"China cannot handle unpredictability. So they don't know when His Holiness the Dalai Lama will talk about emanation, which means choosing somebody before one's own demise. Or reincarnation. That's finding a new body in the next life". Tibet's Sikyong or political head, Penpa Tsering says in an exclusive 'The Gist' interview with StratNews Global's Amitabh P. Ravi. "Sometimes when he's asked whether it could be a woman, he says, why not? So all options are very open. And one thing, the Chinese cannot handle is unpredictability. So I think His Holiness is also being very strategic about his approach. But we can be very, very sure that he and he alone will be responsible for his succession. But he will definitely leave signs and indications," the leader elected by Tibetans outside their country says.

India's Tibet Policy

“Everybody would love to hear something from the Indian government. But I think it is taken for granted from our side too, that India is concerned, India has a stake in this. Suppose the next Dalai Lama is born in India. That makes it more relevant for India. So, I’m sure the Indian authorities are really thinking about and working on all this. And when and what they say is something for them to decide,” Penpa Tsering adds in this Tibet Sikyong Exclusive.

The Sikyong Also Discusses:

- The ‘Resolve Tibet’ Act that U.S. President Joe Biden has signed into law.
- Its overall ramifications and the next steps planned.
- Whether India’s Tibet policy needs to be recalibrated.
- Calls for renaming the Line of Actual Control (LAC) the Tibet border.
- Ways to counter the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) changing names of places in Tibet and India.
- The Tibetan government-in-exile’s plans for a detailed historical map.
- How to bring the CCP “to its knees”.
- The Central Tibetan Administration’s position on Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh.
- Tibetans under Indian military command in the Special Frontier Force (SFF) and Vikas battalions.
- The Dalai Lama’s middle way and dual polarity.
- Non-violence and the possibility of armed struggle.
- Back-channel talks in a third country.
- When the Dalai Lama will be back in India after recovering from knee surgery.
- And the succession issue and why Xi Jinping can’t handle the unpredictability.

MPs re-launch Tibet group | Gao supports Tibetan people’s rights

10 August 2024, Arunachal Observer

The All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT), first set up in 1970, was re-launched in new Indian Parliament on Wednesday following after the 2024 general elections as a delegation of Tibetan Parliament in Exile (TPiE) lobbied during ongoing session of the Parliament.

Odisha’s BJP MP Bhartruhari Mahtab, who served as the pro-tem speaker of current 18th Lok Sabha is the group’s convenor while Arunachal Pradesh BJP MP Tapir Gao is co-convenor, Central Tibetan Administration posted on its Tibet.net website.

Gao expressing his support for Tibetan people’s rights to self-determination, said resumption of dialogue between China and envoys of His Holiness the Dalai Lama on the basis of the latter’s middle way proposal, and for countering of China’s false narrative on Tibet. He has called on China to immediately release all Tibetan political prisoners. Mehtab could not attend due to some unavoidable circumstance, Gao added. The re-launch was announced during a dinner hosted by the TPiE and India Tibet Coordination Office (ITCO) here. Other MPs present were Sujeet Kumar (Rajya Sabha, BJD), and former APIPFT convener Manoj Tigga (BJP MP, West Bengal); Amarsing Tisso (BJP MP, Assam); Joyanta Basumatary (MP, United People’s Party Libera, Assam); Phangnon Konyak (Rajya Sabha, BJP, Nagaland); Birendra Prasad Baishya (Rajya Sabha, Asom Gana Parishad, Assam); Jagannath Sarkar (MP, BJP, West Bengal); Angomcha Bimol Akoijam (MP, INC, Manipur); Indra Hang Subba (MP, Sikkim Krantikari Morcha, Sikkim); Pradyut Bordoloi (MP, INC, Assam); Phani Bhusan Choudhury (MP, Asom Gana Parishad, Assam), Mohammad Haneefa (MP, Independent, Ladakh), Maneka Gandhi (former MP, BJP), Dr Pankaj Pushkar (Rajiv Gandhi Foundation Legislative Support Group senior fellow-cum-former Delhi Assembly MLA).

The TPiE members, who attended, also included Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, delegation members Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tsetan, Lopon Thupten Gyaltsen, Tsaneytsang Dhondup Tashi, Geshe Ngaba Gangri, Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen, and Tsering Yangchen.

The re-launching of APIPFT is relevant after the US Congress recently passed the Promoting a Resolution to Tibet-China Dispute Act also known as Resolve Tibet Act. This legislation aims to promote a peaceful resolution to the Tibet-China dispute according to international law and the United Nations (UN) Charter through peaceful dialogue without preconditions.

Moreover this would also strengthen the efforts of Core Group for Tibetan Cause-India (CGTC-I) with former MP R K Khrimy as convenor and Tibet Support Group of Arunachal Pradesh president Tarh Tarak and secretary general Nima Sangey for honourable return of Tibetans living across the world to their motherland to lead a decent life free from coercion by China.

Indo-Tibetan support group declares 2025 as ‘Year of Compassion’ for Dalai Lama’s 90th Birthday

10 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The Bharat-Tibet Sahayog Manch’s (BTSM) national council meeting China’s aggressive policies in Tibet and expansionist ambitions against India and declared 2025 as ‘Year of Compassion’ honouring Dalai Lama’s 90th Birthday.

The meeting held on 3 and 4 August in Sonapat, Haryana had a total of 267 members from 24 states featured the adoption of five resolutions addressing issues concerning Tibet and Sino-Indian relations. Minister of Security of the exile Tibetan government, Gyari Dolma attended the meeting as the chief guest. During the meeting, BTSM declared the year 2025 as the Karuna Varsh (Year of Compassion), in celebration of the 90th birthday of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Recognised globally as a symbol of peace, His Holiness the Dalai Lama's birthday will be marked by year-long celebrations promoting peace, non-violence, brotherhood, and love. The group acknowledged its commitment to forming a committee to organise these celebrations, engaging communities across India and the world.

MP Indresh Kumar, the patron of Bharat Tibbat Sahyog Manch said that the ongoing sinicisation in Tibet such as the recent closure of the Renounced Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling School in Golog is a clear motive of China to eradicate Tibet and its unique identity. "What kind of humanity is it that China is eradicating Tibetan identity from Tibet, except for a few thousand of them in the rest of the world". He further stated that "BTSM condemned China's actions aimed at eliminating the Tibetan race through a systematic campaign of sinicization. BTSM firmly believes that China is engaged in a conspiracy to erase Tibetan culture and identity", he said.

National working president of BTSM Harjit Singh Grewal stated "We must Keep moving, keep talking about these things, keep making programs, with other groups, and new groups. We will be blessed because our movement is for the injustice faced by Tibetans from China. For the protection of India, we must continue doing it".

The Bharat-Tibet Sahayog Manch (BTSM) is a pan-Indian Tibet support group that was founded in 1998. Over the past 26 years, BTSM has grown to establish branches across India, becoming one of the largest Tibet support groups in the country. On Wednesday another Indian support group for Tibet, the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet (APIPFT), was successfully revived. The APIPFT appointed Shri Bhartruhari Mahtab, the pro-tem Speaker of the 18th Lok Sabha and Member of Parliament from the BJP, as its Convener. Shri Tapir Gao, also a BJP MP, was appointed as the Co-convener in the capital of India New Delhi.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Advocates Tibet, Meets Key Indian Leaders

09 August 2024, CTA

A Tibetan parliamentary delegation led by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, continued their Tibet outreach campaign on their fourth day of the Tibet advocacy campaign meeting key Indian leaders.

They held meetings with Shri. Sujeet Kumar, Rajya Sabha MP; Shri Kethi Reddy Suresh Reddy, Lok Sabha MP; Shri Mohammad Nisar, General Secretary of Janata Dal (United); and Shri Surendra Kumar, Co- convener of Core Group for Tibetan Cause.

The first group of the Tibetan parliamentary delegation led by Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel and consisting of MP Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tseten and MP Tsaneytsang Dhondup Tashi met with Shri Sujeet Kumar, Rajya Sabha MP. They expressed their heartfelt gratitude to the MP for his role as the convener of the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet for the last three years and his valuable contribution to the Tibetan cause. They presented him with a 12-point appeal letter and sought his continued support. Shri Kumar affirmed his steadfast commitment to the Tibetan cause.

Thereafter, the group met with Shri Mohammad Nisar, National Secretary, Janata Dal (United). They presented him with the 12-point appeal letter outlining the critical situation in Tibet. Shri Nisar, who has a keen interest in Buddhism and is aware of the Sino-Tibetan conflict, acknowledged the historical support of JDU leaders like Shri George Fernandes and noted that many current leaders of JDU also support Tibet.

The second group consisting of MP Lupon Thupten Gyaltsen, MP Geshe Gangri, MP Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen, and MP Tsering Yangchen met with Shri Kethi Reddy Suresh Reddy (Rajya Sabha MP, Bharat Rashtra Samithi, Telangana).

They briefed him about the critical situation in Tibet including the forced placement of children as young as six in boarding schools with the recent closure of Tibetan institutions such as the Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling (Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational School) in Golok. They presented him with the 12- point appeal letter, highlighted the tragic self- immolations by 157 Tibetans protesting China's policies, and urged him to join the All Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet.

Throughout their advocacy campaign, the delegation also met with other key Indian leaders, emphasising the urgency of the situation in Tibet and the aspirations of the Tibetan people. Indian leaders expressed their support and solidarity with Tibetans. During the advocacy campaign, the delegation was accompanied by Tashi Dekyi, Acting Coordinator of India Tibet Coordination Office; Tenzin Paljor and Tenzin Sherab, staff of Tibetan parliamentary secretariat; and Phuntsok Gyatso, Delhi based coordinator of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile.

American Bar Association urges rights violations investigation in Tibet in first stand on the issue

08 August 2024, Tibetan Review

In what has been termed as a landmark development, the American Bar Association (ABA) has on Aug 5 adopted a resolution urging the United States and the United Nations to investigate human rights violations in Tibet. The resolution came less than a month after US President Joe Biden signed the 'Resolve Tibet Act', which calls China's occupation of Tibet illegal under international law, recognizes the Tibetan people's right to self-determination, and mandates US support for a negotiated settlement of the issue.

The resolution, passed at the ABA's Annual General Meeting in Chicago, marks the first time the organization has taken a stance on the issue of Tibet, and "recommends measures to address ongoing atrocity crimes in Tibet", noted the jurist.org Aug 7. In particular, the resolution calls on the US Department of State's Office of Global Criminal Justice to investigate and publish updated findings on the question of genocide, crimes against humanity, and other human rights violations in Tibet. It also urges the UN Human Rights Council, Geneva, to appoint a special rapporteur on the situation concerning Tibet and to include the situation of Tibet on its agenda.

The ABA House of Delegates, the association's policymaking body, met Aug. 5-6 to conclude the 2024 Annual Meeting in Chicago. (Photo courtesy: ABA)

The resolution was proposed by the International Law Section (ILS) of the ABA and received unanimous support from the delegates at the meeting. Sara Sandford, Attorney and former Chair of the ILS, stated that "the American Bar Association stood up for the rule of law and protection of human rights" by adopting the resolution, the report said.

Regina M Paulose, an international criminal law attorney and Co-Chair of the International Criminal Law Committee in ILS, has welcomed the news and expressed hope for future actions by the ABA in promoting dialogue and conversations about the rule of law, justice, and accountability related to Tibet. She has said:

"The situation in Tibet has been ignored for far too long despite credible and well documented reports indicating the commission of international crimes. The steps taken in this resolution should be implemented by the international community at large – not just the United States; ensuring accountability for Tibet in the wake of PRC's actions, upholding human rights, religious liberty, cultural heritage, and ensure international court rulings are adhered to."

China must end its persecution of Tibetan human rights defender Tsering Tso

08 August 2024, TCHRD

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy strongly condemns the relentless persecution of Tibetan human rights defender Tsering Tso, who was arbitrarily arrested and subjected to a 10-day "administrative detention" by the local police in Yushu Prefecture.

Tsering Tso, a tour guide by profession, was detained for the fourth time in five years by the Chinese authorities for exposing Chinese authorities racial discrimination practices against two Tibetan monks on their way to pilgrimage in Drachen (Ch: Bachen) County, Nagchu (Ch: Naqu) Prefecture, Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). On the evening of 10 June, at approximately 5 pm local time, while escorting a group of monks on a pilgrimage tour to Lhasa and Tsari, local police in Gomri Township, Drachen County, interrupted their journey. The police stated that the monks needed to obtain prior permission from both the Monastery Management Committee and the local government for their travel. Later that night, the local police took the two monks, including Thutop Namgyal and another monk (name withheld for security reasons), into custody and subjected them to rigorous interrogation.

Upon learning of their arrest, Tsering Tso contacted the police, pointing out how Chinese tourists required no prior permission while Tibetan monks faced restrictions and mistreatment over permit requirements. She demanded the authorities for the immediate release of the two monks, asserting that their detention by Drachen County police was unlawful and in violation of China's law and domestic policies. Initially, the Drachen County police denied detaining the monks but later admitted to taking them for “interrogation”, suggesting “cooperation” would expedite their release.

In a recorded conversation with the local police, Tsering Tso criticised the police’s misuse of powers for harassing Tibetan pilgrims, stating that such actions contravened Xi Jinping’s policies on ethnic unity.

Tsering can be heard saying, “As law-abiding citizens of China, Tibetans should have the same rights as Han Chinese. President Xi Jinping and the government always profess ethnic unity, but why am I facing this issue? What can I do now? Will you [the local police] not implement President Xi’s policies?” demanding an end to the Drachen County authorities’ abuse of power. The police responded with vague excuses, stating that different departments had different regulations. After three hours of urging the local authorities, the monks were eventually released around 3 am.

Tso later shared the entire recordings of the event on social media, exposing Drachen County police’s discriminatory practices and illegal detention of the two monks. ‘Subsequently, upon her return to her hometown in Yushu Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, she was detained on 29 June on charges of “endangering social stability” and was later released on 8 July after ten days in administrative detention. This is the fourth time Tso has been detained for criticising the Chinese government’s discriminatory policies and advocating for equal and fair treatment of Tibetans inside Tibet.

In December last year, Drachen County police detained Tsering Tso for fifteen days, accusing her of refusing to cooperate with a traffic investigation and spreading false information online.

In October, Tsering Tso posted short videos on social media platforms, including WeChat and Douyin, exposing the Chinese government’s discriminatory practices against Tibetans. Her videos highlighted how officials from various departments were harassing Tibetan businesses in Tibet, attempting to force their closure by leaving business owners with no option but to comply.

As a result, the Yushu Public Security Bureau officers sentenced her to 15 days of administrative detention on charges of ‘picking quarrels and provoking troubles,’ an allegation frequently levied against human rights defenders, minority groups, critics, and dissenters to compel conformity with the official narrative and to stifle questioning and dissent by deterring criticism of government policies. Whether at the central or local level, the party-state exercises its authority to define and enforce these trumped-up charges, categorising any deviation from the official stance as a violation.

Similarly, on the evening of 12 November 2020, Tsering Tso was forcibly detained from her Xining home by ten officers and taken to the Trikha (Ch: Guide) County detention centre. She was subsequently subjected to a 10-day administrative detention from 13 to 23 November and imposed a monetary fine of Yuan 1000. In addition to surviving only on steamed buns and boiled water during her detention, she was subjected to ill-treatment and intimidation, which the detention officers employed to coerce her into abandoning her vocal advocacy for democracy and the rule of law.

In 2017, while advocating for the legal right of local Tibetans to apply for passports in Yushu Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Tsering Tso was detained and interrogated by the Public Security Bureau (PSB) of Yushu Prefecture. She was brutally assaulted by an officer named Jamga from the Immigration Administration Division of the Yushu PSB, who kicked her in the head, face, chest, and abdomen. Although doctors from both the provincial and prefectural PSBs concluded that she had not sustained significant injuries, despite contrary reports from her husband and friends about the severity of her condition, the authorities fabricated a narrative to deflect responsibility. They claimed that the attack was perpetrated by ordinary civilians under the influence of alcohol, thereby denying her access to justice.

Tsering Tso is a native of Trika (Ch: Guide) County in Tsoelho (Ch: Hainan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture but works and lives in Yushu City. She operates the Tibet World Tours and Travel, specialising in organising tours in various regions, including Lhasa City, Ngari, and other parts of Tibet, as well as destinations in other parts of the world.

Tsering Tso has consistently advocated for equal rights for Tibetans, including freedom of movement as guaranteed by the Chinese Constitution. Instead of addressing her concerns, the Chinese government has repeatedly abused its power by detaining, intimidating, and harassing her.

In its concluding observations following China’s periodic review in 2018, the UN Committee on Racial Discrimination called upon the Chinese government to revise its regulations and practices to ensure non-discriminatory determinations on passport applications and freedom of movement for Tibetans who wish to travel within the Tibet Autonomous Region and abroad. The contradictions between what is purportedly promised in the constitution against actual legal amendments and practices, especially in criminal procedures, reveal a legal system deliberately structured to navigate and manipulate domestic and international scrutiny, evading accountability for egregious human rights abuses.

Arbitrary arrests and detention are some of the pressing human rights issues that undermine the criminal justice system in China. Thousands are incarcerated outside the formal criminal process without access to legal rights and punished for up to 15 days in jail at mercy to police discretion. We call on the Chinese government to uphold the principles of equality and non-discrimination enshrined in its constitution, immediately abolish the discriminatory passport regulations, and allow Tibetans the right to movement and access pilgrimage sites in Tibet.

Tibetan athlete fails to medal in her latest Olympics but is 'happy'

07 August 2024, RFA, Jeff Wang

Choeying Kyi, the only Tibetan ever to win a gold medal, was cheered on by Tibetans around the world.

Choeying Kyi and her partner in the race walk mixed relay marathon finished well outside of medal contention on Wednesday, a result she immediately described as "not good, not good, not good!"

But after having a moment to catch her breath, the lone Tibetan athlete at the 2024 Paris Olympics and the only Tibetan ever to win gold said that ultimately she had accomplished something of greater consequence.

"I have participated in four Olympic Games, and I was the only Tibetan representative in all four of them," Kyi told reporters after completing the race.

"I have persisted for so long because I really want to influence some children. I see more and more Tibetan athletes, and I feel very happy. I think it's all worth it. This cannot be proven by a medal."

Choeying Kyi speaks to reporters after competing in the race walk mixed relay marathon at the 2024 Summer Olympics, Aug. 7, 2024, in Paris.

Kyi and her teammate, He Xianghong, finished 14th in the 42.2-kilometers (26.2 miles) mixed team relay, which made its Olympic debut in Paris on Wednesday. They were among the 25 teams that competed in four roughly 10-km stages with the competitors – man, woman, man, woman – alternating in the race.

He Xianghong faced a three-minute penalty at the 29-km mark for committing three violations of the game's rules, which caused the team's ranking to drop sharply.

Kyi and He Xianghong finished the race in 2 hours, 59 minutes and 13 seconds, nearly 10 minutes behind the Spanish team that won but ahead of the other Chinese team that was competing.

Kyi – known as Qieyang Shijie in Chinese – said she knew the penalty would cost her team a medal but that she still pushed hard over her last leg.

"The main thing is to show the spirit of the Chinese team," she told reporters.

Kyi and He Xianghong won the mixed team's 35-km race walk at the 19th Asian Games in Hangzhou, east China's Zhejiang Province, in October 2023.

Mixed emotions

Before the race in Paris, Tibetan netizens, including those inside Tibet, extended well wishes to Kyi, referring to her as the "Snow Princess of the Mountains," "Daughter of the Snowland" and "Pride of the Tibetan Race."

Along the route at the foot of the Eiffel Tower, Tibetan Parisians waved the Tibetan national flag as she raced past and shouted "Choeying Kyi, Go for it!" Afterward, some expressed mixed emotions about the scene.

"As a Tibetan, I was overwhelmed with joy to be able to witness a Tibetan girl taking part in this race at the Paris Olympics," said Tenzin Namgyal, a Paris resident. "But I was also overcome with sadness and a deep hope that one day Tibetan athletes will represent Tibet proudly under the Tibetan national flag. And I pray that such a day would come for Tibetans."

Online, Tibetans expressed similar feelings.

"In sports, it is not important to be the first. It's the joy and pride and inspiration she brought to 6 million Tibetans," Loten Namling, a Tibetan living in Switzerland, wrote on Facebook.

"Even if she had won the gold medal, China would have taken it away from her, but China cannot take away the joy and inspiration she gave to her people! This is a victory more valuable than a gold medal," he said.

Kyi was born in 1990 to humble beginnings in Haiyan County in Haibei Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai province but rose to be among the best in her sport.

She competed in the previous three Olympic Games in London, Rio and Tokyo. In 2012, Kyi originally finished third in the women's 20-km race walk, earning a bronze medal.

But 11 years later she made history when she was awarded the gold after the original first and second-place finishers were disqualified due to doping violations. Kyi also won a silver medal in the 20-km race at the 13th National Games in China in 2017.

"I felt both happy and sad when I heard the news," Kyi wrote on social media upon hearing the news in 2023 that she was an Olympic champion.

"I'm happy because I could be the champion I am in my heart and I could have an Olympic gold medal. But I'm also regretful as I didn't experience what an Olympic gold medalist should have experienced."

"Let bygones be bygones, and I will always try to work hard to get what I want," she added. "Tomorrow is a new beginning and a fresh start. Thank you all for your support and blessings over the years. May you all be healthy, safe and happy."

'Pro-democracy' academic who spied on Tibetans etc for China set for Jan 9 sentencing

07 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Wang Shujun wanted to be seen as a democracy activist with a passion to see his country become a free and open society, but a court in New York City has found that he was wearing that hat only to spy on critics of China, including Tibetans. The 76-year-old Chinese-American academic was convicted Aug 6 for illegally collecting information for Beijing.

A federal jury has found Wang guilty on four counts including acting as a foreign agent without notifying the US attorney general and lying to US authorities following a week-long trial in Brooklyn federal court. He is to be sentenced on Jan 9, 2025 and could be jailed for up to 25 years, reported Reuters and other news agencies Aug 7,

Federal prosecutors had said Wang portrayed himself as a proponent of democracy and fierce opponent of the ruling Communist Party of China (CP) to gain the trust of his targeted groups. His contacts were stated to include Hong Kong pro-democracy activists, supporters of Taiwan declaring independence as well as Uyghur and Tibetan campaign groups.

Prosecutors had accused Wang of interacting with them only for the purpose of spying on their activists and sharing information with China's main intelligence agency, the Ministry of State Security (MSS).

Wang composed emails – styled as "diaries" – that recounted conversations, meetings and plans of various critics of the Chinese government. He saved them as email drafts that Chinese intelligence officials could access and read by signing in with a shared password. He did not send those emails in order to avoid creating a digital trail.

The emails included those that talked about people planning demonstrations during various visits that Chinese President Xi Jinping made to the US.

The indictment said Wang also wrote separate encrypted messages that contained details of upcoming pro-democracy events and plans for him to meet with prominent Hong Kong dissidents.

Wang lived a double life for over a decade. He held himself out as a critic of the Chinese government so that he could build rapport with people who actually opposed it, then betrayed their trust by telling Beijing what they said and planned, prosecutors have said. "The indictment could have been the plot of a spy novel, but the evidence is shockingly real that the defendant was a secret agent for the Chinese government," Brooklyn-based US attorney Breon Peace has said in a statement after the verdict.

Prosecutors have also charged four Chinese intelligence officers who allegedly worked as Wang's handlers. They are all at large and believed to be in China.

Wang was arrested in Mar 2022. He came to New York in 1994 to teach after doing so at a Chinese university and later became a naturalized US citizen. He helped to found the Queens-based Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang Memorial Foundation, named for two CPC leaders who were sympathetic to calls for reform in the 1980s, said the AP Aug 7.

The indictment was part of the US Department of Justice's crackdown in recent years on "transnational repression" by Beijing, referring to its alleged attempts at overseas surveillance and intimidation.

During a series of FBI interviews from 2017 to 2021, Wang initially said he had no contacts with the MSS, but he later acknowledged on videotape that the intelligence agency asked him to gather information on democracy advocates and that he sometimes did, FBI agents testified.

Still, Wang had pleaded not guilty. His lawyers has cast him as someone who was forthcoming with US authorities about activities he saw as innocuous, and they disputed that his communications were truly under Chinese officials' direction or control, the report said.

Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson for the Chinese embassy, has claimed in a statement Aug 6 that he was unaware of the specifics of the Wang case but that China opposed the United States' "slander," "political manipulation" and "malicious fabrication of the so-called 'transnational suppression' narrative and its blatant prosecution of officials from relevant Chinese departments."

Tibet House Japan Starts Three-month Tibetan Language Class

05 August 2024, CTA

The Tibet House Japan, a cultural wing of the Liaison Office of H.H. the Dalai Lama for Japan and East Asia, began its in-person and online three-month language and culture class on 3 August, 2024.

Representative Dr. Tsewang Gyalpo Arya welcomed the participants and thanked them for taking an interest in the Tibetan language. He explained the contents of the class and what they will learn at the end of the class.

Representative Arya introduced the two staff, Tashi Yangzom and Chisa Tselha of the office, who will help take the class. He further said that along with the Tibetan conversation, reading, and writing class, the office will endeavour to enlighten the students on Tibetan religion and culture.

While participants from Tokyo and neighbouring areas will attend the class at the office, others from faraway prefectures will participate online. Some of the participants were repeat students who said they came again to refresh what they had learned earlier. Some elderly participants said that their interest in the Tibetan language was to gain some information on Tibetan religion and culture.

Lower TCV hosts first residential school for overseas Tibetan students

04 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhondup

Lower TCV school, a pioneer school in the exile Tibetan set up based in India celebrated the opening ceremony of the first residential school for Tibetan students from overseas on Friday in a bid to preserve the Tibetan identity and language for children based in the west.

The initiative by Tibetan Children Village for overseas Tibetan children living abroad aims to impart Tibetan language skills and cultural traditions, while simultaneously teaching modern education. At the moment, only students from the fourth to eighth grades are enrolled.

Tibetan children and their parents from overseas at the opening function (Photo/LTCV Facebook)

Only five overseas children ( 3 boys and 2 girls) have arrived in school from the registered eight. The school which was on the verge of closing in 2020 has now 73 students mostly from Arunachal, Tawang and the Himalayan region.

TCV Director Sonam Sichoe said that initially, the aim was to gather around sixty students from abroad. Fifteen students were enrolled earlier but due to visa issues, the numbers further dwindled. He further stated, "It's sad to see only a few children have enrolled on this programme but regardless of the numbers, the school will proceed as planned".

He said, "In Tibet, the Chinese authorities are closing schools and transferring Tibetan children to colonial boarding schools to sinicise the young Tibetan children. The Tibetan children inside Tibet do not have the opportunity and facilities to study the Tibetan language but in exile, we have both facilities and opportunities due to the efforts of His Holiness the 14 Dalai Lama, hence we have to preserve the Tibetan language and culture."

Sichoe further stated that critics of the initiatives say that "this initiative by TCV is to make profits but it's not true the sole aim of this programme is to provide Tibetan education". The fees for overseas students cost US$350 per child per month for tuition, room and board.

Lobsang Sherab from New York, a parent of two children who enrolled in the school, shared his thoughts with Phayul, "The primary reason for bringing my children here is to instil Tibetan character in them. Education can be procured from anywhere, but my hope is to instil kindness and the Tibetan nature in my children. I would be satisfied if my children acquired Tibetan character and language. In foreign countries, it is hard to learn Tibetan ways. There, the children are Tibetan only in name; only their face is Tibetan, but their behaviour and personality are like Westerners, which saddens the heart."

He further explained, "The weekend schools in New York are only gathered on weekends, so the time is very limited, and the children speak English in the classes. There are no substantial results in terms of inculcating Tibetan language, culture, and traditions in the children, which is why I brought my children here. Although my children are not very excited to go to school here, it is up to the parents to decide the future of their children. I have thought for their future, keeping in mind the importance of preserving the Tibetan identity."

In their social media handles, the school expressed excitement and anticipation stating "We are excited to see these students integrate into our community and bring their diverse perspectives and experiences. The entire school is abuzz with anticipation and enthusiasm as we prepare to support them in this new journey. Some students are still yet to report they will soon join here. We wish them the best of luck for their upcoming new session in the new school and hope they find this experience both enriching and memorable”.

Richard Gere helping to produce documentary on Dalai Lama's message of kindness

03 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Hollywood star Richard Gere, possibly the world's most famous lay Tibetan Buddhist as well as Tibet activist, is helping to produce a documentary about the Dalai Lama and his message of peace, reported aussiedlerbote.de Aug 2, citing an interview with the Süddeutsche Zeitung.

Together with producer and director Oren Moverman (58), Gere, 74, will serve as an executive producer for the Swiss documentary “Wisdom of Happiness”.

As stated in the press release, the film will “create a powerful cinematic exploration of the inner thoughts of the Dalai Lama”, the report said.

The documentary is set to be released worldwide in theatres in fall/winter 2024 and aims to be “a philosophical testament of the Dalai Lama on the big screen”. Regarding the potential impact of the documentary, Gere has said, “This is a fine film that can have a great impact on the future.”

Fellow producer Moverman has added: “As a filmmaker, I am deeply grateful for the invitation to participate in this truly unique film that so beautifully translates the message of kindness into the visual language of cinema.”

Gere is the Board Chair of Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet which researches on and advocates for Tibet. He has taken part in lobbying efforts in the US Congress, including hearings, on Tibet.

He remains banned from Oscar ceremonies for speaking up on Tibet while China's ban on his films has greatly affected his Hollywood career.

Sikkim: Tibetan Association hails MP Dorjee Lepcha's statement clarifying border as Tibet's, not China's

02 August 2024, India Today, Sujal Pradhan

The Tibetan Association has expressed its gratitude to Rajya Sabha MP Dorjee Tsering Lepcha for his statement that the border from Arunachal Pradesh to Sikkim is Tibet's, not China's. This statement has brought joy to Tibetans globally and highlighted Tibet's independent status before Chinese occupation.

The various branches of the Tibetan Association has extended gratitude to Rajya Sabha MP, Dorjee Tsering Lepcha for stating that the border from Arunachal Pradesh to Sikkim is the Tibet border and not China border. In a press release, the association comprising Tibetan Freedom Movement; Regional Tibetan Youth Congress, Gangtok (TYC); Regional Tibetan Women Association, Gangtok; Domey Association; Utsang Association; Dokham Chushi Khandruk, on behalf of the entire Tibetan community of Sikkim and Tibetans residing all over the globe, thanked Lepcha for “the immense love, support and for his bold statement.” The Rajya Sabha MP in his statement said, “This border, from Arunachal Pradesh to Sikkim, is approximately 1400 kilometers. We refer to it as the China border. It is not the China border; it is the Tibet border. Because along the entire Line of Actual Control (LAC), there is no China, the entire area is Tibet. Call it the Tibet Border.”

He also stated that it is not the China border, but rather the Tibet border, and we should refer to it as such. “By doing this, the name of the dragon will be erased!” He also demanded that the government refer to this border as the Tibet border instead of the China border. “Whether it is the Army, GREF, BRO, or any agency operating through the Central Government, they should be given directions to not treat it as the China border but as the Tibet border,” he said.

“Your statement has brought so much joy and happiness in the faces of Tibetans residing all over the world. The voices we raise and want the world to know that Tibet was forcefully occupied by the communist Chinese regime and further Tibet was always an independent country,” the members said, further stating, “Sir we wish you long healthy life ahead and success for your future endeavours.”

July

Central Tibetan Administration seeks US action on exiled Tibetans as Chinese repression intensifies

30 July 2024, Take One

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), based in Dharamshala, which represents Tibetans living in exile, highlighted the need for the United States to provide concrete assistance to Tibetans who are already experiencing backlash from the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

In a post on X, the CTA emphasised that while the US Resolve Tibet Act is a significant step in challenging the CCP's attempts to rewrite Tibetan history, it's crucial for the US to support the Tibetan community actively as they face increasing retaliation. The CTB on X said, “The act takes a landmark step in challenging the CCP's historical revisionism. But the US should be prepared to offer concrete support to the Tibetan community, which is already beginning to feel the CCP's retaliation."

The US Resolve Tibet Act is a legislative measure aimed at supporting Tibetans and addressing issues related to Chinese policies in Tibet. The act typically focuses on enhancing US support for the Tibetan people, promoting human rights, and challenging Chinese government actions that are perceived as oppressive or unjust.

In the 1950s, Tibet came under the control of the People's Republic of China (PRC) following a military invasion. This event prompted the Dalai Lama, Tibet's spiritual leader, to flee to India in 1959, where he set up a government in exile. China considers Tibet a fundamental part of its territory and has worked to integrate it into the broader Chinese state. This has involved relocating Han Chinese settlers to Tibet and enforcing strict regulations on Tibetan political and religious practices.

Human rights organisations and Tibetan advocacy groups have raised alarms about various issues in Tibet, including political repression, restrictions on freedom of speech and assembly, arbitrary detentions of activists, and cultural suppression.

Reports also indicate significant environmental damage and resource exploitation in Tibetan areas. On the global stage, Tibet's situation remains a sensitive diplomatic matter, with some countries and international bodies expressing concern over human rights violations and advocating for peaceful dialogue between China and Tibetan representatives to address these issues.

Panel Discussion on 'Forced Closure of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institution: Causes and Impacts'

29 July 2024, CTA

The Tibet Policy Institute, a research center affiliated with the Central Tibetan Administration, hosted a panel discussion titled "Forced Closure of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institute: Causes and Impacts" this morning at 10 a.m. in the TPI Hall.

The event featured distinguished panellists, including Pema Tso, Member of the Tibetan Parliament and Chief Editor of Tibet Times; Dawa Tsering, Director of the Tibet Policy Institute, CTA; and Shede Dawa, Researcher at Tibet Watch and former student of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institute.

TPI's Deputy Director, Zamlha Tempa Gyaltsen, moderated the discussion. He provided an overview of the subject matter and introduced the topic. He brought up 'The Last Class,' a story by Alphonse Daudet, exploring different aspects of French nationalism and identity. The protagonist was a young boy attending his last French class, drawing parallels to the situation of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institute.

The panel discussion commenced with poignant opening remarks from each panellist, delving into the recent 'Forced Closure of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institute (Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational High School in Golog) in Tibet' and its multifaceted implications within their respective domains of expertise.

Parliamentarian Pema Tso highlighted the challenges and restrictions Ragya Sherig Norling faced in its educational endeavours. She first received the news on the morning of 14 July 2024, at 5:35 a.m. via mobile, learning that the school had been closed two hours earlier and that all students were being sent home. Following this, Tibetans inside and outside Tibet started writing articles about the closure and sharing videos of students crying on the school grounds. This news spread across almost all social media platforms, raising questions among Tibetans about the reason behind the closure. She stated, "Between 1994 and 2021, more than 2,200 students graduated from this institution, and 253 were former staff members. As of 2021, this year in 2024, more than 120 students have graduated from the same institute." She also provided a brief history of the founder of Jigme Ragya Sherig School, Gen Jigme Gyaltsen.

Shede Dawa, a former student of Ragya Sherig Norling Educational Institute, shared his experiences and memories from his school days. He also discussed the history of the school's founder, Gen Jigme Gyaltsen. He recalled the latter emphasising the importance of the Tibetan language for the Tibetan people, asserting that without their own language, they would fall behind in society. He remarked that Gen Jigme wasn't someone of high social status or wealth who established the university but rather a humble monk from a nomadic region who made it possible through immense effort and dedication to the Tibetan language.

In his account of being a student at the institute, Shide Dawa shared that he initially had no interest in Tibetan. However, under the educational guidance of Gen Jigme Gyaltsen, he was eventually able to enroll in the institute for further studies. "Gen Jigme Gyaltsen consistently emphasised that preserving the Tibetan language and writing was crucial for the survival of the Tibetan people." He further added that Gen Jigme used to inspire students by saying that just as a Chinese or English person must know their language first, so must Tibetans. His inspiring words and active participation in every co-curricular activity motivated the students to embrace their heritage and language.

Geshe Akuk Tseten, a member of the Tibetan Parliament and a special guest on the panel, highlighted the significance of the school for Tibetans both inside and outside Tibet. He explained that the Chinese government shut down the school because they saw it as a threat. He also mentioned that Jigme Gyaltsen, a student of the Panchen Lama, sold his mother's jewellery to establish the school. Recognizing his noble intention, some monks assisted him without any compensation. He noted that Rejia Sherab Ling was not only a center for Tibetan language studies but also for logic and contemporary education.

Tenzin Lekshey, the spokesman and Additional Secretary of the Department of Information and International Relations, expressed strong opposition to the Chinese government's policy of shutting down Tibetan schools and replacing them with boarding schools. He argued that these measures aim to undermine Tibetan culture, religion, and people. Tenzin Pema, Additional Secretary for Education at the Central Tibetan Administration; Kalsang Dolma, deputy secretary of the Tibetan Women's League; Sonam Tsering, secretary of the Tibetan Youth League; and Lobsang Yangtso, director of the Tibet Affairs Office, also spoke on the matter, highlighting its seriousness.

TPI Director Dawa Tsering addressed the future prospects for Tibetan language education in light of the closure of Ragya Sherig Norling. He emphasised that to shape a positive future for Tibet, it is crucial to understand and address the current situation. "Presently, the Chinese government is actively closing monasteries and Tibetan schools. This is not the first instance of such actions; recent events include the mass relocation of Tibetans due to hydropower projects in Tibetan areas and the downstream regions outside Tibet. These measures are part of a broader strategy by Chinese authorities to eradicate the Tibetan language and culture systematically," he added.

The panel discussion was also attended by Tibetan parliamentarians Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tseten, Geshe Atong Rinchen Gyaltsen and Geshe Ngaba Gangri, along with Additional Secretaries Tenzin Lekshey and Tenzin Pema, and representatives from various Tibetan NGOs and media outlets came together to engage in insightful discussions.

Tibet Represented at the Opening Ceremony of Paris Olympic Games

27 July 2024, CTA

Representative Rigzin Genkhang led a Tibetan delegation comprising Co-ordinator Thupten Tsering, Tibetan Community President Pema Rinchen and former President Ven. Tenzin Penpa, as invited guests to the opening Ceremony of the Paris Olympic Games along the Seine river, flowing through the heart of the city of light.

Despite Tibet not being represented at the Olympics alongside other nations, the presence of this delegation was crucial to represent Tibet and raise awareness and advocate for the ongoing Tibetan situation.

It may be noted here that France, with one the highest number of Tibet Support Groups, is also home to the largest Tibetan diaspora in Europe.

Proudly displaying their national flag, which quickly attracted a lot of interest and questions, the Tibetan delegation joined the French people in this historic moment, celebrating the Olympic spirit.

-Report filed by Bureau du Tibet, Brussels

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Meets US Congress Members in Washington DC, Expresses Gratitude on Behalf of Tibetans

26 July 2024, CTA

From 22 to 25 July, Sikyong Penpa Tsering visited Washington DC for a series of official engagements, during which he expressed gratitude to US legislators in person for their support of the "Resolve Tibet Act."

In addition to meeting with the US Congress members, Sikyong had meetings with the State Department and White House officials on Tibet-related issues. Sikyong also participated in a closed-door expert roundtable at Brookings Institution, moderated by its China centre director, Ryan Hass. Other engagements included meetings with USAID officials and congressional staffers.

A reception was organised at the Capitol Visitor Center to mark the signing of "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" into law. Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the Tibetan political leader, expressed the gratitude of the Tibetan people to the sponsors of the Bill. The reception was attended by Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi, Chairman Michael McCaul, Congressman Jim McGovern, and Congressman Joe Wilson. A video with a collection of Tibetan people thanking the United States was also screened at the reception and enjoyed by the attendees.

Sikyong also attended the community celebration of the Resolve Tibet Act becoming law at the Capital Area Tibetan Community Center and addressed the gathering. In his speech, Sikyong said, "It's very rare for Tibetans to celebrate. There were times when Tibetans celebrated when His Holiness was honoured with the Nobel Peace Prize, the US Congressional Gold Medal, and recognitions from many institutions and organisations or otherwise; the Tibet issue became known internationally because of Tibetans suffering inside Tibet. And, for the first time, this is a very momentous day for the Tibetans that we celebrate because of the government's decision to pass legislation like the Resolve Tibet Act, which challenges every aspect of China's claim on Tibet."

Regarding the development of the "Resolve Tibet Act," Sikyong Penpa Tsering expressed his gratitude, stating, "I want to extend my thanks to Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi. This bill originated from her office during her tenure as Speaker in 2022. At that time, Richard Gere as the President of the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), I as Sikyong, and the team from the Office of Tibet and ICT met with Speaker Pelosi and Congressman Jim McGovern. During this meeting, we strategise on three basic issues: organising a World Parliamentary Convention on Tibet in Washington, DC—since the last one was held in 1997 and this was organised in June 2022, and around the same time, the testimony on Tibet's historical status by Tenzin Namgyal Tethong, Ellen Bork, Chinese historian Professor Lao, and Professor Michael, the four of them testified before the Congressional-Executive Commission on China. Based on that testimony, this "Resolve Tibet Act" was sponsored by Congressman Jim McGovern and Chairman McCaul in the house, and Senator Todd Young and Senator Jeff Markley in the Senate with the support of Senator Cardin as Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. We are deeply thankful for their support."

Sikyong further added, "As Speaker Pelosi said when she visited Dharamshala, she mentioned that this was also due to the Tibetan people that this bill got passed. So, I am gonna thank all the Tibetans in America, the Tibet Support Groups, the Tibetan associations, the Tibetan advocates, particularly the younger generations of Tibet who have been at the Hill this year in March. And I know that there has been a lot of input and support also from the Congressional staffers, some of whom are present here, who have been architects of this bill."

During the weekend, Sikyong will be visiting Tibetan communities in Madison-Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Chicago.

International Campaign for Tibet alleges "systematic censorship" of Tibetan content on Chinese platforms

25 July 2024, ANI

The International Campaign for Tibet (ICT), in its recent report, has highlighted the "severe challenges" faced by Tibetan users on platforms like Douyin and other prominent Chinese social media channels due to a "systematic censorship" of Tibetan content.

The report stated that these platforms are part of Beijing's broader strategy to diminish Tibetan language and culture in favour of promoting Mandarin.

Despite assertions by Chinese authorities that they support minority languages, including Tibetan, there has been no official acknowledgment or response to protests from Tibetans regarding these discriminatory practices, claims ICT.

According to the International Campaign for Tibet, Tibetans engaging in online commerce and communication encounter significant barriers such as blocked livestreams and restricted comments in Tibetan.

This censorship severely limits their ability to freely engage online. Even Tibetan medical professionals are impacted, as they are unable to effectively communicate with patients in Tibetan due to language restrictions imposed by platforms like Douyin.

The report underscores that these actions are part of a deliberate effort to enhance the dominance of Mandarin while suppressing Tibetan cultural expression. This contradicts official claims of respecting ethnic minority languages and suggests governmental complicity in enforcing policies that undermine Tibetan language rights, despite constitutional protections.

This situation raises broader concerns about freedom of expression and cultural preservation in Tibet, echoing ongoing struggles faced by Tibetan advocates like Tashi Wangchuk, who continue to advocate for language rights amid repression.

ICT further stated that the stringent censorship and monitoring of Tibetan-related content on social media platforms like Douyin reflect a systematic approach to control narratives and silence dissenting voices, aligning with the broader objectives of the Chinese Communist Party.

This suppression extends globally, as seen in instances where platforms such as TikTok are used to harass Tibetan communities abroad, highlighting the international impact of these restrictive policies. The ongoing restrictions on Tibetan language use online and the lack of official response to grievances highlight a troubling pattern of neglect and suppression. This situation raises serious concerns about the future of Tibetan cultural identity and linguistic heritage under Chinese governance, the report added.

In the Tibetan region, the Chinese government has promoted a bilingual education policy where Mandarin Chinese is increasingly emphasised over Tibetan.

This policy has led to Mandarin becoming the primary language of instruction in many schools, reducing the prominence of Tibetan language education. There have been reports of restrictions on teaching Tibetan language in schools beyond a certain level, particularly in higher education institutions. This limits opportunities for Tibetan language development and higher education in Tibetan.

As per reports, the Chinese government exercises strict control over textbooks and publications in Tibetan areas, ensuring that materials align with state-approved narratives and ideologies. This control extends to content related to Tibetan language and culture. (ANI)

Secretary Tsering Yangkyi is Appointed Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama at Office of Tibet, London

24 July 2024, CTA

In a circular issued today, 24 July 2024, the Kashag announced the appointment of Secretary Tsering Yangkyi as the Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama at the Office of Tibet in London.

Currently serving as the Secretary of the Election and Public Service Commission (CTA), Secretary Tsering Yangkyi's appointment aligns with Article 19 (1) of the Public Service Commission's rules and regulations. This article stipulates that the Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama at the Offices of Tibet must be appointed by the Kashag in the presence of Sikyong and the Kalons.

གསལ་བསྒྲགས།

༡༩༩༩ ལམ་ཐུང་འདེམས་བསྐོས་ཁང་གི་ཐུག་ཁེ་དོན་ཚན་བཅུ་དྲུག་པའི་ནང་གསེས་ ༡
པའི་དགོངས་དོན། ཕྱི་རྒྱལ་ཁག་ཏུ་མཆོད་པོ་ལེན་པའི་མཐོང་སྤྱོད་དང་། བཀའ་རྒྱུན་ཚང་
འཛིན་ཞེས་ཐོས་ཀྱི་འདེམས་ཀྱིས་བཀའ་ལག་ནས་བསྐོས་པའི་གནད་བར་ལ་ གོང་ས་
ལ་སྐབས་མགོན་ཆེན་པོ་མཆོག་གི་སྐུ་ཚབ་ཀྱི་མཚན་གནས་བསྐུལ་རྒྱུ། ཞེས་གསལ་བ་ལྟར་ལས་
ཕྱི་འདེམས་བསྐོས་ཁང་དང་དབུས་པོ་ས་ལས་བསྐུལ་ཁང་གི་དྲུང་ཆེ་གཅིག་ལྷོགས་ཆེ་རིང་
དབུས་སྤྱི་དུང་ལགས་མིན་ལན་སྐུ་ཚབ་དོན་གཙོ་དྲུང་བསྐོས་ལཱ་གཞི་བཟུང་ཡིག་ཆ་སྐུ་
མཚན་ལས་ཁང་འགོ་འཇགས་གནང་རྒྱུ་གནང་སོང་བའི་གསལ་བསྒྲགས་སྤྱི་བཀའ་དྲུང་ཡིག་
ཚང་ནས་ ༡༠༡༥ ལྷ་ ༡ ཆེས་ ༡༥ ལྟ།

'People's Court' finds President Xi guilty of 'crime against humanity' in Tibet, verdict refutes China's propaganda

21 July 2024, Tibetan Review

While defeated rulers and fallen military leaders of smaller countries with limited global influence have faced judicial scrutiny and punishment under international law, those in the Communist Party of China leadership, topped by President Xi Jinping, continue their crimes against humanity, including acts bordering on genocide, with impunity. This has outraged the global civil society which recently held a 'people's court' hearing in The Hague on China's acts of aggression in Taiwan, crimes against humanity in Tibet, and genocide against the Uyghur population in Xinjiang. The tribunal found Chinese President Xi Jinping guilty on most counts and issued a symbolic arrest warrant against him on Jul 12.

"The evidence-backed findings affirm the occurrence of severe crimes against humanity, lending credibility to calls for justice and accountability. They may compel countries to impose sanctions or reconsider their economic and political ties with China," noted the jurist.org Jul 13.

The court confirmed charges of crimes against humanity against Chinese President Xi Jinping based on evidence of his effective control over the state organs committing widespread and systematic violations in Tibet and Xinjiang with knowledge of the situation.

Regarding China's actions in Tibet, the court confirmed crimes against humanity, including forcible transfer of children, imprisonment, and persecution. Judge Fonseca has said, "We believe there are substantial grounds to infer a widespread and systematic attack directed against the civilian population with knowledge of cyber attacks. Thus, the court confirms counts two, three and four of the indictment."

The 'people's court' known as 'The Court of the Citizens of the World', comprised of Former Ambassador for War Crimes Stephen Rapp, Former Madela appointee before the Constitutional Court of South Africa Zak Yacoob, and lawyer and international law specialist Bhavani Fonseca, and held its hearing from Jul 8-11, 2024. The cases were meticulously presented through opening statements, expert testimonies, and victim narratives, the report noted.

Apart from lending credibility to calls for justice and accountability, the tribunal's judgment may challenge domestic Chinese propaganda and prompt the younger Chinese populace to question their government's policies. The rulings imply that human rights violations will not go unnoticed and signal to authoritarian regimes worldwide that justice may ultimately prevail. The tribunal's findings validate the survivors' and advocates' efforts against atrocities, reinforcing their hopes for eventual accountability, noted the jurist.org report.

"The tribunal has imparted a powerful moral and legal message against human rights violations, even if current geopolitical realities might impede immediate action. Its comprehensive findings and unequivocal moral stance ensure these crimes remain in global consciousness. This judgment provides enduring hope that future international legal bodies might hold even the most powerful leaders accountable, thus upholding the rights of vulnerable communities worldwide," the report said.

The court successfully concluded its session despite facing harassment and attempts to shut it down with fake threats that called the trial illegal by citing a series of alleged violations under Article 118 of the Dutch Penal Code "including but not limited to impersonation of judicial authority, violation of public order, defamation, false imprisonment, and complicity in criminal activities."

Besides, an alleged spy, disguised as a new legal volunteer from Italy, was stated to have claimed on Jul 2 with no reason in an unauthorised group message to all staff members that the court was not paying its staff, was acting 'unjustly,' while also questioning the court's moral legitimacy. The individual was stated to have "provoked fellow volunteers to resign and sent an email to legal participants from the official email accounts, asking them not to attend the trial this coming week in The Hague against President Xi."

The pursuit of peace and human rights remains a universal endeavour, with the China Tribunal paving the way for a more just world, the report concluded.

"China cannot just change history", says Tibet President in exile as US passes Resolve Tibet act

21 July 2024, The Economic Times

US House recently passed the Tibet bill S-138, urging China to resolve the Tibet dispute. This bill also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, refutes Beijing's claims about Tibet and urges China to stop spreading disinformation about Tibet's history and the Tibetan people.

The bill was followed by the visit of a bipartisan group of US lawmakers led by Congressman Michael McCaul and former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to Dharamshala where they met with the Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama. The visit raised the hackles of the Chinese government which had described the bill as being groundless and futile.

The passage of the bill, however, has given a fillip to the Tibetan struggle for independence. Speaking exclusively to ANI, Tibetan President in exile, Penpa Tsering, said they want a clear message to go out to China that it cannot just change history.

"This is part of the strategy that we adopted since we came into this job in May 2021. The first time I travelled to the United States was in April 2022... we informed Speaker Pelosi that this is our changing strategy and we need to focus on the extremes... There cannot be a middle way... There could be political, social, economic and educational dimensions... One extreme is the present situation of Tibet, occupied under the repressive communist government... The other extreme is the historical status of Tibet as an independent state," Tsering said. "We have reasons for doing this. First is to send a message to China that they cannot just change history... The second message is to the international community that without understanding Tibet's history, how can they parrot what the Chinese government wants them to say over the last 60-65 years?" Tsering added.

Congressman Michael McCaul who leads the Republican House Committee on Foreign Affairs had led a delegation that called on the Dalai Lama after the Resolve Tibet bill was passed in the House said that the Chinese government has been working to stomp out Tibetan culture.

"I hope our visit served as a symbol of the U.S. government's support for the people of Tibet and the friendship between our two peoples," Congressman McCaul said.

"The CCP's (Chinese Communist Party) propaganda campaign can't hide the truth: the people of Tibet have a unique culture, history, and religion that have never been part of China, despite the regime's lies. The CCP is working to stomp out Tibetan culture. This cannot be allowed to happen," he added.

Tibetan President in exile Penpa Tsering agrees with that view and says that for the first time the Chinese claim that Tibet is part of the Peoples Republic of China is being challenged.

"There are a lot of discrepancies in China's logic towards history and they have been shifting the goalpost all the time. This Tibet Resolve Act focuses on the part countering China's disinformation on Tibetan history, its people and His Holiness... The first issue is that it's an unresolved conflict. Because China thinks Tibet is already resolved, they have managed to convince the world that Tibet is part of PRC and that is being challenged for the first time," Tsering said.

"They keep saying there is not one country that recognizes the independence of Tibet. The law does not say we recognize independence, but it challenges China's narrative that they have not accepted Tibet as a part of China... In the fourth part of this bill, these are all acting against China's narrative, and it is a new tool in our hand," Tsering added. The new act has now opened a fresh standoff point between the United States and China. China's Foreign Ministry has questioned the Resolve Tibet act, saying the move is pure interference in the country's internal affairs.

Tibetan govt-in-exile takes on Chinese embassy, says Tibet not 'internal affair'

21 July 2024, The Economic Times

US House recently passed the Tibet bill S-138, urging China to resolve the Tibet dispute. This bill also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, refutes Beijing's claims about Tibet and urges China to stop spreading disinformation about Tibet's history and the Tibetan people.

"This is part of the strategy that we adopted since we came into this job in May 2021. The first time I travelled to the United States was in April 2022... we informed Speaker Pelosi that this is our changing strategy and we need to focus on the extremes... There cannot be a middle way... There could be political, social, economic and educational dimensions... One extreme is the present situation of Tibet, occupied under the repressive communist government... The other extreme is the historical status of Tibet as an independent state," Tsering said. "We have reasons for doing this. First is to send a message to China that they cannot just change history... The second message is to the international community that without understanding Tibet's history, how can they parrot what the Chinese government wants them to say over the last 60-65 years?" Tsering added. Congressman Michael McCaul who leads the Republican House Committee on Foreign Affairs had led a delegation that called on the Dalai Lama after the Resolve Tibet bill was passed in the House said that the Chinese government has been working to stomp out Tibetan culture.

"I hope our visit served as a symbol of the U.S. government's support for the people of Tibet and the friendship between our two peoples," Congressman McCaul said "The CCP's (Chinese Communist Party) propaganda campaign can't hide the truth: the people of Tibet have a unique culture, history, and religion that have never been part of China, despite the regime's lies. The CCP is working to stomp out Tibetan culture. This cannot be allowed to happen," he added.

Tibetan President in exile Penpa Tsering agrees with that view and says that for the first time the Chinese claim that Tibet is part of the Peoples Republic of China is being challenged.

"There are a lot of discrepancies in China's logic towards history and they have been shifting the goalpost all the time. This Tibet Resolve Act focuses on the part countering China's disinformation on Tibetan history, its people and His Holiness... The first issue is that it's an unresolved conflict. Because China thinks Tibet is already resolved, they have managed to convince the world that Tibet is part of PRC and that is being challenged for the first time," Tsering said. "They keep saying there is not one country that recognizes the independence of Tibet. The law does not say we recognize independence, but it challenges China's narrative that they have not accepted Tibet as a part of China... In the fourth part of this bill, these are all acting against China's narrative, and it is a new tool in our hand," Tsering added.

The new act has now opened a fresh standoff point between the United States and China. China's Foreign Ministry has questioned the Resolve Tibet act, saying the move is pure interference in the country's internal affairs.

Tibetan govt in exile to issue map of Tibet to counter China's 'cartographic aggression'

20 July 2024, MyIndMakers

The Tibetan government-in-exile plans to release a map of Tibet founded on historical records, featuring original boundaries and place names, in response to China's "cartographic aggression" and its practice of renaming locations to assert claims over disputed territories.

Penpa Tsering, the Sikyong or political leader of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) based in Dharamshala, announced that the CTA will utilise various research studies by experts on Tibet and ancient maps to create a new map. This map will be made available online for Tibetans and academics globally.

"We are doing this so that Tibetans living around the world get to know the real history of their country, and so that the memories of the Tibetans living inside Tibet don't fade away in the face of China's cartographic aggression," Tsering told HT.

"This is the overall Chinese strategy, it's nothing new. Renaming [of places] has happened before with Tibet. They did it last year too. If you look at the overall Chinese strategy, they use only Chinese names for [territories they claim, such as] Senkaku islands of Japan, or islands near Taiwan or Spratly Islands in the South China Sea," said Tsering, who like most of the current Tibetan leadership in exile was born in India and has never been to Tibet.

"The Chinese have their own names for islands they claim, not the names coined by other countries. They have also done something similar in Arunachal Pradesh. Within China, they are trying to erase the historical background of these names."

Tsering stated that the CTA will collaborate with a Tibetan cartographer based at Stanford to develop a searchable map of Tibet, with the project expected to be completed within six months to a year.

"We will then make it available online for everyone, otherwise there is no reason to have this map. It will provide a complete picture of Tibet," he said.

Another project taken up by the CTA is developing a search engine with Tibetan names of places. "Now, if I go to Google, I can't recognise names or places inside Tibet. We're going to do research on names of every place inside Tibet, and their Tibetan origins," Tsering said.

According to a recent report by Human Rights Watch, Chinese authorities have forcibly relocated 500 villages, displacing over 140,000 residents in the Tibet Autonomous Region since 2016. They have also renamed numerous places across the ancient kingdom of Tibet.

In addition to renaming Tibet as Xizang and establishing the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) in 1965, Chinese authorities have incorporated several regions of the ancient kingdom of Tibet into Chinese provinces. For example, Tibetan officials noted that the region of Amdo is now part of Qinghai province, the Kham region was included in Sichuan province, and some other areas were integrated into Yunnan province.

The map being developed by the CTA will address these historical issues. Tsering expressed his belief that other countries facing similar problems with China should also push back.

"Countries with disputes in the South China Sea and in the case of the Senkaku Islands – everyone should push back against their designs. Because these designs amplify China's hegemonistic ambitions despite their denials," he said.

China refers to the northeastern Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh as "Zangnan" and claims the strategic region as part of South Tibet. In recent years, China has renamed dozens of towns and geographical features in Arunachal Pradesh to assert its claim on the region. The Indian government has dismissed such moves, stating that the state will always remain a part of India.

Referring to the Resolve Tibet Act, signed by US President Joe Biden on 12th July, which aims to pressure China for a negotiated settlement regarding Tibet's demand for greater autonomy, Tsering said, "The main issue is that we were trying to push against China's disinformation on Tibetan history. [The Act] says the US doesn't recognise China's assertion that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times."

Dr Gyal Lo's Makes Presentation on China's Colonial-style Boarding Schools in Tibet at a Conference in Tokyo

20 July 2024, CTA

Tibet House Japan and the Asian Democracy Movement organised a talk and press conference by Tibetan Educational Sociologist Dr. Gyal Lo and his team comprising Dorjee Tsetan, Tibetan Parliamentarian and Asia Program Manager at Tibet Action Institute, and Tenzin Minlek and Tsering Dorjee of the Students for Free Tibet at Bunkyo Civic Center in Tokyo today.

Representative of the Liaison Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama for Japan and East Asia, Dr. Tsewang Gyalpo Arya, welcomed the audience and introduced Dr. Gyal Lo, who has a long experience as a teacher and lecturer in different schools and universities in Tibet, and how Chinese policy behind the boarding school and the discrimination he faced forced him to flee Tibet and take refuge abroad. A short documentary on the Chinese colonial boarding school was presented to highlight the gravity of the situation.

Dr. Arya also shared the good news of the signing of the US Congress' Tibet Resolve Act by President Joe Biden on 12 July. He explained the importance of the law and how it strongly establishes and demonstrates the US's support and vision for a free and democratic Tibet. A Japanese translation of the law (S.138) was distributed to the audience, and some important points were read for particular attention.

Dr. Gyal Lo, educational sociologist and a leading expert on China's assimilative education policies in Tibet, made a presentation on China's colonial boarding schools in Tibet and how it started and evolved in three stages: first in 1970s with introduction of assimilative policies; second from 1984 onwards to take the Tibetan children away to Chinese cities; and third and the latest from 2016 with the closure of the native schools and forced education of one million Tibetan children from as young as 4 and 5 to 18 years old at the Chinese boarding schools. He explained how young children are indoctrinated and how they behave awkwardly after attending boarding school for some time.

Tenzin Minlek of the Students for Free Tibet (SFT) talked about the activities of the SFT to highlight the Chinese brutal assimilative policy to destroy Tibetan identity and deny the young children their mother tongue, culture, and religion.

Tibetan MP Dorjee Tsetan thanked the organisers and the audience for providing a platform to speak on this CCP's drastic policy to rob the Tibetan children of their language and identity. He also talked about the US Tibet Resolve Act. He requested the Japanese people and the government to come up with a statement condemning China's colonial boarding schools and for legislation similar to the US Tibet Resolve Act to demonstrate Japan's support for freedom, human rights, and democracy in Tibet.

The press conference was held after the talk. Media people asked about specific suffering and torture faced by the children and its impact on both children and the parents, and how Tibetans in exile are making efforts to counter this Chinese assimilative policy.

A report booklet on colonial boarding schools by the Tibetan Action Institute and translated into Japanese by the Tibet House Japan was distributed freely to the audience and the media. Akira Shiho moderated the talk event, and Takayuki Kojima of the Asian Democracy Movement moderated the press conference.

Dr. Gyal Lo and the team delivered talks and presentations at Meiji and Waseda Universities. They met Shimomura Hakubun, Chairman of the Japan Parliamentarian Support Group for Tibet, where Dr. Gyal Lo informed the critical nature of the situation in Tibet and sought the lawmaker's support. Dr. Gyal Lo will speak at Tokyo University and some other places.

Hegemonistic Ambitions: Tibet PM-In-Exile On China Renaming Places In India

18 July 2024, NDTV

"All the neighboring countries from Japan to Taiwan to Philippines, now they are having serious problems in the strategies," said Tibetan Prime Minister-in-Exile, Sikyong Penpa Tsering

Renaming places in Arunachal Pradesh and belligerence in Ladakh – this is what reflects China's hegemonistic ambition and now that the US law about Tibet has been passed, it has challenged China's claim that no nation recognises Tibetan Independence, Tibetan Prime Minister-in-Exile, Sikyong Penpa Tsering told NDTV today in an exclusive interview.

Asked about the Resolve Tibet Act – which became a law in the United States four days ago – he said through the Act, the US government says they do not accept the Chinese narrative that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times.

"So far, the Chinese government has been saying that there is not a single country that recognises the independence of Tibet or the government in exile...

'But with this act, would the Chinese government be able to say that?' he said.

China has watched warily as a bipartisan delegation led by ex-House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Michael McCaul came to India last month and met the Dalai Lama, underscoring an acceleration in US diplomatic initiative on a long-pending human rights issue.

China had asked the US to respect its sensitivity on matters related to Tibet and suggested that the Dalai Lama "correct" his political propositions before talks can be held with him.

Asked about that, Mr McCaul said the US message to China was that "Do not destroy the culture of these people, their religion... Every people and country have a right to self-determination".

The US message to China was also a silent criticism of Beijing's alleged hegemonistic ambition that has led to discomfort among some.

Mr Tsering also alluded to it, saying, "All the neighboring countries from Japan to Taiwan to Philippines, now they are having serious problems in the strategies... Malaysia, Brunei, Vietnam, everywhere they are escalating the situation. And then also because of their behavior, all the defense expenditures of all these countries are going on increasing every year, including New Zealand and Australia".

"Some 8, 10 years ago, China declared an air identification [zone] and so on. At that time, I told our US friends when China can claim the air, they will claim everything under that air, sea or land or whatever," he said.

"So these days, China's hegemonistic ambitions are also reflected in terms of how they are renaming places, not just in Arunachal Pradesh or belligerence on Ladakh," he added.

Chinese know "they're hurt": Tibetan leader on US President Biden signing 'Resolve Tibet Bill'

18 July 2024, The Print

Penpa Tsering, the President of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile, commented on President Biden's recent signing of the 'Resolve Tibet Bill,' stating that the move has clearly struck a nerve with China.

Last week, US President Joe Biden signed the 'Resolve Tibet Act', which states that China's ongoing occupation of Tibet must be resolved per international law peacefully and not through repression.

In an interview with ANI, Tsering highlighted the intense reaction from the Chinese government, which has condemned the bill as an interference in their domestic affairs.

"The very fact that they came here to deliver the bill to His Holiness and then President Biden signing it, even before he signed, they said, please don't sign the form. Now, after signing, they are saying, don't implement the bill; otherwise, it will have consequences," Tsering said, adding, "So, in that sense, we know that it has worked and China has for it."

Expressing a confident stance on the impact of the newly signed 'Resolve Tibet Bill' and highlighting that the bill has significantly unsettled the Chinese government. Tsering remarked that the strong Chinese reaction underscores the bill's effectiveness in challenging Beijing's narrative on Tibet.

Reflecting on the strategic approach adopted by his administration since May 2021, Tsering explained, "This is part of the strategy that we adopted since we came into this job in May 2021. The first time I managed to travel to the United States was in April 2022, because the pandemic was going on. And at that time, we did inform our friends in Congress, particularly Speaker Nancy Pelosi at that time, that this is our change in strategy, that we need to focus on the extremes."

He elaborated on this strategy, saying, "When we talk about the middle way, then there has to be extremes. Without extremes, there is no middle way. And if you have no recognition for the extremes, then there is no value for the middle way. So extreme could be in many dimensions. It could be political, social, economic, educational, whatever."

Tsering highlighted the bill's role in countering China's historical claims over Tibet. He asserted, "One is to send a message to China that they cannot just change history. History is in the past. And it's best left to historians." He criticised the Chinese government's shifting historical narratives, saying, "China thinks Tibet is already resolved, that they have managed to convince the world that Tibet is part of the PRC. And that is being challenged for the first time."

He further elaborated on the bill's impact, "The law does not say we recognise independence, but it challenges China's narratives that they have not accepted that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times."

Regarding future diplomatic strategies, Tsering expressed a commitment to international advocacy, stating, "Definitely, definitely. Now we would expect the United States to lend a shoulder to work with like-minded countries, because that is something about which the United States has always been talking, and we can reach out only to the free world."

He also addressed the role of India in this context, saying, "I have always said that no country will leave aside their national interests and pick up India's national interests. So as long as that nation's security interests and other interests align with Tibetan interests, and Tibet and India, we have age-old relations."

On the subject of back-channel talks with China, Tsering was sceptical, noting, "No, I have admitted to having back channels, but then it's nothing important to talk about. There's nothing significant to talk about. It doesn't look very likely that there would be any positive outcome."

Regarding the Dalai Lama's health and return to Dharamshala, Tsering said, "The dates are not fixed because it will all depend on how well His Holiness recovers and what other engagements might appear." (ANI)

Tibetans in-exile condemn China's policies, hold candlelight vigil

18 July 2024, ANI

The Tibetans in exile held a candlelight vigil in Dharamshala on Wednesday to condemn China's forced closure of the renowned Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling School in Golog and to stand in solidarity with Tibetans.

On the occasion of International Justice Day on Wednesday, the Tibetan NGOs in Dharamshala condemned Chinese policies in Tibet. Eight non-governmental organisations based in Dharamshala express their profound concern and condemnation of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) systematic violations of human rights in Tibet.

Tibetan activists said that Beijing's policies in Tibet have resulted in egregious violations affecting the fundamental rights of Tibetan children and their access to education.

More than one million Tibetan children are currently enrolled in colonial-style boarding schools, forcibly separated from their families and cultural roots. This forced assimilation into the Chinese language and culture runs counter to international standards on cultural rights and education, they said.

Moreover, the Communist Party has aggressively shut down privately-run Tibetan schools and educational institutions, eroding Tibetan communities' ability to preserve and transmit their unique cultural heritage and values through education, they alleged.

On July 14, 2024, the Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbu School, founded by the renowned Tibetan educator Jigme Gyaltsen with the approval of the local people's government, was forced to close under pressure from the Chinese Communist government, they said.

Therefore, the coalition of NGOs based in Dharamshala vehemently condemns the forced closure of the school founded in 1994 by Ragya Jigme Gyaltsen, the school served as a cornerstone of Tibetan cultural and linguistic education for three decades before its abrupt shutdown by CCP.

These actions are part of a malicious policy aimed at destroying the environment for nurturing Tibetan education, culture, psychology, and consciousness, effectively erasing the Tibetan people's identity. "We strongly oppose this policy and condemn the Chinese government's actions," they said.

The NGOs in Dharamshala call upon the international community, including governments, human rights organisations, and educational institutions, to take immediate and decisive action to hold China accountable for these grave violations.

On this World Justice Day, the NGOs in Dharamshala reaffirm their commitment to advocating for justice, freedom, and the preservation of Tibetan cultural heritage, they said. (ANI)

Long-time friend of Tibet Richard Gere recovering after prostate operation

18 July 2024, Phayul

Richard Gere, hollywood actor and long-time advocate for Tibet and a good friend of the Tibetan exiled spiritual leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama, has recently been the subject of public concern over reports of his health. The President of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) Sikyong Penpa during a public talk on the last-day visit to Ladakh, revealed that the 74-year-old actor had undergone prostate surgery earlier in June.

"Earlier in June, Richard Gere underwent a prostate operation. He relocated to Spain 10-15 days post-operation. Unfortunately, he required a second procedure due to an infection. Gere has been a devoted ally to our cause for many years. During this challenging time, I urge Tibetans to pray for his swift recovery," stated Sikyong Penpa Tsering in his public address (min. 47:43 onwards).

The concerns over Richard Gere's health amplified following an online post by Tibetan singer Loten Namling who shared information received from Fabrizio Pallotti, a close friend of Gere. According to the post, Gere's health issues began with an operation in the United States, during which his blood became infected. The details of the initial procedure and the nature of the infection remain undisclosed. Following the complications from the initial operation, Gere underwent a second operation and is now recuperating in Spain.

The news of Richard Gere's health has elicited widespread concern and well-wishes from supporters around the world. Social media platforms have been flooded with messages of support and prayers for his recovery. Gere's unwavering support for the Tibetan cause has earned him immense respect and built a strong emotional connection, particularly within the Tibetan community.

In 1993, during the Academy Awards, while presenting the Best Art Direction, Gere skipped the script and called out China's occupation of Tibet and its "horrendous, horrendous human rights situation." He continued his advocacy, calling for a boycott of the 2008 Beijing Olympics, and he continues to support the cause through his two foundations, the Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet and the Gere Foundation in New York.

A netizen via Facebook wrote, "I really hope he will recover well as soon as possible. He is our real friend. May Buddha bless him."

"Sending from my heart streams of sincere prayers and wishes for a speedy recovery and long life. We Tibetans deeply remain grateful to you dearest Gere," another netizen expressed.

"We consider ourselves extension of Indian culture," says Tibetan leader in exile

18 July 2024, ANI

Penpa Tsering, the President of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile, appreciated India's support for Tibetan culture and highlighted their strong cultural connection with New Delhi, adding that Tibetans consider themselves an extension of Indian culture, language and religion.

Tsering further noted that Tibetan language and religion are based on Indian scripts and have translated many Sanskrit and Pali texts into Tibetan, preserving ancient Indian wisdom.

"We consider ourselves as an extension of Indian culture, language or religion. The script of our language and religion all came from India. We consider ourselves as an extension of Indian culture because we translated every available Sanskrit and Pali text into Tibetan and we are the only country to do that. So, we are the repository of one part of ancient Indian wisdom," Penpa Tsering said.

Further, he also acknowledged India's role in providing refuge to the Dalai Lama and 72,000 Tibetan people when China annexed Tibet in 1951.

"We are very grateful to the Indian government at the most difficult period of our history, to give refuge here in India to His Holiness and now there are 72,000 Indian Tibetans in India," said Tsering.

Tsering also spoke about the recent United States Congressional delegation's visit to India. The delegation, including former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, met Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama at his residence in Dharamshala on June 20.

The US delegation also met Prime Minister Narendra Modi and External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar.

Tsering said that India's permission for a congressional visit to Dharamshala and the subsequent meetings with Indian leaders is a sign of validation and support for the Tibetan cause.

"I think a lot of analysis has been done during the congressional visit to Dharamshala where a lot of credit is given to the Indian government for allowing them to visit India, visit Dharamshala make those statements and they're on the way back meet with Prime Minister Modi ji and also the foreign minister," said Tsering

"So I think in Taiwan also it's being interpreted as validation of this visit to Dharamshala by the Indian government," he added.

The Tibetan Government-in-Exile President also hailed US President Joe Biden's recent signing of the 'Resolve Tibet Bill,' stating that the move has clearly struck a nerve with China.

Last week, US President Joe Biden signed the 'Resolve Tibet Act', which states that China's ongoing occupation of Tibet must be resolved per international law peacefully and not through repression.

Expressing a confident stance on the impact of the newly signed 'Resolve Tibet Bill' and highlighting that the bill has "significantly unsettled" the Chinese government, Tsering remarked that the strong Chinese reaction underscores the bill's effectiveness in challenging Beijing's narrative on Tibet. (ANI)

Tibetans express gratitude to US President for enacting 'Resolve Tibet Act'

17 July 2024, Awaz The Voice

The Tibetan community in Shimla held a grand ceremony at the Sambhota Tibetan School on Wednesday to thank the US and President Joe Biden for enacting the 'Resolve Tibet Act' which calls for a resolution to the Tibet-China dispute.

Last week, US President Joe Biden signed the 'Resolve Tibet Act', which states that China's ongoing occupation of Tibet must be resolved per international law peacefully and not through repression.

The Tibetan community said the legislation is a historical milestone and sends a strong political message to China, seven decades since the People's Republic of China (PRC) illegally occupied Tibet and forced the Tibetan delegation to sign the so-called 17-point Agreement in 1951 under duress.

During the celebration, Tibetan students, elders and others performed traditional dances at the Tibetan Sambhota School in Shimla. The Traditional circle dance (Gorshey) was also performed by Tibetans.

Tsewang Phuntsok, Chief Representative Officer of the Central Tibetan Administration in Shimla, said this will help the international community to send a strong message and enforce China to start dialogue with His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

"The Tibetan community in Shimla has gathered to celebrate the signing of the Tibet Issue Resolve Act. This will help the Tibetan community and international community to send a strong message and enforce China to start dialogue with His Holiness the Dalai Lama and between the democratically elected representatives of the Tibetan government-in-exile and China," Phuntsok said.

Calling it a "landmark for the Tibetan issue," he said, "This is the first ever such act signed by any country in the past seven decades."

Phuntsok said that the function is organised by the Tibetan community to pay gratitude and heartfelt thanks to the US.

"It's important, as it's Wednesday today, that we organise the traditional circle dance (gorshey). We take this day as the birth of the Dalai Lama as per the Tibetan lunar calendar," Tsewang Phuntsok added.

The Tibetan community said they are happy that the bill was passed with overwhelming support. They said the signing of the legislation further reiterated the current policy of the China's systematically eradicating the Tibetan religion, culture, language, history, way of life and environment.

Tibetan freedom activist Tenzin Palden said that this is a "landmark legislation" for their freedom struggle.

"This is an important day for us. We have gathered here to thank the United States of America for signing the Act for Tibet. This is a landmark for us, as since 1959 it has been an act, which makes it important for us as a landmark of our freedom struggle. They have made it an act and law and it will send a message to China and to the countries of the world as the friends of Tibet across the globe are coming forward," he said.

Palden added that they are expressing their gratitude to US President Joe Biden and the people of the US for signing this act favouring the resolution of the Tibet issue. "It is a historic milestone for us," Palden said.

The young Tibetan generation are happy to know that powerful Nations like the USA are coming forward to understand and recognise the issue of Tibet.

Dawa Choedon, a young Tibetan activist, said the young generation is happy that strong nations like the US are coming forward to understand and recognise the issue of Tibet.

"On July 12, US President Joe Biden signed an Act to resolve the Tibet issue. We, the Tibetan diaspora here in Shimla, have gathered to celebrate this day. We would like to extend our heartfelt gratitude to the US, as it is a very important day for us. Today is White Wednesday, which we usually celebrate, and today is a very special Wednesday because of the support we get from the world, especially the powerful countries like the USA, as they are recognising our problems."

Choedon added that this would enforce China to realise its mistake, recognise our problems and resolve them.

"As I said, this is the first milestone that we have achieved, the young Tibetan population across the globe are happy for this and are thankful to the United States of America," Choedonb said.

Back-channel talks between China, Tibetan govt-in-exile going on: Sikyong Penpa Tsering

17 July 2024, The Economic Times

The Tibetan government-in-exile and China are continuing to hold back-channel talks and the last round took place this month, just days before US President Joe Biden signed a legislation that seeks to press Beijing for a negotiated settlement to Tibet's demands for greater autonomy. "Last round of talks happened at the beginning of this month," Penpa Tsering, the Sikyong or political head of Tibet's government-in-exile, said on Wednesday.

The Tibetan side has been joining the back-channel negotiations with a long-term perspective and that it does not have any expectations from the Xi Jinping-led Chinese government, he told a small group of journalists.

"We just cannot think of the short term. We cannot only think about Xi Jinping. He will be there for sometime and then he will be gone. But we have to keep our communications (with Beijing) ..

In April, Beijing rejected reports of the back-channel talks with the Tibetan government-in-exile and said it will hold negotiations only with the representatives of the Dalai Lama.

"The back-channel talks are going on. However China never acknowledges them. It is their policy not to acknowledge," Tsering said.

From 2002 to 2010, Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama's representatives and the Chinese government held nine rounds of dialogue that did not produce any concrete outcomes. No formal talks have been held since then.

The back-channel talks were seen as willingness by both sides to re-engage over a decade after the formal dialogue process hit a dead end in view of anti-China protests in Tibet and Beijing's hardline approach towards the Buddhist region.

Sikyong said the talks are taking place in a third country and it was Beijing which reached out to Tibet's government-in-exile for the negotiations.

At the same time, he said there has been no contact between the two sides since Biden signed into law the "The Resolve Tibet Act".

"My Administration will continue to call on the People's Republic of China to resume direct dialogue, without preconditions, with the Dalai Lama, or his representatives, to seek a settlement that resolves differences and leads to a negotiated agreement on Tibet," Biden said after signing the Act on July 12.

The legislation, seen as significant in Tibet's struggle for autonomy, says it is Washington's policy that the conflict must be resolved in accordance with international law through dialogue without preconditions.

"If there has to be a resolution, it should be based on international law – that is the first aspect of this act," the Sikyong said.

"Even though we are asking for some kind of autonomy under the Middle-Way policy, the concept of autonomy is not defined in international law. The only thing that is defined in international law is self determination," he explained.

"And that is what the US recognises that the Tibetan people have the right to self determination just as the UN General Assembly passed a resolution way back in 1961." Tsering said the Tibetan people are very committed to the 'Middleway' policy of the Dalai Lama to resolve the conflict.

"We are very very committed to the Middleway policy of His Holiness the Dalai Lama that is approved by the majority of Tibetans and unanimously adopted by the Parliament way back in 1997," he said.

"We remain committed to His Holiness's thinking and try to find a non-violent, negotiated, mutually-beneficial lasting solution to the cause of Tibet," he said.

"But we decided to change our policy a little bit in the sense that when we speak about the Middle-way, then there needs to be polarities. Without polarities, there cannot be a middle-way and without recognition of the polarities, there is no value for middle-way," Tsering said.

Explaining the two polarities, he said one is the present situation in Tibet under the "repressive" Chinese communist government and the other is the historical status of Tibet as an independent state.

Another significant aspect of "The Resolve Tibet Act" is the US's assertion that China is wrong in claiming that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times. In its talks with China between 2002 and 2010, the Tibetan side pitched genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people in line with the Dalai Lama's middle way policy.

China has in the past accused the Dalai Lama of indulging in "separatist" activities and trying to split Tibet and considers him as a divisive figure.

However, the Tibetan spiritual leader has insisted that he is not seeking independence but "genuine autonomy for all Tibetans living in the three traditional provinces of Tibet" under the "Middle-Way approach".

After a failed anti-Chinese uprising in 1959, the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet and came to India where he set up the government-in-exile. The Chinese government officials and the Dalai Lama or his representatives have not met in formal negotiations since 2010.

Beijing has been maintaining that it freed "serfs and slaves" from a brutal theocracy in Tibet and bringing the region on the path of prosperity and modernisation.

7th international Rangzen Conference concludes in Toronto, Canada

16 July 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The 7th International Rangzen (Independence) Conference, dedicated to the cause of Tibetan independence, was held from July 13-15 in Toronto, Canada, garnering over 250 delegates from Canada, the US, Australia, Europe, and India.

The conference was honoured by the presence of Bradd Redekopp, a Canadian Member of Parliament, who served as the chief guest. Other distinguished attendees included members of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, Geshe Monlam Tharchin, Geshe Lharampa Gowo Lobsang Phende, Tenpa Yarphe, Tenzin Jigdal, Juchen Kunchok Chodon, Phurba Dorje Gyalthong, and Lhagyari Namgyal Dolkar. Additionally, the event featured special guests such as Tibetan writers, artists, and researchers besides other members of the public.

The conference organisers passed four resolutions reaffirming their stance. They reiterated their belief to never trust the Chinese government due to the ongoing repression, torture and murder of the Tibetan people. They condemned the recent forced closure of a highly successful Tibetan school in Golog, expressing solidarity with its students and teachers. They expressed deep gratitude to the Court of Citizens of the World for issuing an arrest warrant against Xi Jinping for crimes against humanity in Tibet. They also voiced concerns over “selective and biased reporting by Tibetan mainstream media,” urging these outlets to “prioritise fair and objective reporting.”

In his speech, Geshe Monlam Tharchin emphasised, “When advocating for people’s cause, we must prioritise on their capabilities. While many countries offer support and enact legislation in our favour, they often prioritise their national interests and consider all circumstances first. Although we should be grateful for their support, it is essential to recognise and leverage our own strengths.”

“We have received support and condolences, and His Holiness the Dalai Lama was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize and had the opportunity to propose the Five-Point Peace Plan in Congress. However, we must carefully consider whether the current legislation genuinely benefits us. Various individuals and organisations have actively lobbied for the bill’s passage, so they must reflect on whether the law is truly intended to benefit Tibetans or if it is using Tibet’s issue on an international platform,” he further emphasised.

During the question and answer session with the public, Tibetan filmmaker and activist Shenpenn Khymtsar stated, “Rangzen (Independence) is not a policy but our birth right. When we speak of Rangzen, we must be clear about from whom we seek it—whether it is from those who bully us, torture us, killed our parents, or stole our land. The moment we speak of Rangzen, we should automatically think of China. However, when we speak of Rangzen, we often overlook China, leading to internal disputes within the community. Ideally, China should be the focus of our pursuit of Rangzen, but instead, Umaylam (Middle Way Approach) enters the discussion, which is unnecessary.”

“We Tibetans should prepare to counter China not just by vocalising our demands or organising protests, but by understanding the political landscape within China and its relations with other countries. Personally, I believe it is not our role to host debates between supporters of Rangzen and Umaylam. In parliamentary sessions, I hope to see discussions on how to resolve the Tibet conflict, counter China’s narrative, and unite Tibetans spread across the globe. I do not wish to hear debates on Umaylam, Rangzen, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, and Sisur Lobsang Sangay,” he further remarked.

The inaugural Rangzen Conference took place in Dharamsala on June 27, 2012. Subsequent editions were held in New Delhi (2015), New York (2016), and Paris (2017). The fifth conference returned to Dharamsala in 2018, where participants were honoured with an audience by His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama. The sixth conference convened in New Delhi in 2023. During the seventh International Rangzen Conference in Toronto, Canada, it was decided that the eighth International Rangzen Conference would be held in Australia in 2025.

OoT, Canberra & Chinese Alliance for Democracy Conduct Seminar titled “Sino-Tibet Relations in the Post-Xi Jinping Era”

15 July 2024, CTA

The Office of Tibet, Canberra, in collaboration with the Chinese Alliance for Democracy, organised a seminar titled “Sino-Tibet Relations in the Post Xi Jinping Era” at Sydney University on 10 July 2024.

The seminar, graced by the presence of esteemed researchers, activists, and leading experts on China, engaged in a comprehensive discourse. The discussions ranged from the impact of Xi-Jinping’s policies on Sino-Tibetan relations to the alarming cultural genocide unfolding in Tibet under his rule.

In his opening remarks, Representative Karma Singey underscored the situation’s urgency, stating, “Today, a deep sense of insecurity, uncertainty, and fear pervades due to the Chinese government’s expansionist greed and repressive policies. If these policies remain unchallenged, the world’s peace and security are in grave jeopardy.” He further revealed China’s policy to securitise Tibet and Sinicise Tibetan people as part of Xi Jinping’s long-term assimilation drive.

Dr Gyalo, a leading expert on China's assimilation and education policies in Tibet, shared his profound insights on Xi Jinping's overall vision to create a Han-centric nationalism policy and how the Chinese government has enforced mandatory boarding school education for Tibetan children, which he described as forced sinicisation and policy of culture genocide against Tibetans.

Bawa Kalsang Gyaltsen, Representative of the Office of Tibet in Taiwan, explained the Central Tibetan Administration's commitment to Middle Way Policy in finding a peaceful solution to the Sino-Tibet conflict. He further emphasised the importance of more vital interaction and allyship between Tibetan and Chinese communities to strengthen the friendship between the two communities.

Finally, Prof. Feng Chongyi, Associate Professor at the University of Technology Sydney and Chairman of the Australia and New Zealand Alliance of Victims of Chinese Communist Party spoke on how establishing a democratic constitutional government in China is the prerequisite for any nationality to achieve self-determination. He further explained that democratic negotiation or a referendum under a democratic political system is necessary to realise self-determination, which could result in autonomy, independence, or maintaining the status quo.

Dr Jin Jiang, Chairman of the Chinese Alliance for Democracy, Duoduo Zhang, President of the Sydney Chinese-Tibetan Friendship Group, and Sophia Tsai, a Taiwanese ally, moderated the seminar.

Dawa Sangmo, Chinese liaison officer of the Tibet Office, Canberra, delivered the closing remarks.

Tibetans in exile mark death anniversary of freedom fighter Tulku Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, release book on his struggles

15 July 2024, Rtv

A memorial event for Tibetan freedom fighter Tulku Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, marking the anniversary of his unjust death in Chinese custody, was organized on Friday at the Gangkyi Tibetan Library in the North Indian hill town of Dharamshala.

A memorial event for Tibetan freedom fighter Tulku Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, marking the anniversary of his unjust death in Chinese custody, was organized on Friday at the Gangkyi Tibetan Library in the North Indian hill town of Dharamshala. A book about Rinpoche's life, authored by his niece Nyima Lhamo, was also released at the event.

Exile Tibetan Minister of Defence Gryari Dolma attended the event as the chief guest and honoured the memory of Tulku Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, a Tibetan freedom fighter who was wrongly accused and imprisoned by China. Speaking to ANI, Dolma Gyari said, 'Today marks the death anniversary of the renowned Tibetan freedom fighter and former political prisoner Tulku Tenzin Delek Rinpoche. He was arrested on false charges, spent a long time in Chinese prison, and ultimately died there. This event is to remember his death anniversary.'

During the event, Rinpoche's niece launched a book detailing her personal experiences from the time her family faced pressures and challenges due to the false charges against Rinpoche. She has written the book to speak the truth about her experiences.

Following this, Tibetan activist Sonam Tsering was also present at the event to honour Rinpoche's memory. He highlighted the ongoing struggles of Tibetans facing persecution in China and urged the Chinese government to free all Tibetan political prisoners.

Sonam Tsering also spoke with ANI, stating, 'Today marks the 10th anniversary of Tulku Rinpoche, a prominent Lama who passed away under Chinese torture and prosecution. We also demand that the Chinese Communist government release all Tibetan political prisoners.'

President Biden signs Resolve Tibet Act, strengthening US support for Tibet negotiations

12 July 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The United States has a message for Beijing: China's ongoing occupation of Tibet must be peacefully resolved through negotiation, not repression.

President Joe Biden signed the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act [read his message here], popularly known as the Resolve Tibet Act, earlier today. The law states that it is American policy that the Tibet issue must be resolved in accordance with international law by peaceful means, through dialogue without preconditions.

It also takes aim at China's lies about Tibet, calling on China to stop propagating disinformation about Tibet's history and giving the State Department a new mandate to directly counter these false claims.

"The Resolve Tibet Act cuts to the heart of China's brutal treatment of the Tibetan people," said Tencho Gyatso, President of the International Campaign for Tibet. "To Tibetans it is a statement of hope. To other countries it is a clarion call to support Tibet's peaceful struggle for human rights and democratic freedoms. And to Beijing it is a declaration that American support for Tibet does not come with an expiration date; China must resume dialogue and find a solution that supports the fundamental rights of the Tibetan people."

Empowering the Tibetan people

One key feature of the bill is defining the Tibetan people as a people with their own distinct religious, cultural, linguistic, and historical identity. It then states that Chinese policies are systematically suppressing the ability of the Tibetan people to preserve their way of life.

The Dalai Lama has repeatedly called for China to grant genuine autonomy to the Tibetan people, and it is clear under international law that people are entitled to self-determination. When House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul (R-TX) spoke before it passed Congress, he expressed his hopes that the new law will help “put the people of Tibet in charge of their own future.”

Secretary of State Antony Blinken frequently refers to support for self-determination as a core principle of American foreign policy. President Biden previously pledged to push Beijing to “return to direct dialogue with the representatives of the Tibetan people to achieve meaningful autonomy, respect for human rights, and the preservation of Tibet’s environment as well as its unique cultural, linguistic and religious traditions.”

Now that the Resolve Tibet Act is law, the onus is on the State Department and the White House to vigorously champion genuine negotiation and overcome Beijing’s stalling tactics.

“President Biden promised his administration would stand up for the people of Tibet,” said ICT President Tencho Gyatso. “There is not a moment to lose. Experienced State Department officials like Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues Uzra Zeya now have a valuable tool to elevate their calls for negotiations and fulfill the core objective of the Special Coordinator’s office: promoting substantive dialogue, without preconditions, between China and the Dalai Lama, his representatives, or democratically elected Tibetan leaders in support of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.”

Persistent advocacy for Tibet

The Resolve Tibet Act became law after three years of effort by a select group of members of Congress backed by a broad range of Tibet supporters and Tibetan Americans.

Senior leaders of the Central Tibetan Administration and the ICT board and staff met with Congressional leaders to brief them on the situation in Tibet and discuss how new initiatives could help. Representatives Jim McGovern (D-MA) and Michael McCaul (R-TX) took the lead in the House, while Senators Jeff Merkley (D-OR) and Todd Young (R-IN) introduced the bill in the Senate. All four leads and their staff worked tirelessly to put this law in place.

Advocates for Tibet helped at every step along the way. These efforts included testimony from international law scholars, grassroots advocacy by Tibetan Associations, waves of petitions from ICT members, record-breaking turnout at Tibet Lobby Day, and coordination between the Office of Tibet, the International Campaign for Tibet, Students for a Free Tibet, and other prominent Tibet groups.

“It was inspiring to witness such a positive response to the Resolve Tibet Act from across the country and around the world,” said ICT President Tencho Gyatso. “It is clear how much can be accomplished when citizens, organizations, and dedicated decision makers unite. Moving forward, I know we can build on today’s extraordinary accomplishment.”

“As His Holiness the Dalai Lama says, change only takes place through action,” she added.

To see a timeline of how the bill was crafted, introduced, and passed, please click here.

Quotes from Members of Congress and Tibetan leaders

The Resolve Tibet Act’s lead sponsors put out videos celebrating the passage of the bill, partially transcribed below. Separately, Tibetan leader Namgyal Choedup issued a statement:

Rep. Jim McGovern, D-MA, said: “I am thrilled. The United States once again affirms our strong support for the rights of the Tibetan people under international law, including their right to self-determination.

With its bipartisan passage, we hope to restart dialogue between Tibet and China to resolve the decades-long dispute over Tibet’s autonomy and governance in keeping with U.S. policy. The Tibetans are willing; the People’s Republic of China should come to the table.”

Rep. Michael McCaul, R-TX, said during his recent visit to Dharamsala: “We are here just one week after the House of Representatives and the Congress passed the Resolve Tibet Act. This bill makes it clear the United States believes Tibet has its own unique language, religion and culture, and has a right to self-determination. The bill also requires the State Department to aggressively challenge CCP propaganda about Tibet.”

Sen. Jeff Merkley, D-OR, said: “All people should have the right to live in peace and decide their own future. But the people of Tibet have not had those freedoms for more than 70 years. We just took an important step toward changing that.

President Biden signed into law my bipartisan bill to support Tibet, which passed Congress overwhelmingly. This bill empowers the State Department to counter the Chinese government’s attempt to rewrite or in some cases erase history, and it encourages dialogue between the leaders of Tibet and China to reach a peaceful resolution.”

Sen. Todd Young, R-IN, said: “Over the past several years, I’ve worked with my colleague Jeff Merkley on legislation to encourage a peaceful resolution to the dispute between Tibet and China.

I want to thank the Office of Tibet and the International Campaign for Tibet for your tireless advocacy for this legislation. Your brave leadership on this issue has been instrumental in making the case for why American leadership, grounded in liberal values like pluralism, religious freedom, and self-determination, is so critical to ensuring a safer, more secure future for Tibet and the Tibetan people.” Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration to North America Namgyal Choedup said: “The bipartisan and bicameral passage of the Tibet bill and the signing of the bill into law by President Biden is a huge moral boost to the Tibetan people, who continues to suffer PRC’s systematic repression. This is a clear indication of unwavering support of the US government and its people towards the just cause of Tibetan people. This is a call to Beijing that the only solution to Tibet China dispute is through dialogue and negotiation in good faith.”

What the bill does

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act states that it is US policy that the dispute between Tibet and China remains unresolved in accordance with international law.

The legislation also:

- Empowers the Special Coordinator for Tibet to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government and Communist Party, including working to ensure that US government statements and documents counter disinformation about Tibet.
- Rejects as “inaccurate” China’s false claims that Tibet has been part of China since “ancient times.”
- Promotes substantive dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community. The US could also explore activities to improve prospects for dialogue leading to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Affirms the State Department’s responsibility to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Encourages China’s government to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

Statement from President Joe Biden on S. 138, the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act”

12 July 2024, WH.GOV

Today, I have signed into law S. 138, the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act” (the “Act”). I share the Congress’s bipartisan commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage. My Administration will continue to call on the People’s Republic of China to resume direct dialogue, without preconditions, with the Dalai Lama, or his representatives, to seek a settlement that resolves differences and leads to a negotiated agreement on Tibet. The Act does not change longstanding bipartisan United States policy to recognize the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan areas of China as part of the People’s Republic of China -- a policy decision that falls within my authority to recognize foreign states and the territorial bounds of such states.

India and US support for the Dalai Lama and Tibetans upsets China

12 July 2024, The Pioneer, K.S. Tomar

India and America's identical and unequivocal stance on Tibet has rattled China, highlighting the evolving geopolitical dynamics in Asia

In a significant diplomatic move, both India and the United States have extended their support to the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan cause, provoking a strong reaction from China. The adoption of the Resolve Tibet Act by the US Congress and a recent high-profile meeting between a bipartisan American Congressional delegation and the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala have amplified the tensions between the US, India, and China. This article explores the strategic and ideological implications of these developments.

A Diplomatic Convergence:

The backdrop of this development is the increasingly strained relationship between the United States and China.

The US Congress's passage of the Resolve Tibet Act, which promises comprehensive support for the Tibetan cause, marks a clear stance against China's policies in Tibet. The meeting between the American delegation and the Dalai Lama further underscores this commitment.

In a related move, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi met with the US delegation, who congratulated him on his historic third-term election victory and praised the fairness and transparency of the recent Indian general elections. Modi's subsequent Twitter post highlighted the strong bipartisan support for advancing the India-US strategic partnership. Notably, the post did not mention the Dalai Lama, though it was clear the topic was a significant aspect of the discussions.

India's hosting of the Tibetan government-in-exile in Dharamshala places it in a unique position concerning the Tibetan cause. The Indian government has historically balanced its support for Tibet with its broader strategic and economic relations with China. The timing of the meetings suggests a coordinated diplomatic effort to highlight shared values and mutual interests in countering China's assertive policies.

Strategic Ramifications: The convergence of American and Indian interests reflects the evolving geopolitical landscape in Asia. Both nations share concerns about China's growing influence and assertive behavior, particularly in the Indo-Pacific region. By reinforcing their strategic partnership, the United States and India signal their commitment to a rules-based international order, countering China's ambitions.

In response, China is likely to intensify its efforts to strengthen alliances and expand its influence in the region. This could involve deepening ties with Pakistan, increasing engagement with other South Asian nations, and accelerating Belt and Road Initiative projects to secure strategic footholds. Additionally, China might enhance its military posture along disputed borders with India, particularly in Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh, to assert territorial claims.

Beyond immediate strategic calculations, these meetings highlight the broader ideological contest between democratic values and authoritarian governance. The Dalai Lama, a symbol of non-violent resistance and spiritual leadership, embodies values resonating with global advocates of democracy and human rights. Engaging with him reinforces the US and India's commitment to these principles.

China, facing scrutiny over its human rights record in Tibet, Xinjiang, and Hong Kong, is placed in a defensive position. In the global influence battle, soft power and moral authority are becoming increasingly important.

The Dharamshala and Delhi meetings enhance the soft power of the United States and India, positioning them as champions of human rights and democratic values.

The Path Forward: As the geopolitical chessboard in Asia becomes more complex, the interplay between diplomacy and deterrence will be crucial. The United States and India, through coordinated diplomatic actions, are setting the stage for a more assertive and collaborative approach to countering China's influence. This involves not only strengthening bilateral ties but also fostering broader coalitions with like-minded countries in the Indo-Pacific region.

The high-level US delegation, led by Republican Rep. Michael McCaul and including prominent figures like Democratic former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, discussed the relevance and significance of the Resolve Tibet Act. President Joe Biden, a strong advocate for Tibetan rights, is expected to approve the Act.

China's reaction has been predictably strong, warning the United States against sending the "wrong signal." The Chinese embassy in India emphasized China's stance on Tibet as an internal matter, condemning any perceived interference in its domestic affairs.

Conclusion

India and America's identical and unequivocal stance on Tibet has rattled China, highlighting the evolving geopolitical dynamics in Asia. The historical breach of trust by China in 1962, replicated in 2020 during the Ladakh confrontation, underscores the challenges in Sino-Indian relations. Prime Minister Modi's efforts to normalize ties with Beijing have not yielded desired results, reflecting the ongoing tension.

Adopting a more nuanced approach to diplomacy may help mitigate tensions while advancing China's strategic goals.

Japan to Host International Meeting on Support for Tibet Next June for 1st Time; Dalai Lama to Deliver Speech Online

11 July 2024, The Japan News, The Yomiuri Shimbun

Japan will hold an international meeting to discuss support for Tibetans early next June in Tokyo, it has been learned.

Since the first such meeting in 1994, talks on aiding the oppressed ethnic minority in China have mainly been held in the United States and Europe. It will be the first time for Japan to host.

The meeting is being backed by the cross-party Japan-Tibet Parliamentary Association, which is headed by former education minister Hakubun Shimomura and aims to boost support for Tibet.

The legislative body of Tibet's government in exile will run the meeting, with around 90 people including lawmakers and scholars to come from 26 countries. The Dalai Lama, exiled supreme leader of Tibetan Buddhism, is planned to deliver a speech online.

The parliamentary association includes 105 members of the Diet. Shu Watanabe, a member of the lower house for the Constitutional Democratic Party of Japan, serves as acting chair and Keiji Furuya, a member of the lower house for the Liberal Democratic Party who previously chaired the National Public Safety Commission, serves as vice chair.

In 2022, both houses of the Diet adopted a resolution expressing concern about human rights abuses in China including in Tibet.

Previously banned, Dalai Lama's 89th birthday celebrated in Nepal's capital

11 July 2024, Tibetan Review

The 89th birthday of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, usually clamped down on by the government of Nepal with preventive detentions, police deployments and onsite arrests due to its fear of offending China, appears to have been held in Kathmandu without a hitch this time as a religious and cultural event on Jul 6.

The event was held at the Hyolmo Monastery near the capital city's landmark Buddhist site of Boudha stupa.

Senior diplomats and officials from the European Union, Australia, Switzerland, France and the United States, attended the event, said the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) on its Tibet.net website Jul 10.

The chief guest was stated to be Sabchu Rinpoché, with the special guest being HH the Dalai Lama's representative at the Office of Tibet, CTA, Tsepri Lopan Tulku Ngawang Chokdup. His office previously organized the event until Nepal's crackdown came since many years ago.

Besides, prominent figures from Nepal's human rights groups such as Inhured International, Human Rights Organisation for Nepal, and HURON, as well as prominent individual human rights activists were stated to have attended the event which drew a crowd of more than 2000.

The celebrations, in fact, continued over two days filled with Tibetan opera and other Tibetan cultural performances, the report said.

However, Nepal still does not allow Tibetans to gather on Wednesdays to mark the Dalai Lama's weekly birthday with traditional folk group dances.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering's Visit to Ladakh: Engaging with Monasteries and Schools on a Cultural and Educational Journey

10 July 2024, CTA

On 9 July 2024, as part of the ongoing official visit in Ladakh, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) paid visits to monasteries under the jurisdiction of Department of Religion and Culture (CTA) and SOS Tibetan Children's Village School (TCV) and its branch schools in Choglamsar, along with the latter's affiliate Old People's Home. Sikyong was also honoured with a dinner reception at the Triksey Monastery hosted by Venerable Triksey Rinpoche.

Beginning from the Shewatsel Phodrang Gapheling, Sikyong paid obeisance to sacred icons in Leh-based Monasteries, namely Karma Drupgyu Choeling, Sheten Youngdrung Lhatse Bon Monastery, and Rutok Lhundup Choeling, as part of his second-day itinerary. At the same time, Sikyong held a brief meetings with the respective monastic administrations to discuss on necessities crucial for their sustenances.

Thereafter, Sikyong headed towards TCV Menlha and Agling branch schools to inspect education facilities over there. Likewise, Sikyong toured premises of Sonamling main TCV school, including its affiliate Old People's Home.

Sikyong later addressed the students and teachers of Ladakh TCV at its auditorium to apprise the gathering on the geo-political and strategic significance of the Tibetan plateau and its environment that has immense potential to bring harmony in the region, the imperativeness of maintaining the unique cultural and linguistic heritage of Tibet amidst intensifies restrictions and systematic annihilations of Tibetan identity in Tibet under CCP, and benefits of the Tibetan Buddhist culture in bringing about global peace. Given the CCP's continued repression and manipulation over these matters, Sikyong underscored CTA's policy of the Middle Way Approach that is pragmatically actionable and has the potential to resolve the longstanding Tibet-China conflict. In light of this, Sikyong briefly touched on the passage of the Resolve Tibet Act in both houses of the United States with unanimous bipartisan support. Hence, to strengthen and continue the Tibetan freedom struggle, Sikyong implored teachers to educate students on these issues during class and advised students to enhance their knowledge of Tibet's current status.

Following Sikyong's address, a Q&A session was held with students in which he delved into an array of issues concerning the Tibet cause as well as student's education.

Additionally, Sikyong conducted an inspection of the housing projects currently underway in Choglamsar where he toured the project site and interacted with the residents of Maque and Chushul, who are about to relocate to the project site area after its completion.

Later in the evening, Sikyong attended a dinner reception hosted by Triksey Rinpoche. It was also joined by the honourable Chairman of the Ladakh Autonomous Hill Development Council, Shri Tashi Gyaltsen, and Deputy Chair Tsering Angchuk, along with Councillors and prominent officials of Ladakh UT.

Throughout these programmes, Sikyong was accompanied by Chief Representative Officer Dhondup Tashi and Joint Secretary Tashi Dickey from the Department of Home (CTA).

China's Interference in the Succession of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama Unacceptable

10 July 2024, CTA

In a press release issued on the occasion of the 89th birthday of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, the Interparliamentary group for Tibet in the French Senate led by Senator Jacqueline Eustache-Brinio asserts that the life of His Holiness Dalai Lama, heir to a long historical lineage, is inseparable from the destiny of his people and Tibetan Buddhism. As such, it is unacceptable for the Chinese authorities to interfere in the process of appointing the spiritual leader of the Tibetans, since it is undeniable and legitimate that the choice of a possible successor to the 14th Dalai Lama should be made by Tibetans alone.

In the same communication, the Senator also recalls His Holiness the Dalai Lama's contribution to his people and the world at large.

The full statement in French can be read here

– Filed by Office of Tibet, Brussels

"He was being playful": Delhi High Court rejects plea for POCSO action against Dalai Lama for kissing child

09 July 2024, Bar and Bench, Prashant Jha

The Delhi High Court on Tuesday rejected a plea seeking action under the Protection of Children from Sexual Offence Act (POCSO Act) against the spiritual leader Dalai Lama for kissing a child on the lips [Confederation of NGOs & Anr v Union of India & Ors].

A Division Bench of Acting Chief Justice Manmohan and Justice Tushar Rao Gedela rejected the plea filed by a bunch of non-governmental organizations.

"Dalai Lama has apologised for it. He has said he was just trying to be playful. It should be seen in the context of Tibetan culture," the Court observed.

Dalai Lama relocates to Syracuse, NY for recovery from knee surgery

09 July 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The revered exiled spiritual leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama, departed the Park Hyatt hotel in New York early Tuesday morning to a temporary residence in Syracuse, New York, to aid his recovery and undergo follow-up physiotherapy in the coming days.

The Dalai Lama, who recently had knee replacement surgery at the Hospital for Special Surgery (HSS) in New York, had been staying at the Park Hyatt since his discharge from the hospital. According to his personal physicians, Dr. Tsetan Dorjee Sadhutsang and Dr. Tsewang Tamdin, the octogenarian leader's recovery is progressing positively, prompting the move to a more accommodating environment for his continued recovery.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

"His Holiness is recovering exceptionally well and is able to walk. Soon, he will move to a place with a better environment. Tibetans inside Tibet and in exile should not be worried about his condition. There's nothing to worry about," stated Dr. Tsetan D. Sadhutsang.

In a medical bulletin, Dr. David J. Mayman, Chief of the Adult Reconstruction and Joint Replacement Service at HSS, detailed the recovery process earlier. "During the first week after knee replacement, the primary objective is to minimise inflammation and swelling. His Holiness is mobile and walking with our physical therapy team." "I would expect His Holiness to continue to improve in terms of his knee and walking over this coming year," Dr. Mayman said.

Tibetans in New York city welcoming H.H. the Dalai Lama (Photo/Indianeconomicobserver)

Meanwhile, a large number of Tibetans and followers of the Dalai Lama gathered outside the Park Hyatt hotel early in the morning to see their leader off, expressing strong emotions and chanting longevity prayers for his swift recovery. International leaders, followers and well-wishers have poured in with their message of love and speedy recovery for the much admired religious leader.

China condemns US and India's Dalai Lama birthday greetings as subversive, reiterates vow of its own successor to him

08 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China's party-government experts have condemned the United States and India for conveying their greetings to the exile spiritual leader of Tibet on his 89th birthday on Jul 6. They have condemned their actions as attempts to play "the so-called Dalai card" to contain China, according to China's official globaltimes.cn Jul 7.

When asked whether the actions of the US Secretary of State Antony Blinken and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi may imply an intention to contain China by playing the so-called Dalai card, Zhu Weiqun, former head of the Ethnic and Religious Affairs Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, affirmed such intention, the report said.

Without explaining what he meant by it, Zhu has maintained that "such attempts are increasingly ineffective as the influence of the Dalai clique has been declining, which is an inevitable historical trend."

"The attempts of the US and India are a self-consoling elegy," he has said.

Blinken extended his birthday greetings to the Dalai Lama in a statement on the website of the US Department of State while Modi did so in an X (formerly Twitter) post, wishing him a long life.

The report also had Chinese analysts refuting a Reuters report Jul 6, titled as titled "As the Dalai Lama turns 89, exiled Tibetans fear a future without him."

"The initiative of finding the successor of Dalai Lama is firmly held by the Chinese central government," Zhu has asserted, emphasizing that "the finding work will definitely be in accordance with relevant policies and the sincere wishes of religious believers in Xizang, and will never be based on the fantasies of the separatist Dalai clique."

Dalai Lama Succession: US, India Don't Want China Involved

08 July 2024, India West Journal

In a monastery beneath snow-capped mountains in northern India, the Buddhist monk entrusted with protecting the Dalai Lama and foretelling his people's future is concerned.

The Dalai Lama has turned 89 and China insists it will choose his successor as Tibet's chief spiritual leader. That has the Medium of Tibet's Chief State Oracle contemplating what might come next.

"His Holiness is the fourteenth Dalai Lama, then there will be a fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth," the Medium, known as the Nechung, said. "In countries, leaders change, and then that story is over. But in Tibet it works differently."

Tibetan Buddhists believe that learned monastics are reincarnated after death as newborns. The Dalai Lama, who is currently recuperating in the United States from a medical procedure, has said he will clarify questions about succession – including if and where he will be reincarnated – around his ninetieth birthday. As part of a reincarnation identification process, the medium will enter a trance to consult the oracle.

The incumbent Dalai Lama is a charismatic figure who popularized Buddhism internationally and won a Nobel Peace Prize in 1989 for keeping alive the Tibetan cause in exile. Beijing sees him as a dangerous separatist, though he has embraced what he calls a "Middle Way" of peacefully seeking genuine autonomy and religious freedom within China.

Any successor will be inexperienced and unknown on the global stage. That has sparked concerns about whether the movement will lose momentum or grow more radical amid heightened tensions between Beijing and Washington, long a source of bipartisan support for the Central Tibetan Administration, Tibet's government-in-exile.

The CTA and its partners in the West as well as India, which has hosted the Dalai Lama in the Himalayan foothills for more than six decades, are preparing for a future without his influential presence.

President Joe Biden is expected to soon sign a bill that requires the State Department to counter what it calls Chinese "disinformation" that Tibet, which was annexed by the People's Republic of China in 1951, has been part of China since ancient times.

"China wants recognition that Tibet has been part of China ... throughout history, and this bill is suggesting that it would be relatively easy for Tibet supporters to get a western government to refuse to give recognition for such an extensive claim," said Tibet specialist Robert Barnett of London's School of Oriental and African Studies.

U.S. lawmakers, including former House speaker Nancy Pelosi, visited the Dalai Lama in June to celebrate Congress passing the legislation, which Sikyong Penpa Tsering, who heads the CTA, called a "breakthrough."

The bill is part of a strategic shift away from emphasizing Chinese rights violations such as forced assimilation, the Sikyong, or political leader. Since 2021, CTA has lobbied two dozen countries including the U.S., to publicly undermine Beijing's narrative that Tibet has always been part of China, he said.

With U.S. weight behind this strategy, the exiles hope to push China to the negotiating table, he said. "If every country keeps saying that Tibet is part of the People's Republic of China, then where is the reason for China to come and talk to us?"

The Chinese foreign ministry said in response to Reuters' questions that it would be open to discussions with the Dalai Lama about his "personal future" if he "truly gives up his position of splitting the motherland" and recognized Tibet as an unalienable part of China.

Beijing, which has not held official talks with the Dalai Lama's representatives since 2010, has also urged Biden not to sign the bill.

The office of the Dalai Lama, who has in recent years apologized for remarks he made about women and to a young child, referred an interview request to the Sikyong.

Succession

Most historians say Tibet was assimilated into the Mongol empire during the 13th-14th century Yuan dynasty, which also covered large parts of present-day China. Beijing says that established its sovereign claim, though scholars believe the relationship varied greatly over the centuries and remote Tibet largely governed itself for much of the time.

In 1995, atheist China and the Dalai Lama separately identified two boys as the Panchen Lama, the second-most-important Tibetan Buddhist leader. The Dalai Lama's pick was taken away by Chinese authorities and has not been seen since.

Many Buddhists consider Beijing's choice illegitimate, though most expect a similar parallel selection for the next Dalai Lama given the Chinese government's stance that he must reincarnate, and it must approve the successor.

Chinese authorities have "tried to insert themselves into the succession of the Dalai Lama but we will not let that happen," said Michael McCaul, Republican chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee during his Dharamsala visit.

India, whose troops clashed with China near the Tibetan plateau in 2022, has been less vocal about its position on succession.

"The U.S. ... does not have to worry about border incursions as India does," said Donald Camp, a former top South Asia official on the U.S. National Security Council.

But as home to tens of thousands of Tibetans and an ascendant voice on the global stage, Delhi will be pulled into the fray, observers of Indian diplomacy say. Hawkish commentators have already called on Prime Minister Narendra Modi to meet with the Dalai Lama as a way of pressuring China.

Delhi's Ministry of External Affairs declined to comment on the succession but its former ambassador to China, Ashok Kantha, said India would not be "comfortable with China trying to control that process."

"Privately we have told China ... that for them the best option is engaging with the Dalai Lama and his representatives," said Kantha. "Post-fourteenth Dalai Lama we don't know what will happen."

The respect that the Dalai Lama commands among Tibetan exiles has kept in check frustrations and a formal push for independence, though it isn't clear if that balance will be maintained following his death

Sonam Wangchuk demands Bharat Ratna for Dalai Lama

08 July 2024, The Earth News

Renowned climate activist and innovator Sonam Wangchuk has called for India's highest civilian award, the Bharat Ratna, to be conferred upon His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso. This appeal was made on the auspicious occasion of the Dalai Lama's 89th birthday, highlighting his lifelong dedication to peace, compassion, and humanity.

In a heartfelt video message posted on X, Wangchuk emphasized the Dalai Lama's unparalleled contributions to global harmony, spiritual teachings, and advocacy for non-violence. He noted that the Dalai Lama has dedicated his life to promoting the values of compassion, peace, and understanding, making him a tremendous ambassador of Indian values and culture to the world. "Bestowing the Bharat Ratna upon him would be a fitting acknowledgment of his tireless efforts and a message of support for his enduring legacy," Wangchuk stated.

The post captioned, HH THE #DALAILAMA, has been the biggest ambassador of Indian values in the world. Today 6th July is His birthday. Let's give Him a befitting gift from India.

Wangchuk also highlighted the Dalai Lama's influential role in promoting interfaith dialogue, environmental consciousness, and the preservation of Tibetan culture. "In a world facing unprecedented challenges, His Holiness has been a beacon of hope and wisdom. His teachings on compassion and sustainability resonate deeply with the principles of our nation," he added.

The Dalai Lama, born on July 6, 1935, in Taktser, Amdo, Tibet, has been a global spiritual leader and a symbol of the Tibetan struggle for autonomy. Despite living in exile for over six decades, he continues to inspire millions worldwide with his message of love and forgiveness.

Wangchuk's appeal has garnered widespread support from various quarters, including social activists, religious leaders, and political figures. Many believe that honouring the Dalai Lama with the Bharat Ratna would not only celebrate his contributions but also reinforce the values of peace and compassion in the contemporary world.

PM Modi sends greetings to the Dalai Lama on his 89th birthday

07 July 2024, Deccan Herald, Anirban Bhaumik

This is the fourth year in a row the prime minister went public about his greetings to the Tibetan Buddhist monk on his birthday. He started doing it in 2021, apparently to send a message to Beijing in the wake of China's aggressive moves along its Line of Actual Control (LAC) with India.

New Delhi: Prime Minister Narendra Modi on Saturday sent greetings to the 14th Dalai Lama on occasion of the 89th birthday of the monk and prayed for his long life, disregarding Beijing's objection to such greetings to the icon of the global campaign against the occupation of Tibet by China. The Dalai Lama has been living in exile in India since 1959. He is currently in the United States recuperating after knee surgery.

"Sent my greetings to His Holiness @DalaiLama on the occasion of his 89th birthday. Pray for his quick recovery after knee surgery, good health, and long life", the prime minister wrote on X.

This is the fourth year in a row the prime minister went public about his greetings to the Tibetan Buddhist monk on his birthday. He started doing it in 2021, apparently to send a message to Beijing in the wake of China's aggressive moves along its Line of Actual Control (LAC) with India.

The military stand-off along the LAC brought down the relations between India and China to a new low.

"Beijing had strongly reacted after Modi had called and greeted the Dalai Lama last year. The Indian side should fully recognise the anti-China separatist nature of the 14th Dalai Lama. It should abide by its commitment to China, speak and act prudently, and stop using Tibet-related issues to interfere in China's internal affairs", a spokesperson of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese Government had told journalists in Beijing.

The Dalai Lama has been living in exile in India following his 1959 escape from Tibet, which had been occupied by the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) in 1950-51.

The monk, a staunch advocate for non-violence and freedom, was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989. He has been arguing for "genuine autonomy" – not independence from the Chinese Government's rule – for Tibet. Beijing, however, still calls him a "separatist" and accuses him of running a campaign to split China.

His meeting with the then Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in August 2010 or his visit to Rashtrapati Bhavan on an invitation from then President Pranab Mukherjee in December 2016 had triggered strong protests from China. So did New Delhi's decisions in 2009 and 2017 to allow him to visit Arunachal Pradesh, where China claims nearly 90,000 sq. km of Indian territory to be its own.

Modi, however, did not have any public contact or engagement with the Dalai Lama till 2021, ostensibly to avoid hurting the sensitivity of China. He did not change the policy of maintaining distance from the Dalai Lama and refrained from publicly wishing the octogenarian on his birthday on July 6, 2020, even though New Delhi's relations with Beijing nosedived after the June 15, 2020 clash between the Indian Army and the Chinese People's Liberation Army along the LAC in Galwan Valley in eastern Ladakh.

The Dalai Lama turns 89; exiled Tibetans fear future without him

06 July 2024, VOA

In a monastery beneath snow-capped mountains in northern India, the Buddhist monk entrusted with protecting the Dalai Lama and foretelling his people's future is concerned.

The Dalai Lama turns 89 on Saturday and China insists it will choose his successor as Tibet's chief spiritual leader.

That has the Medium of Tibet's Chief State Oracle contemplating what might come next.

"His Holiness is the fourteenth Dalai Lama, then there will be a fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth," the medium, known as the Nechung, said. "In countries, leaders change, and then that story is over. But in Tibet it works differently."

Tibetan Buddhists believe that learned monastics are reincarnated after death as newborns. The Dalai Lama, who is currently recuperating in the United States from a medical procedure, has said he will clarify questions about succession - including if and where he will be reincarnated - around his ninetieth birthday. As part of a reincarnation identification process, the medium will enter a trance to consult the oracle.

The incumbent Dalai Lama is a charismatic figure who popularized Buddhism internationally and won a Nobel Peace Prize in 1989 for keeping alive the Tibetan cause in exile. Beijing sees him as a dangerous separatist, though he has embraced what he calls a "Middle Way" of peacefully seeking genuine autonomy and religious freedom within China.

Any successor will be inexperienced and unknown on the global stage. That has sparked concerns about whether the movement will lose momentum or grow more radical amid heightened tensions between Beijing and Washington, long a source of bipartisan support for the Central Tibetan Administration, or CTA, Tibet's government-in-exile.

The CTA and its partners in the West, as well as India, which has hosted the Dalai Lama in the Himalayan foothills for more than six decades, are preparing for a future without his influential presence.

U.S. President Joe Biden is expected to soon sign a bill that requires the State Department to counter what it calls Chinese "disinformation" that Tibet, which was annexed by the People's Republic of China in 1951, has been part of China since ancient times.

"China wants recognition that Tibet has been part of China ... throughout history, and this bill is suggesting that it would be relatively easy for Tibet supporters to get a western government to refuse to give recognition for such an extensive claim," said Tibet specialist Robert Barnett of London's School of Oriental and African Studies.

U.S. lawmakers, including former House speaker Nancy Pelosi, visited the Dalai Lama in June to celebrate Congress passing the legislation, which Sikyong Penpa Tsering, who heads the CTA, called a "breakthrough."

The bill is part of a strategic shift away from emphasizing Chinese rights violations such as forced assimilation, the Sikyong, or political leader, told Reuters. Since 2021, CTA has lobbied two dozen countries including the U.S., to publicly undermine Beijing's narrative that Tibet has always been part of China, he said.

With U.S. weight behind this strategy, the exiles hope to push China to the negotiating table, he said. "If every country keeps saying that Tibet is part of the People's Republic of China, then where is the reason for China to come and talk to us?"

The Chinese foreign ministry said in response to Reuters' questions that it would be open to discussions with the Dalai Lama about his "personal future" if he "truly gives up his position of splitting the motherland" and recognized Tibet as an unalienable part of China.

Beijing, which has not held official talks with the Dalai Lama's representatives since 2010, has also urged Biden not to sign the bill.

The office of the Dalai Lama, who has in recent years apologized for remarks he made about women and to a young child, referred an interview request to the Sikyong.

Succession questions

Most historians say Tibet was assimilated into the Mongol empire during the 13th-14th century Yuan dynasty, which also covered large parts of present day China. Beijing says that established its sovereign claim, though scholars believe the relationship varied greatly over the centuries and remote Tibet largely governed itself for much of the time.

The People's Liberation Army marched into Tibet in 1950 and announced its "peaceful liberation." After a failed uprising against Chinese rule in 1959, a young Dalai Lama fled into exile in India.

In 1995, atheist China and the Dalai Lama separately identified two boys as the Panchen Lama, the second-most-important Tibetan Buddhist leader. The Dalai Lama's pick was taken away by Chinese authorities and has not been seen since.

Many Buddhists consider Beijing's choice illegitimate, though most expect a similar parallel selection for the next Dalai Lama, given the Chinese government's stance that he must reincarnate, and it must approve the successor.

Chinese authorities have "tried to insert themselves into the succession of the Dalai Lama but we will not let that happen," said Michael McCaul, Republican chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee during his Dharamsala visit.

World Tibet Day - Showcasing Uniqueness Of Tibetan Culture, Thought

06 July 2024, ETV Bharat

World Tibet Day is observed every year on July 6. It aims to increase awareness of the genocidal threats to the Tibetan people, and showcase the uniqueness of Tibetan culture and thought.

July 6 is observed as World Tibet Day, marking the birthday of His Holiness, the XIV Dalai Lama of Tibet. It aims to help restore essential freedoms for those living in Chinese-occupied Tibet, increase awareness of the genocidal threats to the Tibetan people, and showcase the uniqueness of Tibetan culture and thought.

Tibet is a region in East Asia, centred on the Tibetan Plateau north of the Himalayas. It is technically part of China, but it has had a long history as an independent power, and its rule by China is controversial. Tibet's unique form of Buddhism is its predominant religion and the central part of its culture.

Who is Called Dalai Lama: Dalai Lama is called the biggest religious leader of Tibet. Lama means Guru who inspires his people to follow the right path.

The current 14th Dalai Lama of Tibet, Tenzin Gyatso, has been living in India since 1959. The Dalai Lama lives in Dharamsala, Himachal Pradesh and from here he runs the Tibetan government in exile.

In 1937, the child was declared the reincarnation of a great Buddhist spiritual leader and named the 14th Dalai Lama. His leadership rights were exercised by a regency until 1950. That same year, he was forced to flee by the Chinese but negotiated an agreement and returned to lead Tibet for the next eight years.

On March 17, 1959, an unsuccessful Tibetan nationalist uprising led to a crackdown by China, and the Dalai Lama fled to Punjab, India, where he established his democratic government in exile. In 1989, he won the Nobel Peace Prize for his commitment to the nonviolent liberation of Tibet.

Dalai Lama Sent A Message To Nehru: After reaching Lhotse Zog, Dalai Lama performed the ceremony of forming the new Tibetan government. But by then it was clear that Dalai Lama's life was in great danger while staying in Tibet. Therefore, messages were sent to India and America that the Dalai Lama wanted to cross the border and take refuge in India.

John Greeny, a senior CIA officer, received this message on March 28. He immediately sent information to Delhi and informed about the Dalai Lama's intention. Earlier on March 26, Dalai Lama had sent a message to India's Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, "Indian people are known all over the world for supporting human values. We are entering India from the Sona area. We hope that you will make arrangements for our stay on Indian soil. We have full faith in your kindness." Nehru immediately said 'yes' to this.

23 May 1951 - Tibetans consider this day a black day, while the Chinese call it a day of peace efforts. On this day, Tibet signed an agreement with China. With this agreement, Tibet was occupied by China.

History Of Tibet Since The Chinese Invasion: China's newly established communist government sent troops to invade Tibet in 1949-50. An agreement was imposed on the Tibetan government in May of 1951, acknowledging sovereignty over Tibet but recognising the Tibetan government's autonomy with respect to Tibet's internal affairs. As the Chinese consolidated their control, they repeatedly violated the treaty and open resistance to their rule grew, leading to the National Uprising in 1959 and the flight into India of the Dalai Lama.

The international community reacted with shock at the events in Tibet. The question of Tibet was discussed on numerous occasions by the UN General Assembly between 1959 and 1965. Three resolutions were passed by the General Assembly condemning China's violations of human rights in Tibet and calling upon China to respect those rights, including Tibet's right to self-determination.

Penpa Tsering, Sikyong of CTA raises concern as China imposes restrictions ahead of Dalai Lama's 89th birthday

05 July 2024, ANI

President of the Central Tibetan Administration of the Tibetan government-in-exile, Penpa Tsering Sikyong, expressed regret that Tibetans cannot celebrate the 89th birthday of their spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, on July 6 in his birthplace due to China's restrictions.

Conveying his message to all Tibetans, Sikyong said, "It is a joyous occasion for us who have the freedom to celebrate his birthday, but for Tibetans inside, of course, they still have to be bound by the restrictions that the Chinese government has imposed on not being able to celebrate Dalai Lama's birthday in the place of his birth."

The 14th Dalai Lama, known to the Tibetan people as Gyalwa Rinpoche, is the current Dalai Lama, also the highest spiritual leader and head of Tibet. The Chinese government is intensifying already stringent social media restrictions on Tibetans to keep them from celebrating the July 6 birthday of the Dalai Lama.

While speaking to ANI on Friday, he urged Tibetans to unite and support the Dalai Lama's efforts to keep the Tibetan issue alive.

"So that is very unfortunate but people have learned to understand the situation and the Chinese government is always very nervous around this time. Dalai Lama is going to be 89 this year, so to all the Tibetans inside and outside, I keep saying we see his holiness reincarnation of Aviloteshwara and so far, he alone travelled around the world with his folded hands and made sure that the Tibet issue is alive and one form of Aviloktेशvara is a thousand eyes, thousand hands, now I ask Tibetans inside and outside to be one eye and one hand of Dalai Lama," said Sikyong .

Dalai Lama is in United States these days, as he went there for knee surgery. Talking about Dalai Lama's health, Sikyong said, "Dalai Lama's health is improving. The surgery went very well on the 28th of the last month and it was a short surgery and now he is in the recovery section and he will move somewhere to have physiotherapy for a complete recovery."

The US has also come up with a new law in support of Tibet and Tibetans are waiting for US President Biden to sign new legislation, the 'Tibet Resolve Act'. Commenting on the government of India's vision or policy towards China, Sikyong said, "I keep saying that I am nobody to advise the Indian government and they are much smarter. People working at the top there and we of course work with them and yeah when a lot of things are happening, when there are lot of things on the table, it is also important to think about recalibration depending on the changing political scenario..."

The Chinese government labels Tibet as a "socialist paradise," but the CTA President questions why they don't allow people to see it for themselves if that's truly the case.

"Sometimes we get to know only after things have happened, one or two weeks or sometimes even one month after things have happened because the Chinese government knows that the world community and the media need evidence so they don't allow people to come and see for themselves. They call Tibet a socialist paradise so we keep asking, If Tibet is a socialist paradise, then why don't you allow people to see for themselves?," said CTA President "Instead of going into a very single detail about what is happening inside Tibet, all I could say is that we're dying a slow death," he added.

Tibetan Buddhism originated from India and Tibetans consider themselves a part of Indian culture, said Tsering, adding that China is trying to erase Tibetan culture and replace it with Chinese culture, which will also affect India.

"Tibetan Buddhism came from India. We consider ourselves as an extension of Indian culture. Because we have translated every available Sanskrit and Pali text into Tibetan way back from the 8th to 13th century. So today it is being destroyed and this will also have implications for India because what China is trying to do is turn every young Tibetan into a Chinese," said Tsering.

China considers Dalai Lama, who has been living in exile in India for decades, a separatist intending to split the formerly independent region from the control of China, as per UCA News.

Chinese forces invaded and annexed Tibet in the 1950s under the pretext that it had always been a part of China. (ANI)

As UPR concludes, UN Human Rights Council voices clear criticism of China's abuses in Tibet

04 July 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The United Nations Human Rights Council has once again issued substantive criticism of Beijing's systematic human rights violations against Tibetans, Uyghurs, Hong Kongers and Chinese. This evaluation of China's human rights record came during China's Universal Periodic Review (UPR), which takes place every four and a half years and whose final report was adopted by the UN Human Rights Council today.

Despite intense lobbying by Beijing and the deployment of an array of non-governmental organizations controlled by the Chinese government (government-organized non-government organizations, or GONGOs), 21 states addressed the situation in Tibet. This was the largest number since China underwent its first review in 2009.

The United Kingdom made the following statement: "China tried to claim that the Office of the High Commissioners' authoritative Xinjiang assessment is, and I quote: illegal and void. It is neither. Let me again urge China to end its persecution and arbitrary detention of Uyghurs and Tibetans and to allow genuine freedom of religion and expression."

The United States also made a statement, saying, "The United States condemns the human rights abuses in Tibet, Inner Mongolia, and across China."

As expected, the Chinese government rejected substantial recommendations, or in some cases "accepted" them with the argument that various human rights standards had "already been implemented." These claims are in clear contradiction to the reality in Tibet, as has been stated many times by independent UN human rights experts.

ICT Executive Director Kai Müller said: "No matter how hard they try, the Chinese government cannot conceal what is happening in Tibet. However, it is a cause for concern that more and more states are apparently allowing themselves to be put under pressure by China and are singing Beijing's song. The large number of GONGOs on the Human Rights Council is also a serious impediment to the proper functioning of these processes.

"On the other hand, it is positive that more states than ever before have critically addressed the situation in Tibet and called for change. Especially as a member of the UN Security Council, China must comply with international rules, and human rights are a central part of this," Müller continued.

Increased criticism

Compared to the UPR review six years ago, 21 states – up from nine – expressed substantial criticism of China's human rights record in Tibet and 19 states made recommendations. The so-called "Advanced Questions" to China, which could be submitted to the Chinese government in advance, indicated increased interest. Twice as many of these questions were submitted compared to 2018.

The review took place in a tense climate, as the Chinese government was once again present with an unusually large delegation of diplomats. Beijing also mobilized a large number of GONGOs that strictly repeat the party line. Of the 67 organizations registered to speak at the Human Rights Council, at least 25 were Chinese GONGOs and another five were GONGOs from friendly authoritarian states such as Russia or Cuba. At the same time, a large number of states used their speaking time for statements supportive of Chinese policies.

ICT advocacy

ICT advocacy staffer Melanie Blondelle was able to deliver a statement on behalf of the Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights in the plenary session of the Human Rights Council. Blondelle:

"Over the past two years, several UN human rights bodies have raised the alarm over the escalation of human rights violations in Tibet. These include the boarding school system that has separated nearly one million Tibetan children from their families and communities, extensive forced labor programs, massive displacement of the rural Tibetan population, and the imprisonment of Tibetan environmentalists. Tibetans continue to face torture, death in custody and enforced disappearances at the hands of the Chinese state.

As a result, an unprecedented number of states have made recommendations and raised preliminary questions on Tibet, expressing the growing concern of the international community. We strongly welcome this expression of genuine concern, which not only recognizes the situation on the ground, but also protects the credibility of the Human Rights Council itself.”

In her statement on behalf of the Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights, Blondelle also pointed out that several nations had called on the Chinese government to grant open, independent and unrestricted access to Tibet, including through the UN OHCHR and special rapporteurs. China is consistently blocking this access and instead spreading disinformation in which alleged social progress is used to justify its repressive tactics. The international community must see through this barely disguised strategy and insist on the universality and indivisibility of human rights, Blondelle continued.

Appendix: Statement in the original text

Item 6: UPR outcomes

Statement delivered by Mélanie Blondelle on behalf of the Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights – Check against delivery

Mr. President,

Over the last two years, multiple UN human rights bodies raised alarm at the escalation of human rights violations in Tibet. This includes nearly one million Tibetan children separated from their families and forced into Mandarin dominated schools; extensive forced labor transfer programs; massive dislocation of the rural Tibetan population; and imprisonment of Tibetan environmental and human rights defenders. Tibetans are routinely tortured, die in custody, and are disappeared.

An unprecedented number of states offered recommendations and submitted advance questions on Tibet, demonstrating the international community’s dismay. We welcome this expression of genuine concern, which does not only acknowledge the situation on the ground, but also protects the credibility of the Human Rights Council itself.

China’s predicted rejection of almost 70% of the 23 Tibet-specific recommendations and its listing of the remainder as ‘accepted and already implemented’, contradicts verified facts.

Several states and the EU called on China to provide independent and unfettered access to Tibet, including by UN OHCHR and Special Rapporteurs. China consistently blocks such access, opting instead to spread disinformation alleging social progress as justification for its oppressive tactics. The international community must see through this thinly veiled strategy and insist on the universality and indivisibility of human rights.

We also stress that Tibetans in Tibet are not able to engage freely with UN mechanisms, foremost the UPR due to the pervasive climate of fear instilled by decades long oppression.

Despite this dire situation, options exist to achieve peaceful change. The Dalai Lama continues to pursue a path to invite dialogue and mutual understanding. The Chinese government should seize this opportunity, and the international community should press China, a Permanent Member of the UN Security Council, to fully respect the rights of the Tibetan people and to address the root causes for the conflict on the plateau.

Tibet is a test of the UN Human Rights Council’s ability to uphold universal human rights, through the UPR and beyond. It is a test it must not fail.

Dalai Lama’s followers pray for his knee surgery recovery outside makeshift ‘temple’ — a ritzy NYC hotel

04 July 2024, New York Post, Caitlin McCormack and Matt Troutman

They’re Tibet-ing on a speedy recovery.

Acolytes of the Dalai Lama congregated during the July Fourth holiday outside Midtown’s ritzy Park Hyatt Hotel, where the exiled leader of Tibetan Buddhism is recuperating from knee replacement surgery.

Throngs of Dalai devotees, some wearing traditional Tibetan garb and prayer beads, posed for photos and prayed outside the West 57th Street hotel Thursday, walking around the block clockwise as if it were a Buddhist temple.

“We believe that if you circumambulate, it’s offering us good luck in our future and in our present also,” said Yonten Dorjee, 40, of Kew Gardens, Queens.

“We imagine this as our temple and His Holiness is inside,” Dorjee’s wife, Kalsang Youdon, 45, said.

Acolytes offered prayers to the Dalai Lama’s recovery and sought to circumambulate the Park Hyatt hotel.

The Dalai Lama arrived in New York City in late June — his first trip to the US since 2017 — to undergo knee replacement surgery at the Hospital for Special Surgery.

The 88-year-old Nobel Peace Prize laureate, who fled to India in 1959 after a failed uprising against Chinese rule in Tibet, has suffered health problems for years.

His June 28 surgery was successful and he's expected to make a full recovery after his discharge a day later, said David J. Mayman, the chief of adult reconstruction and joint replacement service at the Upper East Side hospital, in a statement.

"His Holiness's personal medical team and office were in constant communication with the surgical and medical staff at HSS," Mayman said.

It's unclear how long the Dalai Lama will be recovering at the five-star hotel across from Carnegie Hall, where admirers' have been making daily devotional visits, Gothamist first reported.

Existence may be suffering, as the Buddha taught, but the mood outside the hotel has been joyous.

The Dalai Lama's personal cook Tenzin Pasang made an appearance at one point Thursday and was immediately greeted by spectators as though he were Taylor Swift.

"I heard that [the Dalai Lama's] treatments were successful, so that's why we're very happy," said Kalsang Phuntsok, 58, who brought his family from Jackson Heights.

"He shares wisdom throughout all of Tibet and India, and my family is so proud of what he's done," said Phuntsok's son Baruwa Kunshey, 11.

China views the Dalai Lama as a dangerous separatist, a charge the religious leader has dismissed.

Indeed, his New York City visit came shortly after a bipartisan House delegation visited him in northern India – a trip that drew a threatening letter from China's embassy to the US.

"The visit interferes with China's internal affairs, violates China's sovereignty and territorial integrity," the letter stated.

"Free Tibet" chatter was scarce outside the Park Hyatt among the Independence Day crowd.

For Ella Krivova, 37, an Upper East Sider who was grateful for the holiday off so she could spend more time near the Dalai Lama, the religious leader's presence itself was a "precious opportunity."

"This city can be so materialistic, being here helps you to be closer to the teaching and to develop and deepen your life," she said.

"His mindstream is very vast and kind and generous so it's to be connected to the teaching and to liberate and help other people in the future."

2nd International Tibet Youth Forum Commences in Dharamshala, Sikyong Calls for Unified Efforts in Advocating for Tibet

03 July 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering addressing the gathering.
Photo / Tenzin Phende / CTA

The Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR), Central Tibetan Administration, earlier today commenced the 2nd International Tibet Youth Forum, a hallmark initiative of the 16th Kashag, in Dharamshala that brought together over 100 Tibetan youths representing diverse educational and professional backgrounds from more than 13 countries.

The inaugural session of this three-day seminar, from 3 to 5 July, was honoured by the presence of Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the democratically elected leader of the Central Tibetan Administration, who presided over the proceedings with grace and conviction. Secretary Karma Choeying and Additional Secretary Tenzin Lekshay from the DIIR also graced the occasion with their presence.

Following the arrival of the guests and participants at the venue, Secretary Karma Choeying delivered a welcome address to emphasise the importance of this conference. He stated that in this critical time of generational transition, it is paramount for younger Tibetans to inherit the mantle of our freedom struggle and safeguard Tibet's unique identity. Hence, under the stewardship of Sikyong Penpa Tsering and the 16th Kashag, the V-TAG (Voluntary Tibet Advocacy Group) initiative was introduced in 2021 to amplify Tibet advocacy efforts worldwide. The Secretary further said this seminar aims to empower members of V-TAG and other Tibetan youths from diverse organisations to advance the Tibetan Freedom Movement through coordinated advocacy and awareness campaigns.

In addition, Secretary Karma Choeying clarified that V-TAG is not a Central Tibetan Administration's youth group but rather a platform for younger Tibetans, regardless of their political opinions, to dedicate themselves to furthering the cause of Tibet.

The event's chief guest, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, extended his greetings to the participants and lauded their commitment to advocating for the Tibetan cause while introducing the conference speakers.

Beginning with the benevolent and lifelong contributions of His Holiness the Dalai Lama in resolving the longstanding Tibet-China conflict and establishing this unparalleled exile Tibetan community, Sikyong implored everyone to pray for the wellbeing of His Holiness. Sikyong further stated that following His Holiness' noble guidance is the most appropriate way to offer prayers and to do so, "We must not fall into petty factional arguments and, instead, we must all unify our efforts regardless of our political stands to strive for freedom in Tibet." In relation to this, Sikyong shed light on the Central Tibetan Administration's policy of the Middle Way Approach (MWA). "Every political view among Tibetans, including those seeking a win-win solution through MWA and others who want complete independence, have their valid reasons based on the truth. But, His Holiness introduced MWA, which was later unanimously adopted as the official political position by the Tibetan Parliament in Exile, for the sole reason of Tibet's survival that otherwise has reached a stage of complete extinction."

Apart from that, as part of his keynote speech, Sikyong Penpa Tsering spoke about the V-TAG's increasing impact over the last three years and commended all active members for their efforts. "Central Tibetan Administration has prioritised inclusiveness of all sections of our community in the Tibetan freedom struggle", and therefore, Sikyong encouraged others to take part in the journey of V-TAG. "A success of V-TAG can later be translated into a people's movement", Sikyong declared.

Furthermore, the exile Tibetan political leader shared profound insights into international politics, shedding light on China's current geopolitical stance and its internal political dynamics before concluding his talk. Thereafter, a Q&A session with Sikyong was held for around half an hour that was followed by a vote of thanks from DIIR Additional Secretary Tenzin Lekshay.

Over the course of following three days, Kasur (former Kalon) Tenpa Tsering; Bhutika Karpoché, Member of the Provincial Parliament for Parkdale-High Park, Canada; Namgyal Gangshontsang, Mayor of the Oetwil am See, Switzerland; Geshe Lhakdor, Director of the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives; Namkyi, a former Tibetan Political Prisoner; Franz Matzner, Director of Government Relations, International Campaign for Tibet; Tenzin Dorjee, Strategist and Senior Researcher, Tibet Action Institute; Karma Lekshey, Director of the Tibetan Centre for Conflict Resolution; Topjor Tsaltrim, Communication Coordinator of the Students for a Free Tibet; and Tenzin Yangzom, Campaign Coordinator, International Tibet Network, will speak on various topics concerning Tibet advocacy.

Artist launches collection of 108 visual arts from exile Tibetan artists

03 July 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Whiteline Graphics, an initiative by Jamyang Tenzin and his brother Tsering Namgyal, launched the first-ever meticulously curated book titled "108 Exile Tibetan Visual Artists and Their Expression of Universal Responsibility and The Environment." This unique project celebrated the rich tapestry of Tibetan art and culture in exile. Through this initiative, Jamyang showcased unique artworks of 108 incredible talents that boast of diversity and inclusiveness within the Tibetan art community.

A panel discussion featured Ven. Tenzin Tselek, a former TCV Education Director; Bhuchung D. Sonam, a writer, poet, and co-founder of Tibetwrit.es; and was attended by Geshe Lhakdor, Director of the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives. During the discussions, Ven. Tselek, who also served as the Principal of TCV Selakui, emphasised the importance of prioritising the foundations of the arts in schools.

Bhuchung D. Sonam urged the audience to respect and support artists, highlighting the lack of recognition they receive. He referenced an editorial from Amnye Machen's magazine, Lungtah, which noted that traditionally, artists in Tibet, including dancers and singers, are often viewed unfavourably. He also discussed Drubchen Thangtong Gyalpo, who pioneered Tibetan opera in the 15th century.

Despite his significant contributions, historical records and biographies seldom acknowledged him as the founder of Tibetan opera. Nowadays, his contributions are verbally recognised, as demonstrated during Tibetan Institute of Performing Arts' Opera Festival, where homage is duly paid to Thangtong Gyalpo. Bhuchung also shared personal anecdotes, recounting how his parents would disparagingly refer to singers as "beggars" during the harvest festival, where these performers would sing songs.

"The purpose of including 108 artists' works holds symbolic significance," Jamyang told Phayul. "There are numerous ways to interpret this number. In Buddhism, we believe that 108 steps are required to reach Nirvana, and the Tibetan rosary typically consists of 108 beads. While there isn't a definitive reason for choosing 108, it is considered an auspicious number. Based on this symbolism, I curated the artworks of 108 Tibetan artists in exile. Although I had a list of around 270 visual artists, I could only contact 108."

Discussing the process of compiling the artworks, Jamyang mentioned facing challenges in reaching senior artists due to their lack of social media presence, which required considerable effort to contact them. With younger artists, transparency was a concern, as they wanted assurance that their artworks would not be used for commercial purposes.

Jamyang reported that the response from most artists has been positive. He explained that his inspiration for creating this book was to unite the artistic efforts of 108 exiled Tibetan visual artists, each contributing a piece that reflects their unique perspective.

June

Discourse facilitator 'Democracy and Debate' launches report on opinion poll from Tibetan public

28 June 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Lharong, the co-founder of the Democracy and Debate during the launch of Tibetan Public Opinion Poll on June 28, 2024 (Phayul photo)

Democracy and Debate, a non-partisan and independent initiative dedicated to fostering open dialogue and transparency, released a report on Friday based on an public opinion poll conducted among Tibetans from around the globe.

This comprehensive survey, which included 28 questions and garnered responses from 1,088 Tibetans residing in over 30 countries, offers a unique and expansive view of the current challenges and the need for reform in Tibetan democracy. The poll was conducted using a combination of online surveys and in-person interviews to ensure a broad and representative sample.

The findings of the poll highlighted the urgent need for reform in several areas in the political set up and democratic system of the exile Tibetan community with 89% of respondents supporting democratic reforms to ensure an equal number of voting rights for all Tibetans, 80% supporting the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) holding a special meeting to foster broader engagement and dialogue with Tibetan communities on democracy issues, 70% support the separation of politics and religion within the Tibetan democratic system and 64% support increasing the number of parliamentary seats for Tibetans abroad. Another area for reform is in the area of policy 64% support increasing the Green Book fee by 50%.

The report also highlighted several challenges facing Tibetan democracy. Many respondents pointed out the polarisation within the community. They suggested measures to reduce it, such as promoting unity, separating politics and religion, eradicating regionalism, following the guidance of His Holiness, ensuring equal voting rights, and leading by example.

"The purpose of the opinion poll is to understand Tibetan's perspectives on Tibetan democracy as well as to establish a channel between the CTA and the Tibetan community. The discussion in Tibetan democracy often lacks data on public opinion. With this detailed data released will help policymakers, media, and the general public to understand the community's perspective on a variety of issues, including structural issues, policy issues, and public approval ratings on institutions and decisions-makers," stated Lharong, the co-founder of the Democracy and Debate, during the launch of the report.

Tibetans worldwide rejoice over Dalai Lama's successful knee surgery

28 June 2024, RFA

The Buddhist spiritual leader enjoys strong support in the US, where the operation took place.

The Dalai Lama had successful total knee replacement surgery at a top New York hospital and will be discharged on Saturday, the Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader's personal physician said as Tibetans around the world rejoiced at the news.

The Dalai Lama, who turns 89 on July 6, has experienced health problems for years. His knee issues required medical attention outside northern India where he has lived in exile for 65 years following a failed uprising against Chinese rule in Tibet.

The Nobel Prize winner enjoys strong support in the United States, especially among prominent lawmakers who have spoken out about human rights issues in Tibet, despite objections by China which views him as a separatist and bristles at his interactions with foreign officials.

"After the surgery, he returned to his room in the hospital in a very stable condition and has already had his lunch," said Dr. Tsetan Dorjee Sadutshang, who gave a video briefing on the Dalai Lama's condition just hours after his operation Friday at New York's Hospital for Special Surgery, a top medical facility for musculoskeletal health.

The operation began in the early morning amid mass prayers and religious rituals by Tibetans worldwide, including those inside Tibet, for the Dalai Lama's successful surgery and swift recovery.

"The entire team looking after His Holiness at the hospital has been very supportive and caring," said Sadutshang, who was accompanied by Tenzin Taklha, the Dalai Lama's secretary, at the briefing.

The treatment was successful, and the surgery ended around 7:30 a.m., said another source with knowledge of the matter.

The Dalai Lama arrived in New York on June 23, marking his first visit to the United States in over seven years and his first overseas trip since November 2018.

Tibetans across Tibet have been offering prayers for his well-being ever since news of his U.S. visit reached people in various corners of the region and in Tibetan-populated areas of China's western provinces, Tibetan sources said.

In Lhasa, Tibetans offered prayers at the Jokhang Temple, Ramoche Temple and other monasteries on Friday, as China tightened security at religious sites amid news of widespread prayer by Tibetans inside Tibet for the Dalai Lama's successful surgery, the sources said.

People await the arrival of the Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, at his hotel in New York before he undergoes knee surgery, June 23, 2024. (Adam Gray/AFP)

Tibetans worldwide also took to social media to express their joy and gratitude.

"Thank you so much for the updates, Doctor. Wishing His Holiness the Dalai Lama a speedy recovery," wrote one Tibetan netizen, commenting on the press briefing video posted on YouTube.

Another wrote: "Thank you, USA medical team. This is really good news for us."

The Dalai Lama's trip to the U.S. comes in the wake of the passage of a bill in the U.S. Congress urging Beijing to re-engage with him and other Tibetan leaders to peacefully resolve their dispute over the status and governance of Tibet.

Tibetans worldwide pray as Dalai Lama undergoes knee surgery in the USA

28 June 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Tibetans across the globe are united in prayer today as His Holiness the Dalai Lama underwent knee surgery at the Hospital for Special Surgery (HSS) in New York city.

According to Voice of America and Radio Free Asia, both media houses headquartered in the United States, the surgery has been successful and His Holiness the Dalai Lama's condition is good, citing confirmed sources. However, there are no official announcements or updates from his office yet.

The surgery took place this morning (New York time) at HSS, the world's leading academic medical centre focused on musculoskeletal health. Renowned for its excellence, HSS has been ranked No. 1 in orthopaedics for 14 consecutive years by U.S. News & World Report (2023-2024) and has consistently been among the top-ranked hospitals for both orthopaedics and rheumatology for 32 years.

The Dalai Lama, the revered spiritual leader of Tibet, has been experiencing knee issues that necessitated this medical intervention. He will be 89 years of age next month on his birthday which falls on July 6th.

From Dharamshala to New York, Tibetans and supporters of His Holiness have been gathering in temples, community centres, and private homes to offer prayers and perform rituals for his swift recovery. Social media platforms are also flooded with messages of support and well-wishes from followers around the world.

The global Tibetan community remains hopeful and united in their support for the Dalai Lama during this critical time. Further updates on His Holiness's condition are eagerly awaited by his followers worldwide.

'Dalai Lama will live on, Xi Jinping will die' — former Tibet PM on reincarnation geopolitics

28 June 2024, The Print, Monami Gogoi

Lobsang Sangay said 'no one has done more for Tibetans than India', adding that the Indian media has fallen prey to Chinese propaganda in the past.

Lobsang Sangay, former Sikyong or Prime Minister of the Tibetan government in exile, is confident in his understanding of how the United States functions. Shedding light on Tibet's relations with the US, Sangay, currently a Harvard Law School professor, described the ties as 'a roller coaster experience', while mentioning the US' 'ping-pong' diplomacy and Richard Nixon's attempt to normalise his country's relationship with China in order to counter the Soviet Union. Sangay made the comments during a lecture on 'Geopolitics of Reincarnation' at New Delhi's India International Centre on 20 June in front of a full house of nearly 100 people. In the 90-minute session, the 56-year-old spoke on themes of geopolitics and international diplomacy alongside Buddhist concepts of reincarnation, karma, and compassion.

Realpolitik and spirituality might seem completely antithetical, but the two topics are interconnected for Sangay. Political acumen and spiritual wisdom intertwined to explain the evolving nature of the Chinese occupation of the Tibetan plateau, including the thorny issue of China's position on the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama.

The talk didn't happen in isolation. A day before, a bipartisan seven-member US delegation, which included former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, had visited the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh. It was followed by their announcement that the US would not allow China to interfere in the succession of the Dalai Lama. Sangay intended to remind the audience about the Dalai Lama's statement on reincarnation from 2011, where, among several other things, he had categorically stated that the next Dalai Lama wouldn't be born in China if the issue of Tibet was not resolved. He did it by highlighting the subsequent "disinformation strategy" of the Chinese government "to manipulate and control the narrative."

The professor said the geopolitics of reincarnation affects huge geography, naming areas where Tibetan Buddhism is practised—regions along the Himalayas, inner and outer Mongolia, among other places. Continuing his argument, Sangay also mentioned China, East Asia, and Southeast Asian countries where Buddhism is a dominant religion.

"And you might be surprised to know that the third largest religion in Italy—the land of the Catholic Church and Pope—is Buddhism. In all of Europe as well. So Buddhism has become a major religion all over the world. But directly impacting this. So, the reincarnation of His Holiness Dalai Lama has major geopolitical significance," he said.

An atheistic party interfering in reincarnation

Sangay, who served as the Sikyong from 2011 to 2021, cited numerous instances of the workings of the Chinese government's "disruptive propaganda machine." To an audience comprising several journalists, he stated that the Indian media had fallen prey to Chinese propaganda in the past. Sangay recalled that in 2019, a team of Indian journalists went on a "guided tour" to China. Before the trip, he had warned a journalist not to "get fooled" by the Chinese.

"They came back on July 11th or 12th. And all the headlines, in all the major newspapers of India, were this—'India should not interfere in the selection of Dalai Lama. China will select,'" he said, pointing to a slide showing headlines of several news articles.

While pinpointing the media's shortcomings, Sangay also underscored and appreciated India's role in the Tibetan freedom movement.

"No one has done more for Tibetans than India. India has done the most. Indian people have been the most hospitable. The fact that we are here, we have a government-in-exile here," he said.

He also discussed the Chinese government's ongoing efforts to assert control over the reincarnation process of Tibetan Lamas, including the Dalai Lama. Sangay pointed out the historical and political manipulations involved, referencing the "Golden Urn" method used by the Qing Dynasty to legitimise the selection of reincarnations of Tibetan lamas. The Chinese government still insists on using this method.

"Communist Party of China, which says religion is poison, is now issuing certificates to legitimise Lamas," he remarked, highlighting the irony in the Chinese government's stance.

Sangay also brought to focus a 70,000-character petition, dated 18 May 1962, written by the 10th Panchen Lama and addressed to the Chinese government. In the report, Panchen Lama wrote about the destruction of monasteries and nunneries in Tibet.

"After all this destruction, what legitimacy does the Chinese government have to say – we have destroyed everything but we have the right to choose your Lama?" the professor said.

Reincarnation, karma, and compassion

Balancing geopolitics and the spiritual, Sangay consistently mentioned the deeply rooted Tibetan Buddhist concepts of reincarnation, karma, and compassion throughout his lecture. He went through the Dalai Lama's 2011 statement on reincarnation, succinctly explaining all the states of the process. He also briefed on the emanation and selection process of the next Dalai Lama, which involves divination.

Though the reincarnation process might seem "complicated" to others, Sangay said it isn't so for Tibetans.

"For 800 years, we've been practising this, we have nailed it. So we know how it works. It's a well-oiled system that we have," he said.

During the Q&A session, when tough remarks surfaced about the US' history of "abandoning" Tibet in the past, Sangay's reply had a latent Buddhist approach.

"We know how America functions. Generally, we know how realpolitik is, right? In international relations, everybody works for their own national interests. So when their national interests coincide with ours, we welcome them. When it doesn't, we are compassionate," he said, underscoring the importance of allies.

Another question was whether Pelosi's provocative remark in Dharmshala, where she had said that the Dalai Lama's legacy would continue and Xi Jinping's would be forgotten, could be read as an endorsement by the Indian government.

As a seasoned speaker, Sangay skirted a direct reply but gave a response steeped in Buddhist teachings.

"Leader Nancy Pelosi is right. His (Dalai Lama's) legacy will live on, and Xi Jinping will die, and no one will remember. All the dictators will die. It's a historical fact that in the 20th century, eight empires collapsed," he said, beginning his argument. Eight empires will come in the 21st century, and they will all collapse too, he added.

"So as Buddhists, we believe in impermanence. We just have to wait and survive. And our turn will come. That's the law of karma."

'Tibetans Forced To Join Chinese Army Won't Be Deployed Near Indian Border': Tibetan Govt In Exile Head

28 June 2024, Times Now Digital

Tibetans, forced to join the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA), wouldn't be sent near the Indian border, Lobsang Sangay, sikkong or political head of the Tibetan government in exile, said. For, they would "cross over," he said. He also wondered how much PLA officers would trust Tibetan troops, especially if there's been coercion in the enrolment. On the other hand, Tibetan troops with the Indian security forces did well in Ladakh and forced the Chinese to pull back several years ago, he said.

Speaking about former U.S. Speaker of the House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi and her bipartisan delegation of Democrats and Republicans calling on the Dalai Lama, he said it was evidence of American intent. He agreed with Pelosi's statement about Chinese leader Xi Jinping being forgotten by history. "All dictators will die... Pelosi is right. He will be forgotten while His Holiness, the Dalai Lama will be remembered," he added. Prime Minister Narendra Modi's meeting with Pelosi's delegation was a sign of solidarity, he added. It was also symbolic, he said.

The sikkong from 2011 to 2021, Sangay said China is keen on destroying Tibetan civilisation, including repressive measures against lamas and the destruction of monasteries, but has failed so far.

Nor while the Chinese have a role in finding the next Dalai Lama. Sangay said that when the current Dalai Lama does pass on, the Regent will take over while a selection committee will shortlist about 10 little boys. Of them, two or three may go before the finding committee and from the two-three, the next Dalai Lama will be chosen through divination. The process can take 3-6 years.

US is Ready to Stand With Tibet and Its People

25 June 2024, Japan Forward, Professor Pema Gyalpo

New US legislation, a Congressional delegation visit to Dharmshala, and the Dalai Lama in New York highlight American support for Tibet amid Chinese objections.

I went to Dharmshala to participate in a special prayer for the "Long Life of His Holiness the Dalai Lama." The former staff of the Central Tibetan Administration organized this event for the spiritual leader of Tibet.

While I was still in India, a very impressive and important delegation of United States friends came to Dharmshala, where His Holiness the Dalai Lama resides today. Leading this delegation was Republican Representative Michael McCaul, along with prominent Democrat, former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

This high-profile seven-member delegation made me feel that some images are powerful and others even more so. Take the case of this US Congressional delegation meeting His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama in Dharmshala on June 19, 2024.

However, even more critical politically was the picture of the same US congressional delegation meeting with Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi in New Delhi. Of course, the icing on the cake was Nancy Pelosi's announcement that President Joe Biden is likely to sign the Tibet Resolve Act very soon. Doing so would show America's support for Tibet and the Tibetan people.

In all, it is a heady combination of politics and spirituality that sends strong signals to the so-called People's Republic of China. It also shows that India is beginning to realize the importance of showing support for the Tibetan people.

Resolve Tibet Act

On June 12, the US Congress passed a resolution to enhance the Tibet-China Dispute Act, better known as the Resolve Tibet Act. Congress's bipartisan legislation now awaits signing from President Joe Biden, following which it will be ratified into law.

Following the Tibetan Policy Act or TPA (2002) and the Tibetan Policy & Support Act or the TPSA (2020), this is the third legislation that the US has taken regarding Tibet. Washington has long supported the Tibetan cause, and the latest bill is another step in the effort.

The Resolve Tibet Act underlines the need for such talks to be pursued without "preconditions" on the terms to seek a settlement that resolves differences. It also states that the succession of the Dalai Lama was not of China's concern and would best be left to Tibetan Buddhists. (Of course, we Tibetans believe His Holiness will live for decades to come).

Dharamsala Delegation

This is precisely why the delegation's recent visit to Dharamsala to meet His Holiness at his temporary phodrang (palace, residence) angered China. Beijing views His Holiness, the beloved peace-loving Spiritual Tibetan leader, as a dangerous separatist. (His Holiness has handed over His Temporal power to the directly elected Sikyong)

According to a local paper, "The high-level delegation, led by Republican Representative Michael McCaul and including Democratic former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, arrived Tuesday at the hillside town, which the Nobel Peace Prize laureate has made his headquarters since fleeing from Tibet after a failed uprising against Chinese rule in 1959. There, they met with officials from the Tibetan government-in-exile, which wants more autonomy for Tibet."

They said that a key focus of their visit was to underscore the Resolve Tibet Act. The Act aims to encourage dialogue between His Holiness and Chinese officials to find a peaceful resolution between Tibet and Beijing. The Bill should now be sent to the White House for President Biden to sign into law.

Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, speaks with former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi during their meeting at Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh, India, June 19, 2024. (©Tenzin Choejor/Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama/Handout via REUTERS)

A Strong Message

Nancy Pelosi said the bill is "a message to the Chinese government that we have clarity in our thinking and our understanding of this issue of the freedom of Tibet."

Representative McCaul said it reaffirmed American support for the Tibetan right to self-determination. "Just this week, our delegation received a letter from the Chinese Communist Party, warning us not to come here...but we did not let the CCP intimidate us, for we are here today," he said as people cheered.

Apart from Representative McCaul, the delegation consisted of six prominent US congressional members: former House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Mariannette Miller, Gregory Meeks, Nicole Malliotakis, Jim McGovern, and Ami Bera.

Indeed, the timing and sequence of the visit is interesting. The US delegation chose first to visit Dharamsala, meet with His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and then come down to New Delhi, where they called on the Prime Minister of India.

While the meeting was likely a bipartisan message showing US support for India and its new government, the underlying message could not have been stronger. After all, Prime Minister Modi chose to meet the delegation soon after they met with His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Support From India

An official Government of India release stated, "The delegation members congratulated the Prime Minister on his election for a historic third consecutive term. They expressed deep appreciation for the scale, fairness, and transparency of the recently concluded world's largest democratic electoral exercise in India."

Prime Minister Modi posted a photo on X along with the message, "Had a very good exchange of views with friends from the US Congress in a delegation led by Representative McCaul, Chairman of House Foreign GOP. Deeply value the strong bipartisan support in advancing India- US Comprehensive Global Strategic Partnership."

Later, the delegation met India's External Affairs Minister Dr S. Jaishankar. The Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) clarified that "Dalai Lama is a revered religious leader and is deeply respected by the people of India. His Holiness is accorded due courtesies and freedom to conduct his religious and spiritual activities."

Tibetans are always grateful to the people and government of India for their help and support. India stood by Tibet in the hardest and darkest days of its more than 2,150 years of history. We understand India's delicate situation. Tibetans can not only read India's lips but also the hearts of Indian leaders and its great people.

Prime Minister Modi's meeting with the US delegation and tweeting about it was hugely significant. While in India, the delegation had an audience with His Holiness and interacted with Sikyong Penpa Tsering (the prime minister of the government in exile ) and his team of leaders. Modi announcing this via X was a direct endorsement, if not an indication and acknowledgment of what was going on. Moreover, it was a brave symbolic gesture of support. Actions speak louder than words.

Now, while His Holiness is in the US for knee surgery, the next step would be for President Biden to meet His Holiness. A meeting between the two would send a clearer signal to China that it can never accomplish its erasure of Tibetan Identity and culture. Such a meeting would shield the Dalai Lama's institution from external interference, especially from atheist Chinese Communists.

This is the clearest indication yet that India and the US are aligned on Tibet, which may also encourage Japan, the United Kingdom, and the European Union. That is the long-term significance of the recent US Congressional visit to India and their meeting with His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

PM Modi meets US delegations who visited Dalai Lama despite China's objection

21 June 2024, The Economic Times

Prime Minister Narendra Modi met with a US Congressional delegation on Thursday, following their visit to Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh, earlier this week. The delegation, including former US House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi, congratulated PM Modi on his third consecutive term and expressed "deep appreciation" for the scale and transparency of India's recent general elections. Led by House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul, the seven-member delegation highlighted the significance of India-US relations, describing them as the "most consequential one," according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office. In addition to McCaul, the delegation comprised six prominent US Congressional members: Nancy Pelosi, Mariannette Miller, Gregory Meeks, Nicole Malliotakis, Jim McGovern, and Ami Bera. The delegation expressed their support for enhancing the Comprehensive Global Strategic Partnership between India and the US, focusing on areas such as trade, emerging technology, defense, and people-to-people exchanges.

Prime Minister Modi posted a photo with the delegation on X (formerly Twitter).

"Had a very good exchange of views with friends from the US Congress in a delegation led by @RepMcCaul, Chairman of @HouseForeignGOP. Deeply value the strong bipartisan support in advancing India-US Comprehensive Global Strategic Partnership," he wrote on the social media platform. A Dharamshala visit that irked ChinaThe US delegation arrived in Dharamshala on Tuesday and met with the Dalai Lama on Wednesday. This prompted a stern response from China, which urged the United States to "fully recognize the anti-China and separatist nature of the Dalai clique" and to refrain from "any form of contact with it."

The United States has long supported the rights of the Tibetan people to practice their religion and culture, and has accused China of human rights violations in the Himalayan region bordering India. Recently, the US House of Representatives passed a bipartisan bill aiming to push Beijing to resume stalled talks with Tibetan leaders and address Tibetan aspirations related to historical, cultural, religious, and linguistic identity.

The bill has aggravated tensions with China at a time when Beijing and Washington are attempting to improve bilateral relations. Additionally, India's relationship with China has been strained since a 2020 military standoff along their Himalayan border resulted in the deaths of 24 soldiers.

US President Joe Biden is expected to sign the Resolve Tibet Act soon, which seeks to find a resolution to the Tibet dispute. While Washington acknowledges the Tibetan Autonomous Region as part of China, the bill emphasizes the need for Tibetans to have a say in their own future.

"This visit should highlight the bipartisan support in the U.S. Congress for Tibet to have a say in their own future," said Michael McCaul, head of the US delegation and co-author of the bill, before departing from Washington.

During their meeting with PM Modi, the US delegation, including former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, congratulated him on his third consecutive term and praised the scale and transparency of India's recent general elections. The seven-member delegation emphasized the importance of India-US relations, describing them as the "most consequential one," according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office.

The delegation, led by McCaul, included Pelosi, Mariannette Miller, Gregory Meeks, Nicole Malliotakis, Jim McGovern, and Ami Bera. They expressed their support for deepening the Comprehensive Global Strategic Partnership between India and the US, focusing on trade, emerging technology, defense, and people-to-people exchanges.

Modi lauds India-US ties

Modi, in his turn, highlighted the "significant role played by the consistent and bipartisan support of the US Congress in advancing India-US ties," which, he said, are based on shared democratic values, rule of law, and strong people-to-people ties.

He reiterated the commitment to "further strengthen bilateral relations for the global good," the statement said.

Modi recalled his State Visit to the US in June last year during which he had an opportunity to address a Joint Session of the US Congress for a historic second time.

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar on Wednesday said that he met with the members of the visiting bipartisan US Congressional delegation and appreciated their "strong and continued support" to the partnership.

PM Modi's third term

In the recently-held Lok Sabha polls, the BJP with 240 seats fell short of a majority but the NDA secured the mandate with 293 seats.

The Congress bagged 99 seats, while the INDIA bloc, of which it is a part, got 234 seats.

Following the polls, two Independents who won the election pledged support to the Congress, taking the INDIA bloc tally to 236.

The general election for the 18th Lok Sabha were held in seven phases from April 19 to June 1 and votes were counted on June 4.

Nancy Pelosi, After Meeting Dalai Lama, Says China Is 'Trying to Erase' Tibetan Culture

19 June 2024, Time, Sudhi Ranjan Sen and Dan Strumpf

Former U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi accused China of trying to erase Tibetan culture following her high-profile meeting with the Dalai Lama at his home in northern India Wednesday, a visit condemned by Beijing.

Pelosi was joined on the trip to Dharamshala by a bipartisan delegation led by Michael McCaul, the Republican chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The group also met with officials from Tibet's government in exile.

Pelosi said a bill recently passed in Congress strengthening U.S. support to Tibet sends a strong message to China.

China is "trying to erase the culture, reduce the use of the language," Pelosi said during a public ceremony Wednesday in Dharamshala. "They are trying something that we cannot let them get away with."

"This bill is a message to the Chinese government that we have clarity in our thinking and understanding of this issue of the freedom of Tibet," Pelosi said.

Beijing had warned the U.S. lawmakers against the meeting, urging the U.S. in remarks on Tuesday to "see clearly the anti-China separatism nature" of the Dalai Lama and his followers.

China considers the Dalai Lama a separatist for his commitment to limited autonomy for the region. Pelosi has been a longtime critic of Chinese policy on Tibet, and visited the Tibetan city of Lhasa in 2015.

China annexed Tibet in the 1950s, with the Dalai Lama and other monks fleeing to India nine years later, where they live as refugees and have set up a government in exile in Dharamshala.

Officials from the Tibetan government-in-exile earlier said the U.S. visit and legislation will put pressure on China to engage with them as they seek autonomy for the region.

Nancy Pelosi's scathing attack on Xi Jinping: 'Dalai Lama's legacy will live forever, you'll be gone'

19 June 2024, Business Today

A US congressional delegation, led by House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaulis, is visiting India to strengthen bilateral ties and to meet the Tibetan spiritual leader.

Former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is part of the delegation that reached Dharamshala on Tuesday

Former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who is on a two-day visit to India, on Wednesday launched a blistering attack on Chinese President Xi Jinping, saying Dalai Lama's legacy will live forever but Xi will be gone in a few years. "His Holiness Dalai Lama, with his message of knowledge, tradition, compassion, purity of soul, and love, will live a long time and his legacy will live forever. But you, the President of China, you'll be gone and nobody will give you credit for anything," she said during the public felicitation programme at Tsuglagkhang Complex in Dharamshala.

China considers spiritual leader Dalai Lama as a separatist because of his demand for autonomy for Tibet, which Beijing occupied in the 1950s.

During the address, Pelosi said the Dalai Lama would not approve of her comment against China. "When I criticize the Chinese government, he (Dalai Lama) says, let's pray for Nancy to rid her of her negative attitudes. I hope he will indulge me today to say that change is on the way. As our colleagues have said hope brings some faith and the faith of the Tibetan people in the goodness of others is what is going to make all the difference."

A US congressional delegation, led by House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaulis, is visiting India to strengthen bilateral ties and to meet the Tibetan spiritual leader. Former US

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is part of the delegation that reached Dharamsala on Tuesday. Dharamsala is the seat of power for Tibet's government in exile since the Dalai Lama stepped into India six decades ago. Last Wednesday, the US House of Representatives voted 391-26 to approve the Promoting and Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, which the Senate passed. The bill would direct funds to counter what it calls "disinformation" from Beijing about Tibet's history, people, and institutions.

On Tuesday, China urged US President Joe Biden not to sign the Tibet policy bill. "The 14th Dalai Lama is not a pure religious figure, but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said. He also said that Beijing was gravely concerned and urged the US side to fully recognise the anti-China separatist nature of the Dalai group, honour the commitments the US has made to China on issues related to Xizang, a Chinese name for Tibet. Jian also urged the US to have no contact with the Dalai group in any form.

On Wednesday, the White House said that Biden was going to make a decision that he thought was in the best interest of the US. "The President is going to do what he thinks is best on behalf of the American people, that's what I can tell you," White House Press Secretary Karine Jean-Pierre told reporters when asked about China's warning.

Referring to the legislation, Pelosi said the passage of this bill (Resolve Tibet Act) is a message to the Chinese government that the US has clarity in its thinking and understanding of this issue of the freedom of Tibet. "Listening to the leader of our delegation and the leader of the foreign affairs committee was so masterful in not only the policy but in the process of getting it passed in the most bipartisan way."

The Resolve Tibet Act is a bipartisan bill to enhance US support for Tibet and promote dialogue between the People's Republic of China and the Dalai Lama toward a peaceful resolution of the long-standing dispute between Tibet and China. The Act enhances US support for Tibet – empowering State Department officials to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government, and reject false claims that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times".

The bill also encourages officials to push for negotiations without preconditions between Beijing and the Dalai Lama or his representatives and coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

However, Beijing is opposed to the Act and has asked Biden not to sign it. The Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson has said that anyone or any force who attempts to destabilise Xizang to contain or suppress China will not succeed. "The US should not sign the bill. China will take resolute measures to defend its sovereignty, security, and development interests," Jian said.

China, which officially refers to Tibet as Xizang, earlier this year said it would talk only with the representatives of the Dalai Lama and not the officials of the Tibetan government in exile. At the same time, China ruled out dialogue on the Dalai Lama's long-pending demand for autonomy for his remote Himalayan homeland.

In its talks with China between 2002 and 2010, the Tibetan side pitched genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people in line with the middle-way policy as proposed by the Dalai Lama. The Tibetan spiritual leader has said he does not seek political independence for Tibet but seeks autonomy for all Tibetan areas which include Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan and Yunnan provinces besides the current official Tibet Autonomous Region, a truncated version of Tibet before it was annexed by China.

After a failed anti-Chinese uprising in 1959, the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet and came to India. He set up the government-in-exile in Himachal.

US Legislators in Dharamsala to Meet Dalai Lama, China 'Gravely Concerned'

18 June 2024, The Wire

The leader of the group of legislators said that US President Joe Biden would soon sign into law a Bill that pushes for negotiations between Tibet and China and that has passed through both chambers of the US federal legislature.

A group of seven US legislators from either of the country's main political parties arrived in Dharamsala today (June 18) to meet the Dalai Lama, with its leader saying US President Joe Biden will soon sign a Bill that pushes for negotiations between Tibet and China. Among the legislators are Michael McCaul, a Republican who is chairman of the US House of Representatives' foreign affairs committee, and Nancy Pelosi, a Democrat who has served as speaker of the House, which is the lower chamber of the country's federal legislature.

They will meet the Dalai Lama, who is the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, tomorrow, according to news reports.

"We are very excited to see His Holiness tomorrow to talk about many things, including the Bill we just passed out of Congress [the name of the US federal legislature] that basically says the United States of America stands with the people of Tibet," Reuters quoted McCaul as saying.

When asked if Biden would sign the Bill – which is officially titled the ‘Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act’ – into law soon, McCaul said according to Reuters: “Yes, he will, he will.”

Its report added that US legislators have regularly visited Dharamsala and promoted the Dalai Lama’s work in an effort to garner support for a linguistically and culturally autonomous Tibet.

Responding to the developments, China said it was “gravely concerned” and insisted the US does not engage with the “Dalai group”.

“It’s known by all that the 14th Dalai Lama is not a pure religious figure, but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion,” Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said at a press briefing today. Lin urged the US to “fully recognise the anti-China separatist nature of the Dalai group, honour the commitments the US has made to China on issues related to Xizang [China’s name for Tibet], have no contact with the Dalai group in any form and stop sending the wrong signal to the world”.

The Promoting a Resolution Bill was passed by both houses of the US federal legislature, most recently by the House of Representatives last Wednesday, and received broad bipartisan support, The Hill reported. According to the website of the US House’s foreign affairs committee, the Bill seeks to empower officials of the US state department to “actively and directly counter” disinformation about Tibet from China’s government, as well as to reject “false claims that Tibet has been part of China since ‘ancient times’.”

But Lin said at Tuesday’s press conference that “Xizang has always been part of China since ancient times”, adding that the US “must not sign the Bill into law”.

“Xizang’s affairs are purely China’s domestic affairs and no external interference will ever be allowed,” he also said.

Washington’s new Tibet policy bill ‘likely to be counterproductive’

18 June 2024, SCMP, Dewey Sim

A new Tibet policy bill passed in the United States last week is set to fuel fresh tensions with China, with one analyst saying it could be counterproductive.

The US House of Representatives on Wednesday approved the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, which would channel funds to boost Washington’s support for Tibet and counter what it calls “disinformation” from China about the region’s history, people and institutions.

The bipartisan bill, among other things, refutes Beijing’s claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times and promotes talks between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama, Tibet’s exiled spiritual leader.

The bill’s authors argued that the Chinese government was “systematically suppressing” the ability of Tibetans to preserve their religion, culture, language, history, way of life and environment.

“Passing this bill demonstrates America’s resolve that the CCP’s status quo in Tibet is not acceptable,” said Republican representative Michael McCaul of Texas on the House floor, referring to the Chinese Communist Party.

“If the CCP truly does respect ‘sovereignty’ as it claims to do then it will engage in peaceful dialogue with the Tibetans to resolve this conflict, not force the Tibetans to accept a CCP proposal.”

“It will not go down well in Beijing. China is very sensitive about Tibet and they will see the latest move by the US as nothing more than an attempt to further smear China,” he said.

Asked about the bill at a press briefing in Beijing on Tuesday, foreign ministry spokesman Lin Jian said Tibet had always been Chinese territory, and that issues surrounding Tibet were “purely China’s internal affairs”.

“It will not go down well in Beijing. China is very sensitive about Tibet and they will see the latest move by the US as nothing more than an attempt to further smear China,” he said.

Asked about the bill at a press briefing in Beijing on Tuesday, foreign ministry spokesman Lin Jian said Tibet had always been Chinese territory, and that issues surrounding Tibet were “purely China’s internal affairs”.

“Anyone or any force who attempts to destabilise Xizang to contain or suppress China will not succeed,” he said, referring to the Tibet region. “The US should not sign the bill. China will take resolute measures to defend its sovereignty, security and development interests.”

China maintains that Tibet has remained under central Chinese rule for over 700 years, despite extended periods in which Tibetan campaigners argue that the region was effectively self-governed.

Tibetans protest Chinese Premier Li Qiang’s visit to New Zealand with six demands

17 June 2024, The Tibet Post, Yangchen Dolma

Tibetans and Tibet supporters have strongly protested against Chinese Premier Li Qiang’s visit to Wellington and Auckland in New Zealand and called on the Chinese government to respect human rights and demand freedom in Tibet. During the peaceful protests, Tibetans were subjected to physical violence and harassment by pro-Chinese government individuals, which represents Chinese transnational repression in the free world.

Tibetans from Auckland Tibetan Association and members of Friends of Tibet protested against Chinese Premier Li Qiang's visit to Auckland on June 14, 2024 by holding up the Tibetan national flag, which is banned in Tibet by the Chinese government, and shouting slogans such as "We want justice in Tibet, we want human rights in Tibet, we want freedom in Tibet" etc. Supporters of Tibet also protested against Chinese Premier Li Qiang's visit to Wellington, Capital of New Zealand on Junw 13, 2024. When Chinese Premier Li Qiang arrived in Wellington, members of the Wellington chapter of Friends of Tibet organised a demonstration to protest against Li Qiang and the CCP on the side of the road where the Premier's motorcade passed.

A member of the Wellington Chapter of Friends of Tibet who participated in the protests, Robin Greenberg said, "In Wellington, we don't have Tibetans living here at the moment, Friends of Tibet feels a real privilege to make our presence felt and made the Chinese Premier seen us displaying the Tibetan flags high". She further mentioned the importance of putting human rights above trade and holding Chinese leadership to account for its atrocities in Tibet.

Although small in number, Tibetans in Auckland made sure that their voices were heard to Chinese the Chinese Premier Li Qiang and Chinese government and that they stood up for the truth. Tibetan activists were jostled, pushed aside and relentlessly pursued around the protest site by the much larger pro-China group, who tried to tear down Tibetan banners. Yet the Tibetan flag flew high wherever the Premier had engagements in the cities of New Zealand. The Peaceful Tibetan demonstrators braved the rain and resisted beatings and harassment from their Chinese supporters.

The Tibetan protesters have made six demands of the Chinese government:

1. To Call on China to re-engage in dialogue with the Dalai Lama and Central Tibetan Administration to resolve the Sino-Tibet conflict.
2. Reinforce New Zealand's expectation that China immediately grants meaningful and unfettered access to Tibet for independent observers, including the Office of the UN High Commission.
3. Demand that China end its oppressive policies targeting Tibetan children and end the residential boarding school and pre-school system that separate an estimated one million Tibetan children from their families in denial of their cultural, religious and linguistic rights.
4. Demand that China cease interference in the selection and installation of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, including any future Dalai Lama. The determination of Tibetan Buddhist leaders must be determined solely by the Tibetan people, in accordance with international human rights law, without any interference by the Chinese Government.

5. Demand that China immediately release the world's youngest political prisoner His Eminence the 11th Panchen Lama and all other prisoners of conscience.

6. Demand that China repeal or amend provisions of their Criminal Procedure Law that violate the rights of detainees to a fair trial, and are routinely used to arrest Tibetans for peacefully exercising their human rights under the guise of 'separatism' and other State Security crimes.

Dalai Lama keeps cards close to chest on his successor, says 'not thinking of re-incarnation'

17 June 2024, The Tribune, Ajay Banerjee

Developments on the front are being followed keenly by Tibetans as the Dalai Lama is leading the fight seeking autonomy from China

Keeping cards close to his chest on who will his successor, the 14th Dalai Lama, on Monday said he was not 'thinking' about re-incarnation – a process to appoint the next Dalai Lama.

Developments on the front are being followed keenly by Tibetans as the Dalai Lama is leading the fight seeking autonomy from China; that in turn, is trying to meddle in the appointment of a successor. Speaking to a select group of media-persons from Delhi, the Dalai Lama, who turns 89 in July, was asked how would the Tibetan community maintain the sanctity of re-incarnation to which he said, "I am not thinking of reincarnation. The Important thing is as long as I am alive, I should use my energies to help as many people as I can".

The Dalai Lama is the spiritual head of the Tibetan Government in exile, headquartered here in Dharamsala.

Re-incarnation is a traditional Buddhist method of anointing a successor. A Dalai Lama before dying leave hints of where his re-birth would be. These hints are followed by a religious committee to trace the child who is supposed to have been born as the next Dalai Lama. The present Dalai Lama was selected in 1940 as five years old.

A senior official of the Central Tibetan Administration, who did not wish to be identified, mentioned the process of re-incarnation saying "his holiness (the Dalai Lama) has kept an element of surprise. He has maintained an uncertainty since China is an unpredictable entity".

For years, the Chinese government has claimed that the Dalai Lama's eventual reincarnation must comply with Chinese law—that ignores Tibetans' history of selecting the Dalai Lama without foreign interference. Tibetans want to keep China out, as that has been the case for centuries.

Spokesperson of the CTA Tenzin Lekshey says "The Chinese have never thought about Tibet, but about themselves. Beijing has no legitimate right, and there was no need to consult them on the appointment of the next Dalai Lama".

The US also wants to keep Beijing out of this 'selection' process and even passed a law 'The Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020'. It makes it official US policy that the Dalai Lama's succession is a strictly religious issue that only he and his followers can decide on. India also wants to follow the wish of the Tibetans.

The issue of re-incarnation is now being debated as the Dalai Lama had said in the past on his successor: "When I am about ninety I will consult the high Lamas of the Tibetan Buddhist traditions, the Tibetan public, and other concerned people who follow Tibetan Buddhism and re-evaluate whether the institution of the Dalai Lama should continue or not."

On that basis we will take a decision. If it is decided that the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama should continue and there is a need for the Fifteenth Dalai Lama to be recognized. The Dalai Lama has tasked the 'Dalai Lama's Gaden Phodrang Trust' to locate the successor.

The procedures of search and recognition of the next Dalai Lama has to be in accordance with past tradition.

On Monday morning, the Dalai Lama on being asked if he would be keen to visit his home province of Amdo in Tibet, said "I am not thinking of Amdo, neither I feel anything like that".

US 'Resolve Tibet Act' an important tool to internationally counter China's claim on Tibet

16 June 2024, Tibetan Review

The Resolve Tibet Act, which was passed in its final version by the US House of Representatives on Jun 12, will be an important tool to counter China's false claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times once it is signed into law by President Joe Biden, the Sikyong (executive head) Mr Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) has said.

When it becomes a law in the US, it will become an important tool for us to reach out to other governments to counter China's false narrative that Tibet is part of the People's Republic of China (PRC), he has said in an interview which appeared on theweek.in Jun 16.

"China has been asking every country to say that Tibet is part of PRC. That is why the law is important to explain to governments that if they keep parroting what the Chinese want them to say, then it is against (this) law because if they support negotiations between Representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government, then they cannot contradict themselves by saying Tibet is part of PRC, because that removes the very ground for negotiation," he has explained.

Support for a negotiated settlement to the issue of Tibet exists mainly in Western democracies. Most of the global south, on the other hand, play second fiddle to Beijing's line to include Tibet also in its so-called One China policy towards Taiwan. These countries are heavily dependent on Chinese investment, loan, aid, and market, although debt-burdening is now becoming a burgeoning issue to them.

This is not to say that a robust support for the Tibet issue does not exist in the civil society in these countries.

The Resolve Tibet Act recognizes the fact that China's armed annexation of Tibet more than 70 years ago is illegal under international law, that the country's legal status therefore needs to be resolved through negotiation with the Tibetan people through their leadership in exile, and that the US should gear its policy towards actively facilitating and realizing this objective.

While the CTA's policy is to seek genuine autonomy for a historically defined Tibetan homeland through a negotiated settlement, a vociferous section of the Tibetan population remains adamant in demanding independence.

Canada should consider recognizing Tibet as an Independent Nation

14 June 2024, Tibetan Review

LETTER

The arrest of two innocent Canadian citizens by China in 2018 has strained relations between the two countries. With rising concerns about foreign interference in Canadian elections, there is growing pressure on the government and politicians to address this issue, providing an opportunity for Canadian Tibetans to advocate for the freedom and human rights of Tibetans oppressed by China. Therefore, Canadian Tibetan organizations across the country under the leadership of Canada Tibet Committee have been relentless in their efforts to garner support from politicians across the political spectrum for the Tibetan advocacy movement, achieving significant milestones along the way.

December 14, 2022, marked a historic day for Tibet as the Canadian parliament unanimously passed a motion in support of Sino-Tibetan dialogue, highlighting its dedication to promoting peaceful negotiations. The motion on Sino-Tibetan dialogue was sponsored by Conservative MP and prominent Tibetan supporter Garnett Genuis

Then, just recently, on June 10, 2024, the Canadian parliament took a remarkable step by passing a motion with unanimous consent, recognizing Tibet's right to self-determination. It was sponsored by the Bloc Quebecois Party MP Alexis Brunelle-Duceppe. This historic achievement in Canada's support for the Tibetan freedom movement recognizes the fundamental rights of Tibetans to choose their political and socio-economic systems. The motion marks a significant milestone in the pursuit of Tibet's aspirations for freedom.

This motion sends a powerful message to both Tibetans and the Chinese government, recognizing the Tibetan people's persistent efforts for freedom and human rights while simultaneously expressing Canada's opposition to China's illegal occupation of Tibet.

To me, as a Tibetan Canadian, this motion reinforces our commitment to advocating for the Tibetan cause and seeking recognition for Tibet as an independent nation. We must encourage Canadian politicians to support this motion and end the classification of Tibetans as Chinese nationals on Canadian passports. Tibet was a historically independent nation, and it is only right that we Tibetans do not want to be identified as Chinese on our Canadian passports. It is both painful and outrageous for us Canadian Tibetans to see China listed as our country of origin on our passports. We aspire to have Tibet listed as our country of origin on our passports instead. This change would be a significant step towards recognizing Tibet as an independent nation. Also, recognizing Tibet as an independent nation through a parliamentary motion would be in line with the Canadian government's position on Tibet's status adopted in 1950, when its Minister of External Affairs, Lester Pearson, sent a confidential memo to the country's Ambassador in Washington. In the memo, Pearson made it clear: "In fact it appears that during the past 40 years Tibet has controlled its own internal and external affairs. Viewing the situation thus, I am of the opinion that Tibet is, from the point of view of international law, qualified for recognition as an independent state. We look forward to advocating for our quest to recognize Tibet as an independent nation and our desire to remove China as our country of origin on our Canadian passports. Let's strive to make this happen soon. As we are in a free country, it is our moral responsibility to support the voiceless Tibetans who are oppressed and repressed by the Chinese government.

– Youngdoun Tenzin

EU officials to make rare Tibet visit to examine human rights

14 June 2024, RFA, Tenzin Pema and Jewlan

The delegation hopes to visit schools, prisons and places of worship but access could be limited.

European Union officials are scheduled to make a rare visit starting this weekend to the Tibet Autonomous Region during their annual human rights talks with China, an EU spokesperson told Radio Free Asia. Although it isn't clear how much access the officials will ultimately be granted, the spokesperson, Peter Stano, told RFA that the EU has put forth "concrete proposals" for the places the delegation would like to see, including boarding schools, prisons and places of worship.

"We have requested a meaningful, non-touristic visit that will allow us to measure our long-standing human rights concerns against the reality in Tibet on the ground," Stano said.

A small group of EU officials led by Paola Pampaloni, the EU's deputy managing director of Asia and Pacific Department, will make the visit to Tibet during the annual EU-China Human Rights Dialogue in Chongqing, China, that is scheduled to start on June 16.

A man shaves the hair of a woman as dozens of activists from Tibet, Mongolia and China, demonstrate in front of the European Parliament in Brussels, March 31, 2014, during a visit by the President of China to the European Institutions. (Thierry Charlier/AFP)

The Tibet visit was agreed in principle during a previous round of EU-China talks, the EU spokesperson told RFA. The details of the visit are being organized by Chinese authorities and remain unclear. "It's very rare that an official visit such as this one is taking place," Vincent Metten, EU policy director for the International Campaign for Tibet, told RFA from Brussels. The last highest EU official visit to Tibet was more than 10 years ago when then-EU Special Representative for Human Rights Stavros Lambrinidis took a trip there in September 2013.

Access to Tibet remains difficult, if not impossible, for diplomats, parliamentarians, non-governmental organizations, journalists and even tourists.

A U.S. State Department report on access to Tibetan areas said Chinese security forces have used "conspicuous surveillance" to intimidate, monitor, harass and restrict the movements of U.S. diplomats, officials and tourists traveling to Tibetan areas.

Tenzin Lekshay, a spokesman for the Central Tibetan Administration – the Tibetan government-in-exile based in Dharamsala, India – said it would be crucial for EU officials to have the ability to travel freely inside Tibet for the trip to yield meaningful results.

"It would be difficult to understand the realities of human rights conditions inside Tibet if their movement is restricted by the Chinese," Lekshay said.

Talk is cheap

News of the pending trip to Tibet comes after five human rights groups criticized the EU's continued participation in the broader human rights dialogue with China, noting little has changed in 38 previous rounds of talks. In a June 12 statement, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, Front Line Defenders, International Service for Human Rights and the World Uyghur Congress said that the talks allow European officials to raise key issues with their Chinese counterparts.

Head of the European Union's Delegation to the Human Rights Dialogue Paola Pampaloni briefs journalists at the EU Delegation compound in Beijing, China, Monday, July 9, 2018. (Ng Han Guan/AP)

But the lack of measurable benchmarks or defined objectives make the discussions a largely pointless exercise, the letter states.

"While the EU raises concerns during these dialogues, it knows that the Chinese government will not acknowledge abuses, will not undertake any effort to secure accountability, and will not be persuaded to undertake any policy or legislative action to comply with China's international human rights obligations," the groups said.

Sophie Richardson, a visiting scholar at Stanford University's Center on Democracy, Development and Rule of Law, said in an interview with RFA Uyghur that these types of talks can do more harm than good in that they tend to relieve the pressure on more senior political leaders to press the case for change with their Chinese counterparts.

"Beijing's goal in these dialogues is to keep human rights out of all other conversations," said Richardson, who previously was China director for Human Rights Watch.

"This diplomatic tool not only stopped being useful about a decade ago, but actually started to be problematic because it prevents you from doing things that I think would be more effective, like pursuing investigations of the Chinese government officials who are complicit in crimes against humanity," she said.

European Commissioner Janez Lenarčič attends a joint news conference at the Quai d'Orsay in Paris, France, April 15, 2024. (Sarah Meyssonier/Reuters)

She added that the Tibetan trip's value won't be known until a clearer understanding of the restrictions the delegation will operate in is known.

The EU has been critical of Chinese policies in Tibet and in the Xinjiang Autonomous Region, where more than 1 million Uyghurs and other ethnic Turkic Muslims have been detained in a crackdown that began in 2017.

Tibetan boarding schools

In December, Janez Lenarčič, EU crisis management commissioner, gave a speech criticizing China's restrictive policies in Tibet and in Chinese provinces where many Tibetans live.

She noted political repression and widespread reports of Tibetan students being pressured to attend boarding schools with Mandarin-heavy curriculums, which critics say threatens Tibetan cultural and religious traditions.

Chinese officials say that boarding schools are the best way to educate a population of students scattered in remote areas over a vast geographical region. The students aren't forced to attend the schools, according to official statements.

Dozens of activists from Tibet, Mongolia and China hold placards reading "Mr Xi Jinping start dialogue, leave Tibet" as they demonstrate in front of the European Parliament in Brussels on March 31, 2014, during a visit by the President of China to the European Institutions. (Thierry Charlier/AFP)

But exiled Tibetans say Chinese authorities coerce attendance by promising to withhold governmental benefits or future educational opportunities.

