Chinese started gathering spontaneously in streets named after Urumqi in Shanghai, Beijing, and many other cities, lighting candles, praying, sometimes (but not often and not always) even shouting anti-CCP slogans. When the police arrived and told them that holding signs was a crime, they started holding pieces of white paper, showing to the world that claiming their freedom of expression and writing anything on them was something the CCP would not tolerate. Some tried to persuade the police officers to join their fight. CCP officials came and told the crowd that they were manipulated by "foreign forces." They were ridiculed, with the students telling them that the only "foreign forces" they had been exposed to in school were Marx and Engels.

As the days passed, Xi Jinping realized that the protest would not go away. He had two alternatives, replicating the June Fourth incident of 1989 and killing thousands in multiple cities, or abandoning the Zero COVID policy. We will never know, at least will not know for many years, what deliberations within the CCP led Xi to choose the second alternative, just as we will not know for long how many really died in the Urumqi fire.

What we know is that by December 2022, Zero COVID was gone, and on January 8, 2023, Xi proclaimed that COVID-19 was no longer, and he had defeated it. The attempt to transform a defeat into a victory did not fool many. Not surprisingly, the sudden re-opening after the harsh lockdown caused an outbreak of the virus and, again, casualties whose numbers we may never know. Certainly, crematoriums were unusually busy for months.

More dangerous than the COVID deaths for the CCP was the fact that, unlike in 1989, a popular protest had succeeded, and the government had to renounce a policy it had just declared beneficial, successful, and irrevocable. Perhaps, if one protest succeeded, other protests may succeed too. In fact, after 2022, public protests on a variety of subjects are becoming more common in China. Each time they are called unprecedented and surprising, but soon they will become routine.

What happened in 2022 was important, and Xi and the CCP may have seen the writing on the wall. They decided the wall should be cleaned immediately. With patience, the authorities are scouting all possible Internet repositories of stories and images of what happened in 2022 and erasing them. The emblematic story of this campaign concerns filmmaker Chen Pinlin, who goes under the nickname Plato and posted on YouTube (which is blocked in China) a documentary on the protests in Shanghai. He called the documentary "Not the Foreign Force." He was arrested in January 2023, charged in February with "picking quarrels and provoking trouble" (a serious crime in China), and kept in jail.

Protesters continued to demand the end of the "Zero COVID" policy. From Chen Pinlin's documentary movie.

Is the CCP afraid of the 2022 movement? The answer is yes. Did 2022 change China forever? We don't know yet. While some anti-regime slogans were heard, they did not dominate the protests. Subsequent popular demonstrations all focused on limited, often local grievances. Even 2002 did not aim at overcoming the CCP regime. Its aim was to eliminate the Zero COVID policy. We should not read too much in the new spring of popular protests in China. But we should not ignore them either. Perhaps one day some event or movement will arise, able to coordinate the local protests into a national claim that oppression should cease.

A growing number of Chinese Indonesians are winning political offices

May 14 2024, VOA News, Devianti Faridz

This October, 45-year-old Kevin Wu will serve in the Jakarta House of Regional Representatives for the first time, becoming part of a minority of ethnic Chinese elected officials in the Indonesian legislative body. Wu has been a staunch advocate for Chinese-Indonesian rights since 2008 and helped to establish a Buddhist house of worship in the predominantly Muslim country. Now, he is an entrepreneur who advocates for small businesses.

"If we witness injustice, we have two choices – to accept our fate or to strive and hope for change. I chose to do the latter," he said.

Wu said he was inspired to fight for Chinese-Indonesian rights by late President Abdurrahman Wahid, who was known for his support for ethnic and religious tolerance.

x In February, nearly 205 million Indonesians were eligible to cast their votes in the country's presidential and parliamentary elections. According to the last census in 2010, 1.2% of Indonesia's total population is of Chinese ethnicity, at over 2.8 million people.

Johanes Herlijanto, chairman of the Indonesian Sinology Forum, a group that seeks to promote Indonesia-China relations, said that in this election he saw more names of Chinese-Indonesian politicians vying for the 500 seats in the national Parliament as well as in the District Representative Council, Provincial Council and Local Council than there were during the parliamentary elections in 2019.

Herlijanto said that political activism among the Chinese-Indonesian community strengthened in the last 26 years, since the Jakarta riots in May 1998 that saw many Chinese Indonesians being persecuted. He said he has seen more Chinese Indonesians serving in public offices ranging from regent, mayoral and legislative.

Herlijanto explained that there have been organizations that provided political education to Chinese Indonesians since the late 1990s.

"This allowed Chinese Indonesians who previously were uncomfortable, to be involved in politics, to now being elected and actively improving public welfare as politicians," he said.

For decades, under President Suharto, many Chinese Indonesians faced discrimination, persecution and social restrictions, such as being banned from using their Chinese names, practicing their traditional beliefs, showcasing Chinese culture and having their full citizenship recognized.

It was only after former President Wahid came into power in October 1999 that government discrimination against Chinese Indonesians was abolished with the issuance of Presidential Decree No. 6, which protected minority rights. Wahid – commonly known as "Gus Dur" – was the former head of Indonesia's largest Islamic organization, Nahdlatul Ulama, and had Chinese, Arab and Javanese ancestry.

Wu joined the Indonesian Solidarity Party, or PSI, in 2024, founded by a Chinese Indonesian TV news anchor-turned-politician, and said he was attracted to the party's dynamic "start-up"-like work environment and idealistic approach to politics. Wu is also a member of the Young Entrepreneurs Association and the Indonesian Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

"I am keen to support industries that open up more job opportunities, offer quality human resources development programs and ease the application process for business permits and industries," he told VOA.

Daniel Johan, 52, a Buddhist, has been a legislator for the past decade and will serve his third five-year term for the Indonesian Renaissance Party, PKB, in October 2024. He said Gus Dur, and another PKB leader, Muhaimin Iskandar, both inspired him.

Johan is active in the Chinese Clans Association of Indonesia and shared with VOA that it took months of working in the community for his constituents, who are mostly Muslims in West Kalimantan, to trust and vote for a Chinese Indonesian politician.

"This term, I will be working on issues regarding food security, food independence and how to improve the management of natural resources and better monitor the implementation of the Mineral and Coal Production Law," he said.

Although political activism and involvement is on the rise in the Chinese Indonesian community, politicians and leaders of Chinese associations in Indonesia are still aware that stereotypes remain, especially in rural areas.

Herlijanto said that the campaign teams for all three presidential candidates in the recent elections had Chinese Indonesian supporters, "so taking on divisive identity politics is not a prudent political strategy."

However, the tides could turn against ethnic and religious minorities if divisive identity politics were to be used again in future elections. Herlijanto noted the case of former Jakarta Governor Basuki Tjahaja Purnama, a Chinese-Christian governor known as "Ahok," who was sentenced to two years in prison in 2017 under Indonesia's blasphemy law, based on claims he insulted the Quran during his campaign for reelection. Ahok denied wrongdoing.

"Although radicalism based on religious beliefs, or a narrowed interpretation of nationalism, has faded in recent years, its re-emergence is possible and is an issue Chinese Indonesians are cautious about. That's why it's important for Chinese Indonesians to be inclusive, strive for equality and welfare and show that we stand for all Indonesians," said Herlijanto.

I Wayan Suparmin, head of the Indonesian Chinese Association in Jakarta, said Chinese Indonesians must strive to be more inclusive in their surroundings and better understand that in a community everyone's lives are truly intertwined. A notion that Johan agrees with, "Moving forward, Chinese-Indonesian politicians need to be more sincere, humble and avoid being deceitful or scandalous. The majority of people can sense politicians' sincerity and intentions."

Children not spared in China's persecution of human rights defenders' families

23 April 2024, Tibetan Review

The practice of collective punishment dates from the days of Mao Zedong's dictatorship and it continues to this day in a China which claims to practice what is sought to be called a globally superior "whole process people's democracy". Whatever this Communist Party of China's "theoretical breakthrough" jargon means, there is very little to praise it when it punishes severely even children of those who have dared to be critical of the governing dispensation.

Releasing its annual report on the situation of human rights defenders in China in 2023 on Apr 15, If I Disobey, My Family Will Suffer: Collective punishment of human rights defenders' families in China, the US-based Chinese Human Rights Defenders (CHRD) has highlighted Chinese authorities' punitive measures against human rights defenders' families, including even newborns.

"Chinese authorities are punishing their families, including young children to penalize human rights defenders, rights lawyers, themselves. Even the Chinese law provides no legal basis for this perverse practice, which is forbidden in international law," CHRD Director Renee Xia has said.

"The most heart-breaking part in really inflicting so much pain is the harm done to children. Children growing up from a young age watching their parents being mistreated and persecuted leaves a long-term psychological trauma."

The report is based on testimony from a dozen people affected by collective punishment last year, and redacted certain identifying details to protect them from official reprisals.

"While this report focuses on 2023, Chinese authorities have used these tactics for decades, inflicting tremendous harm with impunity," it said.

"Seeking redress often triggers more police harassment, brutality, and baseless legal prosecutions," it added.

It said authorities threatened and harmed the children of rights advocates, including by imposing foreign exit bans, forcing them to drop out of school and detaining them in psychiatric wards and orphanages.

"The Chinese Communist Party's collective punishment of human rights defenders' families is an informal or hidden policy carried out by government authorities," the report cited one activist as saying.

In one severe case, He Fangmei – an imprisoned campaigner for vaccine safety and for victims of defective vaccines – had her young children placed in a psychiatric hospital following her and her husband's detentions.

After He gave birth, her newborn child was also placed in the institution, the report said.

Likewise, the family of human rights lawyer Wang Quanzhang was subjected to intense harassment, and his young son denied education through official pressure on schools. The boy's mother Li Wenzu – also an activist – has said that last month he was once again forced out of a school he had been attending for just 10 days after police showed up there.

The report also shed some light on the fate of Peng Lifa, an activist who disappeared after he placed banners denouncing President Xi Jinping and the country's Covid policies.

"To prevent his family from speaking out, Chinese police have... put members of his family and relatives under surveillance, and cut off all contact with each other and the outside world," the report said.

CHRD is a network of Chinese and international activists promoting human rights and empowering rights defenders in China.

China reveals it executed scientist for spying in 2016 in documentary about 'shocking' cases

- Programme on state television discloses new details and punishments from espionage cases as part of a campaign marking National Security Education Day

- State security ministry releases details of researcher Huang Yu, who was executed for selling 'core secrets' to an unnamed foreign intelligence agency

Authorities in Beijing have revealed that a Chinese scientist who was convicted in 2015 of selling state secrets to foreign spy agencies was executed in 2016, one of several "shocking" spy cases.

The death sentence and execution were disclosed in a new documentary produced by the Ministry of State Security, China's top counter-espionage agency, which profiled 10 prominent spy cases from the past.

The documentary – Led by Innovation, National Security Sharpens the Sword – which was aired on Sunday by state broadcaster CCTV and has been posted to the ministry's social media page, is part of a campaign to mark the annual National Security Education Day.

The event, which is promoted by various local governments, including Hong Kong and Macau, is also intended to remind the public to remain vigilant about national security threats and report suspicious acts.

According to the documentary, Huang Yu, then a researcher at a top secret communication system development project, sent a note to "the website of a certain country's spy agency" containing classified Chinese military codes.

Huang was bitter after being removed from a unit that was working on the project due to poor work performance and had indicated he wanted to defect, the report said.

After the authenticity of the codes had been confirmed, Huang was recruited by the unnamed foreign spy agency and given training in Hong Kong and Bangkok. The documentary said he not only sold "core secrets" through his work, but also duped his wife – an employee at the same institution – into copying confidential material so he could pass it on in return for additional payments.

Huang was said to have leaked "a shocking amount" of confidential information about the communication systems used by the Communist Party, government agencies, the military and industries such as finance and telecoms. These included design, technical specifications, secret algorithms, source codes and programmes, the documentary said.

Huang was handed the maximum penalty for spying that caused "serious harm" to China's national security and was executed in May 2016.

The documentary also revealed new details about a former researcher from Taiwan who had been stealing secrets from mainland China while based in the Czech Republic.

Cheng Yu-chin, who was sentenced in 2022 to seven years in prison for espionage, "long had Taiwan independence ideas" and had been recruited by Taiwan's intelligence agency while studying for his PhD in Prague, the programme said.

Cheng had been paid NT$2.76 million (US$85,467) by the Taiwanese government to steal intelligence-related research reports and identify potential infiltration targets during multiple visits to the mainland, according to the documentary.

Cheng had previously worked as an assistant to Cho Jung-tai, the former secretary general of the Taiwan cabinet, who has been selected to be the island's next premier.

The documentary also profiled the case of Lee Henely Hu Xiang, a businessman from Belize who was sentenced in 2021 to 11 years in prison for helping to fund the Hong Kong protests, as well as the cases of the "two Michaels" – Canadians Michael Spavor and Michael Kovrig – who were detained in China in 2018, in apparent retaliation for the arrest in Vancouver of Meng Wanzhou.

Meng, the former chief financial officer of Chinese telecoms equipment giant Huawei Technologies had been detained in Canada on a US warrant, which the documentary said showed how China had fought the West's long-arm jurisdiction and efforts to undermine the country's political stability.

Quoting media reports that Spavor reached a C$7 million (US$5 million) settlement with the Canadian government in March this year, the documentary said Canada's "slander" in labelling their cases as "arbitrary detentions" had been "self-defeating".

The documentary concluded with what Chinese regulators have called a "rectification" of Shanghai-based consultancy firm Capvision Partners. The due-diligence company had been raided by authorities last year over national security risks in areas such as defence, technology, energy and resources, and medicine.

China said some of Capvision's clients had close relationships with foreign governments and military intelligence agencies.

"After foreign countries mastered this important and sensitive information, they implemented precise sanctions on a series of Chinese companies, causing significant harm to our country's industrial development and economic security," the programme said.

Chen Yixin, the state security minister, reiterated the ministry's priorities in an article published on Monday in the Communist Party's top theoretical journal Qiushi.

He said China's national security agencies will focus on major and outstanding risks, including "anti-subversion, anti-hegemony, anti-separatism, anti-terrorism, and anti-espionage struggles".

Also on Monday, a commentary in the Communist Party mouthpiece People's Daily said China has made breakthroughs in safeguarding national security in the past decade, making it a leading country "with the best sense of security".

"We have withstood and fought back against extreme external suppression and containment, and on a series of major issues involving Hong Kong, Taiwan, Xinjiang, Tibet, maritime affairs, and human rights, we have fought hard and won one tough battle after another," it said.

Covering China brings surveillance, harassment, report finds

11 April 2024, NewsGram

Reporting conditions in China have improved since the global pandemic but foreign journalists still face obstacles including visa problems, surveillance and harassment, according to a new survey.

Covering China brings surveillance:- Reporting conditions in China have improved since the global pandemic but foreign journalists still face obstacles including visa problems, surveillance and harassment, according to a new survey.

The annual survey by the Foreign Correspondents' Club of China, or FCCC, found that 81% of respondents said reporting conditions have "somewhat" improved, but nearly all the journalists said the reporting environment does not meet international standards.

Key issues remain, including difficulty in obtaining long-term visas, which leaves foreign news bureaus understaffed; reporters being obstructed by police or other officials while on assignment, and harassment when reporting in Xinjiang and border regions.

The FCCC each year surveys more than 155 correspondents from Asia, Europe, Latin America and North America. Its latest report is based on 101 responses to that survey which looks at working conditions for foreign media.

A spokesperson for China's embassy told VOA via email that the FCCC members "account for less than half of the foreign journalists in China, which means it cannot represent all of them," and that China has made efforts to support foreign media.

Referring to the FCCC as an "illegal organization, never recognized by China," the email added that Beijing is "against using the freedom of the press as an excuse to smear China with false information."

In response to concerns over visas, the spokesperson said, "In 2021, China and the US reached some common grounds. China has implemented what's been agreed, while the US has not fully delivered."

Accessing visas is one of the main difficulties cited in the survey. About one-third of respondents said their bureaus remain understaffed because of difficulty in extending or successfully applying for new visas.

Chinese authorities have mostly issued short-term visas. In 2023, only one U.S. outlet was able to get accreditation, the FCCC found. And Canadian media have had no resident reporter in China for four years.

Respondents said that as pandemic restrictions eased, they have returned to an uncertainty over what stories will result in surveillance or trips being cut short.

Four out of five of those surveyed said they experienced interference and harassment, and more than half reported being blocked from reporting or filming by police or other officials.

Nearly all those who reported from Xinjiang or Tibet said they experienced increased harassment. But journalists who reported or tried to travel to other border regions in the country also reported harassment.

After Xinjiang, the area with the most reported obstacles was the border with Russia, with 79% of journalists trying to report from there experiencing difficulties.

One journalist at a European outlet, whom the FCCC does not name, described being followed by several vehicles during a reporting trip to a town along the Russian border.

"They did not interfere during any of our interviews, although they did reach out to at least one interviewee afterwards. When we checked into our hotel, the hotel staff referred to us as 'the journalists state security had warned them about' earlier," the reporter said.

Similar experiences were reported by journalists who traveled to Inner Mongolia. The FCCC detailed three cases of plainclothes individuals warning people to not speak with journalists or of following news crews. The FCCC in its report notes, "Foreign journalists are, according to China's own regulations, free to report on a wide range of topics and speak to whomever they want."

The survey showed an increase in journalists being "invited for tea" – a tactic where Chinese officials invite foreign media to an informal meeting. During the meetings, journalists are asked about their coverage and while the FCCC says the exchanges are usually "cordial," it notes they can be used as a form of intimidation.

Surveillance is another concern, with respondents seeing more sources declining interviews or requesting anonymity.

Nearly all those surveyed said they believe they are targeted with digital surveillance through communication apps or that their homes or offices are bugged. Four of those surveyed said that officials referenced information that could have been known only if the authorities had access to private accounts or devices.

The FCCC says the restrictions and harassment prevents media from reporting a more balanced and nuanced picture of life in China.

"The result is coverage of China that cannot fully capture its massively complex dynamics," the FCCC said in its report. "Correspondents, restricted in where they can travel and with whom they can speak, no longer have the luxury of delving deeply into topics and painting a nuanced picture of the country. The result is coverage of China that is narrower in scope and less representative."

China has a poor press freedom record, ranking 179 out of 180 countries, where 1 shows the best environment, on the Press Freedom Index.

Media watchdog Reporters Without Borders, which compiles the index, said China is conducting a "campaign of repression against journalism and the right to information worldwide." VOA/SP

China Accused of Buying Off Strategic Island Nation With Bottled Water

03 April 2024, NewsWeek

Maldives President Mohamed Muizzu speaks at the United Nations climate summit in Dubai on December 1, 2023. China has been accused of buying off the Maldives with a million bottles of water, causing a fresh controversy over the strategic island nation. KARIM SAHIB/AFP VIA GETTY

China has been accused of buying off the the strategic Indian Ocean island nation of the Maldives with a million bottles of water from melting Tibetan glaciers.

"The Chinese Xizang [Chinese name for Tibet] Autonomous Region has extended a generous donation of 1500 [tonnes] drinking water to the Maldives, aimed at alleviating water shortages on the islands," Public Service Media, the state broadcaster of the Maldives, reported on March 27.

However, some social media users alleged that China's donation was for the personal use of Maldivian President Mohamed Muizzu.

"It wasn't announced officially because Muizzu wanted to use this at Muleeaage [the official residence of the Maldives president]," one user from the Maldives said on X, formerly Twitter.

"We are not aware of the specifics you mentioned, and please refer to competent authorities for your specific question," the Chinese Embassy in Washington, D.C., told Newsweek in a reply by email. The Maldives' foreign ministry didn't reply to Newsweek's request for comment by publication time.

Muizzu, who came to power last year, has increasingly adopted a pro-China position while relegating the Maldives' traditional ties with India. The U.S. has taken note of Beijing's growing influence in the Maldives, a strategic island nation that sits on the critical waterways connecting the Indian Ocean to the Middle East and Africa. The Maldives' foreign ministry has denied the allegations, saying that the drinking water was a donation by Yan Jinhai, the chairman of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, rather than a gift to Muizzu, AFP reported on March 29. Yan, a senior Chinese politician in charge of Tibet, visited the Maldivian capital, Malé, in November 2023 to boost ties between China and the Maldives, the Maldivian President's Office said last year. "Produced within the pristine mountains of the Xizang Autonomous Region, the bottled water donation signifies a gesture of solidarity and support from China to the Maldives during times of need," Public Service Media, Maldives' state broadcaster reported on March 27.

The U.S. opened its first embassy in the Maldives in 2023 to boost its presence in the Indian Ocean region, while recognizing the importance of Maldives.

"The United States is committed to strengthening cooperation with the Maldives, a key partner in ensuring a free, open, secure, and prosperous Indo-Pacific region," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for South and Central Asia, Donald Lu, told the Press Trust of India in February.

The Maldives faces a shortage of fresh water while also living with the threat of rising sea levels caused by global warming.

"The only available natural water resources are rain and groundwater, both of which are highly vulnerable to climate change," Abdulla Naseer, the Maldives' former Minister of State for Environment, Climate Change and Technology, told the United Nations in March 2023.

China donated five seawater desalination systems to the Maldives to help with the drinking water shortage, Chinese state media outlet China Daily reported on March 17

China court jails 'tortured' rights activist Xu Qin for four years

Authorities in the eastern Chinese province of Jiangsu have handed a four-year jail term to veteran rights activist Xu Qin, after repeatedly delaying her trial and sentencing despite concerns over her deteriorating health, and amid reports of torture from a prominent rights group.

The Yangzhou Intermediate People's Court sentenced Xu, a key figure in the Wuhan-based China Rights Observer group founded by jailed veteran dissident Qin Yongmin, to four years' imprisonment on March 29 for "incitement to subvert state power," a charge frequently used to target peaceful critics of the ruling Chinese Communist Party, the Civil Rights and Livelihood Watch rights website reported.

It quoted Xu as telling the sentencing hearing: "I'd like to thank everyone for their care and support, and also thank my husband for his help and support. Regardless of whether it's futile or not, I must appeal. This is my right." An award-winning activist in a number of high-profile human rights cases, including that of detained human rights lawyer Yu Wensheng, Xu was detained under "residential surveillance at a designated location" in 2021, a form of incommunicado detention rights groups say puts detainees at greater risk of torture and mistreatment. Her family told RFA in earlier interviews that Xu is a stroke and heart attack survivor who suffers from high blood pressure, among other ailments.

But according to the Civil Rights and Livelihood Watch rights website, many of Xu's health problems were caused by her torture and mistreatment in detention. "During her detention and interrogation, Xu Qin was brutally tortured to extract a confession, and was held in solitary confinement for a long period of time," the website said in a report about her sentencing published on Sunday. "Xu already suffered from multiple health problems including stroke, heart attack and hypertension, and as a result [of the torture], she was left paralyzed and unable to stand," it said.

Since she was locked up in the detention center, Xu has started using a wheelchair, according to her lawyer.

Xu told the court on Friday that she would appeal the sentence, which came after more than two years in pretrial detention at the Yangmiao Detention Center in Yangzhou city, where she held intermittent hunger strikes in protest at a loss of communications privileges as well as a months-long ban on meetings with her lawyer, Civil Rights and Livelihood Watch said. Repeated calls to Xu's lawyer rang unanswered during office hours on Monday.

Trial was delayed

Xu's trial was delayed several times following her initial detention in May 2021, with the authorities citing only "unavoidable circumstances."

But her family says it was delayed due to her refusal to provide the state security police with a "confession."

The trial was eventually held on Nov. 7, 2022, but the verdict and sentencing were also repeatedly delayed until now.

New York-based rights lawyer Chen Chuangchuang, who also heads the U.S. branch of the banned China Democracy Party, said Chen has always been an extremely tenacious activist.

"The trial was held a long time ago, but the verdict and sentencing were delayed multiple times, which is a deliberate form of torture used by the Chinese Communist Party," Chen told RFA on Monday.

Chen said that one of the purposes of the authorities' repeated delay in pronouncing the sentence was to get Xu Qin to plead guilty, and that she had been especially targeted due to her association with Qin Yongmin.

According to the Weiwanwang rights website, the charges against Xu listed her participation in Qin's China Rights Observer and its sister organization Rose China as evidence against her.

Qin was sentenced in July 2018 to 13 years' imprisonment for "incitement to subvert state power," the latest in a string of long sentences for his peaceful dissent and attempts to build the banned China Democracy Party.

A contemporary of exiled dissident Wei Jingsheng, Qin was sentenced to eight years in prison for "counterrevolutionary propaganda and subversion" in the wake of China's Democracy Wall movement in 1981.

He served a further two years' "re-education through labor" in 1993 after he penned a controversial document titled the "Peace Charter."

Qin then served a 12-year jail term for subversion after he helped found the China Democracy Party in 1998 in spite of a ban on opposition political parties. Xu was honored with the Lin Zhao Freedom Award for her human rights advocacy in 2022, and the Oscar China Freedom Human Rights Award last month.

March

CPC leadership reviews disciplinary inspection report

31 March 2024, ECNS

The Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee met on March 21/22 to review a comprehensive report on the second round of disciplinary inspection missions of the 20th CPC Central Committee. Xi Jinping, general secretary of the CPC Central Committee, presided over the meeting.

It was noted at the meeting that the CPC Central Committee with Comrade Xi Jinping at its core has attached importance to disciplinary inspection work, and has arranged two rounds of such inspection missions since the 20th CPC National Congress, which had covered all centrally-administered enterprises. It was pointed out at the meeting that Party-building work in centrally-administered enterprises and relevant government departments had been strengthened, with new achievements in terms of the Party's full and rigorous self-governance. But there are still some problems that must be taken very seriously from a political standpoint and addressed earnestly.

Inspections and rectifications followed must be taken as the pivot for promoting high-quality development and exercising full and rigorous Party self-governance. Organization and leadership must be strengthened to see that key parties assume their primary responsibilities, and problems, tasks, and responsibilities must be put on a list, so as to ensure that every problem has a solution and feedback. Oversight over inspections and rectifications must be strengthened, key officials and events be placed under tight scrutiny to make sure that every case is addressed as required. An accountability system must be established for rectifications to ensure that those who are perfunctory or cheat in the rectifications will be strictly held to account.

It was emphasized at the meeting that state-owned enterprises (SOE) are the crucial material and political foundation for socialism with Chinese characteristics. It is imperative to uphold and consolidate Party's leadership, and thoroughly study and put into practice Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era. SOEs must perform their duties and fulfill their missions in a down-to-earth manner, and must uphold General Secretary Xi Jinping's core position on the CPC Central Committee and in the Party as a whole, and uphold the Central Committee's authority and centralized, unified leadership. They must ensure both development and security, be vigilant against potential dangers, be prepared to deal with worst-case scenarios, resolutely prevent and mitigate risks and ensure high-quality development with high-level safety.

It is imperative to make advances in exercising full and rigorous Party self-governance, with rigor being maintained for the work in every aspect. Oversight of "top leaders" and leaderships must be strengthened, and crackdown on corruption must continue to be carried out with a high hand. Cases must be studied and used for promoting rectification of conduct and Party governance so that the soil and conditions that breed corruption will be eliminated.

It is imperative to conscientiously implement the Party's organizational line for the new era and strengthen the building of leaderships, ranks of officials, talent pool as well as grassroots Party organizations. What has been achieved from disciplinary inspections must be put to good use. It is also essential to conduct in-depth research on common and deep-seated problems discovered in disciplinary inspections, further improve the related systems and mechanisms, and tackle not only symptoms but also root causes.

China spy agency fingers consultancies as espionage threat

31 March 2024, VOA News

China's Ministry of State Security issued a fresh warning this week about overseas spy agencies and what it says are their efforts in recent years to obtain state secrets under the guise of consulting agencies.

The six-minute video released Thursday on the ministry's official WeChat social media account reenacts what it says was a real case where overseas spy agencies instructed a consulting firm to steal classified information from a Chinese company seeking to invest abroad.

The release of the video comes as Chinese leader Xi Jinping met this week with American CEOs in a bid reassure them that China remains open for business, despite concerns about its economy and worrying signals from the authoritarian government.

Over the past year, foreign investment in China has shrunk as supply chains shift to other countries while Chinese authorities have rolled out a new anti-espionage law and used exit bans to keep business executives and others from leaving the country. It has also carried out raids on consulting and due diligence firms.

During the same period, the Ministry of State Security has ramped up its use of social media to raise the alarm about foreign spies.

Its latest video – the fourth since it launched its social media account last year – has the feel of a spy thriller with dramatic music and fast-paced video elements and graphics.

It tells the story of an executive at a Chinese company who is pressed by a consulting firm representative on a string of questions, including the company's total profit, the technical parameters of its products, and how its products are used by the Air Force.

In a WeChat post released with the video, the ministry warned about the national security risks that consultancy agencies pose.

"The seemingly normal investigation conducted by consulting firms are in fact attempts to illegally acquire our commercial secrets and efforts to suppress our advantageous industries," the ministry wrote, adding that these consulting firms are accomplices to foreign spy agencies aiming to infiltrate key sectors in China.

Intimidation campaign against Chinese citizens

Some experts say the video is tailored to the Chinese audience rather than foreign investors since the video is purely in Mandarin and features the arrest of a Chinese national working for a foreign consulting firm.

The purpose of the video is "to inform and intimidate Chinese citizens by telling them that the government is watching them," said Dennis Wilder, a former U.S. national security official. He added that the campaign will likely create a chilling effect among Chinese citizens, especially those working for foreign companies.

Over the last year, Chinese authorities have raided several American companies' offices in China and detained some of their Chinese employees. Companies affected include due diligence firm Mintz Group, business consulting firm Capvision, and management consultancy Bain & Company.

Chilling effect for new foreign businesses

While the campaign focuses on Chinese citizens, Wilder said Beijing's efforts to safeguard national security will also create a chilling effect for foreign businesses trying to enter the Chinese market.

Unlike big foreign companies with an established presence in China, such as Apple or Qualcomm, he said companies that have no presence in China need to conduct due diligence. "They have to understand what their counterparts in China are all about, but if they can't conduct due diligence, they won't invest in China," he told VOA in a video interview.

A survey conducted by foreign business groups in 2023 suggests foreign companies are increasingly pulling investments and operations out of China. Survey data show that only 45% of American companies view China as their primary or among their top three investment destinations while 66% of the companies surveyed by the European Union Chamber of Commerce in China said they found operating in China has become increasingly difficult. Despite foreign companies' lack of confidence in the Chinese market, some analysts say the Chinese government thinks efforts to safeguard national security and enhance foreign investors' confidence in the Chinese market are not mutually contradictory.

"Beijing believes that while they try to attract more foreign businesses to invest in China, they also should ensure key national interests, such as core data or key infrastructure won't be easily obtained by foreign businesses," said Hung Chin-fu, a political scientist at National Cheng Kung University in Taiwan.

He said Beijing's approach will be met with deep suspicion among foreign businesses. "At a time when the Chinese government has laid out many red lines in the name of national security, investing in China will be like walking on thin ice for foreign companies," he told VOA by phone.

As foreign businesses will likely remain hesitant to increase their investment volumes in China, Wilder thinks Chinese leaders may have different views on whether to prioritize efforts to attract more foreign investment or the need to safeguard national security. "For Xi Jinping, I think if he has to choose between foreign investment and economic growth and what he perceives as national security, he will always come out on the national security side," he told VOA. But for other Communist Party leaders who must consider economic growth, such as Chinese Premier Li Qiang, Wilder thinks their consideration will be different from Xi's.

U-M study reveals how China's local bureaucrats struggle for power through negative media coverage

19 March 2024, Michigan News

Recent research on China's factional competition uncovers how local bureaucrats, who are connected to influential national leaders, strategically use the media to criticize members of rival factions, harming their promotion prospects and weakening their factions.

Led by Ji Yeon (Jean) Hong, associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan, the research analyzed millions of media reports in Chinese national and regional newspapers spanning from 2000-2014, along with information on the political networks of elite Chinese bureaucrats. It mapped out patterns of behavior among local bureaucrats in leveraging negative media coverage to attack political rivals.

Given the limited freedom of local media on criticizing local governments, provincial leaders linked to strong national leaders, such as Politburo Standing Committee members, encouraged local media to cover negative political incidents such as corruption investigation in other provinces.

More importantly, when reporting on others, provincial leaders are more likely to target provinces connected to weaker national political leaders. The bigger the power gap between the national leaders, the more frequent the negative reporting is.

"This suggests that factional competition encourages strong factions to attack weaker factions more frequently than the reverse," Hong said. "This often leads to power consolidation, strengthening strong factions and weakening weaker factions."

The research further explores the consequences of such negative news coverage on the promotion prospects of provincial leaders. It finds that these negative reports indeed harm the reported-on cadres and their factions.

Specifically, news reports on corruption substantially reduce the promotion chances of the reported-on province's party secretary, the top local political leader, who is likely to hold political responsibility and suffer a substantial disadvantage if more corrupt cadres are caught within his or her region. While leaders of provinces where the media reports on other provinces' corruption cases enjoy a higher probability of promotion.

Even though the Chinese personnel system, including promotion, demotion and allocation of party cadres, is not transparent, one of the factors that the Communist Party formally emphasizes in cadre evaluation is public perception. Without an electoral mechanism, it is not straightforward to elicit the public's evaluation of a cadre or its governance, but the media strongly affect public opinion in China. In such circumstances, the media role is critical.

The research covers the period ranging from the end of the Jiang Zemin administration to the beginning of Xi Jinping's regime. The Hu Jintao and Wen Jiabao administrations, which constitute the bulk of the period under analysis, are not typically framed as a period in which one faction or one top leader dominated others. Furthermore, during this period intellectuals within the party actively debated the possibility of intraparty democracy.

"This implies that the recent personalization of power in China's central politics might not be a unique feature of the current leadership, but an outcome of latent behavioral patterns in China's elite politics," Hong said.

Detailed measures stipulate place name translation from foreign language must not compromise China's territorial claims, sovereign rights

16 March 2024, Global Times

China's Ministry of Civil Affairs on Friday published implementation measures addressing the management of geographical names, which detailed the requirements for translation of place names in ethnic minority or foreign languages into Chinese characters.

Set to take effect from May 1, 2024, the implementation measures stipulated in Article 13 that "place name in foreign language that may harm China's territorial claims and sovereignty rights shall not be directly quoted or translated without authorization."

Translation of place names in foreign languages or minority languages should comply with standards formulated by related organs of the State Council. The standard translations are made public through notices, the national database for geographical names and official publications on geographical names, according to the implementation measures.

The measures released on Friday also clarified that names of a person, company or trademark should not be used as geographical names and specified the general rules and procedures of naming or renaming localities.

The State Council issued a revised regulation on place names in April 2022, which is applicable to naming, renaming, usage, cultural protection and other management on geographical names within Chinese territories.

Analysts noted the newly released implementation measures are made in accordance with the revision. Zhi Zhenfeng, a research fellow with the Institute of Law at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, told the Global Times on Saturday that geographical names are not only directly related to administration and everyday life, but also carry legal and sovereign implications.

Standardization of name translation helps confirm the scope of a geographical name refers to and all administrative rights and public geographical services (mapping and navigating, weather forecast, etc) are based on that, Zhi explained.

As China still has disputes over some territories with certain neighboring countries, the use of geographical names of places in disputes directly relates to sovereign rights. Using the incorrect translation or non-standard translation could cause confusion and encroach China's territorial integrity, Zhi stressed.

Analysts mentioned the example of maritime disputes in the South China Sea with countries like the Philippines. When referring to islands and reefs concerned, the use of standard translation is a firm declaration of sovereignty and transliteration of foreign names means concession of legal rights.

The Ministry of Civil Affairs standardized the names of 11 places in Zangnan (the southern part of Southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region) in Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin in April 2023.

Experts told the Global Times that the move is meaningful in safeguarding national sovereignty, maintaining peace in border regions and managing border-related matters at a legal level. Using standard place names helps raise awareness of Chinese territory.

The April 2023 issuance was the third list of standardized geographical names in Zangnan published by the ministry. The first list of the standardized names of six places in Zangnan was released in 2017, while the second list of 15 places was issued in 2021.

What to expect at China's 'Two Sessions' amid sagging economy, party drama

03 March 2024, Aljazeera

China's "Two Sessions" kick off in Beijing on Monday with the meeting of the National People's Congress (NPC) and the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC).

The event brings together China's political elite, as well as leaders in business, tech, media, and the arts. Known as lianghui in Chinese, the concurrent meetings are an annual fixture of China's legislative agenda and run for approximately two weeks.

During the period, legislators will approve new laws, political appointments, and government work reports detailing the progress of various departments such as the Ministry of Finance and the National Development and Reform Commission.

What are the major developments to watch?

During last year's Two Sessions, delegates officially approved Xi Jinping for an unprecedented third term as president.

This year, the event is likely to be dominated by China's lagging economy, which is grappling with slowing growth, deflation, massive debt and falling exports.

One of the most important events to watch will be Premier Li Qiang's delivery of the annual work report, which will review the government's accomplishments and set goals for 2024.

Li is expected to set an economic growth target of about 5 percent for 2024 and discuss headline issues from China's falling birth rate to the future of tech and artificial intelligence (AI) regulation.

A number of key appointments could also be made.

Over the past year, 11 members of the NPC's Standing Committee – the legislature's 175-member permanent body – have been removed, including Minister of Foreign Affairs Qin Gang and Minister of Defence Li Shangfu.

Those who were removed had ties to the military, including the People's Liberation Army (PLA) Rocket Force, which oversees China's nuclear and conventional ballistic missiles.

What is the difference between the two sessions?

The NPC and the CPPCC are both Chinese state institutions that are technically separate from the Communist Party of China (CCP), but much of their work is dictated by it.

On paper, the NPC is officially China's highest legislative body with nearly 3,000 members representing the country's provinces, autonomous regions, big cities, the PLA and the People's Armed Police. The NPC also has delegates representing self-governing Taiwan, which is claimed by the CCP even though Beijing has never exercised control over the island.

During the NPC, delegates review progress on policy goals and vote to approve new legislation and senior political appointments, although most delegates in reality have little political power.

The NPC Standing Committee is widely viewed as more powerful than the legislature in practice, despite being technically subordinate, as it meets regularly between legislative sessions.

"The NPC is not a parliament in the sense of a democratic parliament where the representatives are elected through fair elections. Its deputies are elected by a small portion of the Chinese population under the guidance of the Communist Party," Adam Ni, co-editor of the China Neican newsletter, told Al Jazeera.

"That is to say, the deputies of the NPC are at least acceptable to the party."

The CPPCC, which meets at the same time and brings together 2,000 plus delegates from across China and the diaspora, is a political advisory body that functions as more of a public relations exercise.

Delegates are not necessarily members of the CCP, although the meeting is part of its "United Front" efforts to align different actors on common causes and spread China's influence.

CPPCC delegates include leaders in tech, the arts, media, and leaders from semi-autonomous Hong Kong and Macau.

"The CPPCC performs several functions, including facilitating elite networking and directing policy advice from outside the party to the party-state. It operates as a means of trade, where the Communist Party provides access to the system and recognition through granting membership, while the elites sitting on the body gain access to policymakers and receive recognition," Ni said.

Is the NPC just a 'rubber stamp' parliament?

The NPC is often referred to as a "rubber stamp" parliament or legislature, as its main function is to formally approve premade decisions and it features little, if any, overt debate.

China watchers say that the NPC is still important to watch.

It can incorporate limited popular input on issues that are not considered too sensitive and, on rare occasions, has featured displays of dissent.

Most famously, one-third of delegates in 1992 voted against or abstained from approving the Three Gorges Dam, a controversial project to dam the Yangtze River.

"People refer to the NPC as a 'rubber stamp' because it has never voted down any bill, work report, budget, or nomination presented to it. But that unduly narrow focus on the NPC's vote outcomes alone, in my view, ignores the important role played by the thousands of NPC delegates in representing citizen interests on a range of politically non-sensitive issues," Changhao Wei, a fellow at Yale Law School's Paul Tsai China Center, told Al Jazeera.

While you will not hear delegates debating on the floor, individual delegates and bodies such as the NPC Standing Committee can shape legislation as it is being drafted and provide input on issues like the national budget.

Delegates can also submit individual bills calling on the NPC to act on important issues of the day.

In 2022, delegates submitted multiple bills focusing on women's rights and domestic violence in response to public outrage over the case of a trafficked woman with mental health issues who was found chained up by her husband.

While these bills were not debated publicly, they would not have gone unnoticed within the government either, Wei said.

Ni said although the CPP maintains an ironclad grip on power, the party is not a monolith, "but contains a multitude of interest groups and networks".

"There are also non-party groups and personnel involved in the lawmaking process," Ni said.

"We shouldn't discount their agency, eg, advocates of women's rights, environmentalists, because they can have an impact. But the influence and power of non-party individuals and groups are constrained by the political structure, where the party monopolises the instruments of state power."

China's premier won't meet the press after 'two sessions' for first time in 3 decades

04 March 2024, South China Morning Post

For the first time in three decades, the Chinese premier will not host a press conference at the end of the annual parliamentary sessions, which began in Beijing on Monday.

It will also be scrapped for future years of the current National People's Congress' term barring exceptional circumstances, said Lou Qinjian, spokesman for the NPC, China's top legislative body. The press conference – first held in 1988 and established as a customary practice in 1993 – is one of the most anticipated events of the annual "two sessions", when the top political advisory body and legislature meet.

It is one of the rare occasions when a top Chinese leader takes questions from local and international media. Those questions are often tightly scripted and chosen in advance, but it offers the outside world a chance to hear directly from a high-ranking official on policy directions.

In particular, it has been seen as a platform for China to indicate its diplomatic priorities, not only in terms of the questions selected but also which country's media they come from.

It also makes the premier a more familiar face globally than other Chinese leaders – including the president and Communist Party secretary – who seldom talk directly to outside media.

But Lou said that after a review, the leadership had decided to scrap the press conference since it often overlapped with similar events during the two sessions.

Premier Li Qiang will deliver the government work report to the NPC on Tuesday morning, followed by two written reports from the National Development and Reform Commission and the Ministry of Finance outlining plans and the budget.

"It should be said that society's major concerns have been specifically addressed in the [government] reports," Lou said on Monday. "They will be publicised so that the media and the public can learn about their content easily."

There will be at least three press conferences during the two sessions, including one given by Foreign Minister Wang Yi.

Observers said that while the change might come as a surprise, it was in line with China's political development.

"The party's leadership has been firmly established over the past decade. The State Council's role is now mainly about implementing the party's decisions," according to veteran China watcher Wang Xiangwei, a former editor-in-chief of the South China Morning Post.

"The role and status of the premier, who heads the State Council, is therefore adjusted accordingly."

He said that was already reflected in arrangements for state leaders meeting the chief executives of Hong Kong and Macau on duty visits.

Previously the chief executives held separate meetings with the president and the premier. But last year they reported only to the president, with the premier sitting in on the meeting.

"It is also a reflection of Li Qiang's pragmatism. He focuses on major policy directions, which are all clearly spelled out in his work report," Wang said. "He doesn't think an additional press conference is necessary as the ministers are in a better position to elaborate on detailed policies, and they will all have press conferences."

But he said the Chinese leadership could bring back the practice in future if it was deemed necessary.

Another observer, who spoke on condition of anonymity, agreed it reflected the change in power dynamics in China.

"The premier's job is now mainly to do with the economy and social affairs. However, the questions asked at the presser are usually about foreign affairs and China's grand strategy," the observer said.

"It would be strange for Li to answer those questions as foreign affairs are increasingly centralised in the hands of the party chief, President Xi Jinping."

While the foreign minister nominally reports to the premier, Wang stepped into the role from a higher rank after Qin Gang was sacked from the job without explanation in July. Wang reports directly to Xi.

The observer said Li could also have decided not to hold the press conference as a way to show loyalty to Xi, so that more focus is on the president.

But Wang said there could be a negative impact.

"This is still the only opportunity for a top Chinese leader to have live televised interaction with foreign media. Even though it is a highly scripted event, it's a chance for everyone who is interested in China – particularly foreign investors – to hear directly from the Chinese leadership,” he said.

“This will be an opportunity missed for China to explain itself, and it may increase the perception of China’s lack of transparency. It will have a huge impact on China’s image to the outside world when it comes to openness.”

Alfred Wu, an associate professor at the National University of Singapore’s Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said the change was likely to be part of revisions made by the cabinet to its work rules a year ago, noting that an amended version of the related law would be endorsed during the NPC session.

“[This] clearly shows the fundamental changes in China’s party-government relationships in the past few years,” he said.

The revised work rules state that the cabinet will closely follow instructions from the party leadership, and provisions related to government transparency were removed.

“It will have only taken a year from the revision of the internal work rules to the revision of the guiding law,” Wu said. “Li Qiang is certainly pushing this very hard to show his loyalty.”

Jens Eskelund, president of the European Union Chamber of Commerce in China, expressed regret that the premier’s press conference was cancelled.

“Transparency and engagement with international media are important for enabling the global audience to understand China’s priorities and its assessment of the domestic and global situation,” he said. “We hope the press conference will be reintroduced next year.”

David Lie Tai-chong, a Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference member from Hong Kong, said he believed the press briefing was dropped as part of efforts to “streamline” the two sessions.

China's top political advisory body concludes standing committee session

02 March 2024, Xinhua

The 14th National Committee of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), or China’s national political advisory body, closed the fifth session of its standing committee Saturday in Beijing. Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the CPPCC National Committee, hosted the closing meeting and delivered a speech.

Praising the concrete progress the CPPCC National Committee has made over the past year, Wang noted that the year of 2024 marks the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People’s Republic of China and the founding of the CPPCC.

The CPPCC should carry on its fine tradition, stay committed to its political responsibility, actively offer advice and build up consensus for advancing Chinese modernization as well as pool wisdom and strength for fulfilling the national economic and social development goals, Wang said.

He also called for efforts to ensure the upcoming second session of the 14th CPPCC National Committee be held successfully.

The meeting reviewed and adopted documents including a draft agenda and the schedule of the annual session, a work report of the Standing Committee of the CPPCC National Committee, and a report on how the proposals from political advisors have been handled since the first session of the 14th CPPCC National Committee.

These documents will be submitted to the annual session for review.

Intrigue swirls about possible reshuffles as China's parliament convenes

02 March 2024, The Guardian

Thousands of delegates are due to arrive in Beijing this weekend for China’s most high-profile political gathering, a closely observed series of meetings that will lay out the government’s policy blueprint for the year ahead.

The event, known as the “two sessions”, begins on Monday as China’s parliament, the National People’s Congress (NPC) convenes alongside a separate but parallel meeting of the country’s top political advisory body, the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference.

The nearly 3,000 NPC delegates can amend the constitution, enact new legislation, approve the government budget and fill vacancies in state offices. But in reality the NPC is a rubber-stamp parliament. It has never voted down any item on the agenda, and the Communist party (CCP) holds the ultimate power over the state.

Nevertheless, it is a keenly watched political event. The premier, Li Qiang, will present the government work report, which lays out its plans for the year ahead, including the GDP growth target. And while no changes are expected to the position of Xi Jinping, who was granted a norm-busting third term as president at last year’s NPC, personnel changes may be announced, after months of uncertainty about who is responsible for some of China’s most important government departments.

The most significant changes are at the offices of the foreign minister and the defence minister. Speculation around the fates of Qin Gang, the former foreign minister, and Li Shangfu, the former defence minister, has swirled since the two men were removed without explanation from their positions last year, in a season of turbulence for China's government.

Qin has not been seen since in public since June, leading to rumours about his fate. This week Qin was removed as a NPC delegate, concluding his eradication from the levers of China's government.

Unlike other delegates who were "dismissed" from parliament, the official notice said Qin had resigned. James Palmer, a deputy editor of Foreign Policy, said in his China Brief newsletter that this indicated Qin's "fall from grace has been relatively cushioned".

Qin was replaced as foreign minister by his predecessor, Wang Yi, who is also the director of the more powerful CCP foreign affairs commission. Many experts believe that Wang's reappointment was intended to be temporary, with a replacement expected to be announced at this year's NPC. A likely candidate is Liu Jianchao, a senior party cadre who has travelled extensively in recent months to participate in diplomatic meetings.

Li, the former defence minister, was recently removed from the website of the CCP's central military commission.

The demotions of Qin and Li have left vacancies on the state council, China's cabinet. Li's vacancy may be filled by his replacement as defence minister, Dong Jun. But it is far from certain that Dong or any new foreign minister will be appointed to the state council.

Neil Thomas and Jing Qian, researchers at the Asia Society Policy Institute, said in a recent analysis that if the spots remained vacant, it "could suggest a higher degree of mistrust and paralysis at the centre of Xi's leadership and a poorer outlook for China's attempts to both manage tensions with the west and lead the global south".

Observers will be paying close attention to the government work report, which Li will deliver on Tuesday. He is expected to announce a relatively modest GDP growth target likely to hew closely to 2023's target of 5%.

There may be some modest fiscal support, although not the deep structural reform or more aggressive stimulus that many economists say is necessary to recharge China's struggling economy. That is because Xi's third term as China's leader has been characterised by a focus on national security, even at the expense of economic growth or business confidence.

Underlining this, on 27 February the NPC standing committee, which meets when the NPC is not in session, revised the law on state secrets, expanding the scope of sensitive information to "work secrets". The update requires government agencies to protect information that may not be a state secret but "would cause a definite adverse impact after leaking".

Although the law only applies to state institutions, Thomas and Qian said the widened scope of sensitive information "could affect firms that deal with China", meaning more uncertainty for businesses in China.

China's Xi Jinping calls for 'loyalty and honesty' from younger officials as morale runs low

02 March 2024, South China Morning Post

Chinese President Xi Jinping on Friday urged young and middle-aged officials to be loyal, honest and "keen on reform and innovation" in an effort to rally morale and encourage unity in the face of economic and social risks.

"[Young and middle-aged officials] must actively practice loyalty and honesty towards the party, and must make their political stance clear," Xi said, according to state news agency Xinhua.

He called on young cadres to strictly uphold the Communist Party's political discipline and rules, show honesty and maintain a high degree of unity with the party at all times.

The message was conveyed at the opening ceremony of a training programme for young and middle-aged officials on Friday at the Central Party School in Beijing, where Xi urged party organisations to nurture reliable and qualified successors.

"[Party members] should be strong promoters of good and clean political ecology ... resolutely oppose privileged thoughts and privileged behaviours, and maintain the political integrity of the party," Xi added.

He also called on them to guard against major risks and solve prominent problems.

Xi emphasised that young party members should be "selfless" and dedicate themselves to improving people's well-being. They should also be "keen on reform and innovation and dare to confront difficulties", he said.

Xi has previously highlighted the importance of innovation in China's modernisation path, saying it should be given a prominent position in overall development, according to an excerpt published last year in Qiushi, the party's theoretical journal.

"Chinese-style modernisation is an exploratory undertaking with many unknown areas that the country is required to boldly explore through reform and innovation, and we should never rigidly cling to an idea or approach without considering the reality of the situation," Xi said, according to the journal.

Morale is running low among China's public servants as Xi's sweeping anti-corruption campaign has increased the pressure on rank-and-file cadres, while the risk of social unrest is growing because of the country's economic slowdown.

Chen Daoyin, a political analyst and former professor at Shanghai University of Political Science and Law, noted that it was "party tradition" to train young and middle-aged officials at the Central Party School, where cadres learn to fill key party and state positions.

"The points emphasised in Xi's speech this year suggest prevalent problems among young and middle-aged officials, including the lack of a sense of responsibility and capability and low awareness of their roles," Chen said.

In January, Xi warned that the party should continue to fight corruption and other problems with "tenacity, perseverance and precision".

Later that month, the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection, China's top anti-corruption body, revealed that around 110,000 party officials faced disciplinary action last year.

China's former foreign minister Qin Gang and former defence minister Li Shangfu were also stripped of their titles and state councillor positions last year. The reasons for their dismissals have not been revealed publicly.

China economy gaining momentum despite calls for hardline US stance: senior diplomat

02 March 2024, South China Morning Post

China's economy is gaining momentum towards recovery and high-quality development as it becomes a "modern socialist country in all respects", a senior Chinese diplomat said on Friday, even as he denigrated American critics calling for hardline policies against the Asian giant.

The comments by Qian Jin, China's deputy consul general in New York, come as the administrations of Presidents Joe Biden and Xi Jinping seek to stabilise relations and build on good will following their November summit in California amid escalating US rhetoric ahead of the nation's presidential election in November.

"Some people have been hyping up [the] so-called 'China threat', advocating cutting China off from chips, slapping new sanctions," said Qian in prepared remarks.

"The stabilising momentum in China-US relations should not be disrupted by domestic politics."

Friday's statement, one of several over the past year by Beijing officials aimed at boosting investor and consumer confidence in China's struggling economy, was released amid a slew of headwinds.

Qian knocked detractors who voice "concerns and doubts" about China's economic development and who use such phrases as "struggling for momentum", "lack of drive" and "dragging down the world".

"This is further from the truth," he said. "The ship of China's economy is breaking turbulent waves of the global economy and moving steadily forward."

Qian argued critics should note that Beijing achieved its 5.2 per cent growth target in 2023.

In addition, China's economy remained a strong engine of global growth, he said, and planners had avoided "massive stimulus" for short-term gain given "sound and solid fundamentals".

Beijing has sought to project confidence as it tries to right its economic ship. Its swooning property market is a grave concern, accounting for some 25 per cent of the country's economy and about 70 per cent of household wealth.

On other fronts, local debt levels are mounting, and youth unemployment stood at 15 per cent in December. Last summer, the total surpassed 20 per cent, after which China's National Bureau of Statistics temporarily stopped releasing figures, citing a need to change how the index was calculated.

Furthermore, deflationary fears have intensified, and consumers during the closely watched Lunar New Year period stayed cautious.

While the number of domestic tourists was up 34 per cent during the major annual holiday over last year – and 19 per cent above 2019 pre-coronavirus pandemic levels – average spending per person was nine per cent below 2019.

"In short, Chinese households are readily partaking in the service economy but remain frugal in their spending," said Michael Hirson of 22V Research, a New York-based investment research firm.

"Cautious household spending and investing has been a key factor behind weak domestic demand since the post-Covid reopening and we see few catalysts to reverse it any time soon," added Hirson, who served as the US Treasury Department's attaché in China from 2013 to 2016.

Qian countered that the economy was stable, saying 2023 grain output fell only slightly below 2022 levels, R&D spending held strong and a shift was under way to new sources of growth.

China continued to welcome foreign investors, he added, while electric vehicles, batteries, solar panels and new energy developments remained promising. Some economists noted overcapacity concerns, however.

The country's domestic EV sales could grow 25 per cent to 9.44 million units this year, according to a forecast by Citic Futures. That is down from annual growth rates of 31 per cent last year and 89 per cent in 2022.

Beijing has sought to tackle the mounting economic uncertainties, vowing to embark on a host of pro-growth policies. "Proactive fiscal policy must be moderately strengthened and improved in quality and efficiency," according to a statement from the Politburo on Thursday.

In a meeting with US business executives in Beijing on Wednesday, Chinese Premier Li Qiang touted the "huge demand potential" in advanced manufacturing, urbanisation, consumption upgrading and green energy transformation. He did so even as he criticised any move to decouple the two economies.

On trade, prospects for China look mixed, analysts said, as 2023 exports fell, the US has maintained its insistence on restricting exports of high-end semiconductors and other key technologies and Europe grows warier of Beijing's ambitious EV plans, which the continent has viewed as a threat to its own efforts.

But Qian said better Sino-American trade relations were mutually beneficial.

"Decoupling between us will not work and will produce no winner," the diplomat said. "For Chinese companies in the US, unreasonable tariffs, sanctions and suppression are most unwanted."

Beijing's bid to bolster confidence with foreign investors comes amid steep stock market declines – partially reversed after recent government intervention – and plunging sentiment.

According to an American Chamber of Commerce in South China survey released on Tuesday, 63 per cent of US firms in China were looking to reinvest in China, down 5 percentage points.

The same survey found that only 11 per cent of non-American foreign firms planned to reinvest in China, down sharply from last year's 71 per cent.

Trade tensions are also weighing on the economy. More than 60 per cent of American firms and over half of Chinese firms in the South China AmCham survey said they had been negatively affected by tariffs both from Beijing and Washington, with 85 per cent expecting bilateral trade tensions to worsen.

The low level of trust and ongoing mudslinging between the world's two largest economies was evident in this week's annual US assessment of China's membership in the World Trade Organization.

Washington accused Beijing of a "state-directed, non-market approach" and an array of non-market practices targeting industries for global market domination, according to the 80-page report.

The US added that China's socialist market economy "has turned decidedly predatory".

Beijing quickly denied the charges, countering Washington relied on "discriminatory" industrial policies that disrupt global supply chains and used "smear tactics and blame-shifting methods to cover up its violations and sabotage".

Qian on Friday contended doubters would be proved wrong. "The Chinese economy can handle ups and downs," he said. "The overall trend of long-term growth will not change."

Further fall from grace for disappeared former foreign, defence ministers in opaque world of China

01 March 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Mar01'24) – China said Feb 27 that the resignation from the 14th National People's Congress (NPC) by the months-long disappeared former foreign minister Qin Gang had been accepted, without any information on his whereabouts or current status. China also said Feb 27 that it's also months-long disappeared defence minister Li Shangfu had been removed from the Party Central Military Commission (CMC).

"Tianjin Municipal People's Congress Standing Committee has decided to accept Qin Gang's resignation as a delegate to the 14th NPC," reported China's official Xinhua news agency Feb 27. The decision came ahead of the opening of the NPC's 2024 session on Mar 5.

Qin, China's former envoy to the United States, took the office of foreign minister in Jan 2023. He disappeared from public view in Jun 2023 and was formally banished from his position as a state councillor in October.

Qin rose to power due to his personal relationship with Chinese leader Xi Jinping, and his downfall has left many questions unanswered. Some experts have even described him as Xi's most loyal servant, noted newsweek.com Feb 27.

Beijing has yet to officially explain Qin's dismissal as foreign minister, after he was removed from the post only six months into the role. The mystery around Qin's disappearance since June continues as various theories about his fate have been put forward, the report noted.

Meanwhile, it is also not clear when exactly Li Shangfu was removed from China's key military command body, said the scmp.com Feb 27.

Li, who had not been seen in public since late Aug 2023, was removed as defence minister and state councillor without explanation at a meeting of the NPC Standing Committee in Oct 2023. He had only been in the post for months.

The CMC is a parallel system for the party and the state, with the same membership. Li had already been removed from the state CMC in October, the report noted.

It added that Li is still a member of the party's Central Committee and retains his seat in the legislature.

Last year also saw a number of senior generals being removed from their commands, prompting speculation that President Xi Jinping's anti-corruption drive was deepening in the military. They included the leadership of the People's Liberation Army Rocket Force who are responsible for the country's nuclear arsenal.

Nine of those commanders were also stripped of their seats in the legislature in Dec 2023, with the NPC saying this month that they were suspected of "violations of discipline and the law", usually a euphemism for corruption, the report noted.

Also, the fate of Li's predecessor Wei Fenghe remains uncertain after he did not appear on a list of senior officials who received Lunar New Year greetings from the leadership – a common courtesy. Wei has not been seen in public since then.

Besides, the new Defence Minister, Dong Jun, a former head of the navy, has not yet been given the rank of state councillor or a seat on the CMC, something all previous defence ministers have received, the report noted.

China's embattled former foreign minister steps down as a lawmaker

27 February 2024, NBC News

Qin Gang was dismissed in July in one of China's biggest political surprises in years. He has yet to reappear publicly.

China's former foreign minister, Qin Gang, who has been missing from public view since June, has resigned from the national legislature, state media reported Tuesday.

Qin was dismissed as foreign minister in July, in one of China's biggest political surprises in years.

The 57-year-old served for only seven months before he disappeared from public view last June. The government announced a month later that he had been dismissed from his post. He has yet to reappear publicly.

Qin was replaced as foreign minister by his predecessor, Wang Yi.

According to a notice by the National People's Congress Standing Committee, the Tianjin Municipal People's Congress accepted Qin's resignation as a delegate to the upcoming annual parliamentary session.

Official websites no longer list Qin as a member of the State Council, China's Cabinet, but there has been no mention of whether he has been excluded from China's ruling Communist Party.

His disappearance came during a series of dismissals at the top echelons of the party that included former Defense Minister Li Shangfu and other top military officials.

Signs of overt political friction are extremely rare in China, especially since President Xi Jinping tightened his control over the country's politics, partly through an anti-corruption drive that purged scores of his presumed rivals.

Qin's and Li's ousters are believed to be part of a broader effort to reduce security vulnerabilities amid China's increasing competition with the United States and its allies.

The National People's Congress, China's rubber-stamp parliament, is to convene its annual session in early March and is expected to focus on the country's ailing economy.

China's economy expanded by 5.2% last year but is forecast to slow sharply this year, bogged down by a property crisis, high youth unemployment and massive local government debt.

The Wall Street Journal reported in September, citing people familiar with a briefing, that Qin was ousted over an extramarital affair he had during a previous posting as ambassador to the U.S. An investigation was focused on whether his conduct had compromised China's national security, according to the Journal.

Leaked document trove shows a Chinese hacking scheme focused on harassing dissidents

22 February 2024, Wisconsin Public Radio

A large trove of more than 500 sensitive technical documents posted online anonymously last week details one Chinese technology company's hacking operations, target lists and marketing materials for the Chinese government.

The majority of the operations appear to be focused on surveilling and harassing dissidents who publicly criticize the Chinese government, including on global social media platforms like X, formerly known as Twitter.

Target lists reveal victims from at least 14 governments from Pakistan to Australia, as well as academic institutions, pro-democracy organizations in places like Hong Kong, as well as the military alliance NATO. The company was also bidding for work to surveil the minority Uyghur population in Xinjiang, a broader Chinese government program that major global human rights' organizations around the world have heavily criticized. There are even pictures of custom devices used for spying, such as a recording device disguised as a power bank.

Cybersecurity researchers are still investigating different components of the leak, which was shared to the open source development website popular with programmers, called GitHub. However, experts from top U.S. cybersecurity companies including Google's Mandiant and Sentinel Labs have shared preliminary analysis of the contents of the leak, believing the documents to be authentic.

"We have every reason to believe this is the authentic data of a contractor supporting global and domestic cyber espionage operations out of China,” said John Hultquist, the chief analyst for Mandiant Intelligence, a part of Google Cloud. “This leak is narrow, but it is deep. We rarely get such unfettered access to the inner workings of any intelligence operation. We are working hard to learn as much as we can and put it to good use.”

The state-affiliated company, called i-Soon, is known to be one of many contractors and subcontractors who compete for opportunities to perform hacking and surveillance operations for different Chinese government agencies. The company is currently facing litigation from another Chinese contractor called Chengdu 404, a company that the U.S. government has publicly linked in court documents to hacking operations for the state. It appears i-Soon may have done subcontracting work with Chengdu 404.

In previous public materials, i-Soon has noted relationships with China’s Ministry of Public Security, Ministry of State Security, and People’s Liberation Army, among others. The company is publicly known for providing cybersecurity trainings around the country from its base in Shanghai.

But beyond what’s publicly known, the details in the leak give internal insights into how an increasingly competitive marketplace for hacking operations within China functions. It’s unclear if all the claims made in marketing materials included in the leak are true, such as the ability to break into devices manufactured by top U.S. companies like Apple and Microsoft. However, it’s clear that the company is heavily invested in automating the ability to constantly monitor platforms like X and Facebook. Those platforms, unlike the popular WeChat, are not controlled by the Chinese government, making them popular with dissidents.

There are also details in the leak concerning internal pay scales and other bureaucratic details of contracts with the Chinese government. There is a note, or “ReadMe” document, included on the GitHub page where the leak is hosted, where the purported source of the leak claims to be dissatisfied with the company’s policies. That could indicate the source being a disgruntled employee, though it’s also possible the leak is the result of an intelligence operation or the work of a competitor.

While the contents of the leak are not entirely surprising, they’re especially helpful to specialists and researchers, who continue to review the contents. In particular, individual documents can help researchers fact-check their assumptions about who was responsible for previously discovered breaches.

China revamps discipline inspection rules to ensure Xi Jinping’s instructions are carried out

22 February 2024, South China Morning Post
China’s ruling Communist Party has revamped a set of rules to bolster its discipline inspections, making it a top priority to check whether cadres have fully implemented instructions from President Xi Jinping.

The party’s Central Committee has released revised regulations on inspection work and issued a directive asking all regions and government agencies to strictly comply, the state-run Xinhua news agency reported on Wednesday.

According to Xinhua, the revisions were approved at a January 31 meeting of the party’s 24-member Politburo and circulated within the party on February 8.

The revised regulations include a new clause that defines inspection work as the “political supervision” of party organs from the top down, according to the full text released by Xinhua.

A newly added paragraph at the beginning of the document states that the inspection work’s “fundamental task is to resolutely safeguard the core status” of Xi, as well as his authority and leadership.

Another new section explains that the party’s inspection team shall, as its top priority, check on the implementation of “major decisions and arrangements of the party’s Central Committee, especially the implementation of General Secretary Xi Jinping’s important speeches and important instructions”.

The revisions also removed three articles detailing specific corruption and disciplinary issues to watch for, which had been a top priority in the previous version, and summarised them in a single paragraph that appears after the section about implementing Xi’s instructions.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University in Beijing, said the revisions made it clear that inspection work was now largely focused on how closely China’s different regions and government departments were following and executing Xi’s grand plan.

“Beijing has learned a lot in the inspection work of the past decade and clearly wants to make sure previous cases in which the local government ignored Xi’s repeated instructions do not happen again,” said Xie, who is also a senior fellow at the Taihe Institute, a Beijing think tank.

Discipline inspection, which involves sending teams of senior inspectors to screen local disciplinary problems, has been a powerful tool for the party under Xi’s leadership since 2012.

The practice gives corruption busters access to various state and party organs and state-owned enterprises so they can proactively search for leads on corruption. It has been credited by Beijing for uncovering many high-profile corruption cases. The rules on discipline inspection were last revised in 2017.

"The focus has clearly been changed to checking on the political and work alignment of regions and government departments," Xie said, noting that the revisions added that a key principle of inspection work was to "focus on the party's central task and serve the big plan".

He said that meant that when Beijing issues new directions, its inspectors will make sure party and state organs recalibrate their work, leading them in the right direction.

The new code casts the inspection net wider. Under the revised rules, key state-owned enterprises, especially financial institutions, and state-run tertiary institutions will be targets for inspection, along with party committees in government agencies.

It also gives the inspectors much wider access to local government departments – including those for propaganda, security, auditing, finance, statistics and petitions – to support inspection work when necessary.

Tsinghua's Xie said this showed Beijing was determined to get accurate information and curb inflated official statistics.

"That is why the new code asked the inspectors to go directly to the ground for information, so they can spot misleading numbers from local governments and rectify them accordingly," he said.

The party made falsification of data a disciplinary violation in December, and last month Beijing sent stern warnings calling the practice "the biggest corruption in the statistical sphere".

China's would-be powerhouse Hunan wants officials to 'emancipate their minds'

19 February 2024, South China Morning Post
Communist Party officials in Hunan province in central China have kicked off a campaign which recalls Beijing's reversal of the Maoist political and economic doctrines of the last century, in a move that analysts say will have limited political implications.

According to a notice made public on Sunday, provincial cadres at all levels are taking part in the campaign, which started in early February and will continue until the end of March.

The campaign's name – "large-scale discussions on emancipating the mind" – was a clear reference to the party's efforts to kick off much-needed market reforms after the death of leader Mao Zedong in 1976.

President Xi Jinping, who came to power in 2013, revived the slogan to call for effective local governance and it was also in evidence on Sunday in the northeastern province of Heilongjiang, where top cadres used it in a pledge to drive growth.

Deng Xiaoping, who took over as leader in December 1978, made "emancipate the mind" his signature slogan as he paved the way for more than 40 years of reform and opening up.

Later Chinese leaders also used the slogan to urge the country to reflect on the lessons of Mao's governance, especially during the Cultural Revolution – a decade of political and social upheaval that almost paralysed the national economy, and only ended after his death.

The latest "emancipating the mind" campaign is fundamentally different from the 1970s and 1980s, according to Chen Daoyin, a political commentator and former professor at Shanghai University of Political Science and Law.

"The biggest difference is their political orientations: the emancipation of the mind movement by Deng Xiaoping was to break the 10-year ideological imprisonment of the Cultural Revolution," Chen said.

"Now in Hunan, it basically aims to strengthen Xi's Thought and better serve Xi's goals."

Chen noted that the Hunan campaign adopted only the first part of Deng's three-part proposition – "emancipate the mind, seek truth from facts, unite and look forward".

As such, the campaign would not make a major difference because all discussions were confined within existing policy priorities, without seeking more fundamental breakthroughs, he said.

The Hunan notice placed strong emphasis on effectively reviving the economy, as well as paying homage to Xi's teachings.

The discussions, taking place throughout the province, address problems with local cadres, including "lack of confidence in development" and "insufficient spirit of responsibility".

At the same time, the campaign aimed to fundamentally reverse the "addiction" that leads to many officials simply relying on GDP growth for evaluations, the notice said.

Through the discussions, problems such as raising loans regardless of risks, investing blindly on projects, cheating on data, and "lying flat" to evade making mistakes should be resolved, it said.

Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University, said Hunan's campaign was "a tactical attempt" to re-energise China's massive bureaucracy.

Many officials have been accused of "lying flat" – the phenomenon commonly known in the West as "goblin mode", which describes workers who put in just enough effort to keep their jobs and no more.

"After a decade of anti-corruption and disciplinary campaigns, many officials are in risk-aversion mode," Xie said.

They were unwilling to take responsibility, push development initiatives or incentivise private sector growth “as they are afraid of making mistakes or facing supervision checks”.

“It seems that Hunan is trying to trailblaze a way to give its officials more freedom to act and more tolerance of their probable mistakes,” he said.

China’s economy is facing multiple challenges, including a prolonged property market downturn, a local government debt crisis, and weak demand, as well as heightened geopolitical tensions.

The International Monetary Fund expects the Chinese economy to grow by 4.6 per cent this year, before slowing to 4 per cent in 2025, despite last year’s higher than expected growth of 5.2 per cent.

Hunan – which has ambitions to become the most “important advanced manufacturing highlands of the country” – achieved 5 trillion yuan (US$702 billion) in economic volume last year at a GDP growth rate of 4.6 per cent.

The province – which has set a growth target of around 6 per cent for this year – is at a “critical stage of comprehensively deepening reform and opening up and promoting high-quality development”, according to the notice.

“More than at any time in history, Hunan needs to break the ice with ideas to lead reform breakthroughs.”

According to the notice, discussions should abide by the guidance of the party’s Central Committee and Xi, as general secretary, and focus on removing obstacles that hinder development, as well as other issues to “prevent and resolve various major risks”.

The notice also called on the province’s cadres to create a better business environment for private enterprises, and to help them solve funding and payment delays, as well as other difficulties.

The notice said the campaign was taking in all levels of the party, starting with the grass-roots members and spreading to county, city and provincial levels of the party’s organs, as well as companies and schools.

At the upper echelons, Hunan’s senior provincial officials would hold discussion panels and make inspection tours, it said.

Alfred Wu, an associate professor with the National University of Singapore’s Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, said that under Deng the slogan “emancipate the mind” was about relaxing socialist thought and adopting international norms.

But now, he said, it meant that officials would try every possible avenue to deliver the high-quality growth Xi wanted.

According to Wu, the specific mention of inflated growth numbers and a “lying flat” attitude among officials in the announcement could be a signal from Hunan party boss Shen Xiaoming.

Wu said Shen could be signalling that he had the political will to address these stumbling blocks, but also that he wanted the province’s officials to come up with workable ideas.

Chinese firm behind local ‘news’ websites spreading Beijing propaganda in 30 countries

18 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb18’24) – China appears to have co-opted, through the agency of a Beijing public relations firm, more than 100 websites in 30 countries in Europe, Asia and Latin America to push its propaganda information at local levels. The outlets are seen to be disguised as local news outlets, but push unmitigated Chinese Party-state propaganda, suggests Reuters Feb 8, citing Toronto-based digital watchdog Citizen Lab Feb 7.

The propaganda material is interspersed with news aggregated from local news outlets and Chinese state media, the watchdog’s research report was stated to show.

“While the campaign’s websites enjoyed negligible exposure to date, there is a heightened risk of inadvertent amplification by the local media and target audiences, as a result of the quick multiplication of these websites and their adaptiveness to local languages and content,” researcher Alberto Fittarelli has said in the report.

The sites’ contents were stated to sway between conspiracy theories, often about the United States or its allies – such as a piece blaming American scientists for “leaking” Covid-19 – to articles attacking Beijing’s critics.

Citizen Lab has said the campaign began in mid-2020 and traced the network to public relations firm Shenzhen Haimaiyunxiang Media Co., Ltd., also known as Haimai.

One of the websites in the campaign was stated to be Roma Journal, “which looks every bit like a local Italian news outlet: headlines discuss the Italian prime minister’s political prospects, a hot air balloon festival in a northern province and a book launch.

“But a ‘press releases’ button at a corner of its homepage leads to a range of Chinese state media articles on topics such as China’s contribution to the global economic recovery and its push towards technological innovation.”

What is more, much of the content on the sites Citizen Lab found was seen to be sourced from a press releases service called Times Newswire, which analysts at cybersecurity firm Mandiant last year found to be at the centre of a separate Chinese influence operation that targeted US audiences.

The report cited experts tracking such operations as saying while online influence campaigns are increasingly common as powerful people and governments around the world seek to manipulate public opinion, China remains one of the biggest sources of such drives alongside Russia and Iran.

Notably, Chinese influence operations have increased and expanded well beyond Asia, social media giant Meta said in a report in Nov 2023, calling it "the most notable change in the threat landscape" since 2020.

The report said Citizen Lab dug deeper into the network it found after a series of such websites popped up in South Korea and Italy.

It said that South Korea's National Cyber Security Center (NCSC) – part of the country's national intelligence agency – exposed 18 of the sites in a report in Nov 2023, also linking the operation to Haimai.

State education leaders urged to investigate whether CCP is infiltrating K-12 schools

10 February 2024, ABC News

WASHINGTON (CITC) – A parents' rights group is pressing more than 30 state education leaders to investigate whether the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is attempting to infiltrate their schools.

The letter penned Thursday by Parents Defending Education (PDE) targets 34 state superintendents. Each of the 34 states were found to have school district contracts linked to the CCP, according to PDE. The letter follows a recent House hearing on the CCP's "cyber threat" to national security, during which Rep. Raja Krishnamoorthi, D-Ill., said "CCP hackers" were able to access an electric grid in Texas to install malware. PDE is now warning officials that the "infiltration of American infrastructure and institutions" extends to public education.

That should frighten people," Alex Nester, an investigative fellow for PDE, told Crisis in the Classroom (CITC).

PDE determined that 143 U.S. schools have "fostered relationships" with the CCP and affiliated entities. Most notably, Thomas Jefferson High School in Virginia was discovered to have received more than $1 million from such entities after agreeing to help a Beijing high school adopt its premier STEM research. "They took that back to China and opened a string of schools that are called the Thomas Schools that are based off our model," Nester told CITC. "It's like they don't even need to steal our IP anymore, they don't even need to do this under the table, we're freely handing an adversarial foreign nation the blueprints."

Thomas Jefferson was later instructed by Virginia's education department to sever all ties with CCP-connected donors.

Nester says PDE is now choosing to alert state officials because most tend to assume national security is the responsibility of the federal government.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

And it certainly is, but there are definitely steps that local leaders, including state superintendents, can take," she told CITC. "Do an investigation, look through emails, look at your servers, do checks for malware, for viruses, anything that could have been embedded from an adversarial foreign nation."

In its letter, PDE notes that the CCP's interest in American education is "not for the benefit of the American children," but "part of the communist regime's long-term strategy to soften American and global sentiments toward its own political goals."

China's Political Power List Hints at Fate of Disappeared Official

09 February 2024, NewsWeek

China's former Defense Minister Wei Fenghe was absent from a prominent list of retired Chinese political figures, fueling speculation about his fate.

Wei was missing from an official list of prominent retired officials published by the Chinese Communist Party that acknowledges the central figures of the Chinese political system. State broadcaster China Central Television broadcasted the list as part of Lunar New Year greetings.

Wei's predecessors, Chang Wanquan, Liang Guanglie, Cao Gangchuan, and Chi Haotian, were present on the list published on Wednesday, as first reported on Thursday by Hong Kong newspaper South China Morning Post. Newsweek independently confirmed that Wei Fenghe didn't appear on the list of prominent retired Chinese political figures.

In recent months, several leading military leaders from the People's Liberation Army's Rocket Force have also been replaced in recent months without explanation. Experts believe there is an extensive anti-corruption-related investigation currently underway in China's military and diplomatic circles, Newsweek previously reported.

Wei served as the defense minister of China from March 2018 until January 2023, replaced by former Defense Minister Li Shangfu. Wei officially retired that month.

He also previously served as the commander of Xi's elite Rocket Force, in charge of Beijing's nuclear arsenal, which has been mired in corruption allegations in recent months.

The scrutiny of Wei's absence from the list comes as China's leading military and diplomatic figures, including the former Foreign Minister Qin Gang and Foreign Defense Minister Li Shangfu, have disappeared from public view without explanation.

Qin and Li were officially removed from the State Council, China's chief administrative authority, according to state broadcaster CCTV, in October 2023. No official explanations were provided for their dismissal.

Newsweek reached out to the Chinese embassy in Washington, D.C., via email for comment on Wei's absence from the list.

Earlier in the year, Chinese leader Xi Jinping called the problem of corruption within the Chinese political system an ongoing effort.

"After 10 years of unrelenting and powerful anti-corruption efforts in the new era, we have achieved an overwhelming victory and have comprehensively consolidated our achievements. However, the situation remains dire and complex," Xi told the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection members, the Communist Party's highest supervisory body.

Ou Si-fu, a research fellow and division director at the Institute for National Defense and Security Research, Taiwan's top military think tank, told Newsweek in a recent interview that corruption in the People's Liberation Army remains rampant.

"During the last two decades, Beijing has poured many budgets and resources into defense modernization. Owing to a shortage of transparency, many officials have cut a big slice of this defense fat for private purposes," Ou said.

China's increasing political influence in the south Pacific has sparked an international response

09 February 2024, The Conversation

Taiwan elected Lai Ching-te, also known as William Lai, to be its next president on January 13. His election marks the continuation of a government that promotes an independent Taiwan.

Just two days later, the Pacific nation of Nauru severed ties with Taiwan and transferred its diplomatic allegiance to Beijing.

More recently, on January 27, Tuvalu's pro-Taiwan prime minister, Kausea Natano, lost his seat in the nation's general election. Natano's finance minister, Seve Paeniu, who is aiming for the prime ministership himself, was returned to his seat. In his campaign, Paeniu pledged to review Tuvalu's relationships with China and Taiwan.

These examples indicate China's growing influence in the south Pacific, a region that the world's major powers are competing for influence over. But why is the region significant? And how are these major powers exerting their influence there?

Preventing recognition of Taiwan

Taiwan has been governed independently since 1949. But Beijing believes it should be reunited with the rest of China. It is not an option for states to diplomatically recognise both China and Taiwan – China forces them to choose.

For decades, the Chinese government has used a combination of carrots and sticks to pressure such states into transferring diplomatic recognition from Taiwan to China.

China has, for example, imposed significant political, diplomatic and economic sanctions on countries that continue to formally recognise Taiwan. In 2022, China curbed imports from Lithuania to punish the country for allowing Taiwan to open a de facto embassy in the country.

But China also offers states – and their governing elites – economic and political incentives for withdrawing diplomatic recognition of Taiwan. It has, in the past, used its influence in the UN and other international organisations to block assistance or elect specific people to international positions.

Nauru's change of diplomatic position, and the political debate unfolding in Tuvalu, should be understood as part of China's longstanding effort to prevent and reduce recognition of Taiwan as a sovereign state.

But they are a significant step forward for China. Nauru has a leading position in the Pacific Islands Forum – the main political decision-making body for the region – so the country's change of stance could lead to wider formal diplomatic changes in the south Pacific.

China, of course, has legitimate economic and political interests in the south Pacific too. It is a vital export market for natural resources from Pacific island states and is a key source of incoming tourism. According to Chinese statistics, total trade volume between China and Pacific island states grew from US$153 million (£121 million) to US$5.3 billion (£4.2 billion) between 1992 and 2021.

Competing for influence

Nauru's decision is another diplomatic setback for Taiwan, which is now formally recognised by just 11 countries. However, this is not in itself a serious concern for the US, Australia and their allies.

They all formally recognise China, while at the same time maintaining close, informal links with Taiwan. Their focus is on trying to limit the depth of Chinese political and economic influence over Pacific island states and elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific region. The US is concerned that growing Chinese political influence may ultimately result in it enjoying significant military presence in the region.

The Pacific region encompasses the US state of Hawaii, multiple US territories, and is also home to several crucial US military bases. So, the US has made an effort to enhance its diplomatic relations in the region by providing financial support for initiatives around climate change adaption, sustainable fishing and economic growth.

However, increased tension between China and the west over the past decade has made it increasingly challenging to reign in Chinese influence. China has been asserting its primacy in and around Taiwan in the South China Sea, and has increasingly exerted military pressure.

China's struggle for influence in the region now also includes taking opportunities to challenge previously undisputed western security dominance in the south Pacific. In 2022, China put forward a proposal for a diplomatic, economic and security agreement with the region. The agreement was, however, later abandoned due to resistance from some Pacific island nations at the urging of the US and Australia.

US strategy in the south Pacific

When president, Donald Trump launched a number of deals with Pacific islands including Nauru, Marshall Islands, Solomon Islands, Palau and Micronesia. However, Trump's strategy for a "free and open Indo-Pacific" had limited success. This was not only due to his confrontational posture towards China, but also to his threatening and protectionist "America first" rhetoric.

Joe Biden's comparatively measured diplomacy has seen more success. In 2022, the Biden administration announced its "Pacific partnership strategy".

The initiative included a commitment of US$810 million in development aid across the Pacific island region. And in May 2023, the US secretary of state, Antony Blinken, stated that he would work with Congress to provide over US$7.2 billion to support the region.

Since then, the US has recognised the Cook Islands and Niue as independent, sovereign nations, increased its diplomatic footprint in the region and has committed strongly to work with the Pacific Islands Forum to promote a "democratic, resilient and prosperous Pacific islands region".

The shift of diplomatic ties from Taiwan to China does not mean that Pacific island nations want to reduce their ties with the west. But the US, Australia and their allies will need to invest a lot more in diplomatic, economic and security assistance if they want to counter China's growing influence there.

Chinese security agencies tell students studying abroad to beware risk from foreign spies

07 February 2024, South China Morning Post

China's top spy agency has warned Chinese students to be alert to the risk from foreign spies when studying abroad.

The warning from the Ministry of State Security comes amid a sweeping national security drive.

In a post on the ministry's WeChat account it told the story of a "real case" involving a Chinese graduate who, it claimed, had secured a place from a "top ranking" foreign university despite failing the Chinese college entrance exam in 2006.

It said the student, identified only by the surname Zhang, had been "severely punished" for his role in leaking Chinese scientific research after graduating.

The ministry did not say where Zhang had studied, but it said he had been responsible for liaising with Chinese students abroad and had done well in his studies, which brought him to the attention of a senior figure in the university.

This individual was then said to have put Zhang in touch with two people who turned out to be foreign spies and convinced him to provide intelligence on Chinese international students and other "sensitive information" in return for money.

The account said these spies had secured Zhang a job in a Chinese research institution in China, even though he did not have the correct credentials, and told him to appear to be helpful to his colleagues to collect information.

The State Security Ministry said Zhang had "squandered his promising future" by giving in to the foreign intelligence agency's "emotional manipulation and monetary temptation".

It warned the public to be alert to national security risks and "uncover the hidden motives behind various seemingly innocent interactions" while studying and travelling abroad.

In recent months the Chinese authorities have heightened their focus on risks to national security, with the state security ministry becoming more active on social media to warn of the threat from foreign spies.

Last year, State Security Minister Chen Yixin said the country must "proactively defend" against foreign spies to strengthen national security and the Communist Party's leadership.

A new counter-espionage law came into effect in July 2023, which expanded both the definition of spying and the investigative powers of national security agencies.

Although China and the United States recently pledged to boost academic exchanges as part of a wider effort to improve relations, Chinese students in America are still at risk of being caught up in the wider tensions between the countries.

Recently China accused the US authorities of harassing Chinese students on arrival at Washington's Dulles airport, subjecting them to lengthy questioning and trying to turn them into spies.

According to China's education ministry, more than 8 million students have studied abroad in the period between 1978 and the end of 2021, with the US, Britain and Singapore as the most popular destinations.

China expands visa exemption policy to attract more foreigners

04 February 2024, RFA

China has expanded its visa-free entry policy for tourists and business travelers from more than a dozen European and Asian countries, opening up its borders further in recent months as it struggles to shore up foreign interests to help arrest an economic slowdown.

In January, the Chinese government announced that it would provide unilateral visa exemption for Ireland and Switzerland and introduce a mutual visa exemption for Singapore for 30 days. Additionally, from March 1, China and Thailand will also allow permanent visa exemption for citizens of both sides. In the past six months, Beijing has implemented a visa-free policy to tourists from Brunei, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Malaysia.

While the number of foreign tourist arrivals has jumped nearly seven times to 35.5 million last year from 4.5 million in 2022, it's still a far cry from the 98 million recorded in pre-pandemic 2019, according to China's National Immigration Administration.

But foreign nationals would be hesitant to travel to China for several factors: the high cost of air tickets, the inconveniences upon arrival without a Chinese mobile phone number – which is needed for mobile payment apps as many businesses and restaurants do not take cash – as well as being closely surveilled and controlled by the authorities.

"I recently returned to China and the biggest inconvenience was that overseas credit cards are difficult to use in China. China's WeChat Pay or Alipay require a Chinese domestic WeChat account to install," an Australian citizen surnamed Yang lamented to Radio Free Asia.

"Moreover, without a mobile phone number in China, I can't even hail a taxi. I have to ask someone to hail one for me every time."

Yang said another issue was the close surveillance he endured.

After registering for accommodation with the neighborhood police station – a requisite – the neighborhood committee cadres would come to verify, and also inform him they knew of his comings and goings from the residence.

"It was nothing more than a warning to me: the Public Security Bureau is closely monitoring my every move and deliberately putting pressure on me."

Not only was Yang under close surveillance, but his work partners were not spared either.

"I used my Australian mobile phone in China to make a call to a boss in Zhejiang to discuss possible cooperation. A few hours after the call, the lady was summoned to the police station. The police told her that it was an overseas fraud call and made a record. She was so scared that she never dared to answer my call again."

Yang added he was scarred from the experience and would try to avoid going to China, which he described as "a hysterical country."

Costly airfares and politics

A woman who works in the United States and only gave her name as Angela said the air ticket price from the U.S. to China remains high, although a slight decline allowed her to return last month.

Angela said that compared to her experience three years ago, the Chinese government has stepped up its controls on the people.

"One thing that makes it very inconvenient is: everywhere I go, I am being checked for my identity – be it to get on the high-speed rail, book a ticket for a tourist attraction, and even to register a shared bike account. The purpose of this is probably to collect and control information and capture everyone's whereabouts, but it is very annoying."

Separately, a travel agent in the U.S. who only gave her surname Cai noted that middle-aged and elderly overseas Chinese are reluctant to travel to China because of the political environment.

"It's not that we don't do business in the Chinese market – now is not the right time, whether it is political or other factors."

Beijing is trying to rebuild its international image and trust with the international community, and the visa-free policy was one of the measures to improve relations with foreign countries, said Riley Walters, a senior researcher on international economics at the Hudson Institute, a Washington-based think tank.

"The slowdown in the economy and stock market has made China's demand for foreign investment high. Relaxing visa restrictions will also help the tourism industry," Walters said.

But how effective Beijing's visa-free policy will be in shoring up foreign investment remains to be seen.

Ralph Weber, a professor from the European Center for Global Studies at the University of Basel in Switzerland, believes the policy will have a limited effect on attracting business travelers.

"Investors are hesitant to go to China because they feel uneasy. They're worried about what's happening in China, like the espionage laws. So the impact created by the visa-free policy is not worth mentioning. I can't imagine a Swiss business traveler thinking, 'Wow, I now don't have to pay for a Chinese visa, so I'm going to invest in China.' That's not the logic," Weber said.

China's actual foreign direct investment fell 8% to 1.13 trillion yuan (US$159 billion) last year, according to the Ministry of Commerce.

China to strengthen propaganda control on discussion of ethnic minority issues

03 February 2024, Tibetan Review

Sounding the urgency to realise President Xi Jinping's vision of "forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation," a top policy office of the Communist Party of China (CPC) has pledged to tighten control of ethnic minority-related discussions on the internet and in print. The aim is to stamp out what the office calls ideological risks related to the minorities especially in Xinjiang and Tibet, reported the scmp.com Feb 2, citing the Communist Party's theoretical journal Qiushi on Feb 1.

The article, written under the byline of the Communist Party leadership group at the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, the office responsible for drafting and implementing laws regarding China's policies towards its ethnic minority groups, has called for greater oversight of public opinion and discussion around ethnic minority groups and related issues online.

The article is stated to refer to "risks" arising from ethnic minority communities and to call for what is called "the responsibility mechanism of ideology work" to be implemented.

"[We must] resolutely fend off the infiltration of the 'three forces'," referring to terrorism, separatism and religious extremism. "[We must] further regulate publication related to ethnic minority groups," the article is quoted as saying.

The commission has called for greater supervision, for officials to "promptly and appropriately" address grievances involving issues related to ethnic minority groups, and to "absolutely uphold the bottom line of preventing regional and systemic risks in the ethnic regions".

In addition to a call for greater control, the article is stated to endorse more resources being put into art – such as in publications, on stage and visual arts – which could help ethnic minority groups identify more deeply with Chinese culture.

"[We] should aim to make the internet the biggest contributor to strengthening the awareness of the community of the Chinese nation,” it is quoted as saying.

The remarks are seen to have come as Beijing stresses the need to realise President Xi’s vision of “forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation”, which advocates for greater integration of ethnic minority groups and putting the interests of the Chinese nation first.

The report notes that grievances relating to ethnic minority groups have long been a major source of tension in Chinese society, particularly in Xinjiang and Tibet.

While Beijing has largely tamped down the intensity of those tensions in recent years by tightening its grip on the regions’ security and culture policies, its measures have attracted massive criticisms for human rights abuses, the report said.

It bears noting that major issues highlighted in these criticisms have included re-education camps and forced labour incarceration of around a million mostly Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang and the forced enrolment of around a million Tibetan children in forced colonial schools designed to Sinicize them.

Given these foreign criticisms, the article in Qiushi has said China’s external communication around its ethnic minority groups was not effective, claiming Beijing “has a valid point but not able to effectively communicate it”.

Without naming any countries, it has said this was because of some countries’ “hegemonic dominance”. The article has noted that in recent times Beijing had stepped up efforts in the hope that its global communication would better align with its narrative.

The report says that one example of this is Beijing’s dramatically increased use since last year of “Xizang” rather than “Tibet” in its English articles in Chinese state media. It sees the term “Tibet” as being linked in international discussion to the region’s spiritual leader-in-exile, the Dalai Lama.

China’s anti-corruption watchdog says 110,000 Communist Party officials faced disciplinary action last year

30 January 2024, South China Morning Post

About 110,000 Chinese Communist Party officials faced disciplinary action last year as part of the ongoing drive to clean up the party’s act, according to the country’s top anti-corruption body.

The figures published by the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) on Sunday represent a 13 per cent increase in the number of cases compared with the previous year.

There is little sign of Beijing easing up on its latest crackdown more than a year after the party’s national congress in October 2022, when President Xi Jinping began an unprecedented third term as China’s paramount leader and filled most key positions with his loyalists.

Last year saw the commission launching corruption probes into a 45 senior officials, a record number, according to a tally by the Post.

Other signs suggest that more senior figures under also under investigation. Apart from last year’s shock removal of Qin Gang as foreign minister and Li Shangfu as defence minister after just months in their jobs, nine senior military officials were abruptly dismissed by China’s national legislative body, the National People’s Congress.

Despite previously hailing an “overwhelming victory” against corruption, Xi told the CCDI’s annual planning event earlier this month that the party must continue to fight graft and other problems with “tenacity, perseverance and precision” to transcend “the historical cycle of rise and fall”.

The CCDI said last year’s disciplinary cases covered breaches of the eight rules on official conduct that Xi laid down soon after taking over as head of the party in late 2012.

These rules, enforced by the CCDI, are intended to ensure a thrifty and responsible working style for officials and cover everything from a ban on extravagant banquets and receptions to avoiding unnecessary meetings and red tape.

Of those punished, more than 41,000 officials fell foul of the watchdog for failing to carry out their duties properly by “failing to take responsibility” or “paying lip service” to their orders. The watchdog particularly highlighted failures to implement development or environmental protection policies – two of Xi’s main priorities.

A further 40,000 were punished for receiving expensive gifts, money or attending lavish meals and celebrations, while another 10,000 were reprimanded for issuing or receiving benefits without approval.

In publishing the figures, the commission also warned party officials that they must closely follow the disciplinary rules – especially in the build-up to Lunar New Year, which begins on February 10.

“[We will] strengthen warnings and deterrents, and educate and guide party members and cadres so they will celebrate the festival in a clean manner,” it said.

Beside disciplinary action, several provinces including Guangdong, Anhui, Henan, Zhejiang and Fujian have adopted a policy of naming and shaming officials who are slacking off from performing their duties in recent months.

Deng Yuwen, a former deputy editor of Study Times, the official newspaper of the Central Party School where cadres are trained, said Xi had not let up on the anti-corruption crackdown because the disciplinary apparatus was his most powerful tool for forging a clean and efficient team to steer the country ahead.

“China’s party-state system does not allow any opposition parties that can keep the ruling party in check, and there is little media freedom too,” he said.

He said the “eight rules” discipline campaign began with a focus on curbing rampant extravagance among party officials, but it was now trying to ensure that policy priorities were implemented by turning the spotlight onto those who neglected their duties.

“Many officials switched to goblin mode [refusing to perform tasks they do not want to do] after the anti-corruption campaign as they think they can better survive the purge if they don’t do anything,” said Deng, who is now living in the United States.

“But Xi is backing up his harsh corruption crackdown with a tough official conduct rectification campaign to ensure no one can slack off. All have to get up and march in his direction.”

China ‘gamed’ UN human rights review, experts say

29 January 2024, RFA

A Chinese diplomat said the majority of the 428 recommendations it received were ‘constructive.’

A top Chinese diplomat said Beijing would “earnestly study” 428 recommendations for addressing human rights submitted by U.N. members, calling them “objective and balanced.”

But leading experts said China “gamed” the once-every-five-year “universal periodic review” to avoid scrutiny of its rights abuses.

Chen Xu, China’s ambassador to the U.N. offices in Geneva, said following the adoption of the report that he was happy with the many recommendations by 141 countries, and that Beijing would release its positions on each of the suggestions next month.

“The report just adopted is, in general, objective and balanced, and has reflected the statements and the recommendations during the meeting,” Chen said in remarks to the council. “We believe the majority of the comments and recommendations are constructive.”

Tuesday’s three-hour review session descended into farce, with the unusually high number of participating countries meaning each only had 45 seconds to provide an assessment of a country that has been accused of possible crimes against humanity by a U.N. body.

Under this process, each of the 193 U.N. member states has their rights record reviewed on a rolling five-year basis.

A report by Reuters said Chinese diplomats had in the lead-up to the session lobbied countries to turn up with soft-ball assessments.

Gaming the system

The many contributions during Tuesday’s session worked to draw attention away from some of the worst claims of rights abuse in China, including the treatment of Uyghurs, Tibetans and Hong Kongers.

While Western nations including the United States, Finland, Canada, Switzerland and the United Kingdom focussed on China’s treatment of Tibetans and Uyghurs in the country’s west during their 45 seconds, many countries offered praise for things like legal system reforms.

William Nee, the research and advocacy coordinator for the Washington-based Chinese Human Rights Defenders, said Beijing had used its diplomatic heft to water-down legitimate criticism of its human rights record by inundating the process with friendly voices.

“This time, they tried to game the process,” Nee told Radio Free Asia. “There was an intense lobbying campaign for countries to ask questions that essentially the Chinese government wrote in advance. There were a lot of softball questions and very easy questions.”

Nee added that some countries’ recommendations even appeared to poke fun at the global condemnation of the China’s treatment of Tibetans and Uyghur citizens, the latter of whom the U.S. government says are the victim of an ongoing campaign of genocide.

Russia, he noted, said China should “improve gradually people’s sense and ability of using standard spoken and written Chinese language in Xinjiang,” referring to the far-western region where Uyghurs live.

Venezuela, meanwhile, said China must “firmly oppose the politicization” of human rights “under the pretext of issues related to Xinjiang, Hong Kong and Xizang,” the latter of which is the new official romanized name for Tibet adopted by the Chinese government.

“If we look at the advanced questions submitted, it seems as though some of those questions could have been drafted by the Chinese government, to be quite blunt,” said Kai Müller, executive director and head of U.N. advocacy at the International Campaign for Tibet.

Nothing new

Sophie Richardson, the former China director at Human Rights Watch, told RFA that China openly flouted U.N. requirements to allow input from independent civil society groups into the self-report it submits.

“There’s a long list of ways the Chinese government tried to game the process this time around, which has to start with the way it tried to game the process the last time around,” Richardson said, pointing to China’s boasting of its fidelity to recommendations made in 2018.

China that year accepted 284 of the 346 recommendations made by some 150 countries. But many of those, Richardson said, were the ones that were “vague or meaningless, or in fact encouraged the Chinese government to keep committing human rights violations.”

“Beijing has held that up as real progress,” she said, even though “five years later, we know it is committing atrocity crimes.”

But China’s “gaming” of the review process did not entirely wipe out opportunities for countries to speak out about their legitimate concerns.

There was a heightened focus, for example, on the plight of Tibetans and Uyghurs, with the number of recommendations related to Tibet increasing to 24 from 10 in 2018. Likewise, the number of countries mentioning Tibet in their floor speeches doubled from nine to 20.

“The dramatic increase in the number of U.N. member states who spoke out for Tibet ... speaks to the existential threat China’s assimilationist policies pose to the Tibetan people,” said Lhadon Tethong, the director of the Tibet Action Institute.

Campaign for Uyghurs executive director Rushan Abbas said the 30 countries who called out human rights abuses against Uyghurs showed that the world was no longer being fooled by China’s denials.

“This significant outcry, despite China’s persistent lies and outright denial, stands as a testament to the commitment to human rights and justice,” Abbas said. “It also sends a powerful message that the international community will not be swayed by false narratives in light of the mounting evidence exposing the crimes of the PRC.”

China has until Feb. 9, 2024 to provide its initial written response to each of the recommendations, including whether it accepts them, and has until Feb. 16 to finalize its statements and response.

China’s Communist Party vows to take on ‘new and old challenges’ in People’s Daily article based on Xi Jinping’s speech

26 January 2024, South China Morning Post

The Communist Party of China has pledged to maintain a tight grip on discipline within its ranks as it faces “new and old challenges” to its rule.

An article in party mouthpiece the People’s Daily said these problems would not go away any time soon, and resolving them would be “a long and arduous process”.

“There is always the possibility that some old problems will rebound. If we relax even a little bit, they will resurface, while new problems are still emerging,” the article said.

It ran under the byline “commentator of the People’s Daily” – indicating direct endorsement from the senior party leadership.

It was also the fifth official piece elaborating on a speech delivered by President Xi Jinping to the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection – the party’s top corruption watchdog and disciplinary body.

The “four dangers” will threaten the party’s power for a long time, the article warned, referring to the official term covering lax discipline, incompetence, popular disconnect and corruption.

This comes as graft fighters report a record number of internal investigations of senior officials, more than a year after the party’s 20th national congress where Xi began a third term as leader amid a show of even firmer support for him.

In his work report to the congress, Xi said the party had “waged a battle against corruption on a scale unprecedented in our history” and “achieved an overwhelming victory”.

But high-profile officials continue to fall. Apart from the shock removal of foreign minister Qin Gang and defence minister Li Shangfu, both the shortest-serving in their positions, the party also launched corruption probes into a record high 45 senior officials last year, according to a tally by the Post.

Anti-corruption officers have pointed to a wide range of misconduct for those probes, including corruption, snubbing instructions from the senior leadership, political disloyalty and irresponsible use of public funds.

Two weeks ago, Xi reiterated his call for the party to find ways to transcend “the historical cycle of rise and fall”.

Addressing hundreds of top discipline inspectors gathered for the CCDI’s annual meeting in Beijing on January 8, Xi emphasised the “strategic question” facing the party’s 98 million members.

"As the world's largest Marxist ruling party, how can our party successfully break free from the historical cycle of rise and fall and ensure that it will never change its nature, convictions or character?" he was quoted as saying by state media.

Thursday's article said the Chinese Communist Party must draw painful lessons from many other "large parties and parties with a long history" that had failed, but did not offer any specific examples.

"They were once full of vigour and vitality, but some have fallen apart or disappeared, some have weakened and are approaching their end, while some are in deep trouble. These are very regrettable and thought provoking [lessons]," it said.

Brian Wong, assistant professor of philosophy at the University of Hong Kong, cited Beijing's tracking of communist powers around the world.

Beijing had kept a watchful eye on events such as the decline and fall of the Soviet Union, the changes in Eastern Europe, and the "falling apart" of revolutionary parties, such as in Cambodia, Wong said.

"On the other hand, Beijing also recognises that the socioeconomic inequalities giving rise to great instability in advanced liberal democracies point towards the need to redress these inequalities [in communist states] and [enforce] internal party discipline."

The People's Daily article also said China's unique situation made it impossible for it to follow the paths of other countries. "Unique problems can only be fundamentally solved by relying on the party's internal strength", it said.

China's ruling party sees strict enforcement of discipline as a way to sustain its public appeal.

Xi relaunched the Mao-style "self-revolution" slogan in 2015 with this in mind, and has since repeatedly emphasised this as the only way forward to keep the people's support.

A People's Daily report on the January 8 meeting hailed the "courage" in carrying out self-revolution as "the most distinctive character and greatest advantage" of the party.

The concept, often metaphorised as a "blade turned inward", is a response to concerns about the impact of corruption on the party.

It mainly involves a rigorous system to oversee all officials, building a competent disciplinary supervision team, and a better combination of carrot and stick to steer officials away from temptation.

The People's Daily article also warned of the "four major tests" faced by the party with regard to governance, reform and opening-up, the market economy and the external environment.

The latest data released by the CCDI on Thursday showed 610,000 cadres had been reprimanded last year, a 3 per cent increase over 2022, while 49 ministerial rank officials faced disciplinary action, compared with 53 the previous year.

A political researcher at Tsinghua University in Beijing said Xi's speech to the CCDI and the People's Daily commentary showed the anti-corruption drive would not be removed from the president's priority list for "a very long period of time".

"The 'old problems' [in the article] refer to the corruption that took place before ... Xi came to power, primarily caused by vibrant economic growth and more lax party discipline," the Tsinghua researcher said, declining to be named as he was not authorised to speak to the media.

"The new problems can refer to those who fall prey to increased infiltration from the West, as China and the West are competing on many fronts, and those who refuse to implement Xi's policy directions or engage in pointless formalities and bureaucracy while Xi wants to see results."

China in overdrive to defend its UN-battered rights record ahead of review report

25 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan25'24) – As the United Nations Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review (UPR) Working Group at Geneva prepared to finalize on Jan 26 its recommendations on the basis of its Jan 23 hearing, China has put itself in an overdrive to defend its record. This followed news reports and reports by rights groups that despite its efforts to stymie discussions, China received scathing criticism for its record especially in Xinjiang, Tibet and Hong Kong, with a record number of participants expressing serious concern on the situation in Tibet.

China claimed that more than 120 countries "spoke highly" of its "human rights progress". They "fully acknowledged China's effort and historic achievements in advancing and protecting human rights," said China's official Xinhua news agency Jan 24, citing the country's foreign ministry spokesperson that day.

The remark from spokesperson Wang Wenbin had come in response to a question from a representative of an official Chinese media group, the Hubei Media Group, during a regular press conference, who asked: "Representatives attending the meeting spoke highly of China's human rights development path and historic achievements in human rights cause. Can you share more details with us?"

Also, China's official chinadaily.com.cn Jan 25 published an open letter addressed to the President of the UN Human Rights Council, signed by a total of 73 so-called Chinese civil society organizations. The open letter criticized Tibetan and other groups that had contributed reports or made presentations during the review hearing. It accused them of having “spread false information and cause trouble on a large scale, with the purpose of attacking and smearing China.”

The open letter especially named “so-called International Federation for Human Rights, International Campaign for Tibet (Xizang) and Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy”. It accused them of “inciting other countries to attack and criticize China” on issues “such as colonial boarding school system”, “repression of Tibetan Buddhism”, “systematic attacks on the Tibetan language”, “limit the rights to freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of peaceful association and assembly”, “denial of the legal rights of detainees and prisoners”, and “torture and other forms of ill-treatment”.

The open letter maintained that the success of the reports of these groups at the review “will significantly impact the credibility of the Human Rights Council, seriously disrupt the enthusiasm and expectations of normal participation by countries worldwide and global NGOs in the working mechanisms of the Human Rights Council, greatly harm the sentiments of the 1.4 billion people in China including Xizang, and severely misguide the global populace’s accurate understanding and international public opinion of Xizang.”

The open letter especially focused on the reports on the situation in “Xizang”, the term China recently began to use in place of “Tibet” in furtherance of its policy-objective of Sinicizing the Tibetan identity of the Tibetan Plateau region.

Apparently seeking a set of recommendations that would praise rather than call for improvement in its human rights record, the letter said: “We strongly urge the Human Rights Council to remember the original intention and mission of establishing the universal periodic review mechanism, eliminate confusing noises, prevent lies and false accusations impacting the Council’s consideration of significant human rights issues with genuine practical significance.”

The open letter’s long list of “civil society” signatories included a number of educational and research centres, especially from the Tibetan regions, as well as chambers of commerce and an assortment of other entities, all of them government-backed or government-run.

Open letter from Chinese Civil Society Organizations to the President of the United Nations Human Rights Council

24 January 2024, China Daily

Dear President of the UN Human Rights Council,
As a crucial organ of the United Nations General Assembly aimed at promoting and protecting human rights, the Human Rights Council plays a pivotal role in advancing global human rights development. We sincerely admire this role and express high appreciation for your commitment to upholding guiding principles such as universality, impartiality, objectivity, non-selectivity, as well as constructive international dialogue and cooperation in your work. We have noticed, over the past period, organizations including the so-called International Federation for Human Rights, International Campaign for Tibet(Xizang) and Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy, have been using the platform of the Human Rights Council to spread false information and cause trouble on a large scale, with the purpose of attacking and smearing China. They fabricated lies such as "colonial boarding school system" "repression of Tibetan Buddhism" "systematic attacks on the Tibetan language" "limit the rights to freedom of opinion and expression and freedom of peaceful association and assembly" "denial of the legal rights of detainees and prisoners" "torture and other forms of ill-treatment", attempting to manipulate the Human Rights Council into making biased statements on the issue of Xizang, inciting other countries to attack and criticize China. These practices of distorting right and wrong completely ignore the history and reality of Xizang, disregarding the tremendous achievements in the development of human rights in Xizang, lacking basic objectivity and truthfulness. Once successful, it will significantly impact the credibility of the Human Rights Council, seriously disrupt the enthusiasm and expectations of normal participation by countries worldwide and global NGOs in the working mechanisms of the Human Rights Council, greatly harm the sentiments of the 1.4 billion people in China including Xizang, and severely misguide the global populace's accurate understanding and international public opinion of Xizang. We strongly oppose the maliciously fabricated and baseless accusations, object to the politicization, instrumentalization, and stigmatization of human rights in Xizang.

In today's Xizang, governments at all levels and people of all ethnicities are making efforts to promote political stability, social harmony, economic development, national unity, religious harmony, rule of law, and ecological well-being. They are working to ensure more comprehensive protection of basic human rights. The people of Xizang have firsthand experiences of these efforts, and many foreign media outlets that have visited Xizang have also provided extensive and objective coverage.

Rumors originate from schemers, thrive among the foolish, and cease with the wise. We strongly urge the Human Rights Council to remember the original intention and mission of establishing the universal periodic review mechanism, eliminate confusing noises, prevent lies and false accusations impacting the Council's consideration of significant human rights issues with genuine practical significance. We call for the respect of legitimate information provided by member states and the making of objective, rational, and fair judgments.

China's ethnic affairs officials urged to promote integration of minority groups

24 January 2024, South China Morning Post

China's ethnic affairs officials have been asked to boost efforts to promote the integration of the country's ethnic minority groups in the new year.

The Tuesday meeting brought together senior ethnic affairs policy directors from around the country and outlined goals for China's ethnic affairs policies.

Beijing has stressed the need to enforce President Xi Jinping's vision of "forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation", which calls for greater integration of ethnic minority groups.

The meeting noted that efforts should be made to "build a system of historical materials, a system of discourse and a system of theories on the community of the Chinese nation" and to "scientifically reveal the reasons, theories and philosophies of the formation and development of the Chinese nation".

It called for efforts to launch cultural products and exhibits that "reflect the commonality of the Chinese nation" to "fully demonstrate Chinese cultural heritage".

It also outlined the goal of addressing risks and "hidden dangers" in the field of ethnic affairs and safeguarding ethnic unity and stability.

The meeting noted that ethnic affairs offices across China should "have a sense of responsibility and urgency" and "thoroughly implement" the latest decisions by Communist Party leaders on ethnic affairs.

Ethnic grievances were once a major source of tension in Chinese society, especially in Tibet and Xinjiang. Beijing has largely brought down the intensity of those tensions in recent years, but has been widely criticised for the security and cultural policies that were used during the process.

At a Politburo study session in October, President Xi Jinping noted the need to promote the party's work in guiding ethnic minority groups. He emphasised the importance of educating ethnic minority groups about party history, theories and policies and to further integrate them into the Chinese nation.

"Efforts should be made to let people cultivate awareness that people from all ethnicities are in the same community, where they share weal and woe and stick together through thick and thin," he was quoted as saying at the time by state news agency Xinhua.

In Tuesday's meeting, Pan Yue, party chief of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, said efforts should be made "to open up a brand new situation of high-quality development of the party's work on ethnic affairs in the new era".

The commission is responsible for drafting laws regarding China's policies towards its ethnic minority groups as well as implementing those laws and regulations.

Pan is also a deputy head of the United Front Work Department, the body responsible for liaising with non-party groups, overseeing the country's ethnic and religious issues and overseas Chinese affairs.

The Tuesday meeting also called for efforts to make economic development "a process of forging a sense of community of the Chinese nation".

It also emphasised "strengthening the party's centralised and unified leadership on ethnic affairs" to promote "strong synergy for the party's work on ethnic affairs in the new era".

Western countries use UN-backed review to press China on its treatment of activists and minorities

23 January 2024, ABC27

GENEVA (AP) — Western countries used a regular U.N.-backed review of China's human rights record Tuesday to press Beijing to do more to allow freedom of expression, protect the rights of ethnic minorities and to repeal a national security law in Hong Kong that troubles independent activists.

China's ambassador in Geneva, Chen Xu, led a delegation from some 20 Chinese ministries for the "universal periodic review" conducted under the U.N. Human Rights Council. He stressed China's progress in poverty eradication, said citizens engage in "democratic elections" and gave assurance that freedom of religious belief is safeguarded.

"China upholds respect for and protection of human rights as a task of importance in state governance," Chen said through an interpreter. "We have embarked on a path of human rights development that is in keeping with the trend of the times and appropriate to China's national conditions and so-called historic achievements in this process."

"We uphold the people-centered philosophy and strive to deliver a better life for all the people," he said.

An extraordinarily high number of more than 160 countries — some critics of Beijing, some allies — registered to take part in the discussion. That meant each country had a maximum of 45 seconds to speak, forcing some ambassadors into what at times felt like a speed-reading exercise.

China's delegation had a total of 70 minutes to make its case.

The review process, which encourages constructive recommendations over sharp criticism, nevertheless gave way to firm, if not scathing, advice to China from some leading Western countries, while some of China's friends rallied to its defense.

Ambassador Leslie Norton of Canada urged China to end "enforced disappearances targeting human rights defenders, ethnic minorities and Falun Gong practitioners." Falun Gong is a spiritual movement.

Czech Ambassador Vaclav Balek said China needed to stop "the criminalization of religious and peaceful civil expression" and "cross-border kidnappings and intimidating Chinese citizens living abroad." Slovenian Ambassador Anita Pipan recommended that China "establish a moratorium on the death penalty."

U.K. Ambassador Simon Manley called for a halt to the prosecution of Jimmy Lai, a former Hong Kong publisher who is on trial for alleged national security violations, and an end to the forced repatriation of North Koreans who fled into China.

Kozo Honsei, Japan's deputy permanent representative in Geneva, called for better protection of the rights of minorities in Tibet and northwestern China's Xinjiang region. U.S. Ambassador Michele Taylor presented a list of concerns, concluding with, "We condemn the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang and transnational repression to silence individuals abroad."

Some independent organizations and the United States have accused China of genocide against minority Muslim Uyghurs in Xinjiang, but no U.N. bodies have affirmed that. China lashed out at a 2022 report by the U.N.'s then-human rights chief citing possible crimes against humanity committed in the region.

The hearing offered a wide-ranging look at the human rights situation in China. Bolivia's envoy commended China's efforts to reduce deforestation, Burundi's representative urged China to improve access to health care in central regions and to better housing in Hong Kong and Macao, and Iran praised China's "national action plan for human rights."

First secretary Ilia Barmin of Russia's diplomatic mission advised China "to consistently improve the understanding and capacity of citizens to use standard spoken and written Chinese in Xinjiang."

Many developing-world countries praised China's policies on issues like poverty reduction and economic development policies while also offering suggestions to Beijing. Frankye Bronwen Levy, political affairs counselor for South Africa, called on China to strengthen an anti-domestic violence law passed eight years ago.

Hilary Power, the Geneva director of Human Rights Watch, called it "utterly shameful" that many countries opted to "use their platform at the U.N.'s top human rights body to praise Beijing's rights record, or stay silent in the face of well-documented grave crimes."

The "universal periodic review" puts all U.N. member states up for scrutiny – at times sharp – by other countries roughly every five years. The 3 1/2-hour discussion aims to offer constructive criticism and to yield a written report with recommendations. On Monday, countries examined Saudi Arabia's rights record.

At China's last review in 2018, the United States and other countries voiced concerns about its treatment of Muslim Uyghurs in Xinjiang.

Groups that included Falun Gong practitioners, Uyghurs and pro-Tibet activists held small demonstrations outside the U.N. Geneva compound during Tuesday's discussion. Inside, roughly 100 activists from nongovernmental groups attended the session or watched it from a "spillover room" in the vast complex, officials said.

Another advocacy group sent representatives to speak out against the forced repatriation from China of women from North Korea who fled the nation under leader Kim Jong Un's rule.

China's human rights record criticised at UN as it faces rare scrutiny of policies

23 January 2024, The Guardian

The UK, the US and several other countries criticised China's human rights record on Tuesday as the country was subjected to rare scrutiny of its policies at the United Nations.

The UK called on China to "cease the persecution and arbitrary detention of Uyghurs and Tibetans and allow genuine freedom of religion or belief and cultural expression without fear of surveillance, torture, forced labour or sexual violence", while the US said China should "release all arbitrarily detained individuals" and cease the operation of "forcible assimilation policies including boarding schools in Tibet and Xinjiang".

The UK also recommended that the national security law in Hong Kong be repealed and specifically called for the prosecution of the pro-democracy activist Jimmy Lai to be dropped.

The recommendations were made as part of the UN Human Rights Council's universal periodic review, a mechanism by which the 193 UN member states review each others' human rights records every five years.

Each country at the UN headquarters in Geneva was given 45 seconds to make recommendations based on China's human rights records since 2018. In that period, huge protests against the tightening grip of the Chinese Communist party (CCP) in Hong Kong prompted the imposition of a national security law that critics say criminalises dissent, and there has been increased international scrutiny of the human rights situation in Xinjiang, as well as growing concern about transnational repression as activists in the US, the UK and other countries have been targeted by Chinese authorities or agents.

Responding to the recommendations, China's UN ambassador, Chen Xu, said concerns were caused by "misunderstanding or misinformation".

Chen said: "A few countries groundlessly accuse and smear China, based not on facts but on ideological bias and unfounded rumours and lies."

Tuesday's meeting was the first time China has been through the review process since the UN's report on Xinjiang was published in August 2022. The long-delayed report, which was written by the outgoing human rights commissioner Michelle Bachelet, found China was committing "serious human rights violations" against Uyghurs in Xinjiang. Beijing described it as "disinformation".

Several countries brought up China's policies in Xinjiang during Tuesday's meeting. The region, along with Tibet, has become a byword for Beijing's repressive human rights policies, particularly towards religious and ethnic minorities.

Human rights activists said that the fact that several countries mentioned Tibet in this year's review bucked a recent trend of the region not being spoken about on the international stage.

Many smaller countries, or countries that are economically dependent on China, praised China's rights record, in particular its success at lifting tens of millions of people out of poverty since 2018.

Ethiopia said it "applauds China for improving the criminal litigation system", while Iran said: "We appreciate the economic programmes implemented by the government of China with the aim of promoting social, cultural and economic rights."

Bhutan, a small, landlocked country between India and China that has recently been warming its relationship with Beijing, said: "We commend the significant progress in poverty alleviation and the achievement of the poverty reduction target of the 2030 agenda ahead of schedule."

Speaking after the UN session, Sophie Richardson, a former China director for Human Rights Watch, said: "We increasingly hear Chinese government rhetoric in the recommendations made by governments, I think indicating a level of control over the process or influence over the process, and that's problematic."

Zumretay Arkin, the spokesperson for the World Uyghur Congress, criticised central Asian countries for failing to speak out against the abuse of Uyghurs, Kazakhs and other minorities in Xinjiang and said: "Muslim-majority countries have failed the Uyghurs."

China's foreign ministry has been approached for comment.

Xi Jinping urges loyalty from China's courts and law enforcers to 'defuse' social and financial risks

15 January 2024, South China Morning Post

Chinese President Xi Jinping has urged the country's judicial and law enforcement authorities to safeguard national security, calling on the courts, prosecutors and public security authorities to "defuse" social and economic risks, and for their continued loyalty to the Communist Party.

Xi's instructions were delivered during a two-day national conference over the weekend for the country's zhengfa departments – the political and legal authorities responsible for domestic security.

The instructions were delivered at the virtual meeting by Chen Wenqing, the head of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission, a party body that oversees all security-related matters, according to state news agency Xinhua. Xi did not address the meeting in person.

In his instructions, Xi said judicial and law enforcement departments should "uphold the absolute leadership" of the party, and use their development to support and serve China's modernisation.

He said they should provide strong security guarantees for "the comprehensive advancement of the construction of a strong nation and the great cause of national rejuvenation".

Beijing has been placing growing significance on national security, especially over the past year. Xi has also repeated the significance of security issues at high-level meetings.

Xi urged the departments to "resolutely safeguard national security" and "prevent and resolve major security risks".

He also called for efforts to "resolutely maintain social stability" and "correctly handle internal conflicts among the people", noting that the "Fengqiao experience in the new era" should be upheld and developed.

The "Fengqiao experience" refers to a mechanism for mobilising the masses to settle social conflicts at the grass-roots level without needing to involve higher legal bodies. The concept dates back to the times of Mao Zedong and has been promoted by Xi as an integral part of improving social governance.

Xi also stressed the need to maintain order in the socialist market economy, and improve the business environment based on the rule of law.

He called for strengthening the party's political construction of the judicial and law enforcement departments to "forge a loyal, clean and responsible iron army".

Public Security Minister Wang Xiaohong presided over the meeting, which was also attended by Zhang Jun, president of the Supreme People's Court, and Ying Yong, procurator-general of the Supreme People's Procuratorate.

The meeting also focused on emerging economic crimes, and punishment for offenders who disrupt the country's socialist market economy, such as by violating financial management rules, financial fraud, and infringing on intellectual property rights, according to state media reports.

Participants also discussed the need to step up a crackdown on telecoms fraud and cross-border gambling.

China Builds Spy Stations in Mountains on Disputed Border

15 January 2024, Newsweek

China has been building new radar and electronic warfare facilities in the mountains along its long, disputed border with India, recent satellite imagery revealed.

An expansive radome—a structure housing radar and other signals intelligence equipment—is under construction at Lake Mansarovar in its southwestern Tibet region, according to stills captured this month.

The facility appeared to be equipped with dedicated solar arrays to ensure a sustained power supply, photographs from Sinergise's Sentinel Hub website showed. The service hosts images from the Sentinel-2 satellite of the European Union's Copernicus Earth observation program.

China and India have been locked in an escalated military standoff for nearly four years since a deadly border clash in the summer of 2020, itself a result of their decades-long unsettled Himalayan boundary.

The buildup of military infrastructure is thought to be part of the People's Liberation Army's broader strategy of enhancing its intelligence gathering and electronic warfare capabilities, with both forces deployed in the mountainous regions throughout the year.

In a report last September, Kartik Bommakanti, a senior fellow with the Observer Research Foundation think tank in New Delhi, described the PLA's electronic warfare regiment as multifaceted, capable of electromagnetic attacks and jamming, long-distance electronic surveillance, as well as cyber operations and communications near the border.

The regiment had a similar setup to Russia's reconnaissance and fire system, suggesting that the Chinese military units would likely provide support to artillery and air defense brigades within the PLA Ground Force.

India, however, is far from idle. Air Chief Marshal Vivek Ram Chaudhari of the Indian Air Force has disclosed ambitious plans to bolster frontier defenses with locally produced military technology. They would include mountain radars that would extend India's vision deep into neighboring territory, he said last fall.

It is part of an India's air force modernization program that will also include the introduction of autonomous combat and reconnaissance drones in the coming years.

Other capabilities will include long-range surface-to-air missile systems, fighter jets, helicopters, and ballistic missiles, Chaudhari said in his briefing, which emphasized New Delhi's desire to reduce its traditional reliance on foreign hardware in favor of enhancing its domestic defense industry.

Addressing concerns regarding the Chinese military buildup across the 2,300-mile Line of Actual Control, Chaudhari said India was constantly monitoring developments with intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance.

The Center for International and Strategic Studies, a think tank in Washington, D.C., reported on the construction of another listening post in an analysis published in November 2022.

The new radome, first captured by satellites in late 2021, sits atop a mountain peak north of Lake Mansarovar and houses high-frequency towers and at least one support building, with the groundwork for other structures already underway.

The CSIS report speculated that the radome could serve signals intelligence collection and satellite communications, supplementing another existing facility by Pangong Tso Lake on the disputed border, near the valley where Chinese and Indian soldiers fought in 2020.

China's patriotic education law a bad news for ethnic minority areas

(TibetanReview.net, Jan06'24) – China ushered in the year 2024 with the implementation of its Patriotic Education Law, which was adopted by its rubberstamp parliament in Oct 2023. The sweeping new law aims to get families, schools, companies, international institutions, and especially religious centres and ethnic minority areas, to deepen patriotism in the Communist Party of China (CPC)-state.

In particular, the law is seen as being directed at cracking down on people embracing ideas of liberal democracy and human rights. In the case of ethnic minority regions, it will give a new fillip to the ongoing assimilation drive being carried out in the name of Sinicization of religion, education, and so forth.

Under the new law, schools must include patriotic education in their curriculum, while companies must do so in their operations, such as business management and staff training. Parents should also “include love of the motherland in family education”, says the law.

Besides, measures will be taken to strengthen patriotism among residents in Hong Kong and Macau, beef up publicity and education on unifying China, and strengthening communication with overseas Chinese and Taiwan residents, noted the straitstimes.com Jan 4.

As in the case of schools, the new law requires religious groups and places of religious activities to conduct patriotic education, with the aim to strengthen national awareness among clergy and believers and guide religions to align with socialist society, noted the voanews.com Jan 5.

Late last month, on Christmas Eve, China’s top political adviser, Wang Huning, delivered a stern message to Christian leaders, urging “strict” management of religious affairs and unwavering allegiance to the Communist Party’s vision for Christianity, the report noted.

Outlining a clear vision for the future of Christianity in China, Wang has made it clear that religious leaders must “adhere to the direction of Sinicization of Christianity.”

The Sinicization campaign applies, of course, to all religions and, all the more, to the ethnic minority areas where the focus will be on assimilation.

Besides, under the new law, insulting national symbols such as China’s flag, emblem and the country’s heroes and martyrs will attract punishment. Assistant Professor Dylan Loh at the Nanyang Technological University’s Public Policy and Global Affairs programme has said the law came about as the CPC had “identified risks, particularly among some disenfranchised and politically apathetic youths”.

“It is clearly unacceptable to depart from CPC hagiography and ideology, such as embracing Western ideas of democracy, freedom of speech.

“But now it is increasingly a problem for the party that people don’t care and want to make as much money as possible. That, seen through the party’s eyes, is also equally threatening for the legitimacy and longevity of the party,” the straitstimes.com report quoted the China expert as saying.

The report noted that reactions to the new law have been mixed, with netizens leaving both supportive comments and questions on whether love for a country should be enforced.

Some netizens have also taken a dig at party officials with family members who have migrated to the United States or are currently studying there, and asked if that is patriotism.

Some parents have expressed concern that students’ learning will be affected by the changes.

A parent in Beijing, named only as Mrs Fan, has said she was concerned that any changes will “affect the development of critical thinking skills in schools”; that schools may not allow probing questions about Chinese history.

Even Mr Li Yong, 42, a project manager at a state-owned enterprise and who supports the new law, sees a downside in the changes, saying, “I guess if there’s one thing I’m worried about, it is that the new law will mean more homework for my daughter. She is busy enough at school.”

‘No one is safe’: China purges record number of senior officials in 2023, with more ‘tigers’ likely to fall

China’s battle against corruption set new records last year, with the ruling Communist Party’s anti-corruption watchdog launching probes into 45 senior officials, according to a tally by the South China Morning Post.

The record number of investigations came five years after Chinese President Xi Jinping declared a “crushing victory” in his war on corruption, a sweeping crackdown that was launched in 2013. The ongoing probe signals that he has little interest in letting up on an effort to clean up China’s officialdom while pushing authorities ever harder to implement his policies.

The number of senior-level investigations launched in 2023 jumped by 40 per cent compared with 2022, when the Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) – China’s top anti corruption agency – recorded 32 investigations into high-ranking officials, based on official announcements by the CCDI.

Most of the subjects who were placed under investigation – sometimes referred to as “tigers” – belonged to a pool of officials known as “centrally managed cadres”, meaning they held ranks at the deputy ministerial level or above. A smaller number of them held slightly lower ranks but occupied key positions in important sectors.

Unlike their subordinates who are managed and supervised by the local branches of the party’s organisation and disciplinary agency, the group of senior officials are under direct management of the Communist Party’s Central Organisation Department, its top personnel body. If any wrongdoing is found, they would face top level investigations from the CCDI.

Twenty-seven of the 45 senior cadres who had faced detention by the disciplinary watchdog were found to have retired from their positions when they faced investigation, according to further research.

Deng Yuwen, a former deputy editor at the Study Times, official newspaper of the Central Party School where cadres are trained, said the fact that most of the CCDI's investigations focused on retired officials signalled that the probes uncovered more misconduct before Xi took power, and that such retirements would not allow the individuals to avoid further investigation.

"Among the officials arrested in recent years, not many were caught for corruption in their current positions. Most of the problems occurred in the past few years, or even more than 10, 20 years ago. The CCDI is no longer following the previous unspoken rule that retired officials will be spared from investigation," he said.

"Now, no one is safe. As Xi digs deeper, he just finds more problems that accumulated over the past three decades due to rapid economic development and lax party discipline. And there is no sign of him stopping the digging."

A total of 294 senior officials have been sacked by the CCDI in the 11 years since the anti-corruption campaign was launched, according to the Post's count.

However, this number does not include most of the corruption probes in the Chinese military, which conducts its own investigations through the Discipline Inspection Commission. The agency, which operates within China's top military command – the Central Military Commission (CMC) – led by Xi, operates under extreme secrecy.

Beijing announces such cases very selectively, as it did for the investigations of former CMC deputy chairmen Xu Caihou and Guo Boxiong during Xi's first presidential term. They were the highest ranking officers in the People's Liberation Army to be targeted since the anti-corruption drive began.

Before 2023, the most senior officials investigated in a single year by the CCDI had been in 2014, when 38 individuals were targeted.

In 2020, 18 officials were placed under investigation. But since then, the annual tally has been rising: 25 high ranking officials were investigated in 2021, and 32 in 2022.

On Saturday, the National People's Congress, China's top legislative body, announced the dismissal of nine generals.

Five of the officers were either past or current top commanders in the PLA Rocket Force, a key component of the country's nuclear arsenal. They included Li Yuchao, who had commanded the rocket force from January last year until he was replaced in July, and his former deputy, Zhang Zhenzhong.

Beijing has not confirmed if any of the nine men were under investigation for alleged corruption, although some were reportedly being probed earlier last year. A political researcher at Peking University said there were many obvious signs that suggest that China's "tiger hunt" will expand even further in 2024.

"We have the removal of [former foreign minister] Qin Gang and [former defence minister] Li Shangfu. We also saw the National People's Congress just officially dismiss nine PLA generals, indicating a sweeping investigation in the military has got preliminary results," said the researcher, who declined to be named due to the sensitivity of the matter.

No reasons have been provided for the dismissals of Qin and Li, who were both stripped of their positions last year.

"I suspect only a tiny amount of information regarding these cases will be released to the public, just for minimal formalities."

The CCDI will begin its third plenum from next Monday to lay out the work priorities in the new year for tens of millions of discipline inspectors across the country.

China's cadres urged to connect with the masses as part of education campaign, but some question its methods

02 January 2024, South China Morning Post

After hearing complaints about local water quality in the southeastern city of Hefei, the provincial party boss visited the neighbourhood to take a sip from the tap – as reporters and camera crews looked on – to assure residents it was safe to drink.

The gesture by Anhui province's Communist Party secretary Han Jun was one of several covered by state-run media in recent months to show how party leaders have put into practice President Xi Jinping's teachings about connecting with the masses.

According to the Anhui Daily, Han's unannounced visit to the community was an example of how senior cadres had "put people's interests first" by visiting residents to address their grievances – an idea Xi first promoted 35 years ago when he became party chief of the city of Ningde in the southeastern province of Fujian.

To mark the anniversary of the practice, Xi's teachings have been promoted as part of an education campaign for cadres. In late December, hundreds of officials gathered in Beijing to attend a forum chaired by Politburo member Li Ganjie, with similar events held around the country.

However, while cadres are studying and imitating Xi's ideas on how to connect with the masses, which have been dubbed the "four downs" in a reference to going "down to the grass roots", some question the effectiveness of the methods and the education campaign.

A video of Anhui party boss Han taking a swig of Hefei tap water attracted plenty of "thumbs up" reactions on social media. But the 47,000 comments posted below the clip included many who appeared confused, with some asking how Han could check the quality of the water by drinking it.

Alfred Wu, associate professor at the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, also questioned Han's actions, noting that testing water quality was not part of the professional skills or job duties of a provincial party secretary.

Xi's ideas on the "four downs" have been widely taught among the party's rank and file. The teachings include bringing the party's policy down the masses, as well as receiving petitions from the people and working among the masses and at the grass-roots level.

An official who took part in the education campaign in Fujian province and asked to remain anonymous said the latest round of training, which began in September, focused on officials at the prefecture and county level with a closer working relationship with local communities.

When asked about the education campaign, responses from junior officials ranged from supportive to dismissive.

"I do believe the 'down to grass roots level' campaign is effective in solving people's problems," said a recent university graduate who is now a civil servant in the northern province of Jilin.

"I took part in a campaign to promote production safety for businesses such as the use of firefighting equipment," said the civil servant, who also asked to remain anonymous. "I think our visits did help enhance people's knowledge in this regard."

Others rejected the visits to local communities as publicity stunts or political shows.

One local civil servant in the southwestern province of Sichuan said, "What's the point of conducting such investigations?"

"We were all told about them in advance so everything was well prepared ahead of the visits," she said.

"It only adds to the burden of us grass-roots civil servants because we have to prepare all the documents and materials for these investigations by the senior cadres."

Wu of the National University of Singapore said there might be a gap between what top leaders in Beijing envisioned for the campaign and the reality on the ground.

"It can be a beautiful vision when the campaign is launched but cadres in the grass roots level may see it differently," Wu said.

"The Chinese [governance] system is very top-down and sometimes local cadres only want to appease their bosses and check the box, independent of whether the problems are solved," he added.

Compared with previous political drives, the latest education campaign, which is expected to end this month, has emphasised regular visits by senior cadres to the masses as part of the doctrine of Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era.

In November, the Central Commission of Discipline Inspection, the party's top disciplinary body, published an article warning cadres that they must take the investigation mandate seriously and avoid "ills such as formalism" – a term that refers to performing duties in a perfunctory manner – that would add to the burden of junior cadres.

Li Chuncheng, a professor at the School of International Relations and Public Affairs of Fudan University in Shanghai, said party elites could better address problems such as formalism by having the disciplinary watchdog supervise grass-roots inspections and visits by officials.

"There are two inspection mechanisms that can be used to regulate formalism," Li said.

"The first is to incorporate formalism into the scope of inspection work of the disciplinary inspection commission. The second one is to set up a dialogue channel between policymakers [at the top] and the cadres responsible for implementation [at the lower level]."

"But the disciplinary commission now only oversees disciplinary matters and there is no dialogue mechanism in the current bureaucracy."

Wu said it would be hard to assess how effective the campaign had been without independent studies or public polls.

"I think Xi wants to use the campaign as a tool to increase his prestige and popularity among the cadres and the people, but it's hard for us to verify if Xi's goal is achieved with the lack of poll results in China," Wu said.

China completes building highest-altitude, largest-capacity hydropower project in Yellow River basin in Qinghai

China said Dec 30 that it was set to complete today the final testing of the second unit of the Maerdang Hydropower Station, the highest-altitude and largest-capacity hydropower project under construction in the Yellow River basin, located in Qinghai province. The first unit was put into operation in April this year. There are no available details about the relocation of local Tibetans from the building of this major dam project which began in 2011 at Marteng (Chinese: Maerdang) in Ragya (Lajia) Town of Machen (Maqen) County, Golog (Guoluo) Prefecture.

A research on the Longyangxia reservoir, also in Qinghai province, by Jarmila Ptackova from the Oriental Institute of the Czech Academy of Sciences, Prague, Czech Republic, in 2016 stated that the building of other dams in the province – Bingling, Jishixia, Dahejia, Huangfeng, Banduo, Yangdian, Maerdang, Shitouxia and Nazixia – will require the further relocation of 51,855 people by 2020.

On Dec 31, the five turbine generators, including four 550,000-kilowatt units and one 120,000-kilowatt unit, will be put into operation to generate electricity, reported China's official globaltimes.cn Dec 30, citing China Group Media.

Located at an average altitude of 3,300 metres, the hydropower station has a total installed capacity of 2.32 million kilowatts. To harness the power of the fast-flowing water, the Maerdang Hydroelectric Station was built in a steep canyon, the report said.

Located in a nature reserve, the report claims that the construction of the hydropower station aimed to minimize its impact on local wildlife, providing some details about measures that had been taken for the purpose.

"Due to its challenging high-altitude terrain, the Maerdang Hydropower Station only began construction in recent years. Its completion and operation represent a major technological milestone," Lin Boqiang, director of the China Centre for Energy Economics Research at Xiamen University, has said.

China approves Tibet mega dam that could generate 3 times more power than Three Gorges

26 December 2024, SCMP, Holly Chik

Hydropower project on Yarlung Tsangpo River could get unprecedented investment to tackle daunting engineering challenges

China has approved the construction of a colossal hydropower project on Tibet's longest river that could generate three times more energy than the Three Gorges Dam, state news agency Xinhua reported on Wednesday.

The mega hydropower project, set to be built on the Yarlung Tsangpo River in Tibet autonomous region, presents unprecedented engineering challenges.

Total investment in the dam could exceed 1 trillion yuan (US$137 billion), which would dwarf any other single infrastructure project on the planet.

The report did not specify when construction would begin, or where it would take place.

The Yarlung Tsangpo flows across the Tibetan Plateau, carving out the deepest canyon on Earth and falling a staggering 7,667 metres (25,154 feet), before reaching India, where it is known as the Brahmaputra River

The dam will be built in one of the rainiest parts of mainland China.

The project is expected to generate nearly 300 billion kilowatt-hours (kWh) of electricity annually. By contrast, the Three Gorges Dam, which now has the world's largest installed capacity, was designed to produce 88.2 billion kWh.

In 2020, Yan Zhiyong, then chairman of state-owned Power Construction Corporation of China, said the location on the Yarlung Tsangpo was one of the most hydropower-rich areas in the world.

"The lower reaches area features a vertical drop of 2,000 metres over a 50km (31 miles) distance, representing nearly 70 million kilowatts of resources that could be developed – that is more than three Three Gorges Dams with an installed capacity of 22.5 million kilowatts," he said.

To harness the hydropower potential of the river, four to six 20km-long tunnels must be drilled through the Namcha Barwa mountain to divert half of the river's flow at about 2,000 cubic metres per second.

Additionally, the project site is located along a tectonic plate boundary where earthquakes may occur, and the geology of the plateau differs significantly from that of the plains.

According to a 2023 report, the hydropower station is expected to generate over 300 billion kWh of electricity each year – enough to meet the annual needs of more than 300 million people.

Xinhua said the hydropower project would prioritise environmental protection.

"Through extensive geological exploration and technical advancements, a solid foundation has been laid for the science-based, secure and high-quality development of the project," it said.

The dam would also drive the development of nearby solar and wind energy resources, adding to the region's clean energy base, Xinhua reported.

"This represents a major move in China's green and low-carbon energy transition," the report said.

"It is also of great importance to advancing the country's strategy for carbon peaking and carbon neutrality and to coping with global climate change."

Beijing first announced plans to build the dam in 2020, raising concerns in India about its impact on the country's water and food security. Some also worry that China could weaponise water by using it to cause floods or induce droughts.

However, a 2023 study by scientists at Tsinghua University's department of hydraulic engineering said the project could benefit China, India and Bangladesh if the countries were to cooperate.

The researchers said reservoir storage could increase the minimum water flow during the dry season and add one to four navigable months per year for the Indian portion of the river.

Using reservoir storage to manage flood peaks can reduce flood-affected areas by as much as 32.6 per cent in India and 14.8 per cent in Bangladesh, according to the study.

"The construction of [a] mainstream cascade hydropower system with reservoir storage would have enormous benefits for hydropower development, waterway navigation and agricultural production in the Yarlung Tsangpo-Brahmaputra River basin," they wrote in the peer-reviewed Journal of Hydrology: Regional Studies.

Satellite images show huge construction activity on Chinese side near Arunachal Pradesh

21 December 2024, Eastern Sentinel

Amid ongoing debates between the state government and anti-dam activists, villagers over the Siang Upper Multipurpose Project, recent satellite images from Google Maps reveal significant construction activities near the Chinese-occupied Tibet region, close to Indian territory (Arunachal Pradesh). These developments are occurring on the left bank of the Yarlung Tsangpo River, known as the Siang River in Arunachal Pradesh and the Brahmaputra in Assam.

In his recent visit to Boleng in Siang district, Chief Minister Pema Khandu reiterated that the Siang project is a central initiative and will be executed to counter potential threats from China. Khandu revealed that China has approved the construction of a massive project capable of generating 60,000 MW of power on the Yarlung Tsangpo, just upstream from its entry point into India at Tuting in Upper Siang district.

Satellite images depict extensive activities near the left bank of the Yarlung Tsangpo, including heavy machinery, excavators, cylindrical structures, and blue painted camp-like formations. As per the Google Map, the construction site lies approximately 5km from the nearest ITBP post in Gelling, Upper Siang, 5.75 km from Gelling village the last Circle HQ in Tuting under Upper Siang District, 1.62 km from the McMahon Line, 35 km from Medog town in the Nyingchi region of the Tibet Autonomous Region, China.

However, the images also show significant earth-cutting work, road formations, and landslides, although the exact purpose of these activities remains unclear. The presence of massive vehicles and camps has fueled speculation about China's alleged mega-dam construction project, as claimed by CM Khandu in his recent speech, or could be a road development project near McMahon Line.

CM Khandu also added that, the Chinese government, which is not signatory to the International Water Conventions, intends to divert the water from the multiple water reservoirs to be created under the project to dry regions of Tibet and elsewhere in the country.

"In such a scenario it is inevitable that volume of water in Siang river will drastically get reduced so much so that during winters you will be able to cross the mighty Siang on foot. If China releases water from their dams all of a sudden, a trail of unimaginable destruction will sweep through the Siang belt, Assam and Bangladesh," said CM in his recent speech at Boleng.

Reiterating that Arunachal Pradesh has about 50% of the country's hydropower potential, Khandu informed that the 12500 MW that would be generated from the projects for which MoUs have been signed with PSUs will generate about Rs 10000 crores annually for the state exchequer.

"Please be informed that the 12500 MW, I am mentioning does not include the Siang project. We do not know yet the amount of power that this project will generate if at all executed," Khandu added.

New flight to connect Tibet's capital with Singapore

Experts see move as part of China's strategy to wield greater influence in Southeast Asia.

Come Christmas Day, Tibet's capital will see its first flight to Singapore take off from Lhasa Gonggar International Airport in a move the Chinese government says is aimed at boosting tourism, economic growth and fostering cultural exchanges.

This is the second international flight to be launched from Lhasa. In December last year, China allowed Nepal's Himalaya Airlines to resume international flights linking Lhasa with Kathmandu.

West Air, a unit of China's state-owned HNA Aviation Group, will operate three round-trip flights per week that connect the Tibetan plateau with the Southeast Asian island nation via a transit stop at the southwestern Chinese city of Chongqing, the company said in a statement.

Additional international routes from Lhasa to Hong Kong and other destinations are also expected to be launched early next year, according to the regional civil aviation administration office of the Tibet Autonomous Region, or TAR.

The opening of international air routes will enhance Tibet's "international visibility, attracting more domestic and foreign tourists to explore the region, and it will also further expand the regional tourism market," said Wang Yueyue of the TAR's Culture and Tourism Department.

Southeast Asia influence

Analysts believe the move to add a flight to Singapore — one of the most supportive partners in China's ambitious Belt and Road Initiative — is in line with Beijing's efforts to strengthen ties with Southeast Asian nations and exude more influence in the region.

The initiative is a Chinese development strategy to improve trade, infrastructure, investment links and regional integration between Asia, Africa and Europe.

"As a major economy in the region, Singapore offers China significant economic leverage and connectivity advantages, which can help solidify Beijing's influence across Southeast Asia," Sana Hashmi, a postdoctoral fellow at the Taipei-based Taiwan-Asia Exchange Foundation, told Radio Free Asia.

In a statement, West Air said the new route will serve as a bridge linking western China and the ASEAN region, creating an “air corridor” for the development of a new land-sea corridor in the west.

“Looking ahead, West Air will expand its investments in ‘Belt and Road’ countries and open additional routes to meet growing passenger demand while supporting national strategies and regional development,” the company added.

Chinese government officials have repeatedly emphasized the importance of Tibet to China’s Belt and Road initiative, citing Tibet’s geographical advantages and serving as a ‘gateway to South Asia.’

Foreign Minister Wang Yi in 2021 also made promises to support Tibet’s opening-up and deepen its cooperation with neighboring countries to jointly contribute to Belt and Road projects.

Tibet travel challenges

But international tourists going to Lhasa must still obtain special Tibet travel permits, in addition to a Chinese visa – and other permits if going elsewhere in the TAR.

“While additional flight connectivity is useful, it does not address the essential issue about traveling to and from Tibet which is government scrutiny and travel permits,” said Manoj Kewalramani, a fellow in China studies at Bengaluru, India-based Takshishila Institution.

China and Singapore implemented a visa-free entry policy, with up to 30 days of stay allowed for their citizens traveling for family, tourism or business purposes.

But to enter Tibet, they must possess a Tibet travel permit, which tour operators obtain by submitting applications on their behalf.

Foreign tourists must also stick with group tours. Independent travel in Tibet is prohibited.

For travel outside Lhasa city to other parts of the TAR such as Shigatse or Shannan, visitors are required to apply for an additional permit referred to as the Aliens’ Travel Permit, issued by the Public Security Bureau.

For travel to border areas or sensitive military zones such as Mount Kailash or Lake Manasarovar in Ngari region, visitors require a Military Area Entry Permit and a Foreign Affairs Permit, issued by the respective offices in Lhasa.

Travel to other sensitive areas requires an additional permit from the local cultural antiquities department.

China has expanded its nuclear force and strengthened ties to Russia, the Pentagon says

19 December 2024, AP News, Lolita C. Baldor

China is expanding its nuclear force, has increased military pressure against Taiwan and has strengthened its ties with Russia over the past year, according to a Pentagon report Wednesday that details actions accelerating key areas of conflict with the United States.

The report, however, also notes that the recent rash of corruption allegations within China’s powerful Central Military Commission, which oversees the People’s Liberation Army, is hurting Beijing’s military growth and could slow its campaign to modernize.

The impact, said a senior defense official, is a bit of a mixed bag because while there has been progress in some programs, China has slid back in others.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity to describe the U.S. assessment, warned that Beijing is working toward developing a more diverse and technologically sophisticated nuclear force. While the expected number of nuclear warheads has maintained consistent growth, China is broadening its targeting abilities.

Beijing is going to be able to go after more and different types of targets, do greater damage and have more options for multiple rounds of counterstrikes, the official said. The U.S. is urging China to be more transparent about its nuclear program, while also warning that America will defend its allies and take appropriate steps in response.

According to the report, which provides the annual U.S. assessment of China’s military power and is required by Congress, China had more than 600 operational nuclear warheads as of May, and the U.S. expects it will have more than 1,000 by 2030.

The Chinese Embassy, in response, said China has always “firmly adhered to a nuclear strategy of self-defense,” follows the no-first-use nuclear policy and maintains its nuclear capabilities at the minimum level required for national security.

Liu Pengyu, the embassy spokesman, said such annual reports by the Pentagon are “filled with ‘Cold-War’ thinking and zero-sum game mentality, which China firmly opposes.”

The Biden administration has worked to maintain a balance with China, building up the U.S. military presence in the Asia-Pacific region to be ready to counter Beijing while also encouraging increased communications between the two countries at the diplomatic and military levels.

That uptick in talks has coincided with a decrease in coercive and risky intercepts of U.S. aircraft since late 2023, compared with the previous two years. China still, however, does what the U.S. military considers “unsafe” flights near American and allied forces in the region.

The Pentagon’s national defense strategy is built around China being the greatest security challenge for the U.S., and the threat from Beijing influences how the U.S. military is equipped and organized for the future.

The corruption within the PLA has resulted in at least 15 high-ranking officials being ousted in a major shakeup of China's defense establishment.

"This wave of corruption touches every service in the PLA, and it may have shaken Beijing's confidence," the report said.

In June, China announced that former Defense Minister Li Shangfu and his predecessor, Wei Fenghe, were expelled from the ruling Communist Party and accused of corruption. Last month, another senior official, Miao Hua, was suspended and put under investigation, according to China's Defense Ministry.

The U.S. report points to a persistent increased military presence by China around Taiwan, the self-governing island that China claims as its own. It said China's navy has been in the region more and that there have been increased crossings into the island's air defense identification zone and major military exercises in the area.

Just last week, a large deployment of Chinese navy and coast guard vessels in the waters around Taiwan triggered alarm as Taiwanese officials said it looked like China was simulating a blockade. Officials have said there were as many as 90 ships involved in what Taiwan described as two walls designed to demonstrate that the waters belong to China.

Taiwan split from communist China in 1949 and has rejected Beijing's demands that it accept unification. China says it will do so by force if necessary, and leaders have said they want to be ready to do so by 2027. Beijing also has demanded that Washington not interfere with the Taiwan issue, citing that it is an internal matter.

The United States is obligated under domestic law to help defend Taiwan and give it weapons and technology to deter invasion.

The island democracy has been the chief source of tension between Washington and Beijing for decades and is widely seen as the most likely trigger for a potentially catastrophic U.S.-China war.

More broadly, the report concluded that the PLA continued its drive to develop greater military capabilities but "made uneven progress toward its 2027" milestone for modernization.

One area of expansion, the report said, is with unmanned aerial systems, which officials said are "quickly approaching U.S. standards."

Regarding Russia, the report said China has supported Russia's war against Ukraine and sold Russia dual-use items that Moscow's military industry relies on. Dual use items can be used for both civilian and military purposes.

