firmly secure China's interests," she said.

"This port is vital for China's broader strategic aims, shaping relationships between superpowers in the region."

Symposium held in Islamabad on China-Pakistan cooperation to drive modernization

20 October 2024, Xinhua

The Hong Ting Forum themed "Understanding China-Pakistan All-Weather Strategic Cooperative Partnership and Chinese-style Modernization Development Path" has been held in Pakistan's federal capital city of Islamabad.

The symposium held on Friday drew about 100 participants, including diplomats, scholars, and media representatives. It was co-convened by Xinhua News Agency and the Institute of Strategic Studies Islamabad (ISSI), an Islamabad-based think tank.

Speaking at the event, Shi Yuanqiang, minister of Chinese Embassy in Pakistan, said that China is ready to share development opportunities with the rest of the world.

"China and Pakistan are good neighbors and all-weather strategic cooperative partners, and mutually beneficial cooperation benefits both countries," he added.

Masood Khalid, former Pakistani ambassador to China, said the third plenary session of the 20th Communist Party of China Central Committee has adopted a grand strategic blueprint for Chinese-style modernization.

"Pakistan greatly value our time-tested relationship with China, and both countries are tied in a relationship which is unbreakable," Khalid said, adding that Pakistan should learn from the development model of Chinese-style modernization to embark on the path of self-reliance and better benefit both nations and regional development.

Mudassar Iqbal, deputy director of Associated Press of Pakistan, said that China's approach to modernization is not only benefiting its own people but also contributing to global development.

"The ironclad friendship between Pakistan and China will enable the two countries to stand and move forward side by side and forge a future of shared prosperity and unshakable friendship," he added.

Hassan Daud Butt, senior advisor at the China Study Center of the Sustainable Development Policy Institute, an Islamabad-based think tank, said that Pakistan should fully utilize the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) to expand cooperation with China in various fields such as industry, agriculture, science and technology, digital economy, green energy and technological innovation.

On the occasion, Khalid Mahmood, chairman of the ISSI Board of Governors, said efforts should be stepped up by the media and think tanks of Pakistan and China to contribute to deepening the all-weather strategic cooperative partnership between the two countries

Pakistan to increase security for Chinese projects as Beijing calls for urgent steps

16 October 2024, Reuters

Pakistan has agreed to increase security for Chinese citizens and projects in the South Asian nation, a joint statement said on Tuesday, as Beijing called for urgent security measures following an escalation in militant threats in the country.

China has pumped billions of dollars into Pakistan over the years building infrastructure under the Belt and Road Initiative, while also running a strategic port and a major mine in the country.

But its citizens and projects have been attacked continuously by separatist militants fighting against what they call exploitation of the mineral-rich southwestern Balochistan province.

"The Chinese side underscored the need and urgency to take targeted security measures in Pakistan, to jointly create a safe environment for cooperation," said a joint statement on the visit of Chinese Premier Li Qiang.

Li arrived in Islamabad on Monday for a four-day visit- the first visit by a Chinese premier to Pakistan in 11 years - days after a suicide bombing in Karachi killed two Chinese engineers. It was the second attack on Chinese engineers in the country this year.

The visit coincides with a meeting of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation, a Eurasian security and political group.

The Pakistani side emphasised its firm commitment to enhancing security input and coordination as well as strengthening security measures, the statement, released by Pakistan's foreign office, added.

Pakistan will make "comprehensive efforts to ensure the safety and security of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions," the 30-point statement added.

Islamabad is under tight security for the duration of the Chinese premier's visit, which concludes on Thursday.

The joint statement also pressed on regional, economic and diplomatic cooperation between the two countries.

Both parties reaffirmed their commitment to an upgraded version of the China Pakistan Economic Corridor, a $65 billion investment in the South Asian country under Chinese President Xi Jinping's Belt and Road Initiative.

China's Premier Li begins Pakistan visit amid rare strains in relations

14 October 2024, VOA, Ayaz Gul

Chinese Premier Li Qiang began a four-day visit to Pakistan on Monday under tight security for bilateral talks and to attend the heads of government meeting of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) hosted in Islamabad this week.

Pakistan is on high alert after a recent increase in deadly insurgent attacks nationwide, including a suicide car bomb attack in Karachi last week that targeted a Chinese convoy and resulted in the deaths of two Chinese engineers.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif received Li at a military air base outside the Pakistani capital before the two led their respective teams' delegations to review bilateral trade and progress on the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor. Popularly known as CPEC, the Chinese-funded multibillion-dollar bilateral project is a key extension of Chinese President Xi Jinping's global Belt and Road Initiative.

The Pakistani government has declared a three-day public holiday in Islamabad and the adjoining garrison city of Rawalpindi. Schools and businesses are closed, and troops and paramilitary forces have been deployed to ensure "foolproof security arrangements" for Li's visit and the two-day SCO summit starting Tuesday.

After holding delegation-level talks, Li and Sharif virtually inaugurated the CPEC-built international airport in Gwadar, a coastal city housing a Chinese-controlled deep-water port on the Arabian Sea.

"Under the strategic guidance of President Xi Jinping and the Pakistani leadership, our all-weather strategic cooperative partnership is constantly deepening. What we have is a unique and unbreakable iron-clad friendship that has stood the test of a changing international landscape," Li stated while addressing the ceremony broadcast live.

In his brief speech, Sharif thanked the Chinese premier for building the airport as a gift to Pakistan. "I want to assure you that I will work with you very closely ... to promote peace and security for the people of China in Pakistan," he added.

Neither side has commented on the reason for the virtual inauguration, but diplomatic sources cited heightened security concerns, particularly following the Karachi attack.

Li is the first Chinese premier to visit Islamabad in 11 years. The Sharif administration said the visit will help advance the development of CPEC and facilitate Chinese business expansion in the South Asian nation.

China has invested nearly $25 billion over the past decade under CPEC, building large-scale infrastructure development projects in Pakistan such as roads, highways, power plants, the Gwadar seaport and the airport.

However, critics are skeptical about whether China would be keen to expand its business investments under CPEC, citing growing security threats to Chinese workers in Pakistan, among other challenges.

Militant attacks have killed at least 21 Chinese nationals since 2017. Last week's Karachi suicide bombing of Chinese engineers associated with a CPEC power plant prompted Beijing to ask its citizens not to visit Balochistan and the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province. Both sit on Pakistan's border with Afghanistan and witness almost daily insurgent attacks.

On Monday, at least four police officers were killed when Islamist insurgents stormed a district police headquarters in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. Authorities said that all five assailants were also killed in the ensuing exchange of fire.

Turning point

Mushahid Hussain, a former senator and head of the Islamabad-based Pakistan-China Institute, cautioned that the latest deadly attack on Chinese nationals was a severe blow and could be a "turning point" for the "strategic partnership" between the two countries.

"China has huge investments in strife-torn Nigeria and Congo, but never have we witnessed ... murders of Chinese engineers and technicians ... as we see these recurring in Pakistan," Hussain noted.

Hussain described the Karachi attack as a "blatant breach of security" and echoed Chinese calls for Pakistani authorities to bring the perpetrators to justice urgently.

"China, our best friend, has been badly let down with their confidence shaken" despite Islamabad promising "foolproof security" for its Chinese guests, he stated.

Separatist militant group the Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) claimed responsibility for the October 6 attack in Karachi, the capital of the southern Sindh province. The group has been waging deadly attacks in Balochistan, accusing China of helping Pakistan to exploit the region's natural resources, charges both countries reject as unfounded.

Information Minister Attaullah Tarar told reporters Monday that their government was doing all it could to ensure the security of the Chinese nationals in Pakistan. He stated that recent attacks on Chinese workers, including the Karachi bombing, "are being probed, and the prime minister is personally looking into it." In their post-attack meetings with Pakistani counterparts, Chinese officials appeared "furious" and pressed the host nation to "severely punish" the perpetrators and urgently enhance the security of Chinese nationals and projects, according to diplomatic sources privy to the discussions.

Husnain Javed, a Beijing-based Pakistani researcher, told VOA that CPEC-related debt and capacity payments for Chinese-built coal-fired power plants are the main hurdles in moving the project forward.

"Pakistan is looking to defer these payments for a period of 3 years with interest and penalty amount [growing]. ... We are far from CPEC phase 2," he stated in written comments.

Javed noted that growing security concerns for thousands of Chinese workers in Pakistan have added to the bilateral project challenges.

"The recent attack, I think, is the final nail in the CPEC coffin, as it heavily damaged the trust between the two countries. ... It's important to consider that these were no ordinary engineers," the researcher noted.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry said last week that a high-level team was sent to Islamabad after the attack. It "asked the Pakistani side to properly handle ensuing matters ... conduct thorough investigations, bring all the perpetrators to justice, and step up security measures to ensure the safety and security of Chinese personnel, institutions and projects."

China to work with Pakistan to protect Chinese personnel following attack

10 October 2024, Reuters

China said on Thursday it would work with Pakistan to protect the safety and security of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions in Pakistan, following the killing of two Chinese engineers claimed by a separatist militant group on Sunday.

Mao Ning, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson, said she was not aware of reports that Pakistani authorities are seeking to curb movements of Chinese citizens during the Shanghai Cooperation Organization meeting next week because of a security risk from militant groups targeting them.

China's security agency vows to boost intelligence sharing after deadly attack in Pakistan

09 October 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

Ministry of State Security says Chinese bodies will 'guard against the infiltration of extremist violent ideologies'

China's top anti-espionage agency, the Ministry of State Security (MSS), has pledged to step up early warning and anti-terrorism intelligence cooperation following a deadly attack against Chinese nationals in Pakistan at the weekend.

In an editorial published on Wednesday, the ministry emphasised that combating terrorism was a "shared responsibility of the international community and a pressing priority".

Pakistan has been plagued by terrorism and has faced frequent attacks that threaten public safety and regional stability, according to the article.

It said the MSS firmly opposed all forms of terrorism and was committed to supporting Pakistan's counterterrorism efforts while working to thwart attempts to undermine relations between the two countries.

China's national security agencies would "adopt stricter measures and means to legally combat violent and terrorist activities, prevent foreign terrorist activities from extending into domestic territory and guard against the infiltration of extremist violent ideologies into the country," the MSS said.

"In regions concentrated with overseas interests, efforts will be made to enhance early warning systems for terrorist attack risks, strengthen emergency response to sudden incidents, and effectively protect the safety of overseas citizens, organisations and projects."

It said China would adopt a "multifaceted" approach to counterterrorism, and deepen international cooperation against terrorism, improve mechanisms for anti-terrorism intelligence sharing, financial regulation, law enforcement cooperation and judicial assistance.

The statement came three days after a deadly attack was launched against Chinese nationals in Karachi by the separatist group, Baloch Liberation Army (BLA).

The attack, involving a vehicle-borne improvised explosive device, claimed the lives of two Chinese nationals and injured several others near Jinnah International Airport on Sunday night.

The Chinese government expressed "shock" and condemned the attack, urging Pakistan to enhance security measures and investigate thoroughly to ensure accountability.

Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif said there would be a thorough investigation to apprehend those responsible, reaffirming Pakistan's commitment to protect Chinese nationals and infrastructure projects.

In a meeting on Tuesday with Liu Jinsong, head of the Asian affairs department at the Chinese foreign ministry, Khalil Hashmi, Pakistani ambassador to China, said his side would make every effort to improve security measures, enhance anti-terrorism cooperation with the Chinese side and strengthen the protection of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions in Pakistan.

The incident has reignited concerns about the safety of the US$65 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a flagship initiative under China's Belt and Road Initiative aimed at enhancing connectivity between China and the Arabian Sea.

However, Pakistan is grappling with an increasingly unstable security environment, particularly in its Balochistan and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa provinces.

In a statement on Monday, the Chinese embassy in Pakistan advised Chinese citizens to avoid travelling to Balochistan – a resource-rich region and crucial site for CPEC infrastructure developments – and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, which have seen a surge in attacks targeting Chinese personnel and projects.

The BLA has in recent years intensified its assaults on projects associated with China, including launching a lethal attack on the Chinese consulate in Karachi in 2018 and multiple suicide bombings. The militant group claims Beijing is taking advantage of local resources in partnership with the Pakistani government.

The latest attack came just days before the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit is to be held in Islamabad.

Recent meetings among members of the security bloc have focused on strengthening regional security mechanisms to address mutual concerns.

In May, China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi highlighted the necessity of joint operations and intelligence exchanges to combat the rising tide of “three forces of evil” – terrorism, separatism and religious extremism.

China calls on Pakistan to ‘severely punish’ attackers after 2 Chinese die in Karachi

07 October 2024, SCMP, Meredith Chen

Baloch Liberation Army finds targeting Chinese interests ‘a useful tool’ in its separatist campaign, says academic

The Chinese embassy in Pakistan has called on Islamabad to punish those responsible for a deadly attack on Chinese nationals near Jinnah International Airport in the southern city of Karachi on Sunday night.

At least two Chinese were killed and one Chinese and several Pakistanis were wounded on Monday morning.

China’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs said on Monday night that Beijing was “shocked” by the event.

“The Chinese side strongly condemns the attack and offers deep condolences for the victims,” it said.

“China calls on the Pakistan side to plug security loopholes and take specific action to protect the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor and Chinese nationals ... in Pakistan.”

It added that China was willing to work with Pakistan to quash any attempt to undermine relations between the two countries.

The Chinese embassy said that around 11pm on Sunday a “terrorist attack” was launched on vehicles of a China-funded electric power company.

The regional government of southern Sindh province said on X that a tanker had exploded on the airport motorway. Pakistani broadcaster Geo News said at least 10 people were hurt in the blast.

The company employing the attacked workers is involved in the Pakistan Port Qasim Power Project, around 37km (20 miles) southeast of Karachi.

The project is part of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, a flagship project under Beijing’s multibillion-dollar Belt and Road Initiative.

Separatist militant group Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) said it carried out the attack using a vehicle-borne improvised explosive device targeting “a high-level convoy of Chinese engineers and investors”.

The Chinese embassy demanded Islamabad “conduct a thorough investigation of the attack, and severely punish the perpetrators”.

“The Chinese embassy and consulates general in Pakistan strongly condemn this act of terrorism, express deep condolences for the victims from both countries, and extend sincere sympathies to the injured and their families,” it said, adding that the Chinese side had been working with Pakistani authorities in the aftermath.

In a post on X on Monday, Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif said he was “deeply shocked and saddened by last night’s tragic incident” and “strongly [condemns] this heinous act”.

“The perpetrators of this dastardly incident cannot be Pakistanis but are sworn enemies of Pakistan,” he said, adding that an investigation was under way to “identify them and bring them to justice”.

Other parts of the CPEC have also been attacked this year, targeting Chinese nationals and China-affiliated projects in the South Asian country.

In March, a suicide bomber rammed a vehicle into a convoy of Chinese engineers working on a dam in northwest Pakistan’s Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province, killing five Chinese. Pakistan’s military claimed the assault was planned in neighbouring Afghanistan.

Before that, a naval airbase and a strategic port in the southwestern province of Balochistan, where China has invested billions in infrastructure projects, were attacked.

The BLA seeks independence for Balochistan, the province bordering Afghanistan and Iran. In August, it launched coordinated attacks there, killing more than 70 people.

The group specifically targets Chinese interests, particularly in the strategic port of Gwadar on the Arabian Sea, accusing Beijing of aiding Islamabad in exploiting the province. It has previously killed Chinese citizens working in the region and attacked Beijing’s consulate in Karachi.

According to Lin Minwang, deputy director of Fudan University’s Centre for South Asian Studies, the violence against Chinese interests is not likely to be resolved if China maintains a strict non-intervention policy, because Pakistan does not have the capacity to eradicate the terrorist groups.

“China has been caught in the conflict between Islamabad and the separatist militants, and targeting Chinese interests has become a useful tool for the BLA,” he said.

Lin said the issue had persisted for around two decades, with the number of attacks surging after the economic corridor was established and the China factor “grew increasingly important in Pakistan’s internal politics”.

The withdrawal of US troops from neighbouring Afghanistan, where they had conducted counterterrorism measures, also contributed to the increase in attacks, he said.

Lin said any intervention by China would test its military abilities abroad and depend on Islamabad’s willingness, which appeared to be lacking.

“With no party prepared, this situation is likely to persist” even though economic ties between the two countries appeared likely to stay strong

China sends 27 military aircraft, six naval vessels towards Taiwan

07 October 2024, India Narrative

Taiwan's Ministry of National Defence (MND) said that 27 Chinese military aircraft and six naval vessels were detected operating around Taiwan from 6 am (local time) on Sunday to 6 am (local time) on Monday.

According to Taiwan's MND, 19 of the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) aircraft crossed the Taiwan Strait median line in the country's northern, central, southwestern, and eastern Air Defence Identification Zone (ADIZ).

In a post on X, Taiwan MND stated, "27 PLA aircraft and 6 PLAN vessels operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today. 19 of the aircraft crossed the median line and entered Taiwan's northern, central, and southwestern ADIZ. We have monitored the situation and responded accordingly."

This latest Chinese military activity adds to a series of similar provocations by Beijing in recent months.

On Sunday, the Taiwanese MND said that four Chinese military aircraft and six naval vessels were detected operating around Taiwan from 6 am (local time) on Saturday to 6 am (local time) on Sunday.

Two of the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) aircraft crossed the Taiwan Strait median line in the country's northern, central, southwestern, and eastern Air Defence Identification Zone (ADIZ), the statement added.

In a post on X, Taiwan MND stated, "4 PLA aircraft and 6 PLAN vessels operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today. 2 of the aircraft crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait. We have monitored the situation and responded accordingly."

'Terrorist attack' near Karachi airport kills two Chinese nationals, embassy says

07 October 2024, Reuters

Two Chinese nationals were killed in an explosion near the international airport of the southern Pakistani city of Karachi on Sunday night, the Chinese embassy in Pakistan said, in what it described as a "terrorist attack".

In a statement emailed to journalists, separatist militant group Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) claimed the explosion was an attack carried out by them using a vehicle-borne improvised explosive device targeting Chinese nationals, including engineers.

The Chinese embassy said a convoy from the Port Qasim Electric Power Company was attacked near the airport.

"The Chinese Embassy and Consulates General in Pakistan strongly condemn this terrorist attack, express deep condolences to the innocent victims of both countries and sincere sympathies to the injured and (their) families," the statement said, adding the Chinese side has been working with Pakistani authorities in the aftermath.

Pakistan's Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif said a Chinese national was also injured and that an investigation was underway.

"Pakistan stands committed to safeguarding our Chinese friends," he said in a statement on social media platform X. "We will leave no stone unturned to ensure their security and well-being."

Pakistan is preparing to host the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit in the capital Islamabad, which was roiled by protests and clashes this weekend between police and supporters of jailed former Prime Minister Imran Khan.

High-level Chinese representation and the first visit by an Indian foreign minister in a decade are expected at the summit next week, which authorities have vowed to secure.

Pakistan broadcaster Geo News reported at least 10 people were injured in Sunday's blast in addition to the fatalities. Karachi police did not immediately respond to request for comment.

The BLA seeks independence for the province of Balochistan, located in Pakistan's southwest and bordering on Afghanistan and Iran. In August, it launched coordinated attacks in the province, in which more than 70 people were killed.

BLA specifically targets Chinese interests - in particular the strategic port of Gwadar on the Arabian Sea, accusing Beijing of helping Islamabad exploit the province. It has previously killed Chinese citizens working in the region and attacked Beijing's consulate in Karachi.

Security issues have affected China's billions of planned investments, including under China-Pakistan Economic Corridor which is part of President Xi Jinping's Belt and Road.

In March, a suicide bomber killed five Chinese engineers working on a hydropower project in northern Pakistan. Authorities arrested militants they said were associated with the Pakistani Taliban, though that group denied being behind the attack.

Chinese modernization serves as model for Pakistan to promote economic development: Pakistani PM

05 October 2024, Global Times

The unique Chinese modernization serves as a model for Pakistan to promote economic development, Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif has said, extending congratulations on the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China.

China has made remarkable achievements, and Pakistan desired to revamp its economy by emulating China's path of progress, which offers new opportunities for countries around the world, including Pakistan, Sharif said in an interview with Chinese media.

China believed in inclusiveness and multilateralism, a recipe for enhanced peaceful global interaction, bringing more understanding between various nations with enhanced economic cooperation, trade, investment and people-to-people exchanges, the prime minister said.

He said that 14 Palestinian factions have lately held a reconciliation dialogue in Beijing under the mediation of China, a testimony to China's positive role in promoting regional and world peace and development.

Speaking highly of Pakistan-China time-tested friendship, Sharif said that the friendship, based on mutual trust and respect, is exemplary in the world.

The two countries have always supported each other and have worked closely on the international stage to jointly strengthen the forces that promote regional and world peace as well as stability, he said.

Talking about the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a flagship project of the China-proposed Belt and Road Initiative, the prime minister said that the project promotes socio-economic development of Pakistan.

Launched in 2013, the CPEC is a corridor linking the Gwadar Port in southwest Pakistan's Balochistan province with Kashgar in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, which highlights energy, transport, and industrial cooperation in the first phase.

Issues of road connectivity and electricity that greatly hindered Pakistan's economy in the past were resolved in the first phase, Sharif said, noting the CPEC has successfully entered a new phase of high-quality development, which focuses more on strengthening cooperation with China in such fields as agriculture, information technology and mining.

The prime minister underscored that Pakistan and China would continue to work together to further enhance economic cooperation and lift their unshakable and unique friendship to new heights.

Pakistan approves ₹45 billion for armed forces to protect Chinese interests

04 October 2024, CNBC

The Pakistan government decided to provide an additional ₹45 billion budget for the armed forces mainly to strengthen their capacity to protect Chinese commercial interests in the cash-strapped country and manage the fencing along international borders.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

The decision was taken in the meeting of the Economic Coordination Committee (ECC) of the cabinet on Thursday, which was chaired by Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb, reported The Express Tribune.

The paper said that out of the ₹45 billion, an amount of ₹35.4 billion will be given to the military and ₹9.5 billion to the navy for various purposes.

The ECC considered and approved a proposal submitted by the Defence Division for a technical supplementary grant of ₹45 billion for the already approved projects of defence services during the current fiscal year.

It is the second major supplementary grant approved for the armed forces after the approval of the budget in June. Earlier, the ECC gave ₹60 billion for Operation Azm-e-Istehkam. These supplementary grants are over and above the ₹2.127 trillion defence budget.

Due to the increasing number of terror attacks, China has demanded the signing of an agreement on anti-terrorism cooperation to address its security concerns.

China has also proposed the establishment of a joint company to ensure the security of its citizens already working in Pakistan or will be engaged during the CPEC phase II.

Under phase I, both sides have completed 38 projects worth $25.2 billion. Of these, 17 projects valued at $18 billion were completed in the energy sector, according to the paper.

About 26 projects worth $26.8 billion are in the pipeline and many of those have been included in CPEC phase II. However, the security concerns have slowed down work on these projects.

China has also proposed that a vehicle-mounted mobile securing equipment project should be included in phase II besides undertaking a project on ballistic protective vehicles, the paper reported.

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) is a major infrastructure project in Pakistan, launched in 2015 as part of China's Belt and Road Initiative.

It aims to enhance economic connectivity between China and Pakistan by developing a network of roads, railways, pipelines and energy projects.

Chinese investment plays instrumental role in stabilizing Pakistan's economy: minister

03 October 2024, People's Daily Online

Pakistan's Minister for Planning Development and Special Initiatives Ahsan Iqbal said on Wednesday that Chinese investment and financial assistance have played an instrumental role in stabilizing Pakistan's economy during challenging times, the ministry said in a statement.

Chairing a meeting here with senior government officials on enhancing cross-sectoral cooperation and formulating a comprehensive action plan to boost economic ties with China, Iqbal reiterated Pakistan's commitment to strengthening collaboration across various sectors.

Chinese projects under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) are a shining example of a shared vision for growth and modernization between the two countries, the statement quoted Iqbal as saying. Launched in 2013, CPEC, a flagship project of the China-proposed Belt and Road Initiative, is a corridor linking the Gwadar Port in southwest Pakistan's Balochistan province with Kashgar in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, which highlights energy, transport, and industrial cooperation in the first phase, while in the new phase expands to fields of agriculture and livelihood, among others.

The minister also highlighted the essential role of all ministries in the successful implementation of CPEC, emphasizing that collaboration across government sectors is crucial to unlocking the full potential of the initiative.

Iqbal stressed the importance of interaction with the Chinese private sector to showcase Pakistan's potential as a prime destination for advanced business-to-business investments, the statement said.

The minister also underscored the urgency of achieving substantive advancements in priority sectors such as infrastructure development, road connectivity, information technology, agriculture, industrial cooperation, education, healthcare, water resources, energy, and artificial intelligence.

Pakistan prepares over 70 projects for China's cooperation in CPEC phase II

23 September 2024, Profit

Infrastructure, energy, and digital economy top the agenda in expanded China-Pakistan partnership .

Pakistan has finalized a list of over 70 projects for potential collaboration with China under the second phase of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

These projects, covering various sectors such as infrastructure, energy, trade, and technology, will be presented to the Chinese Prime Minister next month, according to sources from the Ministry of Planning, Development, and Special Initiatives.

According to a media report, the Ministry highlighted that while CPEC's first phase has concluded successfully, the second phase aims to deepen cooperation between the two countries.

To advance CPEC's scope, Pakistan and China have agreed to focus on five new development corridors: growth, innovation, green development, livelihood improvement, and regional connectivity. These corridors are designed to broaden the scope of CPEC, making it more comprehensive and inclusive.

During his recent visit to China, the Minister for Planning, Development, and Special Initiatives Ahsan Iqbal held discussions with the Vice Chairman of the National Development and Reforms Commission (NDRC). The meeting resulted in an agreement to hold a high-level workshop aimed at aligning Pakistan's 5Es framework with the proposed five corridors and the eight-point agenda of President Xi Jinping's Belt and Road Initiative.

Among the key projects identified for collaboration are the follow-up technical support for the New Gwadar International Airport project, the second phase of the East Bay Expressway, and the realignment of the Karakoram Highway (Raikot-Thakot section).

The government is also keen on advancing the Main Line 1 (ML-1) railway project and the Karachi Circular Railway (KCR), both of which are seen as critical to boosting Pakistan's infrastructure.

Additionally, energy-related projects such as the GEIP LNG terminal and the upgrading and expansion of the National Refinery have been included in the proposed plans.

Pakistan is also looking to develop the Suki Kinari Hydropower Station and the Siyadik Copper Project, showcasing its focus on expanding the country's energy and mineral resources.

On the industrial front, projects like the Dhabeji Special Economic Zone and the Rashakai Industrial Park Project are being proposed to strengthen economic cooperation between the two nations.

The Omara Port ship repair project and agricultural initiatives, such as the buffalo breeding and dairy processing project, are also part of the wider cooperation framework.

In the fields of science and technology, Pakistan is seeking China's help in constructing the China-Pakistan Earth Science Research Centre and promoting the participation of five Pakistani universities in the China-Pakistan Belt and Road joint labs for disaster prevention.

Livelihood initiatives also feature prominently, with plans for a vocational and technical exchange program, the joint agricultural technology laboratory, and assistance for repairing flood-affected houses in Pakistan. These projects aim to uplift communities while addressing critical climate change challenges.

The digital economy is another major focus, with Pakistan looking to partner with Chinese firms to develop digital infrastructure, enhance cooperation in software, cloud computing, and big data, and promote exchanges in network security.

The list of projects reflects Pakistan's efforts to further strengthen its economic ties with China, building on the success of the first phase of CPEC. The proposed projects are expected to bolster Pakistan's infrastructure, energy resources, industrial development, and digital transformation, while also enhancing regional connectivity and promoting sustainable development.

China emerges as stabilizing force in global affairs under CPC leadership: Pakistani president

22 September 2024, People's Daily Online

China, under the leadership of the Communist Party of China (CPC), has emerged as a stabilizing force in global affairs, bolstering the global economy and showing tremendous progress in the fields of science, innovation and technology, Pakistani President Asif Ali Zardari said on Thursday at a ceremony celebrating the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China.

China is poised to achieve significant milestones in the coming decades, which would not only bolster its development but also reshape the global landscape in politics, economics and culture, Zardari said.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif said that the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) has helped Pakistan to transform its economy as the first phase of the project brought socio-economic benefits to the people.

"We are entering into the second phase of CPEC, which has huge potential for cooperation in agriculture, information technology, mines and minerals, and many other important areas of mutual interests," the prime minister said.

Speaking at the event, Chinese Ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong said that China and Pakistan would further accelerate the construction of a closer China-Pakistan community of shared future in the new era, bringing more welfare to the peoples of the two countries and making greater contributions to the modernization of the world.

Pakistan's potential Brics entry seen as benefiting China at India's expense

22 September 2024, SCMP, Junaid Kathju

Russia's support for Pakistan's bid to join 'China-centric' Brics could further enhance Beijing's clout in the bloc, analysts say

Russia's backing of Pakistan's entry into Brics has sparked a debate over India's stance on the matter, with analysts suggesting the inclusion could enhance China's influence within the bloc at New Delhi's expense.

Last week, Russia said it would support Pakistan's bid to join Brics – an intergovernmental organisation aimed at counterbalancing Western-dominated institutions – with both countries agreeing to boost trade and cultural ties.

"We are glad that Pakistan has applied ... We will support this," Russian Deputy Prime Minister Alexei Overchuk said at a press conference in Islamabad on Wednesday following talks with Pakistani Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar.

Abhishek Sharma, a research assistant in the strategic studies programme at Observer Research Foundation, a Delhi-based think tank, said it was unlikely that India would support further expansion of Brics in the coming years.

"Even if the next tranche of membership happens down the line, it will be difficult for Pakistan to qualify for membership given the stringent criteria, procedures and rules that it is likely to have to qualify for," Sharma said, adding any new Brics member should have friendly relations with all existing members or substantial trade with member states.

"India sees the current Brics as a brand that represents the concerns of the developing world and the exemplifier of the multilateral order," he said. "With Pakistan's inclusion, if it happens, China's position will further consolidate, weakening India's standing in the group. This will erode the true characteristics of Brics."

Brics was formed in 2006 with Brazil, Russia, India and China as its founding members. South Africa joined in 2010 while Egypt, Iran, the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia and Ethiopia were granted full membership on January 1.

In November 2023, Pakistan submitted a request to join Brics this year. If successful, China might use Pakistan's entry to further Beijing's interests, Sharma said.

"India started its diplomatic initiatives such as the Global South Summit and got support for its cause from Western countries like the US, Italy and Germany, and groupings like the EU and G7, unlike China," Sharma said.

"Therefore, China sees India as a growing competitor in this space. Hence, with Pakistan's inclusion, China will try to block India's positions as a proponent of Global South interests," he added.

Saheli Chattaraj, an assistant professor of Chinese studies at Somaiya Vidyavihar University, said China started the process of expanding Brics when it served as the bloc's chair in 2022, a move supported by Russia.

"This move might have many implications. Brics as a grouping has often been a China-centric group, often primarily pursuing anti-US agendas," Chattaraj said.

"Russia's support for Pakistan to enter Brics means Pakistan would be a part of one of the greatest emerging economic cooperation groupings, which implies that China would also have more leverage to push its agendas within the grouping with one extra member's support," she added.

Russia will hold the Brics summit in Kazan from October 22 to 24. With the country holding the Brics presidency this year, Moscow would focus on furthering the bloc's partnerships in politics and security, the economy and finance, and cultural and humanitarian ties, Russian presidential aide Yury Ushakov told state news agency TASS in March.

As of 2023, the original five Brics countries represent 40 per cent of the world's population and 31.5 per cent of global gross domestic product, surpassing the G7 nations' 30.7 per cent share, according to a report published in March last year by the news analysis website countercurrents.org, citing data from the macroeconomic research company Acorn Macro Consulting.

Under Brics rules, leaders of the founding countries will decide on new membership applications after full consultation and consensus.

If India were to object to Pakistan's application, it was hard to see how the rules could be circumvented, said Antoine Levesques, a Research Fellow for South and Central Asian Defence, Strategy and Diplomacy at the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS). The pace of Islamabad's membership could be "slow and conditional", Levesques told This Week in Asia.

Pakistan had an interest in seeking closer ties with Russia and China, the latter of which was already one of its top trading partners even as it sought more engagement with the US, Levesques said.

In comparison, Brics was not a high priority for India with its activities in the bloc calibrated accordingly to accommodate its goals, he added.

"India will have by now well factored into its policy planning Pakistan's nearly year-old request for Brics admittance. Russia's DPM Overchuk's support to Pakistan, tempered by a clear reference to consensus, does not effectively leave India more exposed than a week ago," he said.

A key factor that would shape India's decision on the matter is its growing misgivings at being seen as supporting any initiatives linked to China's interests within Brics, according to Levesques.

"It is doubtful that India would seek to wholly support an initiative pleasing Moscow, which would enhance Beijing's standing and ... placing Moscow in an increasingly junior position to Beijing," he said.

Pakistan's Brics membership would therefore be seen as being counterproductive and self-defeating for India, Levesques added.

Brics' expansion momentum

More than 40 countries, including Iran, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Argentina, Algeria, Bolivia, Indonesia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Cuba, Democratic Republic of Congo, Comoros, Gabon and Kazakhstan have expressed interest in joining Brics, according to the bloc's 2023 summit chair South Africa.

Noting the reality of Brics expansion, former Indian diplomat Anil Trigunayat said China would push for Pakistan's inclusion, just as it has done for Islamabad's membership in the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation.

Delhi's reaction to Pakistan's potential inclusion depends on how Islamabad would address cross-border terrorism targeting India, according to Trigunayat.

Levesques suggested that India might sense an opportunity to allow Pakistan's admission to Brics as a step towards rebuilding their strained ties.

Walter Ladwig, a senior international relations lecturer at King's College London, said there was an emerging battle between India and China on the future direction of Brics, whether it should be a vehicle for advocating on behalf of the Global South or a means of pursuing anti-US agendas.

It would appear that Russia was showing less regard for Indian interests within the bloc regarding Pakistan's potential inclusion, he said.

"Pakistan's inclusion supported by Russia would seem to bolster China's vision ... you could not think of a better move than including Pakistan alongside India."

Pakistan set to strengthen counter-terrorism collaboration with China

21 September 2024, Geo News

Both sides agree to conduct joint police and paramilitary forces exercises in Gilgit-Baltistan or Xinjiang

Pakistan and China have agreed to strengthen strategic cooperation in key areas, including counter-terrorism efforts, cross-border cooperation, and measures to combat smuggling.

The agreement was reached during a meeting between Interior Minister Mohsin Naqvi and a high-level Chinese delegation led by the Minister for Political and Legal Affairs, Chen Mingguo, in Islamabad.

The Chinese delegation included Xinjiang's Deputy Secretary of the Committee of Parliamentary and Legal Affairs, the Executive Director General of Police, and the Vice President of the Xinjiang Police Academy.

During the meeting, both sides agreed to conduct joint police and paramilitary exercises in Gilgit-Baltistan or Xinjiang, with GB police officers set to train at the Xinjiang Police Academy.

In this regard, a Pakistani delegation, led by the Federal Secretary of Interior, will soon visit Xinjiang to enhance cooperation.

It was also agreed that comprehensive measures would be taken against terrorism, which is a global issue. Speaking on the occasion, Naqvi said that Xinjiang province is of vital importance for Pakistan in its relations with China.

He underscored that, besides being Pakistan's neighbour, Pakistan shares a 600-kilometre-long border with Xinjiang. "The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) project also passes through Xinjiang and Islamabad aims to eliminate the smuggling of drugs, arms, and other goods," Naqvi said.

He noted that the visit of the Pakistani delegation to Xinjiang would open new avenues for strengthening cooperation. For his part, Minister Mingguo expressed a desire to enhance relations with Pakistan in all fields.

"Terrorism is a common problem and Xinjiang has suffered from it for many years," said Mingguo, highlighting that Pakistan could benefit from Xinjiang's counter-terrorism experience.

In March this year, at least six people, including five Chinese nationals, were killed after a suicide bomber rammed into a bus transporting staff working on the Dasu hydropower project in Bisham, Shangla district. The Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Counter-Terrorism Department (CTD) found Tehreek-e-Taliban Pakistan (TTP) responsible for the attack and arrested four key terrorists.

This was the second attack in the last three years on Chinese engineers working in the area. In July 2021, 13 people, including 9 Chinese nationals, two Frontier Constabulary personnel, and two locals, were killed when their coach was bombed in the Dasu area of Kohistan.

Chinese military officials vow 'unfettered commitment' to Pakistan in meeting with top general

16 September 2024, Arab News

Two top Chinese military officials highlighted their country's "unfettered commitment" to standing in solidarity with Pakistan, the Inter-Services Public Relations (ISPR) said on Saturday, as they met with Chairman Joint Chiefs of Staff Committee General Sahir Shamshad Mirza during his visit to Beijing.

China and Pakistan's strategic partnership, rooted in decades of close ties, has expanded beyond defense cooperation to encompass infrastructure development and regional connectivity. Through projects like the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), the administration in Beijing has bolstered Pakistan's economy by billions of dollars of investment.

Simultaneously, Pakistan remains firmly committed to the One-China policy, underscoring its support to Beijing on key issues like Taiwan and Tibet, while China continues to deepen its defense ties with Pakistan, to serve mutual security interests.

"General Sahir Shamshad Mirza ... on an official visit to [the] People's Republic of China held separate meetings with General He Weidong, Vice Chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), and General Liu Zhenli, Chief of CMC Joint Staff Department, and delivered a talk in 11th Beijing Xiangshan Forum on the Role of Pakistan toward regional peace and stability," the ISPR said.

It informed that both sides appreciated the deep and historic relationship between Pakistan and China in multiple domains and acknowledged progress related to bilateral strategic and defense cooperation.

"The Chinese leadership ... reaffirmed their unfettered commitment to support Pakistan on its territorial integrity and sovereignty," the ISPR added. Just a day ago, the Pakistani general told a major forum in Beijing that CPEC was not just beneficial for his country's economy but also a "stabilizing force" for South Asia.

He also maintained that the strategic cooperation between the two countries was "a cornerstone for peace and stability" for a region fraught with security challenges.

Pakistan and China pursue corridor dream, despite risks

13 September 2024, Dialogue, Atika Rehman

Recent attacks in Balochistan highlight security challenges for the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, but both countries remain committed

More than 50 people were killed in late August during multiple attacks in Pakistan's impoverished southwestern province of Balochistan. Despite extensive infrastructure investments made in the region, mostly through the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a decades-long insurgency has only intensified, raising concerns about the sustainability of ongoing and future investments.

The attacks in Balochistan follow a similar pattern. Separatist militant groups, such as the banned Balochistan Liberation Army (BLA) and Balochistan Liberation Front (BLF), have long targeted Pakistani security forces and Chinese nationals, accusing them of exploiting the province's resources. In Gwadar, home to the port often hailed as the crown jewel of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), resentment is growing among local communities, particularly fishermen, who have protested against the construction and the lack of basic amenities like water and electricity in their city.

Despite these challenges, there is little evidence that either Pakistan or China will abandon CPEC, with policymakers from both countries continuing to tout it as a "game-changer". However, the reality on the ground is one that falls short of the lofty claims promoted by officials. Although some energy and infrastructure projects have been completed, CPEC is hardly the vibrant trade route it was billed to be.

Energy projects hit roadblocks

A key issue remains energy. Last year, Pakistan experienced an enormous blackout, a symptom of its creaky infrastructure and decades of underinvestment. Many of the CPEC energy projects, such as the Suki Kinari hydropower project and a coal power plant in Thar, were designed to address chronic energy shortages. Yet, according to Haneesha Issad, an energy finance specialist at the Institute for Energy Economics and Financial Analysis (IEEFA), the issues run far deeper than simply building more plants.

"The government currently owes Chinese IPPs capacity payments to the tune of a billion dollars," Issad told Dialogue Earth. "Any investor owed such a huge sum would be wary of further investments after this." She added: "There is also the issue of surplus capacity on the national grid and a shrinking consumer demand amidst slow economic and industrial growth. With the grid's inability to absorb any new power projects, there aren't many avenues for new investment opportunities opening up. From the Pakistan government's end, it doesn't have any more fiscal space to bring on any imported fuel-based new capacity, at least not on the traditional 'take or pay', fixed-price contractual model."

Given these constraints, Issad argues that "any new contracts on the same model will not be feasible for both sides."

CPEC: A multi-billion project in a struggling province
Perhaps more importantly, CPEC projects have yet to deliver meaningful benefits to the people of Balochistan, a province that makes up 44% of Pakistan's land mass. According to the UNDP, Balochistan has the second highest headcount for multi-dimensional poverty out of all the provinces at 71.2%. It also has the lowest literacy rate in the country, especially among women.

Two energy projects under CPEC are located in Balochistan; both are troubled. The first, a 300 MW imported coal power project in Gwadar has yet to be built and there is speculation the project will be shelved due to financing challenges. Meanwhile, the China Power Hub Generation Company's 1,320MW coal-fired plant at Hub, has faced frequent liquidity problems, shattering investor confidence and leading to appeals for intervention from the Chinese ambassador to the prime minister.

Of the two road projects in Balochistan, the Khuzdar-Basima road has been built, but the second road from DI Khan to Zhob is not yet complete.

The BRI's flagship project, the Gwadar port, is operational but has, thus far, failed to attract significant economic activity. It remains far from the bustling transshipment hub officials envisioned would "connect South Asia to the world". Gwadar Airport, though reportedly complete, has yet to be inaugurated due to persistent security threats.

'We don't let saboteurs sabotage it'

Over the years, militant groups have frequently threatened China against pursuing its development objects in the region via video messages. These groups have carried out numerous attacks, including assaults on Chinese engineers, an attack on the Chinese consulate in Karachi and the killing of three Chinese teachers.

In response, both Pakistan and China have reaffirmed their commitment to counter-terrorism and continued development. Pakistan's defence minister, Khawaja Muhammad Asif, told Dialogue Earth: "The Chinese are invested and will not desert us. Of course, they have security concerns — it's not just financial for them, it also involves Chinese workers on the ground. From Khunjerab to Gwadar, Chinese workers are present, making it a serious matter."

Ahsan Iqbal, Pakistan's minister for planning and development, expressed a similar sentiment, adding: "The Chinese understand that these incidents are isolated and they know that the forces behind them are trying to disrupt CPEC. We won't let saboteurs succeed."

Nonetheless, the persistent militant attacks have added pressure on CPEC projects, according to security expert Amir Rana. He pointed out that a recent high-level meeting between Pakistan's army chief, the prime minister and Chinese president Xi Jinping featured security as "the foremost topic".

He said: "They returned [from China] and announced 'Azm-e-Istehkam' [a military operation] ostensibly in response to Afghanistan, but it also reflects Chinese interest in making Balochistan safe — where the threat is highest and attacks are frequent."

Rana added that resolving the insurgency in Balochistan and the ensuing militant attacks is far from straightforward: "It's complicated because it's not just a terrorist threat [and has] political elements." On Pakistan's response, he said "the political part of the resolution is missing."

A pivot towards 'Smart CPEC'

China, meanwhile, has adjusted its approach to investment in Pakistan in light of these challenges. Shahid Khaqan Abbasi, former secretary general of the Pakistan Democratic Movement coalition that governed the country from April 2022 to August 2023, noted that China had shifted away from large-scale infrastructure projects with long-term payoffs. "Earlier in the CPEC process there was joint identification, feasibility and due diligence of potential projects and investments. But then the Chinese focus shifted to smaller and sharper interventions with quick returns; which was sometimes referred to as 'smart CPEC', i.e. not large infrastructure projects with long gestation periods, but smaller ones with faster results," he explained.

At the third Belt and Road Forum in October 2023, president Xi placed great emphasis on "small yet smart" projects as part of BRI. These investments, focusing on a thousand small-scale livelihood programmes, aim to address local needs through targeted, manageable projects.

An Islamabad-based politician, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that Chinese business leaders had revealed unofficial instructions from their government to avoid investing in long-term projects. "They've been told to continue investing in Pakistan but to select projects that are near-ready or already operational with revenue streams. The direction changed after the slow pace and poor returns on existing projects," he said.

This pivot reflects a broader reset in China's overseas investment strategy, according to Isabel Hilton, founder of China Dialogue (which became Dialogue Earth in 2024) and visiting professor at King's College London. "Large-scale BRI investments peaked around 2017, as many of the projects became problematic for a number of reasons," she told Dialogue Earth. "Last year, the 10th anniversary of BRI was a relatively subdued affair and today Beijing stresses a different development model – the Global Development Initiative. Chinese banks and government entities have become much more cautious in their lending and finance policies and there is a much greater realisation that due diligence matters in a world of low growth and mounting levels of debt."

China shows interest to invest in Pakistan's diverse sectors

10 September 2024, Radio Pakistan

A high level Chinese business delegation has evinced keen interest for investment in major sectors of Pakistan's economy and relocating Chinese industries here.

The expression was made by the delegation comprising four prominent Chinese business groups during their visit to Special Investment Facilitation Council in Islamabad today.

The delegation was apprised of potential investment opportunities in priority sectors including agriculture, livestock, Information Technology, energy, minerals, tourism and industry.

The delegation was also informed about the policy level measures taken by SIFC to improve the overall business environment in the country and salient features of industrial development in Pakistan.

The visit of the delegation will further stimulate the ongoing engagement between Pakistan and China under the Business to Business framework.

Pakistani scholars hail China's modernization, envision CPEC cooperation

09 September 2024, Xinhua

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) is beneficial for both countries as it creates many trade opportunities and helps Pakistan to speed up the industrialization drive, Nadira Panjwani, chairperson of the Karachi-based Karachi Council on Foreign Relations (KCFR), has said.

Addressing a seminar hosted by KCFR on Friday, the chairperson said the CPEC was a flagship project symbolizing tremendous potentials that exist for trade and regional connectivity.

The expert said friendship between Pakistan and China is unbreakable, adding that as the world undergoes transformative changes and the global geopolitical landscape evolves, the two countries need to strengthen cooperation and strive to build a more interconnected, peaceful and sustainable world.

Talking to Xinhua on the occasion, Habib Paracha, a member of KCFR and a film producer, said that China's modernization shows the world how a populous country alleviated poverty.

"Pakistan should make good use of its resource advantages and learn from China's experience to solve the problem of unbalanced development and gradually move toward modernization," he said.

Paracha said that agricultural cooperation between Pakistan and China should be broader, adding that it would benefit the Pakistani people, and the two countries should continue to strengthen cultural exchanges to promote mutual understanding.

Speaking at the event, Chinese Ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong said that China is willing to strengthen exchanges on state governance with Pakistan and work together to promote the modernization of both countries.

Launched in 2013, the CPEC, a flagship project of the China-proposed Belt and Road Initiative, is a corridor linking Gwadar Port in southwest Pakistan's Balochistan province with Kashgar in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, which highlights energy, transport and industrial cooperation in the first phase, while the new phase expands to agriculture and livelihood, among others.

Pakistan committed to enhancing cooperation with China: foreign office

Pakistan has remained committed to deepening cooperation with China in various sectors, including agriculture, the Pakistani Ministry of Foreign Affairs said on Thursday.

Spokesperson of Pakistan's Foreign Office Mumtaz Zahra Baloch emphasized the robust and multifaceted relationship between the two countries. Baloch said that bilateral cooperation in various sectors, including agriculture, has continued to grow steadily over the years.

"Pakistan and China are all-weather strategic cooperative partners, and our relationship is multifaceted," said the spokesperson.

According to official sources, the Pakistani government is working on training of 1,000 Pakistani agricultural experts in China under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor.

Pakistan resolves IMF issues to unlock $7 billion loan

13 September 2024, The Tribune, Shahbaz Rana

Board scheduled to meet this month, 37-month deal will mark beginning of a new journey.

Pakistan on Thursday announced that it had amicably resolved all outstanding issues with the International Monetary Fund paving the way for the approval of the $7 billion loan this month, as it is also set to further tighten the noose around the necks of existing taxpayers after retreating against the traders.

The government has prepared amendments to deny the existing filers of the income tax returns the right to purchase assets if the value of their declared cash balances and income is less than the cost of the new assets.

The step is being taken after the new Federal Board of Revenue chairman analysed the data of the existing less than six million filers of the income tax returns for the tax year 2024. It turned out that hardly 45,000 Pakistanis out of the six million income tax returns filers were showing annual income of more than Rs10 million.

"Thank God, all issues have amicably been resolved with the IMF and this month the IMF board will give final shape to these issues", said Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb on Thursday.

His statement brings to an end the uncertainty around the approval of the $7 billion Extended Fund Facility that is pending for the final board nod for the past two months.

IMF spokesperson Julie Kozack said in Washington on Thursday that the board is scheduled to meet on September 25 to consider the approval of the $7 billion loan package for three years' term.

Pakistan took longer than the anticipated time in securing rollover of the $16 billion cash deposits and commercial loans and arranging another $2 billion in commercial financing.

The new 37-month IMF deal approval will mark the beginning of a new journey, which will bring more economic difficulties but its implementation can provide stability.

Compliant taxpayers to pay more

The sources said that the government was working on a new piece of legislation to take measures for enhancing the tax collection, which is facing huge shortfalls against the agreed targets with the IMF.

The government believes that the majority of the existing nearly six million filers, mainly business individuals, associations of persons and companies, have under-declared their assets and incomes in the annual statements filed with the FBR, said the tax authorities. It has been decided that the people and the firms, already in the tax net, would be targeted to cough more revenues.

The government's decision to charge higher tax rates on the purchase of assets by non-filers is the core reason for a narrow tax base and low taxpayers by the filers. However, the government is still not willing to abolish this uncalled for category of the non-filers, which encourages people to stay away from the tax net.

The government is considering to amend the Income Tax Ordinance to target the majority of the existing nearly six million income tax return filers by either promulgating an ordinance or introducing a bill in the National Assembly, said the sources.

As per the proposal, despite being filers and taxpayers, individuals and firms having assets not worth buying homes, plots and cars would be denied to purchase these assets, said the sources. They would also be denied the right to withdraw their cash balances from the banks, if their aggregate cash withdrawals are less than the amounts shown in their tax returns.

The FBR has proposed to implement these new stringent legal measures with effect from October 1, according to the government sources.

The government officials said that the FBR would give access to the information of the existing taxpayers to the government departments and the commercial banks to deny them the right to purchase the assets.

The proposals are being framed days after the government conceded to the retailers and exempted them from the legal requirement of disclosing their bank accounts and the details of the assets.

Pakistan's industrialists have already started establishing their businesses overseas and people are finding avenues to stay away from the heavy taxation that has broken the back of the salaried and business individuals. The salaried persons pay up to 39% of their gross salary in taxes while this ratio for business individuals is around 50% of their net income.

Despite the limited tax base and the burden being borne by these people, the government has the audacity to prepare and consider proposals to further tighten the noose around the existing taxpayers.

The FBR sources said that the government was also proposing to deny the right of investing in mutual funds and stock market to non-filers. According to another proposal, the non-filers may also be denied the right to purchase properties. But it is not clear whether the government can afford to implement this recommendation given the pressure by the strong lobbies.

The FBR believes that the existing taxpayers were not coughing up enough revenues. It is going to send them nudging notices, detailing their incomes, assets and the tax liabilities. The notices will go to the existing tax filers.

Civil servants first target

The sources said that in the first step, the income tax returns of the nearly two million federal, provincial and the state-owned enterprises employees would be pre-populated aimed at encouraging them to pay their due taxes.

The FBR plans to go after the business individuals who are already filers but according to its assumption they are not paying due taxes. There are 3.7 million filer business individuals, and 2.4 million of them did not pay income tax last year. Only 20,000 showed more than Rs10 million in annual income while another 921,000 showed less than Rs10 million in annual income.

Out of two million salaried class filers, about 630,000 were below the Rs600,000 annual income tax threshold, according to the FBR officials. There were about 15,000 salaried persons having annual income of Rs10 million or more and paid Rs93 billion in income tax, according to the FBR officials.

However, less than 1.3 million salaried individuals also declared less than Rs10 million annual incomes and paid Rs157 billion income taxes. These people are mostly middle to upper-middle income earners and are bearing the burden of the nation.

According to the tax authorities, there are 80,000 registered companies but less than 6,000 showed more than Rs10 million in annual income. These below 6,000 firms paid the 940 billion income tax, which is 99% of the total income tax paid by all the companies.

There were 47,000 companies that filed nil returns and another 26,000 that declared less than Rs10 million in annual income. The FBR is going to target these existing registered companies.

Likewise, out of nearly 100,000 associations of persons, less than 5,000 showed Rs10 million annual incomes. There were 60,000 such associations, which showed nil income. Less than 5,000 associations declared Rs10 million worth income people and paid Rs150 billion in income tax.

Pakistan relaxed rules to award $2 billion contract to China for construction of Karakoram Highway: report

Pakistan relaxed bidding rules to directly award a $2 billion contract to China for the construction of a strategically important road, according to a media report on Friday. Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb-led Economic Coordination Committee of the Cabinet on Thursday approved to invoke a special rule to exempt the requirement for the international competitive bidding to award a contract to Chinese firms for the construction of a section of the Karakoram Highway, The Express Tribune newspaper reported.

The Thakot-Raikot section of the highway is critical to keep China-Pakistan connected through the land route.

The committee considered a summary of the Ministry of Communications regarding the Execution of Framework Agreement between China and Pakistan on Realignment of KKH (Thakot-Raikot) under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), according to a statement by the Ministry of Finance.

After detailed discussions and deliberations, and in order to comply with the codal requirements, the committee allowed the Ministry of Communications and National Highway Authority to proceed with provisions of the Framework Agreement in accordance with provisions of rule-5 of Public Procurement Rules, 2004 for procurement of construction of realignment of KKH (Thakot-Raikot Section 241 KM) project under CPEC (Phase-II), it added.

Pakistan had signed the framework agreement for the construction of Thakot-Raikot section of Karakoram Highway in June during the visit of Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif to Beijing. China will give a $2 billion loan for the project.

The existing road portion will be submerged due to the construction of the Diamer-Basha, Dasu, Azad Pattan and Thakot dams along the road.

According to the framework agreement, the Chinese companies will be responsible for the engineering design, procurement and construction (EPC) and supervision work. The identification of the Chinese companies for the project will culminate in selection of one company or a consortium after due negotiations on all technical and financial considerations with the Pakistani institutions responsible for the project, according to the agreement.

China will provide a list of the recommended Chinese companies and Pakistan will select one of those for the construction work. Pakistan will use Chinese equipment for the construction of the project.

The Public Procurement Regulatory Authority (PPRA) law binds the government to give contracts through competitive bidding. However, the PPRA rule 5 states that whenever these rules are in conflict with an obligation or commitment of the federal government arising out of an international treaty or an agreement with a state, or any international financial institution the provisions of such international treaty or agreement shall prevail to the extent of such conflict. The committee also approved to relax competitive process conditions for hiring of foreign consultants for the construction of Chakdara-Timergara road connecting Peshawar with Chitral.

The Export-Import Bank of South Korea has given a USD 49 million loan for the project but on the condition that the consultants will be hired as per its desire.

The Chairman ECC Senator Muhammad Aurangzeb directed that in future no foreign loans should be taken for those road projects, which cannot generate enough revenues to pay off these liabilities.

Pakistan's external financing position remains thin and the government took a couple of incentives to ease pressure on the foreign exchange reserves, according to the paper.

Deadliest Attack in Years Sabotages Pakistan's Security Promises to China

29 August 2024, China Digital Times, Arthur Kaufman

This week, the Balochistan Liberation Army (BLA), a militant separatist group from Pakistan's southwestern province, claimed responsibility for a series of coordinated attacks that left 73 people dead across numerous provinces. While no Chinese citizens were targeted, Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif claimed that the BLA wanted to "drive a wedge" between Pakistan and China and scare off Chinese investors from projects in Balochistan and other parts of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC). Saleem Ahmad and Saud Mehsud from Reuters reported on the scope of the attacks:

Pakistan's military said 14 soldiers and police and 21 militants were killed in fighting after the largest of the attacks, which targeted buses and trucks on a major highway.

Balochistan's chief minister said 38 civilians were also killed. Local officials said 23 of them were killed in the roadside attack after armed men checked passengers' IDs before shooting many of them and torching vehicles.

[...] Officials said militants also targeted police and security stations in Balochistan, Pakistan's largest province by area but least populated, killing at least 10 people in one attack.

[...] The [BLA] said four suicide bombers, including a woman from the southern port district of Gwadar, had been involved in an attack on the Bela paramilitary base. Pakistani authorities did not confirm the suicide blasts, but the provincial chief minister said three people had been killed at the base. [Source]

Pakistan witnessed 409 militant attacks in the first five months of 2024, leading to 414 deaths and 474 injuries, marking an 83 percent increase in attacks over the same period in 2023, according to the Pakistan Institute for Conflict and Security Studies.

This week's attacks, the deadliest in years, reinforce the trend of a deteriorating security environment. Haroon Janjua from DW described the significance of these latest attacks, which experts view as a major escalation:

Analysts view the latest coordinated attacks as alarming due to their unprecedented scale and intensity, raising serious concerns about the security impacts.

"These are extremely significant attacks because of their scale – in terms of number of fatalities, the geographic scope of the attacks, and the wide range of targets, both civilian and security," Michael Kugelman, a South Asia expert at the Washington-based Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, told DW.

Kiyya Baloch, a journalist and commentator who has extensively covered Balochistan, said that Monday's attacks marked a new level of seriousness due to their meticulous planning and coordination.

"This indicates that the use of force by the state in Balochistan in the last two decades is not effective. It is backfiring and worsening the situation," Baloch told DW. [Source]

Abid Hussain from Al Jazeera described the message that the BLA was attempting to send via the attacks, along with their motivations:

The targeted attacks on workers from Punjab – Pakistan's biggest, most prosperous and most politically dominant province – also add to a growing pattern, said experts. As with multiple previous attacks on Chinese nationals and projects in the province, the separatist movement wants to send the message that outsiders are not safe in Balochistan, they said. "Besides the Chinese, Baloch nationalists also target specific groups such as security forces, Punjabi laborers, and workers involved in development projects. Their aim is to discourage these groups from coming to Balochistan to work on these initiatives," Malik Siraj Akbar, a Balochistan expert based in Washington, DC, said.

[...M]any in the province accuse the Pakistani state of systematically neglecting their needs and exploiting their resources, fuelling a sense of betrayal and deepening support for separatism.

"The nationalists are strongly opposed to the exploration of gold, minerals, and coal, seeing these activities as the exploitation of Balochistan's resources," Akbar said. "They often highlight images of coal trucks leaving the province as evidence of resources being extracted without benefiting the local population. This narrative helps to boost public support for their cause." [Source]

The CPEC and its flagship Gwadar port and free zone project, located in the resource-rich Balochistan province, are major investments by Chinese state actors that underpin the countries' bilateral relationship. But local backlash to these projects has grown and made Chinese citizens targets of BLA attacks. Describing the insecurity-underdevelopment nexus in Balochistan, Abdul Basit wrote for The Diplomat about the neocolonial terms in which the BLA views China and the CPEC:

In its propaganda, BLA frames China's economic footprint in Balochistan as a neo-colonial project and compares it with the British East India Company which entered the Indian Subcontinent in 1608 as spice traders and gradually took over the entire region. In multiple statements after targeting Chinese nationals and projects in Pakistan, BLA has issued warnings to Beijing to roll back its development projects and leave the province.

BLA alleges that CPEC would give China control over Balochistan's mineral resources and strategic coastline through Gwadar's deep-sea port. BLA also accuses China of furthering the restive province's sense of economic marginalization that would reduce the Baloch community to a minority in their own province once Gwadar is fully developed as a modern city. Lacking technical skills and modern education, the Baloch fear that job opportunities in Gwadar will be grabbed by outsiders while sidelining them. Concurrently, Pakistan's worsening economic situation has also generated rumors that the country will offer Balochistan's resources to repay soaring Chinese loans, which have now risen to $30 billion of Pakistan's

$126 billion external debt. Such narratives strengthen the insurgent groups and allow them to recruit by leveraging the Baloch community's economic anxieties to perpetuate the conflict. [Source]

The attacks coincided with a meeting on Monday between Pakistani Army Chief Gen Asim Munir and visiting Commander of the People's Liberation Army Ground Forces Gen Li Qiaoming to discuss bilateral security cooperation. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian also told a regular news briefing that "China is ready to further strengthen counter- terrorism security co-operation with the Pakistani side in order to jointly maintain regional peace and security."

But it is unclear whether China's security cooperation will make a difference. In Wednesday's China-Global South Project newsletter, Eric Olander wrote: "China's in a bind because it's too deeply invested in Pakistan to pull out, but the South Asian country is clearly not stable enough for Beijing to add more money to the $60 billion that it's already spent building the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor. It's going to have to make do with the status quo, which means more destruction and more bloodshed."

China strongly condemns attacks in Pakistan, says Chinese foreign ministry

27 August 2024, Reuters

China strongly condemns the attacks in Pakistan and will continue to give strong support to the country in anti-terrorism action, a spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry said on Tuesday at a regular press briefing.

The attacks in Pakistan were the most widespread in years by ethnic militants fighting a decades-long insurgency to win secession of a resource-rich southwestern province, home to major China-led projects such as a port and a gold and copper mine.

Commander of the Ground Forces of the People's Liberation Army of China General Li Qiaoming was on Tuesday conferred the Nishan-e-Imtiaz, one of the top honours in Pakistan, for his "unwavering commitment" in promoting close cooperation between the militaries of the two all-weather friends.

PM, Commander Ground Forces of PLA China discuss bilateral ties, defence relations

27 August 2024, Pakistan Today

Commander of the Ground Forces of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) of China, General Li Qiaoming called on Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif here on Monday.

The prime minister extended a warm welcome to General Li and underscored that Pakistan and China are All-Weather Strategic Cooperative Partners and trusted friends.

PM Shehbaz Sharif highlighted that the deep-rooted ties between the two nations enjoy broad public, political, and institutional support in Pakistan, making them indispensable for the progress and development of both countries.

ISLAMABAD: Commander of the Ground Forces of the People's Liberation Army of China, General Li Qiaoming calls on Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif . INP

Expressing satisfaction at the deepening military-to-military exchanges, he noted that the defense and strategic ties between Pakistan and China are vital for peace and stability in the region as these relations form the foundation of their bilateral relationship.

In his remarks, General Li affirmed that China, as an iron brother, strategic partner, and reliable friend, places the highest priority on its relationship with Pakistan.

The PLA commander expressed China's desire to elevate their bilateral friendship to new levels of cooperation and collaboration. Recognizing the role of Pakistan's armed forces in promoting regional peace and stability and combating terrorism, General Li reiterated the PLA's commitment to further expanding its cooperation with Pakistan to enhance the capacity building of the two armed forces.

The two sides focused on various aspects of the Pakistan-China friendship, particularly the bilateral defense and strategic partnership.

Earlier, PLA Commander General Li Qiaoming visited the General Headquarters where he held a meeting with Chief of Army Staff Gen Asim Munir.

The meeting offered a forum for in-depth discussions on matters of mutual interest, regional security, military training, and strategies to improve bilateral defense cooperation, according to a statement from the ISPR.

Gen Asim Munir thanked the dignitary and reiterated how much Pakistan values its brotherly relations with China.

Earlier, in a formal show of deference and hospitality, General Li Qiaoming arrived at the General Headquarters, laid a floral wreath at Yadgar-e- Shuhada, and received a guard of honour by a well-groomed Pakistan Army detachment.

Pakistan's Balochistan, home to China-led projects, hit by militant attacks, 60 killed

26 August 2024, SCMP

The attacks targeted police stations, railway lines, and vehicles on highways, with the Baloch Liberation Army claiming responsibility.

Separatist militant attacks on police stations, railway lines and highways in Pakistan's restive province of Balochistan, coupled with retaliatory operations by security forces, killed more than 60 people, officials said on Monday.

The most widespread assault by ethnic insurgents in years forms part of a decades-long effort to win secession of the resource-rich southwestern province, home to major China-led projects such as a strategic port and a gold and copper mine.

"These attacks are a well thought out plan to create anarchy in Pakistan," Interior Minister Mohsin Naqvi said in a statement, adding that security forces had killed 12 militants in operations after the attacks on Sunday and Monday.

Pakistan's military said 14 soldiers and police, and 21 militants, were killed in fighting after the largest of the attacks, which targeted vehicles from buses to goods trucks on a major highway.

It was not immediately clear if that included the 12 militants the interior ministry confirmed dead.

Local officials said at least 23 passengers were killed in the attack, with 35 vehicles set ablaze.

Rail traffic with Quetta was suspended following blasts on a rail bridge linking the provincial capital to the rest of Pakistan, as well as on a rail link to neighbouring Iran, railways official Muhammad Kashif said.

Police said they had found six as yet unidentified bodies near the site of the attack on the railway bridge. Officials said militants also targeted police and security stations in Balochistan, which is Pakistan's largest province by area, killing at least 10 people in one attack.

Militant group the Baloch Liberation Army (BLA) took responsibility in a statement to journalists that claimed many more attacks, including one on a major paramilitary base, though Pakistani authorities have yet to confirm these.

The BLA is the biggest of several ethnic insurgent groups that have battled the central government for decades, saying it unfairly exploits Balochistan's gas and mineral resources. It seeks the expulsion of China and independence for the province.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif vowed that security forces would retaliate and bring those responsible to justice.

General Li Qiaoming, commander of China's People's Liberation Army Ground Forces and Pakistan's army chief Asim Munir met on Monday, though a Pakistani military statement made no mention of the attacks.

"The meeting afforded an opportunity for in-depth discussions on matters of mutual interest, regional security, military training, and measures to further augment bilateral defence cooperation," it said.

Passengers killed

On Sunday night, armed men blocked a highway in Balochistan, marched passengers off vehicles, and shot them after checking their identity cards, a senior superintendent of police, Ayub Achakzai, told Reuters. As many as 35 vehicles, including trucks, were set on fire on the highway in the area of Musakhail.

"The armed men also not only killed passengers but also killed the drivers of trucks carrying coal," said Hameed Zahir, deputy commissioner of the area.

Militants have targeted workers from the eastern province of Punjab, whom they see as exploiting their resources.

In the past, they have also attacked Chinese interests and citizens in the province, where China runs the strategic southern deep water port of Gawadar, as well as a gold and copper mine in its west.

The BLA said its fighters targeted military personnel travelling in civilian clothes, who were shot after being identified.

Pakistan's interior ministry said the dead were innocent citizens.

Six security personnel, three civilians and one tribal elder made up the 10 killed in clashes with armed militants who stormed a station of the Balochistan Levies in the central district of Kalat, police official Dostain Khan Dashti said.

Officials said police stations had also been attacked in two southern coastal towns, but the toll had yet to be confirmed.

Balochistan, which borders both Iran and Afghanistan, is Pakistan's largest province by size, but the least populated and remains largely underdeveloped, with high levels of poverty

Pakistan postpones opening of $250 million China-funded airport over security fears

23 August 2024, First Post

The planned opening on August 14 - Pakistan's Independence Day - was abruptly delayed following mass protests earlier this month that paralysed Gwadar, the city where the airport is located

Pakistan has postponed the opening of a nearly $250 million China-funded New Gwadar International Airport (NGIA) due to security concerns.

According to Nikkei Asia report, Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif was due to attend the inauguration of New Gwadar International Airport (NGIA), close to a port at the center of the $50 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

However, the planned opening on August 14 - Pakistan's Independence Day - was abruptly delayed following mass protests earlier this month that paralysed Gwadar, the city where the airport is located.

No new opening date has been announced for the $246 million project, which got off the ground following a grant deal with Beijing in 2015.

"All the required work and prerequisite arrangements on [the New Gwadar] airport have been completed and it's ready for flight operations," Nikkei Asia quoted a government official familiar with the matter as saying.

The New Gwadar International Airport's opening has been delayed again, following an initial postponement last year, due to concerns over low flight demand amid ongoing militant attacks and separatist unrest.

The single-runway airport, located 45 kilometers from the Chinese-controlled Gwadar port, spans 4,300 acres and can accommodate large aircraft like the Airbus A380, making it Pakistan's largest airport by size, surpassing Islamabad's airport.

Gwadar's efforts to establish itself as a major hub have been underwhelming, with only three weekly flights to a smaller nearby airport from Karachi, many of which are canceled.

Despite anticipated direct flights from Chinese airlines, analysts doubt there will be a significant increase in demand, reported Nikkei Asia.

"The inauguration of NGIA is symbolic in nature because it is not commercially viable for any airline in the short term," Afsar Malik, an expert in airline economics, was quoted as saying.

Pakistani governments have long touted the multibillion-dollar investment with China as a means to transform Gwadar into the next Singapore.

However, on Monday, the prime minister ordered that half of all government sea cargo, originally slated for Karachi, be rerouted to Gwadar's port, underscoring its underutilisation.

There are concerns that Gwadar's new transport hub may become a white elephant, akin to Sri Lanka's Mattala Rajapaksa International Airport, which is often labeled the "world's emptiest international airport" due to sparse flight activity.

"Vanity projects are not new for the Chinese, they have built similar projects back home which have limited use," Nikkei Asia quoted Mohammad Shoaib, an assistant professor at Quaid-i-Azam University Islamabad, as saying.

"The Chinese are biding their time and the NGIA can be of use once Gwadar kicks off. ... In the meantime, NGIA and old Gwadar airport can be used by other support missions from China," Shoaib added.

This month, Gwadar saw major protests by groups advocating for civil, political, and economic rights in Balochistan, where the China-funded port is located.

Beijing has become increasingly cautious about investing in Pakistan following a series of deadly attacks on its nationals. The country faces a rise in militant activity from both Islamist groups and separatists in Balochistan.

Islamabad, already struggling with a fragile economy, has pledged to enhance security for workers and launch new counterterror operations. Despite hopes that the new airport will attract more Chinese investment, skepticism remains about its impact on the largely impoverished local population.

Pakistan blames users for slow internet as firewall rumours grow

19 August 2024, BBC, Kelly Ng

Pakistan has for weeks been experiencing painfully slow internet - but who, or what, is to blame is a matter for debate.

Activists say the state is building a China-style internet firewall as it looks to exert further control over the online space.

Officials have disputed these claims and instead blamed the widespread use of secure connections or VPN (virtual private networks) for the crawling speeds. Shutting down the internet to crush dissent is a familiar move in regulators' playbooks in Pakistan and other parts of Asia.

Since the riots sparked by former prime minister Imran Khan last year, the government has blocked social media platforms and throttled connection speeds as the battle for public support spilled over from the streets to the digital space.

The micro-blogging platform X has been blocked since the February elections due to "national security" concerns.

Mr Khan's party supporters are big users of X and he is the most popular Pakistani on the platform, with nearly 21 million followers.

But Minister of State for Information Technology Shaza Fatima said on Sunday that the government was not behind the recent slowdown.

She said her team has been "working tirelessly" with internet service providers and telcos to resolve the issue.

Ms Fatima said a "large population" had been using VPNs and "this strained the network, causing the internet to go slow".

She said reports that the state was behind the slow connections were "completely false".

However Ms Fatima said the government had been upgrading its systems to improve cyber security.

"It is the right of the government to [take such measures] given the cyber security attacks that this country has to go through," she said.

Activists however accuse the minister of "dodging criticism like a usual politician".

Shahzad Ahmad, director of local digital watchdog Bytes for All, told the BBC his organisation has "ample tech evident" to prove the existence of a firewall.

"It seems its purpose is to monitor online traffic... and limit dissemination [of information] in online spaces, particularly curbing political expression," Mr Ahmad said.

"Even if civil liberties don't matter, this is now about people's livelihood and the economy as well," said Farieha Aziz, co-founder of Bolo Bhi, a local non-profit that advocates for free speech online.

Business leaders and associations have warned that the slow connections could endanger Pakistan's business potential.

"The imposition of the firewall has triggered a perfect storm of challenges, with prolonged internet disconnections and erratic VPN performance threatening a complete meltdown of business operations," said the Pakistan Software Houses Association.

This could cost the IT sector up to $300 million, the association said, calling it a "direct, tangible and aggressive assault on the industry's viability".

"A mass exodus of IT companies is not just a possibility but an imminent reality if immediate and decisive action is not taken," it said.

Activists have filed a petition before the Islamabad High Court, calling for access to the internet to be declared a fundamental right under Pakistan's constitution.

Embassy of Pakistan in China celebrates 78th Independence Day of Pakistan

15 August 2024, Global Times, Dong Feng

Embassy of Pakistan in China celebrated the 78th Independence Day of Pakistan in Beijing on Wednesday. Activities were hosted at the embassy. The friendship between China and Pakistan was also celebrated at an award ceremony.

Early in the morning, officials and Pakistani community participated in a flag hoisting ceremony to celebrate the 78th Independence Day of Pakistan. Holding their national flags, Pakistani children smiled in the morning sunshine.

Messages from President of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan Asif Ali Zardari, as well as Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif were extended to the audience.

In his keynote speech, Pakistan's Ambassador to China Khalil Hashmi said, "This day marks a celebration of our nation's enduring spirit, a testament to the sacrifices and unwavering resolve of our founding fathers, who paved the path for our freedom. As we unfurl our national flag today, let us reflect on the progress we have made and renew our commitment toward a prosperous and peaceful country." The ambassador also stressed the friendship between Pakistan and China. "Here in China, we are privileged to witness the blossoming of a friendship that has grown alongside our nation's journey. The bond between Pakistan and China, characterized by mutual respect and a shared vision, is unparalleled in inter-state relations," he said. He also urged the attendees to contribute more to strengthen bilateral relations.

"We are resolved to further solidify this friendship. I call upon the Pakistani community in China to continue playing its vital role in strengthening this unique relationship," the ambassador noted.

Moreover, the Embassy of Pakistan in China hosted a Pakistan Civil Award Investiture Ceremony. Two representatives who contributed to the bilateral ties - Sha Zukang, former permanent representative of China to the UN and president of the China-Pakistan Friendship Association, and Nong Rong, deputy director of the Hong Kong and Macao Work Office of the CPC Central Committee and Hong Kong and Macao Affairs Office of the State Council and former ambassador of China to Pakistan - were awarded. Ambassador Hashmi, on behalf of the president of Pakistan, conferred the prestigious "Hilal-e-Quaid-i-Azam" award.

In his remarks, the ambassador extended heartfelt congratulations and paid a rich tribute to the contributions made by the two dignitaries. He highlighted the significant impact of their efforts in bilateral relations and beyond. "I have the honor to witness and personally engage myself in the promotion of China-Pakistan friendship," Sha said.

Since the establishment of China-Pakistan diplomatic relations, Pakistan has been consistently supporting China in maintaining independence, national sovereignty and territory integrity. Pakistan has been consistently and firmly supporting China's social and economic development. At the same time, Pakistan has always been supportive of China's international initiatives and proposals, including the establishment and construction of a community of shared interests. "I take it, this support of Pakistan to China is most valued. This support cannot be measured in cash," Sha noted.

"We should take and we do, take this friendship, as radical assets of our peoples, particularly at a time when we are undergoing centenary changes in the world situation. To further promote the traditional friendship between China and Pakistan and deepen our solidarity and cooperation carries special important significance," He stressed. Nong also expressed his gratitude to the president of Pakistan for the honor and reaffirmed his commitment to further advancing the China-Pakistan relationship. "The friendship between China and Pakistan is higher than the Himalayas, deeper than the ocean, sweeter than honey, stronger than steel. The iron clad friendship between China and Pakistan is deeply rooted in the hearts of our two peoples," he said. Nong continued recalling the meetings between the state leaders of the two countries. "I have every confidence in the future of China- Pakistan relations and stand ready to continue to contribute to this friendship," said Nong. On the sideline of the activities, in an interview with the Global Times, Ambassador Hashmi also recalled the salience of the time-tested, all-weather friendship between China and Pakistan, describing it as a model of inter-state relations based on mutual respect, strategic trust, and a shared vision for global peace and development. Talking about developing and strengthening the China- Pakistan All-Weather Strategic Cooperative Partnership, the ambassador said, "I think it's fair to say that there is no dimension that we have not touched bilaterally. So we work on the diplomatic front, on the political front, on defense, economic trade, investment, culture, education, agriculture, the science of technology, and people to people [exchanges]. In our relationship, our cooperation has even gone to space with the launch of a satellite."

He also highlighted investment opportunities in Pakistan.

"Right now we are very much focused on the economic side of the relationship because it's mutually beneficial in the sense that Chinese enterprises are small-, medium- and large-state-owned and private enterprises. They have a lot of expertise, they have a lot of management experience, technology and capital. They can invest in Pakistan." Talking about the outlook for cooperation between China and Pakistan in cultural heritage and cultural relics protection efforts, the ambassador said, "There's a lot of heritage from Buddhist sites that are in Pakistan that go back centuries and millennia." Pakistan has featured some artifacts in an exhibition at the Capital Museum in Beijing for three months. Taking popularity into account, the exhibition was also showcased at other locations such as Gansu Province and Shenzhen, Guangdong Province. "We are also starting a project that is looking at the two civilizations. The civilization that flourished along the Indus River in Pakistan and one of the most significant rivers in China - the Yangtze River. "Experts from the two sides - archaeologists and historians - are working together and they will undergo field visits while doing some research and this will lead to a book but also an exhibition and hopefully also a documentary," he introduced.

China-built landmark hydropower project connects to grid, another milestone for China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, despite Western media's smears

13 August 2024, Global Times

The first unit of the Chinese-built Suki Kinari Hydropower project in northwest Pakistan was connected to the power grid on Monday, the Xinhua News Agency reported, meaning the project, which was among the first under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) framework, has taken the most critical step toward full commercial operation. The launch of the landmark project, which is the largest overseas greenfield hydropower investment project by a Chinese enterprise, will further alleviate Pakistan's chronic electricity shortages, while injecting new impetus into the sustainable development of the regional economy, experts said. The project's launch comes as some Western media outlets have intensified efforts to badmouth China-Pakistan cooperation, the CPEC in particular, and the China-proposed Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), by bringing up old issues such as debt, which they claim may disrupt future cooperation.

Construction of the project, funded and developed by Energy China, started in January 2017 with a total investment of about $1.962 billion. The power station features four impulse turbine units, with a total installed capacity of 884 megawatts and a total reservoir volume of 13.45 million cubic meters, according to Energy China.

All units of the power station will be put into operation by the end of August, the company said. As a flagship project of the CPEC, the Suki Kinari Hydropower project boasts the largest impulse water turbine generator units and the deepest pressure shaft group in the world, meaning that it involved high construction standards.

The project will generate an average of 3.21 billion kilowatt-hours per year, saving about 1.28 million tons of standard coal annually and reducing carbon dioxide emissions by about 3.2 million tons.

More importantly, it will provide affordable, clean electricity to more than 1 million households in Pakistan.

Chinese experts said that the launch of this massive project is another milestone in the cooperation between China and Pakistan under the BRI. It serves as a living example of how the Chinese company has deeply participated in the sustainable development of Pakistan for the benefit of its social and economic development. "Helping Pakistan deal with its energy shortage has been an important task under the development of the CPEC since the beginning... while the heavy reliance on imported coal and high international coal prices are among the issues that have troubled Pakistan.

"The hydropower station offers an alternative choice to resolve many of these problems due to its ecologically friendly, affordable and sustainable nature," Liu Zongyi, director of the Center for South Asia Studies at the Shanghai Institutes for International Studies, told the Global Times on Tuesday.

The launch is an important achievement in the new phase of the high-quality construction of the CPEC, which will further ease Pakistan's electricity crisis and provide tangible benefits to local living standards and economic development, Qian Feng, director of the research department at the National Strategy Institute at Tsinghua University, told the Global Times on Tuesday.

The launch comes amid negative coverage by foreign media outlets of China-Pakistan cooperation and the CPEC. One even used an intimidating headline saying that "China-Pakistan ties are at a crossroads," in hyping issues such as debt and security in the region. "Such negative commentary is not new... it has been ongoing since the inception of the CPEC," Qian said. He noted that these persistent negative claims by Western media outlets can underscore the critical importance of China-Pakistan cooperation in further building a China-Pakistan community with a shared future. China is globally recognized for its infrastructure capabilities. In terms of financing, projects under the BRI have benefited from favorable loans, which have significantly motivated Chinese enterprises to participate in development and construction.

This financing also helped Pakistan overcome funding constraints that are common among developing countries, experts said.

As a key flagship project under the BRI, the CPEC has brought $25.4 billion in direct investment to Pakistan, created 236,000 jobs, built 510 kilometers of highways and generated more than 8,000 megawatts of electricity, among other achievements. All these have significantly boosted Pakistan's social and economic development, according to the Chinese Embassy in Pakistan.

As the CPEC enters a new phase in 2024, its 11th year, experts said that cooperation between China and Pakistan under the BRI will be further strengthened in sectors where they have complementary advantages. These sectors could include new energy, manufacturing and cross-border e-commerce, to further enhance regional connectivity and support Pakistan's sustainable development and improvement of livelihoods.

China, Pakistan: Rallies in Gilgit Baltistan interrupting cross-border trade and travel disruptions end as of Aug. 12 /update 1

12 August 2024, Crisis24

Protests in Gilgit-Baltistan, Pakistan, end as of Aug. 12, easing cross-border trade and travel disruptions with China.

Protests in Gilgit-Baltistan, Pakistan, that were disrupting cross-border trade and travel with neighboring Xinjiang, China, have ended as of Aug. 12. Activists in Gilgit-Baltistan had staged disruptive sit-ins along a major section of the Karakoram Highway (National Highway 35) and outside the Sost Dry Port from July 24, affecting cross-border travel and trade near the Khunjerab Pass. Organizers were denouncing taxation on Chinese imports at the affected crossing and called off the action following successful negotiations with government officials.

Lingering localized transport and business disruptions, including shipping delays, are possible through Aug. 12 as operators clear backlogs.

Traders end protest against taxes at northern border pass linking Pakistan to China

10 August 2024, Arab News

Traders in the northern Gilgit-Baltistan region on Sunday called off a 17-day sit-in protest against taxes on imports at an important border pass linking Pakistan to China, following successful negotiations with the government that will pave the way for trade to resume at the key crossing. Trade and transportation at the high-altitude Khunjerab Pass connecting Pakistan and China remained suspended since July 26 after traders staged a sit-in protest at the Sost dry port against taxes on Chinese imports.

On July 20, the GB Chief Court declared illegal the collection of income tax, sales tax and additional sales tax by Pakistani revenue authorities on goods imported from China through the Khunjerab Pass. Protesters accused the federal government of violating the court's orders and collecting taxes on imports that arrived through the pass.

"The customs department has accepted the GB Chief Court's order and the unanimous resolution of the GB assembly," Imran Ali, president of the GB Chamber of Commerce and Industry, told Arab News via a text message.

"So now, we have announced to call off the protest." Muhammad Iqbal, president of the GB Importers and Exporters Association, said a three-member team representing the traders met GB Chief Minister Hajji Gulber Khan and Minister for Kashmir Affairs and GB Amir Muqam in Islamabad to resolve the issue. "And they promised to fulfill our demands after assurances with the FBR," Iqbal said. "From today, the border is open for all kinds of trade and transport." Bakhtiar Muhammad, a spokesperson for the Federal Board of Revenue (FBR) said the customs department was willing to implement the GB court's interim order subject to the provision of monetary security during the case proceedings to safeguard government revenue.

"Traders finally agreed to provide post-dated cheques as security and customs negotiated a standard operating procedure for the clearance, to which they agreed," Muhammad said.

GB Information Minister Eman Shah shared details of the agreement, saying that local traders in GB would not be taxed for imports through the Khunjerab Pass. "However, a checkpoint will be installed at the Thakot Bridge by customs where all taxes will be applicable on imported things being transported to another region," he revealed.

Ninety-six percent of trade between Pakistan and China consists of China's exports to Pakistan, while Pakistan's share of exports to China is only 4 percent, as per the Trade Development Authority of Pakistan (TDAP).

The main items imported from China into Pakistan include electronic items, shoes, garments and spare parts while Pakistan exports gemstones, dry fruits, medicinal herbs and some clothing items to the neighboring country.

Relations with US should be repaired but not at China's expense: Pakistan PM Shehbaz Sharif

05 August 2024, The Indian Express

Sharif said that work was progressing fast in the second phase of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) and also informed that during the recent visit of Chinese experts to Pakistan, there was positive movement in the promotion of cooperation in different fields.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif has said that Pakistan wants to repair ties with the US but not at the cost of its ties with China as no other country could do what Beijing was doing for his cash-strapped country.

The 72-year-old Pakistan Muslim League-Nawaz (PML-N) leader made these remarks during a meeting with a group of journalists who had recently returned from an official visit to China at his Model Town residence here, according to the Dawn newspaper.

Sharif said that work was progressing fast in the second phase of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) and also informed that during the recent visit of Chinese experts to Pakistan, there was positive movement in the promotion of cooperation in different fields.

Asked about the Pakistan-US relations, the prime minister said that the country needed to repair its relations with Washington as that was in its best interests but it shouldn't be at the expense of China.

"I think our relations with the US must be repaired, as it is very necessary for Pakistan... But it shouldn't be at the cost of China... and I had told (the Americans) recently in the presence of various dignitaries, including Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar," Sharif was quoted as saying.

"I also told them that similarly, the friendship with China is not at the cost of the US, as both have significance for us," he clarified.

Ties between the two countries soured after jailed former prime minister Imran Khan openly accused the US of orchestrating his downfall after he was removed through a vote of no-confidence in April 2022.

Prime Minister Sharif said he believed that whatever China was helping Pakistan accomplish, the US cannot do.

Sharif also spoke about his letter to Beijing requesting a debt re-profiling and said that if China agreed to give Pakistan five to seven years to pay back the loans, the government would be able to bring down inflation, including electricity prices, the Dawn reported.

The premier said their request is under consideration and he is hoping for a positive response from China. He also expressed his concern about the safety and security of Chinese nationals in Pakistan and assured that the government would use all its resources to ensure their well-being.

In March, five Chinese nationals were among six people killed when an explosives-packed vehicle rammed into their bus in Pakistan's troubled province of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. It was the second suicide attack on the personnel working on the China-backed hydropower project since 2021.

The Chinese were working on the Dasu hydropower project, which is about 300 km to the north of Islamabad. The 4,320 MW project is being constructed by the China Gezhouba with funding from the World Bank.

Thousands of Chinese personnel are working in Pakistan on several projects being carried out under the aegis of the USD 60 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor.

What China is doing for Pakistan, no other country can do: PM

05 August 2024, Dawn, Khalid Hasnain

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif said on Sunday that whatever China was doing for Pakistan, no other country could do, and reiterated that relations with Washington should be repaired, but not at the cost of ties with Beijing.

The prime minister, who had a busy weekend, met with a group of journalists at his Model Town residence in Lahore. The journalists had recently returned from an official visit to China, undertaken on the invitation of the China Public Diplomacy Association.

Speaking on the occasion, PM Shehbaz said that work was progressing fast on the second phase of the China- Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), and during the visit of Chinese experts to Pakistan, there was positive movement on the promotion of cooperation in different fields.

Talking about his letter to Beijing requesting debt re-profiling, he said that if China agreed to give Pakistan five to seven years to pay back the loans, the government would be able to bring down inflation, including electricity prices.

However, when asked if he had received any response so far, he said: "No... [our request] is under consideration".

"We hope for a positive response from China in this regard," he said.

When asked about Pakistan-US relations, the PM was of the view that the country needed to repair its relations with Washington, as that was in its best interests.

"I think our relations with the US must be repaired, as it is very necessary for Pakistan... But it shouldn't be at the cost of China... and I had told [the Americans] recently in presence of various dignitaries including Mr Ishaq Dar," he explained.

"I also told them that similarly, the friendship with China is not at the cost of US, as both have significance for us," he clarified.

The PM said he believed that whatever China was helping Pakistan accomplish, the US cannot do.

He was also very concerned about the safety and security of Chinese nationals in Pakistan, and assured that the government would use all its resources to ensure their well-being.

There is no place for politics of any kind on relations with a close friend like China, he remarked.

He said he was well aware of problems, including the inflation and energy prices, being faced by the public at large.

For this, he said, the government had taken Rs50 billion out of the Public Sector Development Programme (PSDP) and allocated it for relief in energy prices to those using up to 200 units of electricity.

The premier also appeared supportive for those using 400 units and said they should also be given such relief. "We are really worried about the energy prices. And we are reassessing our priorities concerning Independent Power Producers," he maintained.

Youn-i-Istehsal

Today (Monday), marks the fifth anniversary of India revoking Kashmir's special status. In commemoration, the country will observe Youn-i-Istehsal in solidarity with their Kashmiri brethren.

According to PTV News, PM Shehbaz Sharif is expected to visit Muzaffarabad, where he is expected to make an important policy statement.

While stressing continued support for the people of Kashmir for the realization of their right to self determination on the eve of Youn-i-Istehsal, PM Shehbaz said in his message that since 2019, "India has been trying to convince the world that Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of its territory. However, international law, historical facts, moral principles and the situation on the ground deny India's baseless claims."

He said that efforts were being made in India to silence the genuine leadership of the Kashmiri people and muzzle the media.

The number of political prisoners remains in the thousands, while 14 political organisations have been outlawed, he said.

Harassment of innocent people, arbitrary detentions, and the so-called 'cordon and search operations have become a matter of routine.

The Indian forces are operating with impunity, according to them under different draconian laws, he added.

He saluted the indomitable courage of the Kashmiri people that has enabled them to withstand every Indian attempt to subjugate them.

"History has proven, time and again, that durable peace in South Asia remains contingent upon the settlement of the Jammu and Kashmir dispute. In the interest of lasting peace and security in South Asia, India must move from dispute denial to dispute resolution," he added.

China's reform policy opens up opportunities for global investment: Pakistani experts

03 August 2024, Xinhua Net, Misbah Saba Malik

Pakistani officials and experts said on Friday that China's transformative economic journey has a global impact, and over the years, the country has not only eradicated poverty for millions but also opened up vast opportunities for international trade and investment.

Addressing an event titled "Global Opportunities in Deepening China's Reforms in the New Era," the Focal Person on the Development Projects of the Government of Pakistan, Asim Khan, said that China has made a remarkable journey of economic reforms, which have transformed the country into a global powerhouse.

He said that China's reforms have not only lifted millions of people out of poverty but also created unprecedented opportunities for global trade, investment, and cooperation.

China's growing influence in international affairs is undeniable and its contributions to global governance, climate change, and development financing have been noteworthy, and the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), in particular, has the potential to reshape regional development and connectivity, he added.

"From Pakistan's perspective, we view China's BRI as a game-changer, and the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a pilot project of the BRI, has transformed Pakistan's profile from a perceived safe haven for terrorism to an attractive destination for Chinese and global investment," he noted.

He hoped that Pakistan would attract more investments by relocating Chinese industries to Pakistan as there are tremendous opportunities for both countries to deepen their economic ties.

In his address, Khalid Taimur Akram, executive director of the Pakistan Research Center for a Community with Shared Future in Islamabad, said that China has been an engine of global growth for decades and will continue to be a key player in international development in the years to come.

China's steady economic progress and substantial potential in trade and investment are not only major positives for the current global economy, but also for the future, he added.

"China's ongoing reforms constantly shape new momentum and advantages for development, promote a new leap in productivity, and sustain the continuous high-quality growth of China's economy, bringing new opportunities to countries around the world, particularly to the iron-clad friend Pakistan," the expert said.

Speaking at the event, Liaqat Ali Khan, head of policy in the Center of Excellence for CPEC in the country's Ministry of Planning, Development and Special Initiatives, said that Pakistan can benefit from the second phase of CPEC as it provides the country with an opportunity to attract the labor-intensive and light engineering industries that are relocating due to the reform process in China.

He said that the participating countries of BRI should learn to understand the reform policies of China that lead to the country's economic transformation from the coastal regions to the inland and Western areas to ensure balanced development across the country.

Launched in 2013, the CPEC is a corridor linking the Gwadar Port in southwest Pakistan's Balochistan province with Kashgar in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, which highlights energy, transport, and industrial cooperation in the first phase, while in the new phase expands to fields of agriculture and livelihood, among others.

Pakistan PM writes to China for debt reprofiling as IMF loan approval nears

02 August 2024, Arab News, Muhammad Ibrahim

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif said on Friday he wrote a letter to the Chinese government requesting debt reprofiling as his administration seeks a $7 billion loan from the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which has consistently focused on the country's debt obligations and energy sector issues. Last month, Pakistan reached a staff-level agreement with the IMF for a fresh loan, which it expects to be validated by the Fund's executive board later this month. The IMF has repeatedly expressed concerns about Pakistan's plans to manage its escalating circular debt in the energy sector while also addressing its external financial obligations.

"I have written to China for [debt] reprofiling," the prime minister informed his cabinet ministers. Debt reprofiling is a financial strategy used to restructure a country's existing debt obligations. It involves extending the maturity dates of debt, reducing interest rates or altering other terms of the debt agreements to make repayment more manageable. The IMF previously raised concerns about Pakistan's external financing gaps, prompting the country to seek assistance from friendly nations like Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and China, which shored up its foreign exchange reserves by depositing significant amounts into the central bank. These nations also rolled over existing funds when Pakistan requested it, thereby providing additional relief to its financial situation.

The prime minister pointed out his government had also sent Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb to China for talks on power sector debt relief. He said he had a detailed conversation with President Xi Jinping during his own visit to China, where Xi asked about Pakistan's plans to convert to coal-based projects under the multibillion-dollar joint economic corridor project.

Sharif told him it would help Pakistan save "$500 million in investment, and annually, we will save $1 billion, which will be a very significant thing." He maintained that his administration was aware of people's hardship amid rising power tariffs causing inflationary pressure. But he noted that it was taking steps to provide relief to power consumers, though it would take some time before these efforts produce the desired outcomes.

"Rome was not built in a day, and you cannot expect instant results," he added.

PM orders swift implementation of agreements with China

21 July 2024, Profit

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif on Saturday directed the authorities to expedite the process of implementing the agreements and memoranda of understanding (MoUs) made with the Chinese government and Chinese companies, saying that any further delay would not be tolerated.

"China is a time-tested friend of Pakistan who helped Pakistan in every hour of need, said Mr Shehbaz while chairing a review meeting regarding Pak-China cooperation at the PM House.

The prime minister pointed out that the transfer of the Chinese industry to Pakistan would help improve the country's overall economy, increase Pakistan's exports, and create new employment opportunities. During the meeting, the prime minister was briefed on the progress of different projects launched with Chinese cooperation.

The prime minister was told that the Sukkur-Hyderabad Motorway would be completed through a Public-Private Partnership.

It was informed that the plan to send 1,000 students for modern agricultural vocational training at government expense had been completed. The first batch of students was sent to China at the beginning of this academic year, while the next batch would be sent to modern Chinese agricultural universities after learning Chinese in Pakistan.

A comprehensive road map regarding the transfer of Chinese industries to Pakistan was presented at the meeting.

"Around 78 Pakistani companies have initially expressed deep interest in cooperation for the transfer of Chinese industries to Pakistan," the meeting was informed. The Board of Investment also presented a comprehensive report on the progress and action plan which was appreciated by the PM.

Operation Azm-e-Istehkam: Pakistan Acts at China's behest

21 July 2024, Balochwana

Since Pakistan's occupation of Balochistan in 1948, the region has endured prolonged adverse treatment characterised by a series of military operations. Major military operations occurred in 1948, 1958-59, 1963-69, and 1973-77, and have been ongoing since 2004, resulting in thousands of deaths among the Baloch nation. These actions have led to widespread destruction of homes and livelihoods. The Baloch people have faced forced disappearances, extrajudicial killings, and severe human rights abuses.

Despite its rich natural resources, Balochistan's benefits have been largely extracted by the Punjabi establishment, leaving the region with stagnated economic, cultural, and technological development. This systemic colonisation and exploitation have fuelled ongoing political movements and resistance among the Baloch people, who continue to demand an independent homeland. On the one hand, Pakistan vociferously calls for the independence of Kashmir and Palestine, while on the other, it is responsible for the deaths of thousands of fellow Baloch Muslims and the occupation of Balochistan.

The Pakistani government has received substantial funds from Western nations to tackle Islamic terrorism, ignoring the fact that Pakistan was and remains the only country in the modern era, apart from the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS), that was purely established in the name of political Islam. Chinese involvement in occupied Balochistan has worsened the situation for the Baloch nation. The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) has been developed on the suffering and bloodshed of the Baloch people. Both China and Pakistan are exploiting Balochistan's rich resources with impunity, prioritising their strategic and economic interests over the welfare of the local population.

China has covertly supported Pakistan's efforts to suppress the Baloch liberation movement due to its strategic interests in Balochistan. However, China is now openly demanding that Pakistan use its full might to crush Balochistan's democratic national struggle against Pakistani colonisation. Pakistan has launched a new military operation under the pretext of targeting the Pakistani Taliban and Islamic terrorists. However, the international community is aware that Pakistan has fostered and protected armed Islamist elements. How can a country whose very existence depends on political Islam counter its ideological allies?

Pakistan's current geography consists of three main areas: the former parts of India, such as Punjab and Sindh; the former independent state of Balochistan, which Pakistan colonised in 1948; and the former Afghan/Pashtun lands now part of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. Indian Muslims, Punjabis, Sindhis, and Urdu-speaking migrants have experienced an identity crisis and have embraced Islam as their core identity. However, the Baloch have resisted the occupation of their country from the beginning, and despite the Pashtuns' religious conservatism, they have a strong cultural identity and historically see themselves as an extension of Afghanistan.

This is why the Pakistani state believes that the ethnic cleansing of the Baloch and Pashtun nations would cement its rule over occupied Balochistan and the Pashtun lands. It is time for the international community, especially Europe and America, to hold Pakistan accountable for its crimes and stop the Pakistani military aggression initiated by the Chinese order.

Pakistan releases new anthem honouring China's 97th PLA anniversary

21 July 2024, The Tribune

The song's lyrics poetically capture the essence of this friendship: "Oh Himalayas, your peaks seem insignificant compared to our bond, and your depths appear shallow next to the strength of our friendship. This musical tribute emphasizes that the friendship between Pakistan and China is a timeless journey—stronger than the Himalayas, sweeter than honey, and deeper than the sea. Both nations have consistently supported each other through every joy and hardship.

Fears rise of China supplying Pakistan dreaded chemicals for use against Baloch rebels

19 July 2024, India Today, Pradip R. Sagar

The seizure by Indian customs of a dual-use chemical consignment covertly en route from Shanghai to Karachi has buttressed the suspicion.

In early May, customs authorities at the Kattupalli port in Tamil Nadu were stunned when they, based on intelligence inputs, seized a consignment shipped by Chengdu Shichen Trading Company Ltd, a Chinese firm, to Rohail Enterprises in Pakistan. It was the chemical Ortho-Chloro Benzylidene Malononitrile (CS), being carried by the vessel Hyundai Shanghai (sailing under the Cyprus flag) from Shanghai to Karachi.

CS gas, while commonly used in riot control, is regulated due to its potential use as a chemical weapon. Its dual-use (civilian and military) nature makes it particularly sensitive under the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Wassenaar Arrangement.

The seizure of the CS consignment highlights China's role in the global proliferation network. Beijing has had a history of producing dual-use technologies that, while ostensibly for civilian use, can be repurposed for military applications. This is particularly concerning given China's penchant to bypass international regulations and export controls. The most shocking aspect of the seizure and the investigation that followed is the banned chemical's potential to be used against Baloch rebels by Pakistani law enforcement agencies. The covert supply indicates China's move to safeguard its interests in Balochistan, which is part of the China-

Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC). Several CPEC projects in the region face opposition from local nationalist groups, with several incidents reported in the recent past.

The CS consignment issue has also raised a pertinent question about how China bypasses laws to dump banned items into Pakistan and acts as a key player in global proliferation networks, particularly for sanctioned states. The incident reveals the extent of China-Pakistan cooperation, especially in the realm of security and counterinsurgency. It also points to China's willingness to support the Pakistani law enforcement apparatus even if that means supplying controlled or banned substances.

Multiple European and US agencies are closely monitoring dual-use technology trading by China and Pakistan. One of the incidents is of Ilya Kahn, a tri-national resident of Brooklyn and Los Angeles who was arrested for a long-term scheme involving the illegal export of semiconductors from the US to sanctioned Russian military-linked businesses by utilising a network of companies in China and elsewhere.

In April this year, the US announced sanctions against three Chinese and Belarusian companies allegedly supplying missile technology to Pakistan. China is the main supplier of weapons and defence equipment for Pakistan's military modernisation programme.

The 2023 report of Germany's Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution highlights illegal procurement efforts by countries like Pakistan, Iran, North Korea and Syria, involving bypass countries like China and Turkey. The annual report states: "It's an old power bloc re-emerging. Under the leadership of China, Russia and Iran are working closely together in the area of proliferation. North Korea, Syria and Pakistan, countries that also show efforts to proliferate weapons of mass destruction, are part of this new alliance. However, they play a subordinate role in the position of supplier. China acts as a global buyer to circumvent the sanctions imposed on Russia, Iran, North Korea and partly on Pakistan."

Similarly, the Directorate of State Security and Intelligence (DSN) of Austria released the 'Constitutional Protection Report-2023'. Reviewing the global security scenario, the report emphasised on China's role in sourcing dual-use goods for Pakistan through fake companies and dealer networks. It said China occupies a special position in global proliferation. While Russia concluded bilateral arms agreements with Iran and North Korea in 2023, primarily in the production of drones, China acted as a global buyer for sanctioned states in the European market and Austria.

Pakistan traditionally maintains good relations with China and often relies on front companies and dealer networks on the Arabian Peninsula for procurement of dual-use goods from Europe. China became an even-more important trading partner for Pakistan in this segment in 2023.

The Austrian report added that Pakistan's proliferation attempts are increasingly being carried out via intermediaries in China. This approach makes it more difficult to combat proliferation as China itself is not sanctioned and the intermediaries to whom Austrian companies supply are usually civilian companies. The passing on of exported goods by the intermediaries is usually no longer subject to de facto control by Austrian exporters. China is thus becoming the global hub for sanctioned goods.

One example of this is microchips, which aren't essential for the Russian military industry alone. Since the Russian Federation does not have any significant chip production, it is dependent on foreign countries. According to open sources, the country managed to import sanctioned microchips worth more than $500 million via China, and in particular the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region. As customs data shows, some of the imported goods come from the production of a German chip manufacturer that also operates a subsidiary in Austria.

"Particularly in dual-use technologies, China is making goods originally developed for commercial purposes usable for military purposes. In this context, even supposedly harmless research collaborations or 'joint ventures' between China and Austria represent a proliferation risk that cannot be ignored," the Austrian report pointed out.

COAS Asim Munir lauds Chinese army at PLA's 97th founding day

18 July 2024, Dunya News

Chief of Army Staff (COAS) Gen Asim Munir said on Thursday Pakistan-China relations were exceptional and had always weathered the vicissitudes of strategic environment with mutual trust and unwavering belief in each other's support.

The army chief expressed the sentiment at the 97th anniversary of the founding of Peoples Liberation Army (PLA) of China, hosted at the GHQ on Thursday.

Ambassador of the People's Republic of China to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong was the chief guest on the occasion. Maj Gen Wang Zhong, Defence Attaché, Chinese Embassy officials and officers from tri-services of Pakistan attended the event.

COAS Munir, while welcoming the Chinese guests, congratulated the PLA and praised its contribution to the Chinese defence, security and nation development.

"Relations between Pakistan Army and Peoples Liberation Army are strong and both militaries continue to engage in bilateral military cooperation, demonstrating the iron clad brotherhood between the two countries," the COAS said.

Speaking on the occasion, the Chinese ambassador thanked the COAS for hosting the event on the 97th anniversary of the founding of the PLA.

"Pakistani military has always been at the forefront of countering terrorism and has made great sacrifices for the peace and stability of Pakistan and the region," the Chinese ambassador remarked.

"We stand ready to work with our brethren to combat terrorism and firmly believe that no force can destroy the iron-clad friendship between China and Pakistan and the brotherhood between the two militaries," the ambassador said.

Pakistani entrepreneurs to attend China's int'l exhibition

17 July 2024, Presnsa Latina

Islamabad, Jul 17 (Prensa Latina) A 25-strong entrepreneurial delegation from Pakistan will take part in the 8th China South Asia Exhibition, to be held in Kunming, China, on July 23-28, officials informed on Tuesday.

Khurshid Barlas, director of the Pakistan Association of Exhibition Industry, told reporters that the group consists of representatives of light engineering, textile, pharmaceuticals, solar energy, and other sectors.

He added that memorandums of understanding (MoUs) and agreements are expected to be signed with Chinese companies during the exhibition.

Barlas pointed out that the presence of Pakistani businesspeople and delegates from 80 other countries at the exhibition is one of the positive outcomes of Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's recent visit to China.

Beijing reiterates calls for Pakistan to create 'safe' environment for Chinese workers and projects

15 July 2024, Arab News

Beijing has reiterated its calls for Islamabad to create a "safe, stable and predictable" environment for Chinese workers, projects and institutions operating inside Pakistan and crack down on militant groups working against Chinese interests in the South Asian nation, Beijing's ambassador said on Sunday.

China is a major ally and investor in Pakistan but both separatist and religiously motivated militants have attacked Chinese projects over recent years, killing Chinese personnel. In the most high-profile recent attack, five Chinese workers were killed in a suicide bombing in March. It was the third major attack on Chinese interests in Pakistan in a week.

In an interview to state-run Pakistani news agency APP, Chinese ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong said President Xi Jinping had discussed security challenges with Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif when he visited China in June.

"President Xi Jinping made it clear that China supports Pakistan in firmly combating terrorism and hopes that Pakistan will continue to create a safe, stable and predictable business environment and effectively protect the safety of Chinese nationals, projects and institutions in Pakistan," the envoy said. Sharif had "promised" that Pakistan would "resolutely crack down on and severely punish the terrorists involved" in recent attacks and take all measures necessary to ensure the safety of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions in Pakistan, Jiang added.

Speaking about Sharif's visit, the envoy said its focus was on strategic and security cooperation and materializing an upgraded version of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) in line with China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Under CPEC, Beijing has pledged over $65 billion in investment in road, infrastructure and development projects in Pakistan as part of the Belt and Road scheme.

"Through Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's visit, the leaders of the two countries have drawn a blueprint, pointed out the path, and determined measures for the development of China-Pakistan relations in the new era," he said, adding that the two leaders had agreed on cooperation in various sectors including mining, development of offshore oil and gas resources, clean energy, artificial intelligence, science and technology, finance and space cooperation.

Consensus had been reached, the envoy said, on accelerating the Main Line-1 railways and Karakoram Highway projects, the year-round operation of the Khunjerab Pass, development of Gwadar Port and supporting Chinese companies to invest and operate in Special Economic Zones.

"At present, China-Pakistan cooperation is facing important opportunities for quality improvement and upgrading," Jiang said, "but also under the realistic pressure of climbing over obstacles."

Chinese ambassador highlights enhanced cooperation with Pakistan under Global South Initiative

15 July 2024, The Express Tribune

Envoy shares region's global GDP share has increased from 24% to over 40% in 40 years.

Chinese Ambassador to Pakistan Jiang Zaidong reiterated China's commitment to collaborate with Pakistan in actively implementing its Global South initiative aimed at common development and shared cooperation.

Recently, Chinese President Xi Jinping announced a series of measures benefiting Global South countries, including the establishment of a Global South research center, offering 1,000 scholarships under the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence Scholarship of Excellence, and providing 100,000 training opportunities over the next five years.

In an interview with APP on Sunday, Jiang expressed China's readiness to implement these measures for Pakistan and other countries. He emphasised that these initiatives demonstrate China's steadfast determination to foster development and revitalisation within the Global South.

Jiang underscored that China's Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence provide a framework to tackle global challenges and promote a shared vision of global peace, security, and prosperity.

He highlighted the significant economic contribution of the Global South, noting that its share in world economic growth over the past two decades has been as high as 80%.

Moreover, the region's global GDP share has increased from 24% to over 40% in the past 40 years.

Jiang emphasised that politically, the Global South countries are no longer merely silent participants on the international stage but are recognised as a pivotal force in transforming the international order.

He referenced President Xi's recent remarks at the Beijing Declaration of the Conference marking the 70th Anniversary of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, urging the Global South to lead in building a community with a shared future for mankind.

Pakistan's participation in this conference was noted, which saw high-level representation from over 100 countries.

The ambassador reiterated China's commitment to working with all nations to implement this initiative effectively, acting as a strong advocate for peace, development, and global governance. He stressed the importance of strengthening South-South and North-South cooperation to advance human progress.

Regarding China-Pakistan relations, the ambassador reaffirmed China's support for Pakistan's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

He highlighted the outcomes of Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's recent visit to China, focusing on strategic and security cooperation and the enhancement of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) under President Xi Jinping's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI).

The ambassador described Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's visit as achieving expected goals and fruitful results, providing a roadmap for enhancing all-weather strategic cooperation in the new era.

He outlined specific areas of cooperation agreed upon during the visit, including mining, development of offshore oil and gas resources, clean energy, artificial intelligence, science and technology, finance, and space cooperation. These initiatives, he noted, will inject new momentum into practical cooperation between China and Pakistan.

Jiang further emphasised President Xi's personal commitment to advancing China-Pakistan relations, especially through major projects like the Main Line-1 railways, the Karakoram Highway, year-round operation of the Khunjerab Pass, and development of Gwadar Port.

He highlighted the importance of Sino-Pakistani cooperation at international forums, particularly with China's presidency of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) and Pakistan's upcoming hosting of the SCO's Council of Heads of Government meeting, alongside its non-permanent membership in the United Nations Security Council.

Regarding security cooperation, the ambassador expressed confidence in the joint efforts of relevant departments from both sides to elevate security cooperation to new heights.

He underscored the importance of creating a safe environment for the development of China-Pakistan relations, particularly following the terrorist attack on the Chinese convoy at the Dasu Hydropower Project in March 2024.

The ambassador reiterated President Xi's assurance of China's support for Pakistan in combating terrorism and urged Pakistan to ensure the safety of Chinese nationals, projects, and institutions within its borders. He acknowledged PM Shehbaz's commitment to cracking down on terrorism and providing necessary security measures.

Pakistan to approach China to restructure its $15 billion energy debt

09 July 2024, Business Standard

During the June 4-8 visit, Prime Minister Sharif requested President Xi Jinping to consider re-profiling the IPPs' debt and converting the imported-coal-fired power plants

Pakistan has decided to approach its all-weather ally China with a formal request to restructure its $15 billion energy debt to help the cash-strapped country wriggle out of its financial woes.

"Planning Minister Ahsan Iqbal and Finance Minister Muhammad Aurangzeb would visit China this week," the Express Tribune newspaper quoted highly placed sources as saying.

"While Iqbal's visit was pre-planned, the finance minister is being sent as Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's special messenger," they added. Iqbal is scheduled to attend the Global Development Initiative forum to be held in China from July 11 to 13.

"As the finance minister's visit was not scheduled earlier, Pakistan's ambassador to Beijing has been instructed to arrange meetings with Chinese authorities," said the sources.

A Cabinet member, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that the premier decided the issue of Chinese Independent Power Producers' (IPP) debt should be immediately taken up for re-profiling. According to the sources, the finance minister will carry a letter from Prime Minister Sharif requesting debt restructuring.

During the June 4-8 visit, Prime Minister Sharif requested President Xi Jinping to consider re-profiling the IPPs' debt and converting the imported-coal-fired power plants. Aurangzeb will seek approval for a mechanism to proceed, though Chinese authorities have repeatedly refused to restructure these deals.

The delegation would also formally convey Pakistan's request to convert Chinese-imported coal-fired power plants to local coal. They said there is a proposal for the government to help Chinese investors arrange loans from local banks to convert these plants to indigenous coal. The sources added that Habib Bank Limited (HBL) is also engaged in the process.

China has set up 21 energy projects in Pakistan with a total cost of $21 billion, including about $5 billion in equity. Chinese investors obtained loans for these projects at an interest rate equal to the London Interbank Offered Rate (Libor) plus 4.5 per cent.

Against the remaining Chinese energy debt of over $15 billion, payments by 2040 would total $16.6 billion, according to government sources.

The proposal involves extending debt repayments from 10 to 15 years. This would reduce the outflow of foreign currency by about $550 million to $750 million per annum and decrease prices by Rs 3 per unit.

According to the existing IPP deals, the current power tariff structure requires debt servicing repayments during the first 10 years, leading to a significant burden on consumers who are paying the interest and principal of these loans through higher tariffs.

"However, due to the extended repayment period, the country will also have to make an extra $1.3 billion payment to China," sources said.

The Cabinet member stated that Pakistan needs immediate fiscal space and some room for reducing prices, although the overall cost would increase in the long run.

The government's economic challenges have multiplied, and it has not yet been able to conclude the International Monetary Fund (IMF) deal or lower electricity prices.

To secure the IMF deal, the government imposed a record Rs 1.7 lakh crores in additional taxes on Pakistan's lower, middle, and upper-middle-income groups.

Electricity prices were also approved to increase by 14 per cent to 51 per cent to collect another Rs 58,000 crores from residential and commercial consumers.

However, the Ministry of Finance has not been able to give a firm date for the staff-level agreement with the IMF. Finance Minister Aurangzeb, a former banker, hopes the deal may be reached this month.

Despite raising average base tariffs by around Rs 18 per unit over the past two years, the Power Division told the prime minister on Saturday that as of end-May, the circular debt owed to power companies had again increased to Rs 2.65 lakh crores, Rs 345 billion higher than the level agreed with the IMF.

The government has neither been able to give a firm date for the IMF staff-level deal nor reduce the cost of electricity and the circular debt.

Pakistani sources indicated that China might not grant further concessions in debt until resolving their over Rs 50,000 crores outstanding dues and ensuring security for Chinese nationals in Pakistan.

IMF bailout packages have hindered Chinese energy deals due to restrictions on repayments.

If China agrees to debt restructuring, the repayment period will be extended to 2040, including interest payments. According to Pakistani authorities, repayment would be $600 million less this year and can be reduced to just $1.63 billion after restructuring.

"For 2025, debt repayments would decrease from $2.1 billion to $1.55 billion a benefit of $580 million," sources said. However, the upfront relief would result in more repayments from 2036 to 2040. In April, Prime Minister Sharif ordered all imported coal-fired power plants, including three Chinese plants, to convert to local coal to save $800 million annually and reduce consumer rates by Rs 3 per unit. The finance and planning ministers will request Chinese approval for this project and propose financing with HBL.

Pakistan, China enter new era of cooperation

Focus on IT, minerals and mining, energy sectors to boost progress

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif on Saturday said that a new era of cooperation with China commenced in the areas of information technology, communication, minerals and mining, and energy, which would boost economic progress, regional connectivity and bilateral ties.

Chairing a meeting to review the implementation of agreements and memoranda of understanding (MoUs) between the two countries reached during the PM's recent visit to China, the premier said that he would not tolerate any disruption in their implementation and would personally supervise the process.

Referring to the longstanding Pakistan-China friendship, he said that China had always supported Pakistan in difficult and hard times. "China has emerged as the strongest economic power and Pakistan can emulate its development," he added.

The PM observed that recently a delegation of Chinese shoe manufacturing companies visited Pakistan to discuss the relocation of their plants, adding that such companies had the capacity to invest about $5-8 billion, the PM Office's media wing said in a statement.

He said that the local shoe manufacturers' association was in constant contact with the Chinese companies in that regard.

Moreover, PM Sharif said about 12 renowned Chinese companies related to the agriculture sector would be taking very active part in the Food and Agri Expo in Pakistan.

He reviewed progress on sending 1,000 Pakistani students on government scholarships to China for getting latest training in the agriculture sector.

The PM gave directives for sending students from the backward areas of Balochistan on a priority basis, besides other students from the four provinces, Gilgit-Baltistan and Azad Kashmir on merit.

The meeting was apprised that owing to the agreements and MoUs signed during the prime minister's visit, more than 100 Chinese companies were in contact with their Pakistani counterparts for business and investment purposes.

The meeting was informed by the Ministry of IT on the progress made in imparting technical training, one-stop operation for business facilitation, smart governance and smart city project of Huawei.

The prime minister directed Wapda authorities for establishing a safe centre for foolproof security arrangements for the Chinese nationals working on Dasu and Diamer Bhasha dams. He asked for immediate implementation of all the directives.

The prime minister was apprised of the progress on different projects related to communication infrastructure, electricity and Gwadar.

Is China fueling Pakistan's nuclear ambitions against India?

04 July 2024, The Economic Times

A recent photograph from the 2023 Pakistan Day Parade rehearsals has provided new insights into Pakistan's advancing military capabilities. The image depicts a JF-17 Thunder Block II aircraft carrying what appears to be a Ra'ad-I air-launched cruise missile (ALCM). This marks the first public display of this specific configuration, signaling significant strategic developments.

China has played a crucial role in aiding Pakistan's military modernization. The JF-17 Thunder, developed jointly by Pakistan Aeronautical Complex and China's Chengdu Aircraft Industry Corporation, is poised to take over from the aging Mirage III and V aircraft in Pakistan's air force. With over 130 operational JF-17s, this partnership underscores the deepening defense cooperation between the two countries.

FAS Confirms Nuclear-Capable Ra'ad-I Missile on JF-17

The Federation of American Scientists (FAS) analyzed the image and confirmed the missile as a Ra'ad-I, Pakistan's sole nuclear-capable ALCM. "Notably, this was the first time such a configuration had been observed in public," stated the FAS report. The identification was made by comparing the missile's 'twin-tail' design to the Ra'ad-II's 'x-shaped' tail, introduced in 2017.

Detailed Analysis and Comparisons

The FAS conducted a thorough comparison with previous versions of the Ra'ad missiles displayed in Pakistan Day Parades from 2017 to 2024. Using Photoshop's Vanishing Point feature, they measured the length of the missiles at approximately 4.9 meters. This measurement, along with the tail fin configuration, confirmed that the missile on the JF-17 is likely a Ra'ad-I rather than the newer Ra'ad-II or the conventional anti-ship variant, Taimoor. The report by Eliana Johns of FAS provided detailed insights into these findings.

Ra'ad-I vs Ra'ad-II

To ascertain the specific missile type, experts compared the observed Ra'ad configuration with past displays of Ra'ad-I and Ra'ad-II missiles. Notably, the Ra'ad-I features a 'twin-tail' design, distinct from the 'x-shaped' tail fin introduced with the Ra'ad-II in recent years. Using advanced tools like Photoshop's Vanishing Point, analysts estimated the Ra'ad missile's length at approximately 4.9 meters, consistent with previous Ra'ad-I specifications. This finding, combined with the tail fin configuration, strongly suggests the deployment of the Ra'ad-I ALCM on the JF-17 Thunder Block II.

Role of China in Pakistan's Military Advancements

China has played a crucial role in aiding Pakistan's military modernization. The JF-17 Thunder, developed jointly by Pakistan Aeronautical Complex and China's Chengdu Aircraft Industry Corporation, is poised to take over from the aging Mirage III and V aircraft in Pakistan's air force. With over 130 operational JF-17s, this partnership underscores the deepening defense cooperation between the two countries.

Strategic Shift and Modernization

The integration of the Ra'ad-I on the JF-17 represents a significant strategic enhancement for Pakistan. For years, Pakistan has relied on its Mirage aircraft for nuclear strike roles. However, budget constraints have forced Pakistan to repair and upgrade these aging planes. The induction of the JF-17, equipped with Ra'ad-I missiles, is expected to replace the Mirage aircraft and bolster Pakistan's nuclear deterrence capabilities.

Regional Implications and Impact on India

This development comes amidst a broader nuclear arms competition in South Asia involving India, China, and Pakistan. As India inducts Rafale jets capable of carrying nuclear weapons and advances its missile technology with MIRVs on Agni-P and Agni-5 missiles, Pakistan's enhancements with the JF-17 and Ra'ad-I underscore the intensifying arms race. The heightened tensions and development of short-range, lower-yield nuclear-capable systems by Pakistan raise concerns about regional stability and the potential for escalation in a conflict with India.

China and Pakistan have been cooperating in matters of defense. Additionally, Pakistan is developing other short-range, lower-yield nuclear-capable systems like the NASR (Hatf-9) ballistic missile, aimed at countering conventional military threats from India below the strategic nuclear level. These advancements, coupled with heightened regional tensions, raise concerns about an accelerated arms race and the potential for escalation in a conflict between India and Pakistan.

Islamabad currently holds 170 nuclear warheads as of 2024, and its nuclear warheads are stored separately from its missiles, assembling them only when necessary. This means that even if JF-17 jets are equipped with Ra'ad missiles, they are unlikely to carry nuclear warheads during patrols.

Pakistan's nuclear posture remains focused on countering India's conventional and nuclear capabilities. Unlike India, which has declared a No First Use policy, Pakistan emphasizes smaller, tactical nuclear weapons to counter India's superior conventional forces. Pakistan's warhead designs primarily use highly enriched uranium (HEU), produced at facilities in Kahuta and Gadwal, Punjab. The revelation of the JF-17 Thunder Block II's nuclear capabilities, supported by China, highlights Pakistan's strategic shift in modernizing its air force. The integration of Ra'ad-I missiles signifies a significant enhancement in Pakistan's nuclear deterrence, impacting the regional power balance. As South Asia witnesses an accelerated arms race, the implications for regional stability and potential conflict escalation remain critical concerns.

Pakistan's new anti-terror initiative aimed at protecting Chinese projects: Report

25 June 2024, Hindustan Times

Islamabad recently approved a revitalised national counter-terrorism campaign known as 'Operation Azm-e-Istehkam'.

China's reported hesitation to invest in new projects under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) stems largely from concerns about the security of its citizens and assets in Pakistan.

This hesitation appears to have prompted the Pakistani government to take action, as Islamabad recently approved a revitalised national counter-terrorism campaign known as 'Operation Azm-e-Istehkam'.

According to a recent editorial in Dawn, the move underscores Pakistan's recognition of the importance of addressing China's security concerns, especially at a time when attracting foreign investment is critical for the country's economic development.

Speaking at a press conference in Lahore, Pakistan's Defence Minister Khawaja Asif clarified that the main focus of operations under 'Azm-e-Istehkam' will be in Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa (K-P) and Balochistan.

He mentioned that a comprehensive plan detailing the framework for these operations will be announced in the coming days. Notably, Chinese citizens, workers, or projects have been targeted by violence or security threats within Pakistani territory.

These incidents have raised concerns about the safety and security of Chinese nationals and investments in Pakistan, particularly under projects like the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

Such attacks can have significant implications for bilateral relations between China and Pakistan, as well as for regional stability and economic cooperation.

However, military operations conducted by Pakistan frequently face allegations of human rights violations, which involve accusations of excessive use of force, arbitrary arrests, disappearances, and mistreatment of civilians in conflict zones such as Balochistan, Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, and in areas affected by insurgency.

These allegations are often reported by human rights organisations and international observers, raising concerns about the protection of civil liberties and adherence to international humanitarian law.

Such reports can strain Pakistan's relations with the international community and prompt calls for accountability and reforms within the military and security forces.

Azm-e-Istehkam: China's wish is Pakistan's command

24 June 2024, ORF, Sushant Sareen

The new operation Azm-e-Istehkaam is designed to curb Islamist terror networks and is clearly undertaken to allay the fears of China.

Military operations by Pakistan Army against Islamist radicals and terrorists are like the country's annual budgets: They all pretend to be aimed at solving the critical problems but they all falter because they never address the underlying structural causes that gave rise to the problem in the first place. And, quite like the budgets, military operations are often devised and designed not so much to address the principal problem as they are to satisfy and appease foreign players—the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in case of the budget, and increasingly China, in case of the anti-terror operations.

Yet another operation

Once again, Pakistan's hybrid regime has announced yet another military operation—Azm-e-Istehkaam (Resolve of durable stability)—to “combat the menaces of extremism and terrorism in a comprehensive and decisive manner”. Since 2007, this is the twelfth major anti-Islamist terrorist military operation, there have been many minor ones as well. Most of the earlier operations were of a tactical nature, focusing on a particular area that had become particularly troublesome. For instance, the Operation Rah-e-Rast and Rah-e-Haq were in Swat region, Sherdil was in Bajaur and Rah-e-Nijaat was in South Waziristan agency. The two big operations on a much broader front were the Zarb-e-Azb, which started in North Waziristan and then was extended to other regions, followed by Radd-ul-Fassad which was more an intelligence based operation to strike at terrorist networks which had spread throughout Pakistan. The new operation Azm-e-Istehkaam is aimed at curbing the Islamist terror networks which have resurfaced with renewed vigour and virulence after the Afghan Taliban shattered the “shackles of slavery” of US and its allies, ironically enough with Pakistan's assiduous assistance.

The new operation Azm-e-Istehkaam is aimed at curbing the Islamist terror networks which have resurfaced with renewed vigour and virulence after the Afghan Taliban shattered the “shackles of slavery” of US and its allies, ironically enough with Pakistan's assiduous assistance. Ostensibly, it aims at “full-blown kinetic efforts of the armed forces [which] will be augmented by full support from all law enforcement agencies, empowered by effective legislation to address legal voids that hinder effective prosecution of terrorism-related cases and award of exemplary punishments to them [terrorists].” Every military operation bears the unique imprint of the Army chief: Gen Ashfaq Kayani was very cautious and worried about the blowback, and therefore preferred limited operations; Gen Raheel Sharif preferred an all-out kind of operations without bothering too much about consequences; Gen Qamar Bajwa preferred small, tactical, intelligence based operations. The next few weeks will give a good idea about the military approach of the current Army Chief Gen Asim Munir.