Previous international delegations that have visited areas where many of the abuse claims emanate have been limited.

A 2022 United Nations report based on a trip to Xinjiang alleged serious human rights abuses had been perpetrated against ethnic Uyghurs and others there in the name of combating terrorism and extremism.

China said the report was based on "disinformation and lies fabricated by anti-China forces."

Tenzin Dawa, director of the Tibetan Center for Human Rights and Democracy in Dharamsala, India, said the visiting EU officials should try to find information on Tibetan political prisoners Go Sherab Gyatso and Lodoe Gyatso.

Go Sherab Gyatso is a writer and educator known for his loyalty to the exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama.

Lodoe Gyatso was rearrested and sentenced to 18 years for protesting against repression in Tibet shortly after he had been released from a 20-year sentence.

Exiled Tibetan political leader honored with democracy medal

14 June 2024, RFA, Tenzin Dickyi and Tashi Wangchuk

Tibetan President Penpa Tsering, center, Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and International Campaign for Tibet Chairman Richard Gere, celebrate the 16th anniversary of the reception of the Congressional Gold Medal by the Dalai Lama at the Capitol, Tuesday, Oct. 17, 2023.

The leader of Tibet's government-in-exile on Thursday won the Democracy Service Medal from the U.S.-based National Endowment for Democracy, recognizing Sikyong Penpa Tsering's commitment to advancing democracy and promoting the dignity of the Tibetan people.

In his acceptance speech, Tsering dedicated the award to Tibetans inside Tibet and in exile, and to the Dalai Lama, acknowledging the Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader's role in defending democracy and human rights for all Tibetans.

"I am an ordinary person, but His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama is the architect and spirit behind everything that we are now or what we have today," he said. during the award ceremony at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington.

"This award is for the people I serve," said Tsering, who is head of the Central Tibetan Administration.

The award, which honors people defending democracy worldwide, was also given to former U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, Russian opposition leader Vladimir Kara-Murza and Free Belarus leader Sviatlana Tsikhanouskaya.

Since taking office after winning the 2021 democratic elections which saw a 77% voter turnout, Sikyong Penpa Tsering has worked to counter Chinese influence and mobilised Tibet's allies to speak up against the suppression of cultural identity within Tibet, said Castro. "In recognition of those efforts, it's my honour to present the 2024 democracy service medal to Sikyong Penpa Tsering on behalf of the National Endowment for Democracy.

Also on Thursday, the Tibet Action Institute received the endowment's Democracy Award for its work in documenting the Chinese Communist Party's efforts to erase Tibetan children's identity by forcibly enrolling them in state-run boarding schools in Tibet. The Regional Center for Human Rights and the Waey Organisation also received the Democracy Award. The National Endowment for Democracy, founded in 1983, promotes democracy worldwide through grants funded primarily by the U.S. Congress.

Resolve Tibet Act

The ceremony came a day after the U.S. Congress passed the Resolve Tibet Act, urging China to resolve the Tibet-China dispute through dialogue. It now awaits President Joe Biden's signature to become law.

It calls on Beijing to resume dialogue with the Dalai Lama, who is the spiritual leader of Tibet, and other Tibetan leaders about how Tibet is governed. No formal talks have taken place since 2010.

Tsering welcomed the passage of the bill and expressed hope that Biden would sign it into law soon. He also confirmed that a congressional bipartisan delegation led by Rep. Michael McCaul and which includes Pelosi, is set to meet with the Dalai Lama and Central Tibetan Administration leaders in India on June 19.

Tsering also presented Pelosi – a long-time Tibet supporter and strong China critic – with her award, while lauding her unwavering fight for democracy, and against authoritarianism, everywhere.

Pelosi commended the endowment for its efforts to highlight global injustices.

"One of the cruelest tactics used by oppressors is to imprison people and make them disappear, hoping they will be forgotten," she said.

"But we do not forget them," she said. "Our members of Congress, in a bipartisan manner, consistently raise their names—whether on the House floor, in meetings with heads of state, or during visits to other countries."

115 candidates for the European Parliament pledge to support Tibet

13 June 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

A total of 115 candidates from 16 EU member states have pledged to defend the fundamental freedom of the Tibetan people if elected to the European Parliament.

"Europe for Tibet" is an online campaign launched in the European Parliament on 9 April 2024 ahead of the 6-9 June European election. The counting of votes is underway, as of now 14 of 27 countries have finished counting.

The joint online campaign was led by the Office of Tibet, Brussels, Tibet Interest Group of the European Parliament, and International Campaign for Tibet with the support of the Offices of Tibet in London and Geneva and International Tibet Network.

Representative Rigzin Genkhang of the Office of Tibet Brussels stated, "In view of China's relentless attacks on the fundamental rights of Tibetans in Tibet, it is crucial that the new Parliament reaffirms and redoubles its support for the non-violent freedom struggle of the Tibetan people. It can do so by prioritising the re-establishment of the Tibet Intergroup, which is pivotal in ensuring that Tibet remains a priority for the European Parliament." reported tibet.net.

The European Parliament is a forum for political debate and decision-making at the EU level. The Members of the European Parliament are directly elected by voters in all Member States to represent people's interests in EU law-making and to ensure that other EU institutions are working democratically. The Parliament acts as a co-legislator, sharing with the Council the power to adopt and amend legislative proposals and to decide on the EU budget. A total of 27 countries in Europe is part of the European Union.

The European Parliament has been an active supporter of the Tibetan cause and the Dalai Lama's non-violent approach. It has advocated for dialogue to resolve differences between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government, pushing for autonomy in Tibet to safeguard religious and cultural freedoms.

In 1988, the European Parliament became the first parliament in Europe to allow the Tibetan spiritual leader to address an official meeting on Tibet, despite strong protests from the Chinese government. On 15 June, a year after he presented a Five-Point Peace Plan for the restoration of peace and human rights in Tibet at the U.S. Congressional Human Rights Caucus in Washington, D.C, the Dalai Lama was invited for the first time to the European Parliament in Strasbourg, where he elaborated on this plan, proposing a concrete framework of negotiations and the creation of a self-governing democratic Tibet "in association with the People's Republic of China".

Over the years, the European Parliament has raised awareness about Tibet's human rights situation through hearings, exhibitions, and conferences. It has passed around 50 resolutions focusing on Tibet, human rights, and China, addressing issues like religious freedom restrictions and linguistic rights violations.

US Congress passes Resolve Tibet Act

12 June 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

In a second vote, the House of Representatives voted overwhelmingly in favor of the Resolve Tibet Act today, June 12, 2024. It now goes to the White House for President Biden's signature.

Speaking on the House floor as he raised the bill, House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul (R-TX) spoke in support of the Resolve Tibet Act, saying, "the US strongly condemns all oppression and coercion of Tibetans." An original sponsor of the bill, McCaul added that it will help "put the people of Tibet in charge of their own future."

Representative Jim McGovern (D-MA), the author of the bill, welcomed another chance to spotlight it. He urged his colleagues to pass the Resolve Tibet Act and said that with this bill, "we hope to restart dialogue between Tibet and China."

Representative Bill Keating (D-MA) rose to speak in favor as well, saying the bill calls out Beijing's "oppressive tactics and relentless disinformation campaign" about Tibet.

"This latest indication of American support of Tibet is a source of hope and encouragement to the Tibetan people, who have been nonviolently struggling against the Chinese government for more than six decades for human rights and democratic freedoms," International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) President Tencho Gyatso said as voting concluded.

She added: "I thank the main sponsors of the bill – Representative Jim McGovern, Chairman Michael McCaul, Senator Jeff Merkley, and Senator Todd Young – for their leadership. The Resolve Tibet Act is a strong message to China that the Tibet issue has to be resolved through negotiation instead of an assault on Tibet's unique and ancient civilization."

Previously passed by the House in February and the Senate in May, the Resolve Tibet Act emerged from the two legislative bodies with minor wording differences that necessitated a return to the House floor. It passed again today with 391 votes in favor.

To the president's desk

The next and final step is for President Biden to sign the bill. This should happen within the next two weeks, turning the Resolve Tibet Act into law.

The Resolve Tibet Act will strengthen US efforts to push the Chinese government to resolve the longstanding Tibet-China dispute through dialogue with Tibetan leaders and arm the State Department's Special Coordinator for Tibet office with more tools to combat the CCP's disinformation on Tibet.

Quote from Congress members and Tibetan leaders Representative Jim McGovern, D-MA, said: "Let the overwhelming passage of our strong, bipartisan bill be a clear message to the Tibetan people: America stands with you on the side of human dignity, and we support you in your quest to secure the basic rights to which you are entitled under international law. The People's Republic of China has systematically denied Tibetans the right to self-determination and continues to deliberately erase Tibetan religion, culture, and language. The ongoing oppression of the Tibetan people is a grave tragedy, and our bill provides further tools that empower both America and the international community to stand up for justice and peace."

Representative Michael McCaul, R-TX, said: "Tibetans, like all people, have the right to religious freedom – which includes freedom from CCP surveillance, censorship, and detention. If the CCP truly does respect 'sovereignty' as it claims to do then it will engage in peaceful dialogue with the Tibetans to resolve this conflict, not force the Tibetans to accept a CCP proposal. Passing this bipartisan bill demonstrates America's resolve that the CCP's status quo in Tibet is not acceptable."

Senator Jeff Merkley, D-OR, said: "The people of Tibet deserve to be in charge of their own future, and, today, Congress has voted to stand with Tibetans in their struggle for freedom and self-determination. The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act helps counter misinformation from the Chinese government about Tibet and pushes for negotiations between the People's Republic of China and Tibet to end this longstanding dispute. I look forward to President Biden swiftly signing this bill into law—the people of Tibet cannot wait any longer."

Senator Todd Young, R-IN, said: "Our bipartisan bill will refresh U.S. policy towards Tibet and push for negotiations that advance freedom for the Tibetan people and a peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama. Congressional passage of this legislation further demonstrates America's resolve that the CCP's status quo – both in Tibet and elsewhere – is not acceptable. I look forward to this important effort becoming law and working with my colleagues and the Administration to ensure swift and effective implementation."

Namgyal Choedup, Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration, said: "Senate passage of the Resolve Tibet Act is a clear message that China's systematic oppression and erasure of Tibetan identity is never the answer to resolving the Tibet-China dispute. The Central Tibet Administration remains fully committed to His Holiness the Dalai Lama's vision of a Middle Way to find a mutually beneficial and long-lasting negotiated solution to the Tibet-China dispute. We are grateful for Senator Merkley and Senator Young's leadership in showing that America will not concede to China's false claims and refusal to follow international law. Until China comes back to the negotiating table in good faith, the Tibetan people will never abandon hope and will remain resilient in their non-violent resistance. Ending the Tibet-China dispute is within grasp—if China is willing to abandon lies for truth."

Rep. Chris Smith, R-NJ, Chairman of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, said: "The people of Tibet will not be forgotten, and the enactment of the bipartisan Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act underscores that fact. The Chinese Communist Party cannot erase the history, language and culture of the Tibetan people, nor the central importance religious faith plays in the everyday lives of Tibetans. We stand in solidarity with the Dalai Lama in his quest for a lasting and just peace."

What the bill does

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act states that it is US policy that the dispute between Tibet and China remains unresolved in accordance with international law.

The legislation also:

- Empowers the Special Coordinator for Tibet to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government and Communist Party, including working to ensure that US government statements and documents counter disinformation about Tibet.
- Rejects as "inaccurate" China's false claims that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times."
- Promotes substantive dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community. The US could also explore activities to improve prospects for dialogue leading to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Affirms the State Department's responsibility to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Encourages China's government to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

Learn more about the Resolve Tibet Act.

Dalai Lama to meet Australian ministers

11 June 2024, Reuters

The Dalai Lama arrived in Australia for a five-day visit on Wednesday, with supporters urging the Australian government to encourage China to return to talks with envoys of the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader.

The Dalai Lama will meet Immigration Minister Chris Evans, who is acting head of government while Prime Minister Kevin Rudd is overseas, as well as Foreign Minister Stephen Smith.

"This reflects the Dalai Lama's status as an international religious leader and the significant domestic interest in the Dalai Lama's visit, including from the Tibetan immigrant community in Australia," a government spokesman said.

He will also hold a series of public lectures on meditation during his trip.

The meetings with government officials are likely to upset Beijing, which is keen to contain the Tibet issue ahead of the Olympics in August.

China blames a "Dalai Lama clique" for violent protests in Tibet in March, and for protests that disrupted the Olympic torch relay.

Chinese officials met the Dalai Lama's representatives for talks on May 4, but further talks originally set to start on Wednesday were postponed after an earthquake in China in May killed or left missing nearly 87,000 people.

China's Foreign Minister Yang Jeichi on Tuesday called on the Dalai Lama and his supporters to stop their Tibet protests and attempts to "ruin the Olympics" to enable further talks.

The Australian Tibet Council said it was concerned the comments signalled China wanted to avoid further talks on Tibet ahead of the Olympics.

"With less than two months remaining before the Olympics, the Australia Tibet Council fears that the Chinese government believes that it can use delaying tactics to avoid addressing the Tibet issue," council chief executive officer Paul Bourke said.

"It's clear that it is going to take concerted pressure from concerned governments for the talks even to go ahead and a major shift in China's approach for results-orientated formal negotiations to begin before the Games."

He said the Australia Tibet Council had asked the Australian government to talk to the Dalai Lama about ways to encourage further talks with China.

Former prime minister John Howard and Rudd, who was then opposition leader, met the Dalai Lama during his last visit to Australia in 2007.

Rudd returns to Australia on Sunday after visiting Japan and Indonesia, leaving little time for a meeting before the Dalai Lama leaves the country early on Monday.

The Dalai Lama fled into exile in India in 1959 after an abortive uprising against Chinese rule in Tibet. He says he advocates autonomy for the Himalayan region, and not independence.

About 30 supporters, and a small group of pro-China protesters, were at the airport on Wednesday when the Dalai Lama arrived in Sydney.

Canadian Parliament supports Tibet's self-determination

11 June 2024, RFA, Tashi Wangchuk and Tenzin Dickyi

The motion recognizes that Tibetans are victims of China's systemic cultural assimilation.

Canadian lawmaker Alexis Brunelle-Duceppe of the Bloc Québécois introduces a motion advocating for Tibet's right to self-determination, at the Canadian Parliament in Ottawa, June 10, 2024.

Canada's Parliament has unanimously passed a motion in the House of Commons advocating for Tibet's right to self-determination.

The nonbinding motion recognizes Tibetans as "a people and a nation" with the inherent right to determine their own social, economic, cultural and religious policies, including the selection of the next Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism. The measure demonstrates growing international support for Tibetans and their cause as the Chinese government steps up its repressive policies in the western region by eroding Tibetan language, culture and religion.

Sponsored by the bloc Québécois, the motion was introduced by party lawmaker Alexis Brunelle-Duceppe.

"The purpose of the motion was for the House of Commons to recognize that Tibetans are victims of systemic cultural assimilation by China; and to offer unanimous support to the Tibetan people's efforts and actions towards self-determination," he said in a written response to Radio Free Asia.

The motion says Tibetans can claim the right to self-determination and freely choose their economic, social, cultural and religious policies without interference from external powers

It also says this empowerment prohibits China from interfering in the selection of the next Dalai Lama, whom Tibetans believe should be determined in accordance with their Buddhist belief in reincarnation.

The Chinese Embassy in Ottawa did not respond to RFA's request for comment.

'Not forgotten'

The motion's passage on Monday follows a series of meetings between Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the leader of the Tibetan government-in-exile, Namgyal Choedup, the Dalai Lama's representative for North America, and the Canada Tibet Committee with Bloc Québécois leaders in Montreal, Ottawa, and Washington.

"Canada's unanimous passage of the motion reaffirming Tibetan self-determination sends a strong message to Tibetans in Tibet that their resilience is not forgotten," Tsering posted on his X account.

Tenzin Lekshey, spokesman for the Central Tibetan Administration in Dharamsala, India, expressed the gratitude of the Tibetan government-in-exile to the Canadian Parliament for supporting the motion.

"This motion holds immense significance for the Tibetan people inside Tibet, addressing key issues such as Tibet's self-determination, the future reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, Chinese interference, Chinese assimilation policies, and the importance of preserving Tibetan culture," he said.

The adoption of the motion coincides with Canada Tibet Lobby Days 2024 during which Tibetans from across Canada travel to Ottawa to meet with lawmakers and express their concerns about China's repression of Tibetans.

In December 2022, Canada's House of Commons unanimously passed a motion endorsing Tibet's Middle Way Approach and supporting the resumption of dialogue between Tibetan representatives and the Chinese government.

The approach accepts the formerly independent Himalayan nation's status as a part of China but urges greater cultural and religious freedoms, including strengthened language rights, guaranteed for ethnic minorities under provisions of China's constitution.

Auckland Tibetan Association Calls on PM Luxon to Raise Tibet During the Chinese Premier Li Qiang's Visit to New Zealand

11 June 2024, CTA

The Auckland Tibetan Association has sent a letter to the New Zealand Prime Minister requesting to raise Tibet during the Chinese Premier Li Qiang's visit to the island country.

The letter to Prime Minister Christopher Luxon reads, "Chinese Premier Li Qiang's visit to New Zealand this week is a significant one and Tibetan-New Zealanders are always in support of what our leaders do to further our nation's interest. China is New Zealand's largest trading partner and we understand the government's focus on further growth opportunities."

"However I urge you not to be silenced by China and be complicit in their moral and ethical depravation."

The letter continues, "In February 2024 alone, over a thousand Tibetans in Dege County protested the planned development of a massive hydro-dam that would flood nearby villages and obliterate six monasteries, each with centuries-old Buddhist murals. The peaceful protestors, many of whom were seen getting down on their knees, wailing and begging the Chinese authorities were arrested for simply trying to protect what was rightfully theirs.

Political repression, social discrimination, economic marginalization, environmental destruction and cultural assimilation is Tibet's reality today. China's 'Sinicization' campaign in Tibet continues to intensify with state-run colonial style boarding schools housing nearly one million Tibetan children forced apart from their parents. Restrictions on the Tibetan language in schools and across monasteries is aimed to dilute and eventually erase the Tibetan cultural and religious identity. Reports from Toronto based Citizen Lab state that between 2016 and 2022, Chinese police have collected roughly 1.2 million DNA samples of Tibetans from some as young as five to combat 'crime' and 'social stability' in the region. The PRC also demanded biometric information from Tibetans in other parts of Tibet such as DNA and IRIS records on the pretext of researching altitude sickness and studying male ancestry. These actions are covertly designed to intensify political surveillance of Tibetans. Tragically, 159 Tibetans have self-immolated since 2009 as a form of political protest. According to International watchdog group Freedom House's 'Freedom in the World 2024' report, Tibet is the least free country on earth with a score of 0 out of 100. On the other hand, New Zealand is one of the freest countries with a score of 99. The stark difference is glaring to say the least.

Religion is fundamental to the Tibetan way of life and Buddhism primarily defines the Tibetan national identity. The Tibetan people's devotion to His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, a Nobel Laureate is viewed as an act of separatism and a national security threat by the CCP. This results in continuous crackdown on the Tibetan monastic community and freedom of religion.

The visiting Chinese Premier Li Qiang himself reaffirmed the Party's stand at its annual China's National People's Congress on March 5th, 2024, by stating; "We will adhere to the Party's basic policy on religious affairs, ensure that religions in China must be Chinese in orientation, and provide guidance to religions so that they can adapt themselves to our socialist society”.

During meetings with Chinese Premier Li Qiang, we urge New Zealand Government to:

1. Call on China to re-engage in dialogue with the Dalai Lama and Central Tibetan Administration to resolve the Sino-Tibet conflict.
2. Reinforce New Zealand's expectation that China immediately grants meaningful and unfettered access to Tibet for independent observers, including the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.
3. Demand that China end its oppressive policies targeting Tibetan children and end the residential boarding school and pre-school system that separate an estimated one million Tibetan children from their families in denial of their cultural, religious and linguistic rights.
4. Demand that China cease interference in the selection and installation of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, including any future Dalai Lama. The determination of Tibetan Buddhist leaders must be determined solely by the Tibetan people, in accordance with international human rights law, without any interference by the Chinese Government.
5. Demand that China immediately release the world's youngest political prisoner His Eminence the 11th Panchen Lama and all other prisoners of conscience.
6. Demand that China repeal or amend provisions of their Criminal Procedure Law that violate the rights of detainees to a fair trial, and are routinely used to arrest Tibetans for peacefully exercising their human rights under the guise of 'separatism' and other State Security crimes.

China is no doubt a powerful country. Its influence has reached far and wide but not without consequences. China's Debt Trap Diplomacy in the Pacific Islands feels a little too close to home and not without threats to New Zealand. China's alleged state sponsored cyber hacking on New Zealand parliament in 2021 and response from our government just cautioning them to 'refrain from such activity in future' has been lack lustre.

New Zealand must shut down Confucius Institutes in its university campuses, adopt Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act, adopt Magnitsky Act and oppose the Belt and Road Initiative. If New Zealand allows China to oppress and continually abuse Tibetan human rights with impunity then New Zealand is complicit in the oppression of Tibetans. I once again ask you to use the occasion of the visit of Chinese Premier Li Qiang to raise China's human rights abuses and to stand with Tibet. Supporting the Tibetan cause is not anti-China; rather pro-justice.”

-Report filed by Office of Tibet, Canberra

Sikyong Penpa Tsering and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang Launch Autobiography of Former Kalon Tashi Wangdi

07 June 2024, CTA

Dharamshala: Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the chief guest, along with Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang and Geshe Lhakdor as special guests, launched Kasur Tashi Wangdi's autobiography "My Life: Born in Free Tibet, Served in Exile" at the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives in Dharamshala on 7 June 2024.

In his keynote speech, Sikyong Penpa Tsering shared the story of his first encounter with former Kalon Tashi Wangdi. He commended Kasur Tashi Wangdi for his over four decades of service to the Tibetan people. Tashi Wangdi had held six cabinet minister positions and served as the representative of the Offices of Tibet. Sikyong stressed the importance of the younger generation of Tibetans learning about the hardships and sacrifices of the senior ministers who supported His Holiness the Dalai Lama during the difficult times of the Tibetan freedom struggle. Sikyong concluded his speech by urging Tibetan elders to document their own histories in line with the wishes of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He also advised Tibetans to cherish historical evidence and research materials, emphasising the importance of preserving them.

During her address, Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang acknowledged the lifelong dedication and service of former Kalon Tashi Wangdi to the cause of Tibet. She also commended the author for his decision to write his autobiography, following the advice of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama. The Deputy Speaker provided a detailed account of the author's life, starting from his early days as a senior clerk at the beginning of the Central Tibetan Administration, which was formerly known as the Gaden Phodrang government. She also highlighted his journey to becoming Kalon (Minister) serving the CTA's departments. Additionally, she recognised the significant sacrifices made by the former Kalon's family in supporting him in his duties, especially acknowledging the contributions of his late wife Diky and his children, whom she found equally remarkable and praiseworthy.

Kalon (Minister) Norzin Dolma from the Department of Information and International Relations, Secretaries from Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), Secretaries from Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and former CTA dignitaries and bureaucrats also graced the book launch event.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Congratulates Indian PM Modi for Historic Third Win

06 June 2024, CTA

On 6 June 2024, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration offered his congratulations to Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and the National Democratic Alliance (NDA) for their landmark victory in the recent General elections 2024. In the letter addressed to PM Modi, Sikyong attributed the electoral victory to the enduring trust and confidence reposed by the people of India in Modi's robust leadership and the NDA's commitment to the nation's progress.

Sikyong further expressed gratitude to the Government and people of India for their long-standing support and hospitality extended towards His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan community over the decades. The letter stated, "India has graciously embraced us as cherished guests, providing a sanctuary where we can safeguard our distinct culture, language, and heritage".

The letter also highlighted the deep bond between His Holiness the Dalai Lama and India, noting His Holiness's frequent reference to himself as a son of India, acknowledging the profound influence of the ancient Nalanda tradition on his philosophical outlook. Sikyong, in the letter, also underscored His Holiness's dedication to reviving ancient Indian knowledge and wisdom and expressed deep gratitude for the initiatives supported by the central and state governments in this honourable mission.

In the letter, Sikyong Tsering urged India, the world's largest democracy, to lead democratic cooperation with like-minded nations amidst current global turmoil. Sikyong wrote, "With a legacy deeply rooted in the principles of nonviolence, India's leadership is more crucial than ever in guiding the world towards peace and stability. As you embark upon this historic third term, we continue to remain highly optimistic that under your leadership, India will continue to champion the values of democracy, freedom and human rights."

Dalai Lama to visit US for knee treatment in coming weeks

04 June 2024, RFA, Tashi Wangchuk and Tenzin Dickyi

The Tibetan Buddhism spiritual leader's last visit was in June 2017.

The Dalai Lama is scheduled to visit the United States for medical treatment for his knees in the coming weeks, according to his office, in what would be his first visit to the country since 2017.

Though the dates for which have not yet been announced, his trip is expected to take place this summer. It will be the Dalai Lama's first overseas trip since November 2018 and first overseas trip since the coronavirus pandemic.

The statement issued by his office in Dharamsala, in northern India, where the 88-year-old Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader lives in exile, said there will be no engagements scheduled from June 20 onwards.

The Dalai Lama enjoys strong support in the United States, where prominent lawmakers have spoken out about human rights issues in Tibet, through China considers him a separatist and has criticized those who meet with him.

Neither the Dalai Lama's private office nor his representative in the Washington-based Office of Tibet commented on Radio Free Asia's inquiries about the exact dates of his scheduled U.S. travel, citing security reasons.

The U.S. magazine The Atlantic said the exact timing of the Dalai Lama's visit "is not yet decided," citing sources involved in planning the trip, but that it will follow a visit later this month to Dharamsala by a bipartisan congressional delegation led by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat and former speaker of the House. She is a staunch supporter of human rights in Tibet.

Her spokesperson declined to comment on the news, saying, "We do not comment on Speaker Pelosi's upcoming or potential foreign travel" due to security concerns.

The Atlantic also said the Dalai Lama, who has bad knees, has decided to travel to the U.S. "this summer to investigate the possibility of replacement" for his knees. During the Dalai Lama's last U.S. trip in June 2017, he gave the keynote address to 25,000 graduates and their families at the University of California, San Diego. Additionally, he underwent his annual medical check-up in Rochester, Minnesota, as part of his routine health checks. His 2017 visit also included a stop in Massachusetts.

The Dalai Lama's most recent foreign trip outside of India was to Japan in November 2018, where he conducted a series of teachings and public events in Yokohama, Tokyo, Chiba and Fukuoka.

Although he hasn't traveled abroad since 2018, he has continued to travel every year to Bodhi Gaya, the holiest pilgrimage site for Buddhists, located in northeast India to conduct teachings, except during the COVID-19 lockdown in India.

Foreign visits

For years, the Dalai Lama has shared Buddhist teachings globally, while advocating for increased autonomy for Tibet and engaging with global leaders to urge China to implement these changes.

Despite the pain of being in exile, he acknowledges its benefits, facilitating his travel, interactions with diverse individuals, and the dissemination of Buddhist wisdom as a Nobel Peace Prize laureate.

Beijing has consistently criticized and opposed any foreign trips by the Dalai Lama and regards them as “a severe insult” to the feelings of the Chinese people.

“The Chinese consider such visits ... a deviation from their commitment to recognizing the government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government representing the whole of China,” Zhang Yijiong, a senior Communist Party leader, said in October 2017.

The Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration — the Tibetan government-in-exile — has adopted a Middle Way approach to the question of Tibet's status under Beijing's rule, by which accepts Tibet as a part of China but urges greater cultural and religious freedoms, including strengthened language rights guaranteed for ethnic minorities under the provisions of China's own constitution.

Nine rounds of talks on greater autonomy in Tibet and Tibetan populated areas of China were held between envoys of the Dalai Lama and high-level Chinese officials beginning in 2002, but stalled in 2010 and were never resumed.

Resolve Tibet Act

The Dalai Lama's visit comes amid the much-awaited passage of a U.S. bill urging the Chinese government to engage in dialogue, without any preconditions, with the Dalai Lama or his representatives or democratically elected Tibetan leaders to resolve the China-Tibet dispute.

The bipartisan Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, calls on China to “cease its propagation of disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama.”

The Senate unanimously approved a revised version of the bill and is due for another vote by the House. If approved, it will go to U.S. President Joe Biden, who is likely to sign it into law.

In 2020, while serving as the Democratic party presidential nominee, Biden pledged to urge China to engage in discussions with Tibetans aimed at achieving “meaningful autonomy.”

He also said at the time that if elected president, he would meet with the Dalai Lama, although he has yet to do this since taking office in 2021.

In December 2021, the Biden administration appointed Uzra Zeya as under secretary for civilian security, democracy, and human rights to serve concurrently as the U.S. special coordinator for Tibetan issues.

Department of Religion and Culture's Monastic Assessment Committee Presents Report of their Findings to His Holiness the Dalai Lama

03 June 2024, CTA

Department of Religion and Culture's Monastic Assessment Committee Presents Report of their Findings to His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

The Department of Religion and Culture, Central Tibetan Administration, held a closing meeting of the assessment committee to prepare a report of their finding to be presented to His Holiness the Dalai Lama. The 14th Tibetan Religious Conference's 13th resolution of its first agenda requires the Department of Religion and Culture to set up an assessment committee to investigate the deterioration of the religious traditions across Tibetan monasteries based in India, Nepal, and Bhutan. Accordingly, the department appealed to religious heads of all schools of Tibetan Buddhism and Yungdrung Bon to send two representatives from each school as members of the committee, following which the committee was formed.

This year, on 9 and 10 April, the committee members gathered at the Department of Religion and Culture and devised a scheme to assess the exposition and study of religious theories and practices, instruction of Vinaya rules (monastic discipline), and incorporation of modern education, health, and science at the monasteries. The committee further established a form to be employed for the assessment.

From 11 April to 24 May, the committee dispatched four teams of three members to their assigned monasteries and thus far conducted meticulous evaluations at 76 monasteries.

Thereafter, the department convened members of the committee from 25 to 30 May and drafted a report of their assessment that was later presented to His Holiness the Dalai Lama during a special audience on 31 May.

Tibetans in Dharamshala vote in the 2024 Indian general elections

01 June 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

A Tibetan monk shows his inked finger after casting his vote in Dharamshala (Photo/ANI)

Hundreds of Tibetans with voter ID voted at the Bhagsunath polling station in Dharamshala during the final phase of the 2024 Indian General Election, on Saturday. Tibetans all over India with voter ID have cast their votes in the Lok Sabha election over the course of the last few weeks. The Indian general elections, spread across seven phases took place from April 19 to June 1, 2024, to elect 543 members of the Lok Sabha of the Indian parliament. The counting of votes and the declaration of results will be done on June 4, 2024.

Himachal Pradesh, home to the second-largest population of Tibetan exiles after Karnataka, conducted its polling in the final phase on June 1. Many Tibetans holding voter ID cards, predominantly in the Kangra district, where the exile Tibetan government and Tibetan leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama are based, gave their mandate today.

The Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) advised Tibetans to exercise personal discretion regarding their participation in the election. Earlier this month in an interview with Voice of Tibet, CTA spokesperson Tenzin Lekshay stated that the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) cannot dictate whether Tibetans in exile should acquire Indian voter ID cards and Indian passports or not, it can only offer guidance. Lekshay explained that the Indian government issues Registration Certificates (RC) and Identity Cards (IC) to Tibetans with refugee status. However, the government also provides Indian passports and voter ID cards, which confer Indian citizenship. He emphasised the need for caution in deciding whether to obtain these documents, as involvement in Indian politics could have implications for the Tibetan community. He further stated that Tibetans must carefully consider whether such participation is beneficial for the collective future or not.

On May 27, the incumbent Chief Minister of Himachal Pradesh, Sukhvinder Singh Sukhu, visited Dharamshala to meet and appeal for votes from the local Tibetan community. The meeting took place at the Tibetan Settlement Office Hall in McLeod Ganj, where the Tibetan Settlement Officer presented a list of three pressing issues faced by the Tibetan community in Dharamshala.

The first issue highlighted was the construction of proper roads in the area. The second problem raised was the need for permanent shops for Tibetan shop owners, who currently operate from temporary setups along the roadside. The third issue involved resolving the dispute concerning the old Tibetan Settlement Office. Chief Minister Sukhu acknowledged these concerns and assured the community that he would make efforts to address and resolve these problems.

Speaking to Phayul, a Tibetan who voted in Dharamshala today said, "It's my fifth time voting. The reason for voting is the same as our Indian counterparts, like issues including inflation of daily needs products. It is our right to choose a representative who can work on these issues. The other advantage of having a voter card is the ease of travelling to other countries. I have relatives in Nepal, and a voter ID card, helps me to travel by flight without any difficulties. With other documents, it's hard to travel there."

Another voter stated, "The reason I made a voter ID card is because of the ease of travelling to other countries. Many countries have difficulty accepting the Identity Certificate (IC) provided to us. With a voter ID, the ease of travelling is the reason."

Tibetans in Sarguja, Chhattisgarh, participated in the third phase of the elections on May 7, 2024. In the Phuntsokling settlement, Orissa, Tibetan voters were in a dilemma about whether to participate in the Indian election due to concerns about losing refugee status. In Himachal Pradesh, Tibetans with voter ID cards have been participating in Indian elections for some years.

In February 2014, India's chief election body directed all states to include Tibetans and their offspring born in India in the electoral rolls. This followed a 2013 court order granting Indian citizenship to Tibetan refugees born in India between January 26, 1950, and July 1, 1987, and their children under the Indian Citizenship Act 1955.

New school for overseas Tibetan kids aims to preserve language

01 June 2024, RFA, Lobe Socktsang, Tashi Wangchuk and Tenzin Dickyi

The move comes amid China's attempts to suppress Tibetan language and culture among children.

Tibetan children pose for a photo at the Lower Tibetan Children's Villages school in Dharamsala, India, in an undated photo.

In a bid to help preserve Tibet's language and culture, a nonprofit organization in northern India is transforming one of its facilities into a boarding school where children of Tibetans living overseas can go to live and study.

The Dharamsala, India-based school being created by the Tibetan Children's Villages, or TCV, is accepting applications for the academic year starting Aug. 1 for children entering grades four to eight.

There are already several Tibetan boarding schools elsewhere in India, but this will be the first time one is being created for the children of overseas Tibetans.

The move comes as China intensifies its policies to suppress — or even eradicate — Tibetan and other ethnic languages and cultures and replace them with Mandarin and Han Chinese customs.

Chinese officials in Tibet and in Tibetan-populated areas in China's western provinces are using government-run boarding schools to assimilate Tibetan children culturally, religiously and linguistically, rights groups say.

Schools become 'battleground'

Tibetan students are being forcibly removed from their homes and immersed in a Mandarin-language curriculum without an opportunity to learn the Tibetan language or culture.

"Tibetan schools are the battleground for CCP ideology," said Kai Mueller, the Berlin-based executive director and head of U.N. advocacy at the International Campaign for Tibet, referring to the Chinese Communist Party.

"We have noted so many forms of indoctrination towards Tibetan children in school that it is quite astounding," he said.

The Lower TCV school in Dharamsala, India, is being renovated as a new residential school for Tibetan children from abroad. (TCV)

The types of indoctrination include poetry competitions on Chinese President Xi Jinping's Thought on socialism with Chinese characteristics, field trips to Communist Party museums, and school visits by Chinese officials and members of the Chinese military who teach children about national unity, Mueller said.

"The Chinese rulers are using ever new methods to try to transform young Tibetans into loyal Chinese," he said.

"Their main starting point is language," he said.

In a two-pronged approach, Chinese officials work to dissuade children from learning their mother tongue by sending them to compulsory boarding schools and make Mandarin attractive to young Tibetans, Mueller said.

"In this way, the Chinese leadership wants to destroy the youth's connection to traditional Tibetan culture and language," he said.

Students learn about tuberculosis at the Tibetan Children's Villages lower school in Dharamsala, India, in an undated photo. (TCV)

Grassroots idea

For this reason, many Tibetans both inside and outside Tibet urged Tibetan Children's Villages to set up a boarding school for children from overseas, TCV Director Sonam Sichoe told Radio Free Asia. The proposal was then approved by the network's board.

The school's main priority will be to teach Tibetan language skills and cultural traditions, while simultaneously receiving a modern education that is on par with the West, Sichoe said.

So far, about 15 students from the United States, Canada, Australia, Denmark and Germany have enrolled. Regardless of the numbers, the school will proceed as planned, he said.

In the dormitories, the children from overseas will be mixed with students from India so that they don't end up speaking only English, he added.

The Lower TCV school in Dharamsala, India, is being renovated as a new residential school for Tibetan children from abroad. (TCV)

Tuition, room and board cost US$350 per child per month, Sichoe said.

Because the children are expected to come from different countries, the main medium of teaching academic subjects will be in English to ensure ease of understanding and communication, he said.

Studio Nyandak Dharamsala, a design company whose local employees are all TCV alumni, is working with school administrators to renovate the campus. Changes include the installation of Western toilets, single beds instead of bunk beds, water heating facilities and solar panels.

Expanded network

Set up in 1960 as a nursery for Tibetan children, TCV was established after the Dalai Lama proposed a center to care for kids who had been orphaned or separated from their families while fleeing after China's annexation of Tibet in 1959.

Since then, the organization expanded its footprint across India to become a network of boarding schools caring for over 15,000 children.

The Dharamsala-based Lower TCV campus — now being renovated into a residential school for overseas children — came about in the 1980s after the main TCV school was inundated with children who had been smuggled out of Tibet by Tibetan parents during China's liberalization program of that period.

Earlier this year, Jetsun Pema, the younger sister of the Dalai Lama who led the school for many years, received the Pearl S. Buck award from Randolph College in Lynchburg, Virginia, in recognition of her service.

Parents' reactions

Migmar Bhuti, a Tibetan in New York, welcomed the new boarding school, saying it would enable Tibetan children to more effectively learn and preserve the Tibetan language and culture at an early age. But she also expressed concern over whether math, English, science and the social sciences would be adequately taught.

"Since the Lower TCV School is planning to only take in students from the fourth to eighth grades, I wonder if that will allow the children to catch up in their classes when they move back here from the ninth grade, or whether they will need to drop a grade," she told RFA Tibetan.

Given that academic and vacation schedules in the West differ from those in India, school officials are in discussions with parents about these concerns, said Choeying Dhondup, TCV's general-secretary.

The Lower TCV school in Dharamsala, India, is being renovated as a new residential school for Tibetan children from abroad. (TCV)

Kalsang Dorji, a father of two children and principal of a Sunday school for Tibetan children in Berkeley, California, said Tibetans there have wanted a dedicated residential school to teach their language and culture to youngsters.

"Not only do they get to learn the Tibetan language and culture very early on, they also have the opportunity to engage with other Tibetan children," he said.

The success of the school will be determined by the quality of the faculty and enrollment numbers, he added.

"In our community, there is a widespread desire to have a dedicated school like this for Tibetan children, which is why I deeply appreciate TCV's move to convert Lower TCV into a residential school for children from the West," Dorji said.

Chinese ambassador reprimands Estonian MP for visiting Tibetans in D'shala last month

30 May 2024, Tibetan Review

In a belated, angry reaction, the Chinese Ambassador to Estonia has written to an Estonian MP, reprimanding him for visiting the exile Tibetan community in India at Dharamshala and meeting with their Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) leaders late last month, reported news.err.ee May 29.

The Ambassador, Mr Guo Xiaomei, has also requested a meeting with the MP, Mr Juku-Kalle Raid, who is the chairman of the parliamentary support group for Tibet in the Riigikogu, Estonia's unicameral parliament.

"No country or government in the world has ever recognized 'Tibetan independence'," the report quoted Guo as having written to Raid. "As a responsible politician, a member of the Riigikogu should firmly adhere to international norms, respect China's sovereignty and territorial integrity, become more familiar with facts related to Xizang, and cease any form of interaction with the so-called Tibetan government in exile."

Raid has dismissed Guo's complaint as "a very old and tired tune in which China always reacts very painfully to questions about Tibet."

"But not only that. Beijing was similarly enraged by a visit to Taiwan, and the same happens every time someone draws attention to the Chinese regime, which relentlessly harasses minority peoples," Raid has said.

Raid led an Estonian parliamentary and Tibet Support Group (TSG) delegation to Dharamshala late last month. The delegation included Estonian parliament members Henn Polluaas (former speaker) and Tarmo Tamm; former MP Andres Herkel; journalist Roy Strider and Estonian Tibet Support Coordinator; and TSG members Eleri Porroson and Annabel Piiritalu.

The delegation took part in the commemoration on Apr 25 of the 35th birthday of the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, Tibet's second most prominent religious figure abducted and disappeared by the Chinese government when he was six years old, in 1995. His fate or whereabouts have continued to remain unknown to this day. China has appointed its own 11th Panchen Lama to replace him.

In his address to the gathering at that time, Raid, who is said to be also a member of the Estonian government's Foreign Affairs Commission, said, "We have had a similar past, and the past was similarly terrible, but we hope we will have a similar future that is not terrible."

Raid also met with the Dalai Lama and visited the Tibetan Parliament in Exile during the visit, said the CTA in its Tibet.net website reports Apr 25 and 26.

PM Modi refers to his frequent talks with the Dalai Lama in election speech

25 May 2024, Tibetan Review

Prime Minister Narendra Modi revealed that he talked frequently with the Dalai Lama in his May 24 election speech in Mandi constituency, which covers almost two-thirds of the state of Himachal Pradesh, reported the IANS news service May 24. The state votes on Jun 1 to elect four members to the Lok Sabha, the upper house of the Indian parliament.

Modi's BJP and the Congress are the main rivals for all the four seats. The BJP candidate for the Mandi Lok Sabha constituency seat is the well-known Bollywood actress Kangana Ranaut. Soon after her nomination for contesting the seat, Ranaut called on the Dalai Lama on Apr 15, accompanied by the state's former BJP Chief minister Jairam Ramesh Thakur. She called her experience of the meeting "very emotional", and something she will "cherish all my life."

Meanwhile, in his election speech in Mandi, Modi has said, "India is the country of Buddha and the Modi government has vigorously promoted this heritage," while highlighting places of Buddhism in the state.

Modi's remarks came after reports that the actress was shown black flags at the Buddhist-dominated Kaza in Lahaul and Spiti. It was reported as a protest against her for what was seen as a critical online Tweet on the Tibetan spiritual leader by her in Apr 2023, although the actress later apologised after protests and said it was meant to be a harmless joke and that she respected the Dalai Lama.

Referring to that episode, the Congress candidate Vikramaditya Singh on May 22 targeted Ranaut, saying, "People of the tribal area worship Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama as their God and if someone passes any remarks against their God, they will surely not like it and protest," reported the PTI new agency May 22.

The report cited Ranaut as saying the Congress was behind the protest against her at Kaza.

The Mandi constituency seat includes Kullu, Mandi and some areas of Chamba and Shimla districts, besides the tribal-dominated Kinnaur and Lahaul and Spiti, which are dominated by Buddhists.

Interestingly, Modi's assertion came just hours after the state's Chief Minister Sukhvinder Sukhu made a courtesy call on the Dalai Lama, said the IANS report said.

Sukhu sought blessings from the Dalai Lama, who praised the state and India's religious respect, reported the PTI May 24.

The report also said around 800 Tibetan exiles had registered as voters in this election.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Addresses Participants of Conference Themed 'Investigating the Impact of Contemplative Practices'

24 May 2024, CTA

Thekchen Chöling, Dharamshala, HP, India, 24 May 2024: This morning His Holiness the Dalai Lama met 200 people from, or associated with, Emory University, who have come to Dharamshala to take part in a conference on the theme 'Investigating the Impact of Contemplative Practices'. Executive Director of the Emory Compassion Center, Geshé Lobsang Tenzin Negi, introduced the occasion.

"Your Holiness, on behalf of everyone present I would like to express our gratitude to you for inviting us to this conference co-hosted by Emory University and the Dalai Lama Trust.

"Among us are Emory faculty, staff and students; Emory-Tibet Science Initiative (ETSI) students, teachers and staff; Tibetan teachers and students who are following Social, Emotional and Ethical Learning (SEE Learning) programs, as well as other observers and participants.

"For the first time, Tibetan monastic scholars who have systematically studied modern science are presenting the first outcomes of their research in the field of contemplative practice. This is an historic event, the fruit of your visionary introduction of science to the Tibetan monastic centers of learning about 20 years ago. Science has become an integral part of Tibetan monastic education. As a result of this education, monks and nuns are emerging as scientists.

"Before handing over to Dr Barbara Krauthammer, Dean of Emory University, I'd like to introduce David Nassar, Vice-president of the Templeton Foundation and John Cunningham, Executive Director of the Templeton Foundation. We are grateful for their presence and the Foundation's support of the ETSI Program over the last ten years."

Dr Negi explained that Emory students who are studying Tibetan culture, Buddhist philosophy and the Buddhist science of mind; ETSI students and Tibetan school-children would each put a question to His Holiness.

On behalf of Emory University Dr Barbara Krauthammer thanked His Holiness for his vision and kindness.

"I have nothing special to say today," His Holiness replied. "From our study of Buddhism, we have access to a great deal of information about psychology, the workings of the mind and emotions. When they talk about religion, people are generally referring to matters of faith not how to conduct an investigation. However, the Nalanda Tradition places emphasis on taking a critical, analytical approach, and its scholars are learned when it comes to the study of the mind.

"When the Indian master Shantarakshita came to Tibet in 8th century he recognized that Tibetans have an ability for deep thought. This was a measure of his kindness to us.

"I like to talk about secular ethics and what make them important is that they can be applied by anyone whether they are religious or not. The crucial issue is to discover how to achieve peace of mind. Buddhists also have to understand that what's important is not the conduct of rituals, but whether we can endow others and ourselves with peace of mind. And the way to do this is by employing the mind.

"In the monastic curriculum we learn about the four Buddhist philosophical schools, but when we interact with other people it's more practical to talk about how our mind and emotions work. This is something of common interest. The way we can help other people is to discuss how to relax and achieve peace of mind from a scientific point of view.

An Emory University student asked His Holiness how to keep hope alive in our world today.

"A lot of the time," His Holiness replied, "we have all sorts of expectations, but what we have to keep in mind is that bad as well as good things can happen. We have to use our intelligence to solve the problems we face. We have to examine what is really going on. Sometimes we may turn to religion in search of a solution, but much more effective is to employ our intelligence and our ability to reason.

"When we engage in formal debate in the monasteries, it's customary for challengers to cite quotations from scripture to support their assertions.

Barbara Krauthammer, Dean of Emory College of Arts and Sciences, thanking His Holiness the Dalai Lama for his vision and kindness during the meeting with participants of the conference about the impact of

Contemplative studies, co-organised by Emory University and The Dalai Lama Trust, at his residence in Dharamshala, HP, India on 24 May 2024. Photo by Tenzin Choejor

The defenders take off their hats to indicate their respect, but then reply that what has been cited is not logically necessary. Instead, they declare that what's important is to employ our critical faculties.

"A scientific approach is an excellent tool for assessing the reality of any given situation. The Nalanda Tradition too teaches us how analyze and investigate without resort to scripture."

A monk from the ETSI program asked how monastics who have studied science can contribute to society. His Holiness responded:

"The very purpose of studying is to be able to serve others better. As I've already said, we have to use our intelligence with reason and logic. Of course, there is a great deal we learn about the mind from reading books, but we must understand that we will learn more and in greater detail if we examine our minds in a scientific way."

Noting that His Holiness is keen to encourage an appreciation of secular ethics and that their essence is compassion, a Tibetan Children's Village (TCV) student asked what the nature of compassion is.

"Different traditions teach us how to be more considerate and well-mannered," His Holiness told her, "but compassion in terms of active concern for others is the key issue. Secular ethics provides us with the means to guide society, but on a person-to-person level, what everyone appreciates is warm-heartedness."

Two science books published by ETSI were presented to His Holiness. The visitors gathered in their various groups around him to have their photographs taken, and then they departed for the first session of their conference.

Central Tibetan Administration Appreciates the US Senate's Unanimous Passage of Resolve Tibet Bill

24 May 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering addressing the media during a press conference held on the US Senate's passage of Resolve Tibet Bill following the conclusion of Tibetan Cooperative's Conference. Photo / Tenzin Phende / CTA

The Central Tibetan Administration commends the US Senate's unanimous passage of the S. 138, titled "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act". The US Senate passed the bipartisan and bicameral legislation on 23 May 2024, sponsored by Senator Jeff Merkley (D-OR), co-chair of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, along with Senator Todd Young (R-IN).

Known as the Resolve Tibet Bill, this act reaffirms the U.S. policy of advocating for direct dialogue between the People's Republic of China and representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, or with democratically elected Tibetan leaders, without preconditions, to address the Tibet-China conflict. It acknowledges that the Tibet-China conflict remains unresolved and that Tibet's legal status is yet to be determined in accordance with international law. Additionally, the legislation aims to combat Chinese government's disinformation about Tibet, including fabricated narratives concerning Tibet's history, culture, people, and institutions, including that of His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Senator Merkley said, "All peoples around the world have inalienable rights to freedom and self-determination, including the Tibetans. Our bipartisan, bicameral Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act is a direct response to the tactics of the People's Republic of China (PRC), which continues to trample on the fundamental rights of the Tibetan people. The bill supports a peaceful resolution to the ongoing dispute between the PRC and Tibet and counters disinformation from the PRC about Tibet and its history. It now heads back to the House, and we will work to get it to President Biden's desk to help put the people of Tibet in charge of their own future."

Senator Young said, "The Chinese Communist Party's aggression towards Tibet is self-serving, with negotiations and even the very definition of Tibet on the CCP's terms. We must refresh U.S. policy towards Tibet, and push for negotiations that advance freedoms for the Tibetan people and peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama. The Senate's vote to pass this legislation demonstrates America's resolve that the CCP's status quo - both in Tibet and elsewhere - is not acceptable."

Sikyong Penpa Tsering on the Senate's passage of the bill said, "On the very auspicious day of the Saka Dawa, the US Senate unanimously passed the Resolve Tibet Bill. This is an essential step, advancing us significantly toward the bill's enactment and moving us toward right direction. The bill's progress thus far is a result of collective efforts that cannot be accomplished by one person or group alone. Despite our limited human and financial resources, we have demonstrated that by working together, we can achieve our goal. We are particularly grateful to the sponsors of the bill, Senator Jeff Merkley and Senator Todd Young and all the cosponsors for championing this bill and the senate for the decisive support to the bill."

Senate approval sends bill back to House for eventual US mandate to help resolve Tibet's status

24 May 2024, Tibetan Review

The United States Senate has on May 23 unanimously passed the bipartisan Tibet bill titled "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" (or "Resolve Tibet Act" in short). Though already passed by the House of Representatives in Feb 2024 by overwhelming majority, the bill now heads back to it for its concurrence on a few Senate amendments before it could be sent to President Joe Biden for being signed into law.

The bill questions the legitimacy of the Chinese occupation rule in Tibet and seeks to make it a US policy to promote a resolution of the Tibet-China dispute in accordance with international law. It specifically rejects as "inaccurate" China's claims that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times."

In keeping with this fact, the bill, once it becomes law, will empower the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan issues to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government and Communist Party, while US government statements and documents will also be required to do the same.

Also, it will require the US government to promote substantive dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community, leading to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

The proposed new law will task the US State Department with the responsibility to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

The US government will also be required to encourage China to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

President Tencho Gyatso of Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet has thanked Senators Jeff Merkley (D-Ore) and Todd Young (R-Ind), who had introduced the bill in the Senate, for their dedication to the cause of freedom and justice for Tibetans.

Senator Merkley has called the bill a direct response to the tactics of the People's Republic of China (PRC), "which continues to trample on the fundamental rights of the Tibetan people." He has said "he bill supports a peaceful resolution to the ongoing dispute between the PRC and Tibet and counters disinformation from the PRC about Tibet and its history."

Condemning China's ongoing aggression towards Tibet as self-serving, Senator Young has said, "We must refresh US policy towards Tibet, and push for negotiations that advance freedoms for the Tibetan people and peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama. The Senate's vote to pass this legislation demonstrates America's resolve that the CCP's status quo – both in Tibet and elsewhere – is not acceptable."

Namgyal Choedup, Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration to North America has said: "Senate passage of the Resolve Tibet Act is a clear message that China's systematic oppression and erasure of Tibetan identity is never the answer to resolving the Tibet-China dispute."

Sikyong (executive head) Penpa Tsering of the CTA sees the Senate's unanimous passage of the bill as auspicious, saying, "On the very auspicious day of the Saka Dawa, the US Senate unanimously passed the Resolve Tibet Bill." The full-moon day of the Sakadawa (4th month of the Tibetan calendar) marks the birth, enlightenment and passing away of the Buddhas Shakyamuni and it fell on May 23 this year.

Senator Merkley has vowed to work with others to get the bill to President Biden's desk to help put the people of Tibet in charge of their own future.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Closing Ceremony of Tibetan Cooperative's Conference

24 May 2024, CTA

The participants of the 3-day Tibetan Cooperative Society's Conference, 24 May 2024.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration attended the closing ceremony of the 3-day Tibetan Cooperative's conference today, 24 May 2024, at the CTA training centre located inside the premises of the Tibetan Reception Centre. In his keynote address as the event's chief guest, Sikyong stressed the purpose of this meeting, which aimed to draft proposals for establishing a cohesive and robust exiled Tibetan Community through the initiatives of Tibetan Cooperative Societies backed by DoH and FTCl. Sikyong encouraged the workshop participants to perform their duties according to the noble wishes of His Holiness the Dalai Lama to continue the legacies of His Holiness-led older Tibetan generations. Given the fact that one of the key objectives of Tibetan Cooperative Societies is to make Tibetan settlements viable and sustainable, Sikyong suggested meeting the work demands of younger generations in settlements by creating additional job opportunities through innovative schemes. Sikyong further proposed creating guidelines for future reference to promote healthy functioning and collaboration amongst the DoH, FTCl, and member Cooperatives Societies.

On a sideline event, Sikyong Penpa Tsering also brought attention to a significant development- the U.S. Senate's Unanimous passage of the Resolve Tibet bill on 23 May 2024. This news, undoubtedly, brings a sense of hope and optimism for the Tibetan community.

Alongside Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the concluding ceremony of the conference was graced by the presence of other esteemed individuals. These included Home Secretary Palden Dhondup, Additional Secretaries Tenzin Norbu and Jampa Phuntsok, and Pema Delek, Chairman of the Federation of Tibetan Cooperatives in India (FTCl).

Kharge calls upon scholars to unearth hidden history of Buddhism to enlighten next generation

23 May 2024, The Hindu

Stressing on the need for digging into history and unearthing the facts about Buddhism in the country, Congress president Mallikarjun Kharge questioned why the Krishna, the banks of which provided a lot of clues on Buddha, was neglected in historical research as compared to the Ganga, the Yamuna, and the Cauvery.

Congress president Mallikarjun Kharge paying floral tributes to Buddha at Buddha Vihar on the outskirts of Kalaburagi on Thursday. | Photo Credit: ARUN KULKARNI

"History is hidden sometimes. It is unearthed some other times. It is also distorted often. Numerous archaeological evidences found along the banks of the Krishna and its tributary the Bhima indicated that Buddhism flourished in southern India. But, there is no further research to unearth more facts about Buddhism and reconstruct its history. Our mythology has plenty of references to the Ganga, the Yamuna, and the Cauvery and it hardly had any reference to the Krishna and the Bhima," Mr. Kharge said.

He was speaking at the celebration of the 2568th Vaishakha Purnima, the birth anniversary of Gautam Buddha at Buddha Vihar on the outskirts of Kalaburagi on Thursday.

"King Nagarjuna was a great patron to thousands of Buddhist monks. When he faced stiff resistance to his patronage of Buddhism, he sent the monks to China, Tibet, and other countries. We must pick up such history, which is hitherto hidden, and pass it on to the next generation, no matter what resistance we face," Mr. Kharge said.

Expressing his discontentment over the poor response to Buddhist thoughts in India, Mr. Kharge said that the number of foreigners visiting Sarnath was more than Indians visiting the place.

"People from Japan, Thailand, Indonesia, Myanmar, Vietnam, and other countries increasingly visit Sarnath. How many people from India are visiting the place which is just 16 km from Varanasi? It is the place where Gautama Buddha taught his first sermon to his five disciples after attaining enlightenment at Bodh Gaya," he said.

Upholding the Buddha as a great philosopher and social reformer who enlightened the world with his revolutionary and scientific thoughts, Mr. Kharge, who is the founder of Buddha Vihar Trust in Kalaburagi, called upon the people understand, internalise, and follow Buddhist philosophy to get enlightened and lead a more humane life.

"We all must read, understand and internalise Buddha. Those who follow Buddha will be enlightened and lead a meaningful life. All religions have a bunch of fairytales and legendary stories. The followers of those religions exaggerated them to impress the people. However, Buddha had never lied. There was no exaggeration in Buddhist stories. All his words are facts and based on real-life experiences. His philosophy is rational and scientific. This is what exactly Basavanna [the 12th-century social reformer and poet in Karnataka] had advocated through his Vachanas [poems]. We need to think of and follow such scientific and progressive ideologies to lead more meaningful life," Mr. Kharge said.

The event was attended by Medical Education Minister Sharan Prakash Patil, MLAs Allamprabhu Patil and M.Y. Patil, MLC Tippannappa Kamaknur and Congress leader Jagadev Guttedar.

Apart from Mr. Kharge's wife Radhabai and several Buddhist monks arrived from different places.

"Buddha never advised his followers or the people at large what to be done and what not to be done. He never said he was a god. He simply went on to share his experiences. Buddha is regarded as the ninth incarnation of Vishnu. Is Buddha receiving the same treatment that Rama, Krishna, Parashuram, and other deities who were regarded as the other incarnations of Vishnu are receiving? When we had raised such valid questions, Prime Minister Modi alleged that we are making divisions between deities," Mr. Kharge said.

Writer H.R. Swamy, who gave a special lecture on Buddha and his thoughts, said that Albert Einstein, who was regarded as the greatest scientist of all times, had termed Buddhism as the religion based on scientific foundation.

"The Buddhist thoughts are the basis for the revolutionary and progressive thoughts of the 12th century reformer Basavanna and Mahatma Gandhi," he said.

Resolve Tibet Act unanimously passes Senate

23 May 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The United States Senate unanimously passed the bipartisan Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act today, May 23, 2024.

Also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, this bill will strengthen US efforts to push the Chinese government to resolve the longstanding Tibet-China dispute through dialogue with Tibetan leaders.

In a statement, International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) President Tencho Gyatso lauded the advance of the bill and emphasized that China must resume dialogue with the Tibetans, saying, "I hope Beijing will now see that this dispute must be resolved through negotiation, instead of an assault on Tibet's unique and ancient civilization."

Steady advance through Congress

The House version of the Resolve Tibet Act was passed earlier this year with overwhelming bipartisan support. Although additional procedural hurdles remain, passing the Senate is a crucial step forward for the bill.

This day arrived following ongoing advocacy efforts ICT, the Office of Tibet, Tibetan Associations around the country, and other prominent Tibet groups that included postcard campaigns to members of Congress, letters from Tibetan Associations to their elected representatives, and numerous grassroots efforts by Tibet support groups including a record-breaking turnout at the 2024 Tibet Lobby Day, organized by ICT.

After 65 years of Chinese occupation, Tibet's global freedom score has now dropped all the way to zero, watchdog group Freedom House says in a recent report.

Quotes from Congress members and Tibetan leaders International Campaign for Tibet President Tencho Gyatso said: "Today's Senate action is an indication that American support of Tibet will never waver. The Resolve Tibet Act is crystal clear; it is incumbent on China to resume dialogue, and the United States will not accept China's disinformation about Tibet, particularly when it concerns the historical status of Tibet. I thank Senator Merkley and Senator Young for their dedication to the cause of freedom and justice for Tibetans, and I hope Beijing will now see that this dispute must be resolved through negotiation instead of an assault on Tibet's unique and ancient civilization."

Senator Jeff Merkley, D-OR, said: "All peoples around the world have inalienable rights to freedom and self-determination, including the Tibetans. Our bipartisan, bicameral Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act is a direct response to the tactics of the People's Republic of China (PRC), which continues to trample on the fundamental rights of the Tibetan people. The bill supports a peaceful resolution to the ongoing dispute between the PRC and Tibet and counters disinformation from the PRC about Tibet and its history. It now heads back to the House, and we will work to get it to President Biden's desk to help put the people of Tibet in charge of their own future."

Senator Todd Young, R-IN, said: "The Chinese Communist Party's aggression towards Tibet is self-serving, with negotiations and even the very definition of Tibet on the CCP's terms. We must refresh U.S. policy towards Tibet, and push for negotiations that advance freedoms for the Tibetan people and peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama. The Senate's vote to pass this legislation demonstrates America's resolve that the CCP's status quo – both in Tibet and elsewhere – is not acceptable."

Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration to North America Namgyal Choedup said: "Senate passage of the Resolve Tibet Act is a clear message that China's systematic oppression and erasure of Tibetan identity is never the answer to resolving the Tibet-China dispute. The Central Tibet Administration remains fully committed to His Holiness the Dalai Lama's vision of a Middle Way to find a mutually beneficial and long-lasting negotiated solution to the Tibet-China dispute. We are grateful for Senator Merkley and Senator Young's leadership in showing that America will not concede to China's false claims and refusal to follow international law. Until China comes back to the negotiating table in good faith, the Tibetan people will never abandon hope and will remain resilient in their non-violent resistance. Ending the Tibet-China dispute is within grasp—if China is willing to abandon lies for truth."

What the bill does

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act states that it is US policy that the dispute between Tibet and China remains unresolved in accordance with international law.

The legislation also:

- Empowers the Special Coordinator for Tibet to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government and Communist Party, including working to ensure that US government statements and documents counter disinformation about Tibet.
- Rejects as "inaccurate" China's false claims that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times."
- Promotes substantive dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community. The US could also explore activities to improve prospects for dialogue leading to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Affirms the State Department's responsibility to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Encourages China's government to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

Reports detail forced displacement and violent reprisals against protest in Tibet

22 May 2024, China Digital Times, Arthur Kaufman

Two research reports published this week underscore how authorities in Tibet have displaced local communities to impose state-sponsored projects, undermining environmental protection and human rights. The collaborative research network Turquoise Roof published the first report, "Occupying Tibet's rivers: China's hydropower 'battlefield' in Tibet." The report details how violent paramilitary reprisals have stifled protests against the construction of the planned Kamtok hydropower dam along the Dri Chu (Yangtze) river, threatening the displacement of villages and Buddhist monasteries:

The protests draw urgent attention to China's extractivist plans that are carving up the Tibetan landscape, risking landslides, earthquakes and food insecurity, and impacting tens of millions living downstream in China, India and elsewhere in Asia. State-owned conglomerates are accelerating the construction of mega dams and associated infrastructure in Tibet despite the inherent dangers of a seismically unstable region where river systems are increasingly unpredictable due to climate change.

For the first time, China's dambuilding is now reaching upriver to the sources of Asia's great wild mountain rivers in Tibet in landscapes that were previously among the least disturbed habitats on earth. Tibet is described by Chinese engineers as "the main battlefield of China's hydropower construction", while a Chinese chief engineer warned that the process of constructing a dam in the upper reaches of the Dri Chu river is like building "high-rise blocks on tofu".

[...] The plans involve the entire population of the area – monks and lay, old and young – being uprooted and displaced in their thousands from villages and monasteries that have flourished upstream in the sacred mountains of Gendong alongside the Dri Chu or the upper Yangtze River, the longest and largest river on the Eurasian continent.

[...] The construction of the Kamtok dam risks a cascade of adverse consequences both on the plateau and in China, serving as a reminder that China's policies in Tibet – where water is regarded as a 'strategic asset' by the Communist Party state – affect global climate systems already challenged by food and water insecurity involving glacial melting and erratic monsoon cycles. A leading Tibetan professor based in Beijing has revealed data showing that the rivers of Tibet are becoming more and more unpredictable.

Protests against the dam began in mid-February in Derge County (also known as Dege) in Sichuan Province, where authorities reportedly arrested over 100 Tibetan Buddhist monks and other residents. Videos of the protests showed black-clad forces pushing around Tibetan monks who were peacefully protesting. Similar dynamics were observed in mid-April, as Tibet Watch reported that the government had already started relocating around 60 households located near another planned hydropower station on the Machu river in Qinghai Province.

A second report was published by Human Rights Watch and titled, "Educate the Masses to Change Their Minds: China's Forced Relocation of Rural Tibetans." The report draws on over 1,000 official Chinese media articles between 2016 and 2023 as well as government publications and academic field studies. It shows that Chinese media reports in many cases contradict official claims that all those relocated gave their consent and instead indicate that participation in "whole-village relocation" programs in Tibet is in effect compulsory:

The official press reports indicate the extreme forms of persuasion—that is, coercion—used by officials to pressure villagers and nomadic people or nomads to agree to whole-village relocation. These methods include repeated home visits; denigrating the intellectual capacity of the villagers to make decisions for themselves; implicit threats of punishment; banning of criticism; and threats of disciplinary action against local officials who fail to meet targets. In some cases, officials of increasing seniority visited families at their homes to gain their "consent," visits that sometimes were repeated over several years. Some official press reports and videos obtained by Human Rights Watch show officials telling residents that essential services would be cut to their current homes if they did not move. Others showed authorities openly threatening villagers who voiced disagreements about the relocations, accusing them of "spreading rumors" and ordering officials to crack down on such actions "swiftly and resolutely"—implying administrative and criminal penalties. This report includes three case studies that show in detail the timelines, objectives, arguments, and methods used to obtain the "consent" of residents of entire villages to relocate.

[...] Official statistics suggest that between 2000 and 2025, the Chinese authorities will have relocated over 930,000 rural Tibetans (see Appendix I). Most of these relocations—over 709,000 people or 76 percent of these relocations—have taken place since 2016. Among these 709,000 people relocated, 140,000 are moved as part of the whole village relocation drives, 567,000 as part of individual household relocations.

[...] The relocation program in Tibet contravenes international human rights law standards. International law prohibits "forced evictions," which have been defined as the removal of individuals, families, or communities against their will from their homes or land without access to appropriate forms of legal or other protection. Forced evictions include those that lack meaningful consultation or compensation, and which do not consider "all feasible alternatives" to relocation. Otherwise, lawful evictions must still be carried out in compliance with relevant international human rights law and "in accordance with general principles of reasonableness and proportionality."

The report stated that over three million Tibetans have been forced to give up their traditional nomadic lifestyles based on yak herding and agriculture, and that "most relocation programs in Tibet move former farmers and pastoralists to areas where they cannot practice their former livelihood and have no choice but to seek work as wage laborers in off-farm industries." Providing more details from the report, Marrian Zhou from Nikkei Asia highlighted the involuntary nature of the relocations and their detrimental economic effects:

In one case, 200 out of 262 families in a village in the nomadic area of Nagqu initially refused to move almost 1,000 kilometers away. Villagers eventually consented and there has been no record of anyone who was able to avoid relocation.

"The Chinese government says that the relocation of Tibetan villages is voluntary, but official media reports contradict this claim," said Maya Wang, acting China director at Human Rights Watch. "Those reports make clear that when a whole village is targeted for relocation, it is practically impossible for the residents to refuse to move without facing serious repercussions."

[...] Government officials also ask poorer families to move away from areas that are deemed "more suitable for income generation," according to the report. Researchers found that local officials sometimes lied about the economic benefits of relocation to get the families to move, leaving them financially stranded in their new neighborhoods.

[...] Chinese laws require that families who relocate demolish their former homes to prevent them from returning. Researchers found that local officials in Tibet often enforce the demolition as well.

International Campaign for Tibet · May 22, 2024

@SaveTibetOrg · Follow

Replying to @SaveTibetOrg

ICT President Tencho Gyatso says, "China's coercive mass displacement of Tibetans destroys Tibetan way of life and culture under the misleading policy labels of 'poverty alleviation' and 'ecology protection'. Tibetans have lived on the Tibetan plateau for thousands of years..

International Campaign for Tibet

@SaveTibetOrg · Follow

way before China came into existence, adapting genetically and socially on how best to live and protect the high-altitude environment. China's reckless displacement policy and programs is pulling apart Tibetan society, its ancient cultural and environmental best practices."

7:30 PM · May 22, 2024

1

Reply

Share

Read 1 reply

State-driven forced displacement has put Tibetan culture under threat. President of the Tibetan government-in-exile Penpa Tsering told France Culture this week, "We need to talk with the Chinese government. We try to find dialogue. But if you see what the government is doing all over China : everything is aimed at eradicating Tibetan culture. It is a true cultural genocide. We are dying a slow death, and so are the Uyghurs." Covering the Human Rights Watch report for VOA, William Yang showed that Tibetan activists shared Penpa's fears about the eradication of Tibetan identity:

Some Tibetan activists worry that the mass relocation or displacement of Tibetan communities may eventually "eradicate the Tibetan identity."

"It takes many years for [a community] to flourish in one land, and you can't easily build that in a place where you are not willing to go," Tenzin Choekyi, a senior researcher at Tibet Watch, told VOA by phone.

In her view, the implementation of the relocation policies hasn't taken the Tibetan community's opinions and thoughts into consideration. "The Tibetan identity is in the hands of the Chinese party-state and is being eradicated under different policy directives," she said.

This week, Tibetscapes, a research collective at the Indian Institute of Technology-Madras, shared a preview of R. Madhumitha's recently submitted M.A. thesis that connects the themes of forced displacement, urbanization, Tibetan identity. It is titled, "Fiction as a Window to Contemporary Tibet: Understanding the Tibetan Experience of Sedentarisation & Urbanisation":

Madhumitha's thesis examines Tibetan responses to Chinese state-making as they emerge through modern Tibetan fiction in English and English translations of Tibetan writing. She argues that 21st-century Tibetan literature has framed an uneasy confrontation with the state's processes of sedentarization and urbanisation as a central element of the modern Tibetan identity and captures diverse and nuanced lived experiences of Tibetans.

Last year, CDT produced an interview series about Tibet and spoke with Tenzin Norgay, Lhadon Tethong (part one and part two), Bhuchung Tsering, Dechen Pemba, and Tsering Yangzom Lama. The latest interview in the series was with Lobsang Yangtso, Environmental Researcher at the International Tibet Network, who argued that the Chinese government's interpretation of environmental protection in fact prioritizes extractive economic policies at the expense of sustainability and participatory governance:

The kind of environmental problems that we see in Tibet, all of them are very urgent. But one thing that I would like to highlight is how the Chinese government interprets environmental protection in the name of clean energy and so-called ecological civilization. They bring policies to Tibet and then remove people from their land in the name of protection: people are relocated, nomads are removed from their land. According to the Chinese government, removing nomads is essential to protect the grassland from degradation, and also to elevate the nomads from poverty. This is a really significant issue because nomads are losing their livelihood. And the nomadic way of life is their identity, their culture. The participation of nomads in the decision making is completely missing in the current policy that we see in Tibet. This has an economic, cultural, and political implication as well. So I feel this is very, very urgent.

[...] When we talk about environmental policies from the government, the one problem that I see is that, in this whole policy of the Chinese government, economic development is the main emphasis, and in the name of economic development, they try to gain legitimacy from the local people. For them, economic development is more important than environmental protection in Tibet. So many policies like urbanization, especially when we specifically focus on border areas, specifically on the Brahmaputra, that kind of infrastructure development—the roads, the railways, the airports that we see have a lot of impact on water. Slowly, with these infrastructure developments, it will bring more army, more Chinese, and then slowly they will do mining, and then tunnel-building. Everything is all about gaining and extracting the resources from Tibet and then neglecting the respect for the whole nature and ecosystem. For us, we believe in nature reserves and we believe the rivers are sacred, but these concepts have not been really included in the policymaking. Right now, we are under the colonial occupation of China. And yes, the whole global world is facing climate change, but Chinese political control and colonialism has further degraded the whole Tibet environment.

China accelerates forced relocation of rural Tibetans to urban areas, report says

22 May 2024, VOA, William Yang

In a newly released report, Human Rights Watch says China has been accelerating the forced relocation of Tibetan villagers and herders in the name of “poverty alleviation” and environmental protection since 2016.

While Chinese authorities describe the relocations as voluntary, the New York-based international rights organization’s report cites more than 1,000 Chinese state media reports and government publications that it says contradict that assertion.

“The news articles indicate that participation in whole-village relocation programs in Tibet is in effect compulsory,” the report said, adding that many Tibetans asked to relocate express “high levels of reluctance.”

China’s official data suggests that more than 930,000 Tibetans in rural areas have been relocated since 2000, and around 76% of these relocations happened since 2016, the report said.

FILE - Yaks graze around tents set up for herders to live in the during the summer grazing season on grasslands near Lhasa, in western China's Tibet Autonomous Region, on June 2, 2021.

Of that total, at least 140,000 rural Tibetans were moved as part of what authorities called “whole-village relocation.” In some cases, rural Tibetans are relocated to places hundreds of kilometers from their homes.

And while some Tibetan villagers are reluctant to take part in the government’s relocation program initially, state media reports show how local authorities have used coercive measures, including repeated home visits, threats of punishment or the banning of criticism, to push these Tibetans to comply, the report said.

“In some cases, officials of increasing seniority visit families to gain their ‘consent’ [while] some official reports show [local authorities] telling residents that essential services would be cut to their current homes if they didn’t move,” the report wrote.

Human Rights Watch also found that higher-level authorities would routinely pressure local officials to use coercive measures to achieve the goal of relocating rural Tibetans. The higher-level authorities would “routinely characterize the relocation program as a non-negotiable policy coming straight from the national capital, Beijing, or from Lhasa, the regional capital,” the report said.

Maya Wang, the interim director at Human Rights Watch, told VOA that the forced relocations are part of the Chinese government’s efforts to “assimilate” Tibetans into the majority Han Chinese society.

“The whole project has an impact of transforming Tibetans’ way of life,” Wang said, adding that the relocations “undermine the Tibetan language, culture and religion.”

During a press conference in 2020, China’s State Council Information Office said 266,000 rural Tibetans had been relocated to 965 areas established by the Chinese government as part of its efforts to “alleviate poverty” in Tibet.

Misleading promises

In addition to the “whole-village relocation,” the report said around 567,000 rural Tibetans may have been relocated as part of the government’s “individual household relocation” program since 2016.

While individual household relocation involves less coercive measures, Human Rights Watch found that officials would try to gain Tibetan families’ consent by providing misleading information about the economic benefits of moving to a new place.

“Surveys carried out by official scholars at relocation sites in Tibet concluded that many of those relocated 'cannot find suitable jobs to support their families' and 'satisfaction with relocation is low,'" the report said.

These Tibetans "have to leave their animals and move to an area near a town where they can't farm," Robert Barnett, an expert on Tibet at King's College London, told VOA by phone.

He said in other cases, rural Tibetans are relocated to areas they are not familiar with culturally, and one of the requirements for them to find jobs in urban centers is to acquire Chinese language skills. "There are lots of question marks about whether the Chinese government thought through this strategy," Barnett said.

To help Tibetans find jobs, Barnett said the Chinese government has tried to set up industries and projects for them to work on. "I'm not sure it's a very satisfying form of income for the Tibetans, as they've spent their entire lives being their own bosses," he told VOA.

In response to the report, the Chinese embassy in the United States said the assertion that Tibetans have been forcefully relocated is "entirely groundless."

"No one has been forced to become 'transferred laborers' in Xizang [China's official name for Tibet] and workers of all ethnic groups in Xizang choose their professions according to their own will," Liu Pengyu, the spokesperson of the Chinese embassy in the U.S., told VOA in a written response.

Violation of international law

Despite the Chinese government's defense of its relocation program in Tibet, Human Rights Watch said the two relocation programs and other government programs that require rural Tibetans to rebuild houses or adopt "a sedentary way of life" if they are nomads have affected most of the 4.55 million Tibetan population in rural areas.

"While such mass relocations of residents have been occurring elsewhere in poor rural areas in China, these drives risk causing a devastating impact on Tibetan communities," the report wrote.

Maya Wang told VOA that the involuntary nature of these relocations constitutes forced eviction, which is prohibited by international law. "This is a classic Chinese development behavior towards minorities that in many ways violates international human rights law," she said.

Some Tibetan activists worry that the mass relocation or displacement of Tibetan communities may eventually "eradicate the Tibetan identity."

"It takes many years for [a community] to flourish in one land, and you can't easily build that in a place where you are not willing to go," Tenzin Choekyi, a senior researcher at Tibet Watch, told VOA by phone.

In her view, the implementation of the relocation policies hasn't taken the Tibetan community's opinions and thoughts into consideration. "The Tibetan identity is in the hands of the Chinese party-state and is being eradicated under different policy directives," she said.

From Scrolls to Screens: Tibetan Digital Library Initiative Begins in Dharamshala-based Monasteries and Cultural Centres

21 May 2024, CTA

From Scrolls to Screens: Tibetan Digital Library Initiative Begins in Dharamshala-based Monasteries and Cultural Centres

As part of its ongoing Tibetan Digital Library Initiative, the Department of Religion and Culture, Central Tibetan Administration, convened a two-day introductory workshop on 13 and 14 May 2024. The workshop's primary objective was to acquaint the staff and dealing personnel from three Dharamshala-based Tibetan monasteries and cultural centres with the sophisticated tools and methodologies provided by Wadhvani AI and the Buddhist Digital Resource Center's application.

With the successful conclusion of the workshop, the task force responsible for the initiative commenced the pivotal phase of researching and digitising ancient scriptures housed within the monastic repositories on 15 May.

Under this initiative, the project will render mechanical facilities, along with training and a year-long salary, to dealing staff of the monasteries to realise this digitisation initiative in 20 monasteries by forthcoming September.

The project was funded by USAID.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Congratulates the New President of Taiwan

21 May 2024, CTA

His Holiness the Dalai Lama has written to His Excellency Lai Ching-te to offer warm congratulations on his assuming the Presidency of the Republic of China.

"It is wonderful to see how firmly rooted democracy has become in Taiwan," he wrote. "The Taiwanese people have not only developed a flourishing, robust democracy, but have also achieved great prosperity, while at the same time preserving their rich cultural traditions.

"May I wish you every success in meeting the challenges that lie ahead in fulfilling the hopes and aspirations of the people of Taiwan."

The only power China lacks is moral power

21 May 2024, NZZ, Marco Kauffmann Bossart

The head of the Tibetan exile government, Penpa Tsering, calls for autonomy for Tibetans living under the Chinese state.

The spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, the Dalai Lama, is as famous as the pope. Few people know the political leader Penpa Tsering. On trips abroad, the president of Tibet's government-in-exile lobbies for autonomy in Tibet, the highlands which were occupied by the young People's Republic of China in 1951.

The communist regime rules the so-called autonomous region of Tibet with an iron fist. It monitors monasteries, and insists on having a say in the naming of the next dalai lama. The officially atheist government in Beijing even had a law passed stating that his reincarnation must take place in China. Tibetan Buddhists believe that the dalai lama is reincarnated after death and can be identified. The 14th dalai lama, the current holder of the title, announced that his reincarnation would take place in a free country, thus ruling out the possibility of his successor being discovered in the People's Republic of China.

Out of consideration for Beijing's sensitivities, Tibetan politicians are rarely received by members of the government. This made the brief meeting between Penpa Tsering and French President Emmanuel Macron in Paris at the beginning of May all the more remarkable. In Switzerland, the president of the exile government met with members of the Tibet Parliamentary Group.

A delegation of employees and assistants accompanied him to the interview on the roof of a hotel in Bern. The 57-year-old surveyed the snow-covered mountain ranges of the Bernese Oberland, stubbed out a cigarette, and was then ready for the first question.

Mr. Penpa Tsering, the wars in Gaza and Ukraine are dominating the world's attention. Is it still possible to arouse interest in the needs of Tibetans?

Especially now, when bloody conflicts are captivating the world, it is important to promote peaceful solutions. His Holiness, the Dalai Lama, and the government in exile are striving for a nonviolent «middle way» for Tibet.

What does this middle way look like?

An autonomous status for Tibet, not only in name, but also in reality. However, a middle way can emerge only on the following condition: We must recognize that we are starting from two completely opposite poles. One is the historical status of Tibet as an independent state. The other pole corresponds to Tibet's current situation under the repressive Chinese communist government.

Beijing claims that Tibet has always been part of China. You devote considerable energy to refuting this characterization. Why is this fight so important?

Regardless of whether we are talking about the occupation of Ukraine or what happened in Tibet 70 years ago, we are talking about the same international law. Tibet was occupied by force. Under international law, this occupation should be null and void. In fact, the Chinese government knows very well that its rule of Tibet has no legitimacy. Otherwise the communists would not be trying with all their might to convince the international community that Tibet has always belonged to China. For 12 years, there was radio silence between Beijing and the Tibetans in exile. Informal talks have been resumed during your term of office. How did this come about?

The Chinese side approached us at the beginning of 2023. They are obviously aiming to reopen an official channel for talks. But we have no great expectations. You have only to look at what is happening under President Xi Jinping.

What are you alluding to?

China's leadership is aiming to destroy the identity of the various nationalities, especially in Tibet. Boarding schools have been established where everything is taught in Mandarin. Tibetan lessons have been reduced to just four hours per week. University entrance exams and exams for Chinese jobs are all in Chinese. This reduces the value of the national languages, and thus weakens the foundation of national identity.

Five years ago, your predecessor said that China would never succeed in destroying Tibetan culture. Is that no longer true?

His assessments reflected the situation in 2019. The situation in Tibet is changing, and there are reports that they may altogether eliminate use of the Tibetan language. If that happens, it will have even more serious consequences for Tibetans. A whole generation of Tibetans would become Chinese. A generation without a Tibetan identity.

You say that China's leadership is intensifying its repression in Tibet. So why are they simultaneously seeking dialogue?

I don't know the exact reasons, but one obvious reason is His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He is 88 years old. The possibility that he may die soon cannot be ruled out. Beijing is more concerned about the next dalai lama than the living one. The Chinese know that they can control the Tibetan people as long as they control the next dalai lama. So I have no doubt: China wants to control the next dalai lama.

The Chinese leadership wants to influence the selection of the next Dalai Lama. Does that worry you?

His Holiness – and only His Holiness – is responsible for his reincarnation. In 2011, he wrote in a document that he would say more after he turned 90. There is nothing the Chinese government can do about this. Moreover, we do not believe that an atheist regime has any credibility on this issue. If the Chinese government is really serious about reincarnation, it would first have to believe in life after death.

So no need to worry?

Not really, for the reasons mentioned. On the other hand, we also know that China will try to pressure other countries to adopt its view of things – as it is doing with regard to the history of Tibet. They use all their economic influence to push others to support their position. When you took office, you set yourself the goal of «solving the Tibetan question.» That sounds unrealistic.

We aren't striving for independence. But despite this, the Chinese government continues to refer to the Dalai Lama as a separatist. They also call me a separatist. My question to the Chinese government is: Who wants to separate from China? His Holiness repeats: middle way, middle way, middle way. Like a mantra. And the Chinese shout: separatist, separatist, separatist!

Is rapprochement impossible, and the Tibet question insoluble?

In the short term, yes. The conflict has been going on for 70 years. I can't wave a magic wand and solve the problems in a year or two. But things are changing in China, that much we know. President Xi Jinping lives in a paranoid world in which he sees enemies everywhere, abroad and at home. So when we talk about China's military and political strength, it comes from the country's economic position. The only power China lacks is moral power.

From Beijing's perspective, the communist leadership has done a great deal for Tibet, especially with regard to advancing the region economically.

That has been good. But the Chinese way of thinking falls short. They are fixated on economic development. But this does not correspond to the reality of our nature, our existence, which has more dimensions. Thus, people are seeking more than economic development. You don't believe in a god? You don't believe in life after death? That's all right. But we also need to respect people who have a faith. Xi Jinping must understand that his policies are being rejected in Tibet.

You live in exile. How do you learn what is actually happening in Tibet?

We have our sources within Tibet. And for decades, Tibetans have been crossing the Himalayas and fleeing to Dharamsala in India, the seat of the exile government.

You said in a speech that frustration and anger were growing among the Tibetans over the complicated situation. Is there a threat of radicalization?

I can't make any predictions. Theoretically there is a risk. But let's look at what is actually happening: In Tibet, around 160 Tibetans set themselves on fire between 2009 and 2022. Most of the people who did this were between 16 and 35 years old. They had never experienced independence. They did not live through the invasion of Tibet by China. They only saw what the Chinese government is doing to the Tibetan people today. And this act of self-immolation is an act of desperation.

There is a sense of frustration in the diaspora. I can understand that. When I was young, I wanted to fight with every single Chinese person. But no one has allowed themselves to be provoked into acts of violence. Why? The Dalai Lama is committed to nonviolence. And I have also radically changed my attitude. Wherever we meet with young people, we repeat the core message: violence generates counterviolence.

Penpa Tsering

As a child of Tibetan refugees, Penpa Tsering studied economics in India. In 2021, around 60,000 Tibetans in over 40 countries elected him as political head (Sikyong) of the exile government, the so-called Central Tibetan Administration. Like the Dalai Lama, who handed over his political functions to the secular Sikyong in 2011, Penpa Tsering resides in Dharamsala, India, at the foot of the Himalayas.

Tibet Support Group in Vilnius Organises Peaceful Protest to Free Panchen Lama In Front of the Chinese Embassy

19 May 2024, CTA

The members of the Tibet Support Group organised a protest action in front of the Chinese Embassy in Vilnius

On 17 May, on the 29th anniversary of the abduction of the Panchen Lama, members of the Tibet Support Group organised a protest action in front of the Chinese Embassy in Vilnius. The protesters demanded that Lithuanian and European politicians pay attention to human rights problems in Tibet.

On this day in 1995, six-year-old Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, who had been proclaimed as the incarnation of the XI Panchen Lama just three days earlier, was kidnapped and forcibly disappeared by the Chinese government. Robertas Mažeika, a member of the Tibet Support Group, stressed that China must be pressured to reveal the whereabouts of the recognised Panchen Lama. He also noted that in response to the deteriorating situation in the region, Tibetan communities and representatives in Lithuania and abroad are calling on present and future Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) to sign a pledge to support Tibet.

Vytis Vydūnas, head of Tibet House and a lecturer at Vilnius University, admitted that the question of the Dalai Lama's successor may seem exotic to the Lithuanian public, but noted that it is a cultural aspect of global significance. "Tibetans are our natural allies. The Uighurs are our natural allies, just as the Chinese regime is an ally of the monstrous and inhuman regime that is currently in Russia. We must support the Tibetan struggle," said Mr. Vydūnas.

The picketers carried Tibetan and Lithuanian flags, and placards reflecting the demands of the action read "Free Panchen Lama", "Respect human rights in Tibet", "Stop cultural genocide of Tibetans: close colonial boarding schools!" and more. They also chanted "Free Tibet".

The national broadcaster LRT produced a TV report and distributed information about the event on its website, lrt.lt.

DIIR Statement on the 29th Enforced Disappearance Day of the 11th Panchen Lama

17 May, 2024, CTA

29 Years On: Still "Missing"

Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, was abducted by the authorities of the People's Republic of China on this day in 1995. At that time, the mere six-year-old was then recognised as one of the highest religious leaders in Tibetan Buddhism. On 14 May 1995, His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama had publicly announced the young boy as the 11th Panchen Lama and officially bestowed him the name Jetsun Tenzin Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo. Three days later, on 17 May, the young Panchen Lama "disappeared" along with his parents and Chadrel Rinpoche, the abbot of the Panchen Lama's seat Tashi Lhunpo monastery. Rejecting His Holiness the Dalai Lama's recognition of the Panchen Lama's reincarnation, the Chinese authorities appointed another boy in his place for political motives. 29 years on, the Panchen Lama, his parents and Chadrel Rinpoche are still "missing", without a trace.

Over these years, the international community, various governments, organisations, supporters and Tibetans around the world made extensive efforts on many accounts to ascertain the whereabouts of the 11th Panchen Lama, who was popularly known by his birth name Gedhun Choekyi Nyima. Some even raised concerns about the Panchen Lama's health and whereabouts directly with PRC delegations, including in the United Nations on several occasions but to no avail.

"We condemn China's prolonged enforced disappearance of the 11th Panchen Lama and reiterate our call on the PRC government to immediately release the Panchen Lama who has remained in captivity for 29 years," states Tenzin Lekshay, the spokesperson of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), and Additional Secretary of the Department of Information and International Relations. "Where else would it be possible but under the PRC government that an adult is kept completely oblivious of what's happening and hidden from the face of the earth that there is not even a single reliable information or photo of the abducted Panchen Lama of recent times? We demand the PRC government to release verifiable information of the well-being and the location of the Panchen Lama, and that of his parents and Chadrel Rinpoche. Until the light of truth is shined, we will continue to demand for their freedom,” he further exclaims.

Last month, on 24 April, the Panchen Lama turned 35 years of age. The CTA observed his birthday in absentia, along with many others around the world. As long as the PRC continues to keep him “disappeared”, the CTA’s efforts in advocating for the Panchen Lama’s release will continue, the search will continue.

Marking 29 Years Since the Panchen Lama’s Disappearance

17 May 2024, US Department of State, Matthew Miller

Today marks 29 years since the People’s Republic of China (PRC) abducted the 11th Panchen Lama, one of the most important figures in Tibetan Buddhism, as a six-year-old child. Gedhun Choekyi Nyima remains missing and has not appeared in public since that day. The PRC government is denying members of the Tibetan community access to this important religious figure and instead continues to promote a state-selected proxy.

The United States supports Tibetans’ human rights and their exercise of those rights in connection with their distinct religious, cultural, and linguistic identity. Tibetans, like members of all religious communities, should have the ability to select, educate, and venerate their own leaders, like the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama, according to their own beliefs and without government interference.

We urge PRC authorities to immediately account for Gedhun Choekyi Nyima’s whereabouts and well-being and to allow him to fully exercise his human rights in line with the PRC’s international commitments.

Central Tibetan Administration Congratulates New Co-Chair for Australian Parliamentary Group for Tibet, Senator Barbara Pocock

16 May 2024, CTA

Representative Karma Singey of the Tibet Information Office, Canberra, met Australian Green’s Senator Barbara Pocock at the Parliament House yesterday and delivered her Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel of Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and Kalon (Minister) Norzin Dolma of the Department of Information and International Relation’s congratulatory messages on her assuming as the new Co-Chair of the Australian All Party Parliamentary Group for Tibet (AAPGT). Representative Karma Singey was accompanied by Dr Zoe Bedford, Executive Officer of Australia Tibet Council.

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel has, in his message, said, “On behalf of the 17th Tibetan Parliament in Exile, I extend my warmest congratulations to you on your assumption as the new Co-Chair of the Australian All Party Parliamentary Group for Tibet. You were awarded Member of the Order of Australia (AM) in 2010 for your services to social justice, and your dedication to climate change, LGBTQ rights, refugee rights, and anti-nuclear policies resonate with the just cause of Tibet and Tibetans.”

Representative Karma Singey with Senator Barbara Pocock, New Co-Chair of AAPGT.

Kalon Norzin Dolma wrote, “Your appointment as Co-Chair of AAPGT is a testament to your unwavering commitment to human rights and dedication to amplifying the voices of those who are oppressed and marginalized. As a Representative of the Tibetan people, I want to express my deep appreciation for your willingness to champion the rights and freedom of the Tibetan people.”

During the meeting, Representative Karma Singey took the opportunity to present a brief introduction of the Central Tibetan Administration and an overview of his role and responsibilities as a Representative. He also briefed Senator Barbara and her staffers about some of the important upcoming events, including the visit by a Tibetan Parliamentary delegation in August 2024.

Tibetan In Exile Reveals Cousin’s Ordeal

16 May 2024, Free Tibet

A Tibetan refugee in India has revealed the ordeal her cousin brother faced since his detention in 2015 after he called for freedom and the return of the exiled leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama to Tibet. Gendun Phuntsok, a monk at Kirti Monastery then aged only 16, staged a solo street protest in Ngaba County on 8 March 2015 holding up a photo of the Dalai Lama, shouting “We want freedom and equality in Tibet! Let the Dalai Lama return to Tibet!”

His home county of Ngaba is where the first and the largest number of Tibetans had burned themselves alive in protest against the ruling Chinese government.

Although his arrest was reported at the time by Tibetan exile media, it was not known that seven months later, in October 2015, his cousin sister, Namkyi, had also taken to the street with the photo of the Dalai Lama calling for freedom. She too was subsequently taken into custody and subjected to extreme torture, including being confined to a narrow cell without ventilation that stifled them with extreme heat and sweating.

Namkyi, 24, now living in Dharamsala, home to the 89-year-old Dalai Lama and the Tibetan government-in-exile, is one of the handful Tibetan refugees to have escaped alive into exile after being imprisoned and tortured for her courageous protest calling for freedom in Tibet. She is also amongst the only few refugees to have spoken publicly about her life since detention (full interview forthcoming), as well as that of her brother. "Ngaba County police arrived and arrested him. He was then taken to People's Court in Tashi Ling (Ch: Li) County in Ngaba Prefecture and sentenced to four years in prison. He was imprisoned at Deyang Prison in Huangxu City in Sichuan province. In Deyang prison, he was put in forced labour such as sewing clothes in the prison factory. Before he was imprisoned, he was tortured inhumanly during the interrogations by police authorities at a detention centre in Ngaba County. He suffered from head ache and his ribs were broken due to the police torture at the detention."

"On 8 March 8 2019, Gendun was released and he was taken from the prison to Ngaba County police custody where he was kept under detention for a few more days and then his illness became worse. His family asked the concerned police authorities to allow him to see a doctor in Ngaba County but the county hospital said that they can't treat his illness and suggested taking him to a better hospital in Chengdu City."

"When he was checked in Chengdu City hospital, they found out that Gendun had an illness that looks like tuberculosis and his stomach was full of some fluid. So Gendun was operated and treated at the hospital for two months and finally saved his life. He almost died at that time. Later his illness became better but now Gedun's health deteriorated and became an unhealthy person. His family paid 10,000 Chinese yuan for his treatment at the hospital. Gendun didn't go to the monastery due to the injuries he sustained in both Chinese detention and prison labour. Currently, he lives at home under his family's care."

Gendun Phuntsok (དགེ་འདུན་ཕུན་ཚོགས།) is from Pema Lhathang Village (པལ་ལྷ་ཐང་གྲེ་བ།) in Lower Charo Chugra

(གཙང་རྩོུགས་ར་འགབ་མ།), Ngaba County. He joined Kirti Monastery as a young boy and studied there until his arrest in March 2015.

Former Chinese spy expose covert operations against dissidents overseas

15 May 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Eric (fourth from left) with the exiled spiritual leader H.H. the Dalai Lama in 2016 (Photo/ABC News)

A former Chinese secret agent named Eric, once a dissident himself, has come forward with crucial information exposing the Chinese Communist Party's covert operations targeting dissidents overseas. He was assigned to infiltrate pro-democracy organisations and target dissidents critical of the Communist regime for 15 years since 2008, reported ABC News.

In a revelation, Eric disclosed that in 2016, he received an invitation to attend a gathering of activists in Dharamshala, the headquarters of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile. During this event, he also had a meeting with the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Speaking to ABC News, Eric admitted to submitting a detailed report to his handler, outlining the exiled government's policy on China. He further stated that this report was "well received."

The former Chinese spy disclosed that he undertook missions in multiple countries as an agent for Chinese Communist Party's covert operations aimed at dissidents abroad. In 2018, Eric received orders to locate Edwin Yin, a YouTuber known for his staunch criticism of Chinese President Xi Jinping.

Former Chinese spy Eric worked for the Communist party for 15 years since 2008 (Photo/Keana Naughton)

He further revealed that before working as a Chinese spy, he was a university student who joined the US-founded China Social Democratic Party in 2007 out of admiration for Western democracy. Unaware of surveillance, he shared about the party's annual meeting on social media, leading to a visit from the police who coerced him into collaboration. "They forced me to work with them. I didn't have a choice," he said.

Eric's story exposes the Chinese government's extensive history of Beijing's transnational repression that includes monitoring, harassing, and silencing dissidents abroad. The CCP employs various tactics, including surveillance, intimidation, and even abduction, to suppress dissenting voices that challenge its authority or advocate for human rights and democracy, according to multiple independent observers.

Congressional Executive Commission on China's Annual Report Finds Persistent Human Rights Violations in Tibet

15 May, 2024, CTA

The latest annual report from the Congressional Executive Commission on China (CECC) underscores the persistent severe limitations on international human rights, evidenced by the punishment of Tibetans for exercising their fundamental rights. These include expressing religious beliefs, critiquing PRC policies, and sharing information online. The 2023 annual report, which covers human rights and rule of law developments in the People's Republic of China (PRC) from 1 July 2022 to 30 June 2023, notes the lack of renewed negotiations between the PRC and His Holiness the Dalai Lama's representatives since 2010 and the PRC's interference and attempt to control over the selection and recognition of Tibetan Buddhist reincarnated lamas, including His Holiness the Dalai Lama. The report outlines the DNA, blood sample, and iris scan collection programs employed by the PRC as forms of social control, surveillance, and repression of Tibetans. It also highlights PRC policies aimed to restrict the use of Tibetan and other regional languages, such as shutting down schools, banning language instruction in anything other than Standard Mandarin, and establishing a network of boarding schools where Tibetan children are forced to enrol.

The report also finds PRC authorities intensifying restrictions on religious activities, particularly around significant events and sensitive dates. Examples include prohibitions on celebrating His Holiness the Dalai Lama's birthday, increased surveillance during such occasions, and warnings against sharing images of His Holiness. Additionally, individuals have faced detention for unauthorized social media groups celebrating religious figures' birthdays, warnings against commemorating His Holiness the Dalai Lama's birthdays online, and severe consequences for sending donations abroad, with monks receiving prison sentences for supporting exiled leaders. Tragic incidents, such as deaths in custody and allegations of police torture, further highlight the oppressive environment faced by Tibetans.

The report also delineates the impact of strict "zero COVID" measures following the COVID-19 outbreaks in Tibet, causing criticism and protests due to inadequate support during lockdowns. Authorities censored dissent, detained hundreds, and discriminated against Tibetan detainees. Despite partial relaxation of restrictions, protests continued, especially by Han Chinese migrants seeking to leave Tibet, highlighting ongoing tensions.

The 2023 annual report includes a new chapter titled "Technology-Enhanced Authoritarianism", acknowledging how emerging technology facilitates surveillance, censorship, and repression of freedoms in China and globally.

Recommendations from the CECC for Members of the U.S. Congress and Administration officials:

Members of the U.S. Congress and Administration officials are encouraged to take the following actions:

- Work with the United Nations to help set up visits by U.N. human rights officials, including the High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Special Rapporteur on minority issues, and the Special Rapporteur on the right to education, to Tibetan areas of China to independently assess the human rights situation there, free of any restrictions or hindrances by Chinese Communist Party or government officials, to be followed by a full report to the United Nations on their findings.
- Adopt and implement appropriate legislation to prohibit American companies doing business with Chinese police and other law enforcement agencies in Tibet from selling or providing equipment used by those forces in gross human rights violations, including mass coercive biometric data-gathering and surveillance programs.

- Work with government officials, parliamentarians, and nongovernmental organizations in like-minded countries to pressure the Chinese government and Communist Party to respect, as a matter of the right to religious freedom and as recognized under Chinese and international law, that it is the right of Tibetan Buddhists to identify and educate all religious teachers, including the Dalai Lama, in a manner consistent with Tibetan Buddhist practices and traditions.
- Urge the Chinese government to cease treating the Dalai Lama as a security threat, and encourage the resumption of genuine dialogue, without preconditions, between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives.
- In interactions with Chinese officials, call for the release of Tibetan political prisoners currently detained or imprisoned for the peaceful exercise of their human rights. The records of detained Tibetans in the Commission's Political Prisoner Database provide a useful resource for such advocacy. Urge the Chinese government and its law enforcement and security forces to end the use of arbitrary detention, disappearance, beatings, torture, and intimidation to suppress and punish Tibetans for the peaceful exercise of their rights.
- Urge the Chinese government to invite representatives of governments and international organizations to meet with Gedun Choekyi Nyima, whom the Dalai Lama recognized as the 11th Panchen Lama, and his parents, all three of whom disappeared shortly after his recognition as Panchen Lama in 1995.

16th Kashag Convenes 6th Permanent Strategy Committee Meeting

14 May 2024, CTA

6th Permanent Strategy Committee Meeting of the 16th Kashag

The 16th Kashag convened 6th Permanent Strategy Committee Meeting in Switzerland on 13 May 2024. The 3-day bi-annual meeting will follow up with the implementation of measures chalked out at the previous five meetings and additionally, will discuss the progress of the ongoing strategic programs and deliberate on future advocacy initiatives as per the committee's objectives.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering will chair the meeting which will be attended by the members of committee comprising Kalon (Minister) Dolma Gyari (Department of Security), Kalon (Minister) Norzin Dolma (Department of Information and International Relations), former Kalon Tempa Tsering and former envoy Kelsang Gyaltsen, Political Secretary Tashi Gyatso of Kashag Secretariat Secretary Karma Rinchen (Department of Security), Secretary Karma Choeying (Department of Information and International Relations), Secretary Dawa Tsering of the Tibet Policy Institute (TPI), Secretary Ngaba Tsegyam of Gaden Phodrang office, and Additional Secretary Lobsang Choedak of Kashag Secretariat.

Following the dissolution of the previous Task Force on Sino-Tibetan Negotiations by the 16th Kashag, this new Permanent Strategy Committee was established. The Committee held its first meeting in November 2021, the second meeting in July 2022, the third meeting in November 2022, the fourth meeting in April 2023, the Fifth meeting in November 2023 in Dharamshala.

No interest from PRC to resume dialogue: US Congressional Committee on China

14 May 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The 2023 annual report of the bipartisan Congressional-Executive Commission on China

(CECC) released on Friday stated that there is no interest from the People's Republic of China (PRC) in resuming the long-stalled dialogue with the representatives of the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

The commission on China urged the Chinese government to stop treating the Dalai Lama as a "security threat" and to facilitate the resumption of genuine dialogue, without preconditions, between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives.

Despite the Dalai Lama's consistent stance on seeking autonomy rather than independence for Tibet, a position reiterated over time, the Chinese government has persisted in its refusal to engage in talks regarding Tibetan autonomy.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin stated on April 26 that Beijing would only engage with the Dalai Lama's representatives, excluding officials of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile, and dismissed any possibility of dialogue concerning the long-pending demand for autonomy for Tibetan people. Wang also dismissed any reports of back-channel discussions between the Tibetan Government-in-Exile and the Chinese government, categorising the Government-in-Exile as a "separatist" entity during a press briefing in Beijing. "First, we would only have contact and talks with the personal representative of the 14th Dalai Lama, not the so-called 'Tibetan government-in-exile' or the 'Central Tibetan Administration.' The Chinese government will not be dealing with it," he said.

This statement came after the President of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile Sikyong Penpa Tsering disclosed to a group of journalists in Dharamshala a day earlier, that informal back-channel engagements had been ongoing since last year. "We have had back-channel (engagement) since last year. But we have no immediate expectations from it. It has to be a long-term (one)." Insisting that the talks are "very informal," Sikyong Penpa Tsering said. "I have my interlocutor who deals with people in Beijing. Then, there are other elements also trying to reach out to us." The dialogue between Beijing and representatives of the Dalai Lama began with fact-finding Tibetan delegations visiting Tibet in 1979 and 1980, followed by exploratory talks in Beijing in 1982 and 1984. From 2002 onwards, nine rounds of discussions took place between envoys of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and China's United Front Work Department.

Throughout these talks, the Tibetan delegation advocated for genuine autonomy for Tibet within the framework of Chinese constitutional principles and the Law on Regional National Autonomy, culminating in the presentation of a memorandum and note to the Chinese leadership. However, the ninth and final round of talks occurred in 2010 and 2012, the Dalai Lama's envoys resigned after the ninth round, citing the deteriorating situation in Tibet and a perceived lack of sincerity and willingness from the Chinese side.

Representative Genkhang-led Tibetan Delegation Visits Spanish Parliament to Discuss Tibet

13 May 2024, CTA

Tibetan delegation with President Juan Van-Halen, Secretary General Fernando Sanz Alonso & former Senator Robert Nahar

On the invitation of the President and Secretary General of the Association of Former Parliamentarians, Representative Rigzin Genkhang and Europe-based Tibetan Parliamentarian Thupten Wangchen visited the Spanish Parliament on Friday, 10 May 2024, to discuss the critical situation in Tibet. They were joined by Executive Director of ICT, Wangpo Tethong.

The visit underscored the importance of raising awareness about the plight of Tibetans and advocating for their rights on the international stage. During the discussions, Representative Genkhang outlined the systematic violations of human rights and the ongoing deliberate attempt of the Chinese government to Sinicise Tibetan language, religion and culture. The Representative also highlighted the resilience of the Tibetan people and their commitment to non-violence in the face of adversity, emphasising the need for international support to address the issues, while Parliamentarian Thupten Wangchen and Wangpo Tethong focused on freedom of religion in Tibet and the Tibet issue in Europe in general.

Former members of the Spanish Parliament showed great interest in the Tibetan cause and engaged in a constructive dialogue and expressed their concerns and solidarity with the Tibetan people in their freedom struggle. They acknowledged the importance of raising awareness about the situation in Tibet and pledged to support the initiatives.

Overall, the visit of the Representative to the Spanish Parliament marks a significant milestone laying the foundation for future collaboration.

The event was made possible by the efforts of former Senator Robert Nahar and a good friend of Tibet.

The visit was covered by El Mundo, the second largest printed daily newspaper in Spain.

Tibetan women detained over 'Free Tibet' bag in Paris

13 May, 2024, RTV

Two Tibetan women were reportedly detained by the French authorities for several hours during a peaceful demonstration when Chinese President Xi Jinping's convoy passed through Paris. One of the women was carrying a white tote bag with the slogan "FREE TIBET" inscribed on it. The two Tibetan women, who were walking home from work, encountered a gathering of people waving Chinese flags in anticipation of Xi Jinping's arrival. One of the women, upon seeing the crowd, took out a pen and wrote "FREE TIBET" on her bag. As Xi's motorcade approached, she held up her bag amidst the crowd of Chinese people and flags, standing alone in her protest.

The French police intervened and demanded that she leave the area. She complied by stepping a few meters away but continued to hold the "FREE TIBET" bag. Despite her cooperation, the police detained her and kept her in a dark detention vehicle until Xi Jinping's motorcade had passed.

The video footage obtained by Students for a Free Tibet (SFT) captured the tense encounter between the Tibetan woman and the French police. In the video, the police can be heard instructing the woman to "remain for 10-15 minutes." One of the detained women, speaking from a jail cell, expressed their distress, stating, "Everyone, please, now I have been captured. I have been captured. They have put me in some sort of vehicle. I am with my cousin sister, they have captured us both." The detention has sparked widespread attention and raised concerns regarding freedom of expression in a free country like France, due to Chinese pressure. Netizens have taken to their social media platforms to voice their opinions regarding Xi Jinping's arrival in Europe, interpreting it as emblematic of China's ambition to reshape the global order. They argue that this signals a potential threat to Western democracies, which could face continued undermining.

Moreover, the detention of the two women has reignited concerns about the safety of Tibetans, both within and outside Tibet, from Chinese rule. Some commentators suggest that this incident shows the vulnerability of Western democracies, which appear to be easily swayed by economic opportunities while ignoring fundamental human rights and democratic principles.

Sikyong Continues Advocating for Tibet and Acknowledges Italy's Longstanding Support for the Tibet Cause

12 May 2024, CTA

Continuing his whirlwind tour, Sikyong Penpa Tsering made a brief halt in Rome, Italy on Thursday to meet with Parliamentary Intergroup Italia Tibet. This visit follows his packed itinerary spanning Berlin, Munich (Germany), Innsbruck (Austria), Bolzano, Trento, Milan (Italy), Paris (France), and Zurich (Switzerland) starting 28 April. Accompanied by Representative Thinlay Chukki and Phuntsok Topgyal from the Tibet Bureau Geneva, Sikyong Penpa Tsering and the delegates were warmly received in the Italian senate chambers.

While on that day, the Italian Senate was bustling with various party conventions and also hosting visits from the Italian president, the MPs accorded utmost significance to their meeting with Sikyong Penpa Tsering and the Tibetan delegates. They engaged in an in-depth discussion with the Sikyong, deliberating on the current situation in Tibet and devising actionable future plans to deter China's intensified repression of the Tibetans in Tibet.

Senator De Priamo Andrea, President of the Parliamentary Intergroup Italia Tibet receives Sikyong Penpa Tsering at the Senate in Rome, Italy, 9 May 2024

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, in his remarks, underscored the deep historical ties between Italy and Tibet, dating back to the late 16th century when Jesuit missionaries ventured into Tibet. Recognising Italy as the first European nation to engage with Tibetans on the roof of the world, he highlighted the significance of Italy's longstanding support for the Tibetan people and the cause. Sikyong also extended an invitation to the Parliamentary Intergroup Italia Tibet, led by President Senator De Priamo Andrea, to spearhead a high-level parliamentary delegation to Dharamshala in the near future.

The members present included: President of Parliamentary Intergroup Italia Tibet – Senator De Priamo Andrea; Vice President and member of Chamber of Deputies On. Ilenia Malavasi members of the Intergroup Senator Terzi di Sant'Agata Giulio who is also a former Minister for Foreign Affairs, Senator Domenica Spinelli, President of the Italia Tibet Association Mr. Claudio Cardelli, President of Tibetan community Italy Tseten Lunghini, and Matteo Angioli, general secretary of Global Committee for the Rule of Law, also represents Radio Radicale.

Building on his advocacy in Germany and the other nations he visited the past two weeks, Sikyong urged the intergroup to spearhead parliamentary initiatives spotlighting some of the most critical issues threatening the survival of the Tibetan culture and Buddhist traditions, including China's unprecedented sinicization of the Tibetan Buddhist traditions, and Tibetan language.

As part of his tasks, Sikyong implored the MPs to push for an official policy affirming that the authority of decisions concerning the reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama rests solely with His Holiness the Dalai Lama himself, and to reject any governmental inferences. Sikyong also rallied for swift parliamentary intervention to hold China accountable on its operation of colonial style boarding schools in Tibet.

Senator De Priamo Andrea and the MP delegates stressed the urgent need to intensify support for Tibet and briefed Sikyong on ongoing initiatives by the intergroup focusing on the crackdown on the peaceful protests by Tibetans in Derge and the colonial boarding schools in Tibet.

Senator Terzi echoed concerns about China's attempts to divide the European Union and emphasised the importance of coordinated action in countering China's transnational repression.

Sikyong further warned of the economic implications of Europe's trade deficit with China, underlining how China's foreign exchange surplus fuels its aggressive pursuits, including space technology investments and expanding debt economies in regions like Africa and South Asia. He called for a coordinated multilateral strategy to push back against what he called China's economic colonialism.

Following the meeting, Sikyong spoke to Radio Radicale, and held meetings with longtime friends of Tibet, as well as members of the Tibetan community. During the discussion, Sikyong proposed a collaborative project documenting the early relations between Italy and Tibet, which received positive feedback from the members. Discussions further ensued on the yearlong celebration of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's 90th birthday in 2025, which will be marked as the Year of Peace.

In the evening, Sikyong departed for Vienna, Austria.

Xi Jinping's Visit to Hungary: Hiding the Flag, mysterious Chinese Policemen and 18 Agreements

11 May 2024, Sarajevo Times

Chinese President Xi Jinping ended his European tour with a visit to Hungary where he held a series of meetings with Hungarian officials, including Prime Minister Viktor Orban.

On the last day of the visit, Orban hosted a lunch attended by his wife Anika Levai and Xi Jinping and his wife Peng Li-yuan.

On that occasion, journalists had the opportunity to ask Orban and Xi several questions, and one of them was a review of the anti-Chinese protests that were organized before the visit of the Chinese president. On that occasion, Tibetan activists unfurled the flag of Tibet on Gellert Hill, and the police quickly chased them away, and they hung the flag of China at that place.

"It is an old debate. The position of the Hungarian government is clear. At home there is freedom of expression, but the guests who come have the right to be guests. These two rights must be harmonized. We will not allow the value of the visit of the guests who come here to be destroyed. Demonstrations and reception they must be spatially separated from each other," explained Orban.

What is interesting is that the Pro-Tibet protesters were driven away by policemen from China who were in civilian clothes performing the duty of securing the event. Although there were police officials from another country, Orban did not see anything objectionable in all of this.

"It is not a question of national security, but of ensuring public order and peace," said the Hungarian Prime Minister.

The media in Hungary also referred to the results of Xi Jinping's visit. According to information from Budapest, Orban and Xi signed a total of 18 agreements and new plans and goals were defined.

The agreements include, among other things, the construction of a railway line, a railway bypass around Budapest, and the construction of a border crossing between Serbia and Hungary to facilitate the transport of people and goods.

"Hungary and China will consider the option of building an oil pipeline between the two countries, and there is also a willingness to expand cooperation in the field of nuclear energy," Orban said.

In addition to Hungary, Chinese President Xi Jinping previously visited France, where he met with President Emmanuel Macron, and Serbia, where he held meetings with the country's leadership, including President Aleksandar Vucic, Klix.ba reports.

Austrian MPs host Tibetan government in exile, pledge support

11 May 2024, The Print

In a show of solidarity, Austrian Members of Parliament opened their doors to Penpa Tsering, president of the Central Tibetan Administration, for a discussion on the plight of Tibetans amidst China's human rights abuses. The meeting, held on Friday within the halls of the Austrian Parliament in Vienna, marked a pivotal moment in European support for Tibet's struggle against cultural oppression and political suppression. Penpa Tsering, on a diplomatic mission across Europe for the past ten days, has been advocating for international awareness regarding China's systematic violations in Tibet. His visit to Vienna saw him engaging with members of the Austrian People's Party and the GREENS, shedding light on China's egregious targeting of Tibetan children, and Buddhist monks, and the relentless assault on Tibetan cultural heritage.

Austrian MPs host Tibetan Government in Exile, pledge support (Photo/ANI)

During the parliamentary rendezvous, Penpa Tsering underscored two critical concerns: the grave implications of China's operation of state-controlled boarding schools in Tibet and the urgent need to safeguard Tibetan religious freedom and Buddhist heritage.

He laid bare the reality of China's tight grip over the Tibet Autonomous Region and Tibetan-populated areas, stifling political dissent and trampling on cultural and religious expressions.

In his impassioned plea, Penpa Tsering called for a nuanced understanding of China's behaviour, emphasizing its ramifications not only for Tibet but also for Europe's own interests.

He urged recognition of Tibet's historical independence and endorsed the middle-way approach for autonomy as a viable solution. His words resonated with the Austrian Parliamentarians, who acknowledged the imperative of sustained international support for Tibetans in their quest for fundamental rights.

Gudrun Kugler, MP from the Austrian People's Party and spokesperson for human rights and displaced persons, along with Faika El-Nagashi, MP from the GREENS, joined forces with a delegation from Save Tibet, Austria, and Friends of Tibet, Austria, in reaffirming their commitment to upholding human rights. They pledged to amplify the Tibetan cause in various multilateral forums to hold the Chinese government accountable for its transgressions. (ANI)

Calligraphy Day keeps alive Tibetans' written language

11 May 2024, RFA, Pelbar, Pasang Tsering and Dolma Lhamo

For several years now, Tibetan Calligraphy Day has been a way for Tibetans to keep their language and heritage alive amid China imposing restrictions and bans on use of the language.

On April 30, Tibetans across the Tibet Autonomous Region, in northern India as well as in Chinese provinces where Tibetans live participated in competitions, festivals and displays of calligraphy to mark the day on April 30, sources told Radio Free Asia. The Tibetan Language Preservation Committee, a group based in Gangtok in northern India that is dedicated to preserving the Tibetan language, observed the day by organizing a calligraphy competition.

Participants in a calligraphy competition observe Tibetan Calligraphy Day at Karma township in Chamdo, western China's Tibet Autonomous Region, April 30, 2024.

"His Holiness the Dalai Lama has consistently urged Tibetans in exile to safeguard and preserve our invaluable Tibetan language," said Tenzin Tsephel, president of the Gangtok Regional Tibetan Youth Congress.

Tibetans throughout Tibet shared their writings and opinions on Tibetan calligraphy and the significance of the Tibetan language on social media platforms. Several monasteries and educational institutions in Tibet and in Tibetan-populated areas of China organized events to commemorate the day. Over 300 participants gathered in Barkham county of Ngawa Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture in northwestern Sichuan province.

Videos posted on social media showed Buddhist monks in crimson robes who gathered with brushes, ink and paper to display their writing skills at the Tsangkor Sholma-gon Pel Ngedhon Tashi Choekorling Monastery in Qinghai province on April 30.

The Labrang Calligraphy Association in Sangchu county of Kanlho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Gansu province also organized calligraphy exhibitions in all county schools.

Banning Tibetan

Since 2020, the Chinese government has tightened its restrictions on the use and study of Tibetan, closing private Tibetan schools in Tibet and intensifying Chinese-language education in the schools in the name of promoting uniformity in the use of textbooks and instructional materials.

Just recently, authorities banned students in schools in a Tibetan-populated area in China's Sichuan province from speaking their native language, following a similar case in another part of the province.

Tibetan Calligraphy Day began in 2017 following a Tibetan calligraphy conference held at Qinghai Nationalities University in western China.

The significance of the date – April 30 – lies in its numerical representation: The number four symbolizes the number of vowels in the Tibetan alphabet, while 30 represents the number of consonants.

Given the importance of Buddhism to Tibetans, many traditions in Tibetan calligraphy come from religious texts written by monks in monasteries.

Despite the absence of a dedicated Tibetan school for children in Gangtok, a youth congress there began a Sunday school program in 2018 to teach children how to read and write Tibetan.

The day is more than just commemorating Tibetan calligraphy and hosting writing competitions, said Tsering Dhondup, a volunteer Tibetan teacher at the Sunday school.

"We must also consider Tibetan alphabets, vowels and the Tibetan language as a whole, given its vast richness in representing Tibet," he told Radio Free Asia.

Preserving a culture

Pema Tsultrim, a renowned Tibetan calligrapher based in Tibet, organized the Pema Golden Pen Competition in Chengdu, attracting about 100 Tibetan calligraphy experts, historians and writers from across Tibet who discussed the significance of Tibetan calligraphy.

He said the contest aimed to preserve the rich heritage of Tibetan calligraphy and to provide participants with a platform to display their talent.

Among the more than 1,200 calligraphy submissions from Tibetans various regions of Tibet, Dhondup Norbu, a resident of Lhasa, was chosen as the contest winner.

"Calligraphy holds significant importance in preserving Tibet's unique traditions," said Geshe Lobsang Monlam, a Buddhist scholar, lexicologist and leading innovator of Tibetan information technology.

Through various calligraphy styles, we can understand writings that date back over 1,000 years," he said. "Despite the presence of numerous dialects within Tibet, our ability to communicate and understand one another is facilitated by these Tibetan calligraphies."

The day was observed in Tibetan communities around the world.

The Latse Project, a U.S.-based volunteer nonprofit group that promotes Tibetan language use and literacy, along with the Center for South Asia and the Center for East Asian Studies at the University of Wisconsin-Madison held an event on Tibetan calligraphic arts on April 26-27.

In 2018, The Latse Project organized the first Tibetan Calligraphy Day to be held outside Tibet in New York City, and held subsequent calligraphy exhibits in Paris, France, and at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

Representative Kelsang Gyaltsen Bawa Meets with Ukrainian Cross-sectoral Delegation

10 May, 2024, CTA

Representative Kelsang Gyaltsen Bawa Meets with a Group of Ukrainian Cross-sectoral Delegation

Representative Kelsang Gyaltsen Bawa held an hour-long discussion with a group of Ukrainian cross-sectoral delegation from Liberal Democratic League of Ukraine (LDLU), Ukraine+Taiwan Forum, Kyiv Independent, and International Renaissance Foundation on 23 April 2024, sharing information about their respective causes, exchanging experiences, and presenting views on the future endeavours.

Headed by Yevheniia Fedotova, the Vice President of LDLU, the delegation, consisting reporter Asami Terajima from Kyiv Independent; a war-related volunteer and expert in post-war rebuilding Uliana Dzhurliak; and Head of the direction of minimisation of corruption risks in the sanctions policy of the National Agency on Corruption Prevention of Ukraine Agiya Zahrebelska, introduced the objectives of their mission that aimed to enhance mutual understanding between key decision-makers in Taiwan and various sectors of Ukrainian society, including civil rights campaigners and volunteers, media professionals, and public affairs stakeholders during the meeting. The visitors also expressed their deep respect for His Holiness the Dalai Lama and stated, "The resilience of the Tibetan people for decades serves as a source of inspiration to the people of Ukraine, who are defending the values of lasting and just peace, human dignity, and freedom, these days. The Chinese invasion of Tibet was the first major attack on the rule-based international order without the appropriate attention of democratic stakeholders. Eventually, the path started by the People's Republic of China was continued by Russia in Ukraine through the occupation of Crimea (2014) and the ongoing full-scale invasion (2022). Taking this into account, the Liberal Democratic League of Ukraine considers supporting a free Tibet as a lifelong mission of every freedom-seeker."

In response, the Representative extended his greetings on behalf of the Office of Tibet in Taipei and expressed solidarity with the Ukrainian people's current situation. He vocalised his optimism that Ukrainians will prevail over the ongoing conflict, citing strong backing from democratic and justice-loving allies.

Additionally, Representative Bawa further promised to forward their suggestions to the Central Tibetan Administration and report their ideas for collaboration to the Tibetan NGOs. During the Q&A session of the meeting, Representative Bawa presented a brief overview of the Offices of Tibet and their undertakings, particularly about the one inside Taiwan.

The Ukrainian cross-sectoral delegation was met by members of prominent Taiwanese political parties, NGOs, and the general public, most notably by the Vice President-elect, Hsiao Bi-Khim.

Sikyong Advocates for Tibetan Rights & Religious Freedom in Germany, Calls on Europe to Stand Against China's Authoritarian Regime

10 May 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, accompanied by Representative Thinley Chukki, during the meeting with Anke Oppermann, Director of the Unit of the Federal Government Commissioner for Freedom of Religious and Belief at the Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation and Development (BMZ), Germany.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering concluded a series of engagements in Berlin, focusing on two critical issues: addressing China's state-run colonial boarding schools in Tibet and the safeguarding Tibetan religious freedom as well as unique Buddhist traditions, including the succession of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Citing the US policies on these two issues, Sikyong urged leaders in Berlin to consider similar instruments and also use multilateral forums to hold the Chinese government accountable.

A key highlight of Sikyong's visit was his meeting with Anke Oppermann, Director of the Unit of the Federal Government Commissioner for Freedom of Religious and Belief at the Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation and Development (BMZ), Germany, on 7 May.

During their hour-long meeting at the Commission, Anke Oppermann briefed Sikyong on the German Federal Government's Third Report on the Global Status of Freedom of Religion or Belief and on forthcoming initiatives by the Commission aimed at bolstering religious freedom advocacy.

Sikyong, in turn, thanked the Commission, particularly Commissioner Frank Schwabe, for his statement on Panchen Rinpoche's enforced disappearance. Sikyong urged for sustained international attention and called on the Ministry to join like-minded nations in affirming the reincarnation of His Holiness the Dalai Lama as a purely religious matter that should be free from governmental interference.

In another significant engagement, Sikyong Penpa Tsering met with Hon. Roderich Kiesewetter, a member of the German Bundestag who is also the representative of foreign affairs for the CDU/CSU Caucus, as well as Deputy Chairman of the Parliamentary Oversight Panel. Sikyong discussed the pragmatic lessons that can be learned from Tibetans in facing China's authoritarian regime. Both reiterated their shared commitment to upholding human rights, with the Honourable MP lauding the enduring relevance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's message of peace and non-violence as well as the strategic nonviolent struggle of the Tibetan people.

Throughout 5 to 6 May and 8 May as well, Sikyong engaged in closed-door meetings and round tables with high-level government officials and relevant figures. Additionally, he addressed prominent German media outlets, including Table Media, RBB Radio, DieZeit, and Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, advocating for a robust European policy on China.

On 6 and 8 May, respectively, Sikyong met with key Tibetan advocacy organisations in Berlin, namely Tibet Initiative Deutschland and ICT Germany, to strategise on forthcoming projects addressing the deteriorating situation in Tibet.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering's overarching message in Germany was to urge Europe, particularly Germany, to leverage its strengths in dealing with China and to draw inspiration from Tibetans in confronting the authoritarian regime. He called on Germany, as a leading nation, to champion the values and freedoms cherished in Germany.

On 9 May, Sikyong Penpa Tsering will hold a one-day engagement in Rome, Italy, followed by a visit to Vienna, Austria, on 10 and 11 May. From 12 to 15 May, Sikyong will hold closed-door meetings in Zurich, Switzerland.

Chinese volunteers joined Hungarian security to harass Tibet protesters during Xi Jinping visit

10 May 2024, Tibetan Review

Tibetan protesters displayed Tibetan flags next to Chinese national flags on Gellert Hill to oppose Chinese President Xi Jinping's visit to Budapest, Hungary, May 9, 2024. (Photo courtesy: AP)

Chinese people not only turned up in strength to welcome their President Xi Jinping who arrived for a state visit to Budapest on May 8 evening but also harassed and bullied Tibet protesters and others as well while the country's police joined force with them, according to various media reports. Tímea Szabó, co-chairman of the opposition party Párbeszéd, hung a Tibetan flag from his window on May 8 and within minutes received threats from the Speaker of the Hungarian House of Representatives László Kövér and the secret service, reported dailynewshungary.com May 9. Before the arrival of Xi for a ceremonial welcome on May 9, Tibor Hendrey, president of the Tibet Aid Society (Tibeti Segítő Társaság), stretched the Tibetan flag on the cross fence in Gellért Hill. However, within minutes Chinese activists covered it with the Chinese flag.

The report cited Hendrey as saying later that he was searched by police three times that day. The report also cited witnesses as saying the police only looked for Hungarians at the scene, and no Chinese at all. Pro-China activists waved at least 16 Chinese flags to hide from view Tibetan flags the protesters were holding, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org May 9. Also, Tibetan protesters tried to hoist a "Free Tibet" banner along with the Tibetan flag on the Elizabeth Bridge, under which Xi's motorcade would have had to pass on its way to the presidential palace in Budapest on May 9 morning. But the Chinese activists disrupted them again, the report said.

"These guys just came and ripped our banner, and they are still allowed to be here, pushing us further and further out," Chime Lhamo, campaigns director of Students for Free Tibet, has told journalists on the street. "Is this a free country?"

Hungarian police standing nearby did not intervene, the report added.

After the street encounter, the protesters were followed by what appeared to be about eight undercover police officers on their way to the Budapest airport, one of them has said.

In fact, "over the last few days, we were followed, harassed and intimidated by undercover Hungarian police, as well as Chinese people and police everywhere in the city," Tenzin Yangzom from the International Tibet Network has said. "Everywhere in the city is swarmed by them."

"We had come here to peacefully protest Xi's genocidal policies in Tibet, East Turkistan, Hong Kong and beyond and the treatment of Tibetans, Hong Kongers, Uyghurs and Chinese people," she has added. Márton Tompos, vice-president of the opposition party Momentum, wanted to place the EU flag at the Elisabeth Bridge in Budapest but was prevented by Chinese volunteers wearing red caps working for their embassy. He was even asked which flags he wanted to put up and why, said the dailynewshungary.com report.

It appears that no flags other than those of China will be displayed in Budapest while Xi is in town, the report added. "Budapest is full of Chinese volunteer gendarmes wearing red caps to protect Xi Jinping, known as Winnie the Pooh, from the 'unfriendly' Tibetan and Taiwanese flags," Tompos was stated to have written in a video post.

This year marks the 75th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic ties between China and Hungary and the two countries have decided to elevate bilateral relations to an all-weather comprehensive strategic partnership for the new era during Xi's meeting with Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban.

Frequently at loggerheads with the EU, Orban has been advocating an "Eastern opening" foreign policy since his return to power in 2010, seeking closer economic ties with China, Russia and other Asian countries. Beijing has invested billions in Hungary and sees the EU member as an important foothold inside the 27-member trading bloc. In December, Hungary announced that one of the world's largest EV manufacturers, China's BYD, will open its first European EV production factory in the south of the country – an inroad that could upend the competitiveness of the continent's auto industry, noted the AP May 9.

The state visit to Hungary is the last leg of Xi's current European tour after France and Serbia, his first since 2019. His visit to France, marking 60th year of establishing diplomatic relations, was cordial but also highlighted tensions between Beijing and the EU over the war in Ukraine and global trade.

His visit to non-EU, non-NATO member Serbia, known for its staunch alliance with Russia, took place on the 25th anniversary of NATO's accidental bombing of the Chinese embassy at Belgrade during the Yugoslavia conflict, which Xi said his country will never forget despite the issue being settled with payment of compensations.

Office of Tibet in Taiwan Leads Efforts to Revive Taiwanese Parliamentary Group for Tibet: Over 30 Legislators Poised to Join

10 May 2024, CTA

The Office of Tibet in Taipei, in collaboration with the Human Rights Network for Tibet and Taiwan, initiated a lobbying campaign at the end of March to re-establish the Taiwanese parliamentary group for Tibet in the 11th Legislative Yuan (Taiwanese Parliament).

Representative Kalsang Gyaltsen Bawa from the Office of Tibet, along with Secretary Mingyur Yudon and executive member of the Human Rights Network for Tibet and Taiwan, Tashi Tsering, paid a courtesy call upon distinguished parliamentarians to congratulate them on their election and implored them to remain a member of the group during their new tenure. The elected members were also appreciated and thanked for their years of constant support for the Tibetan cause and the Tibetan people's right to self-determination.

On 29 March, the Tibetan delegation paid a visit to Hong Shenhan, the 10th Legislative Yuan's vice chair of the Taiwanese parliamentary group for Tibet, to discuss holding a ceremony of re-establishment of the group on the day (17 May) of 29th enforced disappearance of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Lama Tenzin Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo. The meeting also discussed dispatching Tashi Tsering to extend invitations to representatives of the Kashag and the Tibetan Parliament in Exile for that occasion.

Similarly, the Representative-led Tibetan delegation called on several other Taiwanese legislators, including Huang Jie on 1 April, Wang Dingyu on 3 April, and Shen Boyang, Qiu Zhiwei, Zhang Yalin, and Chen Peiyu on 11 April. On 15 April, the team met with parliamentarian Chen Zhaozi, followed by Qiu Yiyang and Fan Yun on 17 and 23 April, respectively.

During the meetings with the aforementioned Taiwanese lawmakers, the Tibetan delegation presented the Central Tibetan Administration's appeal letter concerning the recent issue of Dam construction in Kham Derge, 16th Kashag's vision paper, and calendars and paperweights engraved with His Holiness' message and the symbolic "Ah Ka Ma" words to enlighten the new members on Tibetan political history. While extending gratitude to the old members, the Tibetan team beseeched newer members to join the Taiwanese parliamentary group for Tibet to bolster support.

In addition, the issue of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama's reincarnation and the Chinese government's misappropriation of it, current human rights situations inside Tibet, the representations of "Ah Ka Ma" words that were visualised in sacred Lhamoi Lhatso lake during the recognition of current Dalai Lama, and seeking assistance in lessening the difficulties faced by Tibetan refugees in obtaining visas to enter Taiwan were discussed during the interactions with Taiwanese parliamentarians.

More than 30 Taiwanese legislators expressed their intentions to join the Taiwanese parliamentary group for Tibet.

On 3 May, the delegation held a prep meeting with Parliamentarian Hong Shenhan to discuss programmes for the forthcoming re-establishment event of the parliamentary support group for Tibet which is scheduled to hold on 17 May.

Tibet's Derge printing house's historic printing blocks earn UNESCO recognition

11 May 2024, Phayul

Workers printing texts using wooden blocks at the Derge Printing House (Photo/Tibet Travel)

The printing blocks housed at the Derge Printing House in Tibet have been included in this year's UNESCO's Asia-Pacific regional register of memory of the world on May 8.

Listed among this year's 20 successfully inscribed items to the MOWCAP Regional Register for Asia-Pacific, the Dege Printing House is the largest of the three major Sutra-printing houses in the Tibet, alongside Lhasa sutra-printing house in Meru monastery, Lhasa which was built more than 400 years ago, during the days of the 5th Dalai Lama and Lhapuleng House in Laprang Monastery in Amdo region.

Dege Printing House is in the Gonchen monastery, founded by Thang Tong Gyalpo also known as Derge Monastery, the printing house was built in 1729. The monastery, located in the Kham region of Tibet, was completely destroyed during the Chinese invasion of Tibet and was later restored in the 1980s. On the ground floor of the monastery lies the famous Derge Parkhang (printing house), where Buddhist scriptures such as the Kangyur and the Tengyur, along with other religious, historical, literary, medical, astronomical, and calendrical works in Tibetan, are still printed from wooden blocks using traditional handwork.

The printing house continues to employ ancient techniques without the use of electricity. Approximately 217,000 engraved blocks of scriptures from all Tibetan Buddhist sects, including the Bon tradition, are housed here, with about 2,500 pages produced by hand each day in the traditional manner.

The inclusion of the Dege printing blocks in UNESCO's Memory of the World (MOW) acknowledges human innovation and imagination in the Asia-Pacific region. This recognition was decided at the 10th General Meeting of the Memory of the World Committee for Asia and the Pacific (MOWCAP), held from May 7 to 8 in Ulaanbaatar, Mongolia.

UNESCO initiated the Memory of the World (MoW) Programme in 1992 to safeguard against collective amnesia by preserving valuable archive holdings and library collections worldwide and ensuring their wide dissemination. The programme aims for the world's documentary heritage to be fully preserved, protected, and permanently accessible to all, respecting cultural differences and practical considerations.

CTA Prez calls for unified action against CCP to catalyze positive change

08 May 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

The President of the Tibetan government in Exile, Penpa Tsering called for unified action from various oppressed people representing different causes against the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in pursuit of meaningful change within China, at the 20th anniversary of the World Uyghur Congress on May 3 in Munich.

As the guest speaker for the opening ceremony, the Sikyong reminisced about the historic collaboration between Erkin Alptekin, founding President of the World Uyghur Congress, and the late Lodi Gyari, former Special Envoy of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He emphasized their efforts to establish an allied committee, showcasing the longstanding bond between the Tibetan and Uyghur communities.

"I consider the Uyghurs, Mongolians, now even the Manchus, Tibetans, Hongkongers, Pro-Democracy leaders in China, and, if you want to include, Taiwan also. We are all travelling in the same boat against the brutal storm of Communist China," the Sikyong asserted, highlighting the imperative of unity in the face of Chinese oppression.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering delivering his speech during the opening session of the 20th anniversary of the World Uyghur Congress in Munich on 3 May 2024 (Photo/CTA)

Expressing gratitude for the collaboration with Rebiya Kadeer and Dolkun Isa, former and current Presidents of the World Uyghur Congress, Sikyong stressed the importance of collective action. "If we have to bring positive changes to China, then we need both internal and external forces. And we are the internal forces," he stated.

In a bold move, the Sikyong proposed organizing a large rally in Europe, uniting Uyghurs, Tibetans, Hongkongers, Mongolians, Taiwanese, and pro-democratic Chinese leaders. "If you are willing to do that, we are willing to join you or take the leadership," he declared, a call to action for solidarity against Chinese oppression.

The former president of the Tibetan Government in Exile, Dr Lobsang Sangay was also present at the event, in his keynote speech on May 4 as a guest speaker, he said that despite the Chinese government's attempts to erase Uyghur and Tibetan culture, the younger generation born in Germany remains steadfast in preserving their identity and heritage, pledging to stand proudly in their Uyghur identity inherited from their elders, sending a resounding message to Beijing that their cultural resilience will endure despite attempts at suppression. In addition to his participation in the World Uyghur Congress anniversary, Sikyong Penpa Tsering embarked on a week-long journey across Europe, engaging with Tibetan communities and forging alliances. His itinerary included visits to Zurich, Switzerland; Milan, Trento, and Bolzano in Italy; Innsbruck, Austria; and Berlin, Germany.

In Innsbruck, Sikyong's meetings with university leaders bore fruit as Vice-Rector Prof. Dr. Bernhard Fügenschuh extended a fully funded scholarship opportunity for Tibetan students.

Currently in Berlin for closed-door meetings with high-level government officials, Sikyong Penpa Tsering continues his advocacy for Tibetan rights and international solidarity against Chinese oppression.

Zeekgyab Rinpoche Appeals to Japanese parliamentarians

08 May 2024, CTA

A group photo with the parliamentarians

The Liaison Office of H.H. the Dalai Lama for Japan and East Asia organised a Tibet workshop for the Japanese parliamentarians at the Japan Lower House International Conference Hall in Tokyo on 7 May 2024. Tibet supporters and media people also participated in the workshop. The theme of the workshop was "Human rights violations and religious atrocities in Tibet".

Ishibashi Rintaro, a Liberal Democratic Party Member, moderated the event and in his opening remarks, he briefed the lawmakers on the Panchen Lama issue and how even after nearly three decades his whereabouts are still not known.

Representative Dr. Tsewang Gyalpo Arya of the Liaison Office of H.H. the Dalai Lama for Japan and East Asia thanked the lawmakers, Tibet supporters, and media members for attending the workshop. He introduced Zeekgyab Rinpoche and spoke on how the situation in Tibet has worsened and how the CCP is trying to destroy Tibetan identity and religious culture through colonial boarding schools and continued interference in Tibetan religious matters, including selections of high reincarnate Lamas.

Zeekgyab Rinpoche, Chief Abbot of the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in South India, spoke on the disappearance of the real Panchen Lama and the continued Chinese interference in Tibetan religious matters.

"I make this heartfelt appeal in the context of the dire situation in Tibet. The severe oppression and inhumane restrictions imposed on the Tibetan people, their movement, and their freedoms continued to worsen. The people of Tibet suffer in silence. Today, my primary appeal is for your help in the immediate release of the 11th Panchen Lama and addressing the long-standing plight of the Tibetan people in Tibet- their native land." He said.

Speaking on the CCP's repressive and colonial policy toward Tibet he appealed to the lawmakers and the supporters on three points:

- 1) Japanese parliament members exert every possible effort and pressure on the Chinese government to immediately release and announce the whereabouts of the 11th Panchen Lama.
- 2) To adopt a resolution condemning China's human rights violations and interference in the Tibetan religious matters, including the selection of the reincarnation of H.H. the Dalai Lama.
- 3) To support the vision of H.H. the Dalai Lama in making Tibet a zone of peace and resolution of the Tibet issue through dialogue and the Middle Way Approach. Writer scholar Miura Junko translated for Rinpoche.

Lawmaker Furuya Keiji, Chairman of the Japanese parliamentarian monitoring China's human rights violations, thanked Rinpoche for his statement and promised full support for religious freedom in Tibet. He called on the lawmakers to study the three points and expressed the possibility of issuing a statement urging China not to interfere in the selection of H.H. the Dalai Lama's reincarnation.

Shimomura Hakubun, Chairman of the Japan Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet, spoke on the contribution of Buddhism in bringing peace and harmony at societal and national levels. He spoke on the resolution the Japanese Parliament passed in 2022 condemning China for human rights violations in Tibet and other occupied territories. He talked of the visits of the two Sikyongs of the Central Tibetan Administration to Japan and their interaction with the parliamentarians.

Lawmakers in the audience asked questions about the current situation in Tibet and information and how news is sabotaged. Zeekgyab Rinpoche and Dr. Arya attended to the lawmaker's question and informed the audience on the colonial boarding schools, Larungar and Yachen gar situation, the destruction of the Buddha statue and prayer wheels in Drago, self-immolation of 157 Tibetans, and the recent forced relocation of Tibetans for dam buildings.

Lawmaker Ishikawa Akimasa, Vice Minister of Cabinet Affairs and Digital Ministry and General

Secretary of the Japan Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet, spoke on the Tashi Lhunpo monastery which he read from Japanese sources and how the monastery and the Panchen Lamas played important roles in Tibetan religious culture.

President Macron Urged to Raise Tibet with President Xi and Put Tibet at the Heart of French Strategy Towards China

06 May, 2024, CTA

Ahead of Chinese President Xi's visit to Paris, Senator Jacqueline Eustache-Brinio, President of the French Parliamentary group for Tibet addressed an open letter to President Macron urging him to raise Tibet with his Chinese counterpart.

In the letter, co-signed by 13 other Senators, Senator Eustache-Brinio highlights the deteriorating human rights situation in Tibet under President Xi, underscores Tibet's geopolitical and ecological importance. She further stresses that in the face of the many ongoing conflicts in the region, His Holiness the Dalai Lama's Five Point Peace Plan for Tibet is more relevant than ever before.

"Therefore, the resumption of dialogue and respect for the rights of the Tibetan people must be at the heart of France's strategy towards China", say the Senators.

President Xi Jinping arrived in Paris on Sunday, 5 May, and is scheduled to meet President Macron and President Ursula von der Leyen of the European Commission today.

Tibetan, Uyghur protesters greet Xi Jinping in Paris

06 May, 2024 , RFA, Roseanne Gerin

Unfurling banners and waving flags, Uyghur, Tibetan and Chinese activists took to the streets to protest Chinese President Xi Jinping's two-day visit to Paris "Free Tibet. Dictator Xi Jinping, your time is up!" declared a large white banner that his motorcade had to drive under on the Boulevard Périphérique after his arrival on Sunday, on his way for a state visit with French President Emmanuel Macron.

Atop the banner was the flag of Tibet – a symbol of the Tibetan independence movement that has become known as the "Free Tibet flag." The visit was Xi's first European tour since 2019 and marked the 60th anniversary of the establishment of Franco-Chinese diplomatic relations.

Activists display a giant banner from Pont Dauphine as Chinese President Xi Jinping's motorcade drives along Boulevard Périphérique in Paris, May 5, 2024.

Ethnic Tibetan from France, Belgium, Hungary and elsewhere gathered to express their anger over Beijing's restrictions on religious and cultural expression in Tibet – which China invaded in 1950 and now controls – and human rights violations.

Uyghurs also rallied in Paris, seeking to draw attention to the abuses their families and friends have suffered in the far-western region of Xinjiang, including mass arbitrary detentions in prisons. The United States and some Western parliaments have identified China's persecution of the Uyghurs as a genocide and crimes against humanity.

The protesters were joined by Chinese, Taiwanese, Mongolian and Vietnamese human rights activists as well as Hong Kong pro-democracy supporters.

"Under Xi Jinping's rule, the situation in Tibet has gone from bad to worse," Tenzin Yangzom, campaigns coordinator at International Tibet Network, said in a statement.

"Today, we confronted Xi with our message that his time is up and Tibet will be free as he was forced to drive under our banner and Tibetan flags," she said. "President Macron and European leaders should not be rolling out the red carpet for a man guilty of genocide."

More than 1,000 demonstrators gathered in the city's Place de la République on May 5, displaying Tibetan flags and placards in French, calling for an end to repression inside Tibet, the release of Tibetan prisoners and a stop to China's construction of dams in the region.

As street performers depicted the dismal human rights situation inside Tibet, they then marched to the Place de la Bastille, where they remained for over four hours.

Within Xi's sight, Tibetan activists waved Tibetan national flags – an action banned in Tibet by the Chinese government and punishable by arrest, Students for a Free Tibet said in a statement.

French politicians

Even French politicians got into the act, calling on Macron to raise the Tibet issue with Xi in a letter signed by 14 senators on May 2.

"The resumption of Sino-Tibetan dialogue and respect for the rights of the Tibetan people must be at the heart of the French strategy vis-à-vis China," the letter said, in a reference to the Chinese government's cutoff of talks in 2010 between Beijing and the Dalai Lama on genuine autonomy for Tibetans.

Uyghurs gathered at Madeleine Square, close to the French president's residence, to show their opposition to Xi, said Dilnur Ryhan, president of the European Uyghur Institute.

Some pro-China activists holding Chinese flags attacked the group in three waves, one after the other, while Chinese agents wearing dark sunglasses were positioned around the square, closely monitoring their activities, she said.

Gulbahar Haitiwaji, a Uyghur detained in "re-education" camps for two years but who now lives in France, urged Macron to address the plight of those still detained in Xinjiang and other human rights abuses there.

Not all agree

Anti-Xi activists from China also participated in the protests, including one who identified himself as Jiang, an artist living in Paris who represents the group Freedom Square.

Jiang said Xi Jinping's views and actions do not have the support of all Chinese, including his "ethnic cleansing" of Tibetans, his comprehensive surveillance of Chinese citizens, aggression towards Taiwan and suppression of Hong Kong.

"These views are actually different from ours," he said. "We want to convey to the outside world that China does not only have one voice, and Xi Jinping does not represent us."

Xi is a dictator, said Liu Feilong, a Chinese dissident who lives in the Netherlands, who decided to go to Paris and participate in the demonstrations after seeing protest announcements on social media.

"Xi Jinping not only harms people living in China, but also infiltrates democratic countries in Europe and America, posing a serious threat to universal values," he said. "I escaped from China for freedom and found the freedom I wanted in the Netherlands, so I should also defend freedom and universal values."

After France, Xi will visit Serbia and Hungary – two European countries that are shifting towards authoritarianism and are big beneficiaries of Xi's Belt and Road Initiative, which aims to connect China with other nations.

It includes plans for a Budapest-Belgrade high-speed railway financed mainly by China to transport Chinese goods from the Greek port of Piraeus into Europe.

Long-time supporter of Tibet awarded US Presidential Medal of Freedom

05 May 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

A notable figure in the Tibetan advocacy movement in the United States and a close friend of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Rep. Nancy Pelosi was honoured with the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the highest civilian honour of the United States on Friday.

During the ceremony, US President Biden took a moment to highlight each honouree, commending their unwavering commitment to “curiosity, innovation, creativity, and optimism.” He specifically lauded Speaker Pelosi as the “greatest Speaker of the House of Representatives in history,” attributing her remarkable achievements to her extraordinary leadership and legislative prowess.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi’s historic milestones were also recognised during the event. In 2007, she made history by becoming the first woman to assume the role of Speaker of the House, marking a watershed moment in American politics. Subsequently, in 2019, she made history once more by being re-elected to this prestigious position. Notably, President Biden emphasised how she utilised her exceptional abilities to pass some of the most transformative laws in the nation’s history through Congress.

The former Speaker of the House has long been an advocate for the Tibetan cause. In 2020, during her tenure as Speaker, she delivered an address on the floor of the House of Representatives in support of H.R. 4331, known as the Tibet Policy Act of 2019, bipartisan legislation aimed to support the aspirations of the Tibetan people in safeguarding their unique cultural identity.

In her remarks, she voiced strong support for the Tibet Policy Act of 2019, expressing, “I rise in support of the Tibetan Policy Act of 2019: strong, bipartisan and urgently-needed legislation to strengthen America’s commitment to the Tibetan people and their right to safeguard their distinct identity. If we don’t speak out for human rights in China because of commercial interests, then we lose all moral authority to speak out for human rights in any other place in the world. I urge a strong vote for this legislation and support the Tibetan people as they seek to defend their culture, their identity, and their pursuit of a future of freedom and dignity.”

Among other priorities, Speaker Pelosi has consistently criticised the Chinese regime for its interference in the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama. As a closely of the His Holiness Dalai Lama, she has actively supported the ‘Middle Way Approach’ a policy advocated by the Tibetan leader seeking genuine autonomy for Tibet. “I heard His Holiness first describe his ‘Middle Way Approach’ for Tibet, and it was an approach about autonomy, not about independence. So when the Chinese say that it’s about independence, that’s not what it ever has been about as far as His Holiness’s presentation on Capitol Hill, or to the world.”

“In 1987, when I first came to Congress, I heard Tom Lantos – I mentioned the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission – Tom Lantos invited me to meet His Holiness the Dalai Lama, to be in a small meeting with him. I heard His Holiness first describe his ‘Middle Way Approach’ for Tibet, and it was an approach about autonomy, not about independence. So when the Chinese say that it’s about independence, that’s not what it ever has been about as far as His Holiness’s presentation on Capitol Hill, or to the world,” she also said in support of the Tibet Policy Act of 2019.

In 2023, during the fourth day of its budget session, the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile unanimously passed a “Resolution of Gratitude” to honour Nancy Pelosi. The resolution acknowledged Speaker Pelosi’s unwavering support and tireless advocacy on behalf of Tibet and Tibetans in holding China accountable for its oppression of the Tibetan people and its denial of their fundamental rights.

The Presidential Medal of Freedom, established by President Harry S. Truman in 1945, is one of the highest civilian awards of the United States, presented to individuals who have made especially exceptional contributions to the security or national interests of the United States, to world peace, or cultural or other significant public or private endeavours.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Meets President Kompatscher; the Latter Assures to Lead Parliamentary Initiatives to Spotlight Tibet’s Deteriorating Situation

04 May 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering on Thursday met with President of the Autonomous Province of Bolzano, South Tyrol, marking his second official visit to the Autonomous Province of Bolzano, South Tyrol. Sikyong last met President Kompatscher in October 2021 on his first formal visit to South Tyrol.

Lasting an hour, their discourse focused on the dire situation in Tibet, where the political, socio-cultural, and economic rights of Tibetan people have significantly deteriorated, ranking Tibet as the least free country on earth alongside South Sudan and Syria.

Sikyong addressed the alarming reality of China’s state-run colonial boarding schools in Tibet, which have forcibly separated over a million Tibetan children from their families and their cultural roots as part of China’s policy of sinicisation.

Despite these challenges, Sikyong highlighted the resilience of the Tibetan spirit, drawing inspiration from the successful autonomy model exemplified in South Tyrol which he deemed a profound contribution to humanity and particularly meaningful for the Tibetan people. Sikyong also extended an invitation to President Kompatscher to visit the Central Tibetan Administration in Dharamshala as part of a forthcoming event being organized by the CTA, which the President graciously accepted.

Responding to Sikyong's specific appeals, President Kompatscher assured to lead parliamentary initiatives to spotlight the deteriorating situation inside Tibet. Furthermore, he committed to furthering collaborations between South Tyrol and Tibet, as part of which the President unveiled plans for a new Provincial Library in Bolzano, ensuring representation for Tibet and the Tibetan movement in the Library's Documentation Center for the Protection of Minorities and Autonomy. Sikyong was accompanied by Representative Thinlay Chukki and Dr. Gunther Cologna to the meeting.

While in Bolzano, Sikyong also met with the local Tibetans over a dinner gathering, attended by Dr. Gunther Cologna and other longstanding friends of Tibet.

At the esteemed EURAC Research Center, Sikyong engaged with resident researchers, discussing the relevance of the CTA's Middle Way Approach in today's tumultuous world and advocating for Tibet's historical status in support of the Middle Way. The researchers expressed eagerness to enhance collaboration between EURAC and CTA.

Sikyong later gave interviews to the Communications team of EURAC and three prominent news media outlets, including ORF Austrian TV.

Prior to his visit to Bolzano, Sikyong visited the Tibetan community in Milan, Italy on Wednesday, 1 May. Led by the President and Vice-President of the Tibetan community Italy, the Milan Tibetan community hosted a rousing reception in honour of the Sikyong's second official visit. The reception held at Ghe Pel Ling Institute for Tibetan Buddhist Studies was joined by Filippo Scianna, President of the Italian Buddhist Union, among other longtime friends of Tibet.

Following the community engagement, Sikyong proceeded to Trentino to visit the 'Ice Stupa Zanskar' exhibition at the invitation of Roberto Pinter, a former councillor of Trentino and president of Trentino For Tibet. At the exhibition, Sikyong was warmly welcomed by the Vice Mayor of Trento and local Tibetans in Trento. The total population of Tibetans across Italy is estimated at approximately 198.

Calls for freedom on Panchen Lama's 35th birthday

03 May 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

As the Panchen Lama spent a milestone birthday in captivity last week, supporters around the globe called on China's government to finally free the Tibetan Buddhist leader.

"On the occasion of the 35th birthday of the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima of Tibet, we call on the Chinese authorities for his immediate release along with his family, teacher and other Tibetan political prisoners," Els Van Hoof and Samuel Cogolati, chair and deputy chair of the external affairs committee of Belgium's Federal Parliament, said in one of several statements by global officials last week.

The Panchen Lama, one of Tibetan Buddhism's most important leaders, turned 35 on April 25, 2024.

Born in Chinese-occupied Tibet, he was recognized by the Dalai Lama as the reincarnation of the previous Panchen Lama at age 6. Just three days later, the Chinese government abducted him and his family. The Panchen Lama has not been seen since.

The Panchen Lama's birthday last week was "a day of great importance to be observed with celebrations by all the Tibetan people, both inside and outside Tibet," the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile said in a statement.

"However, this day has also become one of great sadness for the people of Tibet, as it has been decades since we last saw him or heard his teachings."

US leaders

In the United States, several officials spoke up for the Panchen Lama as he turned 35.

"Today marks Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima's 35th birthday," Under Secretary of State Uzra Zeya, who serves as the US special coordinator for Tibetan issues, said on Twitter/X. "On this day, [the United States] renews our calls for the [People's Republic of China] to immediately provide proof of his whereabouts & well-being and reaffirms our support for Tibetans to select, educate, and venerate their religious leaders free of government interference."

"The PRC should provide the location and status of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, who turns 35 today," added US Ambassador-at-Large for International Religious Freedom Rashad Hussain. "Like members of all religious and spiritual groups, Tibetan Buddhists should be able to select, educate, and venerate their leaders, free from interference."

Members of the US Congress also spoke up for the Panchen Lama on his birthday.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-NJ, and Sen. Jeff Merkley, D-Wash., chair and co-chair of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, called for “confirmation of his whereabouts and safety, immediate release for him and his parents, and an end to PRC interference in the religious traditions of #Tibetan Buddhism.”

The Lantos Foundation for Human Rights and Justice, which carries on the legacy of late Congressman Tom Lantos, tweeted: “Holding a spiritual leader as a political prisoner for decades does not erase his position, nor does it lessen his deep connection to his people. On the occasion of his birthday, our wish is to finally get an answer to the question #WhereisthePanchenLama?”

Other US officials also raised their voice for the Panchen Lama.

David Curry, a commissioner of the US Commission on International Religious Freedom, said: “Today is the Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima’s 35th birthday, and still no proof of his whereabouts. Nearly 30 years have passed since Chinese authorities abducted him & his family.”

Curry added that Secretary of State Antony J. Blinken “must demand answers.”

Nury Turkel, the commission’s chair, said: “The #CCP brutally suppresses Tibetan Buddhists, including interfering in the succession process of the Dalai Lama & other religious leaders—a right that belongs to the Tibetan Buddhist community alone.”

According to Radio Free Asia, a State Department spokesperson said, “We are saddened that the PRC continues to separate the Panchen Lama from his community and deny him his rightful place as a Tibetan Buddhist leader.”

Around the globe

Alongside Van Hoof and Cogolati, the two Belgian parliamentarians, several officials around the globe raised the Panchen Lama’s disappearance on his birthday.

Germany’s Commissioner for Global Freedom of Religion Frank Schwabe tweeted that China’s kidnapping of the Panchen Lama was “an act of enforced disappearance.”

“I urge the Government of China to disclose precisely his whereabouts, to allow an independent monitor to visit him + to ensure that Tibetan Buddhists are able to freely practice their religion, traditions + culture without interference according to international human rights law,” Schwabe added.

Calls for freedom on Panchen Lama’s 35th birthday

03 May 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

As the Panchen Lama spent a milestone birthday in captivity last week, supporters around the globe called on China’s government to finally free the Tibetan Buddhist leader.

“On the occasion of the 35th birthday of the 11th Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima of Tibet, we call on the Chinese authorities for his immediate release along with his family, teacher and other Tibetan political prisoners,” Els Van Hoof and Samuel Cogolati, chair and deputy chair of the external affairs committee of Belgium’s Federal Parliament, said in one of several statements by global officials last week.

The Panchen Lama, one of Tibetan Buddhism’s most important leaders, turned 35 on April 25, 2024.

Born in Chinese-occupied Tibet, he was recognized by the Dalai Lama as the reincarnation of the previous Panchen Lama at age 6. Just three days later, the Chinese government abducted him and his family. The Panchen Lama has not been seen since.

The Panchen Lama’s birthday last week was “a day of great importance to be observed with celebrations by all the Tibetan people, both inside and outside Tibet,” the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile said in a statement.

“However, this day has also become one of great sadness for the people of Tibet, as it has been decades since we last saw him or heard his teachings.”

US leaders

In the United States, several officials spoke up for the Panchen Lama as he turned 35.

“Today marks Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima’s 35th birthday,” Under Secretary of State Uzra Zeya, who serves as the US special coordinator for Tibetan issues, said on Twitter/X. “On this day, [the United States] renews our calls for the [People’s Republic of China] to immediately provide proof of his whereabouts & well-being and reaffirms our support for Tibetans to select, educate, and venerate their religious leaders free of government interference.”

“The PRC should provide the location and status of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the 11th Panchen Lama, who turns 35 today," added US Ambassador-at-Large for International Religious Freedom Rashad Hussain. "Like members of all religious and spiritual groups, Tibetan Buddhists should be able to select, educate, and venerate their leaders, free from interference."

Members of the US Congress also spoke up for the Panchen Lama on his birthday.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-NJ, and Sen. Jeff Merkley, D-Wash., chair and co-chair of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, called for "confirmation of his whereabouts and safety, immediate release for him and his parents, and an end to PRC interference in the religious traditions of #Tibetan Buddhism."

The Lantos Foundation for Human Rights and Justice, which carries on the legacy of late Congressman Tom Lantos, tweeted: "Holding a spiritual leader as a political prisoner for decades does not erase his position, nor does it lessen his deep connection to his people. On the occasion of his birthday, our wish is to finally get an answer to the question #WhereisThePanchenLama?"

Other US officials also raised their voice for the Panchen Lama.

David Curry, a commissioner of the US Commission on International Religious Freedom, said: "Today is the Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima's 35th birthday, and still no proof of his whereabouts. Nearly 30 years have passed since Chinese authorities abducted him & his family."

Curry added that Secretary of State Antony J. Blinken "must demand answers."

Nury Turkel, the commission's chair, said: "The #CCP brutally suppresses Tibetan Buddhists, including interfering in the succession process of the Dalai Lama & other religious leaders—a right that belongs to the Tibetan Buddhist community alone."

According to Radio Free Asia, a State Department spokesperson said, "We are saddened that the PRC continues to separate the Panchen Lama from his community and deny him his rightful place as a Tibetan Buddhist leader."

Around the globe

Alongside Van Hoof and Cogolati, the two Belgian parliamentarians, several officials around the globe raised the Panchen Lama's disappearance on his birthday.

Germany's Commissioner for Global Freedom of Religion Frank Schwabe tweeted that China's kidnapping of the Panchen Lama was "an act of enforced disappearance."

"I urge the Government of China to disclose precisely his whereabouts, to allow an independent monitor to visit him + to ensure that Tibetan Buddhists are able to freely practice their religion, traditions + culture without interference according to international human rights law," Schwabe added.

A delegation from Estonia's parliament traveled to Dharamsala, India—the exile capital of the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan people—for the Panchen Lama's birthday.

The delegation members held a press conference where they called for the Panchen Lama's release and expressed unwavering support for Tibet, which China has brutally occupied for over 65 years.

Juku-Kalle Raid, a member of the delegation, said after meeting the Dalai Lama: "As His Holiness [the Dalai Lama] mentioned today, the issue at hand is not just about the Panchen Lama; it is a global matter involving unlawful acts, forced occupation, and the violations of human rights. We are committed to raising awareness on these issues in the European Parliament."

Tibetan leaders

In Dharamsala, the Central Tibetan Administration, which provides democratic governance for Tibetan exiles around the globe, led a celebration of the Panchen Lama's birthday at the Tsuglagkhang temple.

Along with the Estonian delegation, Buddhist officials, Tibetan leaders and others took part in the events.

The abbot of Tashi Lhunpo Monastery, the traditional home of the Panchen Lama, implored all Tibetans to pool their efforts in advocating for the Panchen Lama's release.

Zeekyab Rinpoche, the abbot, earlier joined other Buddhist leaders from the Himalayas to release a five-point appeal for the Panchen Lama to foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community.

Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, speaker of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile, said on Twitter/X: "For 29 years, [the Panchen Lama's] whereabouts remain unknown. I urge governments and the international community to advocate for his release. #FreePanchenLama."

The Tibetan Sikyong (President) Penpa Tsering tweeted: "On the occasion of the 35th birthday of the 11th #PanchenRinpoche, Tenzin Gendun Yeshe Thinley Phuntsok, we pray that Rinpoche may soon be able to break the shackles of Chinese government's illegal captivity and assume his rightful throne of the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery."

Gyari Dorjee Youdon, female warrior who fought Chinese army passes away at 92

02 May 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Gyari Dorjee Youdon in an undated photo (Photo/Facebook)

Gyari Dorjee Youdon, a significant yet an overlooked figure in Tibetan history, passed away at the age of 92. Despite her lesser-known status, she played a pivotal role as a female warrior leading revolts against invading Chinese armies in 1956 in Nyarong, in eastern Tibet's Kham region.

Her cremation ceremony, held in Mindroling, Clement Town, India on April 29, was a solemn occasion attended by dignitaries from various sections of the exile Tibetan set up. His Eminence Khokim Rinpoche presided over the ceremony, paying tribute to her remarkable life and contributions.

In 1956, Gyari Dorjee Youdon emerged as a courageous leader amidst the turmoil of Chinese oppression in Nyarong. The Chinese Communist soldiers, as part of their aggressive agenda, implemented a series of so-called "democratic reforms," which included brutal tactics such as "struggle sessions" (thamzings). These sessions involved public criticism, denunciation, and even physical violence against prominent citizens, lamas, and village headmen, often resulting in executions. Upon learning of these atrocities, Gyari Dorjee Youdon, alongside her husband Gyari Nyima and his senior wife Norzin Lhamo, recognised the urgent need for action. Despite being less of a public figure compared to her husband and Norzin Lhamo, Gyari Dorjee Youdon took the lead in organising a rebellion in their local area to protect her community from the ruthless tactics of the Chinese military.

Accounts from Jamyang Norbu, a well-known Tibetan writer and historian, described Gyari Dorjee Youdon, clad in the attire of a man and armed with a pistol strapped to her side, fearlessly led her warriors into battle against the Chinese invaders. She attacked Chinese columns and outposts across Nyarong.

Dorjee Youdon also led an assault on the Drukmo Dzong, the former Gyaristang family palace where the Chinese were stationed. After freeing the chieftains, she attacked the castle with her 1400 troops. Lacking sufficient artillery to breach the walls, they surrounded it to cut off supplies. In the ensuing battle, they killed most of the Chinese soldiers and lost 26 of their own. She offered a ceasefire on two conditions to the Chinese: release of captive chieftains in Dartsedo including her husband, Gyari Nyima, and cessation of the Chinese democratic reform program.

Gyari Dorjee Youdon's name may not be as widely recognised as other figures in Tibetan history, historians believe that her legacy as a courageous female warrior and leader of the revolt against Chinese oppression will endure. They say, her life serves as a reminder of the resilience and indomitable spirit of the Tibetan people.

Tibetan activists to protest Xi Jinping's visit to Paris

01 May 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Chinese President Xi Jinping is set visit Europe later this week from May 5-10, with scheduled visits to France, Hungary, and Serbia. This marks his first visit to Europe in five years.

Ahead of Xi's visit to France, the head of the Tibetan government in exile, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, met with French President Emmanuel Macron on Tuesday. During the meeting, an autographed photo of the Dalai Lama and Macron was presented to the French President during a ceremony honouring Mr. André Gattolin, a former Senator known for his support of Tibet.

As anticipation builds for President Xi's upcoming visit to France, the country finds itself bracing for potential protests, particularly from the Tibetan community there. Activist group Students for a Free Tibet is gearing for what it called the "biggest unwelcoming of Xi's Europe trip", urging fellow protestors to call out the Chinese President. France has the largest population of Tibetan exiles in Europe and is expected to voice concerns over China's policies towards Tibet and broader human rights issues.

Preparations are underway as demonstrators gear up to make their voices heard during Xi's visit. The protests aim to draw attention to the ongoing challenges faced by Tibetans under Chinese rule and advocate for greater international scrutiny of human rights violations in the region.

Experts say that the primary motive behind the visit to Europe and particularly to Italy is linked with the recent decision to withdraw from China's New Silk Road program, a decision to be finalized by Italian Prime Minister Giorgia Meloni in Beijing in July, following some initial hesitation. Italy's departure from the initiative elevates the importance of Hungary and Serbia which are strategically positioned in central and eastern Europe, for China's access to the EU through land.

An agreement with the Italian government is expected to be postponed until after Xi's European tour concludes in May, during which he aims to assess the intentions of other European nations. The Belgrade-Budapest freight railway emerges as a focal point, shedding light on the gravity of Xi's visits to these neighbouring capitals.

Tibetan Sikyong meets with French President ahead of state visit by Chinese president

01 May 2024, Tibetan Review

Ahead of the arrival of Chinese President Xi Jinping for a state visit, President Emmanuel Macron of France had a brief meeting with the Sikyong (executive head) Mr Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) at his official Élysée Palace on Apr 30 evening during an award ceremony.

The occasion was a ceremony to present the National Order of the Legion of Honour awarded to Andre Gattolin, a former French senator known for his strong support for the issue of Tibet.

It was a brief yet consequential visit to Paris for the Tibetan Sikyong, said the CTA, which is effectively the Tibetan government in exile, on its Tibet.net website May 1.

The Sikyong was stated to have presented to Mr Macron an autographed picture of the latter with His Holiness the Dalai Lama, while urging him not to forget Tibet.

Although the main purpose of the Sikyong's palace visit was the award ceremony, it still remains to be seen how China will react, if at all. China sees any foreign leader's meeting with an exile Tibetan leader as encouragement of Tibetan independence despite the fact that the latter only seeks autonomy, not independence from Chinese rule.

Chinese President Xi Jinping is paying state visits to France, Serbia and Hungary from May 5 to 10 at the invitation of Mr Macron, President Aleksandar Vucic of the Republic of Serbia and President Tamas Sulyok and Prime Minister Viktor Orban of Hungary.

The upcoming visits show that both China and Europe are striving to explore the space and prospects of cooperation in an era when major power strategic competition intensifies and geopolitics returns, China's official globaltimes.cn Apr 29 cited Chinese and European experts as saying. The report painted the visits as charting of blueprint for ties.

The visits are expected to shape the future of relations between China and Europe at a time when ties with the USA show little prospects for normalization in the foreseeable future.

Before Paris, the Sikyong visited Switzerland where he took part in closed-door meetings with prominent leaders and senior officials of the Swiss administration, said another Tibet.net report May 1. He was also hosted in the Swiss parliament in capital Bern on Apr 29 by its Parliamentary Group for Tibet (PGT). The event was led by Maya Graf, Vice President of the PGT; Barbara Gysi; Fabian Molina, Co-president of the PGT; and Nik Gugger, Co-president of the PGT, joined by the group's founder 35 years ago, Rene Longet. The Sikyong was also stated to have been hosted a luncheon in the parliament building.

The Sikyong was also stated to have had a dinner engagement later in the evening with Eric Nussbaumer, the Speaker of the Swiss National Council, or lower house of parliament.

The Sikyong also met with the Tibetan community in the country, delivering a speech and answering their questions on a range of issues.

French president urged to put human rights, Tibet at heart of Xi Jinping talks

01 May 2024, RFA, Tenzin Pema, Tashi Wangchuk, Yeshe Dawa

Government officials will meet only with representatives of the Dalai Lama, says a foreign ministry spokesman.

Sikong Penpa Tsering, leader of the Tibetan government-in-exile, gestures after an interview with AFP in his office in Dharamsala, India, Feb. 19, 2024.

The Chinese government says it will only talk with the representatives of the Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama, while ruling out any scope for "contact" with the India-based Tibetan government in exile.

Beijing called the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), as the government is known, a "separatist" bloc demanding autonomy for Tibet – a line that experts say it has long upheld and signals no change in Beijing's stance towards engaging meaningfully with the Tibetan side since previous talks fell through in 2010.

Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin, who made the comment on April 27, was reacting to a statement by Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the democratically elected leader of the Central Tibetan Administration, or CTA, about his government engaging in back-channel talks with the Chinese government.

Wang told a press conference there were two main conditions for any "contact or negotiations" on Tibet.

"First, we would only have contact and talks with the personal representative of the 14th Dalai Lama, not the so-called 'Tibetan government-in-exile' or 'Central Tibetan Administration,' he said." The Chinese government will not be dealing with it."

"Second, any contact or talks will only be about the personal future of the 14th Dalai Lama himself, or at most, a handful of people close to him, not the so-called 'high degree of autonomy for Tibet,'" he added.

Following the Chinese government's statement, Tsering said negotiation was the only way forward to resolve the Tibet-China conflict and the CTA would continue appealing to the government and international community to urge the Chinese government to resume dialogue.

Sino-Tibetan dialogue began in 2002 in an effort to consider prospects of "genuine" autonomy for Tibet, as called for by the Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, as part of his Middle Way policy.

The approach accepts the formerly independent Himalayan nation's status as a part of China but urges greater cultural and religious freedoms, including strengthened language rights, guaranteed for ethnic minorities under provisions of China's constitution.

"His Holiness the Dalai Lama has said time and again that the Tibet issue is the issue of six million Tibetans and not his personal matter," CTA spokesman Tenzin Lekshay told Radio Free Asia.

"The Central Tibetan Administration's Middle Way Policy seeks genuine, meaningful autonomy for the Tibetan people within the framework of the Chinese constitution and the Regional National Autonomy Law of China," he said.

"Resolving the Sino-Tibet conflict through the Middle Way Approach is mutually beneficial," he added.

False sense of hope

The Sino-Tibetan talks ground to a halt in 2010 without any breakthrough following nine formal rounds of discussion and one informal meeting.

Chinese officials rejected proposals by the Tibetan delegation — which included the Dalai Lama's special envoy Lodi Gyari and senior envoy Kelsang Gyaltsen — in which they called for greater autonomy for Tibet within China.

Both Gyari and Gyaltsen resigned from their posts two years after the talks stalled, citing frustration over the lack of a positive response from the Chinese side.

Reacting to the Chinese government's latest statement on conditions for talks to resolve the conflict, Gyaltsen told RFA that Wang's statement reflected the Chinese government line as usual.

"In fact, I can see that the Chinese government has intensified its tough stance on Tibet and, the statement signals a negative turn as now there is no scope even for a discussion on autonomy," he said.

Wang's statement also appeared to be "an attempt by the Chinese Communist Party, or CCP, to create a false sense of hope among Tibetans and create further differences within the Tibetan communities," he added.

London-based Tibetologist Robert Barnett of London University's School of Oriental and African Studies, echoed Gyaltsen's assessment, noting that the Chinese ministry spokesperson "does not deny that there are back-channel talks."

"Basically, he confirms it. ... That might also explain why it is so aggressive. They want to distract Chinese listeners at least from realizing that they are talking with the Tibetans, perhaps," Barnett told RFA, referring to the two conditions China laid out for talks.

What China was saying in public differed from what Chinese officials were saying behind the scenes, Barnett said.

"It is not credible that the Chinese will only talk about the Dalai Lama's personal situation, as they claim," he said. "They may well refuse to discuss autonomy, but we can be fairly sure that they will be talking about other issues besides the Dalai Lama's personal position and that of his retinue," he said.

Push for 'meaningful' dialogue

Some governments, including those of the United States and European countries, have made repeated calls for the Chinese government to resume talks with the Dalai Lama or Tibetan leaders.

On Tuesday, a U.S. State Department spokesperson told RFA that the U.S. government would work with its allies and partners to encourage China to return, without preconditions, to direct dialogue with the Dalai Lama, his representatives or the democratically elected Tibetan leaders to achieve meaningful autonomy for Tibetans and ensure they can preserve their religion, culture and language.

In April, the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee unanimously approved a bipartisan bill urging China to resume negotiations with the Dalai Lama or his representatives, without preconditions, and address the aspirations of Tibetans regarding their historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

"The CCP has oppressed the Tibetan people for 70 years and will not stop until their culture is eliminated," U.S. Rep. Young Kim, a California

Republican, told RFA. "The only way that there will be a peaceful resolution is if the voice of the Tibetan people is included in any conversations with the CCP."

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, was approved by the U.S. House of Representatives in February, and now needs to pass the Senate for it to become law.

The bill notes that an obstacle to further dialogue is that the Chinese government continues to impose conditions on substantive dialogue with the Dalai Lama, including "a demand that he say that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times, which the Dalai Lama has refused to do because it is inaccurate."

The European Parliament in December 2023 adopted a resolution in which it repeated its call for the Chinese government to re-engage with the Dalai Lama's representatives to establish genuine autonomy for Tibetans within China.

The resolution also urged Chinese authorities to release the Panchen Lama, Tibet's second most senior Buddhist monk abducted by Chinese authorities in 1995, and refrain from interfering in the designation of the next Dalai Lama.

April

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Discusses Bringing Positive Change in China with Swiss Parliamentarians

30 April 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering and Representative Thinlay Chukki with Speaker of the Swiss National Council, Eric Nussbaumer.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering interacted with members of the Swiss Parliament and participated in closed meetings with prominent leaders and senior officials of the Swiss administration on 29 April 2024 in Bern. Sikyong Penpa Tsering was graciously hosted at the Swiss Parliament by the Parliamentary Group for Tibet, led by MP Maya Graf-Vice President of the PGT, MP Barbara Gysi-PGT member, MP Fabian Molina, Co-President of the PGT, and MP Nik Gugger, Co-President of the PGT.

Throughout the extended meeting with the Parliamentarians, Sikyong Penpa Tsering underscored the pivotal role of Tibetans, Uyghurs, Hong Kongers, and Taiwanese as intrinsic agents of change within China, "If you want to bring positive change in China, you need both internal and external forces, and we are the internal forces."

Further, Sikyong Penpa Tsering appealed to the Parliamentarians on the significance of the historical status of Tibet in adding value to the Middle Way Policy. Sikyong also advocated for parliamentary initiatives aimed at addressing the prevailing situation inside Tibet.

In the growing climate of interest across Europe and globally in reevaluating their China policies, spurred by recent experiences, Sikyong Penpa Tsering implored Switzerland to adopt a more pragmatic approach in its bilateral relations with China.

In response, MP Maya Graf echoed the call for a paradigm shift, underscoring the imperative of historical context, and revisiting past stances.

The meeting culminated in a luncheon held within the parliament halls in honour of the Sikyong's visit, attended by MP Fabian Molina, Co-president of PGT, MP Nik Gugger, Co-president PGT, along with MP Maya Graf and MP Barbara Gysi.

Rene Longet, Co-founder of the Parliamentary Group for Tibet also joined the meeting. Sikyong Penpa Tsering expressed gratitude to Longet for his unwavering support for Tibet and his instrumental role in the establishment of the Swiss parliamentary group for Tibet 35 years ago.

Accompanying Sikyong Tsering were Representative Thinlay Chukki and Phuntsok Topgyal from the Tibet Bureau Geneva, Chisur Jampa Samdho, Co-president of Gesellschaft Schweizerisch-Tibetische Freundschaft (GSTF), Thomas Buchli, Secretary of the Tibet Parliamentary Group, President of Tibet Community Switzerland and Liechtenstein Ngedun Gyatso Drongpatsang, Vice President Kalsang Kangrang, Namgyal Gangshontsang, Mayor of Oetwil a.S, GSTF Board members Lhawang Ngorkhangsar and Michaela Litzenburger, Bettina Eckert GSTF, VTJE Co-president Arya Amipa, and Selina Morell from STP.

On the evening of 29 April, Sikyong had a dinner engagement with the Speaker of the Swiss National Council, Eric Nussbaumer. Sikyong was accompanied by Representative Thinlay Chukki, Tibet Bureau Geneva and Phuntsok Topgyal, Tibet Bureau Geneva. On the sidelines of the visit, Sikyong also gave media interviews with prominent Swiss local press.

Sikyong Addresses Tibetan Community in Zurich, Debunks Recent Comment by Spokesperson of Chinese Foreign Ministry

29 April 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering addressing the Tibetan community of Zurich. Photo / Tenzin Nyishon

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the democratically elected leader of the exile Tibetan people, embarked on his five-nation tour starting with Zurich on 28 April 2024. Led by Representative Thinlay Chukki, Tibet Bureau Geneva and its staff, and Presidents and Vice-Presidents of Tibetan communities in Switzerland and Liechtenstein, the community extended a warm welcome to Sikyong as he arrived on his second round of official visits there.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering's first engagement was at the Tibet Institute Rekon, where he held a meeting with Dr. Karma Dolma Lobsang, President of Rikon, Managing Director Peter Oberholzer, Ven. Lama Tenzin Jottotshang, Representative of the Monastic Community and Ven. Abbot Geshe Tenzin Jangchup along with Representative of Tibet Bureau Geneva and President of Tibetan Community of Switzerland and Liechtenstein.

Later, Sikyong engaged with the Tibetan community at Dietikon, including a brief interaction with the teachers and heads of the Weekend Tibetan language school.

In his address to the Tibetan community, Sikyong emphasised everyone to remember and appreciate the dedicated contributions of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and elder Tibetans for setting up this unparalleled exile community with well established democratic system to maintain Tibetan freedom struggle while imploring the newer generations to uphold their legacies.

Highlighting the importance of the continued existence and relevance of the Central Tibetan Administration in Tibetans' pursuit of freedom, the Tibetan political leader said, "Since we are unsure if someone with His Holiness' level of influence and impact will take the helm, it is crucial that this institution must endure in order to safeguard the Tibetan freedom movement going forward."

Sikyong further apprised the gathering of 16th Kashag's official undertakings to capacitate and strengthen the operations of the Central Tibetan Administration. And, with regard to the recent comment made by Chinese Foreign Ministry's spokesperson on back-channel communication between the Central Tibetan Administration and the People's Republic of China, the Tibetan political leader stressed, "Negotiation is the only way forward for resolving the Tibet-China conflict and the Central Tibetan Administration would continue making appeals to the government and international community to urge the Chinese government to resume the dialogue."

In this connection, Sikyong urged the Chinese government to start enacting constructive reforms within Tibet instead of giving His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Tibetan leaders instructions on what to do or not.

On 29 April, Sikyong is set to meet with Swiss parliamentarians in the capital city of Bern.

Resolution of Sino-Tibet conflict to be mutually beneficial: Tibetan leadership

29 April 2024, Hindustan Times

Penpa Tsering said last week his interlocutor was dealing with "people in Beijing", and "other elements" on the Chinese side have also reached out. The Tibetan government-in-exile has reiterated that resolving the "Sino-Tibet conflict" through a process that leads to genuine autonomy for Tibet will be mutually beneficial, days after Beijing ruled out talks with the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA). Penpa Tsering, the Sikyong or political leader of the CTA, told a small group of reporters in Dharamshala last week that the Tibetan government-in-exile has opened back channel communications with China to explore ways to find a resolution to the issue of Tibet though there is no expectation of an immediate breakthrough. Responding to Tsering's remarks, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin said on Friday that Beijing will only have talks with the personal representative of the Dalai Lama and not the Tibetan government-in-exile. "The Middle Way Policy (MWP) of [the] Central Tibetan Administration is to seek genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people within the framework of Chinese constitution & Regional National Autonomy Law of China," CTA spokesperson Tenzin Lekshay said in a post on X in response to the Chinese foreign ministry's stance.

"Resolving Sino-Tibet conflict through MWP is mutually beneficial," Lekshay said, referring to the Tibetan government-in-exile's official position of seeking autonomy, and not independence, for Tibet. The Indian side has not made any official comments on this issue so far. The Tibetan government-in-exile is based in Dharamshala town in Himachal Pradesh and Tsering said the CTA works closely with the external affairs ministry and Indian security agencies on the issue of Tibet.

Tsering also said his interlocutor has been dealing with “people in Beijing”, and “other elements” on the Chinese side have sought to reach out to the Tibetan leadership.

“We keep the communications going, it has been almost more than a year since we started the back channels,” Tsering said. “They [the Chinese] are reaching out to us, it’s not us reaching out to them. But to hope for something at this juncture? It is not realistic.” Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Wang, however, described the Tibetan government-in-exile as an “organised separatist political group” with an agenda for “Tibetan independence”. The Chinese government will only have contacts and talks with the personal representative of the Dalai Lama, and such talks will “only be about the personal future” of the Dalai Lama and “not the so-called ‘high degree of autonomy for Tibet’”, he said.

Wang added that “future contact and talks” can be considered when the Dalai Lama gives up “any activity aimed at disrupting the social order” in Tibet.

China pushed back on rights, Tibet in meetings with top US diplomat

28 April 2024, Tibetan Review

Back from meetings with top Chinese leaders in Beijing and Shanghai over Apr 24-26, US Secretary of State Antony Blinken has said that apart from discussing the numerous weighty matters that continue to bedevil good relations between the two sides, issues relating to human rights and Tibet as well as Xinjiang and other serious concerns such, especially, as Taiwan were also raised. But China has made it clear that it pushed back against the US advocacy on those issues.

At a press availability on Apr 26, Blinken has said: “I raised the cases of American citizens who are wrongfully detained and those who are subject to exit bans. President Biden and I will not rest until they’re back with their families where they belong. I also raised concerns about the erosion of Hong Kong’s autonomy and democratic institutions as well as transnational repression, ongoing human rights abuses in Xinjiang and Tibet, and a number of individual human rights cases.”

Blinken has not said what China’s reaction was to his raising of those concerns. However, China’s official Xinhua news agency Apr 27 cited Yang Tao, Director General of the Department of North American and Oceanian Affairs of the Foreign Ministry, as saying at a media briefing on the just-concluded visit: “On issues related to Hong Kong, Xinjiang, Xizang, and human rights, Yang noted that Hong Kong belongs to China, and the United States should respect China’s sovereignty and the rule of law in Hong Kong. Any smearing campaign must be stopped. Issues related to Xinjiang and Xizang are China’s internal affairs. The United States should not make unwarranted remarks, still less interfere in them under the pretext of human rights.”

In fact, referring to Blinken’s plans made clear earlier to raise those issues during his upcoming meetings, China made it clear Apr 23 that it will not welcome any raising of human rights, Tibet, and Taiwan issues. China’s official globaltimes.cn Apr 23 cited a senior official from the country’s Foreign Ministry as saying that it will be made clear that “issues related to Xinjiang, Xizang [Tibet], and Hong Kong are matters of China’s internal affairs and have nothing to do with so-called human rights.”

The report cited the unnamed senior official as saying the US must not use human rights as an excuse to interfere in China’s internal affairs, that how human rights are in a country is best judged by its own people, the official was stated to have maintained.

Xinhua cited Yang as saying Blinken’s visit took place at the invitation of Foreign Minister Wang Yi, also a member of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee. The visit was stated to be part of the efforts by China and the US to follow through on the common understandings reached by the two presidents at their meeting in San Francisco, maintain dialogue, manage differences, advance cooperation and strengthen coordination on international affairs.

Apart from President Xi Jinping and Wang Yi, Blinken was stated to have met with Wang Xiaohong, State Councilor and Minister of Public Security, for exchange of views on counter-narcotics law enforcement cooperation. Blinken has also met, Apr 25, with Secretary of the Shanghai Municipal Party Committee Chen Jining to discuss Shanghai’s exchanges and cooperation with the US side.

Globaltimes.cn Apr 27 said Chinese experts deemed Blinken’s visit as “generally positive and playing a role in stabilizing relations between China and the US,” but cited observers as also believing such a visit by itself cannot fundamentally change the current trend of China-US ties.

Dialogue with Dalai Lama's representatives only, not with Tibetan Government-in-Exile, says China

28 April 2024, Phayul

China on Friday said it would talk only with the representatives of the Dalai Lama and not the officials of the Tibetan government-in-exile, also ruling out dialogue on the long-pending demand for autonomy for Tibetan people.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin refuted reports of back-channel discussions between the Tibetan government-in-exile and the Chinese government by categorizing the Tibetan government-in-exile, headquartered in Dharamshala, as a "separatist" entity, during a press briefing in Beijing.

Wang stated that "The so-called 'Tibetan government-in-exile' is an entirely organised separatist political group with a political platform and an agenda for 'Tibetan independence.' It is an illegal organisation that violates China's Constitution and laws. No country in the world recognises it," Wang said.

Elaborating on China's stand, Wang said the Chinese government has two basic principles when it comes to contact and talks. "First, we would only have contact and talks with the personal representative of the 14th Dalai Lama, not the so-called 'Tibetan government-in-exile' or the 'Central Tibetan Administration.' The Chinese government will not be dealing with it," he said.

"Second, any contact or talks will only be about the personal future of the 14th Dalai Lama himself, or to the utmost extent, a handful of people close to him, not the so-called 'high degree of autonomy for Tibet,' Wang added.

He further stated "We hope the 14th Dalai Lama will have a right understanding of the central government's policy, seriously reflect on and thoroughly correct its political propositions and actions, give up any activity aimed to disrupt the social order in Xizang (Tibet) and return to the right path. Only then can contact and talks be considered next," he said. China calls Tibet as Xizang in its efforts to sinicize the name of Tibet on the global stage.

The Dalai Lama has, time and again, denied aspiration for independence, and instead called for autonomy for Tibet, which has subsequently been bifurcated into various prefectures by the Chinese government after taking it over in 1951.

On Thursday, Sikyong or the political head of Tibet's government-in-exile, Penpa Tsering, told a visiting group of journalists in Dharamshala, India, "We have had back-channel (engagement) since last year. But we have no immediate expectations from it. It has to be a long-term (one)." Insisting that the talks are "very informal," the head of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) said, "I have my interlocutor who deals with people in Beijing. Then, there are other elements also trying to reach out to us."

His cabinet minister for Information and International Relations Minister Norzin Dolma on Thursday reaffirmed that there are back-channel talks with China that are aimed at reviving the overall dialogue process as it is the only way out to resolve the Tibetan issue.

The dialogue between Beijing and representatives of the Dalai Lama began with fact-finding Tibetan delegations visiting Tibet in 1979 and 1980, followed by exploratory talks in Beijing in 1982 and 1984. From 2002 onwards, nine rounds of discussions took place between envoys of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and China's United Front Work Department.

Throughout these talks, the Tibetan delegation advocated for genuine autonomy for Tibet by Chinese constitutional principles and the Law on Regional National Autonomy, culminating in the presentation of a Memorandum and Note to the Chinese leadership. However, the ninth and final round of talks occurred in 2010 and 2012, the Dalai Lama's envoys resigned after the ninth round, citing the deteriorating situation in Tibet and a perceived lack of sincerity and willingness from the Chinese side.

Fleeing Chinese persecution: One woman's great escape from Tibet to India

27 April 2024, The New Indian Express

"I have left my family behind and crossed over to tell the world how difficult life is for us in Tibet. Human rights are violated with impunity," the 24-year-old Namkyi told The New Indian Express

DHARAMSALA: A year ago, Namkyi left her home in Charo village, Tibet, and walked continuously for 10 days and nights along with her aunt Tsering Kyi before crossing into Nepal and finally reaching India. Now 24, she recalls how she was imprisoned for a year at the age of 15 by Chinese authorities after she and her sister protested over not being allowed to practise their faith.

"I have left my family behind and crossed over to tell the world how difficult life is for us in Tibet. Human rights are violated with impunity and we are always treated with suspicion and looked down upon. I shudder to recall the days I spent in jail when I was barely 15, men in uniform would hit us, leftover food was fed, and we slept in the cold with thin blankets. There was just nobody who could come to our rescue. I was let off after being tried but with threats and warnings," a teary-eyed Namkyi told The New Indian Express.

Namkyi was detained in the Tashi Gyalkaling County along with her sister. The charges levelled against her were 'separatist acts against the nation' and supporting the 'Dalai clique'.

"While in prison, we were made to undertake military training and learn about the Chinese constitution. We also worked in a labour camp making copper wires, cigarette boxes and watches. After completing our prison term, we were kept at a police station in Pema Lhathang in Ngaba County for a week. My family has been kept on a blacklist ever since," she said adding that her family was questioned after she left, and she fears they would be tortured.

After reaching India in June 2023, Namkyi has been in a transit school where she is learning the local language as her dialect isn't similar to what the Tibetans in exile speak in India.

She got an audience with His Holiness the Dalai Lama, a few weeks after she reached Dharamsala, which she says helped her heal. "HH said that we should preserve our culture and tradition," she said.

Namkyi has gone through a lot, but her story is not any different from thousands of Tibetan refugees who have braved harsh terrain to escape Tibet. Namkyi says that she hopes to travel across the world and make people aware of the gross human rights violations in China and hopes that someday justice will prevail.

Chinese 'democracy activist' in Germany known to be close to Tibetan groups held for spying

27 April 2024, Tibetan Review

Source of photograph: Tibetan Review

An aide to a German member of the European Parliament arrested for spying for China was not only a familiar presence in the overseas Chinese pro-democracy movement but had also organized a group visit to the Dalai Lama in India and was well-placed to convey sensitive information to Beijing, reported the Cantonese service of rfa.org Apr 26, citing activists.

German citizen Guo Jian, who has since been suspended from his job as an aide to far-right Member of the European Parliament Maximilian Krah, was reported arrested on Apr 22 by police in Dresden.

Federal prosecutors have said he was working for a Chinese intelligence agency, and that he repeatedly passed to it information on European Parliament negotiations and decisions in January. He is also accused of spying on Chinese dissidents and overseas activists in Germany.

Canada-based writer and activist Sheng Xue has said she had met Guo several times at pro-democracy events, where she noticed he didn't say much, but spent most of his time observing.

"He was a director of the Federation for a Democratic China and the secretary-general of the China Republican Party, so he knew all of the details of the people who attended their meetings."

"Guo Jian has been active in the Chinese democratic circle in Germany," Germany-based rights activist and journalist Su Yutong has, likewise, written in a tweet on Apr 23. Because he had served on those two posts, "people in the democracy movement trusted him a great deal," and "many well-known democrats have participated in the meetings he helped to prepare."

According to Su, Guo had also been "close to Tibetan organizations" and had led a group of people to visit Dharamshala, meet the Dalai Lama there, and shared a photo from the trip.

The report noted that an account of the 2018 visit penned by Guo was still visible on the official Chinese-language website of the Tibetan government-in-exile on Apr 25, confirming Su's claim, along with the same photo she shared of Guo with the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader.

The report said that in that article, endorsed by the Central Tibetan Administration's European Liaison Office, Guo had described his visit as "a democratic learning journey," saying "democracy activists must communicate more with Tibetans and learn about their democratic achievements."