China has improved military infrastructure and training along LAC: US report

19 December 2024, The New Indian Express, Mayank Singh

In addition to continued PLAA deployments to the Indian border and Burma, the PLAA conducted multiple large-scale exercises in training areas throughout the country.

The US Department of Defence, in its latest report, said that China has improved its training and infrastructure along the Line of Actual Control aimed at long-term sustenance of the troops along the de-facto borders.

Mentioning the People's Liberation Army, the Report says that the PLAA continued to improve its methods and standards of training combined arms units. Training encompassed individual to collective soldier events integrating reconnaissance, infantry, artillery, armour, engineers, and signal units.

In addition to continued PLAA deployments to the Indian border and Burma, the PLAA conducted multiple large-scale exercises in training areas throughout the country.

The 2024 report to the US Congress on the military and security developments involving the People's Republic of China (PRC) covers security and military developments involving the PRC through early 2024.

The report, to elaborate its point about the Chinese actions along the LAC linking it with the military infrastructure spruce-up, gives the background of China's tensions with India along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

LAC - a disputed border between the PRC's western provinces and India's northern provinces—sparked a standoff between PRC and Indian forces in mid-May 2020, which escalated on June 15, 2020, after a skirmish ensued in the Galwan Valley between the Indian Army and PLA forces that ended with 20 Indian soldiers and four PRC soldiers dead.

The two sides agreed to tactical pull-backs from most of the contested areas in early 2021 but standoffs continued at two locations in Ladakh on the Western Sector of the LAC.

In late 2022, PRC and Indian forces engaged in an unarmed clash near Tawang along the Eastern Sector of the LAC separating Tibet and the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

This was the first such clash since the 2020 skirmish although local commanders quickly defused the clash and the overall standoff did not substantively escalate.

"These engagements coincide with a significant and sustained escalation in military infrastructure to support a long-term presence on the LAC," says the DoD.

In late 2023, India hosted the 20th round of commander-level meetings with the PLA. Both sides agreed to maintain communication and dialogue through military and diplomatic channels.

In 2020, PLA Special Operations Forces (SOF) from the Tibet Military Region were deployed to the border with India following clashes between PRC and Indian forces along the LAC, the report adds.

Currently, there has been disengagement from all standoff points in Eastern Ladakh with the latest being those at the Depsang and Demchok in October.

The PRC has defined its core interests, says the report, as issues so central to its national rejuvenation that the official position on them is not subject to negotiation or compromise and this also includes the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

The PRC began using the term in 2003, initially in reference to sovereignty issues regarding Taiwan and later Tibet and Xinjiang. In 2009, the senior PRC official for foreign affairs publicly defined the elements of core interests: 1) preserving the PRC's political system, 2) defending the PRC's sovereignty and territorial claims, and 3) promoting the PRC's economic development.

The list of core interests has grown over the last decade with President Xi increasingly using the terms of a national security law passed in 2015 to extend the formal status of "core interest" to territorial disputes in the South China Sea (SCS), the Senkaku Islands, and the northeastern Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

On the Chinese Military, the report mentions that the Western Theater Command (WTC) is oriented toward India and counterterrorism missions along the PRC's Central Asia borders.

"The WTC focuses on Xinjiang and Tibet Autonomous Regions, where the CCP perceives a high threat of separatism, terrorism, and extremism. The WTC is geographically the largest theater command in the PRC and is responsible for responding to conflict with India, border interactions with Central Asian states, and what the PRC refers to as the "three evil forces" of terrorism, separatism, and extremism in Tibet and Xinjiang.", it says.

The WTC's primary focus is on securing the PRC's border with India. In recent years, differing perceptions between India and the PRC regarding border demarcations have facilitated multiple clashes, force buildups, and military infrastructure construction.

In June 2020, PLA and Indian patrols clashed in Galwan Valley—the most violent clash between the two countries in 45 years. The PLA has not drawn down its positions or troop numbers since the 2020 clash and has built infrastructure and support facilities to maintain multiple BDE deployments along the LAC.

WTC and Indian commanders have held 21 corps commander-level talks since the 2020 clash.

Adding about the modernisation, the PLA has sought to modernize its capabilities and improve its proficiencies across all warfare domains, is "to become a joint force capable of the full range of land, air, and maritime as well as nuclear, space, counter space, electronic warfare, and cyberspace operations.

Despite its progress, the force still has significant deficiencies including in commander proficiency, long-distance logistics, and urban warfare." Added the report.

Chinese military conducts patrol near disputed Scarborough shoal

29 November 2024, RFA

China's air-and-sea patrol took place as a U.S. carrier strike group entered the South China Sea.

The Chinese military held a large-scale maritime and airspace patrol near the Scarborough shoal, a disputed reef in the South China Sea known in China as Huangyan Dao, citing "instability" created by "certain countries."

Scarborough Shoal, known as Bajo de Masinloc in the Philippines, is about 125 nautical miles (232 kilometers) from the main Philippine island of Luzon. China now effectively controls it, even though a landmark international arbitration case in 2016 rejected Beijing's claims to most of the South China Sea.

The People's Liberation Army, or PLA, Southern Theater Command, responsible for the contested waterway, said in a statement on Thursday that navy and air forces were taking part in the "routine training" which included reconnaissance and early warning; and maritime and airspace patrol near the shoal.

The Philippines has not reacted to the news but in the past Manila has repeatedly protested against what it saw as "China's bullying."

Also on Thursday, a U.S. aircraft carrier strike group entered the South China Sea, according to ship-tracking data obtained and analyzed by Radio Free Asia.

Data from the MarineTraffic website show the nuclear-powered USS Abraham Lincoln, or CVN-72, transited the Singapore Strait and entered the South China Sea on Thursday morning before moving northeast. Unusually, the ship has its automatic identification system, which shows its location, turned on.

‘Stirring up trouble’

The Abraham Lincoln carrier strike group also includes Arleigh Burke-class guided missile destroyer USS Frank E. Petersen Jr., and destroyers USS Spruance and USS Michael Murphy.

The destroyers have just visited Thailand and Singapore, and are now “underway conducting routine operations in the U.S. 7th Fleet area of operations,” the U.S. Navy said.

USS Abraham Lincoln is the fifth aircraft carrier of the Nimitz class that comprises the largest warships in the world. The U.S. 7th Fleet is the U.S. Navy’s largest forward-deployed fleet with a continuous presence in the Indo-Pacific for more than 75 years.

The navy said in a news release that the fleet “routinely interacts and operates with allies and partners in preserving a free and open Indo-Pacific region.”

In its statement, the PLA Southern Theater Command criticized “certain countries from outside the region” that were “stirring up trouble” and creating instability in the South China Sea but did not name any country.

It reiterated that China has “indisputable sovereignty” over Huangyan Dao and its surrounding waters, and that Chinese troops would “resolutely” defend national sovereignty and maritime rights.

Western China railroad work progressing smoothly, boosting shared growth

26 November 2024, China Daily

When builders from China Railway No 4 Engineering Group Co Ltd (CREC4) started their work in Gansu province on a railway project in 2022, a young woman of the Tibetan ethnic group approached the technicians, asking, “What is that device you are using?”

The technicians from CREC4 Seventh Engineering were surveying the terrain in Luchu county under Gannan Tibetan autonomous prefecture, preparing to help build the Xining-Chengdu railway, which links Northwest China’s Qinghai and Gansu provinces with Sichuan province in Southwest China.

Seeing the young lady tending her herd, they explained to her the uses of the survey tool and its role in helping construct the railway, which traverses the county sitting on the eastern edge of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

The CREC4 staff members officially started their work on Oct 26, 2022, embarking on their six-yearlong task, with 255 managerial employees and 1,376 construction workers, said Guan Lei, Party secretary for the first division of CREC4’s railway project for the Xining-Chengdu railway.

“We also brought 398 pieces of mechanical equipment into our construction site,” he said, noting that his preliminary research showed the task to be an arduous one, as their bid sits at an elevation of some 3,500 meters above sea level, with some sites surpassing 3,700 meters.

“We have to spare every effort in properly building this national railway infrastructure,” Guan said.

Some months into his work, Guan made a mini-movie – On the Xining-Chengdu Railway, It is No Longer Cold – detailing his colleagues’ combat with the cold weather (-30.6 C at extremes) and the high altitude, which brings a lack of oxygen.

“Despite the cold wind which blows over the plateau, and the snow which falls at an early date, we have progressed well in accordance with our schedule,” he said.

Khamdrug Tso is a native of Lhamosi town in Luchu county and joined the CREC4 project team in July 2022 upon her graduation from Sichuan Vocational and Technical College.

Her dedication to her job in materials management has won her widespread praise from colleagues.

“My sincere thanks go to the CREC4 project department, which not only helps me master my skills, but also hands me 6,300 yuan ($869) each month for my salary, helping improve my family’s income,” she said.

To express her thanks, she brought her friends of the Tibetan ethnic group to an evening party at the project department during the Dragon Boat Festival in 2023, performing traditional Tibetan dances for participants.

Wangchen Tso, a member of the Tibetan ethnic group who is divorced with three children and works as a cleaner for the CREC4 project department, found an anomaly on her kidney during a CREC4 medical examination for staff members.

After undergoing timely treatment at a hospital, Wangchen is now recuperating at home, and the managerial staffer from the CREC4 project department went to comfort her with gifts.

She said she was grateful to the CREC4 project department for her physical examination, which enabled her to have timely treatment, and her income from her job can help her and her three children live better lives.

In addition to building the railway, CREC4 employees help locals of the Tibetan ethnic group overall, said Xing Jiang, an office director from CREC4 Seventh Engineering.

Xing said they leased local machinery and equipment and improved the standardization of local machinery leasing; bought local foodstuffs, hardware and specialty products to enrich local incomes; hired locals to help train engineering and technical personnel; set up shared bookstores and health checking posts to boost local culture; and planted more trees to help improve the local environment.

Chigyung Tashi is Party secretary of Lhamosi town and often pays visits to the CREC4 project department to help solve related problems.

It is expected that the Xining-Chengdu railway will extend for 183.47 kilometers in Gansu, including 69.65 km in Luchu, which will have three stations – Luchu, Tsecha and Lhamosi.

"With the new railway, our town will witness faster rural vitalization," he said, adding that the unit is doing a lot of work for them.

Xing said they are working harmoniously with local colleagues in their daily construction job and in their recreational activities.

One get-together for a drill with the local police and a joint signing ceremony for safety enhancement among the CREC4 staff members this year allowed those from various ethnic groups to develop warm memories, he said.

China opposes using Taiwan question as excuse to strengthen military deployment

25 November 2024, Global Times, Yang Sheng and Liu Xuanzun

The Chinese foreign ministry on Monday expressed opposition to relevant countries using the Taiwan question as an excuse to strengthen military deployment and heighten tensions, as the US is reportedly going to deploy missile units on islands of Japan and the Philippines as part of "contingency plans for a possible future emergency involving Taiwan."

When asked to comment on a report by Japanese media on US plan to work with Japan on contingency plans for a possible future emergency involving Taiwan, including deploying missile units on islands of Japan and the Philippines, Mao Ning, a spokesperson of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said Taiwan is an inalienable part of China's territory, and the Taiwan question is China's internal affair.

"The key to upholding cross-Straits peace and stability is to remain committed to the one-China principle. China firmly opposes relevant countries using the Taiwan question as an excuse to strengthen military deployment in the region, heighten tensions and confrontation, and disturb regional peace and stability."

According to Kyodo News on Monday, quoting sources familiar with Japan-US relations, the US military will set up "temporary bases along Japan's southwestern Nansei island chain and the Philippines" to deploy missile units, and the deployment will be "incorporated in the first joint operation plan for the US and Japan" to cope with a "contingency" involving the Chinese mainland and the island of Taiwan to be formulated in December.

Chinese observers said the deployment matter seems familiar - Japanese media disclose "explosive news" against China but neither Japanese nor US officials respond, which could be their "double act" to test China's reaction while exaggerating regional tensions.

Li Fei, a professor at the Taiwan Research Center at Xiamen University, told the Global Times that the US and its allies like Japan have always tried to test China's bottom-line on the Taiwan question by gradually strengthening their military deployments or military activities in the region, to encourage Taiwan separatists and hype tensions, and also set obstacles for China's reunification efforts. "This is just an old trick with no surprise, and China is prepared," Li said.

Due to the provocations by the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) authorities and the US in recent years, the Chinese military forces have conducted a series of military drills in recent years, and "the more they provoke, the more opportunities will be provided for the Chinese mainland to strengthen its military preparations to solve the problem," Li noted.

The US Marine Littoral Regiment, which possesses a multiple-launch High Mobility Artillery Rocket System (HIMARS), will be deployed along the island chain stretching from the Japanese prefectures of Kagoshima and Okinawa toward the island of Taiwan, according to the sources, Kyodo News reported.

The Japan Self-Defense Forces is expected to mainly engage in logistical support for the US marine unit, including supplying fuel and ammunition. The US Army will deploy the Multi-Domain Task Force's (MDTF) long-range fire units in the Philippines. The MDTF is designed to operate in a multi-domain environment, including air, land, water, space, cyber, and information, according to Kyodo News.

Known in short as HIMARS, the US-made High Mobility Artillery Rocket System has been a focus in media reports due to its deployment in the Russia-Ukraine conflict. It is characterized by its high mobility, high accuracy and long range, but is having lackluster performances recently because the Russians have found counters to it, Fu Qianshao, a Chinese military expert, told the Global Times on Monday.

One counter is drone reconnaissance, and once the HIMARS is spotted, the drone will summon fire strikes to destroy the HIMARS before it relocates, Fu said, noting that another counter is electronic interference. The Washington Post reported in May that many US-made satellite-guided munitions including HIMARS failed to withstand Russian jamming technology. Fu further noted that if the HIMARS is to be deployed on Japanese islands, it will not have enough space like on the Russian-Ukraine battlefield.

Islands have complicated terrains and elevations, and it will not be as easy to become mobile. Another point is that islands have limited defense depths, which means that no matter how the HIMARS maneuvers, it cannot leave the area entirely, so once it is locked on by drones, it will very likely get attacked, Fu said. "On the other hand, the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) forces can launch attacks from the vast depths on the mainland."

Also, the HIMARS is less capable than its Chinese counterparts, Fu noted. Even if the HIMARS to be deployed on the Japanese islands is equipped with the ATACMS tactical missile, the PLA's long-range rocket systems can still outrange it, Fu said.

According to the Kyodo report, the US Army will also deploy the Multi-Domain Task Force's long-range fire units in the Philippines.

Fu said the US' military deployment plan aims to blockade key channels for PLA vessels to enter the West Pacific, such as the Miyako Strait and the Bashi Channel. If these countries dare to launch attacks with weapons like HIMARS, the PLA will launch counterattacks, and their chances of survival will be very low.

The external forces must understand that interfering in the Taiwan question is a dead end, and their military deployment plan cannot change China's capability and determination over the Taiwan question, Fu said.

Tibetan Art Museum wins Supreme Award for Structural Engineering Excellence

15 November 2024, The Engineer

An art museum constructed on the site of a 1960s concrete factory at an altitude of 3,800m has been awarded the 2024 Supreme Award for Structural Engineering Excellence.

The Institution of Structural Engineers (IStructE) awarded the accolade to Tongji Architectural Design (Group) Co., Ltd for their work on the Tibetan Art Museum in Lhasa, Tibet.

Located on the world's highest plateau, the Tibetan Art Museum sits in a remote and ecologically sensitive environment, which presented a number of unique challenges.

A key challenge of the project was upgrading the existing factory buildings, which had insufficient concrete strength, to meet modern seismic standards. Tongji's solutions included strategic strengthening, the installation of damping systems, and base isolation, all designed to work seamlessly with the original structures. According to IStructE, this approach minimised the need for new construction, significantly reducing the environmental impact on the Tibetan Plateau.

Judged across four key pillars - Planet, People, Process, and Profession - IStructE said the Tibetan Art Museum stood out for its commitment to sustainability, minimal intervention, and seismic resilience. The judges praised the project as an 'inspiring example of transformative reuse and seismic strengthening in a challenging environment'.

In addition to the supreme award, 10 other projects were recognised for their contributions to structural engineering, showcasing excellence in areas including innovation, social impact, and sustainability. All winning projects demonstrated the integration of environmentally friendly solutions, with a particular focus on reducing embodied carbon in construction.

In a statement, Professor John Orr, chair of the judging panel and chartered member of the IStructE, said: "A massive congratulations to the Tongji team. Their work on the Tibetan Art Museum exemplifies the critical role that structural engineers play in shaping the future, with the ability to address complex social and environmental challenges. Their ingenuity and precision in seismic retrofitting are truly commendable.

"This year's awards also recognised a wealth of other inspiring projects, all characterised by their intelligent use of materials, circular design principles, and low-carbon construction. Our judging framework, focused on key attributes, highlights how structural engineers are driving innovation towards a safer, more sustainable built environment."

The winners were announced on November 8, 2024 during the awards ceremony in London. A full list of winners and project highlights can be found here.

EU has 'conclusive' proof of armed drones for Russia being made in China: sources

15 November 2024, SCMP, Finbarr Bermingham

The European Union has "conclusive" evidence that armed drones are being produced for the Russian military in China's western Xinjiang region and has demanded answers from Beijing, several diplomatic sources have confirmed.

EU foreign ministers will discuss the intelligence at a meeting in Brussels on Monday, with some of the bloc's 27 member states calling for serious consequences for what would be considered a major uptick in China's support for Russia's military.

While it is unclear at this stage whether this was approved by Beijing, several sources suggested that it would be difficult to conduct business of this nature without the go-ahead from the central government.

"We have had reports from intelligence sources on the existence of a factory inside China producing drones that are shipped to Russia, and used in the war in Ukraine, but we don't have more than that," said a senior EU official.

Multiple EU diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the evidence was "conclusive", "credible" and "convincing", and that there would need to be serious consequences for Beijing.

The senior EU official, however, said three points still needed to be firmly established before it decided on a course of action.

The first is to confirm the basic information in the intelligence, that the factory is producing drones for Russia. The second is whether those drones had been shipped yet. The third is "the level of knowledge of the Chinese authorities".

"It is difficult to believe that this is happening without the knowledge of the [Chinese] authorities - we are putting that question to them," the official said, adding that it had been raised with the Chinese ambassador to the EU.

Since the Russian invasion of Ukraine in February 2022, China has maintained that it is neutral and not a party to the war. Several sources said the new evidence showed that Beijing was definitively on Moscow's side and could no longer claim neutrality in the conflict.

One senior diplomat said the findings would show that China has "always said that you want to be neutral - you are not neutral... you are feeding the beast".

The senior official would not be drawn on specific action the bloc might take in response, but pointed to recent history for examples of how it might move.

"If we finally confirm that there is a transfer of drones, that will have consequences - the same it had with Iran," said the senior EU official, referring to the bloc's sanctioning of Tehran for providing substantial military support to Moscow's war effort.

"We have taken action against all countries cooperating militarily with Russia, first with Belarus, then with Iran... and we are working on DPRK sanctions," they added, referring to North Korea's growing support for Moscow.

For the whole of the war's duration, the EU has urged China to condemn Russia's invasion and insisted that providing military support to Russia would be a "red line".

While there have long been concerns about China's provision to Russia of Western-sanctioned dual-use items - that is, those with both civilian and military uses - the direct supply of arms would take the support to a new level, sources said.

"Now we are apparently a different situation, in which the second part of the story could happen," the senior official said, referring to Beijing crossing the "red line"

The Europeans have raised the matter with Beijing and are ready to take decisive action to punish China if the response is not satisfactory, according to several sources. The senior EU official confirmed that it had reached out to the Chinese ambassador in Brussels and that there would be no deadline on talks, given the severity of the matter.

In September, a Reuters report citing European intelligence agencies found that IEMZ Kupol, a subsidiary of Russian state-owned arms company Almaz-Antey, developed and flight-tested a new drone model called Garpiya-3 (G3) in China with the help of local specialists.

In an update to the Russian defence ministry, the company said it could "produce drones at scale at a factory in China so the weapons could be deployed in the 'special military operation' in Ukraine", the term Moscow uses for the war, Reuters reported.

The development comes at a moment of severe strain in the EU-China relationship, with clashes on everything from geopolitics to trade.

While some have suggested that Donald Trump becoming US president again could usher in a period of relative calm in EU-China ties, as it did in 2017, Beijing's close relations with Moscow are likely to make that difficult.

Brussels could ramp up sanctions on Chinese firms over the matter, one diplomat said, while others speculated that it could resort to more serious actions, suggesting that it had a "full toolbox" of punitive measures to pick from.

Thus far, the EU has sanctioned a relatively small number of mainland China or Hong Kong-headquartered companies for allegedly funnelling goods made in Europe to Russian military buyers. These dual-use goods had been sanctioned by European authorities, therefore re-exporting them to Russia is banned under EU law.

The Chinese mission to the European Union did not respond immediately to a request for comment.

Last month, the United States imposed sanctions on two Chinese drone suppliers and their supposed Russian partners for collaborating on the production of Moscow's "Garpiya series" long-range drones.

"The Garpiya, designed and produced in the People's Republic of China in collaboration with Russian defence firms, has been used to destroy critical infrastructure and has resulted in mass casualties," the US State Department said.

China's largest air show takes off with fighter jets, attack drones

12 November 2024, Index Journal, Michael Zhang

Fighter jets and attack drones took centre stage as China's largest air show officially opened on Tuesday, an opportunity for Beijing to showcase its growing military might to potential customers and rivals alike.

China has poured resources into modernising and expanding its aviation capabilities as it faces off against the United States and others around regional flashpoints like Taiwan.

Record numbers of Chinese warplanes have been sent around the self-ruled democratic island, which Beijing claims as its territory, over the past few years. The star of Airshow China, which showcases Beijing's civil and military aerospace sector every two years in the southern city of Zhuhai, is the new J-35A stealth fighter jet.

Video from state media showed the warplane rearing up into the air, engines roaring, before flipping upside down and speeding away as spectators on the ground excitedly cheered.

Its inclusion in the airshow suggests it is nearly ready to enter operation, which would make China the only country other than the United States to have two stealth fighters in action, experts said.

The J-35A is lighter than China's existing model, the J20, and looks more similar in design to a US F-35.

A group of J20s also performed a display flight on Tuesday morning, in a diamond formation across the sky. State news agency Xinhua quoted military expert Wang Mingzhi as saying the combination of the two models greatly enhances the People's Liberation Army Air Force (PLAAF)'s "ability to conduct offensive operations in high-threat and contested environments".

For the first time, a PLA naval jet will be present at the airshow, according to state broadcaster CCTV.

The J-15T's design suggests it may be intended for use on China's newest aircraft carrier, the Fujian.

Another key piece of hardware making its debut is the HQ-19 surface-to-air missile system, designed to intercept ballistic missiles and hypersonic glide vehicles, according to state media.

- Drone zone -

The airshow features a dedicated drone zone for the first time, reflecting their increased prominence in warzones, including Ukraine.

The SS-UAV – a massive mothership that can release swarms of smaller drones for intelligence gathering, as well as strikes – will be on display in Zhuhai, according to the South China Morning Post.

In October the United States unveiled sanctions targeting China-based companies linked to the production of drones that Russia has deployed in Ukraine.

Moscow and Beijing have deepened military and defence ties since Russia's invasion of its neighbour three years ago, and the secretary of its Security Council, Sergei Shoigu, is due to visit Zhuhai.

Russia's Su-57, a stealth jet with a distinctive grey-and-white mosaic pattern, also took to the skies on Tuesday.

In another display, soldiers descended on ropes from helicopters.

This year the show's focus is squarely on the military sector, as it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the PLAAF, but China's burgeoning space industry will also be showcasing developments.

A model of a homegrown reusable space cargo shuttle will debut at the show, Xinhua reported on Monday. Named Haoloong, the shuttle is designed to be launched on a commercial rocket, and then dock with China's space station Tiangong.

"It can re-enter the atmosphere, fly and land horizontally at a designated airport, allowing for recovery and reuse," Xinhua said.

Beijing has poured huge resources into its space programme over the past decade in an effort to catch up to traditional space powers the United States and Russia.

China's Advanced firing range and probable SIGINT facilities near in Shigatse( Tibet Autonomous Region)

10 November 2024, Resonant News, Dr Y Nithiyanandam

This report finds that a sophisticated PLA firing range near Shigatse is being used for high-altitude target practice and weapon calibration. Secondly, it finds evidence of probable SIGINT systems that can listen to a range of signals, including military and submarine communications, from vast distances.

Backstory

Have you ever wondered what an advanced firing range looks like? While media reports often mention the PLA conducting sophisticated drills "somewhere" in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), this report offers the first detailed glimpse, captured through satellite images, of such a site and its major components. It can show how the landscape has evolved chronologically.

But it's not just about the firing range. Are you curious about what kind of technology China might use for signal intelligence (SIGINT), navigation, or space situational awareness? In the second part of the report, we reveal two massive SIGINT facilities located near Shigatse along the Yarlung Tsang Po River.

This report focuses on a significant military site—likely a firing range—and two SIGINT facilities situated just 200 km from the Doklam plateau, 150 km from India's border with Sikkim, and 30 km from the Shigatse dual-use airport. This location underscores China's intense military preparations, where a variety of air-to-ground and ground-to-ground weapons are tested and complex target simulations are carried out. The proximity of these sites to disputed areas, including Bhutan and India's Arunachal Pradesh, makes them critical points of interest, mainly as they sit directly along an aerial path over contested territories. The ongoing developments highlight the increasing operational readiness of the PLA forces and the expanding SIGINT infrastructure in this sensitive region.

Part I: The firing range

Firing ranges at high altitudes is essential for maintaining precision in weapon systems and calibrating older equipment, ensuring optimal performance in these unique environments. The thinner air impacts projectile trajectories, making calibration adjustments critical. Regular target practice helps recalibrate systems for use under reduced air resistance, which affects range and accuracy. For instance, the PLA's high-altitude drills in Tibet tested long-range artillery and rocket systems for precision in low-oxygen, cold conditions. Such drills improve accuracy and integrate new and old systems for combat readiness in plateau regions. In addition to ground artillery, air-to-ground firing is also crucial in high-altitude environments. The reduced air density can alter the trajectory of air-launched munitions, making it essential for air forces to adapt targeting systems and techniques to ensure accurate strikes. Air-to-ground training at high altitudes allows for better coordination between aircraft and ground forces, enhancing the overall effectiveness of operations. This type of training ensures that aircraft can accurately deliver munitions, even under challenging conditions, which is vital for maintaining control over strategic high-altitude regions.

Yarlung Tsang Po River between the confluence of two streams. The site is positioned adjacent to Highway G349, which is only 400 metres north of the firing range, and near Highway G562, which is located 12 kilometres to the east. This range is probably used for air-to-ground target practice by fighter jets and drones operating from the Shigatse dual-purpose airport or artillery firing. Its strategic location at an altitude of 3850 meters (approximately 12,631 feet) serves to assess the accuracy of targeting at higher elevations.

Large dunes, dried-up streams, and muddy tracks were the area's defining features prior to 2016. However, from July to August 2016, the landscape underwent a first sign of transformation. The initial development was the construction of a small-scale runway, measuring 200 by 50 metres, made of concrete. Subsequently, an artificial water channel was established along the western perimeter of the site, initially serving as a barrier.

Figure 3 highlights the key features observed on the site between August 2016 and July 2017. The 2016 image shows limited features, whereas the 2017 image reveals the presence of actual target markings

Figure 4 illustrates the rapid developments in the firing range following the Doklam Standoff, along with the phased advancements from 2018 to 2021.

While the initial sign of construction was mushrooming in the second half of 2016, the wide range of markings on the ground evolved rapidly after the Doklam Standoff. It was a 3.13 sq. km firing range during the Doklam stand-off, which expanded to 5 sq. km in 2021. The markings are probably used to calibrate and practice on different weapon systems, possibly for air-to-ground and ground-to-ground operations. The other parts of the range are well connected with the road network, mostly demarcated muddy tracks.

The target pin surfaces are smoothed using loose soil, possibly mined from the adjacent riverbed. Over the five years from 2016 to 2021, the firing range seems to have become a testing ground for various weapons used by the PLA in high-altitude operational environments.

Within the firing range

Let us now dive into the various target simulations and markings observed inside the firing range through the lens of satellite imagery.

Figure 5 displays the monochrome image of firing range features labelled with numbers 1-10: 1. Small concrete strip with fighter jets; 2. Artificial water channel; 3. Strip with vertical structures in a uniform pattern and with fighter jets; 4 & 5. Target pins with varied sizes; 6. Concentric circles; 7. Vehicles, structures, and artillery guns placed in specific patterns; 8. Large shelters; 9. Various formations of vehicle convoys; 10. Permanent structures.

1. A concrete strip with fighter jets

Small concrete strips can be observed with fighter jets positioned in various places at different times, with the number of planes changing periodically. These planes, resembling the Su-30 series, appear to be decoys or old, non-functional models likely used for target practice and formation exercises. The strip is probably connected to a road network for moving the planes. Some images show destroyed planes, while others display new sets, indicating ongoing activities in the area. Despite the presence of fighter jets and other nearby assets, the strip is significantly smaller (200*50 metres) than a typical runway required for take-off and landing, reinforcing the idea that the site is primarily used for target practice. An extension piece of the concrete strip will be developed in 2024, containing hardened kinds of simulated targets.

2. Artificial water channel

Figure 7 depicts an artificial water channel that carries water to the firing range from 35 km. The markings are explained as follows: 1. The diversion from the main Yarlung Tsan Po River; 2. The channel passes through the mountain via a tunnel; 3. The water is diverted and stored in an artificial pond; 4. The channel ends in the firing range—images Credits: Maxar & Google Earth.

A narrow channel, approximately 3 metres wide, flows into the firing range, where it ends abruptly. This channel originates from a place called Sequi, located roughly 35 Km to the east of the site. It carries freshwater diverted from the Yarlung Tsangpo River, providing an essential water supply to various villages and regions along its path.

This channel may offer a purer freshwater source than the water available in downstream areas. Along its route, the water is stored in numerous artificial reservoirs or ponds, which may serve purposes such as irrigation and domestic use for the communities it passes. The water primarily moves via natural gravity, travelling across the landscape and navigating through several barrages, confluences of larger rivers, and smaller streams. Remarkably, at one point, the channel even cuts through a mountain via a tunnel, showcasing significant engineering effort.

What is particularly puzzling is the rationale behind transporting this water over such long distances and through challenging terrain, which involves tunnelling through mountains, crossing dried riverbeds, and constructing bridges. Why the water is sourced from so far upstream, rather than utilising more accessible local water resources right next to the firing range through methods like pumping remains unclear. The reasoning behind this intricate water transport system is still a mystery, leaving questions about its intended purpose and the motivations behind its design unanswered.

3. levelled strip

Figure 8 depicts a levelled strip with vertical structures and decoy planes positioned for target practice. Images credits: Maxar, Google Earth and ESRI.

A levelled strip, measuring 1300 metres in length and 50 metres in width, is in the centre of the firing range. On one side of the strip, there is a section measuring 140 metres in length and 30 metres in width, where dummy aircraft were positioned. In 2018, two aircraft were placed in this area, pointed in a specific direction and good condition. However, satellite images from 2021 reveal that the aircraft has sustained damage. One appears to have been dislocated, with parts scattered along the direction of the hit. Subsequent photos show the aircraft becoming increasingly disoriented and displaced over time, indicating that target practice has been conducted regularly.

Additionally, the strip is dotted with vertical structures arranged into five distinct clusters, each spaced approximately 200 metres apart. Each cluster contains five vertical pillars: two in the front row and three in the second row. The land around the clusters has been levelled and paved with concrete, and vehicles have occasionally been spotted next to the clusters. There are five clusters with 25 vertical pillars on this strip extending east to west. Meanwhile, another five clusters with 25 vertical pillars are evident in the linear structure from north to south. Below the strip are two more clusters, each with ten vertical pillars.

While the vertical pillars have remained intact over the years, the condition of the aircraft and their wreckage has varied, with vehicles appearing intermittently in the area.

4-6. Target pins of varied size

Figure 9 shows target pins of different sizes numbered as follows: 1. 50 m radius; 2. 100 m radius 3. 15 m radius with two concentric circles 4. 15-radius with three concentric circles, each with an interval of 5 m. Images credit: Maxar & Google Earth.

At the firing range, circular target markers of various sizes are observed. The site had a circle with a 100-meter radius and rectangular markings around it in November 2017. Initially, there were also four 50-meter radius circles and some concentric circles in the southeastern corner.

Post-Doklam, significant changes were noted. By 2021, the number of large circles increased to four, each with a 100-meter radius and distinctive (+) marking. Furthermore, 18 circles with a 50-meter radius and several smaller circles with a 15-meter radius, all marked centrally, were also present. In addition, six of the 15-meter radius circles included concentric rings at 5, 10, and 15 metres within them. This arrangement has been consistently maintained, with annual upkeep. Occasionally, the orientation of the markings is adjusted. Craters within the circles are subsequently filled as part of site redevelopment, indicating that regular target practice is conducted. These targets are not merely superficial but reinforced to endure sustained firepower. The circles with markings probably indicate air-to-ground targeting simulations and ground-to-ground calibration of weapons.

Most of the circular targets are concentrated on the eastern and southern sides of the range, with rivers bordering both ends of the area.

7. Array of structures

Figure 10 shows the array of structures placed in a linear network. The patches are connected to the artery of roads. The images of two different periods indicate the changes in the position of objects. Images credit: Maxar & Google Earth.

A network of roads that resemble arteries connects the various target patches set up in this area. There are over ten distinct patches, some situated near dunes, possibly providing protection. Each patch contains a group of structures spaced evenly apart, typically by 8 to 10 units. The number of structures in each patch varies, ranging from 8 to 10, and they are positioned in different orientations.

Some structures resemble individual houses, while others resemble probable artillery units. Notably, the number and arrangement of these structures are inconsistent across satellite imagery from different periods. These patches are located centrally within a firing range and may be used for various target practice simulations.

8-10. Mix of functional objects and decoys

Figure 11 shows the imagery of vehicle decoys and structures placed in the southwest part of the firing range. The number 1 indicates individual target structures, 2&3 vehicles placed in various positions, and four, a concrete structure resembling a hangar. Images credit: Maxar & Google Earth.

The image highlights several large individual structures positioned at various points along the roads and road extensions. It also shows target simulations, including vehicle convoys arranged linearly. Notably, a significant structure marked as number 4 in the June 2024 image appears to be a large aircraft hangar, possibly constructed with durable materials and serving as a storage facility or a simulated target like a hangar.

The structures are identified as follows: number 1 refers to individual structures, numbers 2 and 3 represent individual vehicle convoys, while numbers 4 and 5 denote larger structures, potentially simulated targets or storage areas. Numbers 6 and 7 indicate recent changes in the convoys' positions and placement.

Comparing the August 2000 image with the June 2024 image reveals variations in the positions of these structures. Notably, some of these structures are active, not merely decoys. The vehicles and specific structures emit electronic signals, suggesting they are functioning units rather than static or inactive targets. This part of the firing range in the southwest section appears highly active, likely simulating scenarios that change periodically based on operational requirements.

11. Few other features

Figure 12 shows the 2021 satellite images of a few minor features, and the numbers indicate the following: 1. Mobile launcher 2. Pairs of radars, 3. Launchpads. Images credit: Google Earth.

In addition to the main features previously described, there are a few more minor, unmarked elements worth noting. Three pairs of radars are positioned adjacent, along with two pairs of mobile launchers, all within an area of approximately 1,000 square metres. The radars are spaced less than 10 metres apart, and the launchers are about 10 metres apart, suggesting they might serve as decoys rather than active operational units.

Four concrete pads are visible outside the firing range on the northwest side near a river junction. Despite having markers and roads connecting them, the purpose of these patches is unknown.

Scattered throughout the area are several destroyed structures, with damaged objects and simulated features related to air operations and ground infrastructure. These appear to be used as targets during training exercises.

The monitoring station

Figure 13 illustrates the 3D view of a potential monitoring station established to provide an aerial perspective of the range. Images credit: Maxar & Google Earth.

The Probable Monitoring Station is located at 4025 metres, right next to the highway and facing the centre of the firing range, which is at 3835 metres. This elevated position gives the station a clear view of the firing range.

View shed Geospatial analysis helps to determine the coverage area using 3D data, with the results displayed in green. The green areas represent the visible areas from the highest point. Considering the station's location, elevation, antennas, road construction, and existing facilities, this is likely a monitoring station for regular firing exercises.

Is this an active firing range?

While studying the developments in the firing area, a big question remains: When were these sites active in the past, and are they still functional today? We used techniques adopted in our previous studies based on remote sensing inference to find some answers. These findings reveal some interesting things, which are explained below.

Figure 15 illustrates the potential activities conducted at the firing range. A shows the year-on-year changes, and B shows the frequency and season during which the firing range operations were most frequent.

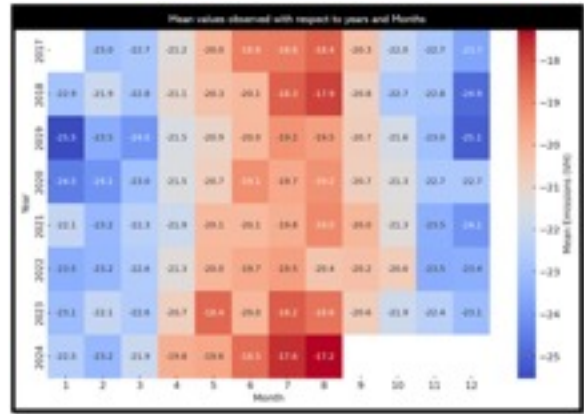

Figure 16 illustrates the highest signal emissions (interference) detected from space in various periods and months since 2017.

A space-based approach to monitor ground activity instead of relying on traditional SIGINT methods is used. This allowed us to observe changes throughout the year. In 2017, certain areas of the range were highly active, but from 2018 to 2021, the activity gradually decreased. From 2023, the activity began to increase again, sometimes holding steady until early 2024 before declining slightly. However, overall activity levels remained high. The range is most active from May to August, with August seeing the highest usage, followed by July. Over the years, operations have primarily occurred between May and August, with occasional activity extending into September. August is consistently the busiest month, although shifting patterns may reflect weather changes or other schedule factors.

It is important to note that the above analysis is based on observations of specific sections of the firing range. It relies on limited open-source satellite imagery, which may not fully or accurately reflect the actual extent of exercises conducted. Corroboration with additional intelligence sources is recommended for a more comprehensive and accurate interpretation.

Part II: Probable signal intelligence (SIGINT) facilities While exploring places around the firing range, we noticed some interesting structures. These might be advanced signal intelligence facilities with broader utilisation and military importance beyond the firing range.

The site is situated about 6 km west of the firing range and 38 km west of Shigatse Airport, at an elevation of 3,840 metres. Positioned along the banks of the Yarlung Tsangpo River, directly across from Shigatse City, the feature has an approximate radius of 180 metres and a circumference of around 1,134 metres.

The physical characteristics of site A without fingerprinting it are as follows:

Circle and Antenna Placement:

- First Inner Circle: The innermost circle, located 50 meters from the centre, is populated by 40 evenly spaced antennas around its circumference.
- Middle Circle: The middle circle, sitting 100 meters from the centre, acts as a boundary for the area between the inner and outermost circles.
- Last Outer Circle: The outermost circle, situated 170 meters from the centre, contains 40 antennas along its circumference, completing the outermost layer of the structure.

Radial Divisions:

The area between the centre point and the inner circle and between the inner and middle circles is divided into five segments by radial lines extending from the centre. These lines create distinct zones within these circles. Further, the image shows the structure divided into 16 equal segments by radial lines extending from the middle circle to the outer perimeter, creating additional distinct areas.

Central Elevated Structure:

At the centre of the feature is an elevated circular structure with a radius of 8 meters, constructed in 2018. This central feature stands out prominently within the design.

Site Development History:

- The site was initially a flat riverside area before construction began in June 2017. The first construction phase occurred in the middle of this space, where a small, circular, elevated structure was built.

- By mid-2018, the land had been cleared and levelled, with the outer circle completed first. Following June 2018, more sections were marked out, and the full-fledged antenna system was rapidly developed.

- Throughout 2018, additional circular divisions were completed, and the antennas were systematically installed in their respective positions, forming the comprehensive structure seen in the image.

Inference:

The physical features seen were similar to those of SIGINT systems around the world, which suggests that this might be a circularly disposed antenna array (CDAA) system used for high-frequency direction finding (HFDF).

Criteria	Circularly Disposed Antenna Array (CDAA)	Observed Geometry in the Image
Concentric Circles	CDAA often have multiple concentric rings of antennas for signal reception from different directions.	The image shows at least two concentric circles with evenly spaced antennas.
Radial Symmetry	CDAA exhibit radial symmetry to allow equal signal coverage in all directions.	Radial symmetry is present, with lines dividing the circle into equal sectors.
Uniform Spacing	Antennas in CDAA are usually uniformly spaced around each concentric circle to ensure even signal distribution.	Antennas are evenly spaced along the rings in the observed structure.
Sector Division	Sectors created by radial lines in CDAA may correspond to specific signal directions or coverage areas.	The radial lines create sectors, potentially representing directional segments.
Design Complexity	CDAA can be very complex, with multiple rings and varying distances between antennas for precise signal capturing.	The observed structure appears more straightforward, with two main antenna rings and straight radial lines.

Table 1 Compares the observed geometry of typical CDAA (compiled from various sources of documents) and the object identified near the firing range.

The CDAA system, created during the Cold War, is a tool used to intercept and locate signals. The US military has widely used it to find signal sources worldwide. The Soviets also developed similar systems back then. The CDAA works best between 3 and 30 MHz using two circles that scan signals in all directions to find the best way to intercept transmissions. This system is more compact than large antenna farms, which need much space and must be moved around in different directions.

Many countries have used this system, and recent studies show that China is now using old World War II tools to find and listen to signals from various directions. One study, mentioned in a CSIS document, highlights China helps to build such a facility in Cuba to listen to military activities in the United States.

Since the HFDF system relies on skywave propagation through the ionosphere, it can intercept signals over vast distances, sometimes spanning continents.

In the meantime, another site connected to SIGINT has been identified and is referred to as Site-B.

Site B

A facility with a control centre in the middle and three semi-circular boundaries containing antennae is located between the firing range and the CDAA system. It is approximately 4 km from the firing range and 1.3 km from the CDAA system, at an elevation of 3800 m. The first construction phase began in early 2017, during which the control centre was being developed and the road connecting this site from the highway was laid out. The satellite image of May 2018 shows that construction was halfway completed, but it was expedited and finished by the end of 2018. The control centre is covered with high walls, indicating its importance. Communication dish antennas are also present.

Main Structure:

- A rectangular central building, likely housing control equipment, sits at the top of the image, surrounded by a perimeter fence with road access from the upper left.

Antennae Layout:

- Multiple antennae extend from the central structure in a radial pattern, forming clusters that create semi-circular patterns around the facility.

Semi-Circular Pattern:

The antennae are organised in semi-circles:

- Inner Semi-Circle: The first semi-circle closest to the building contains approximately nine evenly spaced antennae.
- Middle Semi-Circle: The second semi-circle contains approximately 18 antennae, extending further outward.
- Outer Semi-Circle: The final, outermost semi-circle contains around 33 antennae, making the rods longer and covering a wider area.

Orientation:

- The central structure is positioned at the top (North), with the antennae spreading in a fan-like formation toward the southern part of the installation (facing south).

Number of Antennae:

- The three semi-circles collectively contain approximately 60 antennae, with increasing length as they move outward.

Overall Layout:

- The radial pattern suggests the array is designed for focused data collection, possibly for military, astronomical, radio frequency monitoring, or scientific research purposes.

Inference:

Given the physical features of the antenna array, there are some possibilities that it could be a Very Low Frequency (VLF) system. VLF systems typically require extensive infrastructure to support highly long wavelengths (3–30 kHz), often consisting of tall masts or extensive wire arrays spread over vast areas. The semi-circular arrangement of this array, with clusters of approximately 9, 18, and 33 antennae in progressively larger arcs pointing towards one direction, suggests a design for signal directionality rather than omnidirectional VLF communication. Given the size of the system, this may be designed for 1 MHz – 1 kHz; however, it may vary.

The radial, organised pattern could be an adaptation to maintain precision in transmitting or receiving low-frequency signals. If this array were intended for VLF applications, the layout could represent a more modern or compact version, where multiple concentric rings of antennae help focus or distribute very low-frequency signals for specific tasks—primarily used for long-distance communication, particularly with submarines or applications requiring signals to penetrate through water or ground. Due to their low frequency, these signals are robust but limited in data capacity.

Notable developments in a nearby village

Figure 19 shows the developments in the village next to the critical SIG-INT facilities over the period. Images credit: Maxar, ESRI & Google Earth.

As we analyse the activities at the firing range and the SIG-INT facilities, it's crucial to consider the surrounding areas. Shigatse, a city with a significant military presence, was previously studied for infrastructure developments at Shigatse airport, Heliport developments, and changes in its urban area. This time, we will focus on Dalongda, the nearest village to the examined sites, located just above the firing range and signal intelligence facility.

Significant changes have occurred in this village over time. In 2018, a structure storage facility was constructed, and it has recently transformed into an entire military complex. This indicates ongoing developments and the establishment of supporting facilities in the vicinity.

While firing ranges are a standard component of military operations, their significance intensifies when the People's Liberation Army (PLA) conducts activities near the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with India. This highly militarised area has fighter jets, UAVs, helipads, and a robust military presence. Still, it is also aligned with critical locations like the Doklam Plateau and India's 'Chicken Neck' corridor. The proximity of such sensitive regions underscores the importance of these developments. Construction and militarisation activities, particularly since 2018, align with shifting geopolitical priorities. By 2021, much of the infrastructure was completed, with further refinements observed up to 2024, including the reconstruction of targets and the introduction of new shelters and decoys. Although some equipment, such as fighter jets, may not be fully functional, electronic intelligence systems indicate ongoing operational readiness. The precise positioning of radars, shelters, and convoy targets suggests evolving tactical strategies to replicate real-world combat scenarios. The type of weapon being used in the firing range is unclear. Typically, firing ranges have targets at a distance, so it's not clear whether air-to-ground or ground-to-air weapons are being used. However, it's possible that precision weapons are being tested using UAVs and that precise ground-to-ground weapons are being calibrated.

Meanwhile, the SIGINT infrastructures mapped in the report are vital for aviation, space situational awareness, air operations, and, most importantly, military signal intelligence. These systems intercept both high- and low-frequency signals, with the HFDF capturing signals bouncing off the ionosphere and the VLF systems monitoring ground-based propagation extending as far as the Bay of Bengal, tracking potential marine and naval activities. This facility is likely part of a more extensive, global network of similar installations designed to monitor intrusions and gather intelligence on military and civilian operations. Though the exact nature of its operations remains uncertain, the infrastructure appears fully operational and continually expands. Many might wonder why China would invest in these seemingly outdated signal intelligence systems, which most of the world has moved away from. However, recent developments, such as a 2024 CSIS report detailing China's construction of a similar facility in Cuba to monitor U.S. military activities, indicate this is part of China's broader strategy. This network of installations reflects a deliberate investment in traditional signal interception, possibly augmenting modern technologies.

The proximity of this facility to critical areas near the LAC highlights its strategic importance. While geospatial data suggests it could serve as both a firing range and a signal intelligence hub, further intelligence corroboration is necessary for a complete understanding of its function. The fact that China continues to maintain and operate these facilities demonstrates their importance in modern intelligence operations, where the fusion of old and new systems provides comprehensive surveillance capabilities. The proximity to crucial military zones only adds to the significance of this installation in regional and global military dynamics.

These developments underscore the PLA's extensive preparations and highlight the need for effective countermeasures. Understanding the scale and nature of these exercises is crucial for assessing the PLA's military readiness and crafting appropriate responses. This facility's presence in such a geopolitically sensitive region reinforces its role as a key player in China's strategic intelligence operations, making it a significant factor in regional stability and global security.

Exclusive: Chinese researchers develop AI model for military use on back of Meta's Llama

01 November 2024, Reuters

Top Chinese research institutions linked to the People's Liberation Army have used Meta's publicly available Llama model to develop an AI tool for potential military applications, according to three academic papers and analysts.

In a June paper reviewed by Reuters, six Chinese researchers from three institutions, including two under the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) leading research body, the Academy of Military Science (AMS), detailed how they had used an early version of Meta's Llama as a base for what it calls "ChatBIT". The researchers used an earlier Llama 13B large language model (LLM) from Meta (META.O), opens new tab, incorporating their own parameters to construct a military-focused AI tool to gather and process intelligence, and offer accurate and reliable information for operational decision-making.

ChatBIT was fine-tuned and "optimised for dialogue and question-answering tasks in the military field", the paper said. It was found to outperform some other AI models that were roughly 90% as capable as OpenAI's powerful ChatGPT-4. The researchers didn't elaborate on how they defined performance or specify whether the AI model had been put into service.

"It's the first time there has been substantial evidence that PLA military experts in China have been systematically researching and trying to leverage the power of open-source LLMs, especially those of Meta, for military purposes," said Sunny Cheung, associate fellow at the Jamestown Foundation who specialises in China's emerging and dual use technologies, including AI., opens new tab

Meta has embraced the open release of many of its AI models, including Llama. It imposes restrictions on their use, including a requirement that services with more than 700 million users seek a license from the company.

Its terms also prohibit use of the models for "military, warfare, nuclear industries or applications, espionage" and other activities subject to U.S. defence export controls, as well as for the development of weapons and content intended to "incite and promote violence".

However, because Meta's models are public, the company has limited ways of enforcing those provisions.

In response to Reuters questions, Meta cited its acceptable use policy and said it took measures to prevent misuse.

"Any use of our models by the People's Liberation Army is unauthorized and contrary to our acceptable use policy," Molly Montgomery, Meta's director of public policy, told Reuters in a phone interview.

Meta added that the United States must embrace open innovation.

"In the global competition on AI, the alleged role of a single, and outdated, version of an American open-source model is irrelevant when we know China is already investing more than a trillion dollars to surpass the US on AI," a Meta spokesperson said in a statement.

China's leader has a new military secretary, state TV video of rocket force visit suggests

26 October 2024, SCMP, Sylvie Zhuang

Signs are that Fang Yongxiang, 58, seen by Xi Jinping's side on at least two military visits, is the new CMC general office director

Xi Jinping appears to have a new military secretary, going by state footage of the Chinese president's recent inspection visits to People's Liberation Army units.

Lieutenant General Fang Yongxiang, 58, was part of the group accompanying Xi during his visit to an unspecified brigade of the elite PLA Rocket Force last week.

Footage released by state broadcaster CCTV on Saturday showed Fang standing at arm's length as Xi talked to several top commanders at the base in the southeastern province of Anhui.

A close-up shot showed Fang, along with General Zhang Youxia, China's most senior uniformed military official, to be the only two generals next to Xi not wearing the rocket force uniform.

Fang was also seen by Xi's side in CCTV footage of his visit in April to the Army Medical University in the southwestern city of Chongqing.

That clip showed Fang standing next to He Weidong, the second-ranked vice-chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), the body in charge of China's armed forces. Zhang is the first-ranked vice-chairman at the CMC, which is headed by Xi.

Fang is also an alternate member of the Communist Party's Central Committee, the country's top policymaking body.

Xi is generally accompanied on troop visits by his military secretary – the director of the CMC's general office, which oversees the commission's day-to-day operations.

Fang's inclusion in Xi's visit entourage suggests he is now CMC general office chief.

Personnel changes in the Chinese military are generally not officially announced and are only publicly confirmed much later than the actual appointments.

The role of military secretary was previously held by Zhong Shaojun, according to state media reports. CCTV footage of a military meeting in August showed Zhong seated with an armband bearing the logo of the National Defence University, the top PLA academy.

According to state news agency Xinhua, Fang was appointed a member of the PLA's election committee last month and will lead voting work for the entire military.

Fang is a native of Xiamen in Fujian, the southeastern province where Xi rose through the ranks in the 1980s and 90s.

Fang's military career started in 1989 after he graduated from the PLA's Army Infantry Academy. His career in Fujian overlapped Xi's time there by more than a decade.

Xi was appointed Xiamen's deputy mayor in 1985 and served as provincial governor from 1999 to 2002.

Fang started as a platoon leader and a company commander at the 31st Group Army, a division under the PLA's Eastern Theatre Command, which oversees the Taiwan Strait and the East China Sea.

He progressed through various leadership roles to become the 31st Group's political director and then a member of its core leadership standing committee in 2014.

He also led political and party work at the Eastern Theatre Command from 2015 to 2017, before being named Communist Party chief of the 81st Group Army Unit. The unit is a division under the PLA's Central Theatre Command headquartered in Beijing that protects the capital and supports the other four theatre commands.

In 2018, he was promoted to vice-minister at the newly set up Ministry for Veterans Affairs, a post he held until 2022.

In July that year Fang called on all veterans to oppose "the use of extreme moves to petition, and the staging of mass gatherings".

His comments at the ministry's first ever press conference came after several large-scale rallies by former servicemen and women seeking better retirement benefits. The ministry was established to better handle welfare for China's 57 million former armed forces personnel.

In 2022, Fang was made political commissar of the Southern Theatre Command, which covers key regions including the resource-rich and disputed South China Sea.

Xi Jinping Inspects Rocket Force Unit, Emphasizes Combat Readiness and Party Leadership

24 October 2024, China Scope

Xi Jinping, General Secretary of the Chinese Communist Party, inspected a Rocket Force unit on the 17th, emphasizing the need to strengthen crisis awareness and combat readiness.

During his visit to a Rocket Force brigade in Hefei, Xi observed weapons equipment demonstrations and troop training exercises. In his remarks, Xi stressed maintaining absolute Party leadership over the military and ensuring troops follow orders from the Party Central Committee and Central Military Commission.

He also emphasized strengthening grass-roots Party organizations, investigating and dealing with corruption issues, enhancing combat preparedness and operational capabilities, and adapting to modern warfare changes by focusing on new equipment, skills, and tactics.

The visit came shortly after China's "Joint Sword-2024B" military exercises near Taiwan on the 14th, and following Xi's inspection of Dongshan Island in Fujian province, a location with historical military significance in cross-strait relations. Vice Chairman of the Central Military Commission Zhang Youxia accompanied the inspection. The timing of these visits – to Dongshan Island and then the Rocket Force – appears significant given recent military activities in the region.

Border town in Xizang sees rapid growth in cross-border trade, tourism under favorable national policies

06 October 2024, Bastille Post

Benefiting from various favorable national policies, Gyirong, a charming Chinese town nestling in an area bordering Nepal, has witnessed rapid growth in cross-border trade and tourism, boosting local residents' income.

It is about 820 km west of Lhasa, capital of southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region, and lies about 131 km from the Nepalese capital Kathmandu.

The Himalayas have cut open five north-south rift valleys in Xigaze under Xizang. The valley where Gyirong is located is the westernmost and longest of them all, stretching approximately 93 km.

The valley has served as a crucial transportation route between the hinterland of the Qinghai-Xizang Plateau and South Asia. Historically, it has functioned as a combination of an "official road" and a "commercial road."

In addition to its long history, the small town has undergone significant changes in the new era. Today, a land port has been built on the ancient commercial site.

In 1961, Gyirong port attained approval for opening. It was declared a second-class land port in 1972 and was upgraded to a national first-class land port in 1987. Thanks to the Belt and Road Initiative, the volume of border trade at the Gyirong port has steadily grown. In 2017, the port was designated as an international port, thereby allowing access to individuals from third countries besides China and Nepal.

During the week-long National Day holiday which started on Tuesday, the inbound and outbound passengers at the Gyirong port have significantly increased, with a noticeable rise in cross-border trade among border residents.

Dawa Phuntsog, who has been working at the Gyirong port for eight years, has noticed a significant surge in workload over the past two years. "One aspect is that the volume of business has increased, and the other is that the personnel structure has become more diverse. Previously, it was only the border residents, and travelers from Nepal and other regions of China. After becoming an international port, there are more people from third countries besides China and Nepal. In terms of trade volume, there used to be mainly general merchandise. However, recently, with the export of new energy vehicles, highland drinking water, and some agricultural and sideline products, I think the variety has become more diverse," he said.

After graduating from her university, Nangsa chose to return to her hometown. She started by promoting her hometown through short videos on social platforms and then progressed to selling Nepalese products. As the pioneer of livestreaming e-commerce in Gyirong, she has transitioned the fervor of Sino-Nepalese border trade from offline to online. The source of income for villagers is becoming increasingly diversified.

Nangsa said that Xizang is a microcosm of China's achievements in construction and development, as well as a comprehensive window of Chinese modernization.

"Look at the development in Gyirong now, it's a microcosm of the country's opening up. I believe all of this signifies a more open, confident, and inclusive China," she said.

From January to August this year, the total import and export value in Xizang exceeded 7 billion yuan (about 1 billion U.S. dollars), with the Gyirong port surpassing 2.5 billion yuan (about 0.36 billion U.S. dollars).

China confirms 'successful' intercontinental ballistic missile test

25 September 2024, RFA

Beijing says its first ICBM test in decades was routine and not aimed at any country.

The Chinese military said that it successfully launched an intercontinental ballistic missile, or ICBM, into the Pacific Ocean on Wednesday, its first such test in more than 40 years.

ICBMs are primarily designed to carry nuclear warheads, and China's latest generation ICBM – Dongfeng-41 (DF-41) – has an operational range of between 12,000 kilometers and 15,000 kilometers (7,500- 9,300 miles), which means it can reach the U.S. mainland.

China's defense ministry said in a statement that the People's Liberation Army Rocket Force successfully launched an ICBM carrying a training simulated warhead into the high seas of the Pacific Ocean early on Wednesday.

China tests intercontinental ballistic missile

China fired an intercontinental ballistic missile into the Pacific Ocean.

"It accurately landed in the designated sea area," the ministry said.

It was not clear what type of ICBM was tested.

The ministry said that the launch was a routine arrangement of the force's annual military training, "in line with international law and international practice, and is not aimed at any specific country or target."

China's first publicly known ICBM test launch was in May 1980 when it fired at least two missiles into the South Pacific as a gesture of deterrence to the Soviet Union but since then the PLA has not announced any further test.

In its 2023 China Military Power report, the Pentagon said that China had completed construction on at least 300 ICBM silos in 2022. It also said that as of May 2023, it had more than 500 operational nuclear warheads, and that number would likely grow to more than 1,000 by 2030.

The intercontinental missile test sends a strong signal to the world that China is determined to build up its nuclear capabilities, analysts said.

"A significant factor is to respond to growing international skepticism about the internal stability and combat readiness of China's Rocket Force," said Carnegie Endowment for International Peace Senior Fellow Zhao Tong, adding that in recent years, international public opinion has focused on issues of corruption within the Rocket Force, equipment quality problems, and leadership changes.

Some U.S. officials even argue that, given those issues, the Chinese military is unlikely to conduct large-scale military operations in the foreseeable future, Zhao said.

"For China's political leaders, such international doubts have a highly negative impact on the perception of China's military power. Chinese leaders are very concerned that Western skepticism about China's military capabilities might lead to more aggressive containment or suppression policies, or even proactive military provocations from Western nations."

'New era of nuclear competition'

China's Xinhua News Agency said relevant countries had been notified about Wednesday's test launch in advance but it did not elaborate.

Taiwan's ministry of national defense said it had recorded "intensive" Chinese missile firing activities but did not provide further details.

This month, China's neighbor North Korea has also conducted several short-range ballistic missiles.

Meanwhile, Beijing has protested against the deployment of U.S. Mid-Range Capability missile system Typhon in the Philippines since April, saying it undermined peace and stability in the region.

With the ICBM test, China is sending the signal that it is going to continue to build up its global nuclear capabilities, said Richard Fisher, a senior researcher who specializes in Asian military affairs at the International Assessment and Strategy Center, a U.S. think tank.

"China's ICBM test is another reminder that the world is moving into a new era of nuclear weapon competition, and in order to deter China and Russia, it is necessary – vitally necessary – for the United States to increase its nuclear arsenal," he told Radio Free Asia.

Wang Weizheng, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Adelphi University, said the missile launch was China's way of expressing dissatisfaction with recent developments in the Indo-Pacific.

"With President Biden announcing that he will not seek re-election and having only about three months left in his term, Xi Jinping seems intent on delivering a stern message to the U.S. before a new president is elected," the political science professor told RFA,

"Xi wants the U.S. to recognize the reality that China's strategic weapons capabilities are no longer what they once were."

China builds laser communication ground station for massive satellite data transmission

16 September 2024, Global Times

A laser communication ground system with a 500mm-caliber antenna was successfully deployed Sunday on the Pamir Plateau in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, which is expected to significantly enhance the country's capacity for massive satellite data transmission.

The system, developed by the Aerospace Information Research Institute (AIR) of the Chinese Academy of Sciences, marks the end of relying solely on microwave ground stations for satellite data reception.

With the rapid advancements in China's aerospace technology, the volume of data generated by satellite detection is growing exponentially. The current inability to transmit this massive amount of data promptly has become a significant problem, limiting the efficient utilization of China's space resources, said Li Yalin, a senior engineer of AIR.

Satellite-to-ground laser communications have abundant spectrum resources and a wider bandwidth, about ten times to nearly a thousand times wider than that of microwave communications. Additionally, this equipment is lighter, the system size is smaller, and it has lower power consumption. Li said it can address the growing demand for efficient and reliable transmission of information gathered by satellites.

However, weather conditions and atmospheric turbulence significantly affect the performance and availability of space-to-ground laser communications. Therefore, selecting an appropriate site can greatly mitigate the impact of complex and unstable atmospheric conditions.

The atmospheric conditions in the Mount Muztagata region on the Pamir Plateau are excellent, with high visibility and a dry and low rainfall climate, allowing for year-round space-to-ground laser communication operations, said Wang Jianping, another senior engineer of AIR and chief of the remote-sensing satellite ground station in Kashgar.

Facilities were constructed at 4,800 meters and 3,300 meters above the sea level, and the system will be operated remotely.

"Our team traveled about 300,000 kilometers on the Pamir Plateau to select the site of the station, and we faced tremendous difficulties," said Wang. Recently, the project team successfully completed the first operational trial of daytime space-ground laser communications.

Huang Peng, a researcher with AIR and director of China Remote Sensing Satellite Ground Station, said the normalized operation of the newly built station will provide valuable engineering experience in satellite-ground laser communications, laying a solid foundation for planning China's next-generation massive satellite data transmission system.

AIR is planning and evaluating the feasibility of a laser communication ground station network to overcome the adverse weather conditions and improve the reliability of laser communications, according to Huang.

China mulls national military training for children, college students

13 September 2024, RFA

The ruling Chinese Communist Party wants to cultivate the next generation of recruits to prepare for war.

Kindergarten children in military uniforms hold toy guns at a park in Dongyang city, Zhejiang province, China, Oct. 25, 2013.

China's National People's Congress is considering amendments to the law that would expand compulsory military training at universities and 'national defense education' in high schools.

Under the amendments, branches of the People's Liberation Army will be stationed in colleges, universities and high schools across the country to boost a nationwide program of approved military education and physical training to prepare young people for recruitment, state news agency Xinhua reported on Sept. 10.

"The second draft of the revised bill clarifies that ordinary colleges, universities and high schools should strengthen military skills training, hone students' willpower, enhance organizational discipline, and improve the level of military training," the agency said in a summary of the amendments.

China has long had a culture of military training in schools and universities, with military-style boot-camps for kids on vacation and 'defense education bases' catering to corporations and tour groups. The authorities in Hong Kong have also imposed such training on former young protesters, alongside "patriotic education."

People's Armed Forces departments already exist at every level of government, in schools, universities and state-owned enterprises to strengthen ruling Chinese Communist Party, or CCP, control over local militias, guard weapons caches and find work for veterans.

After decades of relative invisibility throughout the post-Mao economic boom, they are once more mobilizing to build militias in big state-owned companies and consolidate party leadership over local military operations.

But analysts say the amendments, if adopted, will standardize these activities under guidelines laid down by the CCP's military arm, in a bid to create more potential recruits as part of preparations for war. While Chinese citizens have an obligation to serve in the People's Liberation Army on paper, this hasn't been implemented since the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949.

'Glorious' military service

Under the planned amendments, high schools will also be obliged to teach children about military service, and create an atmosphere in which military service is seen as "glorious," Xinhua said.

Primary and junior high schools are included in the plan, which calls on them to "combine classroom teaching with extracurricular activities," according to the China News Service.

"Students in colleges and high schools are required to offer compulsory basic military training, while junior high schools may also organize such activities," the report said.

According to a report in the Legal Daily newspaper, the amendments aim to build a nationwide program of military training that connects schools at all levels and of all types.

They also guarantee funding for these activities, which will include military camps and "national defense education bases," the paper said.

"They want students to know about national defense, an awareness of who the enemy is, at a much younger age," Shan-Son Kung, an associate researcher at Taiwan's Institute for National Defense and Security Research, told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview.

"[They also] want kids to get basic military training, which is being extended lower down the system, so as to universalize basic military knowledge," he said. "The aim is to step up preparations for a future war, so that there will be more conscripts available following the passing of the Mobilization Law."

The National Defense Mobilization Law of the People's Republic of China took effect on July 1, 2010, with the aim of setting up a nationwide structure for national defense mobilization.

Currently, the Chinese military mostly relies on recruitment, and most of the standing army are professional soldiers, Kung said.

"In the next few years, we could see growing tensions between China and the United States, and China may look to strengthen its economic and military mobilization as well as the frequency and scope of exercises sooner rather than later," Kung said. "They may be making advance preparations for a large-scale war."

'Educational brainwashing'

China already requires graduates in fluid mechanics, machinery, chemistry, missile technology, radar, science and engineering, weapons science and other technical disciplines to join the People's Liberation Army.

Taiwan-based Chinese dissident Gong Yujian said the Chinese Communist Party is aware that it may face great difficulty in recruiting young people to the military, given the shrinking of that age group due to the one-child policy, so it's stepping up pro-military propaganda while they're still young.

"They need to cultivate high school students to be loyal to the party and patriotic, and worship the People's Liberation Army," Gong said. "It's educational brainwashing."

"That way, they can join up after graduation and boost the People's Liberation Army's recruitment figures," he said.

Gong said he still has memories of some military training exercises from when he was in high school.

"When we were in school, we had seven days' military training, but it was just a formality," he said.

"The local armed police force sent soldiers to our school to teach the students how to march, and how to fold a blanket."

"But we didn't even so much as touch a firearm," he said.

Construction begins on 1.1 GW solar project in Tibet

11 September 2024, PV Magazine, Patrick Jowett

JA Solar has supplied its n-type DeepBlue 4.0 Pro modules for a 1.1 GW solar installation in Tibet. The project is believed to be the world's largest combined animal husbandry facility and solar array now under construction.

Construction has begun on a 1.1 GW solar project in Tibet, China.

The project includes two sites combining animal husbandry and solar power, located in Angduo Township, Mangkang County, and Gongjue Township, Latuo County, in eastern Tibet. China Huadian Corp. is funding the project.

Once operational, the sites will work in conjunction with hydropower stations along the upper reaches of the Jinsha River. A JA Solar spokesperson told pv magazine that the project will generate 6.518 billion kWh of electricity per year.

"It will effectively maintain soil and water, increase land green coverage, improve the local ecological environment and promote animal husbandry, achieving a coordinated development of economic growth and environmental protection," added the spokesperson.

The projects are among the first to integrate wind, solar, hydropower and energy storage in the region. The installation in Angduo Township is also believed to be the largest animal husbandry and complementary solar project under construction in the world.

JA Solar supplied its n-type DeepBlue 4.0 Pro solar modules for the project. The company said the modules have passed tests for IEC standards, thresher, salt mist corrosion, ammonia corrosion, dust and sand, non-uniform snow load, and wind tunnel conditions. They were also demonstrated outdoors in Mohe, Heilongjiang province – one of China's coldest regions.

The company's DeepBlue 4.0 Pro modules were previously used in a 200 MW project in Chamdo, Tibet, which was connected to the grid in November 2023. In March of this year, the module received the highest + Rating Certificate in the Frontrunner Plus Cold Climate Field Test from the China General Certification Center.

Earlier this year, the Chinese authorities switched on 50 MW of solar, paired with 40 MWh of battery storage, in southeastern Tibet.

Exclusive: US expected to send senior Pentagon official to China military forum

04 September 2024, Reuters, Idrees Ali and Laurie Chen

The United States is set to send Michael Chase, the deputy assistant secretary of defence for China, Taiwan and Mongolia, to China's top annual security forum in mid-September, a U.S. official told Reuters.

The choice of Chase has not been previously reported. He is more senior than the U.S. official who attended the Xiangshan Forum last year, but his rank is in line with historical norms for the Pentagon.

Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for China Chad Sbragia attended the forum in 2019.

There is some hope that this could signal deeper working-level engagement with China amid regional disputes. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Chase's expected attendance was not unprecedented, but sent a message that the United States prioritises engagement at the military level with China even at a time of heightened tensions.

More than 90 countries and international organisations plan to send delegations to the Sept. 12-14 forum in Beijing, Chinese state media reported Wednesday.

Washington sent Xanthi Carras, China country director in the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense, when the forum resumed last year after a three-year hiatus due to the pandemic. It was a sign of thawing military ties; however Carras' title is of a lower rank than Chase or Sbragia.

Chase co-chaired U.S.-China military talks in Washington in January – the first such working-level talks since 2022, when most bilateral military engagement was suspended after then-U.S. Speaker Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan.

Taiwan and the South China Sea remain contentious flashpoints in the U.S.-China relationship, with both sides unwilling to compromise on "core issues". U.S. National Security Adviser Jake Sullivan said no new agreements had been reached on the South China Sea during a visit to China last week.

China has repeatedly criticised U.S. deployments in the Asia-Pacific region, including the placement of long-range missiles in the Philippines, as well as U.S. arms sales to democratically governed Taiwan, which China considers its own territory, over the strenuous objections of Taipei.

Meanwhile the U.S. has raised concerns over China's "aggressive" actions in the South China Sea, its frequent military manoeuvres in the air and waters surrounding Taiwan, and what it says is the opacity of China's nuclear buildup.

Official nuclear talks were halted by Beijing in July in protest over U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. But both sides have agreed that U.S. Indo-Pacific Command leaders would soon speak by phone to their counterparts in China's southern theatre command, which covers its southern seas.

Chinese military's new focus: Winning wars against "strong enemies, opponents"

24 August 2024, Hindustan Times

Beijing, From its decades-old doctrine of winning local wars, China's military is shifting its focus to winning wars against "strong enemies and opponents," a top defence official has said, amidst the mounting challenges Beijing faces on multiple fronts, including from the US. President Xi Jinping has also directed the People's Liberation Army to improve its strategic ability to defend the country's sovereignty and development interests. Celebrating the 120th anniversary of Deng Xiaoping, widely hailed as the paramount leader and the architect of modern China who rebuilt the country after the disastrous Mao Zedong era, Xi not only praised his outstanding contributions to the ruling Communist Party of China, the country and the world but also highlighted his emphasis to build a modern military. "The best way to honour Deng is to continue advancing the cause of socialism with Chinese characteristics that he initiated," Xi, said in his address to a meeting held to mark Deng's birth anniversary.

He also recalled that Deng had highlighted the need to build the PLA into a strong, modernised and well-organised force, and to have fewer but better troops. Xi, also the Commander-in-Chief of the PLA, on Thursday told the military to improve its "strategic ability to defend national sovereignty, security and development interests," the Hong Kong-based South China Post reported.

Significantly, at a PLA commemoration, Miao Hua, a member of the Central Military Commission, the military's top decision-making body headed by Xi, said: "In the new journey, we should ... focus on strengthening capabilities to defeat strong enemies and opponents."

Earlier on Wednesday, an article in the official PLA Daily said Deng had made the strategic judgment that "world wars can be postponed or avoided" in the 1980s, but China now faced "great changes unseen in a century."

"We must ... always maintain strategic clarity on the possible risks of war, make full preparations for military struggle, effectively deter war and resolutely win the war."

The latest directive to the PLA to win wars against "strong enemies and opponents" is regarded as a major course correction for the Chinese military considering the mounting challenges China faces on multiple fronts.

Until recently, the CPC's directive to the PLA was to develop the ability to win local wars considering China's long-festering border dispute with India besides maritime disputes involving the disputed South China Sea and East China Sea with Japan.

China's relations with Taiwan, which Beijing claims is part of its own, have also worsened in recent times. China claims most of the South China Sea while the Philippines, Vietnam, Malaysia, Brunei and Taiwan counter its claim.

As recently as in 2022, in his speech at the Party congress, Xi had set "victory in local wars" as a goal and told the PLA to "improve training and preparation for war in all aspects and improve the ability of the army to fight and win."

"We will strengthen the normal and diversified use of military forces, carry out military struggles with determination and flexibility, shape the security posture, contain crises and conflicts, and win local wars," he said then.

Analysts said the strategic shift from winning local wars to defeating "strong enemies and opponents" was in line with Beijing's thinking about the risks it faces and its increasing focus on security, particularly in the face of the growing rivalry between China and the United States on multiple fronts.

The Middle Of Nowhere: Introducing China's 5 Most Remote Airports

21 August 2024, Simple Flying

China is the third-largest country in the world by area, following only Russia and Canada. With its vast expanse and diverse terrain, China is home to some of the most remote and isolated regions on Earth. From the towering peaks of the Himalayas to the barren Gobi Desert and the distant islands of the South China Sea, these far-flung corners present unique challenges for connectivity and transportation. Yet, within these remote areas lie vital lifelines: airports that serve as the only gateways to the outside world.

In a country as vast, geographically diverse, and sparsely populated as China, these remote airports play a crucial role in connecting people and places. They provide essential access to economic opportunities, medical services, and cultural exchange, often bridging the gap between isolation and integration.

This article explores five of China's most remote civilian airports, each situated in some of the most desolate and rugged terrain imaginable. From the frozen plateaus of Tibet to the distant islands of the South China Sea, these airports are more than just transportation hubs—they are symbols of human resilience and the relentless drive to connect even the most distant parts of the world.

Haixi Huatugou Airport (HTT)

The airport in the Hoh Xil (Kekexili) region

Haixi Huatugou Airport (HTT) is located at the border between Qinghai Province and the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region in China, in the northern part of the famous Hoh Xil (Kekexili) region. Administratively, the airport belongs to Haixi Mongolian and Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai Province. Situated at an elevation of 2,906 meters, Haixi Huatugou is a high-altitude airport and is classified as a 4C-grade domestic regional airport. Construction of Haixi Huatugou Airport began in 2012, and three years later, on June 26, 2015, the airport officially commenced operations. The airport is positioned in the northernmost part of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau. The surrounding area, particularly Mangya City, is known as an oil town, thanks to the discovery of petroleum in the 1950s. Haixi Huatugou Airport does not have a railway connection, and the nearest major cities are reachable only by long road trips. The airport is situated on a key transportation route between Qinghai Province and Xinjiang.

According to the Baidu Navigation, it takes about 15 hours (1,300 kilometers) by road to reach Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang, 19 hours (1,700 kilometers) to reach Kashgar, and 14 hours (1,250 kilometers) to reach Xining, the capital of Qinghai Province.

Currently, China Eastern Airlines is the sole carrier operating at Haixi Huatugou Airport, offering three direct routes to different destinations. These include flights to Xining, with four flights per week; to Dunhuang, also with four flights per week; and to Delingha, with three flights per week. All routes are served by Airbus A319 aircraft.

Yushu Batang Airport (YUS)

An airport on the edge of the Tibetan Plateau
Yushu Batang Airport (YUS) is located at the intersection of Qinghai Province, Tibet Autonomous Region, and Sichuan Province, in the northeastern part of the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau. With an elevation of 3,950 meters, it is classified as a high-altitude airport and ranks as the seventh-highest airport in the world. The airport is a 4C-grade domestic regional airport.

In 2007, China approved the construction of Yushu's civil airport, and work commenced the same year. On August 1, 2009, Yushu Batang Airport officially opened, with its inaugural flight operated by China Eastern Airlines on the Xi'an-Xining-Yushu route using an Airbus A319 aircraft.

Just over eight months after the airport's opening, a 7.1-magnitude earthquake struck Yushu on April 14, 2010, severing road connections and leaving Yushu Batang Airport as the only viable route for disaster relief. In the 24 days following the earthquake, the airport facilitated 490 rescue flights, transported 17,051 rescue personnel, delivered 2,174.86 tons of relief materials, and evacuated 2,133 injured individuals. Yushu Airport is situated in a river valley in the southern part of Yushu Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai Province. The airport lacks railway connections, and the nearest major cities are far from easy reach by road. The airport is located roughly midway between Xining, the capital of Qinghai Province, and Lhasa, the capital of Tibet Autonomous Region. By road, it takes about 11 hours (810 kilometers) to reach Xining and 19 hours (1,000 kilometers) to reach Lhasa.

Currently, three airlines operate regular passenger routes at Yushu Batang Airport. Tibet Airlines offers two daily flights to Xining; China Eastern Airlines operates one daily flight to Xining and one to Chengdu; and Capital Airlines provides two daily flights to Xining. All three airlines use Airbus A319 aircraft on these routes.

Qamdo Bangda Airport (BPX)

World's 2nd highest airport in Hengduan Mountains
Qamdo Bangda Airport (BPX) is nestled among the eastern mountains of China's Tibet Autonomous Region, at an elevation of 4,334 meters. This high-altitude airport is the second-highest airport in the world and is classified as a 4C-grade military-civilian dual-use regional airport. Qamdo Bangda Airport's runway length is 5 kilometers, which is also the longest civil airport in China.

The construction of Qamdo Airport was approved in 1969 during the Cultural Revolution, but it wasn't until nearly a decade later, in 1978, that Qamdo Bangda Airport was completed and became operational. The construction process was arduous, claiming the lives of 89 workers. Initially, the airport was used exclusively by the Air Force as a military airport. However, in 1992, a military-civilian expansion project commenced, and on April 28, 1995, Qamdo Bangda Airport officially opened for civil aviation services.

Situated in the Hengduan Mountains, Qamdo Airport is located in a narrow valley between the Nujiang (Salween) and Lancang (Mekong) rivers, in an area known for its treacherous terrain. The airport lacks railway connections, and access by road is limited to two routes: a northern route that takes about two and a half hours (123 kilometers) to reach Qamdo (Changdu) City, and a southern route that takes about an hour (50 kilometers) to reach the famous G318 National Highway. From there, travelers can head west for 21 hours (1,060 kilometers) to reach Lhasa, or east for 18 hours (930 kilometers) to reach Chengdu.

Currently, three airlines operate regular passenger routes at Qamdo Bangda Airport. Tibet Airlines offers flights to Lhasa, Xi'an, Chengdu, and Chongqing, with one to two flights daily on each route. Air China's Southwest branch operates two daily flights to its base in Chengdu, while West Air, a subsidiary of Hainan Airlines Group (HNA Group), offers one daily flight to its base in Chongqing. All three airlines use Airbus A319 aircraft for these routes.

Sansha Yongshu Airport (YXG)

An airport 1370 km from mainland China

Sansha Yongshu Airport (YXG) is located on Yongshu Island in Sansha City, Hainan Province, China. Yongshu Island also serves as the administrative center of the Nansha District within Sansha City. Sansha Yongshu Airport is the southernmost airport in China and is classified as a 4C-grade military-civilian regional airport.

Sansha City was established in 2012, and the construction of Sansha Yongshu Airport began in 2014. On January 6, 2016, the airport successfully conducted its first civil aviation test flight. The test flight was carried out by China Southern Airlines and Hainan Airlines, using an Airbus A320-200 and a Boeing B737-800 from their Haikou Meilan International Airport base. The flights also carried some relatives of the military personnel stationed on Yongshu Island. Although Sansha Yongshu Airport is technically a military-civilian airport, due to national defense considerations, China has not developed large-scale tourism in the Nansha Islands. As a result, ordinary Chinese citizens cannot purchase tickets to fly to Sansha Yongshu Airport.

Currently, Sansha Yongshu Airport only operates occasional flights to Haikou, the capital of Hainan Province. To purchase tickets, one must provide a valid reason, such as visiting military personnel stationed on the island.

In addition, China has three other airports on the islands under Sansha City's control, located on Yongxing Island, Zhubi Reef, and Meiji Reef. Among these, Sansha Yongxing Airport (XYI) on Yongxing Island in the Xisha Islands is also a military-civilian airport, while the other two airports on Zhubi Reef and Meiji Reef are currently military airports with no civil aviation flights.

Sansha Yongxing Airport (XYI) is located on Yongxing Island in Sansha City, Hainan Province, China. Yongxing Island also serves as the administrative center of Sansha City in Hainan Province. Sansha Yongxing Airport is classified as a 4C-grade military-civilian airport. In April 1991, Yongxing Island's military airport was completed and opened. In 2012, Hainan Province applied to expand Yongxing Island Airport to serve both military and civilian purposes. On December 22, 2016, Sansha Yongxing Airport officially began civil aviation operations, with Hainan Airlines operating a government charter flight route from Haikou to Sansha using a Boeing B737-800.

The runway at Sansha Yongxing Airport is 3,000 meters long and 50 meters wide, capable of accommodating aircraft up to the size of a Boeing B737-800.

Ngari Gunsa Airport (NGQ)

The most remote airport in Tibet

Ngari Gunsa Airport (NGQ) is located in the Ali region of China's Tibet Autonomous Region, sitting at an elevation of 4,274 meters above sea level. Classified as a high-altitude airport, it ranks as the third-highest airport in the world. The airport is situated 44 kilometers from the administrative center of Gar County in the Ali region. It officially opened for operations on July 1, 2010, with its inaugural flight operated by Air China's Southwest branch using an Airbus A319 on the Chengdu-Lhasa-Ali route.

The Ali region, with an average elevation of 4,500 meters, is located in western Tibet, approximately 1,600 kilometers from Lhasa, the capital of Tibet Autonomous Region. This area is where the Himalayas, Gangdise, and Karakoram mountain ranges converge. Ali is renowned for its unique natural scenery and cultural sites, most notably Mount Kailash and Lake Manasarovar, considered as sacred places by Buddhists. However, due to challenging transportation conditions, reaching these remote landmarks has long been difficult for travelers. In terms of transportation, the Ali region lacks railway connections and is accessible by only three main roads: one leading north over the Kunlun Mountains to Kashgar in Xinjiang, one heading east to Chamdo, and one extending southeast to Lhasa. According to the Baidu Navigation, the distances from Ali to Kashgar and Lhasa by road are approximately 1,300 kilometers and 1,450 kilometers, respectively, with travel times averaging around 24 hours.

Currently, Ngari Gunsa Airport (NGQ) offers two regular passenger routes: one to Lhasa and another to Kashgar. The Lhasa route is operated by Tibet Airlines using Airbus A319 aircraft, with three to four flights daily. The Kashgar route is serviced by Lucky Air using Boeing 737-700 aircraft, with one flight daily.

China's remote airports are vital connections for some of the country's most isolated and challenging areas. These airports do more than just link distant regions to the rest of the world—they provide crucial access to services, support local communities, and help integrate these far-flung places into the nation. From the high mountains of Tibet to the far-off islands of the South China Sea, these airports are lifelines that keep even the most remote corners of China connected.

China Revises Military Personnel Benefits Regulations for 2024 Implementation

14 August 2024, ChinaScope

China's State Council and Central Military Commission have announced revised "Regulations on Preferential Treatment for Military Personnel," effective October 1, 2024. The new regulations aim "to ensure state support for military personnel, inspire their dedication to defending and building the country, strengthen national defense and military modernization, and make military service a respected profession."

Key revisions include:

1. Emphasis on "Communist Party leadership" and establishment of principles for military personnel benefits. The benefits are to "balance treatment with contribution, spiritual with material rewards, and care with service."
2. Adaptation to new national defense and military requirements via "clarification of benefit recipients, of management systems, and of financial responsibilities between central and local governments."
3. Enhancement of support measures for military personnel: ensuring access to social security, public services, and appropriate benefits. This includes increasing compensation for families of honored deceased personnel and inviting beneficiaries to major ceremonial events.
4. Improvement of service procedures and capabilities: improved processes for one-time compensation payments as well as refinement of disability rating assessments.

The revised regulations stress the importance of "dynamically adjusting benefit standards to align with economic and social development and military needs." They also "establish care and assistance mechanisms, particularly for beneficiaries facing special difficulties."

China eyes anti-drone technology as key to future battlefield success

11 August 2024, SCMP, Amber Wang

China's military and private manufacturers have been urged to ramp up efforts to produce anti-drone weapons after seeing how effective they have been in the Ukraine war.

The People's Liberation Army has been watching closely how the technology has been employed on the battlefield, and has been testing its own capabilities in regular exercises.

The official military newspaper, The PLA Daily, has reported on some of these drills, the most recent being carried out in Kunming, the capital of Yunnan province.

Another article in May highlighted some of the technology being studied, including Britain's DragonFire, a high-powered laser weapon that was successfully tested in January.

The military has also published regular articles about the use of the technology in conflicts such as Ukraine and Gaza.

One article in June argued that "through the study of local wars in recent years, it is found that foreign militaries usually adopt detection, electronic jamming ... and other means to implement anti-UAV [unmanned aerial vehicle] operations, and often achieve good results".

It went on to call for the building of "smarter and higher-efficiency" anti-drones systems for the Chinese military.

Earlier this year, Globe Weekly, a magazine published by China's state news agency Xinhua, said in an article about Israel's air defences, that "whichever side can effectively counter the other side's use of drones can better seize the initiative on the battlefield".

According to a report by the Pentagon last year, the PLA's air defence unit concentrated on improving its tactical air defences against low-flying and suicide drones in 2022.

Drones have played a key part in the war in Ukraine, with both sides using them for reconnaissance and attacks on enemy troops.

But counter drone systems – whether they involve the use of missiles or jamming – are just as important on the battlefield.

The technology could also prove vital in any conflict in the Taiwan Strait, where the United States has threatened to deploy thousands of drones if mainland forces attack the island.

Admiral Samuel Paparo, the new head of the US Indo-Pacific Command, told the Washington Post in July the US had plans to create an "unmanned hellscape" in such an event.

Meanwhile, the Taiwanese authorities are developing their own anti-drone defences, budgeting NT$4.98 billion (US$156 million) this year to spend on the technology.

On the Chinese mainland, there is a thriving domestic market for the technology.

One employee at Jindowin, a firm in Nanjing that specialises in anti-drone technology, said the market was "booming", and Russia's war against Ukraine had been the turning point for domestic producers.

"Our business is impacted by international situations, such as the Russia-Ukraine war during which drones have been widely used. Our country's drones are amazing, and once there is a spear, there must be a shield," they said.

China has been steadily tightening restrictions on exports of drone technology that has military uses following repeated Western accusations it is tacitly supporting Russia's war effort.

But the Jindowin worker said the company had no overseas market and its products were mostly used for domestic security.

China imposed some of the strictest bans on civilian drones around the time of political events of various levels and there is strong domestic demand for drones to be used on such occasions.

The employee also said the country's economic system gave it an advantage by providing all elements of the supply chain, which helped to reduce costs and produce "high-quality and low-price products".

Tibetan prefecture marches toward modernization

09 August 2024, China Daily

After quitting her job in an auto parts company in a big city, Yeshe Lhamo decided to return to her rural hometown in the Northwest China plateau province of Qinghai two years ago to open a cafe.

Renowned for its yak butter coffee, the 90-square-meter cafe has become popular among tourists, and makes a profit of 20,000 yuan ($2,800) a month.

Yeshe Lhamo, 27, who hails from Maqen county, in the Golog Tibetan autonomous prefecture, said that as the "hope of my family, I used to study hard to break free from the confines of the mountains", but she now realizes those efforts gave her the means to "come back and build our hometown even better".

Established in 1954, the prefecture, at an average altitude of 4,200 meters, is nestled deep in the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau.

The harsh environment, with steep mountains, vast grasslands, thin air and an average annual temperature of – 4 C, made life difficult for the locals, who mainly relied on herding for a living and horses for transportation.

Despite the challenging natural conditions, the past 70 years have seen a remarkable turnaround for Golog. The prefecture now boasts over 13,000 kilometers of roads, ensuring connectivity to every town and village. It also has an airport, and expressways have been built in recent years.

There have also been 205 farming and animal husbandry industrial bases set up in the prefecture, starkly contrasting with the days when locals lived a nomadic lifestyle.

Through industries like animal husbandry and tourism, the prefecture, with a population of 222,000, achieved a GDP of 6.72 billion yuan last year.

The transformation from tents to apartments and from nomadic herdsmen to settled residents exemplifies Golog's journey from a state of backward feudal serfdom to thriving socialist modernization, said Ye Wanbin, head of the prefecture.

The progress was achieved through hard work. Zhou Wangzhong, deputy director of the prefecture's transport bureau, said building roads in Golog means digging tunnels in mountains and crossing permafrost areas.

"The construction workers had to endure the harsh conditions of high altitude," Zhou said. "No matter how difficult, the roads must be built because they symbolize hope for prosperity for our herdsmen."

As the prefecture advances toward modernity, residents have placed unprecedented emphasis on education, with their children benefiting from improved school facilities and resources.

Ngoje Nyima, who leads a herding life with his two children in Baima county, said that his greatest regret was dropping from school to go herding. Now, he is determined to ensure his children receive a good education. "I want them to go to school and not follow the old path of herding," he said.

With assistance from Shanghai, as part of a national scheme in which developed eastern regions support less developed western regions, Golog has built new schools across the prefecture, with teachers coming from Shanghai to support the teaching efforts.

"In our pastoral area, the most beautiful architecture is mostly schools," said Qi Yaqiong, president of a primary school in Madoi county.

The school has received 21.3 million yuan for the construction of the teaching building, sports ground and other facilities.

Since the 18th National Congress of the Communist Party of China in late 2012, 3.8 billion yuan has been spent on education infrastructure projects in Golog, resulting in the construction, upgrade and expansion of 135 schools, a news conference on the 70th anniversary of the prefecture's founding was told last month.

Students from families who were previously registered as poverty-stricken and later lifted out of poverty no longer drop out of school.

"After I graduate from university, I believe my hometown will be even better, and I will choose to go to places where I am needed most, becoming a teacher," said Nedong Lhamo, a senior high school student.

Pidu District in China's Chengdu leads way in urban- rural integrated development

03 August 2024, Bastille Post

Pidu District of Chengdu, capital of southwest China's Sichuan Province, stands at the forefront of promoting the integrated development between urban and rural areas, constantly seeking new avenues for shared prosperity by harmonizing urban and rural functions and industries.

Pidu District, the birthplace of the ancient Shu civilization and the source of the agricultural civilization of the upper reaches of the Yangtze River, has a historical and cultural DNA rooted in agricultural prosperity.

In recent years, Pidun has created a model of modern agricultural and rural development, treating the city and countryside as interconnected entities. The approach optimizes spatial layouts to create a business-friendly and livable countryside.

In China's Sichuan Cuisine Industrial City, based on the Pixian Douban intellectual super-property which has a brand value of 66.109 billion yuan, over a hundred enterprises have been engaged in intelligent production and manufacturing, driving innovation and reaping the benefits of urban-rural integration.

"In fact, it is a very traditional industry. We used to rely heavily on the operating experience of the staff. In order to ensure a more stable product quality, the whole production process is now standardized and we are also using a lot of intelligent equipment, including intelligent systems, to achieve traceability of our entire production process. This helps improve the competitiveness of the company. We are also committed to solving the local employment problem, focusing on the welfare of frontline production staff, including income improvement," said Ni Tiaoyuan, manufacturing manager of NGM biotechnology company.

China's Sichuan Cuisine Industrial City is the first industrial park named after a local cuisine. Over 19 years of development, it has insisted on technological empowerment, continuously enhanced its research and development, and supply chain management capabilities, and created more than 12,000 jobs.

"We support leading enterprises to establish chili, bean, pepper planting bases in Gansu, Xinjiang or Guizhou, so as to play the role of upstream and downstream drivers. We have also actively integrated into the new consumption industry, attracting tourists and promoting the integration of urban and rural exchanges from multiple perspectives," said Yang Li, deputy director of the Management Committee of Sichuan Cuisine Industrial City of China.

In Donglin Art Village of Pidū District, many agricultural, cultural and tourism integration projects have become Instagram-worthy places, attracting many visitors.

"My house is in Chengdu. I'm meeting a friend today. Usually everyone is very busy at work, so for the weekend, they would like to find a place to relax with friends. I checked online and found that the environment here is quite good, with good views of the countryside. People can be close to the countryside and enjoy the wonderful scenery. Outside the courtyard, there is a swimming pool. It is a great place to take pictures. So today, I have come here with my friend for afternoon tea," said Zhou Dan, a visitor. Chen Guo, president of Dezhiyuan Rice and Garlic Specialized Cooperative, reflected on the company's efforts on boosting the integrated development of urban and rural areas.

"After working in Shanghai for more than ten years, I wanted to return to my hometown for work. Donglin Art Village is relatively close to the city, and at the right stage to be developed. I am engaged in industrial analysis and regional planning, and I am very familiar with agriculture. I chose Donglin Village as I thought it is more suitable. Our company is engaged in the agricultural and service industry sector. It has more than 50 employees, and the vast majority of them come from the village. In addition, millions of yuan are paid for labor in agriculture every year, constituting the income of nearby villagers working in the fields. Our company is also a perfect example of rural revitalization efforts to boost personal income growth, which reflects the integration of urban and rural areas in China," said Chen.

The communiqué issued by the Third Plenary Session of the 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC) underscores the integration between urban and rural areas and called for efforts to promote the two-way flow and equal exchanges between urban and rural areas, with the aim of reducing urban-rural disparities and promoting prosperity and common development.

Taking advantage of regional advantages and characteristics, Pidū District is working hard to realize the idea that a city improves people's lives, while the countryside contributes to their happiness.

By harnessing the power of technology, Paralympic swimmers are gaining unprecedented insights into their performances, which empowers them to chase their dreams of gold in Paris and beyond.

One such device, resembling a fishing rod handle, is being used to measure the instantaneous speed, acceleration, and power of athletes as they move through the water. Attached to the athlete's body on one end and held by researchers on the other, the device transmits real-time biomechanical data to a computer, allowing athletes and coaches to optimize speed distribution.

"The device is connected to the end that I hold by a cord. The chip inside can connect to my computer, allowing us to calculate the distance the cord is pulled each frame, and from that, the acceleration. It can help us analyze the change in velocity over the cycle," said Li Shudong, a teacher at Ningbo University's School of Sports Science.

A more AI-driven system is added for more analysis, with underwater and poolside cameras automatically capturing and stitching together multi-angle footage. Advanced AI models then track key body points and provide objective feedback on the athlete's speed, angles, and trajectories, helping coaches and athletes identify areas for improvement.

"For example, when an athlete enters the water like this – his body forms a 'banana shape' – he will feel an obviously increased drag. The solution is to make the body slightly less than 180 degrees at the point of entry, allowing for a more streamlined entry," Li said in explaining how the system works.

For athletes like Zhang Li, who was born with cerebral palsy and relies only on her arms to propel herself through the water, these technologies are game-changers. Zhang claimed six golds and one silver medal at the Rio 2016 and Tokyo 2021 Paralympics, and is now using the cutting-edge system to strive for faster results.

"The margins between us in the same disability class are just fractions of a second. The technology allows us to more clearly and objectively compare and identify where we can improve, and where we are left behind," said Zhang, a member of China's 2024 Paralympic swimming team.

These advancements are also benefiting visually impaired athletes, like Yang Bozun, a five-time Paralympic swimmer who will be competing in Paris. Yang now trains with the added assistance of earphones, which allow his coach to provide instant feedback and instructions on his movements and timing while in the water.

"Even in the pool, the instructions from the coach come through the earphones clearly. If they notice something off with my movement, they can immediately remind me, and I can correct it at once. Knowing when to accelerate, when to slow down, when to turn, and when to sprint to the wall – this real-time feedback has reduced a lot of injuries. It's a warm comfort for us athletes," said Yang.

China's defence spending dwarfs rest of Asia combined, likely to be close to US

20 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China's economic growth may have hit a stubborn roadblock since hitting the Covid-19 pandemic brakes in 2020. Nevertheless, the country spent more on defence than the rest of Asia combined last year as President Xi Jinping progressed toward his goal of building a military to rival the United States, noted newswatch.com Jul 19, citing a peace research report.

This is based on estimates released by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI) in an April report, which compared China's military budget with the continent's next eight-largest defence spenders.

China is now stated to boast more warships than the US and to be rapidly building its stockpiles of nuclear warheads and ballistic missiles.

SIPRI's estimate is reported to show that China's military spending totalled nearly $296.4 billion in 2023, more than three times the defence budget of the second-largest spender in the region, India, at $83.6 billion. The two countries have been in a border standoff across eastern Ladakh since mid-2020.

The other 'big' spenders in Asia are stated to be Japan ($50.2 billion), South Korea ($47.2 billion), Taiwan ($16.6 billion), Singapore ($13.2 billion), Indonesia ($9.5 billion), Thailand ($5.8 billion) and the Philippines ($5.5 billion).

China also lays claim over more than 90% of the South China Sea maritime territory, riding roughshod over international law-based rights of other countries. Besides, it engages in grey zone warfare tactics against Taiwan, which it has vowed to annex, including by naked armed invasion if necessary.

The report notes that during a session of its rubber-stamp parliament in March, China announced a 7.2% increase in its defence budget for the year, bringing it to $236.1 billion.

But the country's actual defence spending is believed to be far higher than its as well as SIPRI reports. In fact, the Washington, DC-based American Enterprise Institute (AEI) has estimated, accounting for unreported expenditures, that China's 2022 military budget was about $711 billion, nearly equal to that of the US.

Xiao Liang, a researcher for SIPRI's Military Expenditure and Arms Production Programme, has said in the institute's report, "China is directing much of its growing military budget to boost the combat readiness of the People's Liberation Army."

SIPRI generally considers national data accurate unless there is compelling evidence to the contrary. Estimates are made when official data does not align with SIPRI's definition or lacks consistent time series coverage, the report said.

Beijing promises joint facility, but builds full army base in Tajikistan

16 July 2024, The Economic Times, Dipankar Roy Chaudhury

New Delhi: China may have duped Tajikistan by establishing a full-scale military base instead of a joint counter-terror facility in collaboration with the host's interior ministry as originally planned.

As reports emerged alleging that China has created a full-scale military base in the Central Asian country bordering Afghanistan, both China and Tajikistan recently denied the existence of a secret military base near Tajik-Afghan border.

However, ET has learnt that the Chinese military base, located in a remote mountainous area at an altitude of 13,000 feet, includes observation towers and hosts troops from China.

The purported counter-terror base was built following developments in Afghanistan and the agreement for the same may have been signed in 2021, sources said.

Both Russia and India have big stakes in Tajikistan. Any Chinese military facility in Central Asia, particularly in Tajikistan close to the Afghan border and Pakistan-occupied Kashmir (PoK), is a matter of concern for India as well as Russia.

While Russia has retained a military base in Tajikistan, India has worked closely with the country in the past to address terror threats in the region.

India operated out of Ayni air base in Tajikistan (near capital Dushanbe) and even deployed Sukhois, but later this facility was wound up. Between 2002 and 2010, India spent nearly $70 million to renovate the air base, extending the runway to 3,200 metres and installing state-of-the-art navigational and air defence equipment.

During the Cold War, Ayni served as a major base for the Soviet military in the region.

President Xi Jinping purges PLA generals in massive military overhaul

14 July 2024, Hindustan Times, Shishir Gupta

As per a list of officers facing purges in China compiled by HT through open-source intelligence, close to 52 top generals have faced the axe since 2014.

Chinese President Xi Jinping has been on a strident campaign to rid the country's armed forces of corruption and has powered through with major military reforms.

Since he took over as powerful general secretary of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) on November 15, 2012, and as the chairman of the Central Military Commission (CMC), Xi has conducted large-scale purges in the Peoples' Liberation Army (PLA). In this period, he fired two defence ministers and at least two vice chairmen of CMC, in addition to a large number of top officers on grounds of corruption, inefficiency, political rivalry and for resisting reforms in the PLA.

On June 19, addressing a political-military conference at Yanan, Jinping acknowledged that there were "deep-seated problems" in the Chinese military's politics, ideology, work style and discipline. He was quoted by state-run CCTV saying, "There must be no hiding place for corrupt elements in the army."

Another list compiled by HT shows that no less than 65 top PLA officers/ commissars/ commanders/ directors have been purged since 2012, with eight other generals being investigated for corruption and allied charges but not punished.

In fact, a report published in PLA daily in 2015 showed that in just two years, since 2013, 4,024 officers of the rank of Lt Colonel and above, including 82 generals, were the subject of anti-corruption inquiries. As a result of which 21 commanders and 144 officers were demoted and at least 77 were reprimanded.

Generals like Xu Caihou, who was vice chairman of CMC, was expelled from the party in June 2014 on charges of corruption but the charges were dropped after he passed away in March 2015. Another vice chairman Gen Guo Boxiong was purged by chairman Xi in July 2015.

Defence ministers Wei Fenghe and Li Shangfu were expelled from the Communist Party on charges of accepting gifts and facilitating benefits.

According to China watchers in India, the likely reason for purges in PLA, PLA Navy, Air Force or Rocket Forces is that during President Xi's first term, officers close to or appointed by the previous Hu Jintao and Wen Jiabao administrations were at higher echelons of PLA leadership – a position that meant they could exercise influence even after their political mentors went out of power – and that it was to check this that Xi replaced them.

Another key reason for the purge, they said, was the widespread rampant corruption in the PLA as viewed by Xi when he took over as chairman of CMC. In December 2012, Xi emphatically claimed that the PLA should be absolutely loyal to the party, absolutely clean and absolutely reliable. At the first meeting of the CMC under his leadership, Xi stated that the Chinese military, which controls the guns, cannot be a hiding place for corrupt figures.

The third reason for the purge, they added, was the inefficiency and opposition of top commanders to Xi's modernisation and mechanisation of the PLA.

With Xi determined to make PLA a world-class military rivalling the American armed forces, a large number of generals who were proving to be a hindrance or had performance deemed not up to the mark were fired by paramount leader Xi.

China redefining air power with huge stealth fighter rollout

10 July 2024, Asia Times, Gabriel Honrada

J-31B and J-20 fighters will boost carrier aviation, long-range maritime strike and deep penetration capabilities vis-a-vis US and India

China is on a roll with its rapid deployment of advanced fifth-generation fighters, potentially revolutionizing its airpower versus potential adversaries such as the US and India.

This month, Nikkei reported that China's new stealth combat aircraft, the J-31B, is expected to be deployed on its third aircraft carrier, the Fujian. Nikkei mentions that the fifth-generation fighter jet, revealed by Shenyang Aircraft Industry Group in late June, is designed for aircraft carrier use and will enhance the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) air and sea strategies.

The report says that the J-31B, which is more challenging to detect by radars and capable of coordinating with drones, is a significant upgrade from the current fourth-generation Shenyang J-15.

It says that the Fujian, China's largest aircraft carrier, is equipped with an electromagnetic catapult, allowing jets to carry more fuel and weapons, thus expanding their operational area and combat capabilities.

Nikkei notes that the J-31B is seen as a competitor to the US F-35 Lightning II and is part of China's ongoing efforts to increase its deployment of fifth-generation fighter jets, including the Chengdu J-20.

Janes reported last month that the PLA Air Force (PLA-AF) has significantly bolstered its fleet with the advanced Chengdu J-20 "Mighty Dragon" fifth-generation stealth fighters. Janes says that over 11 months leading up to July 2023, the PLA-AF incorporated over 70 J-20s, bringing the total to approximately 195 aircraft.

It notes that this expansion has enabled the replacement of older fourth-generation fighters like the Shenyang J-11s and Sukhoi Su-27SK/UKBs across multiple air brigades. The report also says that as of May 2024, the PLA-AF operated 12 air brigades equipped with J-20s, with three fully outfitted with the stealth fighter.

Jane's notes that the J-20's enhanced capabilities, such as airborne early warning and control (AEW&C), underscore its growing importance within the PLA-AF.

The Janes report points out that China's strategic deployment of the J-20s aligns with its objective to concurrently strengthen its five theater commands. It says recent satellite imagery indicates the presence of J-20s in the Eastern, Western, and Southern Theater Commands, with the Eastern Theater Command conducting aerial operations around Taiwan and projecting air power over the East China Sea.

Janes also notes that the increasing presence of J-20s near India, as observed at Shigatse Peace Airport in Tibet, suggests a strategic shift in China's military posture.

The J-31B may replace China's carrier aviation workhorse, the J-15. In November 2022, Asia Times pointed out that Chinese media have derisively referred to the aircraft as a "flopping fish" because of its minimal range and weapons payload.

The J-15's flight tests on the ski-ramp carrier Liaoning have shown that it can only travel up to 120 kilometers from the carrier when carrying heavy weapons. Additionally, if the J-15 is loaded with fuel, it can only carry up to 2 tons of weapons, even though its capacity is 12 tons.

The design of the Liaoning and Shandong aircraft carriers' ski ramps presents a significant challenge for launching aircraft weighing over 26 tons unless the aircraft has more powerful engines. Implementing the electromagnetic aircraft launch system (EMALS) on China's third aircraft carrier, the Fujian, may allow it to use newer aircraft types such as the J-31B. On capability, the South China Morning Post (SCMP) mentioned this month that in addition to stealth, the J-31B features weapons bays on both sides, noting that such a feature could significantly increase its combat capabilities.

SCMP says that each weapons bay can carry two missiles, distinguishing the J-31B from the US F-22 and China's J-20, which have side weapon bays but can carry only one missile in each. It notes that the J-31B's added weapons payload can increase its combat capabilities in close-range fighting.

As for armaments, Brandon Weichert notes in an article this month for The National Interest (TNI) that the J-31B has an active electronically scanned array (AESA) radar, an electro-optical targeting system and a helmet-mounted display system.

Weichert mentions that the J-31B can carry an assortment of munitions, such as the PL-10 and PL-15 air-to-air missiles (AAM), various guided bombs, and air-to-ground missiles (AGM). He says that while many dispute China's claims about the J-31B, the aircraft may be a decent counterpart to the US F-35.

As for the J-20, a February 2017 China Power report says that opinions vary about the J-20's role, ranging from the aircraft being a long-range interceptor for aerial engagements to a long-range strike aircraft designed to penetrate enemy air defenses and destroy critical infrastructure.

The report says that the J-20 could target intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance (ISR) aircraft and aerial tankers with long-range AAMs in an interceptor role. In a strike role, it says that possible targets could include airfields, command centers, and other military installations.

Furthermore, the report says that the J-20's stealth and range could enable it to threaten US warships and that J-20s in a maritime strike role may be a more significant threat than short-range air superiority fighters.

Newsweek mentioned in an article last month that China's deployment of J-20 fighters at Shigatse and H-6 bombers at Hotan in the Taklamakan Desert raises the threat to India in its Sikkim-Arunachal Pradesh region.

While the Newsweek report says that India's S-400 surface-to-air missiles (SAM) and Rafale fighters can challenge China's J-20, the J-20's stealth capabilities must be factored into its air threat wargames.

Despite China's advances in fifth-generation fighters, such developments may be overrated while China may still face significant challenges in developing such sophisticated aircraft.

Owen Sirrs says in a 2020 Journal of Indo-Pacific Affairs article that as political regimes may flaunt sophisticated military equipment for prestige reasons, China is no exception and that alarmist conclusions about the J-31B should not be drawn from limited glimpses at a distance.

Sirrs says that while China has made significant strides in fighter aircraft design, it is still behind in critical technologies such as jet engines.

In line with that analysis, Alex Hollings says in a February 2024 TNI article that a stealth fighter's performance relies heavily on its engine's power, and only the US can build high-end jet engines in quantities enough to equip a high-end fighter fleet.

Hollings notes that while China and Russia are fielding new jet engines such as the WS-15 and AL-51, new US technologies like adaptive cycle engines with advanced composites and ceramics may maintain the US's lead in jet engine production.

Sirrs also points out that a modern fighter integrates avionics, weapons systems, electronic countermeasures, radar, and other systems, not just one piece of cutting-edge technology.

Lastly, Sirrs says that China's J-20 and J-31B may face obsolescence problems as they employ technology developed by the US more than two decades ago. He adds that advances in aviation technology, such as sensors and combat drones, could render China's stealth fighters obsolete in a war scenario.

Satellite images show China's new bunker near Pangong Lake in eastern Ladakh

10 July 2024, Phayul, Tenzin Nyidon

The situation at Indo-Tibetan border near Ladakh may escalate after China reportedly constructed extensive underground bunkers and hardened shelters at a crucial base, according to satellite images by BlackSky, a US-based firm. These images show Chinese military build-up at Sirjap, an area claimed by India, located over 120 km southeast of the Galwan Valley, the site of a brutal skirmish in June 2020.

Satellite images by BlackSky reveal China's extensive military build-up near Pangong Lake (Photo/Hindustan Times)

The satellite images show China's preparation for a long-term presence with eight sloping entrances to large underground bunkers and five entrances to smaller bunkers intended for ammunition and fuel storage. Additionally, hardened shelters for armoured vehicles have been established at Sirjap Post, which serves as a headquarters, just 5 km from the Line of Actual Control (LAC) at the Indo-Tibet border.

There has been no immediate response from New Delhi or Indian officials regarding the images. A former Indian Army commander who served in the Pangong Lake region, speaking anonymously to Hindustan Times, remarked, "In today's battlefield, everything can be pinpointed using satellites or aerial surveillance platforms. We have no such underground shelters on our side. Tunnelling is the only way out to create better defences."

"Without underground shelters, weapons and stores are sitting ducks for air strikes with precision-guided munitions. The Chinese are pioneers in tunnelling activities and no hi-tech is required for these structures, just civil engineering skills and funds. Otherwise, we have to invest in more air defence equipment," he added.

The developments at Pangong Lake have emerged at a time when, before the start of the standoff on the LAC in May 2020, this region was almost completely devoid of human habitation. However, India has since constructed roads, bridges, tunnels, airfields, and helipads for military logistics. India's Border Roads Organisation (BRO) completed 125 infrastructure projects worth Rs. 3,611 crore in 2023-24.

The activity at Pangong Lake coincides with increased Chinese operations at the Shigatse airbase in Tibet on May 30. Satellite images from that period showed six J-20 and eight J-10 jets at the Shigatse airbase. Shigatse airbase is 300 km from India's Hasimara base, which hosts Rafale jets. Analysts believe China's J-20 deployment aims to counter the Indian Air Force's (IAF) Rafales, among the most advanced aircraft in the IAF's arsenal.

Exclusive: India races to build power plants in region claimed by China

India plans to spend $1 billion to expedite the construction of 12 hydropower stations in the northeastern Himalayan state of Arunachal Pradesh, two government sources said, a move that could raise tensions with China that lays claims to the region.

The federal finance ministry under Nirmala Sitharaman recently approved up to 7.5 billion rupees ($89.85 million) in financial assistance to each hydropower project in the northeastern region, the sources said.

Under the scheme, about 90 billion rupees will likely be allotted for the 12 hydropower projects in Arunachal Pradesh, said the sources, who have direct knowledge of the matter.

The scheme is likely to support northeastern states and help them finance equity holdings in the projects they host. Having state governments on board generally helps in expediting regulatory clearances, locals rehabilitation and negotiations on sharing electricity with the host state.

The plans for the hydropower stations are expected to be announced in the 2024/2025 federal budget that Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government will unveil on July 23, the sources said, declining to be named as the information remained confidential.

The Indian finance and power ministries and China's foreign ministry did not immediately respond to Reuters' requests for comment.

Last August, the government awarded contracts to state-run firms NHPC (NHPC.NS), opens new tab, SJVNL (SJVN.NS), opens new tab and NEEPCO for the construction of the 11.5-gigawatt-capacity plants entailing an estimated investment of $11 billion, as part of a broader project to develop infrastructure in the border region.

None of the companies responded to a request for comments.

These power plants were earlier enlisted with private sector firms, but remained non-starters due to various reasons.

India has built less than 15-gigawatt hydropower plants in the last 20 years, while installations of new coal and other renewable sources of energy were nearly 10 times of the new hydropower projects.

India and China share a 2,500 km (1553.43 mile) largely un-demarcated border, over which they fought a war in 1962.

India says Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of the country, but China claims it is a part of southern Tibet, and has objected to other Indian infrastructure projects there.

The Indian government is pushing projects in the eastern region following reports that Beijing could construct dams on a section of the Brahmaputra river, known as the Yarlung Tsangpo in China, that flows from Tibet through Arunachal Pradesh.

India is concerned that Chinese projects in the region could trigger flash floods or create water scarcity.

Both countries are working to improve infrastructure along their border regions since clashes in western Himalayas left 20 Indian and at least four Chinese troops dead in 2020.

Last week, India Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi in Kazakhstan where the two agreed to step up talks to resolve issues along their border.

China's military sends troops to Laos for 2-week joint military drills

09 July 2024, RFA

Chinese troops have arrived in Laos for a two-week exercise with the Lao military on the outskirts of Vientiane, just weeks after a similar training in Cambodia that's part of a push by Beijing to strengthen ties with Southeast Asian countries.

Some 300 Chinese troops and about 900 Lao military personnel are participating in the Laos-China Friendship Shield-2024 exercise, which began on July 5, according to Lt. Col. Santi Chanthalangsonge, who directs training for Laos' armed forces.

Most of the Chinese participants and military equipment arrived on the newly constructed Laos-China railway, which was funded mostly through loans from Beijing's Belt and Road Initiative.

"Participants will focus on technical cooperation and how to use armed vehicles and weapons," Santi Chanthalangsonge told local media on July 5.

"The Chinese side might have weapons and experiences that can be shared with us," he said.

"The drill will help strengthen our military ties, organize and modernize our armed forces."

The exercises at the Kommadam Military Academy will last until July 18, he said.

'China's backyard'

The two militaries also held exercises in May 2023, when they trained for a joint attack on transnational armed crime syndicates operating in a mountain jungle environment.

Laos also participated in military exercises in China's Guangdong province last November that included the militaries from Cambodia, Malaysia, Thailand and Vietnam.

Laos' dire economic conditions and its large national debt – most of which is owed to China – means that it realistically can't hold military exercises with anyone else, according to Prof. Adisorn Semyaem, a researcher on Lao studies at Thailand's Chulalongkorn University.

"The drill could affect its ties with Vietnam. It won't be easy for Laos. Laos and Vietnam share the same border," he said. "But Laos is also in China's backyard."

China has been seeking closer military-to-military cooperation with its regional neighbors to respond to what it calls "interference" from the United States and its allies.

The United States conducts annual war games in Indonesia and Thailand, and in April it held a large-scale drill with its mutual defense treaty partner, the Philippines.

In May, Chinese troops went to Sihanoukville in Cambodia to take part in the largest ever bilateral military exercise between those two countries.

Chinese warships have also been spotted since December at a new Chinese-built pier at Cambodia's Ream Naval Base. Cambodia has repeatedly denied that China is being given exclusive military access to the base.

The First Electrified Railway in Tibet: Achievements and Prospects

07 July 2024, Railway Supply

The commissioning of the first electrified railway in the Tibet Autonomous Region in southwestern China has become a significant event for both the region and the entire country, this is reported by the railway transport news portal Railway Supply.

Three years since the opening of the Lhasa-Nyingchi line on June 25, 2021, the China Railway Qinghai-Tibet Group reported that over 3 million passengers and more than 783,000 tons of cargo have been transported.

Ukrzaliznytsia launches a new project: UZ Energo
This achievement indicates significant changes in the region's transportation infrastructure and economy.

Transportation Advantages

The Lhasa-Nyingchi line, stretching about 435 kilometers, has reduced travel time between these two important points from 5 to 3.5 hours, greatly enhancing accessibility and convenience for locals and tourists.

The high-speed Fuxing electric trains operating on this line reach speeds of up to 160 km/h, making travel not only fast but also comfortable.

Notably, over 90% of the route runs at an altitude of more than 3000 meters, which is a unique engineering feat.

Economic Development and Tourism

In 2023, the city of Nyingchi was visited by more than 13 million tourists, generating revenue of 11.6 billion yuan (about 1.6 billion US dollars).

The development of railway infrastructure has opened new opportunities for tourism, improved the quality of life for residents, and contributed to the creation of new jobs.

The railway has also played a crucial role in the transportation of local goods, handicrafts, and agricultural products, fostering regional business and economic growth.

Construction of the Sichuan-Tibet Railway

The Lhasa-Nyingchi line is part of the ongoing Sichuan-Tibet railway project, which will span over 1600 kilometers.

The first section of this railway, Chengdu-Ya'an, was put into operation in December 2018.

SOF Pic of the Day: People's Armed Police Tibet Special Warfare Detachment – Guardians of the Roof of the World

07 July 2024, SOFREP, Guy D. McCardle

Elite operatives from the PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment demonstrate their readiness and tactical prowess in high-stakes urban combat scenarios.

For today's SOF Pic of the Day, I've found a rather unusual photo for you. It's not every day we talk about the Tibetan People's Armed Police (PAP).

The People's Armed Police (PAP) Tibet Special Warfare Detachment, often called the Tibet Special Police, plays a crucial role in maintaining security and order in one of the world's most challenging regions. Operating in Tibet's high-altitude, rugged terrain, this elite unit is tasked with counterterrorism, riot control, and other special operations that demand exceptional physical and mental resilience.

Origins and Structure

The PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment was formed to address the unique security needs of the Tibet Autonomous Region. Given Tibet's strategic significance and the potential for unrest, this unit was established to provide a rapid response force capable of handling a wide range of security challenges.

The unit is part of the larger People's Armed Police Force, which operates under the dual leadership of the Central Military Commission and the State Council of China.

Make no mistake, these are Chinese warriors.

Training for the PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment is intense and tailored to the harsh conditions of the Tibetan Plateau. Recruits undergo rigorous physical conditioning to cope with the thin air and extreme weather. High-altitude acclimatization is a crucial part of their training regimen, which includes long-distance marches, mountain climbing, and survival skills.

The detachment is also trained in various aspects of modern warfare, including counterterrorism, urban combat, and hostage rescue. It is equipped with advanced weaponry and tactical gear, ensuring it is prepared for any situation. Specialized training in snow and ice combat and high-altitude marksmanship sets it apart from other units.

Operations and Responsibilities

The PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment's primary responsibility is to maintain stability and security in Tibet. This includes counterterrorism operations to neutralize threats posed by separatist groups and extremists. The unit also plays a vital role in riot control, ensuring that protests and demonstrations do not escalate into violence.

One of their key missions is to protect critical infrastructure and important landmarks, such as the Potala Palace and Jokhang Temple. These sites are not only of cultural and historical significance but also potential targets for terrorist attacks.

Challenges and Adaptability

Operating in Tibet presents unique challenges. The high altitude can cause altitude sickness, fatigue, and decreased performance, even for well-trained soldiers. The extreme cold and unpredictable weather further complicate their operations. Despite these challenges, the PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment has proven adaptable and resilient.

Their ability to conduct operations in such a demanding environment is a testament to their rigorous training and dedication. The unit continuously evolves its tactics and strategies to address emerging threats and changing regional conditions.

International Perception and Controversy

The presence and activities of the PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment are not without controversy. Human rights organizations have criticized the unit's involvement in suppressing protests and unrest in Tibet. Allegations of excessive force and human rights abuses have drawn international condemnation.

China, however, maintains that the detachment is essential for maintaining stability and combating terrorism in a volatile region. The government argues that the unit's actions are necessary to ensure the safety and security of both Tibetans and Chinese nationals in the area.

Conclusion

The PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment symbolizes China's commitment to maintaining control and security in Tibet. Its operations in one of the most challenging environments on Earth highlight its unique capabilities and resilience. While its role is often mired in controversy, this elite unit's critical importance in safeguarding the region's stability cannot be denied.

As geopolitical tensions continue to evolve, the PAP Tibet Special Warfare Detachment will remain a key player in China's strategy for the Tibetan Plateau, embodying the delicate balance between security and human rights in one of the world's most contentious regions.

Satellite images reveal China's military build-up near Pangong Lake, India's western border

07 July 2024, First Post, Prakriti Jash

The developments at Pangong Lake coincide with new images indicating increased Chinese military activity at Shigatse air base, a dual-use high-altitude airport in the Tibet Autonomous Region's second largest city, and the disputed Doklam tri-junction, the site of a 73-day standoff between Indian and Chinese troops in 2017

According to satellite pictures, China's military is preparing for the long haul in the area surrounding Pangong Lake in eastern Ladakh, having built subterranean bunkers to store weapons and fuel, as well as hardened shelters for armoured vehicles at a crucial base in the region.

The People's Liberation Army (PLA) post at Sirjap, hidden among mountains on the northern bank of Pangong Lake, is the headquarters for Chinese forces stationed around the lake. It was established in an area claimed by India and is around 5 km from the Line of Actual Control (LAC). Until the start of the LAC conflict in May 2020, this region was nearly entirely free of human settlements.

The station, which will be erected between 2021 and 2022, will have subterranean bunkers that may be used to store missile systems, fuel, or other supplies, according to photos given by BlackSky, a US-based company capable of obtaining photographs 15 times each day with its satellites. One photograph, taken on May 30, clearly depicts the eight sloping entrances to a massive subterranean bunker. A smaller bunker with five entrances is positioned near the bigger one.

Aside from many big command buildings, the site contains reinforced shelters and covered parking for armoured vehicles stationed in the region. According to experts, these shelters are designed to shield cars from air assaults using precision-guided weapons.

On the condition of anonymity, a BlackSky analyst said the base hosts an expanse of armoured vehicle storage facilities, test ranges, and fuel and munitions storage buildings. According to the analyst, the base's current construction comprises artillery and other defensive positions fortified by enormous berms and connected by a vast network of roads and trenches that are not apparent on publicly available mapping apps.

The outpost is located somewhat more than 120 km southeast of Galwan Valley, the location of a deadly combat in June 2020 that killed 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese forces.

There was no immediate response from Indian officials to the photographs. A former Indian Army general who deployed in the region surrounding Pangong Lake, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said China's expanded development of subterranean infrastructure made perfect military sense.

According to those familiar with the situation, India has built a number of roads, bridges, tunnels, airfields, and helipads around its borders for military movement and logistics support since the stalemate began in 2020.

India's infrastructure development has focused on improving troops' living conditions and amenities, as well as protecting weapons and equipment in forward regions. This border infrastructure drive has been fueled by greater investment and the rapid implementation of important projects to assist military operations.

In 2023-24, the Border Roads Organisation (BRO) completed 125 infrastructure projects totaling ₹3,611 crore, including the Sela tunnel in Arunachal Pradesh.

The developments at Pangong Lake coincide with new images indicating increased Chinese military activity at Shigatse air base, a dual-use high-altitude airport in the Tibet Autonomous Region's second largest city, and the disputed Doklam tri-junction, the site of a 73-day standoff between Indian and Chinese troops in 2017.

While satellite photographs from earlier this year showed roughly half a dozen Chengdu J-20s, China's most sophisticated stealth combat fighter, at the Shigatse facility, a BlackSky image dated May 30 showed six J-20s parked next to eight Chengdu J-10 multi-role combat jets on the centre apron.

The Shigatse facility is around 300 km from the Indian Air Force's (IAF) Hasimara base in West Bengal, which contains a squadron of Rafale combat planes. Experts think China's deployment of J-20s is aimed at combating the IAF's Rafales, which are among its most modern aircraft.

While some J-20s have been deployed in Xinjiang, the majority of these planes have been stationed in China's coastal and interior regions, and their deployment in Tibet signals a significant shift, according to analysts. A more recent satellite image from June 30 showed at least two J-10 planes on the centre apron of the Shigatse Air Base.

Satellite photographs of the Doklam plateau show China maintaining an extensive network of roads that connect military equipment near the disputed boundary with India. A large number of military vehicles were discovered in a satellite photograph from April, both in the rear base and forward

Chinese crews drill through Xinjiang glacial area for 'super-long' highway tunnel

06 July 2024, SCMP, Coy Li

Huge boring machine to cut passage for crucial north-south link providing vital connection to Central Asia.

A Chinese construction team in charge of excavating a tunnel in one of the longest mountain ranges in the world has embarked on the most challenging part of the mega project – slicing several kilometres through a glacial area.

The 15.7km (9.8 mile) long West Tianshan Super-long Tunnel is part of a major highway connecting southern and northern areas of China's vast western Xinjiang region. It is expected to help boost trade and tourism and provide a vital link to Central Asia under the Beijing-led Belt and Road Initiative.

The construction team on Wednesday launched a domestically built tunnel boring machine (TBM) to drill the main passageway for the tunnel, state news agency Xinhua reported.

G219 Zhaosu-Wensu Highway Project

The 1,800 tonne machine, dubbed "Wensu", was designed and developed by the state-owned China Communications Construction Company. It is 235 metres (771 feet) long and has a diameter of 8.83 metres, making it the widest such machine in use among the tunnel boring projects currently under way at Tianshan, according to Communist Party mouthpiece People's Daily.

About two-thirds of the 2,500km Tianshan range – which stretches into Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan in Central Asia – is located in Xinjiang. Its average altitude is about 4,000 metres (over 13,000 feet).

The West Tianshan tunnel will be China's first to cut a straight path through a glacial area. More than three-quarters, or nearly 12km, will run through rock under 1km of ice, with some sections under as much as 2.4km of ice.

Wensu is also the most advanced TBM to traverse the Tianshan range, a seismically active region with average temperatures of about minus 23 degrees Celsius (minus 10 Fahrenheit) in the winter. The geological conditions present unique safety and environmental challenges for tunnel boring, including water inrush, rock bursts and variable ground temperatures, Xinhua reported in April.

Construction on the tunnel started in September and is scheduled for completion in 2026. The project is the most important segment of the 237km Zhaosu-Wensu or G219 highway, connecting Zhaosu county in northern Xinjiang to Wensu county in the south, according to People's Daily.

Due to open to traffic in 2027, the highway will be part of a major transport route linking China to Russia, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, Kyrgyzstan and Pakistan, as well as a key connection between Xinjiang and Tibet.

China has started work on several highways and tunnels in Xinjiang in recent years, including the Tianshan Shengli tunnel – a crucial section of the 1,300km Urumqi-Yuli Expressway linking the regional capital to Yuli county in central Xinjiang.

The 22.1km passage will be the world's longest such tunnel when the highway opens to traffic late next year.

Poised along the Indian border, Chinese troops are there for the long haul

02 July 2024, ANI

The bloody combat operations occurring in Ukraine and Gaza, plus the tensions heating up in the South China Sea, dominate news headlines and make it easy to forget that the People's Liberation Army (PLA) - China's armed forces - continues to strengthen its position along China's southern border with India.

In the Annual Threat Assessment of the US Intelligence Community, published earlier this year, border tensions between China and India merited only a single paragraph amidst all the other conflicts, threats and tensions that currently abound in the world.

Nonetheless, the report assessed that "The shared disputed border between India and China will remain a strain on their bilateral relationship."

It continued, "While the two sides have not engaged in significant cross-border clashes since 2020, they are maintaining large troop deployments, and sporadic encounters between opposing forces risk miscalculation and escalation into armed conflict."

In April this year, the Strategic Studies Institute of the US Army War College published an in-depth report examining PLA activity along the mountainous border in Aksai Chin opposite India in 2020-21. The author, Dennis Blasko, primarily considered how the PLA rapidly moved troops into the region as violence flared between Chinese and Indian troops in Galwan Valley on 15-16 June 2020. However, Blasko, a former US defence attache in Beijing and Hong Kong, also provided a useful assessment of current and future conditions along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

He assessed, "Barring negotiations with the Indian military and government to withdraw out-of-area combat troops, the PLA appears ready to maintain its deployments near the LAC in Aksai Chin and on the border at Doklam indefinitely."

He continued: "In the case of Aksai Chin, due to the challenges of transporting large mechanized units over long distances, rotations of units into and out of the region will likely occur after a prolonged tour of duty (perhaps six months to a year or more). The situation has taken the form of PLA border operations against Vietnam following the 1979 war until 1987, albeit with fewer troops and less actual combat and artillery bombardment."

He pointed out that the Chinese army's "extended border reinforcement operations serve both political and military purposes, and provide the units and staffs in the Western Theater Command with real-world operational and logistics experience that cannot be achieved through routine peacetime training".

Unfortunately, little is known about how PLA units prepare for, assemble and travel to and from their home bases to the LAC. Once in position, these units are sustained by supply depots more than 1,600km away. Incidentally, the Western Theater Command defends nearly half of China's landmass with just a quarter of the PLA ground force's total troops. The theater command possesses two group armies, plus the Xinjiang and Tibet Military Districts, which are equipped unlike any other PLA provincial military district.

Blasko made heavy use of Google Earth satellite coverage of the Aksai China area in his research for the US Army War College, and because some imagery is not up to date, he could not provide a reliable assessment of current deployments. He said, "Although China's state media continues to report on units on the 'front line' or in 'battle positions' in the Karakoram region (without specifying Aksai Chin), it has done so without revealing the total number of troops deployed or their exact locations."

Nonetheless, the former US officer assessed that "enough fortified positions were constructed in the various PLA-controlled sectors since the spring of 2020 to support a full division-size deployment - or roughly 10,000 personnel - on top of the two border defence regiments (approximately 5,000 personnel) already assigned to the region. Further, these units are reinforced by engineer, artillery and support elements (probably numbering several thousand more personnel)."

In all, he calculated the PLA has approximately 20,000 soldiers arrayed over 400km front in Aksai Chin, in a zone reaching back more than 32km from the LAC.

Furthermore, "This number may be higher during the period in which an out-of-area unit that has spent time on the LAC rotates out and is replaced by a fresh unit entering the area. Nonetheless, the 20,000 figure is a considerably smaller estimate of PLA personnel deployed in the disputed region than the 40,000-60,000 frequently asserted in non-Chinese media."

Perhaps comfortingly, Blasko concluded that 20,000 troops scattered across such a broad front is "inadequate to conduct a large-scale offensive across the difficult terrain delineated by the LAC". Any offensive would necessitate a build-up of units and supplies if the PLA were to attempt a substantial incursion beyond the border. For defensive operations, PLA doctrine recommends a divisional front that is 15-20 km wide and 20-30 km deep. For offensive operations, that front would sharpen to be some 5-8km wide and 4-8km deep. Obviously, the disposition of Chinese troops along the LAC is nowhere close to that at present and, even at the peak of tensions in mid-2020, the front was in fact some 160km wide from Galwan Valley to Rechin La. At that time, the PLA's combined-arms regiment deployed to Galwan was lined up in a valley less than quarter of a mile wide, and separated by more than 50km from the nearest combat unit. Likewise, two combined-arms regiments in the south deployed over a 40km front, separated by Pangong and Spanggur Lakes, so they could not mutually support each other via land manoeuvres.

Of course, the terrain in that rugged, high-altitude part of the world does not favour large-scale armored or mechanized combat operations. This is because mountains and valleys channel advances and prohibit lateral movement.

Asked about the terrain, Blasko told ANI: "I just don't think they want to pack too many troops and vehicles into such bad terrain, because they'd just make lucrative targets if fighting actually starts - lucrative to air, missile or artillery attack. In a prolonged conflict, this is light infantry terrain where people will be trying to gain control of ridges, hilltops and areas for long-range observation. In most areas, the new tanks and armored personnel carriers and everything else would really be constricted. This is a very, very tough place to operate, even when you have air and artillery support."

Blasko also pointed out in his detailed report that "PLA units have been positioned to consolidate and hold territory, to conduct patrols and protect construction projects, and to create 'facts on the ground', similar to the reef expansion operations in the South China Sea a decade ago." Indeed, the PLA is "prepared to stay in the region for as long as it takes for the two governments to negotiate a solution."

Actually, there are many similarities between China's aggressive modus operandi along the Indian border and its nefarious reef-building and territory-grabbing activities in the South China Sea.

Speaking of which, the confrontation between the China Coast Guard (CCG) and the Philippines near Second Thomas Shoal on 17 June came precipitously close to armed conflict. It was the most serious confrontation ever recorded between the two sides, as CCG personnel attempted to prevent resupply of the Philippine military garrison on the beached BRP Sierra Madre vessel there. Chinese personnel operated extremely close to the grounded ship at Second Thomas Shoal, and then proceeded to wield knives and an axe, and ram a Philippine boat in an action that resulted in a Philippine sailor losing a thumb. China seized a Philippine rubber dinghy and confiscated firearms during the confrontation.

China claimed that the CCG exercised restraint and acted "professionally and reasonably" in this skirmish, despite extremely contrary video evidence released by Manila. China's violent actions so close to the Sierra Madre, just short of boarding it, demonstrate how it is escalating tensions and testing Manila's red lines. In fact, its seizure of another military's boat could perhaps legally be construed as an act of war.

Earlier this year, President Ferdinand Marcos Jr warned that the Philippine-US Mutual Defense Treaty could be invoked if a civilian or serviceman is killed in these fiery exchanges in the South China Sea. Beijing is presently flirting with that possibility.

The Philippine personnel under attack on 17 June were from the Naval Special Operations Command, and they could easily have fought back against the lesser-trained CCG. The Philippines thus exercised remarkable restraint, and its troops also refrained from firing warning shots. This is because Manila is wary of China baiting it into escalatory behavior. On 23 June, Marcos told personnel watching over the South China Sea that the Philippines is "not in the business to instigate wars".

Unfortunately, however, this whole incident reinforced to Beijing how Manila is reticent about escalating tensions, and that the US is reluctant to get more heavily involved. China's probes are discovering that Philippine red lines are quite stretchy and flexible. Of course, China uses the same probing tactics along the LAC, but India has demonstrated that only ongoing and robust action can dissuade China from its bullying provocations.

Doklam along the Sino-Indian border was another site where Indian and Chinese troops clashed in 2017, and Blasko highlighted how the situation there exhibited similar, but smaller, characteristics. The American observed: "Based on my analysis of Google Earth imagery, the Tibet Military District light combined-arms brigade located in Yadong County has established protected positions to reinforce border defence units stationed along the border with Bhutan. But likely only one reinforced combined-arms battalion at a time of the combined-arms brigade is deployed on about a one-mile-wide front at Doklam to a depth of about three miles. Forward-deployed units are supported by the brigade's artillery battalion operating from newly built hillside bunkers to the rear."

After the Galwan Valley clash, units from the Xinjiang Military District reinforced the two border defense regiments already stationed in Aksai Chin. Over the next six months, the PLA established fortified defensive positions along the LAC. The latter activity was known as the 506 Special Mission, and since then has involved ongoing rotational deployments. Blasko shared: "Until a negotiated political settlement is reached, the Western Theater Command is prepared to sustain the rotation of units into and out of the region in the largest near-combat deployment since the end of the border conflict with Vietnam in 1987."

China has been feverishly beaver away on creating new infrastructure, such as two bridges it put across the narrowest part of Lake Pangong. One bridge is estimated to be 6m wide and the other 11m wide, able to support the movement of troops, equipment and supplies. China has also been building a road from the bridge to the Moldo garrison and PLA base camp behind Lake Spanggur, which would facilitate faster tactical deployments of troops.

To better prepare troops for living in such high-altitude areas, the PLA Tibet Military Command and the Department of Highland Military Medicine of the PLA Army Medical University launched a pilot program for low-pressure hypoxia cabin acclimation training for recruits before they deploy.

According to Chinese media, this training has improved acclimatization and permitted operational deployments in shorter periods of time. The PLA has even created "vegetable factories" at altitudes as high as 5,270m to provide border defence troops with fresh greens.

Asked earlier whether further border confrontations could happen along the Sino-Indian border, Blasko told ANI, "Yes, I think there's a possibility of conflict, especially as small units come into close proximity with each other. There are probably a lot of low-level people on both sides looking for a fight." (ANI)

Xi eyes military supremacy as he reorganises China's armed forces

24 June 2024, Aljazeera, Frederik Kelter

China has been giving the democratic island of Taiwan – and the rest of the world – an indication of its growing military prowess in recent months.

In the run-up to Taiwan's elections in January, the island's information sphere was bombarded with coordinated cyberattacks and disinformation campaigns.

Beijing claims Taiwan as its own and has not ruled out the use of force to bring the island under its control.

Following the inauguration of the Taiwanese government last month, Chinese military might was on full display as the Chinese armed forces surrounded Taiwan in two days of drills during which Chinese state media released an animated video showing missiles raining down on major Taiwanese cities.

After the exercises, a Chinese military spokesperson said the country's armed forces remained fully prepared, highly vigilant and ready to take resolute action when it came to Taiwan.

Later in May, China's newest and most advanced aircraft carrier also sailed out from Shanghai on its first sea trials – placing the Chinese navy second only to the United States in the number of aircraft carriers in its fleet.

But despite the relentless demonstration of the military's increasing sophistication, some analysts wonder how much confidence Chinese President Xi Jinping has in his armed forces.

Last week, Xi told a military conference that there were "deep-seated problems" throughout the armed forces and change was necessary.

His comments followed a ceremony in April where he unveiled the largest reorganisation of the Chinese military in almost 10 years.

"It came as a shock, and it shows that Xi is not satisfied with the existing structure and the current capabilities of the Chinese military," Yang Zi, a PhD student at the S Rajaratnam School of International Studies (RSIS) at Nanyang Technological University in Singapore, told Al Jazeera.

Purges and corruption

For many observers, the most unexpected element of the reorganisation was the elimination of the Strategic Support Force (SSF).

"There have been problems, purges and corruption probes in other divisions of the military," Christina Chen, a research fellow at the Taiwanese security think tank Institute for National Defense and Security Research (INDSR), told Al Jazeera.

"But we haven't heard of similar trouble within the Strategic Support Force, so there was little indication leading up to this announcement that the SSF was in line to be reorganised."

Xi was himself involved with the creation of the SSF, which was unveiled at the last major Chinese military restructuring in 2015.

The SSF was an elite body tasked with accelerating the development of armed forces' space and cyber warfare capabilities and improving data sharing across services and theatres by 2020

But by mid-2019, a white paper from China's Ministry of Defence found that SSF progress had been slow even as advanced data and intelligence were expected to play an ever more decisive role in future conflicts.

The end of the SSF indicates a loss of faith in the ability of the 2015 reforms to prepare for such conflicts and suggests the Chinese leadership will be playing an even greater role in military modernisation, according to Chen.

Instead of the SSF, the fields of space, information and cyber warfare are being placed within their own divisions directly under the supervision of the Central Military Commission, which Xi chairs.

The new structure will be vital in helping the Chinese military “fight and win in modern warfare,” Xi said when he announced the reforms.

Modern warfare is a field currently dominated by the United States military, said Chen, who sees the reorganisation as a further indication of Beijing’s determination to catch up with Washington.

Beijing and Washington find themselves on opposite sides in several disputes in the South China Sea, the East China Sea and the Taiwan Strait.

Washington has accused Beijing, which has been involved in a number of confrontations with the Philippines at several contested reefs, of threatening regional peace with its aggressive conduct, while Beijing has accused Washington of meddling in Asian affairs that do not concern it.

“Xi’s long-term goal is to surpass the United States militarily and make China the leading military power in the region and the world,” Chen said.

The military reorganisation comes amid what has been described as the biggest purge in Chinese military history, with key leaders being fired or disappearing from view.

Much of the upheaval has taken place within the armed forces elite Rocket Force, which oversees Beijing’s tactical and nuclear missiles and was supposed to be among the military’s most capable units.

“The Rocket Force purges of last year showed that the Chinese armed forces are not as ready for prime time as we have previously imagined,” RSIS’s Yang said.

Prominent figures have disappeared as well. The defence minister, Li Shuangfu, who previously served as a deputy commander of the SSF and was considered a Xi loyalist, went missing last year.

Beijing confirmed that Li had been removed in October, nearly two months after he disappeared from view.

The fact that high-ranking officers and officials seemingly close to Xi have not been spared in the purge underlines the shifting landscape of loyalty and power in Chinese elite politics, according to Shaoyu Yuan, a scholar of Chinese studies at Rutgers University in the US.

“Individuals removed might have initially risen under Xi’s patronage but their dismissal signals a recalibration of loyalty and trust as his strategic vision and his perception of potential threats evolve,” Yuan told Al Jazeera.

In Yang’s view, the purges and the recent military reorganisation suggest that Xi has little faith in the commanders who have risen through the ranks in recent times, or in the previous reforms, even though he played a key role in their promotions and the structural changes.

While that might raise questions about Xi’s choices, Yuan said the Chinese president’s reactions to his lack of faith demonstrate his ruthless adaptability as well as his willingness to recalibrate his approach to maintain control and pursue his vision.

“His determination to eliminate any structures or individuals that do not align with his current strategic objectives regardless of their past contributions may reinforce his image as a decisive leader who prioritises the present needs of the state over past allegiances,” he said.

Yuan adds that in the power dynamics around the president, loyalty must be continually earned.

“This approach can create a cycle where trust is perpetually conditional, driving the need for constant reaffirmation of loyalty,” he said.

At a recent military conference, Xi stressed that military officials, especially those at senior levels, had to have the courage to put aside their prestige and acknowledge their shortcomings.

“They must deeply self-reflect ... make earnest rectifications, resolve problems at the root of their thinking,” he said.

RSIS’s Yang expects that there will be a greater emphasis on political work within the armed forces, building on last year’s focus on Xi Jinping Thought, the president’s political, economic and social philosophy, throughout the Communist Party.

Such political work could take time away from crucial military training, according to Yang, or encourage talented officers to keep their heads down to avoid the risk of being targeted in any future purges.

“He [Xi] has no qualms about shaking things up and letting heads roll,” Yang said. “But in the end, only time will tell whether these changes will actually enhance the Chinese military’s combat capabilities.”

China is snapping up land near military sites — Washington needs to act ASAP

23 June 2024, The New York Post

In yet another front where the Biden administration is blithely ignoring US national security, a bombshell Post report last week revealed that Chinese entities have bought up land around 19 military bases nationwide.

The danger’s obvious: Beijing can easily use surveillance tech, like drones or trackers, to monitor movements in and out of bases, among other spying. And that’s plainly the intent: Sun Guangxin, a former People’s Liberation Army general with close ties to the Chinese Communist Party, owns about 40% of Chinese-owned US land; over a few years starting in 2016, notably, he bought up $110 million worth of land next to Laughlin Air Force Base in Val Verde County, Texas.

His plan to run a "wind farm" there was foiled by the Lone Star Infrastructure Act, blocking businesses associated with "hostile nations" from accessing the state's energy grid.

Texas isn't the only state fighting back: In 2023, 15 states passed laws regulating foreign ownership of US land; 20 more states are looking to do the same this year.

But why isn't the Biden administration doing more?

Yes, President Biden last month signed an executive order forcing a Chinese-owned Bitcoin mining firm to sell land near F.E. Warren base, which houses intercontinental ballistic missiles, in Cheyenne, Wyo. He could do the same to kick CCP-connected owners off all farmland near military sites.

Several lawmakers have tried to get ahead of this problem on a national level.

Last year, Rep. Dan Newhouse (R-Wash.) reintroduced a bill to require the prez to prohibit entities associated with China's government from buying US agricultural land (which is virtually all the sites in question; Rep. Elise Stefanik (R-NY) and Sens. Jon Tester (D-Mont.) and Mike Rounds (R-SD) have introduced legislation to block China, Russia, Iran and North Korea from doing so.

But all these bills are dying in committee.

Congress should pass a law ASAP; in the meantime, Biden needs to start rolling back the CCP's slow, methodical invasion.

Probably, it is time for an indigenous assessment of Chinese military developments on a regular basis.

Central Military Commission Tells PLA to Tighten Budget

23 June 2024, China Scope

Due to the sliding economy, Beijing has been asking local governments to keep tight budgets. Now it has also asked the People's Liberation Army (PLA) to do the same.

China's Central Military Commission recently issued a document titled "Measures on Building the Military with Hard Work and in Thrifty Way, to Improve the Military's Quality and Efficiency." The document states that "building the military with hard work and in a thrifty way is the fine tradition of the communist party and military," and "must not be abandoned at any time or under any circumstances." It urged the military to "firmly establish the mindset of living with a tight budget, meticulously calculate and manage all endeavors with thrift." According to the website of China's Ministry of Veterans Affairs, the document emphasizes the need to "adopt concepts such as resource constraints, cost-effectiveness, integration of support, performance management, and systematic governance, to enhance the operational efficiency of military systems and the utilization efficiency of defense resources."

Xi signals further military purges to eradicate corruption

22 June 2024, VOA, William Yang

Speaking at China's first military political work conference in a decade this week, Chinese President Xi Jinping reiterated the need for the military to eliminate corruption and strengthen its loyalty to the Chinese Communist Party. He also warned of "deep-seated issues" in the military's politics, ideology, work style and discipline.

"The gun barrels should always be in the hands of those who are loyal and reliable to the party and there must be no place for corrupt elements to hide in the military," Xi said in his remarks, according to China's state broadcaster CCTV.

In a lengthy overview, Xi urged the military to enhance the thoroughness of its ideological transformation by following the Communist Party's theories, improving the leadership of party organizations, and eradicating conditions that may allow corruption to thrive.

Chieh Chung, a military researcher at the National Policy Foundation in Taiwan, said the remarks show that "Xi wants to emphasize the importance for the military to be loyal to the party and his leadership while signaling his concerns about how corruption affects the military" and its capabilities.

Xi "hopes the warnings can help accelerate the development of advanced technologies and equipment," Chieh told VOA by phone.

Since last July, China has ousted more than a dozen top military commanders, including former defense minister Li Shangfu, and leaders of the People's Liberation Army's Rocket Force.

While the Chinese government hasn't publicly linked their removals to corruption, some foreign media outlets and experts see their removal as part of the extended anti-corruption campaign Xi initiated since he came to power in 2012.

Reuters reported last September that Li was facing an investigation related to the procurement of military equipment.

The removal of top military leaders not only highlights the prevalence of corruption; it also raises other questions.

"Since corruption has hampered Russia's ability to supply its military in the Ukraine war, it raises the question of whether the Chinese military's capabilities have been compromised by corruption or not," Lin Ying-yu, a military expert at Tamkang University in Taiwan, told VOA by phone.

There is also a concern about the impact Xi's persistent attempts to eradicate corruption will have on the military internally.

"When a former defense minister can be abruptly removed from his position without any clear explanation, it will create a deep sense of fear within the military because no one knows when they might be the next one to be purged," said Su Tzu-yun, a military expert at the Taipei-based Institute for National Defense and Security Research.

Su said this is part of the Communist Party's strategy of "ruling with terror," which allows Xi to concentrate decision-making power on the top leadership within the party.

"While tackling corruption in the military is important to Xi, the anti-corruption campaign has become a political tool for him to consolidate his control over the military," Su told VOA by phone.

In January, the state-run People's Liberation Army Daily published an opinion piece that emphasized the importance of implementing Xi's instructions for the military and extending the party's governance to the grassroots level.

"By strengthening the supervision of military personnel, it builds a firm first line of defense for soldiers to comply with the rules and refuse to be corrupted," said the opinion piece run by the PLA Daily.

While Xi looks to consolidate control and build loyalty, both Chieh and Su see other potential side-effects such as the promotion of unqualified leaders and the impact that could have on the military's capabilities and readiness.

"When Beijing puts so much emphasis on loyalty to the party, it could reduce the military's combat capabilities and make the military huge but weak," Su said.

Xi's expressed desire to continue cracking down on corruption also means the Chinese military may need to go through a period of adjustment, Chieh said.

"Normally, the military's combat capabilities will decrease following several rounds of purges, so I expect the Chinese military to go through a tough period of adjustment and reorganization over the next few years," he told VOA.

And while top officials in the U.S. have repeatedly highlighted 2027 as the year that the Chinese military aims to possess the capabilities to invade Taiwan, Chieh thinks the purges and Xi's remarks at the political work conference suggest the PLA may be hard pressed to achieve that goal.

"Since the Chinese military's command system and the rocket force's capabilities may not have reached the goal set by the top leadership due to rampant corruption, I think this makes it even less likely for the Chinese military to have the capabilities required to invade Taiwan by 2027," he said.

China Sends Advanced Fighter Jets to Contested Border with India, Satellite Images Show

09 June 2024, MSN, Samyarup Chowdhury

Recent satellite images have shown China deploying advanced J-20 stealth fighter jets at the Shigatse Air Base near a contested border with India.

Knewz.com has learned that the Shigatse Air Base, a dual-use airport, is located around 93 miles from the Indo-China border in the mountainous state of Sikkim. The satellite images, shared by All Source Analysis, show six Chengdu J-20 fighter jets, also known as the "Mighty Dragon," kept under protective tarps and a KJ-500 Airborne Early Warning and Control Aircraft stationed at the air base. The Economic Times reported that the Indian Air Force is already aware of the deployment of the Chinese fighter jets.

Nearly 190 miles on the other side of the contested border lies the Indian Air Force (IAF) base in Hasimara, in the Indian state of West Bengal, which is currently the home of the Air Force's second squadron of 16 Rafale fighter jets.

The deployment of the stealth fighter jets near the border was first noticed towards the end of May 2024, with Indian news outlet NDTV commenting that it has "major military implications for India."