China gets what China wants

However, what is clear is that this is the third military operation that is being taken to assuage the Chinese. In 2007, the Lal Masjid operation which became the catalyst for the formation of Tehrik-e-Taliban Pakistan (TTP) and led to a massive spike in terrorist activity inside Pakistan was launched after the Islamist radicals in the mosque raided a Chinese massage parlour and abducted the Chinese workers. The Chinese government is reported to have leaned very heavily on the then military dictator Pervez Musharraf to send in the Army to clean up the Lal Masjid. The Zarb-e-Azb operation was also prompted in part by Pakistan wanting to assure the Chinese that the operation was aimed at Uyghur militants. This latest operation has once again been forced on Pakistan by the Chinese. On 29 May, the Business Recorder newspaper reported that Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Sun Weidong told a visiting Pakistani delegation that was in Beijing to prepare for Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's visit about “the need for another Zarb-e-Azb against terrorist forces such as TTP, Majeed Bridge, BLA and others to crush them once and for all”. Recent attacks on Chinese—the latest being the suicide bombing in March of a bus carrying Chinese engineers working on the Dash dam project—had angered the Chinese who had been given repeated assurances by the Pakistanis of fool proof security.

Not only were Chinese investments in Pakistan under the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC)

proving to be a loss-making venture, even the physical security of Chinese workers in Pakistan was in grave jeopardy. It was made clear to the Pakistanis that future Chinese investments were contingent on Pakistan getting its act together on providing security to the Chinese workers. During Shehbaz Sharif's visit to Beijing in June last, despite all the hyperbole that usually accompanies anything to do between China and Pakistan, there was very little outcome in substantive terms. Speculation has been rife that there is a visible cooling off in the bilateral relationship. The Chinese seemed to be losing interest in at least the economic side of things which was supposed to have added a new dimension to the security and strategic relationship when CPEC was initiated 10 years ago. For a couple of years now, the Chinese have been trying to impress on Pakistan that without political stability (Istehkaam) and security, there was no way that the CPEC projects could move forward. The same message was given by Xi Jinping during Shehbaz Sharif's visit. And just a day before the announcement of the new military operation, the visiting Chinese minister Liu Jianchao bluntly informed his Pakistani hosts that "security threats are the main hazards to CPEC cooperation...In the case of Pakistan, the primary factor shaking the confidence of Chinese investors is the security situation."

The Chinese have, for long, been trying to impress upon the Pakistanis that if they are unable to protect Chinese workers, China should be allowed to bring in their own security. But Pakistan has balked at this demand and reiterated assurances of providing complete security to all Chinese.

The Chinese have, for long, been trying to impress upon the Pakistanis that if they are unable to protect Chinese workers, China should be allowed to bring in their own security. But Pakistan has balked at this demand and reiterated assurances of providing complete security to all Chinese. However, things seem to be reaching the point where Pakistani assurances need to be backed by concrete action on ground. This is required not just to satisfy the Chinese who are critical because they are really the only economic game in town for Pakistan, but also to push back the alarming inroads made by the TTP and other armed groups, including Baloch separatists. With Pakistan's economy in a mess, it desperately needs both foreign and domestic investment. But given the political instability and the deteriorating security situation, neither domestic nor foreign investors are ready to invest in Pakistan. However, conducting a large scale anti-terrorist military operation will not be an easy option for a variety of reasons. Between a rock and a hard place there are already carping sounds being made by the opposition. Add to this the fact that the civilian government does not really have the mandate to govern because they have come into power through a very controversial and tainted election. Second, a military operation is an expensive exercise. Although the defence budget has been increased by around around 18 percent, more money will need to be pumped into what is essentially both a war of attrition accompanied by some higher intensity combat. Third, if the military operations lead to greater violence, then it will spook most potential investors. The economic crisis is immediate and if there are major terror attacks then whatever negligible chance there is of the economy recovering will go up in smoke. Fourth, Pakistan is increasingly getting embroiled in what threatens to be an endless war, especially because the Afghan Taliban are unlikely to dump the Pakistani Taliban. Taking the war into Afghanistan to force compellence on the Afghan Taliban will mean a conflict that will suck Pakistan into the Afghan vortex.

First, there is no political consensus behind such an operation. In the fractious political environment,

Fifth, Pakistan has a fundamental ideological confusion in both state and society that militates against successfully fighting terrorism. It is not possible to extol the virtues of jihad against India, nurture and support terrorist organisations active against India, but fight against similar organisations that target Pakistan. Add to this the growth of fundamentalism and radicalism inside Pakistan, and it becomes even more difficult to prosecute this war. Soft-peddling and encouraging groups like the Bareilvi radicals of Tehrik-e-Labbaik and turning a blind eye to extremist ideology and indoctrination that is running rampant in society will only increase the complexity of the task of fighting terrorism. Pakistan Army just doesn't get it that the antidote of terrorism is not extremism. Finally, at a time when Pakistan has ramped up tensions against India—the recent terrorist attacks in Jammu are an example—can it afford a three active fronts, i.e., against India, Afghanistan and internal?

Pakistan has a fundamental ideological confusion in both state and society that militates against successfully fighting terrorism. It is not possible to extol the virtues of jihad against India, nurture and support terrorist organisations active against India, but fight against similar organisations that target Pakistan.

While the economic aspect could be addressed with assistance from the US (which appears to be cozying up to the idea of cooperating with Pakistan on the terrorism issue) and China, the bigger problem will be the political crisis which is likely to deepen in coming weeks with rising economic difficulties being faced by an already squeezed citizenry that is increasingly blaming the Pakistan Army and the incumbent regime for much of its woes. On the flip side, the Pakistani state doesn't have the luxury of time to wait until the economic and political situation stabilises before it grabs the bull of terrorism by its horn. The longer it waits, the greater the ingress of the Taliban and the more difficult it will be to extirpate them.

Chinese minister urges closer ties to achieve development goals

21 June 2024, The Express Tribune

Liu Jianchao says China-Pakistan friendship's foundation is public support

The senior Chinese minister conveyed these views during a meeting with Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Mohammad Ishaq Dar in Islamabad.

Addressing the Pak-China Consultation Mechanism meeting, Liu expressed that the event marks a positive step towards strengthening the relationship between the two countries.

He stated that the development of China and Pakistan would bring mutual benefits and create new opportunities through bilateral agreements.

Liu stressed the foundation of the China-Pakistan friendship lies in public support and highlighted plans for media, student, and youth exchanges.

He mentioned that both nations' leaders had agreed on upgrading the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

He also pointed out the necessity of improving security conditions to attract more investment to Pakistan.

Dar stresses political unity on CPEC

Dar welcomed the Chinese delegation, stating that their visit would boost mutual trust. He noted that all political parties in Pakistan support CPEC, recognising it as a cornerstone of cooperation between the two countries.

Dar praised the socio-economic benefits CPEC has brought to Pakistan and reaffirmed the country's commitment to its further development.

Earlier, a Foreign Office (FO) spokesperson announced that Deputy PM Dar met with Liu Jianchao. Both sides appreciated CPEC's contributions to Pakistan's development and pledged to continue its successful implementation.

Liu reiterated China's special regard for Pakistan in its foreign policy and expressed a desire to strengthen their strategic partnership. The two sides expressed satisfaction with the progress of CPEC and agreed to enhance high-level engagements and communication on key regional and global issues.

Pakistani PM Shehbaz Sharif highlights safety and economic cooperation with China

06 June 2024, Global Times, Xie Wenting and Bai Yunyi

Pakistani Prime Minister Muhammad Shehbaz Sharif made a strong commitment in Beijing on Thursday during a business reception event, stating that he would attach even greater importance to the safety of Chinese people in Pakistan than to the safety of his own children. He assured that Pakistan will make all necessary arrangements to protect Chinese people.

Shehbaz made the commitment at the Pakistan-China Friendship and Business Reception, which was held in Beijing on Thursday, with the participation of dozens of diplomats and businesspeople from both China and Pakistan. This event was part of the activities during Shehbaz's visit to China aimed at further enhancing cooperation and pushing forward the construction of the upgraded version of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

At the invitation of Chinese Premier Li Qiang, Shehbaz is paying an official visit to China from Tuesday to Saturday. This also marks his first visit to China since the establishment of the new Pakistani government this year.

At Thursday's event, Shehbaz recounted his first visit to China back in 1981 and hailed the remarkable development that China has achieved over the past decades, while stressing that Pakistan wants to learn from China's progress.

In an op-ed that Shehbaz wrote in the Global Times, he said that he viewed the visit as "a vital opportunity to further strengthen cooperation between Pakistan and China across political, economic, trade, and investment domains."

"Personally, it will also be an opportunity for me to, once again, benefit from Chinese wisdom on issues of peace, security, and development," he wrote in the Global Times.

During this visit, in addition to leading a federal cabinet, he also led a huge business delegation.

At Thursday's event, Pakistani businessman Salim Ghaury told the Global Times that he is very excited to visit China with the prime minister and the business delegation.

"China is a friend; China is a big economy. Pakistan can learn from China's growth and how they achieved it. I think it is important that we come to China regularly and see what China has done and benefit from it," he told the Global Times.

Ghaury owns a software development company. According to him, China is the company's biggest market, and they have over 20 customers in the country, including some big companies. The company also runs a main office in China.

"We have Chinese engineers working for us, so we work together in Pakistan and China to develop software... I think there could be more cooperation with the Chinese software industry to research and develop better products," he said.

Hasan Farid, a postdoctoral fellow at Hohai University, performed a song celebrating the relationship between China and Pakistan at Thursday's event. Majoring in business administration, he told the Global Times that he hopes to land a job in China in the future, after being in China for seven years.

Farid believes that the prime minister's visit is a "very good opportunity, and the timing is really important for both Pakistan and China," as the visit demonstrates how serious the government of Pakistan is about CPEC and how much Pakistan is looking forward to attracting foreign investment, especially from China, which is Pakistan's all-weather strategic cooperative partner.

He said people in Pakistan are also looking forward to the development of the upgraded version of the CPEC, viewing it as a "game changer" that will help Pakistan and the region develop.

Terrorism and economy expected to top agenda at China-Pakistan talks as security concerns cloud belt and road

02 June 2024, SCMP, Zhao Ziwen

- Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif will head to China, where he will meet President Xi Jinping and Premier Li Qiang

- Beijing is the South Asian country's key trading partner and investor, but Chinese-driven infrastructure projects have been targets of terror attacks

Counterterrorism cooperation and the economy are expected to be high on the agenda when Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif makes a five-day trip to China next week.

Chinese foreign ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning confirmed on Friday that Sharif's trip, which starts on Tuesday, will include talks with President Xi Jinping and Premier Li Qiang.

Sharif will also visit Guangdong province, China's economic hub, and the northwestern province of Shaanxi.

"Under the guidance of the leaders of the two countries, China and Pakistan have in recent years had close high-level exchanges, steadily advanced practical cooperation ... on the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, and maintained sound communication and coordination in international and regional affairs," Mao said.

It is Sharif's first trip to China since starting his second term as prime minister in March. His visit comes amid concerns about security in Pakistan's southwestern Balochistan and northwestern Khyber Pakhtunkhwa provinces, the site of a number of major Chinese infrastructure projects under the multibillion-dollar China-Pakistan Economic Corridor.

In the latest in a string of attacks targeting personnel working on Chinese projects, five Chinese nationals and their Pakistani driver were killed in a suicide bombing on their way to the Dasu hydropower dam project in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa in March.

Islamabad said it arrested 11 militants accused of being involved in the attack. It said the suicide bomber who targeted the Chinese convoy was an Afghan national.

One of the deadliest acknowledged attacks was in July 2021, when a suicide bomber on a bus killed 13 people, including nine Chinese workers in the province. More than 20 Chinese personnel were wounded in that attack.

Sharif's visit also comes as Pakistan faces a debt crisis and fiscal deficits.

According to data shared by the State Bank of Pakistan, the country's external debt reached around US$130 billion in 2023 – double the figure in 2015.

Chinese debt accounts for 13 per cent of Pakistan's total foreign debt, said Zhao Shiren, China's counsel general in Lahore, while addressing a gathering of business leaders in March.

Zhu Yongbiao, a professor with the school of politics and international relations at Lanzhou University, said China's investment in Pakistan would weather the constant terrorism threats.

Zhu said that China was “generally satisfied” with Pakistan’s counterterrorism operations, but that both sides still needed to strengthen cooperation in the field.

“The main area [of the visit] is still economic and trade cooperation, in order to help Pakistan’s development and enhance its capacity of self-reliance.”

China is Pakistan’s key trading partner and investor, especially in the country’s infrastructure.

China’s mega project in Pakistan – the CPEC – is a flagship infrastructure project under the global Belt and Road Initiative and is designed to link China’s northwest Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region directly to the Arabian Sea and the oil-rich Middle East.

As of the end of 2022, the CPEC had brought in a total direct investment of US$25.4 billion to Pakistan, official news agency Xinhua reported, citing data from the Chinese embassy in Islamabad.

It generated 236,000 jobs, helped construct 510km (317 miles) of highway, and contributed to the development of an 886km national power transmission network in Pakistan.

Afghanistan could be another topic discussed during the talks. China has started to lean on Afghanistan’s Taliban regime to prevent cross-border attacks on Chinese personnel and interests in neighbouring Pakistan, according to an earlier report from South China Morning Post.

The Post has learned that several Chinese diplomats in Islamabad and Kabul are seeking to persuade the Taliban to rein in Pakistani Taliban militants and prevent a surge in cross-border terrorism attacks.

Islamabad has accused Kabul of harbouring militants, but the Afghan regime has denied these claims.

China supports Pakistan in further investigating terror attack on Chinese: spokesperson

27 May 2024, Xinhua

China supports Pakistan in continuing investigation into a deadly terror attack on Chinese nationals and bringing to justice all the perpetrators, foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said on Monday.

China attaches great importance to the key progress made by the Pakistani side on the investigation, and will continue to work with Pakistan to strengthen security cooperation and ensure the safety and security of Chinese personnel, projects, and institutions in Pakistan, Mao said at a press briefing.

On March 26, a suicide bomber riding on an explosive-laden vehicle attacked a convoy of Chinese nationals heading towards a hydropower project, killing five Chinese and their Pakistani driver in the Besham area of Shangla district of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province.

Pakistan’s National Counter-Terrorism Authority Coordinator Muhammad Tahir Rai said Sunday that security forces have arrested 11 suspects accused involved the attack.

Mao said that terrorism is a common enemy of humanity and a scourge against regional development and stability.

China calls on countries in the region to strengthen counter-terrorism cooperation, root out all terrorist organizations, remove their breeding ground, and protect the common security and development interests of all countries, she said.

Chinese Propaganda in Pakistan: “Xinjiang Is Having Its Best Time in History”

24 May 2024, Bitter Winter, Massimo Introvigne

A seminar in Islamabad presented the region, where a genocide of Muslim Uyghurs is taking place, as a land where freedom of religion reigns.

Chinese diplomat Shi Yuangqiang addressing the seminar’s participants.

Several Parliaments in the Western world have acknowledged the persecution of Uyghurs and other Turkic people in Xinjiang as “genocide,” while the United Nations and the European Parliament stated that China is committing “crimes against humanity” in the region.

Yet, it was solemnly proclaimed in Pakistan that the “Xinjiang region is enjoying the best time in its history,” a provocative comment about a region whose inhabitants are targeted by crimes against humanity and genocide. The statement was uttered by the Chinese Deputy Chief of Missions (DCM) of Beijing’s Embassy to Pakistan, Shi Yuangqiang, at a seminar on “Dynamics of Xinjiang in Pakistani Perspective” hosted on May 18 in Islamabad by the Overseas Chinese Association Rawalpindi. It was as if German diplomats in Nazi times had tried to persuade their audiences that Jews in Germany were “enjoying the best time in their history.”

The seminar was attended by politicians and journalists. Shi particularly insisted that Uyghurs in Xinjiang "are enjoying the religious freedom that rejects the malicious propaganda campaigns of Western think tanks."

Shi praised Pakistan as one of the "best friends" of China and promised more economic support.

A sad but emblematic moment was where Uyghur children brought to the event had to lip sync in Chinese, i. e., pretend to be singing while in fact just moving their lips in synchronicity with pre-recorded songs.

This was an emblematic moment: Uyghur's youth cannot really sing their own songs, but they are admitted to lip sync the songs of their colonizers, while Pakistani VIPs applaud.

Pakistan scrambles for relief on $15bn energy debt owed to China

24 May 2024, Nikkei Asia, Adnan Aamir

UAE surprises with $10 bn investment in promising sectors of economy.

Cash-strapped Pakistan is moving to restructure more than $15 billion in power-plant debt owed to Chinese energy producers, in a move that threatens to dampen Beijing's appetite for future investment.

The South Asian nation is already on the hook for about $1.9 billion in unpaid operating bills at 20 China-backed power plants across the country. Most were built under the $50 billion China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a key part of Beijing's globe-spanning Belt and Road Initiative (BRI).

But Islamabad announced last weekend that it was seeking to restructure $15.4 billion in loans linked to the construction of those China-funded plants.

Pakistan wants to extend the maturity of the loans by five years to save roughly $2 billion in debt-servicing costs over the next several years, according to an official involved in the process who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak with the media.

Delaying payment could give the government some wiggle room to avoid raising electricity prices in the midst of soaring summertime demand. An energy price hike last year triggered widespread protests.

The surprise announcement came as Pakistan negotiates another bailout package in the range of $6 to $8 billion with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which has called on Islamabad to stop subsidizing the energy sector.

"It reduces the [debt] burden [of Pakistan] when it comes to negotiating with the IMF," Aadil Nakhoda, an assistant professor of economics at the Institute of Business Administration (IBA) in Karachi, said of the restructuring plan.

Pakistan's investment prospects have been dim, hampering its low-growth economy. This month, Saudi crown prince Mohammed bin Salman delayed a visit that Islamabad had hoped would generate billions of dollars in business deals.

In a rare bit of good news, however, the United Arab Emirates announced Thursday that it would invest $10 billion in promising sectors of Pakistan's economy, although more funding from China remains crucial.

Pakistan is aiming to get its proposed debt restructuring approved before Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif visits China next month. But observers said convincing Beijing could be difficult. The request comes amid tensions between the two countries after a series of deadly militant attacks on Chinese nationals and economic interests in Pakistan. Abdul Rehman, a Pakistan-based energy market expert, said Chinese officials will not agree to restructure the multibillion-dollar loans.

"China will give new loans, which can be used to repay the existing loans of power projects," Rehman said. "In this way, the debts will not be restructured and Pakistan's forex accounts will also get a breather."

Chinese companies have repeatedly called on Pakistan to settle its outstanding power bills, stoking fears that producers could suspend their operations to force Islamabad's hand. Pakistan is paying some of the operations' variable costs, such as fuel, and it is unlikely the Chinese companies would take such a drastic step, Rehman said. But "Chinese power producers' payment problems will surely affect future Chinese investment in Pakistan," he added.

This month, Chinese investors called for Pakistan to place funds in a foreign bank account to ensure that debts owed to power producers are paid on time. Pakistan has not accepted this demand, but it is under mounting pressure to placate them as a meeting of the Joint Coordination Committee (JCC) got underway Friday. The body makes decisions for the broader China-Pakistan investment framework, including about future funding and the suspension of existing projects.

"Given its burgeoning economic problems, Pakistan expects major investments from China at the next JCC meeting," another government official told Nikkei on condition of anonymity. "We fear that Pakistan's failure to honor commitments to pay Chinese power producers has made our investment pitch to China a very hard sell."

Interview: Pakistan firmly upholds one-China principle – president

22 May 2024, News CN, Deng Kaiyin, Jiang Chao, Zhang Jingyao

Pakistan abides by the one-China principle as the country always chooses to stand on the right side of history, Pakistani President Asif Ali Zardari said during a recent interview with Chinese media.

Tuesday marks the 73rd anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Pakistan. Recalling the rapport between the previous generations' leaders of the two countries, Zardari said: "My late father-in-law, Pakistan's former Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto told the nation to look east, to look towards China."

Zardari, who had visited China nine times during his first term as Pakistani president, said Pakistani people love China as "there is no conditionality between us." In the interview, the first one with foreign media after being re-elected as Pakistan's president for the second time in March, Zardari reaffirmed Pakistan's stance of upholding one-China principle, rejecting any form of "Taiwan-independence."

"Taiwan is part of China. There's no other way," the president said, adding that Pakistan will always stand with China and safeguard China's core interests.

Commenting on the development of Gwadar Port, a starting point of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), Zardari said many things have been done in Gwadar port since the launch of the CPEC 11 years ago, noting that the port will always welcome investors from all over the world.

Zardari said Pakistan is encouraging more schools to adopt the Chinese language into their compulsory curriculum. Emphasizing the importance of strengthening people-to-people exchanges between the two countries, he called for more policies to facilitate the movement of people between the two countries.

Speaking highly of the development achievements made by the Chinese people, Zardari said that ensuring the continuation of policies is one of the key reasons behind China's success, adding that Pakistan hopes to be more involved in China's development process.

"Long live Pakistan-China friendship!" Zardari said in Chinese while concluding the interview.

Today is the 73rd anniversary of Pak-China diplomatic relation

20 May 2024, Pakistan Today

In the limelight of international relations, there exists a thread woven with the deepest hues of solidarity and trust. Pakistan and China, bound by an unbreakable bond, stand as testament to the enduring power of friendship amidst the tumult of global politics.

From the towering peaks of the Himalayas to the bustling streets of Islamabad and Beijing, their diplomatic embrace echoes with the whispers of shared history and common aspirations.

Pakistan and China's diplomatic journey, which commenced on the 21st of May 1951, has transcended time, evolving into a formidable alliance with each passing day and year. This cherished relationship, rooted in mutual recognition and respect, has blossomed into an All-Weather Strategic Cooperative Partnership, epitomizing the unwavering commitment of both nations' leadership to propel it forward. Pakistan, among the first nations to embrace the People's Republic of China, holds China dear as its Iron Brother, while China, in turn, cherishes Pakistan as one of its closest friends and partners. This deep-seated camaraderie is underpinned by feelings of mutual trust, respect, and goodwill, fostering a regular exchange of high-level visits and strategic consultations between the two neighbors. Economically, China's stature as Pakistan's largest trading partner and a major investor, particularly in infrastructure and energy sectors, amplifies the bilateral synergy. The official launch of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a flagship project under President Xi Jinping's "One Road, One Belt" initiative, marks a significant milestone, elevating the bilateral relationship to unprecedented heights. CPEC, envisioned to enhance connectivity and infrastructure, has catalyzed monumental developments, fostering socio-economic prosperity and job creation across Pakistan. This transformative journey, facilitated by a robust mechanism of Joint Cooperation Committees and Working Groups, underscores the depth of commitment towards mutual progress and shared prosperity. As Pakistan and China continue to script a narrative of unparalleled friendship and cooperation, their enduring partnership serves as a beacon of hope, inspiring a more harmonious global community. Pakistan's diplomatic ties with China have stood the test of time, evolving into a robust alliance with multifaceted dimensions. Pakistan was one of the first countries to recognize the People's Republic of China, their relationship has grown from strength to strength. Throughout the years, their partnership has become a cornerstone of regional stability and economic growth.

In the early years, the two nations established their camaraderie on the foundation of countering common threats and challenges. As the geopolitical landscape evolved, their alliance served as a strategic counterbalance to the influence of neighboring India.

Moreover, China's substantial investments in Pakistan's infrastructure, including the transformative CPEC, have not only fueled Pakistan's economic growth but have also deepened the bond between the two nations.

Over time, their collaboration expanded beyond economic ventures to encompass defense and security cooperation. With a shared commitment to combating terrorism and ensuring regional security, China and Pakistan have engaged in intelligence sharing and military exchanges. Pakistan's pivotal role in China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) further solidifies their partnership, with CPEC emerging as a flagship project under this ambitious endeavor.

Their friendship extends beyond bilateral interests, manifesting in unwavering diplomatic support in international forums. Through thick and thin, China and Pakistan have stood by each other, forging a bond based on trust, respect, and mutual benefit. As they continue to navigate the complexities of global politics, the China-Pakistan relationship remains a beacon of stability and cooperation in an ever-changing world.

- 1949: The People's Republic of China was established.
- 1950: Pakistan becomes one of the first countries to recognize the People's Republic of China.
- 1951: Diplomatic relations between Pakistan and China are formally established.
- 1962: The Sino-Indian War strengthens Pakistan's ties with China as Pakistan supported China during the conflict.
- 1963: The Sino-Pakistani Agreement is signed, transferring territory from Pakistan-administered Kashmir to China.
- 1971: During the Bangladesh Liberation War, China supports Pakistan, leading to further strengthening of bilateral relations.
- 1978: China's reform and opening-up policies begin, leading to increased economic cooperation between China and Pakistan.
- 2013: China announces the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) project, enhancing economic collaboration between the two countries.
- 2024: China and Pakistan celebrate the 73rd anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations, highlighting the strong and enduring friendship between the two nations.

These milestones highlight the close and strategic partnership that has developed between Pakistan and China over the years. Further developments in Pakistan-China relations include ongoing military cooperation, cultural exchanges, and economic collaborations. The CPEC has emerged as a flagship project, aiming to enhance connectivity and promote economic development in Pakistan. Both countries continue to support each other on various international platforms, maintaining a strong strategic partnership. People-to-people exchanges, educational cooperation, and mutual support on regional and global issues further cement the bond between Pakistan and China.

The bilateral relationship between the two countries remains vital for regional stability and economic development in the broader context of South Asia and beyond. Worth mentioning that Pakistan and China's diplomatic relations have evolved into a multifaceted partnership with several key aspects driving their enduring bond. Firstly, their strategic partnership stands as a pillar of regional stability, with both nations collaborating closely on security, defense, and counterterrorism efforts. Secondly, economic cooperation forms a cornerstone of their relationship, with China emerging as a major investor in Pakistan's infrastructure projects, notably through the CPEC.

Additionally, military cooperation between the two countries is robust, encompassing joint exercises, technology transfer, and defense collaboration. Diplomatically, China consistently extends support to Pakistan on various international platforms, while Pakistan aligns itself with China on matters of mutual interest. Finally, people-to-people ties foster cultural exchanges, educational collaborations, and tourism, strengthening the bond between the peoples of both nations beyond official channels. As Pakistan and China celebrate the 73rd anniversary of their diplomatic relations, these five aspects underscore the depth and resilience of their friendship, which continues to shape the geopolitical landscape of the region. This relationship goes beyond mere strategic cooperation; it embodies a deep-rooted friendship that has weathered the tests of time and emerged stronger. Their partnership is characterized by a shared commitment to fostering peace, stability, and prosperity in the region. The bond also extends beyond bilateral interests, manifesting in a robust diplomatic support system in various international forums. Whether it's advocating for each other's positions on critical issues or standing shoulder to shoulder in times of global challenges, the two countries exemplify the true essence of solidarity and collaboration. At its core, the friendship between Pakistan and China is built on a foundation of trust, respect, and mutual benefit. This symbiotic relationship allows both nations to leverage their respective strengths and resources for collective advancement. From infrastructure development projects like BRI & CPEC to joint military exercises, their collaboration spans across diverse sectors of mutual interest. In an ever-evolving geopolitical landscape, the enduring friendship between China and Pakistan serves as a beacon of stability and cooperation. As both countries navigate complex global challenges and opportunities, their shared commitment to each other highlights the importance of fostering genuine relationships in the realm of international politics. By continuing to stand by each other through thick and thin, China and Pakistan set a commendable example for the world on how genuine friendship can transcend borders and contribute to a more harmonious global community. As we reflect on the remarkable journey of Pakistan-China diplomatic relations, spanning over seven decades, it becomes evident that the bond between these two nations is not merely defined by geography or shared interests, but by the enduring spirit of friendship and cooperation. With a border stretching over 5000 kilometers, their relationship stands taller than the mighty Himalayas, symbolizing the strength and resilience that characterize their partnership. Like the sweetness of honey, their relations are imbued with warmth and sincerity, transcending borders and cultural differences. As the old saying goes, "Iron brothers" indeed, their bond is unbreakable, and their commitment to each other unwavering. Through thick and thin, Pakistan and China have stood by each other, and their friendship will last forever, ever, a testament to the power of genuine camaraderie in shaping a brighter future for generations to come.

Pakistan, China on path to new heights of friendship

13 May, 2024, The Nation, Shafqat Ali

Pakistan and China are on the path to new heights of friendship amid top Pakistani leaders continuing visits to Beijing and the proposed trip by Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif.

The anticipation is palpable as Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar prepares for his journey to China today. The PM will also fly to China within days.

Beijing's unwavering support, manifested through financial aid and strategic partnerships, has been a cornerstone of Pakistan's economic stability in tumultuous times.

The recent extension of a multi-billion-dollar loan was not just a lifeline but a symbol of solidarity in the face of adversity.

The agenda for Dar's visit is ambitious yet crucial. Discussions of paramount importance include bilateral trade, cooperation, and the evolution of the monumental China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

This ambitious initiative, representative of President Xi Jinping's vision encapsulated in the Belt and Road Initiative, holds the promise of transformative change for both nations.

Against the backdrop of geopolitical shifts and regional dynamics, the dialogue between Dar and his Chinese counterpart, Wang Yi, transcends mere diplomatic niceties.

It will delve into the heart of mutual interests and shared aspirations, exploring avenues for deeper collaboration in the face of evolving challenges.

For Pakistan, the spectre of financial obligations and security threats loom over the CPEC project, underscoring the delicate balance between ambition and pragmatism. Pakistan's commitment to fulfilling its end of the bargain is unwavering, but the road ahead is fraught with challenges.

As Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's visit to China is on the anvil, the stakes are higher than ever. The 13th meeting of the joint cooperation committee on CPEC held the promise of accelerating progress and realizing shared ambitions. It was a testament to the enduring bond between Pakistan and China, forged in the crucible of mutual trust and shared aspirations.

China hands over data collected from Pakistan's first satellite mission on Chang'e-6 lunar probe

11 May, 2024, People's Daily Online

China on Friday handed over the data collected from Pakistan's first satellite mission on the Chang'e-6 lunar probe to the Pakistan side, and together they unveiled the first image captured by the CubeSat, the Global Times learned from the China National Space Administration (CNSA) on Friday.

China has carried out four international projects with the Chang'e-6 probe, including the European Space Agency's lunar surface ion analyzer, France's radon detection instrument, Italy's laser corner reflector, and the first-ever CubeSat from Pakistan, the CNSA previously revealed.

The CubeSat, named iCube-Q, is a remote sensing satellite co-developed by Pakistan's national space agency SUPARCO and Shanghai Jiao Tong University. It was launched in early 2023.

The iCube-Q and the orbiter separated near the far side of the Moon in a 12-hour elliptical lunar orbit on Wednesday, and subsequently successfully captured the first image. The project achieved its goal of "successful separation and obtaining telemetry," marking the smooth completion of Pakistan's first-ever lunar project, the CNSA said.

Through this mission, the CubeSat successfully validated nano-satellite lunar orbit detection technology, and explored the cooperation model between China and Pakistan in lunar and deep space exploration, laying the foundation for deeper cooperation between the two sides in future missions. After its grand liftoff on May 3, the Chang'e-6 lunar probe on Wednesday entered its circumlunar orbit after performing a near-moon braking procedure.

Later, the Chang'e-6 probe will adjust the altitude and inclination of its circumlunar orbit with the support of China's Queqiao-2 relay satellite, and implement the separation of the orbiter-returner combination from the lander-ascender combination. The latter will then make a soft landing on the lunar surface at the South Pole-Aitken Basin, which is widely considered by industry insiders to be one of the most challenging tasks in space exploration. A number of countries have struggled with this maneuver previously. Early in January, Japan's SLIM moon lander, took a tumble as it touched down on the lunar surface. This was described as a "success" by the Japanese space agency JAXA, even though the lander's solar panels were not angled properly to harness sunlight and power up the probe.

India protests China's building of road in Ladakh territory ceded to it by Pakistan

India has lodged a strong protest to China last week over the latter's building of a road in Shaksgam Valley which belongs to it, and which also has the potential to threaten Indian defences in Siachen Glacier. This 5180 square-kilometre Indian territory was illegally ceded by Pakistan to China in 1963, noted the hindustantimes.com and other reports May 3.

India lodged its protest against China both in New Delhi and Beijing. Besides, road could be part of an alignment that links Karakoram Highway to Upper Shaksgam Valley, bordering the Siachen Glacier. India's ministry of external affairs (MEA) said India has never accepted the so-called China Pakistan Boundary Agreement of 1963 through which Pakistan unlawfully attempted to cede the area to China, and India has consistently conveyed its rejection of the same, noted the timesofindia.com May 3.

"We have registered our protest with the Chinese side against illegal attempts to alter facts on the ground. We further reserve the right to take necessary measures to safeguard our interests," the report quoted MEA spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal as saying May 2.

India maintains that under the 1963 agreement, Pakistan illegally ceded to China 5,180 sq km of Indian territory in Shaksgam Valley from areas illegally occupied by it in the Union Territory of Ladakh. It has also maintained that China continues to be in illegal occupation of approximately 38,000 sq kms of Indian territory in Ladakh for the past six decades, the report said.

The new road transverses through 16333 feet Aghil Pass and could provide an alternative alignment to Karakoram Pass via Upper Shaksgam and thereon to Khunjerab Pass in Northern Areas of Pakistan-Occupied Jammu and Kashmir.

The hindustantimes.com report said the matter was of serious concern to India for if China extends the road to Upper Shaksgam Valley, then the Indian positions on Siachen Glacier will face twin threats – Pakistan in the South and China to the north. It is only logical to assume that the Indian Army will have to plan long term defences to deal with Chinese expansion in the Occupied Shaksgam Valley.

The report said that although the current road construction is a patch between two possible alignments in the long term, it is quite evident that China wants to link Lower and Upper Shaksgam valley through road and military outposts in order to pressurize Indian Army positions on Siachen Glacier and Saltoro Ridge.

India is stated to have been raising the issue of Shaksgam Valley in the Special Representative Dialogue on Boundary Resolution, the last of which was held in Dec 2019. This dialogue has, however, virtually been put on the backburner after Chinese PLA threw all the bilateral agreements out of the window and transgressed in East Ladakh in May 2020. India has no intention to allow Beijing to unilaterally impose the 1959 line on East Ladakh.

The report added that by lodging at least two protests in the past two years on road construction in Shaksgam Valley, India made it clear to China that it is right to protect its territory and will take measures to ensure that road construction is halted in the illegally occupied territory.

China pledges five-year development assistance for Nepal's Tibet-border districts

03 May, 2024, Tibetan Review

The Chinese government of Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), which constitutes roughly the western half of Tibet proper, is to fund a five-year initiative in Nepal's northern border districts, offering different kinds of logistical and material support, mostly for social and economic development projects. The inhabitants of these districts are ethnically Tibetan or of Tibetan-origin, with most of them practicing Tibetan religion and culture.

The TAR government will provide 20 million yuan or around Nepali Rs 370 million each year under the initiative for the next five years, reported the kathmandupost.com May 3, citing officials familiar with the development.

In order to execute this initiative, the first preparatory meeting was held in Lhasa over Apr 23-24, co-chaired by Kamal Prasad Bhattarai, joint secretary of Nepal's Ministry of Federal Affairs and General Administration of Nepal, and Baiman Yangzong, director general of the Foreign Affairs Office of the TAR government, the report said, citing a statement from Nepal's Consulate General in Lhasa.

The report noted that during his Nepal visit in Nov 2023, Wang Junzheng, the Party Secretary of TAR, had informed Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs Narayan Kaji Shrestha that Lhasa would provide Nepal 20 million yuan for administrative reform and development needs in Nepal.

The assistance will be used to build schools and health posts, install solar electricity, and fund other small projects in the northern 15 districts of Nepal, a Nepali official who attended the meeting in Lhasa last week has said.

The districts have been named as Taplejung, Solukhumbu, Sankhuwasabha, Dolakha, Sindhupalchok, Rasuwa, Dhading, Gorkha, Manang, Mustang, Bajhang, Dolpa, Mugu, Humla and Darchula.

The two sides will meet twice in the first half of the year with focus on the projects' arrangements and twice in the second half of the year for the implementation and review of the implemented projects, the report said.

The statement has further said the two sides discussed enhancing support for improving the livelihood of the people residing in the border districts through various projects.

Nepal's Ministry of Local Development was stated to be currently compiling a list of projects needed in the 15 districts that share a border with Tibet.

The report noted that China has already been implementing small-scale aid projects in the northern border districts of Nepal, providing each district Nepali Rs 3 million for the development of village development committees (VDCs), then local administrative units, in the districts.

The report suggested that the initiative began in 2014 when China agreed to provide 10 million yuan (USD 1.63 million) annually from 2014 to 2018 through the TAR government in areas like health, education and road sectors to improve the livelihood of the residents in those districts.

Later in Apr 2019, during the state visit of the then Nepali president Bidya Devi Bhandari to China, the two countries signed the Northern Area Infrastructure Development and Livelihood Improvement Project (NAIDLIP), under which Beijing pledged to provide funds for implementing various development projects, which was estimated to be 20 million yuan, the report said.

China Coast Guard holds second high-level meeting with Pakistani counterpart

26 April 2024, China Mail

The China Coast Guard (CCG) and the Pakistan Maritime Security Agency (PMSA) held the second high-level meeting in Beijing on April 24. The meeting was co-chaired by Major General Yu Zhong, director general of CCG, and Rear Admiral Imtiaz Ali, director general of PMSA.

The two sides jointly reviewed the results of bilateral cooperation in recent years, and spoke positively of the effective implementation of the memorandum of understanding (MoU) on strengthening cooperation and exchanges in maritime law enforcement. They also conducted in-depth exchanges on issues such as personnel visits, information exchange, training exchanges, ship visits, joint exercises as well as joint combat against transnational crimes at sea, and exchanged views on topics of mutual concern.

The two sides vowed to further deepen practical maritime cooperation, jointly safeguard maritime security order, and play a positive role in promoting the China-Pakistan all-weather strategic cooperative partnership to a higher level.

Former Pakistani PM Nawaz Sharif embarks on 'private visit' to China

Former Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif departed for China Monday evening for a five-day "private visit," maintaining a low-profile approach to the trip.

Accompanied by his grandson Junaid Safdar and personal staff, Sharif boarded a Chinese Southern Airlines flight from Lahore airport, as disclosed by the Pakistan Muslim League (Nawaz), of which he is the supreme leader.

However, specific details of Sharif's agenda during his stay in China were not disclosed by the party.

Reports from local media suggest that Sharif intends to undergo a medical examination in China and engage in meetings with Chinese companies concerning development projects in Punjab, where his daughter Maryam Nawaz serves as chief minister. Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar is also said to be accompanying him. Speculation within PML-N circles hints at the possibility of Sharif being on a "special assignment" during his time in China.

Sharif never visited China in the past for medical reasons. He went to the United Kingdom on medical grounds in 2019 and stayed there in self-exile, before his return in 2023 after the fall of Imran Khan's government. His younger brother Shehbaz Sharif is leading a six-party coalition at the Centre.

After his dream of becoming prime minister for a fourth time shattered in the February election, Nawaz Sharif has been keeping a low profile.

Pakistan strikes $200m deal with China for solar power conversion

13 April 2024, Link News

Pakistan has signed a $200 million Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with a Chinese firm to convert a thermal plant to solar power, as per a recent post by the Information Ministry.

The project will upgrade an existing thermal power plant to a 300 MW solar power plant through the Special Investment Facilitation Council (SIFC).

Furthermore, it will generate 400m units of electricity per year at a significantly lower cost, reducing the per unit cost from Rs45 to Rs40.

Another key advantage of this project is that it will eliminate the need for Heavy Fuel Oil (HFO), resulting in an estimated savings of $44m annually due to a reduction in import bills, offering attractive returns to stakeholders.

Growing Angst against China in Pakistan

11 April 2024, Baltimore Post- Examiner

A terrorist group linked to the Taliban attacked a convoy of Chinese workers near Gilgit, killing the bus driver and five Chinese nationals. The Chinese are currently working on the Dasu and Diamer dams, which are being built on reclaimed land in Kohistan district and Gilgit-Baltistan.

Investigators revealed that the bus transporting the Chinese was neither bulletproof nor bombproof. Maryam Nawaz, Punjab's chief minister, has accused the Chinese of violating security protocols, and complicating security officials' efforts.

This was the third major attack in less than a week on Pakistan-based Chinese, exacerbating Islamabad's national security concerns. In 2021, nine Chinese engineers working on the Dasu power project were killed in a suicide attack, causing the Chinese company to halt operations for several months.

Both Pakistan and China suspect that Indians and Americans are sabotaging the Chinese interests in Pakistan. Thousands of Chinese are working on multibillion-dollar infrastructure projects in Pakistan as part of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC). The Chinese are also working on several megaprojects in Gilgit-Baltistan, a territory claimed by India.

The Chinese government has demanded a thorough investigation into the fatal explosion. As a precautionary measure, the Chinese also temporarily halted work on the Diamer Dam in Gilgit-Baltistan.

Pakistan accuses the Taliban regime in Kabul of sheltering terrorists who carry out cross-border attacks. These are the same terrorists that Pakistan trained to cause mayhem in Afghanistan and India, and they have now become an embarrassment to Pakistan's military rulers.

Whatever terrorist groups the militants belong to, they demand Sharia law in Pakistan and blame the Pakistani military for being a pawn of non-Muslim western powers.

Many Islamic terrorists also resent Chinese for gross human rights violations and the ongoing genocide against Muslim Uyghurs in China's Xinjiang province. China has the world's largest concentration camp, where more than a million Muslim Uyghurs are still imprisoned for demanding basic religious freedoms.

The Taliban do not approve of Pakistan's double standards, which support and encourage Sharia law in Afghanistan while viewing the same immutable and flawless Islamic system as harmful to their own country's interests.

Pakistani rulers who used the Taliban to promote terrorism west of the Durand Line forgot that the Taliban would eventually cross the Durand Line and expand their influence in the eastern areas as well.

So far, the Taliban have refused to recognize the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, and continue to claim the grand old Indus River as the original demarcation between the two nations.

Some analysts also believe that in the near future, the Taliban will request military equipment from India, indicating a failure in Pakistan's strategic policy.

Terrorist attacks aren't the only concern for Chinese interests in Pakistan. The people of Gilgit have periodically spoken out against Chinese exploitation of their mineral wealth and water bodies.

The glaciers and rivers of Gilgit provide more than half of Pakistan's water needs, and the Chinese are building large dams here to generate tens of thousands of megawatts of electricity, which will be transported to Punjab's industrial hubs.

Gilgit residents do not benefit from these projects because Pakistani decision-making bodies refuse to accommodate their voices. Pakistan's popularity is dwindling in Kashmir and Gilgit as its economic downturn appears imminent. The Pakistani army fears that local angst is weakening its control over the vital disputed territory, which also serves as the sole land link between Pakistan and its ally China.

As we speak, several political parties, civil society organizations, labor unions, and representatives from the mining, travel and tourism industries are protesting in Gilgit to express their dissatisfaction with the absence of autonomy and basic constitutional rights. They are also expressing anger at Pakistan's policy of illegally settling Pakistani citizens in Gilgit to change its ethnic identity.

Recently, an event took place at the Geneva-based United Nations Human Rights Council where the special rapporteur on minority issues, Nicolas Levrat, lambasted Pakistani authorities for undermining the interests of the people of Gilgit and imposing an alien political system to deny locals their inalienable rights over their lands.

According to Greek politician and former MEP Konstantino Bogdanos, the people of Gilgit lack basic rights. He chastised Pakistan for taking a securitized approach to the region, transforming it into a large prison. He said that the deliberate political marginalization of Gilgit is deeply alarming and no country can afford to keep its people disenfranchised and devoid of basic freedoms.

In a joint statement, Saudi authorities have asked Pakistan's visiting prime minister to resolve the Kashmir and Gilgit issues with India bilaterally. This is a major setback for Pakistani rulers who expect a third party to intervene to resolve this seven-decade-old chronic dispute.

Whether it's Islamic terrorists, Chinese or Pakistani land grabbers, Gilgit-Baltistan is bound to become the axis of international politics in the coming days.

Pakistan-China border reopens for tourism and trade after 4 months closure

05 April 2024, Times of India

As per the latest development, Pakistan-China Khunjerab border opens for travel. If reports are to go by, following a closure lasting four months due to harsh winter conditions, the Khunjerab border between Pakistan and China has reopened, ushering in renewed opportunities for both commercial ventures and tourism.

If records are to go by, typically, the bilateral agreement dictates the closure of the border from December 1 to March 31 annually, owing to the extreme cold and heavy snowfall during these months. With the reopening of this vital border crossing, there is optimism for an upsurge in bilateral trade and tourism activities between the two nations. While the closure period temporarily halted trade and tourism activities, it's noteworthy that the transportation of essential goods for Pakistan's development projects continued uninterrupted across the border. Moreover, alongside the reopening of the Khunjerab border, transportation activities have resumed in the border areas of Gilgit-Baltistan, particularly in Sost, and the Chinese city of Tashghargan. This development signifies a reinvigorated flow of commerce and connectivity between Pakistan and China, promising economic benefits and bolstering bilateral ties.

Situated at a towering altitude of 16,200 ft, Khunjerab Pass serves as the sole link between the two nations over this rugged mountain range. It marks the entry point of the highest paved international road into China, connecting the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region of China with Gilgit-Baltistan of Pakistan.

Functioning under a border protocol agreement inked between the two countries in 1985, Khunjerab Pass stands as the highest paved international border at 15,500 ft above sea level. Further reports suggest that the pass remains accessible for travel and trade purposes between April and November each year, further facilitating the socio-economic exchange between the regions.

Notably, on November 12, the Chinese Government had announced the closure of the Khunjerab Pass for four months during winter, just a month after agreeing to keep the high-altitude road open throughout the year, as per the reports.

March

Six killed in suicide attack on Chinese engineers in Pakistan

27 March 2024, Reuters

A suicide bomber rammed a vehicle into a convoy of Chinese engineers working on a dam project in northwest Pakistan on Tuesday, killing six people, police said, the third major attack on Chinese interests in the South Asian country in a week.

The first two attacks targeted a Pakistan naval air base and a strategic port used by China in the southwest province of Balochistan where Beijing is investing billions in infrastructure projects.

The engineers were en route from Islamabad to their camp at the dam construction site in Dasu in the province of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, regional police chief Mohammad Ali Gandapur said.

"Five Chinese nationals and their Pakistani driver were killed in the attack," Gandapur told Reuters.

Dasu is the site of a major dam and the area has been attacked in the past. A blast on a bus killed 13 people, including nine Chinese nationals, in 2021.

Chinese engineers have been working on a number of projects in Pakistan with Beijing investing over $65 billion in infrastructure works as part of the China Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) under Beijing's wider Belt and Road initiative.

No one claimed responsibility for Tuesday's attack; there also had been no claim for the 2021 attack. Pakistan is home to twin insurgencies - one by Islamists and the other by ethnic militants seeking secession.

While Chinese interests are primarily targeted by the ethnic militants seeking to push Beijing out of mineral-rich Balochistan, they generally operate in the country's south and southwest - far from the site of Tuesday's attack.

Islamists mostly operate in Pakistan's northwest, the area where the convoy was attacked.

Khyber Pakhtunkhwa police have reached the spot and started relief operations.

A separate police source told Reuters the convoy was carrying staff of the construction firm China Gezhouba Group Company (CGGC) working on the Dasu hydropower project - the same company targeted in 2021.

Construction work ceased for months after that attack.

China's embassy in Pakistan demanded investigations into the attack.

"The Chinese embassy and consulates in Pakistan have immediately launched emergency work, demanding that the Pakistani side conduct a thorough investigation into the attack, severely punish the perpetrators, and take practical and effective measures to protect the safety of Chinese citizens," the embassy said in statement.

The embassy on Wednesday also warned Chinese citizens to stay abreast of the situation and strengthen security measures. It said China will work more resolutely with Pakistan to do its utmost to maintain the security of Chinese personnel, projects and institutions in Pakistan.

'FOREIGN ELEMENTS'

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif is expected to visit Beijing next week, according to a source in the Prime Minister's Office, his first since taking office following February elections.

On Tuesday afternoon after the attack, Sharif went to the Chinese embassy to offer condolences to victims' families and the Chinese government, the embassy said on Wednesday.

A Pakistani military statement said the three attacks in the last week were aimed at destabilising the internal security situation, accusing "foreign elements" of aiding and abetting such incidents in Pakistan.

It said strategic projects and sensitive sites vital to Pakistan's economic progress were being targeted in an effort to sabotage it and sow discord between Pakistan and its allies, most notably China.

Pakistan's Indian Ocean port of Gwadar, on the route to key Gulf shipping lanes, is managed by China, while nearby naval air base Siddique is used to support security and development work, spearheaded by Beijing, in Balochistan.

Both were attacked in recent days by Baloch separatists.

Foreign Minister Ishaq Dar condemned Tuesday's attack and said Pakistan would continue to fight back against militants.

Pakistan's foreign office said the life and safety of Chinese nationals in Pakistan was of paramount importance.

"Pakistan will continue to work with our Chinese brothers in ensuring the safety and security of Chinese nationals, projects and institutions in Pakistan," it said in a statement.

Pakistan assures IMF not to allocate additional budget for China-Pakistan Economic Corridor

17 March 2024, The Economic Times

The Pakistan government has assured the International Monetary Fund (IMF) that it will not allocate an additional budget to settle the Pakistcurrency (PKR) 493 billion dues of Chinese power plants, The Express Tribune reported on Sunday.

This comes as the IMF questioned the efficacy of the power sector's anti-theft campaign in Pakistan.

The IMF inquired about the government's decision on the allocation of funds for the Chinese power plants over and above the budgeted amount of PKR 48 billion for this fiscal year, said officials of the Ministry of Energy.

They added that the IMF was informed there was no plan to approve additional funds for retiring the outstanding debt of the Chinese power plants.

The outstanding dues of power projects of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) alarmingly increased to a record PKR 493 billion or USD 1.8 billion as of the end of January 2024. The amount was PKR 214 billion or 77 per cent higher than June last year.

The Pakistan-based news daily reported that the government also faced criticism about a record PKR 7 per unit increase in electricity prices in March due to the energy ministry's faulty policy of using expensive imported fuels, The Express Tribune reported quoting sources.

The loan lending organisation is in doubt about the government's claim of restricting losses due to the non-recovery of bills to PKR 263 billion in this fiscal year, as the amount has already almost reached PKR 200 billion in just seven months. This has serious implications for restricting the overall circular debt to PKR 2.31 trillion by June this year.

The build-up of Chinese debt violates the 2015 Energy Framework Agreement, which binds Pakistan to allocate sufficient money in a special fund to keep Chinese investors immune from the circular debt. However, the government is allocating only PKR 48 billion annually with a condition to withdraw a maximum of PKR 4 billion per month.

Sources said the IMF appeared sceptical about the long-term success of the government's anti-theft campaign and the military's involvement in monitoring the performance of power distribution companies.

Energy ministry officials said the IMF believes the anti-theft campaign can work only in the short term and the government needs to focus on digital monitoring of the power distribution network.

The government claimed it has recovered PKR 82 billion in this fiscal year because of its anti-theft campaign, although there is no publicly available breakup about recoveries from private and public sector consumers.

Sources said the IMF's view was that such measures can only be beneficial in the short term. The IMF also did not appear satisfied with the involvement of third parties in monitoring the anti-theft campaign, said the sources.

For the global lender, as such interventions could diminish the role of power distribution company management and their boards.

The low recovery of bills and high line losses contribute annually to PKR 589 billion in the circular debt build-up - a sum that the government recovers either through further price increases or budget subsidies.

For this fiscal year, the government estimates PKR 263 billion in losses due to lower bill recovery by power distribution companies. Despite the anti-theft campaign, in seven months, there has already been an increase of PKR 200 billion under this head.

Energy ministry officials claimed before the IMF that recoveries have increased to 92 per cent of the billed amount, marginally better than last year. They further said recoveries would improve once billing increased during the summer period.

The energy ministry officials said the finance ministry would release over PKR 250 billion in subsidies this month to keep the circular debt flow at the agreed level for this fiscal year.

The IMF was informed that circular debt increased by PKR 378 billion during the first half, jumping to PKR 545 billion by end March. However, the government has agreed to keep the overall debt stock at PKR 2.310 trillion by settling the addition through the budget by June this year.

The Express Tribune reported that the government also faced IMF questions over a sharp monthly increase of PKR 7 per unit due to monthly fuel cost adjustment in electricity bills. The sharp increase highlighted mismanagement by the energy ministry, which failed to implement planned use of various fuels to keep prices low.

Sources said the IMF argued there was no justification for the PKR 7 per unit increase when the exchange rate was stable and global commodity prices did not change.

The energy ministry explained the government had to seek the price increase due to using expensive fuels during winter for electricity generation. High-speed diesel, furnace oil, and imported gas were used due to a faulty policy of allocating cheaper local gas to other sources.

Sources said the IMF has also sought a fresh timeline for ending agriculture tube-well subsidies in Balochistan. (ANI)

Two Sessions fosters stronger Pak-China ties

05 March 2024, The Tribune

Pakistani experts have lauded the significance of the "Two Sessions" in fostering global economic stability in the context of jointly building the Belt and Road Initiative, particularly China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) initiatives.

They believe that the foreign policies and incentives for foreigners in China during these sessions are pivotal in enhancing economic cooperation and promoting sustainable development in the region.

Muhammad Asghar, a correspondent for the Associated Press of Pakistan in China, said that the strategic discussions held during the Two Sessions serve as a platform for fostering stronger ties between Pakistan and China.

"I'm attending different meetings and briefings during the six-day Two Sessions. I will focus on jointly building the Belt and Road Initiative President Xi Jinping launched a decade ago to build a community with a shared future," he stated.

"I am also looking forward to attending Foreign Minister Wang Yi media interaction and also the opening and closing ceremonies of Two Sessions in the People's Great Hall," he added.

Shahid Afraz Khan, a foreign expert in Beijing, said that the strategic discussions and initiatives undertaken during these sessions serve as a testament to the strong partnership between China and the world and their commitment to sustainable economic development.

"Jointly building the BRI has become the biggest mega development project of the 21st century which is successfully negating the spillover repercussions of geopolitics, protectionism, unilateralism, war-theatre mentality, isolation, marginalisation and gearing the developing countries and Global South towards greater socio-economic integration," Pakistani expert Dr Mehmoodul Hassan Khan told CEN.

Ship from China to Pakistan stopped at Mumbai port; Indian agencies suspect nuclear link

02 March 2024, Hindustan Times

Indian security agencies stopped a Karachi-bound ship from China at Mumbai's Nhava Sheva port suspecting a dual-use consignment that could aid Pakistan's nuclear and ballistic missile programme, officials said on Saturday, reported PTI.

Customs officials, acting on intelligence input, intercepted the Malta-flagged merchant ship, CMA CGM Attila, en route to Karachi on January 23. The consignment, featuring a Computer Numerical Control (CNC) machine manufactured by an Italian company, was thoroughly inspected during the operation.

What are CNC machines?

Computer Numerical Control (CNC) machine is a manufacturing device where computer software guides the movement of factory tools and machinery. This technology controls various complex machinery like grinders, lathes, mills, and CNC routers.

CNC machines ensure a level of efficiency, consistency, and accuracy that is unattainable through manual operation.

Concerns about CNC machines in nuclear programmes

Since 1996, CNC machines have been covered by the Wassenaar Arrangement, an international arms control regime aiming to prevent the spread of equipment with both civilian and military applications.

India, one of the 42 member countries, participates in the exchange of information regarding transfers of conventional weapons and dual-use goods and technologies.

The CNC machine was employed by North Korea in its nuclear programme.

A team from the Defence Research and Development Organisation (DRDO) examined the consignment and verified its potential use in the neighbouring country's nuclear programme.

Officials said that the seizure aligns with efforts to prevent potential proliferation by Pakistan and China. The consignment was coming from China

The consignment, originating from China, detailed the consigner as "Shanghai JXE Global Logistics Co Ltd" and the consignee as "Pakistan Wings Pvt Ltd" in Sialkot, according to documents such as bills of loading. However, a more in-depth probe by security agencies revealed that the 22,180-kilogram consignment was shipped by Taiyuan Mining Import and Export Co Ltd, intended for Cosmos Engineering in Pakistan.

Cosmos Engineering is already on watchlist

Cosmos Engineering, a Pakistani defence supplier, has been under scrutiny since March 12, 2022, when Indian authorities intercepted a shipment of Italian-made thermoelectric instruments at the Nhava Sheva port.

Officials expressed concerns about Pakistan potentially using China as a conduit to obtain restricted items from Europe and the US, disguising identities to avoid detection. Worries have heightened over Chinese support for Pakistan's nuclear and missile programmes, highlighted by a 2020 case involving the concealment of an industrial autoclave, crucial for missile production, as industrial equipment on a Chinese vessel bound for Pakistan.

The ongoing investigation seeks to determine if the suspected Pakistani entities receiving these dual-use items are supplying them to the Defence Science and Technology Organisation (DESTO), responsible for much of Pakistan's defence research and development.

Pakistan 'secures' $2 billion loan rollover from China

28 February 2024, The News

Rollover to support SBP depleting foreign reserves stand at $8 billion

ISLAMABAD: In a major boost to the country's foreign exchange reserves, China has rolled over $2 billion to Pakistan, Ministry of Finance sources told Geo News on Wednesday.

Pakistan has borrowed $2 billion from China on a 7.1% interest rate, the sources said, adding that the loan was maturing in the week of March.

The sources said Pakistan paid Rs26.6 billion in the last fiscal year to China, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE) on the $9 billion deposits that these three nations placed with the State Bank of Pakistan.

The rollover will support the State Bank of Pakistan (SBP) depleting foreign reserves which stand at $8 billion.

Last month, caretaker Prime Minister Anwaar-ul-Haq Kakar wrote a letter to his Chinese counterpart Li Qiang, seeking the rollover of a $2 billion loan.

In his letter to China's premier, the interim prime minister has requested that Beijing roll over Pakistan's $2 billion loan for a year, sources had told Geo News.

PM Kakar, in his letter to the Chinese premier, also thanked the Chinese government for financial support, the finance ministry sources said.

The sources, citing the letter, stated: "China gave a loan to the government of Pakistan in a difficult economic situation."

A total of $4 billion worth of funds in loans, as per the sources, has been kept as a safe deposit, which has reduced Pakistan's external payments burden.

Last year in May, Beijing came to Pakistan's rescue during its struggle to secure the critical pending loan from the International Monetary Fund (IMF), as the Chinese government rolled over more than $2 billion in debt.

The friendly neighbour had committed to help Islamabad meet two crucial debt repayments in June worth $2.3 billion by providing fresh funds immediately after Pakistan was to make the payments.

"The refinancing of the commercial loans worth $1.3 billion and a Chinese government loan of $1 billion would help Pakistan avert immediate default," a senior government official told The News in May 2023.

Earlier last year, China had already rolled over some loans to Pakistan and Chinese Foreign Minister Qin Gang also reiterated Beijing's financial support for the country on a visit to Pakistan back in May last year.

Pakistan exports to South China increase by 16pc in 2023

23 February 2024, The Nation

Pakistan's exports to South China have witnessed a significant surge of 16 percent during the year 2023. This remarkable achievement comes as a result of the strengthened trade ties between the two countries and Pakistan's ongoing efforts to diversify its export market, said Muhammad Irfan, Trade and Investment Counsellor Pakistan's Consulate in Guangzhou, China.

According to the latest data released by the General Administration of Customs of China (GACC), the total value of exports from Pakistan to South China reached a record high of $973.21 million from January-December of 2023, compared to $836.645 million in the previous year. This upward trajectory is a testament to the resilience and competitiveness of Pakistan's export sector.

Guangdong province imported $379.011 million worth of goods from Pakistan in 2023, while Fujian province imported $367.30 million. On the other hand, imports in the previous year were 248.532 million, up by 48 percent, followed by the Guangxi Zhuang autonomous region's 86.790 million and $80.164 million, up by 8 percent, in 2022. In 2023, Hainan province imported goods worth $85.883 million, with a 56 percent increase, and in 2022, its imports were $24.371 million, increased by 123 percent to $54.227 million, he told China Economic Net (CEN).

He further said that the surge in exports to South China can be attributed to various factors, including the preferential trade agreement between Pakistan and China, known as the China-Pakistan Free Trade Agreement (CPFTA).

This agreement has eliminated or significantly reduced tariffs on a wide range of goods, making Pakistani products more affordable and competitive in the Chinese market.

Due to the significant participation of Chinese participants in two major events held in Pakistan, the Food and Agriculture Exhibition and TEXPO 2023, Pakistan's exports to South China surged by 69 percent in the second half of 2023. The key sectors contributing to Pakistan's export growth in South China include textiles, leather products, seafood, and agricultural commodities. Sesame seed, rice textiles, and garments, in particular, have witnessed a significant surge in demand, as Pakistani textile manufacturers have managed to produce high-quality products at competitive prices Irfan mentioned.

He further said that the Pakistani government has also played a vital role in promoting exports to South China by providing various incentives and support to exporters. These include subsidised loans, export financing schemes, and trade exhibitions to showcase Pakistani products in the Chinese market. Furthermore, the geographical proximity of South China to Pakistan has facilitated the smooth flow of goods, reducing transportation costs and time.

This advantage has allowed Pakistani exporters to deliver their products more efficiently and gain a competitive edge over other countries. It is to be noted that the total exports of Pakistan to China from 2021-2023 increased by 1.4 percent on year-on-year basics.

Irfan added that the increase in exports to South China is beneficial for Pakistan's economy and helps in bridging the trade imbalance between the two countries. Historically, Pakistan has been heavily reliant on imports from China, and the export surge has helped to reduce this dependency and create a more balanced trade relationship.

China Endorses 'Successful' Pakistan Polls With Big Thumbs Up to Army Amid Rigging Claims

21 February 2024, News18

In what appears to be a clear endorsement of the February 8 polls, China has congratulated Pakistan on its 'successful elections,' even as controversy brews over alleged rigging. Speaking at a regular press conference on Monday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning commended Pakistan's handling of the polls.

"As a close and friendly neighbour, China fully respects the choice of the Pakistani people and sincerely hopes that relevant parties of Pakistan will work together to uphold political solidarity and social stability after the elections and jointly open up a brighter future for the development of the country," Ning said in response to a question posed by China News Service on Pakistan elections.

"China and Pakistan are all-weather strategic cooperative partners. China hopes to work with Pakistan to build on the traditional friendship, deepen practical cooperation in various areas, and accelerate the building of an even closer China-Pakistan community with a shared future in the new era for the benefit of the peoples of the two countries," the Chinese spokesperson added.

Answering a question about the absence of a decisive mandate, Ning said, "We noted that general elections in Pakistan are held in a generally steady and smooth manner and we fully respect the choice of the Pakistani people. We hope and believe that relevant parties of Pakistan will uphold solidarity, maintain stability and properly handle relevant issues to jointly open up a brighter future for the development of the country."

The statement is viewed as support for Pakistan's military establishment, countering US criticism of election integrity. "China's statement is out of turn to calm down the controversy going on due to election rigging," said top Pakistan govt sources. They told CNN-News18 that this endorsement challenges voices like Bilawal Bhutto Zardari and Imran Khan, indicating China's preference for stability over democratic processes.

It also signals the approval of Army Chief Gen Asim Munir's leadership. While aimed at calming tensions in the debt-ridden country, China's intervention underlines its strategic interests in its "all-weather" partner. The move also highlights tensions between China and the US regarding democratic norms and regional influence, potentially impacting future diplomatic relations between the countries.

Cash-strapped Pakistan seeks $2 billion loan from China

27 January 2024, The Economic Times

Cash-strapped Pakistan has sought financial assistance of USD 2 billion from its close ally China for a year, according to a media report on Saturday. Caretaker Prime Minister Anwaarul Haq Kakar, in a letter, has requested his Chinese Premier Li Qiang to roll over the debt as soon as the deposit time for the loan from China is completed on March 23.

In his letter, Kakar expressed gratitude to China for its financial assistance to Pakistan during its economic crisis as the cash-strapped country has secured a safe deposit of a total of USD 4 billion in loans from China, reducing the country's mounting pressure on external debt payments and stabilising its foreign exchange reserves, The Express Tribune newspaper reported.

Earlier this month, the UAE rolled over Pakistan's maturing loan of USD 2 billion.

Apart from the UAE, Saudi Arabia has deposited USD 5 billion with the State Bank of Pakistan.

Following the loan rollover by the UAE, the interim government requested the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to dispatch a new mission this month for talks for the last loan tranche of USD 1.2 billion.

The IMF's next mission is critical for not only securing the last loan tranche but also for beginning negotiations for a new long-term programme.

While speaking to a private TV news channel recently, former finance minister Ishaq Dar said in case his party - the Pakistan Muslim League-Nawaz (PML-N) - won the elections and formed the government, the decision about the new IMF programme would be made at the earliest.

Dar, the four-time finance minister of the country, added that in case his party decided not to enter the IMF programme, it would immediately start implementing the belt-tightening measures.

The IMF has made new adjustments in its fresh staff-level report about the available financing to Pakistan. The Washington-based lender has increased the projection of budget support loans to USD 3 billion but cut the project financing to USD 3.7 billion for this fiscal year.

The overall external financing requirements have been reduced to a little under USD 25 billion with minor downward adjustments in the current account deficit projections, the report said.

The report suggested the global lender had made a minor adjustment of USD 575 million in its current account deficit projection in comparison with July's estimates.

The IMF has now projected the deficit at USD 5.7 billion or 1.6 per cent of the GDP - an estimate that appeared on the higher end.

Pakistan is in economic ruin and awaiting a monumental financial default without long overdue structural reforms sought by global creditors such as the IMF and the World Bank, along with bilateral partners like China and the UAE.

The primary reason behind Pakistan's economic woes is its staggering debt levels, which, as of 2023, amount to nearly USD 125 billion owed to external creditors, with approximately one-third to China.

China stands ready to work with Pakistan to upgrade Cpec project: Report

25 January 2024, Times of India

ISLAMABAD/BEIJING: China has said that it stands ready to work with Pakistan to upgrade the multi-billion dollar China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (Cpec) project to deepen the political mutual trust between the two "all-weather" allies, a media report said on Thursday. Caretaker Prime Minister Anwaarul Haq Kakar said after having achieved the first phase of the Cpec, Pakistan is benefiting from its early harvest projects while remaining engaged with China to execute the next phase.

Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin while answering a question during a briefing on Wednesday said, "China stands ready to work with Pakistan to deliver on the important common understandings between the leaders of the two countries, deepen political mutual trust, and expand practical cooperation."

China has said it is ready to work with Pakistan to upgrade the Cpec and accelerate the building of an even closer China-Pakistan community with a shared future in the new era, the Dawn newspaper reported. The CPEC, which connects Gwadar Port in Pakistan's Balochistan with China's Xinjiang province, is opposed by India as it is being laid through Pakistan-occupied Kashmir (PoK).

About the recent visit of Chinese vice foreign minister Sun Weidong to Pakistan, Wang said, he called on President Arif Alvi, Prime Minister Kakar, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Committee General Sahir Shamshad Mirza, Chief of the Army Staff General Syed Asim Munir and foreign minister Jalil Abbas Jilani to have an in-depth exchange of views on bilateral relations and issues of mutual interest.

The spokesperson added that the Chinese minister also co-chaired the fourth meeting of the CPEC Joint Working Group on International Cooperation and Coordination with foreign secretary Syrus Sajjad Qazi.

"China and Pakistan are all-weather strategic cooperative partners," he said. China appreciates Pakistan's firm commitment to the One-China principle and supports Pakistan in defending its sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity, stability, development and prosperity.

In Islamabad, Prime Minister Kakar said that after having achieved the first phase of CPEC, Pakistan is benefiting from its early harvest projects while remaining engaged with China to execute the next phase.

"We have already achieved the CPEC's first phase and we are benefiting from its early harvest projects. We are entering the second phase. We do need more deliberations when it comes to the second phase," he said in an interview recorded by CGTN during his recent visit to Davos to attend the World Economic Forum.

The Chinese state-run news outlet ran the interview on Wednesday. Prime Minister Kakar said the CPEC's second phase required road and air connectivity around industrialisation projects.

"Both sides are engaged and we have developed a lot of connectivity - road, air and the rest of the connectivity corridor. We are benefiting from the ecosystem of doing trade with one another," he said. Asked how he saw the Chinese economy, the prime minister said: "I am always sanguine about it. There are 1.5 billion consumers and 1.5 billion producers... How can you divorce 1.5 billion people from 8 billion people? It has to remain connected."

China assures Pakistan of closer economic ties, support on efforts to defend 'territorial integrity'

23 January 2024, South China Morning Post

China seeks stronger economic ties with Pakistan under the Belt and Road Initiative, and supports its efforts to defend “territorial integrity”, a senior Chinese diplomat has said.

Foreign vice-minister Sun Weidong made the pledge during a visit to Pakistan days after it engaged in deadly tit-for-tat air strikes along the border with Iran.

Sun arrived in Islamabad on Saturday to attend a working group meeting on the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a centrepiece of Beijing’s belt and road cooperation with the neighbouring country.

His three-day trip also included a series of talks with top Pakistani leaders and military chiefs, including President Arif Alvi, caretaker prime minister Anwaar-ul-Haq Kakar and caretaker foreign minister Jalil Abbas Jilani. Pakistan is scheduled to hold general elections early next month.

Meeting Alvi on Monday, Sun said Beijing supported Islamabad in its defence of “sovereignty, independence, and territory integrity”, in what was a clear reference to the cross-border military assaults last week.

Later the same day, Sun told army chief General Syed Asim Munir that he acknowledged Pakistan’s efforts to promote regional peace and stability. He also travelled to Rawalpindi for talks with General Sahir Shamshad Mirza, chairman of Pakistan’s joint chiefs of staff committee.

The Pakistani army said the talks covered bilateral security, defence cooperation, and the “regional and international security environment”.

Pakistan on Thursday carried out missile strikes in Iran’s border areas, two days after Tehran staged its own cross-border air raid. Both sides said they were targeting separatist militant groups. The deadly attacks sparked fears of a wider spillover of the conflict in the Middle East and sparked a diplomatic stand-off between the neighbours.

But tensions have since eased, with full diplomatic ties resuming on Monday. Tehran also said Foreign Minister Hossein Amir Abdollahian would visit Pakistan next week at Islamabad’s invitation.

Ma Zhaoxu, another Chinese foreign vice-minister, held a phone call with Iranian deputy foreign minister Ali Bagheri Kani on Sunday. They exchanged “views on bilateral relations, and regional and international issues of mutual interest and concern”, a statement from Beijing said, but did not reveal details.

Asked whether Beijing was playing mediator – given Ma’s phone call and Sun’s Pakistan trip – Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin on Monday said China maintained “close connections” with both countries, and was willing to continue to play a “positive and constructive role in improving the relationship” between them.

As China’s “iron brother”, a term indicative of their “all-weather strategic partnership”, Pakistan shares a close military connection with its more powerful neighbour and is the largest buyer of Chinese weapons.

During talks with Alvi, Sun also voiced support for Pakistan in promoting “stability, development and prosperity”, while pledging to create an “upgraded version” of the CPEC, according to the Chinese ministry.

The more than US$50 billion flagship corridor is part of Beijing’s efforts to connect its landlocked western Xinjiang region to the Arabian Sea through Pakistan’s Gwadar port in Balochistan province – targeted by Iran in its January 16 raid.

The most high-profile belt and road plans in Pakistan revolve around the CPEC, which involves dozens of infrastructure projects, including Gwadar.

On Sunday, Sun co-chaired the fourth round of a high-profile meeting to review the CPEC, alongside the foreign secretary of Pakistan, Mohammad Syrus Sajjad Qazi. Previous meetings of the CPEC Joint Working Group on International Cooperation and Coordination were held in 2019, 2020 and 2022.

Sun and Qazi pledged to focus on information technology, science and technology, and agriculture for future development of the CPEC, Pakistan’s foreign ministry said.

The two countries also “rejected the disinformation campaigns and distorted reporting” on the CPEC, and pledged to “counter fallacious narratives and misinformation”.

Gwadar port is one of many CPEC projects in Pakistan’s largest but poorest region of Balochistan, bordering Afghanistan and Iran. The ethnic minority Baloch there have protested against China’s infrastructure plans and carried out deadly attacks against Chinese projects and personnel.

With the CPEC project at the centre of Islamabad’s conflict with Baloch separatists, Beijing has become increasingly worried about the security situation there.

Last year, China reportedly cited security concerns in turning down Pakistan’s call to invest in new CPEC projects related to energy, climate change, electricity transmission lines and tourism.

Calling on caretaker foreign minister Jilani in Islamabad on Monday, Sun emphasised Pakistan’s role as an “iron brother and reliable friend”, and an important part of China’s foreign policy.

Jilani emphasised the significance of the CPEC for Pakistan and thanked China for its support, while pledging that Pakistan would continue to strive to realise the corridor’s full potential for shared benefits.

China on mediation mission to 'bridge' differences between Pakistan and Iran

22 January 2024, The Hindu

China maintains close communication with Iran and Pakistan, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin said

China on January 22 said it is maintaining close contacts with Pakistan and Iran to "bridge their differences" after the two nations conducted airstrikes against each other last week.

The Foreign Ministry's statement came amidst the reported visit of Foreign Minister Sun Weidong to Pakistan on a mediation mission.

China on Thursday last offered to play a "constructive role" to ease tension between Islamabad and Tehran after Pakistan conducted "precision military strikes" against what it called "terrorist hideouts" in Iran's Sistan-Balochistan province that killed 9 people in the wee hours on Thursday. The attack was seen as retaliation to Iranian missile and drone attacks on Tuesday last which targeted two bases of the Sunni Baloch militant group Jaish al-Adl in Pakistan's unruly Balochistan province.

The attacks have put China in a piquant situation as Pakistan is an all-weather ally, while Iran is warming up to Beijing in recent years enabling China to expand its influence in the West Asia region. China also imports a considerable amount of oil from Iran.

China maintains close communication with Iran and Pakistan, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin told a media briefing on Monday when asked by a Pakistani journalist about Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Ma Zhaoxu's phone call with Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister Ali Bagheri Kani on Sunday and the current visit of another Vice Foreign Minister Sun Weidong to Pakistan.

Mr. Sun was a former Ambassador to Pakistan and India.

Mr. Wang said Iran and Pakistan are friendly neighbours, and both are good friends of China.

"China is committed to upholding regional and international peace and stability, and supports Iran and Pakistan in continuing to bridge differences through dialogue and consultation," Mr. Wang said.

The spokesperson said China would like to continue to play a positive and constructive role in improving the relations between Iran and Pakistan based on the needs of the two countries.

Remaining works of peace process to be completed on consensus: PM Dahal

21 January 2023, The Himalayan Times

Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal 'Prachanda' has expressed the belief that the remaining works of the peace process would be completed on the basis of consensus.

Addressing a special news conference organised at Tribhuvan International Airport upon returning home after attending the 19th Summit of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) today, he reiterated that the bill on Truth and Reconciliation Commission would be taken to its logical conclusion.

The PM stated that discussions are on with all sides and the remaining works of the peace process would be concluded through consensus immediately after the commencement of the upcoming session of the Federal Parliament.

"We have made preparations on the Truth and Reconciliation Bill after holding discussions with all. It has landed in the parliamentary committee after finalization from the sub-committee. It will be taken to the full house once the parliament session opens and concluded with priority," he said. Prime Minister Dahal said he is effortful to have the bill decided through consensus.

The Prime Minister said the government's works have been expedited and the ministers also have been directed to carry out works accordingly. "Ministers would be made to work providing them with target and we will take decisions accordingly if the responsibilities are not carried out in the right manner," he added.

According to the PM, although Nepal's bureaucracy is not weak in terms of efficiency and experience, there is some lacking when it comes to promptness, seriousness and courage to take initiation. He shared that he has been regularly holding discussions with the Chief Secretary, secretaries and the bureaucracy. Govt serious on recruitment of Nepali youths in Russian military force

Asked about the woes Nepali youths facing after their recruitment in the Russian Army, the PM said he was serious and sensitive to that issue.

"The government is very much serious and sensitive towards the reports that Nepali youths are recruited in the Russian force and mobilised in the Russia-Ukraine conflict. We don't have such policy on behalf of the government," PM Dahal added.

The PM stated that the government has no policy to allow Nepalis for their recruitment in the military force in any other countries except the past agreements made for India and England.

He also shared that a diplomatic note has been sent to Russia on this issue and the Foreign Minister has repeatedly talked about this agenda.

The PM added that Nepal's Foreign Minister held talks with Russian Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs at Kampala of Uganda during the 19th NAM Summit and was urged to send Nepali youths back home.

He said that talks were held regarding the youths killed in the war and the government has seriously taken the issue of compensation for them.

"Everyone should disseminate awareness among people. We should spread awareness stating that youth should not join the military service anywhere in name of seeking job against the State's policy, the spirit of the Constitution and against the spirit of our democratic national independence. We should further aware people saying this is not the way to leave the country by avoiding formal way. The government is serious. All should work on it (to stop)," the PM argued.

Likewise, the PM said that Nepal has taken Taiwan as an integral part of China since the beginning. "We are not in favour of policy of separation of Taiwan after accepting One-China Principle," PM Prachanda asserted.

Taiwan is China's part and Nepal is stuck to this policy since the beginning, according to the PM.

China's reopening border reflection of Pakistan's good economy, experts say

15 January 2024, Pakistan Today

Looking back on the past year, one of the good things for Pakistan's economy was that China reopened its border, which is good not only for Pakistan's economy, but also for the global economy. This was stated by Dr. Abid Qaiyum Suleri, executive director of Sustainable Development Policy Institute (SDPI), Pakistan and member of the Pakistan Climate Change Council said in an exclusive interview with China Economic Net (CEN).

"Take Pakistan as an example, as a close trade partner of China, Pakistan was able to increase its exports to China", he added.

In the 1st half of FY 2023-24 (July-December), Pakistan's exports to China surged by 66.4%, reaching US$1.5458 billion, attesting to the tremendous potential of China as the second largest consumer market in the world.

"I'm quite optimistic about China's economy. The way it handles the risks in real estate has shown resilience. And the demand is there.

As the Chinese economy is taking up, Pakistan, as with many other countries that are economically interrelated with China, would be able to get the benefit of it", Dr. Abid Qaiyum Suleri told CEN.

In his opinion, technological advancement, innovation, and the booming service sector are driving China's economy and shaping its bright prospects.

"If we look at the electric vehicles, Chinese automakers have been able to supply more new energy vehicles than Tesla", he exemplified, adding that Pakistan can benefit from China's renewable energy experience, by setting up joint ventures for example, to transition from a traditional economy to a climate-friendly and green economy.

"For long, it was seen that going green would have a negative impact on growth. That hypothesis is no longer valid. Now, countries, aware that the cost of protection is high, have to go green", he observed.

"But the cost of transition is high. So at the multilateral level, we should keep talking about climate justice and the historical responsibility of advanced economies", he suggested.

At the bilateral level, he said Pakistan needs to strengthen its technological and financial cooperation with China to benefit from China's experience in areas like climate-smart agriculture, digital technologies, big data and other smart practices.

"By harmonizing standards on both sides, crossing language barriers, facilitating government operations, promoting business-to-business context and people-to-people relationship, bilateral exchanges can be further promoted", he added.

Pak envoy visits China-Pakistan Economic, Cultural Exchange Center in Chengdu

14 January 2024, Associated Press of Pakistan

BEIJING, Jan 14 (APP): Pakistan Ambassador to China, Khalil Hashmi, visited the China-Pakistan Economic and Cultural Exchange Incubation Center in Chengdu, China.

The Incubation Center is a platform for economic, trade, and cultural exchanges between China and Pakistan, jointly created by the Consulate General of Pakistan in Chengdu and the Pakistan-Sichuan Chamber of Commerce.

During his visit, Hashmi paid special attention to the sale and market prospects of Pakistani goods exhibited in the centers, including carpets, clothes, and handicrafts.

"Pakistan's products are of excellent quality and have distinctive characteristics, making them highly favored by the local people," said Li Hongwu, Director of the Incubation Center and the Chairman of the Pakistan-Sichuan Chamber of Commerce, China Economic Net (CEN) reported.

"We are currently witnessing significant trading activities in agricultural and sideline products, which showcase the growing economic ties between our two countries. We have also received strong interest from several enterprises in the light industry and construction material sectors, who are keen on establishing partnerships with Pakistani counterparts."

Hashmi remarked, "I am particularly interested in the Chamber of Commerce's initiatives related to the establishment of industrial parks, cultural tourism, and the Lahore-Chengdu direct flight. These projects hold great potential for further enhancing our bilateral cooperation and connectivity."

Both parties also discussed cooperation to establish an e-commerce platform and organize exhibitions and sales events, which can further promote trade and cultural exchanges between the countries.

China & Taiwan

China's propaganda office taps Taiwanese god of cities as ally

25 December 2024, RFA. Huang Chun-mei

Cheng Huang, god of cities, is the latest deity to be co-opted in the cause of 'unification.'

The Chinese Communist Party's United Front Work Department is counting on a new ally in the fight to persuade Taiwan's 23 million people to give up their democratic way of life to be ruled by Beijing – Cheng Huang, the god of cities.

Officials in the southeastern province of Fujian, just across the Taiwan Strait from self-ruled Taiwan, invited hundreds of Taoists, temple representatives, scholars and experts to a lavish cultural exchange event last month, according to the provincial government's official website.

The event included seminars on Cheng Huang temples across Fujian as well as beliefs around the god in Taiwan, particularly in smaller towns on the island, the Nov. 14 report said.

Cheng Huang isn't the first supernatural being to be enlisted by the Chinese Communist Party in pursuit of its political goals, in this case, to control Taiwan, whether by soft power and propaganda or by military force if necessary.

China has already tried to co-opt the sea goddess Matsu, widely revered in Taiwan, as part of a United Front operation targeting millions of voters. And it has also encouraged the worship of the controversial Tibetan dharma protector Shugden, a move at loggerheads with the Tibetan Buddhist Gelugpa sect of the exiled spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama.

The United Front is a shadowy government agency in charge of seeking Chinese influence outside the country through individuals and often innocuous-sounding organizations.

The Chinese Communist Party embraces atheism and exercises tight controls over any form of religious practice among its citizens, requiring them to join government-backed governing bodies and to display the Chinese flag, along with other demonstrations of loyalty to Beijing.

But apparently it isn't opposed to using religion to further its political objectives.

Religious cross-straits links

Cheng Huang emerged in Chinese folk belief as a spirit protector of city walls and moats, and later diversified into a more complex deity with his own following and underworld bureaucracy mirroring structures found in the land of the living.

"Cheng Huang culture is one of the important links connecting compatriots on both sides of the Taiwan Strait," the report quoted Cheng Ming-hui of Taiwan's Wuji Sanching Temple as saying.

"I hope we can to hold more such activities in the future to further enhance the understanding and friendship between believers on both sides of the Taiwan Strait," Cheng said.

Taiwan has never been ruled by Beijing and is formally governed by the Republic of China government, formed after the 1911 fall of the Qing Dynasty under Sun Yat-sen, that later fled to Taipei after losing the civil war in 1949 to Mao Zedong's communists on the mainland.

While China insists on eventual "unification" with Taiwan, by armed invasion if necessary, the majority of Taiwan's 23 million people have no wish to give up their democratic way of life to submit to Chinese rule.

Ho Cheng-Hui, who heads Taiwanese civil defense organization the Kuma Academy, said China likes to cash in politically on religious devotion of any kind, citing its involvement in the cult of Matsu as an example.

"They are catering to the customs of the Taiwanese people, but with other motives behind it," Ho said.

"They call it religious exchange, but actually it's a United Front operation – scholars have defined it as the warfare of influence in recent years."

"Some Taiwanese take part in these so-called exchanges because of their religious feeling, or sense of the historical origins [of their beliefs]," he said.

"But that's not what's happening here."

He called on religious believers in Taiwan to become more aware of China's motives, "so as not to be used" by Beijing.

'Living chess pieces'

Wu Se-Chih, a researcher at Taiwan's Cross-Straits Policy Association, agreed.

"There is also a certain degree of United Front motivation," he said. "China will always try to leverage any United Front gains from the people of Taiwan."

Wu said the "deep connection between folk beliefs and local politics" in Taiwan also offers a channel for funds to flow into – and influence – the island's messily democratic political life.

The Chinese government has acquired a number of local temples in Taiwan in recent years, which he described as "living chess pieces" in Beijing's hands, to boost its influence in Taiwanese politics at a local level.

"These interest groups haven't been subjected to enough supervision," Wu said. "That's the main reason the Chinese Communist Party targets local temples."

And there are also personal risks involved for any religious believers traveling to China, according to Wu, who cited the recent detention of three elderly Taiwanese members of the I-Kuan Tao religion in Zhongshan city.

"Sometimes the red lines aren't very clear ... so people need to think twice and be vigilant, which is the best way to protect themselves," Wu said.

Chinese hackers attack Taiwan's legislature nearly a million times each month

24 December 2024, Tibetan Review

Apart from intimidating large-scale military drills and a propaganda onslaught, China has been attacking Taiwan with a relentless wave of cyber-attacks as well, averaging nearly a million hacking attempts each month on the latter's legislative Yuan alone.

Chinese hackers on average attack the Legislative Yuan (LY) 900,000 times a month, reported taipetimes.com Dec 23, citing the legislature's information technology (IT) department. The report said the Department's head Cheng Hui-pin made the remarks after Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) Legislator Chung Chia-pin asked questions about the security and quality of the legislature's wifi service during the Judiciary and Organic Laws and Statutes Committee's review of the legislature's budget on Dec 12.

Chung has said the Legislative Yuan's network is connected to devices with sensitive information that could harm national security if the system is compromised, adding that the legislature's wifi is slow and experiences frequent outages.

He has said the department routinely reviews the legislature's cyberdefenses as required under the Cyber Security Management Act.

Following negotiations between the DPP and Chinese Nationalist Party (KMT) members of the committee, the lawmakers have issued a resolution, demanding the IT department solve the issues without freezing its budget.

The IT department is directed to test all devices connected to the legislature's network for security and check audio equipment, lawmakers have said, adding that soundproofing should be installed in the chambers.

Taiwan reports 8 Chinese aircraft, six naval vessels around its territory

24 December 2024, ANI

Taiwan's Ministry of National Defence (MND) on Tuesday reported the operation of eight Chinese military aircraft and five naval vessels. The aircraft and vessels were detected operating around Taiwan until 6 am (local time) on Tuesday.

Of the eight People's Liberation Army (PLA) aircraft, six of them crossed the median line and entered Taiwan's northern and southwestern Air Defense Identification Zone (ADIZ).

Sharing a post on X, MND wrote, "8 PLA aircraft and 5 PLAN vessels operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today."

The post added, "6 of the aircraft crossed the median line and entered Taiwan's northern and southwestern ADIZ. We have monitored the situation and responded accordingly."

Meanwhile, following the White House announcement of arms sales and assistance to Taiwan, China's foreign ministry said that the "Taiwan issue" is the core of China's interests and the "first red line that cannot be crossed in China-US relations," Taiwan News reported.

Further, the ministry also accused the US of "playing with fire."

A spokesperson for China's Foreign Ministry on Sunday condemned the latest US arms package to Taiwan, stating that it "seriously violates the one-China principle and the three Sino-US joint communiques, especially the 'August 17' communique, seriously infringes on China's sovereignty and security interests, and seriously violates the US leaders' commitment not to support "Taiwan independence."

The spokesperson claimed that Washington's actions sent a "seriously wrong signal to the 'Taiwan independence' separatist forces."

Recently, NATO Secretary General Mark Rutte also criticised China's stance towards Taiwan and said that "China is bullying Taiwan, and pursuing access to critical infrastructure in ways that could cripple societies."

He said, "We need to be clear-eyed about China's ambitions. China is substantially building up its forces, including its nuclear weapons - with no transparency and no limitations. From 200 warheads in 2020, China is expected to have more than 1,000 nuclear weapons by 2030. Its space-launch investments are skyrocketing. China is bullying Taiwan, and pursuing access to our critical infrastructure in ways that could cripple our societies." (ANI)

Former Taiwan leader emphasises shared historical roots of island and mainland Chinese

25 December 2024, SCMP, Lawrence Chung

On his fifth student exchange programme, Ma Ying-jeou accuses ruling DPP of being behind unprecedented crisis in culture

Former Taiwanese leader Ma Ying-jeou has vowed to protect the island's deep-rooted cultural and historical ties with mainland China while accusing the ruling Democratic Progressive Party's (DPP) of having a "misguided political agenda" in attempting to sever these links.

"In the past several decades, Taiwan has played a vital role in preserving and promoting Chinese culture. But today, Chinese culture in Taiwan faces an unprecedented crisis," Ma said at a seminar in Chengdu, Sichuan province, on Monday. "The DPP's political manipulations have steered Taiwan in the wrong direction of de-sinicisation."

The seminar, held at Chengdu's renowned Du Fu Thatched Cottage in the southwestern province, was co-hosted by the Ma Ying-jeou Foundation, the mainland's Taiwan Affairs Office's (TAO) Centre for Cross-Strait Research and Sichuan University.

It brought together high-ranking mainland officials, including TAO director Song Tao, academics and participants from both sides of the Taiwan Strait to discuss preserving Chinese cultural heritage.

In his speech, Ma highlighted the linguistic, cultural and historical commonalities shared across the strait, emphasising that people on both sides were descendants of Emperor Yan and the Yellow Emperor.

"Chinese civilisation is the world's only ancient culture to have endured 5,000 years without interruption," he said. "This is a testament to the combined efforts across the strait that have ensured Chinese culture not only survives but continues to thrive."

Ma highlighted the core values of Chinese culture, including reverence for history, gratitude and a deep sense of heritage. These traditions, he argued, had been the cornerstone of Chinese resilience over millennia.

"Most Taiwanese people maintain a strong sense of identity with Chinese culture and the Chinese nation," Ma asserted. "Any attempts by the DPP to promote de-sinicisation are bound to fail because Chinese culture is deeply rooted in the bloodline of its people."

He called on his generation to "take responsibility for correcting these missteps" and pledged to mobilise all efforts to "preserve this shared heritage despite today's unprecedented challenges".

Song echoed Ma's sentiments, describing Chinese culture as the "common root and soul" of compatriots on both sides of the strait. He urged adherence to the "1992 consensus", opposition to separatism and resistance against foreign interference. The consensus, a point of contention spearheaded by the DPP, refers to an agreement that both sides recognise one China but with differing interpretations of its meaning.

Ma is leading students on a nine-day visit to mainland China to promote cross-strait cultural exchanges. They started in Harbin, Heilongjiang province, on December 18, and are set to end the trip in Sichuan before returning to Taiwan on Thursday.

It marks his fifth student exchange programme involving three groups from Taiwan and two from the mainland in the past two years.

Ma, who has positioned himself as a staunch defender of the island's shared heritage with the mainland, has long accused the DPP government of undermining centuries-old cultural ties for political gain.

Before leaving for Harbin on December 18, he emphasised that as a former leader, he is responsible for fostering exchanges and must "build a bridge of peace, transcend political hostilities and reflect the public's desire for cross-strait engagement".

However, Ma's efforts have drawn sharp criticism from Taiwan's pro-independence camp, which accuses him of aligning with Beijing's agenda and undermining Taiwan's sovereignty.

DPP lawmakers and politicians have said that by promoting these exchanges, Ma is playing into Beijing's hands and diminishing Taiwan's standing as a self-governed democracy.

Cross-strait relations have grown increasingly tense since the DPP's Tsai Ing-wen assumed the presidency in 2016 and rejected the one-China principle. Her successor, William Lai Ching-te, who took office in May, has further strained ties with Beijing by declaring that Taiwan and the mainland "are not subordinate to each other".

While Beijing views Taiwan as part of its territory and has not ruled out using force to achieve unification, most countries, including the United States, do not formally recognise Taiwan as an independent state. However, Washington opposes military aggression and supports Taiwan's self-defence through arms sales.

Reunification is inevitable: TAO

25 December 2024, Taipei Times, Chen Yu-fu and Hollie Younger

The reunification of China and Taiwan is "non-negotiable," China's Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO) said today in response to an article by a Chinese academic suggesting that China would not set a timetable for the annexation of Taiwan in the next four years.

China's focus for the next four years would instead be revitalizing the economy, and not deciding a time to invade Taiwan, the head of Beijing's Tsinghua University Department of International Relations Yan Xuetong (閻學通) wrote in an article for Foreign Affairs magazine on Friday last week.

The TAO today said it is the personal opinion of an academic.

Since 1949, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), China's government and the Chinese people have committed to one day "resolve the Taiwan question" and "realize China's complete reunification as a historic mission and unshakeable commitment," it said.

The reunification of the motherland is non-negotiable for the great revival of the Chinese race, TAO spokesman Chen Binhua (陳斌華) said in a news release.

In Yan's article "Why China isn't scared of Trump," Yan said that US president-elect Donald Trump would take more extreme policies to limit China's development in his second presidential term, further destabilizing US-China relations.

However, China's leaders learned valuable lessons from Trump's first term in office and "do not look at Trump with fear," he wrote.

"As Trump courts an escalation in the trade war, his administration will likely ramp up military pressure on Beijing," especially in relation to the South China Sea, as Taiwanese independence remains "a source of friction between Beijing and Washington, but China and the United States are unlikely to go to war over it," he said, as Trump "will not want to get entangled in the matter of Taiwan."

China and the US would instead focus on rebuilding their economies and domestic reforms, he added.

Experts sound alarm over low awareness of China threat among Taiwan's youth

21 December 2024, Focus Taiwan

A survey showing that less than 40 percent of young Taiwanese support regulating influencers in Taiwan linked to pro-China unification efforts has sparked concern among experts that the younger generation lacks vigilance in the face of threats from across the Taiwan Strait.

At a seminar in Taipei on Friday, the Asia-Pacific Elite Interchange Association (APEIA) released the results of a survey examining public views on China's United Front tactics targeting Taiwan and other recent cross-strait issues.

The findings showed that 56.3 percent of all respondents agreed that laws should be amended to regulate Taiwanese influencers involved in China's United Front efforts. Meanwhile, 25.7 percent disagreed and 18 percent had no opinion.

Among respondents aged 20 to 24, only 37.9 percent agreed, significantly less than the 49.1-70.6 percent observed across other age groups.

The survey was carried out against the backdrop of China allegedly recruiting Taiwanese influencers to help carry out its United Front work. The revelations were highlighted by YouTuber Pa Chiung (八炯) in a documentary.

In the video, Pa Chiung interviewed Taiwanese rapper Chen Po-yuan (陳伯源), who described how he had worked with government agencies in China to promote his music before realizing he was being used to support a pro-unification agenda.

The United Front is a strategy used by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to influence and co-opt individuals or organizations to advance its political and strategic goals, including pushing for unification with Taiwan.

Arthur Wang (王智盛), secretary-general of the APEIA and an expert on cross-strait relations, described the comparatively low awareness of Chinese United Front efforts among young Taiwanese as a "warning signal."

"This suggests that to some extent... our young people have indeed lost their vigilance," Wang said, attributing the results to the influence of Chinese social media platforms and the prevailing perception that cross-strait exchanges are harmless.

He urged society to address the relatively low vigilance of Taiwanese young people in recognizing China's United Front efforts, particularly among those with prolonged exposure to Chinese social media.

Following the same vein, Raymond Sung (宋承恩), vice president of the Prospect Foundation, said that the issue with influencers lies in the fact that most of their content focuses on topics such as fashion and makeup, which seem harmless and lifestyle-oriented. "However, on certain political issues, they (influencers) align with the narratives that China wants to promote," Sung said, adding that it might influence how Taiwanese youth perceive China.

The survey, commissioned by the APEIA, was conducted by DADI Opinion Research from Dec. 17 to 18 through telephone interviews with adults aged 20 and above in Taiwan.

According to the APEIA, 1,001 valid samples were collected, with a confidence level of 95 percent and a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

VOA Mandarin: China faces operational challenges if it were to invade Taiwan, US says

19 December 2024, VOA, Tina Chung

The U.S. Defense Department's annual report on China's military power, released this week, says the PLA is accelerating modernization, but it still faces several operational challenges in executing a rapid and decisive invasion of Taiwan.

Taiwan-Shanghai forum opens after military tensions

17 December 2024, RFA, Alan Lu

The forum is an avenue for contacts when top-level communications are frozen though some Taiwanese are skeptical.

An annual forum between the cities of Shanghai and Taipei that is meant to promote dialogue across the Taiwan Strait has opened about six months late after tensions including unprecedented Chinese sabre-rattling raised doubts that it could be organized this year.

The Shanghai-Taipei City Forum opened in the self-ruled island's capital on Monday with a visit by Hua Yuan, the deputy mayor of China's largest city, presided over by Taipei's mayor, Chiang Wan-an.

Chiang, in his opening remarks, acknowledged the recent tensions between Beijing and the island it regards as its territory and has vowed to take over by force if necessary.

Just last week, China's military deployed what one senior Taiwan official called a "staggering" array of ships and aircraft in the seas and skies around the island in a show of force that analysts said could be aimed at setting red lines for the incoming administration in the United States, Taiwan's main ally.

"I always say that the more tense and difficult the moment, the more we need to communicate," Chiang told the visiting Chinese delegates at the forum.

Chiang called for talks.

"More dialogue and less confrontation; more olive branches of peace and less sour grapes of conflict. More lights from fishing boats to adorn the sunset; less of the howls of ships and aircraft," said Chiang.

Chiang, a member of Taiwan's main opposition party, the Kuomintang, which traditionally advocates for closer cross-strait ties while rejecting accusations it is pro-Beijing, is widely seen as a possible presidential candidate.

The forum is an annual platform for dialogue and cooperation between the two cities. Established in 2010, it serves as a semi-official channel for communication, focusing on practicalities such as economic collaboration, tourism, education, culture, and public services.

The city-to-city is seen as a useful avenue for people-to-people exchanges, especially when official cross-strait communications are limited.

Entry bans

This year's forum was initially planned for July or August but was postponed as the tensions raised doubts about the schedule, until an agenda was finally drawn up late in the year.

The event has not been without its casualties.

As tensions surged last week with the Chinese show of force, Taiwan banned entry to Shanghai Taiwan Affairs Office Director Jin Mei and nine Chinese media personnel.

Assistant Professor of Taiwan's Shoochow University's Department of Political Science Chen Fang-Yu told Radio Free Asia that the forum, in principle, should be a "positive event," especially as it involves official exchanges from both sides.

"However, since 2016 China has unilaterally cut off all opportunities for official dialogue with Taiwan," he said, adding that Taipei seemed "urged" to host the forum this year.

Chen noted that Taipei Mayor Chiang had vowed in his 2022 election campaign that the forum would only be hosted when the Chinese Communist Party stopped sending military aircraft and vessels to harass Taiwan.

"Clearly, this goal has not been met," Chen said.

At the forum, Shanghai Mayor Hua called for practical cooperation between the two sides and said that Shanghai tour group trips to Taiwan would resume, although China has yet to fully restore the levels of tourism to the island seen before the COVID-19 pandemic.

"Compatriots on both sides of the Taiwan Strait have always been one family. We often come and go, getting closer and closer to each other," Hua told the forum.

However, Chen warned that the offer to resume tour groups from China could be seen as a Chinese tactic to promote its pro-unification agenda.

"It feels like they are treating the reopening as some kind of favor to Taiwan," Chen said, referring to the resumption of group tours.

China's new tactic against Taiwan: drills 'that dare not speak their name'

13 December 2024, Reuters, Ben Blanchard, Yimou Lee and Angie Teo

Beijing has unveiled a new tactic on Taiwan, the democratic island it claims as its own, officials and experts say: large-scale drills with no fanfare to normalise a heightened military presence and let the U.S. know that China can act whenever it wants.

For four days this week, Taiwan went on alert in response to what it said was China's largest massing of naval forces in three decades around Taiwan and in the East and South China Seas.

China's military said nothing until Friday when it quoted ancient Chinese tactician Sun Tzu's Art of War, a favourite of the communist republic's founder Mao Zedong.

"Just as water retains no constant shape, so in warfare there are no constant conditions," the defence ministry said, a cryptic statement that neither confirmed nor denied that Beijing had been holding military exercises.

The initial silence was a departure from China's past practice of unleashing a massive propaganda push to coincide with war games around the island.

A senior Taiwan security official this week termed China's activities as "drills that dare not speak their name".

China's "Joint Sword-2024B" war games in October were accompanied by a flood of military and state media graphics and videos lambasting Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te, a person Beijing denounces as a "separatist". One animation caricatured Lai with devil-like pointed ears.

Lai rejects Beijing's claims of sovereignty over Taiwan, saying only the island's people can decide their future.

Security sources had expected China to launch new drills to coincide with Lai's trip this month to the Pacific, where he stopped over in Hawaii and the U.S. territory of Guam. Beijing opposes any foreign engagements for Taiwan leaders.

"I clearly believe this is the beginning of the 'mid-stage' of normalisation," Chen Kuan-ting, a lawmaker for Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) who sits on parliament's foreign affairs and defence committee, told Reuters.

"Neighbouring countries have to be aware that if they don't respond accordingly, they themselves may become the next target."

Neither the United States nor Japan, Taiwan's two most important security partners, have confirmed the scale of China's military movements, although both expressed concern. Taiwan signalled late Thursday the activities had wound down by closing its emergency response centre.

One fear Taiwan has is of Chinese drills suddenly turning into an actual attack, and a Taiwan intelligence official said this week China was trying to wrongfoot them by keeping mum.

"By not announcing the drills in advance, they want to lower our alertness and catch everyone off guard when they keep appearing around Taiwan," senior defence ministry intelligence officer Hsieh Jih-sheng told reporters.

"CONTROL THE FIRST ISLAND CHAIN"

Analysts say that Beijing's activities, conducted in near silence and followed by an opaque statement are meant to create confusion. "What's changed here is the scale of the exercise and lack of clarity from China about what was involved," said Drew Thompson, a former U.S. Department of Defense official and now a senior fellow at Singapore's S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies.

"This only underscores the lack of certainty of China's intentions."

China has over the last five years sent its warships and warplanes almost daily into the waters and air space around Taiwan, in what Taiwanese officials see as a creeping effort by China to "normalise" its military presence.

Taiwan's defence ministry said this time the naval deployment extended across the First Island Chain, which runs from Japan through Taiwan, the Philippines and on to Borneo, enclosing China's coastal seas.

Its control by China could prevent U.S. forces coming to Taiwan's assistance in the event of conflict.

"It's a tricky operation, showing on the one hand their dissatisfaction with Taiwan, and on the other showing the U.S. and its allies that it has military muscle, flying the flag, to show their ability to control the First Island Chain," said Su Tzu-yun, a research fellow at Taiwan's top military think tank, the Institute for National Defence and Security Research.

A regional security diplomat said the lack of any announcement ahead of time signalled the normalisation of war simulations around Taiwan.

"China seems to be more concerned with preventing or delaying an intervention into the First Island Chain, than with controlling the area around Taiwan," the diplomat said.

"One day they will have exercised all they need and feel fully confident to deal with anything that might occur during their aggression towards Taiwan."

Chinese officials arrive in Taipei for rare visit

16 December 2024, Reuters

A delegation of Chinese officials led by a deputy Shanghai mayor arrived in Taipei on Monday for an annual city-to-city forum, a rare visit happening at a time of heightened Taiwan-China military and political tension.

China, which claims the democratically governed island as its territory, last week carried out large-scale military activities near Taiwan, and regularly sends fighter jets and warships into the skies and waters around the island.

Shanghai Vice Mayor Hua Yuan arrived at Taipei's downtown Songshan airport to attend Tuesday's Taipei-Shanghai City Forum, which was first held in 2010, and did not answer questions shouted at him by reporters.

A small group from the pro-independence Taiwan Republic Office shouted "Taiwan and China, separate countries" as he left the airport.

"There is no goodwill. The communist bandits continue to hold military drills," Chilly Chen, head of the group, told Reuters.

Taipei Mayor Chiang Wan-an, from the main opposition Kuomintang party that traditionally favours close ties across the strait although it denies being pro-Beijing, has said visits like this are needed more than ever at times of tension.

Chiang, who visited Shanghai last year for the same city forum, will host Hua at a banquet in the evening. Taiwan's government last week blocked some members of the Shanghai delegation from attending, saying given China's stepped up military threats it had to take into account "the overall situation" when granting permission for the visit.

Adding to the drama, Taiwan's government on Friday demanded China release three members of a Taiwanese religious group arrested while in the country. China says they are suspected of organising an underground cult.

Taiwan's China-policy making Mainland Affairs Council said on Monday the government was showing goodwill by allowing the forum to take place even in the face of the "still serious situation across the Taiwan Strait".

Taiwan's government has called for new talks with China but Beijing refuses to engage with President Lai Ching-te, calling him a "separatist".

Lai says only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

After Days of Military Activity, China Restates Its Hard Line on Taiwan

14 December 2024, G Captain

China's defense ministry on Friday broke its silence about days of military activities around Taiwan, saying it was entitled to stage exercises and the military would "not be absent" if required to fight separatist forces.

Taiwan's defense ministry on Monday went on alert and activated an emergency response center after reporting a surge in Chinese military activity, both nearby and more broadly in the East and South China Seas.

China's military had not announced any maneuvers. Beijing views democratically governed Taiwan as its territory – a claim rejected by Taipei, which says that only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

In a statement responding to a question on Taiwan President Lai Ching-te's recent visits to Hawaii and the U.S. territory of Guam, and whether or not China had held drills, China's defense ministry offered neither confirmation nor denial.

"Whether or not to hold exercises and when to hold them is a matter for us to decide on our own according to our own needs and the situation of the struggle," it said.

"Regardless of whether or not exercises are held, the People's Liberation Army will not be absent and will not be soft in its fight against independence and for reunification."

Any reliance on "foreign forces to seek independence" – the usual wording China uses to warn the United States off supporting Taiwan – would be severely punished and was "doomed to failure," the ministry added.

China has staged two rounds of war games around Taiwan so far this year, most recently in October, saying they were a warning against "separatist acts" and vowing to take further action if needed.

TAIWAN SAYS CHINA'S THREAT IS EXPANDING

On Friday, Taiwan's defense ministry said China's threat towards the island had been evolving since 2022, when it began staging the current round of war games, from “detering Taiwan” to “impacting the First Island Chain,” an area that stretches from Japan through to Taiwan, along the Chinese coast and into the South China Sea.

“China’s long-term goal of deterring regional parties and disrupting the rule-based international order will not be endorsed by the international community,” it said in a statement.

The United States has repeatedly expressed concern about tensions in the Taiwan Strait, and once or twice a month sends military aircraft or warships on missions there.

Late on Friday, Taiwan’s defense ministry said a U.S. P-8A Poseidon reconnaissance and patrol plane had flown through the Taiwan Strait in the morning, the first such publicly acknowledged flight since Nov. 26. Security sources had expected China to hold drills to coincide with Lai’s U.S. trip, and also to send a warning to the incoming Trump administration about China’s red lines.

On Thursday, the de facto U.S. embassy in Taiwan said that Chinese military activity in the region was currently elevated but it did not see that as a response to Lai’s U.S. visit.

Later that day, Taiwan’s defense ministry said it had disbanded its emergency response center, signaling an end to the current round of Chinese military activities.

On Friday morning, the ministry said the number of Chinese military aircraft operating nearby was down sharply.

Taiwan’s coast guard said that nine Chinese coast guard ships off the coast had headed northwards after carrying out “undue” activities in recent days.

China jeopardised peace with its military threat: Taiwan Defence Ministry

13 December 2024, India Narrative

Taiwan’s Ministry of National Defence (MND) on Friday released a rousing video highlighting Taiwan’s defence capabilities and informing of the threat posed by the Chinese military to Taiwan.

The video was shared by the Taiwanese Defence Ministry through a post on X.

“The threat posed by #PLA to Taiwan and the region has escalated from coercion to directly affecting the First Island Chain, undermining the rules-based international order. #ROCArmedForces continue to forge our capabilities and deter war”, the MND said.

The video showcased Taiwan’s defence capabilities, its weapons and the armed forces personnel in action, preparing and training.

“PRC has jeopardised the peace with its military threat, challenged the rule-based international order.

Its action will never earn the approval from the international community”, the video noted.

“To safeguard our territory, and sovereignty, and maintain regional security, the R.O.C. Armed Forces closely monitor our adversary and has adjusted reactions accordingly. We train at the moment, we face our opponent and keep up our work in force buildup. We forge our capabilities in rigorous training. Our faith is from our strength. We stand firmly to safeguard our national security”, the video said.

The video comes after the Chinese incursions near Taiwan’s territory have seen an uptick in recent times.

On Saturday, the MND reported that 12 Chinese military aircraft, 14 naval vessels and 9 official ships were detected operating near Taiwan until 6 am (local time). The details were shared by Taiwan’s Ministry of National Defence (MND) in a post on X. Earlier on Wednesday in a post on X, the MND said, “Confronting normalized #PLA provocations, apathy is not an option. #ROCArmedForces seize every training opportunity!”

Taiwan-China issue is a complex and longstanding geopolitical conflict centred on Taiwan’s sovereignty. Taiwan, officially known as the Republic of China (ROC), operates its own government, military, and economy, functioning as a de facto independent state.

However, China considers Taiwan a breakaway province and insists on the “One China” policy, which asserts that there is only one China, with Beijing as its capital.

This has fuelled decades of tension, especially since the Chinese Civil War (1945-1949), when the ROC government retreated to Taiwan after the Communist Party, led by Mao Zedong, took control of mainland China.

Beijing has consistently expressed its goal of reunification with Taiwan, using diplomatic, economic, and military pressure to isolate Taiwan internationally. Meanwhile, Taiwan, supported by a significant portion of its population, continues to maintain its independence.

Taiwan Flags Alarming Threat After China Deploys Largest Naval Fleet

10 December 2024, StratNews Global

Taiwan is alarmed at the rise in Chinese military activities around its waters and airspace though China’s military has not announced any drills. China’s muscle flexing is seen as an expression of its anger over the U.S. visit of President Lai Ching-te.

China’s war games with Taiwan took a serious turn after Beijing deployed its largest navy fleet in regional waters in nearly three decades.

This is posing an alarming threat to the island nation, its Defence Ministry said.

Defence Ministry spokesperson Sun Li-fang said that the scale of the current Chinese naval deployment in an area running from the southern Japanese islands down into the South China Sea was the largest since 1996.

China had held war games around Taiwan ahead of the 1996 Taiwanese Presidential elections.

China's military is yet to comment and has not confirmed it is carrying out any exercises.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory over the island's rejection, had been expected to launch drills to express its anger at President Lai Ching-te's tour of the Pacific.

The tour which included stopovers in Hawaii and the U.S. territory of Guam, ended on Friday.

Taiwan's military raised its alert on Monday after saying China had reserved airspace and deployed naval and coast guard vessels.

"The current scale is the largest compared to the previous four," Sun said.

"Regardless of whether they have announced drills, they are posing a great threats to us."

Senior ministry intelligence officer Hsieh Jih-sheng said at the same Press conference there have so far been no live fire drills in China's seven "reserved" air space zones.

Of these, two are in the Taiwan Strait, but there had been a significant increase in Chinese activity to the north of Taiwan over the last day.

The number of Chinese Navy and Coast Guard ships in the region, was "very alarming".

He added that China was taking aim at not only Taiwan but other countries in the region as well.

A Taiwan security source told Reuters that the number of the Chinese Navy and Coast Guard ships in the region remained at 90.

China's deployment in the First Island Chain – which runs from Japan through Taiwan, the Philippines and on to Borneo, enclosing China's coastal seas – is aimed at area denial to prevent foreign forces from interfering, Hsieh said.

The ministry said that the Chinese Navy is building two "walls" in the Pacific.

While one is at the eastern end of Taiwan's Air Defence Identification Zone, the other is further out in the Pacific.

"They are sending a very simple message with these two walls: trying to make the Taiwan Strait an internal sea" of China, said Hsieh.

Earlier on Tuesday, the Defence Ministry said it detected 47 military aircraft operating around the island over the past 24 hours,

The ministry also detected a dozen Navy vessels and nine "official" ships, which refers to vessels from ostensibly civilian agencies such as the Coast Guard.

Of the aircraft, 26 flew in an area to the north of Taiwan off the coast of China's Zhejiang province, six in the Taiwan Strait and a further 15 to the island's southwest.

The ministry provided these details in a map in its daily morning statement on Chinese activities.

A senior Taiwan security source told Reuters that the Chinese aircraft simulated attacks on foreign naval ships and practised driving away military and civilian aircraft as part of a "blockade exercise".

Lai and his government reject Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

China says the Taiwan issue is the "core of its core interests" and a red line the United States should not cross.

China has held two rounds of major war games around Taiwan so far this year.

Taiwan reports near doubling of Chinese warships nearby

08 December 2024, Reuters

Taiwan's defence ministry said on Sunday that China had nearly doubled the number of its warships operating around the island in the previous 24 hours, ahead of what security sources expect will be a new round of war games.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, has been angered by visits by President Lai Ching-te to Hawaii and the U.S. territory of Guam as part of a Pacific tour. Lai returned from the week-long trip on Friday night.

Beijing has held two rounds of war games around Taiwan this year.

In its daily morning report on Chinese military activities, Taiwan's defence ministry said there were 14 Chinese warships operating nearby, up from the eight it reported the previous day.

The ministry said it had detected four Chinese balloons flying over the Taiwan Strait, one of which had brushed the top of the island.

Weather will likely be a factor in China's decision on any war games, security sources say. Weather in the strait has been poor this weekend.

China's defence ministry did not answer calls to its news office seeking comment outside of office hours on Sunday.

But in a strongly worded commentary on its WeChat account on Sunday, China's Ministry of State Security said Lai's efforts to "use arms to seek independence" and cosy up to the United States were doomed to fail.

Taiwan's government is putting on a "false display of power" while the U.S. government is "acting in cahoots with gangsters and jackals" in supporting Taiwan, it said.

"No country, organisation or individual should underestimate the strong determination, firm will and powerful capacity of the Chinese government and people to safeguard national sovereignty and territorial integrity," it said.

No one should presume they can "step out of line on the Taiwan issue without having to pay a price", the ministry added.

Lai and his government reject Beijing's sovereignty claims.

China slaps sanctions on 13 US military firms over Taiwan arms sale

05 December 2024, Reuters

China has decided to impose sanctions on 13 U.S. military firms from Thursday, in response to the sale of U.S. arms to Taiwan, the foreign ministry said after the United States arranged for Taiwan's president to transit through its territory.

The step follows China's strong objection to the United States authorising a potential $385-million sale of spare parts and support for F-16 jets and radars to Taiwan, which Beijing says undermines its sovereignty and territorial integrity.

China, which considers Taiwan its own territory and its President Lai Ching-te a dangerous separatist, opposes any foreign interactions or visits by the island's leaders.

Companies targeted by the sanctions include Teledyne Brown Engineering Inc, BRINC Drones Inc and Shield AI Inc, the foreign ministry said in Thursday's statement.

Other companies facing sanctions are Rapid Flight LLC, Red Six Solutions, SYNEXXUS Inc, Firestorm Labs Inc, Kratos Unmanned Aerial Systems Inc, HavocAI, Neros Technologies, Cyberlux Corporation, Domo Tactical Communications and Group W.

In addition, China will freeze the assets of six executives from five companies including Raytheon, BAE Systems and United Technologies, in China, and bar their entry to the country.

Chinese organisations and individuals are also prohibited from dealing with them.

Taiwan's Lai provokes China's ire with planned US visit

30 November 2024, DW

Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te is to visit US soil during a seven-day trip that he says aims to enhance exchanges with Taiwan's allies. China has slammed the trip as a step toward independence from Beijing.

Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te set off on Saturday on a week-long trip to visit partners of his country that will include stopovers on US territory, much to the anger of Beijing.

The trip, Lai's first overseas since taking office, has provoked fierce threats from China, which sees the self-governing democratic island of Taiwan as its territory and opposes any international recognition of its sovereignty.

'New era of values-based democracy'

Lai's trip will see him make stopovers in Hawaii and the US territory of Guam, in addition to visits to partners in the South Pacific, including the Marshall Islands, Tuvalu and Palau.

The US is Taiwan's most important supporter, and is the top benefactor of the island's defense capabilities under the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act, even though Washington has no official diplomatic relations with Taipei.

Lai's trip follows the US's approval of the proposed sale to Taiwan of spare parts for F-16 fighter jets and radar systems, as well as communications equipment. In all, the deals are valued at $385 million (£364 million).

Upon departing, Lai said: "I'd like to thank the US government for adhering to the principles of safety, dignity, comfort and convenience in facilitating the success of this trip," and that the trip "ushered in a new era of values-based democracy."

He said he wanted to "continue to expand cooperation and deepen partnerships with our allies based on the values of democracy, peace and prosperity."

The Marshall Islands, Tuvalu and Palau are the only Pacific island nations among the 12 remaining allies that recognize Taiwan, with China persuading others to drop their support for Taipei by promising aid and investment.

Chinese condemnation

The Chinese Foreign Ministry has reiterated that it is against official interactions between the US and Taiwan, including any visits by Taiwanese leaders to US territory.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning described Lai's planned stopover in the US territory of Guam as "separatist actions."

"We have consistently opposed official exchanges between the United States and Taiwan ... and any form of the US condoning and supporting Taiwan independence separatists and their separatist actions," she said on Thursday.

November

Lai has in the past been branded a "separatist" by China, which has vowed to "resolutely crush" any attempts at gaining independence.

Beijing regularly conducts war games near the island in what is widely seen as an attempt at intimidation.

Pro-Taiwan Lithuania expels three Chinese diplomats

30 November 2024, Tibetan Review

Lithuania has on Nov 29 asked three staff members of China's representative office, a type of diplomatic mission, to leave the country for being in violation of the Vienna Convention and Lithuanian legislation. No further details were provided.

China has already downgraded ties with Lithuania and pressured multinationals to sever links with the Baltic nation of 2.9 million people after it allowed Taiwan to open a de facto embassy there in 2021, noted Reuters Nov 29.

Declaring them as personae non gratae, Lithuania's foreign ministry has cited violations of the 1961 Vienna Convention, which outlines the rules of diplomatic law.

The Chinese diplomatic staff have been instructed to leave Lithuania within a week, the ministry has said in a statement, exacerbating sour relations between the two countries.

The latest development apparently had its beginning in March, when the chief of Lithuania's counter-intelligence said Chinese interference in this year's elections could not be ruled out due to the EU and NATO member's support for Taiwan.

In addition, a Chinese ship is suspected of being involved in damage to two undersea cables recently, one of which runs between Sweden and Lithuania, the report noted.

Foreign Minister Dr Rana off to China

28 November 2024, RFA

The island's foreign minister called on China not to 'overreact' to Lai's foreign trip.

Taiwan President Lai Ching-te will visit Hawaii and the U.S. territory of Guam on a trip to the Pacific that will include stops in three diplomatic allies, media reported, after the government called on China not to "overreact" to his travels.

China views Taiwan as its territory and it objects to any country or organization treating it as a state. In particular, China gets infuriated by visits by Taiwan leaders to the United States, and by visits by U.S. officials to Taiwan.

Lai sets off on Saturday for visits to the Marshall Islands, Tuvalu and Palau, his first overseas trip since taking office on May 20. He would also visit Hawaii and Guam, Taiwan's Central News Agency, or CNA, reported on Thursday.

"The president will stay in Hawaii for two nights before visiting the Marshall Islands and Tuvalu, then transit through Guam before heading to Palau," CNA cited an unidentified government source as saying.

"During the layovers in the U.S., Lai plans to hold closed-door discussions with think tanks and meet with local Taiwanese communities," it said.

A spokesperson for China's defence ministry said China objected to the trip, the AFP news agency reported.

"We firmly oppose official interaction with China's Taiwan region in any form," the spokesperson, Wu Qian, told a press conference.

"The Chinese (military) shoulders the sacred mission of safeguarding national sovereignty... and will resolutely crush all secessionist attempts for Taiwan independence," Wu said.

Taiwan's foreign minister, Lin Chia-lung, speaking before the president's office announced the Hawaii and Guam stops on the trip, called on China not to use the Pacific trip as an excuse to stage military exercises.

"We call on Beijing not to use the long-standing practice [of Taiwan's presidents traveling overseas] as a pretense to overreact, for example, by holding military exercises that risk destabilizing cross-strait relations," said CNA in a separate report, citing Lin.

Reuters news agency on Wednesday reported that China would likely launch military drills near the island, using Lai's to the Pacific and the expected U.S. transit stop as a pretext, citing regional security officials. China launched intensive military exercises around Taiwan in 2022 after then U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi became the highest-ranking U.S. official in 25 years to visit Taiwan.

China also froze top-level military talks and other dialogue with the U.S. in response to the Pelosi visit. Chinese forces have held frequent drills in the air and seas around the island since then.

Beijing has over the years successfully swayed several of Taipei's diplomatic allies to shift their recognition to China. As of Nov. 28, only 12 countries maintained official diplomatic relations with Taiwan.

China could launch military drills near Taiwan over president's Pacific visit, sources say

27 November 2024, Reuters, Yimou Lee and Ben Blanchard

China is likely to launch military drills in the coming days near Taiwan, using President Lai Ching-te's upcoming trip to the Pacific and scheduled U.S. transit as a pretext, according to assessments by Taiwan and regional security officials.

Lai will start a visit to Taipei's three diplomatic allies in the Pacific on Saturday, and sources told Reuters he was planning stops in Hawaii and the U.S. territory of Guam in a sensitive trip coming shortly after the U.S. election.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory and the most important issue in its relations with Washington, has a strong dislike of Lai whom Beijing calls a "separatist".

Lai's office has yet to confirm details of what are officially stop-overs in the United States, but is expected to do so shortly before he departs, sources familiar with the trip have previously said.

Beijing could conduct military manoeuvres around or shortly after Lai's trip which ends on Dec. 6, said four officials in the region briefed on the matter, who declined to be identified due to the sensitivity of the topic.

China's defence ministry did not respond to a request for comment, though the government has urged the United States not to permit Lai to transit.

Chen Binhua, spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, said on Wednesday that Lai's transit stops were "essentially provocative acts that violate the one-China principle".

Taiwan's presidential office said in a statement that if China were to use Lai's trip as an excuse to launch military exercises, "it would be a blatant provocation of the status quo of peace and stability in the region".

Taiwan's defence ministry said in a separate statement any deliberate attempt to create tension in the Taiwan Strait would undermine peace and stability, which is not "the proper behaviour of a responsible modern country".

The White House did not respond to a request for comment.

China has already staged two rounds of major exercises around Taiwan this year to pressure Taipei, one in May and one in October, dubbed "Joint Sword - 2024A" and B, respectively.

China could "repackage" ongoing regular military activities in the South China Sea or the East China Sea, moving them closer to Taiwan and rebranding them "Joint Sword - 2024C," according to a Taiwan security official.

Beijing could expand the size of its regular "joint combat readiness patrol" that typically involves naval and air force drills near Taiwan during Lai's visit and launch a "targeted" exercise towards the end of the trip, the source said. China could "repackage" ongoing regular military activities in the South China Sea or the East China Sea, moving them closer to Taiwan and rebranding them "Joint Sword - 2024C," according to a Taiwan security official.

Beijing could expand the size of its regular "joint combat readiness patrol" that typically involves naval and air force drills near Taiwan during Lai's visit and launch a "targeted" exercise towards the end of the trip, the source said.

Between 20 and 30 Chinese naval vessels are involved in the ongoing military manoeuvres this week in the South China Sea, the source added.

'RED LINE'

Beijing wants to show the incoming U.S. administration of President-elect Donald Trump that the first island chain is "China's sphere of influence" and Lai's trip could become a "pretext", the official said, referring to an area that runs from Japan through Taiwan, the Philippines and on to Borneo, enclosing China's coastal seas.

"Beijing hopes to draw a red line and establish its power" during the U.S. government transition and extend its sphere of influence, the official said, adding the military drills were meant for the United States and its allies.

A second source, a Taiwan-based regional security official, said the drills would probably be more limited in scope than the two earlier rounds this year given unstable winter weather conditions in the Taiwan Strait.

A third source, familiar with security assessments around Taiwan, said China could use exercises in the coming weeks to test the bottom line of the Trump administration.

Two of the sources said more favourable weather conditions may prompt an earlier or delayed display of force in the days around Lai's trip.

Taiwan presidents typically take advantage of stop-overs in the United States going to and from far-flung allies to give speeches and meet with friendly politicians. Lai will be visiting the Marshall Islands, Tuvalu and Palau, three of the 12 remaining countries maintaining official diplomatic ties with Taipei.

It would not be unprecedented for China to respond militarily to this trip. It did so in August of last year when then-Vice President Lai returned from the United States, and in April of last year upon then-President Tsai Ing-wen's return from California.

Lai and his ruling Democratic Progressive Party reject Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

Taiwan reports Chinese balloon, first time in six months

25 November 2024, Reuters

Taiwan's defence ministry on Monday reported that a Chinese balloon had been detected over the sea to Taiwan's north, the first time since April it has reported such an incident in what Taipei views as part of a pattern of harassment by Beijing.

Taiwan, which China claims as its own territory, complained that in the weeks leading up to its presidential election in January Chinese balloon activity took place at an "unprecedented scale".

It described the incidents as part of a Chinese pressure campaign - so-called grey-zone warfare designed to exhaust a foe using irregular tactics without open combat.

Taiwan strongly objects to China's sovereignty claims and says only the island's people can decide their future.