Sheng sees Guo's arrest as highlighting the enormity of China's global reach when it comes to targeting dissidents and activists overseas.

"The Chinese Communist Party has put huge effort into bribing and infiltrating the politics, economy, media and academic life of various countries," she has said.

Earlier in 2017, Sweden's Security Police (SÄPO) arrested a Tibetan refugee named Dorjee Gyantsan, 49, for spying on the Tibetan community in the country as well in nearby countries, such as Denmark, Norway, and Poland, for China's Ministry of State Security. He reported to a handler named Lei Da in meetings in Finland and Poland, where the latter worked as a secretary at the Chinese Embassy in Warsaw.

Dorjee, having fled to Nepal from Tibet in 1997, was a real refugee. He changed his name to Dorjee Gyantsan to reflect his Tibetan ancestry on his mother's side – his previous name was Abdul Ma, after his father who was a Hui Muslim. He moved to Stockholm in 2002 after being granted refugee status by the UNHCR and offered asylum in Sweden. Jamyang Choedon, the then head of the Tibetan community organization in Sweden, told Safeguard Defenders at that time that everyone was shocked by his arrest, and about the fact that a spy had been placed in their midst.

Dorjee was sentenced to 22 months for spying on Tibetans in Sweden for China.

After this release from Mariefreds prison in central Sweden on May 14, 2020, SÄPO placed him into custody immediately, remanded him to Sollentuna häkte, one of Sweden's newest detention centres, just north of Stockholm, and requested his expulsion from the country on the ground that he was a threat to Sweden's national security. He was not allowed to go home to his family, a wife, and two children.

After the Swedish Migration Board and High Court of Migration agreed in July and September, respectively, Sweden's Home Minister approved Dorjee's expulsion for life on Oct 22. However, because of his status as a UNCHR refugee under Swedish law, there were legal hurdles to sending him back to China. And so Dorjee remained in custody awaiting his fate amid a possible prolonged legal wrangling.

Calls grow for proof of whereabouts of Tibet's missing Panchen Lama

26 April 2024, RFA

Global leaders joined Tibetans across the world this week to mark the 35th birthday of a revered Tibetan religious leader taken into custody 29 years ago and missing ever since.

Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, then just six years old, was recognized by Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, as the 11th Panchen Lama, Tibet's second most-senior Buddhist monk, in May 1995.

An exile Tibetan Buddhist monk puts a scarf in front of a portrait of the 11th Panchen Lama, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, at an event marking his birthday in Dharamshala, India, Thursday, April 25, 2024. (Ashwini Bhatia/AP)

Shortly after the Dalai Lama's announcement, Chinese authorities abducted the new Panchen Lama, his family and his teacher. His whereabouts remain unknown. If alive, he would have turned 35 on Thursday.

At a commemoration event in Dharamshala, India, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the democratically elected head of the Tibetan government-in-exile, reissued a long-standing plea for information about his fate.

"Our most pressing concern is whether the Panchen Rinpoche is still alive or not," Tsering said, using a name Tibetan Buddhists reserve for reincarnated lamas.

China's choice

The Panchen Lama's abduction illustrates the sensitivity of Chinese authorities to other prominent figures and their effort to control Tibetans by suppressing expressions of their Buddhist faith.

After the 1950-51 Chinese invasion and annexation of Tibet, Beijing made efforts to influence Tibetan affairs, including through the selection of a spiritual successor to the 10th Panchen Lama, who died in 1989.

Tibetan Buddhists believe that the Dalai Lama and Panchen Lama are reincarnated as children when they die, and that they have the right to select the religious leaders based on their religious belief in the principle of rebirth.

After abducting Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, the ruling Chinese Communist Party installed another boy, Gyaltsen Norbu, called Gyaincain Norbu in Chinese, as the 11th Panchen Lama.

However, the Chinese government-appointed religious figure remains unpopular with Tibetans both in exile and at home and is perceived as a "political tool" for Beijing.

The fight over the 11th Panchen Lama is likely a precursor to the battle over who will follow the 14th Dalai Lama, who is now 88 years old. China, always wary of opposition to its authority, particularly in the sometimes restive Tibetan region, says it can appoint the successor under Chinese law. Sikyong Tsering also called on the Beijing-appointed Panchen Lama to “not become a political tool of the Chinese government’s sinister motives.”

“Instead, he must recognize the unprecedented danger threatening the survival of the Tibetan people and Tibetan Buddhism, and fearlessly undertake his responsibility, and not commit any act that would hurt the Tibetans and Tibet’s spiritual and political cause,” he said.

Traditionally the Panchen Lama has played a leading role in Tibetan Buddhist scholarship as the leader of the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery in Shigatse, the second-largest city in Tibet, which has been controlled by China since 1951. The previous incarnation of the Panchen Lama passed away in 1989 at the monastery.

International criticism

Uzra Zeya, special coordinator for Tibetan issues in the U.S. State Department, marked the Panchen Lama’s birthday by calling on China to provide proof of his whereabouts and well-being.

The U.S. government “reaffirms our support for Tibetans to select, educate and venerate their religious leaders free of government interference,” she wrote on X, the social media platform formerly known as Twitter.

A U.S. State Department spokesperson told RFA that Secretary of State Antony Blinken, who is on a visit to China, is expected to “raise clearly and candidly our concerns on human rights, including the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang, and abuses throughout the country, including in Hong Kong and Tibet.”

“We are saddened that the PRC [People’s Republic of China] continues to separate the Panchen Lama from his community and deny him his rightful place as a Tibetan Buddhist leader,” the spokesperson said, adding that the U.S. has called on Beijing to publicize verifiable proof of his whereabouts and to allow him to speak for himself.

In Europe, Els Van Hoof, chair of the External Affairs Committee of the Federal Parliament of Belgium, and Samuel Cogolati, deputy chair, issued a statement condemning the 29-year-long enforced disappearance of the Panchen Lama and calling for his immediate release along with those of his family, teacher and other political prisoners.

Additional reporting by Tenzin Dickyi for RFA Tibetan. Edited by Tenzin Pema, Roseanne Gerin and Jim Snyder.

Estonian Parliamentary Delegation Holds Press Conference to Express their Concerns Over State of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Lama

26 April 2024, CTA

Juku Kalle Raid, member of Estonian Parliament and Estonia’s Foreign Affairs Commission, speaking during the press conference. Photo / Tenzin Jigme Taydeh / CTA

On 25 April 2024, delegates from the Estonian Parliament and Tibet Support Group participating in the official ceremony of the 35th birthday of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Lama Gedun Choekyi Nyima came together to hold a joint press conference at Tsuglagkhang.

The delegation: Juku Kalle Raid, member of Estonian Parliament and Estonia’s Foreign Affairs Commission; Jenn Polluaas, Member of Estonian Parliament and its Former Speaker; Tarmo Tamm, Member of Estonian Parliament, and Andres Herkel, Former Estonian MP and Journalist, partook in the press meeting and made an appeal to China, urging for the immediate release of the 11th Panchen Lama, while expressing their unwavering support for the cause of Tibet.

Chair of the Estonian Parliamentary Support Group for Tibet, Juko Kalle Raid, emphasised the significance of this press conference for the Estonian nation and its people. He remarked that His Holiness the Dalai Lama had visited Estonia on three separate occasions, and each time, a significant number of Estonians warmly received Him. The people of Estonia have consistently shown a deep admiration and affection for Tibet, and this enduring sentiment will continue to prevail. Given the resemblance between Tibet and Estonia for having undergone similar experiences of foreign occupation, he added, “Despite the challenging circumstances we find ourselves in, it is imperative that we continue to progress and refrain from regressing or remaining stagnant. The system deems the violation of human rights and the act of forced occupation as illegitimate.”

He further assured his commitment to amplifying voices across European countries with increased conviction and impact to seek European nations’ acknowledgement on the Tibetan people's self determination. He stressed that China must refrain from meddling in Tibetan affairs to ensure the continued existence of Tibet's unique heritage.

Following the address of the delegation members, a Q&A session was held with the media representatives discussing the urgent request for China to release the 11th Panchen Lama. MP Juko Kalle Raid responded, "As His Holiness mentioned today (during their private audience with His Holiness), the issue at hand is not just about the Panchen Lama; it is a global matter involving unlawful acts, forced occupation, and the violations of human rights. We are committed to raising awareness on these issues in the European Parliament."

Additionally, he claimed, "The Upcoming election of the European Parliament is on the horizon. I have the necessary criteria to vote for individuals capable of raising these issues and concerns. It is crucial not only to address the whereabouts of the 11th Panchen Lama separately but also to discuss and bring to light the unlawful actions of the Chinese government." Furthermore, he made a noteworthy point about his experiences under Soviet Union rule, expressing his complete distrust of the authoritarian government, including the Chinese government.

The other members the delegation also participated in the press conference and shared their concerns over the PRC's continued repression inside Tibet.

Very informal talks with China on since last year, but have no immediate expectations: Tibet's govt-in-exile head

25 April 2024, First Post

The political head of Tibet's government-in-exile Penpa Tsering has confirmed that his interlocutor are holding "very informal" talks with China but expressed there is no immediate expectation of a forward movement.

The formal dialogue process had hit a roadblock over a decade ago in view of anti-China protests in Tibet and Beijing's hardline approach towards the Buddhist region.

"We have had back-channel (engagement) since last year. But we have no immediate expectations from it. It has to be a long-term (one)," PTI quoted the Sikyong or political head of Tibet's government-in-exile Penpa Tsering as saying to journalists, insisting that the talks are "very informal".

"I have my interlocutor who deals with people in Beijing. Then there are other elements also trying to reach out to us," the head of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) said.

Between 2002 and 2010, representatives of the Dalai Lama engaged in nine rounds of dialogue with the Chinese government, yielding no tangible results.

However, formal discussions have been dormant since that time.

A prominent senior Tibetan leader hinted that informal discussions are underway to reinvigorate the broader dialogue, recognising it as the sole avenue to address the Tibetan situation.

Regarding the strained relations between New Delhi and Beijing after the eastern Ladakh dispute in 2020, a leader from the Central Tibetan Administration noted that Chinese aggression along the Indian border has underscored the significance of the Tibetan issue in India.

"With the Chinese belligerence on the border, the Tibetan issue also naturally gets highlighted in India," PTI quoted him as saying.

At the same time, Tsering pitched for greater support from India to the Tibetan cause.

"Now you can see that India's foreign policy is becoming more vibrant. India's influence around the world is also growing. In that sense, we would definitely want India to be a little more vocal towards the Tibetan cause," he said.

After a failed anti-Chinese uprising in 1959, the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet and came to India where he set up the government-in-exile. The Chinese government officials and the Dalai Lama or his representatives have not met in formal negotiations since 2010.

Beijing has been maintaining that it freed "serfs and slaves" from a brutal theocracy in Tibet and is bringing the region on the path of prosperity and modernisation.

China has in the past accused the Dalai Lama of indulging in "separatist" activities and trying to split Tibet and considers him a divisive figure.

However, the Tibetan spiritual leader has insisted that he is not seeking independence but "genuine autonomy for all Tibetans living in the three traditional provinces of Tibet" under the "Middle-Way approach".

Relations between the two sides strained further due to protests against China in Tibetan areas in 2008.

The Dalai Lama has been favouring resolution of the Tibetan issue through dialogue.

"I am always open to talks with China and have made it clear years ago that we are not seeking complete independence and would remain a part of the People's Republic of China (PRC)," the Dalai Lama said last year.

In his remarks, Tsering suggested that less complicated relations between India and China could help in moving positively toward the resolution of the Tibetan issue.

In this context, he also highlighted the deep-rooted connection between Indian and Tibetan culture and heritage.

"His Holiness the Dalai Lama keeps saying that 'I am a son of Indian soil' and that 'I'm a messenger of Indian wisdom'. So we are close to Indian culture but not to China's," he said.

Tibetan govt-in-exile holds back-channel informal dialogue with China

25 April 2024, Business Standard

From 2002 To 2010, Tibetan Spiritual Leader The Dalai Lama's Representatives And The Chinese Government Held Nine Rounds Of Dialogue That Did Not Produce A Concrete Outcome. No Formal Talks Have Been Held Since Then | (Photo: PTI)

The Tibetan government-in-exile and China are holding back-channel talks, signalling signs of willingness by both sides to re-engage over a decade after the formal dialogue process hit a dead end in view of anti-China protests in Tibet and Beijing's hardline approach towards the Buddhist region.

The Sikyong or political head of Tibet's government-in-exile, Penpa Tsering, confirmed the holding of informal talks and said his interlocutor has been dealing with "people in Beijing" but there is no immediate expectation of a forward movement.

"We have had back-channel (engagement) since last year. But we have no immediate expectations from it. It has to be a long-term (one)," Tsering told a small group of journalists, insisting that the talks are "very informal".

"I have my interlocutor who deals with people in Beijing. Then there are other elements also trying to reach out to us," the head of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) said.

From 2002 to 2010, Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama's representatives and the Chinese government held nine rounds of dialogue that did not produce a concrete outcome. No formal talks have been held since then.

Another senior Tibetan leader indicated that the back-channel talks are aimed at reviving the overall dialogue process as it is the only way out to resolve the Tibetan issue.

The CTA leader, referring to the frosty ties between New Delhi and Beijing following the eastern Ladakh row in 2020, said the Chinese belligerence along the Indian border highlighted the Tibetan issue in India.

"With the Chinese belligerence on the border, the Tibetan issue also naturally gets highlighted in India," he said.

At the same time, Tsering pitched for greater support from India for the Tibetan cause.

"Now you can see that India's foreign policy is becoming more vibrant. India's influence around the world is also growing. In that sense, we would definitely want India to be a little more vocal towards the Tibetan cause," he said.

After a failed anti-Chinese uprising in 1959, the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet and came to India where he set up the government-in-exile. The Chinese government officials and the Dalai Lama or his representatives have not met in formal negotiations since 2010.

Beijing has been maintaining that it freed "serfs and slaves" from a brutal theocracy in Tibet and was bringing the region on the path of prosperity and modernisation.

China has in the past accused the Dalai Lama of indulging in "separatist" activities and trying to split Tibet and considers him a divisive figure.

However, the Tibetan spiritual leader has insisted that he is not seeking independence but "genuine autonomy for all Tibetans living in the three traditional provinces of Tibet" under the "Middle-Way approach".

Relations between the two sides strained further due to protests against China in Tibetan areas in 2008.

The Sikyong also mentioned that India doesn't make statements on Tibet during the periodic review of human rights in China by the United Nations Human Rights Council.

"Normally, other countries look at the leadership of India because India is one country that knows Tibet historically. In that sense we would also like them to be a little more vocal," he said.

In its talks with China between 2002 and 2010, the Tibetan side pitched for genuine autonomy for the Tibetan people in line with the Dalai Lama's middle-way policy.

The Dalai Lama has been favouring a resolution of the Tibetan issue through dialogue.

"I am always open to talks with China and have made it clear years ago that we are not seeking complete independence and would remain a part of the People's Republic of China (PRC)," the Dalai Lama said last year. In his remarks, Tsering suggested that less complicated relations between India and China could help in moving positively toward the resolution of the Tibetan issue.

In this context, he also highlighted the deep-rooted connection between Indian and Tibetan culture and heritage.

"His Holiness the Dalai Lama keeps saying that 'I am a son of Indian soil' and that 'I'm a messenger of Indian wisdom'. So we are close to Indian culture but not to China's," he said.

Tibetans call on India, other democratic nations to press Beijing on whereabouts of Panchen Lama

25 April 2024, The Economic Times

The Tibetan government-in-exile on Thursday called on India and other democratic nations to press Beijing to divulge the whereabouts of Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima and allow an independent fact-finding commission to examine his disappearance in China nearly 29 years ago. The demand was made at a grand event held in this Himachal Pradesh town commemorating the 35th birth anniversary of Choekyi Nyima who disappeared just three days after the Dalai Lama declared the then six-year to be the reincarnated Panchen Lama. A joint statement issued by leading Tibetan leaders called on foreign governments and the UN to direct their ambassadors in China to meet with the 11th Panchen Lama and ascertain his whereabouts and wellbeing.

The Panchen Lama is the second most important figure in Tibetan Buddhism.

"Our most pressing concern is whether the Panchen Rinpoche is still alive or not," said Penpa Tsering, the Sikyong or political head of Tibet's government-in-exile, in presence of hundreds of Tibetans and international delegations.

"If he is presumed to be alive, has he been brought up with his parents from the age of six up till now for the last 29 years? Or had he been kept in a remote environment to become someone who can't speak even in Tibetan? How much the people around him might have abused and tortured him?" Tsering accused the Chinese government of "brazenly violating" fundamental human rights and freedom of the Panchen Lama.

In May 1995, Choekyi Nyima was identified by the Dalai Lama as the 11th Panchen Lama, six years after the death of his predecessor. China had rejected the move and anointed its own Panchen Lama, Gyaltzen Norbu. Tsering said the Chinese authorities should immediately allow an independent fact-finding commission to get access to the Panchen Lama and that he should be given his basic human rights. The Chinese government has not yet responded clearly to questions about the whereabouts of Panchen Lama.

In 2015, it claimed that the Panchen Lama is receiving education like other children and that he does not want to be disturbed by anyone."The Chinese government has brazenly violated fundamental human rights and freedoms of Panchen Rinpoche recognised by His Holiness the Dalai Lama," Tsering said. In their statement, the leading Tibetan religious leaders hoped that the foreign governments, the UN and the international community will consider the "reality" of the Tibetan situation, especially on the issue of the Panchen Lama's enforced disappearance. In their statement, the leading Tibetan religious leaders hoped that the foreign governments, the UN and the international community will consider the "reality" of the Tibetan situation, especially on the issue of the Panchen Lama's enforced disappearance for almost 29 years, and as someone who has been denied with his human rights, religious freedom, rights of a child and other fundamental rights of movement," according to the statement. The leaders also urged the international community to actively call for the release of Chadrel Rinpoche, a lama of Tashi Lhunpo monastery who was the head of the search committee for the 11 Panchen Lama, as well as other Tibetan political prisoners.

"On account of the dire situation inside Tibet, Tibetans have been resorting to acts of self-immolation, the latest being a 25-year-old Tibetan singer Tsewang Norbu and an 81-year-old Taphun in 2022," the statement said. "The self-immolators have sacrificed their most cherished life in order to draw the attention of the UN and the international community to the critical situation in Tibet," it said. A high-level parliamentary delegation from Estonia attended the event. "Every Estonian feel connected with the Tibetan cause. The issue is not only about Panchen Lama. It is about protecting human rights and dignity of people," said Jukku Kalle Raid, one of the members of the delegation. He said there has been greater understanding now in Europe about challenges emanating from China. "We urge the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to pass a motion urging them to direct their ambassadors in China to meet with the 11th Panchen Lama and ascertain his whereabouts and wellbeing," they said. The leaders also urged the international community to actively call for the release of Chadrel Rinpoche, a lama of Tashi Lhunpo monastery who was the head of the search committee for the 11 Panchen Lama, as well as other Tibetan political prisoners.

Buddhist Leaders from Himalaya Holds Joint Press Conference to Raise Issue of the 11th Panchen Lama's Whereabout

25 April 2024, CTA

Regzin Dorjay, Acting President of the Ladakh Buddhist Association, speaking during the press conference. Photo / Tenzin Jigme Taydeh / CTA

Kyabje Zeekyab Tulku Jetsun Tenzin Thupten Rabgyal, Abbot of Tashi Lhunpo Monastery, the traditional seat of the Panchen Lama; Kyabje Lochen Rinpoche, Tsechokling Tulku Tenzing Gelek, Sikkim; and Regzin Dorjay, Acting President of the Ladakh Buddhist Association, jointly held a press conference to call for the immediate release of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Rinpoche who was recognised by His Holiness the Dalai Lama on the occasion of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Rinpoche's birthday.

At the press meeting, Zeekyab Rinpoche read a joint appeal undersigned by himself, along with Kyabje Lochen Rinpoche of the Key Monastery in Spiti, Tsechokling Rinpoche, and Regzin Dorjay. The petition reads, "It is with great concern that we, representing four monasteries and associations from the Himalayan region and the traditional seat of the Panchen Lama, the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery, make this joint appeal with following five points to the Foreign Governments, the United Nations, and the International Community:

We urge the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to pass a motion urging them to direct their ambassadors in China to meet with the 11th Panchen Lama and ascertain his whereabouts and wellbeing.

We urge the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to honor the 11th Panchen Lama with an award recognizing him as a victim of enforced disappearance for almost 29 years, and as someone who has been denied with his human rights, religious freedom, rights of a child and other fundamental rights of movement, residency and action.

In order to enable his early release and as a way to draw attention to his situation, we appeal the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to observe the birthday of the 11th Panchen Lama.

We also urge the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to actively call for the release of Chadrel Rinpoche, a lama of Tashi Lhunpo monastery who was the head of the search committee for the 11th Panchen Lama, as well as the very many Tibetan political prisoners. On account of the dire situation inside Tibet, more than 150 Tibetans have been resorting to acts of self-immolation, the latest being a 25-year-old Tibetan singer Tsewang Norbu and an 81-year-old Taphun in 2022. The self-immolators have sacrificed their most cherished life in order to draw the attention of the United Nations and the international community to the critical situation in Tibet. Therefore, we urge the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to respond positively to their plea.

The aspiration of the Tibetans in Tibet is for His Holiness the Dalai Lama to be able to return to Tibet at the earliest. Therefore, we strongly appeal to the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community to consider taking concrete initiatives to support His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration to enable the resolution of the Tibet-China conflict through the mutually beneficial Middle Way Approach.

The foreign governments, their citizens, the United Nations, and the international community have been consistently supporting the Tibetan people. So, we take this opportunity to express our sincere gratitude. This five-point joint appeal that we have presented today are in one way also connected to the holistic wellbeing of the several million believers and followers, and therefore, is connected to democratic rights of these many individuals.

We have firm hope that the foreign governments, the United Nations and the international community will consider the reality of the Tibetan situation, particularly on the issue of the Panchen Lama's enforced disappearance case, and consider our appeals positively."

Addressing the press meeting, Regzin Dorjay, Acting President of the Ladakh Buddhist Association, shared his comments on His Serenity the 11 Panchen Lama's plight and expressed dismay over the long disappearance of the latter after being recognised by His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He urged the Indian government to initiate dialogue with China concerning the whereabouts of the Panchen Lama and appealed to the United Nations to intervene in the situation. He added, "As a Buddhist leader, I highly doubt the Panchen Lama's current status, as no one has seen him since his disappearance. We must exert pressure on the Chinese government as this violates our human rights. It's a significant loss to the Buddhist community and sends a troubling message that the Panchen Lama remains missing after so many years”.

Following the address, the speakers answered questions from the media personnel from Tibetan and Indian news outlets assembled at the joint press meeting.

Statement of TPIE on the 35th Birthday of the 11th Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche Jetsun Tenzin
Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo

25 April 2024, CTA

Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel reading the Tibetan Parliament in Exile's statement on 35th Birthday of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Rinpoche. Photo / Tenzin Jigme Taydeh / CTA

Today marks the momentous occasion of the 35th birthday of the 11th Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche, Jetsun Tenzin Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo (Gedhun Choekyi Nyima). It is therefore a day of great importance to be observed with celebrations by all the Tibetan people, both inside and outside Tibet. However, this day has also become one of great sadness for the people of Tibet, as it has been decades since we last saw him or heard his teachings

Gedhun Choekyi Nyima was born on the 25th day of April in 1989, corresponding to the 19th day of the 3rd month in the Tibetan Earth-Serpent Year. His birth took place in Lhari Dzong, located in the Nagchu region of Tibet, to his father, Konchog Phuntsog, and mother, Dechen Choedon. The historical relationship between successive Dalai Lamas and successive Panchen Lamas has been uniquely characterized by mutual recognition of their reincarnations, with each often serving as either a teacher or a disciple to the other. In line with this unique historical bond between them, His Holiness the Dalai Lama assumed the responsibility with deep commitment to conduct comprehensive examinations of all the facts in the Panchen Lama reincarnation process for many years. This was done in strict adherence to Tibetan customs, traditions, as well as religious rituals and practices.

On the 15th day of the 3rd month in the Tibetan Wood-Hog Year, corresponding to May 14, 1995, His Holiness the great 14th Dalai Lama made an unmistakable recognition of the reincarnation of the 10th Panchen Lama. He bestowed upon him the name Tenzin Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo and composed a prayer for his spontaneous fulfilment of wishes. With this proclamation, His Holiness the Dalai Lama officially recognized him as the reincarnated 11th Panchen Rinpoche.

On May 17, 1995, the Chinese Communist Party government issued an announcement filled with wild and distorted narratives, attempting to argue that the proclamation made by His Holiness the Dalai Lama was illegal and, therefore, void. Furthermore, the Chinese Communist Party government forcibly abducted the six-year-old reincarnated Rinpoche Gedhun Choekyi Nyima along with his parents, other family members, and Chadrel Rinpoche, who served as the Chairman of the committee tasked with searching for the reincarnation of the 10th Panchen Rinpoche. It has now been 29 years since their disappearance.

The Chinese Communist Party, which staunchly opposes and disregards any religious faith, installed another boy in place of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima solely to serve their deceitful political agenda. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the Tibetan people both inside and outside Tibet, along with Buddhists worldwide, steadfastly believe that Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized by His Holiness the Dalai Lama, is the true reincarnation of the 10th Panchen Rinpoche. This conviction is unwavering—their faith in him remains unshakeable.

The 10th Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche, Jetsun Tenzin Trinley Jigme Choekyi Wangchug Pal Sangpo, was unwavering in his relentless commitment to the religious, political, and national causes of Tibet. On May 18, 1962, he courageously presented a seventy-thousand-character petition to Chinese Premier Zhao Enlai, detailing the atrocities suffered by the Tibetan people across their homeland. In reprisal for this appeal, the Chinese Communist Party subjected the revered Panchen Rinpoche to vicious struggle sessions and launched scathing criticisms against him. Consequently, he was imprisoned in Beijing for nearly 9 years and 10 months. Upon his release, the Panchen Rinpoche resumed his dedicated service to the religious, political, and national interests of the Tibetan people. In particular, he revitalized the preservation of the Tibetan language and script. The Tibetan people remain immensely grateful to the 10th Panchen Rinpoche for his remarkable contributions and accomplishments.

It has now been 29 years since the Communist Party of China abducted and made the 11th Panchen Rinpoche disappear at the age of six. This action by the Chinese government constitutes a grave violation of various provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. He remains, to this day, the world's youngest prisoner of conscience. For an entire year following his abduction on May 17, 1995, the Chinese Communist Party denied holding him. In May 1996, China finally admitted to holding the young boy 'under the protection of the government at the request of his parents.' However, the Chinese government has yet to grant any access to him—neither to governmental bodies, concerned organizations, nor non-governmental investigators—to ascertain whether he is even alive.

In fact, the Communist Party of China continues to flagrantly violate human rights and religious freedom in this matter.

Concerning the whereabouts and well-being of the 11th Panchen Rinpoche and his family, pressures have been exerted by various United Nations working groups, committees, and human rights officials. These include the UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, the Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Religion or Belief, the High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Committee against Torture, among others.

Despite these efforts, the Chinese government has kept on making efforts to avoid the issue by making unsubstantiated claims. Their responses have consistently been evasive, refusing to disclose any meaningful information, which strains credibility. As a result, we do not trust the claims made by the Chinese government and believe their actions violate international laws.

The United Nations Organization, governments, international organizations, members of parliaments, the global community of Tibet support groups, international human rights organizations, and individual lawmakers worldwide have tirelessly campaigned for the immediate release of the 11th Panchen Rinpoche from his custodial detention by the Communist Party of China.

Similarly, the Central Tibetan Administration, the exile-based Tashi Lhunpo Monastery, and Tibetan non-governmental organizations have repeatedly appealed to governments and parliaments worldwide, urging their support for the immediate release of the Panchen Rinpoche, his family members, and Chadrel Rinpoche.

In this context, the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile has also undertaken and will continue to undertake, international lobbying efforts, particularly for this cause, besides consistently voicing criticisms and issuing appeals to the Chinese government on numerous occasions through the adoption of official resolutions of solidarity in each session.

Remembering the debt of gratitude we owe to His Holiness the Dalai Lama for his great kindness in having undertaken the unmistakable recognition of the reincarnation of the Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche, we appeal to everyone concerned about this issue to consolidate their efforts with a reinforced sense of commitment. It is crucial to grasp the gravity of the situation in which the Panchen Rinpoche is living.

We also reiterate our call to the Chinese Communist Party government that it must be fully transparent in clearing all doubts regarding the true situation of the Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche and the members of his family.

We remain fervent in our prayers and supplication that the 11th Kunzig Panchen Rinpoche Jetsun Tenzin Gedhun Yeshe Trinley Phuntsok Pal Sangpo remains in sound health conditions; that he may swiftly be released from the captivity of the Communist Party of Chinese government; that the entire communities of the Tibetan people and Buddhist peoples may definitely realize the glorious visual blessings of his golden countenance; and that he may thereby be able to resume the role that he has inherited from his predecessors.

In conclusion, we wish and pray that His Holiness the Dalai Lama, the supreme leader of the Tibetan people, the refuge and protector of the sentient beings of all the three realms of existence but especially us the people of the Snowland of Tibet, may live for a hundred aeons; that all his altruistic wishes and desires may be seen fulfilled with spontaneity without any hindrance, and that the just cause of the Tibetan people may definitely be seen to prevail.

The Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile

25 April 2024

Statement of the Kashag on the Thirty-Fifth Birthday of His Serenity the Eleventh Panchen Rinpoche

25 April 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering reading the Kashag's statement on 35th Birthday of His Serenity the 11th Panchen Rinpoche. Photo / Tenzin Jigme Taydeh / CTA

Today, we are gathered here to mark the special occasion of the thirty-fifth birthday of His Eminence the eleventh Panchen Rinpoche, Tenzin Gendun Yeshe Thinley Phuntsok. On this special occasion, we fervently pray that His Eminence may soon be able to break the shackles of the Chinese government's illegal captivity to freedom and assume his rightful throne of the Tashi Lhunpo Monastery.

It is a day for us to engage in customary festivity to celebrate the Panchen Rinpoche's birthday. Sadly, the Panchen Rinpoche's whereabouts and that of his parents Kunchok Phuntsok and Dechen Choedon and Jadrel Jampa Trinley Rinpoche, who had been appointed chairman by the Chinese government's search committee, remain unknown after they were forcibly abducted by the Chinese authorities on the night of 17th May 1995, three days after His Holiness the Dalai Lama recognised him as the reincarnation of the Panchen Rinpoche.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Rinpoche, considered the sun and moon by the Tibetans, are the two foremost holders of the Gelug tradition of Tibetan Buddhism in history. Not only are they the highest-ranking masters of the Gelug tradition, but they have a long history of spiritual relationship in terms of recognising each other's successive reincarnations, bestowing ordination on and transmitting teachings to each other.

Born in Amdo around the same time as His Holiness the fourteenth Dalai Lama and after being recognised as the reincarnation of the Panchen Rinpoche by His Holiness, they met in 1952. They together visited China and India in 1954 and 1956 respectively. The turmoil in 1959 resulted in their separation, following which the Chinese government appointed Panchen Rinpoche as the deputy chairman of the so-called Preparatory Committee for the Autonomous Region of Tibet. The Panchen Rinpoche had witnessed the atrocious land and democratic reforms, so-called "pacification" of the rebellion, destruction of monasteries, forced disrobing of monks and nuns, the massacre, imprisonment, and torture of hundreds of thousands of Tibetans, and the untimely death of many Tibetans, which brought hell on earth to Tibet. Despite the insistence of his tutor Ngulchu Rinpoche, Ngabo, Geshe Sherab Gyatso, and others, Panchen Rinpoche submitted the 70,000-character petition to the Chinese Prime Minister. As a result, he suffered immeasurable suffering in the Chinese prison for more than 14 years. Following his release from incarceration, with unshaken determination, he tirelessly advocated for the education of Tibetans, the promotion and preservation of Tibetan Buddhism and the rights of the Tibetan people.

On the Tenth death anniversary of the 10th Panchen Rinpoche in 1999, His Holiness the Dalai Lama said, "Panchen Rinpoche has been a hero who has sacrificed his life for the cause of the Tibetan people's culture and freedom, despite threat to his life, and especially for the teachings of Lama Tsongkhapa. This is indisputably well known. We can see it clearly from his 70,000-character petition. In this way, he is an extraordinary person whose aspirations have ripened in time."

"When Panchen Rinpoche was alive, I could think he would do whatever he could to help Tibet. After the Panchen Rinpoche's death, whenever there was a crisis in Tibet, I would think that it was terrible to think that Panchen Rinpoche was not there. If Panchen Rinpoche were here, I would think he would do everything possible."

On 14th May 1995, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, following the traditional Tibetan Buddhist rituals and tests, announced the unmistakable reincarnation of the tenth Panchen Rinpoche. However, three days later, the Chinese government abducted him along with his parents and since then 29 years passed and their whereabouts remain unknown.

Since 1995, the case of the enforced disappearance of the 10th Panchen Rinpoche has been consistently discussed in the UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, UN Human Rights Commission's Special Investigation Group on Forced Disappearances, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, Special Rapporteur on freedom of Religion or Belief, UN Convention Against Torture, and other committees. Likewise, Members of Parliaments and Governments in the United States, Lithuania, Germany, Czech Republic, Canada, Slovakia, India, Italy, Belgium, Japan, Switzerland, Taiwan, the European Union, United Kingdom, South Africa, Australia, Chile, and Spain among others have expressed their serious concern about the situation of the Panchen Lama and have called for his immediate release.

The Chinese government has not responded clearly to questions about the whereabouts of Panchen Rinpoche raised by the United Nations and the international community. In 2015, the Chinese government's spokesperson claimed that the Panchen Rinpoche is receiving education like other children and that he does not want to be disturbed by anyone. The report from a five-member UN human rights experts in their meeting with the Chinese government on 2nd June 2020, the Chinese government claimed that Panchen Rinpoche received free compulsory education when he was a child, passed the college entrance examination and now has a job. Similarly, on being questioned on Panchen Rinpoche during the 45th session of the UN Human Rights Council held on 22nd September 2020, the Chinese government's representative said the Gendun Choekyi Nyima is a common Chinese citizen and not the reincarnation of Panchen Rinpoche.

The Central Tibetan Administration has persistently called for the immediate release of Panchen Rinpoche through resolutions passed in the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile and in statements of the Kashag. The offices of Tibet carried out various campaigns to garner support from the international community. Similarly, non-government organisations such as the International Campaign for Tibet and Tibet Support Groups worldwide have initiated numerous advocacy campaigns. The Tashi Lhunpo Monastery has unceasingly carried out campaigns for the release of Panchen Rinpoche. On the occasion of the 33rd birthday of Panchen Rinpoche in 2022, Venerable Zeekgyab Rinpoche, Abbot of Tashi Lhunpo Monastery along with Sikyong met with Nancy Pelosi, the then Speaker of the US Congress and Uzra Zeya, the US Special Coordinator for the Tibetan Issues. They also participated in a testimony in the Canadian Parliament on 5th May. With the coordination with the offices of Tibet, Ven. Zeekgyab Rinpoche carried out advocacy campaigns in Belgium and England, among others. Sadly, the Chinese government has paid no heed to the genuine concern and appeal of the international community and the Tibetans in exile.

Our most pressing concern is whether the Panchen Rinpoche is still alive or not. If he is presumed to be alive, had he been brought up with his parents from the age of six up till now for the last 29 years? Or had he been kept in a remote environment to become someone who can't speak even in Tibetan? How much the people around him might have abused and tortured him, just as the Chinese communist red guards subjected the 10th Panchen Rinpoche through struggle session? Has he been confined within the high walls of a Chinese prison with no communication with the outside world? Or had he been kept in solitary confinement with no sight of the sunlight, just as the 10th Panchen Rinpoche? Was he being tortured by the Chinese government with cold and hunger in a place battered with blizzard? Or is he being forced to work as a slave in a labor camp? Is the Panchen Lama, who has reached his prime age really living a healthy life?

These are the vital questions which remained unanswered?

The Chinese government has brazenly violated fundamental human rights and freedoms of Panchen Rinpoche recognised by His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Moreover, it alleges that the appeals made by Tibetans in exile and the international community to restore his fundamental human rights and freedoms are disturbing him. Such tactics to hoodwink the international community is untenable. The underlying philosophy of the reincarnation system is that one must accept the concept of rebirth. The purpose of the appearance of a reincarnation is to continue the predecessor's unfinished work. Therefore, respecting the international law, human dignity, aspirations of millions of followers of Tibetan Buddhism and their national laws, the Chinese authorities should immediately allow an independent fact-finding commission access to Panchen Rinpoche, who should be given his basic human rights.

Giving free rein to those regimes that brazenly violate international law and human rights is tantamount to neglecting the foundation of peace and justice in the world. Therefore, we appeal to all free democratic governments to take effective measures to secure the immediate release of Panchen Rinpoche. We call on the human rights organisations and supporters of the Tibetan cause to take all possible steps to appeal to their governments.

Taking this opportunity, the Kashag would like to urge Gyaltsen Norbu, who was appointed by the Chinese government, being a Tibetan and someone who had the opportunity to study Tibetan Buddhism, should not become a political tool of the Chinese government's sinister motives. Instead, he must recognise the unprecedented danger threatening the survival of the Tibetan people and Tibetan Buddhism, and fearlessly undertaken his responsibility and not commit any act that would hurt the Tibetans and Tibet's spiritual and political cause.

Finally, we pray for the long life of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the immediate release of His Eminence the eleventh Panchen Rinpoche Tenzin Gendun. May the two be reunited soon!

Penpa Tsering

Sikyong

25 April 2024

Tibetans from Europe find China's visa-free policy not so free

25 April 2024, RFA

Four ethnic Tibetan travelers with EU passports say they were questioned for hours upon arrival in China – and two were ultimately deported – despite Beijing's visa-free policy for citizens of several European countries for visits of up to 15 days.

Belgian citizen Thubten Gyatso, who was traveling to meet family in Qinghai province via Shanghai in early April, said authorities detained him and his 6-year-old son for about 18 hours at Shanghai's Pudong International Airport, where at least six Chinese officials took turns grilling him in a small room.

"During the 18 hours, we were provided with only one meal, along with water and a few biscuits," said

Gyatso, adding that he and his son could not leave the room except to use the restroom, during which they were escorted by two policemen, he said.

When authorities searched Gyatso's belongings and his mobile phone, they found pictures of the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan flag – both banned in the Tibetan Autonomous Region.

Gyatso explained to them that the leader of Tibetan Buddhism – whom Beijing views as a separatist – is a “global leader, universally respected, with numerous images freely available online.”

“My reverence for His Holiness transcends boundaries, and if the Chinese authorities prohibit my entry into Tibet due to these images, I accept it without regret,” he said.

Authorities also questioned Gyatso about his escape from Tibet to India in 1994, his move to Belgium and his citizenship status there, and details about family members' professions, he said.

After 18 hours, the officials told him that he would not be allowed to return to his hometown because of the photo of the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan national flag, Gyatso said.

They then made Gyatso and his son board a plane at 1 a.m. on April 4 to London, where he is currently based.

Attempt to boost tourism

In an apparent effort to increase tourism and foreign investment, China has allowed visa-free entry to travelers from five European countries – Germany, France, Italy, Spain and the Netherlands – for business, tourism, family visits and transit for up to 15 days until Nov. 30, 2024

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs later expanded the policy to citizens of Belgium, Austria, Switzerland, Ireland, Hungary and Luxembourg.

In return, the Chinese government hopes more countries will facilitate visas for Chinese citizens and work with Beijing on networks for faster cross-border travel and the speedy resumption of international passenger flights, according to a March statement by the ministry, citing Foreign Minister Wang Yi.

“This will make it more convenient for Chinese citizens to travel abroad, and make foreign friends feel at home in China,” it said.

But that doesn't seem to apply to European citizens of Tibetan ethnicity.

In March, A French citizen with family in the Tibetan Autonomous Region was denied entry into Tibet and told to redirect his travel to Chengdu to where his family members would have to travel to meet him.

Some Tibetans from Europe have been able to travel to their hometowns to meet relatives, though their families have reported similar accounts of heightened scrutiny owing to their Tibetan background.

In March, authorities at Shanghai's Pudong International Airport interrogated a Tibetan with German citizenship for six hours before letting him travel onward to visit his family in Tsolho Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai province.

“Despite conducting a thorough search of my phone, other tech gadgets and luggage, authorities did not find any photos of the Dalai Lama, so they allowed me to travel to my hometown in Amdo,” he said, referring to one of the three traditional Tibetan regions. The man spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal by Chinese authorities.

But upon his arrival in Qinghai province, police subjected him to further interrogation, he added.

Translated by Tenzin Palmo and Tenzin Dickyi for RFA Tibetan. Edited by Tenzin Pema for RFA Tibetan, and by Roseanne Gerin and Malcolm Foster.

Genocidal China condemned for catena of Tibet violations in US annual rights report

24 April 2024, Tibetan Review

While highlighting China's continued genocidal crimes against the predominantly Uyghur Muslims and others in East Turkestan (Xinjiang), the US State Department's 2023 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, released Apr 22, also cited a long list of human rights abuses against the Tibetan people enduring Chinese rule. The report underscores the need to resolve Tibet's status, said Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) Apr 23. China has condemned the report, accusing the US of slandering it.

The report shows that China violated Tibetans' human rights on a massive scale last year. These included torture, arbitrary arrest and detention, censorship, transnational repression, restrictions on religious freedom, denial of democratic elections and much more, said ICT.

The catena of violations highlighted by the report, ICT said, included the following:

- Forcing Tibetan Buddhist monks to sign documents denouncing the Dalai Lama, their exiled spiritual leader
- Disappearing and torturing Tibetan political prisoners
- Requiring job applicants to “align ideologically, politically, and in action with the [Chinese Communist Party] Central Committee”
- Severely restricting Tibetans' travel and freedom of movement
- Harassing and denying opportunities to the families of Tibetan self-immolators
- Depriving Tibetans of internet freedom, freedom of the press, the right to peacefully assemble and the right to change their government through free and fair elections
- Requiring monasteries to incorporate CCP members into their administrative systems. These members were tasked with overseeing various aspects, including monastic admissions, education, security and finances

– Criminalizing speech as spreading information “damaging to ethnic unity,” “subverting state power,” “undermining national unity” and “damaging the honor and interests of the state.”

Besides, the report shows “that China is severely violating the human rights of the Tibetan people all across the globe,” according to ICT President Tencho Gyatso. “Even inside the United States, China is discriminating against Tibetan Americans. In Tibet, China’s abuses are shocking.”

The report was released by Secretary of Antony Blinken ahead of his Apr 24-26 travel to China.

China condemned the report, calling it politically biased and ideological prejudiced. The human rights situation in China is best judged by the Chinese people, its official globaltimes.cn Apr 23 cited Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin as saying during his press briefing on Apr 23.

The US, despite having multiple affairs to cooperate and coordinate with China, is slandering the country simultaneously, the report claimed.

On the other hand, ICT says the report vindicates the ongoing move for the final passage of the Resolve Tibet Act bill which now awaits full Senate vote before it could be signed into law by President Joe Biden. The bill rejects China’s claim that the historically and ethnographically defined Tibet has been part of China since ancient times; that its legal status therefore needs to be resolved through negotiations with the Dalai Lama, Tibet’s exiled spiritual leader, and the democratically elected Tibetan leadership; and that the US should actively involve itself to help realize such a settlement.

State Department reports show need to resolve Tibet

23 April 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

New reports from the US State Department identify a long list of Chinese government human rights abuses against the Tibetan people, underscoring the need to resolve Tibet’s status, the International Campaign for Tibet said today.

“These reports show that China is severely violating the human rights of the Tibetan people all across the globe,” ICT President Tencho Gyatso said. “Even inside the United States, China is discriminating against Tibetan Americans. In Tibet, China’s abuses are shocking.

“With Secretary Blinken traveling to China this week, we once again call on him to raise Tibet both privately and publicly during his trip. That includes reiterating to Chinese leaders that they must take part in dialogue with Tibetan officials to resolve Tibet’s status. China’s human rights abuses against the Tibetan people cannot continue, and its occupation of Tibet must come to a peaceful end.”

The State Department released the 2023 Country Reports on Human Rights Practices yesterday, April 22, 2024.

Human rights violations in Tibet

The reports show that China violated Tibetans’ human rights on a massive scale last year.

The violations included torture, arbitrary arrest and detention, censorship, transnational repression, restrictions on religious freedom, denial of democratic elections and much more.

A few of China’s abuses listed in the report are:

Forcing Tibetan Buddhist monks to sign documents denouncing the Dalai Lama, their exiled spiritual leader

Disappearing and torturing Tibetan political prisoners

Requiring job applicants to “align ideologically, politically, and in action with the [Chinese Communist Party] Central Committee”

Severely restricting Tibetans’ travel and freedom of movement

Harassing and denying opportunities to the families of Tibetan self-immolators

Depriving Tibetans of internet freedom, freedom of the press, the right to peacefully assemble and the right to change their government through free and fair elections

Requiring monasteries to incorporate CCP members into their administrative systems. These members were tasked with overseeing various aspects, including monastic admissions, education, security and finances

Criminalizing speech as spreading information “damaging to ethnic unity,” “subverting state power,” “undermining national unity” and “damaging the honor and interests of the state”

In addition, no international NGOs were reported to be active last year in the Tibet Autonomous Region, which spans less than half of Tibet. Government officials showed little cooperation or responsiveness to the perspectives of Tibetan or foreign human rights organizations.

The reports note that ICT expressed concerns over China reportedly collecting DNA from about 1 million residents of the Tibet Autonomous Region, as well as about Chinese authorities withholding household registrations from some Tibetans who traveled abroad, particularly those who went to India, the exile home of the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration.

Resolving Tibet's status

The reports arrive on the back of the US Senate Foreign Relations committee voting to approve the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act on April 16.

Known as the Resolve Tibet Act, the bipartisan bill will strengthen US efforts to get China back to the negotiating table with Tibetan leaders for the first time since 2010 to resolve Tibet's status. The bill will also combat China's disinformation about Tibet.

China has occupied Tibet for over 65 years, forcing the Dalai Lama to escape into exile in 1959. Under China's iron rule, Tibet now has a total global freedom score of zero, according to the watchdog group Freedom House.

The Resolve Tibet Act can now move to the Senate floor for a vote. It already passed the House in February.

Earlier this year, members of the House also introduced a bipartisan resolution reaffirming support for Tibetans' human rights—including their right to self-determination—and condemning China's mass arrest of Tibetans who protested a destructive hydropower dam project in Derge (Chinese: Dege) county in eastern Tibet.

Blinken's trip

The reports also come as Secretary Blinken prepares to travel to China April 24-26.

Blinken's trip will overlap with the 35th birthday of the Panchen Lama, the Tibetan Buddhist leader whose ongoing disappearance by the Chinese government is mentioned in the reports.

ICT calls on Blinken to raise the issue of Tibet during his meetings with Chinese leaders, as well as publicly in front of the press.

The topics for Blinken to discuss include China's disappearance of the Panchen Lama; its attempts to interfere in the succession of the Dalai Lama; and its responsibility to resume negotiations with Tibetan leaders.

The Tibet Support Group of the Riigikogu will pay a visit to the Dalai Lama

24 April 2024, Riigikogu

The delegation of the Tibet Support Group of the Riigikogu (Parliament of Estonia) will meet with Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatso, the Tibetan Government-in-Exile and the community of Tibetans in exile in Dharhamsala, India.

"The Tibet Support Group in this Riigikogu is the largest of all time, and it has altogether 16 members," Chairman of the Tibet Support Group Juku-Kalle Raid said. "It is understandable because the situation with the native language, education, politics, human rights and freedoms in occupied Tibet is extremely complicated and is becoming more and more grim every day. The cooperation between China and Russia in oppressing other nations has been gathering wind beneath its wings, Iran's actions can be added to this, and of course all this is being noticed," Raid explained.

"The programme is busy and quite likely we will get a closer look at what China has been doing in occupied Tibet," Raid said, and added that the delegation of the Riigikogu planned to meet with the Head and the ministers of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile and to visit the Tibetan parliament.

Besides the Chairman of the Tibet Support Group, the delegation also includes members of the Support Group Tarmo Tamm and Henn Põlluaas, as well as representatives of the Estonian Institute of Human Rights and the Tibetan Institute, and Estonian journalists.

The 14th Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatso has visited Estonia three times, in 1991, 2001 and 2011. He was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989 for his peaceful struggle for the liberation of Tibet. He has published dozens of books about the Tibetan Buddhism, several of which have been translated into Estonian. The Dalai Lama is a title that was bestowed to Sönam Gyatso, the Head Lama of the Gelugpa school of Buddhism, by ruler of the Mongols Altan Khan in 1578. After the People's Republic of China occupied Tibet in the 1950s, the 14th Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatso went into exile in India in 1959 and founded the Tibetan Government-in-Exile in Dharamsala.

Massive Chinese Cyber Espionage of Tibetan Diaspora Revealed

24 April 2024, Bitter Winter

Documents leaked from private company i-Soon reveal constant attacks against emails and mobile phones of exiles from Tibet, including the Dalai Lama

We all knew that Chinese intelligence agencies keep the Tibetan and Uyghur diasporas under surveillance and harass them in many different ways. However, a data leak from the private company Shanghai Anxun Information Technology Co., Ltd. (i-Soon), which occurred on February 18, 2024, probably thanks to an anonymous whistleblower within the corporation, revealed that cyber surveillance has now escalated to a higher and much more dangerous level.

On April 18, the specialized research network Turquoise Roof released a detailed report analyzing the leaked i-Soon data, which mentions Uyghur targets but focuses on Tibetans. The leaked data reveal that among the main clients of i-Soon are "the Chinese police, the People's Liberation Army, the Ministry of State Security, and the Tibetan regional authorities based in Lhasa."

The i-Soon company supports a Chinese intelligence project known as "Poison Carp," which has targeted since 2018 the mobile phones of Tibetans and Uyghurs in exile, including the Dalai Lama himself. The data reveal that in recent years the technology supplied by i-Soon has achieved a much higher level of sophistication. Some of the vulnerabilities in cell phones operating in India and elsewhere that i-Soon exploited were previously unknown to Western experts.

In addition, i-Soon technology was used to spy on commercial email used by thousands of Tibetans abroad. It can be safely assumed that whenever Tibetans in the diaspora, including the highest figures in the Central Tibetan Administration, use non-encrypted email, their messages are known to and analyzed by the Chinese intelligence.

The data also evidenced that i-Soon technology was used to spy on pro-democracy activists in Hong Kong and even on entering the private mailboxes and cell phones of foreign officials, including some working for the police of independent Mongolia and for India's customs agencies.

Experts warn that Chinese cyber espionage technology appears to be much more advanced than Western intelligence had previously assumed. The i-Soon company was believed to be a comparatively minor player and its technology was not properly analyzed before the February 2024 leak.

Other opponents of China may also safely assume that their cell phones and non-encrypted emails are regular targets of Chinese espionage.

Chinese government tries to destroy Buddhism, but Chinese people show interest in it

22 April 2024, The Tibet Post

His Holiness the Dalai Lama gives a teaching to Mongolians, Tibetans and people from all over the world in Dharamshala on Friday. His Holiness said: "The Chinese Communists have tried to destroy Buddhism, but many other people in China are showing an interest in Buddhism. Bodhichitta is very precious. It brings peace of mind. It is a powerful way of serving others."

His Holiness the Dalai Lama begins the first day of the two-day teachings on "100 Deities of Tushita Heaven" at the request of Lamiin Gegeen Teaching Mongol Sunchoi Organising Committee and estimated 6100 of Buddhists and well-wishers from 72 countries gathered to listen his teaching, at Tibetan Main Temple (Thekchen Choeling Tsuglakhang) in Dharamshala, HP, India on April 19, 2024.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama begins his speech by saying, "Today, we have an opportunity to hold a discourse on the Dharma. When I look back, I have tried to preserve the Dharma traditions that flourished in Tibet. I have spoken up to protect the environment, to secure peace in the world and to encourage inter-religious harmony."

"Those of us gathered here are all followers of the same Buddha. We uphold the Nalanda Tradition, the complete teaching of the Buddha, which we kept alive in Tibet, Mongolia and the Himalayan regions. I have had dreams that clearly indicate I am an incarnation of King Trisong Detsen and I have done my best to preserve the tradition established under his direction. I would like to thank all of you for the trust you have placed in me," the spiritual leader of Tibet told the gathering.

His Holiness addressed the congregation on the second day of the teaching and said, "Today, we have here Tibetan and Mongolian Buddhists, as well as people from elsewhere who are interested in learning about Buddhist teachings. They are attracted by their discovery that Buddhism is based on reason and has a bearing on peace of mind as well as peace in the world."

"We Tibetans here are living in exile because we lost our country. But where we are doesn't matter that much because we rely on the Nalanda Tradition that the great Indian master Shantarakshita established in Tibet at the invitation of King Trisong Detsen. This tradition has spread all over Tibet and the Himalayan region. Conditions may change but we have a custom of responding to each other warm-heartedly. This is something worth preserving," the Tibetan spiritual leader said.

"Tibetans in Tibet continue to wish to follow the tradition introduced by Shantarakshita, and they place their trust in me. Not only in Tibet, but also in mainland China, growing numbers of people are taking an interest in Tibetan Buddhism and its essence—warmheartedness. Tibetan Buddhism includes a thorough understanding of the workings of the mind and emotions, which interests scientists. Other people are keen to know more about training the mind and tackling their emotions," His Holiness explained.

"My Dharma friends, it is good to remember that we are able to study and practice now due to the traditions passed down by past masters. The Chinese Communists have tried to destroy Buddhism, but many other people in China are showing an interest in Buddhism. We Tibetans need to think carefully about the significance of sharing what we know of the Buddha's teachings with interested Chinese," the spiritual leader told the gathering.

He declared: "Bodhichitta is very precious. It brings peace of mind. It is a powerful way of serving others. There is the Seven-fold Cause and Effect method and the more powerful Equalizing and Exchanging Self and Others approach. Taking account of all sentient beings and cultivating the mind that cherishes others more than oneself is powerfully transformative. It brings confidence and peace."

"Like us, all human beings wish to be happy. We are the same. That's why we need to be warm-hearted to everyone. Cherishing others is the source of all good qualities. Cherishing only ourselves is a source of misery. We survive due to the kindness of others, therefore, showing kindness and good heartedness are the simple key to happiness," His Holiness concluded.

Why a Tibetan lama visiting Bhutan is significant

21 April 2024, First Post

A few years ago, during a visit to Drukyl, the Land of the Dragon, as Bhutan is locally known, I had the occasion to meet a group of Bhutanese scholars and historians belonging to a local think tank. During the course of the discussion, the term "our northern neighbour" kept coming up in the conversation.

As I was wondering why the Bhutanese were not naming China, I asked an Indian friend accompanying me, "Why does nobody name China?" My friend explained that as a 'small' (by size at least) country, Drukyl does not like even to pronounce the name of its northern neighbour.

A formula used by the 13th Dalai Lama as he was chased out of his country by a Chinese warlord in 1910 returned to my mind: "The big insect always eats small insects."

In the past, Tibet played the role of 'big insect' for Bhutan, the southern neighbour.

Until very recently, Thimphu has been extremely wary of the Tibetans; for example, the Dalai Lama has never been permitted to visit the Land of Dragon, even 65 years after he took refuge in India.

The recent visit to Bhutan by one of the highest Tibetan lamas should be seen in this background.

Sakya Trichen Known as His Holiness Kyabgon Gongma Trichen Rinpoche, the respected lama, served as the 41st head (Trizin) of the Sakya School of Tibetan Buddhism from 1951 until March 2017, when he handed over his responsibilities as throneholder to a successor.

His biography says: "His Holiness Sakya Trichen [former throne-holder] is renowned throughout the world for the brilliance and clarity of his teachings and his fluency and precise command of English.

Receiving teachings directly from His Holiness carries a special lineage of blessings from the founders of the Sakya Order as well as from Manjushri himself."

It speaks of an unbroken lineage dating back to 1073 AD: "Since this celestial race descended upon earth over one thousand years ago, the lineage remains unbroken to this day. Many illustrious masters and practitioners have appeared in the lineage, including the Five Great Masters of the Sakya Order."

Sakya Trichen is a member of the Khon noble family, which founded the Sakya School in the eleventh century and ruled over Tibet for centuries. The present Sakya Trichen is said to be a manifestation of Manjusri, the Buddha of transcendent wisdom.

First relocated in Darjeeling in 1959, the Lama soon shifted to Rajpur, near Dehradun, from where he reestablished the Sakya monastery and preserved his lineage's tradition.

The Visit

Sakya Trichen left India for his inaugural visit to Bhutan on April 9 this year. As he arrived at the Paro Airport, he was received by Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Rinpoche, one of his foremost disciples, who apparently organised the visit.

Incidentally, Khyentse is not only a renowned religious teacher but also a filmmaker (he directed the hugely successful "The Cup"), a photographer, and a football fan. Khyentse was born in 1961 into a 'hard-core Buddhist family' in the 'staunchly Buddhist country' of Bhutan.

At the age of seven, he was recognised by the same Sakya Trichen as the main incarnation of the unrivaled Dzongsar Jamyang Khyentse Chökyi Lodrö, the spiritual heir of one of the most influential and admired 19th century 'Rime' (non-sectarian) traditions of Tibetan Buddhism; his biographer says: "At a time when sectarianism threatened to decimate the Tibetan Buddhist tradition, in a unique collaboration with Jamgon Kongtrul Lodrö Taye and Chogyur Lingpa, Khyentse Wangpo was responsible for initiating and promoting 'Rime' throughout the Land of Snow, effectively breathing new life into all schools of Buddhism, and rescuing many lineages from complete extinction."

Sakya Trichen in Bhutan

On April 11 this year, Sakya Trichen emphasised the importance of devotion to Guru Rinpoche (also known as Padmasambhava) in today's world.

The next day, he met Dzongsar Khyentse and other Bhutanese Rinpoches.

Most impressive was the grand procession in Bumthang on April 13, where tens of thousands of devotees gathered to receive the teachings and blessings of the 78-year-old lama. Sakya Trichen took the opportunity to bestow a number of oral transmissions and empowerments on the local population.

On April 15, he had an audience with the King and Queen of Bhutan and some of the members of the royal family, during which the Tibetan lama was accompanied by his wife, Dagmo Tashi Lhakyi Sakya.

Interestingly, on the following day, he met the Lopens of the 'Zhung Dratshang', or Central Monk Body of the Drukpa Kagyu tradition established in 1620 by Shabdrung Ngawang Tenzin Namgyel, the Founder of the Bhutanese State, who unified the country, codified the laws, and set up the dual system of governance (religious and secular).

In 1637, the Sangha moved to Punakha Dzong, which still today continues to serve as the winter headquarters of the 'Zhung Dratshang', representing more than 7,000 monks, nuns, and 'gomchens' (meditators). According to the Constitution of Bhutan, the Zhung Dratshang is an autonomous institution financed by an annual grant from the Royal Government.

The Tibetan Rinpoche had the occasion to mention the long cordial relations between the Zhung Dratshang and the Sakya lineage since the 17th century.

Why the Visit is Important

There is no doubt that the visit, though not covered by the world media, has important religious as well as political implications.

First, it showcased that despite the differences, the cultural bondage between Tibet and Bhutan remains strong; it also demonstrates the spiritual reverence for a non-Bhutanese respected lama; let us remember that Sakya Trichen belongs to a different school than the main stream Drukpa Kagyu in Bhutan.

In his speeches, the Tibetan lama lauded time and again Bhutan's spiritual atmosphere; he was happy to visit the ancient 'gompas' and enjoyed meeting the common people as well as the religious leaders of the country. He was all praise for the royal family, particularly the "Dharma Raja", the present king (the fifth of the Wangchuk dynasty), whose role was stressed time and again as pivotal to the nation's progress.

Religiously, the Sakya lama stressed Guru Rinpoche's significance; he asked the Bhutanese to pray for the Tantric master of Swat, who strengthened Buddhism in the 8th century in Tibet, and visited several places in Bhutan during his spiritual peregrinations. For the lama, Bhutan, with its ethos of Gross National Happiness, encapsulates a harmonious blend of cultural development, spiritual atmosphere, and aspiration for global peace.

The visit of Sakya Trichen to the famous Paro Taktsang, or 'Tiger's Nest', a monastery built on a cliff wall about 900 metres above Paro valley, is significant in this context as the monastery is built around a cave where Padmasambhava is said to have meditated. The sage is said to have flown there from Tibet on the back of Yeshe Tsogyal, his consort, whom he had, for the purpose, transformed into a flying tigress.

Political Significance

But the visit also has political significance, at a time when the 'northern neighbour' repeatedly intrudes into Bhutanese territory to bully Thimphu; the visit of the Indian Prime Minister Modi in April was probably linked to this, particularly the fact that Beijing is trying to force a border agreement on Bhutan. Could a Tibetan lama siding with its former 'southern neighbour' make Beijing think twice? Not sure.

One should remember that relations have not always been cordial between the Tibetans and the Bhutanese.

On April 5, 1964, Jigme Dorji, then Bhutanese Prime Minister, was assassinated by some Bhutanese officers.

Three days after the murder, the alleged assassin, Zambay, was arrested; he apparently confessed that Bhutan's deputy commander-in-chief, Brigadier Namgyal Bahadur, had ordered him to kill the Prime Minister.

The then King Jigme Dorji Wangchuk was away in Switzerland; he returned hurriedly, but rumours had already circulated that Yankie, the Tibetan mistress of the King, was involved, being jealous of the power of the Dorji family.

Eventually, a total of 39 army officers, including Brigadier Bahadur, were arrested, and the brigadier was executed by a firing squad on May 17, 1964. Zambay was put to death on July 4, 1964.

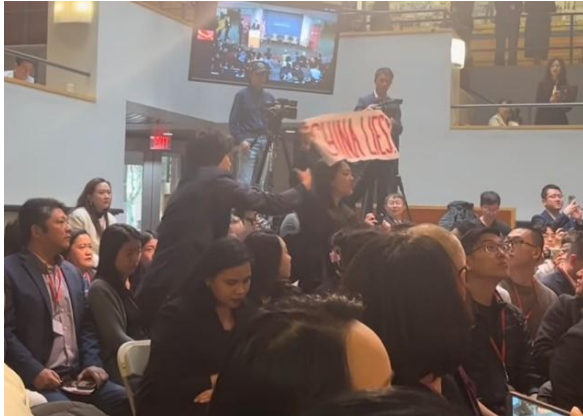

Referring to local reports, the Bhutanese court that convicted Brigadier Bahadur noted: "There is no evidence at all that any foreign power was in any way involved... The full and entire responsibility for this plot belongs to these accused and only to them." Though Yankie was exonerated, mistrust continued to persist.

One could mention many such incidents, showing that the suspicion between the Bhutanese and the Tibetans has continued. With this background, the visit of the Sakya Lama is a most welcome change, and it could be a powerful message to China that 'divide and rule' between traditional neighbours cannot be exploited forever.

Will the visit of the Sakya Trichen be followed by a trip by the Dalai Lama to the Land of the Dragon? It is too early to say, but it would be interesting.

Chinese Ambassador's address at Harvard disrupted by student activists

21 April 2024, Phayul

Screen grab of a Taiwanese student activist denouncing Ambassador Xie at the event in Harvard University.

A group of student activists representing organisations like Students for a Free Tibet and the Coalition of Students Resisting the CCP disrupted an address by the Chinese Ambassador to the United States, Xie Feng, at Harvard University on Saturday. The student activists voiced their strong opposition to Ambassador Xie's involvement in the erosion of freedom in Hong Kong, the suppression of democracy, support for genocide in Tibet and East Turkestan, and advocacy for military action against Taiwan.

In a widely circulated video, a female Taiwanese student activist from Harvard is seen denouncing Ambassador Xie's complicity in tarnishing Hong Kong's freedoms and democracy, extending to similar intentions in her native Taiwan. "Xie Feng, you come to paint your delusion of a "prosperous China" when your hands are painted with blood. You robbed the Hong Kongers of fundamental freedoms and devastated their democracy. Now in my country, Taiwan, you sought to do the same."

Another female Tibetan student activist in the same video decried China's policies, asserting, "China lies, people die. 80% of Tibetan children are forced into larger colonial-style boarding schools which are aimed at destroying my Tibetan people's existence. Shame on Xie Feng. Free Tibet. Free East Turkestan. You have blood on your hands. Guilty of genocide. Shame on Xie Feng."

In another widely circulated video, a male Tibetan student activist named Topjor is seen holding the Tibetan national flag and shouting, "Free Tibet. How can you be here when the Chinese government is in direct contravention of every human rights law in the world? You are a representative of a government that advocates for genocide. The genocide of the Tibetan people, of the Uyghur people, the occupation of Hong Kong. You are a travesty. You do not deserve to be here. This is a free country. You cannot project your transnational repression in this country, in this continent. You are a shame, a stain on this institution. Shame on you Xie Feng. Shame on China."

Furthermore, the two female Harvard student activists, who were expelled from the event expressed, "We just got kicked out of our own university. Right now, Xie Feng, the Chinese Ambassador to the United States is inside giving a propaganda speech. We Harvard students went in to tell him that we will not give him this undeserved platform. Xie Feng is spinning bloody, bloody lies touting the "good China story."

In response to Ambassador Xie's address at Harvard University, Students for a Free Tibet issued a statement, asserting, "Ambassador Xie Feng's job is to spread propaganda about China and the CCP, but today the truth was louder. These student activists sent a strong message that advocates of genocide are to be welcome on our campuses and the presence of the CCP on campus is a stain on the institution."

G7 foreign ministers express concern over China's human rights violations in Xinjiang, Tibet

20 April 2024, Indian Narrative

The G7 foreign ministers on Friday reiterated the importance of peace in the Taiwan Strait and expressed their concern over the human rights violations in Xinjiang and Tibet by Chinese authorities, Taiwan News reported citing a joint statement issued on Friday.

Regional peace and stability are "indispensable to security and prosperity for the whole international community," the ministers said, calling for a peaceful resolution of cross-strait issues.

They also reaffirmed their support for Taiwan's inclusion in international organisations, such as the World Health Assembly and World Health Organisation technical meetings. There is no change in the basic position of the G7 members on Taiwan, they added.

The ministers expressed concern about China's human rights violations in Xinjiang and Tibet and pointed out the "deterioration of pluralism" in Hong Kong. They also urged China to stop activities undermining democratic institutions and the security of communities.

The joint statement follows US Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Daniel Kritenbrink's meeting with China's Taiwan Affairs Office Deputy Director Qiu Kaiming in Beijing on April 15.

Accompanied by US National Security Council Senior Director for China and Taiwan Affairs Sarah Beran, Krittenbrink stressed the importance of peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait.

He also assured Beijing there was no change to the US "one China" policy, Taiwan News reported.

Despite calls from the international community for regional peace, China has continued to ramp up military activity around Taiwan. The threat of a potential invasion of Taiwan has prompted the US to help beef up Taiwanese defence.

Most recently, US House Speaker Mike Johnson proposed the 2024 Indo-Pacific Security Supplemental Appropriations Act on April 17 that allocates USD 2 billion (NTD 65.07 billion) from the Foreign Military Financing Program for Taiwan and other regional security partners for "confronting Chinese aggression." It also provides an additional USD 1.9 billion to "replenish defence articles and defence services" for Taiwan and other partners.

US 'repatriates' lost Tibetan Buddhist relics to China

19 April 2024, Tibetan Review

The United States has on Apr 17 delivered 38 cultural relics to China as part of a repatriation deal to help Beijing retrieve artifacts that have been lost throughout the centuries. However, what is disconcerting about this "repatriation" is that "the prized haul primarily comprises Tibetan Buddhist objects spanning from the Yuan Dynasty (1271-1368) to the Qing Dynasty (1644 -1911)" as reported by China's official news.cgtn.com Apr 19.

The repatriation is part of a 2009 MOU between China and the US relating to the illegal importation of Chinese cultural property, so it is obviously based on the US recognition of Tibet being part of China which illegally annexed the Himalayan country in 1951.

The repatriation of the relics was made to Chinese officials on Apr 17 at a handover ceremony held at the Chinese consulate general in New York City.

During China's invasion of Tibet from late 1949 and especially during the Cultural Revolution (1966-76), Chinese officials ransacked monasteries and temples, as well as the Potala Palace in Capital Lhasa, and plundered them of their countless and priceless artifacts which were then said to have been smuggled to antique markets in Hong Kong and elsewhere.

Since signing the MOU in 2009, 504 lost artefacts have been successfully returned to China from the US in 15 batches, the scmp.com Apr 19 cited Li Qun, director general of the Chinese National Cultural Heritage Administration (NCHA), as saying said during the ceremony.

These unwavering efforts, coupled with intensified global cooperation, have yielded major gains, with over 150,000 artifacts retrieved through more than 300 repatriation missions since 1949, said the news.cgtn.com report.

The report cited the Chinese Society of Cultural Relics as saying that over 10 million Chinese artifacts had been displaced overseas since the Opium War in 1840, a consequence of warfare and illicit trade. It did not refer to the Cultural Revolution period plunders of artifacts in Tibet by communist Chinese officials.

The question is, will the US continue to "repatriate" to China lost or stolen Tibetan artifacts should its Congress pass the ongoing "Resolve Tibet Act" which recognized Tibet as an occupied country and whose legal status remains to be resolved under international law?

Dalai Lama's sister receives award for educating Tibetans in exile

19 April 2024, Tibetan Review

Sue Ott Rowlands (L), president of Randolph College, presents Jetsun Pema, the younger sister of the Dalai Lama, with the Pearl S. Buck Award at Randolph College in Lynchburg, Virginia, April 18, 2024.

The younger sister of the Tibetan Buddhist spiritual leader the Dalai Lama has received a prestigious university award for her lifelong dedication to educating Tibetan children who live in exile.

Jetsun Pema, 84, received the Pearl S. Buck Award, with a medallion and a cash prize of US$25,000, from Randolph College in Lynchburg, Virginia, on Thursday.

Pema, revered by Tibetans as "Amala," or "Respected Mother," has built one of the most successful Tibetan educational institutions abroad – the Tibetan Children's Villages, or TCV. The nonprofit organization cares for and educates orphaned, destitute and refugee children from Tibet. Its main facility is in Dharamsala in northern India.

She is the first Tibetan to receive the award given to women who exemplify the ideals, values and commitments of writer and novelist Pearl S. Buck, the first American woman to receive the Nobel Prize for Literature and a champion of women's and children's rights.

"We had some amazing nominations, and when the nominations for Jetsun Pema came through, it just felt like this is [someone] who exemplifies Pearl Buck and her commitments to people of Asia and the children, and her commitment to education," college president Sue Ott Rowlands told Radio Free Asia.

Pema was also the first woman elected to a ministerial post in the Tibetan parliament-in-exile, serving as minister for education.

Officially recognized by the Tibetan parliament-in-exile as the “Mother of Tibet,” Pema worked at TCV for over five decades.

She served as president of TCV from 1964 to 2006 and was instrumental in leading the expansion of schools across India and in caring for and educating over 53,000 Tibetan children who had escaped Tibet and were separated from their families, or who were orphaned or from underprivileged families.

After she retired in August 2006, Pema continued to work on various children’s education projects, including the Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education in Bangalore, India.

“This award acknowledges the efforts of not only myself but everyone who has contributed to this cause, starting from my late elder sister along with many others who have dedicated their lives to the education of Tibetan children,” Pema told RFA Tibetan in an interview.

Illustrious list

Previous award winners include former Irish President Mary Robinson, Bangladeshi Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, former First Lady of Egypt Jehan Sadat, former Philippines President Corazon Aquino, U.S. architect, designer and sculptor Maya Lin, and American author Maxine Hong Kingston.

Pema said she would donate her award money to TCV.

“The education we have given to our young people has benefited them greatly and has empowered them ... and that is encouraging,” Pema said, addressing a gathering of several hundred people, including former students and Tibetans who had traveled from other parts of the country to be at the award ceremony.

At the event, Pema spoke about the mandate she received from the Dalai Lama to ensure Tibetan children received a good education and care when she took over the work initiated by her late sister, Tsering Dolma Takla.

Takla, the elder sister of the Dalai Lama, first volunteered in May 1960 to care for over 50 Tibetan children whose parents were working in road construction camps in north India, creating a nursery home for them, which later expanded into a series of over 15 TCV schools across India under Pema’s leadership. Pema has received several global honors, including the World’s Children’s Prize for the Rights of the Child in Sweden in 2006, the Maria Montessori Award in Italy in 2010, and a UNESCO Medal in 1999.

She also received the esteemed Nari Shakti Puraskar award in 2018 from the Indian government, which recognizes women or institutions dedicated to advancing women’s empowerment.

Translated by Tenzin Dickyi with additional reporting by Passang Dhonden for RFA Tibetan. Edited by Tenzin Pema for RFA Tibetan, and by Roseanne Gerin and Malcolm Foster.

Former political prisoner shares testimonial of her suffering in Chinese prison

19 April 2024, Phayul

Former Tibetan political prisoner Namkyi speaking at the press conference at the CTA compound in Dharamshala on April 19, 2024 (Photo/CTA)

Former Tibetan political prisoner Namkyi, who escaped into exile last year shared a gripping testimonial of her suffering and persecution under Chinese occupation in Tibet, at a press briefing on Friday, at the exile Tibetan government’s compound here.

Speaking to reporters, Namkyi recounted her upbringing in Charo village, Ngaba County, eastern Tibet, within a nomadic family where she shared the sorrow felt by many Tibetans over the forced occupation by “Red China” and the subsequent exodus of spiritual leaders such as His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

Namkyi detailed the challenges faced by Tibetan activists in Tibet, including restrictions on movement and suppression of cultural and religious practices by the Chinese government. She expressed concerns over whether the international community fully grasped the plight of Tibetans under Chinese rule.

She recalled the events of October 21, 2015, at 3 pm Beijing local time when she and her companion held portraits of His Holiness the Dalai Lama as they marched along Ngaba’s ‘martyr’s roads’, advocating for the freedom of Tibet and the return of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and His Eminence Kirti Rinpoche. Within minutes, police officers emerged, seizing their portraits.

Despite resistance, they were eventually subdued, handcuffed, and taken to Ngaba County’s detention centre. Subsequently, they endured seven months of detention before facing an unjust three-year prison sentence on false charges of separatism. Their time in a prison in Sichuan Province was marked by forced labour and discrimination.

Namkyi continued, describing the subsequent events of her arrest, detention, and trial, vividly recalling the interrogations, physical abuse, and unjust sentencing she and her sister endured. Their time in prison was further worsened by conditions such as malnutrition, cold, and discrimination, she said.

She further stated, "On 21 October 2018, we were released from prison after completing the prison term and kept at the police station of Pema Lhathang in Ngaba County for a week as concerned authorities called upon our family to write a promise letter for our release. My family was put on a blacklist because my elder brother was also in prison. Despite our release, our expressions and movement were severely restricted, putting anyone we were in contact with at risk."

Last year, in 2023, Namkyi started her journey of escape with her cousin sister Tsering Kyi without informing anyone. They arrived in Dharamshala and reached the reception centre in Dharamshala on 28 June last year.

Senators Young, Merkley celebrate committee passage of bill promoting peaceful resolution to the Tibet-China Conflict

18 April 2024, Giant RealRadio WTCA

U.S. Senator Todd Young (R-Ind.), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and U.S. Senator Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.) praised committee passage of the bipartisan, bicameral Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act. The legislation strengthens the United States' policy to promote dialogue between the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the Dalai Lama to move toward a peaceful resolution of the conflict between Tibet and the PRC. The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act previously passed the House of Representatives, and the next step is a vote in the full Senate.

"The Chinese Communist Party's aggression towards Tibet is self-serving, with negotiations and even the very definition of Tibet on the CCP's terms. We must refresh U.S. policy towards Tibet, and push for negotiations that advance freedoms for the Tibetan people and peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama. I am pleased by this vote, and I urge the full Senate to pass this bipartisan legislation and demonstrate America's resolve that the CCP's status quo – both in Tibet and elsewhere – is not acceptable," said Senator Young.

"All peoples around the world have inalienable rights to freedom and self-determination. These principles must guide the actions and relationships of the United States around the world, especially in the face of our biggest adversaries. The People's Republic of China continues to ignore the basic rights of the Tibetan people, and the status quo is not tenable. The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act sends a straightforward message to the Chinese government: stop spreading disinformation about Tibet and its history and enter sincere negotiations over Tibet's status. We must get this bipartisan bill over the finish line because the people of Tibet deserve a say in how they are governed," said Senator Merkley.

In addition to Senators Young and Merkley, the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act was cosponsored by U.S. Senators Ben Cardin (D-Md.), Mike Braun (R-Ind.), Richard Blumenthal (D-Conn.), Christopher Coons (D-Del.), Mitt Romney (R-Utah), Tina Smith (D-Minn.), Tim Kaine (D-Va.), Jim Risch (R-Idaho), and Mike Crapo (R-Idaho). The House version of the bill was led by U.S. Representatives Jim McGovern (D-MA-02) and Michael McCaul (R-TX-10).

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Calls on Legislators, Addresses Tibetan Community in Vermont and Boston

18 April 2024, CTA

Following the conclusion of his official engagements in Toronto and Montreal, Sikyong Penpa Tsering proceeded with his official engagements in North America, specifically in Vermont and Boston. During this leg of his visit, he participated in public talks, engaged with young individuals, and held meetings with congressional and legislative representatives.

In the morning of April 12, Sikyong met with Senator Peter Welch, David Scherr, the State Director at the Office of Representative Becca Balint, and staff from Burlington Mayor Emma Mulvaney-Stanak's office in the US state of Vermont. During these meetings, Sikyong conveyed the urgent situation in Tibet, highlighting China's efforts to eradicate Tibet's distinct culture, identity, and assimilate the Tibetan people.

Following these meetings, Sikyong interacted with local Tibetan youths, discussing Tibet's historical significance, the Tibetan plateau's history, as well as its natural environment.

Later in the evening, Sikyong was welcomed in the traditional Tibetan manner, with a cultural dance performance by the regional Tibetan association. After a summary of activities by the association's president, Tsering Yangkyi and a welcome speech by Representative Dr. Namgyal Choedup of the Office of Tibet, North America, Sikyong addressed the local Tibetan residents gathered there.

Sikyong commended the efforts of the regional Tibetan association in organising meetings with officials and local authorities, despite their small team, appreciating their efficiency during the brief duration of his visit. He outlined the primary objectives of his North America visit, including discussing the responsibilities of the Central Tibetan Administration and China's policies aimed at assimilating Tibetan religion, culture, and language, along with the current situation in Tibet. Sikyong attributed the increased attention to the Tibetan cause in recent years to the influence of His Holiness, and he explained the policies and activities of the current Kashag, followed by an open Q&A session with the public.

On 13 April, Sikyong arrived in Boston, where he delivered a speech to local Tibetan residents at the regional Tibetan assembly hall. He was warmly welcomed, followed by a recap of activities by the President of the Regional Tibetan Association of Boston, Yama, and a welcoming address by Representative Dr. Namgyal Choedup.

During his speech, Sikyong reflected on his extensive travels over the past two years, visiting 24 countries on official visits, and underscored the unique nature of the exile government, which no other refugee community possesses, attributing this achievement to His Holiness's visionary leadership. He discussed the priorities and policies of the 16th Kashag, strategies for enhancing the stability and efficiency of departments within the Central Tibetan Administration, and the Middle Way Policy. Afterwards, Sikyong participated as the chief guest in a fundraising dinner organised by the regional Tibetan association.

In the morning of 14 April, Sikyong Penpa Tsering engaged in an interactive session with Tibetan youths in Boston, focusing on topics such as Tibetan history and environmental issues to enrich their knowledge and foster engagement. Following this session, he promptly departed for Washington DC, where he met with officials from the State Department and members of the legislative assembly.

Report: Government-linked hackers in China target exiled Tibetan leaders

18 April 2024, VOA News

A new report by a team of Tibet-focused cybersecurity analysts details how hackers with links to the Chinese government are using cyber espionage tactics to target members of the Tibetan government-in-exile and the office of the Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama.

"Spyware-as-a-Service," which was released Thursday, uses information from an enormous data leak in February from Chinese cybersecurity firm I-Soon. According to the report, hackers have been targeting the mobile phones of officials from the Central Tibetan Administration, or CTA, since 2018 and the large amount of information Chinese hackers have collected could pose significant security risks to them and those in their social networks.

That targeting, "represents a significant shift in the tactics used by threat actors, signaling an adaptation to modern communication methods and an understanding of the increasing reliance on mobile devices for both personal and professional activities," the report said. Tibet-focused research network Turquoise Roof published the report.

The February data dump was a treasure trove of information about China's cyber espionage and other activities. Leaked documents revealed that private firm I-Soon's clients include the Chinese police, China's Ministry of Public Security, and the People's Liberation Army. The leaked information also detailed tools and tactics used by the organization and connections among hacking groups in China.

'Tip of an iceberg'

These new findings provide a glimpse into "the sprawling cyber espionage apparatus" that China has used to target ethnic minorities over the last few decades, says Greg Walton, senior investigator at U.K.-based security consulting firm Secdev Group.

"While the revelation is only the tip of an iceberg, it's a very revealing one," said Walton, who is the report's author.

"The findings help us learn more about the opaque system [that the Chinese authorities] have been using to target the West," he told VOA by phone.

One leaked white paper described in the report focused on how I-Soon used compromised e-mail inboxes of exiled Tibetan authorities to demonstrate how their system can satisfy the demand of China's intelligence agencies to "mine through substantial volumes of intercepted email data."

"The platform is engineered to facilitate investigations into an individual's 'interpersonal network' and to intricately map the social networks of targeted individuals," the report wrote.

Walton said the white paper offers rare insight into the "capabilities of the Chinese party-state."

"[Since] we know that I-Soon has been selling their services to Chinese intelligence agencies, including the public security bureau in Tibet, we make the point in the report that the harvested social network analysis from the exiles' inboxes could be sold to the authorities in Tibet," he told VOA.

In his view, Chinese authorities could incorporate "the web of personal and professional connections" identified from the compromised e-mail inboxes of exiled Tibetan officials into the big data policing platform that they use to crack down on the local community in Tibet.

"The platform is instrumental in a campaign that criminalizes even moderate cultural, religious expressions, language rights advocacy and surfaces links to exile Tibetan networks," Walton said.

In response to the report's findings, the Chinese Embassy in Washington said Beijing has "always firmly opposed and cracked down on all forms of cyber hacking" according to law.

The accusation from the report "is a complete reversal of black and white," Liu Pengyu, the spokesperson of the Chinese Embassy, told VOA in a written response.

A long history of threats from Chinese cyber espionage

The CTA and the Tibetan diaspora community have been targets of Chinese cyber espionage for more than a decade. In 2008, an extensive cyber operation called "GhostNet," which is connected to a specialized division of the People's Liberation Army, caused serious problems across the Tibetan community.

Between November 2018 and May 2019, some senior members of Tibetan groups received malicious links in tailored WhatsApp text exchanges with operators disguised as NGO workers and other fake personas, according to research conducted by the University of Toronto's Citizen Lab.

According to Turquoise Roof's report, the escalation of cyber operations against the CTA by China's military and intelligence services is "in step with" the exiled Tibetan government's increased investment in its digital presence and reliance on digital systems for interacting with the diaspora community.

Some Tibetan organizations have been conducting training to enhance their resilience against Chinese cyberattacks.

"The Tibet Action Institute provides tech assistance to exiled Tibetan organizations and they often teach us about the security measures we can adopt to prevent our accounts or digital devices from being hacked," Ngawang Lungtok, a researcher at the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy, told VOA by phone.

The CTA has also been focusing on upgrading its technical capacity and offering orientations to all Tibetan officials in recent years.

"The Tibetan Computer Resource Center offers training and workshops regularly," Tenzin Lekshay, the spokesperson of the CTA, told VOA in a written response.

Walton adds that the CTA even sent people to the United States for specialized training.

"The CTA has some good people trained in the U.S. and is now in the position to help tackle risks extended from Chinese cyberattacks," he said.

The report says the I-Soon leak offers significant insight into the Chinese authorities' use of AI-driven surveillance systems to "enforce political controls" within and beyond its border. It also showcases Beijing's efforts to "refine its espionage capabilities" by using novel intelligence tactics against vulnerable populations like the Tibetans before global deployment. Considering the impact of cyber espionage on the Tibetans, Walton said he believes investing in the protection of vulnerable populations from digital transnational repression "is an example of" aligning traditional security with human rights advocacy.

Why China is blocking the Dalai Lama's Sri Lanka visit

18 April 2024, First Post

The Sri Lankans have been trying to have the Dalai Lama visit since January 2023

The—70 per cent plus Buddhist—Sinhala population of Sri Lanka fervently wants to welcome the 87-year-old Dalai Lama into their country at the earliest. A group of Sri Lankan Buddhist monks who met the Dalai Lama in Bodhi Gaya in 2022 invited him to come.

Dalai Lama is revered by his direct followers and other Buddhist sects as the 14th reincarnation of the Buddha, Avalokiteshvara. The current monk was anointed at the age of 15 in 1950, the very year the Chinese took over Tibet.

The Sri Lankans have been trying to have the Dalai Lama visit since January 2023. They are trying once more now as fresh efforts intensify on the open invitation from the various Buddhist monasteries.

Many Sri Lankan Buddhists feel the Dalai Lama can help sort out the island nation's economic woes with his wisdom and blessings.

Leading Sri Lankan Buddhist leader Waskaduwe Mahindawansa went on television to state that the Chinese had pressured the Sri Lankan government to prevent the visit.

The Chinese, ever political and strategic, want the Sri Lankan Buddhists to team up with Gandharan Buddhists in Pakistan rather than the Indian-orders that are opposed to the Chinese. And certainly, they do not want the Dalai Lama to visit and be honoured.

The impediment to a Sri Lankan visit comes every time by way of China. Beijing's debt restructuring will play a crucial role in obtaining further soft loans from the IMF. This has tied the hands of the Sri Lankan government.

The Chinese still regard the elderly Dalai Lama as a dangerous separatist with massive influence, a living and highly popular symbol of resistance to the Chinese takeover of Tibet.

One of the thorny problems stretching beyond the present incumbent is that the Buddhist monasteries in Tawang, Leh, and elsewhere in India do not agree that the Dalai Lama's successor can be chosen by the Chinese. The Buddhists everywhere are furious at the constant insults hurled by the Communist Chinese against the Dalai Lama, who do not recognise him as a spiritual leader at all, calling him a 'wolf' in monks robes.

The internal facts in Tibet are quite damning. Since 1949, over 1.2 million Tibetans have been killed, over 6,000 monasteries destroyed, and thousands of Tibetans imprisoned. The Tibetans are being relocated to dense city enclaves in Lhasa; their smart phones are monitored; and the Mandarin language is being pushed in place of the Tibetan.

With all this and 74 years of effort, including much infrastructure development and the relocation of ethnic Han Chinese to Lhasa, the Chinese are still not the masters of Tibetan hearts and minds. Similar problems of non-acceptance of unbridled repression plague the Communist CCP in Xinkiang, Hong Kong, against dissidence of any kind in the country, and of course, Taiwan.

The Chinese authorities bristle at everything the Dalai Lama says and does, and are disturbed every time the Dalai Lama travels within India or internationally. Still, the Dalai Lama has been very successful at promoting the Tibetan cause. The Chinese don't like the fact that the Dalai Lama is completely free in India. They objected strongly to the Dalai Lama's visit to the Tawang Buddhist monastery and other parts of Arunachal Pradesh as a state guest in 2016. China, typically and audaciously, claims 90,000 sq km of the state, even today as 'South Tibet'. China is firmly opposed to the Nobel Laureate and international apostle of spiritual optimism. The fact that the young Lama escaped to India, which gave him sanctuary, is a constant thorn in the flesh of the Chinese side. Even today, Tibetans in occupied Tibet are rarely given Chinese passports to travel. They are specifically discouraged from visiting the Dalai Lama in India, more so since 2012. There is also a ban on openly worshipping him.

China handed out brownie points to relatively smaller countries like South Africa, a part of BRICS, when it was far more important and influential, for blocking a Dalai Lama visit in 2011.

This was widely criticised internally. The Lama was to go to Cape Town on the occasion of the 80th birthday of fellow Nobel Peace Laureate Desmond Tutu, at his invitation.

The Dalai Lama did visit South Africa to meet with Nelson Mandela in 1996. But he was prevented from doing so again before the 2010 World Cup. The Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman in 2011, Hong Lei, laid out the unrelenting policy on the venerable monk when he said, 'China's position of opposing the Dalai Lama visiting any country with ties to China is clear and consistent'.

When the Dalai Lama met Mexican President Felipe Calderon in 2011, China said it had 'harmed Chinese-Mexican relations'. Likewise, Beijing was critical of President Barack Obama receiving the Dalai Lama in the White House in July 2011. However, Presidents Clinton and George W Bush also met the Dalai Lama, ignoring Chinese protests. As did Angela Merkel of Germany, Nicholas Sarkozy of France, and Gordon Brown of Britain.

Much was done to impact the careers of Hollywood stars like Richard Gere by backing Tibetan aspirations and regularly visiting McLeod Ganj.

The Dalai Lama fled to India in 1959 on muleback and on foot, just ahead of the Chinese takeover of his Potala Palace in Lhasa. This followed a failed Tibetan uprising against the Han Chinese occupation of Tibet. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, in an admirable act of idealistic courage, allowed the young Dalai Lama and his small band of fellow monks and followers refuge at Dharamshala/McLeod Ganj, in what is now Himachal Pradesh. India signed a document recognising China's takeover of Tibet in 1954.

Yet, in hindsight, Nehru may have had to pay for harbouring the Dalai Lama, by way of the unprovoked Chinese invasion of NEFA in 1962. Of course, it wasn't the only reason. However, it was a shock and humiliation that Nehru wasn't able to survive for long.

Soon, a nucleus of exiled Tibetans and enough monks to form a spiritual organisation grew around the Dalai Lama. More and more Indian and international devotees and admirers made the trip to McLeod Ganj as the time wore on. For the Tibetans trapped on the other side, in Chinese-occupied Tibet, the Dalai Lama has remained a symbol of hope for 'genuine autonomy' instead of subjugation, over the years, since 1950.

A Tibetan government in exile formed in McLeod Ganj holds elections and thrives to this day, frequently appearing to give its views on Indian television. Its stated purpose is to one day see their way to a free Tibet, or at least a truly 'autonomous' region.

Many of the Tibetans and their descendants have integrated into Indian society, marrying other communities, forming clusters and colonies in different parts of the hills and plains of India.

The Indo-Tibetan Border Force is a formidable military presence all along the LAC with China and is being steadily expanded. By way of contrast, the Han Chinese have had great difficulty motivating the natives of sparsely populated Tibet to work with them in any capacity or help their efforts to man and defend the LAC with India.

Instead, the Chinese have been forced to use Han conscripts from the plains, ill-suited to the rare air and high altitude. Most, including the senior officers, fall sick, and have to be frequently replaced.

China puts out a different development narrative with impressive statistics. Tibet now has a prosperous economy with a GDP of $31 billion and a per capita income of $8,000. This is twice that of Sri Lanka and four times that of India, they state. Life expectancy is now 72.19 years. There are 46,000 monks and nuns in over 1,700 monasteries in Tibet.

Critics say these statistics are fudged and a debt-driven narrative. Most of all, there is no freedom of religion. The effort to nurture a phoney Buddhist ethos is to legitimise Chinese efforts to name a state-sponsored Dalai Lama successor.

The writer is a Delhi-based political commentator. Views expressed in the above piece are personal and solely those of the author. They do not necessarily reflect Firstpost's views.

Bill mandating US gov't help to resolve Tibet's legal status set for full Senate vote

17 April 2024, Tibetan Review

A bill mandating the US government to pressure China to negotiate with the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected exile Tibetan leadership to reach a settlement on the legal status of Tibet has moved closer to being enacted into law with its clearance by a Senate committee on Apr 16, said Washington-based Tibet campaign group International Campaign for Tibet (ICT). The bill also recognizes Tibet as an occupied country and will require the US government to combat China's propaganda disinformation campaign on this issue.

The bipartisan "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" was approved at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at its business meeting on Apr 16, 2024. The development has coincided with the visit of the executive head, Sikyong Mr Penpa Tsering, of Dharamshala-based Central Tibetan Administration, which is effectively the Tibetan government in exile.

The main Agenda of Sikyong Penpa Tsering's visit to Washington, DC, is to meet with administration officials as well as members of Congress to push for the passage of this legislation which now heads to the full Senate for final debate and possible approval before President Joe Biden could sign it into law, said the ICT on its savetibet.org website Apr 16.

Speaking to the media after the approval, the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Ben Cardin, acknowledged his discussion with the Tibetan Sikyong the night before and said the bill's language was precisely the same as that which the Lower House had approved, according to the CTA on its Tibet.net website Apr 17.

The bill was earlier introduced by Reps. Jim McGovern, D-Mass., and Michael McCaul, R-Texas, and Sens. Jeff Merkley, D-Ore., and Todd Young, R-Ind in the two chambers of the US Congress. It was passed by the House of Representatives on Feb 15.

Known as the "Resolve Tibet Act" in short, the bill seeks to make it a US position that the dispute between Tibet and China must be resolved in accordance with international law, including the UN Charter, by peaceful means through dialogue without preconditions.

It also states that the Chinese government's disinformation campaign, claiming Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times", is historically inaccurate. For this purpose, the US government is urged to use public diplomacy efforts to "counter disinformation about Tibet" from the Chinese government and Communist Party, including "disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions including that of the Dalai Lama."

In this connection, the State Department's special coordinator for Tibetan issues is sought to be empowered to work to ensure that US government statements and documents counter Beijing's disinformation about Tibet.

The bill also encourages Washington to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

It also encourages Beijing to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

Significantly, the proposed legislation makes it clear that Tibet includes not just what China calls Xizang or Xizang Autonomous Region, but also the Tibetan regions that currently constitute or form parts of Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan and Yunnan provinces.

US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations
Approves Resolve Tibet Bill, the Committee's Chair Assures His Support for the Bill's Passage in Senate

17 April 2024, CTA

In photos: Senator Ben Cardin (L), Senator Jeff Merkley (C), and Senator Todd Young (R)

The Resolve Tibet Bill, S. 138, "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act", was unanimously approved on 16 April 2024 by the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

Speaking to the media following the Committee's session, the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Ben Cardin, acknowledged his discussion with Sikyong the night before regarding the procedure to be adopted in connection with this bill and said the bill's language was precisely the same as that which the Lower House had approved.

According to the Tibetan language broadcaster, immediately after the bill was unanimously approved, Senator Jeff Merkley (Democratic Party) and Senator Todd Young (Republican Party) explained the Committee's approval of the bill was a further confirmation of the United States' policy of advocating peaceful dialogue between His Holiness the Dalai Lama or His representative and the People's Republic of China to resolve the Tibet-China conflict. They further stated the bill had already been passed in the US House of Representatives and could now move to the Senate floor.

Representative Dr Namgyal Choedup delivered this great news to the members of North American Tibetan Associations and extended his appreciation on behalf of the Central Tibetan Administration for their commitment to seeking support from the Senators of their respective states and called for continued effort. While ensuring that the Office of Tibet and the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) have been doing their best, the Representative apprised Sikyong has been actively involved in meetings with lawmakers and government officials during this ongoing visit in the US to advocate for the passage of the bill. He further acknowledged Sikyong Penpa Tsering and ICT Chair Richard Gere's successful meeting with the Chairman of the United States Senate Committee, Senator Ben Cardin, during which the latter affirmed his firm support for the bill's passage.

China prevents exposure of human rights violations in Tibet and Xinjiang in foreign media

17 April 2024, Colombo Gazette

As Beijing increases its repression of ethnic minorities in China to establish Han domination, the Chinese Communist Party is also devising numerous ways to ensure that the overseas media cannot expose this ongoing violation of human rights behind the bamboo curtain.

The Chinese media is highly censored. To project the false image of China as a progressive country, the mandarins of the CCP must prevent all these atrocities from being exposed in newspapers, news agencies and televisions in other countries.

From the experiences of foreign journalists reporting from Tibet and Xinjiang, the land of ethnic Tibetan and Uighur people, respectively, now under the illegal control of China, and from research into how the CCP controls the foreign media, it transpires that there are essentially two ways of doing this.

One is to stop the flow of information to the outside world from these regions simply by preventing foreign reporters from visiting and operating in these areas. The other is to misguide the foreign media by planting fake news, by ideological brain-washing of journalists in different countries and by intimidating them with draconian legislations purportedly with extra-terrestrial reach.

"Tibet is one of the most restrictive places in the world for Press freedom, with information online and offline tightly controlled and censored by the Chinese government," says a research paper by Sage, a global academic publisher of books and journals. Special restrictions exist on foreign correspondents who travel to the Tibet Autonomous Region and report to Tibetan areas.

Tibetans who act as sources are persecuted. Requests from the Foreign Correspondents Club of China for visits to Tibet are routinely denied. Tours of foreign correspondents to the TAR, few and far between, are group trips closely supervised and coordinated by the authorities.

To prevent the filtering out of the real situation in Tibet to other countries, measures like network shutdowns, internet filtering, social media censorship, confiscation of satellite dishes and shortwave radio signal jamming are adopted. The authorities persecute Tibetans who provide journalists with assistance without official permission.

A well-known case was of Tashi Wangchuk, Tibetan herder-turned-shopkeeper who in 2018 was sentenced to five years in prison for 'inciting separatism' for having talked to a New York Times reporter in Beijing in 2015. "Some of my sources have been prosecuted and sentenced from three to 16 years. A lot of them have been imprisoned," a Tibetan journalist in exile has been quoted.

Internet filtering and radio jamming help Tibetan news groups reach Tibetan audiences. Frequencies are jammed, and the authorities confiscate satellite dishes. Websites face 'Disturbed Denial of Service' attacks, which typically occur around sensitive political anniversaries of Tibetan people.

The experience of Albanian-Canadian historian and journalist Olsi Jazexhi in 2019, as narrated in Al-Jazeera, is a telling story of how China prevents the filtering out of news to the outside world of violation of human rights inflicted on the Uighur Muslims. Jazexhi had joined a media tour of foreign journalists, mostly from Muslim countries, to the Xinjiang region.

"I wanted to defend the Chinese government," he recalled. But he quickly understood that defending the Chinese narrative was a far more difficult task than he had anticipated. They were taken to one of the so-called vocational training centres outside the regional capital of Urumqi. "They said it was like a school but it was clearly a high-security site in the middle of the desert," Jazexhi said.

"They also told us that the people staying there were not allowed to leave. So it was obviously not a school but a prison and the people there were not students but prisoners. They (the Chinese hosts) were portraying the indigenous people of Xinjiang as immigrants and Islam as a religion that was foreign to the region. It was incorrect."

Such media tours, organised at the behest of Chinese President Xi Jinping, are a common tactic employed by countries with something to hide.

Associated Press journalist posted in Beijing Yanan Wang has narrated the subtle ways of the propaganda department of the Chinese government to control reporting in the Uighur Autonomous Region.

"At the airport we had a welcoming committee from the local authorities. They offered us drives in their car and plenty of hospitality. From the moment we arrived, we're followed by at least one car. We were taking photos, and someone suddenly appeared on the scene to say he was a 'concerned citizen.'

He said taking photos was an infringement of his privacy rights. He had this long monologue about privacy rights and about how it wasn't right for us to take photos of him without his knowledge. We asked him: 'Well, where are you in these photos?' He'd go through all of them. He said we had to delete all of them. 'This is my brother,' or 'This is my place of work, you have to delete it.' They posed as concerned citizens to obstruct reporting."

A BBC team had a harrowing experience on a visit to the Uighur Autonomous region. "Over a period of less than 72 hours in Xinjiang we were followed constantly and on five separate occasions approached by people who attempted to stop us from filming in public, sometimes violently. In at least two instances, we were accused of breaching the privacy of these individuals on the basis that their attempts to stop us had led them to walk in front of our camera.

Uniformed police officers attending these 'incidents' twice deleted our footage and on the other occasion we were briefly held by local officials who claimed we had infringed a farmer's rights by filming a field." The BBC team concludes: "China's propaganda efforts may be a sign of just how damaging it believes the coverage of Xinjiang has been to its international reputation."

Besides expelling foreign correspondents from China, the communist regime is now also trying to influence in its favour coverage in the international media, especially in countries where it has invested in Belt and Road Initiative projects. China regularly conducts exchange programmes for foreign reporters, training for journalists in Chinese cities and regular discussions with foreign journalists in Chinese media unions.

Media contents with official propaganda are provided free to foreign journalists. Bilateral cooperation agreements with media outlets are launched at local levels, and supplements are run in respectable foreign publications.

In 2019, when Italy signed the BRI agreement with China, President of China Xi Jinping signed a series of agreements with Italian media companies. The Xinhua Italian News Service was launched in a MoU between the Italian news agency ANSA and the Chinese news agency Xinhua.

Public broadcaster of Italy RAI reached agreements with China Media Group. "An expanding presence in Italian media gives Beijing a platform to spread its official view while potentially inhibiting more critical debates from emerging," a London-based Henry Jackson Society report says. ANSA ended the agreement in 2022.

In poorer nations the infusion of money is often inducement enough. "A desk, a telephone and regular pay are all positives in countries where these are luxuries," Jeremy Dear of the International Federation of Journalists has been quoted.

Fake news on China is also planted in foreign media outlets, taking advantage of the latest communication technologies. Appeals to ideological beliefs are made to journalists to self-censor reports critical of China in cities with a communist tradition.

When nothing works, Beijing resorts to threats against foreign journalists to make them fall in line. In December 2023, China placed sanctions on Los Angeles-based research and data analytics firm Kharon and its two lead analysts, according to an Al Jazeera report.

They were barred from entry into China. Assets or property owned by the company and the two analysts would be frozen. Organisations and individuals in China were prohibited from conducting transactions or cooperating with them. The company had reported extensively on human rights abuses against Uighur and other Muslim groups.

China uses the National Security Law of Hong Kong to threaten foreign journalists with arrest and prosecution if they are in a Chinese jurisdiction, even for transit. On March 13, the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region government threatened the London-based Hong Kong Watch with treason for critiquing the draconian Safeguarding National Security Ordinance.

Bill mandating US gov't help to resolve Tibet's legal status set for full Senate vote

17 April 2024, Tibetan Review

A bill mandating the US government to pressure China to negotiate with the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected exile Tibetan leadership to reach a settlement on the legal status of Tibet has moved closer to being enacted into law with its clearance by a Senate committee on Apr 16, said Washington-based Tibet campaign group International Campaign for Tibet (ICT). The bill also recognizes Tibet as an occupied country and will require the US government to combat China's propaganda disinformation campaign on this issue.

The bipartisan "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" was approved at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at its business meeting on Apr 16, 2024. The development has coincided with the visit of the executive head, Sikyong Mr Penpa Tsering, of Dharamshala-based Central Tibetan Administration, which is effectively the Tibetan government in exile.

The main Agenda of Sikyong Penpa Tsering's visit to Washington, DC, is to meet with administration officials as well as members of Congress to push for the passage of this legislation which now heads to the full Senate for final debate and possible approval before President Joe Biden could sign it into law, said the ICT on its savetibet.org website Apr 16.

Speaking to the media after the approval, the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Ben Cardin, acknowledged his discussion with the Tibetan Sikyong the night before and said the bill's language was precisely the same as that which the Lower House had approved, according to the CTA on its Tibet.net website Apr 17.

The bill was earlier introduced by Reps. Jim McGovern, D-Mass., and Michael McCaul, R-Texas, and Sens. Jeff Merkley, D-Ore., and Todd Young, R-Ind in the two chambers of the US Congress. It was passed by the House of Representatives on Feb 15.

Known as the "Resolve Tibet Act" in short, the bill seeks to make it a US position that the dispute between Tibet and China must be resolved in accordance with international law, including the UN Charter, by peaceful means through dialogue without preconditions.

It also states that the Chinese government's disinformation campaign, claiming Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times", is historically inaccurate. For this purpose, the US government is urged to use public diplomacy efforts to "counter disinformation about Tibet" from the Chinese government and Communist Party, including "disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions including that of the Dalai Lama."

In this connection, the State Department's special coordinator for Tibetan issues is sought to be empowered to work to ensure that US government statements and documents counter Beijing's disinformation about Tibet.

The bill also encourages Washington to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

It also encourages Beijing to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

Significantly, the proposed legislation makes it clear that Tibet includes not just what China calls Xizang or Xizang Autonomous Region, but also the Tibetan regions that currently constitute or form parts of Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan and Yunnan provinces.

Central Tibetan Administration Appreciates Senate Foreign Relations Committee's Approval of Resolve Tibet Bill

17 April 2024, CTA

The Central Tibetan Administration applauds the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's (SFRC) approval of the Resolve Tibet bill, S. 138 "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act". The bipartisan, bicameral Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act received approval during the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's session on 16 April 2024.

The bill also known as the Resolve Tibet Bill reaffirms the US policy of supporting direct dialogue between the People's Republic of China and representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama or with democratically elected Tibetan leaders, without any preconditions, to resolve the Tibet-China conflict. The legislation also aims to counter disinformation propagated by the Chinese government regarding Tibet included fabricated narratives about Tibet's history, culture, people, and institutions including that of the Dalai Lama.

The bill approved by the SFRC is a revised iteration of the legislation initially presented by Senators Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.) and Todd Young (R-Ind.), and also by Representatives Jim McGovern (D-Mass.) and Michael McCaul (R-Texas) in the House, where it secured passage. Following its approval by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the bill is now slated to proceed to the Senate floor.

During the bill introduction, Senator Merkley stated, "The People's Republic of China continues to ignore the basic rights of the Tibetan people, and the status quo is not tenable. The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act sends a straightforward message to the Chinese government: stop spreading disinformation about Tibet and its history and enter sincere negotiations over Tibet's status. We must get this bipartisan bill over the finish line because the people of Tibet deserve a say in how they are governed."

Senator Young urged, "The Chinese Communist Party's aggression towards Tibet is self-serving, with negotiations and even the very definition of Tibet on the CCP's terms. We must refresh U.S. policy towards Tibet, and push for negotiations that advance freedoms for the Tibetan people and peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama. I am pleased by today's vote, and I urge the full Senate to pass this bipartisan legislation and demonstrate America's resolve that the CCP's status quo – both in Tibet and elsewhere – is not acceptable.

In his official X (formerly called Twitter) account, Sikyong Penpa Tsering posted, "Grateful to witness the Resolve Tibet Act pass the US Senate Foreign Relations Committee. This marks a significant first step towards countering China's false narrative on Tibet's history. I thank SFRC Chairman Senator Cardin and all the members for their unwavering support."

Dr. Namgyal Choedup, Representative of Office of Tibet, North America, said: "Tibetans hold the US Congress in high regard and are always grateful for the support of the American people. With today's vote, the United States is once again showing that it is the leader on the international stage when it comes to advancing the just cause of the Tibetans. We thank the members of the committee for moving the Resolve Tibet Act to the Senate floor, and we call on the Senate to pass this bill without delay."

Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration has embarked on his official endeavours in Washington DC since Monday, 15 April 2024 as part of his engagement in North America. He has been actively involved in meetings with legislators and government officials to champion the passage of the Resolve Tibet Bill.

Senate committee advances bill pushing Tibet-China negotiations

16 April 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

A bill to strengthen US efforts to get China back to the negotiating table with Tibetan leaders and combat China's disinformation about Tibet can now move to the Senate floor after a key committee's approval today.

The bipartisan Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act was approved at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's business meeting this morning, April 16, 2024.

The approval comes as Penpa Tsering, the exile-based Tibetan sikyong (president), is in Washington, DC for meetings with administration officials and with members of Congress to push for passage of this legislation.

Namgyal Choedup, representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration to North America, said: "Tibetans hold the US Congress in high regard and are always grateful for the support of the American people. With today's vote, the United States is once again showing that it is the leader on the international stage when it comes to advancing the just cause of the Tibetans. We thank the members of the committee for moving the Resolve Tibet Act to the Senate floor, and we call on the Senate to pass this bill without delay."

International Campaign for Tibet President Tencho Gyatso said: "Today's vote shows that Congress is making it a priority to resolve China's brutal occupation of Tibet through dialogue. We look forward to seeing this bill passed by the Senate and signed into law by the president. China needs to get back to negotiations with Tibetan leaders, and this bill will raise the diplomatic pressure on China significantly."

About the bill

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act was introduced by Reps. Jim McGovern, D-Mass., and Michael McCaul, R-Texas, and Sens. Jeff Merkley, D-Ore., and Todd Young, R-Ind. It passed the House on Feb. 15.

Known as the Resolve Tibet Act, the bill states that it is US policy that the dispute between Tibet and China must be resolved in accordance with international law, including the UN Charter, by peaceful means through dialogue without preconditions.

Between 2002-10, the Chinese government took part in 10 rounds of dialogue with Tibetan leaders. Since then, China has refused to negotiate in good faith.

The bill also states that the Chinese government's disinformation claiming that Tibet has been part of China since "ancient times" is historically inaccurate.

The Resolve Tibet Act says that the US should:

- Promote substantive dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community. The US could also explore activities to improve prospects for dialogue leading to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.
- Encourage China's government to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people regarding their distinct historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.
- Use public diplomacy efforts to "counter disinformation about Tibet" from the Chinese government and Communist Party, including "disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions including that of the Dalai Lama."
- Empower the State Department's special coordinator for Tibetan issues to work to ensure that US government statements and documents counter disinformation about Tibet.

Although the Chinese government attempts to shape a narrative that Tibet is only the Tibet Autonomous Region—an administrative region that spans less than half the Tibetan homeland—this legislation makes clear that Tibet also includes Tibetan regions of Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan and Yunnan provinces.

Suspend the Rules and Pass the Bill, H. R. 533, With an Amendment

(The amendment strikes all after the enacting clause and inserts a complete new text)

118TH CONGRESS 2D SESSION

To amend the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 to modify certain provisions of that Act.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

JANUARY 26, 2023

Mr. MCGOVERN (for himself and Mr. MCCAUL) introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs

A BILL

To amend the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 to modify certain provisions of that Act.

H. R. 533

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds the following:

(1) It has been the long-standing policy of the United States to encourage meaningful and direct dialogue between representatives of the People's Republic of China and the Dalai Lama, his or her representatives, or democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community, without preconditions, to seek a settlement that resolves differences.

(2) Nine rounds of dialogue held between 2002 and 2010 between the People's Republic of China authorities and the 14th Dalai Lama's representatives failed to produce a settlement that resolved differences, and the two sides have held no formal dialogue since January 2010.

(3) An obstacle to further dialogue is that the Government of the People's Republic of China continues to impose conditions on substantive dialogue with the Dalai Lama, including demand that he say that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times, which the Dalai Lama has refused to do because it is inaccurate.

(4) Article 1 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 1 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights provide that "All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development."

(4) Article 1 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 1 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights provide that "All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development."

(5) The United States Government has never taken the position that Tibet was a part of China since ancient times

(6) China signed the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights on October 5, 1998, and ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights on March 27, 2001.

(7) Under international law, including United Nations General Assembly Resolution 2625, the right to self-determination is the right of a people to determine its own destiny and the exercise of this right can result in a variety of outcomes ranging from independence, federation, protection, some form of autonomy or full integration within a State.

(8) United Nations General Assembly Resolution 1723, adopted on December 20, 1961, called for the “cessation of practices which deprive the Tibetan people of their fundamental human rights and freedoms, including their right to self-determination.”.

(8) United Nations General Assembly Resolution 1723, adopted on December 20, 1961, called for the “cessation of practices which deprive the Tibetan people of their fundamental human rights and freedoms, including their right to self-determination.”

(9) Secretary of State Antony Blinken, in a May 26, 2022, speech entitled “The Administration’s Approach to the People’s Republic of China,” said that the rules-based international order’s “founding documents include the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which enshrined concepts like self-determination, sovereignty, the peaceful settlement of disputes. These are not Western constructs. They are reflections of the world’s shared aspirations.”

(10) The Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 (22 U.S.C. 6901 note), as amended by the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020, in directing the United States Government “to promote the human rights and distinct religious, cultural, linguistic, and historical identity of the Tibetan people” acknowledges that the Tibetan people possess a distinct religious, cultural, linguistic, and historical identity.

(11) Department of State reports on human rights and religious freedom have consistently documented systematic repression by the authorities of the People’s Republic of China against Tibetans as well as acts of defiance and resistance by Tibetan people against the People’s Republic of China policies.

(12) The Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 (22 U.S.C. 6901 note), as amended by the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020, specifies that the central objective of the United States Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues is to promote substantive dialogue between the Government of the People’s Republic of China and the Dalai Lama, his or her representatives, or democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community.

SEC. 3. STATEMENT OF POLICY.

It is the policy of the United States—

(1) that the Tibetan people are a people with a distinct religious, cultural, linguistic and historical identity;

- (2) that the dispute between Tibet and the People’s Republic of China must be resolved in accordance with international law, including the United Nations Charter, by peaceful means, through dialogue without preconditions,
- (3) that the People’s Republic of China should cease its propagation of disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama;

- (4) to encourage the People’s Republic of China to uphold all its obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights; and

- (5) in accordance with the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020

- (A) to promote substantive dialogue without pre-conditions, between the Government of the People’s Republic of China and the Dalai Lama, his or her representatives, or democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community, or explore activities to improve prospects for dialogue, that leads to a negotiated agreement on Tibet;
- (B) to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts towards the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet; and
- (C) to encourage the Government of the People’s Republic of China to address the aspirations of the Tibetan people with regard to their distinct historical, cultural, religious, and linguistic identity.

SEC. 4. SENSE OF CONGRESS.

It is the sense of Congress that—

- (1) claims made by officials of the People’s Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times are historically inaccurate;
- (2) the current policies of the People’s Republic of China are systematically suppressing the ability of the Tibetan people to preserve their religion, culture, language, history, way of life and environment;
- (3) the Government of the People’s Republic of China is failing to meet the expectations of the United States to engage in meaningful dialogue with the Dalai Lama or his representatives or to reach a negotiated resolution that includes the aspirations of the Tibetan people; and

SEC. 5. MODIFICATIONS TO THE TIBETAN POLICY ACT OF 2002.

(a) TIBET NEGOTIATIONS.—Section 613(b) of the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 (22 U.S.C. 6901 note) is amended—

- (1) in paragraph (2), by striking “and” at the end;
- (2) in paragraph (3), by striking the period at the end and inserting “; and”; and
- (3) by adding at the end the following:

“(4) efforts to counter disinformation about Tibet from the Government of the People’s Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party, including disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions including that of the Dalai Lama.”

(b) UNITED STATES SPECIAL COORDINATOR FOR TIBETAN ISSUES.—Section 621(d) of the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 (22 U.S.C. 6901 note) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraphs (6), (7), and (8) as paragraphs (7), (8), and (9), respectively; and

(2) by inserting after paragraph (5) the following:

“work with relevant bureaus of the Department of State and the United States Agency for International Development to ensure that United States Government statements and documents counter, as appropriate, disinformation about Tibet from the Government of the People’s Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party, including disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions including that of the Dalai Lama;”

(c) DEFINITION.—The Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 (22 U.S.C. 6901 note) is amended by adding at the end the following:

“SEC. 622. DEFINITION.

“For purposes of this Act, the term ‘Tibet’ refers to the following areas:

“(1) The Tibet Autonomous Region.

“(2) The areas that the Government of the People’s Republic of China designated as Tibetan Autonomous, as of 2018, as follows:

“(A) Kanlho (Gannan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, and Pari (Tianzhu) Tibetan Autonomous County located in Gansu Province.

“(B) Golog (Guoluo) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Malho (Huangnan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Tsojiang (Haibei) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Tsolho (Hainan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Tsonub (Haixi) Mongolian and Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, and Yulshul (Yushu) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, located in Qinghai Province.

“(C) Garze (Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Ngawa (Aba) Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture, and Muli (Mili) Tibetan Autonomous County, located in Sichuan Province.

“(D) Dechen (Diqing) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, located in Yunnan Province.”

SEC. 6. AVAILABILITY OF AMOUNTS TO COUNTER DISINFORMATION ABOUT TIBET.

Amounts authorized to be appropriated or otherwise made available under section 346 of subtitle E of title III of division FF of Public Law 116–260 (“Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020”) are authorized to be made available to counter disinformation about Tibet from the Government of the People’s Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party, including disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions including that of the Dalai Lama.

Sikkim CM alleges former state govt. coerced Karmapa’s exit from India

15 April 2024, Phayul

Ahead of the 2024 Indian Lok Sabha election, the anticipated return of the revered Buddhist figure, the 17th Karmapa, Ogyen Trinley Dorje, to India has become a prominent theme in political campaigns in the state of Sikkim. Prem Singh Tamang, the incumbent Chief Minister of Sikkim, alleged on Wednesday that the previous ruling party of the state, the Sikkim Democratic Front (SDF) led by Pawan Kumar Chamling coerced the 17th Karmapa to leave India by unjustly labelling him a Chinese agent.

Tamang promised the crowd that the government would support a pilgrimage for 4,000 Buddhist monks to the Dominican Republic to receive the blessings of the Karmapa. He criticised the former CM Pawan Kumar Chamling for supposedly pledging to send 4,000 lamas to the Dominican Republic to meet with Karmapa, calling it deceptive. In August 2020, CM Tamang reportedly wrote to Prime Minister Narendra Modi, asking the Indian government to allow the 17th Karmapa to return to India, as reported by The Week. He informed PM Modi that Sikkimese and Buddhist devotees were urging him to let the Tibetan spiritual figure come back for religious commitments.

Tamang reminded PM Modi that Karmapa was granted asylum by PM Atal Bihari Vajpayee in 2000. He mentioned that restrictions were later placed on his movement within the country, preventing his visit to Sikkim despite popular demands from devotees. He also acknowledged that it was the Modi government that lifted these restrictions in 2018, except entry into the Rumtek Monastery, and expressed gratitude on behalf of the people of Sikkim for removing such barriers. Furthermore, Tamang stated that the public demand for Karmapa’s visit has been growing and urged Modi to consider allowing the Tibetan spiritual leader entry into India as soon as possible.

The former CM Chamling during his chief-ministership reached out to the then External Affairs Minister Sushma Swaraj, asking for permission for the 17th Karmapa to visit the north-eastern state. “I have written a letter to Sushma Swaraj seeking her assistance and cooperation in permitting the 17th Karmapa, His Holiness Ogyen Trinley Dorje, to visit any monastery in Sikkim, if not Rumtek Monastery, to bless our people,” Chamling stated in an interview. He emphasised that the Karmapa’s visit would fulfill the longstanding demand of the people and the Sikkim government.

The Karmapa obtained a passport from the Commonwealth of Dominica in 2018 to make traveling easier after facing restrictions on movement in India. He serves as the head of the Karma Kagyu School, one of the four main schools of Tibetan Buddhism. Tibetans and Buddhists in India have been advocating for his return to India where the bulk of his followership is based.

Rumtek Monastery, also known as the Dharmachakra Centre in Sikkim, is considered the main seat of the Karma Kagyu lineage in exile and has become a focal point of a long-standing dispute within the sect. Despite being in exile, the spiritual leader of the Kagyu lineage has not been permitted to visit the monastery.

Bollywood star calls on Dalai Lama as she campaigns for parliament seat

15 April 2024, Tibetan Review

Bollywood star Ms Kangana Ranaut has on Apr 15 called on His Holiness the Dalai Lama at his residence in Dharamshala along with former BJP Chief minister (Ex-CM) Jairam Ramesh Thakur of Himachal Pradesh. The much-publicized Indian actress is contesting as the BJP candidate for the Mandi district constituency seat in the ongoing general elections.

"It was an experience which I'll cherish all my life. I think it is exceptional to be in the presence of such a being who has sheer divinity around him. So, it was very emotional for me and ex-CM-Ji. ... It is something I will cherish all my life," she said, following her meeting.

Last year, on Apr 12, Kangana had re-tweeted a meme which featured the Dalai Lama and read, "The Dalai Lama receives a warm welcome at the White house". The picture in the tweet showed Dalai Lama sticking his tongue out with Joe Biden Photoshopped in front of him.

Sharing the post, the actor wrote, "Hmmm dono ko same bimari hai, definitely dono ki dosti ho sakti hai (The two have the same illness, they can be friends for sure)."

Given the media controversy raised about a news video of the Dalai Lama shown sticking his tongue out to an Indian boy during a public meeting, and the out-of-context suggestions of misconduct sought to be attributed to the Tibetan spiritual leader at that time, Tibetans protested strongly against her, including outside her office in Mumbai.

It prompted Ms Ranaut to clarify on Instagram: "A group of Buddhist people doing dharna outside my office in Pali Hill, I didn't mean to hurt anyone, it was a harmless joke about Biden being friends with Dalai Lama.... please don't misunderstand my intentions (folded hands emoji)."

She also added, "I do believe in Buddha's teachings and his holiness 14th Dalai Lama has spent his whole life in public service, I hold nothing against anyone, don't stand in the harsh heat, please go home", (with a folded hands emoji again). Ms Ranaut is pitted Against Congress stalwart Vikramaditya Singh, son of the state's late former Chief Minister Virbhadra Singh who had got elected from the Mandi parliamentary constituency in the 2009 general elections and in 2013 by-election. Vikramaditya is currently a state government minister. Virbhadra Singh's widow Pratibha Singh currently represents Mandi in the Indian parliament, having won it in the 2021 election. Voting for the Mandi Lok Sabha (Lower House of Indian parliament) seat, which has 17 assembly segments, is being held together with the Lok Sabha polls on Jun 1. The fight between the two candidates is seen as a tough one. Kangana, who turned 37 on Mar 23, was born in a small town of Mandi district. Her great-grandfather, Sarju Singh Ranaut, was an MLA. Her mother, Asha Ranaut, retired as a schoolteacher from Mandi, and her father, Amardeep, is a businessman. The actor previously visited the Baglamukhi and Jwala Devi temples in Himachal to celebrate her nomination on Mar 24.

Representative Rigzin Genkhang Briefs Dutch Ambassador for Human Rights on the Critical Situation in Tibet

16 April 2024, CTA

Representative Rigzin Genkhang met with H.E. Wim Geerts, Dutch Ambassador for human rights at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands. During the meeting Representative Genkhang expressed her gratitude to Ambassador Geerts for his recent expression of concern on the situation in Derge and calling on the Chinese government for the immediate release of those arrested for exercising their fundamental rights.

Representative Rigzin Genkhang with H.E. Wim Geerts, Dutch Ambassador for human rights at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands.

Representative Genkhang further briefed Ambassador Geerts on the critical situation in Tibet highlighting among other things, Chinese interference in the succession of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama and the forced assimilation of Tibetan children in Chinese state-run boarding schools aimed at eradicating Tibetan identity and culture.

Ambassador Geerts reaffirmed his government's continued support and informed Representative Genkhang that Prime Minister Rutte raised the issue of Tibet with his Chinese counterpart during his visit to China in March this year.

Ambassador Geerts was previously the Ambassador of the Kingdom of Netherlands to China and is well acquainted with the situation in Tibet.

Eminent Buddhist teacher Arjia Rinpoche gives first-hand information about China's atrocities to Japanese lawmakers

11 April 2024, The Print

Tokyo [Japan], April 11 (ANI): Internationally known Buddhist teacher Lobsang Tubten Jigme Gyatso, prominently known as the Arjia Rinpoche, revealed to Japanese lawmakers the ongoing human rights violations in Tibet inflicted by China.

During his visit to Japan, Rinpoche was invited to the Japanese National Parliament, popularly known as Diet in Tokyo, a press release by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) reported.

During his visit, Rinpoche met with the Japanese Parliamentarian Group, monitoring China's human rights violations.

Prominent Buddhist teacher Arjia Rinpoche reveals first-hand information of China's atrocities to Japanese lawmakers (Photo credits: Central Tibetan Administration)

Lobsang Tubten Jigme Gyatso is a Mongolian, who was recognised as the 8th Arjia Rinpoche at the age of two in 1952 by the 10th Panchen Lama. Rinpoche revealed how China invaded Tibet and destroyed monasteries, religious artefacts, and how monks, including him, were forced to disrobe and denied religious education.

He further talked about how the 11th Panchen Lama recognised by the Dalai Lama was kidnapped and how a false Panchen Lama was installed through dubious means, the press release said.

Rinpoche said that he was given a high religious position, only to be controlled and used by the communist leadership.

When he was asked to tutor the false Panchen Lama and forced to do things against his religious faith, he decided to flee Tibet, he said.

Another Japanese lawmaker, Shimamura Hakubun, thanked the Rinpoche for the information provided.

Hakubun also mentioned that it greatly helped the parliamentarians to get firsthand information on Chinese religious atrocities in Tibet.

He assured Rinpoche that Japan would do its best to address Chinese repression in Tibet and southern Mongolia.

According to the press release, Arjia Rinpoche attended to questions from lawmakers on how Japan could further extend help, the relationship with Japanese monasteries, and Tibetan independence.

During his session at the Diet, Rinpoche requested the issuance of statements of support from the Japanese government and the public.

On the relationship with Japanese monasteries, Rinpoche said Japanese sangha members greatly respect the Dalai Lama and have maintained a good relationship with the Tibetan Buddhist community.

On the independence issue, Rinpoche explained the Dalai Lama's Middle Way Approach and requested the support of the Japanese parliament. (ANI)

Europe For Tibet Campaign Launched in The European Parliament

10 April 2024, CTA

The campaign “Europe for Tibet” was launched in the European Parliament during a meeting with Members of European Parliament, ahead of the 06-09 June European elections.

The campaign website eu4tibet.org will serve as a platform for all groups advocating for the rights and freedom of the Tibetan people based in the member states to obtain a pledge of support for Tibet from the candidates of the 2024 European elections and to question their political parties on their position on Tibet.

This campaign jointly organised by the Office of Tibet, Brussels, and the International Campaign for Tibet with the support from Offices of Tibet in London and Geneva and the International Tibet Network aims to mobilize support from current and future members of the European Parliament, Tibet Support Groups, Tibetan Communities in Europe, V-TAG members and all other groups advocating for Tibet to reestablish a dedicated group of Members of the European Parliament supportive of Tibet in order to ensure Tibet’s continued presence on the agenda of the European Union in the next legislative term.

Speakers at the event included Mikulas Peksa, Salima Yenbou, Ausra Maldeikiene, Members of the European Parliament, Rigzin Genkhang, Representative of H.H. the Dalai Lama in Brussels, Wangpo Tethong, Executive Director of the International Campaign for Tibet.

Parliamentary Assistants, Vincent Metten and Mélanie Blondel, ICT, Brussels, Thinley Wangdue, Office of Tibet, Brussels and V-TAG members also attended the event.

To close the event, Members of the European Parliament were offered a traditional Tibetan scarf.

27th Tibetan Shoton Festival Begins in Dharamshala, Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche Graces the Festival’s Inaugural

10 April 2024, CTA

Kyabje Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche addressing the gathering during the opening ceremony of the 27th Tibetan Shoton Festival. Photo / Tenzin Jigme Taydeh / CTA

The 27th annual Tibetan Shoton Festival (yoghurt festival) in exile kicked off today at the Tibetan Institute of Performing Arts (TIPA) in Dharamshala to celebrate Tibetan opera from 10 – 22 April 2024.

Kyabje Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche Jetsun Tenzin Chokyi Gyaltzen graced the opening ceremony of the festival as chief guest, along with officiating Sikyong Tharlam Dolma Changra, Kalon (Minister) of the Department of Education, and Deputy Speaker Dolma Tsering Teykhang from the Tibetan Parliament in Exile.

Election and Public Service Commissioner Wangdue Tsering Pesur, Standing Committee Members and Dharamshala-based Parliamentarians of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile, Secretaries and staff of the Central Tibetan Administration, Secretaries of the Office of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Dharamshala Tibetan Settlement Officer, Members of Local Tibetan Assembly and Tibetan Freedom Movement, and representatives of the Tibetan NGOs and institutions also attended the festival’s inaugural.

Following a day-long display of each opera story’s preview from the participating troupes, chief guest Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche delivered a keynote speech. “Despite Tibet’s continued difficulties and the geographical separation of Tibetans inside and outside of Tibet, we should be proud of our capacity to host the Shoton Festival of this magnitude in exile, drawing ever-larger crowds of participants,” said Rinpoche while commending the members of opera troupes for their devotion and dedication to preserving the rich opera tradition of Tibet. The chief guest went on to say that it was His Holiness the Dalai Lama’s leadership that empowered the Tibetan people to preserve and honour their rich cultural heritages and hence advised all the Tibetans to remember the benevolence of His Holiness time and again and adhere to His noble guidance. Rinpoche further emphasised the collective efforts of every Tibetan in maintaining Tibet's unique traditions, including Tibetan opera.

After concluding the address, Kundeling Tatsak Rinpoche handed over a cheque of 1 Lakh rupees to each troupe group, a small contribution from the Department of Religion and Culture, CTA, for their sustenance.

Over the course of the 13-day Shoton Festival, Tibetan troupes from various settlements will present different Tibetan opera performances.

White paper addresses Himalayan water security challenges

08 April 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

A new white paper summarizing a panel at World Water Week 2023 in Stockholm is providing recommendations for China and other stakeholders to address water security in the region where Tibet is located.

"Addressing Water Security Challenges in the Himalayan Region" is available to read now.

The white paper is the result of the panel during World Water Week organized by the International Water Management Institute and supported by the US Department of State, the International Tibet Network, the Mountain Resiliency Project and the International Campaign for Tibet.

The panel featured two Tibetan experts based in exile: Tsechu Dolma, founder of the Mountain Resiliency Project, and Lobsang Yangtso, senior researcher at the International Tibet Network. The third panelist was Manohara Khadka, the Nepal country representative for the International Water Management Institute.

The thoughts and recommendations of all three panelists are featured in the white paper.

Water security panel

The panel took place Aug. 24, 2023 at the World Water Week Conference in Stockholm.

The discussion focused on environmental sustainability and climate change on the Earth's "Third Pole," as the Himalayan region is known.

That region is home to one-fifth of the world's freshwater supply. Glacial runoff forms rivers in almost every country across South and Southeast Asia.

Under Secretary of State Uzra Zeya, who serves as the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues, spoke to the panel by video message.

Asok Kumar, director general of the National Mission for Clean Ganga, Ministry of Jal Shakti, government of India, also addressed the panel by video, while Rebecca Peters, a water policy advisor to the State Department, delivered remarks in person.

"Water is essential to all life," said Franz Matzner, director of government relations for the International Campaign for Tibet. "World Water Week brings together people from across the globe with a shared mission to use water for peace. ICT was proud to be a part of the event."

The views of the three main experts at the panel—Tsechu Dolma, Lobsang Yangtso and Manohara Khadka—are featured in the white paper, which also includes a comment from Matzner.

The white paper touches on topics like adaptation measures in the face of climate change and receding glaciers; the implications of water challenges for women, poor and marginalized communities; and how global networks in water and environmental security can aid Himalayan nations.

The paper also includes Dolma's, Yangtso's and Khadka's policy recommendations.

These recommendations call for:

- the People's Republic of China and other central governments to halt policies that prioritize extraction
- building the capacity of local governments to design, implement and assess the impact of policies on equitable access to and control over water, land and energy
- the Chinese government to provide access to Tibet for independent media, scientists, NGOs, UN monitors and other international observers
- investing in sustainable renewable energy sources, such as solar or wind energy. Properly sited and constructed for co-management, such installations can generate clean energy while maintaining additional values, such as grazing and herding. The technology exists, so it is a matter of making choices and much more

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Addresses Members of Tibetan Community in Toronto

08 April 2024, CTA

As part of his official engagements in Toronto, Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration addressed the members of the Tibetan community on 6 April 2024 at the auditorium of the Tibetan Canadian Cultural Centre.

While crediting His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama for establishing the unparalleled exiled Tibetan community with full-fledged democratic institution, Sikyong Penpa Tsering said, "Although more than six decades have passed since the start of our journey into exile, Tibetans are still struggling to sort out the long-standing Tibet-China conflict with full commitment.” However, given the uncompromising policies of Chinese President Xi Jinping, the Tibetan political leader added that immediate resolution of this conflict seems unattainable at the moment and, hence, implored Tibetans to remain dedicated and pool their efforts and energies in resolving the Tibet-China conflict without falling into petty internal infightings. Sikyong further illuminated the gathering about Central Tibetan Administration’s policy of Middle Way Approach, a win-win solution that aims to seek a peaceful solution through dialogue.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering during his meeting with Tibetan residents of Toronto at Tibetan Canadian Cultural Centre

In regard to the Tibet advocacy campaign, Sikyong informed that he paid special visits to countries with whom Tibet had no prior formal relationship to draw their attention to the plight of the Tibetan people and cautioned them against doing business with China. He pointed out that the current aggressive behaviour of China on the international stage has led to a negative attitude towards China in many countries and that this has led to a growing interest in the Tibetan freedom struggle.

Likewise, as the Resolve Tibet Act is currently making its way through the US House of Senators, Sikyong acknowledged that the goal of this visit is to garner support for the successful passage of this Tibet bill before concluding his talk.

On Sunday, Sikyong Penpa Tsering interacted with students and teachers of the Tibetan Weekend school and held a separate meeting with Tibetan youths to enlighten them about the geopolitical and strategic significance of the Tibetan plateau. Similarly, Sikyong also convened representatives of the Tibetan Buddhist Centres to discuss issues concerning Tibetan Buddhism, including the reincarnation of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama.

Until 11 April, Sikyong Penpa Tsering will undertake a series of official engagements in Toronto and Montreal before heading to the United States.

“Don’t flood your country with cheap Chinese products”: Tibetan leader in exile Sikyong Penpa

05 April 2024, Organiser

Exiled Tibetan leader Sikyong Penpa Tsering advised against inundating nations with inexpensive Chinese goods, highlighting the threat posed to local industries. Tsering underscores China's strategic trade tactics, urging caution in engaging with their exports to the Global South.

Fretting over “dumping” by China to Global South—that is, exporting goods at artificially low prices, President of Central Tibetan Administration of Tibetan government-in-exile Sikyong Penpa Tsering, warned them to be careful while doing business with China.....

While speaking to ANI, Sikyong Penpa Tsering said, “China is now exporting more to the Global South, and my warning to those countries is don’t flood your country with cheap Chinese products because they are going to kill your industries. Nothing comes for free from China. They always come with the strategy.”.....China’s overinvestment and excess capacity could result in cheap products flooding global markets, affecting local industries and employment. Raising concern over cheap Chinese products inundating the Global South, Tsering urged the nations to give China less business. The only way to bring them down, to their knees is through the economy. Give them less business, and then they won’t have all that money to splurge on the Belt and Road initiatives (BRI) and create a dead economy worldwide,” said Tsering. BRI aims to connect Asia, Africa, and Europe. Its goal is to increase trade, improve regional integration, and stimulate economic growth. Sikyong Penpa Tsering also raised concern over China controlling regional water resources, shown in its reluctance to sign international agreements on cross-border water management. The country can seize water sources without any military force; because the rivers originate within its territory, they are seen as China’s natural assets. He said that China wants to control the water resources so they are building multiple dams in Tibet. This will have an impact on several countries.

Commenting on the building of multiple dams in Tibet by China, Tsering stated, “You know the 10 major rivers that flow out of Tibet go into 10 different countries, and from China to 5 countries in Southeast Asia. Burma Cambodia, Thailand, Vietnam, Nepal, Pakistan, and Bangladesh all have rivers as precious commodities.

“Some people say that the ‘Third World War’ could happen because of water, if that is the case, then I consider Tibet a hotspot. Because Tibet is now also being offered as the water tower of Asia... because of the snow mountain ranges, people started calling Tibet the roof of the world, and now Chinese environmental scientists call Tibet a third pole," he added.

Climate change plays a key role in the water shortage crisis in China. For thousands of years, civilisations along the Yangtze and Yellow Rivers fed on the glacial meltwater from the Qinghai-Tibetan Plateau – also known as 'The Third Pole'. Once a stable source of river flow, the ice mass is now less capable of supplying glacial melt with fresh snow and ice, since global warming has raised the temperature of the glacial region by 3- 3.5C over the past half-century.

Furthermore, he expressed concerns about several villages and monasteries facing inundation. He said to media, "Several villages are going to be inundated, about six monasteries, 600 to 700 years old will be submerged in water and ultimately destroyed, so the Chinese government has no more concerns about addressing the grievances of the local people."

During an interview with media, Tsering emphasised there will be no normalisation of relationships due to the Chinese activities along the Ladakh border.

"So in that sense, we see the continuity of the programmes and right now with this government, having taken a stronger position on the diligence on the Ladakh border by the Chinese government, that till there is disengagement from all sectors there will be no normalisation of relationships and adding to all these are also developments in the maritime security of India, including Maldives," Tsering added. He also spoke on the India-Maldives diplomatic rift, Tsering said, "We are talking about the Maldives government asking the Indian army to move out by May 10 so all these geopolitical developments are not helping build better relations." The Maldives has recently found itself in the midst of diplomatic turmoil, raising questions about its relations with India through undiplomatic remarks, military positioning, and the scrapping of crucial agreements. Maldives has also signed new deals with China, further complicating the geopolitical landscape.

"So just as China is complaining that the US is trying to contain us, China has been trying to contain India for the last so many decades and they can't apply double standards. What works for them is fine and what doesn't work for them isn't fine for the Chinese," he said.

Sri Lankan monks present Buddha relics to HH the Dalai Lama

04 April 2024, Tibetan Review

A delegation of Buddhist monks from Sri Lanka has on Apr 4 presented to His Holiness the Dalai Lama at

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Dharamshala, relics of the Buddha that has been kept at their monastery for the last one and a quarter century. It was stated to be a long-standing aim of a group of Sri Lankan Buddhists led by the Most Venerable Dr Waskaduwe Mahindawansa Maha Nayaka Thero, head of Amarapura Sambuddha Sasanodaya Maha Nikaya, to realise this historic occasion.

The presentation was coordinated by Dr Damenda Porage, Founder-President of the Sri Lanka-Tibetan Buddhist Brotherhood in Sri Lanka.

His Holiness greeted the relics at the gate of his residence from a ceremonial procession led by the Most Venerable Thero and his party from Sri Lanka.

His Holiness respectfully touched the portable reliquary with his bowed head as the Sri Lankan party chanted auspicious verses.

"We pray for your good health and long life and offer these relics to you," the Most Venerable Thero was quoted as having told His Holiness. "We, members of the Sri Lankan Mahasangha appreciate your service to the world," the Most Venerable Thero has told His Holiness. "Teaching the world loving-kindness is one of the Buddha's accomplishments. You too are doing what the Buddha did. We have metta for everyone. Cultivating warm-heartedness is what the Dharma is about." (Metta is a Buddhist concept meaning benevolence, loving-kindness, friendliness, amity, good will, and active interest in others.)

Sitting with the Most Venerable Thero, joined by Prof Samdhong Rinpoché, Ling Rinpoché, Kirti Rinpoché, and Sikyong Penpa Tsering, His Holiness has said, among other things: "I respect all religious traditions, but it's Buddhism in particular that employs reason. This is why we are able to hold our own in discussions with scientists. I've met scientists who were initially sceptical about religion in general who eventually became Buddhists.

"Now, on a practical level, the world needs peace and that's the core of the Buddha's message. However, I'm prepared not to mention Buddhism as such but to emphasize secular ethics and universal values crucial among which is compassion. The important thing is to have a warm heart. Consequently, I'm committed to encouraging people to cultivate loving-kindness. What I want to convey is that I'm fully committed to promoting the Buddha's message from a secular point of view. What do you think?"

"It's a good way to approach the future," the Most Venerable Thero has responded.

After Buddha Shakyamuni's mortal remains were cremated following his passing away, what remained of his relics, in the form of fragments of bones and teeth, were divided among eight kingdoms. Stupas were then erected over them in Allakappa, Kapilavastu, Kushinagar, Pava, Rajagriha, Ramagrama, Vaishali, and Vethapida. During excavations at Piprahwa, which is identified with Kapilavastu, relics of the Buddha were discovered that had been enshrined by the Buddha's Shakyen relatives in Kapilavastu. In 1898, a British official, William Peppé, made a gift of these relics to the erudite Sri Lankan monk Most Venerable Waskaduwe Sri Subhuthi Mahanayake Thera, who brought them to Sri Lanka. The Most Venerable Dr Waskaduwe Mahindawansa Maha Nayaka Thero and his party arrived this morning at Kangra airport at Gaggal and drove up from there to His Holiness's residence to make its presentation to him.

Dalai Lama determined to live 100+ years to continue to serve Buddhадharma

04 April 2024, Tibetan Review

At a time when the Buddhадharma is seeing a bit of a decline, I am determined to serve it for another 15-20 years, said Holiness the Dalai Lama Apr 3 at a ceremony to offer long-life prayers to him made by the Toepa and Purang Tibetan communities.

His Holiness said the heartfelt sincerity of devotion of those making the offering has been a source encouragement to him. Besides, he said, doctors most recently told him that he was in sound health.

The ceremony was led by Ling Rinpoché. He was joined in the front row by the two reincarnations of Trulshik Rinpoché and to his right, the Abbot of Sera-mé, the Lobsön of his Namgyal Monastery and Bodong Rinpoché. To his left sat the Abbot of Drepung Loseling and the Abbot of Tawang Monastery. In his address at the end of the ceremony, His Holiness said: "This is a time when the Buddhадharma is in (a bit of a) decline and yet there have been many causes and conditions for me to be able to serve the teaching of the Buddha. Today, in places where the Dharma had not previously spread, people are taking interest in what the Buddha had to say about the workings of the mind and emotions, scientists particularly among them.

"Whether they are religious or not, there are growing numbers of people who appreciate that we can bring peace to the world by first achieving peace within. In this context this is my prayer:

"Wherever the Buddha's teaching has not spread
And wherever it has spread but has declined

May I, moved by great compassion, clearly elucidate
This treasury of excellent benefit and happiness for all." He also said: "At the same time, I would like to encourage people to have a keener sense of ethics, to serve humanity and, through understanding the functioning of their minds and emotions, to cultivate peace of mind. The inner and outer conditions exist for me to do this and the Dharma Protectors, who take responsibility for defending and preserving the Dharma, are helping me in what I'm trying to do."

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Expresses Solidarity with Victims of Taiwan Earthquake

03 April 2024, CTA

Thekchen Chöling, Dharamsala, HP, India – His Holiness the Dalai Lama has written today to Tsai Ing-wen, President of Taiwan, the Republic of China, to express his sadness to learn of the loss of life and extensive devastation of property and infrastructure that has taken place during a powerful earthquake off the east coast of Taiwan this morning.

"I pray for those who have lost their lives," he wrote, "as well as for the many who have been injured as a result of this natural disaster. I offer my condolences to Your Excellency and to the families of all who have been affected by this tragedy.

"I commend your Government and its concerned agencies for their swift response as they seek to rescue the injured and provide relief to those who need help.

China celebrates annexation of Tibet with events in border villages

02 April 2024, Phayul

China has organized celebratory events in newly built border villages close to the borders with India and Bhutan to commemorate the anniversary of its annexation of Tibet last week on March 28.

Chinese state-run Xinhua news agency in its report stated that March 28th marks the 65th anniversary of what China terms the "democratic reform" in its southwestern so-called Xizang Autonomous Region, globally known as Tibet.

The celebrations were highlighted in the state-run Global Times, emphasizing their presence in the newly established border villages adjacent to India and Bhutan. China has been actively constructing well-equipped settlements along these borders, a move that has sparked concerns in both India and Bhutan.

A recent report in February revealed that three villages, featuring modern infrastructure for residents and soldiers, were erected along the disputed boundary with Bhutan. While China portrays these developments as part of its poverty alleviation efforts, they are also viewed by critics as strategic moves to broaden its foothold in the Himalayan region.

According to the Global Times, China has constructed approximately 624 such villages in border regions. The report underscored the celebrations held across these areas, depicting them as symbols of development and progress. In specific regions like the so-called Yadong County and Medog County, located along the southern borderlands with India and Bhutan, multiple events were organized to mark the anniversary.

China's relentless efforts to develop these border areas, coupled with its strategic undertones, continue to be closely monitored by India and neighbouring countries, especially amid ongoing geopolitical tensions in the region.

Two days after the celebration on Saturday, China announced the renaming of 30 additional places within a disputed border region with India, in a move seen as a bid to reinforce its territorial claims in the area. The Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs released the updated list of names on Saturday, covering various locations in Arunachal Pradesh, a border state of India.

US government allocates $23 million to support Tibetan programs

02 April 2024, Phayul

The US has earmarked $23 million to support Tibetan programs, according to the Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet (ICT). This allocation forms part of the extensive $1.2 trillion government funding bill recently passed by the US Congress and signed into law by President Joe Biden on March 23, aimed at financing various federal initiatives. The funds allocated to Tibetan programs include language preservation, environmental conservation, and efforts to strengthen Tibetan democracy in exile.

Among the allocations for Tibetan programs, $10 million is designated for non-governmental organisations (NGOs) with proven experience in collaborating with Tibetan communities. This funding aims to support activities focused on preserving cultural traditions, fostering sustainable development, enhancing education, and promoting environmental conservation in Tibet.

Additionally, $8 million is allocated to promote and safeguard Tibetan culture and language within Tibetan refugee and diaspora communities. This funding will also contribute to the development and resilience of Tibetan communities and the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in India and Nepal. Moreover, it will facilitate the education and empowerment of the next generation of Tibetan leaders from these communities.

Furthermore, $5 million is set aside to enhance the capacity of the CTA, which governs democratically for Tibetans in exile. A portion of this support, up to $1.5 million, can be utilised for initiatives aimed at economic growth and capacity-building, including assistance for displaced Tibetan refugee families residing in India and Nepal.

The legislation also included a provision stipulating that no federal funds should be allocated for the production of maps or any other materials that depict Tibet as part of the People's Republic of China. This restriction remains in effect until the Chinese government engages in negotiations to reach a mutually agreed resolution regarding the status of Tibet.

Franz Matzner, director of government relations at the International Campaign for Tibet, hailed the new funding bill, stating, "The United States has once again demonstrated its commitment to the Tibetan people in concrete terms that provide crucial resources for their pursuit of freedom and cultural preservation in the face of the Xi Jinping regime's escalating oppression.

"For those fighting for survival in Tibet, every dollar counts—and we are grateful for each one. For those outside Tibet, Congress' investment in maintaining the Tibetan people's distinct language, religion and way of life provides essential aid and a firm message of hope and solidarity."

March

Latest US gov't spending bill allocates $23 million for Tibet support projects

30 March 2024, Tibetan Review

The massive $1.2 trillion government funding bill passed by the US Congress earlier this month and signed into law by President Joe Biden on Mar 23 to fund the rest of the federal government included provisions totalling $23 million for Tibetan programmes, said Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet (ICT, savetibet.org) Mar 29. The Tibetan-programme allocations cover projects in areas that include language preservation, environmental protection, and Tibetan democracy in exile.

Also, included in the bill's more than 1,000 pages is a narration which bans federal spending on maps or other materials that recognize Tibet as part of the People's Republic of China until the Chinese government agrees to a negotiated resolution of Tibet's status.

Of the allocations for Tibetan programmes, $10 million is meant for NGOs that have experience working with Tibetan communities to support activities that preserve cultural traditions and promote sustainable development, education and environmental conservation in Tibet.

Besides, $8 million is earmarked for promoting and preserving Tibetan culture and language in Tibetan refugee and diaspora communities, as well as development and the resilience of Tibetan communities and the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in India and Nepal. This funding will also assist in the education and development of the next generation of Tibetan leaders from those communities, said the savetibet.org report.

In addition, $5 million is allocated for strengthening the capacity of the CTA, which provides democratic governance for Tibetans in exile. Up to $1.5 million of this support can be made available to address economic growth and capacity-building activities, including for displaced Tibetan refugee families in India and Nepal, the report said.

The bill's documents also address China's attempts to spread disinformation about Tibet and avoid negotiating with Tibetan leaders. It forbids spending on documents, reports, maps or other materials that recognize Tibet as part of the People's Republic of China "until the Secretary of State reports to the appropriate congressional committees that the Government of the PRC has reached a final negotiated agreement on Tibet with the Dalai Lama or his representatives or with democratically-elected leaders of the Tibetan people."

Franz Matzner, director of government relations at the ICT, has said: "The United States has once again demonstrated its commitment to the Tibetan people in concrete terms that provide crucial resources for their pursuit of freedom and cultural preservation in the face of the Xi Jinping regime's escalating oppression. "For those fighting for survival in Tibet, every dollar counts—and we are grateful for each one. For those outside Tibet, Congress' investment in maintaining the Tibetan people's distinct language, religion and way of life provides essential aid and a firm message of hope and solidarity."

Tibetan musician advocates colonial boarding school in Tibet, sparks backlash

23 March 2024, Phayul

A controversial remark by a Tibetan musician named Dechen Shak-Dagsay based in Switzerland advocating the colonial-style boarding schools run by China in Tibet, has sparked condemnation and censure from fellow Tibetans.

In a seminar titled, "The Protection of Human Rights for Minorities: Progress in China's Ethnic Autonomous Region" at the University of Geneva organised by the China Society for Human Rights Studies (CSHRS), Dechen can be seen expressing her wish for the success of the Chinese colonial boarding system in Tibet and referred to Tibet as "Xizang."

"Last but not the least I would like to express my wish that this Tibetan students boarding project in Xizang will be very successful," she stated.

This statement made by Dechen has drawn backlash, particularly from the Tibetan diaspora in exile. Many within the community argue that the use of the term "Xizang" represents a concession to the Chinese government terminology regarding Tibet and a direct attempt by Beijing to push their narrative. Others have said that her remarks contradict overwhelming evidence and reports documenting human rights abuses associated with China's coerced colonial boarding school system in Tibet.

A comprehensive report published by the Tibet Action Institute with Tibetan educationist Dr. Gyal lo point out that these schools enforce mandatory attendance and use Chinese as the primary medium of instruction, effectively eroding the Tibetan language and culture. Additionally, reports suggest that over a million Tibetan children have been separated from their families forcefully due to these policies, raising concerns about the impact on familial and cultural ties, against the backdrop of China's totalitarian regime.

Furthermore, Dechen's praise for the colonial boarding school system and her use of the term "Xizang" to refer to Tibet has been met with strong disapproval from the Central Tibetan Administration's advocacy groups like the Voluntary Tibetan Advocacy Group (V-TAG), "V-TAG condemned her assertion and the use of the term "Xizang" to refer to Tibet, and her unabashed praise for the oppressive Colonial Boarding School System, which forcibly impose Mandarin upon millions of Tibet students, eroding their cultural identity."

Like many Tibetans, V-TAG also demanded unequivocal clarifications from Dechen, specifically regarding her stance on these colonial boarding schools. The group challenged her to substantiate her claims by disclosing the names of the schools she visited and providing evidence of her interactions with Tibetan students. Her remarks were also met with strong opposition in the ongoing session of the Tibetan Parliament in Exile.

2023 Annual Report on Human Rights Situation in Tibet Released

21 March 2024, CTA

By Tibetan Centre for Human Rights & Democracy. 20 March 2024.

Even as China ended its draconian zero-Covid policy measures in 2023, Tibetans continue to face escalating crackdowns on freedom of expression, religion and belief. Despite numerous calls from the international community to immediately halt its forced assimilation policy, Chinese authorities imposed Chinese medium education in Tibetan schools and amended local regulations in Tibetan areas to promote Mandarin Chinese.

Tibetans face restrictions not only on their right to freedom of assembly but also on expressing opinions or criticisms against repressive and unjust government policies, both online and offline. Under the guise of maintaining social stability, Chinese authorities exercise direct supervision and censorship over all online platforms.

The right to freedom of religion and belief faced further restrictions as Chinese authorities introduced more repressive regulations to exercise total control over the establishment, management and activities of the religious activity sites. Despite the relaxation of Zero-Covid restrictions, it made no difference to Tibetan Buddhists, who continued to face restrictions in undertaking religious pilgrimages.

Tibetan detainees inside Tibet continue to face a litany of human rights violations. Those arbitrarily, preventatively or forcefully detained underwent unjust sentencing and torture, resulting in custodial deaths. Incommunicado detention in undisclosed locations without due process also remained a regular practice, leading to lasting health issues and premature deaths among political prisoners upon release.

Click here to read more.

Human Rights Violations in Tibet Raised at 55th UN Human Rights Council Session

21 March 2024, CTA

A Tibetan delegate urged the UN Human Rights Council to promptly address concerning reports of China's human rights violations.

Phuntsok Topgyal, the UN Advocacy Officer at the Tibet Bureau in Geneva, delivered an oral statement on March 20, 2024, during the 55th UN Human Rights Council Session, highlighting critical human rights issues demanding attention. He expressed alarm over China's systematic efforts to eradicate Tibetan cultural identity.

Topgyal emphasised the significance of the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising, stressing the ongoing flagrant violations of Tibetan people's rights over the past six decades. He urged immediate action from the council to halt these abuses. Topgyal outlined the dire situation in Tibet, citing concerns such as the enrolment of nearly 1 million Tibetan students in residential schools, China's extensive surveillance measures including iris scans and DNA collection from Tibetans, and the unresolved disappearance of the 11th Panchen Lama, Gedun Choekyi Nyima, who will reach 35 years of age this year.

Highlighting recent events, Topgyal noted that just four days before the 55th Human Rights Council session, Chinese authorities conducted mass arrests of Tibetans peacefully protesting the construction of a large dam in Derge. This dam project threatens to displace two villages, destroy Buddhist monasteries, and obliterate ancient murals.

Topgyal urged China to release all Tibetan protestors unconditionally and to halt the dam project, which poses a significant threat to the delicate ecosystem of the Tibetan Plateau. He called upon the UN Human Rights Council to demand that China refrain from arbitrary detention and violence against peaceful protestors, such as Gonpo Kyi, and instead uphold their right to freedom.

The video link to the oral statement is here. <http://webtv.un.org/en/asset/k1a/k1a6tk9tw4>

Office of Tibet in Canberra Urges Australian Foreign Minister to Address Tibet Issue During Chinese Counterpart's Visit

19 March 2024, CTA

In an urgent plea ahead of Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi's visit to Australia this week, Representative Karma Singey has called upon the Australian Foreign Minister Penny Wong to prioritise discussions on the critical situation in Tibet.

Highlighting the escalating repression and systemic discrimination faced by Tibetans under Chinese rule, the Representative has underscored the urgent need for international attention and action.

In a letter addressed to the Australian Foreign Minister, Representative Karma Singey states that Wang Yi's forthcoming visit serves as a crucial opportunity to raise concerns regarding the deteriorating human rights situation in Tibet.

The letter outlines various violations, including the forced separation of Tibetan children from their families and their indoctrination into Chinese Communist ideology within state-run boarding schools. Additionally, it highlights the severe restrictions imposed on religious practices, arbitrary detentions of Tibetan monks and individuals, and the recent crackdown on peaceful Tibetan protesters in Derge County.

Emphasising the importance of holding China accountable for its human rights abuses, the Representative urged the Australian government to utilise its diplomatic engagement with China to address these pressing issues.

During the anticipated meeting between the Australian Foreign Minister and Wang Yi, the Representative has urged for the following actions:

1. Raise the Tibet issue and the ongoing human rights crisis, including the ongoing repression of political and religious freedoms, environmental degradation and the eradication of Tibetan cultural and language.
2. Urge the Chinese government to immediately and unconditionally release all Tibetan protesters in Derge County who have been wrongfully detained for exercising their fundamental rights of peaceful protest and to ensure proper and timely medical treatment for injured Tibetans.

3. Encourage China to allow greater access to Tibet by international observers and greater freedom of media and movement in Tibet.
4. Encourage China to genuinely commit to resolving the Tibet issue by reopening the Sino-Tibetan dialogue.

As Australia maintains a significant trade relationship with China, the Representative stressed the importance of incorporating human rights concerns into bilateral discussions to foster a more equitable and just relationship between the two nations.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering Meets with Martin Luther King III, Discusses Tibetan Freedom Movement

18 March 2024, CTA

Sikyong Penpa Tsering addressing the delegation.

Dharamshala: Sikyong Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration met with Martin Luther King III, a global human rights activist and the son of Martin Luther King Jr, and a delegation from Dalai Lama Center today at the Kashag secretariat.

During the meeting, Sikyong Penpa Tsering presented an overview of the political history of Tibet, situations inside Tibet, and the Tibetan community in exile. To shed light on Tibetan freedom movement, Sikyong introduced ancient ties between Tibet and China and Tibet and India, and debunked the PRC's claim over Tibet as its integral part since time immemorial and underscored resolving the Tibet-China conflict through the Middle Way Approach while maintaining the historically proven Tibet as a separate entity.

Sikyong brought to light concerning situations inside Tibet, particularly the deteriorating environment brought about by Beijing's exploitation and misapplication of Tibet's river system, the systematic elimination of Tibet's distinct identity, the Chinese government's appropriation of Tibetan religion and manipulation of the system of recognising high lamas reincarnations, and the expansion of sophisticated surveillance inside Tibet. Sikyong Penpa Tsering further spoke about the exiled Tibetan community and the principal responsibilities of the Central Tibetan Administration.

Martin Luther King III, who received a special audience with His Holiness the Dalai Lama earlier this morning, shared his interest in collaborating with the US-based Dalai Lama Centre to promote the oneness of humanity to Sikyong during the meeting.

New resolution on Tibet introduced in the US House

18 March 2024, RTV

A new resolution has been introduced in the United States House of Representatives titled "Recognizing the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan Uprising Day of March 10, 1959, and condemning human rights violations related to the hydropower dam construction project in Derge". The resolution that condemns China's mass arrest of peaceful Tibetan protestors and reaffirms the support for Tibetan self-determination was introduced by Representatives Jim McGovern, D-Massachusetts, and Young Kim, R-California, on Monday, March 11.

The resolution acknowledges the historical events surrounding the Tibetan Uprising Day, particularly the efforts of Tibetan people who formed a human barricade around the Dalai Lama's residence to protect him from Chinese troops in 1959. Additionally, it acknowledges the recent protests in Derge County, eastern Tibet, against a hydropower dam project that would displace residents and destroy Buddhist monasteries.

Rep. McGovern said: "It's been 65 years since His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama was forced to flee as the People's Republic of China forcibly took control of Tibet. Every day since, the Tibetan people have been defending their human rights and fighting for their self-determination. The PRC must comply with its laws and its international human rights obligations, and stop oppressing Tibetans."

Rep. Kim said: "The Tibetan people have suffered the Chinese Communist Party's oppression and control for 70 years, and the CCP shows no signs of slowing down until it has erased Tibetan culture. The freedom-loving people of Tibet deserve our support. I'm proud to join Rep. McGovern in a bipartisan call to stand with the Tibetan people and urge the Biden administration to enforce laws in place to hold the CCP accountable."

The resolution reaffirms the House's support for Tibetan human rights and condemns China's efforts to erase Tibetan cultural identity, particularly by condemning projects like the hydropower dam project in Derge. It demands the immediate release of protestors and prisoners of conscience, along with apologies and redress for rights violations.

Additionally, it calls on the Biden administration to urge China to halt the dam project and respect Tibetan input into development projects.

This resolution adds to previous Congressional actions supporting Tibet, including the passage of the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act of 2018 and the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020. The House also recently passed the Resolve Tibet Act, aimed at pushing China to negotiate peacefully with Tibetan leaders to resolve the conflict in Tibet.

Tibet Policy Institute Convenes Panel Discussion Titled “China’s Dam in Dege” on International Day of Action for Rivers

14 March 2024, CTA

The Tibet Policy Institute, a research centre affiliated with the Central Tibetan Administration, convened a panel discussion entitled “China’s Dam in Dege: Assessing the Social, Cultural, and Ecological Impact on Tibetans and Beyond” in commemoration of the International Day of Action for Rivers.

Held at DIIR Lhakpa Tsering Hall, CTA, Dharamshala, the event featured distinguished panellists including Research Fellow Dechen Palmo from the Tibet Policy Institute, CTA; Researcher Ngawang Lungtok from the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights & Democracy; and Senior Environmental Researcher Dr Lobsang Yangtso from the International Tibet Network, with moderation by Dr Tenzin Lhadon, Research Fellow of the Tibet Policy Institute, CTA.

Attendees representing various Tibetan NGOs and Tibetan media outlets gathered to participate in the insightful discussions.

TPI’s Deputy Director, Zamlha Tempa Gyaltsen, provided a comprehensive overview of the subject matter and introduced the esteemed panellists.

The panel discussion commenced with poignant opening remarks from each panellist, delving into the recent damming project and its multifaceted implications within their respective domains of expertise. Dechen Palmo from TPI underscored the socio-economic repercussions of the Dege Dam construction, urging affected downstream nations to unify and confront the issue with China.

Ngawang Lungtok from TCHRD shed light on the human rights dimensions, while Dr Lobsang Yangtso from ITN elucidated the environmental ramifications of the dam initiative.

The moderator articulated the primary objective of the panel discussion: to raise awareness about the recent damming endeavour in Dege, Kham, and its consequential displacement of Tibetan communities and religious institutions.

Following the panellists’ insights, the audience engaged with pertinent inquiries. The session, supported by USAID and NDI, concluded with a ten-point call to action, underscoring the imperative for collective advocacy and action on this pressing issue.

1. Cease Construction of Dams Without Local Consent: Considering the potential social, cultural, and ecological impacts of the ongoing dam construction in Dege, the Chinese government should halt the construction of all large hydropower dams which are against the needs and wishes of the local communities. Additionally, any forced relocations should cease immediately, and Tibetans unjustly detained for expressing their concerns should be unconditionally released, with proper medical care provided to the injured.

2. Enhance Transparency in Eco-Environment Information: The Chinese government should prioritise transparency by disclosing more information about hydropower development plans in Tibet’s major rivers, such as Drichu, Zachu, Machu, Gyalmo Ngulchu, Senge Tsangpo and Yarlung Tsangpo to ensure people’s right to be informed.

3. Increase Public Involvement in Environmental Decision-making: There should be improved public participation in planning and decision-making processes, including thorough Environmental and Social Impact Assessments for all development projects in Tibet. Public involvement in evaluating plans with potential adverse environmental impacts should be allowed to safeguard environmental rights.

4. Conduct Seismic Risk Assessments: Given Tibet’s high seismic activity, thorough seismic risk assessments are necessary to understand the potential risks posed by earthquakes to large dams and the millions of people living along Tibet’s rivers, including people in Tibet, China, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Burma, Thailand, Laos and Cambodia.

5. Advocate for Free, Prior, and Informed Consent: Governments, NGOs, and civil society groups should advocate for genuine adherence to Free, Prior, and Informed Consent principles, ensuring proper compensation, resettlement, and preservation of cultural heritage before initiating any projects requiring local consent, particularly concerning dam construction in Tibet.

6. Disengage from Businesses Affecting Tibetan Environment: The international community should cease business relations with Chinese companies involved in environmentally detrimental activities, such as mining and dam construction in Tibet until there is a demonstrable improvement in human rights conditions for Tibetans and all social and environmental concerns are fully addressed.

7. Ratify Human Rights Treaties: China should promptly ratify crucial human rights treaties to protect local communities and indigenous inhabitants from coercion related to relocation or the destruction of culturally significant sites.

8. Recognise the Ecological Importance of Tibet: China and the global community should acknowledge the ecological significance of the Tibetan Plateau, recognising its biodiversity, influence on regional weather patterns, and its role in ensuring food and water security in Asia.

9. Address Colonial Behaviours in Tibet: Recognise and rectify the impact of Chinese colonial policies in Tibet since 1959, including resource extraction, dam construction, and forced resettlement of Tibetan nomads. Adopt a rights-based approach to protect frontline communities and respect traditional knowledge.

10. Cease Criminalisation of Environmental Defenders: The Chinese state should refrain from criminalising Tibetan environmental defenders and release all individuals, such as A-nya Sengdra and Karma Samdrup, detained for peaceful activism against dam construction and forced relocation in Tibet.

House resolution supports Tibetan self-determination, protestors

12 March 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

A new bipartisan House resolution will condemn China's recent mass arrest of peaceful Tibetan protestors and reaffirm House support for Tibetan self-determination following the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising.

Reps. Jim McGovern, D-Mass., and Young Kim, R-Calif., introduced the resolution "Recognizing the 65th anniversary of the Tibetan Uprising Day of March 10, 1959, and condemning human rights violations related to the hydropower dam construction project in Derge" on Monday, March 11.

The resolution recognizes the thousands of Tibetan people who formed a human shield around the Dalai Lama's residence on March 10, 1959 to protect their leader from the imminent threat of abduction by Chinese troops. Seven days later, the Dalai Lama was able to escape into exile to keep the Tibetan cause alive.

The resolution also recognizes the Tibetan mass protesters in Derge (Chinese: Dege) county in eastern Tibet. Last month, those protestors demonstrated against a hydropower dam project that would reportedly force residents of two villages to abandon their homes and destroy six Buddhist monasteries containing centuries-old religious murals. Chinese authorities reportedly arrested over 1,000 Tibetan people in the wake of the protests.

The resolution comes as over 200 Tibetan Americans and Tibet supporters are in Washington, DC for the annual Tibet Lobby Day, an event organized by the International Campaign for Tibet that brings advocates to the nation's capital to meet with their Congressional offices.

Quotes from Congress members, ICT

Rep. McGovern said: "It's been 65 years since His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama was forced to flee as the People's Republic of China forcibly took control of Tibet. Every day since, the Tibetan people have been defending their human rights and fighting for their self-determination. The PRC must comply with its own laws and its international human rights obligations, and stop oppressing Tibetans."

Rep. Kim said: "The Tibetan people have suffered the Chinese Communist Party's oppression and control for 70 years, and the CCP shows no signs of slowing down until it has erased Tibetan culture. The freedom-loving people of Tibet deserve our support. I'm proud to join Rep. McGovern in a bipartisan call to stand with the Tibetan people and urge the Biden administration to enforce laws in place to hold the CCP accountable."

International Campaign for Tibet President Tencho Gyatso: "This resolution is a tribute to the resistance and resilience of the Tibetan people over 65 years, as well as the US Congress' consistent, bipartisan support for their cause. From the Tibetan National Uprising of 1959 to the recent protests in Derge, the Tibetan people have continued to reject China's attempts to destroy their culture and way of life, and Congress has been inspirational in supporting their efforts. We thank Reps. McGovern and Kim for introducing this resolution, and we look forward to working with them and their colleagues not only to pass this legislation in the House, but to pass the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act in the Senate, too."

House resolution

The resolution confirms the House's "longstanding support for the human rights, including the right of self-determination, of the Tibetan people." It also "condemns the People's Republic of China's persistent efforts to erase the Tibetan people's distinct religious, cultural, linguistic, and historical identity."

According to the resolution, those efforts include the hydropower dam project in Derge. The resolution condemns China's "arbitrary detention" of the protestors and expresses "grave concern" for their well-being. It demands China immediately release the protestors and all prisoners of conscience.

The resolution also demands that China "publicly apologize" for violating the protestors' rights, "provide immediate redress for physical and emotional trauma, and expunge from the detainees' official records any mention of the arrests or charges."

The resolution calls on the Biden administration to urge Chinese authorities to halt the dam project unless China takes local Tibetans' views into account and obtains their genuine consent.

The Biden administration should also insist that China abide by its commitments to safeguard cultural heritage, and the administration should fully implement the Tibet Project Principles that require Tibetan input into development projects.

Read the House resolution.

Resolving Tibet

The new resolution is the latest in a major wave of Congressional support for Tibet, including the passage of the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act of 2018 and the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020.

Last month, the House passed the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, a bipartisan bill introduced by McGovern and Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Texas. Kim spoke in support of the legislation on the House floor.

Known as the Resolve Tibet Act, the bill will strengthen US efforts to push China to resolve the crisis in Tibet through peaceful negotiations with Tibetan leaders.

China eroding Tibetan language, religion: Sikyong on 65th uprising day

11 March 2024, Hindustan Times

Penpa said that the forced assimilation of nearly one million Tibetan children in Chinese state-run colonial style boarding schools and promotion of Chinese language in kindergartens established across Tibet denies Tibetan children the right to learn and use their own language and cuts them off from their way of thinking, customs and beliefs

Sikyong (president) of Tibetan government-in-exile Penpa Tsering on Sunday alleged that China was using policies to erode Tibetan language and religion.

"The People's Republic of China is pursuing a policy of forging a strong sense of the Chinese as a single identity by erasing Tibetan identity, promotion of Chinese language by banning and minimising the teaching and use of Tibetan language and sinicisation of Tibetan Buddhism," he said while reading the statement of kashag (cabinet) on the 65th fifth anniversary of Tibetan National Uprising Day.

The kashag is the highest executive office of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) and is headed by Sikyong, the political leader elected by the exiled populace. On March 10 in 1959, the people of Tibet from the three traditional provinces rose in protest against the repression by the Chinese communist forces in capital Lhasa.

Penpa said that the forced assimilation of nearly one million Tibetan children in Chinese state-run colonial style boarding schools and promotion of Chinese language in kindergartens established across Tibet denies Tibetan children the right to learn and use their own language and cuts them off from their way of thinking, customs and beliefs.

The cabinet expressed concern over alleged destruction of Tibetan Buddhism.

"The regulations by China are aimed at controlling the numbers, recognition, eligibility and curriculum of monks and nuns, and properties, revenue, expenditure and management of monasteries and nunneries. These mandate the Chinese Communist Party's misappropriation of Tibetan people's authority to select reincarnation of trulkus, restriction on all religious activities and movement of monks and nuns across administrative areas. These extreme measures expand on the existing Chinese government's regulations to control Tibetan Buddhism," the cabinet said in a statement on Sunday.

They appealed to the PRC government to allow Tibetans to learn and use Tibetan as their official language as guaranteed in the Chinese constitution and law on regional national autonomy.

Tibetan Parliament-in-exile also expressed concern over the Chinese government's plan to build a major hydroelectric power dam in Dege area of Kham on the Driчу river.

About three thousand Tibetans, including monks and nuns, gathered in the hill town Dharamshala and held a protest march against China.

Tibetan Resistance Resurfaces: Protests Erupt Over Controversial Dam Construction

10 March 2024, Financial Express

As the world commemorates 65 years since the Tibetan rebellion on March 10th, demonstrations across global capitals, from Delhi to Dharamshala, underscore the enduring spirit of resistance against China's repressive regime.

A growing movement has started within the Chinese-occupied Tibet region. Triggered by China's plans to erect a dam in Wongpo Tok city of Dige County, protestors rally against the impending demolition of the region's historic and sacred monasteries.

Recently, approximately 1000 Tibetan citizens staged a demonstration outside the Eastern Tibet (Sichuan Province) headquarters of the Dige Administration. In response, Chinese authorities ruthlessly dispersed the protesters, leading to the arrest of nearly 100 individuals, including religious leaders from the Vonto Monastery. Alarming footage depicting Chinese officers clad in black are seen forcibly subduing demonstrators surfaced, amplifying global attention on the escalating tensions.

Reports in the public domain reveal that while 40 detainees have been released under strict conditions, forbidding any involvement in future protests or dissemination of protest-related materials, a pervasive atmosphere of surveillance looms over Tibetan social media platforms and communities. This resurgence of Tibetan dissent against the Chinese Communist government stems from mounting grievances surrounding stringent security measures and pervasive surveillance policies enforced by Xi Jinping's administration. Unlike previous sporadic movements, notably the 2021 protests following the suspicious death of a Tibetan youth, this current wave of unrest exhibits remarkable resilience and international solidarity.

Central to the discord is China's relentless exploitation of Tibet's abundant natural resources, epitomized by the construction of colossal infrastructure projects like the 13-story, 13900 MW Kamtok (Kham Dige) Dam on the Dri Chu (Yangtse) river. Local Tibetans fear not only displacement but also the imminent threat of flooding to cherished landmarks, including the 13th-century Wonto Monastery, revered for its profound historical and religious significance.

Beyond Tibet's borders, Tibetan diaspora communities, including those in India, mobilize in solidarity, amplifying the global outcry against CCP's oppressive policies. With protests coinciding with the upcoming anniversary of the Tibetan uprising, the Chinese administration intensifies efforts to suppress dissent, reflecting on their historical tactics to quell resistance.

Tibetans targeted by China-linked supply chain attacks using malicious language translators

07 March 2024, The Record

Tibetans are being targeted with corrupted language translation software in a cyber espionage campaign that began last September, according to new research.

The attackers – which cybersecurity firm ESET said are part of the Chinese government hacking group Evasive Panda – targeted Tibetans living in India, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Australia and the U.S.

In addition to the corrupt Windows and macOS software, ESET said the campaign also involved the compromise of the website of an organizer of an annual religious gathering called the Monlam Festival, which takes place in India each year.

The hackers added malicious code to the website to create a watering-hole attack – where attackers target specific groups by compromising popular platforms.

"We believe that the attackers capitalized, at the time, on the upcoming Monlam festival in January and February of 2024 to compromise users when they visited the festival's website-turned-watering-hole," ESET said. "In addition, the attackers compromised the supply chain of a software developer of Tibetan language translation apps."

ESET researcher Anh Ho, who discovered the attack, said the Evasive Panda hackers used several different types of malicious tools that they have spotted in other attacks on networks across East Asia.

Most notably, the group used MgBot – Evasive Panda's flagship Windows backdoor that has existed since at least 2012 and is used to steal files and credentials and record keystrokes. In April, Evasive Panda used the malware to target a telecom company in Africa.

The majority of MgBot's plugins are designed to steal information from popular Chinese applications such as QQ, WeChat, QQBrowser and Foxmail – all developed by Tencent.

Ho said ESET also discovered another backdoor that has not been publicly documented yet, naming it "Nightdoor." ESET noted that they discovered Nightdoor was used as far back as 2020, when it was deployed on the machine of a "high-profile target in Vietnam."

"The Nightdoor backdoor, used in the supply-chain attack, is a recent addition to Evasive Panda's toolset," Ho added.

ESET said it initially discovered the campaign in January after finding malicious code buried in a website run by the Kagyu International Monlam Trust, an organization based in India that promotes Tibetan Buddhism internationally.

The researchers theorized that the compromise was likely intended to take advantage of interest in the festival, which is held every January in the Indian city of Bodhgaya. In conjunction with the website attack, the researchers also found that an Indian software development company producing Tibetan language translation software was also compromised, with the attackers corrupting applications that deployed malicious downloaders on both Windows and macOS devices.

ESET found another compromise of a Tibetan news website called Tibetpost that was used to host the malicious payloads.

The use of MgBot is what led to ESET attributing the campaign to Evasive Panda – which has used the malware in attacks on a religious organization in Taiwan and elsewhere.

Evasive Panda has been operating since 2012, conducting dozens of attacks aligning with China's geopolitical interests on government entities in Myanmar, the Philippines, Taiwan and Vietnam.

Since 2020, ESET said it has seen Evasive Panda repeatedly hijack the update processes of legitimate software as a way to deliver its malware.

'China should leave Tibet:' Tibetans march near Parliament House to mark 65th uprising

10 March 2024, Times of India

NEW DELHI: Hundreds of Tibetans in exile took to the streets of New Delhi on Sunday to mark the 65th Tibetan National Uprising Day against China.

More than 300 protesters gathered near the Parliament House raising slogans such as "Tibet was never a part of China" and "China should leave Tibet."

The demonstrators waved Tibetan flags and carried photographs of their spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama. Seeking refuge in the town of Dharmasala since his escape from Tibet, the 88-year-old Dalai Lama advocates for substantial autonomy and the preservation of Tibet's native Buddhist culture, refusing China's claim that he is a separatist.

While India considers Tibet as part of China, it continues to host Tibetan exiles.

The Tibetan government-in-exile accuses China of trampling on the basic human rights of Tibetans and systematically eradicating their identity.

The New Delhi protest march, organised by the Tibetan Youth Congress, said that in 1959, the Chinese Communist regime occupied Tibet, leading to a Tibetan uprising.

"Since then, the Chinese regime has resorted to brutal tactics, resulting in the deaths of over a million Tibetans who peacefully protested against oppressive Chinese rule," the Tibetan Youth Congress said in a statement.

Statement: Kashag Urges PRC Govt to Immediately Release all Tibetans Detained in Derge Protests and Respect Rights & Aspirations of Tibetans

07 March 2024, CTA

The Central Tibetan Administration is highly concerned by the brutal crackdown on peaceful Tibetan protesters in Derge, Tibet by the authorities of the People's Republic of China (PRC) resulting in mass arbitrary detention and injuries to many Tibetans. Since last month, Tibetans have been appealing to halt the planned construction of hydroelectric power plant that would result in forceful relocation of hundreds of Tibetans from their ancestral village and destruction of centuries-old monasteries dating back to the 13th century that house a wealth of ancient relics and murals of Buddha.

On 14 February 2024, at least 300 Tibetans peacefully protested outside the Derge (Ch: Dege) County government in Karze "Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture" in the traditional province of Kham, now incorporated into Sichuan Province, appealing to stop the hydroelectric dam construction and to withdraw the official order for Tibetans to relocate. A week later, on 20 and 21 February, County officials and security forces in large numbers arrived at the two monasteries – Wontoe and Yena – in Wonpotoe (Tibetan: དཔོན་པོ་རྩེ། Ch: Wangbuding) township to prepare for their demolition. At that time, a large number of Tibetans appealed again by kneeling and crying in desperation to the Chinese officials to stop the demolition. Chinese police deployed in the region on 22 February severely beat Tibetans using weaponries resulting in injuries that necessitated hospitalization for many participating in the peaceful protest and also led to mass arrest and detention.

The construction of Kamtok (Ch: Gangtuo) dam, the 6th of 13 dams proposed along the upper reaches of Yangtze river, or Drichu in Tibetan, will submerge two villages – Wonpotoe (or Wontoe for short as locally known) in Derge County, Karze, and Shepa Village in Jomda County in Chamdo (Ch: Changdu) – as well as six monasteries along the riverbanks namely Yena, Wontoe, Khadho, Rabten, Gonsar and Tashi Monastery. Additionally, the Wontoe and Yena monasteries are at immediate risk of irreparable destruction of its ancient relics and murals of historical and religious significance.

Tibetan protesters are primarily concerned about the Chinese authorities' failure to legitimately consult with local Tibetans whose traditional livelihoods and customary way of lives are at the risk of facing complete disruption with the planned dam construction to which they have no say. The massive power of this hydroelectric plant, capable of generating 1.1 million kilowatts of electricity, will be transferred through the Ultra High Voltage "West to East" (Ch: xi dian dong song) transmission network only to Chinese cities, while Tibet will not be benefited from the hydropower plant in any significant way.

This recent crackdown on peaceful Tibetan protesters in Derge County demonstrates the disregard for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Tibetan people by the Chinese Communist Party. Currently, the Chinese authorities have completely shut down internet access and censored information relating to the protest on social media platforms as part of the widespread security clampdown in the area.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the President of the Central Tibetan Administration, said, "The crackdown of non-violent protests in Derge, as well as the disregard for Tibetans' fundamental rights by the Chinese authorities, is unacceptable on all levels. These punitive measures demonstrate China's preference for its communist ideology and economic interests over ensuring and upholding fundamental human rights of Tibetans. We urge the PRC government to immediately release all Tibetans detained in Derge protests and to respect the rights and aspirations of Tibetans. There is an urgent need for the world to hear the Tibetan voices and to confront the reality of Chinese misrule in Tibet.”

As we have urged and communicated to all foreign ministries, UN bodies and relevant offices for immediate attention and action, we reiterate our appeals to the international community, to call upon the PRC government to:

- Immediately and unconditionally release these Tibetan protesters who have been wrongfully detained for exercising their fundamental rights and to ensure proper and timely medical treatment for the injured Tibetans;
- Immediately halt the construction of mega hydropower dams in Tibet without the consent of the local population and taking into consideration its ecological implications;
- End the current crackdown, the forced and involuntary mass relocation of Tibetans from their ancestral lands and stop forced relocation without their consent in order to implement so-called economic development projects;
- Respect the religious sentiments and rights of the Tibetan people to practice and preserve Tibetan Buddhism and ancient monasteries;
- As a signatory to multiple international covenants and treaties, the PRC government must respect the rights and aspirations of the Tibetan people.

Most Indians Ignorant of Indo-Tibet Historic Ties, says Tibetan Activist News

06 March 2024, Deccan Chronicle

Tibetan activist Tenzin Tsundue on Wednesday called for educating Indian youth about Tibet, its culture, language, and ongoing struggles, in light of recent geopolitical tensions such as the Galwan Valley conflict. Delivering a talk that delves into the historical and contemporary ties between the Indian subcontinent and Tibet at the Guruswamy Centre, Tsundue said the lack of awareness about Tibet among Indian youth poses a significant challenge, hindering their understanding of the complex dynamics in the region, including the occupation of Tibetan territories by China.

Tsundue, who is also a poet, writer and Tibetan refugee and activist, blamed India’s historical policy of "Hindi-Cheeni Bhai-Bhai" (India-China brotherhood) and subsequent silence on the Tibet issue for the dearth of information about Tibet in India. He also pointed out the glaring omission of Tibet from Indian textbooks, despite its immense geopolitical importance and vast territorial expanse, covering two-thirds of India’s land area.

Recalling the historic ties between India and Tibet for centuries, Tsundue highlighted the vibrant trade that once thrived across the Himalayas, with commodities like jaggery from India and yak wool, cotton, and precious metals from Tibet flowing freely between the two territories. He spoke about the significance of the extensive 4,000-kilometre border shared by India and Tibet, spanning diverse landscapes and cultures, encompassing various Buddhist sects, languages, and traditional practices.

The lecture provided attendees with a comprehensive overview of the intricate relationship between the Indian Himalayas and Tibet, shedding light on historical ties, cultural exchanges, and contemporary challenges.

Austria: Protest held outside Chinese Embassy demanding release of Tibetans arrested in Sichuan

01 March 2024, Take One

Vienna [Austria], March 1 (ANI): The Tibetan diaspora held a protest in front of the Chinese Embassy in Vienna on Wednesday, demanding the release of arrested Tibetans in Sichuan who were peacefully protesting the planned construction of a dam in Tibet, local sources stated.

The protest was held to showcase their solidarity with Tibetans in China’s Sichuan province and the demonstrators called for the immediate release of hundreds of Tibetan monks and villagers.

During the protest, the Tibetan diaspora members raised slogans and held flags against this “illegal and inhumane action” by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). These Tibetan individuals also spoke about their stand against China’s “draconian laws in the occupied territory.”

The protesters carried placards that read, “Chinese Communist Party should stop the forced relocation and dam construction in Kham Dege Wonpo village in Tibet” and “China stop the demolition of homes and monasteries in Kham Dege in Tibet.”

One of the protesters said, “The proposed dam would submerge historic monasteries and numerous Tibetan villages. This dam is the sixth in a proposed series of 13 dams on the River Dri Chu. The demonstration in Sichuan province started when CCP officials came to demolish the Yena and Wontoe monasteries for the construction of the dam.”

“Yena monastery in Shiba village and Wontoe monastery in Wontoe village are cultural landmarks believed to date back over 700 years, and the mural paintings in the monasteries have historical importance,” he added.

Previously, three youngsters from the Tibetan community in Austria staged a protest in front of the Chinese Embassy in Vienna on Saturday over the human rights violations perpetrated by the Chinese Communist Party in Tibet.

They urged the international community to unite and openly support the Tibetan government-in-exile in their ongoing struggle to protect the human rights of Tibetans in Tibet.

Adopting a novel protest, the young Tibetans used a projector and played videos of the forceful displacement of Tibetans by the Chinese in Tibet on the walls of the Chinese Embassy in Vienna. They also projected words highlighting the human rights violations of China and the cultural genocide carried out by China to erase the Tibetan identity.

The young Tibetans, associated with the Voluntary Tibet Advocacy Group (V-TAG), Europe, also raised slogans against the large-scale environmental degradation happening in Tibet under the guise of huge projects that are unsustainable for the region.

During the protest, the young Tibetans also raised slogans in German to create awareness among the people in Austria about what is happening to Tibetans in Tibet: the deliberate extinction of a community, an identity.

According to young Tibetans, these projects, including huge defence establishments, and large dams, would displace a large number of Tibetans from their native homeland. One of the main objectives behind such projects is to forcefully relocate Tibetans and erase their identities.

The protesters stressed that the systematic disregard for the fundamental rights of Tibetans by the Chinese government reflects a blatant violation of international human rights law.

Protesters said that China, obligated to respect and adhere to mechanisms safeguarding people's rights, has been persecuting human rights defenders, forcibly resettling Tibetans, engaging in forced labour, fostering workplace discrimination, curtailing religious freedom and language rights, assimilating Tibetan children in boarding schools, and perpetrating cultural genocide.

February

Freedom House gives Tibet global freedom score of zero

29 February 2024, International Campaign for Tibet
After 65 years of Chinese occupation, Tibet's global freedom score has now dropped all the way to zero, watchdog group Freedom House says in its new Freedom in the World report.

"This score leaves no doubt that China's occupation of Tibet has been a global catastrophe," International Campaign for Tibet President Tencho Gyatso said. "For 65 years, the Chinese government has brutalized Tibet to the point that its global freedom score has now hit rock bottom. That is a clear indictment of China's failed policies in Tibet and the need for the Chinese government to get back to peaceful dialogue with Tibetan leaders to resolve this disastrous occupation."

In Freedom House's 2024 report—released today, Feb. 29—Tibet has a political rights score of negative 2 out of a possible 40 and a civil liberties score of 2 out of a possible 60. That gives Tibet an overall score of 0 out of 100.

The zero rating is Tibet's worst in at least eight years. Tibet had an overall score of 1 in Freedom House's 2023 report.

65th anniversary of Tibetan National Uprising

Tibet's new low score arrives as Tibetans prepare to mark the 65th anniversary of the March 10, 1959 Tibetan National Uprising and the subsequent flight of the Dalai Lama into exile on March 17, 1959.

Under China's rule, Tibetans lack the freedom to practice their Buddhist faith, speak their own language and even raise their own children.

One of the most horrific reports to emerge from Tibet in 2023—the year Freedom House analyzed for its report—was of China's state-run boarding schools in Tibet, which have separated over 1 million Tibetan children from their families and forced them to learn in Chinese with a curriculum focused on Chinese subjects.

The boarding schools are part of China's policy of "Sinification," which seeks to eliminate Tibetans' unique culture, language and identity by forcing them to assimilate as loyal subjects of the Chinese Communist Party.

China has also reportedly collected DNA from about 1 million residents of the Tibet Autonomous Region, which spans much of central and western Tibet. According to Human Rights Watch, the Chinese government has even taken blood from children as young as 5 without their parents' consent.

China has also clamped down on Tibet's borders, making it nearly impossible for foreign journalists, diplomats and tourists to enter the country—and for Tibetans to escape as refugees.

Resolving Tibet

Despite China's 65 years of brutality, Tibetans continue to show resistance and resilience.

Just this month, thousands of Tibetans in Derge (Chinese: Dege) County in eastern Tibet took part in mass protests against a proposed hydropower dam that will force two villages to vacate and destroy several Buddhist monasteries, including several centuries-old religious murals. Chinese authorities have reportedly arrested over 1,000 of the protestors.

Tibet has also received growing support from the international community.

At the UN Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review of China in January, the number of states that raised concerns about Tibet more than doubled compared to China's last review in 2018.

Earlier this month, the US House passed the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act. Known as the Resolve Tibet Act, the bipartisan bill will strengthen US efforts to push the Chinese government to get back to the negotiating table with Tibetan leaders to finally resolve China's 65-year occupation of Tibet.

Tibetans in India march in solidarity with those arrested in dam protest in China

28 February 2024, RFA

Other rallies were held in India's Bir and Clementown, and in London.

Tibetans and Buddhist leaders march in Ladakh, India, on Feb. 28, 2024, to show their solidarity with Tibetans in Dege county, southwestern China's Sichuan province, who were arrested for protesting China's planned construction of a dam on the Driчу River.

Tibetans and Buddhist leaders in northern India on Wednesday participated in a march to show their solidarity with Tibetans in southwestern China's Sichuan province arrested for peacefully protesting the planned construction of a dam.

Similar solidarity rallies were held in London and other cities the same day.

The large Buddhist community in Ladakh – in Jammu and Kashmir – expressed concerns that the dam project will submerge several significant monasteries with ancient murals that date back to the 13th century.

The Regional Tibetan Youth Congress, which organized the march and rally, said Buddhists there were concerned about the humanitarian situation and the violation of cultural and religious rights stemming from the expected impact of the dam on several monasteries and villages near the Driчу River.

On Feb. 23, police arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks and residents, of Dege county in Sichuan's Kardze Autonomous Tibetan Prefecture, who had been protesting the construction of the Gangtuo Dam, meant to generate electricity.

If built, the power station could submerge monasteries in Dege's Wangbuding township and force residents of at least two villages near the Driчу River to relocate, sources told RFA.

Rigzin Dorje, president of the youth wing of the Ladakh Buddhist Association Leh, said there is an urgent need to address the ongoing human rights abuses and environmental destruction perpetrated by China's communist government.

He underscored the interconnectedness of global Buddhist communities and the shared responsibility to stand in solidarity with Tibetans in their struggle for justice, freedom and dignity.

'Collective commitment'

Lobsang Tsering, vice president of the Regional Tibetan Youth Congress of Ladakh, said the rally serves as "an expression of solidarity and support for Tibetans facing challenges and oppression in Dege county."

"It symbolizes a collective commitment to standing up against oppression, promoting human rights and preserving Tibetan culture and identity in the face of adversity," Tsering said.

Tenzin Peldon, who participated in the march in Ladakh said while Tibetans everywhere usually gather to raise their voices against China on politically significant dates such as March 10, known as Tibetan Uprising Day – which commemorates the thousands of lives lost in the 1959 uprising against China's invasion and occupation of their homeland – it is crucial that they come together during dire situations like the one being faced by Tibetans in Dege to collectively speak up against China's oppression.

"I urge all Tibetans in exile not to give up hope and to continue to raise awareness on online platforms about the plight of Tibetans in Dege county," she said.

Other protests were held in Bir village and Clement town in India, and in London, where Tibetans demonstrated outside the Chinese Embassy to show their support for the Dege county protesters, demand the release of the detainees, and call for an immediate halt to the dam construction.

"Risking arrest and torture, Tibetan residents of Kham Derge [Dege county] have shared images and videos of the protest with the outside world," the Tibetan Community UK said in a statement. "They want the international community in the free world to know about their plight and to raise their voice."

Authorities released about 40 of the arrested monks on Feb. 26 and 27, RFA reported on Tuesday.

Chinese authorities released about 20 monks each on Monday and Tuesday, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for safety reasons. Also on Wednesday, Human Rights Watch called on Chinese authorities to immediately release the detained Tibetan monks.