"The forward presence of the J-20 in Tibetan airfields is a clear and present threat to the Indian Air Force. This erodes the advantage enjoyed by IAF assets like the Rafale and imposes caution against the PLAAF [Chinese Air Force]," Sameer Joshi, former Indian Air Force pilot and CEO of NewSpace Research, said in a statement to the outlet.

"This capability, combined with an increase in the available numbers of modern fighters in the Chinese inventory, clearly negates the numerical advantage in modern jets that the IAF has enjoyed for some time."

The satellite images shared by All Source Analysis also show the deployment of at least eight J-10 fighter jets at the Shigatse Air Base.

"Multiple images collected over the course of the same day indicate these aircraft arrived at the air base on 27 May 2024, preceded by the arrival of a Y-20 transport aircraft for the probable deployment of ground crew and support equipment," the analysis from the organization read.

"The J-20 aircraft are not known to be permanently based at Shigatse and deployments near the Indian border are a rare occurrence."

NDTV pointed out in its report that the Shigatse airport is located at an altitude of 12,408 feet, making it one of the highest air bases in the world.

"The deployment of the J-20 shows its ability to operate from the harsh environment of ultra-high altitude Tibetan air bases," the outlet noted.

The 2,100-mile border between India and China, known as the Line of Actual Control, has been the center of constant military dispute between the two countries, with both sides making continuous efforts to reinforce their troops deployed on the border.

According to Newsweek, military tensions over the border erupted in a confrontation between the two forces in 2020, claiming the lives of 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers.

December 2022 saw another significant clash between the two sides, this time in the Tawang sector of the state of Arunachal Pradesh on the eastern tip of India. BBC noted that the rising tensions and sporadic conflicts between India and China would also have an "economic fallout as China is one of India's biggest trading partners."

It is worth noting that the growing hostility on political the boundary has also strained the ties between Chinese President Xi Jinping and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

China to boost rail links to Xinjiang and Tibet, with eye on supply chains and energy security

03 June 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

China will step up construction of strategic railroad links in the autonomous regions of Xinjiang and Tibet in the coming years to strengthen its hold over its westernmost regions, according to a senior Chinese rail planner.

"The rail network layout still needs to be improved. There are still many places in the western regions left undeveloped, and the major strategic channels for entering and exiting Tibet and Xinjiang need to be strengthened," said Liu Wenxian, a senior official with China Railway Group's planning department.

In an interview with The People's Rail, a newspaper affiliated with the state-owned rail operator, Liu said the priority was to "strengthen the construction of strategic links and effectively guarantee the implementation of major national strategies".

"[We will] focus on strengthening strategic trunk channels, such as those from Xinjiang to Tibet, and fill in the 'blanks' in railway networks in key western regions so as to comprehensively improve the multidirectional connectivity between Xinjiang, Tibet and the inland," Liu was quoted as saying.

Liu said this was part of China's plan to strengthen transport links to ensure energy and supply chain security.

Beijing has "big plans" for Xinjiang and Tibet, according to a Tsinghua University researcher who studies ethnic minority issues in China.

"Xinjiang is the gateway for the strategic China-Europe freight trains, while the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau is extremely important to China's western border security," said the researcher, who declined to be named due to the sensitivity of the topic.

"Beijing has painstakingly restored the order and security in these two regions in the past decade. Now it is time to extend the transport networks into these regions so that people-to-people exchanges can happen and goods from these regions can be sold to other parts of China. These are prerequisites for further integration."

Liu said that by 2025, China's modern railway infrastructure would be complete, with its rail network reaching 165,000km (102,526 miles), including 50,000km of high-speed rail lines.

He said China aimed to expand its rail network by 20235 to about 200,000km, of which about 70,000km would be high-speed railway.

China leads the world in high-speed railway development. According to Statista, China had 40,474km of high-speed rail lines in 2022, more than double the combined length of the next 10 countries. The United States ranked 11th in high-speed rail lines, with only 735km, but it still operates the world's largest railway network with over 220,000km in total. China ranked second in terms of total rail network length, with about 159,000km in 2023.

Liu said by the end of next year, China's rail network would cover 99.5 per cent of cities a population of more than 200,000, while the high-speed rail network would cover more than 97 per cent of cities with a population over 500,000.

Liu also said the resilience, safety and reliability of railway infrastructure would be improved, and that China's railways needed to respond better and faster to natural disasters and climate change.

However, this vision faces major financial challenges as China Railway Group has paid for the massive expansion with borrowings.

As of last year, its debt rose to 6.13 trillion yuan (US$846 billion), with operating profits of only 330 million yuan.

China has taken the rare step of sharply increasing fares on four major bullet train lines recently – a move widely seen as an attempt to restore profitability of its debt-ridden high-speed network.

China reported to have boosted offensive air capabilities along Tibet-border with India

01 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Even as it keeps downplaying the seriousness of the standoff with India along the occupied-Tibet- Ladakh border, insisting that the two sides can resume normal bilateral ties without being bogged down by it, China keeps strengthening its military capability in preparation for any possible conflict. It has now deployed its most advanced J-20 stealth fighters at an airfield in Tibet in the eastern sector facing India, amid the continuing military confrontation along the entire Line of Actual Control (LAC), which is into its fifth year now, reported the timesofindia.com May 31.

The report cited latest commercial satellite imagery as showing the People's Liberation Army-Air Force (PLAAF) had deployed six J-20 fighters at the Shigatse dual-use airport, which is barely 155 km from the LAC and close to Doklam near the Sikkim-Bhutan-Tibet tri-junction, in addition to the several J-10 jets and a KJ-500 AEW&C (airborne early-warning and control) aircraft already present there. "Multiple (satellite) images collected over the course of the same day indicate these aircraft (J-20s) arrived at the air base on May 27, preceded by the arrival of a Y-20 transport aircraft for the probable deployment of ground crew and support equipment," All Source Analysis, which looks at geospatial intelligence, has said in a post on "X".

The report cited a senior Indian defence establishment official as saying the twin-engine J-20 fighters "are probably at Shigatse for high-altitude trials". The PLAAF has been regularly deploying J-20s at its airfields in the western sector like the Hotan airfield in Xinjiang, which is around 240-km from the LAC, since the military confrontation erupted in eastern Ladakh in May 2020, the report said.

India too has taken steps to strengthen its military preparedness. Apart from the Sukhoi-30MKI fighters based at Hasimara, Chabua and Tezpur in the eastern sector, the IAF also has a squadron (18 jets) of its latest French-origin Rafale omni-role jets deployed at the Hasimara air base in West Bengal, with the other one at Ambala for the western front with Pakistan, the report said.

China touts the Chengdu J-20 as the effective answer to the world's only fully-operational and proven fifth-generation jets like the American F/A-22 Raptors and F-35 Lightning-II Joint Strike Fighters.

The report said China had offset some of its air combat disadvantage due to high-altitude terrain constraints by deploying additional fighters, bombers, reconnaissance aircraft and drones after upgrading its airfields like Hotan and Kashgar in Xinjiang; Gargunsa, Shigatse, Bangda, Nyingchi and Hoping in occupied Tibet, among others. China has also constructed new runways as well as extended older ones, along with building new hardened shelters, fuel and ammunition storage facilities at these airfields.

At Hotan, for instance, the PLAAF is reported to have recently deployed two new JH-7A fighter-bombers and three Y-20 heavy-lift aircraft, among others, to add to the almost 50 J-11 and J-7 fighters, five Y-8 and Y-7 transport aircraft and KJ-500 AEW&C aircraft already present there.

China's PLAAF Deploys Stealth J-20, J-10 Fighters At Shigatse Air Base Just 150 Km From Indian Border

30 May 2024, The EurAsian Times, Sakshi Tiwari

After China deployed the J-20 Mighty Dragons in a cross-strait show of force against Taiwan, the stealthy Chinese fighter appeared just 150 kilometers from the Indian border, also known as the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

A set of satellite images obtained by 'All Source Analysis' shows at least six J-20 fighter jets stationed at the Chinese Shigatse Air Base, located just over 150 kilometers from the LAC.

The satellite imagery (shown below) appears to have been obtained by Planet Labs on May 27. In addition to the six J-20 stealthy fighters, at least eight J-10 aircraft and one KJ-500 Airborne early warning and control aircraft can also be seen parked at the air base in Shigatse, which is close to the eastern sector of the LAC.

The airport is one of the highest in the world and functions as a dual-use airport. At the time of writing this report, the Indian military had not taken cognizance of the deployment. However, experts noted on social media that the Indian side remained aware of these deployments, which have not been uncommon since the 2020 stand-off began.

The deployment of the J-20s at Shigatse is significant. It is located less than 300 kilometers from Hasimara Air Base in West Bengal, home to the Rafale fighter jets of the Indian Air Force (IAF). Indian military bloggers expressed alarm over the deployment, highlighting the gap between the two air powers. India, unlike China, does not have a fifth-generation aircraft in its arsenal.

The IAF has strategically deployed the Rafales in Hasimara so that they can be quickly scrambled in case of a threat at the border with China.

The Rafales are believed to be one of the strongest systems in the IAF's inventory against the Chinese threat that refuses to die down. Air Chief Marshal RKS Bhadauria, former Indian Air Force (IAF) chief, recently pointed out that China deployed five times more J-20 stealth fighters than India's then newly-procured Rafale jets during the standoff.

Although this is not the first time J-20s have appeared at an airbase near the Indian border, it has been flagged as one of the biggest deployments in recent memory. The aircraft were photographed on multiple occasions at the Hotan airbase in Xinjiang.

The Chinese PLA Air Force first deployed J-20 jets close to Indian territory at the height of the conflict in 2020. According to government sources, the J-20s were reportedly spotted flying from the Hotan airbase in China's Xinjiang province, where strategic bombers and other fighters were stationed. This move came in response to the perceived threat posed by India's Rafale jets, which had begun conducting night flying exercises at the time.

In June 2022, for instance, the People's Liberation Army Air Force (PLAAF) stationed around two dozen frontline combat aircraft at Hotan, including the J-11 and the J-20 stealth fighter jets, as previously reported by EurAsian Times.

J-20s Continue To Project Power

The J-20s have become synonymous with the Chinese assertion of power. This was on display recently when the PLA Eastern Command published a video of J-20s in action, emphasizing the aircraft's "cross-strait" lethality.

The video was published right after the unprecedented military drills launched by the PLA as "punishment" for new Taiwan President Lai Ching-te's inaugural speech on May 20, in which he reiterated his commitment to Taiwanese independence and sovereignty. China has repeatedly called the new Taiwanese President a "separatist."

The Chinese fifth-generation stealth jets, the J-20 Mighty Dragons, are projected as major assets in any potential conflict the country may have to contest. The PLAAF has already positioned a few J-20s in all five theatre commands. By 2026, each command will have at least one to two J-20 brigades.

China has recently announced that the J-20 will be modified to carry nuclear weapons.

The J-20, which has nearly replaced previous PLAAF aircraft as the workhorse, is believed to have sophisticated electronics. It has sensors to help pilots make the best tactical and combat judgments. The recently released video made this clear, and it also underlined the Chinese military's evolving—and now entrenched—belief in "intelligentized combat."

The J-20 is meant to function as a "sniper" in warfare, eluding fighter screens and taking out susceptible targets like airborne early warning planes and air-to-air refueling tankers with near-invisibility.

The Chinese media, however, continues to assert that the Rafale was a generation behind the J-20. It lacked stealth capability and would "find it very difficult to confront a stealth-capable" J-20. The comparison between the two jets has been debated by discerning analysts who believe that the two aircraft are built for performing completely different sets of roles.

Earlier, in one of the simulation drills against India, conducted in 2020, Beijing claimed to have shot down 17 Rafale fighters using J-20 stealth jets. A Chinese pilot belonging to the Wang Hai Air Group under the PLA Eastern Theater Command, along with his colleagues, claimed to have shot down Rafale fighters. The Wang Hai Air Group is the first air wing that is using the J-20 fighter jets.

Nonetheless, some Indian officials and experts continue to assert that the Rafale has an impressive combat history and the ability to perform different roles, which puts it above the J-20s. The J-20 is still in the inception stage, while the Rafale has been combat-proven for 20 years in Iraq, Afghanistan, Mali, Libya, and Syria.

It is almost ironic that while the Chinese J-20s are currently sitting close to the Indian border, the Indian Rafales have flown to the United States to take part in the US Red Flag military exercises to bolster their combat capability and hone dogfighting skills.

Incredible new £34bn train line that's 1,012 miles long and will cut journeys by 35 hours

26 May 2024, Express

When complete, the full length will be around 1,012 miles long (Image: Getty)

This extensive new higher-speed railway, when completed, will reduce travel times of about 48 hours to just 13.

When fully complete, the line will connect Chengdu (in Sichuan, China) and Lhasa (in Tibet), meaning the full length will be around 1,012 miles long and will become the shortest railway connection between the areas.

The Sichuan-Tibet Railway began back in 2014, and currently two sections of the line - from Chengdu-Ya'an and the Nyingchi-Lhasa - are operational. The former opened in 2018, with the latter following three years later.

The third section, linking Ya'an to Nyingchi, began construction in November 2020, and is expected to continue until the early 2030s.

The railway will officially be a "higher-speed rail" (HrSR), also known as a high-performance rail, with train speeds higher than conventional rail, but not as high as high-speed rail services including that which connects Tokyo and Osaka in Japan. This will be the region's first electrified railway and the first higher-speed rail on the plateau. The first section, at 87 miles long, has a design speed of 124mph, while the second, at 270 miles long, runs at 99mph. This reduces travel time between Lhasa and Nyingchi from about five to about three and a half hours, while journeys between Shannan and Nyingchi now can be completed in about two hours as opposed to six by car.

The incomplete section, which will be a staggering 628 miles long, is expected to run at speeds between 75 and 124mph. In total, it will cut travel time from about 48 hours to 13 hours.

This railway will be the second line into the Tibetan region, the first being Qinghai-Tibet, which was a notoriously challenging network to construct, opening in 1984 and 2006. While the previous network was deemed sufficient to support the rather small resident population of 3.5 million, compared with 1.4 billion in China, there were higher requirements for transport to access Tibet's rich resources. The new railway line was pitched in 2011. Allegedly, there are over 100 types of minerals found in Tibet, with currently only 22 developed and utilised. Tibet has also been described as the "water tower of Asia", having extremely rich hydropower resources, expected to reach 200 million kilowatts. It was also deemed to be conducive to promoting exchanges and economic development between Tibet and Eurasian countries, and have major impacts on tourism.

Guangming Daily: the Importance of Chinese-Built International Communications Platforms

Guangming Daily published an article saying that it is important for China to build its own international communications platforms.

"With the advancement of technology, international communication now presents a new characteristic: "platformization." It is transitioning from "individual content going overseas" to "communication platforms going overseas." International communication is entering an era of platformization. The core of the success or failure of international communication in this era of platformization lies in the ability to control the communication platforms. However, current international communication platforms are in a state of monopoly [by Western powers] and opposition [to China]. Western countries (led by the U.S.) are monopolizing communication platforms through technological advantages and are thus able to wield so-called "hostile" communication platforms to gain advantages in political discourse. This puts other countries in a situation where they have no platforms to use. Thus, the creation of such communications platforms is an important facet of [China's plan to] build international communications capabilities. [Such Chinese-built platforms] would provide an important means to break through Western platform monopolies and through opposition from Western platforms. It is evident that the enhancement of cultural soft power relies on the support of international communication platforms."

China on Sunday launched a Long March-4C rocket, placing a satellite in space.

The rocket blasted off at 7:43 a.m. (Beijing Time) from the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Center in northwest China and sent the satellite Shiyao-23 into preset orbit.

The satellite will mainly be used for space environment monitoring.

It was the 522nd flight mission of the Long March series rockets.

China militarizing its entire population in new defence build-up?

07 May, 2024, Tibetan Review

China appears to have embarked on a campaign to militarise its entire population as its economy falters while having adopted bullying or combative tactics to assert its outlandish South China Sea, Taiwan, and India-Tibet border claims. The Communist Party of China apparently hopes that this campaign will be good for ensuring its continued hold on political power at a time when its history of cataclysmic policy failures – dating from the Great Leap Forward Movement, through the decades-long draconian one-child policy, to the recent years-long heart-renting Covid-lockdown measures – threatens to overshadow the success of its economic opening up policy.

The country has proposed a new legislative measure that would require military training at high schools and universities in order to promote awareness of national defence in children as young as elementary school.

The aim is to teach all members of society the “theory, knowledge and skills associated with national defence,” asia.nikkei.com May 7 cited draft revisions to the National Defence Education Law as saying.

The report pointed out that the move to amend the law for the first time since 2018 had come amid rising tensions with the US over Taiwan and the South China Sea. Some universities have already allowed students to train with live ammunition and tanks.

The draft had its first reading by the Standing Committee of the National People’s Congress late last month, has been opened to public comment, and could be enacted as early as this year, the report said.

The draft is said to call for instilling some degree of national defence awareness among elementary school children. Middle schoolers are to learn basic knowledge and skills, while high school and university students would undergo mandatory military training. This education and training would be guided by the government and the People’s Liberation Army.

Once implemented, local governments would need to include defence education costs in their budgets. Besides, state agencies, universities and other organizations would be held accountable for violations of the law.

“The aim is to make the public aware that war could break out and to make it easier to mobilize them in the event of an emergency,” Masafumi Iida, who specializes in Chinese foreign and security policies at Japan’s National Institute for Defence Studies, has said.

With regard to Taiwan – which China threatens to annex should it move to declare independence, though it is already independent – Fuzhou University in China’s Fujian Province, located across the strait from Taiwan, hosted a military skills competition in July. About 500 university students from around the province competed in target shooting, hand grenade throwing and first aid, the report said.

Besides, China Central Television (CCTV) was stated to have reported on an exercise involving tanks and armoured personnel carriers at a university in the Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region. Some schools have new students experience crawling through mud or firing rocket launchers, the report said.

Another aim of expanding national defence education is said to be to recruit tech talent. Expertise in fields such as artificial intelligence, robotics and space are in great demand as China rushes to modernize its military. Xi has designated such “emerging areas” in March and called for strengthening the military’s capacity in them, the report noted.

“For Chinese university leaders, one basis for earning the approval of the Communist Party is how many good students their schools can send to the military,” Iida has said.

The People's Liberation Army Daily was stated to have reported that the number of Chinese university students applying to join the military in 2020 had topped 1.2 million, a roughly sixfold increase over seven years. Local government programmes are stated to provide incentives for signing up. Beijing, for example, offers assistance with tuition, medical insurance and employment after discharge from the military.

China's next defense buildup: mandatory military training for students

07 May 2024, Nikkei Asia, Yukio Tajima

China wants to promote awareness of national defense in children as young as elementary school under proposed legislation that would require military training at high schools and universities.

The aim is to teach all members of society the "theory, knowledge and skills associated with national defense," according to draft revisions to the National Defense Education Law.

The move to amend the law for the first time since 2018 comes amid rising tensions with the U.S. over Taiwan and the South China Sea. Some universities have already allowed students to train with live ammunition and tanks.

The draft had its first reading by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress late last month and has been opened to public comment.

The draft calls for instilling some degree of national defense awareness among elementary school children. Middle schoolers are to learn basic knowledge and skills, while high school and university students would undergo mandatory military training. This education and training would be guided by the government and the People's Liberation Army.

Local governments would need to include defense education costs in their budgets. State agencies, universities and other organizations would be held accountable for violations of the law.

"The aim is to make the public aware that war could break out and to make it easier to mobilize them in the event of an emergency," said Masafumi Iida, who specializes in Chinese foreign and security policies at Japan's National Institute for Defense Studies.

Deliberations on the amendments will continue in the Standing Committee, which in principle meets every two months. The legislation could be enacted as early as this year.

Across the strait from Taiwan, Fuzhou University in China's Fujian Province hosted a military skills competition in July. About 500 university students from around the province competed in target shooting, hand grenade throwing and first aid.

China Central Television (CCTV) reported on an exercise involving tanks and armored personnel carriers at a university in the Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region. Some schools have new students experience crawling through mud or firing rocket launchers.

China's government has also sought to attract talent from medical schools across the country. President Xi Jinping urged students and staff during a visit to the Army Medical University in Chongqing in March to serve the battlefield and work to build a "world-class army medical school."

Another aim of expanding national defense education is recruiting tech talent. Expertise in fields such as artificial intelligence, robotics and space are in great demand as China rushes to modernize its military. Xi designated such "emerging areas" in March and called for strengthening the military's capacity in them.

"For Chinese university leaders, one basis for earning the approval of the Communist Party is how many good students their schools can send to the military," Iida said.

China's revised conscription rules, which went into effect in May 2023 in China, specify university students as eligible for calling up. Universities are tasked with recruiting students for military service. Under the revised rules, students can be drafted either in their hometown or at their school.

The People's Liberation Army Daily reports that the number of Chinese university students applying to join the military in 2020 topped 1.2 million, a roughly sixfold increase over seven years. Local government programs provide incentives for signing up. Beijing, for example, offers assistance with tuition, medical insurance and employment after discharge from the military.

China takes measures against 12 U.S. military-linked firms

22 May 2024, Reuters, Liz Lee

China said on Wednesday it had taken measures against 12 companies involved in the U.S. military-industrial complex and their senior executives, in response to the U.S. arming of Taiwan and sanctions on Chinese companies.

The U.S. companies included units of Lockheed Martin, Raytheon and General Dynamics, China's Foreign Ministry said.

The measures, which include freezing assets in China and banning senior executives from entering the country, took effect from Wednesday, it added.

The action follows U.S. "indiscriminately imposing unlawful unilateral sanctions on a number of Chinese entities on the basis of so-called Russia-related factors," the ministry said in a statement.

China said the U.S. had "ignored its objective and impartial position in the Ukrainian crisis", and had instead "engaged in unilateral bullying and economic coercion".

The ministry said the U.S. has also continued to sell arms to Taiwan, which "seriously violates" the one-China principle and joint communiqués between both countries, and "seriously undermines" China's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

China Ramps Up Military Activity In Tibet And Xinjiang | Why It Matters To India?

30 April 2024, MSN

The Chinese People's Liberation Army Air Force (PLAAF) has been active in the Tibetan plateau in recent weeks, carrying out a para-dropping exercise in Golmud. A dozen PLA servicemen took off in a Y-20 transport aircraft around the time of the Chinese New Year from Golmud, in Qinghai, in the northern part of the Tibetan plateau, and the drop was 60 km to the east. It is another sign that the PLA aspires to be functional in Tibet throughout the year, including in the winter months, when it is bitterly cold. More recently, at the Hotan airfield, in Xinjiang, where there is a substantial presence of the PLAAF, three Y-20 aircraft, a large plane for military transportation, were seen. Besides, Hotan has, as usual, a large number of fighters—about 50. About half of them are the J-11, the twin engined air superiority fighter similar to the Russian Sukhoi-27 and about two decades old, and the J-7, which is an older aircraft, similar to the Russian MiG-21. Besides, a few JH-7As, a fighter bomber, are present along with a KJ-500, an airborne early warning system. Similarly, on the eastern side, at Luliang, in Yunnan, the Chinese have placed a KJ-500 along with a dozen J-11 fighters and two Y-20 heavy-lift transport aircraft. Once again, these are signs that the Chinese are strengthening their armed forces. With summer coming, the Chinese have also begun setting up new radars in the Pangta and Bamda airfields. These are in the east, opposite North-east India and Pangta, is less than 200km from the line of actual control.

Xi shakes up China's military in rethink of how to 'fight and win' future wars

27 April 2024, CNN

China has rolled out the largest restructuring of its military in almost a decade, focusing on technology-driven strategic forces equipped for modern warfare, as Beijing vies with Washington for military primacy in a region rife with geopolitical tensions.

In a surprise move last week, Chinese leader Xi Jinping scrapped the Strategic Support Force (SSF), a military branch he created in 2015 to integrate the People's Liberation Army's space, cyber, electronic and psychological warfare capabilities as part of a sweeping overhaul of the armed forces.

In its place, Xi inaugurated the Information Support Force, which he said was "a brand-new strategic arm of the PLA and a key underpinning of coordinated development and application of the network information system."

The new force would play an important role in helping the Chinese military "fight and win in modern warfare," he said at a ceremony last Friday.

At a news conference on the same day, a spokesperson for China's Defense Ministry appeared to suggest the SSF was effectively broken into three units – the Information Support Force, the Aerospace Force and the Cyberspace Force – which will answer directly to the Central Military Commission, the body at the top of the military chain of command headed by Xi.

Under the new structure, the PLA now consists of four services – the army, navy, air force and the rocket force – plus four arms: the three units spun off from the SSF and the Joint Logistic Support Force, according to ministry spokesperson Wu Qian.

Experts on the Chinese military say the reorganization enhances Xi's direct control over the PLA's strategic capabilities and underscores China's ambitions in better mastering AI and other new technologies to prepare for what it calls the "intelligentized warfare" of the future.

The restructuring follows Xi's sweeping corruption purge of the PLA last year, which ensnared powerful generals and shook up the rocket force, an elite branch overseeing China's fast-expanding arsenal of nuclear and ballistic missiles.

The Information Support Force will be led by top generals from the now-defunct SSF.

SSF deputy commander Bi Yi was appointed commander of the new unit, while Li Wei, the SSF's political commissar, will take the same role in the Information Support Force, according to state-run news agency Xinhua.

There was no mention of any new appointment for SSF commander Ju Qiansheng, who last year spurred speculation when he disappeared from public view amid a flurry of military purges before eventually resurfacing at a conference in late January.

'Better visibility'

Longtime PLA watchers say the latest reorganization is unlikely the result of the recent corruption purges, but rather a reflection that the SSF wasn't an ideal organizational format for the Chinese military.

"It shows that the SSF was not a satisfactory arrangement. It reduced Xi's visibility of important functions and did not really improve coordination between space, cyber, and network defense forces," said Joel Wuthnow, a senior research fellow at the Pentagon-funded National Defense University.

Before its disbandment, the SSF had two principal units – the Aerospace Systems Department overseeing the PLA's space operations and reconnaissance, and the Network System Department tasked with cyber, electronic and psychological warfare capabilities.

"I think the new structure will give Xi better visibility into what is happening in space, cyberspace, and network management. These functions will now be supervised at his level and not through the Strategic Support Force, which served as a middleman," Wuthnow said.

The lack of such visibility could bear high risks, especially during times of heightened tension and deep distrust between Beijing and Washington.

Last year, the US shot down a Chinese surveillance balloon after it traversed the continental United States. The incident caused a fresh crisis between the two powers and plunged bilateral relations into a deep freeze for months.

Though US intelligence officials said the balloon was part of an extensive surveillance program run by the Chinese military, Xi may not have been aware of the mission.

US President Joe Biden said last June that the Chinese leader didn't know about the balloon and was "very embarrassed" when it was shot down after it floated off course into American airspace.

James Char, a research fellow at the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies in Singapore, said the conduct of strategic reconnaissance during the spy balloon incident would have been under the purview of the SSF's Aerospace Systems Department.

"That was one of the roles and responsibilities of the PLASSF," he said.

It is unclear if the balloon incident contributed to Xi's decision to disband the SSF.

Wuthnow, of the National Defense University, said the newly created Information Support Force will likely take charge of communications and network defense for the PLA.

"Getting these things right is of huge importance for the PLA in any future conflict, and they have been paying close attention to these functions and probably drawing lessons for their own organization from the war in Ukraine," he said, referring to Russia's ongoing invasion of its neighbor.

"So it makes sense that the [Central Military Commission] chairman would want to play a more direct role in that area."

'Intelligentized warfare'

The latest shake-up is likely the result of an ongoing review of how the military can better meet the strategic objectives of the ruling Chinese Communist Party, according to Char.

"I suppose the reorganization better reflects the importance the PLA has placed on speeding up the development of intelligentized warfare" brought by a new round of technological and industrial advancement, he said.

The concept of "intelligentized warfare" drew attention in a 2019 Chinese defense white paper that highlighted the military application of cutting-edge tech such as AI, quantum information, big data and cloud computing.

"The landscape of international military competition is undergoing historic changes. New and high-tech military technologies with information technology as the core is advancing with each passing day, and there's a prevailing trend to develop long-range precision, intelligent, stealthy or unmanned weaponry and equipment," the white paper said.

"War is accelerating its evolution in form towards informationized warfare, and intelligentized warfare is on the horizon."

The creation of the Information Support Force as a new branch directly under the Central Military Commission also underscores the importance of information dominance in modern warfare.

A commentary in the PLA Daily, the Chinese military's official mouthpiece, described network information technology as "the biggest variable" in enhancing combat capability.

"Modern wars are competitions between systems and structures, where control over information equates to control over the initiative in war," it said.

The emphasis on information dominance and "intelligentized warfare" also has significant implications for any potential future conflict in the Taiwan Strait.

China's Communist Party views Taiwan as part of its territory, despite never having controlled it, and has vowed to take control of the island – by force if necessary.

Char said in the event of a Taiwan conflict, the Information Support Force “would likely take over as the tip of the spear in supporting the PLA’s attempts to dominate the information space before Beijing’s adversaries can do so.”

Xi Jinping unveils newest branch of Chinese military

21 April 2024, Global Nation

President Xi Jinping on Friday unveiled the newest branch of the Chinese military, the Information Support Force of the People’s Liberation Army, calling it a vital power in modern warfare.

Xi, who is also general secretary of the Communist Party of China Central Committee and chairman of the Central Military Commission, conferred the new force’s flag to its commander Lieutenant General Bi Yi and political commissar of the unit General Li Wei at the force’s establishment ceremony at the CMC headquarters building in Beijing.

The president gave his instructions to the Information Support Force, ordering it to strive to become a powerful and modernized unit. He said that establishing the Information Support Force is a major decision by the CPC Central Committee and the CMC, aiming to build a strong PLA, and a strategic step in establishing a new structure of services and improving the military system with Chinese characteristics.

“This is of profound and far-reaching significance to the modernization of national defense and the armed forces and to the military’s fulfillment of its missions and tasks in the new era,” Xi said. “The Information Support Force is a brand-new strategic branch of the PLA and a key pillar of the integrated development and use of the network information system. It plays an important role and bears great responsibility in promoting the PLA’s high-quality development and the ability to fight and win in modern warfare.”

The president ordered that the new force must be absolutely loyal to the Party. He stressed that the unit must focus on its core task of using information assets to support combat operations. It must maintain information flow, integrate information resources, protect information security and must integrate deeply into the military’s joint operation system.

The commander-in-chief also urged the new force to boost innovation, strengthen coordination and integration among different systems, cooperate with other forces, and bolster the sharing of assets. It must form a network information system which can support modern combat operations and has Chinese characteristics, Xi noted.

According to a decision made by the CMC, the Information Support Force is directly led by the CMC, and the official designation of the Strategic Support Force, which was founded in December 2015 to take charge of space, cyberspace and electronic warfare operations, is canceled.

Meanwhile, the leadership and structures of the PLA Space Force and the PLA Cyberspace Force have been rearranged accordingly, said the CMC.

The announcement also marked the first time China has confirmed the existence of the Space Force and the Cyberspace Force, which were widely believed to be major parts of the Strategic Support Force.

Senior Colonel Wu Qian, a spokesman for the Defense Ministry, told reporters at a news conference on Friday evening that with the latest overhaul, the PLA now has four services, namely the Ground Force, the Navy, the Air Force and the Rocket Force, and several sub-branches including the Space Force, the Cyberspace Force, the Information Support Force and the Joint Logistic Support Force.

In response to a question about the newly declassified Space Force, Wu said that building the force is of great significance in strengthening the capability to safely travel to outer space, openly and peacefully develop space resources, and enhance governance and crisis management in space.

“China’s space policies are clear and plain. We are always committed to the peaceful utilization of space and stand ready to work with all countries with the same commitment to strengthen exchanges, deepen cooperation and contribute to lasting peace and common security in space,” the spokesman said.

When asked whether the Cyberspace Force is used for “militarizing the internet”, Wu said cybersecurity remains a global challenge and poses a severe threat to China.

“Developing the Cyberspace Force and tools for cybersecurity and defense is important for reinforcing national cyberspace defense, promptly detecting and countering network intrusions and maintaining our cybersovereignty and information security," he said.

Xi orders China's biggest military reorganization since 2015

21 April 2024, Japan Times

Chinese leader Xi Jinping has ordered what amounts to the biggest reorganization of the nation's military since 2015 in a move that affects the force in charge of capabilities including cyberwarfare.

China will terminate the Strategic Support Force, which was created more than eight years ago to enhance capabilities in space, cyber, political and electronic warfare, the official Xinhua News Agency reported Friday.

Xi is in turn creating a new branch called the Information Support Force. The aerospace and cyber units previously under the Strategic Support Force will now be organizationally parallel to the newly created Information Support Force, the Defense Ministry said in a statement. The aerospace unit will improve China's capability to use space and step up the management of space crises, the ministry said.

The restructuring comes as the world's second-largest economy faces off with the U.S. in a fight for global influence, with cyberwarfare emerging as a key battleground. The U.S., U.K. and New Zealand accused China last month of sponsoring malicious cyber activity in targeting democratic institutions.

Reiterating the Communist Party's leadership over the army, Xi said that the new force will provide "key support in coordinating the construction and utilization of the cyber information system."

Li Wei, the political commissar from the now-defunct Strategic Support Force, will take that same role with the Information Support Force. He pledged to "resolutely" listen to Xi's instructions. The new commander of the Information Support Force is Bi Yi, state television CCTV reported.

The changes are aimed at better adapting China's military to the "informatization" conditions of modern warfare, said Cao Weidong, a retired senior researcher at the PLA Naval Research Academy. The restructuring will lead to "better deployment" of satellite systems, cyberspace, and when conducting electronic warfare, Cao told reporters on the sidelines of the West Pacific Naval Symposium in Qingdao.

The previous commander of the Strategic Support Force was Ju Qiansheng, whose disappearance had spurred speculation that he was linked to the broader turmoil in China's military leadership that's unfolded over the past year. While Ju has recently resurfaced, state media hasn't made clear his current position.

The latest revamp follows a sweeping purge by Xi of the military establishment last year. U.S. intelligence experts viewed that move as a response to the discovery of widespread corruption in the military, including in the Rocket Force, which manages the country's expanding nuclear arsenal.

Former Defense Minister Li Shangfu was ousted from his role without explanation in October. China named Dong Jun, a navy veteran, as the new defense chief in December.

Chinese Ministry of State Security: 'Military Fans' at High Risk of Becoming Espionage Targets

20 March 2024, RFA

China's Ministry of State Security has issued another stern warning about the potential national security threats posed by military enthusiasts, or "military fans." The ministry says this group is a high-risk target for espionage, theft of secrets, and leaks involving military matters.

In an article titled "Another Reminder for 'Military Fans'" published earlier this month, the ministry outlined several specific risks pertaining to this community's activities. The article states that military fans could inadvertently "guide" foreign intelligence operations by revealing sensitive military information, their online military forums and groups could become channels for overseas theft of secrets, and individual military fans could become targets for "screening and enticement" by foreign personnel acting as "insiders."

On March 7th, the ministry's official WeChat account delved deeper into the risks involved. The WeChat post noted that Chinese military fans obsessively track developments of advanced weapons and equipment, closely following details such as equipment quantities and models, troop locations, and aircraft serial numbers. They establish databases compiling this sensitive information and share it on websites, constantly expanding and refining the available data. "As time goes by, this information will become increasingly rich and professional, to the point of endangering military security," the Ministry of State Security warned.

This is not the first time that Beijing has raised alarms about the activity of military fans. On December 23rd of 2023, the Ministry cautioned fans against leaking information on construction progress, technical specifications, or deployment details of new military equipment. The Ministry's communication at that time stated that violations could result in prison sentences of 3 to 7 years. China's security establishment clearly views information gathering and sharing by these military enthusiasts as a critical risk to be proactively addressed.

Xi Jinping tightens grip on China's military with new information warfare unit

19 April 2024, Financial Times

China has established a new information warfare department under the direct command of its top military body as it begins its largest restructuring of the armed forces in more than eight years. The shift of information warfare to the direct command of the Central Military Commission – the top Communist party and state organ that controls the People's Liberation Army – would hand Chinese leader Xi Jinping even more direct control over the military, analysts said. The Information Support Force will aim to "speed up military modernisation and effectively implement the mission of the people's armed forces in the new era", Xi said at a ceremony in Beijing on Friday. It will be removed from the Strategic Support Force, which was set up eight years ago as a new PLA branch combining information, cyber and space warfare departments under Xi's previous military restructuring, said a statement from the PLA Daily military news service. The space and cyber forces would also be brought under a new command structure, it said, de facto abolishing the Strategic Support Force. Under the SSF, the information forces had been in charge of collecting technical intelligence and providing intelligence support to regional military chiefs. Joe McReynolds, China security fellow at the Jamestown Foundation, said: "When the SSF was created, they rearranged existing capabilities under a new command structure. We guessed at the time that might be transitional, and that has now come to pass." Beijing's efforts to further strengthen the PLA are closely watched as China challenges US dominance in the Indo-Pacific region and wields its growing military power to intimidate various neighbours in territorial disputes. Xi's last major PLA restructuring in 2015 moved critical functions such as logistics, training and mobilisation directly under the command of the CMC, which he chairs. Combining cyber, information and space forces under the SSF was viewed as an attempt to create similar direct control. But experts on the Chinese military said that leaders had unwound that structure as a result of an incident last year in which a Chinese surveillance balloon was shot down by the US, as well as corruption investigations into generals and a failure to achieve synergies across the different divisions within the SSF. The military leadership has been experimenting with smaller reorganisations in recent years, suggesting that the 2015 reforms were not complete. "The relative success of the functions they moved under the CMC has convinced them that they will have the control they want," McReynolds said. He added that Beijing was focused on cutting out layers of command and enabling top leaders to speak directly to tactical forces in wartime if needed. Bi Yi, a veteran army general, was appointed commander of the new Information Support Force, and Li Wei named as its political commissar. The latter position wields power equal with the commander as the Communist party seeks to enforce absolute loyalty and ideological correctness in the force, which belongs to the party rather than the state.

NASA chief warns of Chinese military presence in space

17 April 2024, VOA News

FILE - A Long March-2C rocket, carrying the Einstein Probe satellite, lifts off from the Xichang Satellite Launch Center in Xichang in China's Sichuan province, Jan. 9, 2024. The head of the U.S. space agency said China is using its civilian program to mask military objectives.

China is bolstering its space capabilities and is using its civilian program to mask its military objectives, the head of the U.S. space agency said Wednesday, warning that Washington must remain vigilant.

"China has made extraordinary strides especially in the last 10 years, but they are very, very secretive," NASA administrator Bill Nelson told lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

"We believe that a lot of their so-called civilian space program is a military program. And I think, in effect, we are in a race," Nelson said.

He said he hoped Beijing would "come to its senses and understand that civilian space is for peaceful uses," but added: "We have not seen that demonstrated by China."

Nelson's comment came as he testified before the House Appropriations Committee on NASA's budget for fiscal 2025.

He said the United States should land on the moon again before China does, as both nations pursue lunar missions, but he expressed concern that were Beijing to arrive first, it could say: "OK, this is our territory, you stay out."

The United States is planning to put astronauts back on the moon in 2026 with its Artemis 3 mission. China says it hopes to send humans to the moon by 2030.

Nelson said he was confident the United States would not lose its "global edge" in space exploration.

"But you got to be realistic," he said. "China has really thrown a lot of money at it and they've got a lot of room in their budget to grow. I think that we just better not let down our guard."

China's latest Military Buildup in Tibet: China's Provocation does not end with just Cartographic Aggression

16 April 2024, Indian Defence Review

Amidst the thawing snows and the onset of spring in the Himalayan Border Region, the possibility of a military confrontation between India and China looms ominously. Since March, China's expansive military buildup in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and the Tibetan areas has been disconcerting, marked by a rapid boost in troop size and military logistic infrastructure development.

This includes the upsurge in deploying thousands of newly recruited soldiers and officers from Mainland China into TAR and the Western Theater Command (WTC) as part of 2024 PLA's Spring recruitment drive. Additionally, lately, China has urgently sped up the construction of its military infrastructure projects, notably the recent boost of 417 Key Roadways Projects for a logistic system based on three-dimensional transportation networks in TAR of Airports, Railway, and Roadway.

China's aggressive move has been interpreted as a response towards India's induction of 10,000 soldiers and the strategic infrastructure upgrade, especially the Sela Tunnel, in the border areas along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

Since 2017, Beijing has renamed a total of 62 different areas in Arunachal Pradesh as an integral part of the territorial jurisdiction of Southern Tibet "Zangnan". Apart from dismissing such actions as a gimmick or illogical, India should study the likely future implications of such actions by China and take pre-emptive steps to dissuade the PLA. The 62 renamed places of sovereign Indian territories as being integral to so-called "South-Tibet" is part of the "Three Warfares" strategy to gradually build up domestic and international opinion of their extraterritorial claims.

The current upsurge in militarization efforts by India has garnered significant attention, as covered by CNN and other foreign media "A high-altitude (Sela Tunnel) is the latest flashpoint in India-China border tensions". It seems that such news does not highlight China's ever-growing and non-stop construction of multiple strategic tunnels, bridges, and roads across the LAC with the like of the latest 417 Key Roadway construction announcement after March, which will fuel further disputes and threaten India's security and sovereignty.

China's proactive role in exacerbating tensions along the borders with India extends beyond territorial renaming. By bolstering its military size and infrastructure development across highly sensitive border areas, China is indicating its potential aim to assert pressure and dominance on India and therefore strategically escalate the border conflict.

Between March 16th and 31st, 2024, the Chinese PLA's WTC initiated a substantial drive to induct newly recruited PLA soldiers, primarily from Mainland China. The newly recruited soldiers during PLA's Spring recruitment of first half of 2024 were mobilized and transported into TAR, and Tibetan areas incorporated in Qinghai, Gansu, and Sichuan Provinces within WTC. Other Tibetan areas, specifically the Dechen (Diqing) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture also witnessed an influx of newly recruited soldiers.

In addition, China carried out the direct selection and recruitment of officers for the Tibet Military Region (TMR), targeting mainly fresh graduates with science and engineering backgrounds majoring in Hindi language, aircraft design and engineering, aircraft manufacturing engineering, aircraft power engineering, computer science and technology, network engineering and nursing, and other academic majors. The Chinese PLA's recruitment targets depict China's focus on bolstering military infrastructure construction, cyber operation, and linguistic capabilities, particularly across the LAC.

Assessing Tibetan's presence and participation within the Chinese PLA stationed in TAR

A growing concern among defense analysts in India relates to the increasing number of Tibetans recruitment within the Chinese PLA's forces following the violent 2020 Galwan Clashes.

Major areas within the WTC lie in the territory of the traditional areas of Tibet, which were occupied in the 1950s and subsumed into PRC as TAR (Outer Tibet) and Tibetan areas within Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan Province (Inner Tibet). Although Tibetan traditional areas constitute the largest area within WTC spanning across the whole of the Tibetan Plateau, there are only meager numbers of Tibetan soldiers inside the Chinese PLA.

Recent census data from the China Statistical Yearbook of 2021, recorded a total Tibetan population within the PRC as 7,060,731 people, mainly inhabiting the traditional areas of Tibet, constituting modern-day TAR (Outer Tibet) and Incorporated Tibetan areas (Inner Tibet) absorbed into the four neighboring Chinese provinces. Out of more than 7 million Tibetans, only 7487 Tibetans are recorded as being active servicemen in the PLA, according to China's Seventh National Census in 2020.

Since the Chinese PLA's annexation and its subsequent occupation of Tibet in the 1950s, Tibetans continuously have been at the worst end of systemic repression, leading to a reluctance among Tibetan youth to enlist in the army. The declining number of applicants for military conscription in TAR indicates the lack of support for an army that had stolen and deprived Tibetans of their freedom and sovereignty.

In 2018, there was a total of 6,697 people applying for military conscription from the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). Since then, the number of applicants from TAR for military conscription has shown a declining trend, with the decreasing numbers to 5,800 in 2020, declining to 3800 in 2021, and a slight increase to 4400 during 2022, as per local reports. Among the total permanent population of 3,648,100 in TAR as per the Seventh Chinese Census in 2020, there were 443,370 Han Chinese and 66,829 non-Tibetan ethnic Chinese.

Therefore, it is likely that Han Chinese and other ethnic groups may constitute a significant portion of the applicants during military conscription since there is a lack of Tibetan participation.

Even Lhasa, the most populated city in TAR with a total permanent population of 867,891 people in 2020, had only 472 applicants during the spring 2022 military conscription. Not all 475 applicants are necessarily Tibetan, since Lhasa was recorded as the city with the most Han Chinese populations in 2020.

Out of the total population in Lhasa, there were 233,083 Han-Chinese and 25,953 non-Tibetan ethnic groups permanently settled in the area. Similarly, Zhanda (Zanda) County bordering India's Ladakh, Himachal Pradesh, and Uttarakhand and the closest border county to New Delhi, witnessed only two Tibetan applicants for 2024 spring recruitment out of a total population of 8,454 people.

Contrary to the growing claims of increasing numbers of Tibetans within the PLA, the majority of the soldiers and officers within the Tibet Military Region and other WTC areas are Han Chinese or other non-Tibetan ethnic groups from Mainland China.

Recent Strategic Infrastructure Expansion: Massive 417 Key Roadway Construction Projects underway
The uptick in the deployment of the newly recruited soldiers in the TAR is supplemented by an intense infrastructural development plan intended to strengthen the Chinese PLA's logistical and transportation capabilities. The recent unveiling of 417 Key roadway construction projects in TAR is strategically designed to bolster China's military prowess, particularly in reaction to the construction of the Sela Tunnel near Eastern LAC Sectors by India. On March 22, the Transportation Department of the TAR announced an extensive plan of 417 roadway construction projects scheduled for completion within this year.

As per the official announcement, the key projects targeting TAR border areas of 2024 included:

- G4218 Lhasa to Shigatse Airport section construction project.
- G109 Golmud to Nagqu section quality improvement project.
- Implementation of 281 administrative village access projects and the addition of 175 administrative villages to have access to hardened roads.
- Major quality improvement projects of the G318 Highway including reconstruction of the Wada (Lengqu River) Section.
- To start all projects within the "14th Five-Year Plan"

In addition to the 417 Roadway construction projects, China has announced two other strategic infrastructure plans in recent months, which further significantly boost their transportation logistic network and military readiness. On February 1, the "Key Construction Project Plan for Region in 2024" issued by TAR's Development and Reform Commission, unveiled 187 Key construction projects with a planned investment of 151.8 Billion Yuan. Earlier on January 11, TAR's government announced an 80 billion yuan ($11.2 billion) investment plan to boost key infrastructure such as airports, railways, and highways in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). Within the 80 Billion Yuan Investment, China executed three major roadway projects mainly on the India-china border, comprising the construction of the Metok (Medog) to Chayu (Zayu) section of National Highway G219, ;an upgrade and renovation of National Highway G318, ; and the opening of the entire Lhasa-Shigatse (Lashi) Expressway to traffic was proclaimed.

Concurrently, the prefectural level administration across TAR has also intensified infrastructure construction projects in recent months. For instance, in Ali Prefecture, bordering Ladakh, Himachal Pradesh, and Uttarakhand State, 340 Key Construction Projects for 2024 with a 72.424 Billion Yuan total investment were recently announced.

According to the TAR's governmental work report of 2024, the region's border infrastructure, especially the road transportation network has undergone major upgrades, with 97% of Border Towns and 87% of Xiaokang Border Villages now having access to hardened roads. Earlier reports highlighted that by the end of 2023, a total of 123,00 Kilometers of roadway had been opened for traffic.

This massive roadway project marks a major progression towards realizing an extensive three-dimensional transportation network, with the nexus of Roadways, Railways, and Airports. Thereby linking every remote and border area of TAR with Mainland China and neighboring countries such as Nepal and Bhutan. This strategic design comes under the directives outlined in “The 14th Five-Year Plan for the National Economic and Social Development of the Tibet Autonomous Region, Outline of the plan and long-term goals for 2035” issued on January 24, 2021.

As reiterated by Chinese officials, the main objective of the three-dimensional transportation network in TAR is to establish a modern military logistic system designed to ensure long-term stability and peace in the region.

Conclusion

The recent clashes between India and China along LAC borders and the PLA Navy presence in the Indian Ocean Region (IOR), along with their strategic competition for geopolitical influence over South Asia, have increased the specter of a conflict between the two major powers in Asia.

China’s stern warning to India against escalating border tensions with the induction of 10,000 soldiers and strategic Sela Tunnel construction across the LAC constitutes a duplicity and hypocrisy in its behaviour. Rather than de-escalating border tensions, China’s recent actions suggest the opposite. Its aggression against India does not end with the remaining areas of the sovereign Indian territories. Under the guise of disengagement and de-escalation, Beijing is rapidly bolstering its military power and strategic build-up in TAR with the recent deployment of fresh PLA recruits into TAR and ramping up its logistic infrastructures.

12 April 2024, Current Affairs

As air travel continues to connect the world, airports play a crucial role in facilitating global mobility. However, some airports operate under extreme conditions, situated at breathtaking altitudes where thin air and challenging weather conditions pose unique challenges for pilots and engineers alike. In this article, we delve into the realm of high-altitude aviation to explore the top ten highest altitude airports in the world as of 2024.

Highest Altitude Airport in the World 2024

As of 2024, Daocheng Yading Airport (DCY) in China remains the world’s highest-altitude airport, situated at 4,411m elevation. It serves as the vital link to the stunning Yading Nature Reserve, just 6km away. With a single runway stretching 4,200m long and 45m wide, and a compact 5,000m<sup>2</sup> terminal, the airport operates under special protocols due to its extreme altitude. Aircraft adhere to reduced speeds during takeoff and landing, while passengers are encouraged to acclimate to the high altitude beforehand.

World’s Highest Airport – Daocheng Yading Airport
Location: China

Altitude: 14,472 feet

Since 2013, Daocheng Yading Airport in China has claimed the title of the highest airport globally, standing at an altitude of 4411 meters above sea level. Its runway stretches 4,200 meters long and 45 meters wide, while the terminal covers 5000 square meters, notable for its UFO-like design. This airport serves as a remarkable feat of engineering amidst the challenging high-altitude terrain of the Tibetan Plateau.

Second Highest Altitude Airport of the World – Bangda Airport

Altitude: 14,219 feet

The second-highest airport globally is Bangda Airport, located in Qamdo, Tibet, at an elevation of 4,334 meters above sea level. Renowned for its extraordinary altitude, it features the world’s longest publicly used paved runway, stretching 5,500 meters. This extensive runway is vital to accommodate large aircraft, compensating for reduced engine and aircraft performance during takeoff and landing at such extreme altitudes.

Third Highest Airport in the World – Kangding Airport

Altitude: 14,042 feet

The third-highest airport globally is Kangding Airport in China, nestled in the western province of Sichuan. Situated at 4,280 meters above sea level, it stands as a testament to engineering at extreme altitudes. Kangding Airport serves as a crucial gateway to the region, facilitating air travel amidst challenging mountainous terrain. Its strategic location aids in connecting travelers to the picturesque landscapes of the Tibetan Plateau.

Chinese military researchers zero in on AI-driven navy, space combat to ‘win future wars’

10 April 2024, South China Morning Post

Study Times, a key Communist Party paper, publishes series by PLA experts on emerging weapons technology to take strategic high ground

Monday’s articles come as Xi Jinping underlines need to ‘boldly innovate’ during country’s ‘military struggle’

Researchers in China’s armed forces have prioritised key areas of military technologies, including AI-driven naval warfare and aerospace combat capabilities, expanding on President Xi Jinping calls for “bold innovations” in advanced technology.

In a series devoted to Xi’s concept of developing “new quality combat power”, Study Times, a publication under the Central Party School of China’s Communist Party, published articles on Monday by various People’s Liberation Army (PLA) researchers stressing that such technologies had become the strategic high ground in military dominance and were essential to winning on future battlefields.

Xi has repeatedly pushed the PLA to develop hi-tech and advanced capabilities to win a modern war. In a meeting in March he urged officials to “boldly innovate and explore new types of combat force construction and applications, and liberate and develop new quality combat power”.

The authors said the role of artificial intelligence was a priority for “new combat forces”, and that it was a “clear trend” that AI-powered military systems would be a “key variable in changing the rules of war”.

The authors discussed how AI technology was changing the nature of military command and decision-making, saying it could process and analyse large amounts of data to help make faster decisions, and in some cases, independently make complex tactical decisions and operations. Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs) and unmanned drone boats were also becoming more prevalent, they said.

After Xi last month urged forces to prepare “for the military struggle at sea”, the articles discussed how “unmanned intelligent combat will deeply change the deployments of naval forces, prompting changes in battle concepts and accelerating the evolution of combat”. The authors also explored how massive drone networks could assess situational awareness during sea battles, process data with cloud computing, and use advanced algorithms to form adaptive command, assault and logistic chains. AI-controlled drones could also be used for tasks such as air refuelling, communications relays, electronic countermeasures for reconnaissance and surveillance, swarm bombing and decoy deployment, they said. The flexibility and cost-effectiveness of AI-integrated drones would upend traditional naval theories, one researcher wrote, and “new methods of warfare at sea, such as unmanned attrition warfare and unmanned guerrilla warfare, will gain new asymmetric advantages”. In another article, researchers focused on the expansion of “new military realms”, in which “electromagnetic space, cyberspace and aerospace” would become the “new frontiers of military struggle”. “History has proved that whoever can effectively grasp and use the right to control a certain space through the development of new combat forces will gain a great advantage in future military competitions,” the article said.

The researchers also singled out circumstances that they thought would compel China’s space combat force to modernise, and warned that the PLA must avoid situations “in which core technologies are controlled by others as soon as possible”.

“We must have a deep understanding of the important role of emerging tech and new combat forces in modern warfare, be aware of new fields of technology, and understand the potential of new combat capabilities to see the future battlefield clearly and win future wars,” they said.

Longest Runway In The World: A Brief Guide To China's Rikaze Peace Airport

07 April 2024, Simple Flying

Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) is one of the highest airports and has the world's longest runway. Higher altitude airports in China and Bolivia pose challenges due to thin air and low oxygen levels. Airbus A319 aircrafts are used for high-elevation airports, equipped with special features for operations.

First opened as a purely military facility in 1973, Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) became a dual-use military and civilian airport in 2010 following a 532 million yuan expansion. Serving Shigatse in the Tibet Autonomous Region of China, Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) is one of the highest elevations in the world at 12,408 feet above sea level.

While it is not the world's highest airport, it is tied with Ulyanovsk Vostochny Airport (ULY) in Russia for having the world's longest runway at 16,000 feet long.

Higher altitude airports are:

- Daocheng Yading Airport (DCY) in China is 14,566 feet above sea level.
- Changdu Bangda Airport (BPX) in China is 14,219 feet above sea level.

Other high altitude airports can be found in South America

Before the massive building boom in China, the world's highest runways were in South America and included the following airports:

- El Alto International Airport (LPB) in Bolivia is 13,326 feet above sea level.
- Captain Nicolas Rojas Airport (POI) in Bolivia is 12,913 feet above sea level.

Why do high-elevation airports need long runways?

At 5,400 feet above sea level, Denver International Airport (DEN) in Colorado has long posed challenges to pilots, but things start to deteriorate further once you get above 6,500 feet. Airports above this height are more challenging due to lower air density and lower levels of oxygen. Compared to sea level, airports at high elevations have thinner air, which affects how aircraft perform, because the air is less dense. When it flows over the wings, it produces less lift. Likewise, less oxygen in the air reduces the amount of thrust from the engines. These two factors combined force pilots to carefully calculate takeoff and landing distances along with the plane's rate of climb. Another factor that often comes into play is that high-altitude airports have unpredictable weather that changes rapidly, as is the case at Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) in Tibet.

The weather at Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ)

The climate at Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) consists of a dry monsoon-influenced continental type. The summers are hot and humid due to the East Asian monsoons, while the winters are cold, dry, and windy due to the sizable Siberian anticyclone. The area is often subjected to sand storms blowing across the Mongolian steppe from the Gobi Desert during the spring. The autumn, just like spring, is relatively short and dry with very little rain. Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) is 26.7 miles from Tibet's second-largest city, Shigatse, in Jiangdang Township. In 2020, Xigazê, or Rikaze as it is called in Tibetan, had a population of 798,153. According to the aviation flight tracking website, Flightradar24 Peace Airport (RKZ) has no international flights but does serve three airports in China, which are:

- Chengdu Shuangliu International Airport (CTU) has ten flights per week operated by Tibet Airlines using Airbus A319 aircraft.
- Chongqing Jiangbei International Airport (CKG) has three flights per week by West Air (China) using Airbus A319 aircraft.
- Xi'an Xianyang International Airport (XIY) has six flights per week by China Eastern Airlines using Airbus A319 aircraft.

Ulyanovsk Vostochny Airport (ULY) is used by large cargo planes

At only 253 above the sea, Ulyanovsk Vostochny Airport (ULY) in Ulyanovsk Oblast in Russia has a long runway because it is a base for large load cargo operator Volga-Dnepr Airlines.

Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ) has a 48,000 square feet terminal building and added a second 9,843-foot runway, which is used by the People's Republic of China military to test its high-altitude long-endurance Guizhou WZ-7 Soaring Dragon unmanned aerial reconnaissance drones.

Why airlines use the Airbus A319 to fly to Rikaze Peace Airport (RKZ)

The Airbus A319 is one of the few aircraft certified for high-altitude airport operation by the Federal Aviation Authority (FAA) and the European Union Aviation Safety Agency (EASA). When operating from high-elevation airports, there are two main elements that come into play: engine thrust and passenger oxygen requirements.

Because of the air density at high elevations, Airbus has fitted some A319s with a thrust bump that increases the takeoff/go-around (TOGA) thrust by 10%. The thrust bump buttons are activated by pushing two red buttons on the back of the thrust levers.

For higher altitude airports, the oxygen mask drop levels and a greater passenger oxygen capacity needs to be changed. The Civil Aviation Administration of China (CAAC) requires all planes using high-altitude airports to carry a 55-minute supply of oxygen.

The usual amount of oxygen is 15 minutes, which is more than enough time for pilots to take the aircraft to lower levels. When flying over high mountainous terrain in Tibet, a pilot would need more time to get the aircraft to a flight level where oxygen was not needed.

About Tibet Airlines

Headquartered in the Lhasa, Tibet Autonomous Region, Tibet Airlines commenced flights on July 26, 2011. Its inaugural route was from Lhasa Gonggar Airport (LXA) to Ngari Gunsa Airport (NGQ). Later in the same year, Tibet began to fly direct flights between Lhasa, Beijing, and Shanghai. According to the aviation data and statistics website, ch-aviation Tibet Airlines serves 55 domestic destinations within China using a fleet of 45 aircraft.

The aircraft in the Tibet Airlines fleet are

- 27 x Airbus A319-100s
- 7 x Airbus A319-100Ns with 13 to be delivered
- 6 x Airbus A320-200s
- 5 X A330-200s

China set to become the world's largest air force, top US military official warns

April 1, 2024

<https://interestingengineering.com/military/china-worlds-largest-air-force>

Navy Adm. John Aquilino characterized the modernization of China's military as "the biggest threat since World War 2."

China is set to become the world's largest air force and could replace the United States, a top US military official warned. According to Navy Adm. John Aquilino, head of the US Indo-Pacific Command, China's military modernization is "the biggest threat since World War 2."

"What we all have to understand is we haven't faced a threat like this since World War 2. The largest military, and again as Senator Wicker said, the world's largest Navy, soon to be the world's largest Air Force. So, the magnitude, scope and scale of this security challenge cannot be understated," Aquilino said in a testimony on Capitol Hill on March 21.

"Our adversaries have become increasingly aggressive and emboldened. The PRC's unprecedented military buildup and campaign of course of actions destabilize the region and they challenge our values and the institutions that support a free and open Indo-Pacific," he added. In his last testimony as the Commander of US Indo-Pacific Command (USINDOPACOM), Aquilino noted that PLA's aviation has undergone a significant transformation since 2021. "Combined, the PLA Air Force (PLAAF) and PLAN Aviation constitute the largest aviation force in the Indo Pacific. Over half of the PLA's operational fighter force is 4th and 5th generation, enabling longer-range A2/AD and counter-air operations across the western Pacific Ocean. The PLA is also developing a stealth bomber that can cover the Second Island Chain and the Western Pacific," he wrote in a March 18 statement. Catching up with the US economically and technologically

Furthermore, the military official also pointed out that the US can't just spend money to stay ahead because "China is catching up economically and technologically."

"While modernization of the force and the development of new concepts are essential to our ability to deter, we need to move at the speed and pace required to address the rapidly evolving security environment," he wrote.

In a 2023 assessment of Chinese military capabilities, the Pentagon highlighted that when considering the People's Liberation Army Air Force (PLAAF) and Navy together, they possess over 3,150 aircraft excluding trainer versions and unmanned aircraft systems (UAS), of which approximately 2,400 are combat aircraft, including fighters, strategic bombers, tactical bombers, multi-mission tactical, and attack aircraft. "The PLAAF is rapidly catching up to Western air forces. The PLAAF continues to modernize with the delivery of domestically built aircraft and a wide range of UASs," reads a key takeaway from the report. Meanwhile, the US Air Force, though currently at its smallest size in recent years, maintains approximately 4,000 aircraft that are not trainers or drones. Moreover, additional aircraft are operated by the Navy, Marine Corps, and Army, collectively numbering several thousand more, The EurAsian Times reported.

President Xi Jinping has promoted the PLA's security chief to the rank of general, a departure from recent practice that comes amid a purge of military leaders. Wang Renhua, head of the Central Military Commission's Political and Legal Affairs Commission, was elevated to the highest rank for officers in active service on Thursday.

Wang, 62, is the third security chief of the People's Liberation Army since a major overhaul of the military in 2015. He took up the job in late 2019 and was promoted to lieutenant general.

He becomes the first general to serve in this position since the overhaul – his predecessor Song Dan was a lieutenant general when he was security chief, as was Li Xiaofeng before him.

It comes as the ruling Communist Party is ramping up a campaign targeting corruption in the military. In December, nine PLA generals – including a number of senior members of the PLA Rocket Force responsible for China's nuclear arsenal – were dismissed from the top legislature.

Meanwhile, Li Shangfu – who has not been seen in public since August – was sacked as defence minister and state councillor in October, without explanation. Li was also removed from the CMC last month.

Others include aerospace company chairman Feng Jiehong, who resigned from the legislature in February. Li Zhizhong, a lieutenant general who was deputy commander of the PLA's Central Theatre Command, was also dismissed from the legislature.

Wang heads the commission that oversees the military's courts, procuratorates and prisons. It is responsible for formulating laws and regulations related to the military, including those protecting the rights of personnel.

Lu Li-shih, a former instructor at the Taiwanese naval academy in Kaohsiung, said Wang's promotion could give both him and the commission more power. "[This] means the elevation of his commission and military courts and military prosecutors' office – not just a promotion for [Wang]," he said.

Lu added that the promotion would also give the commission more authority in the trials of senior generals.

Xi – who is also chairman of the CMC – presented Wang with a certificate of order to elevate him to the top rank at a ceremony in Beijing on Thursday, state broadcaster CCTV reported.

Xiao Tianliang, president of the PLA's National Defence University, was also promoted to general, in line with past practice.

Wang, who is originally from Sichuan province, has previously served as director of the political unit at the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Centre in the Gobi Desert, and as deputy head of the PLA Ground Force political work department. In 2017, he became chief of the graft-buster of the PLA Navy's East Sea Fleet. As PLA security chief, Wang is also a member of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission, a party body that oversees all security-related matters. Prior to the 2015 military overhaul, PLA security chiefs were generals who were also in charge of the CMC's Commission for Discipline Inspection – the graft-buster responsible for investigating alleged wrongdoings by military officers.

China's Ministry of State Security has issued another stern warning about the potential national security threats posed by military enthusiasts, or "military fans." The ministry says this group is a high-risk target for espionage, theft of secrets, and leaks involving military matters.

In an article titled "Another Reminder for 'Military Fans'" published earlier this month, the ministry outlined several specific risks pertaining to this community's activities. The article states that military fans could inadvertently "guide" foreign intelligence operations by revealing sensitive military information, their online military forums and groups could become channels for overseas theft of secrets, and individual military fans could become targets for "screening and enticement" by foreign personnel acting as "insiders."

On March 7th, the ministry's official WeChat account delved deeper into the risks involved. The WeChat post noted that Chinese military fans obsessively track developments of advanced weapons and equipment, closely following details such as equipment quantities and models, troop locations, and aircraft serial numbers. They establish databases compiling this sensitive information and share it on websites, constantly expanding and refining the available data. "As time goes by, this information will become increasingly rich and professional, to the point of endangering military security," the Ministry of State Security warned.

This is not the first time that Beijing has raised alarms about the activity of military fans. On December 23rd of 2023, the Ministry cautioned fans against leaking information on construction progress, technical specifications, or deployment details of new military equipment. The Ministry's communication at that time stated that violations could result in prison sentences of 3 to 7 years. China's security establishment clearly views information gathering and sharing by these military enthusiasts as a critical risk to be proactively addressed.

China's South Asia 'bridgehead' needs urgent infrastructure boost to aid security, mineral exploration

08 March 2024, South China Morning Post

China should address an urgent need for infrastructure construction in a strategically important part of its southwestern Tibet autonomous region – seen as a “bridgehead” to South Asia – to enhance national security and mineral exploration, according to the head of one of its largest aluminium producers. “As a base for China’s mineral resources reserve, [Ngari prefecture] is an important transport and logistics hub in the western part of the country,” said Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference delegate Duan Xiangdong during the ongoing “two sessions” in Beijing.

“There is an urgent need [for the region] to enhance its infrastructure, such as electricity and transport.” Located in the remote and high-altitude western region near India, Ngari prefecture grapples with a challenging terrain and harsh climate, which has hindered logistics and infrastructure development, further constraining its economic progress.

While the region had made progress in mineral exploration that has contributed to China’s reserves of strategic mineral resources over the past few years, progress has been crippled by inadequate infrastructure, Duan added.

“Currently, the electrical grid capacity in the region is insufficient to meet the demands of its economic and social development, particularly given the absence of railway lines,” he said, according to the Aluminum Corporation of China official website on Tuesday.

He added that the region’s administrative centre is over 1,200km (746 miles) from the nearby railway stations.

“Relying solely on road transport results in long distances, high costs and low efficiency, thereby compromising the region’s ability to support the security and development of the country’s border area,” Duan added.

He called for “concurrently advancing” infrastructure construction and mineral resource exploration to “turn its resource advantages into economic strengths”.

Beijing has put energy self-reliance and security high on its agenda, ramping up domestic exploration and mining for critical minerals amid growing geopolitical tensions that risk its status in the global supply chain. Duan suggested speeding up power grid construction in northwest Tibet, increasing electricity purchase from other regions and enhancing the transmission capacity of power interconnections with the neighbouring provinces of Sichuan and Qinghai.

To address the logistics challenges, Duan proposed accelerating the construction of the northern line of the Xinjiang-Tibet railway.

Tibet plans to complete building 4,000km of railway lines by 2025, according to its 14th five-year plan, with the section between the city of Xigaze – also known as Shigatse – and Lake Pelku expected to begin operation next year.

The government and relevant enterprises should also work together to improve the green, efficient and sustainable exploration and utilisation of strategic mineral resources in the prefecture, added Duan.

Beijing has increased investment in Tibet, initiating a project to establish the world’s highest computing data centre in its capital city of Lhasa, which will span over 645,000 square metres (6.9 million sq ft). The 11.8 billion yuan (US$1.6 billion) project, which completed its first phase of construction in 2020, is expected to produce an annual revenue of 10 billion yuan, according to the state-backed Xinhua News Agency.

China moved military forces in disregard of agreements: Jaishankar on border row in eastern Ladakh

26 February 2024, Tribune India

India and China are rising and the two countries, in the process, are changing the world order, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar said on Monday.

Jaishankar, citing talks between leadership of the two countries in Mamallapuram and Wuhan, said India tried to maintain an “equilibrium” in the ties through diplomacy, but the relations took a different turn following China’s military build-up along the Line of Actual Control in 2020 in violation of laid down norms.

The external affairs minister, speaking at a media summit organised by the TV9 Network, described the rise of India and China as “significant” in the global geopolitical scenario.

“If you were to list three or four really big things which have changed in the last 20-25 years, I think most people would agree it would be the rise of China and the rise of India,” he said, replying to a question.

“You can say China started it much earlier because our own politics here delayed the era of reform. That’s okay. What’s done is done. But there is no question, both countries are rising and for world politics, this poses a very interesting problem,” he said.

"The problem is this: both are changing the world order by their rise. So each one has an impact vis-a-vis the world. But they also happened to be neighbours. So their relationship is also changing while it is changing vis-a-vis the rest of the world," Jaishankar added.

The external affairs minister argued that the situation, therefore, is making it "very complicated to create an equilibrium". They were part of "equilibrium maintenance exercise", Jaishankar said when specifically asked about the informal summit between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping in the Chinese city of Wuhan in 2018 and Mamallapuram in 2019.

"We tried to maintain that equilibrium naturally—first through diplomacy. So what you saw in Wuhan and Mamallapuram, etc was that equilibrium maintenance exercise," he said.

"But what happened in 2020 was, China for whatever reason chose to move military forces in disregard of agreements. That called for a different response for the equilibrium," he said.

"The logical thing for us to do, which is what we did, was we moved our forces and in a very big way. So from 2020, you have an equilibrium, one part of which is the military posture in the border areas, one part of it today obviously is the political relationship impacted by this border situation," he said.

"One part of it is also the economic measures that we have taken," he added.

Jaishankar said the Modi government believes that interests of the country's working class, small enterprises and small industries must be protected against "unfair competition".

"Our effort today is to build our deep strengths. We have to build our digital capabilities, our telecom, our manufacturing, our pharma industry, our health self-sufficiency, our defence industry, our ability to deploy on the border which you can only do if you build infrastructure," he said.

Jaishankar suggested that India's annual average expenditure on the border with China was about Rs 3,500 crore till 2014.

Today, it is almost Rs 15,000 crore, he said.

There was a neglect of the border infrastructure, he said, adding "you cannot defend the border if you do not build infrastructure there".

Military diplomacy in focus amid mega peacekeeping exercise

26 February 2024, The Nation

With powerful nations sending high-level defence delegations to Kathmandu, Nepal's military diplomacy is in full swing.

Nepal Army is hosting the fourth edition of Exercise Shanti Prayas, which brings more than 1,100 military personnel from 17 nations. Admiral John Aquilino, who leads the United States Indo-Pacific Command, arrived in Kathmandu via New Delhi on Saturday to observe the exercise sponsored by the Nepali and US armies.

Shanti Prayas is a multinational peacekeeping exercise hosted rotationally by the Nepal Army and the US Indo-Pacific Command.

Observers say having good military-to-military relations contributes to the improvement of overall bilateral and multilateral relations between Nepal and respective countries.

Adm Aquilino is scheduled to visit the Birendra Peace Operations Training Centre (BPOTC) in Panchkhal on Sunday, said Nepal Army spokesperson Brigadier General Krishna Prasad Bhandari. He is also scheduled to meet President Ramchandra Paudel, Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Defence Purna Bahadur Khadka, Chief of the Army Staff General Prabhu Ram Sharma and senior government and military officials, on Monday, according to the sources.

In New Delhi, Aquilino addressed the Raising Dialogue and held talks with the External Affairs Minister of India S Jaishankar, among other Indian officials. Jaishankar wrote about his meeting with the admiral on the social media platform X (formerly Twitter). The minister said that he had a good conversation with Aquilino on strategic affairs.

Prime Minister Dahal inaugurated the Exercise Shanti Prayas-IV on February 20. The event will continue till March 4. Rachel Schiller, the US deputy assistant secretary for programs and operations under the Bureau of Political-Military Affairs, attended during the opening ceremony.

Shanti Prayas-IV is designed to improve peacekeeping capabilities, strengthen military-to-military cooperation, and enhance the core peacekeeping competencies of all participants by the UN doctrines. The militaries of Nepal, the US, Australia, Bangladesh, Canada, Fiji, Ghana, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Mongolia, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Philippines, South Korea, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Uruguay, and Vietnam are participating in the effort, according to the Nepal Army.

After the Shanti Prayas concludes, a high-level delegation led by a lieutenant general of the Chinese People's Liberation Army is due to arrive in Kathmandu. The agenda of the March visit is yet to be fixed, according to sources at the Ministry of Defence.

There are some pending issues with China like military procurement, installation of an ammunition plant for the Nepal Army, another joint military exercise, training for Nepali Army officials, and military-to-military cooperation, sources privy to the developments said.

"The Chinese side has informed us that the PLA delegation will be led by a lieutenant general. The two sides are finalising agendas and issues," said a defence official informed on the matter.

Chinese Major General Yue Ande of the Tibet Military Command of the PLA visited Kathmandu in August last year. In talks held with Gen Sharma, the two sides discussed holding the pending joint military drills, among other issues.

When Nepal Army chief Sharma visited China in October-November last year to attend the Beijing-Xiangshan Forum, he held talks with Chief of Staff Gen Liu Zhenli of the Central Military Commission (CMC) of the Chinese Army and visited Chinese Army's different units and training centres in Xi'an, Shanghai and Guangzhou.

However, Nepal Army spokesperson Brig Gen Bhandari said that he has no information about the PLA delegation's Nepal visit.

Moreover, several Indian Army officials and delegations have also visited Kathmandu and held talks with General Sharma and other senior military and government officials.

In the context of the Indo-Pacific, Shanti Prayas is a remarkable event at a time when regional bodies like SAARC have stalled, said retired Maj Gen Purna Silwal. The participation of India and other democratic countries in this particular multilateral military exercise is significant.

"In terms of participation, the event this year is the biggest of its kind in Nepal. As the army is the country's only stable institution, all major and middle powers want to have good relations with it," said Silwal. "If the relations between the armies are good, other relations will automatically improve. This will further stabilise and cement bilateral ties."

Nepal Army is capable of handling geopolitical rivalry, and such military exercises and arrivals of individual military delegations from various countries are not targeted against any nation, Silwal added.

After Nepal became the highest troops contributing country to UN peacekeeping, this is another milestone for us, said Silwal. "This achievement will boost our confidence."

CCP Expands Military Recruitment, Especially in Rural Areas

13 February 2024, ChinaScope

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is expanding its military recruitment, particularly in rural areas.

Recently-leaked CCP recruitment documents state that the CCP's recruiting focus should be on college students, while also recruiting widely in the countryside, "leaving no dead zones" (no unrecruited rural areas). For those Chinese citizens who leave their city of residence to travel for work or school, it is mandatory that they register with the military regarding their travel plans. Expert observers believe this expanded recruitment activity is preparation for large-scale war.

The CCP is focused on recruiting college graduates, who are suitable for adaptation to modern information warfare. Rural recruits are also targeted to provide a large pool of soldiers whose casualties may have less immediate economic and political impact. There are reports that the CCP has been recruiting discharged soldiers back into service only 5 years after they leave the military, as well as relaxing requirements to allow military service by people with criminal records.

New military recruitment regulations enacted in May 2022 have enabled this expansion. The new regulations include allowing retired soldiers to re-enlist, as well as directives to recruit students with high-tech skills. The CCP has completed a nationwide military service registration covering the country's entire population, signaling preparation for war.

According to expert Yuan Hongbing, a Chinese legal expert living in exile in Australia, the CCP under Xi Jinping is waiting to see what will happen in the 2024 US presidential election. The CCP believes that, regardless of who wins, the result will divide America for years, creating a window of opportunity for the CCP to attack Taiwan. Yuan says China's war preparations are likely focused on seizing this window of time in 2025-2027. Expanded recruitment from rural areas in particular will provide "cannon fodder" for large-scale combat operations against Taiwan planned for this period.

DEFENSE/9 Chinese military aircraft cross median line: Taiwan defense ministry

14 February 2024, Focus Taiwan

Taipei, Feb. 14 (CNA) A total of 14 warplanes and drones sent by the Chinese People's Liberation Army were detected in waters near Taiwan on Wednesday afternoon, with nine of them crossing the median line of the Taiwan Strait, according to Taiwan's Ministry of National Defense (MND).

The 14 aircraft dispatched by the Chinese military starting at 1 p.m. included Shenyang J-16 fighter jets, Shaanxi Y-8 transport aircraft, and unmanned aerial vehicles, the MND said.

Among them, nine crossed the median line of the Taiwan Strait and entered Taiwan's air defense identification zone (ADIZ) off the north and southwest of the country in tandem with patrolling activities carried out by Chinese military vessels in the areas, the MND said.

The MND said that it had monitored the situation closely and "employed appropriate forces," such as scrambling fighter jets, dispatching military vessels, and readying coastal missile systems.

The median line of the Taiwan Strait served for decades as a tacit border, but the Chinese military has more flagrantly sent aircraft, warships, and drones across it since former United States House Speaker Nancy Pelosi visited Taiwan in early August 2022.

Since the beginning of 2024, Beijing has also begun sending balloons over Taiwan, according to the MND.

An ADIZ is a self-declared area in which a country claims the right to identify, locate, and control approaching foreign aircraft but is not part of its territorial airspace as defined by international law.

China 'Targets' India In Its Latest Military Venture; Works On '007 Drones' To Fight Indian Army At LAC

05 February 2024, The EurAsian Times

Special Agent 007, aka James Bond of the British intelligence agency MI-6, is the most renowned special agent in the world. The agent carries out the most complex and life-threatening missions with finesse and has a knack for surviving against all odds.

Real life, however, is not that predictable.

Keeping this in mind, the Chinese military and scientists have started the task of developing drones that can replace special agents in the coming decade to carry out high-risk military operations overseas without risking human life.

A unit of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) has been working in the bustling city of Chengdu in southwest China along with a team of scientists to develop these complex drones to execute operations in foreign countries.

China's stated position is that it does not interfere in the internal affairs of other countries, and its military's overseas operations have always been cloaked in secrecy.

However, with human operators come the risk of being captured by adversaries and wreaking havoc with the military plans. The research to replace human agents in special operations using technology is indicative of how the Chinese approach to espionage will pan out in the future.

In a recent paper published in the Fire Control & Command Control journal, the PLA's 78092 unit discusses a fictitious special operation overseas. The theoretical plan intends to serve as a guideline for Chinese companies and researchers working on drone technology.

As reported by the South China Morning Post, the operation is set in 2035 when a small-scale conflict erupts between China and one of its neighbors, with whom it shares a border.

Without naming the country, the paper mentions that a river with an average depth of 30 meters runs along its border. Incidentally, the River Brahmaputra (known as Yarlung Tsangpo in China) flows from Tibet to India.

In the case study, both countries decided to stick to using small arms, small boats, drones, and anti-aircraft guns to avoid escalation. In this scenario, the UAV would be required to traverse long distances, dive deep underwater, and remain submerged for long periods, awaiting the opportune moment. When required, it will re-emerge from the water to throw a punch before going beneath the water surface again.

The Chinese military's special mission entailed targeting the enemy's critical command and logistics hub that lies along a river, some 40 kilometers inside from the border.

The Chinese armed forces, for this mission, require a drone that can operate both alone and in swarms; it should be able to fly as well as navigate river depths to avoid detection by the adversary and should be able to maneuver to avoid obstacles both in the air and in the water.

The PLA wants to give more teeth to the drones by making them able to operate with precision and beyond visual range without human intervention. They should be able to hover over the battlefield to assess the damage and take further action if required. It should be able to pursue fleeing enemy combatants and return to Chinese territory by annihilating the enemy in totality.

China Leads Drone Innovation

China has long ensconced itself at the forefront of drone innovation. More than 80 percent of commercial drones in the world are made by Chinese companies. Shenzhen-based DJI commands 70 percent of the world's consumer drone market alone. Now, China is carefully factoring unmanned systems into its military planning. A 2019 China defense white paper stated that "there is a prevailing trend to develop long-range precision, intelligent, stealthy or unmanned weaponry or equipment" and added that "intelligent warfare is on the horizon."

Since then, Beijing has been able to develop strike-capable and non-weaponized systems for intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) missions. In the 2000s, a drone was synonymous with American MQ-9s, but a 2018 Department of Defense report concludes that China "is closing the gap with the US Air Force across a spectrum of capabilities, gradually eroding longstanding US technical advantages."

Its Wing Loong and Caihong (CH) series have helped China's military exports, particularly to the Middle East and North Africa. Its fleet of reconnaissance drones includes the High-Altitude Long Endurance (HALE) Soaring Dragon and Cloud Shadow.

While the Chinese military has not demonstrated drone strikes, it has deployed UAVs in non-combat scenarios. But its ambition is fast changing.

CH-5 is almost identical to Reaper. It is larger than the Reaper, but its payload capacity is roughly 1200 kg, which is 500 kg less than that of the Reaper. Like other Chinese aerial platforms, CH-5 is limited by its engine. But it boasts an operational endurance of 60 hours, which is more than double the Reaper's fly time of 27 hours.

The development of the latest version in the series CH-7 stealth drone is expected to finish this year.

In 2023, Chinese researchers developed a new method of enabling UAVs to maneuver, acquire, and potentially attack targets in global-positioning-system (GPS) "denied" environments. The drone proposes to use "image-based visual servoing" (IBVS) to "lock on" to hostile assets. This method, the researchers suggest, can be used to acquire targets, even quickly moving ones.

This technology is likely to find application in military drones. Till now, human operators have been required to give the "kill command." But increased use of Artificial Intelligence and drone autonomy, like the ability to work in GPS-denied areas, means humans will soon be taken out of the chain of command.

China's defence ministry spokesperson says India border issue 'left over from history'

BEIJING, Jan 25 (Reuters) - A Chinese defence ministry spokesperson said on Thursday that India-China border tensions were "an issue left over from history and not the whole of China-India relations".

"It is unwise and inappropriate for the Indian side to insist on linking the border situation with bilateral relations," spokesperson Wu Qian told a monthly press briefing.

A senior Indian official told Reuters earlier this month that India could ease its heightened scrutiny of Chinese investments if the two countries' border remained peaceful, the first signal that the four-year-old curbs could be lifted.

Taiwan begins extended one-year conscription in response to China threat

TAICHUNG, Taiwan (Reuters) - The first batch of new recruits began serving their one-year compulsory military service in Taiwan on Thursday after the conscription period was extended from four months due to government concerns about China's rising military threat.

President Tsai Ing-wen announced the extension in late 2022.

China has ramped up military, diplomatic and economic pressure on Taiwan to assert its sovereignty claims, including almost daily Chinese air force missions near the island over the past four years.

At a recruitment center in the central Taiwanese city of Taichung, a group of young men gathered in the morning cold to be inducted as dogs checked their bags for drugs and barbers shaved their heads before they changed into army fatigues.

"It is our shared responsibility to adjust the structure of the military and improve combat power. It is also a foundation for us to strengthen our military power," officer Lien Chih-wei told reporters.

Taiwan's army said in a statement that it expected a total of 670 conscripts to join in the first batch under the newly extended service.

"In the face of a complex international environment, it is our first priority to build the strong will to resist the enemy," it said.

"The extension of compulsory service to one year will not only enhance immediate combat effectiveness, but will also improve the quality of reserve personnel, strengthen mobilization energy, and enhance the overall combat effectiveness of national defense."

Tsai has described the previous military system, including training reservists, as inefficient and insufficient to cope with China's rising military threat, especially if China launched a rapid attack on the island.

Conscripts will undergo more intense training, including shooting exercises, combat instruction used by U.S. forces, and operating more powerful weapons including anti-tank missiles and Stinger anti-aircraft missiles, according to previously announced plans.

Yin Hsin-shih, 18, said he was a "little bit excited" to be joining up.

"For the country, it will provide the needed defense power given that our neighboring country is a great threat to our nation," he said, referring to China.

The United States, Taiwan's most important international backer and arms seller despite the lack of formal diplomatic ties, has welcomed the conscription reform as part of Taiwan's efforts to boost its ability to defend itself.

However, the period of service in Taiwan is still shorter than the 18 months mandated in South Korea, which faces a hostile and nuclear-armed North Korea.

After Taiwan announced the extension in 2022, China criticized Taiwan for seeking to use the Taiwanese people as "cannon fodder."

Taiwan's government rejects Beijing's sovereignty claims and says only the Taiwanese people can decide their future.

Map Shows China's Latest Military Moves Around Dangerous Flashpoint

23 January 2024, NewsWeek

China this week kept up its military maneuvers in the sea and airspace around Taiwan, including near-daily probing flights by Chinese warplane into the island's air defense identification zone.

Since January 1, 26 Chinese warplanes have been detected inside Taiwan's ADIZ, according to the Defense Ministry in Taipei. The Taiwanese government also has been following increasingly numerous balloons—suspected weather-monitoring devices—which have flown close to the island or at times directly through its airspace in recent weeks. Their precise purpose was unknown.

Beijing claims Taiwan as its own despite Taipei's strong rejections. Successive Chinese leaders have sought to entice or coerce the island and its 23 million people into a future political union, and all have refused to rule out the use of force to achieve the ultimate goal of "national unification."

The aerial pressure campaign conducted by the Chinese People's Liberation Army aircraft began in the fall of 2020 after the administration of former President Donald Trump dispatched cabinet-level officials to Taiwan. China's warships joined the maneuvers in August 2020, following the historic and high-profile visit to the island by then-House Speaker Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-CA).

Chinese warplanes also began crossing the Taiwan Strait's median line at higher frequencies than in decades past.

The most recent activity, however, remains modest and appeared to speak to a wait-and-see response to the presidential election victory this month of Taiwan's Vice President Lai Ching-te, a staunch China skeptic who was Beijing's least favorite candidate in the three-way contest.

Lai's win on January 13 means the governing Democratic Progressive Party will remain in power for a third consecutive presidential term. Lai has pledged to maintain the status quo across the Taiwan Strait, but China's officials continue to accuse his party of pushing for the island's formal independence—a political red line for Beijing and a move not supported by the United States, Taipei's strongest international backer.

In the week to January 22, Taiwan recorded 19 PLA aircraft incursions into its ADIZ, the Defense Ministry data showed.

Since the ministry began publishing ADIZ activity in September 2020, the Chinese military has flown about 4,800 warplanes sortied around Taiwan, according to a database maintained by U.S.-based analysts Gerald C. Brown, Benjamin Lewis and Alex Kung.

Although China carried out a major intrusion into Taiwan's ADIZ last week with 11 sorties in a 24-hour window, January's 36 sorties to date could result in the lowest level of monthly activity since August 2021, when Taipei recorded 34 sorties, Lewis told Newsweek.

An ADIZ is a self-declared buffer zone drawn over international airspace. In Asia, it is also used by China, Japan and South Korea, whose governments expect passing military aircraft to declare their presence.

Taiwan's Defense Ministry last week began using a new map to illustrate the ADIZ intrusions, which remain outside of the island's territorial airspace. Observers said the government was reducing transparency by removing the estimated flight paths of Chinese planes and drones.

China watchers say the military maneuvers aim to undermine the Taiwanese government's de facto control of surrounding sea and airspace, exhaust Taiwan's armed forces, and inflict a psychological toll on its public.

Lai, who contested the presidency against Hou Yu-ih of the main opposition Kuomintang party and third party candidate Ko Wen-je of the Taiwan People's Party, has vowed to continue Taiwan's policies of strengthening its self-defense and bolstering its democratic institutions in the face of increasing pressure from Beijing.

China has labeled Lai and his running mate, Taiwan's former representative to Washington, Hsiao Bi-khim, Taiwan independence advocates, although both insist Taiwan's people seek no change to the island's political status.

Lai, who said he remained open to dialogue with Beijing, was elected with just over 40 percent of the votes, while all three parties currently hold respective meaningful shares of the island's legislature, with neither capturing a majority.

Lai and Hsiao will be inaugurated this May.

Over 700 Chinese border outposts connected to national power grid, boosts defense capability

14 January 2024, Global Times

Under a nationwide upgrade program, more than 700 Chinese frontier outposts have connected to the national power grid, a move experts said on Sunday that has boosted the Chinese military's capabilities in border defense, including improving the living conditions of troops and the deployment of advanced, power-consuming weapons and equipment.

The Logistic Support Department of the Central Military Commission has worked together with the National Energy Administration and carried out power grid constructions for border defense troops in batches, taking advantage of the country's latest round of rural power grid overhaul and upgrade, China Central Television (CCTV) reported on Saturday.

By the end of 2023, more than 700 remote outposts of border defense companies were successively connected to the national power grid, CCTV reported.

Since then, Chinese defense outposts have formed an energy support system relying mainly on electricity from the grid, which is supported by fuel, solar energy and wind energy, the report said.

This has further elevated the Chinese military's border management and control capabilities by making the power supply to military equipment more secure and reliable, border defense energy consumption cleaner and environment-friendly, in addition to improving living conditions for troops stationed along border areas as well as their combat readiness, according to the report.

China is a vast country and shares long borderlines with many neighboring nations across various and complex terrains, including high altitude plateaus, rugged mountains, dry deserts and remote islands, where border defense conditions are harsh and infrastructure construction costs are high, analysts said.

But living conditions and infrastructure construction are vital to border defense, as they significantly contribute to the troops' combat readiness, according to a Chinese military expert who used to serve in Southwest China's Xizang Autonomous Region.

Having stable power supply through the national power grid has many merits, ranging from the use of household appliances to military weapons and equipment, the expert said, noting that in modern military activities, many advanced equipment, like radar systems, require stable energy in large volumes.

Since many border defense outposts are established in remote, unpolluted regions with little human activity, using electricity from the national power grid to replace burning fuel as much as possible can also contribute to the protection of the natural environment, the expert added.

A group of Global Times reporters recently visited the "Model Border Battalion on the Plateau" in Xizang and the "5592" watchpoint, the Chinese People's Liberation Army's highest post at which soldiers are stationed.

In the season of heavy snow and freezing cold, the soldiers at the border frontlines remain steadfast while on duty in the snowy mountains, a testament not only to their spirit of sacrifice and dedication but also to the strong logistical support provided by the military.

India in rush to outbuild China while continuing talks to avoid border conflict

13 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan13'24) – As the dispute between India and China along Tibet's border continues to simmer, the two countries are trying to outbuild each other to enhance their relative advantages in the event of the outbreak of a conflict, said a newsweek.com report Jan 12. It was earlier reported by thewire.in Jan 7 that India's Northern Army Commander Lt Gen Upendra Dwivedi had reiterated that the situation on the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China in Ladakh, which had seen tensions after the ingress by Chinese troops in May 2020, was "stable but sensitive and not normal".

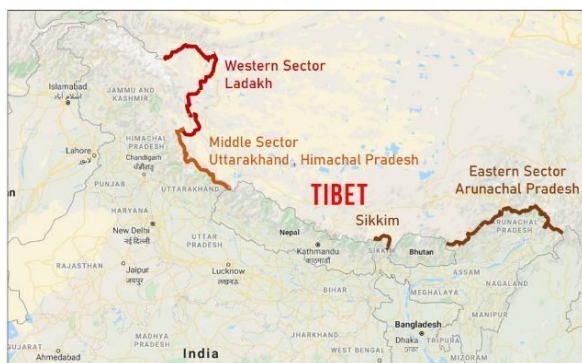

India has lagged behind China in the border infrastructure building contest by decades but has been speeding things up under the BJP-led government of Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

In contentious regions along the 2,100-mile LAC, the Indian government had earmarked some 90 connectivity projects, Rajeswari Pillai Rajagopalan, a political analyst at the Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi, had written in The Diplomat magazine last month.

In Arunachal Pradesh, on the northeastern border with Chinese-ruled Tibet, where the two forces last clashed just over one year ago, 36 projects are planned. And Ladakh in the west, bordering Xinjiang, will benefit from 26, Rajagopalan has said.

On the other side of the border – in occupied Tibet – China is also hurriedly constructing new roads in Xinjiang, a so-called dual-use infrastructure that will similarly facilitate the movement of People’s Liberation Army troops in the event of a conflict, the report noted.

Two Chinese highways, the G216 and the G695, are slowly nearing completion as the two Asian giants remain poised at higher readiness levels since their deadly night standoff in Ladakh’s Galwan Valley in Jun 2020.

Map of the Line of Actual Control.

The United States has been supporting India in monitoring China’s moves in occupied Tibet. The report said that for three and a half years, India has been supported by US intelligence-gathering operations as it watched the PLA’s movements in the tense border areas. It added that the United States had also transferred technology to boost India’s defences against China’s territorial expansion in the immediate neighbourhood.

India has reported notable progress in its border infrastructure-building efforts especially in Ladakh. In its year-end review, India’s Defence Ministry said over 370 miles of highway were completed in 2023, with significant progress on the India-China(occupied Tibet) border and other operationally critical areas in the country’s north. Several other major undertakings were stated to be approaching completion.

India’s late push for strategic infrastructure is a direct response to the military standoff that began in May 2020, just before the Galwan Valley melee, with a full resolution still elusive despite ongoing negotiations, the report noted.

Lt Gen Rajeev Chaudhry, the director general of India’s Border Roads Organization, has told the ANI news agency last year that the urgency of the projects—focused squarely on Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh—was aimed at securing a strategic edge over China.

Meanwhile, the report also cited India’s army chief, Gen Manoj Pande, as saying this week that New Delhi was continuing to push China to restore the status quo ante on the border situation.

“Currently, our attempt is to continue the talks with the Chinese army to go back to the pre-April 2020 status quo. Our first aim is to achieve that,” Pande has said during a press conference on Jan 11.

Dwivedi had sounded positive about the about 20 rounds of border talks held with China on the Ladakh border standoff, with the Northern Army Commander saying there had been a “persistent approach from both sides” and “we are looking at [ways so] that mutual concerns are addressed”.

Communist Party diplomat Liu Jianchao, on US visit, urges ‘correct’ understanding of China

10 January 2024, South China Morning Post

As China feels the heat of Washington-led “de-risking” efforts amid Western concerns about Beijing’s economic coercion and military aggression, a senior Chinese Communist Party official is visiting the US with a mission to encourage a “correct” perception of his country.

“We’re here to promote dialogues between the governments, legislators and political parties of the two countries, as we believe communication is the only way of increasing common understanding,” Liu Jianchao, who leads the Chinese Communist Party’s diplomatic arm, said on Tuesday in New York at an event hosted by the Council on Foreign Relations. Stressing a “correct” and “good” understanding of China’s “strategic intentions”, Liu said that as the country becomes more powerful militarily and economically, its aim was to “deliver a better life for all the Chinese people”.

He said a “mutually beneficial cooperation” would be possible between the two global powers if it’s understood that China does not have “any hidden agenda” or the goal of “overtaking” the US.

After completing his engagements in New York, including a meeting with United Nations Secretary General Antonio Guterres on Tuesday, Liu is expected to visit Washington before heading to San Francisco.

Since taking office in June 2022, Liu has held two meetings in Beijing with Nicholas Burns, the US ambassador to China, and visited countries in Asia, Africa and Europe.

Liu, 59, said that there was “no talk” about returning to the confrontational Wolf Warrior diplomacy and that Chinese diplomats were working to forge “warm and cooperative” ties with countries around the world to create a “favourable international environment” for China’s “high-quality development”.

He said Beijing would “keep its door open” and create a “market-oriented and rules-based” business environment that meets an “international standard”, hoping that, in return, Washington would keep its markets open and provide Chinese companies with "a non-discriminatory business environment".

His remarks came after outgoing foreign direct investment in China exceeded inflows in the third quarter of 2023, the first time that has happened since 1998.

In August, US Commerce Secretary Gina Raimondo said several American companies told her China was becoming "uninvestable" and "too risky" because of new national security regulations.

But Liu said "there should not be unnecessary rhetoric" about foreign businesses leaving China because of "anti-espionage" or other "necessary" laws.

"The US has even stricter anti-espionage tools," he said, adding that China was ready to convince foreign investors that it remained a country with "good opportunities".

Liu has faced criticism in the West for his role in the Chinese Communist Party's "anti-corruption" efforts and accusations of transnational repression.

On Tuesday, he said China had received help from the US Justice and Homeland Security departments in extraditing "criminal suspects" on the "basis of the US law".

US and Chinese military officials meet in Washington

10 January 2024, RFA

U.S. and Chinese military officials met in Washington this week for their first face-to-face talks in more than two years, as the world's two major powers waded further into a detente after nearly a year of animosity.

The status of Taiwan, which derailed U.S.-Chinese relations nearly 18 months ago, was high on the agenda, with the democratic island that Beijing claims as its territory set to hold a pivotal election this weekend.

Michael Chase, deputy assistant secretary of defense for China, met Maj. Gen. Song Yanchao, deputy director of international military cooperation in China's Central Military Commission, on Monday and Tuesday, according to a statement from the Pentagon.

It was the first Defense Policy Coordination Talks since 2021, with China's military leaders refusing to speak with their U.S. counterparts following then-House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's August 2022 trip to the self-governing island of Taiwan.

Direct military-to-military talks were only restored after U.S. President Joe Biden and Chinese President Xi Jinping's summit in San Francisco in November during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation meeting.

The Pentagon said that the two military officials "discussed regional and global security issues" and that Chase "highlighted the importance of maintaining open lines of military-to-military communication in order to prevent competition from veering into conflict."

U.S. defense officials last year criticized Chinese military leaders for refusing to pick up the phone amid a surge in near-accidents between military ships and jets over the South China Sea and Taiwan Strait. Chase also "reaffirmed that the United States will continue to fly, sail, and operate safely and responsibly wherever international law allows," the Pentagon said, referring to U.S. "freedom of navigation" operations through the South China Sea, which China claims as its territory.

Red lines

China's military said in its own readout that it was "willing to develop a sound and stable military-to-military relationship with the U.S. side on the basis of equality and respect" as agreed upon in San Francisco.

But it added Washington "needs to take seriously China's concerns and do more things that contribute to the growth of the mil-mil relationship," such as reducing its "military presence" in the South China Sea.

"The Chinese side underscored that the U.S. side should fully recognize the root cause of maritime and air security issues, strictly discipline its troops on the ground, and stop manipulating and hyping-up relevant issues," the Chinese readout said.

It added that Beijing "will not make any concession or compromise on the Taiwan question" and called for America to "stop arming Taiwan."

Taiwan is scheduled to hold a presidential election on Saturday, with the incumbent Vice President Lai Ching-te, who has described himself as a "pragmatic worker for Taiwan independence," a front-runner to replace President Tsai Ing-wen, who cannot run for a third term.

The opposition Kuomintang, meanwhile, has pledged to work more closely with Beijing if it wins back power after eight years out of office.

Pentagon spokesman Pat Ryder said Tuesday that American policy on Taiwan "will remain the same regardless of which party is in power" and that U.S. officials would work "with whomever Taiwan voters elect."

"We strongly support Taiwan's free and fair elections, which we view as a model for democracy not only in the region but also globally, and the United States does not take sides in Taiwan's elections," Ryder said. "We're committed to fair treatment of the candidates."

Tinderbox

Whatever inroads have been made toward a detente, the lasting disagreements over the status of Taiwan and the South China Sea seem destined to throw a spanner in the works for relations.

In its analysis of the talks, for instance, China's state-run Global Times said the meeting "signifies China's genuine efforts to stabilize relations," but that American leaders should tread carefully.

"It is important for the U.S. to understand China's strong message against colluding with Taiwan secessionists, particularly in the lead-up to Taiwan's regional leader election," it said, referring to the presidential election, and threatening "harsh measures from [the] Chinese mainland."

In that situation, it said, "the U.S. will also be put in [a] dilemma."

Such threats may soon be put to the test, with Taiwan's next leader – particularly if Lai wins – likely to float an invitation for a delegation of American lawmakers to visit the island for the inauguration ceremony.

At a preview of Taiwan's election hosted by Politico on Wednesday, Rep. Raja Krishnamoorthi, a Democrat from Illinois who serves as his party's ranking member on the House Select Committee on China, demurred when asked if he would sign-on to such a delegation.

The lawmaker, who was part of Pelosi's controversial 2021 trip to Taiwan, instead alluded to the official U.S. policy on whether it would defend the island in the case of an invasion by mainland China.

"You know, I think I'm gonna have to maintain a little bit of strategic ambiguity here," Krishnamoorthi said.

US lists China among 'Countries of Particular Concern' for severity of religious repression

(TibetanReview.net, Jan09'24) – As recommended by the country's Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) in its annual report released Apr 2023, the United States has on Jan 4 designated China, along with 11 other countries that included North Korea and Pakistan, as "Countries of Particular Concern" for engaging in and tolerating "particularly severe violations of religious freedom." Announcing the Religious Freedom Designations, US Secretary of State Antony Blinken has said that advancing the freedom of religion or belief has been a core objective of US foreign policy ever since Congress passed and enacted the International Religious Freedom Act in 1998.

"As part of that enduring commitment, I have designated Burma, the People's Republic of China, Cuba, the DPRK, Eritrea, Iran, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan as Countries of Particular Concern for having engaged in or tolerated particularly severe violations of religious freedom," Blinken has said in a press statement posted on the State Department website.

The USCIRF's recommendations were for 17 countries to be designated as "Countries of Particular Concern". It had also recommended 11 others for being designated as "Special Watch List Countries" for "engaging in or tolerating severe violations of religious freedom."

Blinken has said "Governments must end abuses such as attacks on members of religious minority communities and their places of worship, communal violence and lengthy imprisonment for peaceful expression, transnational repression, and calls to violence against religious communities, among other violations that occur in too many places around the world."

He has called the challenges to religious freedom across the globe "structural, systemic, and deeply entrenched."

But he has expressed confidence that "with thoughtful, sustained commitment from those who are unwilling to accept hatred, intolerance, and persecution as the status quo we will one day see a world where all people live with dignity and equality."

The International Religious Freedom Act requires the President, who has delegated this function to the Secretary of State, to designate as "countries of particular concern," countries that commit systematic, ongoing, and egregious violations of religious freedom.

China to spend $11bn on Tibetan infrastructure this year

08 January 2024, Global Construction Review

The Chinese government is to spend $11.3bn on infrastructure in Tibet's western Xizang Autonomous Region this year, Xinhua reports.

The investment, equal to more than a third of the region's GDP, is seen as central to the region's development.

Yan Jinhai, chairman of Xizang's regional government, said the money would be mainly spent on transport projects including railways, roads and as many as 10 airports, where work will be begun or will continue in 2024.

As well as transport, Yan mentioned the development of renewable energy sites.

According to China Daily, the region aims to achieve GDP growth of 8% and total fixed-asset investment growth of 13% in the coming year, with similar increases in the income of the population.

The Tibetan Review comments that the investment is in line with China's grand strategy of "improving frontier security amid heightened border tensions with India in recent months".

Beijing is also concerned with winning support from the residents of the region. There is a Tibetan independence movement, centred on the Dalai Lama, and in the past, China's conduct in Tibet has attracted allegations from the US over suppression of Tibetan Buddhism.

China sanctions 5 US defense companies in response to US sanctions and arms sales to Taiwan

07 January 2024, AP News

BEIJING (AP) — China announced sanctions Sunday on five American defense-related companies in response to U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and U.S. sanctions on Chinese companies and individuals.

The sanctions will freeze any property the companies have in China and prohibit organizations and individuals in China from doing business with them, the Foreign Ministry said in a statement posted online.

It was unclear what impact, if any, the sanctions would have on the companies, BAE Systems Land and Armaments, Alliant Techsystems Operations, AeroVironment, Viasat and Data Link Solutions. Such sanctions are often mostly symbolic as American defense contractors generally don't sell to China.

The Foreign Ministry said the U.S. moves harmed China's sovereignty and security interests, undermined peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait and violated the rights and interests of Chinese companies and individuals.

"The Chinese government remains unwavering in our resolve to safeguard national sovereignty, security and territorial integrity and protect the lawful rights and interests of Chinese companies and citizens," the ministry statement said.

The announcement was made less than a week ahead of a presidential election in Taiwan that is being contested in large part over how the government should manage its relationship with China, which claims the self-governing island as its territory and says it must come under its rule.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not specify which arms deal or which U.S. sanctions China was responding to, though spokesperson Wang Wenbin had warned three weeks ago that China would take countermeasures following the U.S. government's approval of a $300 million military package for Taiwan in December.

The deal includes equipment, training and equipment repair to maintain Taiwan's command, control and military communications capabilities.

The U.S. said the sale would support the modernization of Taiwan's armed forces and the maintenance of a credible defense. "The proposed sale will improve the recipient's capability to meet current and future threats by enhancing operational readiness," a news release from the Pentagon's Defense Security Cooperation Agency said.

Taiwan is a major flashpoint in U.S.-China relations that analysts worry could explode into military conflict between the two powers. China says that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan are interference in its domestic affairs.

The Chinese military regularly sends fighter planes and ships into and over the waters around Taiwan, in part to deter the island's government from declaring formal independence. An invasion doesn't appear imminent, but the constant military activity serves as a reminder that the threat is ever-present.

The U.S. switched diplomatic recognition from Taiwan to China in 1979, but it is bound by its own laws to ensure that Taiwan has the ability to defend itself. America and its allies sail warships through the Taiwan Strait, a 160-kilometer (100-mile) -wide waterway that separates the island from China.

The year in which the U.S. switched diplomatic recognition from Taiwan to China has been corrected to 1979.

Pakistan in Talks with China to Acquire J-31 Stealth Fighters

05 January 2024, Indrastra

As per the latest media reports, Pakistan is currently in discussions to procure Chinese-built Shenyang FC-31 Gyr Falcon, also known as the J-31 mid-sized twinjet 5th-generation stealth fighter, a move that could potentially recalibrate the balance of air power within the region. The J-31 bears striking similarities to the American F-35 and F-22 aircraft and, if acquired, may replace earlier versions of the American F-16 in Pakistan's air fleet, according to sources within the defense and security establishments.

Recent statements attributed to Pakistan Air Force (PAF) Chief Air Chief Marshal Zaheer Ahmed Babar indicate ongoing negotiations with China for the acquisition of the J-31 stealth fighter aircraft. Babar highlighted that groundwork for this acquisition has been laid, signaling an imminent inclusion of these advanced fighters into the PAF's arsenal.

Pakistan already operates various Chinese-manufactured aircraft, notably the JF-17 'Thunder,' jointly manufactured in Pakistan and also adopted by Nigeria in 2021. With approximately 150 JF-17s in its fleet and the acquisition of 25 J-10C 'Vigorous Dragon' fighters in 2022, Pakistan appears to strategically enhance its air capabilities, mirroring India's procurement of 36 French-made Rafale fighter jets.

The prospect of integrating the J-31 into Pakistan's air force could prove a significant boost for the nation, particularly as India presently lacks a stealth fighter. While India is actively developing its indigenous Advanced Medium Combat Aircraft (AMCA), its induction is not anticipated before 2030. Air Marshal

Anil Chopra, Director-General of IAF's Center for Air Power Studies (CAPS), emphasized that the J-31 remains in its developmental phase, distinct from China's more established J-20 stealth aircraft, of which approximately 150 units have been produced. He highlighted the J-31's smaller size, primarily designed as a potential naval variant for operations from aircraft carriers.

Retired Air Marshal Diptendu Choudhury acknowledged past concerns with Chinese-made aircraft but noted China's continuous development and deployment of such technology. He pointed out that China's persistence in refining its aviation capabilities not only challenges the US but also contributes to projecting superior Chinese aviation capabilities.

Regarding the potential impact on the regional power balance, Choudhury suggested that while the acquisition of the J-31 might not drastically alter the dynamics immediately, it would undoubtedly enhance the quality of Pakistan's air power. He emphasized the significance of newer generation jets and the importance of their ratio in defining air superiority.

Approximately 60-70% of the People's Liberation Army Air Force's fleet comprises 4th and 5th-generation fighters, similar to the trajectory India aims to pursue. This emphasizes the need for the Indian Air Force to expedite its modernization efforts to maintain regional parity.

Reports tracing back to 2007 indicate that China acquired confidential information on the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter and F-22 Raptor, which reportedly aided in the development of the J-31 or FC-31 stealth aircraft. Earlier versions closely resembled the F-35, but subsequent images reveal a more elongated structure reminiscent of the F-22, suggesting evolving design adaptations.

China activates 'freedom in Tibet' propaganda triggered by US-Dalai Lama meet in Dharamshala

26 June 2024, The Print, Sana Hashmi

CYBER SECURITY

India has avoided using the so-called Tibet card in the past but even this issue isn't off the table now as New Delhi works with the US to address the China factor.

The portrayal of Tibet Autonomous Region on Chinese social media, especially after the meeting between US lawmakers and the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, underscores heightened Chinese insecurity about potential unrest in Tibet and US interest. This carefully managed discourse surrounding Tibet suggests orchestrated efforts, mirroring Beijing's approach in Xinjiang to present these autonomous regions as prosperous and enjoying religious freedom, countering Western human rights concerns.

A cursory search of Tibet, referred to as Xizang by China, on several Chinese social media platforms presents a picture of a thriving tourist destination with robust infrastructure and Tibetans freely practising their religion. However, according to the Central Tibetan Administration, this portrayal is far from reality. Allegations persist of China suppressing religious freedoms in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR).

The stark contrast between Chinese social media and official discourse and the perspectives of Western governments and Tibetans-in-exile is evident, especially highlighted by the visit of a bipartisan delegation of United States' lawmakers led by Republican Rep. Michael McCaul to meet the 14th Dalai Lama.

Chinese media platforms are flooded with articles, posts, and videos promoting Tibet as a burgeoning tourist destination. This narrative emphasises the TAR enjoying 'autonomy and freedom', highlighting Beijing's initiatives in promoting Tibetan welfare and developing infrastructure.

To counter the US narrative on Tibet, Chinese media has extensively covered the rare visit by a European Union delegation for the 39th EU-China Human Rights Dialogue to the TAR. This visit occurred just days before US lawmakers' visit to Dharamshala. The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) highlighted the EU delegation's visit, stating that it deepened their understanding of the actual situation in Tibet.

Despite Beijing's strict grip over Tibet, reactions from Chinese officials and social media users to the US lawmakers' delegation visit to Dharamshala reveal deep-seated anxieties. Tibet remains a core issue for China. Lin Jian, a Chinese MFA spokesperson, emphasised, 'Tibet (Xizang) as an integral part of China since ancient times', categorising it as 'an internal matter' and warning against 'external interference' (read the US).

'US meddling in China's internal affairs'

Nancy Pelosi, the former Speaker of the US House of Representatives, drew notable reactions from China with her fiery remarks, despite discussions on Tibet being heavily censored. Pelosi is widely disliked among Chinese officials and social media users, perceived as anti-China, at least since her outspoken criticism of China's handling of the Tiananmen Square protests in 1989. From her August 2022 visit to Taiwan to her recent trip to Dharamshala, discussions about her have been largely negative. Numerous posts on Chinese social media platforms have disparaged her, with a commentary in Guangming Daily accusing Pelosi of harbouring anti-China sentiments, attributing her motives to seeking attention and benefiting from tarnishing China's image.

A commentary on Baidu asserted that after over emphasising the Taiwan card, the US is now highlighting the Tibet issue, suggesting that the lawmakers visit and the Resolve Tibet Act aimed to split China. The author argues that despite China's firm stance on sovereignty and territorial integrity as non-negotiable core interests, both the United States and India (given New Delhi's permission for the lawmakers' visit) continue to hype these sensitive issues, thereby deliberately provoking tensions.

The discourse in China regarding the India-US coalition's stance on Tibet remains relatively underreported. The prevailing narrative continues to be about accusing the US of meddling in China's internal affairs, specifically in Tibet. A commentary suggested that US concerns, possibly influenced by the People's Liberation Army's powerful Xi'an H-6 twin-engine jet bombers in Tibet, may have prompted this shift in focus towards Tibet.

Whether it is Tibet or Taiwan, the perception in China is that the US is trying to leverage every possible option to hinder China's rise, using these sensitive issues as bargaining chips. Zhu Weiqun, former head of the Ethnic and Religious Affairs Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, suggests that "the more the US discusses Tibet, the more it reveals their support for the Dalai Lama, which he views as revisiting past issues." However, Zhu believes Washington's attempt to play the Tibet card will be futile due to the region's stability.

Interestingly, Russia's state-controlled RT posted on Weibo that the Joe Biden administration is expanding US influence in Asia, sparking controversy by selling weapons to Taiwan and raising concerns over Tibet. Whether supporting Taiwan's or Tibet's independence, the administration's goal appears to be dividing China and impeding its rapid development. The RT post also claimed that even Russian President Vladimir Putin recently cautioned that NATO, led by the US, views Asia as a permanent strategic focus, posing a significant threat to regional countries, including Russia. This post gained widespread circulation on Weibo, underscoring Moscow's alignment with Beijing on core issues important to the latter and highlighting concerns over increasing US influence in Asia.

While discussions on Weibo and other social media platforms have echoed past accusations of the US using the Tibet issue to meddle in China's internal affairs, much of the scholarly community has noticeably refrained from addressing Tibet's geopolitical dynamics. Despite several Tibetan studies centres established in Chinese universities, many have transformed into propaganda platforms selectively focusing on ecological issues, environmental concerns, and infrastructure development. This deliberate shift aims to divert attention from Tibet's geopolitical relevance and the suppression of Tibetan religious and human rights.

Chinese hackers have stepped up attacks on Taiwanese organizations, cybersecurity firm says

24 June 2024, AP News

A suspected Chinese state-sponsored hacking group has stepped up its targeting of Taiwanese organizations, particularly those in sectors such as government, education, technology and diplomacy, according to cybersecurity intelligence company Recorded Future.

In recent years, relations between China and Taiwan, a self-governed island across the Taiwan Strait that Beijing claims as its territory, have deteriorated. The cyberattacks by the group known as RedJuliatt were observed between November 2023 and April 2024, during the lead up to Taiwan's presidential elections in January and the subsequent change in administration.

RedJuliatt has targeted Taiwanese organizations in the past, but this is the first time that activity was seen at such a scale, a Recorded Future analyst said, speaking on condition of anonymity out of safety concerns.

The report said RedJuliatt attacked 24 organizations, including government agencies in places like Laos, Kenya and Rwanda, as well as Taiwan.

It also hacked into websites of religious organizations in Hong Kong and South Korea, a U.S university and a Djiboutian university. The report did not identify the organizations.

Recorded Future said RedJuliatt accessed the servers of those places via a vulnerability in their SoftEther enterprise virtual private network (VPN) software, an open-source VPN that allows remote connections to an organization's networks.

RedJuliatt has been observed attempting to break into systems of more than 70 Taiwanese organizations including three universities, an optoelectronics company and a facial recognition company that has contracts with the government.

It was unclear if RedJuliatt managed to break into those organizations: Recorded Future only said it observed the attempts to identify vulnerabilities in their networks.

RedJuliatt's hacking patterns match those of Chinese state-sponsored groups, according to Recorded Future.

It said that based on the geolocations of IP addresses, RedJuliatt is likely based out of the city of Fuzhou, in China's southern Fujian province, whose coast faces Taiwan.

"Given the close geographical proximity between Fuzhou and Taiwan, Chinese intelligence services operating in Fuzhou are likely tasked with intelligence collection against Taiwanese targets," the report said.

"RedJuliatt is likely targeting Taiwan to collect intelligence and support Beijing's policy-making on cross-strait relations," the Recorded Future report said.

Taiwan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs did not immediately comment.

A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson dismissed the allegations.

"I don't know the specifics of what you mentioned, but I can tell you that it's not the first time the company you mentioned has fabricated disinformation on so-called Chinese hacking operations. There is absolutely no professionalism or credibility to speak of in what the company does," the spokesperson, Mao Ning, said.

Microsoft reported in August last year that RedJuliatt, which Microsoft tracks under the name Flax Typhoon, was targeting Taiwanese organizations.

China has in recent years stepped up military drills around Taiwan and imposed economic and diplomatic pressure on the island.

Relations between Taiwan and Beijing worsened further after the election in January of Taiwan's new president Lai Ching-te, who China has deemed a "separatist," after he said in his inauguration speech that Taiwan and China were not subordinate to each other. Like his predecessor Tsai Ing-wen, Lai has said that there is no need to declare Taiwanese independence because it is already an independent sovereign state.

Like many other countries including the U.S., China has been known to engage in cyberespionage. Earlier this year, the U.S. and Britain accused China of a sweeping cyberespionage campaign that allegedly hit millions of people.

Beijing has consistently denied engaging in any form of state-sponsored hacking, instead saying that China itself is a major target of cyberattacks.

According to Recorded Future, Chinese state-sponsored groups will likely continue to target Taiwanese government agencies, universities and critical technology companies via "public-facing" devices such as open-source VPN software, which provide limited visibility and logging capabilities.

Companies and organizations can best protect themselves by prioritizing and patching vulnerabilities once they become known, Recorded Future's threat intelligence analyst said.

Geologists raise concerns over possible censorship and bias in Chinese chatbot

24 June 2024, The Guardian, Amy Hawkins

Geologists have raised concerns about potential Chinese censorship and bias in a chatbot being developed with the backing of the International Union of Geological Sciences (IUGS), one of the world's largest scientific organisations and a Unesco partner.

The GeoGPT chatbot is aimed at geoscientists and researchers, particularly in the global south, to help them develop their understanding of earth sciences by drawing on swaths of data and research on billions of years of the planet's history.

It is an initiative from Deep-time Digital Earth (DDE), a largely Chinese-funded programme founded in 2019 to enhance international scientific cooperation and help countries to realise the UN's sustainable development goals.

Part of the underlying AI for GeoGPT is Qwen, a large language model built by the Chinese tech company Alibaba. One of those who had tested a pre-release version of the chatbot, Prof Paul Cleverley, a geologist and computer scientist, claimed in an article recently published in the Geoscientist, the magazine of the Geological Society, the UK's professional association for geologists, that GeoGPT had "serious issues around a lack of transparency, state censorship, and potential copyright infringement".

Responding to the article, DDE representatives Michael Stephenson, Hans Thybo, Chengshan Wang and Ishwaran Natarajan said the chatbot also used Meta's Llama, another large language model, and that during testing they had not noticed any state censorship, which they said was "unlikely" given that the system was “based entirely in geoscience information”.

The DDE academics said: “Problems with GeoGPT have been largely solved, but the team will be working to improve the system even more. It must be stressed that at present GeoGPT has not been released and is not in the public domain.”

David Giles, a professional geoscientist, said it was “blatantly untrue” that a system based on geoscience data could be free of sensitive information.

Tests on Qwen, part of GeoGPT’s underlying AI, reveal geoscience-related questions can produce answers that appear to be influenced by narratives set by the Chinese Communist party.

For example, when asked how many people have died in a mining operation in Ghana run by the Shaanxi Mining Company, Qwen says: “I’m unable to provide current or specific information about events, including mining accidents, as my knowledge is based on data up until 2021 and I don’t have real-time access to news updates.”

The same question posed to ChatGPT, the chatbot developed by the US company OpenAI, produces the answer: “The Shaanxi Mining Company in Ghana has experienced multiple fatal incidents, resulting in a total of 61 deaths since 2013. This includes a significant explosion in January 2019 that alone claimed 16 lives.”

It is not clear what kind of answer GeoGPT, which is still in development, would give to this question.

Dr Natarajan Ishwaran, the head of international relations for DDE, said: “The team building GeoGPT has full independence. We can assure you that GeoGPT – currently in an exploratory phase and not yet open to the public – will not be affected by any state censorship.”

He added that users would be able to choose between using Alibaba’s Qwen or Meta’s Llama as the model for GeoGPT.

Geoscientific research and data include commercially and strategically valuable information about deposits of natural resources such as lithium, which are vital for the green transition.

Giles said there was a risk that a Chinese-developed platform could “filter” information to withhold content that was useful for “mineral reconnaissance”.

He added: “China is very aggressively looking for minerals across the globe. There is a strategic advantage and an economic advantage in looking for mineral reserves.”

An article published in 2020 by Chen Jun, an academic at the Chinese Academy of Sciences, said DDE, the scientific programme that created GeoGPT, would “help enhance China’s detection and security capabilities in global resources and energy”.

Stephenson, Thybo, Wang and Natarajan, from DDE, said the 2020 article aimed “to encourage Chinese scientists to get involved in international science programmes” and was “purely the opinion of the author”, not of DDE or the Chinese Academy of Sciences.

Mohammad Hoque, a senior lecturer in hydrogeology and environmental geoscience at the University of Portsmouth, said “one danger” of using a Chinese language model for academic research was that “there will be some bias, because they have to obey local laws”.

GeoGPT’s terms of use state that prompting the chatbot to generate content that “undermines national security” and “incites subversion of state power” is prohibited. The terms of use also state that it is governed by the laws of China.

Hoque said GeoGPT had a greater obligation of transparency because it was developed under the auspices of an international research collaboration. “The most important thing would be to know what data they use to fine-tune and train [GeoGPT]. We have an expectation to know under IUGS.”

John Ludden, the president of the IUGS, said the GeoGPT database would be made public “only if the IUGS is satisfied that the appropriate governance is in place”.

Ishwaran said when GeoGPT opened to the public its training database would be made available “to those who wish to have it”.

Geologists interviewed by the Guardian said the extent of DDE’s links to China were not widely known among professionals. According to a planning document published in 2021, the multimillion-pound project is “almost 99%” funded by sources in China.

The programme is part of the IUGS, an international NGO representing more than 1 million geoscientists in 121 countries, including the UK’s Geological Society. Its secretariat is based in Beijing and receives “tremendous” financial and logistical support from the Chinese government, according to the organisation’s 2023 annual report.

Ludden said: “The best thing for science is to be open and share data. DDE does this for geological data if openly available [and] will lead to inward investment in any nation ... [and] discoveries in research.”

Hackers for hire: How the Chinese Communist Party is trying to monitor the entire world

21 June 2024, ITVX, Debi Edward

In February, a leak from an anonymous source lifted the lid on China’s network of state-affiliated hackers. Hundreds of chatlogs and files from a company called iSoon (AnXun) were uploaded to an open-source code database.

The documents gave a rare insight into an inherently clandestine industry, so analysts and journalists pored over the details.

The cache of documents showed professional hackers were paid to infiltrate national databases in more than 20 countries. The company's website presents an array of cyber-attack services it can provide.

It was clear work was being done on behalf of China's public security bureaus and even its military, indicating the Chinese state operates a hackers-for-hire industry.

There were several references to the UK: In one log we found what looked like a shopping list of British government agencies and organisations.

It named Chatham House and the charity Amnesty International as targets of interest. And the Foreign Office was mentioned as being of particular value.

Screenshot of 'Chang'an' a Chinese dark net website used to trade hacked information.

In the months since the British government has named and shamed Chinese state-affiliated actors as being behind several cyber-attacks on the UK, it has sanctioned two individuals and one company.

Last month, Chinese hackers were linked to an attack on the private contractor that runs the Ministry of Defense (MoD) payroll.

At the start of the general election campaign, MI5 and MI6 said the country should be on high alert for cyber-attacks from hostile states mentioning China, along with Russia and North Korea.

A group of Russian hackers is demanding a ransom after infiltrating NHS computer systems last week, and on Friday started to publish allegedly sensitive data online.

We set out to track down the Chinese entities named by the British government for cyber campaigns against our MPs, the MoD and the electoral commission.

In Wuhan, at the official headquarters of Xiaoruizhi, a company sanctioned by the UK there has no physical evidence that it even exists.

At its registered address, we found a company with a completely different name.

We asked at the security gate but the guard couldn't or wouldn't tell us anything about Xiaoruizhi.

At a human resources company in the city from where Xiaoruizhi workers are known to have been recruited, we were invited in for tea while they checked out the details we had given them.

A woman who at first appeared willing to help came back to tell us that her boss was travelling and so she couldn't help us at that time.

The change in her demeanour suggested she'd been told to send us away.

Naturally, it ended up being online where we picked up a trail, leading us into China's shady network of hackers.

On the dark web, we gained access to sites where one hacker claimed to be selling data from register to vote UK. The sales sample also included usernames, emails and passwords, with references to the Universal Credit and immigration systems.

Several pages showed the financial information of British citizens and one from a casino company showed the credit details of almost half a million people.

It was shocking to see such sensitive information traded by sinister actors on the Chinese dark web.

On the dark web forums, it appeared that many Chinese hackers were vying for assignments in foreign countries, suggesting there is a growing marketplace for datasets from countries around the world.

This backs up what we saw in the i-Soon leak, where it looked like foreign intel was being hacked anticipating there would be interest in it from clandestine services in China.

Nigel Inkster a former Deputy Director of MI6 believes both private and public datasets are being weaponised. He is now the Senior Advisor for the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) on Cyber Security and China.

He told us there has been too much naivete in dealing with China, saying: "China is uniquely, promiscuous and voracious in terms of the kinds of information it is, seeking to collect.

"And this means governments need to rethink, what it is that requires, protection because, the reality in today's world is that, data sets that we hitherto have not considered very, important may actually be more important than we think and make us more vulnerable."

Bringing together publicly available information, a rare bank of leaked data and expert analysis, we built a picture of China's giant cybersecurity industry. At its roots are hackers who are being trained at what we assess are hundreds of specialist facilities.

Graduates are given the guarantee of a job in a complex web of private and state-owned enterprises. They operate directly, or indirectly with domestic public security bureaus or for the mighty Ministry of State Security which runs foreign intelligence. The MSS acts on the orders of the Chinese communist government.

There are almost 4,000 cyber security companies operating in China, in a market worth £5 billion a year, and growing.

Many of those companies are private cyber security contractors, like i-Soon, who are helping the Chinese government scale up their cyber operation capability, offering the country a major manpower advantage and potential scope, compared to Western rivals.

It has already given China the edge when it comes to data collection through hacking means.

We travelled to Taiwan to meet with experts from Team T5, a cyber security company.

In Taiwan, cyber-attacks from China are a persistent threat and we had spoken to Team T5 earlier in the year when they were tracking Chinese cyber threats during the Taiwanese elections.

One of their lead analysts, Charles Li believes too many people just see one-off cyber-attacks that don't appear to achieve much.

But he says it is all part of a wider, long-term strategy to know the enemy and build a data bank that can be used against them.

"They realised, it is very hard for China to fight with us in traditional areas like, land, sea or airspace. And so if they can dominate the cyber war, it means, they have this, chance to fight with these Western countries. So that's their long-term strategy."

We asked Team T5 to show us an example of one of the most common methods used by hackers to target individuals, like members of parliament.

They ran me through a mock email phishing exercise whereby I received an email which looked like it had been sent by an economic think-tank in Taipei, following up on my interest in the Taiwanese election. The email was formal and polite, and those writing it had clearly been monitoring my reporting to be able to mention specific details which made it look more legitimate. It contained a link to a PDF with the economic information which they said might be of interest.

When I clicked on the PDF, sure enough, it had articles with useful information, and there was no sign to be that in the background all the data on my computer was being transferred to my (in this case fake) cyber attacker.

With the information they could get from my computer, they could easily access my company and anyone I'd been in communication with.

It's a very common tactic but Chinese hackers have made it more sophisticated by selecting and monitoring targets very carefully so that when they strike it has a greater chance of success.

There was no response to our requests for interviews or a statement from the relevant Chinese government departments.

In the past, the Foreign Ministry has condemned the UK for politicising the issue of cyber security and dismissed any hacking accusations as lies.

The Chinese Communist Party appears to have an ambition to monitor the whole world, using all the manpower at its disposal.

China's local governments shut down social media accounts as budgets shrink

24 May 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

Once a key tool in China's campaign to spread its message to the public, government-run social media accounts are being shut down amid a squeeze on public finances.

The online platforms of government agencies at all levels are being consolidated, reversing more than a decade of feverish development that led to many redundant apps and sites.

Local officials and analysts said the trend showed local governments must scale back development and merge functions as a result of institutional reform, shrinking funds, and rising fatigue among the low-level cadres tasked with maintaining the platforms.

Dozens of cities in the provinces of Guangdong, Sichuan, Yunnan, Hunan, Shaanxi, Shandong and Jiangsu, as well as Guangxi Zhuang autonomous region, have announced plans so far this year to cut back on government department websites, social media accounts and smartphone applications, research by the Post shows.

One of the latest to do so is Longgang district in the southern megacity of Shenzhen. In the first week of May, it announced that web services for its land supervision and state-owned assets bureaus would be shut down, as both bodies had been merged into other agencies.

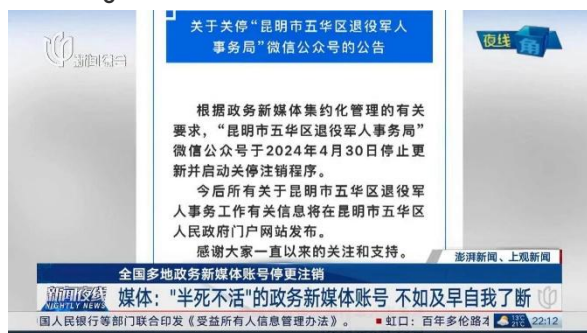

That same week, Guangxi shut down the website and social media accounts of its sugar industry development office. This has been absorbed into the Guangxi Development and Reform Commission, the region's top economic planning agency.

On April 28, the city of Bazhong in Sichuan province said it would shut down the website and social media accounts of its rural revitalisation bureau, financial work bureau and government services and public resource service centre, as they had been merged into other government bodies.

Some others to exit the internet include the Wuhua district veterans' affairs bureau in the city of Kunming, the Yuhua district market supervision bureau in Changsha, the Zhenxing subdistrict of the city of Jinan, the Weiyang district culture, tourism and sports bureau in Xian, the Linwei district judicial bureau in Weinan, Shaanxi province, and the urban management bureau of Nanjing's Jiangning district.

While these offices continue to exist, their websites, social media accounts and smartphone apps have been absorbed by higher-level municipal agencies, according to the announcements.

The streamlining efforts come less than six months after the Cyberspace Administration of China issued a directive ordering local governments to consolidate "similar and duplicate functions", as many online platforms were white elephants or even "zombies" controlled by internet trolls.

A Shenzhen official involved in a few municipal web platforms said the frenetic pursuit of online engagement had caused "lots of stress to the ground staff".

"After posting content to our account, we have to mobilise our colleagues and friends to help us to click on them. I even ask my parents and grandparents for help," she said, adding that consolidation was "indeed necessary".

"Many are happy to see the consolidation efforts. I hope one day we will not need to sit for the whole day to post and click on repetitive content."

Ma Liming, an associate professor at Jinan University's school of journalism and communication, echoed those views in an interview with Chinese media earlier this week.

"It is becoming way too complex as even subdistrict-level governments need to have their own government affairs new media platforms," Ma told Cnwest.com, the official news portal of Shaanxi province.

"For grass-roots staff without media-related backgrounds, maintaining these zombie accounts has become a burden.

"[And] is this really convenient and beneficial to the people if they need to follow a lot of accounts for government information services?"

Reductions in staff headcounts at local government agencies have also made the situation worse, as many have had to cut contract workers who are typically responsible for noncore functions such as updating websites and social media accounts.

Earlier this month, the Post reported that Chinese regional governments had cut thousands of positions in recent years.

The Chinese government started ramping up its online presence from November 2009, when Yunnan's provincial propaganda department started using the microblogging platform Weibo to respond to public concerns about a massive protest triggered by sudden rent increases at a wholesale market in the provincial capital Kunming.

Local government affairs websites and social media accounts quickly became popular, especially after the State Council, China's cabinet, released an official instruction in 2013 recognising that these platforms could help to strengthen government transparency and credibility.

According to China's official Internet Development Report released on March 26, more than 146,000 government bodies had an official presence on Chinese social media platforms as of the end of last year.

Some government agencies, such as the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission – the Communist Party's top security body – and Shenzhen's health commission, created popular social media accounts by using internet slang, cartoons and short videos to deliver their messages. But many local government accounts have become neglected, with some taken over by hackers or internet trolls.

The Weibo account of the urban management team of Wuhan's Wulijie subdistrict was found to have published a number of posts soliciting surrogacy and even prostitution from 2017 to 2019. The local government did not respond until 2021, saying the account had been hacked by criminals.

China creates a new county made up largely of India-claimed Aksai China

Even as the two countries struggle, with some amount of success in recent times, to normalize their bilateral relations in the face of longstanding border issues, China has created two new counties in Xinjiang of which one is made up mainly of Indian territory it illegally occupied in Aksai Chin after it annexed Tibet in the middle of the last century.

The People's Government of northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region had announced the establishment of two new counties in the region – He'an County and Hekang County – reported the deccanherald.com Dec 29, citing China's official Xinhua news agency this week.

"The establishment of the counties, both administered by Hotan Prefecture, has been approved by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China and the State Council," Xinhua was quoted as saying.

Hongliu and Xeyidula townships have been declared as the "county seats" (administrative headquarters) of He'an and Hekang respectively.

The report noted that the He'an county encompasses a large part of the 38000 sq km of areas India accuses China of illegally occupying in Aksai Chin.

The deccanherald.com report said that while India has not yet officially reacted to it, sources in New Delhi have remarked that such unilateral moves by China would not have any bearing on the bilateral negotiations to resolve the boundary dispute.

SINO-INDIAN RELATIONS

The report said the Chinese move came just 10 days after the Special Representatives of the two nations restarted the boundary negotiation, which had been stalled for almost five years.

The Special Representatives of New Delhi and Beijing for boundary negotiations – India's National Security Advisor Ajit Doval and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi – met in the capital of the communist country on Dec 18.

They held the 23rd round of boundary negotiations, thus restarting a process that remained stalled for five years after the Chinese People's Liberation Army's aggressive moves along the Line of Actual Control and the Indian Army's counter-deployment in Apr-May 2020 led to a military stand-off in eastern Ladakh.

Apart from the about 38,000 sq km of India's territory in Aksai Chin, which borders eastern Ladakh, Pakistan ceded to China about 5,180 sq. km of India's territory in Saksgam Valley in 1963.

Beijing, on the other hand, claims the Arunachal Pradesh state of India as part of the territory of China and calls it "Zangnan" (south Tibet), on the basis of its claim of sovereignty over occupied Tibet.

China expresses condolences over death of India's former PM Singh

27 December 2024, Xinhua

China expresses deep condolences over the passing of former Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said on Friday.

"China expresses sincere sympathies to the Indian government and people as well as to Mr. Singh's family," Mao said during a daily press briefing.

"Mr. Singh was a veteran statesman and renowned economist of India, who contributed significantly to the development of China-India relations," Mao said. During his tenure, China and India announced the establishment of a strategic and cooperative partnership for peace and prosperity and agreed on the political parameters and guiding principles for the settlement of the boundary question, Mao said. Singh died at 92 Thursday after a prolonged illness. He served two consecutive terms as prime minister of India from 2004 to 2014.

Recent Sino-India pact being implemented effectively, says China

27 December 2024, The Shillong Times

China's Defence Ministry on Thursday said that the Chinese and Indian militaries are "comprehensively and effectively" implementing the agreement to end the standoff at eastern Ladakh and "steady progress" has been made.

Chinese Defence Spokesperson Senior Colonel Zhang Xiaogang made the remarks during a media briefing here while answering a question on the December 18 Special Representatives talks.

"At present, the Chinese and Indian militaries are comprehensively and effectively implementing the border-related solutions reached between the two sides, and steady progress has been made," he said. He said that in recent times, based on the important consensus reached by the leaders of the two countries, China and India have maintained close communication on the border situation through diplomatic and military channels and achieved great progress.

Following the October 21 agreement between India and China, Special Representatives for border question NSA Ajit Doval and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi met here and held a comprehensive dialogue on the implementation of the agreement and restoration of the relations which were frozen since the standoff began in April 2020.

In October, Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping met in Kazan, Russia, on the sidelines of the BRICS summit and approved the Oct 21 agreement.

Col Zhang said that bringing China-India relations back on the right track serves the fundamental interests of the two countries and the two peoples.

"The Chinese military is ready to make concerted efforts with the Indian side to faithfully implement the important consensus of the two leaders, conduct more exchanges and interactions, and promote China-India mil-to-mil relationship, in a bid to jointly safeguard lasting peace and tranquillity in the border areas," he added.

India-China ties in 2024: Military standoff with India ends in Ladakh, long freeze over

25 December 2024, Deccan Herald

Throughout the over four-year crisis, bilateral trade was not impacted. In fact, it continued to boom.

Beijing: It was a breakthrough year in India-China ties after a near freeze in their ties for over four years – the longest since the 1962 war – with an agreement to end the eastern Ladakh military standoff.

After "amassing of a large number of troops by China along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in Eastern Ladakh" in April-May 2020, as External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar said in a recent statement in Lok Sabha, resulting in the Galwan valley clash in June 2020, there had been a breakdown in the relations between the two Asian giants.

The post-1962 war chill lasted till the then Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's visit to Beijing in 1988.

This time, the two countries held periodic talks between the top commanders and through the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination (WMCC), resulting in disengagement in stages from four points – the Galwan Valley, the Pangong Lake, Hot Springs, and Gogra – in eastern Ladakh by creating buffer zones.

Finally, on October 21, India and China firmed up an agreement on patrolling and disengagement of troops along the LAC in eastern Ladakh at the remaining friction points of Depsang and Demchok.

The agreement led to the first structured meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the BRICS summit at Kazan in Russia soon after, their first in five years.

Subsequently, Jaishankar met Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi on the sidelines of the G20 meeting in Brazil in November where they reached an understanding that the Special Representatives (SRs) and the Foreign Secretary-level mechanisms will be convened soon.

Constituted in 2003 to comprehensively address the vexed dispute of the India-China border spanning to 3,488 kms, the Special Representatives mechanism is headed by NSA Doval and Foreign Minister Wang.

Defence Minister Rajnath Singh too met his Chinese counterpart Dong Jun at the ASEAN Defence Ministers' meeting in Vientiane in Laos in November.

After the 23rd SR dialogue between Doval and Wang in December, the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) said the extensive talks focussed on a "positive" direction for cross-border cooperation, including resuming the Kailash Mansarovar Yatra and border trade, while the Chinese side said a six-point consensus, including continuing to take measures to maintain peace at borders and promote healthy and stable development of relations, was reached between the two sides.

While there was no clarity from China on why it moved its troops near the LAC in 2020, equally puzzling is the timing for the agreement to bring down the border tensions with India, months ahead of the 75th anniversary of their diplomatic relationship.

But Beijing, in recent months, appeared to be mellowing down after its economy struggled to reverse its slowdown, weighed down by issues such as property crisis and rising unemployment.

Throughout the over four-year crisis, bilateral trade was not impacted. In fact, it continued to boom.

The bilateral trade, according to Chinese official figures, totalled USD 138.2 billion in 2023, with Chinese exports climbing to USD 122 billion and Indian exports to China standing at USD 16.2 billion. India's trade deficit with China amounted to USD 105.8 billion last year.

The trade deficit in the first six months of this year climbed to USD 41.89 billion, with Chinese exports totalling USD 50.35 billion against India's exports to China USD 8.46 billion, according to data from the Indian Embassy in Beijing.

In 2025, amid stubborn attempts by the US and EU to restrict Chinese exports with heavy tariffs, China looks to push its exports as well as investments in India, especially electric vehicles.

Experts here see the trade expansion with India, currently the fastest growing economy in the world, also as a new avenue to partly offset its likely damages in the Trump 2.0 era.

China also recalibrated its foreign, trade and military policies ahead of this year's US Presidential elections, especially after President-elect Donald Trump vowed to enhance tariffs over and above what he imposed against China in his first tenure.

Officials here say there is considerable concern in Beijing that India-US relations under Trump's Presidency will pick up further momentum, especially the Quad grouping comprising the US, India, Australia and Japan, which China perceives as an alliance aimed at containing it.

Besides India, China also sought to recalibrate frayed ties with Australia and Japan.

Meanwhile, as China marked 75 years of communist party rule, a crucial meeting of the ruling Communist Party in July adopted a resolution for comprehensive reforms to lift the sluggish growth by achieving socialist modernisation by 2035.

President Xi, who continued to crack the corruption whip on the ruling Communist Party and the military officials, asked them in January to turn the knife inwards and carry the anti-graft campaign without any mercy.

Xi's anti-graft campaign in the military has drawn global attention, which his critics say enabled him to consolidate his hold on power.

China also announced to raise its retirement age from January 2025 after its population dipped for a second consecutive year. The demographic crisis was further highlighted as China's marriage registrations in the first half of 2024 fell to a record low since 1980, not to mention the reduced number of kindergartens and drop in the number of children enrolled in them.

In June, Chinese spacecraft Chang'e-6 successfully touched down in the South Pole-Aitken Basin - the far side of the Moon, in the first endeavour of its kind in human history to collect samples from the rarely explored terrain and brought back the soil.

Meanwhile, Tibet and Arunachal Pradesh continued to be contentious issues as China celebrated the 65th year of its takeover of Tibet.

In March, the Joe Biden administration recognised Arunachal Pradesh as Indian territory. Biden also signed into law the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act' in July, triggering a sharp response from Beijing.

India not on same page with China on 'bifurcating' border issue at Special Representatives meeting in Beijing

While not denying it as such, India has distanced itself from China's claim that the two sides reached a six-point consensus and a commitment to a 'package' deal on the boundary question at the Dec 18 Beijing meeting of their special representatives – India's National Security Adviser Ajit Doval and Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi.

There was no joint statement after that meeting and China's claim about the two sides having agreed to bifurcate the boundary issue from the "overall development of bilateral relations" is clearly opposed to India's stand.

India's position remains that stabilizing the border situation is the basis for the restoration of normal ties between the two countries.

The Chinese statement, issued Dec 18 night, received wide publicity in the Indian media, which talked about a "six-point consensus" and highlighted the fact that Indians may again be able to undertake the Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage in western Tibet soon.

China stopped the pilgrimage in 2020 due to the Covid-19 pandemic, but never reopened it after bilateral ties plummeted in the wake of eastern Ladakh Galwan valley clash of the troops from the two sides that year.

The clashes led to the two sides escalating their military presence in the region, with the bilateral relationship severely affected in the process.

While both special representatives gave a "positive direction" towards the resumption of the pilgrimage, they have differed on the issue of prioritizing the normalization of the border situation, according to the print in Dec 20.

The Indian statement asserted that border ties are the cornerstone for determining the overall ties between the two countries. Furthermore, it makes no mention of a "six-point consensus", the report said.

"We put out the details of issues discussed in our press release. The two sides have reaffirmed their commitment to exploring a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable framework for the settlement of the boundary question in accordance with the political parameters and guiding principles agreed in 2005," the report quoted India's Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal as saying during a regular media briefing Dec 20.

The meeting between Doval and Wang was the first between the two in the special representatives' format since 2019.

China has been pressing New Delhi to normalize overall bilateral ties, including with the resumption of direct flights between the two countries and the issuance of visas to Chinese nationals – both of which have been affected since the clashes at Galwan.

But Jaiswal has clarified that it is a "step-by-step" process before all parts of the relationship get restored.

The political processes of normalisation between the two Asian neighbours began after an agreement was reached on Oct 21, 2024 to disengage at the friction points in Eastern and Southern Ladakh.

Subsequently, Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping held a bilateral meeting on the margins of the BRICS summit in the Russian city of Kazan on Oct 23, 2024, the report noted.

China building ability to 'fight and win wars' post 2020 standoff with India: US report

20 December 2024, First Post

The US Department of Defence's latest report submitted to the US Congress says China has strengthened its ability to 'fight and win wars' in a huge push after the 2020 military standoff with India

Following the 2020 military standoff with India along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), China has enhanced its development capabilities and concepts to strengthen its ability to "fight and win war" against a "strong enemy," the US Department of Defence has said in its latest report to the US Congress.

In the report that covered the military and security developments involving the People's Republic of China (PRC) through early 2024, the US also revealed that China has not scaled back its military presence along the LAC in eastern Ladakh region. It said there was significant and sustained escalation in military infrastructure in the region.

"The Western Theatre Command's (WTC) primary focus is on securing the People's Republic of China border with India. In recent years, differing perceptions between India and the PRC regarding border demarcations have facilitated multiple clashes, force buildups, and military infrastructure construction," report said, referring to the developments along the LAC since the India-China military standoff.

The report further claimed that China has strengthened its training and infrastructure aimed at long-term sustenance of the troops along the LAC.

The report cited the Galwan clash of June 2020, saying that the People's Liberation Army (PLA) "has not drawn down its positions or troop numbers since the 2020 clash and has built infrastructure and support facilities to maintain multiple Brigade deployments along the LAC".

"These engagements coincide with a significant and sustained escalation in military infrastructure to support a long-term presence on the LAC," the report said, referring to the developments on the LAC since the standoff.

On October 21 this year, the Indian government announced that India and China reached an agreement on disengagement and the resumption of patrolling from Demchok and Depsang in eastern Ladakh, the last two friction points of the 2020 standoff, returning to the status quo of pre-April 2020.

The US report also observed that since 1998, China has settled 11 land-based territorial disputes with six of its neighbours. It also said that the PRC, in the last decade, used a "more coercive" approach to deal with disputes over maritime features, rights to potentially rich offshore oil and gas deposits, and border areas.

The report said that the PLA has continuously been improving its methods and standards of training combined arms units. "Training encompassed individual to collective soldier events integrating reconnaissance, infantry, artillery, armor, engineers, and signal units," it said.

It also pointed out that in addition to continued deployments on the Indian border and in Myanmar, the PLA conducted multiple large-scale exercises in training areas throughout the country.

The report also pointed out that in 2020, PLA Special Operations Forces from the Tibet Military Region were deployed on the LAC with India following clashes between Chinese and Indian troops in eastern Ladakh.

'What if China suddenly releases water?' Arunachal Chief Minister asks protesters against major dam project

20 December 2024, Tibetan Review

Seeking to reason with those protesting against the proposed hydropower project on the Siang river, Arunachal Pradesh Chief Minister Pema Khandu has on Dec 19 said the aim of the project is to counter possible threats posed by China with its 60,000 MW hydropower project in upstream Tibet on the Yarlung Tsangpo river just before it enters Tuting in Upper Siang.

"In case, China releases water from their dams all of a sudden, a trail of unimaginable destruction will sweep through the Siang belt, Assam and Bangladesh.

"It is also inevitable that the volume of water in the Siang river will drastically get reduced during the winters so much (so) that you will be able to cross the mighty Siang on foot. Would you like such a situation? I certainly won't," the deccanherald.com Dec 19 quoted Khandu as saying, addressing a function at Boleng in Siang district.

"We are optimistic that with the progress being made through bilateral talks with China, relations will improve; but we cannot remain complacent and be prepared for the unseen," he has added.

He has said China, which is not a signatory to the International Water Conventions, intends to divert the water from the multiple water reservoirs to be created under the project to dry regions of Tibet and elsewhere in the PRC.

The Siang Upper Multipurpose Project, Khandu has said, has been proposed by New Delhi to maintain natural flow of water in the Siang river throughout the year and flood modulation in case of water release by China.

The Yarlung Tsangpo is called the Siang in Arunachal Pradesh and the Brahmaputra in Assam.

Khandu's comments came amid strong protests led by several civil society organisations against possible adverse impact of the proposed hydro power project on the Siang river. The protesters have refused to allow the National Hydro Power Corporation (NHPC), a federal Public Sector Undertaking, to carry out a pre-feasibility study for the major project. Khandu has rejected reports that central forces will be used by the government to forcibly execute the project.

"We are a democratic country. We do not believe in forcing projects on our own people. We believe in taking into confidence the last man in the queue."

He has also said, according the etvbharat.com Dec 19, "If you don't want a dam, if you don't want a hydropower project, there won't be. Chapter closed".

"But," he has added, "The case at hand is not about a hydropower project. It's about a Multipurpose Project, a project of national importance and envisioned by the Government of India and the Niti Aayog."

The NITI Aayog (lit. 'Policy Commission'; abbreviation for National Institution for Transforming India) serves as the apex public policy think tank of the Government of India, and the nodal agency tasked with catalyzing economic development. It was established in 2015 to replace the country's Planning Commission.

China ready to enhance mutual trust with India at border talks, foreign ministry says

China is ready to work with India to enhance mutual trust through dialogue and communication, and manage differences with sincerity and integrity, the foreign ministry said on Tuesday.

Lin Jian, a ministry spokesperson, made the remarks when asked about the upcoming talks between Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and Indian National Security Adviser Ajit Doval this week on border issues.

Wang and Doval are set to meet in Beijing on Wednesday in a resumption of talks under their "special representatives dialogue" mechanism since deadly border clashes soured ties four years ago.

"China stands ready to work with India to implement the important consensus reached by the two countries' leaders, respect each other's core interests and major concerns... and bring bilateral relations back to a stable and healthy development track at an early date," Lin said at the ministry's regular press briefing.

Chinese President Xi Jinping met Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi in Russia in October just days after the two countries reached a deal on patrolling their disputed frontier to end a four-year military stand-off.

Both leaders agreed to boost communications and resolve conflicts and differences, directing their officials to take further steps to stabilise all aspects of bilateral ties.

Relations between the nuclear-armed neighbours have been strained in recent years, after at least 20 Indian soldiers and four Chinese troops were killed in hand-to-hand combat in the Galwan Valley in 2020.

Ties had remained frozen since, with their trust eroded by repeated border stand-offs.