The ministry, in its regular morning update on Chinese military activities over the previous 24 hours, said the single balloon was detected at 6:21 p.m. (1021 GMT) on Sunday 60 nautical miles (111 km) to the north of Taiwan's Keelung port.

It then vanished some two hours later, having flown at an altitude of 33,000 ft (10,000 metres), but without crossing Taiwan itself, the ministry said.

China's defence ministry did not respond to a request for comment.

China has previously dismissed Taiwan's complaints about the balloons, saying they were for meteorological purposes and should not be hyped up for political reasons.

The potential for China to use balloons for spying became a global issue last year when the United States shot down what it said was a Chinese surveillance balloon. China said the balloon was a civilian craft that accidentally drifted astray.

PRC threatens regional stability: Taipei

18 November 2024, Taipei Times, Lee I-chia

ONE LAST TALK: While Xi said that Taiwan was a 'red line,' Biden, in what is likely his last meeting with

Xi as president, called for an end to China's military activity around Taiwan

China's military intimidation and economic coercion against Taiwan are the main causes of tensions that are destabilizing peace in the Taiwan Strait, Taipei said yesterday while thanking US President Joe Biden for expressing Washington's firm stance of maintaining peace and stability in the region.

Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping (習近平) met on Saturday for their third meeting and their first talks in seven months on the sidelines of the APEC forum in Lima, Peru.

It was likely Biden's last meeting as president with Xi. During their conversation, Biden reiterated the US' opposition to any unilateral change to the "status quo" from either side, that it expects cross-strait differences to be resolved peacefully and that the world has an interest in peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

Biden also called for an end to destabilizing military activity by the People's Republic of China (PRC) around Taiwan.

Xi told Biden that the "Taiwan issue, democracy and human rights, pathways and systems, and development interests are China's four red lines that must not be challenged," according to state-run China Central Television.

"These are the most important guardrails and safety net for China-US relations," Xi said.

"The separatist actions of 'Taiwan independence' are incompatible with peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait," he added.

Xi also told Biden that Washington "should not intervene in bilateral disputes ... and not condone or support provocative impulses" in the South China Sea.

He also said that China's position on the war in Ukraine was "open and aboveboard" and that Beijing would not allow tensions on the Korean Peninsula to "descend into conflict or chaos," the broadcaster reported.

China would "strive for a smooth transition" in relations with the US and is ready to work with the incoming administration of US president-elect Donald Trump, Xi said.

In Taipei, the Mainland Affairs Council yesterday said that the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) posed several challenges, including military intimidation and economic coercion, that affect security and stability in the Indo-Pacific region, and are part of an attempt to force others to accept Beijing's political views.

"Beijing wants to change the rules-based international order, and that has attracted widespread attention from the international community," it said. "This is also the main cause of tensions in cross-strait relations and instability in the Taiwan Strait."

The council said that the government's cross-strait policy seeks steady, pragmatic and consistent relations with China, as well as the prosperity and development of the Indo-Pacific region, which has been affirmed by mainstream public opinion in Taiwan and the international community.

"In the face of the CCP's continued aggression toward Taiwan, we will stand firm in protecting the constitutional system of the Republic of China" (ROC), it said. "We will maintain the status quo and we will resolutely safeguard national sovereignty and dignity."

Beijing should pragmatically face the facts of the current situation across the Strait, abandon coercive claims and actions, and engage in meaningful dialogue with Taiwan's democratically elected government to resolve differences, it added.

China is the biggest destabilizing force in the Indo-Pacific region, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MOFA) said in a separate statement.

"The ministry also thanks the Biden administration for affirming the importance of maintaining peace and stability in the Indo-Pacific region and for continuing to take concrete actions to maintain it," it said.

Those actions include a joint statement by Japan, South Korea and the US issued on Friday, which reiterated that "peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait is an indispensable element of security and prosperity in the Indo-Pacific region," it said.

The three countries also established the Trilateral Cooperation Secretariat, responsible for coordinating and implementing their shared commitments, including working together to ensure the region is thriving, connected, resilient, stable and secure, it added.

The ministry also addressed a news release issued by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs that it said included misleading claims about Taiwan and Taiwan-US relations.

The MOFA reiterated that "the ROC and the PRC are not subordinate to each other."

"As the US and other countries have repeatedly pointed out, China, which continues its provocative military actions surrounding Taiwan, is the biggest source of tension that is undermining peace and stability in the region and posing a serious threat to global economic prosperity," the ministry said.

It said it welcomes the international community's concerns over China's efforts to threaten the "status quo" in the region and calls for peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

As a responsible member of the international community, Taiwan would implement its "four pillars of peace" plan to enhance its self-defense capabilities, it said.

Taiwan would also work with the US and like-minded countries to ensure peace, stability and prosperity in the Taiwan Strait and Indo-Pacific region, it added.

Taiwan rebuts remarks made by China's Xi at APEC meeting with Biden

18 November 2024, Focus Taiwan

Taiwan on Sunday rebutted remarks made by Chinese President Xi Jinping (習近平) during his meeting with U.S. President Joe Biden at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit in Lima, Peru.

Xi's comments were "targeted, contrary to the facts, and deliberately setting limits on Taiwan-U.S. relations," according to a statement issued by the Mainland Affairs Council (MAC), Taiwan's top government agency in charge of relations with China.

During his meeting with the U.S. leader on Saturday (Peru time), Xi had named "the Taiwan question" – along with "democracy and human rights, China's path and system, and China's development right" – as "red line" issues for Beijing that "must not be challenged" by other countries.

Xi also mentioned Lai Ching-te (賴清德), Taiwan's president and leader of the ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), by name.

"If the U.S. side cares about maintaining peace across the Taiwan Strait, it is crucial that it sees clearly the true nature of Lai Ching-te and the DPP authorities in seeking 'Taiwan independence,' handles the Taiwan question with extra prudence, unequivocally opposes 'Taiwan independence,' and supports China's peaceful reunification," according to a readout of the meeting published by China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Sunday.

In response, the MAC said in its statement that the Taiwan government's cross-strait policies are "steady, pragmatic and consistent" and "recognized by Taiwanese mainstream public opinion and the international community."

"In the face of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) continued civil and military attacks on Taiwan, we will firmly uphold the constitutional system of the Republic of China [Taiwan's official name], neither be humble nor arrogant, maintain the status quo, resolutely safeguard national sovereignty and dignity, and strive to maintain peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait and in the region."

"President Lai made it clear during his inauguration and National Day speeches that Taiwan will work with its democratic partners to hold up a 'democratic umbrella' to protect democratic partner countries from the threat of authoritarian expansion and work together to promote world democratic peace and prosperity," the MAC said.

The MAC statement also criticized Beijing's "military intimidation and economic coercion" toward Taiwan and other countries in the Indo-Pacific region, noting that these actions had been the main cause of "tensions" and "instability to peace" in cross-strait relations.

"The Mainland Affairs Council calls on the Beijing authorities to pragmatically face the objective facts of the current situation across the Taiwan Strait, abandon coercive claims and actions, engage in meaningful dialogue with Taiwan's democratically elected and legitimate government to resolve differences, and jointly shoulder the international responsibility for maintaining regional security and global peace."

The White House also issued a readout of the Xi-Biden meeting on Sunday (U.S. time), in which the American president was described as telling the Chinese leader that "the United States' one China policy remains unchanged."

President Biden also "reiterated that the United States opposes any unilateral changes to the status quo from either side, that we expect cross-strait differences to be resolved by peaceful means, and that the world has an interest in peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait."

Biden also "called for an end to destabilizing PRC military activity around Taiwan" in his meeting with Xi, according to the White House.

Taiwan's business leaders are finding ways to reduce their exposure in China

18 November 2024, NPR, Emily Feng

Amid geopolitical uncertainties, Taiwan has slashed its investment in China to the lowest level in nearly a quarter century as the island strives to "derisk" itself from its powerful neighbor.

MARY LOUISE KELLY, HOST:

President Joe Biden and Chinese leader Xi Jinping held their last official meeting over the weekend outside a summit in Peru. Once again, the issue of Taiwan came up. The Chinese government has long claimed the self-governed Asian island as its own territory and long said it will never renounce the use of force to resolve that issue if necessary. Well, in Taiwan, business leaders are finding ways to reduce their exposure in China. NPR's Emily Feng reports from the island.

EMILY FENG, BYLINE: If you're a fan of bubble tea, well, it was invented here in Taiwan, and a lot of the tapioca starch bubbles are still made here.

CHOU CHIAH-YU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: Including in this factory belonging to the Ditiantai company in southern Taiwan.

It smells like brown sugar.

Chou Chiah-yu, one of the managers, shows me around his bubble tea factory...

CHOU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: ...Which processes and rolls enough tapioca to make more than 600,000 pounds' worth of bubble tea bubbles a day. Ditiantai sells brown sugar-flavored bubbles to Japan, Europe, the U.S. and China. But that's starting to change.

CHOU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: Chou says Thailand is now their big focus...

CHOU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: ...Where labor costs are way lower and risks, in his view, are also lower.

(Speaking Chinese).

Unlike the previous generation of Taiwanese entrepreneurs, Chou is among the new generation, who sees opportunities outside China's gigantic consumer market. This is in part because of warnings from other entrepreneurs, or Taishang, as they're called locally.

CHOU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: Chou tells me other Taishang have warned him Chinese capital control laws make it very difficult to get money out of the country. It's a place with no guarantees.

CHOU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: Then Chou says, rather euphemistically, there are the political problems with China, meaning the risk of China seizing Taiwanese assets, blocking their imports or even invading Taiwan. Taiwanese firms are reacting to this risk. They slashed investment into China last year to the lowest in nearly a quarter century. Spending in China by Taiwan companies dropped nearly 40%, though this year it rebounded somewhat.

SCOTT KENNEDY: Taiwanese companies can be the canary in the mine.

FENG: This is Scott Kennedy, a China and Taiwan expert at the Washington-based think tank Center for Strategic and International Studies. He and his colleagues now do a survey each year of Taiwanese firms. This year, they found about over a third of firms had already moved some of their operations out of China.

KENNEDY: Uncertainty that comes with growing U.S.-China tensions, whether it's around tariffs or export controls.

FENG: But Kennedy stresses Taiwan is not decoupling from China entirely. Taiwanese manufacturers are only moving part of their businesses.

KENNEDY: They're moving somewhere between 11- and 25% of their business, so they are keeping a lot of their operations in China, but moving some of them to new locales - Southeast Asia, India, back to Taiwan.

FENG: Chen Chern-Chyi, Taiwan's deputy economic affairs minister, says since 2016, Taiwan has been actively incentivizing the shift to South and Southeast Asia.

CHEN CHERN-CHYI: With respect to investment, it's like 130% compared to 2016. So we are of the view this is quite successful.

FENG: He says Taiwanese EMS, or electronics manufacturing companies...

CHEN: Almost all the major Taiwan EMS companies now, they have investment in India. They have investment in Vietnam.

FENG: With South and Southeast Asia being the focus, the Taiwanese trade and investment leaving China is not necessarily coming back to Taiwan, however. Chou at the Ditiandai bubble tea factory, for example, says he is avoiding China, but also avoiding expansion in Taiwan.

CHOU: (Speaking Chinese).

FENG: He says their clients around the world are already asking them to have a backup plan should China invade Taiwan. They want to know, if there's a war, can they still get their tapioca bubble tea balls?

Former Taiwan Navy officer praises Chinese military, sparks outrage

16 November 2024, ANI

A retired Taiwan Navy officer has provoked widespread criticism after attending a military air show in Zhuhai, China, and publicly lauding the strength of China's air force and military advancements.

Retired Lieutenant Commander Lu Li-shih attended the International Aviation and Aerospace Exhibition, which began on Tuesday, where he was interviewed by reporters.

In a video that quickly circulated in Taiwan and China, Lu praised the military equipment on display, saying, "I want to share the truth and tell Taiwanese viewers how strong our China is." He also expressed admiration for "Chinese national integration and rejuvenation," Taiwan News reported.

His remarks have drawn sharp criticism from Taiwanese authorities and legislators. Legislator Lin Chu-yin called Lu's remarks "disgusting."

Meanwhile, Taiwan's Ministry of National Defence (MND) issued a statement urging retired officers to remain cautious in their words and actions to avoid harming Taiwan's reputation.

The MND clarified that since Lu retired as a lieutenant commander rather than a higher-ranked officer, he is not subject to penalties such as losing his pension or being stripped of his rank.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

The Mainland Affairs Council (MAC) also condemned Lu's statements as "deeply regrettable." However, MAC Deputy Chief Liang Wen-chieh stated that the government does not intend to impose punitive measures against Lu, emphasising that Taiwan's policy opposes any commendation of China's military forces, which pose a threat to Taiwan, reported Taiwan News.

Despite the backlash, Lu appeared on CTI television on Thursday to reiterate his views. He praised China's military advancements and the confidence of its people while taking the opportunity to criticise Taiwan's military capabilities.

His remarks have further intensified the controversy, fuelling debate over the responsibilities of retired military personnel and their potential influence on cross-strait relations.

The situation has brought into question the extent to which retired officers should exercise caution in their public statements, particularly when such remarks have the potential to impact Taiwan's international standing.

Beijing urges US not to let Taiwan's William Lai transit through country

15 November 2024, SCMP, Holly Chik

'Stop sending wrong signals to Taiwan independence forces,' Beijing's foreign ministry tells US, a day after similar message to Canada

Beijing has urged Washington not to allow Taiwanese leader William Lai Ching-te to transit via the United States, ahead of his reported plans to visit the Pacific islands.

This came a day after Beijing urged Ottawa to abide by its "one China" commitment, with Lai's predecessor Tsai Ing-wen reportedly scheduled to visit Canada next week.

Reuters reported on Friday that Lai was set to visit Taiwan's diplomatic allies in the Pacific in the coming weeks, with plans to stop over in the US state of Hawaii and possibly its Micronesian territory Guam, both home to major US military bases.

"Taiwan authorities use these so-called diplomatic ties to pull political agenda," Beijing's foreign ministry spokesman Lin Jian said on Friday afternoon. "These actions are useless and would not shake the trend of the time that there is one China in the world."

"China consistently opposes the US arrangements [of such transits]," he said. "We urge America to abide by the one-China principle and the three joint communiques, not allow Lai to transit through the United States and stop sending wrong signals to Taiwan independence forces."

The three joint communiques on the Taiwan issue state that the US recognises the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China, and it acknowledges Beijing's position that there is but one China, and Taiwan is part of China.

Details about Lai's visit, including the dates and names of countries to be covered, have not been released yet.

Taipei has formal ties with 12 countries, including the Pacific nations of Marshall Islands, Tuvalu and Palau. Earlier this year, Nauru became the latest diplomatic ally to choose Beijing over Taiwan.

Beijing's foreign ministry also cited the one-China principle in expressing its opposition to Tsai's visit to Canada.

"China strongly opposes any visits by Taiwan separatists to countries that maintain diplomatic relations with China under any title," Lin said on Thursday.

"We urge relevant countries to uphold the one-China principle and safeguard the political foundation of bilateral relations through concrete actions," he said in response to a question from Reuters, which cited sources in its reporting on the coming visit.

Tsai, who completed her second and final term as leader of Taiwan in May, will deliver a speech at the Halifax International Security Forum starting on November 22 in Nova Scotia, eastern Canada, according to Reuters.

The website for this year's conference shows that the event is "by invitation only", but information on the agenda and speakers is not yet available.

Tsai visited the Czech Republic, France and Belgium last month, in her first overseas trip since stepping down. She spoke at a democracy conference in the Czech capital Prague, met European politicians and Taiwanese expatriates, and visited the European Parliament in Brussels.

The Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO) in Beijing, which oversees cross-strait ties, said at the time that authorities in Taiwan were carrying out "Taiwan independence" separatist activities under various pretexts and deceiving the international community, according to state news agency Xinhua.

"We urge relevant countries to strictly abide by the one-China principle, handle the Taiwan issue prudently, not send wrong signals to the separatist forces and not provide any platform for them to spread their fallacies," TAO spokeswoman Zhu Fenglian said on October 9, days ahead of Tsai's three-nation trip.

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary and regards Tsai and Lai, both of the ruling Democratic Progressive Party, as separatists who promote independence for the island.

Most countries, including the United States and Canada, do not recognise self-governed Taiwan as an independent state. However, Washington opposes any attempt to bring the island under Beijing's control by force and is legally committed to arming it for defence.

Taiwan detects spike in Chinese military activity around itself

15 November 2024, ANI

Taiwan's Ministry of National Defence (MND) reported Chinese military activity on Friday, detecting eight People's Liberation Army (PLA) aircraft, nine People's Liberation Army Navy (PLAN) vessels and one official ship.

The Ministry of Defence stated that the aircraft, vessels and the ship operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 am (UTC+8).

According to their post on the social media platform X, "8 PLA aircraft, 9 PLAN vessels and 1 official ship operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today. 4 of the aircraft crossed the median line and entered Taiwan's northern and southwestern ADIZ. We have monitored the situation and responded accordingly."

The Ministry said that it has monitored the situation and is responding accordingly.

China has increased its military activities around Taiwan by deploying aircraft and naval vessels since September 2020. It is using grey zone tactics to achieve its security objective.

The Taiwanese MND reported Chinese military activity on Thursday, detecting five People's Liberation Army (PLA) aircraft, and nine People's Liberation Army Navy (PLAN) vessels and one official ship.

Taiwan MND further added that nine of the aircraft crossed the median line and entered Taiwan's northern and southwestern Air Defense Identification Zone (ADIZ).

"5 PLA aircraft, 9 PLAN vessels and 1 official ship operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today. 9 of the aircraft crossed the median line and entered Taiwan's northern and southwestern ADIZ. We have monitored the situation and responded accordingly," Taiwan MND said on X.

Earlier, Taiwan President Lai Ching-te convened a high-level national security conference in which he assured the public about the government's commitment to neutralising any threat to Taiwan's democracy and security after China staged a large-scale military drill around the island.

He made his remarks in response to the Chinese People's Liberation Army's (PLA) announcement of military drills, named "Joint Sword-2024B," in the Taiwan Strait and surrounding areas, which were described as a "stern warning" to advocates of Taiwan independence, according to the Taipei Times.

Taiwan businessman Tsao to sue Chinese officials over sanctions

11 November 2024, Reuters

Taiwanese businessman Robert Tsao said on Monday he would sue in a Taiwan court senior Chinese officials over sanctions they had placed on him, saying he was seeking to counter China's intimidation of lawful activity.

China, which claims Taiwan as its own territory, last month said it would punish and sanction Tsao, the retired founder of chipmaker UMC (2303.TW), opens new tab, for alleged criminal and pro-Taiwan independence activities.

China's Taiwan Affairs Office said the "Black Bear Academy" that Tsao has helped fund was seeking to incite separatism that would endanger cross-strait ties.

Tsao, one of Taiwan's richest men who has pledged to provide millions to two civilian defence training programmes, told a press conference that China was threatening the lawful holding of political views in Taiwan and his personal safety.

The lawsuit will be lodged in a Taipei court against Song Tao, head of China's Taiwan Affairs Office, and also the office's spokesperson Chen Binhua.

Taiwan courts have no jurisdiction in China and senior Chinese officials do not visit the island.

China's Taiwan Affairs Office did not respond to a request for comment.

Cheng Wen-lung, one of Tsao's lawyers, said they knew neither Song nor Chen would come to Taiwan and there would be no way of enforcing any judgement, but the case was about sending a message to Beijing given it has been seeking to use legal means to put pressure on Taiwanese it does not like.

"Legally, we have to do this," Cheng said. "Taiwan is in a difficult spot, but we have to work hard. You cannot not do anything."

Tsao's team is also looking at suing in a U.S. court under that country's Alien Tort Claims Act.

China's announcement against Tsao came as the country's military staged a day of war games around Taiwan it said were a warning to "separatist acts". Taiwan's government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims.

UMC says Tsao has nothing to do with the company any longer having retired a decade ago.

Taiwan indicts couple for promoting Chinese political agenda amid military tensions

07 November 2024, ANI

The Taiwan prosecutors have charged a Taiwanese couple affiliated with a pro-China political party, promoting the Chinese political agenda and affecting Taiwan elections.

The Voice of America reported that the couple, Chang Meng-Chung and his wife, Hung Wen-ting have been indicted for promoting the agenda after receiving billions of dollars from the Chinese authorities.

According to Taiwan's Chiayi District Prosecutors' Office, the couple had violated Taiwan's Anti-Infiltration Act and election laws. They created radio and digital media propaganda for China after receiving 2.32 million dollars from Chinese officials for more than a decade.

The prosecutors claim that China's Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO) in Beijing and its Fujian Province branch have paid the couples who in turn promoted Chinese defence power and also urged Taiwan to surrender before the Chinese invasion. They further stated that the couples went to China and provided reports and plans for the promotions.

In response to persecution, Chang said, "Taiwan says it's democratic, but it's not democratic at all. The China Unification Promotion Party (CUPP) has always been championing cross-strait reunification, so what I said is the same as what the CUPP has always advocated."

The VOA reported that the couple could face 5 years of imprisonment and a fine of up to NT$10 million.

Chao Fang-yi, a non-resident fellow at the Research Institute of Democracy, Security, and Emerging Technology in Taiwan, told VOA Mandarin that the use of the Anti-Infiltration Act is significant and said, "Actually, if China wants to give them money, it may be in a very obscure way, and it may be difficult to trace it," said Chao. "So, this time, there is clear evidence so it can be prosecuted. I think it's also a pretty powerful thing."

Recently in August, the Taiwan prosecutors charged three Taiwanese in connection with CUPP, developing a spy network to trespass the Taiwan army. (ANI)

Taiwan reports rise in Chinese military activity as US election nears

03 November 2024, Reuters

Taiwan's defence ministry said on Sunday it had spotted 35 Chinese military aircraft, including fighters and bombers, flying to the island's south on the way to exercises in the Pacific, a second day in a row it has reported such activities.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory despite the strong objections of the government in Taipei, regularly sends its military in the skies and waters near the island seeking to enforce its sovereignty claims.

China's defence ministry did not respond to a request for comment on the missions, reported just days before Tuesday's U.S. presidential election.

The United States is bound by law to provide Taiwan with the means to defend itself, and its arms sales to Taipei, including a $2 billion missile system announced last month, infuriate Beijing.

Taiwan's defence ministry said that from 9 a.m. (0100 GMT) on Sunday it had detected 37 Chinese military aircraft, including J-16 fighters, nuclear-capable H-6 bombers and drones.

Of those, 35 aircraft flew to Taiwan's southwest, south and southeast into the Western Pacific to carry out long-range training, the ministry said, adding it had sent its own forces to keep watch.

On Saturday, the ministry said China had carried out another "joint combat readiness patrol" with warships and aircraft near Taiwan.

China last month held large war games around Taiwan it said were a warning to "separatist acts", drawing condemnation from the Taiwanese and U.S. governments.

Beijing strongly dislikes Taiwan President Lai Ching-te, who took office in May, saying he is a "separatist". He says only Taiwan's people can decide their future and has repeatedly offered talks with Beijing but been rebuffed.

CCP attempts to extend jurisdiction

31 October 2024, Taipei Times

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) last month sentenced Taiwanese activist and Taiwanese National Party cofounder Yang Chih-yuan (楊智淵) to nine years in prison. Yang's case shows that China wishes to suppress political activists and organizers inside Taiwan. Yang once organized a political group to promote the concept of "one country on each side [of the Taiwan Strait]," mainly advocating for Taiwan's sovereignty and independence. This position is in direct opposition to Beijing's "one China principle."

Yang was arrested in China in August 2022, and in April last year was charged with "separatism," according to the CCP's "Anti-Secession" Law. His case has brought a sharp response from Taiwan, criticizing Chinese authorities' use of vague legal language to carry out its unjust ruling against Yang, and using the ruling to strike fear into Taiwanese.

The CCP in 2005 rubber stamped its "Anti-Secession" Law into existence, aimed at trying to forestall a Taiwanese declaration of formal, de jure independence or the implementation of any "separatist" activities.

The content of the law is vague, and the standards for defining a supposed crime are by no means clear, which has led to its abuse by the CCP. Party authorities are using this type of vague legal caprice to suppress and whisk away dissidents, even to the extent of prosecuting them for activities conducted overseas.

Yang's political activities were mostly carried out within Taiwan, and he never actually crossed into China to carry out any obviously "separatist" activities. Clearly, the CCP's legal interpretations have already stretched far beyond the bounds of its jurisdiction.

If China were to take over Taiwan, the CCP would use similarly opaque legalese to carry out political suppression of far more Taiwanese than just those with a background like Yang's. Taiwan is a diverse and free society. If the CCP handed down rulings on the illegality of opinion using the standards of its "Anti-Secession" Law, an integration of Taiwan into China's legal system would see anyone who advocates for Taiwan's sovereignty or carries out Taiwan independence-related activities facing the extreme likelihood of being defined as "Taiwan separatists." This would not only stifle Taiwan's political diversity, it would render Taiwanese unable to freely express their thoughts and opinions.

Taiwanese should realize the basic differences between the legal systems. In China, the rule of law is subject to political or party interference, and the CCP can use the legal system as a tool to suppress differences of opinion. Taiwanese who travel to China need to be especially mindful of their own words and actions, even within Taiwan, to keep themselves from unwittingly infringing on sensitive political topics, particularly those related to discussions of Taiwan's sovereignty or independence. The government should remind the public to carefully evaluate the necessity of travel to China, and remain aware of possible risks if they decide to go through with travel plans. Yang's plight is a wake-up call for Taiwanese that the tension between our government and China's is not just a matter of those who are part of the political echelons – this strain has extended into everyone's daily life.

Yang's case casts into sharp relief China's severe suppression of Taiwanese political workers, using vague legal language to attempt to extend China's jurisdiction to Taiwan. The CCP is abusing its own "Anti-Secession" Law to force people into a post-unification scenario, where similar laws could be used to mute Taiwan's diverse political voices, and even arbitrarily charge Taiwanese with the so-called crime of supporting "Taiwanese independence." Taiwanese must be clear on the differences in the legal systems, ask themselves about the risks of traveling to China, and pay attention to what they have said and done to keep themselves from running into unjust treatment by China due to their political stances.

Taiwan issues warnings to Chinese coast guard vessels around Kinmen

29 October 2024, Taipei Times

Taiwan yesterday issued warnings to four Chinese coast guard vessels that intruded into restricted waters around the Taiwan-controlled Kinmen Islands, according to the Coast Guard Administration (CGA). The four China Coast Guard ships were detected approaching restricted waters south of Kinmen at around 2 pm yesterday, the CGA's Kinmen-Matsu Branch said in a statement.

The CGA said it immediately deployed four patrol boats to closely monitor the situation.

When the Chinese ships with the hull numbers "14512," "14609," "14603" and "14602" separately entered the restricted waters off Fuhxing islet (復興嶼), Zhaishan (翟山), Sinhu (新湖) and Liaoluo (料羅) at 3 pm, the Taiwanese patrol boats broadcast warnings until they left the areas at 5 pm, it said.

The actions by the China Coast Guard only exacerbate the estrangement between people on two sides of the Taiwan Strait and impede cross-strait exchanges, the CGA said, adding it will continue to safeguard national sovereignty and uphold Taiwan's rights on the sea.

Taiwan reports Chinese 'combat patrol' after Beijing slams US arms deal

27 October 2024, Reuters, Ben Blanchard and Ryan Woo

Taiwan's defence ministry said on Sunday that Chinese warplanes and warships had carried out another "combat patrol" near the island, after Beijing threatened to take countermeasures in response to a $2 billion arms sale package by the United States.

The United States is bound by law to provide Chinese-claimed Taiwan with the means to defend itself despite the lack of formal diplomatic ties, to the constant anger of Beijing.

The Pentagon said on Friday the United States had approved a potential $2 billion arms sale package to Taiwan, including the delivery for the first time to the island of an advanced air defence missile system battle-tested in Ukraine.

Taiwan's defence ministry said it had detected 19 Chinese military aircraft, including Su-30 fighter jets, carrying out a "joint combat readiness patrol" around Taiwan in conjunction with Chinese warships starting on Sunday morning.

It said the Chinese aircraft flew in airspace to the north, centre, southwest and east of Taiwan, and that Taiwanese forces were dispatched to keep watch.

China's defence ministry did not answer calls seeking comment outside normal office hours.

China stages such patrols around Taiwan several times a month, but this was the first since Beijing held a new round of full-blown war games near the island this month.

In a statement late on Saturday, China's foreign ministry said it strongly condemned and firmly opposed the latest U.S. weapons sales and had lodged "solemn representations" with Washington.

China urges the United States to immediately stop arming Taiwan and stop its dangerous moves that undermine peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait, it added.

"China will take resolute countermeasures and take all measures necessary to firmly defend national sovereignty, security and territorial integrity," the ministry said, without elaborating.

China has over the past five years stepped up its military activities around democratically governed Taiwan, whose government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims.

Taiwan's government has welcomed the new arms sale, the 17th to the island under U.S. President Joe Biden's administration.

"In the face of China's threats, Taiwan is duty-bound to protect its homeland, and will continue to demonstrate its determination to defend itself," Taiwan's foreign ministry said on Saturday, responding to the arms sale.

China vows to take 'countermeasures' over US and Taiwan $2bn arms deal

27 October 2024, The Guardian

Package includes Nasams air defence system that Taiwan says will help it in the face of China's frequent military manoeuvres

China will take "countermeasures" to defend its sovereignty and territorial integrity, the government said, lambasting a $2bn arms sale package by the United States to Taiwan.

The Pentagon on Friday said the United States had approved a potential $2bn arms sale package to Taiwan, including the delivery for the first time to the island of an advanced air defence missile system battle-tested in Ukraine, including advanced surface-to-air missile systems and radar. The deal awaits approval by Congress.

In a statement late on Saturday, China's foreign ministry said it strongly condemned and firmly opposed the sales and had lodged "solemn representations" with the US.

China urges the US to immediately stop arming Taiwan and stop its dangerous moves that undermine peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait, it added.

"China will take resolute countermeasures and take all measures necessary to firmly defend national sovereignty, security and territorial integrity," the ministry said, without elaborating.

The US is bound by law to provide Chinese-claimed Taiwan with the means to defend itself despite the lack of formal diplomatic ties, to the anger of Beijing. The Pentagon's Defense Security Cooperation Agency said the new sale consisted of $1.16bn in missile systems, and radar systems worth an estimated $828m.

The missile system sale is for three National Advanced Surface-to-Air Missile System (Nasams) medium-range air defence solutions that includes the advanced AMRAAM Extended Range surface to air missiles, it added.

"This proposed sale serves US national, economic, and security interests by supporting the recipient's continuing efforts to modernise its armed forces and to maintain a credible defensive capability," it said in a statement. "The proposed sale will help improve the security of the recipient and assist in maintaining political stability, military balance, and economic progress in the region."

Demand for Nasams has increased since the system was employed in Ukraine. Taiwan's defence ministry welcomed the announcement, noting the "proven" use of Nasams in Ukraine and saying it would help Taiwan's air defence capabilities in the face of China's frequent military manoeuvres.

China has over the past five years stepped up its military activities around democratically governed Taiwan, whose government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims, including staging a new round of war games earlier this month.

Taiwan's government welcomed the new arms sale, the 17th of the Biden administration to the island.

"In the face of China's threats, Taiwan is duty-bound to protect its homeland, and will continue to demonstrate its determination to defend itself," Taiwan's foreign ministry said, responding to the arms sale.

Beijing's foreign ministry hit back in its statement late on Saturday, saying the latest arms package "seriously damages China-US relations, and endangers peace and stability" in the strait.

China has refused to rule out using force to bring Taiwan under its control.

In September, Beijing sanctioned US defence companies in retaliation for Washington's approval of the sale of military equipment to Taiwan.

Taiwan president 'won't yield an inch' in defense of island's territory

25 October 2024, VOA

Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te said Friday the island will not cede an inch of its territory, as China maintains military pressure on Taipei to accept its claim of sovereignty.

Lai made the remarks during a visit to the Kinmen islands off China for the 75th anniversary of a victory over communist forces in the Battle of Guningtou.

It followed a fortnight of intense military activity in the Taiwan Strait – the sensitive waterway that separates China and Taiwan – with troops from both sides holding drills.

"(We) will not yield an inch of ground in Taiwan, Penghu, Kinmen and Matsu to firmly defend our homeland," Lai said in a speech, referring to the islands controlled by Taipei.

"The Battle of Guningtou lets us understand that democracy and freedom should not be taken for granted, but require the joint efforts of generations to defend them," Lai said.

Without naming China, Lai insisted that "any external forces" would not be allowed to change the future of the islands.

China's Communist Party has never ruled democratic Taiwan, but Beijing claims the island as part of its territory and has said it will never renounce the use of force to bring it under its control.

Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Lin Jian brushed aside Lai's comments, insisting that China and Taiwan "will and must be unified in the end".

The dispute between Beijing and Taipei dates back to a civil war between Mao Zedong's communist fighters and Chiang Kai-shek's nationalist forces, which fled to Taiwan in 1949 following their defeat.

The nationalists scored a key victory over the communists in the Battle of Guningtou on the Kinmen islands.

Lai, who took power in May and has been more outspoken than his predecessor in defending Taiwan's sovereignty, earlier attended a somber ceremony for the battle and shook hands with veterans.

In his speech, Lai said Taiwan's "determination to defend our national sovereignty" and efforts "to maintain peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait" were unchanged.

He repeated his hope that China and Taiwan will "conduct dialogue and exchanges with parity, dignity and in a healthy and orderly manner".

Beijing severed high-level communications with Taipei in 2016 and has since ramped up military and political pressure on the self-ruled island.

China's large-scale war games around Taiwan on October 14 were followed by live-fire drills near the island on Tuesday, and the transiting of a Chinese aircraft carrier group through the Taiwan Strait a day later.

Taiwanese troops conducted live-fire drills on Penghu island in the waterway on Thursday, days after a US and a Canadian warship sailed through the narrow passage.

China Responds to Taiwan's Plea for Cross-Strait Peace with Military Pressure

24 October 2024, United States Institute of Peace

In his first National Day speech as Taiwan's president, William Lai Ching-te called for regional peace while reaffirming that China and Taiwan "are not subordinate to each other." Though Lai's October 10 address was more restrained than past remarks, it was attacked by China's state media as "highly provocative." Days later, the People's Liberation Army (PLA) encircled Taiwan with record numbers of military aircraft and warships during a series of military "drills."

This follows a pattern from Beijing since Lai took office. In late June, China released a set of judicial guidelines to prosecute advocates of Taiwan independence, saying they could face the death penalty in extreme cases. By September, more than 2,000 PLA aircraft had been recorded entering Taiwan's Air Defense Identification Zone in 2024, the highest annual number of incursions to date. Taiwan's Digital Affairs Ministry reported over 90,000 cyberattack attempts targeting government infrastructure in August alone. From February to September, China's Coast Guard vessels entered restricted waters near Taiwan's outlying Kinmen Islands at least 40 times.

As China continues its pressure campaign against Taiwan and channels of cross-Strait communication continue to wither, the risk of miscalculation or unwanted escalation will likely grow in the months ahead. Going forward, the United States should encourage both sides to practice restraint.

USIP's Naiyu Kuo, Dan Spinelli and Jennifer Staats discuss Lai's approach to cross-Strait relations, how Beijing has challenged the new Taiwanese president since he took office and if the two sides are in a dangerous cycle of escalation.

What does Lai's speech reveal about his approach to cross-Strait relations?

Lai's speech repeated many of the key themes from his inaugural address this May. He signaled a strong commitment to Taiwan's autonomy by stressing that the Republic of China (ROC, or Taiwan) and the People's Republic of China (PRC, or China) are not subordinate to each other and promising that he would "uphold the commitment to resist annexation or encroachment upon our sovereignty." Lai also emphasized that China "has no right to represent Taiwan," a stance frequently reiterated by Taiwan's foreign ministry to counter Beijing's efforts to exclude Taiwan from international fora. Yet Lai also suggested a potential framework for cross-Strait engagement. He appealed directly to China to cooperate with Taiwan on climate change, pandemic prevention and regional security, and called on Beijing to work with the international community to advance peace, security and prosperity.

Indeed, Lai may have been attempting to lower the temperature after a series of earlier provocative remarks that stoked Beijing's ire. Speaking to a domestic audience days before National Day, for example, Lai posited that the PRC could not be Taiwan's "motherland" because the ROC dates its founding to 1911, 38 years before the PRC's establishment in 1949. In September, he suggested that if Beijing were intent on reclaiming lost territory, it should pursue territorial claims in Russia that were ceded by the Qing empire. Both statements drew sharp criticism from Beijing's Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO), and some domestic political opponents warned Lai was "provoking a war."

How did Beijing respond?

Although Taiwan's foreign ministry urged China to recognize the goodwill Lai expressed, Chinese state media rejected the notion that Lai's speech evinced "moderation" or "restraint," and instead claimed it was a continuation of what it labels Lai's "new two-state theory" and "separatist fallacies."

Two days after the speech, China's Ministry of Commerce issued a statement saying it is studying further trade measures against Taiwan, which could result in new tariffs or other forms of economic pressure. Early in the week that followed, the TAO announced sanctions against Puma Shen, Robert Tsao and Kuma Academy for allegedly engaging in "separatist activities." (Co-founded by Shen and funded by Tsao, Kuma Academy is a Taiwanese civil defense organization that trains civilians to respond to emergencies.)

On October 14, the PLA's Eastern Theater announced "Joint Sword-2024 B" drills and deployed fighter jets, drones and warships to encircle Taiwan and simulate a potential blockade. As part of the one-day exercise, China flew a record number of 153 Chinese military aircraft around Taiwan in a 13-hour period. When the PLA announced the start of the exercises, it neither provided advance notice nor indicated the duration of the exercises, which aims to intimidate Taiwan psychologically and complicate Taiwan's defense preparedness.

The military exercises encircled Taiwan and included joint air and naval combat readiness patrols, a blockade of key ports north, south and east of Taiwan, and an assault on maritime and land targets. Law enforcement vessels also featured prominently, as China's Coast Guard (CCG) deployed 17 ships to patrol the waters surrounding Taiwan, the first time they have circumnavigated the island. In addition, four CCG vessels entered the restricted waters around the Matsu Islands for the first time.

Leaders in Beijing appear to see military action as the most effective tool for sending signals to Taipei, Washington and others in the region.

The pre-planned drills were shorter in timeframe but closer in proximity to Taiwan than the exercises conducted after House Speaker Pelosi visited the island in August 2022. The U.S. Department of Defense called the recent exercise "irresponsible, disproportionate, and destabilizing," and a State Department spokesperson said China's "response with military provocations to a routine annual speech is unwarranted and risks escalation."

The TAO justified the drills as punishment for Lai's alleged pursuit of "Taiwan independence." On October 15, TAO claimed that Lai's May inaugural speech, National Day address and remarks about the "motherland" were all responsible for escalating tensions, and warned that each provocation made by "separatists" in the name of "Taiwan independence" will be met with more intense countermeasures "until China's complete reunification is realized."

The intensified pressure aims to weaken Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party, intimidate the Taiwanese public and challenge the Taiwan government's autonomy to assert actual control over the island.

How can we avoid an escalation spiral?

Both Beijing and Taipei continue to blame the other for changing the status quo, and view their own statements and actions as necessary responses to provocation from the other.

Leaders in Beijing appear to see military action as the most effective tool for sending signals to Taipei, Washington and others in the region. Until it faces meaningful consequences for this coercion, China's political, economic, military and gray-zone pressures on Taiwan are likely to persist and possibly intensify as Beijing pushes its unification agenda and seeks to avoid appearing weak. Its incremental military actions, like the recent exercises, aim to pressure Taiwan without crossing red lines that would trigger significant international response.

Lai himself is also walking a tightrope. He must respond to critics, at home and abroad, who argue that he is not doing enough to defend Taiwan, while also being mindful of concerns on the island that his provocative comments risk drawing Taiwan into unwanted war. At the same time, China's bellicose response to his more moderate remarks may lead Lai to believe there is nothing he can do to lower the temperature.

Without clear channels of communication, the two sides are often left guessing about the other's intentions or concerns without the ability to frankly address or resolve key issues that could lead to unwanted escalation or conflict. Given the increasingly tense situation, it is incumbent on U.S. political leaders to consistently oppose unilateral changes to the status quo from either side, reaffirm that Washington does not support Taiwan independence and call on all parties to resolve their differences peacefully, so as to not exacerbate the potential for crisis.

Taiwan unveils plans to cope with potential Chinese military blockade

23 October 2024, VOA, William Zheng

Taiwan is stepping up efforts to strengthen its capabilities to respond to a potential military blockade by China, as Beijing increases military pressure on the democratically ruled island.

In a report outlining Taiwan's wartime food plan, which was submitted to parliament on Tuesday, the Ministry of Agriculture said it had maintained a three-month rice stockpile and ensured food and critical supplies were stored evenly across the island.

According to the ministry, the current rice stockpile can sustain Taiwan for seven months, and its fish feed inventory is enough to support fishing in ponds for over three months if sea fishing is not possible. The government said it is also drafting plans to prepare for rice rationing during wartime.

In the event of a Chinese military blockade, Taiwanese authorities said they would dedicate more farmland to grow rice and use additional ponds to grow aquaculture. The crops that Taiwan would prioritize growing in the event of war include sweet potatoes, soybeans and fresh vegetables. The ministry also plans to set up a task force to conduct a monthly inventory of the island's food resources.

Officials from Taiwan's Ministry of Economic Affairs also laid out plans to boost Taiwan's energy reserves and energy supply.

Hu Wen-chong, director of the department of state-owned enterprise management at Taiwan's Ministry of Economic Affairs, told lawmakers Wednesday that the government plans to set up three natural gas receiving stations to enhance the natural gas safety stock to more than 14 days. Taiwan currently has enough stock to maintain natural gas supplies for eight days.

In the event of a natural gas shortage during wartime, Hu told lawmakers that the government could activate some decommissioned coal-fired power plants to support the island's energy supply needs.

Maintaining Taiwan's oil supply is another concern. Taiwan imports close to 70% of its oil from the Middle East, which some legislators worry could be affected if China pressures regional countries to halt exports to the island during a blockade. Hu said the island has diversified its oil procurement from other countries, such as the United States and Indonesia.

Analysts welcomed the preparations for a potential blockade but said Taiwan's wartime food and energy reserve plans were designed to cope with food natural disasters, such as typhoons and earthquakes.

"Wartime is different from natural disasters because there won't be threats posed by the Chinese military during an earthquake," Lin Ying-yu, a military expert at Tamkang University in Taiwan, told VOA by phone.

"For these plans to work in wartime scenarios, there is still a lot of room for improvement."

Su Tzu-yun, a military expert at the Taipei-based Institute for National Defense and Security Research, noted that Taiwan has been taking monthly inventories of critical supplies and storing these resources across the island for a long time.

"There are close to 1,000 grain silos of various sizes across Taiwan, and it has been conducting critical resource distribution drills during the annual Wan An air-defense exercise in July," Su said.

Natural gas accounts for around half of Taiwan's electricity, a crucial resource that Taiwan will not be able to import during a Chinese blockade. Su said figuring out ways to use the island's oil and coal stocks to supply electricity is important.

In a phone interview with VOA, Su cited a report from Taiwan's Energy Administration Act that said the island has about five months' worth of oil and coal reserve, with around 190 million tons of underground coal. Those resources could be used to supply electricity if Taiwan experiences a natural gas shortage during a Chinese blockade, Su said.

Chinese blockade "an act of war"

Over the past week, China has increased its military pressure on Taiwan, staging a one-day blockade-style military exercise around the island just days after Taiwan President Lai Ching-te's National Day speech on October 10.

In the speech, Lai said the People's Republic of China — China's official name — has no right to represent Taiwan, formally known as the Republic of China. Beijing views Taiwan as part of its territory.

China also began holding live-fire air and sea drills near Niushan island off the southeastern Chinese province of Fujian on Tuesday.

On Wednesday, Taiwan's defense minister Wellington Koo said a Chinese aircraft carrier group sailed through the Taiwan Strait. The group was led by the Liaoning, China's oldest aircraft carrier. Taiwan's defense ministry said it was closely monitoring the Liaoning's movement.

Koo also said Beijing's "Joint Sword-2024B" exercise, which took place on October 13, fell short of the definition of an actual blockade since the Chinese military didn't impose no-flight and no-sail zones.

"If you really want to carry out a so-called blockade, which according to international law is to prohibit all aircraft and ships entering the area, then according to United Nations resolutions it is regarded as a form of war," he told journalists at Taiwan's parliament on Wednesday.

Koo added that since around one-fifth of global freight passes through the Taiwan Strait, a blockade imposed by China would have global consequences.

"The international community could not sit by and just watch," Koo told lawmakers during a legislative session on Wednesday.

Since August 2022, China has held at least four blockade-style military exercises around Taiwan and each exercise has served as a response to high-level political exchanges between Taiwan and the U.S. or important speeches delivered by Taiwan's president.

Lin at Tamkang University said while China is using these blockade-style military exercises to test its capabilities and improve coordination between different forces, they are also Beijing's way of responding to major political remarks in Taiwan.

"China is trying to signal that whenever the Taiwanese government makes important political remarks, Beijing will respond militarily," he told VOA.

Lin said Taipei should closely monitor Chinese military exercises and adjust or improve the military's defense and offense capabilities accordingly.

Taiwan says blockade would be act of war as China holds more drills

23 October 2024, Aljazeera

Taiwanese defence chief says a blockade would have far-reaching consequences for international trade.

Taiwan's defence chief has warned that a Chinese blockade would be an act of war and have far-reaching consequences for international trade after Beijing held military exercises to encircle the self-governed island.

Taiwanese Defence Minister Wellington Koo made his comments on Wednesday as the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) continued exercises near the democratically-ruled island after last week carrying out war games that included a simulated blockade.

"If you really want to carry out a so-called blockade, which according to international law is to prohibit all aircraft and ships entering the area, then according to United Nations resolutions it is regarded as a form of war," Koo said in remarks to reporters at parliament.

"I want to stress that drills and exercises are totally different from a blockade, as would be the impact on the international community," Koo added.

China claims Taiwan as its territory and has said it reserves the right to use force to bring it under its control, with the PLA regularly holding drills – including simulating blockading key ports and assaulting maritime and ground targets – around the island.

Taiwan, also known by its official name the Republic of China, has never been ruled by the People's Republic of China and rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims.

Beijing also asserts jurisdiction over the entirety of the Taiwan Strait, a 180km-wide (110-mile) waterway separating mainland China from Taiwan.

Taiwan and other members of the international community reject Beijing's claim, with the United States, Japan and several European countries asserting its status as an international waterway.

The US navy, in particular, regularly sails through the strait to maintain freedom of navigation rights.

Koo, who noted that one-fifth of global freight passes through the strait, said that the international community "could not sit by and just watch" if China were to impose a blockade.

Taiwan's defence ministry announced earlier on Wednesday that Chinese aircraft carriers, led by the Liaoning carrier, travelled north through the waterway after passing through waters near the Taiwan-controlled Pratas islands.

During the previous 24 hours, Taiwan's military detected 15 Chinese military aircraft and six navy vessels in the skies and waters around the island, the defence ministry said.

"The Liaoning is passing through the Taiwan Strait now, sailing north along the west of the median line and we are closely monitoring it," Koo said.

Taiwan has reported almost daily Chinese military drills around the island for the past five years, but activity has intensified since April's election of outspoken President William Lai Ching-te, whom Beijing has labelled a "dangerous separatist".

On October 14, Beijing launched large-scale military drills – code-named "Joint Sword-2024B" and involving the army, navy, air force and rocket force – in the Taiwan Strait and areas to the north, south and east of Taiwan.

Beijing said the drills, which came soon after Lai delivered his National Day speech on October 10, were issued as a "stern warning to the separatist acts of 'Taiwan Independence' forces".

China holds live-fire drills on island closest to Taiwan

22 October 2024, BBC, Kelly Ng

China held a live-firing exercise from its territory closest to Taiwan one week after it launched a large-scale drill encircling the island.

Chinese military drills off the Taiwanese coast have intensified in recent years as its claims over the self-governed island have grown.

Beijing announced late on Monday that an area around Niushan – an island 105km (66 miles) from Taiwan – will be closed for drills for four hours from 09:00 local time (01:00 GMT) on Tuesday.

Taiwan's premier Cho Jung-tai said on Tuesday that China should not be conducting such exercises given their threat to regional stability.

"No matter how large the scale of the drill is, they should not be frequent and close to Taiwan," he told reporters. "This will only cause unnecessary tension." Although Taipei has called the drills routine, analysts believe China is likely sending a message given their proximity to Taiwan.

The exercises are also part of a wider campaign, which has seen Chinese ships and planes regularly cross into Taiwanese territory and airspace – a grey zone warfare tactic intended to normalise the incursions and weaken Taiwan over a prolonged period.

As the Chinese drills have intensified, so have manoeuvres by Taiwan's allies, mainly the United States.

For decades, the US Pacific fleet was the only foreign navy that regularly transited the Taiwan Strait that separates the two sides to assert its freedom of navigation.

But recently, other US allies, including Canada, Germany, Australia and Japan have been joining these patrols as part of what are called "high-visibility" operations.

The most recent was over the weekend, when the US and Canada sailed their warships through the waters.

Analysts say this represents increased signalling from China and the US. While Beijing is emphasising its claims over Taiwan, Washington is making clear its support for the island.

A US official, however, told the BBC that Washington is keen on lowering tensions with Beijing given the US's current focus on conflicts in the Middle East and Europe.

But the longer-term threat for the US still comes from China, the official said.

Last Monday, Beijing deployed a record number of 153 military aircraft, as well as warships and coast guard vessels to encircle Taiwan in an exercise designed to simulate an attack by land, sea and air.

This followed Taiwanese President William Lai's National Day speech on 10 October, where he pledged to "resist annexation or encroachment upon [Taiwan's] sovereignty".

China and Taiwan are "not subordinate to each other", he said, adding that China "has no right to represent Taiwan".

China has repeatedly vowed to take Taiwan by force if necessary. It has long seen Lai as a "troublemaker" advocating for Taiwan's independence.

Preparing for a Chinese blockade, Taiwan maps out wartime food plans

22 October 2024, Reuters

Taiwan's government offered rare details on Tuesday of its wartime food plan, saying it is taking monthly inventories of crucial supplies like rice and making sure they are properly stored across the island in case of a Chinese blockade.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, has over the past five years staged almost daily military activities around the island, including war games that have practised blockades and attacks on ports. Taiwan's government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims.

China's latest war games around the island, carried out last week, included blockading key ports and areas, and assaulting maritime and ground targets, Beijing said.

In a report to parliament about preparations in case of a Chinese blockade, a copy of which was reviewed by Reuters, Taiwan's agriculture ministry said it has ensured that rice stock piles were above a three-month level as required by law and that food supplies were stored across the island in a bid to "lower attack risks".

The ministry said Taiwan's current rice stocks were enough to support the island for at least seven months and plans on rice rationing through supply stations across the island were being made in case of a food crisis.

During a blockade, more farmland will be used to grow rice, the ministry said, adding it will also prioritise growing sweet potatoes, soy beans and fresh vegetables as well as using more ponds for aquaculture.

In a scenario in which sea fishing is not allowed, the ministry said the island's fish feed inventory will be enough to support fishing in ponds for more than three months.

The ministry said it was planning to set up a task force to ensure food supply safety by taking a monthly inventory of the island's food resources.

Taiwan, a farming powerhouse during Japanese colonial rule from 1895 to 1945, depends on imports for the majority of its food needs as farm land was taken over for factories during rapid industrialisation starting in the 1960s.

Taiwan's food self-sufficiency rate in 2023 dropped to 30.3%, the lowest level in 18 years, according a previous report from the ministry.

In a separate report to parliament on preparations for the same scenario, the National Security Bureau said China's cyber forces were honing their skills to infiltrate key online infrastructure like telecoms in a bid to destabilise Taiwan with misinformation during a conflict with China.

China reiterate vow to use force over Taiwan as president Xi visits frontline island

17 October 2024, Tibetan Review

China has on Oct 16 vowed never to commit to renounce the use of force to "reunify" Taiwan, a day after president Xi Jinping visited Dongshan island in Fujian province which lies across the economically prosperous and democratically self-ruled island. Both the events came after China subjected Taiwan on Oct 14 to massive war exercises as a "stern warning" to Taiwan "independence forces". All this followed Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te's vow to defend the island from any Chinese armed aggression during his national day address on Oct 10.

"We are willing to strive for the prospect of peaceful reunification with the utmost sincerity and endeavour," Reuters Oct 16 quoted Chen Binhua, spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, as saying at a regular press briefing in Beijing. "But we will never commit ourselves to renouncing the use of force."

"No matter how many troops Taiwan has and how many weapons it acquires, and no matter whether external forces intervene or not, if it (Taiwan) dares to take risks, it will lead to its own destruction," he has added. "Our actions to defend national sovereignty and territorial integrity will not cease for a moment."

Chen's remarks came a day after Chinese state media reported Oct 15 President Xi's arrival the previous day on Dongshan island where in 1953 China beat off an invasion attempt by Taiwan-based military of the Republic of China (ROC), the official name of Taiwan and which had ruled China from 1911 until its civil war loss to the communists in 1949. No armistice or peace treaty has ever been signed between the two sides.

Xi was stated to have urged officials in Fujian to promote cross-strait cultural exchanges and “enhance the ethnic, cultural and national identity of Taiwan compatriots.”

Taiwan’s ROC government, which for long claimed to be the legitimate government of China and even held its UN seat, with the veto power, until the 1970s, now rejects China’s sovereignty claims, saying only the island’s people can decide their future.

In his Oct 10 speech, Lai said China had no right to represent Taiwan, that the island was willing to work with the government in Beijing to combat challenges like climate change, striking both a firm and a conciliatory tone which Taiwan officials said was a show of goodwill.

But Chen, the Chinese spokesperson, said Lai had stuck to his “stubborn separatist position”, adding “There was no goodwill to speak of.”

Lai has repeatedly offered talks with China, only to be rebuffed by the latter.

China has over the past five years sent warships and warplanes in the waters and skies around Taiwan on an almost daily basis. It has also carried out large-scale war drills to cut off the island in shows of force to intimidate the island against making any move towards declaring independence.

China starts new round of war games around Taiwan

14 October 2024, Aljazeera

Beijing begins manoeuvres in ‘stern warning’ days after President Lai’s first National Day speech.

China’s military has started a new round of war games with ships and aircraft near Taiwan, just days after the self-ruled democratic island marked its National Day.

The exercises, dubbed Joint Sword-2024B, began early on Monday and were a “stern warning to the separatist acts of ‘Taiwan Independence’ forces”, said Beijing, which claims the island as its own.

Captain Li Xi, the spokesman for the Chinese military’s Eastern Theatre Command, said the drills were focussed on “sea-air combat-readiness patrol, blockade on key ports and areas” and would also involve an “assault on maritime and ground targets”. The drills, he added, were a “legitimate and necessary operation for safeguarding state sovereignty and national unity”, and gave no date for their conclusion.

Taiwan’s Ministry of Defence expressed its strong condemnation of China’s “irrational and provocative actions” and said it had “dispatched appropriate forces to respond accordingly to protect freedom and democracy, and defend the sovereignty” of Taiwan.

As of 8am (00:00 GMT), it said some 25 PLA aircraft and a total of 11 ships, including seven from the navy, were found operating around Taiwan.

President William Lai Ching-te promised to protect the island from external threats.

“I would like to reassure my compatriots that the government will continue to defend the democratic and free constitutional system, protect democratic Taiwan, and safeguard national security,” he wrote on Facebook.

In recent years, China has stepped up its military activity around Taiwan, which it claims as its own. The latest drills come just days after Lai gave his first National Day address on October 10, promising he would resist any “annexation or encroachment” and that Beijing had no right to represent the island’s 23 million people.

“It was widely anticipated that the PLA [People’s Liberation Army] would conduct military exercises following Lai’s National Day speech,” Bonnie Glaser, the managing director of the German Marshall Fund’s Indo-Pacific programme, told Al Jazeera. “The drills have the effect of demonstrating to the domestic audience that the CCP [Chinese Communist Party] has the resolve to defend Chinese territory. They are also intended to warn Taipei and Washington not to cross Beijing’s red lines.”

‘It will pass’

Beijing has not ruled out the use of force to bring Taiwan under its control and said the drills were a warning to the “separatist acts of Taiwan independence forces”.

It has condemned Lai, who was elected in January and took office in May, as a “separatist” and previously staged military exercises, Joint Sword-2024A, three days after his inauguration.

Lev Nachman, a professor of political science at the National Taiwan University in Taipei, said China’s latest actions were no surprise.

“While military threats are no small matter, we all knew the PRC [People’s Republic of China] would respond to Lai’s Double Ten Day speech with military threats of some sort,” Nachman wrote on X. “There is no need to panic or overreact. We all saw this coming. It will pass quickly.”

In his October 10 speech, Lai had also appeared to reach out to Beijing, expressing hope for “healthy and orderly dialogue and exchanges”, and urging Beijing to use its influence to help resolve conflicts in the Middle East and Ukraine.

But China’s state-run Global Times, in an analysis of the speech published on Sunday, quoted analysts describing Lai’s speech as a “poison pill wrapped in cellophane”.

Other state media also accused Lai of promoting a "two-state" theory to describe Taiwan and China after he noted last week the different ages of the two governments. The People's Republic of China, which celebrated its National Day on October 1, is 75 years old, while the Republic of China, which celebrated on October 10 and is headquartered in Taipei, turned 113.

Kuang-shun Yang, the co-founder of the Taipei-based think tank US-Taiwan Watch, said the drills could be China testing the waters internationally at a time of global upheaval, citing the Russia-Ukraine war, the conflicts in the Middle East and threats from North Korea.

"We can see that the world has a lot of regional flashpoints that are ongoing and maybe Beijing sees this as ... an opportunity to test their will and see if the world's support for Taiwan is strong enough," he told Al Jazeera.

Beijing has sought to erase Taiwan from the international stage, blocking it from global forums and poaching its few remaining formal diplomatic allies.

The United States remains Taiwan's main international supporter and supplier of weapons.

It said it was "seriously concerned" at the latest military drills.

"The PRC response with military provocations to a routine annual speech is unwarranted and risks escalation," State Department Spokesman Matthew Miller said in a statement.

"We call on the PRC to act with restraint and to avoid any further actions that may undermine peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait and in the broader region, which is essential to regional peace and prosperity and a matter of international concern."

China threatens Taiwan with more trade measures after denouncing president's speech

12 October 2024, Reuters

China is studying further trade measures against Taiwan, China's Ministry of Commerce said on Saturday, two days after Beijing denounced a speech by Taiwan President Lai Ching-te.

The Chinese ministry said in a statement on its website that the Democratic Progressive Party, Taiwan's ruling party, had not taken any practical measures to lift "trade restrictions" on China.

"At present, relevant (Chinese government) departments are studying further measures based on the conclusions of the investigation into trade barriers from Taiwan" against China, it added.

Taiwan's China policy making Mainland Affairs Council said it regretted and "strongly protested" the move.

"Blatant economic coercion will only arouse the resentment of the Taiwanese people and cause the distance between the two sides of the Taiwan Strait to grow wider and wider," it said in a statement.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, detests Lai as a "separatist". Lai and his government reject Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

On Thursday at his keynote national day speech, Lai said the People's Republic of China had no right to represent Taiwan, but that the island was willing to work with Beijing to combat challenges like climate change, striking both a firm and conciliatory tone, drawing anger from China.

The Saturday announcement from China's commerce ministry could portend tariffs or other forms of economic pressure against the island in the near future.

China's Taiwan Affairs Office, which on Thursday said that Lai's speech promoted "separatist ideas" and incited confrontation, responded to the announcement by saying the fundamental reason behind the trade dispute was the "DPP authorities' stubborn adherence to the stance of 'Taiwan independence'".

"The political basis makes it difficult for cross-Strait trade disputes to be resolved through negotiation," it added.

In May, China reinstated tariffs on 134 items it imports from Taiwan, after Beijing's finance ministry said it would suspend concessions on the items under a trade deal because Taiwan had not reciprocated.

The Cross-Strait Economic Cooperation Framework Agreement (ECFA) between China and Taiwan was initially signed in 2010 and Taiwanese officials had previously told Reuters that China was likely to pressure Lai by ending some of the preferential trading terms within it.

Taiwan says four iPhone maker staff detained in China under 'strange' circumstances

11 October 2024, NBC News

Four had been detained in China's Zhengzhou, home to a major Foxconn plant assembling Apple's iPhones, on suspicion of the equivalent of "breach of trust," Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council said.

Four employees of Taiwan's Foxconn, the world's largest iPhone assembler, have been detained in China under "quite strange" circumstances, Taiwan's government said.

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, in a statement to Reuters on Thursday, said the four employees had been detained in China's Zhengzhou, home to a major Foxconn plant assembling Apple's iPhones, on suspicion of the equivalent of "breach of trust."

"The circumstances of this case are quite strange," it said.

The case may be connected to corruption and abuse of power by a small number of Chinese security officials, the council added, without giving details.

Foxconn declined to comment.

The Mainland Affairs Council said Foxconn had stated the company had "suffered no losses and that the four employees had done nothing to harm the company's interests."

"This has seriously damaged the confidence of companies. We call on relevant departments on the other side of the Taiwan Strait to investigate and deal with it as soon as possible."

Calls to China's Taiwan Affairs Office seeking comment outside of office hours went unanswered.

In June, Taiwan's government raised its travel warning for China, telling its citizens not to go unless absolutely necessary, following a threat from Beijing to execute those deemed "diehard" Taiwan independence supporters.

China claims democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, over the strong objections of the government in Taipei.

Taiwanese businesses have invested billions of dollars in China since the country began landmark economic reforms four decades ago, drawn by a common culture and language and much lower costs.

US says Taiwan speech no justification for China military pressure

10 October 2024, Reuters, Michael Martina, David Brunnstrom and Trevor Hunnicutt

China has no justification for using an annual national day speech by Taiwan as a pretext for military pressure, the United States said on Wednesday, ahead of scheduled remarks by the island's president that Taiwan officials say Beijing is likely to follow with military drills.

China has been using every possible means to cause "chaos", a Taiwan source said ahead of President Lai Ching-te's keynote address on Thursday, describing the context around it.

A senior U.S. administration official told reporters the Oct. 10 speech marking the 113th birthday of the Republic of China, Taiwan's official name, was no cause for Chinese military exercises.

"Even though we have not seen significant military activity or exercises following previous 10/10 speeches, we are prepared that Beijing may choose to use this as a pretext this year," the senior official said.

"Again, we see no justification for a routine annual celebration to be used in this manner. Coercive actions like this against Taiwan and in the cross-Strait context, in our view, undermine cross-Strait stability," the official said.

China staged "punishment" war games around Taiwan shortly after Lai's May inauguration but has not announced any new Taiwan-related military drills. The Chinese embassy in Washington did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The U.S. official said Taiwan had briefed diplomatic partners on Lai's speech, but that the content of his remarks were "entirely up to Taiwan officials."

Lai, who took office in May after winning election in January, is detested by China which calls him a "separatist". Beijing claims Taiwan as its own territory, a view Lai and his government reject.

China's military has significantly ramped up its activities around Taiwan in recent years and has never renounced the use of force to bring the island under its control.

National day in Taiwan marks the overthrow of the last Chinese dynasty in 1911 and the ushering in of the Republic of China. The defeated republican government fled to Taiwan in 1949 after losing a civil war with Mao Zedong's communists. No peace treaty or armistice has ever been signed, and Beijing has never renounced the use of force to bring Taiwan under its control.

Most Taiwanese believe China is unlikely to invade in the coming five years but do see Beijing as a serious threat to the island, a poll by Taiwan's top military think tank showed on Wednesday.

The U.S. and China had discussed in late August holding fresh talks between presidents Joe Biden and Xi Jinping, as both countries have sought to maintain stability in difficult bilateral relations.

The U.S. official did not offer new details on when such a leaders call might occur, and said it had been "tough to schedule" due to holidays and domestic issues in both countries.

No one can stop China's reunification: mainland slams Lai's separatist remarks

10 October 2024, China Military

A Chinese mainland spokesperson on Thursday said that no individual or force can stop China's reunification, slamming Taiwan leader Lai Ching-te's latest separatist remarks.

Chen Binhua, a spokesperson for the State Council Taiwan Affairs Office, made the remarks in response to a speech Lai delivered in Taipei on Oct. 10.

Lai's speech continued to propagate the new "two states" theory and fabricate "Taiwan independence" fallacies, Chen said, adding that it has deliberately heightened cross-Strait tensions and gravely undermined peace and stability in the Strait.

Noting that the future of Taiwan lies in national reunification, Chen said that nothing Lai has said can change Taiwan's legal status as a part of China or the fact that both sides of the Taiwan Strait belong to one China.

Lai's remarks have demonstrated his unwavering "Taiwan independence" stance, along with his confrontational mindset and continuous provocations, Chen said.

Since 1949, due to the continuation of China's civil war and foreign interference, the two sides of the Taiwan Strait have been locked in a prolonged state of political confrontation, he noted.

However, Taiwan has always remained an inalienable part of China's territory, and Taiwan's people have always been members of the Chinese nation, Chen stressed.

The government of the People's Republic of China is the sole legal government representing the whole of China, including Taiwan, he added.

He noted that the current fight against separatist forces advocating for "Taiwan independence" is not a fight over political systems but a fight over the reunification or splitting of the motherland.

Lai is attempting to hijack Taiwan for his "Taiwan independence" aims, and his related provocations are the root cause of instability in the Taiwan Strait, which will bring disaster to Taiwan people, Chen said.

He emphasized the mainland's firm opposition to any separatist activities or external interference, calling for the promotion of cross-Strait exchange and cooperation, further integration, and the unwavering pursuit of national reunification.

Taiwan willing to cooperate with China, but not as subordinate to it as 'motherland'

10 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Taiwan's president William Lai Ching-te has said the People's Republic of China (PRC) cannot claim to represent his Republic of China (ROC) which he has pointed out is older – having been founded on Jan 1, 1912 – hitting raw nerves in Beijing which has not ruled out armed invasion to "reunite" the two sides. China marked its 75th national day on Oct 1, and Taiwan its 113th on Oct 10.

Beijing has accused Lai of escalating hostility after his recent comments that the PRC could not be the island's motherland.

Zhu Fenglian, a spokeswoman for the mainland's Taiwan Affairs Office, has said Lai had not only tried to deceive and intimidate the Taiwan people, harming their interests, but was covering up his efforts to provoke separatism and damage cross-strait relations.

"Lai Ching-te's Taiwan independence fallacy is just old wine in new bottles, and again exposes his obstinate stance on Taiwan independence and his sinister intentions of escalating hostility and confrontation," the scmp.com Oct 9 quoted Zhu as saying.

But Lai, giving a keynote national address outside the presidential office in Taipei on his country's national day of Oct 10, has reiterated that the ROC – the island's formal name – and the PRC are "not subordinate to each other".

But such an assertion goes against the grain of China's claim that Taiwan, a "renegade province", belongs to it.

Nevertheless, Taiwan rejects the claim, saying it has never been a part of the PRC, which was established on Oct 1, 1949.

Taiwan, on the other hand, marks as its national day the anniversary of the 2011 revolution, known as the Xinhai Revolution, which toppled China's last imperial dynasty.

"On this land, democracy and freedom are growing and thriving. The PRC has no right to represent Taiwan," Reuters Oct 10 quoted Lai as saying.

Taiwan's determination to defend its sovereignty, maintain peace in the Taiwan Strait and seek equal and dignified talks with China all remain unchanged, he has added.

While holding out an offer of cooperation with China, Lai has made it clear, "I will also uphold the commitment to resist annexation or encroachment upon our sovereignty."

"We are willing to work with China on addressing climate change, combating infectious diseases, and maintaining regional security to pursue peace and mutual prosperity for the well-being of the people on the two sides of the Taiwan Strait," he has added.

Beijing has repeatedly denounced the Taiwanese leader as an "obstinate separatist" and has been angered by his attempts to reframe the relationship between the two sides.

He has promoted the concept of "mutual non-subordination", presenting Taiwan and the mainland as separate entities to cement a distinct Taiwanese identity, noted the scmp.com report.

The ROC government of China led by the Kuomintang, or Nationalist, forces, fled to Taiwan after their defeat by the communists in the civil war, and set up an interim government there under Chiang Kai-shek.

While Chiang had hoped to regain control of the mainland, Lai has added: "We will no longer attack the mainland, but we are also unwilling to be ruled by the Communist Party."

Taiwan's Kuomintang party, now the single largest in parliament, sees democracy and respect for human rights as preconditions for holding talks on a political settlement between the two sides. Lai's Democratic Progressive Party, on the other hand, is seen as favouring a separate national identity for the island.

Most Taiwanese believe China unlikely to invade in coming five years, poll shows

09 October 2024, NBC

Most Taiwanese believe China is unlikely to invade in the coming five years but do see Beijing as a serious threat to the democratic island, a poll by Taiwan's top military think tank showed on Wednesday.

Over the past five years or so, China's military has significantly ramped up its activities around Taiwan, which Beijing views as its own territory over the strong objections of the government in Taipei, and has never renounced the use of force to bring the island under its control.

The survey of around 1,200 people conducted last month by the Institute for National Defense and Security Research showed 61% of people think it was "unlikely or very unlikely" that China would attack Taiwan in the coming five years.

"Most people do not think China's territorial ambitions will manifest themselves in the form of attacking Taiwan," said Christina Chen, an INDSR researcher.

Taiwan's people are also concerned about other Chinese threats, including military drills and propaganda campaigns, she said.

"Most people see China's territorial ambitions as a serious threat," Chen said.

The poll presents a contrast to a warning by the head of U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, who said last year that Chinese President Xi Jinping had ordered his military to be ready to conduct an invasion of Taiwan by 2027.

"That means Taiwanese people are aware of the threat but remain calm and rational with the expectations of an imminent war," the INDSR said.

More than 67% of respondents to the poll said they would fight back if China attacked, but they were split almost evenly on whether Taiwan's armed forces were capable of defending the island, half expressing confidence and half no confidence.

Lee Kuan-chen, another INDSR researcher, said Taiwan's military should continue to boost its defense capacity to build public trust.

The poll also showed a split in opinion on whether the United States would help defend Taiwan.

While some 74% believed the U.S. government was likely to "indirectly" help Taiwan by providing food, medical supplies and weapons, only 52% thought the U.S. military would dispatch its armed forces to intervene, the poll showed.

Lee said Taiwan's government should be more transparent about Taiwan-U.S. security cooperation.

"That way, people will not have expectations that are too high or too low on U.S. assistance," Lee said.

U.S. President Joe Biden has upset the Chinese government with comments that appeared to suggest the United States would defend Taiwan if it were attacked, a deviation from a long-held U.S. position of "strategic ambiguity."

Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te said on Saturday that it is "impossible" for the People's Republic of China to become Taiwan's motherland because Taiwan has older political roots.

Lai, who took office in May, is condemned by Beijing as a "separatist". He rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying that the island is the Republic of China, which traces its origins back to the 1911 revolution that overthrew the last imperial dynasty.

The republican government fled to Taiwan in 1949 after losing a civil war with Mao Zedong's communists who set up the People's Republic of China, which continues to claim the island as its "sacred" territory.

Taiwan's China policy making Mainland Affairs Council said it was an objective fact that since 1949 the People's Republic of China had never ruled the island.

Speaking at a concert ahead of Taiwan's national day celebrations on Oct. 10, Lai noted that the People's Republic had celebrated its 75th anniversary on Oct. 1, and it would be the Republic of China's 113th birthday on Thursday.

"On the contrary, the Republic of China may be the motherland of the people of the People's Republic of China who are over 75 years old," Lai added, to applause.

"One of the most important meanings of these celebrations is that we must remember that we are a sovereign and independent country," he said.

In response, the Chinese government said Lai is escalating tensions with "sinister intentions," saying that he continues to peddle a theory that the two sides of the Taiwan Strait are two separate countries.

"Lai Ching-te's Taiwan independence fallacy is just old wine in a new bottle, and again exposes his obstinate stance on Taiwan independence and his sinister intentions of escalating hostility and confrontation," China's Taiwan Affairs Office said in a statement.

"The Taiwan Affairs Office's remarks have made Taiwan's people see clearly that the Chinese communists regard themselves as the sole legitimate government of China and simply do not allow any room for the survival of the Republic of China," it said.

Lai, who is called a "separatist" by Beijing, is set to give a keynote speech in Taipei on Thursday.

China criticizes Taiwan president for his 'motherland' comment

09 October 2024, NHK World

China has denounced Taiwan President Lai Ching-te for his remark that it is impossible for China to become the motherland of Taiwan's people.

A spokesperson for the Taiwan Affairs Office of the State Council on Tuesday issued a statement about the remark Lai made on Saturday ahead of Double Tenth Day. Taiwan considers October 10 its national day.

Zhu Fenglian said Lai exposed his stubborn adherence to a "Taiwan independence" stance and his malicious intent to escalate hostility and confrontation.

Zhu expressed hope that many compatriots in Taiwan will staunchly oppose "Taiwan independence" and external interference.

China claims Taiwan as part of its territory, and is wary of Lai, labeling him a separatist.

Since he took office in May, China has intensified military pressure through exercises by its forces around Taiwan.

Communist China not the motherland, says Taiwan's president, because our republic is older

07 October 2024, The Guardian

Lai Ching-te argues the reverse may be true because the Republic of China – the mantle that nationalists carried with them to Taiwan – predates the People's Republic

It is "impossible" for the People's Republic of China to become Taiwan's motherland because Taiwan has older political roots, the island's president has said.

Lai Ching-te, who took office in May, is condemned by Beijing as a separatist. He rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying the island is a country called the Republic of China that traces its origins back to the 1911 revolution overthrowing the last imperial dynasty.

The Chinese nationalist government fled to Taiwan in 1949 after losing a civil war with Mao Zedong's communists. Mao set up the People's Republic of China, which continues to claim self-governed Taiwan as its territory.

Speaking at a concert ahead of Taiwan's national day celebrations on 10 October, Lai noted that the People's Republic had celebrated its 75th anniversary on 1 October and in a few days it would be the Republic of China's 113th birthday.

"Therefore, in terms of age, it is absolutely impossible for the People's Republic of China to become the motherland of the Republic of China's people. On the contrary, the Republic of China may be the motherland of the people of the People's Republic of China who are over 75 years old," Lai added, to applause.

"One of the most important meanings of these celebrations is that we must remember that we are a sovereign and independent country."

China's Taiwan affairs office did not answer calls seeking comment outside office hours, the Reuters news agency said.

The Chinese president, Xi Jinping, in a speech on the eve of his country's national day, reiterated his government's view that Taiwan is its territory.

Lai, who will give his own keynote national day address on 10 October, has needled Beijing before with historical references. In September, he said that if China's claims on Taiwan were about territorial integrity then it should also take back land from Russia signed over by the last Chinese dynasty in the 19th century.

Taiwanese people ready to fight as China ramps up aggression, ambassador says

05 October 2024, WFIN

Taiwan's top official in the U.S. is warning that China has ramped up its aggression toward the island, and that its people are ready to fight.

"Yes, of course," Alexander Yui, the Taiwanese representative to the U.S., told Fox News' Aishah Hasnie when asked whether the island's residents were willing to meet the moment, if China were to invade. "We've seen Ukraine."

Taiwan has been intensely watching the conflict in Eastern Europe as Kyiv's forces have battled a Russian invasion for more than two years.

Yui said he hoped to not need help from U.S. troops, which Ukraine also does not have, but suggested they would be eagerly accepted if offered.

"If your house is under fire, and they respond to help you with a bucket of water, would you say no?" Yui posed.

The diplomat said Chinese President Xi Jinping has escalated regional tensions since former President Donald Trump left office, but he stopped short of blaming the Biden administration for emboldening China.

"Xi Jinping has been emboldened because he wants to realize what he calls his China dream," Yui said. "It's not about which administration is in the United States . . . but rather, what are the thoughts of Xi Jinping?"

Taiwan's ministry of defense tracked eight Chinese military aircraft and two naval ships near the island earlier this week. The defense ministry said four of the eight planes crossed the median line dividing China and Taiwan's territory in the Taiwan Strait – though Beijing, which claims ownership of Taiwan, does not recognize the geographic delineation.

A week prior, on Sept. 25, Taiwan's defense ministry said it had detected 43 Chinese military aircraft in a 24-hour period, with 34 having crossed the median line. The next day saw 41 Chinese military planes detected near Taiwan.

Xi is believed to be preparing his country for an invasion of Taiwan by 2027 – meaning the U.S. response would fall to whoever wins the presidency in November.

Asked if he had a message for Americans about Taiwan ahead of Election Day, Yui said it was a "peace-loving nation."

"We believe in democracy and freedom. We have to share the same values. And we want to be incorporated in the world, because we've been isolated for many decades due to the conflict that we have . . . with mainland China," he said.

China wants Taiwan to make mistakes and is looking for excuses to trigger a blockade, Taiwan's navy commander says

04 October 2024, Business Insider

China is trying to force Taiwan into making mistakes and is looking for excuses to trigger a blockade, according to Taiwan's navy commander.

Adm. Tang Hua told The Economist that China is "slowly, but surely" ramping up its military presence around Taiwan and is ready to blockade Taiwan "at any time they want."

He described the tactic as an "anaconda" strategy meant to "squeeze the island."

"They give you extreme pressure, pressure, pressure," Tang said. "They're trying to exhaust you." At the same time, Tang said that Taiwan is focused on avoiding confrontation. "The PLA is trying to force Taiwan to make mistakes," he said, using the acronym for China's People's Liberation Army.

Concerns about a possible Chinese invasion of Taiwan have grown since Phil Davidson, then the US Indo-Pacific commander, said in 2021 that China could invade Taiwan by 2027.

Since then, military experts and former defense officials have made similar assessments, with variations on the timeline and approach.

Many point to China's rapid modernization of its armed forces over the past two decades and military drills around Taiwan.

According to recent updates shared by Taiwan's defense ministry, China's aircraft, vessels, and ships now operate around Taiwan almost daily, sometimes crossing the median line in the Taiwan Strait and causing its neighbor to scramble its planes. Experts from the American Enterprise Institute and the Institute for the Study of War said in May that an aggressive Chinese coercion campaign – short of war but still threatening – was more likely than a full-scale invasion.

Even so, in its Global Peace Index 2023, the Institute for Economics and Peace estimated that a Chinese blockade of Taiwan would result in a $2.7 trillion loss in world economic activity in the first year alone, equivalent to a 2.8% decline in global GDP.

Bloomberg's modeling, meanwhile, estimates that a total blockade of Taiwan and Western sanctions on China could result in a 5% worldwide GDP decline, with US GDP falling by 3.3% and China's by 8.9%.

Earlier this year, Taiwan's military leadership issued new rules of engagement around self-defense.

"We restrain our guys, not to provoke or escalate," Tang told The Economist.

According to an unofficial translation by the Lieber Institute for Law and Land Warfare at West Point, Taiwanese soldiers can launch attacks against a target that is clearly identified as a legitimate military objective and that displays clear hostile acts or intentions, as long as it is in keeping with the nature of the unit, the mission, and the specific tasks assigned by the superior.

Taiwan's defense minister, Wellington Koo, raised similar concerns last month, telling the Financial Times that it will become harder to spot early signs of a Chinese attack due to China's growing military activity around the country.

On Monday, as part of the 75th anniversary celebrations of the People's Republic of China, Chinese leader Xi Jinping pledged to achieve China's "complete reunification" with Taiwan.

"It is where the greater national interest lies, and it is what the people desire," he said, adding: "The wheel of history will not be stopped by any individual or any force."

Not subordinate to China, says Taiwan in response to Xi Jinping's "one-China principle"

03 October 2024, The Economic Times

Taiwan's foreign ministry has made it clear that the country is not subordinate to China in response to China's President Xi Jinping's claim that "Taiwan is a sacred territory of China," Taiwan News reported. During his speech, Xi insisted on adherence to Beijing's "one-China principle" and the "1992 Consensus" and opposed Taiwan independence, while also saying Beijing would achieve "reunification" with Taipei.

In response, Jeff affirmed Taiwan's 23 million citizens uphold a free and democratic constitutional system, the Taiwan News reported.

Further, he added Taiwan's sovereignty must not be infringed upon and that it is opposed to annexation, while the country's future must be determined by the Taiwanese.

Liu highlighted Taipei's calls for peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait, the right to its own space in the global arena, and participation in international organisations.

He also hoped Taiwanese would no longer face interference when cheering for Taiwan's athletes at the Olympics.

On Monday, the Mainland Affairs Council (MAC) called on China to "face up to the reality that the two sides of the Taiwan Strait are not affiliated with each other, rationally face the mainstream public opinion in Taiwan, and engage in pragmatic dialogue with Taiwan's democratically elected government." It called on Beijing to build goodwill to foster favourable conditions for the development of cross-strait relations.

The 'One China principle' is a position held by the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP) that there exists only one sovereign state under the name China, with the PRC serving as the sole legitimate government of China, and Taiwan.

The 1992 consensus refers to the outcome of a meeting in 1992 between the representatives of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP)-led People's Republic of China (PRC) in mainland China and the Kuomintang (KMT)-led Republic of China (ROC) on Taiwan. They are often credited to creating a diplomatic basis between the two.

Xi vows to 'reunify' Taiwan, warns of 'rough seas' ahead, on low-key 75th National Day

02 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Marking a subdued 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China on Oct 1 in the face of daunting, drawn-out economic challenges, and their adverse corollary effects, President Xi Jinping has vowed to "reunify" the self-governing democratic island nation of Taiwan. Earlier, in the run up to the anniversary, Xi had called for "consolidating and developing the unity of the Chinese nation" by "fostering a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation" in ethnic minority areas.

No festivities have been announced for the Oct 1 occasion, save for a flag-raising ceremony at Tiananmen Square, with an honour guard marching from the entrance of the sprawling palace that in past centuries was the home of Chinese emperors. The entirely state-controlled media ran constant reports on China's economic progress and social stability, with no mention of challenges ranging from a declining birth rate to the disruption in supply chains that has harmed the largely export-driven economy, reported indiatvnews.com Oct 1.

Like all his predecessors, Xi has reiterated his pledge to achieve "reunification" with Taiwan, underscoring his resolve to achieve the "complete reunification of the motherland."

China's ruling Communist Party claims Taiwan as its own, despite having never controlled it, and has vowed to "reunify" with the self-governing democracy, by force, if necessary, noted the cnn.com Oct 1.

"Taiwan is China's sacred territory. Blood is thicker than water, and people on both sides of the strait are connected by blood," Xi has told a banquet attended by more than 3,000 people, including officials, retired party leaders and foreign dignitaries.

But many in Taiwan view themselves as distinctly Taiwanese and have no desire to be part of Communist China.

But Xi does not care. "(We must) resolutely oppose 'Taiwan independence' separatist activities," he has said.

Xi has been China's most assertive leader on Taiwan in decades. He has ramped up the rhetoric and aggression against the democratic island – fuelling tension across the strait and raising concerns for a military confrontation with a series of large-scale military exercises.

On the situation within China, Xi has warned of "rough seas" ahead, saying, "The road ahead will not be smooth, there will definitely be difficulties and obstacles, and we may encounter major tests such as high winds and rough seas, or even stormy waves."

Xi has greatly tightened control over the CPC and Chinese people during his more than 10-year rule.

The world's second-largest economy and second most populous nation has struggled to bounce back after the Covid-19 pandemic and major issues in its housing sector – two of the biggest drivers of an economic downturn that is also affected by an ageing population and low consumer spending, noted theguardian.com Oct 1.

The banquet where Xi spoke was one of few events marking the 75th anniversary. This Oct 1 was a surprisingly muted affair, marked in Beijing only by a flag raising ceremony in Tiananmen Square. Past milestone years have seen opulent ceremonies and big military parades, the report noted.

On the eve of the Oct 1 anniversary, the economist.com Sep 30 ran a commentary saying Fear of a Soviet-style collapse keeps Xi Jinping up at night, noting that China's Communists had now been in power longer than the Soviets.

While general security measures are routine in any country marking an occasion like the National Day, in China this goes much further. Police have been following rights activists and lawyers, detaining their family members, or preventing them from entering Beijing, while the phones of outspoken journalist Gao Yu remained blocked ahead of the National Day holiday, rfa.org Sep 30 cited rights lawyers and activists as saying.

Rights activists in Wuhan, Shanghai, Changsha and other parts of China have also told RFA Mandarin that they had also been told by local authorities not to go anywhere during the National Day celebrations, and that they will be under close surveillance during the holiday period.

The moves form part of China's "stability maintenance" operations, which kick in ahead of politically sensitive dates or major events, in a bid to stave off potential threats to the ruling Chinese Communist Party before they can occur, the report said.

Taiwanese military report says China lacks full invasion force

27 September 2024, The Washington Times, Bill Gertz

An annual military report produced by the Taiwanese Defense Ministry concludes that the Chinese military has improved capabilities for conducting offensive landing operations on the island, but the People's Liberation Army still lacks sufficient forces to invade, according to a copy of the report obtained by Japan's Yomiuri newspaper.

The ministry report was submitted to the Taiwan legislature in August and described Chinese military combat drills in May targeting Taiwan shortly after President Lai Ching-te took office. According to the report, China's drills sought to promote division and confrontation in Taiwan and affect the morale of the military and the public. The May exercises also used the Chinese coast guard for patrols and inspections of vessels in waters east of Taiwan for the first time, said to be tests of a potential blockade during a military assault on Taiwan.

China has stepped up deployments of new types of anti-ship ballistic missiles and ultra-high-speed hypersonic missiles, which will provide opportunities for strikes against foreign military forces in the seas between the Chinese coast and what Beijing calls the "second island chain" — islands stretching from Japan to Guam, the report said.

The report also disclosed that the Chinese coast guard is being bolstered with new weapons and the addition of small warships from the Chinese navy.

But despite China's overall buildup, the report concludes that China's current capabilities are not sufficient to move large amounts of forces across the 100-mile Taiwan Strait that would be needed in a military strike. The lack of amphibious forces and supply capabilities for cross-strait warfare means the Chinese military is "not fully prepared to conduct a full-scale invasion on Taiwan," the report said.

A military source said one of the lessons China has learned from Russia's invasion of Ukraine is that an assault on Taiwan will be much more difficult than originally anticipated.

China fails to promptly notify Taiwan on detention of citizens: MAC

27 September 2024, Focus Taiwan

For the past eight years the Chinese authorities have failed to observe cross-strait agreements and promptly inform its counterparts in Taiwan of cases where Taiwanese citizens have had their freedom of movement restricted in China, Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council (MAC) said Thursday.

The notification mechanism regarding Taiwanese whose personal freedoms are restricted in China is part of past cross-strait agreements, MAC deputy head and spokesperson Liang Wen-chieh (梁文傑) said at a news conference.

"Since May 20, 2016 (the date when former President Tsai Ing-wen (蔡英文) took office), the implementation of these cross-strait agreements has been disrupted by political interference from the Chinese authorities," Liang added.

He urged the Chinese authorities to fulfill their commitments in accordance with the original agreements.

One of the cross-strait agreements related to the notification mechanism is the Cross-Strait Joint Crime-Fighting and Judicial Mutual Assistance Agreement (the Agreement), established by the Straits Exchange Foundation (SEF) in Taiwan and the Association for Relations Across the Taiwan Straits (ARATS) in China. The SEF is a semi-official organization in Taiwan that handles technical matters in cross-strait relations and the ARATS is its Chinese counterpart.

According to Article 12 of the Agreement, both parties "agree to promptly notify the other side regarding persons whose personal freedom has been restricted."

In other words, when a Taiwanese citizen is detained in China, the Chinese authorities are required to promptly inform their Taiwanese counterparts. Similarly, Taiwan is required to do the same for Chinese citizens under similar circumstances.

Liang's remarks came in response to a statement made by China's Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO) spokesperson Zhu Fenglian (朱鳳蓮) at a Wednesday news conference, where she said the reason for the disruption in the implementation of cross-strait agreements are "well known" when addressing the case of Taiwanese citizen Kuo Yu-hsuan (郭宇軒).

Twenty-two-year-old Kuo is currently under investigation in China for his alleged involvement in fraud. He went missing soon after arriving in Shanghai on Aug. 27, and his friends and relatives have been unable to contact him since.

However, it was not until Sept. 23, when the TAO issued a news statement confirming Kuo was under investigation by relevant agencies in China due to alleged involvement in fraud, that his whereabouts were made known.

The MAC issued a news statement later on Sept. 23, expressing "strong dissatisfaction" with the Chinese authorities as Kuo's situation was not disclosed until almost one month after his apparent detention.

Liang said at the press conference that Kuo was likely detained since early September, and the absence of a proactive notification from the Chinese authorities led to concerns on the part of his family and media speculation.

"It wasn't until after the incident surfaced, when we made inquiries and even publicly demanded answers, that they (the Chinese authorities) revealed he is currently being investigated for fraud," he added.

Kuo's case clearly demonstrates the necessity of a notification mechanism, which provides both sides of the Taiwan Strait with more accurate information, Liang noted.

In terms of the number of cases notified by China to Taiwan since the Agreement came into effect in 2009, information on the MAC website shows that, as of the end of July this year the Chinese authorities have notified Taiwan of a total of 8,123 cases in which Taiwanese citizens were detained in China.

Of the 8,123 cases, the primary types of criminal cases involved were fraud, smuggling, dangerous driving, drug-related offenses, including both drug trafficking and drug use, and traffic incidents.

In addition, 4,203 of the total were notified from the end of May 2016 (around the time Tsai took office) to late May 2024 (around the time President Lai Ching-te (賴清德) took office), and zero cases from then until the end of July.

Taiwan opposition faces test over motion denying China's U.N. claim

27 September 2024, Nikkei Asia

Taiwan's opposition faces a crucial test over a parliamentary motion mirroring recent international statements denying China's interpretation of a historic United Nations resolution.

Some hope the main opposition Kuomintang (KMT) will come around to back the motion proposed by the ruling Democratic Progressive Party, which rejects Beijing's view of U.N. Resolution 2758. The resolution, passed in 1971, acknowledges the People's Republic of China as "the only legitimate representative of China to the United Nations." Beijing claims the resolution "confirmed" its "One China principle," which asserts that there is only one China and Taiwan is an "inalienable" part of it.

But the Australian and Dutch parliaments recently backed their own motions stating that this does not give China rights to Taiwan. With a growing number of governments and legal experts calling China's take a distortion, the pro-sovereignty DPP tabled its motion when the Taiwanese legislature recently reconvened.

The KMT demurred and dithered. After initially saying it "respects" the DPP's move, the party warned against "weaponizing" the motion and proposed its own motion to demand that the U.N. allow the Republic of China to "return."

As the senior party in the opposition coalition and the biggest in parliament, the KMT's position illustrates the deep divisions in Taiwan's political class over issues of statehood and foreign affairs. It also hints at KMT wariness of any moves that they suspect would dilute their ideology that modern Taiwan belongs to a greater Chinese polity. But if the KMT ultimately refuses to back the idea that the U.N. resolution does not determine Taiwan's status, it could undermine the willingness of foreign governments to support Taipei.

Some experts were taken aback by the KMT's stance. "Frankly, I'm baffled," said Bonnie Glaser, the managing director of the Indo-Pacific program at the German Marshall Fund of the United States. "I assumed that the KMT opposes the resolution because they don't want to offend China."

Glaser said that calling for the ROC to return to the U.N. is a "nonstarter" and that "it's the KMT's fault that it wasn't tested in 1971." This, too, "will irk China," she said. "So what are they up to? I don't get it."

Chinese nationalist leader Chiang Kai-shek and his forces, which were exiled to Taiwan in 1949 after losing a civil war, were expelled from the U.N. in 1971 and had their seat taken by Communist China. For a long time, Chiang insisted that his KMT regime represented all of the Chinese ancien regime, rather than considering alternatives. In subsequent decades, the Taiwanese largely kept the old Chinese polity imposed on them but transformed into a democratic entity.

"The KMT's call for Taiwan to return to the U.N. as the Republic of China is not a serious proposal," said Raymond C-E Sung, vice president of the Taiwanese think tank Prospect Foundation and a scholar on international law. "It's an attempt to block the DPP's motion with a so-called alternative. Essentially, the KMT wants to block Taiwan's legislature from saying that the U.N. resolution doesn't involve Taiwan."

Sung told Nikkei Asia that in his view, the KMT "wants to change the international and domestic narrative – which is increasingly that the U.N. doesn't endorse China's claims over Taiwan – back to their camp. They insist on their own interpretation of the ROC constitution, and created a fantasy that ROC can return to the U.N. in the place of the PRC, as in the pre-1971 state of affairs."

Others have a more positive view.

Luke de Pulford, executive director of the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China (IPAC) – a group of hundreds of lawmakers from 35 countries concerned about Communist China's threat to global democracy – said that "the fact that a cross-party conversation on 2758 is underway in Taiwan is unexpected and exciting."

IPAC lawmakers agreed during a summit in Taipei in July that Beijing's attempt to rewrite international law over Resolution 2758 was unacceptable, and potentially dangerous. "For that reason they resolved to campaign for their own governments to restate their policies on 2758, against Beijing's distortions. ... I know international politicians will be watching [Taiwan's debate] in the hope that consensus can be achieved."

The KMT and its scandal-hit ally the Taiwan People's Party collectively hold a narrow majority in the legislature and have sought to challenge Lai's agenda. But a backlash against some of their proposals and TPP leader Ko Wen-je's corruption and campaign finance scandals have created a sense of disarray inside their coalition.

Still, the two parties remain defiant, sending back the entirety of the government's 2025 budget proposal last week and repeatedly lashing out at President Lai Ching-te. The TPP has yet to state a clear position on the U.N. issue.

Opposition politicians and KMT-leaning intellectuals have criticized the DPP's proposal that Resolution 2758 does not involve Taiwan.

Huang Kwei-bo, a professor at National Chengchi University and a former KMT official, told local media that the DPP's motion "is simply unnecessary and not pragmatic."

Huang argued that "what should be unanimously resolved by the government and the opposition is that they neither recognize nor accept Resolution 2758." This position should be "adopted to safeguard the national integrity of the Republic of China and highlight the shortcomings of global governance in which 23 million people in Taiwan, Penghu, Kinmen and Matsu were deprived of participation in the U.N. system."

But for many experts and observers, the top priority should be opposing China's use of force and coercion against Taiwan, not U.N. participation.

"The KMT's advocating bringing back the Republic of China's formula at the U.N. is switching the clock back to then-President Ma Ying-jeou's era," Sung cautioned. "It runs contrary to what the Australian and Dutch parliaments are saying recently."

DPP lawmaker Puma Shen, an expert in China's disinformation, warned that Resolution 2758 is merely the beginning of China's legal warfare against Taiwan. If Taiwan is to counter this, he argued, it needs to control the narrative.

"Taiwan's Legislative Yuan must swiftly reach a consensus on this issue to highlight the determination of Taiwanese society to defend the nation's sovereignty," Shen told Nikkei Asia. "Unfortunately, the KMT's position on this issue is still focused on competing with the People's Republic of China for the right to represent 'China,' while the DPP firmly stands on the position of 'two countries that are not subordinate to each other.'"

A Taiwanese diplomat, who declined to be named, insisted that "the problem of 2758 is Beijing's distortion, and not us."

"We have the right to fight back," the diplomat said. "Whether we can succeed is another matter. We can't let Beijing expand their 'One China principle' without pushbacks and kill our only remaining international space."

China targeting Taiwanese military: expert

25 September 2024, Taipei Times

Beijing is using its "22 guidelines," designed to punish "die-hard" Taiwanese independence separatists, to target active-duty Taiwanese military personnel, a cross-strait expert said yesterday.

Similar tactics by China intended to threaten or harm morale are expected to increase in the coming weeks ahead of Double Ten National Day next month, Taiwan Thinktank researcher Wu Se-chih (吳瑟致) said.

The Chinese Ministry of State Security on Monday posted a message on WeChat accusing a hacker group called "Anonymous 64" of launching cyberattacks against China, Hong Kong and Macau starting earlier this year.

The group was seeking to seize control of Web sites, electronic billboards, and other devices and platforms to spread disinformation to sow division in China and distrust in the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), the ministry said.

The ministry added that "Anonymous 64" is a front for the Taiwanese Ministry of National Defense's Information, Communications and Electronic Force Command, a claim the defense ministry denied.

The Chinese state security ministry also identified three people it said are members of the Taiwanese military, adding that it was investigating them for alleged involvement in the cyberattacks.

Beijing said the investigation was necessary to ensure that its anti-separatist guidelines are thoroughly implemented.

"This is a typical cognitive warfare tactic that China uses against Taiwan. Only this time, they are poisoning the well by pre-emptively claiming the hackers are from Taiwan," Wu said. "It serves no other purpose than to confuse Taiwanese, affect their morale and cause them to lose trust in their government."

The CCP's tactics to punish advocates of Taiwanese independence have had a limited effect and are more a formality, Wu said.

"It is likely that these tactics were rolled out to influence what President William Lai (賴清德) would say in his Double Ten National Day address next month and pressure the Democratic Progressive Party government," he said.

The government should closely watch whether the incident would serve as an example of how the CCP would incriminate Taiwanese for supporting Taiwanese independence, namely by distributing photographs of people that they allege have committed crimes without providing specific evidence, he said.

"The difference this time is that none of the three people are on the list of 'die-hard' separatists or have political influence. It shows that active-duty military personnel could be incriminated based on the anti-separatist guidelines," he said.

China are the real hackers not us, Taiwan says after cyber accusations

24 September 2024, Yahoo Finance

China are the real hackers not Taiwan and accusations from Beijing of a Taiwanese hacking group are fake news, senior government officials said in Taipei on Tuesday.

China's national security ministry said on Monday a Taiwan military-backed hacking group called Anonymous 64 has been carrying out cyberattacks against targets in China, urging people to report "anti-propaganda sabotage."

It also named three Taiwanese it said were part of the group and published their pictures.

Democratically governed Taiwan, which China claims as its own territory, frequently complains it is a victim of Chinese hacking and disinformation, but it is rare for Beijing to turn the tables and make the accusation back at Taipei.

Speaking to reporters at parliament, Taiwan Defence Minister Wellington Koo said it was China who was the main hacker around the globe.

"China is the first country when it comes to daily cyber attacks, doing it against Taiwan and countries with similar democratic ideals. They are the real originators," he said.

China's accusations are untrue, Koo added.

"As for what they have publicised, the military has the conviction to defend the country and will not shirk from doing so because of this, and nor will it have a chilling effect."

Also speaking at parliament, Premier Cho Jung-tai said China was spreading fake news to attack Taiwan.

"We must respond forcefully to fake news accusations against us," Cho said.

China has never renounced the use of force to bring Taiwan under its control. Taiwan's government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying only the island's people can decide their future.

China detests Taiwan President Lai Ching-te and calls him a "separatist". It has rebuffed Lai's repeated offers of talks.

China urges vigilance against Taiwanese cyberattacks

23 September 2024, Reuters, Joe Cash and Ben Blanchard

China's national security ministry said on Monday a Taiwan military-backed hacking group called Anonymous 64 has been carrying out cyberattacks against targets in China, urging people to report "anti-propaganda sabotage."

Taiwan's defence ministry denied the allegations, saying China was the real disturber of the peace with its cyber attacks and military harassment.

Since the beginning of this year, Anonymous 64 - which China's national security ministry said belonged to Taiwan's cyber warfare wing - has sought to upload and broadcast "content that denigrates the mainland's political system and major policies," on websites, outdoor screens and network TV stations, it said in a blog post.

Taiwan frequently accuses Chinese groups of seeking to spread online disinformation or carry out cyberattacks across the democratically governed island. China claims sovereignty over Taiwan and has ramped up military and political pressure against over the past five years to assert its claims.

The Taiwan defence ministry's Information, Communications and Electronic Force Command said China's accusations were untrue.

"The current enemy situation and cyber threats are severe," it said in a statement. "The Chinese communist military and forces that coordinate with it continue to use aircraft, ships and cyber attacks to harass Taiwan and are the originators of undermining regional peace."

Taiwan's government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims.

The hacking group's X account said it was set up in June 2023 and showed screenshots of efforts to broadcast videos likening Chinese President Xi Jinping to an emperor, marking the second anniversary of protests against Beijing's strict COVID curbs and commemorating the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations.

One video was an address from an Anonymous 64 member wearing the Anonymous hacking group's Guy Fawkes mask in the style of the graphic novel and film V for Vendetta.

Neither the X site nor the blog post from China's national security ministry said whether Anonymous 64 had any affiliation with the international hacking group.

Reuters was not immediately able to verify where the group was based or whether they had actually carried out the hacking attacks they were accused of. In the blog post published on its official WeChat account, the national security ministry said its investigation into the group had found many of the websites Anonymous 64 claimed to have accessed were fake or had little no traffic. Posts showing it having infiltrated numerous university and media websites had been photoshopped, the ministry added.

The security ministry published screenshots of the group's X account with heavily redacted text. It also said it had opened a case against three members of Taiwan's cyber warfare wing.

"We advocate that netizens should not believe in or spread rumours and should promptly report cyberattacks or cases of anti-propaganda activity to the national security authorities," the blog post said.

China blocks Taiwan executive from returning home

19 September 2024, Nikkei Asia, Thompson Chau

Incident seen fueling further Taiwanese concerns about doing business in China

A senior executive at one of Taiwan's top industrial conglomerates has been barred from leaving China, heightening concerns about the risks of traveling there amid tense cross-strait relations.

The unidentified Formosa Plastics Group official was questioned after landing in Shanghai via a flight from Taipei on Sept. 1, according to local media. The Taiwanese government confirmed the incident but declined to comment further, citing the individual's safety.

After being released following interrogation, the executive was not allowed by Chinese authorities to return to Taiwan, according to the Central News Agency here.

The company did not comment on the case.

The case, which hit the news the same night that China announced tariffs on dozens of Taiwanese goods, will likely spark widespread alarm in the Taiwanese business community, which had previously been less affected by the Chinese government's crackdown on individuals who defend Taiwan's sovereignty.

Chinese authorities have in recent years stepped up military aggression and political pressure toward Taiwan, an island democracy that Beijing claims as its own territory. But rarely has it targeted the business community.

During Taiwan's presidential campaign last October, China launched an investigation, which concluded with a $2,800 fine, into contract-manufacturing giant Foxconn after founder Terry Gou joined the race as an independent.

"While it remains unknown why this business executive was subjected to border restrictions, China's actions send a clear message: Anybody can be subject to Beijing's rule by law," said Marcin Jerzewski, a Taipei-based fellow at Visegrad Insight, referring to the term that China often uses to attack Taiwanese individuals who support their own sovereignty. "Intimidation and coercive actions do not merely target a few 'die-hard secessionists.'"

Jerzewski said this is a typical example of China's instrumental use of laws to achieve political objectives – also known as lawfare – as one aspect of Chinese interventions in Taiwan.

"But this strategy might push Taiwanese people even farther away from China due to the increased risks associated with cross-strait travel," the analyst told Nikkei Asia.

China announced late Wednesday that it would end tariff exemptions on 34 agricultural products from Taiwan, effective Sept. 25. The items include fresh fruits, papaya, coconuts, vegetables and aquatic products, according to a statement from the Chinese government's Customs Tariff Commission. Taiwan's Ministry of Agriculture estimated that China's move will affect about $1 million a year in tariffs.

The Chinese government has in recent years banned, or raised tariffs on, a growing list of Taiwanese products, such as pineapples, grouper fish and wax apples, as part of a broader pattern of economic coercion.

In response to the detention of Taiwanese people in China, the Mainland Affairs Council – Taiwan's top body in charge of relations with Beijing – has repeatedly reminded people to assess the risks before visiting.

The recent number of cases shows that Taiwanese people going to China "to engage in academic, economic, cultural, religious or visiting relatives and friends and other exchange activities" have been questioned and have had their personal freedom restricted by the Chinese authorities without explanation, the council warned last year.

It also urged Beijing to "immediately stop the bad and unreasonable detention behavior and treat each other with courtesy." This will "promote healthy and orderly exchanges" between Taiwan and China, it said.

Formosa Plastics, headquartered in the southern port city of Kaohsiung, manufactures and sells plastics and owns a diverse range of businesses and subsidiaries. With a market capitalization of 307.15 billion New Taiwan dollars ($9.5 billion), it is one of the region's leading industrial giants.

Soon after Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te took office in May, China swiftly encircled Taiwan and outlying islands with military drills as a warning to Taiwanese sovereignty.

China's leadership has refused to engage with Taiwan's elected government since the pro-sovereignty Democratic Progressive Party took over in 2016. It has sought to undermine the DPP, including through backing opposition politicians and giving them a platform. China has also stopped recognizing maritime boundaries in the Taiwan Strait that both sides had respected for decades.

Taiwan will 'never succumb,' official says amid intensifying pressure from Beijing

12 September 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

Faced with the "unprecedented pressure, our determination to safeguard our sovereignty and democratic system has never been so strong. This is our bottom line," Chiu Chui-cheng said at a defence forum in Taipei.

The head of Taiwan's top China policy body said Thursday that the democratic island will never surrender in the face of intensifying pressure from a "more aggressive" Beijing.

China claims Taiwan as part of its territory and has said it would never renounce the use of force to bring the self-ruled island under its control.

Beijing has ramped up military and political pressure on Taipei in recent years, sending warplanes, drones and naval vessels around the island on a near-daily basis.

The head of Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council – which manages China-related issues – said on Thursday that Beijing's "attempts to erase the sovereignty of the Republic of China (Taiwan)" have threatened peace and stability across the region.

But faced with the "unprecedented pressure, our determination to safeguard our sovereignty and democratic system has never been so strong. This is our bottom line," Chiu Chui-cheng said in an English-language speech at a defence forum in Taipei.

"On this point, there is no room for compromise. We never succumb to the sabre-rattling and intensifying pressure from China. Taiwan never surrenders."

Chiu also warned that Chinese leader Xi Jinping's policy towards Taiwan will "only become more assertive and aggressive" as he hopes to achieve "national unification" with Taiwan.

"This ambition is no doubt the root causes of risks in the Taiwan Strait," he said.

China maintains a military presence around Taiwan, as well as the nearby South China Sea, as Beijing has increasingly pressed on its territorial claims.

On Thursday, Taipei's defence ministry said 29 Chinese military aircraft, eight naval vessels and one official ship were detected in a 24-hour window ending at 6 am (2200 GMT Wednesday).

In May, three days after Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te was sworn into office, Beijing conducted war games to simulate a blockade of the island.

Lai – whom Beijing regards as a "dangerous separatist" – rejects China's claim of Taiwan, just as his predecessor Tsai Ing-wen did.

He has repeatedly made overtures to restart dialogue with Beijing – which were severed after Tsai came to power in 2016 as relations plunged – to no avail.

Chiu reiterated Thursday that Taiwan is willing to talk with Beijing "without any political preconditions on the basis of mutual respect, dignity, and equality".

"We hope the leaders of the other side will display wisdom and flexibility towards a win-win future for both sides of the Taiwan Strait."

China says it is verifying email tipoffs about Taiwan 'separatist' activity

11 September 2024, Reuters

China's government said on Wednesday it would carefully review email tipoffs it has received about Taiwan "separatist" activity, adding that "good people" have nothing to worry about, drawing a rebuke from Taipei that Beijing was simply lying.

China claims democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, over the strident objections of the government in Taipei.

Beijing has been stepping up its campaign against those it accuses of being "separatists", including in June threatening to execute "diehard separatists", and in August announced an email address where people could report tipoffs about the crimes committed by such people.

Asked at a routine news conference in Beijing how the new email system was working, Chen Binhua, spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, reiterated that their measures targeted only a very small minority.

"After the establishment of the mailbox for reporting diehard Taiwan independence elements, people on both sides of the Taiwan Straits have responded with practical actions," he said.

This is a reflection of the "common aspirations" of people on either side of the strait, Chen added.

"We will carefully verify and screen the clues we receive," he said. "We will never let a single Taiwan independence element off the hook, but we will never wrongly accuse good people either."

Taiwan's China-policy making Mainland Affairs Council said Beijing's claims to be targeting only a small number of people was "obviously a lie" given its vague definition of being an independence supporter.

"We call on the mainland side to stop repeatedly intimidating and threatening the Taiwanese people," it said in a statement.

Taiwan's government, which says only the island's people can decide their future, has condemned China's new campaign, and warned against all but absolutely necessary travel to the country. China says that is alarmist nonsense.

China has a particular hatred of Taiwan President Lai Ching-te, inaugurated in May, but has not placed him on its list of "hardcore separatists", unlike Vice President Hsiao Bi-khim, Defence Minister Wellington Koo and some others in his administration and party.

"Taiwan independence is a scourge, a dead end; it won't come to pass," Chen said, speaking of Lai's first 100 days in office.

Lai has repeatedly offered talks with Beijing but been rebuffed, and also repeatedly warned of the danger Taiwan faces from its giant neighbour and the need to strengthen their defences.

China accuses Taiwan president of 'hunting down' rivals like Ko Wen-je

11 September 2024, Nikkei Asia, Thompson Chau

China has accused Taiwan's president of persecuting Beijing-leaning rivals, days after the leader of the second-largest opposition party was detained amid swirling corruption allegations.

"Since the Lai Ching-te administration came to power, it has repeatedly manipulated judicial and administrative means, used public weapons for private purposes, opposed party members and dissenters, and created 'green terror' on the island,"

Chen Binhua, spokesman for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, told reporters on Wednesday.

The representative of China's top body in charge of relations with Taiwan was replying to a question about his assessment of the scandals plaguing Ko Wen-je, leader of the Taiwan People's Party.

The TPP and its larger opposition partner, the Kuomintang (KMT), have been a thorn in the side of the pro-sovereignty Lai's fledgling administration. But Ko and his party have found themselves fighting for their political future after he was arrested last week in connection with a real estate deal during his past stint as mayor of Taipei.

Hours before his arrest, Ko portrayed himself as the victim of a witch hunt in an interview with Nikkei Asia.

Chen's "green terror" comment was a reference to the White Terror period when the KMT regime, exiled from China, imposed brutal authoritarian rule across Taiwan after 1949.

Comparisons between the Democratic Progressive Party's elected government presiding over a free society and the martial law era are not uncommon among more radical opposition figures in Taiwan, despite obvious differences. During the White Terror, dissidents and civilians were jailed, tortured and executed, and prosecutors did not need a court's permission to detain people.

Ko, who is also embroiled in a campaign finance scandal that prompted him to take a leave of absence from the party's leadership, accused Taiwan's judiciary of being "political tools" of the government in his interview with Nikkei Asia. He also took aim at Taiwan's submarine program, intended as a deterrent against China, and questioned the defense ministry's plans to locally manufacture seven more subs, although he pledged to support raising the defense budget.

Chen accused Lai of trying to "hunt down people from all walks of life who do not support the DPP and do not agree with 'Taiwan independence' in order to pursue the personal interests of one person and one party, and to remove obstacles for them to implement 'Taiwan independence.'"

Ko has argued that China and Taiwan are "one family" and voiced support for economic pacts with Beijing during the campaign for the January elections.

Chen did not provide evidence to substantiate his accusations against Lai. The president, who has been invited for an interview with Nikkei Asia, has on TV emphasized the importance of an independent judiciary in which the executive cannot intervene. Other politicians, including a DPP minister in Lai's administration, have also faced finance scandals recently and been held in custody.

Beijing weighed in on the Ko drama after months of lashing out at Lai's administration through a combination of military incursions and political coercion. Days after Lai took office in May, Chinese forces swiftly encircled Taiwan and its outlying islands with military drills -- underscoring the Communist Party's threat to the Asian democracy and tech powerhouse, which it claims despite never having ruled.

The drills were only one in a series of actions that have raised alarm about Chinese intentions. China's leadership has refused to engage with Taipei's elected government since the DPP took over in 2016. It has sought to undermine the DPP, including by backing opposition politicians and giving them a platform. China has also stopped recognizing maritime boundaries in the Taiwan Strait that both sides had respected for decades.

"I want to emphasize again that 'Taiwan independence' is a countercurrent to history and a dead end; reunification is the historical trend and the right path," Chen said.

The spokesperson added, "No matter how the situation on the island changes, no matter who is in power, it cannot change the fact that both sides of the Taiwan Strait belong to one China, and it cannot change the relationship between the two sides."

Advocates of "Taiwan independence" are defined in Taiwan, the U.S. and much of the world as those who want to remove Taiwan's current Republic of China constitution and polity, and officially declare the island as a de jure sovereign state.

In China, however, the term is increasingly used to describe anyone who supports the status quo and rejects subjugating Taiwan under President Xi Jinping's China, including Lai and his allies.

US House passes bill to financially deter aggression against Taiwan

10 September 2024, Taipei Times, Fion Khan and Kayleigh Madjar

The US House of Representatives yesterday unanimously passed the Taiwan Conflict Deterrence Act, which aims to disincentivize Chinese aggression toward Taiwan by cutting Chinese leaders and their family members off from the US financial system if Beijing acts against Taiwan.

The bipartisan bill, which would also publish the assets of top Chinese leaders, was cosponsored by Republican US Representative French Hill, Democratic US Representative Brad Sherman and seven others.

If the US president determines that a threat against Taiwan exists, the bill would require the US Department of the Treasury to report to Congress on funds held by certain members of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), including how they were acquired.

The treasury must then "prohibit significant transactions" between US financial institutions and the officials, and potentially their immediate family, with allowance for exceptions.

It still needs to be approved by the US Senate to become law, but with less than two months before the presidential and congressional elections, it is not clear it is to become law this year.

"If we want to see the world's communist and autocratic dictatorships change course, we must expose their wealth, corruption and financial privilege of their elites to the citizens suffering daily under their rule," Hill said in remarks during deliberation of the bill.

"This bill goes beyond just naming and shaming. It will also cut off access to the US financial system for those CCP officials and their immediate family," he said.

"It is time for China to give up the idea of intimidating the people of Taiwan and to recognize that America's response will involve the military, will involve broad-based economic response, and will involve very personal economic disclosures and response. That is the way to prevent what could cause an incredible disruption in the world and even possibly a world war," Sherman added.

In Taipei, Minister of Foreign Affairs Lin Chia-lung (林佳龍) today expressed gratitude toward the US Congress for using a "creative and effective way" to deter Chinese military aggression toward Taiwan.

"This kind of legislation allows us to jointly deter Chinese Communist expansion and to uphold peace in the Indo-Pacific region, especially cross-strait stability and security," Lin said.

The bill was part of a package of legislation in the US Congress this week aimed at China.

The US House yesterday also voted to bar new drones from Chinese drone manufacturer DJI from operating in the US.

The bill, which still needs to be approved by the US Senate, would prohibit the company's products from operating on US communications infrastructure.

It would not prevent existing DJI drones from operating in the US.

DJI, which sells more than half of all drones in the US, opposes the bill that it said "restricts the ability of US drone operators to buy and use the right equipment for their work, solely on the basis of the equipment's country of origin."

Another bill approved yesterday would bar the US Department of Homeland Security from buying batteries from six Chinese companies, including CATL.

The US House is also expected to vote later this week on tightening rules barring US electric vehicles tax credits with Chinese content.

China's harsh sentencing of Taiwanese activist sparks tensions in cross-strait relations

10 September 2024, Lokmat Times

Efforts to maintain exchanges between Taiwanese and Chinese citizens are facing severe challenges following China's harsh sentencing of a Taiwanese activist.

Analysts warn that Beijing's decision to jail Yang Chih-yuan, a political activist, to nine years in prison under secession charges will have an effect on Taiwan's civil society, Voice of America reported.

According to the report, on September 6, China's Taiwan Affairs Office (TAO) confirmed that a court in Wenzhou had sentenced Yang under accusations of secession, stating that he was involved in organizations advocating for Taiwan's independence. "His acts are egregious and the court reached the decision according to law," the office said in a statement. Yang, who was arrested in 2022 while teaching and participating in competitions for the board game Go, was accused of long-standing involvement in secessionist activities.

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council (MAC), overseeing cross-strait exchanges, condemned the ruling, urging Beijing to reveal the verdict and evidence. "Beijing is trying to use Yang's case to intimidate Taiwanese people under the pretext of penalizing Taiwan's independence," the MAC said in a statement last week.

VOA further states that this is the first time China has used secession charges against a Taiwanese individual. It follows China's introduction of 22 new guidelines in June aimed at punishing so-called "die-hard Taiwan independence activists," with potential sentences reaching the death penalty.

Observers believe Yang's case is a troubling signal that Beijing is adopting a more hardline stance against Taiwan. "This shows that Beijing means business when it comes to using legal instruments to crack down on what it regards as 'separatism,'" said J Michael Cole, a senior fellow at the Global Taiwan Institute. He noted that the case will inevitably dampen civil society exchanges between the two sides.

In response to China's growing hostility, Taipei has postponed the scheduled visits of two academic delegations from Xiamen University. While some Taiwanese media claim the delay is due to "obstacles" imposed by local authorities, the MAC maintains that it is part of routine procedures.

China, however, wasted no time twisting the narrative, with the state-run Global Times accusing Taiwan of deliberately blocking the delegations. This deliberate mischaracterization is yet another example of Beijing's aggressive tactics to shift blame onto Taiwan while it continues its campaign of intimidation.

The tension has also affected other platforms of communication, such as the annual Shanghai-Taipei City Forum. The event, one of the few remaining opportunities for Taiwanese and Chinese officials to meet, has yet to schedule a 2024 gathering. The absence of such exchanges only highlights Beijing's refusal to engage with Taiwan diplomatically, focusing instead on divide-and-conquer strategies within Taiwanese society.

China's increasing military pressure against Taiwan under President Lai Ching-te's leadership reflects Beijing's desire to suppress any notion of Taiwanese sovereignty. "Such delays serve as a clear reminder that even lower-level engagement is difficult to sustain when one side rejects core aspects of the other's existence," said Timothy Rich, a political scientist at Western Kentucky University.

Beijing's relentless pressure is not just military. The sentencing of Yang Chih-yuan is part of a broader effort to suppress pro-independence sentiment within Taiwan. By criminalizing legitimate advocacy, China is attempting to stifle dissent and sow fear among Taiwanese activists and citizens alike.

However, this strategy risks further alienating Taiwan. As Cole pointed out, Beijing's refusal to engage in formal dialogue with Taipei while keeping doors open to interactions with other elements of Taiwanese society is a calculated effort to divide and weaken Taiwan's unity. Yet, this heavy-handed approach may ultimately backfire, as it deepens mistrust and fuels resentment toward Beijing's authoritarian grip.

Taiwan detects increase in Chinese military activity near its territory

In response to China's military action, Taiwan sent aircraft and naval ships and deployed coastal-based missile systems to monitor PLA activity

Taiwan's Ministry of National Defence (MND) said that it detected seven Chinese military aircraft, six naval vessels, one official ship and two of the aircraft entered its Air Defence Identification Zone from 6 am (local time) on Saturday to 6 am (local time) on Sunday.

Of the seven Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA), two aircraft crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait and entered Taiwan's southeastern and southwestern Air Defence Identification Zone (ADIZ).

Taiwan's MND said that it has monitored the situation and responded accordingly.

Exclusive: Staff member at US consulate general in China openly spreads 'Taiwan independence' rhetoric

07 September 2024, Global Times

A staff member responsible for translation at a US consulate general in China has repeatedly spread rhetoric related to "Taiwan independence" during public activities, deliberately translating "the People's Republic of China" as "the Republic of China," a source familiar with the matter told the Global Times. The source added that the person, if she insists on behaving in such a way, is certainly unwelcome by the Chinese people.

According to the source, after the Chinese side pointed out the mistake, the US staff member refused to admit and instead accused the Chinese side of slander. In contact with Chinese personnel, this US staff member repeatedly issued extreme remarks such as "Taiwan is an independent country."

She even aggressively pushed local Chinese officials on foreign affairs during external events, displaying an arrogant demeanor, the source said.

The aforementioned source told the Global Times that "A staff member dispatched by the US government to China has behaved in such an inappropriate manner. It raises questions about whether the issue lies with her personally or with the lack of discipline within the US diplomatic missions in China."

But one thing is certain – her words and actions have offended Chinese society, violated the US government's commitment to the one-China principle, and breached both the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations and the Consular Convention between the People's Republic of China and the United States.

The person, if she insists on behaving in such a way, is certainly unwelcome by the Chinese people, the source said.

Taiwan court sentences three retired officers for spying on China's behalf

07 September 2024, Business Standard

Taiwan News reported that Chang, Chou, and Yueh reaped benefits from China for their business.

Taipei District court sentenced three retired officers Taipei District court sentenced three retired officers from the Military Intelligence Bureau (MIB) to prison on the charge of forming a spy ring to collect sensitive information on China's behalf, Taiwan News reported.

The Taipei District Court verdicts can still be appealed. Former Major General Yueh Chih-chung was sentenced to 10 months in jail, retired Colonel Chang Chao-jan received a prison term of 18 months, and ex-Colonel Chou Tien-tzu was sentenced to 14 months. Ex-Colonel Wang Ta-wang was found not guilty, as per Taiwan News report on Friday.

Taiwan News reported that Chang, Chou, and Yueh reaped benefits from China for their business, and were invited on free trips, according to prosecutors. A national security official in the Chinese province of Guangdong told them to form a spy ring and collect secret information from Taiwan.

Chang was accused of arranging a trip to China for Wang, who revealed personal background information about colleagues to the Chinese officials. After completing their investigation, prosecutors decided to charge the suspects with breaking the National Security Act by forming a spy organization and the National Intelligence Work Act by leaking secrets, Taiwan News reported.

On August 30, the Taiwanese Supreme Court sentenced a father and son duo for eight years in prison on the charge of enticing active military officers to pass on secret information about the annual Han Kuang drills to China.

The Supreme Court rejected final appeals on August 29. The two suspects, surnamed Huang, first came into contact with Chinese intelligence officials in 2015 when they were doing business in Xiamen.

As per Taiwan News, the duo recruited two officers in separate air defence and missile units, Yeh and Su. The group passed on eight secret documents about the Han Kuang exercises. They delivered the information personally to China or sent images and graphics by messaging softwares.

Residents of Nepal's 15 northern districts to get five- yearly Tibet entry-exit passes

31 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Normal life appears to have finally resumed for the people living in 15 districts of northern Nepal near Chinese occupied Tibet's border with the two countries having agreed to issue five-year entry and exit passes for them, according to kathmandupost.com Aug 29. Most of these people are ethnically Tibetan or of Tibetan-origin. It is not clear whether people on the Tibetan side of the border will be issued similar passes.

Nepali citizens living in northern districts who depend on Tibet for trade, pilgrimage, work, health checks and other daily activities, have long been complaining of hassles in visiting Tibet due to lack of mandatory passes, the report said.

The permit system was suspended after the onset of Covid pandemic at the end of 2019. After China finally started reopening 14 traditional entry points recently, some local units on the Nepali side started issuing temporary "China Departure and Entry Permits" locally. Now, to streamline the entry and exit permission, the Department of Immigration is all set to issue digital passes to residents of the 15 districts. However, Nepali citizens from other districts will need a visa to enter "Chinese" territory, the report explained.

The 15 districts where the passes would be distributed are listed as Taplejung, Sankhuwasabha, Solukumbhu, Dolakha, Sindhupalchok, Rasuwa, Dhading, Gorkha, Manang, Mustang, Dolpa, Mugu, Humla, Bajhang and Darchula.

And the 14 dedicated trading/entry/exit points are listed as Tiptala (Taplejung); Kimathnaka (Sankhuwasabha); Falak and Lapchi of Dolakha; Tatopani and Gumba of Sindhupalchok; Lazing and Chhekampar (Gorkha); Korala of Mustang; Hilsa (Humla); Nakcha (Mugu); Maringla Bhanjyang (Dolpa); Urai (Bajhang); and Tinkar of Darchula district.

However, Nepal's Department of Immigration will not immediately issue the entry pass in Solukumbhu, Dhading, and Manang districts due to ongoing adverse weather conditions, the report said.

The five-year pass will be issued exclusively to Nepali citizens living in the 15 border districts, their siblings, and those who are married and living permanently in these districts. Those who have migrated from other districts and are now permanently living in these 15 districts are also eligible for the pass, the report said. Before 2007, Nepali and Chinese nationals from border districts could travel up to 30 kilometres inside each other's territory without restrictions. However, in Jan 2007, the two sides reached a new agreement under which an identity card with one-year validity was made mandatory. Now, both sides have developed a digital identity card.

The report noted that Nepal and China first entered an 'Agreement on Trade and other Related Matters between the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) of China and Nepal' on Sep 30, 1956, and it was last renewed on Jul 10, 2002.

A Home Ministry official of Nepal has said the ministry and the Department of Immigration had agreed to incorporate biometric security features into the pass, as requested by Chinese officials. The new pass with biometric information is intended to curb illegal and criminal activities across the Nepal-Tibet border, the report added.

Earlier, the Chinese authorities would issue one-year entry permits, and after Covid, they limited it to a day- long pass. If the entry process is simplified further, it will benefit the citizens from both sides even more," Madav Sapkota, a CPN (Maoist Centre) lawmaker from Sindhupalchok district, has said.

100 days into the job, Taiwan's new leader is cutting mainland ties by reframing history

31 August 2024, SCMP

William Lai Ching-te's first 100 days as leader of Taiwan have been evaluated not only on the basis of his handling of local affairs, but also in relation to the self- governed island's heightened tensions with mainland China.

Cross-strait relations have deteriorated significantly since Lai took office on May 20, according to analysts, who say he has actively sought to sever Taiwan's historical ties with the mainland.