"The Chinese authorities have long been hostile to public protests, but their response is especially brutal when the protests are by Tibetans and other ethnic groups," said Maya Wang, the group's acting China director, in a statement.

"Other governments should press Beijing to free these protesters, who have been wrongfully detained for exercising their basic rights," she said.

US official expresses concern over crackdown on Tibetans protesting dam

28 February 2024, Rtv

Chinese police have arrested more than 1,000 and beaten some during interrogation, sources say.

An American official expressed deep concern about the arrest of over 1,000 Tibetans protesting a dam project in central China that would destroy several Buddhist monasteries, saying the United States "stands with Tibetans in preserving their unique cultural, religious, and linguistic identity."

Tibetan advocacy groups condemned China's actions, calling for the immediate release of those detained.

On Feb. 23, police arrested more than 1,000 Tibetans, including monks and residents, in Dege county in Kardze Autonomous Tibetan Prefecture, who had been peacefully protesting against the dam, which would also force two villages to be relocated, sources told Radio Free Asia.

Over the weekend, police began interrogations, beating some detainees so badly that they required medical attention, sources told RFA.

Uzra Zeya, U.S. under secretary for civilian security, democracy and human rights and U.S. special coordinator for Tibetan Issues, said on X on Feb. 25 that she was deeply concerned by reports of the "mass arrests of Tibetans protesting the construction of a dam that threatens displacement of villages & destruction of monasteries."

"China must respect human rights & freedom of expression and include Tibetans in the development & implementation of water and land management policies," she tweeted.

"These centuries-old monasteries are home to hundreds of Tibetan Buddhist monks and contain irreplaceable cultural relics," she wrote. "The U.S. stands with Tibetans in preserving their unique cultural, religious, and linguistic identity."

'Wiping out culture and religion'

The arrests "should be a reminder to the world of how brutal daily life under China's occupation is for the Tibetan people," a statement issued Monday on X from the International Campaign for Tibet by its president, Tencho Gyatso.

"China tries to hide its forced relocation of Tibetans, its destruction of their environment, and its attempts to wipe out their culture and religion," the statement said.

Saying the protesters demonstrated "incredible courage," Gyatso said they needed the support of the international community.

"We call on the Chinese government to free these Tibetans at once," she said. "We also call on the U.S. and other governments to step up pressure on China to end its vicious occupation of Tibet."

Four Tibetan NGOs based in Dharamsala, India, home to the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, issued a statement of solidarity with the Tibetan community in Dege county.

They said that the displacement of Tibetan communities is "not new phenomena," just one of many examples.

"The continued disregard for the rights and well-being of Tibetans in the face of such development projects is unacceptable and demands immediate attention from the international community," said the statement by the Tibetan Women's Association, National Democratic Party of Tibet, Regional Tibetan Youth Congress and Students for a Free Tibet.

Environmental disruption

The four groups went on to say that the construction of the dam not only threatens the local Tibetan community but also poses a risk to the fragile ecosystem of the Tibetan plateau.

"Any disruption to Tibet's rivers and a diversion of the rivers could have far-reaching consequences for the environment, biodiversity, and livelihoods of millions of people downstream," they said.

William Nee, research and advocacy coordinator at Chinese Human Rights Defenders, or CHRDR, told RFA that his organization was concerned about the situation of the detainees, whether they are being maltreated and if they have sufficient food.

RFA reported earlier that authorities told those who were arrested to bring bedding and food, suggesting they would not be released soon.

CHRDR was also concerned whether authorities were giving those arrested access to relatives and lawyers, and whether they were being detained according to Chinese Criminal Procedure Law.

"But beyond that, there are also concerns about the livelihood of the potentially affected communities by the dam and whether this has been taken into consideration," Nee said. "And also the cultural rights, given that this might impact monasteries - some having ancient murals going back to the 13th century.”

Khenpo Sonam Tenphel, speaker of the Tibetan parliament-in-exile, tweeted on X that Tibetans worldwide condemned the crackdown.

“We urge China to promptly release those detained and to cease the dam construction,” he tweeted. “It is crucial for China to acknowledge the peaceful protests of Tibetans, addressing their concerns about preserving historic monasteries and safeguarding their homes.”

Austria: Tibetan youths protest outside Chinese embassy in Vienna over human rights violations

25 February 2024, ANI

Vienna [Austria], February 25 (ANI): Three youngsters from the Tibetan community in Austria staged a protest in front of the Chinese Embassy in Vienna on Saturday over the human rights violations perpetrated by the Chinese Communist Party in Tibet. They urged the international community to unite and openly support the Tibetan Government-in-exile in their ongoing struggle to protect the human rights of Tibetans in Tibet.

Adopting a novel protest, the young Tibetans used a projector and played videos of the forceful displacement of Tibetans by the Chinese in Tibet on the walls of the Chinese Embassy in Vienna. They also projected words highlighting the human rights violations of China and the cultural genocide carried out by China to erase the Tibetan identity.

The young Tibetans, associated with VTAG, Europe, also raised slogans against the large-scale environmental degradation happening in Tibet in the guise of huge projects that are unsustainable for the region.

During the protest, the young Tibetans also raised slogans in German to create awareness among the people in Austria that what is happening to Tibetans in Tibet is a deliberate extinction of a community, an identity.

According to young Tibetans, these projects including huge defence establishments, and large dams would displace a large number of Tibetans from their native homeland.

One of the main objectives behind such projects is to forcefully relocate Tibetans and erase their identity. The protesters stressed that the systematic disregard for the fundamental rights of Tibetans by the Chinese government reflects a blatant violation of international human rights law.

Protesters said that China, obligated to respect and adhere to mechanisms safeguarding people's rights, has been persecuting human rights defenders, forcibly resettling Tibetans, engaging in forced labour, fostering workplace discrimination, curtailing religious freedom and language rights, assimilating Tibetan children in boarding schools, and perpetrating cultural genocide. (ANI)

Dalai Lama's 1959 escape route in Arunachal to be developed for spiritual tourism

24 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb24'24) – The government of the state of Arunachal Pradesh is developing the 1959 escape trail within India of Tibet's spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, following China's annexation of Tibet into a spiritual and religious tourism circuit.

Little-known Lumla in western Arunachal Pradesh's Tawang district would soon be on the national tourism map. The young Dalai Lama had passed through, even stayed in this area, during his escape from Lhasa to India, reported the PTI news agency Feb 23.

“We are developing the escape trail of His Holiness into a religious and spiritual tourism circuit which is going on. As many as five monoliths will be constructed in each place where the Dalai Lama spent the night during his journey to India from Tibet”, Tsering Lhamu the Lumla MLA, has told PTI.

The escape trail was stated to be through the business route that started in Tibet's Tsona district and ended at Khen-Dze-mani under the Zemithang circle in Tawang district.

On Mar 31, 1959, the Dalai Lama and a group of eight people along with another group of eighty people were received officially at Khen-Dze-Mani by the political officer of Tawang, the 5 Assam Rifles and the people of Zemithang, the report said.

Currently, a small gate known as 'Lhasa Dwar', the point where the Dalai Lama entered India, is marked by a 'Holy Tree', which is said to have grown from a staff dug by the Dalai Lama during his escape. It is now worshipped as a relic marking the historic event. Another notable point of interest in this area is stated to be a hanging bridge on the Indian side, followed by the Lhasa Dwar.

Then there is Gorsam Chorten, a little far from Lhasa Dwar, located 90 km from Tawang. It was founded by a Monpa monk named Lama Pradhar in the 12th century and is the largest Buddhist stupa in the region, the report said. Monpa is a major tribe of Arunachal Pradesh. The Dalai Lama stayed in the Gorsam Chorten for a day.

Zemithang is also being developed as a vibrant village in Tawang district under New Delhi's vibrant village programme to counter China's 'border defence villages' in occupied Tibet.

Lhamu has said two gompas at Thonglek and Lumla areas had been completed as part of the project while a museum is coming up at Lumla, which will display various artefacts related to the Dalai Lama. Also, a 113 feet Maitreya Buddha (the coming Buddha) statue is coming up at Buri along the India-Bhutan border, under the NE scheme of Swadesh Darshan of the Union Tourism ministry for the development of Bhalukpong-Bomdila-Tawang tourism circuit, the report said.

Swadesh Darshan scheme is one of the flagship programmes of the ministry for the development of thematic circuits in the country in a planned and prioritised manner. Under the scheme, the government is focussing on the development of quality infrastructure with the objective of providing better experience and facilities to visitors while fostering economic growth.

China's Policies Are 'Like a Python Squeezing Us Out of Our Breath Slowly', Says Tibetan Exiled Leader

21 February 2024, News18

As Tibetans prepare to mark 65 years since a failed uprising against Chinese rule and questions loom over the Dalai Lama's successor, the diaspora's elected leader said Beijing is crushing his people.

Tibetans on March 10 will commemorate the 1959 uprising against Chinese forces that led the future Nobel laureate – and thousands of his followers – to cross snowy Himalayan passes into neighbouring India and set up a government in exile.

But the anniversary has also put the question of who will succeed the ageing Dalai Lama into sharp focus, with the choice likely to spark a controversial geopolitical contest. The charismatic spiritual leader already stepped down as his people's political head in 2011, passing the baton of secular power to a government chosen democratically by some 130,000 Tibetans across the world.

Penpa Tsering, born in India in 1967, was elected in 2021 as its second-ever leader, or sikyong. "If you look at the policies of the Chinese government today, they're squeezing us – like a python squeezing us out of our breath slowly," Tsering told AFP in an interview at the office of the Tibetan government in exile in India. "That's why we are dying a slow death."

Tibet – ruled with an iron fist by China since the 1950s – was historically an independent country, but Beijing maintains its long-held position that "Tibet is part of China".

– EMPIRES FALL –

Tsering readily admits the task of seeking a "resolution to the Sino-Tibetan conflict" with vastly more powerful China can seem overwhelming. But the committed Buddhist takes a long view of history. "Nothing is permanent," he said, sitting in front of a Tibetan flag in the hills above the northern Indian town of Dharamsala, where the Dalai Lama also lives.

India has hosted the exiled Tibetan leadership for decades and is itself a regional rival of China – tensions between the world's two most populous countries flared after a deadly Himalayan border clash in 2020. "There have been a lot of empires in this world, and every empire has fallen," Tsering said. But as the campaign for a free Tibet drags on, many worry there is a more time-pressing issue ahead.

The 88-year-old Dalai Lama has shown no indication he faces serious health problems, but the internationally recognisable face of Tibet has dramatically reduced his once-frenetic globetrotting. "He's always very aware of his mortality... So one day he will die, that is understood, that's a matter of fact," Tsering said. "But, of course, we like to hope that there will be some resolution to the cause of Tibet during the lifetime of this Dalai Lama."

Tibetan Buddhists believe the Dalai Lama is the 14th reincarnation of the leader of an institution dating back six centuries, chosen by monks according to ancient Buddhist traditions. Many expect Beijing will name a successor itself, raising the likelihood of rival nominations for the post. When he stepped aside in favour of the elected government, the Dalai Lama said: "No recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends", singling out China.

– 'CONTROL THE TIBETAN PEOPLE' –

Tsering believes the spiritual leader still has decades to live. "His Holiness keeps saying that 'I will live up to 113,'" he said. "So I chide my Chinese friends, saying: 'You are waiting for this Dalai Lama to die. "'You are not concerned about the living 14th, but you are more concerned about the yet to come 15th – because you know that if you can control the Dalai Lama, you can control the Tibetan people.'"

Tsering stressed he had no immediate concerns. "Let us see whether His Holiness the Dalai Lama outlives the Communist Party, or the Communist Party outlives His Holiness," he added. "Even this morning, His Holiness was saying: 'I have not lost one of my teeth. I'll live long'. So let's see." Tsering sometimes travels to the mountainous Indian border to stare across to the homeland he has never visited, he said, to "fulfil my emotional needs".

He does not seek full independence for Tibet, in line with the long-standing "Middle Way" policy of the Dalai Lama, who believes that pushing demands beyond autonomy would be suicidal. But the Dalai Lama has also rejected Beijing's longstanding demand that he publicly agree Tibet was historically part of China, a refusal cited by Beijing in declining dialogue with his representatives since 2010. Tsering, who campaigns for the rights of the estimated seven million Tibetans he said live under Chinese control, said "back-channel" contacts were in place with Beijing and would continue. "If there's no hope, the cause itself is lost."

Division and factionalism in exile "regrettably shameful", says Dalai Lama in new letter

21 February 2024, Phayul

A letter to felicitate the 50th founding anniversary of the Kollegal Dhondenling Tibetan settlement in South India, by the Tibetan spiritual leader His Holiness the Dalai Lama discouraged the divisive leanings among exile Tibetans including the leadership. Amidst the celebrations, a poignant message from the octogenarian Tibetan leader was delivered by the President of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), Sikyong Penpa Tsering, who graced the event as the chief guest on Saturday.

The message conveyed by the foremost exiled spiritual leader through the Sikyong Penpa Tsering encapsulated a crucial theme. The octogenarian leader implored exiled Tibetans to prioritise unity and solidarity, echoing the resilience demonstrated by Tibetans inside Tibet in the face of severe repression by the Chinese communist government. He cautioned against factionalism, urging the community to show unity displayed by Tibetans inside Tibet.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, while reading the letter from His Holiness the Dalai Lama highlighted the following key points. "Despite living under the illegal occupation by the Communist Chinese, the spirit of unity among Tibetans inside Tibet has endured. However, some living in exile are straying from the path of selflessness. Divisions are being sown within our community by those with narrow minds, who seek to emphasise factions based on regional origins (Cholka) or religious affiliations (Cholug). This is regrettably shameful. Therefore, those entrusted with leadership roles must be careful," the letter expressed.

The letter from His Holiness the Dalai Lama, highlighted by Sikyong emphasises a key aspect of the divisive politics that have emerged within the Tibetan exile community, particularly during parliamentary proceedings and during campaign trails between elections. These factions often become visible particularly during parliamentary sessions, leading to stalemates and disruptions in the proceedings in recent times, thus causing negative impact on the unity and coherence among members of the Tibetan diaspora.

The remainder of the sixth session of the 17th Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile (TPiE), faced significant challenges, leading to the rescheduling of sessions on March 13 to 16 due to the unavailability of the required quorum needed to officially convene the session. The session also encountered disruptions following a walk out by some members of the parliament.

However, many say that this unprecedented trend of prolonged deadlock shows the inability of the parliament to function effectively, thereby jeopardising the governance and stability of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile, known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration. Others say that such prolonged disruptions undermine the legitimacy and credibility of the Tibetan leadership, and contribute to the already growing trust deficit between the leadership and the masses.

Beijing crushing Tibetans, exiled political leader says

21 February 2024, France24

Dharamsala (India) (AFP) – As Tibetans prepare to mark 65 years since a failed uprising against Chinese rule and questions loom over the Dalai Lama's successor, the diaspora's elected leader said Beijing is crushing his people.

Tibetans on March 10 will commemorate the 1959 uprising against Chinese forces that led the future Nobel laureate – and thousands of his followers – to cross snowy Himalayan passes into neighbouring India and set up a government in exile.

But the anniversary has also put the question of who will succeed the ageing Dalai Lama into sharp focus, with the choice likely to spark a controversial geopolitical contest.

The charismatic spiritual leader already stepped down as his people's political head in 2011, passing the baton of secular power to a government chosen democratically by some 130,000 Tibetans across the world.

Penpa Tsering, born in India in 1967, was elected in 2021 as its second-ever leader, or sikyong.

"If you look at the policies of the Chinese government today, they're squeezing us – like a python squeezing us out of our breath slowly," Tsering told AFP in an interview at the office of the Tibetan government in exile in India.

"That's why we are dying a slow death."

Tibet – ruled with an iron fist by China since the 1950s – was historically an independent country, but Beijing maintains its long-held position that "Tibet is part of China".

Empires fall

Tsering readily admits the task of seeking a "resolution to the Sino-Tibetan conflict" with vastly more powerful China can seem overwhelming.

But the committed Buddhist takes a long view of history.

"Nothing is permanent," he said, sitting in front of a Tibetan flag in the hills above the northern Indian town of Dharamsala, where the Dalai Lama also lives.

India has hosted the exiled Tibetan leadership for decades and is itself a regional rival of China – tensions between the world's two most populous countries flared after a deadly Himalayan border clash in 2020.

"There have been a lot of empires in this world, and every empire has fallen," Tsering said.

But as the campaign for a free Tibet drags on, many worry there is a more time-pressing issue ahead.

The 88-year-old Dalai Lama has shown no indication he faces serious health problems, but the internationally recognisable face of Tibet has dramatically reduced his once-frenetic globetrotting.

"He's always very aware of his mortality... So one day he will die, that is understood, that's a matter of fact," Tsering said.

"But, of course, we like to hope that there will be some resolution to the cause of Tibet during the lifetime of this Dalai Lama."

Many expect Beijing will name a successor itself, raising the likelihood of rival nominations for the post.

When he stepped aside in favour of the elected government, the Dalai Lama said: "No recognition or acceptance should be given to a candidate chosen for political ends", singling out China.

'Control the Tibetan people'

Tsering believes the spiritual leader still has decades to live.

"His Holiness keeps saying that 'I will live up to 113,'" he said.

"So I chide my Chinese friends, saying: 'You are waiting for this Dalai Lama to die.'

"'You are not concerned about the living 14th, but you are more concerned about the yet to come 15th – because you know that if you can control the Dalai Lama, you can control the Tibetan people.'"

Tsering stressed he had no immediate concerns.

"Let us see whether His Holiness the Dalai Lama outlives the Communist Party, or the Communist Party outlives His Holiness," he added.

"Even this morning, His Holiness was saying: 'I have not lost one of my teeth. I'll live long'. So let's see."

Tsering sometimes travels to the mountainous Indian border to stare across to the homeland he has never visited, he said, to "fulfil my emotional needs".

He does not seek full independence for Tibet, in line with the long-standing "Middle Way" policy of the Dalai Lama, who believes that pushing demands beyond autonomy would be suicidal.

But the Dalai Lama has also rejected Beijing's longstanding demand that he publicly agree Tibet was historically part of China, a refusal cited by Beijing in declining dialogue with his representatives since 2010.

Tsering, who campaigns for the rights of the estimated seven million Tibetans he said live under Chinese control, said "back-channel" contacts were in place with Beijing and would continue.

"If there's no hope, the cause itself is lost."

US House passes bill recognising Tibet's unresolved political status

16 February 2024, Phayul

In a display of bipartisan unity, the United States House of Representatives made a historic decision on Thursday, passing the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Conflict Act'. This landmark legislation not only recognises Tibet's unresolved political status but also holds China accountable for violating the legitimate right to self-determination of the Tibetan people.

The bill, introduced by long-time Tibet supporters Representative Jim McGovern of Massachusetts and Representative Michael McCaul of Texas, alongside Senators Jeff Merkley of Oregon and Todd Young of Indiana, aims to affirm the United States government's stance on Tibet's legal status in the international arena.

Several members of Congress spoke in support of the Resolve Tibet Act. Rep. McGovern, known for his unwavering dedication to human rights, stressed on the importance of standing in solidarity with the Tibetan people. "It has been more than 60 years since the People's Republic of China forced His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama into exile and took control of Tibet against the will of its people. The dispute between the Chinese and Tibetans over Tibet's status and governance has persisted ever since. In spite of the willingness of the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan people to resolve Tibet status in governance through dialogue. With dialogue blocked, the PRC has continued its unceasing efforts to erode Tibetan history, Tibetan language, Tibetan culture and Tibetan religion. A few years ago, I was on delegation with Speaker Pelosi. We went to Tibet and we saw first-hand the PRC's repression against the people of Tibet essentially trying to erase Tibetans as a people."

"This bill that we are discussing here today seeks to end that. By explicitly recognising the Tibetan people are a people with a distinct religious, cultural, linguistic and historical identity. By reminding all concerned that people's and not least the Tibetan people have a right to self-determination under international human rights law and by requiring the US government to actively counter the PRC's propaganda about Tibet. Like the false claim that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times. A position that the United States has never accepted and there was no basis for such a claim. Through these measures, we hope to kickstart dialogue between Tibet and China, in keeping with the longstanding US policy," he emphasised.

"The decades old dispute between Tibet and China started as an armed conflict of invasion, resistance and insurgency. In the long-run, the only guarantee against the resumption of large scale violence is for the PRC to fully respect the human rights and dignity of the Tibetan people. A vote for this bill is a vote to recognise the rights of the Tibetan people and it is a vote to insist on resolving the dispute between Tibet and People's Republic of China peacefully and in accordance with international law through dialogue and without preconditions. There is still an opportunity to do this but time is running out. And again, I urge my colleagues to support this bill because it is about standing up for human rights. It is about standing up for the Tibetan people who have been repressed for far too long," he further added.

The bill will recognise Tibet's unresolved political status and hold China suspect of violating Tibetan people's legitimate right to self-determination. The bill also aims to counter the narrative propagated by the Chinese government, which asserts that Tibet has been an integral part of China since ancient times. Additionally, the bill also makes clear that Tibet's land mass does not only include the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) but also the significant Tibetan-inhabited areas in Gansu, Sichuan, Qinghai, and Yunnan provinces.

Furthermore, the bill faults China for its refusal to engage in discussions with the Dalai Lama or his representatives. The bill also seeks to empower the position of US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues, currently held by Under Secretary Uzra Zeya to counter CCP's propaganda and address Tibet-related concerns effectively.

This unprecedented move by the US House committee under the Biden Administration is followed by two other Acts that work on demanding more access from inside Tibet and reaffirming that the reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama falls strictly in the hands of the Tibetan people; Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act (2018) and Tibetan Policy and Support Act (2020) respectively.

China fails to stop New Jersey Township Mayor from raising Tibetan flag to celebrate Losar

14 February 2024, RTV

Losar, the Tibetan New Year, which fell on Feb 10 this time, was celebrated in the US State Department while Mayor Michael Melham of Belleville Township in the state of New Jersey flew the Tibetan national flag on Feb 9, rejecting a written objection from China's vice consul in New York.

Extending warmest wishes to all those celebrating Losar, the Tibetan New Year, Secretary of State Antony Blinken said in a statement Feb 9, "On this first day of the Year of the Wood Dragon, we celebrate the strength and perseverance of the Tibetan community around the globe. Here in the United States, tens of thousands of Tibetan-Americans are integral to the preservation of Tibetans' distinct cultural, linguistic, and religious heritage."

He wished Tibetans celebrating all across the world peace and prosperity in the new year.

Meanwhile, in Belleville, Mayor Melham went on to raise the Tibetan flag, rejecting a second last-second letter, from China's vice consul in New York, imploring the mayor to cancel the noon event at town hall, claiming the flag was a symbol of "an illegal separatist political group," reported tapinto.net, cbsnews.com and other news outlets Feb 10.

The reports said the mayor responded in writing to vice consul Huang Ping, saying: "Here in Belleville, New Jersey, we pride ourselves on fostering an environment of inclusivity and acceptance, regardless of nationality or territorial affiliation. Our community's rich history is deeply rooted in these principles, shaping the very essence of who we are."

The mayor has added: "It's essential to clarify that our intentions are not aimed at challenging the sovereignty of any nation. Instead, our gesture symbolizes solidarity with the Tibetan people and their aspirations for freedom and self-determination."

"We stand with the Tibetan people in their struggle for autonomy and respect for their cultural heritage," the mayor has concluded, urging Ping to delve into Belleville's "fascinating Chinese history, which spans over a century and a half."

The mayor has also noted that Belleville was live-streaming a Chinese New Year event on Feb 10, serving "as a testament to our deep appreciation for Chinese culture and traditions. It is a reflection of our longstanding relationship with the Chinese community."

He has also said, "As a Township, we remain committed to fostering understanding, dialogue, and mutual respect among all peoples, both locally and globally."

The mayor said his decision was not political and that he sent a respectful letter back to China's vice consul saying the flag went up because his diverse community respects all voices, according to the cbsnews.com report.

This year, the Tibetan New Year fell on the same day as the Chinese Lunar New Year.

On Losar, Dalai Lama exhorts Tibetans to uphold culture

11 February 2024, The Sentinel

Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama on Saturday greeted Tibetans in Tibet and in exile on Tibetan New Year, Losar 2151 – the year of the Wood-Dragon.

In a video message, the spiritual leader said: "Despite undergoing great difficulties in exile and living under a powerful Communist Chinese regime, our people, the majority of whom are inside of Tibet, have remained unscathed while I have been the leader.

"Although the Communist Chinese rulers, after the 'so-called peaceful liberation', have wished that we Tibetans forget our religious faith, we have held onto our convictions and our culture even more firmly – this is very good. Today, there is a renewed interest in Buddhism, not only among Tibetans, but even among some Chinese.

"In many parts of the world today, Tibetan spiritual and cultural traditions are regarded as logical, rational and of practical benefit when closely considered since they enable us to transform our minds in a positive way and bring about inner peace."

According to the Tibetan lunar calendar, Losar is the first day of the New Year. Traditionally, it is celebrated in a big way. This year, the festival falls on February 10. The three-day festival marks sacred and secular practices like prayers, ceremonies, rituals, and folk dancing and merrymaking.

The elderly Buddhist monk said: "Nowadays, an increasing number of people in Western countries are taking interest in Tibetan culture and spirituality. I'm also aware of an increasing number of Western scientists who admire the methods for developing a kind heart that is found in our culture, although they lack any religious belief."

Saying that the Communist Chinese have attempted systematically to eliminate spiritual and cultural heritage, His Holiness in the video message added: "However, it has become clear that rather than destroying it, there is a renewed interest in our cultural traditions in the world today."

Wishing, in particular, to express appreciation for his fellow Tibetans in Tibet for the unflinching faith and devotion they possess, he said: "Still, I think it's important that the new generation of Tibetans has a deep understanding of the good customs we have upheld for more than a thousand years, not just because they are our customs but also because they accord with reason."

"In the reality of today's world, I think it's necessary that the new generation take a fresh look at the traditions we've preserved in the light of Western scientific interest. They need to understand why people in the West with no particular belief in religion take interest in our traditions.

"And they need to be able to recognize the value of the centuries-old cherished treasures of Tibet in order to preserve them well." (IANS)

China opens Lhasa for Tibetans from other regions for Losar, but tight restrictions remain

11 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb11'24) – China announced a relaxation in restrictions it had imposed in 2018 on the entry into Tibet's capital Lhasa of Tibetans from outside the region in a move to revive its flagging economy ahead of the Tibetan New Year, or Losar, festivities, reported the Tibetan service of rfa.org Feb 9. But restrictions, bordering on a ban, continues to remain on Tibetans seeking to travel to the other countries.

Besides, the relaxations have come with restrictions which severely curtail one of the main Tibetan purposes for undertaking the visit, the report said, citing three local Tibetan sources.

Most of the Tibetans who make it to Lhasa after the relaxation of entry rules have been Kham and Amdo people whose historical Tibetan regions are now parts of Sichuan and Qinghai provinces. And their main or only purpose is to undertake pilgrimage to the major Buddhist religious sites that include the Potala Palace, the Barkhor Street, the Jokhang Temple and the Norbulingka Palace.

The relaxation has led to the largest number of arrivals from the traditional Kham and Amdo provinces of Tibet.

However, the TAR authorities have imposed restrictions on visits to a number of these sites, including the Jokhang Temple, the holiest site in Tibetan Buddhism. It has decided to open the site on the first day of Losar, on Feb 10, and then close it from Feb 11 to 16.

Besides, limits have been placed on visits to other religious sites as well, including on forming of large gatherings, during the 15-day Losar celebrations. Devotees must present their identification cards before participating in religious rituals near temples and pilgrimage sites, the report said, citing a Lhasa police order.

Until last year, Tibetans from other regions were required to submit to an office in Lhasa a prescribed application after obtaining the form for the purpose from a local office, while a resident of the host city was required to provide guarantee that the visitors would not engage in any protest activity.

The report also said Tibetans continued to face severe restrictions on undertaking travels outside the country.

"I went to Nepal with a few of my friends last month but in order to go on that trip, I had to deposit 100,000 Nepali rupee [US$750] and give the name of someone I knew in Lhasa as security," the report quoted one of the sources as saying, speaking, like the others, on condition of anonymity for safety reasons. Besides, only group travel, accompanied by a travel agency representative, was allowed.

"I felt like a prisoner," the source has said.

In addition, "It's almost impossible for Tibetans to travel to the United States and other Western countries," a third source has told rfa.org.

Tibetan Flag Raised in Belleville: An Act of Solidarity Amid Diplomatic Tensions

10 February 2024, BNN

In a defiant act of solidarity, Mayor Michael Melham of Belleville, New Jersey, raised the Tibetan flag on February 11, 2024, honoring a community member, Yangchen Nodong, who fled Tibet in 1960. This gesture came despite a last-minute plea from the Chinese government to cancel the event.

A Last-Minute Plea Ignored

In a display of unwavering support for Tibetan exiles, Mayor Michael Melham of Belleville, New Jersey, raised the Tibetan flag on February 11, 2024. This significant event was held to honor Yangchen Nodong, a Belleville resident who escaped Tibet in 1960. The Chinese government attempted to thwart the flag-raising by sending a last-minute letter urging Mayor Melham to call off the ceremony.

Despite the Chinese government's efforts, Mayor Melham refused to back down, stating that his township respects all voices. Belleville is known for its diverse population, and the mayor believes that embracing this diversity is essential for fostering unity and acceptance.

A Symbol of Freedom and Suppression

Tibet has been an autonomous region of China since 1950, but many exiles argue that their culture and religion have been systematically suppressed under communist rule. The Tibetan flag, banned in Tibet, has become a powerful symbol of freedom and self-determination for those who have been forced to flee their homeland.

For Yangchen Nodong, the flag-raising ceremony was a deeply emotional experience. "Raising the Tibetan flag in Belleville is a testament to our resilience and the unwavering hope for freedom," she said. "I am grateful to Mayor Melham and the people of Belleville for standing with us."

The ceremony was attended by members of the Tibetan community, local residents, and several dignitaries. Many participants expressed their appreciation for Mayor Melham's support and his commitment to inclusivity.

A Dance of Diplomacy and Defiance

Mayor Melham's decision to raise the Tibetan flag has sparked a diplomatic dance between local and international interests. While the Chinese government has condemned the move, stating that it "interferes with China's internal affairs," Mayor Melham remains steadfast in his belief that the gesture was a symbol of solidarity and respect for the Tibetan people.

The mayor's actions have also drawn attention to the broader issue of human rights in Tibet. Activists and supporters of the Tibetan cause are hopeful that this event will help raise awareness and lead to a more open and inclusive dialogue about the situation in Tibet.

As the sun set on the flag-raising ceremony, the Tibetan flag fluttered proudly in the breeze, a powerful reminder of the enduring spirit of the Tibetan people and their quest for freedom.

In defiance of a last-minute plea from the Chinese government, Mayor Michael Melham of Belleville, New Jersey, raised the Tibetan flag on February 11, 2024. This act of solidarity honored Yangchen Nodong, a Tibetan exile who escaped her homeland in 1960. The flag-raising ceremony was a poignant symbol of hope and freedom for the Tibetan community, as well as a testament to Belleville's commitment to inclusivity and acceptance.

As the Tibetan flag continues to fly in Belleville, it serves as a reminder of the ongoing struggle for freedom and self-determination faced by the Tibetan people. Amidst diplomatic tensions, Mayor Melham's unwavering support for the Tibetan cause highlights the importance of standing up for human rights and the preservation of cultural identity.

'Lack of information from Tibet is due to high level of Chinese gov't repression'

07 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb07'24) – The reason why not much is heard about, and therefore reported on, on the human rights situation in Tibet today is because it remains the least free country on earth, an international summit on religious freedom held in Washington, DC, was told last week.

"Today we don't hear much about Tibet. And the reason is exactly because it's the least-free country on Earth," Mr Namgyal Choedup, Washington-based representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Central Tibetan Administration to North America, told the meeting.

He was one of the main speakers at the summit's breakout session, which was also addressed by the UN Special Rapporteur on freedom of religion or belief Nazila Ghanea and Campaign for Uyghurs Founder and Executive Director Rushan Abbas.

This panel of the summit's session on violations in surveillance states was developed by Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) with the groups Boat People SOS and the Campaign for Uyghurs.

Tibet also featured in the summit's panel discussion on challenges and opportunities in freedom of religion or belief in Asia. This panel also highlighted the situation in Nepal, including for Tibetan refugees there, and the situation in Sri Lanka. ICT's Mr Franz Matzner moderated the discussion.

Namgyal traced the current nature of the state of Chinese government surveillance in Tibet Autonomous Region to the 2011-16 tenure of its regional Party Secretary Mr Chen Quanguo, who developed a system of mass surveillance and militarization that has only grown since. Chen was later moved to East Turkestan (Xinjiang) to become the architect of alleged genocide of mostly Uyghur Muslims.

"What we have is kind of reminiscent of the Cultural Revolution period," he said, referring to the decade-long violent purges led by Chairman Mao Zedong. China has largely shut down access to Tibet from the outside world, with Tibetans being even forced to spy on one another, he said.

Any individual act of dissent leads to collective punishment in the form of mass repression and immediate shutdown of internet access to prevent the news from spreading, he said, citing the more recent example of the protest self-immolation in Tibet's capital Lhasa last year by Mr Tsewang Norbu, a popular young Tibetan singer.

He also cited the example of a Tibetan university student named Tsedon in Lhasa who was detained by Chinese authorities on Dec 26 last year and reported dead in police detention on Jan 15, with no avenue to verify these reports.

Namgyal accused China of implementing a policy of Sinification by means of eliminating Tibet's unique civilization by forcing its people to give up their language, religion and culture.

January

China started destroying monasteries after occupying Tibet: Former Tibetan PM-in-exile

29 January 2024, ANI

New Delhi [India], January 29 (ANI): Former Tibetan Prime Minister-in-exile Lobsang Sangay has accused China of exploiting Tibetan identity, language and culture since the Chinese troops entered the Tibet region on October 7, 1950. The incident marked the beginning of a dark period in the history of the Tibetan people's homeland, said Lobsang Sangay in an exclusive interview with ANI.

"China occupied our country, brutalised our people, around million Tibetans died because of killing, starvation and suicides. Monasteries were destroyed, treasures were looted, burnt and sold. Thousands years of civilisations there were brought from Nalanda to Tibet were reduced to ashes." Lobsang Sangay said.

In an effort to revitalise Tibetan culture into mainstream Chinese culture, Beijing has implemented several policies over the years which have resulted in the disappearance of regional culture elements.

Officially an atheist state, China has long persecuted Buddhism, which is revered as a force that binds all Tibetans. In fact, the attack on the faith was the main reason why several monks joined the guerrilla group during the Tibetan uprising of 1959.

"Monks wanted to defend their faith as the Communist Party of China started destroying the monasteries after occupying Tibet," said Lobsang Sangay during the interview.

The Chinese government has also meddled in the succession of the 14th Dalai Lama. Beijing's interference is being seen as violations of religious freedom of the Tibetan people.

He said, "Chinese have no business whatsoever, they destroyed monasteries, they are communists, they are atheists, they don't believe in religion, they have no right to select our religious leader."

When asked if he had ever felt that the Tibetan cause was a lost cause, Lobsang gave a very optimistic view.

He said, "We are Buddhist. We believe in the notion of impermanence. Nothing is permanent. You are born and you die. Wherever you are today, you might not be there tomorrow. Everything is a cycle, so there is always a hope. There is a Tibetan nation, there is a Tibetan civilization, there are Tibetan people, and there is a Tibetan cause. That will always be alive, no matter what".

"As long as you survive your time will come because it is inevitable. Great powers from Mughals to the British, you just name it, how many empires have come and how many empires have gone. China will inevitably go," he added.

Lobsang Sangay is the first person who served as the Tibetan Prime Minister without a monastic background. He was born in Darjeeling in 1968 in a refugee community. He earned a Bachelor of Laws degree from the University of Delhi. He studied international law and democracy at Harvard University. Later, he became an American citizen. (ANI)

DIIR Holds 'Tibet Advocacy Training and Youth Capacity Building Program' for North Indian V-Tag Members

28 January 2024, CTA

Dharamshala: As part of the V-TAG initiative, Department of Information and International Relations-CTA (DIIR) organised a 'Tibet Advocacy Training and Youth Capacity Building program' for a group of V-TAG members from North India to enhance personal skills in Advocacy, communication, and effective presentation at Lemon Tree Hotel in Dharamshala from 26 to 29 January 2024.

Members of regional Tibetan V-TAG members at the 'Tibet Advocacy Training and Youth Capacity Building program'. Photo / Tenzin Jigme Taydeh / CTA

This morning, on the second day, DIIR Secretary Karma Choeying, as chief guest, delivered a keynote address to the participants. In his talk, he stressed, "With the older Tibetan generations slowly diminishing in exile, it is of utmost importance for the younger generations to take over in charge of the Tibetan freedom movement". He underscored the participants to broaden their understanding of Tibetan history, the political climate in Tibet now, and the circumstances facing Tibetans both in Tibet and abroad in order to augment their advocacy proficiency.

In light of China's systematic denial of rights and erasure of Tibetan identity through sinicization process, the Secretary further emphasised the need for younger generations never to forget the gracious contributions of His Holiness the Dalai Lama for establishing and fostering this unparalleled exile Tibetan community and forging ahead with the Tibetan freedom movement.

Following an inaugural speech by Secretary Karma Choeying, a panel discussion was held featuring presidents and directors of Tibetan non-governmental organisations, including Gonpo Dhondup, the President of the Tibetan Youth Congress; Wangden Kyab, a researcher at Tibet Watch; Tsering Dolma, the Vice President of the Tibetan Women's Association; and Tenzing Passang, the India National Director of the Students for Free Tibet. The session was moderated by Tenzing Dhamdul from the Foundation for Non-Violent Alternatives (FNVA).

Tibetan politician in exile talks about continued saga of survival

28 January 2024, Devdiscourse

Tibetan-American politician in exile, Lobsang Sangay, recently provided insight into the struggle of the people living in his parents' native land, Tibet.

Tibetan-American politician in exile, Lobsang Sangay, recently provided insight into the struggle of the people living in his parents' native land, Tibet. In an exclusive interview with ANI, Lobsang Sangay, who served as the Tibetan Prime Minister-in-exile from 2011 to 2021, recounted his parents' struggle for survival and their journey to seek refuge in India amid the Chinese occupation of Tibet.

Sangay explained how China invaded Tibet and forced the 14th Dalai Lama to take refuge in India. While talking about the Tibetan uprising of 1959 and the armed guerrilla group, Lobsang acknowledged that Tibetans were left with no choice but to take up arms in order to defend their motherland. "Many monks joined the guerrilla group to defend their faith as the Communist Party of China started destroying the monasteries after occupying Tibet," Sangay said.

On the question of America's help to Tibetans, Lobsang Sangay explained why the US extended limited support to them. "America came in support of Tibetans because of the Korean War. During the Korean War, the Chinese were literally fighting against the Americans. The US needed a second front to divert attention. So, they started supplying arms and ammunition, but what they provided was very limited. Had they supplied more, the Tibetans would have fought bravely. There was a chance that we could defend at least some parts of our territory," said Sangay.

In response to a question concerning whether Tibetans ever felt deceived by America's treatment of them, Lobsang stated, "When Nixon went to China in 1972 to normalise the relations, several Tibetan guerrillas felt betrayed and committed suicides". When asked about Lobsang's decision to return to his roots, he replied, "China occupied our country, brutalised our people, around million Tibetans died, because of the killings, suicides, starvation. Numerous monasteries were looted and burned. When you grow up with these kinds of stories, you have to fight for your cause."

Lobsang Sangay is the first person to serve as the Tibetan Prime Minister without a monastic background. He was born in Darjeeling in 1968 in a refugee community.

Sangay earned a Bachelor of Laws degree from the University of Delhi. He studied International law and democracy at Harvard University. Later, he became an American citizen.

Dalai Lama reaches Sikkim after 13 years amidst tension with China, know why this visit was special

25 January 2024, Newstrack

As soon as the Dalai Lama reached Sikkim, many discussions started. His visit is also being seen as India giving a strong message to Dragon amid the tension between India and China.

Tibetan Buddhist guru and spiritual leader Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatso reached Sikkim after 13 years on January 22. The Dalai Lama landed at Army's Libing helipad in East Sikkim. There he was welcomed by Chief Minister Prem Singh Tamang. On the first day of his visit, he also met some members of the Tibetan Parliament in exile, the Tibetan Settlement Office and the local Tibetan Assembly. After this, on Tuesday, he gave knowledge on the book '37 Practices of Bodhisattvas' written by religious guru Acharya Gyalse Thokme Sangpo at Paljor Stadium, about 50 km from the India-China border in Nathula. Also Read - On this day India entered Pakistan and took revenge of Pulwama attack, 5 years completed As soon as the Dalai Lama reached Sikkim, many discussions started. His visit is also being seen as India giving a strong message to Dragon amid the tension between India and China. Actually, China considers Dalai Lama as an enemy. When China occupied Tibet, India gave shelter to the Dalai Lama and his supporters. China had become more angry with India since that time. By the way, China is also claiming large parts of Arunachal Pradesh and Sikkim as its own. Even before this, he had expressed strong objection to the visit of Dalai Lama to these two states.

Tension has been going on between India and China for the last 2 years. Also, meeting people especially related to Tibet during this tour is like directly teasing China. There are speculations through this visit that India has tried to send a message to China that it does not take its claims on Sikkim and Arunachal Pradesh seriously. Also he is not afraid of China.

Tibetan Parliamentary Delegation Calls on Maharashtra's Governor and Speaker

24 January 2024, CTA

Tibetan parliamentary delegation with the Governor, Shri Ramesh Bais.

Dharamshala: As part of the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile's advocacy campaign for Tibet across various Indian states, parliamentarians Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tseten, Dhondup Tashi, and Tsering Yangchen visited the state of Maharashtra. During their advocacy tour, they met with the Governor, Shri Ramesh Bais, and the Speaker of the State Legislative Assembly, Shri Rahul Narwekar.

With coordination from the National Campaign for Free Tibet Support (NCFTS)'s regional convenor from Pune and Sangli, Shri Bala Saheb Raste, the Tibetan parliamentary delegates received a visit from Dr. Rajaram Bhonsle, a staff member of the District Malaria Officer, on 19 January 2024.

In the afternoon, they conducted a press conference at the Mumbai Marathi Patrakara Sangh, emphasizing the significance of Tibet to India and shedding light on the current critical situation within Tibet. Expressing gratitude to India and its citizens for their steadfast support for the just cause of Tibet, the parliamentarians addressed each of the media's questions regarding Tibet. Subsequently, they met with Shri Rahul Narwekar, the Speaker of the Maharashtra Assembly, advocating for Tibet and presenting him with a souvenir from the Tibetan Parliament-in-Exile along with relevant documents.

Shri Girish Wankhede, a distinguished expert in the film and media industry, organized a meeting with film and music artists on the next day. In the meeting, MP Geshe Lharampa Atuk Tseten spoke on the religious connection between India and Tibet, while MP Dhondup Tashi focused on the geopolitical connection of the border between the two nations, and MP Tsering Yangchen delved into the intricate relationship of the Tibetan diaspora with India and its citizens. The talk was followed by a question-answer session.

On 22 January, they met with the Governor of Maharashtra, Shri Ramesh Bais, to discuss the historical status of Tibet as an independent nation currently occupied by China. Emphasizing that recognizing Tibet as part of China could impede the resolution of the Sino-Tibetan conflict through non-violent means, they advocated for the Middle Way Approach. This approach advocates dialogue between the envoys of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and its Chinese counterparts to address the conflict.

In addition to highlighting the environmental challenges facing Tibet, they underscored the importance of the Tibetan plateau and rivers flowing into South Asian countries, including India. They urged for unrestricted access for media and researchers to Tibet and the release of Tibetan political prisoners, including Panchen Rinpoche, Gendhun Choekyi Nyima.

Governor Bais shared his prior meeting with His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala and conveyed the discussed matters to the then PM of India, Shri Atal Bihari Vajpayee. He assured the delegation that he would relay their message to the current Indian PM, Shri Narendra Modi.

Having successfully concluded their official advocacy tour in Maharashtra, they proceeded to Telangana.

The UN China Review Finds Unprecedented Support for Tibetan Rights by Member States, While Beijing Shuts Down Criticism

24 January 2024, CTA

Geneva: On 23 January this year, 24 United Nations Member States mentioned Tibet and Tibetans in their oral statements during China's fourth Universal Periodic Review (UPR) cycle. Among these, 21 countries raised serious concerns regarding the human rights situation in Tibet, resulting in 23 recommendations.

China's human rights record was the major focus of intense scrutiny over its treatment of Tibetans, Uyghurs, and dissidents in Hong Kong. The States that raised Tibet at China's review were Austria, Australia, Belgium, Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, France, Germany, Ireland, Japan, Lithuania, Montenegro, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and the United States.

The statements by the Member States offered a wide-ranging look at China's human rights violations in Tibet, urging a review of Beijing's rights record to focus on its cultural genocide and political indoctrination. The major focus was particularly on China's repression of cultural and religious rights. The Member States expressed concerns over human rights violations in Tibet and in particular called for the abolition of the colonial boarding schools that separated over 1 million Tibetan children from their families, language, religion and culture. The States also called for the authorisation of private schools, the release of arbitrarily detained Tibetans and unhindered access for UN representatives to Tibet.

As usual, the PRC government has portrayed boarding schools in Tibet as a means of bridging the gap between urban and rural populations for equal education access; however, it has failed to provide evidence that the curriculum in the schools does not undermine Tibetan language or culture among young Tibetan students. The Chinese delegation maintained that Tibetans enjoy religious freedom and cultural rights based on a variety of statistics that provide little support for their claim. Relocation policies were outlined by the Chinese delegation as operating with the consent of Tibetans. The Chinese ambassador refuted criticism and denounced allegations as smears, lies, and defamatory attacks on China.

Karma Choeying, Secretary of the Department of Information and International Relations, applauded the substantial increase in the number of States raising Tibet at the UN China Review and said: "We are grateful to all states that raised Tibet's grave human rights situation under the unlawful rule of the PRC government. Considering the severity of the situation within Tibet, China should be attentive to the Universal Periodic Review and comply with the recommendations provided by Member States of the UN. In addition to complying with its obligations to respect the protected rights of Tibetans and others, China must immediately cease its assimilationist practices that undermine Tibetan identity."

Several months before China's review by the United Nations Human Rights Council, the Tibetan Bureau Geneva, together with the Central Tibetan Women's Association and the Tibetan Community of Switzerland and Liechtenstein, have already submitted a report in July 2023 detailing systematic and widespread patterns of human rights violations in Tibet. Aside from providing recommendations to the international community, the report also highlights aspects of Chinese government's repressive policies on Tibetan culture, including colonial boarding schools, Sinicization of Tibetan identity and language, crackdown on religious freedom, transnational repression, surveillance system, destruction of Tibetan environment, and arbitrary arrests.

China underwent its third cycle of the UN Convention on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights implementation review before the Universal Periodic Review in February last year. The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights concluded its review of China with its concluding observations noting widespread violations by the country. It requested that the PRC government immediately cease its operation of colonial boarding schools in Tibet, and its program of mass relocation of Tibetans, and called to allow Tibetans to exercise their cultural and religious rights without interference.

The Universal Periodic Review (UPR) is a process through which all UN Member States are provided the opportunity to review the human rights records of all other Member States every five years. The UPR aims to offer constructive criticism and to ensure scrutiny of every country's human rights record and recommendations for compliance with international human rights law. China's previous UPR was held on 6 November 2018.

Twofold increase in states raising Tibet at UN China review

23 January 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

An unprecedented number of UN member states raised China's oppression in Tibet during the Chinese government's Universal Periodic Review at the UN Human Rights Council today in Geneva.

Twenty states took to the floor to challenge China's human rights record in Tibet and to offer recommendations. That number is more than twice the nine states that raised Tibet during China's last Universal Periodic Review in 2018. The increase also reflects the rise in so-called Advanced Questions, which doubled compared to 2018.

Member states also made 24 recommendations on Tibet, up from 11 in 2018.

The Universal Periodic Review is a mechanism of the Human Rights Council to assess the human rights record of every UN member state every four to five years.

The states that raised Tibet at China's review this year were: the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, Australia, France, Lithuania, Japan, Sweden, Norway, Austria, Switzerland, Poland, the Czech Republic, the Netherlands, Ireland, Montenegro, New Zealand, Canada, Denmark and Estonia.

"We welcome the considerable rise in statements and concern among states with regard to Chinese policies in Tibet," said the International Campaign for Tibet.

"Tibetans from Tibet have not had the chance to contribute to this review and raise their voices. We are therefore grateful to all states that raised China's coercive boarding schools and relocation policies in Tibet and called for religious freedom, cultural rights for Tibetans and unfettered access to Tibet. Now the international community needs to follow up in bilateral relations with China and continue to raise Tibet."

Boarding schools, arbitrary detentions and lack of access

The statements by the member states raised the religious and cultural rights of Tibetans. They highlighted in particular the boarding schools that have separated over 1 million Tibetan children from their families, language, religion and culture.

States called for the abolition of the boarding schools. They also called for the release of arbitrarily detained Tibetans and for unfettered access to Tibet, which China keeps largely cut off to foreign diplomats and journalists.

The Chinese government refrained from responding to the issue of boarding schools and flatly claimed that religious freedom and cultural rights of Tibetans were protected, citing numbers of temples, religious personnel or teachers.

Regarding relocation policies, the Chinese delegation claimed to relocate Tibetans from high altitudes with their consent, in the absence of an independent judiciary and rule of law and in a pervasive climate of fear. With what appeared to be an aggressive tone, the Chinese ambassador rebutted criticism and denounced allegations as smears, lies and an attempt at defamation.

Tense climate

The review took place in a tense climate, with the Chinese government present with an unusually large delegation, comprising more than 40 diplomats. Beijing also mobilized a considerable number of Chinese NGOs (known as GONGOs—government-organized NGOs) that merely parrot the party line.

The Human Rights Council also restricted access to the review for civil society, with NGOs initially only having 15 seats available in the room, which were taken up by Chinese GONGOs.

Moreover, the unusually high number of states wanting to take the floor reduced each statement to within 45 seconds. At the same time, a large number of states merely used their speaking time for bluntly affirmative statements ignoring the reality on the ground.

Side event

On the eve of China's review, the International Campaign for Tibet participated in a side event at the Human Rights Council organized by the Helsinki Foundation for Human Rights.

Panelists included the Representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama Thinlay Chukki; Lhadon Tethong, director of the Tibet Action Institute; and Bhuchung Tsering, head of the Research and Monitoring Unit at the International Campaign for Tibet.

US Under Secretary of State Uzra Zeya, who serves as the US special coordinator for Tibetan issues, and Ambassador Michèle Taylor delivered statements at the panel, with Zeya's pre-recorded and Taylor's delivered on the floor.

UN China review: International community must clearly address Tibet

22 January 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

One day before the UN Human Rights Council's review of China, the International Campaign for Tibet urgently appeals to the international community to address the Communist Party's repressive policies in Tibet.

On Jan. 23, 2024 in Geneva, China will face the so-called "Universal Periodic Review" (UPR) for the fourth time. All UN member states must undergo the review on a rotating basis.

"UN member states must use the upcoming review process to press for sweeping changes in Chinese policy in Tibet. The massive attacks on Tibetan culture, Tibetan Buddhism, the Tibetan language and the Tibetan way of life are no longer acceptable. Of particular concern are the residential school system and resettlement programs, which affect millions of Tibetans. It is a farce that the Communist Party is selling this as progress, according to its authoritarian definition of what is supposedly good for the people and what is not," said the International Campaign for Tibet, an advocacy group that promotes human rights and democratic freedoms for Tibetans.

Widespread, systematic violations

In the run-up to China's review at the UN Human Rights Council, ICT, together with the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH), had already submitted a report in July 2023 detailing the systematic and widespread patterns of rights violations in Tibet.

The report contains a number of recommendations to the international community, which ICT and FIDH believe should be addressed to the Chinese government in the context of Tuesday's review of China by the UN Human Rights Council.

In their report, ICT and FIDH highlight three aspects of the Chinese government's repressive policies against Tibetan culture:

- The system of "forced boarding schools" and the associated goal of restricting the Tibetan language and alienating Tibetan children from their culture.

- The forcible expulsion and resettlement of Tibetan nomads and rural populations from their ancestral lands.
- The persecution of Tibetan Buddhists because of their faith and religious practice, combined with an ideological transformation of religious institutions.

Read ICT and FIDH's detailed report to the UN Human Rights Council.

Tibetan activist receives State Department religious freedom award

19 January 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

The International Campaign for Tibet congratulates Tibetan activist Lhadon Tethong on receiving a US State Department International Religious Freedom Award as part of the department's 25th anniversary celebration of the International Religious Freedom Act.

At the award ceremony on Jan. 18, 2024, Richard Verma, deputy secretary of state for management and resources, hailed Lhadon for "us[ing] technology to support Tibetans and others facing Chinese repression."

Lhadon, who was one of several to receive the awards, is the co-founder and director of Tibet Action Institute, an organization that combines digital communication and strategic nonviolent action to advance the Tibetan freedom movement.

After the ceremony, Lhadon tweeted: "Today the US [Ambassador at Large for International Religious Freedom Rashad Hussain] recognized @TibetAction's work to defend the inalienable right of Tibetans in PRC-occupied Tibet to worship freely as Beijing holds 1M Tibetan kids in a system of colonial boarding schools, intentionally cutting them off from their religion & culture."

International Religious Freedom Awards

The International Religious Freedom Awards are part of the events celebrating a quarter-century of the International Religious Freedom Act, which President Bill Clinton signed into law in October 1998. The act elevated the role of religious freedom in US foreign policy.

According to the State Department, the awards recognize individuals for "their courage and commitment to promoting and defending religious freedom globally."

Along with Lhadon, awards this year went to Farid Ahmed, Kola Alapinni, Mirza Dinnayi, Peter Jacob, Martha Patricia Molina Montenegro, Tali Nates and a group of nine Orthodox clergy from Lithuania represented by Gintaras Sungaila.

"These advocates," the department said, "have focused on promoting human rights and mutual respect for all in countries including Nigeria, Iraq, Pakistan, New Zealand, South Africa, and Nicaragua, as well as protecting the rights of Orthodox Christians, Tibetan Buddhists, and members of other religious communities around the world.”

Staff of the Office of Tibet, including Representative Namgyal Choedup, and International Campaign for Tibet were among those invited to attend the awards ceremony and congratulated Lhadon and the other award recipients.

Lhadon also recently appeared on ICT’s Tibet Talks podcast to discuss China’s boarding schools in Tibet, which have separated over 1 million Tibetan children from their families, language, religion and culture.

State Department support

The award for Lhadon is just one of several recent US government actions that have shined a light on the human rights situation in Tibet.

- Secretary of State Anthony Blinken last year announced visa sanctions on Chinese officials for their involvement in the boarding school system.
- Blinken also expressed concerns about China’s reported mass DNA collection in Tibet, making him the senior-most US official to raise the issue publicly.
- President Joe Biden also raised Tibet with Xi Jinping during their meeting in San Francisco in November.
- In recent years, the US has enacted the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act and the Tibetan Policy and Support Act. Congress is now considering another bipartisan bill, the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, which unanimously passed the House Foreign Affairs Committee late last year.

India awards gallantry medals in previously unreported recent Tibet-border clashes

18 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan18’24) – Amid claims and suggestions that an uneasy calm has continued to prevail on India’s border with Chinese occupied Tibet, it has emerged that more clashes between Indian and Chinese troops have occurred than had been reported in the recent past and that soldiers had been awarded medals last week for their displays of exceptional gallantry.

Recent citations for gallantry awards at the Indian Army’s Western Command investiture ceremony shed light on at least two previously undisclosed hand-to-hand clashes between Indian and Chinese troops along the LAC (line of actual control), reported the timesofindia.com and scmp.com Jan 17.

At the ceremony held last week, the Indian Army’s firm response to China’s People’s Liberation Army

I(PLA) soldiers’ aggression was commended, said the timesofindia.com report.

The incidents mentioned in the citations were stated to have occurred between Sep 2021 and Nov 2022.

The citations were stated to provide brief accounts of how Indian troops responded firmly to the aggressive behaviour exhibited by soldiers from the PLA along the LAC.

The Indian Army’s Western Command, headquartered in Chandimandir, had initially uploaded a video of the ceremony on its YouTube channel, featuring commentary on the gallantry awards. However, the video was deactivated on Jan 15, the report said.

The incidents involved hand-to-hand combat and came as New Delhi and Beijing held a series of diplomatic and military talks to resolve their worst military conflict in decades. These skirmishes in India’s Ladakh region, the last of which is now known to have happened in Nov 2022, show that the tensions along the unmarked border continued much longer than previously reported, noted the scmp.com report.

During physical jostling, an Indian soldier wounded at least four Chinese troops and snatched their rifles, “forcing them to go back”, the citation in the first incident was quoted as saying.

In the second incident, which occurred in Nov 2022, Indian troops pushed back “a group of 40 to 50 soldiers of (PLA)” who were trying to enter Indian territory. A unit of Indian soldiers attacked and injured them, “thus foiling the enemy’s plan to capture the post”, the report quoted the citation as saying.

The citations were also cited as saying army units of the two countries were involved in a two-day stand-off in an unspecified area in 2022.

Since the clashes in Ladakh’s Galwan Valley in Jun 2020, the Indian Army has maintained a high level of combat readiness along the 3,488 km-long LAC.

Over the past three and a half years, there have been multiple skirmishes between Indian and Chinese troops following the border dispute in eastern Ladakh that began in May 2020 in the LAC’s western sector. The Chinese troops also attempted a transgression in the Tawang sector of the LAC in Arunachal Pradesh in the eastern sector, the report noted.

This occurred on Dec 9, 2022, when PLA troops made an unsuccessful attempt to transgress the LAC in the Yangtse area of Tawang Sector, resulting in a unilateral change in the status quo. India’s Defence Minister Rajnath Singh addressed Parliament four days later and confirmed that Indian troops firmly contested the Chinese attempt. Several Indian Army personnel involved in countering the transgression were honoured with gallantry awards during the investiture ceremony, the report said.

"The ensuing face-off led to a physical scuffle in which the Indian Army bravely prevented the PLA from transgressing into our territory and compelled them to return to their posts," Singh said.

Even earlier reports, dating from Aug 2020, had hinted that the Galwan clash was not an isolated incident, with several preceding skirmishes, including all-night clashes causing substantial injuries on both sides. The recently disclosed clashes offer a deeper understanding of the escalating tension between these two nuclear-armed powers, locked in a standoff since May 2020, said a financialexpress.com report Jan 16.

'India should be alert...': Shashi Tharoor warns on growing proximity between Maldives and China

15 January 2024, Live Mint

Congress MP Shashi Tharoor has warned India about the increasing proximity of the Maldives government to China and said that the government must be aware of the danger that this represents.

While speaking at the 54th annual day of 'Thuglak' magazine, Tharoor said that China has been attempting to expand its influence throughout India's periphery. "We have to watch very carefully the increasing proximity of the Maldives government to the Chinese," he said.

Further adding, Tharoor, who had served as the Minister of State for External Affairs said, "There is no doubt about the fact that China has been attempting to expand its influence throughout our periphery. They have been increasingly influential in everyone of our neighbouring countries, everyone, without exception."

"We (India) should certainly be alert and I am sure that our government must be aware of the dangers that this represents and there will be some redlines which would be privately communicated among governments."

"...We have to understand is that you (Maldives) have the right to have relations with other countries like we do, but some things we would see as a serious concern for our interests and in those we will take proper action. So far, I think there was no cause for any alarm," he noted.

However, he observed that India's foreign policy should not be discussed in social media and there has to be a more serious level of engagement following the diplomatic row between India and Maldives being widely discussed in various social media platforms.

"We must understand and respect the sensitivities of a small neighbour being close to all," he said.

Meanwhile, on Sunday, the Maldives asked India to withdraw its troops stationed in the country by 15

March, said Abdulla Nazim Ibrahim, a top aide to President Mohamed Muizzu, at a press conference. Tensions between the two countries took a hit after some Maldivian ministers made comments on social media that were seen as derogatory to Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Indians. These prompted a backlash on social media and led to the suspension of three deputy ministers. The Maldives government distanced itself from the statements of these ministers.

President Muizzu who recently completed a state visit to China, during which Beijing agreed to provide $130 million for the development of Male, the capital city. The two countries also signed an agreement on agricultural cooperation. The newly elected President also called China "one of the Maldives' closest allies and developmental partners". Recently, in a press conference, Muizzu also made comments that were seen to be aimed at India. "We may be small, but that doesn't give you the licence to bully us," Muizzu was quoted as saying by Maldivian media. "We aren't in anyone's backyard. We are an independent and sovereign state."

Earlier, referring to a question on whether the I.N.D.I.A. bloc alliance would bring Muslims to power, he said, "I.N.D.I.A. Bloc alliance would bring Indians to power and I want to remind you that Muslims are also Indians."

"We should not forget that one of the great strengths of our society is that we have appreciated people of all sorts of backgrounds," he said.

Tibet Not in Focus, Repression Persists: Exiled Former Leader

15 January 2024, CTA

TAIPEI, (Reuters) – The plight of Tibet has become less discussed internationally but repression continues and China is applying what it did there to other regions, a former head of the Tibetan government-in-exile said on Saturday.

China seized control of Tibet in 1950 in what it describes as a "peaceful liberation" from feudalistic serfdom. International human rights groups and exiles routinely condemn what they call China's oppressive rule in Tibetan areas.

Tibet went through mass protests in 2008 before Beijing held the Olympics, and then a series of self-immolations by Tibetans in protest against Chinese rule, but then what China was doing to Uyghurs in Xinjiang followed by the security crackdown in Hong Kong took more attention, he added.

"On the one hand, yes, there is less coverage about Tibet. That doesn't mean the situation in Tibet is less serious," Sangay said.

China's Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment. China does not recognise the exiled government, and has defended its rule in Tibet as bringing much needed development to what was a backward and feudal society.

Click here to read more.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama Congratulates President-elect Lai Ching-te of Taiwan

14 January 2024, CTA

Bodhgaya, Bihar, India – Following yesterday's presidential elections in Taiwan, His Holiness the Dalai Lama has written to Mr. Lai Ching-te, the President-Elect, to offer his warm congratulations

"Indeed," he wrote, "observing the exercise of democracy, as has just taken place in Taiwan, is a source of encouragement for all of us who aspire to live in freedom and dignity.

"I have fond memories of the hospitality the people of Taiwan showed me during my visits there, when I was also able to see how firmly rooted democracy has become. The Taiwanese people have not only developed a flourishing, robust democracy, but have also achieved a great deal in terms of economics and education, while at the same time preserving their rich traditional culture.

"I admire the strong devotion Taiwanese Buddhists have to the Buddha dharma. As a Buddhist monk, I try my best to fulfill their requests for teachings and spiritual guidance from time to time.

"Good relations between Taiwan and the People's Republic of China are of utmost importance. It is my longstanding conviction that engaging in dialogue is the best way to resolve difficult issues, whether on a local, national or international level."

His Holiness concluded by wishing Mr. Lai every success in meeting the challenges that lie ahead in fulfilling the hopes and aspirations of the people of Taiwan.

Human Rights Situation in Tibet 2023 – A Year in Review

13 January 2024, CTA

Dharamshala: The year 2023 has been marked by a significant amount of global conflict, including two major wars and the loss of many lives. As the world deals with these crises and conflicts, Tibet has been, for more than six decades, a place where some of the most visible and egregious human rights violations committed by the government of the People's Republic of China (PRC) have occurred, and the human rights situation in 2023 was no different.

For the third consecutive year, Freedom House has ranked Tibet as the least free region on Earth, with an overall score of just 1 out of 100. In 2023, China remained the world's worst offender of internet freedom for the ninth consecutive year as free expression continues to be suppressed in the country with heightened control over citizens' access to information, online activities on social media and crackdown on prominent rights activists and bloggers with long imprisonment.

The PRC government's "Sinicization" campaign in Tibet continues to intensify, evident by the persistent operations of state-run colonial boarding schools housing nearly 1 million Tibetan children, even as Tibetan schools are being systematically shut down across the region. The government mouthpieces have amplified their publicity of boarding schools, indicating their intent to offer education to children from all regions of Tibet. However, they failed to address pressing curriculum concerns or discriminatory policies that impede access to cultural, religious, and language education for Tibetan students. Last year alone, more than 34 thousand Tibetan residents have been forced to relocate from their traditional land to government-built housing for various reasons, including making way for hydropower projects, so-called ecological conservation and facilitating the PRC government's control of Tibetans in fixed settlements.

Reports from exile news media indicate that at least 40 Tibetans, both monks and laypeople, have been detained arbitrarily, of whom eight have received prison sentences of up to three years in connection with their expression of Tibetan identity. The practice of torture, despite being regarded as a grave violation of fundamental human rights, continues to be endemic in Chinese prisons without any repercussions. Several reports have emerged that Tibetan political prisoners have died in Chinese custody, prisoners have been released in very poor health or on medical parole, and Tibetan activists have been beaten up by Chinese authorities or CCP goons. The repeated assaults by Chinese authorities on Tibetan rights activist Gonpo Kyi demonstrate the extent to which the Chinese government is willing to use its power to restrict Tibetans' fundamental rights, including the right to appeal for a fair trial despite its guarantee by Chinese law. Tibetan language rights activist Tashi Wangchuk was also ambushed by CCP goons in a hotel room and later denied a business license by the local municipality, in a clear example of the continued attacks and mistreatment of former political prisoners.

Zangkar Jamyang and Golog Palden's long prison terms demonstrate the PRC government's recklessness in attacking influential Tibetan individuals merely for expressing Tibetan identity and concerns about the eradication of Tibetan language due to Chinese oppression. A group of four Tibetan individuals were given two years of imprisonment each for initiating religious events in their village, which simply included sang-sol, a purification or cleansing of spiritual pollution or blockages, and reciting prayers for the longevity and wellbeing of Tibetan Buddhist religious leaders. Also, a Tibetan man named Tsultrim and a Tibetan woman named Semkyi Dolma were both sentenced to two and one and a half years imprisonment for maintaining pictures of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and communicating with Tibetans in exile, respectively.

By promulgating the infamous “Measures for the Administration of Religious Activity Sites”, or Order 19, the PRC government has demonstrated its malicious attempts to subjugate and gain control over religious institutions by making the “Sinicization” of religion a mandatory part of its national laws. It mandates, among other things, that religious institutions provide political indoctrination sessions to their members, where the members will be instructed in the CCP’s policies and guidelines, laws and regulations, and the “excellent traditional culture” and religion of China. The Tibetan people continue to face harsh punishment and arbitrary detention as a consequence of their expression of religious identity and participation in religious activities. Chinese authorities have barred Tibetans from attending a key Buddhist event of Kalachakra out of fear that the gathering of more than 100,000 people could pose a threat to the government. Two basic facts can be drawn: Tibetan people lack respect, dignity, and freedom to express their rights, while the Chinese government is insecure about the rule of Tibet.

The utilization of advanced AI tools to monitor and surveil Tibetans, coupled with other surveillance strategies such as disinformation campaigns and censorship, is exacerbating the deteriorating human rights condition in Tibet. The Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) Cyber Security Management Regulations which came into effect on 1 February 2023 subject individuals engaging in activities that relate to Tibetan culture, language or religion to stricter regulations and harsher punishments. The law does not specify what violations could lead to an individual Tibetan being detained or arrested by authorities, thus giving Chinese police the arbitrary power to target Tibetans for cultural, social, and religious conversations. The regulations have caused disruption and setbacks in the lives of Tibetans where they are unable to practice their culture and go about their normal lives. For instance, a number of Tibetan men and women were arbitrarily detained for sharing pictures of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, audio tracks on Tibetan Buddhism, talking on accumulating religious merits on social media WeChat groups.

Transnational repression by the PRC government has led to self-censorship among Tibetan diaspora, who live in constant fear and have, as a result, been forced to sever contact with family members in Tibet to protect them from potential PRC government reprisals. Last year, credible reports indicated Tibetan youth were denied the opportunity to apply for government jobs if their family members are in diaspora communities or they actively participate in activities to expose the PRC’s repression of Tibet, thereby forcing them to cut ties with their families in exile.

China’s disinformation campaign is strategically crafted to achieve two goals: to counter Tibetan historical accounts and to divert and mislead the global audience, shifting their attention away from its human rights abuses. The latest “White Paper” on Tibet titled “CCP Policies on the Governance of Xizang in the New Era: Approach and Achievements”, aims primarily to misinform the international community by painting a flowery image of Tibet by using figures that imply development that does not benefit Tibetans in any way, while sugarcoating the violations of human rights being committed in Tibet. All official documents replacing “Tibet” with “Xizang” (Chinese term for Tibet) make it clear that the PRC government attempts to imply legitimacy of its illegal occupation of Tibet and reclaim the global association of “Tibet” with injustice and eradicating a valuable culture.

In addition to all of the unjust stories from Tibet under CCP repression, last year also saw growing support for Tibet from the international community through the passing of legislation and resolutions, as well as the release of statements and reports condemning the PRC government’s repressive policies aimed at eradicating Tibetan identity at its core through compulsory colonial boarding schools and “vocational training” programs, among others. Having the support of the international community is vital to advancing the Tibetan cause since it provides a platform for advocacy, intensifies diplomatic pressure, and promotes a greater understanding of Tibetan issues in general.

Likewise, last year demonstrated that the Tibetan people inside Tibet have remained committed to preserving Tibetan identity despite increasing pressure and repression by the PRC government in its attempt to penetrate Tibetan identity and turn it into Chinese.

UN Must Include Strong Language on Tibet in China Review

12 January 2024, CTA

As the United Nations prepares to take up China’s report at the upcoming Universal Periodic Review at the end of January, the accelerating deterioration in Tibet demands that UN member states scrutinize China and that the UN adopts strong language on Tibet in its concluding report.

China’s Universal Periodic Review will take place Jan 23 in Geneva. The UPR is a mechanism of the Human Rights Council to assess the human rights record of every UN member state every four to five years.

In July 2023 the International Campaign for Tibet and the International Federation for Human Rights submitted a joint report detailing systematic and widespread patterns of rights violations in Tibet. The report particularly highlighted three aspects that indicate a shift to a more oppressive and destructive system:

- The so-called “residential boarding schools” in Tibet, which have coerced the separation of over 1 million Tibetan children from their families, and an attendant focus on uprooting the Tibetan language
- Forcible and coercive expulsion of nomads and rural agrarians from their traditional lands
- Punishment for religious expression coupled with an insidious infiltration of religious institutions.

Since the joint report, the situation in Tibet continues to show further deterioration. The Chinese government’s policy of repression is clearly aimed at eradicating the authentic and self-determined Tibetan culture.

Refusing to add ‘China’ to sash, Tibetan woman forced out of pageant

12 January 2024, RFA

A Tibetan woman was forced to withdraw from a beauty pageant in Cambodia due to apparent pressure from China after she refused to add “China” to the words “Miss Tibet” on her sash, she and organizers said.

The incident involving Tenzin Paldon, 28, a contestant at the Miss Global 2023 pageant, jointly hosted by Cambodia and Vietnam, is the latest example where China has used pressure tactics to force international events to toe its political line.

“The organizers, under Chinese pressure, gave me two options: to participate with ‘China’ added to my sash or to not wear a sash at all, which I felt defeated the purpose of my participation which was to represent my country, Tibet,” Paldon told Radio Free Asia from her home in New York, after returning from Cambodia.

“So, I chose to walk out of the event,” said Paldon, who had participated in the same competition in Cambodia in January 2018.

Organizers also said a Taiwanese contestant, Linda Huang, was initially excluded from the competition, but then was reinstated after she agreed to change her sash from “Taiwan ROC” – referring to the Republic of China – to one that read “Taipei China.”

In Sophin, the owner of Mahahang Production, representing the Cambodian side of the organizers, confirmed to RFA that government officials recommended removing two candidates, one from Tibet and one from Taiwan, in keeping with the “one China policy.”

Paldon said she heard the same thing: “One of the organizers said the Cambodian prime minister had texted them saying the Taiwanese and Tibetan pageant candidates should be kicked out of the competition.”

In Sophin said that Huang returned to the pageant after agreeing to wear the “Taipei China” sash.

But Huang told RFA that she was not suspended from the competition. She said that in addition to a sash saying “Taiwan ROC,” she was “offered” a second sash by organizers that read “Taipei China.” She refused to say whether she agreed to wear the second sash.

Video from the competition shows her wearing a sash saying “Taiwan ROC.”

Huang said that the “Taipei China” label is officially used by athletes and contestants representing the island at international events, including the Olympics, and so saw nothing wrong with it.

“Overall, my representation aligns with the Taiwanese government’s stance on maintaining peace, preserving our freedom index, and engaging in the world in a peaceful and fair manner,” she told RFA.

‘Victory to Tibet’

Paldon, who wore a sash that said “Miss Tibet” during the introductory round on Jan. 2, likely caught the attention of Chinese authorities after she shouted “Bhod Gyalo,” or “Victory to Tibet,” during the sash ceremony, which was broadcast live on social media platforms and Cambodian television, she said.

Shortly thereafter, Paldon was stopped at the Vietnamese border as she was making her way to the venue of the next round of the competition.

There, pageant organizers told her the Chinese government had put pressure on Cambodian Prime Minister Hun Manet to have Paldon removed from the pageant after they saw the sash ceremony, and questioned the Cambodian government on why a candidate representing Tibet was allowed to wear a sash that read Miss Tibet and shout, “Bhod Gyalo.”

For years, Cambodia has sought to deepen ties with China. Hun Manet chose to go to Beijing for his maiden official trip abroad in September after taking over as prime minister from his father, Hun Sen, signaling a continued commitment to strengthening Cambodia’s relationship with China.

Sash politics

Paldon, who won the “Miss Tibet 2017” title at a beauty pageant held for Tibetan women of the diaspora, also expressed disappointment at the politicization of international beauty pageants.

“It is unfortunate that politics dictate events of young women and their aspirations, and it’s heartbreaking to note that these events are fixed,” Paldon said. “All I want to be is a role model for young Tibetan women out there, in particular to empower many women who are from displaced communities like me.”

When Paldon arrived back at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York on Jan. 10 after waiting for nearly a week in Cambodia at her own expense, she was welcomed by Tibetan community members and supporters, who praised her for her stance.

“We are disheartened but also very proud of the firm stand [she has taken] as a Tibetan,” said Tashi Palmo, secretary of the Regional Tibetan Women's Organization of New York and New Jersey.

This is not the first time Miss Tibet candidates have had to withdraw from global beauty contests for refusing to add “China” to their sash.

In 2005, Tashi Yangchen was forced to withdraw from a Miss Tourism Pageant held in Zimbabwe after she came under pressure to either wear a sash that said ‘Miss Tibet-China’ or to participate as a guest. She chose to walk out of the event.

Two years later, Miss Tibet 2006 Tsering Chungdak also met with a similar fate at a contest in Malaysia.

The Miss Tibet contest, started by Lobsang Wangyal Productions in 2002 with the mission of ‘Celebrating Tibetan Women,’ had 15 annual editions until 2017, after which it did not take place for various reasons, including a lack of enough applicants and the coronavirus pandemic.

The pageant, however, is set to make a comeback in 2024 after a five-year-long hiatus, Lobsang Wangyal, Director of Miss Tibet beauty pageant, said in a statement.

Belgian Prime Minister urged to take up Tibet during upcoming China visit

09 January 2023, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan09'24) – Ahead of Belgian Prime Minister Alexander De Croo and Minister of Foreign Affairs Hadja Lahbib's visit China this week, marking the first high-level mission since 2019, the International Campaign for Tibet (ICT) has called for the issue of Tibet to be included in the discussions, reported brusselstimes.com Jan 8.

De Croo is scheduled to travel to Beijing over Jan 11 to 12 in a trip to renew high-level ties. Lahbib, who touches down in Shanghai on Jan 10 for fostering economic connections, will join De Croo in Beijing on Jan 11 for official engagements with President Xi Jinping, Prime Minister Li Qiang, and Zhao Leji, the Chairman of the National People's Congress, which is China's parliament. Key to discussions will be all aspects of Sino-Belgian relationships.

The report noted that in Dec 2023, De Croo confirmed that he would discuss China's political interference with Belgian officials following the revelation that honorary Flemish MP Frank Creyelman (Vlaams Belang) was working as a Chinese spy.

Drawing on that remark, Vincent Metten, EU Policy Director of the ICT, has said, “Chinese interference in national politics runs parallel with the repression of Tibetan and Uyghur diasporas.”

He has said that in Belgium, as in other European nations, members of these communities had reported receiving threatening phone calls directed at themselves or family back home in a bid to dissuade them from campaigning. “The Belgian State has an obligation to protect its citizens,” Metten had maintained.

Belgium is home to a sizeable number of Tibetans who had been given asylum in recent decades.

On Tibet, ICT has said, “Recent reports clearly demonstrate China's determination to erase Tibetan identity. ICT is deeply concerned about the ongoing cultural genocide against the Tibetan people.”

The Washington-headquartered ICT has concluded, “Belgium, currently holding the rotating presidency of the Council of the European Union, has the responsibility to hold China accountable for these violations of international law. Prime Minister De Croo should urge Chinese authorities to resume negotiations with the Dalai Lama to resolve the conflict in Tibet.”

Mirroring EU policy, De Croo had explained last month, “Our relationship with China hinges on three components, much like the European Union. China is simultaneously a partner, competitor, and a rival. Means we must navigate areas of collaboration and maintain vigilance.”

Thermo Fisher stops sale of DNA kits in Tibet after activists raised fears of rights abuses

06 January 2024, The Guardian

The US biotech company Thermo Fisher has halted sales of its DNA identification kits in Tibet, nearly five years after it made a similar commitment about the sale of its products in the neighbouring western Chinese region of Xinjiang.

It decided to stop sales in Tibet after months of complaints from rights groups and investors that the technology may be used in a way that abuses human rights. The company said that the decision was made in the middle of 2023, but it was only revealed to investors late last month.

Human rights experts and exiles have said there are pervasive levels of surveillance in Tibet, one of the most tightly controlled parts of China. Foreigners cannot freely visit and many exiled Tibetans have limited contact with their relatives there, making it hard for information to reach the outside world.

Conditions have been likened to those in Xinjiang, where rights groups said that the authorities are building a DNA database for Uyghur Muslims. The authorities have denied the accusations.

Beijing worries about separatism in both regions. The regions' dominant ethnic groups practise cultures and faiths that are different from the Chinese Han majority, and which the Chinese Communist party views with suspicion.

In 2022, the Intercept reported that Tibetan police signed a deal to purchase more than $160,000 worth of DNA profiling kits from Thermo Fisher. Separately, Human Rights Watch reported that mass DNA collection was taking place across Tibet, including from boys as young as five. Citizen Lab, a research institute at the University of Toronto, estimated that between 2016 and 2022, up to one-third of Tibet's population gave DNA samples to the police.

In 2019, Thermo Fisher said it would stop selling its DNA kits in Xinjiang, citing its ethics code. Last month the Guardian revealed that an academic paper published in 2019 which evaluated Thermo Fisher's genetic sequencing technology on minorities in Xinjiang had been retracted because of concerns that the DNA samples had not been obtained with the proper consent. The study was conducted by university researchers, not Thermo Fisher's own scientists.

Campaigners said DNA sampling in Tibet should also be closely scrutinised. Tibetans are monitored "constantly", said Tenzin Rabga Tashi, an activist with Free Tibet, a London-based NGO. He said the kits would have enhanced the Chinese government's ability to surveil the local population.

Responding to Thermo Fisher's decision on Thursday, the Global Times, a Chinese state media tabloid, said "the narrative that the 'Chinese government is collecting DNA data in Xizang [Tibet] for surveillance' comes out of nowhere. Collecting DNA data in China has been an effective approach for public security organs in the country to trace missing children and combat human trafficking."

Thermo Fisher said its sales in Tibet "are consistent with routine forensic investigation in an area of this size" and that its human identification technology "is used for important forensic applications, from tracking down criminals, to stopping human trafficking and freeing the unjustly accused". It did not elaborate on the reasons for halting sales to Tibet.

Joshua Brockwell, investment communications director for Azzad Asset Management, said: "As investors of conscience, Azzad is pleased that our calls on Thermo Fisher to make the right choice and help end biometric repression as a tool of Chinese authoritarian surveillance have been heeded."

Yves Moreau, a professor of engineering at the University of Leuven, in Belgium, who focuses on DNA analysis, said: "The persecution of Tibetans and control of the Tibetan plateau relies on a hi-tech system of digital authoritarianism ... DNA databases are a piece of this architecture of total surveillance ... By selling its products to Tibetan public security, Thermo Fisher was aiding and abetting those abuses."

Thermo Fisher's business in China has come under particular scrutiny because the company's chief executive, Marc Casper, also chairs the US-China Business Council. In November, he hosted a $40,000 per table dinner to welcome China's president, Xi Jinping, to San Francisco. At the dinner, Casper said that companies like Thermo Fisher "have been at the forefront of China's modernisation" and cited the fact that the "vast majority" of the company's employees were in the US and China.

Casper's role on the council "destroys any ignorance [the company] can claim, particularly after the company withdrew from the Uyghur region in 2019", said John Jones, the head of campaigns at Free Tibet.

In 2022, the company generated revenue of $3.8bn in China, up from $3.4bn the previous year. China is Thermo Fisher's biggest market outside the US.

Body found near where Tibetan Buddhist monk went missing

05 January 2024, RFA

Geshe Dadul Namgyal teaches at Sravasti Abbey in Newport, Washington, on Sep. 28, 2023, less than two months before he was reported missing.

A sheriff's office in Washington state said they found the body of a deceased male in a pond near where a 64-year-old Tibetan Buddhist monk went missing in November.

Investigators have said the clothing on the body matched that of Geshe Dadul Namgyal, a senior monk and male resident teacher at the Sravasti Abbey in Newport who was reported missing on Nov. 8 after he failed to show up for a prayer ceremony a day earlier.

Investigators said they are awaiting the results of the autopsy report to confirm the identity of the body, which residents of the abbey said had been frozen over with ice and had only recently thawed.

Newport is the county seat of Pend Oreille County in the northeast corner of the state, bordering Idaho.

In a statement, the Pend Oreille County Sheriff's Office said they received a call on Jan. 3 from the abbey reporting that residents had sighted a body floating in a pond. Police retrieved the body, which was partially submerged in the cold water, using a canoe, the Sheriff's Office said.

"While walking around the pond on Abbey property yesterday, two monastics noticed that maroon-colored clothing was floating on the surface of the water," according to a Jan. 4 statement by Sravasti Abbey.

"We contacted the Sheriff's Department immediately. They came out, called for a boat, and retrieved a body which they think matches the description of Geshe Chodrak (the ordination name of Geshe Dadul Namgyal)," the statement said.

Namgyal was reportedly last seen wearing a maroon jacket over his monk's robes when he went missing while taking a walk around the abbey's 300-acre grounds.

The sheriff's office and the abbey didn't immediately respond to Radio Free Asia's requests for comments.

Extensive search in November

"An autopsy was requested by the Coroner to determine an estimated time of death and possible cause," the sheriff's office said. "Also requested was a positive identity of the deceased person."

In November, the sheriff's office, abbey residents and local search and rescue volunteers carried out extensive searches in the area surrounding the abbey's grounds.

Namgyal's family also offered a reward of up to $25,000 in cash for any information that may help find the missing monk.

Namgyal – who joined the abbey in May as one of its first male resident teachers – has been a practicing monk and a Buddhist practitioner, teacher, scholar and translator for over four decades.

He served as an English language translator for the Dalai Lama and as a speaker and interpreter at many Buddhist conferences that delve into the intersection of Buddhism with modern science, psychology and Western philosophy.

Namgyal has also made significant contributions in developing a comprehensive bilingual science learning curriculum for Tibetan Buddhist monks and nuns while working with the Emory-Tibet Science Initiative as one of the lead translators.

Prior to joining Sravasti Abbey, he was the senior translator and interpreter with the Emory University's Center for Contemplative Science and Compassionbased Ethics, while also serving as the senior resident teacher for the Drepung Loseling Monastery in Atlanta.

"Geshe Dadul was a very learned scholar," said Tsondue Samphel, assistant director for Emory's Social, Emotional and Ethical Learning Program. "He understood and translated scientific terminologies and jargons with ease. This, in turn, was of great benefit to the scientists as well as the monks and nuns studying science."

Namgyal also served for several years as the principal of the Monastic School for Modern Education at Drepung Loseling Monastery in south India, and later, as a professor of Indo-Tibetan Buddhism at the Central University of Tibetan Studies in Sarnath in north India.

He received his Geshe Lharam degree – the highest degree of learning in Tibetan Buddhism – from Drepung Loseling Monastery in South India in 1992.

Child-ed group Manjushri unveils new books

03 January 2024, Phayul

Manjushri, a Dharamshala based organization dedicated to promoting Tibetan children's literature and education, unveiled new books that included five Tibetan folktale books, a Tibetan jigsaw puzzle, and an activity book on Tuesday.

Jamyang Gyaltsen, the executive director of Manjushree, expressed pride in the organization's achievements, highlighting that they have successfully published 81 titles of Tibetan children's books since its inception. These publications have reached a wide audience, with over 70,000 copies distributed, nearly half of them are provided free of charge to ensure accessibility.

Director of Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, Geshe Lhakdor, who attended the event as the chief guest, highlighted critical aspects of Tibetan education system in exile. While emphasizing the significance of instilling Tibetan education in children, he expressed concern over the increasing trend of migration of Tibetan youth to the West, which poses a threat to Tibetan language and culture. He stressed the pivotal role of parents in supplementing classroom learning and urged them to prioritize Tibetan language in their households.

Acknowledging the collaborative efforts of the Department of Education (DoE) and various organizations supporting projects of Manjushree, Geshe Lhakdor praised their joint endeavours. He cautioned against the notion of singular superiority in organizational efforts, emphasizing the necessity of collective action. Stressing the shared goal of providing quality education to Tibetan children, he advocated for further collaboration among stakeholders.

Geshe Lhakdor also emphasized the holistic development of children through education, beyond mere literacy and language. He articulated that comprehensive child development involves more than just teaching reading and writing, instead necessitates a focus on broader aspects of a child's growth and learning.

He also shed light on the issue of a tribal mentality prevailing within the Tibetan community. He highlighted the detrimental effects of engaging in divisive politics and fostering internal conflicts, labelling these actions as indicative of a "tribal mentality." Moreover, he emphasized that this isn't unique to the Tibetan community but is witnessed across various societies. Describing this mentality as incompatible with democratic principles, he stressed the need for education to counteract such divisive tendencies.

Long-life prayer ceremony concludes Dalai Lama's Bodh Gaya visit

02 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan02'24) – The Dalai Lama concluded on Jan 1 his 11 days of scheduled programmes at Bodh Gaya, gracing a long-life ceremonial prayer offering made to him by an assortment of three Tibetan entities. They consisted of the Central Institute of Tibetan Studies, Sarnath, and its alumni; former students of the Dalhousie Tibetan School; and residents of the Tibetan settlement at Paonta Sahib, Himachal Pradesh.

Held on the Kalachakra Teaching Ground before a mammoth gathering of Buddhists from across India and numerous other countries, the ceremony was led by the Chant-master of Namgyal Monastery and presided over by the Ganden Tri Rinpoché, the throneholder of the Gelug school of Tibetan Buddhism. Jangtsé Chöjé Rinpoché and Sakya Gongma Rinpoché also attended the ceremony while Trulshik Rinpoché also took part in the ceremony.

In his address, the Dalai Lama said he considered it his responsibility to bring to people's attention the fact that "if we learn to appreciate the oneness of humanity, that we are all the same as human beings, we will learn to live in harmony and friendship, able to be of help to each other."

He reiterated this message while offering his greetings to the gathering on the occasion of the New Year Day. He said: "As Buddhists we pray for the welfare of all sentient beings, but at least we should do what we can to help the beings of this world. What's important is to recognise our companions as fellow human beings—then we'll be able to create a more peaceful world."

And in a separate message for New Year, the Dalai Lama said: "I also firmly believe that we can find peace in the world only when we find peace within.

Every human being has the potential to cultivate inner peace, and by so doing to contribute to the peace of our global community."

His Holiness the Dalai Lama greeting the crowd as he arrives on stage at the Kalachakra Teaching Ground to attend a Long-Life Prayer offered to him by several Tibetan groups in Bodhgaya, Bihar, India on January 1, 2014. (Photo courtesy: OHHDL/Tenzin Choejor)

The Dalai Lama earlier arrived at Bodh Gaya on Dec 15 after concluding his teachings in Sikkim's capital Gangtok and at Sed-gyued Monastery in Salugara, West Bengal. He began by undertaking a pilgrimage to the Mahabodhi Temple, which marks the location where the Buddha is said to have attained enlightenment more than 2,500 years ago.

On Dec 20, he inaugurated the first International Sangha Forum, a conference of over 2,000 Buddhist monks, nuns and scholars belonging to different traditions from 33 countries, organized mainly by his office and Delhi-based International Buddhist Confederation.

He led a prayer for world peace with the forum participants on Dec 23 after the three-day conference.

Over Dec 29-31, the Dalai Lama gave religious teachings to a gathering estimated to be over 50,000 people that included some 15,000 from over 50 countries.

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

CHINA POLITICS

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

Corruption galore in China's new detention system targeting the corrupt, dissent

30 December 2024, Tibetan Review

CHINA POLITICS

China has built or expanded more than 200 specialized detention facilities nationwide under a new law to interrogate suspects ensnared in Xi Jinping's widening anti-corruption drive as the Chinese leader extends his crackdown beyond the ruling Communist Party to a vast swath of public sectors, reported the edition.cnn.com Dec 28. However, the anti-corruption campaign is seen as selective, mainly targeting those seen as threat to the Xi Jinping leadership, besides being prone to abuse by a corrupt officialdom, and therefore largely ineffective, according to this report and the firstpost.com Dec 28.

Indeed, the CNN investigation report noted that since taking power in 2012, Xi had launched a sweeping campaign against graft and disloyalty, taking down corrupt officials as well as political rivals at an unprecedented speed and scale as he consolidated control over the party and the military. The expanded detention regime, named "liuzhi," or "retention in custody," comes with facilities with padded surfaces and round-the-clock guards in every cell, where detainees can be held under harrowing conditions for up to six months without ever seeing a lawyer or family members, said the edition.cnn.com report.

The report called it an extension of a system long used by the party to exert control and instil fear among its members.

A National Supervisory Commission (NSC) was founded in 2018 as part of the constitutional revision that cleared the way for Xi to rule for life. It consolidated the government's anti-graft forces and merged them with the party's disciplinary arm, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI). The two agencies work hand in glove and share the same offices, same personnel and even the same website – an arrangement that expands the remit of the party's internal graft watchdog to the entire public sector.

A criminal defence lawyer, requesting anonymity due to fears of retribution from the government, has said many of their clients had detailed abuse, threats and forced confessions while in liuzhi custody.

"Most of them would succumb to the pressure and agony. Those who resisted until the end were a tiny minority," the lawyer said.

The report cited state media as saying the expanded jurisdiction fills longstanding loopholes in the party's anti-corruption fight and enables graft busters to go after everyday abuse of power endemic in the country's behemoth public sector, from bribes and kickbacks in hospitals to misappropriation of school funds.

However, critics say it is another example of the party's ever-tightening grip over the state and all aspects of society under Xi, China's most powerful and authoritarian leader in decades, it added.

The spate of construction of liuzhi centres appears to be largely driven by a surge in demand for detention cells due to the NSC's new broad remit, as well as efforts to make liuzhi facilities more standardized and regulated than the hotels and villas often used for a controversial practice – now disbanded – known as “shuanggui,” or “double designation”, before the NSC was established and which targeted party officials, the report said.

Authorities are seen to have laid down standard construction rules for liuzhi centres – including a national plan for building these facilities between 2023 and 2027 – which is a financial burden especially for poor local administrations.

For example, the report noted that Dingxi, one of the poorest cities in the northwestern province of Gansu, had said its 305-million-yuan ($42 million) detention centre would be built following requirements specified by the CCDI and NSC to achieve the “standardized, law-based, and professional operations” of the liuzhi facility.

This massive complex, featuring 542 rooms, will include 32 detention cells, accommodation for investigators and guards to live on site, as well as other facilities to meet their daily needs, according to a 2024 budget document of the city's anti-graft agency, the report said.

Despite a national supervision law, introduced in 2018 to regulate the NSC, legal experts have said the legislation only wraps a thin veil of legality around a detention regime that operates outside the judicial system, lacks external oversight and remains inherently prone to abuse.

“In the past, it was extra-legal. Now, some critics call it ‘legally illegal,’” a Chinese legal scholar who has studied the NSC has said, speaking on condition of anonymity, citing fears of government retribution.

And China's opaque court system, which answers to the Communist Party, already boasts a conviction rate above 99%, the report noted.

Abuses of the system appear to be common. In September, Zhou Tianyong, a top economist and former professor at the elite Central Party School, where the Communist Party trains its senior officials, warned that local authorities had been using corruption probes to extort money from private entrepreneurs to fill their strained coffers, the report said.

It said that in recent years, allegations of abuse and forced confessions had emerged in multiple liuzhi cases publicized online. For example, Chen Jianjun, an architect-turned-local official, has claimed that he was deceived and forced into making false confessions of bribe-taking while detained under liuzhi in 2022 in the northwestern city of Xianyang.

Given the extreme conditions under which liuzhi detainees are held, “where both the body and the mind are pushed to their limits,” it becomes increasingly difficult to tell whether the detainee is giving an “honest confession” based on facts or opting for “full cooperation” by compromising the truth under unbearable pressure, the report cited Dacheng, a Beijing-based law firm, as saying said in an article on its social media account.

Structural reforms to address systemic corruption have yet to be implemented – or even fully ideated – leaving the root causes of graft largely unaddressed. While the crackdown has removed numerous officials, its long-term effectiveness remains uncertain, noted the firstpost.com report.

China makes room for younger faces on middle rungs of Communist Party promotions ladder

28 December 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

A number of ‘post-70s’ officials born between 1970 and 1979 have achieved full ministerial rank this year

A slew of cadres in their early 50s clinched significant administrative positions with full ministerial rank this year, as China's ruling Communist Party moves younger faces into mid-tier leadership positions.

The latest to be promoted was Liu Jie, 54, who was made acting governor of Zhejiang in eastern China on December 18. Zhejiang is well known as a power base of President Xi Jinping, who governed the province in the early 2000s.

Liu's appointment makes him China's youngest provincial governor. He is also the third “post-70s” cadre – a term used to describe officials born between 1970 and 1979 – to achieve full ministerial rank.

After graduating from University of Science and Technology Beijing with a degree in metallurgy, Liu started his career in 1992 as a technician with Xiangtan Iron and Steel Group in central Hunan province.

He spent nearly 15 years with the state-owned firm, rising to general manager before being appointed director of the Hunan Department of Commerce in 2008.

After a decade-long rotation to Jiangxi province in the southeast and Guizhou in the southwest, Liu's career took a decisive leap in 2021 when he was picked to replace a scandal-hit party boss in Zhejiang.

Liu, who was born in January 1970, was transferred to serve as party chief of Zhejiang's e-commerce hub of Hangzhou after his predecessor Zhou Jiangyong crashed out in the corruption scandal.

His fellow post-70s ministerial-level officials are Li Yunze, director of the National Financial Regulatory Administration (NFRA), who was born in September 1970, and the two months younger A Dong, first secretary of the Communist Youth League.

Li spent decades with what is now China Construction Bank before his promotion while A Dong served as director of policy at the State Oceanic Administration before he was appointed mayor of Sansha in 2017.

Sansha, on the southern island province of Hainan, was established as a city in 2012 to assert Beijing's claims to the resource-rich South China Sea.

A Chinese political observer who declined to be identified said Liu seemed to be leading the political race among the trio, despite their similar rankings. The Zhejiang governorship, he said, was "more comprehensive" and had more political significance. The Communist Youth League was once seen as a cradle for China's future political stars, but has receded in significance in recent years.

"The Communist Youth League has been marginalised by Xi, as he prefers cadres with grass-roots or actual administrative track records. It is no longer the fast promotion track of [former president] Hu Jintao's days," the observer said.

"Li Yunze's NFRA is an important financial regulator but its responsibility is much narrower compared to a governor," he added.

In contrast, "taking top leading positions in Zhejiang and Fujian, where Xi has worked for decades, also carries prominent political weight", the observer noted.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at Tsinghua University's National Institute of Strategic Studies, said the Chinese ruling party was sourcing most of its next generation of leaders from three groups – government administrators, state-owned enterprise managers, and professional and technical talent pools.

"All of them are well-educated. Beijing is rotating them to different job functions, especially the security aspects, so that they are exposed to vastly different works. The competition among them is very tough," he said.

A handful of officials born in the late 1960s have also achieved ministerial rank in the past two years, most prominently Beijing mayor Yin Yong and Sichuan governor Shi Xiaolin, both born in 1969 and widely regarded as rising political stars.

Yin, who has a doctorate in engineering from Tsinghua University and a master's degree in public administration from Harvard Kennedy School, spent two decades with the State Administration of Foreign Exchange and the People's Bank of China, the country's central bank.

He was rotated out of the deputy central banker's role to become deputy mayor of Beijing in 2018.

Shi was appointed party boss of Sichuan's provincial capital Chengdu in 2021, becoming the youngest person to hold the post, after nearly three decades in Shanghai.

Shi, a Shanghai University graduate in electrical engineering, rose through the party ranks to head the city's united front work department in 2017. She was subsequently transferred to other regional roles.

Observers in China have also been tracking the careers of several other prominent post-70s senior officials to have risen to deputy ministerial-level posts in recent years.

They include Zhu Zhongming, the 1972-born newly appointed Shanghai security head. Zhu served in various positions in the Zhejiang finance department when Xi and Premier Li Qiang held leading positions in the province.

Other names in the fray are Hubei's deputy party secretary Zhuge Yujie, born in 1971, and Shi Guanghui, deputy secretary and security head of the Inner Mongolia autonomous region, born in 1970. Both previously served extensively in Shanghai.

Zhu, who spent three years as deputy finance minister from 2021 before his rotation to Shanghai, is widely regarded as a leading candidate to succeed the city's mayor Gong Zheng, who reaches the official retirement age of 65 in March.

Observers said that Yin, the Beijing mayor, was ahead of the similarly aged field in terms of party appointments.

He has been a full member of the powerful Central Committee since the 20th party congress in 2022, while Shi Xiaolin and the rest of the post-70s cohort are still alternate members of the top decision-making body

China's Xi vows to stop mass killings known as 'revenge on society crimes'

27 December 2024, AP News

The order came from the top.

China's leader Xi Jinping wants the recent spree of mass killings that shocked the country not to happen again. He ordered local governments to prevent future "extreme cases."

The attacks, where drivers mow down people on foot or knife-wielding assailants stab multiple victims, are not new in China. But the latest surge drew attention. Local officials were quick to vow to examine all sorts of personal disputes that could trigger aggression, from marital troubles to disagreements over inheritance.

However, the increasing reach into people's private lives raises concerns at a time when the Chinese state has already tightened its grip over all social and political aspects in the East Asian nation.

'Revenge on Society Crimes'

This is how people in China label these attacks.

In November alone, three took place: A man struck people at an elementary school in Hunan province, wounding 30, after suffering investment losses. A student who failed his examination stabbed and killed eight at a vocational school in the city of Yixing. The most victims, 35 people, resulted from a man mowing down a crowd in the southern city of Zhuhai, supposedly upset over his divorce.

While pinpointing the exact motive of such attacks can be difficult, there is an overwhelming feeling of being pressured within Chinese society, experts say.

"On the surface, it seems like there are individual factors, but we see there's a common link," Wu Qiang, a former political science professor, said. "This link is, in my personal opinion, every person has a feeling of injustice. They feel deeply that this society is very unfair and they can't bear it anymore."

Since 2015, Chinese police have targeted human rights lawyers and non-profit advocacy groups, jailing many, while keeping tight surveillance on others, effectively destroying the civil society that had been active from the early 2000s to 2010s.

Wu was fired from Tsinghua University after conducting fieldwork during the 2014 Occupy protests in Hong Kong. He says police officers have been regularly stationed outside his home in Beijing since last year.

Keeping a tight lid on the killings

A decade ago, media outlets could report an incident as it developed and even share a suspect's name. Nowadays, it's rarely possible. During the 24 hours before the death toll was released in the Zhuhai slaying, state censors were quick to remove any videos of the incident and eyewitness accounts shared online. In the case of the Hunan elementary school attack, authorities shared the number of the wounded only after the court sentencing, nearly a month later. A tally of violent attacks can be documented in other countries; notably, the U.S. had 38 mass killings so far this year, according to an Associated Press database. But in China, a lack of public data makes it hard to decipher mass killing trends.

A man lights a candle near flowers placed outside the Zhuhai People's Fitness Plaza, where a man deliberately rammed his car into people exercising at the sports center, killing some and injuring others in Zhuhai in southern China's Guangdong province on Tuesday, Nov. 12, 2024. (AP Photo/Ng Han Guan, File)

"From 2000 to 2010, there was a lot of discussions, including how do we help these people by making structural changes to reduce these risks, but now there's not," said Rose Luqiu, a well-known former journalist with state-owned Phoenix Television and an associate professor at Hong Kong Baptist University. Luqiu believes the government may be enforcing censorship thinking it will prevent copycats from imitating such crimes.

"Things will only become more and more strict," she predicted. For the Chinese state, "the only method to deal with it is to strengthen control."

Officials vow to ferret out hidden risks

After the Zhuhai attack, Xi called on all local governments "to strengthen prevention and control of risks at the source, strictly prevent extreme cases from occurring, and to resolve conflicts and disputes in a timely manner," according to the official Xinhua news agency.

The AP found at least a dozen local government notices, from small towns to big cities, announcing actions in response.

In eastern Anhui province, a ruling Communist Party leader inspected a middle school, a local police station, and even the warehouse of a chemical factory where he urged the workers to "ferret out any hidden risks." He said they must "thoroughly and meticulously investigate and resolve conflicts and disputes," including in families, marriages and neighborhoods.

Police and prosecutors issued similar statements.

The Ministry of Justice promised to curtail conflicts by looking into squabbles over inheritance, housing, land and unpaid wages.

However, many expressed worry over how such disputes will be detected.

"I think we're at the beginning of a vicious cycle," said Lynette Ong, a professor at the University of Toronto and author of "Outsourcing Repression:

Everyday State Power in Contemporary China.” “If you nip the conflict in its bud, you’d imagine the system then would impose a lot of pressure ... on schools, enterprises and factories.”

The new announcements reminded Ong of China’s strict policies during the COVID-19 pandemic. Neighborhood committees, the lowest rung of government, set up fences and barriers in front of buildings to control entry and exit and broke into homes in extreme cases to disinfect the apartments of people who had caught the virus.

Eventually, people protested en masse.

“If we see non-sensible measures being introduced, you’ll be met by resistance and anger and grievances from the people, and it’s going to feed into this vicious cycle where more extreme measures are going to be brought,” she said.

VOA Mandarin: Four generals' absence from Chinese ceremony sparks power struggle speculation

26 December 2024, VOA

The Central Military Commission of the Communist Party of China appointed Chen Hui as political commissar of the army and promoted him to the rank of senior general on Monday. However, former army political commissar Qin Shutong and three other senior generals were absent from the ceremony. Experts said the four might have been dismissed because of corruption issues, and that the incident might reveal power struggles within the Communist Party and the military.

Click here for the full story in Mandarin.

2 more Chinese generals fall after anti-corruption drive delivers big changes to military

26 December 2024, SCMP, Vanessa Cai

NPC Standing Committee announces Lieutenant General You Haitao and Vice-Admiral Li Pengcheng removed from China’s top legislature

Beijing has stripped two more generals in the People’s Liberation Army of their lawmaker status, as China continues a wider anti-corruption drive into the country’s military.

In a notice on Wednesday, the Standing Committee of the National People’s Congress (NPC) confirmed that Lieutenant General You Haitao, former deputy commander of China’s army, and Vice-Admiral Li Pengcheng, former naval commander of the PLA Southern Theatre Command, had been removed from the country’s top legislature.

A separate NPC statement said You and Li were suspected of “serious violation of laws and discipline” – a phrase that usually refers to corruption.

The downfall of the two generals comes amid a slew of personnel changes within the PLA, with several senior officers brought down by corruption charges. Miao Hua, a member of the powerful Central Military Commission and the director of its political work department, was placed under investigation for corruption in November.

You, 66, became the deputy commander of the army in early 2016. Previously he was deputy commander of the Nanjing Military Region and was promoted to lieutenant general in 2014.

Li, 61, previously served in roles including the deputy chief of staff of the PLA Navy’s North Sea Fleet, director of the Navy Equipment Research Institute, and chief of staff of the East Sea Fleet.

Li served as the naval commander of the Southern Theatre Command after his predecessor, Ju Xinchun, was dismissed from the NPC in December last year alongside eight other PLA generals, including a number of senior members of the PLA Rocket Force which oversees the country’s nuclear arsenal.

The recent personnel changes also include the promotion of long-time air force officer Chen Hui to the rank of general, confirming him as the new army political commissar to oversee ideology, political education and unit morale, state news agency Xinhua said on Monday.

Chen replaced Qin Shutong, 61, whose appointment as the army political commissar was made public in January 2022. Qin’s whereabouts are not known.

In September, it was announced that Deng Zhiping, a deputy commander of the army, was removed from the NPC for suspected corruption. Deng, 60, was hailed as a war hero during China’s border clashes with Vietnam in the 1970s and 80s.

Beijing also placed two of its former defence ministers, Li Shangfu and Wei Fenghe, under investigation in June.

Wei served in the role from 2018 to 2023. Li was promoted to the job in March 2023 but sacked in October the same year after vanishing from the public eye, making him the country’s shortest serving defence minister.

Both are expected to face indictments in their corruption cases.

VOA Mandarin: Chinese graduate school applications drop as youth unemployment rises

25 December 2024, VOA

Graduate school applications in China have declined for the second consecutive year, with 500,000 fewer applicants for the 2025 entrance exams compared with the previous year. Simultaneously, competition for civil service positions has intensified, signaling a societal shift away from the traditional "degree obsession."

Click here for the full story in Mandarin.

China sets dates for 'two sessions' as investors await 2025 economic growth target

25 December 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Premier Li Qiang expected to deliver work report when top legislature's meeting opens on March 5, but he will skip press conference again

China's top legislature will begin its annual parliamentary meeting on March 5 next year – a session that will be closely watched by investors as Beijing will announce its growth target and decide on ways to stimulate the country's stalled economy.

The start date of the third annual session of the 14th National People's Congress (NPC) in Beijing was announced by the NPC Standing Committee on Wednesday.

On the same day, the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), the country's top political advisory body, announced March 4 as the tentative start date for its annual session.

China typically holds these meetings, known as the "two sessions", in early March.

During the meetings, the Chinese government is expected to reveal its annual policy plans for the economy, military, trade, diplomacy, the environment and other areas for deliberation and approval.

The meeting is expected to last about a week, with President Xi Jinping and other top Communist Party leaders joining the group discussions. Xi's speeches during these deliberation sessions are usually regarded as important signs of China's priorities and direction.

Premier Li Qiang is expected to deliver an annual government work report to legislators at the NPC's opening session. It will be followed by two written reports from the National Development and Reform Commission and the Ministry of Finance outlining plans and the budget.

Although there will be several tightly scripted press conferences during the two sessions, including one by Foreign Minister Wang Yi, Li will not hold a press conference at the end of the event, following a change introduced last year.

Beijing scrapped the premier's press conference in March, saying it "often overlapped with similar events". The conference – first held in 1988, though it did not become an annual practice until 1993 – was once one of the highlights of the two sessions.

This year's two sessions will draw special attention as the world waits for Beijing to decide on its growth target and corresponding policies to achieve it as the Chinese economy faces uncertainty from Donald Trump's tariff threats, sluggish domestic consumption and a property slump.

Lynn Song, ING's chief economist for greater China, said the growth target would set the tone for government policy for the coming year.

"The growth target set will also show how serious policymakers are about shoring up growth amid what will likely be a less supportive external environment in 2025," he said.

Song added that China had rarely failed to meet its growth targets, with only two years on record when growth fell significantly short of the goal – in 1990 and 2022.

Song said he expected China to either announce a growth target of "around 5 per cent" for a third consecutive year in 2025 or "above 4.5 per cent".

"Either of these targets would set a relatively acceptable floor for growth and would send a message that the government remains confident in its ability to stabilise growth," he said.

Global investors have questioned the speed and aggressiveness of Beijing's fiscal and monetary policy easing to counter economic headwinds, and the government work report is expected to offer more clues.

Beijing has indicated its policy focus is likely to shift towards boosting domestic demand, as the odds of export demand holding up are not high. It is also likely to offer targeted support for industries affected by tariffs.

The world will also be watching for any changes to China's military spending. China raised its military budget by 7.2 per cent this year, the same as last year.

China says economists who spread 'inappropriate' views should be fired

23 December 2024, Nikkei Asia, Stella Yifan Xie

Securities watchdog says brokerages must help 'boost investor confidence'

Chinese regulators say brokerage economists must "play a positive role in interpreting government policies and boost investor confidence." © Reuters

China has issued a directive to the country's brokerage firms as it aims to change perceptions of its flagging economy: monitor speeches by top economists and fire them if necessary.

Chief economists at Chinese brokerages must "play a positive role in interpreting government policies and boost investor confidence," the industry watchdog Securities Association of China (SAC) told its members last week, according to the state-run financial newspaper Securities Times.

However, if the individuals have "repeatedly triggered reputational risk over inappropriate commentaries or behaviors" within a certain period of time or caused "major negative impacts," the company shall "severely deal with the person until termination of employment," said the notice, without elaborating on the definition of inappropriate comments.

The order marks a fresh attempt by Beijing to rekindle confidence and hasten growth by avoiding negative takes on the world's second-largest economy. But some analysts and economists are concerned that censorship would only deepen the public's frustration over the economy's sluggish performance and increase the risk of policy missteps. One Chinese economist at a bank received an internal warning in recent months, in part for making public comments on the economy, Nikkei Asia learned.

The Chinese government has long been sensitive about critiques on economic affairs, but the latest directive represents "the turning of the screw to clamp down on free and open discussion of economic issues," said George Magnus, a research associate at the University of Oxford's China Centre and a former chief economist at UBS.

"It might be that they want to make sure there is only one narrative coming out of China, which is the government's narrative," he said. "But you can't solve the issues if you can't discuss them."

Chief economists are barred from attending meetings and events or publicizing opinions without approval from the brokerages they work for, according to the guidance from SAC, which is supervised by the China Securities Regulatory Commission. Companies should not hire economists with "tarnished records," it added.

The CSRC did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The stern warning by the securities regulator came just weeks after candid speeches by two prominent Chinese economists fueled discussions on social media about the reliability of official economic indicators, including the unemployment count and overall growth rate. Access to the social media accounts of Gao Shanwen and Fu Peng were restricted after their speeches went viral.

China's post-pandemic recovery has fallen short of expectations, leading to debates about whether the country is stuck in stagnation similar to Japan's experience in the 1990s. Last year, China's official growth rate was 5.2%, the slowest pace since 1990 apart from two years when COVID-19 curbs disrupted activity.

At the annual economic work conference last year, Beijing urged officials to promote the "bright theory" of the economy, as it battled against a property market meltdown and slumping stocks. The country's top intelligence agency warned the public against those who "denigrate China's economy through false narratives." Negative commentaries and articles about the state of the economy have vanished from Chinese media.

Since September, Chinese leaders have sought to inject confidence with a broad range of stimulus measures such as cutting interest rates, lowering mortgage costs and extending cheap loans for companies to buy back shares to shore up the stock market.

Nevertheless, consumer inflation dropped to a five-month low in November. Exports slowed sharply last month while imports fell unexpectedly.

Beijing vowed to boost domestic demand and ramp up fiscal spending by issuing more debt next year at a key political gathering this month, as it braces for shocks from a second U.S. presidency under Donald Trump, who has threatened to hike tariffs on Chinese goods.

Officials continue to strike a positive tone.

Han Wenxiu, deputy director of the Central Committee for Financial and Economic Affairs, said earlier this month that China's economy is expected to grow by around 5% in 2024, a target that many economists believe to be tough to hit without bolder stimulus.

China's security ministry says foreign spies are slandering revolutionary heroes online

23 December 2024, SCMP, Yuanyue Dang

Overseas intelligence agencies are 'flooding online comment sections with unofficial and fake history', ministry says

China's leading anti-spy agency has blamed foreign agents for comments on social media that it says distort history and "slander" revolutionary heroes.

"There are foreign spy agencies flooding online comment sections with unofficial and fake history about our country's historical heroes, trying to discredit and slander our historical culture and heroic role models, and dispel people's admiration for heroes and their identification with our historical culture," the Ministry of State Security said in a social media post on Monday.

The post on the ministry's official WeChat account warned that "some foreign spy agencies" were "stealing state secrets, disrupting online order and posing a threat to national security".

Foreign spies pretended to be interested in politics, military matters, economics or science and technology and tried to steal information by interacting with social media users, the ministry said. It said officers had discovered that spies were using "manual screening or algorithmic capture" to entice people to post sensitive information such as the "parameters, serial numbers and developers of our research equipment" in the comments under a video about a "certain Chinese technology project".

The spies also recruited trolls or used bots to "recklessly fabricate and spread false statements that discredit our government and policies", the ministry added.

The ministry has become increasingly active on social media with warnings about the risk posed by foreigners.

It said foreign spies "maliciously [post] sensitive topics" on Chinese social media and "flood the screen with provocative and reactionary comments, inflaming public sentiment, and try to provoke disputes and create chaos".

The post did not say which countries were responsible for doing this or what social media platforms they were targeting.

The ministry warned government employees in sensitive positions not to post classified information online or reveal their jobs "to avoid being exploited by people with ulterior motives".

It also asked social media users to report any "reactionary, sensitive or other negative information that endangers our national security" and avoid posting "rumours or slanderous comments that discredit our country's history, revolutionary process, development and construction".

China has a strict law protecting the Communist Party's heroes and martyrs.

Some have questioned whether heroic stories about these people have been embellished for propaganda purposes, but Beijing calls discussion or research that challenges its official version of history "historical nihilism".

Journalist Luo Changping was jailed for seven months in 2021 for "insulting" soldiers who died in the Korean war.

The Chinese authorities have been increasingly vocal about national security and changed the law last year to broaden the definition of espionage.

The ministry opened a WeChat account in August last year and has since used the social media platform to warn that public foreign spy agencies are targeting Chinese citizens and companies.

Xi Jinping's anti-corruption campaign nets record number of 'tigers' in 2024

22 December 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Fifty-six high-ranking officials placed under investigation this year as graft-buster targets central agencies

Chinese leader Xi Jinping's war on corruption has ensnared a record number of high-ranking officials this year, with 56 senior cadres at vice-ministerial level or above being investigated, a tally by the South China Morning Post has found.

That marks a jump of nearly 25 per cent from 2023, when 45 high-ranking officials were subject to graft probes by anti-corruption agency the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, or CCDI.

According to the Post's analysis, corruption cases involving top party organs and ministries have doubled, while there was also an increase in cases within the aviation and defence industries.

But in 2024 there were fewer corruption cases in the finance sector – a key focus of the campaign last year.

Deng Yuwen, former deputy editor of the Study Times newspaper published by the Central Party

School, said more officials were getting caught up in the campaign.

"The anti-corruption net has been cast wider while the mesh is getting smaller – so more are getting caught and fewer can slip through," he said.

All of this year's ensnared "tigers" – as the CCDI calls disgraced top-level officials – were from a pool of "centrally managed cadres", meaning they were at the vice-ministerial level and above. While some were ranked slightly lower, they held key positions in critical sectors.

Taking the count to 56 on Monday was Wu Cunrong, the 61-year-old head of the provincial political advisory body in Shanxi. The CCDI said Wu had been placed under investigation and was "suspected of serious violations of discipline and law" – a euphemism for corruption. Wu was the party boss of Hefei, capital of Anhui province, in 2011 and became deputy party boss of Chongqing a decade later.

Twelve of the 56 officials detained this year held positions in central Communist Party and state agencies – double the number in 2023, suggesting more of a focus on the top party apparatus and ministries.

Some of the more prominent officials placed under investigation include former justice minister Tang Yijun, agriculture minister Tang Renjian and national sports chief Gou Zhongwen.

In addition to corruption allegations, the three men are also accused of failing to implement the instructions of party leaders and political disloyalty. They are awaiting trial after being kicked out of the party and removed from their public positions.

Deng, who is now an independent political analyst based in the US, said the focus on high-ranking officials from central agencies was consistent with Xi's instruction to the CCDI during the 2022 party congress. He said Xi had called on inspectors to "intensify efforts to uproot corruption in sectors with a high concentration of power, funds and resources". "The central agencies are at the top echelon of China's political power structure," Deng said. "The top officials are surrounded by local governments lobbying for projects, funding or subsidies, or businesspeople wanting approvals or licences."

One example is the corruption allegations against Xu Ying, who was deputy director of the State Tobacco Monopoly Administration – the powerful agency that controls China's US$30 billion tobacco market and has sole decision-making power over the lucrative production and distribution chain. Xu was sacked and expelled from the party, and is also awaiting trial.

There was also an increase in the number of cases at non-financial state-owned enterprises in 2024, with six SOE bosses under investigation compared to three last year. Among them is Tan Ruisong, former chairman of the Aviation Industry Corporation of China.

Dozens of top and former aviation and defence industry executives have also been placed under investigation in the past year, including Zhu Zhisong, head of Shanghai's free-trade zone. Zhu was previously in charge of Shanghai's aerospace bureau, which serves as a research and development base for rockets and missiles. It followed a corruption investigation into his former deputy at the bureau, Dai Shoulun.

Three senior aerospace and defence executives were also expelled from the nation's top political advisory body in December last year.

Xi's sweeping anti-corruption campaign – which has been under way since late 2012 – has also had the military in its sights, a crackdown carried out by the People's Liberation Army's anti-graft watchdog. Officials from the PLA Rocket Force that oversees the nuclear arsenal have been a focus since last year.

In the most recent case, Central Military Commission ideology chief Miao Hua was suspended last month and is being investigated for "serious violations of discipline". In June, Beijing announced that former defence minister Li Shangfu and his predecessor Wei Fenghe were being investigated for corruption, and that they had been expelled from the party and stripped of their military ranks.

Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said Xi was purging both the buyers and sellers in China's defence industry.

"His military disciplinary inspectors have taken down several top generals, while the CCDI, which oversees the civilian officials, crack down on defence SOEs," Wu said. "This is the most intensive year for the military crackdown – and there's no end in sight."

Deng said SOEs were also in the crosshairs because of their role in Beijing's push for technological self-reliance and in strategic projects, and also because they are major employers at a time when the economy is struggling.

Four senior state bankers were placed under investigation for corruption this year, compared to eight in 2023. But none of this year's banking "tigers" are at the top level. Last year the finance world was shocked by the downfalls of former China Everbright Bank presidents Li Xiaopeng and Tang Shuangning, and former Bank of China president Liu Liange.

This year also saw several rising young political stars caught up in graft probes – Yang Fasen, who was the Qinghai province security chief, Beijing's deputy mayor Gao Peng, and Tibet's deputy government head Wang Yong.

Wang Huning urges efforts to forge sense of community for Chinese nation

19 December 2024, CPPCC

Wang Huning, chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, on Wednesday urged efforts to forge a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation and to grasp the importance of taking the correct and distinctively Chinese approach to handling ethnic affairs.

Wang, also a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee, made the remarks at a meeting on the work on ethnic affairs.

Wang stressed the need to highlight the prominent features of the Chinese civilization and consolidate the sense of identity with the motherland, the Chinese nation, Chinese culture, the CPC and Chinese socialism among all ethnic groups.

He also called for measures to accelerate modernization in areas with large ethnic minority populations, promote exchanges between different ethnic groups, and improve laws, regulations and policies concerning ethnic affairs.

Chinese Premier Li Qiang pledges to crack down on unfair targeting of private firms

18 December 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Companies have complained of being unjustly targeted by law enforcement to raise funds for cash-strapped local governments

Chinese Premier Li Qiang has warned local governments not to target private companies with unfair fines and promised further measures to improve the business environment next year.

The pledge – made at a meeting of the State Council, China's cabinet, on Monday – follows accusations that some local authorities have been trying to raise extra funds by targeting private firms outside their jurisdictions.

This year Beijing has announced a series of measures to improve the business environment as part of its efforts to boost the faltering economy.

This includes a drive by the country's top prosecuting authority to strengthen legal protections for private enterprises.

According to state news agency Xinhua, Li said that the abuse of administrative punishments and unfair law enforcement are still problems in some parts of the country and in certain sectors.

He told the meeting it is important for the government to start with the issues that are of "grave concern to the public and businesses" and standardise the exercise of power across the nation.

A special campaign will be launched in 2025 to regulate business-related law enforcement with the aim of improving the business environment and boosting market confidence, Li said.

He pledged that the government's enforcement of administrative law will be fully transparent and on the record and will include a review process for major decisions.

He also vowed to keep the channels for appeals open and said "soft measures" could be taken to tackle minor offences.

He also vowed to strengthen the supervision of law enforcement, pay attention to local governments that allow the "abnormal growth of fines and confiscations" and ensure frequent out-of-jurisdiction law enforcement and consistent maximum penalties.

He said the authorities should respond to the problem of unreasonable fines and punishments by reviewing and standardising penalties to ensure they are proportionate and consistent.

In recent years, Chinese entrepreneurs have complained of being targeted by law enforcement to milk them for cash, often using trumped up criminal charges or preying on firms outside their jurisdiction.

While this process is officially known as "profit-driven law enforcement", Chinese entrepreneurs have described it as "distant fishing", likening the police to fishermen who venture far out to sea for their catch.

The problem is compounded by the mounting debts and falling revenues many local governments are facing, something that also increases the pressure to find alternative sources of funding.

In November, a report by prosecutors in the eastern province of Zhejiang outlining how police could abuse their powers to target private businesses went viral online.

The report gave details of a case where two police officers from an unnamed province had been extorting money from entrepreneurs in Zhejiang and Jiangsu provinces. The officers were eventually jailed for abuse of power.

In October, Zheng Shanjie, the head of the National Development and Reform Commission, the country's top economic planning body, said there would be a crackdown on unauthorised and "profit-driven enforcement" measures, as well as arbitrary fines, inspections and business closures.

China's anticorruption crackdown is impeding its military buildup plans, Pentagon says

18 December 2024, CNN, Haley Britzky

A widespread anticorruption campaign within the senior levels of the Chinese military and government is impeding its push to build up its military by 2027, the Pentagon says in a new report released on Wednesday.

"In the second half of 2023 alone, at least 15 high ranking military officials and defense industry executives were removed from their posts for corruption ... This wave of corruption related investigations and the removal of senior leaders may have disrupted the [People's Liberation Army's] progress toward its 2027 goals," a senior defense official told reporters this week in a briefing on the China Military Power report, which is delivered to Congress annually and outlines China's military and security developments.

The official added that it is "having some impact already" and will "inevitably" come up again as the Pentagon continues to track the campaign's impact on development and acquisition of military capabilities, as well as major construction projects and personnel.

The report also says that China is "almost certainly" learning from Russia's war in Ukraine and applying those lessons to its approach to Taiwan. Specifically, the senior defense official said China is looking to "advance their objectives" in the information space and has seen the sanctions against Russia as a sign China needs to be more self-reliant to be able to withstand additional penalties.

The report also said China has an estimated 600 operational nuclear warheads, up roughly 100 since last year's report was released. It says that they will have more than 1,000 operational nuclear warheads by 2030, and while the senior defense official said it was in line with their previous assessments, they added that they certainly expect China will "continue expanding and modernizing their force" beyond 2030.

China's leader Xi Jinping has laid out an ambitious plan to "modernize" the PLA by 2035 and transform it into a "world class" military by mid-century. American officials believe Xi has instructed the PLA to be ready to invade the self-governing island of Taiwan by 2027, though they have stressed that doesn't mean an invasion will occur in 2027.

Amid the push, though, Xi is increasingly turning against members of his own government and struggling with disloyalty in the ranks, CNN has reported. Indeed, the Pentagon's report pinpoints numerous recent incidents of senior officials within the military, government, and defense industry, being fired or investigated.

In November, for example, a top military official viewed as a close protégé of Xi was suspended and placed under investigation for corruption. The senior official also said that while more senior people within China's military get the most attention, personnel are purged "at all levels."

Wednesday's report says that political leaders in China "probably view" the campaign against corruption "as a necessary tool to build a professional fighting force as part of the PLA's 2027 modernization goals."

But that "frequent turnover and replacement of high-level personnel" specifically is what is impacting the PLA's 2027 goal, the senior defense official said. For example, on a major construction project or within their defense industry, the official said, turnover at that scale could slow down projects.

Experts say corruption within the defense industry in particular is relatively unsurprising given the relentless focus China has had on increase its procurement of weapons systems and warships. Victor Shih, a political science professor at the University of San Diego, previously told CNN that the push to modernize the PLA Navy alone provides plenty of opportunities for corruption.

"[O]nce they uncover corruption in one place or involving one senior official, there's sort of a bit of a spiraling kind of effect where it inevitably seems to draw in additional officials," the senior official said. They added it was unlikely Xi would abandon the anticorruption campaign, as he has made it a "hallmark of his tenure."

"I think they've identified it as something that really has posed great risks to the political reliability and ultimately the operational capability of the PLA," the official said, "so I would certainly expect them to continue to pursue the anticorruption campaign."

China's top political advisor again calls for community-for-Chinese-nation drive among ethnic minorities

18 December 2024, Tibetan Review

In yet another reported meeting on work on ethnic affairs by a Sinicization-obsessed party-state of the People's Republic of China (PRC), top leader Wang Huning has on Dec 18 urged efforts to forge a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation and to grasp the importance of taking the correct and distinctively Chinese approach to handling ethnic affairs.

Chinese leaders employ cryptic euphemisms in their policy documents and official remarks whose actual implementations are all about forced assimilation of the ethnic minorities and the destruction of their cultural identity under the ongoing Sinicization drive for Han-homogenizing the PRC.

Wang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, made the remarks at a meeting on the work on ethnic affairs, reported China's official chinadaily.com.cn Dec 18.

The report did not give any details about that meeting, such as who all took part in it, what its agenda was, and its decisions.

The report said Wang stressed the need to highlight the prominent features of the Chinese civilization and consolidate the sense of identity with the motherland, the Chinese nation, Chinese culture, the CPC and Chinese socialism among all ethnic groups.

He was stated to have also called for measures to accelerate modernization in areas with large ethnic minority populations, promote exchanges between different ethnic groups, and improve laws, regulations and policies concerning ethnic affairs.

The EU Expresses Concern About Deteriorating Situation in Tibet

13 December 2024, CTA

On 10 December, 2024, the European Union (EU) delegation in China issued a statement marking International Human Rights Day, reaffirming the EU's commitment to the protection of human rights globally. The statement highlighted ongoing concerns about human rights abuses in China, with particular reference to Tibet and expressed the EU's serious concerns about the deterioration of civil, cultural, and political freedoms.

The EU highlighted the severe restrictions placed on freedom of speech, expression, movement and assembly in Tibetan areas where Tibetans continue to face tight controls on their ability to express dissent. The statement also noted the ongoing limitations on international travel for Tibetans, with restrictions on obtaining passports and stringent controls on the movement of Tibetan religious leaders, such as Lamas.

The EU expressed concerns over the repression of religious freedoms, including the monitoring and restriction of religious practices. Tibetan Buddhism remains under increasing state control, with religious practices being aligned with the ideology of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

The statement also flagged the establishment of mandatory boarding schools for Tibetan children, where children are forcefully separated from their families, as a significant concern for the preservation of Tibetan cultural and linguistic identity.

The EU delegation raised alarms about efforts to suppress Tibetan language and culture, citing the closure of schools that teach in Tibetan, such as the Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational School in Golog. Such closures, along with the promotion of Mandarin-language education, risk leading to cultural erasure.

The EU reiterated its call for the immediate and unconditional release of 6 Tibetan political prisoners (Chadrel Rinpoche, Anya Sangdra, Go Sherab Gytaso, Golog Palden, Semkyi Dolma and Tashi Dorje) arbitrarily detained for exercising their fundamental rights. It emphasised the importance of fair trials, the abolition of practices like "Residential Surveillance at a Designated Location" (RSDL), and an end to torture and ill-treatment. The EU's concerns regarding arbitrary detention extend to Tibetan political prisoners, particularly those arrested for peaceful advocacy of Tibetan rights and independence.

The EU delegation reaffirmed the importance of international engagement with Tibet, encouraging more visits from the international community and civil society organisations to monitor the situation and promote dialogue. A side visit to Tibet took place in June 2024 as part of the 39th EU-China Human Rights Dialogue, demonstrating the EU's ongoing interest in raising human rights concerns in the region.

In conclusion, the EU's statement on International Human Rights Day 2024 underscores its ongoing concern about the human rights situation in Tibet. The delegation called on China to respect and protect the rights of Tibetans, emphasising the importance of cultural preservation, religious freedom, and the right to self-expression. The EU also urged China to engage more constructively with international human rights mechanisms and to create an environment where Tibetans can freely practice their religion and maintain their cultural identity.

The full statement is available here.

The CPC Central Committee approved the expulsion of Wu Yingjie from the party due to improper family traditions

11 December 2024, Kzaobao, Lianhe Zaobao

The website of the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection and the National Supervisory Commission reported on December 10 that with the approval of the CPC Central Committee, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection and the National Supervisory Commission have initiated an investigation into the serious violations of discipline and law by Wu Yingjie, former member of the Standing Committee of the 14th National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference and former director of the Culture, History, and Learning Committee.

Upon investigation, it was found that Wu Yingjie had lost his ideals, beliefs and principles of Party spirit, deviated from his original aspiration and mission, failed to implement the Party Central Committee's Tibet governance strategy in the new era, intervened in engineering projects on a large scale, sought profit for personal gain, seriously affected Tibet's high-quality development, failed to fulfill his main responsibility of comprehensively and strictly governing the Party, contributed to the growth of corruption, and damaged the political ecology; he violated the spirit of the Central Committee's eight regulations and accepted banquets in violation of regulations; he had a weak sense of organization and did not truthfully explain the problems during organizational interviews and inquiries; he lost his integrity and accepted gifts and cash, and used his power to seek special treatment for his relatives; he interfered with discipline and law enforcement in violation of regulations; he had a bad family style and failed to supervise and educate his family members; he used public power as a tool to seek personal gain, used his position to seek profits for others in engineering contracting and other aspects, and illegally accepted huge amounts of property.

Wu Yingjie seriously violated the party's political discipline, organizational discipline, discipline on integrity, work discipline and discipline in life, constituted a serious duty violation and was suspected of bribery, and did not stop after the 18th CPC National Congress. The nature of his violations is serious and the impact is bad, and he should be dealt with seriously. In accordance with the relevant provisions of the "Regulations on Disciplinary Actions of the Communist Party of China", "Supervision Law of the People's Republic of China", "Administrative Punishment Law of the People's Republic of China for Public Officials", etc., after the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection Standing Committee meeting studied and reported to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China for approval, it was decided to expel Wu Yingjie from the party; the National Supervision Commission shall expel him from public office; confiscate his illegal gains; and transfer his suspected criminal issues to the procuratorate for examination and prosecution in accordance with the law, and transfer the relevant property together.

On June 16 this year, it was reported that Wu Yingjie was under investigation.

According to his public resume, Wu Yingjie, male, Han nationality, was born in December 1956 in Changyi, Shandong Province. He joined the Communist Party of China in May 1987 and started working in October 1974. He has a postgraduate degree from the Central Party School.

He has worked in Tibet for a long time, and has served as: deputy secretary and director of the Party Leadership Group of the Tibet Autonomous Region Education Department, vice chairman of the Tibet Autonomous Region Government, member of the Standing Committee of the Tibet Autonomous Region Party Committee and Minister of the Propaganda Department, member of the Standing Committee of the Tibet Autonomous Region Party Committee, deputy secretary of the Party Leadership Group of the Regional Government and executive vice chairman, executive vice secretary of the Tibet Autonomous Region Party Committee, and secretary of the Tibet Autonomous Region Party Committee.

In October 2021, he was appointed as the Vice Chairman of the Education, Science, Culture and Health Committee of the 13th National People's Congress; in March 2023, he was appointed as the Director of the Culture, History, and Learning Committee of the 14th National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference.

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Mao Ning's Regular Press Conference on December 11, 2024

11 December 2024, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

At the invitation of Member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and Minister of Foreign Affairs Wang Yi, Egyptian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Immigration and Expatriates Badr Abdel Aaty will visit China and co-chair the China-Egypt foreign ministers' strategic dialogue from December 12 to 13.

TASS: According to media reports, Deputy Chairman of the Security Council of the Russian Federation Dmitry Medvedev began his visit to China today. Could the Foreign Ministry provide more information on that? Does China have any expectations for this visit?

Mao Ning: Chairman of the United Russia party Dmitry Medvedev's visit is an important event of high-level exchange between China and Russia. The Chinese side will release timely information about the visit. Please stay tuned.

Beijing Daily: The US-based Center for Strategic and International Studies recently issued a report entitled "China's Intelligence Footprint in Cuba: New Evidence and Implications for US Security," saying that there are four sites within Cuba that are most likely to be supporting China's efforts to collect intelligence on the United States and its neighbors and suggesting that the United States and its regional partners should carefully monitor China's growing role in Cuba. What's China's comment?

Mao Ning: I noted what you mentioned. As Cuban Deputy Foreign Minister Carlos Fernández de Cossío said, the US think tank's accusations of so-called Chinese military bases in Cuba are just tales that do not exist and no one has seen.

Let me stress again that China's cooperation with Cuba is done aboveboard, and does not target any third party. We certainly would not accept any deliberate vilification and smear from any third party. It is widely known that US intelligence agencies have an egregious record in Latin America and the Caribbean. The US unlawfully occupied Guantanamo Bay as its military base and imposed blockade and sanctions against Cuba for over six decades, which has been catastrophic for the Cuban people.

China once again urges the US to follow the just call of the international community, lift the blockade and sanctions on Cuba as soon as possible, remove Cuba from the list of "state sponsors of terrorism," and stop creating barriers that hinder Cuba's socioeconomic development.

AFP: A senior security official in Taiwan told AFP today that apparent military drills conducted by China this week around the island are aimed at drawing a red line ahead of the incoming US presidential administration of Donald Trump. Can the Foreign Ministry confirm today these Chinese military drills and does it have any comment?

Mao Ning: I would refer you to the competent Chinese authorities for your specific question. Let me say that the Taiwan question is the first red line that cannot be crossed in China-US relations and this has always been our position. Upholding the one-China principle is the key to ensuring peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait. China will firmly safeguard national sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Hubei Media Group: In a statement issued on December 10 local time, Canada's Minister of Foreign Affairs Mélanie Joly announced sanctions against some Chinese personnel for alleged human rights violations. Do you have any comment on this?

Mao Ning: Without any factual basis, the Canadian government made false allegations against China in the name of human rights and imposed illicit sanctions on Chinese personnel. This is gross interference in China's internal affairs and a serious violation of international law and the basic norms governing international relations. China firmly opposes and strongly condemns this.

The Chinese government follows a people-centered development philosophy and attaches absolute importance to respecting and protecting human rights. China has achieved enormous progress in human rights and made important contribution to the world's human rights cause. This is a simple fact that no one without bias can deny.

Canada faces its own list of human rights issues. Its own human rights record has not been spotless. Even today, Canada's indigenous people still face systemic racial discrimination and unfair treatment. Instead of dealing with it, Canada chooses to smear and vilify other countries and spread lies about China's alleged human rights issues. This is a typical move of "thief-crying-stop-thief" and can hardly convince the world. Facts have laid bare Canada's double standards and hypocrisy. Canada is in no position to lecture others on human rights and point fingers at others' human rights situation, nor do they have any right to act as a judge and arbitrarily impose sanctions.

China strongly urges Canada to reflect on itself, stop interfering in China's internal affairs, stop undermining China's interests and image under the pretext of human rights, stop its poor political stunt and immediately lift its unlawful sanctions against relevant Chinese personnel. We will take all measures necessary to firmly defend our sovereignty, security and development interests.

News 1 Korea: ROK media reported that the new Chinese ambassador to the ROK will travel to the ROK this month to assume office. What's China's comment and expectation?

Mao Ning: You may follow our ministry's website for any update on the new Chinese ambassador to the ROK. On China-ROK relations, our position is consistent. We stand ready to work with the ROK to advance China-ROK relations.

Reuters: China has approved no loans to Cambodia this year, despite being historically its top creditor country. This is according to data from Cambodia's finance ministry. Is there a particular reason for this?

Mao Ning: I would refer you to the competent Chinese authorities for your specific question. Let me say that China and Cambodia are iron-clad friends. We will continue to strengthen cooperation with Cambodia in various fields and support Cambodia in pursuing development and improving people's livelihood.

AFP: The United States said yesterday that it is offering a US$10 million reward for information leading to the arrest of a Chinese man and co-conspirators who are wanted for hacking computer fire walls in order to commit fraud. This was in April of 2020 and the US Treasury said it had imposed sanctions on the man's company. Does the Foreign Ministry have any comment on this case?

Mao Ning: China has always opposed and fought all types of cyberattacks in accordance with the law. We firmly reject using unilateral sanctions and long-arm jurisdiction against Chinese entities and individuals. We urge the US to stop using cybersecurity issues to smear and vilify China, and stop imposing illicit unilateral sanctions. China will do what is necessary to protect the legitimate and lawful rights and interests of Chinese companies and citizens.

CCTV: On December 10, the US Commerce Department added two Chinese high-tech companies to the "Entity List" for "human rights violations." What is China's comment on this?

Mao Ning: The so-called sanctions you mentioned are a blatant suppression of Chinese high-tech companies in the name of human rights. The move further reveals the US's true intention of depriving the Chinese people's right to development. Protecting human rights is just a pretext they use to advance that objective. Such schemes will not succeed. If the US truly cares about human rights, it should take care of its own human rights deficit first, rather than politicizing and weaponizing human rights issues to meddle in other countries' internal affairs and harm other countries' interests.

China's record 'worsening' on Human Rights Day, activists say

10 December 2024, RFA

There is less and less room to criticize the government, follow a religion or receive justice in a court of law.

Chinese rights lawyer Jiang Tianyong appears in People's Court, August 22, 2017, in Changsha, China. (Changsha Intermediate People's Court via AFP)

The right to criticize the government, follow a religion and to get a meaningful defense in court are all deteriorating in China, activists told Radio Free Asia on Tuesday, Human Rights Day.

Over the past year in China, 45 pro-democracy activists and former lawmakers in Hong Kong were jailed for "subversion" after organizing a democratic primary, prominent dissident Xu Zhiyong held a hunger strike to protest his treatment in prison and a journalist was jailed for having lunch with a Japanese diplomat.

The ruling Communist Party has stepped up its suppression of public speech, organized religion and personal freedoms, while continuing to persecute anyone agitating for change, rights activists told RFA Mandarin in recent interviews.

On this day in 1948, the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which proclaimed the inherent, inalienable rights of every person "without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, religion, sex, language, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status."

Some of that language is echoed in China's Constitution.

Article 34 guarantees citizens "the right to vote and stand for election," while Article 35 guarantees

"freedom of speech, the press, assembly, association, procession and demonstration."

Article 36 promises them freedom of religious belief. But activists say there is less and less protection for anything resembling those rights in China today.

"Right now, we don't feel that human rights have improved," Shandong-based rights activist Lu Xiumei told RFA Mandarin. "Controls have become more severe, and there are more rules and regulations."

1,700 prisoners of conscience

According to the China Political Prisoner Concern Database, there are more than 1,700 known prisoners of conscience behind bars.

While many once believed that the internet would be impossible for the authorities to control, eventually leading to greater freedom of speech in China, the government has spent the last 30 years perfecting its control of online spaces.

"On social media platforms like WeChat and TikTok, it is almost impossible to post comments that have a negative impact on the government," Jiangsu-based rights activist Lu Jianrong told RFA Mandarin. "You can only praise the government."

Police have targeted young people who dress up for Halloween, particularly if their costumes had a satirical twist, while online censors have been going after social media accounts that use "unauthorized" language, including puns and homophones, to get around censorship.

Meanwhile, life is getting harder for women and for the LGBTQ+ community.

The party is also cracking down on its own officials if they're found in possession of banned books, and taking direct control over the running of the country's universities.

And it's training up the next generation of religious leaders under President Xi Jinping's "sinicization" of religion policy, to ensure that they put loyalty to the government ahead of the requirements of their faith.

A Protestant pastor from the central province of Henan who gave only the surname Li for fear of reprisals told Radio Free Asia: "There is almost no religious freedom; they don't want to give believers any room to breathe at all."

"A lot of churches have been banned, and are still being banned," he said.

No criticism allowed

Even pursuing complaints against the government using its own official channels can get a person in hot water.

"Take Xu Weibao for example, a petitioner from Taizhou," Lu Jianrong said. "He has been persecuted to the point that he can no longer survive in his hometown, and has had to move somewhere else."

Many who complain about official wrongdoing are targeted for harassment, extrajudicial detention and even physical violence, or locked up in a psychiatric institution for “mental illness.”

“There’s another petitioner from Taixing who was held in a psychiatric hospital for three years,” Lu said. “He’s still under surveillance, and has no freedom at all.”

A human rights lawyer who asked to remain anonymous for fear of reprisals said that prior to the 2015 crackdown on public interest law firms and rights lawyers, the profession wasn’t generally regarded as a threat to the ruling party.

Now, they’re seen as a natural enemy of the Chinese Communist Party, he said.

“Many have had their licenses revoked, and some have also been sent to prison,” he said.

Heavier sentences

Lawyer Li Fangping, who represented the jailed Uyghur scholar Ilham Tohti said rights protections are getting weaker across the board in China.

“There’s a serious regression,” Li said. “We are seeing cases getting much heavier sentences now, especially for people who try to speak out, which is getting harder and harder.”

He said there has been scant information about the status of Ilham Tohti in prison.

Foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning hit out on Tuesday at criticisms of China’s human rights record, saying the government had massively advanced its citizens’ social and economic rights.

“Some countries have used human rights as a weapon to serve their political agenda,” Mao told a regular news briefing in Beijing.

“We also hope that certain countries will discard megaphone diplomacy and stop interfering in other countries’ internal affairs under the pretext of so-called human rights issues,” she said.

Also in Beijing, independent journalist Gao Yu said local police had once more taken steps to stop her from speaking out on Dec. 10.

“The police came to my house on Human Rights Day,” Gao said in a post to her X account, adding that she had used the day to commemorate late Nobel peace laureate and dissident Liu Xiaobo, whose subversion trial was held on Dec. 10, 2009.

Liu, who co-authored the Charter 08 manifesto calling for sweeping political change, died of liver cancer in prison in 2017 despite multiple applications for medical parole.

“I climbed up a ladder and tied a yellow ribbon to the window railing in front of them,” Gao wrote, adding that the local state security police were once more keeping watch outside her apartment building in a vehicle now very familiar both to Gao and her neighbors.

“Today is the 74th Human Rights Day, and the seven-seater Buick is here again,” she wrote.

Xi Jinping calls for wider use of Mandarin in China’s border areas amid security push

10 December 2024, SCMP, Vanessa Cai

Leader tells Politburo study session that the unity of all ethnic groups ‘like pomegranate seeds tightly held together’ should be promoted

President Xi Jinping has called for national security and social stability to be upheld in China’s border regions and for Mandarin to be spoken more broadly in those areas, according to state media.

Addressing a Politburo study session on Monday, Xi said maintaining security and stability was the “baseline requirement” for border governance, state news agency Xinhua reported on Tuesday.

The Chinese leader said efforts should be made to improve social governance, infrastructure and “the overall ability to defend the country and safeguard the border”.

He told members of the ruling party’s top policymaking body that it was necessary to guide all ethnic groups in border regions to “continuously enhance their recognition of the Chinese nation, Chinese culture and the Communist Party”.

He also said use of the common Chinese language, Mandarin, and nationally unified textbooks should be promoted.

“We should continue to deepen efforts on ethnic unity and progress, actively build an integrated social structure and community environment, and promote the unity of all ethnic groups – like pomegranate seeds tightly held together,” he said.

Xi renewed those calls as the 24-member Politburo held a group study session on the history of Chinese border governance.

The Politburo regularly holds such sessions, with discussion usually led by an academic – Monday’s session was led by Li Guoqiang, vice-president of the Chinese Academy of History.

China’s borderlands stretch across five provinces – Yunnan in the southwest, Gansu in the northwest, and Jilin, Liaoning and Heilongjiang in the northeast – as well as four autonomous regions – Tibet and Xinjiang Uygur in the west, Inner Mongolia in the north and Guangxi Zhuang in the south.

Ethnic tensions in those autonomous regions, especially Xinjiang and Tibet, have historically been a challenge for Beijing.

In August, authorities in Xinjiang vowed to make stability and security their top priority and to turn the far western region into a “strategic barrier” against geopolitical risks. Xinjiang shares borders with countries including Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan. China has been accused of human rights abuses against Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang – claims Beijing has denied.

In recent years, authorities have also stepped up efforts to promote Mandarin-language education as part of a nationwide drive to assimilate people from ethnic minorities into the majority Han culture.

However, such calls have been controversial. In 2020, efforts to promote the use of Mandarin rather than Mongolian in schools in Inner Mongolia prompted large-scale street protests over fears that the native language would be wiped out.

On Monday, Xi said modernising the border governance system and governance capacity was essential.

"The development of border areas must be incorporated into the overall strategy of Chinese-style modernisation, regional coordinated development strategies, and major regional strategies," he said, according to the Xinhua report.

The Chinese leader also called for efforts to support border areas to leverage their resources and advantages to achieve development.

He said it was important to improve the standard of living in the border regions and to speed up development of infrastructure and basic public services.

Xi also called for more multidisciplinary research on border history and governance and for accelerated efforts to establish a Chinese "knowledge system" on border studies.

China's villages put to Communist Party loyalty test in national anti-corruption campaign

08 December 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

About 77,000 village officials were reprimanded in first three quarters of this year

Tens of thousands of anti-corruption inspectors have fanned out across China to carry out the first national check on the party loyalty of cadres in the country's half a million villages.

The announcement of the campaign came a month after the Communist Party's graft watchdog, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), said 77,000 village party bosses faced disciplinary action in the first three quarters of this year, a year-on-year increase of nearly 70 per cent.

The village is the lowest level in China's administrative hierarchy and was added to the inspection remit of county and municipal party committees for the first time in regulations introduced in February.

In an editorial published on November 25, the China Discipline Inspection and Supervision News, the CCDI's official newspaper, said the inspection of the village-level governments was key to resolving grass-roots issues and reinforcing governance at this level.

It said it would be "a strong guarantee" for consolidating President Xi Jinping's poverty alleviation campaign and rural revitalisation plans.

At an inspection planning meeting a few days earlier,, CCDI chief and Politburo member Li Xi said the investigations were necessary to rectify "misconduct and corruption that occur on people's doorsteps" and to win more public support for the party.

The top priority, Li said, was to check on the cadres' "political loyalty" to the party, to ensure they implemented the leadership's decisions and policies, and to find solutions to urgent problems, according to state news agency Xinhua.

Inspectors found over 50 per cent more corruption, abuses of power, and dereliction of duty problems in the villages this year, compared with 2023.

Village official, Hainan province

A village official in Hainan province, who declined to be named, said the inspectors coming to his area were led by provincial officials who have never served in the county or municipality – part of a strategy to prevent collusion.

"China's cities and counties are largely 'acquaintance societies', where people all know each other, or are connected to each other in some way. So inspectors from higher up or other jurisdictions can uncover problems better," the official said.

He said that under the new approach, the inspectors had found over 50 per cent more corruption, abuses of power, and dereliction of duty problems in the villages this year, compared with 2023.

An official in Hunan province said similar arrangements were in place there but the teams would focus on "the most notorious villages".

"There are neighbouring villages that organised thousands of people in massive fights over minor disputes in the 1990s. Some villages were known for their participation in telecom scams. We will ensure the teams led by provincial inspectors pay special attention to them," the Hunan official said.

Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said corruption in villages in more developed provinces was mainly linked to land acquisition and development.

In poorer areas, corrupt village chiefs were more likely to be involved in embezzlement or misappropriation of poverty alleviation funds and other government subsidies.

Beijing spent nearly 1.6 trillion yuan (US$221 billion) on its poverty alleviation campaign from 2013 to 2021, while the agricultural ministry has pledged up to 7 trillion yuan to finance rural revitalisation projects.

"Many of the villages' party chiefs have monopolised decision-making power. There have been inadequate checks and balances," Wu added.

China's security chief urges all-out efforts to ensure safe New Year and Spring Festival

08 December 2024, SCMP, Sylvia Ma

Call from Chen Wenqing comes as China doubles down on social stability and judicial fairness after string of public attacks

China's top security official Chen Wenqing has called for all-out efforts to ensure social security and stability during the coming New Year and Spring Festival holidays.

Spring Festival or Lunar New Year, is China's biggest annual celebration and falls on January 29 this time.

Chen issued the call for stronger security measures at key venues and for major events as he toured central Hubei province last week, state news agency Xinhua reported on Saturday.

He also called for increased street patrols to "bolster the public's sense of security" through greater police presence, the report said.

Chen is head of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission, which oversees China's law enforcement agencies. He is also a member of the ruling Communist Party's elite decision-making Politburo.

One stop on the trip was Hubei's high court, where he said judicial efforts should "fully consider the social harm caused by criminal acts and focus on the people's real concerns" to ensure fairness and justice.

Serious and vicious violent crime must be punished swiftly and severely in accordance with the law, he added, so as to effectively safeguard the legitimate rights of the people.

China has doubled down on social stability and judicial fairness after a string of mass killings, set against the backdrop of economic struggles and rising unemployment.

On November 11, an SUV ploughed into a crowd at a sports centre in Zhuhai, in southern Guangdong province, leaving 35 dead and 43 injured.

Days later, a knife attack by a former student at a vocational college in the eastern province of Jiangsu, claimed eight lives and injured 17.

Three days later, an SUV hit a group of parents and children outside a primary school in Changde, in central Hunan province.

In the Zhuhai case, police said the 62-year-old suspect was angered by court decisions regarding the division of property in his divorce.

In a rare commentary for party mouthpiece People's Daily last week, a senior judicial official from Zhejiang urged judges and prosecutors to pay more attention to solving conflicts and ensuring fairness, rather than just closing cases.

The Ministry of Justice met late last month to discuss specific measures to solve conflicts in the wake of the attacks. It called on local officials to look into "marriage issues, neighbour relations, inheritances, property and land disputes and wage arrears" to tackle problems before they can escalate.

During his trip to Hubei, Chen also urged authorities to speed up the establishment of standardised county-level governance centres, which would make dispute resolution easier as people would need to visit just "a single place".

Efforts should be stepped up to resettle released prisoners, help people with severe mental disorders, and prevent juvenile crime, Chen added, while calling for more information sharing and inter-department coordination for a mechanism that can effectively prevent harmful behaviours while providing care.

In wake of mass attacks, China's judges urged to ensure fairness to maintain stability

03 December 2024, SCMP, Phoebe Zhang

In rare People's Daily commentary, senior official calls on judiciary to focus on fixing conflicts to prevent 'social risks from escalating'

China's judges and prosecutors must pay more attention to solving conflicts and ensuring fairness rather than just closing cases, a senior judicial official said in a rare commentary, as authorities reflect on a string of mass killings in recent weeks.

Wang Chengguo, secretary of the Political and Legal Affairs Commission of Zhejiang province, wrote in the official People's Daily on Tuesday that China's judicial system must focus on maintaining social stability as its main task.

He said China faced "an increasing number of uncertain and unpredictable factors", and law enforcement and judicial work served to achieve justice in individual cases and were crucial channels for repairing social relations and advancing social governance.

If officials focus on judicial procedure and aim to close cases quickly, ignoring individual justice, or if they apply laws mechanically to simplify cases without solving the actual problems, they might "intensify conflicts between the parties involved", Wang wrote.

He called for solving problems and strengthening governance "at the root" to prevent "various social risks from escalating".

Wang's commentary is likely a reflection of recent mass incidents, said a political scientist who asked to remain anonymous.

"The commentary meant that unfair judicial decisions and improper handling of cases can trigger social instability, and that authorities should pay attention to these factors," he said.

"Furthermore, there is also the need to strengthen the judicial branch and increase punishment for crimes, including crimes that cause large-scale harm to groups of people."

China has faced an unusually high number of mass killings in recent weeks, which unfolded against the backdrop of an economic slump and high unemployment.

On November 11, an SUV rammed into a crowd of people exercising in Zhuhai in the southern province of Guangdong, killing 35 and injuring 43.

On November 16, at a vocational college in Wuxi in Jiangsu province, a former student killed eight and wounded 17 with a knife.

Three days later, an SUV hit a group of parents and children outside a primary school in Changde in the central province of Hunan. Local police reported that several children were injured and needed hospital treatment, but there were no deaths.

Local police said the suspect in the Zhuhai killing, a 62-year-old man, was unhappy about court decisions regarding the division of property in his divorce.

Wang said that to promote social harmony in judicial work, there must be laws and regulations as well as a conflict-solving mechanism to encourage communication between parties and seek a compromise that satisfies all sides. He called for community volunteers to take part in solving conflicts and urged the use of big data and other technical measures to promote efficiency.

He added that officials should improve their abilities and "act as a bridge to communication" to balance the interests of all sides and solve problems in creative ways.

On November 22, China's Ministry of Justice held a meeting to discuss specific measures to solve conflicts. It called for local officials to look into "marriage issues, neighbour relations, inheritances, property and land disputes and wage arrears" in an effort to nip problems in the bud.

President Xi Jinping has promoted the "Fengqiao experience" – a model of solving problems at the community level – to manage disputes and social relations. Its motto is "small things do not leave the village, big things do not leave the town, and conflicts do not turn over".

In a 2021 speech recorded in Qiushi, the Communist Party's most authoritative theoretical journal, Xi said China's special circumstances meant it could not become "a country of litigation".

"We have 1.4 billion people. If everything, big or small, has to be decided by a lawsuit, our system wouldn't be able to bear the burden," he said, while calling for more mediation of conflicts and insisting on the Fengqiao experience.

China's Xi calls for the protection of Belt and Road Initiative interests overseas

03 December 2024, SCMP, Liu Zhen

China must protect its overseas interests related to the Belt and Road Initiative amid growing global risks, President Xi Jinping said on Monday.

Speaking at a working conference on the projects, Beijing's sprawling effort to build out a global infrastructure and trade network that connects to China, Xi warned that the international environment has become "tough and complicated".

"In recent years, the world has entered a new period of turbulence and change, with a significant rise in unilateralism and protectionism, and regional conflicts and upheavals have become frequent," Xi told the meeting.

"Against such circumstances ... it is necessary to appropriately respond to various risks and challenges, effectively overcome the impact of geopolitical conflicts, correctly address the relationship between enhancing the sense of gain of the partner countries and ensure the benefits to our country, and effectively safeguard the security of our overseas interests," he said.

Xi added that there are still more opportunities than challenges in promoting the initiative, despite the more challenging environment.

"We must strengthen our strategic confidence, maintain our strategic determination and have the courage to take on responsibilities," he said, calling for an improvement in project risk control and a mechanism to protect the interests of host countries.

It has entered a "new phase", said Xi, which should combine major "iconic" infrastructure constructions with "small and beautiful" projects that would improve the livelihoods of local populations, expand into new emerging fields to explore "new space for win-win development that is of higher-standard, more resilient and sustainable".

The initiative was first proposed by Xi in 2013, involving ambitious plans to build power plants, roads, railways, ports and other infrastructure overseas mainly by Chinese companies and funded by Chinese investment development bank loans.

Through these projects, China has deepened its relations with Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East.

They are seen as a way for China to expand its countries such as the United States and some of its allies. As the geopolitical tensions increase between China and the West, some major partners, such as Italy and Australia, have announced they are pulling out from the programme.

Critics have accused Beijing of saddling some project partner countries with unaffordable loan repayment terms, leading some of them to call the belt and road projects “debt traps”.

Some have also said that the projects bring little benefit to local economies, and levelled accusations of low transparency, corruption or human rights violations, as well as environmental damage.

Some high-profile projects under the initiative, such as the Hambantota Port in Sri Lanka, struggled to repay the Chinese loans. Other projects like the Melaka Gateway project in Malaysia, have been cancelled or scaled down.

In addition, Chinese expatriates and construction sites of belt and road projects in Pakistan – a key investment destination and host of some of flagship programmes – have been targeted by terrorists.

Monday’s meeting was attended by senior Chinese officials involved in the projects and was the fourth edition following those in 2016, 2018 and 2021.

November

China condemns G7 foreign minister’s Fiuggi statement on Tibet etc as interference

28 November 2024, Tibetan Review

China has on Nov 27 condemned the G7 countries for the joint statement at their foreign ministers’ meeting in Fiuggi, Italy, over Nov 24-27. The statement criticized Beijing on a host of issues, including human rights and other matters in Tibet etc, while seeking constructive and stable relations with the country, expressing readiness to cooperate with it to address global challenges.

The statement, released by the G7 Foreign Ministers of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States of America and the High Representative of the European Union, expressed concern on the “human rights situation in China, including in Xinjiang and Tibet” as well as on “the erosion of civil society, human rights and fundamental freedoms in Hong Kong.

China accused the G7 foreign ministers of, among other things, making wrongful comments on issues related to the East China Sea, South China Sea, and China’s Taiwan, Xinjiang, Xizang, and Hong Kong. Xizang is China’s Sinicized name for Tibet.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning has said China’s position on issues related to the East China Sea, the South China Sea, Taiwan, Xinjiang, Xizang and Hong Kong was consistent and clear-cut.

“We firmly oppose the G7 undermining China’s sovereignty and interfering in China’s internal affairs. We urge G7 countries to abide by the purposes and principles of the UN Charter and the basic norms governing international relations and look after their own affairs,” the official globaltimes.cn Nov 27 quoted Mao as saying.

China’s defence minister Admiral Dong Jun under probe for corruption

28 November 2024, Phayulv, Tenzin Nyidon

Admiral Dong Jun, China’s defence minister, is under investigation for alleged corruption, making him the third consecutive minister to face such charges. Dong, who assumed the role in December 2023 following the removal of his predecessor Li Shangfu, now faces similar corruption charges just seven months into his tenure.

China's defence minister Admiral Dong Jun in an undated photo (Photo/AP)

Dong was last seen publicly on November 21 in Vientiane, Laos, where he attended an Asian defence meeting but declined to meet with U.S. Defense Secretary Lloyd Austin. China’s defence ministers have traditionally served as members of both the Central Military Commission (CMC), the highest decision-making body for military affairs, and the State Council, the cabinet-level executive body. However, Dong was neither promoted to the six-member CMC, led by Xi Jinping, nor appointed to the State Council.

In a press conference, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning dismissed the investigation as “just shadow chasing,” implying that the allegations lacked substance. However, Dong’s case aligns with a growing pattern of corruption probes targeting senior military officials.

This investigation is part of a decade-long anti-corruption campaign initiated by President Xi Jinping in 2012, which has aggressively targeted high-ranking officials within the People’s Liberation Army (PLA). Dong’s predecessors, Li Shangfu and Wei Fenghe, also fell under scrutiny, with Li removed after just seven months in office for “serious violations of discipline,” a term often used to denote corruption. Wei, a former defence minister and head of the PLA Rocket Force, was similarly dismissed, with no details provided on his whereabouts.

Observers note that these investigations reflect deeper instability within the Chinese military leadership. In December 2023, nine senior military officers were ousted from China’s national legislative body, signalling a sweeping effort to consolidate power and address corruption in the ranks. Critics, however, argue that the anti-corruption drive doubles as a political tool for eliminating rivals and tightening President Xi’s grip on power.

China investigates head of Shanghai’s free-trade zone for corruption

27 November 2024, SCMP, Vanessa Cai

Zhu Zhisong, Communist Party chief of Pudong New Area, is among a number of aerospace veterans under a cloud

The Communist Party chief of Shanghai’s Pudong New Area, Zhu Zhisong, is under investigation on suspicion of corruption.

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) said on Wednesday that Zhu, 55, an aerospace veteran, was suspected of committing “serious violations of discipline and law” – a euphemism for corruption.

Zhu is the first party chief of Shanghai’s Pudong New Area to come under investigation since the district, a major testing ground for China’s economic reforms, was established in 1992.

However, he is the second “tiger”, or senior official, in Shanghai to be targeted by the CCDI since the party wrapped up a major reshuffle at its 20th congress in October 2022.

In July last year, Dong Yunhu, Shanghai’s top legislator, was put under investigation before being sentenced in August this year to life in prison for accepting 148 million yuan (US$20.4 million) in bribes.

Advertisement

Zhu’s last public appearance was on Monday afternoon during an inspection tour of two Pudong New Area communities.

He also attended the Hongqiao International Economic Forum on November 6, telling a gathering that Pudong would further promote institutional opening up and better align with high-standard international economic and trade rules, state media reported.

In December last year, three senior Chinese aerospace-defence executives were stripped of their titles as members of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference, China’s top national political advisory body. The measures signalled that Beijing was pressing ahead with anti-corruption efforts in the key military sector.

The trio were Wu Yansheng, chairman of the China Aerospace Science and Technology Corporation, Liu Shiquan, chairman of the board of the China North Industries Group Corporation, and Wang Changqing, deputy manager of the state-owned China Aerospace Science and Industry Corporation.

In December last year, three senior Chinese aerospace-defence executives were stripped of their titles as members of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference, China’s top national political advisory body. The measures signalled that Beijing was pressing ahead with anti-corruption efforts in the key military sector.

The trio were Wu Yansheng, chairman of the China Aerospace Science and Technology Corporation, Liu Shiquan, chairman of the board of the China North Industries Group Corporation, and Wang Changqing, deputy manager of the state-owned China Aerospace Science and Industry Corporation.

China aims for more than 100 ‘trusted data spaces’ by 2028 under national action plan

25 November 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

National Data Administration action plan marks major step forward in building integrated data market with secure links to other countries

China aims to build more than 100 “trusted data spaces” by 2028 and develop a series of data space solutions and best practices, according to an action plan released over the weekend.

The move marks a major step forward in building a national integrated data market with secure links to other countries.

A trusted data space is an infrastructure for secure data circulation and use, connecting trusted players including data owners, providers, users and developers. The storage and exchange of this data is based on consensus rules and standards, enabling efficient sharing.

According to the 2024-2028 action plan released on Saturday by the National Data Administration (NDA), initiatives will be launched to promote trusted data spaces across enterprises, industries, cities and beyond.

The administration pledged to set up an “efficient, convenient and secure” cross-border data flow mechanism based on multilateral frameworks, such as the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation, Brics and Group of 20.

“We will explore the establishment of a trusted data space dialogue and cooperation mechanism, and promote the construction of international cooperation demonstration projects for trusted data space under regional cooperation platforms such as the Belt and Road Initiative,” the action plan said, referring to Beijing’s cross-continental trade and infrastructure strategy.

It also pledged to “explore the interconnection of domestic and foreign data spaces”.

Within the country, the NDA will build a secure and reliable data space framework, with clearly identified rights and responsibilities for resource management, and safe and reliable application services.

Trusted data space operators will also be encouraged to ensure full traceability of data resource development and utilisation, so as to safeguard the rights and interests of all parties involved.

Operators of the trusted data space will also provide technical services such as data identification and semantic conversion.

Wu Hequan, an academician at the Chinese Academy of Engineering, said that many cities in China generated a vast amount of data that required a lot of pre-processing, because the receiving parties did not always have the ability to handle it.

Trusted data spaces would facilitate data resource retrieval and utilisation, by providing a secure environment for their development and application, Wu was quoted as saying by state news agency Xinhua.

The trusted data spaces plan is one of eight development policy guidelines expected from the NDA, which was set up in October last year to promote the building of a “digital China”.

NDA director Liu Liehong said in July that the eight guidelines would relate to issues including data property rights, data circulation, data revenue sharing, security governance, public data development, enterprise data development and high-quality development of the digital economy.

On Friday, a day before releasing the trusted data space plan, the NDA released a set of draft guidelines for national data infrastructure construction. The guidelines are open for public feedback until December 1.

China zeroes in on ‘common’ disputes in wake of deadly Zhuhai attacks

25 November 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

Earlier this month, a 62-year-old man killed 35 people and wounded more than 40 more when he rammed his car into a crowd in the southern city of Zhuhai – the country’s deadliest attack in a decade.

Beijing is ramping up scrutiny of “common” disputes such as those involving marriages and property, the justice ministry said, as the public reels from a recent string of deadly attacks.

China has witnessed a spate of violent incidents in recent months – from mass stabbings to car rammings – a rare development for a country with a proud reputation for public security.

The issue has prompted soul-searching about the state of society, with some despairing about why an increasing number of people seem willing to “take revenge” on random civilians.

The justice ministry has urged local mediators to carry out “in-depth investigations” into disputes involving family, neighbours, land and wages.

Such close attention is necessary to resolve disputes at the early stage, the ministry said Saturday.

Officials also stressed the importance of maintaining “safety and stability” in prisons.

“It is necessary to increase efforts to resettle and assist released prisoners... to effectively prevent and reduce re-offending,” the ministry statement said.

Earlier this month, a 62-year-old man killed 35 people and wounded more than 40 more when he rammed his car into a crowd in the southern city of Zhuhai – the country’s deadliest attack in a decade.

Preliminary investigations suggested the attack had been “triggered by (his) dissatisfaction with the division of property following his divorce”, according to local police.

Days later, eight people were killed and 17 others wounded in a knife attack at a vocational school in eastern China.

Police said the suspect was a 21-year-old former student at the school, who was meant to graduate this year but had failed his exams.

Officials from China’s Supreme People’s Court also met Saturday and said they would “severely punish major vicious crimes in accordance with the law and maintain social stability”.

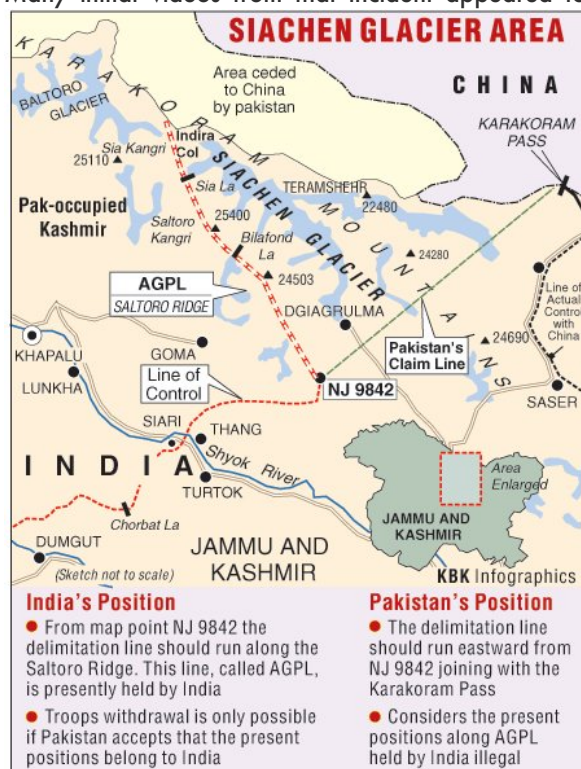

And Beijing’s top public prosecutor vowed “zero tolerance for crimes that infringe students’ rights and interests and endanger campus safety” at a meeting Tuesday.

It also pledged to “make every effort to safeguard the safety of campuses and students”, according to a post on its official WeChat account.

On Tuesday, a car crashed near a primary school in central China and injured multiple children.

Many initial videos from that incident appeared to have been removed from China's tightly controlled social media platforms, echoing other mass casualty events.

In the Zhuhai attack, it took police almost 24 hours to release the death toll, and videos of the attack later appeared to be scrubbed from social media.

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Mao Ning's Regular Press Conference on November 25, 2024

25 November 2024, MFA

It's reported that the UN Climate Change Conference (COP29) held in Baku agreed on the new collective quantified goal. How does China view the results of the meeting and what role will China play in the implementation of the outcomes?

Mao Ning: On November 24, the 29th Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (COP29) was concluded in Baku, the capital city of Azerbaijan. After two weeks of tough negotiations, parties reached consensus on the new collective quantified goal, the operationalization of Article 6 of the Paris Agreement and other issues. The outcomes of the meeting embody the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and demonstrate global effort and aspiration for climate response.

The Chinese government attaches great importance to COP29. President Xi Jinping's Special Representative, Member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and Vice Premier of the State Council Ding Xuexiang attended and addressed the World Leaders Climate Action Summit held during COP29. Vice Premier Ding Xuexiang also attended events hosted by China, including the High-Level meeting on "Early Warnings for a Climate-Resilient Future" and the Launch Conference of the International Zero-Carbon Island Cooperation Initiative. The Chinese delegation shared information on the Xi Jinping Thought on Ecological Civilization and China's achievements in climate actions, participated in consultations on various topics in a comprehensive and in-depth manner, contributed constructive plans for negotiations on key issues, and promoted all sides to expand common ground while resolving differences, making important contributions to reaching the outcomes of the meeting.

The new collective quantified goal reached at COP29 requires developed country Parties to take the lead in providing and mobilizing at least US$300 billion per year by 2035 for developing country Parties for climate action. It is a continuation of the commitment of mobilizing US$100 billion per year made by developed countries in 2009. The COP29 meeting also called on all actors to work together to enable the scaling up of financing to developing country Parties for climate action from all sources to at least US$1.3 trillion per year by 2035.

Climate finance is crucial to supporting developing countries' climate response. China calls on developed countries to earnestly fulfill their obligations and responsibilities of providing funding support to developing countries to boost global climate actions. China will continue to enhance South-South cooperation and provide as much support as we can for the climate response effort of fellow developing countries.

Reuters: What is the latest update on the Chinese ship Yi Peng 3 that was anchored between Denmark and Sweden? Are you able to tell us whether the ship is staying voluntarily or if it is being detained and if the crew is being questioned?

Mao Ning: As I have learned, China maintains smooth communication with relevant parties of the incident through diplomatic channels. As for specifics about the Chinese vessel, I have no more information to share and would like to refer you to competent authorities.

KBS: In accordance with China's criminal law, the South Korean citizen detained for violating the anti-espionage law must stand trial within this year. Can you update us on the investigation progress?

Mao Ning: I'm not familiar with what you mentioned. On the specifics about how the case is being handled, I'd refer you to competent Chinese authorities.

TV Asahi: Last Friday, China issued its unilateral 30-day visa-free policy for Japan. Previously, China's stance was to jointly facilitate cross-border travel and require reciprocal visa exemption measures. Why did China change its stance?

Mao Ning: The Chinese government always attaches high importance to the facilitation of cross-border exchanges. We hope that Japan will work with us in the same direction and jointly facilitate cross-border travel between our two countries.

Rudaw Media Network: Iraq is an important economic and trade partner for China. Israel is threatening to attack regions in Iraq. Do you believe such an action could harm China's interests there? Has China taken any steps through the United Nations Security Council or other diplomatic channels to prevent such attacks on Iraq?

Mao Ning: China opposes infringement upon other countries' sovereignty and security and opposes arbitrary use of force. As tensions in the Middle East are running high, relevant parties need to avoid further increasing the overall security risks in the region. The recent series of incidents once again highlight the urgency of realizing a ceasefire. The international community, major countries with influence in particular, need to play a constructive role and create necessary conditions for cooling down the situation in the region. China will continue to leverage its influence and contribute to keeping the region peaceful and stable.

AFP: A spokesman for Afghanistan's foreign ministry posted on X today about an apparent meeting between top Taliban diplomat Amir Khan Muttaqi and China's special envoy for Afghan affairs Yue Xiaoyong. Can you tell us more about the content or outcomes of this meeting?

Mao Ning: I'll need to check with my colleagues.

Shenzhen TV: The Global Financial Leaders' Investment Summit was successfully held from November 18 to 20 in Hong Kong. The annual meeting of the International Financial Forum was also held for the first time in Hong Kong from November 22 to 23. The two important meetings had the participation of senior financial officials as well as heads of financial institutions from a good number of countries and regions, and received widespread attention. What's the Foreign Ministry's comment?

Mao Ning: We congratulate Hong Kong on successfully hosting these two important meetings in international finance, which represents a vote of confidence from the international community for Hong Kong's status as an international financial center, its business environment and development outlook. Facts prove that with the safeguards of One Country, Two Systems, the strong support of the nation and concerted efforts of all sectors, Hong Kong will maintain lasting prosperity and stability and it will better leverage its role as an international financial center. China welcomes companies and talents from across the world to invest, do business and tap full potential in Hong Kong. They will surely benefit from Hong Kong's development and One Country, Two Systems.

Reuters: The Biden administration is set to unveil new export restrictions on China as soon as next week, the US Chamber of Commerce said on Thursday.

Does the Foreign Ministry have any comment on this?

Mao Ning: China is firmly opposed to the US overstretching the concept of national security, abusing export control measures and making malicious attempts to block and suppress China. Such moves seriously violate the laws of market economy and the principles of fair competition, disrupt international economic and trade order and the stability of global industrial and supply chains, and will eventually harm the interest of all countries. China will take resolute measures to firmly defend the legitimate and lawful rights and interests of Chinese companies.

China News Service: It's reported that on November 24, Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Andrei Rudenko told TASS in an interview that "Naturally, the issue of Taiwan is in the exclusive competence of our Chinese colleagues. However, we see that Washington, in violation of the one-China principle, is strengthening military-political contacts with Taipei under the slogan of maintaining the 'status quo', and increasing arms supplies. The goal of such obvious US interference in the region's affairs is to provoke China and generate a crisis in Asia to suit its own selfish interests." What's China's comment?

Mao Ning: We noted the reports. The one-China principle is a prevailing international consensus and a basic norm governing international relations. China highly commends Russia's just position of staying committed to the one-China principle and opposing the attempt of using Taiwan to contain China.

AFP: According to Japanese media, the United States is working with Japan on contingency plans for a possible future emergency involving Taiwan. These plans would see the United States deploy missile units on Japan's Nansei Islands as well as in the Philippines. Is China aware of such plans and does it have any comments on the report?

Mao Ning: Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory, and the Taiwan question is China's internal affair. The key to upholding cross-strait peace and stability is to remain committed to the one-China principle. China firmly opposes relevant countries using the Taiwan question as an excuse to strengthen military deployment in the region, heighten tensions and confrontation, and disturb regional peace and stability.

Bloomberg: Lithuania's incoming Prime Minister Paluckas said he is open to restoring diplomatic relations with China three years after a trade dispute led to Beijing downgrading its ties. The incoming Prime Minister signals support for repairing ties by returning envoys to both capitals, but he stressed that his administration won't reverse course on current policies that include maintaining trade links with Taiwan. Does the Foreign Ministry have any comment?

Mao Ning: We noted relevant statement from the Lithuanian side. As is widely known, Lithuania's wrongful acts on issues concerning Taiwan are the root cause of the fraught relations between China and Lithuania. China's door remains open to dialogue and we hope that Lithuania will return to the right path of upholding the one-China principle, abide by the political commitments in the communiqué on the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Lithuania, and accumulate enabling conditions for the normalization of bilateral relations.

Kyodo News: A follow-up to the question raised by TV Asahi. Has China asked Japan to offer visa exemptions for its nationals?

Mao Ning: We hope that Japan will work with us in the same direction and further facilitate cross-border travel between the two countries.

AFP: Taiwan defense ministry said today that it had detected a Chinese balloon passing over waters yesterday northwest of the island. This is the first such balloon it has reported since April. Can you provide details about the situation or do you have any comment?

Mao Ning: First of all, there is no such thing as "Taiwan defense ministry" and the question is not related to foreign affairs.

Global Times: Yamandu Orsi, candidate for the Frente Amplio (Broad Front), a coalition of major opposition parties was reportedly leading in the second round of votes in Uruguay's presidential election. The candidate of the ruling National Party conceded defeat and the incumbent Uruguayan President Luis Lacalle Pou has sent a congratulatory message to Yamandu Orsi on his election. Do you have any comment?

Mao Ning: We express congratulations for this smooth and successful presidential election in Uruguay and congratulate Mr. Yamandu Orsi on his election as the new president. China attaches high importance to growing relations with Uruguay and stands ready to work with Uruguay to further strengthen mutual political trust, deepen cooperation and exchanges in various fields, have closer communication and coordination in international and regional affairs, and work for the sustained and in-depth development of our comprehensive strategic partnership to the benefit of the two peoples.

China's top judge promises swift justice after recent mass killings that shocked nation

24 November 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Chief justice Zhang Jun says stern measures will help public 'truly feel fairness' but lighter punishments may be better for lesser crimes

China's most senior judge has promised to dish out swift punishments for random attacks on members of the public following a series of incidents that have shocked the nation.

In the most serious incident, 35 people were killed and dozens injured when a car ploughed into crowds of people exercising outside a sports stadium in the southern city of Zhuhai almost two weeks ago, prompting authorities around the country to tighten security measures.

Zhang Jun, president and chief justice of the Supreme People's Court, told a special meeting of the country's top courts on Saturday that serious and vicious crimes must be sternly punished, while trials and sentencing must be timely so the public can "truly feel fairness and justice".

But he said courts should consider lighter punishments for minor social crimes or incidents triggered by social conflict – if the defendant pleads guilty and is forgiven by the victim – to “promote the reform of criminals”.

Zhang also said that when there are repeated incidents in a short space of time, the judicial system should find the source of the problem to help prevent future incidents and focus on strengthening correctional education, as well as support for former convicts and patients with severe mental disorders.

The chief justice also told courts across the country to implement a campaign to “resolve conflict and maintain stability” ordered by the country’s top security body after the Zhuhai car attack, a statement from the supreme court said.

The suspect in the case went into a coma after trying to slit his throat after the attack. The local authorities said a preliminary investigation indicated he was angry about his divorce settlement.

Days after the incident, eight people were killed and 17 injured when a knifeman went on the rampage at a college in the eastern city of Wuxi. A 21-year-old former student who had failed his exams and was said to be angry about his low pay as a factory intern was detained at the scene of the attack.

Police are also investigating an incident in which a car ploughed into a group of parents and children outside a school in the central city of Changde on Tuesday. A 39-year-old man was detained at the scene.

On Sunday, Yin Bai, secretary general of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission, called for more controls to prevent “major security incidents”.

During a tour of Zhejiang province, Yin said local governments must provide “one-stop solutions” to resolve disputes and prevent conflicts.

He urged China’s security force to dig into their vast data resources to discover potential risks and hidden dangers and better predict when attacks might occur so they can be stopped.

Officials around the country have also been stepping up security measures around schools and other places where large crowds gather.

Dozens of Chinese cities also saw their party and government inspecting security measures at places with large crowds, especially schools, according to mainland media reports.

In one city, Bijie in the southwestern province of Guizhou, the mayor has ordered traffic and pedestrians to be diverted away from schools at the start and end of the school day.

Senior officials, including President Xi Jinping, have called for stronger security measures in the wake of the Zhuhai attack.

The Ministry of Public Security has urged police across the country to “resolve conflicts at the grass-roots level” to prevent “extreme cases”.

Meanwhile, Ying Yong, the country’s top prosecutor, called on prosecution agencies to support measures to deter “similar malicious crimes” but also “learn profound lessons” from the incident and step up investigative action.

China's top political advisor stresses united front in Chinese modernization

23 November 2024, People’s Daily Online

Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, learns about the operation of the Hainan Free Trade Port at the Xinhai Port in Haikou, south China's Hainan Province, Nov. 20, 2024. Wang made an inspection tour in south China's Hainan Province from Wednesday to Friday. (Xinhua/Rao Aimin)

China's top political advisor Wang Huning has stressed the importance of building a broad united front to rally support from all groups in deepening reform and promoting Chinese modernization.

Wang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, made the remarks during an inspection tour in the southern island province of Hainan from Wednesday to Friday.

During the tour, Wang visited schools, universities and enterprises invested by Taiwan compatriots, where he spoke with teachers and students from Taiwan and learned about the investment and entrepreneurship of Taiwan compatriots. He also learned about the operation of the Hainan Free Trade Port.

Wang urged measures to better meet the demands of Taiwan compatriots regarding study, employment, and business operations in Hainan, thus promoting integrated development across the Taiwan Strait.

As of the end of 2023, Hainan had approved the establishment of more than 2,500 enterprises invested by Taiwan compatriots. In November 2023, the province announced a series of measures to encourage Taiwan compatriots to make investments or start businesses in the Hainan Free Trade Port.

China confronts false accusations that plague Communist Party's anti-corruption crusade

23 November 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

Observers say unfounded claims about cadres waste resources, dampen morale and deter officials from making bold moves to boost the economy

When Chinese President Xi Jinping launched his anti-corruption campaign in 2012, the Communist Party cast its net wide, encouraging party members and the public to report any misconduct.

However, more than a decade later, the party has come to realise many have exploited this to make false accusations against officials.

At a major party conclave in July, Xi and other top officials pledged to "take stronger steps to handle false accusations".

Observers say unfounded claims about corruption waste resources, undermine careers, dampen morale and deter officials from taking decisive action as China faces economic challenges.

"This disrupts disciplinary inspection work, pollutes the political ecosystem, and hurts the feelings of reform-minded leaders," said Zhuang Deshui, deputy director at Peking University's public policy research centre.

Beijing has pledged to foster a healthier political environment that motivates cadres to get things done.

"The aim is not to discourage genuine reporting but to create a positive atmosphere where individuals respect their own rights and report issues transparently, thereby protecting leaders," Zhuang said.

"In recent years, there has been a rise in fabricated claims, prompting the need for a heavy-handed crackdown on such practices."

A tally by the South China Morning Post of over 100 cases found that common motives include retaliation, personal grievances and jealousy. The accusers include political rivals, people with conflicting interests, those seeking personal profits and disgruntled citizens with unmet demands.

A notable case is that of Sun Xiangyu, a former district police chief in Heilongjiang's provincial capital Harbin, who submitted over 60 false reports against six police officers between 2015 and 2021, accusing them of bribery and misconduct.

Sun was motivated by grievances and the desire to advance his career and also told others to make false claims. In 2023, he was expelled from the party, removed from public office, and later faced criminal charges, according to a report by the Heilongjiang disciplinary body released in June.

In another case, Ma Weitao director of a tree farm in Henan province, was falsely accused by an anonymous whistle-blower of profiting from illegal sand mining during the 2021 flood season. After a two-month investigation, the local disciplinary body exonerated him and held a meeting to restore his reputation.

In an interview with mainland news outlet China News Weekly last October, Ma said that upon learning the allegations against him, he was in very low spirits and considered resigning.

"If party members and cadres like me are held accountable for this, it will inevitably make them hesitant in their future work, and some may even become 'lying-flat' officials in urgent situations," he said, using a phrase that refers to cadres who have become complacent.

He added that timely clarification by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), the country's top anti-corruption watchdog, could encourage officials to pursue hard work and take initiative.

The CCDI is not allowed to investigate the identities of anonymous whistle-blowers unless there is evidence a false accusation has been made.

"This anonymity offers an opportunity for individuals with ulterior motives to exploit the reporting system," said Zhuang, who specialises in clean governance research.

"This creates challenges for disciplinary work and affects the morale of certain leaders. People may make these accusations for personal gain, leading to the stifling of important reforms and innovative efforts by capable officials."

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University, acknowledged the "critical role" whistle-blowing had played in the "unprecedented" anti-corruption crackdown.

But he noted the battle against corruption had entered a new phase, and efforts to counter false accusations were necessary and healthy "adjustments" that should not be dismissed as side effects of the anti-corruption fight.

Zhuang said false accusations often arise when officials are nearing promotions. If one official is reported while another is not, leaders might be reluctant to promote the reported official – even if an investigation later confirms the official was falsely accused.

A Beijing-based political scientist, who requested anonymity, said that in recent years, the party had "almost been 'encouraging' reports of cadres' misconduct or complaints about pretty much anything, both among the cadre ranks and within broader Chinese society", which had contributed to false accusations.

She said the efforts to stop false accusations might be a sign that efforts to encourage reporting had "gone too far" and the party was starting to "lose control" of the whistle-blowing campaign.

She added that leaders might be concerned that frequent accusations, whether false or not, could make the party look bad and threaten its legitimacy. The authorities have stepped up the drive against false accusations this year amid growing pressure to counteract falling economic momentum, analysts say. Xie said the central government highlighted the issue of false accusations during the second plenum of the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection in January and vowed to “take stronger steps” to handle them at the party’s third plenum in July.

“The [third plenum statement] encourages leaders to take bold action and also imposes restrictions on those who make false accusations,” he said.

The third plenum document also calls for taking “stronger steps” in other areas to motivate officials – many of whom are reluctant to innovate and fear making mistakes – to “forge ahead in a pioneering spirit and demonstrate enterprise in their work”.

One of those efforts to motivate officials is the “three differentiation” policy, which distinguishes between “mistakes” made during reforms, suggesting leniency for those whose missteps stem from inexperience rather than deliberate violations of discipline.

“During economic downturns, encouraging officials to take decisive action is critical, but the fear of false accusations from competitors can stifle their willingness to engage with the private sector,” Xie said.

The party’s campaign to tackle false accusations ensures accountability for false reports, he said.

“Officials must feel safe to act without the risk of unfounded allegations derailing their careers or decision-making processes,” he added.

A handful of provinces and cities have waged campaigns against false accusations and released reports about cases, punishments and steps taken to clear the names of wronged officials.

Penalties for those who make false accusations can range from party discipline or administrative sanctions to criminal charges.

Methods for absolving falsely accused cadres include statements refuting the false claims, private discussions and open meetings to clear their names.

In August, Yunnan province cleared the names of 2,900 party members and investigated 61 false accusation cases.

Heilongjiang province screened 162 reported cases, leading to 145 investigations and 67 punishments, and 657 officials had their names cleared.

Harbin’s Discipline Inspection Commission has organised a campaign to punish those who make false accusations. The city has examined reports dating back to 2020 to distinguish between false and legitimate claims.

As of late June, Harbin had reviewed over 12,704 reports and referred 221 serious cases to law enforcement. The city has punished 51 people and cleared the names of 624 officials.

Despite these efforts, challenges persist in handling cases that involve disciplinary violations that do not constitute crimes.

According to lawyers quoted in Chinese media, it is often difficult to determine whether reports should be classified as malicious false accusations or incorrect claims made in good faith.

Zhuang said there was a need for the “political art of balance” within disciplinary agencies, and this required practical experience. These agencies must navigate unfounded allegations while ensuring genuine concerns are addressed and protecting citizens’ right to petition.

“If false accusations are reduced, the overall quality of petition reports will also improve, ultimately benefiting the system and restoring trust among officials and the public,” he said.

The anonymous political scientist warned: “Whether the accusations are ‘false’ or ‘truthful’, basing party discipline on an ‘accusation culture’ rather than through further institution building and rule of law that can regulate cadre behaviour institutionally probably will not serve the party’s interest in the long term.”

She added that because the campaign against false accusations is “relatively fresh”, it is not yet clear how it will affect anti-corruption efforts. While local governments have promptly responded, anti-corruption and cadre discipline remain among the central government’s top priorities, she said.

Top political advisor urges pooling strength of Chinese from home, abroad for Chinese modernization

18 November 2024, Xinhua

China's top political advisor Wang Huning on Monday urged the China Overseas Friendship Association (COFA) to shoulder more responsibilities and pool the wisdom and strength of Chinese people from home and abroad to advance Chinese modernization.

Wang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, made the remarks at a meeting of COFA executive directors in Beijing.

Noting the great successes both the Party and the country have made in the new era, Wang said these achievements could not be separated from the support and contributions of compatriots in Hong Kong, Macao and Taiwan, as well as overseas Chinese.

With strong support from the motherland, the prospects for them to serve their motherland and pursue their dreams are very bright, Wang said. He asked the COFA and its directors to make further suggestions and contributions for the long-term prosperity and stability of Hong Kong and Macao, and enhance economic and cultural exchanges and cooperation, as well as integrated development across the Taiwan Strait.

Shi Taifeng, a member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and head of the United Front Work Department of the CPC Central Committee, attended the meeting, where he was re-elected head of the COFA.

Xi Jinping weighs pros and cons of China's shrinking population

16 November 2024, SCMP, Vanessa Cai

China's shrinking population brings both negative and positive effects, President Xi Jinping has said, noting that a lighter environmental burden is among the benefits of a smaller population.

The Chinese leader also defended the "correctness and effectiveness" of past birth control policies, according to excerpts from a speech to the Central Financial and Economic Affairs Commission.

He made the speech in May last year but the excerpts were published for the first time on Friday in Qiushi, the Communist Party's top theoretical journal. The impact of population decline "must be viewed in a dialectical manner", Xi told commission officials.

The drop could bring positive effects, he said, such as "easing pressure on resources and the environment" as well as forcing economic development.

But Xi also acknowledged the negative effects, such as a reduced labour force and weaker consumer and investment momentum.

"Overall, the impact of population decline on economic and social development has both positive and negative aspects. We cannot look at it from just one side. Some issues require long-term consideration, and we should avoid rushing to conclusions ... and we should work to maximise benefits while avoiding harm," he said.

China faces deepening demographic challenges as its birth rate plummets. Only 9 million births were reported in the country in 2023, the lowest since records began in 1949, as the population dropped for the second year in a row to 1.4 billion, a decline of more than 2 million.

National and local governments have rolled out a raft of policies, such as cash subsidies and extended maternity and paternity leave. But demographers argue these have failed to address deeper issues such as high living costs, insufficient childcare support and persistent gender inequality.

According to the article published on Friday, Xi noted that China's demographic changes arrived as the country "completed in a few decades what took developed nations over a hundred years to achieve in terms of industrialisation".

"The pace of population transition is fast, the population decline has come earlier than expected, but overall it follows the general pattern of modernisation development worldwide," he was quoted as saying by the party journal, which regularly highlights internal leadership speeches months after they are given.

Regarding China's historic birth control policies, Xi said their "correctness and effectiveness should be fully affirmed".

The policies "effectively controlled rapid population growth and the pressures it brought, and strongly supported the reform and opening-up", he said.

China's one-child policy started in 1980 and was strictly enforced with punishment, including fines for violators and often forced abortion. It officially ended in January 2016 in favour of a two-child policy amid an ageing population and shrinking workforce.

This was followed by a three-child policy in May 2021, after a national census showed a fourth consecutive drop in the annual birth rate.

Friday's Qiushi article noted Xi's call for continued reforms and innovation to promote high-quality population development.