Wang last met Doval in September in St Petersburg, Russia, with the two agreeing to redouble efforts to ensure complete disengagement on the contested frontier.

India's Spending on Defense To Deter China

18 December 2024, The Heritage Foundation, Wilson Beaver

In a move that signals India's growing commitment to strengthen its own security, the country's Cabinet Committee on Security, chaired by Prime Minister Narendra Modi, recently approved two new deals that will significantly enhance its defense capabilities. These deals include the construction of two nuclear-powered attack submarines (SSNs) and the acquisition of 31 Predator drones (MQ-9B) from U.S. defense-contractor General Atomics. Both are smart strategic decisions that underscore India's willingness to safeguard its interests, strengthen its capacity, and modernize its defense architecture.

New Delhi has an eye on China, of course. As Beijing continues to assert its influence and military presence across the Indian Ocean and beyond, India's investments in undersea warfare and unmanned aerial systems are timely and necessary. However, the procurement of SSNs and the acquisition of MQ-9Bs are more than just a response to China's rise. They represent India's broader ambition to act as a key player in the Indo-Pacific's security architecture.

China's Ambitions Are Endangering the Pacific Islands

The Indian Navy, already operating nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarines, has long advocated for the additional procurement of nuclear-powered attack submarines. This project, which is estimated to cost an initial $5.4 billion, will make the Indian Navy far more capable of defending its interests in the Indian Ocean.

Nuclear-powered submarines are the apex predator of undersea warfare and offer a versatile offensive capability for conventional warfare and force projection. Australian defense policymakers entered into the AUKUS agreement with the United States in order to purchase nuclear-powered attack submarines based on a similar analysis.

India has long recognized the importance of indigenous defense manufacturing and self-reliance under the "Make in India" initiative, and the procurement of SSNs represents a new frontier that enhances India's defense capabilities while simultaneously reducing dependency on foreign suppliers such as the Russian Akula-class SSN, which India previously leased until 2021.

Moreover, the SSNs are critical for the Indian Navy to match the growing power of the Chinese People's Liberation Army Navy, which has 12 nuclear-powered submarines and continues to expand. The nuclear-powered attack submarines will allow India to conduct extended patrols, including around the Strait of Malacca and in the South China Sea.

America's Allies Need To Increase Defense Spending
Also significant is India's decision to purchase 31 Predator Drones from the United States, valued at approximately $3.99 billion. The MQ-9B purchase, which includes 16 Sky Guardian and 15 Sea Guardian High Altitude Long Endurance (HALE) Remotely Piloted Aircraft Systems (RPAS), will enhance intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance capabilities of India's armed forces.

These advanced MQ-9B drones will also provide India the capacity for precision strikes on strategic targets. Most importantly, this deal reflects India's deepening defense partnership with the United States, which has been growing steadily through bilateral channels and multilateral initiatives such as the Quad.

This acquisition comes at a time when the Indian Ocean is increasingly becoming a theater of strategic competition, particularly with China's expanding naval footprint and its aggressive maritime ambitions. Amid growing concerns over illicit maritime activities and the presence of Chinese surveillance vessels in the Indian Ocean, the MQ-9B drones will give India an ability to monitor and respond swiftly to increased Chinese aggression. These Predator drones will further enable real-time intelligence gathering and targeted operations throughout the vast Indian Ocean.

By enhancing its undersea warfare capabilities and expanding its surveillance and strike potential, India's recent two deals represent concrete steps to safeguard its maritime interests, protect critical sea lanes, and strengthen its role as a key player in the region.

23rd Meeting of the Special Representatives of India and China

18 December 2024, MEA

The 23rd Meeting of the Special Representatives (SRs) of India and China, respectively Shri Ajit Doval, National Security Advisor of India, and Mr. Wang Yi, Member of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and Minister of Foreign Affairs, was held in Beijing on 18 December 2024.

2. The SRs met in accordance with the decision taken during the recent meeting between Prime Minister Modi and President Xi Jinping in Kazan for them to meet at an early date to oversee the management of peace & tranquillity in border areas and to explore a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable solution to the boundary question.

3. The SRs reiterated the importance of maintaining a political perspective of the overall bilateral relationship while seeking a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable framework for settlement of the boundary question, and resolved to inject more vitality into this process.

4. This was the first meeting of the SRs since frictions had emerged in the Western Sector of the India-China border areas in 2020. The SRs positively affirmed the implementation of the latest disengagement agreement of October 2024, resulting in patrolling and grazing in relevant areas.

5. Both SRs underlined the importance of maintaining peace and tranquillity in the border areas to promote overall development of the India-China bilateral relationship. They emphasised the need to ensure peaceful conditions on the ground so that issues on the border do not hold back the normal development of bilateral relations. Drawing on the learnings from the events of 2020, they discussed various measures to maintain peace and tranquillity on the border and advance effective border management. They decided to use, coordinate and guide the relevant diplomatic and military mechanisms towards this purpose.

6. The SRs exchanged views on bilateral, regional and global issues of mutual interest. They provided positive directions for cross-border cooperation and exchanges including resumption of the Kailash Mansarovar Yatra, data sharing on trans-border rivers and border trade. They agreed on the salience of stable, predictable and amicable India-China relations for regional and global peace and prosperity.

7. NSA called on H.E. Mr. Han Zheng, Vice President of the People's Republic of China.

8. NSA invited Mr. Wang Yi to visit India at a mutually convenient date to hold the next round of SR meeting.

Successful Modi-Xi meeting signifies new beginning of India-China ties: senior CPC official

11 December 2024, The Economic Times

The "successful" meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and President Xi Jinping in Russia in October "signified a new beginning" of India-China relations, a senior minister of the ruling CPC has said. Liu Jianchao, Minister of the International Department of the Chinese Communist Party of China (CPC) was referring to the Modi-Jinping meeting at Kazan in Russia on the sidelines of the BRICS summit in Russia while speaking with the Indian envoy to China, Pradeep Kumar Rawat, on Tuesday, official media said on Wednesday.

The restarting of China-India relations meets the fundamental interests of the 2.8 billion people of the two countries, corresponds to the common expectations of the Global South and is also in line with the correct direction of history, he said.

Liu said China is willing to strengthen friendly exchanges with all political parties in India, jointly implement the important consensus reached by leaders of the two countries, and promote the early return of bilateral relations to a stable and healthy development track.

Modi and Xi met at Kazan on October 24 after the two countries reached an agreement to end the over four-year military standoff at Eastern Ladakh during which the relations between the two countries were virtually frozen.

During their meeting, their first in five years, the two leaders endorsed the agreement on patrolling and disengagement along the LAC in eastern Ladakh and instructed the Special Representatives for the boundary mechanism to meet to discuss further steps. After their meeting, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar and his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi met on the sidelines of the G20 summit in Brazil followed by the Working Mechanism for Consultation & Coordination on China-India Border Affairs (WMCC).

Indian opposition raises doubts over India-China border deal

11 December 2024, SCMP, Biman Mukherji

Despite opposition concerns, analysts expect the deal to proceed driven by economic necessity and a desire to enhance trade between the two Asian giants

India's opposition has raised concerns about potential territorial concessions under the country's recent border agreement with China, increasing political scrutiny of Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government as it works to ease tensions with Beijing. The controversy erupted after Foreign Minister S Jaishankar's parliamentary statement on December 4 outlining the disengagement of troops from the border following the deadly 2020 Himalayan border clash.

On Sunday, Jairam Ramesh, a senior leader of the main opposition Congress Party, slammed the agreement in parliament as going against India's national interests.

"We want to go back to the status quo of April 2020 ... thereafter we will be looking at disengagement, de-escalation and normal management of the LAC (Line of Actual Control), referring to the India-China border," Ramesh was quoted as saying by the Hindu newspaper, hinting that India may have seceded land in the deal.

However, analysts say opposition pressure is unlikely to derail the thawing of relations between the two Asian giants, who have been pulling back troops since late October after years of being locked virtually eyeball-to-eyeball at two positions on the border.

"I don't really think that any charges, until substantially proven, will have any impact whatsoever on this government," said Yashwant Deshmukh, an independent political commentator. "If the government has decided to go ahead with talks with China, they will go ahead and at this point of time, the opposition is not really in a position to accuse this government of any wrongdoing."

Modi's ruling Bharatiya Janata Party's (BJP) strengthened its mandate by an unexpected victory in state elections in the politically strategic state of Maharashtra last month, he said. The victory followed another surprising win in the northern state of Haryana in October.

The losses have weakened the Congress party, which was gaining momentum after scoring crucial victories in the BJP's heartland Hindi-speaking provinces, resulting in the BJP losing its outright majority in the summer parliamentary elections.

"After the huge loss in Maharashtra, I think the opposition, particularly the Congress, will need a lot of steam together in order to bring any narrative against the BJP NDA government," Deshmukh said.

Sino-Indian relations are on the mend. A reset to pre-pandemic levels is a good start

Uday Chandra, analyst

Sino-Indian relations are on the mend. A reset to pre-pandemic levels is a good start

The border disengagement has raised hopes for improved China-India trade relations, which could have widespread ramifications throughout Asia, especially with incoming US President Donald Trump's threat to raise import tariffs.

India and China have not had direct flights for four years since the border tensions, while New Delhi's increased scrutiny for visa applications from Chinese citizens has hampered cooperation in sectors such as electronics manufacturing.

"Sino-Indian relations are on the mend. A reset to pre-pandemic levels is a good start," said Uday Chandra, an assistant professor of government at Georgetown University.

In May, China appointed senior diplomat Xu Feihong as its new ambassador to India, filling an 18-month vacancy in the backdrop of tense bilateral relations. "The next step should be direct flights resuming. I anticipate that, with business lobbying, this is likely in 2025," Chandra said.

"I doubt the Opposition [in India] will play a significant role in this phase of diplomacy. Opposition unity remains elusive anyway," Chandra said.

Mamata Banerjee, leader of the All Trinamool Congress Party, which holds significant influence in West Bengal, recently staked a claim for the leadership position of the opposition alliance INDIA Bloc, triggering a war of words with the Congress party and raising concerns about opposition unity.

Economic need

Chandra said the economic imperative to strengthen India-China relations will enhance political engagement.

"Economics continues to trump politics. After the US election, India and China are working out how to live and trade peacefully together. It is an alternative model of international relations as the West sinks into democratic crises," Chandra said.

Experts say global supply chains could be disrupted and reshaped if the incoming Trump administration implements its campaign pledge of a 60 per cent import tariffs on China and 10 per cent on other nations.

Earlier this month, the US president-elect threatened a 100 per cent tariff on Brics countries, which includes China and India, if the 11-member group were to create a rival currency to the US dollar. Such a Brics currency has been discussed for over a year without any significant progress.

"There are strong incentives for both [China and India] to trade intensively, even in the absence of any policy developments," said Jamus Lim, associate professor of economics at ESSEC Business School Asia-Pacific.

The most obvious reason for the two countries to trade is "that they are both large economies, located close to each other," he said, noting that the two countries specialise in fairly distinct exports.

The main reason for trade between the two countries, he said, is their proximity as large economies that specialise in different exports. India excels in the services sector, particularly information technology, while China focuses on manufacturing.

"Now, with further normalisation of bilateral political relations, and the frictions arising from impediments to trade that are likely to result from the Trump administration, I anticipate a continued, steady expansion of trade between these two emerging market giants," he said.

China, India vow to learn lessons of deadly 2020 border clash, keep talking to avert rerun

06 December 2024, SCMP, Maple Leung

Calls for openness mark first WMCC talks since both sides withdrew from face-off points along disputed western Himalayan border

India and China have pledged to reflect on the lessons learned from their border stand-off in 2020, while emphasising the need for regular communication to prevent a recurrence.

The resolution came at the first diplomatic talks under a key dialogue mechanism since both sides withdrew from two face-off points along their disputed western Himalayan border.

"The two sides positively affirmed the implementation of the most recent [troop] disengagement agreement which completed the resolution of the issues that emerged in 2020," a statement from the Indian foreign ministry said after the 32nd meeting of the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination (WMCC) on India-China Border Affairs, held in New Delhi on Thursday.

The issues of 2020 refer to a series of stand-offs that summer along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) separating Indian-controlled Ladakh and Chinese-controlled Aksai Chin. Matters came to a head with clashes in the Galwan River valley that left dozens of Indian troops and at least four Chinese soldiers dead, plunging bilateral ties to their lowest point in decades.

To prevent such incidents in the future, both sides emphasised the need for "exchanges and contacts at the diplomatic and military levels through established mechanisms", according to New Delhi.

The Chinese foreign ministry also highlighted the importance of leveraging the border negotiation mechanism, and maintaining open diplomatic and military channels.

The two sides agreed to take measures to further ease the situation along the border, it said.

The meeting focused on making preparations for the next round of border talks at the "special representative" level, and maintaining communication through diplomatic and military channels for sustainable peace and tranquillity in the border area, according to the Chinese readout.

The Indian statement said the next meeting of the special representatives would be held "in accordance with the decision of the two leaders in their meeting in Kazan" on October 23, when Chinese President Xi Jinping and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi met on the sidelines of the Brics summit.

The summit came days after India said it had reached a deal with China on patrolling the frontier in eastern Ladakh to end the four-year military stand-off, signalling an easing of tensions.

Thursday's meeting in the capital was co-chaired by Hong Liang, director general of the Chinese foreign ministry's Department of Boundary and Ocean Affairs, and Gourangalal Das, joint secretary for East Asia from the corresponding Indian ministry. The pair also led the 31st round of the WMCC talks held in Beijing in August.

At the 30th round, also held in New Delhi, both sides sought to promote the healthy and stable development of ties and "turn the page" on the border issue at an early date.

On Tuesday, Indian External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar said that both countries would consider "other aspects" of bilateral ties in a calibrated manner now that troops had pulled back from the last two face-off points on their Himalayan border.

"Recent developments that reflect our continuous diplomatic engagement since then have set our ties in the direction of some improvement," Jaishankar told lawmakers in New Delhi.

"The conclusion of the disengagement phase now allows us to consider other aspects of our bilateral engagement in a calibrated manner, keeping our national security interests first and foremost."

As relations improve, Indian foreign minister outlines three principles for engaging with China

05 December 2024, Tibetan Review

India's External affairs minister S Jaishankar has on Dec 3 informed the Lok Sabha, the lower house of parliament, that India-China relations had improved, and emphasized government's commitment to engaging with the country, according to the hindustantimes.com Dec 3.

He has also informed the country's lawmakers that recent military and diplomatic talks had resolved border issues, including the October patrolling agreement for areas along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh.

He has also informed the Rajya Sabha, the upper house, on Dec 4 that peace and tranquillity in border areas is a pre-requisite for development of bilateral relationship with China, and the two sides will be discussing de-escalation and effective management of activities in these areas in the coming days, according to the timesofindia.com Dec 5.

In his Rajya Sabha statement on "Recent Developments in India's Relations with China", Jaishankar has said China was in "illegal occupation" of 38,000sqkm of Indian territory in Aksai Chin as a result of the 1962 conflict while Pakistan had "illegally" yielded 5,180sqkm of Indian territory to China, which has been under Chinese occupation since 1948.

He has further explained: "While there is a Line of Actual Control, it doesn't have a common understanding in some areas. We remain committed to engaging with China through bilateral discussions to arrive at a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable framework for boundary settlement."

In his identical statement in the Lok Sabha, Jaishankar has further said, "Keeping our national security interests foremost, in my recent meeting with foreign minister Wang Yi, we reached an understanding that the special representatives and the foreign secretary-level mechanism will be convened soon."

He has outlined three key principles to be upheld in all circumstances for engagement with China: "one: both sides should strictly respect and observe the Line of Actual Control (LAC); two: neither side should attempt to unilaterally alter the status quo; and three: agreements and understandings reached in the past must be fully abided by in their entirety".

India's success in capturing 'China-Plus-One strategy' limited: NITI report

04 December 2024, Business Standard

It said that India is seen as an attractive destination for companies looking to shift their bases out of China and this shift offers the country a chance to enhance its manufacturing capabilities

India has seen limited success so far in capturing the 'China Plus One strategy', while Vietnam, Thailand, Cambodia, and Malaysia have become bigger beneficiaries, according to a report of government think tank Niti Aayog.

It said that factors such as cheaper labour, simplified tax laws, lower tariffs and pro-activeness in signing Free Trade Agreements (FTAs) have played a critical role in helping these countries expand their export shares.

The US has implemented stricter export controls and higher tariffs on Chinese goods to limit China's growth and expenditure towards technological progress.

This has led to a fragmentation of global supply chains, prompting multinational corporations to seek alternatives to Chinese manufacturing.

It said that India is seen as an attractive destination for companies looking to shift their manufacturing bases out of China and this shift offers the country a chance to enhance its domestic manufacturing capabilities, particularly in high-tech industries.

"However, India has seen limited success so far in capturing the China Plus One strategy so far," said the report - 'Trade Watch Quarterly'.

In recent years, it said, India's share in global trade has fallen for labour-intensive sectors despite significant endowment.

"China is the main competitor in several key product categories highlighting the need for India to enhance competitiveness in these products. India has a solid foothold in developed markets like the USA, UK, and Germany, across top product categories but there are opportunities to explore emerging markets," it said.

It also said that several studies assessing the EU's Carbon Border Adjustment Mechanism (CBAM) identify African and Asian countries as the "most" vulnerable to its effects.

CBAM (or carbon tax), is aimed at preventing carbon leakage and will apply to high-risk imports such as cement, iron and steel, aluminium, fertilizers, electricity, and hydrogen starting January 2026. It requires the purchase of CBAM certificates, reflecting the carbon emissions linked to these goods.

For India, the iron and steel industry, representing 23.5 per cent of its EU exports, faces the highest exposure under CBAM, it added.

"Indian firms may incur tariffs of 20-35 per cent, leading to higher costs, reduced competitiveness, and lower demand in the EU market. Additionally, compliance costs will rise due to the need for detailed emissions reporting," the report said.

The European Union (EU) is India's second-largest trading partner. In 2023-24, the EU accounted for 17.4 per cent ($ 76 billion) of the country's total exports.

November

Patrolling Agreement with China Implemented: MEA tells Lok Sabha

30 November 2024, The Wire

From April-May 2020, Indian and Chinese troops had been at a stand-off at multiple points of the Line of Actual Control in eastern Ladakh.

The Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) informed parliament on Friday (November 29) that the patrolling arrangement agreement with China, reached a month ago for Depsang and Demchok, has been "implemented," while the terms of disengagement at earlier friction points in Eastern Ladakh border stand-off remain unchanged.

From April-May 2020, Indian and Chinese troops had been at a stand-off at multiple points of the Line of Actual Control in eastern Ladakh, sparking several clashes including a hand-to-hand fight in June that claimed the lives of at least 20 Indian soldiers and four Chinese soldiers.

Following multiple rounds of diplomatic and military negotiations, disengagement was achieved at around four friction points, resulting in the establishment of 'buffer zones'.

However, progress on resolving the two remaining points at Depsang and Demchok had remained elusive, till last month.

On October 21, India first announced that a "patrolling agreement" had been finalised for these two last friction points. Two days later, Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping held their first formal talks in five years in Kazan, Russia on the sidelines of the BRICS summit.

Since then, the foreign and defence ministers of both countries have met twice in separate engagements to advance the process of normalising ties.

Earlier on November 2, India had said that "verification patrolling" had commenced in Depsang and Demchok.

The Chinese defence ministry said on Thursday (November 28) that the "Chinese and Indian militaries are implementing the solutions reached by the two sides on border-related issues, and progress is going smoothly".

In a written answer in Lok Sabha on Friday, Minister of State for External Affairs Kirti Vardhan Singh said for the first time on Friday that the October 21 agreement has been "effected and implemented" on the ground.

"India and China reached agreement on patrolling arrangements along the Line of Actual Control in India-China border areas in Depsang and Demchok on 21 October 2024, leading to disengagement. It has been agreed therein that patrolling activities and, wherever applicable, grazing will resume as per longstanding practice before friction started in these areas. The agreement has since been effected and implemented as per modalities and timelines agreed," Singh said.

The statement also clarifies that the conditions set for the resolution of earlier friction points, which included the establishment of buffer zones, remain intact.

"The terms of the agreements reached before October 21, 2024, continue to apply in the relevant areas of Eastern Ladakh," Singh added.

At the earlier friction points, both sides had reportedly agreed to withdraw an equal distance from the area and suspend patrolling until overall de-escalation and troop withdrawal were completed.

China, India find common ground for 'strategic recalibration' in post-clash thaw

29 November 2024, SCMP, Cyril Ip

De-escalation of border tensions has paved the way for engagement on other issues, including pressures from the West, analysts said

The thaw in China-India relations began with a pact to disengage troops at their disputed border in the Himalayas, laying the groundwork for a reunion between President Xi Jinping and Prime Minister Narendra Modi at the Brics summit in October.

Advertisement

Last week, the two countries' defence chiefs held talks in Laos and committed to cooperation – the latest in a series of moves that analysts have called a "strategic recalibration" in response to pressures from the West.

As Beijing seeks to reform the global economic architecture and New Delhi pursues its multidimensional foreign policy, their visions have proven more complimentary than conflicting since a bloody border clash in June 2020 plunged ties to historic lows.

Numerous rounds of negotiations have taken place in the past four years, but it took October's accord on military disengagement to restore both countries' troop positions to pre-crisis locations in the border region of Ladakh.

According to Chietigj Bajpae, a senior research fellow for South Asia in the Asia-Pacific Programme at Chatham House, the agreement followed "a recognition by New Delhi that it had backed itself into a corner after the clashes".

"De-escalation of border tensions [was] a prerequisite to engagement on other issues, including the economy," said Bajpae, author of China in India's Post-Cold War Engagement with Southeast Asia.

Bajpae said "economic and strategic compulsions" faced by the Asian giants played a role in their reconciliation, including a potentially volatile relationship with the US from next year when president-elect Donald Trump begins his second term. Tightening foreign investment restrictions in Western countries had also prompted China to seek stable relations and deeper engagement with the Global South, of which India is a key member, he said.

"India's tensions with the West, on issues ranging from relations with Russia to Canada, also reaffirmed the need for New Delhi to maintain a multidimensional foreign policy."

Will India and China's new border deal lead to long-term peace in the disputed Himalayas?

Veteran journalist Kalinga Seneviratne, who lectures at the Shinawatra University in Bangkok, said New Delhi was vexed by Washington's "concerted pressure” to halt India’s long-standing trade with Russia after the invasion of Ukraine.

There had also been a perception in India that the US had quietly supported Canada over its recent frictions with India, sparked by the killing of a prominent Sikh activist in June, he said.

Hardeep Singh Nijjar, a Canadian citizen who advocated for an independent Khalistan, was shot outside a temple in Surrey, British Columbia. India has strongly denied involvement in his death and recently accused Canada of sheltering violent extremists.

“The spat with Canada over its alleged harbouring of Sikh ‘terrorists’ and accusation of Indian diplomats being involved in the murder of a Sikh community leader in Canada has spurred some anti-Western sentiment in India, especially in the media.”

According to Seneviratne, despite attempts by Beijing and New Delhi to improve relations, some efforts have been slowed by “strong sentiments among Indians that the Chinese cannot be trusted”.

Seneviratne noted that when asked by Western journalists about the Chinese “threat”, Indian External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar had repeatedly referred to the two countries’ shared history.

“For the past two years or so, [Jaishankar] has kept on pointing to the two countries being ancient civilisations that have lived peacefully next to each other for 5,000 years,” he said.

Seneviratne, author of Geopolitics and the Media in Asia and the Pacific: Pulling in Different Directions, said that widely circulated Western media in India “played a big role in fomenting Sinophobia”.

“But Indians are not fools, they can clearly see the plot,” he said.

According to Seneviratne, when it comes to reforming global architecture, “India and China, along with Russia and Brazil, are on the same wavelength”.

He added that India’s business sector pushed New Delhi to mend fences with Beijing by lifting trade restrictions imposed after the 2020 dispute.

Bajpai said there was growing recognition by India that it could not meet its ambitions to emerge as a global manufacturing hub without sourcing components and raw materials from China.

“Indian corporations have been lobbying to relax visa rules and investment restrictions [and] Indian companies are also seeking ways to help Chinese companies enter the Indian market, although investment restrictions will remain in place for politically sensitive sectors,” he said.

In Seneviratne’s view, Beijing also wants India to play a more active role in the Brics grouping of developing economies and the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation to avoid its mission of “reforming the global economic architecture” being spoiled.

“For Brics to succeed, India and China need to cooperate. Both countries see themselves as leaders or spokespeople of the Global South – if they can do it together, that will be a formidable alliance,” he said.

Colombo-based journalist and researcher Rathindra Kuruwita said there had been signs in recent years that the containment policies imposed on China by the West might be applied to India as its economic prowess grew – hence the “strategic recalibration” by both countries.

“The evolving global order, characterised by shifting alliances and emerging blocs like Brics, has underscored the importance of collaboration between India and China. Both countries aim to assert their influence in multilateral forums, making improved bilateral ties strategically advantageous.”

According to Kuruwita, progress in China-India relations can be expected in the resumption of direct flights and other areas of people-to-people exchanges, as emphasised by Wang Yi, the Chinese foreign minister.

“Simplification of visa processes is likely, aiming to boost tourism, business travel, and academic exchanges. Both sides have also discussed improving cooperation in media by enabling the exchange of journalists, fostering better mutual understanding,” Kuruwita said.

Seneviratne noted that Beijing and New Delhi had been “very strict” over granting visas for academic exchanges between the two countries.

“There needs to be more interaction between them ... Visa liberalisation may help,” he said, adding that opportunities for student exchanges should be increased.

Armies making great progress in implementing settlement: China

29 November 2024, The Hindu, Dinakar Peri

“We also look forward to harmonious dance between the Chinese dragon and Indian Elephant with concerted steps,” says Chinese Defence Ministry spokesperson Wu Qian

Stating that the Armies of India and China are implementing the settlement reached between the two countries for disengagement and resumption of patrolling at Demchok and Depsang in eastern Ladakh, the Chinese Defence Ministry said on Thursday (November 28, 2024) that they were making “great progress.”

Sources in the know said the frequency of patrolling would be a maximum of one patrol a week by each side in Depsang and Demchok. Talks are continuing between the two sides for resumption of patrolling in other five friction points where buffer zones are in place following disengagement.

Last week, Defence Minister Rajnath Singh met his Chinese counterpart Admiral Dong Jun in Laos on the sidelines of the 11th ASEAN Defence Ministers' Meeting-Plus. The meeting came in the backdrop of the disengagement and the meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the BRICS summit.

Implementation of agreement with India to disengage troops going 'smoothly': Chinese Foreign Ministry

Last week, Defence Minister Rajnath Singh met his Chinese counterpart Admiral Dong Jun in Laos on the sidelines of the 11th ASEAN Defence Ministers' Meeting-Plus. The meeting came in the backdrop of the disengagement and the meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the BRICS summit.

'Positive meeting'

On the meeting between the two leaders, he said they had a "positive and constructive" meeting and agreed to implement the important consensus reached between the top leaders and promote stable relations between the two countries. "Now, we are making great progress," Sr Col Wu said.

During the meeting, Mr. Singh called for reflecting on the lessons learnt from the unfortunate border clashes of 2020, "take measures to prevent recurrence of such events and safeguard peace and tranquillity along the India-China border" and both sides agreed to work together towards a road map for rebuilding mutual trust and understanding.

The spokesperson said the two militaries should strictly abide by the recent common understandings reached by the two sides to de-escalate tensions at the border areas, make efforts to bring down the tensions and focus on enhancing mutual trust and exchanges between the two countries. "We hope the two sides can seize the opportunity and build new momentum to make new progress in the military-to-military relations," he added.

The two sides have since completed disengagement from Depsang and Demchok, the last two remaining friction points of the 2020 stand-off, and have resumed coordinated patrolling. On November 4, the Indian Army announced that it had patrolled one of the five patrolling points in Depsang, PP 10 and shortly after the Chinese People's Liberation Army too resumed patrolling.

China looks forward to harmonious dance between the Chinese dragon and Indian elephant with concerted steps: defense spokesperson

28 November 2024, Global Times

A Chinese Defense Ministry spokesperson on Thursday expressed hope for China and India to seize the opportunity and the good momentum of the two countries' defense minister's recent positive and constructive meeting to make new progress in the military-to-military relationship.

Spokesperson Wu Qian made the remarks at a regular press conference on Thursday, when asked to comment about information on the website of the Indian Defense Ministry on November 20. Indian Defense Minister Rajnath Singh stated recently during his meeting with Chinese Defense Minister Admiral Dong Jun in Vientiane, Laos, that a friendly relationship between India and China, the two most populous countries, will have a positive impact on global peace and prosperity, and the two countries should focus on cooperation rather than conflict.

Wu said that Dong met with his Indian counterpart in Vientiane, Laos, on the afternoon of November 20, and the meeting was positive and constructive.

The two sides agreed to deliver on the important consensus reached by the two state leaders and promote a stable development of the mil-to-mil relationship; to strictly abide by the recent common understanding reached by the two sides and make efforts to deescalate tensions in the border areas; to focus on enhancing mutual trust and conduct more exchanges and interactions between the two militaries, Wu noted.

"We hope our two sides can seize the opportunity and the good momentum to make new progress in the mil-to-mil relationship. We also look forward to a harmonious dance between the Chinese dragon and the Indian elephant with concerted steps," Wu said.

Centre Approves ₹ 28,229 Crore For 1,637 Km Arunachal Frontier Highway Along LAC

28 November 2024, NDTV

The ambitious project to be built at an estimated cost of ₹ 40,000 crore is seen as a move to counter China's aggression in Arunachal Pradesh, besides contributing to the socio-economic development of the border state.

The Centre has sanctioned ₹ 28,229 crore for constructing the 1,637 km Arunachal Frontier Highway connecting 12 districts of the state along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) on the India-China international border, a top official said.

The ambitious project to be built at an estimated cost of ₹ 40,000 crore is seen as a move to counter China's aggression in Arunachal Pradesh, besides contributing to the socio-economic development of the border state.

The highway is being constructed along the 'India-Tibet-China-Myanmar' border and the road project will be as close as 20 km from the LAC and international borders.

It will start from Bomdila and pass through Nafra, Huri and Monigong towns, which are closer to the LAC or the McMahon Line, and conclude in Vijaynagar near the India-Myanmar border.

"The Centre has sanctioned ₹ 28,229 crore for the Arunachal Frontier Highway, which will connect 1,683 villages. The national highway being built parallel to the MacMohon Line will be completed by 2027," Chief Engineer of Border Roads Organisation (BRO) and head of Project Brahmanak, Subhash Chandra Lunia, said.

He said work is under progress for constructing the 198 km stretch (Tato-Tuting) of the Arunachal Frontier National Highway-913.

After 2014, the budget for BRO's work in various states has been doubled for road development and maintenance as compared to the previous years, the official said.

Stating that work is underway on projects under the Brahmanak Project in Arunachal Pradesh, Lunia said construction and maintenance of road infrastructure is being done in Siang, Upper Siang, West Siang and Shi-Yomi districts along with maintenance of four roads in Assam's Dhemaji district.

In 2022-23 and 2023-24, the Brahmanak Project constructed a 100-metre span arch bridge on Siom River on Along-Yingkiong road. The construction of Siom bridge was completed in a record time of 180 days and opened for traffic, he said.

Lunia also said that from the day of establishment of the Brahmanak Project till today, construction of 17 roads has been completed, whose total length is 496 km.

Along with this, the construction of 42 permanent bridges and 11 modular bridges has also been completed.

The official also said the BRO has always been at the forefront of construction of roads/bridges in favourable and unfavourable weather conditions for the last many years in the state.

Under Brahmanak Project, BRO is committed to provide all-weather connectivity to the soldiers as well as the public.

China outpaces India in nuclear aircraft carrier race with new breakthrough

25 November 2024, Business Standard

Reports of a prototype reactor in Sichuan shed light on Beijing's long-term ambitions to expand its naval power

China appears to be advancing its plans for a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, a South China Morning Post report from Sunday indicated, citing reports of a prototype nuclear reactor sparking renewed attention on Beijing's aspirations to project naval power globally.

Unlike conventional carriers, nuclear-powered ones can operate for extended periods without refuelling, providing them with greater range and the capacity to carry more fuel and weapons for their aircraft.

What do we know about China's prototype nuclear reactor?

On November 11, the Associated Press reported that a prototype reactor for a large surface warship had been constructed at a mountain site near Leshan in Sichuan province. Research, conducted by the Middlebury Institute of International Studies in California and provided to the news agency, suggested that China's 701 Institute, which oversees aircraft carrier development, had acquired reactor equipment "intended for installation on a large surface warship".

This conclusion was drawn from publicly accessible documents, including an environmental impact report identifying the project as "national defence-related", and satellite imagery captured between 2020 and 2023 that showed the development of reactor-related facilities.

Currently, the United States (US) operates 11 nuclear-powered carriers, while France has one, the Charles de Gaulle.

China's ambitions for a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier have long been speculated upon, with many seeing it as a critical step towards equipping the People's Liberation Army (PLA) Navy with blue-water capabilities. The Associated Press report may be the clearest indication yet that Beijing is pursuing this goal.

What about India's aircraft carrier plans?

This comes as India continues to counter Beijing's growing military presence in the Indian Ocean, a concern expected to persist despite the recent thaw in relations following the October Line of Actual Control (LAC) patrolling agreement.

In May, Defence Minister Rajnath Singh announced that India would soon begin constructing its third aircraft carrier. Singh made these remarks in reference to the pending Indian Navy proposal to construct another indigenous aircraft carrier of the same size as the INS Vikrant, which weighs 45,000 tonnes and was commissioned in September 2022.

Currently, the Indian Navy operates two 45,000-tonne aircraft carriers: the INS Vikramaditya and the INS Vikrant. Both are conventionally powered and utilise ski-jump ramps to assist with aircraft take-offs. The INS Vikrant, India's first indigenous carrier, was constructed by Cochin Shipyard Ltd, while the INS Vikramaditya was acquired from Russia and has been operational since 2014.

These carriers can each accommodate 25-30 fixed-wing aircraft along with 10 helicopters. Given that the proposed third aircraft carrier will match the size of the INS Vikrant, it is expected to have a similar air wing capacity.

India had earlier considered building a 65,000-tonne third carrier, the Indigenous Aircraft Carrier-2 (IAC-2), with a projected air wing of 54 fighters. Discussions had also included the possibility of equipping the ship with nuclear propulsion and electromagnetic catapults.

However, the current plans strongly suggest that India's third carrier will be conventionally powered.

What are the capabilities of nuclear-powered carriers?

If realised, a nuclear-powered carrier would enable the PLA Navy to carry out "smooth deepwater aircraft operations", Yoon Suk-joon, a senior fellow at the Korea Institute for Military Affairs and an expert on Chinese naval systems, told the South China Morning Post.

Yoon noted that nuclear propulsion not only allows sufficient operating speed unaffected by sea conditions and ample power supply, but also ensures the safety of aircraft take-off and landing systems. This, he added, would provide the Chinese navy with the confidence to keep its carriers operational in open seas.

He explained that nuclear power could enable speeds of up to 30 knots, or 55 kilometres per hour (km/h), enhancing the efficiency of advanced aircraft launch systems.

Collin Koh, a senior fellow at the S Rajaratnam School of International Studies in Singapore, reportedly highlighted the potential for such carriers to undertake "global voyages" without frequent refuelling. "We are not just looking at the Chinese operating the carrier just within the region," Koh observed.

He speculated that such a reactor would likely be intended exclusively for use on carriers, emphasising the "long-term Chinese ambition" it represents. While such vessels could play a critical role in flashpoints like the South China Sea and Taiwan Strait, Koh noted their likely deployment on a broader scale, starting with the Indian Ocean.

He also pointed out that China's first overseas military base in Djibouti on the Horn of Africa is large enough to host an aircraft carrier.

What do we know about China's rapid naval modernisation?

The PLA Navy, already the largest in the world, aims to operate six carriers by 2035 as part of its aggressive modernisation drive. Its newest and third carrier, the Fujian, is undergoing sea trials and is the first non-US carrier to feature an advanced electromagnetic catapult launch system, which allows for higher-frequency aircraft launches.

According to Koh, China's carrier programme is evolving rapidly, with the Fujian's successor – referred to as the Type 004 – expected to be of a similar or larger size. Should the reactor project prove successful, future Chinese carriers "will all be nuclear-powered", he reportedly added.

In March, Yuan Huazhi, political commissar for the PLA Navy, confirmed that work on a fourth carrier was in progress, with an announcement on whether it would feature nuclear propulsion expected "soon".

What are the strategic implications?

Alex Bristow, senior analyst at the Australian Strategic Policy Institute, told the South China Morning Post that nuclear-powered carriers would solidify the PLA Navy's status as a "first-tier" rival to the US Navy.

While noting that an aircraft carrier's chances of survival in a major US-China conflict were "debatable", Bristow said that they could still play an important role in other scenarios, enabling Beijing to signal strength and exert force, particularly against weaker adversaries.

Resumption of Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage discussed during recent India-China foreign ministers' meeting

20 November 2024, Tibetan Review

While China said it discussed the resumption of direct flights, exchange of journalists, and facilitation of visa issuance process during its foreign minister Wang Yi's meeting with Indian External Affairs Minister EAM S Jaishankar on the sidelines of the G20 Summit in Brazil's Rio de Janeiro on Nov 19,

India says it also discussed steps to resume the Kailash Mansarovar Yatra pilgrimage.

A press release issued by the Indian foreign ministry said the two sides discussed steps to resume the Kailash-Mansarovar Yatra pilgrimage.

Mansarovar is a freshwater lake in eastern Tibet near Mount Kailash, and both are places of pilgrimage attracting Hindu and other devotees from India and neighbouring countries.

"Among the steps discussed were the resumption of the Kailash Mansarovar Yatra pilgrimage, data sharing on trans-border rivers, direct flights between India and China, and media exchanges," the press release read.

The two leaders also discussed maintaining peace and tranquillity at the Line of Actual Control (LAC), following a recent thaw in ties after PM Narendra Modi and Chinese leader Xi Jinping met in Russia's Kazan on the sidelines of the BRICS Summit, reported the wionews.com Nov 19.

"The Ministers recognized that the disengagement in our border areas had contributed to the maintenance of peace and tranquillity. The discussions focused on the next steps in India-China relations. It was agreed that a meeting of the Special Representatives and of the Foreign Secretary-Vice Minister mechanism will take place soon," the press release said.

Stating India's position on global and regional issues, the Indian foreign ministry also said, "EAM said that we are strongly committed to a multipolar world, including a multipolar Asia. Where India is concerned, its foreign policy has been principled and consistent, marked by independent thought and action. We are against unilateral approaches to establish dominance. India does not view its relationships through the prism of other nations."

The Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage stopped in 2020 after the onset of the Covid-19 pandemic. The year also saw Sino-India relation plummet after the Galwan Valley clash in eastern Ladakh. As a result, the officially organized pilgrimage never resumed, with Indians wishing to take privately arranged pilgrimage through Nepal also being effectively prevented by China.

Need to focus on cooperation, not conflict: Rajnath tells Chinese minister

20 November 2024, Business Standard

Emphasises confidence building between India and China through de-escalation

Defence Minister Rajnath Singh met his Chinese counterpart, Admiral Dong Jun, in Vientiane, Lao Peoples' on Wednesday – i.e. November 20 – on the sidelines of 11th ASEAN Defence Ministers' Meeting-Plus that begins on Thursday.

This was the first meeting between the two defence ministers following the recent disengagement agreements. It is also the first meeting since Prime Minister Narendra Modi met Chinese President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the BRICS summit.

Rajnath Singh also met his Malaysian counterpart Dato Seri Mohamed Khaled Bin Nordin and the Defence Minister of Laos, General Chansamone Chanyalath in Vientiane on Wednesday, on the sidelines of 11th ASEAN Defence Ministers' Meeting (ADMM) Plus.

ADMM-Plus is a regional security platform for the ten ASEAN member states: Brunei, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, and Vietnam. In addition there are eight dialogue partners (India, US, China, Russia, Japan, South Korea, Australia and New Zealand) to strengthen security and defence cooperation.

Rajnath said that amicable relations between India and China, the two largest nations in the world, would have positive implications for global peace and prosperity. Considering that both countries are neighbours, Rajnath mentioned that "we need to focus on cooperation rather than conflict".

Rajnath called for learning lessons from the Sino-Indian border clashes of 2020, safeguarding peace and tranquillity, and preventing the recurrence of such incidents along the India-China border.

The Indian defence minister said he looked forward to greater trust and confidence building between the two sides through de-escalation. Both sides agreed to draw up a roadmap for rebuilding mutual trust and understanding.

Earlier in the day, the Indian Defence Minister Rajnath Singh arrived at Vientiane on a three-day visit. He will attend the 11th ADMM-Plus meeting on Thursday and address the forum on regional and international security issues.

Rajnath Singh said that amicable India-China relations would be good for global peace and prosperity. He said there was a need to focus on cooperation rather than conflict.

China's foreign minister meets Indian counterpart, calls for resumption of direct flights

19 November 2024, Reuters

China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi met his Indian counterpart Subrahmanyam Jaishankar on Monday in Rio de Janeiro, a statement from his ministry said on Tuesday, during which he called for the resumption of direct flights between the two countries.

Wang also talked of the need for "more mutual trust and less suspicion," between the regional rivals, the statement added. The countries last month began implementing an agreement to end a military standoff on each side of the disputed Himalayan border.

Wang also urged the Indian side to step up cooperation on exchanging journalists and facilitating visas.

EAM Jaishankar Emphasizes De-escalation as Next Step in Sino-Indian Relations After Disengagement

16 November 2024, Republic World

Jaishankar says disengagement with China along the LAC is complete, with de-escalation as the next step, but cautions against expecting a reset in ties.

The disengagement part of the "problem" with China along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh has been put at rest and the focus should now be on de-escalation, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar said on Saturday.

Disengagement and Its Implications

Jaishankar said it is "reasonable" to expect some improvement in the relations between India and China following the final round of disengagement but hesitated to say that there could be a reset of the ties.

"I see disengagement as disengagement; nothing more, nothing less. If you look at our current situation with China, we have an issue where our troops are uncomfortably close along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) which required us to disengage," he said at the HT Leadership Summit.

The understanding between India and China on October 21 was the last of the disengagement agreements, Jaishankar said.

"So that with its implementation, the disengagement part of the problem is at rest," he said.

India-China Ties: No Reset Yet

Jaishankar's remarks came in response to a question on whether the disengagement of troops by the two sides last month was the beginning of a reset of the Sino-Indian ties.

The external affairs minister said the current situation of the relationship does not warrant such a conclusion.

Indian and Chinese militaries completed the disengagement exercise in Demchok and Depsang in eastern Ladakh along the LAC last month after the two sides reached an agreement to resolve the festering border row.

The two sides also resumed patrolling activities in the two areas after a gap of almost four-and-a-half years.

Next Step: De-escalation

In his remarks, Jaishankar said de-escalation should be the next step following the completion of the disengagement process.

"Where the disengagement will lead us, it is a reasonable supposition that there will be some improvement in the ties," he said.

Differing Views on China within the Government

On the overall India-China ties, Jaishankar delved into various factors and said it is a "complicated" relationship.

To another question on whether the economic and security wings of the government have divergent views on China as this year's Economic Survey appeared to pitch for greater economic engagement with the neighbouring country, Jaishankar said there could be different points of view but overall relationship is guided by a policy decision.

"I think an accurate way of looking at it is that in every government, different ministries have different responsibilities, and flowing from that responsibility, they have a point of view," he said.

"You referred to an Economic Survey. In effect, there would be a national security survey which you may not see in public, which would have a national security point of view," he said.

Jaishankar said the external affairs ministry is an integrator of all points of views and takes an overall balanced approach.

"If somebody has a point of view, then we look at that point of view. We don't say you can't have that point of view, but a point of view at the end of the day is not a policy decision," he said.

India's Political Stability and Global Impact

To a separate question, the external affairs minister said the world is looking at India's political stability, especially at a time when most countries in the world are facing political instability.

"At such a time, being elected three times in a row in a democracy is not an ordinary thing," he said about the result of the parliamentary election this year.

US Election and Global Engagement

On Republican leader Donald Trump's victory in the US presidential election, Jaishankar said it reflected a lot about the US.

"This US election tells us a lot about America. It tells us that many of the concerns and priorities that won Donald Trump a first term have become more intense, not gone away," he said.

The external affairs minister also said he does not think that the US would turn its back on the world.

"If you are the number one power, you have to remain engaged with the world, but the terms you are offering to the world are going to be different from the terms which were there," he said.

Ambitious India-US Partnerships

The external affairs minister said ambitious projects like the India-US initiative on Critical and Emerging Technologies (iCET) are unlikely to be impacted under the new government in Washington.

"I think we are going to see that as a structural trend and, my own sense is, if President Trump is determined to make America more competitive and brings to it a strong element of business viability, I think such an America will actually look for partners with whom it can work in a complementary fashion," he said.

India's Role in Russia-Ukraine Conflict

On the Russia-Ukraine conflict and India's efforts to find a peaceful solution to it, Jaishankar said a solution cannot be found on the battlefield.

"What we have been trying to do is to have conversations, in good faith, with the understanding that common points or convergences in those conversations, if the other party was comfortable, we were prepared to share it with the other side," he said.

"We have not put forward a peace plan. We do not think it is our business to do that. Our business is to try to find a way of bringing these two countries to a point where they are able to engage, because, at the end of the day, they have to engage with each other," he said.

China accused of trying to stifle India's growth with export restrictions

While the Oct 21 deal on eastern Ladakh disengagement and patrolling with China was hailed by some in India as a "breakthrough", the two countries still have a lot of ground to cover before normalizing their overall bilateral ties, as is evident in their ongoing trade frictions.

In its latest attempt to curb India's industrial growth, China has imposed export restrictions on essential minerals and machinery, ranging from gallium and germanium, critical for solar power and semiconductors, to tunnel-boring machines (TBMs) used in infrastructure projects like metro construction, reported swarajyamag.com Nov 15.

In Aug 2023, China imposed tight controls on the export of gallium and germanium to countries including India, the US, and Japan. These minerals are vital for India's rapidly growing renewable energy sector, especially in the production of solar cells and modules.

China, the world's largest supplier, has now cut off access to these crucial resources, jeopardizing India's ability to meet its solar power production targets, the report said.

India currently circumvents China's ban by rerouting the shipment of these supplies through Dubai's Jebel Ali port. Dubai-based traders or companies lease or import machinery from China, then re-export them to India, the report said.

However, the rerouting process has inflated project costs by as much as 10%. Besides, what was once a 15-day shipping cycle is now stretching to three months, causing significant delays. Furthermore, additional costs arise due to logistics, warehousing, and financing, all of which strain the already tight budgets for strategic infrastructure projects in India, the report noted.

Apart from other costs as well arising from the payment system and so forth, spare parts, often sourced through third-party intermediaries, add to the financial burden.

Besides, experts caution that the current workaround is unsustainable in the long term. Relying on Dubai as a middleman is a temporary fix to China's economic bullying, the report said.

Experts argue that India must focus on building domestic manufacturing capabilities for these vital components. Only then can India fully decouple its reliance on foreign suppliers, especially when China's restrictions may continue to disrupt supply chains in the future, the report said.

During a Delhi Metro ride late last month, India's Commerce and Industry Minister Piyush Goyal informed visiting German Vice Chancellor Robert Habeck that New Delhi may halt the purchase of German-made tunnel boring machines if issues such as China blocking sales continued. This conversation, shared in a video that went viral on social media platform X, underscoring India's concerns over critical infrastructure supplies.

Goyal explained that India currently buys tunnel boring machines from Herrenknecht, a German company. However, recent complications had arisen as China, a key production base for Herrenknecht, had obstructed the sale of these machines to India, noted newsx.com Oct 28.

India, on its part, was recently reported to have stopped importing manufactures from Nepal, and possibly other countries, if they included Chinese components.

Rajnath Singh, Chinese counterpart likely to meet for 1st time after border truce

14 November 2024, India Today

India China Relations: The meeting comes as the Indian and Chinese armies completed the first round of joint patrols in Demchok and Dopsang along the Line of Actual Control in eastern Ladakh following disengagement in these areas.

Defence Minister Rajnath Singh is expected to meet his Chinese counterpart Dong Jun next week, in what could be the first interaction at the ministerial level between the two nations after the Line of Actual Control (LAC) disengagement at eastern Lakakh. The meeting will take place on the sidelines of the ASEAN Defence Ministers Plus (ADMM-Plus).

Earlier this month, India and China conducted a joint patrol at the friction points of Demchok and Depsang in eastern Ladakh, following a recent troop disengagement in the area. Both sides have agreed to a weekly coordinated patrol to manage tensions that have simmered since the 2020 clash in the Galwan Valley.

India, on October 21, announced that it reached an agreement with China on patrolling along the LAC, marking a breakthrough in ending the over four-year-long military standoff, which began following the deadly clashes between the troops of both countries in June 2020 in Galwan.

The ADMM-Plus is an annual meeting that will see participation from defence ministers of eight nations, including Australia, China, India, Japan, New Zealand, South Korea, Russia, and the United States. The last meeting between Defence Minister Rajnath Singh and his Chinese counterpart took place in April 2023 in India. Then Chinese Defence Minister Li Shangfu travelled to Delhi for the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation's defence ministers' meeting. The border issue was the main focus of the meeting.

Before the 2023 meeting, Defence Minister Rajnath Singh met with then Chinese Defence Minister General Wei Fenghe in Moscow during the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation meeting in 2020. This meeting occurred months after the deadly clashes in Galwan, Eastern Ladakh, in June of that year, which left 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers dead.

The upcoming talks in Laos are expected to witness discussions related to regional stability and border issues, building on the framework established by the LAC agreement.

As both nations navigate a complex bilateral relationship marked by border tensions and diplomatic negotiations, the meeting between Rajnath Singh and Dong Jun could play a crucial role in maintaining dialogue and promoting mutual understanding.

Earlier last month, Prime Minister Narendra Modi met Chinese President Xi Jinping in Russia on the sidelines of the BRICS summit just after the LAC agreement was signed.

Nepal's exports to India suffer due to latter's concern about Chinese components

11 November 2024, Tibetan Review

India's ties with today's seemingly China-beholden Nepal is not as friendly as it historically used to be, while the India-China ties are far from normal, with the Oct 21 Depsang and Demchok patrolling deal being only the first step in a long and arduous process. But whatever may be the case, manufacturers and exporters in Nepal say they are in a dilemma over trade with India following restrictive measures imposed on their goods by New Delhi which wanted to ensure they were free of Chinese components, reported the kathmandupost.com Nov 10.

The Nepali government is silent on the issue even though the goods have not been sold to India for months, the report said.

In 2020, the Indian government asked the Bureau of Indian Standards (BIS) to prescribe mandatory standards for imported goods in line with international quality norms. The move was stated to be aimed to prevent Chinese goods from entering India from any of its neighbours.

India-China relations plunged to their nadir since 1962 in mind-2020 following the Galwan valley clash in Ladakh in which 20 Indian and at least four Chinese soldiers lost their lives.

India imposed a series of economic measures against China, which included banning a large number of popular Chinese mobile apps. India also imposed import restrictions on more than 370 Chinese products, the report noted.

The report cited "insiders" as saying India does not want any products from Nepal that have Chinese components, including Nepal's hydroelectricity, greatly worrying Nepal's top exporters.

The BIS deals with the marking and certifying of goods, incorporating quality standards and information on international norms to be followed while importing.

Sanitary pads and diaper factories, for example, used to operate 12 hours a day when the demand in India boomed, but due to the export obstacles, factories have reduced operating hours by 4 hours, Dol Raj Adhikari, president of the Nepal Sanitary and Diaper Association, has said. Adhikari owns the AG Health Industries Private Limited that produces sanitary pads and diapers in Bhairahawa.

According to the association, Nepal used to export three truckloads of sanitary pads and diapers daily. There are 29 sanitary pads and diaper factories in Nepal, large and small, employing 6,000 workers, the report said.

Likewise, a big consignment of Goldstar shoes failed to get export clearance after India refused to issue the BIS certificate, putting Nepal's home-grown shoemaker on the brink, the report said.

The BIS certificate issue is stated to have put the industries in Rupandehi in a big dilemma. "They were opened to export goods to India," Thakur Kumar Shrestha, president of the Siddhartha Chamber of Commerce and Industry, has said, adding, it has negatively impacted both the industries and Nepal's trade.

He has said factories were either running at half capacity or getting shut down, with workers being laid off.

Exports from the cement makers in Rupandehi—such as Arghakhanchi Cement, Sarbottam Cement, Palpa Cement, and Balaji Cement—have completely stopped for nearly two months, the report said.

Except plywood, the export of all the listed goods that require a BIS certificate has come to a halt, Shrestha has said. “India has neither renewed the certificate nor provided a new one.”

Plywood has been given until Mar 2025 for certification-free export, the report said.

Out of 80 plywood factories, 52 had deposited charges to obtain the BIS certificate. However, after completing the process in June, the inspection team from India has not provided a BIS certificate so far, Hom Prasad Ghimire, president of the Nepal Plywood Manufacturers Association, has said. The plywood industry employs 25,000 workers across Nepal.

Posh Raj Pandey, chairman of the South Asia Watch of Economics, Environment and Trade, has said lack of coordination among government agencies and frequent changes of bureaucrats had put the issue on the back burner.

Indian Army denies reports China is causing deadlock in coordinating Depsang patrolling

09 November 2024, Tibetan Review

The Indian Army has on Nov 7 dismissed media reports that military talks between India and China on the modalities of patrols had reached a deadlock in eastern Ladakh's Depsang, saying no roadblocks or objections had been faced. It called the media reports “speculative and bereft of facts”. However, the tribuneindia.com said Nov 7 that it stood by its Nov 6 news story.

In a post on X on Thursday (Nov 7), the Additional Directorate General of Public Information of the Army said some reports on Wednesday and Thursday had speculated about roadblocks in the disengagement process in Depsang and Demchok after an agreement between India and China last month.

“It is unambiguously stated that the disengagement at Depsang and Demchok has been completed and implementation of consensus, as agreed to, is being undertaken in a planned manner that includes resumption of patrolling to traditional patrolling areas. There are no roadblocks/objections from either side that have been faced in this process,” the ndtv.com quoted the Army as saying.

“The articles published in this regard are speculative and bereft of facts. The concerned media houses are requested to verify and authenticate facts before publishing such sensitive articles and exercise due editorial discretion so that no unsubstantiated or misleading information is propagated,” the post was further quoted as saying.

The report also quoted India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar as having said earlier, “We reached an agreement on patrolling, and we have gone back to the 2020 position. With that, we can say the disengagement with China has been completed... There are areas which, for various reasons after 2020, they blocked us, we blocked them. We have now reached an understanding which will allow patrolling as we had been doing till 2020.”

Earlier, in its Nov 6 report, the tribuneindia.com said, citing unnamed sources, that the two sides had reached a deadlock over the “extent and routes of patrolling” at Depsang along the Line of Actual Control (LAC). It said this had happened during the two sides' negotiations on the modalities of patrols at patrolling points (PPs) 10, 11, 11-A, 12 and 13 on the eastern edge of Depsang.

The report said the Chinese side had raised two issues. Firstly, it had reservations about the Indian Army going full extent on the PPs 10 and 11 routes. Secondly, it had reservations about the extent (distance) of patrol on PPs 11A, 12 and 13.

In its clarification, the tribuneindia.com said Nov 7: “The Army, in its response, has not said patrolling has started on all routes in Depsang. The news item did not question consensus or disengagement process. It only said China was delaying modalities. It did not say the Indian Army was ‘not abiding’ by the consensus.”

'Other steps could happen': EAM Jaishankar on India-China ties after LAC disengagement

03 November 2024, Times of India

External affairs minister S Jaishankar said Sunday that India and China have made “some progress” in disengaging along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), calling it a “welcome” move that could lead to further positive steps in the relationship. His remarks come after Indian and Chinese troops recently completed disengagement at two major friction points—Demchok and Depsang Plains—in eastern Ladakh.

The minister said that following a recent meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping in Russia, plans were set for further discussions involving India's national security advisor and the foreign ministry. “So that's where things are,” he noted, adding that the disengagement “opens up the possibility that other steps could happen.”

“In terms of India and China, yes, we have made some progress,” Jaishankar said during an interaction with the Indian diaspora in Brisbane. “Our relations were very, very disturbed for reasons all of you know. We have made some progress in what we call disengagement, which is when troops were very close to each other, with the possibility that could lead to some untoward incident.”

The disengagement process, which saw Indian forces beginning verification patrolling at Depsang and Demchok on Friday, is seen as a significant step towards resolving lingering border issues from the 2020 standoff. The LAC had seen large deployments of Chinese troops, a move countered by India, and this increase in forces on both sides contributed to heightened tensions.

“There are very large numbers of Chinese troops deployed along the Line of Actual Control who were not there before 2020. And we, in turn, have counter-deployed,” Jaishankar added.

This new agreement on patrolling and disengagement was formalised after several rounds of talks, Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri had earlier said, marking a potential breakthrough to end the four-year standoff along the LAC. The Galwan Valley clash in June 2020 had deeply strained relations between the two countries, making disengagement and talks essential steps in normalising ties.

Jaishankar, in Brisbane on the first leg of a two-nation tour, also addressed global issues, including conflicts in Ukraine and the Middle East, expressing concern over their impact on global stability. Highlighting India’s role in promoting diplomacy, he said Prime Minister Modi had been actively involved in discussions with leaders of Russia and Ukraine. “We are trying to do something in both,” Jaishankar stated, emphasising India’s commitment to a diplomatic resolution in both regions.

On the Middle East, he said that India is attempting to prevent further escalation of tensions, pointing out the challenges in mediating between Iran and Israel due to a lack of direct communication. “At the moment, the effort is more to prevent the conflict from spreading,” he said, hinting at India’s involvement without divulging specific details.

Touching upon the Quad alliance, Jaishankar explained that the grouping of India, Australia, Japan, and the United States is focused on a broad agenda that includes maritime security, connectivity, and climate forecasting, among other areas. “You have four democracies, four market economies, four countries with a strong record of global contributions,” he said, underscoring the Quad’s broader purpose.

During his Australian visit, Jaishankar will inaugurate India’s fourth consulate in the country and co-chair the 15th Foreign Ministers’ Framework Dialogue with Australian Foreign Minister Penny Wong in Canberra.

China is building new villages on its remote Himalayan border. Some appear to have crossed the line

05 November 2024, CNN World, Simone McCarthy and Nectar Gan

High in the mist-shrouded Himalayas, a winding mountain road opens to a clearing in the pine forested valley, revealing rows of uniform Tibetan-style houses, each topped with a Chinese flag.

Construction is booming in this remote place. Piles of logs and other building materials line the road. On a nearby hillside, cranes tower over rising housing blocks.

“They are building resettlement houses here,” says the Chinese travel vlogger who captured these scenes last year, speaking into his phone on a roadside. “When people live and settle here, it undeniably confirms that this is our country’s territory.”

But the village – known as Demalong and formally founded in March last year with a community of 70 families, according to a government notice seen in the footage – is not only located in territory claimed by the world’s ascendent superpower.

It is one of a string of Chinese settlements that also fall well within the border shown on official maps of Bhutan – a Buddhist kingdom of fewer than 1 million people that’s never agreed on a formal international border with China.

For centuries, herders looking for summer pastures were the main presence in this harsh and inhospitable region some 14,000 feet (4,200 meters) above sea level in the eastern Himalayas. But now, there is a growing population as the Chinese government incentivizes hundreds of people to settle there from across Tibet, the region of China that borders Bhutan.

Those settlements show another, quieter front in China’s expanding efforts to assert its control over disputed, peripheral territories – also playing out in the South and East China Seas – as Chinese leader Xi Jinping seeks to bolster national security and enhance China’s position over its rivals.

Bhutan and China have been holding yet-unresolved border talks for decades. Looming in the backdrop of those discussions is India, China’s biggest regional rival and Bhutan’s close diplomatic ally.

The nuclear-armed neighbors have previously gone to war and more recently engaged in a series of skirmishes over their disputed 2,100-mile (3,379-kilometer) border, which straddles Bhutan – and, in Beijing’s eyes, makes the small Himalayan nation all the more critical to its national security.

CNN has reviewed satellite images provided by Earth data company Planet Labs, as well as Chinese government notices, state media reports, and social media footage, which together reveal extensive development in a valley China calls the Jigenong, or Jakarlung in Tibetan. Locations of the construction were provided to CNN by modern Tibet studies expert Robert Barnett of SOAS University of London. CNN has geolocated four officially named villages and a fifth settlement using satellite images and videos in state and social media.

A comparison of China's official map of the Tibet Autonomous Region and Bhutan's national map published in its 2023 Statistical Yearbook show this development is located in territory claimed by both countries.

Bhutanese authorities, however, have repeatedly rejected previous reports of Chinese encroachment, including in a foreign media interview last year when then-Prime Minister Lotay Tshering "categorically" denied that China had been building in Bhutan's territory.

In response to a request for comment from CNN about the construction and its territorial claims, Bhutan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and External Trade said there were "no Chinese settlements" in its northern district of Lhuntse, where CNN identified the villages.

"The map of Bhutan covering the northern border will be finalized in accordance to the demarcation of the Bhutan-China border," the ministry's statement said. It also pointed to the two countries' boundary talks and said Bhutan was "confident that the northern border will be finalized in the near future." China's foreign ministry did not deny building villages in disputed territory when approached by CNN for comment on the construction.

"China's construction activities in the border region with Bhutan are aimed at improving the local livelihoods," a ministry statement said. "China and Bhutan have their own claims regarding the territorial status of the relevant region, but both agree to resolve differences and disputes through friendly consultations and negotiations."

New research shared in advance with CNN by a team led by SOAS' Barnett extensively tracks the Chinese construction of what the researchers classified as 19 "cross-border villages" and three smaller settlements since 2016.

The construction has taken place in border regions in northeast Bhutan and the west of the kingdom – near the disputed border between India and China, according to the research. The findings, also described by Barnett in The Diplomat, add to his 2021 Foreign Policy magazine report on earlier construction in the same northern area – and document what the latest research describes as a new "surge" in building there since early last year. Archival research by Barnett suggests Bhutan's claims in this northern region stretch back much farther than China's, he says. An official Chinese map from 1980 seen by CNN also shows the northern area as part of Bhutan.

"China, as the most powerful player in the relationship, seems to be conducting an experiment about whether it can more or less decide for itself whether or when it is entitled to take ownership of territory disputed with a neighbor ... and how and if the international community will respond," Barnett told CNN.

High-altitude rivalry

The blurry boundaries through the Himalayan peaks and plateaus separating China and its southern neighbors are often relics of imperial era agreements and nomadic routes – now charged with the nationalist rhetoric and military might of New Delhi and Beijing.

Landlocked by both, Bhutan has long navigated carefully between India – its largest development and trading partner, which until 2007 effectively controlled its foreign policy – and China, an economic and military giant with whom it has no formal diplomatic ties.

Bhutan's place in their dispute was thrown into the spotlight in 2017, when the kingdom accused the Chinese army of building a road "inside Bhutanese territory" in the Doklam area, near a strategic and disputed junction between all three countries along Bhutan's west.

Then, Indian troops moved into the area to block China – sparking a tense, 73-day standoff that threatened to pitch the rivals into conflict.

Though not part of India's territorial claims, Doklam is close to the so-called "chicken's neck," or Siliguri Corridor, a vital artery between New Delhi and its far northeastern states. China claims Doklam has been its territory "since ancient times."

Ultimately diffused, the incident was one more reminder for Beijing of the volatility of the unresolved border.

India and China reached an agreement on military disengagement along a section of their disputed border earlier this month – in a step toward easing tensions there.

However, strengthening its position in that rivalry has been a driving force for Beijing, experts say, as it extends its foothold in lands traditionally claimed by Bhutan – and enlists its citizens to relocate there to press its counterclaim.

CNN has reached out to India's Ministry of External Affairs for comment on the Chinese construction.

"Knowing India has a strong presence in Bhutan, China naturally becomes vulnerable in the bordering region,” said Rishi Gupta, assistant director at the Asia Society Policy Institute in New Delhi.

“This vulnerability compels China to enhance its influence in Bhutan and assert its territorial claims more aggressively, seeking to counterbalance India’s strategic partnerships in the area.”

One year prior to the 2017 standoff, Beijing was already starting a major bid to bolster its claims by building roads and villages in the Jakarlung valley – along another China-Bhutan frontier far to the northeast of Doklam.

The buildup follows what observers say were long-standing efforts by China to convince Bhutan’s leaders to cede their claims in the west around Doklam – in exchange for Beijing giving up its claims to the northern areas.

In 2016, China founded Jieluobu, its first official village in the Jakarlung valley. Two years later, Jieluobu was branded a model “border xiaokang village” – one of hundreds of such villages built or upgraded in recent years along China’s western and southern frontiers.

The “xiaokang” – or “moderate prosperity” – villages along China’s borders have been billed as part of Beijing’s scheme to eradicate poverty and improve living conditions in its far-flung frontiers.

But experts say these villages are also part of Xi’s vision to use civilian settlements to solidify control of China’s border, amid perceived threats of foreign encroachment and infiltration – and a growing obsession with security.

“Only when there are people can the border remain stable,” the leader is often quoted as saying by officials in frontier regions.

By 2022, more than 600 “border xiaokang villages” – including Jieluobu – had been completed in Tibet, boosting its border population by 10.5%, the regional government said in its annual work report.

“It is no doubt that the villages are aimed to strengthen China’s territorial claims and control of the border regions, especially the disputed areas,” said Yun Sun, director of the China program at the Stimson Center think tank in Washington.

“Once the Chinese villagers are there, China has causes for stationing troops and performing administrative control. The strategy has a long history in China, tracing back as early as the Han dynasty,” she said.

No place anybody would choose

Chinese construction that began in the Jakarlung valley in 2016 has ramped up since last year relative to earlier periods, according to the research by SOAS’s Barnett, based on satellite imagery.

In the west, construction began around 2019 but appeared to have stopped after 2022, the research found. For that reason, CNN’s reporting has focused on development in the area along Bhutan’s northern border.

As of this summer, more than 2,000 residential units – estimated to have space for thousands of people – had been built in multiple settlements across both areas, according to the report.

That buildup has also been supported by an expanding network of roads, which geointelligence researcher Damien Symon says have progressed south from China into Bhutan over recent years.

“None of the roads connect into Bhutan, they start from the Chinese border and end in forest areas. There is no connectivity to existing Bhutanese roads or villages,” said Symon, of analysis collective The Intel Lab, who in a December 2023 report for London-based think tank Chatham House tracked new Chinese construction “across the contested border with Bhutan” in the north.

Road access is crucial for new settlements in the Jakarlung valley, which Chinese reports say used to be cut off from the outside world by heavy snow for half the year.

“These are not places anybody would normally choose to relocate to, because they are either extremely high or extremely exposed to the elements,” Barnett said.

To populate the cold, damp valley, officials in Tibet entice settlers from across the region with spacious new homes and generous subsidies.

In Jieluobu, the Tibetan herders moved into two-story houses with courtyards. Residents aged 16 and older are eligible for an annual subsidy of more than 20,000 yuan (about $2,800), state media reported. Patriotic education is part of everyday life in Jieluobu. In 2021, the village held 150 study sessions on Xi’s speeches, party policies and history, Mandarin Chinese and border defense, state media reported. Since then, the village has also undergone a major expansion.

Meanwhile, in the southeastern part of the valley, Demalong has added 235 new homes since last year and aims to build a kindergarten and a clinic, according to government statements. It also has a military compound, the travel blogger’s video shows. In between Jieluobu and Demalong, China has constructed more settlements along the valley, recently completing two new villages: Qujielong and Semalong. CNN has also geolocated a fifth settlement that has yet to be named in official notices. Since late September, a new wave of residents has moved into Demalong, Jieluobu, Semalong and Qujielong from as far as Nagqu, a city in northern Tibet some seven hours’ drive away, according to a local government notice and videos shared by relocatees on Chinese social media.

The new families, arriving in long columns of vans, coaches and trucks escorted by police cars, were greeted by red banners and traditional Tibetan dances, social media footage shows.

'No intrusion'

Bhutan has repeatedly denied that Chinese construction has taken place in its territory.

Asked in March last year about reports of China building in the kingdom's north, then-Prime Minister Lotay Tshering told Belgian outlet La Libre, "We are not making a big deal of it because it's not in Bhutan."

"We have said categorically that there is no intrusion as mentioned in the media," he said. "This is an international border and we know exactly what belongs to us."

In a separate interview with India's The Hindu about six months later, the former prime minister, whose government was replaced in elections earlier this year, reiterated that "there are no real differences between China and Bhutan, but there is an un-demarcated border dating back to Tibet-Bhutan ties," referring to the period before Tibet's 1951 official annexation by Beijing.

As early as 2020, Bhutan's ambassador to India said there was "no Chinese village inside Bhutan," following Indian media reports about such development in the kingdom's western borderlands.

That appears to be in sharp contrast to recent decades when Bhutan repeatedly protested what it claimed were incursions into its territory by Chinese soldiers and Tibetan herders. In 1997, Thimphu told Beijing that Tibetan herdsman had been intruding into the Jakarlung valley and even constructed sheds there, according to Bhutan's National Assembly records cited by Barnett.

In a 1998 pact, the two countries agreed to maintain the status quo in the border region as they continue talks to resolve the "boundary question."

Observers say Bhutan's rhetoric on this issue has become increasingly opaque in recent years, and some wonder whether the kingdom's muted comments are because it's already reached a tacit understanding with China to give up some territorial claims.

Others suggest Bhutan's priority may be to keep relations stable so they can finally reach a deal – with the potential to ease the uncertainty of the countries' power imbalance and bring the economic benefits of normalized ties.

"Most Bhutanese would love to see the borders demarcated and settled and a new chapter of friendly relations with China," said Bhutanese scholar Karma Phuntsho.

But while Bhutan remains "keen to solve the border issues with China," the remote border areas have little impact on Bhutanese peoples' livelihoods, so, "the countries are taking time to reach the best mutually beneficial solutions," he added.

Other observers take a more pointed view.

The Bhutanese "have realized that they have no way in which they can get back anything which the Chinese have occupied, and they lack the capacity ... to police the border, let alone the military capacity to retrieve anything from the border," said Manoj Joshi, a distinguished fellow at the Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi.

"So at one level, they have taken the position that they will try and resolve the border issue ... pending that settlement, they don't want anything to come up."

Despite the negotiations over the decades, the kingdom has already shed land to China.

Bhutan's official maps have lost a parcel of land to its northwest and the Menchuma valley and plateau in its northeast, according to Barnett. That northwest parcel, which includes Kula Kangri mountain, is often cited as covering some 400 square kilometers (154 sq miles).

In its response to CNN, Bhutan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and External Trade said these two areas "are not inside of Bhutan."

"These areas fall north to the traditional boundary between Bhutan and China," its statement said.

Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs

In 2021, Bhutanese and Chinese officials agreed to a "road map" to expedite settling their border. They picked up formal talks last October for the first time since the Doklam standoff, with Bhutan's foreign minister making a rare visit to Beijing.

There, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi assured counterpart Tandi Dorji that Beijing was ready to "fix and develop China-Bhutan friendly relations in legal form."

In its response to CNN, China's foreign ministry said the "two sides are actively seeking a boundary demarcation arrangement that is acceptable to both, in accordance with the principle of fairness, rationality, mutual understanding and mutual accommodation."

Regardless of how each side defines the location of these developments, they appear to be part of a long-term plan for China to strengthen its position and apply pressure along the yet un-demarcated border.

This year, a local government chief from a county in Tibet has visited the villages in the Jakarlung valley at least twice to inspect construction projects and check in with residents.

During a visit in April, the official reminded local cadres and residents of their mission.

“(We’re) lacking oxygen but not spirit, enduring hardship without fear, overcoming higher altitudes with an even higher sense of purpose,” he said, quoting a 2020 speech by Xi.

Relationship between India and Tibet is centuries old: CM

05 November 2024, The Arunachal Times, Prem Chetry

“The relationship between India and Tibet is centuries old, and it is our responsibility to maintain and continue this relationship,” said Chief Minister Pema Khandu during the consecration and inauguration of the newly constructed Dukhang, the prayer hall of Thubchog Gatsel Ling (TGL) monastery, by His Holiness, the 104th Gaden Tripa-the throne holder of Gaden Monastery of the Gelug sect, Jetsun Lobsang Tenzin Palzangpo, from Gaden Monastery in Mundgod, Karnataka, here on Monday.

The Chief Minister further stated, “Monasteries are of great significance; we must learn the Bhoti script to understand more about the religion. The Nalanda tradition of Buddhism is important, as it went to Tibet and descended to Arunachal Pradesh.”

“I believe the Buddhist community of the Himalayan region has a strong devotion to the religion; however, this devotion needs to be transformed into wisdom, for which learning the Bhoti language, the Tibetan script, is essential,” he added. He noted that “Bhoti teachers have now been added to schools, and children are studying Bhoti.” He also announced that a scholarship provision will be introduced soon to support monks and nuns.

Also present on the occasion were Penpa Tsering, Sikyong of the Central Tibetan Administration, Government in Exile; Speaker Khenpo Sonam Tenphel; and Member of Parliament Geshe Atuk Tseten of the Central Tibetan Administration, Government in Exile.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering, in his address, said, “Use the monastery as a center of learning and align your mind with the teachings of Buddha. Since we lost our country in 1959, a series of misfortunes has befallen Tibet, followed by natural and man-made disasters, especially during the ten years of the Cultural Revolution from 1966 to 1976, when six thousand monasteries were destroyed across China and Tibet.” The Sikyong further expressed hope that the new monastery will ensure the continuity of the religion and impart spiritual wisdom among the masses in the region.

His Holiness Jetsun Lobsang Tenzin Palzangpo, in his address, said, “The consecration and inauguration have been completed; now what remains is to improve and continue the teachings of Buddha. The main goal from now on is to impart and practice the teachings of Buddha.”

“First and foremost is our health. If we are physically unwell, we cannot carry out our activities, so we need to take good care of it. Hence, we can use our bodies for good causes,” he added.

“His Holiness, the 14th Dalai Lama, always guides us. Proper upbringing of children is necessary, whether at school, at home, or in monasteries; we must take care of children’s upbringing,” His Holiness added.

Earlier, His Eminence, the 12th Guru Tulku Rinpoche of the monastery, said, “The monastery was established by my predecessor, the 11th Guru Tulku Rinpoche, and it has been a center of spirituality. The monastery will serve as a center of learning.”

MP Tapir Gao, while congratulating the people, said, “The monastery will serve to disseminate the teachings of Buddha, not only in Arunachal Pradesh but to the entire world.”

The foundation stone of the new prayer hall was laid by His Holiness, the 14th Dalai Lama, in 2017. Devotees from neighbouring Bhutan, MLAs from Tawang and West Kameng districts, and heads of departments also witnessed the ceremony.

Union minister Rijiju interacts with Chinese soldiers in Arunachal as eastern Ladakh disengagement set for completion

02 November 2024, Tibetan Review

In a culmination of the ongoing disengagement process in eastern Ladakh, India’s federal government minister Mr Kiren Rijiju has on Nov 1 interacted with soldiers of China’s People’s Liberation Army (PLA) near Tawang in Arunachal Pradesh along the India-Tibet border.

The interaction occurred when Rijiju, the Minister of Parliamentary Affairs as well as of Minority Affairs, and who belongs to the state, visited an Indian Army post on the occasion of Diwali. He celebrated India’s Hindu New Year festival of lights with Army jawans posted in Bumla on Oct 31.

The minister posted a video on X, formerly Twitter, where he could be seen talking to three PLA soldiers with the help of an interpreter.

He praised the kind of infrastructure built and other development works being carried out by the Indian government along the international border.

“After talking to Chinese soldiers and seeing the infrastructures, everyone will feel proud of India’s border development now,” the PTI news agency quoted him as saying Nov 1.

Rijiju’s interaction with the PLA soldiers came about 10 days after India’s Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri said that an agreement was finalised between India and China for a resolution of the issues that arose in 2020 in eastern Ladakh.

The agreement established a protocol on patrolling after disengagement of troops along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh, a breakthrough to end the more than four-year standoff there.

Following the completion of the disengagement process at the two friction points in eastern Ladakh, the Indian Army began patrolling at Demchok on Nov 1. Patrolling at Depsang, the other friction point where the disengagement process is almost complete, will commence soon, reported the indianexpress.com Nov 2 and the hindustantimes.com Nov 1.

The agreement, reached on Oct 21, marked a significant development in the pursuit of reduced tension along the LAC in eastern Ladakh since the fierce clash in the Galwan Valley in Jun 2020 that marked the most serious military conflict between the two sides in decades. The ties between the two Asian giants had nosedived following the clash.

Indian and Chinese border troops exchange Diwali sweets after Depsang and Demchok disengagement

On the occasion of Diwali, India's Hindu New Year festival of light, on Oct 31, Indian and Chinese troops have exchanged sweets on five locations along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), including two in Ladakh. It came a day after the two sides completed military disengagement from the Depsang and Demchok areas in eastern Ladakh, in line with an Oct 21 patrolling arrangement deal.

The deal was hailed in India as the beginning of the normalization of bilateral ties which plunged to their nadir in the middle of Jun 2020 when troops from the two sides clashed in the Galwan valley of India's Union Territory of Ladakh, resulting in the admitted deaths of 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers.

The exchange of Diwali sweets took place at Chushul Maldo and Daulat Beg Oldi in Ladakh, Banchha (near Kibutu) and Bumla in Arunachal Pradesh, and Nathula in Sikkim, reported the ndtv.com Oct 31.

The patrolling deal called for removal of military personnel and infrastructure, including temporary camps, from the Depsang plains and Demchok, and the withdrawal of troops to pre-Apr 2020 positions. They were the last two spots from which China had adamantly refused to withdraw its troops in a series of both diplomatic and military talks.

The deal will end nearly four years of military and diplomatic tension triggered by skirmishes and violent clashes in the Pangong Lake and Galwan regions in May-Jun 2020, the report hoped.

The completion of the ongoing disengagement verification process – to cross-check to ensure that the two sides have, indeed, withdrawn their troops as agreed – will be followed by steps to de-escalate the border situation, and the discussion of managing the borders, to be then followed by the normalization of bilateral ties.

All this depends on the restoration of trust between the two sides, which was severely dented by China's violation of a series of written agreements, as repeatedly noted by India's External Affairs Minister Mr S Jaishankar.

Jaishankar declined to give a timeline for the de-escalation, saying only it would not happen till Delhi is sure that its Beijing counterparts had honoured their side of the deal, the report noted.

De-escalation still remained a concern in other areas, including the Gogra-Hot Springs area in Ladakh, after Indian and Chinese forces backed down in September last year. China continues to hold large swathes of Indian territory to the north, in the Depsang plains area, the report said.

"After de-escalation, how to manage the borders will be discussed," Jaishankar has said.

Experts have cautioned India that China's current climb-down may be temporary, driven by its current economic difficulties and the resultant internal turmoil, and so not to normalize bilateral ties too quickly, as being sought by China.

Ambassador Xu Feihong of China has said that the meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the BRICS summit in Russia on Oct 23 was very important. They "reached many important understandings" which will be "the guidelines for the further development of relations between our two countries."

"I hope that, under the guidance of this consensus, our relations will be moving forward smoothly in the future and they will not be restricted or interrupted by specific disagreements between our two sides," moneycontrol.com Oct 31 quoted the ambassador saying on the NDTV news channel.

He has said he was "looking forward" to a future resumption of direct flights between India and his home country, which had remained suspended since 2020, something China has been seeking for some time.

Xu has also voiced optimism for increased collaboration between India and China across diverse sectors, such as trade, education, and scientific research. He emphasized that sustained progress in these domains would strengthen partnerships and mutual understanding between the two nations, contributing to a more cooperative regional environment, zeenews.india.com Oct 30 cited Xu as saying.

India's Defence Minister Rajnath Singh has described the border disengagement as a "major achievement" after years of diplomatic and military efforts. Addressing soldiers at Meghna Stadium in Tezpur, Assam, Singh has emphasized that the success was made possible by the dedication and bravery of India's armed forces.

"This is not a small development. After prolonged efforts, we have reached a consensus with China," ddnews.gov.in Oct 30 quoted Singh as saying, ahead of celebrating Diwali with the Indian troops in Tezpur.

Indian And Chinese Troops Gift Sweets At Contested Border

31 October 2024, Barron's

Indian and Chinese troops exchanged boxes of sweets on Thursday at two points on their contested high-altitude border, a week after the leaders of the Asian rivals held a rare meeting.

China and India, the world's two most populous nations, are intense rivals and have accused each other of trying to seize territory along their unofficial divide, known as the Line of Actual Control.

However, Chinese President Xi Jinping and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi met on the sidelines of a BRICS gathering in Russia on October 23, the pair's first formal meeting in five years.

In their meeting, Xi said they should "strengthen communication and cooperation", while Modi said "mutual trust" will guide ties with China.

It signalled a potential thaw between the nuclear-armed neighbours since clashes between their troops in 2020 over their border, which killed at least 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers.

On Thursday, photographs released by the Indian army showed soldiers shaking hands and handing gift-wrapped boxes of sweets in the rugged icy mountains of Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh, to mark India's Hindu festival of lights, Diwali.

After the 2020 clashes, more than 20 rounds of military talks were held.

Both sides pulled back tens of thousands of troops and agreed not to send patrols into a narrow dividing strip.

But two major points remained with troops and tanks on both sides staring at each other.

On October 21, days before Xi and Modi met, a deal was struck to pull back a few hundred soldiers deployed at forward positions, a term dubbed "disengagement", and resume military patrols.

An Indian army official who was not authorised to speak to journalists confirmed that "sweets were exchanged between troops of India and China at several border points on the occasion of Diwali".

Rajnath Singh, India's defence minister, said Thursday that New Delhi's "efforts will be to move the matter beyond disengagement", but added that that "will have to wait a little longer", the Press Trust of India news agency quoted him as saying.

India is wary of its northern neighbour, and disputes over their 3,500-kilometre (2,200-mile) frontier have been a perennial source of tension.

Rajnath Singh to celebrate Diwali with soldiers at Bum La Pass in China border

29 October 2024, Arunachal Observer

Defence Minister Rajnath Singh will visit Tawang district on October 31 to celebrate Diwali with soldiers posted along the India-China border, highly placed official sources told this daily on Monday.

Set against the stunning backdrop of the eastern Himalayas, Tawang has long symbolized India's commitment to securing its borders. Singh's visit comes at after India-China agreement on disengagement of deployed forces in Ladakh and both neighbouring nations achieved a breakthrough in patrolling the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in Eastern Ladakh.

In recent years, Tawang has become one of the focal points of friction, especially in areas like Yangtse, where troops of Indian Army and China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) has clashed in December 2022 leading to injuries on both sides.

During this incident, Indian Army had successfully prevented PLA soldiers from advancing their patrols into the Yangtse, reinforcing India's control over the sensitive region.

After the incident, both sides actively engaged in dialogue to de-escalate tensions around Yangtse. According to sources within the defence establishment, there is an emerging proposal to allow PLA patrols in designated areas, aiming for a controlled and mutually agreeable presence on both sides.

This diplomatic effort underscores a potential breakthrough in easing tensions in this disputed sector, as India and China seek ways to balance security with stability.

Before Singh's visit, Arunachal Pradesh Chief Minister Pema Khandu and Deputy Chief Minister Chowna Mein would also welcome the Indian Air Force's Uttarakhand War Memorial car rally that will reach Tawang on October 30. Diwali, a major Hindu festival, this year will be celebrated from October 29 to November 3.

The Defence Minister's move is to boost up the morale of soldiers who guard the frontier against all odds in inhospitable freezing locations. He had celebrated Vijaydashami on 24.10.23 with troops at Bum La Pass and extended his wishes to the troops. He had commended the soldiers for securing the borders in sub-minus temperatures at an altitude of 15,000 feet above sea level. Singh had emphasized the need to strengthen the country's security apparatus and highlighted the efforts being made by the government to enhance indigenous production of defense equipment. He also visited the 4 Corps Headquarters at Tezpur in Assam and reviewed the operational readiness of the troops.

Bum La, a border pass between China's Tsona County in Tibet and India's Tawang district, is 37-km away from Tawang district HQs Tawang, an agreed Border Personnel Meeting point for security forces of China and India also serves as a trading point between Arunachal Pradesh and Tibet since 2006.

The Bum La Pass road is historic as the PLA had invaded India during the 1962 Sino-India War and the pass had witnessed one of the fiercest battles, known as Battle of Bum La Pass. Arunachal Pradesh alone shares 1,129-km of total 3,488-km Indo-China border.

India: Border issues far from fully resolved, normalizing China ties to take time

28 October 2024, Tibetan Review

India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has said Oct 26 that the breakthrough agreement with China on patrolling arrangement along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh's Demchok and Depsang plains does not mean that all issues between the two countries have been resolved. However, the disengagement allows us to look at the next step, the PTI news agency Oct 27 cited him as saying.

Apart from that, normalizing relations will naturally take time and requires rebuilding a degree of trust and willingness to work together, Jaishankar has said at an event in Pune.

He has explained that when Prime Minister Narendra Modi met Chinese President Xi Jinping at Kazan in Russia on the sidelines of the BRICS summit, it was decided that the foreign ministers and National Security Advisors of the two countries would meet and see how to move forward.

"The latest step (of disengagement) was the Oct 21 understanding that patrolling will take place in Depsang and Demchok. This will allow us now to look at the next step. It is not like everything has been resolved but the disengagement which is the first phase we have managed to reach that level," Jaishankar has said.

While China's huge border infrastructure advantage in Tibet had given its People's Liberation Army the upper hand thus far, Jaishankar has said India has made great stride in recent years on its side of the border.

Over the decade, India improved its infrastructure, he has said, adding that part of the problem is that in the earlier years, the border infrastructure was really neglected.

"Today we have put in five times more resources annually than there used to be a decade ago which is showing results and enabling the military to actually be effectively deployed. The combination of these (factors) has led to where it is," he has said.

The Oct 21 deal on patrolling along the LAC in eastern Ladakh was a major breakthrough in ending the over four-year-long military standoff.

Since 2020, the situation on the border has been very disturbed which understandably negatively impacted the overall relationship. Since Sep 2020, India has been negotiating with the Chinese to find a solution, Jaishankar has said.

Emphasizing the immediate issues to be resolved before talking about any long-term settlement, Jaishankar has said one of the immediate pressing issues is disengagement because troops are very, very close to each other and the possibility of something happening existed.

Then there is de-escalation because of troop buildup on both sides, he has added.

And then "there is a larger issue of how you manage the border and negotiate the boundary settlement. Right now everything that's going on is concerning the first part which is disengagement," he has explained.

Meanwhile, following the agreement, the two countries have begun troop disengagement at the two friction points at Demchok and Depsang Plains in eastern Ladakh and this process is likely to be completed by Oct 28-29. This will be followed by the resumption of patrolling from both sides in accordance with the protocol reached during the Oct 21 deal.

Similar deal has not been reached on the other three or so troubled Tibet-border areas in Ladakh on which there has only been withdrawal of troops with moratorium on patrolling and creation of buffer zones reportedly on the Indian side as temporary solutions.

India and China disengaging at Ladakh border after reaching a patrolling deal

25 October 2024, Tibetan Review

In a promising start to the implementation of a patrolling arrangement reached between them recently, India and China have begun the disengagement of their troops at two critical friction points in the Eastern Ladakh sector – Demchok and Depsang Plains.

The development comes after India and China successfully negotiated an agreement to resolve their ongoing military standoff in eastern Ladakh, which began in 2020.

Disengagement process at the LAC started within hours after the two sides reached an agreement to end the nearly four-year military stand-off in eastern Ladakh. Some temporary tents from Depsang and Demchok have already been removed by both the countries, reported the firstpost.com Oct 25.

Apart from this, some temporary structures have also been dismantled in the area, with Indian soldiers moving back to the west side of the Charding Nala, and Chinese personnel retreating to the east side of the Nala, the report said.

The temporary posts and structures which were erected at both the face-off sites after May 2020 were now being dismantled in a “controlled manner as part of the modalities worked out by the tactical commanders on the ground,” the timesofindia.com Oct 25 cited its sources as saying.

It further cited the sources as saying the dismantling and pullback by the troops will take around a week’s time, following which, the local commanders will verify it physically on the ground before the coordinated patrolling begins.

There are about 10 to 12 temporary structures and around 12 tents on both sides, all of which are set to be removed. Once all tents and temporary structures have been fully removed, a joint verification process will begin, both on the ground and through aerial surveys, said Indiatoday.com Oct 25.

The Chinese army reduced the number of their vehicles in the area, and the Indian army also withdrew some troops in the area. After this process is completed, patrolling is expected to resume in Depsang and Demchok within the next 4-5 days, the report cited sources as saying.

The ongoing process is also in keeping with India’s Defence Minister Rajnath Singh’s remark Oct 24 that a “broad consensus” had been achieved to restore the “ground situation” in certain areas based on the principles of equal and mutual security.

The announcement of the deal, made by India on Oct 21, marked a major breakthrough, although experts have struck a note of caution, given China’s well established record of not abiding by deals.

The current disengagement process, carried out by local commanders, is being done as per broad terms decided at a senior level, the CNN-News18 Oct 25 cited sources as saying.

As per the “patrolling arrangements” deal, Chinese troops will no longer block Indian soldiers at the “Bottleneck” area in the strategically-located Depsang Plains, which is around 18-km inside what India considers its own territory, said the timesofindia.com report.

“The aim is to ensure no clashes and violence takes place.”

Discussions on the four buffer zones, including Galwan, have not yet taken place, said the Indiatoday.com report.

The announcement of the border patrolling deal was followed, on Oct 23, by a meeting between Prime Minister Narendra Modi and President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the 16th Brics Summit in Kazan city of Russia.

The two leaders issued directions to revive various bilateral dialogue mechanisms, signalling attempts to normalise ties that were affected by the mind-2020 military clash at Galwan in eastern Ladakh.

Two Nepalese nationals arrested in Lucknow for digital fraud linked to Chinese operative

25 October 2024. Times of India

In a late-night operation, the Uttar Pradesh Special Task Force (STF) arrested two Nepalese nationals in Lucknow for their involvement in extensive digital fraud operations using fake documents, especially ‘digital arrest’.

The suspects, Saroj Khanal from Dharan, Sunsari, and Shivram Rimal from Kathmandu, were apprehended near Saroj Hospital on Dubagga Road. They were reportedly meeting someone to arrange a bank account for transferring funds obtained through scams.

STF said that the two were connected to Chinese native Ben who is currently based in Nepal.

STF officials revealed that the duo was using fake identities, posing as Indian nationals Rahul Kumar and Pankaj Sridhar, with fabricated addresses in Lucknow’s Avash Vikas Yojna area. During the arrest, the STF seized two Nepalese passports, ID cards, forged Indian Aadhaar cards, and mobile phones.

Deputy SP of STF, Deepak Kumar Singh stated that the STF had been receiving multiple reports over the past few months about a gang posing as senior officials from various law enforcement agencies, including the Police, ED, and CBI. These individuals would intimidate victims, threatening them with false legal charges, including the concept of ‘digital arrest.’

“Further investigation revealed that Khanal and Rimal were connected to an individual named "Ben" from China, currently based in Nepal. Initially, they had collaborated with Ben in Dubai before returning to Nepal, where he introduced them to cybercrime. Operating in India with fake Aadhaar cards, they opened bank accounts and obtained SIM cards used for scamming activities. Ben facilitated their operations by transferring scammed money into these accounts and covering their living expenses in India through cryptocurrency commissions," said Singh.

The STF is now investigating other gang members and bank accounts linked to this extensive fraud operation. The electronic devices seized during the arrest will undergo forensic examination. A case has been registered at Para Police Station in Lucknow, with further legal actions in progress.

China and India should manage their differences, Xi tells Modi in first formal talks in 5 years

24 October 2024, NBC News

The two leaders' meeting on the sidelines of the BRICS summit in Russia came after a deal to resolve a four-year military standoff over their disputed Himalayan border.

Chinese President Xi Jinping and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi agreed on Wednesday to boost communication and cooperation between their countries and resolve conflicts to help improve ties that were damaged by a deadly military clash in 2020.

The two leaders met on the sidelines of the BRICS summit in Russia for their first formal talks in five years, signaling that ties between the Asian giants have begun to recover from the diplomatic rift caused by the clash along their disputed Himalayan frontier.

India and China, two of the world's biggest economies, have maintained strong trade ties despite the military and diplomatic tensions. The rapprochement is expected to boost Chinese investment in India.

India said the two leaders have directed their officials to take further steps to stabilize all aspects of bilateral ties.

The Xi-Modi meeting in the city of Kazan came two days after New Delhi said it had reached a deal with Beijing to resolve the four-year military standoff in the Himalayan region of Ladakh, although neither side has shared details of the pact.

The two sides should strengthen communication and cooperation, resolve conflicts and differences, and realize each other's development dreams, Chinese state broadcaster CCTV reported Xi as telling Modi.

Modi put forward ideas for improving and developing bilateral relations, to which Xi agreed in principle, CCTV added without elaborating.

In response, Modi told Xi that peace, stability, mutual trust and respect were crucial for relations.

"We welcome the agreement on the issues that had come up over the last four years," Modi told Xi in comments aired on India's state broadcaster Doordarshan.

"It should be our priority to maintain peace and tranquility on the border. Mutual trust, mutual respect and mutual sensitivity should be the basis of our relationship," Modi said.

Relations between the world's two most populous nations – both nuclear powers – have been strained since a clash between their troops on the largely undemarcated frontier in the western Himalayas left 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers dead in 2020.

The neighbors have added tens of thousands of troops and weapons along the icy frontier over the last four years.

Modi and Xi had not held formal bilateral talks since then, although both participated in multilateral events. Their last bilateral summit talks were held in October 2019 in the southern Indian town of Mamallapuram.

The two spoke briefly on the sidelines of the G20 summit in Bali in November 2022. They spoke again on the sidelines of the BRICS summit in Johannesburg in August 2023 but released different versions of the conversation, suggesting they didn't see eye to eye.

Xi skipped the G20 summit hosted by New Delhi the following month, a decision seen as another setback to relations.

Diplomatic efforts gained momentum in recent months after the two countries' foreign ministers met in July and agreed to step up talks to ease the border tensions.

India had made improving the wider political and damaged business ties contingent upon finding a solution to the border standoff.

New Delhi had increased the scrutiny of investments coming from China, blocked direct flights between the two countries and had practically barred issuing any visas to Chinese nationals since the Ladakh clashes.

Speaking in Kazan, Indian Foreign Secretary Vikram Misri said there was hope for better India-China relations.

"As we have maintained during the last four years, the restoration of peace and tranquility on the border areas will create space for ... normalization of our bilateral relations."

Amid Modi-Xi meet, Indian Army opens museum to counter China's claims about Arunachal Pradesh

23 October 2024, Deccan Herald, Sumir Karmakar

'This unique institution recognizes and showcases the martial, cultural, and heritage prowess of Arunachal Pradesh and celebrates the historical linkages of this ancient region with Bharatvarsh,' said Arunachal Pradesh CM Khandu.

Guwahati: Indian Army on Wednesday opened a museum in Arunachal Pradesh's Dirang district, one of the theatres of the 1962 Sino-India War, in order to display the frontier state's ancient ties with "Bharatvarsh" and counter China's repeated claims over the state.

The museum displays 343 traditional heirlooms dating back to the Neolithic period, many ancient artefacts, catalogue highlighting the bravery of the local heroes and Indian soldiers who had sacrificed their lives while fighting against the Chinese troops during the 1962 war, beside other items.

"This location of the Museum, at Nyukmadung is of special reverence to all of us as it proudly marks the sacrifice, bravery and honour of the Indian Army during the 1962 war along with the camaraderie and compatriotism of local people. This museum is not just a repository of artefacts, heirlooms and memories but a living bridge between the past and future," Arunachal Pradesh Chief Minister Pema Khandu said, after inaugurating the museum.

The museum, named as Kameng Culture and Heritage Museum, is situated at Nyukmadung village in Dirang district, situated atop 1,600 meters.

"This unique institution recognizes and showcases the martial, cultural, and heritage prowess of Arunachal Pradesh and celebrates the historical linkages of this ancient region with Bharatvarsh," said Khandu. Khandu hoped that the museum would place Nyukmadung and Dirang on the country's tourist map, boosting religious and adventure tourism. "It will not only contribute to the local economy but also foster a deeper understanding of the region's cultural canvas on the national and global stage." The Indian Institute of Heritage curated the museum.

Khandu expressed gratitude to the Army's Sela Brigade, 16 Madras and 18 Sikh Light Infantry, who worked hard to deliver the project. A film by Captain Praveen Chaturvedi, CEO, Moonlight Pictures and his team, was also screened during the event that highlighted the deep-rooted connection of Arunachal Pradesh and Bharat, said a statement issued by the Chief Minister's Office, on Wednesday evening.

India has repeatedly rejected China's claims over Arunachal Pradesh. China, on the other hand, reacted sharply to infrastructure development projects taken up by India in Arunachal Pradesh claiming that the region was part of its South Tibet province.

A Modi-Xi Meeting Could Signal a Thaw Between India and China

23 October 2024, The New York Times, David Pierson, Valarie Hopkins and Alex Travelli

A meeting between the two leaders comes just two days after they settled a tense border dispute in the Himalayas. But experts said their long-term geopolitical rivalry would persist.

China's top leader, Xi Jinping, and Prime Minister Narendra Modi of India met officially for the first time in more than five years on Wednesday at a summit of emerging market countries in Russia, raising the prospect of a potential thaw between the two Asian powers.

The session came two days after China and India reached a deal on patrolling their shared Himalayan border, the site of a deadly clash between Chinese and Indian forces in 2020. Relations between Beijing and New Delhi have been frosty ever since, with India drawing closer to the United States through a regional security grouping called the Quad.

In separate statements, both Mr. Xi and Mr. Modi highlighted the need for the neighboring countries to address their differences peacefully.

Mr. Xi told Mr. Modi a rapprochement was "in the fundamental interests of both countries," according to Chinese state media, adding that China and India should "set an example for developing countries."

Mr. Modi called for “stable, predictable and amicable” relations between the two nations, the world’s most populous, saying it would have “a positive impact on regional and global peace and prosperity,” according to India’s Ministry of External Affairs.

Both leaders underscored their desire for a more “multipolar” world, an inference to the current global order, where the United States dominates, wielding what China and India regard as unfair influence.

The meeting between Mr. Xi and Mr. Modi took place at the 16th annual BRICS summit, a group of non-Western countries whose acronym stems from its earliest members: Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa. It expanded this year to include Egypt, Ethiopia, Iran and the United Arab Emirates, growing to represent almost half the world’s population.

Established as a counterweight to U.S.-led forums like the Group of 7 and intended to give developing countries more influence, BRICS has struggled to speak with a unified voice. That, in no small part, is because of the competing interests of its two biggest members.

China wants to use the grouping to weaken the dominance of the United States and burnish its credentials as a leader of the so-called Global South. India also claims leadership of the Global South, but unlike China, remains firmly nonaligned and does not want BRICS to develop into an explicitly anti-Western body.

Experts said little would change within BRICS as a result of China and India’s moving to ease tensions. Beijing has ambitions to be the pre-eminent power in Asia.

“The thaw between India and China will not fundamentally alter the dynamics of BRICS because while the détente between the two Asian giants is in the interest of both players, their long-term geopolitical rivalry will remain,” said Stewart Patrick, a senior fellow at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

India “has no desire to replace U.S. hegemony for Chinese hegemony,” Mr. Patrick continued, “and it is disinclined to have BRICS become an anti-Western bloc.”

During a round table session earlier on Wednesday, leaders of the BRICS conference discussed a range of issues, including creating financial platforms outside the reach of the U.S. dollar. President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia offered a proposal to create a BRICS grain exchange that could evolve into a commodities exchange. Russia is the world’s largest wheat exporter, and its war in Ukraine, another top grain exporter, sent prices soaring in 2022.

While improved ties between China and India could make BRICS a more cohesive group, a lasting thaw is anything but assured. Analysts warned that the border deal struck this week could fall apart, as details remained murky about how the two sides would patrol the disputed area, considered some of the least habitable terrain in Asia.

For China, easing tensions with India would help drive a wedge between New Delhi and Washington. It would also provide Beijing with one less headache at a time when it is struggling to turn around its sputtering economy, which has been battered by a property crisis.

As for India, a lasting border deal would come as a relief for Mr. Modi’s government, which took the largely symbolic step of banning dozens of Chinese apps, including TikTok, after the clash in 2020. Since then, Mr. Modi has tried to deflect attention from the conflict. He refused to take questions about it in Parliament.

Smoother relations with China will leave India in a position straddling geopolitical forces within Asia. Washington has been courting New Delhi as a strategic counterweight to China, as it seeks to corral various states, most of them democracies, into a ring of defensive arrangements around Asia.

Indian foreign policy has long been defined by its overlapping and sometimes contradictory set of friends. It is the only country that sits inside both the Quad – the loose, defense-oriented club where it joins the United States, Japan and Australia – and the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, which is dominated by China and Russia. The Shanghai group also includes Pakistan, India’s fiercest foe.

The United States has been working to tighten its ties with India for about 25 years. That has accelerated under both the Trump and Biden administrations, as India has been drawn into greater and greater economic, technological and military coordination with Washington. In the latest example, India signed a $3.5 billion deal last week to buy American Predator drones.

Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping have held their first formal talks in five years, a sign that icy relations are thawing after a deadly military clash in 2020.

The two leaders met on Wednesday on the sidelines of the BRICS summit in the Russian city of Kazan, the Indian government and Chinese state media said.

The meeting comes days after the two countries agreed a deal to resolve a four-year military standoff on their disputed Himalayan border.

Xi and Modi shook hands against a backdrop featuring their national flags, and both stressed the importance of handling their disputes.

The Chinese leader said the two countries were at a crucial stage of development and "should carefully handle differences and disagreements and facilitate each other's pursuit of development aspirations."

"It's important for both sides to shoulder our international responsibilities, set an example for boosting the strength and unity of the developing countries, and contribute to promoting multi-polarisation and democracy in international relations," Xi said.

The clash in 2020 on the largely undemarcated frontier of Ladakh in the western Himalayas killed 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers.

Relations between Beijing and New Delhi were strained as a result, with both sides beefing up their military presence along their shared border.

Modi and Xi had not held formal talks since although they were present at a number of multilateral events. Their last summit talks were held in October 2019 in the southern Indian town of Mamallapuram.

The pact agreed to this week related to military patrols along the frontier. But the announcement on Tuesday did not explain whether it covered the length of the border or just points where the clashes occurred in 2020.

Border tensions are a thorny issue between Beijing and New Delhi. China claims India's eastern state of Arunachal Pradesh in its entirety, considering it part of its Tibet region, and the two fought a border war in 1962.

China confirms pact with India to 'resolve' conflict over disputed border

22 October 2024, Aljazeera

China has confirmed reaching a deal with India over their disputed border in the Himalayan region, a day after New Delhi said it had struck an agreement with Beijing for military patrols along the frontier.

But the announcement on Tuesday did not explain whether the pact covered the length of the border or just points where the two sides have been involved in a standoff since 2020.

Relations between the world's two most populous, nuclear-armed neighbours have been strained since clashes between their troops on the largely undemarcated frontier in the western Himalayas' Ladakh region four years ago killed 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers.

Since the skirmish in 2020, both sides pulled back tens of thousands of soldiers and agreed not to send patrols into a narrow strip surrounding the Line of Actual Control, which is an unofficial division about 3,488km (2,167 miles) long in the Himalayas, with China claiming a considerably shorter section.

It separates Chinese and Indian-held territories from Ladakh in the west to India's eastern state of Arunachal Pradesh, which China claims in its entirety considering it part of its Tibet region.

In 1962, Chinese troops crossed the frontier with India during a dispute over the border's demarcation, sparking a four-week-long war. China retained Aksai Chin, a strategic corridor linking Tibet to western China.

"Recently, China and India have maintained close communication through diplomatic and military channels on issues relating to the China-India border," China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesman Lin Jian told a news briefing in Beijing on Tuesday.

"At present, the two sides have reached a solution to the relevant issues, which China views positively," Lin said.

Arunachal's Siang valley dam project on fast track to counter China threat

21 October 2024, Business Standard

The project has been facing protests from the local population which fears severe ecological impact because of the construction of the dam.

With an eye on China developing a mega hydro project in the vicinity of Arunachal Pradesh, the Centre has accelerated the development of its colossal dam in the Siang upper valley, which will be the country's biggest to date. The recently announced financial assistance by the Union Cabinet for hydropower (or hydel) projects is aimed at the initial project management of the Siang upper valley dam, said senior officials.

The proposed project has a three-pronged agenda – flood management, water flow correction, and power generation as a by-product. State-owned hydropower major NHPC has been entrusted with developing a detailed project report (DPR) and project feasibility report (PFR). According to estimates by NHPC, the dam will have the capacity to generate 10-12 gigawatts (Gw) of hydropower, making it the largest hydel project in India. The projected cost is expected to be Rs 1 trillion, said officials.

NHPC executives said while discussions were ongoing among different central ministries, such as power, Jal Shakti, and the state of Arunachal Pradesh, the latest fund infusion by the Centre has kick-started the project. In August, the Union Cabinet approved Rs 4,136 crore for the northeastern states to develop hydropower projects worth 15 Gw. Last month, the Cabinet also approved Rs 12,461 crore for creating "enabling infrastructure" for upcoming hydropower projects and Pumped Storage Projects (PSPs) in the country.

Officials indicated that funds from these two allocations would be directed towards the PFR for the Siang valley project and to conduct awareness programmes for the locals. An emailed questionnaire to the NHPC spokesperson remained unanswered until the time of going to press.

The project has been facing protests from the local population, which fears severe ecological impact due to the construction of the dam. According to local reports, data collection efforts by NHPC have been thwarted by locals who are apprehensive that the project will harm aquatic ecology. NHPC, however, is advocating for the project on the grounds of national security and the adverse impact of the Chinese dam. In 2021, the People's Republic of China approved the construction of the 60 Gw Motong hydropower station on the Yarlung Tsangpo, which falls in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). The Yarlung river connects with the Brahmaputra (Siang in Arunachal) river on the Indian side. According to initial studies by NHPC and the state government, water flow to India can be reduced by up to 80 per cent due to China's project. In a recent presentation, authorities also hinted at the possibilities of China using it as a 'water bomb' or even to induce floods in Indian territory.

The Siang river has previously witnessed flash floods at least three times due to breaches in dams on the Chinese side. A recent official presentation by NHPC said: "It is estimated that 40 billion cubic meters (BCM) of water may be diverted by the Chinese project. The total annual yield at the Siang Upper Project is around 112 BCM. During the lean season, the flow may reduce by about 60 per cent at Pasighat and 25 per cent at Pandu (Guwahati) without the Upper Siang Project."

The presentation also said that the project would neutralise the adverse effects of reduced lean season water availability. "The project is mainly aimed at flood moderation and ensuring water security in the area. The hydropower generated would be essential in meeting peaking power requirements," officials said. Around 12 per cent of the total energy generated from the project would be provided for free to the state of Arunachal Pradesh.

The project was first conceptualised in 2018 by the Ministry of Jal Shakti as an irrigation-cum-power project. Lack of funds and support from the state government, coupled with local protests, caused no progress, said officials. Some officials also indicated that the rehabilitation of the local population continues to be a major challenge, as they fear loss of jobs and arable land for cultivation, especially rice. The 3 Gw Dibang Valley hydro project on the Siang river has faced years of protests over similar concerns.

What's at stake

Project significance: Largest hydropower project in India with a capacity of 10-12 Gw

Estimated cost, storage capacity: Rs 1 trn; 14-15 bn cubic meter

Strategic importance: Aimed at flood management, water security, and mitigating risks posed by China's 60 Gw Motong project on Yarlung Zangbo

Funding boost: Recent approvals of over Rs 16,000 crore by the Union Cabinet for hydropower and allied infrastructure in the Northeast

Key concerns: Loss of arable lands, displacement of heritage tribal lands and communities

National security focus: Project seeks to counter potential diversion of 40 bn cubic meters of water by China and mitigate risks of flash floods by Chinese dam breaches

India calls out China's non-transparent subsidies that stifle competition at WTO meet

19 October 2024, Tibetan Review

While India's border problem with China is serious enough to render it a hindrance to the normalization of their overall bilateral ties, the former also has grave concerns over the business practices of the latter. The country has made known this fact during a WTO meeting. Indian officials pointed out that China's policies not only affect Indian exporters but also threaten the stability of the broader international trading system, reported the psuconnect.in Oct 19.

The officials have put under scrutiny China's non-transparent subsidies that lead to an influx of low-priced, inferior goods into the country, adversely affecting local industries.

The report said India strongly criticized China's trade policies, labelling them as unfair and harmful to equitable global trade practices, raising issues related to China's state subsidies, intellectual property violations, and market access barriers that hinder Indian businesses.

India's position was stated to reflect increasing frustration with China's aggressive trade tactics that disrupt competition. Its officials have noted that these policies not only impact Indian exporters but also pose a threat to the stability of the wider international trading system.

During the discussions, India called for enhanced transparency and accountability from China, urging the WTO to address practices that breach trade agreements. The Indian delegation highlighted the necessity for a level playing field and advocated for reforms within the WTO to ensure that all member countries comply with fair trade practices, the report noted.

The ongoing dialogue at the WTO was stated to underscore the rising tensions in international trade, particularly among major economies, with India reflecting its commitment to assert its rights on the global stage.

China urges India to handle Taiwan issue cautiously after Mumbai office opening

17 October 2024, Reuters

China urged India on Thursday to handle Taiwan issues with caution and avoid interference in the improvement of Sino-India relations following the opening of another Taiwan de facto consulate in Mumbai.

China opposes moves by any countries it has ties with to engage in official contacts with Taiwan, said Mao Ning, a foreign ministry spokesperson, at a regular news conference.

The Taiwanese government opened its third representative office in India on Wednesday, Taiwan's official Central News Agency reported, adding to existing offices in New Delhi and Chennai. The video player is currently playing an ad.

The opening came amid ongoing efforts from China and India to ease tensions and resolve conflicts on their Himalayan frontier, a point of contention that has strained bilateral ties.

China, which views democratically-governed Taiwan as its own territory, staged a new round of war games around the island earlier this week.

Taiwan's government rejects China's sovereignty claims and Beijing's claim of the right to speak for and represent the island on the international stage "China has lodged solemn representations with the Indian side," Mao said.

"The one-China principle is a serious political commitment made by the Indian side and the political foundation of Sino-Indian relations."

China urges India to strictly abide by its commitments, handle Taiwan-related issues prudently and properly, and refrain from conducting any form of official exchanges with Taiwan, she added.

Satellite pics show new Chinese settlement under construction near Pangong Lake

14 October 2024, India Today, Shivani Sharma

Satellite imagery accessed by India Today shows significant Chinese construction activity, 38 km from the 2020 standoff point, raising fresh concerns over border infrastructure.

As India and China continue diplomatic efforts to ease tensions along the border, recent satellite imagery reviewed by India Today reveals the ongoing construction of a large Chinese settlement near the north bank of Pangong Tso Lake.

The settlement is located approximately 38 kilometres east of one of the 2020 standoff points between Indian and Chinese forces, though it lies outside India's territorial claims. Pangong Tso, the world's highest saltwater lake, straddles India, China-administered Tibet, and the disputed border between them.

The satellite images, captured on October 9 by US-based Maxar Technologies, show rapid construction over an area of about 17 hectares. Situated near Yemagou Road at an elevation of 4,347 meters, the site is bustling with construction and earth-moving machinery. According to Y Nithiyanandam, Professor & Head of the Geospatial Research Programme at the Takshashila Institution, "More than 100 buildings, including residential structures and larger administrative buildings, are being built. Open spaces and flattened land suggest possible future use for parks or sports facilities."

He also pointed out a 150-meter-long rectangular strip in the southeast corner, speculating it could be prepared for helicopter operations.

Analysis of open-source satellite imagery indicates that construction began in early April 2024 on a riverbed sloping towards the lake. The settlement appears to be divided into two parts, possibly distinguishing between administrative and operational zones, according to military sources.

Shadow analysis of the structures reveals a mix of single and double-story buildings, with smaller hutments nearby, likely accommodating six to eight people each. Two larger structures may serve as administration and storage facilities. The layout, designed in staggered rows rather than straight lines, suggests an intention to reduce vulnerability to long-range attacks.

The settlement's location behind high peaks further enhances its strategic advantage, limiting visibility from nearby areas. "The surrounding high peaks obscure the site from land-based surveillance equipment," Nithiyanandam noted. Military sources speculate that if used for military purposes, the settlement could function as an "ad-hoc forward base," reducing reaction times for Chinese forces.

A SETTLEMENT FOR TIBETAN NOMADS?

Nature Desai, an observer of the Indo-Tibetan frontier, offers another interpretation. He suggests that the settlement could be intended for Tibetan nomads, identifying the site as Changzun Nuru, a historic campsite mentioned in Swedish geographer Sven Hedin's Central Asia Atlas: Memoir on Maps. Desai argues that the design is more consistent with the style of permanent housing built for Tibetan nomads by the Chinese government over the past two decades, rather than typical Xiaokang-style border defence villages.

If so, this would be the first such settlement close in the area, reflecting China's ongoing efforts to settle Tibetan nomads permanently. China could frame this development as "a long-awaited gift to its loyal nomads along the Indian frontier," Desai noted.

Nithiyanandam pointed out that while the proximity to a water source likely resolves water supply issues, the settlement's energy needs will likely rely on renewable sources. The rapid pace of construction suggests that residential buildings are nearing completion, and significant progress has been made over the past six months. However, the settlement's completion timeline could be impacted by extreme weather conditions in the coming months.

India expresses cautious optimism in Tibet-border talks with China

India's Defence Minister, Mr Rajnath Singh, has on Oct 11 expressed cautious optimism about ongoing diplomatic-military talks with China, while emphasizing that troop disengagement was key to resolving tensions.

India remains "cautiously optimistic" about the ongoing diplomatic-military talks with China to resolve the troop standoff in the eastern Ladakh border with Tibet, business-standard.com Sep 12 quoted Singh as saying Oct 11.

Singh has also expressed full confidence in the Indian Army's ability to handle any situation should tensions escalate along the border.

Speaking at the Army Commanders' Conference in Gangtok, capital of the Tibet-border state of Sikkim, Singh has made it clear that progress of discussions with China would be contingent on "actual progress" being made on the ground, specifically with the disengagement of troops in eastern Ladakh.

While China is said to be stubbornly reluctant to withdraw from the two remaining conflict points in eastern Ladakh, namely Depsang and Demchok, India has been advocating for a phased process, starting with troop disengagement there. This should be followed by de-escalation and eventually the withdrawal of the 50,000 Chinese troops stationed along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the region, if normalcy in bilateral ties are to be restored.

Singh has spoken by video conference, which was chaired by General Upendra Dwivedi, Chief of the Army Staff, from Sukna in Darjeeling as he could not travel to Gangtok as scheduled due to bad weather. The choice of Gangtok as the conference location was stated to be symbolic, signalling India's readiness in the eastern sector, where China has also increased its military presence by deploying 90,000 additional troops.

General Dwivedi had earlier this month described the situation along the LAC as "stable but sensitive and not normal", noting that "trust has become the biggest casualty" in India's relationship with China.

He has added that while political-diplomatic efforts had generated some “positive signalling” in recent months, implementation depended on military commanders on the ground.

Given this situation, the Indian Army will continue to maintain its forward positions in preparation for the fifth consecutive winter in the harsh terrain of eastern Ladakh, Arunachal Pradesh, and Sikkim, the report said.

Singh has called on the Indian armed forces to continuously modernise and adapt to emerging threats.

On Oct 12, Singh inaugurate several Border Road Organization projects in Sikkim, including 22 roads, 51 bridges, and two additional projects, totalling Rs 2,236 crore. These include 19 projects in Jammu and Kashmir, 18 in Arunachal Pradesh, 11 in Ladakh, nine in Uttarakhand, and six in Sikkim, the report added.

India launches major strategic infrastructure projects and plans, procurements as China threat simmers

13 October 2024, Tibetan Review

As India’s trust-deficit towards China on the border issue continues amid continuing standoff in eastern Ladakh, the country has announced more major strategic infrastructure projects to achieve parity with the developments on the occupied Tibet side of the border. Defence Minister Rajnath Singh on Oct 12 virtually inaugurated 75 infrastructure projects “dedicated to the nation” from Sherathang, near the Indo-Tibet border, most of them in the Tibet-bordering states, reported eastmojo.com Oct 12.

India has also approved plans for the launch of 42 spy satellites and plans to procure over 20,000 new-generation anti-tank guided missiles (ATGMs), along with 1,500 launchers and simulators, for the Indian Army, according to latest media reports.

The 75 projects launched by Mr Singh were stated to include 51 bridges, 22 roads, and two miscellaneous projects, aimed at strengthening connectivity in critical regions.

The road projects were stated to include four for Sikkim, seven for Jammu and Kashmir, three for Arunachal Pradesh, two for Ladakh, besides two for Rajasthan and one each for one for Nagaland and the Andaman and Nicobar Islands.

The 51 bridges were stated to cover key locations, including 14 for Arunachal Pradesh, 12 for Jammu and Kashmir, nine for Ladakh, and others spread across Uttarakhand, Himachal Pradesh, Mizoram, and Sikkim.

Those in Sikkim were stated to include the upgradation of the Sherathang-Kupup road, which plays a crucial role for the armed forces, offering an alternative route from East Sikkim to the Siliguri corridor. In Ladakh, the newly constructed Hemiya Bridge on the Leh-Loma road will improve connectivity to Dungti, the report said.

Singh has inaugurated the projects virtually from Sukna Military Base as inclement weather prevented his planned personal attendance. Sikkim Chief Minister Prem Singh Golay, along with other state dignitaries, has attended the ceremony at Sherathang.

Meanwhile the Cabinet Committee on Security (CCS) led by PM Narendra Modi has quietly approved the phase III of the Space Based Surveillance (SBS-III) for launching an array of spy satellites in low earth and geostationary orbits.

“CCS on Monday gave the approval for launching 52 satellites under the SBS-III project, which would cost around Rs 27,000 crore,” the timesofindia.com Oct 12 quoted a source in the ISRO, India’s space agency, as saying.

“If India is able to launch satellites at this scale, threats to the country can be better mitigated,” the source has said. The recent Cabinet clearance to purchase 31 weaponised Predator drones from US-based General Atomics will add more teeth to the surveillance capability of the SBS-3 mission.

Also, India’s Defence Ministry has issued a Request for Information (RFI) to procure over 20,000 new-generation anti-tank guided missiles (ATGMs), along with 1,500 launchers and simulators, for the Indian Army, reported indiatoday.in Oct 11.

This initiative is aimed at enhancing the Army’s operational capabilities to effectively target and destroy tanks and other armoured vehicles, the report said.

These ATGMs are expected to operate in diverse terrains, including plains, deserts, high altitudes up to 5,500 meters (18,000 feet), as well as coastal areas and islands.

The requirement is that the new-generation missiles must function effectively in both day and night conditions, adapting to various weather scenarios such as rain, fog, humidity, and dust. Additionally, they are required to operate in extreme temperatures ranging from -45°C to 45°C.

And the ATGMs should be able to neutralize a range of targets, including enemy tanks, armoured personnel carriers, low-flying helicopters, concrete structures, and other weapon platforms.

They will be strategically deployed along India’s western border with Pakistan and the northern border with Chinese ruled Tibet, the report said.

The move is a step toward bolstering the Indian Army’s capabilities in modern warfare.

India 'cautiously optimistic' about border talks with China: Rajnath Singh

12 October 2024, Business Standard, Rimjhim Singh

Defence Minister Rajnath Singh expressed cautious optimism about ongoing diplomatic-military talks with China, emphasising troop disengagement as key to resolving tensions

India remains "cautiously optimistic" about the ongoing diplomatic-military talks with China to resolve the troop standoff in eastern Ladakh, Defence Minister Rajnath Singh said on Friday. However, he also expressed full confidence in the Army's ability to handle any situation should tensions escalate along the border.

Speaking at the Army Commanders' Conference in Gangtok, Singh emphasised that the progress of discussions with China is contingent on "actual progress" being made on the ground, specifically with the disengagement of troops in eastern Ladakh. India has been advocating for a phased process, starting with troop disengagement at the two remaining conflict points in Depsang and Demchok. This would be followed by de-escalation and eventually the withdrawal of the 50,000 Chinese troops stationed along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the region.

The defence minister's comments come against the backdrop of concerns about China's inconsistent actions, as the People's Liberation Army made several incursions into eastern Ladakh in April-May 2020, despite diplomatic assurances.

Although Singh was scheduled to attend the conference, chaired by General Upendra Dwivedi, in person, bad weather forced him to address it via videoconference from Sukna in Darjeeling. The choice of Gangtok as the conference location, near the China border, was symbolic, signalling India's readiness in the eastern sector, where China has also increased its military presence by deploying 90,000 additional troops.

Earlier this month, General Dwivedi cautioned that "trust has become the biggest casualty" in India's relationship with China, describing the situation along the LAC as "stable but sensitive and not normal". He added that while political-diplomatic efforts have generated some "positive signalling" in recent months, implementation depends on military commanders on the ground.

In preparation for the fifth consecutive winter in the harsh terrain of eastern Ladakh, Arunachal Pradesh, and Sikkim, the Army will continue to maintain its forward positions. Meanwhile, the Border Roads Organisation (BRO) is working to improve India's border infrastructure, attempting to close the gap with China.

Rajnath Singh to inaugurate BRO projects in Sikkim today

On Saturday, Rajnath Singh is set to inaugurate several BRO projects in Sikkim, including 22 roads, 51 bridges, and two additional projects, totalling Rs 2,236 crore. These include 19 projects in Jammu and Kashmir, 18 in Arunachal Pradesh, 11 in Ladakh, nine in Uttarakhand, and six in Sikkim.

Defence minister Singh highlighted the need for the armed forces to prepare for "asymmetric warfare", a lesson underscored by current global conflicts. He noted that unconventional and asymmetric warfare, including hybrid war, will be integral to future conflicts, and added that the forces should continuously modernise and adapt to emerging threats.

EXPLAINED: Is China taking away people's passports?

08 October 2024, RFA, Luisetta Mudie

Beijing steps up travel curbs on Communist Party members and state employees amid concerns they won't return.

The ruling Chinese Communist Party has been gradually stepping up controls on officials' personal trips overseas since pandemic restrictions ended, with many working in state organizations required to hand in their passports for "safekeeping," amid concerns that they may not return.

The party's disciplinary arm warned members earlier this year not to make overseas trips without getting the approval of their employer first, on pain of "severe disciplinary punishment."

Those who don't have a valid private passport may not be allowed to apply for one, while those who do are being told to hand them over on pain of disciplinary action, according official documents and people within the government system.

In July, Radio Free Asia reported that the authorities were stepping up travel restrictions on teachers, schoolchildren and state-owned bank staff ahead of summer vacation by requiring them to hand over their passports or ask permission before leaving the country.

A recent report in the Financial Times also quoted teachers as saying they were being told to hand in their passports.

Is this a new development?

Teachers were being ordered to hand in their passports as early as 2018, with authorities in the southeastern province of Fujian, the eastern province of Shandong and the northern region of Inner Mongolia warning them that any plans for overseas travel must first get government approval.

Similar warnings were issued to teachers, schoolchildren and state-owned bank employees ahead of the summer vacation this year, too.

Official websites have been warning of travel restrictions on employees of the Chinese state since President Xi Jinping took power in 2012, but travel curbs intensified during the three years of the zero-COVID policy, when people started leaving the country in droves in a phenomenon called the "run" movement.

Arriving air passengers in the southern city of Guangzhou told Radio Free Asia in May 2022 that border police had stepped up controls on incoming Chinese citizens, questioning them about their overseas activities and confiscating their passports.

In April of the same year, police in the central province of Hunan ordered local residents to hand over their passports, promising to return them "when the pandemic is over," amid a massive surge in people looking for ways to leave China or obtain overseas immigration status.

Who is affected by the travel restrictions?

The Chinese Communist Party's 99 million members are barred from obtaining foreign nationality or permanent residency in another country, and from applying for private passports without prior approval, according to a post on the official website of its Central Commission for Discipline Inspection.

They must also submit details of their proposed itinerary when taking private trips, and not deviate from the agreed route or engage in unauthorized activities, it said.

Officials in government departments, employees of state-owned companies and banks, and children have all been issued with warnings over private overseas travel in recent years, covering a large swathe of the population.

Travel bans have long been used by the Chinese authorities to target religious minorities and ethnic groups.

In 2022, Christians in eastern China told RFA Mandarin they were finding it harder to gain approval for their private passport applications, with applications rejected after Entry-Exit Bureau officials discovered the family's religious beliefs.

Passport recall orders and restrictions on new applications have been used to limit overseas travel by mostly Muslim Uyghurs since the beginning of the century, while similar restrictions have also been imposed on Tibetans under Xi's rule.

But restrictions are also sometimes extended to all citizens, should the government deem it necessary, as happened during the zero-COVID years.

Why is the government imposing such bans?

"Firstly, they're afraid that people will leave and never return," the wife of a high-ranking executive in a state-owned enterprise in the northeastern province of Jilin, who gave only the surname Liu for fear of reprisals, told RFA Mandarin in a recent interview.

The number of people fleeing China to seek asylum in the United States spiked sharply in 2023, as people made the grueling and dangerous overland trip to Mexico through Central America.

But there are also concerns that sensitive information could leak to overseas media or security services, as China's secret police step up warnings about potential foreign spies everywhere.

"Particularly those who work in government departments, who know more of the details about the Chinese Communist Party's internal operations," Liu said. "They strictly prohibit people from disclosing that kind of detail abroad."

Liu said her husband, who recently took a less demanding role at the company, is still subject to travel restrictions as a state employee.

"He may no longer be a leader ... but he's not retired yet, so they won't let him have a passport," she said, adding that the government is likely worried that officials will contribute to capital outflows by taking their money with them. "When people leave China, so does their money," Liu said.

A recent op-ed in the state-backed Shenzhen Special Zone Daily warned that state employees "must not keep hold of his passport for the sake of his own convenience, and must not take chances and conceal his overseas travel itinerary."

"Unauthorized illegal travel abroad is not a trivial private matter, but a major public matter related to discipline ... and political consciousness," the Feb. 8, 2024, article said.

"Ready to enhance communication with India, increase mutual trust": Chinese Foreign Ministry

08 October 2024, ANI

After President Droupadi Murmu sent messages to Chinese President Xi Jinping on the 75th anniversary of China, Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Mao Ning emphasised the country's willingness to strengthen communication and mutual trust with India, aiming to promote a stable development of the China-India relationship.

The remarks by Mao came while she was addressing a regular press briefing on Tuesday.

Responding to the congratulatory message sent by President Murmu to Chinese President Xi on the 75th Anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China, Mao said, "Recently, leaders of neighbouring countries in Asia, including Indian President Droupadi Murmu, sent messages or letters of congratulations to President Xi Jinping on the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China. We express our appreciation for that."

She further said, "China attaches importance to President Murmu's remarks on the China-India relations. We stand ready to enhance communication with India, increase mutual trust and jointly promote the sound and steady development of China-India relations."

Notably, on September 27, President Murmu in her message emphasised the significance of fostering peaceful and stable relations, stating, "As two large neighbours with many common developmental challenges and shared regional interests, it is important that we work towards peaceful and stable relations between our two countries."

In her communication, President Murmu expressed a desire to enhance bilateral cooperation, saying, "I look forward to working with you to realise a mutually beneficial relationship and leverage our respective strengths for the benefit of people of both countries and the region and world."

Meanwhile, elaborating further on the disengagement process going on between India and China, Mao said that the two nations have successfully disengaged in four key areas, including the Galwan Valley. She said, "China and India maintain close communication on issues concerning the border areas through diplomatic and military channels, and the two countries have realised disengagement in four areas in the Western sector of the China-India border, including the Galwan Valley."

"The situation on the China-India border is currently stable on the whole. At the recent 31st meeting of the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination on China-India Border Affairs (WMCC), the two sides further narrowed down differences, expanded common understandings and agreed to find early resolution to the situation on the border," Mao added further.

Earlier on September 13, Mao had spoken about the disengagement process and said, "In recent years, front-line armies of the two countries have realised disengagement in four areas in the Western sector of the China-India border, including the Galwan Valley. The China-India border situation is generally stable and under control."

New air force chief calls for India to 'catch up' with China on defence tech

07 October 2024, SCMP, Enoch Wong

Air Chief Marshal Amar Preet Singh says the country is lagging behind its neighbour on technology and production of equipment

The new Indian Air Force chief has warned that the country has fallen behind China on defence technology and equipment and says it needs to "catch up".

Air Chief Marshal Amar Preet Singh made the remarks at a press briefing in New Delhi on Friday, days after taking up the role and ahead of the 92nd anniversary of the air force on Tuesday.

Singh pointed to a delayed order of supersonic fighter jets being built by state-owned Hindustan Aeronautics Limited, saying none of the 83 Tejas Mark-1A combat aircraft that were promised this year had been delivered, according to The Hindu.

"I am very confident that as far as the human angle is concerned – as far as our people behind the machines are concerned – we are way ahead of [China]," Singh was quoted as saying.

"We were ahead of [China] in technology some time back, but we have lagged and need to catch up," he said.

"As far as production rates are concerned, we are way behind. We need to catch up with that. And that will happen over time. It cannot happen overnight."

India and China have a long-running dispute over their undemarcated 3,488km (2,167-mile) border, known as the Line of Actual Control. Tensions worsened after a clash in the Himalayan border area in 2020 in which at least 20 Indian and four Chinese troops were killed – the first deadly skirmish between the two sides in at least 45 years.

Meanwhile, China has been rapidly modernising its air force fleet. That includes the J-20 fifth-generation fighter jet with stealth and supersonic cruise capabilities.

According to Air and Space Forces Magazine, China currently produces more than 100 J-20s every year, solely for domestic use.

China's air force is said to have more than 300 J-20s in service, with recent reports that some of the fighter jets have been deployed near the border with India, in Tibet and Xinjiang.

Testifying before Congress in March, the former head of the US Indo-Pacific Command, Admiral John Aquilino, said China could soon have the world's largest air force due to its modernisation efforts.

India has also been trying to modernise its air force but despite efforts to become more self-reliant it remains heavily dependent on imported weapons and equipment.

It currently has a fleet of 31 fighter jet squadrons but the target is 42 – a number that could be revised up given the military's shift in focus from Pakistan to China, Indian news magazine The Week reported on Friday, citing an anonymous senior air force official.

Singh's remarks follow a number of air force incidents in recent months. In September, a Mikoyan MiG-29 fighter jet crashed in Rajasthan during a routine night training mission. Three months earlier, a Sukhoi Su-30 MKI fighter jet went down in Maharashtra. In both incidents the pilots managed to eject safely. In April, a remotely piloted aircraft crashed during a training sortie in Rajasthan in April, and the previous month a Tejas light combat aircraft crashed in a student hostel compound in the same state – the pilot also ejected safely.

Jaishankar refutes Chinese incursion claims in Arunachal Pradesh

06 October 2024, Arunachal24

Speaking at The Conclave 2024 in New Delhi, Jaishankar responded sharply, “China entered the border in 1959! What are you talking about?”

External Affairs Minister (EAM) S Jaishankar, on Saturday, refuted claims of a recent Chinese incursion into Arunachal Pradesh, highlighting India’s steadfast patrolling along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

Speaking at the Conclave 2024 in New Delhi, Jaishankar responded sharply, “China entered the border in 1959! What are you talking about?”

The EAM reiterated that India’s patrolling along the LAC, particularly in Arunachal Pradesh, has remained robust for over a decade. “There’s been no major change in the last five to tens years or maybe even longer,” he said.

China has persistently claimed Arunachal Pradesh as its own, further attempting to assert its stance by renaming 30 locations in the state earlier this year. India, however, firmly rejected these actions, stating, “Assigning invented names will not alter the reality that the state will always be an integral and inalienable part of India.”

On India’s diplomatic ties with Bangladesh, Jaishankar stressed the importance of maintaining sturdy relations amid potential political disruptions. “In every country, in politics, there are changes... Foreign policy should plan for this change,” he explained, adding that the India-Bangladesh relationship has significantly deepened over the last decade.

Jaishankar also addressed India’s long-standing bid for a permanent seat at the United Nations Security Council (UNSC), calling the process “complicated.” He noted, “More and more countries today accept that there should be change and that India should be one of the countries.” The EAM, however, acknowledged that further work, persuasion, and negotiation are still needed to achieve this goal.

Meanwhile, the External Affairs Minister is set to lead a delegation to Pakistan for the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) summit which will be held in Islamabad on October 15 and 16. The visit will mark the first high-level visit from India to Pakistan in about ten years.

China’s restrictions drive Indians to undertake helicopter Mt Kailash pilgrimage from own country

05 October 2024, Tibetan Review

As the Mt Kailash–Lake Mansarovar Yatra for Indian pilgrims has continued to remain closed or prohibitively regulated since 2020 both for government-organized travellers and those wishing to make the trip privately from Nepal, The Uttarakhand Tourism Department has on Oct 3 resumed providing aerial pilgrimage for them, reported thestatesman.com Oct 3.

The pilgrimage has remained closed for Indian visa holders since 2020 due to various reasons, beginning with the Covid-19 pandemic and subsequent travel restrictions following clashes between the two border armies along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh.

In Nepal, the prohibitive restrictions on Indian pilgrims were previously reported to have ruined the business of the country’s tourism industry catering to them annually.

The first batch of five pilgrims – who were from Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, and Punjab – paid obeisance to the abode of Lord Shiva in Tibet for the first time from Indian soil on Oct 3.

The Old Lipulekh Peak, which offers a clear view of Mt Kailash, was discovered a few months ago by a team of officials from the Uttarakhand Tourism Department, the Border Roads Organisation (BRO), and the Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP). Following this discovery, the Uttarakhand Tourism Department made the necessary preparations to launch a five-day, four-night tour package. The mode of darshan was aerial via helicopter, taking sorties from Pithoragarh to Gunji and back, the report said.

Uttarakhand Chief Minister Pushkar Singh Dhami has said, “The implementation of the Mt Kailash pilgrimage plan from Indian soil demonstrates the commitment of both the state government and the central agencies. Now, Shiva devotees need not wait for their turn to begin the Kailash-Mansarovar Yatra and can pay their respects from Indian territory.”

India’s renewed push for permanent UN Security Council seat faces persistent China roadblock

03 October 2024, SCMP, Amy Sood

India’s chances remain poor due to tensions with China, but more support from Global South nations could boost its bid, analysts say

India has renewed its long-standing bid for a permanent position in the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) as it seeks to represent the Global South, but resistance from China is expected to continue to present a significant hurdle.

For decades, India has been pushing for a seat at the table with the UNSC's five permanent members, also known as the P5 – United Kingdom, China, France, Russia and the United States.

The council – which held its first session in 1946 – represents the victor nations of World War II and is responsible for maintaining international peace and security among the UN's 193 member states.

China, the only Asian member of the council, has remained outwardly opposed to admitting India to the exclusive group.

In his address at the United Nations General Assembly last Saturday, India's External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar called for a "more representative" UN.

"Large parts of the world cannot be left behind when it comes to deciding the key issues of our times," he said, reflecting Prime Minister Narendra Modi's previous critique of the current council's skewed representation.

In July last year, Modi said: "How can we talk of it as a primary organ of a global body, when entire continents of Africa and Latin America are ignored? How can it claim to speak for the world when its most populous country, and its largest democracy, is not a permanent member?"

Last week, British Prime Minister Keir Starmer and French President Emmanuel Macron publicly endorsed India's bid to join the council. And during a visit by Modi to the US last month, US President Joe Biden said Washington recognised a need to reform global institutions to "reflect India's important voice".

Russia has also backed India's effort, with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov saying in July that his country was in support of India getting a permanent seat on the council.

However, analysts caution that India's chances of joining the UNSC remain slim due to its escalating tensions with China, stemming from a territorial dispute in the Himalayas and ongoing competition for regional influence.

"China is the only Asian power in the UNSC, so it definitely would not want a big competitor like India there," said Dhananjay Tripathi, an associate professor in the Department of International Relations at South Asian University in New Delhi.

Beijing would like to maintain its position as the only Asian country with a permanent seat on the council, he added, noting it was unlikely that there would be any "fundamental changes" in its relations with India that would change this view.

Veto power

The five permanent members of the council have veto power to single-handedly block any UN resolutions.

China has previously used this blocking power in support of Pakistan over the Kashmir conflict with India.

Analysts say this presents a challenge for India, which aims to assert itself as a leading global power, maintain influence in the Asia-Pacific, and position itself as a champion of the Global South.

"India has wanted to play a certain role in world politics that at times can get curtailed because it's not a part of the UNSC's permanent membership," Tripathi said. "On some issues, India feels that it has to be on the high table to defend its interest in world politics."

For China, the issue also lies in its perception that India is growing closer to the West and, more specifically, the US, according to Srikanth Kondapalli, dean of the School of International Studies and a professor of China studies at Jawaharlal Nehru University in India.

"If India joins the Security Council with veto power, there may be concerns it may not side with China on certain issues," he said. "As of now, the five countries don't have to accommodate any other countries when it comes to a vote."

Tripathi said more clarity was needed from the other permanent members on whether they supported India's bid to join the UNSC with or without veto powers.

"If India joins without the veto power, it may not be able to play a vital, critical or relevant role in the UNSC," he added.

Alongside India, the other members of the "Group of Four" countries – Germany, Japan and Brazil – have also sought permanent seats on the UN body.

While China has said it supports reforms to give developing nations "a greater say", it has stopped short of providing specific proposals or naming countries.

Last year, China's top diplomat Wang Yi said reform should "increase the representation and voice of developing countries, allowing more small and medium-sized countries to have more opportunities to participate in the decision-making of the council".

Analysts suggest that another factor fuelling China's resistance to India's membership is that both countries see themselves as champions of the Global South, competing for greater influence in the region. Kondapalli said while the "China factor is unlikely to go away", India could strengthen its bid by further aligning itself with countries in the Global South.

"But China could be a spoiler in this by convincing some countries not to align with India," he said. "It very much depends on India's ability to convince these countries."

Tripathi concurred, saying that greater support from Global South countries would also allow India to “put more pressure” on the current council members for more immediate reform.

“There is a closer eye on India now more than ever as a growing economic power ... how India engages with its neighbours, whether it is playing a constructive role in the issues that are critical to the region will all be very important,” he said.

India: Tension with China to remain amid trust deficit, continuing border standoff

04 October 2024, Tibetan Review

So long as the forward deployments of militaries on the border continues, which resulted from China’s violation of a series of signed agreements, tension in bilateral relations will remain, India’s External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has said Oct 1.

China has recently been trying to sweet talk India into restoring normal bilateral ties while keeping talks ongoing on the continuing border standoff amid heavy deployment of troops and relentless building of strategic infrastructure.

Speaking at an event hosted by Carnegie Endowment in the US, Jaishankar has said: “In terms of our relationship with China, I think it’s a long story, but the short version is that we have agreements on how to keep the border peaceful and tranquil, and those agreements were violated by China in 2020. And ...because we have forward deployments of our militaries, there are resultant tensions. And until those forward deployments are addressed the tensions would continue. If the tensions continue, it casts a natural shadow over the rest of the relationship. So our relationship hasn’t been built for the last four years.”

India and China have been in a territorial face-off since 2020 after the Chinese Army transgressed into multiple areas from the Galwan Valley to the Finger area along the Pangong Lake, noted the ndtv.com Oct 3.

The standoff at the border is continuing as multiple rounds of military and diplomatic discussions did not reap results, the report said.

Jaishankar earlier said the two sides had carried out 75% of the disengagement in eastern Ladakh after a series of talks at various levels but that the trust deficit continued to remain due to China’s propensity to renege on signed agreements and its unwillingness to carry out the remaining disengagements for restoring the pre-2020 border situation.

India cites ‘trust deficit’ to continue winter troop deployment on China-ruled Tibet-borders

01 October 2024, Tibetan Review

With the huge trust deficit with China continuing along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), India is going full steam ahead with preparations to maintain its forward deployment of troops for the fifth successive winter in the forbidding terrain of eastern Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh-Sikkim, reported the timesofindia.com Sep 30.

With this decision., India has continued to avoid falling into China’s trap of the waiting game, thereby maintaining its strategic troops deployment and preventing the Chinese People’s Liberation Army (PLA) from making any further unjust advancements, said zeenews.india.com Sep 30.

Dismissing the significance of the possible suggestions of “progress and narrowing of differences” following recent political-diplomatic talks, top sources in India’s defence establishment have told the timesofindia.com that “the trust deficit on the ground with the PLA remains very high”.

They have pointed to the way China continues to strengthen its forward military positions as well as build “permanent defences” and infrastructure all along the 3,488-km LAC. “It is quite clear the PLA will not be returning to its peacetime locations in the near future,” the sources have added.

As the Indian Army transitions from “the summer to winter posture”, with massive “winter stocking” underway for the additional troops forward deployed along the frontier, General Upendra Dwivedi and the commanders-in-chief of the force’s seven commands will also review the operational situation at a meeting to be held in Gangtok (Sikkim) on Oct 9-10, the report said.

Talk of a possible breakthrough in the military confrontation in eastern Ladakh has been fuelled by a flurry of bilateral political-diplomatic talks over the last couple of months. These included the 30th and 31st meetings of the Working Mechanism for Consultation & Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) on Jul 31 and Aug 29, which were followed by a meeting between national security advisor Ajit Doval and Chinese foreign minister Wang Yi on the side-lines of a BRICS meet at St Petersburg on Sep 12.

However, in the end, there was no change in China’s position, which was made explicit when the rival military corps commanders held their 21st round of talks way back on Feb 19. At that time, China again rebuffed India’s push for defusing the two major continuing face-offs at the strategically-located Depsang Plains, which is towards the crucial Daulat Beg Oldie and Karakoram Pass in the north, and the Charding Ninglung Nallah track junction near Demchok, the report said.

Besides, "disengagement at Depsang and Demchok, if it happens, will only be the first step. Till the subsequent de-escalation and de-induction of troops take place for restoration of status quo ante, the threat will remain," a senior officer has said.

As the situation now stands, the creation of buffer zones after the earlier troop disengagements at Galwan Valley, Pangong Tso-Kailash Range and Gogra-Hot Springs up till Sep 2022 as well as the confrontation at Depsang and Demchok has meant that Indian troops cannot access 26 of their 65 patrolling points (PPs), which begin from the Karakoram Pass in the north and go down to Chumar in the south in eastern Ladakh, the report said.

"Even the buffer zones were meant to be only temporary arrangements. China continues to make unreasonable demands and is playing the long waiting game. India has to be careful about not falling into China's trap," the officer has said.

There is said to be a growing realization, as the military stalemate persists, that only politico-diplomatic talks can break the deadlock.

"If the two sides agree to a broad framework, the actual disengagement modalities at Depsang and Demchok can be worked out at the military level," the officer has added.

India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has on Sep 28 taken a veiled dig at China during his address at the United Nations General Assembly, stating that the sanctioning of global terrorists by the United Nations should not be impeded for political reasons.

He was obviously referring to China's repeated moves over the past several years to prevent the UN security Council from sanctioning Pakistan based terrorists when sought by India and other countries.

"Terrorism is antithetical of everything that the world stands for. All its forms of and manifestations must be resolutely opposed. The sanctioning of global terrorists by the United Nations should also not be impeded for political reasons," timesnownews.com Sep 28 quoted Jaishankar as having said.

Jaishankar Puts China And Pakistan On Blast at the U.N.

28 September 2024, India Today

India's external affairs minister Dr S. Jaishankar rebuked Pakistan and China during his address at the U.N. He made it clear that India will not back down in the face of aggression and provocations. He drew attention to the role of Pakistan in fostering terrorism and China's assertive tactics, the Foreign Minister emphasized that India's patience has its limits and actions have repercussions.

Dr Jaishankar also replied to Pakistan Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's speech, in which he raised the Jammu and Kashmir issue. He said "A dysfunctional nation coveting the lands of others must be exposed and must be countered. We heard some bizarre assertions from it at this forum yesterday. So let me make India's position perfectly clear. Pakistan's cross-border terrorism policy will never succeed. And it can have no expectation of impunity. On the contrary, actions will certainly have consequences. The issue to be resolved between us is now only the vacation of illegally occupied Indian territory by Pakistan. And of course the abandonment of Pakistan's longstanding attachment to terrorism."

Though not named directly, China was a clear target in the Minister's speech when he spoke about the erosion of trust in international processes. "Any connectivity that flouts sovereignty and territorial integrity acquires strategic connotations," he warned, a likely reference to China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) and its contentious projects in the region.

China sends 'deterrent message' with missile intercept test near Indian border

28 September 2024, SCMP

China's missile intercept test near the Indian border is a clear message of deterrence for its neighbour, observers say, as the two sides step up diplomatic talks over their long-running territorial dispute.

The test was part of a live-fire exercise involving surface-to-air missile operations on the Karakoram Plateau, state news agency Xinhua reported on August 29.

It was conducted by the People's Liberation Army Xinjiang Military District, which is responsible for the Chinese side of the border in the western region.

A subsonic cruise missile was successfully intercepted at an altitude of 5,300 metres (17,390 feet) for the first time during the exercise, showing that the interceptor missile was stable and effective in harsh conditions, according to the report.

The specific location of the test was not disclosed, nor is it known when the test took place, but analysts say its proximity to the border suggested it was part of a deterrence strategy.

China and India share an ill-defined, contested border – known as the Line of Actual Control – that spans some 3,488km (2,167 miles).

Their border dispute has been the most contentious aspect of relations for decades. Tensions worsened after a clash in 2020 in a disputed Himalayan border area in which at least 20 Indian and four Chinese troops were killed – the first deadly skirmish between the two sides in at least 45 years.

Lin Minwang, deputy director of Fudan University's Centre for South Asian Studies in Shanghai, said the PLA had been testing weapons and equipment in China's border plateau region since 2020 amid tensions along the frontier with India, and the latest test was in line with that practice.

"It carries a certain deterrent message. To avoid war, we must first possess the capability to fight," Lin said. He said strains in the relationship had shown signs of easing this year.

"Both sides are intensifying efforts to reach an agreement on border issues as soon as possible," he said. "[But] it is impossible for China to meet India's demands ... in this context, the test signifies to India that China possesses military capabilities – and the choice now lies with India."

State media reported the missile intercept test on the same day that China and India held their 31st meeting on border affairs in Beijing, during which they agreed to strengthen dialogue and maintain peace along their border.

During talks in St Petersburg two weeks later, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi and Indian national security adviser Ajit Doval agreed to work together to create the conditions needed to improve bilateral relations.

Song Zhongping, a Chinese military commentator, said the PLA test could be seen as a "guarantee of strength" to support those talks.

"The goal was to intercept all incoming targets, whether they're subsonic or hypersonic [missiles]," Song said. "Negotiations without that guarantee of strength are unlikely to produce results."

The test is likely to heighten concerns in New Delhi, according to Rajeev Ranjan Chaturvedy, an associate professor with Nalanda University's School of Historical Studies in India.

He said the test had "significant implications for regional security dynamics" and suggested that China was "actively enhancing its military capabilities, focusing on creating a more sophisticated arsenal that improves its overall lethality and effectiveness".

"The strategic objective behind such advancements appears to be a shift towards damage limitation, particularly through the deployment of missile defence systems," Chaturvedy said.

He said the timing of the test amid ongoing dialogues between the two sides could prompt India to reassess its defence priorities. "The emphasis on building a more robust deterrent force is imperative, as it could catalyse an arms race in the region," he added.

India could be compelled to accelerate its own military capabilities, including developing hypersonic missiles, long-range air-launched cruise missiles and nuclear ballistic missile submarines, according to Chaturvedy.

China demanding patrolling right in Indian held Arunachal territory?

28 September 2024, Tibetan Review

China has been demanding patrolling access to two Indian held areas of Arunachal Pradesh during the past four years of discussions on restoring the pre-2020 situation in the eastern Ladakh border region, according to the tribuneindia.com Sep 28. It suggested that China tried to create an eastern Ladakh-like situation there too, to prevent India's patrolling of its own Tibet-border territory.

The two spots – one in the Yangtse area north-east of Tawang, where the two sides had a deadly clash in Dec 2022, and the second in central Arunachal along the Subansiri river valley – have been firmly under Indian control for decades, the report said.

The Chinese side was stated to have been making the demand during the 21 rounds of talks held over the past four years, to discuss the dispute on the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh which arose from China's incursions in 2020.