His predecessor Tsai Ing-wen, also of the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), employed a strategy of ambiguity in dealing with the mainland during her eight years in office. However, the more assertive Lai is seen to have taken a clear and decisive stance.

His promotion of the "mutual non-subordination" theory to define Taiwan's relationship with Beijing has raised concerns among observers, who fear it could further strain cross-strait ties and potentially lead to conflict.

In his three major speeches on cross-strait relations since taking office, Lai has consistently stressed his view that the two sides of the Taiwan Strait are no longer connected.

"The Republic of China and the People's Republic of China are not subordinate to each other," Lai said in his inauguration speech, referring to the official names of the two sides.

According to analysts, Lai has sought to use these speeches to project a permanent disconnect, reframing the two sides of the strait as adversaries rather than kin.

"In contrast to Tsai, who adopted a strategic ambiguity approach by maintaining the Act Governing the Relations Between the People of Taiwan and the Mainland to avoid overly provoking Beijing, Lai chose to make it clear that the two sides are not subordinate to each other," said Wang Kung-yi, head of the Taiwan International Strategy Study Society, a think tank in Taipei.

Promulgated in 1992, the act governs visits and exchanges of people between Taiwan and the mainland.

Although Tsai also promoted the island's independence, Wang said that by maintaining the cross-strait relations act that still binds the two sides together, she managed to give Beijing the impression that she did not seek to overly offend.

But Lai has simply abandoned the act and directly touted the "mutual non-subordination" concept to wipe out the historic cross-strait link, Wang said.

Addressing the centennial celebration of the Whampoa Military Academy in Kaohsiung on June 16, Lai said: "Despite drastic changes over the past 100 years, we firmly believe that wherever the Republic of China is, there is the spirit of Whampoa." Lai made no mention of the late Kuomintang (KMT) leader Chiang Kai-shek, who headed the academy when it was first established in the southern mainland city of Guangzhou in 1924.

The academy was relocated to Taiwan shortly after the civil war, when Chiang's defeated forces retreated to the island and set up an interim government there in 1949.

"Only those who fight for the survival, development and security of the Republic of China and its people are true graduates of the academy; those without such ambition are false ones," Lai said.

Last week in Quemoy – a Taiwanese defence outpost also known as Kinmen – Lai addressed a ceremony to mark the 66th anniversary of the start of the 1958 Taiwan Strait Crisis, also known as the "August 23 Artillery Battle".

"We are no longer trying to retake mainland China, but we are also unwilling to be ruled by the Chinese Communist Party," Lai said.

"When the artillery battle happened, I wasn't born yet, and the Democratic Progressive Party hadn't been established either. Clearly, China's intention to take over Taiwan is not directed at any particular person or political party in Taiwan, nor is it about what anyone has said or done."

The battle in 1958 saw communist forces shelling the nearby islands of Quemoy and Matsu – another Taiwanese defence outpost close to the mainland – in an attempt to take control of Taiwan.

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. Most countries, including Taiwan's main international backer, the United States, do not recognise Taiwan as independent, but Washington is opposed to any attempt to take the self-governed island by force and is committed to supplying it with weapons.

Beijing sees Lai, leader of the DPP, as a "separatist" who could bring war to the Taiwan Strait and has stepped up military intimidation since he was elected to succeed Tsai in January.

"In his June address to the Whampoa Military Academy, Lai stressed that although the academy was set up 100 years ago in Guangzhou, it is now in Kaohsiung, and the Whampoa spirit only exists in Taiwan rather than in mainland China," Wang said.

"Lai attempted to strike a delicate balance between acknowledging the academy's historical roots in mainland China and promoting a distinct Taiwanese identity," Wang added, saying he also sought to erase the legacy of Chiang, who had deep historical links with the mainland and whose influence still lingered within the military.

Huang Kwei-bo, a professor of diplomacy at National Chengchi University in Taipei, said Lai's August 23 speech was part of an ongoing attempt to decouple Taiwan from mainland China.

"In the case of the August 23 Artillery Battle, Lai sought to lead the public to believe that the battle was a conflict between 'democratic Taiwan and communist China,' whereas in reality, it was the extension of the Chinese civil war between the KMT and the [Communist Party]," Huang said.

Like the mainland, Taiwan was under one-party rule in 1958. The KMT is now the main opposition party in Taiwan.

Huang said Lai's remarks that China's attempt to take the island was "not directed at any particular person or political party in Taiwan" suggested that Beijing's wish to seize Taiwan had nothing to do with the ruling DPP's promotion of independence.

However, Lai I-chung, president of the Prospect Foundation, a government think tank, said that Lai's remarks aimed to assert that Taiwan had “long since moved beyond the historical perspective of the Chinese Civil War”.

“The artillery battle should not be viewed as an extension of that civil war,” he said, adding the island’s leader sought to “break free from the Chinese civil war framework in Taiwan’s cross-strait discourse, anchoring it instead in the broader national context”. Additionally, his remarks aimed to shift society away from an outdated historical viewpoint, urging Taiwanese to realise that Taiwan is now of global significance, Lai I-chung said.

“The Taiwan Strait issue is not merely a matter between Taiwan and China but a challenge faced by the entire world, and Taiwan is not facing it alone.” James Yifan Chen, a professor of diplomacy and international relations at Tamkang University in New Taipei, said Lai’s cross-strait policy rhetoric appeared to be more separatist than Tsai’s because of Lai’s repeated emphasis on how the two sides were not subordinate to each other.

“Lai is also framing a different concept which denies [Taiwan’s] past legacies on the mainland to push for more obvious separation as a historical revisionist,” Chen said.

Timing is also important. Lai is promoting his ideology during the “vacuum period” of the US presidential election, when Americans typically pay less attention to the words and actions of a Taiwanese leader, according to Chen.

“I think US national security adviser Jake Sullivan and China’s top diplomat Wang Yi would definitely talk about this [but] the US worries more about the Middle East and the South China Sea now, and cross-strait issues do not appear on its alert radar,” he said.

Li Zhengguang, dean of the Taiwan Research Institute at Beijing Union University, said that from the mainland’s perspective, Tsai Ing-wen was more inclined towards “soft confrontation” while Lai’s provocations on the issue of Taiwanese independence have surpassed hers.

He warned that if Lai continued to push the “Taiwan independence historical narrative” to sever cross-strait ties or adopted a “hard confrontation” approach in cross-strait relations, the mainland will undoubtedly respond with “hard measures” to seek unification.

“This is evident from earlier actions such as the mainland issuing judicial documents to punish stubborn Taiwan independence elements, the People’s Liberation Army exercises targeting Taiwan, and the normalisation of law enforcement patrols by the mainland coastguard in the waters around Quemoy,” he said.

Sullivan’s just-concluded visit to Beijing also sent “a clear signal” that the US wanted to cooperate with the mainland to improve risk management regarding Taiwan, Li said.

China lacks the ability to invade, but has options

31 August 2024, Taipei Times

China lacks the ability to “fully” invade Taiwan as it does not have the equipment, but is bringing online advanced new weapons and has other options to threaten Taiwan, such as inspecting foreign cargo ships, the Ministry of National Defense (MND) said yesterday.

In an annual threat assessment of China sent to lawmakers, a copy of which was reviewed by Reuters, the ministry said Beijing continues to hone skills such as joint command operations.

“However, the use of tactics and strategies against Taiwan is still limited by the natural geographical environment of the Taiwan Strait and insufficient landing equipment and logistic capabilities,” it said. China “does not yet fully possess the formal combat capabilities for a comprehensive invasion of Taiwan,” it added.

However, China is speeding up development of a slew of new weapons, such as the H-20 bomber and hypersonic missiles, beefing up the number of nuclear warheads and trialing new tactics, the ministry said. The report said that in May, when China staged war games around Taiwan shortly after President William’s Lai (賴清德) inauguration, China Coast Guard ships were sent for the first time on interception and inspection drills off the east coast. China’s aim with the drills was to practice cutting off communication with the outside world and blockade Taiwan, and boarding foreign cargo ships is an option China could take, short of open conflict, the ministry said.

The Chinese Ministry of National Defense did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

At a regular news briefing in Beijing on Thursday, the Chinese ministry said that as long as the Democratic Progressive Party “engages in ‘Taiwan independence’ [efforts], there will be no peace.”

“The more they provoke, the faster they will perish,” Chinese Ministry of National Defense spokesperson Wu Qian (吳謙) told reporters.

Taiwan’s proposed defense spending is to rise faster than expected economic growth next year, as Taipei builds more missiles, submarines and other weapons to deter China.

“Peace achieved by strength is true peace,” Lai told officers at the defense ministry yesterday. “We will continue to improve our self-defense capabilities and show the world that we are united as a nation and are determined to protect our country."

Hundreds of Taiwanese 'disappear' in China over past 10 years

30 August 2024, RFA, Haung Chun-mei and Jing Wei

Rights groups call for better safeguards for all victims of 'enforced disappearance.'

Victims of enforced disappearance in China (L to R) rights attorney Gao Zhisheng, retired university professor Sun Wenguang, 2022 bridge banner protester Peng Lifa, and the 11th Panchen Lama.

More than 800 nationals of democratic Taiwan have "disappeared" over the past 10 years in China, which has long used forced disappearances to silence and control its own dissidents and rights activists, rights groups said on Friday.

Figures compiled by the Taiwan Association for Human Rights and several other non-government groups showed that 857 Taiwan nationals have been "forcibly disappeared or arbitrarily arrested" in China, activists told a joint news conference in Taipei. They include publisher Li Yanhe (pen name Fu Cha), detained in Shanghai since April 2023, democracy activist Lee Ming-cheh, who served a five-year jail term in Hunan province for "attempting to subvert state power," and businessman Lee Meng-Chu, jailed for nearly two years for "espionage" after he snapped photos of People's Armed Police personnel at a Shenzhen hotel at the height of the 2019 Hong Kong protests.

Speaking on the United Nations' International Day of the Victims of Enforced Disappearances, Taiwan Association for Human Rights chief Eeling Chiu called on China to fulfill its obligations under international human rights law.

"China should ... immediately release those who have been forcibly disappeared or arbitrarily detained," Chiu told journalists, calling on the Taiwan authorities to ratify United Nations conventions against torture and enforced disappearances as soon as possible.

"[They should also] actively assist the families of those who have been arbitrarily arrested and detained in China and set up assistance mechanisms for them," she said.

Activist Wang Chia-hsuan of a petition group in support of Li Yanhe, or Fu Cha, said Li was born in China but had permanent residency in Taiwan at the time of his disappearance, having lived in Taipei for more than a decade.

He has been incommunicado for 527 days, and has been detained on suspicion of "incitement to secession," Wang said.

He called on Taipei municipal authorities to step up efforts to communicate with the Chinese authorities regarding Li's case.

Lee Ming-cheh told the news conference that his disappearance and subsequent jailing put huge pressure on his family back home.

"Collaborators with the Chinese government in Taiwan warned my wife off talking to Taiwanese NGOs or speaking out publicly about my case, saying they would allow her to travel to China to visit me [if she complied]," he said.

"If she spoke publicly about my case, she wouldn't be allowed to go to China," Lee said, accusing the Chinese government of abusing current crime cooperation agreements with Taiwan to persecute its residents.

Negotiating is key

Ruling Democratic Progressive Party lawmaker Puma Shen said the Taiwanese authorities could do a better job of negotiating in the early stages of such cases.

"Government officials ... should call on China for more appropriate handling of [such] cases," Shen said. "If that doesn't happen, then we should cut off communication [with China]."

"If we continue to communicate past that point, there will be no deterrence at all ... and it will send the message that it's OK if our people keep disappearing," he said.

Meanwhile, Taiwanese lawmaker Hung Shen-han warned that it's not only Taiwanese who are at risk of arbitrary arrest and "disappearance" in China.

"The risk to individuals of being disappeared and prosecuted in China don't just apply to Taiwanese," Hung said, adding that some democratic countries have issued travel advisories to their citizens on the matter.

"The Chinese government uses its laws, along with various undemocratic and unsupervised practices, to threaten the personal safety of people from all countries who go to China," he said.

"Chinese citizens themselves face the same problem." Geng He, the U.S.-based wife of human rights lawyer Gao Zhisheng said it has been seven years since he "disappeared" on Aug. 13, 2017.

"Gao Zhisheng has been missing for seven years and 17 days, with no news or explanation, neither verbal nor written," she told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview.

"They deploy the whole state apparatus in its entirety to target people like Gao Zhisheng who speak the truth and work on behalf of the people," Geng said. The couple's entire family has also been affected, she said.

"My entire family's ID cards have been confiscated for the past 15 years now," Geng said. "This has caused great inconvenience to my family in terms of their ability to work, go about their lives, access medical treatment and travel."

"They're being controlled to death," Geng said. "Basically, they can't leave their homes."

Gao's sister died by suicide in May 2020, while his brother-in-law also took his own life after being forced to beg the authorities to "borrow" his own ID card so he can access his cancer medication.

Veteran rights lawyer Bao Longjun said the authorities have also "disappeared" his wife Wang Yu, also a prominent rights attorney, on several occasions in recent years. She was incommunicado for several hours on Wednesday during the trial of rights lawyer Yu Wensheng and activist Xu Yan in Suzhou.

"I feel like it's about ruling the country through terror," Bao told RFA Mandarin. "There is no legal basis for [enforced disappearances]."

"If you are even slightly disobedient, they will immediately bring state power to bear, forcibly restricting your freedom, and controlling you to achieve what they think is stability," he said.

Uyghurs and Tibetans

Chinese authorities have also forcibly disappeared Uyghurs and Tibetans in the far-western part of mainland China.

An estimated 1.8 million Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims have been detained in Xinjiang under flimsy pretexts during mass incarcerations that began more than seven years ago in an effort by Chinese authorities to prevent religious extremism, separatism and terrorism.

Former Xinjiang University President Tashpolat Teyip, who himself vanished in 2017 amid rumors he had run afoul of China's increasingly hardline policies in Xinjiang, told RFA that he has had no news about his brother, Nury, who also fell victim to an enforced disappearance.

Teyip, who now lives in the U.S. state of Virginia, said he has lost faith in the United Nations and international human rights organizations which did little to help except release a statement.

"I haven't received any information from them regarding my brother — whether he's alive or not, whether he was executed or not," he said.

Rights groups and the Tibetan government-in-exile expressed "serious concern" on Friday over the enforced disappearances of Tibetans in Tibet and called on the Chinese government to release credible information on the whereabouts and well-being of those who have been arbitrarily detained.

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy highlighted a "disturbing trend" of underreporting of the number of Tibetans who are victims of enforced disappearances as China cracks down more heavily with restrictions and heightened surveillance in Tibet. The rights group has documented more than 63 known cases of Tibetans subjected to enforced disappearance in Tibet over the past four years, but said the underreporting likely had to do with fear of reprisals.

In February 2024, Tibetan performer Gyegjom Dorjee, who sang publicly about the exiled Dalai Lama's return to Tibet and blasted Chinese leaders as "false," was arrested in China's Sichuan province. In March, Chinese police arrested Pema, a Tibetan monk from Kirti Monastery, for staging a solo protest while holding a portrait of the Dalai Lama on the streets of Ngaba county in Sichuan province.

And on May 28, the Chinese authorities arrested Rabgang Tenzin who hoisted the Tibetan national flag on the rooftop of his home in Tibet's Chamdo prefecture as part of a consecration ceremony.

On Friday, the U.S. Congressional Executive Commission on China and the Tibetan government in exile urged Beijing to reveal the whereabouts of one of the highest Tibetan Buddhist leaders, the 11th Panchen Lama, or Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, as one of the "most prominent enforced disappearance cases." He was abducted by Chinese authorities in May 1995, just days after the Dalai Lama recognized the then six-year-old as the 11th reincarnation of the Panchen Lama, the second-highest spiritual leader in the largest sect of Tibetan Buddhism.

'An egregious human rights violation'

The whereabouts and well-being of disappeared Tibetans remain unknown, despite repeated attempts by family members to get information about them, causing them, government officials and rights groups said.

"Enforced disappearance is an egregious human rights violation that inflicts the trauma of indeterminate detention or disappearance on its victims, whom all too often are targeted for their dissent or advocacy for human rights and democracy," said U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken in a statement on Friday.

"Families of those forcibly disappeared also suffer immensely, not knowing where their loved ones are, or whether they are alive or dead," he said. "The agony that enforced disappearance inflicts on the victims and their families is unimaginable."

According to the U.N.'s official website, enforced disappearances are "frequently" used by authorities around the world as a way of spreading terror.

Hundreds of thousands of people have vanished during conflicts or periods of repression in at least 85 countries around the world, plunging their families into "mental anguish" and dire economic hardship, it said.

The disappeared are particularly vulnerable to torture, while women are at risk of sexual violence, a U.N. page explaining the concept said.

The practice violates a slew of fundamental human rights, including the right liberty and security, the right not to be subjected to torture or inhumane treatment, and the right to a fair trial, it said.

Taiwan sentences 8 military officers on charges of spying for China

27 August 2024, Phayul. Tsering Dhundup

The Taiwan High Court sentenced eight Taiwanese military officers to prison on charges of spying for China in exchange for financial gain on Thursday. The sentences range from 18 months to 13 years, marking one of Taiwan's largest espionage cases in recent years.

The Taiwan high court stated that the defendants were involved in collecting intelligence for China, leading to the leak of important secrets. The defendants were reportedly motivated by financial incentives. The court also noted that an individual named Chen Yuxin contacted and recruited the defendants at key military sites to form a spy network for China. Chen is believed to have fled to China.

The defendants were accused of planning to fly a CH-47 Chinook military helicopter to a Chinese aircraft carrier in the Taiwan Strait and of creating a video indicating their intention to surrender to Beijing in the event of war, as reported by Taiwan's Central News Agency. According to Timothy Heath, a senior international defence researcher with the RAND Corporation, the consequences could have been severe if Taiwan's authorities had not intervened.

According to Taiwanese authorities, this sentencing is the latest in a series of espionage cases involving Chinese efforts on the island. Russell Hsiao, executive director of the Global Taiwan Institute, highlighted a shift in Chinese espionage tactics, noting that the convicted agents in this case were relatively younger than those in prior cases, which often involved older retirees from the military.

Hsiao also pointed out that while older targets were often motivated by ideology and financial gain, the recent cases appear to be driven primarily by financial motives. He observed that the sentences in this case are more severe than in previous cases, potentially serving as a deterrent.

China claims Taiwan as its territory and has increased military and political pressure in the Taiwan Strait. Espionage between the two sides has been ongoing for decades. Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, stated that this issue concerns the two sides of the Taiwan Strait, which he described as belonging to the same China.

Hsiao mentioned an upward trend in espionage cases involving Taiwanese military personnel over the past decade. Taiwan's Control Yuan, the government's oversight branch, confirmed this trend, noting a significant increase in the number of espionage-related cases uncovered by Taiwan's military security units. From 2011 to 2023, there were 40 espionage cases, involving 113 military and civilian personnel, and numerous top secrets were leaked.

Taiwan condemns China for disrupting regional peace

27 August 2024, Focus Taiwan

Taiwan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MOFA) strongly condemned China on Tuesday after a Chinese aircraft infringed on Japanese airspace earlier in the day.

The action seriously violated Japan's sovereignty and heightened regional tensions, MOFA said in a statement.

Chinese military aircraft and ships have continuously intruded into Taiwan's and Japan's air defense identification zones and exclusive economic zones, MOFA said.

Furthermore, China has partnered with Russia to frequently carry out military exercises in the East China Sea and South China Sea, in attempts to change the status quo through military prowess. Their expanding military actions have posed serious threats to countries in the Indo-Pacific region, said MOFA. MOFA called for China to exercise restraint and refrain from disrupting peace in the Taiwan Strait.

Taiwan will also strengthen its self-defense and work with like-minded countries to stop the expansion of authoritarianism, MOFA said.

Taiwan bans concert by Chinese rapper over insulting 'Taipei, China' promotional materials

26 August 2024, FOX4

Taiwan has cancelled a planned Taipei concert by a Chinese rapper after he used the insulting term "Taipei, China" in promotional materials.

Wang Yitai's scheduled Sept. 14 concert has been scrapped and the performer from the southwestern city of Chengdu banned from the island, the Taiwanese government's Mainland Affairs Council announced late Sunday.

The term is insulting because it describes Taipei, the island's capital, as a Chinese city under Beijing's rule, echoing the government's position on eventually annexing Taiwan by force if necessary and denigrating the island's lively democracy.

Not widely known outside China, Wang is signed to a rap label in Chengdu, a city with a lively arts scene that has become famous for eclectic performers and venues. It's also home to the rap group CD Rev, which won international notoriety for hard-line nationalist tracks including ones that compare Taiwan to the semi-autonomous Chinese city Hong Kong and made obscene and misogynist references to former President Tsai Ing-wen.

China regularly bans Taiwanese artists, many of whom are popular in the mainland, for any sign of support for the ruling Democratic Progressive Party that favors the island's de-facto independence from China.

While Taiwan regularly welcomes Chinese artists and its government considers musical interactions in a positive light, the Mainland Affairs Council said that "cross-strait exchanges should be conducted based on the principles of reciprocity and mutual respect, and any publications or promotions that belittle Taiwan's status will not be tolerated."

While Taiwan's official name is the Republic of China, after the government that fled to the island in 1950 amid civil war, it is widely known simply as Taiwan, and competes at the Olympics as "Chinese Taipei" in deference to Beijing, whose pressure has reduced the island's number of formal diplomatic allies to just 12.

U.S. national security advisor to raise Taiwan on upcoming China trip

25 August 2024, Focus Taiwan

A senior White House official told reporters on Friday that the U.S. will raise concerns about China's "destabilizing" military, diplomatic and economic pressure on Taiwan when National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan meets China's foreign minister in Beijing next week.

Sullivan will travel to Beijing for meetings with the People's Republic of China's (PRC) foreign minister, Wang Yi, between Aug. 27-29, according to the White House.

"I expect in these conversations next week we're going to raise concerns about the PRC's increased military, diplomatic, and economic pressure against Taiwan," the official told reporters in a press briefing phone call early on Friday morning (U.S. Eastern Time).

"These activities are destabilizing and risk escalation," the official said, without elaborating.

"And we're going to continue to urge Beijing to engage in meaningful dialogue with Taipei."

Reiterating the Biden administration's commitment to the United States' "One China" policy – in which the U.S. recognizes the PRC as the sole legal government of China but only acknowledges Beijing's claim that Taiwan is a part of China – the official said the U.S. "oppose[s] unilateral changes to the status quo from either side."

"We expect cross-strait differences to be resolved peacefully," the official added.

"Everything that we have seen come out of Taipei indicates that the current leadership remains committed to maintaining status quo and peace and stability," the official said, referring to President Lai Ching-te's (賴清德) calls for dialogue with Beijing since assuming office in May.

The official also said that "the economic impact of instability in the region would be overwhelming" and there is a "global stake in continued peace and stability and status quo."

Sullivan has met with Wang four times over the last year and a half, according to the White House.

The trip next week comes in advance of the U.S. presidential election in November and amid tensions between Washington and Beijing over China's growing assertiveness in the Asia-Pacific region.

Chinese Planners Push Creation of Post-Takeover 'Shadow Government' for Taiwan

23 August 2024, National Review, Jimmy Quinn

The plan comes from a team at Xiamen University's Cross-Strait Institute of Urban Planning and was published earlier this month, then translated by the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Xiamen, which is located in China's Fujian province, is only a few miles away from the Taiwanese island of Kinmen. The Xiamen University paper states that the Chinese regime would need to move more swiftly in Taiwan than it did after the 1997 handover of Hong Kong by the United Kingdom. "The depth and breadth of the takeover will be far greater than in Hong Kong in 1997, so preparing plans for the comprehensive takeover of Taiwan after 'reunification' is already an urgent matter," the Xiamen academics wrote.

The plan comes from a team at Xiamen University's Cross-Strait Institute of Urban Planning and was published earlier this month, then translated by the Center for Strategic and International Studies. Xiamen, which is located in China's Fujian province, is only a few miles away from the Taiwanese island of Kinmen. The Xiamen University paper states that the Chinese regime would need to move more swiftly in Taiwan than it did after the 1997 handover of Hong Kong by the United Kingdom. "The depth and breadth of the takeover will be far greater than in Hong Kong in 1997, so preparing plans for the comprehensive takeover of Taiwan after 'reunification' is already an urgent matter," the Xiamen academics wrote.

They proposed the creation of a "Central Taiwan Work Committee" that the government would set up "as soon as possible," then send to Taiwan after annexation. It would study "post-takeover policies such as the application of laws, currency conversion, mainland-Taiwan infrastructure integration, customs, international travel, and screening of military personnel, civil servants, and teachers."

The three purposes of that committee would be to bolster the Chinese regime's understanding of Taiwanese institutions and how they could be adopted or changed after takeover, galvanize the efforts of Beijing's political allies in Taiwan's current political system akin to how the Communist International supported the CCP, and "smooth the impact of regime change" by working with Taiwanese elites to help craft Beijing's plans for the takeover.

The paper's mention of Beijing's allies in Taiwan seems to be a nod at the CCP's extensive "united front" influence operations and espionage campaigns in the country, though it also notes that these "anti-Taiwan independence forces" have grown less influential in recent years.

The plan also calls for the immediate creation of a "Taiwan Governance Experimental Zone" in Xiamen or nearby Nan'an City, both of which the paper notes are adjacent to Kinmen and have mountains and a culture similar to that of that Taiwanese island. The experimental zone would simulate Taiwan's political structure, enacting policies such as the elimination of the traditional Chinese characters used in Taiwan but not mainland China and the phasing out of Taiwan's currency.

The Chinese authorities would also train CCP cadres in the experimental zone, primarily consisting of retired Taiwanese soldiers, civil servants, and teachers.

The Xiamen University paper is just the latest indication that Beijing would govern the island with an iron fist, in the event of its absorption by the mainland, and although it was published by academics, it is consistent with previous Chinese-regime statements. Increasingly, Chinese-government officials have spoken about how Beijing would rule over the island after annexation, with China's ambassador to France Lu Shaye in 2022 stating that the party would carry out a widespread "reeducation" campaign

Last year, the party's prominent Chinese People's Political and Consultative Conference body purportedly passed a resolution urging the Chinese authorities to craft a "Taiwan Province Separatist Forces Blacklist," which would include the names of prominent Taiwanese individuals to execute.

The author of that resolution, who posted to social media about the CPPCC's vote to approve it, also called for the execution of Taiwanese president William Lai, who was the country's vice president at the time.

Then, earlier this month two Chinese agencies – the Taiwan Affairs Office of the State Council and the Ministry of Public Security – posted a list of "diehard 'Taiwan independence' secessionists" to their websites, according to the Global Times, an English-language propaganda organ.

The members of that list include Taiwanese vice president Bi-Khim Hsiao, national security council secretary-general Joseph Wu, and several other Taiwanese officials.

China's 'growing authoritarianism' poses a global challenge, Taiwan's President Lai warns

21 August 2024, CNBC, Lee Ying Shan

Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te has cautioned that China's "growing authoritarianism" will not stop with the island, and that it poses a challenge at the "global level."

Lai was speaking at the annual Ketagalan Forum, a dialogue focusing on security issues in the Indo-Pacific. It was attended by representatives from several countries including the U.S., India, Japan, Australia and Canada.

"We are all fully aware that China's growing authoritarianism will not stop with Taiwan, nor is Taiwan the only target of China's economic pressures," Lai said, adding that this authoritarianism is becoming "more aggressive."

"It's now a challenge at the global level," Lai emphasized, calling for countries to cooperate and curtail China's efforts.

His comments come as China has been ramping up military activity in the South China Sea.

"China intends to change the rules-based international order. That is why democratic countries must come together and take concrete action," the Taiwanese president said.

Last weekend, China's Ministry of Transport said it carried out a maritime patrol and law enforcement operation in the Taiwan Straits aimed at "enhancing traffic management and emergency rescue capabilities."

In May, after Lai was sworn in, China's military conducted two days of drills around Taiwan as an act of "punishment" to the island's "separatist acts."

Tensions between China and the Philippines have also been escalating in the Spratly Islands for months. Recently, vessels from the two countries collided near the disputed Sabina Shoal in the South China Sea.

Following the vessel collision, Beijing's actions drew condemnation from Philippine allies, with the U.S. reaffirming its mutual defense pact with the Philippines.

"Such actions are intended to intimidate China's neighbors and undermine regional peace and stability," said Lai.

China had dismissed the outcome of Taiwan's elections in January that brought Lai to power, saying the ruling Democratic Progressive Party did not represent the mainstream public.

Beijing maintains that the democratically governed island of Taiwan is part of its territory.

China's foreign ministry did not immediately respond to CNBC's request for comment.

Taiwan's defense spending is reportedly set to climb 7.7%, outpacing the island's GDP growth.

China confident of 'reunification' with Taiwan: CCP official

20 August 2024, Alarabiya

Beijing is confident about "complete reunification" with self-ruled Taiwan, a senior Chinese Communist Party official said Tuesday at a Hong Kong conference promoting China's reunification.

The annual conference – held in Hong Kong for the first time in 14 years – was attended by more than 1,200 pro-China politicians and public figures from the mainland, Hong Kong, Taiwan and overseas, according to organizers.

"Today, we are closer to... realizing the great rejuvenation of the people of China than at any other time in history, and more confident and more capable than ever to complete reunification," said Shi Taifeng, who heads the United Front Work Department (UFWD).

China claims self-ruled Taiwan – which has its own government, military and currency – as part of its territory.

Beijing has said it would never renounce the use of force to bring Taiwan under its control.

The UFWD is responsible for engaging with minor ethnicities, religious groups and overseas Chinese on issues related to Hong Kong, Macau, Tibet, Xinjiang and Taiwan.

Tuesday's "Promoting Peaceful Reunification of China" was organized by an umbrella council under the department.

Beijing considers Tibet, a Himalayan region, and northwest Xinjiang province – home to a largely Sunni Muslim Uyghur population – as inalienable parts of its territory, while Hong Kong and Macau are classified as "special administrative regions."

In his speech, Shi said the current situation in the Taiwan Strait is "grave and complex," blaming it on the government of Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te and his Democratic Progressive Party's "wanton incitement of cross-strait confrontation."

"But the time and situation are always on the side of those who advocate national reunification," he said.

"We must... uphold the fighting spirits, dare to shoulder our responsibility and... always stay vigilant to the movements of the Taiwan independence forces and external interfering forces."

Among the attendees were leaders of minor pro-unification political parties in Taiwan, such as the New Party and the Labour Party.

China maintains a near-daily military presence around Taiwan with fighter jets, drones, and naval vessels.

Beijing also launched war games around the island days after Lai was sworn into office.

It regards him as a "dangerous separatist" for his views of maintaining Taiwan's sovereignty.

Within Taiwan, the issue of "unification" is deeply unpopular for the Taiwanese population, according to regular surveys done by National Chengchi University. The most recent one, published in June, shows that around one percent of people support "unification as soon as possible," while nearly 90 percent want to maintain the status quo.

Tensions Rise: Taiwan Monitors Increased Chinese Military Activities

19 August 2024, Devdiscourse

Taiwan detected eight Chinese aircraft and nine vessels near its territory on Monday, with four aircraft crossing into its Eastern Air Defense Identification Zone. The Taiwanese Ministry of Defence monitored the situation and took responsive measures, highlighting ongoing Chinese military provocations in the region.

Taiwan's Ministry of Defence reported the detection of eight Chinese aircraft and nine vessels around its territory on Monday. Notably, four of these aircraft crossed the median line, entering Taiwan's Eastern Air Defence Identification Zone (ADIZ). Taiwan responded by monitoring the situation closely.

In an official statement shared on X, Taiwan's MND disclosed that the intrusion was part of a pattern. Earlier, on Sunday, seven Chinese military aircraft and 15 naval vessels were detected between 6 a.m. Saturday and 6 a.m. Sunday, with some crossing the median line and entering Taiwan's northern and southeastern ADIZ.

In response to these incursions, Taiwan deployed aircraft, naval ships, and coastal-based missile systems to monitor the People's Liberation Army (PLA) activities. The recent incidents are seen as a continuation of China's increased military operations around Taiwan, including frequent air and naval incursions and nearby military exercises.

Chinese military aggression has been on the rise since former U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to traffic management and emergency rescue capabilities in the strait to ensure the safety of vessels, facilities and personnel," Xinhua reported.

A new media website under China Central Television also reported that the operation reached 2 nautical miles east of the central part of the Taiwan Strait, while the southernmost point reached the Taiwan Shoal, claiming to cover "a wider area than in previous years."

The Taiwan Shoal, situated southwest of Penghu County and near the median line of the Taiwan Strait, falls within Taiwan's exclusive economic zone, encompassing approximately 8,800 square kilometers with a water depth ranging from 8 to 40 meters, according to the National Academy of Marine Research.

The report also mentioned that the operation was "a further extension of regularization," with the relevant departments in China having established a big data system for more comprehensive management of the strait.

Commenting on the issue, Su Tzu-yun (蘇紫雲), a research fellow at Taiwan's government-funded think tank, the Institute for National Defense and Security Research, said Beijing's move to include the Taiwan Shoal and waters near Penghu as part of the patrol Taiwan in 2022. Taiwan has operated independently since 1949, but China views the island as part of its territory, advocating for reunification by force if necessary.

This month alone, Taiwan has tracked over 300 PLA aircraft and about 200 Chinese ships. Since September 2020, China has employed 'grey zone' tactics, characterized by incremental escalations that avoid large-scale direct confrontations.

Chinese vessels patrol Taiwan Strait to close jurisdictional gap: Experts

19 August 2024, Focus Taiwan, Hsieh Yi-hsuan and Sunny Lai

A patrol and law enforcement operation carried out by official Chinese vessels in the Taiwan Strait could indirectly expand Beijing's jurisdiction to the median line of the strait, as a way of eliminating jurisdictional gaps, experts have told CNA.

The operation, jointly launched by the Chinese Ministry of Transport's Fujian Maritime Safety Administration and its East China Sea rescue bureau, was conducted from Saturday to Sunday, after China's three-and-a-half-month fishing moratorium concluded on Aug. 16, according to China's state-run Xinhua News Agency.

The operation involved three public service ships, lasted 30.5 hours and covered a total distance of 413 nautical miles, with the aim being to "enhance area may indirectly lead to an expansion of jurisdiction to the strait's median line, indicating an attempt to turn the strait into "quasi-internal waters."

According to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, the Taiwan Strait is not considered internal waters (waters on the landward side of the baseline), the Chinese authorities therefore have adopted a "salami slicing" strategy to gradually assert jurisdiction over the Taiwan Strait, Su said.

Criticizing the operation as indirectly eroding the sovereignty of the Republic of China (Taiwan's official name), Su predicts that such actions could occur more frequently in the future and their scope be gradually expanded.

Chieh Chung (揭仲), a researcher at the Taiwan-based Association of Strategic Foresight, said that the operation reflected China's view of the Taiwan government as a "local government" with no authority to issue laws governing traffic in the strait.

"On one hand, the Chinese Communist Party is trying to eliminate the gap in jurisdictional areas, and on the other, it is denying our laws and orders through these actions," Chieh said.

The Chinese authorities have been pushing a legal battle in the Taiwan Strait since June 2022, with the key objective being to claim jurisdiction over most of the strait, Chieh said.

He cited the example of the Kinmen speedboat incident, during which China's Taiwan Affairs Office said "there is simply no such thing as so-called 'prohibited or restricted waters.'"

According to Taiwan's Coast Guard Administration (CGA), prohibited waters and restricted waters are designated by the Ministry of National Defense in accordance with the Act Governing Relations between the People of the Taiwan Area and the Mainland Area, with waters around the Taiwan-held Kinmen and Matsu Islands being delineated using a polygonal method.

Under the act, no Chinese vessels, civil aircraft or other means of transportation are allowed to enter Taiwan's restricted or prohibited waters, including those in the outlying islands.

Regarding the patrol and law enforcement operation carried out by the three Chinese vessels, Taiwan's CGA said Sunday that the three ships briefly crossed the median line by 3.2 nautical miles at 12:25 p.m. on Saturday before heading back towards China.

MAC criticizes China's claim of uncovering over 1,000 Taiwanese spy cases

15 August 2024, Focus Taiwan, Sunny Lai

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council (MAC) said Thursday that China's claim of detecting more than 1,000 cases of espionage by Taiwanese spies was a means of achieving "goals" set by high-level Chinese authorities. If the Chinese authorities' claim is not a boast, then it suggests that they are abusing their power to detain people, MAC deputy head and spokesperson Liang Wen-chieh (梁文傑) said at a press conference.

He was referring to an article published Tuesday on the social media account of China's Ministry of State Security, which said that its authorities had "uncovered more than 1,000 cases of espionage by Taiwanese spies," without providing any details.

A large number of espionage networks established by Taiwanese spies in China have been destroyed, while "Taiwan independence leaders" such as Yang Chih-yuan (楊智淵) have been arrested, dealing a "severe blow and strong deterrence" to Taiwan independence forces, according to the article titled "Resolutely Fight against Taiwan-related Separatism and Espionage." Yang, one of the founders of the Taiwanese National Party, was the first Taiwanese to be prosecuted and arrested for the crime of "secession" in China and has been in custody there since August 2022.

On Thursday, Liang said the approach taken by the Chinese Communist Party over the years has been very simple, with the high-level authorities setting certain targets, and the subordinates working to achieve those "goals."

"Historically, whether it's the Anti-Rightist Campaign, the Cultural Revolution, the Great Leap Forward, or others, it has always been the same [approach]," Liang added.

Regarding Yang's arrest, Liang said the MAC has been in contact with his family and now has "a better understanding of his current situation" but cannot disclose any detailed information, as it has to respect his family's wishes.

Liang said Yang's political stance has often been fluid, aligning sometimes with the ruling Democratic Progressive Party and at other times with the opposition Kuomintang, which means it is difficult to categorize his views.

"Before his arrest, he was teaching Go in China and participating in some Go competitions," Liang said. "It is quite absurd that someone like him can be labeled as a leading advocate of Taiwan independence, just to achieve those [Chinese] 'goals.'"

China says it 'destroyed large network' of Taiwanese spies

14 August 2024, RFA, Taejun Kang

Beijing has uncovered more than 1,000 espionage cases by Taipei, its spy agency says.

China has "destroyed" a large network of Taiwanese spies in the mainland and uncovered more than 1,000 espionage cases undertaken by Taiwan, China's security ministry said as it vowed to fight "separatism."

"The cases involved espionage activities and leaking state secrets," said the Ministry of State Security, China's counterintelligence agency, in a post on its official WeChat account.

The ministry cited the case of Taiwanese citizen Yang Zhiyuan, who was arrested in 2022.

"His arrest dealt a serious blow to pro-independence separatist forces and had a strong deterrent effect," the ministry said in its post on Tuesday, calling Yang a "Taiwan independence" leader.

Yang was detained in August 2022 in Wenzhou, Zhejiang province, on suspicion of engaging in "separatist activities" and endangering China's national security.

He was reportedly handed over to prosecutors in April the following year and is now facing trial in a Chinese court.

"We will resolutely fight against Taiwanese separatism and espionage," the ministry said, adding that it would destroy any attempt to seek Taiwanese independence. Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, which is responsible for cross-strait affairs, said in response to a query from RFA Mandarin that the announcement by the Chinese security department illustrated its use of "vague and unclear laws" to detain people from Taiwan who do not conform with the political ideology of China's ruling Communist Party.

The arrests also hindered a healthy interaction between the two sides, the council said, while reiterating its advice to Taiwan people to carefully consider the necessity of traveling to the mainland.

Arrests of Taiwanese

The Chinese ministry also lashed out at Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party authorities, warning that "those who are willing to work with them will be shattered under the wheels of history."

China regards Taiwan as a renegade province that should be reunited with the mainland, by force if necessary. The democratic island has been self-governing since it effectively separated from mainland China in 1949 after the Chinese civil war.

China has dialed up diplomatic and economic pressure on the island since former president Tsai Ing-wen's administration came to power in 2016. Tsai and her party refuse to acknowledge that Taiwan and the mainland belong to "One China."

President Lai Ching-te, who is also a DPP member who came to power after a January election, is also viewed with suspicion by China's Communist Party.

There have been several other cases in recent years of people from Taiwan who have been imprisoned in mainland China on espionage charges.

Researcher Cheng Yu-chin was jailed for seven years in prison in 2022 on espionage-related charges. He was a former aide to Taiwan's former president Tsai.

Taiwanese activist Lee Ming-che was sentenced to five years in a mainland Chinese prison for subversion of the state before being released in 2022, while Taiwanese businessman Lee Meng-chu was jailed on espionage charges after being arrested in Shenzhen in 2019 for taking photos of armed police officers.

In June, China issued guidelines on criminal punishment for "diehard Taiwanese separatists," who attempt or incite secession, with penalties up to death.

Chinese authorities also recently released a list of 10 "diehard Taiwanese separatists," including Vice President Hsiao Bi-khim and former DPP chairman Su Tseng-chang.

China says it uncovered over 1,000 Taiwanese espionage cases in recent years

13 August 2024, AA, Serder Dincel

Country's State Security Ministry says it destroyed 'large number of spy intelligence networks'

China Tuesday said it has uncovered more than 1,000 cases of Taiwanese espionage in recent years.

The State Security Ministry said these cases were exposed through a series of special operations and pledged to maintain pressure on Taiwan's "pro-independence forces," according to a report by South China Morning Post.

It said that the cases included espionage and the theft of state secrets, adding that it destroyed "a large number of spy intelligence networks" established by Taiwanese operatives in mainland China.

The ministry said it continued to "strike hard" against alleged spying activities.

China considers Taiwan its "breakaway province," while Taipei has maintained its independence since 1949.

China lists Taiwanese independence supporters it wants people to denounce

08 August 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidosn

Beijing website asks for information about supposed 'crimes' of 'secessionist' current and past Taiwan officials.

China's government has called for people to denounce "diehard secessionists" and give information about their "criminal activities" as it intensifies its legal and rhetorical intimidation of Taiwan.

The Taiwan affairs office and ministry of public security this week launched new webpages with lists of 10 current and former officials in Taiwan who have been named as "diehard" separatists.

The site includes a prominently displayed email address and urges people to report "the clues and crimes" of those on the list, as well as "new 'Taiwan independence' diehards who commit serious crimes". China's ruling Communist party (CCP) claims Taiwan is a province of China and has vowed to annex the territory, by force if necessary. Taiwan's democratically elected government and a growing majority of its people reject the prospect of Chinese rule, and both sides have been preparing for a potential war in coming decades.

The 10 names – which had been previously announced in 2021 and 2022 – including Taiwan's vice-president, Hsiao Bi-khim, the former foreign minister and now head of Taiwan's security council, Joseph Wu, Wu's deputy, Lin Fei-fan, and senior officials from the ruling Democratic Progressive party. The new site and tipline are part of a broader escalation by Beijing against Taiwan and those who maintain that it is not and will not become a part of the People's Republic of China. Official state media said the pages, which also included legal documents and government statements, "present the legal foundation for such actions".

China's hawkish state media tabloid, the Global Times, said the publication of the 10 names served as "both as a deterrent and as a clear message that the criminal justice measures are aimed at a small number of diehard individuals who engage in or incite secession activities, and do not target the majority of Taiwan compatriots".

In June the CCP said "ringleaders" of independence efforts would face the death penalty under Chinese laws. It issued new guidelines for Chinese courts, prosecutors and public and state security bodies to "severely punish Taiwan independence diehards for splitting the country and inciting secession crimes in accordance with the law, and resolutely defend national sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity", according to state media.

"The sharp sword of legal action will always hang high," Sun Ping, an official from China's ministry of public security, told reporters in Beijing.

Taiwan's leaders rejected Beijing's claim that its laws had any jurisdiction over Taiwan, which has its own government, legal system, currency and military.

"The government appeals to our country's people to feel at ease and not to be threatened or intimidated by the Chinese Communist party," Taiwan's mainland affairs council said at the time.

Beijing should set up 'shadow government' ready to run Taiwan, academics say

08 August 2024, SCMPv, Amber Wang

In an article on social media, mainland Chinese research institute says a plan is needed for 'comprehensive takeover' of the island after unification.

A mainland Chinese research institute has suggested Beijing set up a "shadow government" so that it is ready to govern Taiwan after unification.

The proposal from the Cross-Strait Institute of Urban Planning at Xiamen University was made in an article recently posted to social media network WeChat that was later taken down.

"It is imperative to prepare a plan for the comprehensive takeover of Taiwan after unification," the research institute said in the article, which sets out a proposed power transition for the island.

It also said the complex international environment – including the potential re-election of Donald Trump as US president in November – could accelerate Beijing's unification timeline, without elaborating.

The article offers a rare glimpse of the discussions going on in mainland China over the future of self-ruled Taiwan, which Beijing sees as part of its territory and to be brought under its control – by force if necessary.

Most countries do not recognise Taiwan as an independent state but oppose any attempt to seize the island.

The Xiamen research institute – part of the university's architecture and civil engineering school – confirmed that it wrote the article and said it would be reposted later, but declined an interview request. Two mainland Chinese academics who focus on Taiwan were sceptical about the proposal which they said was not practical.

The institute suggested in the article that a "Central Taiwan Work Committee" be set up to function as a "shadow government" that could be ready to assume control of the island's administration at any moment. It said the committee should look at issues such as applicable laws, currency conversion and infrastructure integration between the two sides.

Its role would also include uniting anti-independence forces on the island and encouraging Taiwanese to take part in discussions on the takeover plan.

"As the mainland's military strength grows, the difficulty of unification itself is decreasing, and effective control after unification will become increasingly important," the article said.

Relations between Beijing and Taipei remain strained after William Lai Ching-te, from the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party, took over as Taiwan's leader in May.

Beijing has for decades proposed a "one country, two systems" model to govern Taiwan but has never released a detailed plan about how it would be done. Chinese President Xi Jinping called for a "two systems" solution on Taiwan in 2019, saying Beijing would consider the island's reality, as well as views and proposals from both sides.

Beijing elaborated on that in a white paper in 2022, saying Taiwan would have a "high degree of autonomy" as a special administrative region after unification, and that its social system and way of life would be respected. It did not say whether there would be changes to Taiwan's political system.

Taipei has rejected the proposal.

In the article, the Xiamen institute also suggested that Taiwan governance pilot zones be set up on the mainland and that new systems planned for Taiwan should draw on lessons learned from Hong Kong.

"The recent unrest in Hong Kong shows that the one country, two systems approach of fully accepting the existing system is not necessarily suitable for Taiwan," the article said. "Taiwan should aim to fully integrate into the mainland from the beginning."

It said the pilot zone could be established in coastal cities such as Xiamen and Quanzhou in Fujian, which are across the strait from Taiwan and share similar language and culture.

The institute said the zones could be used to simulate the post-unification governance model – including for elections, language and education – to put policies to the test and train the cadres who will run the island. "Hong Kong's role as a model [for one country, two systems] has become a lot less persuasive on the island," the article said, noting that a new model was needed.

While Beijing insists that the one country, two systems framework has been successful in Hong Kong, Taiwan's three main political parties have all rejected the plan, citing its failure in the city.

Taiwan condemns China's guidelines on punishing 'stubborn independence supporters'

07 August 2024, Taiwan News, Kelvin Chen

Beijing releases additional legal document on 'Taiwan independence elements'

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council (MAC) blasted China's release of an additional guideline on "Punishing Stubborn Taiwan Independence Elements" on Wednesday (Aug. 7).

China is preventing the positive development of healthy cross-strait exchanges, MAC said, per Liberty Times. Beijing should pursue policies that "are conducive to positive interactions between both sides," it added.

In its new guideline, China listed 10 previously blacklisted Taiwanese, including Su Tseng-chang (蘇貞昌) and Joseph Wu (吳釗燮). Beijing previously issued a document in June listing the legal procedures for dealing with Taiwan Independence supporters. One of the provisions called for the death penalty for those found guilty of "splitting the country." Other punishments include life or fixed-term imprisonment of more than 10 years.

MAC Minister Chiu Chui-cheng (邱垂正) said on Tuesday that China has been waging legal wars against Taiwan since it passed the Anti-Secession Law in 2005. Beijing has no jurisdiction over Taiwanese, Chiu added.

Taiwan celebrates badminton victory against China, without political symbols

05 August 2024, Reuters, Richa Naidu and Ann Wang

Taiwan supporters celebrated their country's first gold medal at the Paris Games on Sunday during a badminton doubles final that took place without their national flag, as security staff enforced International Olympic Committee rules.

Lee Yang and Wang-Chi-Lin retained their title by beating China's Liang Weikeng and Wang Chang in front of euphoric Taiwanese supporters, but some of them saw their banners confiscated and had to rub out their face paint.

"I want to cheer for them," said Mina Syue, a 28-year-old engineer from Taiwan who said her banner had been confiscated after the guards checked the message with translation software.

Syue's banner was in the colours of Taiwan's flag – a red background with 'Taiwan you're the best!' written in blue and white.

IOC rules prohibit flags or signs that include political messages or support countries that are not participating at the Olympics.

Taiwan competes at the Olympics as Chinese Taipei to avoid objections from China, which claims the democratically governed island as its own territory. Taiwan's government rejects Chinese sovereignty claims.

A Taiwanese family of four told Reuters they had painted the Taiwanese flag on their faces but were made to wash it off before they could enter the arena. During the match spectators cheered 'Taiwan' each time their team scored a point. At least one supporter managed to sneak in the Taiwanese flag and wave it from the stands.

UNITING TAIWAN

After the match, Taiwan supporters celebrated the gold medal victory chanting "Taiwan Taiwan" and "Taiwan number 1".

Taiwanese freelance artist Peng Cheng-yang had bought a last-minute ticket and travelled from Germany to see the match when he found out Taiwan would be playing China.

"It's a political action to be here, to show we are a country, to support our people. We don't need the flag

- it's the people that is important," he said, adding he was "moved".

Taiwan President Lai Ching-te said on Facebook that "the Lin-Yang team faced strong opponents and fought all the way to the end, uniting and inspiring Taiwan!" When asked about the Taiwanese president's Facebook post, Lee and Wang paused for several seconds looking uncomfortable.

"Very tough question. We thank all the support we have received and will continue to work hard. We will put out better performances in the future," Wang said. Spectator Christina Chang, a Taiwanese education worker living in New York, said that she was very proud of the Taiwan players but that she clapped for the silver medallists too.

"It is not a political symbol. I'm excited as it's our first gold medal but the Chinese deserved the silver too - that's the beautiful thing about the Olympics," she said.

Isa Zhang, a 35-year-old China supporter living in Paris, said that although the team she was rooting for came second she was happy with the result because "China, Chinese Taipei - it's all the same for me."

At Taipei's main train station, supporters held a party to watch the final at 10 p.m. local time where they were able to stridently show their support with Taiwanese flags and political colours.

"It is an honour to have our flag represented in an important event ... I hope one day we can bravely hold our flag in an international event without (it) being snatched away," said Danny Tsai, 36, a local resident in the crowd.

Taiwan joins international parliamentary alliance countering China

05 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundop

The Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China (IPAC) has officially welcomed Taiwan as a member during its fourth annual summit held in Taipei on July 30.

The announcement was made by IPAC Executive Director Luke de Pulford during a press conference. He revealed that ruling Democratic Progressive Party Legislator Fan Yun and opposition Taiwan People's Party Legislator Chen Gau-Tzu would serve as co-chairs of the Taiwan legislature within the alliance. According to the IPAC official website, each legislature in IPAC is led by two co-chairs from diverse political backgrounds.

In a statement, IPAC expressed strong support for Taiwan's meaningful participation in international organizations, "Its [Taiwan's] formal inclusion in the Alliance was welcomed as a historic result by all delegates."

This year's summit was attended by 49 politicians from 24 countries, reflecting the growing international concern about China's policies. Established in 2020, IPAC focuses on reforming countries' policies towards the People's Republic of China. It also unites lawmakers worldwide, promoting democracy and addressing threats to the rules-based and human rights systems posed by the rise of China.

With Taiwan's inclusion, IPAC now comprises over 250 cross-party members from 40 countries, including Australia, Canada, Japan, and the United Kingdom. Previous summits were held in Rome (2021), Washington DC (2022), and Prague (2023). Taiwan was a central focus of this year's summit, with speeches by Taiwan President Lai Ching-te and Vice-President Hsiao Bi-khim, emphasizing the need for a "democratic umbrella" to defend Taiwan and preserve the international rules-based order.

China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesperson, Lin Jian, criticized the move, stating, "This so-called alliance has maliciously hyped up issues related to China. Spreading lies and rumours about China, and has no credibility whatsoever. There is only one China in the world, and Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory. The Taiwan question is purely China's internal affair that brooks no interference by any external forces."

Reports emerged before the conference that eight lawmakers from at least five countries had received pressure from Chinese diplomats to avoid attending the summit. These attempts to dissuade foreign parliamentarians were condemned by the organizers as "massively overstepping" and acts of bullying. In a statement, the organisers condemned China's action stating "The PRC's actions around IPAC's Summit are yet another example of their brazen efforts to curtail other nations' democratic privileges and negate Taiwan's rights to engage in legitimate diplomatic exchanges". The statement further stated "In response to the PRCs intimidation, IPAC has decided to bring forward its announcement of our largest ever enlargement, welcoming six new countries to the Alliance: Colombia, Iraq, Malawi, Solomon Islands, The Gambia and Uruguay".

Taiwan says Macau's 'One China' demand blocks envoy's visa

02 August 2024, The Straits Times

Taiwan said it's having difficulty sending staff to its representative office in Macau because the special administrative region's government is demanding that they sign a commitment to the "One China Principle" to get a visa.

A Taiwan official who was set to be posted to the Macau, which China resumed sovereignty over in 1999, couldn't get a visa, Mr Liang Wen-chieh, deputy head of Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, said at a briefing on Aug 1.

He urged Macau to remove the obstacle and deal with the issue in a friendly manner, but added that Taiwan will “prepare for the worst,” without elaborating.

At issue is Macau’s demand that Taiwan officials commit to the “One China Principle” which states that there is only one China, ruled by the Beijing-based Communist government, and that Taiwan is an inalienable part of the country. That position is anathema to Taiwan, a democratic and self-ruled island, which argues it has the right of self-determination and that it has never been under the sovereignty of the People’s Republic of China.

The dispute echoes a similar spat that led to Taiwan recalling seven representative officials from Hong Kong in 2021, leaving only local Hong Kong employees to handle affairs in the city. It also underscores China’s efforts to undermine international recognition of Taiwan, where President Lai Ching-te this week called for democracies around the world to stand up to Beijing.

At present, there are just two Taiwanese staff remaining in the Macau office, meaning Taiwan has to remotely assist with consular services, Mr Liang said. Macau and Hong Kong have both closed their representative offices in Taipei in 2021. That move came amid souring cross-strait relations and claims that Taiwan was interfering in Hong Kong affairs. Relations between China and Taiwan have worsened over the past decade, with Beijing stepping up pressure on the island after Mr Lai was elected in January to succeed Ms Tsai Ing-wen, also of the Democratic Progressive Party. After a deadly boat incident in February, China’s coast guard started to “normalise” patrols near Taiwan’s offshore islands near China.

China also held large-scale military drills around Taiwan a few days after Mr Lai took office in May, and then fleshed out a law targeting supporters of Taiwan independence in June. In response to this, Taiwan raised its travel alert for China in late June, urging its citizens to avoid non-essential trips.

But there has been some progress. Beijing and Taipei on July 30 agreed to resolve the boat incident. And separately, Taiwan’s United Daily News reported on Aug 2 that a Taiwanese angler held by China in another incident will return to Taiwan on Aug 7.

Taiwan detects 29 Chinese aircraft, 10 naval vessels near its territory

01 August 2024, Indian Narrative

Taiwan’s Ministry of National Defence said that 29 Chinese military aircraft and 10 naval vessels were detected operating around the nation from 6 am (local time) on Tuesday to 6 am (local time) on Wednesday. Of the 29 People’s Liberation Army

(PLA) aircraft, 13 crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait and entered Taiwan’s northern, central, southwest, and eastern Air Defence Identification Zone (ADIZ). Taiwan sent aircraft and naval ships and deployed coastal-based missile systems to monitor China’s military activity.

In a post on X, Taiwan’s Defence Ministry said, “29 PLA aircraft and 10 PLAN vessels operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today. 13 of the aircraft crossed the median line and entered Taiwan’s southwestern and southeastern ADIZ. We have monitored the situation and responded accordingly.” Earlier on Wednesday, Taiwan’s Ministry of National Defence said that 25 Chinese military aircraft and 10 naval vessels were detected operating around Taiwan from 6 am (local time) on Tuesday to 6 am (local time) on Wednesday.

This latest incident adds to a series of similar provocations by China in recent months. China has increased its military activities around Taiwan, including regular air and naval incursions into Taiwan’s ADIZ and military exercises near the island. The Taiwan Strait, separating Taiwan from mainland China, has been a frequent area of contention, with Beijing viewing Taiwan as a breakaway province and asserting sovereignty over the island.

The latest incident comes amid heightened regional security concerns and underscores Taiwan’s ongoing vigilance in defending its airspace and territorial integrity against Chinese military activities.

Amid rising tensions across the Taiwan Strait, China has increased its military presence and conducted frequent drills in the region. The manoeuvres are seen as part of Beijing’s ongoing pressure campaign against Taiwan, which China views as a renegade province.

China pressures lawmakers from 6 countries not to attend conference in Taiwan

28 July 2024, ABC News

Lawmakers from at least six countries say Chinese diplomats are pressuring them not to attend a China-focused conference in Taiwan

Lawmakers from at least six countries said Chinese diplomats were pressuring them not to attend a China-focused conference in Taiwan, in what they described as efforts to isolate the self-governed island.

Politicians in Bolivia, Colombia, Slovakia, North Macedonia, Bosnia and one Asian country that declined to be named said they were getting texts, calls and urgent requests for meetings that would conflict with their plans to travel to Taipei. China vehemently defends its claim to Taiwan and views it as its own territory to be annexed by force if necessary.

The conference begins Monday and is being held by the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China, or IPAC, a group of hundreds of lawmakers from 35 countries concerned about how democracies approach Beijing. IPAC has long faced pressure from the Chinese government: Some members have been sanctioned by Beijing, and in 2021 the group was targeted by Chinese state-sponsored hackers, according to a U.S. indictment unsealed earlier this year.

But Luke de Pulford, the alliance's director, said the pressure from Chinese officials the past few days has been unprecedented. During past IPAC meetings in other locations, lawmakers were approached by Chinese diplomats only after they concluded. This year, the first in which IPAC's annual meeting is taking place in Taiwan, there appeared to be a coordinated attempt to stop participants from attending.

The Associated Press spoke to three lawmakers and reviewed texts and emails sent by Chinese diplomats asking whether they were planning to participate in the meeting.

"I'm Wu, from Chinese Embassy," read a message sent to Antonio Miloshoski, a member of parliament in North Macedonia. "We heard that you got an invitation from IPAC, will you attend the Conference which will be held next week in Taiwan?"

In some cases, lawmakers described vague inquiries about their plans to travel to Taiwan. In other cases, the contact was more menacing: One lawmaker told AP that Chinese diplomats messaged the head of her party with a demand to stop her from going.

"They contacted president of my political party, they ask him to stop me to travel to Taiwan," said Sanela Klarić, a member of parliament in Bosnia. "They're trying, in my country, to stop me from traveling ... This is really not OK."

China routinely threatens retaliation against politicians and countries that show support for Taiwan, which has only informal relations with most countries due to Chinese diplomatic pressure. Klarić said the pressure was unpleasant but only steeled her determination to go on the trip.

"I really am fighting against countries or societies where the tool to manipulate and control peoples is fear," said Klarić, adding that it reminded her of threats and intimidation she faced while suffering through wars in Bosnia in the 1990s. "I really hate the feeling when somebody is frightening you."

The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not respond to a request for comment.

De Pulford called the pressure "gross foreign interference."

"How would PRC officials would feel if we tried to tell them about their travel plans, where they could and could not go?" de Pulford said, using the acronym for China's official name, the People's Republic of China. "It's absolutely outrageous that they think that they can interfere in the travel plans of foreign legislators."

Lawmakers from 25 countries were expected to attend this year's meeting, including Japan, India and the U.K., and IPAC said in a statement that some would meet with high-level Taiwanese officials. The Taiwanese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Last week, Beijing criticized Taiwan for its annual Han Kuang military drills, saying that Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party was "carrying out provocations to seek independence."

"Any attempt to whip up tensions and use force to seek independence or reject reunification is doomed to failure," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning told reporters.

China has been peeling off the island's diplomatic allies, often with promises of development aid, in a long-running competition between the two that has swung in Beijing's favor in recent years. The Pacific Island nation of Nauru switched recognition to Beijing earlier this year, a move that reduced Taiwan's dwindling number of diplomatic allies to 12. But China's at-times heavy-handed approach has also alienated other countries.

In 2021, Beijing downgraded relations and blocked imports from Lithuania, a member of both the EU and NATO, after the Baltic nation broke with diplomatic custom by agreeing that a Taiwanese representative office in its capital of Vilnius would bear the name Taiwan instead of Chinese Taipei, which other countries use to avoid offending Beijing. The following year, the EU adopted a resolution criticizing Beijing's behavior toward Taiwan and took action against China at the World Trade Organization over the import restrictions.

The pressure over the IPAC meeting was also triggering backlash.

Bolivian Senator Centa Rek said she submitted a letter of protest after a Chinese diplomat called her and told not to go to Taiwan, saying the island was run by an "imposter president" and that the meeting was hosted by an organization "not accepted within the terms of the policy of mainland China." When Rek refused, the diplomat said he would report her decision to his embassy, which Rek interpreted as a "veiled threat."

"I told him that it was an unacceptable intrusion, that I would not accept an order or intrusion from any government," Rek said. "These were personal decisions and that it seemed to me that he had gone beyond all international political norms.”

Most of the lawmakers targeted appear to be from smaller countries, which de Pulford, the alliance’s director, said was likely because Beijing “feels that they can get away with it.” But he added that the coercive tactics have only made participants more determined to take part in the summit.

Miriam Lexmann, a Slovakian member of the European Parliament whose party head was approached by Chinese diplomats, said the pressure underscored her reason for coming to Taiwan.

We want to “exchange information, ways how to deal with those challenges and threats which China represents to the democratic part of the world, and of course, to support Taiwan,” she said.

Taiwan jails citizen doing business in China for spying on Tibetans, independence activists

25 July 2024, Tibetan Review

In what is seen as an unusual case, a court in Taiwan has tried and jailed a citizen running business in China for spying on Taiwanese and Tibetan independence activists in his home country. Fang Hsiang, in his seventies, has served as the head of a business association in Hainan for Taiwanese businessmen in China and has been jailed with his associates, reported newbloommag.net Jul 24.

The report said Fang and his associates were accused of spying on associates of former president Chen Shui-bian, Tibetans in Taiwan, and Taiwanese government officials whose work pertains to Tibetans.

Fang was stated to have been recruited as a spy after becoming acquainted with a man surnamed Hou, the apparent director of the National Security Department of Hainan province, which is part of China’s Ministry of State Security. The ministry is the principal civilian intelligence, security and secret police agency of the People’s Republic of China, responsible for foreign intelligence, counterintelligence, and the political security of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

Upon returning to Taiwan, Fang recruited several individuals. This included a man surnamed Chen working in the Mongolian and Tibetan Cultural Centre in Taipei, which is part of the Ministry of Culture. At one point, Chen recorded a conversation with the director of the centre to try and gain information on Tibetan groups in Taiwan and what coordination exists between the government and such groups as pertaining to refugee policy, the report said.

Associates of Fang were stated to have been flown to China to meet with Hou at various points.

Fang was sentenced to five and a half years in jail, while Chen was sentenced to three years in jail. However, Fang’s wife, a Chinese national, was not sentenced due to lack of evidence, the report said.

Fang and his associates’ case is seen as unusual because the most common Chinese espionage cases that one hears about in Taiwan involve former Taiwanese military officers who meet with Chinese counterparts. This may involve passing along details of Taiwan’s defence, or classified information. KMT lawmakers such as Legislative Yuan defence committee co-chair Ma Wen-chun have also been accused of leaking the details of confidential defence programmes to China, such as regarding Taiwan’s domestic submarine programme, the report noted.

It is actually not hard for the Chinese government to gain intelligence on Taiwan which is, after all, a free and open democratic society. Still, it is unclear to what extent civil society groups are surveilled or monitored, except that this does occur, the report noted.

China’s New Non-Military Offensives against Taiwan

24 July 2024, Global Taiwan Institute

Since the election of Lai Ching-te (賴清德) as the president of the self-governing democracy of Taiwan, officially known as the Republic of China (ROC, 中華民國), Beijing has been turning the screws on the island-nation—and not just in the military domain. National security officials from Taiwan are now sounding the alarm about a noticeable shift in the Chinese multi-domain pressure campaign against the island democracy. Indeed, multiple indicators are pointing to a more aggressive turn in Chinese Communist Party (CCP, 中國共產黨) General Secretary Xi Jinping’s (習近平) approach to Taiwan in the months ahead.

While a change in Beijing’s strategy was already visible in the latter half of Tsai Ing-wen’s (蔡英文) second term—particularly in the military space—recent activities in the non-military space—in the areas of diplomatic/political, legal, information/united front, and economic measures—are perhaps most troubling. Additionally, they are broadly indicative of a comprehensive shift in Beijing’s overall approach from deterring Taiwan’s independence to compelling its unification with the People’s Republic of China (PRC, 中華人民共和國)—by military force if necessary.

Diplomatic and Political Pressure

On the diplomatic front, Beijing is currently going after Taiwan’s 12 remaining diplomatic partners. Since 2016, Taiwan’s international diplomatic presence has steadily diminished, from 22 diplomatic partners to only 12. Just days after Lai's unprecedented presidential victory—which represented the first time that a political party won three consecutive terms for president in Taiwan—Beijing flipped the small Pacific nation of Nauru.

Taiwan's last dozen diplomatic partners are vulnerable to PRC enticement and coercion to varying degrees. Although the current president of Paraguay—Taiwan's last remaining diplomatic partner in South America—has expressed strong personal support for continuing ties with Taiwan, Paraguay stands as a potentially acute reminder that many of these last remaining steadfast diplomatic partners are seemingly always one election away from switching recognition.

While Beijing's diplomatic successes against Taiwan are clear, Taipei has made important advancements in raising its international visibility and political engagement with other like-minded partners on the world stage with the support of like-minded friends. Therefore, it is unsurprising that Beijing is now putting more emphasis on not only enticing but pressuring Taiwan's non-diplomatic partners to downgrade political ties and support cross-Straits "reunification." Indeed, Beijing appears to no longer seek a political endorsement from other countries for its "One-China Principle" (一個中國原則), but is now pressuring other countries to take action that actively supports the PRC's position on "reunification."

In the past, some countries that maintain diplomatic relations with the PRC have been asked to have Taipei move its representative office from the capital to other locations, or to put pressure on Taipei's local representative offices to remove any reference to the Republic of China or Taiwan from the name of their de facto embassies. China has also continued to pressure countries with which it has diplomatic ties to deport Taiwan nationals accused of criminal activities to the PRC rather than back to Taiwan.

Countries that have recently established unofficial ties or have increased their political ties with Taiwan also find themselves increasingly in the cross-hairs of Beijing's diplomatic offensive—the cases of Lithuania and the Czech Republic are prime examples of this. Other pressure tactics could include applying sanctions against people and other entities for engaging with Taiwan, limiting the consular activities of Taiwan's foreign missions, and restricting government contacts with Taiwanese counterparts and supporters of Taiwan.

The fact that British lawmaker Conservative MP Tim Loughton from the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China was denied entry to Somalia in April 2024 is potentially instructive of Beijing's future tactics in this space. In such instances, not only are Taiwanese lawmakers and persons sanctioned or wanted by Beijing singled out, but also other lawmakers from third countries who have run afoul of Beijing's policies on Taiwan. Such persons could be potentially denied entry or surveilled in third countries, which are either allied or significantly influenced by Beijing.

Propaganda and United Front Work

In addition to diplomatic pressure, the CCP is also ramping up its political warfare activities, particularly in the areas of overt united front work and propaganda directed against Taiwan's central government and ruling party. This is particularly noteworthy in the CCP's attempts to co-opt Taiwan's key opposition parties. In addition to existing ties with the Kuomintang (KMT, 中國國民黨), the CCP showed interest in the Taiwan People's Party (TPP, 台灣民眾黨) throughout the presidential campaign—and particularly after the elections, in which the TPP walked away with a decisive minority of seats in the Legislative Yuan.

Since beginning his post as KMT vice chairman in October 2021, Andrew Hsia (夏立言) has led the official party channel for dialogue to China at least eight times. Notably, there has been a plethora of other cross-Straits exchanges headed by various factions of the KMT that began in 2024. The delegation that raised the most eyebrows is perhaps the one led by Fu kun-chi (傅崐冀)—an influential power broker among local factions of the KMT and the current caucus whip for the KMT. In April—just a month before the inauguration—Fu brought a delegation of local faction members to China. Local factions are instrumental in influence peddling during local elections. Although there have been insinuations of collusion because of the correlation in the timing between these visits and the controversial reform measures adopted by the opposition parties immediately after the inauguration, it should be noted that the authorities have not yet provided clear and convincing evidence of a conspiracy.

Chinese disinformation and propaganda also remain rampant in Taiwan's information space. Taiwanese national security officials are particularly concerned by AI-enabled efforts spreading disinformation on social media platforms, including Chinese-owned platforms like Douyin (抖音, TikTok) and Xiaohongshu (小紅書) that have large user bases in Taiwan. Additionally, so-called "local collaborators"—with the support of traditional media—are increasingly parroting the CCP's talking points, thereby increasingly blurring the line between what may be legitimate political opposition and Chinese government propaganda.

Russian propaganda disinformation tactics and narratives used against Ukraine are also increasingly more visible in the Chinese approaches to Taiwan. This is indicative of the increasing cross-pollination of Chinese and Russian disinformation and malign influence tactics. One recent example was a disinformation case concerning the fabricated news carried by a major news outlet about US pressure on Taiwan to establish a biowarfare lab in Taiwan, which appeared intended to stoke American skepticism among the general public. As Chinese support for Russia's invasion of Ukraine continues and the Chinese-Russian "unlimited partnership" grows, there will likely be more sharing of tactics, techniques, and procedures in Chinese malign influence activities in Taiwan.

A New Feature: Lawfare

The most notable feature in the PRC's new multi-domain offensive against Taiwan is the use of a suite of lawfare measures, which include the application of law enforcement instruments intended to extend the claimed jurisdiction of Chinese authorities and constrain that of the Taiwanese authorities.

Extra-Territorial Applications of Domestic Law

Specifically, there are clear signs that Beijing is broadening the application of the Anti-Secession Law (ASL, 反分裂国家法). Since its passage in 2005, the ASL was primarily used as a rhetorical instrument for the legal justification of China's use of military force against Taiwan. On June 21, based on the ASL and other legal measures, the PRC promulgated the "Opinions on Punishing the Crimes of Splitting the Country and Inciting Splitting the Country by 'Taiwan Independence' Diehards," (關於依法懲罰「台獨」頑固分子分裂國家、煽動分裂國家犯罪的意見), which could apply criminal punishment, even the death penalty to "secessionists" in absentia. In particular, the guidelines specify actions that constitute the "crimes of secession" and "incitement to secession," including:

1. "Initiating or establishing organizations, plans, or programs aimed at promoting Taiwanese independence.
2. Attempting to alter Taiwan's status through legislative means or referendums.
3. Seeking international recognition of Taiwan as an independent entity.
4. Using one's job or influence, such as in government, education, or media, to misrepresent or falsify the history of Taiwan's status as part of China.
5. Consistently taking part in or playing a major role in activities that support Taiwanese independence."

This could be seen as Beijing's response to what it views as internationalization and increased external interference in the Taiwan issue in recent years. As written, the excessively broad law notably does not limit the application of these laws by geographical scope of citizenship, which could presumably include both ROC citizens and non-ROC citizens. These guidelines signal a new phase in the PRC's new multi-domain offensive against Taiwan and its supporters and represent an especially nefarious form of lawfare. As it stands, it could be a particularly gross application of transnational repression by plausibly justifying, under its domestic law, the forcible repatriation of persons to the PRC—and further signal the "Hong Kongization" of Taiwan in terms of the application of domestic law and regulations.

Legalization of its "One-China Principle" through UNGA Resolution 2758

In addition to the application of domestic legal measures to extend PRC jurisdiction over Taiwan and its administered territories, China has also been more aggressively forcing its distorted interpretation of UN General Assembly Resolution 2758 in an attempt to legalize its "One-China Principle." In its statement declaring the switch in its recognition of the PRC, the government of Nauru cited UNGA Resolution 2758 as a legal basis for supporting its decision. Moreover, civil society groups applying to join international organizations have been barred from admission due to the misleading application of UNGA Resolution 2758.

Hostage Diplomacy

As the PRC seeks to increasingly extend its laws and jurisdiction over Taiwan and its people, in a report delivered to the Legislative Yuan, Tsai Ming-yen (蔡明彥), the director of the National Security Bureau (NSB, 國家安全局)—Taiwan's premier intelligence agency—revealed how "in the past 12 months, 15 Taiwanese have been detained or undergone trials after entering China and the two special administrative regions, while 51 have been interrogated by border officers—and the number is increasing." The NSB director also noted with concern that the number of cases concerning national security investigations involving PRC covert influence has been increasing in recent years—raising the specter of potentially more extraordinary measures.

Maritime Law Enforcement and Civil Aviation for Contesting and Limiting Territorial Jurisdiction

Beijing is using the unilateral application of its domestic law and regulations as a form of lawfare to constrain the legal space of the Taiwan government—and deter other countries from engaging with it. These measures seem intended to limit the Taiwan government's agency, and represent Beijing's efforts to deny the existence of the ROC and the objective reality that the ROC and PRC are two separate jurisdictions.

The Chinese authorities are not issuing new laws per se and Beijing's legal claims over Taiwan have not changed. Still, the PRC is beginning to enforce these claims—with implications for other competing claimants with territorial disputes with China. Similar to how the PRC has begun to suddenly and arbitrarily enforce certain regulations on Taiwanese companies operating in China for coercive political purposes, it is now increasingly utilizing the China Coast Guard (中国海警局)—a paramilitary force used for maritime law enforcement that is directed by the Central Military Commission (CMC, 中央軍事委員會), and increasingly deployed with the People's Liberation Army Navy (PLAN, 中國人民解放軍海軍)—in patrols around Taiwan—in order to enforce its maritime and territorial claims over Taiwan. Some of these activities by purportedly non-military vessels include increasingly encroaching upon the 12 nautical miles of territorial waters claimed by Taiwan, conducting maritime surveillance around Taiwan, detention of ROC citizens for alleged illegal fishing, forced inspection of civilian vessels, and PRC civilian intrusion into the harbors. Indeed, the PRC appears to be shifting from a previous stance of tacit acknowledgment that the PRC and ROC are two separate jurisdictions toward denying it.

Economic Coercion

In the economic sphere, Beijing leans heavily on coercive economic tools through a combination of targeted suspension of preferential tariff terms, selective bans of imported goods, expanded import restrictions on a range of products beyond just agricultural and aquatic goods, arbitrary regulatory enforcements targeting select companies for their political activities, and the sanctioning of individuals and organizations. Although such measures do not yet represent a significant departure from the PRC's longstanding strategy, Beijing will likely dial up these tactics to apply even greater pressure on Taiwan's new leadership in the years to come.

Conclusion

The intensification of these non-military measures is broadly indicative of a comprehensive shift in Beijing's overall approach from one of deterring Taiwan's independence to compelling its unification with the PRC. Beijing does not appear to have abandoned its desire for "peaceful reunification," and it would prefer to annex Taiwan without the use of military force.

However, in a review of the Chinese measures taken from 2016 to now, Beijing's current stance represents a departure from its prior stance of tacitly acknowledging the separate jurisdictions of the PRC and ROC, to now seemingly deny this objective fact. Although these gray zone actions are non-kinetic by operational standards, if the PRC's actions to systematically erode the ROC's legal space with such activities go unchallenged and take on other more challenging forms—compounded by its aggressive military activities—the situation could escalate and become dangerous. It bears noting that such PRC lawfare tactics are likely intended to provoke a response (or inability to respond) from the United States and Taiwan. If not properly managed, these tactics could drive a wedge between Taiwan's new leadership and the United States. Going forward, clear communication between Washington and Taipei is essential and any response on either side must be carefully calibrated.

With the US election slated for November, Beijing is unlikely to dramatically scale up its actions in the coming months lest it raise the Taiwan issue into a national election issue. What is visible now is likely only a preview of the actions to follow. Vigilance is paramount.

The main point: While a change in Beijing's strategy was already visible in the military space during the latter half of Tsai Ing-wen's second term, recent activities in the non-military space (diplomatic/political, legal, information/united front, and economic) are troubling and broadly indicative of a comprehensive shift in Beijing's overall approach from deterring Taiwan's independence to compelling its unification with the PRC.

China's Wang complains about Japan lawmakers' visits to Taiwan

23 July 2024, Kyodo News

China's top diplomat Wang Yi complained Tuesday about Japanese lawmakers' visits to Taiwan, noting that more of them travel there than to the mainland, which claims the self-ruled democratic island, a senior Japanese ruling party member said.

Hiroshi Moriyama, a veteran House of Representatives lawmaker and chief of the Liberal Democratic Party's decision-making general council, told reporters that Wang expressed the concern to him during a meeting in Beijing.

The top diplomat also warned that the Taiwan Strait is "not a political showground," urging Tokyo to be cautious in its words and deeds and ensure that the Taiwan issue will not damage or shake the foundation of Sino-Japanese relations, according to the Chinese Foreign Ministry.

Moriyama, who made a five-day trip to China through Tuesday, said factors such as the COVID-19 pandemic have prevented many Japanese Diet members from visiting the mainland, but he believes "as many ruling and opposition lawmakers as possible should come to China" for in-person exchanges of views.

Wang said Japanese politicians, including young parliamentarians, are welcome to visit China frequently, the ministry said.

Only a handful of Japanese lawmakers have visited China since Beijing lifted COVID travel curbs in early 2023.

By contrast, a number of parliamentary delegations have traveled to Taiwan, including 31 Diet members who attended the May 20 inauguration ceremony of President Lai Ching-te. It was one of the largest delegations from Tokyo to have attended such an event there.

Wang also called for Moriyama's cooperation in resolving a bilateral dispute over Japan's release of the treated radioactive water from the crippled Fukushima nuclear power plant, which began in August last year, prompting China to impose a total import ban on Japanese seafood, the senior LDP member said.

Wang pointed out that the top priority is to establish a long-term international monitoring mechanism to ensure the full and effective participation of China and other stakeholders, the ministry said.

On Monday, Moriyama agreed with Liu Jianchao, head of the Chinese Communist Party's International Department, to work toward restarting regular talks between the two countries' ruling parties at an early date, possibly later this year.

The last such talks were held in Japan in October 2018.

China and Taiwan have been governed separately since they split in 1949 due to a civil war. Beijing opposes official interaction between Taiwan and countries with diplomatic relations with the mainland.

Von der Leyen is 'playing with fire' over Taiwan, China warns after her re-election

19 July 2024, Euro.News, Jorge Liboreiro

Beijing has taken issue with the political guidelines of Ursula von der Leyen, which call for the status quo in the Taiwan Strait to be respected.

The re-election of Ursula von der Leyen as European Commission president has already triggered the first international spat: China has denounced the political guidelines of her second mandate for containing "gross interference" in the country's internal affairs.

"Playing with fire on Taiwan is highly dangerous," Wang Lutong, the director general for European affairs at the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said on Friday, one day after the Commission chief clinched a majority in Strasbourg.

"Meddling and even trying to join forces is by no means a right choice for Europe."

Lutong's recriminations refer to a small passage in von der Leyen's re-election manifesto that commits her executive to work closely with Japan, Korea, New Zealand and Australia to address "common challenges in cyber, space and in the secure supply of critical minerals and technologies."

"This includes our collective efforts to deploy the full range of our combined statecraft to deter China from unilaterally changing the status quo by military means, particularly over Taiwan," she writes in her 30-page long document.

The reference adds nothing new and simply repeats von der Leyen's well-known stance: Beijing should refrain from any activity that can forcefully alter the decades-long stalemate in the Taiwan Strait, including a military invasion that many fear is inevitable.

But for China, any statement favourable to Taiwan is a red line that no country, whether ally or adversary, must cross.

The People's Republic of China (PRC) considers Taiwan, whose formal name is the Republic of China (RoC), as a breakaway province that needs to be reconciled with the mainland. Taipei rejects this view and argues the island, after years of building up its democratic institutions, is a de facto independent nation.

Taiwan's new president, William Lai, has offered to resume bilateral contacts but insists the RoC and the PRC will never be subordinate to each other. His outspoken views have increased tensions with Beijing, which considers Lai an "instigator of war."

The EU does not recognise Taiwan and has no embassy in Taipei. However, the two sides conduct relations at a lower level on a variety of topics, such as renewable energy, security, research, data protection, human rights and, most importantly for Brussels, semiconductors, a crucial industry where the island enjoys an unbeatable edge.

These ties have intensified in recent years, partly in response to the sharp deterioration in EU-China relations, and are expected to expand during von der Leyen's next mandate.

In a statement, Taiwan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs congratulated the president on her re-election and "expressed appreciation for her high level of support and concern for peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait."

"In the future," the statement says, "Taiwan will also further collaborate with the European Union to safeguard the rules-based international order and jointly open a new chapter in their friendly and mutually beneficial cooperation."

Taiwan's Blunt-Talking Leader Faces China's Backlash

16 July 2024, The New York Times, Chris Buckley and Amy Chang Chien

The long-smoldering tensions between China and Taiwan have been entering a more precarious phase. In recent months, Beijing has threatened to severely punish Taiwanese citizens who challenge China's claim to the island. More Chinese jets have buzzed the skies near it. Chinese Coast Guard ships have sailed near Taiwan's outer islands.

And both sides have dug deeper into their opposing political positions.

When Lai Ching-te became Taiwan's president in May, he vowed to stick with the China policies of his predecessor, Tsai Ing-wen. Ms. Tsai sought to avoid confrontation even as she defended Taiwan's right to self-rule and rejected Beijing's assertion of sovereignty.

Yet Mr. Lai, while keeping Taiwan's basic policy toward China unchanged, has been blunter in rebuffing its demands. Ms. Tsai, a former trade law specialist, chose her words about China with care. Mr. Lai, who rose as a more plain-spoken politician, sees a need to more sharply lay out Taiwan's separate status.

"In his judgment, there's nothing to be gained from being ambiguous — the conclusion is that Beijing is going to press them, no matter what," said David Sacks, a fellow for Asia studies at the Council on Foreign Relations who analyzes relations between Taiwan and China.

"For decades, cross-strait relations really lay on ambiguities and not saying what you really think, but I think that a lot of that is being eliminated," Mr. Sacks said. "There's less room for maneuverability."

This shift does not mean that war or regional crisis looms. China's leader, Xi Jinping, is focused on fixing its economy and has indicated that he wants to keep tensions with the United States, Taiwan's security partner, in check. Chinese leaders also still hope to absorb Taiwan peacefully, and they have maintained contacts with the island's opposition Nationalist Party, which favors closer ties with Beijing.

But China's pressure tactics are likely to present Mr. Lai with hard choices about how and when to push back or exercise restraint.

"In this new chapter, it's like the tensions become the norm," Chen Kuan-ting, a lawmaker from Mr. Lai's Democratic Progressive Party, said in an interview.

"Trying to contain us and squeeze us tighter, trying to get us like this," Mr. Chen said, bracing his arms into a tightening hold. "It's not a hug."

Taiwan's leader speaks his mind.

Mr. Lai is the second president in a row from the Democratic Progressive Party, which has turned to Western partners to hold China at bay.

A former mayor and lawmaker, Mr. Lai rose in the defiant traditions of his party. Even before Mr. Lai's election, Beijing reviled him for describing himself in 2017 as a "pragmatic worker for Taiwan's independence," words meant to signal that he would defend Taiwan's autonomy without pursuing formal independence.

Still, officials in Beijing seemed taken aback by how starkly he drew a line between Taiwan and China in his high-profile May inauguration speech, several analysts said.

In the speech, Mr. Lai asserted that dialogue with Beijing is only possible if the two sides negotiate as separate equals, not — as Beijing wants — based on the idea that each side accepts that it is part of one Chinese nation.

Past Taiwanese presidents have also said that China and Taiwan should treat each other as distinct equals. But Beijing took more umbrage this time, partly because he said so in his inauguration speech, a manifesto for his four-year term, said Bonnie S. Glaser, an analyst of Taiwan and China at the German Marshall Fund of the United States.

"He just wanted to convey clearly that the two sides of the strait — they're two separate states," Ms. Glaser said. "He wants to, basically, begin his four years setting that as the base line, and telling the Chinese that they have to accept it."

In an interview with Time magazine, Mr. Lai set out his position: "According to international law, we are already a sovereign and independent country."

He wants Taiwan's military to be better prepared.

Mr. Lai's supporters say his clearer position is part of an effort to bring more urgency to building up Taiwan's resilience against threats from China.

His new defense minister, Wellington Koo, has signaled that he wants to shake up the armed forces. He started by putting an end to ceremonial formalities like goose-step marching in parades.

Mr. Lai has vowed to continue Taiwan's military buildup, and some experts argue that the island should lengthen conscription — already extended recently to 12 months — to amass enough well-trained troops to deter Beijing.

While China's leader, Mr. Xi, has dismissed speculation that he has a plan to invade Taiwan in the coming years, many Taiwanese officials are convinced that their island will be vulnerable unless it quickly steps up preparedness. The upcoming presidential election in the United States adds another element of unpredictability to the tensions.

"The situation is heading in the direction of greater conflict," I-Chung Lai, the president of the Prospect Foundation, a think tank affiliated with the Taiwanese government, said at a seminar in Taipei this month. "Fundamentally, we can't see any final balancing point."

China is putting the squeeze on Taiwan.

More than 300 Chinese military aircraft flew near Taiwan in June, the second-highest monthly count since Taiwan's Ministry of National Defense began regularly issuing such data in 2020, according to PLATracker, a site that analyzes the data.

China has sent groups of coast guard ships into waters off Kinmen, a Taiwan-controlled island near the Chinese coast, more than 30 times in recent months, eroding a longstanding understanding against such incursions. The forays began after two Chinese fishermen died in the area in February, when their boat capsized as they tried to flee the Taiwanese Coast Guard.

Chinese military officials have said that they will not be letting up.

"If Taiwan independence tries to take one step forward, we'll take one step forward with our retaliatory measures, until full unification of the motherland is achieved," Senior Col. Wu Qian, a spokesman for China's Ministry of National Defense, said in a brief interview last month in Singapore.

For all that military swagger, Chinese leaders seem concerned that their warnings are not having the desired effect on opinion in Taiwan, said Lyle J. Morris, a senior fellow in the Center for China Analysis under the Asia Society. "I see increasing worry that Beijing's levers of influence over Taiwan are narrowing," he said, citing comments from Chinese officials.

That anxiety, Mr. Morris added, seemed to partly motivate China's release of legal guidelines last month that raised the threat of imprisonment — even execution, in extreme cases — for people deemed to be "Taiwan independence die-hards."

Taiwan Steps Up Alertness After Detecting Test-Firing by China's Missile Unit

Taiwan's Defense Ministry said Saturday it was monitoring "waves of test-firing" by China's missile unit in a region more than 1,600 kilometers (1,000 miles) from the self-ruled island and that its air force stepped up its alertness.

China views the democratic island as a breakaway province that should be reunified with the mainland.

It is not immediately clear whether the tests were related to China's harassment of Taiwan. In recent years, China has ramped up its military activities around the island, which is ruled by the Democratic Progressive Party.

In May, Taiwan's newly elected President Lai Ching-te said in his inauguration speech that he wants peace with China and urged it to stop its military threats and intimidation of the island.

It is not immediately clear whether the tests were related to China's harassment of Taiwan. In recent years, China has ramped up its military activities around the island, which is ruled by the Democratic Progressive Party.

In May, Taiwan's newly elected President Lai Ching-te said in his inauguration speech that he wants peace with China and urged it to stop its military threats and intimidation of the island.

China's military has displayed a strong show of force toward Taiwan since Wednesday, when the U.S. new top envoy to Taipei promised that Washington would help the island defend itself.

Taiwan's Defense Ministry said Thursday it had detected 66 warplanes around the island and that dozens flew across the median line in the Taiwan Strait, the de facto boundary between the two sides. On Saturday, 30 warplanes were also detected around Taiwan over a 24-hour period, with 20 crossing the median line.

The U.S., like most countries, does not recognize Taiwan. But it is the island's main partner and is bound by U.S. laws to provide it with the means to defend itself. Less than a month ago, the U.S. State Department approved the sale to Taiwan of missiles and drones for an estimated $360 million.

Meanwhile, Chinese state broadcaster CCTV reported that Russian warships arrived at a port in Zhanjiang city, in Guangdong province, on Friday for joint naval drills. The military exercise will include anti-missile exercises, sea strikes and air defense, CCTV said. It is expected to last until around mid-July.

The exercise aims to demonstrate the armies' capabilities in jointly tackling maritime security threats and preserving peace and stability regionally and globally, China's defense ministry said Friday. It would further deepen the strategic partnership of both sides "for the new era", it said.

Earlier this week, NATO allies called China a "decisive enabler" of Russia's war against Ukraine in their most serious rebuke of Beijing. They also expressed concerns over Beijing's nuclear arsenal and its capabilities in space.

The sternly worded final communiqué, approved by the 32 NATO members at their summit in Washington, makes clear that China is becoming a focus of the military alliance. The European and North American members and their partners in the Indo-Pacific increasingly see shared security concerns coming from Russia and its Asian supporters, especially China.

In response, China accused NATO of seeking security at the expense of others and told the alliance not to bring the same "chaos" to Asia. Its foreign ministry maintained that China has a fair and objective stance on the Ukraine issue.

Taiwan says record number of Chinese warplanes detected amid NATO summit

11 July 2024, Aljazeera

Taiwan's Defence Ministry says 56 Chinese aircraft crossed sensitive median line as Beijing carries out military drills.

Taiwan has said it is watching China's military movements after detecting the most Chinese warplanes near the island in a 24-hour window so far this year, as Beijing conducts drills that are coinciding with the NATO summit in Washington, DC. Taiwan's Ministry of Defence said in a statement on Thursday that "66 PLA aircraft and seven PLAN vessels operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6am [22:00 GMT Wednesday] today".

Of those, 56 aircraft crossed the sensitive median line that bisects the narrow 180-kilometre (112-mile) waterway separating the self-governing island from mainland China, according to the ministry.

Taiwan's Defence Ministry also released two pictures of a Chinese J-16 fighter and a nuclear-capable H-6 bomber, which it said were taken recently.

"The military has a detailed grasp of the activities in the seas and waters around the Taiwan Strait, including of the Chinese communists' aircraft and ships," ministry spokesperson Sun Li-fang said.

On Wednesday, Taiwanese officials announced that China's Shandong aircraft carrier had passed close to the Philippines on its way to military exercises in the Pacific.

The Philippines military said it had received reports of a China-Russia exercise taking place in the Philippine Sea without directly referencing the Shandong.

Taiwan, which Beijing considers part of its territory, has complained of a sharp uptick in Chinese military activity in recent years as Beijing seeks to put pressure on the island's Democratic Progressive Party government, which has advocated strengthening Taiwanese identity and forging closer relations with the international community.

Beijing has labelled Taiwanese President William Lai Ching-te a "dangerous separatist" and said the island should be "reunified" with the Chinese mainland by force if necessary.

In a communique released on Wednesday, NATO leaders said China has acted as a "decisive enabler" of Russia's war against Ukraine and poses systemic challenges to Europe and its security.

A spokesperson for the Chinese mission to the European Union accused NATO of "hyping up the so-called China threat" and said the declaration is full of "obvious lies and smears".

Taiwan soldier charged with leaking military secrets to China

09 July 2024, The Straits Times

A Taiwanese sergeant has been indicted for allegedly photographing and leaking confidential defence information to China, prosecutors said on July 9.

Beijing claims self-ruled Taiwan as its territory and has ramped up military and political pressures on the island in recent years.

The sergeant, surnamed Chen, worked at a navy training centre and was recruited by an unspecified number of people who "collected intelligence for mainland China" via messaging apps in 2022, said the Taiwan High Prosecutors' Office.

"Between April 2022 and February 2023, he photographed secret national defence information in (the counties of) Pingtung, Yilan and other places with his mobile phone," the office said in a statement. "(He) sent the information four times via Line and Telegram... for a total illegal gain of NT$170,000 (S$7,060)."

The office said Chen was charged with violating the Criminal Code of the Armed Forces and the Anti-corruption Act.

When asked to comment on the indictment, Defence Ministry spokesman Sun Li-fang said the military had worked with national security units on the case.

"In recent years, the CCP's (Chinese Communist Party's) infiltration has indeed posed a very serious threat to the military. The threat is no less than...

threats posed by missiles or aircraft and ships," he told reporters.

China maintains a near-daily presence of warships, drones and fighter jets around Taiwan, and earlier in 2024 had launched war games following the May 20 inauguration of Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te. Beijing regards him as a "dangerous separatist" due to his defence of Taiwan's sovereignty.

In pre-recorded footage for a military television programme that aired on July 9, Mr Lai warned soldiers at an air force base in central Taichung city to be vigilant.

"China's infiltration and spying will not stop," he said, dressed in military fatigues.

"You must always be vigilant, pay attention to your own information security, and do not fall into traps."

The sergeant's indictment was the latest in a recent string of spying cases.

In April, a father and son duo were jailed for eight years for collecting confidential military information and trying to develop a spying "organisation" for Beijing. AFP

Taiwan probes senior official who deals with China over bribery suspicions

06 July 2024, Reuters

Taiwan prosecutors said on Saturday they were investigating a senior official and member of the ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) who deals with China on suspicion of bribery. He said he had done nothing wrong.

Cheng Wen-tsan is head of the Straits Exchange Foundation under the China-policy making Mainland Affairs Council that deals with day-to-day issues like accidents involving Taiwanese in China. The foundation is technically private because the governments in Beijing and Taipei do not recognise each other or have any official relations.

Prosecutors in the northern Taiwanese city of Taoyuan, where Cheng was mayor from 2014-2022, said he had been summoned for questioning on Friday on bribery suspicions and that they had applied to a court to detain him.

It did not give details of the allegations against him.

Cheng, in a statement issued via his lawyer and released by the foundation, denied wrongdoing.

"I have not committed any illegal acts, and I will cooperate with the judicial investigation. I hope to clarify the truth and prove my innocence as soon as possible," he said.

Taiwan's presidential office said it respects the judiciary and hopes investigators will clarify the matter as soon as possible.

Taiwan reports more Chinese military activity, calls for de-escalation

05 July 2024, Reuters

Taiwan on Friday reported renewed Chinese military activity nearby with another "combat patrol" as the government called on Beijing not to escalate tensions after the seizure of a Taiwanese fishing boat.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, has stepped up its pressure over the past four years, both militarily and politically.

On Tuesday, Chinese officials boarded and detained a Taiwanese fishing boat for illegally operating in the country's waters, in what a senior Taiwan official said may be act of psychological warfare.

Taiwan's defence ministry said that starting just before 7 a.m. (2300 GMT) on Friday, it had detected 26 Chinese military aircraft, including J-16 fighters, carrying out a "joint combat readiness patrol" with Chinese warships.

The Chinese aircraft flew into airspace to the north, centre and southern part of Taiwan, the ministry said. Taiwan has detected at least 127 Chinese military aircraft operating near the island since the start of this month.

China's defence ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Speaking to reporters earlier on Friday, Taiwan Premier Cho Jung-tai said fishermen should raise their alert level and not do anything that could be considered illegal.

"At the same time, I also want to ask the Chinese side not to escalate with any the use of any excessive measures, because this can easily cause tension and unnecessary confrontation which is extremely unnecessary," he added.

Firms weigh removing Taiwan staff from China after death penalty threat

04 July 2024, Reuters, Laurie Chen

Some foreign companies are considering moving Taiwanese employees out of China after Beijing said it could impose the death penalty on "diehard" Taiwan independence separatists, said four people familiar with the matter.

The new guidelines have caused some Taiwanese expatriates and foreign multinationals operating in China to scramble to assess their legal risks and exposure, said the people, who include a lawyer and two executives with direct knowledge of the discussions.

"Several companies have come to us to assess the risks to their personnel," said the lawyer, James Zimmerman, a Beijing-based partner at the Perkins

Coie law firm. He declined to identify the companies or industries for confidentiality reasons.

"The companies are still concerned that there may be some grey areas such as whether a benign social media post or voting for a particular political party or candidate in Taiwan elections could be interpreted as engaging in pro-independence activities," Zimmerman said.

Reuters has previously consulted Perkins Coie on unrelated matters in China.

Some 177,000 Taiwanese were working in China as of 2022, according to the most recent Taiwan government survey. Taiwanese staff are employed by many multinationals in China, given their linguistic abilities and cultural familiarity with the country.

Many more work for the myriad Taiwanese firms that operate in China and have, by the Taiwan government's estimate, invested more than $200 billion since 1991, helping fuel China's growth to become the world's second-biggest economy.

Some foreign corporations operating in China have held meetings with employees on safety, said the two executives, who asked not to be named due to the sensitivity of the matter.

Another source, who was briefed on the matter, said some Taiwanese staff in China have received and accepted the option to leave the country.

'EXTREME MINORITY' SUBJECT TO DEATH PENALTY

China views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory. Taiwan President Lai Ching-te rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims, saying only Taiwan's people can decide their future. He has denounced China's new guidelines.

The June 21 guidelines criminalise promoting Taiwan's entry to international organisations where statehood is a condition, having external official exchanges and suppressing parties, groups and people that promote "reunification".

Also illegal are "other acts that seek to separate Taiwan from China" – phrasing that allows Beijing to interpret the rules broadly, according to legal experts.

Among "the ringleaders or those who have committed serious crimes", the guidelines say, "if the harm to the country and the people is particularly serious and the circumstances are particularly bad, they may be sentenced to death."

The regulations do not further specify who might be subject to the death penalty.

Asked for comment on how companies and Taiwanese employees are reacting to the guidelines, China's foreign ministry told Reuters in a statement: "Using criminal law measures to punish criminal separatist elements and uphold the country's core interests is a common practice for all countries.

"It needs to be emphasised that the relevant legislative document targets the extreme minority of diehard 'Taiwan independence' elements and their separatist activities, and does not implicate the vast majority of Taiwan compatriots," the ministry said.

China's Taiwan Affairs Office did not respond to a request for comment. Last week it said the vast majority of Taiwanese have nothing to worry about and can come "in high spirits".

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, which oversees relations with Beijing, told Reuters in a statement: "The government reminds Taiwanese businesspeople and Taiwanese employees in mainland China that they must pay more attention to their personal safety now. The risk is indeed increasing."

Last week the council urged Taiwanese people to avoid all non-essential travel to China, Hong Kong and Macau as a result of the new regulations.

The council said last month that eight retired Taiwanese military and police officers had been detained in China over the previous year. Last year it warned that Taiwanese academics were being detained and interrogated upon entry to China, even if they were on formal exchange programmes.

'REVIEWING THE RISK DAILY'

One of the executives who spoke to Reuters – a senior official who works with Taiwan investors in China – said his phone lit up after China announced the new guidelines as people discussed what they could mean for their work.

He said the guidelines add to the uncertainty of doing business in China, coming on the heels of such measures as China's anti-espionage law and its national security law for Hong Kong.

The second executive, who works for a large multinational whose Taiwanese executives frequently go on business trips to China, said they had been having regular meetings with senior managers to assess the danger and whether to withdraw those working in the country.

"It's not yet gotten to the stage of deciding not to send them there, but we are reviewing the risk daily," the executive said.

Wen-Ti Sung, a fellow at the Atlantic Council's Global China Hub, said the guidelines would force foreign companies to "either move their operations out entirely to keep Taiwanese talent or they stop hiring Taiwanese talent."

That would mean that "even fewer Taiwanese will be working or living in China, thereby making Beijing's attempts to win over their hearts and minds even harder," Sung said.

Beijing condemns Taiwan's Lai as a "separatist" and staged war games shortly after his May inauguration. Taiwan has complained of ramped up Chinese pressure since Lai won the election in January, including ongoing military actions, trade sanctions and coast guard patrols around Taiwan-controlled islands next to China.

Lai has repeatedly offered talks with China but been rebuffed.

China presses Global South leaders to support Taiwan 'reunification'

24 June 2024, Nikkei Asia, Ken Moriyasu

When Chinese Premier Li Qiang visited Malaysia last week, Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim said that his country firmly supports China in "achieving national reunification."

Support for China's "reunification" with Taiwan was not a phrase that Anwar used when he met Chinese President Xi Jinping in Beijing in March 2023, at least according to the Chinese readout. But Anwar joins a list of Global South and other leaders who have recently mentioned "reunification" in their meetings with Li or President Xi Jinping – a trend that has not gone unnoticed by Western analysts.

"Beijing is no longer satisfied with deterring Taiwan independence. Xi Jinping is now seeking to promote reunification," said Bonnie Glaser, the managing director of the Indo-Pacific program at the German Marshall Fund of the United States.

China has long made its diplomatic relationships contingent upon its partners' acknowledgment that there is only "one China." But its recent engagements with some other countries suggest it increasingly demands more than that.

During a state visit to China in April, Surinamese President Chandrikapersad Santokhi said that Suriname will continue to "unswervingly support China in achieving national reunification." Some, like King Hamad bin Isa Al Khalifa of Bahrain, have said they support "peaceful reunification."

But others, like Equatorial Guinea President Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo and Egyptian President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi, who both had state visits in May, said they support "complete reunification" without adding conditions on how that should take place.

For Malaysia's part, when it established diplomatic relations with China in May 1974, it said it recognizes the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China, and "acknowledged" Beijing's position that Taiwan is an inalienable part of Chinese territory.

That Malaysia did not "recognize," "support" or "endorse" that position on Taiwan was in line with the "One China" policies of other nations around the world. The U.S. holds that there is but one entity called "China," but leaves ambiguity over sovereignty. U.S. presidents have repeatedly reassured Chinese leaders that Washington does not support Taiwan independence.

But Anwar's explicit support for "reunification" appears to be one step closer to Beijing's position. Communist China has never controlled Taiwan, but considers the island part of its territory and has refused to rule out taking it by force.

Some leaders, such as Pakistani Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif, Bahrain's King Hamad, Egypt's Sisi and Equatorial Guinea's Teodoro Obiang have also expressed support for a One China "principle," a subtle but important choice of word that implies endorsement of Beijing's stance that Taiwan is a province of China.

Analysts in Washington say they started to take note of the shifting rhetoric around last fall, ahead of Xi's meeting with U.S. President Joe Biden in Woodside, California, in November.

Rush Doshi, who until recently served as the National Security Council deputy senior director for China and Taiwan, said, "This is [China's] response to the United States enlisting its allies and partners to speak publicly about the importance of peace and stability in the [Taiwan] Strait."

Most Western leaders are not playing Xi's game. U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken simply told Xi in April that the U.S. adheres to the One China policy.

But in January, Irish Prime Minister Leo Varadkar told visiting Premier Li in Dublin that Ireland always abides by the One China "principle" and that he "hopes that China will achieve peaceful reunification at an early date," according to the Chinese readout. Varadkar later corrected the record, stating the One China "policy" of Ireland, a European Union member, had not changed.

Some analysts say that last month's inauguration of Taiwan's new pro-sovereignty President Lai Ching-te may fuel Xi's drive to press more leaders to publicly support "reunification."

Russell Hsiao, executive director of the Global Taiwan Institute in Washington, said Anwar's statement is "one of many troubling signs of the more aggressive turn in Xi's approach to Taiwan we could expect to see more in the years to come, as Beijing turns the screws on the Lai administration."

This shift in Beijing's strategy began in the latter half of former President Tsai Ing-wen's second term, Hsiao said. "Beijing is no longer simply seeking political endorsement from other countries of its 'One China principle,' but for them to take action that actively supports its position on 'reunification.'"

While it would be more challenging for China to force major powers to concede to this position, "it would be harder for smaller countries to resist

Beijing's pressure," Hsiao said. "What this change means in practical terms requires careful and close observation."

But Doshi was confident that support from Global South countries would only go so far.

"China may get countries to support unification, but does that mean those countries support war? No, none of them want that. The global economic cost would be too great," he said.

China threatens death penalty for Taiwan independence 'diehards'

22 June 2024, The Guardian

Beijing ramps up pressure over 'crime of secession' while Taipei says China has no jurisdiction over Taiwan and urges its people not to be intimidated. China has threatened to impose the death penalty in extreme cases for "diehard" Taiwan independence separatists, a ratcheting up of pressure even though Chinese courts have no jurisdiction on the democratically governed island.

China, which views Taiwan as its own territory, has made no secret of its dislike of President Lai Ching-te, who took office last month, saying he is a "separatist", and staged war games shortly after his inauguration.

Taiwan has complained of a pattern of ramped up Chinese pressure since Lai won the election in January, including ongoing military actions, trade sanctions and coast guard patrols around Taiwan-controlled islands next to China.

The new guidelines say China's courts, prosecutors, public and state security bodies should "severely punish Taiwan independence diehards for splitting the country and inciting secession crimes in accordance with the law, and resolutely defend national sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity", according to China's state-run Xinhua news agency.

The notice Beijing released on Friday specified the death penalty for "ringleaders" of independence efforts who "cause particularly serious harm to the state and the people", Xinhua said.

Other leading advocates could face jail terms ranging from 10 years to life.

The new guidelines – to take effect from Friday – were being issued in accordance with laws already on the books, including the 2005 anti-secession law, Xinhua said. That law gives China the legal basis for military action against Taiwan if it secedes or seems about to.

Sun Ping, an official from China's ministry of public security, told reporters in Beijing the maximum penalty for the "crime of secession" was the death penalty.

"The sharp sword of legal action will always hang high," she said.

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council denounced Beijing's move, urging its people not to be threatened by China.

"The Beijing authorities have absolutely no jurisdiction over Taiwan, and the Chinese communists' so-called laws and norms have no binding force on our people," it said in a statement on Friday. "The government appeals to our country's people to feel at ease and not to be threatened or intimidated by the Chinese Communist party."

The guidelines detail what is considered a crime worthy of punishment, including promoting Taiwan's entry to international organisations where statehood is a condition, having "external official exchanges" and "suppressing" parties, groups and people that promote "reunification".

The guidelines add a further clause to what could be considered a crime – "other acts that seek to separate Taiwan from China" – meaning the rules can be broadly interpreted.

Lai has repeatedly offered to hold talks with China but has been rebuffed. He says only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

China has taken legal measures against Taiwanese officials before, including imposing sanctions on Hsiao Bi-khim, Taiwan's former de facto ambassador to the US and now the island's vice-president.

Such punishments have little practical effect as Chinese courts do not have jurisdiction in Taiwan, whose government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims. Senior Taiwanese officials, including its president, also do not visit China.

China's reunification is 'unstoppable', says Beijing's top man on Taiwan affairs

15 June 2024, SCMP, Xiamen and Hayley Wong

Beijing has "firm determination, sufficient confidence and strong capability" to destroy any efforts by Taiwanese separatists, mainland China's top political adviser and No. 4 official told a forum aimed at boosting exchanges with the island's mainland-friendly camps.

"No matter how the situation in the Taiwan Strait changes, the fact that both sides belong to one China cannot be denied," Wang Huning said in his opening speech at the annual Straits Forum on Saturday, held in the southeastern port city of Xiamen in Fujian province.

"The historic trend of China's renaissance and reunification is unstoppable."

Wang is Beijing's top man on Taiwan affairs and a member of the Politburo Standing Committee, the Communist Party's top decision-making body. He is also chairman of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, the country's top advisory body.

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. Most countries, including the United States, Taiwan's top weapons supplier, do not recognise the island as an independent state. However, Washington is opposed to any attempt to take Taiwan by force and is committed to arming it.

Fujian is located just to the west of the Taiwan Strait and is the closest part of the mainland to Taiwan, both geographically and culturally.

Despite Taipei's warnings that the forum is a "united front tool", Taiwan's main opposition party, the Kuomintang (KMT), sent a delegation led by vice-chairman Sean Lien Sheng-wen. Beijing has described the forum as the biggest platform for cross-strait "people-to-people exchanges".

Beijing's Taiwan Affairs Office said it expected over 7,000 attendees from Taiwan to join some 50 events during the week-long forum on grass-roots governance, youth exchanges, and cultural and economic exchanges.

Chang Li-shan, chief of Taiwan's Yunlin county, also attended the forum and was invited to speak at the opening ceremony, drawing criticism from Taipei's Mainland Affairs Council. Chiu Chui-cheng, the council's minister, expressed "displeasure" over local officials joining the events.

The opening event on Saturday was hosted by Song Tao, director of mainland China's Taiwan Affairs Office. Fujian party chief Zhou Zuyi was among the other high-ranking officials there.

In his speech, Wang said the foundation, "driving force" and development of cross-strait relations all depended on the people.

He urged people on both sides to "resolutely oppose Taiwan independence and foreign interference" and "jointly push cross-strait relations back on the right track".

The KMT's Lien said at least 60 per cent of Taiwan's population "disagreed with the elected government's speeches and actions on Taiwan independence", as reflected in the island's presidential and legislative elections this year.

He called on the two sides to "reduce hostile words and practices" so that "people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait will not have any doubts or uneasiness about the interactions between the two sides".

"We must also not be kidnapped by a few extreme people with ulterior motives, let alone be misled by some extreme remarks," he added.

Lien touted the KMT's approach to promoting "peaceful win-win cooperation" in his speech and during his meeting with Wang before the opening ceremony.

In January, William Lai Ching-te from the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party was elected as Taiwan's new leader with 40 per cent of the votes.

In his inauguration speech, Lai said the Republic of China, Taiwan's official name, and the People's Republic of China were "not subordinate to each other". Beijing described the speech as a "confession of Taiwan independence" and has previously described him as a "separatist" and "destroyer of cross-strait peace".

The People's Liberation Army then held massive military drills around Taiwan. Beijing said the exercises were "punishment" for "Taiwan separatists" and a "severe warning" to outside forces intent on interference and provocation.

In a blow to Taiwan's chemical exports, a suspension of tariff cuts took effect on Saturday on 134 items under the Cross-Strait Economic Cooperation Framework Agreement – the only trade agreement between Beijing and Taipei.

The Straits Forum, held annually since 2009, has been a platform for signalling new Taiwan policies. At last year's forum, Wang announced that a cross-strait "integration development" pilot zone would be built in Fujian.

In September, Beijing released a comprehensive guideline for building the zone to promote peaceful reunification.

The plan called on Fujian authorities to remove long-standing restrictions on Taiwanese living on the mainland – such as inconveniences in housing, employment and social security.

Beijing also aims to create interconnected communities between the mainland city of Xiamen and the Taiwan-controlled island of Quemoy, also known as Kinmen, which are less than 5km (three miles) apart. Similar plans are under way for Fujian's provincial capital of Fuzhou and the Taipei-governed archipelago of Matsu, which are about 20km apart.

Fujian party chief Zhou told the forum that 121 major projects for Fujian-Taiwan integration have been planned or implemented since last year, including providing water, gas, electricity and bridges to Kinmen and Matsu.

Wang said in his speech that these policies had been "widely welcomed".

Beijing has so far issued 16 policy documents to promote the plan, including 20 measures issued by the Ministry of Education on Wednesday to make it easier for Taiwanese students and teachers to find courses and jobs in Fujian.

In a meeting attended by senior officials before the forum on Friday, Wang urged related government departments to make the integration of Fujian and Taiwan "deeper" and "more solid".

While this year's forum appeared to emphasise peace, some delegates raised concerns about the cross-strait situation.

During a parallel event on Friday, Cheng Ting-wen, secretary general of the Chinese Youth International, an organisation that promotes youth exchanges, expressed worries about the PLA's presence in the Taiwan Strait.

China's war games near Taiwan threaten international peace and security

12 June 2024, The Conversation

Taiwan recently saw yet another peaceful transition of power with the inauguration of President Lai Ching-Te, who was elected to office in January.

In his inaugural speech, Lai called on neighbouring China to cease its acts of intimidation and to "choose dialogue over confrontation."

China responded by launching a simulated blockade of Taiwan. The People's Liberation Army released images boasting its ability to rain missiles on one of the most densely populated countries in the world as "strong punishment."

Democracy under threat

Beijing's standard reaction to the democratic voting rights of 24 million people is to threaten to "break skulls and let blood flow." For China, Taiwan as a renegade province that must "return to the embrace of the motherland" despite the fact China does not have any authority over Taiwan.

In recent years, China has been trying to use its diplomatic clout and influence at the United Nations to rewrite history and legitimize its claim of sovereignty over Taiwan.

While Taiwan ranks highly on the Human Freedom Index (just one spot ahead of Canada), China is a techno-authoritarian state that has regressed even further under the reign of Xi Jinping.

Millions of Uyghur Muslims remain in re-education and forced labour camps, while Tibetans are forced to "Sinicize" and lose their cultural and religious heritage.

Reaching beyond borders

Political dissidents, journalists and foreign nationals are not immune from intimidation or imprisonment.

In what has been termed transnational oppression, aided through Chinese so-called police stations operating with impunity overseas, the Chinese government targets and threatens Chinese nationals and critics of China wherever they are.

Many governments, including Canada's, caution against travel to China and Hong Kong due to the "risk of arbitrary enforcement" of laws prohibiting activities or speech critical of the Chinese Communist Party.

China's censorship, surveillance and arbitrary arrests are widespread, and such tactics and technologies are alarmingly being exported worldwide.

While the Chinese government condemns the forced divestment of TikTok, the app – together with Facebook, WhatsApp and Google – are all banned within the great firewall of China.

War games

When former United States House Speaker Nancy Pelosi visited Taiwan in 2022, China conducted similar war games.

Incursions by Chinese warships and fighters into Taiwan's Air Defence Identification Zone are increasing in frequency. In addition, short of mounting an invasion, China is increasingly testing the waters by deploying its maritime militia to swarm islands under Taiwan's control.

Known as "grey-zone" tactics, they fall short of the use of force, which is prohibited under international law. Also referred to as "salami slicing," grey-zone tactics that are not strictly attacks make it hard for others to respond without potentially escalating a situation to a conflict.

But not responding to threats of force or military intimidation risks normalizing such aggressive behaviour and emboldening China to further destabilize international peace and stability.

Such acts of harassment and threats can happen not just on Earth but in cyberspace and outer space, all of which can have severe repercussions on civilian life and infrastructure.

Pattern of reckless behaviour

Closely allying with Russia, and actively supplying weapons to sustain its war in Ukraine, China has not concealed its desire to reshape the world order.

Taiwan is not alone suffering China's increasingly brazen naval and aerial military operations. Canadian and Australian aircraft enforcing United Nations sanctions against North Korea have also been repeatedly harassed on international waters, where states supposedly enjoy the freedom of navigation.

Meanwhile, China is continuously engaged in violent border clashes with India, is challenging the sovereignty of islands that belong to Japan and militarizing islands in the disputed waters of the South China Sea.

Deliberate jamming of navigation and emergency distress signals in the Asia-Pacific, which threatens the safety of international aviation, has also been attributed to China.

Why Taiwan matters

Tech executives around the world were recently in Taiwan to talk about the future of AI and innovative technologies. With Taiwan's prowess in computing technologies and chip production, Jensen Huang – the Taiwanese-born NVIDIA CEO – described his homeland as "the unsung hero, a steadfast pillar of the world."

But Taiwan is also on the front lines of an increasingly aggressive and assertive China. On a daily basis, Taiwan experiences the highest rate of cyberattacks in the world originating from China, all aimed at disrupting government services and sowing social distrust.

Taiwan has much to share with the world on how to enhance citizen participation in the digital age, counter foreign influence and dispel misinformation and disinformation that undermine trust in democratic institutions and processes.

The latest war games surrounding Taiwan are just another reminder of the various ways China tries to undermine liberal democracies and international peace and security. Today it may be a simulated attack. But the world must stand together and prevent it ever becoming reality.

Taiwan tracks 23 Chinese military aircraft around nation

04 June 2024, DT Next

The median line notably bisects the Taiwan Strait in a way that separates the island from China, which Taiwan claims to be a part of its territory.

TAIPEI: Taiwan tracked 23 Chinese military aircraft around the nation, the country's Ministry of National Defence said on Tuesday. It included fighter jets, transport aircraft, and drones.

Out of these aircraft, 16 crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait. In a post on social media platform X, Taiwan MND wrote, "Overall 23 PLA aircraft (J-16, Y-8, UAVs, etc.) were detected at 0820 hrs today. Out of which, 16 crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait and entered the north, central, and southwest parts of Taiwan's ADIZ in conducting joint combat patrol along with PLAN vessels."

The median line notably bisects the Taiwan Strait in a way that separates the island from China, which Taiwan claims to be a part of its territory.

The Chinese military aircraft were spotted right after China sent in 19 aircraft, eight naval vessels, and four Chinese coast guard ships around the self-governed island within 24 hours ending at 6 a.m. on Tuesday.

"19 PLA aircraft, 8 PLAN vessels, and 4 CCG vessels operating around Taiwan were detected today. 17 of the aircraft crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait and entered Taiwan's northern and SW ADIZ. ROC Armed Forces have monitored the situation and responded accordingly," Taiwan's Ministry of Defence said in a post on X earlier today.

Taiwan monitored the situation and responded accordingly.

Meanwhile, amid tense ties with China and the country's growing aggressiveness, the Defence Minister of Taiwan, Wellington Koo Li-Hsiung, visited the Army HQ to receive a briefing on the operational concepts for the country's ground forces.

The MND, in a post on X, wrote, "On June 3, Defence Minister Wellington Koo Li-hsiung visited the Army HQ to receive a briefing on the operational concepts for Taiwan's ground forces and key future acquisitions to enhance warfighting capabilities."

"Minister Koo emphasised the importance of integrating active duty and reserve forces, strengthening command and control for joint operations, and adopting realistic training aligned with our asymmetric warfare strategy," the post added.

China ready to 'forcefully' stop Taiwan independence: Defence minister

02 June 2024, Aljazeera

Dong Jun says 'whoever dares to split Taiwan from China will be crushed to pieces and suffer his own destruction'.

Chinese Defence Minister Dong Jun has said the country's military was ready to "forcefully" stop Taiwan's independence, in a fiery speech at a Singapore security forum.

Speaking at the Shangri-La Dialogue conference in Singapore on Sunday, Dong said the self-ruled democracy of Taiwan was the "core of core issues" for China, but claimed Taiwan's governing Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) was incrementally pursuing separatism and bent on erasing Chinese identity.

China views Taiwan as its own territory and has not ruled out the use of force to achieve unification.

Last month it staged two days of war games around the island after the May 20 inauguration of President William Lai Ching-te. Lai and the DPP say it is up to the people of Taiwan to decide their future. Beijing calls him a "separatist".

"Those separatists recently made fanatical statements that show their betrayal of the Chinese nation and their ancestors. They will be nailed to the pillar of shame in history," Dong said.

"The Chinese People's Liberation Army has always been an indestructible and powerful force in defence of the unification of the motherland, and it will act resolutely and forcefully at all times to curb the independence of Taiwan and to ensure that it never succeeds in its attempts," Dong told the forum on Sunday.

"Whoever dares to split Taiwan from China will be crushed to pieces and suffer his own destruction."

Reacting to the Chinese minister's statements, Taiwan's government said it deeply regretted the "provocative and irrational" remarks.

Dong's comments in Singapore followed the first substantive face-to-face talks in 18 months between the defence chiefs of China and the US. Dong and US Defense Secretary Lloyd Austin met for more than an hour at the luxury hotel hosting the forum.

"We have always been open to exchanges and cooperation, but this requires both sides to meet each other halfway," Dong said. "We believe that we need more exchanges precisely because there are differences between our two militaries."

After the meeting, Austin said telephone conversations between US and Chinese military commanders would resume "in the coming months", while Beijing hailed the "stabilising" security relations between the two countries.

President Joe Biden's administration and China have been stepping up communication to ease friction between the nuclear-armed rivals, with Secretary of State Antony Blinken visiting Beijing and Shanghai last month.

A key focus has been the resumption of military-to-military dialogue, which is seen as critical to preventing flashpoint disputes from spinning out of control.

China scrapped military communications with the US in 2022 in response to then-US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan.

On the South China Sea, which China claims almost entirely and where it has been involved in frequent confrontations with Philippine vessels, Dong warned of "limits" to Beijing's restraint.

China has fired water cannon at Philippine vessels in contested waters at Second Thomas Shoal and Scarborough Shoal, which Beijing seized from the Philippines after a months-long stand-off in 2012.

"China has maintained sufficient restraint in the face of rights infringements and provocation, but there are limits to this," Dong said.

China accuses the US of using the Philippines as a "pawn" to stir up trouble in the South China Sea.

After the Scarborough Shoal incident, Manila took its case to international arbitration. The court found in favour of the Philippines, and that China's claims had no legal basis. Beijing has ignored the ruling.

Exiled Writer Yuan Hongbing Reveals Chinese United Front Strategy Targeting Taiwan's Legislature

28 May 2024, China Scope

In February, exiled Chinese writer Yuan Hongbing revealed that China aims to use the Kuomintang's (KMT's) influence in Taiwan's legislature to advance its united front strategy, sparking a political storm. Yuan stated in an interview that the information came from a "princeling" (child of a Chinese revolutionary leader) whom Xi Jinping does not dare to challenge. The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) wants to turn the KMT into the vanguard force of the People's Liberation Army to achieve unification of Taiwan with mainland China from within.

According to Yuan's analysis, the CCP is not just using military intimidation to destabilize Taiwan; it is also using propaganda, deployment of agents, and expansion of the KMT's legislative power to override the Taiwanese administration. Yuan said that the CCP wants the KMT to pave the way for Xi Jinping to fully occupy Taiwan, and that the recent military drills are aimed at supporting the CCP's agents in Taiwan.

While some members of Taiwan's Democratic Progressive Party may have been co-opted by Beijing, Yuan said that the party as a whole rejects CCP influence. This stands in contrast to the political attitude of the pro-China KMT party.

Yuan stated that the CCP's Taiwan policy has shifted from coercion and enticement to psychological warfare, aiming to demoralize Taiwanese. He praised the peaceful protests outside the of Taiwan's Legislature as social forces advocating for self-defense that could resist Beijing's intimidation.

Yuan, a former Beijing University law professor, was exiled from China for supporting the 1989 pro-democracy movement.

Most countries support one-China principle, oppose Taiwan region's participation in WHA: FM

24 May 2024, Global Times

The support by a majority of countries for China's position on the Taiwan region's participation in the World Health Assembly (WHA) proves again that the one-China principle represents the will of the international community and the trend of the times, and also fully reflects the majority of countries holding a stance for justice on the Taiwan question related to the WHA, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin said on Friday.

There is but one China in the world. The government of the People's Republic of China is the sole legal government representing the whole of China. Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory, the spokesperson reiterated.

China's position on the Taiwan region's participation in the activities of international organizations, including the World Health Organization (WHO), is consistent and clear: it must be handled under the one-China principle, which is also a fundamental principle demonstrated by the United Nations General Assembly (UNGA) Resolution 2758 and WHA Resolution 25.1, said Wang.

Most countries have reiterated their commitments to upholding Resolution 2758 of the UNGA and firmly supporting the one-China principle, opposing Taiwan region's participation in WHA, the spokesperson said.

For eight consecutive years from 2009 to 2016, The Chinese central government made special arrangements for the Taiwan region's participation in the WHA on the basis of adherence to the one-China principle. But since the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) authorities came to power, they have obstinately adhered to the separatist position of "Taiwan independence" and refused to admit the 1992 Consensus embodying the one-China principle, which means that the political foundation for the Taiwan region's participation in the WHA no longer exists, said Wang.

The 77th WHA will open on May 27. Upholding the one-China principle, as well as the sanctity and authority of relevant UNGA and WHA resolutions, China has decided not to approve the Taiwan region's participation in this year's WHA, a move that has been widely understood and supported by the international community, said Wang.

Leaders and senior officials of many countries, as well as those of international organizations, such as officials from the UN Geneva Office, have recently restated that their countries or organizations abide by the one-China principle and the UNGA Resolution 2758.

When asked about a question related to China, Stephane Dujarric, spokesman for the UN Secretary-General, said, "it means in terms of our standing on Taiwan as a province of China," according to a UN daily press briefing on Thursday.

Any attempt to violate the one-China principle or play the "Taiwan card" for political manipulation are doomed to fail, Wang said.

Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin also slammed the US' false narrative on UNGA Resolution 2758. The past few weeks saw repeated ill-intentioned comments from some US officials challenging the authority of UNGA Resolution 2758. "Those comments distort the facts and history, tread on international law and the basic norms of international relations, and breach the US' own commitment," Wang said at a press briefing on May 15.

PRC Military Drills near Taiwan

25 May 2024, State.gov, Matthew Miller

The United States is deeply concerned over the People's Liberation Army joint military drills in the Taiwan Strait and around Taiwan. We are monitoring PRC activities closely and coordinating with allies and partners regarding our shared concerns.

We strongly urge Beijing to act with restraint. Using a normal, routine, and democratic transition as an excuse for military provocations risks escalation and erodes longstanding norms that for decades have maintained peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait, which is critical for regional and global security and prosperity and a matter of international concern.