But he said rushed decisions leading to "measures introduced hastily that may easily raise controversies" must be avoided.

China's Communist Party expels former agriculture minister for corruption

15 November 2024, Reuters, Mei Mei Chu

China's Communist Party has expelled former agriculture minister Tang Renjian, state media reported on Friday, six months after he was placed under investigation by the country's anti-graft watchdog and removed from his post.

Tang, 61, was investigated for "serious violations of discipline and law", a euphemism for corruption, and removed from the leadership roster of the ministry's website in May.

The move to investigate Tang was unusually swift and follows similar investigations on defence minister Li Shangfu and his predecessor Wei Fenghe as China cracks down on corruption.

Tang was found to have accepted gifts and money in violation of regulations, accepting property in the selection and appointment of cadres, using his authority to provide assistance to his relatives' business activities, and interfering in judicial activities, state media CCTV reported.

"Tang Renjian lost his ideals and beliefs, abandoned his original mission," CCTV reported.

President Xi Jinping has pursued a tough and sweeping anti-graft campaign since taking power in 2012 and earlier this year declared "overwhelming victory" in the crackdown while vowing to keep up the pressure.

Xi views his anti-corruption drive as a key political achievement, but critics say the campaign has been used to purge his political opponents and does not address the root causes of graft, such as low wages and the unchecked powers of party-appointed state officials.

Tang was governor of the western province of Gansu from 2017 to 2020 before being named minister of agriculture and rural affairs, according to official biographies.

Under Tang, the agriculture and rural affairs ministry had stepped up its food security policies, approving the use of genetically-modified crops and adopting a food security law.

China appointed veteran official Han Jun, 60, as the new head of the ministry in September.

State television serial paints President Xi as worthy son of a glorious father

09 November 2024, Tibetan Review

Xi Zhongxun, the father of China's party general secretary and state president Xi Jinping, is the subject of a rousing new historical drama that premiered on Chinese state television on Nov 5, reported theguardian.com Nov 8.

Funded by the Central Propaganda Department of the Communist party of China (CPC), Time in the Northwest, a 39-part serialised drama, chronicles the life of senior Xi, who was himself a CPC elder and a key figure in the party under Chairman Mao Zedong.

The show has naturally received overwhelmingly positive reviews on China's closely censored social media platforms, focused as it is on glorifying the CPC's military history. But unlike other popular television shows and films, Time in the Northwest also glorifies Xi Jinping's personal family history, the report noted.

Across 39 episodes, the show is said to dramatize the elder Xi's life from a peasant family in rural Shaanxi province to a leader in the CPC revolution in China's north-west.

The report cited an article published by the state broadcaster CCTV to promote the show as saying the biopic is "the first epic masterpiece that presents a panoramic view of the magnificent history of the north-west revolution", and in particular, highlights Xi's "extraordinary experience".

The show, taking place against the backdrop of the Chinese civil war, in which the Communists and the Nationalists (KMT) fought for control of the country after the fall of the Manchu Qing dynasty, portrays Xi as a loyal and determined revolutionary who helped to build key CPC bases in Shaanxi and Gansu provinces.

The senior Xi's fervour as a young man propelled him into the highest echelons of the CPC elite. After the Communists' victory in the civil war, he became the head of the party's publicity department and a vice-premier of China. His red credentials have been inherited by his son, Xi Jinping, who is often referred to as a "princeling" of the party he now controls, the report said.

The serial conveniently ends in 1952, one year before Xi Jinping was born, and a decade before Zhongxun was purged for supporting a novel that was seen as a covert attempt to rewrite the party history.

Were it to continue, the serial would have to show how in the 1960s and 70s, Xi spent 16 years in purgatory. Xi was rehabilitated after the end of the Cultural Revolution, and went on to hold leadership positions.

In the first episode, which aired on Nov 5 evening, Xi is shown scrapping with a school administrator called Wei Hai. In real life, Xi was jailed for his involvement in a plot to assassinate Wei, the report said, citing a forthcoming biography of Xi Zhongxun by Joseph Torigian, a research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover History Lab. The dramatized version is said to minimise Xi's role in the attempted killing.

"Part of the idea of Xi's model is that this generation needs to take the baton from the older generation," Torigian has said. "One specific, concrete way of doing that is to show how Xi Jinping took the baton from his own father."

This is expected to have a countervailing influence in a country where the buzzwords that have become popular among young Chinese today include tangping, or "lying flat", reflecting a desire to quit the rat race for a more passive lifestyle, and neijuan, or "involution", reflecting despair at the feeling of being overworked.

"Red Cultural Education" for Clergy of All Religions in China

07 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Hu Zimo

For seven days, clergy was taken around Henan to pay homage to CCP heroes and learn that "Xi Jinping's thought on culture is profound, logically rigorous, and of great significance."

The five authorized religions in China are taking very seriously the instructions of submitting their clergy to “patriotic education,” i.e., the national program of indoctrination introduced by a law that came into force on January 1, 2024. Special guidelines on how religions should implement it were issued on January 4.

It seems that a favorite way for the mandatory indoctrination of the clergy is to organize pilgrimages to the red shrines of the Civil War and of the history of the Communist Party. They are organized at times of traditional religious pilgrimages to effectively replace them. It is also believed that the clergy may like the opportunity to do some tourism and would more easily tolerate boring propaganda lectures if they are alternated with banquets and traveling.

As part of the program, a “red cultural tour” for clergy of all provinces and regions was held from October 21 to 27 in Henan Province. The event, organised by the United Front Work Department, saw the participation of 140 religious figures nationwide.

The clergy was submitted to lectures on the “Resolution of the CCP Central Committee on Further Deepening Reforms and Promoting Modernization with Chinese Characteristics,” endorsed at the Third Plenary Session of the 20th CCP Central Committee. The Resolution emphasizes “building a socialist cultural power,” noting this is also essential to complete the Sinicization of religion in China.

The seven-day indoctrination tour featured lectures, on-site teaching, and group discussions. The organizers arranged talks on “Understanding Xi Jinping’s thought on culture” and the “Dabie Mountain Spirit,” which refers to a strategically situated Red Army base during the Civil War.

This was one of the “red” pilgrimage sites the clergy was taken to visit, along with the Red Flag Canal, the Jiao Yulu Memorial Hall, and others. The Red Flag Canal was aimed at improving Henan’s irrigation but what the clergy was not told was that the “heroism” of those who built it in difficult conditions was not spontaneous. It was completed during the Cultural Revolution by workers who in many cases were forcibly taken there, and many died. The official figure of 81 casualties is probably under-estimated. The Jiao Yulu Memorial Hall celebrates one of the Mao-era Communist heroes whose exploits as told are largely apochryphal. Jiao was the Party chief of Lankao and died of cancer at age 42 in 1964. He is hailed for extraordinary successes in agriculture that are probably imaginary.

As reported on social media and in the official press release, the message hammered into the clergy was that, “Everyone believes that Xi Jinping’s thought on culture is profound, logically rigorous, and of great significance. We must not only persist in learning and understanding it, but also truly learn and apply it and put it into practice.”

Entire Village of the Yi Ethnic Minority “Deprogrammed” in Yunnan

06 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Mo Yuan

When the authorities learned that the banned Association of Disciples had converted all villagers in Jiciping, reeducation was entrusted directly to the police.

The Association of Disciples has been added by Chinese authorities to the category of “xie jiao” (“movements spreading heterodox teachings”) regarded as direct threats to national security, a dubious honor it shares with The Church of Almighty God and Falun Gong.

The Association of Disciples (门徒会, Mentuhui) is also known as “Teachings of the Third Redemption” (三赎教), a name indicating the claim that their doctrine is the third historical source of salvation following Noah’s ark and the cross of Jesus Christ.

The movement was established by Ji Sanbao (季三保, 1940–1997), a former member of the True Jesus Church, in 1989. It was listed as a “xie jiao” in 1990, and submitted to intense persecution.

From 2020, the authorities launched a national campaign aimed at eradicating the Association of Disciples, which, like other forms of “illegal” religion, had experienced a new growth during the COVID-19 pandemic, offering comfort during a time of crisis and an explanation why God permitted it.

During this national campaign, the specialized anti-xie-jiao police discovered something it did not know. From some ten years, in a remote area of Yunnan, unbeknownst to the authorities an entire village had converted to the Association of Disciples faith. Jiciping Village, part of Zixin, Guanping Township, Yunlong County, is not easy to reach. It is located at an eight of some 2,700 meters in Dali Bai Autonomous Prefecture. Its 53 inhabitants belong to the Yi ethnic minority.

They were reached by Association of Disciples missionaries and all converted. The village chief did not report the development to the authorities for the good reason that he had converted himself.

It took ten years to the anti-xie-jiao police to realize what was going on—and to organize a reaction. Specially trained police officers descended on the village and submitted all villagers to intense sessions of “deprogramming” and indoctrination. Villagers were constantly followed by the officers during their daily activities.

In the end, they all had to sign declarations renouncing the Association of Disciples and thanking the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and the police.

The scandal of the "xie jiao village" was (reportedly) put to an end. The nation-wide repression of the Association of Disciples continues.

China warns military members against online dating, gambling

05 November 2024, VOA

In an unusual warning, China's navy told young officers and personnel that they could get ensnared by online dating scams and virtual gambling if they let down their guard, exposing themselves to security risks and undermining the military.

Addressing those born from 1990 who are "becoming the core of the army," the People's Liberation Army (PLA) Navy said in a social media post that young soldiers should avoid revealing their military identity online as they could be "extremely easy" targets of criminals.

The political and confidential nature of the military profession dictates that the military personnel identity must not be exposed online, it said.

"Distinguish carefully and keep some distance when making friends online," a line in the post advised, and "never lose sight of your principles and make random friends with netizens."

The navy also cautioned against virtual gambling, which is illegal in China, likening gambling addiction to being "possessed by a demon" and warning against schemes that could lead to a "fall into an endless abyss" of debt.

China's military projects an image of power, from launching drills around democratically governed Taiwan to deploying patrols in the South China Sea. But President Xi Jinping, also the military's commander-in-chief, has often warned that the armed forces face "deep-seated" problems from within, including corruption and a lack of discipline.

Young soldiers are not the only demographic singled out. Xi has also stressed political loyalty from senior military personnel.

At a military conference in June, Xi emphasized upholding the Chinese Communist Party's "absolute leadership" over the PLA and that the armed forces must always "uphold their core values, maintain purity, and strictly adhere to discipline."

Xi attributed the root cause of problems to the lack of ideals and beliefs, calling on the armed forces particularly senior cadres, to "introspect, engage in soul-searching reflections, and make earnest rectifications," according to official news agency Xinhua.

Xi Jinping urges China's provinces to be patient and fair in push for economic reforms

05 November 2024, SCMP, Josephine Ma

The Chinese leader also urged provincial leaders to remove the country's internal barriers to create a national market

Chinese President Xi Jinping has called on provincial leaders to be patient about the pace of economic reforms and cautioned them against trying to solve problems hastily, according to Communist Party mouthpiece People's Daily.

He also urged them to break down the fences of vested interests in each province in favour of a national market and to avoid "selective law enforcement", the newspaper said.

"Reform is a gradual process and cannot be achieved with just one move," Xi told the officials last week at a study session about the spirit of the party's third plenum – the conclave that took place in July and outlined the country's economic direction. The market, meanwhile, is closely watching the meeting of the country's top legislative body, which is reviewing and set to unveil a bill this week on local government debt swaps, along with other measures in a financial policy package to address short-term economic pains and prop up growth.

While it only published a summary of Xi's speech to the officials, the flagship newspaper has rolled out four opinion pieces based on the speech's highlights in recent days in an effort to get the key messages across.

Xi delivered his remarks amid high expectations that Beijing was about to unveil a range of fiscal stimulus measures designed to inject funds into the Chinese economy against a backdrop of economic challenges.

On October 18, China posted quarterly economic growth of 4.6 per cent – its lowest since the first quarter of last year, raising concerns about whether it can reach this year's target of "around five per cent".

Xi has issued three rallying calls since October 14, urging local officials to exhaust all means to reach the economic target, while reiterating the need to deepen reforms with the aim of steering a tech-driven path towards growth over the long run.

He told the provincial leaders at the October 29 study session that they should do everything they could to reach the annual target, according to People's Daily.

Xi also highlighted the importance of protecting people's legal rights, warning local officials not to "selectively" enforce the law nor spare lawbreakers, it said.

While the articles did not elaborate on what Xi meant by selective enforcement, the term has been used in recent months to refer to the practice of provincial authorities hitting private enterprises with fines as a way to boost local government coffers.

Last month, the justice ministry announced an investigation into whether local law enforcement departments have been targeting businesses for selective enforcement or revenue-generating law enforcement.

And in June the party's Study Times called on local authorities to avoid selective law enforcement after reports that some firms had been asked to pay tax bills dating as far back as the 1990s, creating panic among many businesspeople.

Another of the People's Daily opinion pieces said that Xi called on provincial officials to break the local protectionism and market barriers in different provinces to create a national market.

"As the reforms go deeper, the more vested interests will be affected. We should have a better awareness of the overall picture and correctly view the changes of vested interests in the process of reform, as well as personal gains and losses," he said.

One of the opinion pieces said it was noteworthy that Xi had asked the provincial leaders to rally public support by quickly dismissing people's worries and addressing their concerns.

Chinese officials told to stop avoiding media questions about emergencies

03 November 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Chinese government officials will no longer be allowed to avoid commenting on emergencies under new legislative amendments to give journalists better "legal protection".

A commentary published on Friday in Legal Weekly, a newspaper under the supervision of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission – a Communist Party body with a wide range of supervisory powers over the legal system and security apparatus – said changes to the Emergency Response Law meant officials should not be evasive in response to media queries.

The law was adopted by the National People's Congress Standing Committee in 2007, and was revised for the first time in June. The changes came into effect this month.

"The implementation of the [amended] Emergency Response Law means that government departments can no longer use 'no comment' to prevaricate when responding to media questions on emergencies," the Legal Weekly commentary said.

"It undoubtedly provides legal protection for news interviews and reports on emergencies."

The commentary highlighted Article 8 of the law, which stipulates that government departments should "support the news media in their coverage and public oversight" of official bodies, and that news coverage of emergencies should be "timely, accurate, objective and fair".

It also highlighted the duty of government to be prompt in releasing public alerts and other information about emergency responses.

The amended law also warned that no institutions or individuals should "fabricate or deliberately spread false information about emergencies", and that government bodies should promptly release clarifications if "false or incomplete information" is spreading in the public domain.

The commentary noted that the amended Article 97 stipulates that if the person directly responsible for spreading false information is a public official, "they shall also be punished in accordance with the law".

The All-China Journalists Association said on Thursday that without timely information and public oversight during emergencies, the government risked falling into a "Tacitus Trap".

Named after the Roman historian Tacitus, the concept suggests that a government with no public trust will always be hated by the people, no matter what it does.

A lecturer from the Communication University of China, who declined to be named, said the amendments were a good start in granting the media some freedom and protection to cover emergencies, but local government officials could easily find ways to circumvent the "no comment" rules.

"What's key is the law says now the officials will be held responsible if they are found to have fabricated information," the lecturer said.

"This will curb a little the knee-jerk tendency of local officials to cover up. But they can still play delaying tactics, because the law was not very clear on how timely the release of information should be.

"Alternatively, they can also get around the rules by saying 'we are still investigating it', or 'the death toll is still being calculated' – which are de facto 'no comments'."

The propaganda chief of one area could also call a counterpart in another area, asking for censorship and offering to reciprocate in the future.

"All these are very common in China nowadays, so we can only be cautiously optimistic," he added.

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Lin Jian's Regular Press Conference on November 1, 2024

01 November 2024, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

At the invitation of the Chinese side, Prime Minister of Malaysia Dato' Seri Anwar Ibrahim will pay a working visit to China from November 4 to 7.

Islamic Republic of Iran Broadcasting: I have a question about the terrorist attack in Iran. On Saturday, October 26, 2024, a foreign terrorist group supported by and linked with ISIS-Khorasan, carried out a terrorist attack on two vehicles of the patrol unit of the Islamic Republic of Iran Police Command in the city of Taftan in the province of Sistan and Baluchistan. This attack by the Jaish al-Zalm terrorist group unfortunately led to the martyrdom of 10 Iranian policemen. What is the Chinese government's comment in this regard?

Lin Jian: China condemns the terrorist attack. We oppose terrorism of all forms and support Iran's effort to keep the country safe and stable.

Reuters: Viet Nam on Thursday said they have protested against China's alleged detention of Vietnamese fishermen and fishing vessels in the Paracel Islands. Please could the Foreign Ministry confirm this?

Lin Jian: Xisha Qundao is China's inherent territory. China hopes Viet Nam will earnestly raise the awareness of its fishermen and make sure they will not engage in illegal activities in waters under China's jurisdiction.

AFP: A question about the reported presence of North Korean soldiers in Russia. Ukrainian President Zelenskyy said he was surprised by China's "silence" on this issue of the North Korean soldiers. What is China's response to the Ukrainian President?

Lin Jian: We have noted some reports related to this and responses from various parties recently. The DPRK and Russia are two independent sovereign states, and how to develop bilateral relations is a matter for themselves. China is not aware of the specifics of bilateral exchanges and cooperation between the DPRK and Russia.

China's position on the Ukraine crisis is consistent and clear. Let me stress that China hopes that parties will work to ease tensions and remain committed to the political settlement of the Ukraine crisis. This position remains unchanged. China will continue to play a constructive role to this end.

AFP: Still a question on the same topic about the reported presence of North Korean soldiers in Russia. The US said that up to 8,000 North Korean troops have reached Russia's border region with Ukraine. Do you confirm these claims and is China in contact with North Korea on this issue?

Lin Jian: I am not familiar with this. On the Ukraine crisis, I have shared China's consistent and clear position just now.

Reuters: Myanmar's local media reports the head of Myanmar will visit China. Please could the Foreign Ministry confirm this visit?

Lin Jian: I have nothing to share on that.

AFP: Josep Borrell, High Representative of the European Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy, is visiting Japan starting from today. During the visit, the Japanese government and the European Union will sign the Japan-EU Security and Defence Partnership agreement, which according to local media reports, targets China. What is China's response to the agreement between the EU and Japan?

Lin Jian: Security and defense cooperation between various parties should be conducive to regional peace and stability, and not target any third party or undermine the security interests of other countries. Let me stress that due to historical reasons, Japan's military and security moves have been closely watched by the international community and its Asian neighbors. We urge Japan to earnestly draw lessons from history, adhere to peaceful development, respect the security concerns of its neighbors in Asia, and stay prudent in military and security areas. We also hope that the EU will not interfere in the disputes on territorial and maritime rights and interests between regional countries, but instead play a constructive role for regional peace, stability, and development.

The Paper: The seventh China International Import Expo (CIIE) will kick off next week, and the preparations are almost completed. According to statistics, the number of participants will hit a new record, with 297 Fortune Global 500 companies, industry leaders and nearly 800 trading groups from various countries set to attend the event. How do you view the significance of this year's CIIE to China's effort of expanding high-standard opening up?

Lin Jian: Hosting the CIIE is an important step for China to further open up and a concrete action China took to build an open world economy. The numbers you just mentioned showcase the appeal of China's mega-sized market, speak volumes about the strong confidence of the international community in China's economic outlook, and demonstrate the common aspiration of all sides for win-win result through open cooperation.

Since the first CIIE in 2018, the event has been upgraded and expanded into a window for China to forge a new development paradigm and a platform to advance high-standard opening up. The CIIE has an expanding network of friends and growing significance as an international public good. This year's CIIE provides support for 37 least developed countries to participate in country exhibition and business exhibition, and further expands the exhibition area for African products in the food and agricultural products exhibition, in an effort to help more developing countries take part in the universally beneficial and inclusive economic globalization.

Openness is the core value of the CIIE and a defining feature of today's development in China. China is striving for high-quality development by advancing high-standard opening up. We stand ready to work with all sides through the CIIE to make the pie of opening up bigger and the list of cooperation longer, so that the opportunities of China's huge market can be shared by all countries and benefit people across the world.

Bloomberg: Viet Nam said it has asked China to immediately release vessels and fishermen detained in the South China Sea. It has also demanded compensation for losses. Would the Foreign Ministry like to respond to this?

Lin Jian: I answered the relevant question just now.

The following question was raised after the press conference: During the meeting with Slovakia's Prime Minister Robert Fico, President Xi Jinping announced China's unilateral visa-free policy to Slovakia. Could you share with us more details? Besides the 20 other countries whose ordinary passport holders have enjoyed the unilateral visa-free policy, has China rolled out this policy to more countries?

Lin Jian: To further facilitate cross-border travel, China decided to give visa-free treatment to more countries by extending the visa-free policy to ordinary passport holders from Slovakia, Norway, Finland, Denmark, Iceland, Andorra, Monaco, Liechtenstein, and the ROK on a trial basis. From November 8, 2024 to December 31, 2025, ordinary passport holders from these nine countries can be exempted from visa to enter China and stay for no more than 15 days for business, tourism, family visit and transit purposes.

October

Xi stresses advancing reform at study session for senior officials

30 October 2024, Xinhua

Chinese President Xi Jinping on Tuesday called for pooling strength to advance reform in a steady and sustained manner, as he addressed senior officials attending a central Party school study session.

Xi, also general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, made the remarks at the opening of the study session at the Party School of the CPC Central Committee (National Academy of Governance) for principal officials at the provincial and ministerial level.

The session is themed on implementing the guiding principles of the third plenary session of the 20th CPC Central Committee, which rolled out a new package of comprehensive reforms for the country.

Xi pointed out that China's efforts to advance reforms on all fronts in the new era have yielded substantial results across practical, institutional and theoretical dimensions, representing one of the most monumental chapters in the nation's journey of reform and opening up.

He emphasized that the reforms are guided by clear principles. Core commitments include upholding the Party's overall leadership, adhering to Marxism, adhering to socialism with Chinese characteristics, and upholding the people's democratic dictatorship, focusing on fostering social equity and enhancing people's well-being in everything the authorities do.

Xi asserted that these principles must remain unwavering, regardless of circumstances.

He also highlighted the need to uphold the unity of reform and the rule of law, bolster the rule of law through reform, advance reform in the domain of law-based governance, and continuously improve the system of socialist rule of law with Chinese characteristics.

Xi underscored the need to uphold the unity of reform and opening up, steadily expand institutional opening up, take the initiative to align with high-standard international economic and trade rules, deepen reform in foreign trade, foreign investment and outbound investment management system, and foster a first-class business environment that is market-oriented, law-based and internationalized.

Xi stressed that leading officials, especially senior officials, should strive to open new horizons for reform and development rather than shying away from risks and challenges.

It is essential to build broad consensus and mobilize all positive factors to advance reforms, Xi said.

All regions and departments must implement the existing and incremental policies and strive to achieve the annual economic and social development goals, he noted.

The opening session was presided over by Li Qiang, and attended by Zhao Leji, Wang Huning, Cai Qi, Ding Xuexiang and Li Xi, who are all members of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee. Vice President Han Zheng also attended the opening session.

Xi's speech is of great significance to solidifying confidence and pooling strength for advancing reforms, and will help ensure the effective implementation of various reform measures, said Li Qiang.

It is essential to grasp the core principles and practical implications of Xi's speech, and to implement reform measures with creativity, Li added.

Role reversed for China's birth-control enforcers, now cajoling women to marry, have children

29 October 2024, Tibetan Review

As China unveiled on Oct 28 new birth support policy measures to promote the building of a birth-friendly society, its grass roots government workers, who had spent decades imposing strict birth control policies, ruining careers and families, are now calling up women in their neighbourhoods to urge them to get pregnant amid the country's demographic crisis, reported China's official Xinhua news agency and the scmp.com Oct 28.

A directive from the General Office of China's State Council (the cabinet) details 13 targeted measures on enhancing childbirth support services, expanding child-care systems, strengthening support in education, housing and employment, and fostering a birth-friendly social atmosphere, said the Xinhua report.

The measures are designed for actively building a "new marriage and childbearing culture", noted Reuters Oct 28.

Tens of thousands of Chinese women of childbearing age are now being pursued through a vigorous campaign organised by vast district administrative networks. Grass-roots government workers have been mobilised to contact women in their neighbourhoods to urge them to get pregnant, said the scmp.com report.

The central government also hopes to learn why so many women are reluctant to have more children, and devise new policy options as a plummeting birth rate steers the country towards a demographic crisis, the report said.

A nationwide survey announced Oct 17 by China's Population and Development Research Centre sought to "obtain new data on views on marriage and fertility and key influencing factors".

A Sample Survey on Population and Family Development in China, approved by the National Bureau of Statistics on Oct 11 targeted women of child-bearing age – defined by the bureau as women aged between 15 and 49 – from about 30,000 families, covering 1,500 communities or villages across 150 counties.

Their responses showed strong grievance and anger against the country's past draconian one-child policy and antipathy towards marrying or having children in the post-Deng Xiaoping reform era of today.

Huang, a 35-year-old working mother of one son who lives in the southeast coastal province of Fujian, has said an overly enthusiastic social worker even asked about the timing of her most recent period and offered to give her a reminder call when it was "the right time" to conceive another baby.

She has cut short the government effort by telling the social worker that she had no immediate plans for a second child, that "I have no money, no time and no energy for a second baby."

Huang's sentiment was "very common", the scmp.com report cited district level officials from three coastal provinces as saying, speaking on condition of anonymity.

They have said many respondents had vented "strong grievances" about the country's recent past one-child policy as well as considerable worries about the economy and employment.

One official from Fujian, surnamed Lin, who was involved in the survey, has said many who had been fined by the government for breaching the previously strictly enforced birth control rule wanted the authorities to refund the penalties imposed on families.

China scrapped its decades-old draconian birth control policies in 2021, when Beijing raised the limit of children per family to three, and stopped imposing fines on families who exceed the quota.

Previously, couples who had more children than allowed were required by the local birth control department to pay "social maintenance fees", to have the child legally registered in the household.

In 2020, one couple in Guangzhou were fined nearly 320,000 yuan (US$44,870) for having a third child, the report said, citing mainland media reports.

Women of child-bearing in China are now being targeted by joint efforts of the "civil affairs, education, police, health, statistics, medical insurance, social security departments," who seek to "understand how many women in our district are of child-bearing age, their intentions to have more children, their physical condition and the family's financial condition."

Some districts even offered women who intend to have more children in the near future free folic acid supplements, to help reduce the chance of birth defects, a Guangdong district official surnamed Chen has said.

According to the China Population and Development Research Centre, in 2022, China's fertility rate dropped to 1.09, while the total fertility rate in Shanghai, one of China's wealthiest cities, dipped to 0.6 in 2023, according to the municipality, the report noted.

A replacement fertility rate of 2.1 children per woman is widely accepted as the necessary rate for a country's population to remain constant.

If China's fertility rate remains on its downward trajectory, for every child born in the future, six people will die – a trend that threatens to intensify the nation's demographic crisis, the report was stated to have warned.

China faces stormy future as confidence in Xi crumbles

29 October 2024, ANI

A File Photo of Xi Jinping at a Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference meeting in Beijing (File Photo/Reuters)

Recently circulating on social media was a photo of a Chinese soldier wedding his bride. Behind them, an enormous slogan was emblazoned: "Listen to Chairman Xi's command; Be responsible to Chairman Xi; Let Chairman Xi rest assured."

These were the kinds of slogans prevalent during the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s, promoting a personality cult for Mao Zedong.

There can be no questioning the centrality of Xi in China but as the country's economy increasingly struggles, many are questioning the direction Chairman Xi Jinping has taken China.

One who is critical of Xi is Desmond Shum, a Hong Kong-raised businessman who was once married to billionaire businesswoman Duan Weihong. Witnessing the direction Xi was taking China, Shum departed China in 2015 and, six years later, wrote Red Roulette, a book that describes corruption within the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

In mid-October, he posted public criticism of Xi on social media, saying, "Xi is systematically dismantling the most valuable asset of the CCP: public trust. Over the past few weeks, we've witnessed the wreckage of Xi's financial policies unfolding in real-time."

Shum continued: "To me, the more pressing issue isn't merely the financial mishaps but how Xi is eroding the longstanding trust and confidence the Chinese people once had in CCP governance. While this is probably unintentional on his part, it is definitely systematic and far-reaching."

He said previous Chinese leaders like Deng Xiaoping, Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao were generally pragmatic. "This created a bond between the CCP and the public, rooted in the belief that the party was steering China towards continued prosperity. However, Xi has systematically undermined this trust through a combination of political centralization, economic clampdowns and a stifling of civil society. His leadership marks a sharp departure from the more collective and pragmatic governance approach seen in previous administrations."

Shum highlighted seven specific areas of failure. The first is political centralisation and authoritarianism, as Xi concentrated power to a degree not seen since Mao. Secondly, he has suppressed civil society and freedoms through censorship, crackdowns on non governmental organisations and the treatment of Hong Kong.

Thirdly, Xi's anti-corruption campaign, initially popular, is now viewed as a political purge that has generated fear without rooting out corruption.

Fourthly, Xi has eroded longstanding institutional norms, such as senior cadre appointments and bureaucratic procedures.

Fifthly, Shum said, Xi is to blame for economic tightening and state control, as his focus on expanding the role of state-owned enterprises came at the expense of the private sector.

Sixthly, Xi grossly mishandled COVID-19, and this was perhaps the most damaging action he ever took. "After years of strict zero-COVID policies that ground daily life to a halt, the sudden reversal in late 2022 shocked the nation.

Particularly among younger generations, many view this as a defining moment of CCP mismanagement." Finally, Shum identified nationalism and Beijing's aggressive stance on Taiwan, the South China Sea and the Indian border is a mistake.

Shum concluded: "When Wen Jiabao famously remarked that 'confidence is more important than gold' in 2008, it underscored the essential role trust plays in governance. Yet Xi has worked relentlessly—albeit unintentionally—to erode that very confidence. His COVID management has shaken people's trust in his societal governance, and the ongoing stock market debacle calls into question his ability to lead China's economy. As trust in Xi's leadership falters, the road ahead looks increasingly bleak."

A Chatham House seminar on 24 September, titled "Can China still Prosper under Xi?" featured several experts, including Dr. Winnie King, Senior Lecturer in Chinese International Political Economy, University of Bristol. Asked about Xi's performance, she noted, "I think in terms of the international system's expectations of China, we're quite disappointed, mainly because there was a lot of hope that he would bring in reform..."

David Lubin, Michael Klein Research Fellow, Global Economy and Finance Programme, Chatham House, also participating in the seminar, said: "I think, if the question is, is he doing as much as he can do for the welfare of Chinese households, The answer is clearly no. But I don't think that's the question he's asking himself. The question he's asking himself is what can I do to promote the interests of the Chinese nation? And it's interesting that those two ideas that are so separate in the Chinese context [is] because of the way Xi Jinping feels himself to be encircled geopolitically. So economic policy is oriented around the need to protect China from geopolitical risk. From that point of view, he probably thinks he's doing quite well, but household welfare becomes a sort of sideshow."

An economic macro trend is evident. China benefitted greatly from wider access to the global economy when it joined the World Trade Organisation in 2001, but China's ability to generate structural growth started fading rapidly in the 2010s. Beijing's solution was to leverage—to borrow funds to buy investments—and so it went on a huge credit binge even whilst the West was deleveraging to repair balance sheets. From 2012-16, the Chinese corporate sector took on much of the burden as companies attempted to level up their business models and expand operations in the West.

Chinese household debt rose quickly at the same time. This was because China's business model was not about rewarding workers with greater wages, for that would hurt Chinese exports.

Instead, the easiest way for households to join the wealth creation craze was via the real estate market. As more houses were purchased, prices rose, and at last, the average Chinese person felt they were getting richer. In fact, property currently accounts for 62 per cent of Chinese household net worth, compared to just 23 per cent in the US.

However, Xi clamped down on the property sector as he signaled that paper wealth creation should be brought under control and as he promoted "common prosperity." The results were predictable, as the government could not deleverage a USD50-trillion real estate bubble in an orderly manner. As house prices fell, indebted households and developers sold off properties to fix their balance sheets. In a vicious cycle, fewer Chinese are seeking mortgages and less credit is available, causing prices to further tumble. Interest rates are dropping in China, and pressure on the Chinese yuan is building.

Incidentally, China will lift the retirement age from next year. Beijing listed factors for this, such as a rising life expectancy (78.6 in 2023 compared to 35 in 1949) and average years of education for new entrants in the workforce (14 years of education in 2023, versus eight years in 1982).

However, the real reason forcing this change is an ageing population, a plummeting birthrate and a tighter pension budget. Shum said 2008 was a watershed moment for the CCP when it realised the Western model had failings. Indeed, as the rest of the world reeled, Beijing emerged as something of a hero as the West relied on China to stabilise things. "That's the moment when the Chinese leadership really decided, 'Hey, their system is not that great; our system may not be that bad, so we need to find our own way. That's the moment everything changed,'" Shum said, well before Xi assumed the reins of power.

Concurrently, there was a diffusion of power throughout Chinese society, as private companies and wealthy individuals wielded more influence. Of course, this "was a problem for the party. The entire leadership sees that as a problem, but people are not sure what to do about it," Shum explained. It was at this point that Xi stepped in. Lubin described, under Xi's leadership, a change in balance of power between state-owned enterprises and the private sector to reduce the latter's influence.

He related, "Starting in 2015-16, you got this sense that economic policy was emphasising the idea of bigger, better, stronger state-owned enterprises," and the balance started to tilt towards the state sector from that time on. The crushing of the private sector followed in 2021, which is when "the most important policy phrase or slogan in this context was the struggle against the unrestrained expansion of capital, the idea that the private sector was taking advantage of its position, taking things that were not in the national interest."

There was even a Chinese proposal in December 2021 to create a traffic light system where the government would decide what investments in both the state and private sectors were good or not. This was a blatant attempt by the party to insert itself into the allocation of resources. Although the policy proposal died a natural death, it did reflect Xi's thinking about doing whatever it took to keep the CCP in power.

Shum continued, "I think by now probably the whole world is seeing that China is taking a different trajectory since [Xi] came to power a decade ago ... It's amazing how badly he's played his hand and taken the country in a different trajectory."

King described Xi as a combination of a Marxist and a nationalist. "...I think the nationalism side is very under-discussed." She also highlighted the global financial crisis of 2008 as being pivotal in China's future direction. "The Chinese with their economy [were] facing something fundamentally different than they had envisioned, because they were working within a system that was seen to be quite stable. But the global financial crisis demonstrated to the Chinese that there was actually something that didn't fit for them."

Added to that were geopolitical changes—such as Obama's pivot to Asia, Trump's stronger line and American efforts to contain China—and this caused Xi to consider "the context of how the Chinese Communist Party was going to legitimise themselves and ensure their regime security."

Rather than seeing him as a Marxist, Lubin believes Xi is more of a Leninist "in the sense that it seems fairly clear that Xi Jinping is an ideological leader. But the way one needs to understand ideology in this context is to understand it in a Leninist way. In other words, it's not a pure set of ideas—it's a set of ideas needed to keep the ruling party in power.

That is quintessentially a Leninist approach, and I think that's his approach." Shum, taking part in the same Chatham House seminar, gave this assessment of Xi. "First and foremost, we really need to see him as a man of conviction and belief. He's a man of conviction and belief; seeing him as a power-hungry dictator is really missing the point.

I think his vision for China is that it needs to be the primary geopolitical power, and rival, of the US. He believes the Chinese Communist Party should be the eternal ruler of China as a nation... You may not agree with his belief and conviction, and some of the worst tragedies of mankind in history happened [because of] people like Mao, like Hitler, like Stalin. Those were men of belief."

Shum warned: "A man with belief of the wrong kind can do the most damage to humanity, and I tend to believe he's that sort." He noted that for Xi, "the party interest comes first," rather than the people.

He said Xi set himself up for this declining state of affairs. By arresting hundreds of thousands, he was riding a tiger and cannot release his grip on power. As economic conditions worsen, Xi and his party core must increase their stranglehold over society because they are afraid of a backlash. However, Shum does not foresee a "collapse" of the CCP. He believes this is the wrong term; instead, he views it as a "long decline, because the CCP has such a complete hold on the country."

China has lost its luster for many foreign investors and for many Chinese. This year, China will experience its largest-ever outflow of high-net-worth individuals. In 2024, a record exodus of 15,200 wealthy individuals is expected, greater than the 13,800 who departed in 2023.

Illustrating how Xi's ideology means nothing to them, many pragmatic Chinese fear their wealth will be appropriated by the government. As Shum himself admitted, "As long as my money is in China, it's not really my money. The moment my money is out of China; that's my money!"

Village leaders facing spate of investigations

29 October 2024, China Daily

In the first nine months of this year, 77,000 current or former village heads and Party chiefs have been investigated in China, an increase of 31,000 compared to last year, as the central government's anti-corruption campaign delves deeper into the grassroots level.

Data from the country's top watchdog showed figures from January to September this year exceeded the total number of such officials investigated last year — 61,000 — with the supervision of grassroots officials being strengthened amid intensified rural vitalization efforts.

From January to September, disciplinary watchdogs handled 642,000 cases across the country, including investigations into officials at various levels, with 58 at the provincial and ministerial levels, according to a recent release from the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection.

Among the officials investigated, about 3,260 are at the department and bureau levels, 26,000 are at the county level and 89,000 are at the township level, data showed.

At the annual plenary session of the CCDI in January, the central leadership emphasized the need to extend the anti-corruption campaign to the grassroots level to better ensure justice for the people.

A targeted crackdown on corruption and misconduct in rural vitalization efforts was also stressed in the No 1 central document for 2024 released in February, which outlined the priorities for promoting rural vitalization this year.

As scrutiny on grassroots officials intensifies, cases of corruption involving village officials have been disclosed.

In September, Guizhou province revealed a case in which a village official was caught accepting kickbacks related to a toilet renovation project. And in another instance in August, a 32-year-old former village Party chief in Huizhou, Guangdong province, was found guilty of fraudulently obtaining compensation funds for crops.

Measures have been implemented to enhance the management and oversight of village cadres, especially those with significant responsibilities, as rural vitalization work progresses.

In November 2022, Guizhou issued regulations specifically targeting village heads to ensure they perform their duties with integrity. They encompass aspects such as standardizing village-level decision-making and implementing disciplinary supervision.

The document detailing the regulations stipulates that matters concerning village-level asset management must be deliberated by the village Party organization, and reported to the township Party committee for the record.

It also emphasizes strict implementation of the annual inspection system for rural collective assets and a regular reporting system.

It explicitly requires that supervision should be strengthened in villages with large collective economies, numerous construction projects and high integrity risks. Furthermore, each village Party organization under the jurisdiction of a county Party committee should be inspected at least once per term of service.

China takes down fake news about its military, closes social media accounts

29 October 2024, SCMP, Phoebe Zhang

Internet watchdog reports targets include false reports of 'cyberwarfare' in the South China Sea and other 'fantasy stories'

Chinese internet regulators are removing social media accounts that use fake information to hype the country's military strength, including false reports of "cyberwarfare" in the South China Sea.

A sample post from June on Douyin, China's version of TikTok, read: "Breaking news: China and the US engaged in 12 hours of cyber warfare, causing Luzon Island in the Philippines to lose all GPS, communication and phone signals!"

Another invented post in July featured a video delivering an in-depth explanation of how China had won in its rivalry with the United States, thanks to a technology breakthrough by telecoms giant Huawei which had upgraded China's radars.

In its latest report released on Monday, the Cyberspace Administration of China said the posts were promptly identified as rumours and removed. The accounts responsible invented "military fantasy stories" to give themselves a sense of satisfaction and fulfilment, it said.

According to the report, various military and local government authorities have recently removed a batch of accounts for "speculating and fabricating false information, misleading the public and distorting the image of military personnel".

Many of the accounts had been spreading military rumours and made-up history, the report said, naming two WeChat accounts that falsely said China had sunk four foreign ships.

Shanghai-based online news outlet The Paper appeared to be referring to the fabricated posts in July, when its representative asked defence ministry spokesman Zhang Xiaogang at a press conference about cyberwarfare chatter on social media.

Zhang told the assembled journalists that he had not heard of any such cyberwar occurring in the South China Sea.

According to the internet regulator's report, some social media accounts were removed because they "engaged in historical nihilism", a term that usually refers to present-day narratives that contradict the official version of history.

The report said these included two accounts on Zhihu – China's version of the question-and-answer platform Quora – which said "Japanese soldiers killed by guerilla warfare on the Chinese battlefield were only a small portion of the entire army".

Other accounts were removed for distorting the image and policies of the People's Liberation Army. A Douyin account said a man joined the PLA despite his family's objections and a few years later "all his mother got to see was his ash box".

Some accounts called for 200,000 of the country's troops to be discharged, saying it was too expensive to keep an army and such an action would ease China's current financial troubles, the report said.

The cyberspace administration also said it was unacceptable for e-commerce traders to lure buyers for their online products in the name of the military.

Some accounts on Taobao and Xianyu – China's biggest e-commerce platforms owned by Alibaba, which also owns the South China Morning Post – have been using PLA logos or claiming that products are "special supply in the military", it said.

The accounts mentioned in the report could no longer be found on social media platforms, but some of the content continues to linger in the form of shared posts and screenshots.

"We will continue to crack down on illegal actions of social media accounts in military-related news, investigate and punish account owners who publish and hype false information, and expose typical cases," the regulator said, and invited the public to report any examples they see.

Chinese authorities have little tolerance for the spreading of unconfirmed or negative information about the military.

In April 2018, the Standing Committee passed legislation banning the slander of "heroes and martyrs", imposing administrative penalties on anyone who damaged memorials or insulted and defamed war heroes and other national figures.

In 2017, a woman was briefly detained for alleging that a sexual harassment scandal around a Beijing kindergarten involved serving members of the PLA. Her accusations were later denied by the military.

Xi stresses enhancing inclusive public services for people

26 October 2024, Xinhua

Chinese President Xi Jinping has urged efforts to enhance inclusive public services for the people.

In a recent instruction on civil affairs work, Xi, also general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, emphasized the need to strengthen public services aimed at meeting the essential needs of the people and ensuring basic living standards for those facing difficulties.

Chinese Premier Li Qiang, also a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee, addresses a national civil affairs conference in Beijing, capital of China. The conference was held in Beijing from Oct. 25 to 26. [Photo/Xinhua]

Lauding the new progress achieved in all aspects of civil affairs in recent years, Xi urged Party committees and governments at all levels to follow a people-centered approach to resolve the most practical problems that are of the greatest and most direct concern to the people.

He called on civil affairs departments at all levels to promote the implementation of a proactive national strategy in response to population aging, and to improve work in social assistance, social welfare, social affairs and social governance.

Xi also emphasized the need for civil affairs departments to take the initiative in enhancing benefits for the people, meeting their needs and helping them overcome difficulties.

Xi's instruction was read out at a national civil affairs conference that was held in Beijing from Friday to Saturday. Premier Li Qiang, also a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, addressed the conference.

The advancement of Chinese modernization requires the continuous enhancement of civil affairs work to safeguard and promote the immediate interests of various groups, including people in difficulties and people with disabilities, Li said.

Li underscored the importance of doing the civil affairs work with profound feelings for the people and making solid progress to the satisfaction of the populace.

He also called for systematic efforts to plan and carry out reforms to break new ground in the civil affairs sector.

Speaking at the conference, State Councilor Shen Yiqin urged efforts to further improve the systems for social assistance and elderly care services. She also highlighted the importance of deepening reforms in funeral services and other fields, as well as boosting the development of charitable initiatives.

Model individuals and groups in the country's civil affairs sector were awarded at the conference.

Former Chinese Justice Minister Tang Yijun Arrested on Corruption Charges

24 October 2024, ChinaScope

Tang Yijun, China's former Minister of Justice, has been arrested on suspicion of accepting bribes, according to Xinhua News Agency. The Supreme People's Procuratorate has formally approved his arrest following an investigation by the National Supervision Commission.

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection and National Supervisory Commission previously revealed several allegations against Tang, including using his authority to help relatives secure financial business deals, improperly interfering in market economic activities and judicial proceedings, failing to properly supervise his spouse, using public power for personal gain through large-scale trading of power for money, and illegally accepting massive amounts of bribes in exchange for favors in business operations, company listings, promotions, and case handling.

Notably, Caixin Media reported that during Tang's two-and-a-half-year tenure in Liaoning Province, he helped Evergrande Group acquire controlling stakes in Shengjing Bank, which led to substantial bad debts. Evergrande also made significant real estate investments in Liaoning, leaving behind unfinished buildings when its capital chain broke.

Tang's career included extensive work in Zhejiang Province before becoming the Chairman of Ningbo CPPCC in 2011. He later served as Liaoning Province Governor and Minister of Justice (2020-2023). His last position was Chairman of the Jiangxi Provincial CPPCC before his dismissal from both the Party and public office. Sources indicate that most of the alleged violations occurred during his time in Ningbo and Liaoning.

China accuses Australia of 'systemic racism', 'hate crimes' after human rights concerns raised

24 October 2024, Nine News, Yashee Sharma

China has accused Australia of being "plagued by systemic racism and hate crimes" in retaliation to concerns raised about human rights abuses in Xinjiang and Tibet.

Australia's Ambassador to the United Nations James Larsen shared a joint statement with 14 other countries this week to urge China to uphold its international human rights obligations following findings of serious human rights violations.

But Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said those matters were China's "internal affairs" and pointed the finger back at Australia.

"Australia, long plagued by systemic racism and hate crimes, has severely violated the rights of refugees and immigrants, and left Indigenous people with vulnerable living conditions," he said yesterday.

"Australian soldiers have committed abhorrent crimes in Afghanistan and other countries during their military operations overseas."

Lin added that Australia, the US and other Western countries often turn a blind eye to the injustices at home.

China's top political advisor stresses forging strong sense of community for Chinese nation

24 October 2024, Xinhua

China's top political advisor Wang Huning has stressed forging a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation and advancing the development of a beautiful Xinjiang.

Wang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, made the remarks during a four-day research tour of the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region that ended on Thursday.

He called for solid efforts to promote ethnic unity in community-level governance, school education and people's daily life while visiting hospitals, primary schools and villages, and urged building a modern industrial system and enhancing higher education development when visiting enterprises and colleges. Maintaining social stability is a priority in Xinjiang-related work, Wang said, urging efforts to strengthen the sense of community for the Chinese nation among people of various ethnic groups by promoting fine culture in the region.

He also urged efforts to promote high-quality development in Xinjiang to consolidate the economic foundation for social stability and long-term security in the region.

West blasts China on rights, China responds: What about Gaza?

23 October 2024, Reuters, Michelle Nichols

Australia, the United States and 13 other countries criticized China at the United Nations on Tuesday over alleged human rights abuses in Xinjiang and Tibet, prompting China to denounce them for ignoring the "living hell" in the Gaza Strip.

Clashes over China's treatment of Uyghurs and other Muslims have become a common occurrence at both the United Nations in New York and the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva.

A U.N. report released two years ago said China's "arbitrary and discriminatory detention" of Uyghurs and other Muslims in its Xinjiang region may constitute crimes against humanity. It said that "serious human rights violations" had been committed.

"We urge China to uphold the international human-rights obligations that it has voluntarily assumed, and to implement all U.N. recommendations," Australia's U.N. Ambassador James Larsen told the U.N. General Assembly's human rights committee.

"This includes releasing all individuals arbitrarily detained in both Xinjiang and Tibet, and urgently clarifying the fate and whereabouts of missing family members," Larsen said.

He spoke on behalf of Australia, the United States, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Japan, Lithuania, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden and Britain.

Beijing has long denied all allegations of abuse of Uyghurs. China's U.N. Ambassador Fu Cong on Tuesday accused the group of Western states of resorting "to lies to provoke confrontations."

"The human-rights situation that should gather the most attention at the committee this year is undoubtedly that of Gaza," he said. "Australia and the U.S., among a few others, played down this living hell, while unleashing attacks and smears against the peaceful and tranquil Xinjiang."

'BIGGEST LIE'

Palestinian militants Hamas attacked Israel on Oct. 7, 2023, killing 1,200 people and abducting some 250 others.

U.S. ally Israel retaliated in Gaza, where Gaza authorities say more than 42,000 people have been killed and almost everyone in the enclave of 2.3 million displaced.

Fu said if the Gaza death toll was not enough to "awake the conscience of a few Western countries ... then their so-called protection of human rights of Muslims is nothing but the biggest lie."

Independent U.N. human-rights experts criticized mostly Western states last month for supporting Israel despite its actions in Gaza.

Delivering the U.S. statement to the committee, deputy U.S. Ambassador Lisa Carty said Washington was calling for an immediate ceasefire in Gaza, the immediate release of hostages held by Hamas and for Israel to allow more aid into the enclave.

"We continue to condemn (China's) ongoing atrocities in Xinjiang, repression of Tibetans, crackdown on Hong Kong's democratic institutions, and use of transnational repression to silence those abroad," said Carty.

Pakistan's U.N. Ambassador Munir Akram read a statement to the rights committee on behalf of 80 countries that said any issues related to Xinjiang, Hong Kong and Tibet were internal matters for China. The group also said it opposed politicization of human rights and double standards.

"No country has a perfect human-rights record. But no country is above fair scrutiny of its human-rights obligations," Australia's Larsen said. "It is incumbent on all of us not to undermine international human-rights commitments that benefit us all, and for which all states are accountable."

China eyes 'top-tier industrial workforce' by 2035, vows hi-tech training, talent support

22 October 2024, SCMP, Vanessa Cai

Guidelines jointly issued by party Central Committee and the State Council come amid record youth joblessness and the continuing US tech war

China aims to boost training, support and "ideological guidance" for its industrial workforce, to create a highly skilled talent pool as the country doubles down on hi-tech development.

The goals were laid down in a set of guidelines issued jointly by the Communist Party Central Committee, the core leadership body of the ruling party, and the State Council – China's cabinet.

According to the guidelines, the country will focus on training to drive the development of "a top-tier industrial technical workforce" and provide talent and skill support for "Chinese-style modernisation".

The industrial workforce is "the backbone of creating social wealth, and a key force in implementing innovation-driven development strategies and accelerating the construction of a manufacturing powerhouse", the document released on Monday but dated October 12 said.

It also called for efforts to "unite and guide industrial workers to play a leading role in the construction of Chinese-style modernisation".

Main goals listed included "solidifying ideological and political guidance" for the workforce, and improving its overall quality "with an ever-expanding team of knowledgeable, skilled, and innovative industrial workers".

The country also aims to produce around 62,000 "master artisans" by 2035, including 2,000 defined as "national-level craftsmen", according to state news agency Xinhua's report on the guidelines.

The party's top leadership has repeatedly called for technological innovation as the country focuses on self-reliance and "new quality productive forces" amid a tech war with the United States, which has sought to curb China's hi-tech access.

According to Monday's guidelines, the training system should be improved so the workforce can meet emerging industry needs.

Modern vocational education will be improved to integrate practical training, along with the creation of quality courses and teaching teams. Skilled professionals will be encouraged to become educators, and teaching capabilities should be improved to set up vocational schools that meet international standards.

Improved worker welfare is also among the national goals for 2035, with the guidelines calling for a better support system for the career development, labour rights and well-being of industrial workers. This should be done through higher pay based on skills and innovation, and by ensuring job security with written contracts and labour dispute resolution mechanisms.

Another focus is protection of intellectual property rights related to innovation, and guiding skilled workers to take part in major technological projects and awards.

Meanwhile, working environments should be improved to "enhance the appeal of manufacturing jobs" for young people, the guidelines said, at a time when China is battling record joblessness among the 16-24 age group.

Migrant workers will be provided with skills training as well as support for their integration into cities. This will be done by relaxing rules related to hukou – or household registration – so they can better access social welfare where they live for work.

In emphasising the need to "strengthen ideological and political guidance", the guidelines said this aimed to ensure loyalty to the ruling party.

It called for efforts to promote the party's "innovative theories" among industrial workers and "to deepen education on socialist core values".

'Confident' China should relax grip on cultural, information exchange: academic

20 October 2024, SCMP, Jane Cai

Too many Chinese scholars fail to properly engage with their overseas peers, leading to worsening decoupling, professor warns

China should cut red tape around international cultural exchanges and relax its internet controls to prevent the worsening of its information "decoupling" from the world, a leading academic said.

Wang Wen, dean and professor of the Chongyang Institute for Financial Studies at Renmin University, noted that China had become a target for criticism by Western countries as Beijing pursued a bigger say in the global narrative.

"China has solved the problems of hunger and poverty. Now it's time to address the problem of being scolded," he wrote in last week's issue of Think Tank: Theory & Practice, the bimonthly journal published by the Chinese Academy of Sciences and Nanjing University.

According to Wang, he has witnessed many awkward moments when Chinese scholars at overseas symposiums were asked "sensitive questions" on topics ranging from China's leadership moves to human rights concerns in Xinjiang or Tibet. Wang said he had attended events in more than 20 countries since China removed its pandemic curbs in 2022, and seen many scholars fail to properly address queries from overseas audiences.

Other subjects that Chinese academics find difficult to handle at these events include China's battle against Covid-19, social governance, and cross-strait tensions with Taiwan, according to the article.

Wang suggested that these difficulties could arise because of insufficient language skills, limited knowledge of the matters raised, or that the speaker may "have some concerns", which he did not specify.

Many Chinese scholars chose to resort to the "official narrative" to explain what was happening in the country to foreign peers, instead of providing their own perspectives as public intellectuals, he wrote.

"If American scholars only repeated the White House's policy advocacy or remarks of the US president, [it would be impossible for] the US to take the leading position in the world's narrative system for such a long time."

China has tightened speech controls as it prioritises national security amid the rivalry with the US and its allies, creating a tense environment for people to speak freely especially on controversial and politically sensitive issues.

Meanwhile, at the third plenum – a key Communist Party conclave which concluded in July – the party's elites agreed to "establish a more effective international communication system", as well as expand cultural exchanges and cooperation to benefit China's development.

In his article, Wang noted that Chinese academics went through lengthy scrutiny for approval from their employers to be interviewed by overseas media, go abroad for seminars, or receive visiting foreign peers.

The process "seriously hampers exchanges of views and opinions", he wrote. "China should thoroughly simplify the approval procedures, get rid of the formalism and stop overstretching the concept of national security to facilitate international communication."

Wang also turned his attention to the Great Firewall – China's sophisticated internet censorship system – which he said had "semi-decoupled" Chinese academia from the world and led to slow progress in efforts to catch up in technology and social sciences.

China's internet controls made it hard for researchers to use foreign search engines and access overseas websites. Instead, most had to rely on domestic search engines which were at least a decade behind more advanced systems, he wrote.

According to Wang, information decoupling threatens to be even more devastating for China in the age of artificial intelligence.

He argued that if Chinese content could not flow freely and merge into the databases used to feed AI models, Beijing's narrative would be at a disadvantage in international communications.

Wang called for the gradual removal – region by region – of the Great Firewall, to stop the developing trend of "parallel worlds" from worsening as China gradually became more disconnected from the outside world.

He also suggested that China should expand its visa-free policy to visitors from more countries to improve people-to-people exchanges.

At present, foreign nationals from 54 countries – including the US, Canada, and Britain – are eligible for 72/144-hour visa-free entry if they have a valid onwards ticket to another country. There are also exemptions for cruise ship passengers.

China's "strict disciplines, complicated procedures and prevalent formalism" were unnecessarily depressing international exchanges as well as other aspects of people's lives, according to the article.

Wang said that during his visits to cities such as Paris, Berlin and Istanbul he had enjoyed the relaxed lifestyle, chatting with friends and reading newspapers over coffee. China should be similarly confident and loosen controls over cultural exchanges, he added.

In Wang's own experience, he wrote that he usually enjoyed sharing information and taking part in the heated debates and brainstorming of overseas seminars. The talks were "straightforward", he said. "No empty talks."

Xi Jinping again urges his troops to be ready for war

20 October 2024, Tibetan Review

Amid unprecedented purges in the top military brass, a volatile situation in the South China Sea, warmongering over Taiwan, and a refusal to back down from a military standoff with India in the latter's eastern Ladakh border area, China's President Xi Jinping has again called on his troops to strengthen their preparedness for war. The latest call has come just days after Beijing staged large-scale military drills around Taiwan on Oct 14.

Xi made his comments while visiting a brigade of the People's Liberation Army Rocket Force on Oct 17, reported the AFP Oct 19, citing state-run broadcaster CCTV.

The military should "comprehensively strengthen training and preparation for war, (and) ensure troops have solid combat capabilities", CCTV was stated to have quoted Xi as saying.

Soldiers must "enhance their strategic deterrent and combat capability," Xi has said.

He has also said Chinese military must "strongly safeguard the country's strategic security and core interests."

The dispute between China and Taiwan dates back to a civil war in China in which the Kuomintang nationalist forces of Chiang Kai-shek were defeated by Mao Zedong's communist fighters and fled to the island in 1949.

China has vowed to take Taiwan ever since, while the latter claimed to be the legitimate government of China and he held the country's UN seat, with the veto power, until it lost that to the communist-ruled China in the 1970s.

The independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party, which now holds Taiwan's presidency, has called the island a sovereign country, with President Lai Ching-te rejecting China's claim to be its motherland during his Oct 10 national day speech. It prompted China to react with its latest war drills around the island as a stern warning to the "separatist acts" of "Taiwan Independence" forces.

China said Oct 16 that it will never give up its commitment to use force against Taiwan, which it wants to accept its "One China Policy".

China's increasing passport controls evoke Mao era

18 October 2024, VOA

The Chinese government has been acting to restrict travel outside the country by ordering some teachers, civil servants and executives of state-owned enterprises to hand in their passports.

Analysts say that under President Xi Jinping, Beijing is reinstating some internal controls not seen since the era of communist China's founder, Mao Zedong.

Hong Jingfu, a professor in the political science department at Taiwan's National Cheng Kung University, told VOA Mandarin the Chinese Communist Party's confiscation of the passports aims to prevent foreign infiltration and secrets from being leaked.

Hong said the CCP is also worried that as people's confidence in the economy slows, they will become less loyal to Xi's regime and China's system, and that personnel and capital will flee the country.

Hong said Xi is taking China back to the Mao era path of "internal control and external defense," of closing the country to the outside world, because the CCP fears sharing the fate of its Soviet counterpart, which collapsed in 1991.

"Under the so-called overall national security concept, his demand for security is constantly rising, which, in fact, is ironically highlighting that China's so-called 'four self-confidences' Xi promotes is [just] more lying and boasting," Hong said.

Former Chinese President Hu Jintao in 2011 announced the so-called "Three Self-Confidences," promoting China's socialist path, theories and system. Xi in 2016 added a fourth one, socialist culture, as a way of cementing his authority and pushing for more communist and nationalist propaganda in education.

The Financial Times reported October 6 that since last year, an increasing number of schoolteachers and public sector employees in China have been required to hand in their passports, and those already abroad have been told to avoid contact with "foreign, hostile forces."

Chinese authorities have always regarded "instilling loyalty in students" as a top priority. The FT reports the passport controls aim to prevent teachers from being "ideologically polluted by foreign forces" and spreading ideas that are deemed ill-suited for the country.

It's not the first time in modern China that authorities have seized the passports of large categories of key workers. Radio Free Asia reports authorities ordered teachers to hand in their travel documents as early as 2018.

A university professor surnamed Li in China's southeastern, coastal Fujian province, who didn't want to give his full name due to the sensitivity of the issue, told VOA Mandarin that his university since 2019 has required teachers at the rank of associate professor and above to hand in their travel documents.

Even retirees are required to hand in their passports and entry and exit documents, he said, and department heads will only get them back five years after retirement.

Li said if a professor wants to travel abroad, they must report to their supervisor the country they are going to, the number of days they will be there, the purpose of the trip and the source of funds before they can get their passport back.

Li said the university also requires that passports be turned back in within five working days after returning from abroad.

The school did not give them a detailed explanation for the policy, said Li, telling its staff only that it's to ensure that the teaching, research and management work "maintains normal order" and is in line with the "spirit of the relevant documents of the superiors."

Legal authority for Chinese universities to require custody of passports and travel documents appears to be dubious. Article 16 of China's Detailed Rules for the Implementation of the Law on the Administration of the Exit and Entry of Chinese Citizens states that no organ, organization, enterprise, institution or individual other than the public security organ, the original document-issuing authority, the people's procuratorate, or the people's court may revoke or confiscate people's identification documents.

Observers told VOA Mandarin the practice increased significantly after Xi came to power in 2012. The Chinese government last year tightened restrictions on private overseas travel by civil servants and employees of state-owned enterprises, including banning overseas travel, vetting overseas relations, and strengthening approvals and confidentiality training.

Li believes his university's policy was prompted by government fears that teachers may leak sensitive research information or fail to return to China at all.

Hong, of National Cheng Kung University, says the control of passports also aims to keep middle-class people from leaving the country in order to restore consumer confidence and consumption levels.

China's economic downturn has led to a drop in consumer confidence and spending among the middle class that Beijing has tried to reignite with a series of stimulus measures.

But Hong said the CCP's passport controls are restricting economic activities and discouraging international exchanges that could help grow the economy.

"Actually, you are accelerating your so-called internal disintegration because there is no way to solve your internal contradictions," he said.

Despite the increasing number of passports reported seized, analysts say it's impossible for China to close off as much as it was under founding leader Mao, when everyone needed permission to travel abroad and being granted a passport was rare.

Wang Jian, a commentator living in the U.S. who used to work for the Hong Kong Economic Times, Ming Pao Daily News and Sing Tao Daily News, told VOA Mandarin that since China's reform and opening up after Mao died in 1976, there is no way to close the country as it depends on exporting products and importing raw materials.

"China's current foreign trade model has determined that China's door cannot be closed," he said. "Second, the Chinese people [would] not accept it."

During the COVID-19 pandemic, Chinese authorities implemented strict controls on movement, including travel abroad, and stopped issuing new passports for nearly three years to try to control the spread of the virus.

The restrictions led to rare public protests against authorities known as the "White Paper Movement."

China again ranks as the country with worst internet freedom, Myanmar giving it company this time

17 October 2024, Tibetan Review

China has done it again, sharing the spot this time with Myanmar: the country with the world's worst environment for internet freedom, according to the annual ranking by the US-based Freedom House, which released its report Oct 16.

For the past decade, China has consistently ranked last in the world for internet freedom due to its all-pervading online surveillance and content control system dubbed the "Great Firewall," noted the edition.cnn.com Oct 17.

The organisation's 2024 Freedom on the Net (FOTN) report assessed internet freedom based on data collected from Jun 2023 to May 2024 in terms of obstacles people face accessing the internet, limits on content and violations of users' rights. China and Myanmar both scored 9 out of 100 in internet freedom, the lowest among all the countries assessed.

The report says China intensified its efforts to seal off its domestic internet from the global network, blocked international access to certain official websites, and imposed hefty fines on individuals using virtual private networks (VPNs).

"Beijing has persisted in its effort to isolate China's domestic internet from the rest of the world, blocking international traffic to some government websites and imposing huge fines on people using VPNs. The Chinese government also continued to systematically repress dissent, for example by censoring online discussions about activist and journalist Sun Lin, who died in November 2023 after police beat him in apparent retaliation for his social media posts about protests against the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) leader Xi Jinping," the report says.

China's censors have reined in blogs, US search giants, and social media – even regulating "likes" of public posts, the report said.

The report from Freedom House, a US government-funded NGO, has found that global internet freedom has declined for the 14th consecutive year.

As expected, China has rejected the report's findings. Its Ministry of Foreign Affairs said Oct 16 that "Chinese citizens enjoy all rights and freedoms in accordance with the law."

"this so-called report is completely false and has ulterior motives," the edition.cnn.com reported quoted Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning as saying.

Gansu, Association of Disciples Member Deprogrammed—to Atheism

16 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Fang Yongrui

After deprogramming, a former devotee acknowledges he is "his own God" and promises he "will only believe in science and the government."

There has been a new developments during and after COVID in the Chinese fight against the xie jiao—"movements spreading heterodox teachings" (sometimes less precisely translated as "evil cults")—which are mercilessly persecuted. To Falun Gong and The Church of Almighty God a third group has been added as a "direct threat to national security," the Association of Disciples.

The Association of Disciples (门徒会, Mentuhui) is a Christian new religious movement established by Ji Sanbao (季三保, 1940-1997), who was previously part of the True Jesus Church, in 1989. It faced a ban in 1990, was listed as one of the xie jiao, and experienced intense persecution.

From 2020, a national campaign of annihilation was launched against the Association of Disciples, which, like other forms of "illegal" religion, has experienced a new growth during the COVID-19 pandemic.

Movements like the Association of Disciples provided religious reasons for why God permits natural disasters. They suggested they can be used by believers for spiritual growth, drawing in those unhappy with state-controlled churches, which during COVID only repeated the government's slogans.

Members of the Association of Disciples assert that their movement imparts the "teachings of the Third Redemption" (三赎教), indicating it as the third symbol of salvation following Noah's ark and the cross of Jesus Christ.

Deprogramming, a practice banned as a crime in most democratic countries, consists in submitting believers to threats, pressures, and intense indoctrination in a confined setting, until they renounce their faith. In China, deprogramming is routinely used by the state to persuade xie jiao devotees to abandon their religious movements. A "success story" from Gansu recently published by the China Anti-Xie-Jiao Association, which claims to be the largest anti-cult organization in the world and is directly controlled by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), sheds light on a feature of Chinese deprogramming. It does not limit itself to break the faith of xie jiao members. It wants to lead them to atheism.

Anti-cult poster: how the state will smash the Association of Disciples. From Weibo.

In the story, a member of the Association of Disciples, after having been arrested, is submitted to deprogramming. While the report tries to attract the attention of the readers to the usual tragic story of how the devotee did not provide medical care to his son, who died, relying on prayer only, the interesting part concerns the atheistic outcome of the deprogramming process. The devotee, we read, "woke up as if from a dream. When he first joined the cult, he was confused about 'what kind of 'God' is the 'true God.' Now he finally found the answer to this question: respect your parents, love your wife and children, work hard, be down-to-earth, advocate science, and love life, so that you can be your own 'God.'"

Confirming he had been successfully deprogrammed, in the end the former devotee proclaimed: "I will never believe in the 'Three Redemption Christ' thing again. I will only believe in science and the government."

These are the Chinese citizens the horrific system of deprogramming and torture aims to produce. Citizens who do not believe in God but are persuaded they are "their own God," and "only believe in science and the government."

China cracks down on Communist party officials for reading banned books

12 October 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidson and Chi-hui-Lin

Hillary Clinton and Hannah Arendt thought to be among authors of books procured by officials, as Xi Jinping tightens grip on Communist party
When Lam Wing-kee ran his bookshop in Hong Kong, filled with controversial and political titles banned in mainland China, many of his customers were Chinese Communist party officials.

Back then, in the early years of Chinese leader Xi Jinping's reign, and before Lam was detained by Chinese authorities for his work, the officials would load up boxes of books on CCP politics, Chinese economics, and scandal, often taking them back over the border.

"CCP officials would look for books about what's going on in China, about changes in the top rank officials, who gets the most power, changes in the power and the struggle between them, etcetera," Lam tells the Guardian, suggesting officials were often buying the books to learn about what was going on inside their own party.

"Some of my customers were high-ranking members of the CCP," he said.

But today, such purchases are coming back to bite their buyers. Several recent corruption cases against CCP officials have included accusations of procuring or reading banned materials. The officials have so far received internal disciplinary actions, including being expelled from the party, but observers are watching to see if criminal charges follow.

In September a former municipal level official in Heilongjiang, Li Bin, accused of corruption, was also found to have "privately read an illegal publication containing contents that undermined the unity and solidarity of the Party", according to state media. He was expelled from the Party and his case given to prosecutors.

That same month, Cheng Zhiyi, former party secretary of Chongqing's Jiangjin district, was also expelled. Among the accusations were "losing ideals and beliefs" after he privately read books and magazines with "serious political problems" while "outside the country".

Henan official Yang Lei also was accused of "losing ideals and beliefs and abandoning the original mission" when he violated "political discipline and national laws", including bringing prohibited books into the country, according to CCTV in August.

A recent report by the South China Morning Post said at least a dozen cases this year had prominently included accusations of reading or procuring banned materials, up from seven last year. They emphasise illicit reading ahead of other crimes like bribery.

Wen-ti Sung, a nonresident fellow with the Atlantic Council's Global China Hub, attributes the rush of punishments to new performance targets for party discipline bureaucrats tasked with "punishing those who are deemed disparaging of the party's image, principles, or policies, as well as those who are in possession of material that could have such effect."

"The Chinese Communist party champions itself as always 'great, glorious, and correct'. This image of infallibility must not be challenged, lest it threatens the governing legitimacy of the party," he said.

None of the corruption cases publicly reveal what reading materials the fallen cadres had accessed. But a list of banned titles published by China Digital Times offers some possibilities. The list includes writings on Chinese politics and history, including the Tiananmen Square massacre and the disastrous Mao-era policies that saw millions die from famine, violence, and political purges. There are books scrutinising the modern CCP's politics and power, or sharing the views of political enemies and critics like Hong Kong tycoon and activist Jimmy Lai, the exiled Tibetan Dalai Lama, and Bo Xilai, the fallen political foe of Xi Jinping. Hillary Clinton's memoir is on the list, as is Machiavelli's The Prince, and Hannah Arendt's The Origins of Totalitarianism.

Many of the banned books line the shelves of Lam's new shop in downtown Taipei, which he reopened in 2020 after fleeing to the Taiwanese capital in exile.

Xi's leadership has been particularly noteworthy for its purges of political rivals and crushing of factionalism. Discussion, criticism, even gossip, has become more and more dangerous for those trying to survive politically.

As Xi's grip tightens, it will be interesting to see if the illicit reading cases move beyond Party disciplinary proceedings and start to attract criminal charges, says law Prof Margaret Lewis, of Seton Hall University.

"It's not like in the past people would be like 'I'll just take an unauthorised biography of Bo Xilai down the coffee shop'. But it's a matter of turning up the temperature, not totally changing the climate" says Lewis.

"But it goes to show the power of information and books. They care enough to say this is punishable infraction."

China's Li Xiaopeng, son of former premier Li Peng, signals end to closely watched career

12 October 2024, SCMP, Sylvie Zhuang

The former transport minister, a member of one of China's most powerful families, takes semi-retirement role on political advisory body

Li Xiaopeng, son of former Chinese premier Li Peng, has taken a semi-retirement role on the country's top political advisory body, drawing an end to the closely watched political career of a member of one of China's most powerful families.

Li was assigned the role of deputy director of the economic affairs committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), state news agency Xinhua reported on Friday.

The position is commonly seen as a semi-retirement role without actual decision-making power in Chinese politics. The decision was announced at a two-day meeting of the advisory body's standing committee that concluded on Friday.

Li served as Communist Party chief of the Ministry of Transport from May 2023 until his title was removed at the end of September, three months after he turned 65 – the de facto retirement age for ministerial-level officials in China.

Li was born in June 1959 in Beijing. He earned a bachelor's degree from North China Electric Power University, where he studied electrical engineering. He started his career as a technician at the system institute of the China Electric Power Research Institute in 1982 and rose through the ranks to become the head of the system institute in 1990.

He worked in the power industry until 2008, eventually becoming chairman of Huaneng Power, one of the country's biggest electricity producers.

This was followed by eight years of leadership experience in coal-rich Shanxi province, where he was governor and deputy party chief from 2013 to 2016.

Li became China's transport minister in 2016.

Li's career moves have attracted attention within China as he is the son of Li Peng, who served as China's premier from 1987 to 1998 and was one of the country's most influential – and controversial – political leaders.

Li Peng died in 2019 at age 90 in Beijing. As the only Chinese leader to serve as both premier and chairman of the national legislature, he wielded tremendous influence during his career.

As premier, he was openly at odds with party general secretary Zhao Ziyang during the student-led pro-democracy protests in the summer of 1989.

On May 20, 1989, Li appeared on national television and officially declared martial law in Beijing. This eventually led to the bloody Tiananmen Square crackdown on June 4 of that year, and his name was often associated with the incident.

In a rare move for a Chinese leader, Li Peng published a memoir in 2014 about his early political career, though he omitted the sensitive episodes of the later years.

While former paramount leader Deng Xiaoping picked Jiang Zemin to replace Zhao in 1989, Li remained premier until 1998, when he became chairman of the National People's Congress Standing Committee, cementing his position as the second most powerful man in China at the time. He retired from politics in 2003.

Li Peng's family has been powerful in China's energy sector for many years. His daughter, Li Xiaolin, has been called China's "power queen", holding top jobs in various state-owned energy giants until her retirement in 2018.

Li Xiaopeng is the only child of Li Peng to have entered politics.

China's finance minister says there is room for more economic stimulus but offers no plan

12 October 2024, AP, Ken Moritsugu

The Chinese government is looking at additional ways to boost the economy, Finance Minister Lan

Fo'an said Saturday, but he stopped short of unveiling a major new stimulus plan that analysts and stock investors were hoping for.

Lan's remarks left the door open for such a plan in the future but he did not divulge what is under consideration.

"There are other policy tools that are being discussed that are still in the pipeline," he said at a news conference, adding that there is "ample room" in the government budget to raise debt and increase the deficit.

China's economy has remained sluggish despite the lifting of COVID-19 restrictions at the end of 2022. Companies have cut back on hiring and wages and a prolonged downturn in the property market has deflated consumer confidence, curbing spending.

The government has raised pensions and offered subsidies to people who trade in old cars or appliances for new ones, but such steps have failed to jolt economic growth.

Chinese stock markets rallied after the central bank and other government agencies announced steps at the end of September to revive the property sector and prop up financial markets.

But the rally has since cooled amid concern about whether the moves were enough to generate a sustainable economic recovery. Investors were hoping Lan would announce a stimulus package of up to 2 trillion yuan ($280 billion).

The finance minister instead said the government would roll out a package of incremental measures to speed up implementation of its existing policies.

They include increasing scholarships for students, issuing bonds to help major banks replenish their capital, and providing more support to highly indebted local governments, some of which have had to curtail public services.

China's political advisors urged to contribute to country's cultural advancement

12 October 2024, China Daily

China's top political advisor Wang Huning on Friday called on the country's political advisors to continue conducting research and deliberating on matters revolving around deepening reform in the cultural sector.

Wang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference National Committee, made the remarks at the closing meeting of a standing committee session of the CPPCC National Committee.

Political advisors were asked to pool wisdom for building up the country's cultural strength.

Wang also called on them to firmly uphold the CPPCC system, effectively run the CPPCC and fully leverage its political advantages.

Japan urged to investigate China's transnational repression operating in the country

11 October 2024, Tibetan Review

As the exile Tibetan administration advised overseas Tibetans not to submit or even remain silent but report and publicize when subjected to transnational repression by China, New York-based Human Rights Watch has issued a report Oct 9, saying people from Xinjiang, Tibet, Inner Mongolia and other places in the People's Republic of China (PRC) living in Japan had been subjected to such repression in recent times.

The report said that interviews with 25 people, including from Xinjiang, Tibet and Inner Mongolia, revealed that Chinese police or the Chinese Embassy in Japan had contacted them or their relatives in the PRC, pressuring them to end their activities in Japan. The interviewees were stated to have participated in nonviolent activities, such as organizing public events to draw attention to human rights abuses in Xinjiang, promoting Tibetan culture, and hosting book discussions featuring works by Inner Mongolian activists.

The group has urged the Japanese government to call on China to end its surveillance and threats against those living in Japan.

It has also urged Japan to establish a system to report such incidents and provide protection.

The group, which has posted its report on its hrw.org website, said a woman was arrested in 2023 upon returning to Hong Kong for posting pro-democratic comments online during her studies in Japan, while another individual who promoted Tibetan culture in Japan was told to return to Tibet to renew their passport.

Also, a man from Xinjiang has said that when he received a call from a relative asking him to return home, a police officer came on the line and told him he "could not guarantee what would happen to your family" unless he complied with the relative's request. He was later contacted on a messaging app by a police officer telling him to provide information about activists in Japan, Human Rights Watch said.

A person from Taiwan who had participated in activism related to Hong Kong while in a third country has reported having received multiple invitations from the Chinese embassy to go and "retrieve important documents". The person was stated to have declined the offer, fearing detention or reprisal.

China has previously been reported to have set up illegal police stations, disguised as facilitation centres for overseas Chinese, in a number of countries to carry out its transnational repression. When exposed, China's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning said at a press conference, "All our actions are carried out in accordance with laws and regulations."

Teppey Kasai, Asia program officer at Human Rights Watch, has said, "Japan should promptly establish a national system to investigate cases of transnational repression with appropriate safeguards for individuals' privacy."

On Oct 7, the exile Tibetan administration, known as the Central Tibetan Administration, based in Dharamshala, India, called the Chinese government's conduct a violation of international law. It urged anyone who come under such pressure to publicize it before the media with proof thereof. It also suggested that such targeted Tibetans should report the same with all the relevant details to their concerned host governments, or the CTA Representative offices, or Settlement Heads, or the Department of Security, as the case may be.

The call was part of a nine-point guideline for overseas Tibetans desiring to visit Tibet and China.

Political disloyalty being emphasized in China's anti-corruption investigations

09 October 2024, Tibetan Review

As President Xi Jinping tightens control, demanding absolute loyalty from more than 99 million members of the Communist Party of China (CPC), officials put under investigation for corruption are increasingly being accused primarily of having read forbidden publications, which is cited as proof of their disloyalty.

While such reading bans in China are believed to date back decades, the recent uptick in naming and shaming appears to coincide with last year's amendment of the party disciplinary regulations, which greatly expanded the clause related to reading unapproved materials, noted the scmp.com Oct 7.

Those who privately read, browse or listen to publications and make irresponsible comments on the party Central Committee's major policies, vilify the image of the party and the country, or slander leaders will be issued warnings, the amended clause is stated to stipulate. If the circumstances are serious, such persons could be removed from party positions. Deng Yuwen, former deputy editor of Study Times, the newspaper of the cadre-training Central Party School, has said reading and circulating some sensitive materials within the party was common. This had long been impossible to ban, even in Mao Zedong's era, he has added.

"It is not a big deal if they are not under disciplinary investigation, but it can be major evidence of disloyalty when [the top watchdog] finds them."

Allegations of reading politically forbidden books have appeared in at least a dozen corruption case readouts so far this year – compared to around seven last year, the report said.

Similar accusations have been made by anti-corruption bodies in at least five other provinces this year.

One of the recent examples is Li Bin, a former vice-director of the municipal legislature of Mudanjiang in northeastern Heilongjiang province. He was expelled from the Communist Party on suspicions of corruption late last month.

At the top of the allegations made public was the accusation that he privately read an "illegal publication" with content that would "jeopardise the unity of the party", with the municipal corruption inspectors not leading the charges with claims of corrupt dealings.

This was in keeping with a norm in which political disloyalty is always the first charge listed, the report noted.

Similarly, Cheng Zhiyi, 61, former party secretary of Chongqing's Jiangjin district, was also accused of possessing and reading forbidden books. The southwestern city's corruption investigators issued an announcement on his wrongdoings, saying he was accused of "reading overseas books and periodicals with serious political problems".

Though the investigators did not name the books claimed to have been found in the allegedly corrupt officials' possession, the "forbidden books" are generally believed to include but not limited to those that examine a sensitive period for the party. These include insider stories about the struggle of the party and its leaders; the Chinese Civil War; the Anti-Rightist Movement of the 1950s; the Great Leap Forward (1958-62); the Three Years of Hardship famine (1959-61); the Cultural Revolution (1966-76); and the Tiananmen crackdown in 1989.

A 2021 customs document is stated to define articles that are prohibited and restricted from entering and leaving China. These include printed materials, films, photos, records, audio and video tapes, laser discs and computer storage media that are harmful to China's politics, economy, culture and morality.

A statement released by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), China's top political disciplinary and anti-corruption body, was on Sep 12 stated to have accused Zhang Zulin, former vice-governor of southwestern Yunnan province, of possessing and reading forbidden books.

The 65-year-old retiree was stated to have been accused of "losing his political ideals and aspirations, forming political cliques ... and possessing and reading books, periodicals and audio-visual products with serious political problems" in private.

Three days earlier, the anti-corruption watchdog in Jiangxi province was stated to have accused Gan Chengjiu – a former general manager at the local government-owned Jiangxi Financial Holding Group Ltd – of bringing "reactionary books into the country" and reading them privately, along with other political disloyalty and corruption charges.

Japan: Chinese Authorities Harass Critics Abroad

09 October 2024, HRW

Beijing's Transnational Repression Hinges on Threats Against Families in China

Chinese authorities are seeking to intimidate people from China living in Japan who take part in activities critical of the Chinese government, Human Rights Watch said today.

The Chinese government's harassment of people from China, including those from Xinjiang, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia, and their family members back home, appears aimed at deterring members of the diaspora from protesting against the government or engaging in events deemed politically sensitive. The Chinese authorities have also sought out diaspora members to provide information on others in Japan.

"Chinese authorities appear to have few scruples about silencing people from China living in Japan who criticize Beijing's abuses," said Teppei Kasai, Asia program officer at Human Rights Watch. "The Japanese government should make clear to Beijing it won't tolerate the long arm of China's transnational repression in Japan."

Between June and August 2024, Human Rights Watch interviewed 25 people from Hong Kong and mainland China, including from Xinjiang, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia, who were living in Japan. All had been involved in peaceful activities that the Chinese Communist Party deems unfavorable or threatening to one-party rule; such as holding public events to raise awareness about crimes against humanity in Xinjiang, promoting Tibetan culture, or having a reading club discuss a book by an activist from Inner Mongolia.

Most of those interviewed said that the Chinese police have contacted them or their relatives back home, pressuring them to end their activities in Japan. Several provided logs of messages from the Chinese social media platform WeChat, recordings of video calls, and CCTV footage that corroborated their accounts.

One person said they stopped participating in any politically sensitive in-person and online activities after receiving a call from Chinese authorities in 2024. Another who initially agreed to be interviewed later decided not to participate out of fear that Chinese authorities would retaliate.

Several ethnic Uyghurs from Xinjiang said that Chinese authorities contacted them through their relatives back home. The police then called them on WeChat and told them to either stop their anti-Chinese government activities in Japan or pressed them to share information about Japan's Uyghur community, including the members of the advocacy group Japan Uyghur Association.

Several people from Inner Mongolia involved in promoting language rights and peaceful self-determination for Inner Mongolians, an ethnic minority, said that Chinese authorities had contacted them, often through their relatives back home.

A person from Tibet who promotes Tibetan culture in Japan said that when they went to the Chinese embassy in Tokyo to renew their passport, embassy officials told them they needed to return to Tibet to do so. A person from Taiwan previously involved in Hong Kong's pro-democracy activism in a third country said the Chinese embassy sent them multiple invitations to "retrieve important documents." Both people said they rejected the embassy's recommendations, fearing they would be detained or face punishment.

Chinese authorities have violated the rights of Chinese nationals who return home. In 2023 Hong Kong police arbitrarily arrested a 23-year-old Hong Kong woman upon her return to the city for pro-democracy comments she posted online while studying in Japan.

Several people said they did not seek help from the Japanese police as they did not believe Japanese authorities could provide any remedy, or feared reprisals or making the situation worse for themselves and their relatives back home.

Human Rights Watch shared its findings and wrote to the Chinese embassy in Japan for comment, but they have not responded. Japan's Foreign Ministry declined to comment, and the National Police Agency did not respond to a Human Rights Watch letter requesting information about their response to China's efforts at repression in Japan.

In recent years, the Japanese government has become increasingly vocal about the Chinese government's human rights violations, including raising the issue with Chinese officials, and with resolutions in parliament to monitor the cases.

The term "transnational repression" is increasingly used to refer to state actors reaching beyond their borders to suppress or stifle dissent. Nationals or former nationals living in another country, members of diaspora communities, and those living in exile are particularly vulnerable.

The Japanese government should recognize the threat posed by the Chinese government's repression of Chinese nationals abroad, and help protect their basic rights by establishing a system for residents in Japan to report such incidents, Human Rights Watch said.

Such a system should have appropriate safeguards for individuals' privacy, facilitate criminal investigations in cases in which Japanese law has been violated, and protect people who have contacted the authorities to report credible cases from deportation and extradition. People who face such pressure should be advised of their right to seek asylum or other forms of protection.

The Japanese government should call on the Chinese government to end its surveillance and threats against those living in Japan. On June 26 Japan joined 54 countries from all regions at the UN Human Rights Council in condemning transnational repression and pledging to hold those responsible to account. Japan should also coordinate with other governments and UN bodies to protect those at risk.

"Japan should review its policies to establish support mechanisms to help those facing Chinese government harassment," Kasai said. "Japan should promptly establish a national system to investigate cases of transnational repression with appropriate safeguards for individuals' privacy."

For select accounts of Chinese government harassment of Chinese nationals living in Japan, please see below.

The names, dates, and personal information of those interviewed have been withheld for their protection.

Pressuring Relatives in China

A.B. is from Inner Mongolia, a region of northern China where ethnic minority Mongols who mainly speak Mongolian comprise 17 percent of the population. A.B. came to Japan for work in 2018 and said he joined peaceful protests in Japan against the Chinese government's policy of replacing Mongolian with Mandarin Chinese at schools. He said:

In response to the language issue, I felt that if I didn't say anything myself, we [eventually] wouldn't be able to do anything, so I started expressing my opinions against the Chinese government, against Beijing.... At first, I didn't disclose my name and face, I wore a mask. My [relatives] were worried about me. I wasn't sure about my future, I didn't have capacity to think about it.... I eventually found a job [in Japan], and that's when I went public with my face and name.

Since going public, A.B. said that officials of the local public security bureau – China's police – in Inner Mongolia have visited his relatives, who are not politically active. Two CCTV videos both timestamped on the same date in 2022, provided by A.B. and verified by Human Rights Watch to have been filmed in Inner Mongolia, show a car with sirens marked “public security bureau” driving up to his relative’s home. Three men, one apparently wearing a local public security bureau uniform, enter the home of A.B.’s relatives. A few minutes later, the three men are seen escorting A.B.’s relatives from their home:

The officials told my [relatives] they wanted to ask a few questions about some photographs, but that they couldn’t show [the photographs] to them there, so they asked my [relatives] to come to the closest public security bureau office. They showed my [relatives] photographs posted online by an Inner Mongolian group [in Japan] and said I was in them. My [relative] just said these are probably fake.

Subsequently, A.B. said the local public security bureau told his relatives to sign documents declaring that A.B. would not participate in any protests in Japan, which they refused to do:

At the time, my [relatives] just told [the authorities] they couldn’t read the Chinese characters.... [My relatives] told me at the time that these documents may be unfavorable to me because I’m participating in protests.... They knew what the document said to a certain extent.

A.B. said that while he does not believe he is doing anything wrong by participating in protests, at times he feels afraid. Worst of all, he said, is that he feels guilty that the local police are questioning and threatening his relatives in Inner Mongolia because of his activities in Japan:

In Japan, it’s normal for people to interact with the police, including when they lose their belongings. But in Inner Mongolia, you don’t interact with the police unless there’s a serious incident. My [relatives] tell me they’re afraid of the pressure they’re feeling [from the police], and that has been tough on me.

F.G., who is also from Inner Mongolia, has lived in Japan for about two decades and has been participating in public protests since the early 2000s. He said that in 2019, as he prepared to protest Chinese President Xi Jinping’s attendance at the G20 leaders’ summit in Osaka, Japan, police officers visited his relatives back home:

They intimidated my relatives, asking them to tell me that I’m committing a crime against the [Chinese] state. They took down all of my relatives’ contact information. My [relative] was afraid, telling me, “So many police officers came to our house because of you. Our [relatives] are getting older, could you please stop?” ... Since then, my [relative] cut off contact with me.

R.S. moved to Japan from Xinjiang in the early 2000s and began participating in protests in 2009. Since then, R.S. said that the Chinese police have contacted his relatives in Xinjiang a number of times, who then urged him to stop his activities in Japan.

R.S. said such harassment has taken a mental toll on his family. In early 2024, a police officer in Xinjiang again called his relative back home, asking for details about him and his family in Japan:

They called my [relative], asking for details such as where we live and what we’re doing.... My [relative] was panicking, saying “We already told them once, isn’t that good enough? What else do they want?” They called my [relative] again twice.... Apparently, they spoke to my [relative] in a terrible manner, and my [relative] couldn’t take it so [the relative] threw the phone, breaking it into pieces.

S.T., who is also from Xinjiang and moved to Japan in the early 2000s, said he began privately supporting a local advocacy group in 2008 to raise awareness of human rights issues in Xinjiang. He said he was regularly in touch with his relatives back home, but the situation changed in 2017, when his relatives suddenly began asking him to come home. S.T. said:

One day, I was having another phone call with a [relative], rejecting his request for me to come home, and a police officer got on the phone. He told me, “Listen to your [relative], or I can’t guarantee what happens to your family.” That’s when I realized they were being forced to tell me to come home.

S.T. said that was the last time he spoke to that relative. Subsequently, in 2018, S.T. said a police officer repeatedly messaged him on WeChat:

I asked him, “What do you want?” He said, “Don’t have such a negative attitude and instead show loyalty to the central [Chinese] government.... If you provide information about activists in Japan, I can solve the issue involving your family very quickly.” I told him, “I’m not going to cooperate with someone who won’t let me contact my family, so don’t call me,” and I hung up.

After his interaction with the police officer, S.T. said he tried calling his relatives, but no one picked up. He believes his relatives were afraid of picking up a phone call from a foreign number

Restricting Freedom of Movement

A.B. said that Chinese authorities have restricted his relatives’ freedom of movement, presumably because they are related to A.B.:

Last May, I invited my [relatives] to Japan, so I asked them to get passports. They went to the local public security bureau, and when they typed my name into their system, the word “national security personnel” came up in red.... They couldn’t have their passports issued.

In 2024, A.B. said Chinese authorities again blocked his relatives from getting their passports:

When my [relative] found out their passport couldn’t be issued, I think they were crying. So I told them, you don’t need to come [to Japan]. I told them it’s okay. That’s when I had the realization that maybe I won’t be able to see them again.... The last time I saw them was in 2018 before I came to Japan.

A.B. says he cannot visit Inner Mongolia to see his family as he believes Chinese authorities will detain him: "I'll be detained if I return so I don't have any plans, this is something I'm mindful about.... My [relatives] told me, 'We'll kill ourselves if you're detained.'"

Targeting Commonplace Activities

Chinese authorities have been targeting and attempting to shut down commonplace activities in Japan, such as a reading club. J.K., from Inner Mongolia now living in Japan, said that a local police officer reached out to his relatives back home after he began organizing a reading club in 2024 that focused on a book written by an academic and activist from Inner Mongolia. He said:

The police told my relatives that I was part of a reading club that was discussing a book by a well-known academic and activist from Inner Mongolia, and that it's an "anti-China" gathering.... My relatives were very nervous, asking me why I'm not simply focusing on my research and why I'm participating in "anti-China" activities. They asked me if I'm a "Han traitor." I told them, "How could you call me that?" and I got very upset. We fought. I asked my relatives, "Which law am I breaking here?" And they told me, "Laws are meaningless, if the [Chinese] government says someone is bad, then that person is bad." They told me they just want to live safely and told me not to do anything dangerous.

Subsequently, the same police officer added J.K. on WeChat:

I spoke to him on WeChat. I asked him, "What do you want to talk about?" and he simply said "Talk." I asked him, "Please ask me a question," and he said, "Did you host this reading club?" I told him I did, and he said I should just pretend I didn't, so he asked me to clarify in writing that I did not host it. The police officer told me what to write.

Fearing for the safety of his relatives, J.K. sent a written statement to the police officer on WeChat. He also said that the police officer effectively asked him to spy on others, including by attending events, taking photographs of others, and sending information to him, which he refused.

J.K. said that he did not consult Japanese police about this incident because he fears the situation could get worse, and his relatives back home could face retribution.

Repressing Freedom of Expression and Assembly

X.Y., who is from mainland China, said that he moved to Japan in 2023 as he felt the Chinese government's increasing repression against those in the arts.

X.Y. said that after he moved to Japan, a Chinese police official reached out to his family in China in 2024, asking for the details of his WeChat account.

Fearing for his family's safety, X.Y. told his family to have the officer reach out to him directly:

[The officer] initially called my family [in China]. My family asked me, "Do you know why the public security agency wants your phone number?" At the time, the authorities didn't know I was in Japan, so they called my family thinking I was with them. I don't know if they were intending on intimidating my family, but it had an impact on them.

Subsequently, a public security official contacted X.Y. on WeChat and asked him to refrain from certain activities online, which Human Rights Watch is withholding for his security. X.Y. said the call changed his behavior in Japan, and that he still fears for the safety of his family in China:

I haven't received a call from them since, but I think this is because I stopped uploading material on sensitive topics and limited my activities.... I'm still affected by this. My family is in China, so there's a possibility they're being threatened as well.... Although I came to Japan, I don't think my freedom of expression is being protected.

X.Y. said that he did not ask Japanese authorities for help, as he believes that may put his family at greater risk of Chinese government retaliation:

Even if there were a hotline [to ask for help], I don't think I would use it. My family is still in China, and there's not much the police in Japan can do regarding what China's public security agency does. If I were to coordinate with the Japanese police, or not pick up a call from Chinese authorities, there's a possibility the situation may get even more complicated.... I don't know what will happen when I go back to China next time to see my family.

In late November 2022, thousands of people in China's cities took to the streets in what became known as the "White Paper" protests, to demonstrate against the government's "Zero Covid" measures and, for some, the Chinese Communist Party's authoritarian rule. People from China held similar protests in Japan. M.N., who was involved in organizing one of the protests in Tokyo, said that he received a call from an official at the Chinese embassy in Japan before one of the gatherings, asking him to cancel the protests. M.N. said:

When the "White Paper" protests were happening in China, we decided to also organize protests in Japan.... The Chinese embassy saw a poster about it, and they called me, asking me to stop.... Afterward, they called the Japanese language school I was attending and told them to stop my activism.... My teacher is from China, and he told me, "Please stop any political activities, or quit the school yourself."... I quit and now attend a vocational school to learn about the internet.

M.N., who was detained several times in China for participating in human rights activism, said that after he moved to Japan in 2022, a police officer visited his family in China. Police also called M.N. directly on WeChat in late 2022. M.N. provided a recording of the video call between him and two men, one of whom is wearing a police uniform with a visible six-digit identification number. The police officer asked M.N. if he was still in Japan, about his studies, and about his social media activities. They told him he should “focus on himself” and “study well.” M.N. said: “After the call with the police, my family called me and told me to stop my activism, to study well, get into a Japanese university, and not participate in anything political.”

China throws the book: more corruption suspects hit with claims of illicit reading

07 October 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Growing number of disgraced officials being accused by anti-corruption agencies of reading forbidden books, cited as disloyalty to the party

Reading publications with “serious political problems” has become an increasingly common accusation levelled at disgraced officials by China’s anti-corruption agencies, who cite it as proof of disloyalty.

Among them is Li Bin, a former vice-director of the municipal legislature of Mudanjiang in northeastern Heilongjiang province. He was expelled from the Communist Party on suspicions of corruption late last month.

However, municipal corruption inspectors did not lead with claims of corrupt dealings. Instead, at the top of allegations made public was the accusation that he privately read an “illegal publication” with content that would “jeopardise the unity of the party”.

It was in keeping with a norm in which political disloyalty is always the first charge listed.

A few days earlier, Cheng Zhiyi, 61, former party secretary of Chongqing’s Jiangjin district, was also accused of possessing and reading forbidden books. The southwestern city’s corruption investigators issued an announcement on his wrongdoings, saying he was accused of “reading overseas books and periodicals with serious political problems”.

Cheng and Li are among a growing group of disgraced Chinese officials who are being accused in public by corruption fighters at various levels of reading publications not endorsed by the authorities. While the investigators did not name the books claimed to have been found in these officials’ possession, the accused are generally understood to have read political books that had been published outside mainland China and quietly carried across the border.

It is generally believed that “forbidden books” include but are not limited to those that examine a sensitive period for the party.

These include insider stories about the struggle of the party and its leaders; the Chinese Civil War; the Anti-Rightist Movement of the 1950s; the Great Leap Forward; the Three Years of Hardship famine; the Cultural Revolution; and the Tiananmen crackdown in 1989.

Publications on these subjects and others are forbidden by Chinese authorities and the act of carrying them across the border violates customs regulations.

A 2021 customs document defines articles prohibited and restricted from entering and leaving China. These include printed materials, films, photos, records, audio and video tapes, laser discs and computer storage media harmful to China’s politics, economy, culture and morality.

According to a tally by the South China Morning Post, allegations of reading politically forbidden books have appeared in at least a dozen corruption case readouts so far this year – from around seven last year.

Similar accusations have been made by anti-corruption bodies in at least five other provinces this year.

Deng Yuwen, former deputy editor of Study Times, the newspaper of the cadre-training Central Party School, said reading and circulating some sensitive materials within the party was common. This had long been impossible to ban, even in Mao Zedong’s era, he said.

“It is not a big deal if they are not under disciplinary investigation, but it can be major evidence of disloyalty when [the top watchdog] finds them.”

Zhang Zulin, former vice-governor of southwestern Yunnan province, was accused on September 12 of possessing and reading forbidden books, according to a statement released by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), China’s top political disciplinary and anti-corruption body.

Zhang, who is 65 and retired, is accused of “losing his political ideals and aspirations, forming political cliques ... and possessing and reading books, periodicals and audiovisual products with serious political problems” in private, according to the CCDI. The CCDI statement also announced that Zhang would be stripped of party membership and handed over to the judiciary for trial.

Three days earlier, the anti-corruption watchdog in Jiangxi province accused Gan Chengjiu – a former general manager at Jiangxi Financial Holding Group Ltd – of bringing “reactionary books into the country” and reading them privately, along with other political disloyalty and corruption charges.

Jiangxi Financial Holding is wholly owned by the eastern provincial government.

While such reading bans in China are believed to date back decades, the recent uptick in naming and shaming appears to coincide with last year's amendment of the party disciplinary regulations, which greatly expanded the clause related to reading unapproved materials.

Those who privately read, browse or listen to publications and make irresponsible comments on the party Central Committee's major policies, vilify the image of the party and the country, or slander leaders will be issued warnings, the amended clause stipulates. If the circumstances are serious, such persons could be removed from party positions.

As economic challenges and security threats linger, China marks 75 years of Communist Party rule

01 October 2024, PBS, Adam Kemp

China is marking the 75th year of Communist Party rule as economic challenges and security threats linger over the massive state.

No festivities have been announced for the occasion Tuesday, save for a flag-raising ceremony at Tiananmen Square, with an honor guard marching from the entrance of the sprawling palace that in past centuries was the home of Chinese emperors. The entirely state-controlled media ran constant reports on China's economic progress and social stability, with no mention of challenges ranging from a declining birth rate to the disruption in supply chains that has harmed the largely export-driven economy.

Commemorations were also held in the former British colony of Hong Kong and Portugal's former territory of Macao, both of which returned to Chinese sovereignty in the late 1990s in a key indication of Beijing's determination to overcome what it has called a "Century of Humiliation."

In recent decades, China has mounted military parades and displays of the country's economic might only at the turn of decades, such as for the 60th and 70th anniversaries.

The world's second largest economy has struggled to regain momentum after the COVID-19 pandemic.

A prolonged property slump led to a spillover effect on other parts of the economy, from construction to sales of home appliances. Last week, China announced a slew of measures to boost the economy, including lower interest rates and smaller down payment requirements for mortgages.

Party leader and head of state Xi Jinping has largely avoided overseas travel since the pandemic, while continuing with his purges at home of top officials considered insufficiently loyal or being suspected of corruption or personal indiscretions.

"The road ahead will not be smooth, there will definitely be difficulties and obstacles, and we may encounter major tests such as high winds and rough seas, or even stormy waves" Xi warned during a banquet on the eve of the anniversary.

"We must be vigilant in times of peace, plan ahead, and rely closely on the entire Party, the entire army, and people of all ethnic groups across the country" he said, "no difficulties can stop the Chinese people from moving forward."

The anniversary also comes as China is facing growing frictions with neighbors including Japan, South Korea and the Philippines over territorial claims and their close relationships with Beijing's chief rival, the United States.

The Communists under Mao Zedong seized power in 1949 amid a civil war with the Nationalists, also known as the KMT, led by Chiang Kai-shek, who shifted their political, economic and military power to the now self-governing island democracy of Taiwan. Beijing continues to insist Taiwan must be annexed under Communist Party rule, by force if necessary, while the U.S. has provided arms to ensure its defense.

China, meanwhile, has involved itself in disputes over its claims to most of the South China Sea and uninhabited islands held by Japan, the Philippines, Vietnam and other neighboring nations.

China's military buildup and its recent launch of a nuclear capable ballistic missile into the Pacific Ocean have raised concerns about a possible conflict.

At home, Xi has made himself effectively leader for life by ending term limits and extending his power over key government and party bodies. China allows no competitive elections and the party retains near total control over the media that informs its 1.4 billion people.

September

Building on Past Achievements and Forging Ahead Together Toward a Community with a Shared Future for Mankind

29 September 2024, MFA

Mr. President, Colleagues,

Today, humanity has once again come to a historical crossroads. We are facing a changing and turbulent world. Challenges of insecurity, imbalanced development and ineffective governance are increasingly prominent. Hotspot conflicts, major-country confrontation and geopolitical tensions keep emerging. The future of this planet is becoming a cause for growing concern. Meanwhile, we are also embracing a world full of hope. Multipolarity and globalization have become the unstoppable trend of our times. The aspirations of the Global South nations for modernization has never been stronger. Our stride toward modernization has never been more steadfast.

Statement by H.E. Wang Yi
Member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China At the General Debate of the 79th Session of The United Nations General Assembly New York, September 28, 2024

This institution, the United Nations, embodies the aspirations of people across the world for lasting peace and common prosperity, and bears witness to the glorious journey of the international community coming together in pursuit of progress. President Xi Jinping stressed on multiple occasions that the role of the U.N. should be strengthened, not weakened. Amid global transformation not seen in a century, what China calls for is to follow the trend of the times, keep to the direction of human progress, and make the right choices of history. What China proposes is to uphold peaceful coexistence and put in place a security architecture that ensures enduring stability; uphold openness and inclusiveness and foster a development paradigm that promotes shared prosperity; uphold harmony without uniformity and adopt an approach to civilizations that promotes exchange and mutual learning; and uphold fairness and justice and develop a governance structure that pools strengths for shared benefit.

In today's world, the security of all countries is tied together. In face of various kinds of global challenges and risks, no one can stay immune or enjoy security alone. Countries need to be guided by a vision of common, comprehensive, cooperative and sustainable security. We should respect each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity, take the legitimate security concerns of others seriously, and resolve disputes and differences through dialogue and consultation. We should actively explore a path for major countries to coexist in peace, and work for a new type of international relations characterized by mutual respect, fairness, justice and win-win cooperation.

In today's world, the development of all countries is deeply integrated. If the rich get richer while the poor remain poor, then "everyone is born equal" would become an empty slogan, and fairness and justice would be even more elusive. Achieving modernization is a legitimate right of the people of all countries, not a prerogative of a few. We should be committed to advancing global modernization, and ensure that no one and no country is left behind on the journey toward modernization. We should advocate a universally beneficial and inclusive globalization, unequivocally oppose unilateralism and protectionism, and help developing countries leap over the development divide, to maintain the vitality of global economic growth.

In today's world, each civilization has its own strengths. President Xi Jinping pointed out that there is no such thing as a superior or inferior civilization, and civilizations are different only in identity and location. We should respect the diversity of civilizations, and strive to replace estrangement and clash of civilizations with exchanges and mutual learning. We should advocate humanity's common values, namely, peace, development, equity, justice, democracy and freedom, refrain from conducting values-oriented diplomacy, and oppose ideology-based confrontation. We should respect each other as equals, and help each other succeed with an inclusive mind. In today's world, countries should all enjoy sovereign equality. As a large number of Global South nations are growing with a strong momentum, gone are the days when one or two major powers call the shots on everything. We should advocate an equal and orderly multipolar world, and see that all countries, regardless of their size, have their own place and role in the multipolar system. We should practice true multilateralism, oppose hegemonism and power politics, and make international relations more democratic. We should follow the principle of extensive consultation and joint contribution for shared benefit, and make global governance more just and equitable.

Mr. President,

Peace is the most precious thing in our world today. You may wonder if there is a path leading to peace. In fact, peace is the path. Without peace, development will not sustain; without peace, cooperation cannot happen. For the sake of peace, a single ray of hope is reason enough not to give up; the slightest chance deserves a hundredfold effort.

An end to the Ukraine crisis remains elusive. The top priority is to commit to "no expansion of the battlefield, no escalation of fighting and no provocation by any party," and push for deescalation of the situation as soon as possible.

China is committed to playing a constructive role, engaging in shuttle mediation and promoting talks for peace, not throwing oil on the fire or exploiting the situation for selfish gains. At this session of the General Assembly, China, Brazil and other Global South countries have jointly launched the group of Friends for Peace. Its very purpose is to uphold the purposes and principles of the U.N. Charter, build consensus for a political settlement of the crisis and contribute to a prospect of peace.

The question of Palestine is the biggest wound to human conscience. As we speak, the conflict in Gaza is still going on, causing more civilian casualties with each passing day. Fighting has spread to Lebanon; might must not take the place of justice. Palestine's long-held aspiration to establish an independent state should not be shunned anymore, and the historical injustice suffered by the Palestinian people should not be ignored any longer. There must not be any delay in reaching a comprehensive ceasefire, and the fundamental way out lies in the two-State solution. China has always been a staunch supporter of the just cause of the Palestinian people to regain their legitimate national rights, and a staunch supporter of Palestine's full U.N. membership. We have recently helped to bring about breakthroughs in intra-Palestine reconciliation, and will continue to work in concert with like-minded countries for a comprehensive and just settlement of the question of Palestine and durable peace and security in the Middle East.

The issue of Afghanistan concerns regional peace and security. It is important to help Afghanistan exercise prudent governance, fight terrorism effectively, improve people's life and reinvigorate the economy, to open up a better future for the Afghan people.

The Korean Peninsula should not experience war again. The important thing is to make persistent effort for deescalation, commit to seeking solutions through dialogue and consultation, realize a transition from the armistice to a peace mechanism, and safeguard peace and stability on the Peninsula.

China is deeply aware that Asia needs stability and development and opposes division and conflict. As an important origin of human civilization and a key engine of global growth, Asia has the wisdom and capability to stabilize the situation through regional cooperation and handle differences properly through dialogue and consultation. We are firmly against the meddling by countries outside the region, and will resolutely resist attempts by any force to stoke trouble and confrontation in the region.

Mr. President,

As the world faces increasingly serious challenges, China has never opted to be an indifferent spectator. Instead, we have been playing a bigger part in global governance than ever before. President Xi Jinping has put forth the Global Development Initiative, the Global Security Initiative and the Global Civilization Initiative in recent years. They carry China's wisdom for resolving various difficult issues confronting humanity, and bring impetus from China for improving global governance.

In the face of uneven and inadequate global development, China's proposal is to put development at the top of the global agenda, focus on delivering the Sustainable Development Goals of the U.N. 2030 Agenda, increase input in development, and help developing countries better respond to different risks and challenges. At the recent Beijing Summit of the Forum on China-Africa Cooperation, President Xi Jinping outlined 10 partnership actions to be taken together with Africa to advance modernization, and announced the decision to give over 40 LDCs, including those in Africa, zero-tariff treatment for 100 percent tariff lines. China is the first major developing country and the first major economy to take such a significant step.

In the face of unilateral, bullying acts such as sanctions and blockade, China firmly supports countries in defending their legitimate rights, upholding the equity and openness of the international system, making global development more coordinated and beneficial for all, and jointly opposing technology blockade and rejecting decoupling or severing supply chains. Sanctions and pressure will not bring monopolistic advantages. Suppressing and containing others will not solve problems at home. The right of people of all countries to pursue a better life should not be taken away. Here, we once again urge the United States to completely lift its blockade, sanctions and terrorism-related designation against Cuba.

In the face of aggravating ecological challenges, China is firmly committed to a path of green, low-carbon and sustainable development. We will move from carbon peaking to carbon neutrality in the shortest time span in world history, contributing China's efforts to harmonious coexistence between humanity and nature. At the global level, the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities must be upheld, and the Paris Agreement must be implemented in earnest. Developed countries should assist developing countries in building their capacity to cope with climate change. Touting the need of climate response while suppressing the green industries of others will only hold back global progress in green transition.

In the face of burgeoning artificial intelligence (AI), China is committed to taking a people-centered approach, developing AI for good, and putting equal emphasis on development and security. We are working to explore and establish widely-recognized international rules and standards. China supports the U.N.'s role as the main channel for global AI governance and is committed to strengthening international cooperation on AI capacity-building. China has put forth the AI Capacity-Building Action Plan for Good and for All, and is ready to make more contributions to the sound, orderly, fair and inclusive development of AI. In the face of the task of human rights protection, China maintains that all countries' right to independently choose their path of human rights development should be respected. No country should impose its own will on others, or arbitrarily interfere in others' internal affairs citing human rights as an excuse. In human rights protection, China is committed to putting people first and promoting the free and well-rounded development of the people. We have found a path of human rights development that suits China's national conditions. China is ready to engage in dialogue and exchanges with all countries and U.N. human rights bodies on an equal footing, and jointly promote the sound development of the global human rights cause.

Mr. President,

Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory. This is the history and the reality. Both the Cairo Declaration and the Potsdam Proclamation stated in explicit terms that all the territories Japan had stolen from the Chinese, such as Taiwan and the Penghu Islands, shall be restored to China, and this constitutes an important part of the post-war international order. Right here in this august hall 53 years ago, the 26th session of the U.N. General Assembly adopted Resolution 2758 with an overwhelming majority, deciding to restore all the rights of the People's Republic of China at the U.N., to recognize the representatives of the Government of the People's Republic of China as the only legitimate representatives of China to the U.N., and to expel forthwith the representatives of the Taiwan region from the U.N. and all the organizations related to it. Once and for all, the resolution resolved the issue of the representation of the whole of China, including Taiwan, in the U.N. It made clear that there is no such thing as "two Chinas," or "one China, one Taiwan." On this matter of principle, there is no gray zone or room for ambiguity. The complete reunification of China will be achieved. Taiwan will eventually return to the embrace of the motherland. This is the overwhelming trend of history that no one and no force can stop.

Mr. President,

In a few days' time, the People's Republic of China will celebrate the 75th anniversary of its founding. Over the past 75 years, no matter how the world changes, China's dedication has not changed. It is dedicated to pursuing happiness for the Chinese people and the rejuvenation of the Chinese nation. It is also dedicated to human progress and world harmony. In the course of seeking its own development, China has kept in mind the common interests of the whole world, generating new opportunities for the world through its own development. Not long ago, the Third Plenum of the 20th CPC Central Committee made an important decision on further deepening reform comprehensively to advance Chinese modernization. It set in motion a new journey where China joins hands with the world in common development and progress.

Chinese modernization will contribute robustly to world peace and stability. The Chinese culture values peace, and the Chinese nation has no tradition of external expansion. China, once a victim of foreign power bullying, knows full well the value of peace and the hard-won gains of development. In fact, China is the only major country that has written peaceful development into its constitution, and the only country among the five nuclear-weapon states to pledge no-first-use of nuclear weapons. We are actively exploring and putting into practice the Chinese way of addressing hotspot issues, boosting the prospects for resolving the security dilemma and improving security governance, and paving the ground for conflict settlement and peacebuilding. Every step in China's development is an increase in the force for peace.

Chinese modernization will contribute robustly to the common development for all. China does not only care about its own development. We are ready to develop hand in hand with all countries. By further expanding high-standard opening up, China is aligning proactively with high-standard international economic and trade rules to foster a market-oriented, law-based and world-class business environment. China has realized full mutual visa exemption with many countries, and is expanding its unilateral visa waiver program to facilitate two-way personnel flows. China is vigorously promoting high-quality Belt and Road cooperation, a concrete step to support the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. China will also speed up the implementation of the eight measures in support of Global South cooperation and the series of initiatives supporting Africa's peace and development, in order to help countries in the Global South stride toward modernization.

Chinese modernization will contribute robustly to improving global governance. China has been an abiding supporter of the U.N.'s continued reform and development to bring about a modernized "U.N. 2.0." The international financial system needs to be more fit for the times and global governance should be more balanced and effective. China will continue to fulfill its international obligations, provide financial support and send our best minds to the United Nations. The U.N. system needs to respond to the legitimate calls of developing countries and increase the representation and voice of those in the Global South.

Chinese modernization will contribute robustly to the advancement of human civilization. Chinese modernization is rooted in China, but has also drawn on the achievements of other civilizations. It has created a new form of human advancement, and provided a new choice to other countries in exploring modernization paths. China believes that different civilizations should respect and learn from one another, and jointly contribute to the progress of human civilization. China has proposed the setting up of an International Day for Dialogue among Civilizations. We call for more people-to-people exchanges and cooperation across the world, to strengthen mutual understanding and amity among people of all countries.

Mr. President,

Next year will mark the 80th anniversary of the victory of the World Anti-Fascist War and the founding of this very Organization. China stands ready to work with all countries to renew the founding purposes and mission of the U.N., reaffirm our steadfast commitment to the U.N. Charter, advocate and practice true multilateralism, build a community with a shared future for mankind, and jointly usher in a better world.

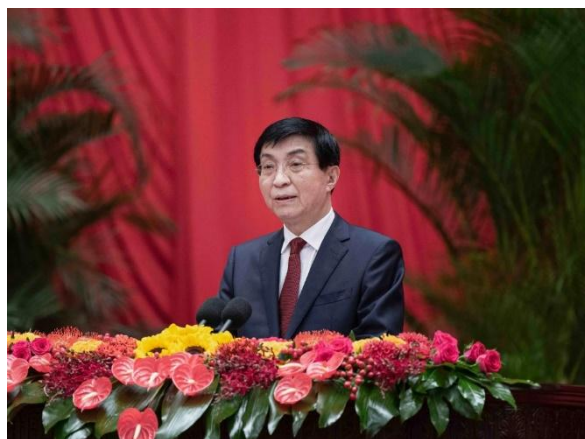

Thank you.

China's top political advisor calls for broadest patriotic united front at National Day reception

29 September 2024, People's Daily Online

China's top political advisor Wang Huning on Saturday called for consolidating and developing the broadest possible patriotic united front to rally the people's support, foster consensus, and pool their strength to advance Chinese modernization.

Wang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political

Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), delivers a speech at a reception to celebrate the upcoming 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China, in Beijing, capital of China, Sept. 28, 2024. The reception was jointly held by the General Office of the CPPCC National Committee, the United Front Work Department of the CPC Central Committee, the Overseas Chinese Affairs Office of the State Council, the Hong Kong and Macao Affairs Office of the State Council, the Taiwan Affairs Office of the State Council, and the All-China Federation of Returned Overseas Chinese. (Xinhua/Li Tao)

Consultative Conference, made the remarks at a reception held in Beijing to celebrate the upcoming 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China.

"To accomplish Chinese modernization, it is essential for all Chinese people to unite and collaborate collectively," he said.

On Hong Kong and Macao, Wang stressed the determination to continue to fully, faithfully, and resolutely implement the policy of One Country, Two Systems, see that Hong Kong and Macao are administered by patriots, inspire more people in Hong Kong and Macao to love both the country and their own regions, and support Hong Kong and Macao in better integrating themselves into the country's overall development.

On Taiwan, Wang stressed adherence to the one-China principle and the 1992 Consensus, expressing the willingness to promote peaceful development of cross-strait relations and advance integrated development in all fields.

He called for efforts to resolutely oppose "Taiwan independence" separatist activities and foreign interference and unswervingly advance the cause of national reunification.

About 2,000 representatives from Hong Kong, Macao, Taiwan and overseas Chinese communities attended the reception.

'Get things done': China tries to rally risk-averse officials to revive economy

27 September 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang and William Zheng

China's leaders are again seeking to rally risk-averse cadres to the cause of decisive economic action by stressing the need to "get things done" and its tolerance of mistakes in a policy known as the "three exempts".

The Politburo, the ruling Communist Party's inner circle, signalled the renewed political commitment in a statement after a meeting on Thursday to, in part, address the lack of action among many officials to help revive the economy.

"Party members and officials are urged to take responsibility and be willing to innovate, using challenges as opportunities to grow and achieve results," state news agency Xinhua quoted the Politburo as saying.

"The 'three exempts' framework must be effectively applied to support those who take on responsibilities and get things done. Major economic provinces should be encouraged to take the lead and play a greater role in driving the economy forward."

The meeting came a day after financial authorities unveiled a series of sweeping stimulus measures and in the lead-up to National Day celebrations, underscoring Beijing's desire to prop up growth over other priorities.

It also stressed the need for proactive policies, effective financial measures and support for the private sector.

President Xi Jinping launched the three exempts policy in 2016 to tackle the challenges officials face in advancing reforms.

Many civil servants are reluctant to innovate and fear making mistakes, daunted by the system's centralisation, tight controls and lack of flexibility. Stringent oversight by the party's formidable disciplinary bodies is also a deterrent.

The three exempts policy differentiates between "mistakes" made during reforms, suggesting leniency for those stemming from inexperience rather than deliberate violations of discipline; those made in exploration; and those made unintentionally to promote development rather than for personal gain. In 2020, the party's Central Committee went one step further to protect the rights of members to make mistakes, aiming to encourage initiative among its cadres.

The three exempts were underscored by Xi in January and again at a major party meeting in July to encourage officials to "forge ahead in a pioneering spirit and demonstrate enterprise in their work".

In a first, the July meeting referred specifically to the need to seriously investigate and handle "false accusations" against officials.

"It's a clear signal from the party's top leadership, telling officials down the command chain that now the economy is their priority"

• Deng Yuwen, former Study Times editor

Deng Yuwen, former deputy editor of Study Times, the official newspaper of the Central Party School, said the three exempts reference on Thursday was a clear message to officials down the line that economic recovery was now the top performance indicator on their report card.

"It's a clear signal from the party's top leadership, telling officials down the command chain that now the economy is Beijing has tried to strike a balance between national security and economic growth as "external hostilities" have grown, but mixed messaging and ambiguity have long made cadres fearful of taking action.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University, said trial and error were a part of any difficult task.

"The party has to value those cadres who have the guts to test the water, because its reform and opening up is entering deep waters, with all the low-hanging fruit already picked," Xie said.

Victor Shih, a specialist in Chinese elite politics and finance at the University of California San Diego, said the sloganeering was an attempt to encourage local officials to take more risks as their counterparts did in the 1980s and 1990s to drive growth.

"Local initiative would indeed help with growth today," Shih said.

But there were big differences between then and now.

"First, local governments are much more indebted so are less able to take initiatives on their own. They will need to dovetail their initiatives with central projects in order to take advantage of central transfer payments," he said.

"Second, given the strong national security concern in Beijing, local officials still will be hesitant to collaborate with foreign investors. This was not the case in the 1980s and 1990s, when foreign investors were seen as highly desirable by the central leadership."

To foster genuine economic recovery, Beijing must demonstrate that officials who take risks and innovate will be rewarded, according to a political scientist at Peking University who declined to be named.

He said motivated officials were "the most critical driver" to China's growth but tougher regulations and anti-corruption campaigns over the past decade had made officials more risk-averse and hesitant to engage with the business community.

"So many just don't push for new initiatives, don't do extra, just pass the bosses' instructions down," he said.

"Beijing needs to reward them and let the whole party know, so that more will follow. Without such examples, few will take a first step because the previous few years have fixed their view."

their priority. It essentially relaxes the current strict political requirements so that officials know what they should focus on," Deng said.

"As the economy continues to worsen, the party's leadership is getting more anxious than before, because they know a stagnant economy will mean major political risk in the future.

"They have also come to realise that besides the stimulus from the central bank and the Ministry of Finance, they also need to stimulate the enthusiasm of cadres."

Top Chinese economist disappears from public life after criticizing Xi Jinping

27 September 2024, Tibetan Review

China sought to deny that Xi Jinping is a dictator when criticized as such by US President Joe Biden in Nov 2023, but a leading economist at a government thinktank has reportedly disappeared after being disciplined for criticising the Chinese President in a private online chat group.

Zhu Hengpeng, 55, reportedly made disparaging remarks about China's economy, and potentially about the Chinese leader specifically, in a private WeChat group. He was subsequently detained in April and put under investigation, according to the Wall Street Journal which cited anonymous sources.

The specifics of what Zhu wrote in the private WeChat group are not known, although Hong Kong's Sing Tao Daily has said he "improperly discussed central policies". The Wall Street Journal has also reported that he allegedly made a reference to "Xi's mortality".

Zhu worked at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences (Cass) for more than 20 years, most recently as the Institute of Economics deputy director and director of the Public Policy Research Center.

He has reportedly not been seen in public since April when he spoke at an event organised by Chinese media outlet Caixin, which he had done previously. Efforts by the Wall Street Journal to contact him at home were reportedly unsuccessful. The Cass has not responded to queries, reported theguardian.com Sep 25.

Zhu's loss of position at the Cass also saw a shakeup of the institute's senior ranks, with the director and secretary also removed from their posts, the report said, citing Hong Kong media reports earlier this month. While those two officials were reassigned, Zhu was not, the report said, citing Sing Tao Daily. He is no longer listed on the Cass website.

Websites related to his work at Tsinghua University have also reportedly been taken offline.

Cass is a state research think tank that reports directly to China's top leadership. Chen Daoyin, a former associate professor at Shanghai University of Political Science and Law, described it as a "body to formulate party ideology to support the leadership," noted businessinsider.in Sep 24.

While Cass sometimes provides relatively frank analysis, under the increasingly authoritarian rule of Xi, criticism of the Communist Party of China (CPC) and his individual leadership has become increasingly frowned upon, and treated punitively, said theguardian.com report.

Notices on the Cass website were stated to show staff engaging in several political education sessions in recent months, with a heavy focus on party loyalty and adherence to Xi Jinping Thought – the name given to the enshrined political ideology of the CPC leader.

China's economy is struggling, and there are concerns that the world's second-largest economy will miss its own 5% annual growth target, a relatively modest ambition by historic standards. However, Xi is seen as giving greater importance to his and the party's grip on power than the nation's economy.

Reforms key to better protection of human rights

25 September 2024, China Daily

Experts at a human rights symposium in Beijing on Tuesday called for stronger judicial protection of human rights, enhanced oversight of law enforcement, and reforms to address issues in the application of coercive legal measures.

Organized by the China Society for Human Rights Studies, the symposium aimed to promote the comprehensive development of human rights across the country.

Zhang Wenxian, director of the Academic Committee of the China Law Society, stressed that the rule of law is the most effective means to protect human rights.

He noted that despite progress, misuse of administrative and coercive measures – which sometimes constitute infringement on personal and property rights – still exists. Zhang said the need for further reforms to safeguard citizens and the legal representatives of entities and organizations is critical.

His comments came after the third plenary session of the 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China reaffirmed the importance of the judicial protection of human rights, calling for a "correct outlook on human rights "and more robust legal safeguards.

In July, the CPC Central Committee issued a resolution aimed at advancing Chinese modernization, highlighting the need for stronger protection of personal and property rights through law enforcement and judicial mechanisms. The resolution stressed improving systems for oversight and redress, particularly in cases involving coercive measures such as illegal detentions, the use of torture and the freezing of assets.

Zhang acknowledged that systemic shortcomings remain, particularly in ensuring personal and property rights are respected in law enforcement. He called for a comprehensive plan to improve human rights awareness among judicial personnel and more intensive reforms to prevent abuses of power.

Ma Huaide, president of China University of Political Science and Law, pointed to the problematic application of coercive measures such as the seizure and freezing of property, which often leads to human rights violations.

Ma cited a recent case in Shandong province, where a market regulation official was investigated for threatening a business operator, illustrating the need for greater oversight.

Li Xiao, a senior inspector at the Supreme People's Court, highlighted progress in reforming the trial-centered criminal procedure system, leading to the correction of several wrongful convictions.

However, she noted that misconduct by some law enforcement officers, including illegal detentions and abuse of power for personal gain, continues to undermine public trust in the judicial system.

Li stressed the importance of further reforms to strengthen supervision at all stages of law enforcement and related judicial processes, ensuring that abuses of power are checked and human rights are protected.

Xi stresses imperative to give full play to CPPCC's political strengths

22 September 2024, The State Council

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC) and the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) convened a grand gathering to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the founding of the CPPCC. The event took place in the auditorium of the National Committee of the CPPCC on the morning of September 20. Xi Jinping, general secretary of the CPC Central Committee, Chinese president, and chairman of the Central Military Commission, attended the conference and delivered an important address. Xi underscored the imperative of having greater confidence in the path, theory, system, and culture, giving full play to the salient political strengths of the CPPCC in advancing the whole-process people's democracy, and continuously consolidating and fostering a vibrant, stable and united political landscape.

Li Qiang, Zhao Leji, Cai Qi, Ding Xuexiang and Li Xi, who are members of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, and Vice President Han Zheng, attended the conference. Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the CPPCC, chaired the conference.

The conference commenced with the majestic national anthem. Xi delivered an important speech. He pointed out that the practice in the past 75 years has fully demonstrated that the CPPCC stands as a remarkable achievement the CPC has made in adapting the united front theory, political party theory, and democratic politics theory of Marxism-Leninism to China's realities and to the best of its traditional culture. The CPPCC is a great invention by the CPC leading other political parties, personages without party affiliation, people's organizations and people from all walks of life and all ethnic groups in the development of China's political system. It has a profound cultural, theoretical and practical foundation, distinct Chinese characteristics and significant political strengths. It is a scientific and effective institutional arrangement, and has distinctive political value unique in the development of the political systems of mankind.

Xi stressed that since the 18th CPC National Congress in 2012, we have adapted to the situation and tasks of socialism with Chinese characteristics in the new era, promoted innovation in theories on the development of the CPPCC based on practice, and constantly deepened the understanding of how the CPPCC should function and develop. The fundamental principles are as follows: the Party's overall leadership over the CPPCC must be upheld, the nature of the CPPCC must remain unchanged, the role of the CPPCC as a specialized consultative body must be given full play, China's new socialist political party system must be adhered to and improved, great unity and alliance must be maintained, strengthening ideological and political guidance and building a broad consensus must be taken as the central link, the central tasks of the Party and the country must be the focus when the CPPCC performs its duties, serving the people must be what the CPPCC pursues, the responsibilities of its members must be strengthened, and the CPPCC's capacity for performing its duties must be built in the spirit of reform and innovation. These 10 principles constitute our Party's important thinking on strengthening and improving the work of the CPPCC, Xi said. They epitomize the experience the CPPCC has accumulated in its development in the past 75 years, especially since the beginning of the new era, and are fundamental guidelines for the CPPCC's work on the new journey in the new era. They must be implemented in a complete, accurate and comprehensive manner, and continue to be enriched and developed in practice.

Xi pointed out that consultative democracy is an important component of the whole-process people's democracy, a unique form and distinctive advantage of China's socialist democratic politics, and an important embodiment of the Party's mass line in the political sphere. On the new journey in the new era, we must adhere to the correct political direction, improve the system of consultative democracy in an integrated manner, make efforts to improve the mechanism of consultative democracy, continuously expand the methods and platforms of consultation, and actively create a good atmosphere and favorable conditions so as to promote extensive, multilevel, and institutionalized development of consultative democracy.

Xi noted that, on the new journey in the new era, the CPPCC should carry forward its fine traditions, shoulder its political responsibilities, ensure the integration of Party leadership, the united front, and consultative democracy, and give full play to the role of a specialized consultative body, so as to rally the people's support, build consensus, draw on collective wisdom, and pool strengths for advancing Chinese modernization.

Xi pointed out that upholding and developing socialism with Chinese characteristics is the linchpin of consolidating the common ideological and political foundation, and the Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era is the general guideline for the work of the CPPCC. The CPPCC must have a thorough understanding of the distinct political attributes of its system and its organizations, thoroughly study and implement the Party's innovative theories, constantly consolidate the common ideological and political foundation for unity and hard work, and do its work well for promoting political unity and cooperation, common ideological progress, and concerted action among all political parties, organizations, and people of all ethnic groups and from all walks of life.

Xi stressed that the CPPCC should leverage well its strengths in gathering talent and pooling wisdom, and further advance consultation and deliberation on state affairs with focus on major, challenging and hotspot issues concerning advancing Chinese modernization, further comprehensively deepening reform, promoting high-quality development and safeguarding social harmony and stability. He said that the CPPCC should also give full play to its strengths in consultative oversight, and help ensure that the Party and the state's major decisions and plans deliver substantially.

Xi noted that the CPPCC should improve its working mechanism that propels the role of the united front in rallying the people's support and pooling strengths. He said the CPPCC should strengthen the political guidance on intellectuals who are not Party members, those working in the non-public sector, people from emerging social groups and those from the religious sector, extensively unite and stay engaged with overseas Chinese, and expand the convergence of interests in building a strong country and the rejuvenation of the Chinese nation.

Xi stressed that it is imperative to improve the working institutions and mechanisms of the CPPCC, and strengthen the coordination and cooperation between its consultation and other forms of consultation. It is essential to refine the mechanisms under which in-depth consultations and interactions are conducted, opinions are fully expressed, and broad consensus is built. It is equally important to strengthen the building of mechanisms under which the CPPCC can know better about social realities and public opinions, and stay engaged with and serve the people. The CPPCC should do more work to know more about people's actual conditions, address their concerns and make them feel that we do care about them.

Xi pointed out that building a team of CPPCC members who have profound understanding of the CPPCC, are adept at political consultation and discussion of state affairs, and abide by discipline, value norms and moral integrity, is an important guarantee for the CPPCC to perform its duties in high quality. All CPPCC members should cherish their political identity, temper their political morals, improve their capability to do political work, and have a stronger sense of mission and responsibility so that they can devote themselves to the practical work of pooling collective wisdom and strength, consulting on decision-making, consultative democracy and national governance.

Xi emphasized that CPC committees at all levels should strengthen the leadership over the work of the CPPCC and support the CPPCC in performing its duties. The leading Party members group of the CPPCC National Committee should play a leading role in commanding the direction, managing the overall situation, and ensuring implementation of related policies, and improve and implement the organizational system and institutional mechanism for the CPC's leadership over the work of the CPPCC. With the progress of the CPC's political work as guide, it is imperative to promote the CPPCC's Party building in a comprehensive way so that a clean political ecology will be created for the CPPCC to perform its duties well.

Presiding over the meeting, Wang Huning pointed out that in his important speech, General Secretary Xi Jinping spoke highly of the historical contribution of the CPPCC, profoundly expounded on the CPPCC's distinct Chinese characteristics and significant political strengths, put forward clear requirements for continuously promoting extensive, multilevel, and institutionalized development of consultative democracy, and made comprehensive arrangements for the work of the CPPCC at present and in the future. The speech has pointed out the direction forward and provided fundamental guidelines for the high-quality development of the CPPCC work on the new journey in the new era. The speech is insightful and in depth, has rich connotations and is of political, ideological, and guiding significance. It is essential for us to earnestly study and implement the essence of the speech, Wang said. It is imperative to thoroughly study, comprehend and implement General Secretary Xi Jinping's important thinking on strengthening and improving the work of the CPPCC, understand the decisive significance of the "Two Establishments," consciously act on the "Two Upholds," and guarantee the integration of the Party's leadership, the united front, and consultative democracy, striving to make new contributions to the development of the Party and the country.

Those present at the meeting included members of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee in Beijing, members of the CPC Central Committee Secretariat, some vice chairpersons of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, state councilors, the president of the Supreme People's Court, the procurator-general of the Supreme People's Procuratorate, vice chairpersons of the National Committee of the CPPCC, and former leading officials of the CPPCC National Committee who have retired.

Approximately 800 attendees were present at the meeting, including the leading officials from relevant central Party and state departments, and relevant people's organizations and units, leaders of the other political parties' central committees and the All-China Federation of Industry and Commerce, and personages without party affiliation, members of the Standing Committee of the CPPCC National Committee in Beijing as well as representatives of relevant sectors.

China sees significant rise in protests despite CCP regime's tight control: Report

21 September 2024, Zimbabwe Independent

An American nonprofit human rights organization, in its latest report released on August 28, documented 805 incidents of dissent in China between April and June, which marks an 18 percent increase compared to the same period in 2023, despite the Chinese communist regime's stringent controls.

According to the report by Washington-based Freedom House's China Dissent Monitor (CDM), most of the dissent incidents recorded across 370 provincial cities in China were related to labour disputes (44 percent) and homeowners' protests (21 percent), with the remainder involving diverse groups like rural residents, students, parents, investors, consumers, members of religious groups, activists, Tibetans, ethnic Mongolians, and members of the LGBT+ community.

Guangdong Province saw the highest number of protests, accounting for 13 percent of the total, followed by Shandong, Hebei, Henan, and Zhejiang. Shenzhen, Xi'an, and Sanya were among the cities with the highest rates of protests over economic issues.

Additionally, several cities in Guangdong Province also experienced a significant percentage of protests, as per the report.

Freedom House's CDM, documenting nearly 6,400 dissent events over two years, logged 805 dissent incidents in the second quarter of 2024, as per the report.

"The top regions for protest events were Guangdong (13 percent), followed by Shandong, Hebei, Henan, and Zhejiang. CDM has logged a total of 6,300 cases of dissent since data collection began in June 2022," the report read.

The CDM documented 228 protests led by rural residents over the past two years, most of which were linked to forced relocation and unfair land acquisition.

These cases shed light on the corruption and discontent that arises from widespread land expropriation, the report said.

The report analyzed 91 protests led by taxi, ride-hailing, delivery, bus, and truck drivers in China, while many of these events were sparked by policies affecting transportation workers, such as regulation on ride-hailing apps and self-driving taxis.

Dissent by homeowners and construction workers constitute 44 percent of all dissent cases in CDM's database, reflecting the major impact of the real estate crisis on citizens' livelihoods.

Despite the Chinese government's attempts to abate the real estate sector's collapse, CDM data indicates that protest frequency has not declined.

Analysis of CDM's data collected over two years indicates that Shenzhen, Xi'an, and Sanya have more protests over economic grievances on a per capita basis than any other cities in China, while many other highly ranked cities are located in Guangdong Province.

Meanwhile, despite Beijing's intervention efforts, China's economy is sliding into stagnation after four decades of growth.

The communist regime's measures have been unable to resolve key obstacles to economic advancement, such as the real estate crisis, a trade war with the United States, restrictions on the private sector, and the prolonged negative impacts of its stringent Covid-19 lockdowns and restrictions, as per the report.

The report indicates that many of the protests were suppressed by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) due to concerns that they might pose greater political risks.

China observers suggest that the rise in protests, despite the CCP's stringent control, signals a legitimacy crisis for the party.

Chairman of the board of Taiwan's New School for Democracy, Tseng Chien-Yuan, told The Epoch Times that the current situation in China is unlike anywhere else, as even the middle class, including property owners, have stood up to protest, which shows that China's economic situation is very serious.

"People are forced to live in poverty, and the legitimacy of the CCP's rule, which is built on economic development, is greatly weakened," Yuan said.

"Under strict surveillance, people still come out to protest, which is a warning sign of a major crisis," he added.

Speaking to The Epoch Times on the matter, Wu Se-Chih, a researcher at Cross-Strait Policy Association in Taiwan, said, "Generally speaking, social protests occur when people's forbearance has reached its limit."

He claimed that the real number of the protests is much larger than what the CDM was able to collect because of the CCP's control and its censorship.

Freedom House acknowledged the media restrictions in China and the "risks associated with collecting information from within the country about dissent and protest" in the report.

Freedom House's CDM "was created in response to the information gap" through data collected from "news reports, civil society organizations, and China-based social media," as well as other sources.

Wu Se-Chih said that the Chinese regime always suppresses protests and blocks information from reaching the public and outside world.

The CCP also "used other methods to ease the backlash from the people or society," Wu said, adding that "the CCP now has fewer and fewer means that it can use, especially as it's facing serious financial problems."

The researcher said when Chinese society as a whole falls into economic despair, it will be more difficult for the CCP to control the power of the people to counter its regime.

"In the end, the CCP will collapse due to the social unrest," he told the publication.

Translation: Chinese Universities Install Software to Identify and Punish Students Who Circumvent the Great Firewall

18 September 2024, China Digital Times

A recent WeChat post reveals that some Chinese schools and universities are using special software to identify and punish students who "scale the wall"—that is, circumvent China's Great Firewall (GFW) to access overseas websites and portals. The post begins with a not-very-convincing exchange of WeChat messages between three students—identified as "student A," "student B," and "student C," respectively—discussing their university's use of the ABT Online Behavior Management System (安博通上网行为管理, Ānbótōng shàngwǎng xíngwéi guǎnlǐ) to identify and punish fellow students who circumvented the GFW to access blocked overseas websites and engage in "illegal discourse." In their conversation, one of the students writes that it was "lucky the school caught the offenders before they ruined the school's reputation." The text that follows this exchange reads like advertising copy and praises the various "advantages" of the software.

Below is a partial translation, with some added explanatory links, of the WeChat post. The post includes a statement—ostensibly from a teacher in the university's department of information management, though it reads more like an ABT product pitch—touting the four "advantages" of ABT's software:

1. High performance equipment, simple installation. [...] Tailor-made for colleges and universities.
2. Cutting-edge capability for identifying 116 types of GFW-circumvention proxy utilities, including popular utilities such as Shadowrocket, Clash, Freerate, and more.
3. A variety of authentication methods to meet the real-name requirements of different clients. [...] Utilizes overseas IP-address tracing and real-name registration to accurately pinpoint and "apprehend" violators.
4. Detailed and comprehensive reports, displayed in a separate interface.

How did the school discover which students "scaled the wall" to visit overseas websites? [...] The school had installed the ABT Online Behavior Management System, which utilizes reverse IP lookup and real-name identification to accurately pinpoint students who circumvent the Great Firewall.

[...] Universities in various cities and provinces have also issued similar notices. For example, the National University of Defense Technology [in Changsha, Hunan province] issued a notice declaring, "This wall cannot be scaled! Do not test the law," and Jilin University of Finance and Economics issued a set of "regulations regarding students' illegal use of GFW-circumvention software."

[...] What are some university test-cases?

Five universities in Jiangxi province: Thanks to the product's outstanding accurate proxy-identification capability and robust library of proxy-identifying features, [ABT] successfully won the bid involving both 40Gb/s- and 60Gb/s-bandwidth equipment.

During a test at a certain university in Jiangxi, the Internet Supervision Office reported that a student had used a VPN to circumvent the GFW. ABT's technical staff worked closely with teachers in the university's Information Management Office to check the VPN logs and NAT (Network Address Translation) logs on ABT's Online Behavior Management System, and were able to accurately identify the suspected violator. A subsequent inspection of the student's computer revealed evidence that the suspect had accessed VPN software and illegal online forums. This efficient collaboration and precise investigation won high praise for our equipment and service from the teachers at the university's Information Management Office, which not only laid the groundwork for cooperation between our two parties, but also smoothed the path to ABT winning the bid for the project.

[...] In addition to countering circumvention, ABT's Online Behavior Management System also has sophisticated capabilities for identifying, controlling, and auditing more than 7,000 common software applications such as instant messaging, P2P downloads, stock trading, online gaming, online video-streaming, and more. By combining powerful bandwidth-management features, sophisticated management of network application behavior, and user-friendly logs and other functions, it can help academic institutions and companies alike to achieve visual control and worry-free security. [Chinese]

There is a long history of prosecutions and punishments of individuals in China who use VPNs to circumvent the GFW and access the uncensored Internet. One recent case involved the retroactive administrative punishment of a man in Ningde, Fujian province, for using a VPN back in 2020. In 2023, a programmer in Chengde, Hebei province, was fined three years of "illegal income," totaling over one million yuan, for using a VPN to do work for an overseas client. VPN-related prosecutions of Uyghurs in Xinjiang have been even stricter than in other areas: in 2017, a computer science student in Urumqi was sentenced to 13 years in prison for using a VPN to bypass Internet censorship and view "illegal information." Other double standards abound: in November of last year, current affairs blogger Xiang Dongliang had his Weibo account banned for reporting nationalist pundit and former Global Times Editor-in-Chief Hu Xijin for illegal VPN use and posting to overseas websites such as X. (Xiang was punished, but authorities ignored his complaint about Hu's violation of the law.) In late 2022, CDT translated a censorship directive about a crackdown on censorship-circumvention tools. The crackdown was likely aimed at suppressing news about the nationwide spate of anti-lockdown demonstrations that came to be known as the "White Paper protests."

Xi urges continuous efforts to run people's congresses to good effect

16 September 2024, The State Council

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC) and the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress (NPC) held a grand meeting at the Great Hall of the People on the morning of Sept. 14 to celebrate the 70th anniversary of the establishment of the NPC. Xi Jinping, general secretary of the CPC Central Committee, Chinese president and chairman of the Central Military Commission, attended the meeting and delivered an important speech. He stressed the need to further firm up confidence in the path, theory, system and culture, develop whole-process people's democracy, and continuously uphold, improve and run the system of people's congresses to good effect to provide a solid institutional guarantee for the Party and the people to achieve their goals on the new journey in the new era.

Li Qiang, Wang Huning, Cai Qi, Ding Xuexiang and Li Xi, who are members of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, and Vice President Han Zheng, attended the event. The meeting was presided over by Zhao Leji, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and chairman of the NPC Standing Committee.

The meeting commenced amidst the resounding national anthem. Xi delivered an important speech. He pointed out that the system of people's congresses is the result of the arduous exploration and long-term struggles of the Chinese people under the CPC leadership. It is an entirely new political system that has grown from the Chinese soil and a great invention in the evolution of political institutions. The establishment of this system marked a great transformation in China's political system, signifying a great shift from a power structure where the power was concentrated in the hands of a few while the majority faced oppression and exploitation, to one that is led by the Party and empowers the people to govern the country as its masters.

Xi emphasized that over the past 70 years, the system of people's congresses has, under the Party's leadership, effectively ensured that our country continues to advance along the socialist path. It has demonstrated significant political advantages in guaranteeing that the Party leads the people in governing the country according to law, ensuring that the people are the masters of the country, maintaining political life that is both vibrant and orderly, promoting the rule of law in all aspects of national governance, and safeguarding long-term stability and peace. This system has provided an important institutional guarantee for creating miracles of rapid economic development and long-term social stability. Practice has proven that the people's congress system is a sound system that accords with China's national conditions and realities, embodies the nature of socialist countries, and effectively rallies the strength of all Chinese people to advance Chinese modernization.

Xi pointed out that since the 18th CPC National Congress in 2012, our Party has stood at a new historical juncture, gained a deep understanding of the new changes to the principal contradictions in Chinese society, actively responded to the people's new demands and aspirations for democracy and rule of law, and improved the organizational and working systems of people's congresses, making historic achievements in its work. We adhere to adapting the basic tenets of Marxism to China's specific realities and fine traditional Chinese culture, deeply grasp the laws governing the development of socialist democracy, and continuously promote theoretical and practical innovations in the system of people's congresses. Noting that the system of people's congresses is an important institutional vehicle for realizing whole-process people's democracy in China, Xi said it is imperative to uphold the CPC's leadership, adhere to the use of a system of institutions to ensure that the people run the country, exercise law-based governance on all fronts, uphold democratic centralism, and stick to the path of socialist political advancement with Chinese characteristics. Efforts must be made to modernize China's system and capacity for governance, give full play to the role of deputies to people's congresses, strengthen the self-improvement efforts of people's congresses at various levels to uphold their four-fold role as political, working, representative institutions, and institutions of state power. This series of new concepts, ideas and requirements form the Party's important thoughts on upholding and improving the system of people's congresses, providing fundamental guidance for the high-quality development of people's congresses in the new era, Xi said.

Xi emphasized the need to give full play to the role of people's congresses in ensuring full and effective implementation of the Constitution and laws. People's congresses at all levels and their standing committees must fully perform their functions, firmly safeguard the unity, dignity, and authority of the country's legal system, ensure effective implementation of the Constitution and laws, and make sure that all state organs fulfill their duties and carry out their work within the scope permitted by the Constitution and laws.

It is important that people's congresses play a leading role in legislative work, Xi said. He urges efforts to improve the legislative framework featuring guidance from Party committees, the leading role played by people's congresses, support from the government, and participation by all parties. Efforts should be made to step up legislation in key, emerging, and foreign-related fields, improve the quality of legislation, and continuously improve the socialist legal system with Chinese characteristics. He also urged efforts to accelerate the improvement of a legal system featuring equal rights, equal opportunities and fair rules for all to ensure that citizens fully enjoy their rights.

Xi emphasized the need to give full play to the key role of the oversight by people's congresses in the Party and state supervision systems. It is imperative to improve the system through which people's congresses oversee the government, the supervisory commissions, the people's courts and the people's procuratorates. Xi urged people's congresses to strengthen oversight of the implementation of the Constitution and laws, and intensify the review and oversight of government budgets and final accounts and the oversight over the management of state-owned assets and government debts. People's congresses should work to promote the implementation of the CPC Central Committee's decisions and plans, and ensure that all state organs exercise their powers by law and that the legitimate rights and interests of the people are safeguarded and realized. Administrative, supervisory, adjudicatory and procuratorial organs at various levels should readily accept oversight from people's congresses and effectively fulfill their respective supervisory duties, he said.

Xi pointed out that people's congresses should play an exemplary role in maintaining close ties with the people. All state organs and their employees must foster a strong sense of service to the people, put the people above all else, and maintain close ties with them. Deputies to people's congresses shoulder the honorable duties entrusted to them by the people, Xi noted, urging them to faithfully represent the interests and will of the people, and serve as the bridge that links the Party and the state with the people. He stressed the need for all state organs to provide support for the deputies to the people's congresses to perform their duties in accordance with the law, improve the systems and mechanisms for contact with deputies, and ensure that deputies reach out to the public on a greater variety of issues and in more diversified ways.

Xi emphasized that party committees at all levels should strengthen their overall leadership over the work of the people's congresses, and support the people's congresses and their standing committees in exercising their powers and carrying out their work in accordance with the law. The leading Party members groups of the standing committees of the people's congresses at all levels should always adhere to the centralized and unified leadership of the Party Central Committee, fulfill their main responsibilities for comprehensively and strictly governing the Party, and strengthen the political, ideological, organizational, work style, and disciplinary construction of the people's congresses in line with the requirement to uphold the four-fold role. They should train personnel that maintain political resolve, serve the people, respect the rule of law, promote democracy, and are diligent and responsible, and continuously improve the quality and level of the people's congress work in the new era and on the new journey.

While presiding over the meeting, Zhao Leji said that General Secretary Xi Jinping's important speech reviewed the glorious course of the CPC leading the Chinese people in establishing and improving the system of people's congresses, and profoundly expounded on the remarkable political advantages of the system. The speech has systematically summarized the major achievements in theoretical and practical innovations of the system in the new era, and made comprehensive arrangements and clear requirements for upholding, improving, and running the system at a new historical starting point. The speech is forward-looking and inspires people to forge ahead. It enriches and develops Xi's important thoughts on upholding and improving the system, and is a guiding document shining with the brilliance of the truth of Marxism. We must study and comprehend it earnestly and firmly implement it. We must gain a deep understanding of the decisive significance of establishing Comrade Xi Jinping's core position on the Party Central Committee and in the Party as a whole and establishing the guiding role of Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and consciously uphold Comrade Xi Jinping's core position on the Party Central Committee and in the Party as a whole and uphold the Central Committee's authority and its centralized, unified leadership. We must unwaveringly keep to the path of socialist political advancement with Chinese characteristics, and uphold, improve and run the system of people's congresses to good effect.

The meeting was attended by members of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and the Secretariat of the CPC Central Committee, vice chairpersons of the NPC Standing Committee, State Councilors, president of the Supreme People's Court, procurator general of the Supreme People's Procuratorate, some vice chairpersons of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, senior comrades who had assumed leading positions at the NPC Standing Committee, as well as members of the Central Military Commission in Beijing.

Approximately 3,000 people attended the meeting, including leaders from various departments of the CPC Central Committee, government, military and people's organizations as well as leading officials from Beijing, leaders of the central committees of democratic parties and the All-China Federation of Industry and Commerce, representatives of non-party personages, members of the NPC Standing Committee and various special committees, senior officials from the standing committees of people's congresses at the provincial, regional and municipal levels, some NPC deputies, representatives from all walks of life in the capital, and foreign envoys in China.

China is poised to amend its anti-corruption law for the first time

14 September 2024, SCMP, Yuanyue Dang

China is set to amend its anti-corruption law, allowing bail for corruption suspects during investigations but also extending the detention period during which suspects are denied access to a lawyer.

A draft amendment to the Supervision Law was under review by the National People's Congress (NPC) Standing Committee, China's top legislative body, during its four-day session that ended on Friday, state news agency Xinhua said.

It would be the first amendment since the legislation's introduction in March 2018. The draft was published on the NPC website on Friday afternoon as a month-long public consultation starts.

The Xinhua report did not say when and whether the standing committee would approve the amendments but legislative amendments are generally adopted after three reviews.

Some lawyers said that the draft did not give them more leeway in defending their clients while providing anti-corruption agencies more legal tools to carry out investigations.

Under one new provision, investigators are authorised to “compel an individual who is suspected of serious dereliction of duties or committing a crime by abusing power to make himself available for investigation”.

The same provision also stipulates that investigators can only hold a suspect for 12 hours under normal circumstances, though the detention may be extended to 24 hours if it is deemed necessary considering the safety and psychological conditions of the suspect. Investigators would not be allowed to hold a suspect indefinitely by repeatedly extending the detention.

Another proposal would allow suspects of minor corruption offences to be released on bail for a maximum period of 12 months.

In addition, one provision would permit investigators to hold suspects of minor offences in a detention facility even if the suspects are not officially detained but deemed to pose “real security risks”, such as flight risk or the risk of suicide.

Under such circumstances, investigators would have to send the suspect to detention facilities within 24 hours after they identify the risk and decide within seven days whether to formally hold him in detention or release him.

Under the amendment, the period of disciplinary detention – commonly known as liuzhi – may be extended.

Under current law, disciplinary detention allows anti-corruption investigators to hold a suspect at designated facilities for up to six months. Such detention could apply to anyone employed in the state sector or on a public payroll, including officials, academics and teachers as well as those suspected of offering bribes.

A new provision would let investigators extend the detention another two months if they determine that a suspect’s offence could warrant more than 10 years’ imprisonment and that their inquiry cannot be completed within six months.

However, the extension would require approval from the country’s top anti-corruption body, the National Supervisory Commission – which is essentially the same body as the Communist Party’s Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI).

Additionally, the provision states, if the anti-corruption agency at or above the provincial level discovers that the suspect has committed other serious crimes, it can apply to the national agency for a renewal of their detention period, which can be as long as eight months.

The change means that suspects in corruption cases may not be able to see a lawyer for more than a year before prosecutors charge them.

According to the CCDI, China’s top anti-corruption body, some 26,000 disciplinary detentions were ordered in 2023.

The most controversial feature of the Supervision Law has been that people detained by anti-corruption authorities are not allowed access to lawyers until they have been formally charged.

Despite years of calls from lawyers and legal scholars to change the rule, the proposed amendment does not modify it.

Xie Dan, a partner at Beijing Ronghe Law Firm, said: “We lawyers have been concerned over the years about how the authorities can protect the rights of suspects during investigations. The amendment partly addresses these concerns by providing alternatives to liuzhi and providing more details about how the system works.”

But, he added, “I still think that the authorities should allow them [suspects in corruption cases] to meet with lawyers during detention.”

Jin Hongwei, a partner at Beijing Huayi Law Firm, said that under the current Supervision Law, investigation almost automatically means detention, and that the new measures of the draft amendment make the transition from investigation to detention “more nuanced”.

Jin said the changes were expected to have a major impact on those under investigation, but “not on lawyers”.

For the first time, the draft also states that anti-corruption agencies should not “use their power to illegally interfere in the operation of enterprises” and should protect the “rights and interests of personal freedom and property” of entrepreneurs under investigation.

Beijing has called for protection of private businesses to create a more favourable business environment as China endures a weak economic recovery.

Report details how China retaliates against people for engaging with UN

13 September 2024, VOA News, Liam Scott

FILE - Jimmy Lai walks through the Stanley prison in Hong Kong on July 28, 2023.

China is among the foreign governments that retaliate against people for engaging with the United Nations, according to a report released this week by the U.N. Secretary-General.

The report highlights how hard Beijing tries to silence its critics, according to Sophie Richardson, an expert on human rights in China.

"These [U.N.] mechanisms are some of the only ones available to people inside China, at least on paper, to provide any modicum of redress or justice for the human rights abuses either they've endured or the communities they work with have endured," Richardson told VOA.

"That's why you see the Chinese government go to extraordinary lengths to silence people who are simply trying to take reports to some of these human rights experts or bodies," Richardson said.

A former China director at Human Rights Watch, Richardson is currently a visiting scholar at Stanford University.

The annual report chronicles government retaliation against people for engaging with the U.N. In addition to China, other countries named in the report include Colombia, India, Nicaragua, the Philippines and Russia.

"In my perfect world, governments that get referenced in these reprisals reports shouldn't be members of the Human Rights Council," said Richardson, who is based in Washington. China is a current member of the council in Geneva.

China's Washington embassy, as well as its U.N. offices in New York and Geneva, did not reply to VOA's emails requesting comment for this story.

One of the incidents included in the report's China section is harassment against two members of the international legal team supporting Jimmy Lai, a pro-democracy publisher.

Lai is on trial in Hong Kong on national security charges that are widely viewed as politically motivated. The 76-year-old is in prison following convictions in other cases that supporters also view as sham cases.

Members of Lai's legal team have faced death and rape threats, as well as attempts by unknown sources to hack their email and bank accounts, according to the report.

Sebastien Lai thanked the U.N. for shedding light on his father's case.

"These intimidation tactics will not succeed. I will not rest until my father is freed," he said in a statement.

Caoilfhionn Gallagher KC, a barrister leading Jimmy's international legal team, also condemned the attacks.

The reprisals "are personally unpleasant and distressing," Gallagher said in a statement. "But they are also an attack on the legal profession and on the international human rights system."

The reprisals make it harder for Jimmy Lai to use U.N. mechanisms to achieve justice in his case, Gallagher said.

Hong Kong's government has tried to argue that the legal team interfered in Hong Kong's judicial process by bringing his case to U.N. human rights mechanisms, according to the report.

"It's just so nakedly in tension with its obligations under international law," Richardson said.

On Thursday, Lai's international legal team submitted an urgent appeal to the U.N. special rapporteur on torture. The appeal raised several concerns, including that the elderly publisher has been in solitary confinement since late 2020 and that the British national has been denied access to independent medical care, according to a statement from his legal team.

Lai's trial began in December 2023. It was initially expected to last around 80 days but is now expected to resume in November.

Press freedom groups have called the trial a sham, and the U.S. and British governments have called for his immediate release. Hong Kong officials, however, have said he will receive a fair trial.

Other incidents cited in the U.N. report include the case of Cao Shunli, a Beijing-based human rights defender who was arrested following an attempt to engage in a universal periodic review of China's human rights record at the Human Rights Council. Cao died in custody in 2014.

Another case is that of the Beijing-based activists Li Wenzu and Wang Quanzhang, who are married. The couple have faced significant retaliation, including police surveillance and evictions, and their son is unable to enroll in school due to pressure from state authorities, the report said.

"If one reads these cases, you get a sense of what risks — what unbelievable risks — people are taking to do this kind of work," Richardson said.

The report doesn't mention specific incidents involving Uyghurs or Tibetans, but Richardson says their absence underscores how difficult it is for some groups to access U.N. mechanisms in the first place, as well as how some people may be too scared to report such incidents to the U.N.

The Chinese government has engaged in severe human rights abuses against both ethnic groups, according to myriad reports. Multiple governments and international human rights organizations have accused Beijing of committing genocide and crimes against humanity against the Uyghurs, which the Chinese government rejects.

China to train 3,000 foreign law enforcement officers to protect overseas interests

10 September 2024, SCMP, Phoebe Zhang

Public Security Minister Wang Xiaohong says Beijing will also send consultants to help countries improve law enforcement and tackle cross-border crime.

China will help to train 3,000 foreign law enforcement officials over the next year to tackle global security issues and better protect Chinese interests beyond its borders, the country's public security minister said.

Wang Xiaohong made the pledge in a speech on Monday at the opening of the 2024 Conference of the Global Public Security Cooperation Forum in Lianyungang, in eastern China's Jiangsu province, China Daily reported.

China will also send police consultants and working units to countries to help improve their law enforcement capacity, conduct joint patrols and investigations, and tackle cross-border crime, Wang said.

Beijing is seeking ways to boost its presence beyond its borders to protect overseas interests while offering an alternative to Western-led global security governance.

In the past year, China has worked with all parties to implement in-depth global security initiatives, and will continue to promote the development of the global public security governance system in a "more fair, reasonable and efficient direction", Wang said, according to state news agency Xinhua.

This year's conference was themed "Win-win cooperation under changing circumstances: building a global public security community". More than 2,100 people from 122 countries, regions and international organisations attended this year's event, which also featured forums on tourist security, police education and law enforcement capacity building, according to The Paper.

On Monday, Wang met security officials from Malaysia, Myanmar, Zambia, Nicaragua and Russia, and told them that China was willing to cooperate in the fight against telecoms fraud, drug trafficking and other cross-border crimes, boost security along belt and road infrastructure projects and offer criminal judicial help, Xinhua reported.

Francisco Javier Diaz Madriz, director general of Nicaragua's national police, told Xinhua his country was "looking forward to learning from China's successful experience".

Advertisement

At last year's conference, Wang discussed the need to build a cooperative public security network, and said global powers "with more resources and advantages" should take the lead in upholding fairness and justice in the international community and take a stand against hegemony.

That forum also issued several documents, including proposals on data security, artificial intelligence governance, and a talent programme for global public security.

Beijing released a concept paper in February 2023 on its Global Security Initiative, a plan announced by President Xi Jinping almost a year earlier, as China tries to take a bigger role in global governance and security.

In the paper, Beijing repeated a call for countries to strengthen strategic dialogue to improve mutual trust and manage differences.

Questions continue to swirl around China's 'disappeared' foreign minister

10 September 2024, VOA, Xiaoshan Xue

More than a year after China's former foreign minister, Qin Gang, disappeared from public view, raising a host of questions, the Chinese government remains silent on his whereabouts.

A new report this week from The Washington Post, citing two former U.S. government officials, suggests Qin has been spared any jail time and now is nominally holding a low-ranking position at a publishing house under the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Earlier reports speculated that he was sentenced to life in prison or had died from suicide or torture.

Some are skeptical about the Washington Post report, while others see it as evidence of uncertainty and impermanence within the political system directed by the Chinese Communist Party, or CCP.

According to Sunday's Washington Post report, Qin, 58, now works, at least on paper, for the World Affairs Press, a state-owned publishing house under the Foreign Ministry.

One of the former officials said Qin is "not going to jail, but his career is over."

Before he disappeared from public view in July of last year, Qin was the youngest foreign minister since the founding of the CCP. A leading theory among Chinese political analysts is that Qin was removed because he had an affair with Fu Xiaotian, a prominent Chinese television journalist, and that the pair had a child born out of wedlock in the United States.

Some reports suggested that the Chinese government suspected Fu of sharing state secrets with foreign intelligence agencies, but these rumors have never been confirmed. Like Qin, Fu disappeared from public life for more than a year ago.

During a top-level political meeting in July, the Third Plenum of the 20th Central Committee, the CCP agreed to Qin's request that he be removed from his post as a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, Chinese state media reported. That followed an official announcement in February that said Qin had resigned as a parliamentary deputy.

A reporter from The Washington Post recently visited the bookstore of the World Affairs Press in Beijing, but employees there told the newspaper that they had not heard that Qin worked at the publishing house. A staff member who answered the phone said she did not know if the news was true. China's Foreign Ministry did not respond to a request for comment.

Some observers pointed out that the Washington Post's report is based on an anonymous source who has left office, and the authenticity still needs to be verified.

Neil Thomas, a fellow on Chinese politics at the Asia Society Policy Institute's Center for China Analysis, said on social media platform X, "The rumors of Qin Gang moving to World Affairs Press have been around for months. Sources are U.S. ex-officials and I don't know what they do. But @nakashimae & @cdcshepherd are top reporters."

Charles Smith, an encryption security expert, said on X that he doesn't believe the article, which "even notes the 'bookstore' employees have never seen Qin. ... He's on an extended fishing vacation." His tweet was accompanied by an image of a skeleton fishing underwater.

Last December, online news outlet Politico reported that Qin had been arrested for undermining national security and was tortured to death or committed suicide.

Yen-Ting, an X user who frequently comments on China's social and political issues, tweeted, "It's almost poetic justice, a 'Wolf Warrior' reduced to selling books while the regime's whispers suggest he's paid off the hook rather than locked up. This is China's way of dealing w/ its wayward wolves: not through the claws of justice but by shoving them into obscurity."

Kalpit A. Mankikar, a fellow in the Strategic Studies Program with the Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi, tweeted, "Once seen as Stalin's heir, Soviet politician Georgy Malenkov fell from grace and was banished to Kazakhstan to manage a power plant. In #China, ex-foreign minister Qin Gang seems to have rehabilitated at a Party-run bookshop, says @washingtonpost."

The Washington Post report also quoted current and former U.S. officials who had dealt with Qin as saying he lacked the diplomatic skills of his experienced colleagues to break out of the "Wolf Warrior" model.

One example is that Qin appeared to threaten the U.S. with China "erasing" Taiwan Strait's median line, in a heated exchange with U.S. officials amid former U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan in August 2022.

American columnist James Pinkerton tweeted a reader's online comment on the Washington Post report.

The reader Paul Messina said, "I believe that now that the Chinese economy is falling apart, Xi has realized that this 'Wolf Warrior' tactic has actually exacerbated the fall of Chinese industry. Besides aggravating the West, particularly the United States with this nonsense, it has led to multiple Western corporations leaving China, permanently closing their doors and factories in search of friendlier nations to do business.

"Vietnam and other nations have greatly benefited. Thus this idiot actually decreased the CCP's prestige in the world. I believe that this is why his new 'career' is librarian. Xi made a big mistake with his 'Wolf Warrior' attitude towards the world. I believe that he now realizes this fact."

Liu Jianchao, the head of the International Liaison Department of the CCP Central Committee, who is relatively moderate in terms of rhetoric and image, is considered a possible candidate to succeed Wang Yi as the next foreign minister.

According to The New York Times, as China is already seeking to soften its image in the U.S. and Europe and improve relations with some of its neighbors, appointing Liu may mean China is abandoning its "Wolf Warrior" diplomacy.

Chinese legal community asks: where is the line on death penalty for corrupt officials?

08 September 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Inner Mongolia court dismisses appeal by party official who pleaded guilty to pocketing more than US$422 million and was sentenced to death.

China may see more death sentences handed down to corrupt officials in the future as President Xi Jinping's anti-corruption efforts reach into lucrative sectors and the spoils of corruption rise, according to Chinese law practitioners and observers.

The Chinese legal community's latest discussion about standards for the death penalty come after a court in the Inner Mongolia autonomous region upheld the death sentence of a local official who pleaded guilty to pocketing more than 3 billion yuan (US$422 million) in total.

On August 27, Inner Mongolia's regional high court dismissed an appeal by Li Jianping, 64, former party secretary of the economic and technological development zone in Hohhot, the region's capital city, according to its website.

Li's death sentence is awaiting final approval by the Supreme People's Court in keeping with a practice observed since 2006.

Li was also found guilty of condoning a local mafia organisation that carried out numerous illegal and criminal activities.

Even though more than 4 million officials have been caught up in China's sweeping anti-corruption campaign since Xi Jinping came to power at the end of 2012, it is rare for death sentences not to be suspended in corruption cases.

Li is only the third known case among officials handed the death penalty in the past decade. The others were Lai Xiaomin and Bai Tianhui, the former chairman and general manager of China Huarong International Holdings, one of the country's largest state-controlled asset management firms.

Lai was put to death by a court in the northern city of Tianjin in January 2021 after he was indicted for taking almost 1.8 billion yuan in bribes, as well as other forms of corruption and bigamy. His former subordinate Bai was handed the death penalty in May for accepting bribes exceeding 1.1 billion yuan. Two Chinese lawyers who handle corruption cases said the recent death penalty rulings were being closely watched by China's law practitioners for strong hints about the standard for the death penalty in such cases. Both declined to be named because of the sensitivity of the issue.

"If Bai is sentenced to death without a two-year suspension, then the 'death line' will be around 1.1 billion [yuan] in Bai's case," said one Beijing-based lawyer.

There is no official information about an appeal by Bai, but his death sentence has not been sent to the Supreme Court for final approval, meaning the ruling is not yet final.

A Shanghai lawyer concurred. He also noted that Zhang Zhongsheng – a former deputy mayor of Luliang city in Shanxi province who was indicted of taking 1.04 billion yuan – avoided execution when in 2021 he was granted a two-year reprieve on his death sentence on his appeal to Shanxi's provincial high court.

Under the presidency of Hu Jintao between 2003 and 2013, death penalties handed to corrupt officials were also rare but the sums involved were smaller.

Xu Maiyong and Jiang Renjie, former mayors of the eastern cities of Hangzhou and Suzhou, respectively, were corrupt officials who paid the ultimate price. Both were put to death in 2011.

Xu pleaded guilty to accepting more than 160 million yuan in bribes and embezzling more than 53 million yuan, while Jiang pocketed more than 100 million yuan.

Zheng Xiaoyu, director of the State Food and Drug Administration of China from 2003 to 2005, was sentenced to death for taking more than 6.49 million yuan. He was executed in 2007 in a case that was deemed extraordinary because he oversaw a sector considered highly consequential to the health of all Chinese.

Liu Changsong, director and founder of Beijing Mugong Law Firm, said although today's 1 billion yuan red line was "a rough threshold", any final decision on death penalty sentencing involved many other factors, including harm to the country and society from the crime, and mitigating circumstances such as a sincere confession of guilt, expression of repentance and efforts to return the proceeds of crime.

"In some cases, if the harm caused is extremely terrible, even if the bribe amount is not much, or just over the limit, the death penalty may be imposed," he said, noting the case of Lin Shiyuan, former deputy secretary of Chongqing's Qijiang county in 1999.

Lin was found guilty of accepting bribes of 110,000 yuan, which was just over the 100,000 yuan limit deemed to be serious corruption. But he was sentenced to death because the bribes he took led to the neglect of a local bridge that collapsed in 1999, killing 40 people. He managed to plead to a suspended death sentence in the second instance by reporting his boss for corruption.

Li Jianping, who is accused of receiving bribes from mining businessmen in the resource-rich Inner Mongolia region, was charged with pocketing 3 billion yuan in total – a record amount in recent decades. It is an example of what China's anti-corruption agency calls "small officials with big corruption".

According to Deng Yuwen, a former deputy editor of the Study Times, the Central Party School's official newspaper, China is likely to see the death penalty handed down to more corrupt officials as Xi puts hugely lucrative sectors – including finance and mining – in the cross hairs of anti-corruption investigators.

"Despite his rank, the total amount on Li's charge paper is even bigger than [that for] Lai Xiaomin, who was of deputy-ministerial rank, and held the previous corruption record," Deng said.

"That shows that while rank can be important, the position and what sectors under their control is key. If he is in charge of approving land usage, mining rights, etc, people will be willing to pay him top money or give him shares in the business to get a bite of the cake."

Rock 'n' roll, internet are potential Western 'colour revolution' traps: Chinese textbook

04 September 2024, SCMP, Alcott Wei

Rock 'n' roll, pop music and the internet are Western vices that can be used to sow the seeds of "colour revolution" among Chinese youth, according to China's latest college textbook on national security. The textbook, which was officially launched last week, represents the latest move from Beijing to strengthen ideological control and promote national security among young Chinese.

The book, National Security Education Reader for College Students, will be used in the foundational course on national security education in universities, according to Community Party mouthpiece People's Daily.

According to the book, university students must remain vigilant against Western popular culture and beware of "colour revolution" traps when surfing online.

"Colour revolution" is Beijing's code for subversion instigated by Western powers, and their attempts to infiltrate various sectors of society and fuel unrest with the purpose of overthrowing the ruling establishment.

"The internet is a key channel of communication; popular culture like pop and rock music are often used as covers for [colour revolution]," the textbook warns.

It cites the 2010 Jasmine Revolution in Tunisia and the Arab spring movement that followed as examples of colour revolutions, arguing that these movements led to national turmoil.

The new textbook is based on various speeches on national security by President Xi Jinping and includes several essays tailored for university students.

The Ministry of Education, which held a symposium on Friday to mark the launch of the book, has urged teachers to make full use of it to boost awareness of national security risks.

"Comprehensively promote the use of the textbook, effectively equip university students to have a proper understanding of the concept of overall national security, guide them to become the firm practitioners of national security," the ministry said in an announcement on the launch.

Students are also required to study the meaning of "overall national security" – a concept put forward by Xi in 2014 about raising such awareness and written into the National Security Law a year later. The book argues that the internet is a crucial platform for shaping public opinion, and China must defend cyberspace as it is a key battleground for national security in its ideological struggle with the West.

It also says that failure to safeguard national security was the main reason behind the collapse of the former Soviet Union, which had abandoned Marxism and one-party rule.

Xi has repeatedly called on his party to learn from the lessons of the Soviet Union's disintegration to avoid a similar fate.

It uses quotes from ancient Chinese texts to argue that university students should have a sense of crisis about national security, saying that they must be conscious about their roles in safeguarding national security, actively take part in related activities on campus and be vigilant against foreign infiltration.

"It's imperative to heighten sensitivity about national security on campus, and individuals must take the initiative and dare to struggle."

Primary and junior high schools have also been issued new textbooks that emphasise national security and traditional culture, state broadcaster CCTV reported as the autumn semester began on Sunday.

Since Xi came to power over a decade ago, the leadership in Beijing has stepped up national security education in school as a defence against what it calls infiltration by Western forces among Chinese youth.

In 2015, China designated April 15 as National Security Education Day, with numerous related activities organised in schools every year on this day since then.

In a speech delivered at the National Education Conference in 2018, Xi attacked Western countries for their attempts to "westernise" Chinese youth and orchestrate colour revolutions, as he stressed the importance of ideological education in classrooms. The speech was recently published in the party journal Qiushi.

China is pushing divisive political messages online using fake U.S. voters

03 September 2024, NPR, Shannon Bond

A long-running Chinese influence operation is posing as American voters on social media in an attempt to exacerbate social divisions ahead of the 2024 presidential election, according to a new report from the research company Graphika.

The push by the campaign known as "Spamouflage" includes accounts claiming to be American voters and U.S. soldiers. They posted about hot-button topics including reproductive rights, homelessness, U.S. support for Ukraine, and American policy toward Israel. They criticized President Joe Biden and Vice President Kamala Harris as well as former President Donald Trump and the Republican Party, and sometimes used artificial intelligence tools to create content.

The group of fake accounts Graphika identified is small — 15 accounts on X (formerly known as Twitter), one on TikTok, as well as a persona impersonating a U.S. news outlet across platforms. They claimed to be U.S. citizens or U.S.-focused activists “frustrated by American politics and the West,” the report said. With the exception of one TikTok video, they didn’t gain much traction with real users online.

Still, the activity underscores how China is “engaging in these more advanced deceptive behaviors and directly targeting these organic but hyper-sensitive social rifts” as part of a broader effort “to portray the U.S. as this declining global power with weak political leadership and a failing system of governance,” said Jack Stubbs, Graphika’s chief intelligence officer.

The U.S. intelligence community said in its most recent election security update in late July that China’s influence operations “are using social media to sow divisions in the United States and portray democracies as chaotic.”

However, intelligence officials say they do not believe Beijing plans to influence the outcome of the presidential election, which may explain why the Spamouflage cluster Graphika identified targeted both Democrats and Republicans.

“Generally, the accounts were very critical of Biden, but we also saw them criticizing Trump as well, and in more recent weeks, actually increasingly targeting Kamala Harris since Biden dropped off the ticket,” Stubbs said. “It looks to us like they were attempting to build their fake identities less around an individual party or individual party candidate and more around the idea of U.S. patriotism or national pride.”

Graphika is a research company that studies social networks and online communities for companies, tech platforms, human rights organizations and universities.

The findings build on another report earlier this year from the Institute for Strategic Dialogue, a nonprofit which studies extremism and disinformation, that uncovered four other Spamouflage accounts on X posing as supporters of Trump and the MAGA movement.

Graphika first publicly identified the Spamouflage operation in 2019. It’s grown into one of the most sprawling networks of fake accounts across the internet. It has largely focused on pushing pro-China narratives, including attacks on pro-democracy protesters in Hong Kong, praise for China’s COVID-19 response, and AI-generated news videos promoting Chinese leadership. More recently, it has also begun posting about American politics and elections. Last year, Facebook owner Meta linked the operation to Chinese law enforcement.

The accounts Graphika identified bore many hallmarks of Spamouflage activity, including coordinated posting and sharing content that has previously been linked to the operation. Some accounts occasionally slipped up and posted in Chinese. One account on X, calling itself “Common fireman,” was previously branded as a pro-China media outlet, Graphika said.

Stubbs cautioned that the cluster of accounts Graphika found is “one small sliver of this wider operation.” He noted a larger portion of the Spamouflage network is also targeting the U.S. using different types of accounts. “And then there are huge parts of the network that are targeting issues in Hong Kong, for example, or the broader Indo-Pacific, that aren’t directly concerned with the upcoming U.S. election.”

While the cluster’s efforts went largely unnoticed by real people, it did strike one success. A TikTok account posing as a conservative American news outlet and social media influencer posted a video mocking Biden in July that was viewed 1.5 million times, Graphika said.

TikTok said it has taken the account down for violating its policies, as well as the other accounts Graphika identified.

“The TikTok accounts referenced in this report have been banned, and we will continue to remove deceptive accounts and harmful misinformation as we protect the integrity of our platform during the US elections,” a TikTok spokesperson said.

The fake news outlet also has an account on X, and previously had a YouTube channel and Instagram account, both of which have been taken down.

Stubbs said it wasn’t clear why that particular video had been removed, but that occasional hits are possible with a “high volume, low impact” operation like Spamouflage.

“They’re just throwing a lot of stuff out there, and every now and then a little bit of it will stick,” he said. “But it’s probably worth noting that throwing spaghetti at the wall and hoping that occasionally a piece will stick doesn’t feel to be a recipe for longer term success.”

August

China places former chairman of top aircraft maker AVIC under investigation for corruption

31 August 2024, SCMP, Jane Cai

A former head of China's leading aircraft manufacturer has been placed under investigation as Beijing pushes ahead with anti-corruption efforts in sectors crucial to its military capacity.

Tan Ruisong, chairman of the Aviation Industry Corporation of China (AVIC) from 2018 to 2023, is suspected to have committed "severe violations" of the law and Communist Party discipline.

He is being investigated by the party's Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) and the National Commission of Supervision, according to a statement released on Friday.

The country's top anti-corruption watchdogs did not provide details of the alleged "severe violations", a euphemism for corruption.

Tan, 62, was removed from his post at state-owned giant AVIC in March 2023 for age reasons, according to the party's personnel management arm.

Tan, a native of Hunan province, is a technocrat trained in aviation engine design, manufacturing and engineering. He had spent two decades with AVIC, a conglomerate with over 100 subsidiaries and 450,000 employees worldwide – more than America's Boeing and Europe's Airbus combined.

AVIC was the sixth largest defence contractor globally as of 2022 and second largest Chinese defence contractor by annual revenue after China North Industries Group, according to data from the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute.

In 2022, Tan vowed to turn AVIC into a world-class military equipment supplier.

The company aimed to become an industry champion like "the national ping pong team", he told the China International Aviation & Aerospace Exhibition, the country's premier air show held in the southern city of Zhuhai every two years.

AVIC is at the forefront of China's drive to become more technologically self-reliant, and makes products for military use as well as for the civil aviation market. Through its many subsidiaries, it manufactures some of China's leading fighter aircraft such as the J-10, J-11, and J-20.

The company is also a major supplier of components for China's small regional jet ARJ-21 and the C919, a narrowbody medium-haul aircraft. Its exports include the regional turboprop MA60 series and Y12s, and the AC series helicopters.

The aerospace and defence industry sector is a major source of technocrats favoured by Chinese President Xi Jinping to become part of the political elite. However, it has become a key target of Beijing's anti-graft campaign since nine generals including previous and serving commanders from the rocket and air forces were dismissed from the top legislature in December, after several of them were placed under investigation.

The shake-up exposed rampant irregularities in bidding and procurement processes for military equipment.

Months later, in June, former defence minister Li Shangfu and his predecessor Wei Fenghe were both expelled from the party as Beijing confirmed they were being investigated on suspicion of corruption.

The announcement of the unprecedented move came eight months after the abrupt dismissal of Li, making him China's shortest-serving defence minister.

Li, 66, previously oversaw military procurement. He was accused of accepting "large sums of money" to seek benefits for others, and allegedly bribing others. Wei was accused of accepting a huge amount of money and helping others to gain improper benefits. AVIC and other eight state-owned enterprises operating in key sectors including nuclear, aerospace and shipbuilding promised in July to tighten their bidding and procurement rules as well as look at areas such as hiring and quality control, following a series of inspections by the CCDI.

A number of senior defence company executives have already been caught up in the anti-corruption campaign. China Aerospace Science and Technology Corporation (CASC), a main contractor for the country's space programme, said 36 employees had been the subject of the party's disciplinary action and seven had been handed over to judicial authorities.

Former CASC chairman Wu Yansheng was among three senior aerospace-defence executives stripped of their seats on the country's top political advisory body, the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), in December.

China's Communist Party brings in new rules to regulate faith, loyalty and performance

30 August 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Regulations target members who are not guilty of serious breaches but 'lack revolutionary spirit' or fail to pay membership fees on time.

China's Communist Party has rolled out a set of new rules to remove incompetent members deemed lagging in their faith, loyalty and performance, in a bid to further strengthen the party's control over the conduct of its nearly 100 million members.

The new rules released by the party's general office on Thursday, decree that underperforming party members, whose conduct might not warrant a formal corruption investigation, be disqualified from the party, state-run Xinhua news agency said.

Comprising 27 articles, the rules are "crucial for exercising full and rigorous" party self-cleansing, according to Xinhua, quoting an official from the Central Organisation Department, the party's top personnel office.

Unlike disciplinary measures imposed on party members who violate the party's discipline, for example through corruption, this new set of regulations specifically targets party members who "lack revolutionary spirit, fail to fulfil their party obligations, or no longer meet party membership criteria", the official told Xinhua.

It is essential for establishing a team of party members with "stronger beliefs, better political reliability, superior qualities, stricter discipline and more significant contributions", the official said.

According to Xie Maosong, a senior research fellow at the National Strategy Institute at Tsinghua University, party membership is a necessity for those who want to climb the political or social ladder, but that many slack off after joining the party.

"The party is already very big. While it is growing in numbers, it must also control the quality of people who are in the party," Xie said.

According to the report issued by the Central Organisation Department in June, the party had more than 99.18 million members at the end of 2023, up by more than 1.14 million from 2022.

Xie said that previously the party had mainly relied on the party's anti-graft watchdogs for self-cleansing but, they can only tackle serious wrongdoing.

Many with smaller conduct problems had previously not resulted in disciplinary action, but the organisation department will now have the necessary means to show the exit to those who were lagging behind, he said.

The official from the Central Organisation Department told Xinhua party branches were now required to closely watch their members' conduct and set a deadline for underperforming members – such as those failing to take part in regular party activities or pay membership fees in full and on time – to rectify their behaviour.

Party branches will now be able expel members who have lost their ideals and beliefs, waver in their political stance, neglect work assigned to them by the party, are disloyal to the party or fail to take part in party organisational activities for six months without a valid reason.

Depending on the circumstances, they can also persuade those who fail to rectify their conduct to withdraw from the party voluntarily or it can expel them, according to the official.

The official added that members who threaten to leave the Communist Party as an attempt to gain leverage will be strongly encouraged to leave the party if they do not change their behaviour despite consultation.

New Chinese textbooks play up national security, Xi Jinping Thought and Vietnam, India wars

28 August 2024, SCMP

New Chinese school textbooks will give more space to national security and traditional culture in Beijing's latest move to step up ideological propaganda and control.

Primary and junior high school students starting the autumn semester next week will be handed the new textbooks on Chinese language, history, as well as morality and law, state broadcaster CCTV said on Tuesday.

Morality and law was known until 2016 as ideology and politics. It is a mandatory subject that promotes the ideology of the ruling Communist Party.

Topics highlighted in the new textbooks include the president's political philosophy, Xi Jinping Thought. There will also be an emphasis on traditional Chinese culture and national security, according to a Ministry of Education official cited in the report.

All Chinese nationals receive nine years of compulsory education, six in primary school and the rest in junior high. The new textbooks will initially be used in the first and seventh grades, and will be extended to all nine grades within three years, according to CCTV. The new morality and law textbook would introduce the "main content and historical status" of Xi Jinping Thought, the report said.

Officially known as "Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era", Xi's political philosophy was enshrined in China's constitution in 2018.

However, it has expanded in recent years to include seven aspects, covering his instructions on economic, diplomatic, military and environmental matters, as well as the law, propaganda and party discipline.

Earlier this year, the study of these ideas was made a top priority for all party organisations across the country, with orders to hold regular meetings to study Xi's speeches and directives.

The new history textbooks will include the brief but bloody border war in 1962 between China and India, which ended with India's defeat after four weeks.

China and India are still at odds over their ill-defined Himalayan border, involving more than 120,000 sq km (46,300 square miles) of disputed territory. Both countries maintain a significant military presence in the border areas, and were involved in another deadly conflict in June 2020.

The 1979 China-Vietnam conflict will also feature in the new history books. Some 300,000 Chinese troops entered Vietnam to prevent Hanoi from overthrowing the Beijing-backed Khmer Rouge regime in Cambodia. The conflict caused tens of thousands of casualties on both sides in what Beijing called a "self-defence war against Vietnam".

However it has long been silent on the issue, including not organising public commemorations of its 40th anniversary in 2019 and trying to prevent veterans from paying tribute.

Vietnam seeks Chinese investment and technical support, but the 1979 war and territorial disputes with Beijing in the South China Sea are potential hurdles to bilateral ties.

The Ministry of Education official quoted in the CCTV report said the new content would "allow students to deeply understand that national security is a top priority and that everyone has a responsibility to safeguard it".

Earlier this year, the study of these ideas was made a top priority for all party organisations across the country, with orders to hold regular meetings to study Xi's speeches and directives.

The new history textbooks will include the brief but bloody border war in 1962 between China and India, which ended with India's defeat after four weeks.

China and India are still at odds over their ill-defined Himalayan border, involving more than 120,000 sq km (46,300 square miles) of disputed territory. Both countries maintain a significant military presence in the border areas, and were involved in another deadly conflict in June 2020.

The 1979 China-Vietnam conflict will also feature in the new history books. Some 300,000 Chinese troops entered Vietnam to prevent Hanoi from overthrowing the Beijing-backed Khmer Rouge regime in Cambodia. The conflict caused tens of thousands of casualties on both sides in what Beijing called a "self-defence war against Vietnam".

However it has long been silent on the issue, including not organising public commemorations of its 40th anniversary in 2019 and trying to prevent veterans from paying tribute.

Vietnam seeks Chinese investment and technical support, but the 1979 war and territorial disputes with Beijing in the South China Sea are potential hurdles to bilateral ties.

The Ministry of Education official quoted in the CCTV report said the new content would "allow students to deeply understand that national security is a top priority and that everyone has a responsibility to safeguard it".

China to make marriage easier, divorce harder in latest move to reverse population decline

25 August 2024, Tibetan Review

China had found it easier to punish its citizens in the past for violating its decades-long one-child policy than to motivate them now to have more children. With incentive policies having failed, its civil affairs ministry has now released a draft amendment to the Regulation on Marriage Registration this month, with the aim to make it easier for citizens to get married and harder to get divorced.

Calling it an important change to "build happy and harmonious families", the ministry has opened the draft amendment for public feedback until Sep 11.

For decades, families were ruined by impositions of steep fines and loss of jobs and opportunities for violating the country's draconian one-child norm. But now, with its population shrinking and rapidly ageing, the country is facing a demographic crisis. Policymakers have been struggling to encourage young people to get married and have children.

According to official data, some 3.43 million people registered for marriage in the first six months of 2024 – down 12% from a year ago and the lowest number in a decade, noted the scmp.com Aug 25.

The birth rate meanwhile plunged to a record low of 9.02 million births in 2023, the National Bureau of Statistics was cited as saying.

Under the revised regulation, couples can get married using just their ID cards anywhere in the country. Previously, they also needed their official household registration, or hukou, and could only marry in the places where they were registered.

The revision also includes a 30-day cooling-off period for a divorce, when either party may withdraw their application. This only applies to divorce applications made at registry offices, not divorce by lawsuit.

But it remains doubtful whether the new legislation would make any significant difference. Faced with high living costs, a challenging job market and increasing work pressure, many young people are choosing not to marry and start families. In addition, more women are becoming well-educated and financially independent, which has led to more individual freedom and choices, the report noted.

The government has been trying to drive up the birth rate with incentives that included cheaper housing, tax cuts and even cash payments. President Xi Jinping has called for women to return to more traditional roles, urging officials to “foster a new type of marriage and childbearing culture”.

But many young people are drawn to the narrative that marriage is a trap and has no benefits, the report noted.

For some young people, the trend away from marriage is liberating. Tiffany Chen, an unmarried film producer in Beijing, said it showed that young people saw marriage as an outdated institution, the report said. “When young people are no longer getting married, it means that they believe love, intimacy, sex and companionship – crucial concepts to humankind – are no longer linked to a marriage,” she has said.

China moves to ease low-level officials out from endless meetings, reports and red tape

25 August 2024, SCMP, Xinlu Liang

‘Formalism’ is viewed as scourge of grass-roots officials pushed to meet onerous standards and carry out ‘pointless formalities’.

China has unveiled new regulations to tackle “formalism” and reduce the burden on grass-roots officials to improve governance amid endless red tape.

The issue of formalism – characterised by excessive paperwork, meetings and inspections – has hindered the ability of local leaders to effectively do their job, according to the new regulations released by the General Office of the Central Committee and the State Council.

The regulations were created as a vital part of the party’s broader efforts to enhance governance quality and align with directives laid out by President Xi Jinping during the third plenum, a spokesperson from the General Office of the Central Committee told Xinhua on Monday, adding: “For the first time, it has established institutional norms in the form of intraparty regulations aimed at reducing burdens at the grass-roots level”.

This initiative responds to a long-standing problem in which junior party officials often feel overwhelmed by a barrage of meetings and extensive reports they must produce. These pressures have hindered Xi’s ambitions related to anti-corruption, revitalising the sluggish economy and rejuvenating the nation.

During last month’s third plenum, China also announced plans to improve mechanisms aimed at reducing “pointless formalities and bureaucratism”.

The published resolution emphasised the need to streamline meetings, documents and initiatives while curtailing community-level inspections and evaluations. It said there would be efforts to enhance the quality of research and make such activities less frequent.

“We will formulate lists of duties for towns and townships [urban subdistricts] and refine the long-term mechanisms for reducing their burdens,” it added.

The newly enacted document includes reforms to streamline documentation, limit meetings, revise assessment protocols and ease burdens imposed on local-level organisations.

New guidelines governing how local policy documents are created aim to keep tasks to a minimum. Additionally, the document advises against using unnecessarily complex evaluation systems or burdening officials with detailed criteria, allowing them to focus on taking policy action instead.

In April, the central working group tackling formalism and China’s top anti-corruption watchdog, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), reported instances of junior cadres being burdened by bureaucratic tasks.

According to a report jointly released by the CCDI and a central working group tackling formalism, the education bureau conducted an unauthorised initiative in Changchun in Jilin province.

In 2023, the bureau changed the frequency of evaluations from every two years to annually and expanded the original 98 evaluation criteria into 179 scoring standards – resulting in some schools having to prepare around 1,000 review documents.

The Nanguan District Education Bureau even borrowed veteran teachers from primary and secondary schools to work in the bureau.

The same joint report said China’s state-owned pipeline giant PipeChina faced criticism for poorly coordinating meetings across departments.

In 2022, its headquarters ordered participation in more than 800 meetings. On average, the employees had to attend more than three meetings each work day.

Concerns about excessive meetings were raised to relevant departments last September, but their number further increased over the following six months.

“This high volume of meetings significantly consumed work time, prompting strong feedback from employees regarding the inefficiency and disruption caused by such practices,” the CCDI notice said.

The rules tighten the management of government-run social media accounts and applications to ease the pressure of preventing damage from zombie accounts, hackers and trolls.

Earlier this year, Beijing’s cyberspace watchdog ordered many local governments to shut down their social media accounts, once seen as a propaganda tool, amid budget cuts, institutional reforms and fatigue among the officials managing these accounts.

Additionally, stricter rules have been put in place to stop higher-level offices borrowing too many staff members from local units, including a broad range of public sector workers such as teachers.

He Xuefeng, a professor at Wuhan University specialising in rural governance, said higher-level departments often shifted responsibilities to grass-roots organisations while imposing stringent requirements, leading to chaos and confusion.

"Due to overly strict demands and excessive tasks from above, along with insufficient governance resources at the grass-roots level and many requirements that do not align with local realities, grass-roots organisations can only resort to formalism to cope with the bureaucratic demands of higher departments," he wrote in an article published on Monday by the local media outlet Guancha.cn.

He said that in one example in Henan province, village officials reported that collecting rural health insurance fees was more challenging than collecting agricultural taxes.

According to He, the burden on farmers had increased significantly and many were not willing to pay. Last year, they had to pay 380 yuan (US$53) per person for the year, compared to just 10 yuan (US$1.40) previously.

To meet collection goals, higher-level health insurance departments rank grass-roots organisations based on their performance in collecting health insurance, often leading to punitive measures for those that fall short, he wrote.

This system "shifts the responsibility of fee collection onto village officials instead of allowing voluntary participation from residents", creating significant frustration and confusion, He wrote.

In light of this challenge, the new regulations call for clear duty descriptions for townships and streets to ensure that the assessment of grass-roots work is based on defined responsibilities, preventing responsibilities being transferred from higher authorities.

Cai Qi, China's No 5 official and Xi's chief of staff, has emphasised the importance of ongoing reforms to reduce formalism. During a meeting on Tuesday, he urged officials to streamline inspections, evaluations and assessments to lessen the burden on grass-roots units, allowing them to focus more on "practical implementation".

China's Politburo meeting stresses Chinese-ness, ethnic unity, border stability

23 August 2024, Tibetan Review

The Political Bureau (Politburo) of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee has called for the forging of a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation to safeguard ethnic unity and stability in border areas during a meeting it held on Aug 23 to review policies and measures to open up a new vista in the large-scale development of the western region, according to China's official Xinhua news agency.