Chinese troops have since been denying access to Indian troops to "patrol points" 10, 11, 12 and 13 (also known in military jargon as PP) on this part of the LAC. All of these originate from "the bottleneck", a geographical feature on the eastern flank of the 972 sq km Dapsang plateau, the report said.

Indian government sources, speaking to The Tribune on the condition of anonymity, have said the Chinese demands were "unreasonable" and "devoid of logic". "The last Indian Army patrol to the PP areas was (undertaken) in Jan 2020," a source has said.

The report cited Indian government sources as reiterating that the so-called Chinese demand to allow its troops to patrol the two spots in Arunachal Pradesh was not a "quid pro quo", as both had been in Indian control for decades.

On the other hand, the issue of patrolling PP 10, 11, 12 and 13 in eastern Ladakh is a dispute that cropped up in Apr 2020. Ever since, the two armies have been locked in a military standoff, the report noted.

India's External Affairs Minister Mr S Jaishankar, speaking at an event in the US on Sep 24, referred to the problems of India's loss of access to the patrolling areas in eastern Ladakh after the Chinese incursion in 2020.

"The main issue right now is the patrolling," Jaishankar said, pointing out that the patrolling arrangements since 2020 had been disturbed. He went on to describe the India-China relationship as "significantly disturbed" as a result of it.

The report cited Indian military sources as separately confirming that since Apr 2020, Chinese troops had not allowed Indian soldiers to patrol areas PP 10, 11, 12 and 13. Indian side had patrolled there until the Chinese incursions.

China tried to achieve eastern Ladakh-like situation in Arunachal Pradesh too in 2022. After the Dec 2022 clash at Yangtse, Defence Minister Singh had told Indian Parliament: "The PLA (People's Liberation Army) troops on Dec 9 tried to transgress the LAC in Yangtse area of Tawang sector and unilaterally change the status quo."

There were also face-offs in the Yangtse area in the past, a major one being in Oct 2021, the report noted. The Chinese attempt was to get access to the top of the 17,000-foot-high peak that provides a commanding view on both sides of the LAC. India has remained in firm control of the top and its access routes from its own side, the report said.

Elsewhere in Arunachal Pradesh, the two armies have had face-offs in the past at the second spot, in the Subansiri valley in central Arunachal.

Over the past 21 rounds of talks, India was stated to have been suggesting to China a graded three-step process for resolving the Eastern Ladakh issue. The first involves disengagement of troops within close proximity to each other in grey zones along the LAC and getting back to positions as on Apr 2020. The next two steps – de-escalation and de-induction – entail pulling back troops and equipment to the pre-Apr 2020 levels, the report added.

China calls India's conquest, naming of Arunachal peak after 6th Dalai Lama 'illegal'

27 September 2024, Tibetan Review

On the basis of its claim that Tibet "belongs" to it and, by extension, Arunachal Pradesh too, China has called the recent scaling of a hitherto unclimbed peak in the Indian state by a team of Indian mountaineers and its naming of it after the 6th Dalai Lama of Tibet "illegal".

A team of 15 members from the National Institute of Mountaineering and Adventure Sports (NIMAS) successfully climbed the 20,942-foot-high, previously unclimbed peak in a 15-day expedition and named it as the "Tsangyang Gyatso Peak".

NIMAS, based in Dirang, Arunachal Pradesh, operates under the ministry of defence, noted the hindustantimes.com Sep 27.

In a press release, the defence ministry stated that naming the peak after the 6th Dalai Lama pays homage to his enduring wisdom and significant contributions to the Monpa community and beyond.

China has condemned the entire exercise, calling it "illegal and null and void".

While noting he was not aware of the entire exercise, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian has told a media briefing, "Let me say more broadly that the area of Zangnan is Chinese territory, and it's illegal, and null and void for India to set up the so-called 'Arunachal Pradesh' in Chinese territory. This has been China's consistent position."

"Zangnan" is Chinese for "southern Tibet". China claims that the state belongs to it on the basis of its claim over Tibet. India recognized Tibet as an autonomous region of the People's Republic of China but denies that this includes Arunachal Pradesh also. India has not yet reacted to China's remarks but has maintained that Arunachal Pradesh was an integral part of India and assigning "invented" names does not alter this reality, noted indiatoday.in Sep 27, referring to China's renaming of places in the state in recent years.

Meanwhile, Arunachal Chief Minister Mr Pema Khandu has extended his wishes to the NIMAS team for its achievement.

"Led by Director Ranveer Jamwal, they've successfully summited an untamed peak in the Gorichen Massif of Mon Tawang Region of Arunachal Pradesh, reaching an impressive 6,383 meters!" he wrote on X.

Renaming of Arunachal peak illegal: China

27 September 2024, TOI, Prabin Kalita

Days after an Indian mountaineering team scaled an unnamed and unconquered peak in Arunachal Pradesh's Tawang region and named it after the sixth Dalai Lama, a furious China on Thursday hit out at what it called an illegal operation in "Chinese territory".

A team of 15 mountaineers from the National Institute of Mountaineering and Adventure Sports (NIMAS) in Dirang successfully scaled the peak last Saturday, and named it "Tsangyang Gyatso Peak" in honour of Tsangyang Gyatso (17th-18th century CE), the sixth Dalai Lama, who was born in Tawang.

While the Army sends several adventure expeditions, many see these as dual-purpose endeavours aimed also at rebuffing the claims of China on Arunachal Pradesh. China insists on calling the Indian state 'Zangnan'.

Naming the peak after the 6th Dalai Lama would not have also gone down well with the Chinese who have tried to belittle the significance of the institution which serves as a reminder of Tibet's existence as an independent entity before it was grabbed by Beijing. A defence ministry statement saying the choice of name of the 6th Dalai Lama is a tribute to his timeless wisdom and his profound contributions to the Monpa community and beyond, seemed to rub it in.

When asked for his reaction, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Lin Jian told a media briefing in Beijing: "I'm not aware of what you mentioned."

"Let me say more broadly that the area of Zangnan is Chinese territory, and it's illegal, and null and void for India to set up the so-called 'Arunachal Pradesh' in Chinese territory. This has been China's consistent position," he said.

Reached 'some consensus' with India: Chinese military on disengagement process in Ladakh

27 September 2024, The Hindu

China and India were able to "reduce differences" and build "some consensus" on disengaging troops from friction points to end the standoff in eastern Ladakh and agreed to maintain dialogue to reach a resolution acceptable to both sides at an "early date", the Chinese Defence Ministry said on Thursday (September 26, 2024). Under the guidance of two leaders, China and India have maintained communication with each other through diplomatic and military channels, including between two foreign Ministers and China's Foreign Minister and India's National Security Advisor, and through the border consultation mechanisms, Mr. Zhang Xiaogang said. Both China and India, through talks, were "able to reduce their differences and build some consensus besides agreeing to strengthen dialogue to accommodate each other's legitimate concerns", Mr. Zhang, a spokesperson for the Ministry of National Defence, told a media briefing in Beijing. "The two sides agreed to reach a resolution at an early date acceptable to both sides," he said.

He was replying to a question on the talks between the two countries on disengagement from the remaining friction points especially Demchok and Depsang to end the over four-year-long military standoff in eastern Ladakh resulting in a freeze of relations between the two countries.

Mr. Zhang referred to the meeting between External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi as well as the recent meeting on the sidelines of the BRICS meeting in Russia between Wang and National Security Advisor Ajit Doval.

On September 3, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning, while commenting on the talks between Wang and Doval, said the "front-line armies of the two countries have realised disengagement in four areas in the Western sector of the China-India border, including the Galwan Valley". In his reply to the question, Mr. Zhang didn't comment on the progress of the disengagement from the remaining areas including Depsang and Demchok but said both sides will continue to consolidate the outcomes.

"We will continue to consolidate the outcomes we have reached and respect bilateral agreements and confidence-building measures to safeguard peace and tranquillity at the border," he said.

His comment respecting bilateral agreements came as Jaishankar, while addressing an event hosted by the Asia Society and the Asia Society Policy Institute in New York on Tuesday (September 24, 2024), said there were a series of agreements between the two countries that went into greater and greater detail on how to make sure the border remained peaceful and stable. "Now the problem was in 2020, despite these very explicit agreements, we saw that the Chinese - we were all in the middle of Covid at that time - moved a large number of forces in violation of these agreements to the Line of Actual Control. And we responded in kind," he said.

Meanwhile, Li Jinsong, Director-General of the Department of Asian Affairs of the Foreign Ministry, met with Indian Ambassador to China Pradeep Kumar Rawat here, the Chinese Foreign Ministry said, without providing any details.

China's high-altitude heliports in Tibet a sobering reminder of threat to India along LAC

26 September 2024, The New Indian Express

The military dynamics of Tibet are undergoing a fresh change with the construction of high-altitude helicopter infrastructure in the area.

An under-construction heliport in Gar County The Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) presents unique challenges for air infrastructure superiority, with its high altitude and rugged terrain. While the expansion of airports and deployment of fighter jets and sophisticated radar systems have been traditional measures of this superiority, a less recognised but equally critical aspect is China's increasing rotary-wing capabilities at extreme altitudes.

Our research reveals that nearly 90% of heliports in the TAR are located at elevations between 3,300 and 5,300 m (10,000–17,400 ft), with 80% concentrated above 3,600 m. These advancements signal that China's once-significant limitations in helicopter operations at such altitudes are swiftly diminishing.

China's critical military infrastructure at higher altitudes is rapidly expanding in the challenging environment of the TAR. A vital part of this expansion is the proliferation of high-altitude heliports and helipads, which are quickly becoming crucial nodes in the People's Liberation Army (PLA) ground and air operations strategy.

These helipads, strategically placed near the Line of Actual Control (LAC) between India and China, disputed areas with Bhutan, and critical infrastructure like surface-to-missile (SAM) sites and military barracks, serve as logistics hubs. Their role in facilitating rapid troop and equipment movement underscores their strategic significance.

The figure above shows the distribution of 109 helipads based on their elevation. Surprisingly, only two helipads are positioned at an elevation of 780 to 2600 m. However, 32 helipads are located between 2700 and 3600 m, 44 helipads between 3700 and 4300 m, and 25 helipads between 4400 and 4700 m. Six more helipads are positioned at elevations between 4800 and 5400 m. These helipads exhibit a wide range of elevations, from a minimum of 780.50 m to a maximum of 5374 m, with an average elevation of approximately 3930 m.

Once considered to be a handicap in PLA's air operation, China's high-altitude capabilities have seen a significant and rapid expansion. This development underscores the urgency of the situation and the growth of the PLA's air operations in a way that cannot be ignored.

A new approach of extending heli strips to allow Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs) to land on strips shorter than 1,000 m highlights China's forward-thinking military infrastructure, making these sites useful for both helicopters and UAVs.

Over the past decade, the PLA has substantially invested in helicopter infrastructure, which has increased its operational capability. These expenses are not merely reactions to disputes like the 2017 Doklam standoff or the 2020 Galwan Valley clash. Instead, they are a calculated approach aimed at guaranteeing long-term gains in a zone where the topography and elevation seriously challenge the PLA's troops.

For example, the Z-20 and Z-8L helicopters have been specially built to operate under the difficult circumstances of the Tibetan plateau, highlighting China's will to overcome the obstacles presented by the hostile surroundings.

Modernising and Expanding: A Strategic Choice

While the rate of heliport construction is slower than the growth of airfields, it reflects the PLA's approach of aggressively expanding its military infrastructure. Some of the heliports studied in our research are undergoing infrastructure upgrades/expansion, while a few are newly established.

India displays battle readiness as eastern Ladakh standoff continues amid Chinese buildup

25 September 2024, Tibetan Review

As China continues its military and strategic infrastructure buildup in occupied Tibet while refusing to pull back from eastern Ladakh to restore the pre-2020 border situation, India has sought to make clear its readiness to defend its territorial integrity. On Sep 22, the Indian Army troops displayed multiple tactical tank exercises in the icy heights of Nyoma in eastern Ladakh, reported newindianexpress.com Sep 24.

The exercises, carried out by the armoured unit, saw modern war horses T-90, T-72 and BMP-2 pass through rapid enemy assault in the undulating surface of the valley. Nyoma stands at a height of about 13,700 ft and is around 30 km inside the Line of Actual Control (LAC), the report said.

Speaking about the T-90 tank, soldier tradesman Manoj Kumar has said, "We are fully prepared to destroy our enemy at this altitude. It can be deployed anywhere and remove its obstacles to cross the area. It is capable of deep-fording (a technique used to cross deep water by driving a vehicle on the riverbed, lakebed, or seabed)."

"This is one of the best tanks in the world. We are very proud that this tank is being manufactured in India," he has said, adding, it is effective in any weather condition, day and night.

Also, this tank, which is fitted with a 1000-hp engine, can cross any obstacles anytime. It can be deployed in deserts and marshy land.

Speaking about the tank's combat capability, the report said India's front-ranking Bhisma T-90 tank is equipped with 'hunter killer' capabilities – combat power, reconnaissance capability, and survivability.

The LAC runs through eastern Ladakh for 832 km and is dotted with open valleys. The Indian Army had to induct a significant number of T-72 and T-90 tanks in operational areas, gaining tactical surprise over the adversary, forcing it on the back foot, the report noted.

India rules out joining world's largest trade deal, accuses China of 'very opaque' trade practices

22 September 2024, CNBC, Lee Ying Shan

India's commerce minister rejected the idea of joining the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership, the world's largest trade deal, maintaining that it is not in the country's interest to be part of a free trade agreement with China.

"India is not going to join the RCEP because neither did it reflect the guiding principles on which ASEAN was started, nor is it in the nation's interest to do a free trade agreement with China," India's Minister of Commerce and Industry Piyush Goyal told CNBC's Tanvir Gill in an interview.

The RCEP deal was signed in 2020 by 15 Asia-Pacific countries — which makes up out 30% of global GDP — and came into force in January 2022. The countries are the 10 members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, and five of their largest trading partners, China, South Korea, Japan, Australia and New Zealand.

Negotiations for the RCEP started in 2013 and initially included India, which some members viewed as a counterbalance to China. However, in 2019, India chose not to join RCEP, citing unresolved "core interest" issues. Back then, India did not expand on what some of those core unresolved interests were.

Goyal noted that at that time, India already had a free trade agreement with ASEAN, Japan and Korea, as well as a bilateral trade with New Zealand worth $300 million.

"It was not in our farmers' interest, RCEP did not reflect the aspirations of our small and micro medium industries and sector, and in some form, was nothing but a free trade agreement with China," he said.

as a counterbalance to China. However, in 2019, India chose not to join RCEP, citing unresolved "core interest" issues. Back then, India did not expand on what some of those core unresolved interests were.

Goyal noted that at that time, India already had a free trade agreement with ASEAN, Japan and Korea, as well as a bilateral trade with New Zealand worth $300 million.

"It was not in our farmers' interest, RCEP did not reflect the aspirations of our small and micro medium industries and sector, and in some form, was nothing but a free trade agreement with China," he said.

"Certainly nobody back home would like to have an FTA with [a] non-transparent economy, very opaque in its economic practices, where both trading systems, political systems, the economy — the way it is managed — is completely different from what the democratic world wants."

Goyal also accused China of using the World Trade Organization's policies to its advantage, flooding various economies with goods at low prices which often do not meet quality standards.

From solar panels to cars to steel, China has recently been churning out more goods in an economy that has been slow to absorb, resulting in a surge of cheap exports to foreign markets.

Semiconductor ambitions

The minister also made a strong case for India to become a Taiwan "plus one" semiconductor country. "China Plus One" is a phrase used to describe a supply chain strategy that sees companies diversifying manufacturing and sourcing, by continuing operations in the mainland while also expanding into other countries. This approach aims to reduce risks linked to complete reliance on a single country's market or supply chain.

Spinning off that idea, Goyal thinks India can become an alternative place in the region for companies that want to diversify outside of Taiwan for semiconductors.

"We are encouraging [the] semiconductor industry in a big way. We started building up the ecosystem, which is essential before we can see more and more foundries coming into the country for the actual chip making," Goyal said.

"We expect the demand for semiconductor products to be about $100 billion by 2030, and will grow exponentially thereafter," he said, adding that interest in India's semiconductor industry is expanding "by leaps and bounds."

India aims to establish itself as a major chips hub similar to the U.S., Taiwan, and South Korea, actively seeking foreign companies to set up their operations in the country.

Earlier this year, Prime Minister Narendra Modi inaugurated three semiconductor plants, bringing the total count of plants under development in India to four. One of those plants is a joint venture between Tata Electronics and Taiwan's Powerchip Semiconductor Manufacturing Corp. The plant, which is set up in Dholera, Gujarat state, is expected to deliver its first batch of semiconductors by late 2025 or early 2026.

Asked if India can be Taiwan's "plus one" in the semiconductor space, Goyal said that his country's size, democracy and rule of law means it is a "safe harbor."

"It provides an alternative where you will always have a youthful population in life, huge demand, and you will have the rule of law to back it. I think that's a very compulsive case," he said.

The world recognizes that excessive concentration in any one region is fraught with serious risks, Goyal added.

India's chip strategy has two main components: attracting foreign companies to establish operations and invest in the country, as well as forming partnerships with other major semiconductor nations, such as the U.S. In 2021, the government approved a $10 billion incentive program for the sector, which is also available to foreign companies.

As of 2024, Taiwan, the world's chipmaking powerhouse, is expected to hold around 44% of global market share, followed by China with 28% and South Korea with 12%, according to a report. The U.S. and Japan account for 6% and 2%, respectively.

The authors of the report, Taiwan consultancy Trendforce, said Taiwan's global capacity share in advanced manufacturing processes is expected to decrease to 40% by 2027, while South Korea's could see a 2% decline. In the same time period, China's is expected to increase by 3% to 31%. "When you see from the lens sitting outside the country, you don't realize how difficult it is to compete against a non-transparent economy," the minister continued, in reference to China.

China welcomes more Indian investments, ambassador says

20 September 2024, Reuters

China would welcome more Indian investments and commodities in the Chinese market and also hopes that India will provide a "sound business environment" for Chinese firms in the country, Beijing's ambassador to India, Xu Feihong, said on Thursday.

The comments signal a willingness from Beijing to forge deeper economic ties with New Delhi that have been strained since a deadly clash between their troops on a Himalayan frontier in 2020.

India heightened scrutiny on Chinese investments after the clash and created new layers of red tape for Indian firms with Chinese stakeholders. But the Indian government is now looking to loosen some of these restrictions as its firms struggle to scale up manufacturing.

Ambassador Xu, speaking at an event in New Delhi, said that China is also willing to advance cooperation with India on science and technology, and hopes India will take measures to resume direct flights and facilitate visas for Chinese citizens.

He said China would welcome more Indian commodities and investment by Indian enterprises, adding, "It is hoped that the Indian side could provide sound business environment for the Chinese enterprises in India".

China continues to be India's biggest source of goods and was the largest supplier of industrial products last year. India's trade gap with China fell briefly after the border clash but later doubled to $85 billion as of March 2024.

Indian minister cites Tibet-border progress with China, cites a host of other difficulties in bilateral ties

13 September 2024, Tibetan Review

India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has said Sep 12 that roughly 75% of the "disengagement problems" with China in the eastern Ladakh border area with Chinese-ruled Tibet had been sorted out, citing this as a progress. However, he has added that the bigger issue remained the increasing militarization of the frontier and the complex relationship between the two sides on a host of other issues as well.

India's relations with China cannot become normal until peace and tranquillity is restored on the border between the two countries, thestatesman.com Sep 12 cited him as reiterating.

The minister has said the two countries had negotiated for the last four years in the aftermath of the Jun 2020 clashes in the Galwan Valley that killed 20 Indian troops.

That year, Jaishankar has said, China moved a large number of troops to the Line of Actual Control (LAC) "in violation of multiple agreements for some reason, which is not entirely clear to us".

So, "the first step to that (solving the border stand-off) is disengagement... We have made some progress. You can say roughly 75% of the disengagement problems have been sorted out," he has said.

He has said the border confrontation had affected the entirety of the bilateral relationship.

"Because, you cannot have violence at the border and say the rest of the relationship is insulated from it. Trade has got affected. The exchanges have gotten affected. It is not normal," theprint.in Sep 12 quoted him as saying, speaking with Jean David-Levitte, the former French permanent representative to the United Nations at the Geneva Centre for Security Policy (GCSP), a think-tank.

Jaishankar was visiting Switzerland from Sep 12 to 13, following a two-day stop in Germany.

India took a series of measures after the Galwan Valley clash. It banned a large of Chinese apps in a series of announcements, including the highly popular and profitable short video app TikTok. It also tightened restrictions on Chinese investments in India. Besides, India is yet to lift the Covid-era restrictions of direct flights to China, while the number of visas issued to Chinese citizens has fallen to 5,500 in 2023 from nearly 2,00,000 in 2018, the report noted.

The minister has also called trade ties between India and China "very unfair," saying the imbalance was extremely high. In 2023-2024, India imported $101.74 billion worth of goods from China, while exporting only about $16.66 billion – nearly a $85 billion deficit.

"We do not have the market access there. They have much better market access in India. We have concerns in various areas – in technology, telecommunications, digital. We also monitor what happens in the Indian Ocean," Jaishankar has added.

He has said any "radical change" of presence in the Indian Ocean would require India to scrutinize it under its "security calculus".

The external affairs minister indicated that the relationship could improve if there is a resolution to the border row. "We hope that if there is a solution to the disengagement and there is a return to peace and tranquillity, then we can look at other possibilities," firstpost.com Sep 12 quoted him as saying.

India, China agree to redouble efforts for complete disengagement along border

12 September 2024, Reuters

India and China agreed to redouble efforts to ensure complete disengagement on the contested Himalayan frontier, New Delhi said on Thursday after India's National Security Adviser Ajit Doval met China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi in Russia.

"Both sides agreed to work with urgency and redouble their efforts to realize complete disengagement in the remaining areas," the Indian government said in a statement.

China occupied land the size of Delhi in Ladakh': Rahul Gandhi makes big claim, attacks PM Modi

11 September 2024, Business Today

Rahul Gandhi's claims that China has occupied Indian territory in Ladakh are not new.

Leader of Opposition in the Lok Sabha Rahul Gandhi on Wednesday made a huge claim regarding the occupation of land in Ladakh by Chinese troops. While attacking the Modi government, Gandhi said that the Chinese troops have occupied land the size of Delhi in Ladakh.

"Well, if you call having Chinese troops in 4,000 square kilometres of our territory handling something well, then maybe we've got Chinese troops occupying land the size of Delhi in Ladakh," Gandhi said while speaking at the National Press Club in Washington DC.

He went onto India's handling of the situation a "disaster". Claiming that the media does not question the government on the same, Gandhi asked: "How would America react if a neighbour occupied 4,000 sq kms of your territory? Would any president be able to get away with saying that he's handled that well?"

Rahul Gandhi also seized this opportunity to attack Prime Minister Narendra Modi. "So I don't think PM Modi handled China well at all. I see no reason why Chinese troops should be sitting in our territory," the Gandhi scion said.

Gandhi's claims that China has occupied Indian territory in Ladakh are not new. Last year, Rahul Gandhi accused PM Modi of lying to the opposition over the Indo-China border situation in Ladakh. He also repeated his claim that China has snatched Indian territory.

Modi told leaders of all political parties that neither has anyone entered nor is anyone present in Indian territory. The Prime Minister also told the leaders that no Indian post was captured.

Earlier this year, the Congress accused the Modi government of giving a "clean chit" to China and asserted that the encroachment will be halted decisively when the party comes to power.

At the time, Congress leader Jairam Ramesh claimed that the Prime Minister and Home Minister are denying that China has occupied around 2,000 sq km of Indian territory.

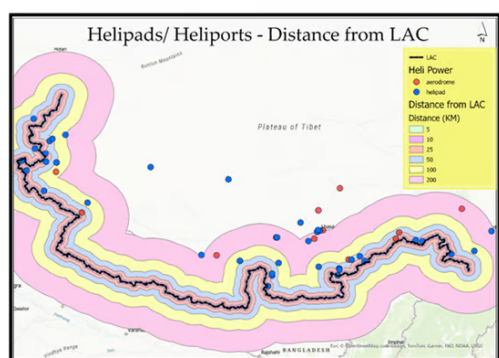

He further said the Chinese have taken over 26 out of 65 patrolling points in Ladakh, while adding that China has built complete villages 50-60 km deep inside Arunachal Pradesh. Ramesh said that this fact was confirmed by satellite imagery and the issue was also raised by BJP MP Tapir Gao in the Lok Sabha.

The statement came after Union Home Minister Amit Shah said that China could not encroach upon a "single inch" of land under the Modi dispensation.

He also claimed that people will never forget how former PM Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru said "bye-bye" to Assam and Arunachal Pradesh during the 1962 Indo-China war.

Heliport in Lhasa

The figure above shows helipads/heliports and aerodromes located 5, 10, 25, 50, 100, and 200 km from the LAC. The spacing of these heliports highlights their strategic importance.

Heliport concentrations close to the LAC and other disputed regions highlight their importance in supporting ground operations and preserving a continuous military presence in disputed territory. Combining these heliports with other military installations, such as radar stations and Surface-to-Air Missile (SAM) sites, can create a dense network of military capabilities that can be rapidly mobilised in response to any border escalation.

These heliports' proximity to the Indian border allows the PLA to quickly deploy hop-on, hop-off forces in case of a confrontation, matching Indian defences in high-altitude locations with supply lines and logistics. Over the years, China may have a significant advantage over its neighbours if it keeps constructing such infrastructure at this rate. This underscores China's long-term approach to defending its territorial claims and establishing hegemony by incorporating these heliports in a more extensive military infrastructure network.

These advances will impact the strategic calculus in the Himalayan borderlands, serving as a sobering reminder of how the threat is changing for India along its northern front. As the PLA keeps improving its capacity in Tibet, India must react with similar steps to guarantee it is ready to handle the difficulties presented by China's growing military presence in the Himalayas.

India has to change its policy if it wants to attract more Chinese investment: China Daily editorial

11 September 2024, China Daily

There have been positive signs of improving China-India economic relations recently, as evidenced by Indian officials talking about easing restrictions on Chinese investment, and New Delhi making moves to expedite visa approvals for Chinese technicians.

Rajeev Chandrasekhar, India's minister of state for electronics and information technology, said recently that his country is "open" to investments from China, while Indian Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar said "we are not closed to business from China".

New Delhi has also launched a new portal to streamline the issuing of business visas for Chinese technicians whose expertise is key to India's manufacturing facilities that use Chinese machinery. These developments are encouraging considering how trade and investment between the two giant neighbors have been disrupted due to the restrictive measures New Delhi adopted after a deadly clash between the two countries' border troops in June 2020.

Since then, India has banned hundreds of Chinese apps including TikTok on the grounds of addressing national security concerns, and launched so-called regulatory investigations against major Chinese high-tech companies such as Xiaomi and Oppo.

The crackdown has disrupted the previously good economic relations India had with China.

The seeming softening of attitude by New Delhi toward Chinese investment may have been made out of expediency, as declining foreign investment is likely to pose a challenge to India's economic ambition to become a developed country by the middle of this century.

Foreign direct investment in India plummeted by more than 40 percent to $28 billion last year, according to a report by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, compared with an annual average of around $40 billion in recent years. Analysts attributed the decline in FDI inflows to red tape and India's discriminatory economic policies.

Yet a recent survey by India's chief economic adviser suggested that boosting FDI inflows from China in nonsensitive sectors such as solar panels and battery manufacturing, where India lacks expertise, "appears more advantageous than relying on trade" for its economy to achieve sustained growth.

India's exports to China, its largest trading partner, stood at $16.65 billion last year, while imports from the country reached $101.75 billion, leaving a trade deficit of more than $85 billion.

Despite the tensions in bilateral relations and India's curbs on Chinese investment, China continues to play an irreplaceable role in India's economic development. For example, China has remained the biggest supplier of components and parts for the development of India's booming electronic and automobile industries, hallmarks of India's economic success. All this attests to the resilience and potential of economic and trade cooperation between the two countries.

China views India as an important investment destination and has expressed interest in expanding its investment footprint in various sectors in India, and it continues to promote and encourage bilateral investment cooperation between the two countries.

Increased trade and investment from China can help boost India's economy. However, despite the increasing calls to attract more investment from China, India's Commerce and Industry Minister Piyush Goyal insisted there is no "rethinking" to support Chinese investments in the country.

Since the two countries are not rivals or threats to each other but partners in cooperation and development, creating opportunities for each other benefits both sides.

New Delhi should work to strengthen its economic partnership with China, and provide a fair, just, transparent and nondiscriminatory business environment for Chinese investment.

Indian foreign minister Jaishankar says "not closed to business from China"

10 September 2024, Reuters

India is not "closed to business from China", but the issue is in which sectors the country does business with Beijing and on what terms, foreign minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar said in Berlin on Tuesday. Ties between the nuclear-armed Asian giants have been strained since clashes between their troops on their largely undemarcated Himalayan frontier left 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers dead in 2020.

India subsequently tightened its scrutiny of investments from Chinese companies and halted major projects.

However, government officials, including Finance Minister Nirmala Sitharaman, have recently backed suggestions to allow more Chinese investment in the country.

The latest annual economic survey released in July suggests that to boost its global exports, India can either integrate into China's supply chain or promote foreign direct investment (FDI) from China.

"We are not closed to business from China...I think the issue is, which sectors do you do business and what terms do you do business? It's far more complicated than a black and white binary answer," Jaishankar said at a conference in Berlin.

Reuters reported in July that India could ease restrictions on Chinese investment in non-sensitive sectors such as solar panels and battery manufacturing where New Delhi lacks expertise and which hinders domestic manufacturing.

Diplomatic and military talks to end the military standoff in the Himalayas have made slow progress.

Along with investments scrutiny, India has also virtually blocked visas for all Chinese nationals since 2020, but it is considering easing them for Chinese technicians, as it had hindered investments worth billions of dollars.

Mere painting of marks does not mean China encroached our land: Rijiju

09 September 2024, Business Standard

The union minister's comments came amidst reports that the PLA allegedly entered inside Indian territory in the Anjaw district of Arunachal Pradesh last week and they were camping in the Kapapu area

But we will not allow anyone to come near the Line of Actual Control: Union Minister Kiren Rijiju | (Photo: PTI)

Amidst reports of incursion by China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) in Arunachal Pradesh, Union Minister Kiren Rijiju on Monday said the mere painting of marks in undemarcated locations doesn't mean the areas have been encroached upon.

Rijiju, who hails from Arunachal Pradesh, also said that overlapping of patrolling by Indian and Chinese forces does take place in the undemarcated areas along the Sino-Indian border but that does not lead to encroachment of Indian territory.

The union minister's comments came amidst reports that the PLA allegedly entered inside Indian territory in the Anjaw district of Arunachal Pradesh last week and they were camping in the Kapapu area of the district for some time.

Pictures of bonfires, painting of rocks and Chinese food materials found at the site have been shared on social media, the reports said.

"China can't take our land. Overlapping of patrolling does take place in the undemarcated areas. They are not allowed to construct anything permanent. There is strict vigil from our side. Mere painting of marks in undemarcated locations doesn't mean the areas have been encroached on," Rijiju told PTI here.

The union minister said India has been building infrastructure along the border and that will continue.

"But we will not allow anyone to come near the Line of Actual Control," he said.

The latest incident came at a time when the Indian army continues to engage in a stand-off with the PLA in Ladakh. The stand-off has been going on since April 2020.

India shares a 3,400 km-long Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China from Ladakh to Arunachal Pradesh. China continues to claim that Arunachal Pradesh has "always been" its territory, a claim India termed as "absurd" and "ludicrous".

China, which terms Arunachal Pradesh as South Tibet, routinely objects to Indian leaders' visits to the state to highlight its claims. Beijing has also named the area as Zangnan.

India has repeatedly rejected China's territorial claims over Arunachal Pradesh, asserting that the state is an integral part of the country.

New Delhi has also dismissed Beijing's move to assign "invented" names to the area, saying it did not alter the reality.

Foreign minister Jaishankar underlines India's special problem with China

31 August 2024, Tibetan Review

India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has on Aug 31 noted that there is a general China problem being debated in many countries of the world, and India is not the only one facing issues with it. However, India's problems with China are particularly significant, extending beyond the shared concerns of the international community, timesofindia.com Aug 31 cited Jaishankar as saying during a conversation with Pranab Dhal Samanta at the ET World Leaders Forum in Delhi.

"There is a general China problem, apart from our own difficult situation in the border. We are not the only country in the world which is having a debate about China. Go to Europe, and ask them what is today among your major economic or national security debates? It's about China. Look at the United States (of America). It's obsessed with China, and rightly so in many ways. So, the fact is let's not make out as though it's only India which has a China problem." Elaborating on it further, Jaishankar has said, "Decades ago the world decided to overlook problems in China. Now everyone has a problem. India has a special China problem, over and above the world's China problem. Because there is a general problem, apart from our border situation, the sensible thing to do is take precautions which a country like India should be taking."

He has said one of these precautions is to scrutinize Chinese investments in India.

"It has never been the government's position that we should not be having investments from China or doing business with China. But on the investment issue it is common sense that investments from China would be scrutinized. I think the border, and the state of relations between India and China call for it."

And he has stressed the importance of carefully examining investments originating from China before granting approval. He has noted that even countries without shared borders with China are subjecting Chinese investments to increased scrutiny, although the level of examination may vary.

The minister emphasized the delicate balance between economic considerations and national security, remarking, "There is a thin line between economics and national security in most cases," reported business.bbc.com in Aug 31.

The minister's remarks came as both India and China spoke positively about the atmospherics of the 31st meeting of the Working Mechanism for Consultation & Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) which was held in Beijing on Aug 29 and their desires and goals. However, India again differed from China by its insistence that normalizing the border situation was prerequisite for resuming normal overall ties.

China and India held six rounds of WMCC meetings on border affairs in 2020 following the Galwan Valley border skirmish on Jun 15, 2020. Except for that year, since the first WMCC meeting on border affairs started in 2012, the two sides have held WMCC meetings on border affairs one to three times a year, China's official globaltimes.cn Aug 31 cited analysts as saying. It cited the analysts as also saying that the recent frequent interactions signalled that both sides were actively seeking to accelerate a resolution to the border standoff and to get bilateral relations back on track.

India, China discuss situation along LAC to narrow down differences and find resolutions

29 August 2024, Times Of India

The ministry of external affairs said that India and China held a discussion over the situation along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) on Thursday and decided to jointly uphold peace and tranquillity on the ground. MEA said that a 'frank, constructive and forward-looking exchange of views' took place at the 31st meeting of the Working Mechanism for Consultation & Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) in Beijing.

The Indian delegation was led by Gourangalal Das, joint secretary (East Asia) while the Chinese delegation was led by Hong Liang, director general of the boundary & ocean affairs department of the Chinese ministry of foreign affairs. The two sides narrowed down their differences and sought to find early resolution of the outstanding issues. For this, they further agreed for intensified contact through diplomatic and military channels.

Indian solar panels face US scrutiny for possible links to China forced labor

27 August 2024, Reuters, Lewis Jackson and Nichola Groom

U.S. Customs and Border Protection has detained nearly $43 million in shipments of electronics equipment from India since October under a 2022 law banning goods made with forced labor, according to agency data, representing a new focus for the trade enforcement agency.

While CBP does not specify what types of electronic equipment it has detained, polysilicon, a raw material in solar panels, is identified as a high-priority sector in the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act (UFLPA), and solar panels have historically made up most of the stopped shipments in that category, according to industry sources.

The CBP did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The law bans goods made in China's Xinjiang region where Chinese authorities are reported to have established labor camps for ethnic Uyghur and other Muslim groups.

China denies any abuses.

No Indian electronics shipments were detained under the UFLPA in previous years.

Nearly a third of the detained Indian electronics shipments were denied, according to CBP. By comparison, just 5.4% of shipments from top U.S. solar component suppliers Malaysia, Vietnam and Thailand were denied entry over that period.

The Indian detentions represent a small share of the $3 billion in electronics shipments CBP has stopped at the border under the UFLPA in the last two years.

But they are a setback for Indian producers seeking to cast themselves as an alternative for U.S. solar project developers weary of navigating tariffs and UFLPA enforcement delays on panels made by mainly Chinese companies.

"If the solar cells for Indian panels are coming from China, then there is likely a good reason why detentions of Indian products may be increasing," said Tim Brightbill, a trade attorney with Wiley Rein LLP. "My sense is that Customs and Border Protection did not realize for a while that many Indian solar panels contained Chinese solar cells, and therefore the UFLPA risks were (and are) high."

Imports of solar products from India have soared in recent years, hitting $2.3 billion last year, according to U.S. trade data.

In the second quarter of 2024, India accounted for 11% of U.S. panel imports, more than double its share in the previous quarter, according to S&P Global Market Intelligence.

As recently as 2018, the U.S. was not importing any solar panels from India.

The increased scrutiny of Indian shipments is a reflection of the border agency's recent efforts to broaden UFLPA enforcement beyond just the biggest China-based solar panel makers, which have replaced their Chinese polysilicon suppliers with sources from the United States and Europe in a bid to avoid their shipments being detained, according to a trade attorney.

"Indian module manufacturers found an opportunity to import more at a time when the Chinese manufacturers were being held up because of UFLPA," Richard Mojica, a trade attorney with Miller & Chevalier in Washington said.

Waaree Technologies (WAAR.BO), opens new tab and Adani Enterprises (ADEL.NS), opens new tab are the top Indian solar suppliers to the U.S. market.

A spokesperson for Adani confirmed that some of its shipments had been detained and that all had been released.

"This outcome reaffirms that our products imported into the U.S. fully comply with UFLPA regulations, reinforcing customer confidence in the quality, reliability and legal adherence of our products and manufacturing," the spokesperson said.

Waaree did not respond to requests for comment. Following the guidance from two foreign ministers' meetings in Astana and Vientiane in July 2024, both sides engaged with a goal to narrow down differences and find an early resolution to outstanding issues. To achieve this, they decided to intensify contact through both diplomatic and military channels. "In the meantime, they decided to jointly uphold peace and tranquillity on the ground in border areas in accordance with relevant bilateral agreements, protocols and understandings reached between the two Governments. It was reiterated that restoration of peace and tranquility, and respect for LAC are the essential basis for restoration of normalcy in bilateral relations," MEA said in a press release. Additionally, the leader of the Indian delegation called on the vice minister in the Chinese ministry of foreign affairs. This meeting builds upon the previous WMCC meeting held last month.

Ladakh herders seek mechanism for return of yaks straying across Tibet border

20 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Villagers in Ladakh have rounded up yaks that had strayed from across the Tibetan side of the international border but there is no mechanism for returning them, or getting back their own herd that had previously strayed to the other side, reported greaterkashmir.com Aug 19.

Konchok Stanzin, a politician and a former executive Councillor for Ladakh Autonomous Hill Development Council, has tweeted that these yaks, numbering 40, from Tibet were found on Dzomolung Demchok valley. He has on Aug 19 posted videos and pictures which he said were of "Chinese" yaks that had strayed to the Indian side.

Konchok Stanzin has said that people from the Indian side in Ladakh too had lost their yaks some years ago, after they strayed into Tibet, but never got them back. He has urged the governments of India and China to initiate a mechanism that would facilitate the returning of these animals.

Jaishankar says China, Pakistan not invited to join Voice of Global South summit

18 August 2024, Hindustan Times

India's relations with China and Pakistan are currently at an all-time low, and both countries were also not part of the 2 earlier Voice of Global South Summits. China and Pakistan were not part of the Voice of Global South Summit hosted virtually by India on Saturday, and the meeting was joined by leaders and ministers of 123 countries to discuss key challenges facing developing countries.

Several countries raised the conflicts in Gaza and Ukraine during the day-long summit, external affairs minister S Jaishankar told a media briefing. The countries that raised the situation in Gaza expressed concern at the civilian casualties and emphasised the need to put in place a ceasefire and resume negotiations, he said.

Responding to questions, Jaishankar said both China and Pakistan were not invited to the third edition of the summit hosted by India. In the case of China, he said, "Were they invited, the answer is no."

India's relations with China and Pakistan are currently at an all-time low, and both countries were also not part of the two earlier Voice of Global South Summits held last year.

The summit was joined by a total of 123 countries, including India. Twenty-one countries participated in the leaders' session, while 118 ministers joined various sessions devoted to issues such as digital, trade, and health. A total of 34 countries participated in the two sessions for foreign ministers. The issue of reforming the United Nations also figured in the summit, with Jaishankar saying there is a need to reconcile many different ideas for the proposed reforms and then give UN members the ability to make a choice. There should be text-based negotiations, and countries should be allowed to vote on the future of the UN, he said.

"We are not going to get perfect unity among 190 odd countries in the world...nor do we expect it...We feel that process has been unduly and unfairly blocked," Jaishankar said.

With India's capabilities and economic heft set to grow, the country will have to cope with more responsibilities and expectations, especially from countries of the Global South, he said.

China Threatens To Snatch Disputed Areas On India- China Border, Indo-Pacific Using PLA-Backed 'Civilian Soldiers'

16 August 2024, The EurAsian Times

China, the world's second-most populous nation, is advancing its global ambitions through land and sea strategies. These efforts aim to expand territory and increase trade dominance without resorting to direct conflict. A key aspect of this approach involves using civilian forces as indirect support for military objectives.

Known for its expansionist policies, China is not only focused on becoming a world superpower but is also strategizing on how to seize neighboring lands without engaging in direct conflict. To achieve this, the Chinese military takes indirect support from civilian forces, who are often used as a shield by the People's Liberation Army (PLA).

Examples of this include the "Xiaokang" border defense villages and the Maritime Militia, which are nontraditional forces involved in gray-zone operations. These operations—employing nontraditional methods to achieve security objectives without provoking armed conflict—are frequently discussed in military literature. Let’s explore in detail how civilian forces are used to support China’s military efforts on both land and sea.

Border Defense On Land: “Xiaokang” Villages

On its land borders, particularly along the disputed Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the Middle and Eastern sectors of the India-China border, China has implemented the “Xiaokang” border defense village initiative.

The term “Xiaokang” translates to “moderately prosperous.” The Xiaokang initiative is designed to populate the 21 Himalayan border counties, including Nyingchi, Shannan, Shigatse, and Ngari prefectures. The plan includes the construction of new Xiaokang houses, infrastructure, and public service facilities in these areas to strengthen and enrich the border regions of Tibet.

This initiative involves villages in Tibet, including Zhuangnan, Yarao, Kuiqiongmen, and Majiduncun, which commonly feature military or dual-use facilities. Notably, the Xiaokang border plan seeks to populate these areas with individuals loyal to the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), creating a civilian border force through China’s military-civilian fusion strategy, which has been increasingly emphasized under Xi Jinping’s leadership.

Over the past five years, China has developed more than 600 villages along its border with India in the Tibet Autonomous Region. Since 2019, China has been building villages along the LAC, and while many of these were initially unoccupied, they have recently seen new residents.

Some of these villages are located along the LAC, opposite the Lohit Valley and the Tawang sector of Arunachal Pradesh, a region administered by India but largely claimed by China as “South Tibet.” By populating and re-populating these border areas, China appears to be strengthening its territorial claims by establishing a “settled population” in disputed regions.

China is rapidly upgrading these dual-use villages along disputed borders. New roads and what may become small security outposts are being constructed between these remote villages. Given China’s focus on military-civilian fusion, these Xiaokang border villages are expected to serve as forward posts for troop deployment.

The extensive network of roads and the active civilian force near the border would function as a defense force, providing resources and support in the event of border skirmishes, effectively turning these villages into extended troop cantonments near the LAC. These villages, often accompanied by military and dual-use infrastructure, serve as a “Gray Zone” tool for China to assert and defend its claims in disputed areas. Commercial satellite images reveal the rapid and significant progress China is making in these border villages despite the harsh environment.

Media reports indicate that these complexes include barracks, perimeter walls, and radome/communications towers, suggesting the likely presence of China’s military, the People’s Liberation Army (PLA). It is also possible that these facilities are operated by the paramilitary People’s Armed Police (PAP). Under China’s Land Borders Law, both the PLA and PAP share responsibility for defending China’s borders from armed attacks or other encroachments. Maritime Strategy: The Maritime Militia

At sea, China employs its Maritime Militia to support the People’s Liberation Army (PLA) in asserting territorial claims, particularly in the South China Sea. The Maritime Militia is often described as a shadowy armada, a fleet of vessels that appear to be ordinary fishing boats but can mobilize for military purposes. The Maritime Militia has existed for decades, but under President Xi Jinping’s leadership, it has become more professional, better equipped, and increasingly militarized. Officially, the People’s Republic of China (PRC) defines its militia as “an armed mass organization composed of civilians retaining their regular jobs,” serving as a component of China’s armed forces and an “auxiliary and reserve force” of the PLA. The Maritime Militia operates independently of the PLA Navy and China Coast Guard (CCG). It consists of citizens working in the marine economy who receive training from the PLA and CCG to perform tasks such as border patrol, surveillance, reconnaissance, maritime transportation, search and rescue, and supporting naval operations during wartime.

The Maritime Militia is composed of two main forces. The first is a ‘Professional Fleet’ of at least 100 purpose-built boats that appear to be fishing vessels but are stronger and equipped with military-grade technology.

The second fleet, known as ‘The Spratly Backbone Fishing Vessels’ (SBFV), consists of actual fishing boats drafted into China’s missions. These boats operate out of ports in Hainan and Guangdong. The professional fleet can fish when needed, but they often remain inactive and then cluster together at disputed locations. SBFV crews receive lucrative government fuel subsidies for militia missions.

The United States, a treaty ally of the Philippines, has repeatedly accused China’s Maritime Militia of violating international law to enforce China’s expansive and unlawful maritime claims. By deploying vessels in groups, China seeks to challenge the rules of freedom of navigation, bolster its maritime claims, secure vital resources, and extend its economic influence globally.

China's overtly civilian distant-water fishing (DWF) fleets, affiliated to varying degrees with government agencies, have come under growing international scrutiny. These fleets are often visible on satellite tracking platforms, swarming around disputed areas. Crews in both the professional and SBFV fleets are believed to include civilian fishers, sailors, and ex-military personnel recruited through Chinese government training programs. When engaged in militia activities rather than genuine fishing, these vessels typically operate with smaller crews of about five to six members, according to The Guardian report. According to a research report published by International Law Studies, China's Maritime Militia is a key instrument for peacetime power projection in the region, particularly as it guards China's audacious maritime claim to over 90 percent of the South China Sea.

The philosophical foundation of this militia lies in the concept of the "people's war," which integrates civilian and military sectors. China believes that using a civilian militia composed of fishing vessels is a less provocative way to advance its strategic goal of regional hegemony.

During armed conflict, these vessels could conduct reconnaissance, gather intelligence for the PLAN, and engage in military deception, jamming, sealift, ship repair, and emergency rescue. The militia is also armed and may participate in more challenging maritime security operations, such as boarding foreign-flagged fishing vessels in contested waters.

Military-Civil Fusion Strategy

Both the Xiaokang villages and Maritime Militia exemplify China's "military-civil fusion" strategy, which aims to integrate civilian and military sectors for national objectives.

This approach is formalized in China's Land Borders Law, which emphasizes the role of local governments and civilian populations in border defense and security and urges them to "strengthen the construction of mass defense forces to maintain border security."

A 2021 article in the official PLA Daily highlights the importance of enhancing border infrastructure and encouraging people of all ethnic groups to settle in border areas, protect their homeland, and develop their communities. This focus on integrating civilian villages into the military framework is a clear example of China's "military-civil fusion" strategy, which seeks to merge the country's economic and military development to advance national objectives. Through these initiatives, China seeks to advance its territorial ambitions and global influence while minimizing the risk of direct military confrontation. This strategy represents a significant challenge to neighboring countries and international norms in both land and maritime domains.

Message to China? PM Modi says India's progress doesn't come with crisis for anyone, we are land of Buddha

15 August 2024, First Post

In his Independence Day address, without making any specific references, Prime Minister Narendra Modi said India will 'defeat all those with bad intentions with our good intentions'

India's progress does not come with any crisis for anyone and the world shouldn't be concerned about the country's growing strength, Prime Minister Narendra Modi said on Thursday against the backdrop of geopolitical turbulences in various parts of the world.

In his Independence Day speech from the ramparts of the iconic Red Fort, Modi said India is facing "countless" challenges both "within and outside" and that the country will neither "falter nor get tired" in dealing with them.

Without making any specific references, he said India will "defeat all those with bad intentions with our good intentions." "There are challenges within as well as outside. As we become stronger and our influence increases, the challenges too will increase," he said. "The challenges from outside will increase but I want to tell everyone that India's progress does not bring crisis for anyone," he said.

"We are the land of the Buddha, war is not our path and because of this, the world shouldn't be concerned about India's progress," he said.

"I assure the world community that you should understand India's traditions and its history of thousands of years, don't think of us as a crisis." The prime minister said there should not be any concern over the country's development.

"I want to tell the countrymen that no matter how many challenges we face, it is in the nature of India to challenge the challenge," Modi said.

"We will neither falter, nor get tired, nor stop, nor bow down. We will leave no stone unturned to fulfil our resolutions, to change the fate of 140 crore countrymen, to realise the dreams of the nation.

"I assure you that we will defeat all those with bad intentions with our good intentions," Modi said without elaborating.

Modi's remarks came against the backdrop of India's frosty ties with China following the border row in eastern Ladakh that erupted in 2020.

The prime minister spoke about the situation in Bangladesh. But his address was largely devoid of any other foreign policy issues.

Eye on China & Pakistan, India fast-tracks deal for 31 US 'hunter-killer' drones

14 August 2024, Times Of India, Rajat Pandit

With both China and Pakistan bolstering their fleets of armed drones, India is fast-tracking negotiations for the acquisition of 31 weaponised MQ-9B 'hunter-killer' remotely-piloted aircraft from the US, with the somewhat ambitious aim to ink the mega deal by November-December this year.

Techno-commercial discussions for the inter-governmental contract for the 31 armed high-altitude, long endurance drones "are in an advanced stage now", with 15 Sea Guardians earmarked for Navy and 8 Sky Guardians each for Army and IAF, defence ministry sources told TOI.

This comes at a time when China, which continues the military confrontation in eastern Ladakh for the fifth year running now, has stepped-up supplies of its armed Cai Hong-4 and Wing Loong-II drones to Pakistan. "Pakistan has sought 16 more armed CH-4 drones from China. It already has seven CH-4 drones in the Army and 3 in Navy," a source said. The MQ-9B Reaper or Predator-B drones, designed to fly for around 40 hours at altitudes over 40,000-feet for surveillance and armed with Hellfire air-to-ground missiles and smart bombs for precision strikes, are considered far superior to Chinese armed drones.

The operational utility of the MQ-9B drones has been reinforced by extensive ISR (intelligence, surveillance, reconnaissance) missions being undertaken by the two unarmed Sea Guardian drones – taken on lease from US firm General Atomics – both over the vast Indian Ocean Region (IOR) as well as along the 3,488- km Line of Actual Control with China. While the US has put a price tag of $3.9 billion (over Rs 33,500 crore) for the 31 weaponised MQ-9B drones and associated equipment, including 170 Hellfire missiles, 310 GBU-39B precision-guided glide bombs, navigation systems, sensor suites and mobile ground control systems, the Indian negotiating team is working to bring the costs down.

"The price and terms offered by the US govt and General Atomics to other countries is being taken into account. All efforts are underway to conclude the deal within this calendar year after the final nod from the cabinet committee on security," a source said. Under the deal, the drones will be assembled in India, while General Atomics will also source some components from Indian companies as well as set up a global MRO (maintenance, repair, overhaul) facility here.

"Since General Atomics cannot give transfer of technology for the varied sub-systems it sources from other companies, it will provide expertise and consultancy to DRDO and other entities to develop such advanced drones indigenously," the source said. The armed forces hope to induct the first 10 MQ-9B drones within a couple of years of the contract being inked, though it will depend on General Atomics' production capacity. The rest will come in batches every six months.

The plan is to deploy the fighter-size drones at ISR command and control centres at Arakkonam and Porbandar for the Indian Ocean region and Sarsawa and Gorakhpur for the land borders. "With their long- distance hunting and killing capabilities, such drones are required at a time when China's naval forays into the IOR are only going to increase further," an officer said.

Minor Indian-Chinese troops skirmish along Ladakh border reported

13 August 2024, Tibetan Review

It is not clear how often skirmishes are taking place between the two sides along the Tibet-India border Line of Actual Control (LAC), if at all. However, one reported incident has taken place on Aug 12 morning in the Burtse area in the Durbuk Sector of Ladakh.

Sticks were used freely by both sides during the confrontation that took place at 4 am, reported thestatesman.com Aug 12.

The trouble started with the Chinese troops reportedly burning two RCC (Reinforced Cement Concrete) huts on the Indian side of the LAC. This was followed by a faceoff between the Indian and PLA troops of China, the report said.

The minor skirmish was stated to have taken place near the LAC pillar point 12 while India was replacing an Armoured Battalion from the area.

Tension has been prevailing between the Indian and Chinese Armies since Jun 2020 when troops from the two sides got engaged in a brutal physical confrontation without the use of firearms in the Galwan valley. It resulted in the death of 20 Indian soldiers. China belatedly admitted that four of its soldiers died, although intelligence reports said the figure was much higher.

India and China have held at least 20 rounds of military talks and 13 rounds of foreign office led discussions but there is no let-up in the tensions, the report said.

China, Pakistan Try To Derail India, G4 Nations' UN Security Council Bid

13 August 2024, NDTV

China's Permanent Representative Fu Cong also threw in criticism against India and the G4, saying that there were "a few countries and interest groups who pursue their own selfish and small-circle interests when it comes to Council reform".

The lack of adequate geographic representation in the UN Security Council is responsible for its failures, and giving Africa permanent membership will be essential to make the highest decision-making body effective, R. Ravindra, charge d'affaires of India's UN mission has said.

Speaking on behalf of the G-4, the group of India, Brazil, Germany and Japan, on Monday at an open debate of the Council on reforming itself, he said, "A primary reason for the underperformance of this critical institution remains the non-representation of Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean and the under-representation of Asia-Pacific in the permanent category".

"We are convinced that African representation in both permanent and non-permanent categories will be an indispensable part of UNSC reform for a more representative and effective Council," he said.

The meeting of the Council was convened by Sierra Leone, which holds the rotating presidency, to push Africa's case for reforming the Council to give the continent better representation.

Sierra Leone's President Julius Maada Bio said, "Despite being home to over 1.3 billion people, and the 54 African countries making up 28 per cent of the total membership of the UN," Africa continues to suffer from the historic injustice of being deprived of permanent seats at the Council.

"Nearly 80 years after its creation, the Council has been stuck in time" – 1945 when the UN was created while most of Africa was under the colonial yoke perpetuating the injustice, he said.

"Africa demands two permanent seats in the UN Security Council and two additional non-permanent seats" to the existing three, he said.

Mr Ravindra said, "We as G-4 continue to support fully these legitimate demands and aspirations from the people of Africa" and its relationship with the continent "is anchored in trust and mutual respect and is focused on ensuring that Africa finds its rightful place in a new age of reformed multilateralism".

"It is also inconceivable that Africa which constitutes over 70 per cent of the UNSC's agenda items under discussions, does not get a permanent voice at the horse-shoe table" at the Council chamber, he said.

Mr Ravindra said the Inter-governmental Negotiations (IGN) for Council reforms should expedite text-based negotiations so that it can proceed with the reform process in time for the 80th anniversary of the UN next year.

He said that at the summit of G-20 last year under India's leadership, Africa was given membership in the group of the major industrialised and emerging economies, which was also noted by Bio.

Bio said that Africa's claim should be treated as a "special case" and given priority in reforming the Council in time for the 80th anniversary next year.

Many speakers at the meeting also emphasised Africa's case for special expedited treatment in the reform process mired for decades by opposition by a small group of countries that call themselves Uniting for Consensus (UfC) hoping to detach the continent from the controversies involving other countries.

India, its G4 partners that work together to expand the Council, and other countries have counted on Africa's case for reform to break the stalemate.

But the calls for treating Africa as a "special case" ahead of the Summit of the Future in September and the UN's 80th anniversary next year seek to make the reform a piecemeal effort – if it happens at all.

Marco Romiti, a Minister Counsellor in the UN Mission of Italy which heads the UfC, spoke out against adding more permanent members.

Munir Akram, the permanent representative of Pakistan, which is also a member of UfC, opposed expanding permanent membership but said that Africa can be considered a special case and be given long-term seats in the Council.

But he, too, was firm against adding permanent members.

Bio was asked outside the Council chamber at his meeting with the media how he hoped to overcome the UfC opposition.

He said Africa has a very compelling case and that is what we are pushing for.

"We don't consider the opposition," he said. "We have a genuine case and that is what we are pushing. We know that there are others ... it is a total reform, but we are talking for Africa".

He said he was confident that it was only a matter of time before Africa got its due.

"The gatekeepers will find it difficult to let us in, but as you can see, there is already willingness and as you can see we are gradually inching towards the next steps in order to be able to reach our goal," he said.

Mr Akram took a dig at India and the G4 saying, "Africa is critically different from the demand of four states for permanent membership for themselves".

China's Permanent Representative Fu Cong also threw in criticism against India and the G4, saying that there were "a few countries and interest groups who pursue their own selfish and small-circle interests when it comes to Council reform".

Secretary-General Antonio Guterres said that the "cracks" in the Council's "foundation are becoming too large to ignore".

"They are contributing to deadlock, stalemate and stagnation around today's most pressing crises and they are feeding a broader crisis of credibility and legitimacy that is affecting multilateralism itself," he said.

"We cannot accept that the world's preeminent peace and security body lacks a permanent voice for a continent of well over a billion people – a young and rapidly growing population – making up 28 per cent of the membership of the United Nations," he said.

Civil 'guardians': China quietly builds villages near border with India, other countries to press territorial claims

10 August 2024, Money Control

The New York Times conducted a comprehensive mapping and analysis of settlements along China's border to create the first detailed visual depiction of how China has strategically transformed its frontier regions through the establishment of civilian outposts. On a once empty land nestled deep within the Himalayas, Chinese officials built 'Qionglin New Village' and paid people to move there from other settlements, according to a report by The New York Times. It lies a mere three miles from a contentious zone.

This nearby area has become a flashpoint of tension, with substantial military deployments and confrontations between Chinese and Indian forces fueling apprehensions of an impending border conflict.

Xi Jinping, the President of China, calls people living in these areas as "border guardians". The villagers of Qionglin serve as de facto guardians on the periphery of China's territorial assertion over Arunachal Pradesh, India's easternmost state, the NYT report added.

Qionglin is only one of many such villages that have surfaced recently.

The New York Times conducted a comprehensive mapping and analysis of settlements along China's border to create the first detailed visual depiction of how China has strategically transformed its frontier regions through the establishment of civilian outposts.

"The mapping reveals that China has put at least one village near every accessible Himalayan pass that borders India, as well as on most of the passes bordering Bhutan and Nepal," according to Matthew Akester, an independent researcher on Tibet, and Robert Barnett, a professor from SOAS University of London, reported NYT.

These civilian settlements serve a dual purpose. They provide critical infrastructure – roads, internet connectivity, and electricity – that could facilitate rapid military deployment to the border if needed. Additionally, the villagers act as eyes and ears in these remote regions, deterring intrusions and potential defectors.

India, meanwhile, has launched its own initiative dubbed "Vibrant Villages Programme." This program seeks to reinvigorate hundreds of settlements along the frontier.

Last year, the government had approved Vibrant Villages Programme (VVP) as a centrally sponsored scheme for comprehensive development of select villages in 46 blocks in 19 districts of abutting northern border in the states of Arunachal Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh, Sikkim, Uttarakhand and UT of Ladakh.

Last month, Union home minister Amit Shah reviewed the implementation of the 'Vibrant Villages Programme' at a high-level meeting in the national capital and stressed the need to provide employment opportunities to local residents as well as increase connectivity to prevent migration from border villages. Amit Shah further emphasized that the Central Armed Police Forces (CAPFs) and Army deployed around the border villages should encourage the purchase of local agricultural and handicraft products through cooperatives, the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) said in a statement.

China still to acknowledge having custody of 2 Arunachal men missing from border for nearly 2 years

04 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Two men from the state of Arunachal Pradesh missing for nearly two years from a remote location along India's border with Chinese ruled Tibet are still untraceable. They are believed – in fact, known – to be in the custody of the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA), which has so far not acknowledged having them in custody, reported the PTI news agency Aug 4.

Batelum Tikro (35) and his cousin Bainsi Manyu (37) went missing from the Chaglagam area in Anjaw district on Aug 19, 2022 while looking for medicinal herbs at a high altitude area. They never returned home and could not be traced.

"I have come to know that they were detained by the Chinese army," Mr Tikro's brother Dishanso Chikro has told PTI over phone.

Chikro has said he approached the local army authorities several times seeking information about his brothers.

"I am told that the issue was raised by the Indian Army with their Chinese counterparts. But no response has come so far," he has said.

"The Chinese side has not yet acknowledged that the youths are in their custody. But I am told that they are still alive," Anjaw MLA and State's Women and Child Development Minister Dasanglu Pul has said.

Mr Chikro had also lodged two missing-person complaints at the local Hayuliang police station saying, "Some fellow villagers might have last seen them at border areas on Aug 24, 2022", adding, "but since then there has been no sign of the whereabouts of the duo".

Mr Tikro, who belongs to Doiliang, is unmarried while Manyu, who hails from Many Chiprogam of Anjaw district, is married and has two very young children. "I have no idea what was the response of the Chinese side at the flag meetings (when the matter was raised). The parents of the men keep telling us to do something. But we are helpless so far. We hope that they will return home safe and soon," Anjaw district Zila Parishad Chairman Soblem Pul has said.

While this is not the first time residents of Arunachal Pradesh have gone missing along the border or been detained by China's PLA, in most cases, such people returned home after a few days or weeks, the report noted.

This is the first time persons missing along the border have not returned home for almost two years.

India shares a 3,400-km-long Line of Actual Control (LAC) with Chinese occupied Tibet, from Ladakh to Arunachal Pradesh.

India has repeatedly rejected China's claim that Arunachal Pradesh is southern (or south) Tibet and part of its territory.

China ready to work with India to bridge gap between people of the two countries: Chinese diplomat

02 August 2024, The Hindu

Recently Indian Coast Guard and Indian Navy jointly rescued a Chinese mariner.

Chinese Consul General in Mumbai Kong Xianhua has said his country is ready to work with India to bridge the gap between the people of the two neighbours, recalling the Indian help during the Sino-Japanese war. The senior diplomat on August 1 visited the Indian Coast Guard Headquarters (West) to express gratitude to the maritime security agency for saving Chinese mariners over the past two years, an official statement said.

Mr. Kong met Inspector General Bhisham Sharma, Commander of Indian Coast Guard (West), and said

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

China is ready to work with India to bridge the gap between the people of the two countries and strengthen friendship.

"... our two peoples will walk together like brothers and sisters," he said.

The Indian Coast Guard and Indian Navy have jointly carried out a successful rescue mission to evacuate a Chinese mariner who was critically injured and suffering heavy blood loss on July 24, the statement said.

"The Indian Coast Guard responded immediately to the medical emergency. The rescue team overcame the strong wind and high waves to evacuate him to hospital. Thanks to the Indian Coast Guard's prompt rescue and professional treatment, the mariner recovered very well and has already been back to China," Mr. Kong said.

"Today I come here on behalf of the Chinese Consulate General in Mumbai to express my heartfelt gratitude to you and all the officers and pay my highest tribute to the Indian Coast Guard," Mr. Kong told IG Sharma. Mr. Kong recalled that in 1938, an Indian medical team went to China to help Chinese people fight against Japanese aggression.

Dr. Kotnis, one of the doctors who was from Solapur (in Maharashtra), sacrificed his life for the great cause of Chinese people's liberation. Many Chinese people also gave their firm support for India's independence, the diplomat said.

In the current context, these rescue missions carried out by the Indian Coast Guard are of great significance and will strengthen the friendship between the two neighbours, he said. "A Chinese idiom goes 'compassion knows no borders'".

He said the Indian Coast Guard has saved three Chinese mariners in the consular district of the Consulate General alone over the past two years.

Mr. Kong said, "These rescue missions not only fulfil the (Coast Guard's) motto of 'Vayam Rakshamah' (we protect), but also demonstrate the common philosophy of People First, Life First in both China and India." IG Sharma said that over the past decade, the Indian Coast Guard has saved 27 Chinese citizens.

China's Pangong Tso bridge in Tibet seen as meant to alter India-border status quo

02 August 2024, Tibetan Review

After two back-to-back meetings between their foreign ministers during the month, India and China held their latest round of foreign-office led border talks on Jul 31. Both sides have spoken of the talks in positive terms but different hues while reporting no progress. Meanwhile China has completed the construction and began using a strategic 400-metre bridge, connecting the northern and southern banks of the Pangong Tso (Lake) inside the India-claimed lines in eastern Ladakh.

Indian military veterans have expressed apprehension that China's latest move confirmed their fears that the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) was forcing India to accept the new status quo in the region, the report said.

It also cited security experts as saying the lake-bridge would give China "a strategic edge" in the region as it would allow PLA troops to speedily move between the north and south banks of the lake.

"It is a matter of extreme concern for India. The bridge enhances connectivity between China's forward and depth forces, underscoring Beijing's commitment to solidifying its territorial claims against India by modifying the landscape to its advantage," the report quoted a former major general as saying.

"It has also confirmed our fears that the PLA seems to be forcing India to accept the new status quo in the region," the unnamed former major general has said. The report also quoted a retired colonel as saying the Chinese army "has fortified its positions at multiple transgression points in eastern Ladakh".

"The PLA is forcing India to agree to its reinterpretation of the Line of Actual Control (LAC). India's capitulation has made restoration of the pre-Apr 2020 status quo difficult," he has said.

"Previously, the PLA had to navigate the lake's entire eastern section to reach conflict zones, a lengthy detour that hampered their response time in an active conflict zone," the financialexpress.com Jul 30 quoted Damien Symon, a satellite imagery expert and researcher with The Intel Lab, as saying.

The bridge is expected to reduce the travel distance between the lake's banks by approximately 50-100 kilometres, significantly cutting travel time, the report said, citing ndtv.com.

The Jul 31 discussions held in New Delhi under the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination were the first to take place in India after the 2020 Galwan clashes, said thewire.in Jul 31. It added that there was no sign of a breakthrough again as India and China met for the working mechanism's 30th round of talks.

While their public statements have not indicated any change in their positions, the frequency of their meetings has raised speculation of a thaw, the report said.

In its press release, India's Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) said the "discussion at the meeting was in-depth, constructive and forward-looking".

It also stated that both agreed to "maintain the momentum through the established diplomatic and military channels," that they also "reviewed the current situation along the [LAC] with a view to finding an early resolution of the outstanding issues."

It added that the two sides "agreed on the need to jointly uphold peace and tranquillity on the ground in the border areas in accordance with relevant bilateral agreements, protocols and understandings reached between the two governments."

On its part, the Chinese foreign ministry stated that based on the "important consensus" reached by the recent meeting between the two countries' foreign ministers, the two sides agreed to "focus on specific issues related to the China-India border, take care of each other's reasonable concerns, and reach a solution acceptable to both sides as soon as possible". The press note further stated that the two sides agreed to "strengthen the construction of negotiation mechanisms, accelerate the negotiation process, and achieve a turning point in the border situation as soon as possible".

India's aim in holding these talks is to achieve "complete disengagement" along the LAC. However, China has characterized the meeting's agenda as promoting the "transition of the border situation into a normalized phase of control", report noted.

Indian and Chinese troops have disengaged from some places along the LAC after the 2020 clashes after a series of talks at different levels, but the Chinese have refused to undertake any disengagement at two places, namely Demchok and Depsang plains, where soldiers on both sides continue to be in a faceoff situation.

India's position remains that overall bilateral ties cannot return to normalcy until the border issue is resolved. On the other hand, China insists that the border issue should not overshadow their broader relationship.

India's fear might be that accepting China's position would only lead to further Salami slicing of its territory by continued creeping intrusions by Chinese troops.

Tensions raised as China expands military presence along India's vast northern border

29 July 2024, Black Sky

The unprecedented arrival of China's most advanced fighter jets in Tibet is just one example of how the Chinese military's continued expansion along India's contested northern border raises tensions in a decades-long standoff high atop the Himalayas. With the ability to monitor the most important national security and economic locations and events at scale, BlackSky recently provided a revealing look into how China is asserting its military posture in this vast, mountainous region.

Published in the Hindustan Times, BlackSky's rare, time-diverse satellite images and AI-driven analytics show the first presence of Chinese J-20 stealth fighters parked at a Tibetan airfield, advanced artillery and defensive infrastructure north of Pangong Lake and a winding network of roads giving China access across Bhutan's disputed Doklam plateau. These images were captured as recently as May 31.

The region's latest developments fuel long-standing disagreements over competing territorial claims that led to the 1962 China-India war. The still unresolved conflict resulted in a 3,380km (2,100 miles) contested border where the nuclear-armed countries collectively maintain an estimated 100,000 troops. Occasional violent skirmishes between the two militaries, the most recent of which occurred in 2022, have caused deaths on both sides. The unforgiving terrain, ranging in elevation from 3,600 to 6,400m (12,000 to 21,000 feet), and extreme cold temperatures, reaching minus 40 C in winter, make security a unique challenge.

Tibet's Shigatse Air Base

BlackSky imagery and automated detection identified six Chinese Chengdu J-20 stealth fighters parked adjacent to eight Chengdu J-10 jets on the central apron at Tibet's Shigatse Air Base on May 30. The base is less than 150km from India's northern border in Sikkim. Introduced in 2017, the J-20 is a dual engine, multirole fighter featuring low radar observability and precision strike capabilities designed for air superiority.

Bhutan's Doklam Plateau

China maintains an elaborate network of roads connecting military infrastructure across the Doklam plateau in territory dually claimed by Bhutan that also borders northern India. Military vehicles detected by BlackSky's automated analytics are positioned at various locations along the plateau, including China's tri-junction border post, base of operations and forward position. In 2017, Chinese and Indian troops engaged in a 72-day standoff over China's Doklam road construction.

Sirijap, Pangong Tso, Ladakh

Nestled among the mountains along the northern shore of Pangong lake in the disputed Indo-Chinese border region of Ladakh, China's Sirijap military complex hosts an expanse of armored vehicle storage facilities, test ranges and fuel and munitions storage buildings. Sirijap's current state of development features artillery and other defensive positions reinforced by large berms and connected by a wide-reaching network of roads and trenches that are not visible on publicly available mapping applications. The Sirijap complex is located 126 km southeast of the Galwan Valley, the site of a lethal 2020 skirmish between Indian and Chinese soldiers. The Hindustan Times quotes an unnamed former Indian Army commander on the military rationale for China's construction of underground facilities.

"In today's battlefield, everything can be pinpointed using satellites or aerial surveillance platforms. We have no such underground shelters on our side. Tunneling is the only way out to create better defences," he said. "Without underground shelters, weapons and stores are sitting ducks for air strikes with precision-guided munitions. The Chinese are pioneers in tunneling activities and no hi-tech is required for these structures, just civil engineering skills and funds. Otherwise, we have to invest in more air defence equipment," he added.

This collection showcases the power of BlackSky's real-time monitoring of multiple sites over an entire region, delivering actionable insights from dynamic change at scale to enhance situational awareness.

India-China relations under the Modi 3.0 government

23 July 2024, IISS

India is gambling that it can both steal a page from China's playbook, earn China's consideration and maintain stability on favourable terms.

On 4 June, Narendra Modi was re-elected as prime minister of India for a third consecutive term – unprecedented in 62 years. By reappointing his foreign minister and national security advisor, Modi has signalled his desire for continuity in India's statecraft.

However, among India's key bilateral ties, those with China will merit significant attention and possibly adaptation. As the relationship between Asia's largest nuclear-armed militaries and economies by 2025 appears increasingly distant and tense, where is it headed? Mutually exclusive prosperity and security

India-China ties are troubled by an unsettled border, an unequal trade relationship, China's strategic ties to Pakistan, and a broadening political-strategic disagreement over each other's perceived rightful place in Asia and beyond. The relationship has suffered from a lack of strategic trust since a June 2020 border clash, which unmade much of the letter and spirit of the border-management regime that had been patiently negotiated, designed and agreed to over a generation. The war in Ukraine has brought China closer to Russia, India's historic defence partner.

The result is a complex relationship which tends towards tension over cooperation. This has not always been the case. During the course of the 1990s and until 2013, India and China agreed to set aside their differences on the border and focus on their economic development, each involving the other on secondary issues such as terrorism or Afghanistan.

Despite sharing the goal of avoiding another border war akin to that of 1962, national interests began to diverge. Coinciding with lower economic growth prospects, President Xi Jinping pursued an assertive foreign-policy and security agenda by focusing on promoting global technology champions and its Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), as well as acquiring advanced dual-use technologies and securitising its economy at home. This created insecurity for India.

India has concurrently considered itself a rising global economic force able to leverage its strategic partnerships in Asia and beyond. Since the end of the coronavirus pandemic, India has gained confidence from its status as the world's fastest growing major economy, while China's own economic prospects defied optimism. India's ambitions evolved from seeking to be the 'plus-one' of multinationals' China-focused strategies to being a preferred, 'trusted' middle-weight supplier in global supply chains in order to ride the 'decoupling' trend that is partly hollowing out China's prosperity. India's 'Make in India' policy epitomises its ambitions to grow its services and industry, using foreign capital to eventually boost exports.

Breaking the deadlock

Thus, India under Modi, who as leader of Gujarat State once cited China's Guangdong province as an example for achieving growth, appears increasingly to be trying to outdo China at its own economic and strategic game. This is designed to change China's perception of India without becoming 'revisionist'. India seeks leverage by showing its strength: setting conditions for dialogue based on the pre-2020 border conditions; restricting official contacts and visas; renaming localities in disputed territory; investing in border infrastructure and defence; limiting dependency on Chinese imports to fuel its own rise, to the benefit of supply chains with the Quad and other countries; strengthening its nuclear second-strike capability; and letting select irritants develop. India hopes the sum of these calibrated and restrained actions will pressure China to recognise India's global rise, while staying below China's threshold for an adverse, counter-productive response.

China, for its part, is focused on its rivalry with the US. China often sees India as having diminishing international agency of its own, as a result of that contest. The existence in Washington of a bipartisan consensus on both China and India, the relevance of Modi's warm relations with Donald Trump, and the fact that US Indo-Pacific strategy hinges on India's support for Washington's objectives in the region all drive much of the thinking in Beijing about India. China is paying particular attention to US-India cooperation on emerging and disruptive technologies, as well as naval logistics. India's now larger population and promising economy are attractive to Chinese exporters, but may also worry China. The GDP gap between India and China continues to grow in the latter's favour, feeding its belief that its terms alone can direct the relationship.

Exceptions to India and China's zero-sum rivalry are few and shrinking. Suggestions of 'India-China-plus-one' projects appear out of date as both compete for the Global South's attention. Both countries are investing in national technological capacities to enhance their prosperity and security in space, cyber and underwater maritime domains, leaving little room for cooperation. This carries global implications. Their convergence within BRICS on promoting their currencies is challenged by India's rejection of the BRI and New Delhi's consideration of a US-led sanctions policy on Ukraine. Dissuading Russia from using nuclear weapons in Ukraine or combatting climate change also appear as rare areas of agreement.

Meanwhile, third countries feel they have to choose between India and China, undermining both countries' claims to a benign rise. Other risks abound. The militarising border remains unstable and incident prone. Accidents in the Indian Ocean or South China Sea could occur as long as there is no dialogue or agreement to prevent or manage such incidents. The rise of technology ties with Taiwan, which India is increasingly displaying as a symbol of its independent statecraft, is becoming a major area of misunderstanding. Meanwhile, both countries are building up domestic expectations for their national-development goals set for 2049 for China and 2047 for India.

Strategic communication and understanding

Amid these tensions and wider geopolitical uncertainty, as well as both optimism and distrust of some dialogues with China, the two countries need to find a format for establishing and maintaining dialogue – to set and update expectations – without seeing this as an undue reward for the other. Xi and Modi held two highly personalised informal summits in 2018 and 2019. But Xi declined to attend Modi's 2023 standout G-20 summit. After a hiatus of over two years, their two top national-security officials met in 2022, 2023 and July 2024, but the meetings are unlikely to have been proportionate to the relationship's needs, not least because 'disengagement' at two border points is still a pending objective.

China needs to better understand how India's conduct reflects its motives for engaging, competing, balancing and deterring China. India wants China to show more sensitivity to its interests. One Indian official has explained that there is little point 'aiming for the moon while we remain in a ditch'.

Modi's lack of attendance at the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit in July 2024 does not close the door to future engagement with Xi. Xi's failure to send his personal congratulations upon Modi's re-election may be the latest clue that managing any 'loss of face' matters most to the two leaders who have never criticised each other in public. Yet Xi's reference to India in a June 2024 speech on cooperation could be a conciliatory response to Modi's own display of optimism during his re-election campaign. India and China have an interest in maintaining strategic communications to avoid any inadvertent flare-ups which could distract them from their peaceful rise. One possible route is to establish new confidence-building measures. Only the two countries, between themselves, can make that determination of the need – or not – for any form of new 'guardrails', before relaying this to the rest of the world.

Arunachal lawmaker raises serious concern over China's mega dam construction in occupied Tibet

20 July, 2024, Tibetan Review

A state lawmaker of Arunachal Pradesh has on Jul 19 warned New Delhi that China's ongoing building of a mega dam in neighbouring occupied Tibet's border area of Metog posed grave potential hydrological threats to India. The river could be diverted and the flow of its volume machinated to cause floods in India, Ninong Ering, a BJP MLA and a former union minister, has said.

Yarlung Tsangpo is known as Siang after it enters Arunachal Pradesh and Brahmaputra in the neighbouring state of Assam. The main channel of this river is the Jamuna, which flows through Bangladesh before joining the Bay of Bengal, noted the economicstimes.com Jul 20.

Participating in the motion of thanks to the governor's address in the state assembly, Ering, a former union minister of state for minority affairs, has said, "We cannot trust our 'neighbour'. You never know what they can do. They can either divert the entire river flow drying up our Siang or release water at once causing unprecedented floods havoc downstream."

He has added that the construction of the 60,000-megawatt dam could also affect the other downstream country Bangladesh.

The MLA from Pasighat West assembly constituency has expressed support for India's construction of dams with storage capacity to check floods in the region and noted that there is no water treaty between India and China so far.

Pointing out that "hydropower is Arunachal Pradesh's only resource," Ering has called for those opposing the construction of dams in state to be consulted beforehand so that the interest of the affected people could be taken care of.

Earlier, the state's Chief Minister, Mr Pema Khandu, had in September stated that New Delhi had proposed to construct a large barrage on the Siang river to keep the area secure in view of the potential threat from the huge dam on the Yarlung Tsangpo river being built by China in occupied Tibet.

"In case of release of excessive water, we need to have big structures to protect ourselves from floods. The Centre, too, has expressed concern about the position of the Siang river once the Chinese project is completed. We have to keep Siang alive. If there is diversion of water by China, massive land erosion will take place," Khandu had said.

Reuters reported earlier this month, on Jul 9, that India was planning to spend $1 billion to expedite the construction of 12 hydropower stations in the state.

China responded the next day by claiming India's development activities in the area were "illegal and invalid". It calls the state 'Zangnan' (South Tibet) on the basis of its baseless claim of sovereignty over occupied Tibet. The state is the birthplace of Tibet's 6th Dalai Lama. The current territory of Arunachal Pradesh was delineated as part of India in a 1914 convention at Shimla involving representatives of British India, Nationalist China and Tibet. Communist China rejects this convention, while India has recognized Tibet as an autonomous region of China since 1954.

Take up China's under-construction mega dam issue with Centre: Ering

20 July 2024, Arunachal Observer

Former Union Minister and sitting BJP Pasighat West MLA Ninong Ering on Friday expressed concern over under-construction mega dam by China near Arunachal Pradesh border and urged the state Govt to take up the issue with the Centre.

Participating in the motion of thanks to the governor's address in the Assembly, Ering said that the dam might pose serious threat of a flood-like situation in Arunachal Pradesh, located down stream. "Not only India, the construction of the dam might also affect Bangladesh," Ering said, adding "People cannot trust China. We never know what they can do. They may either divert the entire river flow drying up Sian River feeding the Siang belt or release water all of a sudden causing unprecedented floods and havoc downstream."

Ering, who quit the Congress and joined the BJP earlier this year, said that with the motto of 'Nation First', people's interest and their safety and the country's security cannot be negotiated.

Noting that there is no water treaty between India and China, Ering suggested that it was high time for a proper water treaty with the neighbouring country to protect downstream section and flood plains of the state in particular and other downstream states of the country in general.

"Hydropower is key resource of this state and it would help the country to a great extent in fulfilling energy security," he said.

China has announced to build a mega dam on Yarlung Tsangpo River in Medog, near the international border, According to various reports,.

Tsangpo River is known as Siang in Arunachal Pradesh and Brahmaputra in Assam and Jamuna in Bangladesh and it flows through the neighbouring Bangladesh before joining the Bay of Bengal.

Chief Minister Pema Khandu had in September last year proposed to the Centre construction of a large barrage on Siang River to keep the area secure in view of the potential threat from the huge dam on Yarlung Tsangpo River.

Lawmaker Ering is right as highlighted in Beyond the Horizon Colum on July 13 edition of this daily- China plans super-dam on Brahmaputra River: Will it spell water disaster for India and Bangladesh?

"China built one of its biggest projects ever: The Three Gorges Dam in 2003. While this monumental undertaking was steeped in controversy, many argued that its ability to deter routine catastrophic floods along Yangtze River, known as Brahmaputra in Arunachal Pradesh and generate clean energy resulted in an overall net good for the nation.

China is embarking on yet another ambitious project now to construct the world's first "super-dam" on Yarlung Tsangpo River, which is a high-altitude section of the Brahmaputra that flows through China-controlled Tibet to India and Bangladesh. This colossal undertaking aims to capitalise on the Tsangbo's deep canyons – measuring more than twice the depth of the colossal United States' Grand Canyons – to provide an estimated 60 million kilowatts of hydropower. This is more than three times the hydroelectric power generated by the Three Gorge power stations!

However, while some tout the super-dam as an excellent clean energy solution, many others express concern about the environmental and social costs surrounding the project. The Three Gorges Dam itself led to the woeful displacement of nearly 1.5 million riverbank residents, and created significant regional ecological disruptions.

Impact on India: Unfortunately, the new project's location on the Brahmaputra River, flowing downstream to India and Bangladesh, adds another layer of tension to the subject. Both India and Bangladesh rely heavily on the Brahmaputra's water and are thus anxious about leaving the flow of the river in China's control.

Considering that the Brahmaputra accounts for nearly 30% of India's freshwater resources, many have raised concerns about China's tinkering with the Yarlung dam upriver. And it certainly does not help that China's intent to divert a portion of Brahmaputra's water to arid parts of North China has remained a well-known point of contention between the two nations in the past.

Reports have also indicated that a "twin disaster" may be looming for India if the new dam is actually built. As the super dam engulfs the flow of Brahmaputra River, some assert that India could stand to face acute shortages due to weakened flow in the winter season. Conversely, if China releases excess water from the structure during its monsoons, future flash foods could become a more frequent sight for India downriver.

China had made history by unveiling the Lianghekou mega hydroelectric power plant, almost the size of Eiffel Tower and the highest in the country. It is a gigantic construction that boasts an average altitude of 3,000 meters, putting it above all other power plants in China. It is located on the Yalong River in Garzê, in the southwest of the country. Moreover, its total planned installed capacity is three million kW.

This construction started almost 10 years ago in October 2014 and those in charge of it finished it only in 2023. Going by the numbers, the approved investment is around 66.5 billion yuan, equivalent to 9.449 billion euros. The design of the reservoir allows it to reach almost 11 billion cubic meters (m<sup>3</sup>), specifically 10,800, as reported by Yalong River Hydropower Development Company Ltd (YLHDC), the breakwater dam at the highest point rises 295 meters, bringing it to the very level of the Eiffel Tower (which stands at about 300 m excluding the antenna). The hydroelectric power plant integrates, among other things, spillways, a ventilation tunnel and a subway power plant.

The state news agency Xinhua reports that the hydropower plant will be a turning point in the supply of Sichuan and development of the Yangtze River Economic Belt and the Chengdu-Chongqing economic circle.

India Considers Easing Visa Restrictions for Chinese Technicians

17 July 2024, KNN

In a significant shift from its stringent stance following the 2020 Himalayan border clash, India is reportedly considering a relaxation of visa restrictions for Chinese technicians.

This move comes as the country grapples with mounting economic losses and delays in manufacturing sectors heavily reliant on Chinese expertise.

Sources within the Indian government reveal that the trade ministry is spearheading efforts to expedite visa approvals for Chinese technical personnel.

The foreign ministry, despite initial reservations stemming from the four-year diplomatic chill between the two nuclear-armed nations, is said to be viewing the proposal "positively."

The potential policy shift is driven by domestic industry concerns and aligns with Prime Minister Narendra Modi's ambitious plans to boost local manufacturing.

According to industry estimates cited by the Economic Times, the electronics manufacturing sector alone has suffered production losses of approximately USD 15 billion over the past four years due to visa-related delays.

The proposed fast-track visa process aims to reduce approval times from the current one-year wait to less than a month. This would particularly benefit 14 key sectors covered by a USD 24 billion scheme to enhance high-tech electronics production.

The new visas would allow Chinese technicians to stay for up to six months, primarily to operate and maintain Chinese-made machinery in Indian factories.

Government data indicates that between November 2023 and April 2024, India received nearly 1,600 visa applications for Chinese technicians, underscoring the urgent need for their expertise in industries ranging from telecommunications to steel production and solar panel manufacturing.

This potential thaw in visa policy represents a delicate balancing act for India. While seeking to protect its economic interests and manufacturing goals, the country must navigate the complex geopolitical landscape that has defined Sino-Indian relations since the 2020 border tensions.

As the situation develops, observers note that this move could signal a broader reassessment of India's approach to Chinese engagement, potentially paving the way for increased economic cooperation while maintaining strategic caution.

The Indian government has yet to make an official announcement, and spokespersons for the trade, home, and foreign ministries have not responded to requests for comment at the time of reporting.

China's continued blocking of Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage in Tibet violates bilateral agreements

15 July 2024, Tibetan Review

For the fifth consecutive year since 2020, both the official routes for the holy Kailash-Mansarovar pilgrimage for Indians has remained closed. And the private route through Nepal, which was re-opened last year by China, is also practically unavailable to Indians due to onerous rules that especially targets them, as reported earlier by the Nepali media.

Covid-19 rules remain the ostensible reason for the suspension of the pilgrimage to Mt Kailash, the holy abode in western Tibet of the Hindu God Lord Shiva. However, the reason for the continued closing of the pilgrimage routes in a world free of Covid restrictions could only be attributed to the souring of bilateral relations since Galwan Valley clash in eastern Ladakh between Indian and Chinese border troops.

India signed two agreements with China, in 2013 and 2014, to open two official routes for Indian pilgrims. Both make it clear that China cannot unilaterally terminate the agreements without prior notice, noted news18.com Jul 15, citing copies of the agreements obtained from India's Ministry of External Affairs in response to a RTI application.

The first one, dated May 20, 2013, was signed between then Foreign Minister Salman Khurshid and Wang Yi, then Foreign Minister of China. This opened the Lipulekh Pass route for the yatra. The second agreement was signed by Sushma Swaraj as Foreign Minister with Yi on Sep 18, 2014 to start the Nathu La Pass route for the Kailash Mansarovar Yatra.

Both the agreements were valid for a period of five years, and to be automatically extended for a further period of five years at a time. Either side could give a notice to the other in writing, six months ahead of the date of expiry, if it intends to terminate the protocol.

The first agreement permits Indian pilgrims to visit Mt Kailash and Mansarovar through Lipulekh Pass, a Mt Kailash-viewing point in Uttarakhand state, by commercial tour operators and travel agents. "The Chinese side agrees to provide necessary facilities and support to these pilgrims as well in accordance with its domestic laws and regulations," the agreement was quoted as saying.

The second agreement allows Indian pilgrims, who go through tour operators and travel agents, to enter or exit "China" through the Nathu La Pass from Sikkim. The implementation of modalities of this route was through diplomatic channels.

The third option for Indians was to enter Tibet from Nepal through private operators there. China opened its borders from the Nepal side last year, but tightened rules for foreigners, especially Indians, and put multiple restrictions, including hiking the fee, making it practically impossible for Indians to go to Mt Kailash through Nepal. Nepali tour operators have expressed dismay that the virtual ban on Indian pilgrims had ruined their business.

In all cases, Indians needed visas from China to visit Mt Kailash and Mansarovar, a requirement which did not exist when Tibet was free until the first half or so of the last century.

This year in January, 38 Indians were the first to take a chartered flight, 'Kailash Mansarovar Darshan Flight', from Nepalgunj in Nepal to get aerial darshan of Mt Kailash from 27,000 feet in the air, the report said.

And now, India has also developed a spot in its territory at Lipulekh peak in Dharchula of Pithoragarh, Uttarakhand, from where Mt Kailash can soon be clearly viewed from a distance of just 50 km.

Earlier this month, the Uttarakhand government announced that pilgrims would be able to view Mt Kailash from this spot from Sep 15 this year. This will involve a vehicle drive up to Lipulekh and a trek of about 800 metres on foot to reach the vantage point to view the holy spot.

China objects to India's Arunachal dam projects with 'South Tibet' claim

11 July 2024, Tibetan Review

China has claimed Jul 10 that India had no right to carry out development projects in the latter's Tibet-border state of Arunachal Pradesh, claiming it is Zangnan (South Tibet) and part of its territory.

The remark has come from China's Foreign Ministry in response to a Reuters report on New Delhi's plans to speed up hydropower projects in the border state. "South Tibet is China's territory," Reuters Jul 10 quoted a Chinese foreign ministry spokesman as saying in a statement.

India's development activities in the area "illegal and invalid", devdiscourse.com Jul 10, likewise, quoted the strongly worded statement as saying.

The previous Reuters report said Jul 9 that India planned to spend $1 billion to expedite the construction of 12 hydropower stations in the northeastern Himalayan state. The territory was delineated as part of India in a 1914 convention at Shimla involving representatives of British India, Nationalist China and Tibet.

Communist China rejects this convention while India has recognized Tibet as an autonomous region of China since 1954.

Indian and Chinese diplomats to meet soon as border dispute continues to freeze bilateral ties

11 July 2024, Tibetan Review

With each side looking for the other side to make concessions, the Sino-India border dispute along Chinese occupied Tibet, and, as a result of it, the turbulence in overall relations between India and China appear to be set to remain prolonged.

Still, diplomats from India and China will soon meet to make yet another attempt to reach an agreement on mutual withdrawal of troops from the remaining face-off points along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh, reported deccanherald.com Jul 4. The stumbling block remains China's stubborn refusal to withdraw its troops from their 2020 incursion areas, claiming the territory belongs to it on the basis of its claim over occupied Tibet.

The decision followed a meeting between India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi on the sideline of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) summit in Astana, Capital of Kazakhstan, on Jul 4 when they agreed that the bilateral Working Mechanism on Consultation and Coordination (WMCC) on border affairs should hold another meeting soon.

The report cited a press release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs in New Delhi as saying the two ministers also agreed the military commanders of both sides would continue to meet to take forward discussions to "resolve the remaining issues" along the LAC in eastern Ladakh.

However, India has effectively reiterated its rejection of China's oft repeated insistence that the two sides normalize bilateral ties while talks for the settlement of the heavily deployed border standoff continues with no apparent end in sight.

"Discussed early resolution of remaining issues in border areas. Agreed to redouble efforts through diplomatic and military channels to that end. Respecting the LAC and ensuring peace and tranquillity in the border areas is essential," Jaishankar posted on X (formerly Twitter) after meeting Wang, adding: "The three mutuals – mutual respect, mutual sensitivity, and mutual interest – will guide our bilateral ties."

Though protracted negotiations have led to mutual withdrawal of troops from some of the face-off points along the LAC, like Galwan Valley, the northern and southern banks of Pangong Tso, Gogra Post, and Hot Springs, the stand-off could not be resolved completely so far.

Herders in Ladakh have complained that as a result of the already agreed withdrawals of troops, swathes of grazing land over which they had freely roamed for ages with their herds had become off-limits as they had been declared demilitarized zones. Besides, the report noted that Chinese PLA troops deployed in Depsang, well inside the territory of India along the LAC, were continuing to block the Indian Army's access to Patrolling Points 10, 11, 12, 12A, and 13. It added that a face-off is also continuing in Demchok.

China's position thus far is that the mutual withdrawal of troops by the Chinese PLA and the Indian Army from Patrolling Point 15 (Gogra-Hotsprings area) in Sep 2022 marked the restoration of normalcy along the LAC in eastern Ladakh.

The claim seen as an attempt by China to subtly build up pressure on India to accept the "new normal" in the Depsang and Demchok areas. The report said Wang reiterated this during his meeting with Jaishankar.

However, India has refused to budge, insisting that China must vacate its troops from these areas to restore the pre-2020 status quo.

In this matter, India's China policy and its stance on the boundary issues have remained unchanged in the past few years, and there are no major adjustments or substantial changes from the Indian side to be seen at present, China's official globaltimes.cn Jul, 5 cited Long Xingchun, a professor at the School of International Relations at Sichuan International Studies University, as saying.

"India has been demanding that China make concessions regarding the border issues," Long has asserted.

China says India has no right to develop contested border region

09 July 2024, VOA

India has no right to carry out development in the area China calls South Tibet, China's Foreign Ministry said on Wednesday in response to a Reuters report on New Delhi's plans to speed up hydropower projects in the border state.

"South Tibet is China's territory," a foreign ministry spokesman said in a statement.

It said India had no right to carry out development there and the establishment of what India calls Arunachal Pradesh on Chinese territory is "illegal and invalid."

Reuters reported on Tuesday that India plans to spend $1 billion to expedite the construction of 12 hydropower stations in the northeastern Himalayan state.

India's Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment on China's statement.

India says its remote state of Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of the country, but China says it is a part of southern Tibet, and has objected to Indian infrastructure projects there.

Last week, India Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi in Kazakhstan where the two agreed to intensify efforts to resolve issues along their border.

Satellite Images show China building infrastructure in area which it is illegally occupying since Nehru's time

08 July 2024, Organiser

Setting the information right for the Congress leaders and those spreading fake news, it is important to mention that China's build up at the LAC is taking place in that area, which it has been illegally occupying since the time of then Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru

Recent satellite imagery has unveiled significant military infrastructure development by China in the area surrounding Pangong Lake in eastern Ladakh, an area it has illegally occupied since the era of former Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru.

The People's Liberation Army (PLA) base at Sirjap, situated amidst mountains on the northern shore of Pangong Lake, serves as the headquarters for Chinese troops in the vicinity. It resides in an area claimed by India, approximately 5 km from the Line of Actual Control (LAC). Until the standoff on the LAC began in May 2020, this area was nearly uninhabited.

Constructed during 2021-22, the base features underground bunkers for storing weapon systems, fuel, and supplies, as revealed by satellite images from BlackSky, a US-based firm. An image from May 30 distinctly shows eight sloping entrances to a sizable underground bunker and a smaller bunker with five entrances. The base also includes large buildings for headquarters operations and hardened shelters designed to protect armored vehicles from air strikes using precision-guided munitions.

An analyst from BlackSky, speaking on condition of anonymity, noted, "The base hosts an expanse of armored vehicle storage facilities, test ranges, and fuel and munitions storage buildings." The current state of development includes artillery and other defensive positions reinforced by large berms, interconnected by an extensive network of roads and trenches not visible on publicly available mapping applications.

The base is situated approximately 120 km southeast of Galwan Valley, where a fierce clash in June 2020 resulted in the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese troops.

A former Indian Army commander, who served in the Pangong Lake region, commented, "In today's battlefield, everything can be pinpointed using satellites or aerial surveillance platforms. We have no such underground shelters on our side. Tunnelling is the only way out to create better defenses."

He added, "Without underground shelters, weapons and stores are sitting ducks for air strikes with precision-guided munitions. The Chinese are pioneers in tunnelling activities, and no hi-tech is required for these structures, just civil engineering skills and funds. Otherwise, we have to invest in more air defense equipment."

Since the standoff began in 2020, India has significantly enhanced its border infrastructure, constructing roads, bridges, tunnels, airfields, and helipads for military mobility and logistics support. India's infrastructure development has focused on better living conditions and improved facilities for soldiers, as well as the protection of weapons and equipment in forward areas. This push has been propelled by increased spending and swift execution of strategic projects, with the Border Roads Organisation (BRO) completing 125 infrastructure projects valued at Rs 3,611 crore in the fiscal year 2023-24, including the Sela tunnel in Arunachal Pradesh.

The developments at Pangong Lake coincide with increased activity by the Chinese military at the Shigatse air base in Tibet and the contentious Doklam tri-junction. Satellite images from earlier this year showed about half a dozen Chengdu J-20 stealth combat jets at Shigatse, and a more recent image from June 30 revealed at least two J-10 jets on the central apron.

The Shigatse base, approximately 300 km from the Indian Air Force's (IAF) Hasimara base in West Bengal, houses a squadron of Rafale combat jets. Experts believe China's deployment of the J-20s aims to counter the Rafales, among the IAF's most advanced aircraft. The shift of J-20s from China's coastal and inland provinces to Tibet underscores the strategic importance of the region.

On the Doklam plateau, satellite imagery reveals China's maintenance of an intricate network of roads linking military infrastructure along the disputed border with India. A significant presence of military vehicles was observed at both a rear base and a forward position in an April satellite image.

In light of these developments, it is crucial to clarify that China's current build-up at the LAC is in an area it has been illegally occupying since the tenure of then Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru. This historical context is vital for setting the record straight amidst misinformation and political discourse.

PLA Readies for Extended Conflict with India as Global Crises Intensify

04 July 2024, Republic, Yuvraj Tyagi

The US Intelligence Community's Annual Threat Assessment highlights the ongoing strain in Sino-Indian relations.

Despite the world's focus on Ukraine, Gaza, and the South China Sea, the People's Liberation Army (PLA) continues to fortify its position along China's southern border with India. The Annual Threat Assessment of the US Intelligence Community acknowledges the persistent strain in Sino-Indian relations due to their disputed border, albeit briefly amidst global conflicts. The report noted that significant cross-border clashes have not occurred since 2020, but large troop deployments on both sides remain. The potential for sporadic encounters raises the risk of miscalculation and escalation into armed conflict. In April 2024, the Strategic Studies Institute of the US Army War College published an analysis of PLA activities in Aksai Chin during 2020-21, providing insight into the ongoing military standoff.

The PLA rapidly deployed troops to Aksai Chin following the Galwan Valley clash in June 2020. Dennis Blasko, a former US defence attache, assessed that the PLA is prepared to maintain its deployments near the Line of Actual Control (LAC) indefinitely. This strategy serves both political and military purposes, offering real-world operational experience that routine peacetime training cannot match. However, the PLA faces sustaining its forces in the remote, high-altitude region. Supply depots are located more than 1,600 km away, requiring complex and prolonged logistical efforts. The Western Theater Command, responsible for nearly half of China's landmass, oversees these operations with a fraction of the PLA's total ground forces.

Strategic Significance of PLA's Border Operations

The PLA's fortified positions along the LAC support a significant deployment, estimated at 20,000 troops across a 400 km front. This force includes additional engineers, artillery, and support elements. Despite the substantial presence, Blasko argues that the terrain's rugged nature and logistical constraints limit the PLA's ability to conduct large-scale offensive operations.

The PLA's border operations serve as a deterrent, creating "facts on the ground" and reinforcing China's territorial claims. Similar to its activities in the South China Sea, these operations are designed to consolidate control and maintain a long-term presence. The PLA's construction of infrastructure, such as bridges over Lake Pangong, underscores its commitment to enhancing mobility and readiness along the border.

Parallel Tensions in the South China Sea

The South China Sea remains a flashpoint, exemplified by the recent confrontation between the China Coast Guard (CCG) and the Philippines near Second Thomas Shoal. This incident, which saw the CCG seizing a Philippine boat and injuring a sailor, highlights China's aggressive tactics. President Ferdinand Marcos Jr. warned that the Philippine-US Mutual Defense Treaty could be invoked if such provocations lead to casualties.

China's assertive actions in both the South China Sea and along the Sino-Indian border reflect a broader strategy of territorial consolidation. The PLA's activities in Aksai Chin mirror its island-building campaigns, demonstrating a willingness to escalate tensions to secure strategic advantages.

Implications for Sino-Indian Relations

Blasko's analysis suggests that while the PLA is not positioned for a large-scale offensive, the risk of localized skirmishes remains high. The PLA's presence serves as a constant reminder of the unresolved border dispute, complicating diplomatic efforts. Both India and China must navigate this precarious situation, balancing military readiness with the need for dialogue.

In conclusion, the PLA's fortified positions along the LAC represent a significant challenge for India's strategic planning. The ongoing military buildup, logistical complexities, and potential for conflict underscore the importance of sustained diplomatic engagement. As global attention remains divided, the Sino-Indian border will continue to be a critical focal point in regional security dynamics.

China has been feverishly working on new infrastructure, including two bridges over Lake Pangong. These bridges facilitate the movement of troops, equipment, and supplies, indicating a long-term commitment to maintaining and potentially escalating its presence. The construction of a road from the bridge to the Molde garrison and PLA base camp behind Lake Spanggur further enhances their logistical capabilities.

Additionally, the PLA Tibet Military Command and the Department of Highland Military Medicine of the PLA Army Medical University have launched a pilot program for low-pressure hypoxia cabin acclimation training for recruits before deployment. This training has improved acclimatization, permitting operational deployments in shorter periods.

Sustainability Measures for High-Altitude Deployments

To sustain troops in high-altitude areas, the PLA has established "vegetable factories" at altitudes as high as 5,270m to provide fresh greens to border defence troops. These measures demonstrate the PLA's commitment to ensuring the well-being and operational efficiency of its forces in challenging environments.

Blasko's report highlighted the PLA's preparedness to maintain these operations indefinitely. Until a negotiated political settlement is reached, the Western Theater Command is prepared to sustain the rotation of units into and out of the region in the largest near-combat deployment since the end of the border conflict with Vietnam in 1987.

Blasko acknowledged the possibility of future border confrontations, especially as small units come into proximity with each other. The challenging terrain favours light infantry operations over large-scale mechanized combat. This environment complicates large-scale offensive operations, making defensive posturing and territorial consolidation more feasible for the PLA.

India, China foreign ministers agree to work on border issues

04 July 2024, Reuters

India's Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi on Thursday in Kazakhstan where the two agreed to step up talks to resolve issues along their border, New Delhi said in a statement.

India and China share a long Himalayan border, much of it poorly demarcated, and relations between the two countries have been sour since a military standoff in July 2020 when at least 20 Indian soldiers and four Chinese troops were killed.

India said Jaishankar met Wang on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit in Astana where they agreed that "prolongation of the current situation in the border areas is not in the interest of either side."

The two agreed to enhance meetings between their diplomatic and military officials "to resolve the remaining issues at the earliest," the Indian foreign ministry said in a statement.

China and India should properly handle their differences and ensure relations advance on a stable track, a Chinese foreign ministry statement quoted Wang as saying during the talks.

"We must maintain a positive mindset, properly handle and control the situation in the border areas on the one hand, and actively resume normal exchanges on the other hand," Wang said.

Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, who began his third straight term last month, said in April that the two countries should urgently address the "prolonged situation" on their border.

Both countries have fortified positions and deployed extra troops and equipment along the border since 2020. The nuclear-armed nations have been uneasy neighbours for decades after a bloody border war in 1962.

"He (Jaishankar) reaffirmed the importance of fully abiding by relevant bilateral agreements, protocols, and understandings reached between the two governments in the past," New Delhi's statement said. The two countries have previously agreed to maintain dialogue through military and diplomatic channels.

At SCO Summit, PM Modi's speech takes a veiled swipe at China, Pakistan

04 July 2024, Hindustan Times

Jaishankar, delivering a speech on behalf of PM Modi at SCO Summit, highlighted the issue of combating terrorism, which was one of the "original goals" of SCO

NEW DELHI: The Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) should address issues such as respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity and non-discriminatory trade rights in the context of connectivity projects, India said on Thursday in a thinly veiled swipe at China.

Delivering a speech on behalf of Prime Minister Narendra Modi at the SCO Summit in the Kazakhstan capital of Astana, external affairs minister S Jaishankar pointed to mutual respect for territorial integrity, non-interference in internal affairs and non-use of force being the basis for the foreign policies of the nine members of the bloc.

The remarks came against the backdrop of India's opposition to the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) since a key part of it passes through Pakistan-occupied Kashmir (PoK), and its concerns about China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). Indian officials have pointed in the past to the lack of a level playing field in projects under the BRI.

The text of Modi's remarks to the SCO Summit noted that economic development requires robust connectivity, which can facilitate trust between societies. "Respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity is essential for connectivity and infrastructure projects. So too are non-discriminatory trade rights and transit regimes. The SCO needs to deliberate seriously on these aspects," the text said.

The SCO is a principle-based organisation and consensus drives the approach of its member states. It is "particularly noteworthy that we are reiterating mutual respect for sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity, equality, mutual benefit, non-interference in internal affairs, non-use of force or threat of use of force as a basis for our foreign policies", the text added.

The speech also highlighted the issue of combating terrorism, which was one of the "original goals" of the SCO. "Many of us have had our experiences, often originating beyond our borders. Let us be clear that if left unchecked, it can become a major threat to regional and global peace," the text said, in an apparent reference to India's concerns about cross-border terror from Pakistan.

The world community must isolate and expose countries that harbour terrorists, provide safe havens and condone terrorism, and cross-border terror requires a "decisive response" and terror financing and recruitment must be resolutely countered.

The speech also referred to challenges such as climate change and the proper use of emerging technologies such as artificial intelligence. India is working towards a committed reduction in emissions, transition to alternate fuels, adoption of electric vehicles and building climate-resilient infrastructure. It is also among countries to formulate a national strategy on AI and is working within the SCO framework on a roadmap for AI cooperation.

The Indian side expressed its condolences at the recent death of Iranian president Ebrahim Raisi in a helicopter crash while congratulating Iran on attending the SCO Summit as a member of the bloc. It also congratulated President Aleksandr Lukashenko on Belarus becoming a new member of the SCO.

The SCO, which was established in June 2001, includes Belarus, China, India, Iran, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Pakistan, Russia, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan. India was represented at the summit in Astana by Jaishankar following Modi's decision to skip the meet.

Xi invokes Panchsheel as key to end today's global conflicts

30 June 2024, Times of India

BEIJING/DELHI: Chinese President Xi Jinping on Friday highlighted the relevance of the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, which gained traction with the Non-Aligned Movement, to end the present-day conflicts and sought to expand influence in the Global South amid its tussle with the West.

Xi, 71, invoked the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, termed as Panchsheel by India, at a conference in Beijing to mark its 70th anniversary and also sought to juxtapose them with his new concept of Global Security Initiative envisaging a shared future for mankind.

The Panchsheel pointers were first formally enunciated in the Agreement on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet region of China and India signed on April 29, 1954, according to the MEA.

No Indian official was reported to have participated in the conference on Friday. The invitees included former Sri Lankan President Mahinda Rajapaksa and several politician and officials from various countries that have close ties with China.

The five principles formed part of the legacy of the then PM Jawaharlal Nehru and his Chinese counterpart Zhou Enlai in their unsuccessful quest to find a solution to the vexed boundary issue.

"The Five Principles answered the call of the times, and its initiation was an inevitable historic development. The Chinese leadership in the past specified the Five Principles in their entirety for the first time, namely, 'mutual respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity', 'mutual non-aggression', 'mutual non-interference in each other's internal affairs',

'equality and mutual benefit', and 'peaceful coexistence'," Xi said.

"They included the Five Principles in the China-India and China-Myanmar joint statements which jointly called for making them basic norms for state-to-state relations," Xi said.

The Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence were born in Asia but quickly ascended to the world stage. In 1955, over 20 Asian and African countries attended the Bandung Conference, Xi recalled.

The Non-Aligned Movement that rose in the 1960s adopted the Five Principles as its guiding principles, he said.

"The Five Principles have set a historic benchmark for international relations and international rule of law," he said, highlighting their relevance to ending the present-day conflicts.

Indian tank sinks while crossing river near China border, killing 5

29 June 2024, VOA

Five Indian soldiers were killed when a military tank they were traveling in sank while crossing a river in the remote region of Ladakh, which borders China, officials said Saturday.

The tank sank early Saturday due to sudden increase in the water levels of Shyok River during a military training activity, according to an Indian army command center statement. It said the accident took place in Saser Brangsa near the Line of Actual Control that divides India and China in the Ladakh region.

Defense Minister Rajnath Singh called it an "unfortunate accident."

"We will never forget exemplary service of our gallant soldiers to the nation. My heartfelt condolences to the bereaved families. The nation stands firm with them during this hour of grief," Singh wrote on the social platform X.

The Indian and Chinese militaries have been locked in a standoff in Ladakh since May 2020, when they clashed along their land border in the region, with 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers killed.

The skirmish turned into a long-running standoff in the rugged mountainous area, where each side has stationed tens of thousands of military personnel. New Delhi and Beijing have held a series of diplomatic and military talks to resolve their worst military conflict in decades.

The border dispute between India and China dates to the 1950s, and the two sides fought a war over it in 1962.

EXCLUSIVE | India Has Legitimate Say in Dalai Lama Selection, China Just Wants to Control Tibet

19 June 2024, News18, Manoj Gupta

Indian officials have questioned that when PRC continues to use various derogatory terms like 'wolf in a monks robe' for the Dalai Lama, why are they interested in seeking the control of the reincarnation of a man they so despise?

Amid talks of the 14th Dalai Lama's successions, sources in India have lashed out at China for trying to control the reincarnation by saying its approval is necessary for the candidate. Sources have said only India has a legitimate say in the Dalai Lama selection and that China was confusing the world and wants to control Tibet.

Sources said that being invited to an enthronement much like an oath taking ceremony of current times does not mean giving official legitimacy to the leader in question as the local people and those believing in him have already put him in the role of leadership. "This would mean those leaders from nations who had come to PM Narendra Modi's oath taking ceremony have given him official legitimacy to govern India for the next 5 years, certainly not," sources said.

Indian officials have questioned that when PRC continues to use various derogatory terms like 'wolf in a monks robe' for the Dalai Lama, why are they interested in seeking the control of the reincarnation of a man they so despise?

The first Dalai Lama was born in 1391 and the People's Republic of China was established in 1949. "How can they have claim over an institution that precedes their formation," sources questioned. The Dalai Lama had formally set up the institution of the Ganden Phorang in 1642 which is before the PRC was formed.

PRC's Founding Father Chairman Mao had infamously said 'Religion is poison' taking it from the Marxist maxim of 'Religion is Opium to the masses' when he met the Dalai Lama in 1956. This is a dictum even followed by the current Communist leadership in China led by President Xi Jinping. Hence, the question is as to why the CCP is so interested in controlling Buddhism in Tibet. The cultural revolution is a standing example and its impact remains large as religions and traditions including Tibetan Buddhism were destroyed and ravaged by the Communist Red Guards.

The abduction by the CCP of the current 11th Panchen Lama gives a clear indication of how Beijing has and continues to control Buddhism, but has failed.

ORDER NUMBER 5 MENTIONED BY CHINESE SPOKESPERSON

People's Republic of China under the Communist Party of China called for Tibet's invasion in 1949 and it was only in 2007 that they came up with 'Order number 5', which is a set of rules and regulations by Beijing to confirm the reincarnations of high lamas practising the Tibetan tradition of Buddhism. If the process laid out by PRC in the order number 5 is so vital to them, why did the PRC only introduce this order in 2007 and not immediately during the years post occupation?

No Tibetan law or religion demanded the establishment of the Order number 5. This order was introduced to control and strangle the practice of Buddhism, Indian sources said. Order number 5 is to control Buddhism, not to promote it.

Indian officials have stated that the PRC has no legitimate role in Tibet. While they thought controlling Buddhism was one way, but they have failed miserably as numerous monks and nuns have been fleeing Tibet. Since coming to power, Xi Jinping had made it his mission to sinicize the Tibetan tradition of Buddhism and he has done this by carrying out previous policy mentioned above (Order number 5) and also enforcing Tibetan Buddhist Institutes in Tibet to adopt and adhere to 'Xi Jinping thought of Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era'.

CURRENT SITUATION OF TIBETAN BUDDHISM

The current monastic education in Tibet stifles proper education and debates. The number of monks/nuns have been restricted, displaying a portrait of His Holiness in a monastery or even possessing one is a punishable offense. A source said, "Namkyi, who escaped exile recently, highlighted to us all how by her carrying a picture of the Dalai Lama and calling for his return branded her as a political prisoner and she was sentenced."

Recent incidents like the Larung Gar demolition, destruction of Buddhist Statue in Drago County, all indicate how the current communist leadership from Beijing views Buddhism and the Dalai Lama. Yet, still they claim to have legitimacy over the Dalai Lama which is "confounding".

INDIA

India has a more legitimate say when it comes to the Dalai Lama as Buddhism originated and spread from India to the rest of the world. The Buddhism that the Dalai Lama teaches and other practices are by and large from the Nalanda tradition of Buddhism.

A statement by the Ministry of External Affairs must be made stating that India will support and endorse the 15th Dalai Lama in accordance with the processes set forth by the current 14th Dalai Lama and that it would strongly oppose outside interference and influence in matters related to his succession as it is a purely religious matter and it is for the Tibetans to decide for themselves; and should the 15th Dalai Lama wish to be in India, then he too shall be an honoured guest just like the 14th Dalai Lama and the Government of India shall provide all the support as offered to the current Dalai Lama to the 15th Dalai Lama. India should be seen as the main unifying force in safeguarding the sanctity of the succession process which will remove doubts and anxiety from the minds of Tibetans. In this context, the Government of India must publicly endorse the statement of His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama, on the issue of his reincarnation made on September 24, 2011.

India plans Tibet renaming tactic to foil China's water diplomacy with Maldives

17 June 2024, India Today, Pradip R. Sagar

The military is apparently awaiting the government's go-ahead for the move aimed at countering Beijing's geopolitical narratives

Geopolitical manoeuvring between China and India, particularly over the sensitive issues of water resources and territorial claims, highlights the complex dynamics of the region. China's recent gesture of gifting water to the Maldives from the Tibetan glaciers, while promoting water conservation campaigns in Tibet, has once again drawn attention to its strategic objectives vis a vis environmental concerns arising out of its actions.

China's alleged exploitation of Tibet's water resources, coupled with its attempts to alter the narrative through renaming and territorial claims, has met with opposition from India. In response, New Delhi has considered similar tactics, including renaming places in Tibet, as a form of diplomatic retaliation.

The strategic implications of these actions extend beyond mere symbolism, reflecting the broader competition for influence and control in the Himalayan region. With both countries vying for dominance and asserting their respective narratives, tensions persist, necessitating a careful balance of diplomatic and strategic manoeuvres.

As India weighs its response and the Narendra Modi government considers its options, the situation underscores the delicate balance of power and the imperative of strategic foresight in navigating complex geopolitical challenges.

In a heightened effort to woo the Maldives, China has gifted 3,000 metric tonnes of water from the Tibetan glaciers to the island nation, in two separate batches in March and May. The move has put China in a peculiar situation. Incidentally, on March 20, barely a week before the first consignment of water was sent, China had unveiled the country's water conservation regulations.

Effective from May 1, the regulations aim to provide a legal guarantee for China's water security, the advancement of ecological progress and high-quality development. Adhering to the vision that "lucid waters and lush mountains are invaluable assets", China has taken multiple steps to protect its water resources and restore harmonious ecological systems.

Beijing, in a social media campaign, has been asking residents across Tibet to conserve water. Multiple social media posts claim that in Sa'gya County, Tibetans are urged to conserve water "this at a time when bottled water companies allegedly exploit the pristine waters of Tibet for profit at the cost of ecological damage.

However, China observers claim that Tibet's water resources are comparatively in higher quantity vis-à-vis China. Beijing has been exploiting these resources, which are extremely vulnerable to climate change, biodiversity, and species housing rare flora and fauna, as well as the intangible Buddhist heritage associated with the rivers in Tibet.

The majority of Chinese bottled water companies, such as Nongfu Spring, in alleged nexus with cadre of the Communist Party of China (CCP) in Tibet, are exploiting the water resources of the plateau region. This is in addition to existing and proposed river water transfer projects.

Observers feel that while New Delhi has donated potable water to the Maldives in the past, it has not damaged the fragile ecology of the Himalayas for such procurement for Male.

It is claimed that China's move to send "glacial water" from Tibet to the Maldives also serves its ulterior political motive of getting Male to help formalise Tibet's name as the Beijing-preferred 'Xizang', and let the world accept the former in the years to come, as has been the case with East Turkestan, now called 'Xinjiang'.

China has been pushing narratives by changing the names of the places, including Arunachal Pradesh, multiple times. China claims Arunachal as its territory by referring to it as 'Zangnan' or southern Tibet. China has rechristened 30 locations in Arunachal with Chinese and Tibetan names. New Delhi has consistently rejected China's attempts to rename places in Arunachal, asserting that the state is an integral part of India.

Barely a couple of months before the G20 leader's summit in New Delhi last September, Beijing had played mischief by releasing a new map that asserted territorial claim over Arunachal and Aksai Chin in Ladakh. In the 2023 edition of China's 'standard map', uploaded by its ministry of natural resources on the website of its standard map service website, Aksai Chin and Arunachal are among the south and south-east Asian territories marked within the Chinese borders.

In retaliation, the Indian military has planned similar tactics by changing the names of close to 30 places in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), backed by extensive historical research. However, the Indian military is awaiting a go-ahead from the newly formed Modi government 3.0 before escalating matters. South Block officials believe this is the only way to counter the narrative as China only understands the 'fit for tat' language.

India should recalibrate its position on China, says president of Tibetan government in exile

16 June 2024, The Week, Namrata Biji Ahuja

PENPA TSERING HAS been closely watching China's military drills in the Taiwan Strait, renaming of villages in Arunachal Pradesh and the aggression in Ladakh. The president of the Tibetan government in exile in Dharamsala has trashed China's claims over Indian territory, citing the 1914 Simla Agreement that defines the border between India and Tibet to which Tibetans were signatories. "Tibetans are happy with that," he says. Excerpts from an interview:

“ As long as you keep giving more business to China, it will keep growing. And right now, there is no sign of China attempting to make a move towards more openness and becoming a responsible partner in the global community. ”

Q/ China's military drills in the Taiwan Strait have spurred concerns about a potential armed conflict in the Indo-Pacific region.

A/ Some years ago, when China announced air defence identification zones, I told our American friends that if the Chinese can claim the air they will claim anything underneath that. This is exactly what is happening, and it is not just the endeavour of reunification or invasion of Taiwan. Look at the whole of South China Sea or East China Sea, alongside Japan and Taiwan. China is giving Chinese names to all these territories. This is to redefine history, remove the historical background and claim these territories as its own. Though China denies territorial hegemonic ambitions, the world knows better.

But I tell the Taiwanese that China is not ready to attack them yet. Xi Jinping keeps moving the generals and commanders from one place to another in a very short period of time. There is no time for the generals to build relations with cadres. A general and the second-in-command do not trust each other. Then there are political commissars who oversee their work and they also do not trust each other. It is good for Xi to ensure that there is no military coup against him, but it is not enough to fight a war. You need synchronisation among the cadres and also between the different arms of the military.

China is the only country that spends more money on internal security than external security threats, which demonstrates the deep distrust between the rulers and the ruled.

These are serious vulnerabilities aside from the economic wars that China is going through and the pivoting towards the Global South, which is also a huge competition for India. The question is how much purchasing power does the Global South have? And if China floods all the Global South countries with cheap products, it will kill all their small and medium-scale industries. Many already have realised the impact of Chinese investments in their countries. For example, all the African countries are now restructuring their loan repayment. And the level of debt economies that China has created around the maritime Silk Road and the taking over of strategic locations are known to people who understand China. Unfortunately, the Global South still has to learn more. They have very little understanding of China's motivation.

Dalai Lama | AP

Q/ How do you assess the border dispute between India and China?

A/ Way back in 1949, just after communism took over China, it invaded Tibet. Now, it claims parts of the Indian territory as southern Tibet and Arunachal Pradesh. But we Tibetans were signatories to the 1914 Simla Agreement that defines the border between India and Tibet through the McMahon Line. We are happy with that. But China's claim over all these territories in Arunachal Pradesh or in Ladakh is based on what it claims to be Tibet's territory. It has now started renaming all territories, including those in Arunachal Pradesh. Therefore, the question now is whether the Tibetan interest and the Indian interest aligns or not.

India has been following the One China policy for decades. The only change now is that India does not keep repeating it. And, as I always say, India knows best. We also understand that India or any country will not leave aside its national interest for the interest of Tibet. But I think India tried its best to reach out to China, create a better atmosphere, both in political and business relationships. Unfortunately, China is pushing India more towards the west because of its behaviour.

Q/ Should India be worried about China's ambitions?

A/ The question is whether China needs India and the western world more or the democratic world needs China more. As long as you keep giving more business to China, it will keep growing. And right now, there is no sign of China attempting to make a move towards more openness and becoming a responsible partner in the global community. Particularly in Europe and America, you get this feeling that you cannot make China more powerful than what it already is. Chinese investments are growing in space technology, military, quantum computing, artificial intelligence and the Belt and Road Initiative, and creating debt economies around the world. So maybe it is time for India to recalibrate its position on China. Beijing respects only strength, not weakness.

We follow a non-violent approach to resolve the China-Tibet dispute through the Middle Way policy espoused by the Dalai Lama (in pic), which can only be understood if we understand the polarities that exist.

Q/ The US Senate has passed the Resolve Tibet Act, urging the Chinese government to engage in dialogue with the Dalai Lama or Tibetan leaders to resolve the China-Tibet dispute. How significant is this development?

A/ We have been working closely with the US Congress over the past two years to move this bill called the Resolve Tibet Act, which talks about countering China's disinformation on Tibetan history. And we are almost there. The bill was passed by the House Foreign Affairs Committee in November 2023, and this February it was passed on the House floor with 392 votes in favour. In April, it was unanimously moved in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and it recently went through the Senate. When it becomes a law in the US, it will become an important tool for us to reach out to other governments to counter China's false narrative that Tibet is part of the People's Republic of China.

We follow a non-violent approach to resolve the China-Tibet dispute through the Middle Way policy espoused by the Dalai Lama, which can only be understood if we understand the polarities that exist. One polarity is to understand the historical status of Tibet as an independent state, and the other polarity is the present situation of Tibet under the repressive communist government. The historical status has not been pushed as much as we would have liked to and China, on the other hand, has been asking every country to say that Tibet is part of PRC. That is why the law is important to explain to governments that if they keep parroting what the Chinese want them to say then it is against the law because if they support negotiations between Representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government, then they cannot contradict themselves by saying Tibet is part of PRC, because that removes the very ground for negotiation.

Q/ The Dalai Lama turns 89 next month. As the political head of the Tibetan government in exile, what is your focus today?

A/ I have been travelling a lot to visit all the Tibetan settlements over the last two years. I promised my people that I would visit every single community two times in five years. We created a platform called the Voluntary Tibet Advocacy Group, where every Tibetan can join in advocating for Tibet. And this has been gaining ground now. One of our challenges is to prepare our younger generation for future leadership. Another challenge is to identify future challenges and make sure that those challenges are not there even before we reach there. Even though His Holiness keeps reassuring us that he will live for another two decades and more, we have to keep the community together, communications going on and reach out to the international community. I tell our Chinese friends, let us see whether Chinese Communist Party outlives the Dalai Lama or His Holiness outlives CCP.

Q/ Do you think it is time the Indian government openly declared that the Dalai Lama's successor will be chosen by the Dalai Lama himself or the Tibetan government in exile?

A/ To some extent it is taken for granted as to where India stands on this, whether it says it vocally or not. I am sure the Indian government is concerned about these issues and developing its own strategy. I believe that it is not going to happen during my tenure. His Holiness will definitely live long. But, at the same time, just as every government has its protocols, we are also preparing protocols. Whenever that eventuality happens, it will be revised by successive Sikyongs or Kashag (cabinet) members at that time.

I am sure that the Indian government will also be seriously thinking about this even though I have not had concrete conversations about this. But I think it is understood that these are definitely matters of concern. Fortunately for the Tibetans, because of His Holiness's leadership, we enjoy bipartisan, bicameral support on Tibet in the US. Even in the Indian Parliament, we have an all-party Indian parliamentary group for Tibet and all the successive governments have followed similar policies on Tibet. Of course, they are more vocal when they are in the opposition and less vocal when they are in government, but they all have the same thinking and support for Tibet.

'Unwarranted': India slams China, Pakistan for mentioning J&K in joint statement

13 June 2024, Times of India

The ministry of external affairs on Thursday condemned the references of Jammu and Kashmir in the China-Pakistan joint statement calling it 'unwarranted'. In response to media queries on references to Jammu & Kashmir in the China-Pakistan Joint Statement, spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal said: "We have noted unwarranted references to the Union Territory of Jammu & Kashmir in the joint statement between China and Pakistan of 07 June 2024.

We categorically reject such references. Our position on the issue is consistent and well-known to the concerned parties. The Union Territory of Jammu and Kashmir and the Union Territory of Ladakh have been, are and will always remain integral and inalienable parts of India. No other country has the locus standing to comment on the same."

"The same joint statement also mentions activities and projects under the so-called China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, some of which are in India's sovereign territory under forcible and illegal occupation by Pakistan," New Delhi's statement read.

The MEA said it resolutely opposes and rejects any moves by other countries to reinforce legitimise Pakistan's illegal occupation of these territories, impinging on India's sovereignty and territorial integrity."

China and Pakistan recently released a joint statement after Shehbaz Sharif talked with Chinese President Xi Jinping on the Kashmir issue.

The joint statement said both China and Pakistan underscored the importance of maintaining peace and stability in South Asia, the need for resolution of all outstanding disputes, and their opposition to any unilateral action. "The Pakistani side briefed the Chinese side on the latest developments of the situation in Jammu and Kashmir. The Chinese side reiterated that the Jammu and Kashmir dispute is left over from history, and should be properly and peacefully resolved in accordance with the UN Charter, relevant UN Security Council resolutions and bilateral agreements," the statement said.

China ready to improve bilateral ties with India and work on border dispute

12 June 2024, The Economic Times

China said it is ready to collaborate with India to improve bilateral relations and mentioned that their border disputes "should be handled properly." This statement comes close on the heels of Narendra Modi returning to Prime Minister's chair for record-equalling third straight term though with a reduced majority.

According to a post on X by the Chinese embassy's spokesperson in India, China also highlighted that a stable relationship is "in the interest of both countries and conducive to peace and development in this region and beyond."

"China and India are important neighbouring countries. Relevant border issues should be handled properly. A sound and stable #ChinaIndia relationship is in the interest of both countries, and conducive to the peace and development in this region and beyond. China is willing to work with India to push forward bilateral relations in the right direction," the Spokesperson of Chinese Embassy in India wrote.

The embassy's statement comes a day after India's External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar reaffirmed his commitment to "finding a solution for the border issues" with China.

India will focus on resolving the remaining issues along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China, Jaishankar said on June 11. This comes amid the over four-year border dispute in eastern Ladakh that has significantly strained ties between the two Asian giants. Shortly after taking charge of the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) for a second term, Jaishankar, referring to cross-border terrorism from Pakistan, said efforts will be made to address the challenge and that it "cannot be the policy of a good neighbour." India-China relation after border clashes China and India's relationship has been fraught since deadly border clashes in 2020, which resulted in at least 20 Indian soldiers and an undisclosed number of Chinese casualties. Despite multiple rounds of diplomatic and military negotiations aimed at easing tensions, relations remain tense.

Recently, Chinese Premier Li Qiang congratulated PM Modi on his re-election, but President Xi Jinping has not yet extended his congratulations, highlighting the ongoing strain between the two nations.

Meanwhile, a Chinese government spokeswoman last week criticised an exchange over X between Modi and the government of Taiwan, which China claims as its territory.

"We noted the results of India's general election and extend congratulations on the victory of the BJP led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi and the National Democratic Alliance," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning told a media briefing here.

A healthy and stable China-India relationship is in the interest of both the countries, and conducive to the peace and development in this region and beyond, Mao said while responding to a question by the official media seeking China's comment on Modi's win.

China stands ready to work with India to act in the fundamental interests of the two countries and the two peoples, bear in mind the overall interest of our ties, look to the future and advance bilateral relations on a healthy and stable track, she said.

India blocks Chinese money

Since 2020, India has tightened restrictions on Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) from countries sharing land borders, mainly targeting Chinese investments. This policy change followed the Covid-19 outbreak and increased tensions at the Ladakh border. Consequently, Chinese automakers such as EV giant BYD have faced hurdles in expanding their investments in India.

BYD also proposed a joint venture with India's Megha Engineering, one of the biggest buyers of electoral bonds, but this plan was rejected by the home ministry.

In the four years since the rule change, the government has received around 450 applications from Chinese companies, rejecting 180 of them. Approximately 70 applications have been approved, including some from entities considered essential for iPhone production. Currently, about 200 proposals are pending with the government.

After Modi's election win, China calls for 'stable' relations with India

05 June 2024, AA, Riyaz ul Khaliq

China expresses readiness to work with India to 'steer development of bilateral relations on a healthy and stable track'

China on Wednesday called for "stable" relations with India after Prime Minister Narendra Modi claimed third term win in general elections, state media reported.

"A sound and stable China-India relationship serves the common interests of both sides and is conducive to peace and development of the region and the world at large," Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning told reporters in Beijing.

Modi on Tuesday evening claimed a win for the ruling National Democratic Alliance (NDA) in the seven-phased general elections.

According to official results, the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) won 240 seats in the 543-member lower house of parliament, while the main opposition Indian National Congress got 99 seats.

The BJP, however, remained short of the 272-seat majority on its own.

Tuesday's results, however, showed the NDA alliance won over 272 seats, the number required to form the government, while the opposition alliance secured over 230 seats.

Felicitating Modi on his win, Mao said: "China is ready to work with India to proceed from the fundamental interests of the two countries and the two peoples, bear in mind the overall situation and the future, and steer the development of bilateral relations on a healthy and stable track."

India and China have counterclaims in Arunachal Pradesh state of the South Asian nation while the two Himalayan neighbors are engaged in a border tussle in the Ladakh area of the disputed Jammu and Kashmir.

Modi's uncoordinated approach on Tibet gives China the advantage

29 May 2024, Himal SouthAsian

This story is part of 'Modi's India from the Edges', a special Himal series presenting Southasian regional perspectives on Narendra Modi's decade in power and possible return as prime minister in the 2024 Indian election. To read the series and support Himal's work on it, click here.

In April this year, India's prime minister, Narendra Modi, outlined his priority on India-China relations:

in an interview to Newsweek. "It is my belief that we need to urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders so that the abnormality in our bilateral interactions can be put behind us," Modi said. The very next day, a spokesperson for China's foreign ministry responded to the comment, saying, "The boundary question does not represent the entirety of China-India relations, and it should be placed appropriately in bilateral relations and managed properly."

This latest public exchange between India and China draws attention to an unstated but critical issue between the two countries – Tibet. The "borders" or the "boundary question" are nothing but references to the Indo-Tibetan border, which became a point of contention between the Asian behemoths after the Chinese takeover of Tibet in 1959. In less than a month, in the wake of India's ongoing general election, Modi and his Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) may form a government in New Delhi for a third consecutive time, or the Indian National Congress and its allies may cause a major upset and take power. The new Indian government, however it is constituted, will have to contend with a poor near-term outlook for India-China relations, with Tibet continuing to be the elephant in the room.

'China allegedly invaded India in 1962': Congress' Mani Shankar Aiyar sparks row with remark

29 May 2024, Business Today

The fallout from Aiyar's remarks saw Congress General Secretary Jairam Ramesh take to X to announce Aiyar's subsequent unreserved apology for his choice of words. Ramesh explained that the veteran leader had apologised for mistakenly using the term 'alleged invasion'.

Senior Congress leader Mani Shankar Aiyar sparked a fresh controversy by saying that China "allegedly" invaded India in October 1962. This statement has led to criticism from the ruling BJP, which condemned it as a "brazen attempt at revisionism".

The fallout from Aiyar's remarks saw Congress General Secretary Jairam Ramesh take to X to announce Aiyar's subsequent unreserved apology for his choice of words. Ramesh explained that the veteran leader had apologised for mistakenly using the term 'alleged invasion'.

Acknowledging Aiyar's age, Ramesh emphasised that the party had distanced itself from the original phrasing used by Aiyar during his speech at the book launch event 'Nehru's First Recruits' held at the Foreign Correspondents' Club in Delhi.

During the event, Aiyar recounted a personal anecdote about his application to the Indian Foreign Service (IFS) and shared his experience of being denied entry amid speculations linking him to leftist ideologies. These statements, however, raised eyebrows and invited criticism from various groups, including from within his own party.

Realising the gravity of the situation, Aiyar later sought to clarify his stance, admitting that his choice of the term 'alleged' was inappropriate, particularly during an election period.

In response, BJP IT cell chief Amit Malviya lambasted Aiyar's comments as an attempt to whitewash history and criticised Congress leaders for their supposed favourable stance towards China.

While noting Aiyar's subsequent apology, Jairam Ramesh also criticised Prime Minister Narendra Modi for his handling of recent Chinese invasions, highlighting past instances of Chinese aggression towards India.

Aiyar's recent statement adds to a string of controversial remarks he has made in the past, including urging India to respect Pakistan for its nuclear capabilities. These comments have sparked backlash from political leaders, with Prime Minister Modi and Home Minister Amit Shah condemning Aiyar's views.

The Chinese strategy of 'resettlement villages' aims at colonising LAC

27 May 2024, First Post, Mahesh Ranjan Debata

Beijing seeks to settle Uyghurs, Tibetans, and Gorkhas along the nearly 3,500 km long Line of Actual Control from west to east through 'resettlement villages' or border defence villages

The People's Republic of China (PRC) has surprised the world many times with its skullduggery. India too has fallen prey to the Chinese perfidy in 1962, further in 2020. The latest Chinese trickery is all about the sinister design to settle Uyghurs, Tibetans, and the Gorkhas along the nearly 3,500 km long Line of Actual Control (LAC) from the western sector to the eastern sector through 'resettlement villages' or border defence villages (Xiaokang). China's central government has planned several hundred resettlement villages along its border with various countries, but the main target at present is India.

The Chinese policy of resettling Tibetans along the India-China border in Tibet, especially along the LAC in Arunachal Pradesh, is not a new phenomenon. The Chinese are pursuing, even forcing Tibetans on their battlefield with India. During an interaction with some villagers from Koyul village near Hot Spring in Ladakh Union Territory, which has been one of the friction points along the India-Tibet border, this author found an authentic local source of information in 2018 about the establishment of resettlement villages.

Similarly, there are reports in international news media that China is mulling over forcing the Uyghurs and other ethnic minority groups to settle down along Xinjiang's border with Ladakh as part of its specific plan to checkmate the overarching Indian presence along the Xinjiang-Ladakh part of LAC following the Galwan clashes on June 20, 2020. The Chinese may claim this strategy as a counterbalance against what the Indian public, media, intelligentsia, and defence veterans have been vociferously calling for since the Galwan incident—the use of the “Uyghur card” to put the Chinese on the back foot.

But what is more disturbing and a matter of grave concern is the apprehension in the Indian psyche that the brave Gorkhas, who have been the mainstay of the Indian military for decades, may be used as a shield along the LAC, especially on the eastern flank. China wants to take advantage of the issues related to Gorkhas's unhappiness and resentment after the Indian government announced the Agniveer scheme for a short stint in the Indian Army and the subsequent announcement by the Nepal government in 2022 not allowing the Nepalese citizens, especially Gorkhas, to join the Indian defence establishment. This is a golden opportunity for China to fish in the troubled waters. It will not fail to inject venom in the Gorkhas' minds to show hatred for India and use them against India.

No Chinese plan is devised without a strategy. The Chinese pretext in this context is that both Tibetans and Gorkhas, being acclimatised to the inclement weather and high altitude, will be a better bet than the mainland Han Chinese soldiers for mountainous warfare with India. The Chinese strategy is to provoke a war between Indian soldiers and the Tibetans, or Gorkhas, deployed along the border as the first line of defence. China will not leave any stone unturned to instigate India deliberately, as it has been doing for the last seven decades, for minor skirmishes that can turn into full-fledged war. If any war occurs in the future along the LAC, no Han Chinese soldier will be killed, but the poor and innocent soldiers on the front, be they Uyghurs, Tibetans, or Gorkhas, will be killed.

Chinese propaganda mechanisms will not fail to spread rumours about India's treachery against the Tibetans and Gorkhas. If India shows any consideration for Tibetans or Gorkhas during the war, it will lose badly. This will be a win-win situation for the Chinese, at least on the domestic front, but it will be an irreparable loss for India. For instance, the Chinese government will get a reprieve from the ire and resentment it faced on the home front after the Galwan clash that led to the deaths of several Chinese soldiers.

India will lose the considerable goodwill it has been enjoying amongst the Uyghurs, Tibetans, or Gorkhas across the globe. But the grand Chinese design will be to use the Gorkhas to create instability along the border and inside India, exactly the way it has done in the Indian hinterland (Kashmir) with the help of Pakistan. The same may be recreated in West Bengal (especially Darjeeling), Northeastern states, Uttarakhand, and Sikkim, where a substantial population of Gorkhas live. Since there has been demand for a separate Gorkhaland out of the Indian state of West Bengal, Chinese efforts will be to exacerbate the situation further by providing men, money, and materials. Now, with the help of another South Asian state, Nepal, which has not a very amicable relationship with India at the present juncture, it will not hesitate to create internal instability in India. Earlier, for over seven decades, China had been using the South Asian nation of Pakistan to vitiate the atmosphere in Kashmir.

India will now face huge challenges on multiple fronts. The Chinese will ensure India curries the disfavour of the Tibetans and Gorkhas, who have been culturally, spiritually, and emotionally close to India. Particularly, the Gorkhas, who have had a strong bond with Indians for the last few centuries and who have been part of the Indian military, contributing immensely and sacrificing their lives for India, would nurse a grudge against India. By doing this, the Chinese are following in letter and spirit one of the teachings of Chinese philosopher Tsu Nzu, “killing your enemies without losing a single bullet,” described in his masterpiece, The Art of War. Two important points can be made here. China will set India right along the border by putting her at risk of taking any action against Tibetans and Gorkhas. Further, the old-age ties between India and Tibetans and India and Gorkhas will be severed.

If the Chinese government becomes successful in its plans and strategy against India, the disturbances and internal instability India endured in Kashmir for over seven decades (till August 2019) will reverberate with a new tone and tenor, jeopardising India's security and stability. It is high time the Indian government pondered this critical state of affairs. The Indian government and its defence establishment must find a counter-strategy to deal with the Chinese design. Military intelligence and thinkers must understand Chinese strategies and accordingly prepare the necessary defence against them. The Indian government has strategised its Vibrant Villages Programme (VVP) in 2023 in response to China's Xiaokang initiative for the comprehensive development of some sensitive villages along the LAC, such as Arunachal Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh, Sikkim, Uttarakhand, and Ladakh Union Territory. The government must ensure that it does not lose its most important constituency against China, the Tibetans. Further, the Gorkhas should not fall into Chinese hands, which is not going to augur well for India.

China Is Upgrading Dual-Use Villages Along Its Disputed Indian Border

May 16 2024, China Power, Jennifer Jun and Brian Hart

In the desolate and inhospitable Himalayas, China is constructing and expanding hundreds of “xiaokang” (小康) villages along its hotly disputed border with India.<sup>1</sup> These villages, often accompanied by military and dual-use infrastructure, are an important “gray zone” tool enabling China to assert and defend its claims near disputed areas. Commercial satellite images provide a glimpse into China’s activities and show that China is making rapid and significant progress on these border villages despite the harsh environment.

In July 2017, the government of China’s Tibet Autonomous Region announced plans to construct hundreds of border villages and accompanying infrastructure as part of a major push to develop China’s remote border regions. Between 2018 and 2022, the region reportedly built 624 villages, and work has continued on additional villages. Many of these are clustered along the eastern sector of the Line of Actual Control (LAC), the de facto border separating China and India. The eastern sector borders Arunachal Pradesh, a state administered by India but largely claimed by China as “South Tibet” (藏南).

Capturing high-resolution satellite imagery in this region is challenging due to heavy cloud cover, but images from recent months have enabled the analysis of four locations within a small 65 square kilometer (km<sup>2</sup>) area. These locations—Zhuangnan, Majiduncun, Yarao, and Kuqiongmen—were chosen to represent different development phases and types, including military, civilian, and dual-use infrastructure. Together, these sites serve as a microcosm of developments underway along much of the 3,500-km border.

Just seven kilometers northwest of the LAC sits the border village of Zhuangnan (庄南), where a likely military or paramilitary facility has undergone significant work in recent years.

Historical satellite images show a walled complex with at least eleven buildings built there by 2019. By 2020, however, seven of the buildings were razed and new buildings were built.

Additional work was done there in the years that followed. Satellite imagery from October 22, 2022, shows an upgraded walled complex encircling four buildings that appear to be barracks, as well as another large building and a radome or communication tower.

Use the slider to compare images. View October 22, 2022, image and December 31, 2023, image.

More recent images show two additional complexes being developed near the main complex since 2022. In an image from December 31, 2023, a new facility is visible due south of the main complex. It features high walls surrounding six buildings with vehicles throughout. Imagery also shows yet another new complex with a perimeter wall encircling a small, green-roofed building. Given its proximity to the nearby facilities, walled perimeter, and irregular shape, the green-roofed building is likely dedicated to observation or operational support.

The barracks, perimeter walls, and radome/communications tower located at these complexes indicate the likely presence of China’s military, the People’s Liberation Army (PLA). It is also possible these facilities are operated by the paramilitary People’s Armed Police (PAP). Under China’s Land Borders Law, these two forces share responsibility for defending China’s borders from armed attacks or other encroachments.<sup>2</sup>

While the exact purpose of these facilities is unclear, their position so close to the LAC suggests they may offer the PLA or PAP a vantage point for monitoring activities along this area of the border.

Expanded Village and Likely Military Activity at Majiduncun

Approximately 2 km north of Zhuangnan—and less than 10 km northwest of the disputed border, is the relatively large village Majiduncun (马及墩村), which has been significantly improved over the past two years.<sup>3</sup>

Majiduncun previously comprised a smaller number of buildings and two helipads, but by November 2018 the area started to be razed to make way for new building complexes. Imagery from October 22, 2022, shows village construction was still underway, with several of the new grey-roofed buildings to the north already complete.

Imagery captured about a year later, on November 8, 2023, shows the village’s new buildings externally completed, with well-paved roads throughout the area. Notably, the two existing helipads are still present. Given the region’s mountainous terrain, helipads play a key role in facilitating the swift movement of people, equipment, and supplies in the area, especially during emergencies.

View October 22, 2022, image and November 8, 2023, image.

On the northern edge of the village is a likely PLA or PAP facility that shows signs of continued activity. The facility includes a gated entrance, a satellite dish, and changing numbers of likely military heavy trucks in the parking lot over the past year.

The presence of military or dual-use facilities is a common feature within xiaokang villages. China's Land Borders Law codifies border defense into the responsibilities of border area governments, calling for them to "strengthen the construction of mass defense forces [群防队伍] to maintain border security." Furthermore, a 2021 article in the official newspaper PLA Daily emphasizes the "need to strengthen the construction of border infrastructure and encourage people of all ethnic groups to root themselves in the border areas, guard the homeland, and build their hometowns" in this region.

This emphasis on leveraging civilian villages to support the military bears the hallmarks of China's "military-civil fusion" (军民融合) strategy, which aims to fuse together China's economic and military development to support overall national objectives.

It is also indicative of China's efforts to use gray zone tactics to advance its strategic and security interests in disputed areas while staying below the threshold of armed conflict. By building civilian villages, China can increase the population of remote border areas, adding legitimacy to its territorial claims. This simultaneously creates the necessary infrastructure to better support military and police forces, which, in turn, helps to protect local civilians from perceived threats across the border.

New Village at Yarao

Situated approximately 26 km northwest of the border is another example of one of China's xiaokang villages, called Yarao (亚绕). Roughly 30 buildings were constructed at Yarao between 2018 and early 2022, but work there accelerated in 2022. Satellite imagery shows that at least 65 new buildings of identical shape were built between March and November 2022. Workers also added a new road leading to two new helipads due east of the village.

View March 6, 2022, image and November 2, 2022, image.

The images available in November show that some of the new buildings at Yarao were not yet roofed, but more recent imagery analyzed by the authors shows that the buildings were externally completed by December.

The speed of construction at Yarao is a testament to China's capacity to rapidly build infrastructure to support new xiaokang villages. China's progress is particularly impressive given the inhospitable terrain of the Himalayas. Yarao sits at a breathtaking 3,900 meters above sea level, where the thin air can pose health risks, and harsh temperatures and weather can create logistical challenges.

New Potential Military Outpost at Kuqiongmen

Between these far-flung villages, China is constructing new roads and what may become small security outposts. One such potential location is visible near Kuqiongmen (亏穷们), approximately halfway between Majiduncun and Yarao.

Satellite imagery from March 13, 2020, shows a winding road along a steep hillside more than 3,700 meters in elevation leading to a small, blue-roofed building with a courtyard.

The original building was externally completed in early 2018 and then razed sometime between March 2020 and March 2022. Satellite imagery captured on November 16, 2023, shows significant work underway to expand the grounds formerly occupied by the building. Visible in the image are construction vehicles, equipment, and likely gabion walls to support continued hillside excavation. Along the road to this construction site, areas were cleared for open-air storage of construction materials and equipment.

It is not yet clear what kind of facilities will be built here but given the location's remoteness from other villages and its position on a hillside overlooking a valley, it is likely that this location could serve as a military or police outpost.

Conclusion

The four locations analyzed here comprise only a meager swath of the expansive disputed border. China has built hundreds of villages along the border in recent years, and it continues to expand and upgrade both civilian and military infrastructure in the area.

China is not alone in developing infrastructure along the border. Alarmed by China's border buildup, India also launched its own program to build villages in Arunachal Pradesh and other border states

However, China has demonstrated an enormous capacity to develop these regions, and India will find it challenging to keep pace with China.

China will continue developing these areas to support its strategic objectives. As it does, analysts should continue to observe China's activities to stay informed about its evolving approach and capabilities in the region.

Open airing of serious differences belie border settlement hopes as China's new envoy arrived in India

16 May 2024, Tibetan Review

As China finally appointed an ambassador to New Delhi after keeping the post vacant for 18 months, the two sides have reiterated their complaints against and criticisms of each other on the four-year-old border standoff in eastern Ladakh, belying hopes, if any, for a new determination to resolve the issue at an early date.

India's External Affairs Minister, Mr S Jaishankar, reiterated New Delhi's desire for a resolution of remaining issues with China in a recent interview, highlighting that normal bilateral ties depended on peace and tranquillity at the border.

But while expressing a seemingly positive stance, Jaishankar indicated that the remaining (border) issues mainly revolve around "patrolling rights and patrolling abilities," decried China's official globaltimes.cn May 13.

This is because China has repeatedly opposed this stance of India, arguing that the border issue need not be a hindrance to normalizing bilateral ties in other areas.

The report said Chinese scholars and military experts, reflecting the official line, strongly objected to these remarks, "cautioning that they effectively annex the current disputed areas into Indian territory, constituting a severe infringement of Chinese sovereignty."

The report complained that Jaishankar had made the remarks during an exclusive interview with the PTI news agency, emphasizing that resolving border issues is a foundation on which the relationship between the two countries can come back to normal. What the report took as "seemingly positive" was the fact that Jaishankar had commented on Prime Minister Narendra Modi's remarks to the Newsweek magazine last month that the border situation needed to be addressed urgently and that stable and peaceful ties between India and China were important for not just the two countries but for the entire region and the world.

Hu Zhiyong, a research fellow with the Institute of International Relations at the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences, has called on China to remain highly vigilant on Jaishankar's remarks. His "patrol rights" remarks actually incorporate the current disputed areas between China and India into Indian territory, severely infringing upon Chinese sovereignty, the report cited Hu as saying.

Hu is of the view that while Modi downplays the Chinese-Indian border issue, Jaishankar adopts a tougher stance, indicating that the softening of Modi's attitude may be only for the sake of domestic elections, a stratagem to woo a group of swing voters. He has accused Jaishankar of deliberately provoking China.

Zhang Junshe, a Chinese military expert, has accused Jaishankar of blaming China for the current border standoff. "It's quite obvious that the current border issues are entirely caused by India's continuous provocations in recent years. As long as India stops provoking, the problem can calm down." He wanted both parties to "place the border issue in an appropriate position within their bilateral relations."