The United States remains committed to its longstanding one China policy, guided by the Taiwan Relations Act, the Three Joint Communiqués, and the Six Assurances.

Beijing says Taiwan politics don't change 'fact' there is 'one China'

Beijing said on Monday (May 20) that Taiwan's internal politics did not change the "fact" it is part of China, warning that efforts towards the island 'It has described Lai as a "dangerous separatist" for his past comments on Taiwan's independence - rhetoric that he has moderated in recent years. Asked about his inauguration on Monday, foreign ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin said that Taiwan independence was "a dead end".

"No matter under what guise or banner, the pursuit of Taiwan independence and secession is doomed to fail," he added. "No matter how the internal political situation in Taiwan changes, it will not change the historical and legal fact that both sides of the strait belong to one China," Wang warned.

"The day of China's complete unification will come eventually."

As Lai took office, Chinese state media reported that Beijing had imposed sanctions on three US defence companies over their sales of weapons to Taipei.

Though the United States formally recognises Beijing, it is Taipei's main partner and supplier of arms.

Wang on Monday accused "some politicians in a small number of countries" of engaging in "political manipulation ... on the Taiwan issue, severely interfering in China's internal politics".

Chinese social media network Weibo also blocked hashtags referencing the inauguration, preventing them from trending on the platform used by hundreds of millions in China.

In his inauguration speech, Lai directly addressed the threat of war following years of growing pressure from China to bring Taiwan under mainland rule. Lai said a "glorious era of Taiwan's democracy has arrived" and thanked citizens for "refusing to be swayed by external forces, for resolutely defending democracy". Beijing's Taiwan Affairs Office - which manages relations with the island - slammed Lai's speech as sending a "dangerous signal", state news agency Xinhua reported. Office spokesman Chen Binhua was quoted as saying Lai's remarks "wantonly advocated separatism, incited cross-strait confrontation and sought independence by relying on foreign support and by force". He went on to accuse Lai of ignoring Taiwan's "mainstream public aspiration ... for peace and development".

Chinese agents highly active in democratic Taiwan, dissidents say

19 May 2024, RFA, Hsia Hsiao-Hwa

On Jan. 13, 2023, Guangdong dissident Xiao Yuhui crossed the 10-kilometer (6-mile) stretch of water from China to Kinmen, a small island that is still controlled by Taiwan, paddling across on a surfboard.

But Xiao's bid to escape the influence of the Chinese government didn't end there.

He believes the ruling Chinese Communist Party under Xi Jinping is now focusing closely on "cleaning up" opposition voices overseas, and has spotted people he believes to be Chinese agents a number of times at public events in democratic Taiwan.

According to a former Chinese agent who spoke recently to Australian broadcaster ABC, this is exactly what's going on. Former Chinese spy "Eric" told the station that he has been involved in surveillance, abductions and the silencing of targets around the world since 2008.

The Spanish-based group Safeguard Defenders, which has warned the world about China's secret police stations, its network of "consular volunteers" and its targeting of dissidents and activists overseas, has now launched a "one-stop shop" legal advice center to help fight transnational repression by Beijing.

"The Chinese Communist Party kidnaps and threatens people at home, and they do the same thing overseas," Xiao said, in response to a question about the ABC report.

The sight of unidentified people he suspected were agents of the Chinese state filming and recording at pro-democracy events in Taiwan worried him enough that he now stays away from protests, rallies and other public events that are seen by Beijing as "anti-China."

He's not the only one who's worried, either.

"Both the Taiwanese government officials and the human rights groups who have assisted me have said they hope I won't take part in so many activities or give public interviews, which could lead to my whereabouts being exposed," Xiao told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview.

"They told me this because [China] has so many political collaborators in Taiwan," he said.

Strange behavior

Li Jiabao, a former exchange student from China who applied for political asylum after speaking out against constitutional amendments allowing Xi to abandon term limits for his own job, said he has been continually targeted by authorities in China since then.

One unidentified person approached Li as he took part in a documentary in 2019 about his life story and situation, demanding that the director delete all footage, he said.

"[The director] didn't even know whether he had captured the person following us or whether he was just a very suspicious sort of person," Li said. "The man seemed very nervous and panicky, and behaved unacceptably, threatening us."

On another occasion, Li spotted someone who appeared to be following him in a park near his home. The man would watch him, but then looked at his phone if Li looked in his direction.

Li noticed people exhibiting similarly strange behavior at rallies he attended in Taipei to mark the anniversaries of the June 4, 1989, Tiananmen massacre, he said. Shortly after his denunciation of Xi, someone contacted him claiming to be a journalist, and sent him emails in a bid to have him download an app to his phone.

"He used a disposable account," said Li, who later realized what had likely happened after reading media reports of Chinese agents posing as journalists. "Turns out he was phishing me."

"The main thing they want is to get access to your contacts ... as well as the Telegram, Facebook and other chat records commonly used by dissidents," he said. "They can also be used to track your location at any time, to know who you are meeting, what you did and what activities you took part in."

Money for spying

Li has also been approached and offered money to spy on fellow dissidents in Taiwan, he revealed.

"Someone asked me how much you can make a month in Taiwan, said I must be short of money, and told me to go and film the Falun Gong, and the next day to film dissidents, including asking them how they're doing," he said.

"They told me just to live my life, and that they would contact me via a Hong Kong account if I thought it was too sensitive," he said. "The Chinese want to find out if you're willing to do stuff for them for money. I always refuse."

Xiao said the Chinese agents clearly knew of his love of photography, because he remembers being approached in October 2023 to take photos of planes taking off and landing at Taipei's Songshan Airport, home to a Taiwanese Air Force base that runs the flying service for the president and vice president of Taiwan.

"They give you some simple tasks to do and some financial support, to see if you can be bought, then more work would follow," he said.

Xiao smelled a rat at the time, and turned down the offer.

Threats to family members back home are another key part of the Chinese state security police playbook, according to dissidents overseas.

Li said he once received a message from his family asking if he was "being used by overseas or foreign forces."

Xiao said the authorities back home had visited his mother at her home and tried to get her to call him and find out his whereabouts and future plans.

Abduction threats

Sometimes, the goal is to get the target to a location where they can be handed over to the Chinese police, the former Chinese agent, who gave only the pseudonym "Eric," told ABC.

During the program, it emerged that RFA political cartoonist Rebel Pepper, whose real name is Wang Liming, was one of the targets, with Eric detailing a plot to lure Wang to Cambodia, using a Chinese-owned conglomerate that has become one of the fastest-growing companies in Cambodia – the Prince Group – to carry out the scam.

RFA has verified that Prince was the company used for the recruitment and has also spoken to "Eric."

Li has already encountered a similar situation, as his Chinese passport is due to expire in October, and he will soon be undocumented.

He was recently contacted by someone with China connections offering to renew his passport if he traveled to Hong Kong, Malaysia, Thailand or elsewhere in Southeast Asia.

"[They told me] as long as you're willing to leave, we have the connections to renew your passport here," he said.

"He and some of his staff also tried to get me to try walking the line into the United States, via the Netherlands and Ecuador," Li said. "The reason I didn't go is that at least I'm safe in Taiwan."

"Once I leave, who's to know if someone would report my whereabouts to the Chinese Communist Party," he said. "I could be threatened, kidnapped or killed along the way, despite not needing a visa to go [to Ecuador]."

Deception

Li said he is very careful about who he is in contact with, as even fellow democracy activists are suspect these days.

"They sometimes pretend to be democrats who care about China, and try to deceive you ... so I'm usually very careful not to meet with strangers unless it's necessary," he said.

"The best way to be sure is to talk to them over time, because no matter how good their cover is, sooner or later they will have to carry out work given them by the Chinese Communist Party, so they will be exposed eventually."

Li said he wasn't surprised by the ABC expose about "Eric", and warned: "Be careful not to accept money or contacts from unknown sources."

Xiao believes that Taiwan still isn't nearly tough enough on Chinese spies operating in its territory, saying that sentences handed down to Chinese spies are typically far too lenient, and not enough to be a deterrent.

Taiwan, despite being a democracy, has plenty of people willing to travel to China and be in contact with authorities there, he said, while certain political parties and civil groups actively campaign for closer ties with Beijing.

Taiwanese star forced to publicly support 'one China' policy

10 May 2024, RFA, Jenny Tang

Taiwanese TV and movie actor Wu Mu-hsuen was recently forced to sign a pledge to support China's territorial claim on democratic Taiwan, or the show she had just finished filming would be ditched, according to multiple local media reports.

Wu was approached by the film crew after wrapping up filming of the online drama "Hey! Come a bit closer" in China last year, and told to sign the agreement or the show would never be aired, her agent Chen Hsiao-chih told several Taiwanese media outlets in recent days.

According to Wu's agent, the practice is now commonplace when Taiwanese artists work in China, and plenty of other stars have been forced to sign agreements pledging that Taiwan is "a part of China," and that there can be no independence for the island, according to reports in the island's Central News Agency, Liberty Times and TVBS.

Taiwan has never been ruled by the Chinese Communist Party, nor formed part of the 74-year-old People's Republic of China, and most of its 23 million people have no wish to give up their sovereignty or democratic way of life to be ruled by China, according to multiple public opinion polls in recent years.

The news about the agreements has highlighted concerns over China's "soft power" influence over Taiwan, as Beijing vows to achieve "peaceful unification" with the island through propaganda and economic pressures.

Signing agreements

A former film and television industry worker who gave only the surname Chen for fear of reprisals said such requests are common, and don't typically come from Chinese officials, but from the production team of the show that Taiwanese artists are working on.

"The Chinese producers have put a lot of money into filming these shows, and they're afraid that if the artist gets into trouble after filming is done, the whole drama will be thrown out [by ruling Chinese Communist Party censors]," Chen told RFA Mandarin in an interview on May 9. "So they ask the artists to make a commitment in that regard."

He said all artists, including Chinese nationals, are asked to sign commitments to refrain from drugs or pornography or anything else that could endanger the reputation of the show.

The version of the agreements handed to Taiwanese artists also includes a commitment to support Beijing's claim on China, or to refrain from supporting independence for Taiwan, Chen said, adding that anyone who doesn't comply will likely be added to a Chinese government blacklist, which means the huge and lucrative Chinese market is closed to them.

"Artists need to be very clear about this — it's unreasonable to criticize them and to still want to make money from them," Chen said, adding that most artists "aren't very political," and are willing to comply.

"The Chinese market is so big, that they don't see the need to offend people just to make a fuss about something," Chen said.

He said the deals have become more ubiquitous with the rise in tensions across the Taiwan Strait that followed the landslide victory of ruling Democratic Progressive Party President Tsai Ing-wen in 2016.

'Forced to take sides'

While it has refused to rule out invading Taiwan by military force, Beijing vowed in January to step up its efforts to achieve "peaceful unification" with the island after Taiwanese voters in January elected Beijing's least favorite candidate Lai Ching-te — Tsai's right-hand man — as their next president.

"Peaceful unification" refers to the Chinese Communist Party's attempts to bring the island under its control through propaganda, threats and infiltration rather than armed invasion, analysts have told RFA in recent interviews.

"They wouldn't be asking artists to sign such deals if the leaders on both sides of the Taiwan Strait were in a state of harmony," Chen said. "When there are high-level political tensions, then people further down are unlucky enough to be forced to take sides."

An employee of Taiwan's terrestrial broadcaster TTV who asked to be identified only by the surname Wang said she, too, would steer clear of hiring people with known political views to make entertainment shows.

"We're a purely commercial TV station with no political affiliation, so we would definitely consider when filming TV shows and movies whether someone we hire has a specific political orientation," Wang said. "We would avoid hiring politicians."

"While professional criteria are given priority, we would still be concerned if the political overtones were too strong," she said.

She said some shows that do showcase political themes simply won't sell in the heavily restricted Chinese market.

"There are a lot of people in the film and TV industry who are unable to sell their shows or movies due to political leanings," Wang said.

"But it's a choice — some see the Chinese market as very important, so won't go anywhere near politics, while others give politics top priority," she said.

China ramps up pressure on Taiwan ahead of presidential inauguration

06 May 2024, VOA, William Yang

China has initiated a series of influence campaigns against Taiwan ahead of the island's inauguration of president-elect Lai Ching-te on May 20. Beijing has increased the scale and frequency of military activities near Taiwan while partially relaxing travel and import restrictions.

Some analysts say Beijing is trying to test how the incoming Taiwanese government will respond to the increased pressure from Beijing while further eroding the longstanding status quo across the Taiwan Strait at a time when Taiwan is preparing for a transition of power.

"In the short term, Beijing is trying to see how the new Taiwanese government under Lai may respond to its pressure campaign," said Chen Fang-yu, a political scientist at Soochow University in Taiwan.

"At the same time, the Chinese government is attempting to change the status quo across the Taiwan Strait when Taipei is focusing on the inauguration," he told VOA by phone.

Taiwan's defense ministry detected 26 Chinese military aircraft and five Chinese naval vessels near the island between May 2 and May 3, including 17 Chinese military aircraft crossing the median line of the Taiwan Strait. Some Chinese aircraft got as close as about 76 kilometers from Taiwan's northern port city of Keelung, which hosts an important naval base.

Meanwhile, the director general of Taiwan's National Security Bureau, Tsai Ming-yen, told Taiwanese lawmakers on May 1 that the Chinese military had incorporated new tactics into its joint combat readiness patrol near the island, including staging night-time combat patrols and using landing ships and minesweepers during these exercises.

Additionally, he said Taiwanese authorities are tracking the increased patrols carried out by the Chinese coast guard near Taiwan's outlying island, Kinmen. On April 29, Beijing said the Fujian Coast Guard had organized a fleet of ships to increase the frequency of patrols in waters near Kinmen since April.

Beijing also announced plans to allow residents from its southern province of Fujian to travel to Taiwan's outlying island of Matsu while lifting import restrictions on Taiwanese pomelos and two types of seafood late last month.

The news came after a group of lawmakers from Taiwan's main opposition party, the Kuomintang, which advocates closer ties between Taipei and Beijing, visited China.

Some experts say the measures rolled out by Beijing in recent weeks are all part of its influence operation against Taipei, which involves using disinformation campaigns, economic coercion, and gray zone operations to impose pressure on Taiwan.

"China's overall strategy is still to increase pressure on Taiwan but they are also offering some small favors to Taiwan's opposition parties," said Su Tzu-yun, a military expert at the Taipei-based Institute for National Defense and Security Research.

While recent developments should be viewed as part of China's overall influence operation against Taiwan, Su said part of Beijing's long-term goal is to increase its control over the Taiwan Strait.

"By increasing the frequency of deploying Chinese coast guard vessels to restricted waters near Kinmen and flying Chinese military aircraft closer to Taiwan's main island, Beijing is hoping to eventually turn the Taiwan Strait into its territorial water," he told VOA by phone.

Beijing has repeatedly threatened to achieve reunification with Taiwan through force in recent years, and the Chinese government views Taiwan's president-elect Lai as an advocate of Taiwan independence.

Since the Chinese military usually concentrates military exercises between June and November, Su said the incoming Taiwanese government needs to closely monitor any increase in Chinese military activities around the island after May 20.

In addition to threats posed by a possible buildup of Chinese military activities, some security analysts say Taiwan should also be mindful of Beijing's efforts to create division in Taiwan's domestic politics.

"There is every reason to believe that [the Chinese Communist Party] is ramping up efforts to use Taiwan's democracy against itself," J. Michael Cole, a Taipei-based security analyst, told VOA in a written response.

He said China will rely on China-friendly political forces in Taiwan to "sabotage the Lai administration" and these efforts will have "serious ramifications for Taiwan's ability to counter Chinese infiltration and the Taiwan government's ability to function."

Prioritizing policy continuity

In light of the increasing Chinese pressure, Lai has appointed some current cabinet members to key positions in charge of national security, foreign policy, and cross-strait relations in his cabinet.

Taiwan's current foreign minister Joseph Wu will be the secretary general of the National Security Council. The current head of the council, Wellington Koo, will be the new defense minister in the Lai administration.

On the foreign policy front, the current secretary general of Taiwan's presidential office Lin Chia-lung will be the new foreign minister, and Chiu Chui-cheng, a former deputy political minister for Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council, which handles cross-strait relations, will be the new head of the council.

Cole said Lai's personnel picks for national security and foreign policy reflect his intention to continue the policy agenda of the outgoing administration under President Tsai Ing-wen, who has focused on strengthening Taiwan's relations with like-minded democracies including the United States and Japan. The decision "will play a major role in reassuring allies and partners around the world that Taiwan will remain committed to the kind of responsible foreign policy that existed under the Tsai administration," he told VOA.

Chen at Soochow University said the incoming Taiwanese government's cabinet lineup will benefit the U.S.-led efforts to strengthen security-related cooperation among democratic countries in the Indo-Pacific region.

"Since some of his cabinet members are holdovers from the current administration, they have already established relationships with officials in other countries, and some of the existing cooperations can continue," he told VOA.

Taiwan reports second Chinese 'combat patrol' in a week

02 May 2024, Reuters

Taiwan's defence ministry on Thursday said that China had carried out a "joint combat readiness patrol" near the island for the second time in a week.

Over the past four years, China's military has significantly ramped up its activities around democratically-governed Taiwan. Beijing views the island as its own territory, a position the government in Taipei strongly rejects.

The ministry said that starting from 4 p.m. (0800GMT) on Thursday it had detected 15 Chinese military aircraft, including Su-30 fighters, carrying out "joint combat readiness patrols" with Chinese warships around Taiwan.

Ten of the aircraft crossed the Taiwan Strait's median line, or areas nearby, and flew into air space to the island's north, centre and southwest, the ministry said.

The median line used to serve as an unofficial border between Taiwan and China, but Chinese military aircraft now regularly cross it. China says it does not recognise the line's existence.

China's defence ministry did not answer calls seeking comment on Thursday, the country being in the middle of its Labour Day holiday.

Taiwan reported a similar Chinese combat patrol on Saturday.

The island's top security official said on Wednesday that Taiwan is on alert for China to carry out military exercises following the inauguration of President-elect Lai Ching-te later this month.

Taiwan National Security Bureau Director-General Tsai Ming-yen said China had begun using unusual new tactics, including staging night time combat patrols.

China has a strong dislike of Lai, believing him a dangerous separatist. China's government has rejected his repeated offers of talks, including one made last week.

Lai says only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

Taiwan on alert for post-inauguration Chinese drills

01 May 2024, Reuters, Ben Blanchard

Taiwan is on alert for China to carry out military exercises after the inauguration of President-elect Lai Ching-te this month, the island's top security official said on Wednesday, adding China has already begun using unusual new tactics.

China, which views democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, has a strong dislike of Lai, believing him a dangerous separatist. China's government has rejected his repeated offers of talks, including one made last week.

Lai, like current President Tsai Ing-wen, rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims; both say only the island's people can decide their future. Lai, now vice president, will be inaugurated on May 20.

Speaking to reporters at parliament, Taiwan National Security Bureau Director-General Tsai Ming-yen said maintaining stability in the Taiwan Strait was in the interests of everyone in the international community, including China.

China is currently using a carrot-and-stick approach toward Taiwan, hoping to influence the incoming government's China policy, added Tsai, who shares a common family name with the president but is not related to her.

"What needs special attention is that following May 20, from June to November, is when the Chinese Communists hold their regular military drills," he said. "Whether the Chinese Communists use this hot season as an excuse to carry out some military drills to further pressure Taiwan is a key point the National Security Bureau is focusing on."

China's defence ministry did not answer calls seeking comment outside of office hours on Wednesday, the start of the Labour Day holiday.

China's military has during the past four years massively increased its activities around Taiwan.

NIGHTTIME PATROLS

Taking lawmaker questions, Tsai said China had been observed three times so far this year carrying out "joint combat readiness patrols" at night, something he described as a new development.

"In addition, inflight refuelling aircraft are being used during the joint combat readiness patrols" to extend the time combat aircraft can remain in the air, Tsai said.

Landing ships and minesweepers have also been observed joining these patrols, he added.

"These are new patterns for this year."

Taiwan's defence ministry last reported a Chinese combat readiness patrol, where warships and warplanes operate together in the skies and waters near Taiwan, on Saturday.

In 2022, China carried out major war games near Taiwan after a visit to Taipei by then-U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and again last year after President Tsai met then-House Speaker Kevin McCarthy on a stopover in California.

Taiwan-based security sources have repeatedly warned China could show their displeasure with Lai using the military.

Since Lai's January election victory, China has kept up a steady stream of pressure on Taiwan, including coast guard patrols near a group of Taiwanese-controlled islands that sit next to the Chinese coast, and opening new air routes in the Taiwan Strait that Taipei says threaten aviation safety.

But Beijing has also offered to resume, albeit in limited form, Chinese tourism to Taiwan, a proposal the government in Taipei is still considering, as it wants a full resumption of visits by Chinese tourists.

Ma Ying-jeou urges Taiwan's next president to respond 'pragmatically' to Xi Jinping's 'olive branch'

15 April 2024, Lawrence Chung, SCMP

- Island's former leader also calls on William Lai to 'confirm the one-China framework'
- He made the remarks after a trip to the mainland, which included a meeting with Xi

Former Taiwanese leader Ma Ying-jeou has called on the island's president-elect to respond "pragmatically" to the "olive branch" extended by Xi Jinping and to accept the one-China principle.

Ma, who met mainland Chinese leader Xi in Beijing last week, said Taiwan's next leader, William Lai Ching-te, should take note of Xi's goodwill and refrain from "walking the independence path".

Lai, of the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party, was elected in January and will be inaugurated next month.

Using Taiwan's official name for itself, Ma wrote in a Facebook post on Monday that Lai should "follow the Constitution of the Republic of China, confirm the one-China framework based on the constitution, and ensure that the two sides of the strait are not two separate countries".

The ROC constitution, which includes the one-China concept, was adopted by the Nationalist, or Kuomintang, government in Nanjing in 1947. It has remained in effect in Taiwan since the KMT fled to the island and set up an interim government there after being defeated by the Communists in mainland China during the civil war in 1949.

Since she came to power in 2016, incumbent President Tsai Ing-wen, of the DPP, has refused to accept the one-China principle, saying Beijing has never ruled Taiwan and that the island is already sovereign and independent.

Tsai's second four-year term ends on May 20. Her successor, Lai, has been denounced by Beijing as a "troublemaker" and "obstinate separatist".

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of its territory awaiting reunification, by force if necessary. Most countries, including the United States, do not recognise Taiwan as an independent state but oppose any attempt to take it by force.

In his post on Monday, Ma called on Lai to "guarantee not to pursue Taiwan independence, allow both sides of the strait to return to the common political foundation of the 1992 consensus and engage in various exchanges on an equal and dignified basis".

The consensus is a tacit agreement between Beijing and Taipei that there is only “one China”, but each side has its own interpretation of what that means.

Ma said that at time of unabating conflicts around the world “there is a need to ensure peace and prosperity” across the Taiwan Strait, adding that both the US and Europe would want to see regional security maintained.

“Mr Xi has extended an olive branch to us, and I sincerely hope that for the well-being of the Taiwanese people, [Lai] can respond to him pragmatically,” Ma said.

Ma, who led Taiwan from 2008 to 2016 and remains an influential figure in the Beijing-friendly KMT, returned to the island on Thursday from an 11-day tour of Guangdong, Shaanxi and Beijing with a group of Taiwanese students.

Expressing “special thanks” to Xi for his reception on Wednesday, Ma said he had told Xi that both sides of the strait should cherish each other’s values and way of life, and that if a war broke out it would be “unbearable for the Chinese nation”.

Xi responded that although their systems were different, as long as Taiwan and mainland China shared a common national identity, with the 1992 consensus as the foundation for political ties, then they could sit down to resolve conflicts and build mutual trust, according to Ma.

The former Taiwanese leader also said Xi had a rare face-to-face talk with the students, listening to their thoughts and answering questions.

“I believe this demonstrates the highest sincerity and goodwill towards Taiwan,” Ma said, adding that the students had told him that Xi “seemed like a caring elder, patiently sharing life experiences with them, leaving them with unforgettable memories”.

There was no immediate response to Ma’s remarks from Lai or his office. But the DPP said last week that Ma’s views did not reflect those of the Taiwanese public and that cross-strait dialogue and interaction should be based on “equality and dignity” with “neither side subordinating to the other”.

Taiwan’s Mainland Affairs Council said a survey it conducted this month found that nearly 80 per cent of Taiwanese disagreed with Beijing’s use of the 1992 consensus as the political foundation for cross-strait dialogue.

Chinese President Xi meets former Taiwan leader Ma Ying-jeou on pro-unification visit

10 April 2024, Spectrum News

Chinese President Xi Jinping met with former Taiwanese President Ma Ying-jeou in Beijing Wednesday in a bid to promote unification between the sides that separated amid civil war in 1949.

Ma left office almost two decades ago and was largely excluded from the opposition Nationalist Party’s failed campaign to retake the presidency in January, a concession to the electorate’s strong opposition to political unification with China and politicians seen as willing to compromise Taiwan’s security.

He follows a long line of politicians from the Nationalists, also known as the KMT, who have been invited to China by its authoritarian one-party government and given VIP treatment on visits around the country.

China claims Taiwan as its own territory, to be annexed by force if necessary. Beijing sends navy ships and warplanes around the island on a daily basis in hopes of wearing down Taiwan’s defenses and intimidating the population.

“The people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait are all Chinese. There is no dispute that cannot be resolved, there is no problem that cannot be discussed, and no force can separate us,” Xi told Ma.

“Differences in systems cannot change the fact that both sides of the Taiwan Straits belong to the same country and nation,” he added.

Ma responded that a new war between the sides would be “an unbearable burden for the Chinese nation.”

“The Chinese people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait will definitely have enough wisdom to handle cross-strait disputes peacefully and avoid conflicts,” Ma said.

Independence leaning president-elect Lai Ching-te of the Democratic Progressive Party won the January election handily and his vice president-elect Bi-khim Hsiao has been visiting nations friendly to Taiwan in Europe and elsewhere ahead of taking office.

Ma’s 11-day trip, ostensibly at the head of a student delegation, underlines continued interactions in education, business and culture despite Beijing’s threat to use military force against the self-governing island democracy to achieve unification.

Toward the end of his second term in 2015, Ma held a historic meeting with Xi in Singapore, which has close contacts with both sides. The meeting – the first between the leaders of China and Taiwan in more than half a century – produced few tangible outcomes, and Ma’s Nationalist Party lost the next presidential election to Tsai Ing-wen of the DPP.

Lai Ching-te, currently vice president, is despised by Beijing for his opposition to unification. The Nationalists recovered a narrow majority in the legislature but their influence on foreign policy and other national issues remains limited.

Taiwan has been boosting military relations with allies such as the U.S. and Japan while maintaining close economic ties with the Chinese mainland.

RFI: Taiwan Rejects China's Relief Aid After Earthquake

05 April 2024, RFI

Following the magnitude 7.4 earthquake that struck Taiwan on the morning of April 3rd, Radio France Internationale (RFI) reported that Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council quickly rejected aid offered by mainland China, saying it was not needed.

Analysts explained that Beijing's aid always comes with conditions attached and is not a true gesture of goodwill. Some suggested that, instead of providing aid, it would be better for the mainland to stop interfering with the Taiwanese government's disaster relief effort.

The report stated that "China has been unwilling to give up the threat of force to expand its control over Taiwan, and the Taiwanese people are naturally highly suspicious of China's intentions." The article mentioned that mainland China blocked the United Nations from providing much-needed assistance to Taiwan 25 years ago when it suffered "The Great 921 Earthquake." In recent years, mainland aircraft and warships frequently disturb the areas surrounding Taiwan. This trend is only intensifying. Because of these ongoing military threats, people in Taiwan are highly suspicious of China's intentions.

Some scholars expressed the belief that China may have anticipated Taiwan's reaction. The argument is as follows: When Beijing made an offer that was very likely to be rejected, they were not actually trying to help; they were setting a trap to embarrass Taiwan for rejecting aid that appears to have been offered in goodwill.

Taiwan detects 30 Chinese military aircraft, 9 navy vessels around nation

03 April 2024, Business Standard

Taiwan Defence Ministry detected 30 Chinese military aircraft and nine navy vessels operating around its nation between Tuesday 6 am and Wednesday 6 am, Taiwan Ministry of National Defence said.

It added that 20 Chinese aircraft entered its northern middle line and Taiwan's southwest air defence identification zone (ADIZ). "30 PLA aircraft and 9 PLAN vessels operating around Taiwan were detected up until 6 a.m. (UTC+8) today. 20 of the aircraft entered Taiwan's northern, middle line, and SW ADIZ. #ROCArmedForces have monitored the situation and employed appropriate force to respond," Taiwan Ministry of National Defence posted on X. Taiwan tracked seven Chinese naval vessels and six military aircraft around the nation amid escalating cross-strait tensions on Tuesday,

Taiwan News reported. In an official post on 'X,' Taiwan's Ministry of National Defence (MND) said, "6 PLA aircraft and 7 PLAN vessels around Taiwan were detected by 6 am (UTC+8) today. 2 of the aircraft crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait. #ROCArmedForces have monitored the situation and employed appropriate forces to respond."

Notably, in March, Taiwan tracked 359 Chinese military aircraft and 204 naval vessels, according to Taiwan News.

Since September 2020, China has increased its use of gray zone tactics by incrementally increasing the number of military aircraft and naval ships operating around Taiwan.

Gray zone tactics are defined as "an effort or series of efforts beyond steady-state deterrence and assurance that attempts to achieve one's security objectives without resorting to direct and sizable use of force."

Meanwhile, the Taiwanese military condemned the filming by drones by Chinese netizens on the outlying island of Erdan near Kinmen on March 31, Taiwan News reported.

Some reports circulated online suggesting that unmanned aerial vehicles had captured footage of military movements on the Taiwanese-held island, within view of the Chinese city of Xiamen.

The Kinmen Defence Command said local officers could take appropriate measures based on the threat level the drones posed.

The military blamed some Chinese netizens for the provocative behaviour, which could easily escalate into a serious incident.

Ma's itinerary includes a visit to Beijing, where there is heavy speculation he might meet with Xi, who says he remains open to Taiwanese politicians who proclaim that the island and the mainland, which split during a civil war in 1949, belong to a common Chinese nation.

Taiwan's official Central News Agency quoted Hsiao Hsu-tsen, who directs Ma's foundation, as saying he hopes Ma will have the chance to meet with "an old friend," but gave no details.

Taiwanese are largely opposed to political unification with China, and the island is boosting military relations with allies such as the U.S. and Japan while maintaining close economic ties with the mainland

Taiwan Calls for Return of Military Officer Rescued by China

23 March 2024, VOA

Taiwan called Saturday for the swift return of one of its military officers who was rescued by Chinese authorities after losing contact during a fishing vacation.

Two men from Taiwan's outlying Kinmen island were found on March 18 by the coast guard of China's Fujian province after the engine of their boat failed. Chinese authorities said one of the anglers, surnamed Hu, was an active member of Taiwan's military, accusing him of intentionally concealing his identity.

Taiwan's defense ministry confirmed Saturday that Hu was part of the Kinmen Garrison Brigade.

"(He) went fishing during his vacation and lost contact due to heavy fog. He contacted his family and service unit that he was rescued by the Chinese coast guard and is safe," said Kinmen's Defense Command in a statement.

It added that they were cooperating with other agencies and hoped "for the safe return of its personnel to Kinmen as soon as possible on humanitarian grounds."

Kinmen Defense Command also said it will tell soldiers "to refrain from participating in various risky activities during their vacation."

The other man in the fishing boat, surnamed Wu, was repatriated to Kinmen by Taiwan's coast guard Saturday.

According to video footage shared by Kinmen lawmaker Chen Yu-jen — who was at the dock — Wu was greeted by his tearful mother with a hug when he stepped off the boat.

Hu's mother told reporters that she hoped China would allow family members to go visit him.

"Our hearts are filled with anxiety when we can't see him in person, although my son has sent a message saying he is safe," she said.

China's Taiwan Affairs Office — a mainland body tasked with handling cross-strait relations — had told Chinese state news agency Xinhua that Hu needed to be held "to further verify and understand the situation."

China claims self-ruled Taiwan as part of its territory and has said it will not rule out force to bring the island under Beijing's control.

This incident comes after an ongoing row between Taipei and Beijing over a fatal boat incident last month.

A Chinese speedboat carrying four people capsized on February 14 near Kinmen while Taiwan's coast guard was pursuing it, leaving two dead.

The coast guard had defended its actions, saying the boat was within "prohibited waters" and was zigzagging before it capsized, but Beijing has accused Taipei of "hiding the truth" about the incident.

Since then, China said it would step up patrols around Kinmen — a territory administered by Taipei but located just 5 kilometers (3 miles) from the mainland city of Xiamen.

Taiwan Faces Sovereignty Dilemma in South China Sea Amid Chinese Pressure

22 March 2024, VOA

Taiwan has been grappling with debates over the last week about a potential visit to an island in the disputed South China Sea by its outgoing president.

Some lawmakers from the main opposition party Kuomintang, which advocates friendlier ties with China, have urged Tsai Ing-wen, who will leave office in May, to visit Itu Aba, in the contested Spratly Islands, and assert Taiwan's sovereignty over the island.

Taiwan took control of the 46-hectare (114-acre) islet, which Taiwan and China call Taiping Island, in 1956. China, Vietnam and the Philippines all claim sovereignty.

It hosts 200 members of Taiwan's coast guard and contains a hospital, a farm and a runway to facilitate military resupply missions. In January, Taiwan completed a dredging project that would allow larger vessels to dock at the wharf.

In 2016, a Hague tribunal ruled that Itu Aba is not an "island," under the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, and thus not subject to claims of sovereignty.

"Since the South China Sea arbitration downgraded Taiping Island to a reef in 2016, the Tsai administration hasn't protested against the ruling," Ma Wen-chu, a Kuomintang legislator, wrote on her official Facebook page.

"Instead, her administration urged Kuomintang not to claim sovereignty over the South China Sea. President Tsai should really go to Taiping Island and declare Taiwan's sovereignty over the island," she said, adding that lawmakers from the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee are planning a trip to the island in early May.

However, Taiwan's foreign minister and top security official have advised the president not to take the trip at the moment, saying she should consider current regional tensions and international perception of the potential trip.

"Many countries' aircraft and ships are interfered with by relevant countries when passing through, [so] it is necessary [for the government] to assess whether the president's aircraft's flight safety can be maintained during the 1,600-kilometer flight," Tsai Ming-yan, director-general of Taiwan's National Security Bureau, told journalists Thursday.

Foreign Minister Joseph Wu said Wednesday that while the Taiwanese government remains committed to upholding Taipei's sovereignty over Itu Aba, it needs to consider how other countries might interpret a potential visit to the island by Tsai.

Pointing to the standoff between China and the Philippines in the South China Sea, Wu said Taiwan "must consider how to use peaceful means to resolve the South China Sea issue, and not let others think we are creating difficulties."

While both of Tsai's predecessors visited Itu Aba, Tsai hasn't made similar trips in office. Taiwan has built a runway on Itu Aba to facilitate military resupply missions, but the island is lightly defended compared with nearby islands controlled by China.

The debate comes as Taiwan prepares for the inauguration of President-elect Lai Ching-te on May 20, whom Beijing views as a "separatist." It also follows the increased activities by Chinese coast guard vessels around disputed waters near Taiwan's outlying Kinmen Island in recent weeks.

Some analysts said a potential visit to Itu Aba could "inflare tensions" between Taiwan and other countries with territorial claims in the South China

Sea. A trip to the island by Tsai "could be used by China to further strain [cross-strait] relations," Timothy Rich, an expert on Taiwan politics at Western Kentucky University, told VOA in a written response.

Since Itu Aba lies about 230 miles from the Philippines and is more than 900 miles from Taiwan, Rich said Taiwan's attempt to assert sovereignty over the island through a potential trip by Tsai "could strain relations" with Manila, whose administration "seems particularly open to strengthening relations with" Taipei.

In addition to allowing China to increase pressure on Taiwan, other experts told VOA that a potential trip to Itu Aba by Tsai could also damage the diplomatic progress that Taiwan has achieved since 2016.

"A trip to Taiping Island would be counterproductive to Tsai's New Southbound Policy and the diplomatic progress that Taipei has made with regional partners over the past 8 years," said Ivan Kanapathy, who served on former U.S. President Donald Trump's National Security Council as director for China, Taiwan and Mongolia, in a written response.

As China maintains an aggressive posture in the South China Sea, some Taiwanese analysts think it is in Taiwan's interest to defend its territorial interest in the disputed water through a peaceful approach.

"Since tensions remain high between China and the Philippines and Vietnam in the South China Sea, it'll be favorable for Taiwan if the government uses more peaceful ways to safeguard its territorial integrity," Su Tzu-yun, a military analyst at the Taipei-based Institute for National Defense and Security Research, told VOA by phone.

Growing Chinese military activities

Amid ongoing debates about the Taiwanese president's potential trip to Itu Aba, China has increased military activities around Taiwan over the last few days. A total of 68 Chinese military aircraft and 11 Chinese naval vessels were detected in areas near Taiwan between Wednesday and Friday, according to statistics released by Taiwan's Defense Ministry.

Su in Taiwan said the uptick in Chinese military activities around Taiwan is a way for Beijing to express its displeasure toward U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken's trip to the Philippines, during which he reiterated Washington's "ironclad" commitment to defend Manila, and Taiwanese Vice President-elect Hsiao Bi-Khim's recent trip to the Czech Republic.

"China is showcasing its displeasure toward Washington's and Taipei's recent diplomatic activities by increasing the scale of its military activities around Taiwan," he told VOA.

With less than two months until Taiwan's President-elect Lai takes office, Rich at Western Kentucky University said China may try to keep up the pressure on his administration by increasing the frequency of its military activities around Taiwan.

"I assume China's increased naval and air exercises around Taiwan still serve as means to persuade the Lai administration into what they see as a more pro-China policy, [but] the strategy is unlikely to bear fruit," he told VOA.

Amid increased Chinese military activities near Taiwan, the top U.S. military commander in the Indo-Pacific warned that China remains ready to potentially invade Taiwan by 2027.

"All indications point to the PLA [China's People's Liberation Army] meeting President Xi Jinping's directive to be ready to invade Taiwan by 2027," Indo-Pacific Command chief Admiral John Aquilino told the U.S. House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday.

Kanapathy, now the senior vice president of Washington-based consultant Beacon Global Strategies, said that since China's Xi has told his military to be ready for a potential Taiwan invasion in 2027, the world "should take him at his word."

"Beijing is investing heavily to buy down its perceived risks for an invasion operation, including by expanding lift capacity and nuclear capabilities," he told VOA.

Taiwan warns of 'enormous' Chinese bases near its S.China Sea holding

20 March 2024, Reuters

TAIPEI, March 20 (Reuters) - Taiwan's foreign minister said on Wednesday that China has built "enormous" military bases on three islands surrounding Taiwan's main holding in the South China Sea, but Taipei is not looking to further escalate tensions in the strategic waterway.

Both Taiwan and China claim most of the South China Sea as their own territory, but Taiwan only controls one islet in the contested Spratly Islands deep in the southern part of the sea called Itu Aba, which Taiwan refers to as Taiping.

Some lawmakers from both the ruling and main opposition parties have called on President Tsai Ing-wen to visit Itu Aba before she steps down in May to assert Taiwan's sovereignty and view a newly renovated harbour that can take larger ships.

Both her predecessors visited the island but she has yet to do so while in office.

Asked by reporters about calls for Tsai to go to Itu Aba, Taiwan Foreign Minister Joseph Wu said there was no doubt the island belonged to Taiwan and the government would defend their sovereignty over it.

China and the Philippines have been involved in a dangerous stand-off in the South China Sea of late, but the situation around Itu Aba is also tense, Wu said.

"China has already created very enormous South China Sea military bases on the three islands surrounding Taiping - Subi Reef, Fiery Cross Reef and Mischief Reef - and these are all quite close to our Taiping," Wu said.

"As the dispute continues to intensify, we in Taiwan must consider how to use peaceful means to resolve the South China Sea issue, and not let others think we are creating difficulties."

If there is an opportunity, Taiwan will use the "best way" to demonstrate its sovereignty over Itu Aba, he added without elaborating.

Itu Aba has a runway long enough to take military re-supply flights from Taiwan, but is lightly defended compared to the nearby Chinese-controlled islands. Chinese forces generally leave Itu Aba alone.

China has carried out extensive land reclamation on its South China Sea islands, building major air force and other military facilities, causing major concern in Washington and around the region.

China says it has every right to build on and defend what it considers its territory.

Taiwan also controls the Pratas Islands in the northern part of the South China Sea, and both China's air force and navy regularly operate nearby to assert Beijing's territorial claims over Taiwan, which the government in Taipei rejects.

Vietnam, Malaysia and Brunei claim other parts of the South China Sea in dispute with both China and Taiwan.

Unification of Taiwan not priority for many Chinese, one-third disapprove of war: Report

17 March 2024, The Print

Beijing [China], March 17 (ANI): The 'unification' of Taiwan with mainland China is not the main priority for many Chinese people, and around one-third consider launching a full-scale war on the self-ruled island "unacceptable," Al Jazeera reported.

But, even though the people's focus remains underpinned on the economy and other crucial fronts, the Taiwan issue will remain the 'cornerstone' of the Chinese Communist Party's narrative.

The communists won the Chinese Civil War in 1949, and the nationalists of the Kuomintang (KMT) fled Beijing for the island of Taiwan. It was on Kinmen, the main island of the archipelago of the same name, less than 10 km (6.2 miles) from the coast of China, that the nationalists repulsed repeated communist invasion attempts, but not before the fighting had wreaked havoc on both Xiamen and Kinmen, Al Jazeera reported.

Kinmen and its outlying islets – some of which lie even closer to the Chinese coast – have been a part of Taiwan's territory ever since.

Chinese citizens were once able to get tourist visas to visit the islands, but that ended with the pandemic.

"It is difficult to imagine that this used to be a warzone," 23-year-old Shao Hongtian said. "Kinmen, China and Taiwan are all part of the same nation, so it should be possible to visit, and I hope I can visit one day."

Like Shao, Chinese President Xi Jinping and the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP) too claim that Taiwan and its territory are part of China.

Xi said in his New Year's address that China's unification with democratic Taiwan was an "historical inevitability," and China has not ruled out the use of force to achieve unification. Last year Xi called on China's armed forces to strengthen their combat readiness.

In recent years, the Chinese military has increased its pressure on Taiwan with almost daily airborne and maritime incursions close to Taiwan's air and seaspace. This further intensified after the visit of former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to Taipei.

At times, the Chinese manoeuvres have been accompanied by sabre-rattling rhetoric and large-scale military drills.

Lately, tensions have also been rising near Kinmen.

Last month, two Chinese fishermen were killed when their speedboat capsized as they attempted to flee the Taiwanese coastguard when they were discovered fishing "within prohibited waters" about one nautical mile (1.8km) from the Kinmen archipelago, Al Jazeera reported.

Since then, the Chinese coastguard has stepped up its activities around Kinmen.

Zhu Fenglian, a spokesperson for the Chinese government's Taiwan Affairs Office, called the February incident "vicious" and stressed the waters were "traditional" fishing grounds for fishermen in China and Taiwan. There were no off-limits waters around Kinmen, she added.

A second capsizing was reported on Thursday, and on this occasion, China asked for help from the Taiwan coastguard.

But, despite the recent tensions, Chinese citizen Shao says hostilities are not the way to bring China and Taiwan together.

"I want unification to happen peacefully," he said. He said that if that is not possible, it would be better to keep things as they are.

He knows that many of his friends feel the same way. According to Shao, if they go to Kinmen and Taiwan, it should be as visitors, not as fighters.

"The Taiwanese haven't done anything bad to us, so why should we go there to fight them?" he said, convinced that any war between China and Taiwan would result in significant casualties on both sides. "Unification with Taiwan is not worth a war."

According to Al Jazeera, a study published by the University of California San Diego's 21st Century China Center last year suggests that Shao and his friends are not alone in opposing a war over Taiwan. The study explored Chinese public support for different policy steps regarding unification with Taiwan and it was found that one-third of Chinese respondents termed launching a full-scale war to achieve unification as "unacceptable."

Only one per cent rejected all other options but war, challenging the Chinese government's assertion that the Chinese people were willing to "go to any length and pay any price" to achieve unification, Al Jazeera reported.

Mia Wei, a 26-year-old marketing specialist from Shanghai is not surprised by such results.

"Ordinary Chinese people are not pushing the government to get unification," she said. "It is the government that pushes people to believe that there must be unification."

At the same time, support for a unification war turned out to be close to the same level found in similar studies from earlier years, indicating that despite the growing tension in the Taiwan Strait and renewed talk about taking control of Taiwan, there has not been a corresponding increase in support for more forceful measures.

Wei believes that Chinese like herself are more concerned with developments inside their country, amid issues like property crisis and economic concerns.

"First there was Covid, then the economy got bad and then the housing market got even worse," she said. "I think Chinese people have their minds on more important things than unification with Taiwan."

However, regardless of what Chinese people might think, Eric Chan, a senior fellow at the Global Taiwan Institute in Washington, DC believed that unifying Taiwan with the mainland will remain a 'cornerstone' of the CCP's narrative.

"Unification is not a topic that is up for any sort of debate with the general public," he said.

Although the Chinese leadership often claims that China is a democratic country where the party is guided by the will of the Chinese people, there are no regular national elections or free media, and online discourse is restricted and regularly censored. Speaking out against the CCP can also result in criminal convictions.

Since Xi became president in 2012, crackdowns on civil liberties have intensified, and Xi has centralised power around himself to a degree unprecedented since the rule of Mao Zedong – the man who led the communists to victory against the nationalists and became communist China's first leader, Al Jazeera reported.

During Mao's rule, reforms and purges of Chinese society led to the deaths of millions of Chinese people, while over 4,00,000 Chinese soldiers died as a result of his decision to enter the 1950-1953 Korean War on North Korea's side.

But according to Chan, the days when a Chinese leader could expend tens of thousands of lives in such a manner are over. Recent government actions that exacted a heavy toll on citizens led to public pushback, and Xi did not appear immune.

During the Covid pandemic, Xi ardently defended the country's zero-COVID policy even though its mass testing and strict lockdowns had dire socioeconomic consequences. The government eventually abandoned the policy as the economy sank, and people took to the streets across China's major cities demanding an end to the lockdowns, even calling for Xi to step down, Al Jazeera reported.

As for war, the circumstances are also different. A battle for Taiwan would be existential for the communist party and Xi, according to Chan.

According to Chan, the public outrage over a long unification war that might even end in a Chinese defeat could 'endanger' the party's rule. So, he expects the CCP instead continuing to engage in low-cost grey zone operations against Taiwan while developing a Chinese military that would be able to score a swift victory.

For citizens like Shao, however, any attempt to settle the issue through conflict would be a disaster.

"I don't think it will end well for anyone – not for those that have to fight it and not for the government that starts it," he said. (ANI)

CCP is increasing cross-strait 'gray area': report

10 March 2024, Taipei Times

The Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) unpredictability is increasing and the "gray area" in its cross-strait policy is being reduced as its National People's Congress (NPC) and Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference's (CPPCC) National Committee meetings consolidate Chinese President Xi Jinping's (習近平) authority and the party's control over the state, a report by Taiwan's National Security Bureau (NSB) said.

The report, which has been sent to the Legislative Yuan ahead of NSB Director-General Tsai Ming-yen's (蔡明彥) presentation to the legislature's Foreign Affairs and National Defense Committee tomorrow, said that Chinese Premier Li Qiang's (李強) report at the opening of China's NPC earlier this week showed that the State Council, which coordinates China's government ministries, is to play the role of enforcing party orders and upholding Xi's authority.

The Organic Law of the State Council was also amended to grant the party a further legal basis for it "to lead the state," the NSB report said, adding that China had also scrapped the premier's press conference this year that is usually held at the end of each NPC.

The report cited critics as saying that these moves would inevitably strengthen Xi's hold over the party and make Chinese politics even more closed off.

Despite facing inflation and the bursting of a housing bubble, China is determined to pump more money into its military spending and is working ever more closely with Russia to increase geopolitical risk in the Indo-Pacific region, the report said.

With the US elections set for November, China is stepping up efforts to reinforce its "one China" principle and change the "status quo" by stepping up military, diplomatic, economic and legal pressure against Taiwan, it added.

China is also trying to invite various Taiwanese groups to visit China with a aim to influence them with "united front" rhetoric, the report said.

On the US presidential election, Tsai said in the report that incumbent Joe Biden and his front-running opponent, Donald Trump, see China as a challenger to the US.

Regardless of who wins the election, the US strategy to continue to support Taiwan and contain China would not significantly change, the report added.

"Neither India nor Taiwan is part of the PRC and we're not its puppets" Taiwanese FM

07 March 2024, Phayul

The Chinese embassy in India has issued a statement condemning an Indian media channel's interview with Taiwan Foreign Minister Joseph Wu. The embassy alleges that the interview provided a platform to advocate "Taiwan independence," on March 2.

The statement from the Chinese embassy read: "On 29th February 2024, certain Indian TV broadcasted an interview with the head of Taiwan's foreign affairs office Joseph Wu, which provided a platform for him to advocate 'Taiwan independence' and disseminate false information. It seriously violated the one-China principle, and is totally unacceptable."

In response to the Chinese embassy's statement, Taiwan's foreign ministry posted on X, "Neither India nor Taiwan is part of the PRC [People's Republic of China] and we're not its puppets. We're both democracies with free and vibrant presses that can't be dictated to." Taipei asked Beijing to worry about its "economic slump, not bully its neighbours".

India was among the first nations in the world to accept the "one China policy" in 1949 and used it in joint statements, but New Delhi stopped doing so around 2010 in response to Beijing's insistence on issuing stapled visas to residents of Jammu and Kashmir and Arunachal Pradesh.

Over the years, India has also deepened its engagement with Taiwan through trade, including negotiations for a free trade agreement, and culture without having diplomatic relations. India has a trade and cultural office in Taipei with a reciprocal set-up in New Delhi, which also provides consular services.

China drops 'peaceful reunification' reference to Taiwan

05 March 2024, Reuters

China will boost its defence spending by 7.2% this year, fuelling a military budget that has more than doubled under President Xi Jinping's 11 years in office as Beijing hardens its stance on Taiwan, according to official reports on Tuesday.

The increase mirrors the rate presented in last year's budget and again comes in well above the government's economic growth forecast for this year. China also officially adopted tougher language against Taiwan as it released the budget figures, dropping the mention of "peaceful reunification" in a government report delivered by Premier Li Qiang at the opening of the National People's Congress (NPC), China's rubber-stamp parliament, on Tuesday. Tensions have risen sharply in recent years over Taiwan, the democratically ruled island that China claims as its own, and elsewhere across East Asia as regional military deployments rise.

Li Mingjiang, a defence scholar at the Rajaratnam School of International Studies (RSIS) in Singapore, said that despite China's struggling economy, Taiwan is a major consideration in Beijing's defence spending.

"China is showing that in the coming decade it wants to grow its military to the point where it is prepared to win a war if it has no choice but to fight one," Li said.

Since Xi became president and commander-in-chief more than a decade ago, the defence budget has ballooned to 1.67 trillion yuan ($230 billion) this year from 720 billion yuan in 2013.

The percentage rise in military spending has consistently outpaced the annual domestic economic growth target during his time in office. This year the growth target for 2024 is about 5%, similar to last year's goal, according to the government report. The defence budget is closely watched by China's neighbours and the United States, who are wary of Beijing's strategic intentions and the development of its armed forces.

Based on data from the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS), this year's budget marks the 30th consecutive year of Chinese defence spending increases.

Japanese government spokesperson Yoshimasa Hayashi on Tuesday urged greater openness from Beijing, warning of serious international concerns.

China's continuous military spending increases without sufficient transparency were "the greatest strategic challenge ever to ensure the peace and stability of Japan and the international community and strengthen international order", Hayashi said in Tokyo.

South Korea's defence ministry declined to comment. Australia's defence ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

James Char, a security scholar at the RSIS, said that despite the defence budget's outpacing GDP growth, it had remained at about 1.3% of overall gross domestic product in the last decade and had put no stress on the national coffers.

"Of course, the country's longer-term economic fortunes will determine whether this can be sustained going forward," Char said.

The purchase of new equipment is likely to take up the largest single chunk of the budget as the military works to meet Xi's goal of full modernisation by 2035, the IISS said in research published last month. That push continues across several fronts, with China producing weapons ranging from warships and submarines to drones and advanced missiles that can be equipped with both nuclear and conventional warheads.

Char said tighter management would also be a priority for military leadership after high-profile personnel purges related to weapons procurement.

The Central Military Commission, China's top military body, last July ordered a "clean up" of the procurement process and invited the public to report irregularities.

The commission has not announced the results of its investigation, but at least nine generals, including four directly in charge of procurement, have been stripped of their title as parliamentarians, a necessary procedure before they can be charged in court.

Two former defence ministers, Li Shangfu and Wei Fenghe, have also gone missing without explanation, which in China often means they are under investigation.

Li had been in charge of military procurement from 2017 to 2022. When asked whether Li would attend the parliament sessions, parliament spokesman Lou Qinjian told Singapore paper Lianhe Zaobao on Monday that Li "cannot attend because he is no longer a delegate".

In the government work report, China reiterated a call for "reunification" with Taiwan, but added emphasis that it wants to "be firm" in doing so and dropped the descriptor "peaceful", which had been used in previous reports.

Although it is not the first time that China had omitted the word "peaceful", the change in language is closely watched as a possible sign of more assertive stance towards Taiwan.

Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council on Tuesday urged China to accept the fact that the two sides are not subordinate to each other, and urged China to create health cross-strait exchanges.

The island's defence minister had said on Tuesday Taiwan's armed forces would increase the number of missile drills they hold this year.

Wen-Ti Sung, a political scientist and fellow at the Atlantic Council, said that the language on Taiwan has "moderately hardened".

"Beijing appears to be balancing between projecting increased toughness on Taiwan with stabilising relations with Taiwan's international friends," he said. After the Democratic Progressive Party's Lai Ching-te won the presidential election in Taiwan, the Chinese Communist Party's fourth-ranked leader, Wang Huning, said at a high-level Taiwan policy meeting last month that China would "resolutely combat" any efforts towards Taiwan independence this year.

Previous statements from the annual meeting only vowed to "resolutely oppose" Taiwan independence. ($1 = 7.1987 Chinese yuan renminbi)

Taiwan faces steady 'drip' of pressure as China tightens pre-inauguration squeeze

01 March 2024, Reuters

TAIPEI, March 1 (Reuters) - Taiwan is facing a steady "drip, drip" of Chinese pressure ahead of the inauguration of its next president in May, with officials in Taipei fearing Beijing could further squeeze the island's room to manoeuvre without resorting to direct conflict.

Since current Vice President Lai Ching-te won the presidency in January - China views Lai as a separatist - Beijing has snatched away a diplomatic ally, altered an air route in the narrow Taiwan Strait, and begun regular coast guard patrols around the Taiwan-controlled Kinmen islands, which hug the Chinese coast.

China claims democratically governed Taiwan as its own territory, over the island's strong rejections.

Visiting Taipei last week, U.S. Representative Mike Gallagher, chairman of the U.S. House of Representatives select committee on China, said Beijing's patrols around Kinmen, which is a short ferry ride from the Chinese cities of Xiamen and Quanzhou, were part of a pattern of steady pressure on Taiwan.

It is a salami-slicing effort; they are slowly turning up the rheostat," he said, referring to a resistor used to control an electric current.

One foreign official tracking security matters in the region described what was happening as a "drip, drip" of pressure, keeping up the message that Beijing does not like Lai, but without holding war games - as it has twice around the island in the past year and a half - or forcing direct military confrontation.

"It's part of the pattern of gradually altering the status quo in the Taiwan Strait, seeing what they can get away with and shifting to a new normal, restricting Taiwan's space to move," the source said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

China says the coast guard patrols are to ensure the safety of its fishermen. Two Chinese fishermen died last month trying to flee Taiwan's coast guard after approaching too close to one of Kinmen's heavily fortified islets.

Asked on Wednesday whether the Kinmen tensions were part of China's pre-inauguration pressure on Lai, a spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office did not answer directly, reiterating China's right to the coast guard patrols.

"Both sides of the Taiwan Strait are part of one China, and Taiwan is a part of China," Zhu Fenglian said.

China says it alone has sovereignty over the Taiwan Strait, and that it also recognises no "off limits" waters for its fisherman around Kinmen. Taiwan strongly rejects China's territorial claims.

Li Zhenguang, a Taiwan expert at Beijing Union University, told China's official Xinhua news agency this week that it was up to China to "firmly grasp the initiative" when it came to dealing with Taiwan, and that asserting jurisdiction around Kinmen was a necessary step on the road to "reunification".

'GREY ZONE'

Taiwan has complained for four years of stepped-up Chinese military action, such as fighters regularly flying over the strait as part of a "grey zone" strategy to wear down Taiwan with activities that stop short of a full-blown conflict.

A senior Taiwan official familiar with the island's security planning said that Beijing is exerting pressure "day in and day out" ahead of Lai's inauguration speech on May 20, and that the Kinmen situation was another "grey zone" tactic.

"We will not go along with their political plots and escalate tensions," said the official, who declined to be named because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Taiwan's Ocean Affairs Council Minister Kuan Bi-ling, whose department runs the coast guard, this week drew a parallel to what was happening around Kinmen and China's regular sovereignty-asserting patrols around islets in the East China Sea that Beijing, Tokyo and Taipei all claim as theirs.

"It is China trying to take the Diaoyutai method and apply it to the Kinmen-Xiamen waters, which we really, really cannot accept," she said, using Taiwan's name for the islets China calls the Diaoyu and Japan the Senkaku.

Tensions around Kinmen, however, appear unlikely to ease anytime soon, as government representatives from both Taiwan and China this week continued negotiations on how to settle the incident. Families of the dead have asked for compensation and an apology from Taiwan authorities.

A senior Taiwan official dealing with the incident in Kinmen said Taiwan will not apologise, as doing so would make future Taiwan law enforcement there difficult.

Taiwan's armed forces have left the handling of the dispute so far to the coast guard, whose Kinmen fleet of 16 boats patrols there rather than the navy, signalling they don't want an escalation.

Asked on Tuesday what the response would be if China's coast guard "overdid it", Taiwan Defence Minister Chiu Kuo-cheng said they don't want conflict.

"Avoiding war is not to shirk it. We have rules for combat preparation, but we don't want it to happen," he said.

China Says Its Coast Guard Patrols Around Taiwan Islands 'Beyond Reproach'

27 February 2024, US News

BEIJING (Reuters) -China's government said on Wednesday that its coast guard patrols around a group of Taiwanese islands near the Chinese coast were "beyond reproach", and dismissed complaints the boarding of a Taiwan tourist boat had caused panic.

China's coast guard this month began regular patrols around the Taiwan-controlled Kinmen islands, which face China's Xiamen and Quanzhou cities, where two Chinese nationals died trying to flee Taiwan's coast guard after their boat entered prohibited waters.

Taiwan said last week a Taiwanese tourist boat operating from Kinmen had been boarded briefly by China's coast guard, triggering "panic", and that this week five Chinese ships entered prohibited or controlled waters.

Speaking at a regular news briefing in Beijing, Zhu Fenglian, spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, reiterated it does not recognise any off-limits waters around Kinmen for fishermen, and said that the coast guard did not cause alarm with boarding the tourist boat.

"I don't think there is any issue of panic," Zhu said.

The coast guard carries out its official duties in "their own waters" in accordance with the law to maintain "normal order" and protect the lives and of fishermen and travellers, she added.

"Civilized and transparent law enforcement is beyond reproach," Zhu said.

Taiwan, which China claims as its own territory despite the island's rejection, has been wary of efforts by Beijing to ramp up pressure on Taipei following last month's election of Lai Ching-te as president. Beijing considers Lai, who takes office in May, a separatist.

Taiwan has complained of repeated Chinese military activity near its territory.

On Wednesday, Taiwan's defence ministry said it had detected 15 Chinese military aircraft operating around the island carrying out "joint combat readiness patrols" with Chinese warships.

China recognises no sovereignty claims by Taiwan, and has accused Taiwan of acting "maliciously" by causing the deaths of the two Chinese nationals on the fishing boat, which had gotten too close to one of Kinmen's heavily fortified islets.

Taiwan has defended its action and accused China of failing to properly control its fishing boats and stop them entering Taiwan's waters around Kinmen, the site of frequent fighting during the height of the Cold War.

Zhu said Taiwan was to blame for its dangerous enforcement actions.

"The relevant parties in Taiwan should respect the fact that both sides of the Taiwan Strait have been operating in traditional waters for a long time, and stop seizing and detaining mainland fishing boats in a rough and dangerous manner."

Over 80% of Taiwanese favour maintaining status quo with China: Survey

24 February 2024, Business Standard

More than 80 per cent of Taiwanese people want to maintain the status quo with China, with those preferring to keep Taiwan's current status indefinitely rising sharply, while those who want independence have been dropping since 2020, according to the results of a survey released on Friday, Central News Agency Taiwan reported.

In the survey titled "Changes in the Unification-Independence Stances of Taiwanese," National Chengchi University's Election Study Center, which has tracked the annual change in Taiwanese residents' stance on the issue from 1994-2023, said it saw increasing support for the continuation of cross-strait status quo.

The three most preferred choices in 2023 were: "maintain the status quo indefinitely" (33.2 per cent), "maintain the status quo, decide at a later date" (27.9 per cent) and "maintain the status quo, move toward independence" (21.5 per cent), according to the Center.

Added together, those three categories of people who either want to maintain the status quo for now or indefinitely accounted for 82.6 per cent of the total, Central News Agency Taiwan reported.

The least preferred option was "unification as soon as possible," which had never exceeded 5 per cent since the survey has been conducted and stood at only 1.2 per cent in 2023, according to the findings. That category of people who want to "maintain the status quo, move toward unification," has dropped from the third highest percentage overall, or 15.6 per cent, in 1994, to 6.2 per cent in 2023.

Also, in 2023, only 3.8 per cent of respondents expressed a desire for Taiwan's immediate independence, making it the second least preferred option overall, with support over the decades never exceeding 7.8 per cent.

Central News Agency Taiwan reported that the percentage of people who want independence now and those who want it later have been steadily dropping since 2020. The two groups added together fell from a high of 32.1 per cent in 2020 to 25.3 per cent last year.

The fastest growing category of people were those who want to maintain the status quo indefinitely; it rose from 9.8 per cent in 1994 to 33.2 per cent last year, rising sharply since 2020.

It surpassed those who favored "maintain status quo, decide at later date" for the first time in 2022.

This survey was released in tandem with another one that tracked the year-on-year changes in how Taiwanese people identify themselves (as Taiwanese or Chinese) between 1992 and 2023.

That second survey showed that 61.7 per cent of Taiwanese in 2023 identified themselves as Taiwanese, falling a little from the record high of 64.3 per cent seen in 2020. That self-identification preference has ballooned from 17.6 per cent in 1992 to more than threefold last year, Central News Agency Taiwan reported.

Last year, around one third of respondents considered themselves both Taiwanese and Chinese, continuing a general downward trend from 46.4 per cent in 1992 to 32 per cent in 2023. But last year those who considered themselves to be Taiwanese and Chinese rose slightly from the record low of 29.9 per cent in 2020.

In contrast, significantly fewer people consider themselves to be simply Chinese, with the number falling from 25.5 per cent to 2.4 per cent over the past 30 years.

Only 3.9 per cent of respondents showed no response in 2023, down from 10.5 per cent in 1992. According to the center, the surveys were conducted via telephone questionnaires with respondents ranging from 1,209 to 34,854 per year.

The center said it used key sample variables to weight the sample's partial characters such as sex, age, and education through an iterated (or raking) process to ensure the sample structure is representative of the population.

It did not provide the confidence level and margin of error.

Mainland China's top Taiwan official pledges support for pro-unification forces

23 February 2024, South China Morning Post
Beijing's top Taiwan affairs official has called for more efforts to support pro-unification forces and deepen cultural ties a month after the presidential election was won by an independence-leaning candidate.

Wang Huning, who heads the Central Leading Group for Taiwan Affairs, told the Taiwan Affairs Work Conference that this year its task was to "advance the process of reunification" and "maintain peace and stability" across the Taiwan Strait, state news agency Xinhua reported on Friday.

Wang, the No 4 in the Communist Party's hierarchy, told officials they would also need to strike hard against Taiwan independence and interference by external forces.

Last month's Taiwanese presidential election was won by William Lai Ching-te of the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party – whom Beijing has repeatedly described as a dangerous separatist – as its next president. He will take office in May when current leader Tsai Ing-wen steps down.

Beijing has criticised Washington's increased political support and arms sales to Taiwan as "external interference in China's internal affairs", and described them as the biggest obstacles to its reunification plan with Taiwan.

Wang also told the conference that Beijing has "overcome difficulties" in pushing ahead its Taiwan agenda and winning international support for the "one China" principle – an apparent reference to Honduras and Nauru cutting their ties with Taipei in the past 12 months.

"It is necessary to expand cross-Strait exchanges and cooperation in various fields and deepen cross-Strait integration and development. We should push for joint Chinese culture promotions across the Taiwan Strait and promote spiritual bonds among Chinese compatriots," he added.

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. Most countries, including the US, do not recognise Taiwan as an independent state, but Washington is opposed to any attempt to take the self-governed island by force and is committed to supplying it with weapons.

As China will celebrate the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China this year, Wang said Beijing will need to "further grasp the strategic initiative to achieve complete reunification of the motherland".

In contrast to his speech last year, this time Wang did not refer to "one family across the Taiwan Strait" or of Beijing's efforts to "promote policies benefiting the Taiwanese people".

Instead, he said Beijing would "firmly support patriotic and pro-unification forces on the island and unite Taiwan compatriots".

In December, Beijing suspended tariff cuts on 12 products imported from Taiwan, a decision it blamed on the DPP's stance, and threatened more measures might follow. The decision prompted speculation it might try to weaponise trade to influence the presidential election.

China-Taiwan tensions surge as Beijing increases patrolling following fishermen's deaths

19 February 2024, The Economic Times

Tensions are escalating in the waters near Taiwan as China intensifies patrols around a group of islands controlled by Taiwan. This move comes in the aftermath of the death of two Chinese fishermen who drowned during a pursuit by Taiwan's coast guard, accusing them of trespassing, CNN reported.

China's coast guard, specifically its Fujian division, announced on Sunday that it would enhance maritime law enforcement and conduct regular patrols in the waters around Xiamen, China, and Taiwan's Kinmen islands.

Gan Yu, a spokesperson for China's coast guard, stated that the objective is to "further maintaining the order of operations in the relevant waters and protecting the lives and property of fishermen." The decision to increase patrols raises concerns about heightened proximity between Chinese and Taiwanese coast guard vessels, potentially increasing the risk of miscalculation and conflict, as reported by CNN.

The recent escalation followed an incident where a Chinese speedboat capsized while attempting to evade Taiwan's coast guard, alleging trespassing for fishing in waters approximately 1 nautical mile off Kinmen's coast. Two crew members survived after being rescued by Taiwan's coast guard, while the other two were found unconscious and confirmed dead after being taken to the hospital in Kinmen.

China has strongly condemned the incident, blaming Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) and accusing them of forcibly seizing mainland fishing boats and mistreating mainland fishermen. The Taiwan Affairs Office in China stated that the incident during the Lunar New Year holiday seriously hurt the feelings of compatriots on both sides of the Taiwan Strait.

Taiwan authorities expressed regret over the deaths but maintained that their coast guard officers were acting within the bounds of the law. China's Taiwan Affairs Office further escalated the rhetoric, expressing "strong indignation" in mainland China and denying Taiwan's designation of "restricted" waters near Kinmen.

The office asserted that fishermen from both sides have been operating in traditional fishing grounds in the Xiamen-Kinmen waters since ancient times, rejecting the idea of "prohibited or restricted waters." It urged Taiwan authorities to release the surviving fishermen from custody.

In response, Taiwan's Mainland Affairs Council reaffirmed its commitment to enforcing the law in the waters it controls, expelling or detaining trespassing vessels. It disputed Beijing's accusations of "rough expulsions," attributing the incident to constant intrusions by unidentified ships that lack certification or port registration. The council stated that the case is under investigation by Taiwanese prosecutors.

Kuan Bi-ling, Taiwan's Minister of Ocean Affairs Council, assured that the surviving fishermen under Taiwan's custody were being cared for and would be repatriated as the case progressed. Kuan highlighted Taiwan's previous rescue efforts for mainland Chinese fishermen and cargo ships, emphasising the humanitarian approach despite rising tensions in the Taiwan Strait.

Over the past three years, Taiwan's coast guard has reportedly rescued 20 individuals from mainland China. China has been applying economic, military, and diplomatic pressure on Taiwan and has severed most communications with Taipei since the Democratic Progressive Party came to power in 2016.

In previous years, during the more Beijing-friendly Kuomintang government's term, joint maritime drills were held for search and rescue operations, CNN reported.

'Cycling for a Free Tibet' event launched ahead of Tibetan Uprising Day in Taiwan

15 February 2024, Phayul

The Human Rights Network for Tibet and Taiwan (HRNTT) organized a "Cycling for a Free Tibet" event in Taipei on Wednesday to raise public awareness on the Tibetan struggle for freedom ahead of the Tibetan Uprising Day. During the event, cyclists took to the streets of the capital to commemorate 65 years of Tibetan resistance against China's occupation of their homeland and the Lhasa uprising that happened on March 10, 1959.

Tashi Tsering, the founder of The Human Rights Network for Tibet and Taiwan (HRNTT), held a press conference outside the Legislative Yuan. During the conference, he expressed his concerns over the Chinese Communist Party's coercion of Tibet into signing the "Seventeen Point Agreement" in 1951. He highlighted many issues happening in Tibet, including Tibetan children being separated from their parents and subjected to China's indoctrination education in colonial style boarding schools.

He also highlighted that the Chinese Communist Party has imposed laws to dictate the selection of reincarnated Buddhist leaders, in a bid to regulate and suppress Tibetan Buddhism.

During the same event, DPP Legislator Puma Shen warned against China's economic and diplomatic aggression towards Taiwan. Shen cited the "peaceful treaty" signed with Tibet as a warning and emphasized Taiwan's obligation to defend against tyranny, especially in light of the circumstances in the so-called Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and Hong Kong. Shen also pledged to continue advocating for freedom, democracy, and human rights within the parliament.

Sky Fung, the chief secretary of Hong Kong Outlanders, expressed his grief over the persecution of Tibet's religion, culture, and tradition after China's invasion. As a Hong Kong citizen, Fung expressed regret for not realizing China's deception earlier and for not raising support for Tibet. He emphasized the importance of freedom and cautioned against complacency, while warning Taiwan could potentially become China's next target.

More cycling events are scheduled in Taipei on Feb. 21, Feb. 28, and March 6, with another in Kaohsiung on March 2.

Taiwan reports more Chinese balloons over Taiwan Strait

11 February 2024, Reuters

TAIPEI, Feb 11 (Reuters) - Taiwan's defence ministry said on Sunday it had detected eight Chinese balloons crossing the Taiwan Strait in the previous 24 hours, of which five flew across Taiwan, the second day in a row it has reported a large number of balloons.

Taiwan, which China claims as its own territory despite the strong objections of the government in Taipei, has complained since December about the balloons, saying they are a threat to aviation safety and attempt at psychological warfare.

In its daily report on Chinese military activities, Taiwan's defence ministry said it spotted the first balloon on Saturday morning and the last one mid-afternoon, having spotted the same number of balloons on Friday.

Five crossed the northern and central part of Taiwan, according to a map provided by the ministry.

China's defence ministry did not answer calls seeking comment on Sunday. Both China and Taiwan are currently celebrating the Lunar New Year holiday, the most important festival in the Chinese-speaking world.

Last month, China's government dismissed repeated complaints by Taiwan about the balloons, saying they are for meteorological purposes and should not be hyped up for political reasons.

Chinese warplanes operate daily in the Taiwan Strait and often cross its median line that previously served as an unofficial barrier between the two sides. China says it does not recognise the existence of that line.

Taiwan last month elected Vice President Lai Ching-te as its next president, a man China describes as a dangerous separatist.

Lai, who takes office in May, has offered talks with China, which have been rejected. He says only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

The potential for China to use balloons for spying became a global issue last February when the United States shot down what it said was a Chinese surveillance balloon. China said the balloon was a civilian craft that accidentally drifted astray.

China is troublemaker by repeatedly using Taiwan Strait issues to hold other countries hostage: Tiaiwan

28 January 2024, Times of India

TAIPEI: The Taiwan Ministry of Foreign Affairs said today that Taiwan has always been committed to maintaining the status quo, in order to maintain peace and stability in the region and across the Taiwan Strait, but China has repeatedly used the Taiwan Strait issue to hold other countries hostage and sow discord between Taiwan and other countries, fully highlighting that China is the troublemaker that undermines regional and Taiwan Strait peace and stability, and China's so-called "Taiwan independence" fallacy simply cannot be established, the international community should be alert and share concerns and condemnation.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated in the afternoon that when US National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan met with Wang Yi, Director of the Office of the Foreign Affairs Commission of the CPC Central Committee and Minister of Foreign Affairs, in Bangkok, Thailand, from the January 26-27, he emphasised the importance of maintaining peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait. Once again, we firmly and publicly reaffirm our firm stance of supporting the maintenance of peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait and express our sincere welcome and gratitude.

On the other hand, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs also noticed that the news released by the Chinese foreign ministry falsely stated that "The Taiwan issue is China's internal affairs, and elections in the Taiwan region cannot change the basic fact that Taiwan is a part of China. The biggest risk to peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait is" "Taiwan independence", the biggest challenge to Sino-US relations is also "Taiwan independence."

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs reiterated that Taiwan, the Republic of China, is a sovereign and independent country and is not affiliated with the People's Republic of China. Taiwan's presidential election on January 13 fully demonstrated Taiwan's democratic politics. It has received the heartfelt blessings of more than 100 countries around the world, once again verifying the facts and status quo that have been recognized by the international community for many years. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs solemnly refutes and condemns China's repeated malicious spread of claims that distort Taiwan's sovereign status.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs solemnly stated that Taiwan has always been committed to maintaining the status quo to maintain peace and stability in the region and across the Taiwan Strait. However, China has continued to provoke and threaten neighbouring countries, using pretexts to increase regional tensions, intending to change the status quo and undermine the rules-based international order, and repeatedly used the Taiwan Strait issue to hold other countries hostage and sow discord between Taiwan and other countries, fully highlighting that China is the troublemaker that undermines regional and Taiwan Strait peace and stability. China's so-called "Taiwan independence" fallacy cannot be established at all. The international community should be vigilant and share concerns and condemnations.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs emphasized that the international community is welcome to continue to pay attention to the security of the Taiwan Strait, and Taiwan will continue to work closely with the United States and other countries with similar ideals to jointly safeguard the shared values of democracy and freedom to maintain peace, stability, and prosperity across the Taiwan Strait and the region.

Beijing Continues Military Operations Near Taiwan After US and China Announce Talks

28 January 2024, NTD

China sent more than 30 warplanes and a group of navy ships toward Taiwan following an announcement that senior American and Chinese representatives were going to discuss Taiwan during a meeting in Thailand's capital, Bangkok, the island's defense ministry said Saturday.

China's army sent 33 aircraft and six navy vessels around Taiwan, between 6 a.m. Friday and 6 a.m. Saturday. Of these, 13 warplanes crossed the midline of the Taiwan Strait—an unofficial boundary that's considered a buffer between the island and mainland. Taiwan has monitored the situation and employed its own forces in response to the activities. Top Chinese and U.S. officials held candid talks in Bangkok aimed at lowering tensions between the superpowers on Taiwan and other subjects, ahead of an expected springtime call between U.S. President Joe Biden and Chinese leader Xi Jinping.

U.S. national security adviser Jake Sullivan pressed Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi to use his country's diplomatic influence to convince Iran to curtail support for Houthis attacking Red Sea merchant vessels, according to a senior Biden administration official.

The meetings, which spanned more than 12 hours over two days and wrapped up on Saturday, are intended to deliver on President Biden and Xi's agreement at a California summit in November to restore ruptured diplomatic talks on a range of global security and economic issues like defense and counter-narcotics, despite significant disagreements.

China's foreign ministry and the White House said in statements that the two sides had agreed to keep in contact to manage sensitive issues.

U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken is expected to travel to Beijing and more military-to-military talks are planned for the coming months, and counter-narcotics talks start between the countries on Tuesday in Beijing.

China criticized the United States on Thursday for causing "trouble and provocation" after the U.S. Navy sailed its first warship through waters separating China and Taiwan since the election.

The United States switched diplomatic recognition from Taipei to Beijing in 1979 and has long said it does not support a formal declaration of independence by Taiwan. It does, however, maintain unofficial relations with the self-governed island and remains its most important backer and arms supplier. President Biden previously upset the Chinese communist regime with comments that appeared to suggest the United States would defend the island if it were attacked. That stance deviates from Washington's long-held position of "strategic ambiguity."

Open conflict between China and Taiwan in a U.S. presidential election year would strain the U.S. economy and stretch President Biden's national security team, which is already dealing with a grinding Ukraine-Russia war, the Red Sea Houthi attacks, and an Israel-Gaza conflict that has divided Biden's voter base.

China's struggling economy may dampen Beijing's appetite for a more combative relationship with Washington.

Recently six Chinese balloons were flown over Taiwan or through its northern airspace days after the island elected Lai Ching-te as its new president. Mr. Lai's Democratic Progressive Party largely campaigned on self-determination and a rejection of China's threats.

President Biden and Xi met on the sidelines of a summit in November in an effort to patch up frayed relations due to quarrels over a range of economic and geopolitical issues.

U.S. lawmakers, in their first visit to the island since its elections, told Taiwan to "rest assured" that they have firm support from Washington during a meeting last week with President-elect Lai and outgoing President Tsai Ing-wen.

Mr. Lai said he hopes that the United States can continue to firmly support Taiwan.

On the military front, Taiwan has increased the service period for its conscripts from 4 months to one year, with the extension announced in late 2022 by Ms. Tsai as a response to the government's concerns about China's military threat.

In recent years the Chinese regime has ramped up military, diplomatic, and economic pressure on Taiwan.

That has included almost daily Chinese air force missions near the island over the last four years.

The period of military service in Taiwan is still shorter than the 18 months mandated in South Korea, which faces a hostile and nuclear-armed North Korea.

A Taipei-based think tank estimated the extended conscription could add an extra 60,000 to 70,000 soldiers annually to the current 165,000-strong professional force.

'Taiwan independence' an obstacle to China-US relations, says Beijing

27 January 2024, Aljazeera

Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and US National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan met to discuss competition and cooperation between the two countries.

Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and United States National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan have held talks aimed at keeping in contact, both sides said, with Wang stressing that "Taiwan independence" posed the biggest risk to Sino-US ties.

Wang and Sullivan met in Bangkok, Thailand, on Saturday, just more than two months after US President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping met on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in San Francisco.

The two "had candid, substantive and fruitful strategic communication on implementing the consensus reach at the San Francisco meeting ... and on properly handling important and sensitive issues in China-US relations," China's foreign ministry said in a statement.

The White House said that the meeting between the officials was "part of the effort to maintain open lines of communication" between the two countries.

It added that "Sullivan stressed that although the United States and China are in competition, both countries need to prevent it from veering into conflict or confrontation".

Beijing and Washington have previously clashed on issues related to technology, trade, human rights, and Taiwan, which China claims as its territory.

Taiwan

The recent Taiwanese election saw the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) secure a third term. The DPP is resistant to China's claim over Taiwan.

This week, two US lawmakers met Taiwan's new leader, Lai Ching-te, to reaffirm Washington's support for the self-governing island.

This was the second group to arrive in Taiwan since the election after Biden sent an unofficial delegation to congratulate Lai two days after the vote.

But, according to China's foreign ministry, Wang stressed in the meeting with Sullivan that Taiwan was "China's internal affair, and the regional election in Taiwan cannot change the basic reality that Taiwan is part of China".

"The biggest risk to peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait is the so-called 'Taiwan independence' movement. The biggest challenge to China-US relations is also the 'Taiwan independence' movement," it added.

Before the meeting, Taiwan's defence ministry said China sent 33 aircraft, including SU-30 fighters and six navy vessels, around Taiwan between 6am Friday to 6am Saturday (22:00 Thursday - 22:00 Friday GMT). Among those sent, 13 warplanes crossed the Taiwan Strait, an unofficial boundary between Taiwan and China.

The White House said Sullivan "underscored the importance of maintaining peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait" without elaborating.

High-level diplomacy

Apart from cross-strait issues, the officials also touched on other issues, including Russia's war against Ukraine, Iran and the Middle East, North Korea, the South China Sea, and Myanmar, the White House said.

Both sides agreed that the two presidents would keep regular contact, provide strategic guidance on bilateral relations and promote exchanges between the US and China in different areas and levels, the Chinese ministry said.

The two sides will set up a call between President Xi and President Biden, the White House said in a statement, as part of “high-level diplomacy” efforts.

They also agreed to launch a joint working group on anti-drug cooperation and set up an intergovernmental dialogue on artificial intelligence.

Sullivan and Wang “recognised recent progress in resuming military-to-military communication and noted the importance of maintaining these channels”, the White House added.

Taiwan says it spots six more Chinese balloons, one crossed island

22 January 2024, Reuters

TAIPEI, Jan 22 (Reuters) - Taiwan's defence ministry said it had detected six more Chinese balloons flying over the Taiwan Strait on Sunday, one of which crossed the island, the latest in a spate of such balloons the ministry says it has seen over the past month-and-a-half.

The ministry earlier this month, in a strongly worded statement, accused China of threatening aviation safety and waging psychological warfare on the island's people with the balloons, days before Taiwan's Jan. 13 elections.

China's defence ministry, which last month declined to comment on the balloons, did not immediately respond to a request for comment. China claims Taiwan as its own territory, despite the strong objections of the government in Taipei.

The potential for China to use balloons for spying became a global issue last February when the United States shot down what it said was a Chinese surveillance balloon. China said the balloon was a civilian craft that accidentally drifted astray.

In the latest incident, revealed by the ministry on Monday in its daily report on Chinese military activities over the past 24 hours, it said six balloons had flown over the strait's sensitive median line on Sunday.

However, only one crossed Taiwan island, at its southern tip, according to a map the ministry provided.

The other five balloons flew to the north of Taiwan but did not fly over land, the ministry said.

The balloons all headed east before vanishing, it added.

The Taiwan Strait's median line previously served as an unofficial barrier between Taiwan and China, but Chinese fighter jets, drones and now balloons regularly fly over it.

China says it does not recognise the existence of the median line.

Purges in China's military allow Taiwan some respite – for now

20 January 2024, Aljazeera

Turmoil in China's senior ranks raises questions about morale and whether the chaos reduces the threat to Taiwan.

Danny Jia was walking down a street outside Taiwan's Taoyuan city in late December when he suddenly heard automatic gunfire.

Not far from Jia's location that morning, the 249th mechanised infantry brigade of the Taiwanese armed forces was conducting military drills at Guanyin beach on the island's northwest coast.

“I was so startled that I almost dropped my phone,” the 46-year-old civil servant told Al Jazeera.

“The exercises are also a scary reminder that a war might actually come to Taiwan in the future,” Jia said.

Guanyin beach is one of Taiwan's so-called “red beaches” – stretches of the coastline that in the event of a Chinese invasion, offer the most favourable conditions for amphibious landing assaults.

For China's military planners, Guanyin beach would be particularly suitable as it lies less than 18 kilometres (11 miles) from Taiwan's primary international airport, and only about 50 kilometres (31 miles) from the outskirts of the Taiwanese capital, Taipei.

Democratic and self-ruled Taiwan has never been part of the People's Republic of China (PRC), but Beijing considers Taiwan to be part of its territory and has not ruled out using force to bring the island under its control.

In his new year speech, Chinese President Xi Jinping called Taiwan's unification with mainland China “inevitable”.

With the ever-present threat of China's troops spilling onto Taiwan's shores one day, Jia believes that the military drills on red beaches serve an important purpose in preparing the Taiwanese military for the worst.

Recently, however, Jia has found himself convinced that such a scenario is far from certain due to events in China's own military ranks.

At the end of December, nine high-ranking military officers were removed from their positions.

Several of those axed were from the Chinese military's elite “rocket force”, which oversees China's tactical and nuclear missiles.

Earlier, in August, two leading figures in the rocket force were likewise removed.

That same month, the then-Chinese defence minister, Li Shuangfu, went missing.

Li has since been dismissed and replaced by Dong Jun.

With so many changes among the top brass, Jia said he failed to see how the Chinese armed forces could be prepared for the complex planning involved in a large-scale assault on Taiwan in the near future.

"I think there is too much chaos in China's military for that," he said.

A limited Taiwanese respite

People in Taiwan have reasons to feel more secure, according to Christina Chen, a research fellow at Taiwan's Institute for National Defense and Security Research (INDSR) think tank.

"The removal of senior officers demonstrates that Xi Jinping is clearly not confident in the military, and that reduces the likelihood of a Chinese attack on Taiwan in the near term," Chen told Al Jazeera.

The relatively large number of Chinese officers expelled in such a short time can also affect the armed forces' fighting spirit as uncertainty spreads as to who will be targeted next.

"More removals might follow and that could further weaken the morale of the military and its ability to fight," Chen said.

While the risk of an imminent conflict in the Taiwan Strait may have been reduced, Chen sees Beijing's long-term goal of taking over Taiwan staying firmly in place.

China's new defence minister, Dong Jun, has experience with military matters regarding Taiwan from his previous roles as commander of the Chinese navy, deputy commander of the Southern Theatre Command and deputy commander of China's East Sea Fleet.

Although a defence minister serves mostly a diplomatic and public role in China, the appointment of the highly experienced Dong Jun was not arbitrary, according to Chen.

It reflects Beijing's overall ambition of turning China into a maritime power that can rival the United States and eventually annex Taiwan, she said.

Beijing has in recent years increasingly projected its growing maritime and air power in Taiwan's direction.

Airborne and maritime incursions into Taiwan's air and sea space have become a daily occurrence by the Chinese armed forces.

Sabre-rattling rhetoric and large-scale military drills in the waters close to Taiwan have also accompanied times of particular tension.

This was the case in the aftermath of then-US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taipei in 2022 and after Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen's stopover in San Francisco last year where she met with Pelosi's successor, Kevin McCarthy.

Some observers expect a similarly assertive Chinese reaction leading up to President-elect William Lai Ching-te taking office in May following his victory in the Taiwanese presidential election on January 13.

Beijing has branded Lai a separatist and declared that the election result would not change the Chinese government's stance on Taiwan's unification with the mainland.

Chen sees Beijing's pressure campaign directed at Taiwan continuing despite the dismissals in the Chinese military ranks.

"That will not change no matter how many military officers are removed," she said.

The biggest purge

According to Associate Professor Alfred Wu, a scholar specialising in corruption and governance in China at the National University of Singapore, the removal of Chinese military officials is more than a simple shake-up.

"In addition to the anticorruption effort, it is a purge," Wu told Al Jazeera.

"Xi Jinping is strengthening his hold over the military and sending a signal to all those that are not completely aligned with him that they might be next and therefore should be afraid," he said.

Wu described the use of fear as a tool employed to try to secure loyalty in China's authoritarian state structure where a lack of oversight and transparency can easily result in corruption and poor governance. Since Xi came to power in 2012, several anticorruption campaigns have resulted in purges throughout the Chinese state apparatus.

The Chinese military has long had a reputation for corruption, but the fact that the army's elite rocket force has been targeted is unprecedented.

The scale of the crackdown has left observers describing it as one of the biggest in Chinese military history.

Under the rule of Xi, who has called for the military's absolute loyalty, purges are, in Wu's words, "a continuous process".

Purges might even grow in frequency and magnitude, according to Wu, as the legitimacy that the Chinese government enjoyed during the country's economic boom years comes under strain at a time when the Chinese economy is showing signs of weakness.

"The economic situation might cause insecurity to grow within the Chinese government leading them to take more hawkish steps to secure loyalty within the state and in the military," he said.

However, continuing purges within the Chinese military may have a lingering impact on its capabilities.

"It's difficult to fight a war if many of your generals are in jail," Wu said.

Back on the outskirts of Taoyuan city near one of Taiwan's "red beaches", Jia, the civil servant who was startled by the military exercises in December, said that he doesn't wish ill on anyone.

But he also hopes the purges continue if they protect peace.

"I hope that more Chinese officers will lose their jobs if it means we won't get a war."

Taiwan's top diplomat sets record straight on China: 'We want the status quo. We want the way it is'

19 January 2024, Fortune

Taiwan's top diplomat in Washington has a message for both the island's Chinese adversaries and its American friends: Don't worry that Taiwan's new president-elect will worsen relations with Beijing and possibly draw the U.S. into a conflict.

President-elect Lai Ching-te plans to keep the status quo in the Taiwan Strait, Alexander Tah-Ray Yui told The Associated Press on Thursday in his first interview with an international news organization since he arrived in the U.S. in December.

The Chinese government has called Lai a troublemaker who will push Taiwan toward independence. But Yui said Lai is willing to engage with Beijing, even as the island seeks to strengthen its unofficial ties with Washington for stability in the region.

"We want the status quo. We want the way it is — neither unification, neither independence. The way it is is the way we want to live right now," said Yui, Taiwan's de-facto ambassador to the U.S., noting the stance is largely supported at home and will guide the new administration.

Yui spoke to the AP five days after Lai won the presidential election with more than 40% of the vote in a three-way race. Lai will succeed Tsai Ing-wen when he is inaugurated in May.

His victory, which gives the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party an unprecedented third presidential term, was not welcomed by Beijing, which claims Taiwan as its own, to be taken by force if necessary.

Military action in the Taiwan Strait could draw in the United States, which is obligated under a 1979 law to provide Taiwan with sufficient military hardware and technology.

Beijing refused to have any dialogue with Tsai because her party rejects China's claim of sovereignty over the island, and before the election had suggested to voters that they could be choosing between war and peace.

It remains unclear if Beijing will be willing to engage with Lai, who in the past described himself as a "pragmatic worker of Taiwan's independence."

Two days after Lai was elected, China wooed away Nauru, a small Pacific island nation, which has left Taiwan with only 12 countries around the world that recognize its statehood. However, China has not launched massive military exercises around the island, as it has in past times of increased tensions.

Yui said Lai intends to follow the same line as his predecessor "but also to offer an olive branch to mainland China by saying that he's also willing to engage with mainland China."

At the same time, Taiwan will work with the U.S. to boost its defense and deepen economic and cultural ties, Yui said, calling relations with Washington "one of the most important aspects in our foreign affairs."

The United States does not have a formal relationship with Taiwan, but it has stepped up its support in the past several years, angering China, which has urged the U.S. to "exercise extreme prudence in handling Taiwan-related issues." President Xi Jinping told President Joe Biden that Taiwan is the most sensitive issue in U.S.-China relations.

Shortly after Taiwan's election, Biden told reporters that his administration does not support Taiwan's independence.

Scott Kennedy, senior adviser and trustee chair in Chinese business and economics at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington-based think tank, said he expected tensions to remain largely the same under Lai.

"Beijing will continue to develop its military capabilities and push the boundaries of military threats and economic coercion," he said. "The U.S. will continue to assist Taiwan with its defensive preparedness and push Taiwan to move more assertively on the various elements needed for effective self-defense."

But Kennedy said Beijing may also open up some channels for the two sides to convey messages and reduce misunderstanding.

Yui said it is incumbent upon both Beijing and Taipei to keep the Taiwan Strait peaceful.

"I have to stress, we're not the aggressors. We're not the ones, you know, making waves in the Taiwan Strait, making things nervous and tense," he said, alluding to Beijing's increased military activities near the island in the past several years.

Yui said Taiwan is determined to safeguard its homeland, noting that the island is increasing its defense budget and has extended the mandatory military service from four months to one year.

He said Beijing's luring away of Nauru was an attempt to punish the Taiwanese people for choosing the leader they wanted and will only backfire.

"They were just trying to find an appropriate time and excuse to slowly pluck all of our allies," Yui said. But, as a technological powerhouse and a democracy, Taiwan has “become a common word in the international community” and countries around the world have become more willing to engage with it, he said.

Yui, who met with Republican House Speaker Mike Johnson shortly before Taiwan’s election, said he’s been encouraged by the support from both the Republicans and Democrats.

“If you go to the U.S. Congress, your heart warms up because everywhere you go you meet friends,” he said.

Sen. Ben Cardin, the Democratic chair of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, called Taiwan “a key U.S. partner in the Indo-Pacific and beyond” and said he would be “working closely with the newly elected leadership of Taiwan to deepen our economic, security, and people-to-people ties.”

Yui, who was born to a diplomat’s family, attended high school in Panama and received both his bachelor’s and master’s degrees from Texas A&M University. He previously served as Taiwan’s ambassador to Paraguay and as its vice foreign minister.

Before he came to Washington, Yui briefly served as Taiwan’s representative to the European Union and Belgium. Yui succeeded Hsiao Bi-Khim, who left the post in November to be Lai’s running mate. Hsiao, who is credited with deepening Taiwan-U.S. ties when heading the Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office in the United States between 2020 and 2023, will be the next vice president.

How China’s public views Taiwan’s elections

18 January 2024, The Economist

Ordinary Chinese express no eagerness for war, but back threats of force

As china’s rulers tell it, the Communist Party must control Taiwan to make the whole country safe and strong. “Unification brings strength while division leads to chaos,” says the State Council, China’s cabinet. “This is a law of history.”

Actually, the party’s obsession with Taiwan is a political choice. After 1991 China signed a series of treaties fixing its borders with the Soviet Union and Russia, in effect ceding over a million square kilometres of Chinese territory grabbed by Russia in the 19th century. No law of history forbade that decision to forget past wrongs.

Taiwan is different because it represents a direct affront to the Communist Party. That dates back to 1949 when the island became the home-in-exile of the Nationalist regime defeated by Mao Zedong and the People’s Liberation Army (pla) in the Chinese civil war. If Xi Jinping could take Taiwan, he would be the final victor of a war that Mao could not end. In contrast, letting the island slip out of China’s grasp would undermine the party’s legitimacy, or so Chinese scholars claim.

Political self-interest, then, explains decades of investments to build up the pla, with a focus on deterring America from coming to the island’s rescue. It explains, too, threats to use force should Taiwan declare formal independence. Those are political calculations. They make the world more dangerous than it needs to be.

Still, there is another self-serving choice by China’s leaders that arguably keeps the peace in the Taiwan Strait. That choice involves telling the Chinese public—despite much evidence to the contrary—that most Taiwanese long to be part of China, but are thwarted by separatists egged on by America, Japan and other hostile foreign powers. This is a gambit. Mr Xi enjoys more room for manoeuvre as long as lots of ordinary Chinese believe that Taiwan may one day embrace “peaceful reunification”.

The tactic can be seen at work since Taiwan’s presidential election on January 13th was won by the Communist Party’s least-favoured candidate, Lai Ching-te. Mr Lai’s win marks the third presidential term in a row for the Democratic Progressive Party (dpp), which emphasises Taiwan’s separate, democratic identity. Yet since that victory, mainland propaganda outlets have downplayed its significance and played up the dpp’s poor showing in parliamentary elections held the same day. Chen Binhua, a spokesman for China’s Taiwan Affairs Office, assured the Chinese public that the elections show that the dpp “does not represent mainstream public opinion” in Taiwan. Rather than stoke anger, party media dug up soothing past comments by Mr Xi about the need to woo “patriotic”, pro-unification forces on the island.

Rather than stoke anger, party media dug up soothing past comments by Mr Xi about the need to woo “patriotic”, pro-unification forces on the island.

It is unclear how angry China's public is even ready to be, after years of being told that most Taiwanese are their blood brothers. When researchers from the South China University of Technology and the National University of Singapore polled Chinese people in nine cities in 2019, they found almost 40% ready to rule out unifying Taiwan with the mainland by force under any circumstances.

A paper for the Journal of Contemporary China, published in 2022, records the survey organisers' surprise that support for keeping force on the table as an option was highest among the well-educated and those knowledgeable about Taiwan. Qi Dongtao, a lead author, suggests that well-informed Chinese may not be war hawks as such, but simply more aware than regular folk that Taiwan is not about to submit peacefully to Beijing.

To sample the post-election mood, Chaguan flew south to Xiamen. The Chinese port city enjoys close economic and cultural ties to Taiwan—and would be on the front line in a war. Serving as a reminder is Hulishan Fortress, whose weathered cannons point at an outlying Taiwanese island, Jinmen, just 27km (17 miles) offshore. In the Mao era, the pla shelled Jinmen. The fort acted as a military radio base. Now a museum, it hosts tourists who tended to flee when asked questions about politics. Those who stuck around offered strikingly diverse views.

A middle-aged woman from Tianjin, strolling on the beach below the fort, expressed confidence that most Taiwanese support unification. She did not know the election results but had recently seen online reports about islanders travelling to an ice festival in the city of Harbin, in China's frozen north. “We should promote this kind of contact,” she enthused. That said, she supported threats of force as an option, venturing that “toughness” by China's leaders should balance “softness” towards Taiwan's people.

Talking of war and peace, in a fort

Up in the fort a retired man from Ningbo, a coastal city, stood taking pictures of Jinmen through the mist. The photographer disclosed that his own father served in China's navy and was killed in the Taiwan Strait in the late 1960s. His family's loss makes him long for peace, he said, adding that China needs to become more appealing, economically, politically and culturally, if Taiwan is to choose unification. Yet his patience co-exists with a belief that force cannot be ruled out. “If we promise to give up the threat of force altogether, and promise that in front of the world, then the island would just declare its independence, right?” he asked.

A university student from Shanghai saw Mr Lai's victory as a sign of trouble ahead, but called the election the will of Taiwan's voters. “Among my generation, I know few who want a war. Whereas some older people may hope that we can recover Taiwan by force one day,” he worried.

The student was not wrong. A former rural official from the province of Jiangsu was encountered briskly climbing the fort's stone steps with his granddaughter, though he turns 85 next month. Every place wants to be ruled by its own king, he declared, and Taiwan has been separate for too long. “We have to reunite with Taiwan by force.” Indeed, if the pla were not powerful, Britain would not have given Hong Kong back, the old man added with a glare. Having laid down that law of history, off he marched.

'China most likely to win war against US over Taiwan': Niall Ferguson

17 January 2024, Business Today

China would be more likely to win the war because its manufacturing capacity is now so much greater than the US, said Niall Ferguson

Historian and author Niall Ferguson on Tuesday predicted that China is most likely to win the war against the United States (US) over Taiwan – a self-governing island that Beijing considers as its own territory. He said his advice to policymakers in Washington would be to not go to war with China. Ferguson said China is spending a huge amount of money on defence and that its navy is already the biggest in the world.

"It's (China) building a navy that, in terms of numbers of boats, is already the biggest in the world. It is building a nuclear arsenal, which does not get nearly enough attention. But there is a huge threat to global stability. Right now, if there were a showdown between the US and China over Taiwan, I would not put money on the US winning that showdown," the historian said while speaking with India Today Group's Vice Chairperson & Executive Editor-in-Chief Kalli Purie and Business Today Executive Director Rahul Kanwal at WEF2024 in Davos.

Ferguson, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, said China would be more likely to win the war because its manufacturing capacity is now so much greater than the US. "If you look at the war games that have been done, one of the striking features is - how quickly the US runs out of precision missiles, in a week. Now, if you're going to run out of precision missiles in a week, you're not in great shape to win a war like that," the historian said.

"China's manufacturing capacity is now so much greater than the US, probably two times greater. If it came to a hot war, China would have some real advantages," he said, adding that his strong advice to the American policymakers would be - "Don't do this. Let's not have a showdown over Taiwan. You're not in the kind of position you were in back in the 1990s, the last time there was a Taiwan Strait crisis." Tensions between the US and China escalated in August 2022 after former US Speaker Nancy Pelosi visited Taiwan - the first high-profile visit to the territory in recent years that upset Beijing. China has, on multiple occasions, made its intent clear that is prepared to unify Taiwan by force, if required.

When asked whether Taiwan becoming a part of mainland China is inevitable at some point, the scholar said that he hopes not because Taiwan is a free society and a true democracy. "It shows that Chinese people can run a really exemplary democracy. But you have to ask yourself if its autonomy depends on an American military guarantee, how long can that last when the guarantee ceases to be credible?"

Ferguson said China's investment in its military is a serious cause for disquiet. But this, he added, cannot offset the fact that China's economy is slowing down and President Xi Jinping is facing serious issues in the real estate sector and rising youth unemployment. "The demographics are terrible. There's a scenario in which the population halves between now and the end of the century. It's hard for me to see that China's power is there for the long term. Youth unemployment is past 20%."

"These are serious problems for Xi Jinping that they may make him take strategic risks. Sometimes it is when things are going badly that authoritarian regimes do reckless things," the historian said.

Taiwan earlier this month elected its new president, Lai Ching-te – who calls the island "an independent sovereign state". Ferguson said that so far nothing bad has happened from China but it may happen in the future.

"It feels like we have probably avoided a crisis this year. But at some point in the next few years, I am afraid there is bound to be a Taiwan crisis. And when that happens, that will be the real test of the US-India relationship. Where will India be in that scenario? My guess is not picking up the phone kind of busy this weekend."

FM spokesperson: China firmly opposes US passing of Taiwan-related act

17 January 2024, Xinhua

China strongly deplores and firmly opposes the United States passing the so-called Taiwan-related act, and has made serious representations to the U.S. side, a foreign ministry spokesperson said on Tuesday.

It is reported that the U.S. House of Representatives recently passed the Taiwan Non-Discrimination Act of 2023, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to use America's influence in the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to support Taiwan's membership in this organization.

In response to a related query, spokesperson Mao Ning told a daily news briefing that the United States passed the so-called act to grossly interfere in China's internal affairs and attempt to manipulate the Taiwan question for political purposes to create "two Chinas" and "one China, one Taiwan." "We strongly deplore and firmly oppose this, and have made serious representations to the U.S. side."

"Taiwan does not have any ground, reason, or right to join the UN, or any other international organization whose membership is confined to sovereign states," Mao stressed.

Mao noted that on Oct. 25, 1971, the 26th Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted, with an overwhelming majority, Resolution 2758, which "decides to restore all its rights to the People's Republic of China and to recognize the representatives of its Government as the only legitimate representatives of China to the United Nations", and to expel forthwith the representatives of the Taiwan authorities "from the place which they unlawfully occupy."

Once and for all, UNGA Resolution 2758 resolved, politically, legally and procedurally, the issue of the representation of the whole of China, including Taiwan, at the UN. It also made it clear that there can only be one seat representing China at the UN, and that is the People's Republic of China, Mao said. Over the past half century and more, Resolution 2758 has been observed by the UN, special agencies such as the IMF, and other international and regional organizations, Mao said, adding that any issues regarding the Taiwan region's participation in the activities of international organizations must be handled in accordance with the one-China principle.

The United States should fully understand the highly sensitive nature of the Taiwan question and immediately stop using the Taiwan question to interfere in China's internal affairs, sending wrong signals to the "Taiwan independence" forces and undermining China-U.S. relations and peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait, Mao said.

China says threats of force over Taiwan not aimed at most Taiwanese

17 January 2024, Reuters

BEIJING, Jan 17 (Reuters) - China's position that it will not renounce using force to bring Taiwan under its control is aimed at foreign interference and a tiny number of separatists, but Taiwanese need to be disabused of "biases" against China, the government said on Wednesday.

Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), which won the presidential election on Saturday, rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims but has repeatedly offered talks that have been rebuffed.

China views president-elect Lai Ching-te as a dangerous separatist.

Chen Binhua, spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office, told a regular news briefing in Beijing that the result of Taiwan's election does not change the fact that the island is Chinese and will eventually be "reunified".

"Our not promising to renounce the use of force is absolutely not targeted at Taiwan compatriots. We are targeting interference from external forces and the tiny number of Taiwan independence separatists and their separatist activities," Chen said.

Over the past year-and-a-half China has twice staged large-scale war games around Taiwan and regularly sends fighter jets and warships into the Taiwan Strait. Mainstream public opinion in Taiwan wants peace not war, exchanges not distance, and to "take down" the DPP, he said, reiterating the office's comment on Saturday following Lai's victory with less than 50 pct of the vote and the loss of the DPP's parliamentary majority.

"If the DPP does not repent and goes further and further on the wicked path of seeking 'independence' provocations, it will only push Taiwan into a dangerous situation and bring serious harm to Taiwan," he said.

Chen said Taiwanese are "our flesh and blood", but some have been "poisoned" by ideas of independence and have a "biased understanding" of relations across the strait and national identity.

"We are willing to maintain sufficient patience and tolerance, continue to deepen the understanding of the mainland of the motherland by the majority of Taiwanese compatriots, and gradually reduce their misunderstandings and doubts," he added.

"We hope and believe that our compatriots in Taiwan can firmly stand on the right side of history and be upright Chinese people."

As if to underscore those differences in understanding, Chen told off a Taiwanese reporter for using "Beijing" to refer to China, saying the correct wording was "the mainland".

Opinion polls in Taiwan show an overwhelming number of people these days consider themselves Taiwanese not Chinese, and close to no support for China's "one country, two systems" model of autonomy to get the island to accept Beijing's rule.

However, Chen did not mention Lai, who takes office on May 20, by name, unlike before the election when the Taiwan Affairs Office repeatedly and directly called him a separatist and danger to peace. China says talks can only happen under the proviso Taiwan recognises both sides of the Taiwan Strait are part of "one China", which the DPP-led government has refused to do.

Lianhe Zaobao: China's Weibo Blocked "Taiwanese Election" Search Results on Election Day

16 January 2024, ChinaScope

Singapore's primary Chinese language newspaper Lianhe Zaobao recently reported that Taiwan's presidential and legislative elections took place on January 13, and Mainland Chinese netizens were paying close attention to the election results. After voting began at 8 a.m. that day, the relevant term "Taiwan Election" was on the "hot search ranking list" on Weibo, one of the largest social media platforms in Mainland China. The number of views on the topic quickly reached 163.2 million. However, the popular topic was soon blocked on Weibo.

Before the "Taiwan Elections" topic was blocked, many Mainland Chinese netizens posted comments and discussion on this topic. Some netizens called for improving relations between Mainland China and Taiwan after the Taiwanese election, and some netizens expressed their hopes for the DPP's presidential candidate Lai Ching-te to win the election so that the Chinese military would "unify by force" sooner. (Taiwan's DDP party, which won the presidency in the election, is the party that's most opposed to cooperation with Beijing.)

Since Chinese official media, including Xinhua News Agency, CCTV News and People's Daily, had very little coverage of the Taiwan election that day, some netizens asked on Weibo: "Is today the voting day for Taiwan? Why is there no news coverage?" Many related topics were blocked on Weibo as well. The Spokesperson of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs said in a press conference two days earlier that "the United States must not interfere in Taiwan's elections in any form" – this quote remained visible on Weibo.

China's Taiwan approach 'has been counterproductive,' Blinken says

16 January 2024, CNBC

Secretary of State Antony Blinken said Tuesday that China's growing aggression toward Taiwan has undermined the country's own interests.

"I think the approach that they've shown in recent years has actually been totally counterproductive to their interests," Blinken said at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland on CNBC's "Squawk on the Street."

Taiwan is an epicenter for the production of semiconductors, which China relies on, and the adjacent Taiwan Strait is a major commercial route that has implications for economic stability in the region.

Blinken's comments come days after Taiwan voters elected the Democratic Progressive Party's Lai Ching-te to serve as the next president. Of the candidates, Lai was Beijing's least favorite as he would likely maintain the DPP's status quo when it comes to relations with mainland China and the U.S.

In the weeks leading up to the election, Taiwan officials reported several attempts by the Chinese government to sway the election via escalating military pressure and disinformation campaigns.

Despite China's distaste for Lai, the White House has been supportive, issuing several congratulatory statements for the president-elect. That has further angered Beijing.

"The US State Department's statement on the election in China's Taiwan region seriously violates the one-China principle and the three China-US joint communiqués, and goes against the US' own political commitment to maintaining only cultural, commercial, and other unofficial relations with the people of Taiwan," China's Foreign Ministry wrote in a statement Sunday.

"It also sends a gravely wrong signal to the 'Taiwan independence' separatist forces. We strongly deplore and firmly oppose this, and have made serious representations to the US side," the statement said.

At Davos, Blinken reiterated the official U.S. stance on Taiwan and China, which simultaneously supports Taiwan's democratic systems but does not support its independence.

The outcome of Taiwan's election would inevitably have ripple effects on the geopolitical climate and economic landscape. The U.S. has been preparing accordingly.

Days before Taiwan voters took to the polls, the White House said it was preparing various contingency plans for a possible "period of higher tension."

"I don't want to get into specifics on those, but of course, we have to be prepared and thinking through any eventuality ... ranging from no response to the higher end," a senior administration official said Wednesday.

China, which claims sovereignty over Taiwan, has made clear its intentions to reunify the island with the mainland, including during President Joe Biden's one-on-one meeting with Chinese President Xi Jinping. China has not ruled out military force to execute that goal.

"What we're focused on is maintaining peace and stability and we've been very clear with China about that and we've been very clear with Taiwan about that," Blinken said.

Taiwan election: China says US 'gravely wrong' to congratulate new leader

14 January 2024, BBC

China has accused the US of sending "a gravely wrong signal" to those pushing for Taiwan's independence after Saturday's election result.

US Secretary of State Antony Blinken sent Taiwanese president-elect William Lai a message of congratulations following the result.

Beijing called the message a violation of Washington's commitment to maintain only unofficial ties with Taiwan.

Mr Lai has vowed to protect Taiwan from an increasingly aggressive China.

But Beijing sees Taiwan as its territory and fiercely challenges any government that says otherwise.

Messages of congratulations for Taiwan's new leader poured in from all over the world after the election, including from Mr Blinken - who emphasised the partnership between Taipei and Washington, which he said was rooted in democratic values.

"We look forward to working with Dr Lai and Taiwan's leaders of all parties to advance our shared interests and values," he said in a statement.

Mr Blinken also stressed that the US, one of Taiwan's biggest allies, is "committed to maintaining cross-strait peace and stability".

The top US diplomat was also quick to say that such collaboration should "further our longstanding unofficial relationship" and be "consistent with the US One China policy".

Under the policy, the US recognises and has formal ties with China rather than the island of Taiwan, which China sees as a breakaway province to be unified with the mainland one day.

Mr Blinken's remarks drew sharp criticism from Beijing, which views any statement of support for Taiwan as lending legitimacy to a candidate and political party it sees as a gang of separatists hoping to turn Taiwan into an independent sovereign nation. In a statement, China's foreign ministry said Mr Blinken's congratulations violated the US's promise to maintain "only cultural, commercial, and other unofficial relations" with Taiwan.

It stressed that the Taiwan question is "the first red line that must not be crossed in China-US relations" and said it had lodged a formal diplomatic complaint.

"China firmly opposes the US having any form of official interaction with Taiwan and interfering in Taiwan affairs in any way or under any pretext."

Beijing's statement will likely serve as a warning to Washington after it sent an unofficial delegation of former US officials to hold talks with leading political figures in Taiwan just hours after the self-ruled island elected Mr Lai.

Deployed by US President Joe Biden, who himself welcomed the election results, the delegation includes a former US national security adviser and a former deputy secretary of state.

Other Western countries, including the UK, France and Germany, congratulated the new leader.

Beijing's Communist government reviles Mr Lai's pro-sovereignty Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), which has governed Taiwan for eight years.

That is because China sees any statement of support towards the DPP as lending legitimacy to politicians, which Beijing sees as a gang of separatists hoping to turn Taiwan into an independent sovereign nation.

New Taiwan Government Faces Challenges in Policy, China Pressures

14 January 2024, VOA

MIAOLI, TAIWAN — Taiwanese voters handed Taiwan's pro-sovereignty ruling Democratic Progressive Party, or DPP, a historic victory in the island's presidential election over the weekend, despite pressure from China.

While several democratic countries around the world congratulated DPP's President-elect Lai Ching-te for his victory Saturday, Beijing claimed the election outcome doesn't reflect the mainstream public opinion in Taiwan and emphasized that Taiwan remains China's internal affair.

The United States, European Union, United Kingdom and Canada all congratulated the DPP for the win, with a U.S. State Department spokesperson praising Taiwan's people for "demonstrating the strength" of the island's robust democratic system.

In response, China's foreign ministry characterized Washington's message as a violation of the One China principle and said the basic fact that Taiwan is part of China will never change.

China considers Taiwan a wayward province and has never ruled out using force to take full control.

"The Taiwan question is at the very core of China's core interests and the first red line that must not be crossed in China-U.S. relations," said an unnamed Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson in a statement, urging Washington not to use the "Taiwan question" to contain China.

Hitting back at Beijing's claim over Taiwan, the island's foreign ministry said China's comments are inconsistent with the international perception and "contrary to the expectation of the global democratic community" as well as "the will of the Taiwanese people."

"This kind of rhetoric is not worth refuting," the ministry said in a statement.

With the DPP winning a third consecutive presidential term, some analysts say Taiwan is likely to continue to deepen ties with the U.S. and other like-minded democracies while Beijing may further increase pressure on Taipei.

"The messages from Washington show that Taiwan is an important ally to the U.S., and I think both sides will further deepen ties in the next four years," Chen Fang-yu, a political scientist at Soochow University in Taiwan, told VOA by phone.

Taiwan's Foreign Ministry announced Sunday that a U.S. delegation including former U.S. national security adviser Stephen Hadley and former Deputy Secretary of State James Steinberg, arrived in Taipei on Sunday for a three-day visit. The delegation is expected to meet Taiwan President Tsai Ing-wen, government officials and other political figures during the visit.

While U.S.-Taiwan ties will remain robust, some experts think Beijing will maintain the same amount of pressure on Taiwan, especially at a time when the island is expected to be governed under a divided government over the next four years. Following Saturday's election, no political party secured a majority in the legislature, which some analysts say may weaken the DPP's hold on power for the next four years.

"Beijing will less likely extend the olive branch toward the next DPP government," Wen-Ti Sung, a political scientist at the Australian National University, told VOA by phone.

In his view, since the DPP no longer has a majority in the legislature, the Chinese government may think the next Taiwanese government's hold on power is "delicate enough" that they can maintain a high level of pressure on Taipei. "This means the continued cross-strait tension seems to be in the offing," Sung added.

Ahead of Saturday's election, the Chinese government had repeatedly characterized the election as a choice between "war and peace" and criticized Taiwan's new president-elect as a "troublemaker" who spreads "Taiwan independence" remarks.

To maintain a high level of pressure on Taiwan, Beijing in recent weeks unleashed a series of measures to influence Taiwan's election, conducting military maneuvers in areas near the island and imposing targeted sanctions on certain Taiwanese products.

Some analysts think Beijing will continue to exert pressure on Taiwan but the effect of some of their measures, such as military maneuvers and economic coercion, may be limited. "Regarding the gray zone operations, I think Taiwan's population has more or less normalized it," Ian Chong, a political scientist at the National University of Singapore, told VOA by phone.

When it comes to coercive economic measures, Chong thinks China is only targeting commodities that won't harm its economic interests. "If Beijing really wanted to put pain on Taiwan, they would stop electronic imports and semiconductor imports," he said. "But they are not going to do that since it would hurt their economy."

Despite the limited effect of China's military and economic measures, Chong thinks Beijing is likely going to start forcing Taiwanese politicians, especially those with business interests in China, to toe the line mandated by the Chinese government.

"I'm sure Beijing will try to find new ways to put pressure on Taiwan, and they will try to pressure the Lai administration in the next year to see where they can force him into making mistakes," he said.

Since all three political parties failed to secure a majority in the legislature, Chen at Soochow University said the DPP will likely face obstacles when it comes to policy implementation. "Many important policies and personnel appointments may be blocked by opposition parties in the new legislature," Chen told VOA.

Apart from focusing on negotiating with opposition parties, Chen thinks the incoming administration led by Lai also needs to reestablish a connection with civil society, especially at a time when public opinion isn't supportive of the DPP.

"The DPP needs to create dialogue with civil society and try to use public opinion as a foundation to implement policies," he said.

Among different policy platforms, Chen thinks the two opposition parties, the China-friendly Kuomintang and the Taiwan People's Party, may try to make it tougher for the DPP to push through key policies related to Taiwan's bilateral relations, such as the U.S.-Taiwan Initiative on 21st Century Trade and U.S. arms sales to Taiwan.

"The split government situation will test the Lai administration's wisdom, such as how to negotiate with opposition parties and how to work with civil society groups," he said. "It's important for them to learn how to properly explain policy implementation to the public."

The incoming president takes office in May and will succeed Tsai Ing-wen, who has been in office since 2016.

Taiwan expects China to apply pressure on incoming government

12 January 2024, Reuters

TAIPEI, Jan 12 (Reuters) - Taiwan's government believes China is likely to attempt to put pressure on its incoming president after the island goes to the polls on Saturday, including staging military manoeuvres near the island this spring, two senior government officials said.

No matter which candidate wins the election, Beijing's military and economic pressure on Taiwan's next leader is likely to increase, said the Taiwanese officials who briefed reporters on condition they not be named.

Taiwan goes to the polls to elect a new president and parliament under the shadow of an increasingly assertive China which has called the vote a choice between "peace and war".

China and Taiwan's largest opposition party, the Kuomintang (KMT), warned on Thursday of the danger Taiwan's ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) presidential candidate Lai Ching-te could pose to peace if he wins election. Lai has pledged to pursue peace and engage with China if elected.

Beijing is likely to apply "great pressure" in a bid to influence the new president's inaugural address on May 20, which is expected to set the tone for the new administration's China policy, said one official, who has knowledge of Taiwan's security planning.

China's top Taiwan policy agency, the Taiwan Affairs Office, did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

MILITARY PRESSURE

China claims democratically-governed Taiwan as its own territory, against the strident objections of the government in Taipei, and has never renounced the use of force to bring it under China's control.

While large-scale military drills near Taiwan are unlikely immediately after the vote, Beijing is likely to stage manoeuvres near the island after March due to more favourable weather and sea conditions, the official said, citing Taiwan's security assessment.

The potential for further tensions over Taiwan, especially after China staged two rounds of major war games near the island in April of last year and August of 2022, is being closely watched in the region and by Washington and its allies.

Two Western security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity as they were not authorised to speak to the media, said China was likely to respond militarily at some point post election, though they did not believe it would be on the scale of the last two war games.

The Taiwan official said Beijing could also opt to limit any show of military force in the coming months because of considerations including improving U.S.-Chinese relations.

U.S.-China relationship tumbled to historic lows last year, but since President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping met in November and agreed to re-establish military-to-military ties, senior Chinese and US officials have staged meetings.

In the case that the party which wins the presidency fails to gain a parliamentary majority, China is likely to label the new administration a "minority government," the Taiwanese official said.

In what Taiwan views as a bid to weaken a new administration, China is also likely to invite pro-Beijing Taiwanese politicians to visit China and to continue what Taipei perceives as disinformation campaigns against the Taiwan government, the official said.

"They are likely to try to frustrate the confidence building of the new government," the official said.

China has not publicly named a preferred candidate, but has urged Taiwan voters to make "the right choice" after calling a vote for the DPP dangerous and threatening cross-Straits peace. The KMT traditionally favours close ties with China although it denies being pro-Beijing.

"We are not afraid" of China, said tech worker Charlie Lee, 61. "We already have a very strong democratic identity and will fight to the end."

Taiwan's defence ministry said on Friday it had detected five Chinese balloons flying over the Taiwan Strait over the past 24 hours, one of which crossed the island, the latest in a spate of such balloons the ministry says it has spotted over the past month.

Taiwan has described a range of actions by China, including the balloon flights, reports by China's state-media and threats of further trade sanctions as a form of psychological warfare on the island's people ahead of the vote.

"China's voting interference in Taiwan is a textbook example," the first Taiwanese official said. "Other countries must come and learn quickly."

China says election interference allegations are the DPP "dirty tricks" to win votes.

China looms large in Taiwan's presidential election

09 January 2024, Axios

Saturday's presidential election in Taiwan will be one of this year's most watched contests, as voters head to the polls to choose a new leader who will chart the future of the island's relations with China — a decision that will be felt far beyond the Indo-Pacific.

Why it matters: Taiwan is a potential U.S.-China flashpoint. Chinese leader Xi Jinping has repeatedly emphasized that China has the right to take Taiwan, by force if Beijing deems necessary.

- The U.S. has strong unofficial ties to Taiwan and President Biden has repeatedly said the U.S. would defend Taiwan if China attacked — though official U.S. policy regarding the defense of Taiwan is known as "strategic ambiguity," meaning the U.S. won't publicly state its actual intention.

The big picture: The election comes at a crucial time as the Chinese government ratchets up pressure on the self-governing democracy by deploying military, diplomatic and economic coercion in its attempts to convince the island's residents that unification with China is the only possible future.

- A top Chinese government official last week urged Taiwanese people to "stand on the right side of history" and make the "correct choice."
- The Chinese military has increased its incursions into the air and waters near Taiwan over the past month, and has sent high-altitude balloons over the island.
- Taiwan is a key U.S. partner in the region and is home to semiconductor manufacturer TSMC, the only facility in the world that makes certain critical components for smart phones, cars, and satellites.

The key players: This year's election features not just candidates from the two major parties but also a third candidate who seeks to disrupt the two-party system.

- The ruling Democratic Progressive Party's (DPP) William Lai is vice president to the current DPP president Tsai Ing-wen, who has advocated forcefully for Taiwan – attracting Beijing's ire. Lai, like Tsai, believes Taiwan should be an independent actor on the world stage and has described himself as a "pragmatic worker for Taiwanese independence." The Chinese foreign ministry has called him a "separatist through and through."
- The Kuomintang's (KMT) Hou You-yi is the popular mayor of New Taipei City and former police chief. He opposes Taiwan independence in favor of the status quo.
- The Taiwan People's Party's (TPP) Ko Wen-je, a former Taipei mayor, founded the TPP in 2019 and seeks to appeal to voters who are tired of the two major parties and want something new. His views on China fall somewhere between the DPP and KMT; he has called for both "deterrence and communication" with China.

Of note: The vice presidential picks for two of the three candidates highlight Taiwan's close relationship and people-to-people ties with the U.S. Lai's running mate, Taiwan's former representative to the U.S. Bih-khim Hsiao, spent parts of her childhood in the U.S. and Japan.

- Ko's running mate, business executive and politician Cynthia Wu, was born in the U.S.

Details: Campaign rhetoric this year has been acrimonious. KMT supporters resent eight continuous years of DPP rule, and Hou has accused the DPP of acting like a "dictatorship."

- Lai, meanwhile, has called the KMT's position on cross-strait relations "deadly" and accused the party's leaders of trying to "befriend the communists."
- Meanwhile, election-related misinformation has proliferated online, and disinformation experts say Beijing-linked actors have promoted stories that cast doubt on the efficacy and legitimacy of Taiwan's democracy and on the reliability of the U.S. as a partner.

What to watch: The DPP's Lai is the frontrunner for the presidential election, but the KMT and TPP are likely to prevail in legislative elections, denying the DPP control of Taiwan's legislature and creating a split government that would make it more difficult for Lai to accomplish his agenda.

- Beijing prefers a KMT-ruled Taiwan and could respond to a potential third DPP term by further increasing pressure on the island – potentially disrupting regional and global trade and transportation.

Beijing Postpones China-Japan-South Korea Summit so it can Focus on Taiwan's Presidential Election

05 January 2024, ChinaScope

According to diplomatic sources cited by South Korean newspaper Chosun Ilbo, China has proposed postponing the upcoming China-Japan-South Korea Summit (previously scheduled for March 2024) as Beijing wants to prioritize monitoring Taiwan's upcoming Presidential election (scheduled for January 13, 2024) and then focus on Taiwan-related issues during the following several months.

The last China-Japan-South Korea trilateral summit was held in Chengdu, China in 2019. Subsequent summits were canceled due to COVID. The three countries had planned to resume their trilateral summits in South Korea in 2023, but later decided to postpone until March 2024.

The meeting was expected to be attended by South Korean President Yoon Suk-yeol, Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida, and Chinese Premier Li Qiang.

China calls on Taiwan's people to promote 'peaceful reunification'

02 January 2024, Reuters

TAIPEI, Jan 2 (Reuters) - The head of China's Taiwan Affairs Office on Tuesday called on Taiwan's people to promote the process of "peaceful reunification", saying it was the common desire of people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait.

Song Tao's message, which comes less than two weeks before Taiwan holds presidential and parliamentary elections on Jan. 13, follows President Xi Jinping's remarks in his New Year Eve's address that China's "reunification" with Taiwan was inevitable.

"The motherland will eventually be reunified, and it will inevitably be reunified," Song said in his New Year's message on his office's website.

This is the common desire and common mission of people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait, Song added.

Taiwan's people should "promote cross-strait relations to return to the right track of peaceful development, and promote the process of peaceful reunification of the motherland", he said.

Taiwan's government rejects China's sovereignty claims. Both the ruling Democratic Progressive Party and largest opposition party, the Kuomintang, say only Taiwan's people can decide their future.

China has offered Taiwan a "one country, two systems" model of autonomy, but no mainstream Taiwanese party supports that idea.

Song reiterated China's support for "one country, two systems" and opposition to Taiwan's formal independence or "interference by external forces".

His message made no mention of the election, which the Taiwan Affairs Office has cast as a choice between war and peace.

China has continued military pressure around the island, ended some tariff cuts for Taiwan and threatened further economic measures as the vote has neared.