The meeting of China's top decision-making body was stated to have been chaired by Xi Jinping, general secretary of the CPC Central Committee.

The meeting was stated to have urged focused efforts to pursue well-coordinated environmental conservation, large-scale opening-up, and high-quality development, and move faster to create a new pattern of development to elevate overall regional strength and sustainable development capacity.

These are often euphemisms employed by the Chinese leadership to implement policies for forced-relocation of Tibetan farmers and nomads, and for the facilitation of the settlement of burgeoning Chinese immigrants for a speedy Sinicization of the Tibetan Plateau. Many Tibetan farmers and herders have been force-relocated to newly built villages in remote areas near the borders with India, Bhutan and Nepal to act as eyes and ears for China's security apparatus, with little consideration for their largely subsidy-based living condition.

Efforts should be made to deepen reform comprehensively, further unleash and develop the productive forces, boost the vitality of society, and blaze a path of Chinese modernization that suits the realities of the region, a statement released after the meeting was cited as saying.

Measures will be taken to advance the new urbanization in accordance with local conditions, consolidate the poverty alleviation achievements, and make sure that there will be no relapsing into poverty on a large scale in rural areas, the meeting was cited as saying.

Much of the forced relocations in Tibet take place in the name of environmental protection and improving living conditions of Tibetan farmers and herders. The meeting was stated to have stressed "efforts to promote high-level environmental conservation, build a beautiful western region, thoroughly carry out pollution prevention and control, and advance green and low-carbon development."

Forging a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation, a euphemism for Sinicizing the ethnic minority regions, is also seen to have been stressed at the 4th Qomolangma Forum on Tibetan Studies held in Chengdu, capital of Sichuan province, from Aug 21 to 23.

Held four times since 2010 and organized by the China Association for Preservation and Development of Tibetan Culture and the China Tibetology Research Centre, nearly a hundred scholars from universities and scientific research institutions in Sichuan, Yunnan, Gansu and Qinghai provinces, as well as Beijing and the Tibet autonomous region were stated to have attended this year's forum.

The participants were stated to have "exchanged academic research results from the perspectives of the contemporary inheritance and innovation of Tibetan studies, the practice of Chinese-style modernization in Xizang, and the forging of a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation."

As China celebrates Deng Xiaoping's legacy, the country is again at a crossroads

22 August 2024, SCMP, Chow Chung-yan, Jane Cai and William Zheng

Deng and his 'true heir' Xi Jinping differ in strategies and approaches, but closer examination reveals many core similarities.

As China commemorates the 120th anniversary of Deng Xiaoping's birth, the Post examines his legacy across generations. In the first of a three-part series, we look at Deng's continuing resonance with the ruling Communist Party's leadership.

Chairman Mao Zedong called him the "steel factory" for his uncompromising resolve. Yet he was also a master of charm – winning the hearts and minds of the American public in one swoop by donning a cowboy hat on the first visit by a Chinese communist leader to the US.

The "chief architect" of the greatest economic liberation programme in history was also the man who demanded that the Communist Party "unwaveringly uphold the dictatorship of the proletariat", nipping the country's democracy movement in its bud.

As China celebrates the 120th anniversary of the birth of the late paramount leader Deng Xiaoping, the seemingly contradictory duality of the man and his legacy continue to resonate.

In Chinese culture, 60 years is known as jiazi, representing the full alignment cycle between heaven and earth.

The commemoration of Deng's 120th birthday on August 22 comes at a most intriguing time. After four decades of spectacular growth thanks to Deng's reforms, the world is again "standing at a crossroads of history", as his modern-day successor Xi Jinping put it.

Comparisons between the two men are almost inevitable. Xi, said to be the most powerful Chinese leader since Deng, is often depicted in Western narratives as the "dismantler" of Deng's reforms – an assertion that Beijing would angrily dismiss as a smear. Xi, according to various official reports and his own speeches, regards himself as Deng's true heir and the one to see through the great mission that Deng started – the rejuvenation of China as a great civilisation.

Although the two leaders differed in their strategies and approaches, closer examination reveals many core similarities.

Each of them faced critical moments that would decide the Communist Party's very survival and reacted by breaking with the conventions and paths set by their predecessors.

Both Deng and Xi embarked on a zealous mission to restore China to its position as a great world power, and they shared a conviction that the Communist Party is indispensable to achieving that goal.

Deng was the first to warn that China must chart its own reform path and not blindly copy the Western model. He sneered at Mikhail Gorbachev's "perestroika" reforms in the Soviet Union, even as they were widely praised in the West.

"My father thinks Gorbachev is an idiot," Deng's younger son, Deng Zhifang, once told a friend.

By dismantling the Communist Party's power structure, "he [Gorbachev] will lose the power to fix the problems before people kick him out", the younger Deng recalled his father predicting, ahead of the Soviet Union's eventual collapse in 1991.

"Deng likes to say that he was groping for the stones as he crossed the river," wrote Ezra Vogel in his book Deng Xiaoping and the Transformation of China. "But in fact, he had developed strong convictions about getting across that particular river. One was that the Communist Party should be in charge."

Deng Yuwen, former deputy chief editor of the Central Party School's Study Times, also called Deng "a diehard communist".

"He did not want anyone using his reform initiative to damage the party's rule. He laid down the 'Four Cardinal Principles' to safeguard that."

The cardinal principles required Chinese leaders to adhere to the socialist path, the people's democratic dictatorship, the party's leadership, and Mao Zedong's Thought and Marxism-Leninism principles – the same message that Xi likes to stress.

"The most distinct feature of Comrade Deng's thoughts and practices is [they start] from reality, from the general trend of the world and from the situation and conditions of China," said Xi, in a 2014 speech to mark the 110th anniversary of his predecessor's birth. "A developing country like China would not rise if its people had no national dignity or the country lost its independence," Xi said. "We should not belittle ourselves, forget our heritage or betray the motherland."

Xi upheld Deng's Four Principles and answered with his own "Four Convictions" – officially translated as the Four Confidences.

These demand that the party's 99 million members demonstrate full faith in China's path, its unique political theories and system, and its rich history and culture. The language and terminology used may differ, but the two men spoke with one voice.

Consensus, centralisation

However, each of them inherited a China facing drastically different challenges and conditions, and each responded with a unique approach.

When Deng and his colleagues emerged from the aftermath of the Cultural Revolution, the party and the country were on the brink of collapse. The decade-long anarchy had left the party's structure fragmented and ideologically divided.

Deng realised that his first task was to pull the party out of a quagmire of ideological infighting and shift the focus to economic growth. He opted for collective leadership – a consensus-building mechanism that gave the different factions seats at the table. "Meetings should be small and short ... If you don't have anything to say, save your breath ... the only reason to have meetings is to solve problems"

- Deng Xiaoping

Many of the unwritten rules in Chinese politics were formed in the years that followed, including the customary retirement age of 68 for senior leaders and the immunity from prosecution for former top leaders. These rules provided basic power-sharing and a mutual protection framework that made it possible for the factions to work together.

It was a design born out of pragmatism. Deng and his colleagues realised that factional and ideological differences would lead to little actual result and must be set aside.

If they could not reunite their divided party and refocus minds on economic development, the party's very survival – along with the People's Republic of China – would be in doubt.

While Deng was the unquestioned leader, he had the support of other party elders, such as Chen Yun – like Deng, a founding father of the People's Republic – and other peers. In his book, Vogel called Deng China's "general manager".

Deng's emphasis on pragmatism is best reflected in his speech at the closing of the fifth plenum of the 11th party congress.

"Meetings should be small and short. They should not be held at all unless the participants have prepared ... If you don't have anything to say, save your breath ... the only reason to have meetings is to solve problems," he said.

"There should be collective leadership in settling major issues. But when it comes to particular jobs or tasks, individual responsibility must be clearly defined, and each person should be held responsible."

The principle of collective leadership was designed to revitalise the party, as well as to prevent any faction from total domination.

While it proved useful, its shortcomings gradually become apparent. The striving for superficial unity eventually led to extreme caution, inertia and a breakdown of party discipline.

Later party chiefs would increasingly struggle to assemble a support team of their own choosing or to carry out reform programmes that would upset entrenched interest groups.

This was most apparent under former president Hu Jintao, who expanded the powerful Politburo Standing Committee's membership to nine to accommodate conflicting factional demands.

The decision-making body was half-jokingly referred to as the "nine dragons ruling the rainfall", in reference to an idiom observing that when power is shared, no one is powerful enough to effect a downpour.

With no strong leadership at the top and responsibility spread across the team, party discipline broke down, breeding rampant corruption as well as abuses of power and even insubordination.

Xi responded to the crisis by launching the largest anti-corruption campaign in the party's history and a drive to recentralise power. In the process, the unwritten rules – such as the exemption from prosecution of former top leaders – were shattered.

While the two leaders opted for opposing strategies, both Deng and Xi were aiming for the same goal – to refocus the party's minds on the common goal of national rejuvenation.

And Xi, like Deng, is also known for his dislike of "empty talk", often urging the party's cadres to "roll up their sleeves and work harder".

Xi's move to recentralise power was based on his view that the party was in danger of losing its cohesion and being hijacked by powerful interest groups, in a repeat of Gorbachev's Soviet Union.

Such concerns have deep roots in Chinese governing philosophy. Han Fei – whose teachings of 2,200 years ago formed the foundation of the Qin empire – said "the key to governing [a vast empire] with pressing issues on all fronts is a strong core".

Xi cited this quote in a keynote speech to the Politburo Standing Committee on January 15, 2018 – two months before the National People's Congress approved the amendment to the constitution removing presidential term limits.

Legacy and challenges

Deng's reforms transformed China in just 30 years – half a jiazi, before heaven and earth could complete one full cycle of alignment – from one of the poorest countries to the world's second-largest economy.

"If there is one leader to whom most Chinese people express gratitude for improvements in their daily lives, it is Deng Xiaoping," Vogel wrote.

"Did any other leader in the 20th century do more to improve the lives of so many? Did any other 20th-century leader have such a large and lasting influence on world history?"

Yet the Chinese leader's unparalleled success also created a host of problems. Towards the end of Vogel's book – written in 2011, just a year before Xi's ascension to power – the Harvard professor listed five challenges for Deng's successors.

They were: to contain corruption; provide universal social security; preserve the environment; maintain the party's legitimacy to rule; and to redefine and manage the boundaries of freedom. All have been top of the agenda under Xi.

"Things have changed so much ... but China still follows the route set by Deng, aiming to achieve rejuvenation by the construction of a unique China, no matter how the party's narrative put it," said Victor Gao, a former foreign ministry official and a translator for Deng in the 1980s.

According to Gao, vice-president of the Beijing-based think tank Centre for China and Globalisation, Deng's "vision and thinking remain relevant today" as the country "faces many challenges on how to open up to the world".

"It calls for an outstanding leader who can see the big picture clearly and work from the right direction, just like Deng did," he said.

Honour reformer Deng Xiaoping by realising China's revival, Xi Jinping urges nation

22 August 2024, SCMP

Deng Xiaoping is heralded as the "architect" of China's economic reform, transforming a poor, backward country into a global superpower. Photo: AFP

The best way to commemorate Communist Party patriarch Deng Xiaoping is to persevere to realise the mission of national rejuvenation, Chinese President Xi Jinping said on Thursday, the 120th anniversary of the late leader's birth.

Paying tribute to Deng's political legacy while also identifying with it, Xi called on the country to rally behind his own policies on establishing a modern economic system, promoting hi-tech self-reliance, and safeguarding national sovereignty and development interests.

"The enduring tribute to Comrade Deng Xiaoping is to continue pushing forward the cause of socialism with Chinese characteristics he initiated," Xi told top government and party officials as well as Deng's relatives and former staff at Beijing's Great Hall of the People, according to state news agency Xinhua.

Xi delivered the address at a commemorative event held every decade around August 22 – a tradition that allows the party's leaders to reconnect with its founding fathers and announce a path forward.

He used the event to offer a salute to the past and to acknowledge the political challenges of today.

Xi said Deng's "one country, two systems" proposal – which defines Hong Kong and Macau's relationship with the mainland – "opened up a new path to achieve the complete reunification" of China in a peaceful way. The principle did so because it was centred on the country's fundamental, overall and long-term interests, ensuring both autonomy and stability in the two special administrative regions.

"We must steadfastly implement the one country, two systems policy and promote Hong Kong and Macau's integration into the national development framework," Xi said, in a year that not only marks 40th anniversary of the Sino-British Joint Declaration, a key document over the handover of Hong Kong to China, but also the 25th anniversary of the return of Macau to China.

One country, two systems was also supposed to be a template for unification with Taiwan.

In his address, Xi restated Beijing's unyielding position against Taiwanese independence, and presented himself as taking on the responsibility left by the party's elders.

"Achieving national reunification is not merely an aspiration of past leaders like Mao Zedong and Deng Xiaoping, but a collective yearning of the Chinese people both home and abroad, and also an unstoppable historical trend."

Beijing regards Taiwan as a part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. Most countries, including the United States, do not recognise Taiwan as an independent state, but Washington is against any move to take it by force and is committed to arming the island.

Deng, who died in 1997 at the age of 92, is credited as the "architect" of China's economic reform which transformed a poor, backward country into a global superpower.

He dismantled the constraints of a heavily regulated planned economy and pioneered a hybrid market economy that has propelled China onto the world stage. He also reintroduced public examinations for university admissions and government jobs, laying the groundwork for the resurgence of education, science and technology in modern China.

But the anniversary comes as China grapples with unprecedented challenges, including economic sluggishness, rising unemployment and an intensified rivalry with the US.

With the country at a new crossroads, the leadership is drawing lessons from Deng but also searching for a path through the international tensions and economic headwinds.

"As we embark on this new journey in a new era, we must deeply study and apply Deng Xiaoping Theory to navigate the complexities of our time," Xi said, directly connecting his policies to the foundational work done by Deng.

Xi has articulated clearer objectives with specific timelines, such as aiming for a "moderately developed" economy by 2035 and realising the rejuvenation of the Chinese nation by 2049.

Party discipline is central to that reform mission – "the party must have a core, and the party's Central Committee must have authority".

"Reforms should be bold in spirit but steady in pace, managing the relationship between reform, development, and stability, with stability being paramount. The key to handling China's affairs lies in the party, which must focus on both reform and opening up, and on combating corruption," he said. Xi also reflected on Deng and China's place in the global order.

For the first time, Xi applauded Deng as "a great internationalist who has made significant contributions to world peace and development", remarks that tied China's present global path to Deng's strategy.

"China is a staunch force for world peace. We will advocate peace, development, cooperation, and win-win outcomes while pushing forward with initiatives to create a community of shared human destiny," Xi said, reaffirming his long-held goal for China to become a peaceful global superpower on the international stage.

"[Deng] profoundly summed up the experience and lessons of the reform and opening up process, emphasising the need to concentrate on party building, strengthen ideological and political work and education on fine traditions, improve the party's leadership level and governing ability, and ensure the stability of the red regime."

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University, said the speech framed Deng as the staunch defender of China's socialist path, a central legacy that Xi inherited and was upholding now.

"Just imagine if China were to follow the Soviet Union's path and to fall apart. The country might be totally different now. Deng's fundamental contribution to the party and his successors was leaving a united socialist China with the Communist Party playing an effective leadership," Xie said.

Rana Mitter, ST Lee Chair in US-Asia Relations at Harvard Kennedy School, said not all of Deng's approach was applicable today.

"Deng Xiaoping was a key figure in moving China from a command economy to market socialism. He worked with other key reformist figures, notably Zhao Ziyang and Hu Yaobang, and had to push back against economic conservatives such as Chen Yun," Mitter said.

"His plans worked well during the period of high global economic growth. However, today China faces slower growth and a need to move towards a more open, tech-driven economy – the export-oriented manufacturing of Deng's time can't just be translated to the 2020s."

Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore, said there was a desire to return to the times of strong economic growth.

"All reforms are driven by necessity," he said. "Now everyone is dissatisfied, as the economic downturn is quite evident, and China is facing a hostile environment amid rivalry with the US."

Leaked Documents Reveal CCP Plan to "Eliminate" Falun Gong, Escalating Persecution

20 August 2024, ChinaScope

The Falun Dafa Information Center has reportedly obtained information from insiders in China's Ministry of Public Security's (MPS) regarding the organization's new plan to "dismantle Falun Gong worldwide," including in the United States. Falun Gong (also called Falun Dafa) "is an ancient spiritual practice in the Buddhist tradition." The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) started persecuting Falun Gong in 1999 and has continued its persecution of the practice until today. The CCP has also targeted the Shen Yun performing arts group, which showcases traditional Chinese culture and religious beliefs and aims to raise awareness about the CCP's persecution of Falun Gong. The Falun Dafa Information Center's report stated that "it is abundantly clear both from sources inside China as well as from observable attacks (on Falun Gong and Shen Yun) over the past few months that these escalations against Falun Gong have already begun and are trending into uncharted territory. The internal documents explicitly state that the regime's aim is to 'eliminate Falun Gong worldwide.'"

The MPS' new plan has five tactics:

1. "Coordinated propaganda attacks against Shen Yun, Falun Gong"
2. "Inciting conflict between Falun Gong and the U.S. Government"

The MPS indicates it will deploy a two-pronged strategy:

1. Incite Falun Gong practitioners to distrust and even protest the U.S. government.

2. Provoke the U.S. government to investigate Shen Yun Performing Arts and other organizations founded by Falun Gong practitioners.
3. "Cutting communication channels that expose persecution inside China," blocking Falun Gong practitioners in China from contacting their overseas supporters
4. "Manipulating search engines and disseminating content in multiple formats" as a means to "carry out the offensive" against Falun Gong.
5. "Provoking distrust and internal divisions within the Falun Gong community"

Chinese cartoon campaign warns village clans against hindering Communist Party

20 August 2024, SCMP

A cartoon circulating on official Chinese websites and social media accounts is intended as a cautionary tale against confronting the Communist Party and the government. Photo: Handout

Beijing is urging family clans in rural areas not to stand in the way of Communist Party and government policies.

In a cartoon circulating on government websites and social media since last week, a family elder demands that his nephew, a village official, block the construction of a telecommunications tower.

A comic strip issued by Beijing outlines a cautionary tale about a family elder demanding that a relative block the construction of a telecommunications tower. Image: Handout

It goes on to say the tower was demolished by the villagers, "causing more than 200,000 yuan [US$28,000] damage" and the village official was expelled from the party.

The illustrated narrative, which was published on August 12 on the WeChat account of the Organisation Department of the eastern province of Jiangsu's party committee, has been reproduced on the social media accounts and web pages of courts and anti-corruption agencies in different regions of China.

The publication described the cartoon as a "case study", but did not say whether it was based on a real case – and if so, when or where the incident took place.

The text accompanying the cartoon warned that "in recent years, a small number of people with bad intentions have organised themselves and used the solidarity and cooperation within clans to confront the party and the government".

In many rural areas of China where people value family heritage, clans – often made up of male relatives with the same surname – hold considerable influence.

Under China's village committee organisation law, villagers can elect officials to form a committee to run their village and decide some village affairs by voting. The government post last week said the clans had "formed a 'state within a state', which has had extremely bad social effects". It called on party members and cadres to "consciously resist" such behaviour.

The cartoon is part of a massive public education campaign launched by Beijing regarding new party discipline rules announced at the end of last year.

The new rules, which came into force this year, broadened the scope of violations and punishments, such as banning party members from reading negative party histories.

They also reaffirmed the party's rules against clan influence, including the disqualification of party members who "organise and use clan influence to confront the party and the government".

In some areas with strong clan influence – such as Guangdong and Fujian provinces in southern China – and in some areas with ethnic minority populations, village administrators are often from the same surname. Their defence of clan interests has challenged the introduction of party policies in the villages.

Over the years, Beijing has repeatedly called for family clans and gangsters who have taken root in the countryside to be punished, demanding that local governments prevent them from "undermining the primary-level political system".

Walz's China experience draws GOP attacks, but Beijing isn't counting on better ties

17 August 2024, ABC News

Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz has a history with China. Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz has a history with China. And Republicans are seizing on it.

At 25, Walz taught a year of high school in China. He returned for his honeymoon and many more times with American exchange students. As a congressman, he served on a committee tracking China's human rights and met figures like the Dalai Lama.

Now that Walz is the Democratic vice presidential nominee, Republicans have accused him of a decadeslong relationship with "Communist China" and even opened an investigation. The attacks reflect how, amid a tense U.S.-China relationship, visits once seen as simple cultural interactions have become a target for political opponents. Ultimately, Beijing does not expect U.S. policy to thaw regardless of who is in the White House, experts say.

With competition defining Washington's relationship with Beijing, any interaction with China appears to be "regarded with skepticism, if not outright suspicion," and it's become "a well-worn tactic to attack opponents simply for having a China line in their resumes," said Kyle Jaros, an associate professor of global affairs at the University of Notre Dame.

"The assumption behind these attack lines is that having China connections makes individuals beholden or sympathetic to China and compromises U.S. interests," Jaros said. "There is definitely such a thing as being too cozy with one's geopolitical rival, but blanket China-bashing and excluding people with firsthand China experience from U.S. policymaking is also bad for U.S. interests."

Republican Rep. James Comer, chair of the House Oversight and Accountability Committee, announced on Friday an investigation into Walz's China connections, including the student trips he had organized. Comer said he asked the FBI for information on whether Walz could have targeted by or recruited for Beijing's influence operations.

Walz's "longstanding and cozy relationship with China" should be a concern for Americans, Comer said in a statement.

Walz spokesman Teddy Tschann pointed to the governor's record in standing up to China's Communist Party and fighting for human rights and democracy. "Republicans are twisting basic facts and desperately lying to distract from the Trump-Vance agenda," Tschann said.

Scrutiny started almost immediately after Walz was named Vice President Kamala Harris' running mate in the November presidential election.

"Communist China is very happy with" Walz, Richard Grenell, former acting director of national intelligence in President Donald Trump's administration, posted on the social media platform X.

Republican Sen. Tom Cotton of Arkansas wrote on X that Walz "owes the American people an explanation about his unusual, 35-year relationship with Communist China." Sen. Marco Rubio, a Florida

Republican, called Walz "an example of how Beijing patiently grooms future American leaders."

Walz was 26 when he returned from a one-year teaching gig in China. He spoke kindly of the Chinese people and said they had been "mistreated and cheated" by their government. He told the newspaper Chadron Record in his home state of Nebraska that he wished they had proper leadership.

Walz returned to China in 1994 for his honeymoon. He got married on June 4, the fifth anniversary of the bloody crackdown of the student-led pro-democracy movement in Tiananmen Square, which remains a political taboo in China.

"He wanted to have a date he'll always remember," Gwen Whipple, Walz's wife-to-be, told the Star-Herald of Scottsbluff, Nebraska, ahead of their trip. Later, when Walz came to Washington as a Minnesota congressman, he became a champion for China's human rights and served on a congressional committee that tracks the issue. He called a lunch with the Dalai Lama "life-changing."

He also posed for photos with Hong Kong pro-democracy activist Joshua Wong, who testified before Congress in 2019 when the territory was engulfed in monthslong protests over an unpopular proposal to allow suspects to be extradited to China for trial that raised concerns about Hong Kong's autonomy. Beijing sees the Tibetan spiritual leader and Wong as threats to its rule and disapproved of U.S. politicians meeting them.

In recent years, China has moderated its hopes for U.S. politicians with a history in the country, said Yun Sun, director of the China program at the foreign affairs think tank Stimson Center. That's partly because they might know details of China's internal problems, she said.

Walz's knowledge could actually lend credibility to U.S. criticism of the ruling Communist Party, said Dimitar Gueorguiev, an associate professor of political science at Syracuse University.

He also shows "how it is possible to have China experience and human-level empathy while retaining moral clarity" about the Chinese government, said Jaros of the University of Notre Dame.

In China, the public has been curious about Walz's experience in the country, but the government is tamping down discussions.

Alumni of Foshan No. 1 High School, the Chinese school where Walz taught in 1989-90, were asked not to post anything about Walz or accept media interviews, especially not with foreign journalists. The notice, posted to at least one alumni chat group and shared with The Associated Press, cited the "extremely sensitive" China-U.S. relationship, the anti-China consensus of both political parties and the need to “avoid unnecessary troubles.”

The nationalistic Chinese news site guancha.cn published an exclusive interview with Chen Weichuan, a retired English teacher from the school who was a translator between Walz and the principal and had taken Walz out for street food.

Chen described Walz as “very nice, easygoing and loved by students” and expressed admiration for Walz’s ascent from a teacher to governor and now vice presidential candidate. “He is remarkable,” Chen told guancha.cn.

Mao Ning, a spokeswoman for the Chinese foreign ministry, declined to comment, saying U.S. elections were a domestic affair.

Chinese President Xi Jinping has no illusion that Washington would soften its stance on Beijing, regardless of who gets elected in November, said Willy Lam, a senior fellow at the research institute Jamestown Foundation.

“They have stopped entertaining the aspect that individual politicians, individual CEOs might push the White House towards a more China-friendly policy,” Lam said.

Jailed Chinese activist faces another birthday alone in a cell, his wife says

17 August 2024, AP News

Ding Jiaxi knew he would spend his 57th birthday alone in a Chinese prison cell, without a phone call from family or a chance to stretch in the sunlight.

It was the activist’s fifth year in those conditions. Despite letters assuring his family in the United States that he was healthy, his wife, Sophie Luo, was not convinced.

“I’m really worried about his health, because he was tortured before,” Luo told The Associated Press from Washington.

Luo shared details about her husband’s plight before his birthday Saturday, casting light on the harsh treatment endured by the country’s jailed political prisoners, who are often deprived of rights such as outdoor exercise and contact with loved ones, according to families and human rights groups.

Beijing has said prisoners’ legal rights are protected in accordance with Chinese law. The Chinese Embassy in Washington did not immediately respond to an email seeking comment.

Ding, a key member of the now-defunct New Citizen’s Movement that sought to promote democracy and civil society in China, was detained in December 2019 after taking part in an informal gathering in the southeastern city of Xiamen to discuss current affairs. He was sentenced to 12 years in prison in April 2023 on charges of subverting state power.

Maya Wang, interim China director for the rights advocacy group Human Rights Watch, called harsh treatment “all common fare” for China’s political prisoners.

“Unfortunately, the mistreatment is very common, and it has gotten worse under Chinese President Xi Jinping,” Wang said. Political prisoners have been tortured, deprived of access to lawyers and given “very little” contact with their families, she said, adding that the secrecy has made it easier for abuse against prisoners to continue and their health to suffer. Rep. Adam Schiff, who serves on a bipartisan congressional human rights commission, urged Ding’s release.

“Once again, he will be alone in a prison in Hubei Province in China. He will be separated from his loved ones – his wife and children. He will mark the passing of yet another birthday in isolation – his fifth in prison,” Schiff, D-Calif., said in a statement released Friday.

Luo said she has not been allowed to speak with her husband on the phone since he was taken away by authorities in 2019. Since then, “I haven’t heard his voice,” said Luo, who moved to the U.S. with the couple’s two children soon after Ding was detained the first time in 2013.

It was only this March that she received his first letter. In letters, Ding has not been allowed to write about his case, how he has been treated in prison or any other subject deemed sensitive by the Chinese government, Luo said.

She said she could not believe Ding was banned from leaving his cell to go out for exercise. “This is really bad for his health,” Luo said. “Every prisoner in China should have the right to be let out for exercise. Why can’t he have that?”

And she lamented on the absence of Ding from the lives of their two daughters. “He can’t be with the girls when they needed a father most,” she said. “It’s really a big loss.”

TikTok promotes pro-China bias on Tibet, Taiwan, Uyghurs: study

16 August 2024, RFA

The findings show Beijing’s attempts to sway public opinion, particularly among youth, experts say.

TikTok algorithms promote the Chinese government’s narratives on hot-button issues such as Tibet, Taiwan and the Uyghurs – while suppressing content critical of Beijing, a new study has found.

When users search for terms on TikTok – owned by Chinese company ByteDance – that are sensitive to the ruling Chinese Communist Party, or CCP, such as “Tibet” and “Taiwan,” the results show much more content that is pro-China than content that is critical of China, researchers found.

Compared to similar searches on Instagram and YouTube, the results showed a pronounced pro-Beijing bias, according to the study, titled "The CCP's Digital Charm Offensive," by the Network Contagion Research Institute, or NCRI, at Rutgers University.

The findings, "while not definitive proof of state orchestration, present compelling and strong circumstantial evidence of TikTok's covert content manipulation," wrote NCRI co-founder Joel Finkelstein in the report.

Swaying youth

The study mimicked the user journeys of American 16-year-olds based on the newly created accounts that were used to test the three platforms' search algorithm results, the report said.

The findings point to attempts by the Chinese government to shape public opinion — particularly among youth — on human rights and political issues, experts said.

Tibetan and Uyghur activists say that such bias obfuscates China's oppression of Tibetans and Uyghurs and its attempts to undermine or wipe out their languages and cultures.

Constant exposure to TikTok's pro-Beijing content is "a significant threat and concern," said Lobsang Gyatso Sithar, a member of the Tibetan parliament-in-exile and director of technology at the Tibet Action Institute.

Rushan Abbas, executive director of the Campaign for Uyghurs, said that the research shows a "strong possibility" of content suppression or amplification to align with Beijing's interests.

"The CCP is responsible for the Uyghur genocide and the oppression of the people of Hong Kong and Tibet," she said.

Beijing is using social media "in their campaign of transnational repression, harassing human rights defenders living outside of China," she said.

TikTok users also say that the short-form mobile video app has censored comments deemed critical of Beijing.

One young Uyghur user who wanted to remain nameless said that last November, after the outbreak of conflict between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, Chinese officials said on social media that a genocide was happening in Gaza but not in Xinjiang, home to some 11 million Uyghurs.

"I posted a comment in Arabic saying China was actually committing genocide against Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang," he said. "My comment was soon removed by TikTok. I was quite shocked. Apparently, TikTok didn't want the Muslim world to know about the Uyghur genocide."

Rejecting criticism

A TikTok spokesperson rejected the study, saying it was a "non-peer reviewed, flawed experiment ... clearly engineered to reach a false, predetermined conclusion."

"Previous research by NCRI has been debunked by outside analysts, and this latest paper is equally flawed," the spokesperson, who asked that his name not be published, told RFA in an email.

"Creating fake accounts that interact with the app in a prescribed manner does not reflect real users' experience, just as this so-called study does not reflect facts or reality."

"One would hope media outlets would apply journalistic standards and rigor to fact check this type of fiction before rushing to publication," he wrote.

Concerns about Beijing's influence over TikTok are not new.

Since 2020, the Indian government has imposed a ban on more than 232 Chinese apps, including TikTok.

As of 2023, some 34 U.S. states enacted policies prohibiting government agencies and officials, including contract employees, from using TikTok. This year, the U.S. Congress passed legislation banning TikTok unless it is sold to a government-approved buyer. There are ongoing hearings about the potential for a ban of the app across the U.S.

The NCRI research found that when using TikTok to search for terms such as "Tibet," "Tibet," "Uyghurs" or "1989 Tiananmen Massacre," between 61% and 93% of the results were either pro-China or irrelevant, while anti-China content constituted only 5%.

By comparison, pro-China content made up 13.7% of content on YouTube and 27.7% on Instagram, the study showed.

In December 2023, the NCRI published its first report on TikTok which showed a strong possibility that content on the video-sharing app was being either amplified or suppressed based on the alignment with Chinese government narratives.

Influence tool

The Chinese government uses TikTok as a strategic tool to influence other countries, particularly young people, in an effort to shift their perceptions of China, said Vinayak Bhatt, an Indian defense analyst and former army general.

"This includes promoting the idea that China's economic growth is due not only to hard work but also to strategic government planning," he said.

Many Gen Z users of TikTok say they are aware of the Chinese government's biases and potential for content manipulation on the app, but choose to use it for recreational purposes.

"My page doesn't have any political content, so when I think of TikTok, I view it as more recreational, but I also have a subconscious awareness that when I see anything pro-China or political, that it may be influenced," said Tenzin Khando, a 20-year-old Tibetan student from New York, who has had a TikTok account since 2019.

Dolma Lhamo, a 25-year-old Tibetan resident of Orissa, India, recalled an issue with TikTok in 2019 when she posted a picture of the Dalai Lama and a note of appreciation on the platform on his birthday, but the post was blocked and did not appear.

Lhamo, who created her TikTok account about 10 years ago, expressed concern about the incident and said she stopped posting anything related to Tibet. Most TikTok Gen Z users say they are subconsciously aware of the Chinese government's biases and potential for content manipulation on the app, but choose to use it for recreational purposes.

But Chemi Lhamo, a Tibetan-Canadian human rights activist and campaign director at Students for a Free Tibet, said she avoids apps and digital platforms created by the Chinese government because she doesn't trust them.

"I also advise others against using such platforms due to concerns about bias," she said.

Language restrictions

Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibetan Policy Institute in Dharamsala, India, told RFA that the prohibition of Tibetan language on ByteDance's Douyin, the Chinese version of the TikTok app available to Tibetans inside Tibet and others in China, is indicative of a broader policy to eradicate the Tibetan language.

He said these restrictions are in line with Chinese government orders to suppress Tibetan culture and language, with social media platforms like TikTok actively supporting this policy of cultural eradication. Douyin has become a key platform for the Chinese authorities to distribute information and propaganda. Like other social media services in China, Douyin adheres to the censorship regulations set by the CCP.

Experts warn of national security risks from Chinese apps

12 August 2024, Focus Taiwan

Chinese apps are a potential national security risk because of China's authoritarian political system, according to two experts from the Institute for National Defense and Security Research (INDSR).

"Information security risks are national security risks," said Tzeng Yi-suo (曾怡碩), an associate research fellow at INDSR's Division of Cyber Security and Decision-making Simulation.

"As long as the app is under the jurisdiction of the Chinese government, there will basically be security concerns," he explained.

Tzeng told CNA that commercial companies collect data about app users and then use algorithms to tailor relevant information and marketing.

This is not a problem in a democratic country governed by the rule of law such as Taiwan, the cyber-security expert said, because if the information involves judicial cases, the government will need to go through certain legal procedures to obtain the information.

However, the National Intelligence Law of the People's Republic of China and the Law of the People's Republic of China on Guarding State Secrets empower Chinese government agencies to require platform service providers to hand over users' data "as long as they determine that national security is involved," Tzeng said.

"How the Chinese government obtains the data and what they will do with it is not transparent," the security expert added.

In areas under China's authoritarian control, including Hong Kong and Macau, China "can assert its sovereignty" and "investigate the words and actions of users" through data collected by Chinese apps, said Tzeng.

In places outside of its jurisdiction, "China's authoritarian system" still poses risks to users, according to Lee Jyun-yi (李俊毅), an associate research fellow at INDSR's Division of National Security Research.

Lee cited the U.S. court testimony of former employees of ByteDance, TikTok's parent company, as evidence that "TikTok does indeed transmit users' personal information back to China."

In addition to the security of personal data, Chinese apps such as Douyin and TikTok pose risks relating to the spread of false information, according to Lee.

Lee told CNA that although misleading information is not limited to Chinese apps, popular Western platforms such as Facebook, Instagram and YouTube have adopted new methods to crack down on bot accounts and mark state-funded media.

"TikTok's lack of effort to do so makes it relatively easy for false information to spread," the expert said.

Lee also believes that Chinese apps may "shape users' perceptions" through algorithms.

Up to 40 percent of popular videos come from accounts controlled by the Chinese government, he noted.

"The Chinese government has legislated to require media platforms' algorithm recommendation models to comply with the values of the Chinese Communist Party," the security expert told CNA.

Taking Douyin as an example, Lee said that the platform promotes content that is "beneficial to China" and the Chinese government requires the platform to self-censor.

According to the scholar, this makes it "difficult for short videos that are negative or critical of China to appear or spread, which has a long-term effect in shaping people's perceptions."

The two security experts are not alone in their concerns over Chinese apps such as TikTok.

In March, Taiwan's Minister of Digital Affairs Audrey Tang (唐鳳) said that TikTok had been classified as a "dangerous product." The use of the app is banned in government agencies and on their premises in Taiwan. In April, U.S. President Joe Biden signed into law a bill titled Protecting Americans from Foreign Adversary Controlled Applications Act which required ByteDance to divest its U.S. assets or face a nationwide ban. The earliest such a ban could go into effect would be Jan. 19, 2025.

India completely banned TikTok in June 2020, while countries including Australia, the United Kingdom, France, the Netherlands, Norway, Belgium, Denmark, Canada and New Zealand have separately imposed rules limiting certain workers from using the app due to cyber-security concerns.

Communist Party exhibitions lean on honour and obligation among young Chinese

11 August 2024, SCMP, Yijing Shen and Alcott Wei

Xintiandi in downtown Shanghai used to be the name of a subway stop known for its chic restaurants and boutiques.

Three years ago, the stop was rebadged as the Site of the First National Congress of the Chinese Communist Party, Xintiandi Station, to mark the party's centenary. At the same time, just a few minutes' walk from the station, an expanded memorial to the party's origins in the city opened, housing a permanent exhibition to the organisation's founding.

Since then, a steady stream of visitors – many of them students – have bypassed the shops to make their way to the patriotic-themed memorial, particularly on public holidays.

As part of summer holiday school assignments, students are required to visit patriotic exhibitions, and the one at the memorial is on a list of options they can choose from.

Advertisement

The idea is to inspire greater loyalty to the party through stories of its struggles and success but while some visitors say the approach is motivating, others are looking for a more diverse view of history.

Patriotic education has become a national priority with the introduction of a law in January that spells out the responsibilities of everyone, from children to adults, and schools to families, to the drive to build a strong, rejuvenated nation.

The effectiveness of the patriotism drive is difficult to measure, but one of those won over at the Shanghai memorial was Wang Xinning, a student at Fudan University in Shanghai.

Visiting the exhibition before the summer holiday, Wang said she was impressed by the stories of party martyrs who sacrificed their lives at a young age. "[Their stories] contrasted sharply with my life, and made me rethink my purpose of joining the Communist Party," she said.

It was a similar story at the Red Building on the Peking University campus in Beijing, where a young student of Marxism said she felt "fired up" when she visited the historic party site.

The site is often regarded as the cradle of the student-led May Fourth Movement of 1919, an anti-imperialist, cultural, and political movement in early modern China. The Red Building, a four-storey red brick house, reopened in 2021 to serve as a memorial to the party's early revolutionary activities. "I feel like I am in the company of those students [in 1919], and I am motivated to relearn Marxism and theories about the Communist Party," the student said.

[Their stories] contrasted sharply with my life, and made me rethink my purpose of joining the Communist Party

Wang Xinning, university student

But there were also visitors to these exhibitions who came out of obligation.

At the Communist Party Museum near Beijing Olympic Park, some parents said they came to help their children fulfil school requirements. One mother said her son needed to complete a worksheet about the Red Army and write the story of a Red Army soldier. "These tasks are troublesome, but they are requirements from the school. How can we refuse to do that?" she said.

An undergraduate student at the Red Building said the visit was just "a waste of time".

Advertisement

"It's so boring and all propaganda, and there's nothing new in any of these [exhibition] rooms," he said. "I could have spent my time better studying for the postgraduate entrance examination.

"We waste too much time in ideological and political courses – even when we are on summer holidays." Yuan Bo, who has completed her graduate studies and is working at a start-up in Shanghai, said she was often more interested in observing other visitors' reactions rather than the exhibits.

On a humid and hot Sunday afternoon in July, she visited the Sihang Warehouse Memorial of War of Resistance Against Japanese Aggression in central

Shanghai, which houses an exhibition documenting a battle by Chinese soldiers against the invading Japanese army that started in 1937.

Yuan said she was indifferent about the memorial since the exhibition was similar to other patriotic education sites she had visited.

"We are told how we should feel about history and the motherland, instead of having our own thoughts and ideas. We won [the war against Japan's invasion] because of all the great work by our country and our people," she said.

Watching small children running and shouting "defeat the Japanese" at the memorial, Yuan said she was like them when she was their age but had since experienced a shift.

"Before I could form my own values, I was often fed with different ideas by others, and it's difficult not to be influenced by all those anti-Japanese films and TV series.

"But I don't want to blindly follow others now."

She said while patriotism was important, it should not be at the expense of independent thinking.

"Patriotic education is indeed necessary, but there should be room for discussion," Yuan said.

"Promoting peace may be more important than promoting patriotism."

Jonathan Sullivan, an associate professor specialising in Chinese politics at the University of Nottingham, said that in China, "control of representations of the past represents an ideological battleground".

The People's Cafe serves up a patriotic coffee. Photo: Yijing Shen

Just outside the Sihang Warehouse exhibition, a coffee shop called The People's Cafe continues the patriotic message in its decor, which features red stars and other Communist Party icons. A stereo plays patriotic songs on a loop, and revolutionary posters on the walls carry slogans such as "Taiwan independence is a dead end".

Beijing sees Taiwan as part of China to be reunited by force if necessary. Most countries, including the US, do not recognise Taiwan as an independent state, but Washington is opposed to any attempt to take the self-governed island by force and is committed to supplying it with weapons.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

The cafe sells two types of cappuccino – one with foam in the shape of China's territory and the other topped with foam in the shape of the word "China" in Chinese characters.

Its pineapple-flavoured latte, a new introduction in July, is decorated with the shape of Taiwan island and the words "must be returned" on top.

"I felt I was living in magical realism," said Yuan, watching the chocolate foam dwindling from the cappuccino she ordered.

Chinese diplomat reaffirms "One China" stance

10 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

In what is seen as reaffirmation of a key precondition by Beijing for any political resolution for Tibetans, Victor Gao, a former translator for Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping and vice president of the Center for China and Globalization has said, "If you want to go back to Tibet, acknowledge Tibet is part of China." during an interview with Al Jazeera at Conway hall in London, England, on Friday.

The interview, hosted by journalist Mehdi Hasan, focused on China's foreign policy and its handling of dissent in Tibet, East Turkistan, and Taiwan. The discussion featured three experts on China: Rayhan Asat, an international human rights lawyer of Uighur descent and senior fellow at the Atlantic Council; Stephen Chan, a professor of world politics at the University of London, School of African and Oriental Studies; and Martin Jacques, author of When China Rules the World and visiting professor at Tsinghua University in Beijing.

During the Q&A session, Sonam Frasi, the representative of His Holiness the Dalai Lama at the Office of Tibet in London, asked about the current situation in Tibet, noting that after 74 years of Chinese rule, Tibet remains under strict control with limited access for journalists, tourists, and even Tibetans wishing to visit their families. Gao responded by stating, "Tibet has been part of China ever since the Yuan dynasty... I can assure you during your lifetime and mine Tibet will always be part of China." He emphasized that acknowledging Tibet as part of China is necessary for anyone wishing to visit Tibet or any resolution for Tibet.

When Mehdi Hasan questioned the reasoning behind China's approach to Taiwan and Tibet, Gao reiterated that China's security is based on the principle that there is only one China, with Taiwan, Tibet, and East Turkistan (Xinjiang) as integral parts of it.

The One China principle is a stance maintained by the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP), asserting that there is only one sovereign state under the name China which includes the occupied East Turkestan, Tibet, Southern Mongolia, Manchuria and Taiwan, which China is seeking to occupy. According to this principle, the PRC is recognized as the sole legitimate government representing this expansive entity.

Experts say that Beijing has effectively weaponized the “One-China Principle” by pressuring countries to acknowledge the “One China Policy” as a prerequisite for establishing diplomatic relations with China. The Chinese government demands that “All countries having diplomatic relations with China and all member states of the UN should unconditionally adhere to the one-China principle and follow the guidance of UNGA Resolution 2758. Any attempt to unilaterally add preconditions and provisos to the one-China principle, to distort, fudge and hollow out the one-China principle is illegal, null and void”. This approach has become a critical tool in China’s diplomatic strategy, influencing international recognition and relations. Till now, China claims that 181 countries acknowledge the “One China Principle”.

China’s third plenum highlights the quiet rise of political theorist Wang Huning

10 August 2024, SCMP, Yuanyue Dang and William Zheng

The CPPCC chairman’s role on the plenum’s documents drafting team shows he remains Xi’s ideological ‘brains trust’, an observer said.

In March 1994, Wang Huning was a star professor in political science at Shanghai’s prestigious Fudan University, whose dream was to “write more good books and teach more good students”, according to his diary from the time.

Instead, Wang’s career has taken him deep into the heart of elite politics in China. He has been an ideology guru for three of the country’s leaders, including President Xi Jinping, and is the ruling Communist Party’s fourth most senior official.

In a sign of his status, Wang was a deputy head on the Xi-led team that drafted the resolutions for last month’s third plenary session of the party’s Central Committee, setting China’s economic development tone for at least the next five years.

Wang, 68, stepped away from his ideology role and became chairman of political advisory body the National Committee of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) last year.

But he continues to serve on the Politburo Standing Committee, the party’s top decision-making body, where he was ideology and propaganda chief from 2017, in his first five-year term.

While Xi has remained exclusively in the pilot’s seat of the drafting process for all party plenum resolutions since 2012, he has always selected two or three deputy heads from the seven-strong Standing Committee.

Two sources with relevant knowledge said that, besides seeking his assistance in drafting the resolution for the latest plenum, Xi regularly asks for Wang’s input on his major speeches and statements. Since 2017, when he first gained a seat on the seven-strong committee, Wang has served as a deputy head on one of these drafting teams three times, for some of the party’s most historic resolutions.

In 2021, he co-led the team that composed a resolution on the history of the Communist Party – only the third of its kind in the party’s 100 years. A year earlier, he played a similar role in drafting the outline for China’s 14th five-year plan.

Wang was also a vice-director of the drafting team for the 20th party congress in 2022, when Xi delivered the report which laid out his vision for the next five years to more than 2,000 delegates in Beijing.

Wang has also retained his position as deputy director of the Central Comprehensively Deepening Reforms Commission, a party group founded and chaired by Xi that met for fresh discussions on a range of issues just before the third plenum.

Wang’s positions have given him sway in a long list of policy areas, including Taiwan, ethnic minority groups, the border regions of Xinjiang and Tibet, as well as Beijing’s courtship of the country’s private sector.

According to Neil Thomas, a Chinese politics fellow at the Asia Society Policy Institute’s Centre for China Analysis, Wang’s role on the drafting team “shows that his political influence exceeds what is normal for a CPPCC chairman”.

“Wang appears to still serve as Xi’s brains trust for his domestic reform agenda,” Thomas said.

He is a political survivor who loyally served Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao but found his greatest supporter in Xi Jinping

Neil Thomas, analyst

Wang had gained Xi’s trust because he “is a believer in centralising power, fighting corruption, and prioritising hi-tech growth and has helped to make these issues central to Xi’s political agenda”.

“He is a political survivor who loyally served Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao but found his greatest supporter in Xi Jinping. Wang’s neo-authoritarian intellectual project is a perfect complement to Xi’s centralising political project,” he said.

Wang’s reputation was established in the early 1990s, with a number of published works – including a collection of his diaries – that made him a rarity among China’s career bureaucrats and articulated his political vision of “neo-authoritarianism”.

Rather than a Western-style system based on checks and balances, China “must discover new political values from our own cultural traditions”, Wang wrote in his 1994 diary.

He also noted that “China’s development requires an authority that can regulate the whole of society in a unified way” and weighed in on how to fight corruption.

In his 1991 book America Against America, Wang said Japan’s economic race with the US in the 1980s taught him that “individualism, hedonism and democratism” could be defeated by “collectivism, altruism and authoritarianism”.

In the 1980s, when he was developing his political theories, Wang attached great importance to the concentration of state power, according to Xia Ming, one of his former students at Fudan, who now teaches political science at the City University of New York. “He believed that with its unique political ecology, China has a unique political path,” Xia said. Despite his familiarity with political thinkers like Hegel and Rousseau, Wang believed that he should be a defender of that path, Xia added.

“[Wang] thinks that with its large size, China must keep its authority on the central level to maintain its stability [and the West’s] path of liberalisation is not suitable for China because it is too big and too poor, especially with the conditions in rural areas and with its clans,” he said.

A political-science professor at Tsinghua University, who asked to remain anonymous, said Wang was very different from the Chinese intellectuals who looked to the West for inspiration after China opened its doors. “Wang was not impressed by the Western style democracy of the US after he visited twice. He believed that was not suitable for China. Wang believed China must take a different development path from the US if it wants to overtake the US one day,” he said.

In 1995, Wang left Shanghai for Beijing to begin his political career as head of the policy team at the Central Policy Research Office, in support of then president Jiang Zemin.

Wang was not impressed by the Western style democracy of the US after he visited twice

Political-science professor

The office is involved in drafting key documents for the leadership and advising the party on inner-party and domestic policies.

According to a mainland political analyst who interacted with Wang several times before his promotion to Beijing, it was after this move that the academic “retreated behind the scenes to provide advice to his political leaders”.

The party’s long-standing trust in Wang showed “its deep-rooted need for a sophisticated intellectual to explain the legitimacy of China’s one-party rule and party-state system both externally and internally”, he added.

For decades, Wang was known as purely a party theorist. In 2002, he was appointed director of the research office, a position he held for 18 years – the longest tenure of any official in the role.

While his position at the research office remained unchanged, his ranking in the party kept climbing – another rarity among Chinese officials. Notably, when Wang left the role in 2022, his successor’s party ranking was far below his own.

Wang helped Jiang and his successor as president, Hu Jintao, to build their own ideological systems that were later written into the party’s constitution. He also stood quietly behind them on numerous domestic and international trips.

He also helped to launch the Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, also enshrined in the constitution, and is believed to be behind Xi’s promotion of the concept of the “Chinese dream” for China’s renaissance.

Wang remained in the background for the first years of Xi’s presidency but gradually moved into the spotlight after 2017 and his accession to the Politburo Standing Committee, when the public started to hear Wang’s voice for the first time.

In January 2018, as China’s ideology chief, Wang used a meeting of the country’s propaganda officials to call for the “construction of a socialist ideology with strong cohesion and guiding force”.

On becoming CPPCC chairman, Wang’s role expanded further to include management of sensitive issues such as ethnicity, religion and Taiwan, making him the top official in these areas.

In a meeting with Christian groups late last year, Wang asked them to ensure “strict” supervision of religion and to insist on the “Sinofication” of Christianity.

In February, a month after the election of the pro-independence Taiwanese leader William Lai Ching-te, Wang called for a “tough crackdown” on Taiwan independence and “interference from outside forces”. But decades in the party’s research arm has left Wang with very few protégés in the rank and file, unlike other officials who have years of local governance experience under their belts.

Wang’s most visible protégé, Lin Shangli, was also his student and colleague at Fudan University. He left the Central Policy Research Office in 2022, after only a year as deputy director, to take up the presidency at Renmin University of China.

Wang is the only known official of his rank to have written a book on the US and his 1991 work America Against America is still popular among observers of Chinese politics.

Wang is seen as a political theorist rather than a grand strategist

Sun Yun, analyst

Sun Yun, co-director of the East Asia Programme and director of the China programme at the Stimson Centre in Washington, said Wang's knowledge of the US was "unique" among China's top leaders.

"He has dedicated experience studying and dealing with the US, while his colleagues on the Politburo Standing Committee are primarily domestic generalists," she said.

But Sun noted that "Wang is seen as a political theorist rather than a grand strategist", adding that his book on the US "is primarily about domestic politics rather than US-China relations".

Sun observed that Wang "plays a key supportive role" in China's US strategy, given that "Xi is the key decision-maker".

While Wang has said he remains largely critical of the political system in the US, he did have some positive takeaways from his experiences in the late 1980s when he was learning about American society and its perceived successes and failures.

As he wrote in his 1991 book: "Although America is a commodity society, a money-oriented society, when it comes to science and technology education, they have a deep understanding of how to spend money to get the most out of it."

Agents 'implanted' anti-China content in overseas university applications, ministry says

09 August 2024, SCMP, Hayley Wong

Beijing's top spy agency has hit out at education consultants it said "implanted" anti-China messages in the applications of students seeking admission to overseas universities.

In a post on WeChat on Friday, the Ministry of State Security said some education agents had "stirred up sensitive issues" and used "defamation and slander" to "provide ammunition to anti-China activities" in the applications.

It said this was done to boost the students' chances of being accepted into foreign universities.

The ministry said there were "hidden risks" involved, and that smearing China in overseas university applications was a national security risk.

China is the world's largest source of overseas students, and it has become common practice for them to use agents to apply for foreign universities to help them navigate unfamiliar education and admissions systems.

In the WeChat post, the ministry highlighted the case of a high school student it identified as Zhang. It said Zhang had been told by an agent there would be a much higher chance of being accepted at an overseas university if the student's application letter was "polished".

The ministry alleged that Zhang's letter had subsequently, without permission, been "implanted with a large amount of fake content that pandered to anti-China biases, including reactionary, political speech".

The consultancy involved was investigated by "national security authorities" and penalised in May, the ministry said, without elaborating.

It said it was illegal to fabricate, publish or disseminate information that endangers national security, citing the detailed rules for the implementation of the counter-espionage law that took effect in 2017.

The ministry said "certain countries" were tightening their policies for international students, and that they were also "trying to use studying abroad as bait to lure young students to engage in anti-China activities".

It said some education agencies "blindly pursue" their financial interests and university acceptance rates, and in doing so they become "accomplices of overseas anti-China forces that induce young students to fabricate false résumés and images".

The ministry also took aim at agencies it said had failed to adequately supervise staff training and that lacked awareness about national security.

It said there was "loose screening of foreign staff in some agencies" and some had hired "ill-intended foreign staff with unknown backgrounds and unclear qualifications".

According to the ministry, those staff had "catered to anti-China forces in the name of obtaining advantages for admission" by rewriting student applications for overseas universities.

Western countries are popular destinations for Chinese looking to study abroad, with the UK, US and Australia the top three choices this year, according to a report by Chinese educational service provider New Oriental Education & Technology Group.

Although numbers have fallen since the pandemic, Chinese students still topped the list of international students in many countries last year – from the US and UK to Germany, Australia, New Zealand and Japan, a separate report by Chinese consultancy EIC Education said.

More Chinese students have headed to Asian destinations in recent years, and mainland Chinese have also looked to Hong Kong to study.

Last month, two mainland Chinese women were arrested in Hong Kong after it was discovered that around 30 students had secured places at the University of Hong Kong business school with the help of agents who had forged documents.

China's Proposed Nationwide Digital ID System Stokes Fears of Government Overreach

01 August 2024, Time, Josh Xiao

China's plan to introduce a nationwide digital identification system has been met with criticism of government overreach in a country that already closely monitors and censors speech.

Some legal experts and users in the world's largest internet market have openly doubted the efforts' stated goal of protecting privacy after authorities published the proposal last week. China's internet regulator and police said users could opt in to such digital IDs, which would let them verify their identity online without giving up unnecessary personal details to internet service providers.

"The real intention is to step up the control of individual expressions online," Lao Dongyan, a law professor at Tsinghua University, said in a post on X-like Weibo on Tuesday that has since been removed. Du Zhaoyong, a lawyer, said in another post the move will have a "destructive" effect on the free flow of information.

The Chinese government already requires internet users to use their real identities to register for digital services and has extensive access to their online behavior and communications. But a new centralized digital ID system may give authorities a more direct and complete view of people's online lives.

Jeremy Daum, senior fellow at the Yale Law School Paul Tsai China Center, said Chinese people may be more wary of such a system following the use of health codes, an online identification system China used during the pandemic to record and control citizens' movement in order to contain the virus.

But he said the regulation appears to be focused on privacy, not content.

"In China, privacy regulation is usually privacy versus other citizens and corporations rather than versus the government," he said. The proposed system "gives you a new level of privacy where you don't have to share information with a corporation, but the government of course still has access to that information."

The proposal by the Cyberspace Administration of China and the Ministry of Public Security seeks to create a unified system for identity verification that would limit internet companies' ability to collect data. Users may voluntarily request a unique ID, made up of alphabets and digits, and a digital certificate to confirm their identity. Internet platforms shouldn't ask for other personal information once a user is authenticated, according to the proposal.

Beijing has lashed out at internet platform companies for collecting excessive data, with the internet watchdog in 2021 naming 105 apps for violations including ByteDance Ltd's Douyin and Microsoft Corp.'s LinkedIn.

More than 50 popular apps, including those run by Tencent Holdings Ltd, Alibaba Group Holdings Ltd and ByteDance, have tested the proposed authentication system, the South China Morning Post reported Thursday, citing a survey it carried out.

Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Lin Jian's Regular Press Conference on August 1, 2024

01 August 2024, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

CCTV: It's reported that Indian Navy and Coast Guard recently rescued an accidentally injured Chinese mariner off Mumbai coast and took him to hospital. What is China's comment?

Lin Jian: Most recently, a Chinese mariner was accidentally injured when operating on a ship off Mumbai coast. The Indian side swiftly came to his rescue and provided him with timely medical treatment. He is now in stable condition and recovering back in China.

The Chinese side expresses its heartfelt appreciation to all the departments and personnel of the Indian side who overcame the challenging conditions on the scene and successfully carried out this humanitarian rescue operation.

Dragon TV: It's reported that the DPRK recently commemorated the 71st anniversary of the armistice of the Korean War. Ambassadors of Russia, Viet Nam, Cuba and so on attended the event but the ambassador of China was not spotted there. Some say this is yet another sign that the relationship between China and the DPRK is experiencing issues and that China and Russia are in a contest over relations with the DPRK. What is China's comment?

Lin Jian: This year marks the 71st anniversary of the armistice of the Korean War. Seventy-one years ago, the Chinese People's Volunteers fought alongside the Korean people and troops and together achieved a resounding victory in the War to Resist US Aggression and Aid Korea and the Fatherland Liberation War. In that process, China and the DPRK forged with blood an unbreakable friendship.

Despite the transformation in the international and regional landscape, the CPC and the Chinese government have never changed the importance they attach and their commitment to the traditional friendship and cooperative relationship between China and the DPRK.

Lately, certain countries and media outlets have been speculating and asserting that there have been issues with China-DPRK relations or there is a China-Russia contest over relations with the DPRK. These are unsubstantiated, ill-motivated claims. Let me stress that both the DPRK and Russia are China's friendly neighbors. China is happy to see the DPRK and Russia grow their ties and play a constructive role for the peace and stability of this region.

Rudaw Media Network: How will the killing of Ismail Haniyeh impact the Chinese peace effort in the Middle East? Will it affect the recently signed "Beijing agreement" mediated by China? The problems in the Middle East are increasingly getting complicated. Does this distract or diminish your efforts regarding achieving security and stability and peace in the region?

Lin Jian: China has stated its position on the incident. We firmly oppose and condemn the act of assassination and are deeply concerned that the incident may plunge the region into greater turmoil. Gaza needs a comprehensive and permanent ceasefire as soon as possible and there should be no more escalation of the conflict and confrontation.

China supports Palestine's internal reconciliation and believes this is an important step towards solving the Palestinian question and realizing peace and stability in the Middle East. China commends Palestinian factions for their effort on the Beijing Declaration, and looks forward to the day when Palestinian factions achieve reconciliation and, on that basis, realize independent statehood as early as possible. We will continue to work with relevant parties towards this goal.

On your second question, the more daunting the situation is in the Middle East, the more critical it is for the international community to try to cool down the situation and enable deescalation. China remains committed to keeping the Middle East peaceful and stable, and opposes external interference. We stand ready to work with relevant parties to work hard for lasting peace and security in the region.

Kyodo News: It's reported that after China-Japan foreign ministers' meeting on July 26, China altered and published the Japanese Foreign Minister's remarks. China's readout stated that Japan's commitment to the one-China position remains unchanged and that Japan's control on semiconductor export is not targeted at any particular country, and Japan is willing to maintain constructive communication with the Chinese side to handle it properly. Did Foreign Minister Yoko Kamikawa make the above-mentioned remarks? It's reported that Japan's Foreign Ministry privately pointed out to the Chinese side that the readout was inaccurate. Is that true?

Lin Jian: The one-China principle is a basic norm in international relations and prevailing international consensus. It's also the political premise on which China establishes and develops diplomatic relations with any country in the world. Japan made a clear commitment on this in the 1972 China-Japan Joint Statement, which says "The Government of Japan recognizes the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal Government of China. The Government of the People's Republic of China reiterates that Taiwan is an inalienable part of the territory of the People's Republic of China. The Government of Japan fully understands and respects this position of the Government of the People's Republic of China, and it firmly maintains its position under Article 8 of the Potsdam Proclamation." According to my knowledge, Japanese Foreign Minister Yoko Kamikawa reaffirmed Japan's position during the meeting, which has not changed.

When it comes to semiconductors, certain country, to perpetuate its supremacy, has been turning normal economic cooperation and trade into political and security issues, either enticing or coercing other countries to join its tech blockade against China, and deliberately disrupting global supply and industrial chains. We have noted that Japanese officials have repeatedly stated publicly that their export control measures on semiconductors are not directed at any particular country. China will work with countries around the world to stay open and pursue cooperation, and keep the global semiconductor industrial and supply chains stable.

AFP: The government of Germany accused China of conducting cyberattack on the Federal Agency for Cartography and Geodesy (BKG). It also summoned the Chinese ambassador to lodge a protest. What is China's comment?

Lin Jian: China noted Germany's statement and remarks. During the past few months, some Western politicians and media have been spreading unverified and even deliberately fabricated disinformation to spread the fear for so-called "Chinese cyber threat." Their motive is clearly not about cybersecurity. China firmly opposes such political manipulation that clearly was preorchestrated and played up to attack China. We oppose any move to politicize and weaponize cybersecurity issues. China's Embassy in Germany has voiced strong opposition and lodged a protest to the German side.

Ensuring cybersecurity is a global challenge. China is a major victim of cyberattacks. We oppose and have fought various types of cyberattacks in accordance with the law. China and Germany have open lines of communication on cybersecurity. The two sides need to jointly address threats and challenges through dialogue and cooperation, rather than resort to megaphone diplomacy, smear and attack one another and spread disinformation about so-called Chinese hacking operations. We call on Germany to maintain strategic independence, take a constructive and responsible attitude, abandon bloc confrontation and the Cold War mentality, and work with countries through dialogue and cooperation to keep the cyberspace peaceful and secure.

July

China's state employees to face forced three-child policy?

29 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China is desperate as it fails to repeat the spectacular success of its decades-long one-child policy in implementing its current three-child policy. Burdened by economic hardship and for sundry other reasons, young people are simply refusing to marry and procreate or otherwise have more children.

A leaked draft document has revealed that the government plans to coerce government officials and employees into having more children, reported news.com.au Jul 28.

China's population is already contracting. As its citizens age, the labour force is shrinking. And that means its social, economic and military ambitions are coming under increasing pressure, the report noted. While the party-state realized this as early as 2015 when it abandoned its long-enforced draconian one-child policy, the nation's birth-rates only continued to decline.

Now, a leaked draft document circulating on Chinese social media reportedly details plans to "organise and implement" Chairman Xi Jinping's 2021 "three-child" policy among party officials and municipal employees. In particular, the document states among its "key tasks and measures" the need for bureaucrats at all levels to lead by example.

"Party members and cadres at all levels of government agencies, state-owned enterprises, and public institutions should take the lead in implementing the three-child policy," the report cited the Chinese Sina news service report as saying, referring to the leaked document.

The Quanzhou Municipal Health Commission is stated to have confirmed to Sina the document was authentic, while blaming "negligent" staff for its early release.

"Later, the relevant departments of Quanzhou City may publish it in due course according to the situation," it has added.

It is not clear from the report whether this is a nationwide policy yet.

The Quanzhou documents is stated to list three main areas of work: "First, organise and implement the three-child policy; Second, cancel fertility restrictions, including cancelling social maintenance fees, cleaning up policy documents and social restrictions that are not suitable for the population development situation; Third, improve the population service system, improve the overall solution for the 'old and young', and establish and improve the population service system covering the life cycle."

But what attracted public attention was stated to be a fourth element. "In the section on 'organising and implementing the three-child policy', the mention of party members and cadres taking the lead in implementing the three-child policy made some netizens feel uncomfortable," the Sina report was stated to read.

"Some people worried that it would become a disguised forced birth of three children," the report quoted one commentator as saying.

Apart from the prosperous Quanzhou, Jiemian Financial News has reported that the Xiangtan District in Xiangtan City, Hunan Province, had already taken similar steps.

"We call on party members and cadres to publicise and guide, take the lead in implementation, and consciously implement the country's optimised fertility policy, and make positive contributions to promoting the long-term balanced development of the population," the Xiangtan District CPC administration was stated to have proclaimed in Nov 2023.

Party General Secretary Xi set the ball rolling in Nov 2023, when he told an assembly of the All-China Women's Federation: "We need to actively cultivate a new culture of marriage and child-bearing" as an essential contribution to the "rejuvenation" of the nation.

Following it, the party last year ordered government family planning officials to "intervene" and reduce the number of abortions among teenagers. They must now campaign for "respecting the social value of childbirth, advocating age-appropriate marriage and child-bearing, as well as optimal child-bearing and raising", the report noted.

"The new marriage and childbirth culture must be incorporated into village regulations, and content that is inconsistent with this must be revised," the family planning directive was stated to have added. State employees who fail to comply "can forget about getting promoted or getting rich," another commentator was stated to have noted.

The concern about declining birth rate was also mentioned recently by China's Central Party Committee, whose 205 members are responsible for establishing national policy, during its Third Plenum (five-yearly assembly) under Chairman Xi Jinping earlier this month.

"A sound system will be instituted to provide full life-cycle population services to all in order to promote high-quality population development. China will refine the policy system and incentive mechanisms for boosting the birth-rate and strive to build a childbirth-friendly society," Xinhua reported the Plenum as ruling.

A Global Times article Jul 22 stated that work was already underway to establish a "child-bearing and child-rearing support system".

Progress so far includes "a number of policies rolled out in localities across the country, including extending maternity leave to 158 days or longer, raising childbirth allowance and child-rearing subsidies, and providing more professional and affordable babysitter services at childcare institutions," it added.

China's former Hainan party chief Luo Baoming faces corruption investigation

26 July 2024, SCMP

Official who helped transform Hainan into strategic and economic hub in the South China Sea is being probed for 'violations of party discipline and the law'

The former Communist Party boss of the southern Chinese province of Hainan who helped transform it into a strategic hub in the South China Sea has been placed under investigation for corruption.

China's top corruption watchdog, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI), said on Thursday that Luo Baoming was being investigated for suspected severe violations of party discipline and the law – the usual euphemism for corruption.

Luo, who went on to serve as the vice-chairman of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Committee of the National People's Congress, China's legislature, "voluntarily turned himself in", according to the commission. No further details were given.

Luo, 72, a native of northern city of Tianjin, started his career at the Inner Mongolia Production and Construction Corporation in 1969, then returned to Tianjin in 1973, where he rose through the ranks to eventually head the city's Communist Party propaganda department in 1997, according to public records.

Luo rose to prominence in Hainan where he spent more than 15 years in various senior roles.

During his time in office, the rustic island was transformed into one of the region's most popular tourist destinations, and has become a strategic Chinese outpost in the northern part of the South China Sea, where China has staked vast territorial claims that have fuelled tensions between Beijing, its neighbours and Washington.

In 2001, Luo was promoted to deputy secretary of the party committee in Hainan. He became the provincial governor in 2007 and was appointed as the province's Communist Party chief in 2011.

Hainan, which is almost the size of Taiwan, has gone through rapid development on its way to becoming a major resort.

After being approved by the State Council, the province established the prefecture-level city of Sansha in 2012 at Yongxing Island – or Woody Island – under Luo's watch. The city, which is situated in the contested Paracel Islands, is responsible for managing the islands, reefs, and surrounding waters in the South China Sea.

While Luo was in power, Hainan invested in building, upgrading and expanding critical civilian infrastructure, including railways, ports and airports – such as Meilan International airport in Haikou city – to boost capacity and connectivity, transforming the island into a strategic and economic hub.

In 2016, Luo led a delegation to Canada and the United States and said Chinese provincial party secretaries should be invited "to lead Communist Party delegations to visit the US annually to enhance dialogue, exchanges, and mutual trust between the two sides", according to the official Hainan Daily.

Luo stepped down from his role as Hainan's party secretary in 2017 to serve as the vice-chairman of the Overseas Chinese Affairs Committee of the 12th and 13th National People's Congress until 2023, according to public records.

Chinese Communist Party Plans To Raise Retirement Age To Deal With Aging Population

25 July 2024, Eurasia Review, Hsia Hsiao-hwa

The ruling Chinese Communist Party has announced plans to raise the retirement age as part of its response to falling births and a rapidly aging population.

Party leader Xi Jinping called on party and government at a recent top-level meeting in Beijing to "advance reform to gradually raise the statutory retirement age in a prudent and orderly manner in line with the principle of promoting voluntary participation while allowing appropriate flexibility."

Xi also called for moves to “improve the systems for supporting population development and providing related services, refine the policy system and incentive mechanisms for boosting the birth rate, and refine the policies and mechanisms for developing elderly care programs and industries.”

China has one of the lowest statutory retirement ages in the world, currently set at 60 for men, at 55 for female officials and at 50 for female workers.

Retired teacher Gu Guoping, who currently lives in Shanghai, said the authorities are likely to change the mandatory retirement age to 65 for men and 55 for women, which is likely to be unpopular.

“The vast majority of people in China don’t want a later retirement age,” he said. “Some men want to retire at 58 or 55.”

“If you start to receive [your pension] too late, you’ll only have a short time left to enjoy it,” Gu said.

He added: “Women live longer on average than men, so having them retire at 50 is too soon,” Gu said. “Extending their retirement age to 55 is reasonable and acceptable to most people.”

“But it makes no sense to stop men from retiring at 60 given that they don’t live as long as women.”

Rising life expectancy

In the meantime, the authorities are getting people used to the idea of a later retirement by promoting “flexibility” and voluntary approaches, he said.

International medical journal The Lancet reported last year that average life expectancy in China will likely rise to 81.3 years old by 2035, 85.1 years for women and 78 years for men, with the gap widening from 5.2 years in 2019 to 7 years by that time.

However, the disadvantage of later retirement is that older people continue to occupy jobs at a time of widespread youth unemployment, according to Gu.

A Beijing resident who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals said part of the issue is that people currently in work are paying for the pensions of people who are currently retired, making the social security system increasingly top-heavy and unsustainable as the population ages and births plummet

Raising the pension age to 65 could plunge a lot of people into economic hardship, she said.

“Delaying retirement should be part of a system-wide approach,” she said, saying more jobs for older people would be needed if they can’t collect their pensions until that age.

“Not many people in today’s China stay with the same employer their whole life,” the woman said. “Once they delay the pensionable retirement age, people will be forced to do odd jobs, change employers and jobs.”

“Measures need to be in place to support this kind of situation, especially when it comes to [preventing rampant] age discrimination,” she said. “Those attitudes are entrenched, and aren’t going to change overnight.”

Meager pension resources

The Chinese Academy of Social Sciences estimated recently that there will be nothing left in the national pension fund for city-based employees by 2035, while the International Monetary Fund has predicted that a sluggish economy will also impact the pension system.

Some 300 million people are expected to retire in China over the next decade, putting huge pressure on pension funding.

While 10 working-age people supported 1 retiree in 2002, the ratio had fallen to 5 to 1 by 2021. It will likely fall further to 4 in 2030 and 2 in 2050, Larry Hu, chief economist at Macquarie, told Reuters in January.

China’s pension system consists of three elements: basic pension, corporate and occupational annuities, and personal pension plans.

The economic downturn has reduced people’s ability to pay into the optional elements of that package.

At the end of 2023, only 20% of the 50 million people who have personal pensions had paid anything into them, with the average value of personal pension pots standing at a meager 2,000 yuan (US$275).

China’s population aged 60 and over reached 296.97 million in 2023, about 21.1% of its total population, up from 280.04 million in 2022, Reuters reported on Jan. 18.

China created a special fund in 2018 to shift pension funds from richer coastal provinces like Guangdong to places like Heilongjiang and Liaoning, to tackle cross-country disparities, yet about a third of China’s provincial-level jurisdictions are running pension deficits, the agency reported.

China’s third plenum sees Communist Party double down on economic, tech, military power

21 July 2024, SCMP

China will focus on boosting its economic, technological and defence capabilities to tackle growing conflicts with the US-led West, the full text of decisions from a key party conclave has revealed.

The more than 22,000-word resolution document lists a wide range of measures for the next five years approved by the Central Committee of the ruling Communist Party, which met for its key third plenum last week.

The measures aim to strengthen China’s economic resilience, deepen the tech talent pool and narrow the rural-urban gap as part of efforts to find new growth engines and address demographic challenges, according to the document released by state news agency Xinhua on Sunday.

National security also gets greater prominence, with pledges to keep key industrial chains safe and boost strategic military deterrence.

The goals have to be accomplished by 2029, the 80th anniversary of the People's Republic. The coming five years will also be a decisive period for the party's target of building a modern socialist China by 2035, giving it a strong position in the great power rivalry with the United States and other geopolitical hostilities.

President Xi Jinping said the measures aimed to meet China's "urgent need" to counter major risks and challenges, according to a separate Xinhua article on decisions made at the plenum.

Xi, who leads the Central Committee, said China was faced with "increasing uncertainties and unpredictable factors" impacting national development, as "external suppression and containment are continuously escalating".

The four-day, closed-door plenary session of the Central Committee concluded on Thursday.

A unified set of market rules, fair and consistent regulatory framework, removal of restrictions to market entry and competition are among the aims listed in the resolution document, which also calls for efficient and coordinated policy implementation and pledges to address the financing difficulties of local governments.

It includes a promise to equally protect the "property rights of all types of ownership economies", and to support the private sector.

The leadership also aims to promote the development of future industries, "new fields and new competitive tracks" in the global tech race.

The boost for tech and the private sector – the backbone of job creation and innovation – comes as China's post-Covid economic recovery remains patchy. Growth momentum slowed in the second quarter, and public sentiment remains weak amid a prolonged property market slump, lacklustre financial markets and rising unemployment.

In manufacturing, China is under pressure from a global supply chain diversification away from its market and tightened hi-tech restrictions led by the US. Trade tensions with the European Union have also escalated, with exports of electric vehicles and some new energy products in limbo.

The difficulties have pushed Beijing to strengthen the resilience and security of its supply chains, including a mission to build up a "strategic hinterland" as backup for key industries and improve the national reserve system for key resources.

According to the document, the party also called to "step up building a self-controlled industrial and supply chain" with a focus on integrated chips, industrial master machines, medical equipment and advanced materials.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at Tsinghua University's National Institute of Strategic Studies, said the fact that almost all of the long document was devoted to domestic issues indicated the leadership's focus on stability and the push for progress.

He said the message was clear, that the only way China could cope better was by making itself stronger and be more prepared to tackle challenges on all fronts, he said.

"The message from the top leadership is consistent: we should prioritise our own matters first," Xie said.

"But China's door will remain wide open. It will continue to push for trade, investment and innovation links with the more friendly parts of the world as the decision indicates."

The document includes a pledge to implement "transparent, stable and predictable" policies, in an apparent attempt to restore China's market allure for foreign investors. This group has raised concerns about tightened security control in China, as they come under pressure to adjust supply chains or China operations amid the US-led decoupling.

Beijing has also doubled down on national security and stepped up military reform efforts, at a time when maritime tensions threaten to become flashpoints in its tensions with the US and its regional allies.

"[We should] accelerate the development of strategic deterrence forces, and develop new domain and quality combat forces," the document said, elaborating on aims to build up military power in five years.

The leadership has also vowed to further improve national security mechanisms, to counter "long-arm jurisdiction" and to better safeguard China's maritime rights and interests.

A mainland-based political analyst, who requested anonymity, said Beijing will continue to launch sanctions and legislation to hit back at US sanctions and protect its core interests over the issue of Taiwan and the South China Sea.

On the science and tech front, the decisions from the plenum include a call to cultivate national "innovative capabilities" and encourage "high-level foreign science and engineering universities to cooperate in running schools in China".

More open and effective talent recruitment and cultivation mechanisms are expected, with the party calling for better treatment for young scientists so that they can focus on research.

It has also pledged more funding for basic research and better allocation of funds for research projects – including giving scientists more decision-making power and greater control over the funds.

Xi's big economic meeting shows the Party bracing for slower growth driven by advanced manufacturing

18 July 2024, Himalayan Dak

China's Communist Party concluded its "third plenum," a biennial meeting focused on long-term reform, from July 15th to 18th. President Xi Jinping emphasized "high-quality development" as the guiding principle, but there were few signs of major changes to boost demand or address the property market decline. The communique indicated no significant shift from recent economic policies. State media Xinhua briefly published an article praising Xi as a reformer, which was later removed for unknown reasons. One might ask: How does that affect the supply chain and manufacturing shifts between China and India?

China's Communist Party removes ex-foreign, defence ministers from top body

18 July 2024, Reuters, Laurie Chen and Jessie Pang

China's Communist Party removed its former foreign and defence ministers, Qin Gang and Li Shangfu, from its Central Committee on Thursday during a meeting of its largest top decision-making body, state news agency Xinhua reported.

The two officials had been removed from their jobs last year.

The ruling Communist Party ended its long-delayed third plenum on Thursday, a meeting of the 205-member Central Committee held roughly once every five years to map out the general direction of the country's long-term social and economic policies. Removals of Central Committee members would also be approved at such meetings.

The Central Committee said in a communique released by Xinhua that it accepted Qin Gang's resignation from the body, and confirmed the expulsion of Li Shangfu, 66, as well as former PLA Rocket Force commander Li Yuchao, 61, from the Communist Party for "serious violations of discipline and law", a euphemism for corruption. Li Yuchao was also removed from his job last year.

The decision to expel Li Shangfu and Li Yuchao from the Communist Party and its Central Committee by extension suggests harsher political consequences for the pair, compared to Qin Gang's resignation. Qin remains a Communist Party member.

Chinese President Xi Jinping has spearheaded a wide-ranging anti-corruption campaign since becoming leader of the Communist Party in 2012. In the first half of this year alone, the party's top graft watchdog has investigated 36 officials at the vice-ministerial level and above.

Li Shangfu and his predecessor Wei Fenghe were both expelled from the Communist Party last month on bribery charges, as China's People's Liberation Army undergoes a sweeping anti-corruption purge which has implicated two former defence ministers and nine top generals.

Qin, 58, was abruptly removed as foreign minister in July last year after seven months in the job, and has not been seen in public since following rumours of an extramarital affair. He was removed from China's cabinet, the State Council, in October and "resigned" from the national legislative body in February.

He became one of the country's youngest foreign ministers when he was appointed in December 2022, enjoying a meteoric rise which analysts partly attributed to his closeness to President Xi. No official reason was given for Qin's resignation from the Central Committee.

"Qin and Xi's images are somewhat tied - there is no way to make Qin look bad without making Xi look bad," said Wen-Ti Sung, a fellow at the Atlantic Council's Global China Hub.

"Qin Gang is able to get a relatively more graceful exit. The communique grants him the dignity of appearing to 'resign' on his own volition, and still calls him a 'comrade'"

ANTI-CORRUPTION DRIVE

Li Shangfu was ousted as defence minister last October without explanation, before being placed under a graft investigation. He was removed from the party's highest military command body in February.

Li Yuchao was replaced last July during a shakeup of the Rocket Force leadership which also saw its political commissar dismissed. He oversaw a highly strategic unit of the PLA responsible for the nation's conventional and nuclear missile arsenal.

The Central Committee's communique also pledged to deepen Chinese military reforms, "uphold the party's leadership over the PLA", and to "provide effective guarantees for achieving military and national defence modernisation" - without mentioning the military corruption crackdown.

Agriculture minister Tang Renjian, 61, who has been under investigation for corruption since May, remains a member of the Central Committee.

"One could see (the dismissals) as a sign of the continued vigour of Xi's anti-corruption campaign - or its sub-optimal effectiveness at preventing corruption even after more than a decade," said Sung.

Three alternate Central Committee members were appointed as full members according to the communique: Anhui provincial Communist Party personnel boss Ding Xiangqun, Sichuan provincial Communist Party personnel boss Yu Lijun and Beijing Normal University President Yu Jihong.

According to past convention, the Central Committee would appoint some of its 171 alternate members to fill in vacancies by order of the number of votes they received.

The new appointments this time skipped PLA Rocket Force deputy political commissar Ding Xingnong, who would have been second in line to join the Central Committee.

Former Central Committee alternate member and PLA Rocket Force chief of staff Lieutenant General Sun Jinming was also expelled from the Communist Party for corruption, the communique said.

Only 199 full Central Committee members and 165 alternate members attended the plenum, according to the communique.

China's Communist Party meets to set direction for troubled economy

14 July 2024, CNN, Simone McCarthy

After months of unexplained delay, top officials from China's ruling Communist Party are gathering in Beijing this week to signal the direction forward for the world's second largest economy as it faces major economic challenges and friction with the West.

Stakes are high for the meeting, which takes place every five years and is known as China's third plenum. It has historically been a platform for the party's leadership to announce key economic reforms and policy directives.

China is grappling with a property sector crisis, high local government debt and weak consumer demand – as well as flagging investor confidence and intensifying trade and technology tensions with the United States and Europe.

Those challenges were underscored by its latest economic growth data, which were announced Monday. China's gross domestic product expanded by 4.7% in the April to June months, compared to the previous year.

That represents a slowdown from the 5.3% growth reported for the first quarter and also missed the expectations of a group of economists polled by Reuters who had predicted 5.1% expansion in the second quarter.

Economic problems on the back of years of stringent pandemic controls have triggered mounting social frustration, as well as questions about the direction of the country under Xi Jinping, its most powerful leader in decades.

Those questions have been underscored by a recent shake-up in the upper echelons of Xi's government that saw three ministers and a handful of top military officers removed from posts or investigated, a situation that some observers of China's opaque political system believe contributed to the plenum's delay.

How Xi and his top officials choose to address the country's economic challenges will have significant impact on whether they can continue to raise quality of life, and public confidence, within China.

They could also have a broad impact on the country's role in the global economy and how willing foreign investors will be to do business there as uncertainties, including the outcome of the upcoming US presidential election, loom.

Here's what to expect at the four-day gathering, which begins Monday.

Big changes?

About 200 members of the party's Central Committee leadership body as well as 170 alternate committee members are gathering in Beijing to approve a document laying out a plan on "deepening reform" and advancing "Chinese-style modernization," according to state media.

Past third plenums have delivered sweeping reforms.

The meeting in 1978 was linked to the landmark shift toward the "reform and opening" of China's economy, while Xi's first third plenum as leader in 2013 set in motion the move to dismantle the decades-old one child policy.

But observers of China's opaque political machine don't believe there will be fundamental economic reforms this time around.

Instead, they will be watching for more targeted efforts to address structural economic issues and social problems – and to enhance China's technological self-reliance at a time when it faces a raft of restrictions on access to technology driven by the US.

This is Xi's third time overseeing this meeting after he extended his rule into a norm-breaking second decade at the last Party Congress in 2022.

Speculation has swirled around why the meeting, which was widely expected to take place last fall, is only happening now.

Some observers suggested the flagging economy and internal disagreement over how to address it, as well as the high-level personnel shake-ups that cast a shadow over Xi's third term, could have played a role.

Uncompleted residential buildings at a real estate project on the outskirts of Shenyang in China's Liaoning province earlier this year.

Economic challenges

The high debt loads held by local governments and their shrinking income, linked to an ongoing property sector crisis, lie at the heart of China's current economic woes.

They'll also be looking for signals on a new direction for real estate development and property sector policy in the wake of the industry crisis that's seen dozens of Chinese developers default on their debts, which has, in turn, devastated investors, homebuyers and construction workers.

Observers will be watching for fiscal reforms, especially around taxation and government spending, that could reduce pressure on local governments and bolster their revenue.

Many also say the government should take steps to boost consumer spending and increase household income, including potential reforms to change rural land ownership and China's restrictive household registration system, as well as to expand social safety nets in a country grappling with high medical costs and a rapidly aging population.

Xi has acknowledged economic hardship in China, saying in a New Year's speech that "some people" had "difficulty finding jobs and meeting basic needs." In a May speech, he also stressed that the party should "do more practical things that benefit the people's livelihood," adding that reform should give people a sense of "gain."

While chasing rapid economic growth is "no longer Beijing's singular priority," Asia Society Center for China Analysis experts Neil Thomas and Jing Qian wrote last week, Xi likely recognizes that his priorities of national security and tech self-reliance "must co-exist with a baseline level of growth that sustains consumption, investment, social stability, and his own political security."

Tech push

Tech self-reliance has become a key focus for Beijing as the US and its allies have moved to limit China's access to high-end technologies, citing their own security concerns.

The plenum is expected to greenlight more government coordination around Xi's plan to build China into a "science and technology power," both in terms of innovation as well as industry.

But such a focus also threatens to heighten frictions with the West.

The EU and the US have recently slapped hefty tariffs on Chinese electric vehicles, saying they are unfairly subsidized by the government and flooding global markets. Any moves this week that bolster the production of such high-end green technologies, which also include goods like solar panels or batteries, could further inflame the issue.

Meanwhile, global investors will be looking for Beijing to make good on promises to further open up its market, even as many firms have become more wary of doing business in the country as Xi has prioritized heightened state control and security.

The plenum could also see the formal ousting of top Communist Party officials who have been ensnared in opaque disciplinary investigations or removed from posts without explanation, some of whom were linked to an apparent military purge.

Li Shangfu, China's former defense minister who was fired from his role in October and expelled from the Communist Party following a corruption investigation, will likely be formally removed from the Central Committee.

Observers will be watching closely for any similar movement around other ousted government and military officials, including former Foreign Minister Qin Gang, People's Liberation Army Rocket Force commander Li Yuchao and his political commissar Xu Zhongbo.

China's ailing economy under spotlight as leader Xi Jinping and top officials to meet

14 July 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

The world's second-largest economy is grappling with a real estate debt crisis, weakening consumption, an ageing population and geopolitical tensions overseas, some of which are expected to be addressed at the upcoming Third Plenum.

Top Chinese officials gather in Beijing on Monday, with all eyes on how they might kickstart lacklustre growth at a key political meeting that has traditionally seen officials unveil big-picture economic policy changes.

The world's second-largest economy is grappling with a real estate debt crisis, weakening consumption, an ageing population and geopolitical tensions overseas.

President Xi Jinping will oversee the ruling Communist Party's secretive Third Plenum, which usually takes place every five years in October, though Beijing has offered few hints about what might be on the table.

State media in June said the delayed four-day gathering would "primarily examine issues related to further comprehensively deepening reform and advancing Chinese modernization", and Xi last week said the CCP was planning "major" reforms.

Analysts are hoping those pledges will result in badly needed support for the economy.

"There are many hopes that this Third Plenum will provide some new breakthroughs on policy," Andrew Batson of the Beijing-based consultancy Gavekal Dragonomics told AFP.

"China's government has struggled to execute a successful economic strategy since emerging from the pandemic," he added.

But he said he did not expect a "fundamental departure from the course Xi has already laid out", in which technological self-sufficiency and national security outweigh economic growth.

And the People's Daily, the Communist Party's official newspaper, warned on Monday that "reform is not about changing direction and transformation is not about changing colour".

Ting Lu, chief China economist at Nomura, said the meeting was "intended to generate and discuss big, long-term ideas and structural reforms instead of making short-term policy adjustments".

The Third Plenum has long been an occasion for the Communist Party's top leadership to unveil major economic policy shifts.

In 1978, then-leader Deng Xiaoping used the meeting to announce market reforms that would put China on the path to dazzling economic growth by opening it to the world.

And more recently following the closed-door meeting in 2013, the leadership pledged to give the free market a "decisive" role in resource allocation as well as other sweeping changes to economic and social policy.

Growth figures expected

This year's conclave will begin the same day China is due to release its growth figures for the second quarter.

Experts polled by AFP expect China's economy to have grown, on average, 5.3 percent year-on-year between April and June.

Beijing has said it is aiming for five percent growth this year – enviable for many Western countries but a far cry from the double-digit expansion that for years drove the Chinese economy.

Authorities have been clear they want to reorient the economy away from state-funded investment and instead base growth around high-tech innovation and domestic consumption.

But economic uncertainty is fuelling a vicious cycle that has kept consumption stubbornly low.

Among the most urgent issues facing the economy is a persistent crisis in the property sector, which long served as a key engine for growth but is now mired in debt, with several top firms facing liquidation.

Authorities have moved in recent months to ease pressure on developers and restore confidence, such as by encouraging local governments to buy up unsold homes.

Analysts say much more is required for a full rebound as the country's economy has yet to bounce back more than 18 months after damaging Covid-19 restrictions ended.

"Short-term stimulus is badly needed to boost the teetering economy," Nomura's Ting said.

But, he added, "major steps towards market-oriented reforms might be limited this time".

China amasses record half-year 'tiger' tally in anti-corruption campaign

06 July 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

High-profile casualties show that past glories are no protection in the long-running crackdown, analyst says.

Three dozen "tigers" were detained by China's anti-corruption watchdog in the first half of the year, setting a new six-month benchmark for President Xi Jinping's signature anti-corruption campaign.

The detention of the 36 senior officials of at least vice-ministerial rank compares to the 22 investigated in the same time last year, a total that was a half-year high at the time, according to a South China Morning Post tally.

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) – China's top anti-corruption agency – announced 45 investigations into senior officials last year but two more have since been added to that total with the announcement in June that former defence ministers Li Shangfu and Wei Fenghe came under investigation in 2023.

All of the tigers – as the CCDI refers to them – belonged to a pool of officials known as "centrally managed cadres", meaning they held ranks at the deputy ministerial level or above. A smaller number held slightly lower ranks but occupied key positions in critical sectors.

Eight of the 36 detained in the first half held positions in central Communist Party and state agencies, while 20 of them were from local governments or party bodies, suggesting the investigators cast a wide net.

The biggest cases involved former agriculture minister Tang Renjian; former justice minister Tang Yijun; Gou Zhongwen, China's former sports chief credited with the country's Olympic medals success; former deputy propaganda chief Zhang Jiancun; and Zhong Ziran, former director of the China Geological Survey.

The most high-profile downfalls among the 20 regional officials were former Tibet party boss Wu Yingjie; Gansu's deputy provincial governor Yang Zixing; and his counterpart in Yunnan province, Li Shisong.

Li Shisong is the first alternate member of the party's present Central Committee – convened in 2022 – ensnared in a corruption investigation. The CCDI announced his detention on June 25, just three weeks before the committee meets for its much-awaited third plenum, set to start July 15.

The plenum is likely to endorse a decision to remove three full members of the Central Committee under investigation, namely former defence minister Li Shangfu, agriculture minister Tang Renjian and former rocket force commander Li Yuchao.

Beyond the Central Committee, other big names brought down by CCDI in the six months include two prominent security officials. Liu Yuejin, China's former anti-terror chief and renowned anti-narcotics hero, was targeted in March and Liu Zhiqiang, the police's former international cooperation head and deputy justice minister, found himself in the cross hairs in April.

Liu Yuejing's downfall was particularly shocking because he was known as one of the country's best anti-narcotics officers, working on many high-profile cases before rising to head the China National Narcotics Control Commission in May 2015.

He became the country's first anti-terror chief in December 2015, following a series of attacks across China, notably one in March 2014 when dozens of people were killed by a knife-wielding gang that rampaged at a railway station in Kunming, Yunnan province. Beijing blamed that attack on Xinjiang separatists.

These investigations showed that past glories, outstanding expertise or political connections were no longer bargaining chips with the disciplinary watchdog, said a political scientist from Beijing's Renmin university.

"Liu [Yuejing] was a well-known anti-narcotics cop. Gou was hailed as the man behind China's successful winter Olympics run ... Tibet's Wu Yingjie had boasted of Tibet's stability during his rule. But the anti-corruption team did not let them hide behind their past glories," the political scientist said on condition of anonymity.

"In Xi's era, no one can be spared. The investigators don't care about officials' past contributions. At the ministerial level, there is no immunity privilege."

China's uncalled for gloating over UN's adoption of its rights review report

05 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China has sought to gloat over the fact that the UN human rights Council, Geneva, has "unanimously" approved the 4th Universal Periodic Review (UPR) of its human rights record on Jul 4 as if this amounted to unanimous approval of its human rights record. In fact, a number of countries have expressed serious concern at the gravity of the situation not only in China itself but also in Tibet, Xinjiang, and elsewhere and Beijing's continued refusal to address them both during the UPR hearing and when the report came up for adoption.

The only countries that praised it, even if many, were those with serious human rights problems of their own and that had been lobbied by China to be present and speak for it. China's official globaltimes.cn, reporting Jul 5 on the report's adoption, mentioned some of them. "Russia, Venezuela, Uzbekistan, Gambia, Vietnam, and many other countries at the meeting positively assessed China's efforts and achievements in human rights development."

In fact, during the UPR hearing to evaluate China's record, 21 states made substantial criticism of its human rights record in Tibet – the largest number since China underwent its first review in 2009, said Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet (savetibet.org) Jul 4.

Criticism of China's human rights record, including in Tibet, was galore even at the meeting for the adoption of the report.

The United Kingdom made the following scathing statement: "China tried to claim that the Office of the High Commissioners' authoritative Xinjiang assessment is, and I quote: illegal and void. It is neither. Let me again urge China to end its persecution and arbitrary detention of Uyghurs and Tibetans and to allow genuine freedom of religion and expression."

It "again" urged China to "end its persecution and arbitrary detention of Uyghurs and Tibetans and to allow genuine freedom of religion or belief and cultural expression," and so forth.

Likewise, the United States said, "The United States condemns the human rights abuses in Tibet, Inner Mongolia, and across China."

China brought a large delegation to the meeting. "Representatives from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Supreme People's Court, as well as delegates from the Xizang Autonomous Region, Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, Hong Kong, and Macao Special Administrative Regions also attended as members of the Chinese government delegation," said the globaltimes.cn report.

The report also said, "After the Human Rights Council approved China's report, the venue resounded with warm applause, and many representatives from other countries congratulated the Chinese delegation."

Nevertheless, Ambassador Chen Xu, Permanent Representative of China to the UN Office at Geneva and other international organizations in Switzerland, who led the Chinese government delegation, has felt constrained to vent his anger at the criticisms China had received throughout the UPR process.

"China firmly opposes the politicization, instrumentalization, and weaponization of human rights issues, and firmly opposes using human rights issues as an excuse to interfere in China's internal affairs," the report cited him as saying.

China rejects key Western calls for human-rights reforms at U.N. meeting

04 July 2024, Reuters, Emma Farge

China on Thursday rejected Western-led recommendations for human-rights reforms including calls for greater freedoms in Hong Kong and for Uyghurs in Xinjiang, but accepted others from allies, as it sought to defend its record at a U.N. meeting.

The U.N. Human Rights Council session in Geneva caps off a review process in which Beijing has strived to fend off criticism following a 2022 U.N. report which said the detention of Uyghurs and other Muslims in China's Xinjiang region may constitute crimes against humanity. China denies any abuses.

The council's president, Omar Zniber, said China had accepted nearly 70% of the more than 400 reform recommendations it received as part of the U.N. review.

"Progress and development on human rights is achieved in China with each passing day," China's ambassador, Chen Xu, told the meeting, alongside a large delegation of Chinese diplomats and officials. He said it rejected recommendations that were "politically motivated based on disinformation, ideologically biased or interfering in China's traditional sovereignty" and condemned what he called an attempt to "smear and attack" it.

Yet China's critics say its high acceptance rate is misleading, with one Western diplomat alleging the country had "stacked the deck" by investing political capital in quelling criticism.

Reuters previously reported that China had lobbied non-Western countries to praise its record by asking them to make "constructive recommendations."

British ambassador Simon Manley complained to the council that China had rejected each and every one of its recommendations, including a call for an end to persecutions of Uyghurs and for the Hong Kong security law to be repealed.

U.S. Human Rights Ambassador Michèle Taylor also voiced disappointment at what she called China's refusal to take action.

"China's abuses constitute a rejection of U.N. assessments and recommendations and violate or undermine international commitments," she said. Other countries were more upbeat, including Russia's envoy who praised China's "constructive approach" and Gambia's envoy who lauded the country's progress.

The U.N. review of China is not unique and all countries undergo the process every few years at the council - the only intergovernmental body designed to protect human rights worldwide.

An attempt to hold a debate about the U.N. High Commissioner's China report was voted down by mostly non-Western members later in 2022 - a result seen as a diplomatic victory for Beijing.

China's internet watchdog calls for 'favourable' environment ahead of third plenum

03 July 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

China's top internet watchdog has called on regulators and internet companies to create a "favourable" environment ahead of a crucial Communist Party meeting this month.

The Cyberspace Administration of China (CAC) made the call at a national cyberspace meeting held last week, according to a statement released on social media on Tuesday.

The meeting came less than a month ahead of the third plenum, a gathering of more than 370 members of the party elite setting out the policy direction to tackle China's economic and social challenges over the next five to 10 years.

CAC deputy director Niu Yibing urged all departments and China's web platforms to "go all out" to create a "favourable" public opinion environment in the build-up to the four-day meeting, which starts in just under two weeks.

"[We must] adhere to the correct political position of directing public opinion and orienting social values," the statement said, also vowing to continue a crackdown on bad behaviour online.

The statement also warned regulators and internet companies to properly handle "the relationship between security and development".

They must make use of the internet to help drive economic growth, especially for new industries, and at the same time strengthen content management and control to "prevent various risks and hidden dangers", it said.

Officials from the CAC's Beijing headquarters and provincial branches, as well as representatives of leading internet companies attended the meeting.

A few days after the meeting finished, internet platforms started to crack down on ultranationalist comments in the wake of the death of Hu Youping, who tried to stop a knife attack on a Japanese school bus in Suzhou.

Hu's bravery was applauded by most of the public, but some sporadic anti-Japanese postings described her as a "Japanese spy".

On Sunday some of the country's top tech firms, including Tencent, NetEase, Sina Weibo, Douyin - the Chinese version of TikTok - and Phoenix New Media's news portal Ifeng.com, said they had deleted comments of this nature and banned accounts that promoted hatred and extremism.

Although it is routine for the internet watchdog to keep online opinion in check ahead of major political meetings, the authorities need to tread carefully and not be seen as too aggressive in undermining economic growth, said Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy.

"Security is clearly still the top concern ahead of the party plenum. Any incident can create unnecessary attention from the top leadership and result in potential setbacks in the careers of the officials in charge," Wu said.

"But for the Chinese regulators, now they are also mindful of not going overboard in the security aspect. They probably don't want to create another saga like the online gaming rule proposal, which caused a major market meltdown."

In January regulators were forced into a rare reversal after a proposal to limit the amount of time and money people could spend on video games caused the share price of some major companies such as Tencent Holdings and NetEase to plummet.

Former Chinese TAR boss Wu Yingjie's fall likely due to misuse of funds

03 July 2024, International Campaign for Tibet

On June 16, 2024, Chinese state media reported that former Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) Party Secretary Wu Yingjie is being investigated for "suspected severe violations of Party discipline and the law."

The announcement has prompted speculation that Wu's downfall might be connected to his work in Tibet. Wu spent over 45 years working in different departments of the TAR government from 1974 to 2021, lending some credence to this speculation.

However, given the Chinese government's penchant for secrecy no details have been provided about Wu's investigation, and there may not be an authoritative answer until charges have been filed and his sentencing is announced. In the meantime, it is possible to analyze some developments around the time of Wu's investigation, including actions taken against other senior officials that are connected to the possible misuse of funds in Tibet.

Timeline of events

On December 28, 2020, Chinese state media reported on a meeting that Wu Yingjie, then secretary of the TAR Party Committee, and Che Dralha (Chinese: Qi Zhala), then chairman of TAR, had in Beijing with China Development Bank (CDB) Chairman Zhao Huan and Ouyang Weimin, then president of the Bank. They signed a "Memorandum of Cooperation on Development Finance Supporting Long-term Stability and High-quality Development in Tibet in the New Era." Also present in that meeting were Zhou Qingyu, then vice president of CDB, and Jiang Jie, then TAR party committee member.

(from left) Wu Yingjie, Che Dralha, Zhao Huan, Ouyang Weimin, Zhou Qingyu, and Jiang Jie

Since then investigations, indictments, and trials have been variously announced against three of the six participants of this meeting, while another one has disappeared from public view. This could indicate that this meeting and the participants involved are connected with the latest investigation against Wu Yingjie.

On June 14, 2024, two days before Wu's investigation was announced, Jiang Jie, one of the attendees of the meeting, was indicted after prosecutors accused him of "taking advantage of his various positions to seek profits for others, in return he illegally accepted huge sums of money and valuables," according to state media. The investigation against Jiang was announced on July 3, 2023, and the reasoning given was the same as for Wu: "for suspected severe violations of Party discipline and laws." Jiang was subsequently dismissed from the membership of the TAR committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference.

On May 19, 2023, disciplinary and supervisory investigation was announced against Zhou Qingyu of CDB, another participant in the 2020 meeting. He was arrested in December 2023 on suspicion of bribe-taking, again with the same reasoning given as Jiang and Wu.

On June 14, 2024, state media reported on his trial. Reports said between 2013 and 2023, "Zhou took advantage of his various positions at the bank to provide assistance to others in matters such as loan financing, project contracting, business operations, and personnel arrangements. In return, Zhou accepted money and valuables worth over 67.43 million yuan (about 9.5 million U.S. dollars)."

Corruption in Tibet under Chinese rule

The official narrative is that these are part of the broader anti-corruption campaign announced by Chinese Communist Party leader Xi Jinping. It is possible that given the close proximity of these announcements, they might be connected to a larger group of people working on Tibet – if corruption is the real reason for the investigation.

To date, from among the participants of the 2020 meeting, only CDB's Zhao Huan remains in his position as the chair of the Bank. On February 17, 2023, CDB announced that Ouyang Weimin was relieved of his post without providing any reason. He seems to have disappeared from public view, and it will be unsurprising if an investigation against him is announced soon.

The only other named attendee, and the only Tibetan in that meeting, is Che Dralha. Soon after his transfer to the TAR from Dechen (Diqing) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Yunnan in 2017 observers noted indications that Chinese authorities were promoting him for possible token Tibetan representation as a senior leader at the national level. However, in October 2021 he was unexpectedly transferred to serve as a vice chair of a committee of the National People's Congress (NPC). It might not be a coincidence that Wu was also transferred from Lhasa to be a vice chair of another committee of the NPC. It may be the case that Wu and Che Dralha were already being scrutinized by the Party.

Available information indicates that CBD has been involved in funding projects in the TAR for years. It has a branch in Lhasa that opened in 2011, and according to a recruitment announcement, it "closely focuses on serving the Party's Tibet governance strategy in the new era, gives full play to the advantages of medium- and long-term investment and financing of development finance and comprehensive financial services, takes root in the snow-covered plateau, serves the construction of the border, vigorously supports infrastructure construction, energy and transportation, ecological protection, rural revitalization, improvement of people's livelihood and characteristic and advantageous industries, and serves the long-term stability and high-quality development of Tibet."

In 2013 CDB announced that it was investing 50 billion yuan (around US $ 7 billion) of financing to support TAR economic and social development from 2013 to 2020. In 2018, CDB announced that it was investing 60 billion yuan (around US $8 billion).

Wu has spent most of his professional career working in TAR, having worked there nearly 50 years (from 1974 to 2021). In August 2016, he became TAR party secretary before being shunted to Beijing in October 2021. Interestingly, on Dec. 9, 2022 the U.S. Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC), announced that Wu was among 40 individuals and entities that are being sanctioned for their connection to corruption or human rights abuse across nine countries.

Will Che Dralha face investigation?

A Tibetan source in exile with contacts in Lhasa said that when hearing about the investigation into Wu Yingjie in June, some people there asked why Che Dralha was not being investigated.

There may be some basis for this speculation. Che Dralha and Wu worked together in Lhasa from 2017 to October 2021, and the announcement of their transfer from Lhasa was made on the same day, indicating a likely connection. The fact that he did not appear anywhere during the 20th Party Congress and did not make the jump to national leadership despite previous years of active promotion by the Party may be another indication.

Also, in January 2024 Zhang Yongze, who was vice chairman of TAR when Che Dralha was the chairman, was sentenced to 14 years in prison for bribery. According to Chinese state media, he been indicted earlier on charges of taking bribes of about 51.8 million yuan (US $7 million). Similarly, on January 29, 2024, investigation against another TAR vice chair, Wang Yong, was announced and in March he was dismissed from his position in Tibet.

Conclusion

It may be some time before there are conclusive answers about Wu's actions and those of the other members of this circle.

The established facts, however, are indicative of the nature of Chinese rule in Tibet. The absence of a free press, freedom of speech, and an independent judiciary have created the conditions for massive, endemic corruption that includes China's highest leaders in Tibet. Xi's anti-corruption campaign may remove some of these officials from power, but it has not addressed the broader factors that gave rise their corruption in the first place. It seems unlikely that many leading officials, from the lowest level to the highest, could survive any level of scrutiny into their actions.

There is an awareness in Tibet of widespread corruption in Chinese officialdom and the Chinese Communist Party. Chinese authorities do not take kindly to outside attempts to curb this corruption, however; see the case of Sengdra, a Tibetan township chief who spent more than a year in prison for raising questions about government corruption.

If Xi is truly concerned about corruption in Tibet, allowing Tibetans to speak freely about the abuses of CCP officials in Tibet is a better solution than fostering an environment of corruption and then haphazardly pursuing some of the officials within it.

Xi Jinping exposes China's hypocrisy with Panchsheel fakery

01 July 2024, India Today, Yudhajit Shankar Das

China celebrated the 70th anniversary of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, or Panchsheel Agreement, first signed with India. As Chinese President Xi Jinping heaped praises on Panchsheel, it exposed China's hypocrisy of celebrating the anniversary of the principles that it continues to trample on with impunity.

China commemorated the 70th anniversary of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, which is known in India as Panchsheel and a cornerstone of former Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru's vision of a world order. In marking the anniversary and heaping praise on Panchsheel, China and its President, Xi Jinping, revealed their hypocrisy. There's a reason why China is talking about Panchsheel now, an agreement that it trampled upon with its war against India in 1962.

It is to increase its influence on the global south that China is parroting the Five Principles of Peaceful Existence. It signed the first agreement with India in 1954.

However, unlike the 60th anniversary celebrations in 2014, India officially stayed away from the Panchsheel ceremony in China this year.

National strategy experts have called out China's fakery in commemorating the Panchsheel anniversary.

They pointed out that the commemoration is ironic because China itself has "flagrantly violated all the Panchsheel principles".

The first of the Panchsheel principles is mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty. China has, from the very beginning, blatantly flouted that.

Experts also pointed out how China still continues to violate these principles with its continuing territorial claims and massing of troops along the border.

PANCHSHEEL, ONE OF BIGGEST BLUNDERS, SAY EXPERTS

The Panchsheel Agreement, signed on April 29, 1954, is formerly known as The Agreement on Trade and Intercourse with Tibet Region. It was signed by the Indian envoy to Beijing, N Raghavan, and the Chinese Foreign Minister, Zhang Han-Fu.

It gave major concessions to the Chinese side, and ended up trading Tibet's independence, which made India share immediate borders with China.

There has been vehement opposition to the agreement in India since the very beginning.

"Born in sin" is how Congress leader Acharya Kriplani described the Panchsheel Agreement of 1954. Kriplani said during a debate in the Lok Sabha in 1959 that with the Panchsheel, India "put the seal of our approval on the destruction of an ancient nation [Tibet]".

Kriplani's criticism came years before the Chinese thrust upon a war on unprepared India.

"The 1954 Panchsheel Agreement represented one of India's biggest post-Independence blunders," said geostrategist Brahma Chellaney, while commenting on China marking the Panchsheel anniversary.

Chinese President Xi Jinping on Saturday (June 29) highlighted the significance of the Panchsheel Agreement in resolving current global conflicts as he sought to expand influence in the Global South amid its tussle with the West.

"The Five Principles have set a historic benchmark for international relations and international rule of law," said Xi.

EXPERTS CALL OUT CHINA'S, XI'S PANCHSHEEL FAKERY

"It is scarcely a surprise that Xi heaps praise on the five principles ("Panchsheel") of peaceful coexistence... What Xi did not say is that, just about eight years later, China, by invading India in 1962, flagrantly violated all the Panchsheel Principles," wrote Brahma Chellaney on X.

"Worse still, China continues to violate those principles in its relations with its neighbours," added Chellaney.

It isn't just with India, China has territorial disputes with several neighbours.

Recently, Chinese military personnel rammed two Philippine navy boats, boarded them and used axes, spears, machetes and hammers to damage the boats. The Chinese aggression in a disputed area of the South China Sea seemed similar to China's Galwan Valley attack of June 2020, and Indians called it "Galwan 2.0 in the South China Sea".

A post by Sudheendra Kulkarni, columnist and an official of Atal Bihari Vajpayee's PMO, on him attending the Panchsheel anniversary celebration in Beijing irked several experts.

"Panchsheel principles were supposed to be the bedrock of India-China ties following India's acceptance of Tibet as part of China, a massive political concession India made to China in the interest of peaceful relations," said Kanwal Sibal, former foreign secretary of India.

"China totally violated these principles in 1962 and continues to violate them with continuing territorial claims on India and military pressures on the border," Sibal wrote on X, reacting to Kulkarni's post. "Is massing of 50,000 troops by each side on the border consistent with Panch Sheel principles?" asked Sibal, a career diplomat.

Against this backdrop, Kanwal Sibal said it was appropriate that India didn't attend the celebrations in Beijing.

"India's presence at this self-serving Chinese propagandist show would be endorsing China's adherence to these principles in India-China ties and Chinese conduct elsewhere," he said. "We would be making a political fool of ourselves as a country," he added.

CHINA'S PANCHSHEEL MOVE STRATEGIC

There's a reason why China is showing its affinity to the Panchsheel.

Chinese President Xi invoked the Five Principles and linked them to his Global Security Initiative, saying it aims for "joint security and a shared future for humanity".

Xi has been promoting various initiatives, including the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), to expand China's global influence.

However, it is a hogwash that doesn't need much effort to be deciphered.

China has trampled upon all five of the Panchsheel principles and continues to violate them in its dealings with its neighbours. Therefore, marking the 70th anniversary of the Five Principles is plain Chinese fakery, which was exposed by President Xi as he heaped praises on the Panchsheel Agreement, while working against its spirit.

China's Communist Party on track for 100 million members by year's end

01 July 2024, SCMP, Phoebe Zhang

Membership of the Chinese Communist Party reached 99 million last year and is on track to reach 100 million by the end of 2024, but the rate of growth continues to slow, according to the latest official tally.

In line with tradition, the data was released a day ahead of the July 1 celebrations to honour the party's founding in 1921.

The Central Organisation Department – the party's top personnel office – reported a net increase of 1.14 million members, a 1.2 per cent growth, compared with the end of 2022 when party membership rose by 1.4 per cent, increasing by 1.32 million.

Chinese President Xi Jinping – who is also the party's general secretary – extended greetings to party members across the country on Friday, in advance of the 103rd anniversary, at a Politburo study session.

Xi stressed that "comprehensive and strict governance over the party" must be upheld, to push forward party-building in the new era, and its organisation needs to be effective, insisting on a centralised and united leadership.

Grass roots party organisations also need to be reformed, to increase the party's local governance ability, he said. Internet and information technologies should be applied to party-building, to achieve full coverage of the organisation, online and offline.

A closer look at the tally shows that the number of members aged under 30 dropped to 12.41 million – a 0.18 per cent decrease of 23,000 on 2022. The drop was much slower than the previous year, when young membership fell by 1.5 per cent, or 189,000 from 2021.

The party has become more educated, with 56.2 per cent – 55.78 million members – having a college degree or higher, an increase of 2.13 million. While women and ethnic minority groups remain under-represented, there have been improvements.

Female members increased by 88,300 to reach 30.18 million – 30.4 per cent of the membership – while ethnic minority groups now represent 7.7 per cent of the party, with a rise of 14,700 in 2023 to a total of 7.59 million, the data showed.

Xi has used various domestic and international settings over the years to stress the importance of female issues and called for women's rights and interests to be protected.

At a United Nations meeting in 2020 marking the 25th anniversary of the Fourth World Conference on Women for example, he said efforts must be made to ensure that women's development went hand in hand with economic and social development.

And in October last year, at a meeting with the All-China Women's Federation, Xi said women's roles were "irreplaceable" and called for more female participation in areas including high-quality development and village revitalisation.

Despite leadership support for economic and social empowerment, female participation in China's elite politics is lagging. In a break from a two-decade tradition, the current Politburo has 24 men and no women.

June

CHINA: Harsh words, political disloyalty allegations mark purge of two former defence ministers

28 June 2024, Tibetan Review

China has used especially harsh words in announcing the expulsion from the party of the country's two immediate former defence ministers while also underlining their political disloyalty, noted the scmp.com Jun 28, citing observers and China's official Xinhua news agency.

In an unprecedented move, the party's 24-person Politburo decided to launch corruption investigations into Wei Fenghe and his successor Li Shangfu, and expelled both from the party, the report said, citing statements on the decision released by state news agency Xinhua on Jun 27.

Both have also been stripped of their positions as generals and membership of the People's Liberation Army and will reportedly face criminal charges from military prosecutors too.

Li was sacked from his job in October, just seven months after he became defence minister while Wei held the position from 2018 to 2023.

Wei had also become the first chief of the rocket force when it was formed in 2015 as part of a major military overhaul. His two successors as heads of the force, Zhou Yaning and Li Yuchao, were both ousted last year.

The statements were quoted as saying the two former ministers "betrayed the trust of the party and the CMC [Central Military Commission], seriously polluted the political environment of the military, and caused great damage to the party's cause, national defence and military construction, as well as the image of its senior leaders".

The statements were stated to have singled Wei out for degrading the "political ecosystem" of the People's Liberation Army (PLA), and Li for contaminating the PLA's military equipment industry. Observers have drawn attention to the especially harsh wording in the brief statements of accusations against the two men. The wording is much harsher than the accusations previously made against Xu Caihou and Guo Boxiong, two former vice-chairmen of the CMC – China's top military command body – who were sacked for corruption during the first term of President Xi Jinping, a political scientist from Nanjing university, who asked not to be named due to sensitivity of the matter, has said.

"You can almost tell there is a feeling of 'how dare you let me down on the most important job!'"

The analyst has added that Beijing's frustration may have been compounded because unlike Guo and Xu, both Wei and Li were promoted to their most senior position under Xi.

He has noted that beside the usual short description of the alleged corruption, the Xinhua announcement underlined Wei and Li's political disloyalty.

The military, the bastion of the party's political power, has become a prime target for Xi's anti-graft campaign, and Beijing has said proudly that more Chinese generals have been sacked for corruption under Xi than were killed in decades of war in the 20th century, the report noted.

The official announcements were cited as saying that while Wei Fenghe was accused of taking bribes, his successor Li Shangfu was accused of both taking and giving bribes, raising new questions.

"It would be interesting to ask to whom did Li, who was already a top brass in the military, give money to," the Nanjing-based analyst has said.

The sacking of such a large number of senior defence officials is seen as a sign of the strength of President Xi's control over the military.

"Xi Jinping's control over the PLA is stronger than that of any of his predecessors, even Mao Zedong, if we look at the reforms he has been able to effect throughout the PLA since late 2015," James Char, a research fellow with the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies at the Nanyang Technological University in Singapore, has said.

While some observers have argued that corruption in the PLA has exposed weaknesses in its military abilities, some have argued it could actually improve the force's capacity to fight, the report said.

Xi Says China Planning 'Major' Reforms Ahead Of Key Political Meeting

28 June 2024, Barron's

Chinese President Xi Jinping said Friday the ruling Communist Party was planning and implementing "major" reforms, ahead of a closely watched political conclave that is expected to put economic recovery high on the agenda.

Chinese policymakers have struggled to reignite growth since the end of strict Covid-19 pandemic health curbs in late 2022.

The world's second-largest economy is beset by a debt crisis in the property sector, persistently low consumption and high youth unemployment.

Xi said in a speech on Friday policymakers "are planning and implementing major measures to further deepen reform in a comprehensive manner".

"We will... form a more market-oriented, legal and international business environment," he said.

"China's door will only open wider and wider, and will never be closed."

Xi has touted the promise of significant reform several times this year and the government has already enacted measures in key sectors such as real estate to try to address critical issues.

It was announced on Thursday that the delayed Third Plenum – a meeting historically watched for signals on economic policy direction – will take place in Beijing in mid-July.

The key meeting of top officials, originally expected last autumn, is highly anticipated in the hopes it might resolve the uncertainty that has weighed on China's economy.

The People's Bank of China (PBOC), the country's central bank, pledged later on Friday to "promote the implementation of the financial policies and measures already issued, and push for the stable and healthy development of the real estate market".

"(We will)... promote the accelerated construction of a new model for real estate development," the PBOC said in a statement.

Xi's address at Beijing's opulent Great Hall of the People, delivered in front of a high-profile international audience, marked the 70th anniversary of some of China's foundational diplomatic tenets.

The Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence include mutual respect for territorial integrity, mutual non-aggression, mutual non-interference in internal affairs, equality and cooperation for mutual benefit, and peaceful coexistence.

Xi hailed China as a force for global peace, saying in his speech Beijing would continue to play "constructive roles" in international conflicts such as Gaza and Ukraine.

China has been criticised by Ukraine's allies for failing to condemn Russia's 2022 invasion and accused of favouring Moscow. Beijing insists it is a neutral party.

In the Middle East, China has advocated for decades for a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict.

Xi called for greater cooperation between China and developing countries in his speech.

"Engaging in small yard, high-wall decoupling practices is to move against the tide of history," Xi said.

"It will only harm the common interests of the international community."

China condemned for rejecting key recommendations of UN review of its rights record

26 June 2024, Tibetan Review

China has rejected all key recommendations urging it to end violations of human rights of its citizens while accepting only those from friendly governments which either do not criticize it or which, in fact, praises its repressive policies in the name of combating separatism and maintaining the socialist government system following the UN's Universal Periodical Review (UPR) of its record held in Jan 2024.

The UPR is a process through which all UN member states' human rights records are examined by other members and the latest was China's fourth since 2009.

Announcing China's response to the 418 recommendations made at the end of the review hearing, the UN has said Jun 11 that the Chinese government had agreed to accept 290 recommendations, partially accept 8, take note of 32, and reject 98.

China has cited the 290 as those it had either "accepted and (were) being implemented" or those it had "accepted and already implemented." However, none of the "accepted" recommendations address concerns raised by UN member states about crimes against humanity, torture, forced disappearance, persecution of human rights defenders and journalists, or other grave and well-documented violations, said a group of 13 human rights organizations that include Chinese, Tibetan, Uyghur, Hong Kong, as well as international groups such as Human Rights Watch in a joint statement on Jun 25.

The statement said that through intense lobbying campaign ahead of the review, China acted to whitewash its record, submitting false information and blocking any domestic civil society groups from participating in the preparation of the state report or from making contributions to the review. It also succeeded in having a number of states friendly to it to ask bland questions that made vague recommendations while using their platform to, in fact, praise the Chinese government's rights record.

"This provided ample weak recommendations that the Chinese government could deem acceptable."

Given this context, the numerous acceptances by the Chinese government does not mean actual intention to improve its rights record. No one should confuse a high number of accepted recommendations with any real commitment by Beijing on human rights, the statement said.

In fact, China's latest rejection rate is stated to be 30%, much higher than in the last one, in 2018, at 18%.

The statement dismissed China's claim made at the Jan 2024 review of the achievement from its "acceptance" of many recommendations from the 2018 review, citing NGO research which showed that "the overwhelming majority of those accepted recommendations were so weak, vague, or based on flawed assumptions, that progress towards them cannot be meaningfully verified."

In fact, "dozens of the accepted recommendations clearly or implicitly endorse human rights violations. For example, Belarus recommended that China "[c]ombat separatism and promote modernization of the social governance system and capacity in Xizang" [using the Chinese government's official name for Tibet], the statement pointed out.

Given the sorry state of the UPR recommendations and China's rejection of their substantive contents, the statement suggested: "The Chinese government's posture towards the UPR should prompt the HRC member states and other actors to press Beijing to follow up on recommendations made by independent UN human rights monitors and officials, including Special Procedures, treaty bodies, and the OHCHR."

The joint statement came ahead of the adoption of China's UPR at the ongoing Jun 18 – Jul 12, 2024, session of the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva. China's official position is that any discussion critical of its human rights record constitutes interference in its internal affair even as it plays an outsized role in the UN human rights system

Chinese Government Rejects Key Human Rights Recommendations in Latest UN Review

25 June 2024, TCHRD

Intense Lobbying Campaign Produces Many Weak Recommendations

The Chinese government's rejection of recommendations to end its deepening human rights crisis reflects its disdain for international human rights reviews at the United Nations, the undersigned human rights nongovernmental organizations said in a joint statement released on 25 June 2024.

On 11 June 2024, the UN made available the Chinese government's announcement to accept or reject recommendations from the latest Universal Periodical Review (UPR) in January 2024, a process through which all UN member states' human rights records are examined. In a disingenuous effort to paper over its refusal to engage to improve its appalling record, the Chinese government said it would accept 290 of the 428 recommendations, partially accept 8, note 32, and reject 98 of the recommendations made. The 290 accepted ones include those the government said it "accepted and being implemented" and those "accepted and already implemented."

None of the "accepted" recommendations address concerns raised by UN member states about crimes against humanity, torture, forced disappearance, persecution of human rights defenders and journalists, or other grave and well-documented violations.

The Chinese government, in the preparatory process leading up to the January 2024 review, as it did in and around three previous UPRs in 2009, 2013, and 2018, submitted false information, and blocked any domestic civil society groups from participating in the preparation of the state report or from making contributions to the review. Through an intense lobbying campaign ahead of the review, it acted to whitewash its record, and succeeded in having a number of states ask bland questions, make vague recommendations, and use their platform to praise the Chinese government's rights record. This provided ample weak recommendations that the Chinese government could deem acceptable.

Despite the heavy pressure, some countries took a principled approach, raising concerns, and making recommendations, on the basis of the growing body of evidence of abuses compiled by NGOs, UN special procedures, treaty bodies and the UN Human Rights Office.

However, Beijing categorically rejected all recommendations calling on it to stop these egregious human rights violations and to end impunity for the perpetrators. The rejection rate is 30%, much higher than in 2018 – 18%. It also rejected all recommendations calling on the government to end reprisals against individuals engaging with the international human rights system, a message of disdain on the ten-year anniversary of the death of Cao Shunli in detention, a courageous Chinese human rights defender taken into custody on her way to Geneva for China's 2014 UPR.

In this context, the numerous acceptances by the Chinese government does not mean actual intention to improve its rights record. No one should confuse a high number of accepted recommendations with any real commitment by Beijing on human rights.

At the January 2024 review, Chinese officials claimed as the government's achievement its "acceptance" of many recommendations from the 2018 review, yet NGO research shows that the overwhelming majority of those accepted recommendations were so weak, vague, or based on flawed assumptions, that progress towards them cannot be meaningfully verified. Worse still, dozens of the accepted recommendations also clearly or implicitly endorse human rights violations. For example, Belarus recommended that China "[c]ombat separatism and promote modernization of the social governance system and capacity in Xizang" [using the Chinese government's official name for Tibet].

Since the 2018 UPR, civil society groups have documented a range of acts of intimidation and reprisals, including Chinese diplomats photographing civil society representatives and journalists inside UN premises. And intimidation was intense around and during the January 2024 review, as the Chinese government, in clear violation of its legal obligation to uphold the right to unhindered access to the UN, tried to silence critics who may offer an honest assessment.

Beijing's responses to UPR recommendations also include hostility towards the process and towards UN human rights mechanisms. The government has challenged the authority of the UPR to address topics Beijing insists are a matter of "sovereignty," and disparaged the professionalism of UN human rights experts. The Chinese government also falsely proclaimed the August 2022 OHCHR report on human rights abuses in Xinjiang, which that office alleged may constitute crimes against humanity, as "completely illegal and void."

The adoption of China's UPR at this session of the Human Rights Council should be an important inflection point. The Chinese government's posture towards the UPR should prompt the HRC member states and other actors to press Beijing to follow up on recommendations made by independent UN human rights monitors and officials, including Special Procedures, treaty bodies, and the OHCHR.

Specifically, the UN High Commissioner and member states should follow up on the landmark 2022 OHCHR report on abuses in the Uyghur region. The Special Advisor of the Secretary-General on the Responsibility to Protect should take concrete action in response to the referral of the situation of Xinjiang to their Office by the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination in November 2022.

Member states from all regional and political groups should take overdue action to heed the call by more than fifty UN human rights experts in June 2020 for them “to act collectively and decisively to ensure China respects human rights and abides by its international obligations,” including by holding an HRC special session on China and establishing an impartial and independent United Nations mechanism “to closely monitor, analyze and report annually on the human rights situation in China.” Such a mechanism is needed more than ever, in the face of Beijing’s intransigence and deepening repression. The experts repeated the call in June 2022 and September 2022.

Member states should also press Beijing to end intimidation and seriously cooperate with other forthcoming treaty body reviews, including under the Convention against Torture, for which its state report is five years overdue, and the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Undersigned, in alphabetical order: Chinese Human Rights Defenders (CHRD), CIVICUS: World Alliance for Citizen Participation, Hong Kong Democracy Council (HKDC), Hong Kong Watch (HKW), Human Rights in China (HRIC), Human Rights Watch (HRW), International Service for Human Rights (ISHR), International Tibet Network, Reporters without Borders (RSF), Safeguard Defenders, The Rights Practice (TRP), Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), Uyghur Human Rights Project, Campaign for Uyghurs, World Uyghur Congress.

Cities, provinces across China join global propaganda push

21 June 2024, VOA, Lin Yang

Each year, China’s government spends billions on foreign propaganda and until recently those efforts were largely driven by departments in the central government and state media. Now, a growing number of cities are joining that effort, with the China Media Project, an independent research group, recently documenting at least 23 foreign propaganda centers at China’s city and provincial levels.

China experts say the move makes sense because it allows Beijing to draw on more resources and create tailored messages at a time when the country’s image is facing serious challenges over concerns that range from trade to human rights as well its handling of the COVID pandemic.

“The battle for discourse power requires all hands on deck,” Jonathan Sullivan, a China specialist at the University of Nottingham, told VOA.

“In every sector, China brings its full capacity – institutional, financial and human resources – to the fight, so it is normal” for Beijing to do the same with propaganda, Sullivan said.

Joshua Kurlantzick, author of Beijing’s Global Media Offensive, said this is one of the many attempts to spread the Chinese Communist Party, or CCP, propaganda.

“If one doesn’t work, China has so many efforts they can try others,” he told VOA in a written response.

The centers are popping up across the country and the most recent was on June 7, when China’s northeastern city of Tianjin established the Tianjin International Communication Center, or TICC.

According to the city’s state-run newspaper, the Tianjin Daily, the new center will “use lenses and pens to demonstrate a lively Tianjin to the outside world” and “serve the country’s overall public diplomacy.”

The establishment of the TICC follows the formation on May 31 of Zhejiang International Communication Center. That provincial-level center, according to the China Public Diplomacy Association, will “showcase China’s governance through the Zhejiang model ... and allow the world to truly understand China.”

Since 2023, the spread of global propaganda centers at the local level began expanding rapidly. On July 3, 2023, Shenzhen formed the SZMG International Communication Center. A few days later, eastern Jiangsu province established Jiangsu International Communication Center on July 12. Shanghai joined in October 2023 with SMG International, a city-level external communication base dubbed as “a video window for Shanghai’s city image.”

On January 6, 2024, the northern province of Hebei announced its own Great Wall International Communication Center. As of this month, China has established 23 provincial-level external communication centers, tasked to remake China’s approach of delivering its message externally.

Gary Rawnsley, a professor of public diplomacy at the University of Lincoln, said these provincial-level centers indicate China has begun to realize that it cannot carry out the same propaganda to all foreigners.

“I would say that this is a clever and strategic move because it indicates that China is understanding the need to tailor its messages for particular audiences,” he said. “When we look at the activities of some of these centers, they are very much oriented toward the needs and interests of people in neighboring countries."

Tailored for its audiences

"Tailored" and "targeted" are key words used by provincial-level international communication centers, or ICCs.

An article by Qiushi Journal, the leading official theoretical journal for the Chinese Communist Party, says the centers are "developed based on local propaganda needs" and will become "a new force" for China's global propaganda.

The Jiangsu International Communication Center has active accounts in seven languages on major social platforms that are blocked in China, including X, formerly known as Twitter, Facebook, Instagram and YouTube.

The director of the Hubei Communication Center told a local newspaper that in addition to making full use of social media accounts, the center has adopted a "one place, one policy" approach to tailor the content according to their audiences.

"For example, we focus on football programs to Brazil and Argentina, and culinary shows to Southeast Asia and Italy," said the center's director, Cao Xiqing.

Not all the centers were established over the past year.

China's Yunnan province, which borders Myanmar, Laos and Vietnam, formed the South and Southeast Asian Media Network on May 31, 2022. According to the Information Office of the Yunnan Government, this is "the only international communication center in the country specially designed for audiences in South Asia and Southeast Asia."

The regional network publishes journals in Burmese, Thai, Cambodian and Lao. In addition to distributing its content on social media, it also has web pages in seven languages — Burmese, Lao, Thai, Khmer, English, Vietnamese and Chinese.

Soft power focus

The local ICCs focus on China's soft power. Rawnsley from the University of Lincoln said this is deliberate.

"It seems to be that at the central level, they are moving toward a much more political style of programming and letting these regional centers soften their programming for particular audiences and focusing much more on culture, tourism and history," he told VOA.

VOA examined recent tweets by the Henan International Communication Center and found topics that included night scenes of its capital, Zhengzhou, foreigners learning Chinese medicine, Henan Opera and Shaolin Kung Fu. The Henan ICC also has a promotional video of the Belt and Road Initiative, Beijing's massive global infrastructure project.

The ICCs also host various activities. For example, the Hubei ICC held an event named "The Story of the Communist Party of China" in May 2023, inviting foreigners in China to learn the history of the CCP.

Rawnsley said this highlights how everything the regional centers are doing is not completely autonomous.

"Everything will be following particular guidelines that are laid down in Beijing," he said.

Limited effect

Despite their rapid formations, these centers have not attracted much traffic. The Henan ICC, which joined X in November 2022, currently has 19,000 followers. The Jinan ICC's X account has around 55,000 followers since it was established in April 2022.

China has poured enormous resources into its external propaganda, yet people's attitudes toward China have worsened in recent years, especially since the 2020 coronavirus outbreak.

A poll by the Pew Research Center in May showed that 81% of Americans have an unfavorable view of China, including 43% who hold a very unfavorable view of the country.

A 2022 poll by Pew that surveyed people in 19 countries found 68% of the respondents had an unfavorable impression of Beijing. The research organization found these unfavorable opinions are related to concerns about China's policies on human rights.

China has received heavy criticism for its strict policies in Xinjiang, Tibet and Hong Kong, as well as its aggression toward self-ruling island Taiwan, which China claims as a breakaway province. The CCP leadership denies all these accusations.

Rawnsley said the problem China faces is much more than just its presentation.

"China keeps adding more and more platforms, but it doesn't change the message. It doesn't change what people know is going on inside China," he said.

"At the end of the day, policy and behavior determines credibility," he said. "Actions speak louder than words."

Xi calls for carrying forward patriotism

21 June 2024, China Daily

President Xi Jinping expressed the hope for the Tibetan Buddhist circle in Qinghai province to carry on the fine traditions of patriotism, help promote religious, social and ethnic harmony, and play an active role in advancing Chinese modernization, during an inspection tour in the province.

President Xi Jinping, who is also general secretary of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, is welcomed by monks at a Tibetan Buddhist temple in Xining, Qinghai province, on Tuesday. He inspected Qinghai from Tuesday to Wednesday. [Photo by Xie Huanchi / XINHUA]

Xi, who is also general secretary of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, made the remarks while visiting the Hongjue Temple in the provincial capital of Xining on Tuesday afternoon.

He said the temple has played an important role as a bridge in strengthening the bond between the central government and Tibetan Buddhism over generations.

"It is essential to protect this precious historical and cultural heritage, and renew efforts to foster a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation and promote ethnic unity and progress," Xi said.

The Hongjue Temple in central Xining has a history of more than 1,000 years. Konchok Gyatso, a senior monk at the temple, said it has played an important role in boosting exchanges between the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau and other parts of China and promoting peace among people from different ethnic groups.

Since the establishment of the monastery in 941 AD, it has always been inclusive to different cultures, Konchok Gyatso said. "The founder of the monastery was taught and approved by three masters from Tibetan Buddhism and two from Chinese Buddhism (also known as Mahayana Buddhism). And Hongjue is the temple with the longest history for integrating the cultures of both Tibetan Buddhism and Chinese Buddhism in China."

Because of such integration, it has become a well-known school among Tibetan Buddhist monks, and many accomplished monks and living Buddhas have studied at the temple, he added. "More importantly, besides their accomplishments in Tibetan Buddhism, they all share the same vision of promoting peace and unity among people from different ethnic groups till today."

Furthermore, the temple, which is located at the eastern entry point of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, has always helped to enforce ties between the central government and Tibetan Buddhism, Konchok Gyatso said.

In 1779, the 6th Panchen Erdeni Lobsang Palden Yeshe was invited to Beijing by Emperor Qianlong of the Qing Dynasty (1644-1911). To make his stop at the Hongjue Temple comfortable, the emperor had the temple fully renovated. And it has become a key spot where the Panchen Lama — one of the two most revered living Buddhas in Tibetan Buddhism — stayed in Qinghai ever since.

Also, born in Qinghai in 1938, the 10th Panchen Erdeni Chokyi Gyaltsen set off from the temple to Xizang in 1951 to fulfill his duty after completing a series of studies on Tibetan Buddhism.

"He then became a living Buddha with profound Buddhist knowledge and full love of the country and his religion. He worked hard for the country's unification and ethnic unity, which inspired us all," Konchok Gyatso said.

To protect Hongjue Temple's rich cultural heritage, a renovation and restoration project was launched in 2004. Upon the completion of the project in 2014, a new grand prayer hall was built at the temple.

"When people come to visit the monastery, besides the culture of Tibetan Buddhism, we want them to see its long-lasting tradition of boosting understanding among people from different ethnic groups, such as Tibetan, Mongolian and Han," Konchok Gyatso said. Chen Lijian, a researcher at the China Tibetology Research Center, said the temple has been influential in Tibetan Buddhism historically.

"And it will continue to serve as a key platform for promoting exchanges among different cultures and ethnic unity on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau," Chen said.

Xi Jinping visits Mao's caves

20 June 2024, RFA, Qian Lang

The Chinese leader uses symbolism of wartime revolutionary base to signal grip on the military.

President Xi Jinping has led top military brass on a pilgrimage of caves that were a key revolutionary base for the late supreme leader Mao Zedong, state media reported, a move analysts said was aimed at strengthening grip over the People's Liberation Army.

The cave complex of Yan'an, in northeast China, where Mao spent the formative years of the Chinese Communist Party leadership during the war with Japan, has become a symbol of ideological purity in China, and has been described by commentators as one of the "holy sites" of the Chinese revolution.

The Yan'an conference marks "a return to the roots of the military," state news agency Xinhua paraphrased Xi as saying.

It comes after Xi fired Li Shangfu from his post as defense minister on Oct. 24, 2023, with no explanation given. A number of senior leaders of the People's Liberation Army's Rocket Corps, including the head of China's nuclear arsenal, had also been fired by Xi in July.

Yan'an is also where Mao launched a major "rectification" campaign, purging his opponents from party ranks.

Commentators told RFA that the choice of Yan'an as a venue for Xi's speech sent out a strong symbolic message.

Xi told the political work conference in Shaanxi province that "the armed forces must always be led by those who are reliable and loyal to the party," Xinhua reported.

He warned of "deep-seated problems" in the military due to a "lack of ideals and beliefs."

Useful propaganda tool

Communist troops arrived in Yan'an, on the poverty-stricken loess plateau of the Yellow River, in 1935, making their homes in caves and eating millet gruel every day until the tide swung their way in the civil war in 1948.

The Yan'an period of Chinese history is a useful propaganda tool, because it came before the power struggles and political campaigns launched by Mao against his opponents threw the country into years of turmoil and cost millions of lives, and still carries a message of hope for many Chinese people. Current affairs commentator Cai Shenkun said Xi's message was clear.

"He is emphasizing the importance of who it is holding the gun," Cai said. "It used to be said that the party should command the gun, but the key question is, who is actually holding it?"

"Mao Zedong ruled the party with guns, Deng Xiaoping did the same," he said in a reference to Mao's successor who ordered the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre by People's Liberation Army forces in Beijing.

Wife promoted

Meanwhile, Xi has reportedly promoted his wife Peng Liyuan, a former military singer who holds the rank of major-general, to a senior position in the Central Military Commission's Cadre Assessment Committee, which approves appointments, according to senior political commentator Willy Lam.

"Peng's increasing public profile and potential elevation within the military hierarchy invites comparisons to Mao Zedong's reliance on his fourth wife, Jiang Qing, during the Cultural Revolution," Lam wrote in a commentary last month for the Jamestown Foundation.

Cai said it is significant that the conference is being held ahead of the third plenum of the Central Committee next month, and can be seen as a message that Xi is strengthening his grip on the military.

Current affairs commentator Guo Min agreed, saying that party control over the armed forces is a recurrent concern for Xi.

"He's talking about the absolute leadership of the party over the military, which basically means, his absolute command over the military," Guo said.

"Political work is actually about toeing the line, the same line as [Xi]," he said.

Xi Jinping tells top PLA leaders they must eliminate 'conditions that breed corruption'

20 June 2024, SCMP, Liu Zhen

The People's Liberation Army must show absolute loyalty to the Communist Party and there can be no room for corruption in the military, President Xi Jinping told top PLA brass this week.

"We must make it clear that the barrels of guns must always be in the hands of those who are loyal and dependable to the party ... And we must make it clear that there is no place for any corrupt elements in the military," Xi was quoted by state media as saying.

Xi spoke on Monday in Yanan, in northwest Shaanxi province, at a political work conference of the Central Military Commission (CMC) with key officials and political commissars of the military, state news agency Xinhua reported. The appearance came before next month's Third Plenum of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, which is expected to lay out China's reform and economic priorities for the next few years.

The Xinhua report highlighted that the conference was initiated by Xi, who is the chairman of the CMC – the top decision-making body of the PLA.

Xi's speech, which covered a range of issues from global geopolitical challenges to the PLA's modernisation, mirrored a similar one he gave a decade ago in Gutian, Fujian province, that heralded an overhaul of the PLA and acceleration of its modernisation drive.

On Monday, Xi told the PLA elites that they must never forget the revolutionary spirit of the Communist Party founders, stay loyal to the party, and steel themselves for an unstable and rapidly changing world.

"At present, we face complex and profound changes in the world, country, party and the army," he said.

"Politically, we must incessantly promote politics in our army-building as our military face sophisticated and unparalleled challenges so that we can ensure the nature and principles of the people's army will never change, and we can always dare to fight and win."

In order to win, Xi said leading cadres must be prepared to do “deep soul searching” and face their own shortcomings.

“[PLA] cadres at all levels, the senior ones in particular, must step forward, dare to lose face and face up to their own shortcomings and flaws ... make earnest rectifications, resolve problems that are deeply rooted in their thinking,” Xi said.

He added that the top brass must eliminate “hotbeds and conditions that breed corruption” by improving the distribution of power and operational check and balance mechanisms, “enriching the toolbox for punishing new types of corruption and hidden corruption” and strengthening the all-round supervision of high-ranking officers in their performance and use of power.

Xi made no mention of individuals in his speech, which came after the sacking of dozens of senior PLA officials since last year. Former defence minister Li Shangfu was abruptly removed in October, with the reason for his removal never announced.

Additionally, nine senior generals – including past or current top commanders of the PLA Rocket Force (PLARF), the former air force commander and a few Central Military Commission officials with the Equipment Development Department in charge of equipment development of procurement – were disqualified from their posts in the National People’s Congress in December. Their removals also remain unexplained.

SCMP reported last year that Beijing had started a wide-ranging anti-corruption investigation focused on the leaders of the PLARF, a key element of the country’s nuclear arsenal. In December, the inquiries led to the dismissal of three senior Chinese aerospace-defence executives from China’s top advisory body, the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference, and a prominent Chinese rocket scientist was also expelled from the CPPCC in January.

The military has been one of the main targets of Xi’s far-reaching anti-corruption campaign. The decade-long effort has seen the downfall of top military leaders like Guo Boxiong and Xu Caihou, both former vice-chairmen of the CMC, in 2014 and 2015. The Political Work Conference is part of the Central Military Commission’s meeting series on important issues, as “political work is always the lifeline of the PLA”.

In 2014, Xi chaired an extended Political Work Conference of the CMC with delegates from the entire PLA in Gutian, Fujian province. The meeting echoed the 1929 meeting held in the same place by Mao Zedong, during which the Communist Party established the principle of “the party commands the gun”.

China’s leader Xi Jinping vows to step up crackdown on corruption in armed forces

20 June 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

Xi Jinping has waged an unrelenting crackdown on deep-seated corruption since coming to power a decade ago, a campaign critics say is a tool to purge political rivals.

China’s President Xi Jinping has vowed to boost his crackdown on corruption and enhance loyalty within the armed forces, state media reported Wednesday.

Xi has waged an unrelenting crackdown on deep-seated corruption since coming to power a decade ago, a campaign critics say is a tool to purge political rivals.

China’s former defence minister Li Shangfu was sacked abruptly last year in unexplained circumstances and replaced weeks later by the incumbent Dong Jun.

Xi addressed China’s top brass on Monday at a meeting of the Central Military Commission in the northwestern city of Yan’an, state broadcaster CCTV said.

He urged participants to “eradicate the soil and conditions in which corruption thrives (and) expand the depth and breadth of the anti-corruption struggle”, CCTV said.

Xi also called on the military to “strengthen the all-round supervision of senior cadres in exercising their duties and using their powers”.

The meeting took place as China and its regional neighbours have butted heads in recent months over territorial claims in the hotly disputed South China Sea.

China also held war games last month around Taiwan, the self-ruled island that it claims as part of its territory and has vowed to seize one day, by force if needed.

“The situation in the world, country, party and army are undergoing complex and profound changes,” Xi said, according to CCTV.

“We must unceasingly promote political army-building... and always dare to fight and win.”

Xi stresses PLA's political loyalty at crucial meeting held in old revolutionary base

19 June 2024, The State Council

Chinese President Xi Jinping emphasized the armed forces' political loyalty as a crucial meeting on the political work in the military was held in Yan'an, an old revolutionary base in northwest China's Shaanxi Province.

Xi, also general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), demanded efforts to ensure a solid political guarantee for building a strong military, as he addressed the CMC Political Work Conference, held from Monday to Wednesday.

The Yan'an conference, which Xi personally decided to convene, took place 10 years after a similar meeting was held in Gutian, east China's Fujian Province. The participants discussed and made arrangements for promoting political work in the People's Liberation Army (PLA).

Xi emphasized the need to uphold the Party's absolute leadership over the military and to build a high-quality cadre team that is loyal, clean, responsible, and capable of fulfilling the mission of strengthening the military.

On Monday afternoon, Xi led CMC members and heads of various departments and units to visit the revolutionary relics at Wangjiaping, where the CMC's headquarters were stationed from August 1937 to March 1947.

Xi visited the former residences of late revolutionary leaders including Mao Zedong, Zhou Enlai and Zhu De in Yan'an to honor the memory of their revolutionary struggle.

The Yan'an conference marks a return to the roots of the military, Xi said.

He called on senior military officers to shoulder the responsibilities entrusted by the Party and the people to keep strengthening the armed forces.

Xi delivered an important speech at the conference, noting that after the 18th CPC National Congress in 2012, the CPC Central Committee held the 2014 military political work conference in Gutian and improved political conduct through rectification initiatives.

Measures to govern the military with strict discipline have been comprehensively implemented with unprecedented determination and intensity, achieving historic accomplishments in enhancing political loyalty in the military, according to Xi.

Xi stressed that political work is always the lifeline of the country's military. The armed forces must always be led by those who are reliable and loyal to the Party, and there must be no place for corruption within the military.

Noting that China's military is confronted with complicated challenges in the political work, Xi said it is necessary to continuously enhance political loyalty in the military to ensure that the people's armed forces always uphold their core values, maintain purity, and strictly adhere to discipline.

He also analyzed the deep-seated problems that need to be addressed in military political work, emphasizing that a root cause of these problems lies in the lack of ideals and beliefs.

Xi called on relevant personnel at all levels, especially senior cadres, to introspect, engage in soul-searching reflections, and make earnest rectifications.

Xi highlighted key work to enhance political loyalty in the military, urging efforts to arm the military with the Party's new theories and improve the leadership of Party organizations, as well as their capabilities of organization and implementation.

The Party leadership must be upheld in all the fields and the whole process of enhancing combat readiness, Xi noted.

Xi urged efforts to nurture a contingent of high-caliber officers, eradicate the breeding ground for corruption, and enhance the comprehensive oversight of high-ranking officers in terms of their performance of duty and exercise of power.

Officers at all levels, especially those in the higher ranks, should lead by example and serve as pioneers and models, Xi said.

Chinese Communist Party warns members not to criticise policy ahead of major economic policy meeting

16 June 2024, SCMP, Sylvie Zhuang

The Chinese Communist Party's watchdog has issued a stern reminder to members not to criticise party policy ahead of a major party meeting that is likely to set the direction of economic policy for the next five years.

But analysts warned this effort to "unify thought", to use the party's own jargon, amid challenging economic conditions may further damage Beijing's credibility and erode business confidence if it is seen as "unreasonably trying to control the storyline".

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection published a special report via state news agency Xinhua on Wednesday that warned against "openly speaking ill of the party on major issues" as part of the watchdog's latest internal disciplinary drive.

The report said "public statements that contradict the decisions of the Central Committee are absolutely not allowed".

It added that public comments that "irresponsibly discuss" the party's main policies, "disrupt the thoughts" and undermine the unity of party members, warning that those who hinder policy execution must be "dealt with strictly".

Explaining its rationale, the report said the party leadership "fully listened" to different voices before it made a decision, and once it had decided all party members "must resolutely implement" that policy.

It also said there were internal party procedures that should be used to address any problems that may arise.

The disciplinary message came weeks ahead of the third plenum – a key meeting of the party’s Central Committee next month that will set the country’s economic strategy for the coming five years.

The event was moved back from its customary time slot in the latter months of last year, possibly to give the leadership more time to prepare in the face of growing economic headwinds.

The event is expected to be one of the defining moments for President Xi Jinping’s third five-year term as the party’s leader.

Its outcome is also likely to play a major role in determining whether the country can avoid the increasingly obvious middle-income trap – where rising costs and declining competitiveness prevent emerging economies reaching high-income status – and reach the party’s goal of becoming an innovation-driven developed economy.

The country is also facing multiple challenges on other fronts, including the property crisis, sluggish growth, tariffs from the United States and the European Union’s de-risking strategy.

In the run-up to the plenum senior leadership figures have been touring the country to solicit opinion on economic policy, including Xi himself, who held a rare meeting with business leaders in Shandong province and pledged to carry out further reforms.

“Now, as the third plenary session is about to be held, the central leadership undoubtedly wants to control the pace of the discussion,” said Dali Yang, a political scientist at the University of Chicago.

“The talk of reforms suggest that everyone is encouraged to speak out, but the ban on public criticism is a stark reminder that dissenting voices will face consequences,” he said.

Deng Yuwen, former deputy editor of Study Times, the Central Party School’s official newspaper, said the message being sent was “everyone should unify their thoughts before the Third Plenary Session and do not say anything that does not align with the central leadership’s main themes and spirit”.

He said: “Disciplinary moves of this kind are nominally confined to the party, but it is always the aim to regulate society as a whole.”

The rules against public criticisms were included in a major revamp of the party’s disciplinary code in 2015 that tightened its control over the membership.

The first person to fall foul of such a charge was Zhao Xinwei, the former editor-in-chief of Xinjiang Daily, the Communist Party mouthpiece in the far-western region.

He was expelled from the party in 2015 for a series of charges including openly opposing key policies aimed at combating terrorism and extremism.

Since then, more than 16 officials have been placed under investigation on suspicion of publicly speaking or going against major party policies, according to a report by the official newspaper Legal Daily in 2021. Such moves have heightened fears the party is further chipping away at differences of opinion in line with the wider trend of tightening access to information and data.

James Zimmerman, a partner in international law firm Perkins Coie and former chairman of the American Chamber of Commerce in China, said “any attempt to unreasonably and dishonestly control the storyline will only further erode Beijing’s credibility”. He said foreign businesses already had doubts about the credibility of China’s official data and information, and restrictions on policy discussions would further dampen investor and consumer confidence.

China has strongly hit out at questions about its future economic prospects, but last year when the country’s youth unemployment rate hit an all-time high, China’s national statistics agency simply stopped issuing the data. It said it needed to make adjustments and resumed publication six months later.

Nis Grunberg, a China analyst with the Berlin-based think tank Mercator Institute for China Studies, said the decreasing opportunities to speak out or gain access to opinion were not conducive to academic research or building business confidence.

“I don’t think obsessive streamlining of information and only making one single message available is good for business confidence or trust,” said Grunberg, adding that it is clear that Beijing wants everyone to speak with one voice.

He said the lack of transparency and trust in Chinese information also hinders academic research because it is hard to verify or test any assumptions.

“Now the third plenum is approaching and nobody knows what’s coming, really,” said Grunberg.

“So it’s very clear that everyone is supposed to stick to the official line and not to stir up some assumptions or even demands for [the reforms that are] coming.”

China’s Communist Party Members Revised Disciplinary Code Details “Hundred Sins”

14 June 2024, China Scope

The Chinese Communist Party’s (CCP’s) nearly 100 million members are studying a newly revised set of “Disciplinary Regulations.” The regulations contain over 100 provisions, leading Hong Kong media outlet Ming Pao to sarcastically comment that members who can avoid violating any of them are almost “saints” or “perfect people.”

According to the commentary in Ming Pao, the revised regulations list 158 disciplinary violations for party members. These include bans on religious beliefs, stock trading, and joining alumni or hometown associations without approval.

First introduced in 2003 and frequently revised since, the latest version of the CCP's "Disciplinary Regulations" took effect on January 1st, 2023 after the latest revisions were finalized in December 2022. Violations span six categories: political, organizational, integrity, mass relations, work, and life. On the political discipline front, publicly expressing "right-wing" views that "adhere to the position of bourgeois liberalization and oppose the Four Cardinal Principles," as well as "ultra-leftist" opposition to China's reform and opening up policies, are considered violations. Newly added are violations like "opportunistic networking" and "associating with 'political fraudsters.'"

"Political fraudsters" refer to those who claim high-level connections to officials, those who claim to have "special backgrounds" as experts/masters, and those who ingratiate themselves with local politicians to facilitate promotions or to resolve legal cases for personal gain.

The Ming Pao commentary noted that, while some violations like "failing to resolutely implement central policies" are clear, others like "pursuing sensual pleasures and vulgar interests" or "inaction, false action, and slow action" are more vague and hard to interpret.

China rolls out 'zero tolerance' crackdown on fake government officials, financial crimes

07 June 2024, SCMP, Sylie Zhuang

Beijing has launched a nationwide "zero tolerance" crackdown on people who pretend to be government officials to defraud investors by selling fake official seals – among other schemes.

In a meeting last week, the Ministry of Public Security called on agencies nationwide to target people who impersonated officials from government ministries or state-owned companies to dupe investors.

The rackets had "severely damaged the image of the Communist Party and the government and disrupted social and economic order", according to a statement posted to the ministry's website on Thursday.

In an effort to maintain a "good business environment", the ministry said, law enforcement agencies should leverage mechanisms like big data to uncover illegal fundraising, contract fraud, and illegal deposits.

The crackdown was announced after state media published several reports about individuals or groups that have scammed investors and the public by leveraging the credibility of state institutions.

According to a November report by state news agency Xinhua, more than 20 central ministries and agencies, including the ministries of finance, agriculture and rural affairs, and science and technology, as well as state-owned enterprises, had issued "fraud prevention statements" warning the public to be aware of impostors.

In one case from a court in the city of Dezhou in the eastern province of Shandong, a gang had defrauded 286 victims of almost 29 million yuan (US$4 million) by claiming to have "government backing", according to the Xinhua report.

In another case from May 2023, fraudsters who pretended to be a working-group affiliated with the National Development and Reform Commission (NDRC), the country's top national economic planner, told local government officials that could obtain subsidies of up to 10 billion yuan, according to a report in March by state broadcaster CCTV.

The scam forced the NDRC to issue a statement on its official WeChat account saying that it had no such working group and there were no such government subsidies.

Chinese authorities have also been battling frauds in which scammers use artificial intelligence to commit financial crimes with increasingly sophisticated technology.

The frequent media presence of some high-profile government officials had offered scammers abundant content to create realistic simulations for scams using facial and voice recognition, CCTV reported.

Earlier this year, Beijing vowed to ramp up a crackdown on financial crimes and pledged to improve monitoring of transactions to reduce risks.

Xi Jinping using relatives to conceal $707.2mn wealth, says report

10 June 2024, WION, Heena Sharma

Chinese President Xi Jinping and other senior Chinese leaders have engaged in corruption and concealed vast amounts of wealth, using their relatives to obscure their activities, according to a US government report.

The report by the Congressional Research Service (CRS), a public policy research institute of the United States Congress also highlighted the challenges in obtaining public information regarding the wealth and corruption of high-ranking Communist Party officials.

According to the report, Xi had accrued a staggering $376 million in company investments by 2012.

This is in addition to an indirect 18 per cent stake in a rare-earth mineral company valued over $311 million as well as holdings totaling $20.2 million in a technology company.

The report underscored the lack of transparency within the Communist Party of China (CPC), as officials are not mandated to disclose their assets publicly.

Control of media is also mentioned in the report, saying that Chinese authorities want to ensure that any reporting on corruption is swiftly suppressed.

Notably, American intelligence agencies are also preparing a report that's likely to uncover major corruption and undisclosed riches among Chinese Communist Party figures, including Xi Jinping.

CRS report is prepared for members of the US Congress ahead of this US intel report.

The CRS report indicated that there was an expulsion of 266 members of the CPC Central Committee, including prominent figures like former Defence Minister Li Shangfu and former Foreign Minister Qin Gang.

Four types of corruption

The report identified four types of corruption prevalent in China, with "access money" being the most prominent.

This form of corruption involves bribes from capitalists to powerful party officials in exchange for various privileges, as per reports. The other forms of corruption include speed money, grand theft and petty theft.

Several high-profile corruption cases involving Chinese leaders and their relatives have been uncovered by investigations, including those of President Xi's family members and former Premier Wen Jiabao's relatives.

Most of the Xi's $707.2 million wealth were owned by his eldest sister Qi Qiaoqiao and her husband Deng Jiagui and the couple's daughter Zhang Yunnan.

In China, regional security officials have been told to make regime stability a priority

10 June 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Regional officials have been told to safeguard national security and regime stability in meetings held across China ahead of the ruling Communist Party's third plenum in July.

It comes after President Xi Jinping put the focus on regime stability when the National Security Commission met in May last year.

It is rare for such meetings to be made public at any level, and it is not known how often the national body meets during its five-year term.

According to official readouts, at least four provincial and municipal committees of the National Security Commission held meetings in May and early June. The readouts were brief and made no mention of specific events or targets.

At a meeting in the southeastern province of Anhui on June 3, party chief Han Jun emphasised Xi's "holistic approach to national security" and told officials to give priority to "political security" – meaning regime stability.

Prioritising political security and Xi's "holistic approach" were also the main messages at national security meetings held in May in Shanghai in the east, as well as in Chongqing and Yunnan province, both in the southwest, according to official media reports.

Xi first made mention of the "holistic approach" during a speech at the inaugural meeting of the National Security Commission a decade ago. Xi leads the commission, which was set up under the Central Committee in November 2013 as part of a major overhaul of the party's institutions to strengthen its control over security.

In his speech, Xi said political security was the foundation of the holistic approach to national security, and he also stressed the need for economic, military, cultural and social security.

Addressing the national body in May last year, Xi told officials to be ready for "worst-case and most extreme scenarios" so that they could withstand "high winds and waves and even perilous storms". He said China was facing national security issues that were "considerably more complex and much more difficult" to deal with than before.

Party secretaries – who also head the provincial and municipal committees of the National Security Commission – laid out their approaches to improve security at the recent meetings.

Chongqing party chief Yuan Jiajun stressed the need to "guard against and crack down on the infiltration, sabotage, subversion and secession activities of hostile forces, resolutely fight the ideological struggle, and crack down on violent terrorist activities harshly" during a meeting on May 31, according to the official readout.

He told officials to do their "utmost to ensure economic and financial security", especially to prevent and deal with the hidden debts of local governments and state-owned enterprises.

In Yunnan the previous day, party boss Wang Ning stressed the province's role in safeguarding China's southwest, including by cracking down on cross-border crimes such as telecoms scams, illegal immigration and smuggling. Yunnan shares borders with Vietnam, Myanmar and Laos.

At a meeting on May 15, Shanghai's party chief Chen Jining said the city should build "a solid foundation for economic security and effectively safeguard cultural security", according to party mouthpiece Jiefang Daily. Chen also called for people's safety to be maintained, and for there to be "virtuous interaction" between high-quality development and high-level security.

A political scientist at Nanjing University said the security push needs to be balanced with development since the economy is facing more headwinds than it was 10 years ago when Xi first introduced the “holistic” concept.

“Security is certainly very important for the party’s regime stability, but by overdoing it, it seems to be eating into China’s economic growth and affecting employment, people’s lives and government revenue,” said the political scientist, who declined to be named as he is not authorised to speak to the media.

“So if they are true believers in the ‘holistic’ security approach they should take another look at how to balance it, because too much emphasis on security is creating other social risks.”

Key report helps to reveal the wealth and corruption of the CCP

09 June 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Paul Berkowitz and Bradley A. Thayer

WASHINGTON DC: By revealing the corrupt nature of CCP, the CRS report helps the world to grasp the fundamental nature of CCP.

An important Congressional Research Service (CRS) report was released in Washington at the end of May. The report studied the publicly available information on the wealth and corruption of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). This includes the General Secretary of the CCP, Xi Jinping, and senior leadership officials of the Central Committee, the Politburo, the Politburo Standing Committee, the regional Party Secretaries, as well as the leaders of the five autonomous regions, and four municipalities that report directly to the central government. This was mandated by members of the U.S. House and Senate and also tasked the U.S. intelligence community with producing a similar, publicly available study. The report was precipitated by the fact that the CCP leadership and their families are as wealthy as Croesus while shamelessly espousing socialist rhetoric. Precisely how did selfless CCP leadership gain this wealth on their nominal salaries is curious and it is certain that the Chinese people will wish to know.

The CRS report is of paramount importance for four reasons. First, it reveals for global audiences the corrupt nature of the CCP and to identify pathways for investigative journalism, documentation on social media, and how states within the Quad may wish to employ their resources, including their intelligence communities, to document these facts. There is a rich menu of topic for journalists to explore and for other media, perhaps most importantly social media, to highlight the CCP’s wealth and corruption, and so publicize and thus inform global populations.

Second, the report reviews some of what is openly known about senior CCP officials like Xi Jinping and his family, former CCP officials like Wen Jiabao, and tycoons like Wang Jianlin. It also documents the difficulties some journalists have experienced in their investigations. Those difficulties have come from the People’s Republic of China’s (PRC) government. For example, when the Wall Street Journal reported on the activities of Xi’s material cousin, Ming Chai, one of the article’s co-authors, Chun Han Wong, did not have his press credentials renewed, which effectively expelled him from the country. But there is another more odious form employed to discourage investigation into the wealth of the CCP leadership. The example of Michael Forsythe, who was leading a Bloomberg News investigation into Xi’s wealth. After publishing an exposé, Forsythe and his family received death threats, and Bloomberg’s site was blocked within the PRC, and Bloomberg declined to publish a subsequent investigation into Wang Jianlin, a well-connected head of a major real estate and entertainment concern. The PRC’s direct and indirect pressure against media is tangible however intrepid journalists may be. It underscores the need of alternatives to find the information, including the Chinese diaspora and by individual nation states to employ their resources.

Third, by revealing the corrupt nature of the CCP, the CRS report helps the world to grasp the fundamental nature of the CCP. While the CCP rules China, it is not its legitimate government. Their grotesque wealth and corruption are a symptom of their illegitimacy. They are not the rightful rulers of the Chinese people but gangsters, thugs and goons who came to power due to the Communist International and ultimately as a result of Soviet dictator Josef Stalin’s support in the wake of the defeat of Japan. They are the poisoned fruit of the Bolshevik Revolution who seek to sustain the tyranny of the failed ideology of Marxism-Leninism on the Chinese people. They only held onto power after the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre because of the world’s industrial states’ reluctance to ostracize Beijing as long as it could provide rock bottom cheap and slave labour.

Fourth, the CRS report is the beginning of a path and framework for creating the most effective tool of political warfare that members of the Quad and other concerned nations possess. Illuminating the corruption and obscene wealth of the CCP leadership means that the CCP’s legitimization crisis is close at hand for the Chinese people to act upon and for nations to factor in when calculating risk in bilateral relations. As a result of its gross human rights abuses, hyperaggression directed at East Turkestan, India, the Philippines, Taiwan, and Tibet, the CCP is beyond the bounds of acceptable behaviour in international society. It is hoped that armed with detailed facts about the enormous wealth of individual leaders of the CCP, the Chinese people will turn China into a respected democracy like Taiwan.

Having made a contribution, the question becomes what will the global public do with such information. The Quad members, acting either as individual states or as a unified group, can lead the community of nations to identify the sources and location of the wealth of the CCP. It is a certainty that investigations will reveal that the CCP's leaders are billionaires with untold wealth in New York, Switzerland, Dubai, London, Paris, and other locations. While that has been long suspected, the revelation of the facts will be a critical component for the Chinese people to free themselves from this base and evil regime.

The CRS report, and related ones, are important steps in delegitimizing the CCP to remove this aggressive cancer from continuing to harm the health of China and the body of global humanity. Working together, the international community should labour towards a complete accounting of how many billions Xi, his family, and Party comrades have in overseas banks

इस शब्द का अर्थ जानिये

, properties, and other assets. Thereby, the true, corrupt nature of the CCP leadership, with specific amounts and locations documented, will permit the victims of the CCP, domestic and international, to move to seize those assets. That window into the sordid behaviour of the CCP will permit the Chinese people and the world to demand accountability while also energizing the necessary response from people of goodwill around the world.

Paul Berkowitz is a former House Foreign Affairs Committee staffer. He covered Asia and the Pacific for Chairman Benjamin A. Gilman who was honoured with the Padma Vibhushan Award for Public Affairs in 2001. Bradley A. Thayer is the coauthor with James Fanell of "Embracing Communist China: America's Greatest Strategic Failure".

China's political advisors meet on high-level socialist market economy

04 June 2024, Xinhua

The seventh meeting of the Standing Committee of the 14th National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), China's top political advisory body, opened in Beijing on Tuesday, focusing on building a high-level socialist market economy system.

Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the CPPCC National Committee, presided over the opening meeting.

Ding Xuexiang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and vice premier, was invited to attend the meeting and delivered a report.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Wang called on the national political advisors to carry out in-depth consultations and put forward suggestions on building a high-level socialist market economy system, and contribute wisdom and strength to advancing the great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation on all fronts through Chinese modernization.

In delivering a report, Ding stressed efforts to encourage state-owned capital and state-owned enterprises to grow stronger, better and bigger, and provide a sound environment and more opportunities for the non-public sector.

It is important to speed up the development of a unified national market, improve fundamental market economic systems such as property-rights protection, market access, fair competition and social credit, and build a high-standard market system, he said.

He called for giving full play to the strategic guidance of national development plans and strengthening coordination between fiscal and monetary policies, so as to promote sustained and sound economic development.

"We will take more initiative to align with high-standard international economic and trade rules, steadily expand institutional opening-up, and foster new advantages in global economic cooperation and competition," he said.

The political advisors listened to reports on a number of topics, including the transformation and upgrading of traditional manufacturing industries, the construction of water conservancy infrastructure for better production capacity in agriculture, and green and low-carbon transformation of industries.

The meeting will last for two and a half days. The political advisors will conduct group discussions on seven topics.

May

Statement From the Tiananmen Mothers on the 35th Anniversary of the 1989 Tiananmen Massacre

30 May 2024, Human Rights in China

Human Rights in China has translated the following statement by the Tiananmen Mothers, a group of survivors and families of the victims of the Tiananmen Massacre, in honor and remembrance on the 35th Anniversary.

Today, we, the families and relatives of the June Fourth victims, are gathered in Beijing to commemorate the 35th anniversary of the Tiananmen Massacre. As we gaze upon the photos of our loved ones, our hearts are filled with a mix of grief and anger, and the pain arises suddenly.

We will never forget that day on June Fourth, 35 years ago, when your vibrant lives were struck by bullets, crushed by tanks, and snuffed out! The missing people whose remains could not even be found, and whose family members could not wipe the blood from your bodies and bid you a final farewell. These events happened in peacetime, on Chang'an Avenue in Beijing, the capital of China. It was too cruel! The injustices were too many to name! For the past 35 years, we have never been able to forget the sight of you leaving home, and the gunshots in the night sky of Beijing which made us worry that something happened to you when you did not return home on time. We anxiously searched day after day, asking about you at major hospitals and all levels of government offices, tirelessly striving to find you and bring you home. When we finally heard the bad news, our anxious tension completely collapsed. We were heartbroken, devastated. Every family then seemed to live in darkness without light, and some could only shed endless tears.

Some of the wounded that Beijing citizens brought to the hospitals were hovering on the line between life and death. The doctors saved lives in one operation after another, hoping that there would be a miracle. Your family and loved ones were by your side day and night, praying that you could have a chance to reunite with your parents, wives and children, and that there would be the same harmony and warmth in your families as before. However, the Chinese authorities issued inhumane and indifferent orders mandating that the injured were not to be rescued, that blood transfusions were not to be given, martial law forces were to investigate the injured in major hospitals, and so on, so the hospitals had no choice but to conceal your injuries as other diseases. What's more, when those young lives were struck by bullets and fell to the ground, some citizens desperately tried to rescue them, but the soldiers did not allow citizens to even come close, and even stabbed the injured again with their bayonets several times.

The Geneva Convention of the International Red Cross clearly states: "Both sides of a conflict should observe humanitarian principles regarding prisoners of war, ensure the neutrality of the wounded, and in the event of war, they should make every effort to rescue the wounded regardless of nationality, ethnicity, and religious belief, and reduce deaths."<sup>1</sup> China is a signatory to this convention. The 1989 June Fourth Massacre, which occurred in peacetime, was a result of the Chinese military shooting at students and citizens who were petitioning for peace, and no rescue of the resulting casualties was allowed. This was antithetical to the laws of nature and humanity! Every human being on this Earth has the right to life and human dignity, and no ruler or leader has the right to arbitrarily deprive others of their lives.

Some students came from other provinces, full of youthful optimism. Carrying the expectations of their parents and fellow villagers, they came to the capital Beijing alone for their studies. The students of the '80s were the most idealistic and ambitious group of young people after the college entrance examinations were reinstated, and they would have become the pillars of the country. Instead, with the sound of a gunshot, their young lives were forever frozen on Shili Chang'an Street, and their blood stained the streets. Thirty-five years have passed, and the marks of that year have been erased by merciless time, but the traces of their blood and souls forever remain in the hearts of the witnesses, and in the hearts of their parents and loved ones. A mother from one of those faraway provinces once said: "My child went to Beijing to study, I never thought that my child wouldn't finish school, but would lose their life instead!" How heartbroken she was, and how helpless she must have felt against the government for her to say that.

As we stand here today, looking at the pictures of our loved ones, we feel incomparably sad. We can't help but ask China's ruling party and the Chinese government: Do society's problems have to be resolved by taking the lives of others?! Behind every life is their family, their parents, their siblings, their wives, and their children. For the families, the sudden loss of a loved one overnight is like the sky has fallen, and we are unable to accept the cruel truth. As a group of family members and relatives of the victims, we have the right to know the truth about the June Fourth Massacre, how many people were killed, how many people were injured, and how many people were implicated in this massacre that shocked China and the rest of the world. It is the responsibility of the government to give an explanation to society about this tragic incident that is in line with the facts, to publish the names of those who died, to make a public apology in the government's name, and to return fairness and justice to us.

Thirty-five years have passed, and the authorities remain silent. All that can be seen on the Internet is A Concise History of the Communist Party of China, which says that a tragic incident was caused by the student movement in 1989. We cannot accept or tolerate such statements that ignore the facts. In the student movement triggered by Hu Yaobang's death, the slogans put forward by the students were anti-official and anti-corruption, demanding the disclosure of officials' personal assets and the people's right to know the truth. These demands solicited extensive responses and support from people from all walks of life. The people had good intentions; they wanted to express the people's wishes to the government in this way, hoping that the government would listen to the people's demands, and bring about a vision of a clean and honest government. Isn't the current government also fighting corruption and discussing the proposal of "officials disclosing their assets" at the National People's Congress?

Thirty-five years have passed, and we ask the Chinese ruling party and the Chinese government again: Where were the counter-revolutionary riots that took place during the June Fourth Massacre, who were the counter-revolutionary rioters, and which key departments of the party and government leaders were hit on the day of the June Fourth Massacre? What was the behind the scenes information? What were the rumors being spread? After the army cleared Tiananmen Square, the government spokesman said in public that no shots were fired in Tiananmen Square and no one was killed. Since no shots were fired and no one died, how could the counter-revolutionary riots in Tiananmen Square come from that instigated by the counter-revolutionaries? Why did the "Concise History" mention Tiananmen Square without mentioning the students? Why did the "Concise History" not mention what the decisive measures were? Not mention the army's indiscriminate killing of innocent people, which filled the hundreds of thousands of people on Chang'an Avenue that day with fear? Only when history is factual can future generations in China reflect on it and learn from it.

Since June Fourth, the government has ignored the legitimate demands of the family members and relatives of the innocent victims of the Tiananmen Massacre and has continued to interfere with the daily lives of the remaining family members and relatives in various ways. The government's propaganda emphasizes that the principles and policies of governing the country must be implemented according to the law and must put people's interests first. However, the demands of the family members and relatives of the June Fourth victims have been ignored, completely deviating from the ruling philosophy of upholding the supremacy of the people and the supremacy of life.

Over the past 35 years, we have repeatedly appealed to our national leaders, hoping to have a sincere dialogue with the government on the following matters related to the June Fourth Massacre:

(1) Publish the list and number of the deceased persons in the incident;

(2) Provide appropriate compensation to the victims of June Fourth and victims' families in accordance with the law;

(3) Investigate those responsible for the incident in accordance with legal procedures.

These are also the three demands of truth, reparations, and accountability that our group has always adhered to.

On the occasion of the 35th anniversary of the June Fourth Massacre, we once again sincerely appeal to President Xi Jinping and the government to engage in dialogue with us on these issues. The June Fourth Massacre is a historic and tragic event that the Chinese government must face and needs to explain to the people. It cannot be ignored, and there are members of government from that time who should bear legal responsibility for indiscriminately killing innocent people. For 35 years, we have suffered the loss of our loved ones. Many parents who lost their children have already passed away, carrying with them endless regrets. If the government sincerely addresses this tragedy, it would be the greatest consolation to the parents who are still alive.

This year, another victim and another bereaved family member in our group passed away due to illness. One is the disabled Mr. Qi Zhiyong, who died on January 2 at the age of 68. He was injured in the Liubukou area of Xidan. He had a high-limb amputation on his left leg, contracted Hepatitis C from a blood transfusion, and had suffered for 35 years. He once had a happy home, but the June Fourth Massacre completely changed his life. Another victim, Mr. Jia Fuquan, died at the age of 80 on March 7 due to a new coronavirus infection. On the morning of June 4, 1989, his wife, Mu Guilian, an employee of the No. 3 Jingmian Factory, went out to buy breakfast for her family when she was shot by a military vehicle at the Chaoyangmen overpass. She died on the spot.

We take this opportunity to mourn the both of them. May their souls rest in peace! We will continue to hold on to your last wishes until the day of justice arrives!

Signed:

You Weijie, Guo Liying, Zhang Yanqiu, Wu Lihong, Zhu Zhidi, Ye Xiangrong, Ding Zilin, Zhang Xianling, Zhou Shuzhuang, Qian Putai, Wu Dingfu, Song Xiuling, Sun Chengkang, Yu Qing, Sun Ning, Huang Jinping, Meng Shuying, Yuan Shumin, Liu Meihua, Xie Jinghua, Ma Xueqin, Kuang Ruirong, Yang Darong, He Tianfeng, Liu Xiuchen, Shen Guifang, Xie Jingrong, Yao Furong, Meng Shuzhen, Shao Qiufeng, Tan Hanfeng, Wang Wenhua, Chen Mei, Zhou Yan, Li Guiying, Xu Baoyan, Di Mengqi, Wang Lian, Guan Weidong, Liu Shuqin, Sun Shanping, Liu Tianyuan, Huang Dingying, Xiong Hui, Zhang Caifeng, He Ruitian, Tian Weiyan, Yang Zhiyu, Li Xianyuan, Wang Yuqin, Fang Zheng, He Xingcai, Liu Ren'an, Qi Guoxiang, Han Guogang, Pang Meiqing, Huang Ning, Wang Bodong, Zhang Zhiqiang, Zhao Jinsuo, Kong Weizhen, Liu Baodong, Qi Zhiying, Fang Guizhen, Lei Yong, Ge Guirong, Zheng Xiucun, Gui Delan, Wang Yunqi, Huang Xuefen, Guo Daxian, Wang Lin, Zhu Jingrong, Mu Huailan, Wang Zhengqiang, Ning Shuping, Cao Yunlan, Feng Shulan, Fu Yuanyuan, Li Chunshan Jiang Yanqin, He Fengting, Xi Yongshun, Xiao Zongyou, Qiao Xiulan, Lu Yanjing, Li Haoquan, Lai Yundi, Zhou Xiaojiao, Zhou Yunjiao, Chen Yongbang, Liu Yongliang, Zhang Jingli, Sun Haiwen, Wang Hai, Lu Sanbao, Yao Yueying, Ren Gailian, Ni Shishu, Yang Yunlong, Cui Linsen, Wu Weidong, Wang Deyi, Shi Jing, Yuan Ren, Bao Limei, Xi Guijun, Zhong Junhua, Ya Aiqiang, Chen Weidong, Hao Jian, Zhang Suying, Lin Li, Duan Changqi (114 people in total)

At the suggestion of fellow sufferers, we have decided to append the list of deceased signatories from previous years to honor their final wishes:

Wu Xuehan, Su Bingxian, Yao Ruisheng, Yang Shiyu, Yuan Changlu, Zhou Shuzhen, Wang Guoxian, Bao Yutian, Lin Jingpei, Kou Yusheng, Meng Jinxiu, Zhang Junsheng, Wu Shouqin, Zhou Zhigang, Sun Xiuzhi, Luo Rang, Yan Guanghan, Li Zhenying, Kuang Diqing, Duan Hongbing, Liu Chunlin, Zhang Yaozu, Li Shujuan, Yang Yinshan, Wang Peijing, Yuan Kezhi, Pan Muzhi, Xiao Changyi, Ya Weilin, Liu Jianlan, Suo Xiunu, Yang Ziming, Cheng Shuzhen, Du Dongxu, Zhang Guirong, Zhao Tingjie, Lu Masheng, Jiang Peikun, Ren Jinbao, Zhang Shuyun, Han Shuxiang, Shi Feng, Wang Guirong, Sui Lisong, Tian Shuling, Sun Shufang, Chen Yongchao, Sun Hengyao, Xu Jue, Wang Fandi Li Xuewen, Wang Shuanglan, Zhang Zhenxia, Xiao Shulan, Tan Shuqin, Gao Jie, Jin Yaxi, Xing Chengli, Zhou Guolin, Hao Yichuan, Lu Yubao, Cao Changxian, Yin Min, Liu Qian, Lin Wuyun, Jin Zhenyu, Feng Youxiang, Wang Huirong, Zhu Yuxian, Zhang Shusen, Wang Guangming, Qi Zhiyong, Jia Fuquan (73 people in total)

Former China politics lecturer slams curbs on university research

27 May 2024, RFA, Song Danyang and Qian Lang for RFA Mandarin

Since he published an open letter criticizing "Cultural Revolution-style" ideological controls of China's higher education system, former Tsinghua University politics lecturer Wu Qiang has found it a little harder to move around Beijing.

Wu, whose former school is the fictional location for the gruesome Cultural Revolution political 'struggle session' scene that opens Liu Cixin's popular science fiction trilogy The Three-Body Problem, told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview that he is now regarded as a "sensitive person" by the country's state security police, which means restrictions on his day-to-day activities.

Former Tsinghua University lecturer Wu Qiang is photographed at his apartment in Beijing in June 2021. (Leo Ramirez/AFP)

"The Beijing police stop me from entering the embassy district because I have a lot of contact with foreign journalists and diplomats," Wu said. "I get identified through facial recognition technology, then my ID card gets checked at the next intersection, and I'm told to leave."

"Ten minutes after that, I may get a call from state security police telling me not to remain in the area," he said.

Wu studies mass protests and demonstrations, a highly sensitive topic termed "mass incidents" by the increasingly security-obsessed ruling Chinese Communist Party.

He was suspended from his lectureship at Tsinghua University in 2015 for researching the 2014 Occupy Central pro-democracy movement in Hong Kong, as well as protests and land-related campaigns in the rebel Guangdong villages of Taishi and Wukan.

Since the Chinese Communist Party enshrined Xi Jinping's personal brand of ideology – Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics in the New Era – into the party charter in 2017, colleges and universities have scrambled to launch research programs and institutes to study "Xi Jinping Thought."

Stepped up surveillance

In January, RFA reported that the ruling party was taking more direct control over colleges and universities, with the ongoing mergers of university-level Communist Party committees with university presidents' offices, something that didn't even happen during the political turmoil of the 1966-1976 Cultural Revolution.

It is also using technology to step up surveillance and monitoring of anyone deemed a potential threat to state security, including Wu Qiang.

Just a decade ago, it usually took the authorities at least a few days to put an end to Wu's research activities, Wu told RFA.

"Now it takes them just 10 minutes," he said. "Even normal communication with foreigners has become dangerous, even though I have no access to any secrets – the system is highly sensitive."

The increased restrictions came after Wu penned an open letter in March to newly appointed Tsinghua University President Li Luming calling on him to drop a lawsuit against him which the school is pursuing despite its having been rejected by a Beijing court in 2021.

Wu, who was placed under house arrest around the same time, also took the opportunity to note that many former politics lecturers and professors at top schools in Beijing, Shanghai and across China have fled overseas to escape the political repercussions of doing their jobs.

Intimidation

A friend of Wu's who asked to remain anonymous for fear of reprisals said he believes the lawsuit against Wu is a form of intimidation.

"I believe that the plaintiff is trying to make an example of Wu Qiang by repeatedly suing him, so as to tame other Tsinghua lecturers," the friend said.

A former colleague who gave only the surname Hu for fear of reprisals said the authorities have targeted Wu entirely due to his academic interests.

"Tsinghua University blacklisted Wu Qiang in the spring of 2020, and continues to do so to this day," Hu told RFA Mandarin. "They have banned him from living on campus, and they are demanding so-called liquidated damages of more than 1 million yuan."

"A court has already ruled that the school has no jurisdiction, but Tsinghua University just keeps filing these trumped-up lawsuits, which means that this is a form of persecution," he said.

The school has also targeted Wu's colleagues, including the outspoken sociology professor Guo Yuhua, who was last year stopped by border guards while trying to leave China, and former law professor Xu Zhangrun, who was fired from his post in July 2020 after he called online for political reforms.

'Truth has been ripped to pieces'

Wu has continued with his research despite being banned from lecturing, but is finding it more and more difficult to make headway, something he blames on an overriding obsession with the political security of the regime under Xi Jinping.

"There is no regular field research happening any more," Wu said. "Everything is performance-based from top to bottom."

"Just as communities were locked down during the three years of zero-COVID, China has been shut off from the rest of the world, and the truth has been ripped to pieces," he said. "Isolation is what is happening to China, and it's also what's happening to me."

Wu started studying social movements for his PhD in political science at Germany's University of Duisburg-

Essen, and was able to continue fieldwork for a few years on his return to China, although the authorities began obstructing his work as early as 2003 in various ways.

"It became increasingly difficult to obtain that kind of material [first hand]," he said. "I was followed by police while carrying out fieldwork and had them carry out checks on me in the middle of the night at my hotel."

"I even got expelled from one city," said Wu, who studies popular protest and resistance to the government, including spontaneous mass demonstrations and long-running attempts to redress grievances through official channels by petitioners.

Xia Ming, a professor of political science at New York's City University, confirmed Wu's account.

"Major universities in China are all infiltrated and tightly controlled by the state security police, the regular police, the political security police ... and so on," Xia said.

He described Wu as a rare and professional scholar capable of facilitating communication between China and the rest of the world.

Yet that's precisely what makes him a target.

"What Tsinghua has done to Wu Qiang is an indicator for the tightening of controls over colleges and universities in China generally," said Xia, who has previously worked at Fudan University in Shanghai. "Influential universities in China are always subject to selective control by the Chinese Communist Party."

"Very active and influential academics with international academic connections are monitored, warned, and eventually heavily persecuted," he said. Translated by Luisetta Mudie. Edited by Malcolm Foster.

China's political advisors discuss fortifying strong sense of community for Chinese nation

25 May 2024, People's Daily Online

BEIJING, May 24 (Xinhua) -- The National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), China's top political advisory body, on Friday held a fortnightly consultation session to discuss forging a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation.

Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the CPPCC National Committee, presided over the session.

To foster a strong sense of community and a shared sense of belonging for the Chinese nation, it is imperative to follow the guidance of the core socialist values and promote interactions, exchanges and integration among all ethnic groups, Wang said.

Calling for increased research and proposals in this regard, Wang urged political advisors to contribute their insights toward building China's independent systems of historical records, discourse, and theory for the community of the Chinese nation.

Ten political advisors and experts voiced their opinions at the meeting. Highlighting the role of civilization, culture, and language, they called for constant efforts to nurture a shared sense of belonging for the Chinese nation.

They also proposed efforts to forge a strong cultural identity and promote high-quality development of ethnic minority areas, among others.

China's latest AI chatbot is trained on President Xi Jinping's political ideology

24 May 2024, ABC News

China's latest artificial intelligence chatbot is trained on President Xi Jinping's doctrine, in a stark reminder of the ideological parameters that Chinese AI models should abide by.

China's cyberspace academy earlier this week announced the chatbot trained on Xi Jinping Thought, a doctrine which promotes "socialism with Chinese characteristics."

The chatbot was trained on seven databases, six of which were mostly related to information technologies provided by China's internet watchdog, the Cyberspace Administration of China, or CAC.

Xi Jinping Thought was the seventh database that the chatbot was trained on, according to a WeChat messaging service post by CAC's magazine about the AI model.

The Xi-trained large language model is the latest effort by authorities to spread the Chinese leader's ideology and ideas. Students have had to take classes on Xi Jinping Thought in schools, and an app called Study Xi Strong Nation was also rolled out in 2019 to allow users to learn and take quizzes about his ideologies.

Xi Jinping Thought — also known as "Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era" — is made up of 14 principles, including ensuring the absolute power of the Chinese Communist Party, strengthening national security and socialist values, as well as improving people's livelihoods and well-being.

The chatbot was created primarily to demonstrate the development and practical applications in cybersecurity and IT research, according to the China Institute of Cybersecurity Affairs, which had launched the AI model for internal use.

The AI model would be able to generate report outlines on topics like AI development and productivity, according to the CAC magazine's WeChat post.

"Users can choose different categories of knowledge bases for intelligent question and answer. The professionalism and authority of the corpus ensure the professionalism of the generated content," the post said.

The AI model will also be able to create reports, summarize information and provide translations in Chinese or English for users who have access to it.

However, it's not clear if the Xi-trained chatbot will be meant for public use.

The unveiling of the chatbot comes as the U.S. and China are locked in a race for AI supremacy.

Though San Francisco-based OpenAI's generative AI model ChatGPT has been widely credited as one of the most important developments in the field, China too has ambitions to become the global leader in AI by 2030.

China's access to a population of 1.4 billion also allows the country to amass troves of data to train systems for facial recognition and autonomous driving.

Technology firms such as Alibaba and Baidu have already rolled out primarily Chinese-language AI models similar to ChatGPT for public and commercial use.

However, these AI models tend to be more restricted as they have to abide by China's strict censorship rules. This means that Chinese AI models will often not answer any politically sensitive questions posed to them.

"Educate the Masses to Change Their Minds"

21 May 2024, Human Rights Watch

Since 2016, the Chinese government has dramatically accelerated the relocation of rural villagers and herders in Tibet. The government says that these relocations—often to areas hundreds of kilometers away—are voluntary and that they will "improve people's livelihood" and "protect the ecological environment."

This report, drawing on over 1,000 official Chinese media articles between 2016 and 2023 as well as government publications and academic field studies, shows that China's own media reports in many cases contradict the claims that all those relocated gave their consent.

The news articles instead indicate that participation in "whole-village relocation" programs in Tibet is in effect compulsory. The articles describe high levels of reluctance to relocate among many Tibetans from those villages. In one case, 200 households out of 262 in the village did not initially want to relocate to a new location which was nearly 1,000 kilometers away. In another village scheduled for relocation, all the residents except for a Chinese Communist Party activist initially disagreed with the plan to move the village. In all cases, the reports say these villagers eventually gave their consent to move. Human Rights Watch has not found any case where a village or any of its members scheduled for relocation has been able to avoid being moved.

The official press reports indicate the extreme forms of persuasion—that is, coercion—used by officials to pressure villagers and nomadic people or nomads to agree to whole-village relocation. These methods include repeated home visits; denigrating the intellectual capacity of the villagers to make decisions for themselves; implicit threats of punishment; banning of criticism; and threats of disciplinary action against local officials who fail to meet targets. In some cases, officials of increasing seniority visited families at their homes to gain their “consent,” visits that sometimes were repeated over several years. Some official press reports and videos obtained by Human Rights Watch show officials telling residents that essential services would be cut to their current homes if they did not move. Others showed authorities openly threatening villagers who voiced disagreements about the relocations, accusing them of “spreading rumors” and ordering officials to crack down on such actions “swiftly and resolutely”—implying administrative and criminal penalties. This report includes three case studies that show in detail the timelines, objectives, arguments, and methods used to obtain the “consent” of residents of entire villages to relocate.

These coercive tactics can be traced to pressure placed on local officials by higher-level authorities who routinely characterize the relocation program as a non-negotiable, politically critical policy coming straight from the national capital, Beijing, or from Lhasa, the regional capital. This leaves local officials no flexibility in implementation at the local level and requires them to obtain 100 percent agreement from affected villagers to relocate.

In addition to whole-village relocations, there is also a second form of relocation in Tibet—that of individual households. This form of relocation typically involves officials selecting poorer households for relocation in areas presented as more suitable for income generation. While participants can decline to take part, Human Rights Watch found in many cases that officials provided families misleading information about the economic benefits of relocation to gain their consent. From previous projects, it should be evident to the officials that many rural people relocated would be unable to find sustainable work in their new environment.

Even surveys carried out by official scholars at relocation sites in Tibet—which tend not to criticize the government—variously concluded that many of those relocated “cannot find suitable jobs to support their families,” and “satisfaction with relocation is low.” A 2014 review of an earlier relocation program in eastern Tibet found that even after 10 years, 69 percent of relocatees were still facing financial difficulties and 49 percent wished that they could move back to their original homes on the grasslands. False expectations created by officials who knowingly provide rural Tibetans misleading or false information about the economic benefit of relocation likely contributes to the dissatisfaction.

In both whole-village and individual-household relocations, Chinese law requires those who have been relocated to demolish their former homes to deter them from returning. Our research found that officials in Tibet are often enforcing this requirement. Official statistics suggest that between 2000 and 2025, the Chinese authorities will have relocated over 930,000 rural Tibetans (see Appendix I). Most of these relocations—over 709,000 people or 76 percent of these relocations—have taken place since 2016. Among these 709,000 people relocated, 140,000 are moved as part of the whole village relocation drives, 567,000 as part of individual household relocations

In this same period between 2000 and 2025, 3.36 million rural Tibetans have been affected by other government programs requiring them to rebuild their houses and to adopt a sedentary way of life if they are nomads, without necessarily being relocated.

Given that there are 4.55 million Tibetans living in rural areas in the People’s Republic of China, these figures suggest that most rural Tibetans have been impacted by Chinese government relocation or rehousing policies in the past two decades. Many of them have had to move or rebuild their homes more than once.

While such mass relocations of residents have been occurring elsewhere in poor rural areas in China, these drives risk causing a devastating impact on Tibetan communities. Together with current Chinese government programs to assimilate Tibetan schooling, culture, and religion into those of the “Chinese nation,” these relocations of rural communities erode or cause major damage to Tibetan culture and ways of life, not least because most relocation programs in Tibet move former farmers and pastoralists to areas where they cannot practice their former livelihood and have no choice but to seek work as wage laborers in off-farm industries.

The relocation program in Tibet contravenes international human rights law standards. International law prohibits “forced evictions,” which have been defined as the removal of individuals, families, or communities against their will from their homes or land without access to appropriate forms of legal or other protection. Forced evictions include those that lack meaningful consultation or compensation, and which do not consider “all feasible alternatives" to relocation. Otherwise, lawful evictions must still be carried out in compliance with relevant international human rights law and "in accordance with general principles of reasonableness and proportionality."

As detailed below, Chinese government policies that pressure or coerce Tibetans to relocate do not meet these standards. Authorities do not explore "all feasible alternatives" prior to relocation, ensure that those evicted receive "adequate compensation," have a right to return where possible if dissatisfied, or other procedural protections.

China-proposed river ethics initiative wins support

23 May 2024, China Daily, Hou Liqiang

International experts have spoken highly of a river ethics initiative that China proposed during the ongoing 10th World Water Forum in Bali, Indonesia, saying that it will help to realize the harmonious coexistence between humans and rivers, many of which have been jeopardized by human activities.

They made the remarks following the unveiling of the report "River Ethics and China's Practices" on Tuesday at the eight-day forum, which concludes on Saturday.

Underscoring river ethics as a new guiding philosophy to deal with the relationship between humans and rivers, the report compiled by the China Institute of Water Resources and Hydropower Research delves into the theoretical logic, the rules of practice and the development path of river ethics in China.

The report hopes that the nation's experiences will prove useful in overcoming the crisis involving rivers worldwide, which is currently challenging global sustainable development.

While unveiling the report, Minister of Water Resources Li Guoying said that in accordance with Xi Jinping Thought on Ecological Civilization and President Xi's perspective on water governance, developing river ethics means treating rivers as living entities and respecting their basic rights for survival and health.