If India attempts to use the border issue as leverage against China, it won't work because China is equally determined to defend its sovereignty and territorial integrity, Zhang has maintained.

The report noted that Chinese ambassador-designate to India, Xu Feihong, had said during an interview on May 10 that the Chinese side believed that China-India ties should not be defined by any single issue or area, and the boundary question is not the entirety of the relationship.

The report also noted Xu's remark that China was ready to work with India to accommodate each other's concerns, find a mutually acceptable solution to specific issues through dialogue at an early date, and turn the page as soon as possible.

But given China's hardline expansionist position, calling for "a mutually acceptable solution to specific issues" appears to be a devoid of any meaning.

Meanwhile, Jaishankar has reiterated India's position on May 14, saying the deployment of forces at the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China (ie, occupied Tibet) was "abnormal" and the security of the country should not be disregarded.

Speaking at an event organised by the Indian Chamber of Commerce in Kolkata, Jaishankar has said India responded to the Galwan Valley clash by counter-deployment of forces there.

"In 2020, the Chinese, in violation of multiple agreements, brought a large number of forces to our border and they did it at the time when we were under Covid lockdown," news18.com May 14 quoted Jaishankar as saying.

Jaishankar on India-China standoff: 'Abnormal deployment along LAC'

15 May 2024, Hindustan Times

External affairs minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar on Tuesday described the deployment of forces at the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China as 'abnormal', adding that the security of the country should not be disregarded.

"After 1962, Rajiv Gandhi went to China in 1988 in many ways that was the key step towards normalising the ties (with China)...there was a clear understanding that we will discuss our boundary differences but we will maintain peace and tranquillity on the border. And the rest of the relationship will carry on," the minister was quoted by PTI as saying at an event in Kolkata.

"What changed now is what happened in 2020. In 2020, the Chinese, in violation of multiple agreements, brought a large number of forces to our border and they did it at the time when we were under COVID lockdown," Jaishankar said. The minister asserted that India responded by counter deployment of force and for four now, the forces have been deployed ahead of the normal base positions at Galwan. "This is a very abnormal deployment along the LAC. Given the tension between the two countries... As Indian citizens, none of us should disregard the security of the country...it is today a challenge", he said. There is also an economic challenge, he said, which is due to "neglect of the manufacturing and infrastructure sectors in the previous years. "Why is Indian business buying so much from China... Is it good to be so dependent on some other source?" Jaishankar added. The relations between India and China are strained since the June 2020 clashes in Galwan valley.

Last week, Jaishankar had said that New Delhi hopes for a resolution of the remaining issues with Beijing. The minister asserted that a return to normal bilateral ties hinges on peace and tranquillity at the border.

"We would hope that there is a resolution of the remaining issues out there. These issues mainly pertain to patrolling rights and patrolling abilities there," Jaishankar had told PTI.

China is India's top trade partner, enjoys a huge trade surplus

12 May, 2024, Tibetan Review

Despite what India has been saying about the normalization of its overall ties with China being subject to the resolution of the ongoing four-year-old border standoff in eastern Ladakh, trade between the two countries has been rising, and in China's favour.

China has emerged as the largest trading partner of India with $118.4 billion two-way commerce in 2023-24, slightly edging past the US, said a PTI news agency report May 12, citing data from economic think tank Global Trade Research Initiative (GTRI).

The US was the top trading partner of India during 2021-22 and 2022-23.

China continues to enjoy a huge trade surplus with India. The data were stated to show that India's exports to China rose by 8.7% to $16.67 billion in the last fiscal. The main sectors which recorded healthy growth in exports to that country include iron ore, cotton yarn/fabrics/made-ups, handloom, spices, fruits and vegetables, plastic and linoleum. Imports from China increased by 3.24% to $101.7 billion.

"This growth in imports led to an expanding trade deficit in India, rising from $53.57 billion in FY2019 to $85.09 billion in FY2024, highlighting concerns over stagnant exports amidst rising imports," GTRI Founder Ajay Srivastava has said.

China's new envoy to India appears accommodating, but belittles border standoff issue

12 May, 2024, Tibetan Review

China's new envoy to India, who arrived in New Delhi on May 10, appears to have expressed willingness on the part of his government to be accommodating in talks on settling the ongoing, nearly four-year-old border standoff in eastern Ladakh. India has accused China of bring inflexible, trying to create a new border status quo by refusing to withdraw its troops from new patrolling areas they have been in occupation since its mid-2020 incursions.

China is ready to work with India to “accommodate” each other’s concerns and find a mutually acceptable solution to “specific issues” through dialogue at an early date, the PTI news agency May 11 cited Xu Feihong as saying.

The report cited Xu, 60, as saying he regarded his posting in New Delhi as an “honourable mission and a sacred duty” to improve and advance the bilateral ties.

“China is ready to work with India to accommodate each other’s concerns, find a mutually acceptable solution to specific issues through dialogue at an early date, and turn the page as soon as possible,” Xu has said.

The post of the Chinese ambassador in New Delhi has been lying vacant for 18 months before the appointment of Xu, who ranks as an Assistant Minister.

Relations between the two countries hit a new low ever since the eastern Ladakh border standoff erupted on May 5, 2020, following a violent clash in the Pangong Tso (lake) area. The two sides have so far held 21 rounds of Corps Commander-level talks to resolve the standoff, the report noted.

India has been pressing the Chinese People’s Liberation Army (PLA) to disengage from the Depsang and Demchok areas, persistently making it clear that there could not be a restoration of normalcy in bilateral relations so long as the border situation remained abnormal.

The report cited the Chinese military as saying that so far, the two sides had agreed to disengage from four points, namely the Galwan Valley, the Pangong Lake, Hot Springs, and Jianan Daban (Gogra).

Earlier, in what was seen as a softening of India’s tone or stand on its defiant posture on the tense Tibet-border situation with China, Prime Minister Narendra Modi had said the two sides should “urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders so that the abnormality in our bilateral interactions can be put behind us”.

“I hope and believe that through positive and constructive bilateral engagement at the diplomatic and military levels, we will be able to restore and sustain peace and tranquillity in our borders,” Modi had added in an interview published Apr 10 by the US magazine Newsweek.

Xu has referred to these remarks from Modi, saying “I noted Prime Minister Modi’s comments on the importance of China-India ties, and the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson responded to that right afterwards.”

However, Xu has then referred to China’s oft repeated stand, which India has pointedly rejected so far. “The Chinese side always believes that China-India ties should not be defined by any single issue or area; the boundary question is not the entirety of the relationship.

“Speaking at the Indian Council of World Affairs in September 2014, President Xi Jinping said that we must not focus our attention only on differences and forget about our friendship and cooperation, still less should we allow the differences to stand in the way of our development and interfere with the overall growth of bilateral relations,” Xu has said.

Indian Embassy in China holds first meeting with students hit hard by COVID visa bans

05 May 2024, The Economic Times

The Indian Embassy here has held its first interactive session with the Indian students who suffered the most during the three-year COVID-19 period following China’s visa bans prolonging their academic periods for several years.

Around 80 old and new students from more than 13 Chinese universities took part in the “welcome and interaction ceremony” held on May 4. Indian Ambassador to China Pradeep Kumar Rawat, and Counsellor Nitinjeet Singh interacted with the students and heard their grievances and experiences during Saturday’s meeting.

The meeting also included a detailed presentation by Amit Sharma, Second Secretary (Education) on various services offered by the Embassy, Dos & Don’ts for students, the Embassy posting on X said.

Until the coronavirus struck China in early 2020 over 23,000 Indian students mostly studying medicine in Chinese universities constituting the second-highest number of foreign students after Pakistan.

Currently, the numbers reportedly come down to around 10,000 across China.

Chinese medical universities became preferred destinations in the past as private medical colleges in India charged exorbitant fees while admissions to government institutions became extremely competitive.

However, they have to write the Foreign Medical Graduates Examination in India to qualify for practice in India.

When COVID-19 struck China, most of the Indian students left for home at the height of lockdowns and could not return until early last year due to China’s visa bans and restrictions.

Many of them started returning in the latter part of 2022 while the Chinese universities began a new intake of students last year.

Some of the old students in their media interactions said they are shattered by China’s COVID visa bans and feel that Beijing could have handled the crisis more compassionately taking into consideration the impact of the restrictions had on their academic careers and meagre budgets as most of them hail from middle-class backgrounds.

Saturday's meeting was the first held by the Indian Embassy here to step up its interactions with the students considering their plight and the issues they faced.

During the height of the COVID visa bans, the Embassy actively pursued with China to permit the early return of the students considering the damage the delay caused to their studies.

Students said they were told at the meeting to remain cautious and disciplined strictly abiding by the local laws.

According to recent reports, three Indian students were under detention in China on charges of criminal offences.

Chinese military on PM Modi's border remarks: 'Situation generally stable'

26 April 2024, India Today

The Chinese military, reacting to Prime Minister Narendra Modi's recent comments on the India-China border row, said the present situation was "generally stable". It also said both countries had "effective" communication to resolve the standoff in eastern Ladakh.

The Chinese military on Thursday said the situation along the India-China border "at present" is "generally stable" and both sides have maintained "effective" communication to resolve the military standoff in eastern Ladakh.

Defence Ministry spokesman Senior Colonel Wu Qian was reacting to Prime Minister Narendra Modi's recent interview with Newsweek magazine. PM Modi had expressed hope that through positive and constructive bilateral engagement at the diplomatic and military levels, India and China will be able to restore and sustain peace and tranquillity at their borders.

"At present, the situation in the border areas between China and India is generally stable," Wu said.

"Both the sides have maintained effective communication through diplomatic and military channels had positive constructive dialogue and achieved positive progress," he said while responding to a question on PM Modi's remarks and also Defence Minister Rajnath Singh's reported comments that India will continue to have dialogue with China to resolve the standoff at the border areas.

Wu said that "both sides have agreed to reach a mutually acceptable solution as soon as possible" to resolve the standoff.

In his interview, Modi said that for India, the relationship with China is important and significant. "It is my belief that we need to urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders so that the abnormality in our bilateral interactions can be put behind us. Stable and peaceful relations between India and China are important for not just our two countries but the entire region and world," he said.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning in her response to Modi's interview on April 11 said sound and stable China-India relations serve the interests of both countries and are conducive to peace and development in the region and beyond.

Relations between India and China are frozen except for trade ever since the eastern Ladakh border standoff erupted on May 5, 2020, following a violent clash in the Pangong Tso (lake) area. The eastern Ladakh standoff has resulted in a freeze of bilateral ties on all fronts except trade.

The two sides have so far held 21 rounds of corps commanders-level talks to resolve the standoff.

According to the Chinese military, the two sides so far agreed to disengage from four points, namely the Galwan Valley, the Pangong Lake, Hot Springs, and Jianan Daban (Gogra).

India is pressing the People's Liberation Army (PLA) to disengage from the Depsang and Demchok areas, maintaining that there cannot be restoration of normalcy in its relations with China as long as the state of the borders remains abnormal.

China may say whatever they want, but Sikkim is part of India: CM PS Tamang

26 April 2024, Northeast Now

Sikkim chief minister Prem Singh Tamang-Golay has reaffirmed the territorial integrity of India, saying that the Himalayan state is an integral part of the country.

Sikkim CM PS Tamang-Golay was reacting to the territorial claims made by China on the Himalayan state.

"Sikkim is an inseparable part of India," said CM PS Tamang-Golay.

The Sikkim chief minister added: "Regardless of any claims China make, we are an integral part of the vast Indian nation. Even if they make baseless claims, there is no truth to them."

He made this remark while on a "religious visit" to Dharamshala in Himachal Pradesh on Thursday (April 25).

CM Tamang said: "This visit of mine is purely for religious purposes. I am here to seek blessings from His Holiness the Dalai Lama."

India takes big step to counter China snooping threat from surveillance cameras

16 April 2024, India Today

The government has amended the compulsory registration order for CCTV cameras sold in India to make testing of their 'essential security parameters' mandatory

After a series of deliberations on how to check alleged snooping by Beijing through a web of Chinese-origin CCTV cameras installed across India, including government and military establishments, the Union government has come out with safety guidelines keeping national security as top priority.

To date, the Indian government had no mechanism to check the installation of these Chinese-origin surveillance cameras, as the certification for such devices in use in the country only looked into aspects such as fire hazard or durability, and not security or snooping threats.

But early last week, the Union ministry of electronics and information technology (MeitY) amended the compulsory registration order (CRO) for CCTV cameras sold in India. This amendment makes the testing of 'essential security parameters' of all CCTV cameras mandatory. Given the massive network of such cameras, the new regulation comes into effect on October 9 this year, thereby allowing manufacturers sufficient time to adapt.

Prioritising national security in such matters is crucial, especially given the sensitive nature of government and military establishments. Setting up guidelines to monitor and certify these surveillance cameras on the security aspect is a prudent move.

India is estimated to have over two million surveillance cameras, installed at every nook and corner. Out of these, around a million cameras made by Chinese companies are installed in various government institutions, posing a serious risk of snooping. It is suspected that CCTVs being deployed in most Indian government projects are of Chinese origin—imported from China and supplied as Made in India. This is a threat to national security.

It is estimated that the market penetration of Chinese CCTVs is over 80 per cent for domestic and over 98 per cent for government installations. As experts say, countries no longer need to send spies across the border. Such suspect CCTVs become the eyes of any country aiming to do mischief. Such cameras are the best tool for technical intelligence. The unchecked proliferation of such devices across India is a grave security risk.

The cover story of INDIA TODAY magazine's March 6, 2023 edition had unravelled the threat of China snooping on India through hundreds of thousands of such surveillance cameras, with security experts flagging serious concerns about the security threat.

In last week's notification, dated April 9, MeitY made the testing of 'essential security parameters' of CCTV cameras mandatory. The notification also mandates that test reports from Bureau of Indian Standards (BIS)-recognised labs, such as the Standardisation Testing and Quality Certification, would need to be submitted by manufacturers.

Reacting to the guidelines, Lieutenant General Rajesh Pant (retired), former national cyber security coordinator for India's National Security Council and also chairman of the Cyber Security Association of India, told INDIA TODAY that the proliferation of CCTVs in the country without any security checks had created a major vulnerability for national security, since most of these devices were imported from the country of concern. This has led to remote surveillance and loss of data. "The notification by MeitY is a long-awaited and welcome step by the government to ensure that essential security parameters are built into these devices. I hope this is extended to all IoT (internet of things) devices in the future," Lt Gen. Pant said.

PM spells out India's position on China

16 April 2024, The Statesman

In a recent interview to Newsweek, the Prime Minister, discussing Indo-China relations, commented, "For India, the relationship with China is important and significant. It is my belief that we need to urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders so that the abnormality in our bilateral interactions can be put behind us. I hope and believe that through positive and constructive bilateral engagement at the diplomatic and military levels, we will be able to restore and sustain peace and tranquillity on our borders." These words coming from Mr Narendra Modi, especially when electioneering is gaining steam, are profound. This is possibly the first time that the PM has hinted at rapprochement with China. Till now central ministers took credit for the performance of the army in the ongoing standoff, while insisting on no loss of territory. External Affairs minister S Jaishankar had repeatedly stated that bilateral ties cannot be normal unless the border situation reverts to pre-April 2020. PM Modi has adopted the same approach, while supporting dialogue.

The PM had thus far maintained silence, while avoiding an embarrassing situation resulting from him and President Xi Jinping being present on a common platform. The conduct of the SCO (Shanghai Cooperation Organization) summit in online mode as also the nonpresence of Mr Xi at the G-20 worked to his benefit. The PM even refused to meet the Chinese foreign minister, Wang Yi, on his visits to India. India also rejected calls by China to rebuild relations placing the border issue at an 'appropriate place' while concentrating on other aspects of the relationship. Simultaneously, India is expending resources to boost its military capabilities and infrastructure to close the gap with China.

The recent conduct of the Agni 5 test with MIRV technology, demonstrated that India is an equal and not a nation which could be pressured or bullied. India's military deployment along the LAC matches China's, confirming that India will not back down. The PM's message was that while India is extending a hand of friendship it possesses the capability to respond in case of any misadventures. To assuage Chinese misconceptions, the PM also spoke of the Quad. He mentioned, "Quad is not aimed against any country. Like many other international groupings, SCO, BRICS and others, Quad is a group of likeminded countries working on a shared positive agenda." He added, "The Quad has established itself as an important platform for ensuring peace, stability and prosperity in the Indo-Pacific." The message was evident. Apart from countering China's continuous prattle that the Quad is a military alliance created to contain it, PM Modi confirmed that India will remain its member and be allied to the West, while balancing its ties with others. The message could not have been more subtle.

These signals from the nation's top leadership were assessed by the Chinese. Since India is in the midst of elections, there is unlikely to be any forward movement from Beijing. PM Modi's statements for normalization of ties come at a time when relations between the two nations are sliding downhill. Further, tensions in the East and South China Seas as also the Taiwan strait are at an all-time high. China has, for the third time, issued its own list of names for places in Arunachal Pradesh, strongly condemned by India.

The Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson, Mao Ning, stated "China noted PM Modi's remarks." She added, "China and India are in close communication through diplomatic and military channels to address issues related to the border situation, and have achieved positive progress." She parroted the Chinese line, "We hope that India will work with China to place the boundary question appropriately in bilateral relations and manage it properly, and put the relationship on a sound and steady track."

The Global Times, Beijing's mouthpiece, in an editorial termed PM Modi's remarks as 'rare,' mentioning, "Modi's direct statement, especially his clear position, is quite rare and carefully timed, hence receiving exceptional attention from the public." It added, "Modi's interview has sent out quite positive signals regarding China-Indian relations." It further mentioned that China believes that the statement may not be too 'pleasing' to some in Washington. Beijing assumes that Washington desires Indo-China ties remain tense as it backs their Indo-Pacific strategy.

As per the Global Times, 'being in conflict would squeeze resources needed for development (for India).' Possibly the Chinese are hinting that the current deployment is the new normal and should be accepted. For China to pull back to pre-April 2020 positions could be considered a setback. Internally, the PM's statement was criticized by the Congress. Its spokesperson, Jairam Ramesh, tweeted, 'the Prime Minister's reaction to the China issue is not only disgraceful but also disrespectful to our martyrs who made the supreme sacrifice in defending our borders.' PM Modi also clarified that India will compete with China in the economic field. He mentioned, "We believe that when a country with one-sixth of the world's population adopts global standards, it will have a big positive impact on the world. We have major global manufacturing entities setting up shops in India. India is now globally considered most suited for manufacturing world-class goods at competitive cost.

Apart from producing for the world, the vast Indian domestic market is an added attraction." Evidently, India is proving to be the destination that companies exiting China wish to embrace. The forthcoming visit of Elon Musk and talks of a plant in India has China concerned. Sending a message to Pakistan on non-interference, PM Modi mentioned, "I won't comment on matters internal (incarceration of Imran Khan) to Pakistan." The Pakistani government reciprocating appears unlikely. There were no comments from Islamabad on PM Modi's statement.

India is clear. While it seeks dialogue and desires normalization of ties, it will not bow down. Its capability, development and trained armed forces send a firm message that it is not a pushover. For China, facing tensions in the East and South China seas, as also the straits of Taiwan, alongside a receding economy, peace with India is to its advantage. PM Modi's message has been received in Beijing. It is now for them to respond. Unless they display positivity, tensions would remain. Further, India will compete with China by offering better sops to global manufacturers. (The writer is a retired Major-General of the Indian Army.)

Indian Army celebrates 40 years of 'Operation Meghdoot' on Siachen Glacier

13 April 2024, The Economic Times

The Indian Army marked a significant milestone as it commemorated 40 years since the commencement of its presence on the strategically vital Siachen Glacier. Known as 'Operation Meghdoot', this operation has been a remarkable journey of technological progress and logistical advancements.

Technological Progress and Infrastructure Development

Over the last four decades, significant efforts have been made to enhance infrastructure and habitat on the Siachen Glacier. One notable advancement is the improvement in mobile and data connectivity, with the introduction of VSAT (Very Small Aperture Terminal) technology. This technology has revolutionized communication on the glacier, providing troops with crucial data and internet connectivity.

Enhanced Supply Chain and Logistics

The introduction of heavy-lift helicopters and logistic drones has significantly improved the supply of essential resources to personnel stationed at isolated posts, especially during harsh winter conditions. This includes ensuring the availability of clothing, mountaineering equipment, and rations.

Improved Living Conditions and Connectivity

Recent initiatives have focused on improving connectivity, leading to advancements in the supply chain. This has ensured that personnel stationed at forward posts in the Northern and Central Glaciers now have access to fresh rations and vegetables.

State-of-the-Art Medical Infrastructure

The Siachen Glacier now boasts state-of-the-art medical infrastructure, including telemedicine nodes established by ISRO. These facilities provide critical medical support not only to troops but also to the local populace and tourists in the Nubra Valley.

Recognition of Sacrifices and Immortal Spirit

The Indian Army, in a press release, acknowledged the sacrifices of its brave soldiers and the immortal spirit that has characterized its long deployment in Siachen.

Operation Meghdoot's Unique Significance

Launched in 1984 to secure the Siachen Glacier in Jammu and Kashmir, 'Operation Meghdoot' was unique as it involved the first assault on the world's highest battlefield. The result was the Indian troops gaining control of the entire Siachen Glacier.

Operation Meghdoot, launched on April 13, 1984, by the Indian Army and Indian Air Force (IAF), marked a pivotal moment in securing the Siachen Glacier, a strategically crucial region dominating Northern Ladakh. The operation involved airlifting Indian Army soldiers, with IAF helicopters operating in the area since 1978, including the first landing of an IAF helicopter on the glacier in October 1978.

The need for Operation Meghdoot arose due to Pakistan's cartographic aggression in Ladakh, allowing foreign mountaineering expeditions in Siachen. Intelligence inputs about impending Pakistani military action prompted India to secure strategic heights on Siachen, deploying troops via airlifts and air-dropping supplies to high-altitude airfields.

IAF's Role and Evolution in Operation Meghdoot

The IAF played a crucial role in supporting Operation Meghdoot, initially focusing on transport and helicopter aircraft for troop and material transport. Gradually, the IAF expanded its role, deploying fighter aircraft like the Hunter, MiG-23s, and MiG-29s, operating from high-altitude airfields at Leh and Thoise. This expanded role included fighter sweeps and simulated strikes over the glacier, boosting morale and deterring adversaries.

In 2009, the IAF inducted Cheetal helicopters, re-engineered for high-altitude operations, and in 2013, showcased its capabilities by landing a Lockheed Martin C-130J Super Hercules at Daulat Beg Oldie, the world's highest airstrip near the line of actual control in Ladakh. Today, a variety of IAF aircraft, including Rafale, Su-30MKI, Chinook, Apache, and others, support Operation Meghdoot.

IAF's Lifeline Role in Extreme Conditions

Operating in the highest battlefield globally, IAF helicopters are the lifeline for Indian troops, providing crucial support in emergencies, logistics supply, and evacuating the sick and wounded from the glacier. Their operations set records in human endurance, flying, and technical proficiency, showcasing the IAF's commitment and skill in supporting the four-decade-old military operation on the Siachen Glacier.

As the Indian Army celebrates 40 years on the Siachen Glacier, it reflects not only on the progress made in technological advancements and logistical improvements but also on the sacrifices and dedication of its personnel. 'Operation Meghdoot' stands as a testament to India's commitment to safeguarding its borders and ensuring the well-being of its troops in one of the world's most challenging terrains.

China has not occupied any Indian land, claims S Jaishankar

13 April 2024, Scroll

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar claimed on Friday that China has not occupied any of India's land, but said that the situation along the Line of Actual Control remains "competitive, sensitive and challenging", The Indian Express reported.

The Line of Actual Control is the de facto demarcation between Indian and Chinese-held territory.

Jaishankar, during a press meet in Pune, said that India and China earlier never had troops on the Line of Actual Control, and both armies deployed forces away from it on their respective sides.

The minister said that China had brought its troops forward in some locations along the Line of Actual Control in 2020. "In response, we also advanced our units and a standoff ensued," he said. "After that, the two armies continue to battle for supremacy... But there is no encroachment."

The minister added: "China has tried to bring its troops to the upper part of the mountainous areas along the LAC [Line of Actual Control] but the Indian Army also responded to it in the same manner."

However, in January last year, a senior police officer posted in Leh said in a research paper that India has lost access to 26 out of 65 patrolling points in the eastern Ladakh region. Leh Senior Superintendent of Police PD Nitya had said that Indian security forces were no longer able to patrol 26 patrolling points located between the Karakoram Pass and the Chumur region in eastern Ladakh – a major flashpoint of border conflicts between India and China. A report by the United States Department of Defense on October 19 said that China continued to develop large-scale military infrastructure, including an airport, along the Line of Actual control in 2022 despite holding talks with India on resolving border disagreements. Border tensions between India and China have increased since June 2020 when a major face-off between Indian and Chinese soldiers took place in Galwan Valley of Ladakh. The clashes, which took place at multiple locations along the Line of Actual Control, had led to the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers. Beijing had said that the clash left four of its soldiers dead. Tensions had flared at multiple friction points, with both countries stationing tens of thousands of troops backed by artillery, tanks and fighter jets. Since the Galwan clashes, China and India have held several rounds of military and diplomatic talks to resolve the border standoff.

China says 'great positive progress' made to resolve border row with India

12 April 2024, Times of India

Chinese foreign ministry official on Friday said that China and India have made "great positive progress" to resolve the border standoff, with both sides maintaining close communication throughout the process.

This statement by foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning was elaborated on China's response to Prime Minister Narendra Modi's recent comments in which he said that for New Delhi, ties with Beijing are important and the "prolonged situation" at the borders should be addressed urgently.

PM Modi, in an interview with Newsweek magazine, expressed optimism that through constructive engagement at diplomatic and military levels, both countries can achieve peace and tranquillity at the border.

In response to a question on PM Modi's interview to Newsweek, Mao said, "About the border issue, I can tell you that China and India are remaining in close communication through diplomatic and military channels and great positive progress has been made."

"We also believe that a healthy China and India relations serve the interests of the two countries," she said.

"China hopes that India will work in the same direction with China to properly manage the differences and promote the bilateral relations forward on a healthy stable track," Mao added.

This was China's response for the second time in two days to PM Modi's interview. "It is my belief that we need to urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders so that the abnormality in our bilateral interactions can be put behind us," the Prime Minister said in his interview.

"Stable and peaceful relations between India and China are important for not just our two countries but the entire region and world," PM Modi said.

The Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson reiterated China's stance on the border issue and said, "Sound and stable China-India relations serve the interests of both countries and are conducive to peace and development in the region and beyond."

On the boundary question, she clarified China's oft-repeated stand that it does not "represent the entirety of China-India relations, and it should be placed appropriately in bilateral relations and managed properly".

India, on the other hand, has maintained that there cannot be restoration of normalcy in its relations with China as long as the state of the borders remains abnormal. Both countries have engaged in close communication through diplomatic and military channels, making progress towards addressing the border situation, Mao said.

"We hope that India will work with China, approach the bilateral relations from a strategic height and long-term perspective, keep building trust and engage in dialogue and cooperation, and seek to handle differences appropriately to put the relationship on a sound and stable track," she added.

The recent interactions between China and India come against the backdrop of the standoff in eastern Ladakh since May 5, 2020, following clashes in the Pangong Tso (lake) area.

The two nations have conducted multiple rounds of talks to ease tensions, agreeing to disengage from certain points. However, India continues to urge China to disengage from additional areas to normalize relations fully.

The two sides so far agreed to disengage from four points, namely the Galwan Valley, the Pangong Lake, Hot Springs, and Jianan Daban (Gogra), as per the Chinese military.

India urges the People's Liberation Army (PLA) to withdraw from Depsang and Demchok regions, stressing that there cannot be restoration of normalcy in its relations with China as long as the border remains tense.

Naam ke vaaste, let's call Tibet dalailabad

11 April 2024, The Economic Times

Rajnath Singh, wearing his semiotician's pagdi at an election rally at Namsai in Arunachal Pradesh on Tuesday, made an excellent suggestion, without actually suggesting it - changing names of Chinese provinces. The defmin was actually making a point about how Beijing continuously referring to Arunachal Pradesh as 'Zangnan' makes the Indian state as much a Chinese territory as giving Indian names to Chinese provinces will make them 'Indian'. But to sidestep Singh's version of the Bard's 'What's in a name?' reasoning, we think it's a great idea to Indianise those proper nouns 'up there'. The exercise can jolly well start with Tibet - or, as the Chinese call it, 'Xijiang Autonomous Region' - being named Dalailabad. Guangdong would, in the spirit of Gurgaon, be Guangram. Shanghai can be shanghaied into Bheemtalaiya, for no reason other than it sounds robust. Instead of calling Beijing 'Peking' again, the Chinese capital can sound rather piquant if renamed Jijingapatnam. If the nomenclatura from the Muddle Kingdom are outraged, they can be calmly told that this isn't about challenging Chinese territory by aggressive proper nouncing, but it's just how the world's most populous country's citizens will call these places. After all, the French calling Deutschland 'Allemagne' and English-speakers calling it 'Germany' don't threaten the Deutsche.

In Newsweek interview, PM Modi speaks on India-China border dispute: 'We need to urgently address...'

10 April 2024, Hindustan Times

Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Chinese President Xi Jinping(MEAIndia)

Prime Minister Narendra Modi has stressed the need to urgently address the “prolonged situation” on the disputed India-China border to normalise the bilateral ties between the two countries, according to a report. In an interview with Newsweek magazine, PM Modi underscored that stable and peaceful relations betw“I hope and believe that through positive and constructive bilateral engagement at the diplomatic and military levels, we will be able to restore and sustain peace and tranquility in our borders,” he said.On the topic of competing with China, Prime Minister Modi highlighted India's economic reforms and positioned the nation as an attractive choice for businesses seeking to diversify their supply chainHe pointed out key reforms such as the Goods and Service Tax, corporate tax reduction, bankruptcy code, and labour law reforms, which have significantly improved India's ease of doing business.

“We are striving to make our regulatory framework, our taxation practices as well as our infrastructure at par with global standards,” Modi said.“We believe that when a country with one-sixth of the world's population adopts global standards in these sectors, it will have a big positive impact on the world,” he added.He highlighted initiatives such as the Production Linked Incentive (PLI) schemes across 14 sectors, including electronics, solar modules, medical devices, and automobiles, to bolster India's manufacturing capabilities.

"Given our strengths, India is now globally considered most suited for manufacturing world-class goods at competitive cost. Apart from producing for the world, the vast Indian domestic market is an added attraction. India is a perfect destination for those who want to set up trusted and resilient supply chains," he said. Prime Minister Modi is seeking a rare third term in office the country starts voting for seven-phase Lok Sabha elections on April 19.

China's Neighbor Sends Russian-Made Air Defense Missiles to Border

10 April 2024, News Week

India is set to deploy Russian-made man-portable air defense systems, or MANPADs, along its disputed border with China, even as Moscow and Beijing reaffirm their shared opposition against common adversaries in the West.

"The Igla-S systems are under procurement for the new authorized air defense formations for high mountainous terrain along the northern border," Indian news outlet The Print reported on Monday.

The Indian army first began using the Soviet-designed MANPADS in 2021. New Delhi is acquiring more of the shoulder-fired missiles amid a four-year military standoff with Beijing, which began after the deadly Galwan Valley skirmish in June 2020.

Since then, the two Asian giants have stationed thousands of soldiers at the Line of Actual Control. The de facto boundary in the Himalayas has separated India and China since a bloody border war in the 1960s.

A Russia-made Igla-S man-portable air defense system, or MANPADS, is seen in images published on manufacturer Rosoboronexports's website. India will deploy Russia-made Igla-S MANDPADS on the border with China.

Leaders in Russia and China have further strengthened their countries' strategic partnership in recent years amid heavy scrutiny since the start of the Russia-Ukraine war two years ago. The United States recently told its NATO allies that Beijing's material support for Moscow was growing to significant levels, although Chinese officials say the country remains a neutral party.

The Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, a Swedish think tank, said Russia was India's biggest source of defense imports last year, accounting for 36 percent of all arms purchases, according to a March report.

Despite that, however, the period from 2019-2023 was the first time since 1960-1964 that Russia's arms sales accounted for less than half of India's overall imports, SIPRI said.

Weapons manufactured by China and India have been found on the battlefields of the ongoing conflict in Ukraine. Igla-S MANDPADS also have been used by Ukrainian forces to shoot down Russian aircraft.

The Russian and Chinese foreign ministries and the Indian External Affairs Ministry did not immediately respond to separate written requests for comment before publication.

India's upcoming deployment of Igla-S systems to its border with China, despite Beijing's friendship with Moscow, suggests the Kremlin leadership is unable to dictate terms on weapons sales, subject matter experts believe.

"The general public is not privy to the actual terms of the contract, but over the years, the general impression is that Russia does not impose any preconditions on the use of its weapons," said Nandan Unnikrishnan, a distinguished fellow at the Observer Research Foundation think tank in New Delhi and the former Moscow bureau chief of the Press Trust of India news agency.

"So far Russia-China relations haven't visibly impacted the India-Russia defense partnership," Unnikrishnan told Newsweek.

India recently sold the BrahMos missile system, jointly developed with Russia, to the Philippines, a U.S. treaty ally locked in a territorial dispute with China.

The Philippines will deploy land-based and anti-ship variants of the missile system along its coastline to counter Beijing's assertiveness in the South China Sea.

"As the world's fastest supersonic cruise missiles, the BrahMos missiles will provide deterrence against any attempt to undermine our sovereignty and sovereign rights, especially in the West Philippine Sea," Delfin Lorenzana, the Philippines' former defense minister, said one year ago, referring to the section of the South China Sea that falls within the Philippines exclusive economic zone.

Christopher Clary, an associate professor at the State University of New York, told Newsweek that India may worry about China's leverage over Russia and its future implications.

"I've seen little evidence Russia seeks to censor the arms it makes available to India in order to appease their Chinese partner. Yet India must be concerned that in the event of a serious China-India conflict, Beijing would put enormous pressure on Russia to halt spares and ammunition destined to India," Clary said.

"Even with acquisitions like [the Igla-S], what remains an open question is whether India will invest in sufficient munitions to fight a long war. The war in Ukraine showcases how expensive and exhausting long wars can be," Clary added.

Why are there three Chinese spy ships in the Indian Ocean Region?

10 April 2024, Hindustan Times

Xiang Yang Hong 01

High endurance Chinese surveillance vessel Xiang Yang Hong 01 is anchored 600 miles west of Andaman Islands (middle of Bay of Bengal) in international water.

After deploying maritime coercion in South China Sea against ASEAN countries, at least three Chinese survey and surveillance vessels are in Indian Ocean Region (IOR) as part of PLA Navy's expansionist objective to launch carrier task force patrols by 2025 through mapping the Indo-Pacific region. As of now, high endurance Chinese surveillance vessel Xiang Yang Hong 01 is anchored 600 miles west of Andaman Islands (middle of Bay of Bengal) in international water conducting trials of high endurance autonomous underwater vehicles, which can stay at the depths of nearly 12 kilometers for three months mapping the ocean bed and collect oceanographic data for future submarine operations. The XYH 01 entered the Bay of Bengal on March 7-8 night and continues to be stationed in the area. Another Chinese survey ship Xiang Yang Hong 03 is employing unmanned systems for ocean observation and hydrographic surveying 350 miles of Maldives with the friendly Muizzu regime in power in Male. While the Indian Navy is monitoring the movements of these Chinese vessels in international waters, the main purpose is to validate ocean models for future deployment of naval assets in the IOR like aircraft carriers. The XYH 03 entered the IOR some three months ago and continues to operate outside Maldives. A third surveillance ship Da Yang Hao is lying 1200 miles south of Port Louis in Mauritius with the 45th PLA anti-piracy escort force operating south west of the Capital at 550 miles. The 46th anti-piracy task force of PLA is operating off the Gulf of Aden albeit there is no news of Chinese vessels intercepting any Somalian pirates or neutralizing any Houthi missiles. As no action can be taken against these vessels operating in international waters, fact is that the PLA is exercising its sea legs for future global naval footprint and courting nations in Indo-Pacific and Africa to influence their maritime policies in the name of defence cooperation. The Chinese Song class submarine was in Karachi harbor in late 2023 and apparently did the 'bottoming' operations off the Makran coast. Given that India will face maritime coercion from China in the coming years, the Indian Navy will have to acquire unmanned underwater drones and long endurance submarines for deterrence operations. An Indian submarine in equatorial waters can play havoc with the adversary as the difference between the surface ocean temperature and sub-surface temperature is high leading to total internal reflection. This means that the Indian submarine will be seen (if at all) at a ghost location rather than its actual position. It is precisely for this very reason that the Chinese PLA collects ocean temperature, salinity, sound, velocity, sediment characteristics, and sea bottom profile in the IOR.

China may disrupt elections in India using AI, warns Microsoft

08 April 2024, Economic Times

Software giant Microsoft has issued a warning regarding China's potential use of artificial intelligence (AI) to disrupt elections in several countries, including India, the US, South Korea. According to Microsoft Threat Intelligence insights, China is likely to utilize AI-generated content to advance its interests, particularly in the upcoming major elections.

The report from Microsoft Threat Analysis Centre (MTAC) highlights the looming threat, stating, "With major elections taking place around the world this year, particularly in India, South Korea, and the United States, we assess that China will, at a minimum, create and amplify AI-generated content to benefit its interests."

While the probability of such content significantly impacting election outcomes remains low, Microsoft predicts that China's ongoing experimentation with augmenting memes, videos, and audio could prove more effective in the future. The Lok Sabha elections in India are scheduled between April 19 and June 4, with South Korea holding its elections on April 10, and the United States preparing for its presidential election in November. The warning from Microsoft follows reports of China's alleged dry run with the presidential election in Taiwan, where it November.

Microsoft anticipates that Chinese state-backed cyber groups, along with North Korean involvement, will target high-profile elections in 2024. The report emphasizes the potential involvement of Chinese cyber and influence actors in influencing these elections through the creation and dissemination of AI-generated content via social media platforms.

"While the impact of such content in swaying audiences remains low, China's increasing experimentation in augmenting memes, videos, and audio will continue – and may prove effective down the line," Microsoft stated.

attempted an AI-generated disinformation campaign in January. The report mentions a Beijing-backed group named Storm 1376, also known as Spamouflage or Dragonbridge, which was highly active during the Taiwanese election.

Moreover, there has been a rise in the use of AI-generated TV news anchors, a tactic reportedly employed by Iran as well. These AI-generated anchors disseminate misinformation, including unfounded claims about individuals' private lives. Microsoft disclosed that the news anchors were created using the CapCut tool developed by Chinese company ByteDance, the owner of TikTok.

Chengdu as Bharatnagar and Kunming as Modinagar?

07 April 2024, Arunachal Times

Just a week back, China audaciously released a fourth list of 30 new names of various places in Arunachal Pradesh, which include 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass, 11 residential areas, etc.

Earlier, on 2 April 2023, China renamed 11 places in Arunachal with Chinese names. Before that also, China renamed six places in Arunachal in 2017, followed by renaming 15 places in 2021. The renamed places include mountains, rivers and places like Mechukha, Manigong, Tawang, Sela, Walong, etc. China regularly claims Arunachal as southern Tibet or 'Zangnan'.

China regularly issues stapled visas to officials and sportspersons from Arunachal planning to visit China. In a few cases, such as the one that happened with me, China said that visa is not required to visit China. China regularly objects to visits by central ministers or senior officials to Arunachal.

China traces back this dispute to the McMahon Line. The 890-km-long McMahon Line demarcates the eastern border between India and China, and follows the watershed principle running along the highest ridges, starting from Bhutan to the trijunction of India, China and Myanmar.

The McMahon Line was created during the Shimla Agreement of 1914. The British Indian representative was Henry McMahon, then secretary in the Indian foreign department, Tibet was represented by Lama Lonchen Shatra, and the Chinese representative was a diplomat named Ivan Chen. After almost a year of negotiations, the McMahon Line was initially presented on 22 April, 1914, along with an attached map. On 25 April, 1914, the Chinese representative submitted a memorandum with a number of objections to the boundaries between Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet and Inner Tibet and China. There were no objections by the Chinese representative on the border between Tibet and India. Thereafter, on 27 April, 1914, the Chinese representative initialled both the documents and the map without any objections. However, the actual agreement documents were kept secret till 1937, when the McMahon Line was first published in a Survey of India map. If the Chinese representative had no objections to the border between Tibet and India and had initialled the documents and the map during the Shimla Agreement of 1914, why are the Chinese still claiming Arunachal as 'southern Tibet'?

This claim is bogus, hegemonic and not supported by documents and facts.

Arunachal is mentioned in the ancient Indian epics Mahabharata, Kalika and Bhagavad Purana (10th century AD). Having studied Chinese language and hailing from Arunachal, it may be firmly stated that the people of Arunachal, comprising many tribes, are culturally, traditionally, linguistically, and racially different from the Han Chinese. Arunachalis are patriotic Indians and have never been a part of mainland China.

Why does China continue this aggressive behaviour, especially with respect to Arunachal? Isn't it time for us to give back to China? The government of India should start issuing stapled visas to a few Chinese officials. Another way could be to rename Chinese cities like Chengdu as Bharatnagar, Kunming as Modinagar, and Nyingchi as Arunnagar. (The contributor is retired Group Captain, Indian Air Force)

US 'strongly opposes' China's renaming of areas along disputed Indian border

07 April 2024, The Star

Washington has criticised Beijing's list of 30 new names for places along the 1,865-mile (3,000km) disputed Himalayan border between China and India, formally known as the Line of Actual Control, as yet another "unilateral attempt" to reassert its territorial claims.

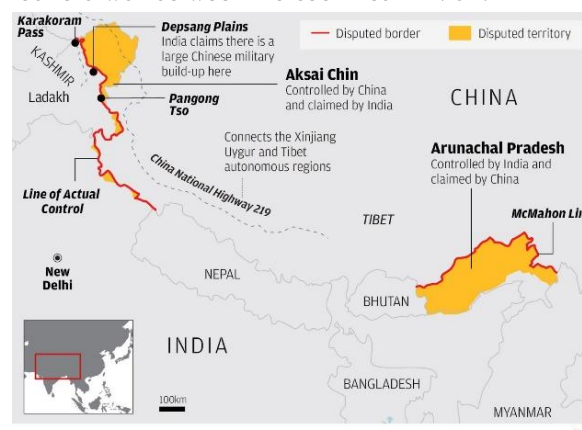

"The United States strongly opposes any unilateral attempts to advance territorial claims by incursions or encroachments, military or civilian, across the Line of Actual Control," a US State Department representative said on Tuesday.

On Sunday, the Post first reported about the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs' fourth list of "standardised" names for places, including mountains, rivers, residential areas in the Indian-administered Arunachal Pradesh state, which China calls Zangnan and claims as part of the Tibetan autonomous region. After the report was picked up by several Indian news outlets, New Delhi's foreign affairs ministry rejected Beijing's "senseless attempt" at "inventing" names and "altering reality".

The two nuclear-armed neighbours have held 21 rounds of military-level talks since 2020, when at least 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers were killed in a fight along the border.

No breakthrough was achieved during the latest meeting in February as both sides agreed to keep communicating while also positioning extra troops and equipment.

Disagreements over the poorly demarcated border led to a war between the countries in 1962.

Last month, a tunnel inaugurated by Prime Minister Narendra Modi in Arunachal Pradesh became the latest flashpoint. As India and China traded warnings and made overlapping claims of national sovereignty, Washington openly sided with its Indo-Pacific partner New Delhi – angering Beijing.

“The United States recognises Arunachal Pradesh as Indian territory,” a State Department representative said in a press briefing. Beijing then accused Washington of trying “to provoke and take advantage of other countries’ conflicts to serve its selfish geopolitical interests”.

Arunachal Pradesh, located on India’s eastern tip, is claimed in its entirety by China. The state shares historical ties with Tibet and is home to the Tawang Monastery, where the sixth Dalai Lama was born in 1683. Buddhists account for the fourth-largest religious group there, following Christians, Hindus and a mix of other local religions.

US sharing of intelligence with India in China border clash seen as pivotal

After being largely neutral on the dispute for decades, the US in recent years has strengthened its cooperation with New Delhi, including a more active role in sharing intelligence as part of its Indo-Pacific strategy to check Chinese activity in the region.

In its October 2022 National Defence Strategy, the administration of President Joe Biden pledged that it would support US allies and partners when they encounter “acute forms of grey zone coercion” from China’s “campaigns to establish control over the East China Sea, Taiwan Strait, South China Sea and disputed land borders such as with India”.

Real-time intelligence provided by the US about Chinese positions along the disputed line prepared India to successfully ward off a potential Chinese military “incursion” in December 2022, marking the first time Washington passed on key information on Chinese strength along the Sino-India in advance to its Indian counterparts.

Ban order compels climate activist Sonam Wangchuk to call off Tibet-border March

07 March 2024, Tibetan Review

Well-known Ladakh-based Indian climate activist Mr Sonam Wangchuk has called off his planned Apr 7 march at the head of his supporters to the Chinese-occupied Tibet’s border. He wanted to “avoid any sort of confrontation with the law-enforcing agencies,” reported deccanchronicle.com Apr 6. He has said the purpose of staging the march had already been achieved in any case while vowing to continue the agitation for statehood.

Wangchuk, 57, had announced last month that he would lead around 10,000 people of Ladakh in a march to the Chinese occupied Tibet’s border to showcase the extent of the Ladakhi land lost to Chinese encroachment in the north and how the local farmers and shepherds were losing prime pastureland to huge industrial plants in the south.

Wangchuk, a Magsaysay Award winner and the founding-director of the Students’ Educational and Cultural Movement of Ladakh, has also said, after ending a 21-day hunger strike on Mar 26, that the agitation to demand statehood for Ladakh will be intensified in coming weeks.

Ladakh is currently a Union Territory, after being a part of the erstwhile state of Jammu and Kashmir for many decades. Ladakhis find the Union Territory status to be inimical to their interests.

The decision to call off the march followed an Apr 5 order by the Leh District Magistrate Santosh Sukhadeve, imposing prohibitory orders under Section 144 of the CrPC (Criminal Procedure Code), banning holding of processions, rallies and marches in the district without his prior approval “to prevent any breach of peace, disturbance to public tranquillity and danger to human life.”

The Union Territory status means that Ladakh is ruled by the central government through a Lieutenant Governor appointed by it, like in the case of the nation’s capital New Delhi whose embattled Aam Aadmi Party government too has been demanding full-statehood for it.

Also, Ladakh’s Additional Director General of Police Darshan Singh had ordered the suspension of mobile data of 3G, 4G and 5G and public Wi-Fi 5G facilities temporarily “in the interest of maintenance of public peace, and law and order” in the Union Territory, the report said.

The decision to call off the march was stated to have been announced by the Leh Apex Body (LAB) at a press conference on Apr 6 in which Wangchuk also took part. Its leaders have also said they had, in any case, already achieved their objective of creating awareness among the people of the country about the plight of farmers, who are allegedly losing prime pastureland to huge industrial plants in the south and to “Chinese encroachments”.

The report quoted Wangchuk also as saying: “We are concerned about national security and the peaceful atmosphere. Secondly, our aim to generate awareness in the country about the ground situation in Ladakh has been achieved, so we are withdrawing the proposed border march in the interest of people and to avoid confrontation with the law-enforcement agencies.”

China developing 175 more security villages in Tibet near India-border?

06 April 2024, Tibetan Review

China is set to develop 175 more border villages on the occupied-Tibet side of the Line of Actual Control (LAC) facing the northeast Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. These settlements will be in addition to the 628 "Xiaokang" or "prosperous villages", otherwise seen to be meant to serve as border security villages, near the LAC, reported tribuneindia.com Apr 5, citing unnamed sources.

The move is reported to be seen in India as being designed to bolster territorial claim under a 2005 bilateral accord and to enhance military preparedness for future possible armed conflicts.

This move is part of a larger effort to construct 900 LAC villages, including 200 near the Indian boundary, which will function both as monitoring points and potential military bases in conflict scenario with India, the report said.

China could be looking to build a strong legal defence under the Border Defence Cooperation Agreement (BDCA), 2005, with India. Article VII of BDCA says "the two sides shall safeguard due interests of their settled populations in the border areas". So as and when a situation arises to demarcate the LAC, these "settled populations" villages are not likely to be disturbed, the report cited sources as saying, adding Indian villages facing these new settlements were currently very thinly populated.

In terms of military preparedness, China has undertaken extensive infrastructure development projects in Tibet and in areas near the LAC. Its current, 14th Five Year Plan (2021-2025) includes expansion of the Nyingchi phase of the Sichuan-Tibet railway line, preliminary work on the Hotan-Shigatse and Gyirong-Shigatse rail lines and the Chengdu-Wuhan-Shanghai high speed railway network, the report noted.

The plan is said to include upgrading the national highways G-219 and G-318, both running parallel to the LAC with India. The G-219 runs opposite the Ladakh and Himachal Pradesh borders while the G-318 runs opposite Arunachal Pradesh and Sikkim borders, the report noted.

Beijing's dual goals of promoting the integration of Tibet into China and ramping up infrastructure development are seen as a strategy aimed at deepening Chinese influence and asserting its power in the region.

The report further noted that last week, in an attempt to cover up the "capture" of Tibet, the Chinese conducted celebratory ceremonies on its side of the LAC and labelled them as the "65th anniversary of democratic reform" in Xizang (Tibet). The illegal dissolution of the Tibetan government headed by the Dalai Lama took place on Mar 28, 1959. The celebratory ceremonies focused on two sites north of Arunachal Pradesh and one spot north of Sikkim, it added.

US Reacts After China Renames Neighbor's Territory

08 April 2024, News Week

The U.S. strongly opposed China's renaming of 30 locations inside India's Arunachal Pradesh, as Beijing's push to further its territorial claims is escalating tensions between the two Asian giants.

"The United States strongly opposes any unilateral attempts to advance territorial claims by incursions or encroachments, military or civilian, across the Line of Actual Control," a U.S. State Department official said on Tuesday, according to Hong Kong newspaper the South China Morning Post.

The U.S. comment on China's renaming policy came as Beijing has recently escalated its claim over Arunachal Pradesh by calling the area part of its territory "since ancient times."

China's Ministry of Civil Affairs on March 30 issued "standardized" names of places in Mandarin and Tibetan for locations inside Arunachal Pradesh. The list of 30 names included places with rivers, mountains, a lake and residential areas.

The renaming effort was China's fourth attempt to use cartographic renaming of locations in Arunachal Pradesh to further its territorial claims.

China claims the area as part of Zangnan, or South Tibet, based on historical rights. In the past, China has released official maps showing the region as part of its territory and issued separate visas to Indian citizens from Arunachal Pradesh to further its sovereignty claim.

The two countries fought a bloody war in the 1960s over the region, and their 2,100-mile-long disputed mutual border remains a thorny issue. Since June 2020, China and India have been locked in a new military stand-off with thousands of soldiers deployed across from each other in the Eastern Ladakh region. The military officials from the two sides have met 21 times so far as part of a special effort to defuse tensions in the frigid Himalayan region.

Beijing has used a similar approach to extend claims in disputed islands in the South China Sea, giving Mandarin names to maritime features.

A Chinese military spokesperson recently issued a stark statement to solidify the claims on Arunachal Pradesh.

"Zangnan has been China's territory since ancient times. This is an undeniable fact," Col. Wu Qian, China's defense ministry spokesperson, said on March 28.

Newsweek contacted China's embassy in New Delhi and India's Ministry of External Affairs for comment. "China has persisted with its senseless attempts to rename places in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. We firmly reject such attempts," a spokesperson from India's External Affairs Ministry said on Tuesday.

"If today I change the name of your house, will it become mine? Arunachal Pradesh was, is and will always be a state of India. Changing names does not have an effect," Subrahmanyam Jaishankar, India's external affairs minister, said on Monday, according to the Indian newspaper The Hindustan Times.

Observers believe the renaming attempt seeks to strategically further Beijing's territorial claims.

"It does bare China's mala-fide intent, and its larger designs: renaming places in Arunachal, showing Arunachal within China on new maps, putting roadblocks to the entry of sportspersons from Arunachal. This is part of its plan to change the cultural markers of Tibet, which it has begun calling Xizang," Kalpit Mankikar, a China fellow at the New Delhi-based think tank the Observer Research Foundation, told Newsweek in an interview.

"The renaming of Mago (China renamed it as Moguo) in the eastern Tawang sector in Arunachal Pradesh is a signal to India that China is taking note of India's recent announcement to build a frontier highway opposite its border as it will be the starting point of India's new strategic border road." Nature Desai, an open-source analyst and observer of China-India relations, told Newsweek in an interview. "Then there is the longest freshwater lake in Arunachal Pradesh, which was renamed," Desai told Newsweek.

India's remote Ladakh protests against Beijing-Delhi squeeze

05 April 2024, Nikkei Asia

Thousands braved sub-zero temperatures across India's remote Ladakh in recent weeks as they march for statehood and safeguards to protect a Himalayan region they say is increasingly squeezed by China and their own government.

Residents say Ladakh's glaciers and sensitive ecology are at risk due to Chinese encroachment and India's industrial and military buildup in the aftermath of a deadly 2020 border standoff.

The latest demonstrations stem from a 2019 decision to strip neighboring Jammu and Kashmir – claimed by both India and Pakistan – of its autonomy, resulting in Ladakh being separated from Indian-controlled Kashmir.

Delhi pledged to give Ladakh's mostly indigenous population safeguards for tribal people, but the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party hasn't followed through, critics said.

Among them is climate activist Sonam Wangchuk, who recently staged a three-week hunger strike, living on just water and salt.

"We are losing land, left, right and center," Wangchuk said in a video message to supporters. "The shepherds are losing their pasture land to China, which is encroaching from the north. The Chinese have captured huge chunks of Indian land in the last few years."

China has taken up more than 4,000 square kilometers of land, according to some critics. Wangchuk is planning another demonstration this weekend.

"To show the ground reality we're planning a border march of 10,000 Ladakhi shepherds to show live footage of how much of the pasture land has been taken over," he said.

China has repeatedly renamed places in another Indian border region, Arunachal Pradesh, which Beijing claims as its own. This month, China criticized Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi's trip to the northeastern state

Earlier this year, a video surfaced on social media purportedly showing Chinese soldiers intercepting Indian shepherds in Ladakh and claiming the area belongs to Beijing.

In 2020, deadly clashes between Indian and Chinese soldiers erupted in Ladakh's Galwan Valley, leaving two dozen Indian and four Chinese soldiers dead after close-quarter fighting with clubs and rocks.

Since that clash, thousands of soldiers have been deployed on both sides of the de facto border, the Line of Actual Control (LAC). India and China have been building infrastructure at breakneck speed near the LAC as several rounds of talks between their militaries failed to ease tensions.

Delhi, meanwhile, has built a massive military infrastructure across the region, while signing at least 10 agreements with outside companies to develop Ladakh's natural resources.

These developments are stirring fears about outside influence and the impact on a fragile environment.

"They [the government] are planning to set up big industries in this fragile area, and if that happens it will be a disaster for this region," said Padma Stanzin, head of the Ladakh Students' Environmental Action Forum (LEAF).

With no significant progress on reducing border tensions, the region is at risk of stepped-up conflict, warns Praveen Donthi, a senior analyst at the International Crisis Group.

"There are around 50 to 60,000 troops on both sides of the border, which means that the border is live, unlike the pre-2020 phase," Donthi added. "There is a possibility of accidental escalation with far-reaching consequences."

India's Ministry of External Affairs said the countries are negotiating to reestablish calm in Ladakh.

"The discussions we had there [in Beijing] built on the previous rounds seeking complete disengagement in the remaining areas along the LAC in eastern Ladakh as an essential basis for the restoration of peace and tranquility in the India-China border areas," ministry spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal said.

Wang Wenbin, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson, said China viewed the border squabbles as something that can be resolved.

"China has stressed multiple times that the boundary question does not represent the entirety of China-India relations, and it should be placed appropriately in the bilateral relations and managed properly," Wenbin told a press conference last month.

Donthi, the ICG analyst, said a political solution was crucial to ease tensions.

"It is an intractable problem and one of the longest-running border crises in the world," Donthi said.

"There is a need for political leadership to take the initiative to resolve the crisis."

Assam CM proposes Tit-for-Tat response to China's gimmick

03 April 2024, Phayul

Assam Chief Minister Himanta Biswa Sarma suggested on Tuesday that India should rename 60 Tibet Digest December - January 2024

places in the occupied Tibet in response to recent actions by Beijing renaming 30 places in Arunachal Pradesh.

Speaking to journalists after a BJP election meeting in central Assam's Karbi Anglong, Sarma emphasized the need for reciprocity, stating, "My request to the Government of India is that we should give 60 geographical names for the Tibetan area of China. It should be always tit for tat but I do not want to comment because it is a policy decision of the Government of India, but if they name 30, we should name 60."

Pema Khandu, the Chief Minister of Arunachal Pradesh, labelled China's actions as "another gimmick," expressing strong condemnation "Being a proud citizen of Bharat and a native of Arunachal Pradesh, I strongly condemn this act of naming places within Arunachal Pradesh which has been an inalienable integral part of India. Proud citizens and patriots of Arunachal Pradesh are rejecting such antics," he wrote on X (formerly Twitter).

Two days after Beijing assigned Mandarin and Tibetan names to 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh of India, New Delhi dismissed the move as "senseless". "China has persisted with its senseless attempts to rename places in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. We firmly reject such attempts," Randhir Jaiswal, the spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA), said in New Delhi.

China had earlier renamed six places in Arunachal Pradesh of India in Mandarin and Tibetan in April 2017, 15 more places in December 2021 and 11 more places in April 2023. Beijing claims 90,000 sq. km of areas in Arunachal Pradesh of India as part of the territory of China and calls it Zangnan or south Tibet.

Beijing also claims a 2,000 sq. km area in the Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand. New Delhi claims that China is illegally occupying about 38,000 sq. km of India's territory in Aksai Chin, which borders eastern Ladakh. Pakistan also ceded about 5,180 sq. km of India's territory in 1963 to China.

In April-May 2020, China initiated a provocative and unilateral action aimed at altering the status quo along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), the de facto boundary between occupied Tibet and India, particularly in eastern Ladakh. This move involved the deployment of a substantial contingent of troops from the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA). In response, the Indian Army was compelled to deploy additional forces to counter China's attempts to encroach upon Indian territory and push the LAC further westward.

Negotiations led to the withdrawal of front-line troops by both the Indian Army and the Chinese PLA from some areas. However, the standoff persisted at several points along the LAC. China has claimed that the mutual withdrawal of troops from Patrolling Point 15 (Gogra-Hot springs area) in September 2022 signalled the return to normalcy along the LAC in eastern Ladakh. This claim seems intended to pressure India into accepting the current situation in the Depsang and Demchok areas, where the Chinese PLA still restricts the Indian Army's access to several patrolling points along the LAC.

In December 2022, Indian Army soldiers prevented an attempt by the Chinese PLA to alter the status quo near Tawang in Arunachal Pradesh. China's continued efforts to assert territorial claims in the region signifies ongoing challenges to India's sovereignty as per critics, amid broader geopolitical tensions between the two nations.

India rejects China's renaming of 30 places in Himalayan border state

02 April 2024, Reuters

NEW DELHI, April 2 (Reuters) - India rejected China's renaming of about 30 places in its northeastern Himalayan state of Arunachal Pradesh on Tuesday, calling the move "senseless" and reaffirming that the border province is an "integral" part of India.

Beijing says Arunachal Pradesh, which it calls Zangnan, is a part of South Tibet - a claim New Delhi has repeatedly dismissed. China similarly ratcheted up tensions a year ago by giving Chinese names to 11 locations in the state.

Troops of the nuclear-armed neighbours engaged in minor scuffles along their disputed frontier in the state in Dec. 2022, and tensions eased after extensive military and diplomatic talks.

Yet the state is frequently the cause of friction between the Asian giants whose ties have nosedived since a bloody border clash between their troops in the western Himalayas in 2020.

China, in a statement on Saturday, said it had standardised the names of about 30 places in what it calls South Tibet, "in accordance with the relevant regulations on place name management of the State Council".

"Assigning invented names will not alter the reality that Arunachal Pradesh is, has been, and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India," foreign ministry spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal said on Tuesday.

On Monday, Indian Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar told reporters that "changing names will not do anything".

"If I change the name of your house, does it become my house?" he said.

Last month, following a visit by Prime Minister Narendra Modi to the state to inaugurate infrastructure projects, China had said it was opposed to his activities in the region. India termed the arguments "baseless".

The U.S. also weighed in on the issue, saying it recognised Arunachal Pradesh as Indian territory and "strongly opposed" any unilateral attempts to make claims on it by military or civilian "incursion or encroachments".

China had opposed these remarks, saying the matter "has nothing to do with the U.S.".

India and China share a 3,800 km (2,400 mile) border - much of it poorly demarcated - over which they also fought a bloody war in 1962.

Twenty Indian soldiers and four Chinese troops were killed in hand-to-hand combat in 2020, prompting both countries to fortify positions and deploy extra troops and equipment along the border.

China gives its own name to 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh in cartographic extension of its Tibet rule

01 April 2024, Tibetan Review

In yet another provocative move, asserting cartographic sovereignty over the northeastern Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh on the basis of its occupation rule over Tibet, China has on Mar 30 declared its own names for 30 more places in the territory it calls Zangnan (or southern part of Tibet).

The Ministry of Civil Affairs released the fourth list of standardized geographical names in Zangnan, reported China's official globaltimes.cn Mar 30, citing the ministry's official website. It said the announcement was for "30 additional publicly used place names in the Zangnan region".

The report did not list those names. However, according to the scmp.com Mar 31, the latest renaming covered 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass and a piece of land, all given in Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin, the Roman alphabet version of Mandarin Chinese.

It noted that the ministry had last standardized the names of 11 places in Zangnan, using Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin, in Apr 2023. That was the third list since 2017 when six placenames were announced, which was followed by the second list with 15 placenames in 2021.

The latest list followed the ministry's publication on Mar 15 of implementation measures on Mar 15 for the management of geographical names, which detailed the requirements for the translation of place names in ethnic minority or foreign languages into Chinese characters.

The measures, which will take effect from May 1, 2024, stipulate in Article 13 that “place names in foreign languages that may harm China’s territorial claims and sovereignty rights shall not be directly quoted or translated without authorization.”

And it was made clear that translation of placenames in foreign languages or minority languages should comply with standards formulated by related organs of the State Council, China’s cabinet or council of ministers. Standard translations are made public through notices, the national database for geographical names and official publications on geographical names, according to the implementation measures.

This meant that “Tibet” should be referred to as “Xizang”, “Arunachal Pradesh” as Zangnan”, “Mt Everest” as “Qomolangma”, and so forth.

The report also noted that the State Council had issued a revised regulation on placenames in Apr 2022, applicable to naming, renaming, usage, cultural protection and other management on geographical names within Chinese territories.

China renames 30 places in Arunachal Pradesh; Jaishankar says it means nothing

01 April 2024, Hindustan Times

“If today I change the name of your house, will it become mine?” S Jaishankar said, asserting that Arunachal Pradesh was, is and will be a state of India

China has rechristened 30 locations in Arunachal Pradesh with Chinese and Tibetan names as part of its continuing efforts to assert claims over the north-eastern Indian state. This is the fourth time that China unilaterally changed the names of locations in the state. The new names will be reflected on official Chinese maps later this year. The renaming comes days after Prime Minister Narendra Modi visited Arunachal where he inaugurated the Sela Tunnel built at an altitude of 13,000 feet, an infrastructure project that is set to ease the movement of troops in the mountainous region.

India has repeatedly rejected the renaming of places in the past and dismissed claims over Arunachal, which Beijing has claimed is part of the southern region of Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), called “Zangnan”.

“China may repeat its baseless claims as many times as they want. That is not going to change the position. Arunachal Pradesh was, is and will always remain an integral and inalienable part of India,” external affairs ministry spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal said last week after Beijing protested Modi’s visit.

The change in names will not have any impact on the places in the Indian state but is a marker of the state of ties between the two Himalayan neighbours.

Asked about the latest move, external affairs minister S Jaishankar told reporters: “If today I change the name of your house, will it become mine? Arunachal Pradesh was, is and will always be a state of India. Changing names does not have an effect”.

Renaming of locations

China’s civil affairs ministry (MCA) released the new list of names on Saturday, Chinese state media reported.

Beijing last standardised the names of 11 places in Arunachal Pradesh using Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin, which is the standard romanisation of Mandarin characters, on Chinese maps in April 2023.

Earlier, China renamed places in the Indian state in April 2017, and in December 2021.

“Set to take effect from May 1, 2024, the implementation measures stipulate in Article 13 that ‘place names in foreign languages that may harm China’s territorial claims and sovereignty rights shall not be directly quoted or translated without authorisation,’” the state-run Global Times tabloid reported, quoting the government notice on the latest renaming.

“The renaming covered 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass and a piece of land,” the Hong Kong-based South China Morning Post reported, adding: “The new list includes more parts of the disputed area than the three previous renamings over the past seven years.”

Bill Hayton, associate fellow at the Chatham House Asia-Pacific programme and author of books on China and Vietnam, told HT last year that China’s practice of renaming places in disputed areas is an effort to “inculcate a sense of anxiety about the perceived loss of territory”.

This dates back at least to the 1920s. Much of these claims are specious and demonstrate some misunderstandings of East Asian history. These misunderstandings have left a dangerous legacy in the modern era,” Hayton had said.

In 2017, China changed the name of locations in Arunachal Pradesh on April 13, a day after Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama left Arunachal Pradesh following a high-profile nine-day visit. Beijing calls the Dalai Lama a splittist, and says he wants to create an independent country of Tibet.

India and China have been locked in a standoff in the Ladakh sector since early May 2020, sending bilateral ties plummeting to their worst in decades. Both sides have deployed thousands of troops and heavy armament along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

A deadly clash at Galwan Valley in June 2020 left 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese troops dead – the first fatalities along the LAC since 1975.

Tensions mount as India deploys 10,000 additional troops along its contested border with China

01 April 2024, WSWs

As the India-China border conflict approaches its fifth year, New Delhi has “forward” deployed an additional 10,000 troops along its disputed border with China in Uttarakhand and Himachal Pradesh, Indian states that abut western Tibet.

This escalation heightens the risk of an all-out war between the nuclear-armed rivals. It was clearly coordinated with Washington, which Indian officials revealed last summer has pressed New Delhi to detail what support it would provide the Pentagon should the US go to war with China. It comes as the US is inserting itself ever more obtrusively in the India-China border dispute and is intensifying economic, diplomatic and military-strategic pressure on China, through Taiwan and its major treaty allies in Asia, Japan, South Korea and the Philippines.

Since May 2020 tens of thousands of Indian and Chinese troops have been arrayed against each other along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), the undefined border between the two countries. On several occasions, Indian and People’s Liberation Army troops have clashed where Chinese-held Aksai Chin meets Indian-held Ladakh, in what is far and away the most significant border conflict between the world’s two most populous countries since they fought a brief border war in 1962. In June 2020, 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers were killed in hand-to-hand combat. In August of that year several thousand Indian forces captured “strategic heights” unopposed in an action that Indian government officials later conceded could easily have resulted in a major clash with Chinese troops and a rapid escalation to war. After a further skirmish in December 2022, New Delhi boasted that its forces had been able to repel what it claimed was a Chinese advance thanks to “real-time” intelligence from the US.

The situation remains highly volatile. Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his Hindu supremacist Bharatiya Janatha Party (BJP) government have used the border conflict to dramatically expand India’s bilateral, trilateral and quadrilateral military-strategic ties with Washington and its principal Asia-Pacific allies Japan and Australia, thereby further consolidating India’s role as a junior partner and frontline state of US imperialism in its war drive against China.

The new deployment of troops to Uttarakhand and Himachal Pradesh was announced as External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar was ending a March 5-8 visit to South Korea and Japan, where he emphasized enhanced military collaboration.

The troops are being relocated from the country’s western border with Pakistan, underscoring that New Delhi now views China, not its historic rival Pakistan, as its principal adversary. They are in addition to the 50,000 troops that Indian and China have each forward deployed since 2020 along the border, as well as sizeable numbers of tanks, warplanes and artillery. On both sides, there are continuous efforts to construct new fortifications, airstrips, roads, tunnels, bridges and rail links aimed at facilitating the swift movement of troops and supplies to the inhospitable Himalayan border region.

Despite nearly two-dozen rounds of bilateral talks, the most recent on February 19, the standoff continues, with each side stressing the other must pull back.

China’s response to India’s latest provocation has been relatively muted. Mao Ning, a spokesperson for the Chinese Foreign Ministry, stated that it would “not be conducive to easing tensions” and that “China is committed to working with India to safeguard the peace and stability of the border areas.”

China gives its own name to 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh in cartographic extension of its Tibet rule

31 March 2024, Tibetan Review

In yet another provocative move, asserting cartographic sovereignty over the northeastern Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh on the basis of its occupation rule over Tibet, China has on Mar 30 declared its own names for 30 more places in the territory it calls Zangnan (or southern part of Tibet). The Ministry of Civil Affairs released the fourth list of standardized geographical names in Zangnan, reported China's official globaltimes.cn Mar 30, citing the ministry's official website. It said the announcement was for "30 additional publicly used place names in the Zangnan region".

The report did not list those names. However, according to the scmp.com Mar 31, the latest renaming covered 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass and a piece of land, all given in Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin, the Roman alphabet version of Mandarin Chinese.

It noted that the ministry had last standardized the names of 11 places in Zangnan, using Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin, in Apr 2023. That was the third list since 2017 when six placenames were announced, which was followed by the second list with 15 placenames in 2021.

The latest list followed the ministry's publication on Mar 15 of implementation measures on Mar 15 for the management of geographical names, which detailed the requirements for the translation of place names in ethnic minority or foreign languages into Chinese characters.

The measures, which will take effect from May 1, 2024, stipulate in Article 13 that "place names in foreign languages that may harm China's territorial claims and sovereignty rights shall not be directly quoted or translated without authorization."

And it was made clear that translation of placenames in foreign languages or minority languages should comply with standards formulated by related organs of the State Council, China's cabinet or council of ministers. Standard translations are made public through notices, the national database for geographical names and official publications on geographical names, according to the implementation measures.

This meant that "Tibet" should be referred to as "Xizang", "Arunachal Pradesh" as Zangnan, "Mt Everest" as "Qomolangma", and so forth.

The report also noted that the State Council had issued a revised regulation on placenames in Apr 2022, applicable to naming, renaming, usage, cultural protection and other management on geographical names within Chinese territories.

China continues to harp on its claim over Arunachal Pradesh

26 March 2024, The Economic Times

China on Monday continued to claim that Arunachal Pradesh has "always been" its territory, notwithstanding India dismissing Beijing's claim as "absurd" and "ludicrous". On Monday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Lin Jian reiterated China's claim reacting to External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar's assertions on Saturday, dismissing China's repeated claims on Arunachal Pradesh as "ludicrous" and that the frontier state was a "natural part of India".

"This is not a new issue. I mean China has laid claim, it has expanded its claim. The claims are ludicrous to begin with and remain ludicrous today," Jaishankar said in response to a question on the Arunachal issue after delivering a lecture at the prestigious Institute of South Asian Studies (ISAS) of the National University of Singapore (NUS).

"So, I think we've been very clear, very consistent on this. And I think you know that is something which will be part of the boundary discussions which are taking place," he said.

Lin, replying to a question from the official media seeking his reactions to Jaishankar's comments, said the border between India and China has never been settled.

"The China-India boundary has never been delimited and is divided into the eastern sector, the middle sector, the western sector, and the Sikkim section", he said.

"Zangnan (the Chinese name for Arunachal Pradesh) in the eastern sector has always been China's territory," he said. China had all along exercised effective administrative jurisdiction over the area "until India's illegal occupation", which he claimed is a "basic fact that cannot be denied".

"In 1987, India formed the so-called 'Arunachal Pradesh' on China's territory under India's illegal occupation. China issued a statement right then to firmly oppose it and stress that India's move was illegal and null and void. China's position remains unchanged," Lin said.

This is the fourth time this month China spoke about its claim over Arunachal Pradesh.

Beijing said it has lodged a diplomatic protest with India over Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to Arunachal Pradesh on March 9 reiterating its claim over the area.

China, which claims Arunachal Pradesh as South Tibet, routinely objects to the Indian leaders' visits to the state to highlight its claims. Beijing has also named the area as Zangnan.

China's defence minister has also claimed that Arunachal Pradesh was part of Chinese territory, a claim dismissed by the Ministry of External Affairs last week.

China's State Media Reacts After India Predicts Prolonged Border Tensions

20 March 2024, News Week

Chinese state media sharply reacted to comments by India's Chief of Defence Staff General Anil Chauhan, who has called China a challenge for the "foreseeable future."

"India has an excessive suspicion and paranoia toward China's rise. Seeing China as the 'most formidable' challenge makes no sense and has no chance of success for India. India does not need to 'fear' the so-called 'China challenge' China and India can and should be partners, avoiding becoming opponents, and certainly not enemies," Chinese state media outlet Global Times said on X, formerly Twitter, on Tuesday.

China and India now consider each other geopolitical rivals, as Washington has backed New Delhi as a bulwark against Beijing in the Indo-Pacific region. China and India have been locked in a four-year-long military standoff, which began in June 2020. The beginning of the stand-off in 2020 saw the first clash between the armies of China and India in over four decades.

"The unsettled borders with China and the rise of China will remain the most formidable challenge that India and Indian armed forces will face in the foreseeable future," Chauhan said at an event organized by a university in India's Pune on Monday, Indian news channel NDTV reported on Tuesday.

Newsweek contacted India's Ministry of Defense for comment.

"The occupation of Tibet by China, made them a new neighbor, and a partition of India created a new nation that thrived on hostility and hatred towards us," Chauhan added.

At least 50,000 soldiers on the Chinese and Indian sides are immediately facing each other in the Eastern Ladakh region since the stand-off began in 2020. At the same time, there is known to be a far more extensive deployment of troops in the rare areas of the Line of Actual Control.

Based on reports from the Indian media, the Indian Army now has between 150,000 and 200,000 soldiers facing China. The People's Liberation Army is said to have an equally large deployment of soldiers, up to 200,000 troops from the Xinjiang and Tibet Military Regions, Newsweek had reported earlier.

Bloomberg recently reported that India had deployed an additional 10,000 troops to the border with China after freeing the soldiers from the Western border with Pakistan.

Meanwhile, China's defense ministry recently responded to India's additional troop deployment and the inauguration of the Sela Tunnel in the Arunachal Pradesh region along the border with China.

"Zangnan is China's inherent territory, and China never recognizes and firmly opposes India's illegal establishment of the so-called 'Arunachal Pradesh,'" Senior Colonel Zhang Xiaogang, spokesperson of the Ministry of National Defense, said on March 15. "We require the Indian side to cease any action that may complicate the boundary question, and earnestly maintain peace and stability in the border areas," Zhang added.

Arunachal Pradesh 'inherent part of China's territory', claims Chinese military

17 March 2024, The Economic Times

The Chinese military has reiterated its claim over Arunachal Pradesh, calling the area an "inherent part of China's territory", days after India rejected Beijing's objection to Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to the state. The Chinese Defence Ministry spokesman Senior Colonel Zhang Xiaogang said that the southern part of Xizang (the Chinese name for Tibet) is an inherent part of China's territory, and Beijing "never acknowledges and firmly opposes" the "so-called Arunachal Pradesh illegally established by India", official media here reported.

Zhang made the remarks in response to India's enhancement of its military readiness through the Sela Tunnel in Arunachal Pradesh, according to a report posted on the Chinese Defence Ministry's website on Friday.

China, which claims Arunachal Pradesh as South Tibet, routinely objects to Indian leaders' visits to the state to highlight its claims. Beijing has also named the area as Zangnan.

India has repeatedly rejected China's territorial claims over Arunachal Pradesh, asserting that the state is an integral part of the country. New Delhi has also dismissed Beijing's move to assign "invented" names to the area, saying it did not alter the reality.

On March 9, Prime Minister Modi dedicated to the nation the Sela Tunnel built at an altitude of 13,000 feet in Arunachal Pradesh that will provide all-weather connectivity to strategically located Tawang and is expected to ensure better movement of troops along the frontier region.

The Rs 825 crore tunnel, constructed on the road connecting Assam's Tezpur to West Kameng district of Arunachal Pradesh, is being billed as the longest bi-lane road tunnel in the world at such an altitude.

The Sela Tunnel will provide for better movement of troops and weaponry to various forward locations along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) with China, according to Indian military officials.

"The Indian side's actions contradict the efforts made by both sides to ease border situations and are not conducive to maintaining peace and tranquillity in the border areas," Zhang said, referring to Modi's visit.

He said that the current border situation is generally stable, with effective diplomatic and military communication between the two sides on border issues of common concern.

Zhang urged India to "stop actions that complicate the border issue and to earnestly maintain peace and stability in the border area."

He "stressed" that the Chinese military remains highly alert in defending national sovereignty and territorial integrity, according to the report.

Zhang's reaction follows China's foreign ministry spokesperson's remark on Monday about lodging a diplomatic protest with India over Modi's recent visit to Arunachal Pradesh.

India "strongly rejected" China's objection and asserted that the state "was, is, and will" always be an integral and inalienable part of India.

External affairs ministry spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal said in New Delhi that the Chinese side was made aware of this "consistent position" on several occasions.

Jaiswal said China's objection to such visits will not change the reality that Arunachal Pradesh "was, is, and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India."

"Indian leaders visit Arunachal Pradesh from time to time, as they visit other States of India. Objecting to such visits or India's developmental projects does not stand to reason," he said.

"Further, it will not change the reality that the State of Arunachal Pradesh was, is, and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India," Jaiswal said.

US Intelligence Report Warns of Potential Armed Conflict Between India and China

15 March 2024, The Wire

The report underscored the strained relationship between India and China citing sporadic encounters between their militaries as a risk for miscalculation and escalation.

US intelligence agencies have raised concerns over a potential armed conflict between India and China amid escalating tensions and large troop deployments along the disputed border in a report released on Monday (March 11).

The report, released by the Director of National Intelligence (DNI), underscored the strained relationship between India and China, citing sporadic encounters between their militaries as a risk for miscalculation and escalation.

"The shared disputed border between India and China will remain a strain on their bilateral relationship. While the two sides have not engaged in significant cross-border clashes since 2020, they are maintaining large troop deployments, and sporadic encounters between opposing forces risk miscalculation and escalation into armed conflict," the report said.

It also pointed out China's ambitions to establish overseas military bases, particularly in Sri Lanka and Pakistan. This move is seen as part of China's broader strategy to project power and safeguard its interests beyond its borders, the Hindustan Times reported.

India, Pakistan and a fragile global order

While a calm persists following a cease-fire with Pakistan along the Line of Control (LoC) in early 2021, the report warns that any provocations from Islamabad could lead to armed conflict between the two neighbours.

The report also highlights the fragile global order, pointing to China's military expansion plans, aggressive cyber operations, and potential interference in the upcoming 2024 US presidential elections. Alongside these concerns, the assessment mentions ongoing conflicts such as the Israel-Hamas war and the Russia-Ukraine conflict.

India-China standoff

Both India and China have amped up efforts on infrastructure projects near the border since a military standoff with China in Ladakh sector of the Line of Actual Control (LAC) began in May 2020.

Close to 50,000 troops from each side have been stationed in the area and India has made it clear that bilateral relations cannot be normalised till there is peace and tranquility in the border areas, the Hindustan Times report said.

In continuation of these efforts, Prime Minister Narendra Modi recently inaugurated the Sela tunnel in Arunachal Pradesh, enhancing all-weather connectivity to the strategically important region of Tawang.

India reportedly lost about 1,000 square kilometres of area in Ladakh to Chinese control in 2020, as per intelligence inputs provided to the Union government. Since then, twenty-eight rounds of negotiations between the two countries have failed to resolve the deadlock.

While China has publicly staked their claim on parts of Arunachal Pradesh, renaming some towns, details about physical confrontation with Indian soldiers were never made public. Former chief of Army Staff, General M.M. Naravane's memoirs were also withheld for revealing how the Modi government left the Army to its own devices when hostilities at Galwan broke out.

Trustworthiness-challenged China criticizes India's Tibet-border redeployment move

12 March 2024, RTV

In light of its latest assessment of threats posed by an expansionist China from across occupied Tibet, India has freed nearly 10,000 soldiers from its western border to redeploy them under a new command to its 532-km border in Uttarakhand and Himachal Pradesh states, according to media reports Mar 8.

China responded by saying the move was “not conducive to easing tensions” between the two sides, reported Reuters Mar 8. Meanwhile, India has faulted China’s breach of long-standing written agreements for the current border turmoil.

In addition, an existing contingent of 9,000 soldiers, already designated to the Chinese occupied Tibet border, will be brought under the newly created fighting command, reported Bloomberg Mar 7.

The two countries are still at loggerheads along at least two remaining unresolved sectors along the Tibet-border region in nearby Ladakh region following a violent night clash in mid-June 2020 that, however, did not involve the use of firearms. Twenty Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese troops were killed in that clash.

Both militaries have fortified positions and deployed troops and equipment there in the last few years.

However, the two countries have also agreed to maintain dialogue through military and diplomatic channels, and on Feb 19 held a constructive 19th army commander-level meeting for restoring normalcy in this western section of their border dispute.

“China is committed to working with India to safeguard the peace and stability of the border areas,” Mao Ning, a spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry, has said “We believe that India’s practice is not conducive to safeguarding peace and is not conducive to easing tensions,” she has added, referring to the news of India’s redeployment of its border troops.

“India’s increase in military deployments in border areas does not help to calm the situation in the border areas or to safeguard peace and safety in these areas.”

The Indian Army and defence ministry have declined to comment on the redeployment news. However, speaking at an event hosted by a TV channel, Defence minister Rajnath Singh has said: “We are working continuously towards keeping the morale of the soldiers high... They are equipped, capable and ready to give a befitting reply to anyone who casts an evil eye on India.”

Meanwhile, in Japan, India’s External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has said Mar 7 that China had not observed longstanding written agreements with India. “For example, ... between 1975 and 2020, which is really 45 years, there was no bloodshed on the border, and in 2020, [that] changed,” timesofindia.com Mar 8 quoted Jaishankar as saying. “We can disagree on many things, but when a country actually sort of does not observe written agreements with a neighbour, I think, you have caused ... because ... then raises a question mark about the stability of the relationship and frankly, about intentions,” Jaishankar has said in response to a question.

India and China share a 3,800-km frontier, a legacy of the latter’s annexation of Tibet and the former’s acceptance of the occupied territory as an autonomous region of China in a 1954 trade agreement.

China protests against India tunnel opening, warns it will only complicate border issue

12 March 2024, South China Morning Post

Beijing has lodged a diplomatic protest with New Delhi after Prime Minister Narendra Modi officially opened a tunnel built in territories along the two countries’ disputed Himalayan border, weeks ahead of general elections in the South Asian state.

Modi paid a visit on Saturday to the contested region – known as Arunachal Pradesh to India and South Tibet, or Zangnan to China – where he inaugurated the Sela tunnel connecting Tezpur in Assam and Tawang in Arunachal.

Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin said on Monday that India had “no right to arbitrarily develop the area of Zangnan in China”. The move “will only complicate” the boundary question and “disrupt the situation” in the border areas.

“The area of Zangnan is Chinese territory. The Chinese government has never recognised the so-called Arunachal Pradesh, illegally set up by India and firmly opposes it.” Wang said “solemn representations” had been made.

“China strongly deplores and firmly opposes the Indian leader’s visit to the east section of the China-India boundary,” he said, adding that the border question has “yet to be solved”.

The tunnel, built at an altitude of 13,000 feet (3,960 metres), is expected to facilitate India’s movement of troops and weaponry to forward locations along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) – the disputed 3,440km (2,100 miles) de facto border.

Modi’s announcement came weeks after the 21st round of corps commander-level talks between the two sides in late February – described by China as “positive, in-depth and constructive” and by India as “held in a friendly and cordial atmosphere”.

Both sides said at the time that they had agreed to keep communicating through the relevant military and diplomatic mechanisms, and were committed to maintaining peace on the ground in the border areas.

China and India have been locked in a military stand-off since their fatal border clash in June 2020 but the dispute dates back to 1962, when the two sides fought a war over the contested boundary.

Modi, who has overseen a decisive tilt towards Washington, is widely expected to secure his third term in the April-May polls, with more than 945 million people set to vote.

During his prime ministership, Modi has elevated military ties and accelerated partnerships with the US, Japan and Australia through the Quad – a strategic security dialogue that Beijing has slammed as an “Indo-Pacific Nato”.

In July, Modi refused to support Beijing’s landmark Belt and Road Initiative at the virtual Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit.

A few weeks later, he and Chinese President Xi Jinping met briefly on the sidelines of the Brics summit in August for their first direct conversation in a year. In September, Xi skipped the Group of 20 summit in India.

China has been without an ambassador to India for 16 months. The post has been vacant since the most recent incumbent Sun Weidong was promoted to a foreign vice-ministership in November 2022.

China warns that increasing Indian troops at border won't ease tensions

08 March 2024, The Economic Times

Senior Indian officials, requesting anonymity due to the confidentiality of the discussions, revealed that a unit of 10,000 soldiers previously deployed to the western border is now assigned to safeguard a segment of the frontier with China, a Bloomberg report said.

An existing group of 9,000 soldiers, initially designated for the disputed Chinese border, will now fall under the newly established fighting command. This unified force will protect a 532 km (330.57 miles) border section dividing China's Tibet region from India's northern states of Uttarakhand and Himachal Pradesh.

Souring Ties

Beginning on May 5, 2020, Chinese and Indian troops were involved in aggressive confrontations, face-offs, and skirmishes at various locations along the Sino-Indian border. These incidents occurred near the disputed Pangong Lake in Ladakh, the Tibet Autonomous Region, and the border between Sikkim and the Tibet Autonomous Region. Additional clashes took place in eastern Ladakh along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

In late May, tensions escalated when Chinese forces raised objections to Indian road construction in the Galwan River valley. On September 7, 2020, shots were fired along the LAC for the first time in 45 years, with both parties attributing blame to the other. Indian media also reported that Indian troops had fired warning shots at the People's Liberation Army (PLA) on August 30, 2020.

Ties between India and China deteriorated following confrontation, and there has been limited improvement since. Despite engaging in as many as 21 rounds of military-diplomatic talks, progress has been incremental. In response to the strained relations, India has enacted laws aimed at discouraging Chinese investments and business enterprises within the country.

In 2021, India deployed an extra 50,000 soldiers to monitor its border with China, responding to heightened tensions following a deadly clash the previous year that resulted in the unfortunate loss of at least 20 Indian soldiers, significantly straining diplomatic relations.

Subsequently, both China and India have taken steps to enhance military-related infrastructure, relocating missiles and aircraft to their respective border regions, alongside the additional deployment of troops.

India-China relations: Foreign Minister S Jaishankar highlights decades of peace shattered by 2020 conflict

07 March 2024, The Telegraph

Longstanding agreements are not being necessarily observed, raising question marks about the stability of the environment in which we all operate: Jaishankar

Taking a dig at China, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar on Thursday said Beijing has not observed longstanding written agreements with India and blamed it for the bloodshed at the borders in 2020, the first in more than four decades.

Speaking here at the inaugural Raisina Roundtable in Tokyo, an event by the think tank, Jaishankar also spoke about how he expected a change in Russia’s direction towards the rest of the world and it may likely want multiple options in Asia.

On a two-day trip to Japan, Jaishankar elaborated on the changing world order, saying, “There is a reality of a very big power shift in the Indo-Pacific. When there are very big shifts in capabilities and influence and presumably ambitions, then there are all the accompanying ambitions and strategic consequences.” “Now, it's not an issue whether you like it or you don't like it. There's a reality out there, you have to deal with that reality,” he said and added, “Ideally, we would assume that everybody would say, okay, things are changing, but let's keep it as stable as we can.” “Unfortunately, that's not what we have seen in the last decade of our own experience in the case of China, for example, is between 1975 to 2020, which is really 45 years, there was no bloodshed on the border, and in 2020, changed,” he said.

“We can disagree on many things, but when a country actually sort of does not observe written agreements with a neighbour, I think, you have caused ... because ... then raises a question mark about the stability of the relationship and frankly, about intentions," Jaishankar said in response to a question.

The eastern Ladakh border standoff erupted on May 5, 2020, following a violent clash in the Pangong Lake area.

The ties between the two countries nosedived significantly following the fierce clash in the Galwan Valley in June 2020 that marked the most serious military conflict between the two sides in decades.

India has been maintaining that its ties with China cannot be normal unless there is peace in the border areas.

"We see it in conflict in Europe, in disregard for international law in Asia, and in the ongoing developments in the Middle East and often in the weaponisation of the normal," he said earlier in his prepared address.

"Longstanding agreements are not being necessarily observed, raising question marks about the stability of the environment in which we all operate," he said, referring to the 1993 Border Peace and Tranquillity Agreement (BPTA) and the 1996 agreement on "Confidence Building Measures in the Military Field Along the Line of Actual Control in the India-China Border Areas".

Answering a question after his speech, he said, "That is why for India, in a changing world, our own equilibrium, our own balances with other countries are changing as well. They don't have to be acrimonious, but the balance is changing." The External Affairs Minister had on March 2 in Delhi raised a similar point while speaking at an interactive session of a think tank. "China must adhere to border management pacts and there has to be peace and tranquillity along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) for improvement in Sino-India ties," Jaishankar asserted amid the lingering military face-off in eastern Ladakh.

In his remarks, in an apparent reference to India's increasing economic strength, he said, "We cannot become, in GDP, from number 11 to number five and (expect) everything remains the same. It will not remain the same." "But how to create new equilibriums ... in a less frictional manner ... I think that today, the management of the global order, some of us are trying to help. Some of us have other approaches to countries in various sectors and also that broadens the spectrum," the Minister added.

The Minister also made an interesting comment about Russia and its changing approach. Pointing out how, during the last two years, Russia's relationship with the West has broken down because of the Ukraine conflict, he said, "Economically, it means that a lot of access Russia had to the Western world is no longer there and historically, Russia has always put a premium that is the main axis for them." "So you actually have today the prospect that Russia is turning more and more towards Asia. It can also turn to other continents but I would say Asia is the most dynamic possibility for them," he observed.

The flow of Russian trade of investments of resources, and available collaborations towards Asian destinations will not be a short-term trend and continue for some years, he added.

"So I expect, actually, almost like a change in Russia's direction towards the world and I think it has very interesting implications for us in Asia, because like any big power Russia will also want multiple options," Jaishankar added.

China-India ties remain adrift as wait for Chinese envoy to New Delhi drags on

04 March 2024, South China Morning Post

China has been without an ambassador to India for 16 months – despite the importance Beijing attaches to its relationship with New Delhi, where foreign policy is mainly focused on its periphery and the interactions of major powers, observers said.

The post has been vacant since the most recent incumbent Sun Weidong was promoted to a foreign vice-ministership in November 2022.

The gap – the longest since 1976 – has coincided with a sharp deterioration in relations, with the two countries locked in a military stand-off since the fatal clash at their disputed Himalayan border in June 2020.

Observers said the long period without a Chinese ambassador to India was highly unusual, adding that the appointment of a new envoy would be viewed positively on both sides as a crucial step towards building trust.

Wang Dehua, an expert on India at the Shanghai Municipal Centre for International Studies, said the long absence of a top Chinese envoy had laid bare the damage caused by the border tensions to ties between the world's two most populous nations.

"That's something very rare in the history of Sino-Indian relations, which for many is an ominous sign and makes it difficult for both sides to manage their differences, especially when ties are at a low point," Wang said.

"While it is true that New Delhi is unlikely to ever become Beijing's friend, China still needs to try its best to have good relations with India ... or at least woo it away from the US on strategic issues, such as trade and Washington's Indo-Pacific strategy. After all, the US and Japan remain our top opponents."

According to Wang, it was "imperative" for Beijing to fill the vacancy, a move that would help China stabilise ties with its nuclear-armed Himalayan neighbour in the midst of its intensifying geopolitical and ideological feud with the US-led West.

Top candidate for the post is tipped as Xu Feihong, who until December served as assistant foreign minister for administrative and financial affairs. He was removed after an almost three-year stint, without explanation or an announcement of his next position. Hong Kong newspaper Sing Tao Daily reported rumours that the move was intended to pave the way for 59-year-old Xu, a former ambassador to Afghanistan and Romania, to take up the New Delhi posting.

And in January, Indian news site The Wire reported that Xu's appointment as China's envoy was being finalised, citing unnamed sources who claimed the news "has been conveyed about the candidate" to New Delhi.

Neither Beijing nor New Delhi has confirmed the appointment.

Liu Zongyi, a senior fellow with the Shanghai Institutes for International Studies' South Asia and China Centre, said an early appointment would be much-needed good news to help arrest further decline in the already strained ties.

Despite his lack of direct involvement in managing Indian affairs, compared to Sun and his predecessor Luo Zhaohui, Xu would be a good candidate for the role, according to Liu.

Both Sun, currently foreign vice-minister in charge of Asian affairs, and Luo have extensive regional experience, including stints as China's top envoy to Pakistan, and are considered experts in South Asian affairs.

But Liu pointed out that Xu – who served as China's ambassador to Afghanistan from 2010-13 – would not be the first top envoy to New Delhi to lack direct experience with the South Asian nation.

Luo's predecessor Le Yucheng – a Russian expert who was posted to India in 2014, shortly ahead of President Xi Jinping's first official visit to New Delhi – did not have any Indian experience either, he said.

On return to Beijing after their stints in India, Luo and Sun were both promoted to foreign vice-minister positions, while Le served as deputy to China's then top ranking diplomat Yang Jiechi, also a vice-ministerial role.

Liu said that all three former Chinese ambassadors had been serving as assistant foreign ministers when they got the New Delhi job, putting Xu's appointment – if confirmed – in line with past arrangements.

But he cautioned against expectations of a quick turnaround in Sino-Indian ties, which were at a "critical juncture", amid signs of further geopolitical division between them on top of their border impasse and in the midst of intensifying US-China rivalry.

"I don't think the border dispute is too complicated to be resolved, and the key is whether both sides are able to demonstrate their willingness to work together towards a mutually acceptable solution, especially on the part of New Delhi," Liu said.

"But even if the border issues can be resolved, I am not optimistic that bilateral ties could be improved any time soon."

According to Liu, Beijing is also concerned about India's hyping of China as a threat and its increasingly restrictive policies against Chinese investment, as New Delhi seeks to decouple economically from its neighbour and replace it in the global supply chain as the world's factory.

Xu's previous experience in financial affairs might prove useful if the veteran diplomat were posted to New Delhi, Liu said.

A Bloomberg report this week said a study by London-based Fathom Financial Consulting found that India has made headway in its efforts to increase its market share of electronics exports – through tax cuts and other incentives – previously dominated by China.

The two countries wrapped up another round of commander-level border talks last week, seeking a mutually acceptable solution "at the earliest possible time" in a bid to "turn the page" on the tensions, the Chinese defence ministry said.

Beijing expressed similar hopes in December, at the start of this latest round of diplomatic talks with New Delhi on the border issues.

However, after 21 rounds of military-level talks and 28 rounds of diplomatic dialogue, there is little sign of any quick solution, let alone "a complete disengagement" of Chinese and Indian troops along the Line of Actual Control in Eastern Ladakh.

Neither side appears ready to back down on the highly charged border issues, with Beijing and New Delhi each accusing the other of stalling the situation. Meanwhile, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi has overseen a decisive tilt towards Washington, elevating military ties and accelerating partnerships with the US, Japan and Australia through the Quad – slammed by Beijing as an "Indo-Pacific Nato".

While Xi and Modi briefly discussed the border situation in August on the sidelines of the Brics summit – their first direct conversation in a year – bilateral ties have largely remained deadlocked.

In a move widely seen as a snub to New Delhi, Xi skipped the Group of 20 summit in India in September, after Modi refused to support Xi's signature Belt and Road Initiative at the virtual Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit in July.

China urges Indian media to uphold One China policy, berating a Taiwan foreign Minister interview

04 March 2024, Tibetan Review

China wants the media in India to follow its so-called One China policy after the television channel NewsX aired on Feb 29 an interview with Taiwan's foreign minister Joseph Wu. The Communist Party of China (CPC)-state has never ruled Taiwan but considers the latter a renegade province and vowed to "reunify" it, including by armed invasion if necessary.

In a statement issued Mar 1, the Chinese embassy in India claimed the interview provided "a platform for advocating Taiwan independence and disseminating false information," which it deemed a serious violation of the One-China principle.

China's One-China principle asserts that there is only one China in this world and Taiwan is part of it, and the government of the People's Republic of China (PRC) is its sole legal representative. It requires all countries having diplomatic relations with it to abide by this principle.

However, India has for years refrained from including the One-China nomenclature in joint statements after meetings with leaders of China due to the latter's claim on Arunachal Pradesh and pro-Pakistan position it has adopted on the Kashmir issue. China has also repeatedly angered India by preventing the UN from sanctioning terrorists who had attacked it and were being protected by Pakistan.

The Chinese embassy statement stressed that the One-China principle is widely accepted and forms the political foundation for diplomatic ties between China and countries worldwide.

It urged the "Indian media to uphold China's sovereignty and territorial integrity."

Responding strongly to the Chinese statement, the Taiwan Foreign Office has said, "Neither India nor Taiwan is part of the PRC and we're not its puppets.

"We're both democracies with free and vibrant presses that can't be dictated to. Beijing should worry about its own economic slump, not bullying its neighbours," the statement has added.

India-Taiwan relations, while unofficial, have gradually strengthened in recent years, driven by economic, strategic, and cultural factors. Despite not having formal diplomatic ties, the two sides have sought to enhance bilateral trade and investment through various mechanisms. Taiwan's technological expertise in areas like chipmaking aligns with India's goals of promoting innovation and digitalisation, noted news18.com Mar 3.

The report said that less than a month ago, the Taipei Economic and Cultural Centre in India – Taiwan's de facto embassy in India – and the India Taipei Association (ITA) signed a memorandum of understanding (MoU) on labour cooperation.

India to open 'strategically important' navy base near China-friendly Maldives

03 March 2024, South China Morning Post

India's navy has said it is bolstering forces on "strategically important" islands close to the Maldives, with a new base set to open just days before Male starts sending home Indian forces.

Relations between India and the Maldives have soured since pro-China President Mohamed Muizzu won elections last year after promising to expel Indian forces.

India is suspicious of China's growing presence in the archipelago nation, which straddles key east-west international shipping routes, and the new base will extend New Delhi's "operational surveillance" of the area, the navy said in a statement late Saturday.

Muizzu has asked India to withdraw 89 security personnel based in the Maldives to operate reconnaissance aircraft, with the first batch due to leave by March 10 and all to depart within two months.

The new base, opening March 6 on India's Lakshadweep islands, will turn an existing small detachment into an "independent naval unit", according to the navy's statement.

India's Lakshadweep islands lie about 130 kilometres (80 miles) north of the Maldives, with the new naval base on the island of Minicoy situated at their closest point.

India's navy already has a base on the Lakshadweep island of Kavaratti, but the new base will be about 258 kilometres (160 miles) closer to the Maldives.

"Minicoy is the southernmost island of Lakshadweep, which straddles the vital sea lines of communications," the navy said.

It said the base will boost anti-piracy and anti-narcotic operations, and was part of a policy to "incrementally augment security infrastructure at the strategically important" islands.

India, China in 'constructive communication' to settle Ladakh standoff: Chinese military

01 March 2024, The Economic Times

China and India have maintained "constructive communication" to find a mutually acceptable solution to resolve the standoff in eastern Ladakh, the Chinese military has said, underlining that Beijing attaches "great importance" to ties with New Delhi to jointly maintain peace at the borders. The Indian and Chinese troops are locked in a standoff in certain friction points in eastern Ladakh even as the two sides completed disengagement from several areas following extensive diplomatic and military talks.

"The two sides had positive, in-depth and constructive communication on resolving the border issues of each other's concern and agreed to reach a mutually acceptable solution at an early date," Ministry of National Defence spokesperson Senior Colonel Zhang Xiaogang told the Chinese media at a press briefing here on Thursday, referring to the commander-level talks held on February 19 between India and China.

"China attaches great importance to the China-India military-to-military relations and hopes that India and China will work towards the same goal, enhance mutual trust, properly settle differences and jointly maintain peace and tranquillity in the border areas," he was quoted as saying by China Military Online, the official news portal of the Chinese Defence Ministry.

The talks held on February 19 were the 21st round of talks between the two militaries to resolve the eastern Ladakh logjam, which will enter its fourth year in May this year.

The Chinese military action in May 2020 resulted in the Galwan Valley clash that marked the most serious military conflict between India and China in decades.

According to the Chinese military, the two sides have so far agreed to disengage at four points – the Galwan Valley, the Pangong Lake, Hot Springs, and Jianan Daban (Gogra) – contributing to the de-escalation of tensions along the border.

But the talks were deadlocked over reaching a similar agreement at Depsang and Demchok, where the Indian side strongly pressed for resolution of two lingering issues.

Both sides issued separate press releases on the 21st round of talks.

A press release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) on the latest talks said the two sides agreed to maintain communication on the way ahead through the relevant military and diplomatic mechanisms.

"The discussions built on the previous rounds, seeking complete disengagement in the remaining areas along the LAC (Line of Actual Control) in eastern Ladakh as an essential basis for the restoration of peace and tranquillity in the India-China border areas," it said in a statement.

The MEA said the two sides shared their perspectives on this in the talks held in a "friendly and cordial" atmosphere.

"The two sides have agreed to maintain communication on the way ahead through the relevant military and diplomatic mechanisms. They also committed to maintain peace and tranquillity on the ground in the border areas in the interim," it said.

In Beijing, China's Ministry of National Defence said the two militaries conducted positive, in-depth, and constructive communication on resolving border issues of mutual concern.

Both sides agreed to continue communication through military and diplomatic channels, guided by the important consensus of the leaders of the two countries, to reach an acceptable solution as soon as possible and "turn the page" in the border situation, the Chinese readout on the 21st round of talks said.

The eastern Ladakh border standoff erupted on May 5, 2020, following a violent clash in the Pangong Lake area. The Eastern Ladakh standoff has resulted in a virtual freeze of bilateral ties on all fronts except trade.

India is pressing the People's Liberation Army to disengage from the Depsang and Demchok, maintaining that there cannot be restoration of normalcy in its relations with China as long as the state of the borders remains abnormal.

'Mind games ...': Jaishankar warns against China's bid to derail bilateral ties

23 February 2024, Times of India

NEW DELHI: India and China face significant challenges in maintaining a balanced relationship, external affairs minister S Jaishankar said on Friday. Speaking at the Raisina Dialogue, Jaishankar noted that China's immediate issue was departure from established norms, leading to the border dispute in eastern Ladakh. During his address, Jaishankar cautioned against China's "mind games" and attempts to limit discussions to bilateral matters, emphasizing that India should assert its rights and consider other global factors to achieve a favourable equilibrium.

On the economic front, Jaishankar referred to Goldman Sachs' projections that by 2075, both India and China could become $50 trillion plus economies. The minister was responding to a question on whether the two countries would manage to find an equilibrium or a balance in their frosty relations.

"Here is the immediate issue which is: From the late 1980s, we had an understanding on the border precisely because it suited both of us. Now there was a departure after almost 30 years. A departure on their side in terms of how they behaved on the border. And there was a pushback from our side," he said.

"I think arriving at an equilibrium, then maintaining those and refreshing those is going to be one of the biggest challenges for both countries. It is not going to be easy," he noted.

The external affairs minister said "mind games" will be played which would be that it is "just between the two of us".

"The other 190 odd countries do not exist in our relationship. That will be the mind game which will be played. I do not think we should play it," he said.

In terms of the two economies, Jaishankar acknowledged that China had a head start and a more intensive and robust growth trajectory. However, he emphasized that economic growth patterns suggest that both countries will eventually flatten out, with India's growth surpassing China's.

"I am not in denial of what the numbers today suggest. But if one looks for an example in Goldman Sachs predictions which is that we will both really by around 2075 end up as $50 trillion plus economies and will be the two closest to each other," he said.

'Ladakh stand-off led India to cite China as No. 1 threat'

13 February 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Feb13'24) – India may still be flummoxed by the audacity of the Chinese army intrusion into eastern Ladakh in mid-2020, especially as regards the level of authority at which the decision was taken, but it has enabled the country to be more aware of and outspoken about where its actual threat lies, theprint.in Feb 11 cited former Army chief Gen Manoj Naravane as saying.

Four years since the Chinese intrusion, which led to a continued standoff but subsequent pullback to their side, the question why they did it still confounds the Indian defence and security establishment, the report said.

While noting that only time will tell at which level the decision was taken to stir tensions with India at the Line of Actual Control (LAC), Naravane has said it worked out well for India because it was now more aware of where the actual threat is.

"Why they did what they did is a question which continues to confound us. Especially because they did it when the world was in the claws of the Covid pandemic," Gen Naravane has said Feb 10, speaking at the WordsCount literature festival held at the Mayo College in Ajmer, Rajasthan.

Given the nature of the Chinese system, it is very unlikely that the decision to do what they did was taken at a local level, that is, by some miscalculation by the Battalion Commander, the report cited him as saying.

"Had to be something which had to be coordinated much higher up. Whether that much higher up is at the level of their Western Theatre Command or right up to the Politburo (of the Chinese Communist Party), that time will tell," he has said.

Speaking at the annual event hosted by author and scriptwriter Advaita Kala, he has added, "But what has happened is not a bad thing. Because for a very long time, we were shying away from calling out China as the No. 1 threat".

And he has continued: "We were always hoping that by being decent and conciliatory and agreeing to what they are saying, they would return that favour in full measure and also give us the respect that is due. So obviously that was not coming... as a result of activities of 2020, we are more focused now on where the threat actually lies."

'Beijing tried to...': Amit Shah likens LAC standoff to 1962 Indo-China war in Lok Sabha

10 February 2024, Live Mint

Union Home Minister Amit Shah on Saturday spoke on the India-China border dispute along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in Ladakh and said that Beijing was attempting a repeat of the 1962 war with India. While speaking in Parliament, Amit Shah reiterated the Union Government's stand that India has "not lost out on any territory" in the military standoff against the Chinese troops.

"China tried to do what it did in 1962," news agency PTI quoted Amit Shah as saying in Lok Sabha. "Our leadership displayed resolve and not an inch of India's land was lost," he added.

Congress-led Opposition parties have attacked the PM Modi-led Union government on the issue and claimed that Chinese troops have encroached on India's territory.

Prime Minister Narendra Modi met Chinese President Xi Jinping on the sidelines of the BRICS Summit in Johannesburg and discussed the de-escalation of tensions along the LAC. "In a conversation with President Xi Jinping of China, PM highlighted India's concerns on the unresolved issues along the LAC in the western sector of the India-China border areas," India's Foreign Secretary Vinay Kwatra said.

After the meeting, China also released a statement emphasizing the need to properly handling the border issues. "President Xi stressed that improving China-India relations serves the common interests of the two countries and peoples, and is also conducive to peace, stability, and development of the world and the region," the statement said.

"The two sides should bear in mind the overall interests of their bilateral relations and handle properly the border issue so as to jointly safeguard peace and tranquility in the border region," it added. India-China LAC standoff

The tense standoff between Indian and Chinese troops commenced in the latter part of April-May 2020. The confrontation culminated in a violent clash in the Galwan Valley on the night of June 15, resulting in casualties on both sides. Twenty Indian soldiers were killed in the violent clashes, the first instance in over four decades where lives were lost in a border dispute along the Line of Actual Control. Since then, both India and China's Army have been conducting meetings at the Corps Commander level and disengagement has taken place in some sectors, but the status quo before April 2020 still looks far.

Budget for cultural bodies linked to Tibetans slashed to Rs 20 crore

06 February 2024, The Economic Times

The Centre has slashed budgetary allocation for Tibet House, the Dalai Lama's cultural centre and other Buddhist institutions.

The budget for such bodies under the cultural ministry has been reduced from ₹50.19 crore in the current financial year to ₹20.19 crore for the next fiscal. Government sources claimed the budget has been allocated as per the demands made by them.

The list includes Tibet House, Centre for Buddhist Cultural Studies Tawang Monastery, Namgyal Institute of Tibetology, Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, International Buddhist Confederation and GRL Monastic School Bomdila.

It also includes bodies such as Vrindavan Research Institute, Asiatic Society (Mumbai), Thanjavur Maharaja Serfoji Sarasvati Mahal Library, Central Library and Connemara Public Library.

In the last fiscal, budget for these institutes was ₹71.51 crore, reduced to ₹50.19 crore for the current fiscal.

When contacted, BJD MP Sujeet Kumar, who heads When contacted, BJD MP Sujeet Kumar, who heads the All-Party Indian Parliamentary Forum for Tibet, said, "It is unfortunate. Reduction in budgetary allocation especially for Tibet House, Tawang Monastery and Namgyal Institute is worrisome as these institutes work in preserving and protecting the Tibetan culture, which is under attack from China. The government of India should have enhanced the support," Kumar said.

India's top civilian honour to Taiwanese business leader seen as message to China

28 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan28'24) – In what is seen as a message to China, India has awarded its third highest civilian honour, the Padma Bhushan, to Taiwan's Liu Young-way, the Chief Executive Officer of Foxconn. The move will send a very strong message to the Communist Party of China, said a firstpost.com news report Jan 26.

Another recipient, albeit posthumously, is Togdan Rinpoche (1938 – May 24, 2023) of Ladakh, who an indiatimes.com report said Jan 16 was an ally of Tibet's exiled spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama. The Dalai Lama is despised by China, which calls him a separatist, even though he only seeks regional autonomy for his Tibetan homeland.

The 66-year-old Liu will receive the accolade in a ceremony later this year, with the presentation to be made by the President of India. The announcement of the 132 recipients across various Padma categories was made on the eve of India's Republic Day of Jan 26.

In a message to Beijing, India for the first time conferred one of its highest civilian awards upon a person from Taiwan on Thursday (Jan 25) said the scmp.com Jan 26.

The recognition comes at a time when Prime Minister Narendra Modi has been trying to attract foreign investors and portray India as Asia's next manufacturing hub amid efforts by the US and its allies to move supply chains away from China.

Foxconn, the world's biggest maker of electronic components, said recently that it planned to build a chip packaging and testing plant in India with HCL Group, a local tech firm.

In November, Foxconn – a leading supplier for American tech titan Apple – announced investments in India worth US$1.6 billion to diversify away from China.

The report noted that in 2019, the company initiated the production of Apple's iPhone XR at its manufacturing facility in India. Building on this milestone, by 2023, the same facility had expanded its capabilities to include the manufacturing of the latest iPhone model, the iPhone 14.

Meanwhile, New Delhi has encouraged the island's top semiconductor firm, Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Company (TSMC), to establish a fabrication plant in India, the report noted.

In a sign of deepening unofficial ties, trade between India and Taiwan surged from just over US$1 billion in 2001 to US$7 billion in 2021, the report said.

Another Padma Bhushan awardee in Togdan Rinpoche. He had served as the Head Lama for Ladakh for all Tibetan Buddhist lineage, is the most senior Lama of the Drikung Kagyu Yogi lineage, and one of the most senior Lamas in Nyingma tradition, according to his official website.

The award is seen as a recognition of the Drikung Kagyu sect by the Centre; Togdan Rinpoche was also instrumental in preserving the Bhoti (Tibetan) language, the indiatimes.com report cited officials as saying.

Apprehensions in India as Chinese Survey Ship Heads to Maldives

29 January 2024, VOA

NEW DELHI — A Chinese research ship due to dock in the Maldives has raised apprehensions in India, where concerns have been growing about the potential military use of the data collected by such vessels.

FILE - Maldives' president Mohamed Muizzu leaves his inauguration ceremony in Male, Nov. 17, 2023. He vowed to expel Indian troops deployed in the strategically located archipelago, in his first speech to the nation after being sworn into power.

The Maldives foreign ministry said last week that it has given permission to the ship, Xiang Yang Hong 3, following a request by China to “make a port call, for rotation of personnel and replenishment.” It said the ship will not be conducting any research in Maldivian waters.

The announcement comes at a time when diplomatic tensions have spiked between India and the Maldives following the election of President Mohamed Muizzu, who is seen as pro-China.

The Maldives gave clearance to the ship weeks after India’s other small neighbor in the Indian Ocean, Sri Lanka placed a one-year moratorium on foreign research ships entering its waters.

The suspension was put in place apparently due to objections raised by India after at least two Chinese research and surveillance ships docked in the island nation in the last year and a half. Last year, the research ship Shi Yan 6, conducted a maritime survey in Sri Lankan waters.

Analysts say New Delhi’s concerns about Chinese research ships such as the one due to dock in the Maldives in the coming days arise from fears that the data collected could be used to deploy Chinese submarines in the region.

“Our suspicion is that this vessel, although it is an oceanographic research vessel, is gathering information that could be used by China to expand its undersea military operations and improve its anti-submarine warfare capabilities, as it studies the Indian Ocean environment, the seabed, temperature profile, eddies, currents, etc. That means China will have an edge militarily in the Indian Ocean in times to come,” Abhijit Singh, Head of Maritime Policy Initiative at the Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi told VOA.

Amid rising geopolitical tensions, the Indian Ocean has become a hugely strategic waterway for India and China, the Asian giants whose rivalries have deepened following a four-year long military standoff along their Himalayan borders.

“Beijing has profound interest in the Indian Ocean because vital sea-lanes of communication pass through here carrying energy, oil, trade etc. What they are doing is reconnoitering the high seas, studying the hydrographic or hydrological conditions because their submarines will operate here one day,” India’s retired navy chief Arun Prakash told VOA. “China is preparing the ground for a major maritime deployment in the years to come So it is of concern to India.”

The Maldives and Sri Lanka are placed strategically along key shipping routes. Although the Maldives foreign ministry said that the Chinese ship, Xiang Yang Hong 3 would not be conducting research, analysts said that was unlikely to reassure New Delhi.

“Once the vessel is there, it is very hard for Maldives to make sure that it is not doing the work it intends to do,” according to Singh.

A report by the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies released earlier this month said that Chinese surveys in the Indian Ocean have “clear military value - especially to submarine operations.”

According to the report, China, whose surveying operations had been concentrated along its periphery in the South China Sea and Western Pacific Ocean, has also set its sights on the Indian Ocean.

“While scientific and commercial benefits may accrue from Chinese oceanographic research, these activities may also prove crucial for the PLA [People’s Liberation Army] in expanding its operational reach and capabilities in the Indian Ocean," the report said.

"This expansion poses a significant challenge to key regional players like India, as well as to the United States and its allies."

Following the report's release, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning, said that China's marine scientific research fully complied with the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea.

"We hope that the relevant parties will take an objective view of China's marine scientific research activities and refrain from speculating through colored glasses," Mao said on January 11.

In the Maldives, permission to the Chinese vessel was granted weeks after both sides committed to stronger ties during a visit this month by the Maldivian president, Muizzu, to Beijing.

"The Chinese are going to leverage these growing ties with Maldives by conducting surveys in these waters," said Singh.

Indian Ocean countries such as Sri Lanka and the Maldives have witnessed a geopolitical tug of war between India and China for a strategic presence over the past two decades.

"The Maldives has always been a welcoming destination for vessels of friendly countries, and continues to host both civilian and military vessels making port calls for peaceful purposes," the Maldivian foreign ministry said last week, referring to the Xiang Yang Hong 3 visit.

"The deployment of such research ships in the Indian Ocean is going to increase, it is not going to get any less in the years to come," said Prakash.

India parades domestic weapons amid China border tensions

NEW DELHI -- India showcased domestically produced weapons during a military parade on Friday, an apparent show of strength toward China amid a border dispute.

Prime Minister Narendra Modi and members of his cabinet attended the event in New Delhi celebrating the 75th Republic Day, a holiday commemorating the 1950 adoption of the constitution.

French President Emmanuel Macron was the chief guest. His invitation was in response to France inviting Modi to attend Bastille Day festivities in Paris on July 14 last year.

Featured in the parade was the Prachand stealth helicopter, designed and manufactured by the state-owned defense contractor Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd. (HAL). The NAG anti-tank missile system, developed by India's Defence Research and Development Organisation, was also on display.

Warplanes running on biofuel re-enacted the massive Tangail airdrop that occurred during the 1971 war with Pakistan. Women personnel from the army, navy and air force marched in a show of diversity and empowerment.

The domestic defense industry has expanded rapidly under Modi's Made In India Initiative. The government has allocated 5.94 trillion rupees ($71.4 billion) to this year's defense budget, roughly double the amount when Modi first came to power in 2014.

India is now fourth in the world in defense spending, behind the U.S., Russia and China.

Because of the war in Ukraine, weapon supplies from Russia have become prone to delays. India is Russia's largest weapons importer, with about 45% of its arms procurement coming from Russia.

One factor driving the rush to boost defense capabilities is a growing sense of alarm in New Delhi toward signs of China's territorial expansionism. In 2020, the two countries engaged in a border clash that produced fatalities on both sides for the first time in 45 years.

The Maldives, which has historically maintained close ties with India, elected a new president last year who is known to be pro-China. A Chinese observation vessel will reportedly make a port call at the Maldives capital of Male early next month, which has put India's military on alert.

India suffered a military failure during the Sino-Indian War in 1962. That experience positioned the modernization of the military and the development of a homegrown defense industry as a matter of sovereignty and survival.

But China's defense budget is triple that of India's, and the number of India's military personnel falls short of China. Without any major military alliances, India is enhancing defense ties with Western countries and with Russia to counter pressure from China.

During the summit Thursday between Modi and Macron, the two sides apparently affirmed plans to advance bilateral defense cooperation, which would include the transfer of submarines and other advanced military tech. French aerospace firm Safran is collaborating with India on the production of warplane engines, according to reports.

Western countries in turn are keen to deepen relations with India to push back against China's military buildup.

In June, U.S. President Joe Biden hosted Modi in a state dinner. General Electric and HAL signed an agreement toward manufacturing engines for the Indian-made Tejas combat aircraft following the dinner.

In November, Washington and New Delhi agreed to jointly manufacture the Stryker armored vehicle in India.

Western nations seek to drive a wedge between India and Russia, but New Delhi is maintaining ties with Moscow in light of its reliance on Russian oil and weapons.

In December, Indian Minister of External Affairs Subrahmanyam Jaishankar met with Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow. Modi has expressed his intentions to visit Russia this year.

Last April, the Indian government said it has established defense industrial corridors in the states of Uttar Pradesh and Tamil Nadu. Uttar Pradesh is due to manufacture the BrahMos supersonic cruise missile co-developed with Russia.

By expanding access to global markets such as Europe, India looks to develop its domestic defense industry supply chain and create jobs.

"I would say there is a greater realization that if India has to elevate its profile, it can't be dependent on arms imports," said Sameer Patil, senior fellow at the Observer Research Foundation, an Indian think tank. "It can develop its military capability, but it won't be recognized as a military power if it doesn't have a robust domestic industrial interface."

China reiterates 'historical legacy' to continue holding up resolution of Ladakh border dispute

26 January 2024, Tibetan Review

(TibetanReview.net, Jan26'24) - China has responded with what amounted to saying a polite "no" to India's suggestion that it could ease its heightened scrutiny of Chinese investments if peace is restored at the two countries' border along occupied Tibet. The boundary dispute is a "legacy issue" and it is "unwise" to link the border issue with the overall relations as it does not represent the whole picture of the bilateral relations, Reuters Jan 25 cited a Chinese defence ministry spokesperson as saying.

Senior Colonel Wu Qian made the remarks at a media briefing in Beijing in response to a question on India's External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar's reported statement that China violated the bilateral consensus in 2020 and assembled a large number of military forces along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), resulting in the conflict in the Galwan Valley, reported the PTI new agency Jan 25.

The report noted that the India-China relations had remained frozen since May 2020 when the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) amassed troops in eastern Ladakh that led to a deadly clash between the two militaries at the Galwan Valley in Jun 2020, resulting in the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese military personnel.

Wu has repeated Beijing's claim that the Galwan Valley lies on the Chinese side of the western sector along the LAC and the relevant incident happened when the Indian side violated the consensus and made unilateral provocations. "Therefore, the responsibility entirely lies with the Indian side," he has maintained.

India has been pressing the PLA to disengage from the Depsang and Demchok areas in eastern Ladakh. While India has maintained that there cannot be restoration of normalcy in its relations with China as long as the state of the borders remains abnormal, China continues to press India to delink the border issue and bilateral relations and work for normalcy.

Wu has sought to make the point that in the past three years, the two countries had maintained communication and coordination through military and diplomatic channels.

The two militaries held 20 rounds of Corps Commanders level meetings and agreed to disengage from four points mainly the Galwan Valley, the Pangong lake, Hot Springs and Jianan Daban (Gogra) contributing to the de-escalating tension along the border, he has asserted.

"The border dispute," Wu has insisted, "is a legacy with India but that does not represent the whole picture of the bilateral relations."

"Therefore, it is unwise and inappropriate for the Indian side to link the border issue with the overall relations. It goes against the shared interests of the two countries.

"We hope the Indian side can work with the Chinese side to enhance strategic mutual trust, properly handle differences and safeguard peace and tranquillity in the border areas."

Meanwhile, differences remain unresolved over pulling back of troops from the Depsang plains areas and Charding Nullah near Demchok in eastern Ladakh. Talks remain deadlocked over the resolution of disputes at Depsang, a 972-sq-km plateau where the two sides have issue over troop positions, especially at 'bottleneck' on the eastern edge of Depsang, the tribuneindia.com earlier reported Aug 15, 2023.

India has been objecting to the PLA deliberately blocking Indian patrols on this specific patrolling route in Depsang, the report said.

China and India Compete for Influence in War on Border

26 January 2024, Newsweek

China and India have found themselves embroiled in a battle for influence in neighboring Myanmar as a guerrilla war rages in the tropical jungles behind their shared borders.

The Burmese civil war had been simmering since a military coup in February 2021 toppled Aung San Suu Kyi's democratically elected government. The conflict has taken on a new dimension with recent revelations of Indian fuel and weapons sales to mysterious entities behind Myanmar's junta.

Both Beijing and New Delhi have lent some form of support to the military government next door. They both seek to prevent fighting from spilling over, while also want to ensure the regime does not completely fall under the other camp's influence. The situation is further complicated as fighting has spread to ever more of Myanmar with the junta's forces under increasingly intense pressure from the insurgent groups.

The regional rivalry between the two Asian giants, who have their own long-running disagreements at their contested Himalayan border, doubtless is part of the equation. However, with vital economic and strategic interests in Myanmar, China is making a point of talking to both the junta and some of the insurgent factions — many of which are ethnically based.

The United Nations last month estimated that the civil war had already sent thousands of refugees fleeing into neighboring countries and displaced nearly 2 million people within Myanmar itself.

The situation in war-torn Myanmar remains fluid, with or without India-China competition, but the conflict's resolution may yet determine the region's balance of power.

The India-Myanmar-China border

India has called for the restoration of democracy in the country, but it remains entangled in a complex web of relationships with the ruling powers. A separate U.N. report last May said Indian entities had dispatched $51 million worth of military-related exports to Myanmar since the junta took power.

This month, the Frontier Myanmar magazine in Yangon said the state-owned Indian Oil Corp., known for its history of supplies to Myanmar's military, had sold over $3.7 million worth of fuel, including more than $1.5 million in navy-grade diesel, to a Burmese consignee known simply as "The Master."

Since the company established a trade link with Myanmar in 2017, it has shipped $284 million worth of fuel, oil, gasoline, and related materials to the country, mostly to Myanmar Chemical and Machinery, a firm accused of brokering arms deals for the military junta, and whose director, Aung Hlaing Oo, has been sanctioned by the United States, Canada and Britain since 2022, according to the news outlet.

Indian Oil Corp. ceased shipments of oil refinement products to the Myanmar company shortly after the sanctions, but it continued to send fuel, Frontier Myanmar said.

Myanmar risks becoming a pawn in a geopolitical chess match involving multiple stakeholders whose decisions could have far-reaching implications.

Angshuman Choudhury, an associate fellow at the New Delhi think tank Center for Policy Research, said India's support for Myanmar's junta hinges on preserving influence and balancing China's presence in the country.

"However, in my opinion, this is a miscalculation as the junta is thoroughly unpopular in Myanmar, and the ground reality has dramatically changed in the last few months in favor of the pro-democracy resistance," Choudhury told Newsweek. "The junta is in no position to protect Indian strategic, political, and economic interests in Myanmar, including along the borders."

"If Delhi really wants to offset the Chinese presence, it should have ideally opened communication channels with armed groups close to its borders while speaking up more clearly in favor of a federal democracy in Myanmar and keeping its contact with the junta to a bare minimum," Choudhury said.

"As the biggest democracy in the region, that would have significantly boosted India's image—and hence political leverage—in Myanmar, projecting it as a real alternative to China, whose authoritarian style of governance doesn't cohere with the pro-democracy revolution," Choudhury added.

The junta, meanwhile, could try to limit any outside attempts to engage with the Three Brotherhood Alliance rebels, according to Aparna Pande, a research fellow at the Washington, D.C.-based Hudson Institute think tank.

In an October analysis for the Geopolitical Intelligence Services website, Pande wrote: "The regime is aware of the strategic competition between India and China and will seek to play one against the other to obtain benefits from both."

"Beijing's support for the junta has never been unconditional. When the junta infringed upon China's core national interest—in eliminating cyber scam operations—China had every reason to want to slap the junta on the wrist. But that punishment is not unlimited. China is not aimed at pushing the junta out," said Yun Sun, director of the China Program at the Stimson Center think tank in Washington, D.C.

Sun told Newsweek that Beijing does not necessarily view New Delhi's support for the junta as detrimental to its interests.

"The competition in Myanmar has not been between China and India. Instead, in the Chinese view, it has been between China and the U.S.," Sun said. "China does not see India as having as many resources or the will to wage those resources in Myanmar."

The fuel trade is merely one facet of India's alliance with Myanmar's government since the coup d'etat nearly three years ago, but observers said that relationship should be made more transparent.

Daw Yadanar Maung, a spokesperson for the Justice For Myanmar activist group, told Frontier Myanmar that New Delhi was complicit in the junta's actions by legitimizing it. Indian Oil Corp. should disclose "the importer and end-user" of its fuel because it risks landing in the hands of the Myanmar Navy, Yadanar Maung said.

On the ground, the rebel offensive known as "Operation 1027"—initiated in late October—has rattled Myanmar's military, which has lost key outposts and border crossings near China and India. Aside from refugees, Burmese junta troops have also been sighted fleeing into India, China, and Thailand.

"The junta was wrong to assume that ethnic armies would crumble under pressure. In fact, the 2021 coup exacerbated ethnic minority anxieties and pushed even signatories of the 2015 Nationwide Ceasefire Agreement—signed by Naypyidaw and nearly 10 different rebel groups—to the jungles," Avinash Paliwal, a reader in international relations at SOAS, University of London, wrote in the Foreign Affairs magazine this week.

In recent months, the situation at the border with India has rapidly deteriorated amid intense fighting. In November, New Delhi issued a travel advisory, urging Indian nationals to avoid nonessential visits to Myanmar and cautioning Indians already residing in the country to avoid violence-affected regions.

On Thursday, a Myanmar military aircraft overshot the runway at Lengpui Airport in India's northeastern Mizoram state, injuring at least 14 people on board. The plane was there to repatriate soldiers who had escaped conflict zones.

According to Myanmar's local news outlets, more than 250 soldiers crossed into India this month alone after armed opposition groups seized control of military outposts near the border. The Indian government is sending them back.

The Chinese and Indian foreign ministries did not return Newsweek's requests for comment before publication.

China has not filled India Ambassador's post in over one year

22 January 2024, The Sentinel

China has yet to appoint its ambassador to India, some 15 months since the post fell vacant. The last Chinese Ambassador in Delhi was Sun Weidong, who left in October 2022 after three years on the job and became a Vice Foreign Minister in Beijing on his return. China-India relations plunged to a new low in the modern histories of the Asian neighbours in June, 2020, following clashes in the Galwan River valley that killed at least 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers.

The decades-old border dispute, which led to a war in 1962, has seen skirmishes in the past three years amid a troops build-up and partial pullback.

The delay in appointment is a sign that the bilateral relationship remains frosty. But the reason being increasingly cited is China's internal affairs.

A diplomatic source said while the common perception is linked to the current state of Sino-Indian relations, the process of selecting a candidate from within China's foreign service is taking time because the Delhi posting requires seniority (as does the role in some other capitals).

Both Chinese and Indian foreign policy analysts agreed China would be cautious about who to pick but their explanations differed.

"It is a vice-ministerial-level job, an important post, so they need to find the right person," said Hu Shisheng, director, Institute for South Asian Studies, at a Beijing-based think-tank on international relations. "This is not related to the bilateral situation. It is a domestic issue."

At present, no other country in South Asia has the Chinese ambassador's post empty. "An Indian ambassador to China can be selected from the joint secretary and above levels (Indian government hierarchy) but the Chinese ambassador's post (in India) is of a vice-ministerial level. Compared with years ago, the job's bureaucratic rank is higher today," said Srikanth Kondapalli, dean, School of International Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, Delhi.

There is not a dearth of senior candidates, he said, but India's approach to China has "changed" and there might be few takers for the job among Chinese diplomats.

"The Galwan incident and follow-up have made the bilateral relationship sensitive," he said, adding that a new appointee would have an uphill task.

According to a non-diplomatic source, last year, "the Chinese government had nearly found a new ambassador to India but the idea was later dropped" amid internal changes such as the removal of Qin Gang from the post of foreign minister and Li Shangfu from the post of defence minister.

The probability of China announcing a new ambassador to India in the immediate future appears less likely, owing to domestic preoccupation: the "two sessions" - China's annual legislative meetings in March, as well as India's general elections between April and May.

"Not naming a new ambassador doesn't mean that China does not take India seriously," said Qian Feng, director of research, National Strategy Institute, Tsinghua University, Beijing. "China has its internal process and will be careful about this appointment." For China-India relations to thaw, China has to create the right conditions, Kondapalli said.

"India is saying, go back to where you came from (pre-2020), remove the troops - de-escalate and disengage and then we can talk about resetting relations." Hu said the Galwan clash continues to be a sensitive issue in the bilateral relationship but both countries have "learned big lessons". The India-China disputed border is categorised in three sections: eastern, middle and western.

"The eastern and middle sections are more or less clear in terms of each other's positions and the Line of Actual Control but there are many 'grey areas' in the western section, with overlapping claims," Hu said, adding that "with mutual understanding, both sides have disengaged in some of the hotspots other than Demchok and the Dapsang Plains".

China views the border dispute as a "leftover" problem of British colonialism in the region and wants to go about business as usual with India in other fields. India has been more vocal about its non-acceptance of that position since 2020.

"We wish India understands that the resolution of the border dispute should not be seen as a prerequisite for improving general bilateral relations," said Qian. (IANS)

Chinese research vessel heads to Maldives, could concern India

22 January 2024, Reuters

NEW DELHI, Jan 22 (Reuters) - A Chinese research vessel is on its way to the Maldives, according to an Indian military official and an independent researcher, as new Maldivian President Mohamed Muizzu deepens ties with Beijing, distancing from New Delhi.

It is likely to raise concern in New Delhi, which has previously viewed the presence of such vessels close to its shores, including in Sri Lanka in 2022, as problematic.

These vessels are not military ships, officially, but India and others worry about the military use of their research.

Relations between traditional friends New Delhi and Male have soured since President Muizzu took office in November riding an 'India Out' campaign.

Both New Delhi and Beijing vie for influence on the tiny Indian Ocean nation but the new government in Male is pivoting towards China and has asked India to withdraw its nearly 80 troops stationed there.

The Chinese vessel is en-route to Male, open source intelligence researcher Damien Symon wrote on social media platform X, saying Xiang Yang Hong 03 "is entering the Indian Ocean Region, displaying its destination as Male, the vessel is expected to run an ocean survey operation in the Indian Ocean Region raising concern in #India".

An Indian military official confirmed Symon's finding and said they are monitoring its movement.

The Maldivian president's office, India's foreign ministry and China's defence ministry did not respond to requests for comment.

New Delhi has in the past flagged similar visits by other Chinese research vessels with its other littoral neighbour Sri Lanka, which has denied permission for such vessels to dock on its ports since 2022.

In 2019, India expelled another Chinese research vessel from its Exclusive Economic Zone (EEZ) after it entered without permission.

A senior Indian security official said China's research vessels are "dual use" which means the information gathered by them can be used for both civilian and military purposes, including the deployment of submarines.

Both the Indian military and security officials spoke on the condition of anonymity as they were not authorised to speak publicly on the subject.

Earlier this month, state-affiliated Chinese media warned against calling its maritime research in the Indian Ocean Region a threat, after an American think tank said China's navy could "leverage the insights gained from these missions" for deployment of naval forces.

Vietnam and Indonesia have previously claimed that similar Chinese research vessels had entered their EEZ.

India urged to properly handle ties with China

20 January 2024, China Daily

Beijing on Friday slammed New Delhi for linking the border issue with economic and trade cooperation, saying that the settlement of the border situation should not affect the normal development of bilateral ties.

Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning made the remarks after a senior Indian official told Reuters that India could ease its scrutiny of Chinese investments if the border remains peaceful.

There have been doubts that India has some hidden considerations behind its discriminatory measures and selective law enforcement against Chinese companies, Mao said.

The Indian official's claim proved that the doubts are not entirely unfounded, she added.

Noting that the situation on the border area remains stable, Mao said the border issue between China and India is left over from history and should be appropriately placed in bilateral ties and also properly handled.

In recent years, trade volume between the two countries has witnessed continuous growth, exceeding $100 billion for years despite India's curbs on Chinese investments.

The facts have demonstrated the resilience and potential of economic and trade ties between the neighbors, Mao said.

China hopes that India will fully understand the mutually beneficial nature of economic and trade cooperation, and provide a fair, just, transparent and nondiscriminatory business environment for Chinese enterprises to invest and operate there, she said.

Fresh Details of India-China Skirmishes on Ladakh Border Emerge

19 January 2024, The Wire

New Delhi: Clashes which occurred between India and China on the Line of Actual Control in Galwan in 2020, claiming lives of 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese soldiers, caused a significant disruption in ties between the two countries. But it has emerged that this was not the last time the two nuclear, Asian neighbours were involved in violent clashes in the past three years.

Fresh details about clashes were revealed at the investiture ceremony of the western command of the Indian Army. These details revealed how China had attempted to violently overthrow at least two Indian Army checkpoints.

The news comes in the same week when the army chief General Manoj Pande has said that situation on the China border is "stable, yet sensitive".

What is this new information?

The Indian Army every year announces gallantry awards on Independence and Republic Days. These awards are given away in investiture ceremonies that are held at a later date.

One such investiture ceremony was conducted, where the western command of the Indian Army gave away medals in the honour of soldiers for their brave deeds.

While three Army personnel involved in the skirmishes along the LAC were awarded Sena Medals on January 26, 2023, the others were conferred the awards on August 15 last year. The citations, however, came into the public domain only during the investiture ceremonies.

These citations revealed crucial details about skirmishes between the Indian Army and Chinese army, which is the People's Liberation Army or PLA. Not only that, it also revealed how an Indian major crossed over to the "enemy" side and was able to provide 120 hours of live feed of military movement on the other side, from deep inside the Chinese territory.

These awards were held for honouring the deeds which occurred between September 2021 and November 2022.

The first major revelation was that of a clash at Sikh Light Infantry Post on January 7, 2022. Here, Chinese troops attacked a post manned by troops of the Sikh Light Infantry. A soldier from the unit, Raman Singh, displayed extreme courage in hand-to-hand combat, repulsing the attack, injuring four PLA soldiers, and seizing their weapons.

The attack on January 7, 2022 was not known before.

Other than this, on November 27, 2022, the PLA initiated an attack on a post manned by J&K Rifles. Citations revealed that 50 PLA soldiers were trying to cross LAC and capture the Atari post.

A Junior Commissioned Officer, Baldev Singh successfully led his troops in repulsing the attack and was wounded in the process. The citations at the awards ceremony revealed that Baldev Singh singlehandedly injured 15 PLA soldiers.

He was awarded the Sena Medal for Gallantry.

Apart from these two attacks on Indian Army posts, there were some covert operations.

Lieutenant Colonel Pushmeet Singh of the 19 J&K Rifles played a crucial role in thwarting the plans of the PLA. Undertaking a patrol along the LAC, Lt. Col. Singh's actions led to a significant standoff. Through negotiations spanning two days with a local PLA commander, he successfully reinforced Indian positions and de-escalated the tense situation. The details of this operation, including the specific date, have been intentionally withheld.

Then, on September 16, 2022, Lieutenant Colonel Yogesh Kumar Sati, a member of the 31 Armoured Division, engaged in a high-altitude special mission as part of Operation Snow Leopard. His task was to navigate challenging terrain while avoiding detection by the enemy.

A particularly intriguing operation, named 'Operation Dorji', unfolded under the command of Major Sourav Kumar from the 15th Battalion of the Kumaon Regiment. Maj. Kumar conducted multiple covert missions deep within the Chinese territory. His covert patrol team established a covert surveillance post aimed at securing the Siliguri corridor, also known as the "Chicken's neck." Maj. Kumar executed Operation Dorji remained in enemy territory and gathered crucial information.

Virtual blackout of information about India-China ties As this "new" information about at least two Chinese attacks on Indian soil was revealed, The Indian Express reported that the Army is now deliberating on keeping details of critical operations out of citation announcements of gallantry award winners in investiture ceremonies.

While acts of gallantry will continue to be highlighted in citations, the newspaper said that specific details of operations and the dates these were conducted may not feature in investiture ceremony announcements until the operations concerned are declassified.

The army chief's has called the situation on the China border is "stable, but sensitive".

External affairs minister S. Jaishankar has maintained that India's relations with China remain abnormal, or certainly not normal. But, other than that, there has been a continual lack of information, briefings to the press or debates in Parliament on China. Ministers do not even name China. The prime minister, in an all-party meeting in 2020, said "no one had ever entered Indian territory and there was no one inside." All this again, without naming China. No details were ever given about the skirmishes that took place between PLA and the Indian Army. Jaishankar also met his Chinese counterpart in Goa on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation event.

According to a research paper tabled at the annual Director Generals of Police Conference organised by the Intelligence Bureau, by a police officer, we may have lost access to 26 out of the 65 Patrolling Points that mark the Line of Actual Control in Ladakh. The paper was not discussed at the conference, which was attended by Prime Minister Narendra Modi and Union home minister Amit Shah, but the government made sure the paper was taken off the web.

The Hindu reported in 2020, that about 1,000 square kilometres of area in Ladakh along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) is now under Chinese control, as per intelligence inputs provided to the Centre.

As reported by The Wire, former chief of Army Staff, General M.M. Naravane's memoirs have been withheld for revealing how the Modi government left the Army to its own devices when hostilities at Galwan broke out.

In August 2019, after India repealed Article 370 of the Indian Constitution and announced Aksai Chin as a Union Territory, China registered their protest against the same.

Aksai Chin is territory in Ladakh, which both India and China stake their claims. Post that, that multiple clashes occurred along the LAC. The clashes that have been reported include the one at Pangong Tso on May 5, Sikkim on May 9 and at Galwan Valley on June 15, 2020.

Since then, negotiations have been ongoing between India and China. While China has publicly staked their claim on parts of Arunachal Pradesh, renaming some towns, details about physical confrontation with Indian soldiers were never made public.

The latest details about the violent clashes along the LAC depict strategic acumen, and courage of Indian Army personnel operating in challenging and often undisclosed circumstances.

The removal of the gallantry awards video from YouTube highlights the high level of secrecy involved in the cross-border matters and also raises questions about Indian government's unwillingness to reveal the details about the actual situation between India and China. Twenty-eight rounds of negotiations between the two countries have failed to resolve the deadlock.

Exclusive: India could ease China investment curbs if border stays calm

19 January 2024, Reuters

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan 18 (Reuters) - India could ease its heightened scrutiny of Chinese investments if the two countries' border remains peaceful, a senior Indian official said in the first signal that the four-year-old curbs could be lifted.

Border tensions, the biggest irritant to relations between the nuclear-armed Asian giants, have eased, which could lead to improved investment ties, top industrial policy bureaucrat Rajesh Kumar Singh told Reuters on Wednesday at the annual World Economic Forum meeting in Davos, Switzerland.

In 2020, India tightened scrutiny on investments from companies based in countries it borders, adding a layer of vetting and security clearances.

The move was widely seen as retaliation for a clash between Chinese and Indian troops on their disputed, 3,800-km (2,400-mile) Himalayan frontier that killed at least 20 Indian and four Chinese soldiers, their worst military conflict in decades.

The curbs have disrupted billions of dollars of investments between the world's two most-populous countries, halting planned projects including from Chinese automakers BYD (002594.SZ), opens new tab and Great Wall Motor (601633.SS)

The investment rules "could change once our relationship there stabilises because I think the border issues that we've had - the border has stabilised", Singh, secretary at the Department for Promotion of Industry and Internal Trade, said in an interview. "On the investment side also, if things go well, I'm sure we can resume normal business."

He did not give a timeframe for a possible easing.

Asked if India's message was that Chinese investments depend on a peaceful border, Singh said, "You can't have somebody nibbling at your border while at the same time having red-carpet treatment for investments from there."

The investment curbs, he said, were a slight "step back" from India's broader opening to foreign investment in recent years. India has significantly reduced hurdles for inbound investment, lowering or scrapping foreign ownership caps in many sectors and granting automatic approvals.

China's foreign ministry responded to Singh's comments on Friday, saying the resolution process of the border situation should not affect the normal development of relations between both countries.

"China has always believed that the China-India border issue is an issue left over from history and should be placed in an appropriate position within the bilateral relationship and properly handled," ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said when asked at a regular news briefing.

Mao added that China hopes that India will "fully understand the mutually beneficial nature of China-India economic and trade cooperation" and sought from India a "fair, just, transparent and non-discriminatory business environment" for Chinese companies to invest and operate there.

Despite the border problems, China is India's largest source of imports, with bilateral trade rising 32% since tensions flared to nearly $114 billion in the fiscal year that ended in March.

Indian and Chinese troops clashed twice in 2022 even as peace talks were ongoing. New Delhi and Beijing, which fought a brief border war in 1962, have held a series of diplomatic and military talks to resolve the conflict.

The two neighbours must find a way to step back from potential confrontation in the western Himalayas, Indian Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar said in June.

But, Singh said, "In the last year or so, there haven't been any incidents. So I'm expressing the general hope from the business community that things will, you know, stabilise and improve."

A mechanism to review foreign investments from all countries, resembling those in the United States and Australia, is an option India could eventually consider, Singh said, adding no decision has been taken as India would want to maintain a "welcoming environment" for investments.

China's Visa Revolution: Over 180,000 Visas Issued to Indian Citizens in 2023

The Chinese embassy in India issued over 180,000 visas to Indian citizens in 2023, as part of an initiative to strengthen bilateral ties and enhance mutual exchanges.

In an unprecedented move, the Chinese embassy in India issued over 180,000 visas to Indian citizens in 2023, easing their travel to the neighboring nation. This initiative, part of an ambitious endeavor to reinforce bilateral ties and promote mutual exchanges, symbolizes a significant step forwards in the complex relationship between these two Asian giants.

Revolutionizing the Visa Process

Revamping the visa application tradition, the Chinese embassy has introduced several innovative measures. These include the abolition of the online appointment requirement, an exemption from mandatory fingerprinting, and a temporary slash in visa fees. These modifications are aimed at streamlining the process and making it more efficient for Indian applicants, thereby encouraging more individuals to consider China as their choice of destination for travel, business, or study.

The Power of Reciprocity

While this move marks a significant stride in China's approach towards India, it comes with an unspoken expectation of reciprocity. The spokesperson for the Chinese embassy has urged India to reciprocate by resuming regular visa channels for Chinese citizens. The appeal for mutual action underscores the importance that China places on people-to-people and cultural exchanges as crucial elements in fostering a positive relationship between the two nations.

Anticipating a Two-Way Exchange

The spokesperson's comments suggest a palpable anticipation that the simplified visa process for Indians will be echoed by similar conveniences for Chinese citizens traveling to India. The expectation is that this will facilitate greater interaction and understanding between the citizenry of the two nations, thus helping to bridge the gap that has historically characterized Sino-Indian relations.

As diplomacies evolve, it is the human element that often serves as the catalyst for change. In this case, the ease of travel could potentially unlock the door to stronger bilateral ties, heightened cultural exchange, and a deeper understanding between two of the world's most populous nations.

'Normal relations with China impossible if...': EAM S Jaishankar on India-China ties

13 January 2024, Live Mint

Border dispute between India and China will continue to impact the relations between the two nations on different fronts like trade, economic, etc, clarified External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar on Saturday.

While addressing a meeting, S Jaishankar said that he has made it clear with Beijing that unless there is no firm solution on the border, and the forces will remain face-to-face, there is no possibility of normal relations between the two nations.

"I have explained to my Chinese counterpart that unless you find a solution on the border, if the forces will remain face-to-face and there will be tension, then you should not expect that the rest of the relations will go on in a normal manner, it is impossible," he said while speaking at 'Manthan': Townhall meeting in Maharashtra's Nagpur on Saturday.

During the interaction, Jaishankar discussed a range of issues related to Indian diplomacy. He also spoke about India's attempt to secure membership in the UNSC.

'World doesn't give things easily, sometimes you have to take it'

While talking about India's efforts to secure a permanent seat at the United Nations Security Council (UNSC), S Jaishankar said that over the time, more countries are showing their support for India for the UNSC.

"With each passing year, the world feels that India should be there, and I can feel that support. The world does not give things easily and generously, sometimes you have to take it," he said.

On being asked about India's participation in groupings like QUAD and BRICS, S Jaishankar beautifully explained how it is important to maintain ties with different nations in diplomacy.

"Because we are independent, we need to learn how to manage our interests by dealing with different people," said EAM Dr S Jaishankar.

To build an understanding among the public about India's foreign policy, J Shankar mentioned how people in common life try to maintain a friendly relationship with two people who might have some grudges for each other so that no one feels bad. "Just like how people visit different parties to maintain good relations with other people, I follow the same practice for India's foreign policy," said Jaishankar.

'New Delhi should stay more open-minded': China amid Maldives- India 'derogatory' remark row

08 January 2024, Live Mint

Maldives President Mohamed Muizzu has landed in China, to strengthen bilateral ties with Beijing. Muizzu, who is regarded as "pro-China", skipped a visit to India and visited China, unlike his predecessors. The China visit by the Maldivian President comes amid a row with India, wherein three ministers made 'derogatory' remarks on Prime Minister Narendra Modi for his Lakshadweep visit.

On Monday, China's state media Global Times, in an editorial, mentioned Muizzu's visit to the East Asian Nation, and referred to India's diplomatic row with the Maldives, and called for an "open-minded" approach to looking at South Asian issues.

As Indians boycott Maldives in retaliation to the derogatory remarks made on PM Modi, China highlighted in the editorial that since 2010 they have been the Maldives' largest source of tourists for 10 consecutive years.

Ties between India and Maldives took a hit when Muizzu defeated his India-friendly predecessor Ibrahim Mohamed Solih in the presidential run-off held in September.

The editorial by Global Times says China has always treated the Maldives as an equal partner and respected its sovereignty.

"It also respects the friendly and cooperative relationship between the Maldives and India, fully aware of the importance for Male to maintain good relations with New Delhi. Beijing has never asked Male to reject New Delhi because of the conflicts between China and India, nor does it view cooperation between the Maldives and India as unfriendly or a threat," the Chinese state media editorial said.

"It (China) is also willing to carry out trilateral cooperation between China, India and the Maldives. New Delhi should stay more open-minded, as China's cooperation with South Asian countries is not a zero-sum game," it said.

Muizzu's predecessors in the recent past visited India first, considering the wide-ranging bilateral ties and the Maldives' proximity to India, followed by China which has expanded its influence in the island nation by investing in major infrastructure projects there.

Muizzu, who was sworn in as President in November, chose Turkiye as his first destination for a foreign visit soon after his election followed by the UAE where he met Prime Minister Modi on the sidelines of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (COP28) on December 1 and discussed the progress of the wide-ranging bilateral ties.

"Under normal circumstances, when a new leader comes to power, they arrange their visits based on the importance and urgency of the matters to be dealt with. President Muizzu broke tradition by visiting Turkey for his first official overseas visit instead of India," Global Times said.

The Maldives is India's key maritime neighbour in the Indian Ocean Region (IOR) and occupies a special place in its initiatives like SAGAR' (Security and Growth for All in the Region) and the Neighbourhood First Policy' of the Modi government. The Maldives' proximity to India, barely 70 nautical miles from the island of Minicoy in Lakshadweep and 300 nautical miles from the mainland's western coast, and its location at the hub of commercial sea lanes running through the Indian Ocean gives it significant strategic importance.