China sanctions 7 companies over US military assistance to Taiwan

27 December 2024, AP News

The Chinese government placed sanctions on seven companies on Friday in response to recent U.S. announcements of military sales and aid to Taiwan, the self-governing island that China claims as part of its territory.

The sanctions also come in response to the recent approval of the U.S. government's annual defense spending bill, which a Chinese Foreign Ministry statement said "includes multiple negative sections on China."

China objects to American military assistance for Taiwan and often imposes sanctions on related companies after a sale or aid package is announced. The sanctions generally have a limited impact, because American defense companies don't sell arms or other military goods to China. The U.S. is the main supplier of weapons to Taiwan for its defense.

The seven companies being sanctioned are Insitu Inc., Hudson Technologies Co., Saronic Technologies, Inc., Raytheon Canada, Raytheon Australia, Aerkomm Inc. and Oceaneering International Inc., the Foreign Ministry statement said. It said that "relevant senior executives" of the companies are also sanctioned, without naming any.

Any assets they have in China will be frozen, and organizations and individuals in China are prohibited from engaging in any activity with them, it said.

U.S. President Joe Biden last week authorized up to $571 million in Defense Department material and services and military education and training for Taiwan. Separately, the Defense Department announced that $295 million in military sales had been approved.

The U.S. defense bill boosts military spending to $895 billion and directs resources toward a more confrontational approach to China. It establishes a fund that could be used to send military resources to Taiwan in much the same way that the U.S. has backed Ukraine. It also expands a ban on U.S. military purchases of Chinese products ranging from drone technology to garlic for military commissaries. Zhang Xiaogang, a Chinese Defense Ministry spokesperson, said earlier this week that the U.S. is hyping up the "so-called" threat from China to justify increased military spending.

"U.S. military spending has topped the world and keeps increasing every year," he said at a press conference. "This fully exposes the belligerent nature of the U.S. and its obsession with hegemony and expansion."

CHINA-US

The Foreign Ministry statement said the U.S. moves violate agreements between the two countries on Taiwan, interfere in China's domestic affairs and undermine the nation's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Taiwan's government said earlier this month that China had sent dozens of ships into nearby seas to practice a blockade of the island, a move that Taiwan said undermined peace and stability and disrupted international shipping and trade. China has not confirmed or commented on the reported military activity.

China Reacts After Biden Signs Record US National Defense Bill

24 December 2024, NewsWeek, Micah McCartney

What's New

Beijing has issued a sharp rebuke after U.S. President Joe Biden on Monday signed the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2025, citing its "negative content on China."

Newsweek reached out to the U.S. Defense Ministry with a request for comment by email.

Why It Matters

Of the record $895 billion the bill authorizes in spending—a 1 percent increase over last year and the largest defense budget in U.S. history—$15.5 billion is allocated to the U.S. Pacific Deterrence Initiative, established in 2021 to strengthen Indo-Pacific defense capabilities to counter China's growing military influence.

Additionally, the act authorizes up to $300 million in military articles and training for Taiwan, the self-governed island democracy that Beijing's Chinese Communist Party claims as its territory and has vowed to someday unify with.

What To Know

"The U.S. determined to sign into law the 'National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2025,' containing negative content on China, playing up the 'China threat' narrative year after year," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said during Tuesday's regular press briefing.

She accused Washington of "trumpeting for military support to Taiwan," undermining China's sovereignty and development, and limiting exchanges between the two nations. Mao also urged the U.S. to abandon its "Cold War mentality," cease arms sales to Taiwan and stop "weaponizing sci-tech, economic and trade issues."

"The U.S. should also stop finding pretexts for increasing military expenditure and maintaining hegemony," Mao added, warning of "strong and resolute measures" if these actions persist.

The U.S. does not maintain formal diplomatic ties with Taiwan but remains its primary arms supplier.

Last week, Taiwan received the first batch of 38 Abrams tanks from an order of 108 approved by Congress in 2019.

The delivery is part of Taiwan's efforts to bolster its defenses amid increasing Chinese military deployments and exercises aimed at intimidating the Beijing-skeptic government of President Lai Ching-te.

What People Are Saying

Li Haidong, international relations professor, China Foreign Affairs University told the Global Times: "the U.S. National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2025 will bring a negative impact and uncertainties to China-U.S. relations next year, because it is an act aimed at meeting the demands of hawkish and anti-China forces to hype the 'China threat' rhetoric worldwide and provide pretexts for the U.S. military industrial complex to earn more money."

Taiwan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs posted on X, formerly Twitter: "We welcome U.S. government approval of arms sales totaling $295 million to Taiwan, reaffirming its commitment to our defense in line with the Taiwan Relations Act and #SixAssurances. We continue to strengthen our self-defense & bilateral security ties to secure #IndoPacific peace."

What Happens Next

Given the broad bipartisan support for Taiwan in Congress, defense support for the island, including arms sales, is likely to continue.

Some U.S. officials, including CIA Director Bill Burns and former U.S. Indo-Pacific Command chief John Aquilino, believe Chinese President Xi Jinping has ordered his military to be capable of an offensive against the island by 2027, but this does not mean he plans to give such an order.

US government starts another investigation targeting these Chinese technology companies

24 December 2024, Times of India

The Biden administration opened a trade investigation into China's production of older-style semiconductors, setting the stage for potential tariffs or other trade restrictions when President-elect Donald Trump takes office in January.

The probe, conducted under Section 301 of the Trade Act, targets "legacy chips" that power everyday devices from cars and household appliances to telecommunications equipment and military systems. U.S. officials warn that China's aggressive expansion in semiconductor production, backed by government subsidies, threatens to dominate global supply chains.

"China's policies are enabling its companies to rapidly expand and offer artificially lower-priced chips that threaten to significantly harm their market-oriented competition," said U.S. Trade Representative Katherine Tai. Commerce Secretary Gina Raimondo revealed that two-thirds of U.S. products contain Chinese-made chips, with half of companies unaware of their chips' origin.

The investigation will examine China's practices in producing silicon carbide substrates and other semiconductor components, with officials expressing concern that Chinese suppliers often price chips 30-50% below U.S. competitors. The Commerce Department projects China could control more than 40% of global capacity in foundational chips by 2032. China's Commerce Ministry strongly opposed the investigation, calling it "protectionist" and warning it would "take all necessary measures" to defend its interests. The ministry argued that U.S. companies dominate the global chip market and receive substantial government subsidies.

The probe, which includes public hearings scheduled for March, will be handed to the incoming Trump administration for completion. The investigation could provide Trump a ready pathway to implement his proposed 60% tariffs on Chinese imports, though some industry groups urged caution about potential supply chain disruptions.

US nuclear expansion unlikely to deter China, finds CSIS-MIT study

22 December 2024, Business Standard

Three scenarios culminated in mutual annihilation, with both the US and China engaging in a nuclear exchange that decimated cities and resulted in millions of casualties

A recent unclassified war game conducted by the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) has revealed that increasing US nuclear capabilities would not deter China from employing atomic weapons in a conflict over Taiwan, Taipei Times reported.

The findings, published in a report on Friday, challenge current calls among policy experts to expand and modernise the US nuclear arsenal in response to China's growing military strength.

The table top exercise, described as the first large-scale unclassified simulation of a potential nuclear war over Taiwan, explored scenarios where nuclear weapons might be used. According to the report, the US's nuclear capabilities, beyond ongoing modernisation efforts, had minimal impact on Beijing's willingness to deploy nuclear arms. Instead, the exercise highlighted the conditions under which either side might face pressure to resort to nuclear strikes, rather than the likelihood of such weapons being used.

The CSIS study pointed to a recurring pattern where Chinese forces faced the greatest pressure to use nuclear weapons when defeat appeared imminent. "Building on US concerns, this suggests that China could be moving away from its no-first-use policy during critical conflicts," the report noted.

Researchers concluded that while favourable outcomes were possible in some scenarios, "complete victory was unachievable" when nuclear weapons were involved, reported Taipei Times.

In contrast to last year's CSIS-MIT simulation, where nuclear arms were excluded and the US secured a decisive victory, the latest war game revealed more complex and devastating results.

Over 15 iterations of the exercise, Chinese forces retreated from Taiwan five times, with four of these scenarios occurring without nuclear weapons being used.

"The US team was the first to use nuclear weapons in only one iteration of the war games. In another iteration, Taiwan returned to the 'status quo' after the US hit PLA forces in Taiwan with nuclear weapons following a Chinese nuclear strike on Taiwanese forces," Taipei Times reported.

Three scenarios culminated in mutual annihilation, with both the US and China engaging in a nuclear exchange that decimated cities and resulted in millions of casualties. In five iterations, China managed to gain a foothold in Taiwan following the use of nuclear weapons, and one exercise concluded without a decisive outcome, Taipei Times reported.

The study urged Washington to consider diplomatic strategies to prevent nuclear escalation in a Taiwan conflict. Drawing parallels to the Cuban missile crisis, CSIS senior adviser Mark Cancian, who co-authored the report, said, "The US withdrew nuclear missiles from Turkey during the Cuban missile crisis to allow Soviet Russia an off-ramp at relatively little cost."

He emphasised the need for pre-emptive discussions with allies to identify potential concessions for China. "Our concern is that time will not be available when nuclear weapons are used," Cancian added.

Eric Heginbotham, a co-author and MIT researcher, noted that the simulation did not align with recommendations to expand the US tactical nuclear arsenal or develop new delivery systems. "The one US team that employed tactical nuclear weapons used fewer than 12 weapons, in comparison with the more than 600 weapons the US currently has," Heginbotham said.

He also emphasised that participants did not identify a need for delivery capabilities beyond those the US already possesses, while the teams representing China did not perceive any constraints in the US's ability to deploy nuclear weapons.

China says US 'playing with fire' by giving Taiwan more military aid

Beijing calls on the US to stop 'dangerous moves' that 'undermine peace and stability' in the Taiwan Strait.

China has warned the United States of "playing with fire" after Washington announced more military aid and sales to Taiwan.

A statement from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Sunday urged the US to stop its "dangerous moves that undermine peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait".

China, which has ramped up political and military pressure on Taiwan in recent years, has repeatedly called for the US to cease sending arms and assistance to Taiwan, which Beijing claims as part of its territory.

The US does not officially recognise Taiwan diplomatically, but it is the self-ruled island's strategic ally and largest supplier of weapons.

On Friday, the White House said the outgoing Biden administration had authorised up to $571.3m in defence assistance to Taiwan. While the White House statement did not provide details of the package, it came less than three months after a $567m aid was announced.

"This move gravely infringes on China's sovereignty and security interests," the Chinese Foreign Ministry said, adding it "firmly opposes this action". China "has lodged stern representations with the US at the earliest opportunity", it added.

China's Taiwan Affairs Office said such actions by the US "contradict its leaders' serious commitments" to not supporting "Taiwan's independence".

"We demand that the US immediately cease arming Taiwan and handle the Taiwan issue with the utmost caution," said the Chinese office's spokeswoman Zhu Fenglian, according to state broadcaster CCTV.

In October, the US approved $2bn in arms sales to Taiwan, including the first-time delivery of an advanced surface-to-air missile defence system, drawing China's criticism and war drills by its army around Taiwan.

Taiwan earlier this month demanded that China end its ongoing military activity in nearby waters, which it said undermined peace and stability and disrupted international shipping and trade.

US President-elect Donald Trump has said he would not commit to defending Taiwan if China were to invade during his presidency. Trump has also said Taiwan should pay the US for defending it against China, likening the relationship to insurance.

Guilty plea exposes Chinese 'secret police station' in New York

21 December 2024, Tibetan Review

In a damning indictment of China's transnational repression of its critics and others, a Chinese resident in New York who operated a "secret police station" in the Chinatown district of Manhattan to aid Beijing's targeting of dissidents has pleaded guilty on Dec 18 to conspiring to act as an unregistered foreign agent, reported Reuters Dec 19.

Chen Jinping, 61, has entered the plea at a hearing in Brooklyn Federal Court before US District Judge Nina Morrison. He is said to face up to five years in prison when sentenced on May 30, 2025.

Chen has also admitted in court to removing an online article about the alleged police station on behalf of China's government in Sep 2022. He has said he was not registered with the Justice Department as a foreign agent at the time, as US law requires of people acting for other countries.

Chen and a New York-based co-defendant, Lu Jianwang, were initially arrested on Apr 17, 2023. Lu has pleaded not guilty to the same charge, as well as to obstruction of justice.

The report noted that the arrests followed a 2022 investigation published by Spain-based advocacy group Safeguard Defenders that reported China had set up overseas "service stations," including in New York, that illegally worked with Chinese police to pressure fugitives to return to China.

China continues to deny having set up any such facility in other countries. "There are no so-called secret police stations," Lin Jian, spokesperson at the Chinese foreign ministry, has said Dec 19, when asked about the Manhattan case at a regular news conference.

"(China) has always strictly abided by international law and respected the judicial sovereignty of all countries," Lin has claimed, adding he had no knowledge of the specifics of the case.

China maintains that there are centres outside China run by local volunteers, not Chinese police officers, that aim to help Chinese citizens renew documents such as driving license and offer other services. It has accused Washington of fabricating the charges to smear China's image.

While the facility may indeed be helping to provide such service, prosecutors have also said that in 2022, Lu was asked by Beijing to locate an individual living in California who was considered a pro-democracy activist.

Before that, in 2018, Lu had sought to persuade an individual considered a fugitive by China to return home, prosecutors have said.

China refutes U.S. irresponsible report on military, security developments

20 December 2024, Beijing Review

A Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson on December 19 urged the United States to view China's strategic intention and defense development in an objective and rational way, in response to an irresponsible U.S. report on China's military and security developments.

"This report, like the ones we've seen before, lays little emphasis on truth. It is filled with bias and designed to amplify the 'China threat' narrative only to justify the U.S. desire to maintain military supremacy," spokesperson Lin Jian told a daily press briefing.

Lin said China is fully committed to being a force for peace, stability and progress in the world, and is equally determined to defend its sovereignty, security and territorial integrity.

"We call on the United States to abandon the Cold War mentality and hegemonic way of thinking, view China's strategic intention and defense development in an objective and rational way, stop issuing this kind of irresponsible report year after year, and make sure what it does is conducive to a stable relationship between the two countries and the two militaries," Lin said.

Trump meets TikTok CEO after saying China, US can 'solve all world's problems' together

17 December 2024, SCMP, Khusboo Razdan

President-elect said the two countries can work together when pressed about his invitation to the Chinese leader to attend inauguration

US president-elect Donald Trump said on Monday that Beijing and Washington could work together "to solve all of the problems of the world", a sweeping statement issued a little more than a month before he returns to office.

Hours after making the remarks in a press conference at Mar-a-Lago, Trump met TikTok CEO Chew Shou Zi at the Florida resort, according to US media reports.

The meeting coincided with the company's emergency appeal to the US Supreme Court for a temporary halt on the ban, which would take effect if it fails to secure a non-Chinese buyer on January 19, a day before Trump officially takes the White House.

Earlier in the day, Trump signalled during a news conference that he was willing to block the ban on TikTok, which has more than 170 million domestic monthly users on its platform in the US.

"We'll take a look at TikTok. You know, I have a warm spot in my heart for TikTok. TikTok had an impact, so we're taking a look at it," he said, hailing the platform for boosting his connection with young American voters during the campaign.

Both Trump and the social media platform kept the meeting low-key, with neither side confirming the meeting, nor issuing any statement on what was discussed. Media reports from the US said it was not clear what the two men talked about.

Experts have said that Trump has limited options when it comes to saving TikTok from the ban. The meeting followed Trump's hopeful remarks about Chinese President Xi Jinping's response to his invitation to attend the January 20 presidential inauguration. During his press conference at Mar-a-Lago ahead of the TikTok meeting, Trump said Xi "hasn't said one way or the other" about whether he will attend.

The issue was "something we barely discussed", Trump said, adding that he has had "some very good conversations" with the Chinese leader through letters.

"You know, because China and the United States can, together solve all of the problems of the world, if you think about it. So it's very important. And you know, he was a friend of mine," Trump added.

Reflecting on the meeting the two men had at Mar-a-Lago in 2017, Trump said: "He was here for a long time, right in that spot, except sitting in a very comfortable chair. He wasn't standing like you are.

But we spent hours and hours talking, and he's an amazing guy."

Trump's latest Beijing-friendly comments inject more mystery into the approach he will take when he is back in the White House next month, as they send different signals compared with the incoming president's cabinet picks like Florida Senator Marco Rubio – one of Congress' harshest critics of the Chinese government – for secretary of state.

According to Jake Werner, acting East Asia director of the Quincy Institute, a think tank in Washington, Trump's latest comments "signal a real openness to doing some sort of deal" with Xi.

"While many of Trump's national security appointments seemed to promise an immediate, sharp deterioration in US-China relations, Trump's comments, and his decision to extend Xi an invitation to his inauguration, indicates that we have a genuine opportunity to build the relationship on a new foundation," Werner added.

On Sunday, Florida lawmaker Mike Waltz, who will be Trump's national security adviser in the White House, in an interview with CBS downplayed the invitation to Xi, saying the ongoing conversations between Trump and other world leaders were "really nothing beyond congratulatory and niceties".

No Chinese head of state has ever attended a presidential inauguration in the US. Such a move would be a departure from a decades-long tradition whereby the White House includes foreign dignitaries and diplomats at the ceremony, but not world leaders.

Some analysts have expressed doubt that Xi would attend the inauguration, pointing out that the diplomatic groundwork for such a visit would likely require more than the five weeks remaining before the president-elect is sworn in.

Denis Simon of the Institute for China-America Studies, another Washington-based think tank, said it has "more or less been determined that Xi is not coming, and the only question will be, 'Who would come?'"

Describing Trump as a "deal maker", Simon reckoned that by inviting Xi, the US president-elect wants to be "seen as some kind of grand statesman" with a knack for personal diplomacy, and added that Beijing might be inclined to send a high-level delegation.

"I really do think Trump wants a Nobel Peace Prize win. I think that's his aim here. So I think that this grand statesman status, if he can work with Xi, and then Xi can work with Putin and all of a sudden we can find peace in several areas, I think that would be Trump's dream," he said.

Earlier this month, Trump had suggested that China could play a key role in brokering peace between Russia and Ukraine.

"Too many lives are being so needlessly wasted, too many families destroyed, and if it keeps going, it can turn into something much bigger, and far worse. I know Vladimir well. This is his time to act. China can help. The World is waiting," Trump said in a social media post on December 9.

In an interview aired later that day Trump told NBC that he "got along very well" with Xi and that the two leaders had "communication as recently as this week".

At the time, the Chinese embassy in Washington declined to comment on any recent communication between Xi and Trump, saying only that Beijing "welcomes and supports all effort conducive to the peaceful settlement of the crisis".

Werner of the Quincy Institute noted that "China would not be willing to do a one-sided deal".

"Trump would need to begin by offering a stable trade environment and clarity on what realms of exchange are off-limits and enter negotiations on China's core complaints around security and space for economic development," he added.

"Trump would need to begin by offering a stable trade environment and clarity on what realms of exchange are off-limits and enter negotiations on China's core complaints around security and space for economic development," he added.

FBI warns some lawmakers that China aims to create fake stories about them to erode support for Taiwan

17 December 2024, NBC News, Scott Wong and Ken Dilanian

The FBI has held classified briefings warning a handful of U.S. lawmakers that the Chinese Communist Party is working to create fake stories to portray them in a negative light because of their hawkish views of Beijing and support for Taiwan, two U.S. officials familiar with the briefings told NBC News.

The U.S. officials, who asked not to be identified due to the sensitive nature of the briefings, said that one of the false stories being concocted by the CCP, cited by FBI briefers, is that these lawmakers are espousing pro-Taiwan views because they were taking "bribes" from Taiwan.

"The CCP is trying to undermine congressional support for Taiwan's democracy, to paint it as corrupt and not in the American public interest," one of the two U.S. officials told NBC News. "It will not work."

The officials said the briefings occurred in the fall.

A third source, a House lawmaker who specializes in national security matters, said they had been informed about the alleged CCP scheme but had not personally received a briefing.

The FBI had no comment. A spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, Liu Pengyu, responded to a detailed list of questions for this story with a statement: "The report is entirely fabricated, and the Chinese government has never had any plan to smear these lawmakers. As for whether they have accepted bribes from Taiwan, it should be investigated by the relevant authorities in the United States and has nothing to do with China."

The classified discussions were described as "defensive" briefings, the U.S. officials said, meaning the alleged CCP scheme had not been carried out yet, but the FBI wanted to share critical information with the intended targets as a way to pre-empt the attacks.

The FBI commonly provides defensive briefings to senior officials when the bureau learns they have been targeted by foreign intelligence operations.

Tensions between Beijing and Washington have escalated in recent years, particularly over the future of the island of Taiwan, a self-ruling democracy and a critical U.S. ally in Asia that China claims as its territory.

In 2022, then-Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., an outspoken critic of China's human rights violations, made an unannounced visit to Taiwan and was awarded the highest civilian honor by its president. She was the highest-ranking U.S. official to set foot in Taiwan since former Speaker Newt Gingrich did it in 1997, and the move infuriated officials in Beijing, which launched military exercises around Taiwan including live-fire drills.

Other lawmakers have made similar trips to Taipei. In February, bipartisan members of the special House committee investigating the CCP traveled to Taiwan to congratulate Lai Ching-te, the pro-independence candidate who had been elected president just weeks earlier. And this past May, House Foreign Affairs Chairman Mike McCaul, R-Texas, led a bipartisan group of six lawmakers on an official congressional visit to Taiwan to meet with Lai.

Several members of the House Intelligence Committee and select House committee on the CCP declined to comment when asked if they had received a classified briefing on the matter. Lawmakers are prohibited from speaking publicly about any such classified briefings.

Rep. John Moolenaar, R-Mich., the chairman of the select House committee on the CCP, had no comment about any specific plot by the CCP, but said it was no secret Beijing has been targeting U.S. officials and other Americans.

"The CCP will try to discredit our way of life, our freedoms and will use every means necessary," Moolenaar told NBC News. "So you know, whether it's hacking high-level officials' communications, we can expect all these things."

Starting with the 2022 midterm elections, China has adopted increasingly sophisticated and aggressive tactics to try to aggravate political divisions in American society and undermine congressional candidates that Beijing deems hostile to the regime's interests, especially over the status of Taiwan, according to U.S. intelligence officials and researchers.

In the 2024 presidential contest, China did not appear to favor either candidate but instead focused on specific downballot races with covert disinformation campaigns, using artificial intelligence tools and fake accounts mimicking Americans. The candidates targeted included McCaul; Rep. Barry Moore, R-Ala.; and Sen. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn., according to an analysis from Microsoft. A Chinese Embassy spokesperson said at the time that the claims were "full of malicious speculations" and that China had "no intention" to and would "not interfere in the U.S. election."

U.S. intelligence officials and analysts say China's efforts to stoke polarization and undercut Americans' confidence in the democratic process are part of a long-term effort that includes global information operations designed to tarnish America's image abroad.

China's disinformation efforts have coincided with what U.S. officials say is a concerted effort to steal intellectual property and U.S. military secrets through espionage and cyber hacks.

Earlier this month, the White House said that a Chinese hacking campaign targeting the U.S. and other countries was more sweeping and serious than previously known. The CCP had spied on the texts and calls of U.S. citizens by hacking at least eight American telecommunications companies, according to a White House official.

A spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington responded to that allegation in a statement this month: "China firmly opposes the US's smear attacks against China without any factual basis."

Chinese migrants in US illegally uneasy after fourth removal flight

13 December 2024, VOA, Bo Gu

After more than two years of separation, Chinese migrant Duan Chunxia, 51, recently met face to face with her husband and daughter at Stewart Detention Center, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement facility in Georgia.

"My wife has lost a lot of weight, and her hair turned gray," her husband, Ni Jinfang, told VOA Mandarin in an emotional video interview. "Our daughter cried so much when she saw her mother. Her tears were all over her face and neck."

That tearful reunion on December 1 was the latest in an emotional roller-coaster ride for the family as they've separately come to the United States seeking political asylum.

Following the COVID-19 pandemic, there was a surge in Chinese nationals entering the United States illegally and seeking asylum. Over the past year, those numbers have dwindled, and U.S. authorities are stepping up efforts to send a growing number back to China.

There is also increasing concern among undocumented migrants from China about President-elect Donald Trump's pledge to carry out mass deportations.

Deportation flights

Just days after Duan met with her family, she was scheduled to be sent back to China on a U.S. government-chartered removal flight.

That flight departed Monday, but Duan was not on it. Following a second asylum interview, authorities agreed to give her more time to appeal the deportation order.

The charter flight marked the fourth time in six months that the United States has deported undocumented migrants back to China. Three previous flights in June, October and November carried a total of at least 350 Chinese citizens back to their homeland.

The last previous large-scale repatriation occurred in 2018.

Growing cooperation

In a statement Wednesday, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security (DHS) said the flight "is yet another example of the department's ongoing cooperation with [China] and other international partners to deter irregular migration."

It added that DHS and its counterparts in China "also continue joint work to counter the human smuggling networks that facilitate irregular migration." DHS did not say how many migrants were on the flight.

Chen Chuangchuang, an immigration lawyer in California, told VOA Mandarin that the Chinese and U.S. governments have cooperated more closely on immigration issues this year than previously.

"In the past, China rarely cooperated with the U.S. government in accepting illegal migrants," Chen told VOA in a December phone interview. "China has recently exchanged prisoners with the U.S. many times and also accepted undocumented people. [Chinese leader] Xi Jinping calls it 'law enforcement cooperation' rather than 'border and immigration issues.' "

How they arrived

Ni, 53, and the couple's 18-year-old daughter entered the U.S. on tourist visas in 2022. After Duan's husband and daughter left China, she applied for a tourist visa the following year, but her application was rejected.

More than one year after that, in late September, she illegally entered the U.S., crossing the southern border with Mexico.

Duan made the hazardous journey through Ecuador and then traveled overland through Colombia, Central America and Mexico to the U.S. border.

Both Duan and Ni are from China's central city of Suzhou, just outside Shanghai. The city is relatively wealthy but human rights violations are not unheard of.

In 2012, Ni lost his house and land following a government-led forced demolition. He tried to sue the local government in 2013 but was not given a chance to file his lawsuit. He continued to petition the government without result. In 2016, Ni was assaulted by local police officers and put in jail for 171 days for the crime of "disturbing public order."

Ni continued to speak against the Chinese government after coming to the United States and participated in a protest in San Francisco last November, when Xi visited the city for the APEC summit and met with U.S. President Joe Biden.

Panicking

Another Chinese immigrant who entered the United States last year via the same route as Duan and is now living in New York state spoke with VOA on the condition that his name not be used because of his undocumented status.

In a telephone interview, he said that with the recent deportations and Trump's pledges, many in the Chinese immigrant community are a little panicked.

"After he takes office, everyone will be worried about being deported, not just us illegal immigrants," he said. "The ones with green cards, aren't they afraid, too?"

Before entering the United States, this man said he had openly criticized Xi on Chinese social media. He said that if he is deported, he will undoubtedly face a prison sentence in China.

The man, who is in his 30s, has already begun applying for political asylum and is still hopeful.

"Although I don't like this result [Trump's victory], this is the choice of the American people, and there is nothing I can do. We are all entering an uncertain era, and everyone's future is uncertain," he said.

Immigration lawyer Chen said that Chinese immigrants in the U.S. who have not yet obtained legal status do face a "real threat."

"The Republicans have already occupied both houses [of Congress], and conservatives also have a clear advantage in the Supreme Court," he said. "We can say with absolute certainty that the second Trump administration will have way more resources, in terms of manpower, law and finances, to support the implementation of his deportation plan. This is bound to happen."

However, Chen does not think that all Chinese immigrants who apply for asylum will be unsuccessful.

"For those who have a deportation order, if you have a legal reason to apply to stay in the U.S., there is still a chance for review. It's not easy though. The standard will be raised," Chen said, adding that individuals need to prove that they will be persecuted if they return to their home country.

US bans all cotton and tomato products from Xinjiang over slave labor

13 December 2024, ABC Audio

U.S. Customs and Border Protection said Wednesday it will detain all cotton and tomato products produced in China's Xinjiang province.

The Withhold Release Order (WRO) issued by CBP is based on information that "reasonably indicates" the use of forced labor within China's so-called "re-education" camps. CBP also claims China is oppressing its Muslim population in that region.

"The goal isn't just to interdict shipments ... that's actually the fallback plan," Acting DHS Deputy Secretary Ken Cuccinelli told reporters Wednesday. "The goal of the WRO is that they stop and that the shipments never arrive – the ultimate goal is that China abandons these horrific practices."

This is the fourth WRO that CBP has issued in 2021 and the second on products originating in Xinjiang. China's Xinjiang province accounted for eight of the 13 WROs that CBP issued in 2020 – all stemming from allegations of forced labor.

CBP officials and human rights experts estimate that somewhere between 1 million to 3 million Uighurs, Kazakhs and others are being detained in what U.S. Secretary of State Mike Pompeo has dubbed "internment camps" throughout China's Xinjiang province. There are about 1,300 of these facilities scattered throughout the region and they've allegedly forced detainees to work without compensation in nearby factories, according to those same officials.

Evidence from Chinese government documents and media reports indicate that hundreds of thousands of Uighurs in Xinjiang are forced to pick cotton by hand via state-mandated labor, according to a report by the Center for Global Policy published last month. The Chinese government strongly denies all claims of forced labor in Xinjiang.

"I've said this before and I'll say it again: Made in China does not just indicate a country of origin," said Cuccinelli. "It's a warning label."

Cotton is Xinjiang's largest export; cotton exports from China are approximately a $9 billion industry.

Last month, CBP issued a WRO on Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, which had accounted for 17% of those cotton exports.

CBP has not yet quantified Xinjiang's tomato export output, but China's overall output of tomatoes is a $10 million industry, according to export data from 2019.

CBP officials emphasized on the call Wednesday that most of the onus falls on importers and consumers – urging them to diligently research their supply chains prior to purchasing items from China in general.

"If you're buying apparel and it's considerably lower than the fair market value everywhere else, there's a reason for that," said CBP Acting Commissioner Mark A. Morgan. "Take a few minutes, understand where it's coming from – is it coming from this region?"

Human rights coalitions have praised the action taken from the U.S. against Beijing's alleged abuses.

"CBP's action is a high-decibel wakeup call to any apparel brand that continues to deny the prevalence and problem of forced-labor produced cotton from the Uyghur region," said Scott Nova, executive director of the Workers Rights Consortium, a member of the coalition to End Uyghur Forced Labour. "The days when any major apparel brand can safely profit from Xinjiang cotton are over."

Scrutiny against China's actions in Xinjiang has mounted in recent months over allegations of forced sterilization of their Uighur population that surfaced last summer.

The scrutiny made its way to social media last week, when Twitter removed a controversial tweet by the Chinese Embassy in the U.S. In the tweet, the embassy shared an unsubstantiated report on population growth in Xinjiang and wrote that Muslim women in the province were "no longer baby-making machines," adding that the decrease in population growth had led to a drop in terrorism.

"After further review we have taken action on this tweet for violating our rules against dehumanization," a Twitter spokesperson said.

China Restricts Visas To US Officials Who "Interfered" In Hong Kong Affairs

12 December 2024, NDTV World, Anushree Jonko

Mao stated that China has decided to impose visa restrictions on US officials who have performed poorly on Hong Kong-related issues. The move is based on China's foreign relations law and a law on countering foreign sanctions.

Beijing has announced that it will impose visa restrictions on US officials who have "interfered" in Hong Kong affairs. This move comes after Washington said it would impose visa restrictions on Hong Kong officials last month.

According to Mao Ning, a spokesperson for China's foreign ministry, the US has "violently interfered in China's internal affairs" by imposing visa restrictions on Chinese officials over Hong Kong issues.

Mao stated that China has decided to impose visa restrictions on US officials who have performed poorly on Hong Kong-related issues. The move is based on China's foreign relations law and a law on countering foreign sanctions.

Mao emphasised that Hong Kong is a part of China and that Hong Kong affairs are China's internal matters.

"I shall emphasise that Hong Kong is China's Hong Kong, and Hong Kong affairs are purely China's internal matters," Mao said. "We urge the US side to genuinely respect China's sovereignty, respect the rule of law in Hong Kong, and stop interfering in Hong Kong affairs in any way."

The US had previously announced that it would impose visa restrictions on Hong Kong officials after 45 pro-democracy advocates were sentenced to prison in November. The sentences ranged from four years and two months to 10 years.

"The 45 defendants sentenced today were aggressively prosecuted, and many now face life-altering imprisonment simply for their peaceful participation in political activities which are protected under the Basic Law of Hong Kong," US Department of State spokesperson Matthew Miller said after the sentencing hearing.

Comments

The Hong Kong government condemned the US move, saying that foreign governments and organisations had "turned a blind eye to the facts" and made "exaggerated remarks" about the landmark case.

Trump invites China's Xi Jinping to inauguration

12 December 2024, CBS News, Jennifer Jacobs

President-elect Donald Trump has invited Chinese President Xi Jinping to attend his inauguration next month, multiple sources told CBS News, and inauguration officials are making plans for additional foreign dignitaries to attend the swearing-in ceremony.

Trump invited Xi in early November, shortly after the election, sources said, but it was not clear whether he has accepted the invitation. A spokesperson for the Chinese embassy in Washington did not immediately comment.

Transition spokesperson Karoline Leavitt told CBS News on Thursday that Trump invited Xi to the inauguration. She told Fox News on Thursday that it is an example of Trump "creating an open dialogue with leaders of countries that are not just our allies but our adversaries and our competitors too."

In addition to Xi, the president-elect's team has raised the possibility of hosting other leaders at the Capitol on Jan. 20. Hungary's far-right leader, Prime Minister Viktor Orbán, who has a warm relationship with Trump and visited him at Mar-a-Lago this week, is "still considering" whether to attend, according to a source familiar with Orbán's plans.

"World leaders are lining up to meet with President Trump because they know he will soon return to power and restore peace through American strength around the globe," Trump transition spokesperson Karoline Leavitt said.

Ambassadors and other diplomats are typically invited to inaugurations, but State Department records dating back to 1874 show that a foreign leader has never attended a transfer-of-power ceremony.

National Security Council spokesman John Kirby said Thursday that it's "going to be up to President-elect Trump to decide who's going to sit there with him at the inauguration, who's going to be there."

Members of Trump's inner circle remain sharp critics of Xi's government, including Sen. Marco Rubio, his pick to be secretary of state, and incoming national security adviser Mike Waltz.

Trump himself has threatened to increase tariffs on goods from China. The U.S. has imposed a deadline of Jan. 19, the eve of the inauguration, for TikTok's Chinese parent company ByteDance to sell the social media app or face a ban in the U.S. TikTok is fighting the ban in court — it lost a bid last week to block the ban but is appealing the case to the Supreme Court. But Trump has also long believed that close leader-to-leader relationships are key to international deal-making. Since Election Day, world leaders have trekked to Mar-a-Lago to meet with Trump, including Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau. Argentina's president, Javier Milei, has also been granted private audiences with the president-elect.

Emmanuel Macron, the president of France, was the first world leader to host Trump overseas since he won the 2024 election. Also in attendance at the Paris reopening of the Notre Dame Cathedral were Italian Prime Minister Georgia Meloni, Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky and Prince William. Trump was mostly unknown on the world stage at his first inauguration in 2017. This time, world leaders are treating Trump essentially as an incumbent.

US House to vote to provide $3 billion to remove Chinese telecoms equipment

08 December 2024, CNBCTV

06 December 2024, BBC, Bernd Debusmann Jr

The 1,800-page text was released late Saturday and includes other provisions aimed at China, including requiring a report on Chinese efforts to evade U.S. national security regulations and an intelligence assessment of the current status of China's biotechnology capabilities.

The U.S. House of Representatives is set to vote next week on an annual defense bill that includes just over $3 billion for U.S. telecom companies to remove equipment made by Chinese telecoms firms Huawei and ZTE from American wireless networks to address security risks.

The 1,800-page text was released late Saturday and includes other provisions aimed at China, including requiring a report on Chinese efforts to evade U.S. national security regulations and an intelligence assessment of the current status of China's biotechnology capabilities.

The Federal Communications Commission has said removing the insecure equipment is estimated to cost $4.98 billion but Congress previously only approved $1.9 billion for the "rip and replace" program.

Washington has aggressively urged U.S. allies to purge Huawei and other Chinese gear from their wireless networks.

FCC Chair Jessica Rosenworcel last week again called on the U.S. Congress to provide urgent additional funding, saying the program to replace equipment in the networks of 126 carriers faces a $3.08 billion shortfall "putting both our national security and the connectivity of rural consumers who depend on these networks at risk."

She has warned the lack of funding could result in some rural networks shutting down, which "could eliminate the only provider in some regions" and could threaten 911 service.

Competitive Carriers Association CEO Tim Donovan on Saturday praised the announcement, saying "funding is desperately needed to fulfill the mandate to remove and replace covered equipment and services while maintaining connectivity for tens of millions of Americans."

In 2019, Congress told the FCC to require U.S. telecoms carriers that receive federal subsidies to purge their networks of Chinese telecoms equipment. The White House in 2023 asked for $3.1 billion for the program.

Senate Commerce Committee chair Maria Cantwell said funding for the program and up to $500 million for regional tech hubs will be covered by funds generated from a one-time spectrum auction by the FCC for advanced wireless spectrum in the band known as AWS-3 to help meet rising spectrum demands of wireless consumers.

President-elect Donald Trump has named former Georgia Senator David Perdue to become ambassador to China, a key role for how the US deals with one of its biggest global rivals.

Perdue, who was labelled "anti-China" by a Chinese think tank while in Congress, has advocated for a stronger US navy, partly over China's work to increase its military strength.

He is the latest China "hawk" tapped for foreign policy in Trump's next term, as the world wonders if the incoming president will start a trade war with the country.

Earlier this week, Trump said Peter Navarro - who backs high tariffs and taking a hard line on China - would return to the White House as a trade and manufacturing adviser.

Both men tapped by Trump for cabinet roles on foreign policy - Senator Marco Rubio for secretary of state and Fox News weekend host Pete Hegseth for defence secretary - are also China critics, along with Michael Waltz, who is expected to become national security adviser.

In announcing his choice, Trump said Perdue would be "instrumental" in maintaining peace and a "productive working relationship" with China.

The President-elect has vowed to impose stiff tariffs on products entering the US from Canada, Mexico and China during his first days back in office.

A massive trade imbalance between the two countries has persisted for decades. The US imported more than $420b worth of goods from China in 2023, and exported less than $150b, federal data shows.

The Chinese embassy in the US recently warned that both countries would suffer consequences if a trade war were to ensue.

"China-US economic and trade cooperation is mutually beneficial in nature," Chinese embassy spokesman Liu Pengyu posted on X earlier this week. "No will win a trade war or a tariff war."

On Thursday night - following Perdue's nomination - Mr Liu said China stands "ready to engage in dialogue, expand cooperation, and manage differences with the incoming US government so as to maintain stability in China-US relations to the benefits of the two countries and the world at large". If confirmed by the Senate, Perdue will take over the ambassadorship in Beijing from Nicholas Burns, a veteran diplomat.

Perdue - who lost his senate seat to Democrat Jon Ossoff in 2020 - ran unsuccessfully to unseat Brian Kemp as the state's governor in 2022.

During his failed gubernatorial bid, Perdue repeated Donald Trump's false claims of electoral fraud in the 2020 election.

Prior to getting involved in politics, he was a high-level executive at Dollar General, Reebok and other firms.

China rejects claims of "forced labor" in Xinjiang's tomato industry, criticizing BBC report for relying on subjective claims, unverified assertions

05 December 2024, Global Times

A spokesperson of China's Foreign Ministry on Thursday strongly rejected claims of "forced labor" in Xinjiang, following a BBC report that tomato purees sold in several British supermarkets may contain ingredients sourced from the region, purportedly linked to "forced labor".

We have repeatedly emphasized that there is no forced labor in Xinjiang, and the Chinese government has always firmly opposed and severely cracked down on forced labor. Xinjiang's tomatoes, like its cotton, are high-quality products globally recognized, spokesperson Lin Jian said, noting that with over 90 percent of tomato harvesting and 85 percent of cotton harvesting in the region mechanized, how can "forced labor" be plausible? He criticized the BBC report for relying on subjective and unverified claims, highlighting the lack of factual evidence supporting the allegations of forced labor linked to Xinjiang tomatoes harvesting.

"The life of news lies in its truth. Not believing in rumors, not spreading rumors, and not listening to or believing in biased views are the minimum requirements of journalistic ethics and the basic qualities of a fair and objective media," Lin said.

Much of the so-called "evidence" in the BBC report and video was centered on subjective assumptions such as 'claims' and 'feelings,' which lacked verification, Lin said. He also accused the BBC of basing on preconceived notions, taking things out of context and making unfounded claims that forced labor exists in tomato harvesting industry in Xinjiang.

Lin further criticized the BBC's investigative approach, noting that while relevant reporters spent months studying various tomato sauces, yet they are unwilling to spend a second to understand the truth about Xinjiang. "This is a typical case of double standards and bias," Lin remarked. "Some individuals with ulterior motives continue to sensationalize forced labor claims to gain attention, with a host of so-called directors and actors as well as a stream of so-called testimonies and reports."

Last week, they hype about Xinjiang cotton, and this week it's about Xinjiang tomatoes. Will next week see the same manipulation targeting Xinjiang's solar energy, carrots, or even its beef and lamb? Lin questioned.

Lin stated that no matter how much these allegations are spread, they cannot change the fact that Xinjiang products are of high-quality, nor can they undermine Xinjiang's economic and social stability and development.

I hope that relevant parties can recognize the sinister intentions behind the lies of "forced labor." I also encourage everyone to visit Xinjiang, take a look around, taste the local tomatoes, experience life in Xinjiang, and feel the real Xinjiang, Lin said.

Activists tell US Congress of China's far-reaching cultural erasure

05 December 2024, RFA, Alex Willemyns

Uyghur, Tibetan, Mongolian and Chinese activists say it's hard to escape Beijing's repressive reach.

A campaign by China's government to rewrite the cultural identity and history of the country's minority ethnic groups and political dissidents is increasingly being waged on American shores, activists told a U.S. congressional hearing on Thursday.

The Tibetan, Uyghur, Mongolian and Chinese activists said that while the United States once stood as a bastion of free speech and a redoubt of cultural preservation for groups targeted by the Chinese Communist Party, many now feared Beijing's extensive reach.

Rishat Abbas, the president of the U.S.-based Uyghur Academy, told the hearing of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China that his sister Gulshan had been jailed in China on a 20-year sentence due to his and other family member's anti-government activism abroad.

The U.S. government says China's government is carrying out a "genocide" against the mostly Muslim Uyghur minority in the country's far-west. Many Uyghurs abroad actively campaign to end the genocide and to do what they can to preserve their language and culture.

But many look to the treatment of the family members, still trapped in China, of those Uyghurs who choose to speak out, and decide it's safer not to provoke the Chinese Communist Party, even from abroad.

"My sister's imprisonment is a clear action of retaliation," he said. "Her detention exposes the CCP's aggressive policies that target Uyghurs simply for their identity and for the activism of their relatives abroad."

"She has never engaged in any form of advocacy in her life," he said.

Abbas said he was nonetheless not deterred, and hoped to one day bring a Uyghur-language textbook developed in the United States back to China's Xinjiang region, where Uyghurs live under surveillance.

Lawfare

It's not only Uyghur immigrants who have been targeted.

In years gone by, American higher education institutions like Stanford University fearlessly curated U.S.-based historical archives about events censored by the Chinese government, said Julian Ku, a constitutional law professor at New York's Hofstra University.

But things have changed.

Ku pointed to a lawsuit brought in the United States by the Beijing-based widow of the late Li Rui – a former secretary to Mao Zedong and later dissident who donated diaries to Stanford.

Stanford says Li Rui donated the diaries through his daughter, fearing that they would be destroyed by Chinese officials if left in China. But Li Rui's widow says they are rightfully hers and wants them returned.

The widow, Ku explained, was inexplicably being represented by "some of the most expensive law firms in the United States," and had likely already racked up legal fees in the "hundreds of thousands of dollars – and probably more – on a widow's Chinese state pension."

Describing the tactic as "lawfare," he suggested that the widow had powerful backers funding the battle, who may not even care if the litigation is ultimately successful.

The nearly four years of costly legal battles sent a message to other U.S. universities, museums or nonprofits to avoid any contentious documents that might attract the attention of Beijing, Ku said.

"They might think, 'Well, maybe I don't want to acquire that one, because it might subject me to litigation in China and maybe litigation here in the United States,'" he said. "It serves as a deterrence for universities, museums and other institutions in the United States."

Living in fear

Like Uyghurs, many ethnically Han Chinese in America also fear speaking out against Beijing even while in the United States, said Rowena He, a historian of the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre in Beijing who was last year banned from entering Hong Kong.

"It's very difficult to not to be emotional being in this room again because I remember 5-10 years ago, when I was first invited to testify to Congress," He recalled. "I was extremely hesitant, because I was so concerned about my family members, and I was so worried."

"I lived with fear ever since the day I started teaching and researching the topic of Tiananmen," she explained, citing the "taboo" around the topic in China, where the massacre is not openly acknowledged.

She said increased funding for curriculums with alternate Chinese histories to the one put forward by Beijing could be one way to counter the "monopoly on historiography" held by China's government.

"If you go to Chinatown, many people are still supporting the CCP, even though they're physically in the United States," He said, noting that figures like herself were denigrated as anti-government.

"Sometimes people call us 'underground historians,' but I do not like the term 'underground,'" she said. "We are the historians."

Government funding

Geshe Lobsang Monlam, a Tibetan monk who authored a 223-volume Tibetan dictionary and helps lead efforts to preserve Tibetan language outside of China, said one of the main obstacles for Tibetans outside China outside of pressure from Beijing was finding needed funds.

"Inside Tibet, the young Tibetans have appeared powerless in their ability to preserve and promote their language," the monk said, pointing to concerted efforts to erase use of the Tibetan language as young Tibetans grow proficient in using Mandarin through smartphones.

"If there can be assistance by the United States to help procure technological equipment that can enable those of us in exile to continue our work on preservation of Tibetan culture and language and way of life ... that would be very useful for us," he explained.

Temulun Togocho, a 17-year-old U.S.-born Southern Mongolian activist, similarly appealed for more funding for cultural preservation.

Togocho said while the decreased global focus on the plight of Mongolians in China had allowed her family in the United States to openly teach her about Mongolian culture and their native language with little fear of reprisal, resources were few and far between.

Mongolians living in China's Inner Mongolia were increasingly facing a similar treatment to Tibetans and Uyghurs, she said, with a "systematic oppression and erasure of Mongolian language" taking place in favor of what is called "patriotic education" lionizing the communist party.

In September 2020, many Southern Mongolians protested the policies through coordinated school boycotts and strikes, but there was little news coverage of the ensuing mass arrests, she explained.

"Approximately 300,000 southern Mongolian students joined the movement," she said. "The Chinese government responded harshly, detaining and placing under house arrest 8-10,000 people."

The young activist called on Congress to fund Mongolian-language programs on Voice of America, which currently do not exist. She said that would help the "minority within a minority" to more actively "preserve their language, culture and identity" from erasure

US' plan to ban 200 Chinese technology companies; China's responds with this warning

29 November 2024, Times of India

Tensions are rising between the US and China over semiconductor technology, a report has said. China has threatened to retaliate against potential new US export restrictions where the Biden administration is reportedly planning to unveil curbs on chip-related exports to China and blacklist 200 companies.

According to a report by news agency Reuters, the Chinese commerce ministry has responded to these reports. Spokesperson He Yadong expressed strong opposition to the US expanding its definition of national security and its "abuse" of export controls targeting Chinese companies.

He argued that these actions disrupt the global trade order, destabilise industrial security, and harm cooperation within the semiconductor industry.

"These actions severely disrupt the international economic and trade order, destabilise global industrial security, and harm the cooperative efforts between China and the US, as well as the global semiconductor industry," He said.

"If the U.S. insists on escalating control measures, China will take necessary actions to resolutely protect the legitimate rights of Chinese enterprises," he added.

US plans to blacklist 200 Chinese chip companies

The US Chamber of Commerce recently alerted its members that the administration is considering blacklisting up to 200 Chinese chip companies, effectively cutting them off from most US suppliers.

The US has been tightening its grip on semiconductor technology due to concerns that China might use advanced chips to bolster its military capabilities.

Bloomberg reported that the proposed restrictions would include curbs on semiconductor equipment and AI memory chips. However, the latest proposal appears to be less severe than initially anticipated, with fewer Huawei suppliers targeted and ChangXin Memory Technologies, a key player in AI memory chip development, reportedly excluded from the blacklist.

The restrictions would still impact two chip factories owned by Semiconductor Manufacturing International Corp (SMIC), a Huawei partner, and over 100 Chinese companies involved in producing semiconductor manufacturing equipment.

Why China's problems may increase

While the decision on the reported curbs is taken by the Biden Administration, which is due to change in January. There are concerns that President-elect Donald Trump's promise to implement additional tariffs on China could trigger a trade war, Reuters said.

Trump has said that his administration will impose an additional 10% tariff on all imports from China, above any existing tariffs.

US and China swap three prisoners each in exchange

29 November 2024, BBC, Holly Honderich

Three Americans detained in China were released in exchange for three Chinese prisoners in the US, after the Biden administration negotiated a prisoner swap. Mark Swidan, Kai Li, and John Leung are on their way back to the US, a spokesperson for the National Security Council (NSC) said in a statement on Wednesday.

"Soon they will return and be reunited with their families for the first time in many years," the statement said.

The exchange was reportedly months in the making, and included the release of three Chinese citizens in US custody, Chinese authorities confirmed on Wednesday.

"Through the unremitting efforts of the Chinese Government, the three Chinese citizens wrongfully detained by the United States have returned to their motherland safely," Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said in a statement Wednesday.

"China has always been firmly opposed to the suppression and persecution of Chinese nationals by the United States for political purposes," she added. President Biden raised the issue of Americans wrongfully detained in China directly with President Xi Jinping earlier this month when the two met during the Apec summit in Peru, according to an American official familiar with the negotiations. National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan also urged for their return during his visit to China in August.

"Thanks to this Administration's efforts and diplomacy with the PRC, all of the wrongfully detained Americans in the PRC are home," the NSC spokesperson said.

The swap was first reported by Politico.

Mr Swidan, 48, had been detained since 2012 and was facing the death penalty after a conviction for narcotics trafficking. Swidan denied the charges and the State Department classified him as wrongfully detained, previously raising concerns about his health.

Mark Li, 60, had been held in China since September 2016 on what activists say were trumped-up spying charges.

John Leung, 78, has lead several pro-Beijing groups in the US. He was arrested in 2021 and sentenced to life in prison on espionage charges two years later.

According to the New York Times, multiple US officials said they had discussed releasing Chinese citizen Xu Yanjun, 42, who was convicted in the US on espionage charges two years ago and sentenced to 20 years in prison. Xu was first Chinese government intelligence officer ever to be extradited to the US to stand trial, the Justice Department said.

As of Wednesday morning, Xu was listed in the Bureau of Prisons system as "not in BOP custody".

The deal marks a diplomatic win for Biden in the final months of his presidency.

It follows the release of another American considered wrongfully detained: David Lin, a pastor who had been jailed in China from 2006 until his release in September.

During his four years in the White House, Biden oversaw the release of more than 70 Americans, including from Russia, Venezuela and Iran.

On Wednesday, the US also lowered its travel advisory level for mainland China to Level 2: Exercise increased caution.

China criticises Trump tariff threat, says it won't solve America's problems

28 November 2024, Reuters, Joe Cash

China attacked U.S. President-elect Donald Trump's pledge to slap additional tariffs on Chinese goods over fentanyl flows, saying his incoming administration was pushing the blame for America's opioid crisis onto China.

Trump, who takes office on Jan. 20, said on Monday he would impose a 10% tariff on Chinese goods so that Beijing does more to stop the trafficking of Chinese-made chemicals used in the highly addictive narcotic.

He had threatened tariffs in excess of 60% on Chinese goods while on the campaign trail.

"China's position against unilateral tariff increases is consistent," He Yadong, a spokesperson for the commerce ministry, told a regular news briefing on Thursday. "Imposing arbitrary tariffs on trading partners will not solve America's own problems."

He added that the U.S. should abide by World Trade Organization rules and work with China to promote stable economic and trade relations.

Trump's comments fired the starting gun for what analysts expect to be a bruising four-year trade war, potentially much worse than his first term which saw tariffs of 7.5%-25% levied and global supply chains uprooted.

Indeed, Howard Lutnick, Trump's pick to run the Commerce Department and oversee the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, said in a podcast interview in October that "China is attacking America" with fentanyl and suggested Trump might levy tariffs as high as 200% on China.

Editorials in China's state media this week have warned new duties could drag the world's top two economies into a mutually destructive tariff war.

DEJA VU

There was already an eerie sense of déjà vu on Thursday after China's state media praised some U.S. firms for "strong collaboration" - commentary reminiscent of how tensions with the U.S. were covered by the Chinese press during the previous trade war.

Back then, U.S. corporate executives and foreign investors would scour Chinese state media for signals as to which U.S. firms might be in favour and which might be penalised as tensions ratcheted up.

The state-owned Global Times late on Wednesday highlighted Apple (AAPL.O), opens new tab, Tesla (TSLA.O), opens new tab, Starbucks (SBUX.O), opens new tab and HP (HPE.N), opens new tab.

"U.S. politicians need to pay attention to and respect the evident willingness of American businesses for economic and trade cooperation by tailoring suitable policy environments for enterprises," it said.

The China Daily also noted that Morgan Stanley (MS.N), opens new tab received regulatory approval in March to expand its China operations, citing this as evidence of foreign financial firms' enthusiasm for investing in China.

"Neither side was good about communicating policy directly, so business was busy looking at the tea leaves and trying to separate signal and noise in traditional and social media," a Beijing-based American executive said of the first trade war.

The executive was not authorised to speak to media and declined to be identified.

The U.S.-China trade war during Trump's first term saw China threaten to ban U.S. companies from importing, exporting and investing in China with the creation of the "Unreliable Entity List".

At the time, Global Times reported the list would target U.S. companies such as Apple, Cisco Systems (CSCO.O), opens new tab and Qualcomm (QCOM.O), opens new tab. But China never followed through on the threat and to date the list has only included U.S. companies involved in the sale of arms to Taiwan.

Bo Zhengyuan, a Shanghai-based partner at consultancy Plenum, said he expected Beijing would not rush to use tools like the Unreliable Entity List in the immediate wake of any formal tariff announcement once Trump is in power, given the weak state of the Chinese economy.

But Beijing could retaliate later if it felt U.S. policymakers were harming China's commercial interests.

"There was collateral damage last time, and there will be collateral damage this time," he added.

China's been trying to 'Trump-proof' its economy amid his tariff threats, experts say

27 November 2024, ABC News, Selina Wang

Exports from China to the United States fell 20% last year.

Key U.S. trading partners are better equipped now to deal with President-elect Donald Trump's tariff threats than they were during his first administration, according to experts.

China has spent the last several years trying to "Trump-proof" its economy, reducing its reliance on U.S. trade. Exports from China to the U.S. fell 20% to $427 billion in 2023.

"China's been trying to Trump-proof its economy for the last few years," said Neil Thomas, a fellow for Chinese politics at the Asia Society Policy Institute's Center for China Analysis. "We know from Trump's first term that tariff threats are often used as an opening salvo for diplomatic negotiations, so I expect there's going to be a lot of behind-the-scenes diplomacy."

Trump on Monday announced he plans to impose a 10% additional tariff on Chinese imports, as well as 25% tariff on products coming from Canada and Mexico.

American markets, so far, are mostly shrugging off Trump's latest tariff threat with stock indexes mixed.

But the Canadian dollar and Mexican peso fell against the U.S. dollar and socks of global carmakers also fell – suggesting investors are waiting to see if Trump makes good on his proposals.

China has shifted and diversified exports to other regions, including Europe and Latin America. It has also increased investments in manufacturing in Southeast Asia, Europe, and Latin America, according to Scott Kennedy, Chinese business and economics specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

The bigger concern for China is Trump's campaign vow to slap 60% tariffs on Chinese imports. That tariff threat could still come.

Trump's latest reason for imposing tariffs on China is the flow of fentanyl into the United States.

Beijing's Ministry of Foreign Affairs pushed back on Trump's claim that China hasn't done enough to stop the flow of illicit drugs.

"China is willing to continue to carry out anti-drug cooperation with the United States on the basis of equality, mutual benefit and mutual respect," it said. "The United States should cherish China's goodwill and maintain the hard-won good situation of Sino-US anti-drug cooperation."

Cooperation on fentanyl is one of the big wins from President Joe Biden's diplomacy with Chinese leader Xi Jinping. According to one senior administration official, China has been "helpful" on curbing the flow of precursor chemicals and they've been abiding by their commitments.

"Trump wants to take credit for that win [on fentanyl cooperation], and he wants to get even more out of Beijing than Biden to show that his approach to diplomacy is superior," Thomas said.

Thomas said given the fact that China is still struggling to revive its economy post-pandemic, it's possible China could take further steps on fentanyl and impose the death penalty on a few major exporters.

Experts say Beijing will likely try to use Elon Musk and other American businesses with operations in China to try to persuade the Trump administration to moderate his policies on China.

In retaliation to the tariffs, Beijing could also revoke some of the preferential treatment that it gives Tesla.

US blacklists 29 more Chinese companies over alleged forced labour in Xinjiang

23 November 2024, SCMP, Robert Delaney

Products of offending firms range from hi-tech inputs such as polysilicon to food products like tomato paste, according to Homeland Security

The US government put more than two dozen Chinese companies on a blacklist meant to block imports of products made with forced labour, bringing the number of targeted firms to more than 100.

Products made by the 29 companies added to the Department of Homeland Security's Uyghur Forced Labour Prevention Act (UFLPA) entity list range from hi-tech inputs, such as polysilicon, to food products like tomato paste, according to the department's announcement on Friday.

The restrictions will take effect on November 25.

The US Congress passed the UFLPA in 2021 to target imports from Xinjiang Uyghur autonomous region in western China to prevent the entry of goods made under such conditions.

The law has since seen sanctions imposed on Chinese officials accused of being complicit in labour and human-rights abuses there as well as companies. About two-thirds of Xinjiang's nearly 26 million people are members of ethnic minorities, including the mostly Muslim Uyghur and Kazakh groups.

Accusations of human-rights abuses, mass detention and forced labour in Xinjiang, mainly targeting the Uyghur population, have been regularly denied by Beijing.

"Today's enforcement actions make it clear – the United States will not tolerate forced labour in the goods entering our markets," Robert Silvers, US Homeland Security undersecretary for policy, said in Friday's announcement.

"We urge companies to take responsibility, know their supply chains and act ethically."

Asked for comment, the Chinese embassy in Washington called UFLPA a tool for the suppression of China.

"Using falsehoods as a basis, the US has enacted and implemented the UFLPA to impose sanctions on relevant entities and individuals in Xinjiang," said spokesman Liu Pengyu. "This is another act of the US' suppression of China under the pretext of human rights. It is also a blatant violation of international trade rules that further destabilizes global industrial and supply chains."

The companies named in Friday's announcement included those based in Xinjiang, such as Xinjiang Nonferrous Metals Industry Group, and some in other provinces and municipalities, like Tianjin Tianwei Food Company, which source commodities from the region for their final products.

Xinjiang Daqo New Energy Company, another newly targeted firm, produces high-purity polysilicon materials, which are used in semiconductors and solar panels.

The US government "has reasonable cause to believe, based on specific and articulable information, that Xinjiang Daqo ... sources silicon powder from" Xinjiang, the Homeland Security Department said.

Most of the newly targeted companies are in the agricultural sector, while the others mine and process copper, lithium, beryllium, nickel, manganese and other metals.

The UFLPA allows for a "rebuttable presumption" that any materials produced in Xinjiang are at risk of being tainted with forced labour, creating a "guilty-until-proven-innocent" principle for the products of companies on the law's entity list.

Companies can appeal if they provide "clear and convincing" evidence to customs authorities that their supply chains are free of forced labour.

China rebuffs meeting with US defense secretary

19 November 2024, CNN, Haley Britzky and Oren Liebermann

China rejected a meeting with Defense Secretary Lloyd Austin during a conference in southeast Asia this week, marking the latest turn in a tumultuous relationship between the two countries' defense leaders.

Austin sought to meet with his Chinese counterpart, Dong Jun, at the ASEAN Defense Ministers' Meeting-Plus in Laos as part of a long-standing effort to maintain military lines of communication between the US and the People's Republic of China. But China did not accept the offer, pointing to a recent Taiwan arms sale as their rationale, a senior defense official told reporters traveling with Austin in Laos.

Three weeks ago, the US approved a $2 billion arms sale to Taiwan, including a first-time provision of advanced surface-to-air missiles to the self-governed island. China immediately criticized the sale, promising to take "resolute countermeasures" to defend its sovereignty.

The Chinese rejection of the meeting in Laos comes just days after US President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping met in Peru for their final meeting under Biden's administration. National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan said the meeting was "candid, constructive, [and] wide ranging," but that Biden would not act as a conduit between the Chinese government and the incoming Trump administration. China has often used the cancellation of meetings and lines of communication as a way of registering displeasure with the United States. After then-House Speaker Nancy Pelosi visited Taiwan in 2022, China cut off a number of lines of communication with the US, including on military issues and climate.

The rejection comes after a seeming improvement in military-to-military communications between the two countries over the last year or so.

Taiwan, Democracy, Development Are China's 'Red Lines', Xi Tells Biden

16 November 2024, U.S. News

China's President Xi Jinping told his U.S. counterpart Joe Biden that the issues of Taiwan, democracy, human rights and rights to development are "red lines" for China and not to be challenged, the official state media Xinhua said on Sunday.

Xi warned the United States not to get involved in bilateral disputes over islands and reefs in the South China Sea or "aid or abet the impulsion to make provocations" in that region, it said.

China and United States would roil or even see relations take a setback in rivalry with each other, but could make considerable progress by treating each other as partners and friends, Xi told Biden on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic forum summit in Peru, according to Xinhua.

During meeting with Biden, China's Xi cautions US to 'make the wise choice' to keep relations stable

16 November 2024, WCVB

China's leader Xi Jinping met for the last time with U.S. President Joe Biden on Saturday but was already looking ahead to President-elect Donald Trump and his "America first" policies, saying Beijing "is ready to work with a new U.S. administration."

During their talks on the sidelines of the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit, Xi cautioned that a stable China-U.S. relationship was critical not only to the two nations, but also the "future and destiny of humanity."

"Make the wise choice," he cautioned. "Keep exploring the right way for two major countries to get along well with each other."

Without mentioning Trump's name, Xi appeared to signal his concern that the incoming president's protectionist rhetoric on the campaign trail could send the U.S.-China relationship into another valley.

"China is ready to work with a new U.S. administration to maintain communication, expand cooperation and manage differences so as to strive for a steady transition of the China-U.S. relationship for the benefit of the two peoples," Xi said through an interpreter.

Xi, who is firmly entrenched atop China's political hierarchy, spoke forcefully in his brief remarks before reporters. Biden, who is winding down more than 50 years of public service, talked in broader brushstrokes about where the relationship between the two countries has gone. He reflected not just on the past four years but on the decades the two have known each other.

"We haven't always agreed, but our conversations have always been candid and always been frank. We've never kidded one another," Biden said. "These conversations prevent miscalculations, and they ensure the competition between our two countries will not veer into conflict."

Biden was expected to urge Xi to dissuade North Korea from further deepening its support for Russia's war on Ukraine. The leaders, with top aides surrounding them, gathered around a long rectangle of tables in an expansive conference room at Lima's Defines Hotel and Conference Center.

China "hosted" the meeting this year, after Xi and Biden met a year ago on the APEC sidelines in Northern California, a gathering hosted by the U.S. They had much to discuss, including China's indirect support for Russia, human rights issues, technology and Taiwan, the self-ruled democracy that Beijing claims as its own.

There's much uncertainty about what lies ahead in the U.S.-China relationship under Trump, who campaigned promising to levy 60% tariffs on Chinese imports.

Already, many American companies, including Nike and eyewear retailer Warby Parker, have been diversifying their sourcing away from China. Shoe brand Steve Madden says it plans to cut imports from China by as much as 45% next year.

In a congratulatory message to Trump after his victory over Vice President Kamala Harris, Xi called for the U.S. and China to manage their differences and get along in a new era. In front of the cameras Saturday, Xi spoke to Biden — but it was unmistakable that his message was directed at Trump.

"In a major flourishing sci-tech revolution, neither decoupling nor supply chain disruption is a solution," Xi said. "Only mutual, beneficial cooperation can lead to common development. 'Small yard, high fence' is not what a major country should pursue."

After he was greeted by Xi, Biden ignored shouted questions from reporters on his concerns about the incoming Trump administration as well as North Korea. The leaders also did not engage reporters after they made their brief comments at the start of the meeting.

Biden administration officials would advise the Trump team that managing the intense competition with Beijing will likely be the most significant foreign policy challenge they will face, White House national security adviser Jake Sullivan said.

Biden has viewed his relationship with Xi as among the most consequential on the international stage and put much effort into cultivating it. The two first got to know each other on travels across the U.S. and China when both were vice presidents, interactions that both have said left a lasting impression.

"For over a decade, you and I have spent many hours together, both here and in China and in between," Biden said. "We've spent a long time dealing with these issues."

But the last four years have presented a steady stream of difficult moments.

The FBI this week offered new details of a federal investigation into Chinese government efforts to hack into U.S. telecommunications networks. The initial findings have revealed a "broad and significant" cyberespionage campaign aimed at stealing information from Americans who work in government and politics.

U.S. intelligence officials also have assessed China has surged sales to Russia of machine tools, microelectronics and other technology that Moscow is using to produce missiles, tanks, aircraft and other weaponry for use in its war against Ukraine.

And tensions flared last year after Biden ordered the shooting down of a Chinese spy balloon that traversed the United States.

Biden is looking for Xi to step up Chinese engagement to prevent an already dangerous moment with North Korea from further escalating.

Biden, South Korean President Yoon Seok Yul and Japanese Prime Minister Shigeru Ishiba on Friday condemned North Korean leader Kim Jong Un's decision to send thousands of troops to help Moscow repel Ukrainian forces who have seized territory in Russia's Kursk border region.

Biden called it "dangerous and destabilizing cooperation."

White House officials have expressed frustration with Beijing, which accounts for the vast majority of North Korea's trade, for not doing more to rein in Pyongyang.

The North Koreans also have provided Russia with artillery and other munitions, according to U.S. and South Korean intelligence officials. And the U.S., Japan and South Korea have expressed alarm over Pyongyang's stepped-up cadence of ballistic missile tests.

Kim ordered testing exercises in the lead-up to this month's U.S. election and is claiming progress on efforts to build capability to strike the U.S. mainland.

Xi and Biden started their day at the leaders' retreat at the APEC summit, taking part in a photo where they all wore scarves made from vicuña wool, a symbolic animal for Peru. It's common practice that leaders at these gatherings are given a gift — usually traditional clothing of the host country — that they don for the photo.

U.S. companies could be caught in the crosshairs if China retaliates to fight Trump

15 November 2024, CNBC, Eunice Yoon

With President-elect Donald Trump's trade and foreign policy team taking a hawkish stance toward China, U.S. companies are increasingly concerned a hard-line approach could stunt their prospects in the world's second-largest economy — and turn them into targets of Chinese retaliation.

Trump has threatened to hit China with at least 60% tariffs and vowed to end reliance on the country. That alone would be disruptive. It would force companies to scramble to find other sources of supply, American consumers to pay higher prices at the store, and, according to many experts, lead to job losses.

On top of that, the Chinese government could respond with an expanded tool kit to target American businesses.

"The Trump administration's actions may be seen or may be interpreted as economic war," Scott Kennedy, senior advisor at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, told reporters in Beijing on Thursday. "If they are interpreted in that way, China might have a much more vigorous response, not limited to tariffs."

Those actions could range from economic changes to matters of diplomacy and security, Kennedy said, adding China may "push back as hard as they can."

More combative relations between the U.S. and China also brings the risk of public backlash amid rising Chinese nationalism. The Chinese government has strong controls over information flow which has led to consumer boycotts of international brands.

"The worst part is the consumer brands that are not of a strategic nature and themselves are not controversial and would not be subject to export restrictions might be punished by the local consumer because of their nationality," said, Michael Hart, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in China. "Since Covid, companies have been looking to diversify and bolster their supply chains, but there are still no easy and reliable replacements for the supply chains and manufacturing that has developed in China over the past decades."

China's retaliation tool kit

During Trump's first term, the Chinese government retaliated against U.S. tariffs by imposing its own tariffs on U.S. imports.

The U.S.-China Business Council, in conjunction with Oxford Economics, estimates a new tit-for-tat tariff battle could result in a "permanent loss of revenue and pressure businesses to slash jobs and investment plans" with as many as 801,000 net job losses by 2025.

The report projected that Nevada, Florida and Arizona would be among the states hardest hit by such tariffs due to their economic reliance on consumer demand. Manufacturing states such as Indiana, Kansas, Michigan and Ohio would also be vulnerable, the Oxford report found. Swing states Nevada, Arizona and Michigan all flipped to Trump in the 2024 election, helping to deliver him back to the White House.

During the last trade battle, China also stopped buying agricultural products from the U.S. The move targeted key U.S. exports like soybeans, disproportionately hurting rural parts of the U.S. where Trump has strong support.

James McGregor, a business consultant on China for three decades, said he sees Beijing using its leverage on U.S. agricultural purchases if it feels pressed this time, too.

"China is already focused on ridding itself of dependence on U.S. farm products. If alternative supplies are available, China may well shift away from American farmers where they can," McGregor said.

Two years ago, China started importing corn from Brazil. The country is now China's biggest supplier of corn, surpassing the U.S.

Beijing could also broaden its retribution methods to include targeting U.S. companies operating on Chinese soil.

The business climate in China has tightened meaningfully since Trump's first term. Despite the Chinese leadership's stated efforts to welcome international companies, AmCham China's 2024

Business Climate Survey Report found 39% of companies polled felt less welcome in China.

Tougher laws, tightening regulations

There's also the risk of legal and regulatory changes in China that could threaten U.S. companies.

In recent years, China made significant revisions to its export control regulations. Those tighter controls have restricted critical metals for the American clean energy and semiconductor sectors.

Analysts foresee China doing the same during a Trump second term, aiming to deprive U.S. industry of key minerals and components.

Beijing has also enhanced laws like an anti-foreign sanctions law that triggers probes, fines and restrictions on operations in the country.

Even before the U.S. election, Beijing had shown signs of targeting certain American companies. For example, PVH, the owner of Calvin Klein, is under investigation thanks to this law.

China has an upgraded anti-espionage law, which international business groups like AmCham China have criticized for what they say is "ambiguity" in the policy.

The law has led to executive and staff detentions and raids on international firms and has made it easier for officials to impose exit bans, barring the accused from leaving the country.

Many worry that the day-to-day regulatory grind to operate in China could become a bigger slog under a heightened retaliatory environment.

Since Trump's first term, Chinese leader Xi Jinping has consolidated power even further.

If Xi signals that U.S. companies are out of favor, they can expect regulations for permits, safety checks, licensing and other approvals to be interpreted more harshly by lower-level officials, experts say.

"We will likely see retaliation against American companies in China where they could be step-by-step squeezed out of the China market and replaced," McGregor said.

Biden and Xi will meet in Peru as US-China relations tested again by Trump's return

14 November 2024, AP, Aamer Madhani

President Joe Biden will hold talks Saturday with China's Xi Jinping on the sidelines of an international summit in Peru, a face-to-face meeting that comes as Beijing braces for Donald Trump's return to the White House.

White House National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan said the meeting will take place while the two leaders are in Lima for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit. That will come just over two months before Trump's inauguration.

Sullivan was opaque about how Biden and administration officials will answer expected questions from Xi and his aides about the incoming Trump administration.

"Transitions are uniquely consequential moments in geopolitics. They're a time when competitors and adversaries can see possibly opportunity," Sullivan said. "And so part of what President Biden will communicate is that we need to maintain stability, clarity, predictability through this transition between the United States and China."

During his campaign against Vice President Kamala Harris, Trump promised to slap blanket 60% tariffs on all Chinese exports to the U.S., a move that would jolt the already tumultuous relationship between Beijing and Washington.

Washington and Beijing have long had deep differences on the support China has given to Russia during its war in Ukraine, human rights issues, technology and Taiwan, the self-ruled democracy that Beijing claims as its own. A second Trump administration is expected to test U.S.-China relations even more than the Republican's first term, when the U.S. imposed tariffs on more than $360 billion in Chinese products.

That brought Beijing to the negotiating table, and in 2020, the two sides signed a trade deal in which China committed to improve intellectual property rights and buy an extra $200 billion of American goods. A couple of years later, a research group showed that China had bought essentially none of the goods it had promised.

The White House has been working for months to arrange a final meeting between Xi and Biden before the Democrat leaves office in January.

Sullivan traveled to Beijing in late August to meet with his Chinese counterpart and also sat down with Xi. After that, Sullivan indicated that there could be a final meeting between Xi and Biden at APEC or at next week's summit of the Group of 20 top economies in Rio de Janeiro, which both leaders are scheduled to attend.

Biden has sought to maintain a steady relationship with Xi even as his administration repeatedly has raised concerns about what it sees as malign actions by Beijing.

U.S. intelligence officials have assessed China has surged sales to Russia of machine tools, microelectronics and other technology that Moscow is using to produce missiles, tanks, aircraft and other weaponry for use in its war against Ukraine. The administration last month imposed sanctions against two Chinese companies accused of directly helping Russia build long-range attack drones used against Ukraine.

Tensions flared last year after Biden ordered the shooting down of a Chinese spy balloon that traversed the United States. And the Biden administration has criticized Chinese military assertiveness toward Japan, the Philippines and Taiwan.

On the campaign trail, Trump spoke of his personal connection with Xi, which started out well during his first term before becoming strained over disputes about trade and the origins of the COVID-19 pandemic.

In a congratulatory message to Trump after his victory over Harris, Xi called for the U.S. and China to manage their differences and get along in a new era, according to Chinese state media.

Biden, for his part, is expected in the meeting with Xi to focus on efforts to stem the flow of Chinese-manufactured chemicals used to make fentanyl, concerns about Beijing's indirect support for Russia's war in Ukraine, cybersecurity concerns and the importance of maintaining military-to-military communications.

Sullivan added that he expected that Biden would also raise an ongoing U.S. investigation into an alleged Chinese hacker operation targeting cellphones used by Trump, Vice President-elect JD Vance, and people associated with the Harris campaign.

Saturday's talks will be the third meeting between Biden and Xi during Biden's presidency. They met in Woodside, California, last November on the sidelines of the 2023 APEC summit, and the leaders last spoke by phone in April.

Sullivan also announced that Biden while at APEC will hold a joint meeting with South Korean President Yoon Suk Yeol and Japan's new prime minister, Shigeru Ishiba.

That meeting is a follow-up on the historic Camp David summit Biden hosted in August 2023 with Yoon and Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida.

Biden has nudged the United States' two closest Asian allies to further tighten security and economic cooperation with each other amid their shared concerns about North Korea's nuclear provocations as well as China's military and economic assertiveness in the Pacific.

The historic rivals have been divided by differing views of World War II history and Japan's colonial rule over the Korean Peninsula from 1910 to 1945.

Investigation into Chinese hacking reveals 'broad and significant' spying effort, FBI says

14 November 2024, AP

A federal investigation into Chinese government efforts to hack into U.S. telecommunications networks has revealed a "broad and significant" cyberespionage campaign aimed at stealing information from Americans who work in government and politics, the FBI said Wednesday. Hackers affiliated with Beijing have compromised the networks of "multiple" telecommunications companies to obtain customer call records and gain access to the private communications of "a limited number of individuals," according to a joint statement issued by the FBI and the federal Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency.

The FBI did not identify any of the individuals targeted by the hackers but said most of them "are primarily involved in government or political activity." The hackers also sought to copy "certain information that was subject to U.S. law enforcement requests pursuant to court orders," the FBI said, suggesting the hackers may have been trying to compromise programs like those subject to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, which grants American spy agencies sweeping powers to surveil the communications of individuals suspected of being agents of a foreign power."

The warning comes after several high-profile hacking incidents that U.S. authorities have linked to China, part of what they say is an effort to steal technological and government information while also targeting vital infrastructure like the electrical grid.

In September, the FBI announced that it had disrupted a vast Chinese hacking operation known as Flax Typhoon that involved the installation of malicious software on more than 200,000 consumer devices, including cameras, video recorders and home and office routers. The devices were then used to create a massive network of infected computers, or botnet, that could then be used to carry out other cyber crimes.

Last month, officials said hackers linked to China targeted the phones of then-presidential candidate Donald Trump and his running mate, Sen. JD Vance, along with people associated with Democratic candidate Vice President Kamala Harris. Authorities did not disclose how or if the operations announced Wednesday are connected to the earlier campaigns.

In their statement Wednesday, the FBI and CISA said officials are working with the telecommunication industry and hacking victims to shore up defenses against continuing attempts at cyberespionage.

"We expect our understanding of these compromises to grow as the investigation continues," the agencies wrote.

China has rejected accusations from U.S. officials that it engages in cyberespionage directed against Americans. A message left with China's embassy in Washington was not immediately returned Wednesday.

China Issues Donald Trump a Warning Over Taiwan

11 November 2024, News Week, Billal Rahman

China has warned President-elect Donald Trump to handle issues related to Taiwan "prudently" to avoid "severely damaging" relations between Beijing and Washington.

Beijing, which views Taiwan as a breakaway province, pledged to take "all necessary measures" to uphold its "One China" principle. Under the first Trump administration, Washington and Beijing went toe-to-toe on trade, tariffs and tech.

In response to a question about Trump and Taiwan, Liu Pengyu, spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in the U.S., told Newsweek: "The Taiwan question is the most important and most sensitive issue in China-U.S. relations.

"The U.S. government needs to earnestly abide by the One China principle and the three China-U.S. joint communiqués and prudently handle Taiwan-related issues so as to avoid severe damage to China-U.S. relations and cross-Straits peace and stability."

Newsweek has contacted the Trump campaign for comment via email.

This comes after the U.S. announced it will be providing Taiwan with a surface-to-air missile defense system as part of a $2 billion arms package in response to escalating tensions with China.

The arms package, which was approved in October, includes three National Advanced Surface-to-Air Missile Systems and related equipment valued at up to $1.16 billion, according to the U.S. State Department's Bureau of Political-Military Affairs. It also features radar systems estimated to be worth $828 million.

In response, the Chinese Embassy said: "The sales seriously undermine China's sovereignty and security interests, harm China-U.S. relations and peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait, and send a gravely wrong message to 'Taiwan independence' separatist forces. China strongly condemns and firmly opposes this and has lodged serious protests with the U.S."

The U.S., Taiwan's closest ally, maintains strong ties with the island, which is crucial to Western foreign policy and influence in the Indo-Pacific region.

U.S. relations with China and Taiwan are complex, and the "One China" policy, established in the 1970s, is central to this relationship. Under this, the U.S. acknowledges Beijing's stance that there is only one China, including Taiwan, while not explicitly endorsing China's sovereignty over Taiwan. This ambiguous stance allows the U.S. to maintain unofficial relations with Taiwan, supporting it in various ways without officially recognizing it as an independent state.

Meanwhile, Beijing cautioned Trump that raising tariffs on Chinese goods could harm the American economy.

During his campaign, Trump pledged to impose 60 percent tariffs on all Chinese exports, a move that would significantly impact China's economy. Tariffs are central to Trump's "America First" economic strategy, designed to protect U.S. industries and stimulate domestic growth.

Dean of the School of Business and Management at Notre Dame de Namur University John M. Veitch told Newsweek, "there will be significant losses to the economy" if a trade war is reignited.

"China is not in a particularly strong economic situation right now. They have seen weakening in important sectors like construction and real estate," he said. "Their central bank has recently implemented new monetary policies and tools to try to stimulate capital markets and the economy broadly.

"Trade wars always have very asymmetric impacts on an economy—overall consumers will lose as they pay higher prices for imported goods and likely higher prices for U.S. goods whose prices were previously held in check by possible imports. This will be a large loss to the economy as a whole and probably a loss that consumers themselves will feel, especially given U.S. consumer sensitivity to past inflation."

In response to Trump's comments suggesting he would impose "massive tariffs" on China if it "went into Taiwan" and that Taiwan might have to pay for U.S. protection, a spokesperson for China's Taiwan Affairs Office said the people of Taiwan had a clear understanding of U.S. policy.

"Whether the United States is trying to protect or harm Taiwan, I believe most of our Taiwan compatriots have already made a rational judgment and know very clearly that what the United States pursues is always America first," Zhu Fenglian told a regular news briefing.

"Taiwan at any time may turn from a pawn to a discarded child," Fenglian said, without referring to Trump by name.

Chinese State Media Mocks US Election as 'Battle of Five Presidents' While Analysts Warn of Propaganda Motives

07 November 2024, China Scope

On the eve of the US presidential election, China's state television CCTV posted a topic on Weibo about "Five US Presidents in a Chaos Battle," which quickly became a trending topic. Chinese netizens reacted to the post with mockery and criticism of the US electoral system by Chinese netizens. The five presidents mentioned in the post were Donald Trump,

Joe Biden, Barak Obama, Bill Clinton, and Jimmy Carter, all of whom were politically active during this last election cycle.

CCTV's post described President Biden as "out," Trump as "nearly physically eliminated due to assassination attempts," and claimed former presidents Obama, Clinton, and Carter were "interfering" (in the election cycle), turning the election into a "battle of five kings." The post garnered 150 million views and sparked extensive discussion.

Chinese social media users criticized the US election process, with some describing it as lacking civility and democratic atmosphere, comparing it to a marketplace quarrel or gang fight. The topic "#USElection" attracted nearly 15.3 billion views on Weibo.

Analysts note that this coverage is part of China's internal propaganda strategy to shape public opinion against the US democratic system. An anonymous source from Chongqing stated that Chinese state media regularly crafts anti-US narratives to control public opinion while avoiding any mention of internal political conflicts within the CCP.

Dr. Du Shengcong, a media expert from Taiwan's Ming Chuan University, describes the Weibo post as "gaseous language" – low-brow statements meant to reach mass audiences. He said that "state media should be more responsible in their reporting" to avoid misinterpretation. He noted, despite pre-election chaos, US democratic institutions continue to function normally after elections."

China urges U.S. cooperation as Trump trade threat looms

07 November 2024, CNBC, Evelyn Cheng

China emphasized the need for greater cooperation with the U.S., a day after it became clear President-elect Donald Trump would become the next leader of the White House.

"The Chinese side is willing, on the basis of mutual respect, peaceful coexistence and win-win cooperation, to increase communication with the U.S., expand cooperation and resolve differences," He Yongqian, spokesperson at China's Ministry of Commerce, told reporters Thursday in Mandarin, according to a CNBC translation.

She was responding to a question about China's views and planned countermeasures, given the potential for increased U.S. tariffs and restrictions on high-end tech.

"Together [we can] push China-U.S. economic and trade relations toward a stable, healthy and sustainable direction, for the benefit of both countries and the world," the commerce spokesperson said. Her comments echoed those of Chinese President Xi Jinping, who earlier in the day noted the benefits of bilateral cooperation in a congratulatory message to Trump, according to a Ministry of Foreign Affairs readout.

Washington turned tougher on Beijing under Trump's first four-year term that began in 2017. This year, the president-elect threatened additional tariffs on Chinese goods while campaigning for his second mandate.

Yue Su, principal economist at the Economist Intelligence Unit, said Trump will likely impose such tariffs in the first half of next year. She added that the White House leader could speed up the process by invoking the International Emergency Economic Powers Act or Section 122 of the Trade Act of 1974, which allows the president to impose tariffs of up to 15% in response to a serious balance-of-payments deficit.

Other analysts are less concerned about a significant increase in U.S. tariffs targeting China.

"Trump's current tariff proposal is likely the worst-case scenario," David Chao, Global Market Strategist, Asia Pacific (excluding Japan) at Invesco, said in a note Thursday. "I suspect the new administration will hold off imposing these tariffs in order to win concessions, whether that may be more purchases of American soybeans or even geopolitical ones."

He added, "More so, I don't think Trump's proposed 60% tariff policy on China will significantly impact [multinational corporations'] confidence or sentiment."

Chao nevertheless said that a potential 10% tariff on all exports to the U.S. would likely have a bigger impact, weakening global demand and hitting China and the rest of Asia.

October

Exclusive: China's Xi pressed Biden to alter language on Taiwan

29 October 2024, Reuters, Trevor Hunnicutt, Laurie Chen and Yimou Lee

Chinese President Xi Jinping asked U.S. President Joe Biden last year to change the language the United States uses when discussing its position on Taiwanese independence, according to two U.S. officials familiar with the private conversation.

During last November's Biden-Xi meeting near San Francisco, Xi and his aides asked Biden and his team to tweak the language in U.S. official statements.

China wanted the U.S. to say "we oppose Taiwan independence," rather than the current version, which is that the United States "does not support" independence for Taiwan, said the people, who requested anonymity to speak about private diplomatic exchanges they participated in or were briefed on.

Xi's aides have repeatedly followed up and made the requests in the months since, according to two U.S. officials and another person familiar with the exchanges.

The U.S. has declined to make the change.

The White House responded to a request for comment with a statement that repeated the line that Washington does not support Taiwan independence. "The Biden-Harris administration has been consistent on our long-standing One China policy," the statement read.

China's foreign ministry said: "You should ask this question to the U.S. government. China's position on the Taiwan issue is clear and consistent."

Taiwan's foreign ministry declined comment.

The defeated Republic of China government fled to Taiwan in 1949 after losing a civil war with Mao Zedong's communists.

The Republic of China remains Taiwan's formal name and the government says it has no plans to change that given they are already a sovereign, independent state and Beijing has no right to claim Taiwan as its own.

SENSITIVE ISSUE

For several years, Chinese diplomats have pushed the United States to make changes to how it refers to Taiwan's status, which remains the most sensitive area in U.S.-China relations. The unusually direct and renewed push at the leader level has not been reported previously.

The United States severed official relations with the government in Taipei in 1979 but is bound by law to provide democratically governed Taiwan with the means to defend itself. China claims Taiwan as its own territory and has never renounced the use of force to bring the island under its control.

It was not clear why Xi chose to raise the issue with Biden, but he has made opposition to Taiwan independence a focus of his time in office and China's military has significantly ramped up its activities around the island in recent years.

The Biden administration regards the proposed language change as a non-starter.

Taiwan was briefed on the recent overtures at a high level by Washington, said one of the sources.

Intel invests US$300 million in China chip packaging and testing plant

28 October 2024, SCMP, Coco Feng

The US chip giant aims to expand an existing chip packaging and testing facility in China, its largest market

US semiconductor giant Intel said it would expand its chip packaging and testing base in Chengdu, in a show of commitment to the mainland market despite a recent call by a Beijing-backed cybersecurity group to review the company's products.

In addition to enlarging packaging and testing capacity for server chips, the facility will also establish a "customer solutions centre to improve the efficiency of the local supply chain, increase support for Chinese customers and improve response time", Intel China said on Monday on its WeChat account.

The Santa Clara, California-based company will inject US$300 million into its local entity, Intel Products (Chengdu), to support the expansion, according to a WeChat post published by the city's Reform and Development Commission.

Launched in 2003, Intel's Chengdu plant is responsible for the packaging and testing of more than half of the company's laptop processors shipped worldwide. Packaging and testing is the final step in semiconductor manufacturing, ensuring the quality and reliability of a product.

The facility plays a critical role in Intel's global supply chain, while Chengdu provides a "favourable" business environment that paves the way for the company's "stable growth", Intel CEO Patrick Gelsinger said during a visit there last year. Chengdu is the capital of China's southwestern Sichuan province.

The fresh investment comes less than two weeks after the Cyber Security Association of China recommended a cybersecurity review of Intel products sold in the country, citing a series of vulnerabilities previously found in the firm's central processors.

Intel's China unit said at the time that it would "maintain communications with the relevant authorities" and demonstrate its "commitment to product safety and quality".

Despite rising tensions between Beijing and Washington, China remains Intel's largest market, contributing 27 per cent of the firm's total revenue last year, compared with 26 per cent from the US.

Intel, which is struggling to compete against rivals in a chip market that is increasingly focused on artificial intelligence, reported a loss of US$1.6 billion in the second quarter, swinging from a year-earlier profit of US$1.5 billion. The firm warned of "weaker spending across consumer and enterprise markets, especially in China".

Chinese Hackers Are Said to Have Targeted Phones Used by Trump and Vance

25 October 2024, The New York Times, Devlin Barrett, Jonathan Swana and Maggie Haberman

The targeting of the Republican presidential ticket's phones is part of what appears to be a wide-ranging effort to gather information about American leaders. Chinese hackers targeted data from phones used by former President Donald J. Trump and his running mate, Senator JD Vance of Ohio, as part of what appears to be a wide-ranging intelligence-collection effort, people familiar with the matter said on Friday. Investigators are working to determine what communications data, if any, was taken or observed by the sophisticated penetration of telecom systems, according to these people, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to describe an active and highly sensitive national security case.

The type of information on phones used by a presidential candidate and his running mate could be a gold mine for an intelligence agency: Who they called and texted, how often they communicated with certain people and how long they talked to those people could be highly valuable to an adversary like China. That sort of communications data could be even more useful if hackers could observe it in real time.

The Trump campaign team was made aware this week that Mr. Trump and Mr. Vance were among a number of people inside and outside government whose phone numbers had been targeted through the infiltration of Verizon phone systems, the officials said.

People briefed on the matter said Democrats were among the targets, including staff members of Vice President Kamala Harris's campaign and prominent figures on Capitol Hill, including Senator Chuck Schumer of New York, the majority leader.

The targeting of a presidential ticket's communications underscores the aggressiveness, scope and potential severity of the hacking attack, which Western cybersecurity experts believe was carried out by a group they have called Salt Typhoon.

The investigation is continuing, but the F.B.I. and national security officials have signaled that they are deeply concerned about the potential extent of compromised data and the wide range of possible victims.

Without identifying those who were targeted, the F.B.I. and the Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency issued a joint statement attributing the hacking to "actors affiliated with the People's Republic of China."

The agencies said they “are collaborating to aggressively mitigate this threat and are coordinating with our industry partners to strengthen cyberdefenses across the commercial communications sector.” They said they had informed potential victims.

It was unclear whether the hackers could have gained access to text messages, especially those sent through unencrypted channels.

Trump campaign officials were told that the hackers might still be inside Verizon’s systems, but that it was unclear whether they were actively trying to take out data. In hacking investigations, observing hackers’ activities within a compromised system can sometimes provide valuable information to investigators.

Data about the communications of a presidential and vice-presidential candidate — even absent the content of the calls and messages — could also help an adversary like China better identify and target people in Mr. Trump’s inner circle for influence operations.

The revelation came in the closing stages of a campaign in which Mr. Trump’s team has also been targeted by Iranian hackers, who have repeatedly sent his inner circle spearphishing emails that were at least partly successful in gaining access to his campaign’s communications and documents.

Security around Mr. Trump has also been tightened as a result of assassination threats from Iran.

A Trump campaign spokesman did not directly address whether the phones used by Mr. Trump and Mr. Vance had been targeted. But in a statement, the spokesman, Steven Cheung, criticized the White House and Ms. Harris and sought to blame them for allowing a foreign adversary to target the campaign. Earlier this year, security officials discovered the presence in American telecommunications systems of a China-affiliated hacking group. But investigators determined only recently that the hackers were targeting specific phone numbers, the officials said.

The infiltration by the hackers extends beyond the 2024 political campaign, with multiple people said to be targeted, people familiar with the investigation said, suggesting it could have far-reaching national security implications.

The investigation into the extent of the hacking and any national security damage is in its early stages. Whether such an attack could monitor or record phone conversations is difficult to know, and whether the hackers could read or intercept texts, for example, would depend in no small part on which messaging apps the targets used and how that data moved over the phone company’s systems.

The Wall Street Journal reported last month that a cyberattack linked to the Chinese government had infiltrated some U.S. broadband providers’ networks and might have been able to get information from systems used by the federal government in FISA court wiretap efforts.

A spokesman for Verizon, Rich Young, said in a statement that the company was “aware that a highly sophisticated nation-state actor has reportedly targeted several U.S. telecommunications providers to gather intelligence.” He said Verizon is assisting law enforcement agencies in the investigation and working to address any continuing problems.

Oversight Committee Releases Report Exposing the CCP’s Destructive Political Warfare and Influence Operations

24 October 2024, Oversight

Staff report finds that the Biden-Harris Administration lacks a government-wide strategy to counter China’s tactics and provides recommendations to help federal agencies secure America House Committee on Oversight and Accountability Chairman James Comer (R-Ky.) released a staff report today titled “CCP Political Warfare: Federal Agencies Urgently Need a Government-Wide Strategy.” The report, which includes information obtained during the Committee’s government-wide investigation into 25 federal sectors, details how the Biden-Harris Administration is dangerously behind in implementing measures to combat the Chinese Communist Party’s (CCP) influence and infiltration campaign. The Oversight Committee conducted multiple hearings, held dozens of briefings, and found that most agencies’ solutions and policies either ignore, placate, or only weakly address the CCP’s efforts to influence and infiltrate the United States. To counter CCP political warfare, the report offers recommendations for federal agencies to use existing resources to defend America and critical U.S. industries.

“The House Oversight Committee has exposed the CCP’s political warfare and is working to ensure the federal government formulates a cohesive strategy to combat CCP threats and protect all Americans. The CCP is successfully infiltrating and influencing communities and critical sectors across this nation and the Biden-Harris Administration is asleep at the wheel. Today’s report details how federal agencies have failed to understand, acknowledge, or develop a plan to combat CCP political warfare and Americans are left to fend for themselves. It is past time for federal agencies to take this threat seriously and fulfill their responsibilities to the American people. Our report offers several solutions federal agencies can implement now with existing resources to address the CCP threat and protect the American people,” said Chairman James Comer (R-Ky.).

Below are some key findings from the report:

- The report exposes the CCP for what it is—a totalitarian force that enslaves its own people, surveils and harasses critics of the Party and people of Chinese descent around the world, poisons tens of thousands of Americans every year with fentanyl, and actively seeks to destroy America. It seeks the downfall of the United States because the CCP views the American way of life as a threat to the authoritarian grip it desperately seeks to maintain.
- The CCP has identified America as its main enemy—against which it has waged infiltration and influence operations for decades. Unlike the first Cold War, the adversary is already within, having entrenched itself within U.S. borders, institutions, businesses, universities, and cultural centers by capturing elites in influential circles.
- The report details what federal agencies, who work for the American people, are doing and failing to do to defend against CCP unrestricted warfare. While CCP infiltration and influence operations target every sector and community in America, much of the federal government under the Biden-Harris Administration has failed to understand, acknowledge, and strategically combat CCP political warfare.
- It is wholly unacceptable that federal agencies have failed to deter CCP unrestricted warfare, let alone to establish a cohesive government-wide strategy to do so, when the CCP has waged this war without weapons for decades.
- To assess how each agency is fulfilling its duties to the American people, the Committee has scored each agency on key metrics—including strategy, knowledge and expertise, transparency and outreach to the American people, and collaboration with relevant partners and stakeholders.

Below are some recommendations from the report:

- Federal agencies should use existing resources to defend America from CCP unrestricted warfare. A successful government-wide strategy must include four components: (1) acknowledgment of and transparent communication about CCP political warfare; (2) rejection of country agnostic and foreign malign influence-focused approaches and embracing of targeted strategies; (3) fostering the depth of knowledge needed to defeat unrestricted warfare; and (4) engaging the American people about the CCP threat and providing resources when appropriate that thwart CCP ambitions.

- Principled leaders who are willing to speak candidly about CCP infiltration of influential circles, communities, and businesses across the United States can turn the tide in America's favor.

China rivalry will continue 'into the next decade,' U.S. ambassador tells NBC News

24 October 2024, NBC, Janis Mackey Frayer and Jennifer Jett

Ambassador Nicholas Burns said the world's two biggest economies will remain locked in competition even as they try to improve ties.

The U.S. will judge China "on its actions, not just its words," the U.S. ambassador to China, Nicholas Burns, told NBC News, as the two rival powers try to improve ties even as they remain locked in competition that he said would continue "into the next decade."

Both countries have expressed the desire for a stabler relationship, especially after relations plunged to their lowest level in decades early last year when the U.S. military shot down an alleged Chinese spy balloon that had been spotted over the continental U.S. Last month, the U.S. and China's top commanders in the Indo-Pacific resumed formal communications for the first time since 2022, which is vital for avoiding inadvertent military conflict.

"It's very important that we have these channels of communication," Burns said in an exclusive interview in Beijing on Wednesday. "But you know, we're going to judge the People's Republic of China on its actions, not just its words."

The world's two biggest economies are increasingly viewing each other through the lens of national security, including in strategically important sectors such as semiconductors, quantum computing, artificial intelligence and biotechnology.

"We're structural rivals," Burns said. "So I see this competition extending for years into the next decade."

President Joe Biden has maintained and in some cases expanded tariffs imposed by former President Donald Trump that China views as intended to restrict its development in areas such as electric vehicles and solar panels. U.S. officials in turn accuse the Chinese government of "overcapacity" in those areas that results in overseas markets being flooded with lower-priced Chinese goods that undercut domestic competitors.

The two countries are also competing for influence in the Asia-Pacific, where China has been increasing its military activity in the South China Sea and around Taiwan, the Beijing-claimed island democracy whose most important international backer is Washington. Burns criticized live-fire drills and other military exercises that China, which has not ruled out the use of force to achieve unification, has held near Taiwan in recent days.

In addition to continuing to arm Taiwan, the Biden administration has made a point of strengthening relations with allies in the region, including South Korea, Japan and the Philippines, to counter China's growing power.

Farther afield, the U.S. has accused China of supplying Russia with dual-use technology for use in its war against Ukraine, sanctioning a number of Chinese companies.

"What's troubling for us is the fact that China says that it's neutral in the Russia-Ukraine war, and yet its actions are the opposite," Burns said, "so that is a major problem in this relationship."

China, which has strived to portray itself as neutral in the conflict, says it has never supplied weapons to Russia and that it strictly controls exports of dual-use goods. On Thursday, the Chinese Commerce Ministry reiterated its opposition to U.S. sanctions.

The "most profound difference" in U.S.-China relations, Burns said, "is that we believe in human freedom and human rights, and so we are a critic of what's happening in Xinjiang, in Tibet, in Hong Kong, the lack of religious freedom."

China, which denies rights abuses in its western region of Xinjiang, responded to criticism from the U.S. and others at the United Nations on Tuesday by saying the world's primary concern right now should be the "living hell" in the Gaza Strip, where there are warnings of "catastrophic" levels of hunger as Israel continues its assault on the Palestinian enclave. Though the relationship is primarily competitive, the Biden administration also seeks opportunities for cooperation with China, Burns said, in areas of vital global importance such as illicit drugs, artificial intelligence and climate change. China and the U.S. are the world's two biggest greenhouse gas emitters. "We want to be responsible for our own people but also for the world as we conduct this relationship," Burns said.

Biden administration officials and U.S. lawmakers have made a series of visits to China in recent months, and Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping had a face-to-face meeting in California in November and a phone call in April.

During their summit last year, the two leaders said there should be more people-to-people exchanges between their countries, including in academics, business and tourism.

But change has been slow.

Since the Biden-Xi summit 11 months ago, Burns said, Chinese security services have tried to impede 94 different U.S. Embassy events meant to bring Chinese and American people together, including by pressuring Chinese citizens not to attend and intimidating those who do.

"They can't have it both ways," Burns said. "You can't say you want to promote people-to-people contacts and then try to actively impede them."

China denied similar allegations by Burns in June, with a Chinese Foreign Affairs Ministry spokesperson calling them "factually inaccurate."

The number of direct commercial flights between the two countries is still far below the number before the Covid-19 pandemic, and there are only about 800 Americans studying in China, down from a high of about 15,000 a decade ago.

By contrast, there are about 300,000 Chinese students in the U.S., though some have complained of being subjected to lengthy interrogations or having even been turned away by immigration officials despite having valid visas.

American views of China have hit an all-time low, according to a poll released Thursday. A majority of Americans, 55%, say the U.S. should actively work to limit the growth of China's power, according to the poll, from the Chicago Council on Global Affairs.

Optimism among U.S. businesses in China is also at a record low, according to a survey released last month by the American Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai, with companies citing geopolitical tensions as their top concern.

Burns, who has been in his role for 2½ years, declined to comment on the U.S. presidential election.

He said U.S. officials did not discuss it with the Chinese government except to warn against election interference, though he declined to comment on whether there was any evidence of Beijing doing so. China has said it has no intention of interfering in the election.

Burns said the Biden administration is "clear-eyed" about the threat China poses to the U.S. but that there are also times when the two countries' interests overlap.

"It's a complicated relationship. It's a very challenging relationship," he said. "But it's without any question the most consequential relationship that we Americans have with any other country."

Cold War legislative barrage: House passes 25 anti-China bills in one week

21 October 2024, People's World, Duncan McFarland And Krista Chan

Reflecting U.S. determination to escalate tensions with China, the House of Representatives passed 25 bills in one week in September aimed at "countering" supposed Chinese influence and addressing alleged national security concerns.

Initiated by the Republican-led Select Committee on the Chinese Communist Party, the stated goal of the legislative onslaught was to deal with “the threat posed by the Chinese Communist Party and develop a plan of action to defend the American people, our economy, and our values.”

In reality, the anti-Communist, anti-China policy program is based on racial profiling, xenophobia, and the desire to maintain U.S. global hegemony.

H.R. 1398, entitled “Protect America’s Innovation and Economic Security from the Chinese Communist Party,” is a revival of the Trump-era “China Initiative.” This Department of Justice program targeted primarily Chinese and Chinese American scientists accused of doing research that threatened U.S. national security.

The bill’s declared aim is to “curb spying by the Chinese Communist Party on United States intellectual property and academic institutions.” Under the Trump administration, the DOJ targeted hundreds of Chinese American academics and scientists, many of whom lost their jobs, but not a single supposed Chinese spy was ever prosecuted. Instead, the climate of fear and racism led many Chinese scientists to return to China.

Jane Wu, a prominent neuroscience researcher at the University of Illinois, was persecuted and her lab was shut down; she then took her own life. Rep. Judy Chu, D-Calif., chair of the Asian Pacific American Caucus, denounced the bill as “an egregious outcome of xenophobic and fear-mongering rhetoric.”

Also notable is H.R. 1157, the Countering the PRC Malign Influence Fund Authorization Act of 2023, which allocates $1.6 billion over five years for the State Department and USAID to fund media and civil society groups around the world to counter China’s “malign influence.”

The real goal of this heavy spending is to smear and undermine China’s Belt and Road Initiative, an international development and cooperation plan that includes 150 participating countries. The bill passed with a bipartisan 351-36 majority.

The House also passed the BIOSECURE Act, aimed at prohibiting contracts with biotechnology companies that have relationships with a “foreign adversary.” While China is not named in the bill, five Chinese companies are explicitly mentioned.

After the release of the bill, one of the companies, WuXi AppTec, said its inclusion in the ban was “a preemptive and unjustified designation without due process that the Company strongly objects to.” Additionally, members of Congress failed to acknowledge the strong reliance of U.S. pharmaceutical supply chains on some of the targeted Chinese companies and the danger their anti-China legislative crusade could pose to health in the U.S.

H.R. 9456, “Protecting American Agriculture from Foreign Adversaries Act” would prohibit the sale of farmland to Chinese immigrants and nationals if they are deemed a national security threat, such as by purchasing land located near a U.S. military installation.

The Countering CCP Drones Act attempts to block the sale of Chinese-manufactured drones, already widely in use in the U.S. The “Securing Global Telecommunications Act” is aimed at Chinese telecommunications equipment manufacturers, such as Huawei. The various other measures target a long list of products, such as Chinese EVs and batteries—crucial to managing climate change—and even profitable Wall Street investments in Chinese tech companies.

Many Asian and Chinese American advocacy groups have spoken out against the 25 anti-China bills. Having passed the House of Representatives, the bills are now being considered by the Senate.

While their final passage is uncertain, what’s already confirmed is that the latest barrage of anti-China propaganda helps prepare U.S. public opinion for conflict or war with China—an outcome that would be a disaster for the working class in this country and everywhere.

Racist “yellow peril” stereotypes are being whipped up, reminiscent of McCarthy-era repression targeting progressives and Communists. Countering the anti-China hate speech and fear-mongering with factual and balanced narratives and reporting is an urgent necessity. The reality is that China is not an “enemy” but rather a country that continuously seeks to cooperate with the U.S. on urgent global issues such as climate change, health, and peace.

US to curb AI investment in China soon

21 October 2024, Reuters, Karen Freifeld

U.S. rules that will ban certain U.S. investments in artificial intelligence in China are under final review, according to a government posting, suggesting the restrictions are coming soon.

The rules, which will also require U.S. investors to notify the Treasury Department about some investments in AI and other sensitive technologies, stem from an executive order signed by President Joe Biden in August 2023 that aims to keep American investors’ know-how from aiding China’s military.

The final rules, which target outbound investment to China in AI, semiconductors and microelectronics and quantum computing, are under review at the Office of Management and Budget, the posting showed, which in the past has meant they will likely be released within the next week or so.

"It looks to me like they're trying to publish this before the election," said former Treasury official Laura Black, a lawyer at Akin Gump in Washington, referring to the Nov. 5 U.S. presidential election. Black added that the Treasury office overseeing the regulations generally provides at least a 30-day window before such regulations go into effect.

The Treasury Department published proposed rules, opens new tab with a raft of exceptions in June and gave the public a chance to comment. The draft rules placed the responsibility on U.S. individuals and companies to determine which transactions will be restricted.

A Treasury Department spokesperson declined to comment.

Black expects the final rules to further clarify the scope of coverage over artificial intelligence and the threshold for limited partners.

The proposed rules banned transactions in AI for certain uses, and involving systems trained in using a specified quantity of computing power. They required notification of transactions related to the development of AI systems or semiconductors not otherwise prohibited.

Publicly traded securities such as index funds or mutual funds, certain limited partnership investments, and certain syndicated debt financings were among proposed exceptions.

DJI sues US department of defence over military company blacklist designation

19 October 2024, MyIndMakers

Chinese drone manufacturer DJI has filed a lawsuit against the U.S. Department of defence (DoD), contesting its inclusion on a blacklist of Chinese military companies. The company announced the legal action on Saturday, challenging the Pentagon's classification, which it claims is incorrect.

"On October 18, DJI filed a lawsuit to challenge the Department of Defence's (DoD) erroneous designation of the company as a 'Chinese military company,'" DJI said in a statement to AFP. The company firmly asserted its independence from the Chinese military, stating, "DJI is not owned or controlled by the Chinese military, and the DoD itself acknowledges that DJI makes consumer and commercial drones, not military drones." DJI added, "DJI is a private company and should not be misclassified as a military company."

DJI has been under increased scrutiny by Washington in recent years, partly due to allegations that its drones have been used to surveil ethnic minorities in China. Additionally, its drones have reportedly been deployed by both sides in the ongoing Ukraine war. In 2022, the Pentagon included DJI on its list of Chinese military-linked companies, claiming that China uses civilian entities such as DJI to access advanced technologies that contribute to military advancements. The Pentagon's statement highlighted concerns about China's Military-Civil Fusion strategy, which aims to modernise the People's Liberation Army (PLA) by leveraging civilian technology.

DJI, founded in 2006, said it had engaged with the DoD for over 16 months in an effort to address the classification before resorting to legal action. The company reiterated, "DJI is not owned or controlled by the Chinese military, and the DoD itself acknowledges that DJI manufactures consumer and commercial drones, not military drones. DJI is a private company and should not be misclassified as a military company."

The lawsuit is the latest development in a series of actions by the U.S. government targeting Chinese technology companies over national security concerns. Last month, the U.S. Department of Commerce banned the sale of vehicles incorporating Chinese technology due to similar risks. DJI, a global leader in consumer and commercial drone manufacturing, produces drones used in various industries, including aerial photography, filmmaking, agriculture, search and rescue, and public safety.

Controversy has also followed DJI in the context of the Russia-Ukraine conflict. The Ukrainian government accused DJI of assisting Russia by providing its AeroScope system, which allegedly helped guide missile strikes. DJI has denied these allegations and suspended business operations in both Russia and Ukraine in April 2022 to reevaluate compliance with international regulations.

In addition to the current lawsuit, DJI was blacklisted by the U.S. Department of the Treasury in 2021 over claims that it supported the surveillance of the Uyghur minority in China's Xinjiang region, further straining its relationship with U.S. authorities.

The outcome of DJI's legal battle against the Department of Defence could have broader implications for Chinese tech companies operating under increasing scrutiny in the U.S.

Xi says China willing to be a partner, friend with the US

16 October 2024, Reuters

Chinese President Xi Jinping said a successful partnership between China and the United States is an opportunity for the two countries to be enablers for each other's development rather than an obstacle, according to state media on Wednesday.

"China is willing to be a partner and friend with the United States. This will benefit not only the two countries, but the world," Xi said in remarks from a letter to the 2024 annual awards dinner of the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations, according to a CCTV news report.

Xi pointed out that China-U.S. relations are among the most important bilateral relations in the world, which have a bearing on the future and destiny of mankind, according to the letter.

The two countries have been at odds over national security concerns, ongoing trade spats as well as China's actions in the South China Sea and intensified military drills around Taiwan.

Trade relations soured over the past year and have centred around issues including restrictions on electric vehicles and advanced semiconductors.

"China has always handled China-U.S. relations in accordance with the principles of mutual respect, peaceful coexistence and win-win cooperation, and has always believed that the success of China and the United States is an opportunity for each other," Xi said.

China slaps sanctions on 3 US firms, 10 senior execs over weapons sales to Taiwan

10 October 2024, Reuters

China's foreign ministry on Thursday announced it had imposed sanctions on three U.S. military-linked firms and 10 senior executives over U.S. weapons sales to Taiwan.

The steps taken against the firms, including Edge Autonomy Operations LLC, Huntingdon Ingalls Industries Inc and Skydio Inc, became effective on Thursday and will freeze any property within China, the foreign ministry said in a statement.

Chinese hackers access US telecom firms, worrying national security officials

06 October 2024, CNN, Sean Lyngaas and Evan Perez

A highly skilled group of Chinese government-linked hackers has in the last several months infiltrated multiple US telecommunications firms in a likely search for sensitive information bearing on national security, multiple sources briefed on the matter told CNN.

US investigators believe the hackers potentially accessed wiretap warrant requests, two of the sources said, but officials are still working to determine what information the hackers may have obtained. US broadband and internet providers AT&T, Verizon and Lumen are among the targets, the sources said.

US officials are concerned about the potential national security damage done by the hacking, which they only recently discovered. It's the latest sophisticated hack targeting US federal agencies that investigators have linked to China, and it comes amid tensions between Washington and Beijing over cyber-espionage and other high-stakes national security issues.

As the backbone of internet and phone communications, US telecom firms hold enormous volumes of caller and user data. US law enforcement agencies request access, through a warrant, to specific portions of that data as part of criminal and national security investigations.

Some of those investigations would be of keen interest to Beijing. The US government has in recent years brought charges against Chinese government agents for allegedly harassing Chinese nationals on US soil and for hacking political dissidents and American companies.

AT&T and Lumen declined to comment. Verizon did not respond to multiple requests for comment.

The Justice Department and the FBI declined to comment.

The Chinese Embassy in Washington, DC, denied that Beijing-backed hackers had breached US telecom firms, calling that information "a distortion of the fact." Embassy spokesperson Liu Pengyu accused the US of "politicizing cybersecurity issues to smear China."

The Wall Street Journal first reported on the hacking activity.

US officials have briefed the House and Senate intelligence committees on the Chinese hacking campaign, two sources said. Cybersecurity experts from Microsoft and Google-owned firm Mandiant have been helping to investigate the hacking activity. People probing the hacks have been struck by the hackers' skill, persistence and ability to burrow into computer networks, the sources briefed on the matter said. The Chinese hacking team in question is known in the cybersecurity industry as Salt Typhoon.

"We track Salt Typhoon and have seen activity consistent with public news reports," a Microsoft spokesperson told CNN. "When we see nation state activity, we provide customers with information to investigate as appropriate."

Yet the Chinese government has an array of other hacking teams at its disposal that can conduct espionage or disrupt computer networks, according to US officials and private experts. FBI Director Christopher Wray has said that Chinese government-backed hackers outnumber FBI cyber personnel 50 to 1.

Another Chinese government-backed hacking group has been lurking in US transportation and communication networks, waiting to use that access to disrupt any US response to a potential Chinese invasion of Taiwan, US officials have alleged.

Yet another Chinese group broke into the unclassified email accounts of senior US diplomats last year on the eve of a high-profile visit by Secretary of State Antony Blinken to China, CNN reported.

Seeking to sway public opinion in the face of detailed US government allegations, China has increasingly accused the US government of conducting cyberattacks against Chinese organizations.

Hacking and information operations are a regular point of contention in bilateral meetings. Chinese leader Xi Jinping told US President Joe Biden that China would not interfere in the 2024 presidential election when the two men met in California last year, CNN previously reported.

Transnational repression endangers Americans: US diplomat

09 October 2024, RFA

China's model of authoritarianism is not limited by sovereign borders, the official said.

Growing efforts by China to silence critics living in the United States are "extremely dangerous" threats to the security of Americans, the top U.S. diplomat for human rights said at a forum Wednesday.

Dafna Rand, who was confirmed in August as the new assistant secretary of state for democracy, human rights and labor after being vetted by senators in February, said regular Americans should care about the "great power competition" with China because Beijing's human rights abuses were being exported to their backyards.

At an event hosted by the International Republican Institute, Rand said she viewed the emerging power rivalry with China as one centered on values, with the United States backing open society and democracy.

By contrast, she said, Beijing acts zealously to crush dissent.

"Not only do they go after dissidents and political oppositionists and civil society and journalists and bloggers within the PRC, but now are emboldened to go after dissidents ... who have been exiled, or fled," Rand said, using an acronym for the People's Republic of China.

"This is extremely dangerous to the American taxpayer – this means that the United States is fair game for PRC and others," she said. "This is a world where security is not confined to the nation state."

Transnational repression

China's government has been repeatedly accused of trying to silence critics living in the United States by making threats, harassing or even outright attacking dissidents who dare to speak out against it.

People protesting against Chinese President Xi Jinping during his visit to San Francisco last year were attacked by pro-Xi supporters, for instance, and Chinese students studying in American colleges say they fear being monitored by fellow students if they criticize Beijing.

Uyghurs living in the United States have likewise reported fears about speaking publicly against the genocide occurring against their people in China due to threats against family still trapped in the country.

However, Chinese officials have denied any orchestration of attacks on government critics. In some cases, they have turned the blame back on U.S. officials for apparently fabricating the claims due to an anti-China bias, and in others have said regime supporters are the real victims.

Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, repeated those denials in an email to Radio Free Asia.

"The Chinese government strictly abides by international law and fully respects other countries' sovereignty in law enforcement. There is no such thing as 'transnational repression' of so-called 'dissidents,'" Liu said. "This is an issue concocted by the U.S. to slander China."

"By attacking China's reasonable and lawful law enforcement operations, the U.S. will encourage more Chinese criminals to seek political asylum in the U.S. and serve as a 'haven for crime,' which will eventually shoot itself in the foot," the spokesperson said.

Double standards

At the event on Wednesday, Rand also acknowledged that for geopolitical reasons the United States often supports governments that have been found to have committed human rights violations.

She said she viewed her role as the new head of the State Department's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor as advocating for changes that chip away at that double standard.

"This is the core of DRL's raison d'être and daily work," Rand said, adding that State Department officials were "having really fruitful and productive and constructive debates every day" on the issues.

U.S. foreign policy would always be about "balancing" Washington's "global security concerns" with its human rights agenda, she explained, with her office in charge of gradually convincing rights-abusing U.S. partners that "essentially, this is not good for our partnership."

Joe Biden 'sent Xi Jinping congratulatory message' to mark China's 75th National Day

05 October 2024, SCMP, Kinling Lo

Chinese foreign ministry publicises US leader's message on its website in press briefing format, saying only that it was received 'recently'

Chinese President Xi Jinping received a congratulatory message from US President Joe Biden to mark the 75th anniversary of the People's Republic of China this week, marking the latest top-level exchange as tensions persist in China-US relations.

The news was made public by the Chinese foreign ministry in a statement published on its website on Saturday evening.

The ministry reported the message in a question-and-answer format, noting that it was a response to media questions.

"President Joe Biden recently sent a message of congratulations to President Xi Jinping on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China," the official English-language statement said.

"In the message, President Biden noted that 'on behalf of the people of the United States, I send our congratulations to you and the people of the People's Republic of China as you celebrate the 75th anniversary of its founding. The American people and I convey our best wishes to the people of the People's Republic of China'."

The statement did not specify when the message was sent and in what format.

China celebrates the founding of the People's Republic on October 1, which usually marks the start of a week-long national holiday.

The diplomatic move comes at a delicate time in bilateral ties, with the two countries engaged in a wide-ranging rivalry, from trade and tech to influence in the Asia-Pacific.

China carried out military drills in the contested South China Sea on October 1, following a joint exercise in the region by the navies of the US, Philippines, Japan, Australia and New Zealand at the weekend.

The last exchange between the two presidents was in April, when they held a phone call on topics including cybersecurity and climate change. Their last in-person meeting was nearly a year ago, held on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in California last November.

The presidential message also came as the US Department of State appeared to deviate from its past diplomatic practice of sending a formal congratulatory message ahead of China's National Day.

The department published a congratulatory message from Secretary of State Antony Blinken on its website at 8am Beijing time, on Thursday, October 3. It has traditionally congratulated China before its National Day, as it does with all countries with which it has diplomatic ties.

It did so on September 29 last year and on September 30 in 2022.

The White House had not released any official statement on Biden's message as of Saturday evening.

On October 1, the official Chinese government website also posted an article published each year by state news agency media Xinhua on congratulatory messages received by China on its National Day.

The article did not note any messages received from the US.

The first few paragraphs mentioned messages from Russia and North Korea, the same as last year.

In 2019, when China celebrated the 70th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic, the article noted Russia's message first, followed by the United States and then North Korea.

US bans Chinese steel and food-additives firms over Xinjiang human rights

03 October 2024, SCMP, Bochen Han

Latest additions to Uygur Forced Labour Prevention Act's entity list show American drive to rid its supply chain of forced labour presses on

The US is banning imports from two more Chinese companies over alleged human-rights abuses involving Uygurs, it was revealed on Wednesday, the latest development in America's drive to eliminate goods made with forced labour from its supply chain. The companies joining the Department of Homeland Security's Uygur Forced Labour Prevention Act (UFLPA) entity list are Baowu Group Xinjiang Bayi Iron and Steel, a subsidiary of the world's largest steelmaker, and Changzhou Guanghui Food Ingredients, a food-additives manufacturer. The restrictions take effect on October 3.

Wednesday's announcement marks the first time that steel and aspartame companies have been added to the list, which also includes entities in the agriculture, apparel, batteries, chemicals, electronics, household appliances, plastics and polysilicon sectors.

Now the total number of sanctioned mainland China-based companies stands at 75, according to the department.

"No sector is off-limits," said Robert Silvers, an undersecretary for policy at Homeland Security.

"We will continue to identify entities across industries and hold accountable those who seek to profit from exploitation and abuse."

The UFLPA, signed into law in 2021, created a "rebuttable presumption" that any materials produced in the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region are at risk of being tainted with forced labour. The "guilty-until-proven-innocent" principle effectively inverted US customs laws related to forced labour. Companies can appeal if they provide "clear and convincing" evidence to customs authorities that their supply chains are free of forced labour.

Homeland Security on Wednesday said state-owned Xinjiang Bayi has "repeatedly participated" in the transfer and receipt of ethnic minorities from Xinjiang, such as Uygurs and Kyrgyz, by way of Xinjiang government labour programmes.

As for Changzhou Guanghui, the department said the Jiangsu-based company sourced aspartame and aspartame inputs from Xinjiang.

The international community in recent years has increasingly voiced concern about the situation in Xinjiang, where the Chinese government has been accused of committing genocide and crimes against humanity targeting Uygurs and other religious and ethnic minority groups.

The alleged crimes include arbitrary detention, destruction of religious sites, forced labour, rape, sterilisation and torture.

Beijing has repeatedly and vehemently denied claims of forced labour, instead portraying its government work schemes as poverty-alleviation programmes.

"The US is again spreading false stories on Xinjiang, putting sanctions illegally on Chinese companies in the name of human rights," said Liu Pengyu, spokesperson for the Chinese embassy in Washington.

In blacklisting the companies, the US was "hurting the right to subsistence, employment and development of people in Xinjiang", Liu added.

Since the UFLPA took effect in 2022, US Customs and Border Protection has inspected 9,791 shipments totalling US$3.56 billion, denying entry to 3,976 of them.

Still, US House lawmakers last week voiced concern that the act has been insufficiently enforced and called for stronger implementation.

China, US to hold talks on economic and trade issues, Xinhua reports

01 October 2024, Reuters

Chinese Commerce Minister Wang Wentao and his U.S. counterpart will hold a call in the near future on trade and economic ties, China's state-run Xinhua news agency reported on Tuesday, citing people familiar with the matter.

They will exchange views on bilateral economic and trade relations and key issues of mutual concern, including restrictions on electric vehicles (EVs), Xinhua reported.

During a two-day working group meeting in Beijing last month with a U.S. delegation, Chinese officials expressed "grave" concerns about additional U.S. tariffs, investment restrictions, and Russia-related sanctions.

A new round of U.S. tariffs on $18 billion of Chinese goods including EVs, EV batteries and solar panels took effect in late September, with lithium-ion batteries bearing the brunt of the levies by value. The U.S. imports nearly zero Chinese EVs.

The tariffs were imposed after a review by the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative of levies that had been previously introduced by former U.S. President Donald Trump in 2018.

The Biden administration said the tariffs were aimed at bolstering protections for strategic domestic industries from China's state-driven excess production capacity. Beijing has vowed retaliation.

China has long accused the United States of containing its economic development and suppressing its technological advancement out of what it says is sheer paranoia. But Beijing has remained open to talks and negotiations, especially given the prospect of Trump returning to the White House.

Trump has said he would consider imposing more tariffs of 60% or more on Chinese goods should he be elected as president again in November.

"In state-to-state relations, the No.1 and overarching question is: are we rivals, or partners?" said Xie Feng, China's ambassador to the United States, at a reception on Monday, the eve of China's National Day.

"China's success does not have to mean a failure of the United States," Xie added.

China's relations with the European Union have also come under renewed strain as Brussels accuses Beijing of flooding the European market with EVs that it says are backed by unfair Chinese industrial policies and subsidies.

The EU is slated to cast a vote on introducing definitive levies on China-made EVs this month.

China taps into AI to ramp up fake-news campaign amid U.S. election

28 September 2024, Fortune, Didi Tang, David Klepper

When veteran U.S. diplomat Kurt Campbell traveled to the Solomon Islands to counter Beijing's influence in the South Pacific country, he quickly saw just how far China would go to spread its message.

The Biden administration's Asia czar woke up one morning in 2022 to a long article in the local press about the U.S. running chemical and biological labs in Ukraine, a claim that Washington calls an outright lie. Started by Russia, the false and incendiary claim was vigorously amplified by China's vast overseas propaganda apparatus.

It was another example of "clearly effective Russian and Chinese disinformation," Campbell told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in July.

Two years later, the claim still reverberates online, demonstrating China's sprawling effort to reshape global perceptions. The campaign, costing many billions per year, is becoming ever more sophisticated thanks to artificial intelligence. China's operations have caught the attention of intelligence analysts and policymakers in Washington, who vow to combat any actions that could influence the November election or undermine American interests. The key tactic: networks of websites purporting to be legitimate news outlets, delivering pro-China coverage that often parallels official statements and positions from Beijing.

Shannon Van Sant, an adviser to the Committee for Freedom in Hong Kong Foundation, tracked a network of dozens of sites that posed as news organizations. One site mimicked The New York Times, using a similar font and design in what she called an attempt at legitimacy. The site carried strongly pro-Chinese messages.

When Van Sant researched the site's reporters she found no information. Their names didn't belong to any known journalists working in China, and their photos bore telltale signs of being created with AI.

"Manipulation of the media is ultimately a manipulation of readers and the audience, and this is damaging to democracy and society," Van Sant said. Liu Pengyu, spokesman for the Chinese Embassy in the U.S., said allegations that China uses news websites and social media to spread pro-Beijing information and influence public opinion in the U.S. "are full of malicious speculations against China, which China firmly opposes."

In addition to its state media, Beijing has turned to foreign players — real or not — to relay messages and lend credibility to narratives favoring the Communist Party, said Xiao Qiang, a research scientist at the School of Information at the University of California, Berkeley. Xiao also is editor-in-chief of China Digital Times, a bilingual news website that aggregates information from and about China.

Beijing's methods are wide-ranging and links to the government are often difficult to prove, Xiao said. But whether it's journalists with American-sounding names or an Indian influencer, the consistently pro-Beijing messages give them away.

"The implicit message is the same — that the Chinese Communist Party works for its people," Xiao said.