"This perspective necessitates adjusting our values, moral codes, responsibilities and behavioral norms governing the interaction between humans and rivers," Li said, adding that the core objective of a river ethics initiative will be to uphold the harmonious coexistence between humans and rivers.

Cecilia Tortajada, a professor at the United Kingdom-based University of Glasgow's School of Interdisciplinary Studies, expressed her support for the China-proposed river ethics initiative, saying that she believes it will have positive impacts.

Such an initiative will not only improve the water quality in every river in China, but also offer important lessons for other countries, she said.

"Because what you need is the practices, and China is a very big laboratory," Tortajada said. "I have great expectations for this initiative from China, because it's going to be positive for China and also for the world."

Asit K. Biswas, a visiting professor at National University of Singapore's School for Public Policy, said that in the 21st century, when most rivers are overexploited, both in terms of quantity and quality, it is important to note what the ethical requirements are with regard to river management.

Rivers play an important role in people's lives by maintaining the ecosystem and improving people's socioeconomic conditions, so the question is what ethics human beings should have in order to live in harmony with nature, Biswas said.

In March last year, during the 2023 United Nations Water Conference, Li, the minister, proposed that the world should look into river ethics as one of the four important areas of water management.

Biswas said: "I'm glad this is being done, because the river has been mostly a neglected topic. It will be good to have some principles. What are they, let's say, 10 to 14 principles of river ethics, which we human beings should follow, so that rivers can exist in harmony with human beings and nature?"

Slobodan P. Simonovic, chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of the International Conference on Flood Management, said that when discussing river ethics, it is fundamental to adopt a global view that doesn't prioritize humans over rivers, but sees them as interconnected elements of one complex system.

This perspective recognizes that rivers are not merely resources to be exploited for human benefit, but are dynamic ecosystems with their own intrinsic value and rights, he stressed.

"Just as humans have rights, proponents of environmental ethics argue that natural entities like rivers should also have (rights). ...This perspective sometimes is referred to as the river rights or the rights of nature," Simonovic said.

"And it recognizes rivers as living entities, deserving legal protection and respect," he added.

Thailand: 'Swap Mart' Targets Foreign Dissidents, Refugees

17 May, 2024, Human Rights Watch

Thai authorities are assisting neighboring governments to take unlawful actions against refugees and dissidents from abroad, making Thailand increasingly unsafe for those fleeing persecution, Human Rights Watch said in a report released today. These targets of transnational repression have gotten caught up in a “swap mart” in which foreign dissidents in Thailand are effectively traded for critics of the Thai government living abroad.

The report, “‘We Thought We Were Safe’: Repression and Refoulement of Refugees in Thailand,” details Thai authorities’ upsurge in repression directed at foreign nationals seeking refugee protection in Thailand. Foreign governments have subjected exiled dissidents and activists living in Thailand to harassment, surveillance, and physical violence, often with the cooperation and knowledge of Thai authorities. In a number of cases, Thai officials arrested asylum seekers and refugees and deported them without due process to their home countries.

“Thai authorities have increasingly engaged in a ‘swap mart’ with neighboring governments to unlawfully exchange each other’s dissidents,” said Elaine Pearson, Asia director at Human Rights Watch. “Thai Prime Minister Srettha Thavisin should break with this practice and prosecute Thai officials wrongfully collaborating with foreign governments acting on Thai soil.”

Suspected Uyghurs are transported back to a detention facility in the town of Songkhla in southern Thailand, March 26, 2014. © 2014 Andrew RC Marshall/Reuters

The term “transnational repression” describes efforts by governments or their agents to silence or deter dissent by committing human rights abuses against their own nationals or members of the country’s diaspora outside their territorial jurisdiction.

Human Rights Watch analyzed 25 cases that took place in Thailand between 2014 and 2023 and conducted 18 interviews with victims, their family members, and witnesses to abuses, along with representatives of local and international nongovernmental organizations. The governments responsible include member countries of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) as well as China and Bahrain, among others.

In one case, a Cambodian dissident who had fled to Thailand in July 2022, said he started receiving letters from Cambodian officials urging him to defect from the main Cambodian opposition party. After he had received these letters for months, unidentified men attacked him in August 2023. “They did not say anything to me, they just came out and started beating me,” the Cambodian dissident said.

In recent years in Thailand, dissidents from Vietnam have been tracked down and abducted, Lao democracy advocates have been forcibly disappeared or killed, and a Malaysian LGBTI rights influencer was targeted for repatriation. Thai authorities have detained and unlawfully deported Chinese dissidents and refugees, seemingly at the request of the Chinese government. Thai authorities also detained a visiting professional football player from Bahrain with Australian refugee status, and nearly returned him to Bahrain.

At the same time, a number of Thai activists have been killed or disappeared in Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam. The mutilated bodies of two missing activists were later found floating in the Mekong River.

“Swap mart” arrangements increased under Thailand’s National Council for Peace and Order military government that came to power after the May 2014 coup and continued under the post-2019 government of Prime Minister Gen. Prayut Chan-ocha.

The Thai authorities, in addition to facilitating assaults, abductions, enforced disappearances, and other abuses, repeatedly violated the principle of nonrefoulement: the prohibition on returning anyone to a place where they would face a real risk of persecution, torture, or other serious ill-treatment, or a threat to life.

Thai authorities have arrested and summarily deported exiled critics and dissidents, even those with refugee status determined by the United Nations Refugee Agency (UNHCR). One Cambodian activist pleaded with Thai police, saying he would “be killed or put in jail ... if deported.” Yet Thai authorities forcibly returned him to Cambodia within days of his arrest.

Thailand’s actions violate customary international law as well as the UN Convention against Torture and other treaties that Thailand has ratified barring refoulement. The actions also violate Thailand’s Act on Prevention and Suppression of Torture and Enforced Disappearances, which came into effect in February 2023. It states that “no government organizations or public officials shall expel, deport, or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that the person would be in danger of torture, cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment, or enforced disappearance.”

The Thai government should thoroughly and impartially investigate alleged harassment, threats, surveillance, and forced returns from Thailand by foreign governments against migrants, refugees and asylum seekers in Thailand and the role of Thai officials in those actions, Human Rights Watch said. "Prime Minister Srettha should act to restore Thailand's deserved reputation as a country that is a safe haven for dissidents from abroad," Pearson said. "He should immediately order a full and transparent investigation into arbitrary arrests, violent assaults, and forced returns of refugees and political dissidents.

Chinese nationalist groups are launching cyber-attacks – often against the wishes of the government

14 May, 2024, The Conversation, Lewis Eves

The UK's national security agency, MI5, warned in April that British universities participating in military research are targets for cyber-attacks by foreign states. More recently, news broke of a cyber-attack against the UK's Ministry of Defence, which exposed the personal details of 270,000 armed forces personnel. China is the main suspect behind these attacks.

China is often presented as a monolithic entity, entirely at the whim of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). However, the reality is more complex. Many Chinese cyber-attacks and other kinds of digital interference are conducted by Chinese nationalist groups.

Some of these groups are funded by and act under the direction of the CCP. The 50 Cent Army (五毛党), for example, is a group who post pro-CCP messages on social media. Its name is derived from reports that the CCP pays recruits 0.5 yuan (US$0.69) per post. But many of these groups operate independently. There are even cases of Chinese nationalist groups engaging in online warfare against the wishes of the CCP.

The fact that cyber-attacks are being launched independently of the CCP and against its directives suggests that China's nationalist movement is escaping the government's societal controls. This could become a headache for China's president, Xi Jinping, as the number of cyber-attacks grows.

China's nationalist movement is very sensitive to what it considers insults to the Chinese nation. This is due to the careful construction of Chinese nationalism through stories like the "century of humiliation", a period from roughly 1839 to 1949 in which China was exploited and victimised by foreign imperialist powers.

Chinese nationalists now act against what they perceive to be renewed attempts by foreign powers to again humiliate China. They take action through "online wars" against those who they believe pose a threat to China's interests.

In 2016, Taiwan elected Tsai Ing-wen, an anti-Beijing candidate, as president. During and after the election, a group of predominately young, female cyber-nationalists known as the Little Pinks (小粉紅) waged a "meme war" against Taiwan.

This involved thousands of Little Pinks posting a deluge of pro-Beijing memes on the social media profiles of President Tsai and numerous Taiwanese news outlets. The memes emphasised China's claim that Taiwan is a Chinese province and not an independent nation state.

Some cyber-nationalist groups have gone a step further by engaging in hacktivism. This involves targeting institutions and organisations through cyber-attacks to pursue the nationalist agenda.

In 2008, an informal group of hacktivists called the Red Hacker Alliance (中国红客联盟) attempted a denial-of-service attack against US media company CNN. The attack was in response to CNN's reporting on anti-Beijing protests in Tibet, which has been occupied by China since 1950. It caused the company's website to be briefly unavailable in some parts of Asia.

In another example, a group called the Honker Union (紅客) launched cyber-attacks against the Philippines in 2014. Triggered by the attempted arrest of Chinese fishermen in a disputed area of the South China Sea, the Honker Union hacked into the website of the University of the Philippines. Hackers posted pro-Chinese slogans and a map showing China's territorial claims on the university's homepage.

The CCP's societal control

The CCP leans into nationalist sentiment to legitimise its regime, presenting itself as the vanguard of the Chinese nation. But this reliance on nationalism has given China's nationalist movement considerable influence. The CCP cannot be seen to contradict its nationalist credentials by constraining nationalist activity too heavily.

As a result, cyber-nationalists have escaped the CCP's societal controls, such as its ability to direct China's nationalist movement through propaganda. In doing so, cyber-nationalists undermine the CCP's authority and occasionally contradict its foreign policy.

In 2020, the CCP called for restraint among nationalist groups following foreign criticism of China's crackdown on Hong Kong. However, cyber-nationalists still undertook an anti-foreign smear campaign on social media. Even the Communist Youth League, a nationalist organisation with formal links to the CCP, took part against the CCP's instruction.

As part of this campaign, hackers also launched cyber-attacks such as hijacking the Twitter account of the Chinese embassy in Paris. The hackers posted a picture of the US as the personification of death visiting Hong Kong.

The embassy quickly deleted the image and apologised to France and the US. But the incident speaks to a CCP that is struggling to control cyber-nationalists who are evading its societal controls and are willing to hijack state propaganda infrastructure to pursue their goals.

There have also been hacker cyber-attacks directed against the Chinese state, usually coinciding with periods of discontent with the CCP. In 2014, one group briefly seized control of a television network in the eastern city of Wenzhou and broadcast nationalistic and anti-CCP messages. This cyber-attack was made in protest of the detention of Wang Bingzhang, a nationalist activist and political dissident.

Another group hacked into a Shanghai police database in 2022, leaking 23 terabytes of personal information that the state had collected on the Chinese people as part of its programme of mass domestic surveillance. The information was later made available for sale on online forums from an anonymous hacker referred to as "ChinaDan".

In the west, we assume that Chinese cyber-attacks reflect a malicious Chinese state. The reality is more complex. As cyber-nationalists continue to take matters into their own hands, increasing numbers of cyber-attacks also reflects a major domestic problem for the CCP – one that showcases the limits of its societal controls.

Xi Stresses Breaking New Ground in Ideological, Political Education

12 May 2024, Women of China

President Xi Jinping has stressed efforts to continuously break new ground in ideological and political education at schools in the new era.

Xi, also general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, made the remarks in an instruction on the development of ideological-political courses for schools.

Xi said that the CPC Central Committee has always made developing ideological-political courses in schools a priority for education since the 18th CPC National Congress and the Party's leadership in this regard has been fully strengthened.

Developing ideological-political courses on the new journey of the new era should follow the guidance of the Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and the fundamental mission of fostering virtue should be carried out, Xi said.

He underscored the importance of developing a system of textbooks with a focus on the Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and integrating political education across all levels from elementary schools to universities.

Xi stressed the need for efforts to uphold fundamental principles and break new ground to develop ideological-political courses, and to make the courses more targeted and appealing.

He stressed that Party committees and leading Party members groups at all levels should make it a priority to develop ideological-political courses.

Schools of various types should consistently break new ground in ideological and political education in the new era, and foster talented individuals who are loyal to the Party, patriotic and dedicated, and capable of shouldering the mission of realizing national rejuvenation, he said.

Xi's important instruction was conveyed at a meeting on boosting the development of ideological-political courses for schools held in Beijing on Saturday. Ding Xuexiang, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, attended the meeting and delivered a speech.

Ding, who is also vice premier, called for thorough study and implementation of Xi's important instruction and urged continuous efforts to push forward the reform and innovation of ideological-political courses.

Stressing the importance of helping students better understand national conditions and consolidate their ideals and faith, Ding said the mechanism for guaranteeing proper status and salaries for teachers of the courses should be improved.

How China's latest government overhaul is shaping up, and what it says about the Communist Party's priorities

12 May 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Since taking the helm of the Communist Party in 2012, President Xi Jinping has constantly been overhauling China's massive system of state and party organs to reflect Beijing's shifting priorities.

In the latest restructuring plan, rolled out in the spring of 2023, Beijing moved to assert more direct party control over a wide range of key policy areas, including science and technology, the financial sector and social stability.

A year later, the nature and scale of the restructuring is starting to take shape as new agencies covering these areas have been set up by central and local governments.

Looking closely at their operations provides an opportunity not just to see how they operate in practice, but also helps shed more light on Beijing's policy priorities and the challenges it faces.

For example, the establishment of new financial regulatory bodies by both central and provincial governments highlights the sense of urgency around tackling financial risk, while the newly established National Data Administration will play a key role in China's plans to develop artificial intelligence by managing data resources.

The top Hong Kong and Macau policy office will also report directly to the party's Central Committee, rather than the State Council, the country's cabinet, to improve coordination with other branches of government as Beijing seeks to tighten its control over the city.

The overhaul is an "important part of the ruling Communist Party's effort to channel nationwide resource-to-technology self-reliance, while strengthening the party's control over financial and social risks", as it faces an increasingly hostile West, according to Alfred Wu, an associate professor with the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy.

"In China's party and state-led governance model, setting up party commissions or government bureaus are usually the best way to influence the resource allocation on priorities as it is trying to shift the key economic growth engine from property to technology," he said.

"It is a painful and long process. China hopes to use the party-led finance model to pump more money into research and development, while keeping an eye on social stability because of higher unemployment."

The efforts to ensure stability extend all the way down to the grass roots, where social work departments – which have to handle petitions and grievances from the public – are being established at county level, the only new bodies to operate at such a low level.

While departments supervising economic matters only make sense on a larger scale, the opposite is true for social stability, according to Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University.

"It has to reach the grass roots level to know what is wrong on the ground and take immediate action," said Xie.

At the central level, Beijing appointed Wu Hansheng, a veteran party administrator, as head of the Social Work Department in July 2023.

At a meeting in February, Wu and his lieutenants set out this year's key tasks, telling provincial social control teams to quickly formulate plans to find ways to better handle petitions and listen to grass-roots grievances and suggestions. They were also urged to deploy more staff to identify and defuse any potential social risks.

The central department is also tasked with asserting the party's leadership over various sectors of society, including industry federations and party branches in private companies. It also aims to extend the party's reach into the gig economy and among the growing number of self-employed people.

Most of the provincial officials who attended the event were the secretaries of local new economy and new social organisation work committees, which have been established since 2016 to extend the party's reach into the private sector and new internet industries, where the party previously had a limited reach.

A Zhejiang cadre said building a social organisation network across the country is still a work in progress.

"We are still in the process of clarifying our new lines of reporting, finding duplicate functions and streamlining them. But the instruction from the top is very clear, get it done before the end of the year – and they won't accept excuses," he said.

The first new body to be established was the National Administration of Financial Regulation, which was set up in May last year – indicating the leadership's belief there is an urgent need for better oversight of the financial sector.

In March last year Beijing also said it would replace local financial regulatory bodies with the provincial outposts of the National Administration of Financial Regulation in a clear sign of Beijing's distrust of local governments when it comes to tackling the problem – especially since giving them free-rein over regulation is seen as a major source of corruption.

Most of the regional financial regulatory heads have been sent from central offices in Beijing

As part of this drive another body, the Central Financial Work Commission, headed by Premier Li Qiang, was set up later in the year to design, coordinate and supervise financial polices for better stability and development.

A political scientist from Nanjing University said the leadership has grave concerns about financial risk and corruption, because the damage it can cause to ordinary people's lives is "nuclear grade".

"If you compare the damage from different sectors ... financial sector corruption is definitely going to lead the chart as they can influence the flow of or have access to the whole financial markets worth trillions of yuan.

"While other officials are taking bribes in thousands or millions of yuan, the financial sector's corruption can easily reach billions, leaving big holes and major headaches in the system," he said.

He cited the case of Lai Xiaomin, the former chairman of Huarong, one of China's largest state-controlled asset management firms, who was executed in 2021 for taking almost 1.8 billion yuan (US$277 million) worth of bribes – a crime the supreme court said had a “particularly severe” social impact.

The political scientist said the government shake-up showed “Beijing is very clear about this now. The financial sector shall not have its own agenda. It shall just serve its role of moving capital to where the party wants it to go”.

Three regional officials involved in the overhaul said the new local financial bodies will only operate in provincial capitals and a handful of major cities.

“So in Guangdong, you will see a provincial financial regulatory bureau and two municipality level bureaus in Guangzhou, the provincial capital, and Shenzhen, a city under separate state planning. That is all,” a Guangdong official said.

An official in Guizhou concurred. “We will only have a provincial financial regulatory body and municipal financial regulator in our provincial capital Guiyang. Many cadres working in the financial area will be redeployed, especially those in smaller cities,” he added.

An official involved in the institutional overhaul in Shanghai, China’s financial and commercial centre, said the overhaul is aimed at removing the responsibility for developing markets from the municipal financial office to focus on regulation.

“The financial works office’s job was to serve local governments and financial institutions, coordinate financial resources, help to obtain more credit to finance local development projects, and assist local companies to go public.

“Now it is different. The central government’s priority for us is to identify potential financial risks within our jurisdiction and manage them before it blows up,” said the Shanghai official.

“It is not just changing the plate outside our office. It requires a drastic change in how we run the bureau, our mentality, how to regulate the interactions between officials and the financial institutions to avoid corruption etc. We are just embarking on it.”

When it comes to data management the implementation at a provincial level is more patchy.

AI is seen as the next major area of competition between China and the US, and data is a vital resource for developing and training the technology.

After the launch of the National Data Administration, 20 out of the mainland’s 31 provinces, regions and municipalities have so far set up their own data management offices to fit with Beijing’s blueprint to develop China’s data infrastructure and integrate and share data resources.

The plan will see national hub nodes set up in some of the country’s key economic hubs, such as the Yangtze and Pearl River Deltas as well as around Beijing, and in less populated areas including Inner Mongolia, Gansu and Ningxia.

Except for Ningxia, all other provinces and regions mentioned in the plan have already announced new data agencies, led by directors with professional backgrounds in computers and big data.

Some provinces – Shaanxi, Hebei, Inner Mongolia and Guangdong – have also included “government services” in the name of their data agencies, suggesting a clear expansion in their role to allow residents to have one-stop access to government services.

The most mysterious of the new party organs are those set up to coordinate scientific development, with little information being released about their operations across the country.

The Central Science and Technology Commission was set up to oversee the sector from the top, but the only public reference to this new party body is a statement on the Ministry of Science and Technology’s website in July that said cadres had studied the outcome of its first meeting.

Unlike the other newly established party organs, even the leadership of this body is unknown, something analysts said may be a sign of China’s concerns about scrutiny from the West and may even indicate it has links to the military.

“China needs to avoid attention from the West so that it can push forward its science and tech development agenda with relatively fewer obstacles and intervention,” said Tsinghua’s Xie,

He noted that China’s ambitious tech development and talent attraction plans – such as the Made in China 2025 blueprint and Thousand Talent Plan – has been used by the West to track the new industries China is betting on and its international talent recruitment, so “staying low-key is the natural response”.

Information about science bodies on the provincial levels is also very limited. As of the end of April, only Henan and Inner Mongolia had announced the establishment of their own science commissions, which were chaired by senior officials.

National University of Singapore’s Wu said it is still too early to say if the overhaul is effective as such drastic organisational changes need time to clear up any confusion or internal disputes they may cause.

“Many companies take years to complete their merger and acquisition process, not to mention mega-Chinese party and state machines which have faced three major reshuffles since Xi came to power.” Xi’s three rounds of institutional reform – announced in 2013, 2018 and last year – have all aimed to centralise power in the hands of party apparatchiks and streamline the ever-ballooning bureaucracy to improve its efficiency and effectiveness.

“Deciding on the organisational structure and the staffing are probably the easiest parts of the latest reshuffle. It can be done in two years. Going forward, the bigger challenge is for the new agencies to prove themselves,” Wu said.

Senior Chinese leaders’ tours round country offer clues to economic policy agenda ahead of key meeting

11 May 2024, SCMP, Vanessa Cai

Several senior Chinese officials have been touring the country this week, offering some clues as to what will be top of the agenda at a key policy meeting that will set out the country’s general economic direction.

The four emphasised technological self-reliance, social stability and high-quality development during the trips, the first made by members of the senior leadership after the announcement that the third plenum would be held in July after an unexplained delay.

It is a tradition for senior officials to make domestic inspection tours before a plenum, a party gathering that will announce goals to be followed up by government agencies with specific policies.

This week, four of the seven members of the Politburo Standing Committee – Premier Li Qiang, the country’s top lawmaker Zhao Leji, top political adviser Wang Huning and first Vice-Premier Ding Xuexiang – were touring the country while President Xi Jinping was in Europe with other senior officials.

Li visited Xinjiang between Tuesday and Thursday, saying the northwestern region should strengthen international exchanges and promote its role as a trade link between inland provinces and other countries, state news agency Xinhua reported.

His itinerary included visits to local companies, where he stressed the need to support the development of industries showcasing local strengths such as energy and equipment manufacturing. He also said the region should promote stability.

Li’s trip followed Xi’s call to accelerate the development and opening-up of western China during a visit to Chongqing last month. The area – including Chongqing and 11 provinces and autonomous regions – is considered strategically important for energy security and national defence.

On Friday, the premier travelled to the eastern province of Anhui, where he stressed the importance of technological self-reliance and innovation.

That was also a focus for vice-premier Ding Xuexiang during his three-day trip to northeastern China’s Liaoning province that concluded on Thursday. He visited the capital city Shenyang and port city Dalian, where he highlighted the need to develop the advanced manufacturing sector.

Ding visited a university, several tech companies and a research lab. He said business should play a stronger role in scientific innovation and collaboration between enterprises, academia and research institutes should be promoted.

Wang Huning, the party’s No 4 official and former ideology chief, travelled to southern China’s Guangxi Zhuang autonomous region between Monday and Wednesday.

He said the region, which has one of China’s highest proportion of non-Han ethnic groups, needs to enforce Xi’s vision of “forging a strong sense of the community of the Chinese nation” that calls for greater integration of minorities.

Wang Huning stressed the importance of implementing Xi Jinping’s vision for integrating ethnic minorities during his visit to Guangxi region. Photo: Xinhua

This has also been a theme in his inspection trips last year to places such as Xinjiang, home of the Uygur population, Tibet and Yunnan.

The third plenum is traditionally used by the Communist Party to set out the country’s economic strategy for the next five to 10 years. July’s meeting is expected to cover a wide range of areas, from the economy to social development.

When announcing the date last month the Politburo, a key decision-making body, emphasised the risks “lurking in key areas” of the economy and the need to advance reforms and gain a strategic advantage over foreign competitors.

It has not spelled out the July meeting’s agenda, saying only that the Central Committee would discuss “further comprehensive reforms” and pushing forward “Chinese modernisation”.

The third plenum will last for up to five days and will be attended by the 376 full and alternate members of the Central Committee, the party’s top governing body.

‘Resist temptations’: China’s top spy agency warns overseas staff are being targeted for hi-tech secrets

10 May 2024, SCMP, Phoebe Zhang

China’s top intelligence agency has warned that overseas entities have been approaching and tricking Chinese personnel stationed in their countries to steal China’s hi-tech industrial secrets.

In a post on its official WeChat account on Friday, the Ministry of State Security warned that the methods used by foreign spy agencies can be “quite deceptive” and overseas Chinese employees should take precautions.

When such entities identify overseas Chinese personnel overseas, they usually approach them in three stages, the ministry said.

Chinese Ministry of State Security app on WeChat.
Photo: Handout

First, they create a “chance encounter”, where they pretend to be friendly and helpful to their targets. Then, they make frequent contact with their targets, invite them to dinners, and share information about their lives to gain trust. Finally, when the targets have lowered their guard, the spies trick or threaten them to sell state secrets, according to the post.

When stationed in an unfamiliar environment far from families and friends, the Chinese staff may be inclined to socialise, the ministry said, but cautioned they should be calm and rational and avoid risks.

“They should stay on guard about the motivations others may have when they make friends, have a strong awareness to keep secrets and resist temptations,” the ministry said.

Over the past year, the ministry has been more active on social media, warning the public about threats of foreign spies, and urging people to report suspicious activity.

The posts have raised alarms on a range of risks, including underwater spyware found in Chinese waters, espionage disguised as consultations and overseas students being approached to obtain information. China’s revised counter-espionage law, which came into effect last July, expands both the definition of spying and the investigative powers of the country’s national security agencies. An amended state secrets law that took effect in May added a dozen new clauses that expand the depth and reach of its coverage.

The ministry had previously disclosed “classic examples” of people stationed overseas who were persuaded to spy.

In April, the ministry discussed the case of Zhang Xiangbin, a translator with a Chinese ministry who was stationed in a “foreign country”. He was approached by a spy, who befriended him and later paid him for intelligence.

For years, Zhang worked as a spy in the host country and had two children with a government officer in that country, the state security ministry said.

Zhang later quit his job when he realised Chinese intelligence might have been on to him. Before leaving, he took 5,200 files and documents, many of which were designated as secret.

In 2019, Zhang was sentenced to death with a two-year reprieve.

Australian study says China uses global apps, games for propaganda

10 May 2024, VOA, Phil Mercer

An Australian study claims that China’s monitoring of global internet users’ online habits — a practice that has made TikTok controversial in the United States — extends far beyond the popular social media app to numerous other platforms and even online games.

The Australian Strategic Policy Institute, a research organization that receives funding from the Australian government and others overseas, said in a May 2 report that Beijing’s propaganda chiefs are forging ties with Chinese tech companies to gather personal data from a wide range of social media apps or platforms and popular online games.

They include ride-sharing app DiDi, the action game Genshin Impact, and Temu, the popular online marketplace.

The Australian study claims that China’s ambition is to harvest “strategically valuable” data from media, gaming, artificial intelligence and other emerging technologies.

It states that China is “working to extend its influence abroad to reshape the global information ecosystem ... to strengthen its grip on power, legitimize its activities and bolster China’s cultural, technological, economic and military influence.”

There has been no response, so far, from Chinese authorities. Beijing has previously accused the Australian government of “anti-China hysteria” over various geopolitical and trade disputes.

Samantha Hoffman, the lead author of the Australian Strategic Policy Institute report, told the Australian Broadcasting Corporation this week that data obtained from apps, platforms and games could be valuable to China.

"That could be data on the way that users make decisions. [With] Temu, it could be preferences that indicate the likes and dislikes of particular demographics," she said. "If China is trying to shape the way that the world perceives and understands truth and reality, then this data will help to make those efforts more successful over time."

The report urged policymakers to "develop robust defenses and countermeasures to safeguard against future information campaigns orchestrated by Beijing."

It also asserts that much attention has been given to the Chinese-owned platform TikTok because of concerns that the user data it collects could be shared with Chinese authorities. It cautions, however, the problem "runs much deeper than just TikTok."

TikTok's Chinese owner, ByteDance, has said it will mount a court challenge in the United States to what it called an "unconstitutional" law making its way through Congress that could require the platform to be sold or banned in that country.

ByteDance has denied collusion with the Chinese government.

Marina Zhang, an associate professor at the Australia-China Relations Institute at the University of Technology Sydney, told VOA she thinks the Strategic Policy Institute report is exaggerated.

"[The] Chinese propaganda machine is huge, but to link all social media apps [to] this propaganda machine is a bit of overstretching," she said.

Zhang said she believes technological collaboration, and not confrontation, is in China's best interests.

"If segregation is going to happen and if reports like this [are] going to happen, China will be isolated from the rest of the world," Zhang said. "So, we do not want to see a total technological decoupling between China and the West in terms of not just applications but also eventually in technological infrastructure. That is not going to be good for anybody."

Last year, Australia said it would ban TikTok on government devices, including cell phones, because of security and surveillance fears.

Senior official with China's new financial regulator targeted in corruption probe just a week into the job

08 May, 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

A senior official from China's new financial regulatory body has been detained by the country's top anti-corruption watchdog, according to official announcements.

The Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) said on Tuesday that Ren Chunsheng, leader of the preparatory team for the Complaint Mediation Centre of the National Financial Regulatory Administration (NFRA), was under investigation because he was "suspected of serious violations of discipline and law" – a euphemism for corruption.

Ren, 55, appears to have joined the administration earlier this month, serving at the agency for about a week before his detention. He is the first senior official at the new financial regulator to be targeted in an anti-corruption investigation.

The NFRA was established in March of last year as part of a major overhaul of Communist Party and state organs.

As part of that overhaul, Beijing established a powerful Central Financial Commission, led by Premier Li Qiang, to decide the general direction of financial regulation. The NFRA was founded to serve as the execution and enforcement arm of the commission's decisions.

The NFRA's Complaint Mediation Centre will be a key mechanism to coordinate the handling of consumer and market complaints about financial institutions' products and unfair practices and to deal with actions that infringe on consumers' rights and interests.

Ren stepped down as the party secretary and chairman of the Shanghai Insurance Exchange (SHIE) in late April, a position he had held since July 2021.

One Shanghai official who knew Ren said friends had not been able to reach him since his departure from SHIE.

SHIE, an insurance service platform launched in June 2016, raised 2.24 billion yuan (US$310 million) in capital and aimed to become the main exchange for Chinese and overseas insurance companies to register and trade their insurance and reinsurance products.

Before his stint at SHIE, Ren was the party secretary and chairman of China Insurance Investment Co, Ltd, a position he assumed in February 2019.

Ren has spent most of his career in top Chinese financial regulatory authorities. Before his appointment to China Insurance Investment group in 2019, he was the director of the Insurance Fund Supervision Department of the China Banking and Insurance Regulatory Commission, which was abolished and replaced by the NFRA during the overhaul last year.

While there, he was mainly responsible for monitoring insurance fund risk and providing early warnings. His team carried out on-site and off-site inspections of insurance company investments.

China's anti-corruption authority has set its sights on China's financial system in recent years. In the first four months of 2024, more than 20 senior financial officers were detained by the CCDI, according to a tally on the disciplinary watchdog's website.

The highest ranking financial official caught so far this year has been Li Jiping, 69, former vice-president of China Development Bank. The CCDI announced his detention on March 13, more than eight years after he retired.

The tally also shows that in 2023, the CCDI announced the detention of more than 100 cadres in China's banking, insurance, securities and other finance-related fields. Nearly 70 per cent of the financial officials investigated were from state banks, with "using bank loans for personal gains" the most common accusation against them.

New rules let China's state security police check people's devices

May 8, 2024, RFA, Qian Lang

China's state security police will be given sweeping powers to search electronic devices including smartphones and laptops from July 1, as part of a nationwide campaign to ensure "national security," a broad term often used by the government to include detailed economic data and political dissent.

The documents issued by the Ministry of State Security on April 26 empower its officers to gather "electronic data" relating to an investigation including "mobile phone text messages, emails, instant messages and group chats," along with "documents, images, audio and video, apps and ... log records" from electronic devices.

Police may "make inquiries" simply by presenting their police ID card, and may "collect evidence" if at least two officers present their ID card, according to the rules on administrative cases.

"The collection and extraction of electronic data shall be carried out by two or more investigators," the orders read.

However, police can investigate purely to determine "basic information about the suspect," and even whether an illegal or criminal act has taken place.

Billed by the ruling Chinese Communist Party's official Legal Daily newspaper as a set of guidelines for implementing the "national security concept," the documents come amid an ongoing nationwide campaign to encourage people to spot any kind of behavior that could "endanger national security," including being on the lookout for foreign spies in their daily lives.

In its report on the new rules, the nationalistic Global Times newspaper mentioned the campaign, citing the cases of Canadian nationals Michael Kovrig and Michael Spavor as examples of foreign spies operating in China.

Similar rules were issued governing investigations run by market regulatory agencies on April 4.

Stop and search

Legal scholar Lu Chenyuan said the new rules mean that state security police officers can stop people and search their devices without the need for a warrant, or even an ongoing criminal investigation.

"This is very bad, because they can actually check people's cell phones as part of administrative law enforcement," he said. He was referring to a type of law enforcement that goes after people who have allegedly broken the law, but whose infractions aren't deemed serious enough to warrant a full criminal prosecution.

Dissidents and rights lawyers have previously been initially held under an administrative sentence of up to 15 days, at which point police either transfer them into "residential surveillance at a designated location" or place them under criminal detention pending further investigation.

Administrative sentences have also been widely used to target petitioners, internet users who post the wrong thing on social media, and people who took part in the November 2022 "white paper" protests across China.

Lu said the state security orders will likely contribute to an atmosphere of fear in China, and encourage people to censor themselves more than they already do.

"I think their purpose is to create a situation where everyone feels as if they could be in danger," Lu said. "They want people to carry out strict self-censorship, for example, not being in contact with anyone outside the country."

He said the authorities could also be looking for people with encrypted messaging apps like Signal or Telegram installed on their phones.

An academic who gave only the surname Liu for fear of reprisals agreed, saying the move is part of the current "national security" campaign.

"They want to push this idea of national security to everyone, to create a pervasive atmosphere of fear in everyone's daily lives," Liu said.

Border checks already happening

Anecdotal evidence from people who frequently travel in and out of China suggests that police at the borders are already carrying out spot checks of people's phones when they cross the border.

A Hong Kong resident who gave only the surname Kong for fear of reprisals said she saw border guards examining the mobile phone of a woman at Futian Port over the weekend.

"As I was going through immigration in Shenzhen, I noticed two female border guards checking a woman's mobile phone," Kong said. "They were asking her if she had any other phones because she had more than one with her."

She said she had seen officers checking people's phones recently at airports in Nanjing and Hangzhou, too.

"They look at what's on your phone, what photos are there," Kong said. "I cleaned up my phone that day, deleting any content that could be highly sensitive."

A Shanghai resident who gave only the surname Shao for fear of reprisals said he had also spotted customs officials checking a man's phone at Shanghai's international airport on his way home from Japan.

"I saw a Chinese man being stopped by customs, who looked at his phone and then let him go," Shao said. "So it seems they didn't find anything problematic on his phone."

It was unclear whether the new rules will mean that such checks will be more frequent in future.

Repeated calls to customs authorities in Shenzhen and Shanghai rang unanswered during office hours on Monday.

Former Chinese defence minister Wei Fenghe emerges after months of speculation

08 May, 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

A floral tribute at the funeral of a senior official on Monday suggests China's former defence chief and rocket army veteran Wei Fenghe may be politically safe, after his absence from state events sparked months of speculation about his fate.

Wei's name was spotted on a wreath at the funeral of Ouyunqemag, 81, who served as vice-chairwoman of the National People's Congress Standing Committee from 2008-2013.

In a prime-time news bulletin on state broadcaster CCTV, Wei's tribute was visible among those from other former state councillors at the side of the funeral hall, with wreaths from President Xi Jinping and other incumbent officials in the middle.

Wei, who headed the PLA Rocket Force from its formation on December 31, 2015, as part of Xi's military overhaul, disappeared from the public eye after his successor, Li Shangfu, was abruptly sacked as defence minister in October last year, without explanation.

Li, who like Wei spent most of his career in the PLA's rocket wing, was also stripped of his rank as a state councillor and removed from top decision-making body the Central Military Commission (CMC).

Wei's indirect reappearance indicates he may have escaped the purge of the People's Liberation Army's top brass, including commanders of the rocket force – which manages China's nuclear arsenal – that followed Li's disgrace.

Direct and indirect appearances in official settings are important indicators of political fate in China's opaque system, where little information is given away.

Wei's absence from an official National Day reception last year was the first sign that he may be in trouble. He was also not included in a list of around 130 retired senior officials who received Lunar New Year greetings from the Communist Party leadership in February.

The annual formality is usually reserved for retired senior officials who have achieved state councillor rank or above.

His predecessors – former defence ministers Chang Wanquan, Liang Guanglie, Cao Gangchuan and Chi Haotian – all featured in the list released by state news agency Xinhua.

The PLA purge included Zhou Yaning and Li Yuchao, the rocket force commanders who succeeded Wei after his promotion to defence minister in 2018, a position he held until his retirement in 2023.

Both men were removed from positions in China's top legislative body, the National People's Congress, in November, along with seven senior PLA officers, including two of their deputies and a head of the rocket force's equipment development programme.

In its first communique of 2024, released in February, the NPC Standing Committee confirmed that all nine were involved in corruption investigations.

The PLA is yet to fully iron out the aftermath of the purges. Defence Minister Dong Jun – who took over from Li in December and is the first navy chief in the role – has yet to be named as a state councillor, or given a place on the CMC.

All previous defence ministers have received the political status of membership on the CMC, which is chaired by Xi.

The military has been one of the main targets of Xi's far-reaching anti-corruption campaign. Two of the most prominent to fall were Guo Boxiong and Xu Caihou, both former CMC vice-chairmen. Guo was jailed for life for bribery in 2016. Xu died of cancer in 2015 while facing court martial.

British lawmaker – and China critic – denied entry to Djibouti

07 May 2024, , RFA, Sonam Lhamo Singeri and Tashi Wangchuk

Conservative MP Tim Loughton from the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China, speaks during a press conference in central London on March 25, 2024.

British lawmaker Tim Loughton, who was deported from the small East African nation of Djibouti in April, has warned that the move serves as more proof of China's global influence in targeting those like him who are vocal critics of Beijing's policies.

Djibouti, located on the Red Sea across next to Ethiopia, is home to China's first overseas military base, and is heavily indebted to China.

Authorities in Djibouti questioned Loughton, who was scheduled to meet with the British ambassador there for a debrief on his recent visit to neighbor Somaliland, for over seven hours on April 8 before he was told he would not be allowed entry.

"This is a further warning that China poses a serious threat not just to those within China's borders, but those beyond it as well," he told Radio Free Asia.

Loughton, a Conservative member of parliament and former children's minister, was one of seven British parliamentarians sanctioned by Beijing in 2021 for criticizing human rights abuses in China – which Beijing referred to as spreading "lies and disinformation."

He said the experience gave him more impetus to speak out against the human rights abuses suffered by Tibetans, Uyghurs and others in China.

"Certainly, it's a further indication of just how far the tentacles of the Chinese Communist Party extend well beyond China around the world, and those of us who have been prepared to speak out are subject to the clutches of those tentacles, apparently even in countries as remote as Djibouti," he told RFA Tibetan.

But the incident pales in significance to "the constant harassment, torture and violence" that many people inside China face, particularly Uyghurs, Tibetans and those from Hong Kong, where there has been a clampdown on freedom amid the imposition of a strict new national security law, Loughton said.

"We will continue to speak out in the British Parliament to highlight China's abuses at home and overseas," he said.

China critic

Loughton is a leading member of the Inter-Parliamentary Alliance on China, an international cross-party group of lawmakers from over 18 democratic countries working towards a collective response to Chinese trade, security and human rights policies.

He is also co-chair of the All-Party Parliamentary Group on Tibet, which has highlighted China's record on human rights abuses, and in 2019, introduced the Reciprocal Access Bill in the House of Commons designed to bar entry to the UK for Chinese officials found to block freedom of travel to Tibet by British citizens.

Loughton, who traveled to Somaliland as part of a British parliamentary delegation, said the visit itself was successful but that China was a frequent subject of discussions because of its close ties with Djibouti.

About 2,000 Chinese troops are permanently stationed at the military base, which appears large enough to dock a Chinese aircraft carrier, he said.

China has invested heavily in the country and is also the biggest creditor to the highly indebted Djibouti government, Loughton said.

"So, basically, what China wants, Djibouti tends to jump, and that became very clear with what happened to me," he added.

Loughton said he had all the necessary requirements for entry into Djibouti, but that when he presented his passport, he was questioned extensively and asked about his occupation.

"When I revealed that I was a British member of parliament, then things turned decidedly frosty," he said. "I was planted in the naughty corner in the arrivals lounge. ... I was then rather rudely put into a room which had doors locked behind me, and I was left there for several hours, not knowing exactly what was going on."

Authorities eventually told Loughton that he was not allowed into the country and that he would be put on the first plane out.

Even the British ambassador's deputy, dispatched to the airport to help him, couldn't persuade authorities to change their minds.

"There was no reason for me not to be allowed to go into Djibouti," Loughlin said.

"Clearly, some of the comments that the delegation had made expressing our concerns about the influence of China in the area had been picked up, and, clearly, those sanctioned British parliamentarians are on a blacklist," he said.

A tale of two slogans

07 May 2024, RFA, Chen Zifei

Judicial bodies in China no longer serve the people, but instead pledge to serve 'the overall situation.'

Emblazoned in huge gold characters at the gate of the ruling Chinese Communist Party headquarters at Zhongnanhai, the words "to serve the people" has a different meaning in China depending on whom you talk to.

The phrase is often echoed by supporters of late supreme leader Mao Zedong, and often used sarcastically to highlight official wrongdoing by people with grievances. It's now being quietly ditched by the country's top judicial bodies in favor of the much more nebulous "to serve the overall situation."

A May 2 article signed by China's top prosecutor Ying Yong in the Communist Party's ideological magazine Qiushi was titled "Serve the overall situation, deliver justice to the people, take responsibility for the rule of law."

The article came as the Supreme People's Procuratorate and other judicial bodies also replaced the slogan "Serve the People" on official documents and in public buildings with the words "Serve the Overall Situation," according to social media posts in recent weeks.

Some comments quipped that the "overall situation" refers to the "boss," while others played on a character in the word for "situation" that is also in the word for "bureau."

"What bureau is more important than the people?" one Netease user commented sarcastically on a blog post about the slogan change.

The phrase "To serve the people" comes from a 1944 speech by late supreme leader Mao Zedong, and was intended to describe idealistic Communist Party officials and People's Liberation Army soldiers who are willing to do anything to bring about a better society, known at the time as the "New China."

"If we have shortcomings, we don't fear criticism from others, regardless of who it is pointing it out, because we serve the people," says the speech.

"The Chinese people are suffering. We have the responsibility to save them, and we must work hard." 'Safeguarding the status' of the Party

A screenshot shows an article on the news channel Jinri Toutiao discussing the change in slogans. (RFA)

The phrase has since become something like a national motto, inscribed, often in Mao's own calligraphy, in big gold letters or large red characters on official buildings, including the entrance to Zhongnanhai.

It has also been turned around as a form of criticism of government corruption and wrongdoing, particularly by the army of ordinary Chinese who seek redress through official channels as petitioners.

In 2008, a caller to a RFA Mandarin talk show said the tainted baby formula scandal that sickened hundreds of infants showed that "Chinese officials do not serve the people."

In 2009, former People's Liberation Army soldier-turned-whistleblower Zhang Shijun accused the ruling party of hypocrisy for claiming that the army served the people after he wrote about being sent to Beijing in 1989 to enforce martial law during the pro-democracy movement on Tiananmen Square.

More recently, the phrase popped up during three years of strict zero-COVID restrictions that included grueling urban lockdowns, mass quarantine camps and compulsory daily testing regimes, this time to criticize the white-clad "enforcers" who at times welded people into their own apartments in a bid to prevent local outbreaks from the virus.

U.S.-based rights lawyer Wu Shaoping said the judicial agencies and courts once used the slogan "to serve the people" far more frequently, and that the move highlights a shift in attitude at the very top.

"The people have been booted out ... and they have brought in a bunch of evil laws like the Patriotic Education Law, the Counterespionage Law, and national security laws to serve the Chinese Communist Party's overall interests, calling it the rule of law," Wu said.

"The people are increasingly losing out, so the overall situation means they are willing to sacrifice lives to ensure their own safety," he said.

Independent political commentator Chen Daoyin said there wasn't much difference between the two phrases in practice, because the slogan "to serve the people" is rarely implemented in practice.

"A realistic way of seeing this might be that ... safeguarding national security is the top priority right now, which means safeguarding the status of the Communist Party regime," Chen said. "That is their fundamental interest."

'Anything can be the overall situation'

Feng Chongyi, a professor at the University of Technology in Sydney, agreed, saying that the claim that the ruling party served the people had always been a dubious one.

"To serve the people has always been a lie and a scam," Feng said. "The overall situation is a very pragmatic idea, because anything can be the overall situation."

"Under Mao Zedong, it would have meant maintaining Mao's absolute power, while in the wake of Deng Xiaoping's suppression of the Tiananmen Square protests, it would have meant the dictatorship of the Communist Party," he said.

"Today, the overall situation is the one-man dictatorship [of Xi Jinping], which means that the party will destroy whatever it needs to destroy, and strip people of whatever rights they have to maintain it," Feng said.

The topic has also prompted a number of comments on social media as people tried to figure out what the new phrase actually means.

"Some netizens have quipped that the overall situation ... is that some people have wealth beyond the imagination of most people, but they have to keep it secret," blogger "Looking at History, Looking at Reality," wrote on the Netease blogging platform.

"Meanwhile, some people are so poor that they struggle to get enough to eat, but they have to be kept a secret too."

The blog post quoted another answer as saying: "Some people have amassed a large amount of wealth through various means and methods, and through family relationships, and they need to hide it and even transfer their wealth out of the country, to avoid public resentment."

"Of course, these are joke answers, but I personally think there's some truth in it," the blogger wrote.

Warrantless Phone Searches Allowed Under New Chinese National Security Regulations

07 May 2024, RFA

On April 26th, China's Ministry of State Security announced two law enforcement regulations which state that local law enforcement officers will be granted the power to inspect electronic devices. This means that, beginning on the implementation date of July 1st, tourists visiting China may have their phones or laptops checked by local officers. Customs officers in Shenzhen and Shanghai have already started randomly checking phones and laptops of incoming travelers.

The new "Administrative Law Enforcement Procedures" and "Criminal Case Procedures" regulations allow state security officers, with approval from superiors at the municipal level or above, to legally inspect individuals' and organizations' electronic devices, facilities, applications and tools. In emergencies, officers only need approval from municipal-level superiors to inspect someone's devices on the spot after showing their police or investigator credentials.

A Ms. Jiang returning from Shenzhen told Radio Free Asia that she saw customs officers checking a female tourist's phone at the border, asking if she had any other phones. Mr. Shao from Shanghai said he witnessed customs officers searching a man's phone after returning from Japan recently.

A Chinese legal scholar Lu Chengyuan said the regulations aim to create an atmosphere of self-censorship and fear of contacting foreigners or using encrypted messaging apps like Signal, violating constitutional free speech rights. He criticized the decision to allow administrative law enforcement officers to search phones without first obtaining a judicial warrant, calling it a blatant violation of privacy rights.

Another scholar, Mr. Liu, said that extending the justification of national security into people's everyday lives has created an omnipresent atmosphere of state security terror. The regulations lack clarity on what qualifies as an "emergency" allowing officers to search phones.

Macron, Xi call for worldwide 'Olympic truce' during Paris Games

06 May 2024, Politico

Chinese President Xi Jinping and French President Emmanuel Macron called for "a truce" in Ukraine and other global conflicts during the Paris Olympic Games.

"The world is far from being tranquil and, as a permanent member of the United Nations, China calls for a worldwide truce during the Olympic Games," Xi said Monday during press statements after a marathon day of talks in Paris.

Xi is on a two-day state visit to France, which also takes him to the Pyrenees where Macron enjoyed childhood holidays with his grandmother. It's the Chinese leader's first visit to Europe since 2019.

Hungary and Serbia — two countries that have signaled their closeness to Moscow — are next on Xi's itinerary.

Sitting alongside Xi at the Elysée Palace, Macron thanked his Chinese counterpart for backing his idea of a temporary truce. "I thank you for showing your desire during our talks to ask all parties to have an Olympics truce," he said.

The French president also hinted a possible opportunity to work toward a ceasefire between Russia and Ukraine. "Maybe this could be an opportunity to work toward a sustainable resolution [of conflicts] in the full respect of international law," he said.

Macron had previously called for an 'Olympic truce' during the upcoming Paris games in the face of ongoing international conflicts including the war in Ukraine.

Talks of a truce, however, go against the signals coming from the battlefield in Ukraine, where Russian forces have taken advantage of Ukraine's dwindling supplies in recent months while also reportedly gearing up for a possible offensive in the coming months. A French diplomat said a truce could help start a more political process, but noted that European demands on territorial integrity would remain unchanged.

Xi and Macron also discussed China's ongoing support for Russia's leader Vladimir Putin, amid repeated calls from France for the Asian powerhouse to use its influence to halt Russia's aggression against Ukraine.

With heavy sanctions on Russia impacting the country's trade with the United States and the EU, China now supplies Russia with the lion's share of its consumer goods as well as key technologies for the battlefield. The two sides enjoy what Xi has called a "no-limits partnership."

Macron, meanwhile, welcomed Chinese "commitments" to "abstain from selling any weapons" to Russia and "closely control the export of dual-use equipment," saying that such statements were "reassuring."

Xi in turn warned Ukraine's backers against focusing too much on Beijing's support for Moscow, hinting at Washington's role in the conflict. "We oppose those who use the crisis and throw the responsibility on a third party, and call for a new Cold War," he said.

Earlier in the day, Xi, Macron and their wives attended an official welcome ceremony at the Invalides monument in Paris, during which the French Republican Guard played the national anthems of the two countries. They also reviewed the troops and exchanged pleasantries about the features of the 17th century monument.

The Chinese leader held three-way talks with Macron and European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen that focused on the brewing trade war between the EU and China. During opening comments, von der Leyen warned that Europe "would not waver from taking action" to defend its interests as it pursues several investigations into suspicions of unfair trade practices in China.

China has jailed more journalists than any other country

04 May 2024, Tibetan Review

The People's Republic of China is the world's largest prison for journalists, and its Communist party-state conducts a campaign of repression against journalism and the right to information worldwide, said Paris-based global press watchdog Reporters Without Borders (RSF), releasing its 2024 World Press Freedom Index on May 3.

Although China's ranking has improved to 172nd out of 180 countries – compared to 179th last year – it is still the world's largest jailer of journalists, with more than 100 currently detained, the group said. Those ranking below China include Bahrain, Vietnam, Turkmenistan, Iran, North Korea, Afghanistan, Syria, and Eritrea in that order, with the group's analysis being based on political, economic, legislative, social, and security indicators.

The group has noted that the Propaganda Department of the Chinese Communist Party sends a detailed notice to all media – all state-owned or controlled – every day that includes editorial guidelines and censored topics. The state-owned China Global Television Network (CGTN) and Radio China International (RCI) spread the regime's propaganda all around the world.

This is because to the ruling regime, the media's function is to be the party's mouthpiece and to impart state propaganda. Independent journalists and bloggers who dare to report "sensitive" information are often placed under surveillance, harassed, detained, and, in some cases, tortured.

Journalists with the state media are kept on a tight leash. They are required to download the "Study Xi, Strengthen the Country" propaganda application that can collect their personal data in order to receive and renew their press cards.

The group said that to further silence journalists, the government accuses them of "espionage", "subversion", or "picking quarrels and provoking trouble", three "pocket crimes", a term used by Chinese law experts to describe offences that are so broadly defined that they can be applied to almost any activity.

Besides, independent journalists can also be legally placed in solitary confinement for six months under "Residential Surveillance at a Designated Location" ("RSDL") in China's "black prisons", where they are deprived of legal representation and may be subjected to torture.

The group accuses President Xi Jinping, in power since 2012, of having restored a media culture worthy of the Maoist era, in which freely accessing information has become a crime and to provide information an even greater crime.

While China's state and privately-owned media are under the Communist Party's ever-tighter control, the administration creates more and more obstacles for foreign reporters.

The Chinese regime uses surveillance, coercion, intimidation and harassment to keep independent journalists from reporting on issues it deems "sensitive", the group said.

The report was released on the day designated by the United Nations as the World Press Freedom Day.

Chinese Communist Youth League Reports Membership of 74 Million

03 May 2024, News CN

On May 3rd, the Central Committee of the Communist Youth League announced that, as of the end of December 2023, there were 4.167 million Communist Youth League members and 4.316 million Communist Youth League organizations across the country. In 2023, a total of 4.605 million new members were recruited.

The youth league has 3,000 local committees, 193,000 grassroots-level committees, and 4.12 million branches. There were 1.905 million school organizations with 38.245 million members; 910,000 enterprise organizations with 7.21 million members; 360,000 organizations in government agencies and public institutions, along with 4.419 million members; 942,000 organizations in urban streets, townships, residential communities, and administrative villages, with 21.737 million members; and 199,000 organizations within societal groups and other fields, with 2.556 million members.

China's amended secrets law sparks fears over widening state powers

01 May 2024, RFA, Jing Wei and Chen Zifei

Law broadens the definition of what makes a 'secret' while new rules extend state security police powers.

Soldiers dressed as ushers stand guard in front of the Great Hall of the People before the opening session of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) in Beijing, China, Saturday, March 3, 2012.

Recent changes to the way the Chinese government will investigate cases involving "state secrets" and sensitive information have sparked concerns that foreign nationals and companies could be a target of a renewed focus on security under ruling Communist Party leader Xi Jinping, analysts told Radio Free Asia.

China's newly revised State Secrets Law, which takes effect on Wednesday, sets higher security requirements for companies and introduces the concept of a "work secret," while a slew of guidelines from the Ministry of State Security gives new powers to state security police to investigate Chinese citizens outside China, and arrest them if they return.

"Everyone is definitely feeling the chilling effect now," U.S.-based current affairs commentator Li Hengqing told RFA Mandarin. "The more the Chinese Communist Party keeps going with this, the more it will discourage foreign businesses and entrepreneurs from investing in China."

"This runs entirely counter to preferential policies that would encourage foreign investment."

The Law on Safeguarding State Secrets was revised and adopted by the National People's Congress Standing Committee on Feb. 27, the latest in a slew of new security legislation to be passed by Beijing in recent months.

The move follows a number of police raids last year on foreign consultancy firms including Mintz Group and Bain & Co, prompting concerns from foreign investors that Beijing's widening national security focus could hurt investor confidence.

Taiwan's government warned its citizens on Tuesday to avoid non-essential travel to China, saying the amended law has "greatly increased the risk of potentially breaking the law."

"The risks for foreign institutions operating and investing in China will also put pressure on non-profit or academic and scientific research exchanges and cooperation," the Taiwanese government's Mainland

Affairs Council said, warning that conversations or any collection of information could run afoul of the new law, describing its definition of a "work secret" as vague and unpredictable.

According to the amended law, only the Ministry of State Security and military agencies have the power to decide what constitutes a state secret.

'Everything is seen as a secret'

Xia Ming, a professor of politics at New York's City University, said any foreign company operating in China will need to carry out market research, putting it at risk of violating China's growing body of security legislation.

"The first thing any company investing in China needs to do is carry out market research," Xia told RFA in a recent interview. "But China regards all kinds of data as confidential, because it touches on the political security [of the ruling party]."

"They think that even real economic data can be interpreted in a way that is politically unfavorable to the regime, so everything is seen as a secret," he said.

Li said the ongoing insistence on "national security" under Xi Jinping suggests that the current administration is willing to sacrifice economic growth on the altar of regime stability.

"Everything is done with the stability of the regime in mind," Li said. "They don't admit that this will come at the expense of the economy, but actually they don't care much about that, nor about the welfare of the people."

Xia said none of the recent amendments appear to target those higher up who have access to highly classified documents.

Instead, they are aimed at ordinary people or foreigners who might get hold of sensitive information, he said.

'An invisible expansion of powers'

Independent political commentator Chen Daoyin said the new provisions from the Ministry of State Security massively expand the powers of state security police to dictate the actions of organizations throughout China, if it deems that "national security" is at stake.

"State security agencies will be able to go into other organizations to carry out activities and provide training," Chen said. "If some organizations aren't doing enough to protect national security, they can tell them to do better."

"This is an invisible expansion of the powers of state security agencies ... making their presence felt in all areas," he said.

Exiled human rights lawyer Wu Shaoping agreed.

"State security police can hold the Sword of Damocles and use it to extract confessions from criminal suspects, even if they choose not to talk during interrogation," Wu said.

The effects of the new regulations will also be felt far beyond China's borders, he warned.

"If a Chinese citizen goes abroad and makes comments critical of the Chinese Communist Party, or blows the whistle on some scandal, or leaks information that the Chinese government considers secret, state security police will be able to arrest him if he one day returns to China," Wu said.

"Through these provisions, the Chinese Communist Party is engaging in long-arm law enforcement on foreign soil, and reaching out its tentacles to Chinese living overseas," he said.

April

China Vows Reforms at Long Delayed Party Conclave Amid Challenging Economy

30 April 2024, US News

A paramilitary police officer stands guard, on the day of the opening session of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), in front of the Great Hall of the People, in Beijing, China March 4, 2024. REUTERS/Tingshu Wang/File Photo

BEIJING (Reuters) -The Chinese Communist Party's central committee will gather in July for a key meeting known as a plenum, the third since the body of elite decision makers was elected in 2022, focusing on reforms amid "challenges" at home and complexities broad.

Plenums are important events on China's political calendar that require the attendance of all of the party's central committee, comprising 205 members and 171 alternate members with President Xi Jinping at the helm.

The central committee typically holds seven plenums between party congresses, which are held once every five years. The current central committee members were elected at the last party congress in October 2022.

Further deepening reforms and promoting the modernisation of China will comprise the main agenda of the third plenum, state-run Xinhua news agency reported on Tuesday, citing the party's elite political bureau, or politburo, during a regular meeting.

Third plenums have been typically held in the autumn since the 1990s. The party was widely expected to hold one in either October or November 2023, but it did not.

"The meeting had been expected to happen late last year but was postponed without explanation," said Julian Evans-Pritchard, head of China economics at Capital Economics.

"We should get a better sense of the leadership's medium-term reform priorities during the third plenum."

The plenum will open amid a subdued economy, with the massively indebted property sector, once accounting for a quarter of gross domestic product, a major drag on household sentiment.

The economy still faces many challenges, with "effective demand" still lacking, the pressure on enterprises sizable, and risks and hazards in key areas numerous, Xinhua reported, citing the politburo meeting.

"Domestic circulation is also not smooth, and the complexity, severity and uncertainty of the external environment has obviously increased," Xinhua reported, adding China's economic foundation remained stable.

'CHINA COLLAPSE THEORY'

China has not collapsed as predicted by the "China collapse theory," nor will it peak as forecast by the "China peak theory," Xi said in March.

"I have repeatedly emphasised that reform and opening up are crucial tools for contemporary China to catch up with the times. China's reform will not pause, and its opening-up will not cease," he said.

"We are planning and implementing a series of significant measures to comprehensively deepen reform."

Third plenums have typically focused on reforms, after the end of the Cultural Revolution in the late 1970s. Some closed-door meetings have left a long-lasting and historical impact on the economy.

The third plenum in December 1978 under Deng Xiaoping initiated China's economic reforms, igniting the transformation of the world's most populous nation from a centrally planned backwater to a global economic powerhouse.

In November 2013 the central committee at a third plenum vowed to let markets play a "decisive" role in allocating resources in the economy.

While a third plenum in February 2018, held atypically early that year, urged the party to "unite closely" around the central committee with Xi at the "core", and proposed the removal of a constitutional clause limiting presidential service to two terms.

Days later, China's largely rubber-stamp parliament voted to remove presidential term limits, allowing Xi to stay in office indefinitely.

(Reporting by Ryan Woo; Editing by Kim Coghill and Michael Perry and Miral Fahmy)

China's national political advisory body holds leadership meeting

29 April 2024, CGTN

The 14th National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference holds its 18th Chairperson's Council meeting in Beijing, China, April 29, 2024. /Xinhua

The 14th National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), the national political advisory body, held its 18th Chairperson's Council meeting in Beijing on Monday. Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the CPPCC National Committee, presided over the meeting and delivered a speech.

Wang stressed the importance of acknowledging the western region's significant role in China's overall reform, development and stability. He urged efforts to conduct in-depth research and active consultation to facilitate the advancement of the western region's large-scale development in the new era.

He also called on political advisors to solidly carry out CPC discipline education and ensure strict Party self-governance within the national political advisory body.

It was decided at the meeting that the Standing Committee of the 14th CPPCC National Committee will convene its seventh session from June 4 to 6.

During the meeting, a document on organizing study and research activities for members of the Chairperson's Council was deliberated and approved.

China to try former Tibet propaganda chief for corruption

25 April 2024, Tibetan Review

China has charged with corruption an official who was for many years responsible for promoting its official line on Tibet and human rights, including with a stint as the propaganda chief of Tibet Autonomous Region, before rising to be the top legislator of Shanghai, official Chinese and other media reports cited prosecutors as saying Apr 24.

The prosecutors have accused Dong Yunhu, 61, of using his positions, such as head of the seventh bureau of the State Council Information Office, head of the publicity department of the Communist Party of China Xizang [Tibet] autonomous region Committee, chairman of the Shanghai Municipal Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, to seek benefits for others, reported China's official chinadaily.com.cn Apr 24.

The report said he also used his power and status to seek undue benefits for others through other civil servants; that in return, he accepted a large amount of property and money. Prosecutors have said he should be held criminally responsible for the crime of taking bribes.

Dong's alleged crimes date back to 1999, when he was in charge of planning and publicising Beijing's official message on human rights and Tibetan affairs as the bureau chief at China's State Council Information office, reported the scmp.com Apr 24, citing prosecutors.

The corruption was alleged to have continued in other leadership roles.

Dong was stated to have trained as a philosopher and started his career at the Communist Party school, where he managed its School of Marxism and Human Rights Research Centre in the 1990s.

The report said he has published several books on human rights, including a 2011 study of the history and functions of human rights centres in various countries, and co-authored a compilation of facts and statistics about Tibet in 2008.

Dong's leadership role was reported to have begun at China's State Council information office in 1999, where he served as the office director for the China Society for Human Rights Studies, a state-led research body.

In 2011, he was posted in Tibet autonomous region to manage communication and propaganda work there. He went on to take up the same role in Shanghai in 2015, later becoming head of its legislative body.

He was indicted in Hefei, a city in Anhui province, an announcement published on the website of the Supreme People's Procuratorate was cited as saying. He was first placed under investigation for suspected corruption in July last year, making him the first ministerial level official to be purged after a major Communist Party reshuffle at the 20th party congress in Oct 2022, the report said.

Dong was expelled from the Communist Party of China, and removed from his public posts in Dec 2023. Later, he was arrested, and his case was handed over to procuratorial organs for review.

He is a native of Xianju, Zhejiang province. He spent much of his career working in publicity departments before he was transferred to the Shanghai Municipal People's Congress earlier this year, said the chinadaily.com.cn report.

Publicize the wealth and corruption of the CCP leadership

21 April 2024, Sunday Guardian

Global investigation into the wealth and corruption of the CCP leadership will show that the CCP's leaders are billionaires with untold wealth in New York, Switzerland, Dubai, London, Paris, and countless other locations.

A curious but often unreported fact about the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is that they are rich. The leadership is Communist, but also extremely wealthy. No Communist should be wealthy, it is like being a married bachelor, and the CCP are expert at hiding their wealth. Precisely how did the CCP leadership gain this wealth on their nominal salaries is an important issue for the global community to explore and, especially, for the Chinese people to know.

In an important effort in this regard, United States Senator Marco Rubio has inserted language into U.S. law which tasks the intelligence community of the United States to produce an unclassified—and thus publicly available report—on the wealth and corrupt activities of the leadership of the CCP. This includes the General Secretary of the CCP, Xi Jinping, and senior leadership officials of the Central Committee, the Politburo, the Politburo Standing Committee, and regional Party Secretaries. The Congressional Research Service (CRS) will also research this and produce a study to which all people around the globe will have access. The answers to these investigations are certain to be startling and capture the corrupt nature of the CCP. It underscores that the CCP rules China, but it is not the legitimate government of China. The CCP is illegitimate for three reasons. First, because they were formed and nurtured by the Communist International, and their seizure of power in 1949 was made possible by Stalin with his full backing and support in the wake of the defeat of Japan.

Second, as with the other poison fruits of the Bolshevik Revolution, because they seek to sustain the tyranny of the failed ideology of Marxism-Leninism on the Chinese people. The dependence upon this imported Western ideology means that at root the CCP's ideology of Marxism-Leninism, and its Chinese idioms, Maoism and later "Xi Jinping Thought," are illegitimate for China.

This ideology should be thought of for what it is: the last surviving form of Western colonialism, and despite the CCP's efforts, they cannot hide the fact that they are the product of this. The "Century of Humiliation," that defined Western imperialism in China from the First Opium War (1839-1842) to the CCP's victory (1949) in fact has not ended. More accurately given the CCP's colonial origins, China will soon realize its second century of humiliation. This causes a legitimacy crisis in China that provides justification for the Chinese people to labour to overthrow the CCP. Its fall would permit China to evolve into a polity which is in accord with the historical political culture of China. As a product of Western intellectual thought, Marx, Engels, and Lenin, the CCP lacks even the legitimacy of the Qing Dynasty (1644-1911/1912) who were foreign, Manchu rather than Han, but who ruled successfully in accord with China's dynastic ideology. Third, the CCP is vulnerable because of its abhorrent and contemptible leadership and the accelerated misrule of Communist dictator Xi Jinping. It possesses odious rulers who have forced China to endure decades of misrule. Seventy years of tyranny and wars against the Chinese people have led to scores of millions killed by the Chinese regime and the recognition by the Chinese people that the regime rules for itself, not for the people.

To call attention to the tyrannical and corrupt nature of CCP leaders, states can employ their resources to reveal the details of the corruption to the Chinese people and the world. This may be accomplished by employing their intelligence communities on this topic. Journalists may also find the topic worthy of investigation. Media, perhaps most importantly social media, may highlight the CCP's wealth and corruption to publicize and inform global populations.

Moreover, the community of nations may come together to identify the sources and location of the wealth of the CCP. What Sen. Rubio has started may be broadened. There could be a global initiative to document the wealth of the CCP leadership. Global investigation into the wealth and corruption of the CCP leadership will reveal the outlines of that base regime. No doubt, it will find that the CCP's leaders are billionaires with untold wealth in New York, Switzerland, Dubai, London, Paris, and countless other locations. While that has been long suspected, the revelation of the facts will be important for the Chinese people and the world to know.

The impact of this research would be magnified if other states, such as Australia, India, Japan, and EU members did as well. In Europe, Italy, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, the United Kingdom, among others, have taken important steps to highlight the risks of the PRC's economic warfare against the EU, and might provide the European anchor of such a global effort.

Efforts to de-legitimize and undermine the CCP are important for three reasons. First, strategically, the most effective strategy to defeat the CCP's ambition and to target the CCP's demise. The CCP's legitimacy crisis is at hand. They failed, as all Communist governments do. The Chinese people know it, the Party does, and likely Xi himself sees the truth.

Second, by accurately identifying its weaknesses, such as the obscene and ill-gotten wealth of its leadership, policies may be developed that assist its fall and permit states like India, Japan, and the United States to prepare for its demise. The ideological crisis of legitimacy, the increasing paranoid rule of Xi and ever-tightening circles of fear among the Party leadership provide important paths to the fall of the CCP. Accordingly, the study of the wealth and corruption of the CCP leadership contributes to its legitimacy crisis and hastens the end of the regime.

Third, exposing its corruption is essential for the global community to recognize its illegitimacy and that the CCP beyond the bounds of acceptable behaviour in international society. Thus, openly planning for a post-Communist China is an appropriate global response. The world has done this before. For instance, sanctioning the apartheid regime of South Africa while supporting Nelson Mandela in his struggle against the regime was ultimately successful. India, of course, led in this noble effort.

These actions that the global community, the Chinese Diaspora, and people of goodwill around the world may undertake will place the Party under pressure.

Knowing how many billions Xi, his family, and Party comrades have in overseas banks, properties, and other assets is significant to reveal the true corrupt nature of the CCP leadership, with specific amounts and locations documented. That will allow the victims of the CCP to move to seize those assets. Equally, it will allow the Chinese people and the world to see proof of the CCP's gross misrule and abuse of the country and the Chinese people. Bold actions may spark the events that lead to their overthrow.

China sees foreign threats 'everywhere' as powerful spy agency takes center stage

21 April 2024, Nectar Gan, CNN

In a slick video marking the National Security Education Day, China's top spy agency has a stern message for Chinese people: foreign spies are everywhere.

As ominous music plays, a broad-faced, beady-eyed man disguises himself as a street fashion photographer, a lab technician, a businessman and a food delivery driver – he even sets up an online honey trap – to glean sensitive state secrets in various places and industries.

"In the sea of people, you may have never noticed him. His identity is changeable and his whereabouts are hard to find," a narrator says. "They are everywhere, cunning... and sneaky, and they may be right here in our lives."

Eventually, Chinese police catch the spy in a dramatic ambush after state security authorities receive multiple tip-offs from the public.

"They can disguise as anyone. But among the crowds you and I together are protecting national security," the narrator concludes. "We 1.4 billion people are 1.4 billion lines of defense."

The three-minute video is the latest propaganda push by China's powerful civilian spy agency, the Ministry of State Security (MSS), to mentally arm the Chinese public against what it sees as the growing threat of foreign espionage.

Under Xi Jinping, China's most authoritarian leader in decades, the country's notoriously secretive spy agency has drastically raised its public profile and broadened its remit.

From a shadowy organization without any discernable public face, the MSS has been transformed into a highly visible presence in public life.

In Chinese cities, posters and slogans promoting national security are now a common sight on sidewalks, subway trains, campuses and billboards. On social media, the ministry commands a massive following with near-daily commentaries, short videos or even comic strips sounding the alarm about supposedly ubiquitous threats to the country.

Whistleblower alleges UN's 'dangerous favours' to China, Covid cover-up

17 April 2024, India Today

The whistleblower's allegation includes charges of two UN General Assembly presidents being bribed by China, harassment of NGO delegates by China, and editing of UN report on Covid-19.

A former employee of the United Nations' Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), Emma Reilly, has levelled serious allegations against the organisation. Reilly claimed that the OHCHR has been granting "dangerous favours" to the Chinese government, which she believes are part of China's broader strategy to use the UN for its national interests.

The written evidence was published by the UK Parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee. The evidence was submitted to it as part of its inquiry into international relations in the multilateral system. The Committee's inquiry focuses on how countries engage with multilateral organizations, whether through influencing them, working around them, or obstructing them.

Reilly's allegation includes charges of two UN General Assembly presidents being bribed by China, harassment of NGO delegates by China, and editing of a UN report on Covid-19. Reilly alleged that during the two-year negotiation of the Sustainable Development Goals, China paid bribes to two successive Presidents of the UN General Assembly.

These presidents "ultimately oversaw the process and had significant influence over the final texts put to the Assembly", the evidence mentions.

In one of the posts on X, Reilly also tagged Antonio Guterres, Secretary-General of the UN, and said he "fought hard" to keep quiet. "He knew he was breaking his own rules when he fired me - his Ethics tsar told him so," she wrote.

Additionally, Reilly claims that China imposed a secret condition on UN agencies, stipulating that funds provided by China cannot be spent in countries that have diplomatic ties with Taiwan.

Advance information on human rights activists

According to Reilly, the Chief of the Human Rights Council Branch in OHCHR, a French national, was secretly sharing advance information with China about human rights activists planning to attend the Human Rights Council.

"UN officials at all levels deliberately lied to member states, including the UK delegation, who enquired about the UN policy of handing names – including of UK citizens and residents – to the PRC (People's Republic of China) without their knowledge or consent".

Repercussions for NGO delegates

Reilly's evidence included chilling accounts of the consequences allegedly faced by NGO delegates whose names were shared with China in advance by the UN Secretariat. These delegates reported harassment, arbitrary arrests, house arrests, disappearances, torture, and in some cases, death of family members in detention.

One delegate, who attended only a side event, later returned to China and died in detention, Reilly claimed.

Additionally, China reportedly issued an Interpol red notice against an NGO delegate.

On Covid-19 reports being edited

Reilly alleged that reports from both the World Health Organization (WHO) and the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) on the origins of Covid-19 were edited to downplay the possibility of a laboratory leak.

Reilly's evidence was submitted before the UK Parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee, which held its first evidence session in the inquiry on April 16.

China's spy agency encourages people to see spies everywhere

16 April 2024, RFA

China's top spy agency is cranking up its propaganda campaign warning of foreign "spies" to mark National Security Education Day, in a bid to get more people to inform on each other and steer clear of anything linked to the West, analysts said this week.

Introduced by Chinese President Xi Jinping in 2015, National Security Education Day is observed every April 15 to raise public awareness about safeguarding China's national security, a core interest of the government.

The feared Ministry of State Security released a video detailing its "top 10" list of major espionage cases and a list of cases based on tip-offs from members of the public, including the "hostile foreign forces" that Beijing claims are behind the pro-democracy movement in Hong Kong, and calling for greater public awareness of foreign "espionage" activities.

Part of the video features a Chinese-American shown to confess to allegedly being recruited as a spy by U.S. intelligence, who appealed to his sense of patriotism and "fooled" him into betrayal.

The man, surnamed Liang, goes on to say he regretted it greatly and warns readers: "I want to tell all Chinese people: Their (American) sweet words are fake."

The man is in his 70s and is said in the video to have been sentenced to life in prison in China in 2023.

Elastic definitions

The Chinese authorities have typically employed a highly elastic definition of what constitutes a state secret, and national security charges are frequently leveled at journalists, rights lawyers and activists, often based on material they post online.

"Comprehensive measures are needed in terms of raising awareness of safeguarding national security," the ministry, which included a top 10 list of public tip-offs, as well as details of "awards" handed out to people who made "significant contributions."

The video warned that university teachers and students were targets for foreign infiltration, mirroring international allegations about China's activities on overseas campuses.

Beijing also promoted National Security Education Day education in far-western Tibet and Uyghur-populated Xinjiang, where authorities impose particularly heavy-handed control to suppress what Beijing says are growing separatist – and in the case of Xinjiang, terrorist – threats.

Chinese nationals abroad were also warned to be vigilant.

"Through various means such as emotional solicitation, seduction and corruption, financial purchase and offering help, overseas spies have tried every means to recruit and instigate Chinese officials, researchers and Chinese personnel working overseas, posing a serious threat to China's national security," the film warned.

Claims of foreign espionage

Amendments to the Counter-Espionage Law in April 2023 further broadened the scope of material that can be used to back up allegations of spying, including the kind of data that could be gathered for market analysis.

They also give authorities new powers to access corporate facilities and electronic equipment, which have already been used to target foreign consultancies.

Feng Chongyi, a professor at the University of Technology in Sydney, said claims of foreign espionage are there to help shore up Communist Party leader Xi Jinping's grip on power.

"They want to keep eyes on everyone, everywhere, and watch everyone," Feng said. "They feel they don't have enough people to do this, despite already having around four million police officers, which is quite a lot."

"So, they need to mobilize the masses and give them the right to enforce the law and do the authorities' dirty work for them," he said. "That means people informing on each other, setting people against each other, and everyone watching everyone else."

In January, police arrested the head of a foreign consultancy firm as an alleged British spy, with one newspaper warning that there are "007s" everywhere in real life – a reference to the fictional British secret agent James Bond whose code name is 007.

The ministry list features Canadian nationals Michael Spavor and Michael Kovrig, along with Belizean national Henley Lee, who was accused of funding the 2014 Occupy Central pro-democracy movement in Hong Kong, also known as the Umbrella Movement. Lee was paraded on state TV in a heavily stage-managed confession in 2021 and accused of "funding hostile elements in the U.S., colluding with foreign anti-China forces to intervene in Hong Kong affairs, and funding the implementation of criminal activities that endangered our national security," in connection with the 2014 Hong Kong protests.

Spavor and Kovrig were among eight Canadian nationals detained in China within weeks of the arrest of Huawei executive Meng Wanzhou in Vancouver in December 2018. All three were released almost simultaneously after Meng made a deal with U.S. investigators over allegations that she broke U.S. sanctions, ending her house arrest.

The party's grip on power

Veteran journalist and political commentator Hu Ping said the "national security" campaign is a political tool that will help ensure the stability of the regime.

"What they are doing is trying to get everyone to inform on each other," Hu said. "It claims to be about national security, but actually it puts the interests of the Communist Party's grip on power above everything else."

Hu warned that such an approach will cause "widespread panic" and put a huge strain on interpersonal relationships.

"That atmosphere is entirely conducive to the authorities' control over the people ... and could lead to a large number of false claims and miscarriages of justice," he said.

Veteran journalist Tang Jingyuan said the ministry's lists were carefully curated to give the impression that anything that has to do with the West is suspicious.

"It replicates the tactics of class struggle from the Mao era," Tang said in a reference to Mao Zedong, influential Chinese leader and founder of the People's Republic of China, whose revolutionary ideology shaped the country's history from 1949 to 1976.

"The aim is to create an atmosphere that is anti-Western, or at least wary of the West ... and that keeps its distance from foreign countries," she said.

Hong Kong

Authorities in Hong Kong, which recently added a second national security law to its statute book, staged a series of lavish ceremonies to mark the day, which critics say has become a focal point for "brainwashing" of Hong Kongers by the ruling Chinese Communist Party amid an ongoing crackdown on public dissent.

Beijing's envoy to Hong Kong, Central Liaison Office director Zheng Yanxiong warned that the government would fight back, using "tit-for-tat cognitive warfare" against critics of the Safeguarding National Security Law, which extended an ongoing crackdown on dissent and political opposition in the city begun in the wake of the 2019 protest movement.

"Some ill-intentioned foreign forces have been bad-mouthing China and Hong Kong ... and even some renowned Western media have jumped on the bandwagon, slandering and smearing," Zheng said, in a reference to criticism of the new law, known as Article 23, in the media.

Current affairs commentator Sang Pu said Beijing is continuing to claim that Hong Kong is a "base" from which "foreign forces" will try to infiltrate the rest of China, despite the fact that the majority of opposition politicians and activists are either behind bars or overseas now.

"It's all a kind of packaging, and is definitely not factual," Sang said of the claim. "They claim that large amounts of money have poured into Hong Kong since June 2019, but it's all fake news."

"They want to shift everyone's focus from the tyranny, incompetence and corruption of the Chinese Communist Party and the Hong Kong government to 'infiltration by foreign forces,'" he said.

Tibet

In monasteries, schools, and villages in Lhasa, capital of the Tibet Autonomous Region, authorities emphasized the need to protect state secrets, promptly report any activities threatening national security, and defend the country and resist aggression.

Authorities also stressed the ban on communication with the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, and the exiled Tibetan community, considered by China as "separatist groups," and on restricting the sharing of domestic information with the outside world, a source inside Tibet told Radio Free Asia.

Experts on the region said the measures were initiated without any legal basis and were intended as a suppression tool to be used against Tibetans and other ethnic minorities.

"The Chinese government asserts that national security education strengthens the totalitarian power of the Chinese Communist Party," said Dawa Tsering, director of the Tibet Policy Research Institute in Dharmasala, India. "In the interests of the party, Tibetans are often accused of national security violations and breaking the law."

China's National Security Education Day initiatives include official interpretations and terminologies, such as "state power, ruling power of the state, unitary sovereignty and complete territorial integrity," but in Tibet, they primarily refer to banning contact with the Dalai Lama, he said.

Every year, there are reports of Tibetans who have been arrested, arbitrarily detained, disappeared or sentenced for alleged involvement in national security violations in Tibet.

The arrests and sentencing of Tibetans for such alleged crimes underscore Beijing's continuing drive to destroy the influence of men and women whose views of life in Tibetan regions of China go against official Chinese narratives.

Xinjiang

In Xinjiang, to the north of Tibet, officials are broadcasting a national security education public course for 10 days, according to an April 14 statement on the website of the Department of Justice of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region.

"Through a variety of online and offline propaganda and education activities, we will further promote the overall national security concept to be deeply rooted in the hearts of the people and build a common national security defense line," the statement said.

Other activities were held in specific areas of the vast region, home to more than 11 million Uyghurs.

National security themes were promoted on educational billboards and banners in the People's Park in Ghulja, called Yining in Chinese, capital of the Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture, beginning on April 7. On the same day, authorities held a publicizing activity on the laws and regulations on overall national security and border security was held in Tajik township of Pishan county in Hotan prefecture.

The Hongmiaozi police station under Shaibak district's Bureau of Public Security in Urumqi, Xinjiang's capital, held a public lecture on China's Cybersecurity Law and Anti-Espionage Law in many communities on April 13.

On the same day, the Public Security Bureau in Akesu prefecture held a police camp where children learned about security awareness to improve their ability to recognize acts that endanger national security.

Translated by Luisetta Mudie and by Tenzin Palmo for RFA Tibetan. Edited by Roseanne Gerin and Malcolm Foster.

It helped China enforce zero-Covid. Now the community 'grid' network is going 'professional'

11 April 2024, Phoebe Zhang, SCMP

A 'basic system of professional community workers' must be built within five years, Communist Party and State Council say in joint notice

Network will aim to 'maintain social stability and consolidate the party's long-term rule', as Beijing continues drive to strengthen central control

President Xi Jinping, whose inspection trips regularly include community work sites, has called on party cells at the community level to become real "fortresses" and build a real connection with people on the ground. Photo: Weibo/Xinhua

China has rolled out new rules to strengthen its nationwide network of community workers, the group that was once key to enforcing its "zero-Covid" strategies on the ground.

The stronger network would aim to "maintain social stability and consolidate the party's long-term rule", China's cabinet and the ruling Communist Party's central decision-making body said in a joint notice released on Wednesday.

According to the State Council and the party's Central Committee, a "basic system of professional community workers" must be built within five years. Workers' political awareness and skills must also be enhanced, with secure pay, the document said.

It comes amid a drive in recent years to strengthen central control, as Beijing seeks ways to minimise risk and conflict down the line to the lowest levels of governance to ensure social stability.

Last year, the Ministry of Public Security pledged to deploy more officers to police stations, and rural and urban residential communities, to defuse the risk of social unrest.

President Xi Jinping's trips around the country regularly include community work sites. He has also called on party cells at the community level to become real "fortresses" against challenges to the party's rule and build a real connection with people on the ground.

According to Wednesday's notice, community workers are those who take part in party-building, social management and services at the grass-roots level. They are either assigned to the posts from other state-related bodies or recruited from within the community.

Existing community "grid" workers, such as those recruited during the Covid years to track public movement, could also be incorporated into the teams if they had the required qualifications, the notice said.

The top priority in hiring should be a "political standard", in that the workers "follow the party's lead, obey laws and disciplines, and are enthusiastic to serve the people".

The notice set a target of 18 community workers for every 10,000 residents, encouraging each region to recruit people from nearby neighbourhoods, with priority given to college graduates and military veterans.

The teams will serve the community in a "grid" system, carrying out door-to-door visits to pair with residents in need of help and run errands for them if needed.

In return, the workers will be paid wages on a par with the local average and enjoy social security benefits. There will also be awards for those taking part in emergency or natural disaster rescue and recovery missions.

The “grid” system is the government’s decades-old social management and surveillance tool, which divides cities and counties into smaller zones. The person in charge of each zone must report to the local government regularly, and be ready to take the blame if things go wrong under their watch.

During the Covid-19 lockdowns, with their border and movement controls, the grid system became even more active. “Grid controllers” were tasked with reporting unusual activities to their superiors, keeping an eye on residents’ health and ensuring food and medicine supply as entire communities were locked down.

But concerns were also raised about the invasion of privacy and overzealous enforcement.

As local governments imposed stringent anti-pandemic restrictions, grid workers sometimes took unduly radical measures to carry out orders on keeping transmissions down. People complained of workers breaking into their homes to disinfect the furniture, and even putting down pets.

Chinese Communist Party Suffocates Christians; The West Should Take Heed.

08 April 2024, Uzay Bulut, Europe Conservative

Wang Yi, a Christian pastor in China, regularly asked during his sermons that Chinese President Xi Jinping and his regime repent of their sins. He also publicly stated the Church should be separate from the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). In response, he and his wife, Jiang Rong, were arrested by Chinese authorities along with over 100 members of his church. Pastor Wang led the Early Rain Covenant Church in Chengdu. At the time of his arrest, the church had hundreds of worshippers.

A closed trial was held in December 2019 and Pastor Wang was given no access to a lawyer. He was sentenced to nine years in prison for engaging in the “subversion of state power” and “illegal business activity,” also known as “crime of fraud.” The pastor was stripped of his political rights for three years and fined 50,000 yuan ($6.9k USD).

According to ChinaAid, an international Christian human rights organization,

At the height of the Sinicization of Christianity, Wang Yi released ‘A Declaration for the Sake of the Christian Faith,’ which over 400 house church pastors and leaders signed with their real names. This document resulted in his arrest.

The U.S. State Department’s Office of International Religious Freedom issued a statement regarding Pastor Wang on October 20, 2023:

Pastor Wang has not been given permission to speak to his family by phone or receive visits from them in the past two years. He has only been allowed to see his wife once since his initial arrest. It is unacceptable that the Chinese government is denying him regular in-person visits and communication with his family, including phone calls, and that he has not been allowed a Bible, notebook or pen.

Pastor Wang remains imprisoned. Meanwhile, the CCP’s crackdown on Christians continues.

On 12 January 2024, another pastor in China, Kan Xiaoyong, was sentenced to fourteen years in prison for “using superstition to undermine the law,” and engaging in business “fraud.” His wife, Wang Fengying, was sentenced to four years. A co-worker, Chu Xinyu, was sentenced to ten years. Another three defendants received three-year verdicts. According to the Bitter Winter, which covers religious liberty and human rights related issues in China, those heavy prison sentences aim at “destroying the successful Discipleship Home Network.”

Bob Fu, a Chinese-American pastor and founder of ChinaAid, explains that, in China, this accusation called “crime of fraud” is common. A Christian who tithes by putting an offering in a church’s donation box might be arrested for engaging in “the crime of fraud.” Pastors who preach online, or those Christians who donate online to churches, also face these accusations.

“Hundreds or perhaps thousands of house church leaders have been arrested and charged with the so-called crime of ‘business fraud.’ Simply, the Communist Party has criminalized tithing and offering,” Fu said. “Their logic is that [these churches] are an illegal, unregistered organization. They do not use the word ‘church.’ They do not refer to the church as a ‘religious institution’ so that they will not be criticized by the foreigners; so they use this so-called business crime or fraud.”

On 26 January 2024, ChinaAid published a report entitled “Crime of Fraud: A New Era of Persecution against Christians by the Chinese Communist Party”: For decades, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has sought to dismantle Christian churches who refuse to register with the government-run Three Self Patriotic Movement. In the name of Sinicization, that is recreating religion to better align with Party ideals, Christians have been targeted with repeated arrests, raids, and harassment at the hands of authorities. The CCP ushered in a new era of persecution beginning in 2018 by charging pastors, church leaders, and other Christians with crimes of fraud.

Since 2018, explains ChinaAid, the charges would often follow these steps:

Authorities prohibit house churches from being registered as legal entities. They accuse house churches of being illegal groups. They accuse house church leaders of being illegal clergy and label house churches’ collection of offerings as fraud.

Many churches and pastors, as well as Christian individuals, are victims of false fraud charges. Evangelist Chen Lijun, for instance, was arrested on August 13, 2022 in Luanchuan county. This was simply because he purchased some Christian books online. He was quickly charged on suspicion of fraud.

In its 2023 report, ChinaAid shed light on the CCP's open oppression of Christians in the ongoing campaign referred to as the "Sinicization of Christianity." According to the report, Sinicization aims to undermine and disband churches, replacing Christian faith with Communist Party loyalty. The Sinicization of Christianity is codified into Chinese law.

The persecution of churches and Christians in China, according to the report, takes place through the oppression of churches and interruption of regular church activities. It further includes opposing Christianity, restricting evangelism, and suppressing social activities, persecution of justice-seeking Christians in public spheres, persecution in economic, social, cultural, and academic spheres, and fraud charges against house churches for receiving tithes and offerings. "Few Christians and churches, if any at all, were left untouched by the persecution efforts of the Chinese government," says the report.

Another way China attempts to "Sinicize" Christianity is by changing or rewriting the Bible. CBN News reported in 2023:

China's ruling regime announced in 2019 its plans to release a new translation of the Bible that will include Confucian and Buddhist principles.

"This new translation ... would really support the Communist Party," explained Todd Nettleton, the spokesman for The Voice of the Martyrs (VOM)—a persecution watchdog serving Christians.

One example of a Bible passage rewritten by the CCP is John 8. This Bible story centers on Jesus' love and corrective compassion for a woman caught in adultery. In the real version from the Bible, Jesus says, "He who is without sin among you, let him be the first to throw a stone at her," after which the crowd begins to leave. Then Jesus tells her, "Go now and sin no more." In a version reportedly found in a Chinese textbook published in September 2020, the crowd disperses, but the text falsely claims that "When everyone went out, Jesus stoned the woman himself."

Tina Ramirez is the president of Hardwired, an organization vocally critical of the Chinese Communist Party. She said that the CCP's rewriting of the Bible is an attempt to force Christians to leave their faith. A full list of ChinaAid's past annual reports shows an increase in persecution cases over the years.

Pastor Fu further explains that, in China's government-sanctioned churches, pastors are forced to pledge absolute allegiance to Xi Jinping's thoughts. The pastor should install a Communist Party flag and place a picture of Xi Jinping behind the pulpit. Before service starts, the Communist national anthem should be sung. If none of these steps occur, then the regime says the church is not compatible with socialism and communism. As a result, church pastors are intimidated, and some are even arrested. Fu says that the Chinese Communist Party prescribes that those under 18 years old, students, Communist Party members, communist Youth League members, and civil servants are not allowed to enter any church building. This prohibition includes state-controlled churches as well. China has entered the period of the worst persecution against Christians in the 40 years since the cultural revolution, Fu concludes.

This persecution targets Christian children as well. A 2020 report by the human rights NGO Jubilee Campaign, entitled "China Bans Faith for All Children," describes the religious freedom violations that Christian, Tibetan Buddhist, Uyghur, and Falun Gong children face in China. According to the report, Christian children are punished, threatened, excluded, and rebuked for their families' and their own religious affiliation ... Christian children under the age of 18 years are prohibited from attending religious worship services and events ... They are prohibited from receiving religious education and face persecution for revealing their religious affiliation in school.

Christian children and their teachers are forced into anti-religious and pro-atheist indoctrination excursions and programs ... Christian families are wary of private worship as a result of the government's multi-faceted crackdown on religion.

In May 2018, for instance, 13-year-old Wang Chenyang (pseudonym) of Zhucheng, Shandong Province, was restricted from attending his school's Children's Day festival performance because he was a Christian. Wang reported that, after finalizing the rehearsal on the day of their performance, the school's principal informed the class that any student with a religious affiliation would be prohibited from participating in the performance.

China has managed to deploy artificial intelligence and facial recognition to track Christians. The Communist Party deploys facial recognition cameras in churches. If they refuse, they are shut down. Jin Mingri, also known as Ezra Jin, was the pastor of the Zion Church of Beijing, one of the city's largest house churches with nearly 1,500 members. In 2018, it refused to install surveillance cameras in its sanctuary, so the authorities shut down the church and placed the pastor under house arrest. Reuters reports that the church is now banned and its materials have been confiscated.

According to Open Doors, an organization that monitors Christian persecution on a global scale, there are over 96 million Christians in China. Open Doors reports:

The Chinese Communist Party's goal is to make sure churches don't fall out of line with official viewpoints. In the case of official churches, this means they are encouraged to praise and pledge allegiance to the Communist Party and its ideology. ... Most churches are monitored and can be shut down without warning.

The CCP is persecuting Christians through many methods, including but not limited to rewriting the Bible, refusing to recognize churches as places of worship, impoverishing church communities by accusing them of "illegal business activities," prohibiting children under 18 from attending church, forcing Christian children and their teachers into pro-atheist indoctrination activities, placing surveillance cameras even on the pulpits of churches, allowing only one state-controlled church to operate within exceedingly strict limits, shutting down house churches, jailing pastors for refusing to worship the communist party ideology. Is this the type of persecution that is coming to Western nations? Given the hostility towards Christianity of many left-wing and woke political parties and organizations in the West, Western Christians should take heed.

Li Qiang: Middleman for Xi?

03 April 2024, Natalie Liu, VOA News

Speculation has been spreading about the future, role, and place in China's power structure of Premier Li Qiang since the unexplained cancellation of a routine press conference he was expected to hold last month. It was arguably the biggest news about Li, a figure largely unknown to the outside world, since he took office a year ago.

Analysts tell VOA that to better know Li, it is important to understand his place in China's leadership structure – highly centralized under Communist Party General Secretary Xi Jinping's tight rule – and the two men's past together, which stretches back two decades.

Path to premiership

Li was born in 1959 in a rural area of China's coastal province Zhejiang. His family is rooted in the farming communities of Zhejiang, and Li started out working as an industrial laborer at the age of 17 after he graduated from high school.

His background differs sharply from that of his boss, Xi Jinping, whose father was one of China's first generation of Communist Party leaders. His background is also different from that of his immediate predecessor, Li Keqiang, who studied at the prestigious Beijing University and whose father was a local party official.

Li Qiang's climb within the ranks of the Chinese Communist Party began after studying at an agricultural college in his home province. After graduating in 1982, Li did not work in factories or in the rural communities again.

From 2000 to 2002, Li presided over the Zhejiang provincial bureau of commerce. In 2002, at age 43, he rose to become the youngest Communist Party secretary of Wenzhou, known to be a capital of entrepreneurs, in his native Zhejiang province.

That same year, Xi Jinping moved from Fujian, another coastal province, to lead Zhejiang as its party secretary, directly overseeing Wenzhou and other municipalities.

It was during Xi's tenure in Zhejiang, from 2002 until he left for Shanghai in 2007, that the two men had opportunities to know each other. From 2004 to 2005, Li served as the chief of staff to Zhejiang's provincial Communist Party committee, essentially Xi's chief of staff. His portfolio soon expanded to include membership in the provincial Communist Party standing committee, deputy provincial party secretary, head of the provincial political and legal affairs committee, and governor of Zhejiang.

Li was promoted to party secretary in neighboring Jiangsu province in 2016 and a year later to party secretary of Shanghai. He was placed in the premiership in March 2023.

"It is fair to say that all of his later promotions happened thanks to Xi," Xia Ming, a China-born political science professor at the City University of New York, said in a phone interview with VOA.

Wenzhou model

"It's worth noting that Li is closely tied to what is known as the 'Wenzhou model,' which resembles what is known in the West as liberal economics," Xia added.

What enabled the private entrepreneur-led "Wenzhou model" to succeed, Xia said, was local Communist Party officials' non-interference at the time, which stands in contrast with the party's heavy-handedness today.

"Now that Li has joined Xi's cabinet, whatever model he might have been tied to will have to succumb to the Xi model," Hu Ping told VOA. Hu Ping is a native of China's south-central Sichuan province and received his degrees from Beijing University in the 1980s, before entering into exile in the United States. Hu Ping is editor emeritus of China Spring magazine.

Steve Tsang, author of The Political Thought of Xi Jinping, explained to VOA in a phone interview from London how he sees the Xi model: "What Xi Jinping is trying to do is to create one country, one people, one ideology, one party, one leader," Tsang said.

Unlike Li Keqiang, who landed the job due to support from party elders, Tsang added, Li Qiang was hand-picked by Xi and is expected to do Xi's bidding.

While Li Qiang's appointment to succeed Li Keqiang is seen as an attempt to solidify the above model, there were signs that Li Qiang's ties with the Chinese business community from his years working in Zhejiang, Jiangsu and Shanghai might be tapped to help Xi solve some of the country's economic challenges.

Potential mediator

The Economist reported in March of last year that Li Qiang had a hand in persuading one of China's most famous businessmen, Jack Ma, to return to China. Ma, like Li, a native of Zhejiang, had reportedly fallen out with Xi amid crackdowns on private enterprises and Ma's increasing popularity, both at home and abroad. Ma was said gone into self-imposed exile in Japan.

Li was "trying to reassure wealthy private entrepreneurs that, though they should know their place, they are still valued by the party," according to the article.

Despite assurances to Ma and private entrepreneurs, China's economy continues to face big challenges, including falling foreign direct investment and outflow of capital.

Li Qiang's predecessor, Li Keqiang, was known for his straight talk on China's economy and calling for a more domestic welfare-centered approach, in contrast to the state power-centric and expansionist model put forth by Xi.

In May 2020, Li Keqiang told reporters at the National People's Congress press conference that more than 40 percent of China's population of 1.4 billion live on $143 a month, remarks seen as a rebuke of the official line that poverty has been eliminated all throughout the country under Xi's leadership.

Li Keqiang even developed an index for measuring China's economic growth that was deemed more reliable than local government figures because it looked at railway cargo volume, electric consumption and loans disbursed by banks.

Li Qiang, who stepped into Li Keqiang's role a year ago, is widely seen as a Xi protégé whose key job is doing the bidding of China's leader. Whether that might include other mediation efforts on behalf of Xi in China's political and economic power struggles remains to be seen.

"To be a middleman, or power broker, you need to have a certain amount of sway on both sides," said City University of New York's Xia Ming. Putting his loyalist credentials aside, Xia said Li is also under pressure to show his ability to take care of the Chinese Communist Party's pocketbook.

Mao Zedong's old saying that political power grows out of the barrel of a gun has since been amended, Xia adds. To stay in power, the money bag is a key factor as well.

Xi's article on putting people first to be published

03 April 2024, Xinhua

BEIJING – An article by Xi Jinping, general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee, on putting the people first will be published on Monday.

The article by Xi, also Chinese president and chairman of the Central Military Commission, will be published in this year's seventh issue of the Qiushi Journal, a flagship magazine of the CPC Central Committee.

It is a collection of excerpts from Xi's relevant discourses between November 2012 and December 2023.

The article stresses that the people are the creators of history and true heroes, highlighting the original aspiration and mission of Chinese Communists to pursue happiness for the Chinese people and rejuvenation for the Chinese nation.

Standing on the people's side represents the fundamental political stance of the CPC, and it is what distinguishes a Marxist political party from other political parties, says the article, adding that everything the Party does is to realize, safeguard, and advance the fundamental interests of the greatest possible majority of the people.

The article lauds the people as the decisive force in building China into a great modern socialist country in all respects and emphasizes a people-centered development philosophy.

It is important to ensure that the gains of modernization benefit all the people fairly, says the article, calling for more notable and substantive progress in promoting common prosperity for all.

March

CPC leadership reviews disciplinary inspection report

31 March 2024, ECNS

The Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee met on March 21-22 to review a comprehensive report on the second round of disciplinary inspection missions of the 20th CPC Central Committee. Xi Jinping, general secretary of the CPC Central Committee, presided over the meeting.

It was noted at the meeting that the CPC Central Committee with Comrade Xi Jinping at its core has attached importance to disciplinary inspection work, and has arranged two rounds of such inspection missions since the 20th CPC National Congress, which had covered all centrally-administered enterprises. It was pointed out at the meeting that Party-building work in centrally-administered enterprises and relevant government departments had been strengthened, with new achievements in terms of the Party's full and rigorous self-governance. But there are still some problems that must be taken very seriously from a political standpoint and addressed earnestly.

Inspections and rectifications followed must be taken as the pivot for promoting high-quality development and exercising full and rigorous Party self-governance. Organization and leadership must be strengthened to see that key parties assume their primary responsibilities, and problems, tasks, and responsibilities must be put on a list, so as to ensure that every problem has a solution and feedback. Oversight over inspections and rectifications must be strengthened, key officials and events be placed under tight scrutiny to make sure that every case is addressed as required. An accountability system must be established for rectifications to ensure that those who are perfunctory or cheat in the rectifications will be strictly held to account.

It was emphasized at the meeting that state-owned enterprises (SOE) are the crucial material and political foundation for socialism with Chinese characteristics. It is imperative to uphold and consolidate Party's leadership, and thoroughly study and put into practice Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era. SOEs must perform their duties and fulfill their missions in a down-to-earth manner, and must uphold General Secretary Xi Jinping's core position on the CPC Central Committee and in the Party as a whole, and uphold the Central Committee's authority and centralized, unified leadership. They must ensure both development and security, be vigilant against potential dangers, be prepared to deal with worst-case scenarios, resolutely prevent and mitigate risks and ensure high-quality development with high-level safety.

It is imperative to make advances in exercising full and rigorous Party self-governance, with rigor being maintained for the work in every aspect. Oversight of "top leaders" and leaderships must be strengthened, and crackdown on corruption must continue to be carried out with a high hand. Cases must be studied and used for promoting rectification of conduct and Party governance so that the soil and conditions that breed corruption will be eliminated.

It is imperative to conscientiously implement the Party's organizational line for the new era and strengthen the building of leaderships, ranks of officials, talent pool as well as grassroots Party organizations. What has been achieved from disciplinary inspections must be put to good use. It is also essential to conduct in-depth research on common and deep-seated problems discovered in disciplinary inspections, further improve the related systems and mechanisms, and tackle not only symptoms but also root causes.

China spy agency fingers consultancies as espionage threat

31 March 2024, VOA News

China's Ministry of State Security issued a fresh warning this week about overseas spy agencies and what it says are their efforts in recent years to obtain state secrets under the disguise of consulting agencies.

The six-minute video released Thursday on the ministry's official WeChat social media account reenacts what it says was a real case where overseas spy agencies instructed a consulting firm to steal classified information from a Chinese company seeking to invest abroad.

The release of the video comes as Chinese leader Xi Jinping met this week with American CEOs in a bid reassure them that China remains open for business, despite concerns about its economy and worrying signals from the authoritarian government.

Over the past year, foreign investment in China has shrunk as supply chains shift to other countries while Chinese authorities have rolled out a new anti-espionage law and used exit bans to keep business executives and others from leaving the country. It has also carried out raids on consulting and due diligence firms.

During the same period, the Ministry of State Security has ramped up its use of social media to raise the alarm about foreign spies.

Its latest video – the fourth since it launched its social media account last year – has the feel of a spy thriller with dramatic music and fast-paced video elements and graphics.

It tells the story of an executive at a Chinese company who is pressed by a consulting firm representative on a string of questions, including the company's total profit, the technical parameters of its products, and how its products are used by the Air Force.

In a WeChat post released with the video, the ministry warned about the national security risks that consultancy agencies pose.

"The seemingly normal investigation conducted by consulting firms are in fact attempts to illegally acquire our commercial secrets and efforts to suppress our advantageous industries," the ministry wrote, adding that these consulting firms are accomplices to foreign spy agencies aiming to infiltrate key sectors in China.

Intimidation campaign against Chinese citizens

Some experts say the video is tailored to the Chinese audience rather than foreign investors since the video is purely in Mandarin and features the arrest of a Chinese national working for a foreign consulting firm.

The purpose of the video is "to inform and intimidate Chinese citizens by telling them that the government is watching them," said Dennis Wilder, a former U.S. national security official. He added that the campaign will likely create a chilling effect among Chinese citizens, especially those working for foreign companies.

Over the last year, Chinese authorities have raided several American companies' offices in China and detained some of their Chinese employees. Companies affected include due diligence firm Mintz Group, business consulting firm Capvision, and management consultancy Bain & Company.

Chilling effect for new foreign businesses

While the campaign focuses on Chinese citizens, Wilder said Beijing's efforts to safeguard national security will also create a chilling effect for foreign businesses trying to enter the Chinese market.

Unlike big foreign companies with an established presence in China, such as Apple or Qualcomm, he said companies that have no presence in China need to conduct due diligence. "They have to understand what their counterparts in China are all about, but if they can't conduct due diligence, they won't invest in China," he told VOA in a video interview.

A survey conducted by foreign business groups in 2023 suggests foreign companies are increasingly pulling investments and operations out of China. Survey data show that only 45% of American companies view China as their primary or among their top three investment destinations while 66% of the companies surveyed by the European Union

Chamber of Commerce in China said they found operating in China has become increasingly difficult. Despite foreign companies' lack of confidence in the Chinese market, some analysts say the Chinese government thinks efforts to safeguard national security and enhance foreign investors' confidence in the Chinese market are not mutually contradictory.

"Beijing believes that while they try to attract more foreign businesses to invest in China, they also should ensure key national interests, such as core data or key infrastructure won't be easily obtained by foreign businesses," said Hung Chin-fu, a political scientist at National Cheng Kung University in Taiwan.

He said Beijing's approach will be met with deep suspicion among foreign businesses. "At a time when the Chinese government has laid out many red lines in the name of national security, investing in China will be like walking on thin ice for foreign companies," he told VOA by phone.

As foreign businesses will likely remain hesitant to increase their investment volumes in China, Wilder thinks Chinese leaders may have different views on whether to prioritize efforts to attract more foreign investment or the need to safeguard national security. "For Xi Jinping, I think if he has to choose between foreign investment and economic growth and what he perceives as national security, he will always come out on the national security side," he told VOA. But for other Communist Party leaders who must consider economic growth, such as Chinese Premier Li Qiang, Wilder thinks their consideration will be different from Xi's.

U-M study reveals how China's local bureaucrats struggle for power through negative media coverage

19 March 2024, Michigan News

Recent research on China's factional competition uncovers how local bureaucrats, who are connected to influential national leaders, strategically use the media to criticize members of rival factions, harming their promotion prospects and weakening their factions.

Led by Ji Yeon (Jean) Hong, associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan, the research analyzed millions of media reports in Chinese national and regional newspapers spanning from 2000-2014, along with information on the political networks of elite Chinese bureaucrats. It mapped out patterns of behavior among local bureaucrats in leveraging negative media coverage to attack political rivals.

Given the limited freedom of local media on criticizing local governments, provincial leaders linked to strong national leaders, such as Politburo Standing Committee members, encouraged local media to cover negative political incidents such as corruption investigation in other provinces.

More importantly, when reporting on others, provincial leaders are more likely to target provinces connected to weaker national political leaders. The bigger the power gap between the national leaders, the more frequent the negative reporting is.

"This suggests that factional competition encourages strong factions to attack weaker factions more frequently than the reverse," Hong said. "This often leads to power consolidation, strengthening strong factions and weakening weaker factions."

The research further explores the consequences of such negative news coverage on the promotion prospects of provincial leaders. It finds that these negative reports indeed harm the reported-on cadres and their factions.

Specifically, news reports on corruption substantially reduce the promotion chances of the reported-on province's party secretary, the top local political leader, who is likely to hold political responsibility and suffer a substantial disadvantage if more corrupt cadres are caught within his or her region. While leaders of provinces where the media reports on other provinces' corruption cases enjoy a higher probability of promotion.

Even though the Chinese personnel system, including promotion, demotion and allocation of party cadres, is not transparent, one of the factors that the Communist Party formally emphasizes in cadre evaluation is public perception. Without an electoral mechanism, it is not straightforward to elicit the public's evaluation of a cadre or its governance, but the media strongly affect public opinion in China. In such circumstances, the media role is critical.

The research covers the period ranging from the end of the Jiang Zemin administration to the beginning of Xi Jinping's regime. The Hu Jintao and Wen Jiabao administrations, which constitute the bulk of the period under analysis, are not typically framed as a period in which one faction or one top leader dominated others. Furthermore, during this period intellectuals within the party actively debated the possibility of intraparty democracy.

"This implies that the recent personalization of power in China's central politics might not be a unique feature of the current leadership, but an outcome of latent behavioral patterns in China's elite politics," Hong said.

This study is published in the April 2024 issue of Political Science Research and Methods.

Detailed measures stipulate place name translation from foreign language must not compromise China's territorial claims, sovereign rights

16 March 2024, Global Times

China's Ministry of Civil Affairs on Friday published implementation measures addressing the management of geographical names, which detailed the requirements for translation of place names in ethnic minority or foreign languages into Chinese characters.

Set to take effect from May 1, 2024, the implementation measures stipulated in Article 13 that "place name in foreign language that may harm China's territorial claims and sovereignty rights shall not be directly quoted or translated without authorization."

Translation of place names in foreign languages or minority languages should comply with standards formulated by related organs of the State Council. The standard translations are made public through notices, the national database for geographical names and official publications on geographical names, according to the implementation measures.

The measures released on Friday also clarified that names of a person, company or trademark should not be used as geographical names and specified the general rules and procedures of naming or renaming localities.

The State Council issued a revised regulation on place names in April 2022, which is applicable to naming, renaming, usage, cultural protection and other management on geographical names within Chinese territories.

Analysts noted the newly released implementation measures are made in accordance with the revision.

Zhi Zhenfeng, a research fellow with the Institute of Law at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, told the Global Times on Saturday that geographical names are not only directly related to administration and everyday life, but also carry legal and sovereign implications.

Standardization of name translation helps confirm the scope of a geographical name refers to and all administrative rights and public geographical services (mapping and navigating, weather forecast, etc) are based on that, Zhi explained.

As China still has disputes over some territories with certain neighboring countries, the use of geographical names of places in disputes directly relates to sovereign rights. Using the incorrect translation or non-standard translation could cause confusion and encroach China's territorial integrity, Zhi stressed.

Analysts mentioned the example of maritime disputes in the South China Sea with countries like the Philippines. When referring to islands and reefs concerned, the use of standard translation is a firm declaration of sovereignty and transliteration of foreign names means concession of legal rights.

The Ministry of Civil Affairs standardized the names of 11 places in Zangnan (the southern part of Southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region) in Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin in April 2023.

Experts told the Global Times that the move is meaningful in safeguarding national sovereignty, maintaining peace in border regions and managing border-related matters at a legal level. Using standard place names helps raise awareness of Chinese territory.

The April 2023 issuance was the third list of standardized geographical names in Zangnan published by the ministry. The first list of the standardized names of six places in Zangnan was released in 2017, while the second list of 15 places was issued in 2021.

What to expect at China's 'Two Sessions' amid sagging economy, party drama

03 March 2024, Aljazeera

The Chinese government's Two Sessions are taking place in Beijing [File: Mark R Cristino/Pool via Reuters]

China's "Two Sessions" kick off in Beijing on Monday with the meeting of the National People's Congress (NPC) and the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC).

The event brings together China's political elite, as well as leaders in business, tech, media, and the arts. Known as lianghui in Chinese, the concurrent meetings are an annual fixture of China's legislative agenda and run for approximately two weeks.

During the period, legislators will approve new laws, political appointments, and government work reports detailing the progress of various departments such as the Ministry of Finance and the National Development and Reform Commission.

What are the major developments to watch?

During last year's Two Sessions, delegates officially approved Xi Jinping for an unprecedented third term as president.

This year, the event is likely to be dominated by China's lagging economy, which is grappling with slowing growth, deflation, massive debt and falling exports.

One of the most important events to watch will be Premier Li Qiang's delivery of the annual work report, which will review the government's accomplishments and set goals for 2024.

Li is expected to set an economic growth target of about 5 percent for 2024 and discuss headline issues from China's falling birth rate to the future of tech and artificial intelligence (AI) regulation.

A number of key appointments could also be made.

Over the past year, 11 members of the NPC's Standing Committee – the legislature's 175-member permanent body – have been removed, including Minister of Foreign Affairs Qin Gang and Minister of Defence Li Shangfu.

Those who were removed had ties to the military, including the People's Liberation Army (PLA) Rocket Force, which oversees China's nuclear and conventional ballistic missiles.

What is the difference between the two sessions?

The NPC and the CPPCC are both Chinese state institutions that are technically separate from the Communist Party of China (CCP), but much of their work is dictated by it.

On paper, the NPC is officially China's highest legislative body with nearly 3,000 members representing the country's provinces, autonomous regions, big cities, the PLA and the People's Armed Police. The NPC also has delegates representing self-governing Taiwan, which is claimed by the CCP even though Beijing has never exercised control over the island.

During the NPC, delegates review progress on policy goals and vote to approve new legislation and senior political appointments, although most delegates in reality have little political power.

The NPC Standing Committee is widely viewed as more powerful than the legislature in practice, despite being technically subordinate, as it meets regularly between legislative sessions.

"The NPC is not a parliament in the sense of a democratic parliament where the representatives are elected through fair elections. Its deputies are elected by a small portion of the Chinese population under the guidance of the Communist Party," Adam Ni, co-editor of the China Neican newsletter, told Al Jazeera.

"That is to say, the deputies of the NPC are at least acceptable to the party."

The CPPCC, which meets at the same time and brings together 2,000 plus delegates from across China and the diaspora, is a political advisory body that functions as more of a public relations exercise.

Delegates are not necessarily members of the CCP, although the meeting is part of its "United Front" efforts to align different actors on common causes and spread China's influence.

CPPCC delegates include leaders in tech, the arts, media, and leaders from semi-autonomous Hong Kong and Macau.

"The CPPCC performs several functions, including facilitating elite networking and directing policy advice from outside the party to the party-state. It operates as a means of trade, where the Communist Party provides access to the system and recognition through granting membership, while the elites sitting on the body gain access to policymakers and receive recognition," Ni said.

Is the NPC just a 'rubber stamp' parliament?

The NPC is often referred to as a "rubber stamp" parliament or legislature, as its main function is to formally approve premade decisions and it features little, if any, overt debate.

China watchers say that the NPC is still important to watch.

It can incorporate limited popular input on issues that are not considered too sensitive and, on rare occasions, has featured displays of dissent.

Most famously, one-third of delegates in 1992 voted against or abstained from approving the Three Gorges Dam, a controversial project to dam the Yangtze River.

"People refer to the NPC as a 'rubber stamp' because it has never voted down any bill, work report, budget, or nomination presented to it. But that unduly narrow focus on the NPC's vote outcomes alone, in my view, ignores the important role played by the thousands of NPC delegates in representing citizen interests on a range of politically non-sensitive issues," Changhao Wei, a fellow at Yale Law School's Paul Tsai China Center, told Al Jazeera.

While you will not hear delegates debating on the floor, individual delegates and bodies such as the NPC Standing Committee can shape legislation as it is being drafted and provide input on issues like the national budget.

Delegates can also submit individual bills calling on the NPC to act on important issues of the day.

In 2022, delegates submitted multiple bills focusing on women's rights and domestic violence in response to public outrage over the case of a trafficked woman with mental health issues who was found chained up by her husband.

While these bills were not debated publicly, they would not have gone unnoticed within the government either, Wei said.

Ni said although the CPP maintains an ironclad grip on power, the party is not a monolith, "but contains a multitude of interest groups and networks".

"There are also non-party groups and personnel involved in the lawmaking process," Ni said.

"We shouldn't discount their agency, eg, advocates of women's rights, environmentalists, because they can have an impact. But the influence and power of non-party individuals and groups are constrained by the political structure, where the party monopolises the instruments of state power."

China's premier won't meet the press after 'two sessions' for first time in 3 decades

04 March 2024, South China Morning Post

For the first time in three decades, the Chinese premier will not host a press conference at the end of the annual parliamentary sessions, which began in Beijing on Monday.

It will also be scrapped for future years of the current National People's Congress' term barring exceptional circumstances, said Lou Qinjian, spokesman for the NPC, China's top legislative body. The press conference – first held in 1988 and established as a customary practice in 1993 – is one of the most anticipated events of the annual "two sessions", when the top political advisory body and legislature meet.

It is one of the rare occasions when a top Chinese leader takes questions from local and international media. Those questions are often tightly scripted and chosen in advance, but it offers the outside world a chance to hear directly from a high-ranking official on policy directions.

In particular, it has been seen as a platform for China to indicate its diplomatic priorities, not only in terms of the questions selected but also which country's media they come from.

It also makes the premier a more familiar face globally than other Chinese leaders – including the president and Communist Party secretary – who seldom talk directly to outside media.

But Lou said that after a review, the leadership had decided to scrap the press conference since it often overlapped with similar events during the two sessions.

Premier Li Qiang will deliver the government work report to the NPC on Tuesday morning, followed by two written reports from the National Development and Reform Commission and the Ministry of Finance outlining plans and the budget.

"It should be said that society's major concerns have been specifically addressed in the [government] reports," Lou said on Monday. "They will be publicised so that the media and the public can learn about their content easily."

There will be at least three press conferences during the two sessions, including one given by Foreign Minister Wang Yi.

Observers said that while the change might come as a surprise, it was in line with China's political development.

"The party's leadership has been firmly established over the past decade. The State Council's role is now mainly about implementing the party's decisions," according to veteran China watcher Wang Xiangwei, a former editor-in-chief of the South China Morning Post.

"The role and status of the premier, who heads the State Council, is therefore adjusted accordingly."

He said that was already reflected in arrangements for state leaders meeting the chief executives of Hong Kong and Macau on duty visits.

Previously the chief executives held separate meetings with the president and the premier. But last year they reported only to the president, with the premier sitting in on the meeting.

"It is also a reflection of Li Qiang's pragmatism. He focuses on major policy directions, which are all clearly spelled out in his work report," Wang said. "He doesn't think an additional press conference is necessary as the ministers are in a better position to elaborate on detailed policies, and they will all have press conferences."

But he said the Chinese leadership could bring back the practice in future if it was deemed necessary.

Another observer, who spoke on condition of anonymity, agreed it reflected the change in power dynamics in China.

"The premier's job is now mainly to do with the economy and social affairs. However, the questions asked at the presser are usually about foreign affairs and China's grand strategy," the observer said.

"It would be strange for Li to answer those questions as foreign affairs are increasingly centralised in the hands of the party chief, President Xi Jinping."

While the foreign minister nominally reports to the premier, Wang stepped into the role from a higher rank after Qin Gang was sacked from the job without explanation in July. Wang reports directly to Xi.

The observer said Li could also have decided not to hold the press conference as a way to show loyalty to Xi, so that more focus is on the president.

But Wang said there could be a negative impact.

"This is still the only opportunity for a top Chinese leader to have live televised interaction with foreign media. Even though it is a highly scripted event, it's a chance for everyone who is interested in China – particularly foreign investors – to hear directly from the Chinese leadership," he said.

"This will be an opportunity missed for China to explain itself, and it may increase the perception of China's lack of transparency. It will have a huge impact on China's image to the outside world when it comes to openness."

Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said the change was likely to be part of revisions made by the cabinet to its work rules a year ago, noting that an amended version of the related law would be endorsed during the NPC session.

"[This] clearly shows the fundamental changes in China's party-government relationships in the past few years," he said.

The revised work rules state that the cabinet will closely follow instructions from the party leadership, and provisions related to government transparency were removed.

"It will have only taken a year from the revision of the internal work rules to the revision of the guiding law," Wu said. "Li Qiang is certainly pushing this very hard to show his loyalty."

Jens Eskelund, president of the European Union Chamber of Commerce in China, expressed regret that the premier's press conference was cancelled.

"Transparency and engagement with international media are important for enabling the global audience to understand China's priorities and its assessment of the domestic and global situation," he said. "We hope the press conference will be reintroduced next year."

David Lie Tai-chong, a Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference member from Hong Kong, said he believed the press briefing was dropped as part of efforts to "streamline" the two sessions.

China's top political advisory body concludes standing committee session

02 March 2024, Xinhua

The 14th National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), or China's national political advisory body, closed the fifth session of its standing committee Saturday in Beijing. Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the CPPCC National Committee, hosted the closing meeting and delivered a speech.

Praising the concrete progress the CPPCC National Committee has made over the past year, Wang noted that the year of 2024 marks the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China and the founding of the CPPCC.

The CPPCC should carry on its fine tradition, stay committed to its political responsibility, actively offer advice and build up consensus for advancing Chinese modernization as well as pool wisdom and strength for fulfilling the national economic and social development goals, Wang said.

He also called for efforts to ensure the upcoming second session of the 14th CPPCC National Committee be held successfully.

The meeting reviewed and adopted documents including a draft agenda and the schedule of the annual session, a work report of the Standing Committee of the CPPCC National Committee, and a report on how the proposals from political advisors have been handled since the first session of the 14th CPPCC National Committee.

These documents will be submitted to the annual session for review.

Intrigue swirls about possible reshuffles as China's parliament convenes

02 March 2024, The Guardian

Thousands of delegates are due to arrive in Beijing this weekend for China's most high-profile political gathering, a closely observed series of meetings that will lay out the government's policy blueprint for the year ahead.

The event, known as the "two sessions", begins on Monday as China's parliament, the National People's Congress (NPC) convenes alongside a separate but parallel meeting of the country's top political advisory body, the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference.

The nearly 3,000 NPC delegates can amend the constitution, enact new legislation, approve the government budget and fill vacancies in state offices. But in reality the NPC is a rubber-stamp parliament. It has never voted down any item on the agenda, and the Communist party (CCP) holds the ultimate power over the state.

Nevertheless, it is a keenly watched political event. The premier, Li Qiang, will present the government work report, which lays out its plans for the year ahead, including the GDP growth target. And while no changes are expected to the position of Xi Jinping, who was granted a norm-busting third term as president at last year's NPC, personnel changes may be announced, after months of uncertainty about who is responsible for some of China's most important government departments.

The most significant changes are at the offices of the foreign minister and the defence minister. Speculation around the fates of Qin Gang, the former foreign minister, and Li Shangfu, the former defence minister, has swirled since the two men were removed without explanation from their positions last year, in a season of turbulence for China's government.

Qin has not been seen since in public since June, leading to rumours about his fate. This week Qin was removed as a NPC delegate, concluding his eradication from the levers of China's government.

Unlike other delegates who were "dismissed" from parliament, the official notice said Qin had resigned. James Palmer, a deputy editor of Foreign Policy, said in his China Brief newsletter that this indicated Qin's "fall from grace has been relatively cushioned".

Qin was replaced as foreign minister by his predecessor, Wang Yi, who is also the director of the more powerful CCP foreign affairs commission. Many experts believe that Wang's reappointment was intended to be temporary, with a replacement expected to be announced at this year's NPC. A likely candidate is Liu Jianchao, a senior party cadre who has travelled extensively in recent months to participate in diplomatic meetings.

Li, the former defence minister, was recently removed from the website of the CCP's central military commission.

The demotions of Qin and Li have left vacancies on the state council, China's cabinet. Li's vacancy may be filled by his replacement as defence minister, Dong Jun. But it is far from certain that Dong or any new foreign minister will be appointed to the state council.

Neil Thomas and Jing Qian, researchers at the Asia Society Policy Institute, said in a recent analysis that if the spots remained vacant, it "could suggest a higher degree of mistrust and paralysis at the centre of Xi's leadership and a poorer outlook for China's attempts to both manage tensions with the west and lead the global south".

Observers will be paying close attention to the government work report, which Li will deliver on Tuesday. He is expected to announce a relatively modest GDP growth target likely to hew closely to 2023's target of 5%.

There may be some modest fiscal support, although not the deep structural reform or more aggressive stimulus that many economists say is necessary to recharge China's struggling economy. That is because Xi's third term as China's leader has been characterised by a focus on national security, even at the expense of economic growth or business confidence.

Underlining this, on 27 February the NPC standing committee, which meets when the NPC is not in session, revised the law on state secrets, expanding the scope of sensitive information to "work secrets". The update requires government agencies to protect information that may not be a state secret but "would cause a definite adverse impact after leaking".

Although the law only applies to state institutions, Thomas and Qian said the widened scope of sensitive information "could affect firms that deal with China", meaning more uncertainty for businesses in China.

China's Xi Jinping calls for 'loyalty and honesty' from younger officials as morale runs low

02 March 2024, South China Morning Post

Chinese President Xi Jinping on Friday urged young and middle-aged officials to be loyal, honest and "keen on reform and innovation" in an effort to rally morale and encourage unity in the face of economic and social risks.

"[Young and middle-aged officials] must actively practice loyalty and honesty towards the party, and must make their political stance clear," Xi said, according to state news agency Xinhua.

He called on young cadres to strictly uphold the Communist Party's political discipline and rules, show honesty and maintain a high degree of unity with the party at all times.

The message was conveyed at the opening ceremony of a training programme for young and middle-aged officials on Friday at the Central Party School in Beijing, where Xi urged party organisations to nurture reliable and qualified successors.

"[Party members] should be strong promoters of good and clean political ecology ... resolutely oppose privileged thoughts and privileged behaviours, and maintain the political integrity of the party," Xi added.

He also called on them to guard against major risks and solve prominent problems.

Xi emphasised that young party members should be "selfless" and dedicate themselves to improving people's well-being. They should also be "keen on reform and innovation and dare to confront difficulties", he said.

Xi has previously highlighted the importance of innovation in China's modernisation path, saying it should be given a prominent position in overall development, according to an excerpt published last year in Qiushi, the party's theoretical journal.

"Chinese-style modernisation is an exploratory undertaking with many unknown areas that the country is required to boldly explore through reform and innovation, and we should never rigidly cling to an idea or approach without considering the reality of the situation," Xi said, according to the journal.

Morale is running low among China's public servants as Xi's sweeping anti-corruption campaign has increased the pressure on rank-and-file cadres, while the risk of social unrest is growing because of the country's economic slowdown.

Chen Daoyin, a political analyst and former professor at Shanghai University of Political Science and Law, noted that it was "party tradition" to train young and middle-aged officials at the Central Party School, where cadres learn to fill key party and state positions.

"The points emphasised in Xi's speech this year suggest prevalent problems among young and middle-aged officials, including the lack of a sense of responsibility and capability and low awareness of their roles," Chen said.

In January, Xi warned that the party should continue to fight corruption and other problems with "tenacity, perseverance and precision".

Later that month, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, China's top anti-corruption body, revealed that around 110,000 party officials faced disciplinary action last year.

China's former foreign minister Qin Gang and former defence minister Li Shangfu were also stripped of their titles and state councillor positions last year. The reasons for their dismissals have not been revealed publicly.

China economy gaining momentum despite calls for hardline US stance: senior diplomat

02 March 2024, South China Morning Post

China's economy is gaining momentum towards recovery and high-quality development as it becomes a "modern socialist country in all respects", a senior Chinese diplomat said on Friday, even as he denigrated American critics calling for hardline policies against the Asian giant.

The comments by Qian Jin, China's deputy consul general in New York, come as the administrations of Presidents Joe Biden and Xi Jinping seek to stabilise relations and build on good will following their November summit in California amid escalating US rhetoric ahead of the nation's presidential election in November.

"Some people have been hyping up [the] so-called 'China threat', advocating cutting China off from chips, slapping new sanctions," said Qian in prepared remarks.

"The stabilising momentum in China-US relations should not be disrupted by domestic politics."

Friday's statement, one of several over the past year by Beijing officials aimed at boosting investor and consumer confidence in China's struggling economy, was released amid a slew of headwinds.

Qian knocked detractors who voice "concerns and doubts" about China's economic development and who use such phrases as "struggling for momentum", "lack of drive" and "dragging down the world".

"This is further from the truth," he said. "The ship of China's economy is breaking turbulent waves of the global economy and moving steadily forward."

Qian argued critics should note that Beijing achieved its 5.2 per cent growth target in 2023.

In addition, China's economy remained a strong engine of global growth, he said, and planners had avoided "massive stimulus" for short-term gain given "sound and solid fundamentals".

Beijing has sought to project confidence as it tries to right its economic ship. Its swooning property market is a grave concern, accounting for some 25 per cent of the country's economy and about 70 per cent of household wealth.

On other fronts, local debt levels are mounting, and youth unemployment stood at 15 per cent in December. Last summer, the total surpassed 20 per cent, after which China's National Bureau of Statistics temporarily stopped releasing figures, citing a need to change how the index was calculated. Furthermore, deflationary fears have intensified, and consumers during the closely watched Lunar New Year period stayed cautious.

While the number of domestic tourists was up 34 per cent during the major annual holiday over last year – and 19 per cent above 2019 pre-coronavirus pandemic levels – average spending per person was nine per cent below 2019.

"In short, Chinese households are readily partaking in the service economy but remain frugal in their spending," said Michael Hirson of 22V Research, a New York-based investment research firm.

"Cautious household spending and investing has been a key factor behind weak domestic demand since the post-Covid reopening and we see few catalysts to reverse it any time soon," added Hirson, who served as the US Treasury Department's attaché in China from 2013 to 2016.

Qian countered that the economy was stable, saying 2023 grain output fell only slightly below 2022 levels, R&D spending held strong and a shift was under way to new sources of growth.

China continued to welcome foreign investors, he added, while electric vehicles, batteries, solar panels and new energy developments remained promising. Some economists noted overcapacity concerns, however.

The country's domestic EV sales could grow 25 per cent to 9.44 million units this year, according to a forecast by Citic Futures. That is down from annual growth rates of 31 per cent last year and 89 per cent in 2022.

Beijing has sought to tackle the mounting economic uncertainties, vowing to embark on a host of pro-growth policies. "Proactive fiscal policy must be moderately strengthened and improved in quality and efficiency," according to a statement from the Politburo on Thursday.

In a meeting with US business executives in Beijing on Wednesday, Chinese Premier Li Qiang touted the "huge demand potential" in advanced manufacturing, urbanisation, consumption upgrading and green energy transformation. He did so even as he criticised any move to decouple the two economies.

On trade, prospects for China look mixed, analysts said, as 2023 exports fell, the US has maintained its insistence on restricting exports of high-end semiconductors and other key technologies and Europe grows warier of Beijing's ambitious EV plans, which the continent has viewed as a threat to its own efforts.

But Qian said better Sino-American trade relations were mutually beneficial.

"Decoupling between us will not work and will produce no winner," the diplomat said. "For Chinese companies in the US, unreasonable tariffs, sanctions and suppression are most unwanted."

Beijing's bid to bolster confidence with foreign investors comes amid steep stock market declines – partially reversed after recent government intervention – and plunging sentiment.

According to an American Chamber of Commerce in South China survey released on Tuesday, 63 per cent of US firms in China were looking to reinvest in China, down 5 percentage points.

The same survey found that only 11 per cent of non-American foreign firms planned to reinvest in China, down sharply from last year's 71 per cent.

Trade tensions are also weighing on the economy. More than 60 per cent of American firms and over half of Chinese firms in the South China AmCham survey said they had been negatively affected by tariffs both from Beijing and Washington, with 85 per cent expecting bilateral trade tensions to worsen.

The low level of trust and ongoing mudslinging between the world's two largest economies was evident in this week's annual US assessment of China's membership in the World Trade Organization.

Washington accused Beijing of a "state-directed, non-market approach" and an array of non-market practices targeting industries for global market domination, according to the 80-page report.

The US added that China's socialist market economy "has turned decidedly predatory".

Beijing quickly denied the charges, countering Washington relied on "discriminatory" industrial policies that disrupt global supply chains and used "smear tactics and blame-shifting methods to cover up its violations and sabotage".

Qian on Friday contended doubters would be proved wrong. "The Chinese economy can handle ups and downs," he said. "The overall trend of long-term growth will not change."

Further fall from grace for disappeared former foreign, defence ministers in opaque world of China

01 March 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Mar01'24) – China said Feb 27 that the resignation from the 14th National People's Congress (NPC) by the months-long disappeared former foreign minister Qin Gang had been accepted, without any information on his whereabouts or current status. China also said Feb 27 that it's also months-long disappeared defence minister Li Shangfu had been removed from the Party Central Military Commission (CMC).

"Tianjin Municipal People's Congress Standing Committee has decided to accept Qin Gang's resignation as a delegate to the 14th NPC," reported China's official Xinhua news agency Feb 27. The decision came ahead of the opening of the NPC's 2024 session on Mar 5.

Qin, China's former envoy to the United States, took the office of foreign minister in Jan 2023. He disappeared from public view in Jun 2023 and was formally banished from his position as a state councillor in October.

Qin rose to power due to his personal relationship with Chinese leader Xi Jinping, and his downfall has left many questions unanswered. Some experts have even described him as Xi's most loyal servant, noted newsweek.com Feb 27.

Beijing has yet to officially explain Qin's dismissal as foreign minister, after he was removed from the post only six months into the role. The mystery around Qin's disappearance since June continues as various theories about his fate have been put forward, the report noted.

Meanwhile, it is also not clear when exactly Li Shangfu was removed from China's key military command body, said the scmp.com Feb 27.

Li, who had not been seen in public since late Aug 2023, was removed as defence minister and state councillor without explanation at a meeting of the NPC Standing Committee in Oct 2023. He had only been in the post for months.

The CMC is a parallel system for the party and the state, with the same membership. Li had already been removed from the state CMC in October, the report noted.

It added that Li is still a member of the party's Central Committee and retains his seat in the legislature.

Last year also saw a number of senior generals being removed from their commands, prompting speculation that President Xi Jinping's anti-corruption drive was deepening in the military. They included the leadership of the People's Liberation Army Rocket Force who are responsible for the country's nuclear arsenal.

Nine of those commanders were also stripped of their seats in the legislature in Dec 2023, with the NPC saying this month that they were suspected of "violations of discipline and the law", usually a euphemism for corruption, the report noted.

Also, the fate of Li's predecessor Wei Fenghe remains uncertain after he did not appear on a list of senior officials who received Lunar New Year greetings from the leadership – a common courtesy. Wei has not been seen in public since then.

Besides, the new Defence Minister, Dong Jun, a former head of the navy, has not yet been given the rank of state councillor or a seat on the CMC, something all previous defence ministers have received, the report noted.

February

China's embattled former foreign minister steps down as a lawmaker

27 February 2024, NBC News

Qin Gang was dismissed in July in one of China's biggest political surprises in years. He has yet to reappear publicly.

China's former foreign minister, Qin Gang, who has been missing from public view since June, has resigned from the national legislature, state media reported Tuesday.

Qin was dismissed as foreign minister in July, in one of China's biggest political surprises in years.

The 57-year-old served for only seven months before he disappeared from public view last June. The government announced a month later that he had been dismissed from his post. He has yet to reappear publicly.

Qin was replaced as foreign minister by his predecessor, Wang Yi.

According to a notice by the National People's Congress Standing Committee, the Tianjin Municipal People's Congress accepted Qin's resignation as a delegate to the upcoming annual parliamentary session.

Official websites no longer list Qin as a member of the State Council, China's Cabinet, but there has been no mention of whether he has been excluded from China's ruling Communist Party.

His disappearance came during a series of dismissals at the top echelons of the party that included former Defense Minister Li Shangfu and other top military officials.

Signs of overt political friction are extremely rare in China, especially since President Xi Jinping tightened his control over the country's politics, partly through an anti-corruption drive that purged scores of his presumed rivals.

Qin's and Li's ousters are believed to be part of a broader effort to reduce security vulnerabilities amid China's increasing competition with the United States and its allies.

The National People's Congress, China's rubber-stamp parliament, is to convene its annual session in early March and is expected to focus on the country's ailing economy.

China's economy expanded by 5.2% last year but is forecast to slow sharply this year, bogged down by a property crisis, high youth unemployment and massive local government debt.

The Wall Street Journal reported in September, citing people familiar with a briefing, that Qin was ousted over an extramarital affair he had during a previous posting as ambassador to the U.S. An investigation was focused on whether his conduct had compromised China's national security, according to the Journal.

Leaked document trove shows a Chinese hacking scheme focused on harassing dissidents

22 February 2024, Wisconsin Public Radio

A large trove of more than 500 sensitive technical documents posted online anonymously last week details one Chinese technology company's hacking operations, target lists and marketing materials for the Chinese government.

The majority of the operations appear to be focused on surveilling and harassing dissidents who publicly criticize the Chinese government, including on global social media platforms like X, formerly known as Twitter.

Target lists reveal victims from at least 14 governments from Pakistan to Australia, as well as academic institutions, pro-democracy organizations in places like Hong Kong, as well as the military alliance NATO. The company was also bidding for work to surveil the minority Uyghur population in Xinjiang, a broader Chinese government program that major global human rights' organizations around the world have heavily criticized. There are even pictures of custom devices used for spying, such as a recording device disguised as a power bank.

Cybersecurity researchers are still investigating different components of the leak, which was shared to the open source development website popular with programmers, called GitHub. However, experts from top U.S. cybersecurity companies including Google's Mandiant and Sentinel Labs have shared preliminary analysis of the contents of the leak, believing the documents to be authentic.

"We have every reason to believe this is the authentic data of a contractor supporting global and domestic cyber espionage operations out of China," said John Hultquist, the chief analyst for Mandiant Intelligence, a part of Google Cloud. "This leak is narrow, but it is deep. We rarely get such unfettered access to the inner workings of any intelligence operation. We are working hard to learn as much as we can and put it to good use."

The state-affiliated company, called i-Soon, is known to be one of many contractors and subcontractors who compete for opportunities to perform hacking and surveillance operations for different Chinese government agencies. The company is currently facing litigation from another Chinese contractor called Chengdu 404, a company that the U.S. government has publicly linked in court documents to hacking operations for the state. It appears i-Soon may have done subcontracting work with Chengdu 404.

In previous public materials, i-Soon has noted relationships with China's Ministry of Public Security, Ministry of State Security, and People's Liberation Army, among others. The company is publicly known for providing cybersecurity trainings around the country from its base in Shanghai.

But beyond what's publicly known, the details in the leak give internal insights into how an increasingly competitive marketplace for hacking operations within China functions. It's unclear if all the claims made in marketing materials included in the leak are true, such as the ability to break into devices manufactured by top U.S. companies like Apple and Microsoft. However, it's clear that the company is heavily invested in automating the ability to constantly monitor platforms like X and Facebook. Those platforms, unlike the popular WeChat, are not controlled by the Chinese government, making them popular with dissidents.

There are also details in the leak concerning internal pay scales and other bureaucratic details of contracts with the Chinese government. There is a note, or "ReadMe" document, included on the GitHub page where the leak is hosted, where the purported source of the leak claims to be dissatisfied with the company's policies. That could indicate the source being a disgruntled employee, though it's also possible the leak is the result of an intelligence operation or the work of a competitor.

While the contents of the leak are not entirely surprising, they're especially helpful to specialists and researchers, who continue to review the contents. In particular, individual documents can help researchers fact-check their assumptions about who was responsible for previously discovered breaches.

China revamps discipline inspection rules to ensure Xi Jinping's instructions are carried out

22 February 2024, South China Morning Post

China's ruling Communist Party has revamped a set of rules to bolster its discipline inspections, making it a top priority to check whether cadres have fully implemented instructions from President Xi Jinping.

The party's Central Committee has released revised regulations on inspection work and issued a directive asking all regions and government agencies to strictly comply, the state-run Xinhua news agency reported on Wednesday.

According to Xinhua, the revisions were approved at a January 31 meeting of the party's 24-member Politburo and circulated within the party on February 8.

The revised regulations include a new clause that defines inspection work as the "political supervision" of party organs from the top down, according to the full text released by Xinhua.

A newly added paragraph at the beginning of the document states that the inspection work's "fundamental task is to resolutely safeguard the core status" of Xi, as well as his authority and leadership.

Another new section explains that the party's inspection team shall, as its top priority, check on the implementation of "major decisions and arrangements of the party's Central Committee, especially the implementation of General Secretary Xi Jinping's important speeches and important instructions".

The revisions also removed three articles detailing specific corruption and disciplinary issues to watch for, which had been a top priority in the previous version, and summarised them in a single paragraph that appears after the section about implementing Xi's instructions.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University in Beijing, said the revisions made it clear that inspection work was now largely focused on how closely China's different regions and government departments were following and executing Xi's grand plan.

"Beijing has learned a lot in the inspection work of the past decade and clearly wants to make sure previous cases in which the local government ignored Xi's repeated instructions do not happen again," said Xie, who is also a senior fellow at the Taihe Institute, a Beijing think tank.

Discipline inspection, which involves sending teams of senior inspectors to screen local disciplinary problems, has been a powerful tool for the party under Xi's leadership since 2012.

The practice gives corruption busters access to various state and party organs and state-owned enterprises so they can proactively search for leads on corruption. It has been credited by Beijing for uncovering many high-profile corruption cases.

The rules on discipline inspection were last revised in 2017.

"The focus has clearly been changed to checking on the political and work alignment of regions and government departments," Xie said, noting that the revisions added that a key principle of inspection work was to "focus on the party's central task and serve the big plan".

He said that meant that when Beijing issues new directions, its inspectors will make sure party and state organs recalibrate their work, leading them in the right direction.

The new code casts the inspection net wider. Under the revised rules, key state-owned enterprises, especially financial institutions, and state-run tertiary institutions will be targets for inspection, along with party committees in government agencies.

It also gives the inspectors much wider access to local government departments – including those for propaganda, security, auditing, finance, statistics and petitions – to support inspection work when necessary.

Tsinghua's Xie said this showed Beijing was determined to get accurate information and curb inflated official statistics.

"That is why the new code asked the inspectors to go directly to the ground for information, so they can spot misleading numbers from local governments and rectify them accordingly," he said.

The party made falsification of data a disciplinary violation in December, and last month Beijing sent stern warnings calling the practice "the biggest corruption in the statistical sphere".

China's would-be powerhouse Hunan wants officials to 'emancipate their minds'

19 February 2024, South China Morning Post

Communist Party officials in Hunan province in central China have kicked off a campaign which recalls Beijing's reversal of the Maoist political and economic doctrines of the last century, in a move that analysts say will have limited political implications.

According to a notice made public on Sunday, provincial cadres at all levels are taking part in the campaign, which started in early February and will continue until the end of March.

The campaign's name – "large-scale discussions on emancipating the mind" – was a clear reference to the party's efforts to kick off much-needed market reforms after the death of leader Mao Zedong in 1976.

President Xi Jinping, who came to power in 2013, revived the slogan to call for effective local governance and it was also in evidence on Sunday in the northeastern province of Heilongjiang, where top cadres used it in a pledge to drive growth.

Deng Xiaoping, who took over as leader in December 1978, made “emancipate the mind” his signature slogan as he paved the way for more than 40 years of reform and opening up.

Later Chinese leaders also used the slogan to urge the country to reflect on the lessons of Mao’s governance, especially during the Cultural Revolution – a decade of political and social upheaval that almost paralysed the national economy, and only ended after his death.

The latest “emancipating the mind” campaign is fundamentally different from the 1970s and 1980s, according to Chen Daoyin, a political commentator and former professor at Shanghai University of Political Science and Law.

“The biggest difference is their political orientations: the emancipation of the mind movement by Deng Xiaoping was to break the 10-year ideological imprisonment of the Cultural Revolution,” Chen said.

“Now in Hunan, it basically aims to strengthen Xi’s Thought and better serve Xi’s goals.”

Chen noted that the Hunan campaign adopted only the first part of Deng’s three-part proposition – “emancipate the mind, seek truth from facts, unite and look forward”.

As such, the campaign would not make a major difference because all discussions were confined within existing policy priorities, without seeking more fundamental breakthroughs, he said.

The Hunan notice placed strong emphasis on effectively reviving the economy, as well as paying homage to Xi’s teachings.

The discussions, taking place throughout the province, address problems with local cadres, including “lack of confidence in development” and “insufficient spirit of responsibility”.

At the same time, the campaign aimed to fundamentally reverse the “addiction” that leads to many officials simply relying on GDP growth for evaluations, the notice said.

Through the discussions, problems such as raising loans regardless of risks, investing blindly on projects, cheating on data, and “lying flat” to evade making mistakes should be resolved, it said.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University, said Hunan’s campaign was “a tactical attempt” to re-energise China’s massive bureaucracy.

Many officials have been accused of “lying flat” – the phenomenon commonly known in the West as “goblin mode”, which describes workers who put in just enough effort to keep their jobs and no more.

“After a decade of anti-corruption and disciplinary campaigns, many officials are in risk-aversion mode,” Xie said.

They were unwilling to take responsibility, push development initiatives or incentivise private sector growth “as they are afraid of making mistakes or facing supervision checks”.

“It seems that Hunan is trying to trailblaze a way to give its officials more freedom to act and more tolerance of their probable mistakes,” he said.

China’s economy is facing multiple challenges, including a prolonged property market downturn, a local government debt crisis, and weak demand, as well as heightened geopolitical tensions.

The International Monetary Fund expects the Chinese economy to grow by 4.6 per cent this year, before slowing to 4 per cent in 2025, despite last year’s higher than expected growth of 5.2 per cent.

Hunan – which has ambitions to become the most “important advanced manufacturing highlands of the country” – achieved 5 trillion yuan (US$702 billion) in economic volume last year at a GDP growth rate of 4.6 per cent.

The province – which has set a growth target of around 6 per cent for this year – is at a “critical stage of comprehensively deepening reform and opening up and promoting high-quality development”, according to the notice.

“More than at any time in history, Hunan needs to break the ice with ideas to lead reform breakthroughs.”

According to the notice, discussions should abide by the guidance of the party’s Central Committee and Xi, as general secretary, and focus on removing obstacles that hinder development, as well as other issues to “prevent and resolve various major risks”.

The notice also called on the province’s cadres to create a better business environment for private enterprises, and to help them solve funding and payment delays, as well as other difficulties.

The notice said the campaign was taking in all levels of the party, starting with the grass-roots members and spreading to county, city and provincial levels of the party’s organs, as well as companies and schools.

At the upper echelons, Hunan’s senior provincial officials would hold discussion panels and make inspection tours, it said.

Alfred Wu, an associate professor with the National University of Singapore’s Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said that under Deng the slogan “emancipate the mind” was about relaxing socialist thought and adopting international norms.

But now, he said, it meant that officials would try every possible avenue to deliver the high-quality growth Xi wanted.

According to Wu, the specific mention of inflated growth numbers and a “lying flat” attitude among officials in the announcement could be a signal from Hunan party boss Shen Xiaoming.

Wu said Shen could be signalling that he had the political will to address these stumbling blocks, but also that he wanted the province's officials to come up with workable ideas.

Chinese firm behind local 'news' websites spreading Beijing propaganda in 30 countries

18 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb18'24) – China appears to have co-opted, through the agency of a Beijing public relations firm, more than 100 websites in 30 countries in Europe, Asia and Latin America to push its propaganda information at local levels. The outlets are seen to be disguised as local news outlets, but push unmitigated Chinese Party-state propaganda, suggests Reuters Feb 8, citing Toronto-based digital watchdog Citizen Lab Feb 7.

The propaganda material is interspersed with news aggregated from local news outlets and Chinese state media, the watchdog's research report was stated to show.

"While the campaign's websites enjoyed negligible exposure to date, there is a heightened risk of inadvertent amplification by the local media and target audiences, as a result of the quick multiplication of these websites and their adaptiveness to local languages and content," researcher Alberto Fittarelli has said in the report.

The sites' contents were stated to sway between conspiracy theories, often about the United States or its allies – such as a piece blaming American scientists for "leaking" Covid-19 – to articles attacking Beijing's critics.

Citizen Lab has said the campaign began in mid-2020 and traced the network to public relations firm Shenzhen Haimaiyunxiang Media Co., Ltd., also known as Haimai.

One of the websites in the campaign was stated to be Roma Journal, "which looks every bit like a local Italian news outlet: headlines discuss the Italian prime minister's political prospects, a hot air balloon festival in a northern province and a book launch.

"But a 'press releases' button at a corner of its homepage leads to a range of Chinese state media articles on topics such as China's contribution to the global economic recovery and its push towards technological innovation."

What is more, much of the content on the sites Citizen Lab found was seen to be sourced from a press releases service called Times Newswire, which analysts at cybersecurity firm Mandiant last year found to be at the centre of a separate Chinese influence operation that targeted US audiences.

The report cited experts tracking such operations as saying while online influence campaigns are increasingly common as powerful people and governments around the world seek to manipulate public opinion, China remains one of the biggest sources of such drives alongside Russia and Iran.

Notably, Chinese influence operations have increased and expanded well beyond Asia, social media giant Meta said in a report in Nov 2023, calling it "the most notable change in the threat landscape" since 2020.

The report said Citizen Lab dug deeper into the network it found after a series of such websites popped up in South Korea and Italy.

It said that South Korea's National Cyber Security Center (NCSC) – part of the country's national intelligence agency – exposed 18 of the sites in a report in Nov 2023, also linking the operation to Haimai.

State education leaders urged to investigate whether CCP is infiltrating K-12 schools

10 February 2024, ABC News

WASHINGTON (CITC) – A parents' rights group is pressing more than 30 state education leaders to investigate whether the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is attempting to infiltrate their schools.

The letter penned Thursday by Parents Defending Education (PDE) targets 34 state superintendents. Each of the 34 states were found to have school district contracts linked to the CCP, according to PDE. The letter follows a recent House hearing on the CCP's "cyber threat" to national security, during which Rep. Raja Krishnamoorthi, D-Ill., said "CCP hackers" were able to access an electric grid in Texas to install malware. PDE is now warning officials that the "infiltration of American infrastructure and institutions" extends to public education.

That should frighten people," Alex Nester, an investigative fellow for PDE, told Crisis in the Classroom (CITC).

PDE determined that 143 U.S. schools have "fostered relationships" with the CCP and affiliated entities. Most notably, Thomas Jefferson High School in Virginia was discovered to have received more than $1 million from such entities after agreeing to help a Beijing high school adopt its premier STEM research. "They took that back to China and opened a string of schools that are called the Thomas Schools that are based off our model," Nester told CITC. "It's like they don't even need to steal our IP anymore, they don't even need to do this under the table, we're freely handing an adversarial foreign nation the blueprints."

Thomas Jefferson was later instructed by Virginia's education department to sever all ties with CCP-connected donors.

Nester says PDE is now choosing to alert state officials because most tend to assume national security is the responsibility of the federal government.

And it certainly is, but there are definitely steps that local leaders, including state superintendents, can take," she told CITC. "Do an investigation, look through emails, look at your servers, do checks for malware, for viruses, anything that could have been embedded from an adversarial foreign nation."

In its letter, PDE notes that the CCP's interest in American education is "not for the benefit of the American children," but "part of the communist regime's long-term strategy to soften American and global sentiments toward its own political goals."

BASF to speed up exit from Xinjiang ventures after Uyghur abuse reports

10 February 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

German chemicals giant BASF said Friday it would accelerate its exit from two joint ventures in China's Xinjiang region after allegations that its local partner violated the rights of the Uyghur minority.

Staff from Markor, with which BASF was working in the region, were alleged to have been involved in rights abuses of the members of the mostly Muslim group, broadcaster ZDF and news outlet Der Spiegel reported last week.

BASF had already announced at the end of last year plans to exit the joint ventures, which manufacture the chemical butanediol, due to commercial and environmental concerns.

But it said in a statement that it would speed up its exit following recent reports that "contain serious allegations that indicate activities inconsistent with BASF's values".

"BASF will accelerate the ongoing process to divest its shares in the two joint ventures in Korla" a town in the northwestern region, it said.

BASF said it had no indication that employees of the joint ventures were involved in rights violations, only staff of its local partner.

According to last week's reports, Markor staff had taken part in visits to homes of Uyghur families in order to spy on them.

Reports about the visits were sent to Chinese authorities in 2018 and 2019, which led to the incarceration of many Uyghurs, they said.

BASF said that the situation in Xinjiang had always been part of its assessment when looking at the joint ventures, but that regular audits had not found any evidence of human rights violations.

Rights groups have long accused Beijing of a widespread crackdown on minorities in Xinjiang, including forced labour and detention camps.

Beijing denies allegations of abuse and insists its actions in Xinjiang have helped to combat extremism and enhance development.

BASF has been ramping up its presence in China in recent years, and is building a 10-billion-euro ($10.8-billion) chemical complex in the southern province of Guangdong.

It has fiercely defended its investments there, with chief executive Martin Brudermueller in 2022 warning against "China-bashing" over Germany's business ties to the world's number two economy.

Xinjiang is home to numerous factories that supply multinational companies, including big-name Western brands.

Another German company, Volkswagen, faced accusations of using forced labour at its factory in Xinjiang. But the automaker said in December that an audit it had commissioned found no evidence.

China's Political Power List Hints at Fate of Disappeared Official

09 February 2024, NewsWeek

China's former Defense Minister Wei Fenghe was absent from a prominent list of retired Chinese political figures, fueling speculation about his fate.

Wei was missing from an official list of prominent retired officials published by the Chinese Communist Party that acknowledges the central figures of the Chinese political system. State broadcaster China Central Television broadcasted the list as part of Lunar New Year greetings.

Wei's predecessors, Chang Wanquan, Liang Guanglie, Cao Gangchuan, and Chi Haotian, were present on the list published on Wednesday, as first reported on Thursday by Hong Kong newspaper South China Morning Post. Newsweek independently confirmed that Wei Fenghe didn't appear on the list of prominent retired Chinese political figures.

In recent months, several leading military leaders from the People's Liberation Army's Rocket Force have also been replaced in recent months without explanation. Experts believe there is an extensive anti-corruption-related investigation currently underway in China's military and diplomatic circles, Newsweek previously reported.

Wei served as the defense minister of China from March 2018 until January 2023, replaced by former Defense Minister Li Shangfu. Wei officially retired that month.

He also previously served as the commander of Xi's elite Rocket Force, in charge of Beijing's nuclear arsenal, which has been mired in corruption allegations in recent months.

The scrutiny of Wei's absence from the list comes as China's leading military and diplomatic figures, including the former Foreign Minister Qin Gang and Foreign Defense Minister Li Shangfu, have disappeared from public view without explanation.

Qin and Li were officially removed from the State Council, China's chief administrative authority, according to state broadcaster CCTV, in October 2023. No official explanations were provided for their dismissal.

Newsweek reached out to the Chinese embassy in Washington, D.C., via email for comment on Wei's absence from the list.

Earlier in the year, Chinese leader Xi Jinping called the problem of corruption within the Chinese political system an ongoing effort.

"After 10 years of unrelenting and powerful anti-corruption efforts in the new era, we have achieved an overwhelming victory and have comprehensively consolidated our achievements. However, the situation remains dire and complex," Xi told the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection members, the Communist Party's highest supervisory body.

Ou Si-fu, a research fellow and division director at the Institute for National Defense and Security Research, Taiwan's top military think tank, told Newsweek in a recent interview that corruption in the People's Liberation Army remains rampant.

"During the last two decades, Beijing has poured many budgets and resources into defense modernization. Owing to a shortage of transparency, many officials have cut a big slice of this defense fat for private purposes," Ou said.

China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response

09 February 2024, The Conversation

Taiwan elected Lai Ching-te, also known as William Lai, to be its next president on January 13. His election marks the continuation of a government that promotes an independent Taiwan.

Just two days later, the Pacific nation of Nauru severed ties with Taiwan and transferred its diplomatic allegiance to Beijing.

More recently, on January 27, Tuvalu's pro-Taiwan prime minister, Kausea Natano, lost his seat in the nation's general election. Natano's finance minister, Seve Paeniu, who is aiming for the prime ministership himself, was returned to his seat. In his campaign, Paeniu pledged to review Tuvalu's relationships with China and Taiwan.

These examples indicate China's growing influence in the south Pacific, a region that the world's major powers are competing for influence over. But why is the region significant? And how are these major powers exerting their influence there?

Preventing recognition of Taiwan

Taiwan has been governed independently since 1949. But Beijing believes it should be reunited with the rest of China. It is not an option for states to diplomatically recognise both China and Taiwan – China forces them to choose.

For decades, the Chinese government has used a combination of carrots and sticks to pressure such states into transferring diplomatic recognition from Taiwan to China.

China has, for example, imposed significant political, diplomatic and economic sanctions on countries that continue to formally recognise Taiwan. In 2022, China curbed imports from Lithuania to punish the country for allowing Taiwan to open a de facto embassy in the country.

But China also offers states – and their governing elites – economic and political incentives for withdrawing diplomatic recognition of Taiwan. It has, in the past, used its influence in the UN and other international organisations to block assistance or elect specific people to international positions.

Nauru's change of diplomatic position, and the political debate unfolding in Tuvalu, should be understood as part of China's longstanding effort to prevent and reduce recognition of Taiwan as a sovereign state.

But they are a significant step forward for China. Nauru has a leading position in the Pacific Islands Forum – the main political decision-making body for the region – so the country's change of stance could lead to wider formal diplomatic changes in the south Pacific.

China, of course, has legitimate economic and political interests in the south Pacific too. It is a vital export market for natural resources from Pacific island states and is a key source of incoming tourism. According to Chinese statistics, total trade volume between China and Pacific island states grew from US$153 million (£121 million) to US$5.3 billion (£4.2 billion) between 1992 and 2021.

Competing for influence

Nauru's decision is another diplomatic setback for Taiwan, which is now formally recognised by just 11 countries. However, this is not in itself a serious concern for the US, Australia and their allies.

They all formally recognise China, while at the same time maintaining close, informal links with Taiwan. Their focus is on trying to limit the depth of Chinese political and economic influence over Pacific island states and elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific region. The US is concerned that growing Chinese political influence may ultimately result in it enjoying significant military presence in the region.

The Pacific region encompasses the US state of Hawaii, multiple US territories, and is also home to several crucial US military bases. So, the US has made an effort to enhance its diplomatic relations in the region by providing financial support for initiatives around climate change adaption, sustainable fishing and economic growth.

However, increased tension between China and the west over the past decade has made it increasingly challenging to reign in Chinese influence. China has been asserting its primacy in and around Taiwan in the South China Sea, and has increasingly exerted military pressure.

China's struggle for influence in the region now also includes taking opportunities to challenge previously undisputed western security dominance in the south Pacific. In 2022, China put forward a proposal for a diplomatic, economic and security agreement with the region. The agreement was, however, later abandoned due to resistance from some Pacific island nations at the urging of the US and Australia.

US strategy in the south Pacific

When president, Donald Trump launched a number of deals with Pacific islands including Nauru, Marshall Islands, Solomon Islands, Palau and Micronesia. However, Trump's strategy for a "free and open Indo-Pacific" had limited success. This was not only due to his confrontational posture towards China, but also to his threatening and protectionist "America first" rhetoric.

Joe Biden's comparatively measured diplomacy has seen more success. In 2022, the Biden administration announced its "Pacific partnership strategy".

The initiative included a commitment of US$810 million in development aid across the Pacific island region. And in May 2023, the US secretary of state, Antony Blinken, stated that he would work with Congress to provide over US$7.2 billion to support the region.

Since then, the US has recognised the Cook Islands and Niue as independent, sovereign nations, increased its diplomatic footprint in the region and has committed strongly to work with the Pacific Islands Forum to promote a "democratic, resilient and prosperous Pacific islands region".

The shift of diplomatic ties from Taiwan to China does not mean that Pacific island nations want to reduce their ties with the west. But the US, Australia and their allies will need to invest a lot more in diplomatic, economic and security assistance if they want to counter China's growing influence there.

Chinese security agencies tell students studying abroad to beware risk from foreign spies

07 February 2024, South China Morning Post

China's top spy agency has warned Chinese students to be alert to the risk from foreign spies when studying abroad.

The warning from the Ministry of State Security comes amid a sweeping national security drive.

In a post on the ministry's WeChat account it told the story of a "real case" involving a Chinese graduate who, it claimed, had secured a place from a "top ranking" foreign university despite failing the Chinese college entrance exam in 2006.

It said the student, identified only by the surname Zhang, had been "severely punished" for his role in leaking Chinese scientific research after graduating.

The ministry did not say where Zhang had studied, but it said he had been responsible for liaising with Chinese students abroad and had done well in his studies, which brought him to the attention of a senior figure in the university.

This individual was then said to have put Zhang in touch with two people who turned out to be foreign spies and convinced him to provide intelligence on Chinese international students and other "sensitive information" in return for money.

The account said these spies had secured Zhang a job in a Chinese research institution in China, even though he did not have the correct credentials, and told him to appear to be helpful to his colleagues to collect information.

The State Security Ministry said Zhang had "squandered his promising future" by giving in to the foreign intelligence agency's "emotional manipulation and monetary temptation".

It warned the public to be alert to national security risks and "uncover the hidden motives behind various seemingly innocent interactions" while studying and travelling abroad.

In recent months the Chinese authorities have heightened their focus on risks to national security, with the state security ministry becoming more active on social media to warn of the threat from foreign spies.

Last year, State Security Minister Chen Yixin said the country must "proactively defend" against foreign spies to strengthen national security and the Communist Party's leadership.

A new counter-espionage law came into effect in July 2023, which expanded both the definition of spying and the investigative powers of national security agencies.

Although China and the United States recently pledged to boost academic exchanges as part of a wider effort to improve relations, Chinese students in America are still at risk of being caught up in the wider tensions between the countries.

Recently China accused the US authorities of harassing Chinese students on arrival at Washington's Dulles airport, subjecting them to lengthy questioning and trying to turn them into spies.

According to China's education ministry, more than 8 million students have studied abroad in the period between 1978 and the end of 2021, with the US, Britain and Singapore as the most popular destinations.

China expands visa exemption policy to attract more foreigners

04 February 2024, RFA

China has expanded its visa-free entry policy for tourists and business travelers from more than a dozen European and Asian countries, opening up its borders further in recent months as it struggles to shore up foreign interests to help arrest an economic slowdown.

In January, the Chinese government announced that it would provide unilateral visa exemption for Ireland and Switzerland and introduce a mutual visa exemption for Singapore for 30 days. Additionally, from March 1, China and Thailand will also allow permanent visa exemption for citizens of both sides. In the past six months, Beijing has implemented a visa-free policy to tourists from Brunei, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Malaysia.

While the number of foreign tourist arrivals has jumped nearly seven times to 35.5 million last year from 4.5 million in 2022, it's still a far cry from the 98 million recorded in pre-pandemic 2019, according to China's National Immigration Administration.

But foreign nationals would be hesitant to travel to China for several factors: the high cost of air tickets, the inconveniences upon arrival without a Chinese mobile phone number – which is needed for mobile payment apps as many businesses and restaurants do not take cash – as well as being closely surveilled and controlled by the authorities.

"I recently returned to China and the biggest inconvenience was that overseas credit cards are difficult to use in China. China's WeChat Pay or Alipay require a Chinese domestic WeChat account to install," an Australian citizen surnamed Yang lamented to Radio Free Asia.

"Moreover, without a mobile phone number in China, I can't even hail a taxi. I have to ask someone to hail one for me every time."

Yang said another issue was the close surveillance he endured.

After registering for accommodation with the neighborhood police station – a requisite – the neighborhood committee cadres would come to verify, and also inform him they knew of his comings and goings from the residence.

"It was nothing more than a warning to me: the Public Security Bureau is closely monitoring my every move and deliberately putting pressure on me."

Not only was Yang under close surveillance, but his work partners were not spared either.

"I used my Australian mobile phone in China to make a call to a boss in Zhejiang to discuss possible cooperation. A few hours after the call, the lady was summoned to the police station. The police told her that it was an overseas fraud call and made a record. She was so scared that she never dared to answer my call again."

Yang added he was scarred from the experience and would try to avoid going to China, which he described as "a hysterical country."

China has expanded its visa-free entry policy for tourists and business travelers from more than a dozen European and Asian countries, opening up its borders further in recent months as it struggles to shore up foreign interests to help arrest an economic slowdown.

In January, the Chinese government announced that it would provide unilateral visa exemption for Ireland and Switzerland and introduce a mutual visa exemption for Singapore for 30 days. Additionally, from March 1, China and Thailand will also allow permanent visa exemption for citizens of both sides. In the past six months, Beijing has implemented a visa-free policy to tourists from Brunei, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Malaysia.

While the number of foreign tourist arrivals has jumped nearly seven times to 35.5 million last year from 4.5 million in 2022, it's still a far cry from the 98 million recorded in pre-pandemic 2019, according to China's National Immigration Administration.

But foreign nationals would be hesitant to travel to China for several factors: the high cost of air tickets, the inconveniences upon arrival without a Chinese mobile phone number – which is needed for mobile payment apps as many businesses and restaurants do not take cash – as well as being closely surveilled and controlled by the authorities.

"I recently returned to China and the biggest inconvenience was that overseas credit cards are difficult to use in China. China's WeChat Pay or Alipay require a Chinese domestic WeChat account to install," an Australian citizen surnamed Yang lamented to Radio Free Asia.

"Moreover, without a mobile phone number in China, I can't even hail a taxi. I have to ask someone to hail one for me every time."

Yang said another issue was the close surveillance he endured.

After registering for accommodation with the neighborhood police station – a requisite – the neighborhood committee cadres would come to verify, and also inform him they knew of his comings and goings from the residence.

"It was nothing more than a warning to me: the Public Security Bureau is closely monitoring my every move and deliberately putting pressure on me."

Not only was Yang under close surveillance, but his work partners were not spared either.

"I used my Australian mobile phone in China to make a call to a boss in Zhejiang to discuss possible cooperation. A few hours after the call, the lady was summoned to the police station. The police told her that it was an overseas fraud call and made a record. She was so scared that she never dared to answer my call again."

Yang added he was scarred from the experience and would try to avoid going to China, which he described as "a hysterical country."

A CCTV security surveillance camera overlooks a street as people walk past in Beijing, China. (Thomas Peter/Reuters)

Costly airfares and politics

A woman who works in the United States and only gave her name as Angela said the air ticket price from the U.S. to China remains high, although a slight decline allowed her to return last month.

Angela said that compared to her experience three years ago, the Chinese government has stepped up its controls on the people.

"One thing that makes it very inconvenient is: everywhere I go, I am being checked for my identity – be it to get on the high-speed rail, book a ticket for a tourist attraction, and even to register a shared bike account. The purpose of this is probably to collect and control information and capture everyone's whereabouts, but it is very annoying."

Separately, a travel agent in the U.S. who only gave her surname Cai noted that middle-aged and elderly overseas Chinese are reluctant to travel to China because of the political environment.

"It's not that we don't do business in the Chinese market – now is not the right time, whether it is political or other factors."

Beijing is trying to rebuild its international image and trust with the international community, and the visa-free policy was one of the measures to improve relations with foreign countries, said Riley Walters, a senior researcher on international economics at the Hudson Institute, a Washington-based think tank.

"The slowdown in the economy and stock market has made China's demand for foreign investment high. Relaxing visa restrictions will also help the tourism industry," Walters said.

But how effective Beijing's visa-free policy will be in shoring up foreign investment remains to be seen.

Ralph Weber, a professor from the European Center for Global Studies at the University of Basel in Switzerland, believes the policy will have a limited effect on attracting business travelers.

"Investors are hesitant to go to China because they feel uneasy. They're worried about what's happening in China, like the espionage laws. So the impact created by the visa-free policy is not worth mentioning. I can't imagine a Swiss business traveler thinking, 'Wow, I now don't have to pay for a Chinese visa, so I'm going to invest in China.' That's not the logic," Weber said.

China's actual foreign direct investment fell 8% to 1.13 trillion yuan (US$159 billion) last year, according to the Ministry of Commerce.

China to strengthen propaganda control on discussion of ethnic minority issues

03 February 2024, Tibetan Review

Sounding the urgency to realise President Xi Jinping's vision of "forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation," a top policy office of the Communist Party of China (CPC) has pledged to tighten control of ethnic minority-related discussions on the internet and in print. The aim is to stamp out what the office calls ideological risks related to the minorities especially in Xinjiang and Tibet, reported the scmp.com Feb 2, citing the Communist Party's theoretical journal Qiushi on Feb 1.

The article, written under the byline of the Communist Party leadership group at the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, the office responsible for drafting and implementing laws regarding China's policies towards its ethnic minority groups, has called for greater oversight of public opinion and discussion around ethnic minority groups and related issues online.

The article is stated to refer to "risks" arising from ethnic minority communities and to call for what is called "the responsibility mechanism of ideology work" to be implemented.

"[We must] resolutely fend off the infiltration of the 'three forces'," referring to terrorism, separatism and religious extremism. "[We must] further regulate publication related to ethnic minority groups," the article is quoted as saying.

The commission has called for greater supervision, for officials to "promptly and appropriately" address grievances involving issues related to ethnic minority groups, and to “absolutely uphold the bottom line of preventing regional and systemic risks in the ethnic regions”.

In addition to a call for greater control, the article is stated to endorse more resources being put into art – such as in publications, on stage and visual arts – which could help ethnic minority groups identify more deeply with Chinese culture.

“[We] should aim to make the internet the biggest contributor to strengthening the awareness of the community of the Chinese nation,” it is quoted as saying.

The remarks are seen to have come as Beijing stresses the need to realise President Xi’s vision of “forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation”, which advocates for greater integration of ethnic minority groups and putting the interests of the Chinese nation first.

The report notes that grievances relating to ethnic minority groups have long been a major source of tension in Chinese society, particularly in Xinjiang and Tibet.

While Beijing has largely tamped down the intensity of those tensions in recent years by tightening its grip on the regions’ security and culture policies, its measures have attracted massive criticisms for human rights abuses, the report said.

It bears noting that major issues highlighted in these criticisms have included re-education camps and forced labour incarceration of around a million mostly Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang and the forced enrolment of around a million Tibetan children in forced colonial schools designed to Sinicize them.

Given these foreign criticisms, the article in Qishui has said China’s external communication around its ethnic minority groups was not effective, claiming Beijing “has a valid point but not able to effectively communicate it”.

Without naming any countries, it has said this was because of some countries’ “hegemonic dominance”.

The article has noted that in recent times Beijing had stepped up efforts in the hope that its global communication would better align with its narrative.

The report says that one example of this is Beijing’s dramatically increased use since last year of “Xizang” rather than “Tibet” in its English articles in Chinese state media. It sees the term “Tibet” as being linked in international discussion to the region’s spiritual leader-in-exile, the Dalai Lama.

January

China’s anti-corruption watchdog says 110,000 Communist Party officials faced disciplinary action last year

30 January 2024, South China Morning Post

About 110,000 Chinese Communist Party officials faced disciplinary action last year as part of the ongoing drive to clean up the party’s act, according to the country’s top anti-corruption body.

Security personnel patrol near the Id Kah Mosque in Kashgar in western China's Xinjiang region. (file photo)

The figures published by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) on Sunday represent a 13 per cent increase in the number of cases compared with the previous year.

There is little sign of Beijing easing up on its latest crackdown more than a year after the party’s national congress in October 2022, when President Xi Jinping began an unprecedented third term as China’s paramount leader and filled most key positions with his loyalists.

Last year saw the commission launching corruption probes into a 45 senior officials, a record number, according to a tally by the Post.

Other signs suggest that more senior figures under also under investigation. Apart from last year’s shock removal of Qin Gang as foreign minister and Li Shangfu as defence minister after just months in their jobs, nine senior military officials were abruptly dismissed by China’s national legislative body, the National People’s Congress.

Despite previously hailing an “overwhelming victory” against corruption, Xi told the CCDI’s annual planning event earlier this month that the party must continue to fight graft and other problems with “tenacity, perseverance and precision” to transcend “the historical cycle of rise and fall”.

The CCDI said last year’s disciplinary cases covered breaches of the eight rules on official conduct that Xi laid down soon after taking over as head of the party in late 2012.

These rules, enforced by the CCDI, are intended to ensure a thrifty and responsible working style for officials and cover everything from a ban on extravagant banquets and receptions to avoiding unnecessary meetings and red tape.

Of those punished, more than 41,000 officials fell foul of the watchdog for failing to carry out their duties properly by “failing to take responsibility” or “paying lip service” to their orders. The watchdog particularly highlighted failures to implement development or environmental protection policies – two of Xi’s main priorities.

A further 40,000 were punished for receiving expensive gifts, money or attending lavish meals and celebrations, while another 10,000 were reprimanded for issuing or receiving benefits without approval.

In publishing the figures, the commission also warned party officials that they must closely follow the disciplinary rules – especially in the build-up to Lunar New Year, which begins on February 10.

“[We will] strengthen warnings and deterrents, and educate and guide party members and cadres so they will celebrate the festival in a clean manner,” it said.

Beside disciplinary action, several provinces including Guangdong, Anhui, Henan, Zhejiang and Fujian have adopted a policy of naming and shaming officials who are slacking off from performing their duties in recent months.

Deng Yuwen, a former deputy editor of Study Times, the official newspaper of the Central Party School where cadres are trained, said Xi had not let up on the anti-corruption crackdown because the disciplinary apparatus was his most powerful tool for forging a clean and efficient team to steer the country ahead. “China’s party-state system does not allow any opposition parties that can keep the ruling party in check, and there is little media freedom too,” he said.

He said the “eight rules” discipline campaign began with a focus on curbing rampant extravagance among party officials, but it was now trying to ensure that policy priorities were implemented by turning the spotlight onto those who neglected their duties.

“Many officials switched to goblin mode [refusing to perform tasks they do not want to do] after the anti-corruption campaign as they think they can better survive the purge if they don’t do anything,” said Deng, who is now living in the United States. “But Xi is backing up his harsh corruption crackdown with a tough official conduct rectification campaign to ensure no one can slack off. All have to get up and march in his direction.”

China ‘gamed’ UN human rights review, experts say

29 January 2024, RFA

A Chinese diplomat said the majority of the 428 recommendations it received were ‘constructive.’

A top Chinese diplomat said Beijing would “earnestly study” 428 recommendations for addressing human rights submitted by U.N. members, calling them “objective and balanced.”

But leading experts said China “gamed” the once-every-five-year “universal periodic review” to avoid scrutiny of its rights abuses. Chen Xu, China’s ambassador to the U.N. offices in Geneva, said following the adoption of the report that he was happy with the many recommendations by 141 countries, and that Beijing would release its positions on each of the suggestions next month.

“The report just adopted is, in general, objective and balanced, and has reflected the statements and the recommendations during the meeting,” Chen said in remarks to the council. “We believe the majority of the comments and recommendations are constructive.”

Tuesday’s three-hour review session descended into farce, with the unusually high number of participating countries meaning each only had 45 seconds to provide an assessment of a country that has been accused of possible crimes against humanity by a U.N. body.

Under this process, each of the 193 U.N. member states has their rights record reviewed on a rolling five-year basis.

A report by Reuters said Chinese diplomats had in the lead-up to the session lobbied countries to turn up with soft-ball assessments.

Gaming the system

The many contributions during Tuesday’s session worked to draw attention away from some of the worst claims of rights abuse in China, including the treatment of Uyghurs, Tibetans and Hong Kongers.

While Western nations including the United States, Finland, Canada, Switzerland and the United Kingdom focussed on China’s treatment of Tibetans and Uyghurs in the country’s west during their 45 seconds, many countries offered praise for things like legal system reforms.

William Nee, the research and advocacy coordinator for the Washington-based Chinese Human Rights Defenders, said Beijing had used its diplomatic heft to water-down legitimate criticism of its human rights record by inundating the process with friendly voices. “This time, they tried to game the process,” Nee told Radio Free Asia. “There was an intense lobbying campaign for countries to ask questions that essentially the Chinese government wrote in advance. There were a lot of softball questions and very easy questions."

Nee added that some countries' recommendations even appeared to poke fun at the global condemnation of the China's treatment of Tibetans and Uyghur citizens, the latter of whom the U.S. government says are the victim of an ongoing campaign of genocide.

Russia, he noted, said China should "improve gradually people's sense and ability of using standard spoken and written Chinese language in Xinjiang," referring to the far- western region where Uyghurs live.

Venezuela, meanwhile, said China must "firmly oppose the politicization" of human rights "under the pretext of issues related to Xinjiang, Hong Kong and Xizang," the latter of which is the new official romanized name for Tibet adopted by the Chinese government.

"If we look at the advanced questions submitted, it seems as though some of those questions could have been drafted by the Chinese government, to be quite blunt," said

Kai Müller, executive director and head of U.N. advocacy at the International Campaign for Tibet.

Nothing new

Sophie Richardson, the former China director at Human Rights Watch, told RFA that China openly flouted U.N. requirements to allow input from independent civil society groups into the self-report it submits.

"There's a long list of ways the Chinese government tried to game the process this time around, which has to start with the way it tried to game the process the last time around," Richardson said, pointing to China's boasting of its fidelity to recommendations made in 2018.

China that year accepted 284 of the 346 recommendations made by some 150 countries. But many of those, Richardson said, were the ones that were "vague or meaningless, or in fact encouraged the Chinese government to keep committing human rights violations."

"Beijing has held that up as real progress," she said, even though "five years later, we know it is committing atrocity crimes."

But China's "gaming" of the review process did not entirely wipe out opportunities for countries to speak out about their legitimate concerns.

There was a heightened focus, for example, on the plight of Tibetans and Uyghurs, with the number of recommendations related to Tibet increasing to 24 from 10 in 2018. Likewise, the number of countries mentioning Tibet in their floor speeches doubled from nine to 20.

"The dramatic increase in the number of U.N. member states who spoke out for Tibet ... speaks to the existential threat China's assimilationist policies pose to the Tibetan people," said Lhadon Tethong, the director of the Tibet Action Institute.

Campaign for Uyghurs executive director Rushan Abbas said the 30 countries who called out human rights abuses against Uyghurs showed that the world was no longer being fooled by China's denials.

"This significant outcry, despite China's persistent lies and outright denial, stands as a testament to the commitment to human rights and justice," Abbas said. "It also sends a powerful message that the international community will not be swayed by false narratives in light of the mounting evidence exposing the crimes of the PRC."

China has until Feb. 9, 2024 to provide its initial written response to each of the recommendations, including whether it accepts them, and has until Feb. 16 to finalize its statements and response.

China's Communist Party vows to take on 'new and old challenges' in People's Daily article based on Xi Jinping's speech

26 January 2024, South China Morning Post

The Communist Party of China has pledged to maintain a tight grip on discipline within its ranks as it faces "new and old challenges" to its rule.

An article in party mouthpiece the People's Daily said these problems would not go away any time soon, and resolving them would be "a long and arduous process".

"There is always the possibility that some old problems will rebound. If we relax even a little bit, they will resurface, while new problems are still emerging," the article said.

It ran under the byline "commentator of the People's Daily" – indicating direct endorsement from the senior party leadership.

It was also the fifth official piece elaborating on a speech delivered by President Xi Jinping to the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection – the party's top corruption watchdog and disciplinary body.

The "four dangers" will threaten the party's power for a long time, the article warned, referring to the official term covering lax discipline, incompetence, popular disconnect and corruption.

This comes as graft fighters report a record number of internal investigations of senior officials, more than a year after the party's 20th national congress where Xi began a third term as leader amid a show of even firmer support for him.

In his work report to the congress, Xi said the party had “waged a battle against corruption on a scale unprecedented in our history” and “achieved an overwhelming victory”.

But high-profile officials continue to fall. Apart from the shock removal of foreign minister Qin Gang and defence minister Li Shangfu, both the shortest-serving in their positions, the party also launched corruption probes into a record high 45 senior officials last year, according to a tally by the Post.

Anti-corruption officers have pointed to a wide range of misconduct for those probes, including corruption, snubbing instructions from the senior leadership, political disloyalty and irresponsible use of public funds.

Two weeks ago, Xi reiterated his call for the party to find ways to transcend “the historical cycle of rise and fall”.

Addressing hundreds of top discipline inspectors gathered for the CCDI’s annual meeting in Beijing on January 8, Xi emphasised the “strategic question” facing the party’s 98 million members.

“As the world’s largest Marxist ruling party, how can our party successfully break free from the historical cycle of rise and fall and ensure that it will never change its nature, convictions or character?” he was quoted as saying by state media.

Thursday’s article said the Chinese Communist Party must draw painful lessons from many other “large parties and parties with a long history” that had failed, but did not offer any specific examples.

“They were once full of vigour and vitality, but some have fallen apart or disappeared, some have weakened and are approaching their end, while some are in deep trouble. These are very regrettable and thought provoking [lessons],” it said. Brian Wong, assistant professor of philosophy at the University of Hong Kong, cited Beijing’s tracking of communist powers around the world.

Beijing had kept a watchful eye on events such as the decline and fall of the Soviet Union, the changes in Eastern Europe, and the “falling apart” of revolutionary parties, such as in Cambodia, Wong said.

“On the other hand, Beijing also recognises that the socioeconomic inequalities giving rise to great instability in advanced liberal democracies point towards the need to redress these inequalities [in communist states] and [enforce] internal party discipline.” The People’s Daily article also said China’s unique situation made it impossible for it to follow the paths of other countries. “Unique problems can only be fundamentally solved by relying on the party’s internal strength”, it said.

China’s ruling party sees strict enforcement of discipline as a way to sustain its public appeal. Xi relaunched the Mao-style “self-revolution” slogan in 2015 with this in mind, and has since repeatedly emphasised this as the only way forward to keep the people’s support.

A People’s Daily report on the January 8 meeting hailed the “courage” in carrying out self-revolution as “the most distinctive character and greatest advantage” of the party.

The concept, often metaphorised as a “blade turned inward”, is a response to concerns about the impact of corruption on the party.

It mainly involves a rigorous system to oversee all officials, building a competent disciplinary supervision team, and a better combination of carrot and stick to steer officials away from temptation.

The People’s Daily article also warned of the “four major tests” faced by the party with regard to governance, reform and opening-up, the market economy and the external environment.

The latest data released by the CCDI on Thursday showed 610,000 cadres had been reprimanded last year, a 3 per cent increase over 2022, while 49 ministerial rank officials faced disciplinary action, compared with 53 the previous year.

A political researcher at Tsinghua University in Beijing said Xi’s speech to the CCDI and the People’s Daily commentary showed the anti-corruption drive would not be removed from the president’s priority list for “a very long period of time”.

“The ‘old problems’ [in the article] refer to the corruption that took place before ... Xi came to power, primarily caused by vibrant economic growth and more lax party discipline,” the Tsinghua researcher said, declining to be named as he was not authorised to speak to the media.

“The new problems can refer to those who fall prey to increased infiltration from the West, as China and the West are competing on many fronts, and those who refuse to implement Xi’s policy directions or engage in pointless formalities and bureaucracy while Xi wants to see results.”

China tests new ethnic assimilation policy on Uyghurs

26 January 2024, RFA

The measure aims to further replace Uyghur culture with that of Han Chinese, experts say.

Northwest China’s Xinjiang region is the first area to implement a government policy promoting integration among ethnic groups to achieve President Xi Jinping’s goal of establishing a unified national identity, Chinese media reported.

The regulation calls for the creation of mixed housing, themed venues and cultural parks, and sports and cultural activities that highlight characteristics of Chinese culture and promote zhonghua minzu – a single Chinese nationality that transcends ethnic divisions.

The policy has raised concern among China watchers and scholars, who say its goal is to further erase the cultural identity of Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples and subsume them into the dominant Han Chinese culture.

The measure, known as the “Regulation for Promoting Interaction, Communication, and Integration Between Ethnic Groups,” went into effect on Jan. 1 in the Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture, a nearly 270,000-square-kilometer (104,000-square-mile) multiethnic area that borders Kazakhstan, Mongolia and Russia, according to a Jan. 16 report by China’s People’s Daily.

A mix of Han Chinese, Kazakhs, Uyghurs, Kyrgyz and other ethnicities live there.

Ili is serving as a test for the policy before the Chinese government rolls it out in other parts of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, experts say.

‘Ethnic genocide’

The policy implemented in the prefecture’s capital Ghulja “aims to dismantle the Uyghur mentality, submerging them within the Chinese population and ultimately eradicating their existence,” said Ilshat Heseni Kokbore, vice chairman of the executive committee of the World Uyghur Congress.

“It serves as a continuation of ethnic genocide, systematically dismantling Uyghur culture through this approach,” he said. “I fear that similar measures will soon be applied in Kashgar, Aksu, Kucha, Korla and numerous other locations.”

Adrian Zenz, director of China Studies at the Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation in Washington, said the regulation aims to “formalize a policy of assimilation and population dilution” for national security reasons.

“Many of the outlined regulations are not entirely new, but they formalize a policy of assimilation and population dilution, which makes this new initiative very significant,” said Zenz who has spent years documenting China’s human rights abuses against Uyghurs and has written about Beijing’s measures to dilute the ethnic Uyghur population in Xinjiang.

Children play soccer in front of a gate with a mural depicting Uyghur musicians in Urumqi, capital of northwest China’s Xinjiang region, April 21, 2021, during a government organized trip for foreign journalists. (Mark Schiefelbein/AP)

Leo Maillet, a doctoral student in the Faculty of Oriental Studies at the University of Geneva, expressed concern that Uyghur historical neighborhoods, traditions and culture could disappear at an even faster rate. This policy “comes with not only symbolic, but also physical violence of replacing Uyghur spaces by Chinese spaces,” he said, as it implies that Chinese traditional architecture and cultural centers will replace Uyghur traditional teahouses, mosques and marketplaces – a destruction of both architectural forms and social forums.

“And in this sense, I think it does not only fit the definitions of genocide, but also the definitions of ecocide in the way that it is not only distracting Uyghurs as a group, but also the Uyghur region,” Maillet said.

The policy was approved by the Standing Committee of the People’s Congress of Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture on Aug. 25, 2023. It received approval from the Standing Committee of the National People’s Congress of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region on Nov. 23.

Niyaz Hashim, known as Niyazi Asim in Chinese, director of the Standing Committee of the People’s Congress of Ili Prefecture, told state-run People’s Daily that the regulation was a result of President Xi’s instructions on “consolidating the sense of community among the Chinese nation,” stemming from his several visits to Xinjiang since he was elected general secretary of the Communist Party in November 2012. “The regulation is primarily designed to create unity among the Han Chinese ethnicity and various ethnic groups,” he was quoted as saying.

Symbolic location

Ili prefecture’s capital Ghulja, called Yining in Chinese, has deep symbolic significance for Uyghurs as the site where the East Turkistan Republic was founded.

On Nov. 7, 1944, Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples rebelled against Chinese rule in Ghulja and declared independence as a separate republic five days later. The rebellion was crushed by the Chinese Communists, but Uyghurs still prefer to call their homeland East Turkistan.

Ilshat Hasan Kokbore said he believes that the integration regulation signals that Beijing's genocidal policy against Uyghurs and other Muslims has entered a new stage.

The Chinese government selected Ili prefecture given its role in expressing and preserving Uyghur nationalism, history, nationality, culture and religion, and now wants to eradicate Uyghur identity and aspirations for independence, he said.

"Instead, they seek to impose the zhonghua ideology," he told RFA. "The ultimate goal of China is uniting not only the Uyghurs, but all ethnic groups, into a single nation."

To this end, local government authorities in Xinjiang already have doubled the Han Chinese population in Xinjiang, arbitrarily detained Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples, destroyed religious structures and historical records, and forced Uyghurs to speak Chinese.

The regulation in Ili prefecture took effect weeks before China's Universal Periodic Review – a comprehensive review of its human rights record – at the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva, Switzerland. During the review, Chinese government representatives on Jan. 22 defended Beijing's policies in Xinjiang, while the U.S. representative to the United Nations condemned its ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity there.

Despite China's denial of rights violations and assertions of normalization and development in Xinjiang, Western states continue to raise alarms about continuing repression, arbitrary detentions and enforced disappearances of Uyghurs and others.

China in overdrive to defend its UN-battered rights record ahead of review report

25 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan25'24) – As the United Nations Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review (UPR) Working Group at Geneva prepared to finalize on Jan 26 its recommendations on the basis of its Jan 23 hearing, China has put itself in an overdrive to defend its record. This followed news reports and reports by rights groups that despite its efforts to stymie discussions, China received scathing criticism for its record especially in Xinjiang, Tibet and Hong Kong, with a record number of participants expressing serious concern on the situation in Tibet.

China claimed that more than 120 countries "spoke highly" of its "human rights progress". They "fully acknowledged China's effort and historic achievements in advancing and protecting human rights," said China's official Xinhua news agency Jan 24, citing the country's foreign ministry spokesperson that day.

The remark from spokesperson Wang Wenbin had come in response to a question from a representative of an official Chinese media group, the Hubei Media Group, during a regular press conference, who asked: "Representatives attending the meeting spoke highly of China's human rights development path and historic achievements in human rights cause. Can you share more details with us?"

Also, China's official chinadaily.com.cn Jan 25 published an open letter addressed to the President of the UN Human Rights Council, signed by a total of 73 so-called Chinese civil society organizations. The open letter criticized Tibetan and other groups that had contributed reports or made presentations during the review hearing. It accused them of having "spread false information and cause trouble on a large scale, with the purpose of attacking and smearing China."

The open letter especially named "so-called International Federation for Human Rights, International Campaign for Tibet (Xizang) and Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy". It accused them of "inciting other countries to attack and criticize China" on issues "such as colonial boarding school system", "repression of Tibetan Buddhism", "systematic attacks on the Tibetan language", "limit the rights to freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of peaceful association and assembly", "denial of the legal rights of detainees and prisoners", and "torture and other forms of ill-treatment".

The open letter maintained that the success of the reports of these groups at the review "will significantly impact the credibility of the Human Rights Council, seriously disrupt the enthusiasm and expectations of normal participation by countries worldwide and global NGOs in the working mechanisms of the Human Rights Council, greatly harm the sentiments of the 1.4 billion people in China including Xizang, and severely misguide the global populace's accurate understanding and international public opinion of Xizang."

The open letter especially focused on the reports on the situation in "Xizang", the term China recently began to use in place of "Tibet" in furtherance of its policy-objective of Sinicizing the Tibetan identity of the Tibetan Plateau region.

Apparently seeking a set of recommendations that would praise rather than call for improvement in its human rights record, the letter said: "We strongly urge the Human Rights Council to remember the original intention and mission of establishing the universal periodic review mechanism, eliminate confusing noises, prevent lies and false accusations impacting the Council's consideration of significant human rights issues with genuine practical significance."

The open letter's long list of "civil society" signatories included a number of educational and research centres, especially from the Tibetan regions, as well as chambers of commerce and an assortment of other entities, all of them government-backed or government-run.

Open letter from Chinese Civil Society Organizations to the President of the United Nations Human Rights Council

24 January 2024, China Daily

Dear President of the UN Human Rights Council,
As a crucial organ of the United Nations General Assembly aimed at promoting and protecting human rights, the Human Rights Council plays a pivotal role in advancing global human rights development. We sincerely admire this role and express high appreciation for your commitment to upholding guiding principles such as universality, impartiality, objectivity, non-selectivity, as well as constructive international dialogue and cooperation in your work.

We have noticed, over the past period, organizations including the so-called International Federation for Human Rights, International Campaign for Tibet(Xizang) and Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy, have been using the platform of the Human Rights Council to spread false information and cause trouble on a large scale, with the purpose of attacking and smearing China. They fabricated lies such as "colonial boarding school system" "repression of Tibetan Buddhism" "systematic attacks on the Tibetan language" "limit the rights to freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of peaceful association and assembly" "denial of the legal rights of detainees and prisoners" "torture and other forms of ill-treatment", attempting to manipulate the Human Rights Council into making biased statements on the issue of Xizang, inciting other countries to attack and criticize China. These practices of distorting right and wrong completely ignore the history and reality of Xizang, disregarding the tremendous achievements in the development of human rights in Xizang, lacking basic objectivity and truthfulness. Once successful, it will significantly impact the credibility of the Human Rights Council, seriously disrupt the enthusiasm and expectations of normal participation by countries worldwide and global NGOs in the working mechanisms of the Human Rights Council, greatly harm the sentiments of the

1.4 billion people in China including Xizang, and severely misguide the global populace's accurate understanding and international public opinion of Xizang. We strongly oppose the maliciously fabricated and baseless accusations, object to the politicization, instrumentalization, and stigmatization of human rights in Xizang.