'Boycott' Maldives call: President Mohamed Muizzu's 'India-out' policy and pro-China tilt

07 January 2024, Hindustan Times

The Maldives government later on Sunday distanced itself from derogatory remarks made by Shiuna against Modi, after former Maldives president Mohamed Nasheed urged President Mohamed Muizzu to distance the government from such comments. He said India is "instrumental" in Maldives' security and prosperity and asked Muizzu to give assurance to New Delhi that the comments don't reflect government policy.

Muizzu, who in November last year took over as president of the Indian Ocean nation made up of more than a hundred islands dotted with luxury resorts, had issued an election pledge to remove a small contingent of some 75 Indian military personnel in the country and alter the Maldives's "India-first" policy. Live Updates on row over Maldives minister's remarks

A tweet by Maldives deputy minister of youth empowerment Mariyam Shiuna days after Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to Lakshadweep has triggered a massive social media backlash, with many Indian celebrities, including actor Akshay Kumar and ex-cricketer Aakash Chopra, joining the calls to boycott the island nation.

Zahid Rameez, a member of the Progressive Party of Maldives Senate, also made controversial remarks on Modi's recent Lakshadweep visit. In one of his social media posts, he asked if India could offer better services than the Maldives.

Maldives president to visit China on January 8

Muizzu is scheduled to visit China on Monday, January 8, the Chinese foreign ministry said in a statement. Chinese President Xi Jinping invited him, China's foreign ministry spokesperson Hua Chunying said on Friday.

Asked to comment on Thursday about talk of President Muizzu making a state visit to China, New Delhi said the matter was out of its hands.

"It is for them to decide where they go and how they go about their international relations," ministry of external affairs spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal said, adding that he had no update on the removal of Indian military personnel from the islands.

While both New Delhi and Beijing are vying for influence in the region, Muizzu's government is considered to be leaning towards China.

The Maldives owes China about $1.3 billion, according to the latest International Monetary Fund

(IMF) data. China is the Maldives's largest external creditor, accounting for about 20 per cent of its total public debt.

"President Muizzu seems disinclined to continue engaging India. His actions seem directed at creating distance between Male and Delhi. He also seems keen on a close friendship with China, which should be concerning to India," Abhijit Singh, head of the Maritime Policy Initiative at the Observer Research Foundation think tank in New Delhi, told news agency Reuters.

"The president's trip to Beijing, before a visit to New Delhi, is a signal - as clear as any - that India is low on priority for this regime," he added.

'India-out' policy of President Muizzu

Unlike most of his predecessors who have visited India first after being elected, Muizzu has opted for an 'India-out' policy by choosing Turkey as his first foreign destination.

He later met Modi in the United Arab Emirates on the sidelines of COP28. The two countries have set up a core group to discuss the withdrawal of Indian troops. US Secretary of State Antony Blinken spoke with foreign minister Zameer on Thursday, the state department said in a statement.

"The Secretary reaffirmed the United States' commitment to strengthening cooperation with the Maldives, a key partner in a free, open, secure, and prosperous Indo-Pacific region," it said.

Actions taken by Maldives under Muizzu's leadership

- In a departure from its usual participation, the Maldives abstained from attending a meeting of the NSA-level Colombo Security Conclave, despite being a member-state alongside India, Sri Lanka, and Mauritius.
- Muizzu, in a reversal of his predecessor Solih's 'India First' policy, pledged to alter the Maldives' stance and opted to withdraw Indian military personnel from the island nation.
- Further signalling a shift, the Maldives chose not to renew the hydrography cooperation agreement with India, allowing it to expire on June 7, 2024.
- Originally signed in 2019, this agreement permitted India to conduct hydrographic surveys in the Maldives' territorial waters, encompassing mapping of underwater surfaces and studying reefs, lagoons, coastlines, and other physical features.

'Indeed, a major power': China's Global Times article praises India's strides under PM Modi

04 January 2024, Business Today

India's domestic and foreign situation has changed tremendously compared to four years ago and it has achieved outstanding results in economic development and social governance, said an article published in China's state-run Global Times.

The article authored by Zhang Jiadong, director of the Center for South Asian Studies at Fudan University, said India has made great achievements in economic development and its economy has gained momentum and is on track to becoming one of the fastest-growing major economies.

Jiadong said he recently visited India twice, marking his first visit in four years. During the talk with Indian representatives, he said, their attitude toward Chinese scholars was more relaxed and moderate, instead of being stubborn at times. With its rapid economic and social development, he said, India has become more strategically confident and more proactive in creating and developing a "Bharat narrative". In the diplomatic sphere, the author found, India has rapidly shifted toward a great power strategy. Jiadong said since Prime Minister Narendra Modi assumed power, he has advocated for a multi-alignment strategy, promoting India's relations with the US, Japan, Russia, and other countries. "Now, India's strategic thinking in foreign policy has undergone another change and is clearly moving toward a great power strategy," he said.

The Chinese professor noted India's stand on the Russia-Ukraine conflict and said New Delhi has distanced itself from the West and aligned itself more closely to the developing world. At the same time, he said, India's reservations about Western powers have significantly diminished, and its activities within Western countries have become more frequent, extending beyond organising large-scale diaspora events.

Jiadong referred to the country's first "Knowledge India Visitors Programme", which was organised by the Indian Council for Cultural Relations in December 2023. The programme brought together more than 77 scholars from 35 countries. During the programme, he said, External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar emphasised the importance of building a strong "Bharat narrative" and explained the "Bharat narrative" in terms of economics, development, politics, and culture.

The professor said India no longer only regards cultural tradition as a channel to achieve its own interests or as a symbol to attract foreign tourists, but also sees it as one of the pillars of India's status as a great power. He said India has always considered itself a world power, but it has only been less than 10 years since New Delhi shifted from multi-balancing to multi-alignment, "and now it is rapidly transforming toward a strategy of becoming a pole in the multipolar world".

Jiadong said that India is indeed a major power, and rapid changes in internal and external strategies pose challenges to both itself and the international community. "It appears that a transformed, stronger, and more assertive India has become a new geopolitical factor that many countries need to consider," the author said in his concluding point.

CHINA IN THE REGION

Round of Boundary Talks between China and Bhutan
Bhutanese and Chinese delegations held the 14th Expert Group Meeting (EGM) on China-Bhutan Boundary Issues in the Bhutanese capital city of Thimphu from August 20th to the 22nd. The EGM was co-chaired by Hong Liang, China's Foreign Affairs Ministry (FAM) Department of Boundary and Ocean Affairs' Director General, and Letho Tobhen Tangbi, Secretary General for the International Boundaries of Bhutan and Head of the Bhutanese Expert Group.

The 14th Expert Group Meeting on China-Bhutan Boundary Issues

Both sides "reviewed the positive progress" made in negotiations between the countries regarding demarcating the boundary in recent years. The delegations had "friendly, candid, and constructive discussions" on topics of mutual concern and interest, such as the implementation of the Three-Step Roadmap. The two sides also discussed the Joint Technical Team on the Delimitation and Demarcation of China-Bhutan Boundary's second meeting and the implementation of the Cooperation Agreement on the Functions of the Joint Technical Team on the Delimitation and Demarcation of the China-Bhutan Boundary. The talks were held in a "cordial and friendly atmosphere," reflecting the cooperative and friendly relations between China and Bhutan.

Previous Meetings on Boundary Issues

Since 1951, Bhutan shares a 296-mile (477-kilometer) border with China along the western, northern, and eastern sides of the country. However, the two countries dispute the ownership of four territories in the western, three in the northern, and one in the eastern areas of Bhutan. The country claims the Beyul Khenpajong and the Menchuma Valley in the north; Doklam, Dramana and Shakhatoe; Sinchulungpa and Langmarpo Valley; Yak chu and Charithang chu in the west; and Sakteng in the east. In the 1980s, Bhutan gave up its claim to Kula Khari, saying its original claim was due to a mapping error.

Bhutan and China held previous meetings and consultations to solve the border issue. In October 2023, the 25th Round of Boundary Talks between China and Bhutan was held in Beijing, China. FAM Vice Minister Sun Weidong led the Chinese delegation, while Foreign Affairs and External Trade Minister Tandi Dorji led the Bhutanese group. Both sides had “in- depth discussions on the boundary negotiations” and noted the progress that the EGMs made since the 24th Round of Boundary Talks held in 2016. Sun and Tandi commended the expert groups “for the work done and agreed to build on the positive momentum.”

The leaders also signed the Cooperation Agreement between the Government of the People’s Republic of China and the Government of the Kingdom of Bhutan on the Responsibilities and Functions of the Joint Technical Team on the Delimitation and Demarcation of the China-Bhutan Boundary. The team were created during the 13th EGM to assist the Expert Groups to implement the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on the Three-Step Roadmap. Both sides agreed “to continue working together to simultaneously push forward the implementation of all the steps of the roadmap. The “discussions were held in a warm and friendly atmosphere,” and both sides exchanged views on “enhancing bilateral relations and matters of mutual interest.” The Bhutanese delegation visited Chinese cultural and historical sites during the visit.

In August 2023, the two countries held the 13th EGM on the China-Bhutan Boundary Issues in Beijing. Hong and Tangbi led the delegations and co-chaired the meeting. Both sides had “candid, friendly, and constructive discussions” on the continuous implementation of the MOU on the Three-Step

Roadmap for Expediting the China-Bhutan Boundary Negotiations that built on the “consensus reached at the 12th EGM.” Bhutan and China agreed “to expedite and take simultaneous steps to implement” the Three- Step Roadmap. The 13th EGM resulted in the establishment of the Joint Technical Team (JTT) on the Delimitation of the China-Bhutan Boundary. The JTT also held its first meeting on the sidelines of the 13th EGM. Both sides agreed to maintain the “positive momentum of frequent EGMs,” to hold the 14th EGM “as soon as possible,” and to maintain “communication on holding the 25th Round of China-Bhutan Boundary Talk.” Bhutan and China Border Dispute

The border dispute between Bhutan and China began in 1912 when the Qing Dynasty was abolished and replaced with the Republic of China (RoC) and Tibet declared independence. The RoC maintained the Qing Dynasty’s claims to both Tibet and areas along the Tibetan Bhutan border. The People’s Republic of China chose to maintain the RoC’s claim to the territories after it won the Chinese Civil War in 1949 and annexed Tibet in 1951. During the 1950s, China published maps that identified the Bhutanese territories as belonging to China to support their claims. The China government also began to send People’s Liberation Army (PLA) soldiers and Tibetan herdsman to enter the disputed areas to pressure the kingdom to enter direct negotiations instead of relying on India to represent its interests. However, Bhutan began to represent itself in various international forums after it became a United Nations member in 1971.

In 1974, Bhutan invited the Chinese ambassador to India to attend the coronation of Jigme Singye Wangchuk to symbolically restart relations. The kingdom also gradually relinquished its claims to Kula Khari, a 154 square mile (398 square kilometer) area located along its border with China throughout the 1980s. Both countries also began talks to establish a bilateral relationship in 1983. In 1984, Bhutan and China began to hold annual meetings to solve the border issues. China and Bhutan discussed the possibility of trading Jakarlung and Pasamlung regions for the Doklam, Gieu, and Sinchulumpa areas in 1996, with Bhutan accepting the agreement as a general plan. However, the two countries signed an agreement where China confirmed its respect for Bhutan’s sovereignty and territorial integrity, with both sides agreeing to build up ties based on the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence in 1998.

Beginning in the mid-1990s, the incursions by Tibetan herdsman into the northern areas became significantly more aggressive, with reports of cattle theft, illegal timber harvests, and herdmen forcing Bhutanese herders to pay large taxes for grazing permissions. In 2004, the incursions by PLA soldiers also escalated tensions because they conducted patrols deeper into the disputed territory of Beyul Khenpajong. China ordered the construction of six roadways near the disputed areas along Bhutan's western border, with four of them crossing into the country. While China stopped construction of the roads after Bhutanese authorities protested, they resumed building in 2005. The two sides also did not hold any ESMs or other discussions about the border for a three-year period beginning in 2006. During this time, however, PLA soldiers conducted approximately 38 incursions along Bhutan's western borders, with Bhutan lodging at least seven diplomatic protests.

In 2012, a Chinese survey team conducted the first land and resources survey in Beyul Khenpajong, with construction beginning in 2013 after Bhutan rejected China's offers of economic aid in return for renouncing their territorial claims. In 2015, China began construction of the first road in the region that crossed into Bhutan via the Namgung La mountain pass. During this time, China also established at least four villages in the Beyul Khenpajong and Menchuma Valley. China resumed construction of a roadway near the Doklam Plateau that would reach the Indian border in 2017. The Indian military responded on behalf of Bhutan by deploying soldiers to stop the roadway's construction that led to a two-month standoff. The standoff ended when China agreed to stop construction efforts and both countries agreed to pull their troops from the area.

In 2020, China objected to the Global Environmental Facility giving Bhutan a grant for the Sakteng Wildlife Sanctuary. The sanctuary is located in eastern Bhutan, and China never included the territory in the dispute until it raised an objection. The two countries signed the MoU for the Three-Step Roadmap to expedite boundary negotiation discussions in 2021, which saw little progress because of the COVID-19 pandemic and the 2017 Doklam Standoff.

Recent Meeting Illustrates China's Use of Coercive Tactics and Bhutan's Ability to Not to Yield to Their Use

The dispute illustrates how China uses coercive tactics to gain leverage over Bhutan and force the country to give up territories that it views as having a strategic advantage in the region. China will use the dispute to increase its regional influence by forcing Bhutan to establish a diplomatic relationship with the country in return for concessions. China employs a variety of tactics to gain enough leverage against Bhutan to force the country to relinquish its claims to the four territories along its western border. The country views these lands as providing the country a strategic advantage versus India because it is located next to the Siliguri Corridor.

The corridor is a stretch of land that measures 12 to 14 miles (20 to 22 kilometers) at its narrowest point and connects India with the northeastern portion of the country. China's control over the Doklam Plateau area would allow the PLA to cut off the northeastern states from the rest of India during a conflict between the two countries over disputed areas along the Line of Actual Control (LAC). The PLA units could capture and secure the disputed areas along the LAC while mitigating the Indian military's ability to respond and reinforce units in the area.

China decided to build villages and infrastructure in the northern areas to force Bhutan to accept its terms to end the dispute. For example, China knows that Bhutan would never trade land in the Beyul Khenpajong area because of its spiritual importance to Tibetan Buddhism and the monarchy. China included Sakteng Wildlife Sanctuary in the dispute in an effort to increase the pressure on Bhutan.

China hopes that increasing the amount of land it includes in the overall dispute would eventually force the Bhutanese government to accept its terms. However, the ESMs and discussions held between the two countries illustrate Bhutan's unwillingness to accept China's terms because of the potential fallout that might occur. Bhutan would need to consult with India before signing any agreement that involves the transfer of western territories, especially Doklam. India understands the Siliguri Corridor's strategic importance and wants to prevent any agreement because it would swing the strategic advantage to China in the LAC dispute.

Bhutan would not agree to any agreement that ends the border dispute if it meant it compromises its neutrality and becomes aligned with China. For example, Bhutan understands that tying the border agreement with establishing diplomatic relations is part of the country's efforts to increase influence in the South Asia region. China would significantly increase its influence in Bhutan if the two countries established diplomatic relations with each other, which the country would use to deepen ties.

However, Bhutan understands that if the country establishes diplomatic relations with China, India will pressure it to do the same. Bhutan's decision would place the kingdom in an unfavorable position because it could no longer rely on the argument that it is a neutral country. The kingdom used the neutrality principle to govern interactions with China and India, but also with other countries, such as the United States. The foreign policy change regarding neutrality would place Bhutan in a position where it would need to choose between aligning with China or India

New township reported coming up in Lhokha in China's Tibet-border build-up

April 29, 2024, Tibetan Review

China is strengthening infrastructure close to the line of actual control (LAC) in occupied Tibet, with a major construction project taking place for a new township in Shannan (Tibetan: Lhokha), in south-eastern Tibet, reported the timesnownews.com Apr 28.

A new project is coming up in Luobusha (Tibetan: Lhunpo Zhol Township in Nagartse County) in Shannan Prefecture, a sparsely-populated part of Tibet, with less than four lakh people living in an area of about 80,000 sq km. Importantly, it is about 125 km from the LAC, roughly north of Arunachal Pradesh, the report said.

The housing project is reported to involve the construction of 164 houses to be begun next month to be ready by the end of next year. The report saw this as more evidence of China's increased emphasis on infrastructure build-up close to the LAC. A housing project could of course be for civilians and if necessary, for soldiers, it said.

The report also said that with the onset of spring, work on military infrastructure and training had begun in earnest. These were stated to include:

- The 84th aviation brigade was involved in an exercise involving the Z-19 and Z-18 helicopters.
- The 84th air defence regiment was involved in missile firing in the Aksai Chin area
- The 99th Air Brigade participated in flight training of the J-16 aircraft, a fighter similar to the Indian Air Force's Sukhoi-30. The Chinese air force began using it about ten years ago and is one of its frontline fighters.

Besides, a new 4-km road track was reported to be under construction in the Shaksgam area, which could become "pucca" in the future and may be used to link up with a labour camp in the area.

Reports have also been cited as saying infrastructure in Tashigang (Zhaaxigang), east of Ladakh, in western Tibet, was being upgraded. Located close to Tashigang is Shiquanhe (Tibetan: Sengge Khabab, the main town and administrative seat of Ngari Prefecture); here too, the upgradation of military infrastructure was reported to be evident.

Meanwhile, new Chinese dual-use 'Xiaokang' border villages are also regularly being built and older ones being "populated" along the disputed stretches of the LAC, especially in the eastern sector, to reinforce PLA positions as well as lay claim to territory, reported the timesofindia.com Apr 29.

Previous reports have noted that China has been building as many as 628 such border defence villages to fortify the borders of occupied Tibet with India and Bhutan over the last few years.

"All this clearly indicates PLA will continue to permanently station troops in forward locations along the LAC, even if eventually there is some sort of disengagement at the two major persisting face-off sites at Depsang and Demchok in eastern Ladakh," the report quoted an unnamed Indian source as saying.

There are currently 50,000 to 60,000 PLA troops with heavy weaponry forward deployed in the western (Ladakh) and central sectors (Uttarakhand, Himachal) as well as 90,000 soldiers in the eastern one (Sikkim, Arunachal), the report noted.

Chinese academic warns Bhutan's India-bonhomie is inimical to Tibet-border talks

30 March 2024, Tibetan Review

The heightened level of bonhomie seen in India-Bhutan relations in recent times has prompted a Chinese academic to warn that it could have "obvious and direct" impacts on China's efforts to resolve its long-running occupied-Tibet border dispute with the Himalayan kingdom. During his visit to Bhutan last week, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi reaffirmed a partnership that "is not limited to land and water". He doubled India's Five-Year Plan assistance to Bhutan to more than $1 billion; was hosted a private dinner by King Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck at his Lingkana Palace; and became the first foreigner to be honoured with the Order of the Druk Gyalpo, or Dragon King, Bhutan's most prestigious civilian award.

Modi's Mar 22-23 trip came just a week after Bhutan's Prime Minister Tshering Tobgay, newly elected in Jan 2024, held talks in Delhi with top Indian leaders.

Tshering Tobgay's predecessor Lotay Tshering was seen as being overly anxious to settle the Tibet-border dispute with China, which likely involves land swaps that would gravely compromise India's security concerns, although he sought to allay any such concern.

Anyhow, Lotay Tshering made it clear that the border dispute could be settled soon – in the next two or so rounds of talks between the two sides – which was seen as having given rise to misgivings in New Delhi. But in light of recent developments, Lin Minwang, deputy director of the Centre for South Asian Studies at Fudan University in Shanghai, has said the impact on Chinese-Bhutan border talks could be "obvious and direct". "We have seen some momentum since 2020 and the negotiations have achieved significant progress," the scmp.com Mar 29 quoted Lin as saying. "The two sides are (a)waiting for an opportunity of breakthrough but now I think there could be some changes."

But it has never been clear how far the border negotiations had advanced since neither Beijing nor Thimphu disclosed details. Nevertheless, the report noted that in an interview with The Hindu last year, then-Bhutanese prime minister Lotay Tshering – considered a China-friendly figure – had said that the two countries were “inching towards the completion” of a three-step road map on boundary delineation. A land swap involving the Bhutan-controlled Doklam area was stated to be among the proposals, although Bhutan made it clear that any such talks should necessarily involve India as an interested party.

China first proposed a “package deal” in 1996 to trade Jakarlung and Pasamlung for a smaller tract of disputed area around Doklam, Sinchulumpa and Gieu, but Bhutan backed off. In 1998, the two sides instead signed an agreement to pause negotiations, pending further talks, the report noted.

Reflecting Beijing’s thinking and hope, Lin has said the territorial disputes between China and Bhutan were “not that big in principle”.

“The core issue is if Bhutan has made up its mind to resolve the disputes – and if it is willing to defy India.”

Despite Bhutan’s assurances, India is seen as being deeply wary of any land swap, which would give China a strategic advantage in the Doklam plateau. The plateau is close to the Siliguri Corridor a strip of land that is around 20km (14 miles) wide at its narrowest point that connects India’s eight northeastern states as well as a part of West Bengal to the rest of the country. Such a swap could expand India’s vulnerabilities to the Chinese in occupied Tibet, with the two Asian powers already at loggerheads over their disputed Himalayan borders stretching over more than three thousand kilometres. After comments by Lotay Tshering (prime minister from 2013 to 2018 on a possible land swap with Beijing, there were discussions in India about whether Thimphu was struggling to reach a deal without Delhi’s backing; and the former prime minister had to clarify that there was no change in position by Bhutan, the report said.

In broader terms, while India’s relation with China has remained soured since the 2020 violent border clashes along the Ladakh border, the latter has steadily pushed for closer ties with other South Asian nations, including Sri Lanka, the Maldives and Bangladesh, Pakistan and Nepal, hosting their leaders in Beijing and financing a number of infrastructure projects in the region.

China’s United Front takes Taiwanese youth on Xinjiang trips

27 December 2024, RFA, Ha Syut and Ray Chung

A delegation of Taiwanese businesspeople visits northwestern China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, Aug. 2024. (China News Service)

Organizers are accused of ‘whitewashing’ the Chinese Communist Party’s human rights record in the Uyghur homeland.

China’s United Front influence and outreach operations are recruiting children and young adults in democratic Taiwan for heavily subsidized tours to the northwestern region of Xinjiang, in a bid to distract them from widespread human rights abuses in the region, according to commentators and government officials.

The Chinese Communist Party, which has never ruled Taiwan, insists that the island submit to “unification” under Beijing’s rule, whether by through its soft power and propaganda operations, or by military force, if necessary.

Its “soft power” operation has already targeted the island’s social media influencers and celebrities with paid junkets, while key ally and former Taiwanese President Ma Ying-jeou met with Chinese President Xi Jinping in April, throwing his political influence behind Beijing’s narrative that Taiwan is a renegade Chinese province rather than a sovereign country.

Now, it seems Beijing is going after children and younger people directly, enlisting them on tours to Xinjiang that take participants on a whistle-stop tour of the Chinese Communist Party’s favorite stereotypes about the millions of Turkic-speaking Uyghurs and Kazakhs who live there, complete with dancing Uyghurs and barbecued meat.

The Xinjiang Provincial Federation of Taiwan Compatriots, a United Front organization based in Urumqi, recently advertised a nine-day tour to Xinjiang on Taiwan's PTT Bulletin Board discussion forum, calling for participants aged 16-40.

When Radio Free Asia contacted the organizers, they said participants would only need to pay NT$24,800 (US$755) per person, with "tour fees, transportation, accommodation and insurance all covered by the Chinese hosts."

As well as travel documents, participants would need to share their Taiwanese ID card numbers, their educational background, their company and department, an emergency contact and a mobile phone number before they could be accepted onto the trip, they said.

'Find out for themselves'

Meanwhile, the Taiwanese volunteer nonprofit group Waker, which sends volunteers around the world, has been criticized on social media for sending groups of volunteers to Xinjiang, with some comments accusing them of whitewashing the mass incarceration of millions of Uyghurs in "re-education" camps and forced labor facilities since 2017.

Waker replied to the comments on Instagram and Facebook, saying it "had never heard of anyone being exploited" in Xinjiang, and called on people to travel to Xinjiang to "find out for themselves."

The charity has close ties to the Chinese Communist Party, according to reports in Chinese state media. Its founder Shen Yangyang is the daughter of former Kuomintang general Shen Tsui, and has been running "poverty alleviation" programs in remote rural areas of China since 2004.

The group will soon be led by Shen's son Chu Yung-Hsiang, who led a 46-member youth delegation to Xinjiang in November under the aegis of the Straits Economic and Cultural Interchange Association that was also attended by Chinese Communist Party United Front officials.

'Spiritual unity of compatriots'

Taiwan has never been ruled by Beijing, nor formed part of the People's Republic of China, and is formally governed by the Republic of China government, formed after the 1911 fall of the Qing Dynasty under Sun Yat-sen, which later fled to Taipei after losing the civil war to Mao Zedong's communists on the mainland.

While China insists on eventual "unification" with Taiwan, by armed invasion if necessary, the majority of Taiwan's 23 million people have no wish to give up their democratic way of life to submit to Chinese rule.

China has threatened the death penalty for supporters of Taiwan independence, while Taipei says Beijing has no jurisdiction over the actions of its citizens.

A recent public opinion poll from the Institute for National Defense and Security Research showed that 67.8% of respondents were willing to fight to defend Taiwan in the event of a Chinese invasion.

China's aim is to underline the "spiritual unity of compatriots on both sides of the Taiwan Strait," and Beijing sees "uniting Taiwan compatriots and winning the hearts and minds of Taiwanese people" as a "fundamental driving force for unification," according to an Oct. 16 article by politics professor Wu Guoguang for the Asia Society.

"Ordinary Taiwanese citizens are viewed as 'family members' of an imagined reunified China, Taiwan's political elites who oppose Taiwanese independence are 'friends,' and whoever supports independence are 'enemies'," Wu wrote.

Planting an illusion

Taiwanese national security analyst Shih Chien-yu said the trips are a way of undermining the reporting of China's human rights abuses in Xinjiang.

"These people may have heard about the re-education camps in Xinjiang, and they may have heard the idea that this is genocide," Shih told RFA in a recent interview. "But when they visit, they won't see any of these things."

"That will plant the illusion that nothing bad ever actually happened in Xinjiang, which is exactly what the Chinese Communist Party wants them to think," he said.

Waker hadn't responded to repeated requests for comment by the time of writing.

The Taiwan government's Mainland Affairs Council said it continues to be concerned about such trips, which it termed "false exchanges" masking United Front infiltration.

"The Chinese Communist Party is trying to lure people from Taiwan, particularly young people, to China on sightseeing trips ... to whitewash its human rights abuses," it said in a response to a query from RFA.

"The public shouldn't cooperate with this United Front propaganda by the Chinese Communist Party for personal gain, nor belittle the sovereign status of our country," it said.

Yet, the trips still seem popular.

In May, a 46-member delegation of Taiwan's Industrial and Commercial Construction Research Association visited Xinjiang on an "exchange," Chinese state media reported.

They were warmly welcomed on May 18 by Li Fuqiang, deputy director of the United Front Work Department of the Xinjiang Party Committee.

Hsiao Yu-lin, leader of the visiting delegation, said the group could "get a sense of the great socioeconomic achievements Xinjiang has made."

"I ... recommend more Taiwan compatriots visit Xinjiang to further promote in-depth exchanges and integration," Hsiao was quoted as saying in an official report.

Political agenda

But not everyone just swallows Beijing's narrative, hook, line and sinker.

Hsiao Hau-yu took a two-week trip to Xinjiang in 2019 while he was in high school at the invitation of Beijing's Taiwan Affairs Office, alongside about 40 students from Hong Kong and Macau, with a similar itinerary to those recently advertised for young people.

"The itinerary was very full, with less than an hour of free time after lunch or dinner," Hsiao remembered in a recent interview with RFA Cantonese. "They took us to a vineyard to see some big, very beautiful grapes, and some very happy local farmers who gave us Xinjiang barbecue."

But Hsiao also spotted a political agenda, with propaganda suggesting that Xinjiang had been settled by majority Han Chinese from ancient times, and plenty of assurances that the region was "very safe."

"Their strong desire to create a sense of security made me nervous," Hsiao said. "The police were carrying pretty big weapons on the street, and we had to go through a security detection scan to go onto public transportation or into our hotel."

"I still remember there was a guy in sunglasses I'd never seen before following behind the whole time on our trip to the ancient city," he said. "I don't know who he was, but he followed us and made sure we didn't break away from the group."

He said he was told that the security measures were to prevent "terrorist" attacks, and warned participants not to have private contact with any residents of the region.

On a trip to a local school, he still remembers a general sense of unease, and in particular a slogan written up on the blackboard by students: "Where darkness arises, sweep it away; where evil arises, eliminate it; where chaos arises, govern it."

"It's hard to imagine that this was written by a child of maybe 10 or 12 years old," he said. "They were writing this stuff before they could even speak Mandarin well."

He said Taiwanese could still benefit from such trips, if they don't lose their capacity to think critically.

"I still think we should go if we have the chance," he said. "Just don't accept everything they try to tell you."

Digging of 46 illegal wells by Chinese migrants threatens Xinjiang's ecological balance: Report

25 December 2024, ANI

The discovery of 46 illegal wells dug by Chinese migrants in the remote Xinjiang region has heightened tensions with Uyghur residents and disturbed the region's ecological balance, as reported by Radio Free Asia.

Water disputes have long been a point of contention between native Uyghurs and Chinese settlers, particularly in regions controlled by the state-run Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps (XPCC), known as Bingtuan.

This organisation, which is responsible for land development, border security, and maintaining stability in the region, is predominantly made up of Han Chinese.

The issue came to light after residents in Korla, Xinjiang's second-largest city, raised alarms about a surge in illegal wells on the city's outskirts. These wells reportedly dug to irrigate cotton and vegetables, have drained vital underground water reserves.

Authorities launched an investigation after the complaints were filed. A source in Xinjiang, speaking anonymously for security reasons, confirmed that 46 illegal wells were uncovered this year in Korla alone.

The individuals responsible for drilling the wells are primarily from the 29th Battalion of the Bingtuan's 2nd Division, along with other Chinese settlers residing in a nearby economic development zone.

Despite ongoing efforts to address the issue, a police officer involved in the investigation told Radio Free Asia that legal proceedings have been slow, and suspects were released after brief questioning. The officer added that authorities used "stability" and "unity" to justify the lack of punitive action.

The difficulty in holding the perpetrators accountable stems from the fact that many of the individuals involved are Han Chinese, complicating the legal process. The Bingtuan, which has played a key role in promoting Han Chinese dominance in Xinjiang, is seen as a major factor in the marginalisation of Uyghurs and other indigenous ethnic groups.

Tensions are already high, and the illegal wells have further strained relations between the two communities, amplifying existing grievances over water access and resource distribution in the region.

Reinvestigation: Better lives in Xinjiang villages refute "forced labor" allegations

26 December 2024, Xinhua

When Zhou Jin'an returned to the village he once worked in for years in southern Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, he was warmly received by the villagers, who shook hands with him and invited him to their homes for a chat over tea.

Zhou used to be a member of the residential work team in that village. Such teams are groups of personnel, either from regional government departments or state-run enterprises, dispatched to poor rural areas to help boost local development.

Earlier this year, The Economist published an article claiming that work teams in Xinjiang villages sought to compel local Uygur farmers to seek alternative employment. However, such allegations, hyped by Western media in recent years, unravel when one observes the interactions between local farmers and Zhou and his colleagues.

"THEY HELPED EVERY HOUSEHOLD"

In early 2015, Zhou, who works for a state-run company, was dispatched to work in a village in Yutian, a county on the southern edge of the Taklamakan Desert and among the last counties in Xinjiang to eliminate absolute poverty in late 2020.

At that time, Zhou could not imagine he would work and live for over eight years in villages in Yutian. Almost all residents there are Uygur farmers, who traditionally earn a living by growing wheat, corn, and roses and raising sheep and poultry.

"We brought agricultural experts to guide the villagers in farming. We built vegetable greenhouses and a small processing plant for local produce, such as roses and cistanche, a Chinese herbal medicine. We would help all households that had difficulties. That was what we were there to do," said Zhou.

This photo taken on Nov. 6, 2024 shows villagers drying cistanche deserticola, a Chinese herbal medicine, near Daliyabuyi Village, Yutian County of northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region. (Xinhua/Chen Shuo)

Zhou was part of an eight-member team working in a village of around 1,600 residents. One daily routine was visiting households so that he could get to know what assistance they needed.

Since many middle-aged and elderly villagers were not fluent in Mandarin, Zhou's Uygur colleagues would translate for him. Sometimes, younger members of the household would translate. Rayila Matturzi was one of them.

The 25-year-old, the eldest of four siblings, was a high school student when Zhou and his colleagues came to work in her village.

With her mother farming at home and her father doing construction work, Rayila's parents brought in a limited income, while her younger brother was diagnosed with epilepsy, a chronic disease that requires long-term treatment.

"The work team did so much for my family. They contacted a hospital for my younger brother, funded his treatment and my studies, and always came to see us with things like flour, meat, and the medicines my brother needed. And it was not just for my family. They helped every household in the village," said Rayila, now a senior student majoring in English at a university near Urumqi, Xinjiang's capital.

She was especially grateful to Zhou. "Every time Uncle Zhou came to my home, he would ask about my life and studies and encourage me. He would say, 'If you need any help, just tell me.' I really liked sharing my stories with him. All the villagers think he is a great man," she said.

To support Rayila's family, Zhou helped her mother secure a part-time job as a cleaner, providing an additional source of income. Earlier this year, through a friend's recommendation, Rayila's mother began working as a cook at her son's school, where the canteen staff are all from low-income households, as part of a program to support these families.

"My family is much better off now. All the villagers are better off now. Everything in the village has been improved – the roads, the houses, the school, the health facilities," said Rayila. "Without the work team, there would not have been such great changes."

Tuersun Aibai, an associate professor at the School of Journalism and Communication at Xinjiang University, who has been studying social changes in southern Xinjiang, said that those work teams have been serving the local people and boosting the development of rural areas "with a pure intention and concrete achievements."

The recognition and support of local people of all ethnic groups testifies to that, he added.

"EVERYONE WANTS A BETTER LIFE"

Rayila was surprised by Western media allegations that work teams in Xinjiang villages forced "reluctant farmers to leave and do other forms of work."

"That is ridiculous. We earn money on our own and spend it for ourselves. Everyone wants a better life," she said. "The work team would help those looking for a job to find one that matches their skills. But we don't need to be 'forced' to work. Why would they talk about us like that?"

Rayila noted that Uygur people, particularly the younger generation, are keen to seek employment instead of relying solely on farming at home. "Most villagers want to find a job nearby or in the county town. Some young people even explore opportunities in big cities or other provinces," she said.

Official statistics show that the Uygur population in Xinjiang, concentrated in the southern part of the region, increased by 16.2 percent to 11.62 million from 2010 to 2020. Yan Xueqin, an associate professor at the School of History and Society at Xinjiang Normal University, said most of the Uygur population had long been farmers despite scarce arable land in southern Xinjiang, where the landscape features vast deserts and mountains.

"The per capita arable land in southern Xinjiang has become even smaller, and the added value of farm products there is still low. Farming alone cannot help improve the living standards of the local people. That's one reason locals seek other forms of work to supplement their incomes," Yan said in a report.

Yan's team surveyed 3,028 rural Uygur households in southern Xinjiang in 2020 and 2021 and found that their incomes had improved and diversified, with wage incomes making up the highest proportion at 41.5 percent, followed by household-based farming incomes at 33.7 percent.

Across China, rural residents have long been moving in huge numbers to cities and towns to work. The trend has gained momentum among the Uygur population, with a younger generation more fluent in Mandarin, better educated, and willing to seek opportunities in more developed areas.

Rayila has observed the trend. "A young couple in my village who once worked in Hubei (a central Chinese province) asked me to help them improve their Mandarin," she said. "They told me that they wanted to return to work and live there because they enjoyed working and living in a developed city."

Zhou noted the changes in the lifestyles of his fellow Uygur villagers. "With higher incomes, people now like to refurbish their homes, enjoy better food and dress well, and want to provide their children with a better education and brighter future," he said.

Chinese surveillance tech firm Dahua exits projects in Xinjiang

24 December 2024, SCMP

The company was added to a US trade blacklist in 2019 on claims it aided in human rights abuses in Xinjiang

China's video surveillance equipment maker Zhejiang Dahua Technology said that it and its subsidiaries have agreed to terminate or exit five projects they signed with local governments in China's Xinjiang region, a stock exchange filing showed on Monday. Some of the projects, awarded between 2016 and 2017, have been terminated in advance, while others were still in operation, Dahua said in a filing to the Shenzhen Stock Exchange.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

The company will cease operating the projects and proceed with asset disposal and debt resolution works, it said. Dahua did not give a reason for the withdrawal.

Dahua's statement came after another Chinese surveillance camera manufacturer, Hikvision, said earlier this month it had exited contracts with five local governments in Xinjiang. It also did not say at the time why it was pulling out.

The US added Dahua and seven other tech firms to its trading blacklist in 2019 for allegedly being "implicated" in "repression and hi-tech surveillance" against Uygurs and other members of Muslim minorities in Xinjiang.

Dahua had said the US decision lacked "any factual basis."

The Chinese government has repeatedly rejected allegations of human rights abuses in Xinjiang and has criticised or targeted companies for removing firms operating in the region from their supply chains.

Illegal wells in Xinjiang spark tension and dry up the land

24 December 2024, RFA, Shohret Hoshur

Fighting over water resources has been a source of friction between Uyghurs and Han Chinese.

The discovery of 46 illegal wells dug by Chinese migrants in the far western region of Xinjiang has intensified tension with Uyghur residents and disrupted the ecological balance of the region, people with knowledge of the situation told Radio Free Asia.

Fighting over water resources has been a source of friction for years between native Uyghurs and Chinese settlers in areas under the control of the state-run Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, or XPCC, called Bingtuan in Chinese.

Authorities investigated after residents in Korla, or Kuerle in Chinese, the second-largest city in Xinjiang, complained about the proliferation of wells on the outskirts of the city, a source in Xinjiang said, asking not to be identified for security reasons.

The wells, dug to grow cotton and vegetables, have drained vital underground reserves, he said.

As a result, authorities discovered 46 illegally drilled holes this year alone in Korla, a policeman in Bayingholin prefecture's Public Security Bureau who had participated in this case in its early phase told Radio Free Asia.

The residents accused of drilling the holes without a permit are from the 29th Battalion of the Bingtuan's 2nd Division and Chinese settlers living in an economic development region on the outskirts of Korla, the officer said.

"We have been working on water management, water control, and identifying water wells since February, and we continue to work on those issues," the police officer said.

Little accountability

But legal authorities have slowed down reviewing the cases, and the suspects were released after brief questioning, the Uyghur source said, with officials using "stability" and "unity" as excuses to let them go.

Authorities could not hold all perpetrators accountable because the activities likely involved Han Chinese, he said.

The Bingtuan is a state-run economic and paramilitary organization of mostly Han Chinese who develop the land, secure borders and maintain stability in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, or XUAR, where about 12 million mostly Muslim Uyghurs live.

Made up of 14 divisions, the Bingtuan is one of the foremost institutions of Han dominance and marginalization of Uyghurs and other indigenous ethnic groups in the region, according to the Uyghur Human Rights Project.

The well-drilling began in 2012 when demand for cotton surged, the Uyghur source told RFA.

Those who stole the water conducted their activities at night using advanced technology to pump it from a depth of 200 meters, or about 660 feet, he said.

"Since they drill these wells in a forested area, a place that people hardly go, it was hard to discover their illegal activities," the Uyghur source said.

It costs about 150,000 yuan (US$20,600) to drill a well and make it operational, he said, an amount that Uyghurs would not likely be able to come up with.

Though the issue has sparked friction many times before, the government has protected the Han Chinese residents, he said.

The policeman initially said there were some Uyghurs among those held responsible, but when pressed for further information, he said most of those who drilled the illegal wells were Chinese who had settled in the area, including Bingtuan workers.

Staff at relevant government organization in Korla contacted by RFA declined to answer questions, but did not deny that Chinese settlers there had stolen water.

Drying up the land

The growing dependence on groundwater in the Korla area since the 1990s has reached a level that is disrupting the ecological balance, said the source familiar with the situation.

"We must control this or it will lead to a further decline in groundwater levels," he said. "In some areas of our protective forests, the Euphrates poplars are withering and drying up."

Peyzulla Zeydin, an ecological devastation researcher from Korla who now lives in the United States, told RFA that the misuse of water resources, including underground water, has severely impacted the region's protective forests over time.

"In the 1990s, when we dug water wells, we could find water at just 10 meters," he said. "Now, even at 30 meters, we can't find water."

"It's getting worse because the underground water recycling system has been disrupted," Zeydin said. "One of the main causes of the declining water levels is the growing population and the over-expansion of farmland. This has interrupted the natural underground water replenishment cycle."

Zeydin said research indicates that the Bingtuan's 1st Division battalions in the Korla area have overused and controlled the water resources there, leading to the drying up of Euphrates poplar trees along the lower streams of the Tarim River.

"The water level is dropping every day, and it has now reached a depth of 100 meters [330 feet]," he said.

Chinese agricultural products linked to Uyghur forced labour, report suggests

21 December 2024, ANI

Chinese exports of agricultural products such as tomatoes, chilli peppers, and marigolds from the Xinjiang region are tainted by forced labour and land transfers from Uyghur peasants to Chinese businesses, as highlighted by a new research report.

According to Radio Free Asia, the 136-page report, authored by Adrian Zenz and I-Lin Lin from the Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation, highlighted the forced assimilation and political indoctrination of Uyghur workers involved in the cultivation of these products.

The report also exposes the role of major Western companies, including Kraft Heinz, Nestle, PepsiCo, Del Monte, McCormick, Unilever, and L'Oreal, which import these goods. The goods often enter supply chains through intermediaries, obscuring their origins. The report identified 72 international companies and 18 Chinese firms that either have production in Xinjiang or are linked to the region's agricultural supply chains.

Adrian Zenz, one of the researchers, told Radio Free Asia that the extensive use of forced labour and coerced land transfers in Xinjiang is directly serving the Chinese government's political goals, including the long-term transformation of the Uyghur population. These practices are also contaminating global supply chains.

Zenz emphasised in an interview with RFA, "It means that we have a much bigger system of forced labour and forced land transfer that is affecting many agricultural communities in Xinjiang and is directly serving the political goals of the regime to achieve political long-term transformation of these populations and taint the supply chains as a result."

Among the implicated Chinese companies are COFCO Tunhe Tomato, Xinjiang Chalkis (which processes tomatoes and fruits), and Chenguang Biotech Group, a high-tech firm specialising in plant-based ingredients. These companies have subsidiaries in the United States and Europe, further complicating the traceability of their products.

The report also draws attention to the ongoing human rights abuses in Xinjiang, including the mass detainment of Uyghur Muslims and the use of forced labour. It states that Xinjiang is home to the world's largest state-imposed forced labour system, with up to 2.5 million Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities at risk of coerced labour. (ANI)

West urged to lift Xinjiang sanctions

18 December 2024, ECNS

International experts are urging Western countries, including the United States, to lift sanctions against the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region, claiming the measures are based on unsubstantiated allegations of "forced labor" and have caused widespread job losses.

The comments were made on Monday during the International Symposium on Employment and Social Security in Xinjiang, held in Urumqi, the regional capital. More than 210 representatives from 44 countries, regions and organizations attended the event.

According to Xinjiang's regional government, by the end of 2023, sanctions had disrupted operations at more than 100 local enterprises. Sanctioned textile and garment factories were forced to cut production or shut down entirely, resulting in significant layoffs. Despite the challenges, Xinjiang continues to trade with 192 countries and regions, officials said.

Erkin Tuniyaz, chairman of Xinjiang's regional government, described employment as fundamental to improving livelihoods and said the region is committed to protecting workers' rights under the law.

"Some anti-China forces have ignored these facts and spread baseless accusations about so-called 'forced labor,'" Erkin said. "These unilateral sanctions are despicable acts, and their motives are becoming increasingly clear to the international community."

The sanctions have particularly affected Xinjiang's cotton, textile, tomato, photovoltaic and chemical industries, all of which are highly mechanized, officials said.

Experts at the symposium argued that allegations of "forced labor" are based on internet rumors and statements from anti-China groups, lacking legal or factual basis.

Alena Douhan, the United Nations special rapporteur on the negative impact of unilateral coercive measures, criticized the sanctions and said they represent a reversal of the burden of proof.

"Anything associated with Xinjiang is now accused of being linked to 'forced labor,' and the accused must prove their innocence," Douhan said via video link. "I call on the sanctioning parties to lift and suspend all unilateral sanctions applied to China, its nationals and companies without the authorization of the UN Security Council."

Mark Levine, a U.S. sociologist and professor at Minzu University of China, said the claims contradict his own experiences in Xinjiang.

"I have seen how the Chinese government has worked to improve the lives of its people over the past 19 years," said Levine, who has lived in China since 2005 and has visited Xinjiang three times. "Through my travels to cities and the countryside, I witnessed the successful eradication of extreme poverty."

Li Juan, director of the legislative affairs committee of the regional people's congress, said the sanctions target basic industries essential to Xinjiang's development.

"Unilateral sanctions under the pretext of 'forced labor' are depriving people of all ethnic groups in Xinjiang of their right to employment," Li said.

China Demolishes Uyghur Business Landmark in Xinjiang

15 December 2024, Shia Waves

Reports emerged that the Chinese government has demolished the Rebiya Kadeer Trade Center in Urumqi, Xinjiang, a significant site for Uyghur culture and commerce, VOA revealed on Friday.

Once home to over 800 mostly Uyghur-owned businesses, the center had been vacant since 2009. Local business owners were reportedly ordered to vacate the area prior to the demolition, which was conducted without public announcement.

This action has drawn condemnation from Uyghur rights activists, who view it as part of China's ongoing efforts to suppress Uyghur identity and heritage. The demolition coincides with increasing international scrutiny of China's policies in Xinjiang, with allegations of mass detentions and cultural erasure being labeled as crimes against humanity.

Rebiya Kadeer, the center's namesake and a prominent Uyghur rights advocate, described the demolition as a calculated effort to erase her legacy. After being imprisoned for her activism, Kadeer has lived in exile in the U.S. since 2005, continuing her fight for Uyghur rights. She reported that her family members have faced persecution, including detention, as a result of her activism. The Chinese government.

county – in the heart of the Taklimakan – using micro-organisms to transform a local saline lake into a usable water source.

Last year, the investors began cultivating about 2 million pearl oysters, and they aim to begin selling their first pearls during the second half of 2025.

According to local media, Xinjiang's unique climate – with its huge temperature swings between night and day, and its long hours of sunshine – is excellent for pearl farming, as the pearls develop a rich lustre and texture.

The cultured pearls also have a side benefit of helping improve the water quality of local lakes, reducing water treatment costs for aqua farms in Xinjiang.

Xinjiang produced 184,000 tonnes (405.7 million pounds) of aquatic products worth 3.86 billion yuan (US$530 million) last year, according to local government data.

By 2025, the local government predicts that the output value of Xinjiang's entire aquaculture industry will reach about 20 billion yuan.

China wants to turn Xinjiang's vast deserts into a string of pearls

29 November 2024, SCMP, He Huifeng

Millions of pearls are already being harvested in the Taklimakan Desert, as China tries to turn the arid region into a hub for aquaculture

Millions of pearls are being artificially cultivated in the deserts of the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region, as China pushes forward with an ambitious plan to turn the arid region into a hub for aquaculture.

The pearl farming project was first launched in 2022, but only recently attracted public attention in China when a video of a local farmer showing off a fistful of pearls went viral on social media, state news agency Xinhua reported.

Chinese authorities have been encouraging private investment in aquaculture across China's northwestern provinces since 2017, with companies using innovative techniques to convert the water inside the region's saline-alkaline lakes into artificial seawater.

Salmon, lobster, shrimp and tilapia are already being farmed on an industrial scale in lakes dotted across the Taklimakan Desert – a vast desert in Xinjiang known as the "Sea of Death" – and "produced in Xinjiang" seafood is being used by restaurants in many Chinese cities.

Now, efforts are under way to harvest pearls in the area. Investors from southern China have reportedly established a seafood breeding base in Qiemo

Uniqlo criticised in China after BBC report of CEO's Xinjiang comments

29 November 2024, SCMP, Eduardo Baptista and Casey Hall

Casual wear giant Uniqlo is facing a storm of online criticism in China after a BBC report quoted the chief executive of its owner as saying the company does not source cotton from the far western region of Xinjiang.

The British Broadcasting Corporation published an interview on Thursday with Tadashi Yanai, the chief executive of Fast Retailing (9983.T), opens new tab, in which it asked him if the Japanese retailer sourced cotton from the region.

The report went viral on Chinese social media platform Weibo on Friday, with several users slamming the company and some saying they would stop buying its products.

"With this kind of attitude from Uniqlo, and their founder being so arrogant, they're probably betting that mainland consumers will forget about it in a few days and continue to buy," one user wrote. "So, can we stand firm this time?"

In the interview, Yanai initially responds to the BBC's question saying, "We're not using," before interrupting himself to say he did not want to continue his answer as it was "too political".

Fast Retailing did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The issue of sourcing from Xinjiang, where rights groups and the U.S. government accuse China of abuses against the Uyghur population, has been a geopolitical minefield for foreign firms with a large presence in China.

Beijing denies any abuses in the region, the origin of the vast majority of Chinese-produced cotton.

In 2021, Uniqlo's rival, H&M, faced a consumer boycott in China for a statement on its website that expressed concern about accusations of forced labour in Xinjiang and said it would no longer source cotton from there.

H&M saw its stores removed from major e-commerce platforms and its store locations moved from map apps in China as it bore the brunt of consumer anger at companies refusing to source cotton from Xinjiang. Other Western brands such as Nike, Puma, Burberry, Adidas and more were also caught up in the controversy.

In September, China's commerce ministry launched an investigation into PVH, the parent company of Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger.

In a statement it said PVH was suspected of "unjustly boycotting" Xinjiang cotton and other products "without factual basis".

PVH has said it will respond in accordance with relevant regulations, media reported.

In 2020, Fast Retailing said it did not make any products in Xinjiang. However, Yanai has refrained in recent years from discussing the subject in other media interviews, saying Uniqlo wanted to stay neutral.

China is Fast Retailing's biggest overseas market and it has more than 900 stores on the mainland. Greater China, including Taiwan and Hong Kong, accounts for more than a fifth of its revenue.

Ben Cavender, managing director at Shanghai-based China Market Research Group said Uniqlo's sales had held up well during the current weakness in its economy.

But that Chinese consumers would vote with their wallets if they felt a brand was being disrespectful to their country or culture, he added.

"It's too soon to tell if there will be lasting damage but losing even a small number of consumers over this will not be helpful, given how challenging things are for the apparel industry right now."

Asked about Yanai's reported comments at a press briefing on Friday, Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said she hoped "companies can eliminate political pressure and bad interference and independently make business decisions in line with their own interests".

Xinjiang's forced labour: Volkswagen and Uniqlo's take a step back

28 November 2024, PIME Asia News

New supply chain regulations adopted by the United States and the European Union are forcing many companies to take a stand on the issue of Uyghur exploitation. The German automaker sold its controversial Urumqi plant "for economic reasons", but it is still renewing its business plans in China. The Japanese clothing brand says that it does not use cotton from Xinjiang.

After BASF, Volkswagen too has decided to leave Xinjiang, in the wake of accusations that Uyghurs have been used as forced labour in building a test track for cars. Yesterday's announcement by the German carmaker officially cites "economic reasons" related to plans to reorganise its presence in China.

This marks an important victory for groups fighting for the rights of the Muslim minority, which has been subjected to harsh repressive government policies in Xinjiang, China's westernmost province, for more than ten years.

For Volkswagen, China is a key market, currently selling four out of every 10 cars produced in its plants globally. But it now finds itself caught up in the clash between China and the European Union over tariffs on imports of electric cars, as well as with its own internal crisis.

In Xinjiang, the automaker was facing the Forced Labour Regulation adopted by the European Union on 19 November; although much less clear-cut than the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act adopted by the United States in 2021, it would still have put the Urumqi plant in difficulty.

In addition, as AsiaNews reported a few weeks ago, the study commissioned by Volkswagen that exonerated its Chinese subsidiary from forced labour charges turned out to be deeply flawed, since it was impossible to investigate freely in the region.

In the end, Volkswagen decided to sell the plant that it opened in Xinjiang in 2012 at Beijing's request, and the related track; both will go to Shanghai-based SMVIC, a company that deals with tests on cars produced in China.

In the meantime, the German car manufacturer has extended until 2040 a joint venture with Saic Motor, its Chinese partner. The agreement provides for 18 new Volkswagen and Audi car models to arrive on the market by the end of the decade, 15 exclusive to the local market.

The goal is to recover positions by returning to sell four million cars a year in China by 2030, a market share of 15 per cent. Far from Xinjiang, but certainly inside the People's Republic.

The sale of the German automaker's plant does not, however, end the broader question of Uyghur slave labour in products that flood markets around the world.

According to the Coalition to End Forced Labour in the Uyghur Region, the apparel and footwear industry is one sector heavily dependent on unfree labour since Xinjiang accounts for about 23 per cent of the world's cotton production, but is also involved in making solar panel components and growing tomatoes.

Meanwhile, Uniqlo, a Japanese casual wear designer and retailer, announced for the first time that it does not use cotton from the Uyghur region in its products.

This step is clearly dictated by new regulations, which are forcing many groups present on international markets to address any ambiguity concerning their workers; this is especially the case with existing US legislation, which requires companies to prove that their supply chains are not linked to Uyghur forced labour.

A few days ago, the Biden administration added another 29 groups to its Entity List, which covers companies whose imports are not allowed into the United States under the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act.

Overall, more than 100 companies have already been excluded from the US market suspected of using Uyghur forced labour, in sectors ranging from agriculture and mining to steel and digital technologies.

Uniqlo's statement is significant because its founder and president Tadashi Yanai had always refused to speak on the matter, until now that it, claiming that he wanted to remain "neutral" in the trade war between the United States and China.

The Japanese's company strong presence in the Chinese market weighs heavily on what might happen, especially since it has more stores in China than in Japan itself. This has raised fears that that its stance on the Xinjiang issue might have negative repercussions, sparking, for example, nationalist boycotts, like with other major brands in the sector.

Great wall of Taklamakan: China surrounds its largest desert with giant green belt

28 November 2024, SCMP, Victoria Bela

Just completed multi-decade project in Xinjiang region is intended to help prevent desertification and boost local economies

China's largest desert, and the world's second-largest sand-shifting desert – is now surrounded by a green belt of various trees and shrubs, as well as a solar-based sand blocking technology.

The encirclement of the Taklamakan Desert in China's northwestern Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region – an area about the size of Germany – is meant to prevent sandstorms and protect local infrastructure, as well as boost regional economic opportunities.

The green belt – which stretches 3,050km (1,900 miles) – was completed on Thursday after the final batch of several types of vegetation was planted in Yutian county at the desert's southern edge, according to state media.

Sand-shifting deserts like the Taklamakan are dominated by wind-driven sand dunes and frequent sandstorms, which can affect weather, agriculture and human health.

About 85 per cent of the 337,600 sq km (130,350 square mile) desert is covered by shifting sand dunes, earning the Taklamakan the label "sea of death".

"The wind and sand action on the edge of the desert is extremely strong, and the sand dunes expand outward," Lei Qiang, a researcher at the Chinese Academy of Sciences Xinjiang Institute of Ecology and Geography, told state-owned news site The Paper.

Lei said the effort to "lock" the edge of the desert using green belts and solar-based sand control measures such as solar panels, would protect the ecology while safeguarding railways and roads.

It took 40 years to construct the first 2,761km of the green belt. In November last year, efforts were begun to close the remaining 285km around the desert, according to state broadcaster CCTV.

Advertisement

An army of 600,000 people worked to plant species such as desert poplar, red willow and saxaul trees to complete the final stretch of the belt.

Lei said some of the species, such as the medicinal plant desert hyacinth, could produce economic spin-offs.

Green belts are being deployed around the world to combat desertification and desert expansion, such as the Great Green Wall initiative, which stretches 8,000km across Africa's Sahara Desert.

In 2022, a new rail link – the Hotan-Ruoqiang railway – went into service to help integrate the desert region with the rest of the country.

The 2,712km loop is the world's first circumnavigation of a desert and now connects various cities around the Taklamakan, transporting minerals and specialties like walnuts and red dates to the rest of China.

In October, the China Three Gorges Corporation announced plans to build a new energy project in the Taklamakan to supply 8.5 gigawatts of solar and 4GW of wind power, according to another report by The Paper.

Construction is expected to be completed within four years and complement energy storage and coal-fired power projects.

Xinjiang has abundant sources of clean energy including solar and wind, and in the first half of this year it ranked first in China for installed capacity of new energy, according to the State Council.

Now that the Taklamakan Desert green belt is completed, Lei said work would continue to improve its efficiency and quality.

Uyghur exiles accuse Xinjiang's leader of repression beyond borders

26 November 2024, VOA, Kasim Kashgar

Exiled members of China's Uyghur minority group accuse Beijing of human rights violations and say the Communist Party chief in the Xinjiang region where most of them are from has been more heavy-handed in his approach toward them than his predecessor.

Members of the largely Turkic Muslim minority group said they had hoped Ma Xingrui, with his technocratic background, might moderate the region's hardline stance, but three years into his current position, observers said the opposite is happening in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in northwest China.

"Under Ma's watch, arbitrary detentions have persisted, and forced labor has expanded, especially in Belt and Road projects," said Abduweli Ayup, a Norway-based Uyghur activist. China's Belt and Road Initiative is a global infrastructure and trade endeavor that has lasted for more than 10 years.

Ayup also said that under Ma, 240 Uyghurs who sought refuge in cities such as Shanghai and Beijing were forced to return to Xinjiang.

"These individuals were arrested and forcibly returned to Xinjiang, where their fates remain uncertain," Ayup told VOA, citing information from trusted sources from China.

Obtaining and verifying information from inside China has been challenging due to the government's tight control over communications and the people's fear of repercussions for disclosing sensitive details.

Despite the risks, Uyghurs from within and outside of China rely on discreet networks and encrypted messaging to get the word out, often at great peril, according to Ayup and other exiles.

Activists said they notice during Ma's tenure, he has not only upheld but intensified the internment of over 1 million Uyghurs, turning temporary detentions into long-term imprisonments.

The United States and Canada have accused China of genocide. The European Union and rights organizations have condemned China's policies against the Uyghurs and described Beijing's approach as crimes against humanity.

Chinese authorities deny allegations of repression in Xinjiang, framing their policies as efforts to combat "terrorism, extremism and separatism."

"China is a law-based country. Judicial departments handle cases in accordance with law," Liu Pengyu, spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, wrote in a response to a VOA request for comment.

Repression extends beyond Xinjiang

Observers said Beijing's narrative sharply contradicts firsthand accounts and international reports that accuse China of human rights abuses, including mass detentions and cultural erasure.

Some Uyghurs have tried to move out of Xinjiang and away from the scrutiny of Chinese officials within the region. But the crackdown has spilled beyond Xinjiang's borders, targeting Uyghurs in other parts of China, Ayup said.

One such case involves Irpan Yarmemet, a Uyghur content producer who was arrested in Shanghai in September for traveling to Turkey eight years ago to study. Ayup said Yarmemet was living in Shanghai for fear of arbitrary detention in Xinjiang. After his arrest, he was detained in Xinjiang. It is unknown whether he is charged or convicted of a crime.

"His hopes of staying safe by avoiding Xinjiang were dashed," Ayup said. "The recent arrests and forced returns show that the crackdown under Ma Xingrui has no geographical boundaries."

The human cost

Uyghur exile Madina Mehmet, now living in the Netherlands, said leaving China was a matter of survival.

In 2012, she enrolled at Beijing Foreign Studies University but was forced out after just a year.

"They kept pressuring me to remove my headscarf," Mehmet said. "They wouldn't let me live in peace. I couldn't take it anymore."

She eventually secured a university scholarship in Turkey, where she lived and studied for eight years. She then moved to the Netherlands. However, Beijing's reach continued to haunt her.

"While I was in Turkey, Chinese officials demanded proof that I was a student there," she said. "Even now, they interrogate my mother in Urumqi, asking for my address and details about my life in the Netherlands." Urumqi is Xinjiang's capital.

Mehmet said her relatives have also been scrutinized for their travels. She said almost a decade ago, her sister, Mihray Mehmet, cousin and aunt had either studied or traveled to Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, all countries Beijing has deemed sensitive.

In late 2021, Madina Mehmet said, the three women were detained in Urumqi. They were falsely accused of being “connected to terrorist organizations,” said Mehmet.

Rights groups reported that Uyghurs who had visited a sensitive country prior to 2017 would be scrutinized for possible arrests and interrogations.

“My sister was an exceptional student,” Mehmet said of her sister, who was attending Xinjiang Medical University when her academic aspirations were derailed by state harassment over her headscarf.

“Teachers humiliated her by forcibly removing it in front of her classmates,” Mehmet said. Mihray Mehmet eventually left university to study in Egypt – a decision later used to justify her detention.

VOA asked the Chinese Embassy in Washington about Mihray Mehmet’s case, and Liu responded by saying, “I have not heard about the case you mentioned.”

Last year, Madina Mehmet’s aunt was released from detention, but her sister and cousin were sentenced to at least seven years in prison.

“They’ve committed no crime,” Mehmet told VOA. “My sister’s children – just 3 and 5 years old when she was arrested – are growing up without their mother.”

Despite the risks of speaking out, Madina Mehmet refuses to stay silent.

“I want the Chinese government to release my sister and cousin,” she said. “They deserve to be free, to raise their children, to live without fear.”

Targeting prominent Uyghurs

Rehmutulla Semet, the vice chair of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Xinjiang and a prominent real estate developer, was also a target of China’s Xinjing policies. He was sentenced to 19 years in prison in 2021 on charges of “assisting terrorist activities” and “gathering a crowd to disrupt public order,” according to a source who requested anonymity out of fear of reprisal.

Sources close to Semet fear retaliation and request not to be revealed but told VOA the charges are false. They said he was targeted due to his ethnicity, social status and wealth.

Since Ma’s arrival in Xinjiang, Semet’s assets, valued at more than $400 million, have been seized. Some of his assets were auctioned off on platforms such as Douyin, China’s domestic version of TikTok.

“One of his signature buildings, the Gold Coin Hill Building, a high-rise in Urumqi, was among those auctioned off,” a source told VOA. “He owned similar buildings in other major cities in the region, all of which were officially confiscated by the government this past August.”

Ayup said such prosecutions are part of a broader pattern of stripping influential Uyghurs of their wealth and silencing dissent.

Mehmet and Ayup are part of a growing number of Uyghur exiles who are calling for international accountability and action.

“The world must act – justice for Uyghurs is long overdue,” Mehmet said.

School Stampede In China's Xinjiang Injures 14

18 November 2024, Barron’s

A stampede at a middle school in China’s northwestern Xinjiang region has left 14 people injured, according to local authorities.

The incident occurred at around 3:25 pm (7:25 am GMT) on Monday at the No. 8 Middle School in Kashgar, a statement on a social media account affiliated with the city government said.

A student fell in front of a door as pupils were moving between a dormitory and a teaching building, “causing a stampede”, the statement said, without giving further details.

It said three people were “seriously injured and are being treated with all-out efforts”.

A further 11 people were “lightly injured and are being kept in hospital for observation”.

Authorities are investigating the cause of the incident, the statement said.

Located around 4,000 kilometres (2,500 miles) from Beijing, the ancient Silk Road city of Kashgar is the cultural heartland of China’s Uyghur minority.

The ruling Communist Party is accused of committing grievous human rights abuses against the Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang, which the United States and lawmakers in some other countries have called a “genocide”.

Beijing vociferously denies the allegations, arguing that its policies in Xinjiang have helped to curb religious extremism and boost economic development.

Trump’s China Hawks Are Also Uyghur Advocates

15 November 2024, Foreign Policy, Amy Mackinnon and Lili Pike

The president and his advisors might clash over human rights in China

U.S. President-elect Donald Trump’s selection of two outspoken critics of China’s crackdown on Uyghurs to serve in top foreign-policy roles in the next administration has been welcomed by Uyghur advocates. But it could also serve as a future flash point with the president-elect.

Sen. Marco Rubio, Trump’s nominee to serve as secretary of state, and Rep. Mike Waltz, his national security advisor, have both sought to use their clout as lawmakers to condemn China’s persecution of Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities in its northwestern Xinjiang region.

"Having engaged with both offices, I'm hopeful for the future," said Rayhan Asat, a human rights lawyer as well as a senior legal and policy advisor with the Strategic Litigation Project at the Atlantic Council. Asat is of Uyghur heritage, and her brother, Etkar Asat, is imprisoned in China. "Their strong records in leading and sponsoring legislation on Uyghur rights speak for themselves."

In 2021, Waltz called for the United States to boycott the Beijing Winter Olympics the following year over China's human rights record, likening the event to the infamous 1936 Summer Games that were held in Nazi Germany.

Rubio has long been a champion of human rights in China. He co-sponsored the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act in 2021, which assumes that all goods from Xinjiang are produced using forced labor, unless proven otherwise, and bars them from being imported to the United States. It is widely regarded as the U.S. government's most assertive action to date to address the repression in Xinjiang, which has seen more than a million people detained since 2017. The Chinese government stopped publishing data on the number of prosecutions in Xinjiang in 2021.

"He is a sturdy, sober member of Congress who has worked for a long time on China and human rights issues," said Sophie Richardson, who served as the China director at Human Rights Watch from 2006 to 2023.

Beijing sanctioned Rubio in 2020 alongside Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and others in response to the United States sanctioning Chinese officials over human rights abuses in Xinjiang.

Although the first Trump administration took a number of important steps to respond to China's crackdown in Xinjiang, including issuing sanctions and designating it as a genocide, such actions seem to have been driven by administration officials as opposed to the president himself. Rubio's and Waltz's strong convictions on human rights in China could thus prove to be a point of tension in a second Trump administration.

John Bolton, one of Trump's former national security advisors, said in his book The Room Where It Happened that during a 2019 meeting between Trump and Xi, at which only the two leaders and their interpreters were present, the U.S. president told his Chinese counterpart that his efforts to incarcerate the Uyghurs was "exactly the right thing to do," according to the U.S. interpreter. Trump has denied the allegation.

In 2020, Trump told Axios that he had held off imposing U.S. Treasury sanctions on Chinese officials involved in the crackdown out of concern that doing so could disrupt ongoing trade talks. At the time, the Trump administration had put export restrictions on Chinese government entities and Chinese companies deemed complicit in the abuses in Xinjiang as well as visa restrictions on Chinese Communist Party officials deemed responsible, but it had not yet taken the step of applying harsher Treasury Department sanctions. Trump had also that week signed into law the Uyghur Human Rights Policy Act, which requires the president to file a report to Congress identifying all individuals responsible for the human rights abuses in Xinjiang, in order to determine future sanctions.

"There were certainly people in the administration who I think cared about these issues deeply," said Richardson, who is now a visiting scholar at Stanford University's Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law, "but I think the president's posture certainly undercut the credibility that the administration could expect on human rights."

Another wrinkle for Rubio and Waltz is close Trump ally Elon Musk, whose electric vehicle company Tesla has a "gigafactory" in Shanghai and opened a showroom in Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang, in 2022. Rubio condemned the latter at the time, writing on X, "Nationless corporations are helping the Chinese Communist Party cover up genocide and slave labor in the region."

Uyghur advocates press for stronger enforcement of forced labor laws and Xinjiang recognition

13 November 2024, The Print

After President-elect Donald Trump's victory, leaders within the Uyghur American community are urging the US to refocus on the human rights violations in Xinjiang, the north-western region of China where Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities have faced severe oppression.

Advocates are calling on Trump to build upon his administration's earlier actions on behalf of Uyghur rights, citing the positive impact of his first-term policies in challenging China's abuses. Under Trump, the U.S. officially classified China's actions in Xinjiang as genocide, imposing sanctions on Chinese officials and entities linked to widespread human rights violations, including mass detentions, forced labour, and sterilizations as reported by Voice of America.

Despite China's denial of these allegations, framing its policies as efforts to combat extremism and terrorism, Nury Turkel, senior fellow at the Hudson Institute and former chairman of the US Commission on International Religious Freedom, highlighted the strong bipartisan support for Uyghur rights in the US. According to the report he emphasized that these issues have broader national security implications, noting, "Uyghur rights concerns extend beyond typical human rights issues. They have profound national security implications tied to America's long-term economic and strategic security." Turkel expressed cautious optimism that the incoming Trump administration would continue its efforts, building on key actions such as the Uyghur Human Rights Policy Act and the genocide designation.

He stated, "I am hopeful that the new administration will take meaningful actions to address the urgent issues facing Uyghurs, as it did in the past."

Uyghur American leaders are urging the Trump administration to further intensify sanctions on Chinese officials and entities implicated in the abuse of Uyghurs, aiming to strengthen the US response. Turkel anticipates that additional sanctions will help confront these atrocities.

The report further stated that Rushan Abbas, executive director of the Campaign for Uyghurs, also stressed the need for robust enforcement of the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act of 2021. He argued that addressing the ongoing genocide is not only a foreign policy issue but also a matter of preventing U.S. complicity in China's use of forced labour.

"Uyghurs are suffering a genocide, and Americans must understand that addressing this atrocity isn't just about foreign policy; it's about stopping the US from becoming complicit by purchasing Chinese goods linked to forced labour," Abbas said.

He added, "It's about preventing China from using Americans' hard-earned money to further its imperial goals and weaken the United States, while also resisting foreign pressure on US soil."

Salih Hudayar, prime minister of the East Turkistan Government in Exile, echoed similar sentiments, urging the Trump administration to formally recognize Xinjiang, or East Turkistan, as an occupied nation.

He argued that an independent East Turkistan would challenge China's growing dominance in Central Asia and the Indo-Pacific, thus protecting both American and global interests. Hudayar also proposed the appointment of a special US coordinator for Uyghur issues, signaling strong US support for Uyghur and minority rights in the region. Despite these calls for action, Uyghur American advocates remain concerned that economic and strategic ties with China could overshadow human rights concerns.

Turkel noted that various advocacy groups have shaped the U.S. response to Uyghur issues, with climate activists seeking closer collaboration with China on environmental matters, pro-engagement China experts urging a more conciliatory approach to US-China relations, and business interests concerned about the risks of heightened tensions.

"These pressures have led to a more measured stance on Uyghur-related policies," Turkel said.

He added that while acts like the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act under the Biden administration were steps forward, broader geopolitical and economic concerns often overshadow Uyghur rights.

In addition to addressing human rights violations within China, Uyghur American leaders are calling for action against China's transnational repression, particularly covert operations aimed at intimidating Uyghur Americans.

Abbas emphasized the need for swift US action to counter these repressive tactics, including China's covert police stations and agents that monitor and intimidate Uyghur Americans and Chinese dissidents living in the US. He also urged the administration to prioritize securing the release of Uyghur detainees in China.

"China continues to detain Uyghur American family members and community leaders as a means of silencing Uyghurs living abroad," Abbas explained, noting that many are forced to self-censor to protect their loved ones. He called for a strong US effort to secure the release of these detainees and put an end to the repressive tactics used by China against the Uyghur diaspora.

China uses London travel show to promote its narrative of Xinjiang in the West

08 November 2024, RFA, Erkin Tarim

Human rights groups criticize the move, noting that Uyghurs there still face abuse by Beijing.

China used a London travel show to promote its narrative of Xinjiang in the West and encourage tourism in the far-western region, despite the government's ongoing repression of the nearly 12 million mostly Muslim Uyghurs who live there.

The event sparked criticism from human rights activists, who have spoken out against Beijing's efforts to falsely show foreign visitors that Uyghurs in Xinjiang are thriving.

The Bureau of Culture and Tourism of the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region staffed a booth called "Xinjiang is a good place" at the World Travel Market trade show in London on Nov. 5-7.

Attendees could learn about "the most magical charm of Xinjiang" and "experience the diverse ethnic culture," said a description of the booth on the trade show's website.

Staff handed out coupons for hotels, scenic spots and ski resorts to participating guests to encourage more international visitors to travel to Xinjiang, a report in the Chinese state-run Global Times said.

The exhibition was part of a larger presentation on "high-quality tourism development in China."

Rights groups, including the Uyghur Human Rights Project based in Washington, have denounced such trips as “genocide tourism,” accusing China of sanitizing its violations of human rights in the region. They have cautioned Western travel companies not to participate in this kind of tourism and criticized the World Travel Market for providing a platform for China to portray a whitewashed image of the situation in Xinjiang.

Rights groups also have accused the Chinese government of using the event as a stage to cover up and justify what the U.S. government and the parliaments of several Western countries have deemed a genocide and crimes against humanity.

Their accusations are based on credible reports of widespread and systematic human rights violations, including mass detentions, cruel and inhuman treatment or punishment, forced sterilizations of women, and the forced separation of children from their parents.

Nicholas Bettles, head of strategic partnerships at World Travel Market London, declined to comment. The trade show’s press officer, Becca Krug, did not respond to an email request for comment.

Portraying Xinjiang as ‘great success’

Henryk Szadziewski, research director at the Uyghur Human Rights Project and co-author of a report on tourism in Xinjiang said China was using the travel fair to try to show the world the “success” of its “Xinjiang policy” in stabilizing the region.

He said this was the first time China sent Xinjiang tourism officials to the World Travel Market, which holds six annual business-to-business events across four continents.

The Chinese government uses tourism as a proxy to show visitors “very carefully curated parts of the region and then reporting back to the world that the region is now a great success,” Szadzieski said.

More than 10 domestic tourism enterprises from Xinjiang along with eight other Chinese provinces and cities, made their debut at the World Travel Market, China’s Global Times reported.

“As ‘China Travel’ heats up thanks to visa-free policies, Xinjiang welcomes visitors to experience its magnificent landscapes and appreciate the beauty of the region,” Guli Abulimu, director of Xinjiang’s Department of Culture of Tourism, was quoted as saying.

The China Daily, another state-run media outlet, said “the intangible cultural heritage, literary and creative products, and tourism brochures showcased at the Xinjiang booth captivated numerous international exhibitors, immersing visitors in the allure of Xinjiang.”

“Their enthusiasm and keen interest in Xinjiang’s tourism offerings sparked collaborative efforts to further enhance the region’s appeal,” the report said.

Radio Free Asia called China’s National Tourist Office in London, but staffers refused to comment on the criticism by human rights groups.

A staff member working at the trade show dismissed rights groups’ warnings about travel to Xinjiang amid the repression of Uyghurs there as “misleading news from certain media outlets.”

Rahima Mahmut, the U.K. director of the World Uyghur Congress and executive director of the group Stop Uyghur Genocide, said showcasing Xinjiang at the World Travel Market was part of the Chinese government’s image-building campaign.

“For the past seven years, the Chinese government has been widely seen as carrying out genocide,” she said. “In an attempt to counter this perception, they claim there is no such thing happening and invite people to take a tour to see the ‘real’ Xinjiang.”

“They argue that Uyghurs have their own culture, speak their own language, and sing their own songs,” Mahmut said. “In reality, they are creating false narratives to try to repair their image.”

Civil group calls for accountability from China over human rights violations in Xinjiang

04 November 2024, Jurist, Matteo Piccioli

The International Service for Human Rights (ISHR) recalled on Monday the need for further action to hold China accountable for grave rights violations in Xinjiang.

The ISHR calls for the Chinese government to ensure timely implementation of the recommendations made by the the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), in addition to permitting investigations in the region. It also calls on the UN Human Rights Council to install a “monitoring and reporting mechanism on the human rights situation” to ensure the participation of UN bodies for transparency and the protection of human rights.

In its August 2022 landmark report, the OHCHR affirmed that the Chinese government had committed serious human rights violations through an anti-terrorism law system that imposes restrictions with discriminatory components on Uyghurs. The report holds China accountable for “restrictions on religious identity and expression, as well as the rights to privacy and movement,” which hinders the human rights protected under international law.

The allegations of cases of disappearances of members of the Uyghur and other Muslim ethnic minority communities in the Xinjiang region grew in 2017. A year later, the UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances reported a surge of cases of re-education of Uyghur members with the pretext of “countering religious extremism” in the region.

China has, since the publication of the report, denied and rejected the allegations. Its allies similarly argued that the allegations are an “interference in China’s internal affairs.” Raphaël Viana David, ISHR’s China program manager responded:

It is deeply regrettable when States engage in double standards and fail to uphold universal human rights. We are dismayed that while 60 States from the global South were prepared to express solidarity and support a Pakistani-led statement regarding Israel’s abuses in Lebanon, 80 States from the same world region were prepared to abandon such principles and the rights of Uyghur Muslims and other minorities by signing statements which greenlight China’s grave human rights abuses.

Recently various states have also remarked on the need for further action to ensure human rights protection. The OHCHR released a statement in August 2024 updating information on the initial assessment. In this report, the UN agency recognized again the government’s inaction to protect human rights and the persistence of wrongful policies. Similarly a month later, a group of countries labelled as the “Xinjiang Core Group” released a joint statement urging China to free “all individuals arbitrarily and unjustly detained in Xinjiang, urgently clarifying the fate and whereabouts of missing family members, and facilitating safe contact and reunion.”

China’s idyllic Xinjiang grasslands hid a salty soiled secret that’s been solved

28 October 2024, SCMP, Mandy Zuo

Years of research have yielded productive plains that offer China more food security in the face of geopolitical upheaval and extreme weather

Nationwide efforts to convert salty soil into arable grasslands have extended to a high-elevation part of China’s Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region where a quartet of mountains converge and the arid climate has long quelled attempts to cultivate crops.

After eight years of intensive work in the region’s Pamir Plateau, about 1,300 hectares (3,200 acres) of salt-affected desert in Tashkurgan Tajik county have been transformed into productive plains, the official People’s Daily reported over the weekend.

The announcement came as Beijing has been sowing the seeds of agricultural security to ensure that 1.4 billion Chinese people continue to have adequate food supplies while geopolitics affect trade supplies and an influx of extreme weather events wreak havoc on farmlands.

With a vegetation coverage rate exceeding 85 per cent, and a hay yield of more than 4,500kg (9,920 pounds) per hectare, the achievement is reportedly the first large-scale success in cultivating high-quality forage across the dry and salty lands of the plateau.

The breakthrough will relieve demand pressure on high-altitude livestock feed and allow for the natural grasslands to recuperate, Professor Xi Linqiao, deputy chief scientist of Xinjiang’s high-quality-forage production initiative and a professor with the region’s Tarim University, was quoted as saying.

Tashkurgan, with 418,000 hectares of natural grassland, supports 250,000 livestock, including the Tashkurgan sheep and Pamir yak, both designated as national genetic resources.

But with poor natural pasture growth due to climate conditions forcing the county to import hay from other areas, the county launched its saline-soil reclamation project in 2017 and built a research team in partnership with several local institutions. People’s Daily said the team managed to lower the pH level, a measure of acidity, from 9.5 to approximately 8 using acid-base balancing agents and halophilic bacteria – extremophilic organisms that thrive in high salt conditions.

The initiative also included irrigation infrastructure, eco-restoration, and innovative “dry seeding, wet germination” techniques to maximise irrigation effectiveness, addressing the region’s uneven terrain. Reclaiming and improving this portion of saline-alkali land could significantly expand usable land

“Reclaiming and improving this portion of saline-alkali land could significantly expand usable land”

-Wang Guangzhou, China Agricultural University

With decades of urbanisation and economic expansion reducing China’s arable land, the reclamation of saline-alkali soil has gained national importance as a vital reserve for agricultural use. Efforts to transform saline land into productive farmland have intensified across China in recent years.

In a paper published in September, Professor Wang Guangzhou from China Agricultural University said that China had about 36.7 million hectares of saline land, of which 12.3 million hectares have agricultural potential while 6.67 million hectares could be converted into farmland.

“Reclaiming and improving this portion of saline-alkali land could significantly expand usable land, boost grain production and safeguard national food security,” he wrote.

Local media reports illustrate the success of these initiatives, as seen in Tangshan, Hebei province, where about 80 per cent of the city’s saline land had been transformed into arable land by the end of 2022.

China hosts World Media Summit in Xinjiang amid human rights concerns

17 October 2024, VOA, Kasim Kashgar

China hosted its sixth World Media Summit this week in Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang, in northwestern China. Organizers say more than 500 participants from 208 leading media organizations participated in the event, which was cohosted by state-run Xinhua News Agency and the Xinjiang regional government. The three-day summit, which ended on Thursday, focused on "Artificial Intelligence and Media Transformation."

Chinese media highlighted the potential benefits of global AI collaboration, but the choice of Xinjiang as the event's venue was criticized by activists concerned about China's alleged human rights abuses in the region.

Adrian Zenz, director of China studies at the Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation, told VOA he believes organizers chose Urumqi to draw attention away from human rights concerns in Xinjiang.

"This event appears to be designed to normalize the situation in Xinjiang, making Xinjiang a location for discussing modern technology and developments," Zenz said in an emailed response.

"As Erkin Tuniyaz [chairman of the region] told the media at the event, 'Xinjiang is open for business.' This points to the current strategy of Xinjiang's [Chinese Communist] party secretary Ma Xingrui to focus on economic development and technological modernization," Zenz told VOA.

Zenz said that this is "an integral part of Xinjiang's strategy to present itself as a modern, developed and safe region — showcasing the alleged success of China's 'deradicalization' measures."

In Xinjiang, China faces numerous allegations of human rights abuses against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslim minorities, including mass detentions and forced labor. Since 2017, more than 1 million people have reportedly been detained in internment camps, with human rights groups estimating that more than half a million have been sentenced through unfair trials.

The U.S. has labeled these actions as genocide, imposing sanctions on Chinese officials and companies. The Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act, enacted in 2022, bans products from Xinjiang unless proven free of forced labor.

China denies these claims, asserting that the camps serve as vocational training centers to combat extremism. However, satellite imagery, survivor testimonies and leaked documents contradict these assertions, resulting in widespread global condemnation.

Summit reactions

Originally launched in 2009, the World Media Summit was initiated by the Chinese state-run Xinhua News Agency, with participation from leading international media organizations such as The Associated Press, Reuters and Russia's TASS, according to Xinhua.

Some attendees at this year's session dismissed allegations of human rights violations in Xinjiang as "fake news," according to a Xinhua report.

"Actually, what I found during my visit to Xinjiang was amazing. Because in the media, we hear about fake news about Xinjiang. But when we came to the field and we see the development of Xinjiang, it's amazing," Waref Komaiha, president of the Silk Road Institute for Studies and Research, told Xinhua.

Representatives from global media organizations, including Reuters, participated in the summit.

Ling-Sze Gan, Reuters head of media sales for the Asia Pacific, said at the summit's opening, "We are particularly excited about the potential of generative AI ... augmenting our journalists with machines to supercharge their ability to do their jobs."

Uyghur activists voice concerns

Uyghur activists condemned the summit, calling it an endorsement of China's policies in Xinjiang.

Mamtimin Ala, president of the Washington-based East Turkistan Government in Exile, or ETGE, which seeks the independence of Xinjiang from China, criticized the involvement of major media organizations.

"It is disheartening that these esteemed media organizations have chosen to partake in a Chinese propaganda event. Their presence provides unwarranted legitimacy to China's colonial and genocidal policies in East Turkistan," he said in a statement posted on the organization's website.

Uyghur activists refer to the region of Xinjiang as East Turkistan, a name tied to the area's historical and political background. Xinjiang, which means "new frontier" in Chinese, is the official name used by the Chinese government.

Similarly, ETGE's foreign affairs chief Salih Hidayar voiced concern that the summit could further China's global propaganda efforts.

"We fear that events like this summit, coupled with China's geopolitical influence, will lead to an even more extensive campaign of media manipulation and propaganda aimed at transforming global perceptions of its atrocities in East Turkistan," Hidayar told VOA.

Former political advisor of Xinjiang arrested for suspected bribe-taking

15 October 2024, Xinhua

Dou Wangui, a former senior political advisor of northwest China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, has been arrested on suspicion of taking bribes, the Supreme People's Procuratorate (SPP) said in a statement on Tuesday.

The case was handed over to prosecutors for examination and prosecution following the conclusion of an investigation by the National Commission of Supervision, the SPP said.

Dou was formerly a member of the leading Party members group of the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Regional Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference and vice chairman of the committee.

Further investigation into this case is still underway.

Rights groups blast Skechers over new store in Xinjiang

10 October 2024, RFA, Jijil Kashgary

Controversial Hong Kong actor Donnie Yen appears at a glitzy mall opening.

Rights groups are condemning U.S. footwear and apparel company Skechers as it used the star power of martial arts actor Donnie Yen to open a new store in Xinjiang despite allegations that ethnic Uyghurs in China's far west are used for forced labor.

In a video Yen posted to Instagram, crowds inside a glitzy shopping mall in the regional capital of Urumqi clamored to catch a glimpse of the Hong Kong actor, who is a Skechers brand ambassador – and is known to have pro-China sympathies.

The company promoted its Sept. 28 Urumqi store opening heavily on Chinese social media, and Yen encouraged his nearly 130 million followers on Weibo to visit the outlet and explore its "comfortable treasures," Voice of America reported.

The brand is big in China: Of Skechers 5,200 retail stores worldwide, China has the most with more than 940.

But the big promotional event – and opening a store in Urumqi – showed that Skechers was "completely tone deaf" to concerns about the use of Uyghur forced labor in Xinjiang, said Jewher Ilham, the forced labor project coordinator at the Worker Rights Consortium.

"Skechers isn't yet taking seriously the need to extricate its business from the Uyghur region, even after it was previously linked to forced labor by U.S. Customs and other institutions," Ilham said.

The United States has taken a strict stance on the issue. Under the 2021 Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act, imports from Xinjiang are banned from entering the United States unless they are certified as not made with forced labor.

In June 2022, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security added Skechers supplier Dongguan Oasis Shoes Co., Ltd., to a list of companies suspected of using Uyghur slave labor.

The Australian Strategic Policy Institute issued a 2020 report titled "Uyghurs For Sale" which found that 83 global companies and brands, including Skechers, were directly or indirectly benefiting from the use of Uyghur forced labor in 27 factories in China from which they sourced products.

'Distasteful'

Skechers has been identified as a company within that risk, said Henryk Szadziwski, research director at the Uyghur Human Rights Project in Washington.

"For me, even if the question of forced labor is in dispute, the very fact that you're opening a shop [and] profiteering in a region where there's ongoing crimes against humanity, I'd have to question the decision of Skechers here and ask them what kind of ethical guidelines and clearance were made to make this decision," he told Radio Free Asia.

"So, it's not just the forced labor," he said. "[In] this region are ongoing crimes against humanity, and [Skechers'] decision is to open a shop and make money. That's very distasteful."

When RFA contacted Jennifer Clay, vice president of corporate communications at Skechers, for comment, her assistant said Clay was traveling and "too busy to deal with that right now."

Yen, whose breakout film in the West was "Ip Man" in 2008, is a controversial figure because of his pro-China comments. He most recently appeared in "John Wick 4" in which he had a prominent role along with American actor Keanu Reeves.

His appearance at the Oscars in Hollywood in March 2023 prompted protesters to gather outside the venue, criticizing him for his lack of support for Hong Kong's 2019 pro-democracy movement, which he had called "a riot." Some critics even called on event organizers to disinvite Yen.

Many Hong Kongers have boycotted Yen's movies over his pro-Beijing stance during the 2019 protests against the erosion of Hong Kong's promised freedoms and judicial independence that saw pitched battles between protesters armed with bricks, Molotov cocktails and other makeshift weapons against fully equipped riot police who fired rubber bullets and tear gas.

EU Parliament urges China to release Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas, economist Ilham Tohti

10 October 2024, ISHR

The European Parliament adopted today an urgent resolution condemning Beijing's persecution against Uyghurs, demanding the release of prominent figures Gulshan Abbas and Ilham Tohti. Following this landmark call, Abbas' daughter, Ziba Murat, and ISHR urge EU leaders to step up EU action on the fate of Uyghurs at the United Nations.

The European Parliament (EP) in session in Strasbourg adopted a landmark motion urging the People's Republic of China (PRC) to 'immediately and unconditionally release Ilham Tohti and Gulshan Abbas, as well as those arbitrarily detained in China' and whose cases have been mentioned by the European Union (EU) at the Human Rights Council.

The text lays out a strongly-worded demand that the PRC halts its 'repression and targeting of Uyghurs', including forced sterilisation, birth prevention measures, the destruction of Uyghur identity and other abuses 'which amount to crimes against humanity and a serious risk of genocide'.

The EP lamented that 62-year-old retired doctor Gulshan Abbas is 'serving a 20-year sentence on fallacious terrorism-related charges relating to activities of her sister, a defender of the human rights of persecuted Uyghurs in the PRC'.

The resolution also regretted that Uyghur economist Ilham Tohti, winner of the EP's 2019 Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought, was sentenced to life imprisonment on charges of 'separatism' despite striving to 'foster dialogue between Uyghurs and Han Chinese'.

This resolution reflects a growing global consensus and the mounting diplomatic pressure on China to release all wrongfully imprisoned individuals in the Uyghur region, like my mother.

Ziba Murat, daughter of detained Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas

Today's resolution was adopted by an overwhelming majority of 540 out of 610 voting members of the European parliament (MEPs), with only 23 oppositions and 47 abstentions.

In September, ISHR joined Dr. Abbas' daughter, Ziba Murat, in an advocacy mission to engage extensively with MEPs leading to today's historic resolution.

Dr. Abbas has been arbitrarily detained since 2018, and held incommunicado most of that time. In June 2024, UN experts sent a letter to the Chinese authorities and later released a statement on Dr. Abbas' situation. Under mounting pressure from UN bodies and Western governments, Beijing finally disclosed Dr. Abbas' whereabouts, sentence, and stated date of release, scheduled for 2038.

This was the first written acknowledgement that the Chinese authorities are holding Dr. Abbas ever since her abrupt forced disappearance six years ago. However, China failed to address UN experts' request for disclosure of detailed information on her health, of her court judgment and evidence used to convict her.

My mother is a medical professional who devoted her life to helping people and saving lives. She is a non-political, warm-hearted and loving mother. The charges against her are preposterous and baseless. My mother is suffering the consequences because her family in the United States spoke out against the Chinese government's unfair treatment of Uyghurs. This is a clear example of kin punishment and transnational repression.

Ziba Murat

Dr. Abbas was forcibly disappeared on 10 September 2018, in retaliation for her sister Rushan Abbas' public advocacy in the United States against the persecution of Uyghurs in China a few days prior.

She has multiple health concerns which require medication and medical attention, including severe high blood pressure, back pain often leading to immobilisation, osteoporosis, and recurring migraines. Both her eyes have undergone multiple surgeries and require monitoring.

In March 2023, the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention released an authoritative, quasi-judicial opinion determining her detention to be arbitrary and calling for her prompt release. The EU also raised her case during its latest human rights dialogue with China in June 2024.

This EU resolution and UN actions follow a concerted campaign of global advocacy, including by Dr. Abbas' relatives, who have remained in the dark about her fate for six long years. It is also indisputable evidence that when governments and UN experts press Beijing publicly on individual cases, in a coordinated and sustained fashion, the wall will eventually crack. It is not time to give in: it is now the moment for global actors to step up pressure until Dr. Abbas is released on medical parole.

Raphaël Viana David, ISHR's China Programme Manager

On 11 September 2024, Murat addressed the UN Human Rights Council on behalf of ISHR to call for Dr. Abbas' release and urge the Council to 'step up monitoring and reporting and hold the [Chinese] government accountable for gross violations of international law' – watch a recording of the statement here.

Stepping up UN monitoring and reporting

The EP's motion 'strongly condemns the PRC for not implementing the recommendations of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR)' and urges Beijing to 'allow the OHCHR independent access to the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region'. It further encourages the OHCHR to issue a 'comprehensive situational update and an action plan for holding the PRC accountable'.

We now expect EU Members States to measure up to the Parliament's motion and to demonstrate leadership and commitment to supporting Uyghurs through bold global action. This includes leading a joint statement on China at the ongoing UN General Assembly session and ensuring a united EU position around it. It is deeply regrettable that four EU members – Greece, Cyprus, Malta and Hungary – have refused since 2019 to align with their peers and endorse such statements at high-level UN fora.

Raphaël Viana David

The EU parliament text calls on EU Member States to suspend extradition treaties with the PRC and Hong Kong and 'respect the non-refoulement principle'. It further urges EU governments to 'address the transnational repression of Chinese dissidents and Uyghurs on their territory and prosecute individuals responsible'.

EU Member States must exert persistent and coordinated pressure on China to implement UN expert recommendations and ensure that individual cases are prioritised in bilateral and multilateral talks. They should not shy away from demanding my mother's release. She is innocent and must be released.

Ziba Murat

On 27 August 2024, in a rare public statement on the matter, the OHCHR stressed that 'many problematic laws and policies' documented in its 2022 Xinjiang report remain in place, that abuses still need to be investigated, and that fear of reprisals against sources and lack of access to information hinder the OHCHR's monitoring of the situation.

The Office further echoed its urgent calls on China to release all those arbitrarily detained, to clarify the status and whereabouts of those disappeared, and to fully review the legal framework governing counter-terrorism, national security and minority rights.

Chinese vice premier urges bolstering Xinjiang's development

08 October 2024, The State Council

Chinese Vice Premier He Lifeng on Monday urged efforts to bolster Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps (XPCC) to boost Xinjiang's development.

He, also a member of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee, made the remarks at a meeting celebrating the XPCC's 70th founding anniversary in Urumqi, capital of Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region.

The vice premier led a central delegation to Xinjiang for the occasion.

Entrusted by Xi Jinping, general secretary of the CPC Central Committee, He extended congratulations and greetings to people from various ethnic groups of the XPCC on behalf of central authorities.

A congratulatory letter sent by the CPC Central Committee, the State Council and the Central Military Commission was read out at the meeting.

The XPCC was founded in 1954 by demobilized military personnel in Xinjiang and has over the past seven decades made pivotal contributions to boosting Xinjiang's development, strengthening ethnic unity and social stability, as well as guarding the borders, according to the letter.

He said the XPCC has blazed a new trail of land reclamation and development under the system of socialism with Chinese characteristics over the past 70 years. Generations of people from the XPCC have made tremendous sacrifices and contributions, and have accumulated many valuable experience, the vice premier said.

He called on the XPCC to fully tap its strengths in maintaining stability and defending border areas to serve Xinjiang's social stability, foster new industrial and sci-tech drivers to promote high-quality development, and leverage the reform and opening-up to construct the region into a "golden channel" between Asia and Europe and a bridgehead for China's westward opening up.

For Companies in China, Pulling Out of Xinjiang Poses 'Messy Dilemma'

04 October 2024, The New York Times

Beijing's investigation of the parent of Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger, which stopped buying goods from Xinjiang, has put global firms in a difficult position.

An investigation by China of an American clothing retailer has escalated concerns among foreign companies about their dependence on Chinese supply chains and the future of their operations in the country.

China's Ministry of Commerce said last week that it was investigating PVH, the corporate parent of the Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger brands, for allegedly taking "discriminatory measures" against products from Xinjiang, a region in China's far west that produces a fifth of the world's cotton.

At issue is whether PVH violated Chinese law by pulling back from purchasing cotton or garments from Xinjiang, where researchers have cited evidence of forced labor, mass arrests and confinement to re-education camps among the region's predominantly Muslim ethnic groups, particularly the Uyghurs.

The investigation has made clear that China will not tolerate companies that shun Xinjiang. That puts some multinationals in a legal vise grip because a growing number of governments, including the United States and the European Union, restrict or ban imports from Xinjiang.

The case is the first time Beijing has wielded a rule it put in place four years ago, known as the Unreliable Entity List, against a company for complying with another country's prohibition on goods from Xinjiang.

"Since this investigation is the first of its kind, companies in all sectors have been forced to reassess what it means for them," said Sean Stein, the chairman of the American Chamber of Commerce in China. "Many are seeing higher risk," he added.

For companies, the PVH investigation adds to the public relations problems that doing business in Xinjiang can bring — inside and outside China.

In 2021, H&M, Nike and other brands faced a damaging backlash from consumers in China after the companies said they would break ties with Xinjiang. This spring, several global automakers became the focus of a congressional investigation for buying parts from a supplier flagged by the U.S. government for participating in forced labor programs tied to the region.

Many international companies are heavily dependent on Chinese suppliers. From cars to solar panels, China is the world's largest manufacturer by far. More than 90 percent of China's cotton is produced in Xinjiang.

"European companies find themselves increasingly caught between a rock and a hard place," the European Union Chamber of Commerce in China said in a statement. "If they cease operations in, or sourcing from, regions like Xinjiang they may face a severe backlash from both government and consumers in China," the chamber continued. "If they stay, they risk negative consequences from their home and other international markets."

Western companies have already grown warier of China because of geopolitical issues. Larry Fink, the chief executive of BlackRock, one of the world's largest asset management companies, said at a conference on Tuesday that global companies needed to re-evaluate investments in China because it is the biggest economic supporter of Russia, which is waging war on Ukraine.

The PVH investigation could provide another reason for companies to shift away from China, according to advisers for global companies.

"It is a serious and growing concern for many multinational corporations and may aggravate the incentive to decouple," said Lester Ross, the partner in charge of the Beijing office of Wilmer Hale, a law firm.

Companies in joint ventures with Chinese firms in Xinjiang are particularly stuck. Such arrangements are hard to change without official approval. The Chinese government, typically quick to push back against criticism, has made clear it wants foreign companies to stay in Xinjiang, a poor region that it wants to develop.

BASF, the German chemical giant, started trying to sell its stakes in both of its Xinjiang manufacturing joint ventures to its state-owned partner in late 2023. Last week, BASF said the sales had not been completed and were "subject to negotiations and required approvals of the relevant authorities."

Volkswagen, the German automaker, said in February that it was examining "the future direction" of its small joint venture in Xinjiang, where the staff and scale of operations had already shrunk considerably. China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs responded by saying companies should "cherish the opportunity to invest and develop in Xinjiang."

VW has yet to announce any changes.

PVH was given 30 days to respond to the government's claims. If PVH is found to have violated China's laws, penalties could include fines and travel limits on PVH employees, or even a halt to the company's exports from China, the ministry said.

In recent years, human rights groups and corporate responsibility organizations have pushed retailers, in particular, to avoid purchases from Xinjiang.

In July 2020, PVH said that within 12 months, it would stop buying garments, fabric and cotton from Xinjiang. The company responded last week to the Ministry of Commerce announcement by saying, "As a matter of company policy, PVH maintains strict compliance with all relevant laws and regulations in all countries and regions in which we operate.”

PVH said this week that it had no further comment.

The Ministry of Commerce has not explained the timing of its decision to begin investigating PVH, which came against a backdrop of persistent trade frictions between the United States and China.

In the United States, the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act bans all imports from Xinjiang unless the importer can prove that the goods are not tainted by forced labor. The United States also has a separate ban on any imports that contain even traces of Xinjiang cotton or tomatoes, two crops grown mainly on state-owned farms that researchers have linked to human rights abuses.

Companies in the European Union and Canada must comply with a patchwork of national regulations that ban the import of goods made by forced labor.

China has banned independent investigations of labor conditions in Xinjiang and has cracked down broadly on due diligence firms, making it almost impossible for companies to prove how their goods were produced.

Nury Turkel, a lawyer and senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, a think tank, said repression and forced labor involving minorities were continuing, both within Xinjiang and around China.

China has stopped publishing the number of people sent to re-education camps. Those detainees have not been released but instead transferred to prisons, fields or factories, he said.

Mr. Turkel said the United States needed to work with more countries to ban Xinjiang products, and toughen penalties for companies that violate bans.

The U.S. Commerce Department declined to comment. The White House did not respond to a request for comment.

Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the Chinese government was “trying to harass and intimidate” American companies that were complying with U.S. law.

“The United States must not let this bogus investigation stop our country from cracking down on China’s ongoing human rights abuses,” he said.

The Chinese government denies that human rights abuses have taken place. The government also portrays programs to send rural Xinjiang residents to jobs in distant factories as an effort to alleviate poverty, not forced labor.

Steve Vickers, a former senior Hong Kong police officer who runs a corporate security consulting firm there, said companies “are now caught in the middle of what is truly a messy dilemma.”

Beijing’s Transnational Repression of Dissidents: From Bad to Worse

26 September 2024, Bitter Winter

That the repression exerted by the Beijing’s communist regime on Uyghurs has extended beyond the borders of the People’s Republic of China (PRC), employing a strategy of transnational repression to target the diaspora communities worldwide, is today a known fact.

This involves a variety of tactics aimed at silencing, intimidating, or surveilling abroad individuals who are critical of the Chinese Communist Party’s (CCP) policies or who advocate for Uyghur rights.

Recently, Paris-based international human rights organization Reporters Without Borders (RSF) shared the testimony of a Uyghur journalist exiled in the United States whose friends who are still in the PRC were detained in retaliation for his work.

The exiled journalist’s story illustrated the transnational repression carried out by the CCP to extend censorship beyond its borders. International news reporter Kasim Abdurehim Kashgar, who left China for the US in 2017 due to the Chinese regime’s intense repression in the XUAR, said Uyghur journalists like him find no escape from the CCP, even in exile. According to the report by RSF, following Kashgar’s emigration, those in his entourage in the PRC were interrogated and, in some cases, imprisoned.

“The Chinese authorities wanted me to stop my investigations and work for the regime’s propaganda. In the months following my refusal, at least twelve people with whom I had worked in a language school were arrested and questioned about me. Some were even sentenced to up to seven years in prison,” the exiled journalist, who investigates crimes committed against Uyghurs for the American public media Voice of America (VOA), explained. The journalist said one of his friends was sentenced to nine years in prison, while four of his former colleagues were sentenced to seven years’ imprisonment on obscure charges, and only one was released, while the fate of the others remains unknown.

Working under a pseudonym for many years, the journalist revealed his identity in the documentary “From Fear to Freedom: A Uyghur’s Journey” broadcast by VOA in June last year. As per the RSF report, that reporter’s mental health suffered as his close circle was targeted by the Chinese authorities. “After learning about their detention, I developed anxiety and depression,” Kashgar said. “I am asking the authorities to release them because they have nothing to do with my work,” he added.

Kashgar remains determined to continue his investigations, despite the pressure. Through extensive research, he discovered his former colleagues were being detained. "It took me three years to reveal their arrests. I only decided to go public recently, when I had gathered solid evidence from five different and unrelated sources," Kashgar told RSF.

Commenting on the matter, RSF Asia-Pacific Bureau Director Cédric Alviani said the journalist's chilling testimony "illustrates the full extent of the transnational repression carried out by the Chinese regime to prevent exiled journalists from revealing the atrocities it is committing in Xinjiang." He added: "The international community must mobilise to protect journalists making the difficult decision to go into exile, as well as their families who remain in China."

Also, in 2024 the police of the PRC arrested two journalists from the Kazakh minority working for the local public channel Xinjiang Television, as well as several other journalists whose identities have not yet been confirmed, reports RSF. The organization counts at least 79 detained individuals among journalists and press freedom activists, including renown Sakharov prize winner Ilham Tohti.

In fact, the PRC is ranked 172nd out of 180 countries in RSF's 2024 World Press Freedom Index. And according to a report by the Washington-based human rights group Freedom House, the parts of the Chinese communist party-state apparatus involved in transnational repression are as diverse as the targets and tactics of the campaign.

The importance of extending the party's grip on overseas Chinese and ethnic minority exiles originates with the highest echelons of the CCP, Freedom House said. "Besides CCP General Secretary Xi Jinping's own advancement of sweeping anti-corruption campaigns, leaked speeches from other members of the Politburo high up in the security apparatus are explicit about the priority that should be given to the 'overseas struggle' against perceived party enemies," the report added.

VOA recently reported that many exiled Uyghurs in the United States claimed the Chinese regime has ramped up transnational repression against them, using their relatives who still live in China to threaten them into silence abroad. VOA reported that the United States' domestic intelligence and security service Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) is aware of such activity targeting Uyghurs and other ethnic minority groups in the US.

"Tactics and patterns morph with advancements in technology," the FBI said in a statement to VOA. These acts, "often identified as transnational repression," represent "severe violations of international norms, US law, and individual rights and freedoms. TNR conducted by any government, against any person including Uyghur Americans, is unacceptable," the federal police agency was quoted as saying by VOA.

Earlier in May this year, UK-based human rights group Amnesty International reported some Chinese and Hong Kong students studying in Europe and North America claimed they were being photographed and followed at protests in their host cities, while many said their families in China had been targeted and threatened by police in connection with the students' activism overseas.

But this transnational repression, a grave violation of human rights, extending the reach of its authoritarian control beyond its borders, not only affects Uyghurs but also poses broader challenges to global human rights and international diplomacy.

Addressing these issues requires coordinated international action, robust support for Uyghur advocacy, and continued scrutiny of Beijing practices, as all experts on the PRC say. As the situation evolves, the global community's response will play a critical role in shaping the future of Uyghur rights and freedoms.

China: Free Uyghur Economist Ilham Tohti From Life Sentence

23 September 2024, HRW

Sakarov Prize Winner in Solitary Confinement, Denied Family Visits

The Chinese government should quash the conviction and release Ilham Tohti, the prominent Uyghur economist and government critic, on the 10th anniversary of his sentencing, Human Rights Watch said today.

In 2014, the Xinjiang People's High Court convicted Professor Tohti on politically motivated charges of "separatism" and sentenced him to life in prison. His family has not been allowed to visit him since early 2017 and he is believed to have been in solitary confinement since his arrest.

"The life sentence for Ilham Tohti marked the beginning of the Chinese government's severe crackdown on the Uyghur region in 2014," said Maya Wang, associate China director at Human Rights Watch. "Tohti's life imprisonment for his peaceful criticism and torturous solitary confinement reflects the Chinese government's heightened repression and relentless abuses against Uyghurs."

Tohti, 54, was teaching at Central University of Nationalities of China when he established "Uighurs Online," a website aimed "to provide Uyghurs and Hans with a platform for discussion and exchange" in late 2005. The Chinese government shut down the website in 2008 and sentenced the manager, Gheyret Niyaz, now 65, to 15 years in prison in 2010 for "endangering state security."

At least six of Tohti's students, Abduqeyum Ablimit, Perhat Halmurat, Akbar Imin, Mutellip Imin, Shohret Nijat, and Atikem Rozi, are believed to have been sentenced to between three-and-a-half and eight years in prison in 2014, based on a document leaked to Xinjiang Victims Database. It is unclear whether they were released when their sentences ended.

In May 2014, the Chinese government launched the "Strike Hard Campaign against Violent Terrorism" in Xinjiang. Since late 2016, the Chinese authorities have dramatically increased its repression in the region, targeting Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims living there with policies that amount to crimes against humanity.

They include mass and arbitrary detention, unjust prolonged imprisonment, forced labor, family separation, violation of reproductive rights, torture, and the use of transnational repression. In 2022, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights issued a report concluding that these abuses "may constitute ... crimes against humanity."

Tohti was awarded the European Parliament Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought in 2019. On the 10th anniversary of Tohti's imprisonment, the European Union issued a statement calling for "the immediate and unconditional release of Tohti and other human rights defenders, lawyers, and intellectuals who are arbitrarily detained in China."

The Chinese government's harsh crackdown on Uyghurs includes the mass detention and imprisonment of intellectuals, the backbone of Uyghur culture and society. They are among more than half-a-million Uyghurs who were sentenced between 2017 and 2021 to prison terms without due process. Among them are the retired physician Gulshan Abbas, sentenced to 20 years in prison, the prominent anthropologist Rahile Dawut, sentenced to life, the writer and literary critic Yalqun Rozi, 15 years, and the literature professor Abduqadir Jalalidin, 13 years.

The authorities continue to detain and imprison Uyghurs on vague charges, though precise information is limited due to the severe government control of information in the region. On September 19, Radio Free Asia reported that Tohti's prison guard, Ghopur Abdurreshit, 51, was sentenced to seven years in prison for disclosing information related to Tohti's health.

"Foreign governments should counter the Chinese government's false claim that there are no abuses in Xinjiang by demanding the release of Ilham Tohti and the hundreds of thousands of other Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims who remain arbitrarily imprisoned," Wang said. "The UN Human Rights office should promptly issue a comprehensive update on the current situation in Xinjiang and present an action plan to hold the Chinese government accountable."

The Uyghur Democratic Reform Movement Needs Unity and Support

23 September 2024, Bitter Winter

We the undersigned are a group of Uyghur scholars, professors, and intellectuals exiled around the world due to the Chinese government's brutal repression of ethnic culture, religion, human rights, democracy, and freedom.

Seven years into Beijing's atrocities in our homeland—which the United States and 11 other parliaments have declared amount to genocide, and the United Nations has affirmed may constitute crimes against humanity—we wish to stress the increasing urgency for action, and a deep need for unity and support for the Uyghur cause. To this end, we call on all democratic leaders, international organizations, and allies to reaffirm their support for Uyghur organizations, and stand with us to fight for justice and freedom.

This autumn is a pivotal moment for the Uyghur democratic movement in exile. On October 24-27, the World Uyghur Congress (WUC) will hold its eighth General Assembly in Sarajevo, gathering over 150 delegates from dozens of countries to elect its leadership and form a consensus on strategy. This exercise of a free and fair election, undertaken once every three years, demonstrates its commitment to democratic values, and stands in sharp contrast to Beijing's imposition of totalitarian rule in our homeland.

Like many elections worldwide, including those held in over 70 countries this year, our process will face challenges. As autocratic regimes like China, Russia, North Korea, and Iran threaten global democracies, the Uyghur movement must overcome similar obstacles. We aim to strengthen democratic reforms, promote social cohesion, and embrace diversity. While division is a constant threat, our resilience lies in our ability to reform and grow. Since its founding in 2004 by a group of leaders, WUC has evolved into a global force of hundreds of Uyghur activists and supporters. Since 2017, it has implemented reforms, improving structure and leadership roles.

Through WUC's leadership, Uyghur organizations have leveraged scholarly research and witness testimony to focus increased attention on Beijing's crimes, leading to official recognition of the genocide, government bans on forced labor products, and company divestments from tainted supply chains. In addition, the WUC has taken several legal actions in different jurisdictions to hold China accountable. They have reminded countries of their obligations under the Rome Statute to protect victims of the genocide, and to combat China's transnational repression. They have encouraged nations to grant safe harbor to victims, such as Canada's recent decision to accept 10,000 Uyghur refugees. And they have pressed policymakers to address the atrocities in key lawmaking bodies in the UN, EU, U.S. Congress, and the parliaments of Canada, the UK, and EU countries.

WUC's efforts to expose Beijing's repression have inspired other victim groups, from Tibetans and Falun Gong to Hongkongers and the Taiwanese. By fostering solidarity and inclusivity, WUC has become a model for constructive collaboration among oppressed groups fighting for freedom and democracy. It has mobilized the Uyghur diaspora, strengthened ties with other groups affected by Beijing's repression, and deepened collaboration with Uyghur Academicians and Uyghur researchers, notably during the Uyghur Tribunal, when we, the Uyghur scholars and many university students voluntarily edited and translated more than 10,000 pages of evidentiary documents.

These successes have caught the attention of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which has increasingly devolved into fear, consternation, and paranoia. In the past year alone, it spent significant resources organizing over 400 delegations and sending more than 5,000 handpicked individuals on propaganda tours to the Uyghur region, many of whom were chosen for their willingness to echo China's narrative abroad.

Such successes are made only by great sacrifice. For decades leaders of Uyghur organizations, both at WUC and elsewhere, have endured targeted attacks by the CCP, from Interpol "red notice" arrest warrants to harassment, blackmail, and even death threats, putting immense strain on their lives, livelihoods, and families.

As WUC becomes a more significant threat to the CCP, we have also seen increasing efforts to undermine the organization's credibility by exploiting individual shortcomings or amplifying slander campaigns against Uyghur organizations and their leaders. These developments are deeply concerning, as they threaten to discredit the broader movement and drain vital energy from our community, at a time when we need all the strength, we can muster to expose the CCP and pursue accountability for its crimes.

Like all human beings, Uyghur leaders are not immune to making decisions that may not yield the best outcomes. What matters is to identify core issues, introduce internal and external mechanisms to strengthen the organization's ability and legitimacy. We believe that is precisely what WUC is committed to doing right now and will continue to do under each new generation of leaders.

As we fight against China's deception with limited resources, financial constraints, and the pain of having family members held hostage by the regime, it is essential to maintain a long-term perspective. Over 20 years, the Uyghur diaspora has built the WUC, securing important but fragile successes. Now, more than ever, we must support and protect this vital organization, which continues to be a strong voice for Uyghurs and a lifeline for the community.

As Uyghur scholars devoted to preserving our ethnic culture, we call on all leaders in the international community to support WUC, to welcome its ongoing democratic reforms. It is crucial for the WUC to take further steps internally by implementing structural reforms, creating a transparent and accountable framework in areas such as law, professional ethics, work efficiency, technology dissemination, and public services. This will enable the WUC to more effectively advance democracy and protect Uyghur rights. In unity against China's oppressive policies, and to contribute to the global movement for democracy. In the face of significant threats and challenges, we must continue to advance WUC's democratic reforms, working alongside the new generation of leaders within the organization.

With high hope for the future, we here rededicate ourselves to the cause, and stand ready to cooperate closely, provide support, and face any difficulties that may lie ahead to achieve justice and freedom for the Uyghur people.

Xi Jinping stresses cultivating more high-caliber officials for Xinjiang

21 September 2024, CGTN

Xi Jinping, general secretary of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee, has stressed cultivating more loyal, upright, responsible and high-caliber officials for Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region.

Xi, also Chinese president and chairman of the Central Military Commission, made the remarks in an instruction upon the 70th anniversary of a training program for ethnic officials in Xinjiang under the Party School of the CPC Central Committee.

Xi pointed out that the training program has played an important role in strengthening the ranks of officials, boosting economic and social development, promoting social stability and long-term security in Xinjiang over the past 70 years.

Emphasizing the need to fully and faithfully implement the Party's policy for the governance of Xinjiang, Xi urged efforts to foster a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation throughout the process of the training program.

It is important to strengthen research on the basic theories and key issues of ethnic affairs and improve the quality and effectiveness of the training program, Xi said.

Xi's instruction was read out by Chen Xi, president of the Party School of the CPC Central Committee and National Academy of Governance, at a symposium held on Saturday to mark the 70th anniversary of the training program.

China tried to influence MPs to vote against Uyghur genocide motion, documents show

18 September 2024, National Post

After the vote the People's Republic of China began efforts to 'build profiles on a number of MPs' who supported the motion

OTTAWA – Chinese government officials tried to influence Canadian MPs to vote against a 2021 motion condemning China's genocide of Uyghurs and even looked to build "profiles" on certain parliamentarians after the vote.

That's according to a summary of intelligence by Canadian security agencies and departments that was tabled at the Public Inquiry into Foreign Interference (PIFI) on Wednesday.

The document reveals that People's Republic of China (PRC) officials made "initial" efforts to influence an unspecified number of MPs to vote against the motion recognizing the country's treatment of its Uyghur and other Turkic Muslim minorities as "genocide."

The motion ultimately passed unanimously in the House of Commons. But after the vote, the document states the PRC began efforts to "build profiles on a number of MPs" who supported the motion.

"This research may have informed the PRC's decision to impose economic sanctions on some of those MPs or may have informed other actions," reads the unclassified summary of intelligence produced for the inquiry.

Those were just some of the examples of suspected or confirmed foreign interference efforts by China against Canadian MPs brought up during Michael Chong's testimony on Wednesday.

The Conservative MP also revealed that in October last year he was approached by an individual in the street offering him “political support, assistance with elections, and political advice here on (Parliament Hill),” he told the inquiry.

The twist: he realized shortly after that the individual was Haiyan Zhang, a former senior analyst at the Privy Council Office who was fired for being a suspected Chinese spy in 2003.

But when Chong raised the encounter with government officials and asked if Zhang was still a potential “national security threat,” he was told they had destroyed all files regarding Zhang.

“It’s another example of the government failing to provide information to members of Parliament to help them protect themselves against potential threats to Parliament and to our democracy,” Chong told reporters after his testimony.

Chong has been a key figure in the government’s controversial handling of foreign interference since 2023, when The Globe and Mail revealed that Canadian intelligence agencies knew for at least two years that the PRC had been collecting information about Chong as well as his family members in Hong Kong.

On Wednesday, the inquiry showed Chong a CSIS issues management brief dated May 31, 2021, that revealed that he and then Conservative MP Kenny Chiu were the target of foreign interference attempts by PRC officials.

A summary of redacted information in the 2021 brief shows CSIS already knew that China was interested in Chong’s relatives in the PRC, though the MP only found out in media reports in the spring of 2023.

It was only in the hours following the publication of the story that Chong was offered a briefing by the prime minister, his staff and the CSIS director on PRC activities targeting him and his family.

Chong was outraged that he wasn’t informed by the government for years and described the Liberals’ handling of foreign interference to date as “gross negligence.”

“I think they should be providing this information because it will allow those parliamentarians to take actions, to protect themselves, to be situationally aware. I think that’s so important,” he said Wednesday.

He was also shocked to find out that the information in 2021 was provided by the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service to then Public Safety Minister Bill Blair, but that Blair never read it for undisclosed reasons.

“It’s inconsistent with the practice of this government, or alternatively, it’s alarming incompetence not to be reading and actioning intelligence that is being sent up the chain,” Chong said.

Chong said the government needs to release “much more” information about foreign interference to the public than it has in recent years.

He pointed to the fact that the government still hasn’t significantly changed how foreign interference threats are shared with Canadians despite years of media revelations.

“We’re buried in a mountain of process,” he said. “This is not how our institution should function. This is not how Parliament should work. This is not how the government of Canada should treat threats to our national security. We’re buried under process. This should have been dealt with a long time ago.”

Uyghur-American politician calls out lack of global attention towards Xinjiang human rights crisis

17 September 2024, Indian Narrative

The Foreign Affairs and Security Minister of the East Turkistan Government-in-Exile, Salih Hudayar, called out the lack of global attention on the human rights crisis in China’s Xinjiang province, and said the perception of the province receiving substantial media and US policy attention is misleading.

In a post on social media platform X, Hudayar said, “The claim that Xinjiang is a focus on intense media and U.S. policy attention is far from the truth. Let’s be clear: Occupied East Turkistan—our country’s true name—gets little to no media and policy attention.”

Emphasising a disparity in international support between Tibet and East Turkistan, Salih stated, that while Tibet’s government in exile receives extensive financial, training, and even diplomatic support, the Uyghurs don’t get this recognition.

“Unlike Tibet, which is rightly recognized as an occupied nation, not as “Xizang,” East Turkistan remains buried under China’s propaganda. Tibet has had U.S. support with a Special Coordinator at US State Department since 1997, backing their right to self-determination,” the minister stated “Tibet’s government in exile and movement receives extensive financial, training, and even diplomatic support. Meanwhile, our people face Uyghur genocide with no similar recognition of our nation as occupied nor any dedicated support. The world must stop turning a blind eye to China’s brutal campaign of colonization, genocide, and occupation in East Turkistan,” he added.

Salih’s post came as a reaction to a news article stating that Xinjiang has garnered significant media coverage and become a key focus of US policy in recent years.

Salih Hudayar is a Uyghur-American politician dedicated to the cause of East Turkistan’s independence. He established the East Turkistan National Awakening Movement and has been at the forefront of efforts advocating for the restoration of East Turkistan's independence.

East Turkistan is a region in Central Asia that is the traditional name used by many Uyghurs and their supporters to refer to what is officially known as Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region.

The Xinjiang and Uyghur issue centers on the complex and contentious situation in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region of China.

The Uyghurs are a predominantly Muslim ethnic minority group with distinct cultural, linguistic, and religious practices. In recent years, there have been widespread reports and allegations of human rights abuses by the Chinese government against Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang.

These allegations include mass detentions in so-called "reeducation camps," extensive surveillance, forced labor, and the suppression of religious and cultural practices. The Chinese government describes these measures as part of a counter-terrorism and de-radicalization effort aimed at combating extremism.

However, international human rights organizations and some governments have criticized these actions as severe human rights violations and cultural repression.

China's Xinjiang accelerates development of 'Air Silk Road'

12 September 2024, Emirates News Agency

Urumqi Diwopu International Airport in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region added or resumed four international passenger and cargo routes in the first week of September, according to relevant authorities.

According to Xinhua News Agency, these air routes are a direct flight from Urumqi to Moscow; a direct tourist charter flight from Kuala Lumpur in Malaysia to Urumqi; a direct cargo flight from Urumqi to Baku in Azerbaijan and a direct flight from Urumqi to Armenia.

Since the beginning of this year, Xinjiang, which is located in the core area of the Belt and Road, has added or resumed eight international passenger routes and nine international cargo air routes, promoting transport connectivity and accelerating the expansion of the "Air Silk Road".

So far, Urumqi Diwopu International Airport has opened international passenger routes from Urumqi to 20 regions in 16 countries including Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan and Tajikistan.

There are 13 international cargo transport routes from this airport covering 12 countries in Central Asia, South Asia, West Asia and Europe. The main imported commodities include camel milk, clothing, shoes and boots, cherries and the main export commodities are fresh-cut flowers, medicines, and clothing, among other items.

China ramping up transnational repression, Uyghur exiles in US say

11 September 2024, VOA, Kasim Kashgar

Many exiled Uyghurs in the U.S. say China has ramped up transnational repression against them, using their relatives who still live in China to threaten them into silence abroad.

"I've been targeted online with fake accounts. ... Chinese trolls even registered for a webinar using fake emails and posted my home address, saying, 'We are watching you,' " Elfidar Iltebir, president of the Uyghur American Association, a rights group, told VOA last week in a phone interview.

The harassment prompted her to increase her home security. Iltebir said the repression has intensified, especially over the past two years.

"People are afraid to come out and advocate, fearing for their families' safety," she said.

From 2017 to 2020, she said, nearly every Uyghur American had at least one family member detained in Xinjiang, spurring many to activism. But as China increased pressure on these exiles, many of them are thinking twice about their activist work.

She described a climate of fear within her organization. "Some of our supporters now ask if they can help behind the scenes, afraid to be seen publicly," Iltebir said. Chinese agents, sending messages through Uyghur relatives in Xinjiang, "tell us not to attend political or cultural events, not to join any organizations, to stay away from activists.

"They even dictate who to invite to weddings. I've seen community members receive these orders."

VOA reached out to the Chinese Embassy in Washington for comment on the allegations of transnational repression targeting Uyghur Americans. The embassy did not respond to multiple inquiries.

However, the FBI says it is aware of such activity targeting Uyghurs and other ethnic minority groups in the United States.

"Tactics and patterns morph with advancements in technology," the federal police agency said in a statement to VOA. "These acts – often identified as transnational repression (TNR) – represent severe violations of international norms, U.S. law, and individual rights and freedoms. TNR conducted by any government, against any person including Uyghur Americans, is unacceptable."

The agency says it has worked to raise awareness of the problem among state, local and university law enforcement partners and has conducted training to help vulnerable communities recognize repressive tactics and examples of transnational harassment. It also provides resources in 60 languages, including in Uyghur.

Iltebir detailed her organization's work with the FBI to support the estimated 10,000 to 15,000 Uyghur Americans in combating China's transnational repression.

China, Uyghurs and human rights

Uyghurs are a largely Muslim minority group. Approximately 12 million Uyghurs live in China's northwestern Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, where accusations of mass detention, forced labor and other human rights abuses have drawn global attention and condemnation.

In recent years, the U.S., U.N., European Parliament and rights organizations have condemned China or its policies in the Uyghur region. Some have accused Beijing of committing genocide and crimes against humanity.

Allegations include the arbitrary mass imprisonment of Uyghurs and other Muslim and Turkic groups, forced labor, forced sterilization, family separation and other abuses.

China denies any wrongdoing in the region, labeling the targeted Uyghurs as extremists, terrorists and separatists and justifying its policies as necessary measures to combat terrorism and separatism.

Fear and anonymity

Fear often keeps exiles from speaking out or enabling the media to confirm accusations.

One such U.S.-based Uyghur rights activist is a man who came to the U.S. for his education. He spoke to VOA on the condition of anonymity, fearing retaliation and increased harassment of his family members in Xinjiang.

In 2017, he said, his sibling and extended family were arbitrarily detained in Xinjiang.

"The only thing I was obsessed with was my academic work," he said, but the detentions forced him into activism.

After joining a Washington-based rights group advocating for human rights in China, including the Uyghurs, in 2019, he began receiving intimidating social media messages from Chinese authorities.

"I started receiving all sorts of intimidation from [Chinese] police through WhatsApp and other social media platforms," he recalled. "They even invited me to a third country to meet them there. I never agreed."

Despite the evolving nature of these tactics, he said, the harassment has never ceased.

"I have submitted details of these incidents to the FBI at least 15 times in the past and provided them with all the details of the communications I've received over the past few years," he said.

But ultimately, he said, the FBI can do nothing because the harassers are based outside the U.S.

However, the agency has taken legal action against China's transnational repression schemes in the U.S.

In a case last month, Wang Shujun of New York was found guilty of acting as a covert Chinese agent. The FBI said he supported transnational repression by posing as a member of a pro-democracy group while feeding Beijing information about its members.

Political response

"Chinese Communist agents should not be able to threaten and intimidate American residents without consequences, anywhere – especially and including here in the United States," said Republican U.S. Representative Chris Smith, chairman of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, in an email to VOA on Tuesday.

Smith emphasized that while the FBI has made efforts, "more can and must be done to stop transnational repression and abuse."

According to the FBI, China has long targeted diaspora communities, particularly what China describes as the "five poisons" - groups seen as threats to Chinese Communist Party rule, including Uyghurs, Tibetans, democracy activists, Falun Gong practitioners and Taiwanese independence advocates.

"The PRC has used proxies, including private investigators, to harass dissidents in the U.S.," the FBI told VOA.

Despite the challenges, Iltebir remains determined to speak out.

"We cannot be silenced. If we don't speak out, who will? Seeing non-Uyghurs stand with us inspires me to continue this fight for freedom, justice and human rights," she said.

China bishop leads patriotic education tour in Xinjiang

09 September 2024, UCA

Bishop Zhan Silu went to Uyghurs to preach doctrines promoted by the ruling communist party, alleged Bitter Winter

An Italy-based human rights and religious liberty magazine has accused a Catholic bishop in China of organizing a "patriotic education" tour for priests to the controversial Xinjiang region.

The study tour led by Bishop Zhan Silu of Xiapu from Aug. 18-26 to Xinjiang can be seen as an example of how religious personnel of the five state-sanctioned religions are deployed as propaganda agents, Bitter Winter said.

The magazine alleged that the tour was part of the study and practice of "Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for the New Era," an ideological doctrine promoted by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

During the tour, Silu had emphasized that “Xinjiang is an inseparable part of China’s territory,” calling the ethnic groups there “blood-related family members of the Chinese nation,” according to the Bitter Winter.

“Religious personnel should be politically dependable and study and preach Xi Jinping’s thought diligently,” Silu was quoted as saying by the Bitter Winter.

Earlier in January, Chinese authorities had ratified a law on “patriotic education,” aimed at promoting CCP’s massive domestic propaganda effort.

The state-approved religious groups had issued detailed guidelines on how the clergy are expected to cooperate in this propaganda system.

Silu “has not changed his political proclivities,” the Bitter Winter alleged pointing out that he was excommunicated by the Vatican for 18 years because of his appointment by Chinese government authorities.

The matter of bishop appointments in China has been a bone of contention between Beijing and the Vatican.

While Beijing insists that it must approve bishop appointments as a matter of its national sovereignty, the Vatican argues that these appointments fall under the pope’s authority to choose the successors of Christ’s apostles.

Silu’s appointment was approved by the Vatican and his excommunication was lifted as part of a China-Vatican deal in 2018, the Bitter Winter said.

The magazine pointed out that Silu and his group may not have succeeded in persuading and converting anyone to the “CCP gospel.”

Xinjiang has gained international attention for the alleged mass incarceration of ethnic groups including Muslim-majority Uyghurs.

It is estimated that some 1.8 million Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims have been detained under flimsy pretexts during mass detentions that began more than seven years ago in 2017.

Travel warning issued over CCP Xinjiang efforts

06 September 2024, Taipei Times, Chen Yun, Chung Li-hua and Jonathan Chin

The Executive Yuan yesterday warned against traveling to or doing business in China after reports that Beijing is recruiting Taiwanese to help conceal the use of forced Uighur labor.

The government is aware that Taiwan-based influencers and businesses are being asked to make pro-Beijing content and offered incentives to invest in the region, Executive Yuan acting spokeswoman Julia Hsieh (謝子涵) told a news conference.

Taiwanese are urged to be aware of the potential personal and reputational harm by visiting or operating businesses in China, Hsieh said, adding that agencies are fully apprised of the situation.

A national security official said that former Mainland Affairs Council (MAC) members who served under former president Ma Ying-jeou (馬英九) are to lead a delegation of Taiwanese investors to Xinjiang on Sept. 19.

China since last month has been arranging for business groups to tour the region in a move to evade international outcry over China’s use of forced Uighur labor and support for the Russian war effort in Ukraine, the official said on condition of anonymity.

Beijing officials “encourage Taiwanese entrepreneurs to establish a presence or facilitate the flow of logistics through Central Asia,” the source said. “The purpose is to conceal the point of origin labels on their products and draw investments for cotton.”

Chinese Communist Party regional head Ma Xinrui (馬興瑞) is overseeing these activities, the official said.

Taiwanese investments might help Beijing’s efforts to stabilize its flagging economy, especially the real-estate sector and capital flows, they said.

State-affiliated studios produce content on daily life, consumer goods and tourism pushing narratives that deny instability in Hong Kong and mass incarceration of Uighurs in Xinjiang, they said.

These studios are followed by up to 130 million people on social media and the introduction of artificial intelligence allowed some to generate the same content in 40 to 50 languages, the official said.

On Tuesday, Oakland University associate professor of journalism and public relations Su Chiao-ning (蘇巧寧) told a conference in Washington that Taiwanese are being co-opted in Beijing’s cognitive warfare activities.

Beijing is accused of committing human rights abuses including torture, compulsory institutionalization and sexual violence against incarcerated Uighurs, Su said, citing a UN report on China’s alleged crimes of humanity dated 2022.

Travel content promoting the beautiful rustic landscape and simple honest folk of Xinjiang is flooding Taiwanese social media amid a violent Chinese campaign to wipe out the Uighur language and culture, she said.

The spread of propaganda created by the communist regime’s apologists is a dangerous trend for Taiwan, Su said, adding that the government must do more to promote public awareness about Beijing’s influence on media.

The MAC yesterday said there has been a significant rise in content produced by influencers designed to promote Xinjiang as an ideal destination for travel and investment.

"We are still trying to understand the real motives behind this so-called 'Xinjiang fever,'" MAC Deputy Minister Liang Wen-chieh (梁文傑) told a news conference.

Some of the promotional content about Xinjiang is attempting to whitewash Beijing's human rights record in the region, Liang said.

"Due to human rights issues, clothes made from Xinjiang-grown cotton is now boycotted by many countries in the international community. Those seeking business opportunities there should be aware of the situation," he said.

If Internet celebrities received funding from the Chinese government to produce videos or other content, they could be contravening the Anti-Infiltration Act (反滲透法) for receiving instructions, sponsorships or petitions from hostile foreign forces to disrupt social order, disseminate false information and interfere in elections in Taiwan, he added.

August

China deflects after UN renews calls to investigate Xinjiang abuses

30 August 2024, VOA, William Echols

On August 27, United Nations human rights chief Volker Turk renewed calls for Beijing to strengthen protections of minorities in China's northwestern Xinjiang region and to fully investigate "allegations of human rights violations, including torture."

The appeal comes nearly two years after the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) released a report, which found Beijing's treatment of Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in China "may constitute international crimes," particularly "crimes against humanity."

In response, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said China was ready to have a "constructive exchange" with the OHCHR, but warned it to "refrain from being used by political forces aiming at containing and vilifying China."

Lin then repeated a well-worn Chinese propaganda talking point that people in Xinjiang were enjoying historic levels of happiness and prosperity.

"People of all ethnic groups in China are equal and their legitimate rights and interests are fully protected," Lin said. "Xinjiang today enjoys social stability and economic growth and the people there live a happy life."

That is false.

While China has invested billions of dollars to develop resource-rich Xinjiang and turn it into a driver of economic growth, those efforts have been coupled with grave human rights abuses.

A wide body of evidence suggests Chinese authorities have subjected Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang to mass internment, forced sterilization, torture, sexual violence, forced labor, religious repression and other forms of cultural erasure.

At the heart of this repressive system are Beijing's internment camps, where the government has detained an estimated 1.8 million people in Xinjiang. China portrays those detention facilities as vocational training centers aimed at eliminating poverty and extremism.

But U.S. lawmakers have shared ample documentation that Chinese authorities use the camps to subject detainees to "forced labor, torture, political indoctrination, and other severe human rights abuses."

China claimed it has since closed those facilities after the individuals who passed through them succeeded in finding better work.

In April 2021, the Australian Strategic Policy Institute (ASPI) identified 385 detention sites through a years-long process using satellite imagery, construction contracts, government documents and eye-witness testimony.

ASPI said China built or expanded those 385 facilities between 2017 and 2021.

There is evidence authorities have shuttered some of those facilities, although Beijing's strict control of media and the lack of government transparency complicates verification efforts.

To verify the ASPI's claims, an Agence France-Presse (AFP) team traveled to 26 of the 385 documented sites.

In their report, published in September 2023, AFP said

10 of the 26 sites "appeared operational," but authorities did not grant them access, thwarting attempts to "identify anyone who was indisputably incarcerated."

International news crews attempting to report on the ground in Xinjiang have repeatedly faced roadblocks. Further complicating verification efforts, China regularly targets the family members of Uyghur activists who speak out against rights abuses. In August, Tahir Imin, a U.S.-based Uyghur activist, told VOA that authorities had prosecuted six of his former business associates, and 28 of his family members, because of their "association" with him.

In June, a U.N. human rights expert said that China had detained Gulshan Abbas, a Uyghur doctor in Xinjiang, six days after her sister criticized the persecution of Uyghurs at an event in Washington D.C.

The U.N. expert said the Chinese government sentenced Abbas to 20 years on unfounded terrorism-related charges to retaliate for her sister's activism.

Six Uyghur reporters from Radio Free Asia, a VOA sister organization, stated dozens of their family members had been detained and sent to camps "for ill-defined reasons."

"Beijing's brazen refusal to meaningfully address well-documented crimes in Xinjiang is no surprise, but shows the need for a robust follow-up by the UN human rights chief and UN member states," said Maya Wang, associate China director at Human Rights Watch.

China willing to engage with UN rights body on Xinjiang

28 August 2024, VOA, Kasim Kashgar

China says it is ready to engage with the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, or OHCHR, after the U.N. body called this week for a comprehensive review of Beijing's laws and policies in Xinjiang.

Speaking at a regular briefing on Wednesday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said, "China is willing to engage in constructive exchanges and cooperation" with OHCHR but added that a review should be conducted "on the basis of mutual respect." China and its policies in Xinjiang have been a persistent point of tension in recent years for the international community and Beijing. The Chinese government has been blamed for incarcerating more than 1 million Uyghurs in Xinjiang, with some accusing it of genocide, a charge that Beijing strongly denies.

In a 2022 report, Michelle Bachelet, then-U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights, detailed alleged abuses in Xinjiang. The report cited abuses such as mass arbitrary detentions and forced labor and concluded that these practices might amount to crimes against humanity. The report also urged the Chinese government to address these violations and implement meaningful reforms.

On Tuesday, just days ahead of the anniversary, OHCHR released an update to the report and renewed its call for a thorough review of China's laws, especially those impacting ethnic and religious minorities in Xinjiang.

Ravina Shamdasani, spokesperson for U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Türk, urged Beijing to conduct a "full review, from the human rights perspective, of the legal framework governing national security and counterterrorism," and called for enhanced protections against discrimination for minorities, including in Xinjiang, Tibet and Hong Kong. "We understand that many problematic laws and policies remain in place in Xinjiang," Shamdasani said. China says the measures are necessary to combat extremism, terrorism and separatism.

While Foreign Ministry spokesperson Lin Jian said China was willing to engage, he also warned against the "politicization of human rights and divisive confrontational actions."

The U.N. has been actively raising individual cases of concern with the Chinese government, urging the release of arbitrarily detained individuals and seeking clarity on the status of those whose families are inquiring about them.

Shamdasani emphasized the high commissioner's commitment to continuing engagement with China and advocacy on behalf of victims. "Our goal remains to improve human rights protections for all individuals on the ground," she added.

Calls for accountability

Rayhan Asat, a human rights lawyer and nonresident senior fellow at the Atlantic Council, described the high commissioner's update as a crucial acknowledgment of China's failure to implement U.N. recommendations or halt its repressive policies against Uyghurs.

"Despite the high commissioner's years of engagement, progress remains absent as the laws underpinning mass imprisonment remain in place," Asat told VOA. "The need for a renewed approach, combining public and private pressure, is evident." Asat is a co-author of a study released earlier this month by the Genocide Studies Program at Yale University. The report says China's mass imprisonment of Uyghurs constitutes both a crime against humanity and a crime of genocide.

The Yale report estimates that if this mass incarceration in Xinjiang continues, Uyghurs could suffer a cumulative 4.4 million years of incarceration. Asat's brother, Ekpar Asat, who has been arbitrarily imprisoned by Chinese authorities in Xinjiang, is among the many cases studied in the report. Ekpar, a Uyghur media tech entrepreneur, was detained in 2016 after returning to China from a U.S. State Department exchange program. He was later sentenced to 15 years in prison on charges of "inciting ethnic discrimination and ethnic hatred."

In a statement on Tuesday, Human Rights Watch urged the U.N. and its member states to intensify their efforts to pressure the Chinese government to end its abuses in Xinjiang.

"Beijing's brazen refusal to meaningfully address well-documented crimes in Xinjiang is no surprise but shows the need for a robust follow-up by the U.N. human rights chief and U.N. member states," Maya Wang, associate China director at Human Rights Watch, said in the statement.

"Contrary to the Chinese government's claims, its punitive campaign against millions of Uyghurs in Xinjiang continues to inflict great pain," she said.

Raphäel Viana David, China program manager at the International Service for Human Rights, welcomed the high commissioner's commitment to working with civil society and advocating for the implementation of all U.N. recommendations to China.

"Beijing does not get to cherry-pick: U.N. human rights findings are indivisible and, altogether, chart the only genuine path forward for China to achieve meaningful human rights change," he said in a statement on the ISHR website.

David added that any deviation from adhering to U.N. recommendations is deceitful and demonstrates a lack of commitment to being a responsible global actor. "We believe that the OHCHR needs to fulfill its mandate in a just and objective manner, respect countries' sovereignty, respect facts, conduct constructive dialogue and cooperation with countries," Lin said.

He also highlighted China's historical achievements in human rights in Xinjiang.

"Xinjiang today enjoys social stability and economic growth, and the people there live a happy life," he said. "It is at its best in history, where people of all ethnic groups are working together for a better life."

Persistent concerns

The U.N. Human Rights Office's latest call for reform follows a June visit by a U.N. human rights team to China, where they engaged with authorities on counterterrorism policies and the criminal justice system. Despite those discussions, concerns persist. "Allegations of human rights violations, including torture, need to be fully investigated," the update stated. The OHCHR still faces challenges related to limited access to information in Xinjiang and risks of reprisals against those engaging with the United Nations.

"We continue to follow the current human rights situation closely, despite these challenges," Shamdasani noted.

China's Xinjiang officials want to build 'strategic barrier for geopolitical security'

27 August 2024, SCMP

Authorities in Xinjiang have vowed to make stability and security their top priority and to turn the far western region into a "strategic barrier" against geopolitical risks, according to official media.

The Xinjiang committee of China's ruling Communist Party made the pledge in a statement at the end of its annual plenary session – attended by the top party and government officials from the region – on Saturday.

"[We should] make social stability the top priority and improve the system and mechanisms for maintaining national security," according to the statement published in Xinjiang Daily, the mouthpiece of the regional party committee.

It said Xinjiang should also improve "the legal and work routines for counterterrorism and maintaining stability", along with public security and stability on the border.

The Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region shares borders with countries including Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan.

China has been accused of human rights abuses in Xinjiang, including that at least 1 million Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities were held in mass internment camps. Beijing has denied the claims, saying the centres were for "vocational training" and that its policies in the region are aimed at cracking down on terrorism and extremism.

In Saturday's statement, the committee also said it would better support the modernisation of the military, improve mechanisms to fight foreign interference in Xinjiang, and build the region into "a strategic barrier to maintain national geopolitical security" for China. It called for the sense of identity and community to be strengthened among all ethnic groups, with more efforts needed to publicise, educate, research and interpret the idea of the Chinese nation's "one common community".

The party's regional committee also said the legal framework for governing religious affairs should be improved.

On developing the region, it said oil and gas exploration and development should be accelerated, with more efforts towards clean and efficient use of coal, developing green energy, and exploration of strategic mineral resources.

The committee also urged the regional government to speed up development of a free-trade pilot zone and projects linking to Central Asia.

In addition, the statement echoed a pledge made last week by Yin Bai, who heads the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission that oversees security and law enforcement in China, to prevent and resist "colour revolutions".

Yin told state news agency Xinhua that "safeguarding political security" and strengthening national security would be the commission's top priority. He also stressed the need for efforts to counter terrorism, maintain stability and "fight against separatism and infiltration".

With China locked in an escalating rivalry with the United States, Beijing is increasingly focused on national security.

An entire section of a policy document released in July after the third plenum – a key party meeting – is devoted to “modernising” national security, which the leadership sees as the “pivotal foundation” for China’s development.

The regional committee on Saturday also approved a decision to expel former Xinjiang deputy security chief Ma Guoqiang from the party, according to Xinjiang Daily. Ma, 51, was placed under investigation for corruption in August last year. He has mostly worked in Xinjiang’s Aksu prefecture, where a dozen officials have been investigated for corruption in recent years. In March, Dou Wangui – Ma’s former boss in Aksu and vice-chairman of Xinjiang’s political advisory body – was also placed under investigation for graft.

China: two years after Xinjiang findings, UN Rights Chief reports ‘limited access to information’, ‘reprisals’ against activists

27 August 2024, ISHR

A spokesperson for the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Volker Türk, issued today a rare public statement on his Office’s work on China, marking two years since the release of its groundbreaking report on the grave human rights situation in the Uyghur region (Xinjiang).

In a public statement on 27 August, the Office of the High Commissioner (OHCHR) stressed its engagement and recommendations in areas where it has been pushing for responses and results from the Chinese government, including on Xinjiang, Tibet, Hong Kong, and individual cases ‘of particular concern’ in mainland China.

This includes a renewed call on Beijing to ‘take prompt steps to release all individuals arbitrarily deprived of their liberty, and to clarify the status and whereabouts of those whose families have been seeking information about them.’

‘I welcome Volker Türk’s strong endorsement of the Xinjiang report. One day is a day too long for victims like my mother. This must be an urgent wake-up call for all countries to take concrete and swift action to hold China accountable for its long list of documented human rights violations, starting at the UN Human Rights Council.’

Ziba Murat, activist and daughter of arbitrarily detained Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas

Two years ago, on 31 August 2022, former High Commissioner Michelle Bachelet released a long-awaited report determining the possible commission of ‘crimes against humanity’ against Uyghurs and other Muslim peoples by Chinese authorities. While the UN report already concluded that conditions were in place for ‘serious violations to continue and recur,’ mounting documentation by UN expert bodies and civil society have confirmed the serious deterioration of the human rights situation in the Uyghur region and across China since 2022.

In today’s statement, the OHCHR underscored that ‘many problematic laws and policies remain in place’ and that allegations of human rights violations, including torture, must be ‘fully investigated’. The Office also called for a ‘full review’ with a human rights emphasis of the legal frameworks governing Chinese policies related to national security, counter-terrorism and minority rights. All of these have remained in place despite extensive concerns, including in the 2022 report, that authorities have weaponised such tools to target Muslim individuals, but also Tibetans, human rights defenders and journalists, and to clamp down on civil society space across mainland China and Hong Kong.

The Chinese government also maintains widespread and systematic restrictions, including through laws, policies and practices described in the UN report, that severely impact the intergenerational transmission of culture, language and religion of Uyghurs and Tibetans.

Beijing has perpetually attempted to present the Xinjiang report to other countries as an isolated initiative. Yet, since its release, further findings by widely-respected UN expert bodies have confirmed and expanded on its findings. Two impartial UN expert committees have called for the report’s full implementation: the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) in their unprecedented November 2022 Urgent Action Decision on Xinjiang, and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) in their May 2023 review of China. In December 2022, at least 15 UN experts also recalled numerous report findings in a strongly-worded letter to the government, laying out seven benchmarks for immediate action, yet expectedly rejected by Beijing.

'We welcome the High Commissioner's commitment to work with civil society and advocate for the implementation of all UN recommendations to China. Beijing does not get to cherry pick: UN human rights findings are indivisible and, altogether, chart the only genuine path forward for China to achieve meaningful human rights change. Any step away from it is deceitful and a proof of lack of willingness to be a responsible global actor.'

Raphäel Viana David, ISHR China Programme Manager Crucially, the OHCHR stated it continues to 'follow closely the situation,' but reported 'difficulties posed by limited access to information and the fear of reprisals against individuals who engage with the United Nations.' The High Commissioner's Office also committed to advocating on behalf of victims and engaging with civil society 'to seek tangible progress in the protection of human rights for all in China.'

'After two years, High Commissioner Türk's update that the Office is committed to tangible change in China is heartening. Yet, China has not implemented any OHCHR recommendations, and independent investigations are still limited or blocked. Victims like my brother Ekpar Asat, who endured three years in solitary confinement, and families facing China's psychological warfare can't wait any longer. Türk's work and engagement with China must fully acknowledge these realities.'

Rayhan Asat, Uyghur human rights lawyer

Further evidence of the absence of good faith from Beijing in its engagement with the UN include an increased rejection rate of recommendations during its last UN human rights peer-review in January 2024 – including all related to the Xinjiang report and UN Treaty Bodies – and its unwillingness to provide unrestricted access to the whole territory for UN Special Rapporteurs listed in the Xinjiang report.

China also remains among the top perpetrators of reprisals against those cooperating, or seeking to cooperate with the UN, and has increased transnational repressive tactics to try silencing activists and victims abroad. In June 2024, two UN experts condemned the continued enforced disappearance of Uyghur doctor Gulshan Abbas, recalling the Xinjiang report's findings of a pattern of reprisals 'against family members of Uyghurs in exile who had engaged in advocacy.'

'Beijing has done its best to discredit the report, even touring foreign officials through Xinjiang, avoiding substantial discussion about the UN's findings,' added Raphäel Viana David. 'The High Commissioner's message places the Xinjiang report at heart of his engagement with Beijing. The onus is now on China to take meaningful steps forward and on the Human Rights Council to closely monitor until it does so,' Viana concluded.

In June 2020, June 2022 and September 2022, over 40 UN experts jointly rang the alarm at China's human rights crisis, urging the Human Rights Council to establish a monitoring and reporting mechanism on the country's rights situation.

Last June, ISHR and three rights groups jointly released translations of the Xinjiang report in the five remaining UN official languages.

ISHR urges:

The Chinese government to adopt a roadmap with a clear timeline for the implementation of recommendations from the OHCHR Xinjiang report and other UN human rights mechanisms, and for its meaningful reengagement with UN bodies, including by allowing unrestricted access to the whole territory for UN independent experts for adequate investigation and by putting an immediate end to all acts of reprisals as reported by the UN;

ISHR further calls on:

The Human Rights Council to establish a monitoring and reporting mechanism on the human rights situation in China, with a view to uphold the integrity of its mandate and put an end to China's exceptionalism.

The High Commissioner to continue monitoring the human rights situation in China, to publicly report about it, including on the implementation of the Xinjiang report and any restrictions in accessing information, and to publicly advocate on individual cases.

China: Update on the work of UN Human Rights Office

27 August 2024, OHCH

Spokesperson for the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Ravina Shamdasani.

In response to questions in relation to our work on China, particularly as we approach two years since the publication of our Office's assessment on human rights in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region on 31 August 2022, here is an update.

The High Commissioner and the Office have had detailed exchanges with the Government of China on a range of critical issues, such as counter-terrorism laws and policies, criminal justice, other policies of concern that impact on the human rights of ethnic and religious minorities, including in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region and the Tibet

Autonomous Region, equality and non-discrimination, as well as national security and human rights concerns in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region.