Analysts at the cybersecurity firm Logically identified 1,200 websites that had carried Russian or Chinese state media stories. The sites often target specific audiences and have names that sound like traditional news organizations or defunct newspapers.

Unlike Russia or Iran, which have displayed clear preferences in the U.S. presidential campaign, Beijing is more cautious and focused on spreading positive content about China.

While the sites aren't owned by China, they run Chinese content. When Logically looked at content specifically about the U.S. election, 20% could be traced back to Chinese or Russian state media.

"There's a decent likelihood that these articles could influence U.S. audiences without them even knowing where it comes from," said Alex Nelson, Logically's senior manager for strategy and analysis.

According to the Gallup World Poll, more countries surveyed view the U.S. positively, but the share of countries where views of both the U.S. and China are negative overall is higher than 15 years ago, signaling the U.S. doesn't appear to be making gains over China.

Some U.S. officials want to increase spending to even the playing field. The House of Representatives this month approved a bill that would authorize $325 million annually through 2027 to counter China's global influence, including its disinformation campaigns. The measure still needs Senate approval.

"We are in a global competition for influence with China, and if you want to win it, then you cannot do it on a middle-power budget," said Rep. Gregory Meeks, a Democrat from New York.

Chinese President Xi Jinping has demanded a systematic buildup of Chinese narratives that would give his country a global voice "commensurate with" its international stature.

Beijing has invested in state media such as the Xinhua news agency and China Central Television to convey its messages to global audiences in various languages and platforms. Media groups at the local level are creating "international communication centers" to build an overseas presence with websites, news channels and social media accounts.

Beijing also has struck media partnerships worldwide, and the article Campbell read in the Solomon Islands is likely a result of those.

China's outreach is tied to the global race for economic dominance in electric vehicles, computer chips, AI and quantum computing, said Jaret Riddick, a senior fellow at Georgetown University's Center for Security and Emerging Technology.

"The countries that lead on emerging technologies will be the countries that have a great advantage going forward," Riddick said.

To tell its story, Beijing has not shied away from using fake personas. A 2023 State Department report detailed the case of a published writer named Yi Fan, originally described as a Chinese foreign ministry analyst. Yi morphed into a journalist, then became an independent analyst.

Yi's details changed, but the message did not. Through published commentaries and writings, Yi trumpeted close ties between China and Africa, praised Beijing's approach to environmental sustainability and argued that China must counter distorted Western narratives.

Then there was Wilson Edwards, a supposed Swiss virologist quoted in Chinese media as a COVID-19 expert who criticized the U.S. response. But Swiss officials found no evidence he existed.

"If you exist, we would like to meet you!" the Swiss Embassy in Beijing wrote on social media.

Legislation to curb US investment in China is top priority, lawmaker says

26 September 2024, Reuters, Alexandra Alper

The Republican chair of the House of Representatives' select committee on China said on Wednesday that the panel's top priority is legislation restricting U.S. investment in China to stop investors from "funding our own demise."

"We have to have an outbound investment regime that basically says 'No investment in these businesses that are on some kind of a list,' that says 'We shouldn't be helping the Chinese military, we shouldn't be supporting genocide,'" Representative John Moolenaar said, speaking on a panel at the American Enterprise Institute.

"That's probably our number one priority right now," he added. "We are actually funding our demise."

A committee spokesperson confirmed that "genocide" referred to China's alleged treatment of its Uyghur minority in Xinjiang.

The Chinese Embassy in Washington said Beijing firmly opposes "the U.S. overstretching the concept of national security and abusing state power to go after Chinese products and companies." It added that China would "continue to firmly protect the legitimate and lawful rights and interests of Chinese companies."

Moolenaar's remarks signal Congress could revive long-sought restrictions on U.S. investment in China, which have faced a rocky path in Washington.

A measure restricting outbound investment was stripped out of the Chips Act before it was signed into law in 2022. In August 2023, Democratic President Joe Biden issued an executive order giving the Treasury Department the authority to bar or restrict U.S. investments in Chinese entities in three sectors: semiconductors and microelectronics, quantum information technologies and certain artificial intelligence systems.

But rules implementing that order, proposed in July, have yet to be finalized. The Treasury did not respond to a request for comment on the status of the proposed rules.

Moolenaar said House Speaker Mike Johnson "would like to have something before the end of the year." Johnson's office did not respond to a request for comment.

The United States and other Western countries have imposed sanctions on Chinese officials for human rights abuses in Xinjiang, which the United States has said have amounted to genocide.

China rejects allegations of abuses, including use of forced labor in Xinjiang, and describes the camps it has set up there as vocational training centers for Uyghur Muslims that help combat religious extremism.

Moolenaar also flagged specific Chinese companies that he said pose national security threats including Chinese crane maker Shanghai Zhenhua Heavy Industry Co (ZPMC), which was featured in a recent committee report

U.S.-bound cranes made by ZPMC, which accounts for 80 percent of ship-to-shore cranes in operation at U.S. ports, contain unauthorized cellular modems, creating a "significant backdoor security vulnerability," he said.

"ZPMC could disrupt U.S. maritime equipment and technology at the request of the Chinese government, including during a conflict over Taiwan," he said, referring to the democratically governed island that China claims. The company, he said, is a "loaded gun".

Neither ZPMC nor the Chinese embassy in Washington immediately responded to requests for comment on that issue, but ZPMC has in the past said it does not pose a cyber security threat.

Eric Adams Indictment: China Could Lose a Friend in New York

26 September 2024, News Week

An investigation into the campaign finances of New York's Mayor Eric Adams, which resulted in charges of bribery, fraud and soliciting illegal donations from abroad on Thursday, could strip China of an important friend in the United States. Prosecutors allege that Adams took money from wealthy foreign businesspeople and at least one Turkish government official ahead of his 2021 campaign. Adams has already declared his innocence. City Hall did not immediately return a written request for comment.

Adams has been a successful example of the Communist Party building relationships deep within America and Newsweek reported last year on donations to his campaigns by groups in New York linked to China's ruling party.

"Adams is just one target," said Cheryl Yu, China Studies Fellow at the Jamestown Foundation, a nonpartisan international affairs think tank.

Newsweek's reporting has shown that it has been a mutually beneficial relationship maintained through proxies on both sides. In New York and other major U.S. cities, the Communist Party holds sway over hundreds of pro-Beijing groups, whose members help promote the Chinese government's narrative on core issues including democratic freedoms in Hong Kong and the political status of Taiwan.

Winnie Greco, one of Adams' closest aides, is the mayor's strongest link to these myriad Chinese business and cultural nonprofits. She has represented his office at their events and praised the contributions of their senior figures, who have in turn encouraged their members to back his campaigns with votes.

Adams himself has been a regular at quasi-political events organized by the overseas Chinese groups, which often had members of the Chinese consulate in attendance. Rights groups have accused Adams of inadvertently legitimizing Beijing's overseas influence work by rubbing shoulders with pro-Beijing figures, one of whom was arrested last year for running a secret Chinese police station in Manhattan.

Adams' office previously said his attendance was a demonstration of his support for the Chinese American community and not an endorsement of their political positions. Adams' office previously said his attendance was a demonstration of his support for the Chinese American community and not an endorsement of their political positions. Adams was not the only New York politician with close Chinese connections in his administration. Linda Sun, a former chief aide to New York Gov. Kathy Hochul, was charged this month for seeking to influence New York politics on Beijing's behalf.

In May, Newsweek's review of hundreds of pages of City Hall emails, obtained under a freedom of information request, found that New York's celebrated Asian-American parade was set up in 2022 by the founder of a media company that the Justice Department had designated a foreign agent of the Chinese government.

The parade was arranged in conjunction with Greco, who has worked with Adams since his time as Brooklyn borough president and who has traveled with him to China in the past.

The investigation into Adams' administration began last November when federal agents raided the home of his top fundraiser Brianna Suggs, who worked on his successful mayoral campaign in 2021.

Last year, a Newsweek investigation revealed dozens of pro-Beijing figureheads—all suspected of involvement in the Communist Party's overseas influence network—had donated at least $1 million to political campaigns in New York alone since the 1990s. Adams' campaigns received nearly $40,000 in donations from 2015-2023. About two-thirds went toward his last run for City Hall.

Newsweek was not able to establish whether federal prosecutors suspected his campaign of accepting unlawful donations from Chinese foreign nationals. U.S. law forbids green card holders from making financial contributions if they are considered a "foreign principal" or to be acting on behalf of a foreign government without prior registration.

Republicans propose bill that would double tariffs on Chinese imports and end favored trade status

26 September 2024, Fox News

A group of Republican senators is unveiling a new bill that would cease all permanent normal trade relations with China and double the tariffs on Chinese Communist Party (CCP) goods.

The bill would, over five years, increase tariffs by 100% on imports deemed "strategic" to national security by the Biden administration in an effort to force the growth of the domestic market for national security-related goods.

It would boost tariffs on non-strategic goods by a minimum of 35%.

The bill, led by Sen. Tom Cotton, R-Ark., and cosponsored by Sens. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., and Josh Hawley, R-Mo., would also grant the president the authority to institute further tariffs, quotas and bans on specific Chinese goods. It would end "de minimis treatment" for China, or the value threshold below which imports are not subject to customs duties.

The revenue generated from this, according to the bill, would go towards farmers and manufacturers injured by potential Chinese retaliation, the purchase of key munitions important to a Pacific conflict, and paying down the debt.

This comprehensive repeal of China's PNTR [Permanent normal Trade Relations] status and reform of the U.S.-China trade relationship will protect American workers, enhance our national security, and end the Chinese Communists' leverage over our economy," Cotton said in a statement.

"Giving Communist China the same trade benefits that we give to our greatest allies was one of the most catastrophic decisions that our country has ever made," said Rubio.

Economists forecast that China's GDP is expected to grow by nearly 5% in 2024. The U.S.'s forecasted GDP growth is half that.

The legislation falls in line with one of Trump's top priorities: during the presidential debate this month, the former president said again that he would impose a 60% tariff on Chinese goods and a 10% baseline tariff on all imported goods. Vice President Kamala Harris scoffed at that plan as a "a sales tax on the American people."

Earlier this month, China instituted new export controls on a batch of minerals that are critical to the U.S. defense industry, including antimony products.

The little-known flame-retardant metal is used in ammunition, infrared missiles, nuclear weapons and night vision goggles, as well as batteries and photovoltaic equipment. China produced nearly half of the world's antimony last year.

BIDEN ROLLS OUT NEW CHINA TARIFFS

In 2000, the U.S. Congress voted to grant China permanent normal trade relations. The designation fundamentally changed China-U.S. trade relations: American consumers gained access to low-priced Chinese imports and between 2001 and 2021, the value of goods imported from China quadrupled to $500 billion.

"More than two decades ago, Washington elites granted China most favored nation trading status, enabling Beijing to exploit our working class. Congress must revoke this sweetheart deal to protect American workers from our greatest adversary and to bring back the millions of manufacturing jobs shipped overseas," said Hawley.

The Biden administration earlier this month finalized plans to increase tariffs on certain Chinese-made products: the tariff rate would double for electric vehicles, go up 50% on solar cells and 25% on EV batteries, critical minerals, steel, aluminum, face masks and ship-to-shore cranes beginning September 27, according to the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative.

Tariff hikes on other products, like semiconductor chips, are expected to go up over the next two years. Trump implemented sweeping tariffs on about $300 billion worth of Chinese-made products. Biden kept those in place and slapped more tariffs on about $15 billion of Chinese imports.

China is widely expected to respond with tariffs on U.S.-made goods.

Chairman McCaul on House Passage of the STOP CCP Act

25 September 2024, Committee on Foreign Affairs

Washington, D.C. — House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman McCaul (R-TX) issued the following statement after the House passed Rep. Lisa McClain's (R-MI) H.R. 3334, the Sanction Tyrannical and Oppressive People within the Chinese Communist Party (STOP CCP) Act of 2024, which sanctions top Chinese Communist Party (CCP) officials responsible for threatening Hong Kong and Taiwan, violating human rights in China, and infringing upon the sovereignty of Tibet.

"Weakness invites aggression. The Biden-Harris administration's failure to confront the malign actions of the CCP has emboldened Chairman Xi and the perpetrators of territorial aggression across the Indo-Pacific to commit egregious human rights violations in Xinjiang and Tibet. Earlier this year, I met with the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, India and learned firsthand about the abuses the CCP has committed against the Tibetan people, as well as CCP efforts to undermine Tibetan culture, language, and religious beliefs. When the U.S. projects strength through action like this, the world listens."

China to Investigate U.S. Retailer, Sending a Message Over Xinjiang

24 September 2024, The New York Times, Keith Bradsher

PVH, which owns Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger, is targeted for allegedly avoiding purchases from the region where the Chinese government has cracked down on Muslim minorities.

China said on Tuesday that it would investigate whether PVH, the American retailer that owns the Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger brands, has taken "discriminatory measures" against products from Xinjiang in China's far west.

The announcement, by China's Ministry of Commerce, is a new escalation of China's effort to fight bans or consumer boycotts of goods from Xinjiang.

Many Western governments have begun restricting or banning products from Xinjiang following mass arrests and evidence of forced labor among the region's predominantly Muslim ethnic groups, particularly the Uyghurs. Researchers have cited evidence that cotton production in Xinjiang has been tainted by coercion.

Beijing is sending a message to multinational corporations that if they comply with consumer boycotts or government bans on products from Xinjiang, they may face retaliation in China.

China's action underlines how big companies increasingly find themselves sandwiched between pressures from the Chinese government, which defends its policies in Xinjiang, and Western countries and human rights advocacy groups.

PVH, which is based in New York, said in a statement that it was in communication with the Chinese Ministry of Commerce. "PVH maintains strict compliance with all relevant laws and regulations in all countries and regions in which we operate," the company said.

On Friday, the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China, a group with lawmakers from at least 22 countries and the European Union, issued a statement calling for Volkswagen to withdraw from Xinjiang. Volkswagen, Germany's largest automaker, has a 190-employee joint venture in Xinjiang with a carmaker owned by the Shanghai municipal government. Chinese state-owned enterprises like Volkswagen's partner follow Beijing's lead in opposing any withdrawal from Xinjiang.

The alliance issued its statement after Adrian Zenz, the director in China studies at the Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation, issued a report that cited a leaked audit that Volkswagen had commissioned. His report said the automaker had failed to properly investigate accusations of complicity in Xinjiang's coercive policies toward Uyghurs. Volkswagen has said that the audit shows it behaved appropriately.

Volkswagen said on Monday that it was not building cars in Xinjiang, where workers prepare cars for delivery to dealerships.

China is not only a large consumer market but also the world's largest manufacturer. Many companies, particularly apparel retailers, depend heavily on factories in China and could be vulnerable if Beijing decided to impose sanctions on their subsidiaries or suppliers.

In the United States, the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act bans the import of any goods from Xinjiang unless the importer can prove to American customs officials that the products were made without forced labor. The law took effect in June 2022.

Proving that has become practically impossible, as China has banned independent investigations of labor practices in Xinjiang. Advocacy groups say that forced labor is widely used in Xinjiang's vast cotton fields, which supply textile factories all over China. Xinjiang produces more than 90 percent of all the cotton grown in China.

The European Union is in the process of imposing a ban similar to the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act.

When consumer and human rights groups in the West began organizing boycotts several years ago of brands that used cotton from Xinjiang, big clothing brands initially tried to shun Xinjiang suppliers. PVH said in July 2020 that within the next 12 months, it would cease all business relationships with factories and mills that produced garments or fabric in Xinjiang, or that supplied cotton from the region.

China responded the next year by allowing nationalist groups to use the country's heavily censored internet to organize their own boycotts of Western brands that did not buy from Xinjiang. H&M soon found shoppers were shunning its stores.

Influential personalities who had endorsed Tommy Hilfiger and Calvin Klein, as well as Adidas, Nike and Converse, in China quickly stopped working on behalf of the brands. Burberry had to give up an online video game partnership.

Western companies quickly stopped saying much about their policies in Xinjiang. But the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act has given them a strong incentive to avoid Xinjiang products anyway.

China has quietly passed its own laws that ban compliance with laws, sanctions or boycotts in other countries. The commerce ministry has authority to deem commercial decisions as a threat to China's national security.

The Ministry of Commerce said Tuesday that it would allow PVH 30 days to provide documents regarding whether it had avoided buying from Xinjiang. If PVH is found to have violated China's laws, the ministry said, the penalties could include a halt to the company's imports and exports from China, restrictions or bans on investments in China, restrictions or bans on PVH employees from working or entering China, and possibly fines on the company.

The ministry could impose these penalties if it decides to put PVH on its "unreliable entity" list. The ministry added three U.S. defense companies to that list in May because they had sold weapons to Taiwan, an island democracy over which Beijing claims sovereignty. But that decision made little difference because the United States does not allow the defense contractors to sell arms to mainland China anyway.

China's strong threat to PVH comes as the Chinese government has been trying to woo foreign investors. The ministry tried to send a reassuring message, saying that its actions against PVH were aimed at preserving free trade, not suppressing it.

"The Chinese government is determined to promote high-level opening-up, firmly safeguard the multilateral trading system, and firmly safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of various market operators," the ministry said. "Honest and law-abiding foreign entities have nothing to worry about," it added.

Biden tells Quad leaders that Beijing is testing region at turbulent moment for Chinese economy

21 September 2024, News Nation, Zeke Miller and Amer Madhani

President Joe Biden told Indo-Pacific allies on Saturday that he believes China's increasing military assertiveness is an effort to test the region at a turbulent moment for Beijing.

Biden's comments were caught by a hot mic after he and fellow leaders of the so-called Quad delivered opening remarks before the press at a summit he's hosting near his hometown of Wilmington, Delaware. He said his administration sees Beijing's actions as a "change in tactic, not a change in strategy."

China is struggling to pull up its economy that was pummeled by the coronavirus pandemic and has seen an extended slowdown in industrial activity and real estate prices as Beijing faces pressure to ramp up spending to stimulate demand.

"China continues to behave aggressively, testing us all across the region, and it's true in the South China Sea, the East China Sea, South China, South Asia and the Taiwan Straits," Biden told Australian Prime Minister Anthony Albanese, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida. He added, "At least from our perspective, we believe (Chinese President) Xi Jinping is looking to focus on domestic economic challenges and minimize the turbulence in China's diplomatic relationships, and he's also looking to buy himself some diplomatic space, in my view, to aggressively pursue China's interest."

Starting with a trade war that dates back to 2018, China and the United States have grown at odds over a range of issues, from global security, such as China's claims over the South China Sea, to industrial policy on electric vehicle and solar panel manufacturing.

The administration has repeatedly spoken out about concerns about Chinese aggression toward Taiwan and more recently on the frequent clashes between Chinese and Philippine vessels in disputed areas of the South China Sea.

At the summit, the leaders agreed to expand the partnership among the Quad nations' coast guards to improve interoperability and capabilities, with Indian, Japanese and Australian personnel sailing on U.S. ships in the region. But U.S. officials would not say if those transits would include the contested South China Sea.

China also has longtime territorial disputes involving other claimants including Vietnam, Taiwan, Malaysia and Brunei. U.S. officials worry about China's long-stated goals of unifying Taiwan with China's mainland and the possibility of war over Taiwan. The self-ruled island democracy is claimed by Beijing as part of its territory.

The leaders in a joint declaration issued following their talks expressed "serious concern about the militarization ... and coercive and intimidating maneuvers in the South China Sea."

Biden last month dispatched his national security adviser, Jake Sullivan, to Beijing for three days of talks with Chinese officials. Sullivan during that visit also met with Xi.

Both governments are eager to keep relations on an even keel ahead of a change in the U.S. presidency in January. And both sides have said they remain committed to managing the relationship, following up on a meeting between Xi and Biden in San Francisco last November.

The concerns about China were raised as Biden showed off a slice of his Delaware hometown to the leaders of Australia, Japan and India as he hosted what is likely the last gathering of the Indo-Pacific partnership that has grown in prominence under his White House tenure.

When Biden began his presidency he looked to elevate the Quad, which until then had only met at the foreign minister level, to a leader-level partnership as he tried to pivot U.S. foreign policy away from conflicts in the Middle East and toward threats and opportunities in the Indo-Pacific. This weekend's summit is the fourth in-person and sixth overall gathering of the leaders since 2021.

"It will survive way beyond November," Biden told the leaders.

The president, who has admitted to an uneven track record as a scholar, also seemed tickled to get to host a gathering with three world leaders at the school he attended more than 60 years ago. He welcomed each of the leaders individually for one-on-one talks at his nearby home before they gathered at the school for talks and a formal dinner. "I don't think the headmaster of this school thought I'd be presiding over a meeting like this," Biden joked to fellow leaders.

Albanese, Modi and Kishida came for the summit before their appearances at the U.N. General Assembly in New York next week.

"This place could not be better suited for my final visit as prime minister," said Kishida, who like Biden, is set to soon leave office.

Earlier, the president warmly greeted Kishida when he arrived at the residence on Saturday morning and gave the prime minister a tour of the property before they settled into talks.

White House officials said holding the talks at the president's house, which sits near a pond in a wooded area several miles west of downtown, was intended to give the meetings a more relaxed feel.

Sullivan described the vibe of Biden's one-on-one meeting with Albanese, who stopped by the house on Friday, as "two guys — one at the other guy's home — talking in broad strokes about where they see the state of the world." He said Biden and Albanese also swapped stories about their political careers.

The Australian leader remarked that the visit had given him "insight into what in my view makes you such an extraordinary world leader."

Modi also stopped by the house on Saturday to meet with Biden before the leaders gathered for their joint talks.

"There cannot be a better place than President Biden's hometown of Wilmington to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the Quad," Modi said.

Biden and Modi discussed Modi's recent visits to Russia and Ukraine as well as economic and security concerns about China. Modi is the most prominent leader from a nation that maintains a neutral position on Russia's invasion of Ukraine.

Biden and Kishida, who are both stepping away from office amid sliding public support, count the tightening of security and economic ties among the U.S., Japan and South Korea as one of their most significant accomplishments.

The improved relations between Japan and South Korea, two nations with a deep and complicated history that have struggled to stay on speaking terms, have come amid worrying developments in the Pacific, including strides made by North Korea in its nuclear program and concerns about China.

Biden during their face-to-face meeting commended Kishida for demonstrating "courage and conviction in strengthening ties" with South Korea, according to the White House. They also discussed China, Russia's war against Ukraine and emerging technology issues.

The U.S. and Japan are dealing with a rare moment of tension in the relationship. Biden, as well as presidential candidates Kamala Harris and Donald Trump, have opposed a $15 billion bid by Japan's Nippon Steel to take over American-owned U.S. Steel.

Biden administration officials indicated this week that a U.S. government committee's formal assessment of the proposed deal has yet to be submitted to the White House and may not come until after the Nov. 5 election.

The summit declaration also condemned North Korea's continued ballistic missile testing and expressed "deep concern about countries that are deepening military cooperation with North Korea." The leaders were expected to discuss the issue in more depth over dinner.

The U.S. has publicized intelligence findings that show North Korea and Iran have provided Russia with ballistic missiles and other weaponry for its war in Ukraine and that Moscow is in turn tightening its relationship with Pyongyang and Tehran.

The leaders announced their four countries are committing $150 million for HPV vaccines, screening and therapeutics in the Indo-Pacific. Relatively few women in the region get screened for the virus that causes nearly all cervical cancers.

U.S. Navy doctors and nurses will also launch a program to train their Pacific counterparts on conducting cervical cancer screening and HPV vaccinations.

The announcement is related to Biden's Cancer Moonshot Initiative, a long-running passion project of the president and his wife, Jill Biden, aimed at reducing cancer deaths.

The Bidens' son Beau died in 2015 at age 46 of brain cancer.

FBI says it has disrupted major Chinese hacking operation that threatened US critical infrastructure

18 September 2024, CNN, Sean Lyngaas

The FBI has used a court order to seize control of a network of hundreds of thousands of hacked internet routers and other devices that Chinese government-linked hackers were using to threaten critical infrastructure in the US and overseas, FBI Director Christopher Wray said Wednesday.

"It is just one round in a much longer fight," Wray said in a speech at the Aspen Cyber Summit in Washington, DC. "The Chinese government is going to continue to target your organizations and our critical infrastructure."

The massive web of hacked devices — known as a botnet — was a menace that the Chinese hackers could have used to conduct targeted cyberattacks on US companies or government agencies, according to an advisory released by the US and its "Five Eyes" allies (the English-speaking alliance that includes Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom). As of June, the botnet included over 260,000 hacked devices from all over the world, from North and South America to Australia, according to US officials. Those hacked devices ranged from webcams to DVRs to routers, and about half of them were located in the US, according to Wray.

A spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington called the US allegations "groundless" and accused the US government of conducting cyberattacks against China.

It's the latest tit-for-tat in the often-tense relations between US and China in cyberspace. The US government has long warned that another Chinese government-backed hacking group has been lurking in US transportation and communication networks, waiting to use that access to disrupt any US response to a potential Chinese invasion of Taiwan.

That Chinese hacking unit is preparing to "wreak havoc and cause real-world harm" to the US, Wray told Congress in January.

A tool of choice

The botnet targeted by the FBI and its allies on Wednesday was an active menace, Wray said in his speech.

The botnet caused "an all-hands-on deck cybersecurity incident" for one unnamed California-based organization, causing "significant financial loss," the FBI director said.

But Wednesday's takedown was more about what the botnet could have done than what it did. The army of zombie computers has been a quiet and looming threat to US government networks for many months, according to experts. In late December 2023, the botnet's operators "conducted extensive scanning efforts" of US military and other government agencies, according to US tech firm Lumen Technologies, which investigated the activity.

Botnets are a tool of choice for both cybercriminals and state-backed hackers because users around the world are often unaware that their computers have been hijacked for scamming or espionage. The FBI said in February that it had helped disrupt a network of over 1,000 hacked internet routers that Russia's military intelligence agency was allegedly using for cyber espionage operations against the United States and its European allies.

The Chinese botnet targeted on Wednesday had an array of capabilities, including the ability to conduct tailored cyberattacks using the devices it had compromised, according to Lumen researchers. Lumen researchers are watching for signs that the Chinese hackers will resurrect the botnet. But for now, "we assess that the botnet has been taken offline due to a combination of law enforcement efforts and null routing as of September 18," Danny Adamitis, principle information security engineer at Lumen's Black Lotus Labs threat intelligence division, told CNN.

Null routing is a process that internet technology providers can use to stop data from being sent to a specific IP address.

A Chinese company named Integrity Technology Group managed the botnet for the last three years, according to US officials. CNN has requested comment from the company.

The Chinese tech firm is "involved in many of China's most important programs and efforts to improve its hacking capabilities," Dakota Cary, a consultant at security firm SentinelOne who focuses on China, told CNN. "The naming of the company is significant as it demonstrates allied governments' visibility into China's operations, as well as enabling researchers to further investigate the company."

China sanctions 9 US firms over military sales to Taiwan

18 September 2024, RFA, Taejun Kang

The U.S. announced on Monday the sale of aircraft spare parts to Taiwan.

China imposed sanctions on Wednesday on nine U.S. military-linked firms for their sale of equipment to Taiwan and it denounced what it called the "dangerous trend" of U.S. military support for the democratic island.

On Monday, the U.S. Defense Security Cooperation Agency announced the sale of aircraft spare parts and related logistics and support worth about US$228 million to Taiwan, adding that the spare parts would boost the island's "ability to meet current and future threats."

The sale included both classified and unclassified components for the aircraft, as well as related engineering, technical and logistics support services. Washington's arms sales to Taipei "seriously interfered in China's internal affairs, and seriously damaged China's sovereignty and territorial integrity," said China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Wednesday.

China regards Taiwan as a renegade province that should be reunited with the mainland, by force if necessary. The democratic island has been self-governing since it effectively separated from mainland China in 1949 after the Chinese civil war.

Despite their lack of formal diplomatic ties, the U.S. has long been a key supplier of arms to Taiwan. Washington is bound by U.S. legislation, the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act, to provide Taiwan with arms for its defense.

A spokesperson for China's foreign ministry on Wednesday, however, urged the U.S. to immediately stop the "dangerous trend" of arming Taiwan.

"Stop conniving and supporting Taiwan independence, and stop undermining peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait," said Lin Jian at a regular press briefing.

While the U.S. maintains strong informal ties with Taiwan, it has not declared support for the island's independence.

China's steps taken against the firms, including Sierra Nevada Corporation and Stick Rudder Enterprises LLC, come into effect on Wednesday and will freeze their property within China, the foreign ministry said in a statement.

It described the sanctions as countermeasures and said they also applied to Cubic Corporation, S3 Aerospace, TCOM Ltd Partnership, TextOre, Planate Management Group, ACT1 Federal and Exovera.

Organizations and individuals within China are prohibited from engaging in transactions with the firms, the ministry added.

China previously sanctioned and banned firms, including units of Lockheed Martin, for selling arms to Taiwan.

The latest sales were the 16th military sale to Taiwan authorized by the administration of President Joe Biden.

Taiwan's Foreign Ministry expressed its appreciation for the U.S. support for Taiwan's security while its Ministry of National Defense highlighted the strategic importance of the sale, noting that China's gray zone tactics – a tactic using the threat of force to create fear and intimidation – had affected Taiwan's training and operational readiness.

The aviation-related equipment would enhance the combat readiness and security of Taiwan's air force, the ministry said.

China says it tailed a US spy plane through the sensitive Taiwan Strait

17 September 2024, AP, Simina Mistreanu

Chinese warplanes tailed a U.S. military aircraft through the sensitive Taiwan Strait on Tuesday, China's military said.

The U.S. aircraft was a P-8A Poseidon patrol and reconnaissance plane, capable of conducting long-range anti-submarine warfare, according to a statement by the People's Liberation Army's Eastern Theater Command.

Chinese military forces "organized warplanes to tail and monitor the U.S. aircraft's flight and handled it in accordance with the law," said Li Xi, a senior colonel and spokesperson for the command.

"Theater command troops will remain on constant high alert and resolutely safeguard national sovereignty and security as well as regional peace and stability," he added.

The U.S. Navy didn't immediately comment on the incident.

China claims the self-ruled island of Taiwan as its own territory and bristles at other countries' patrolling the body of water separating it from the island.

On Friday, Germany sailed two warships through the Taiwan Strait in its first transit of the disputed waters in more than two decades, drawing criticism from Beijing.

In 2001, a U.S. surveillance plane and a Chinese navy fighter collided mid-air near the Chinese island province of Hainan, resulting in the Chinese pilot's death. The U.S. said its plane was in international airspace and the accident was the result of reckless flying by the Chinese side.

China frees American pastor after 18 years in detention

16 September 2024, NPR, Emily Feng

An American pastor jailed in China for more than 18 years has been released this week, according to the State Department on Monday.

68-year-old David Lin, a naturalized US citizen, had gone back to the country of his birth in 2006, after applying for permission from the Chinese government to open a Christian church building there.

But he was detained shortly afterwards and was handed a life sentence in 2009 for contract fraud, a charge Lin and his family deny.

According to the Dui Hua Foundation, a U.S.-based human rights advocacy group, Lin's sentence had been reduced several times since 2012. And prior to the most recent reduction, he was set to be released in December 2029.

The State Department considers Lin as "wrongfully detained" in China and said it "welcomed" his release from the Chinese prison.

"He has returned to the United States and now gets to see his family for the first time in nearly 20 years," it says in a statement shared with NPR.

"No words can express the joy we have – we have a lot of time to make up for," his daughter, Alice Lin, told Politico.

Lin was released the week before a U.S. congressional hearing to be held on Washington on other Americans considered "wrongfully detained" in China. The detainees' families say they suffering from serious health issues.

Among them are Kai Li, a businessman detained in 2016 on spying charges, and Mark Swidan, a businessman who was detained in 2012 for alleged narcotics trafficking. The families of both men have denied the charges.

During his last trip to China this April, Secretary of State Antony Blinken said it remains "a top priority to resolve the cases of American citizens who are wrongfully detained or subject to exit bans in China." Since 2012, China has increased the imposition of exit bans on both Chinese and foreign national, according to human rights groups. Beijing rejects these characterizations.

Last summer, the State Department revised its travel advisory for China, urging Americans to "reconsider" travel to mainland China due to the risk of arbitrary detention and exit bans there. China's foreign ministry said the revision was "totally unwarranted" and called on Washington "to remove this stumbling block in China-U.S. people-to-people exchanges."

Top US, Chinese military brass hold first call to stabilise ties

10 September 2024, Reuters

The United States and China held theatre-level commander talks for the first time on Tuesday, Chinese authorities said, amid efforts to stabilise military ties and avoid misunderstandings, especially in regional hot spots such as the South China Sea.

Washington seeks to open new channels of regular military communication with Beijing since ties sank to a historic low after the United States downed a suspected Chinese surveillance balloon last year.

Admiral Sam Paparo, head of the U.S. Indo-Pacific Command, held a video telephone call with his counterpart Wu Yanan of the Southern Theater Command of the People's Liberation Army (PLA).

The U.S. Indo-Pacific Command's areas of responsibility include the South China Sea and the Taiwan Strait, two hot spots for regional tension that are also flashpoints in U.S.-China bilateral ties.

Both sides had an "in depth exchange of views on issues of common concern," the Chinese defence ministry said in a readout.

Paparo urged the PLA "to reconsider its use of dangerous, coercive, and potentially escalatory tactics in the South China Sea and beyond", the Indo-Pacific Command said in a statement that described the exchange as "constructive and respectful".

He also stressed the importance of continued talks to clarify intent and reduce the risk of misperception or miscalculation.

The call followed a meeting in Beijing last month between U.S. National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan and Chinese leader Xi Jinping's leading military adviser, at which the talks were agreed.

U.S. and Chinese troops were also taking part in large-scale military exercises led by the Brazilian Armed Forces this week in the Brazilian city of Formosa in the state of Goiás.

American and Chinese troops had not trained side by side since 2016, when Beijing participated in the Rim of the Pacific Exercise, or Rimpac, led by the U.S. Indo-Pacific Command.

Most two-way military engagements between the U.S. and China were suspended for almost two years after Nancy Pelosi, then speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, visited Taiwan in August 2022.

"I certainly worry about an unintended conflict between our military forces, an accident, an accidental collision," Nicholas Burns, the U.S. ambassador to China, told the magazine Foreign Policy in an online interview.

Later this week, the United States plans to send a senior Pentagon official to a major security forum in China.

China says it is ending foreign adoptions, prompting concern from US

06 September 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidson

US diplomats seeking clarity for hundreds of families in the process of international adoption.

The Chinese government is ending its international adoption programme, and the US is seeking clarification on how the decision will affect hundreds of American families with pending applications.

At a daily briefing on Thursday, Mao Ning, a spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry, said Beijing was no longer allowing intercountry adoptions of children from China, with the only exception for blood relatives to adopt a child or a stepchild.

Mao did not explain the decision other than to say that it was in line with the spirit of relevant international conventions. "We express our appreciation to those foreign governments and families, who wish to adopt Chinese children, for their good intention and the love and kindness they have shown," she added.

In letters sent to some adoption agencies on Wednesday, and shared on social media, the US state department said it had been told by Chinese authorities that all other pending adoptions were cancelled, except those with already issued travel authorisations.

In a phone call with US diplomats in China, Beijing said it "will not continue to process cases at any stage" other than those cases covered by an exception clause. The embassy is seeking clarification in writing from China's ministry of civil affairs, the US state department said on Thursday.

The state department said: "We understand there are hundreds of families still pending completion of their adoption, and we sympathise with their situation."

Many people have adopted children from China over the decades, visiting the country to pick them up and then bringing them to a new home overseas. Lengthy delays in the process meant many couples who were approved to adopt still waited years, sometimes near a decade, to receive their child.

US families have adopted 82,674 children from China, the most from any foreign country.

Intercountry adoptions had been largely suspended since 2020 because of the Covid pandemic, and changes in China's political, demographic and economic situation had led many in the sector to expect an end or tightening of the adoption policy.

The Chinese government had resumed adoptions for children who had received travel authorisation prior to the suspension, the US state department said in its latest annual report on adoptions, but the numbers appeared small.

A US consulate issued 16 visas for adoptions from China from October 2022 through to September 2023, the first in more than two years, the state department report said. It was not clear if any more visas had been issued since then.

In January, Denmark's only overseas adoption agency said it was winding down operations after concerns were raised about fabricated documents and procedures, and Norway's top regulatory body recommended stopping overseas adoptions for two years pending an investigation into several cases.

The response on social media from prospective and current adoptive parents, and from adoptees themselves, was mixed. Some feared the announcement could also close off avenues for adoptees connecting with their former orphanages and birth families. Some said it was "long overdue" and they hoped children would be taken care of in their country of origin.

The Nanchang Project, a US-based group that works with Chinese adoptees and their adoptive parents to help adoptees find their biological families said the announcement marked "the end of an era" but the programme was "already on its way out".

It added: "It is our profound hope that the remaining children in China receive the attention, medical care, and love they deserve."

The charity said on social media that the number of adoptions had already seriously declined in the years before the pandemic pause, and there were fewer children put up for adoption overall, attributing it to China's improved economy, falling birthrates, and a social preference for male children waning.

The number of newborn babies in China fell to 9.02 million in 2023, and the overall population declined for the second consecutive year. Amid a series of government measures designed to encourage more births, China's decades-long one-child policy – which was a key driver of babies, especially girls, being put up for adoption – was phased out.

Former aide to New York governor charged as 'agent' of Chinese government

03 September 2024, Aljazeera

Linda Sun and husband are accused of having 'laundered millions of dollars' on behalf of China, receiving kickbacks in return.

The United States Justice Department has filed charges against a former top aide to New York Governor Kathy Hochul, accusing the aide of pursuing unlawful "political activities" on behalf of the Chinese government.

The aide in question, 41-year-old Linda Sun, was appointed as Hochul's deputy chief of staff in 2021 and previously worked under Hochul's predecessor, Governor Andrew Cuomo.

But in an indictment unsealed on Tuesday, federal prosecutors accused Sun and her husband Christopher Hu, 40, of using her position to benefit the Chinese government and profit from the exchange.

"Linda Sun, a former New York State government employee, acted as an undisclosed agent of the Chinese government while her husband, Christopher Hu, facilitated the transfer of millions of dollars in kickbacks for personal gain," Christie Curtis, the acting assistant director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), said in a press release.

The indictment is the latest in a series of moves the Justice Department has taken to counter the "national security threats" it perceives from China.

Sun and Hu were both arrested on Tuesday morning. They appeared for their arraignment at a federal court in Brooklyn later that afternoon.

In the indictment, Sun was accused of violating the Foreign Agents Registration Act by failing to register as an agent working on behalf of China and by having "actively concealed" her relationship with its government.

The document also alleged she had committed visa fraud and alien smuggling, as well as entering a money laundering conspiracy.

Hu, meanwhile, was charged with the money laundering conspiracy, as well as conspiracy to commit bank fraud and using a family member's identity to open new bank accounts.

In the indictment, federal prosecutors detailed how they believe the couple "laundered millions of dollars" for China in exchange for kickbacks to buy "luxury vehicles and million-dollar properties" in New York.

That includes a $4.1m property in Manhasset, New York, and a $2.1m condominium in Honolulu, Hawaii. Prosecutors also say the benefits afford Sun and Hu the ability to buy a 2024 Ferrari luxury vehicle.

They also accused Sun of offering Chinese officials letters of invitation to travel to the US and arranging meetings with New York State leaders.

She even provided some Chinese government representatives "official New York State proclamations" without receiving the proper authorisation to do so first, according to the indictment.

That contrasts with her treatment of Taiwanese officials, the indictment alleged. It accused her of preventing representatives from Taiwan's government from meeting with New York officials.

The government in Beijing has long denied Taiwan's claims to sovereignty, as part of its "one China" policy. Rather, it maintains that the self-governing island is an integral part of China, under the authority of its government.

US Attorney for the Eastern District of New York Breon Peace explained in a news release that the "illicit scheme enriched the defendant's family to the tune of millions of dollars".

"While appearing to serve the people of New York as Deputy Chief of Staff within the New York State Executive Chamber, the defendant and her husband actually worked to further the interests of the Chinese government," Peace said.

The US Justice Department has been cracking down on alleged interference from the Chinese government in recent months.

Less than two weeks ago, on August 22, it also filed an indictment against a New York resident who reportedly took part in the protests in Tiananmen Square in 1989, a major flashpoint for the pro-democracy movement in China.

The Justice Department accused that person of acting as an agent for China's Ministry of State Security.

And last year, federal prosecutors announced charges against two men accused of running a "secret police station" in New York City. The Chinese government has refuted such claims of foreign espionage.

McMaster Washington, The Indian government led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi is willing to engage in "unprecedented" levels of cooperation with the United States, mainly due to Chinese aggression, but at the same time is "fearful" both of "entrapment and abandonment", former US National Security Adviser Lt Gen H R McMaster has stated in his latest book.

Giving the firsthand account of his tenure during the Donald Trump administration as the National Security Advisor, McMaster in his book "At War With Ourselves", that hit the bookstores this Tuesday, says he met his Indian counterpart Ajit K Doval a day before he was fired by Trump.

"The day before I was fired, I met for dinner with my Indian counterpart, Ajit Doval, at Quarters 13, Fort McNair, a quiet place at the intersection of the Anacostia and Potomac Rivers, just south of the US Capitol. Doval is a character straight out of central casting. Betraying his background as the former director of his country's Intelligence Bureau, he would lean into conversations, cock his head to the side as he spoke, and use hushed tones, even when discussing the most routine subjects," McMaster writes.

"During our walk after dinner, he whispered, 'How much longer will we work together?' It did not take someone with Doval's intelligence background to figure out I was departing the Trump administration. Without answering directly, I told him it had been a privilege and expressed confidence that there would be continuity," he says.

McMaster writes they knew each other well enough for Doval to be direct.

"What happens in Afghanistan after you leave?" Doval asked him, to which McMaster reminded the Indian NSA that Trump had approved the South Asia strategy last August and that it was the first reasoned and sustainable strategy in 17 years of war.

"Doval knew this, but sometimes you cannot be fully candid with even your closest foreign counterparts. In fact, I shared Doval's concern, and I knew that my response was less than convincing. Trump was unconventional and impulsive. Sometimes his impulses were good. Other times, to use one of his turns of phrase, 'not so much'," the American general writes.

McMaster in his book gives a detailed account of his trip to Afghanistan, Pakistan and India from April 14- 17, 2017, during which he met then Foreign Secretary S Jaishankar, Doval and Prime Minister Narendra Modi in New Delhi.

The conversation was easy, as Doval, Jaishankar, "and I believed we had a tremendous opportunity to work together in pursuit of our mutual objectives", McMaster writes about his meeting at the Janpath residence of Doval. Jaishankar then was the Foreign

India open to 'unprecedented' cooperation with US because of Chinese aggression, says ex-NSA McMaster

29 August 2024, Hindustan Times

India open to 'unprecedented' cooperation with US because of Chinese aggression, says ex-NSA

Secretary and late Sushma Swaraj was the External Affairs Minister.

"We spoke about the war in Afghanistan and the threat to India from nuclear-armed Pakistan, but Jaishankar and Doval spoke mainly about an increasingly aggressive China. The two men were open to unprecedented cooperation thanks to Xi Jinping's aggression. The deepening partnership between the world's largest and the world's oldest democracies seemed logical, but India is fearful both of entrapment into competitions from which it would prefer to abstain and abandonment based on the short American attention span and ambivalence over South Asia," McMaster writes.

"Those 'schizophrenic' anxieties and the legacy of India's leadership of the Non-Aligned Movement during the Cold War had led to hedging behaviour, especially with Russia, an important source of arms and oil for India," he states.

On the final day of his trip, he met Modi at his residence.

"Modi gave us a warm welcome. It was clear that deepening and expanding our relationship was a top priority for him. He expressed concern over China's increasingly aggressive efforts to extend its influence at India's expense and over its growing military presence in the region," the former NSA writes.

Modi, McMaster says, suggested that the US, India, Japan, and like-minded partners emphasise the concept of a free and open Indo-Pacific as an inclusive effort to benefit all, in contrast to China's 'One Belt One Road' initiative.

At the end of the meeting, he says, the prime minister gave him a hug, put his hands on his shoulders, and blessed him. "You have an aura around you, and you will do good for humanity," Modi told him.

A few months later Trump hosted Modi for a meeting at the White House on June 25-26, 2017.

"We huddled in the Oval Office for a few moments between the meeting with Modi's delegation in the Cabinet Room and the statements and question-and-answer session in the Rose Garden. I warned Trump that the prime minister was a hugger and, based on how well the visit was going, would probably hug Trump after their statements," McMaster writes. "Although Trump was known to hug the occasional American flag onstage, he was not a big hugger of people. The hug was delivered and reciprocated in a way that was not too awkward. Success. Modi departed on June 27, just two days before Moon's arrival," he says.

Modi was the first head of state the president and First Lady hosted for dinner in the Blue Room, he noted.

Agenda for US-China talks includes Taiwan, South China Sea, Russia and AI

27 August 2024, SCMP, Igor Patrick

US National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi are set for three days of meetings in Beijing this week.

In addition to Taiwan and tariffs, when US National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi meet this week, they will discuss counternarcotics, better communication between the nations' militaries and improved artificial intelligence security, a senior White House official said Monday. The meetings, scheduled to run from Tuesday to Thursday in Beijing, are to build on the talks that began at last year's summit in California between US President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping. "Mr. Sullivan's trip to China was discussed by the two leaders last November. A lot of planning and scheduling went into it since then, and they're now executing it in Beijing," National Security Council spokesman John Kirby said.

Sullivan's meeting, his fifth with Wang, will be the first trip by a US national security adviser to Beijing since 2016, when Susan Rice of the Barack Obama administration travelled there.

Additionally, Sullivan is expected to raise US concerns regarding security in the Indo-Pacific region, China's support for Russia's defence industrial base as well as other international hotspots, including North Korea, the Middle East and Myanmar, a senior US official said last week.

On Sunday, China's Foreign Ministry said that Beijing regarded Sullivan's trip as "an important step for the two sides to implement the common understandings the two presidents had at their San Francisco meeting," but that Wang would take the opportunity to raise "serious concerns" about Taiwan.

"The US side must abide by the one-China principle and the provisions of the three China-US joint communiques, and honour its commitment of not supporting 'Taiwan independence'," the ministry said in a statement.

According to Kirby, the US intends to tackle the "rising tensions in the South China Sea", where China and the Philippines are embroiled in territorial disputes.

On Monday, Manila criticised Beijing for "repeated aggressive, unprofessional and illegal" actions in the waterway, accusing Chinese aircraft of conducting unsafe manoeuvres against a civilian aircraft patrolling over the Scarborough Shoal and Subi Reef.

Kirby said that Sullivan would also discuss "sea tensions across the Taiwan Strait and a range of other issues, including unfair economic practises".

China's Foreign Ministry said it intended to communicate to Sullivan that "countries outside the region should not do things that provoke confrontation or increase tensions".

"China's territorial sovereignty and maritime rights and interests in the region have sufficient historical and legal basis, and ... countries in the region have full confidence, wisdom and capability to properly handle the issue," the statement added.

Chinese Communist Party Plots Response to Trump's America First Agenda

24 August 2024, AMAC, Ben Solis

Earlier this summer, a spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry claimed that Beijing was indifferent to who wins the U.S. presidential contest this fall. But experts with whom I spoke said that is far from the truth, with one describing the Biden-Harris administration as "a gift that keeps on giving" to Chinese President Xi Jinping.

Dr. Shoi-Ming Teng, a distinguished economist and philosopher who defected to the West in the 1980s, told me that the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) undoubtedly prefers that the "status quo" remains unchanged with a Kamala Harris victory in November. He emphasized that Beijing fears the "constant surprises" that characterized Trump's policy toward the communist nation and would prefer to deal with more predictable Democrat leaders.

"The speed and depth of Trump's policy overwhelmed them," he added, referring to the CCP's senior leadership. "Trump threw them on their knees." Meanwhile, Teng said, the CCP has shown that it does not take Biden as a serious threat, pointing specifically to an altercation early in Biden's presidency where Chinese officials berated and ridiculed Biden Secretary of State Antony Blinken during meetings in Alaska.

Teng also said that while Biden has maintained many of Trump's sanctions and tariffs, he has "failed to make the necessary adjustments after the CCP found a way to avoid them." As a result, China has been able to resume flooding the U.S. with its goods, continuing the hollowing-out of American industry.

Lawyer and economist Jun De Ning, who advised Chinese leader Hu Yaobang and defected to the West shortly after his death, told me that the CCP's "biggest fear" is Trump's return to the White House.

As Ning explained, despite false "official" numbers published by the CCP, China is in a deepening economic crisis caused by Xi's policies and accelerated by Trump's presidency. Prior to Xi's moves to tighten the government's grip over all of Chinese society, many CCP officials assumed China's economic expansion was unstoppable. But now the country has seen a notable rise in unemployment, increasing debt, and a significant foreign investment and capital outflow, with almost $15 billion leaving between April and June.

Early indications also suggest that China may already be making preparations to weather the storm of a second Trump term, further indicating that they would much prefer another four years of Democrat rule.

China's increasing military and economic cooperation with Russia may be one prime example of this. Should Trump win a second term, China would need somewhere else to offload the goods that are currently coming into the United States.

One possible answer is Russia, another American adversary. Chinese exports to Russia rose by 4.76 percent in June, more than quadruple the 0.92 percent increase in May.

However, neither Russia's capital nor its consumer market can come close to supplanting the United States. Russia's ongoing war in Ukraine has also hampered Moscow's ability to be an effective trading partner.

But Beijing has also adopted a three-pronged approach to potentially insulate itself from renewed tariffs and sanctions in a second Trump term.

First, Beijing is working to aggressively integrate Chinese firms into the American economy. This includes working to remove Chinese companies from U.S. blacklists, forcing Trump to restart the sanctions process if he is re-elected. Chinese entities, including real estate owners and tech firms listed on major stock exchanges, have been directed to discreetly increase their U.S. capital ownership.

Second, Chinese companies are also rapidly expanding their operations in Mexico and Canada. In addition to allowing them to skirt existing tariffs, Beijing is hoping that joint Chinese-Mexican and Chinese-Canadian ventures can capture a large share of the American consumer market and make it more economically painful for a second Trump administration to impose new tariffs. Notably, Kamala Harris's assertion that Trump's proposed tariffs on Chinese goods are a "tax" and would raise prices for consumers plays right into Beijing's hands on this front.

Finally, the CCP intends to continue heavily subsidizing Chinese industry to flood foreign markets with Chinese goods. While this practice maintains the Yuan's depreciated value, it is also keeping many Western economies on the brink of an economic crisis and decimating their domestic manufacturing capability. Beijing recognizes that if it can maintain its subsidies to keep prices low long enough, manufacturing in the United States and throughout the West will be decimated to the point where the world will have no choice but to rely on imports from China.

Despite what CCP officials may suggest, the outcome of the presidential election this year will have an enormous impact on the future of Chinese economic and foreign policy. With Trump leading in the polls, Beijing is preparing for the worst.

But even if Trump does win a second term, the question remains – will it be soon enough?

Jake Sullivan to make first China visit as US national security adviser

23 August 2024, Financial Times, Demetri Sevastopulo and Joe Leahly

White House expects foreign minister Wang Yi to ask about November election.

Jake Sullivan will make his first visit to China as US national security adviser next week for talks with foreign minister Wang Yi as part of the “strategic channel” created by the two superpowers to stabilise relations. Sullivan will hold talks with Wang on Tuesday and Wednesday, according to a US official. They last met in Bangkok in January, two months after President Joe Biden and his Chinese counterpart Xi Jinping held a summit in San Francisco.

His visit is part of a broader effort to stabilise the relationship between the two superpowers, which hit a new low last year after a Chinese spy balloon flew over North America. But tensions remain high over issues ranging from the South China Sea and Taiwan to disagreements over the US export controls on technology and China’s support for Russia. Sullivan is the first national security adviser to visit China since Susan Rice, who served in the administration of President Barack Obama and last travelled there in 2016. The White House expects Wang to ask about the US election, which has taken a surprise turn since his last meeting with Sullivan, with vice-president Kamala Harris replacing Biden as the Democratic nominee. The race between Harris and Donald Trump remains tight, with the former president threatening swingeing tariffs against Beijing if he is elected. Over the past 16 months, Sullivan and Wang have held four unannounced meetings – in Vienna, Malta, Washington and Bangkok – in attempts to reduce the odds of the increasingly competitive relationship veering into conflict, particularly over Taiwan. The US official said Sullivan and Wang would discuss issues ranging from Taiwan and technology-related national security policies to US concerns about China’s support for Russia. The US will also raise concerns about aggressive Chinese actions towards the Philippines, a US ally, in the South China Sea. “It’s partly about maintaining stability during a period of high political activity in the United States and . . . general geopolitical uncertainty,” said the official. He said Wang would probably ask, “what does a baton pass from Biden to Harris look like” if she wins November’s election, and added that Sullivan would say he expected “more continuity than change in China policy” under Harris. The official said Sullivan and Wang would also discuss the possibility of Biden and Xi having a final engagement before the US president left office in January, adding that an in-person meeting was “not off the cards”. “We haven’t proposed anything, but the notion that they would see each other one last time before the president leaves office . . . is not out of the question,” said the official, who noted that both leaders were likely to attend the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum and G20 in November. A second US official said the Sullivan-Wang channel was less about convincing China to change its policies and producing “deliverables” and more about ensuring that the two countries managed their rivalry. “It really is about clearing up misperceptions and avoiding this competition from veering into conflict,” the official added. The official said Sullivan would voice concern about China’s “increased military, diplomatic and economic pressure against Taiwan” and “continue to urge Beijing to engage in meaningful dialogue with Taipei.”

Biden and Xi agreed to set up the channel when they met in Bali, Indonesia, in late 2022. They also agreed to have a series of reciprocal visits by top officials. But the plans were derailed when a Chinese spy balloon flew over North America a few months later. For Beijing, Sullivan’s visit marks the latest step in efforts to return the relationship from the brink of an uneasy equilibrium after disruptions caused by the trade war during the Trump presidency, the pandemic, the Ukraine war and the balloon incident. China needs a more stable international environment as it relies on its export engine to steer its economy through the fallout from a deep property slump.

China warns US not to allow Dalai Lama’s ‘separatist activities’ or talks with officials

22 August 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Beijing protests to Washington after the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader meets senior American officials in New York.

China warned the US not to allow the Dalai Lama to engage in “separatist activities” while visiting the country and made “solemn protests” to Washington after senior American officials met the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader in New York on Wednesday.

“China firmly opposes any country allowing the Dalai Lama to visit under any pretext, and firmly opposes any government officials of any country meeting with the Dalai Lama in any form,” Chinese foreign ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning said on Thursday.

"[We] have made solemn protests to the US. The appointment of a so-called special coordinator of Tibetan issues constitutes interference in [China's] internal affairs," she said, adding that Beijing does not recognise the coordinator position.

Mao urged the US to abide by its commitments on Tibet-related issues and respect China's core interests and major concerns.

"Do not allow the Dalai Lama to engage in political separatist activities in the US, and do not have any form of contact with him," she added.

China's protest came a day after senior US officials met the 89-year-old spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism in New York on Wednesday.

White House human rights director Kelly Razzouk and Uzra Zeya, the US undersecretary of state for human rights and special coordinator for Tibetan issues, travelled to New York to meet the Dalai Lama, according to a statement by the US Department of State.

The meeting "reaffirmed the US commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans", the statement said.

The Dalai Lama fled to India in 1959 after a failed uprising against Chinese rule in Tibet.

He has been in the United States since June, when he travelled to New York to seek medical treatment for his knees. It is the first time he has visited the US since 2017.

A bipartisan US congressional delegation met him in June at his residence in India's Dharamsala. The delegation included Republican congressman Michael McCaul and former US House speaker Nancy Pelosi, a Democrat. They also met officials from the Tibetan government-in-exile, which is not officially recognised by any state or government.

Last month, Beijing also expressed strong opposition to Washington after US President Joe Biden signed the Resolve Tibet Act, which urges Beijing to resume direct dialogue with the Dalai Lama to resolve differences and calls for a negotiated agreement on Tibet. Beijing considers the Dalai Lama a separatist and opposes contact with him by foreign government officials. It has not held talks with representatives of the Dalai Lama since 2010.

China says it is 'seriously concerned' about US nuclear strategic report

21 August 2024, Reuters

China is seriously concerned about a report that said the United States approved a nuclear strategic plan to focus on China's rapid expansion in its nuclear arsenal, the Chinese foreign ministry said on Wednesday. "The U.S. is peddling the China nuclear threat narrative, finding excuses to seek strategic advantage," a Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson said.

According to a report by the New York Times, U.S. President Joe Biden approved in March a highly classified nuclear strategic plan that focused on China's quickly growing arsenal, but also seeks to prepare the U.S. for possible coordinated nuclear challenges from China, Russia and North Korea. "China is seriously concerned about the relevant report, and the facts have fully proved that the United States has constantly stirred up the so-called China nuclear threat theory in recent years," said Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning at a regular press briefing.

The White House said on Tuesday that the classified nuclear strategic plan approved by Biden this year is not a response to a single country or threat.

The U.S. has consistently pointed to China's expansive and growing nuclear weaponry. An annual report by the Pentagon last October said China had more than 500 operational nuclear warheads in its arsenal, and will probably have over 1,000 warheads by 2030.

US soldier pleads guilty to selling secrets to China

14 August 2024, BBC, Gavin Bulter

A US Army analyst has pleaded guilty to charges of conspiring to sell military secrets to China, the Department of Justice (DOJ) has said.

Sgt Korbein Schultz was arrested in March after an investigation by the FBI and US Army counterintelligence alleged that he was paid $42,000 (£33,000) in exchange for dozens of sensitive security records.

The criminal conspiracy began in June 2022 and continued up until his arrest, officials said.

He is scheduled for sentencing in January.

Sgt Schultz, who held a security clearance to access top secret information, conspired to collect data with someone whom he believed to be living in Hong Kong, according to court documents.

The purported Hong Kong resident asked Sgt Schultz to collect sensitive data related to missile defence and mobile artillery systems, according to court records. Sgt Schultz also collected data on US fighter aircraft, military tactics, and the US military's defence strategy for Taiwan, based on what it learned from Russia's war in Ukraine.

"By conspiring to transmit national defence information to a person living outside the United States, this defendant callously put our national security at risk to cash in on the trust our military placed in him," Assistant Attorney General Matthew Olsen of the DOJ's National Security Division said.

Sgt Schultz on Tuesday pleaded guilty to all charges against him, including conspiracy to obtain and disclose national defence information and bribery of a public official.

The indictment against Sgt Schultz earlier detailed messages he sent to the supposed Hong Kong resident, who was referred to in court documents as Conspirator A.

In one exchange, Sgt Schultz said he "wished he could be Jason Bourne" in reference to the fictional spy character.

After being promised more money from his handler, he said in another message: "I hope so! I need to get my other BMW back!".

The FBI and US Army Counterintelligence Command are continuing investigations into the case.

Biden repeats debunked claim he traveled 17,000 miles with China's Xi Jinping

13 August 2024, Fox News, Julia Johnson

Biden dropped out of the presidential race last month

President Biden repeated a claim he had been fact-checked for in the past, telling an audience on Tuesday that he traveled 17,000 miles with Chinese President Xi Jinping.

"I spent a lot of time with Xi Jinping," he said during his remarks at an event touting the Biden "Cancer Moonshot" initiative in New Orleans, Louisiana.

"I spent over 80 hours with him alone. Over 17,000 miles in China, anywhere in Tibet, near Tibet."

He described telling the Chinese president that "possibility" is the one word that can define America, tying his analogy to the Cancer Moonshot initiative. Biden's claim that he has traveled more than 17,000 miles with Xi has previously been fact-checked and considered primarily inaccurate, however.

He has made the claim many times over several years and was fact-checked by the Washington Post in 2021. "Try as we could, however, we still could not get the travel to add up to 17,000 miles," wrote the publication.

Biden was given three pinocchios for his claim. According to the Post, this number of pinocchios means there is "significant factual error and/or obvious contradictions." It is comparable to a rating of "mostly false."

The White House did not immediately respond to inquiries from Fox News Digital.

Biden announced $150 million in ARPA-H awards to develop technologies that will allow surgeons to provide more successful tumor-removal surgeries for people facing cancer at the event in New Orleans.

After having dropped out of the 2024 presidential race last month and endorsing Vice President Kamala Harris to succeed him, Biden is now reportedly focusing on the causes that are most personal for him in his remaining months as president.

Cancer research is of "immense importance" to the president, an aide told CNN.

U.S. Officials to Visit China for Economic Talks as Trade Tensions Rise

12 August 2024, The New York Times, Alan Rappeport

A group of senior Biden administration officials is traveling to Shanghai this week for a round of high-level meetings intended to keep the economic relationship between the United States and China on stable footing amid mounting trade tensions between the two countries.

The talks will take place on Thursday and Friday and are being convened through the U.S.-China Financial Working Group, which was created last year. Officials are expected to discuss ways to maintain economic and financial stability, capital markets and efforts to curb the flow of fentanyl into the United States.

Although communication between the United States and China has improved over the past year, the economic relationship remains fraught because of disagreements over industrial policy and China's dominance over green energy technology. The Biden administration imposed new tariffs in May on an array of Chinese imports, including electric vehicles, solar cells, semiconductors and advanced batteries. The United States is also restricting American investments in Chinese sectors that policymakers believe could threaten national security.

The U.S. delegation, which departed on Monday, is being led by Brent Neiman, the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for international finance. He will be joined by officials from the Federal Reserve and the Securities and Exchange Commission. They are expected to meet with the People's Bank of China's deputy governor, Xuan Changneng, and other senior Chinese officials.

"We intend for this F.W.G. meeting to include conversations on financial stability, issues related to cross-border data, lending and payments, private-sector efforts to advance transition finance, and concrete steps we can take to improve communication in the event of financial stress," Mr. Neiman said ahead of the trip, referring to the abbreviation for the financial working group.

American and Chinese financial regulators have been conducting financial shock exercises this year to coordinate their responses in the event of a crisis, like a cyberattack or climate disaster, that might affect the international banking or insurance systems.

The Biden administration has been urging China to take action to prevent chemicals used to produce fentanyl from being exported to other countries and smuggled into the United States. There were signs of progress this month when China announced that it would put new restrictions on three of these chemicals, a move that the United States described as a “valuable step forward.”

Other economic issues between the two countries continue to be contentious. Treasury Secretary Janet L. Yellen pressed Chinese officials during her trip to China in April to stop flooding global markets with cheap clean-energy products, warning that its excess industrial capacity would distort global supply chains. But after a meeting of Communist Party leaders last month, there was little indication that China would retreat from its investments in high-tech manufacturing or take major steps toward rebalancing its economy by bolstering domestic consumption.

The talks this week are the fifth meeting of the financial working group and will be the second time the officials have convened in China.

Love the army, defend the motherland: how China is pushing military education on children

11 August 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidson and Chi-hui Lin

Growing emphasis on military training for civilians reflects heightened nationalism under Xi Jinping – and a growing risk of war over Taiwan

At Beijing Jiaotong University’s affiliated elementary school, a class of children, maybe six or seven years old, stand in a line in a rainbow painted hallway. A boy holds a replica handgun, and behind him other students grasp unwieldy fake assault rifles. Fake police flak jackets cover their blue and white tracksuits, and their heads swim inside too-big artillery helmets. In other photographs students practise drills, salute visiting soldiers, and arrange themselves on a sporting field to spell out “I [heart] u” next to a Chinese flag.

In the post that includes the photos, published online in April, the school says it has worked hard in recent years to conscientiously “promote the main theme of patriotism, and make it an important part of the school’s ideological and political education and moral education”.

“We will create a strong atmosphere of national defence education, carry out rich and colourful activities, cultivate students’ patriotism, love for the army, and organisational discipline, and cultivate their ambitions to build and defend the motherland from an early age,” it says.

The elementary school is among the thousands designated as “model schools for national defence education”, part of China’s push to increase military awareness and skills among its population – starting at younger and younger ages.

More designations announced in January by the ministry of education and the central military commission almost doubled the number of “model schools”. They are likely to be followed by legal changes extending mandated training including “cadet activities” to students under 15. A bill proposing amendments to the National Defence Education Law was given its first reading in the rubber-stamping National People’s Congress in April. The amendments make more prescriptive what was previously a guide, emphasising the need for basic military training in high schools and tertiary institutions, and allowing it to be extended to younger students for the first time.

“All state organs and armed forces, all political parties and public groups, all enterprises and institutions and grassroots self-government organisations of a mass character shall, in light of their specific conditions, organise national defence education in their respective regions, departments and units,” the draft said.

‘Rebuilding the strength of the Chinese Communist party’

The growing emphasis on military training for civilians reflects a heightened nationalism in today’s China under Xi, who has also made clear his distaste for what he sees as declining masculinity in China, and the worsening risk that he could take the country into war over Taiwan.

“Requiring children to engage in performative military education activities at younger and younger ages normalises China’s increasingly aggressive foreign policy, and could potentially prepare the country psychologically for a contingency in which China engages in armed conflict,” said Bethany Allen, the head of the Australian Strategic Policy Institute’s China programme.

China-based analysts have also told media the ruling Chinese Communist party (CCP) is learning from the Ukraine war and the potential need to have a population that can be quickly mobilised for conflict. Increasing militarism by China under Xi Jinping has raised the risk of conflict or hostilities with other countries, particularly over Taiwan. At the same time its armed forces, despite undergoing a massive overhaul and modernisation process, are reportedly struggling with corruption issues and low recruitment.

The defence ministry said in September 2023 that primary and secondary schools across the country had begun the new school year with defence education lessons, “planting a deep sense of patriotism, respect for the military, and concern for national defence in the heart of students”.

It's not clear if the lessons are improving recruitment, and China's punitive censorship culture makes it almost impossible to survey their impact on general opinion. Most published comments are similar to that of Feng Shanguo, a former soldier who took part in leading lessons at his child's school, Neijiang No 13 in Sichuan.

“It can help children to build tenacity, courage, and hard-working qualities,” Feng told state media.

But Katja Drinhausen, head of Merics' research programme on Chinese policy, said military education was just one aspect of a broader campaign to boost the CCP's strength at a time when it was facing multiple challenges including economic downturn, sporadic social unrest, multiple regional disputes, and worsening natural disasters driven by climate change.

“It's important to put together the different pieces of the broader ambition,” Drinhausen said.

“There is renewed focus on military training and creating identity and buy-in from the broader population on what the military does, which also serves to build internal cohesion when the party needs to find new sources of social and political legitimacy cohesion because the economy isn't doing it any more,” she said.

“First came a renewed focus on patriotic education and what ‘makes China great’ in schools. Then came a rollout of national security education, not just the mainland but also in Hong Kong ... I do think these are different layers that are part of a broader strategic refocus on rebuilding the strength of the CCP inside China.”

Drinhausen also noted that the military, the People's Liberation Army, is officially the armed forces of the CCP, not the Chinese state or its people, and has been used in the past to violently put down domestic protests.

“It's helpful to see the development when it comes to military and defence focused education [in the context of different possible scenarios] because when you look at it that way, all these measures aren't necessarily solely a precursor for war but serve all sorts of crisis management for the party going forward,” she said

U.S. Vies With Allies and Industry to Tighten China Tech Controls

09 August 2024, The New York Times , Ana Swanson

The Biden administration must navigate the interests of U.S. companies and allied governments as it tries to close off China's access to advanced chips

The Biden administration is fighting to overcome opposition from allied nations and the tech industry as it prepares to expand restrictions aimed at slowing

China's ability to make the most advanced semiconductors, which could be used to bolster Beijing's military capacity.

The administration has drafted new rules that would limit shipments to China of the machinery and software used to make chips from a number of countries if they are made with American parts or technology, as well as some types of semiconductors, according to people who have seen or were briefed on a draft version of the rules.

The rules are aimed at blocking off some of the newer routes that Chinese chipmakers have found to acquire technology, despite international restrictions. The United States has been pushing allies like Japan and the Netherlands to toughen their restrictions on technology shipments to China, during visits to those countries as well as a Japanese state visit to Washington in April. Those nations are home to companies that produce chip-making machinery, like ASML Holding N.V. and Tokyo Electron Limited. But industry in the United States and other countries has argued the rules could hurt them, and it remains unclear when or if foreign governments will issue limitations.

In the meantime, some of the rules that the United States plans to impose would have significant carve-outs, the people said. The rules blocking shipments of equipment to certain semiconductor factories in China would not apply to more than 30 allied countries, including the Netherlands, South Korea and Japan.

That has sparked pushback from U.S. firms, who argue that the playing field will be further tilted against them if the U.S. government stops their sales but not those of their competitors.

U.S. officials say negotiations are ongoing, and that they still hope to persuade Japan and other countries to tighten their restrictions. But some analysts are skeptical.

Emily Kilcrease, a senior fellow at the Center for a New American Security, said that while U.S. allies are increasingly wary of a threat from China, they are more comfortable with rules that limit only the most advanced technology.

“The broader the controls get, the more it hurts them commercially,” she said.

Ms. Kilcrease said that U.S. firms were also “not happy” about the U.S. move to restrict the activity of American companies but not their competitors in allied countries.

Gregory Allen, an analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said that countries like South Korea were now making significant updates to their export control rules, after having been urged to do so by the United States.

"I think they've made a lot of progress," he said. "My question is always, are they making progress fast enough to deal with Chinese countermeasures?"

A spokeswoman for the Commerce Department said that it was continually updating export controls to protect U.S. national security and remained committed to working closely with allies.

A representative for the Chinese Ministry of Commerce said the United States had abused export control measures, and China hoped other countries would resist U.S. economic coercion.

Much about the policy remains unclear, and could be subject to change. But the rules – which could come as soon as this month – are clearly an effort to shore up previous restrictions aimed at limiting China's ability to develop the most advanced A.I. chips.

Most advanced chips are used in consumer devices, but some can also be used to develop weaponry, carry out cyberattacks and construct surveillance systems. The U.S. government has blocked American technology exports to China, but a key part of the Biden administration's strategy has been to get other countries to pass similar regulations. If they don't, China could still get much of its technology from elsewhere, while American companies would simply lose out on sales. It could also encourage countries not to use American components so they no longer have to follow U.S. rules.

U.S. officials have been trying to get Japan and the Netherlands to target particular companies in China with tougher restrictions, and change their laws to stop their citizens from servicing equipment in chip factories in China.

The effort to get allies to block chip technology to China started in the Trump administration, when the Netherlands agreed to stop shipping China ASML's most advanced machines.

Then, two years ago, the United States banned shipments globally of advanced chips to China, as well as U.S. exports of chip-making machinery from U.S.-based companies including Applied Materials Inc., Lam Research Corporation and KLA Corporation. Last year, the Netherlands and Japan agreed to issue restrictions barring shipment of some of their most advanced machinery to China, and the United States tighten its own rules, including stopping more shipments from ASML and Tokyo Electron. Still, the Chinese chip industry has continued to progress.

Last year, the Chinese telecom company Huawei rolled out a phone with an advanced chip, a move widely seen as a challenge.

Since then, the Biden administration has been working on tighter rules.

One draft version would place about 120 Chinese companies on a so-called entity list, which requires other companies to obtain a special license to ship them products from the United States. The listings would focus on companies that make chips, chip-making machinery and products and services to support them.

Certain Chinese chip factories would also be subject to international restrictions limiting shipments of equipment made with American parts or technology from certain countries.

The draft list included several Chinese chip factories alleged to be cooperating with Huawei, including SwaySure, Shenzhen Pensun Technology, Pengxinwei IC and Qingdao Si'En. It did not include major Chinese chipmaker CXMT, which was previously rumored to be targeted.

Other rules would restrict shipments of memory chips, which are crucial for training A.I. models. The administration has considered lower thresholds for A.I. chips made by Nvidia and other companies, but it's not clear if those will be included.

Details of the rules were earlier reported by Reuters and Bloomberg. KLA and Applied Materials declined to comment, while Lam did not respond to a request for comment.

The revised policy would make it harder for U.S. companies to sidestep restrictions by shipping to China from subsidiaries in countries including Israel, Malaysia and Singapore. But surging shipments to China from certain other countries would be unaffected.

ASML said last month that sales to China accounted for nearly half of its revenue in the first quarter. Tokyo Electron has said that the impact of export controls was "smaller than expected," as it increased sales of less sophisticated equipment to China.

Analysts say that networks of distributors and brokers have sprung up to funnel technology to restricted Chinese semiconductor factories.

U.S. companies also suspect that foreign technicians are helping China to maintain American machinery that was previously sold to Chinese factories.

People familiar with the discussions say that foreign partners have been somewhat skeptical of U.S. national security arguments, and are concerned about Chinese retaliation and lost sales.

Japanese officials did not respond to a request for comment. The Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs said it was in close contact with partners and it was up to each country to make its own assessment on export controls.

Paul Triolo, a partner at Albright Stonebridge Group, called the rule "an attempt to skirt head-on confrontation."

"Nobody wants to run roughshod over allies," he said. However, the damage from export controls on U.S. industry has been "significant," he said.

"There's been a lot of frustration, which the administration has mostly ignored," he said.

Kamala Harris' VP pick has a long history with China. But Beijing may not be happy about it

09 August 2024, CNN, Nectar Gan, Eric Cheung, Issac Yee and Will Ripley

Presumptive Democratic presidential nominee Kamala Harris' running mate has a decades-long connection with China. But in the eyes of Beijing, that may not necessarily be good news.

Tim Walz moved to China fresh out of college in 1989 to teach high school for a year, and then frequently returned to the country during a decade of taking American students on summer cultural exchanges.

The 60-year-old Minnesota governor has spoken fondly of his time in China and the people he met there, and his familiarity with the country and empathy for its people bring a personal, nuanced perspective on the United States' biggest strategic rival that is rare among his political peers.

Some Republican opponents have seized on that experience to accuse Walz of being "pro-China," but the Democratic vice-presidential nominee has a long history of criticizing authoritarian Chinese leadership. Walz moved to China at a tumultuous and politically charged time, shortly after the Tiananmen Square massacre, when the ruling Communist Party sent tanks in to violently quell peaceful student-led democracy protests in Beijing. Upon returning home to Nebraska in 1990, he told a local newspaper he felt the Chinese people had been mistreated by their government for years.

"If they had the proper leadership, there are no limits on what they could accomplish. They are such kind, generous, capable people," he told the Star-Herald at the time.

During his time in Congress from 2007 to 2019, Walz rallied support for imprisoned Chinese activists. He met with the Dalai Lama, the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader loathed by Beijing, and Joshua Wong, the young Hong Kong democracy activist now jailed for his activism against Beijing's tightening grip.

"The more he understands China, the more he feels pity for the Chinese people, and the more critical he becomes of the rulers who govern them," said Shen Dingli, a foreign policy analyst in Shanghai.

"He has some understanding of Chinese culture and respects it in his heart, but he definitely does not accept China's political (system)," Shen added. "Beijing is probably more fearful and uncomfortable with such a foreigner who understands China."

'It was more about the people'

Walz was among the first groups of young Americans to teach in high schools in China under a Harvard University volunteer program, just a decade after the two countries established diplomatic relations.

As a fresh graduate, he spent a year teaching English and American history at the Foshan No. 1 High School, in the southern province of Guangdong.

There, he was met with industrious and welcoming students who applauded him each time he used a Chinese word correctly, and friendly strangers who offered to help whenever he stopped in the streets looking bewildered, he told the Star-Herald in 1990. "I was treated exceptionally well," he told the newspaper. "There was no anti-American feeling whatsoever. American is 'It' in the eyes of the Chinese. Many of the students want to come to America to study."

That was a different era in China. The impoverished country was curious about the world after emerging from decades of self-imposed isolation and tumultuous rule under Mao Zedong. Paramount leader Deng Xiaoping unleashed market reforms and, along with an economic opening, calls for political liberalization gathered pace in the 1980s.

Such calls coalesced into a student-led movement in the spring of 1989, which was brutally put down by the Chinese military weeks before Walz's trip.

"I remember waking up and seeing the news on June 4 that the unthinkable had happened," Walz told Voice of America in an interview in 2014.

"Many of my colleagues decided to go home and not to go on [to China]. I thought it was more important than ever to go, to make sure the story was told and to let the Chinese people know we were standing there, we were with them."

From Guangdong, Walz took a 40-hour cross-country train ride to the Chinese capital to see Tiananmen Square, the site of the democracy protests.

He made sure he would always commemorate the crackdown in a personal way – by getting married on June 4, 1994, the fifth anniversary of the massacre. "He wanted to have a date he'll always remember," his wife and fellow high-school teacher, Gwen, told a local newspaper in Minnesota before their wedding.

The newlyweds spent their honeymoon taking students on two-week tours in China for sightseeing and classes on culture, education and history. These trips became a summer tradition for the couple through 2003.

"I would go back in a heartbeat," said Cara Roemhildt, who went on such a trip in 1998. "It was an educational trip with one of our favorite teachers. It was more about the people. It wasn't about the politics."

Roemhildt said she and her classmates still talk about the trip decades later.

"It felt very, very comfortable. And we went all over...Train rides (to) a whole bunch of different places," she told CNN. "Just seeing a different culture and having respect for it while seeing it. Knowing that it's different, but knowing that it's okay, too."

A nuanced critic

After entering politics in 2006, Walz continued to devote time and attention to China in Congress.

He served more than a decade on the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, which monitors human rights and the rule of law in the country – a role Beijing would not be happy about.

"The Chinese government has always viewed that commission as 'anti-China,'" said Liu Dongshu, an assistant professor of public and international affairs at the City University of Hong Kong.

In Congress, Walz co-sponsored a series of resolutions calling on China to release its jailed rights activists, including Nobel Peace laureate Liu Xiaobo, who eventually died in custody of liver cancer.

In 2015, Walz joined a congressional delegation on a trip to China, which included a rare stop in Tibet, which he had also visited decades earlier during his time teaching at the Chinese high school.

The following year, Walz met the Dalai Lama in Washington for what he called a "life-changing lunch." He also welcomed Lobsang Sangay, then leader of Tibet's government in exile, into his congressional office to meet a group of Minnesota high-school students.

At a congressional meeting that year, he called on Beijing to "ensure the preservation of traditional Tibetan culture" and "provide less regulated religious freedom to the Tibetans."

Walz has also been a vocal supporter of Hong Kong's pro-democracy movement.

In 2017, when Wong, the student protest leader, was jailed for his political activism, Walz posted a photo of himself and the young activist standing side by side to show solidarity with "all advocating for democracy in Hong Kong."

Walz also threw his support behind the Hong Kong Human Rights and Democracy Act, which sanctions officials responsible for human rights violations in the city, when the legislation appeared to be languishing in Congress.

"We knocked on every door when the #HKHRDA lacked momentum. Only Walz answered his," Jeffrey Ngo, a Hong Kong democracy activist now based in Washington, said on X.

"Walz is perhaps the most solid candidate when it comes to human rights and China on a major-party ticket in recent memory," Ngo said.

On the diplomatic front, Walz has criticized China's unfair trade practices and its growing assertiveness in the South China Sea.

In Chinese nationalist circles, which have an outsized voice on policy debates in China, there are no rosy illusions about Walz.

"On human rights and ideological issues, he has basically crossed all the possible red lines out there," Shen Yi, an international relations scholar known for his fiercely nationalistic views, wrote on social media. But unlike more hawkish politicians, Walz does not believe in decoupling, and instead holds a more nuanced view on the geostrategic rivalry between the US and China.

"I don't fall into the category that China necessarily needs to be an adversarial relationship. I totally disagree," he said in an interview in 2016.

"We're on the same sheet of music, two of the world's great superpowers, there's many collaborative things we can do together."

Stephen Roach, former chief of Morgan Stanley Asia, said the Harris-Walz ticket may provide "an important counterweight to the current venom of American Sinophobia."

Walz's empathy for the Chinese people and appreciation of China's non-political aspects make him a harder case for Beijing to "villainize as an 'anti-China' foil" than politicians that are hawkish on all dimensions, Eric Fish, a former Beijing-based journalist and author of "China's Millennials: The Want Generation," said on X.

'A complex country' Walz's extensive experience with China makes him a rare figure in the race for the White House – at least since George H. W. Bush, who served as America's unofficial ambassador to Beijing in the mid- 1970s before running for vice president and later president.

Bush's stint in Beijing would go on to influence his foreign policy – and help steer US-China relations through the tumultuous fallout of the Tiananmen crackdown.

But US-China relations are at a very different place now from the honeymoon period of engagement. Being tough on China has become a rare point of bipartisan consensus in the US, and Beijing is unlikely to be counting on Walz to improve bilateral ties.

"The direction of US policy towards China is very clear. As an individual, regardless of your attitude towards China, there's not much room for maneuver," said Liu, the expert at the City University of Hong Kong.

"And vice presidents can have a varied level of say in foreign policy, depending on the president they serve," he added.

Walz's experience living and teaching in China could serve as a useful diplomatic ice breaker to warm up the room if that's what the two sides wish to do, Liu said. But even then, he added, the Chinese would need to dance around the awkwardness in the timing and avoid all mention of the Tiananmen crackdown – which remains a political taboo in China.

On China's tightly controlled social media, Walz's early ties to the country have raised eyebrows and generated considerable interest. The hashtag "Harris' VP pick once taught in China" racked up 15 million views on microblogging site Weibo.

The year of Walz's arrival in China – 1989 – was not lost among those who understand the sensitivity of the date, despite decades of effort by the Chinese government to erase the brutal crackdown from public memory.

But, perhaps reflective of the different era China now finds itself in under leader Xi Jinping, who has fanned nationalist sentiment and suspicion against foreigners over national security, many questioned the "real motive" of Walz's first trip to China.

"Heh, 1989-1990, Americans teaching in China during this period – it's something worth pondering carefully," said a top comment on Weibo.

"Must be a spy," said another.

Liu said that, given how drastically China has changed over the past decades, Walz's understanding of the country from his younger days may offer limited help on American policy toward China today.

Walz himself has conceded that he's by no means a China expert.

"I lived in China, and as I said I've been there about 30 times," he said in the 2016 interview. "But if someone tells you they're an expert on China, they're probably not telling you the truth because it's a complex country."

US bans imports from five more Chinese companies over Uyghur forced labor

09 August 2024, Reuters, Karen Freifeld

The United States on Thursday banned imports from five more Chinese companies over alleged human rights abuses involving the Uyghurs, according to a government posting, as part of its effort to eliminate goods made with forced labor from the U.S. supply chain.

The companies include Hong Kong-based Rare Earth Magnesium Technology Group Holdings (0601.HK), opens new tab and its parent, Century Sunshine Group Holdings (0509.HK), opens new tab, which manufacture magnesium fertilizer and magnesium alloy products. Also included is Zijin Mining Group Co (601899.SS), opens new tab subsidiary Xinjiang Habahe Ashele Copper Co, which mines nonferrous metals.

The list identifies those who work with the government of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region to recruit and transport Uyghurs, Kazakhs, Kyrgyz or members of other persecuted groups out of the region, and those who source material from the region or from people who work with the government of Xinjiang.

U.S. officials say Chinese authorities have established labor camps for Uyghurs and other Muslim minority groups in Xinjiang. Beijing denies any abuses.

"The so-called 'forced labor in Xinjiang is nothing but an egregious lie propagated by anti-China forces and a tool for US politicians to destabilize Xinjiang and contain China's development," a spokesperson for the Chinese embassy in Washington said on Thursday in a statement. "China will continue to firmly safeguard the legitimate and lawful rights and interests of Chinese companies."

China targets U.S. track athletes in response to doping allegations dogging its swimmers

08 August 2024, CBC

Doping agency cites sprinter Erriyon Knighton as example of U.S. double standard

China is trying to fight fire with fire in the face of persistent doping allegations that have dogged its swimmers at the Paris Olympics.

The China Anti-Doping Agency called Thursday for more intensive testing of American track and field competitors, citing in a news release past doping scandals and questioning how the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency handled them.

Repeated blasts from the Chinese agency have been echoed by reports in the government-controlled state media complaining about double standards applied to Chinese competitors. The reports have highlighted the more than 600 tests undergone by Chinese swimmers at the Paris Games with no violations found.

The World Anti-Doping Agency and World Aquatics have acknowledged that 23 Chinese swimmers tested positive for a banned substance ahead of the Tokyo Olympics. The results were not made public until revealed by media reports earlier this year, with both bodies accepting the Chinese explanation that the positive tests were caused by tainted food.

After the details emerged, the U.S. launched an investigation under a law passed in 2020 giving federal authorities power to investigate sports doping and cover-ups.

In a meeting in Paris this week, the head of the China's Olympic delegation told his American counterpart that China hopes the U.S. will stop its "long-arm jurisdiction" and ensure that athletes from all countries can participate smoothly and safely in the 2028 Summer Games in Los Angeles and the 2034 Winter Games in Salt Lake City, according to an account in an official Chinese sports newspaper.

China's anti-doping agency and its state media have zeroed in on an American sprinter, Erriyon Knighton, who was competing Thursday in the 200-metre finals. Knighton tested positive for a banned substance in March but the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency said an arbitration panel determined it came from contaminated meat, allowing him to compete.

The Chinese agency issued a release Tuesday accusing the U.S. agency of double standards. It followed up Thursday with the release calling for more testing of U.S. track and field competitors.

Some competitors from other countries spoke out about the controversy as China won 12 medals in swimming in Paris, including a gold in the men's 4x100 medley relay that ended a decades-long U.S. dominance of that event. Chinese swimmers have denied cheating.

U.S. swimming legend Michael Phelps doubled down on his support for tougher sanctions, including a lifetime ban for anyone who tests positive for a banned substance.

British swimmer Adam Peaty, whose team missed out on a medal by finishing fourth in the relay, blasted a system that allowed the Chinese swimmers who tested positive to compete.

"As an honourable person, I mean, you should be out of the sport," he said, "but we know sport isn't that simple."

Chinese businesses hoping to expand in the US and bring jobs face uncertainty and suspicion

06 August 2024, The Economic Times

WASHINGTON: It was billed as the "biggest ever economic development project" in north Michigan when Gov. Gretchen Whitmer in 2022 welcomed a Chinese lithium-ion battery company's plan to build a $2.36 billion factory and bring a couple thousand jobs to Big Rapids.

But now the project by Gotion High-Tech is in the crosshairs of some U.S. lawmakers and local residents. Leading the charge is Republican Rep. John Moolenaar of Michigan, chairman of the House Select Committee on China, who accuses the Chinese company of having ties to forced labor and says he fears it could spy for Beijing and work to extend China's influence in the U.S. heartland. Gotion rejects the accusations.

"I want to see this area have more jobs and investments, but we must not welcome companies that are controlled by people who see us as the enemy and we should not allow them to build here," Moolenaar said at a recent roundtable discussion in Michigan.

Lured by the large U.S. market, Chinese businesses are coming to the United States with money, jobs and technology, only to find rising suspicion at a time of an intensifying U.S.-China rivalry that has spread into the business world.

U.S. wariness of China, coupled with Beijing's desire to protect its technological competitiveness, threatens to rupture ties between the world's two largest economies. That could hurt businesses, workers and consumers, which some warn could undermine the economic foundation that has helped stabilize relations.

"This is a lose-lose scenario for the two countries," Zhiquan Zhu, professor of political science and international relations at Bucknell University, said in an email. "The main reason is U.S.-China rivalry, and the U.S. government prioritises 'national security' over economic interests in dealing with China." Lizhi Liu, an assistant professor of business at Georgetown University, said the trend, along with the decline of U.S. investments in China, could hurt China-

U.S. relations.

"Strong investment ties between the two nations are crucial not only for economic reasons but also for security, as intertwined economic interests reduce the likelihood of major conflicts or even war," she said. But U.S. lawmakers believe the stakes are high. Sen. Marco Rubio said at a July hearing that China is not only a military and diplomatic adversary for the U.S. but also a "technological, industrial and commercial" opponent.

"The technological and industrial high ground has always been a precursor of global power," said Rubio, a Republican from Florida. He argued that U.S. foreign policy should take into account the country's commercial, trade and technological interests. The bipartisan House Select Committee on China has warned that widespread adoption in the U.S. of technologies developed by China could threaten long-term U.S. technological competitiveness.

U.S. public sentiment against Chinese investments began to build up during President Barack Obama's administration, in a pushback against globalization, and were amplified after President Donald Trump came into office, said Yilang Feng, an assistant professor of business at University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, who studies economic nationalism and resistance to foreign direct investments in the U.S.

"The scale has increased, so has the intensity," Feng said.

As President Joe Biden's administration seeks to revive American manufacturing and boost U.S. technological capabilities, many politicians believe Chinese companies should be kept out. "Can you imagine working for an American company working tirelessly to develop battery technology and then you find out that your tax dollars are being used to subsidize a competitor from China?" Moolenaar said as he campaigned against the Gotion project in his congressional district in a state that is critical in the presidential election.

Whitmer's office has declined to comment on the project. The Michigan Economic Development Corporation told The Associated Press it has received "bipartisan support at all levels" to move forward with the project, which will create up to 2,350 jobs.

Danielle Emerson, spokesperson for MEDC, said the project is "critical to onshore the battery supply chain and create thousands of good-paying local jobs, which reduces our reliance on overseas disruptions and further protects our national security."

Local residents of Green Charter Township, however, revolted against the project over its Chinese connections last year when they removed five officials who supported it in a recall election.

Also in Michigan, a partnership between Ford and CATL, another Chinese battery manufacturer, has been scaled back, following pushback over CATL's potential connections to China's ruling party. In Worcester, Massachusetts, the Chinese biotech company WuXi Biologics paused construction of a large facility a few weeks after lawmakers introduced a bill that would, over data security concerns, ban U.S. entities receiving federal funds from doing business with a number of China-linked companies, WuXi Biologics included.

John Ling, who has helped South Carolina and Georgia attract Chinese businesses for nearly two decades, said geopolitics have been getting in the way in recent years. Chinese companies are less likely to consider South Carolina after the state senate last year approved a bill banning Chinese citizens from buying property, even though the bill has yet to clear the statehouse, Ling said.

Data by the U.S. Bureau of Economic Analysis show the total investments by China in the U.S. fell to just under $44 billion in 2023, from a high point of $63 billion in 2017, although first-year expenditures rose to $621 million in 2023, up from $531 million in 2022 but drastically down from the high of $27 billion in 2016. The figures include acquisitions, new business establishments and expansions.

Thilo Hanemann, a partner at the research provider Rhodium Group, said there's been an upswing in new Chinese investments in the U.S. following a major decline, prompted by the end of disruptions during the COVID-19 pandemic and the need for Chinese companies to go overseas when margins at home are dwindling.

U.S. policymakers are worried that Chinese companies, beholden to the ruling Chinese Communist Party, could pose national security risks, he said, while Beijing is concerned that overseas investments could lead to Chinese technology leakage. "Chinese companies are in between a rock and a hard place, dealing with both domestic governments in terms of not letting them go abroad and then the U.S. or host governments that have concerns," Hanemann said.

Yet, Chinese investors may still find the U.S. market appealing "due to its high consumption levels and judicial independence," said Liu of Georgetown University.

In 2022, Michigan beat out several other states in luring Gotion, according to the governor's office. Keen to revive its manufacturing base, the state offered a package of incentives, including $175 million in grants and the approval of a new zone that could save the company $540 million. Local townships approved tax abatements for Gotion to build a factory to make components for electrical vehicle batteries. In Green Charter Township, the new board dropped support for the project and rescinded an agreement that would extend water to the factory site, only to be rebuked by a U.S. district judge.

The future of the plant remains uncertain, as Moolenaar is rallying support for his bill that would prevent Gotion from receiving federal subsidies. He has accused the company of using forced labor, after congressional staff discovered links between the company and Xinjiang Production Construction Corps., a paramilitary group sanctioned by the U.S. Commerce Department for its involvement in China's forced labor practice.

Chuck Thelen, vice president of manufacturing of Gotion North America, in recent town hall meetings called the forced labor accusations "categorically false and clearly intended to deceive."

By allowing the Chinese company to build a plant in Michigan, it would help "onshore a technology that has been vastly leapfrogged" outside of the U.S., he said. It doesn't amount to "a Chinese invasion," Thelen said. "This is a global approach, an energy solution."

US reportedly to escalate AI chip restrictions on China, 'may incur countermeasures'

02 August 2024, Global Times, Ma Jingjing

Hegemonic move only 'impels Chinese firms to strive for tech self-reliance'

The Biden administration is reportedly working on a set of unilateral restrictions on China's access to artificial intelligence (AI) memory chips and equipment capable of making those products, in the latest hegemonic move to contain China's AI industry in order to maintain its global monopoly. Chinese observers said the US cannot impede China's technological progress and will only impel Chinese enterprises to strive for technological self-reliance. They said China may take countermeasures, including lodging complaints with the WTO, when it is necessary to fight back as the US continues to expand its "small yard" policies.

Observers said the US' intensifying crackdown on and "decoupling" from China will lead to further deterioration in China-US bilateral relations, bringing monumental losses to US firms that are betting on Chinese opportunities.

US' stepped-up restrictions

Bloomberg reported on Thursday that the Biden administration is expected to announce a set of new restrictions as soon as late August to curb China's access to AI memory chips and related equipment. The measure is designed to keep Micron Technology Inc and South Korea's leading memory chipmakers SK Hynix Inc and Samsung Electronics Co from supplying Chinese firms with so-called high-bandwidth memory, or HBM, chips, the report said, citing people familiar with the matter. HBM chips are required to run AI accelerators like those offered by Nvidia Corp, it said. "By putting patches on its chip export restrictions on China, the US' ultimate purpose is to curb China's technological development so as to maintain its global monopoly in cutting-edge technologies," He Weiwen, a senior fellow at the Center for China and Globalization, told the Global Times on Thursday. He said the US' political maneuvers are not sustainable, as they go against economic rules and the interests of US enterprises and residents.

"China may take countermeasures when it is necessary," He said, noting that China could also lodge complaints with the WTO if the US' restriction measures against China reach a certain scale. At a routine press conference on Wednesday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian blasted the US for continuing to politicize trade and tech issues, tie them to national security and use them as a weapon to tighten control over chip exports to China and coerce other countries to go after China's semiconductor industry, which severely undermines international trade rules, destabilizes global industrial and supply chains, and serves no one's interests. The Biden administration is taking an increasingly hardline stance on China issues in the election year. In June, the US Treasury Department issued draft rules for banning or requiring notification of certain investments in AI and other technology sectors in China that could "threaten US national security." Lü Xiang, a research fellow at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, warned that the US' intensifying crackdown on China's technological rise may further harm China-US relations and send bilateral relations to a new low.

In addition, the US' attempts to crack down on China will backfire on itself and its allies, Lü told the Global Times on Thursday.

"For example, South Korea and Japan previously exported a large number of semiconductor products to China every year, but the US' export restrictions led to South Korea posting a trade deficit with China. The US' selfish moves will harm its allies' production capacity, and will prompt those countries to resist the US' coercion one day," Lü said.

China market indispensable

"For US, tightening chip export controls on China is a double-edged sword," Fu Liang, a Beijing-based tech analyst, told the Global Times on Thursday. Faced with external pressure, Chinese chip producers are accelerating research and development to boost domestic replacements, which means medium- and low-performance US chip products will become increasingly insignificant for the China market, Fu said. Despite the Biden administration's continuous crackdown on China's high-tech field, US firms such as Nvidia are striving to tap the great potential of the huge market of the world's second-largest economy. Nvidia is reportedly working on a special version of its AI chip for the China market. Nvidia will work with Inspur, one of its major distribution partners in China, on the launch and distribution of the chip, which is tentatively named "B20," and the shipments are planned to start in the second quarter of 2025, Reuters reported in July.

US sounds alarm bell on China's military development

02 August 2024, Think China, Han Yong Hong

With the US reaffirming its view that China is its biggest threat and warning of a widening military gap, Lianhe Zaobao associate editor Han Yong Hong notes that once the US loses its overwhelming hard power, the entire chain of efforts to suppress China will also fall apart.

A 29 July report released by the bipartisan US Congressional Commission on the National Defense Strategy (NDS) does not hide its anxiety about the situation facing the US, including the challenges faced by the US military. While the report has not attracted much attention in China, Chinese citizens may feel that it is a rare positive evaluation of China's strength by the US.

US's outdated strategy

At the outset, the 114-page report emphasises in its summary that the threats the US faces are the most serious and most challenging the nation has encountered since 1945 and include the potential for near-term major war, but the US military is "not prepared".

The report boldly proposes that the US should significantly increase military resource investment, prepare for multiple wars and implement a Multiple Theater Force Construct.

To this end, cooperation with allies and partners is necessary to ensure simultaneous defence of the US homeland and response to threats in the Indo-Pacific, Europe and the Middle East.

The commission was tasked to review whether the US Department of Defense's strategy, formulated before the Russia-Ukraine war and the Israel-Hamas conflict, is still applicable. The report assesses that the design and force structure of US defence strategy are outdated, and the defence industrial base is grossly inadequate to provide the equipment, technology and munitions needed today, let alone given the demands of great power conflict.

... while the US "still has the world's strongest military with the farthest reach, within 1,000 miles of China's shore, [the US has] lost military dominance and could lose a war". — Eric Edelman, Vice-Chair, NDS Commission

The report believes that the US should change its longstanding post-Cold War two-war construct, as the alliance between China, Russia, Iran and North Korea has created a real risk of simultaneous protracted conflicts in multiple theatres worldwide.

The report reiterates that China poses the preeminent challenge to US interests and the most formidable military threat. In many ways, China is outpacing the US and has largely negated the US military advantage in the Western Pacific through two decades of focused military investment. China currently boasts the largest navy in the world with over 370 ships and submarines, and the largest aviation force in its region.

In contrast, the US Navy's "ability to construct, maintain, and repair the maritime forces it requires is fundamentally in doubt" due to insufficient shipbuilding industrial capacity. The report also notes that the US military's combat capability is at an inflection point.

Vice-chair of the NDS Commission, Eric Edelman, also stated that while the US "still has the world's strongest military with the farthest reach, within 1,000 miles of China's shore, [the US has] lost military dominance and could lose a war".

Since July, the People's Liberation Army not only attended numerous military parades and celebrations around the world but also flexed its military muscles on at least three occasions.

US concerns not unfounded

The US Congress typically releases reports like this before the Department of Defense updates its strategy, to feed hawkish elements and US military industry interests, and to provide reasons and ammunition to increase military budgets.

China usually strongly refutes such reports for "playing up the China threat" and "fearmongering". However, China did not respond strongly this time. One can see that the report's observations on China's military capabilities are not entirely exaggerated. From another perspective, US concerns are not entirely unfounded.

Indeed, the Chinese army is not what it used to be. Since July, the People's Liberation Army not only attended numerous military parades and celebrations around the world but also flexed its military muscles on at least three occasions. It demonstrated the new heights that it has reached in global naval and air power projection capabilities while displaying its military strength against the US and NATO.

This includes the first time Chinese and Russian bombers were seen flying near Alaska on 24 July; and Chinese troops heading to Tanzania in early July to participate in the Peace Unity-2024 joint land and sea military exercise with Tanzania and Mozambique in late July.

The Chinese side also deployed two Type 071 comprehensive landing ships and a Type 052D guided missile destroyer to escort the cross-border transport of heavy weapons and equipment, and then transported troops from the Central Theater Command to Africa on a Y-20 strategic transport aircraft.

... China's drone industry is outstanding and can be said to be at the forefront of the world. At the same time, the military application of drones would also rewrite the traditional mode of combat.

Also, on 29 July, the Type 052D guided-missile destroyer Jiaozuo was deployed to Finland to participate in a joint military operation with Russia. This was interpreted as an exercise on NATO's "doorstep", expressing China's dissatisfaction with NATO's increasing involvement in Asia-Pacific affairs, just as the approach of Chinese bombers to Alaska was seen as a countermeasure against frequent US reconnaissance along China's coast.

In fact, China's drone industry is outstanding and can be said to be at the forefront of the world. At the same time, the military application of drones would also rewrite the traditional mode of combat.

Balancing development with global interests

These are all the inevitable result of China's economic rise and its strong industrial base and manufacturing capabilities. As written in the report, if the US defence industry does not address its shortcomings, the development gap between the US and China will widen.

In future great power competition between the US and China, if the US does not have a decisive military advantage, what kind of situation might that lead to? Indeed, a series of international issues will follow.

... once the US loses its overwhelming hard power, the entire chain of efforts to suppress China will also fall apart.

Thus, it can be anticipated that China's strategic goal would be to continuously invest in its military, forcing the US to eventually abandon its efforts to suppress China militarily. The Communiqué of the Third Plenary Session of the Chinese Communist Party also listed deepening military reform as one of its goals to serve this strategy.

From a broader perspective, once the US loses its overwhelming hard power, the entire chain of efforts to suppress China will also fall apart.

On the one hand, the rest of the world is somewhat concerned about the uncertainties following China's rise and the expansion of China's military ambitions. On the other hand, it is also very worried that China and the US may engage in conflicts that could lead to a global catastrophe before both sides can achieve peaceful coexistence.

This great power competition will only intensify, and the rest of the world will also adjust their strategies as the situation evolves. The great power that can better balance its own development with global interests will receive broader support and genuine affirmation.

Protesters in US were attacked by Beijing-linked figures: report

02 August 2024, RFA, Alex Willemyns

Anti-Xi protesters at last year's APEC summit were harassed and assaulted to silence them, the report says.

Pro-democracy and human rights activists who protested against Chinese President Xi Jinping during his visit to San Francisco last year were harassed and in some cases violently assaulted by organized supporters of the Chinese Communist Party, a new report says.

The report, Exporting Repression, was released Tuesday by the Hong Kong Democracy Council and Students for a Free Tibet. It says that there was an organized "mobilization" of violent counter-protesters arranged by the CCP's "United Front" foreign-influence program.

"Their actions created a pervasive atmosphere of intimidation that not only had a deterrent effect on protests throughout the duration of Xi's stay but also interfered with protesters' exercise of their free speech rights," it says, blaming police for "exhibiting a lack of awareness."

The report details 34 cases of alleged harassment and violent attacks on anti-Xi protesters and calls for U.S. authorities to look into whether some of the people it alleges carried out the attacks are "unregistered foreign agents" working for Beijing to silence dissent in America.

The attacks, it says, were primarily directed toward Uyghurs, Tibetans and Hongkongers protesting against Xi, who was in San Francisco in November for the Asia-Pacific Economic summit and for high-profile talks with U.S. President Joe Biden just outside the city.

Intimidation of protesters included "threats, attempts to prevent protest, physical attacks and beatings, thefts of cell phones, and incidents of stalking," according to the report. It details multiple cases of protesters being surrounded by counter-protesters before being beaten.

Radio Free Asia reporters in San Francisco also witnessed anti-Xi protesters being attacked with the poles of Chinese flags, with San Francisco Police Department officers at times intervening to stop the violence but at other times taking a hands-off approach.

The report calls efforts by local law enforcement to stop attacks, and later to apprehend those responsible for violence, "inadequate."

The SFPD did not respond to a request for comment.

Plausible deniability

The report does not directly attribute the violence to orders from the Chinese Embassy in the United States, but says Beijing's diplomats in America "play a key role in cultivating united front groups overseas, often providing them with guidance and direction at key junctures."

The United Front organizers allegedly behind the campaign to suppress the anti-Xi protests maintain "a facade of autonomy" from Beijing for appearance's sake, it says, but are nonetheless ultimately "guided" by the CCP and act only to preserve its interests.

But this is denied by Beijing.

Chinese Embassy spokesman Liu Pengyu told RFA that the people in San Francisco who the report claims were violent counter-protesters were in fact peaceful supporters who turned out to welcome Xi. He said the people who turned out in San Francisco to welcome Xi's arrival were there "expressing their support for the stabilization and sound development of China-U.S. relations," which he said should be "welcomed by anyone with good will for the bilateral relationship."

Liu said it was in fact the anti-Xi protesters who stoked violence, blaming them for injuring more than 60 people, including the elderly.

"Some of the victims were knocked out, others were beaten to brain and nose bleeding, still others got hurt at sternums and ribs," Liu said. "Some of the violent rioters were arrested on site and indicted with criminal prosecutions by U.S. law enforcement agencies."

RFA has found no record of the prosecution of any protesters or counter-protesters, with inquiries to the SFPD going unanswered.

But Liu said the Chinese Embassy condemned the violence.

"We have asked the U.S. side to investigate the incidents, bring to justice the perpetrators at an early date and safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of the victims," the spokesperson said.

Transnational repression

The report comes as U.S. lawmakers and White House officials express growing concerns about transnational repression committed by foreign governments against rights activists on American soil. In a statement, Rep. John Moolenaar, a Republican from Missouri who chairs the House Select Committee on the Chinese Communist Party, called on the FBI and SFPD to "hold the perpetrators accountable" and said lawmakers needed to come up with solutions themselves.

"Congress must also act to give law enforcement additional tools to prosecute these crimes," he said. "The CCP cannot be allowed to bring its Orwellian model of totalitarian control to American soil."

Chemi Lhamo, the campaign director at Students for Free Tibet, told RFA Tibetan she hoped the report would lead to increased awareness of the ways in which China's government was trying to silence critics abroad, and perhaps even work to discourage the behavior.

"While there is much talk about transnational repression on international platforms, it has typically been difficult to show clear proof of it, which is one of the challenges the report addresses," Lhamo said, adding that it built on a growing body of "tangible proof" of repression.

"The Chinese government's policy of transnational repression is never going to work well when it always tries to silence and intimidate our people and Tibetan freedom fighters," she said. "We will never be discouraged and will fight back even harder."

US lawmaker calls Chinese sanctions 'badge of honor'

02 August 2024, VOA, Katherine Michaelson

Representative Jim McGovern, the most recent U.S. lawmaker to be put under Chinese sanctions, says he will wear the sanctions "as a badge of honor," calling on the Chinese government to end its oppressive actions in Tibet, Xinjiang and Hong Kong in a statement emailed to VOA from the representative's media office Friday.

"These absurd sanctions against me only serve to highlight how PRC leaders are afraid of free and open debate. They seek to punish and silence those who disagree with them. But the world is watching what they do, and people who care about human rights will not be silent," he said in the statement.

China placed McGovern under sanctions Wednesday for frequently "interfering in China's internal affairs." In his politics, McGovern has taken on the Tibetan cause, sponsoring a bill advocating for a peaceful resolution of the China-Tibet dispute that President Joe Biden signed into law on July 12.

China views Tibet as an "inseparable part of China since ancient times," despite supporters of the Tibetan Government in Exile and the Dalai Lama saying that Tibet has historically been independent. Chinese state-sponsored media Xinhua said McGovern's Tibet- China Dispute Act "grossly interferes in China's internal affairs," violates international law and distorts historical facts to suppress China and encourage Tibetan separatist movements.

Framed as a response to McGovern's efforts to undermine Chinese territorial sovereignty, the sanctions freeze the representative's Chinese assets, prohibit organizations or individuals in China from engaging with him, and ban him and his family from entering Chinese territory, according to a publication from Xinhua.

McGovern, who represents the state of Massachusetts in the House of Representatives, has no assets or business dealings in China.

McGovern's Tibet-China Dispute Act, gives the State Department increased authority to counter Chinese disinformation about Tibet and promotes the resumption of talks between Chinese leaders and the Dalai Lama. No such talks have occurred since 2010. China stands accused of large-scale human rights abuses in Tibet, which the congressman hoped to alleviate with this legislation.

In a statement released on June 12 when the bill passed the House, McGovern said, "The People's Republic of China has systematically denied Tibetans the right to self-determination and continues to deliberately erase Tibetan religion, culture and language.

"The ongoing oppression of the Tibetan people is a grave tragedy, and our bill provides further tools that empower both America and the international community to stand up for justice and peace," he said. Among the signees of the statement were House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul, Senator Todd Young, McGovern and Senator Jeff Merkley.

China has sanctioned other U.S. representatives for their involvement in an issue that threatens Chinese territorial homogeneity. Over the last year, China has sanctioned Representative McCaul and former Representative Mike Gallagher over their support for Taiwan.

China woos local U.S. officials as tensions with Washington rise

01 August 2024, Nikkei Asia, Pak Yiu

Delegations of American mayors visiting China have grown since last year

More than 140 Chinese provincial government officials and business figures gathered in the small port city of Tacoma, Washington in July for a day of exchanges with their U.S. counterparts from 21 different states. As Washington hardens its stance toward Beijing, China is increasingly focused on strengthening ties with state and local officials.

The sixth U.S.-China sister cities summit, held on July 19, was the first to be held in person since 2019, and included a series of panel discussions on business and trade opportunities, youth and education exchanges, and sustainability.

Tacoma Mayor Victoria Woodards said she was able to reconnect with her counterparts at the event after having visited China in June.

"I was really energized and it just reminded me again of why opportunities like this are so important," she said.

Woodards' visit to China was organized by the government of Fuzhou – a city in the country's southeast – to celebrate the 30th anniversary of a sister-city partnership. She later flew to Ningbo and Beijing to meet with city officials and the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Countries (CPAFC), a key organizer of the U.S.-China sister cities summit and an extension of the Chinese Communist Party's United Front Work Department.

From Tacoma to cities in South Carolina, California and Iowa, China has been courting mayors and state officials to strengthen its local-level diplomacy.

As for tensions between the capitals, "some of that does trickle down to the state," Woodards said. "For me, it is staying focused on the things that unite us as opposed to the things that divide us."

At the July event, China's Ambassador to the U.S., Xie Feng, said more than 30 delegations from Chinese provinces have visited the U.S. since the start of 2023, while 10 delegations from the U.S. have travelled to China. He anticipated more to come before the end of the year in order to address "new challenges facing subnational exchanges."

"The so-called political correctness of being tough on China has been spreading in the United States, casting a chilling effect on sister-city cooperation and subnational interactions," Xie said in video remarks at the US-China sister cities summit.

"But the friendship between our two peoples is deeply rooted in our long history of exchanges," Xie said. "Neither setbacks in bilateral relations nor headwinds against people-to-people connections will ever change the fundamental wish of our peoples for friendship and cooperation."

The Chinese embassy in the U.S. referred Nikkei Asia to Xie's speeches at other events when asked for comment.

The summit was hosted by international nongovernmental organization Sister Cities International and CPAFC. Neither group responded to requests for comment.

Thomas Huston, a professor at Cincinnati University who has been establishing increased student exchanges with Chinese universities, said it was important to maintain such engagements.

"When you get to the personal level, or school level, the cooperation is here," he said. And while he acknowledged the existence of China-focused policies at the federal level, Huston said, "You don't get hung up on the geopolitical policies at the end of the day." Relations between the two countries have deteriorated rapidly since 2018 over a wide range of issues, including trade tariffs, reported human rights abuses in Xinjiang and the erosion of Hong Kong's autonomy.

Former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan in 2022 added fuel to the fire, prompting China to pause climate and military talks. Military talks resumed April this year after the long hiatus.

In 2020, then-Secretary of State Mike Pompeo discontinued U.S. participation in a 2011 memorandum of understanding between U.S. and Chinese governments concerning the establishment of a bilateral governors forum to boost subnational ties. Before the COVID-19 pandemic, there were more than 12 local-level engagements annually on average, according to the Truman Center, a think tank focused on national security issues. The number of state, county and city-level engagements reached 27 in 2017. But meetings plummeted to just two in 2020, when tensions between the two superpowers intensified and the pandemic heavily restricted international travel. The number recovered to 14 last year, while this year has also seen 14 engagements with more expected to come.

China's National Development and Reform Commission, a government agency focused on economic planning, said in June that it would establish local liaison mechanisms with the U.S. on climate change, following an event between California and China's Greater Bay Area officials.

The engagement figures are likely underreported, but the Truman Center said they provide a "snapshot" of the vast scope of engagements.

"Part of it is pent up demand, there was a lot of engagement that was just on ice for three years," said Kyle Jaros, an associate professor of global affairs in the Keough School of Global Affairs at the University of Notre Dame.

Repairing perceptions of China was one objective, said Jaros, an expert on subnational diplomacy.

While China has been eager to engage with U.S. state officials, Jaros said not all on the U.S. side are enthusiastic about meeting with their Chinese counterparts.

"There's clearly a diplomatic component to it. China concluded that at the state and local level, it might find at least some partners who believe there's an important reason for a constructive U.S.-China relationship, a kind of talking relationship and also [a] close trade and investment relationship."

"In some cases or places, this kind of charm offensive could create backlash against China," said Jaros.

Some U.S. states have taken a more aggressive attitude towards China of late, with a spike in state legislation targeting Chinese investment, trade and education introduced in the past two years.

But not all states have pursued hostile policies towards China as they value Chinese investments and trade with the country, according to analysts.

California is one such state. Six city mayors from California flew to China in May on a trip organized by China Silicon Valley, a nonprofit organization aimed at promoting investment between the two countries.

The mayors met with Hong Kong officials before flying to Chongqing in China's southwest to attend a trade fair and meet with city-level officials. China Silicon Valley did not respond to requests for comment. "Because of California's dependence on Chinese trade and college students, the state government continues to frame its cooperation with China as mutually beneficial in climate change, green technology, and fighting Asian hate, even though there's little tangible results," said William Chou, Japan Chair fellow at the Hudson Institute.

California Gov. Gavin Newsom met Chinese leader Xi Jinping in October last year to discuss climate change, shortly before Xi and Biden met in San Francisco a month later.

Political analysts say there are concerns in Washington that China could exploit local engagement for its own interest and harm U.S. national security.

"For China, these states give it a useful backdoor at a time when there is growing U.S. concern towards China," Chou added.

The Biden administration, aware of the increased Chinese engagement with local officials, has begun to invest in strengthening cooperation between local governments and the federal government. This year it dispatched State Department advisers to Chattanooga in Tennessee, Kansas City in Missouri,

San Antonio in Texas and San Diego in California to work with local community groups, trade associations, and businesses in a bid to strengthen engagement on global issues.

Chinese envoy calls out US 'political correctness' of taking tough line on China

20 July 2024, SCMP

Sister-city relations offer room for the two countries to advance relations, Xie Feng tells conference in Washington state.

"Grave challenges" confront Sino-US ties, Beijing's envoy to Washington said on Friday as he called out the "political correctness" in the United States of being tough on China.

Addressing a conference in Tacoma, Washington state via video link, Xie Feng called for deeper subnational exchanges, saying it would offer a more solid foundation for ties and "greater room" to move relations forward.

But there are fresh challenges in the way of these more local exchanges. "In recent years, the so-called political correctness of being tough on China has been spreading in the United States, casting a chilling effect on sister-city cooperation and subnational interactions," Xie said.

However, setbacks in US-China ties would not change the "fundamental wish of our peoples for friendship and cooperation", he added.

"The China-US relationship is still facing grave challenges. We need to pool strength from all to get the relationship better," he said in a transcript of the speech posted on the embassy's website.

Xie made the comments at the sixth US-China Sister Cities Summit co-sponsored by the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Foreign Countries, an agency under China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs to promote exchanges with other countries.

According to Xie, the event was the first on China-US subnational exchanges held in the US in five years.

Tacoma, a port city that Chinese President Xi Jinping visited in 2015, became sister cities with the southeastern Chinese city of Fuzhou in 1994.

In his address, the Chinese envoy said sister-city relationships between China and the US had flourished, with 286 pairs already established.

"Serving as bridges for mutual understanding and trust, they have nurtured goodwill between the two peoples, and injected vigour into China-US relations," he said.

Xie noted that since the start of last year, more than 30 delegations from Chinese provinces and cities had visited the US, and these exchanges had helped to "stabilise" US-China ties.

He expected greater exchanges and visits "so that, drop by drop, we can thaw the ice of misunderstanding, and ultimately form a vast ocean of friendship between our two peoples".

China and the US have sought to ease their strained ties, including with the closely watched meeting between Xi and US President Joe Biden in November.

There has been more engagement since then, including on climate change and artificial intelligence.

But in June, US ambassador to China Nicholas Burns said Beijing had made people-to-people exchanges "impossible", including by preventing Chinese nationals from taking part in American government programmes.

Xie, in his speech on Friday, also said that subnational cooperation between Chinese and American cities had brought benefits to both sides, noting that China was the top export market for three US states and in the top three markets for 32.

He urged American firms to seize opportunities brought by China's "openness and development", and called for an expansion in cooperation between sister cities.

"A brighter future for the 1.7 billion people of our two countries cannot be achieved without a healthy and stable China-US relationship," he said.

"It is our sincere hope that our sister-city relationships will continue to be a fountain of strength, giving strong and sustained impetus to the broader bilateral relationship, so as to keep it surging forward."

Tacoma mayor Victoria Woodards said in her speech that sister-city ties between the US and China had allowed the two countries to "build bridges of friendship and cooperation that transcends borders".

"I truly believe that if we can work together to address all the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead, we can and we will create a future that is bright and prosperous for every one of our communities," she said.

China halts nuclear arms talks with US over Taiwan support

18 July 2024, Aljazeera

Beijing said the US's weapons sales to Taiwan has 'compromised the political atmosphere' for continued talks on nuclear non-proliferation.

China has suspended negotiations on nuclear non-proliferation and arms control with the United States in protest against Washington's arms sales to the self-ruled island of Taiwan.

The US called Beijing's decision on Wednesday "unfortunate", while analysts said the move deals a potentially serious setback to global arms-control efforts.

China and the US began nuclear weapons discussions in November as part of a bid to ease mistrust ahead of a summit between Presidents Xi Jinping and Joe Biden.

Further dialogue had not been publicly announced since, with a White House official in January urging Beijing to respond "to some of our more substantive ideas on risk reduction".

A spokesperson for China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Wednesday said the US's arms sales to Taiwan, a territory that it claims, had "seriously compromised the political atmosphere for continuing the arms-control consultations".

"Consequently, the Chinese side has decided to hold off discussion with the US on a new round of consultations on arms control and non-proliferation," Lin Jian, the spokesperson, told a regular news briefing in Beijing.

"The responsibility fully lies with the US," he said.

Lin added that China was willing to maintain communication on international arms control, but said the US "must respect China's core interests and create necessary conditions for dialogue and exchange".

The US switched diplomatic recognition from Taipei to Beijing in 1979 but has remained Taiwan's most important partner and biggest arms supplier, sparking repeated condemnations from China.

Taiwan has protested for the past four years about stepped-up Chinese military activity near the island, including almost daily missions by Chinese warplanes and warships.

Arms-race risks

US State Department spokesperson Matthew Miller slammed China's move, saying Beijing has chosen to follow Russia's lead by asserting that arms-control engagement cannot proceed while there are other challenges in the bilateral relationship.

"We think this approach undermines strategic stability. It increases the risk of arms-race dynamics," Miller told reporters.

Arms-race risks

US State Department spokesperson Matthew Miller slammed China's move, saying Beijing has chosen to follow Russia's lead by asserting that arms-control engagement cannot proceed while there are other challenges in the bilateral relationship.

"We think this approach undermines strategic stability. It increases the risk of arms-race dynamics," Miller told reporters.

"Unfortunately, by suspending these consultations, China has chosen not to pursue efforts that would manage strategic risks and prevent costly arms races, but we, the United States, will remain open to developing and implementing concrete risk-reduction measures with China," he said.

The Biden administration advocates a policy of "compartmentalization", in which nuclear arms control talks are segregated from other contentious Sino-US issues.

The Chinese decision comes just over a month after the Biden administration said the US may have to deploy more strategic nuclear weapons to deter growing threats from Chinese and Russian arsenals.

Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association advocacy group, told the Reuters news agency that the US, Russia and China are legally bound as signatories of the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty – the cornerstone of global arms control – to "engage in talks to prevent the arms race".

"The only way they can accomplish that is through serious dialogue and Russia's refusal to do so and China's decision to do so are very serious setbacks," he said.

The US has a stockpile of about 3,700 nuclear warheads, of which roughly 1,419 strategic nuclear warheads were deployed. Russia has about 1,550 nuclear weapons deployed and according to the Federation of American Scientists, a stockpile of 4,489 nuclear warheads.

Washington meanwhile estimates that China has 500 operational nuclear warheads and will probably have more than 1,000 by 2030.

US officials have expressed frustration that Beijing has shown little interest in discussing steps to reduce nuclear weapons risks. But Beijing has long argued that the US already has a much larger arsenal.

U.S pursuing visa restrictions on Chinese officials involved in human rights abuses in Tibet and East Turkistan

18 July 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The United States State Department is taking action to impose visa restrictions on Chinese officials involved in human rights violations in Tibet and East Turkistan.

In a statement issued on Friday, July 12 by Mathew Miller, the United States State Department spokesperson stated, "The United States continues to promote accountability in the defence of human rights in China. Today, the State Department is taking steps to impose visa restrictions on People's Republic of China (PRC) officials for their involvement in the repression of marginalized religious and ethnic communities.

The PRC has not lived up to its commitments to respect and protect human rights, as demonstrated by the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang, the erosion of fundamental freedoms in Hong Kong, persistent human rights abuses in Tibet, and transnational repression around the world. We call on the PRC to abide by the principles enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to accept the many recommendations made this year during the Universal Periodic Review of its human rights record, including unconditionally releasing PRC nationals it has arbitrarily and unjustly detained".

On June 11, 2024, the UN released the Chinese government's response to the recommendations from the latest Universal Periodic Review (UPR) conducted in January 2024 revealing that China would accept 290 out of 428 recommendations, partially accept 8, note 32, and reject 98. However, these accepted recommendations exclude addressing the concerns raised by UN member states regarding severe human rights abuses in Tibet and East Turkistan, such as crimes against humanity, torture, forced disappearances, and the persecution of human rights defenders and journalists.

The Chinese government's approach to the UPR review, consistent with its tactics in previous reviews in 2009, 2013, and 2018, involved submitting misleading information and preventing domestic civil society groups from contributing to the state report or the review process. Additionally, through a vigorous lobbying campaign, China influenced several states to pose benign questions, make vague recommendations, and praise its human rights record. This strategy resulted in many weak recommendations that the Chinese government could easily accept, thus creating a facade of compliance while avoiding substantial reforms.

Despite the heavy pressure, some countries took a principled approach, raising concerns, and making recommendations, based on the growing body of evidence of abuses compiled by NGOs, UN special procedures, treaty bodies and the UN Human Rights Office.

US to sanction Chinese officials for alleged ongoing human rights violations

14 July 2024, Jurist News, Nada Wilson

The US announced Friday that they will be imposing visa restrictions on People's Republic of China officials due to continuing human rights violations against minority groups. The decision is underpinned by US legislation, namely Section 212 (a)(3)(C) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The alleged ongoing human rights violations include "the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang, the erosion of fundamental freedoms in Hong Kong, persistent human rights abuses in Tibet, and transnational repression around the world." The US has called upon China to amend its human rights policies, stating they must:

abide by the principles enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and accept the many recommendations made this year during the Universal Periodic Review of its human rights record, including unconditionally releasing PRC nationals it has arbitrarily and unjustly detained.

On the same day, the Chinese government also announced sanctions against six US defense companies for selling arms to Taiwan, in addition to five senior management officers from the sanctioned companies. Within this year, the Chinese government announced sanctions against American defense companies repeatedly for engaging in arms trade with Taiwan, allegedly breaching the "One China" principle.

The genocide in Xinjiang against Uyghur Muslims has been reported as an attempt at cultural erasure from China. Uyghur people from 630 villages have been "detained [and] tortured" such that they have been "beat[en] with sticks, [had] fingernails pulled off, some are shackled by heavyweights, immobilized for months on end. Detained women and men have been raped and starved."

China has also reportedly attempted to isolate Tibet from foreign nations by limiting its capacity to interact or communicate with foreign entities. Relatedly, US President Joe Biden signed into law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" which broadens the definition of Tibet to cover not only the Tibet Autonomous Region but also the Tibetan areas of other provinces. In response, the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson decried that the law "grossly interferes in China's domestic affairs" by encouraging "Tibet independence." The spokesperson further claimed that the TAR enjoys "social stability and harmony," with prosperous economic development and robust wellbeing protection.

In Hong Kong, the international community is concerned with the development following the enactment of the 2020 national security law and another local national security legislation in 2024, both of which have compromised the autonomy of Hong Kong and undermined the freedoms and rights of Hong Kong people.

Last month, the EU similarly expressed concerns about "very serious human rights situation" in China

Xinjiang, Tibet and Hong Kong in the 39th session of the Joint Human Rights Dialogue.

China strongly opposed U.S. Tibet Dispute Act and vows to defend its interests

China strongly opposed a U.S. law signed by President Joe Biden that urges Beijing to address Tibet's demands for autonomy, vowing to "firmly defend" its interests. On Friday, President Biden signed the Tibet Dispute Act into law. This is a significant step in urging Beijing to hold talks with Tibetan leaders. These talks, which have been stalled since 2010, aim to secure a negotiated agreement on the Himalayan region and address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their historical, cultural, religious, and linguistic identity.

The law, according to China's foreign ministry, 'grossly interferes in China's domestic affairs, undermines China's interests, and sends a severely wrong signal to the 'Tibet independence' forces.' This potential impact is a cause for concern for China.

Although Washington recognises Tibet as a part of China, the law appears to question that position, analysts say. The U.S. has long supported the rights of the Tibetan people to practice their religion and culture, accusing China of human rights violations in the remote region bordering India.

"The U.S. must not implement the Act," the China's ministry said. "If the U.S. continues down the wrong path, China will take resolute measures to firmly defend its sovereignty, security and development interests."