In today's Xizang, governments at all levels and people of all ethnicities are making efforts to promote political stability, social harmony, economic development, national unity, religious harmony, rule of law, and ecological well-being. They are working to ensure more comprehensive protection of basic human rights. The people of Xizang have firsthand experiences of these efforts, and many foreign media outlets that have visited Xizang have also provided extensive and objective coverage.

Rumors originate from schemers, thrive among the foolish, and cease with the wise. We strongly urge the Human Rights Council to remember the original intention and mission of establishing the universal periodic review mechanism, eliminate confusing noises, prevent lies and false accusations impacting the Council's consideration of significant human rights issues with genuine practical significance. We call for the respect of legitimate information provided by member states and the making of objective, rational, and fair judgments.

China's ethnic affairs officials urged to promote integration of minority groups

24 January 2024, South China Morning Post

China's ethnic affairs officials have been asked to boost efforts to promote the integration of the country's ethnic minority groups in the new year.

The Tuesday meeting brought together senior ethnic affairs policy directors from around the country and outlined goals for China's ethnic affairs policies.

Beijing has stressed the need to enforce President Xi Jinping's vision of "forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation", which calls for greater integration of ethnic minority groups.

The meeting noted that efforts should be made to "build a system of historical materials, a system of discourse and a system of theories on the community of the Chinese nation" and to "scientifically reveal the reasons, theories and philosophies of the formation and development of the Chinese nation”.

It called for efforts to launch cultural products and exhibits that “reflect the commonality of the Chinese nation” to “fully demonstrate Chinese cultural heritage”.

It also outlined the goal of addressing risks and “hidden dangers” in the field of ethnic affairs and safeguarding ethnic unity and stability.

The meeting noted that ethnic affairs offices across China should “have a sense of responsibility and urgency” and “thoroughly implement” the latest decisions by Communist Party leaders on ethnic affairs. Ethnic grievances were once a major source of tension in Chinese society, especially in Tibet and Xinjiang. Beijing has largely brought down the intensity of those tensions in recent years, but has been widely criticised for the security and cultural policies that were used during the process.

At a Politburo study session in October, President Xi Jinping noted the need to promote the party’s work in guiding ethnic minority groups. He emphasised the importance of educating ethnic minority groups about party history, theories and policies and to further integrate them into the Chinese nation.

“Efforts should be made to let people cultivate awareness that people from all ethnicities are in the same community, where they share weal and woe and stick together through thick and thin,” he was quoted as saying at the time by state news agency Xinhua.

In Tuesday’s meeting, Pan Yue, party chief of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, said efforts should be made “to open up a brand new situation of high-quality development of the party’s work on ethnic affairs in the new era”.

The commission is responsible for drafting laws regarding China’s policies towards its ethnic minority groups as well as implementing those laws and regulations.

Pan is also a deputy head of the United Front Work Department, the body responsible for liaising with non-party groups, overseeing the country’s ethnic and religious issues and overseas Chinese affairs.

The Tuesday meeting also called for efforts to make economic development “a process of forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation”.

It also emphasised “strengthening the party’s centralised and unified leadership on ethnic affairs” to promote “strong synergy for the party’s work on ethnic affairs in the new era”.

Western countries use UN-backed review to press China on its treatment of activists and minorities

23 January 2024, ABC27

GENEVA (AP) — Western countries used a regular U.N.-backed review of China’s human rights record Tuesday to press Beijing to do more to allow freedom of expression, protect the rights of ethnic minorities and to repeal a national security law in Hong Kong that troubles independent activists.

China’s ambassador in Geneva, Chen Xu, led a delegation from some 20 Chinese ministries for the “universal periodic review” conducted under the U.N. Human Rights Council. He stressed China’s progress in poverty eradication, said citizens engage in “democratic elections” and gave assurance that freedom of religious belief is safeguarded.

“China upholds respect for and protection of human rights as a task of importance in state governance,” Chen said through an interpreter. “We have embarked on a path of human rights development that is in keeping with the trend of the times and appropriate to China’s national conditions and so-called historic achievements in this process.”

“We uphold the people-centered philosophy and strive to deliver a better life for all the people,” he said.

An extraordinarily high number of more than 160 countries — some critics of Beijing, some allies — registered to take part in the discussion. That meant each country had a maximum of 45 seconds to speak, forcing some ambassadors into what at times felt like a speed-reading exercise.

China’s delegation had a total of 70 minutes to make its case.

The review process, which encourages constructive recommendations over sharp criticism, nevertheless gave way to firm, if not scathing, advice to China from some leading Western countries, while some of China’s friends rallied to its defense.

Ambassador Leslie Norton of Canada urged China to end “enforced disappearances targeting human rights defenders, ethnic minorities and Falun Gong practitioners.” Falun Gong is a spiritual movement.

Czech Ambassador Vaclav Balek said China needed to stop “the criminalization of religious and peaceful civil expression” and “cross-border kidnappings and intimidating Chinese citizens living abroad.” Slovenian Ambassador Anita Pipan recommended that China “establish a moratorium on the death penalty.”

U.K. Ambassador Simon Manley called for a halt to the prosecution of Jimmy Lai, a former Hong Kong publisher who is on trial for alleged national security violations, and an end to the forced repatriation of North Koreans who fled into China.

Kozo Honsei, Japan's deputy permanent representative in Geneva, called for better protection of the rights of minorities in Tibet and northwestern China's Xinjiang region. U.S. Ambassador Michele Taylor presented a list of concerns, concluding with, "We condemn the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang and transnational repression to silence individuals abroad." Some independent organizations and the United States have accused China of genocide against minority Muslim Uighurs in Xinjiang, but no U.N. bodies have affirmed that. China lashed out at a 2022 report by the U.N.'s then-human rights chief citing possible crimes against humanity committed in the region.

The hearing offered a wide-ranging look at the human rights situation in China. Bolivia's envoy commended China's efforts to reduce deforestation, Burundi's representative urged China to improve access to health care in central regions and to better housing in Hong Kong and Macao, and Iran praised China's "national action plan for human rights."

First secretary Ilia Barmin of Russia's diplomatic mission advised China "to consistently improve the understanding and capacity of citizens to use standard spoken and written Chinese in Xinjiang."

Many developing-world countries praised China's policies on issues like poverty reduction and economic development policies while also offering suggestions to Beijing. Frankye Bronwen Levy, political affairs counselor for South Africa, called on China to strengthen an anti-domestic violence law passed eight years ago.

Hilary Power, the Geneva director of Human Rights Watch, called it "utterly shameful" that many countries opted to "use their platform at the U.N.'s top human rights body to praise Beijing's rights record, or stay silent in the face of well-documented grave crimes."

The "universal periodic review" puts all U.N. member states up for scrutiny – at times sharp – by other countries roughly every five years. The 3 1/2-hour discussion aims to offer constructive criticism and to yield a written report with recommendations. On Monday, countries examined Saudi Arabia's rights record.

At China's last review in 2018, the United States and other countries voiced concerns about its treatment of Muslim Uighurs in Xinjiang.

Groups that included Falun Gong practitioners, Uighurs and pro-Tibet activists held small demonstrations outside the U.N. Geneva compound during Tuesday's discussion. Inside, roughly 100 activists from nongovernmental groups attended the session or watched it from a "spillover room" in the vast complex, officials said.

Another advocacy group sent representatives to speak out against the forced repatriation from China of women from North Korea who fled the nation under leader Kim Jong Un's rule.

China's human rights record criticised at UN as it faces rare scrutiny of policies

23 January 2024, The Guardian

The UK, the US and several other countries criticised China's human rights record on Tuesday as the country was subjected to rare scrutiny of its policies at the United Nations.

The UK called on China to "cease the persecution and arbitrary detention of Uyghurs and Tibetans and allow genuine freedom of religion or belief and cultural expression without fear of surveillance, torture, forced labour or sexual violence", while the US said China should "release all arbitrarily detained individuals" and cease the operation of "forcible assimilation policies including boarding schools in Tibet and Xinjiang".

The UK also recommended that the national security law in Hong Kong be repealed and specifically called for the prosecution of the pro-democracy activist Jimmy Lai to be dropped.

The recommendations were made as part of the UN Human Rights Council's universal periodic review, a mechanism by which the 193 UN member states review each others' human rights records every five years.

Each country at the UN headquarters in Geneva was given 45 seconds to make recommendations based on China's human rights records since 2018. In that period, huge protests against the tightening grip of the Chinese Communist party (CCP) in Hong Kong prompted the imposition of a national security law that critics say criminalises dissent, and there has been increased international scrutiny of the human rights situation in Xinjiang, as well as growing concern about transnational repression as activists in the US, the UK and other countries have been targeted by Chinese authorities or agents.

Responding to the recommendations, China's UN ambassador, Chen Xu, said concerns were caused by "misunderstanding or misinformation".

Chen said: "A few countries groundlessly accuse and smear China, based not on facts but on ideological bias and unfounded rumours and lies."

Tuesday's meeting was the first time China has been through the review process since the UN's report on Xinjiang was published in August 2022. The long-delayed report, which was written by the outgoing human rights commissioner Michelle Bachelet, found China was committing “serious human rights violations” against Uyghurs in Xinjiang. Beijing described it as “disinformation”.

Several countries brought up China’s policies in Xinjiang during Tuesday’s meeting. The region, along with Tibet, has become a byword for Beijing’s repressive human rights policies, particularly towards religious and ethnic minorities.

Human rights activists said that the fact that several countries mentioned Tibet in this year’s review bucked a recent trend of the region not being spoken about on the international stage.

Many smaller countries, or countries that are economically dependent on China, praised China’s rights record, in particular its success at lifting tens of millions of people out of poverty since 2018.

Ethiopia said it “applauds China for improving the criminal litigation system”, while Iran said: “We appreciate the economic programmes implemented by the government of China with the aim of promoting social, cultural and economic rights.”

Bhutan, a small, landlocked country between India and China that has recently been warming its relationship with Beijing, said: “We commend the significant progress in poverty alleviation and the achievement of the poverty reduction target of the 2030 agenda ahead of schedule.”

Speaking after the UN session, Sophie Richardson, a former China director for Human Rights Watch, said: “We increasingly hear Chinese government rhetoric in the recommendations made by governments, I think indicating a level of control over the process or influence over the process, and that’s problematic.”

Zumretay Arkin, the spokesperson for the World Uyghur Congress, criticised central Asian countries for failing to speak out against the abuse of Uyghurs, Kazakhs and other minorities in Xinjiang and said: “Muslim-majority countries have failed the Uyghurs.” China’s foreign ministry has been approached for comment.

Xi Jinping urges loyalty from China’s courts and law enforcers to ‘defuse’ social and financial risks

15 January 2024, South China Morning Post

Chinese President Xi Jinping has urged the country’s judicial and law enforcement authorities to safeguard national security, calling on the courts, prosecutors and public security authorities to “defuse” social and economic risks, and for their continued loyalty to the Communist Party.

Xi’s instructions were delivered during a two-day national conference over the weekend for the country’s zhengfa departments – the political and legal authorities responsible for domestic security.

The instructions were delivered at the virtual meeting by Chen Wenqing, the head of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission, a party body that oversees all security-related matters, according to state news agency Xinhua. Xi did not address the meeting in person.

In his instructions, Xi said judicial and law enforcement departments should “uphold the absolute leadership” of the party, and use their development to support and serve China’s modernisation.

He said they should provide strong security guarantees for “the comprehensive advancement of the construction of a strong nation and the great cause of national rejuvenation”.

Beijing has been placing growing significance on national security, especially over the past year. Xi has also repeated the significance of security issues at high-level meetings.

Xi urged the departments to “resolutely safeguard national security” and “prevent and resolve major security risks”.

He also called for efforts to “resolutely maintain social stability” and “correctly handle internal conflicts among the people”, noting that the “Fengqiao experience in the new era” should be upheld and developed.

The “Fengqiao experience” refers to a mechanism for mobilising the masses to settle social conflicts at the grass-roots level without needing to involve higher legal bodies. The concept dates back to the times of Mao Zedong and has been promoted by Xi as an integral part of improving social governance. Xi also stressed the need to maintain order in the socialist market economy, and improve the business environment based on the rule of law.

He called for strengthening the party’s political construction of the judicial and law enforcement departments to “forge a loyal, clean and responsible iron army”.

Public Security Minister Wang Xiaohong presided over the meeting, which was also attended by Zhang Jun, president of the Supreme People’s Court, and Ying Yong, procurator-general of the Supreme People’s Procuratorate.

The meeting also focused on emerging economic crimes, and punishment for offenders who disrupt the country’s socialist market economy, such as by violating financial management rules, financial fraud, and infringing on intellectual property rights, according to state media reports.

Participants also discussed the need to step up a crackdown on telecoms fraud and cross-border gambling.

China Builds Spy Stations in Mountains on Disputed Border

15 January 2024, Newsweek

China has been building new radar and electronic warfare facilities in the mountains along its long, disputed border with India, recent satellite imagery revealed.

An expansive radome—a structure housing radar and other signals intelligence equipment—is under construction at Lake Mansarovar in its southwestern Tibet region, according to stills captured this month.

The facility appeared to be equipped with dedicated solar arrays to ensure a sustained power supply, photographs from Sinergise's Sentinel Hub website showed. The service hosts images from the Sentinel-2 satellite of the European Union's Copernicus Earth observation program.

China and India have been locked in an escalated military standoff for nearly four years since a deadly border clash in the summer of 2020, itself a result of their decades-long unsettled Himalayan boundary. The buildup of military infrastructure is thought to be part of the People's Liberation Army's broader strategy of enhancing its intelligence gathering and electronic warfare capabilities, with both forces deployed in the mountainous regions throughout the year.

In a report last September, Kartik Bommakanti, a senior fellow with the Observer Research Foundation think tank in New Delhi, described the PLA's electronic warfare regiment as multifaceted, capable of electromagnetic attacks and jamming, long-distance electronic surveillance, as well as cyber operations and communications near the border.

The regiment had a similar setup to Russia's reconnaissance and fire system, suggesting that the Chinese military units would likely provide support to artillery and air defense brigades within the PLA Ground Force.

India, however, is far from idle. Air Chief Marshal Vivek Ram Chaudhari of the Indian Air Force has disclosed ambitious plans to bolster frontier defenses with locally produced military technology. They would include mountain radars that would extend India's vision deep into neighboring territory, he said last fall.

It is part of an India's air force modernization program that will also include the introduction of autonomous combat and reconnaissance drones in the coming years.

Other capabilities will include long-range surface-to-air missile systems, fighter jets, helicopters, and ballistic missiles, Chaudhari said in his briefing, which emphasized New Delhi's desire to reduce its traditional reliance on foreign hardware in favor of enhancing its domestic defense industry.

Addressing concerns regarding the Chinese military buildup across the 2,300-mile Line of Actual Control, Chaudhari said India was constantly monitoring developments with intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance. The Center for International and Strategic Studies, a think tank in Washington, D.C., reported on the construction of another listening post in an analysis published in November 2022.

The new radome, first captured by satellites in late 2021, sits atop a mountain peak north of Lake Mansarovar and houses high-frequency towers and at least one support building, with the groundwork for other structures already underway.

The CSIS report speculated that the radome could serve signals intelligence collection and satellite communications, supplementing another existing facility by Pangong Tso Lake on the disputed border, near the valley where Chinese and Indian soldiers fought in 2020.

China's patriotic education law a bad news for ethnic minority areas

06 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan06'24) – China ushered in the year 2024 with the implementation of its Patriotic Education Law, which was adopted by its rubberstamp parliament in Oct 2023. The sweeping new law aims to get families, schools, companies, international institutions, and especially religious centres and ethnic minority areas, to deepen patriotism in the Communist Party of China (CPC)-state.

In particular, the law is seen as being directed at cracking down on people embracing ideas of liberal democracy and human rights. In the case of ethnic minority regions, it will give a new fillip to the ongoing assimilation drive being carried out in the name of Sinicization of religion, education, and so forth.

Under the new law, schools must include patriotic education in their curriculum, while companies must do so in their operations, such as business management and staff training. Parents should also “include love of the motherland in family education”, says the law.

Besides, measures will be taken to strengthen patriotism among residents in Hong Kong and Macau, beef up publicity and education on unifying China, and strengthening communication with overseas Chinese and Taiwan residents, noted the straitstimes.com Jan 4.

As in the case of schools, the new law requires religious groups and places of religious activities to conduct patriotic education, with the aim to strengthen national awareness among clergy and believers and guide religions to align with socialist society, noted the voanews.com Jan 5.

Late last month, on Christmas Eve, China's top political adviser, Wang Huning, delivered a stern message to Christian leaders, urging "strict" management of religious affairs and unwavering allegiance to the Communist Party's vision for Christianity, the report noted.

Outlining a clear vision for the future of Christianity in China, Wang has made it clear that religious leaders must "adhere to the direction of Sinicization of Christianity."

The Sinicization campaign applies, of course, to all religions and, all the more, to the ethnic minority areas where the focus will be on assimilation.

Besides, under the new law, insulting national symbols such as China's flag, emblem and the country's heroes and martyrs will attract punishment. Assistant Professor Dylan Loh at the Nanyang Technological University's Public Policy and Global Affairs programme has said the law came about as the CPC had "identified risks, particularly among some disenfranchised and politically apathetic youths".

"It is clearly unacceptable to depart from CPC hagiography and ideology, such as embracing Western ideas of democracy, freedom of speech.

"But now it is increasingly a problem for the party that people don't care and want to make as much money as possible. That, seen through the party's eyes, is also equally threatening for the legitimacy and longevity of the party," the straitstimes.com report quoted the China expert as saying.

The report noted that reactions to the new law have been mixed, with netizens leaving both supportive comments and questions on whether love for a country should be enforced.

Some netizens have also taken a dig at party officials with family members who have migrated to the United States or are currently studying there, and asked if that is patriotism. Some parents have expressed concern that students' learning will be affected by the changes.

A parent in Beijing, named only as Mrs Fan, has said she was concerned that any changes will "affect the development of critical thinking skills in schools"; that schools may not allow probing questions about Chinese history.

Even Mr Li Yong, 42, a project manager at a state-owned enterprise and who supports the new law, sees a downside in the changes, saying, "I guess if there's one thing I'm worried about, it is that the new law will mean more homework for my daughter. She is busy enough at school."

'No one is safe': China purges record number of senior officials in 2023, with more 'tigers' likely to fall

03 January 2024, South China Morning Post

China's battle against corruption set new records last year, with the ruling Communist Party's anti-corruption watchdog launching probes into 45 senior officials, according to a tally by the South China Morning Post.

The record number of investigations came five years after Chinese President Xi Jinping declared a "crushing victory" in his war on corruption, a sweeping crackdown that was launched in 2013. The ongoing probe signals that he has little interest in letting up on an effort to clean up China's officialdom while pushing authorities ever harder to implement his policies.

The number of senior-level investigations launched in 2023 jumped by 40 per cent compared with 2022, when the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) – China's top anti corruption agency – recorded 32 investigations into high-ranking officials, based on official announcements by the CCDI. Most of the subjects who were placed under investigation – sometimes referred to as "tigers" – belonged to a pool of officials known as "centrally managed cadres", meaning they held ranks at the deputy ministerial level or above. A smaller number of them held slightly lower ranks but occupied key positions in important sectors.

Unlike their subordinates who are managed and supervised by the local branches of the party's organisation and disciplinary agency, the group of senior officials are under direct management of the Communist Party's Central Organisation Department, its top personnel body. If any wrongdoing is found, they would face top level investigations from the CCDI.

Twenty-seven of the 45 senior cadres who had faced detention by the disciplinary watchdog were found to have retired from their positions when they faced investigation, according to further research.

Deng Yuwen, a former deputy editor at the Study Times, official newspaper of the Central Party School where cadres are trained, said the fact that most of the CCDI's investigations focused on retired officials signalled that the probes uncovered more misconduct before Xi took power, and that such retirements would not allow the individuals to avoid further investigation.

"Among the officials arrested in recent years, not many were caught for corruption in their current positions. Most of the problems occurred in the past few years, or even more than 10, 20 years ago. The CCDI is no longer following the previous unspoken rule that retired officials will be spared from investigation," he said.

"Now, no one is safe. As Xi digs deeper, he just finds more problems that accumulated over the past three decades due to rapid economic development and lax party discipline. And there is no sign of him stopping the digging."

A total of 294 senior officials have been sacked by the CCDI in the 11 years since the anti-corruption campaign was launched, according to the Post's count.

However, this number does not include most of the corruption probes in the Chinese military, which conducts its own investigations through the Discipline Inspection Commission. The agency, which operates within China's top military command – the Central Military Commission (CMC) – led by Xi, operates under extreme secrecy.

Beijing announces such cases very selectively, as it did for the investigations of former CMC deputy chairmen Xu Caihou and Guo Boxiong during Xi's first presidential term. They were the highest ranking officers in the People's Liberation Army to be targeted since the anti-corruption drive began.

Before 2023, the most senior officials investigated in a single year by the CCDI had been in 2014, when 38 individuals were targeted.

In 2020, 18 officials were placed under investigation. But since then, the annual tally has been rising: 25 high ranking officials were investigated in 2021, and 32 in 2022.

On Saturday, the National People's Congress, China's top legislative body, announced the dismissal of nine generals.

Five of the officers were either past or current top commanders in the PLA Rocket Force, a key component of the country's nuclear arsenal. They included Li Yuchao, who had commanded the rocket force from January last year until he was replaced in July, and his former deputy, Zhang Zhenzhong.

Beijing has not confirmed if any of the nine men were under investigation for alleged corruption, although some were reportedly being probed earlier last year. A political researcher at Peking University said there were many obvious signs that suggest that China's "tiger hunt" will expand even further in 2024.

"We have the removal of [former foreign minister] Qin Gang and [former defence minister] Li Shangfu. We also saw the National People's Congress just officially dismiss nine PLA generals, indicating a sweeping investigation in the military has got preliminary results," said the researcher, who declined to be named due to the sensitivity of the matter.

No reasons have been provided for the dismissals of Qin and Li, who were both stripped of their positions last year.

"I suspect only a tiny amount of information regarding these cases will be released to the public, just for minimal formalities."

The CCDI will begin its third plenum from next Monday to lay out the work priorities in the new year for tens of millions of discipline inspectors across the country.

China's cadres urged to connect with the masses as part of education campaign, but some question its methods

02 January 2024, South China Morning Post

After hearing complaints about local water quality in the southeastern city of Hefei, the provincial party boss visited the neighbourhood to take a sip from the tap – as reporters and camera crews looked on – to assure residents it was safe to drink.

The gesture by Anhui province's Communist Party secretary Han Jun was one of several covered by state-run media in recent months to show how party leaders have put into practice President Xi Jinping's teachings about connecting with the masses.

According to the Anhui Daily, Han's unannounced visit to the community was an example of how senior cadres had "put people's interests first" by visiting residents to address their grievances – an idea Xi first promoted 35 years ago when he became party chief of the city of Ningde in the southeastern province of Fujian.

To mark the anniversary of the practice, Xi's teachings have been promoted as part of an education campaign for cadres. In late December, hundreds of officials gathered in Beijing to attend a forum chaired by Politburo member Li Ganjie, with similar events held around the country.

However, while cadres are studying and imitating Xi's ideas on how to connect with the masses, which have been dubbed the "four downs" in a reference to going "down to the grass roots", some question the effectiveness of the methods and the education campaign.

A video of Anhui party boss Han taking a swig of Hefei tap water attracted plenty of "thumbs up" reactions on social media. But the 47,000 comments posted below the clip included many who appeared confused, with some asking how Han could check the quality of the water by drinking it.

Alfred Wu, associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, also questioned Han's actions, noting that testing water quality was not part of the professional skills or job duties of a provincial party secretary.

Xi's ideas on the "four downs" have been widely taught among the party's rank and file. The teachings include bringing the party's policy down the masses, as well as receiving petitions from the people and working among the masses and at the grass-roots level.

An official who took part in the education campaign in Fujian province and asked to remain anonymous said the latest round of training, which began in September, focused on officials at the prefecture and county level with a closer working relationship with local communities.

When asked about the education campaign, responses from junior officials ranged from supportive to dismissive.

"I do believe the 'down to grass roots level' campaign is effective in solving people's problems," said a recent university graduate who is now a civil servant in the northern province of Jilin.

"I took part in a campaign to promote production safety for businesses such as the use of firefighting equipment," said the civil servant, who also asked to remain anonymous. "I think our visits did help enhance people's knowledge in this regard." Others rejected the visits to local communities as publicity stunts or political shows.

One local civil servant in the southwestern province of Sichuan said, "What's the point of conducting such investigations?"

"We were all told about them in advance so everything was well prepared ahead of the visits," she said.

"It only adds to the burden of us grass-roots civil servants because we have to prepare all the documents and materials for these investigations by the senior cadres."

Wu of the National University of Singapore said there might be a gap between what top leaders in Beijing envisioned for the campaign and the reality on the ground.

"It can be a beautiful vision when the campaign is launched but cadres in the grass roots level may see it differently," Wu said.

"The Chinese [governance] system is very top-down and sometimes local cadres only want to appease their bosses and check the box, independent of whether the problems are solved," he added.

Compared with previous political drives, the latest education campaign, which is expected to end this month, has emphasised regular visits by senior cadres to the masses as part of the doctrine of Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era.

In November, the Central Commission of Discipline Inspection, the party's top disciplinary body, published an article warning cadres that they must take the investigation mandate seriously and avoid "ills such as formalism" – a term that refers to performing duties in a perfunctory manner – that would add to the burden of junior cadres.

Li Chuncheng, a professor at the School of International Relations and Public Affairs of Fudan University in Shanghai, said party elites could better address problems such as formalism by having the disciplinary watchdog supervise grass-roots inspections and visits by officials.

"There are two inspection mechanisms that can be used to regulate formalism," Li said.

"The first is to incorporate formalism into the scope of inspection work of the disciplinary inspection commission. The second one is to set up a dialogue channel between policymakers [at the top] and the cadres responsible for implementation [at the lower level]."

"But the disciplinary commission now only oversees disciplinary matters and there is no dialogue mechanism in the current bureaucracy."

Wu said it would be hard to assess how effective the campaign had been without independent studies or public polls.

"I think Xi wants to use the campaign as a tool to increase his prestige and popularity among the cadres and the people, but it's hard for us to verify if Xi's goal is achieved with the lack of poll results in China," Wu said.

TIBET DIGEST 2024

FOUNDATION FOR
Non-violent
Alternatives
To inform and shape policy on Tibet and the region

PROTESTS, DETENTIONS AND OTHER NEWS FROM THE PRC

www.fnvaworld.org
143, 4th Floor, Uday Park, New Delhi, 49
office@fnvaworld.org

Disclaimer: FNVA does not endorse "China's Tibet", "Tibet Autonomous Region of China", "Xizang" or any such phrase that denotes Tibet has been/is a part of China. Articles that contain such phraseology are news items from the Chinese state media and must not be confused as endorsement by FNVA

Highlights China's human rights violations in Tibet-2024

30 December 2024, The Tibet Post, Tenzin Lhadon

PROTESTS, DETENTIONS AND OTHER NEWS FROM THE PRC

Chinese government forcefully crackdown Tibetan peaceful protestors for protecting their land and river from construction mega dam on them and force to shift Monasteries and Villages, shutting down famous Tibetan-run schools and Monastery schools, forcefully to take out young monks out of the Monasteries schools and forcefully to put in the Chinese colonial style boarding school. China also detains arrest, imprison and even kill Tibetans for merely exercise basic rights and freedom, practice religion.

Around 300 Tibetans gathered in front of the Dege county government building on February 14, 2024 to protest against the construction of the largest hydroelectric power plant in their region and the forced displacement of their homes and monasteries. Hundreds of Tibetans begged the Chinese authorities to halt the construction of the Kamtok dam on the Drichu River in the Gege region. However, instead of listening to the Tibetans, the Chinese police and army arrested hundreds of Tibetans and severely beat them, on February 22, 2024.

Chinese government has forcibly shut down the most popular school, the Gangjong Sherig Norbu School , where Tibetan students from three provinces of Tibet come to study and where the graduates are well-trained students who do excellent work in Tibetan societies. The teachers and students cried so hard that they could not control their sadness at the closure of their beloved school after 30 years.

Chinese police killed a Tibetan monk by torturing him while in detention. Chinese police detained a Tibetan monk named Losel from Sera monastery in Lhasa, Tibet, in May 2024, on suspicion of sharing information about Tibet with Tibetans in exile. He died as a result of the beatings, ill-treatment and torture he suffered during his detention.

A Tibetan man named Damdul died in November 2021, after being brutally tortured by Chinese police while in the detention. He had been arrested on March 5, 2021, for sharing the teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama on Chinese social media and for keeping photos and CDs of His Holiness in his home in Lhasa, the Capital of Tibet.

Chinese authorities sentenced a Tibetan monk named Lobsang Tashi from Kriti monastery to three years in prison, in a secret trial, at the end of 2021, over allegedly contacting prayers for those who died during the Covid-19 pandemic, and making offerings (money offering to pray) to offices of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Kirti Rinpoche for the deceased. China has conducted major crackdowns on religious freedom in all parts of Tibet, continued over the years, and 269 Tibetan people were placed under investigation for allegedly involving in so-called "illegal spiritual practices", on March 25, 2024 and those arrested may face prison terms ranging from 5 to 17 years.

Chinese authorities arrested a well-educated young Tibetan monk named Tenzin Chenrab and writer from Nyakchu County, in eastern Tibet, in September 2023, for possessing a photo of Tibet's spiritual leader, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and several e-books in his phone. Tenzin Chenrab's 53-year-old mother dead after not hearing his only son for long time. Chinese authorities murdered a girl named Tsedon , a second-year undergraduate in Tibet University in Lhasa, Tibet, on January 15, 2024. She was detained by Chinese police in Ritso Township, Nyemo County, central Tibet, on December 26, 2023 with explaining reason for detention. After 21 days in detention, the police informed her family that she was dead and refused to return her body to the family members.

Chinese authorities arrested a Tibetan monk called Jampa Choephel from Rebgong County, in March, 2024, for posting the teachings of His Holiness the Dalai Lama on his social media platform (Wechat). After five months in detention, he was sentenced by a Chinese court last month to one and a half years in prison.

A Tibetan woman named Tsering Tso , arrested by the Yushu police on June 29, 2024, accused of 'endangering social stability', interrogated and detained for 10 days, then released on July 8, 2024. Who had exercised her rights and criticised the Chinese authorities for their racial discrimination against Tibetans and for posting videos on the social media app about the incident. This is six times she has been detained by Chinese authorities.

Chinese authorities have banned Tibetans from entering the Atsog Moastery in Dragkar County, northern Tibet. But on April 9, 2024, hundreds of Tibetans circled the monastery to pray and bid farewell to the soon-to-be-demolished temple. This is because the monastery will be demolished to build a huge dam on the Yellow River near the monastery.

Chinese authorities from WeChat Company have indiscriminately shut down the "Great Sheep-fold ," a popular blog in the Tibetan language on WeChat on April 2, 2024, which contained over 10,000 pieces directly related to the cultural heritage and humanistic literature of Tibet.

Chinese authorities arrested a Tibetan monk called Lobsang Thamke in June, 2023, for allegedly publishing Tibetan books from outside Tibet and contacting Tibetans in exile.

China detains a young Tibetan, Tsoewo Tsering , after he openly denounced the illegal extraction of sand by a Chinese company (Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering Co, Ltd) in Tibet, on the banks of a river in Tsa-Ri-Ma Township of Gakog County, Ngaba, Tibet, on October 15, 2024.

Tibetan language rights activist Tashi Wangchuk detained again by Chinese authorities on October 22, 2024, over allegedly spreading misinformation about China and making accusations against government policy in his videos on the social media. He was released after 15 days in detention.

The Chinese government has issued a statement warning Tibetans that Tibetans, particularly monks on early April, 2024, cannot do anything related to His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, including keeping and hanging a picture of him and praying for him, cannot perform religious rituals after his death and cannot disrupt the process of his reincarnation by China.

CCP force Tibetan officials to sign a pledge not to practice religion, on January 22, 2024. Chinese authorities in Wolong Township, Wenchuan County, eastern Tibet, forced Tibetan officials to sign a pledge: "not to believe in religion, not to participate in religious activities, never to promote or spread religion anywhere and always to listen to the Chinese Communist Party, be grateful to the Party, follow the Party".

On December 14, 2024, Chinese authorities in Gonghe County, northeastern Tibet, arrested well-known Tibetan entrepreneur and Internet celebrity Sonam Choedup , whose Internet name is Aga Gelek Tsang (better known as Aga Gelek), along with his partners and friends, including Kunsang Dorjee, Tenpa, Tsenthar Gyal and Tashi Loden, in the name of China's "sweep away the black and eliminate the evil" political campaign. The entrepreneur has helped many Tibetan students, disabled students and small Tibetan entrepreneurs. He has also participated in charity work and disaster relief operations, making substantial donations.

Chinese authorities torture Tibetan village head to death amid crackdown on Tibetan Language

25 December 2024, ANI

Chinese authorities have wrongfully arrested over 20 Tibetans and tortured to death a Tibetan village head Gonpo Namgyal, who was subjected to months of severe torture, including repeated electric shock sessions during his detention, as per a report in Tibet.net.

The Central Tibetan Administration reported that Namgyal, a village head in Ponkor township, Darlag County, located in the Tibetan region of Amdo (now part of Qinghai, Sichuan, and Gansu provinces) tragically died on December 18. His death comes after over seven months of inhuman treatment in custody, where he was held for participating in a cultural campaign led by the Tibetan Language Association.

The crackdown in May 2024 followed the launch of the "Pure Mother Tongue" campaign, spearheaded by the association under the leadership of Khenpo Tenpa Dhargye, a Tibetan Buddhist teacher.

The campaign aimed to preserve the Tibetan language, which has been increasingly threatened by Chinese policies promoting Mandarin as the dominant language. The Chinese government arrested Khenpo Tenpa Dhargye and Gonpo Namgyal, along with several others, accusing them of "endangering state security." They were taken to Golog Prefecture headquarters for detention, reported by the Central Tibetan Administration.

While Gonpo Namgyal was eventually released due to ill health, he passed away within three days of his release. During the preparation of his body for cremation, it was discovered that many of his internal organs had been burned, presumably due to the electric torture he endured while in custody.

Khenpo Tenpa Dhargye, a close associate of the revered Lama Jigme Phuntsok, had been a vocal advocate for the preservation of Tibetan culture, including language and traditional practices. His arrest and the ongoing uncertainty surrounding his condition have deeply concerned Tibetan communities in the region, prompting widespread religious prayers and ceremonies for his health and safe release.

The Chinese government's continued persecution of influential Tibetan figures like Khenpo Tenpa Dhargye and Gonpo Namgyal reflects its broader effort to suppress Tibetan identity and resistance. These actions are seen as part of a systematic attempt to undermine Tibetan culture and language in favour of a "Chinese national unity consciousness," at the cost of basic human rights for Tibetans.

China's top procuratorate orders arrest of former senior political advisor

24 December 2024, Global Times

China's Supreme People's Procuratorate (SPP) has ordered the arrest of Wu Yingjie, a former member of the Standing Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), for suspected bribe-taking, the SPP said Tuesday.

Wu was also former head of the Committee on Culture, Historical Data and Studies of the CPPCC National Committee.

The case was transferred to procuratorial authorities for examination and prosecution following the conclusion of an investigation by the National Commission of Supervision.

The handling of the case is underway.

China: Five years on, activists jailed in 'cruel' 2019 crackdown must be released

23 December 2024, Amnesty International

It is time to step up demands for the Chinese government to release human rights defenders detained after attending a social gathering five years ago, Amnesty International said today.

In December 2019, a number of human rights activists met in the southeastern city of Xiamen for a dinner and discussion of social issues. From the 26th of that month, and over the weeks that followed, Chinese authorities forcibly disappeared human rights lawyer Ding Jiaxi and legal scholar Xu Zhiyong until they re-surfaced in government detention.

Amnesty International considers both men prisoners of conscience and has consistently advocated for their immediate and unconditional release.

"The Xiamen crackdown epitomizes the Chinese authorities' all-out assault on civil society and the cruelty with which they treat peaceful rights advocates," said Sarah Brooks, Amnesty International's China Director.

At least five other activists were also targeted, and detained, for their affiliation with the gathering. In the months that followed, all seven activists were reportedly held in "residential surveillance at a designated location" (RSDL), a form of secret incommunicado detention that places detainees at increased risk of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.

"Over the past five years, Xu Zhiyong and Ding Jiaxi – along with several of their companions – have endured arbitrary detention, torture and unfair trials, merely because they attended a private gathering and discussed the civil society situation and current affairs in China."

Following closed-door trials, on 10 April 2023 Xu Zhiyong and Ding Jiaxi were sentenced to 14 and 12 years in prison respectively for "subverting state power". In October 2024, Xu Zhiyong began a hunger strike to protest his treatment in prison, which included being harassed by fellow cellmates, apparently at the behest of prison officials.

"The continued imprisonment of Xu Zhiyong and Ding Jiaxi is an outrage, and the international community must ramp up pressure on the Chinese government to address this injustice and secure their release," Sarah Brooks said.

The Chinese authorities must immediately release Ding and Xu and stop punishing all those who participated in the Xiamen gathering.

Both Ding and Xu have been the subject of recommendations to Chinese authorities by multiple governments and by UN officials, including High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Türk. Yet concrete actions to demand access to these individuals or to increase the consequences to Chinese authorities for their crackdown on human rights defenders have not materialized.

"The harsh sentences meted out to Xu and Ding are meant to send a message: that to fight to defend one's rights is unacceptable to the Chinese government. Yet they persisted, and now their family members carry on advocating for their release with that same conviction."

Ding Jiayi's wife, Sophie Luo, told Amnesty International ahead of the fifth anniversary of the Xiamen gathering: "I know that attending a private gathering does not violate any laws, and these citizens should not be imprisoned for even a day. Therefore, I will fight tirelessly for the dismissal of this case." A support group active online coordinated by activists in and outside of China is collecting messages and prayers to share with Xu, despite censorship and the risk of government retaliation.

"The Chinese authorities must immediately release Ding and Xu and stop punishing all those who participated in the Xiamen gathering. The grim picture painted by their continued imprisonment should galvanize international condemnation for China's crackdown on civil society," Sarah Brooks said.

Xu Zhiyong and Ding Jiayi were prominent members of the New Citizens' Movement, a loose network of activists founded by Xu in 2012 to promote government transparency and expose corruption. Both had been jailed previously due to their advocacy; Ding served three and a half years and was released in October 2016, while Xu – whose sentence was slightly longer – was released in 2017. Xu and Ding appealed their 2023 convictions, but in November 2023, the Shandong Provincial High Court upheld the verdict and sentence against them. Both have now requested a second appeal.

In jail, Ding and Xu have been deprived of fundamental rights, including access to reading and writing materials; have severe restrictions on their right to communicate with family and friends; and have reported challenges seeking medical care. Possibly in response to his hunger strike, the Chinese authorities allowed Xu to meet with his lawyer on 26 November 2024. It appears that Xu has since stopped his hunger strike.

Human rights defenders in China continue to face intimidation, harassment, arbitrary detention, as well as torture and other ill-treatment for defending human rights and exercising their freedoms of expression and association. Such retaliation often also extends to their family members and colleagues. As in many cases of Chinese activists, friends and family of Xu and Ding have faced threats and harassment for speaking out. For years, Xu was not only prevented from seeing his family but lacked legal counsel of his choosing; three lawyers appointed by his family withdrew from representing Xu, reportedly due to threats and intimidation from Chinese authorities.

Other human rights activists targeted in connection with the Xiamen gathering include:

- Chang Weiping was sentenced to three and a half years in prison; he has served his sentence and was released in July 2024 but remains subject to a travel ban
- Li Qiaochu received a sentence of three years and eight months; she has served her sentence and was released in August 2024 but remains subject to a travel ban plus two years of deprivation of political rights
- Zhang Zhongshun was sentenced to four and a half years in prison in November 2024
- Dai Zhenya and Li Yingjun were released on bail after spending time in RSDL, and they are also subject to a travel ban.

Amnesty International considers a prisoner of conscience to be any person imprisoned solely because of their political, religious or other conscientiously held beliefs, their ethnic origin, sex, colour, language, national or social origin, socio-economic status, birth, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, or other status, and who has not used violence or advocated violence or hatred in the circumstances leading to their detention.

Prominent Tibetan activist detained for two weeks amid Chinese discrimination

21 December 2024, ANI

A prominent Tibetan rights activist, Tsering Tso, was detained for two weeks in Qinghai province from November 29 to December 13 on charges of "spreading false information" and "causing trouble" via social media, as reported by Radio Free Asia. The 39-year-old has long been outspoken against Chinese authorities, advocating for equal rights for Tibetans and exposing discrimination faced by her community.

Radio Free Asia reported that Tso, who operates a travel business in Tibet and across China, has been detained or harassed multiple times in the past five years. Her recent detention stemmed from a video she posted in November 2024, in which a police officer at the Public Security Bureau in Trika County, also known as Guide in Chinese, denied her passport application, claiming she had a criminal record.

Tso's social media posts frequently criticise Chinese authorities for their discriminatory practices, particularly regarding the treatment of Tibetans.

Upon her release, Tso expressed defiance, stating, "The laws in Qinghai differ from those in China. Each time I report on the police force's discriminatory practices and violations of their disciplinary rules, they exert their power to detain and pressure the whistleblower on false charges arbitrarily." Tso has been a vocal critic of the challenges Tibetans face in running businesses in their homeland, accusing local officials of corruption and abusing their power for personal gain.

In October 2023, two videos surfaced showing Tso highlighting the difficulties Tibetans face in obtaining business licenses and accusing local leaders of corruption. She also raised concerns over the unfair treatment of two Tibetan monks, who were subjected to additional scrutiny and required to obtain extra permits during their pilgrimage, while Chinese tourists were not. Earlier this year, Tso endured a 10-day detention for "endangering social stability" after speaking out against these discriminatory practices.

Tso's activism reflects the ongoing struggle for equal rights for Tibetans, who continue to face systemic discrimination under Chinese rule.

Testimony of a Chinese human rights defender: inside China's brutal prison system

18 December 2024, HRIC

"Killing someone here is as meaningless as killing a dog. We wouldn't even need to bury you. We'd just take you straight to the crematorium and burn you. It's very near here, you know."

HRIC has translated the harrowing testimony of Xie Wenfei (谢文飞), a Chinese human rights defender whose courage and suffering expose the horrifying depths of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) oppression. His statement was originally published in commemoration of Human Rights Day (10 December 2024). Xie, born in 1977 in Hunan Province, is known for his involvement in the Southern Street Movement, which advocates for democratic reform in China. His commitment to human rights has cost him his freedom, his health, and very nearly his life. In his statement, translated in full below, Xie depicts in graphic detail the brutal consequences faced by human rights defenders, pro-democracy activists, and intellectual dissidents who dare to confront the authority of the CCP.

On 29 April 2020, Xie published an article commemorating Lin Zhao, a dissident executed during the Cultural Revolution for her criticisms of Mao Zedong. By the evening, he had been seized. Xie was detained by the police in Chenzhou, Hunan, on charges of "picking quarrels and provoking trouble," a deliberately vague and politically motivated accusation which the CCP levies against activists and critics. Thereafter, Xie was plunged into a nightmare of state-sanctioned physical violence, psychological torment, degradation and dehumanization in China's detention centers and prisons. Xie's testimony offers a stark reminder of the CCP's disdain for basic human rights, and the chilling lengths it will go to in silencing political opponents.

Xie's story demonstrates clearly why international actors—including governments, civil society organizations, and human rights defenders—must not look away. We must continue to hold the CCP accountable for its violations. The prison abuses described by Xie reveal the darker realities of a government which not only tramples on fundamental principles of human dignity but seeks to legitimize its authoritarian model under the guise of global leadership. This is not just China's problem—it is a global problem. If Beijing is allowed to normalize this system while positioning itself as a global leader, it will embolden other authoritarian regimes and undermine the very foundations of international human rights. We cannot let China rewrite the rules. China's authoritarian practices must not become further normalized on the world stage.

Xie's testimony not only chronicles the inhumane treatment he suffered but also serves as a powerful reminder of the price paid by those who resist the CCP. Beijing's official narrative of 'progress' and 'prosperity' rings hollow when confronted with testimonies like Xie Wenfei's, which reveal a system built on brutality, silence, and fear. This is the truth behind the propaganda. His closing reflection, quoting Alexis de Tocqueville, reminds us that the treatment of prisoners reveals the true measure of a society's civilization. What does this say about China under the CCP? And what does it say about us if we fail to act?

On Human Rights Day, I want to share my personal experiences as a human rights defender.

On the morning of 29 April 2020, I published an article titled A Memorial for Lin Zhao. [Editor's note: Lin Zhao, 1932–1968, was a prominent Chinese dissident who was imprisoned and later executed for her criticism of Mao Zedong's policies during the Cultural Revolution.] That same evening, two burly men dressed in black (each weighing about 90 kilograms, as I estimated) ambushed me. They were hiding in the dark, waiting. When I tried to avoid them, they seized me, and without saying a word, pinned me to the ground. They held me there for a long time. Once I was taken to the case-handling center, I noticed that their T-shirts bore the words "Branded Ironhead" on the chest.

What human rights can we speak of?

On 28 May 2022, I was transferred from the Zixing Detention Center along with 146 others to Chenzhou Detention Center. In Cell 401, because I refused to squat, one brute took advantage of my unguarded moment and slapped me sharply across the face. I kicked him away without hesitation, but this led immediately to a group of thugs attacking me. I was forced to fight back in self-defense.

Unexpectedly, a person nicknamed "Director Li" entered the room and, again catching me off guard, slapped me hard in the face. (This surprised me because, despite having been detained in several detention centers previously and serving over six years in prison, I had never been struck by a police officer before.) After he left, at least seven or eight thugs, emboldened by his implicit encouragement, swarmed and overwhelmed me. I was beaten until I was dizzy, my head pounding as if it would explode. Multiple lumps formed on my scalp. The whole world seemed to spin, and I could barely stay upright.

Deputy Director Li later took me to the interview room. When I requested medical treatment for my injuries, he coldly refused. He then ordered me back to Cell 401. I replied bitterly that they might as well beat me to death. His reply? "Killing someone here is as meaningless as killing a dog. We wouldn't even need to bury you. We'd just take you straight to the crematorium and burn you. It's very near here, you know." (This was the first time I learned just how close the crematorium was.) My head throbbed so severely it felt as though it was about to burst, like the torment Sun Wukong, the Monkey King, endured when the monk Tang Seng chanted the tightening spell in Journey to the West. Writhing on the floor in pain, I succumbed to a combination of rage and despair and collapsed.

Li ordered that I be dragged into solitary confinement in Cell 6011. When I woke up, I found myself lying on a concrete floor with a puddle of water beside me. My head was near the toilet. My socks were worn through, and the only "bed" in the room was a single wooden plank cemented to the wall.

For several days, my head continued to ache intensely, and the lumps on my scalp showed no signs of subsiding. I pressed the alarm button repeatedly for four days, requesting medical attention, but I was ignored. A three-day hunger strike didn't bring any results either. No one admitted I had been beaten.

What human rights can we speak of?

On 30 May 2023, I was transferred from the Zixing Detention Center to Chenzhou Prison. Upon our arrival, they forced the 14 of us from Zixing to strip naked and perform squatting frog jumps in unison. I refused. Within an hour of arriving, I was confined to a 0.18-square-meter iron cage on the second floor of the reception center. The indoor temperature that day was 30°C, and for over eight hours, I was given only a small spoonful of water, no food, and my clothes were drenched with sweat.

That evening, I was transferred to a "high-security" area on the fifth floor, where, for two weeks, I was confined to a 0.7-square-meter iron cage for over 15 hours a day. For six consecutive days, I was not allowed to bathe, and for several days, I was denied both water and access to the toilet. I started a hunger strike. This changed nothing.

In front of over a dozen people (eight in iron cages and several wearing green vests), Warden Liang declared: "This person (referring to me) should be locked up tightly. Don't give him water. Don't let him use the toilet. Just make sure he doesn't die here."

Outraged, I requested to be put on a tiger bench—a notorious torture device—as both an act of defiance and a way to expose the system's cruelty. Within two hours, my "wish" was granted. After less than ten minutes on the tiger bench, my hands swelled up, sweat poured from my head, forming a stream, and my clothes were drenched. The bench, designed for someone 10 centimeters taller than me, required them to forcibly stretch me forward to cuff my hands, which was extremely painful and exhausting. Onlookers could see that my condition was dire.

Several hours after being released from the tiger bench, my right thumb was numb, and I couldn't move it properly for five days. Even two months later, it still felt as though connected to a low-voltage electric current.

What human rights can we possibly speak of?!

On 8 June 2023, in a document required by the prison, I wrote: "Since my arrival at Chenzhou Prison on 30 May, I have not been treated as a human being. Regardless of whether I am an ordinary person, a detained prisoner, a political prisoner, or even someone convicted of the gravest crimes, I am a human, and therefore I am entitled to the most basic human rights. Individual human dignity is an integral part of humanity's collective dignity, and the latter is composed of the former. Even if a prison aims to 'reform' individuals, it cannot do so at the cost of trampling on and sacrificing human dignity."

On 25 June 2023, I was transferred to Changsha Prison in Hunan province. My two boxes of books were not allowed inside, and even my attempt to bring in a single copy of 300 Tang Poems and Collected Annotations of the Four Books was rejected under the guise of a "zero possessions" policy. This was a supervisory measure personally introduced by Prison Director Lei Jianhua, designed to showcase his ultimate authority.

In early July, a fellow prisoner, aged 42, from Liuzhou, Guangxi, who arrived at the detention center on the same day as me, died. No one was held accountable; nothing happened. For nearly two months in the detention center, we were forbidden to read or write. I requested three times to borrow Records of the Grand Historian from the bookshelf but was denied each time.

On 21 August 2023, after being assigned to the Fourth Division, I was subjected to the punishment of being pinned to the corridor floor for five days in a row - all because I had refused the arbitrary command to squat. This punishment was carried out as a display to "make an example" of me and my disobedience. On 27 August 2023, I was beaten by both prisoners and officers for refusing to sing "red songs" as ordered. [Editor's note: These are revolutionary propaganda songs glorifying the Chinese Communist Party and its leaders, often used as a tool of political indoctrination.] Officer Xie, the tallest officer in the division, kicked me violently, and told me: "Because this is a political matter, I can hit you, and I won't face any consequences. Go ahead and complain to the Commission for Discipline Inspection; complain to the procuratorate, or even the prison director—I don't give a shit."

What human rights can we speak of?

On 29 August 2023, I was denied access to the toilet for so long that when I was finally permitted during a group break, it took me 20 minutes to urinate in broken intervals. I was verbally punished by an officer that same day.

Then, every morning and afternoon when water was distributed, I was only allowed one-third to half the usual amount. I was permitted to use the toilet only once each morning and afternoon. Fortunately, a slightly kind-hearted "Aunt Wu" ensured the punishment was not strictly enforced. A week later, I was returned to "normal" access, but the rule of only being allowed to fetch water twice a day remained in effect until my release on 29 October 2024. Every morning and afternoon, I endured thirst for two to three hours before I could drink hot water. My severe prostatitis went untreated. From 21 August to 30 December 2023, I and others filed requests to use the toilet a total of eight times, five of which were outright denied.

What human rights can we possibly speak of? This was worse than being an animal.

In the 16 months I served at Changsha Prison, I read only five books—less than what I read in one month at Heyuan Prison. Either I was prohibited from reading or I had no time or energy to do so. My six-year practice of calligraphy was forcibly ended—I was never even allowed to touch a writing brush.

As I wrote in a letter to Director Lei, which will never receive a reply: from the moment my two boxes of books were left outside Changsha Prison's gate, my prison life became a nightmare. For someone like me, who has read for over a decade, having books to read makes even hell bearable. Conversely, being deprived of books makes even heaven feel like hell. My thanks to the prison education office for providing me with Francis Fukuyama's Political Order and Political Decay on 8 March 2024, after I was beaten on 3 March and left with no avenue for complaint. It slowly brought me back to life.

Before the strict implementation of the "9511" system in August 2024, we worked over 60 hours per week for 13 months. [Editor's note: "9511" refers to a prison management system in which prisoners are required to work 9 hours per day for 5 days a week, devote 1 day to study or "re-education," and are permitted 1 day of rest.]

After moving to the new Changsha Prison site on 23 March 2024, we were forced to work extra night shifts for over a month. Personally, I was fortunate to endure only one such shift; however, among the 170+ other prisoners in my group, dozens were forced to work night shifts daily. Those who failed to complete required tasks faced a range of different punishments.

At the new site, in pursuit of so-called "dining order," our meals—served in stainless steel trays—were placed on stainless steel tables before our shifts ended. By the time we ate, the food was stone cold, even in March, when many prisoners still wore winter clothes due to poor health. My complaints yielded no improvement. I remembered how, over a decade ago, the pigs we raised at home had their swill warmed for them— they never ate cold.

As a human rights defender, I was reduced to a state worse than that of pigs.

What human rights can we speak of?

Many may cite Article 7 of the People's Republic of China's Prison Law, which ostensibly guarantees prisoners' rights and dignity. But any clear-headed person knows how far we are from achieving a rule-of-law society—if anything, we are moving further away from it.

Furthermore, Director Lei openly stated at an assembly that our identity "is that of criminals, what people normally refer to as 'bad people' (I strongly protest this statement and will demand a public apology from Director Lei when the time is right). We are here 'to be punished.'" He even boasted that Changsha Prison was already the best in China, the number one in Hunan. If it were any better, Dickens-inspired citizens dissatisfied with everyday life would flock here.

Under Director Lei's "enlightened leadership," marked by his tyrannical authority, few dared to file complaints. Even if they did, as in my case—when I was beaten, I wrote to the procurator stationed at the prison, and requested to meet my lawyer Zhang Lei—the complaint was torn up before my eyes.

"In Chinese prisons, especially in Changsha Prison, do not speak to me of human rights!"

This is Changsha Prison's resounding declaration!

French thinker Alexis de Tocqueville once said:

"The degree of civilization in a society can be judged by examining its prison system."

Oh, how these words ring true.

Rights group urges China to release jailed Tibetan activist

17 December 2024, UCA News

A Tibetan protester shouts slogans from a police vehicle after being detained near the Chinese embassy during a demonstration in New Delhi on October 1, 2024, against the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China. (Photo by Sajjad HUSSAIN / AFP)

A leading human rights group in Asia has urged China to unconditionally release a Tibetan environmental activist who was jailed after he published a video on illegal sand mining in Sichuan Province.

The Asian Forum for Human Rights and Development (FORUM-ASIA), in a Dec. 16 statement, expressed "deep concern" over China imposing an eight-month jail term on environmental activist Tsogon Tsering.

The rights group asked the Chinese government "to immediately and unconditionally release" Tsering.

Tsering was jailed on Oct. 27, accused of "disturbing social order" after he published the video on illegal sand and gravel mining in Tsaruma village, Kakhog County, Ngaba Prefecture.

The group said Tsering's social media account was taken down, and all search terms related to his name were blocked. His whereabouts remained unknown until his sentencing.

Tsering's case is similar to Anya Sengdra's, who is serving a seven-year sentence after exposing illegal mining in Gade County in the Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture.

Earlier in 2024, four Tibetan environmental activists were arrested in a village in Chamdo Prefecture for raising concerns about alleged illegal land grabbing by Chinese authorities, the statement said.

The group's executive director Mary Aileen Diez-Bacalso expressed "solidarity with the people of Tibet," who face socio-cultural repression and environmental challenges.

Chinese authorities have been targeting Tibet and its people since 1950s, when China annexed Tibet, claiming it to be an integral part of Chinese territory. "Fearing retaliation and reprisals, Tibetans including environmental human rights defenders and journalists – have been effectively silenced, allowing China to govern the region with total impunity," the rights group alleged.

Chinese authorities continue to "criminalize legitimate expressions of concern over Tibetan people's fundamental freedoms" under the guise of national security and ethnic unity, the rights group said.

It asked the Chinese government to stop the arrest and imprisonment of Tibetan environmental rights defenders peacefully advocating for their rights.

It also demanded that China adhere to international human rights standards, such as the UN Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights and the UN Declaration on Human Rights Defenders.

Tibetan environmental activist sentenced to 8 months in prison

02 December 2024, RFA

Tsogon Tsering made a rare public appeal against the illegal extraction of sand and gravel mining from a local river.

Tsogon Tsering, a Tibetan from Tsaruma village in Kyungchu county in southwestern China's Sichuan province, calls for authorities to take action against illegal sand and gravel mining taking place since May 2023 on the Tsaruma River. (Image from citizen video via WeChat)

A Tibetan environmental activist from China's Sichuan province has been sentenced to eight months in prison, after he made a rare public appeal to authorities over a company he accused of illegally extracting sand and gravel from a river, two Tibetan sources told RFA.

Tsogon Tsering, 29, from Tsaruma village in Ngaba prefecture, called Aba in Chinese, openly posted a 5-minute video in which he held up his government ID card and accused Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering Co. of the illegal activity along the Tsaruma River since May 2023.

On Oct. 27, the Kyungchu County People's Court charged Tsering with "disturbing social order" and "provoking trouble and picking quarrels" for raising concerns about the environmental impact of the sand and gravel extraction, including reduced water levels, soil erosion and risk to homes located near the river, the sources said.

Until the news of his sentencing last week, Tsering's whereabouts and condition had remained unknown since "a day or two after" Oct. 20, when authorities had summoned him a second time on the pretext of investigating the matter and detained him. Authorities initially summoned Tsering and other villagers for questioning on Oct. 18, just two days after Tsering made the online public appeal – a rare move in Tibet, where speaking out against authorities or state-approved projects often leads to reprisals. At the time, they were all released back to their homes, but Tsering was detained.

A view of an area where sand and gravel are being illegally extracted from the Tsaruma River in Kyungchu county, southwestern China's Sichuan province, in an image posted on WeChat by Tibetan resident Tsongon Tsering, Oct. 15, 2024. (Tsongon Tsering/WeChat)

Tsering is currently being held in Kyungchu County Prison and faces continued investigation and threats of extended sentencing, the sources told RFA.

"Authorities have also indicated to the family that the eight-month-long prison sentence is not final, emphasizing that they will continue to investigate the matter completely before making a conclusive ruling," one of the sources said.

Speaking out

Tsering's detention is an example of the risks Tibetans face for speaking out and the swift action authorities take to silence those who raise concerns about environmental degradation in their communities, especially when linked to Chinese companies.

Other Tibetan environmental defenders, such as Anya Sengdra, have faced persecution for their activism. In 2019, Chinese authorities sentenced Sengdra to a seven-year prison term on charges of disturbing social order after he complained online about corrupt officials, illegal mining and the hunting of protected wildlife.

"Authorities are treating Tsering's environmental advocacy as criminal activity and accusing him of stirring up social unrest for personal vendettas," said the second source. "His family and locals are under heavy surveillance and restrictions on sharing information about his case."

A view of the results of illegal sand and gravel extraction along the Tsaruma River in Kyungchu county, southwestern China's Sichuan province, in an image posted on WeChat by Tibetan resident Tsongon Tsering, Oct. 15, 2024. (Tsongon Tsering/WeChat)

Authorities acted quickly after Tsering's video became popular on Chinese social media, shutting down his WeChat account and censoring all search terms related to his name on the platform.

The video, which gained significant attention online, had been widely shared by other platform users, but those posts were taken down as well, so that all related content had been censored by Oct. 17.

In the video, Tsering describes Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering's extensive mining operations and repeated appeals made by Tibetans to local authorities to take action against the company for causing environmental harm.

November

China sentences veteran journalist on espionage charges

29 November 2024, NPR, Emily Feng

China has sentenced a longtime Chinese state media journalist to seven years in prison on charges of espionage, in a case press freedom advocates have criticized as opaque and politicized.

Dong Yuyu, 62, had been detained while lunching with a Japanese diplomat at a Beijing hotel in February 2022 and held for half a year in a secret location before being formally charged with espionage, a charge he denied, his family says.

The 7-year sentence, delivered in a Beijing court on Friday, came after months of delays in Dong's sentencing. As in all cases China deems related to national security, Dong's trial was held in secret, with no press or family present, and the court provided no records of the testimony or evidence to the public.

"Yuyu is being persecuted for the independence he has demonstrated during a lifetime spent as a journalist," his family said in a statement.

On Friday, Dong's lawyers and family were allowed in court for the sentencing judgement, which was read aloud but not shared in writing. The sentencing accused Dong of inappropriately sharing information with two Japanese diplomats, including its then-ambassador to China, according to a statement from Dong's family.

Well-known among academic and diplomatic circles for his liberal writings and scholarship, Dong worked for decades as a journalist and editor at Guangming Daily, a Communist Party-run publication. He often traveled abroad and met with foreign experts in China, exchanges he always disclosed but which his family now believes may have led to his arrest.

"He is the epitome of the kind of people-to-people exchanges that China has been working so hard to establish and maintain for the past 30 years," the National Press Club, an advocacy organization based in Washington, said in a statement after Dong's trial concluded in 2023. "That era is now over."

More than 60 academics, former diplomats, and journalists have signed an open letter protesting his arrest.

From 2006-2007, Dong studied at Harvard University after receiving its prestigious Nieman journalism fellowship. In 2010, he was a visiting fellow at Japan's Keio University, and in 2014 he spent the year as a visiting professor at Hokkaido University.

He wrote openly on how he believed China's ruling Communist Party could improve its governance but was no dissident or revolutionary. In 2002, the state-administered All China Journalists Association gave Dong an award for a commentary piece he authored which praised the achievements and plans of the Communist Party.

"Yuyu will now be known as a traitor in his own country, instead of being recognized as someone who always fought for a better Chinese society," his family said.

Tibetan whistle-blower sentenced to eight months for exposing illegal sand mining

28 November 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Screen grab of Tsongon Tsering

Tsongon Tsering has reportedly been sentenced to eight months in prison for protesting illegal sand mining in his village Tsaruma in Kakhog (Chinese: Hongyuan) County, Ngaba (Chinese: Aba) Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture, according to the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD).

On October 27, the Kyungchu County People's Court convicted Tsering on the charge of "disrupting social order," a widely criticized accusation often used by Chinese authorities to silence dissent. Tsering, who is currently being held at Kyungchu County Prison, had been detained incommunicado after his video exposing the mining activities went viral on Chinese social media.

Tsering posted a five-minute video on Oct. 14 revealing large-scale illegal sand and gravel mining operations conducted by Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering Company. He used a "real-name complaint" method, showing his ID card while narrating how the mining, under the pretext of road construction, caused significant environmental destruction.

He documented the environmental destruction and accused local authorities of failing to enforce existing regulations. His video gained traction on Chinese social media, prompting local government bodies to pledge an investigation.

However, Tsering was summoned multiple times to government offices before being detained. Sources report that he is currently held in Kyungchu County Prison, where his family is barred from contacting him. The heightened restrictions imposed by Chinese authorities in Ngaba have deepened fears for his safety, especially given China's record of detaining activists on fabricated charges.

The illegal mining operations, which began in May 2023, led to severe soil erosion, water pollution, and risks to homes near the river. Villagers repeatedly filed complaints with local and regional authorities, including the Kakhog County Environmental Protection Bureau and the Ngaba Prefecture Water Affairs Bureau, but received no meaningful response. In April 2024, the Ecological Environment Bureau of Kakhog County acknowledged in a written statement that the company had engaged in illegal activities and imposed fines. However, activists, including Tsering, argued that these measures were superficial and aimed at deflecting criticism rather than addressing the damage.

Tsering's arrest paints a broader picture of crackdown on Tibetan activists and whistleblowers who challenge Chinese authorities or expose corruption. TCHRD has noted a rise in fabricated charges and incommunicado detentions across Ngaba, contributing to an atmosphere of fear and repression.

"Tsering's case is a stark reminder of the risks faced by individuals who stand up for their communities," TCHRD stated. "His sentencing is not just an attack on him but a message to all Tibetans that dissent will not be tolerated."

Renowned Tibetan writer and intellectual, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup released from Chinese prison but remains under strict surveillance

27 November 2024, TCHRD

On 9 November, a respected Tibetan writer and intellectual, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup was released from a Chinese prison. While Tibetan writers, artists, intellectuals, and activists inside and outside Tibet celebrated his release on social media, the reality remains grim. Like all former Tibetan political prisoners convicted on trumped-up charges, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup, despite being released, is placed under heavy surveillance and restrictions.

Born in 1974 to a nomadic family in Rebkong (Ch: Tongren) City, Malho (Ch: Huangnan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai Province, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup embraced monastic life at a young age. He began his studies at Darzing Monastery before continuing at Rongwo Monastery in Rebkong, Labrang Tashi Kyil, and Serta Larung. He served as a teacher alongside his academic pursuits, nurturing countless monastic and lay students.

Rongwo Gendun Lhundup has been a dedicated educator for over two decades, mentoring nearly a thousand students while contributing to preserving and promoting Tibetan literature and culture. With the rise of the internet, he became a widely recognised blogger, poet, and cultural critic, writing under various pen names such as 'Za' (Planet/Celestial Body), 'Ge Nyon' (Mad Monk), and 'Lham Kog' (Shoe). His literary contributions, spanning creative writing, editing, and teaching, established him as a pivotal figure in modern Tibetan intellectual discourse. However, his visibility and influence also made him a target of the Chinese authorities, resulting in repeated interrogations and detentions.

On 2 December 2020, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup was detained by Chinese authorities. A year later, on December 2021, the Xining Intermediate People's Court sentenced him to four years in prison on charges of "inciting separatism" coupled with two additional years of deprivation of political rights, reflecting the ongoing criminalisation of Tibetan intellectuals who challenge oppressive policies and advocate for the preservation of Tibetan identity and culture.

On 6 June 2013, in honour of His Holiness the Dalai Lama's birthday, Rongwo Gendun Lhundup composed a poem titled "O Noble One of the Pig Year, I Ask of You," dedicated to His Holiness the Dalai Lama, born in the Pig Year of 1935 according to the Tibetan horoscope.

Brimming with longing, joy, and sorrow, the poem evoked the sacred bond between a guru, His Holiness the Dalai Lama and his disciples, Tibetans inside Tibet waiting for his return.

O One Born in the Pig Year, I Ask You

Rongwo Gendun Lhundup

O One Born in the Pig Year, I Ask You

Where is your homeland?

Where is your palace?

We whisk the dust from your golden yellow throne, with trembling hands.

When might you,

With your white hair, swaying with compassion,

With your white smile moved by sorrow,

When will you return, riding a white cloud?

O One Born in the Pig Year, I Ask You,

Wherever you may emerge,

Please save my people,

Please save my culture and religion.

With bent knees and swaying head,

Containing all sorrows within,

Sometimes releasing cold, long breaths,

Fingers pressed to heart,

Lifting your seventy-year-old body with force,

Heedless of day and night, summer and winter,

We have watched you journey on.

We too, with bowed heads,

In a manner unseen by others,
Are praying for your long life.

Literary journey from Rebkong to national recognition

In 1990, he and his friend Tse Mindrol and other writers published the first private journal called 'Ser Zam' (Golden Bridge) in Rebkong. This was among the first private journals in the Tibetan region. Around that time, he and his friend, the poet Tse Mindrol, also published two poetry collections under the joint title 'Drong Yak Ki Hurdra' (The Roar of the Wild Yak) Within this collection, his writing was titled 'Kangling Kyawo' (The Gray Kangling.) Kangling is a Tibetan word for a trumpet or horn made out of a human tibia or femur, and it is used in Tibetan Buddhism for various chöd rituals and funerals performed by a chöpa. The two illustrated poetry volumes became a topic of widespread discussion. In particular, a romantically written poem in the book beautifully documenting his journey to Serta was highly appreciated by everyone for both its easy comprehension and perfect poetic qualities.

He published 'Lha Chenpoi Nyenngag' (The Poetry of the Great Deity), a category of high brow Tibetan poetry. When the 'Jang Lung' (The Ancient Green Breeze) Newspaper interviewed Rongwo Gendun Lhundup, he mentioned that his second poetry collection should be considered more like a practice rather than a turning point in poetry for which he was being credited with.

In contrast, his new poetry collection 'Trenghwa Nakpo' (The Black Rosary) consisted of forty-one poems written over nearly a decade of experimenting with a new style of poetry writing. Between 'The Poetry of the Great Deity' and 'The Black Rosary,' Rongwo Gendun considers 'The Black Rosary' a better poetic achievement.

On 26 October 2009, his poem 'Gom Shey' (Meditation Song) won China's second National Snow Ornament Literary Award. Later, he published a poetry collection titled 'Mitsey Yangta', (The Melody Horse of Life), mainly consisting of metered poetry.

Subsequently, he published 'Lekpham Karpo' (The White Volume) and 'Khorwa', (Samsara.) Before his arrest, he wrote and published a serial novel called 'Drawai Zintho' (Monk's Diary) online. On 30 December 2019, 'Monk's Diary' won one of China's major National Ethnic Literary Awards, although it is currently deleted and censored online.

An author called 'Lham Kog' (Shoe) wrote many influential articles on the largest Tibetan blogs and most popular websites. During this period, literary circles and enthusiasts were trying to determine who 'Lham Kog' was. Only later was it confirmed that he was the famous writer Rongwo Gedun Lhundrub from Rebkong, Amdo.

On 19 November 2024, he published a poem titled 'Shipar Gyurchig' (May It Be Auspicious) online, and many Tibetans who admire him are sharing it through social media. His published works include six volumes of poetry: 'The Gray Kangling,' 'The Poetry of the Great Deity,' 'The Black Rosary,' 'The Melody Horse of Life,' 'The White Volume,' and 'Samsara.' There is also gossip in the literary circles that he has several other books in different genres, such as fiction and essays, but these have not yet been published.

The release of Rongwo Gendun Lhundup is a reminder of the many Tibetan writers and intellectuals suffering detention and persecution under China's oppressive cultural assimilation policies. China must uphold the purported promises of free speech its constitution Article 35 and immediately put a stop to its draconian control over information, stifling fundamental right to freedom of expression and dissent through harsh regulations, often leading to imprisonment and torture.

The systemic repression and malpractices of the Chinese state not only strips Tibetans of their voices but also forcibly suppresses independent publications through widespread censorship.

Rongwo Gendun Lhundup must be allowed to live freely without surveillance or harassment. This fundamental right has been denied to others, such as Tashi Wangchuk, who, despite his initial release, faced surveillance, beatings, only to be imprisoned again. The same fate must not befall Rongwo. His freedom, and the freedom of all Tibetans, must be safeguarded.

Two influential Tibetans released from Chinese prison

20 November 2024, Free Tibet

Undated old photos of Karma Samdup (left) and Gendun Lhundup (right)

Environmentalist Karma Samdup and writer Gendun Lhundup have been released from prison

Prominent Tibetan philanthropist and environmentalist Karma Samdup has been released on Monday from Shayar Prison in East Turkestan, and Gendun Lhundup, a prolific writer also known by his pen name Lhamkok, was released last weekend.

Karma, 56, was a businessman in antique objects who was sentenced to 15 years on 24 June 2010 under falsified charges of grave robbing and dealing looted relics. He was in poor health while in prison.

Fifty-year-old Gendun was arrested on 2 December 2020 and known to have been sentenced to prison for four years, and two more years of “deprivation of political rights” for inciting separation – an accusation routinely used by the Chinese authorities against Tibetans critical of or suspected to be critical of the communist party-state. It is not known which prison he had been kept in.

Karma Samdup is from Dampa Village (ཐོམ་པ་གྲོང་ཁྱེད་) in Samphel Township (བསམ་པེལ་རྫོང་གྲོང་ཁྱེད་) of Gonjo County (གོང་ཇོ་རྫོང་གྲོང་ཁྱེད་) in Kham region. Born in 1974 in the Rebgong nomadic region, Gendun was a teacher at Rongwo Monastery. Since 1994, he has published numerous books. In October 2020, two months before his arrest, he published a book entitled Khorwa and urged fellow Tibetans to support it. He claimed that the book presents the truth as it is without bowing to orders.

Tibetan language rights activist Tashi Wangchuk detained again for “slanderous” videos on Chinese TikTok

14 November 2024, ICT

Chinese authorities detained prominent Tibetan language rights activist, Tashi Wangchuk, on October 20, 2024, for his language rights activism on Chinese social media platforms. The Yushul (Chinese: Yushu) City Public Security Bureau (PSB) accused Tashi of publishing “fabricated” and “slanderous” videos on platforms such as Douyin (TikTok) and Kuaishou to “slander government agencies” and challenge government decision-making.

Tashi was held for 15 days and released on November 4, 2024. This detention follows his previous five-year prison term from 2016 to 2021 on charges of “inciting separatism,” after his appearance in a New York Times article and video documentary in November 2015 documenting his efforts to petition the Chinese government for Tibetan language protection.

Despite surveillance and punitive measures, Tashi has continued his language rights activism after his release from prison. In August 2023, he was attacked by masked men, presumed to be affiliated with the authorities, in his hotel room in Darlag (Chinese: Dari) County, Golog (Guoluo) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai, while conducting research on the status of the Tibetan language in the area.

The recent detention was specifically related to Tashi’s social media activities. According to an Administrative Penalty Decision notice from the Yushul City Public Security Bureau, obtained by the International Campaign for Tibet, Tashi was charged with publishing “fabricated” and “slanderous” videos on Douyin and Kuaishou since June 2024. The PSB alleged that Tashi, using Douyin ID 241933 under the nickname Yushu Tashi, had been posting video clips that “seriously disrupt the cyberspace environment and social public order”.

The PSB alleged Tashi’s language rights activism “provoked disturbances” and imposed an administrative penalty of 15 days of administrative detention in accordance with Article 26(4) of the Law of the People’s Republic of China on Public Security Administration Punishments.

Article 26(4) provides for detention of individuals who commit “Other acts of provocation” that disturb public security or disrupt social order. This broad provision allows Chinese police significant discretion in detaining individuals by misusing the law to suppress activism and free speech.

With a firm belief in his right to freely express himself and advocate for Tibetan language rights in accordance with Chinese and international laws, Tashi refused to sign the Yushul City PSB decision notice that imposed 15 days of detention for his activism. The PSB noted his defiance in a handwritten note on the decision notice. Since his release on Nov.4, Tashi is reportedly under surveillance by the Chinese authorities.

Yulshul City PSB Administrative Penalty Decision notice imposing 15 days detention to Tashi Wangchuk

Notice of release from detention on Nov.4 issued by Yulshul Detention Center

Tibet, Sera Monastery Monk Persecuted to Death in Detention

11 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Lopsang Gurung

38-year-old Losel was charged with sharing information about Tibet with foreigners, detained, and brutally beaten.

Last week, relatives confirmed to human rights activists that a monk from Sera monastery called Losel (also spelled Loser or Lose) died last month due to severe beatings in jail. Dharamshala-based "Tibet Times" was the first to mention the story.

Losel's family didn't know his whereabouts or condition until police returned to them his body in Lhasa on October 21.

Losel, aged 38, was from Tsoto Village in the Phenpo area of Lhasa. Previously known as Kalden, he joined Sera Monastery as a child. He pursued monastic studies at this prominent monastery.

Detained in May 2024, Losel faced allegations of gathering and disseminating information regarding conditions in Tibet to foreign contacts. He was held by Chinese authorities and underwent interrogations accompanied by brutal beatings that severely damaged his health.

Authorities reportedly did not provide medical care, which resulted in his death within the detention facility.

Chinese official ruined by crypto investments gets life in prison for selling state secrets

11 November 2024, The Record, Alexander Martin

Chinese authorities announced on Friday that a public servant who found himself with large debts due to failed cryptocurrency investments had been sentenced to life in prison for selling state secrets to an unidentified foreign intelligence agency.

According to a post on Baidu by the Ministry of State Security (MSS) – the Chinese Communist Party's secret police and intelligence agency – the official, pseudonymised as Wang Moumou, was recruited after posting online about his financial difficulties.

Wang "posted on an online forum seeking a part-time job due to heavy debts, openly stating his identity as a public servant," stated the MSS.

"Soon, he was contacted by an overseas individual who offered a substantial reward in exchange for "paid information" such as production tasks and research progress from his workplace," the agency added.

It said Wang initially "provided a small amount of internal information in exchange for the reward" before he began to consider "how 'a few photos and documents could bring in a lot of money,' [and] his rationality gradually faded. His greed and the hope of getting away with it took over, and his illicit activities grew bolder and bolder."

According to the MSS, Wang provided "top-secret and confidential national information to foreign parties," for which he received "over 1 million yuan ($138,000) in espionage funds through methods such as virtual currency recharge and trading."

The organisation Wang was employed by was not disclosed. The MSS described it as a "certain classified institution" (某涉密单位) an intentionally ambiguous phrase which is typically used to cover a range of national security entities, from the MSS itself through to research departments.

In the MSS post on Baidu, it stated that Wang's workplace "did not strictly enforce security management protocols and protective measures, creating an opportunity for him to steal and leak classified information to foreign intelligence agencies."

It stressed to Chinese citizens that if they suspect espionage activities, they were encouraged to promptly report the incident via a number of routes.

Although the Ministry of State Security is called a ministry, unlike other Chinese government departments its logo does not feature the five stars of the People's Republic of China flag, but the Communist Party's hammer and sickle.

While the total headcount of the agency is not publicly known, it is believed to be the largest intelligence agency in the world with estimates suggesting more than 100,000 employees based in a large number of relatively autonomous branches located throughout China.

Alongside its internal security work, the MSS has been accused of cyber operations targeting Chinese dissidents abroad, as well as of stealing intellectual property to benefit Chinese companies domestically, and targeting political institutions to gain strategic intelligence.

Jailed Tibetan Community Leader Denied Retrial

11 November 2024, CTA

Anya Sengdra has already served 6 years of a 7-year prison sentence.

-by Radio Free Asia, 8 November 2024

Chinese authorities in Tibet have denied to retry an environmental activist who is serving a seven-year sentence for campaigning against government corruption, his lawyer said on social media.

Anya Sengdra, 53, a resident of Kyangchu township in Gade (in Chinese, Gande) county in the Golog (Guoluo) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture has already served six years of his sentence for "disturbing social order" after he complained online about corrupt officials, illegal mining and the hunting of protected wildlife.

He was convicted and sentenced in 2019, and has attempted to appeal the decision twice before, his lawyer Lin Qilei said in a post on X on Tuesday.

"This marks the third appeal for a retrial submitted to the Sixth Circuit Court of the Supreme People's Court in Xi'an," Lin said on X.

"As usual, I filled out the necessary forms and waited in line. After some time, a judge came out and informed me that they had decided not to review Sengdra's case," Lin said. "He advised me not to return to the court regarding this matter in the future." Click here to read more.

Cheng Peiming: Organ Harvesting Survivor Slandered in China and Threatened in the US

08 November 2024, Bitter Winter, Marco Respinti

The press conferences of the Falun Gong practitioner mightily disturbed the CCP. It launched a slander campaign in China and tried to harass Cheng even in the US.

Cheng's press conference in Washington DC, August 9, 2024.

Falun Gong practitioners, Uyghurs, and others have denounced for years that organs are forcibly taken from prisoners of conscience and used for transplants. The People's Republic of China has mobilized its fellow travelers, including academics, anti-cultists, and religionists, around the world to claim that "organ harvesting" is just Falun Gong propaganda (ignoring parallel reports by Uyghurs and others).

The fact that the European Parliament through Resolution 2022/2657 of March 5, 2022, has officially stated that reports of organ harvesting are believable has not stopped the pro-Chinese propaganda. On the other hand, there is increasing evidence that the organ harvesting issue is now being discussed in China, despite the severe censorship trying to eliminate any online reference.

Cheng Peiming, a Falun Gong practitioners who escaped to the U.S., is the first-known survivor of China's forced organ harvesting. This year, he shared his survival story of organ harvesting prohibition at public events nationwide, including panel discussions and documentary screenings. He detailed his imprisonment for practicing Falun Gong and the forced organ harvesting he endured. Upon request of Falun Gong, two Australian medical experts, both college professors, also examined Cheng, corroborating his testimony with findings that confirm parts of his liver and lung were indeed removed.

Cheng's press conferences were impressive. "The Diplomat" wrote in August that "Cheng Pei Ming's testimony offered a rare and disturbing glimpse into the horrors faced by prisoners of conscience in China."

Cheng showing his scars at the Washington press conference. Screenshot.

The testimony of Cheng is making inroads in China too through clandestine channels. This led the Chinese Communist Party to mobilize the China Anti-Xie-Jiao Association, which is directly controlled by the Party and claims to be the largest anti-cult organization in the world (the claim is probably true). The Association prepared a report that was shared by the China Court Network, "China Youth Daily," and other official sources.

Note that these are Chinese websites for domestic Chinese consumption. Very few people read them abroad. The fact that they felt the need to attack Cheng Peiming shows that his story has gained traction in China, managing to break through the censorship. The rebuttal is based on alleged statements by Cheng's relatives (including his sister, who says she believes the authorities and the jail personnel), doctors, and prison staff, but is contradicted by the medical examinations of the victim in the West. Under what kind of pressures the victim's sister and other relatives may have been put in China is also easy to guess.

Cheng has also filed reports with the U.S. authorities about the harassment he is a victim of in the United States. On November 2, 2024, between 4:00 AM and 6:00 AM, unidentified individuals broke into his New York home, forcing the garage door bolt open and leaving two doors unlocked and ajar. Deep tire tracks were found in the backyard, while his security cameras and alarms were offline from 1:12 AM to 6:18 AM. Cheng filed a police report at 11:15 AM. The break-in followed several attempted attacks on Cheng and his vehicle over three months. After an October screening of the documentary film "State Organs" in Delaware, where Cheng spoke, his car was keyed. Twice, nails were found in his tires. One incident resulted in a tire burst while he was driving, but luckily no one was injured.

China said to intensify crackdown on Tibetan monks, religious education

02 November 2024, CTA

Those who attempted to escape have faced severe consequences, treated 'like criminals' and subjected to further restrictions.

Chinese authorities have intensified their crackdown on Tibetan Buddhism, forcibly relocating hundreds of young monks from Kirti Monastery to state-run boarding schools in Ngaba County, Sichuan Province.

Reports indicate that these students, aged 6 to 17, are subjected to prison-like conditions, where they receive instruction solely in Mandarin. They are prohibited from leaving the school grounds or contacting their parents, Radio Free Asia (RFA) reported.

Those who attempted to escape have faced severe consequences, treated "like criminals" and subjected to further restrictions.

In July, the closure of the monastic school at Kirti Monastery left over 1,000 young monks without their educational institution, as they were transferred to state-run "colonial-style" boarding schools. Around the same time, Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge County also closed its school, affecting more than 600 students.

Authorities coerced parents into signing agreements that committed their children to government-run institutions, where they would receive state-sanctioned "patriotic education."

Beijing's regulations on religious affairs dictate that students at monastic schools must be at least 18 years old, demonstrate patriotism, and comply with national laws. Tibetan advocates view these measures as part of a broader campaign to eradicate the Tibetan language, suppress Tibetan culture, and enforce "patriotic education," which requires loyalty to China and the ruling Communist Party in all aspects of life, reported RFA. Click here to read more.

Undisclosed Arrests of Four Tibetans Sweep Through Ngaba as Chinese Authorities Target Monks, Civilians

01 November 2024, CTA

Since early September 2024, monks Lobsang Samten and Lobsang Trinley (or Trinpo) from Kirti Monastery, and civilians Tsering Tashi and Wangkyi, among others, have been secretly arrested by the Chinese authorities in Tibet's Ngaba County, traditionally part of Amdo province. Since their incommunicado detention, their whereabouts and wellbeing remain unknown.

The recent detainees include Lobsang Samten, 53, a senior monk from Khangsar (Ch: Kangsai) in Golog's Chigdril County, who serves as junior chant master at Kirti Monastery and holds the Karampa (Geshe) title. Lobsang Samten was among 300 monks detained in a 2011 mass arrest at Ngaba monastery, according to Tibetan media sources. Also detained was Lobsang Trinley (also known as Trinpo), 40, from Rong Kharsa (Ch: Kuasha) in Ngaba County, a third-year Vinaya student at Kirti Monastery who organizes ritual ceremonies. Among civilian detainees are Wangkyi, 43, a mother of four currently residing in Ngaba County, and her brother Tsering Tashi, 41, both children of Kalko (Tib: ཀལ་ཁོ་) and Jigje Tso (འཇིགས་བྱེད་འཛོཾ་) from the Haritsang family of Rong Kharsa. Sources indicate multiple members of the Haritsang family have been detained over alleged connections with Tibetans residing in India. All detainees' current whereabouts remain unknown. Reports indicate intensified surveillance and restrictions across Ngaba region, with particular focus on Kirti Monastery and surrounding areas. A pattern of undisclosed detentions has emerged, with released detainees prohibited from sharing any information about their arrests, charges, or places of detention, which severely limits public knowledge of Chinese authorities' enforcement and unlawful actions against Tibetans.

Undisclosed Arrests of Four Tibetans Sweep Through Ngaba as Chinese Authorities Target Monks, Civilians.

Chinese authorities have mandated all monks under 18 years of age in the Ngaba area to leave their monasteries and attend Chinese government-run boarding schools. Kirti Monastery's preliminary studies institute, previously home to over 1,400 Tibetan students and teachers, now retains only about 100 students aged 18 or older, with the rest of the facility shut down.

Moreover, throughout Ngaba County and Prefecture, new education policies require all subjects except language classes to be taught exclusively in Chinese at residential schools. These measures are part of a broader policy using both administrative and coercive methods to restrict the transmission of Tibetan language, religious practices, and cultural identity to younger generations.

The Chinese authorities must immediately end these arbitrary detentions and provide accurate information regarding the whereabouts of the four Tibetans who are currently missing. The Central Tibetan Administration last September raised serious concerns on the reports of authorities' have forcibly removal of over 1,700 young monks from three monasteries in Ngaba – Kirti Monastery and two monasteries in Dzoge County – and their forcible enrolment in Chinese government-run boarding schools without consent from the children or their parents.

– Filed by the UN, EU, and the Human Rights Desk, Tibet Advocacy Section, DIIR

October

Authorities Arrest Four Tibetans in Ngaba County for Contacting Outsiders

30 October 2024, CTA

China's government restricts communication between Tibetans and those outside the region, saying it undermines national unity.

Chinese authorities have arrested four Tibetans from Ngaba county in Sichuan province, accusing one monk from Kirti Monastery of making dedication prayer offerings outside Tibet and two laypersons of maintaining contact with Tibetans outside the region, two sources told Radio Free Asia.

The arrests in early September come close on the heels of monastic school closures at Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county and Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Dzoge county, as well as the forced transfer of over 1,600 students, aged 6-17, from the Buddhist schools into state-administered "colonial style" boarding schools. More than 1,000 students were affected by the closure of the school at Kirti Monastery.

In the wake of the school closures, authorities have intensified surveillance and imposed tight restrictions on Tibetans in Ngaba county, including a crackdown on communication with the outside world.

"After the school closures in July, a high-ranking official from China's United Front Work Department was stationed in Ngaba county for several months, implementing even stricter control measures over both the monastery and the local community," the first source told RFA on the condition of anonymity for safety reasons.

Of the four arrested in September, two are Buddhist monks – Lobsang Samten, 53, and Lobsang Trinley, 40 – from Kirti Monastery. Samten was arrested for allegedly contacting someone outside Tibet for the purpose of dedicating prayers, while the reason for Trinley's arrest is still unclear, said the sources.

The Chinese government restricts communication between Tibetans and their family members and friends abroad, saying it undermines national unity.

Tibetans, in turn, have decried surveillance by Beijing, saying Chinese authorities are violating their human rights and trying to eradicate their religious, linguistic and cultural identity. Click here to read more.

Tibetan monks' phones seized after accusations of sharing news about school closures

24 October 2024, RFA

China has shut down 2 schools linked to monasteries in Sichuan province.

Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery is seen in an undated photo. (Citizen photo)

Chinese authorities are confiscating the cell phones of Tibetan Buddhist monks in Sichuan province, accusing them of having shared news about the recent closure of schools linked to monasteries, two sources with knowledge of the situation said.

Under Chinese government rules, ethnic Tibetans are banned from contacting or sharing news with people outside the region.

Traditionally, many Tibetan children are sent to schools at monasteries to be educated in the Tibetan language in regular subjects as well as in Buddhism. But Chinese authorities have closed schools at the Lhamo Kirti Monastery in Sichuan's Dzoge county and the Kirti Monastery in Ngaba county, claiming that the young monks were too young to receive monastic education.

The closure of the Lhamo Kirti Monastery school former affected nearly 600 students.

Instead, parents were required to enroll their children in state-administered residential schools, where the instruction is in Mandarin.

Suspicious that monks were sharing news about the closures with the wider world, authorities have been checking their phones since Oct. 1, said the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisal. Those found to have done so had their phones confiscated.

Authorities also have held frequent meetings with monastery management to emphasize the need for monks to study regulatory rules for Buddhist monasteries, citing religious affairs regulations and the prohibition of "separatist activities" by monks, they said.

"Despite the closure of the monastic schools, strict controls have been imposed, and restrictions have intensified with authorities claiming the spread of information about the monastic school's closure to the outside world is a serious issue," the first source said.

"Officials are also conducting regular meetings with monastery staff, prohibiting 'separatist activities' and enforcing strict adherence to state regulations," he said.

According to Beijing's regulations on religious affairs, students at monastic schools must be 18 or older, display patriotism and be compliant with national laws.

Tibetan advocates see these regulations as part of broader government efforts to suppress Tibetan culture and enforce "patriotic education."

Founded in 1986, the Lhamo Kirti Monastery school initially offered three classes held in the monastery's hall and monks' residences.

In 1993, a separate school called Taktsang Lhamo Tibetan Culture School was established, but it faced interference from the Chinese government when officials ramped up restrictions on the study of the Tibetan language and Buddhist philosophy, ultimately leading to its closure.

The monastery's primary school later reopened and served novice monks under the age of 18 and children from nearby nomadic areas.

In July 2024, authorities issued new orders requiring the closure of the school. Families were compelled to sign agreements ensuring that their children would be enrolled in government-run schools, where they would undergo state-approved "patriotic education."

China cracks down on 'uncivilised' online puns used to discuss sensitive topics

23 October 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidson

Campaign targets wordplay and memes that are often used by people to get around censorship controls

China's internet regulators have launched a campaign cracking down on puns and homophones, one of the last remaining ways for citizens to safely discuss sensitive subjects without recriminations or censorship.

The "clear and bright" campaign is targeting "irregular and uncivilised" language online, particularly jokes, memes, and wordplay, the Cyberspace Administration of China and the ministry of education announced this month.

"For some time, various internet jargons and memes have appeared frequently, leaving people more and more confused," said an editorial by the Communist party mouthpiece, the People's Daily.

"They also form a hidden erosion on the daily communication and ideological values of minors, which can easily lead to adverse consequences."

China's online spaces are strictly monitored and censored. Some sensitive topics and terms are strictly banned, such as references to the Tiananmen massacre, or criticism of President Xi Jinping. Insulting individuals or China generally is also frowned upon.

In response, users have adapted, using funny or obscure references and in-jokes to get around the censorship. Many rely on homophones, using phrases that sound very similar in Mandarin, but were written with different Chinese characters, such as the word for "paratrooper" (sǎn bīng) instead of "idiot" (shǎ bī).

Authorities are in a near-constant race to catch new ways of describing Xi without mentioning him, which in the past have included a series of three arrows to represent the tones in his full name, or references to Winnie-the-Pooh because of suggestions Xi resembles the character.

Commenters will also often use the term "your country" to criticise Communist party (CCP) rule, instead of the CCP's commonly used "my country", as a protest that the CCP's China is not their China. One Chinese academic told the Guardian that instead of openly discussing concerns about government policies, colleagues would instead share links to allegorical poems or historical references.

State media has also suggested the new campaign intends to target even benign-sounding puns, giving as an example the phrase "rainy girl without melons" (yǔ nǚ wú guā) which is often used in place of "it's none of your business" (yǔ nǚ wú guān).

The People's Daily noted the quick turnover for online memes, and urged authorities and social media platforms to not allow "obviously ambiguous" new words to spread quickly without "rectification". "A wave of bad jokes will have disappeared, and a new wave of bad jokes may be on the way," it wrote.

Condemned Uyghur official dies in prison in China's Xinjiang region

22 October 2024, RFA

Shirzat Bawudun, once a senior government official, was sentenced to death in 2021.

A Uyghur man who once served as a high-ranking government official in western China's far-western Xinjiang region has died in prison four years after he was sentenced to death for "separatism" and "terrorism," a prison official and a person with knowledge of the situation said.

Former Uyghur official Shirzat Bawudun admits to acts of separatism and terrorism in a "confession" broadcast on April 9, 2021. (Image from CGTN video)

Shirzat Bawudun is a former deputy secretary of the ruling Chinese Communist Party's Political and Legal Affairs Committee in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, or XUAR.

He was detained in November 2018 on suspicion of being "two-faced" and was officially arrested the following month after authorities determined he had committed a crime.

Bawudun and another high-ranking Uyghur official, Sattar Sawut, were given two-year suspended death sentences in 2021 in a stunning decision that critics said showed that even Uyghurs loyal to the Communist Party couldn't escape persecution in Xinjiang.

It was unclear when Bawudun passed away. But a source familiar with the situation who wished to remain anonymous for security reasons told Radio Free Asia that when family members requested a video meeting with him in late July, authorities informed them that he had died in prison.

Relatives are shocked by the news of his death, which they described as mysterious, according to the source. During their last video call in March, family members didn't observe any signs of illness or physical weakness, the source said.

Workers at the prison were notified of Bawudun's death, but the cause wasn't disclosed, a staff member at Turpan Dahiyan Prison in eastern Xinjiang told RFA last week.

The source familiar with the situation said authorities didn't tell family members about how and when he died. They were only told that Bawudun died in prison and that they shouldn't submit any more visitation requests, the source said.

Bawudun's arrest came amid a campaign of extralegal incarceration that saw up to 1.8 million Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities held in a vast network of internment camps beginning in early 2017. Bawudun and Sawut were the first high-ranking government officials to be given death sentences.

Bawudun had also served as a director of the region's High Court and was a member of the XUAR Political Consultative Conference.

According to the limited information shared by XUAR's High Court in 2021, Bawudun was accused of "long-term planning to split the country," "participating in the East Turkistan Islamic Movement" and "providing illegal intelligence to people outside" China.

Overcrowding reported at China detention centers amid economic downturn

21 October 2024, VOA, Lin Nai- Chuan

Reports of overcrowded detention centers in China are spreading on the country's social media platforms as Chinese law enforcement cracks down on both petty and serious crime.

Analysts say China's increasing economic challenges from the slowing economy to unemployment and a massive property crisis, are all contributing to higher crime rates and in turn an increase in detainees at detention centers.

In one video posted on October 9 on the Chinese social media platform Xiaohongshu, Beijing-based lawyer Zhao Haidong describes a recent visit to the city's Fengtai Detention Center.

"In some of the smaller rooms there are around 20 people, in bigger rooms around 30 or 40 people," he said, adding that the number of detainees was much more than in previous years.

In another video published in August, Wang Rui, a lawyer in Sichuan, says he found 20 people detained in a 12-person room. The detainees had to sleep sideways together on a 30-foot-long bed. Wang reports that China is looking to expand its detention center infrastructure.

One Chinese human rights lawyer who asked to speak anonymously with VOA citing security concerns said he had witnessed similar circumstances.

The lawyer said he recently visited an insurance agent who was detained in Hebei province on allegations of "corruption." Describing the conditions, the lawyer said, "There are 28 people living in a detention room of more than 10 square meters, and a dozen square meters can only accommodate about 7-9 people."

VOA reached out to all three detention centers for comment on the reports of overcrowding. The Fengtai Detention Center refused to comment and said reporters must visit the center in person and present their press credentials before its liaison office would speak with them.

The detention center in Hebei also refused to comment over the phone and the center in Sichuan did not respond to a request for information.

Detention centers are designed to hold individuals awaiting trials and those who are arrested for petty crimes serving three or fewer months of jail time. Their overcrowding has become a problem as China has increasingly arrested more people in violation of the law.

According to official statistics from the Supreme People's Procuratorate of China, 367,000 people were approved for arrest in the first half of 2024, an increase of 18.5% over the previous year. Reports also show that China has prosecuted over 761,000 people this year, an increase of almost 7%.

On China's social media platforms, lawyers cite two reasons for the increase: a tougher crackdown on crime and worsening economic hardships.

Shen Yanan, a lawyer in Shandong province, says actions that were previously tolerated are now being targeted for arrest.

These include illegal transactions, trade disputes, pornography, gambling, fishing and collecting protected wild herbs, reported lawyer Sun Lianwei on her social media accounts.

Many online lawyers attribute the rise in arrests to increasing economic pressures and note that financial crimes have increased because of the pressure of mortgages, car loans and work.

Lin Zhanhui, assistant professor at Feng Chia University in Taichung, said that China's expansion of the definition of national security, heightening levels of social stability maintenance and changing standards for illegal behavior are the reasons for overcrowded detention centers.

"The CCP [Chinese Communist Party] is constantly expanding its criminal crackdown, through the so-called rule of law. [In addition to] maintaining stability for economic crimes, mass protests and political issues [must] be stabilized through national security laws," Lin told VOA.

Taiwanese democracy activist Lee Ming-che, who has firsthand experience in Chinese prisons, believes local government corruption could also be playing into the increase in arrests.

"With China's economic stagnation, and detention centers need to survive, local governments may be detaining more people [to] raise revenues and cracking down in these crimes that used to be overlooked," Lee said.

In China, inmates can pay to upgrade their meals and buy daily necessities. More inmates lead to more sales, increasing the revenue for the detention center and local government.

Lin Zhanhui has also observed local governments in China using "rule by law" as a means of bringing more money into local coffers. Such methods include short-term detentions and fines, he said.

Additionally, Lin agreed with the assessment of lawyers online in China that economic shifts, including rising youth unemployment, corporate layoffs, factory closures and general employment struggles were contributing to the rise in overall crime.

Given the rising costs of living in China, some people, he says, could even see arrest as a means to get free meals provided in detention centers.

Facing harder times and more stringent laws, online legal influencers say it is the responsibility of individual citizens to avoid arrest. That is a frequent reminder that lawyers give in videos posted on social media.

"And here, I want to remind everyone: before you do anything [illegal], be sure to think twice, think twice and then think twice again," lawyer Shi Chuang says.

Falun Gong Practitioner Persecuted to Death 5 Days After Arrival in Notorious Prison

21 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Shen Xiang

The 60-year-old Ren Changbin had just arrived in Heilongjiang's Shuangyashan Prison when his sister was informed he had "accidentally" died.

Ren Changbin. From X.

In Heilongjiang Province, Falun Gong practitioner Ren Changbin was tortured to death on September 28, 2024, merely five days after his incarceration in the notorious Shuangyashan Prison, where torture is routinely practiced.

Ren Changbin was born in 1964 in Jiamusi City in Heilongjiang Province. He previously worked at the Jiamusi Gongnong Glass Factory before retiring and later joined the Jiamusi Jianxing Ready-Mixed Concrete Company.

On September 14 and 15, 2023, a special anti-xie jiao (the Chinese name for banned "organizations spreading heterodox teachings," sometimes less correctly translated as "evil cults") squad of the Jiamusi Public Security Bureau raided several private homes, arresting some thirty Falun Gong practitioners and their families.

Among them, Ren Changbin was arrested by the police at his home on the evening of September 14. He was accused of being active in a xie jiao, a crime punished by Article 300 of the Chinese Criminal Code. On July 25, 2024, he was sentenced to three years in prison by the Jiamusi Xiangyang District Court.

The notorious Shuangyashan Prison. From X.

Ren Changbin was transferred to Shuangyashan Prison on September 23, 2024. He was tortured to death just five days later, on the 28th, at the age of 60.

On September 28, 2024, at 8:00 a.m., Ren Changbin's sister was informed by the prison that he had died unexpectedly. When his family inquired about the cause of death, the prison authorities did not clarify, vaguely mentioning that he may have fallen while taking a shower. They were told that Ren Changbin's body had been sent to the funeral home. Ren Changbin's sister quickly gathered family members and hurried to the funeral home. There, they observed a stitched wound on his head, bruised eyes, body injuries, and hurt feet, all unmistakable signs of torture. Ren Changbin joins a long list of Falun Gong practitioners tortured to death in Chinese jails.

In rare appeal, Tibetan calls for company to stop digging up river

20 October 2024, RFA, Dolkar and Choegyri

Tsongon Tsering, a Tibetan man from Tsaruma village in Kyungchu county in China's Sichuan province, calls for authorities to take action against illegal sand and gravel mining taking place since May 2023 on the Tsaruma River. (Image from citizen video via WeChat)

Chinese authorities have since shut down Tsongon Tsering's WeChat account. A Tibetan from Sichuan province has made a rare public appeal on Chinese social media, calling on authorities to take action against a company that he accuses of illegally extracting sand and gravel from a local riverbed, Tibetan sources with knowledge of the situation said. In a 5-minute video posted on WeChat on Oct. 15, Tsongon Tsering from Tsaruma village in Kyungchu county said Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering Co.'s digging has caused severe soil erosion and a drop in water levels in the Tsaruma River.

Such public appeals are rare due to fear of reprisals from the government for speaking out against authorities or state-approved projects.

Authorities have since shut down his account and blocked search terms related to his name on WeChat, a popular Chinese social media platform, said two sources from inside Tibet, who like others in this report, declined to be identified out of fear of retribution.

Tsering's case illustrates how authorities silence Tibetans who accuse Chinese companies of violating environmental regulations or harming the environment.

In the video, Tsering says Tibetan residents had made repeated appeals before local authorities for action against the company for causing environmental harm, but to no avail.

"The Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering's business office has been illegally extracting sand and stones from the river in Tsaruma Village during their road construction work," he says in the video while holding up his ID card.

"The large-scale and indiscriminate extraction of sand from the river has led to serious soil erosion in the surrounding area and is posing a threat to the foundations of residents' homes," he continues.

Tsering's video, which gained significant attention online, was also widely shared by other users on the platform but even those were taken down and all related content censored by Thursday, Oct. 17, the two sources said.

Sources from the region said they fear Tsering, who hails from Ngaba Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture, will face punishment for his public criticism of authorities.

Four other sources inside Tibet confirmed Tsering's statement that the sand extraction from the local river has caused environmental harm and that locals had reported the issue to various government departments at the village and county levels.

They also provided photos and videos as evidence of the damage, but no action had been taken, said the sources.

Tsering's video, which had around 10,000 views in a day's time, received more than 500 comments from netizens, the majority of whom expressed support for his appeal and called for environmental protection and for the Chinese state media and authorities to address the issue.

Tsering also tagged official Chinese media outlets in his post to draw their attention.

Affects the Yellow and Yangtze

In the video, Tsering explained that the Tsaruma River, where the extraction is taking place, is linked to the Yangtze and Yellow River systems, two of China's most important.

"The pollution of these river sources and the protection of local ecosystems and biodiversity are deeply interconnected issues," he said. "Moreover, this directly affects the water resources of Asia and the conditions of the high-altitude frozen soil."

A sand mining operation is seen along the Tsaruma River in Kyungchu county in Sichuan province, China, in this image posted Oct. 15, 2024, by Tibetan resident Tsongon Tsering. (Image from citizen video via WeChat)

On Oct. 17, a source told RFA that following Tsering's online appeal, the Kyungchu County Development and Reform Office had promised a thorough investigation into the matter.

An official from the Ngaba Prefecture Ecological Protection Office said his office was aware of the issue and investigating it in collaboration with the Sichuan Provincial Ecological Environment Monitoring Office, Chinese state media reported.

The agencies would release their findings soon, he said.

"Although environmental protection policies were introduced many years ago, implementation issues persist in our area," said Tsering in the video.

Brushing it under the rug

In it, he confirms that the county's Ecological Environment Bureau responded to his complaint in April 2024, confirming that the construction company had extracted sand and stones from the river and that it had been fined.

But Tsering said the response merely covers up for the relevant business enterprise and tried to brush the problem under the rug.

"They have addressed minor issues while avoiding the major ones, and have not taken any action to restore the ecological environment or manage the soil erosion situation," he said. "They have simply erected barriers around the endangered house foundations and considered the matter resolved."

Anhui Xianhe Construction Engineering, registered in China in June 2012, is involved in various construction projects including road construction, urban development, hydropower projects and environmental protection works.

RFA Tibetan could not reach the company for comment.

Yunnan, Update on Brother Chang Hao: Sentenced, Liberated, and Detained Again

18 October 2024, Bitter Winter, Li Xiosi

The popular preacher was baptizing new Christians with famous Pastor John Cao when the police raided the gathering on October 15.

Brother Chang Hao (left) and Pastor John Cao (right). From X.

“Bitter Winter” has devoted several articles to Yunnan preacher Chang Hao, the “Christian anti-COVID mask man” who became popular by distributing masks inscribed with Bible verses, an initiative that mightily disturbed the authorities.

In April 2023, police raided Brother Chang Hao’s small rural church in Zhenxiong County, Zhaotong City, Yunnan Province. They confiscated Bibles, Christian books, and the famous anti-COVID masks with the Bible verses.

On November 7, 2023, the prosecutor brought the case against Brother Chang Hao to the Zhenxiong County People’s Court. According to Chinese law and procedure, a verdict was typically expected within two months, and no later than within three months. This period ended in February. Despite a document stating Chang Hao would be detained only until February 10 if no verdict was issued, he remained in jail without a verdict even after that date.

However, he was finally sent to trial and sentenced to one year and one month in jail for “picking quarrels and provoking trouble,” a catch-all charge against religionists who operate independently of the CCP-controlled religious bodies.

Counted from when he was first detained, the term of one year and one month expired on May 14, 2024, and Chang Hao was released on that date. However, he was kept under surveillance.

On October 15, 2024, Chang Hao gathered local believers in Zhenxiong County to celebrate the baptism of fifteen new Christians, some of them coming from Hunan with Pastor John Cao (Cao Sanqiang), another well-known and persecuted figure in the house church movement.

The police raided the event. Pastor Cao and Brother Chang with dozens of Christians were taken to the police station. All were eventually released except Brother Chang, who was notified he will remain in administrative detention for twelve days. What will happen next remains unclear.

China's ruling against Tibetan activist highlights Beijing's poor human rights record

11 October 2024, ANI

For over two years, a Tibetan woman named Gonpo Kyi has been fighting for the release of her falsely accused brother, Dorjee Tashi.

Last month, a Chinese court ruled against her, putting justice for her younger brother even further out of reach. The court determined that the Public Security Bureau's (PSB) detention of Gonpo Kyi was lawful under Chinese law.

The International Campaign for Tibet has expressed concern over the oppressional activities adopted by the Chinese administration against Gonpo Kyi.

The PSB argued that Gonpo's activism expressed through prostration, meditation, posting flyers, and lying down in the street interfered with the work of the Tibet Autonomous Region Higher People's Court.

As a result, the PSB's 10-day detention of Gonpo was deemed valid, the return of confiscated materials (an A4 sign and a white cloth banner) was denied, and her claim for monetary compensation was dismissed. Gonpo Kyi, also known as Gontey (Chinese: Gongde), has been actively seeking justice for her younger brother Dorjee (Duoji Zhaxi) since June 2022. Dorjee received a life sentence in 2010 after being framed as a “secessionist” in the aftermath of the Chinese government's crackdown on mass Tibetan protests in the spring of 2008, and he is currently imprisoned in the notorious Drapchi Prison.

He was arrested following widespread protests across Tibet that challenged Chinese rule and was suspected of providing clandestine support to Tibetan demonstrators and of having alleged connections with the Tibetan exile community.

On September 24, 2024, the Chengguan District Court in Lhasa dismissed all five counts of Gonpo Kyi's complaint against the district's PSB. She had filed the lawsuit in March 2024, primarily claiming that her ten-day detention for peacefully advocating for her brother's release violated her rights.

Since its illegal occupation in the 1950s, China has aimed for the complete sinicisation of Tibet, oppressing its people for over six decades. Since June 2022, Gonpo has been at the forefront of persistent efforts to seek justice for her brother. Her approach has evolved from appeals to authorities in Beijing over the past decade to more public forms of protest, including sit-ins in front of the Tibet Autonomous Region Higher People's Court in Lhasa. Gonpo's public advocacy reveals growing frustration with the lack of progress through official channels and a willingness to risk personal consequences to draw attention to her brother's case.

Tibetans in Tibet face severe restrictions on fundamental human rights, living under the constant surveillance of the Communist Party, which punishes or imprisons those who do not comply with its unfavourable policies and agendas, as reported by The Geneva Daily.

"I have petitioned the court in Lhasa for a retrial of Dorjee Tashi's case under the law of the country, but they have refused. The police have detained, dragged, and beaten me multiple times. I'm currently in poor health due to these beatings. My right to request a retrial for my brother feels powerless. Until the Lhasa Court addresses my appeal, I will persist," Gonpo stated.

Although the initial political charges against Dorjee were eventually dropped, he was later charged with "loan fraud."

In May 2010, the Lhasa Intermediate People's Court sentenced him to life imprisonment and permanent deprivation of political rights. Throughout her years of public advocacy, the PSB has subjected Gonpo to beatings, detentions, forcible removal from protest sites, and threats of severe consequences, all aimed at silencing her efforts.

Tibetan singer arrested for 'patriotic song' released early from prison

07 October 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Golok Palden in an undated photo (Photo/Tibet Times)

A Tibetan singer who was sentenced to three years in prison by Chinese authorities for performing a patriotic song has reportedly been released early, but remains under strict surveillance and restrictions. Golok Palden, from Yostag village in Dhimda township of Golok Padma County, was released on September 25, several months before completing his original prison term. Sources indicate he has been explicitly warned against singing any more patriotic songs.

The singer was initially imprisoned in November of the previous year after performing the song "I Am the Messenger of the Emperor" online. His arrest and sentencing were carried out secretly by Chinese authorities.

According to Tibet Times, which cited an anonymous Tibetan source from Tibet, Palden's release came without prior notice to his family. While the reasons for his early release remain unclear, reports suggest he is being closely monitored and followed by authorities.

Concerns about Palden's health have emerged, as many prisoners released early by Chinese authorities often face medical issues and cases of death in detention are common in Chinese prisons. However, due to restrictions preventing him from meeting with villagers and the secretive nature of his release, his current health condition cannot be verified.

Prior to his arrest, Palden had established himself as a respected figure in Tibet's traditional music scene. In 2022, he achieved sixth place in a traditional singing competition organized by Minthang Sermo and gained popularity for his online release "Missing Mother." His social media following exceeded 98,000 at the time of his arrest.

Chinese authorities continue to implement severe restrictions on Tibetan cultural expression, with numerous artists, writers, and intellectuals facing arbitrary detention and harsh sentences. Singers Pema Trinley and Chakdor from Meuruma nomadic village were secretly sentenced by a Chinese court in Ngaba in February 2013, having been detained in July 2012 shortly after releasing their album "Agony of Unhealed Wounds," which addressed sensitive topics including self-immolation protests and contained songs praising Tibetan religious leaders.

The crackdown extends beyond musicians and include writers and cultural advocates. Tibetan writer and poet Gendun Lhundrup, known for his cultural preservation efforts and his poetry anthology "Khorwa," was arrested in the so called Qinghai province in 2020. Other notable cases include Tashi Wangchuk, sentenced to five years in 2018 for language advocacy, and singer Lhundrub Drakpa, who received a six-year sentence in June 2020 for his song "Black Hat" after spending over a year in pre-trial detention without legal representation. The pattern of suppression continues with the confirmed detention of prominent scholar Rongwo Gangkar in early 2021, following his disappearance for over a year.

Former Tibetan political prisoner Thupten Yeshi passes away at 74 in Lhasa

02 October 2024, Phayul

Former Tibetan political prisoner Thupten Yeshi in an undated photo (Photo/VOA)

Thupten Yeshi, a former political prisoner who spent an aggregate of 15 years in the infamous Drapchi prison for allegedly leading the 1992 protest in Gyama Township, Meldrogungkar County, has reportedly passed away at the age of 74 in Lhasa, Tibet's capital. The 1992 protest was the first in the County since 1987, marking a significant moment in Tibetan resistance.

Thupten Yeshi was arrested on July 6, 1992, alongside four other farmers—Kunchok Lodroe, Lhundup, Sonam Rinchen, and Sonam Dorjee—following a bold protest in Gyama Township, Meldrogungkar County. On June 30, 1992, a large meeting of around 1,200 people, including local leaders, convened in the township. The four farmers disrupted the gathering, unfurling a 2.5-meter-long Tibetan national flag and shouting slogans such as “Free Tibet,” “Chinese Leave Tibet,” and “Long Live His Holiness the Dalai Lama.”

They were swiftly arrested, and Thupten Yeshi was later apprehended as the alleged ringleader. He was initially detained for 13 days at Meldrogungkar County Detention Centre before being secretly transferred to Gutsa Detention Centre, east of Lhasa. There, he endured nearly three months of interrogation, torture, and inhumane treatment.

On October 20, 1992, following severe torture during interrogation at Gutsa, the Lhasa People's Intermediate Court convicted all five on charges of “counter-revolutionary plot” and “inciting reactionary propaganda.” Sonam Dorjee and Kunchok Lodroe were sentenced to 13 years in prison, while Thupten Yeshi, Lhundup, and Sonam Rinchen each received 15-year sentences.

Sonam Rinchen, in his twenties at the time, died in 1999 while still in prison, after suffering partial paralysis due to repeated torture. Kunchok Lodroe was released on medical parole in 1996.

On November 20, 1992, the group was transferred to Drapchi Prison. Thupten Yeshi was immediately placed in solitary confinement for reciting Mani prayers and refusing to “reform.” In February 1999, he developed severe renal problems and blisters all over his body, leading to a 17-day stay at Xizang Military Hospital near Drapchi. Despite not fully recovering, he was returned to prison in poor health. Thupten Yeshi was finally released in 2007 after completing his 15-year sentence.

September

China targets high-ranking officials who read banned books

21 September 2024, RFA, Zhu Liye

The crackdown on restricted content could upend a system that once gave senior officials a more global education.

China's Communist Party is clamping down on the secret hobby of some high-ranking officials: reading banned books, a series of state media reports suggest.

Officials from glitzy Shanghai to poverty-stricken Guizhou have been accused in recent months of “privately possessing and reading banned books and periodicals,” according to state media reports, which typically surface when the officials are probed by the party's disciplinary arm.

Senior officials have traditionally enjoyed privileged access to materials banned as potentially subversive for the wider population, via the “neibu,” or internal, publishing system, former Communist Party officials told RFA Mandarin in recent interviews.

Now it appears that President Xi Jinping is coming for their personal libraries and private browsing habits in a bid to instill the same ideas in all party members regardless of rank.

A man walks past posters about Chinese political books displayed at the Hong Kong Book Fair in Hong Kong, July 18, 2012. (Philippe Lopez/AFP)

During the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, any foreign book could be considered a "poisonous weed that promotes the bourgeois lifestyle."

Books banned since 2000 have typically been works about recent Chinese history or inside scoops on senior leaders, including memoirs from Mao Zedong's personal physician, late ousted premier Zhao Ziyang and a book about the later years of Mao's trusted premier Zhou Enlai.

Overseas publications are often banned or tightly controlled in China, either online, or via a complex process of political vetting by the authorities, including a 2017 requirement that anyone selling foreign publications in China must have a special license.

Wider knowledge makes better leaders

Former Party School professor Cai Xia said officials were generally allowed to read whatever they liked until the turn of the century. The arrangement encouraged officials to broaden their perspective, making them better leaders.

"Politics, like art, requires imagination," Cai said.

"Because experience shows that the more single-minded and closed-off the thinking of the Communist Party, especially the senior cadres, the narrower their vision and the poorer their thinking, and the harder it is for them to grasp the complex phenomena and situations that have emerged in China's rapid development," she told Radio Free Asia.

Wider reading encourages deeper thought, which helps China "to move forward," she said.

Du Wen, former executive director of the Legal Advisory Office of the Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region government, said the purge of readers of banned publications is worrying.

"This phenomenon is so scary, because it sends the message that there is no independence in the ranks of the Chinese Communist Party," Du said. "Even dialectical materialism and critical thinking have become evidence of guilt."

Nearly 20 officials have been accused of similar infractions, Du said, basing the number on his observation of media reports.

Officials have been tight-lipped about the names of the books and periodicals these officials were reading, yet the accusations keep coming.

Those targeted

In November 2023, the party launched a probe into former Zhejiang provincial Vice Gov. Zhu Congjiu, accusing him of losing his way ideologically.

In addition to making off-message comments in public, Zhu had "privately brought banned books into the country and read them over a long period of time," according to media reports at the time.

In June 2023, the Beijing branch of the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection expelled former state assets supervisory official Zhang Guilin for "possessing and reading books and periodicals with serious political issues," alongside a slew of other alleged offenses including "engaging in power-for-sex and money-for-sex transactions."

Many of those targeted have been in the state-controlled financial system, while some have been concentrated in the central province of Hunan and the southwestern megacity of Chongqing, according to political commentator Yu Jie.

"Interestingly, a lot of officials in the political and legal system, national security and prison systems, which are responsible for maintaining stability and persecuting dissidents, are also keen on reading banned books," Yu wrote in a recent commentary for RFA Mandarin, citing the case of former state security police political commissar Li Bin.

In Hubei province, the commission went after one of their own in party secretary Wang Baoping, accusing him of "buying and reading books that distorted and attacked the 18th Party Congress."

"Monitoring what people are reading shows the authoritarian system's determination and ability to maintain its power and to destroy any resources that could be subversive and any doubts about the legitimacy of the authorities' rule," Yu wrote in a Chinese-language commentary on May 28.

"Xi Jinping's ... goal is to turn more than 80 million party members into marionettes or zombies, and follow him, like the Pied Piper, in a mighty procession that leads to hell," he said.

Categories

Zhang Huiqing, a former editor at the People's Publishing House, told RFA Mandarin that "gray" books were allowed to be published under the watchful eye of the party's Central Propaganda Department, which also reviewed and vetted foreign-published books for translation into Chinese, for distribution as "neibu" reading material.

Divided into categories A, B and C, where A was restricted to the smallest number of officials,

"reactionary" books were those that could potentially cause people to challenge the party leadership, and they were once distributed in a highly controlled manner, Zhang said.

Du Wen said that while he was an official in the Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region government, he had access to a slew of foreign news outlets not usually sold on the streets of Chinese cities, including Bloomberg, The New York Times, The Washington Post and newspapers published in democratic Taiwan.

"These were all allowed because if you want to do research, you have to understand what's going on overseas," Du said. "How can you research something if you don't understand the situation?"

Yet recent changes to party disciplinary regulations have brought more publications into the danger zone.

Nowadays, any publication not entirely in line with orthodox Marxism-Leninism or the official view of Communist Party history is likely to be seen as "reactionary," as is any information about China's highest-ranking leaders, both past and present, according to a senior figure in the Chinese publishing industry who spoke to RFA Mandarin on condition of anonymity.

"There's a lot of randomness and contingency that affects whether something winds up being labeled as reactionary," the person said. "It also depends on the level of understanding and personal ambition of the person in charge of an investigation."

And times change, making it hard for officials to stay on the right side of the rules.

"A book that was reactionary yesterday may not be reactionary today, and vice versa," the person said.

Public hotline

Typically, Chinese publishing houses take direct instructions from the General Administration of Press and Publication and its provincial branches about what they can and can't publish.

But a public hotline and a highly cautious attitude in recent years has meant that a book can be banned on the basis of a single phone call from a concerned individual.

The senior publishing industry figure said one work of non-fiction was canned on the say-so of the widow of a senior cadre because she didn't like the way her late husband was portrayed. The man had only played a minor role in the book.

"All of our editing, proofreading, binding, design, printing, marketing and distribution work was wasted," the person said. "We had already printed several thousand copies of the book, but we had to send them to be pulped."

The Chinese Communist Party's internal rule-book entry on what constitutes a banned book offense has been amended three times since 2015, with categories being added each time.

Article 47 of the original regulations issued in 2003 warn: "Anyone who brings reactionary books, audio-visual products, electronic reading materials and so on into the country from abroad shall be criticized and educated; if the circumstances are serious, they will be given a warning or a serious warning; more serious offenses will be disciplined by removal from party post, probation or expulsion from the party."

Since 2015, the rules have been updated three times to include anyone "reading privately, browsing or listening" to banned material, which now includes "online text, images and audiovisual material."

Another senior media figure who requested anonymity said the key factor that makes a book reactionary these days is whether or not it tells the truth, especially about the Chinese government.

"Actually, the most reactionary thing is the truth," the person said, "because the truth could shake the foundations of party rule."

Chinese police 'stalling' after school attack on dissident's son

18 September 2024, RFA, Qian Lang

Poet and artist Wang Zang is barred from talking to the media, while his wife says police are dragging their feet.

Police in the southwestern province of Yunnan have refused to set up a case file after the son of dissident poet Wang Zang was sent to hospital following an attack by older students at his high school, according to the boy's parents.

Wang Nianci, 15, was hospitalized following an attack by four older boys at the Zixi High School in Yunnan's Chuxiong region at around 9:30 p.m. local time on Sept. 12, Wang Zang's wife Wang Li told RFA Mandarin service in an interview on Wednesday.

The boys surrounded Wang Nianci in the bathroom, beating him and leaving with a fractured skull and broken nose, according to a CT scan carried out at the hospital, she said.

The attack came after authorities slapped a gag order, travel ban and round-the-clock surveillance on Wang Li and the couple's children as part of a nationwide "stability maintenance" operation during the National People's Congress in Beijing last year.

Wang Zang and Wang Li were both jailed behind closed doors in May 2020 by the Chuxiong Yi Autonomous Prefecture Intermediate People's Court, which found them guilty of "incitement to subvert state power" after they gave interviews to foreign media organizations.

Wang Zang said he was unable to comment on Wednesday, as he was banned from speaking to the media following his release from prison in May at the end of his four-year jail term. Wang Li was released in 2022 after serving a two-and-a-half year jail term. "The police made it clear to me the day before yesterday that I'm not allowed to give interviews," he said. "I have asked my wife to talk to you about this."

Wang said the couple had gotten a call at around 10 p.m. on Sept. 12 and rushed to the school, where they were asked by school officials to wait in the security guard room.

"They wouldn't let us in to see my son's injuries [at first]," she said. "When he came out, his nose and face were swollen and his hands were covered in blood."

'We're still waiting'

The couple took Wang Nianci to the local police station to report the incident, where police took their statement, before calling in the four alleged attackers, but issued no official documents regarding the case, Wang Li said.

According to the medical report from the Chuxiong People's Hospital, a copy of which was shared with RFA Mandarin, Wang Nianci had sustained a fracture to the parietal bone, which forms part of the skull, and suffered from headaches as a result of that trauma.

But police didn't seem to take the attack very seriously, and suggested instead that her son leave the school he is currently enrolled in, Wang Li said.

"We asked them to open a case file, but they kept saying we had to wait," she said. "We're still waiting."

"We were supposed to meet with the police from the local police station today, but we haven't received a call from them yet, so it's still unclear what's happening," she added.

Last year, the couple called for a police investigation into the drowning death of Wang Zang's two-year-old nephew, which Wang Li said had occurred in "suspicious circumstances," but no further information about the tragedy has been forthcoming. In May 2020, police in Chuxiong Yi Autonomous Prefecture arrested both Wang Zang and Wang Li for "incitement to subvert state power," with the charges citing his poetry, essays, interviews with foreign media, and performance art since his earlier release from prison in 2015.

Wang's earlier sentence came after he posted a performance art selfie in support of Hong Kong's pro-democracy movement, and he was subjected to torture and mistreatment while in Beijing's No. 1 Detention Center, his lawyer said at the time.

In the photo, Wang holds up an umbrella, a symbol of the 2014 Occupy Central movement, and makes a middle-finger gesture.

Chinese dissidents cut off from families at Mid-Autumn Festival

18 September 2024, RFA, Chen Zifei

The authorities often use family separation as a way to punish critics of the ruling Chinese Communist Party.

Chang Weiping is seen before (L) and after (R) he went to prison in undated photos.

The Mid-Autumn Festival is usually a time of family reunions in China, but the country's prisoners of conscience have scant hope of seeing their loved ones face-to-face any time soon, relatives told RFA Mandarin in recent interviews.

Chen Zijuan, the U.S.-based wife of rights attorney Chang Weiping, said that while her husband was released in July following a prison term for taking part in a gathering of dissidents in Xiamen in December 2019, he remains under a travel ban, and can't be with them.

Mid-autumn festival takes place around the autumn equinox in September, and involves family gatherings to eat mooncakes, light lanterns and admire the full moon. The moon also symbolizes togetherness for people forced to be apart, with countless poems dedicated to moon-viewing and feelings of loss or nostalgia.

Mid-Autumn Festival, traditionally a harvest celebration, starts on the 15th day of the eighth lunar month, when the moon appears at its roundest and largest.

This year's Mid-Autumn Festival fell on Tuesday and coincided with worldwide viewing of the supermoon eclipse.

But not everyone in China is in a position to take part.

"In recent years, the Chinese Communist Party has increasingly used family separation as a form of punishment for dissidents," Chen told RFA Mandarin ahead of the festival. "Even two years after his release, I'm not optimistic. I think they'll claim that his departure would endanger national security."

"It's very damaging for a family not to be able to see each other over a long period of time," she said. "They just want to make you suffer — it's also a way to intimidate everyone else in society."

For the spouses and children of political prisoners, national holidays, when everyone else is meeting up with loved ones, are the hardest and saddest times.

"I worry about him — he looks thinner and kind of sallow," she said of Chang. "He has lost his lawyer's license, and it's hard for him to get by now that he has lost his career."

Chen Zijuan (L) and Chang Weiping (R) pose together with their son in an undated photo taken before Chang's imprisonment. (Chen Zijuan)

"He is very anxious right now, and doesn't know what he can do," Chen said. "I don't have a good solution — all I can do is take good care of the kids; at least he doesn't have to worry about us any more."

'They just cut you off'

Meanwhile, the U.S.-based wife of jailed rights attorney Ding Jiaxi, who is currently serving a 12-year jail term for subversion after taking part in the Xiamen gathering, said she misses her husband very much, and is very worried about his health in prison.

"I worry about his health on a daily basis," Luo Shengchun told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview. "He has high blood pressure and needs to take medication."

"In China now, the way the authorities do things is not to tell you anything, not to respond to anything, and not to pass on any information — they just cut you off," she said.

Luo has appealed to her local Congress representative, but the Chinese government won't discuss Ding's situation with them either, she said.

But she still gets letters from Ding, who was jailed in 2023 alongside prominent rights activist Xu Zhiyong, and says he is her inspiration.

"I feel his influence from his letters and his actions — I believe in the resonance of souls," Luo said.

And she refuses to buckle despite the pressure of spearheading a public campaign to support her husband.

"I won't let them succeed in silencing Ding Jiaxi and Xu Zhiyong's voices, and I won't let them turn me into someone who weeps every day," Luo said.

"I am a total believer in non-violent resistance," she said. "The more the Chinese Communist Party tries to stop me from doing something, the more I will do it."

Xu's partner, the feminist activist Li Qiaochu, has since been released from prison.

Ahead of the Mid-Autumn Festival this year, she posted a photo of herself and Xu together in a moon-shaped frame to social media, calling on people to write to him in prison to offer their support during the festival, according to Luo.

Political Shakeup at China's Top Social Sciences Institute Over Alleged Dissent

16 September 2024, China Scope

The Chinese Academy of Social Sciences (CASS) has reportedly experienced a "political earthquake" in its Institute of Economics. The entire leadership was replaced due to allegations of "inappropriate discussions about the central government." This marks another political incident at CASS following an "espionage case" over a decade ago.

The event was triggered by the alleged misconduct of Deputy Director Zhu Hengpeng, leading to a complete overhaul of the institute's leadership. Zhu, 55, was also the director of CASS's Public Policy Research Center, focusing on public hospital reforms and medical security systems.

By the end of last month, the institute's director, party secretary, and deputy directors were all replaced. The CASS Party Committee appointed new leadership, including Gong Yun as party secretary, Li Xuesong as director and deputy party secretary, and Song Hong as deputy director.

CASS, China's highest academic institution for philosophy and social sciences research, also serves as a central think tank and ideological center. This incident follows a previous espionage case involving two CASS researchers over a decade ago.

Beijing officials frequently emphasize that CASS is "first and foremost a political organ, with political nature as its primary attribute and political consciousness as its foremost requirement."

China's Economic Protests Give President Xi Jinping a Headache

28 August 2024, Bloomberg

China's slowdown is presenting a fresh headache for President Xi Jinping: more protests.

Instances of dissent rose 18% in the second quarter compared with the same period last year with economic grievances making up nearly two-thirds of cases. That's according to a new report from China Dissent Monitor at Freedom House, a US advocacy group.

So far, labor and real estate are the key pain points. Protests were often driven by stalled housing projects, sudden company closures or lack of liquidity, the inability to pay wages, or even local government's problems with providing adequate benefits for retirees, the project's lead said.

The figures don't capture the whole picture — researchers observed a new campaign to scrub content on video platforms early this year, and they also incorporated a new source of data in June. But it does provide a rare snapshot of the mood on the ground in some parts of the country.

China's Top 10 Cities for Economic Protest:

Dissent events in Guangdong province reflect strains in manufacturing hub Source: Freedom House's China Dissent Monitor

In tightly controlled and heavily surveilled China, protests don't present an existential threat to its leader. They're typically small scale, sporadic and don't directly criticize Xi. This means they're unlikely to prompt Beijing to take bolder steps to support the economy.

But they are a problem for local officials responsible for resolving the disputes with concessions, suppression or a mix of both. The bigger issue is that the demonstrations are symptomatic of the economic malaise taking its toll across the country.

People everywhere are feeling the pinch — and it's even weighing on demand for the most accessible of goods. This week's disappointing earnings results are another red flag. They prompted record-breaking stock selloffs in China's biggest consumer companies, the online retail giant PDD Holdings and the beverage firm Nongfu Spring.

The big picture is a nearly four-decade rise in living standards appears to be stalling in China.

And for Xi, that means he's not just dealing with the fallout from a sluggish economy but the much thornier question of how to govern as the country's boom comes to an end.

A demonstrator holds a sign reading "There is faith in our soul" during a protest against Covid restrictions in Beijing in November 2022. Source: Bloomberg

Tibetan woman arrested for spreading rumours about closure of Ragya Sherig Norbuling school

22 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Zomkyi in an undated photo (Photo/Tibet Times)

Chinese authorities have reportedly arrested a Tibetan woman for allegedly spreading rumours about the recently closed Ragya Sherig Norbuling school.

Tibet Times, a Tibetan media based in Dharamshala reported that a woman named Zomkyi, a relative of a former student of Sherig Norbu School was arrested by Nagchu County police. She was accused of spreading rumours about the closure of Sherig Norbu School on social media. Her whereabouts since her arrest remained unknown.

A Tibetan source from Tibet informed TT that approximately one week before the closure of Ragya Sherig School, Zomkyi was detained by authorities for several days on charges related to an argument with local government officials. Additionally, on June 14, she received an order from the local police station restricting her movement. The source also indicated that Zomkyi typically showed disinterest in political education.

The Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbuling school in the so called Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture was closed by Chinese authorities on July 14. The private institution, established in 1994 by Ragya Jigme Gyalsten, was shut down, ending its 30-year operation as a Tibetan educational institution. The closure of the school led to expressions of disappointment and discussion among Tibetans both inside and outside Tibet.

Months before the closure of the school, on April 12 the school encountered multiple lawsuits and pressure from the Communist Party Secretary of Golok and other officials, who had been planning to close the school for several years. A student association, formed in 2018 to preserve the Tibetan language, was also sued for using the jewel and lion emblems from the banned Tibetan National Flag as their logo.

The school's founder, Jigme Gyaltsen, was accused of corruption and accepting bribes in his roles as chairman of the Snow Land Pastoral Association and the Qinghai-Tibet Trade Association. These charges were brought to trial, and on June 28, Jigme Gyaltsen was acquitted of all charges.

Feds accuse Tiananmen Square pro-democracy activist of secretly working for China's intelligence agency decades later

21 August 2024, CBS

Federal prosecutors in New York filed criminal charges against a Chinese dissident living in the U.S., accusing him of covertly working for China's intelligence agency, the Ministry of State Security, and spying on pro-democracy activist groups, according to a criminal complaint obtained by CBS News.

Yuanjun Tang once protested against the Chinese Communist Party during the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations, court documents said, and fled to Taiwan and the U.S. But prosecutors alleged decades later, he agreed to work for China's intelligence agency in a bid to see his family living in mainland China.

Investigators said Tang first sought opportunities to visit his family in 2018 and was ultimately introduced to an unnamed intelligence officer. The two allegedly began communicating and the Chinese intelligence agent pushed Tang to collect "information about PRC Dissidents, pro-democracy events, and the political asylum process," according to court documents.

The Chinese intelligence officer also paid members of Tang's family after the pair entered the alleged partnership, prosecutors said.

Tang is accused of passing on information about events planned in New York to commemorate the Tiananmen Square massacre in 2021 and a year later, he allegedly provided the Chinese intelligence officer with information about an unnamed Congressional candidate's campaign team and fundraising. The candidate was also a Chinese dissident and human rights activist.

Court records alleged Tang also helped the agent monitor a group chat used by Chinese dissidents living in the U.S. "The group consisted of approximately 140 members, including confirmed PRC Dissidents such as the Congressional Candidate and a known PRC Dissident based in Flushing," investigators wrote.

Tang is charged with three counts, including acting as an agent of a foreign government and making false statements to investigators.

The FBI interviewed Tang in July 2023 and extracted data from five of his phones, an online account used by the Chinese intelligence officer, and Tang's computer. They recovered text and audio messages that Tang allegedly exchanged with the Chinese intelligence officer, photos and videos of pro-democracy events, screenshots of conversations between dissidents, and "a Chinese-language copy of the FBI's Transnational Repression Threat Intimidation Guide."

In one of the messages — sent on June 3, 2023, the Chinese intelligence officer allegedly urged Tang to "work harder."

"Work harder this month. You have to send over some new stuff with utmost priority," the message directed, court documents revealed.

According to investigators, Tang traveled to mainland China or Macau on at least three occasions between 2019 and 2023 to allegedly meet with the Chinese intelligence officer. During a 2022 meeting, prosecutors said the agent installed a "bug" in one of Tang's cellphones that "caused any photo, screenshot, or voice memorandum generated or captured on the Compromised Phone to be immediately transmitted" to the officer.

Prosecutors alleged Tang had not notified the U.S. federal government about his work for China's intelligence agency as required by law. He was arrested on Wednesday.

The Justice Department charged numerous individuals tied to transnational repression cases in recent years. Communities of dissidents and pro-democracy activists living in the U.S. have long been targets of China's intelligence agency, which uses the families of the activists still living in the mainland as a form of coercion as prosecutors alleged occurred in Tang's case.

Earlier this month, a jury in New York convicted a naturalized U.S. citizen of Chinese dissent who led a pro-democracy group of secretly working with Chinese intelligence officers to surveil dissidents.

And last year, the FBI arrested two defendants on charges that they set up and operated an illegal Chinese police station in the middle of New York City in order to influence and intimidate dissidents critical of the Chinese government in the U.S.

A lawyer for Tang was not immediately identified.

Another Chinese Young Man Confronts CCP, Calls for Xi Jinping's Resignation

17 August 2024, ChinaScope

Recently a Chinese young man has attracted attention by calling for the ouster of Xi Jinping using a wifi router to spread his message.

On August 14, Su Yutong, a Chinese freelance writer living in Germany, released a video on the web and stated: "A young person from China who has been promoting the movement to dismantle the Great Firewall (CCP's internet censorship/blockade system) was imprisoned in a psychiatric hospital on political charges. This morning, I received this video showing that he has once again confronted the CCP." In the video, the young man shouted: "Oppose the CCP's internet censorship and control of speech," "No privileges, we want equality," and "We need freedom of speech and internet freedom." The video was recorded outdoors. The young man hoped that Chinese people would be able to "see the true face of the CCP." The young man also mentioned that, in the past, he had used routers and other equipment to broadcast messages such as "Xi Jinping, step down." The authorities issued a warrant for him as a "political criminal," ransacked his home, and confiscated his equipment including routers, laser sound systems, transmitter modules, and mobile phones.

On August 16, Su Yutong posted again on the X platform again, identifying the young man as Yan Zhongjian, born in February 1999. Su received a message from a friend entrusted by Yan: the friend and Yan had agreed that, if Yan could not be contacted for a certain period of time, the friend would release Yan's personal information and call on netizens to show concern and support for him.

The young man followed in the footsteps of several other dissidents in recent history. For example, in October 2022 Peng Lifa posted banners and played recordings denouncing the Chinese Communist Party and asking for the ouster of Xi Jinping. On July 30 of this year, Fang Yirong posted similar messages on an overpass in Hunan Province (see this ChinaScope briefing).

The First Known Survivor of CCP's Forced Organ Harvesting Speaks Out in Washington, DC

15 August 2024, ChinaScope

Cheng Peiming, a 58-year-old Chinese man from Northeast China, is regarded as the first known survivor of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP's) program of forced live organ harvesting from prisoners of conscience. On August 9, at a forum in Washington, D.C., he publicly shared his experience in which the Chinese authorities forcibly removed his organs twenty years ago.

Cheng stated that he was repeatedly detained and tortured by the CCP for practicing Falun Gong. In 2002 he was sentenced to eight years in prison. In July 2004, in a state of good health, he was dragged from prison to a hospital where guards tried to make him sign a form of consent for surgery. When he refused to sign, the guards knocked him down and anesthetized him. When he woke up three days later, Cheng found himself handcuffed to a bed with a 35-centimeter-long incision on his chest. In 2006, prison guards again took Cheng to a hospital. He said, "They had no reason for any surgery, so I knew I would be killed." He managed to escape while the guards were sleeping. Cheng spent the next nine years hiding in China and managed to flee to Thailand in 2015. Four years ago, with assistance from the U.S. government, he came to America through the United Nations refugee program. When media reports on China's forced organ harvesting practices first emerged in 2006, Cheng realized that this was what had happened to him. It was only after arriving in the U.S. that transplant specialists confirmed through scans that part of his liver and left lung had been removed. Cheng said that he still cannot feel certain parts of his chest and struggles daily with severe pain throughout his body. In 2019 an independent tribunal in London ("The China Tribunal") ruled that the CCP has committed crimes against humanity through its continuous harvesting of organs from minority groups, including Falun Gong practitioners. Two years later, a United Nations human rights expert reported that, in addition to Falun Gong practitioners, other minorities, including Uyghurs, Tibetans, Muslims, and Christians detained in China, had also become targets of forced organ harvesting. In June of this year the U.S. House of Representatives passed the Falun Gong Protection Act, aimed at compelling the CCP to end its persecution of Falun Gong and the forced harvesting of organs from detained practitioners.

China tries 11 Mongol herders for defending traditional land

06 August 2024, UCA News

Police arrest a herder in Urad Front Banner in Mongolia. (Photo:<https://smhric.org>)

The families of nearly a dozen herders branded "criminals" and standing trial in Inner Mongolia have accused local Chinese authorities of aiding and abetting a mining company to illegally occupy their traditional grazing lands.

The trial which has dragged on for more than 90 days is expected to end next week.

In a statement, the families said they "have lived on the grasslands of Urad Front Banner and maintained a pastoralist way of life for generations," the Southern Mongolian Human Rights Information Center (SMHRIC) reported on Aug. 5

"Jiranhoyor [their head] has appealed to the relevant [authority] multiple times. The destruction of grassland has never been resolved. Now, these 11 herders have become 'criminals' overnight," the families added.

Jiranhoyor is the former head of the Taigiin-Enger Gachaa of Bayanhuaa Township who led the local herders to defend their legal rights, the families said. The Bayannuur League Public Security Bureau also reportedly arrested Sumyaa, Sumbur, Daichin, Munkhsumbur, Nars, Naranbat, Hurwaa, Wei Meili, Hong Wuyi, and Aldart for the first time in August 2020 and detained them multiple times since. The herders have been detained for periods ranging from 37 days to 18 months without “legal due process,” the SMHRIC said.

Photographs and videos posted on the SMHRIC website showed sick and elderly herders being taken into custody in wheelchairs and some being handcuffed and shackled to hospital beds.

The herders have been defending the alleged illegal occupation of their lands and environmental destruction by multiple Chinese mining companies, including Huo Tuo Mine, for more than a decade, the SMHRIC said.

In a statement issued in 2020, the Bayannuur security bureau called the herders “gangs” and alleged they were “long engaged in evil deeds and illegal activities, seriously sabotaging the local economy, disturbing public orders, and creating adverse social effects.” Urnaa, a daughter of Jiranhoyor, told SMHRIC that her father and the other herders were only protesting the mining companies for illegally occupying and destroying their grazing lands.

“As mining companies beating up and abusing local herders become commonplace, herders from our community often gathered together to block the mining trucks,” Urnaa said.

“These peaceful and legal activities are now labeled as ‘crimes,’” Urnaa lamented.

Urnaa pointed out that Jiranhoyor was diagnosed with bladder cancer before his arrest in 2020 and he had to undergo several surgeries and chemotherapy before he was arrested again for the second time in 2021.

Sumyaa, Urnaa’s mother, was detained for more than 17 months for signing the petition against the mining company.

Sumbur, a herder, who has been suffering from serious rheumatoid arthritis was handcuffed and shackled on a hospital bed during the detention, according to photos and video footage shared by Urnaa, SMHRIC said.

“Sumbur was not even able to walk and hold a teacup by himself. But he was taken away in a wheelchair by the police,” Urnaa alleged.

Naranbat, another local herder, was the longest-serving detainee at the Urad Front Banner Detention Center.

The center in a release notice said Naranbat was released on bail pending trial on Dec. 1, 2022, after serving an 18-month detention without trial, SMHRIC said.

Reportedly, the local public prosecution authorities have revised the indictment against the 11 herders four times in over four years due to insufficient evidence and legal basis.

The latest revision took place on July 25 during the most recent trial.

Meanwhile, Jiranhoyor’s family members alleged that the mining companies had bribed the local police and authorities.

SMHRIC pointed out that Chinese authorities have accelerated the resource extraction from Southern Mongolia which has prompted giants like Shenhua and Changqing to arrive in the country.

Allegedly, many have opened mines without the consent of locals sparking tensions in the region.

In 2011, a large-scale protest erupted after a Mongolian herder was brutally killed by a Chinese coal-hauling truck.

Thousands of herders were arrested and detained, and their leaders have been imprisoned, SMHRIC said.

Activist of Hunan bridge banner, White Paper Movement missing

06 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Fang Yirong, a Chinese protester known for his recent demonstration on a bridge in Hunan Province, China, is missing. On July 30, Fang unfurled a banner demanding “freedom, democracy, and elections” and condemning Chinese President Xi Jinping as a “dictator” and an “authoritarian traitor.”

A pre-recorded video, widely circulated on August 2 on X (formerly Twitter), showed Fang introducing himself as a “young participant in the White Paper Movement” but does not directly reference the Hunan banner protest. In the video, Fang states, “Last summer, I posted comments supporting democracy on Telegram and was targeted by the Chinese Communist Party’s National Security Department. Since then, the National Security Department has subjected me to brutal and inhumane mind control persecution. I am posting this video now to prove that I am no longer afraid of them. Tyranny is inevitably terrifying, but authority cannot crush the human spirit. Xi Jinping can continue to persecute us, but he cannot stop the ideas of democracy from taking root and sprouting in the hearts of the Chinese people again and again. The waters of the Yangtze River will not flow backward. I hope the Chinese people can soon be free from tyranny and lead better lives. After doing this, I might be officially declared mentally ill by the Chinese Communist Party. I might also die in prison, but I will not regret it.”

In another post on X, journalist and China expert Jennifer Zeng translated a letter by Fang Yirong, which was posted online. In the letter, Fang detailed the political persecution he faced from the Chinese Ministry of Public Security, describing “daily surveillance, intimidation, and harassment” by agents. He wrote, “I participated in poster-posting activities at the end of the White Paper Revolution out of my dissatisfaction with the dictatorial tyranny of the Chinese Communist Party. I have also spoken out against the dictatorship and feudal rule of Xi Winnie (Xi Winnie-the-Pooh) on the internet many times. Eventually, I was exposed for plotting rebellion within the CCP’s black police entrapment group, the ‘White Paper Matrix.’ Since July last year, I have been suppressed and persecuted by the vicious government.”

The banner unfurled by Fang Yirong on the Hunan bridge carried slogans strikingly similar to those displayed during the October 2022 Sitong Bridge protest in Beijing’s Haidian district by Peng Lifa, who was immediately detained. The slogans read, “No COVID test, we want to eat. No restrictions, we want freedom. No lies, we want dignity. No Cultural Revolution, we want reform. No leaders, we want votes. By not being slaves, we can be citizens.” Another banner urged residents to strike from school and work to “remove the dictator and national traitor Xi Jinping.” These acts of dissent are unusual in China, where free speech and criticism are heavily suppressed, and protests often provoke a strong response from authorities. Observers note that the emergence of such banners reflects growing discontent with the Chinese Communist Party’s stringent control over public expression, particularly following the implementation of the ‘Zero COVID’ policy. This policy has sparked sporadic demonstrations against Xi Jinping and the CPC’s governance.

Fate of Drepung monastery monk remains uncertain after 17 years of disappearance

04 August 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

Kunchok Nyima in an undated photo (Photo/RFA)

Kunchok Nyima, a monk from Drepung Monastery, has been missing for 17 years following his arrest by Chinese authorities on April 11, 2008, according to Radio Free Asia (RFA). His whereabouts currently remain unknown. He was detained for his alleged involvement in a peaceful protest by the monks of Drepung Monastery in 2008.

According to the report, the Lhasa Intermediate People’s Court sentenced Kunchok Nyima to 20 years in prison. Despite repeated inquiries from his family members and villagers, authorities have consistently refused to disclose any information regarding his whereabouts or condition, maintaining strict secrecy about his status.

A source within Tibet reported that over two years after Kunchok Nyima’s disappearance, he was sentenced to prison in June 2010. Despite efforts by his family and relatives in Dzoge County, who have connections with the authorities, to inquire about his status, they were eventually told that he had been transferred to Lhasa and was no longer under the jurisdiction of Dzoge County. The authorities expressed that they had no further options in the matter.

Kunchok Nyima originally hailed from Thebo in Amdo (Ch. Qinghai). He travelled to central Tibet for his studies and subsequently joined Drepung Gomang Monastery. There, he became a teacher and attracted numerous students from all three provinces of Tibet. On March 10, 2008, approximately 300-400 monks from Drepung Monastery held a peaceful protest on Barkhor Street to commemorate the 49th anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising against China’s illegal invasion of Tibet. Reports indicate that the monastery was subsequently surrounded by local military and police forces, and the monks were subjected to beatings and tear gas. Over 50 monks were arrested during the incident, according to reports.

Protest banner against Xi Jinping in China calls for freedom and democracy

01 August 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

A protest banner appeared on an overpass in Xinhua County, Hunan province, China on Tuesday calling for freedom and democracy. The banner hung over a bridge called for freedom and democracy, criticizing Chinese President Xi Jinping as a “dictator” and an “authoritarian.” The message, translated by British-Chinese journalist Cindi Yu, read: “freedom, democracy, elections, protest school, protest work, protest authoritarian traitor Xi Jinping”.

This act of dissent is unusual in China, where free speech and criticism are heavily suppressed. Protests are often met with a strong response from authorities. Observers say that the emergence of this banner reflects a growing discontent with the CPC’s strict control over public expression, particularly since the implementation of the ‘Zero Covid’ policy. This policy has led to sporadic demonstrations against Xi and the CPC’s governance.

In recent years, there have been several instances of public unrest in China. In October 2022, two banners appeared hung over a busy overpass in the capital Beijing. One reads: “Go on strike. Remove dictator and national traitor Xi Jinping.” The other read “Say no to covid test, yes to food. No to lockdown, yes to freedom...Don't be a slave, be a citizen."

In November 2022, large-scale riots erupted in Zhengzhou and Guangzhou, with protesters clashing with police and demanding changes to strict covid restrictions. In Zhengzhou, workers at Foxconn's iPhone plant protested company policies and Xi's regime, while residents of Guangzhou voiced their discontent with lockdown measures.

China's history of suppressing dissent includes events such as the 2008 Tibetan uprising and the 1989 Tiananmen square protests. The 2008 Tibetan uprising was marked by severe repression where hundreds of Tibetan monks gathered in Lhasa to protest and mark the 49th anniversary of a previous Tibetan uprising against Beijing's rule. The protesters sought the release of fellow Drepung monks, who were reportedly detained while attempting to celebrate the U.S. Congressional Gold Medal to the Dalai Lama. Rights groups reported more than 140 deaths, while Chinese authorities claimed the death toll was just 22. The crackdown on the Tiananmen Square protests in April-May 1989 remains infamous. Millions of people gathered in Beijing's Tiananmen Square, demanding greater freedoms. In response, the Communist Party of China (CPC) imposed martial law, deploying military forces on June 3-4 to end the movement. Estimates of the death toll vary widely, ranging from 200 to 10,000, with reports of severe violence against protesters.

July

Job losses, protests present difficulties for Chinese Communist Party

27 July 2024, VOA

Job losses and wage cuts from China's economic downturn are hitting key industries, according to the South China Morning Post, and analysts say the situation could lead to political difficulties for the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

Rights groups say the situation has triggered a sharp increase in protests and strikes around the country – not enough to threaten the rule of the CCP or President Xi Jinping, but enough that an analyst sees a "hidden danger" for Chinese authorities unless they can rejuvenate the economy.

Mr. Wang, in his early 40s, lives in Bao'an District, Shenzhen, in southern China. He was formerly employed at a well-known business travel platform but was laid off earlier this year. He prefers not to disclose his full name or the company's name due to the matter's sensitivity.

Wang tells VOA, "In the area of business travel software, our company is at the forefront of China in terms of R&D and sales, and it is also one of the top 500 private enterprises in China. But now many companies have run out of money, our sales have plummeted, and the layoffs finally fell on our group of old employees."

He compares China's economic slowdown to a high-speed train suddenly hitting the brakes, and everyone on the train hitting the ground, even those better-off, like himself.

China's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) growth rate has been dropping since hitting 10.6% in 2010, well before the COVID pandemic, which cut growth to 2.2% in 2020, according to the World Bank.

The global lender says growth bounced back to 8.4% in 2021 but then fell to 3% in 2022 before a moderate recovery to 5.2% in 2023. The World Bank expects China's growth rate to drop back below 5% this year.

Several Chinese workers VOA talked with said they were unprepared for the economy to slow so quickly. Two large IT companies laid off Mr. Liu in Guangzhou in the past two years, and his life has turned gloomy. He also prefers not to disclose his full name due to the matter's sensitivity. Still struggling to find a job, Liu has a second child, and his wife was diagnosed with early-stage breast cancer.

"When I was laid off for the first time, I got decent severance pay because I had worked there for a long time," says Liu. "Later, when I came to a large company, I was laid off again, and I felt that I was quite unlucky. Fortunately, we don't have too much debt."

According to South Morning China Post's (SCMP) July analysis of the annual reports of 23 top Chinese companies, 14 of them carried out large layoffs in 2023, with technology and real estate companies among the worst hit amid a glut of empty buildings.

The online newspaper reports that one company, Poly Real Estate, laid off 16.3% of its workforce in the past year, or 11,000 people; Greenland Holdings, a Shanghai-based real estate company, also saw a 14.5% drop in the number of its employees.

The SCMP reports online retail giant Alibaba cut 12.8% of its workforce, or about 20,000 jobs, in the 2023 fiscal year, while technology conglomerate Tencent's headcount fell 2.8% in 2023 to about 3,000, and in the first quarter of 2024, the company laid off another 630 people.

In addition, Chinese internet tech firms ByteDance, JD.com, Kuaishou, Didi Chuxing, Bilibili and Weibo have all conducted layoffs this year.

China's National Bureau of Statistics (NBS) is painting a rosier picture this month, calling employment and the national economy "generally stable" and citing "steady progress." In June, it showed only a 0.2% drop in urban jobs compared with the same period last year.

The NBS also claimed China's lowest youth unemployment rate this year, 13.2%, after it removed students from the calculation. The new methodology was introduced after China hit a record high 21.3% youth unemployment in June 2023, prompting authorities to suspend publication of the statistic.

Chen Yingxuan, a policy analyst at the Taiwan Institute of National Defense and Security Studies who specializes in Chinese unemployment, tells VOA that Beijing's job worries have shifted from fresh graduates and the working class to middle class and senior managers.

She says many have faced salary cuts or layoffs to reduce costs and increase efficiency as China struggles with a weak housing market, sluggish consumption, high government debt, foreign investment withdrawals, and trade barriers.

Even people with relatively stable incomes, such as workers at state-owned enterprises, are feeling the pinch.

Ms. Zhang, who works for a state-owned commercial bank in Guangzhou and prefers not to disclose her full name due to the matter's sensitivity, says many bank employees are seeing paychecks shrink.

"State owned banks such as China Construction Bank and Agricultural Bank of China, or joint-stock banks, are now cutting salaries, let alone urban commercial banks in many places," she tells VOA. "Salary cuts already started last year, and it seems to be worse this year."

She projects the cuts will be 20% to 30% by the end of the year.

In July, China's 31 provincial-level administrative regions issued regulations calling for party and government organs to "live a tight life," focusing on budget cuts and reductions in public spending.

Analysts say further job and wage cuts could lead to intensified protests and strikes, leading to greater instability.

Rights group China Labor Bulletin (CLB) in 2023 counted 1,794 strike incidents in China, more than double the number in 2022.

In the past six months alone, the group documented about 1,200 incidents in protest of the wage cuts, unpaid wages, unforeseen layoffs, and unfair compensation, a more than 50% increase from the same period in 2023.

CLB estimates "only 5% to 10% of all collective actions of workers have been recorded," suggesting many more protests are taking place.

But Chen of the Taiwan Institute of National Defense and Security Studies says the wage cuts and unemployment have not yet been severe enough to spark large-scale protests that threaten the power of the ruling party or President Xi.

"Although there has been an increase in protests, they are still relatively sporadic. There are no large-scale incidents, and local governments can easily quell them," she says. "So, for the legitimacy of the CCP and Xi's third term, it is more of a hidden danger than an imminent crisis."

While protests in China are usually by working class people, Wang notes the economic pain is spreading to other, more influential groups.

"Whether for blue-collar, white-collar, or even gold-collar workers, the economic losses are now very large," says Wang. "The worse the economy and the more emergencies there are, the more the CCP will suppress it with high pressure. It's a vicious circle, where people suffer more, and stability is more costly."

Meanwhile, analysts say Chinese authorities are struggling to come up with a plan to reverse the unemployment and wage cutting trend.

The communiqué of the Third Plenary Session of the 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, released on July 18, mentioned employment only once, saying "it is necessary to improve the income distribution system and the employment priority policy."

Rights group urges forced labour investigation, especially in mining industry, in Tibet

23 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China is using its so-called "rural surplus labour transfer" policy, sometimes carried out under a broader regime policy of "poverty alleviation through labour transfer", to potentially subject Tibetan farmers and herders to forced labour. And the risk of forced labour is rising in Tibet, specifically in its mining industry, as China's hunger for the territory's rich resources, especially those related to the renewable energy sector and the 'green energy transition', keeps growing, said a new report by New York-based Human Rights Foundation posted on its hrf.org website Jul 22. The report said available information taken from official sources and published reports warrant independent investigations of the true situation there.

China's claim is that by facilitating the transition of workers in subsistence industries, such as herding and farming, to sectors with more "profitable" jobs, such as mining, the regime can grow key industrial sectors while also providing jobs to workers who are at risk of being "left behind" in Tibet's economic growth. While this is ostensibly meant to promote societal progress, the industrialization of Tibetan lands and recruitment of local communities also disrupt traditional Tibetan livelihoods and raise questions about the extent to which Tibetans freely participate in the recruitment process, the report said.

It pointed out that this forced resettlement and sedentarization makes formerly self-sufficient farmers and nomads dependent on the regime's markets and social support programmes to survive, hindering their customary way of life.

Due to China's imposition of especially tight ban on access to Tibet, direct evidence, including testimonies, cannot be obtained. Nevertheless, certain parallels can be drawn between Tibet and the Uyghur Region in terms of policy terminology and implementation. The rural surplus labour transfer policies of Tibet contain the same key phrases (tifa) as those in the Uyghur Region, the report pointed out.

"Tifa" are CCP-approved terms that are euphemisms for specific and often sinister policies, and function like codewords. They refer to various, strictly-defined policies, and it is mandatory for regime officials to use tifa whenever discussing such policies and their implementation, to ensure total conformity in policy implementation. In both Tibet and the Uyghur Region, tifa for rural surplus labour transfer include language, such as "labour absorption", "surplus rural labour transfer", "labour export", "transfer employment", and other such phrases, the report noted.

Besides, both in Xinjiang and Tibet, employment is arranged by the state and local cadres go from door to door to recruit villagers, making the process strongly likely to be coercive in nature.

The report cited two case studies in Tibet.

Zijin Mining Group Ltd., a state-owned Chinese company that mines gold, lithium, and copper, own two mines in Tibet. It was previously linked to forced labour practices in Xinjiang. It owns and runs the Julong Copper Mine, and the Lakkor Tso lithium mine in Tibet. Julong is one of the largest copper mines owned by China and is expected to operate until 2067, the report noted.

The report said an Apr 2023 article published by state media described how Julong, along with another mining company (Tibet Huatailong) and the Chikang Village Party Committee, engaged in trainings and that "labourers were exported".

Besides, in 2018, Julong Mine exported 38 labourers, according to Menba Township's 2018 poverty alleviation objective. This document mentioned that such labour export was done with the support of Maizhokunggar (Tibetan: Maldrogungkar) County's government and the human resources and social security bureaus, the report said.

The second case study is on China Gold International Resources, a mining company based in Canada and owned by China. It is the parent company of Tibet Huatailong, which owns and operates Jiama mine, one of the biggest copper-gold polymetallic mines in Tibet. The parent company was stated to have cited in its 2018 Annual Report Tibet Huatailong's employment of 377 Tibetans as a case study of how the company "has absorbed and arranged" employment of local Tibetan farmers and herders – echoing the tifa associated with labour transfer programmes.

Indeed, Tibet Huatailong was stated to have engaged in this example of possible labour transfer in accordance with a government poverty alleviation scheme as outlined in the Lhasa City government's Thirteenth Five-Year Plan Characteristic Industry Development Plan (2017). In another instance, Tibet Huatailong was stated to have spoken of having "absorbed" 435 farmers and herdsmen by 2020 – the word "absorb" being a key indicator that this employment may have been implemented as part of a labour transfer programme.

A strong indication that forced labour is being implemented in Tibet could be seen from the fact that a Jan 2023 Chinese law applying to the entire Tibetan Autonomous Region states that if Tibetans refuse to accept state-arranged employment three times, the regime will reduce or suspend subsistence allowances on which many Tibetans have come to depend for survival. This financial penalty, though not directly mentioned in rural labour transfer policies, should be examined as an additional potential risk factor for state-imposed coercive labour conditions in Tibet, the report said.

Other mines based in Tibet should also be investigated, such as the Luobusa chromite mine. This mine's parent company, Tibet Mining, published a 2020 Social Responsibility Report which explicitly admits to concentrating "surplus labour" and engaging in the "relocation" of households in Qamdo in the context of governmental poverty alleviation laws. Tibet Mining's own parent company, Baowu, also describes Tibet Mining as engaging in labour transfer and has even been linked to forced labour in the Uyghur Region, the report noted.

US: China still arresting 'thousands' each year for practicing faith

26 June 2024, RFA, Alex Willemyns

Buddhists, Christians, Muslims and Falun Gong followers are targeted.

Chinese authorities continue to arrest "thousands" of people a year for practicing their faith in ways that undermine the primacy of the Chinese Communist Party, a new U.S. State Department report says.

Released by Secretary of State Antony Blinken on Wednesday, the 25th annual Report on International Religious Freedom says China's constitutional guarantees to religious freedom are obstructed by regulations that "require clergy to pledge allegiance to the CCP."

The report says Chinese authorities have recently begun a campaign to enforce those regulations, after a September 2023 "administrative measure" was issued that requires religious centers to fall into line.

Under the measure, all places of worship must "uphold the leadership of the CCP, implement 'Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics,' and promote the 'Sinicization' of religion," it says.

Those who do not comply are "tortured, physically abused, arrested, disappeared, detained, sentenced to prison, subjected to forced indoctrination in CCP ideology," the report adds, noting that charges or accusations against the faithful are often "vague or insubstantial."

A "lack of transparency" from Chinese authorities makes exact arrest and imprisonment numbers impossible to discern, it continues, but "estimates of those imprisoned during the year [2023] for their religious beliefs ranged from the low thousands to more than 10,000."

A little more than half of Chinese are atheist or religiously unaffiliated, the report says, while 18.2% of the population identify as Buddhist, 5.1% as Christian, 1.8% as Muslim and 21.9% follow folk religions.

Only five religions – Buddhism, Taoism, Islam, Protestantism, and Catholicism – are officially recognized in China and allowed to openly be practiced, which must be done under the banner of corresponding state-sanctioned groups closely monitored by the authorities.

Worldwide decline

Speaking at the launch of the report, Blinken noted a recent Pew survey that found worldwide religious freedom was at its lowest ebb since the polling company began tracking the issue in 2007.

He noted that the United States was not immune from the issue.

"Since Hamas's horrific terrorist attack on Israel on Oct. 7, and the subsequent conflict in Gaza, both anti-semitism and Islamophobia have increased significantly across the globe," Blinken said.

"Here in the United States, reports of hate crimes and other incidents targeting both Muslims and Jews have gone up dramatically."

But he said official repression of religion was different, and pointed China's ramping up of forced Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhists and the "genocide and crimes against humanity that China is committing against the predominantly Muslim Uyghurs in Xinjiang."

The campaign is part of a broader campaign to force non-Han Chinese to assimilate into what Beijing considers to be mainstream culture: Chinese authorities in the past year have, for instance, banned Tibetan students speaking their native language and prohibited them from taking private classes outside the state-run schooling system.

Rashad Hussein, the U.S. ambassador at large for international religious freedom, told the launch that the campaign against the Uyghurs "follows decades of persecution of religious communities, from Tibetan Buddhists, to Christians to Falun Gong practitioners." Hussein noted the crackdown against Falun Gong, which Beijing considers a cult and is now headquartered in rural New York, took place 25 years ago, with many adherents fleeing from China.

"We now even see [China] attempt to reach across its borders to target individuals and silence critics, such as the reports of Chinese authorities engaging in transnational repression against predominantly Muslim Uyghurs, Tibetans, Falun Gong and many more," he said.

He noted a similar phenomenon was taking place in Myanmar, where the military junta is increasingly targeting the Rohingya Muslim minority in the country's east as well as those practicing Christianity.

Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, called the accusations in the report inaccurate and accused the U.S. State Department of trying to interfere in domestic Chinese affairs.

"The Chinese government protects citizens' freedom of religious belief in accordance with the law. People of all ethnic groups in China are fully entitled to the freedom of religious belief as prescribed by law," he said, adding that China has "nearly 200 million religious believers."

"We urge relevant parties to stop using the so-called religious issues to meddle in China's internal affairs," he said.

After Escaping China by Sea, a Dissident Faces His Next Act

23 June 2024, The New York Times, John Yoon

The dissident's lone regret after his 200-mile escape across the Yellow Sea was not taking night vision goggles.

Nearing the end of his jet ski journey out of China last summer, Kwon Pyong peered through the darkness off the South Korean coast. As he approached the shore, sea gulls appeared to bob as if floating. He steered forward, then ran aground: The birds were sitting on mud.

"I had everything — sunscreen, backup batteries, a knife to cut buoy lines," he recalled in an interview. He was prepared to signal his location with a laser pen if he became stranded and to burn his notes with a lighter if he were captured. He also had a visa to enter South Korea, and had intended to arrive at a port of entry, he said, not strand himself on a mud flat.

It wasn't enough.

Mr. Kwon, 36 and an ethnic Korean, had mocked China's powerful leader and criticized how the ruling Communist Party was persecuting hundreds of pro-democracy activists at home and abroad. In response, he said, he faced an exit ban and years of detention, prison and surveillance.

But fleeing to South Korea did not offer the relief he expected. He was still hounded by the Chinese state, he said, and spent time in detention. Even after he was released, he was in legal limbo: neither wanted nor allowed to leave.

It would take 10 more months for Mr. Kwon to be permitted to leave South Korea. Days before he flew out on Sunday, he returned to the mud flat where he haplessly came ashore off Incheon last summer and recounted for the first time publicly the details of his meticulously planned journey.

Court documents from his criminal case in South Korea, past interviews with his friends and family and a statement from the Incheon Coast Guard last year corroborated many of the details in his account. On a Yamaha WaveRunner purchased with the equivalent of $25,000 in cash, withdrawn from several banks to avoid tipping off the police, Mr. Kwon set off on the morning of Aug. 16 from the foggy coast of the Shandong Peninsula.

He said he wore a black life jacket and motorcycle helmet for the journey, where he crashed into 10-foot waves and dodged floating rice wine bottles. As his skin burned from the summer sun, he fell into the sea twice, losing his sunglasses.

He refueled using the five barrels of gas that he had tied to the WaveRunner. For himself, he had five bottles of water and five ham and tuna sandwiches.

He navigated using a marine compass and a smartphone he had acquired from someone else.

His first glimpse of land came as the setting sun gave the islands off South Korea a warm glow. What was supposed to take eight hours turned to 14. By the time Mr. Kwon arrived in Incheon, the pink sky he had stopped to admire had faded to black.

He did not see any boats or ships on guard, he said, even as he entered a heavily militarized area that the navy monitors for activity, including defectors from North Korea.

Mr. Kwon — who speaks Chinese, English and some Korean — called the local police for help. For an hour, he waited while trying to fend off mosquitoes by walking around his watercraft in beige Crocs.

That night, he said, the Incheon Coast Guard and the South Korean Marine Corps rescued him, detained him and began investigating him along with the South Korean National Intelligence Service.

South Korea rarely accepts refugees, and the authorities served him a deportation order. But over the next months, he was also banned from leaving the country as he fought a criminal charge of unlawful entry, which can be punished with up to five years in prison.

He said that he wondered how things might have unfolded had his arrival gone as planned.

South Korean prosecutors did not lift the exit ban they imposed on Mr. Kwon until his criminal case was finished this month. He said he planned to apply for asylum in the United States or Canada. His flight on Sunday was bound for Newark.

"I want to live my own life," he said. "I want to live in peace for a while."

Mr. Kwon, whose Chinese name is Quan Ping, is from a city in the northeastern Chinese province of Jilin, near the border with North Korea. He has visited South Korea, his grandfather's birthplace, regularly since childhood. He spent his college years in the United States, where he went by Johnny, participated in Iowa State University's Army R.O.T.C. program and took flying lessons, he said.

He studied aerospace engineering at the university for a few years and returned in 2012 to China, where he ran an online clothing brand and traded cryptocurrencies. He continued traveling widely, touring Lebanon and Syria as an aspiring photojournalist, he said.

He first drew the ire of the Chinese authorities when he began criticizing the Communist Party online. In 2016, he posted on social media about antigovernment protests he had attended in Hong Kong, a Chinese territory. He wore a T-shirt calling China's leader, Xi Jinping, "Xitler."

Chinese authorities arrested Mr. Kwon that year and sentenced him in 2017 to 18 months in prison for "inciting subversion of state power," a charge frequently leveled against dissidents and human rights lawyers.

After his release in 2018, the police tapped his communications, tracked his movements and periodically interrogated him, he said. State agents, he added, were alarmed by his contact with the leaders of the 1989 Tiananmen Square uprising, including Wang Dan, once one of China's most wanted men.

"I couldn't live a normal life," he said.

China's Ministry of Public Security did not respond to a request for comment.

Mr. Kwon grew desperate to leave as the police investigated his family and friends. He said his plans to leave China by sea were inspired in part by the 1994 movie "The Shawshank Redemption" and by Lindsay Warner, an explorer who circumnavigated Australia on a Jet Ski. He decided South Korea was his only viable option.

He left behind his e-commerce and crypto operations, as well as his friends, family members and a girlfriend.

After the rescue from the mud flat, Mr. Kwon said, investigators seemed baffled by his story and interrogated him, threatened to torture him and denied his request for a lawyer. The Incheon Coast Guard, which led the investigation, said in a statement that "there were no human rights violations" during the investigation.

In court, Mr. Kwon argued that he was a political refugee and had intended to arrive legally at the Incheon Port, less than a mile from the mud flat, with a tourist visa. A judge found him guilty of unlawful entry in November, handing down a suspended one-year prison sentence with a two-year probationary period.

The verdict released Mr. Kwon from custody but not from legal limbo. Immigration officials imposed an exit ban as prosecutors appealed the judge's decision.

While living in his parents' house in Ansan, south of Seoul, Mr. Kwon went to the gym, read books about crypto trading and volunteered at an English language school for adults. He said he also befriended a group of Nigerian refugees by joining their soccer club.

But he didn't let his guard down. He stuck to the routines he had developed in China: constantly checking for security cameras, and using encrypted texting apps and signal-blocking Faraday bags.

Lee Dae-seon, a South Korean activist who has helped Mr. Kwon, said that he has warned Mr. Kwon of the dangers of China's overseas police effort, known as Operation Fox Hunt, in which Chinese dissidents living abroad have been forcibly repatriated.

South Korea's National Intelligence Service confirmed with Mr. Lee that he and Mr. Kwon were targets of the operation, Mr. Lee said. The N.I.S. did not respond to a request for comment.

"It is not safe for him to continue living in South Korea," Mr. Lee said.

In May, an appeals court dismissed prosecutors' appeal, as well as Mr. Kwon's lawyers' efforts to have his sentence reduced. Mr. Kwon decided not to pursue the case further so that he could leave the country quickly, and prosecutors lifted the travel ban, said Sejin Kim, his lawyer.

At the mud flat, Mr. Kwon said he was looking forward to leaving and starting a new business venture. He said some of his friends and relatives live in the United States and Canada. He is traveling to the United States on a visa for visitors.

"I want to start my second life," he said.

An immigration law specialist said that while a case for seeking asylum in the United States appeared to be strong, a decision could take years. Mr. Kwon would also have to demonstrate a "well-founded fear" of additional persecution should he be deported to China, said the specialist, Yael Schacher, of Refugees International, a nonprofit in Washington, D.C.

At Incheon Airport on Sunday, he said goodbye to his parents and friends in South Korea, where he would be barred from returning for five years because of his criminal record.

He disappeared into the security line, a ticket for seat 17A in hand, and with his Chinese passport and his South Korean deportation order in the black tactical backpack he had brought on his escape from China. He confirmed that he had boarded his plane by telephone.

"I'm happy, sad," he said minutes before his flight was set to take off. "And angry," he added, "that it took me so long to leave South Korea."

At shortly before 10 p.m., the flight status display showed that his plane had departed.

China's political refugees remain at risk long after leaving country

20 June 2024, RFA, Wang Yun

On World Refugee Day, asylum-seekers share their stories about being persecuted – and fear of being sent back.

Chinese nationals are seeking political asylum in ever larger numbers, but face transnational repression from China and lack of understanding from foreign authorities as they flee persecution, refugees and those who help them told RFA Mandarin in recent interviews.

A Chinese activist who supported an online free speech campaign that saw its leader arrested in Laos and is "terrified" of being sent back to China is now facing deportation from Denmark after her asylum application was rejected by authorities there.

Liu Dongling fled China in 2018 when her son was refused an education by authorities after she helped victims of forced evictions to apply for compensation through legal channels, she told RFA Mandarin in an interview recorded two days before World Refugee Day, June 20.

She said the authorities claimed they couldn't be sure from the evidence she submitted that she was at risk if she went back to China.

But Liu says she knows otherwise, citing repeated phone calls from a state prosecutor from her home city of Zhengzhou.

"I gradually realized that this Gaoxin District People's Procuratorate official called Li Hongbin had been put in charge of my case, relating to when I was helping others with their [forced eviction complaint] cases," Liu said. "I realized that the fact that he kept calling me put me in danger."

Who is a refugee?

The United Nations defines a refugee as someone who legitimately fears persecution due to their race, religion, nationality, belonging to a social group or having a certain political opinion, and is unwilling to return to the country for those reasons.

Yet foreign governments have been repeatedly criticized by rights activists for repatriating asylum-seekers who are then arrested and jailed on their return to China.

China also actively works to force its overseas dissidents to return home, sparking international concern over the Chinese Communist Party's "long-arm" law enforcement operations, which have included running secret police "service stations" in dozens of countries, according to the Spain-based rights group Safeguard Defenders.

Liu, who started writing for the overseas Chinese-language website Boxun after leaving China, also cites the forced repatriation of rights activists Dong Guangping and Jiang Yefei by authorities in Thailand around the time she left China.

"I was told by a colleague at Boxun ... that a lot of Boxun journalists had been detained in China, and that some had even been detained in Thailand," Liu said. "So I got more and more terrified."

Captured in Laos

Liu had also been a vocal supporter via X of an anti-censorship movement started by Lao-based activist Qiao Xinxin, who was later detained and forcibly repatriated.

Qiao, whose birth name is Yang Zewei, went missing, believed detained on or around May 31, 2023 in Vientiane, after launching an online campaign to end internet censorship in China, known as the BanGFW Movement, a reference to the Great Firewall, according to fellow activists.

His family were later informed that he is being held in a juvenile detention center in Hunan's Hengyang city in another example of China's cross-border law enforcement activities

Qiao had lived in Laos for several years before launching the BanGFW Movement, yet was believed to have been detained by Chinese police in Vientiane.

Radio Free Asia contacted the Danish Refugee Council by email about Liu's case, but had received no reply by June 19. Danish Repatriation Council official Tina Fjorside confirmed on Tuesday that Liu had now entered a process that will result in her forced repatriation.

Immigration jails are 'hell on earth'

Thailand-based political dissident Li Nanfei told RFA Mandarin that he's now basically stuck in the country, playing an ongoing game of cat-and-mouse with Thai immigration authorities, and trying to stay out of their detention centers.

"Immigration detention centers are like hell on earth," Li said. "Human rights violations are very common, inmates are packed in very densely, and there is frequent violence."

Li spent his savings on bailing himself out of his last spell in detention, where he ran into plenty of other refugees on the run from China.

"The immigration prisons would hold onto them for a long time," he said. "Some people were held there for more than 10 years. Some even died in there."

Figures released by the United Nations' refugee agency UNHCR in June 2022 showed that while around 12,000 Chinese nationals sought asylum overseas in 2012, the year that Xi took office as Communist Party general secretary, that number had risen to nearly 120,000 by 2021.

The U.S. remains the most popular destination, accepting 88,722 applicants from mainland China last year. Australia took 15,774 asylum-seekers in the same year, figures showed.

New York-based current affairs commentator Ma Ju, who runs a refugee relief station offering two weeks of free food and accommodation to Chinese asylum-seekers in the city, said the refugees just keep on coming, despite the hazards of overland travel to the border with Mexico, known in Chinese as "walking the line."

"A very high proportion, about 80%, are here because of political, religious or ethnic [persecution]," Ma said. "A lot of ethnic minorities like Uyghurs, Kazakhs, Hui Muslims, Mongolians and Tibetans are there because of their religion or ethnic identity."

The vast majority can't live a life of any dignity back home in China, Ma said.

"They were in pain and misery every day – there's nothing there for them, no dignity," he said, adding that only a small minority of refugees are basically there for what he termed "economic reasons."

In San Francisco, artist and rights activist Xiang Li has formed a group to help refugee women through art. Most of them are Chinese women.

"Some have psychological trauma and need treatment," Xiang said. "We haven't gotten to the point of offering counseling yet, but there is a kind of mutual support we can offer, which is sometimes even more effective."

Chengdu Early Rain Church Member Detained for Commemorating Tiananmen

06 June 2024, Qi Junzao

Fu Lijun cautiously posted only music and a prayer on June 4. It was enough to go to jail.

While around the world on June 4 many commemorate the anniversary of the bloody June Fourth Incident, i.e., the mass killing of students in Tiananmen Square, Beijing, of June 4, 1989, any remembrance of the event is strictly forbidden in China. Search engines have been manipulated to disable searches for "June Fourth Incident" or "June 4 Tiananmen Square." Actually, those who commemorate in any way the June 4 Incident may go to jail.

That this is not only a theoretical risk was confirmed by what happened on June 4 this year to Fu Lijun, a member of Chengdu Early Rain Covenant Church, whose Pastor Wang Yi (not a relative of the chief of Chinese Foreign Affairs with the same name) was sentenced to nine years in jail in 2019. Officially, the Early Rain Church has been liquidated, but in fact members continue to meet in private homes, under continuous police harassment.

In the early morning of June 4, Fu Lijun posted on WeChat Moments music intended to commemorate the June Fourth Incident and a prayer. There was no criticism of the CCP.

However, this was enough to mobilize the police, which acted immediately. At 7 a.m. on June 4, agents of Chengdu National Security Bureau knocked at Fu's door, and he was taken away.

He was informed that he will be administratively detained for five days, until June 10. This may seem a lesser penalty, although nobody should spend time in jail for posting music and prayers on social media. However, those who have been placed once in administrative detention in China may expect continuous surveillance for years, police harassment, and serious problems in the workplace.

May

Chinese lawyers decry official supervisory interferences during court trials

19 May 2024, Tibetan Review

While it is an all too well-known fact that the very idea of an independent judiciary is anathema to the Communist Party of China-state's approach to delivering justice, many lawyers in the country were still shocked to see a judge of a county court in Qinghai province receiving real-time instructions from his supervisors in the middle of a trial earlier this month, according to the scmp.com May 19.

About an hour into the trial on May 11 at the Tianjun (Tibetan: Themchen) county court in Haixi (Tsonub) Mongol and Tibetan autonomous prefecture, the presiding judge suddenly adjourned the proceedings, the report said, citing a public letter published on the microblogging site Weibo by a group of lawyers who were defending clients in the case.

"Afterwards, we accidentally found the criminal court judge of the Haixi intermediate court and the director of the Tianjun county court were remotely giving instructions in a WeChat group," the letter was quoted as saying, referring to a messaging and the social media platform.

One of the lawyers involved in the trial, Liu Zheng of the Beijing Zebo Law Firm, took a photo of the judge's computer screen, which displayed a WeChat group that included several judicial officers and staff of local courts, the report said, citing the liberal-leaning newspaper Southern Weekly.

The photo was stated to show the county court director Fan Xuhua saying in the group chat: "You don't have to communicate with him about it."

Following it, Hasi Chaolu, president of the criminal court at Haixi intermediate court – the court that will hear the case if it is appealed – was stated to have directed the county court judge to "just interrupt" and "be tough, don't speak randomly".

The public letter was stated to have condemned these actions of the judicial and court staff, saying, "Their actions blatantly sabotage our legal system where the appeal court's decision is the final one, and those involved should be probed for malpractice or even criminal activity."

The Qinghai provincial prosecutor's office and the Qinghai Higher People's Court have said they will investigate after the lawyers reported the incident to them.

On the other hand, the Haixi intermediate court has issued a notice on Weibo, saying the lawyer had disobeyed court discipline in taking the photo.

It was also reported to have said the case belonged to one of four categories that could seek “key supervision”, and that Haixi had followed protocols in its instructions to a lower court. It has only admitted that the manner of instruction was irregular. Still, many lawyers around the country have spoken up to say they disagreed with the Haixi court after the incident went viral online.

Wang Cailiang, a Beijing-based criminal lawyer, has written on Weibo, “The superiors’ instruction sabotaged the court’s right to independently exercise judicial power,” saying, “if a court and its superior could collude in a lawsuit ... then why do we need evidence? Why do we need the law?”

He has said that when the higher court’s supervision weakened, cases are wrongly decided and not corrected on appeal. Others have said the Haixi court had abused the idea of “key supervision”.

Are regards the four types of cases in which could require “key supervision”, a document issued by the Supreme People’s Court in 2021 was stated to have listed them as: complex and sensitive cases, cases that might affect social stability, those that might have a conflicting judgment with a similar case, and if the judge was reported to have engaged in illegal conduct during the trial.

When a case is classified as one of these four types, the presiding judge may supervise certain aspects that need attention during a trial, such as demanding a report on case progress, evaluating the results, reviewing case files or sitting in on a trial, the report said.

However, “if the judges directly gave instructions or interfered with the case, then they are not following protocol,” Lao Dongyan, a prominent China policy critic and law professor with Tsinghua University, has said during a live-streamed discussion on Weibo earlier this month with the Hongfan Institute of Legal and Economic Studies, a private liberal think tank.

Well-known lawyer Xu Xin has written on WeChat that such incidents were quite common, and that he had experienced or heard of at least four. These included one in Zhangzhou Intermediate People’s Court in Fujian province ten years ago and one in Zoucheng, Shandong province, in 2022.

Ms. Rei Xia’s Speech at the 16th Annual Geneva Summit for Human Rights and Democracy

18 May 2024, Yibao

Editor’s Note: Ms. Xia is a Chinese dissenter and a former political prisoner. As a brave young human rights activist, she was detained and tortured by CCP solely for her outspokenness during the White Paper Movement in 2022 and her white paper Halloween costume in 2023. Citizen Power Initiatives for China is proud to arrange for Ms. Xia to deliver her powerful speech at the 16th Annual Geneva Summit for Human Rights and Democracy on May 16, 2024.

Here is her speech script:

Imagine one day you wake up to realize that you’ve turned into a caterpillar, with your short limbs barely touching the ground, your eyes blindfolded, and your tongue cut off. You’re trapped inside an empty cement room and can’t feel anything except cold air flowing over your skin. A giant incandescent lamp hangs over your head; so bright that you can see a red halo when you close your eyes. You can hear people talking around you and water flowing through the ground. You know this is only an illusion created by your devastated brain. But you are grateful to hear anything – even if it’s not real.

That was my life inside a Chinese detention center after the ‘white paper protest’ in 2022. They threw me in solitary confinement twice, for a total of 65 days. When they finally released me, I was in a state of schizophrenia, with slurred speech.

Now, I tell my story as a queer feminist activist in China and survivor of extreme police brutality by the CCP regime.

When the COVID-19 pandemic broke out in 2020, I was living in Scotland, pursuing an undergraduate degree. I moved back to Shanghai to wait out the pandemic and dove into feminist and LGBTQ activism. Almost immediately, I could tell that Chinese authorities saw us as a threat to their pro-masculine ideology. Police would shut down anything with even a hint of feminism or queerness.

But it wasn’t until 2022 that I had my first direct encounter with the state apparatus. It started with the Xuzhou Chained Woman Incident. You almost certainly remember the video if you saw it online. It showed a woman imprisoned inside a dirty cellar, chained to the wall by her neck. Her so-called husband in the video had raped her repeatedly and forced her to give birth to nine children over 20 years. The video went viral online.

Initially, local officials denied her being a victim of human trafficking, saying that her marriage was legal. Without proper investigative reporters, we the grassroots feminists had to find our way to uncover the truth. It turned out that she had been kidnapped and sold since 1996. We were not at all surprised, as we knew that her experience was just a tiny window into the pervasive and systematic human trafficking of women in China.

But the secret police wanted to stop us. They forcibly disappeared visitors to her village. They found me & my friends and threatened us to stay away. Also, they took down everything we posted online. As a result, we had to be creative in bypassing the censorship machine. We repost other people’s posts before they were deleted. We’d blur and distort text into photos, and translate them into minor languages so AI couldn't read them.

As marginalized groups, we had always practiced to make our voices heard. We had to act in a way that is completely decentralized, both spontaneous and loosely connected at the same time. That's why feminists and queer activists could play a major role in the white paper protest, as characterized by its lack of leading role and highly spontaneous.

Throughout the year, the sense of anger and powerlessness didn't go away. In April, the government mandated COVID lockdowns in Shanghai. Many people were forcibly taken away for isolation, and many others died at home from starvation and suicide.

In November, a building fire killed 10 Uyghur people in Urumchi. And this wouldn't have happened without China's strict zero-COVID policy. It turned out to be the last straw.

In major cities across China, people gathered on the street to commemorate the deceased Uyghurs. We brought candles and flowers. We held up blank paper to symbolize the power of silence and mock the censorship. No words were written on the paper, but all the accusations are in our hearts. They destroyed our language long ago, and self-censorship is embedded in the way that we speak. But, here at the protest, we felt each other's physical presence for the first time.

When I was on the street with other protesters, I lost control of myself and cried so hard. The last time China saw widespread protests was still in 1989.

We were lost and disorganized, like newborn babies experiencing fresh air outside the womb. But I could feel the fearlessness among us, and our oppressed emotions finding their way out onto the street. Here in Shanghai, for the first time, we shouted out Voldemort's name: 'Down with Xi Jinping, Down with CCP.'

The police showed up in full force, blocking the roads, randomly beating up people, and arresting them away. I was also arrested and thrown onto their bus. I saw people screaming in panic attacks, their faces covered in bruises and dripping with blood from open wounds. We were forced to hand over our phones and passwords. Anyone refusing to do so was beaten into submission.

At the police station, they took our fingerprints, scanned our irises, and stripped us naked for examination.

After my release, I learned from my friend that she was beaten severely at the police station. Along with her, there was a girl beaten to concussion, another being kicked hard in the stomach. I did not think much and decided to post this on Twitter. It was a moment when keeping silent meant abandoning one's conscience. One day later, police knocked on my door and took me away in front of my mom.

I was charged with "Picking Quarrels and Provoking Troubles," a common crime used against political activists. They sent me to the detention center and threw me into solitary confinement for 37 days. I couldn't shower, read, write, or speak to anyone. They took away my glasses so I could barely see my surroundings. During the day, I sat cross-legged on a wooden board. Every minute felt like an hour. On the sleepless nights, with the incandescent lamp on, every single minute felt like a year. There were four surveillance cameras in my cell, two in the front, and two at the back, just above the squat pit I used as a toilet. But losing my basic privacy couldn't even compare to the torture I endured just waiting for time to pass. I experienced auditory hallucinations. I lost my sense of time, and I could barely see the line between life and death.

This is the price for speaking out in China. It's not strange to see China ranks second to last on the World Press Freedom Index, because any journalist with dignity ends up living in jail.

After my release, I had 1 year of border control. Police harassed me constantly. They evicted me from my apartment and forced me to a mental hospital for psychiatric evaluation. I couldn't tell my friends what happened to me because I knew the CCP retaliation would fall on them as well.

At the summit, Xia once again raised the symbol of the White Paper Movement—a blank sheet of paper—to protest the tyranny of the CCP regime

Throughout the year, I felt like I was suffocating in a bigger cell. That's why I took to the streets again during Halloween, my clothes covered in layers of white paper. It was my way of commemorating the white paper protest and mourning our loss during the three-year lockdowns that the regime now refused us to discuss.

(Xia's white paper costume in the Halloween parade on the streets of Shanghai in November 2023, one year after the White Paper Movement, led to her second detention by the CCP's secret police)

This time, I was arrested by Guobao, or the secret police, and the rule of law does not restrict them at all. They forbid me from having a lawyer and threatened my mom as well. They beat me, molested me, and tied me to a wooden sleeping board for three days. They also threatened to rape me, shave my head, and detain me for months longer. They forced me to record a staged confession which I refused. 28 days later, I was released and forbidden to enter Shanghai again.

It is still traumatizing to speak about my experience, diving back into the enduring pain inside the single cell. But I've never regretted going onto the street, nor do I regret speaking up against police violence. My courage doesn't come from within myself. It comes from my fellow Chinese human rights defenders, feminists, queer activists, and countless ordinary people that stood together on the streets during the white paper protest.

China's crackdown continues today. Feminist and queer activities have almost entirely disappeared from the public eye. Journalists & lawyers waste away in jail. Their ethnic cleansing of Uyghurs and Tibetans continues.

And Uyghur participants of the White Paper protest are still in jail, including Kamile Wayit and Yashar Shohret. Director Chen Pinlin still waits for his sentence after producing a documentary on the white paper protest.

They hope us to forget. They hope us to turn a blind eye to what is happening in our own land. Above all, they hope us to live in fear. But our voices will not be silenced. And our own existence will never be censored

China Tries to Erase the History—of 2022

May 15, 2024, Bitter Winter, Hu Zimo

Keeping filmmaker Chen Pinlin in jail is part of a massive effort to cancel all traces of the victorious fight of students and citizens that compelled the CCP to abandon the "Zero COVID" policy.

The protests in Shanghai after the Urumqi fire, November 2022. From Chen Pinlin's documentary.

There are many ways in which the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) tries to erase history. What may seem futile to the non-Chinese readers of "Bitter Winter" may actually work in China. All traces and references to the Tiananmen Square June Fourth Incident of 1989 are carefully cancelled. The event does not exist in textbooks about China's history and even Internet searches about the incident are blocked. Of course, the CCP cannot prevent the world outside China to remember and celebrate June Fourth. But its efforts are not entirely fruitless as many Chinese born in the 21st century have never heard of the event.

The CCP is now engaged in an even more ambitious endeavor. It tries to cancel all traces of something that did not happen 35 years ago—not to mention older crimes and massacres of Chairman Mao's times—but in 2022. The massive effort is worth following, as it confirms that what some called the White Paper Revolution of 2022 is a subject of both embarrassment and great concern for the CCP.

It all started on November 24, 2002, and it started in Urumqi, Xinjiang, with a tragedy that in a few hours gave the lie to both the rosy propaganda about happy Uyghurs singing and dancing their gratitude to the CCP and the black propaganda depicting Uyghurs as terrorists. China woke up on November 25 with a feeling that Uyghurs were simply fellow suffering human beings.

What had happened in the night between November 24 and 25 was a fire that had erupted in an 18-storey building inhabited by Uyghur families in Xinjiang's capital, Urumqi. Some trapped inside the building were able to post terrifying images on social media. As Uyghurs commentators writing in "Bitter Winter" noted on the first anniversary of the tragedy,

"The screams of mothers and children coming out of the fire spread through the buildings to Urumqi and reached the world via the internet; but no one could help them. Because this was the period when the region was under lockdown with China's plan to reduce the COVID to zero, and therefore the doors of buildings and houses were locked from the outside. Moreover, since the parents and husbands of some of those who burned in the fire were in prisons and camps, women and children in the buildings did not have the physical strength to break down the doors."

This was the proverbial drop that broke the camel's back. Students first in the main cities of China, many other citizens later, not only took to the street to protest on behalf of the suffering Uyghurs. They had enough of the idiotic and ineffective "Zero COVID" policy, that had condemned them to the worst lockdown in the world without stopping the pandemic and causing many local tragedies that did not reach the mediatic impact of the Urumqi fire.