There has been considerable attention on Tibet-China issues, particularly regarding the Dalai Lama's recovery from a medical procedure and his recent 89th birthday. The exiled spiritual leader has stated that he intends to address questions about his succession ar

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson's Remarks on the US Signing into Law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act"

13 July 2024, Embassy of the People's Republic of China in the United States of America

Q: On July 12 local time, US President Joe Biden signed into law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act." The Act gives recognition to the so-called notion of "Greater Tibet" made up by the Dalai group, and asks the US government and the United States Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues to counter "disinformation about Tibet" from the Chinese government. President Biden said in a statement that the Act "does not change longstanding bipartisan United States policy to recognize the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan areas of China as part of the People's Republic of China." What's China's comment?

A: The so-called "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" violates the US government's long-held position and commitments and the basic norms governing international relations, grossly interferes in China's domestic affairs, undermines China's interests, and sends a severely wrong signal to the "Tibet independence" forces. China firmly opposes it and has protested to the US side.

Xizang has been part of China since ancient times. Xizang affairs are China's internal affairs which brook no interference by any external forces. Xizang today enjoys social stability and harmony, with sound economic performance and people's well-being well protected. Xizang is making fresh progress in effectively running its society, maintaining social stability, and achieving high-quality development. No one and no force should ever attempt to destabilize Xizang to contain and suppress China. Such attempts will never succeed.

We urge the US side to take concrete actions to honor its commitments of recognizing Xizang as part of China and not supporting "Tibet independence." The US must not implement the Act. If the US continues down the wrong path, China will take resolute measures to firmly defend its sovereignty, security and development interests.

China expressed strong opposition on Saturday to a U.S. law signed by President Joe Biden that presses Beijing to resolve a dispute over Tibet's demands for greater autonomy, vowing to "firmly defend" its interests.

Biden signed, opens new tab into law on Friday the Tibet dispute act, which seeks to push Beijing to hold talks with Tibetan leaders, stalled since 2010, to secure a negotiated agreement on the Himalayan region and spur China to address the Tibetan people's aspirations on their historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

The law "grossly interferes in China's domestic affairs, undermines China's interests, and sends a severely wrong signal to the 'Tibet independence' forces," China's foreign ministry said.

Although Washington recognises Tibet as a part of China, the law appears to question that position, analysts say. The U.S. has long supported the rights

Attention has focussed on Tibet-China issues as the Dalai Lama, recuperating from a medical procedure, turned 89 last week. The exiled spiritual leader has said he will clarify questions about his succession around his 90th birthday, while China insists it will choose his successor.

China's top political advisory body strongly opposes U.S. signing of Xizang-related act

13 July 2024, Xinhua

The Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) National Committee on Saturday expressed strong indignation at and firm opposition to the United States on its signing into law of the so-called "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act."

At a symposium held Saturday, members of the Committee of Ethnic and Religious Affairs of the CPPCC National Committee slammed the act as full of extremely erroneous views and provocative remarks, adding that it was blatant interference in China's internal affairs under the guise of "ethnicity," "religion" and "human rights."

The act fully exposes the United States' sinister intention of interfering in China's internal affairs and containing China's peaceful development, the committee members said, describing the act as a serious betrayal of the U.S. government's commitment to acknowledging that Xizang is part of China and not supporting "Tibet independence."

They said Xizang has been an inseparable part of China since ancient times and the people of the Tibetan ethnic group are members of the Chinese nation. This is a fact recognized by the world and will not change at anytime, they added.

Since ancient times, Xizang has forged unbreakable bonds with the rest of China in geographical, consanguineal, political, economic and cultural terms, they said.

The U.S. side and the Dalai clique audaciously distorts history and brazenly denies the fact of China's sovereignty over Xizang. This is a typical act of U.S.-style bullying, they added.

In the 65 years since the democratic reform in Xizang, great historic changes have taken place, they said, adding that since the 18th National Congress of the Communist Party of China in 2012, Xizang has entered a period of best development and greatest changes, during which the people have benefited the most.

China is a unified multi-ethnic and multi-religious country. China has maintained ethnic unity, religious harmony and social stability for years, which prove that its policies on ethnic and religious affairs are completely correct, they said.

Tibetan Buddhism has a glorious tradition of patriotism and has a complete set of religious rituals and historical norms governing the reincarnation of Living Buddhas that has been respected and upheld by the Tibetan Buddhist community, the committee members said.

The Chinese government implements the policy of freedom of religious belief, respects and protects religious traditions, and manages religious affairs in accordance with the law, rendering U.S. interference completely unwarranted, they said.

The process of building a new, modern socialist Xizang that is united, prosperous, civilized, harmonious, and beautiful is unstoppable by any force, they added.

US sanctions more Chinese officials for 'genocide and crimes against humanity' in Xinjiang

13 July 2024, SCMP, Robert Delaney

State Department announcement caps week of sharp rebukes over Beijing's alleged human-rights abuses and support for Russia against Ukraine.

US President Joe Biden's administration on Friday said it would impose sanctions on more Chinese officials for an "ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity", capping off a week of sharp rebukes over Beijing's alleged human-rights abuses and support for Russia's war against Ukraine.

The US State Department announced it was "taking steps to impose visa restrictions on People's Republic of China (PRC) officials for their involvement in repression of marginalised religious and ethnic communities".

"The PRC has not lived up to its commitments to respect and protect human rights, as demonstrated by the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang, the erosion of fundamental freedoms in Hong Kong, persistent human-rights abuses in Tibet, and transnational repression around the world," it said.

In March, the State Department criticised Hong Kong for its passage of a new domestic national security law, claiming vague language in its provisions created uncertainty for some of the city's residents.

At the time, the State Department said it was "analysing" the law to understand what risks were involved for American citizens.

Hong Kong lawmakers unanimously passed Hong Kong's domestic national security law just hours earlier, at the end of a marathon session, in which they fast-tracked the constitutionally mandated legislation.

Biden, with North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg, included accusations of human-rights abuses in their condemnation of China during the just-concluded annual Nato summit, which the US leader hosted in Washington.

Nato's stern language about China during the summit followed many years of pressure from Washington for the transatlantic security alliance to officially portray Beijing as a threat to the rules-based global order.

Human-rights concerns were highlighted by Nato along with closer economic engagement with Russia, which, it said, keeps Moscow's troops fighting in Ukraine.

China's government reacted quickly, arguing that its policies in all areas cited by the State Department had brought social stability and economic development. Beijing vowed to "respond in kind".

"The so-called 'transnational repression' was invented by the US side through fabricating and piecing together 'evidence' to prosecute public-security officers and other Chinese government officials, engaging in large-scale political manipulation and playing up the threat to China," said Liu Pengyu, a spokesman for Beijing's embassy in Washington.

"China urges the US to stop smears against China under the pretext of issues related to Xinjiang, Tibet, Hong Kong and 'transnational repression' and lift its illegal unilateral sanctions against Chinese officials," he added.

"If the US refuses to change course, China will not flinch and will respond in kind."

In an earlier round of sanctions based on accusations of human-rights abuses in Tibet, in 2022, the Treasury Department froze the US assets of and blocked transactions with Wu Yingjie, the Chinese government's top official in Tibet from 2016 to 2021, and Zhang Hongbo, identified at the time as the Tibetan region's police chief since 2018.

Last year, the State Department announced it was imposing visa sanctions on Chinese officials pursuing "forced assimilation" of children in Tibet.

Friday's announcement, which did not identify which individuals would be denied visas or say how many would be added to the blacklist, adds to the pressure that the White House and the US Congress continue to heap on China on this front.

US lawmakers have made Beijing's treatment of the country's religious minorities including Tibetans and Uygurs a priority, leading to recent laws like the Uygur Forced Labour Prevention Act.

A report released by the US State Department in April accused Beijing of continuing to "dismantle" Hong Kong's political freedoms and autonomy in violation of the Sino-British Joint Declaration and the Basic Law.

The report highlighted authorities' enforcement of the 2020 national security law, including its retroactive application and the denial of bail to activists in national-security cases.

China slams US for spreading disinformation

11 July 2024, China Daily

China firmly opposes the continued spread of ungrounded false information by the United States about Russia's so-called "defense industrial base fueled by China," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said on Thursday.

Lin's remarks came after US Secretary of State Antony Blinken's accusation at the 2024 NATO Public Forum.

"We express strong dissatisfaction with and firm opposition to the erroneous remarks made by the US side," Lin told a daily press briefing.

China urges U.S. not to support "Tibet independence" forces: spokesperson

08 July 2024, Xinhua

China urges the United States to stop supporting or endorsing in any way the "Tibet independence" forces and their anti-China and separatist activities, foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said on Monday.

Lin's remarks came after U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken in a press statement extended best wishes to Dalai Lama on the occasion of his 89th birthday, and reaffirmed U.S. commitment to supporting efforts to preserve Xizang's linguistic, cultural and religious heritage.

Lin told a regular press briefing that the position of the Chinese government on Xizang-related issues is consistent and clear. Xizang affairs are China's internal affairs which brook no interference by any external forces.

"Over the years, Xizang has enjoyed a booming economy, social harmony and stability, and sound preservation of its cultural heritage. The rights and freedoms of all ethnic groups in Xizang, including the freedom of religious belief and the freedom to use and develop their own spoken and written languages, are fully protected," Lin said, adding this is a fact and seen by many in the international community.

As many people know, the 14th Dalai Lama is not a pure religious figure, but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion, the spokesperson said.

"We urge the United States to fully understand the gravity and sensitivity of Xizang-related issues, truly respect China's core interests, be fully aware of the Dalai group's anti-China and separatist nature, honor the commitments the United States has made to China on issues related to Xizang, and stop supporting or endorsing in any way the 'Tibet independence' forces and their anti-China and separatist activities," Lin said.

US-China ties may have hit a wall since Xi-Biden summit, noted Chinese commentator warns

08 July 2024, SCMP, Orange Wang

'Fundamental distrust' must not prevail, or 'another crisis' cannot be ruled out, US-China relations expert Da Wei tells Beijing forum.

Moves to stabilise China-US ties may have reached their "limit" since a summit eight months ago, a leading Chinese political scholar has warned.

Da Wei, director of the Centre for International Security and Strategy (CISS) at Tsinghua University, said both countries needed to make their intentions and goals more clear and convincing to each other.

This was crucial to preventing "fundamental distrust", Da told an international security forum in Beijing on Sunday.

He also warned of "negative development" in bilateral ties, particularly on Taiwan, and technological and economic issues, noting that recent remarks from senior officials on either side had been marked by impatience, frustration, anxiety and disappointment.

"This tendency is not good," the US-China relations specialist told a panel at the World Peace Forum, which was jointly hosted by Tsinghua and the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs, a government-run policy group.

"Another crisis or some kind of confrontation" could not be ruled out if the present trajectory continued, he cautioned.

The summit between Chinese President Xi Jinping and his US counterpart Joe Biden in California last November was followed by several positive signs for the bilateral relationship after months of extreme tensions.

The two countries have resumed high-level dialogue, including military-to-military talks, launched several working groups, held negotiations on trade, finance, and climate and counternarcotics action, and also restarted cooperation on deporting illegal Chinese immigrants from the US.

But tensions continue to build on a number of fronts, most notably over US trade tariffs and moves to hobble China's hi-tech access, its relationship with Russia and what the US and its allies see as Beijing's growing regional assertiveness.

Uncertainty surrounding the outcome of the US presidential election in November has further added to worries about the future of the relationship.

In a phone call with US deputy secretary of state Kurt Campbell on June 27, Chinese executive vice-foreign minister Ma Zhaoxu urged Washington to respect Beijing's concerns.

Washington should take concrete actions on its commitment to not support Taiwanese independence, stop interfering in China's internal affairs relating to Tibet, halt support for Philippine "provocations" in the South China Sea and refrain from "smearing" what was "normal" Sino-Russian trade, Ma said.

Campbell said US commitment to the Philippines under their 1951 mutual defence treaty was "ironclad", while reiterating concerns over China's alleged support for Russia's defence industrial base, an issue US Secretary of State Antony Blinken raised again earlier this month when he said China was helping to sustain Russia's war in Ukraine.

Wu Xinbo, dean of the Institute of International Studies at Fudan University and on the same panel as Da, said that the China-US relationship still "lacked reciprocity" and was "uneven".

"China has tried to accommodate US concerns on artificial intelligence dialogue, military-to-military relations, fentanyl, and so on. But on the US side, the Biden administration has been very reluctant to address China's concerns," he said.

"The Taiwan issue or sanctions or tariffs, [on] all these kinds of things, there has not been much progress."

Others on the panel were Susan Thornton, former US acting assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs; and Douglas Paal, former director of the American Institute in Taiwan, Washington's de facto representative office.

Da said that the process of stabilising bilateral relations was "slowing down", adding: "We have probably picked the low-hanging fruits already."

China and the US had taken a bottoms-up approach to creating trust over the past eight months, which had been "effective", Da noted.

"But there is a limit," he said. "I think we are reaching that limit. Because if you have fundamental distrust [of] the other side, I think these negative sentiments will prevent us from having very meaningful cooperation or even coexistence."

Both sides were still very suspicious of the other's sincerity on stabilising relations and continued to view each other through a "very negative" lens, he added.

"We need to understand the basic motives and the purpose of the other side," he said. "Following that, we need to clean up our house to remove the policies that are inconsistent with [our main goals]."

Da also called on the US to take some actions to convince Beijing that its goal was not containment of China.

For instance, he said, the White House should publicly state that new Taiwanese leader William Lai Ching-te's words and actions did not align with Washington's "one-China" policy.

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. The US, like most countries, does not recognise Taiwan as an independent state, but is opposed to any attempt to take the self-governed island by force and committed to supplying it with weapons.

Da also called on the US and China to work together on Ukraine and the Middle East, as "we have some shared interest there, rather than veto each other at the United Nations. That's meaningless."

Referring to his conversations with Russian intellectuals about how the US and Russia had missed opportunities to build trust over the past two decades, Da said the same scenario should not play out for Beijing and Washington.

He also dismissed concerns that the wait for the US election results meant ties had entered what in American sporting parlance is called "garbage time" – when the proceedings become perfunctory.

"We need to be on the same page, understanding each other's goal clearly and from the bottom of the heart, then we maybe can ... have real stability in the next four years."

The US House Select Committee on the Chinese Communist Party initiated an investigation on Monday into Harvard University's response to student protests during Chinese Ambassador Xie Feng's speech at the Harvard Kennedy School on April 20. Members of the Coalition of Students Resisting the CCP and Students for a Free Tibet were forcibly removed by an unidentified individual in a dark suit during the event.

Student activists Cosette Wu and Tsering Yangchen interrupted Xie Feng's address, shouting slogans and condemning China's human rights record. Following the incident, one of the students was approached by an alleged event organizer who sought the names of those who had challenged the ambassador, according to the House Committee.

"This incident raises serious questions regarding possible transnational repression by the Chinese government and the involvement of international students from China at Harvard in acts of harassment and intimidation condoned by the Chinese government against its critics," wrote Chairman John Moolenaar.

Chairman Moolenaar further noted a troubling trend of Chinese students infringing upon their peers' freedom of expression, citing a recent case in which a former student from the Berkeley College of Music was sentenced for threatening and harassing a fellow Chinese student who had posted pro-democracy fliers on campus.

The speech by Ambassador Xie was organised by the Kennedy School's Greater China Society as part of its two-day Greater China Conference. During Xie's opening remarks, six protesters from Students for a Free Tibet and the Coalition of Students Resisting the CCP disrupted the event, holding Tibetan flags and banners denouncing China's human rights abuses. Harvard University has yet to comment on the incident.

China makes mock drill of destroying US F-35 and F-22 fighter jets. Is PLA preparing for war with US? Details here

05 July 2024, The Economic Times

Can you imagine the People's Liberation Army exploding and destroying US fighter jets worth £78,000 each when the two countries are not at war? Not exactly. There is no US-China war and the Chinese Army has not bombed the US Air Force. What they have done is taking mock drills of exploding jet fighters as a part of their training exercise. According to 'Express', Airbus and Google Earth have captured the images showing destroying US F-35 and F-22 fighter jets in a remote desert area in northwest China. The satellite pictures suggest that the Chinese military destroyed these dummy aircraft with a nearby runway displaying scorch marks and bomb blast craters.

Potential China-US war scenario?

These images also show that China is taking a possible war scenario seriously and is getting ready to target and destroy the US fighters if such a situation emerges in real terms. The seriousness and preparedness of the PLA can be understood by the fact that the landscape in the images is dotted with various types of aircraft models. In the images several hangars and radar towers can be seen, indicating a comprehensive and realistic training environment for Chinese forces.

Mock drill by the Chinese Army

The mock drill by the Chinese Army has come after North Korea test-fired its two ballistic missiles after Pyongyang vowed "offensive and overwhelming" responses to a new US military drill with South Korea and Japan. It cannot be said that China and North Korea are working in tandem, but they are certainly making preparations to meet any challenge from a common enemy.

North Korea's missile tests

According to 'Express', the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the North Korean Army confirmed that the missiles were launched 10 minutes apart in a northeasterly direction from the town of Jangyon in southeastern North Korea.

If media reports are to be believed, the first missile flew 600 kilometers or 370 miles, and the second missile was 120 kilometers or 75 miles. North Korea generally test-fires its missiles toward its eastern waters.

FAQs:

Have the Chinese Army destroyed US jet fighters?

Not exactly. The People's Liberation Army has carried out a mock drill in which dummy jet fighters were targeted, bombed and destroyed somewhere in Northwest China.

How serious is China over a potential war with the US?

The seriousness and preparedness of the PLA can be understood by the fact that the landscape in the images is dotted with various types of aircraft models. In the images several hangars and radar towers can be seen, indicating a comprehensive and realistic training environment for Chinese forces.

US deports 116 Chinese migrants in first 'large' flight in 5 years

03 July 2024, AP, Rebecca Santana

The Department of Homeland Security said Tuesday that it sent 116 Chinese migrants from the United States back home in the first "large charter flight" in five years.

The flight, which happened over the weekend, comes as Chinese immigration has become the subject of intense political debate in the upcoming U.S. presidential election.

"We will continue to enforce our immigration laws and remove individuals without a legal basis to remain in the United States," Homeland Security Secretary Alejandro Mayorkas said in a statement.

The department said it was working with China to "reduce and deter irregular migration and to disrupt illicit human smuggling through expanded law enforcement efforts." It did not respond to questions about how long the migrants had been in the U.S.

In recent years, the United States has had a difficult time returning Chinese nationals who do not have the right to stay in America because China has resisted taking them back. Last year, the United States saw a drastic surge in the number of Chinese immigrants entering the country illegally from Mexico.

U.S. border officials arrested more than 37,000 Chinese nationals on the southern border in 2023, 10 times the number during the previous year.

Chinese migration has increasingly become a rallying cry for Republicans and former President Donald Trump who have raised suspicions about why Chinese migrants are coming to the U.S.

Asian advocacy organizations are concerned that the rhetoric could encourage harassment of Asians, while migrants themselves have said they're coming to escape poverty and repression.

Earlier this year, the U.S. and China resumed cooperation on migration issues.

The Chinese government has said it is firmly opposed to "all forms of illegal immigration." In a statement in May, China's Embassy in the U.S. said the country's law enforcement was cracking down "hard on crimes that harm the tranquility of national border, and maintained a high pressure against all kinds of smuggling organizations and offenders."

Homeland Security said they are working with China on more removal flights in the future but did not give a timeline for when the next one would happen.

Earlier this year, a charter flight carried a small but unknown number of deportees to the northeastern Chinese city of Shenyang, according to Thomas Cartwright of Witness at the Border, an advocacy group that tracks deportation flights.

Homeland Security officials did not say how many people were on that March 30 flight, but the Gulfstream V aircraft typically has a seating capacity of 14. It also made a stop in South Korea before heading back to the U.S., Cartwright said.

The announcement of the large charter flight comes after Ecuador cut off a key route used by Chinese migrants to get to the Western Hemisphere. Ecuador was one of only two mainland countries in the Americas to offer visa-free entry to Chinese nationals and had become a popular starting point for Chinese migrants to then trek north to the U.S.

As of July 1, Ecuador has effectively reinstated visas for Chinese nationals after the South American country said it had seen a worrying increase in irregular migration.

House passes bill urging China to mend ties with Dalai Lama

24 June 2024, The Hill, Lauren Irwin

The House voted Wednesday to pass a bill that is urging China to mend ties with the Dalai Lama and other Tibetan leaders.

The legislation, named Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, received broad bipartisan support and encourages China and Tibet to resolve the long-standing dispute over Tibet's governance.

The bill now heads to President Biden's desk after being passed by the Senate last month.

"Tibetans, like all people, have the right to religious freedom — which includes freedom from [Chinese Communist Party] surveillance, censorship, and detention," House Foreign Affairs Committee Chair Michael McCaul (R-Texas) said in a statement. The legislation will allow State Department officials to "actively and directly" counter disinformation about Tibet that's spread by the Chinese government, namely rejecting false claims that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times," the lawmakers said in their release.

It will also allow the U.S. to push for negotiations between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives over the future of Tibet.

The lawmakers noted that no formal dialogue between Tibetan and Chinese authorities has happened since 2010.

As the U.S. seeks to continue its diplomatic conversations with China, the legislation is a reminder that the U.S. recognizes the territory of Tibet as a country occupied by the People's Republic of China and said there are significant human rights issues taking place there. China often pushes back on the Western view, accusing the U.S. of interfering in its sovereign affairs.

Sen. Todd Young (R-Ind.) said in a statement that the bill will refresh the United States's policy toward Tibet and push for negotiations to free the Tibetan people.

"Congressional passage of this legislation further demonstrates America's resolve that the [Chinese Communist Party's] status quo — both in Tibet and elsewhere — is not acceptable," Young's statement said.

"I look forward to this important effort becoming law and working with my colleagues in the Senate and with the Administration to ensure swift and effective implementation."

House Rules Committee Ranking Member Jim McGovern (D-Mass.) said he hopes the bipartisan support on the bill sends a message to the Tibetan people that America stands with them.

"The ongoing oppression of the Tibetan people is a grave tragedy, and our bill provides further tools that empower both America and the international community to stand up for justice and peace," McGovern's statement said.

After South China Sea, US, China Set To Wrestle At 'Roof Of The World'; Washington Begins Himalayan Push

24 June 2024, The EurAsian Times, Shubhangi Palve

A geopolitical drama is unfolding in the shadow of the world's highest mountains. The United States, long on the back foot in the Indo-Pacific, is now making a bold move on the Tibetan plateau. But this isn't just about America and China—India finds itself at the center of this high-altitude power play.

The United States, which was for quite some time in a defensive stance in the Indo-Pacific region, is now shifting to an offensive approach against China on the issue of Tibet.

This strategic shift is playing out on Indian soil, adding a new dimension to the already tense U.S.-China-India relationship. With ongoing trade disputes and Taiwan issues, Tibet's emergence as a flashpoint further complicates this global rivalry.

The US Congress recently passed the "Resolve Tibet Act," which advocates dialogue between China and the Dalai Lama. This act is a sharp jab at Beijing's "One China Policy" and a clear sign that Washington is changing its tune.

History Of US-Tibet Relations

Imagine a century-long story filled with covert operations, spiritual leaders, and mountain warriors. That's the tale of Tibet, and it's heating up once again. The history of U.S.-Tibet relations is complex and often divided.

Aaron Bekemeyer, in his paper for 'History 363' titled 'The Nuances of the US-Tibet Relationship,' argues that 'US-Tibet relations allowed Washington flexibility to avoid total rapprochement with China and maintain Tibet as a potential political tool in Sino-US and other international relations.'

Rewind to the 1950s... After the Communist Chinese takeover of Tibet in 1949 and 1950, the United States covertly supported various forms of Tibetan anti-Chinese resistance as part of its opposition to the Communist regime. However, following the Sino-U.S. rapprochement in 1972, Tibet's utility as an American foreign policy tool quickly diminished.

For the past century or so, Tibet's history has been marked by confusion and conflict over its international political status. In the first half of the twentieth century, Tibet enjoyed de facto independence. Despite Chinese claims to sovereignty, Tibet secured British recognition of its autonomy in 1914 and maintained a military and diplomatic defense against Chinese encroachments. These factors allowed Tibet to conduct its own affairs until 1949.

According to Bekemeyer, the US, involved in the region only from the 1940s, recognized Tibetan autonomy but stopped short of full diplomatic recognition of Tibet as an independent nation. However, in 1950, after Mao Zedong's Communists took power in China, the People's Liberation Army invaded Tibet, and Tibetan representatives were coerced into signing the Seventeen-Point Agreement, which absorbed Tibet into China.

Beginning in the 1950s, the U.S. provided covert support for a Tibetan 'Guerrilla force' and non-military support for the Dalai Lama. This support continued until the normalization of Sino-American relations in 1972.

By 1974, the U.S. had ceased its support, including cutting off the subsidy to the Dalai Lama and his government. Consequently, Tibet became a lesser issue in U.S. foreign policy, and Washington never again matched the level of commitment it had displayed in the 1950s and 1960s.

The US Tibet Policy Bill

This month, the US Congress passed the Resolve Tibet Act, a legislation advocating for a peaceful resolution of the dispute over Tibet's status and governance. The Act calls on Beijing to resume dialogue with the Tibetan spiritual and political leader, the Dalai Lama.

This significant expansion bolsters the Dalai Lama's authority in choosing his successor and mandates decisive US action against Chinese interference, effectively rejecting China's long-held 'One China Policy' and its authoritative grip over Tibet. The legislation marks a notable shift in Washington's approach under President Joe Biden, signaling a more assertive stance against Beijing.

Conversely, China has issued warnings to the US regarding the Tibet policy bill. Officially referring to Tibet as Xizang, China stated in April 2024 that it would only engage in dialogue with representatives of the Dalai Lama, not with officials of the Tibetan government in exile based in India. Additionally, China has ruled out discussions on the Dalai Lama's long-standing demand for autonomy for his remote Himalayan homeland.

Interestingly, Former U.S. Presidents Bill Clinton, George W. Bush, and Barack Obama all met the Dalai Lama. However, Donald Trump, who had a different stance on Tibet, did not meet him. Current US President Joe Biden has also yet to meet the Dalai Lama.

However, the Dalai Lama has reached the US for medical treatment and has been received very warmly by his supporters. It is unclear whether the Dalai Lama will meet any U.S. officials during his trip.

Earlier, the Dalai Lama stated that he does not seek independence from China but rather autonomy. While China continues to regard Tibet as its territory, Tibet does not consider itself subject to Chinese rule and continues to advocate for its independence.

Role Of India In U.S.-China Dispute Over Tibet

Recently, India's role in the U.S.-China dispute over Tibet gained attention when a group of seven U.S. lawmakers visited Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh, to meet the 88-year-old Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso.

Nancy Pelosi, after the meeting, stated, "The passage of this bill is a message to the Chinese government that we have clarity in our thinking and our understanding of this issue of the freedom of Tibet."

Tibet's significance in U.S. foreign policy extends beyond Sino-U.S. relations. At the very least, Washington's position on Tibet has implications for its relations with India. Understanding India's role requires knowing about the Special Frontier Force (SFF).

The Special Frontier Force (SFF)

The Special Frontier Force (SFF), also known as the Vikas Battalion, has played a crucial role in preventing Chinese occupation along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in Ladakh.

The SFF was established on November 14, 1962, in the aftermath of the Sino-India war. Following the war, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and India's Intelligence Bureau (IB) collaborated to train a 5,000-strong Tibetan force for potential missions against China.

According to Tibetologist Claude Arpi, in an interview with 'India Today,' the force was the brainchild of former IB director B.N. Mullick and the CIA.

In the 1950s, the CIA and IB set up Mustang Base in Nepal's Mustang region to train Tibetans in guerrilla warfare. The Mustang rebels facilitated the Dalai Lama's escape to India during the 1959 Tibetan Uprising. The CIA, a civilian foreign intelligence service of the U.S. government, had been involved in a covert program to train Tibetan guerrillas to combat Chinese forces in Tibet since the 1950s.

The SFF is currently based in Chakrata, Uttarakhand, and its insignia features a snow lion. The exact current strength of the force remains unknown.

The SFF gained attention following the Ladakh clash, particularly after the death of Tenzin Nyima, a Tibetan trooper, in a landmine blast at Pangong Tso. Images of his body wrapped in Indian and Tibetan flags brought focus to this secretive security force of trained mountain warriors.

The SFF operates under the operational control of the Indian Army but remains a separate entity due to its inclusion of Tibetan refugees and international implications. Military experts note that the SFF comprises both men and women who receive training equivalent to that of elite commandos.

The SFF has been instrumental in several major military operations, including Operation Eagle (1971 war with Pakistan), Operation Bluestar (1984 clearing of Amritsar's Golden Temple), Operation Meghdoot (1984 securing of the Siachen glacier), and Operation Vijay (1999 Kargil war with Pakistan), as well as numerous counter-insurgency operations. Despite its significant contributions, the SFF has largely operated in the shadows.

Shifts In India's Tibet Policy

The Tibetan movement is currently facing significant survival challenges.

On June 5, 2024, The Diplomat, an international online news magazine based in Washington, DC, reported that India plans to rename more than two dozen places in China's Tibet Autonomous Region in a tit-for-tat move against China renaming places in Arunachal Pradesh.

According to the report, the Army's Information Warfare Division has finalized the list of renamed places and will soon release it.

Like the US, India's stance on Tibet has not remained consistent historically. Amid escalating tensions with China, there has been a shift in India's Tibet policy.

In 1959, the Dalai Lama fled Tibet and sought refuge in India, arriving on March 31 of that year. Upon reaching India, he established a government-in-exile.

In June 2003, India officially acknowledged Tibet as part of China following a meeting between then Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee and Chinese President Jiang Zemin. However, Indian officials clarified that this recognition was indirect, focusing on the autonomous Tibetan region rather than the entirety of Tibet, which is a significant portion of China.

This policy shift marked increased public engagement by the Indian government with the Dalai Lama. For instance, in 2014, Prime Minister Narendra Modi invited Lobsang Sangay, head of the Tibetan government in exile in India, to his swearing-in ceremony. However, Modi did not extend an invitation in 2019 for his second term, prioritizing a smooth summit with Chinese President Xi Jinping.

Currently, India's approach to Tibetans in India is guided by executive policy rather than law. While this policy has improved welfare measures for Tibetans in India, it lacks legal backing on core Tibetan issues. Therefore, there is a growing call for India to adopt a more assertive stance on Tibet in its dealings with China.

As the Dalai Lama ages and questions of succession loom, the stakes are higher than ever. Will India forge its own Tibet policy? Can the US successfully challenge China's grip on the region?

Chinese embassy threatened House lawmakers, urged them to 'cancel' Dalai Lama visit

21 June 2024, Josh Christenson, New York Post

China's embassy to the US sent a threatening letter to lawmakers who visited the Dalai Lama in Tibet this week urging them to "cancel" the trip, according to a copy of the missive exclusively reviewed by The Post.

"I am writing to express deep concern on the HFAC congressional delegation's visit to Dharamshala," Minister-Counselor Zhou Zheng wrote to aides of House Foreign Affairs Committee chairman Michael McCaul (R-Texas) and ranking member Gregory Meeks (D-NY).

"The visit interferes with China's internal affairs, violates China's sovereignty and territorial integrity. China firmly deplores it," Zheng said, referring to Tibet as "Xizang ... an integral part of Chinese territory since [the] Yuan Dynasty in the 13th century."

"We strongly urge the Congress to cancel related activities, so as to help maintain the current stabilizing momentum of China-US relations, rather than the opposite," he added.

The bipartisan House delegation met Wednesday with the Dalai Lama, the exiled spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, in northern India — despite Beijing's warnings against US association with the leader of "anti-China separatist activities under the guise of religion."

"Just this week our delegation received a letter from the Chinese Communist Party, warning us not to come here," McCaul said during the meeting, "but we did not let the CCP intimidate us, for we are here today."

"Communist China's oppression of the Tibetan people, bullying of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and warnings to those of us who visited Tibetans living in exile in India are inappropriate and all the more reason why the United States and the international community must work together to counter Chinese misinformation about Tibet's history, advocate for the Tibetan people's self-determination and encourage a continuity plan for the Dalai Lama's successor," Staten Island GOP Rep. Nicole Malliotakis, who was also on the trip, told The Post Friday.

McCaul, Meeks, Malliotakis, House Speaker emerita Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other House members greeted officials from the Tibetan government-in-exile, which has had no relations with Beijing since 2010.

The Dalai Lama, 88, fled to Dharamshala after a failed uprising against China in 1959.

He has dismissed allegations of fueling separatism in Tibet and claimed he stands only for the protection of its native Buddhist culture.

"The human rights conditions in Xizang are better than ever, as witnessed by the international community," the letter to the congressional delegation from the Chinese embassy claimed — contradicting reports of hundreds of thousands of Tibetan farmers being forced into labor camps to correct their "backward thinking."

The House lawmakers told a crowd of hundreds gathered outside a monastery in the hillside town, some of whom waved American flags, that the visit underscored the successful passage by Congress of the Resolve Tibet Act, which among other provisions calls on the State Department to "counter disinformation" spread by Beijing — including the idea that the region has been part of China for centuries.

Pelosi called the legislation "a message to the Chinese government that we have clarity in our thinking and our understanding of this issue of the freedom of Tibet."

President Biden has not yet signed the bill into law after it passed Congress last week.

"The President is going to do what he thinks is best on behalf of the American people, that's what I can tell you," White House press secretary Karine Jean-Pierre told reporters in a Tuesday press briefing.

Lin Jian, a spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry, said the same day that the White House "must not sign the bill into law," or China will take as yet unrevealed but "resolute measures."

The visit marked the second time Pelosi has disregarded Chinese warnings of US involvement in the Far East, following an August 2022 visit to Taiwan.

The Dalai Lama was expected to fly to the US on Thursday for medical treatment on his knees. It's unclear whether he met with any other officials while on American soil.

A Texas congressman was sanctioned by China. He's not backing down.

21 June 2024, Houston Chronicle, Jeremy Wallace

A lot of members of Congress talk tough about combating Chinese influence around the globe, but few are getting under the skin of communist leaders there quite like U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul.

The Austin Republican has already been personally sanctioned by the Chinese government and helped trigger an intimidating war games display during a visit last year to Taiwan. He was at it again last week, leading a congressional delegation to meet with the Dalai Lama in India's Dharamshala despite vocal Chinese opposition.

China invaded the independent Himalayan country of Tibet in 1950 and has controlled the territory ever since. The Dalai Lama, the head of Tibetan Buddhism, fled into exile to India amid a failed 1959 uprising against Chinese rule.

McCaul, who chairs the House Foreign Affairs Committee, was a key force in helping pass a resolution in Congress earlier this month calling on China to reengage in peaceful talks over Tibet. But Beijing hasn't held dialogue with the representatives of the Dalai Lama since 2010.

Lin Jian, a spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry, urged McCaul and other Washington officials to stop supporting Tibetan independence.

"It's known by all that the 14th Dalai Lama is not a purely religious figure, but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion," Lin said.

The latest dustup with McCaul comes just over a year after China imposed sanctions directly against McCaul for leading a delegation to visit Taiwan. Those sanctions included freezing assets and properties he has in China and prohibiting any organization or individual in China from working with him. They also prohibit McCaul from traveling to China. McCaul doesn't have assets in China.

China's foreign ministry said last year that McCaul had frequently interfered in the country's internal affairs with his words and actions and harmed China's interests. They accused him of "seriously harming China's sovereignty and territorial integrity, and sending a serious wrong signal to Taiwan independence separatist forces."

The sanctions haven't stopped McCaul, as evidenced by his trip to Taiwan in May in which he gave new President Lai Ching-te a cowboy hat as a gift.

"Being sanctioned by the Chinese Communist Party is a badge of honor," McCaul said. "Nothing will deter the United States from supporting free, democratic nations — including Taiwan."

McCaul, first elected to Congress in 2004, represents the sprawling 10th Congressional District, which includes 13 counties stretching from Austin to Katy.

He has used his role on the Foreign Affairs Committee to also call for moving supply chains away from China and going after U.S. companies that are providing technology that is allowing the Chinese to expand their military and espionage activities.

In 2022, McCaul and then-incoming House Speaker Kevin McCarthy held a press conference in Houston to blast the Chinese government for using their since-closed consulate in Houston for spying and stealing trade secrets and technology from organizations including the University of Texas MD Anderson Cancer Center, NASA and the energy sector.

McCaul says he sees trips like the one to meet with the Dalai Lama as a continuation of his effort to deter Chinese aggression and stand up for allies that need U.S. support.

"I hope our visit served as a symbol of the U.S. government's support for the people of Tibet and the friendship between our two peoples," McCaul said.

Won't let China sway Dalai Lama's successor choice: US lawmakers

20 June 2024, The Tribune

Meet spiritual leader in Dharamsala, reiterate support for free Tibet.

The ongoing war of words between the US and China over the autonomy for Tibet escalated on Wednesday with an American Congressional delegation, on a visit to Dharamsala to meet the Dalai Lama, saying Washington won't let Beijing "insert" itself in choosing a successor to the Tibetan spiritual leader.

"Things have changed, (China should) be ready for that," said the US delegation after meeting the Dalai Lama in the morning. There has been no reaction from India since the US announced on June 15 that its delegation would visit McLeodganj where Tibetan government-in-exile is headquartered.

Michael McCaul, the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the US House, who is leading the delegation, said they discussed with the Dalai Lama "how to move ahead with China on having a free Tibet". Asked whether the Tibet-China negotiations could restart, he said "that was for the US State Department to decide".

After emerging from the meeting, the delegation attended a public reception organised by the Central Tibetan Administration (government-in-exile). Hundreds of Tibetans applauded with shouts of 'Tashi Delek' (greetings in Tibetan) as the delegation members held small US and Tibet flags in their hands.

"The Chinese Communist Party continues to threaten the freedom of Tibetans. They want to insert themselves into the succession plan of the Dalai Lama. We will not let that happen... China has been falsely claiming Tibet as its part since the 13th century. The Tibetans as well as the US know that's not true," said McCaul.

He also mentioned a law titled the Tibet China Dispute Act, also referred to as the Resolve Tibet Act, which has been passed by the US Congress and seeks to strengthen efforts to "resolve the Tibet issue as per international norms under a negotiated settlement". "It allows for self-determination," he said.

Nancy Pelosi, former Speaker of the US House, said the law was a message to the Chinese that "we now have clarity in our thinking and understanding on the issue of freedom of Tibet". "The Chinese are trying to change the culture by reducing the use of the (Tibetan) language... Han (ethnic Chinese) are coming in... Things have changed now, get ready for that," she said.

Taking on Chinese President Xi Jinping, Pelosi said "the Dalai Lama would live long and his legacy would live forever". "But you, the President of China (Xi), nobody will know you and nobody will give you credit for anything," she said.

Jim McGovern, who authored the Bill, said China has an opportunity and it should release all political prisoners, including the Panchen Lama (who disappeared in 1995 as a six-year-old)."

The bipartisan US Congressional delegation, including Meeks, McCaul and Pelosi, met EAM S Jaishankar on Wednesday. Foreign Secretary Vinay Mohan Kwatra was also present. "Pleasure to meet with the bipartisan US Congressional delegation," posted Jaishankar on X.

He also thanked each of the members by name and appreciated their "strong and continued support for the Indo-US strategic partnership".

EU raises human rights concerns with China in 39th Dialogue Session

18 June 2024, ANI

The European Union reiterated its persistent concerns regarding fundamental freedoms, labour rights, judicial independence, and cases of forced labour in China, during the 39th session of the joint Human Rights Dialogue held in Chongqing.

The session, which took place on June 16, followed a side visit to Tibet from June 13-15.

In a press statement, the EU voiced concerns over restrictions on freedoms of expression, assembly, and religion in Tibet. It also highlighted the issues of rights to equality and freedom from discrimination, including the rights of women and LGBT.

The EU also reiterated its unequivocal opposition to the death penalty, urging China to implement a moratorium and provide transparent data on its use. It emphasized that religious leaders should be selected without government interference, respecting religious norms, particularly in the case of the Dalai Lama's succession.

The EU highlighted the vulnerability of religious, ethnic, and linguistic minorities, including Uyghurs and Tibetans, the negative impact of Hong Kong's new national security legislation on rights and freedoms, and the erosion of the region's autonomy. Expressing deep concerns over the human rights situation in Xinjiang, Tibetan areas, and Hong Kong, the EU cited reports of crackdowns on human rights defenders, lawyers, and journalists.

It further urged Beijing to stop human rights violations and investigate the cases of unlawful detention, enforced disappearance, torture, and ill-treatment.

Specific cases raised included EU citizen Gui Minhai, Uyghur academic Ilham Tohti, and Tibetan Activists Go Sherab Gyatso and Tashi Dorje.

The EU also addressed the detention of individuals for exercising freedoms of religion, belief, expression, and peaceful assembly, highlighting the cases of Xu Na, Pastor Wang Yi, Zhang Chunlei, Ding Yuande, Yu Wensheng, Xu Yan, Zhang Zhan, Li Qiaochu, Peng Lifa, and Kamile Wayit.

The European Union also called for a reassessment of China's national security framework to ensure compliance with international human rights law.

It encouraged Beijing to invite UN Special Procedures and monitoring bodies to assess and improve its human rights record.

China, in response, discussed the situation of refugees, migrants, and manifestations of racism in the EU, and focused on economic, social, and cultural rights there.

The EU also updated China on incoming European legislation requiring human rights due diligence for companies and prohibiting products made with forced labour on the EU market.

Both parties affirmed the importance of upholding the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and discussed achieving the full realization of economic, social, and cultural rights alongside civil and political rights. The EU emphasized that all human rights are interconnected, interdependent, and equally necessary for protecting human dignity.

The Dialogue concluded with an agreement to continue exchanges in preparation for the next Human Rights Dialogue in 2025.

It was co-chaired by Paola Pampaloni, Deputy Managing Director for Asia and the Pacific in the European External Action Service, and Shen Bo, Director General for International Organisations and Conferences at China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, with EU Member States participating as observers. ### US calls for immediate release of prominent rights activists held in China

18 June 2024, SCMP

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

The United States on Monday condemned prison sentences given to women's rights activist Sophia Huang Xueqin and labour rights activist Wang Jianbing in China and urged Beijing to release both activists immediately.

The sentences demonstrate China's "continued efforts to intimidate and silence civil society", US State Department spokesman Matthew Miller said in a statement.

Supporters said Huang has been sentenced to five years in prison on charges of incitement to subvert state authority, almost three years after she Wang were detained.

The verdict provided to Associated Press stated that Huang would also face a fine of 100,000 yuan (US$14,000), underscoring the ruling Communist Party's intolerance of any activism outside its control in a system whose upper echelons are dominated by men.

China's #MeToo movement flourished briefly before being snuffed out by the government. China often silences activists by holding them incommunicado for a long time and then sentencing them to prison.

Huang's release date was listed as September 18, 2026, accounting for her earlier detention. Co-defendant Wang was sentenced to three years and six months on the same charge. Wang is more known for his labour rights activity but also helped women report sexual harassment.

Huang and Wang's cases appear to have become intertwined as part of the most recent wave of a general crackdown on rights advocates, a trend that predates the #MeToo movement and includes previous incidents such as the 2015 detentions of women distributing pamphlets against sexual harassment on public transport.

Working as a freelance journalist, Huang helped spark China's first #MeToo case in 2018 when she publicised allegations of sexual harassment made by a graduate student against her PhD supervisor at one of China's most prestigious universities.

Friends say that Huang and Wang disappeared on September 19, 2021, a day before Huang was scheduled to fly to the United Kingdom to start a master's degree programme on gender violence and conflict at the University of Sussex. They went on trial in September 2023.

The International Women's Media Foundation earlier gave Huang its Wallis Annenberg Justice for Women Journalists Award.

Supporters of Huang and Wang created a GitHub webpage to post case updates and share their thoughts. China is routinely listed by monitoring groups as among the top imprisoning nations of journalists.

Amnesty International's China Director Sarah Brooks issued a statement condemning Huang's conviction as an attack on women's advocacy in the People's Republic of China, which has long promoted the concept that "women hold up half the sky", but whose institutions remain dominated by men.

"These convictions will prolong their deeply unjust detention and have a further chilling effect on human rights and social advocacy in a country where activists face increasing state crackdowns," Brooks said in an emailed statement.

"In reality, they have committed no actual crime. Instead, the Chinese government has fabricated excuses to deem their work a threat, and to target them for educating themselves and others about social justice issues such as women's dignity and workers' rights."

U.S. bans imports from 3 more Chinese companies over forced labor

11 June 2024, UPI, Chris Benson

The Biden administration Tuesday banned imports from three more Chinese companies in a continued crack down on the use of forced labor of Asia's minority populations in America's supply chain.

The Department of Homeland Security "will not tolerate forced labor in U.S. supply chains and will enforce our laws across all industries and sectors," Homeland Security Secretary Alejandro Mayorkas said Tuesday in a statement.

The three companies in China named by the Department of Homeland Security produce seafood, aluminum and footwear goods. DHS said those three industries play an important role in Xinjiang's economy.

"We will continue to investigate companies that use or facilitate forced labor and will hold those entities responsible," Mayorkas said while urging stakeholders across industry, civil society and international partners "to work with us to eliminate the scourge of forced labor."

The call was made by the Forced Labor Enforcement Task Force, chaired by DHS, which is comprised of the federal departments of commerce, justice, labor, state and treasury. The office of the U.S. Trade Representative also sits on the task force.

They now join 68 other Chinese companies put on the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act Entity List. U.S. Customs and Border Protection will stop their goods from entering the United States over allegations of using or facilitating forced labor of members of the Uyghur population, including the Kazakh and Kyrgyz people, from the Xinjiang region in northwestern China.

The United States, which has already taken similar actions, has accused China of committing genocide against its Uyghur Muslim population in the northwestern Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, where Beijing is estimated to have interned about a million of them in concentration camps since 2017.

Shandong Meijia Group Co., Ltd., also known as Rizhao Meijia Group, is based in Shandong Province. They process, sell and export frozen seafood products, vegetables and other quick-frozen convenience food.

Shrimp supply chains have shown "a disturbing pattern of profiting off of the globe's most vulnerable populations," according to John Williams, the Florida-based Southern Shrimp Alliance's executive director.

In a news release, the Southern Shrimp Alliance called Tuesday's move a "groundbreaking announcement."

As an example, Argentinian red shrimp packed by Uyghurs in Chinese seafood processing plants "should not be competing with wholesome products in American grocery stores," Williams said.

The United States claims the seafood company took part in a Chinese government-sponsored labor transfer program to move and deliver Uyghur people, and individuals from other persecuted minority groups, out of the Xinjiang region for labor at its factory in Shandong.

Williams said the task force's effort to counter forced labor in seafood supply chains "sends a strong message" to U.S. seafood importers "that chasing lower costs and higher margins cannot replace ethical and legal obligations."

Dongguan Oasis Shoes Co., Ltd., also doing business as three other "Dongguan" styled companies, is headquartered in Guangdong Province and manufactures shoe and shoe material goods.

It is alleged Dongguan cooperated with the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps to recruit, transfer and receive people of persecuted minority groups, including Uyghurs, out of the Xinjiang region to a Guangdong factory near China's southeastern coast. Xinjiang Shenhua Coal and Electricity Co., Ltd. is a Xinjiang-based company that produces electrolytic aluminum, graphite carbon and prebaked anodes.

It was alleged the company likewise took part in a Chinese government-lead labor transfer program to similarly recruit, move and deliver minority citizens groups out of the region for forced labor.

An independent British tribunal said in 2021 in a 63-page report that Beijing subjected the Uyghur people to "unconscionable cruelty" and crimes against humanity in actions that amounted to genocide, it concluded.

The bipartisan Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act – signed December 2021 by President Joe Biden – bans the import of goods from the region over alleged human rights abuses against the Muslim Uyghur population, unless the importer proves goods are not made with forced labor. It also imposes sanctions on foreign individuals who make use of forced labor.

Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla, a co-sponsor of the bill, described the law signed by Biden at the time as the "most important and impactful action taken thus far by the United States to hold the Chinese Communist Party accountable for their use of slave labor."

According to the Uyghur Human Rights Project, a Washington-based research and advocacy group, 1 in 26 Uyghurs and non-Han people in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in northwest China were incarcerated in 2022 representing roughly 449,000 people.

While the Uyghur and non-Han population in Xinjiang made up only 1% of China's overall population, the ethnic minority in the Uyghur Region account for 34% of China's estimated prison population, according to the report.

US report documents China's extreme isolation of Tibet

10 June 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

A new State Department report says that Chinese security forces intimidated, monitored, and harassed Americans in Tibet – and that many diplomats, officials, journalists, and tourists were barred from entering Tibet at all.

A consistent theme is that the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) is uniquely subjected to wide-ranging restrictions on access. These restrictions are not in force in any other provincial-level entity in the People's Republic of China.

"The State Department's report documents China's efforts to lock diplomats, journalists, and American visitors out, and keep the Tibetan people locked in. The goal of this legislation is to open Tibet, and the administration should make greater use of sanctions to bring accountability to the Chinese officials responsible for these restrictions," said Tencho Gyatso, president of International Campaign for Tibet.

Onerous restrictions

This is the sixth annual State Department report on access to Tibet. It notes that while the COVID-era restrictions on travel in other parts of the PRC eased, government regulations and procedures impeding travel to Tibet remain in place.

American officials are largely banned from entering Tibet. The report states that U.S. officials made three requests for official travel to the TAR in 2023, none of which were approved.

Diplomatic and official faced fewer formal restrictions on access to regions of Tibet outside the TAR, but PRC officials instead used conspicuous surveillance to intimidate, monitor, harass, and restrict travel to these areas.

The report also says that China's decision to close the American consulate in Chengdu severely inhibits American diplomatic and official access to Tibet, with responsibility for these duties now placed some 800 miles away from Tibet in the embassy in Beijing.

Key findings

Other significant findings from the report include:

- During the reporting year, the U.S. mission personnel were unable to conduct any American Citizen Services visits to the TAR in 2023 because requests for visits by consular officers were not approved. No consular officer has visited the TAR since 2019.
- Access to these areas for journalists remained restricted and limited.
- When U.S. journalists gained access to Tibetan areas, the PRC government further suppressed their ability to report about Tibet by intimidating and preventing PRC citizens from interacting with foreign press. By hosting group tours, the government has been able to cite increased numbers and greater access to the region while maintaining strict control over the information conveyed.
- Tibetan Americans undergo a stricter screening process than other U.S. citizens when applying for PRC visas at PRC embassies. Tibetan Americans reported more frequent harassment by security officials in Tibetan areas than in other parts of China, including requirements to report to the local UFWD office where some were reportedly interrogated, threatened, and forced to download tracking software on their phones.
- Some members of the Tibetan American community reported they self-censored their behavior in the United States out of fear of retribution against their family members in Tibet or fear of losing future access to Tibet and threats from PRC officials.

China says US provoking arms race in moves into South China Sea

09 June 2024, Reuters

The U.S. poses the largest security challenge in the South China Sea as its military deployment there is turning it into "the whirlpool of an arms race", Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Sun Weidong said in remarks published on Sunday.

Recent maritime run-ins between China and the Philippines, a U.S. treaty ally, have made the highly strategic South China Sea a potential flashpoint between Washington and Beijing.

"At present, the biggest security challenge in the South China Sea comes from outside the region," Sun said in comments published by his ministry, after attending a high-level meeting on East Asian cooperation in Laos.

Sun said U.S.-led forces were "promoting military deployment and actions in the South China Sea, inciting and intensifying maritime disputes and contradictions, and damaging the legitimate rights and interests of coastal countries".

A move by the United States to deploy medium-range missile systems in the area "is dragging the region into the whirlpool of an arms race, placing the entire Asia Pacific region under the shadow of geopolitical conflicts", Sun said.

China is committed to properly managing disputes with the parties in the South China Sea through dialogue, he added.

In April, the Philippines said during a meeting with U.S. allies that it was determined to assert its sovereign rights in the South China Sea, accusing China of escalating "its harassment" of the Philippines.

China claims almost the entire South China Sea, a conduit for more than $3 trillion in annual ship commerce, and has deployed hundreds of coast guard vessels as far as 1,000 km off its mainland to police what it says is its jurisdiction.

The Philippines and China have sparred repeatedly this past year near disputed features that fall within Manila's exclusive economic zone. China routinely accuses the Philippines of encroachment while Manila and its allies have condemned what they call aggression by Beijing.

The United States has said it stands with Manila.

Five Eyes nations say China is poaching Western ex-military

05 June 2024, RFA, Alex Willemyns

The People's Liberation Army is 'aggressively recruiting Western military talent.'

Former U.S. Marines Corp pilot Daniel Duggan, who is facing extradition to the United States for allegedly breaking U.S. arms control law after he trained Chinese pilots, poses for a picture in this undated handout picture.

China's navy and air force have been "aggressively recruiting Western military talent" to train their aviators in complex aerial maneuvers taught by U.S. armed forces, the American-led Five Eyes intelligence sharing network said in a bulletin on Wednesday.

The warning came as former Marine and naturalized Australian citizen Daniel Duggan, 55, fights to avoid extradition to the United States after being accused of training Chinese military pilots at a school in South Africa from 2010 to 2012, when he was a U.S. citizen.

The joint bulletin from the Five Eyes countries – the United States, Australia, the United Kingdom, Canada and New Zealand – warns that China's People's Liberation Army "continues to target current and former military personnel" to train pilots in advanced techniques.

Recruitment is "not always obvious, as companies may not initially promote the PLA's role," it says. "Job locations may be in China, South Africa, or elsewhere, with lucrative contracts and the opportunity to fly exotic aircraft, with vague details on the ultimate customers."

Western nations have taken action to counter the threat, the bulletin adds, including putting "commercial restrictions" on private schools like the Test Flying Academy of South Africa, where Duggan worked and said he believed he was only training civilian Chinese pilots.

Duggan, who became an Australian citizen in 2012 and has six school-aged children with his Australian wife, was charged with violating the U.S. Arms Export Control Act for accepting US$100,000 to train Chinese pilots without permission from the State Department.

According to an indictment, Duggan provided "instruction on the tactics, techniques and procedures associated with launching aircraft from and landing aircraft on a naval aircraft carrier" and acquired a U.S. Navy and Marines training aircraft – a T2-Buckeye – to assist.

He also lived in Beijing between 2014 and 2020, according to reports, and was an acquaintance of convicted Chinese hacker Su Bin, who was arrested in Canada in 2016 and charged with theft of U.S. military aircraft designs by hacking American defense contractors.

Duggan renounced his American citizenship at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing in 2016, and was arrested in Australia in October 2022. He has since been held in a maximum security prison two hours west of Sydney, from which he has strenuously denied the accusations.

Michael Casey, the director of the U.S. National Counterintelligence and Security Center, said Wednesday's bulletin was meant to warn ex-service members that China's efforts to recruit them "continue to evolve in response" to countermeasures by Five Eyes militaries.

The bulletin should "deter any current or former Western service members from actions that put their military colleagues at risk and erode our national security," he said.

May

The Chinese Communist Party is infiltrating the US from the inside

24 May 2024, The Hill, Anouk Wear

At the start of May, three men were arrested and charged in the United Kingdom for allegedly violating the UK's 2023 National Security Act by assisting Hong Kong's intelligence service and engaging in foreign interference on behalf of Hong Kong.

They are Bill Yuen, Peter Wai and Matthew Trickett, British and Hong Kong nationals aged 37-63. They are accused of surveillance, harassment and even attempting to break into a home of Hong Kong people who are settled in the UK under the BN(O) Visa Scheme, which has enabled more than 210,000 Hong Kongers to apply to move to the UK and start the path to British citizenship.

Bill Yuen was a manager at the London Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office (HKETO), which is Hong Kong's representative office in the UK. He is accused of acting on behalf of the London HKETO in hiring Wai and Trickett to target Hong Kong pro-democracy activists in the UK. Bank records show transfers from the London HKETO to Wai's security firm. Trickett was later found dead; the police state "[it] is currently being treated as unexplained. The case is ongoing.

There are 14 HKETOs around the world, representing Hong Kong with an annual budget of HK$601.5 million ($76.90 million USD) to engage in commercial relations, public relations and investment promotions. Many of them have diplomatic privileges and immunities, including three such offices in the U.S.

Under its high degree of autonomy, Hong Kong was granted overseas representative offices, which are distinct from Chinese embassies and consulates around the world. In the U.S., there are HKETOs in Washington, D.C., New York City and San Francisco in addition to other Chinese and Hong Kong government-affiliated cultural and business institutions.

However, Hong Kong is beginning to lose this autonomy. This means that the Chinese Communist Party is increasingly controlling Hong Kong, and that Hong Kong's overseas representative offices, the HKETOs, are increasingly under their direct control as well.

Since 2019, Beijing has aggressively cracked down on Hong Kong by ordering the brutal suppression of pro-democracy protests, imposing a national security law and introducing other new reforms, regulations and policies that assert their direct oversight. In just a few years, Hong Kong has morphed from one of Asia's freest cities to another Chinese Communist Party-controlled territory.

Hong Kong people have relentlessly fought for democracy, fundamental rights and freedoms. We now have political prisoners behind bars, many of whom are awaiting or going through trials today. Newspapers have been shut down, editors are on trial, over 100 civil society organizations have disbanded and the list goes on. Just today, in the Hong Kong 47 case – the biggest national security law case since the law was imposed in 2020 – former and aspiring legislators were found guilty of violating the law for organizing peaceful "unofficial" election primaries. They are punished for attempting to have democracy.

The U.S. has supported the Hong Kong people by introducing the 2019 Human Rights and Democracy Act and the Hong Kong Autonomy Act, and by offering Deferred Enforced Departure (DED) status for Hong Kong people in the U.S. This has not gone unnoticed, but it is simply not enough.

Today, the three HKETOs in the U.S. maintain their status, including diplomatic privileges and immunities. Even after the U.S. has acknowledged Hong Kong's diminishing autonomy, it has not reviewed the HKETOs. In other words, the Chinese Communist Party has two outposts with diplomatic privileges in Washington, D.C., New York City and San Francisco.

We can already see the UK government arresting and charging HKETO staff for national security violations and transnational repression. It is likely just a matter of time before the HKETOs and their staff in the U.S. commit the same violations, if they are not doing so already. The writing is on the wall.

Last week, HKETOs in the U.S. supported Hong Kong Financial Secretary Paul Chan's visit to the United States. Despite his key role in Hong Kong's leadership, he was not sanctioned by the U.S. This week, Secretary of Education Dr. Choi Yuk-lin will be visiting the U.S. as well, on a similar propaganda trip, no doubt with the HKETOs' support and with little criticism.

This is not only a threat to Hong Kong pro-democracy activists in the U.S. — some of whom have received arrest warrants and bounties from the Hong Kong government, and assurances from the U.S. — but also to U.S. national security.

Two of these activists spoke at the House Select Committee on the CCP's hearing last week, where they called for the review and closure of HKETOs in the U.S. They mentioned passing relevant legislation including the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office Certification Act.

It is detrimental to U.S. national security to have so many Chinese Communist Party outposts (HKETOs in addition to the embassy and consulates) in the middle of our cities, with diplomatic privileges and immunities including tax benefits and diplomatic staff. This is a threat to Hong Kongers who seek safety in the U.S., as well as Americans, and a gift to the Chinese Communist Party that we must stop granting as soon as possible.

The U.S. must review the status of the HKETOs and urge the Chinese Communist Party to grant Hong Kong its high degree of autonomy if they are to retain HKETOs under the current status — or strip them of their benefits.

China's gray zone social media war comes to America

18 May 2024, Asia Times, Denny Roy

China employs various "gray zone" tactics — moderately aggressive actions that are not egregious enough to provoke conventional military retaliation — against multiple adversaries. One such tactic is deployed within the United States: undeclared influence operations through social media. Chinese government-linked activity has recently become more worrisome. Previously the principal danger was People's Republic of China (PRC) propaganda lulling the US into uncritical acceptance of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) foreign policy agenda. Now, the Chinese government is adding its weight to the forces tearing at America's national fabric from the inside.

Until recently, the main thrust of PRC-sponsored messaging aimed at Americans through social media was to cultivate a positive image of China and its current government and to promote Beijing's point of view on China-related controversies such as Taiwan's political relationship with China, Chinese treatment of Uighurs and Tibetans, and the restriction of civil liberties in Hong Kong.

The content of social media posts was similar to what Chinese diplomats based in the US were saying when they gave public speeches and TV interviews or wrote editorials for newspapers.

This contrasted with the messaging promoted by the Russian government, which generally disparaged the US government and amplified highly divisive US domestic social and political issues, suggesting the Russian goal was to foment political instability in America. This seemed consistent with the respective Russian and Chinese relationships with the US. Vladimir Putin wanted to hurt the United States. He held deep grudges over

- the loss of Russia's great power status in the 1990s;
- humiliating US treatment of Russia through the expansion of NATO and disregard for Russian sensibilities as America waged conflicts in Iraq, Libya and Syria;
- the publication in 2016 of the so-called Panama Papers, which Putin said was an attempt by the US government to embarrass him; and
- US sanctions against Russia for its annexation of Crimea in 2014.

Putin likely would welcome an American fall into anarchy and economic collapse. China, on the other hand, needed Americans to continue buying Chinese goods, educating Chinese students and transferring cutting-edge technology to China. Hence the goal of Chinese strategic messaging was to defeat any threats to business as usual with the United States.

The attempt to foster positive US attitudes toward China has continued. During the 2022 election campaign in the United States, PRC-linked entities promulgated messaging supportive of China-friendly candidates in a few electoral races. TikTok has promoted short videos to millions of its users that support the PRC propaganda lines about Xinjiang and other controversial political issues.

But now there is an even darker aspect of PRC messaging.

The US director of national intelligence notes "growing [PRC] efforts to actively exploit perceived US societal divisions," through which "the PRC aims to sow doubts about US leadership [and] undermine democracy."

According to Clint Watts, general manager of Microsoft's Threat Analysis Center, "More recently, [PRC government] efforts have shifted to exploiting existing partisan divides in the US," including "the Chinese actually going into US audience spaces, masquerading as Americans and posting inflammatory content around current events or social issues or political issues."

A report by Microsoft published in April 2024 found efforts by the PRC to "spread conspiratorial narratives on multiple social media platforms." Accounts that appear to be CCP-affiliated "post about divisive US domestic issues such as global warming, US border policies, drug use, immigration and racial tensions.”

As an example, these posts said the deadly August 2023 wildfires in Maui, Hawaii resulted from the US military testing a “weather weapon.” Chinese-linked accounts also published speculation that the US government caused the derailment of a train in Kentucky in November 2023 and was “hiding something” in the aftermath. Microsoft concluded that the apparent objective of such posts is “encouraging mistrust of and disillusionment with the US government.” In another report also published in April 2024, Microsoft’s Threat Analysis Center assessed that Chinese government-sponsored social media activity “aims to destabilize” the US and other democracies.

The change in the content of PRC-promoted messaging in the social media that Americans consume has two important drivers. The first was the coronavirus pandemic. Just before the virus began to severely impact the United States in early 2020, US President Donald Trump was praising the Chinese government for its counter-pandemic response and touting a bilateral agreement that was supposed to end the “trade war” and restore normalcy to US-China trade relations.

As US fatalities mounted, however, Trump blamed China for unleashing a “plague” on the US. The PRC government responded by ratcheting up its criticism of the US government.

Chinese officials and government-controlled media not only decried the botched management of the pandemic in the US but extended the critique to add the argument that America’s political system is broken and that the US does not deserve a role in global leadership. Heavier emphasis on these themes in PRC strategic communication became a new norm. A second boost came from Russia’s expanded invasion of Ukraine that started in February 2022. The war pulled China into stronger diplomatic support for its “no limits” quasi-ally. This has led to closer alignment between Russian and Chinese propaganda messaging. The Chinese government, for example, repeats the Russian position that NATO is responsible for causing the war.

As the conflict in Ukraine has deepened the sense among the democracies of an increasingly dangerous authoritarian bloc, Russia and China are further incentivized to work to delegitimize US influence and the international appeal of the liberal political model that threatens both Xi Jinping and Putin.

Researchers have found large numbers of China-linked social media accounts spreading pro-Trump and anti-Biden messaging, suggesting that China prefers Trump over Biden as the next US president. For the Russian government, there is no question which of the two major party presidential candidates in the upcoming US election is preferable. Trump has consistently maintained a friendly and respectful stance toward Putin and often criticized US aid for Ukraine as well as the NATO alliance. For Beijing, however, the question is more complicated. Biden has major predictable downsides for the PRC. He would continue to frustrate Chinese desires for freer access to US markets and technology. The Biden administration maintained the Trump-era tariffs against Chinese imports and restricted China’s access to advanced technologies. Biden’s team has also repaired and strengthened US alliances in the Asia-Pacific region, obstructing PRC domination.

But Trump is a wild card for China. The Chinese like that he is transactional and seems to lack either a strategic or ideological vision demanding a US policy of what the Chinese would call “containment.” Trump is respectful toward Xi and has sometimes uncritically absorbed CCP views such as “Korea actually used to be a part of China.”

On the other hand, Trump brought advisors into the White House during his first term who dramatically toughened US policy toward China. Trump himself has at times harshly criticized China, as during the pandemic. He recently said he might increase tariffs on Chinese imports into the US to over 60%. At his worst, Trump might be worse for China than Biden.

Has the top leadership in Beijing now decided that China’s interests are best served if America descended into chaos? That is unlikely given that CCP officials continue to emphasize that their wish is for Washington to stop worrying about national security and allow China maximum opportunity to extract wealth and know-how. But they also want Americans to feel less confident in promoting the liberal democratic model of governance worldwide. Chinese leaders want to fortify their country against demands for political liberalization.

This is part of the reason why the PRC government keeps harping on the importance of the “Bali consensus” in US-China relations. According to Beijing, this “consensus” is a list of five policy renunciations that Biden agreed to during his meeting with Xi in Bali in 2022, one of them his assurance that “the United States does not seek to change China’s system.” (There is no parallel list of policies that China renounces in the Chinese summary of the meeting, and the US official readout does not include a list of five US renunciations.)

That the Chinese government is involved in such a campaign is both ironic and expected.

It is ironic because Beijing so often and so strenuously insists that “China never interferes in the affairs of other countries.” PRC officials specifically deny that China ever has or ever will attempt to influence the US electoral process, saying the accusation indicates American “paranoia” and a penchant for “slinging mud at China to divert attention” from US governance failures. Yet a surreptitious Chinese attempt to subvert an adversary’s government is not surprising, because the Chinese government is itself obsessed with the danger of subversion. The 2013 internal PRC government memo Document No 9 summarizes the Xi regime’s fear of “Western anti-China forces” overthrowing China’s political system by smuggling in liberal ideas and values.

The document emphasizes that CCP authorities must “ensure that the media leadership is always firmly controlled by someone who maintains an identical ideology with the Party’s Central Committee” and “allow absolutely no opportunity or outlets for incorrect thinking or viewpoints to spread.”

PRC leaders and government-controlled media speak often of the threat posed by “color revolutions” and routinely blame “hostile foreign forces” or “black hands” for causing unrest within China that actually results from discontent with Chinese colonization or CCP repression.

If the Chinese government thinks subversion from the outside is potentially effective, Beijing will not fail to employ the same tactic against its own adversaries.

The many broken promises from PRC officials, including Xi, to behave ethically in international affairs demonstrate bad faith and cynicism. To dissuade Beijing from continuing to meddle in American politics, a US response is justified.

As with other Chinese gray zone operations, however, hitting back is problematic. The PRC does not have real elections or open debate about domestic political issues, and the social media outlets that the PRC exploits to reach American audiences are banned in China.

A possible proportionate US response would be to target a weak spot of the ruling regime: its fear of losing legitimacy in the eyes of the Chinese public.

Xi’s government has already suffered a decrease in prestige because of widespread public pessimism about the government’s ability to successfully manage China’s economy, plus fresh bad memories of the government’s counter-Covid policy, which included draconian lockdowns followed by acquiescence to a mass die-off.

In 2012, a New York Times article documented the immense wealth built up by family members of PRC Premier Wen Jiabao. The expose clearly jabbed a raw nerve in Zhongnanhai; the Chinese government scrambled to censor the story and discussion of it, officially called it false and later expelled a New York Times reporter as retaliation.

Current top-ranking Chinese leaders are similarly vulnerable to damaging revelations about their personal hypocrisy (such as, for example, sending their children to colleges in the United States) from a credible foreign source.

In normal times, the US could disregard Chinese social media influence operations as insignificant. Unfortunately, this Chinese push occurs at a time when US domestic politics are highly polarized, conspiracy theories are widely believed and procedures and institutions vital to the proper functioning of US democracy are under stress.

PRC interference reinforces harmful trends that already have momentum. Under such circumstances, this malign influencing activity might contribute to outcomes that not only would be bad for America but that even Beijing might regret.

US committee targets Georgia Tech's alleged ties to Chinese military linked research

10 May 2024, Reuters, Michael Martina

A U.S. congressional committee on China has asked leading research university Georgia Institute of Technology to detail its collaboration with a Chinese university facing U.S. government restrictions due to its alleged ties to the country’s military.

Georgia Tech partnered with China’s northeastern Tianjin University on cutting edge technologies despite its documented ties to the People’s Liberation Army (PLA), John Moolenaar, the new Republican chairman of the House of Representatives’ select committee on China, wrote in a letter on Thursday to the U.S. school’s president Angel Cabrera.

ut the Georgia Tech scientist who led the project defended the research, saying all the results were available to the public, that it had passed extensive legal reviews, and that only a small portion of the funding came from the Georgia Tech Research Institute (GTRI), which is heavily sponsored by the Pentagon.

The letter noted that Tianjin University and numerous affiliates had been added in 2020 to the Commerce Department’s export restrictions list for actions contrary to U.S. national security, including trade secret theft and research collaboration to advance China’s military.

“While Georgia Tech is now prohibited from exporting sensitive technologies to Tianjin University due to the Entity List’s prohibitions, it has collaborated with Tianjin University and at least one other PLA-linked entity on developing sensitive technologies,” Moolenaar said.

The Tianjin research center is affiliated with a Chinese company with subsidiaries that supply the PLA, the letter said.

A Georgia Tech press release, opens new tab from January said its researchers based in Atlanta and at the Tianjin International Center for Nanoparticles and Nanosystems had created the world's first functional semiconductor made from the nanomaterial, graphene, which it said could lead to a "paradigm shift" in electronics and yield faster computing.

The U.S. and China, in the midst of an intense geopolitical and scientific rivalry, both view semiconductors as a strategic industry with civilian and military uses, including quantum computing and advanced weapons systems.

A spokesperson from Georgia Tech said it welcomed the congressional inquiry, but that GTRI "does not have a collaboration, research partnerships, or provide any funding to Tianjin University."

"We are continuously monitoring the evolving relationships between China and the United States and have implemented additional procedures and protocols to ensure security and maintain vigilance," Abigail Tumpey, the spokesperson told Reuters in an email.

In a published article, researchers credited financial support from GTRI, which counted the Defense Department and the U.S. military as customers for more than 90% of its research, opens new tab in fiscal year 2023, according to its latest annual report.

Moolenaar said Georgia Tech's collaboration with Tianjin University raised questions about its entity list compliance, and asked Cabrera to thoroughly disclose all of its joint work.

GTRI, Tianjin International Center for Nanoparticles and Nanosystems, and China's embassy in Washington did not respond immediately to Reuters' requests for comment.

Walter de Heer, the Georgia Tech professor who directed the program, told Reuters that only one Atlanta-based student had derived funding from GTRI for "nonproprietary" research related to the collaboration, which involved reproducing samples made in Tianjin.

He said deteriorating U.S.-China relations had derailed what had been a fruitful scientific endeavor with Chinese researchers. He said the research was still about a decade away from viable implementation, but that he had been unable to obtain U.S. government or private sector funding for follow-on research despite its promise.

"Everything I'm doing is public domain and open source," De Heer said.

The letter marks one of the first actions Moolenaar has taken as head of the bipartisan committee, a post he assumed in April after former Representative Mike Gallagher left Congress. No Democrats on the committee signed the letter.

The U.S. Justice Department under the Biden administration ended a Trump-era program called the China Initiative intended to combat Chinese espionage and intellectual property theft, but which critics had said spurred racial profiling toward Asian Americans and chilled scientific research.

Still, U.S. agencies and Congress have stepped up scrutiny of China's state-sponsored influence and technology transfers at American colleges and universities, concerned that Beijing uses open and federally funded research environments in the U.S. to circumvent export controls and other national security laws.

Various congressional bodies have recommended stricter China-related measures be added to the Higher Education Act of 1965 that requires U.S. colleges and universities that receive federal funding to disclose foreign ownership, control, gifts and contracts.

US confronts China over Volt Typhoon cyber espionage

09 May, 2024, Reuters, Zeba Siddiqui

U.S. officials confronted the Chinese government in Beijing last month about a sweeping cyber espionage campaign through which Chinese hackers have broken in to dozens of American critical infrastructure organizations, a senior U.S. cyber official said.

Under the campaign named Volt Typhoon, American officials say China aims to leverage the access it has gained into U.S. organizations in the event of a war or conflict - a nod to escalating U.S.-China tensions over Taiwan. The Chinese have previously dismissed such allegations as groundless.

"We have had direct conversations with the Chinese about it," Nathaniel Fick, U.S. ambassador at large for cyberspace and digital policy, told Reuters in an interview at the RSA Conference in San Francisco on Tuesday.

"We raised it directly with the Chinese government at very senior levels, and made clear that this kind of behavior is dangerous, escalatory, and it's not acceptable," Fick said. He said he spoke to the Chinese officials with U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken, who was in China from April 24 to 26.

Asked how the Chinese responded, Fick said: "Same way they have to previous attributions ... They have said before that it's a ploy by various U.S. agencies to get more budget dollars."

The Chinese embassy in Washington did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Wednesday.

The U.S. and several of its allies sounded the alarm on the campaign a year ago, warning that the Chinese could launch cyberattacks against oil and gas pipelines, rail systems and other critical industries.

It is unclear how many U.S. organizations have been compromised by the hackers, but "any number we give you is likely an underestimate," said Brandon Wales, the executive director of the U.S. Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency, during a separate media briefing at the same conference.

"Chinese targeting of our critical infrastructure is broad-based," he added.

"It is against a broad swath of small and medium-sized companies that are potentially critical in individual supply chains, or just capable of causing societal panic in some place around the country."

House Oversight Seeks More Briefings on U.S. Government Response to China's 'Political Warfare'

06 May, 2024, National Review, Jimmy Quinn

The House Oversight Committee is launching the second phase of its sweeping investigation into the U.S. government's response to the Chinese Communist Party's influence operations and malign behavior, National Review has exclusively learned.

Representative James Comer (R., Ky.), the panel's chairman, sent letters to nine federal agencies today requesting briefings on how each of them is grappling with threats posed by Beijing. Previously, the committee had sent a first tranche of letters to several other agencies in March, and it held a hearing last month focused on Chinese influence campaigns.

"China experts—with decades of experience in U.S. intelligence, national security, and the military—testified before the House Oversight Committee that the CCP's ambitions to influence the United States are destructive, dangerous, and jeopardize the safety of all Americans," Comer said today, in a statement issued to National Review.

"The Committee has a responsibility to ensure that the federal government is taking every action necessary to protect Americans from the CCP's ongoing political warfare," he said.

The letters today were addressed to the heads of the FBI, the State Department, the Commerce Department, the National Institutes of Health, the Consumer Product Safety Commission, the Department of Education, the Food and Drug Administration, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, and the Department of Energy.

While each letter focused on a set of issues specific to each agency, they all warned that Beijing uses a united-front strategy to influence people who are not members of the party in order to induce them to do the regime's bidding.

The letters all also refer to a 1999 book written by People's Liberation Army officers, titled "Unrestricted Warfare," which set out several tactics that China could use to "defeat America through political warfare," as Comer put it.

"As all Americans are targets of the PRC's warfare, federal agencies have responsibilities to (1) conduct outreach to citizens about the dangers they may encounter, and (2) provide appropriate incentives for Americans to proactively protect themselves—their communities, schools, houses of worship, businesses, finances, food, and more—from the threat," he wrote. Comer attributes his understanding of these threats to three of the witnesses who appeared at the committee's first hearing on China: Robert Spalding, a retired brigadier general who served on the Trump-era National Security Council; Grant Newsham, a retired Marine colonel; and former CIA analyst Peter Mattis.

The letters raised a wide-ranging set of concerns, touching on political-influence operations, medical supply chains, intellectual-property theft, America's reliance on "cheap products made in China," Chinese government-backed activity on U.S. campuses, espionage targeting Department of Energy-run national laboratories, and more. They gave each agency one week to respond and set up a briefing addressing a specific set of questions.

In his letter to Commerce Secretary Gina Raimondo, Comer expressed particular concern about the party's efforts to cultivate influence among state and local officials. Because they focus on economic development and job growth, they are "soft targets for the CCP's political warfare.

He cited federal government warnings that the united-front system leverages its relationships with lower-level officials to pressure Washington. He also pointed to recent reports about CCP influence campaigns in Utah and to National Review's reporting about New York City mayor Eric Adams's ties to the Chinese regime.

Comer wrote that he wants to look at how the Commerce Department's Office of Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs can play a role in liaising with state and local officials to educate them about the risks of engagement with Chinese government entities.

At various points in some of the letters, Comer criticized the Biden administration's handling of China policy.

In a letter to Secretary of State Antony Blinken, Comer questioned Foggy Bottom's promotion of efforts to expand "people-to-people" ties with China, noting that the email account of U.S. ambassador to China Nicholas Burns was hacked by people based in the country. Comer wrote that the department should not promote tourism to China without acknowledging the risks posed by traveling there.

In a letter to Attorney General Merrick Garland, he said that the Justice Department had "abruptly and mistakenly" ended its China Initiative.

US annual int'l religious freedom report red-flags China's move to acculturate Tibetan Buddhism

03 May 2024, Tibetan Review

Releasing its 2024 report on May 1, the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) has recommended that China be again listed as a "country of particular concern", along with 16 others, for reasons that include its move to assimilate Tibetan Buddhism to bring it in line with the prevailing values and policy priorities of the atheist Chinese Communist Party (CCP) dictatorship.

Speaking at a virtual launch of the report, the commission's vice-chair, Frederick A Davie, has referred to the report's recommendation that the US State Department designate China with the status of a "country of particular concern" (CPC) in terms of religious freedom violations.

The commission's main findings highlight increased surveillance and security measures on Tibetan Buddhists, leading to restrictions on their peaceful religious activities. These were stated to have led to Tibetan Buddhists being arrested and imprisoned for engaging in such activities or for possessing materials related to the Dalai Lama. Some have been reported placed in "political re-education" camps to prevent self-immolation, with Tibetan Buddhist monks dying in prison.

The report's Freedom of Religion or Belief Victims List, an online database, includes 93 Tibetans.

The Commission has identified the Chinese government's multifaceted "Sinicization of religion" policy as the significant factor in the deterioration of religious freedom under which all major religious groups are forced to obey the CCP and its ideology and policies.

On the Sinicization-of-Tibet drive, which includes the Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism, the report criticizes China for its forced separation of over 1 million Tibetan children from their families by placing them in state-run boarding schools where the curriculum marginalizes the teaching and practice of Tibetan language and culture.

Besides, the report notes, some local authorities had banned parents from teaching religion to Tibetan children; that the government has controlled the ordination of Tibetan monks and reiterated its intent to interfere in the Dalai Lama's reincarnation by appointing his successor.

As regards what entails the implementation of China's Sinicization of religion policy, the report states: "Sinicization requires groups to follow the CCP's Marxist interpretation of religion, including by altering religious scriptures and doctrines to conform to that interpretation."

In Tibet, the commission states, "Sinicization entailed forced assimilation of local populations that threatened their religious and cultural identities."

The USCIRF is a federal government commission created by the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998 to monitor religious freedom in other countries and to advise the US president, secretary of state and Congress on how best to promote it.

Commissioner Nury Turkel has spotlighted the fact that the Chinese government's continued targeting of diaspora ethnic and religious communities with ties to China, including Uyghurs, Tibetans, Christians and Falun Gong practitioners in 2023. Also, the commission's report expresses concern over the fact that "the Chinese government used its economic and geopolitical influence to pressure foreign countries, including Turkey, Morocco, Thailand, Nepal, and Pakistan, to repatriate Uyghur Muslims, Tibetan Buddhists, and Protestant Christian refugees to China, where they could face severe human rights abuses."

US Commission highlights China's growing 'Sinicization' of Tibetan Buddhism

02 May 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom's 2024 annual report, published May 1, highlights the deterioration of religious freedom in Tibet due to the Chinese government's intensified suppression and "Sinicization" of Tibetan Buddhism. Sinicization is a Chinese policy that aims to bring Tibetan Buddhism under the control of the Chinese Communist Party.

China a country of particular concern

Speaking on behalf of USCIRF during the virtual launch of the 2024 annual report, the commission's vice-chair, Frederick A. Davie, recommended the US State Department designate China as one of the 17 countries with "country of particular concern" (CPC) status in terms of religious freedom violations.

The commission's main findings reveal increased surveillance and security measures on Tibetan Buddhists, leading to restrictions on their peaceful religious activities. Tibetan Buddhists have been arrested and imprisoned for engaging in such activities or for possessing materials related to the Dalai Lama. Some have been placed in "political re-education" camps to prevent self-immolation, with Tibetan Buddhist monks dying in prison.

The commission's Freedom of Religion or Belief Victims List, an online database, includes 93 Tibetans.

The US Commission on International Religious Freedom commissioners released their 2024 annual report on May 1.

Forced assimilation of Tibetan children

Highlighting the forced separation of over 1 million Tibetan children from their families in state-run boarding schools and the government's measures to stop Tibetans from freely practicing their Buddhist faith, the commission spotlighted that:

The government separated one million Tibetan children from parents, putting them in state-run boarding schools to forcibly assimilate them. Some local authorities banned parents from teaching religion to Tibetan children. The government controlled the ordination of Tibetan monks and reiterated its intent to interfere in the Dalai Lama's reincarnation and appoint his successor.

Human rights sanctions

Commissioner Susie Gelman emphasized the commission's role and the US government's implementation of targeted human rights sanctions in 2023, including sanctions on Chinese officials and entities. As an example, she cited the Biden administration's sanctioning of Chinese officials "who forcibly separate Tibetan children from their families and seek to eliminate religious freedom in Tibet."

Sinicization of religion

The Commission identifies the Chinese government's multifaceted "Sinicization of religion" policy as the significant factor in the deterioration of religious freedom under which all major religious groups are forced to obey the Chinese Communist Party and its ideology and policies.

The commission in its annual report states that "Sinicization requires groups to follow the CCP's Marxist interpretation of religion, including by altering religious scriptures and doctrines to conform to that interpretation." Highlighting the effects of the Chinese government's Sinicization of religion policy in Tibet, the commission states that "Sinicization entailed forced assimilation of local populations that threatened their religious and cultural identities."

25th anniversary of the commission

The US Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) is a federal government commission created by the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998 (Public Law 105-292) to monitor religious freedom in other countries and advise the US president, secretary of state and Congress on how best to promote it.

The 2024 annual report marks the 25th anniversary of the creation of the commission.

Transnational repression

USCIRF Commissioner Nury Turkel spotlighted the Chinese government's continued targeting of diaspora ethnic and religious communities with ties to China, including Uyghurs, Tibetans, Christians and Falun Gong practitioners in 2023.

Highlighting the Chinese government's continued perpetration of transnational repression, the commission's annual report highlighted that "the Chinese government used its economic and geopolitical influence to pressure foreign countries, including Turkey, Morocco, Thailand, Nepal, and Pakistan, to repatriate Uyghur Muslims, Tibetan Buddhists, and Protestant Christian refugees to China, where they could face severe human rights abuses."

'Xenophobia' behind India and China's economic troubles, says US President Joe Biden

02 May 2024, The Indian Express

"One of the reasons why our economy's growing is because of you and many others. Why? Because we welcome immigrants," Biden said.

Arguing that immigrants have made the United States stronger, President Joe Biden Wednesday said that xenophobia from India, China, Russia and Japan has stalled their economic growth, news agency Reuters reported.

"Why is China stalling so badly economically, why is Japan having trouble, why is Russia, why is India, because they are xenophobic. They don't want immigrants. Immigrants are what makes us strong," Biden remarked.

The US President was speaking at a Washington fundraising event for his 2024 re-election campaign, which also marked the start of Asian American, Native Hawaiian and Pacific Islander Heritage Month. "One of the reasons why our economy is growing is because of you and many others. Why? Because we welcome immigrants," Biden said.

Biden, who is up against Republican candidate and former president Donald Trump in the presidential race, has often criticised his rival for his "anti-immigrant" rhetoric. Trump has promised to curb illegal immigration and restrict legal migration if elected to office. During his campaigning, he has blamed immigrants for the rise of violence in the country.

Biden, meanwhile, has advocated for a more humane stance on the issue of migrants. Since coming to power, Biden has eased the Trump-era crackdown on migrants and introduced new "parole" policies, which allow certain migrants to enter legally for humanitarian reasons.

However, research shows that Biden is facing criticism from voters over unemployment and immigration. A poll from the AP-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research found that over half of US adults think that "Biden's presidency has hurt the country on cost of living and immigration".

Antony Blinken begins key China visit as tensions rise over new U.S. foreign aid bill

25 April 2024, The Hindu

Blinken arrived in Shanghai on April 24 just hours after the Senate vote on the long-stalled legislation

U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken has begun a critical trip to China armed with a strengthened diplomatic hand following Senate approval of a foreign aid package that will provide billions of dollars in assistance to Ukraine, Israel and Taiwan as well as force TikTok's China-based parent company to sell the social media platform -- all areas of contention between Washington and Beijing.

Blinken arrived in Shanghai on Wednesday just hours after the Senate vote on the long-stalled legislation and shortly before President Joe Biden is expected to sign it into law to demonstrate U.S. resolve in defending its allies and partners. Passage of the bill will add further complications to an already complex relationship that has been strained by disagreements over numerous global and regional disputes.

Still, the fact that Blinken is making the trip -- shortly after a conversation between Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping, a similar visit to China by Treasury Secretary Janet Yellen and a call between the U.S. and Chinese defense chiefs -- is a sign the two sides are at least willing to discuss their differences.

Of primary interest to China, the bill sets aside $8 billion to counter Chinese threats in Taiwan and the broader Indo-Pacific and gives China's ByteDance nine months to sell TikTok with a possible three-month extension if a sale is in progress. China has railed against U.S. assistance to Taiwan, which it regards as a renegade province, and immediately condemned the move as a dangerous provocation. It also strongly opposes efforts to force TikTok's sale.

The bill also allots $26 billion in wartime assistance to Israel and humanitarian relief to Palestinians in Gaza, and $61 billion for Ukraine to defend itself from Russia's invasion. The Biden administration has been disappointed in China's response to the war in Gaza and has complained loudly that Chinese support for Russia's military-industrial sector has allowed Moscow to subvert Western sanctions and ramp up attacks on Ukraine.

Even before Blinken landed in Shanghai -- where he will have meetings on Thursday before traveling to Beijing -- China's Taiwan Affairs Office slammed the assistance to Taipei, saying it "seriously violates" U.S. commitments to China, "sends a wrong signal to the Taiwan independence separatist forces" and pushes the self-governing island republic into a "dangerous situation."

China and the United States are the major players in the Indo-Pacific and Washington has become increasingly alarmed by Beijing's growing aggressiveness in recent years toward Taiwan and Southeast Asian countries with which it has significant territorial and maritime disputes in the South China Sea.

The U.S. has strongly condemned Chinese military exercises threatening Taiwan, which Beijing regards as a renegade province and has vowed to reunify with the mainland by force if necessary. Successive U.S. administrations have steadily boosted military support and sales for Taiwan, much to Chinese anger.

A senior State Department official said last week that Blinken would "underscore, both in private and public, America's abiding interest in maintaining peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait. We think that is vitally important for the region and the world."

In the South China Sea, the U.S. and others have become increasingly concerned by provocative Chinese actions in and around disputed areas.

In particular, the U.S. has voiced objections to what it says are Chinese attempts to thwart legitimate maritime activities by others in the sea, notably the Philippines and Vietnam. That was a major topic of concern this month when Biden held a three-way summit with the prime minister of Japan and the president of the Philippines.

On Ukraine, which U.S. officials say will be a primary topic of conversation during Blinken's visit, the Biden administration said that Chinese support has allowed Russia to largely reconstitute its defense industrial base, affecting not only the war in Ukraine but posing a threat to broader European security.

"If China purports on the one hand to want good relations with Europe and other countries, it can't on the other hand be fueling what is the biggest threat to European security since the end of the Cold War," Blinken said last week.

China says it has the right to trade with Russia and accuses the U.S. of fanning the flames by arming and funding Ukraine. "It is extremely hypocritical and irresponsible for the U.S. to introduce a large-scale aid bill for Ukraine while making groundless accusations against normal economic and trade exchanges between China and Russia," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin said Tuesday.

On the Middle East, U.S. officials, from Biden on down, have repeatedly appealed to China to use any leverage it may have with Iran to prevent Israel's war against Hamas in Gaza from spiraling into a wider regional conflict.

While China appears to have been generally receptive to such calls — particularly because it depends heavily on oil imports from Iran and other Mideast nations — tensions have steadily increased since the beginning of the Gaza war in October and more recent direct strikes and counterstrikes between Israel and Iran.

Blinken has pushed for China to take a more active stance in pressing Iran not to escalate tensions in the Middle East. He has spoken to his Chinese counterpart, Wang Yi, several times urging China to tell Iran to restrain the proxy groups it has supported in the region, including Hamas, Lebanon's Hezbollah, Yemen's Houthis and Iranian-backed militias in Iraq and Syria.

The senior State Department official said Blinken would reiterate the U.S. interest in China using "whatever channels or influence it has to try to convey the need for restraint to all parties, including Iran."

The U.S. and China are also at deep odds over human rights in China's western Xinjiang region,

Tibet and Hong Kong, as well as the fate of several American citizens that the State Department says have been "wrongfully detained" by Chinese authorities, and the supply of precursors to make the synthetic opioid fentanyl that is responsible for the deaths of thousands of Americans.

China has repeatedly rejected the American criticism of its rights record as improper interference in its internal affairs. Yet, Blinken will again raise these issues, according to the State Department official.

Another department official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity to preview Blinken's private talks with Chinese officials, said China had made efforts to rein in the export of materials that traffickers use to make fentanyl but that more needs to be done.

The two sides agreed last year to set up a working group to look into ways to combat the surge of production of fentanyl precursors in China and their export abroad. U.S. officials say they believe they had made some limited progress on cracking down on the illicit industry but many producers had found ways to get around new restrictions.

"We need to see continued and sustained progress," the official said, adding that "more regular law enforcement" against Chinese precursor producers "would send a strong signal of China's commitment to address this issue."

US blacklists four Chinese tech apps for helping military in China

13 April 2024, The Economic Times

Amid escalating tensions between the United States and China, the US Commerce Department has taken action by blacklisting four Chinese companies for their alleged involvement in supplying artificial intelligence (AI) chips to China's military modernization efforts. This move comes as part of the US government's efforts to prevent sensitive American technology from being used for military purposes in China.

The blacklisted companies, including Linkzol (Beijing) Technology Co, Xi'an Like Innovative Information Technology Co, Beijing Anwise Technology Co, and SITONHOLY (Tianjin) Co, were among 11 additions to the Commerce Department Entity List this week. Being placed on this list makes it significantly challenging for these companies to access American goods and technology.

According to Kevin Kurland, an export enforcement official, the banned companies were involved in acquiring US AI chips for Chinese military applications, prompting the US to impose restrictions on exports of advanced semiconductors and chip-making equipment to China.

China, however, vehemently denied the allegations, with Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning dismissing them as attempts to "contain and suppress" Chinese companies. China vowed to take "necessary steps" to safeguard its interests in response to the US actions.

Additionally, the US imposed export restrictions on five other companies accused of aiding drone production for Russia's involvement in Ukraine and Iranian attacks in the Red Sea. Among these companies was Jiangxi Xintuo Enterprise Co, a Chinese firm allegedly supporting Russia's drone program, along with a network of companies supplying drone components to Iran.

China condemned the US measures, arguing that they disrupt normal economic cooperation with Russia. As tensions continue to simmer between the US and China, these latest developments underscore the complexities of economic and geopolitical relations between the two global powers.

US-China competition to field military drone swarms could fuel global arms race

12 April 2024, AP News

As their rivalry intensifies, U.S. and Chinese military planners are gearing up for a new kind of warfare in which squadrons of air and sea drones equipped with artificial intelligence work together like a swarm of bees to overwhelm an enemy.

The planners envision a scenario in which hundreds, even thousands of the machines engage in coordinated battle. A single controller might oversee dozens of drones. Some would scout, others attack. Some would be able to pivot to new objectives in the middle of a mission based on prior programming rather than a direct order.

The world's only AI superpowers are engaged in an arms race for swarming drones that is reminiscent of the Cold War, except drone technology will be far more difficult to contain than nuclear weapons. Because software drives the drones' swarming abilities, it could be relatively easy and cheap for rogue nations and militants to acquire their own fleets of killer robots.

The Pentagon is pushing urgent development of inexpensive, expendable drones as a deterrent against China acting on its territorial claim on Taiwan. Washington says it has no choice but to keep pace with Beijing. Chinese officials say AI-enabled weapons are inevitable so they, too, must have them. The unchecked spread of swarm technology "could lead to more instability and conflict around the world," said Margarita Konaev, an analyst with Georgetown University's Center for Security and Emerging Technology.

As the undisputed leaders in the field, Washington and Beijing are best equipped to set an example by putting limits on military uses of drone swarms. But their intense competition, China's military aggression in the South China Sea and persistent tensions over Taiwan make the prospect of cooperation look dim.

The idea is not new. The United Nations has tried for more than a decade to advance drone non-proliferation efforts that could include limits such as forbidding the targeting of civilians or banning the use of swarms for ethnic cleansing.

MILITARY CONTRACTS OFFER CLUES

Drones have been a priority for both powers for years, and each side has kept its advances secret, so it's unclear which country might have an edge.

A 2023 Georgetown study of AI-related military spending found that more than a third of known contracts issued by both U.S. and Chinese military services over eight months in 2020 were for intelligent uncrewed systems.

The Pentagon sought bids in January for small, unmanned maritime "interceptors." The specifications reflect the military's ambition: The drones must be able to transit hundreds of miles of "contested waterspace," work in groups in waters without GPS, carry 1,000-pound payloads, attack hostile craft at 40 mph and execute "complex autonomous behaviors" to adapt to a target's evasive tactics.

It's not clear how many drones a single person would control. A spokesman for the defense secretary declined to say, but a recently published Pentagon-backed study offers a clue: A single operator supervised a swarm of more than 100 cheap air and land drones in late 2021 in an urban warfare exercise at an Army training site at Fort Campbell, Tennessee.

The CEO of a company developing software to allow multiple drones to collaborate said in an interview that the technology is bounding ahead.

"We're enabling a single operator to direct right now half a dozen," said Lorenz Meier of Auterion, which is working on the technology for the U.S. military and its allies. He said that number is expected to increase to dozens and within a year to hundreds.

Not to be outdone, China's military claimed last year that dozens of aerial drones "self-healed" after jamming cut their communications. An official documentary said they regrouped, switched to self-guidance and completed a search-and-destroy mission unaided, detonating explosive-laden drones on a target.

In justifying the push for drone swarms, China hawks in Washington offer this scenario: Beijing invades Taiwan then stymies U.S. intervention efforts with waves of air and sea drones that deny American and allied planes, ships and troops a foothold.

A year ago, CIA Director William Burns said Chinese Communist Party leader Xi Jinping had instructed his military to “be ready by 2027” to invade. But that doesn’t mean an invasion is likely, or that the U.S.-China arms race over AI will not aggravate global instability.

KISSINGER URGED ACTION

Just before he died last year, former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger urged Beijing and Washington to work together to discourage AI arms proliferation. They have “a narrow window of opportunity,” he said.

“Restraints for AI need to occur before AI is built into the security structure of each society,” Kissinger wrote with Harvard’s Graham Allison.

Xi and President Joe Biden made a verbal agreement in November to set up working groups on AI safety, but that effort has so far taken a back seat to the arms race for autonomous drones.

The competition is not apt to build trust or reduce the risk of conflict, said William Hartung, a senior research fellow at the Quincy Institute for Responsible Statecraft. If the U.S. is “going full speed ahead, it’s most likely China will accelerate whatever it’s doing,” Hartung said. There’s a risk China could offer swarm technology to U.S. foes or repressive countries, analysts say. Or it could be stolen. Other countries developing the tech, such as Russia, Israel, Iran and Turkey, could also spread the know-how. U.S. national security adviser Jake Sullivan said in January that U.S.-China talks set to begin sometime this spring will address AI safety. Neither the defense secretary’s office nor the National Security Council would comment on whether the military use of drone swarms might be on the agenda. The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not respond to a request for comment.

A FIVE-YEAR WAIT

Military analysts, drone makers and AI researchers don’t expect fully capable, combat-ready swarms to be fielded for five years or so, though big breakthroughs could happen sooner. “The Chinese have an edge in hardware right now. I think we have an edge in software,” said CEO Adam Bry of U.S. drone maker Skydio, which supplies the Army, the Drug Enforcement Agency and the State Department, among other agencies. Chinese military analyst Song Zhongping said the U.S. has “stronger basic scientific and technological capabilities” but added that the American advantage is not “impossible to surpass.” He said Washington also tends to overestimate the effect of its computer chip export restrictions on China’s drone swarm advances. Paul Scharre, an AI expert at the Center for a New American Security think tank, believes the rivals are at rough parity.

“The bigger question for each country is about how do you use a drone swarm effectively?” he said.

That’s one reason all eyes are on the war in Ukraine, where drones work as eyes in the sky to make undetected front-line maneuvers all but impossible. They also deliver explosives and serve as sea-skimming ship killers.

Drones in Ukraine are often lost to jamming. Electronic interference is just one of many challenges for drone swarm development. Researchers are also focused on the difficulty of marshaling hundreds of air and sea drones in semi-autonomous swarms over vast expanses of the western Pacific for a potential war over Taiwan.

A secretive, now-inactive $78 million program announced early last year by the Pentagon’s Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or DARPA, seemed tailor-made for the Taiwan invasion scenario. The Autonomous Multi-Domain Adaptive Swarms-of-Swarms is a mouthful to say, but the mission is clear: Develop ways for thousands of autonomous land, sea and air drones to “degrade or defeat” a foe in seizing contested turf.

DRONES IMPROVISE — BUT MUST STICK TO ORDERS

A separate DARPA program called Offensive Swarm-Enabled Tactics, had the goal of marshaling upwards of 250 land-based drones to assist Army troops in urban warfare.

Project coordinator Julie Adams, an Oregon State robotics professor, said swarm commanders in the exercise managed to choreograph up to 133 ground and air vehicles at a time. The drones were programmed with a set of tactics they could perform semi-autonomously, including indoor reconnaissance and simulated enemy kills. Under the direction of a swarm commander, the fleet acted something like an infantry squad whose soldiers are permitted some improvisation as long as they stick to orders.

“It’s what I would call supervisory interaction, in that the human could stop the command or stop the tactic,” Adams said. But once a course of action — such as an attack — was set in motion, the drone was on its own.

Adams said she was particularly impressed with a swarm commander in a different exercise last year at Fort Moore, Georgia, who single-handedly managed a 45-drone swarm over 2.5 hours with just 20 minutes of training.

“It was a pleasant surprise,” she said.

A reporter had to ask: Was he a video game player? Yes, she said. “And he had a VR headset at home.”

Comer Announces Hearing on the CCP’s Efforts to Infiltrate and Influence the United States

10 April 2024, OverSight

House Committee on Oversight and Accountability Chairman James Comer (R-Ky.) announced a hearing titled "Defending America from the Chinese Communist Party's Political Warfare, Part I." This first hearing will examine how the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is waging war against the U.S. by targeting, infiltrating, and influencing every sector and community in America. At the hearing, members will hear from leading experts familiar with the methods and tactics deployed by the CCP to conduct non-kinetic warfare against the United States. On March 14, 2024, Chairman Comer launched a government-wide investigation into these dangerous CCP tactics and sought information from federal agencies to ensure the federal government is effectively utilizing existing resources to combat the CCP's political warfare.

"The CCP is waging an influence and infiltration campaign that threatens U.S. military readiness, the technology sector, financial markets, agriculture industry, education systems, intellectual property, and even our own federal government agencies. These federal agencies have important responsibilities to safeguard Americans from the CCP's nefarious tactics and the House Oversight Committee is uniquely equipped to ensure the federal government is taking every action necessary to thwart China's political warfare," said Chairman Comer. "This hearing is the first in the Committee's government-wide investigation into CCP political warfare and the witnesses appearing will tell the story of how the CCP targets America. I look forward to exposing the CCP's actions and uncovering ways that federal agencies can work together to safeguard our communities."

China accuses US of Deporting Chinese students without proper evidence

08 April 2024, First Post

In response to inquiries concerning claims that Chinese scholars and students were detained and compelled to leave the country upon crossing the border at Dallas and Washington Dulles airports, Mao stated that the US actions severely damaged the individuals involved and hampered people-to-people contacts between China and the US.

China threatened to take "resolute measures" to protect the interests of its citizens on Monday, accusing the US of forcibly deporting Chinese students without any reasonable justification.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning told a media briefing here that the US has been overly expanding the definition of national security and has arbitrarily canceled Chinese students' visas, prohibited them from visiting the US, and forcibly deported them without any solid proof.

In response to inquiries concerning claims that Chinese scholars and students were detained and compelled to leave the country upon crossing the border at Dallas and Washington Dulles airports, Mao stated that the US actions severely damaged the individuals involved and hampered people-to-people contacts between China and the US.

"The recent cases show that the US law enforcement personnel are bent on making excuses for deporting Chinese personnel. These are typical cases of selective, discriminatory and politically motivated law enforcement," Mao said. "China will take resolute measures to safeguard the legitimate and lawful rights and interests of Chinese citizens. The US needs to immediately stop unjustifiably harassing," she said. China's state-run Global Times quoted Chinese Ambassador to the US Xie Feng alleging that dozens of Chinese arriving in the US, including students, were being denied entry every month over the past few months.

He added that they were going back to school after visiting other places or seeing relatives in China, and that they had legal visas and no criminal records.

However, Xie claimed that after they arrived at the airport, they were subjected to an eight-hour interrogation by the authorities, who also forbade them from speaking with their parents, falsely accused them, and even forcibly deported and barred them from entering the country.

Indian students in American schools surpassed Chinese students last year, according to figures from the US Department of Homeland Security.

The number of Chinese students studying in the US increased to 3.20 lakh last year from 2.54 lakh, which Chinese officials ascribed to the country's increasingly unfavorable climate due to worries over the flight of scientific knowledge.

EXCLUSIVE Now Chinese migrants are sneaking onto Guam: Top Republican warns Communist Party wants to 'exploit' every part of the U.S. map and warns critical American base is vulnerable

30 March 2024, Daily Mail

There are rising concerns that the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is infiltrating the United States' sensitive military site in Guam where over 20,000 troops are stationed.

A growing number of Chinese nationals have been sneaking in from the Northern Mariana Islands into Guam, which makes the U.S. territory susceptible to CCP influence.

Guam is the location of the Navy's only submarine base in the western Pacific. It also hosts a 'strategically important' air base with bombers and fighter jets.

The island's homeland security agency has reported 118 'unlawful or attempted unlawful entries by Chinese citizens' since 2022.

The number peaked at 85 in 2022 followed by 27 in 2023 and six so far in 2024, according to Stars and Stripes.

'Count on the Chinese Communist Party to exploit every potential vulnerability on the map. What the CCP is doing in Guam is almost certainly no exception,' House Homeland Security Chairman Mark Green, R-Tenn., told DailyMail.com.

'The United States maintains a significant military presence on the island, a vital outpost for helping America defend our strategic interests in the region.' He added that the 'surging numbers of Chinese nationals coming into Guam' should be a 'major cause for concern, in part because we simply do not know for what purpose these individuals are coming.' Green blames the Biden administration for allowing the CPP to 'sense weakness' and then 'take advantage' of the situation.

'It's not just rising numbers of Chinese nationals illegally crossing our Southwest border that demands attention—what's happening in Guam does, as well.' Chinese migrants using the border to gain entry are the fastest growing group being smuggled in from Mexico.

Last year, Green told DailyMail.com that there had been over 17,800 Chinese nationals released into the U.S. from January through September after they came across the southern border.

In addition to the illegal migrants streaming onto the island, DailyMail.com previously reported on the 'loophole' that allows Chinese nationals to spy on U.S. military installations in Guam.

In 2019, the U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) enacted a policy to allow Chinese nationals to visit the Northern Mariana Islands for 14 days without a visa.

From there, many have been reported to charter boats to Guam in order to get information on sensitive U.S. military sites.

Guam Customs and Quarantine spokeswoman Alana Chargualaf-Afaisen told Newsweek that the agency stops 'unlawful arrivals' to the territory.

The migrants often 'prevent harm in a variety of areas, including military intelligence and reconnaissance, terrorism, communicable diseases, human trafficking for slave labor, prostitution and illegal gambling, cheap, undocumented labor, the movement of illicit drugs, and other illegal activities that pose a threat to the quality of life in Guam, are of equal concern to our island,' said the statement to Newsweek.

The ongoing visa loophole is of major concern to top leaders in the Senate as well.

Sen. Joni Ernst, R-Iowa, previously told DailyMail.com that the visa loophole allows spies to take a 'hard look' at what that U.S. is doing militarily in Guam and then 'use that against us.'

'We're trying to close those loopholes. I just think it's very, very important that we do this,' said Ernst, who sits on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Ernst and Rep. Rep. Neal Dunn, R-Fla., wrote a letter to Department of Homeland Security Sec. Alejandro Mayorkas slamming the policy, which the administration has said provides a significant economic boost for the small island.

China slams the U.S. for interfering in Arunachal Pradesh border dispute with India

21 March 2024, CNBC

China slammed the United States for interfering in its border dispute with India, after Washington said it recognized the disputed Arunachal Pradesh as a part of Indian territory.

"China strongly deplores and firmly opposes this," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said Thursday at a press conference in Beijing. "The China-India boundary question is a matter between the two countries and has nothing to do with the US side."

The response comes after the U.S. on Wednesday rejected China's "unilateral attempts" to advance its territorial claims, weighing in on a spat between New Delhi and Beijing after Prime Minister Narendra Modi inaugurated a tunnel in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

It is the latest in an escalating dispute between neighboring India and China, which share a 3,500 kilometer border.

China, which refers to the territory as Zangnan, claims Arunachal Pradesh is part of southern Tibet. India rejects those claims, stating Arunachal Pradesh has always been a part of India.

On Wednesday, the U.S. State Department weighed in on the matter.

"The United States recognizes Arunachal Pradesh as Indian territory and we strongly oppose any unilateral attempts to advance territorial claims by incursions or encroachments, military or civilian, across the Line of Actual Control," spokesperson Vedant Patel said.

The LAC is a demarcation that separates India-controlled territory from that controlled by China.

China on Thursday reiterated its claims over Arunachal Pradesh, saying: "Zangnan has always been China's territory, a basic fact that is undeniable."

"It is known to all that the US has consistently spared no efforts to provoke and take advantage of other countries' conflicts to serve its selfish geopolitical interests," Lin added.

U.S. support for India in the border dispute is a "reflection of consistent U.S. efforts to fully align itself with India in its competition with China," Michael Kugelman, director of the South Asia Institute at the Wilson Center told CNBC.

Kugelman pointed out that the U.S. typically refrains from commenting on some Indian border disputes, such as the one with Pakistan over Kashmir.

But in this case, he said, Washington is signaling its solidarity with New Delhi – "in the same way that it has made efforts, including through intelligence-sharing, to help India deter Chinese aggressions on its northern border."

India-China border tensions heat up

Earlier this month, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi inaugurated the "Sela Tunnel" – the world's longest bi-lane tunnel built at an altitude above 13,000 feet, which is located in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, triggering sharp responses from Chinese officials.

Border tensions between India and China have risen in recent years. In a major escalation in 2020, a clash between the two sides killed 20 Indian soldiers and four Chinese troops. Last year, China renamed 11 places in Arunachal Pradesh, a move strongly opposed by India.

Senior Colonel Zhang Xiaogang, deputy director general of the Information Office of China's Ministry of National Defense said in a statement days after the road tunnel inauguration that "China never recognizes and firmly opposes India's illegal establishment of the so-called 'Arunachal Pradesh.'"

Last week, China's defense ministry reiterated its claim over the northeastern state of Arunachal Pradesh.

India's foreign ministry this week responded to Zhang's comments, saying Arunachal Pradesh "was, is and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India."

Randhir Jaiswal, India's foreign ministry spokesperson said in an official statement that the Chinese Defense Ministry made "absurd claims" over the Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh and "repeating baseless arguments in this regard does not lend such claims any validity."

On the U.S. standing up for India, Harsh V. Pant, vice president for studies and foreign policy at Observer Research Foundation, a New Delhi-based think tank, said: "It shows how far India-U.S. relations have come."

"Even when it comes to the matter, which has been very sensitive, such as the India China border dispute, the U.S. today is openly standing with India," he told CNBC.

'Renewed US-India ties amid China rise', says President Joe Biden in his final State of the Union Address

09 March 2024, Times of India

WASHINGTON: President Joe Biden delivered a defiant argument for a second term in his State of the Union speech Thursday night, lacing into GOP front-runner Donald Trump for espousing "resentment, revenge and retribution" and for jeopardising freedom at home and abroad.

Revelling in the political moment, Biden fired multiple broadsides at "my predecessor" without ever mentioning Trump by name - 13 times in all - raising his voice repeatedly as he worked to quell voter concerns about his age and job performance while sharpening the contrast with his all-but-certain Nov rival.

The scrappy tone from Biden was a sharp break from his often humdrum daily appearances and was intended to banish doubts about whether the 81-year-old president, the country's oldest ever, is still up to the job.

For 68 minutes in the House chamber, Biden goaded Republicans over their policies on immigration, taxes and more, invited call-and-response banter with fellow Democrats and seemed to relish the fight. "I know I may not look like it, but I've been around a while," Biden deadpanned. "And when you get to my age certain things become clearer than ever before." Noting he was born during WWII and came of political age during the upheaval of the 1960s, Biden declared: "My lifetime has taught me to embrace freedom and democracy. A future based on the core values that have defined America: honesty, decency, dignity, equality. To respect everyone. To give everyone a fair shot. To give hate no safe harbour. Now some other people my age see a different story: an American story of resentment, revenge, and retribution. That's not me."

The president linked Trump's praise for those who overran the Capitol in an attempt to subvert the 2020 election with antidemocratic threats abroad. "Freedom and democracy are under attack both at home and overseas at the very same time," Biden said as he appealed for Congress to support Ukraine's efforts to defend itself against Russia. "History is watching." Biden directly referenced the Jan. 6, 2021, insurrection at the Capitol, calling out those who have played it down. "My predecessor - and some of you here - seek to bury the truth about Jan 6 - I will not do that," Biden said. "This is a moment to speak the truth and to bury the lies. Here's a simple truth. You can't love your country only when you win."

Taking a victory lap in selling his legislative accomplishments, including funding to bolster manufacturing of computer chips nationwide, Biden veered from his prepared script to take a dig at Republicans who voted against such policies but nonetheless take credit for them back home. "If any of you don't want that money in your districts," Biden said, "just let me know."

Biden also engaged in a loud call and response with lawmakers as he rhetorically questioned whether the tax code was fair and whether billionaires and corporations need "another $2 trillion in tax breaks," as he charged Republicans want. Biden also highlighted his efforts to fight "shrinkflation" and so-called "junk fees" on services. Neither is a prime driver of inflation, but the White House hoped to show consumers that Biden is fighting for them.

US has a wrong perception of China, says foreign minister

07 March 2024, Reuters

The U.S. is clinging to wrong perceptions of China and has yet to fulfill its "promises" despite some progress since presidents Joe Biden and Xi Jinping met last November, China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi said on Thursday.

Speaking at a news conference on the sidelines of an annual parliament meeting in Beijing, Wang said exchanges between both countries can only continue if both sides respect and recognize their differences.

"It has to be pointed out that the U.S. side's erroneous perception of China continues, and the promises it has made have not really been fulfilled," Wang said at the National People's Congress.

"The methods of suppressing China are constantly being renewed, and the list of unilateral sanctions is constantly being extended," he said.

The "crimes" the U.S. wanted to add to the list China had supposedly committed "have reached an unbelievable level," Wang said.

Still, Biden had made it clear the U.S. would not seek a new Cold War nor seek to change the Chinese system or back Taiwan's independence, Wang said.

In an annual and wide-ranging discussion, Wang struck a relatively measured tone as he also covered relations with Russia and the Ukraine conflict, Europe, China's stuttering economy and artificial intelligence.

Wang said China would submit a draft resolution on AI to the United Nations General Assembly, reflecting the need for both development and security.

"AI should always be under the control of human beings," he said.

Tensions between the two superpowers have slightly eased since Biden and Xi staged their landmark summit in San Francisco last November, but they remain in an uneasy detente ahead of the U.S. election this year which could see Republican China hawk Donald Trump return to the White House.

Washington has repeatedly stated its desire to put a floor under the relationship after it spiralled to its worst in decades last year over issues including Taiwan, tech competition, trade and an alleged Chinese spy balloon shot down by the U.S. off its east coast.

China alleges the U.S. is trying to contain and suppress its high-tech development and industrial policy, while both militaries eye each other closely amid increased deployments across East Asia.

"So we urge the U.S. to understand the historical development trend, objectively and rationally look at China's development (and) actively and pragmatically carry out interactions with China."

Beijing also faces ongoing geopolitical confrontations on multiple fronts, including with Europe on trade and the Ukraine war, Japan across a variety of issues, as well as the Philippines over the South China Sea, a regional hotbed of competing territorial claims.

Wang said China is willing to work with Russia to foster new drivers of cooperation and consolidate friendship.

China and Russia had declared a "no limits" partnership in February 2022 when Putin visited Beijing just days before he sent tens of thousands of troops into Ukraine, triggering the deadliest land war in Europe since World War Two.

Wang also announced an expansion of its visa-free travel scheme, saying that China will offer visa-free travel to nationals from Switzerland, Ireland, Hungary, Austria, Belgium and Luxembourg from March 14.

China currently has a mutual visa waiver agreement with 22 countries, including most recently Thailand, Singapore and Malaysia.

China has also unilaterally allowed visa-free entry for citizens from nations such as Germany, France, Spain, the Netherlands and Italy for 15 days. Those five European nations have yet to reciprocate with a similar arrangement for Chinese citizens.

China Hopes For Better Relations Regardless Of US Election Outcome

04 March 2024, NDTV World

"No matter who becomes the president, we hope that the United States can work in the same direction with China" Lou said.

China said Monday it hopes relations with the United States can improve whoever wins the presidential election in November.

Beijing and Washington have clashed in recent years on flashpoint issues from technology and trade to human rights, as well as over Taiwan and competing claims in the South China Sea.

Americans go to the polls this November in an election that will likely pit former leader Donald Trump against the sitting President Joe Biden for the keys to the White House.

"You mentioned the US presidential election, it is an internal affair of the United States," parliament spokesman Lou Qinjian told a press conference in response to a question about the vote.

"No matter who becomes the president, we hope that the United States can work in the same direction with China and work for a stable, healthy and sustainable China-US relationship," Lou said.

"To stabilise and improve China-US relations is something that everyone follows closely and expects to see, he said, adding: "China's position has been consistent.

U.S. allegation of 'forced labor' in Xinjiang is huge lie: Foreign Ministry

28 February 2024, ECNS

The allegation of "forced labor" in Northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region is a huge lie, the Chinese Foreign Ministry said on Tuesday, urging the U.S. to immediately stop smearing China, stop intervening in China's internal affairs, and stop politicizing and weaponizing trade issues.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning made the remarks at a regular press briefing in Beijing, responding to media reports saying that the U.S. Department of Homeland Security is intensifying scrutiny of supply chains of American solar companies as the Biden administration mulls to tighten a ban on products assembled in Xinjiang.

The Chinese side has repeatedly pointed out that the allegation of "forced labor" in Xinjiang is a huge lie. The U.S. uses the so-called "forced labor" issue, which does not exist in Xinjiang, which often results in "forced unemployment" in Xinjiang, Mao said.

U.S.' move has severely undermined the basic human rights of the people of all ethnic groups in Xinjiang, violated international trade rules and disrupted international industrial and supply chains, the spokesperson said.

Mao said the U.S. must immediately stop smearing China, stop intervening in China's internal affairs under the pretext of human rights, and stop politicizing and weaponizing trade issues.

China disappointed over US veto on Israel-Hamas ceasefire vote

21 February 2024, Deccan Herald

China expressed "strong disappointment" over the United States blocking a draft United Nations Security Council resolution on the Israel-Hamas war calling for an immediate humanitarian ceasefire, Xinhua said on Wednesday, citing its UN representative Zhang Jun.

The United States on Tuesday vetoed for the third time a draft United Nations Security Council (UNSC) resolution, blocking a demand for an immediate humanitarian ceasefire as it instead pushes the 15-member body towards a rival draft that calls for a temporary ceasefire linked to the release of hostages held by Hamas.

The US has said the draft resolution put forward by Algeria could jeopardize "sensitive negotiations" between US, Egypt, Israel and Qatar aimed at brokering a pause in fighting and securing the release of hostages.

"China expresses its strong disappointment at and dissatisfaction with the US veto," Xinhua said, citing Zhang who urged the UNSC to push for a ceasefire calling it a "moral obligation that the council cannot shy away from".

"The US veto sends a wrong message, pushing the situation in Gaza into a more dangerous one," said Zhang, adding that objection to ceasefire in Gaza is "nothing different from giving the green light to the continued slaughter".

Zhang said the spillover of the conflict is destabilising the Middle East region, raising risks of a wider war.

"Only by extinguishing the flames of war in Gaza can the world prevent the fires of hell from engulfing the entire region," Xinhua cited him as saying.

'Decoupling from China will only backfire on US itself,' Wang Yi holds 'frank' talk with Antony Blinken

18 February 2024, LiveMint

Washington should lift sanctions on Chinese companies and individuals, and that attempts to decouple from China would only hurt the United States, China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi told U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken.

The United States should lift the sanctions and not harm China's legitimate development rights, Wang told Blinken on Friday on the sidelines of a Munich security conference, according to a statement from China's foreign ministry.

Washington has imposed sanctions on various Chinese companies that it accuses of working with China's military despite denials from the firms. U.S. sanctions have also been imposed on individuals and entities over alleged human rights abuses in the Chinese region of Xinjiang.

Sino-U.S. relations have shown signs of improvement in recent months as both sides took steps to re-establish channels of communication after ties between the two global superpowers sank to their lowest levels in decades.

But many points of friction remain.

The Biden administration has imposed bans on the sale of certain technologies to Chinese companies, citing national security risks. China has accused Washington of "weaponising" economic and trade issues.

"Making 'de-risking' into 'de-China', and building 'small yards and high walls' and seeking 'decoupling from China'" will only backfire on the U.S. itself, Wang told Blinken.

The exchanges between the two men were "frank, substantial and constructive", the ministry said in the statement released on Saturday.

Both sides exchanged views on regional issues including the Ukraine crisis and the Korean Peninsula, the statement said, without giving further details.

It added the Korean Peninsula envoys of both sides will "stay in touch".

Wang also reiterated that the United States should abide by the one-China principle, if it truly wanted stability in the Taiwan Strait.

"There is only one China in the world, and Taiwan is part of China's territory, and that is the real status quo in the Taiwan issue," Wang said.

China regards Taiwan as part of its territory. But Taiwan strongly objects to China's sovereignty claims and says only the island's people can decide their future.

U.S. President Joe Biden has said the United States does not support the independence of Taiwan. The United States does, however, maintain unofficial relations with the democratically governed island and remains its most important backer and arms supplier.

China and the U.S. have made some progress in bilateral relations since Chinese President Xi Jinping held talks with Biden in November, where they reached agreements covering fentanyl, military communications and artificial intelligence on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit.

China and the U.S. held their first joint meeting of a working group on fentanyl precursor chemicals in Beijing in late January and China's financial officials hosted U.S. Treasury officials earlier this month.

Blinken and Wang discussed exchanges "at all levels" between the two countries in the next stage, and agreed to maintain dialogue in all areas, according to the Chinese foreign ministry statement.

Top diplomats from US, China hold 'constructive' talks on issues dividing them

16 February 2024, Seattle Times

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Top diplomats from the U.S. and China on Friday held a "candid and constructive" discussion on issues vexing their strained relations over Taiwan, the situation in the South China Sea, Russia's war against Ukraine and synthetic opioids, the State Department said.

The meeting between U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi on the sidelines of the Munich Security Conference marked the latest and highest-level meeting between the two sides since U.S. President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping held talks late last year in California.

State Department spokesman Matthew Miller said Blinken emphasized the importance of maintaining peace in the Taiwan Strait as well as expanding on nascent counternarcotics efforts. Blinken also raised concerns about China's support for Russia's defense industrial base that Washington sees as helping Moscow's military operations against Ukraine.

"The two sides had a candid and constructive discussion on a range of bilateral, regional and global issues as part of ongoing efforts to maintain open lines of communication and responsibly manage competition in the relationship," Miller said. China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said Wang called on the U.S. to remove sanctions against Chinese companies and individuals.

Wang emphasized that Washington's policy of "de-risking" economically from Beijing "has become 'de-Sinicizing,' 'building a tall fence' and 'de-coupling from China'" and "will come back to bite the U.S. itself," according to a Ministry readout Saturday morning.

He also called on the U.S. to stop searches of Chinese nationals. Recently, Chinese state media published reports of Chinese citizens being searched at the U.S. border.

In one prominent case, a group of students led by their professor, Xie Tao from Beijing Foreign Studies University, were interrogated for three hours upon arriving at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport, according to Xinhua. Xie is the dean of the School of International Relations and Diplomacy at the University.

Wang affirmed that cooperation to combat the spread of fentanyl was going "positively" and would continue, as well as the agreement to keep military-to-military communications. Both sides also discussed the ongoing Israel-Hamas war and the war in Ukraine.

Blinken "reiterated that the United States will stand up for our interests and values and those of our allies and partners," Miller said, adding that the current situations in the Middle East and with North Korea had also been topics of conversation.

"Both sides recognized the importance of maintaining open lines of communication between the United States and (China) across a range of strategic issues, including consultations and high-level meetings in key areas in the coming months," he said.

Indonesia's presidential election has high stakes for US and China and their rivalry

14 February 2024, AP News

JAKARTA, Indonesia (AP) — When Indonesians cast their votes on Wednesday for a new president in one of the world's biggest elections, the stakes will also be high for the United States and China and their mounting rivalry in the region.

The Southeast Asian nation is a key battleground economically and politically in a region where the global powers have long been on a collision course over Taiwan, human rights, U.S. military deployments and Beijing's aggressive actions in disputed waters, including the South China Sea.

Outgoing President Joko Widodo's foreign policy has avoided criticizing either Beijing or Washington, but also rejected alignment with either power. The delicate balancing act has paved the way for substantial Chinese trade and investment for Indonesia, including a $7.3 billion high-speed railway that was largely funded by China, while Jakarta has also boosted defense ties and intensified military exercises with the U.S.

These policies would likely continue if the election is won by the apparent front-runner Prabowo Subianto, the current defense minister whose vice presidential running mate is Widodo's eldest son, according to analysts.

"The problem for great powers, however, is that Jakarta is assiduously non-aligned and almost certainly will remain as such regardless of who wins," said Derek Grossman, a senior defense analyst at Rand Corp., a U.S.-based think tank.

IRFBA Chair's Statement on Tibetan Buddhism and Tibetan religious prisoners of conscience the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, writer Go Sherab Gyatso, and separation of Tibetan children from their heritage and language

09 February 2024, U.S. Department of State

IRFBA Chair's Statement on Tibetan Buddhism and Tibetan religious prisoners of conscience the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, writer Go Sherab Gyatso, and separation of Tibetan children from their heritage and language

As the Chair of the International Religious Freedom or Belief Alliance, I appreciate the contribution of Tibetan Buddhism to a deep understanding of seemingly self-evident concepts such as love, compassion and meditation. Tibetan Buddhism has played an important role in the history of the region and continues to have a transformative power in Tibetan society, as well as a positive influence on neighbouring countries and many individuals around the globe.

I express my grave concern for the ongoing enforced disappearance of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, whose whereabouts and well-being in the People's Republic of China (PRC) have been unknown for nearly 30 years.

PRC authorities abducted Gedhun Choekyi Nyima in 1995 when he was six years old and just days after His Holiness the Dalai Lama recognized him as the 11th Panchen Lama. In response, the PRC installed its own Panchen Lama and continues attempts to compel Tibetan Buddhists to pledge allegiance to the government-selected individual.

I am concerned that PRC authorities have denied Gedhun Choekyi Nyima a lifetime of being able to freely practice his faith in a manner of his choosing. Further, I find the lack of independent access to his whereabouts, the seeming restrictions on his freedom of movement, and the limited information about him spanning nearly three decades highly troubling.

Gedhun Choekyi Nyima is one among many Tibetans whom PRC authorities have silenced or oppressed for expressions of their beliefs, culture, language, and traditions. This includes detaining Tibetans for possessing images of the Dalai Lama, such as Go Sherab Gyatso, a Tibetan Buddhist monk, writer, educator and public intellectual currently sentenced to 10 years in prison for his peaceful advocacy and whom authorities previously detained for reportedly possessing and displaying a portrait of the Dalai Lama.