Notably, in June this year, a UN Human Rights team visited China and engaged in dialogue with the authorities, specifically on counter-terrorism policies and the criminal justice system. In particular, on Xinjiang, we understand that many problematic laws and policies remain in place, and we have called again on the authorities to undertake a full review, from the human rights perspective, of the legal framework governing national security and counter-terrorism and to strengthen the protection of minorities against discrimination. Allegations of human rights violations, including torture, need to be fully investigated.

We hope to continue our active engagement with the Government, as well as with civil society actors, to seek tangible progress in the protection of human rights for all in China.

We are also continuing to follow closely the current human rights situation in China, despite the difficulties posed by limited access to information and the fear of reprisals against individuals who engage with the United Nations.

We have continued to raise with the Government individual cases of particular concern, calling on the authorities to take prompt steps to release all individuals arbitrarily deprived of their liberty, and to clarify the status and whereabouts of those whose families have been seeking information about them.

We are continuing to advocate for implementation of these and other recommendations made by us, as well as those made by other human rights mechanisms and during the Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review process.

The High Commissioner is committed to sustained engagement with the Government of China and to advocating on behalf of victims – always guided by the goal of helping improve human rights protections for the people on the ground.

China's Xinjiang region emerges as a Powerhouse of international trade

26 August 2024, Pakistan Today

BEIJING: Having overcome multiple challenges, China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region is now presenting a scene of diversified development, with new high-quality productivity, micro- and macro-economy, art, culture, faith and social values meeting the needs of all social classes.

"Big shoutout for local and central governments of China for channelizing a slew of resources to make Xinjiang a powerhouse of international trade, logistic & economic corridor and resounding hub of all ethnic groups," according to Pakistan's 9-member media delegation that toured the Xinjiang last week, Gwadar Pro reported on Monday.

The delegation visited Xinjiang counter-terrorism and counter-extremism exhibition, Xinjiang Islamic Institute, Xinjiang Software Park, Tianshan Cloud Computing, Xinjiang Art Theatre "Mukam", Xinjiang International Grand Bazar, China-Kazakhstan International Cooperation Center, Khorgos, Jinyi international trade group, Ili general' mansion, Shaanxi mosque, Kazanqi Ethnic culture street, Chabuchar Daily, Uzonbrak resettlement village of Chabuchar and Ili Yimuxin Dairy company, The members of the delegation comprehended phases of the ongoing deeper transformation of Xinjiang in all spheres of life.

They observed that Xinjiang's economic turnaround is no less than a miracle. It reflects the unflinching resolve of the Chinese leadership to make things happen, one of the delegates expressed.

They applauded Xinjiang Software Park dubbed as a bridge connecting China and abroad for cultural and economy.

Xinjiang inheriting the glory of the past one thousand years, the ancient Silk Road is awakening around the corner of a new era, setting an unprecedented starting point of prosperity for Xinjiang.

With the further implementation of China's Belt and Road Initiative, Xinjiang is brimming with development opportunities like never before.

Because of its unique strategic position as a westward gateway, location and industrial agglomeration benefits, barrage of fortunes are available for Pakistan enterprises in Xinjiang Software Park, delegation was informed.

Delegations also witnessed enormous government support for development of Uyghur performing art in the shape of Xinjiang Uyghur Muqam Art which is a comprehensive art integrating singing, dancing, and music, widely prevalent in Uyghur communities across northern and southern Xinjiang.

Meanwhile Xinjiang International Grand Bazar mesmerized delegation with its unique historical architecture, traditional facade of shops, medieval pathways and shades of many ethnic groups.

There are two huge buildings in Grand Bazaar, and the exterior of the building is khaki, which is very thick, and the characteristic pillars and domes are quite beautiful.

Delegation also saw a mosque on the south side of the square, and there are many Muslims come here to pray every day, which are full of Islamic style.

The Silk Road tower is the most famous scenic spot in Xinjiang Grand Bazaar, which has also left a very deep impression on the delegation members.

Paintings and exhibitions on all the layers of the tower, which show the history of the Silk Road.

The interior of Xinjiang Grand Bazaar is a huge market, where numerous traders sell Xinjiang's special commodities such as dried fruits, clothing, attar, Yingjisha knives, handicraft and other various products, and that is quite worth to visit.

"The whole international Grand Bazaar is the most ethnic place in Urumqi," according to Mr. Xin from the Information office of Urumqi.

The Sunday Story: Arresting Your Brothers and Sisters

25 August 2024, NPR

In the Xinjiang region of western China, the government has rounded up and detained at least hundreds of thousands of Uyghurs and other Muslim ethnic groups. Many haven't been heard from in years, and others are still desperately searching for their families. Western governments have called this crackdown a cultural genocide and a possible crime against humanity.

NPR Correspondent Emily Feng has been reporting on Uyghurs inside and outside of China for years. In this episode, she profiles two Uyghur men who have found themselves sometimes unwilling actors within the Chinese state's systems of control over Uyghurs. As they work to silence others, they sometimes find themselves silenced as well.

Hundreds of Uyghur scientists imprisoned in China, rights group says

23 August 2024, VOA, Kasim Kashgar

Index on Censorship, an organization that promotes freedom of expression globally, is featuring the silencing of scientists and science around the world in the next issue of its publication. One country where scientists and intellectuals, especially those who are Uyghur, have disappeared over the years is China.

In recent years, the Uyghur rights organization Uyghur Hjel্প has documented more than 200 cases of Uyghur scientists and other science professionals being imprisoned in China, according to Abduweli Ayup, founder of the Norway-based group.

Among the most prominent is Tursunjan Nurmamat, who received his graduate and postgraduate education in the United States. Nurmamat, who is from the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in northwestern China, specialized in molecular biology and was working as a science editor when he disappeared in 2021.

In addition, he translated English nonfiction books about science and scientists into the Uyghur language. He used his well-known pen name, Bilge, for these translations, which he published on his social media accounts in China.

One of Nurmamat's former employers, Shanghai's Tongji University, confirmed with Radio Free Asia reporters in July 2021 that he had been arrested and had been under investigation since April that year. In response to VOA's request for more information, Liu Pengyu, spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, wrote, "I am not aware of this specific case, thus having nothing to share. China is a law-based country, and I believe the judicial and law enforcement institutions perform their jobs in accordance with law."

Just before Nurmamat's arrest by Xinjiang police, he announced his new role as a science editor at Cell Press, a publisher of scientific journals headquartered in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

"When I last spoke with him before his forced disappearance, he said he was 'stuck and couldn't leave,' " said a friend who is an exiled Uyghur now living in Canada. The Canadian Uyghur, along with several other exiled Uyghurs in the U.S. who knew Nurmamat before his disappearance, shared with VOA details about his situation. They expressed concerns about his well-being in Chinese custody and requested anonymity because of fears for their families in Xinjiang.

Joseph Caputo, head of media and communications at Cell Press, confirmed to VOA that Nurmamat had a brief tenure at the organization but did not provide further details on his current situation.

"No one outside the Chinese government knows his current location or the length of his sentence, similar to many other cases involving Uyghur intellectuals," Uyghur Hjel্প's Ayup told VOA in a phone interview. Uyghur rights organizations say China has been increasing its crackdown on Turkic-speaking Uyghurs in Xinjiang since 2017 with human rights abuses that include arbitrary detention of over 1 million individuals, forced labor, sterilization of women and torture.

China's treatment of Uyghurs has been labeled as genocide by the U.S. and several Western parliaments. The United Nations human rights office has suggested these actions may amount to crimes against humanity. China denies these accusations, saying Xinjing-related policies are established in the context of combating violent terrorism and separatism, and it accuses the U.S. and Western anti-China forces of spreading disinformation.

Censorship of Uyghur science

Ayup described Nurmamat's case as a key example of the broader censorship affecting Uyghur science and scientists.

"The Chinese government has targeted Uyghur scientists like [Nurmamat] who have studied abroad and experienced democratic freedoms," Ayup told VOA. "His work, including translations and science materials in Uyghur, made him a target."

Ayup noted that by translating and writing extensively in Uyghur about science, Nurmamat directly challenged China's efforts to suppress the Uyghur language in education.

Over the past two decades, Uyghurs have observed that Chinese authorities have gradually removed the Uyghur language from science-related subjects in K-12 schools and universities in Xinjiang.

Ayup also compared Nurmamat's case to that of Tashpolat Tiyp, a prominent Uyghur geographer and former president of Xinjiang University, where Nurmamat completed his bachelor's and master's degrees.

Tiyp disappeared in 2017, four years before Nurmamat's arrest, while traveling from Beijing to Berlin for a scientific conference. Since then, there has been no information on his whereabouts or the charges against him.

"Even the Xinjiang University website has removed his record from its list of historic presidents, though it still lists a former president who fled to Taiwan in 1949," Ayup noted.

Dangers of US education

Nurmamat began his doctoral studies in molecular biology at the University of Wyoming in fall 2009, then moved to the University of California for a fellowship, which he completed in 2018.

During the fellowship, Nurmamat traveled to Xinjiang in summer 2017 for a job interview at Shihezi University. He took his wife, Nurimangul, and their U.S.-born 5-year-old daughter, Tumaris, with him to China, in hopes of landing a job back in China after his U.S. fellowship.

"At the airport, he was interrogated by Chinese officials, and the Chinese passports belonging to him and his wife were confiscated. Their daughter, who held a U.S. passport, was the only one spared from the interrogation," a friend said.

After weeks of questioning, Chinese authorities allowed Nurmamat to return to the U.S. to finish his fellowship but imposed strict conditions: His wife and daughter, an American citizen, had to stay in China. "He was also required to promise that he would return to China once his fellowship concluded," the friend added.

Dangerous return

Following the completion of his fellowship in 2018, Nurmamat voiced significant apprehensions about returning to China.

"I'm still really worried. Shihezi University keep asking me to return; but I'm scared to return after my experience in the last summer," he confided to his friend in the U.S. via a messaging app on April 11, 2018, a screenshot of which was shared with VOA. "My family wasn't able to join me. I'm hoping they will be able to get their passport back and join me in the U.S."

Despite these fears, Nurmamat returned to China in summer 2018, aiming to secure the release of his wife, a Xinjiang University graduate. She had been under house arrest since 2017 and was later detained in an internment facility, known as a "vocational training center," which holds over a million Uyghurs, according to his friend.

"Nurmamat thought that keeping his promise to the Chinese authorities would help free his wife and their U.S.-born daughter," the friend said.

But instead of returning directly to Xinjiang, where his wife was detained, Nurmamat took a research position at Tongji University in Shanghai. He believed Shanghai would be safer and hoped to eventually reunite with his family. But his efforts proved futile, as he eventually followed the path of other Uyghur intellectuals before him, with arrest and detention.

China's Uyghur policies a 'racialised atrocity crime', Harvard law scholar finds

22 August 2024, The Guardian, Peter Hessler

The Chinese government has imposed 4.4 million years of cumulative imprisonment on ethnic Uyghurs in its far-western Xinjiang region, a new report has found.

The report, titled Uyghur Race as the Enemy and published by the Yale Macmillan Center's Genocide Studies Program, finds high rates of incarceration are part of "racialised atrocity crimes" occurring in China against Muslim minorities.

It demands urgent action from governments to prevent genocide and ensure "the Uyghurs' ability to continue existing as a people".

The Uyghurs are a mostly Muslim, Turkic ethnic group, whose culture and language are distinct from China's ethnic Han majority.

Since 2017, Chinese authorities have waged the "People's War on Terror", which they say is aimed at stamping out Islamic extremism.

At least 1 million Uyghurs and other Muslim ethnic minorities are estimated to have been detained extrajudicially in detention camps, which Beijing says are vocational training centres.

The study's lead author Rayhan Asat, a Harvard law scholar and senior fellow with the Atlantic Council, told the ABC that the researchers set out to establish: "What is the Chinese government's understanding of extremism?"

Cases analysed in Ms Asat's report, based upon Chinese court documents, reveal "cruel and disproportionately harsh" punishments for alleged support for terrorism or extremism.

In June 2019, a Xinjiang court sentenced Zahir Memet to 15 years' imprisonment for "wearing long clothes, covering her face, and wearing a hijab" between May 2010 and May 2015, against the advice of the village officials.

"In another case that we looked at, they said 'this person is financing terrorism' basically [because] they bought a ring for their son in Türkiye," Ms Asat said. "In another case, they sent tuition fees to their kids who were studying overseas."

Having connections to Uyghurs abroad, including in Australia, has commonly been cited as a factor for being targeted by Chinese authorities for imprisonment.

World's 'highest incarceration rate' in Xinjiang

The report's cumulative sentencing of 4.4 million years figure was based on available data about prosecutions, which showed the average prison sentence handed to Uyghurs in the region was 8.8 years. Xinjiang legal authorities reported that between 2017 and 2021, a total of 540,826 individuals were prosecuted in the region.

"That makes China, especially the Uyghur region, basically the highest incarceration rate in the entire world," Ms Asat said.

Xinjiang authorities have since stopped publishing this court data, meaning these were in fact conservative figures, she said.

In China's opaque legal system, it is difficult to ascertain who is behind bars after formal prosecution and who is detained extrajudicially.

The country's official prison population is reported to be 1.69 million.

According to World Prison Brief at the University of London, however, this figure only accounts for sentenced prisoners in Chinese Ministry of Justice prisons, excluding pre-trial detainees and those held in administrative detention as well as those in camps in Xinjiang.

The Associated Press previously reported that in one county in China's Uyghur heartland alone, one in 25 people had been sentenced to imprisonment on terror-related charges.

While journalists and activists routinely became the enemy of the Chinese state, Ms Asat said, soaring rates of incarceration showed the entire Uyghur population had become enemies.

Ms Asat, whose own brother is serving a 15-year prison sentence, said that when a Uyghur is imprisoned in China, "the whole family goes in with them" — such is the level of trauma experienced by the community.

Australian Uyghur community leader Ramila Chanisheff said "every Uyghur that lives in Australia" has a family member or friend in Xinjiang "who they have lost connections with, who they don't know their situation or whereabouts".

"It's simply because they are Uyghur. China is just wanting to erase them completely, and this is the way to do it."

Earlier this year, Human Rights Watch reported that Chinese authorities had changed the names of some 630 villages, to remove cultural or religious references, in an effort to erase Uyghur culture.

Mosques across China have been demolished or altered, including the removal of minarets, as part of authorities' drive to "Sinicise Islam".

From extra-legal jailing to authoritarian 'lawfare' While the Chinese government has consistently denied human rights abuses in Xinjiang, large amounts of evidence have been gathered by journalists, human rights groups, academics and the United Nations.

A report by the UN human rights chief released in 2022 corroborated previous findings from major human rights groups, concluding that "arbitrary and discriminatory detention of members of Uyghur and other predominantly Muslim groups ... may constitute international crimes, in particular crimes against humanity".

International scrutiny had driven Chinese authorities away from extrajudicial detention towards forms of "lawfare" and weaponising criminal prosecutions, Ms Asat said.

"Chinese authorities have continued to try to justify their patently illegal conduct by calling it the opposite," wrote former China director at Human Rights Watch, Sophie Richardson, in a piece published by The Diplomat in response to the research.

"The tactic is designed to minimise international scrutiny and discourage the pursuit of accountability." Ms Asat said that little had been done by the UN human rights office since its landmark findings in 2022.

"With China opening up, after the COVID lockdown, we see everybody is going to China ... as if this is doing business with a normal, democratic regime," she said. "To see the prime minister of Australia, going and shaking hands, smiling for the cameras, with the very people that are imprisoning my people. That's been very difficult.

"There cannot be business as usual with the Chinese government."

The UN Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery concluded in 2022 that forced labour among Uyghur, Kazakh and other ethnic minorities in sectors such as agriculture and manufacturing had occurred in Xinjiang.

For years, trade unions and human rights groups have demanded Australia ban the import of goods such as textiles or solar panels suspected of being made with Uyghur forced labour.

Ms Chanisheff said the Albanese government should impose sanctions on Chinese officials involved in human rights abuses in Xinjiang – just as Australia had done for officials from Russia, Myanmar and Iran.

"We are sick of our government, our foreign minister and our now prime minister being sympathetic or empathetic. We're sick of the words when we've got millions of people disappearing," she said.

"Australia claims that we are the strongest partner for China, but what kind of friend do you have when you know they're committing genocide, ethnic cleansing – and you're quiet about it?"

A spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade said: "Australia has consistently condemned human rights violations against the Uyghurs and other ethnic and Muslim minorities in Xinjiang and across China."

The spokesperson said that at the UN Human Rights Council in January 2024, Australia called on China to "repeal legislation and cease practices which discriminate against Uyghurs on the basis of race or religion, cease arbitrary detention, coercive labour transfer and family separation programs; and end restrictions on movement and on rights to enjoy their own culture and language".

7 brothers from prominent Uyghur family confirmed jailed in Xinjiang

19 August 2024, RFA, Shohret Hoshur

China arrested them on flimsy charges during mass incarcerations that started in 2017.

A man walks towards the entrance of a vocational and technical school believed to be a detention facility in Jiashi county, Kashgar Prefecture, China's northwestern Xinjiang region, July 15, 2023.

Seven brothers from a prominent Uyghur family in Kashgar have been sentenced to terms ranging from nine to 17 years for charitable work "supporting Uyghurs" and overseas trips, as part of the ongoing mass incarceration campaign against the mostly Muslim group that started in 2017, three people with knowledge of the situation said.

The Obulqasim brothers – Abdusalam, 45; Abduhelil, 47; Mametsidiq, 49; Yusupjan, 51; Memmettursun, 54; Pazil, 56; and Sabir, 62 – were businessmen active in construction materials, electrical appliances and other products.

They were detained and imprisoned amid mass arrests of Uyghurs and are serving their sentences in prisons in Kashgar and Urumqi, the sources said.

"They are one of the richest families in Kashgar," said Abduweli Ayup, founder Uyghur Hjelp, also known as Uyghuryar, a Norway-based nonprofit organization that documents Uyghurs who have been arrested and imprisoned. He said he confirmed through his information network that the seven brothers were all jailed.

They are among the estimated 1.8 million Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims detained under flimsy pretexts during mass detentions that began more than seven years ago, as Chinese authorities rounded up businesspeople, clerics, intellectuals and those who had traveled abroad years before or who taught the Quran to youngsters.

Claiming they were fighting separatism and terrorism, China has clamped down harshly on Uyghurs, penalizing those who communicated with Uyghurs outside of Xinjiang or offered financial support.

Though Chinese authorities long prohibited Uyghurs from traveling abroad, there was a brief period after 2010 when they were encouraged to obtain passports after international pressure.

But later, authorities deemed suspicious those who did obtain passports or merely applied for them and subsequently detained in camps and prisons.

Active businessmen

Their father, Obulqasim, now deceased, sold and repaired watches in Kashgar. The brothers started businesses selling various goods at the city's Id Kah Market, a prime business district.

Over the years they established the Aq Orda Trade Center, selling construction materials and electrical appliances, according to Ayup. They also owned stores in Kashgar.

Pazil expanded the family business into cargo shipping, establishing a presence in Central Asia and Turkey, and became a leading Uyghur businessman. The brothers were also involved in the hotel industry.

The seven brothers were sentenced in May 2019 and received prison terms of 17, 13, 11 or nine years, said a security guard from Kashgar Prison's employee residence building.

Five of the brothers, including Abduhelil and Pazil, are serving their sentences at Kashgar Prison, also known as Yerken Peylu Prison. The other two are in jail in Urumqi, Xinjiang's capital, he said.

Targeted for supporting Uyghurs

Pazil and Yusupjan were accused of "supporting Uyghurs" through charitable work, while the others either traveled abroad or displayed "ethnic hatred and discrimination," the security guard said, referring to discrimination against Han Chinese.

Their arrests came at a time when many Uyghur businessmen were targeted for their charitable activities, Ayup added.

"I heard they were collecting money for people," the prison security guard said. "Starting from 2000, they had been a key family to be under watch."

The brothers helped other Uyghurs get jobs in Kashgar, performed charity work to benefit orphans and the poor, and contributed to children's education, Ayup said.

Pazil and Yusupjan were detained for their charity work and for their connections with Uyghur expatriates during their business operations in the cargo shipping business, he said, citing people with knowledge of the situation.

Their financial assistance to expatriate Uyghurs in need while doing business abroad was later labeled as "supporting" Uyghurs, said another source with knowledge of the situation, who did not want to be identified for fear of retribution by authorities.

They were accused of supporting Uyghurs abroad, and three other brothers were accused of ethnic hatred and discrimination, the guard said.

Authorities disclosed the details of their sentences to their families after their arrest, as there were no prior announcements or notifications about their detention," said the security guard. Another brother, Abduhelil, a filmmaker and entrepreneur, was first arrested in October 2017, held in a pretrial detention for more than 18 months and sent to a "re-education" camp, RFA reported this July. His films promoted Uyghur culture.

Authorities released Abduhelil in December 2019, but rearrested him in September 2023 for "inciting separatism" for promoting Uyghur culture in his films. He is serving a 15-year sentence in Kashgar Prison.

China diverting world attention away from Xinjiang crisis, says Swedish Uyghur Committee

16 August 2024, The News Mill

The Svenska Uyghur Kommitten (SUK), generally known as the Swedish Uyghur Committee, on Thursday said that China has been creating a facade of development to divert the world's attention away from its abuses in East Turkistan. The committee said in a statement that China's invasion and occupation of East Turkistan is a 'dark lesson in global manipulation'.

In the statement posted on X, the SUK said, "Since 1949, China's invasion and occupation of East Turkistan have not just been a blueprint for colonization and genocide against the Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples; they've been a dark lesson in global manipulation. Through economic leverage and a meticulously crafted facade of modernization, China has convinced much of the world to turn a blind eye to its crimes, all the while presenting itself as a pillar of stability on the world stage.

Claiming it to be a bitter irony, the same statement by the SUK stated that China has been using all of its tools to build a narrative away from the brutal reality of the Xinjiang region.

The statement said, "This is a bitter irony, the very tools China uses to commit and conceal its human rights abuses propaganda, economic coercion, and diplomatic double-speak are now exported as part of its global influence. But behind this facade lies the stark reality of a people fighting for survival. The international community, including nations like Sweden, cannot afford to remain complicit in this charade".

The SUK urged the world that addressing the genocide and occupation tactics of China is necessary but is not enough. They demanded that the world must support the struggle of East Turkistan people for independence.

The statement stated, "It is the only path that guarantees the survival of our people. Independence is not just a moral imperative, it is a strategic necessity in the face of a regime that has proven time and again its willingness to erase entire cultures to achieve its ends".

The world's policymakers and diplomats, do not be fooled by the veneer of progress that China projects, the statement said.

The statement added that one must understand that supporting East Turkistan's independence is not just about standing against oppression—it's about rejecting the global spread of a model that prioritises power over people.

The survival of East Turkistan is a test of whether we will allow autocracy to rewrite the rules of international conduct, or whether we will stand firm in defence of human rights, freedom, and the truth, the statement by the SUK added.

Report highlights systematic repression, human rights violations of Uyghurs in Xinjiang by China

16 August 2024, Indian Narrative

A recent report by Yale University has highlighted the precarious living conditions of Uyghur Muslims in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (XUAR) under Chinese repression.

Uyghurs have been facing deteriorating conditions in the Xinjiang region. Beijing has also intensified its crackdown on those who speak out against human rights abuses.

The report has underscored that China's extensive imprisonment of Uyghurs constitutes both a "crime against humanity" and a "genocide," representing a dangerous scale of lawfare.

It has detailed severe inconsistencies and deficiencies in China's legal system, including excessive punishments, widespread prosecutions, and unusually high incarceration rates. The analysis reveals how China's authoritarian framework undermines both domestic and international legal standards.

The Yale report also highlighted how the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has adapted its tactics to evade international scrutiny while continuing its persecution of Uyghurs.

It stated that the scale of imprisonment, unprecedented since World War II, represents the extreme reach of what scholars term "authoritarian legality" and poses a grave concern for global humanity.

The report estimates that if mass imprisonment persists, the Uyghur population could endure a cumulative total of 4.4 million years of imprisonment. Furthermore, the report also highlighted that among 13,114 records with prison sentences (excluding 25,155 without), the average prison term is approximately 8.80 years.

Earlier, a February 2022 report from the Xinjiang High People's Procuratorate revealed that 5,40,826 individuals were prosecuted in the region from 2017 to 2021.

However, with the Xinjiang court ceasing to release new data, the actual number of prosecutions is likely much higher with the missing data of 2022, 2023 and 2024.

The report also raises alarms about China's reeducation or labelled as suspicious are likely convicted, positioning the XUAR with the highest imprisonment rate in the world at 2,095 per 1,00,000 citizens.

Turkish journalists on China-sponsored Xinjiang tour give positive reports

15 August 2024, VOA, Kasim kashgar

Turkish journalist Erdal Emre shared his impressions about a recent media tour of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in northwestern China.

"Our #Xinjiang trip with journalist friends from 8 media outlets has concluded. It was a trip where we learned a lot. We will be writing about our impressions. We extend our sincere thanks to our Chinese colleagues for their hospitality," Emre wrote on the social media platform X on Wednesday.

Emre was part of a group of 11 Turkish journalists who participated in the "Media Trip in Xinjiang: Always More to Discover," a nine-day event co-sponsored by Guangming Online and the Xinjiang Cyberspace Affairs Commission.

The tour covered Urumqi, Ili, Aksu and Kashgar, cities in the north and south of Xinjiang, with the journalists closely monitored by Chinese authorities.

Guangming Online, the digital arm of the state-controlled Guangming Daily, operates under the direction of the Chinese Communist Party. The Xinjiang Cyberspace Affairs Commission, a regional government department, is responsible for overseeing internet censorship and online content management in Xinjiang.

Image campaign

Guangming Daily reported that the initiative aimed to "vividly showcase a beautiful Xinjiang" marked by "unity, harmony, prosperity, progress, security and ecological well-being."

Zhang Jun, director of the Xinjiang Cyberspace Affairs Commission, said in the news report that the goal was to counter criticism and promote a positive image of the region.

"We hope that everyone will come to understand Xinjiang through seeing it with their own eyes, tell the story of Xinjiang in different languages, and share a true Xinjiang with the world," Zhang said in the report. China's efforts to host international journalists in Xinjiang are part of its response to allegations of human rights abuses. These allegations include mass detentions, which the U.S. has labeled as genocide and the U.N. as crimes against humanity. Reports indicate that Uyghurs and Turkic Muslims face forced indoctrination, abuse, labor and sterilization in these facilities.

This strategy aligns with Chinese President Xi Jinping's directive from July 2022 to enhance external propaganda efforts. Xi stressed the importance of using various platforms to "tell the story of Xinjiang" and present the region in a favorable light, advocating a multifaceted approach to bolster China's global influence and shape perceptions of Xinjiang.

According to Abdürreşit Celil Karluk, professor of international relations at Ankara Hacı Bayram Veli University and visiting fellow at the University of Sheffield's School of East Asian Studies, China strategically spends money to try to influence Turkish public opinion through media channels.

The campaigns target a country that hosts one of the largest and most politically active Uyghur diasporas in the world. Rights groups estimate there are 50,000 to 75,000 Uyghurs living in Turkey.

"Media giants such as CRI Türk and CGNT Türk, which are directly linked to China, broadcast in Turkish 24 hours a day," Karluk said. CRI Türk is owned by China Radio International, which is a state-owned broadcaster controlled by the Chinese government.

Diverging narratives

In a video posted Tuesday by the Chinese Embassy in Turkey, Tunç Akkoç, founder of digital media organization Harici, expressed surprise at what he perceived as a stark contrast between his experience in Xinjiang and the reports from Western media.

"It is totally a different impression and a different reality from what we hear, especially from some Western media," Akkoç said.

Mustafa Birol Güger of the Cumhuriyet daily newspaper remarked that the smiling faces he observed at an Urumqi bazaar suggested to him that the populace was content.

"If you want to check the level of stress in a country, you should go to public places and look at the face of the people," Güger said. "In Urumqi, in the grand bazaar today, everyone was smiling, so that means they are happy, and if they are happy, we are happy, too. What I see is completely different from what is being told in the media."

Asli Atasoy, host of the CGTN Turkish channel's program "Chasing the Dragon," on Monday shared a blog post on Turkish news site T24 detailing her visit and an interview with Muhterem Sherif, the imam of the Noghay mosque in Urumqi. CGTN, or China Global Television Network, is a Chinese state-owned media outlet.

Sherif is quoted as saying that Uyghurs "are very satisfied" with the Chinese government's religious policies.

Opinion shaping

Karluk, the international relations professor, said that with sponsored trips like this, China aims to persuade nationalist and conservative groups in Turkey, traditionally supportive of Uyghur rights, to change their stance.

"China is also attempting to influence more nationalist conservative groups in line with its own discourses by taking them to China as part of packaged programs, particularly given the growing anti-Westernism, especially anti-Americanism, in Türkiye most since 2016," he said in an email.

Economic compromise

Yalkun Uluyol, a Uyghur rights advocate, views the Chinese sponsorship of Turkish journalists as part of China's strategy to present a favorable narrative and obscure human rights abuses.

"Similar to previous efforts, China tries to whitewash ongoing abuses and gain international legitimacy," Uluyol said.

Uluyol argues that Turkey's concerns for Uyghurs are being overshadowed by economic interests, citing a $1 billion deal with China's electric carmaker BYD and the resumption of direct flights between Istanbul and Urumqi after an eight-year hiatus as emerging evidence of Turkey's shift from criticism to accommodation of China's Uyghur policy.

Uyghur rights group condemns China for destroying 16,000 mosques in Xinjiang

15 August 2024, News Intervention

The East Turkistan National Movement (ETNM), a US-based organization dedicated to advocating for the rights of Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang, has issued a strong statement condemning China for its systematic destruction of Uyghur culture and heritage. The organization is urging the international community, human rights authorities, and activists to take decisive action against Beijing's oppressive policies.

In a statement released on X (formerly Twitter), the ETNM accused the Chinese government of demolishing over 16,000 mosques and converting other religious sites into bars and clubs. "The Chinese government is executing a calculated strategy to annihilate the identity of the East Turkistan nation to ensure its occupation of East Turkistan continues. In a blatant attempt to erase our historical and cultural roots, Beijing has demolished over 16,000 mosques, desecrated religious sites by turning them into bars and clubs, and destroyed countless historic Uyghur neighborhoods," the ETNM said. "These acts of cultural destruction are designed to break the spirit of our people and erase our Turkic and Islamic

Demolition of 16,000 Mosques in Xinjiang (Photo - X)

The ETNM also criticized Muslim-majority countries, the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation (OIC), and Central Asian Republics for their silence in the face of China’s campaign against Uyghur Muslims. The organization accused these entities of turning a blind eye to the atrocities in Xinjiang and, in some cases, even supporting China’s actions.

A 2021 report by the Australian Strategic Policy Institute (ASPI) supported ETNM’s claims, revealing through satellite imagery that significant damage has been done to over 20 percent of the region’s mosques, with many being demolished or repurposed.

Xinjiang has become one of the most heavily monitored regions in the world, with extensive use of facial recognition technology and other surveillance methods. There is substantial evidence, including satellite imagery, of large-scale internment camps in the region. These facilities, described by the Chinese government as “re-education” camps, are considered by international observers and human rights organizations to be detention centers aimed at erasing the identity of East Turkistan and its people.

The ETNM’s call to action is a plea for the world to recognize and confront the ongoing cultural genocide in Xinjiang and to support the Uyghur people in their fight for survival and freedom.

Uyghur Prison Sentences Total 4.4 Million Years

14 August 2024, National Review, Jimmy Quinn

A new analysis from Yale University attempts to put a number on the staggering cost of the Chinese Communist Party’s campaign against Uyghurs and other Turkic minorities in Xinjiang.

As Beijing has modified its campaign from that of a program of mass arbitrary detentions to one where it comes up with a bogus legal basis for imprisoning individuals, Chinese courts have sentenced residents of Xinjiang to a cumulative 4.4 million years in prison, the report, released this week, found.

“This type of legalized form of repression is profoundly alarming — it is no less widespread nor humane than the former,” stated the report, from the Genocide Studies Program at Yale’s MacMillan Center.

“In fact, one might consider it even more harmful precisely because its veil of legal legitimacy renders it elusive to international scrutiny and legalizes human rights abuses.”

The anti-Uyghur program was brought to public attention in the late 2010s — culminating in the U.S. State Department’s designation in 2021 of the abuses as genocide. Since then, international scrutiny has lagged as Beijing has sought to reframe foreign perceptions of its rule over Xinjiang.

With the completion of campaigns to raze mosques, or otherwise convert them in such a way for access by Han Chinese, and other efforts to turn the region’s cities into tourist destinations, Beijing has welcomed visitors to the region. The party’s broader effort to add the perception of legal legitimacy to the mass detentions is part of this overhaul.

To reach the 4.4 million estimate, researchers — led by Rayhan Asat, a human-rights lawyer who campaigns for the release of her brother, Ekpar, from the camps — consulted data from the Xinjiang Victims Database, an initiative that pulls together information on over 62,000 specific victims from multiple sources including leaked Chinese law-enforcement documents.

They looked at 13,000 cases that listed a prison sentence, finding that the average sentence was 8.8 years, then multiplied that number by the 540,000 individuals the Xinjiang High People’s Procuratorate said it prosecuted from 2017 to 2021.

The report says the Xinjiang victims dataset reflects only a fraction of the true size of the prison program and that the “actual numbers are far more significant.” And while the Chinese authorities make public criminal records in other parts of the country, records from almost 90 percent of cases in Xinjiang are not public, it said.

The existence of this mass detention program, of course, is already widely known, if attention to the ongoing atrocities has flagged in the years that have followed the U.S. genocide determination. But the 4.4 million figure is new and noteworthy because it helps to measure the party's employment of a legalistic charade, which is one less-known detail of the crackdown.

Like other aspects of the atrocities against Uyghurs, this advances Beijing's effort to eliminate a people. "If the Uyghur population continues to be barred from maintaining their communities, it is only a matter of time before full ethnic incapacitation is realized and the damage is irreversible," the report concluded.

Uyghur-American politician calls for enhanced cooperation to address independence struggles in China, PoGB

10 August 2024, Indian Narrative

In a significant push for greater unity and action, Salih Hidayar, a prominent Uyghur-American politician known for advocating for East Turkistan independence, has emphasized the need for increased collaboration to tackle the independence struggles of regions under Chinese and Pakistani control.

In a post on X, Salih stated, "Yesterday, a significant gathering took place at the National Press Club at Washington DC, bringing together representatives of East Turkistan, Gilgit Baltistan, and Tibet. We convened to address the ongoing independence struggles of Tibet and East Turkistan, alongside the political challenges facing Gilgit Baltistan."

In his post, Salih emphasized that the struggles of people go beyond mere human rights issues, encompassing profound political challenges with far-reaching geopolitical implications for both regional and global security and freedom. He also noted that discussions revealed a fundamental cause of our nations' suffering: Chinese imperialism and expansionism.

Salih stressed the critical importance of enhanced cooperation and advocacy to tackle these challenges. He underscored that restoring independence to East Turkistan and Tibet is crucial not only for reclaiming our territories but also for protecting the rights and survival of our people.

Likewise, he highlighted that reuniting Gilgit-Baltistan with India is key to safeguarding the rights and future of its residents.

Salih stated, "This meeting marks an important step in uniting our voices and advancing our shared goals on the global stage. We are committed to working together to counter Chinese expansionism and to secure a future where our nations can thrive in freedom and peace."

The Uyghur people, a predominantly Muslim ethnic group, have long sought independence or greater autonomy from China.

The region, officially known as Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, has been the focus of intense international scrutiny due to reports of human rights abuses, including mass detentions in so-called "re-education camps" and forced labour.

Similarly, Tibet, home to the Tibetan Buddhist community, has also experienced longstanding tensions with the Chinese government. The Dalai Lama, Tibet's spiritual leader, fled to India in 1959 following a failed uprising against Chinese rule. Tibetans continue to seek greater autonomy and the preservation of their cultural and religious practices. The Chinese government maintains strict control over the region, with significant restrictions on religious freedom and political dissent. On the other hand, various local political parties and activist groups in PoGB continue to advocate for greater autonomy of the region. These groups often organize rallies, write petitions, and engage in political dialogue to push for their demands.

Tahir Imin, a 42-year-old U.S.-based Uyghur activist and former political prisoner from China, tells VOA that he recently learned that six of his former business associates in Xinjiang were sentenced for allegedly attempting to split the country.

"I've learned from two sources that the sentences, handed down in early 2024 by the Urumqi Intermediate People's Court, were linked to their association with me," Imin told VOA. "One received 15 years, while the others got 12."

Information in Xinjiang is tightly controlled, making it extremely difficult to get details about court proceedings. Imin — the founder of the Washington-based Uyghur Times and a member of the Washington-based Uyghur Human Rights Project — said his sources were unable to share documents for fear of retaliation from the Chinese government. Among those charged, he added, was the nephew of a top party official in Xinjiang.

The Urumqi Intermediate People's Court is in the capital of Xinjiang, which is home to nearly 12 million predominantly Muslim Uyghurs. The U.S. and other countries have accused China of genocide in Xinjiang, where more than 1 million Uyghurs are believed to be detained in facilities that Beijing describes as vocational training centers.

China says the measures are necessary to combat extremism, terrorism and separatism. Some people have been detained for practicing their religion or for their contacts with overseas individuals who are speaking out about China's policies in Xinjiang.

When reached for comment on the case, Liu Pengyu, a spokesperson for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, told VOA he had not heard of the cases mentioned by Imin.

"China is a law-based country where laws must be observed and those who violate the law must be held accountable," Liu said in an email to VOA. "If the sentencing is linked to accusations of 'attempting to split the country,' please refer to Article 103 of the Criminal Law of the People's Republic of China." Article 103 of the Chinese Criminal Law states that people who "organize, plot or carry out the scheme of splitting the State or undermining national unity" face life imprisonment or at least 10 years.

The sentences of 12 to 15 years for Imin's former associates suggest they might have been charged under this article. Not the first time Imin believes the news about his former associates is part of China's broader strategy of transnational repression against activists like himself.

It is not the first time this has happened to him, he said.

"Previously, I discovered that 28 of my family members were sentenced to prison simply because of their relationship to me," he said. "I am deeply concerned about my daughter, who was forced to denounce me, and my estranged wife, who was forced to divorce me."

Imin told VOA that he has not heard from his wife or daughter in years and has no way of knowing whether they are alive or living freely.

"That leaves me with a constant sense of guilt and sorrow," he said.

Imin and the six sentenced business associates — Ismail Kerim, Elqem Ilham, Dawut Osman, Yashiq Ahmed, Nurmemet Imin and Rashidin Gheyret — founded Xinjiang Ottuz Oghul Import and Export Trading Co., Ltd. in 2014.

Imin left China in March 2017, first relocating to Israel before settling in Washington. After moving to the U.S., he lost touch with his former associates and began speaking out against alleged abuses in Xinjiang. As a result, his associates severed contact with him, leaving him unable to track the fate of the company they once shared.

VOA was able to find details about his import-export firm on Chinese company search websites. According to Alibaba's 1688 business-to-business website, the company and its associates registered with the Urumqi Municipal Administration for Market Regulation on May 14, 2014, with Tahir Imin listed as the representative and chairman and the other sentenced individuals in administrative roles.

Imin says his former associates all had separate businesses, with their joint company serving as a collaborative venture.

"We were all well-educated and focused on business and social improvement," Imin said. "Our company's motto was development, cooperation and social responsibility."

Family ties

Ilham, one of the former business associates who was sentenced, is a nephew of Kaiser Abdukerim, the current vice chairman of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, according to Imin.

VOA couldn't independently verify the connection between Ilham and Abdukerim. Despite multiple calls to a number listed on the Xinjiang government website, the calls went unanswered.

Abdukerim has long been a vocal supporter of the Chinese government's policies in Xinjiang. At the United Nations in 2018, as president of Xinjiang Medical University, he defended the government's policies, calling them social progress even as allegations of mass detentions and human rights abuses were growing.

In March 2023, as vice chairman of Xinjiang, Abdukerim claimed on CGTN that international criticism of Xinjiang was an attempt to interfere in China's internal affairs.

Restricted access

According to information collected by the Xinjiang Victims Database, which documents individuals affected by China's policies in Xinjiang, all of Imin's former colleagues were arrested in July 2021 on charges of problematic association. They later attended a hearing in March of 2023. Imin's update about their sentencing is the latest on their status.

According to Gene Bunin, curator of the Xinjiang Victims Database, access to court verdicts and legal documents is highly restricted with the government now requiring users who want to access them to use Chinese platforms such as WeChat or AliPay.

"The other reason is that, even when accessible, they [Chinese authorities] generally did not post any of the sensitive cases, which is the vast majority of criminal cases for Xinjiang," Bunin told VOA.

He said that in a study he carried out in 2018, only 7,000 of 70,000 criminal cases in Xinjiang had verdicts posted.

"This rate, of around 10%, was by far the lowest in the country, as for most provinces/regions at least 60-70% of the verdicts were posted," said Bunin. "Of the 7,000 visible, almost all were for standard crimes that would be recognized anywhere in the world (drunk driving, theft, robbery, rape, murder, etc.), with essentially no political/religious cases."

According to a Human Rights Watch report released in 2022 that was based on Xinjiang government data, more than half a million people had been prosecuted since 2017.

Xinjiang authorities target Uyghurs cadres in 'dark forces' crackdown

01 August 2024, RFA, Shohret Hoshur

The measure is meant to purge government workers deemed disloyal to China.

Authorities in a central Xinjiang city have detained more than 70 Uyghurs officials after purging them for being "two-faced" — part of a larger operation to investigate and jail those deemed disloyal to China and the Chinese Communist Party, police said.

Authorities in Korla, the second-largest city by population in Xinjiang, told Radio Free Asia they had so far investigated over 200 Uyghurs deemed problematic, as part of a nationwide "dark forces" crackdown on the mostly Muslim group that began on July 15, police said.

The term "two-faced" is used by authorities to describe Uyghur officials who do not willingly follow directives, exhibit signs of disloyalty or show sympathetic tendencies toward other Uyghurs in northwestern China's Xinjiang region where the ethnic group faces repression.

"Since the beginning of the crackdown on 'dark forces,' more than 200 suspects have been investigated, [and] 76 of them were determined to be two-faced," said a police officer on duty at the People's Government building in Korla.

The crackdown is the latest of a series of ongoing measures to suppress what China deems "ethnic separatist forces," "terrorist forces" and "religious extremism" in Xinjiang, home to more than 11 million Uyghurs.

It is also in keeping with policies to fully meld Uyghurs into the Chinese nation and deepen ideological control over the region.

Reexamination method

The crackdown was initiated by Xinjiang's "Combating Dark and Evil Forces" working group, which held a meeting on July 14, according to a Xinjiang TV report. The group said authorities would "identify and punish those who do not fulfill their duties in key areas using the reexamination method." Xinjiang authorities first used the "reexamination method" in 2016 to purge Uyghur writers, artists and researchers by finding "problems" in their previous works that raised questions about their loyalty to China, and subsequently punished them.

Authorities in Korla have operated under a state of emergency since the end of 2023 and have maintained that status since the beginning of the crackdown on "dark forces," said the officer on duty at the People's Government building.

"In meetings we were told that the main targets were two-faced-people," he said. "There have been a lot of two-faced people detained since we started the attack on 'dark forces.'"

While the "attack on dark and evil forces" in Chinese provinces mainly targets gangs and criminals, authorities in Xinjiang go after Uyghurs in political and government positions, especially top Uyghur cadres, state employees and Chinese Communist Party members, according to Chinese media reports.

During the "dark forces" crackdown in Hotan, a major oasis town in southwestern Xinjiang called Hetian in Chinese, authorities investigated and punished leading cadres deemed "two-faced" for purportedly protecting "national separatists" and "religious extremists."

Authorities in Xinjiang have targeted ordinary Uyghurs during previous “reexamination” operations, jailing them for “religious extremism” for practicing their Muslim faith or studying or teaching the Quran, the central religious text of Islam, to others, even if the activities occurred a decade or two earlier.

China executes ‘slow-motion genocide’ in Tibet, Xinjiang, conference told

25 July 2024, The Washington Times

Obliteration of two peoples' identities, cultures, is accelerating.

TOKYO — Dorjee Tseten is 41 but has never set foot on his home country's soil.

“My family escaped Tibet, but 1.2 million Tibetans have lost their lives over the last seven decades through military occupation, famine and while escaping,” said Mr. Tseten, a member of Tibet's parliament in exile. “Every family has this kind of story.”

It hits him hardest when he views TV news. “When I hear of the killing of innocents, it reminds me of what is happening in Tibet,” he said.

Bloody conflicts raging in the Gaza Strip, Sudan and Ukraine generate loose talk of genocide. For those at the International Religious Freedom Summit Asia in Tokyo last week, the discussion was precise and the target clear in what many said was the Chinese communist regime's quiet, de facto policy of genocide in Tibet and Xinjiang.

“The term ‘genocide’ is sometimes misused to get attention,” said Robert Rehak, the Czech Republic's special envoy for Holocaust issues, interfaith dialogue and freedom of religion. “It may not be the mass killing of a huge number of people, but if the long-term aim is to end a nation, you can call it genocide.”

Conference sponsors included Freedom House, the Family Research Council and The Washington Times Foundation.

Though Beijing does not operate death camps or fill mass graves, the central government's policy toward the people of the two regions represents “slow-motion” genocide, experts say.

“Not every massacre or war crime is a genocide,” said Marco Respinti, director of Bitter Winter, a magazine focused on religious liberty and human rights. “To have a genocide, you have to have the intention to destroy an entire portion of humankind, you have to make a project to do that and you have to make tools you need.”

Chinese leaders angrily denounce the charge of genocide. They are particularly furious that the Trump administration and then the Biden administration formally declared Beijing's policies against the local ethnic Muslim Uyghur population of Xinjiang a genocide.

“There has never been so-called genocide, forced labor or religious oppression in Xinjiang,” Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi told a meeting of the United Nations Human Rights Council in 2021. “Such inflammatory accusations are fabricated out of ignorance and prejudice. They are simply malicious and politically driven hype and couldn't be further from the truth.”

Long, slow process

Neither a sudden event nor a shock policy, genocide usually builds over a long period.

Xinjiang, which many Uyghurs call Eastern Turkestan, was occupied by China in 1949. Tibet was annexed by force in 1950. Natives of both say the ruling Chinese Communist Party's policies of cultural liquidation have accelerated since President Xi Jinping took office in 2013.

In 2014, Mr. Xi was said to have expressed surprise and unhappiness on a visit to the Xinjiang city of Kahsgard.

“Some reports said he asked, ‘Why are Uyghurs still Uyghurs?’” said Omer Kanat, president of the Uyghur Human Rights Project. “He criticized officials ... and they decided to forcefully assimilate the Uyghur people.”

Systemic assimilation policies “turned into genocide in 2017,” Mr. Kanat said.

“One of the most current, pressing human rights issues” facing Tibetans – forced indoctrination of children – began to be enforced after 2016, Mr. Tseten said.

“The CCP is conducting three genocides,” said Sam Brownback, the U.S. ambassador-at-large for international religious freedom during the Trump administration. He added a Han Chinese group to the Tibetans and Uyghurs.

Targeting the faithful

China's critics say that, just as the Nazis exterminated followers of Judaism, Beijing is targeting those with strong religious identities: Tibetan Buddhists, Uyghur adherents of Islam, and Chinese Falun Gong, which combines Buddhist and Taoist teachings with breathing and meditation exercises.

“It makes sense that authoritarian regimes fear faith,” said Katrina Lantos Swett, co-chair of the Tokyo religious freedom summit. “What they need is control of their populations, but if people have acquired convictions, they are much harder to control.”

According to Chinese regulations, “all religious venues should have permissions, all [religious] teachers should have certifications and have ‘Xi Jinping ideology,’” said Tsewang Gyalpo Arya, the Dalai Lama’s representative for Japan and East Asia. “Where is the religion?”

Ethnic identities and religious practices are replaced with uniform identities and party-approved practices. Among the worst abuses are torture, disappearances and organ harvesting. More mainstream methods of control include heavy police presence and mass detentions in camps.

“The purpose of the camps is to break lineage, roots and connections to origins – to eliminate the Uyghurs as an ethnic identity in China,” said Mr. Kanat. He estimates that “tens of thousands” from all walks of life have been incarcerated.

Since 2016, Tibetan children as young as 5 have been wrenched from their families and placed in “colonial boarding schools.”

“When children come out, their connection with their families has changed,” said Mr. Tseten. “They can’t speak Tibetan, they forget their traditions and are not able to communicate with their families.

“Some of them even become critical of their grandparents,” he said. “They ask them, ‘Why don’t you know Chinese? Why are you not like other Chinese?’”

Technology and repression

To prevent free expression and free assembly, “authoritarian regimes have technologies they only dreamed of in the past,” Mr. Brownback said.

A security web that synchronizes high technologies, from CCTV camera networks to spyware embedded in personal digital devices, allows for ubiquitous and never-resting artificial intelligence monitoring of the population.

“Families cannot communicate with each other,” said Ilham Mahmut, chairman of Japan’s Uyghur Cultural Center. “People got skeptical about each other, even within the family.”

He said he speaks from personal experience. “The last time I communicated with my mother was in April 2017. She said, ‘Please don’t call me. I’ll call you if something happens.’”

Along with the human cost comes repression in the physical space. Structures central to religious culture, notably mosques and monasteries, are being destroyed or repurposed.

Speakers at the Tokyo gathering urged citizens to demand action from their governments. The U.N. Human Rights Office warned in 2022 that China may be committing crimes against humanity. The Dutch government has joined the U.S. in labeling Beijing’s policies genocidal.

Other countries need to add pressure, particularly from inside China’s region. “We’ve got to have strong Asian democracies stand up,” Mr. Brownback said.

Mr. Respinti said those who plan and implement the genocidal policies should be held to account, but the clock is ticking.

“In 10 or 20 or 30 years, you won’t have identifiable religious or ethnic groups, and it will be ‘mission accomplished,’” he said. “When they can’t practice their religion or can’t speak Tibetan or Uyghur or do not understand it, when it is just the standardized language and culture of China, what’s left?”

Mr. Tseten, born overseas, said he dreams of a Tibetan homeland he has never seen.

“I know where my village is and what it looks like. I live with the memory of Tibet through my parents and grandparents,” he said. “Deep down, I feel one day I will go, when the people in my village and across Tibet will be free from fear to practice what they want, to continue to do what their forefathers have done.”

Xinjiang authorities intensify reporting requirements for Uyghur visitors

23 July 2024, RFA

The measure allows Chinese authorities to monitor Uyghurs’ movements in China’s far-western region.

Authorities in at least two areas of Xinjiang have aggressively ramped up a requirement in recent months that Uyghurs report guests in their homes to police in as little as 10 minutes to two hours of their arrival, three Uyghur township government cadres told Radio Free Asia.

The requirement was first implemented in June 2015 and has been increasingly emphasized by the government of Ma Xingrui who took over as Communist Party secretary of Xinjiang in December 2021, they said.

The requirement is one of several draconian surveillance policies implemented by Chinese authorities to monitor Uyghurs’ movements amid ongoing human rights abuses in Xinjiang that the United States and some Western parliaments have said amount to genocide and crimes against humanity. China has denied the accusations.

Comments posted online by some Uyghur netizens attributed Chinese authorities’ concern about Uyghur gatherings to the government’s tyranny, while others say they believe the main reason is to conceal information about the ongoing genocide in Xinjiang.

A resident of Yengisheher county in Kashgar prefecture was detained at the Yapchan village police station with his wife for forgetting to report a relative from Ghulja who arrived for a visit earlier this month, said a person with knowledge of the situation, giving a recent example of the stepped-up measures.

The pair were released the next day after a night of interrogation, and their guest ended the visit earlier than planned and returned home, he said.

The guest said, "It's like this everywhere," implying that similar practices are in effect in Ghulja where he lives, the person added.

A local police officer contacted by RFA acknowledged the couple's arrest and release.

Police in Guma county of neighboring Hotan prefecture said the system of reporting newly arrived guests to police was being more rigorously adhered to than it was in the past.

A police officer in the county's Kokterak township said residents there must report out-of-town guests to authorities within two hours of their arrival and neighbors within one hour of their arrival.

An officer in the county's Choda township said residents must report guests to the police within 10 minutes, and that if they failed to report them within 30 minutes, they would be held responsible, though he didn't elaborate.

"If the guests stay for more than half an hour they need to be reported," he said. "It's the same for any number of guests. Starting from the beginning of this year, this policy has been strict."

Adult and teenage visitors as young as 14 must be reported, he added.

He said he didn't believe that any Uyghurs who failed to report visitors had been taken in for "re-education."

Uyghur rights organization bashes China for atrocities in Xinjiang

23 July 2024, India Narrative

The Uyghur community residing in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (XUAR) has been facing atrocities inflicted by China for decades.

East Turkistan Svenska Uyghur Kommitten (SUK), a Uyghur rights organization, lamented China's brutality towards the children of the Uyghur community in a statement released on Sunday.

The statement also claimed that the 'Convention on the Rights of the Child' (CRC), a UN human rights law for child rights and protection, has not been able to protect the basic rights of over a million Uyghur children who still suffer in XUAR.

In a post on 'X', the organization said, "The Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) is a cornerstone of international human rights law, intended to protect the fundamental rights of children globally. Yet, the ongoing atrocities faced by over a million Uyghur children under Chinese occupation, colonisation and genocide starkly expose the CRC's limitations and failures in enforcement."

The SUK statement further stated, "Over one million Uyghur children have been forcibly abducted by the CCP from their families, who are detained in concentration camps or prisons. Stripped of their familial support, these defenceless children endure severe human rights abuses. They are subjected to physical and psychological torture, forced labour, organ harvesting, sexual violence, and systematic indoctrination designed to erase their cultural and religious identities and brainwash them into loyal Chinese citizens."

While referring to the laws of CRC to protect children, the SUK mentioned saying, "The CRC explicitly mandates the protection of children from violence, exploitation, and abuse, while safeguarding their rights to education, cultural identity, and familial bonds."

"The CCP's flagrant violations of these rights in East Turkistan represent a profound failure of the CRC to protect these vulnerable children. This situation demands urgent international attention and action to uphold the principles of the CRC and defend children from such egregious human rights abuses," it said.

"The international community's silence and inaction in the face of these atrocities constitute a grave moral and legal failure. The credibility of the CRC is at stake; without decisive action, it risks becoming a mere declaration of intent rather than a robust framework for child protection. Immediate and coordinated diplomatic, economic, and legal measures are essential to hold the CCP accountable and halt these violations" the statement further added.

The statement also urged that the global community must use its power to ensure that the rights and dignity of Uyghur children are restored and protected.

Anything less is a betrayal of the CRC's core principles and an abdication of our shared responsibility to protect all children, irrespective of geopolitical considerations.

"The dire plight of Uyghur children demands nothing less than a united, powerful, and unyielding response from the international community," the statement read.

International pressure builds on China for human rights violations in Xinjiang, Tibet

21 July 2024, Times of India

Human rights advocates have stressed the need for solidarity and measures to ensure accountability for human rights violations in Xinjiang and Tibet, requiring urgent international attention and action.

The situation in Xinjiang and Tibet is seen as a humanitarian crisis, and human rights activists have emphasised the need for support for independent investigations for human rights violations.

United Nations bodies, including the Human Rights Council, have repeatedly raised concerns and called on China to allow independent observers access to Xinjiang to investigate allegations of human rights violations.

Governments and parliaments of various countries, including Canada and the United States, have made statements and passed resolutions condemning China's actions in Xinjiang and Tibet.

These actions underscore international concern and solidarity with affected communities. In 2009, the Canadian Parliament had also passed a non-binding motion declaring China's actions against Uyghurs in Xinjiang as genocide.

Recently, in a groundbreaking ruling, the Court of the Citizens of the World (CCW) delivered a verdict against China for its alleged perpetration of genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang (East Turkistan) and Tibet.

The tribunal, convened in the Hague, Netherlands, from July 8 to 12, marked a significant moment in international justice as it addressed accusations of systematic atrocities committed by Beijing.

Representatives of the East Turkistan Government in Exile (ETGE), speaking on behalf of the Uyghur and Tibetan communities, welcomed the tribunal's decision as a pivotal step towards accountability.

ETGE underscored the historical context of East Turkistan as an area with aspirations of independence, now subjected to what they describe as Beijing's relentless campaign to suppress dissent and assimilate the region into a unified Chinese nation.

ETGE took to X, and stated, "The Judge underscored that international law mandates the recognition of the right to self-determination. He concluded that China systematically planned and executed acts of genocide and crimes against humanity targeting Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples and Chinese dictator Xi Jinping is directly responsible for the crimes. The Judge further highlighted that the ongoing Uyghur Genocide is a "continuous vigorous attack aiming to completely annihilate the Uyghur community."

During the hearings, harrowing testimonies from survivors and experts painted a bleak picture of life in Xinjiang, where reports of mass internment camps, forced labour, and coercive assimilation have drawn global condemnation.

Similar accusations were levied against China's policies in Tibet, where Tibetan culture and autonomy have long been targets of Chinese state control.

The findings of such tribunals can have significant moral and political weight, influencing public opinion, international diplomacy, and calls for accountability.

While the CCW may not have the enforcement power of a national court or an international judicial body, its rulings can contribute to the broader discourse on human rights and potentially spur further action by other entities, including governments and international organisations.

On Eid Al-Adha, calls for action highlight Uyghur and Turkic Muslims' plight in Xinjiang

17 July 2024, The Economic Times

As Muslims around the world celebrate Eid al-Adha, organizations advocating for the rights of Uyghur and Turkic Muslims in East Turkistan (Xinjiang province of China) have issued poignant messages calling for global solidarity and action.

"On this sacred #EidAlAdha, we reflect on faith and resilience. We implore the global #Muslim community to stand with the #Uyghur/Turkic Muslims of occupied #EastTurkistan, who face genocide and are denied their faith. Unite in prayer and action for their dignity and independence," the message reads.

Similarly, the East Turkistan National Movement also conveyed Eid Al-Adha greetings, urging the global community to remember those suffering under Chinese occupation.

"As you gather with loved ones to celebrate this sacred holiday, please remember and pray for the Muslims in occupied #EastTurkistan, who are facing colonization and genocide under Chinese occupation," the organization posted.

They further called for collective action, stating, "Stand with us in demanding an end to China's relentless persecution, and join us in our call for justice, liberation, and the restoration of the East Turkist people's dignity, faith, and independence."

The East Turkistan National Movement has been at the forefront of efforts to end what it terms the "ongoing Uyghur Genocide," promoting democracy, political and human rights, and striving to restore East Turkistan's freedom and independence.

Their messages on this significant Islamic holiday aim to mobilise support from the global Muslim community and beyond, emphasising the urgent need for international intervention.

The situation in East Turkistan, officially known as the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region by China, has been a critical human rights issue.

Reports of mass detentions, forced labour, and severe restrictions on religious practices have drawn widespread condemnation from human rights organisations and governments worldwide.

Despite these efforts, the Chinese government has consistently denied accusations of genocide and human rights abuses, asserting that their actions in the region are aimed at combating extremism and promoting economic development.

The Eid al-Adha messages from the East Turkistan Government in Exile and the East Turkistan National Movement serve as a stark reminder of the ongoing struggles faced by Uyghur and Turkic Muslims.

As they celebrate this holy occasion, these organisations urge the international community to unite in prayer and action to support their quest for justice, freedom, and the preservation of their cultural and religious heritage.

China bans Muslim Eid holiday rites for Uyghurs in Xinjiang

16 July 2024, Genocide Watch

Their aim was to promote the Sinicization of the Muslim group, observers say.

Men dance in front of the Id kah Mosque after Eid al-Fitr morning prayers in Kashgar, northwestern China's Xinjiang region, June 5, 2019.

On an important Muslim holiday last month, police and security officials in China's far-western region of Xinjiang set up camps to keep an eye on Uyghurs, took Uyghurs to see communist-themed films, and visited Uyghur homes to make sure they weren't practicing Muslim religious activities.

The moves around the Qurban Eid, also known as Eid al-Adha or the Feast of the Sacrifice, which fell on June 17 this year in Xinjiang — one of two official Muslim holidays in China — appeared to be attempts to undermine the observation of the Muslim holy day, outside experts said.

Chinese authorities are trying to weaken Uyghurs' ethnic and religious identity and forge their loyalty to the Chinese state and the Communist Party, while maintaining security, the experts said.

"It looks like they are trying to Sinicize Eid," said Erkin Ekrem, a professor at Hacettepe University in Ankara, Turkey, and vice president of the World Uyghur Congress.

"The Chinese government is trying to change the Eid customs, prayers and traditions [by] making Uyghurs consume food along with Chinese people [and] adding Chinese elements to the Eid festivals, thereby removing the Muslim Eid elements," he added.

Before 2017, when the Chinese government started cracking down on religious activities in the predominantly Muslim region, men would observe the holiday by visiting mosques for special prayers, cooking meals, spending time with relatives and welcoming guests to their homes.

Since then, authorities have also forbidden Islamic dress for women, beards for men, and Muslim names for children. They have also prevented Uyghurs from fasting during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan and encouraged the consumption of pork and alcohol, which Islam forbids.

Chinese national consciousness

On the eve of Eid, Ma Xingrui, Communist Party secretary of Xinjiang, visited communities in Urumqi, the region's capital, and asked residents to strengthen Chinese national consciousness and insist on the Sinicization of Islam.

Public security officers celebrated the holiday with Uyghurs and other ethnicities in Xinjiang and promoted "the common consciousness of the Chinese nation," the Xinjiang Daily reported on June 19.

The Keriye County Public Security Bureau in Hotan invited teachers at area primary schools, students and parents on June 16 to participate in social activities at a police camp to "build strong Chinese national consciousness and celebrate Eid," the report said.

On the same day, police in Qitai county in the Changji Hui Autonomous Prefecture invited Uyghur "relatives" with whom they had been paired up under a previous monitoring program to visit a museum to watch communist-themed films.

On June 17, members of the Public Security Bureau in the prefecture's Manas county visited Uyghur homes and danced with residents, who had no choice but to join in, the news report said.

"The police showed their concern for the public by their actions and also planted the seeds of national unity deep in everyone's hearts," it said.

Assimilation policies

Henryk Szadziwski, director of research at the Uyghur Human Rights Project, said public security agents interfere in Muslim holidays like Eid al-Adha to push assimilationist policies in Xinjiang.

Uyghur identification with Turkic culture along with a belief in Islam and related social and political values are considered a threat because they are outside the control of the Chinese state, he told Radio Free Asia.

"China's policies are intended to weaken those kinds of affinities outside which are beyond the borders of China and to ensure Uyghurs allegiances are pinned to the Chinese state and, of course, the Chinese Communist Party," Szadziwski said.

But the Chinese government separates Islam in China from Islam in the rest of the world, Erkin Ekrem of the World Uyghur Congress said.

"In China, the Sinicization of Islam is being carried out vigorously," he told RFA. "They are trying to create a nation away from Islamic beliefs and customs."

"Deemphasizing the religion adding in this secular Chinese national consciousness [is] meant to delink Eid al-Adha from its religious origin," he said. "That is one of the aims here."

China destroying mosques, erasing Islamic identity from Xinjiang: Report

16 July 2024, Indian Narrative

Hundreds of mosques and Islamic shrines have been destroyed by China in recent years, as Beijing aims to erase the Islamic culture associated with the Xinjiang province and forcefully assimilate the Uyghurs with their Han Chinese culture, a report by The Economist stated.

World Uyghur Congress reacted to the report, citing the findings of the report.

"Since the 16th century most Uyghurs have practised Islam. But China has no interest in this later period. Instead, officials are trying to erase it. In recent years they have destroyed hundreds of mosques and Muslim shrines across [East Turkistan]," the WUC post on X read.

The report titled 'China is using archaeology as a weapon' elaborated how the state is unearthing ancient justifications for its rule over Xinjiang

China has destroyed hundreds of mosques and Muslim shrines across Xinjiang. The museum in Kashgar barely mentions Islam, save for signs claiming that it was forced on Xinjiang and that the Uyghurs "are not Muslim by nature".

The report cited a Buddhist stupa in Kashgar, an oasis city in the far-western region of Xinjiang. The stupa and a temple next to it were probably built some 1,700 years ago and abandoned a few centuries later. Chinese archaeologists started excavating the site in 2019. They have dug up stone tools, copper coins and fragments of a Buddha statue.

The archaeologists also claim to have found clear proof that Xinjiang has been part of China since ancient times.

The report cited official statements, which claim that artefacts discovered at Mo'er temple are similar to those dug up thousands of miles to the east in areas dominated by the Han, China's majority ethnic group. Parts of the temple were built in a "Han Buddhist" style. And its architectural features suggest that it was visited by a famous 7th-century monk from central China called Xuanzang. He is known for spreading Buddhism in the country.

"These claims may sound academic, but China's government is using them to justify its brutal rule over Xinjiang," the report stated.

China's security campaign was at its peak in 2018-19, during which around a million Uyghurs and other Muslim residents of Xinjiang passed through camps where they were forcibly assimilated into Han Chinese culture. Critics accuse China of "cultural genocide." Officials say they are trying to stamp out religious extremism.

Moreover, if the inhabitants of Xinjiang have always been Chinese, then accusations of forced assimilation make no sense, the report added.

Last month China organised a conference in Kashgar that focused on the discoveries made at Mo'er temple and other sites.

Pan Yue, head of the state's Ethnic Affairs Commission, said they prove that there is no separation between the culture of Xinjiang and Chinese culture. Those who criticise China's policies in the region reveal their "ignorance of history" and are peddling "baseless narratives", he added.

However, experts are of the opinion that actually it is China's narrative that looks 'dodgy'.

James Millward of Georgetown University, says the country's ancient dynasties had an on-and-off military foothold in what is now Xinjiang. But from the 8th century to the early 18th century, they had little influence. Then in 1759 China's final dynasty, the Qing, conquered the region and turned it into a colony. That is what the Communist Party inherited when it came to power in 1949.

Sites like Mo'er temple are fascinating, but do little to strengthen China's claims. They demonstrate the globalising effect of the Silk Road, a network of trade routes that linked China with Central Asia and Europe. Just as money and commodities flowed along the road, so did religions such as Buddhism, picking up aspects of local cultures along the way. Many of the Uyghurs' ancestors were indeed Buddhist. But that hardly means Xinjiang was culturally or politically part of China. After all, Buddhism originally came from India.

Since the 16th century, most Uyghurs have practised Islam. But China has no interest in this later period. Instead, Beijing's officials are trying to erase it.

The ruins across Xinjiang are surrounded by buildings with sloping roof tiles and red doors, mimicking those of Beijing's Forbidden City. The style is appropriate, said a Han construction worker. Buddhist culture is part of Han culture, he claimed, and Xinjiang has been part of China for thousands of years, the report added.

CCP's Anniversary Marred by Outcry Over Xinjiang 'Genocide'

12 July 2024, Genocide Watch

On the 103rd anniversary of the founding of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), the party is facing severe criticism from human rights organisations and ethnic groups for alleged human rights abuses in Xinjiang, also known as East Turkistan.

The Swedish Uyghur Committee highlighted the grim legacy of the CCP on social media, condemning what they describe as the party's "ruthless invasion, occupation, and colonisation" of East Turkistan.

The committee's post on Twitter, now known as X, stated, "On #CCP's 103rd anniversary, remember their legacy stained by blood: Ruthless invasion, #occupation, and #colonisation of #EastTurkistan accompanied by their ongoing #genocide against Uyghurs/Turkic peoples."

The post further accused the Chinese government of subjecting millions of East Turkistani people, including Uyghurs, to severe human rights violations. These allegations include torture, execution, organ harvesting, starvation, indoctrination, sexual assault, and forced labour in concentration camps.

The committee also highlighted the forced sterilisation of pregnant Uyghur women, the killing of unborn children, and the abduction of over a million Uyghur children by the CCP for what they termed "horrific abuse," including organ harvesting.

The Swedish Uyghur Committee's post emphasised that the anniversary should not be viewed as a celebration but rather as a reminder of the "monstrous cruelty" perpetrated by the CCP and the "world's complicit silence."

The CCP, which has ruled China since 1949, often uses its anniversary to highlight its achievements and reaffirm its commitment to socialism with Chinese characteristics. However, the party's actions in Xinjiang have drawn widespread international condemnation. Numerous reports and testimonies from survivors have detailed the extent of the abuses, leading many to label the situation as genocide.

As the CCP marks its 103rd anniversary, the voices calling for justice for the Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples in Xinjiang grow louder, demanding accountability and an end to the ongoing human rights abuses. (ANI).

Ancient Buddhist temple in Xinjiang stirs controversy

10 July 2024, RFA

Outside experts dispute Chinese historians' claims it's from the Tang Dynasty and shows Chinese influence.

Two earthen pillars, eroded by sand, in barren terrain are all that's left of an ancient Buddhist temple in the far-western Chinese region of Xinjiang. Chinese historians and archaeologists assert that a 7th century Chinese empress ordered the construction of the Mor Temple – known locally as Mora, or "chimney" in the Uyghur language – one of the earliest Buddhist sites in the region.

The ruins show China's influence in shaping the history and culture of the region – home today to 11 million mostly Muslim Uyghurs – going back centuries, state-run media said.

"They are a powerful testimony to the diversity, unity and inclusiveness of Chinese civilization," according to a June 3 report by the China News Service.

But experts outside China dispute those claims, saying the Mor Stupa, or pagoda, and other temple structures were built in more of an Indian style.

And it's highly unlikely that Wu Zetian, empress from 690-705 CE during the Tang Dynasty, was involved in the construction of pagodas because it was hundreds of miles away from her court in central China, they say.

Instead, the Chinese government-backed research may be driven more by Beijing's efforts to expand its cultural influence in the region, where it is actively seeking to Sinicize Uyghur culture and Muslim practices, they said.

"Empress Wu, the famous female emperor of that time, was avidly promoting Buddhism but not necessarily was she promoting it out in Xinjiang," said Johan Elverskog, a professor of history at Southern Methodist University in Dallas, Texas, and author of the book A History of Uyghur Buddhism.

"There is no way that the Tang was involved in building things that far to the west," he said.

Before Islam

Before Islam arrived in China in the 7th century, Buddhism did flourish in what China today calls Xinjiang, or "New Territories" – but which the Uyghurs refer to as East Turkistan, the name of the Uyghur nation that briefly existed in the mid-20th century.

Western archaeologists and Buddhism researchers believe that Buddhism began to spread to Xinjiang during the Kushan Empire, which controlled the western and northern Tarim Basin in southern Xinjiang and ruled over parts of what is today Afghanistan, Pakistan and India between the 1st century BCE and the 3rd century CE.

Some historical documents show Buddhism spread to the region from Afghanistan and northern Pakistan, Elverskog said, while other documents indicate that the Kingdom of Khotan, in present-day Hotan, adopted Buddhism as the official state religion in the 2nd and 3rd centuries.

Archaeological digs at the Mor Temple — about 30 kilometers (19 miles) northeast of Kashgar — since 2019 have determined that the original complex was built in the 3rd century, according to the China News Service report.

It said that elements of Chinese architecture appeared between the 7th and 10th centuries, indicating the prevalence of Chinese Buddhism.

Artifacts discovered around the site reflect Indian and Central Asian Buddhist traditions as well as the influence of the Central Plains, an area along the Yellow River that is believed to be the cradle of Chinese civilization, it said.

But Elverskog said that while there was a Chinese military presence in the region during the Tang Dynasty (618-907 CE), no Buddhist temples were built.

'United' by Chinese culture

The idea that Uyghur culture, including its ancient Buddhist history and structures, should be supplanted by Chinese culture was summed up in a speech by Pan Yue, head of the State Council's National Ethnic Affairs Commission, at an international forum on Xinjiang's history and future held in June in Kashgar.

"Although Xinjiang's culture is diverse, it exists in unity, and the most important factor that unites them is Chinese culture," said Pan, who has been in his role since June 2022.

"Xinjiang should be studied from the perspective of the common history of the Chinese nation and the multipolar unity of the Chinese nation, and Xinjiang should be understood from the perspective of a region where many cultures and religions coexist and ethnic groups live together," he said.

Kahar Barat, a Uyghur-American historian known for his work on Buddhism and Islam in Xinjiang, said there was "absolutely no Chinese influence" in the Buddhist culture of places like Kashgar and Kucha, another city that once had many Buddhist temples.

He said Kashgar and Kucha were part of the Hindu-Greek Gandhara Buddhist culture that existed in present-day Pakistan from the 3rd century BCE to the 12th century CE.

"They call it the Gandhara art," he said. "It's the Gandhara culture created by the Buddhism developed in Kashmir and Pakistan. Therefore, the Buddha paintings and temples in Hotan, Kashgar, Kucha have the influence of Gandhara culture."

Furthermore, Buddhist temples during the Tang Dynasty were modeled after those in India, making it an exaggeration to say that the Mor Stupa and other temple structures reflected the architectural style of that era, he said.

"Pavilion-style construction is a style of India Buddhism," he told RFA. "Hence, all the pavilions in China are inspired by these styles. The building styles in the Han Dynasty were later influenced by Buddhist vihara-style construction."

Elverskog agreed that the Mor Temple was built in Indian style.

"It's obviously based on precedence in northwest India," he said. "That was the main source of the Buddhist culture in Hotan and particularly coming from India. ... So the Buddhism, the iconography, the artwork, was heavily based on northwestern Indian models."

Xia Ming, a political science professor at the College of Staten Island in New York, said China's interpretation of historical Uyghur Buddhism as part of Chinese Buddhism shows the tendency of the Chinese Communist Party to seek its current legitimacy from Chinese dynasties dating back thousands of years.

"If you look at the thousands of years of Chinese history," he said, "you will see that the Chinese Communist Party will pick and choose any historical node and talk about it if it is useful to them."

China, UAE hold 2nd annual air force drill in Xinjiang

10 July 2024, AA, Riyaz ul Khaliq

Falcon Shield-2024 joint training exercise to continue till late July, says Chinese Defense Ministry

China and the United Arab Emirates are holding the second annual joint air force drill in the Xinjiang region.

According to China's Defense Ministry, the annual Falcon Shield-2024 joint training exercise between the Chinese and UAE air forces has been ongoing in the northwestern Xinjiang province since late June and will continue until late July.

The training between the two air forces aims to "enhance mutual understanding and trust, deepen exchanges and cooperation, improve strategic cooperation, and achieve common goals and expectations of both sides," the ministry said on Wednesday.

Last year, the Falcon Shield-2023 joint training exercise was held in August in the same province.

Meanwhile, Chinese and Lao troops are holding the China-Laos Friendship Shield-2024 joint military exercise in the Lao capital Vientiane.

In another joint military exercise, Chinese troops Tuesday held an opening ceremony of the China-Belarus Eagle Assault-2024 drill in the southwestern city of Brest in Belarus, along the border with Poland.

Uyghur Muslim Genocide: ETGE slams, exposes PRC globally for 'barbaric' human rights abuses in Xinjiang

08 July 2024, Organiser

On the 15th anniversary of the Uyghur Muslim massacre in Xinjiang, the East Turkistan Government in Exile and its foreign minister along with the Swedish Uyghur Committee (SOC) have staged protests at an international level urging the government to pressurize China to place a complete halt on the ongoing genocide in western China.

The representatives of the East Turkistan Government in Exile (ETGE) and the Swedish Uyghur Committee (SUC) on July 6, 2024, organised protests in Amsterdam, Netherlands, Stockholm and Sweden highlighting the increasing number of atrocities being perpetrated by the CCP authorities onto their Uyghur Community.

The protests by these Uyghur rights organisations were organised on the sidelines of the commemoration of Uyghur massacre. During the protests in Amsterdam's Dam Square, the Foreign Minister of ETGE, Salih Hundayar urged the Dutch government to put pressure on the Chinese government to immediately stop the ongoing genocide upon the Uyghur community.

"We urge the government to act against China's ongoing campaign of colonisation, genocide and occupation. We want them to support the people of East Turkestan to get their rights to independence and right to human dignity. The restoration of East Turkestan's independence is the only way to ensure that their human rights, their resistance and their human dignity are guaranteed," Hundayar said.

The minister further noted that China has refused to implement and respect the fundamental rights of the East Turkistani people. "Unfortunately, despite a lot of countries criticizing China and even the United Nations stating that China has been committing crimes against humanity and has refused to implement and respect the fundamentals of the East Turkestan people," he said.

The minister added that the only way to ensure our human dignity is by restoring independence. "By doing so, they have once again showed that they intend to continue pursuing objectives to completely eradicate the people of East Turkestan. Hence the only way to ensure their human dignity is by restoring their independence, he added.

In another protest led by the Swedish Uyghur Committee outside the Swedish Parliament, a protestor recalling the China's genocidal acts during the Urumqi Massacre of 2009, said, "On that unfortunate day, hundreds if not thousands of Uyghurs were massacred and tens of thousands were arrested across East Turkestan. Since then, the Chinese occupational forces have implemented an even more oppressive surveillance driven police state laying a groundwork of ongoing genocide.

The protestor further referred to Chinese so-called operation of Peoples War in the East Turkestan initiated in 2014 which has marked an even more systematic pattern of genocide.

The protestor lamented that the Uyghurs and other similar communities of the larger Turkestan homeland such as Kazakhs, Kyrgyz, Tajik in Xinjiang have been subjected to mass interment in concentration camps and prisons where they endure forced mitigation, indoctrination, torture, rape, organ harvesting and executions. "Many are enslaved in factories and forced labour camps under abhorrent conditions and the scope of the genocide is staggering.

During the 2016-17, the Chinese regime forcibly collected DNA voice prints and retina scans from over 36 million individuals aged between 12 to 65. They have been forcibly sterilised and over a million Uyghur children have been separated from their families and have been placed in state run facilities to be raised as loyal Chinese citizens. The protestors continued that over 60,000 mosques and other cultural sights have been destroyed in an attempt to erase native Uyghur culture.

Uighur culture being erased as Beijing tightens grip on Xinjiang, 15 years after Urumqi riots

09 July 2024, Asia News Network, Miho Tamura

A report released in February by The Jamestown Foundation, a U.S. research institute, said that authorities in the autonomous region were taking away farmland from Uighur smallholders and that "surplus laborers" were being transferred.

Friday marked 15 years since deadly riots involving Han Chinese and the Uighur ethnic minority in Urumqi, the capital of the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region in western China.

In late June 2009, Uighur and Han laborers clashed at a toy factory in Guangdong Province, thousands of kilometers away in southeastern China, in an incident that left two Uighurs dead. When Urumqi residents protested on July 5, demanding to know the truth behind the incident, some of them clashed with police. According to Chinese authorities, 197 people died in the ensuing riots and at least 1,700 were injured.

Today, on the pretext of combatting terrorism, the Chinese Communist Party continues to tighten its grip over the region despite U.S. and European criticism that Uighurs are being used for forced labor. As a result of China's policy, the unique culture and customs of Uighurs are being erased.

Vast cotton fields could be seen on both sides of the road about one hour's drive west from Urumqi. As the stifling heat blazed down one day in early June, Uighur men wearing straw hats silently toiled away in the fields.

After driving for about another hour, I arrived in Shihezi. This city is a major base of operations for the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, a paramilitary organization responsible for defending remote regions and bringing land under cultivation. The corps was established in 1954 as an organization of farmer-soldiers predominantly of Han ethnicity, and Han Chinese now account for about 90% of Shihezi's population.

Cotton has become one of the corps' most important industries. However, the United States blocked imports of cotton from the region in 2021 due to concerns that Uighurs placed in mass internment camps were being mobilized for cotton production. In the name of alleviating poverty, the administration of Chinese President Xi Jinping has promoted labor transfers in which Uighurs were moved to work as laborers, and some reportedly are engaged in such agricultural work as picking cotton.

A report released in February by The Jamestown Foundation, a U.S. research institute, said that authorities in the autonomous region were taking away farmland from Uighur smallholders and that "surplus laborers" were being transferred. The report also stated that forced labor had become "less visible" and "institutionalized."

A museum in central Shihezi that showcases the corps does not mention of the situation surrounding these labor transfers. The museum is filled with exhibits trumpeting the region's development and declares that the corps established cotton spinning factories and achieved great advances. Although the exhibition touches on "harmony" between the Han and Uighurs, visitors to the museum were mostly Han. Not a single Uighur could be seen.

Village names changed

Assimilation policies are moving forward in remote parts of the autonomous region. During a visit to Kashgar in the western part of the region in early June, a large, celebrated bazaar had been surrounded by a fence and its Islamic-style signs had been removed.

In 2022, authorities announced the bazaar would be relocated because the facility had become dilapidated. Even today, heavy machinery is still busily demolishing what remains.

"I've shopped at this place for many years," a Uighur man said. "It's such a pity."

The Chinese flag whips in the breeze above the famous Id Kah Mosque in Kashgar. Many Han tourists were around the mosque, which no longer has an air of religious solemnity.

Beijing, concerned that terrorists from Afghanistan or elsewhere might infiltrate the country, has strengthened policies like these in the remote regions. There is smoldering discontent with the oppressions in places such as Kashgar, where Uighurs make up about 80% of the population. The central government remains highly vigilant due to concerns that the remote regions could become hotbeds for terrorist organizations.

In June, the international human rights organization Human Rights Watch announced that the names of about 630 villages in the autonomous region had been changed by authorities since 2017 to reflect government propaganda. One such new name is Unity. The majority of these affected villages are in Kashgar and other districts, which are home to many Uighurs. The original names had religious or cultural meanings to Uighurs and, according to Human Rights Watch, the changes are part of a broader Chinese government effort to "erase culture and religious expressions" of Uighurs.

15 years after Xinjiang unrest, China fends off criticism of hardline rule

Fifteen years ago in Urumqi, the capital of China's northwestern Xinjiang region, thousands of ethnic Uyghurs took to the streets to demand equal treatment and rights as those enjoyed by Han Chinese.

Xinjiang would never be the same.

The protests, which erupted on July 5, 2009, ended in what is considered one of the most severe crackdowns by Chinese authorities. By the end of three days of unrest, 197 people were dead, mostly Uyghurs, according to the official account.

The uprising prompted Beijing to adopt a much tougher line in governing Xinjiang – a hardening that reverberates to this day in the government's international relations.

The July 2009 protests originated as a plea against the perceived failure of the authorities to seriously investigate an earlier incident, in which a false rumor triggered an attack against Uyghurs by Han Chinese at a factory in the southern province of Guangdong. Several ethnic Uyghurs were killed in that dispute.

Dolkun Isa, president of the Munich-headquartered World Uyghur Congress, released a statement on Thursday, calling the suppression of the protests a "massacre" that "stands as one of the darkest episodes in the history of the Uyghur people." He added that Beijing's "harsh crackdown on the protest marked a pivotal turning point, intensifying the repression of the Uyghur people," which he described as a "genocide" against the mostly Muslim group.

China has long denied such allegations. But the violence a decade and a half ago forced the Chinese government to scramble to contain the fallout, as photos and footage spread worldwide, drawing unwanted international scrutiny of its treatment of ethnic minorities.

At the time, then President Hu Jintao aborted a tour in Italy, skipping a meeting with the G8 countries, which had not yet booted Russia over its illegitimate annexation of Crimea in 2014. China had been invited to Western leaders' annual gathering as a dialogue partner.

The state-owned Xinhua news agency reported rather candidly that Hu had to "cut short his stay in Italy ... due to the situation in northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region." The Portugal leg of Hu's trip was also canceled.

Fast-forward 15 years, and China remains haunted by charges of human rights violations in Xinjiang and attempts to strip away the region's Uyghur identity. But it has also found support from certain segments of the international community in fending off criticism, while it claims credit for promoting Xinjiang's economic development.

In late June, China convened the eighth China-Eurasia Expo in Urumqi, showcasing 6,000 products. On Tuesday, the expo's secretariat said the fair had attracted nearly 250,000 visits, leading to 395 contracts worth 615.55 billion yuan ($84.67 billion).

Meanwhile, current President Xi Jinping is on the road to two of the three former Soviet republics that directly border Xinjiang – Kazakhstan and Tajikistan. Both states have dismal human rights records of their own, but China has built friendly ties on shared economic interests and mutual political needs. This was on full display in the joint statement between China and Kazakhstan on Wednesday, signed by Xi and his counterpart President Kassym-Jomart Tokayev on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit.

"Both sides stressed that the significance of maintaining political security is grave," the statement says. The two governments are "staunchly opposed to external forces interfering in internal affairs and politicizing human rights issues and applying double standards." The duo confirmed they would strengthen their "eternal comprehensive strategic partnership."

In the SCO's Astana Declaration, adopted Thursday, all members reaffirmed their determination "to strike against terrorism, separatism and extremism." The summit also churned out a separate document outlining a three-year action plan among member states to coordinate in fighting these three forces, from 2025 and 2027.

Most SCO members have similar low rankings on the Cato Institute's latest human freedom index of 165 countries and regions. China sits at 149th, while Kazakhstan is in 104th place and Tajikistan in 139th. Kyrgyz Republic, the other direct Xinjiang neighbor that Xi skipped this time, ranks 90th.

China has long justified its hardline policies in Xinjiang as a fight against terrorism, especially since Xi took the helm.

Xi in 2014 implemented the so-called "Strike Hard Campaign against Violent Terrorism" in the region, while expanding the notion of "national security" by introducing the concept of a "holistic approach" including 20 elements, from defense, economic and finance to culture, science and technology. The crackdown escalated in 2017 when internment camps were established in the name of countering extremism.

The United Nations Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights published a report on Xinjiang in 2022, concluding that Beijing's stated drive against terrorism and extremism "may constitute international crimes, in particular crimes against humanity."

The latest communique by G7 leaders gathered in Italy last month once again said the seven Western democracies "remain concerned by the human rights situation in China, including in Tibet and in Xinjiang." The Chinese government categorically rejects the criticism and describes the internment facilities as "reeducation centers."

Elaine Pearson, Asia director at Human Rights Watch, praised the publication of the U.N.'s report two years ago as a "landmark moment for highlighting the gravity of human rights violations in Xinjiang," while adding that it is up to the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Turk to "make full use of that report to improve the situation for Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims in Xinjiang."

Sarah Brooks, China director at Amnesty International, said that this year's "second anniversary of the report's release should be an opportunity to build momentum for an independent international mechanism to monitor, report on and investigate allegations of severe human rights violations, including crimes against humanity in Xinjiang."

Brooks stressed, "No state, no matter how influential, should be shielded from accountability for human rights violations."

Turk, at the opening of the 56th session of the U.N. Human Rights Council on June 18, said he has "continued to engage with China on a range of human rights issues, including the serious concerns my office identified in the Xinjiang region."

He revealed that his staff recently visited Beijing "to discuss, among other things, problematic provisions in China's counterterrorism and criminal laws." Turk expressed hope that such dialogue "will contribute to concrete improvements in all human rights."

Yet China continues to push back, insisting the Xinjiang issue is "in essence about safeguarding the national sovereignty, security and unity." In a report submitted to the U.N. council, Beijing said it had gained support from close to 100 countries and, without naming names, urged "certain countries to abandon ideological bias and to stop politicizing and weaponizing human rights issues."

The document was adopted by the council's working group on Thursday in Geneva, with 98 mainly Western recommendations rejected. The proposals that were denied included implementing the 2022 high commissioner's Xinjiang report, which Beijing calls "completely illegal and void."

The World Uyghur Congress, in its statement on Thursday, once again called on the international community to hold China accountable. "The failure of the international community to scrutinize the Chinese government's actions [allows] for China to continue to implement policies that perpetrate crimes against humanity and genocide in East Turkistan," it said, using its term for the region.

China's Xinjiang Communist Party chief urges 'unwavering' terror crackdown

06 July 2024, SCMP, Kinling Lo

Party secretary Ma Xingrui's call for sustained 'high-intensity crackdowns' follows latest military-police joint exercise in western border region.

The Communist Party chief of China's Xinjiang region has called on security personnel to "unwaveringly" uphold the authorities' "high-intensity crackdown on terrorism".

The call from Ma Xingrui came as the western border region completed its latest military-police joint exercise.

"Social stability must be at the forefront" of "strengthening stability and boosting development", Ma told police officers in Xinjiang on Friday.

"[Our] approach towards high-intensity crackdowns has to remain unwavering," Ma was quoted as saying by Xinjiang Daily, an official newspaper.

"[We] have to eliminate all terrorist threats at the initial stage, and push forward with normalising counterterrorism work."

Ma also called for stronger border security and a "society-wide" ability to control risks. Eliminating political, economic and ideological "risks" were important to ensure the prevention of "structural risks", he said.

The Xinjiang Uyghur autonomous region is home to nearly 26 million people, more than half of them from ethnic minority groups, including the mainly Muslim Uyghurs and Kazakhs.

China's years-long crackdown on extremism among Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang has sparked allegations of human rights abuses and sanctions from the United States and other countries. Beijing denies accusations of repression and has hailed its policies in managing ethnic conflicts, combating terrorism and relieving poverty as successful. However, it has continued to step up security measures as part of a campaign to normalise counterterror work.

The latest military-police drills took place in "southern Xinjiang", in the Kunlun Mountains bordering India and Pakistan, according to Xinjiang Daily. The specific location or dates of the exercise were not reported.

Around 3,000 security personnel took part, the report said, including those from the People's Liberation Army, the paramilitary People's Armed Police, the quasi-military Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, and immigration control and public security agencies.

Helicopters, unmanned aerial vehicles, as well as armoured and assault tanks were used in the exercise, according to state media.

During the drills, personnel practised arresting targeted terrorists, preventing the return and infiltration of terrorists, and combating terrorism in high-altitude regions, footage broadcast by Xinjiang Television showed.

In 2016, Beijing imposed security measures in Xinjiang that it said aimed to crack down on terror attacks following decades of ethnic tensions and unrest. But the measures led to allegations of widespread human rights abuses, including that at least 1 million Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities were held in mass internment camps.

Beijing maintains the centres are for “vocational training”.

The Xinjiang government has in recent years focused on promoting economic development, especially trade links with its neighbouring Central Asian countries, and also sought to improve its international image.

During a visit to the regional capital Urumqi in August, President Xi Jinping doubled down on “social stability” as a top priority for Xinjiang, calling for greater efforts against terrorism and religious extremism while also pushing economic development.

'Western misinformation regarding Xinjiang' addresses allegations of a genocide

04 July 2024, WLNS

Recent discussions and reports on the situation in Xinjiang have sparked global debate and divergent viewpoints. The United Nations Human Rights Report of August 31, 2022, has categorized the events in Xinjiang as “crimes against humanity,” a classification that notably does not meet the stringent criteria for genocide under the UN Genocide Convention. This stance echoes an earlier assessment by Amnesty International in 2021, which similarly refrained from labeling the situation as genocide.

Despite these nuanced distinctions, the issue has remained contentious, particularly fueled by ongoing assertions from some Western nations and media outlets. The United States, for instance, has been vocal in affirming allegations of genocide in Xinjiang, a stance that aligns with previous US State Department reports and statements from President Biden. These claims have persisted amidst broader geopolitical tensions and strategic interests.

Critics argue that the narrative of genocide in Xinjiang is selective and based on cherry-picked evidence, disregarding countervailing facts such as China's assertions in its White Paper that a significant number of Uyghur detainees have been released, efforts to provide vocational training within detention centers, and the implementation of de-radicalization programs in line with international norms.

Moreover, global opinion on the matter reflects a stark divide between Western countries and those in the Global South, including numerous Muslim-majority nations. While Western nations have predominantly endorsed the genocide narrative, a substantial portion of the international community remains skeptical, viewing the issue through geopolitical lenses rather than purely humanitarian concerns.

Significantly, the Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC), representing 57 member states, has expressed support for China's efforts in Xinjiang, including visits to rehabilitation facilities, reflecting a divergent perspective from Western assertions of genocide.

Amidst these debates, critical voices have emerged questioning the underlying motives and agendas driving the genocide narrative. Some analysts argue that geopolitical strategies, including efforts to contain China's influence, play a significant role in shaping international perceptions of Xinjiang. These perspectives highlight broader geopolitical dynamics and selective prioritization of human rights issues on the global stage.

It is essential to approach discussions on Xinjiang with a commitment to factual accuracy and transparency, avoiding sensationalism and political manipulation. The complexity of the issue underscores the importance of balanced dialogue and comprehensive understanding, respecting diverse viewpoints within the global community.

This press release aims to provide a balanced perspective on the Xinjiang issue, acknowledging divergent global viewpoints while emphasizing the need for factual accuracy and transparency in discussions.

Committee to Protect Journalists demands release of two Kazakh journalists in Xinjiang

03 July 2024, The Print

The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) has demanded Chinese authorities release Kazakh journalists – Kairat Domalin and Kuandyk Koben, who have been arrested from Xinjiang region and stop harassing members of the media fraternity.

In a statement, the CPJ said that the Chinese authorities arrested Domalin and Koben in Urumqi a city in Xinjiang in April this year, and the arrests were reported in June by the Atajurt Kazakh Human Rights, a human rights organization based in Kazakhstan. Both of the journalists were employed at the local state-run television network Xinjiang Television in Urumqi.

According to the statement, CPJ has not yet received any information regarding the charges that resulted in the arrest of Domalin and Koben. However, the arrest of Koben might be linked to his work related to historic buildings of Xinjiang that have been intentionally ignored by the Chinese government.

While raising the same matter, Iris Hsu, CPJ's China representative stated, "Chinese authorities must free Kazakh journalists Kairat Domalin and Kuandyk Koben. It's time for China to cease its campaign of harassing and arbitrarily detaining press members of the Muslim ethnic minorities and release all imprisoned journalists."

Domalin was a TV presenter for the program "Zholashy" (Traveler) on the Xinjiang Television network, and Koben produced, directed, and presented Kazakh-language documentaries and more than 20 award-winning television programs, the CPJ statement claimed. In addition, the call of CPJ to the Public Security Department of Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region regarding the safety of the journalists had also gone unanswered.

Previously, CPJ in a report released in 2023 found out that China remains the worst place when it comes to arresting journalists, especially from ethnic minorities.

According to CPJ's latest annual prison census, with at least 44 behind bars as of December 1, 2023. Many journalists held were ethnic Uyghurs from Xinjiang.

Meanwhile, international human rights organisations, the United Nations, and several governments of the state have blamed China and its authorities for its severe crimes against humanity and ongoing genocide in the Xinjiang region, particularly for repressing the region's Muslim ethnic groups. ### No Uyghurs from Xinjiang went on Hajj pilgrimage, data shows

02 July 2024, RFA, Gulchehra Hoja

The apparent lack of participation is another example of China's repression of Uyghurs, experts say.

No Uyghurs from China's far-western region of Xinjiang were among the Muslims from China who went on this year's Hajj, according to data from the Islamic Association of China and a Uyghur living abroad who went on the pilgrimage to Mecca.

All told, more than 1.8 million people participated in this year's Hajj, which fell between June 14-19, according to Saudi Arabian officials, including 1.6 million foreign pilgrims.

Muslims in China need government permission to make the pilgrimage, which as one of the Five Pillars of Islam is required of all Muslims once in their lives, if health allows.

As of early June, 1,053 pilgrims – 769 from China's Gansu province and 284 from Yunnan province – were registered to go on the Hajj, according to the website of the Islamic Association of China. No Uyghurs or other Muslims from Xinjiang were included in the tally.

Last year, 386 pilgrims from Ningxia province and other places in China participated, but none from Xinjiang.

The last time any pilgrim from Xinjiang was reported by the association was in 2016.

Abdusalam Teklimakan Haji, a Uyghur in Turkey who went on the Hajj this year and is a member of the board of the International Union of Eastern Turkistan Organizations, said he saw no Uyghurs from Xinjiang among the Chinese delegation, although he did see some ethnic Hui Muslims carrying Chinese flags.

Saudi Arabia's Ministry of Hajj and Umrah, which oversees the pilgrimage, allows about 1,000 pilgrims per million people from each country around the world, he said. With an estimated population of 11 million Uyghurs in Xinjiang – which Uyghurs prefer to call East Turkistan – at least 11,000 Uyghurs should be allowed to perform the Hajj.

Radio Free Asia tried contacting the Islamic Association of China and other departments in Xinjiang administrating the relevant affairs for comment, but received no response.

Repressing religion

The apparent lack of Uyghur participation suggests Chinese authorities are not permitting any Muslims from Xinjiang from going on the pilgrimage, and reflects Beijing's wider repression of Uyghur culture and religious practice, activists and experts say.

Since 2017, China has severely restricted most religious practices among Uyghurs, including praying in mosques, reciting the Quran and fasting during the holy month of Ramadan, in the name of squelching religious extremism and terrorism.

"The Chinese government's targeted restrictions and repression on Uyghur people's religious activities, such as pilgrimage, prayer and fasting, are part of its genocidal policies against Uyghurs," said Ma Ju, an analyst of Islam based in New York City.

"Although China is giving opportunities to a small number of Hui Muslims to perform Hajj so that they can attract the attention of the world, especially the Muslim world, we know that their religious freedom is also restricted," he said.

"There is no religious freedom for any citizen in China," Ma said.

Just before the start of this year's Hajj season, the Chinese government boosted its propaganda campaign for the Muslim world, experts said.

At the beginning of June, the Chinese Consulate General in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, and the Xinjiang Overseas Friendship Association jointly organized a music night in Dubai called "Xinjiang is a Good Place."

China has held similar events in Kuwait, Turkey, Egypt and other Muslim-dominated countries, emphasizing that they respect the freedom of cultural and religious belief in Xinjiang.

Although the events featured Uyghur dancers and singers, no Uyghurs were a part of the Chinese delegation to Mecca.

Chinese authorities must immediately release ethnic Kazakh journalists Kairat Domalin and Kuandyk Koben, who were arrested in China's Xinjiang region, and cease harassing members of the press, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday. Chinese police arrested Domalin and Koben in Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang region, in April, according to the U.S. Congress-funded Radio Free Asia (RFA). The arrests were first reported by Atajurt Kazakh Human Rights, a human rights organization based in Kazakhstan's biggest city, Almaty, in June. They both worked as Kazakh-language television journalists for the local state-run television network Xinjiang Television in Urumqi.

CPJ was unable to confirm what, if any, charges the pair face or other details about their arrest. According to RFA, Koben's arrest may be linked to his work on a historic building in Xinjiang that the government has intentionally neglected.

"Chinese authorities must free Kazakh journalists Kairat Domalin and Kuandyk Koben," said Iris Hsu, CPJ's China representative. "It's time for China to cease its campaign of harassing and arbitrarily detaining press members of the Muslim ethnic minorities and release all imprisoned journalists."

Domalin was a TV presenter for the program "Zholaushy" (Traveler) on Xinjiang Television network, and Koben produced, directed, and presented Kazakh-language documentaries and more than 20 award-winning television programs.

CPJ's call to the Public Security Department of Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region went unanswered.

Serikzhan Bilash, founder of Atajurt Kazakh Human Rights, told CPJ that Koben's brother asked the organization to remove a May 10 YouTube video asking for information from the public about Koben's arrest, fearing that the video would "complicate" Koben's detainment.

According to the RFA report, "several" Kazakh journalists for the state-owned newspaper Xinjiang Daily, along with a few Kazakh editors from different magazines, were also arrested. CPJ could not independently verify these arrests.

China was the world's worst jailer of journalists, according to CPJ's latest annual prison census, with at least 44 behind bars as of December 1, 2023. Many journalists held were ethnic Uyghurs from Xinjiang.

Human rights groups, the United Nations, and foreign governments have accused Chinese authorities of crimes against humanity and genocide in the Xinjiang region as authorities harshly repress the region's Muslim ethnic groups.

CCP's anniversary marred by global outcry over Xinjiang 'genocide'

01 July 2024, The Print

On the 103rd anniversary of the founding of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), the party is facing severe criticism from human rights organisations and ethnic groups for alleged human rights abuses in Xinjiang, also known as East Turkistan.

The Swedish Uyghur Committee highlighted the grim legacy of the CCP on social media, condemning what they describe as the party's "ruthless invasion, occupation, and colonisation" of East Turkistan.

The committee's post on Twitter, now known as X, stated, "On #CCP's 103rd anniversary, remember their legacy stained by blood: Ruthless invasion, #occupation, and #colonisation of #EastTurkistan accompanied by their ongoing #genocide against Uyghurs/Turkic peoples."

The post further accused the Chinese government of subjecting millions of East Turkistani people, including Uyghurs, to severe human rights violations. These allegations include torture, execution, organ harvesting, starvation, indoctrination, sexual assault, and forced labour in concentration camps.

The committee also highlighted the forced sterilisation of pregnant Uyghur women, the killing of unborn children, and the abduction of over a million Uyghur children by the CCP for what they termed “horrific abuse,” including organ harvesting.

The Swedish Uyghur Committee’s post emphasised that the anniversary should not be viewed as a celebration but rather as a reminder of the “monstrous cruelty” perpetrated by the CCP and the “world’s complicit silence.”

The CCP, which has ruled China since 1949, often uses its anniversary to highlight its achievements and reaffirm its commitment to socialism with Chinese characteristics. However, the party’s actions in Xinjiang have drawn widespread international condemnation. Numerous reports and testimonies from survivors have detailed the extent of the abuses, leading many to label the situation as genocide.

As the CCP marks its 103rd anniversary, the voices calling for justice for the Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples in Xinjiang grow louder, demanding accountability and an end to the ongoing human rights abuses. (ANI)

Canadian ambassador’s visit to Xinjiang draws China’s ire

25 June 2024, RFA, Jewlan

Jennifer May raised concerns about human rights violations against Uyghurs.

Canada’s ambassador to China expressed concern over documented human rights violations against Uyghurs with top officials during a visit to Xinjiang, sparking criticism from the Chinese Embassy in Canada that said her concerns were based on “fabricated rumors and reports with ulterior motives.”

Ambassador Jennifer May visited the far-western region on June 19-22 and met with Xinjiang Party Secretary Ma Xingrui and other senior regional government officials, according to a statement issued by Global Affairs Canada, the government department that manages diplomatic relations.

Very few Western diplomats have visited Xinjiang in recent years. It was the first visit to the region by a Canadian diplomat in 10 years. Last August, a group of diplomats from Mexico, Pakistan, Iran and other countries visited the region as part of a government-sponsored tour.

May went to Xinjiang as part of Canada’s diplomatic engagement with China and to raise concerns “over credible reports of systematic violations of human rights occurring in Xinjiang” affecting Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples, the statement said.

Specific concerns included restrictions on Uyghur-language education and the forced placement of Uyghur children in boarding schools, it said, but did not provide detail about the places May visited or what she saw.

In February 2021, Canada’s House of Commons passed a motion declaring the Chinese government’s mistreatment of Uyghurs – including the arbitrary detention of Uyghurs in state-sponsored camps, the use of Uyghur forced labor, the suppression of Uyghur religious practices, and the forced sterilization of women – a genocide.

May also repeated Canada’s calls for China to allow U.N. independent experts unfettered access to all regions of the country, including Xinjiang, the statement said.

“Until an independent investigation team can visit, assess the situation, and release an unbiased report, Canada is signaling that China’s propaganda and staged displays showing Uyghurs as content are ineffective and disregarded,” said Memet Tohti, executive director of the Ottawa-based Uyghur Rights Advocacy Project.

Jennifer May, Canada’s ambassador to China, appears on CTVNews, June 18, 2024. (CTVNews screenshot)

A 2022 report by the then-U.N. Human Rights Chief Michelle Bachelet, who visited Xinjiang, found that China’s mass detentions of Uyghurs and other Turkic minorities in the region may constitute crimes against humanity. Uyghur rights groups criticized the tightly organized trip as a staged tour.

Beijing has denied accusations of severe rights violations.

May’s visit coincided a call by international human rights organizations and Uyghur advocacy groups on June 20 for the U.N.’s current human rights chief, Volker Türk, to provide a public update of measures taken by the Chinese government and his office to address the situation in Xinjiang.

‘Same old rhetoric’

On Monday, the Chinese Embassy in Canada issued a statement saying that Canada “repeated the same old rhetoric, expressing so-called concerns based on fabricated rumors and reports with ulterior motives, without mentioning what Ambassador May really saw and heard in Xinjiang."

The embassy urged Canada to be objective and unbiased and to show Canadians what May saw during her visit. It also said that Xinjiang enjoys social stability, economic prosperity, ethnic unity and religious harmony.

"Human rights of people of all ethnic groups, including their right to use and advance their own ethnic languages, are fully protected," the embassy said.

"Canada has repeatedly made unwarranted remarks about other countries' human rights situation, while turning a blind eye to its own racial issues," the embassy went on to say, citing systemic racial discrimination and unfair treatment of indigenous people, homeless people whose rights are not protected, and racial discrimination against Black civil servants in the federal government.

Canada has long upheld human rights protections and has voiced its concerns about them periodically, said John Packer, a law professor and director of the Human Rights Research and Education Centre at the University of Ottawa.

"This has been a contentious part of the relationship because China does not share the same perspective and considers these issues a matter of internal affairs, feeling it is inappropriate for Canada to raise them," he told Radio Free Asia.

Because Canada and China are parties to international treaties, including human rights agreements such as the U.N. Charter and the Genocide Convention, they are bound by certain multilateral standards, making it legitimate to discuss such matters in international forums and in bilateral relations, Packer said.

Sinicization in Xinjiang: CCP authorities kill Uyghurs, sell 'halal organs' to run medical transplant industry

24 June 2024, Organiser

As an integral part of the Sinicization of non-Chinese communities, including the Turkic minorities and the Uyghurs, in Xinjiang, the cruel Chinese authorities are forcibly killing Uyghurs and selling their organs to run a lucrative medical transplant mission and meet its demands besides regular detention and torture placing PRC at a high position in human rights abuses

The situation regarding the treatment of Uyghurs in China is deeply concerning and has raised serious allegations of human rights abuses, including forced organ harvesting. In March, during a US congressional committee hearing, experts had claimed that Chinese authorities had gathered genetic information from the Muslim Uyghur minority, with the aim of supporting a forced organ transplant programme targeted at attracting Muslim medical tourists from Gulf states.

In a post on X, Uyghur-American politician Salih Hundayar stated, "China has inaugurated a "Children's Organ Transplant Centre." As part of the Uyghur genocide, China has been harvesting Uyghurs' organs and selling them as "halal organs." Since 2014, nearly a million Uyghur children have been forcibly separated from their families. Is this another step in China's ongoing Uyghur Genocide and notorious organ harvesting practices?"

There have been allegations and reports from various sources, including human rights organisations and testimonies from individuals, suggesting that Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslim minorities in Xinjiang have faced severe repression, including forced labour, mass detention, and possibly forced organ harvesting. These claims are serious and demand thorough investigation and accountability.

According to the Minnesota-based non-profit organisation 'World Without Genocide', Uyghurs are reportedly being killed for their organs to meet the demands of a lucrative transplant industry valued at approximately USD 1 billion annually. These allegations are serious and have been raised by various human rights organizations, investigative journalists, and testimonies from individuals who claim to have been affected or have knowledge of such practices.

However, due to the secretive nature of the Chinese government and limited independent access to Xinjiang, verifying these claims with concrete evidence remains challenging. International bodies and governments have called for investigations into these allegations, emphasising the need for transparency and accountability from Chinese authorities. Advocacy groups continue to monitor the situation closely and push for international scrutiny to ensure the protection of human rights and dignity for all individuals affected.

China changes names of 630 Uyghur villages in Xinjiang: report

24 June 2024, RFA, Gulchehra Hoja

It's another way of erasing Uyghur religion, history and culture, a human rights group says.

China has changed the names of about 630 Uyghur villages to Mandarin words such as "Harmony" and "Unity" to promote ethnic harmony in Xinjiang, a report by a human rights group found,

The move is "part of Chinese government's efforts to erase the cultural and religious expression" of the more than 11 million predominantly Muslim Uyghurs living in China's far-western Xinjiang region, New York-based Human Rights Watch, or HRW, said in its June 18 report.

"How these village names are being kind of erased and replaced shows how dystopian the whole project of the Chinese government in the Uyghur region is," Maya Wang, acting China director at HRW.

"It's about repressing people and ... the past, and erasing the future, and erasing what they can imagine as a possibility for their own children or grandchildren," she said.

The results came after HRW and Norway-based Uyghur Hjelp scraped names of villages in Xinjiang from the website of China's National Bureau of Statistics.

All told, China changed the names of 3,652 of 25,000 Uyghur villages in Xinjiang between 2009 and 2023, but most of these changes have been mundane, such as correcting numbers or the way the names were written, they found.

But 630 of the changes were more dramatic and religious, cultural or historical in nature. And most renamings occurred between 2017 and 2019, when the Chinese government's repression escalated in the region, the report said, but they appear to be continuing.

'Erasing symbols'

For example, Aq Meschit, or "White Mosque," village in Akto county, Kizilsu Kyrgyz Autonomous Prefecture, was renamed Unity village in 2018.

The same year, Hoja Eriq, or "Sufi Teacher's Creek," village in Aksu Prefecture was rechristened Willow village.

And Dutar, a village named after a Uyghur musical instrument, in Qaraqash county of Hotan prefecture, was renamed Red Flag in 2022.

The Chinese government has used the village renamings along with other tactics, including the banning of hijabs for women, beards for men, and Muslim names for children, to wipe out Uyghur culture and to humiliate the ethnic group, Wang said. "On a very fundamental level, erasing the symbols of people, the language and culture is about erasing who they are and teaching them to fear," she said.

The village renamings are also part of the greater set of serious rights abuses and crimes against humanity involving the detentions of an estimated 1.8 million Uyghurs and other Turkic people in "re-education" camps, torture, forced labor, sexual violence and the forced sterilization of woman, Wang said.

Uyghur children play in a square where a propaganda poster shows Han Chinese and Uyghurs posing together in a photograph with the words 'Hotan City Unity New Village Unity Square' at the Unity New Village in Hotan, northwestern China's Xinjiang region, Sept. 20, 2018. (Andy Wong/AP)

Campaign for Uyghurs, a Washington-based Uyghur advocacy group, condemned the village renamings.

"The names, which have now been changed to empty CCP [Chinese Communist Party] slogans, once reflected our long history and rich culture and have been in our homeland for hundreds of years," said Rushan Abbas, the group's executive director, in a statement.

"Although the CCP appears to celebrate Uyghur culture by showcasing elements like our music and dance, these displays are nothing but hollow propaganda masking the regime's ongoing and systematic suppression of cultural and religious expression," Abbas said.

In response to such measures, foreign governments, especially those in Muslim-majority nations, can put pressure on the Chinese government to stop its abuses involving religious and ethnic minorities and condemn such behavior, said Ibrahim Hooper, national communications director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations in Washington.

Human rights groups call for UN update, action on China's Xinjiang

20 June 2024, VOA

Human rights groups on Thursday called for the United Nations to act and provide more updates on a report published nearly two years ago about a range of rights violations in China's remote western region of Xinjiang.

The report, issued in August 2022, found that actions taken in Xinjiang may have constituted "crimes against humanity." It also highlighted what it called highly "credible" abuses, including "torture, forced sterilization, sexual violence and forced separation of children."

China called the report a "farce" and a politically motivated attempt to smear its reputation.

Now, nearly two years later and with few updates, Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, the International Service for Human Rights and the World Uyghur Congress issued a statement Thursday calling for action by U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Türk.

"The ongoing absence of public reporting by the high commissioner to follow up the atrocity crimes documented by his own office risks undermining the trust placed in his office by victims and survivors," the statement said.

Türk mentioned Xinjiang Tuesday when he presented his global updates at the 56th session of the U.N. Human Rights Council. In his update, Türk said he "continued to engage with China on a range of human rights issues, including the serious concerns my office identified in the Xinjiang region."

Rights groups, however, say that did not go far enough.

In their statement, the rights groups said Türk did not provide "any specifics about his engagement with the government, a substantive update on the situation in Xinjiang, nor an assessment of the implementation of the report recommendations by his office."

The rights groups added, "It's up to the U.N. high commissioner to make full use of that report to improve the situation for Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims in Xinjiang."

Rights groups have been working together since 2018 to "push the Human Rights Council and other U.N. bodies to document and respond to growing evidence of atrocity crimes in China and to disseminate these findings globally."

On Thursday they also said that the U.N. had failed to make the report available in any language other than English, adding that they have provided their own unofficial translations in the body's other official languages: Arabic, French, Russian, Spanish and Chinese.

Religious and cultural mentions removed from names of China's Xinjiang villages

19 June 2024, NBC News

The name changes appear to be part of a Chinese government attack on the cultural identity of Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities, Human Rights Watch said in a report.

Authorities in China's western Xinjiang region have been systematically replacing the names of villages inhabited by Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities to reflect the ruling Communist Party's ideology, as part of an attack on their cultural identity, a report released by Human Rights Watch said Wednesday.

About 630 villages in Xinjiang have had their names changed to remove references to Islam or the Uyghurs' culture and history, according to the group's report, done in collaboration with the Norway-based organization Uyghur Hjelp.

The report compared the names of 25,000 Xinjiang villages as listed by the National Bureau of Statistics of China between 2009 and 2023.

Words like "dutar," a traditional Uyghur string instrument, or "mazar," a shrine, have been removed from the names of villages, and replaced with words such as "happiness," "unity" and "harmony" — generic terms often found in the Communist Party's policy documents.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to faxed questions about the report and its policies in Xinjiang.

Xinjiang is a vast region bordering Kazakhstan that is home to about 11 million Uyghurs and other ethnic minorities. In 2017, the Chinese government launched a campaign of assimilation that has included mass detentions, alleged political indoctrination, alleged family separations and alleged forced labor among other methods.

As part of the crackdown, more than 1 million Uyghurs, Kazakhs, Kyrgyz and other ethnic minorities were estimated to be held in extralegal internment camps. The Chinese government at the time described the camps as "vocational training centers" and said they were necessary to curb separatism and religious extremism.

The U.N. Human Rights Office in 2022 found accusations of rights violations in Xinjiang "credible" and said China may have committed crimes against humanity in the region.

The changes to the names of Xinjiang villages included removing mentions of religion, including terms such as “Hoja,” a title for a Sufi religious teacher, and “haniqa,” a type of Sufi religious building, or terms such as “baxshi,” a shaman.

References to Uyghur history or to regional leaders prior to the establishment of the People’s Republic of China in 1949 have also been removed, according to the report.

“The Chinese authorities have been changing hundreds of village names in Xinjiang from those rich in meaning for Uyghurs to those that reflect government propaganda,” said Maya Wang, acting China director at Human Rights Watch. “These name changes appear part of Chinese government efforts to erase the cultural and religious expressions of Uyghurs.”

The Chinese government wants to “erase people’s historical memory, because those names remind people of who they are,” said Abduweli Ayup, a Uyghur linguist based in Norway and founder of Uyghur Hjelp.

Most of the village name changes occurred between 2017 and 2019, at the height of the government crackdown in Xinjiang, according to the report.

Uyghur woman re-sentenced for teaching youth the Quran

18 June 2024, RFA, Shohret Hoshur

Heyrinisa Memet had just completed a 10-year prison term after a 2014 crackdown.

Soon after completing a 10-year prison term, a Uyghur woman was sentenced to another 14 years in jail for attempting to split China by teaching the Quran to teenagers, authorities with knowledge of the situation said.

Heyrinisa Memet, in her mid-40s, had been previously sentenced during a crackdown in 2014 after a “terrorist attack” in Xinjiang that Chinese authorities blamed on separatist Uyghur Muslims.

Within days of her release, she was sentenced again on June 11 for activities back in 2014 – providing religious instruction to youth at the request of her neighbors – the director of security of Zulkum village in Kashgar prefecture said, insisting on not being identified for fear of reprisal.

“Her crime was teaching religious content to kids,” he said. “She wasn’t changing those kids’ ideology, she was just teaching them religious content.”

In recent years, Chinese authorities have punished large numbers of Uyghurs in Xinjiang for religious offenses, including teaching the Quran to children, according to leaked Chinese government documents, data compiled by Uyghur rights groups, and accounts of former detainees from “re-education” camps.

Authorities have criminalized such activities because they believe that Uyghurs use religion to incite subversion of state sovereignty, endanger social stability, and advocate religious extremism, terrorism and ethnic separatism.

Memet was one of three people from Zulkum village sentenced at closed-door trials in Makit county of Kashgar prefecture on June 11, according to the village security director and to an officer at the village police station.

Two other Uyghurs from the community who had finished serving prison sentences were tried anew as well, said the village security director, who like others in the report, declined to be named so as to speak freely.

“It’s been one and a half years since their release,” he said. “There was no problem, but they were arrested only because they were in prison before.”

They were sentenced to 18 years in prison for listening to audio recordings or watching videos, he said.

“There was no mention of extremism, but they were keeping those audio and videos,” the village security director said. “They were accused of having hatred towards Han Chinese people, but there was no evidence.”

Authorities informed their families that their previous “education” was not sufficient, so they were taken away for further “education,” he said.

Previous sentence

The village security director went on to say that authorities first sentenced Memet when she was swept up in a crackdown following a “terrorist attack” on a market in Xinjiang’s capital Urumqi on May 22, 2014.

On that morning, five assailants in two sport utility vehicles drove into a busy street market, tossing out explosives and mowing down the mainly Han Chinese shoppers before colliding with each other and exploding. More than 40 people, including four of the assailants, were killed, and over 90 others injured.

The attack occurred amid a string of violent incidents in Xinjiang that officials blamed on separatist Uyghur Muslims.

At the time, activists said the violence was being driven by authorities’ restrictive and discriminatory policies directed at Uyghurs, and the belief that only Han Chinese migrants were benefiting from economic growth in the region.

A police officer in Makit county told Radio Free Asia that some of the Uyghurs sentenced during the 2014 crackdown had completed their terms, but were transferred to jail upon release.

Some were kept in jail for a month, some for a year, and others were sentenced again, he said. Among them were three people from Zulkum village who were sentenced up to 18 years in prison, he said, but could not provide further details.

Former senior Xinjiang official expelled from CPC, public office

17 June 2024, Xinhua

Li Pengxin, former deputy secretary of the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Regional Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC), has been expelled from the CPC and dismissed from public office over serious violations of Party discipline and laws.

The decision was made following an investigation by the CPC Central Commission for Discipline Inspection (CCDI) and the National Commission of Supervision (NCS) with the approval of the CPC Central Committee, according to a statement released by the CCDI and NCS on Monday.

The investigation found that Li had lost his ideals and convictions, and was dishonest about his problems in the face of Party inquiry, the statement said.

Failing to abide by the central Party leadership's eight-point decision on improving conduct, he attended banquets and accepted vehicle and driver services that could affect the fair execution of his official duties, according to the investigation findings. He was found to have accepted money and valuables, and taken advantage of his former position to seek benefits for others in mineral exploitation projects, enterprise operations and job adjustment and promotion, which are in violation of relevant regulations.

According to the statement, Li's actions constituted serious duty-related violations, and he was also suspected of taking bribes, the statement said.

Li's illicit gains will be confiscated, and the case will be transferred to the procuratorial organs for examination and prosecution in accordance with the law, according to the statement.

China promotes Xinjiang, epicentre of human-rights abuses, as tourist destination

17 June 2024, ANI

China's Xinjiang region, which has been under the scanner for violating human rights, has now been shown as a far more idyllic view of the region as instructed and funded by Xi Jinping government to promote it as a tourist destination through a television drama, the Wall Street Journal reported.

According to the United States, China's far western Xinjiang region is often associated with detention camps and a wide network of security checkpoints to control Uyghurs and other mostly Muslim minorities.

However, Beijing has been for years now, denying Western allegations of human-rights violations in Xinjiang, with China portraying the region as infected by a violent strain of religious extremism that needs to be eradicated.

"To the Wonder," the television drama depicting Xinjiang as a land of beauty and wide-open steppes rather than a dangerous backwater inhabited by potential terrorists, the Wall Street Journal reported. Meanwhile, now, China's propaganda system is promoting a far more idyllic view of the region at least for a domestic audience, as reported by Wall Street Journal.

Recently, a Chinese television drama, "To the Wonder," about the love between a Han Chinese writer and a Kazakh man, has grabbed the country's attention, dominating social media and sparking a Xinjiang tourism boom.

The show "To the Wonder" is part of a ramped-up effort to showcase Xinjiang as a beautiful land instead of a dangerous land occupied with potential terrorists.

Moreover, their strategy has proven successful, especially among young, urban Chinese looking for escape from their hectic lives, reported Wall Street Journal.

"To the Wonder" is one of the most popular drama series this year on the Chinese internet and the state broadcaster, attracting more than 100 million viewers online within a week of its release in early May.

The head of tourism in the small Xinjiang town of Altay, where the show is set, said that the bookings there have increased 370 percent since the show began.

The show has been funded by the state and heavily promoted by their official media, is based on a popular memoir published in 2010 by Li Juan, about her family's hardships among Kazakh nomads in northern Xinjiang.

The director, Teng Congcong, is known for work with a focus on women and she told the local media that she saw potential in Li's book for another female portrait, Wall Street Journal reported.

Li was born in a Xinjiang paramilitary compound in 1979, when Beijing sent young Han Chinese to help develop the remote area. She spent most of her childhood in Altay.

Last year, the National Radio and Television Administration selected the show for state funding.

Notably, one of the criteria was that projects must "tell the China story well."

The show, co-produced by the state broadcaster and video platform iQiyi, also highlighted a new business model for Chinese authorities, with local officials tapping into the popularity of dramas filmed in their regions to promote tourism.

The radio and television administration further encouraged platforms to use algorithms to promote the shows, stating, "Positive energy should generate massive traffic".

However, the promotion has mostly targeted young Chinese, but the show was included in the Canneseries, an international television festival held annually in Cannes, France, and is also airing in Kazakhstan this month.

The Xinjiang official account on X, promoted the show in English-language tweets, saying it represents the "freedom, grandeur and beauty of northern Xinjiang."

Human-rights concerns in Xinjiang, covering the one-sixth of China's land territory, have been one of the focal points of US-China tensions, reported Wall street journal.

The Chinese government has been targetting Uyghurs and other minorities with mass detention and omnipresent surveillance as part of a campaign of forcible assimilation, which has also encouraged marriages between Han Chinese and minority members.

Additionally, some governments, rights groups and researchers have also alleged that the Chinese authorities are employing forced labor in Xinjiang as part of the campaign.

The US law bans imports linked to the region and their lawmakers label Beijing's treatment of Uyghurs as a form of "genocide".

China's government, however, has portrayed the assimilation campaign as an effort to fight religious extremism and terrorism.

According to the officials, the efforts to relocate rural residents to factories help improve their income and living standards, Wall street Journal reported.

Daria Impiombato, an analyst at the Australian Strategic Policy Institute, a Canberra-backed think tank, said that the authorities are trying to sell a more "docile and lovable" image of China's frontier regions.

Impiombato also co-wrote a report on how Chinese authorities have begun to enlist women as "frontier influencers" in propaganda efforts around troubled regions such as Xinjiang and Tibet, wall Street Journal reported.

Xinjiang's propaganda department has planned to spend 308 million yuan, or roughly USD 43 million, on culture tourism and communications and media this year, which is more than 60 per cent of its total budgeted spending and 27 per cent more than it spent on such items in 2020.

The boosting tourism helps the Chinese government bring Xinjiang into the mainstream, making it just like any other place in China, Impiombato said.

Traditionally, minorities have been depicted in official Chinese media as either living in backward conditions or glorifying how much better their lives have become under the Communist Party leadership.

"To the Wonder" is a more nuanced portrayal. It shows the everyday struggles of the herders and their love of nature and their livestock.

In one of the scenes, with little cash on hand, a Kazakh family insists on paying a debt with a camel, as reported by Wall Street Journal.

However, a few scenes remind the audience of the reality of life in Xinjiang, such as when two Kazakh men have to hand over their pocket knives to use public transportation.

The Human Rights Watch released a report in February, stating that it found that Chinese authorities are coercing Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims away from their homes and into jobs in factories and warehouses around China.

Earlier in May, Thea Lee, the deputy undersecretary for international affairs at the US Labor Department said that the forced labourers are being transferred from Xinjiang to elsewhere in China in growing numbers. (ANI)

China's ethnic policy chief slams 'ignorance of history' in Xinjiang assimilation claims

16 June 2024, The Star, Yuanyue Dang

China's top ethnic policy official has dismissed claims that Xinjiang is being "assimilated" into Chinese culture as "ignorance of history".

Pan Yue, director of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, made the remarks during a keynote speech on Wednesday at an international forum in Kashgar, a city in the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region that was once part of the ancient Silk Road.

His comments come as Beijing continues to promote its new ethnic integration policies and defend measures taken in the vast western region home to the mainly Muslim Uygur minority.

"There is an inaccurate narrative in the international community that separates Xinjiang culture from Chinese culture and even sets them against each other. But a large amount of archaeological evidence tells us that Xinjiang has been an important part of the Chinese cultural sphere since ancient times," Pan said.

"There is also an international narrative that contradicts the facts and portrays Xinjiang's relationship with Chinese culture as 'assimilation'. This is ignorance of Chinese history."

The people of ancient western regions far from central China – some small states ruled by nomadic peoples rather than the Han Chinese who later became the majority of the Chinese population –

"have also been co-creators of Chinese culture", Pan said.

These regions include what is now the Xinjiang region, as well as the Tibet autonomous region to its south and parts of central Asia.

After thousands of years of "migration, settlement, trade and marriages", "Xinjiang and central China [now] eventually belong to a single political community", Pan said, adding that Islamic culture represented only one part of Xinjiang's "diverse religious culture".

Xinjiang has a population of about 26 million, close to two-thirds of which is made up of ethnic minorities, including Uyghurs and Kazakhs.

Ethnic tensions, particularly in Xinjiang and Tibet, have been a challenge for the government. Controversial governance measures in place in Xinjiang since 2016, in response to once-frequent violent attacks there, have led to allegations of human rights abuses, which Beijing denies.

Pan's comments were in line with Beijing's push over the past decade for a "sense of community for the Chinese nation".

The concept was introduced by President Xi Jinping in 2014. At a meeting in 2021, he said that building this sense of community should be at the heart of all ethnic minority policies and urged local authorities to take more proactive measures.

The measures include promoting the use of "standard spoken and written Chinese", meaning Mandarin, and reinterpreting Chinese history to say that China's 55 ethnic minorities had created civilisation with the Han Chinese majority since ancient times.

The International Forum on the History and Future of Xinjiang, which opened on Wednesday, was jointly organised by several universities in Beijing and Xinjiang.

Official media reported that more than 100 experts from China, the United States, Australia, Germany, Italy, Hungary, Egypt, Russia, Mongolia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan and other countries attended the event in Kashgar, where the remains of a third century Buddhist temple were discovered recently.

Archaeologists said the Buddha statues unearthed at the site bore the characteristics of those from central China, a claim in line with Beijing's historical narrative.

A university textbook edited by Pan, published in February, has been described by experts as the most direct articulation of China's ethnic integration policy as laid down by Xi a decade ago.

The book argues that all ethnic groups have accepted the concept of zhonghua, or Chinese culture or civilisation, since ancient times. It also cites political divisions and "social cleavages" in the West to justify Beijing's policy of ethnic integration.

"Neither the harmonising 'melting pot' policy nor the ultra-diverse model of ethnic governance works," the book says.

Similar views were expressed in Pan's speech. He said China had not experienced "religious wars", "colonial expansion" or "cultural export" for thousands of years, and could "maybe provide a reference for the ethnic and religious conflicts that still exist in the world today".

In recent years, the Xinjiang government has also sought to improve its international image through outreach efforts.

It has frequently hosted visits by foreign envoys, media delegations, religious figures and academics, and sent officials to promote the region in Central Asia and Africa.

Xinhua Headlines: "Forced labor" lies bring "forced unemployment" in Xinjiang

07 June 2024, Xinhua

What Aminam Tulladin wants above all else is her old job back.

Recalling her workdays just a few years ago, she described the moment she received her first pay check as "an elating moment."

Now, the 26-year-old from northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region is a housewife struggling to make ends meet.

"I'm yearning to go back to work," she said.

Starting in 2017 as an intern at a textile processing company in Qingdao, a coastal city in eastern China, Aminam Tulladin was more than thrilled to hear that her boss, Xu Caifeng, decided to move their company to her home county, Shache, in southern Xinjiang.

One year later, her hard work was rewarded with a promotion to team leader and a decent salary of over 3,000 yuan (about 421.9 U.S. dollars) a month. Back then, the company, Shache Xiongying Textile Co., Ltd., employed nearly 1,000 staff with orders mainly coming from Europe and the United States, logging an annual sales revenue of 15 million yuan.

As their business continued to grow, Xu and her husband channeled more money into the company and built a second-phase workshop in the latter half of 2019.

The future seemed bright and promising. Never could they have imagined that their fates would take a sudden turn just because of some lies fabricated by someone a million miles away.

"FORCED LABOR" OR "FORCED LAYOFFS?"

Soon after the completion of the new workshop, Xu became concerned when their incoming orders gradually dwindled, and eventually, their European and U.S. business nearly came to a halt, rendering the new workshop "idle from the moment it was built."

It took them a while to finally discover the reason. "It turned out that our factory was mentioned in a report written by Adrian Zenz, who accused factories in Xinjiang of 'forced labor,'" said Xu.

Under the guise of an academic study, Zenz concocted a series of "research reports" related to Xinjiang, wantonly discrediting the region.

In one report, he made the groundless claim that hundreds of thousands of ethnic minority workers in Xinjiang were "forced" to pick cotton by hand, urging the international community to issue temporary sanctions against any production containing cotton from Xinjiang.

Back in 2018, with a view to expand into the European and U.S. markets, Xiongying applied for and obtained a BSCI (Business Social Compliance Initiative) human rights certification.

BSCI representatives stayed at Xiongying for a week, conducting an extensive review of the company's daily production and the lives of its employees. "None of them raised any concerns," Xu recalled.

Now the once bustling community with modernized workshops has almost turned into a ghost town. Only half of the machines on the second floor of the three-story factory remain operational, and fewer than 100 employees remain to fulfill the meager orders that trickle in.

Aminam Tulladin and many other ethnic minority employees had to quit their jobs due to the decrease in orders.

"We obtained this certification to secure more orders, but instead, what we got are production halts and sanctions..." Xu's voice trailed off as she fought back tears.

Xiongying is just a microcosm of numerous companies affected by the U.S. sanctions against Xinjiang.

More than half of the farmers in Xinjiang grow cotton to make a living, and the textile industry creates nearly one million job opportunities across the region. Shache, where ethnic minorities constitute over 95 percent of its population, used to have nearly 100 textile enterprises, but today fewer than one-fifth remain operational.

In recent years, Western media has kept hyping Xinjiang-related issues, fabricating "forced labor" in its cotton industry, and Washington signed the so-called "Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act" into law.

Ostensibly to safeguard "human rights" under the guise of combating "forced labor," the law has only caused "forced unemployment" that led to poverty in and outside Xinjiang.

Even outside the region, like in the central Chinese province of Hubei, about 1,000 natives of Xinjiang had to quit their jobs from the local non-woven fabric sector and move back home, though none of them had worked against their will.

In a recent interview, a Chinese manufacturer-exporter who had to lay off all his Xinjiang employees because of the act, quoted a stark ultimatum from his American clients: "As long as you have one single worker from Xinjiang, we cannot work with you."

"WHAT WILL OUR FUTURE BE LIKE?"

Also starting as an intern, Aminam Iminniyaz, 26, has worked at Xiongying for six years.

"The job is close to home and offers competitive wages, and has good benefits," she said.

Though plummeting orders forced Xu and her husband to lay off the majority of their employees, the wages of those who stay have remained unchanged.

"What will our future be like if the company doesn't thrive? I fear that our current livelihoods could be at risk," said Aminam Iminniyaz. "Many people have lost their jobs. I feel very angry."

Also subject to sanctions is Hoshine Silicon Industry Co., Ltd., a world-leader in silicon manufacturing. In June 2021, Hoshine and four other solar energy companies in Xinjiang were included in the "entity list" by the United States and subjected to unjustified sanctions. The reason given was that these companies violated the human rights of ethnic minorities and engaged in the purported "forced labor."

Its subsidiary in Ganquanpu Economic Development Zone in the regional capital Urumqi has also been affected.

"It's a huge blow to us," said Cheng Yufeng, general manager of the subsidiary. "We lost almost all our customers in the United States and many customers in other regions such as Europe, racking up billions of yuan in losses."

In Hoshine's project in Turpan, nearly 10,000 ethnic minority employees make up 70 percent of its total workforce. The proportion is 50 percent and 20 percent in its factories in Shihezi and Urumqi, respectively. The fate of companies subject to unfair sanctions is closely intertwined with the lives and incomes of the local ethnic minority group.

"NO 'FORCED LABOR' AT ALL!"

In 2020, 10 natives of Moyu County in Hotan came to work at Saurer Xinjiang Intelligent Machinery Co., Ltd., in Urumqi. Munarwan Nur, now 28 years old, is one of them.

Recalling her initial days in Urumqi, Munarwan Nur said: "I wasn't used to it at first. I dared not talk too much as my Mandarin was not good."

But now, this cheerful, cosmopolitan young woman, effortlessly switches between her native Uyghur language and Mandarin.

In July last year, Munarwan Nur and her husband purchased a home in Urumqi. They plan to bring their two children to the city for their schooling this summer.

"Now, I've got a clear goal in life, and I'm highly motivated," she said.

From Moyu to Urumqi, Munarwan Nur's journey is backed by the regional government's efforts from 2018 to 2020 to provide employment opportunities and facilitate poverty alleviation for those who are willing and capable to work in 22 deeply impoverished counties across the four prefecture-level regions in southern Xinjiang.

Through technical training and employment, these individuals were given the opportunity to improve their lives. Unfortunately, these efforts have also been unjustly labeled as "forced labor."

Zenz, the so-called German scholar, said in a report that poverty alleviation is an extremely intrusive combination of forced or at least involuntary training and labor, inter-generational separation and social control over family units.

"Our decision to stay or leave is completely voluntary," said Munarwan Nur. Out of the 10 employees who initially joined Saurer, seven have already left. Some have chosen to find jobs near their home to better take care of their families, while others went back to farming. "Our contracts, benefits and salaries are exactly the same as our Han colleagues. We have weekends and holidays off, and get paid for extra working hours," said Abuduwali Abila, also from Moyu.

Abuduwali Abila, 39, a father of four, is responsible for sorting goods at the factory. When asked about his income, he took out his phone and showed Xinhua his bank statements, which showed a deposit of 68,000 yuan for the year 2023. In comparison, the per capita disposable income of residents in Xinjiang that year was 28,947 yuan.

When asked if he felt compelled to stay at the company, Abuduwali Abila said: "I won't leave unless they asked me to. Where can you possibly find 'forced labor' like this?"

Uyghur brothers shot dead on same day in Xinjiang prison

06 June 2024, RFA, Shohret Hoshur

They were involved in a scuffle with a security guard who killed them, officials and police say.

People stand in a guard tower on the perimeter wall of the Urumqi No. 3 Detention Center in Dabancheng in northwestern China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, April 23, 2021.

Two Uyghur inmates — biological brothers — were working in a vegetable field at Qarabughra Prison in Xinjiang's Kunes county in early May, when a security guard grabbed one of them by the leg and began dragging him.

The older brother, Sidikjan Ablikim, 35, rushed over to Ablehet, 33, to free him, according to police and prison officers with knowledge of the situation.

An argument ensued, and the brothers physically clashed with the guard, while a third inmate intervened.

The guard then pulled out his gun and shot and killed the Abilkims, the police and prison officials said.

Little is known about the brothers other than that they were from Atush, transliterated as Artux or Atush, the capital of the Kizilsu Kyrgyz Autonomous Prefecture in northwestern China's Xinjiang region.

RFA was unable to find out further details, the reasons for their arrest or the duration of their sentences.

"Situations like this come up rarely," said an officer who has worked at the Qarabughra Prison for 25 years. "There hasn't been anyone who died in the fields [while performing labor] due to a conflict, besides them."

Expanded to handle more inmates

Qarabughra is one of the oldest prisons and largest detention centers in Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture, the prison officer said.

In 2017, as Chinese authorities began detaining Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims en masse in Xinjiang in an effort to eliminate what they said was "terrorism" and "religious extremism," Qarabughra Prison was expanded to handle inmates brought in from other parts of the region.

As part of the crackdown, Chinese authorities ordered Uyghur students studying in Egypt and other predominantly Muslim countries to return to Xinjiang where they were promptly arrested for the purported "crime" of studying abroad.

Some of the students were tried in Atush, their hometown, and sent to Qarabughra Prison in Kunes county. However, it is unknown whether the Ablikim brothers had studied abroad and were arrested upon return.

RFA contacted relevant authorities in Kunes county and Ghulja city, called Yining in Chinese and capital of Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture, for more information on the brothers and their deaths.

A Kunes county police officer, who declined to be identified because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media, said the prison had released the bodies of the two inmates.

The officer knew this because he worked as a security guard along the roads where the vehicle carrying the dead prisoners passed.

Because the brothers died the same day, the officer said he had assumed they had been involved in a fatal accident. However, he did not ask his boss about it, because it was not his job to inquire about the identities of the dead or their cause of death.

"Both are deceased, and they were both from Atush," he said. "Another inmate was hospitalized from that conflict."

Information about the incident was not reported at an official meeting, and because of the tragic nature, news of it was spread by word of mouth among the others who knew about the Ablikims' argument with the guard and their subsequent shootings, the officer from the Kunes county police said.

Other officials contacted by RFA declined to comment, stressing that any matters related to the prison were confidential.

Exiled Uyghur journalist links Urumqi arrests to his reporting

05 June 2024, VOA, Liam Scott

Former colleagues of exiled Uyghur journalist Kasim Kashgar have been imprisoned in China's Xinjiang region, seemingly over their connection to the Washington-based reporter.

Those convicted are Mirkamil Ahmed, Semet Ababekri, Abdukadir Rozi, Mehmud Abdukeyum and Akber Osman. Each has been sentenced to at least seven years in prison, Kashgar said.

Kashgar, who reports for Voice of America, says he learned of the convictions from an acquaintance in May.

At VOA, Kashgar regularly covers Uyghur human rights issues. He believes his former colleagues — who worked with him at the language school he founded in Xinjiang's capital Urumqi — were targeted due to their association with him.

"Their 'mistake' was their past proximity to someone now affiliated with a U.S. news agency covering Uyghur-related news," Kashgar said.

It's unclear when the convictions occurred, since the Chinese government rarely publicizes that kind of information. It's also unclear what the exact charges are.

Kashgar said he learned from sources familiar with the cases that all five were accused of having been recruited by Kashgar to become members of the World Uyghur Congress, or WUC.

Headquartered in Munich, the WUC advocates for Uyghur human rights internationally. But Beijing views it as a separatist organization.

The Chinese government regularly uses bogus charges of separatism and terrorism as an excuse to target Uyghurs, according to human rights groups.

Kashgar said his contact with the WUC is limited to interviews as part of his VOA coverage.

In an emailed statement to VOA, the spokesperson at China's Washington embassy said, "China is a country ruled by law" where all ethnic groups "enjoy equality."

"Xinjiang's judicial organs pursue social fairness and justice, which are the values of the rule of law," the spokesperson said. The email went on to repeat the common government narrative that Beijing's policies in the region are for counterterrorism purposes.

Some advocates say the recent convictions underscore the extent of arbitrary detentions in Xinjiang, which many Uyghurs prefer to call the Uyghur Region or East Turkestan.

"It demonstrates that, first of all, this kind of arbitrary detention, and also retaliation by association, has not stopped at all, despite the fact that the government is claiming otherwise," Zumretay Arkin, the WUC's spokesperson and advocacy manager, told VOA.

In the region, the Chinese government stands accused by foreign governments and human rights groups of committing genocide and crimes against humanity against the majority-Muslim Uyghur ethnic group. Beijing has long denied any wrongdoing in the region.

Kashgar fled Chinese surveillance and repression in his homeland in 2017 for the United States. He started work for VOA in 2019.

The journalist says he faced Beijing-backed harassment over his work in the form of transnational repression. Earlier this year, he learned from sources that the Chinese government had officially labeled him a “key person involved in terrorism.”

But verifying such information is difficult. Experts say Beijing intentionally makes it difficult to confirm such reports.

The situation involving his former colleagues extends back to March 2021, when Kashgar received a phone call from a childhood friend in Xinjiang.

After being jailed multiple times, the friend had been forced to become an informant for China’s Ministry of State Security intelligence agency, Kashgar said.

Now, the intelligence agency wanted Kashgar to spy for them, the friend said. Kashgar declined.

In the weeks that followed, Kashgar learned that five former employees had been disappeared by Chinese security officials.

Human rights groups estimate that around 1 million to 2 million Uyghurs have been held in the region’s mass internment centers.

Kashgar said he knows of at least seven other former employees arrested in Xinjiang, but it’s unclear whether any of them have been convicted.

This kind of story is common for Xinjiang, according to Arkin. To retaliate against vocal Uyghurs in the diaspora, the Chinese government has a pattern of targeting their family, friends and colleagues who still live in the region.

“This really has been, in my opinion, one of the most successful ways of silencing the diaspora,” Arkin said. “Because you’re facing this constant dilemma, because you’re putting the lives of your relatives, your family and friends at risk, you’re constantly wondering if your work is worth it.”

Arkin said she has heard of other cases of Uyghurs in Xinjiang being questioned over alleged links to the WUC. “It’s used as a tool of fear – inside, but also outside,” she said.

In the diaspora, it’s likely intended to make exiled Uyghurs too scared to be involved with groups like the WUC out of fear of potentially putting their loved ones in Xinjiang at risk, Arkin said.

Learning of his former colleagues’ convictions has taken a toll, Kashgar said.

“It was very difficult to go to sleep and concentrate, focus on anything. It still gives you a lot of stress. But I want to seek justice for them,” he said. “I don’t want to be feeling guilty. But at the same time, there’s some sort of that emotional side that hits me, because those former colleagues never, ever committed any sort of crime.”

A 2022 report by the United Nations Human Rights Office determined that the extent of arbitrary detention of Uyghurs in Xinjiang may constitute crimes against humanity.

Mosques demolished, texts censored: How China is repressing Muslims in Xinjiang

28 May 2024, Times of India

NEW DELHI: The Chinese government's crackdown on the Islamic faith, particularly among the Uyghur Muslim population in Xinjiang, has garnered significant international attention and condemnation due to human rights abuses and allegations of cultural genocide.

In a recent investigation, UK's Sky News has shed light on China's increasing control over Islamic practices within the country.

The report underscores the mounting restrictions and surveillance faced by Muslims, particularly in regions with significant Islamic populations.

One poignant scene described in the report occurs in a cold, dusty part of central China, where a local Muslim leader stands alone in the courtyard of a small mosque. "Religion is dying," he laments, highlighting the severe constraints imposed by the Chinese government on religious activities.

The report details how the Chinese authorities have intensified efforts to monitor and restrict Islamic practices, including demolishing mosques, banning religious attire, and censoring Islamic texts. This crackdown is part of a broader campaign to align religious practices with the state's ideology and to curb any potential dissent.

The Chinese authorities have taken numerous steps to curb the practice of Islam:

Demolition of mosques: Many mosques have been demolished, particularly those that do not conform to the government's architectural standards or those deemed too conspicuous.

Banning religious attire: Traditional Islamic attire, such as headscarves and long beards, has been banned in certain areas. This is part of an effort to assimilate Muslims into the broader Han Chinese culture.

Censoring Islamic texts: The government has also censored Islamic texts, removing any content that could be perceived as promoting extremism or dissent. This includes altering the Quran and other religious literature to fit the state's narrative.

Surveillance and Repression

The report highlights the extensive surveillance network that monitors Muslim communities. High-tech surveillance systems, including facial recognition cameras, are prevalent in areas like Xinjiang, home to a significant Uyghur Muslim population. These systems track individuals' movements and behaviors, ensuring strict compliance with the government's regulations.

Impact on daily life

The restrictions have permeated all aspects of daily life for Muslims in China. Religious education for children has been heavily regulated, with many religious schools being shut down. Additionally, community leaders and imams are required to attend government-run re-education programs to ensure they propagate state-approved messages, the Sky News report said.

The international community has responded with concern over China's treatment of its Muslim population. Human rights organizations have condemned the actions, calling for greater transparency and respect for religious freedoms. The Chinese government, however, maintains that these measures are necessary to combat extremism and ensure national security.

In Xinjiang, China's security chief calls for 'normalisation of counterterrorism'

27 May 2024, SCMP

China's top security official Chen Wenqing has called for the "normalisation" of counterterrorism efforts in Xinjiang, where a crackdown on extremism among Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities has been under way for years.

During a visit to the far western region from Wednesday to Sunday, Chen said authorities must "insist on cracking down on terrorist crimes in accordance with the law and make efforts to promote the normalisation of counterterrorism", state news agency Xinhua reported on Sunday.

Chen is a member of the Communist Party's elite decision-making body the Politburo, and secretary of the Central Political and Legal Affairs Commission, which oversees the country's law enforcement agencies.

In Xinjiang, Chen visited the region's capital, Urumqi, as well as Kashgar and the Kazakh prefecture of Ili. He urged local officials to "always give top priority to maintaining social stability" and to "accurately prevent and crack down on violent terrorist crimes", according to Xinhua.

The report said Chen visited Khorgos, a town in Ili on the border with Kazakhstan, and the Tashkurgan Tajik autonomous county in the region's southwest, which borders Tajikistan, Afghanistan and Pakistan. He told law enforcement officials to "strongly defend border security".

A day after the visit, the Ministry of Public Security said in a statement on Monday that China had not seen a terrorist attack in more than seven years.

Decades of ethnic tensions and unrest in Xinjiang prompted Beijing to impose measures in 2016 that it said were aimed at cracking down on terrorist attacks. But the measures have led to allegations of widespread human rights abuses, including that at least 1 million Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities were held in mass internment camps. Beijing denies the claims and has said the centres were for "vocational training".

Xinjiang authorities have claimed an "overwhelming victory" over terrorist attacks, but security remains a major concern.

In its annual work report in January, the Xinjiang government stressed that the region would maintain a "tough stance" to safeguard social stability, meaning combating terrorism.

A white paper released by the State Council Information Office the same month praised Xinjiang's anti-terrorism measures as improvements in China's legal system over the past decade.

It highlighted Xinjiang's de-radicalisation regulations, introduced in 2017 and revised in 2018, which list behaviours considered extremist by the authorities including growing an "abnormal" beard and wearing a veil.

In August, President Xi Jinping said "social stability" was a top priority for the region's authorities when he visited Xinjiang, and he called for more efforts to combat terrorism and religious extremism, as well as stressing the need for economic development.

In recent years, the Xinjiang government has tried to improve its image by touting economic development and inviting foreign media on carefully choreographed tours to promote the region.

A decade of uncertainty: the fate of detained Uyghur refugees in Thailand

12 May, 2024, VOA

Dozens of Uyghurs who fled China a decade ago and have been indefinitely detained in Thailand are getting conflicting explanations from the U.N. refugee agency and Thai authorities on why their cases are still in limbo.

"If we speak out about our condition or our situation here, it will attract media attention, the world will know, Thai authorities will find out. Then our situation here will worsen, and we might lose all communication with the outside world," said one detainee in a rare interview with VOA.

"That's why we refrain from speaking out for the time being," added the man, asking to be identified only as Ahmad.

Ahmad said Uyghur detainees do not have phones to communicate with the outside world but said they sometimes can borrow a phone from a new detainee. That's how Ahmad and others were able to communicate with VOA.

Rights organizations accuse Beijing of repressive policies that amount to human rights violations and even genocide against Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities, which China has repeatedly denied.

Ahmad said Uyghurs who escaped China in 2014 with the help of traffickers crossed into Thailand and were arrested by Thai authorities for illegally crossing the border. They have been held in immigration detention since then.

"We fled repression in China," Ahmad said. He added that he and other Uyghurs in Thai detention feel they have been "abandoned" by the world over the past decade.

Over the years, there have been several news reports on the plight of the Uyghurs in Thai detention, but so far, their situation has stayed the same.

"The world has heard our appeals, but the rules of the United Nations and other [international] organizations have not yet worked in our favor," he said.

UNHCR vs. Thai authorities

Earlier this month, an investigation by The New Humanitarian news agency obtained documents that showed the Thai government in 2020 petitioned the U.N. refugee agency, or UNHCR, "to play a more active role in resolving the Uyghurs' indefinite detention, and that agency staff advised against doing this."

UNHCR spokesperson Babar Baloch stated that due to confidentiality constraints and a desire not to undermine efforts to resolve this sensitive matter, the UNHCR cannot publicly elaborate on its approach to addressing the situation.

"Despite requests, however, at no stage have we been permitted to access the group or engage with them for the purpose of facilitating solutions. We are engaged in close discussions with the Thai authorities," Baloch told VOA in an email. "UNHCR has and continues to proactively raise this issue with the Thai authorities."

Thailand has not ratified the 1951 Refugee Convention and does not have laws that give refugees legal status, but according to the UNHCR, Thailand hosts 82,400 refugees from Myanmar in temporary shelters.

Life in detention

A rights activist familiar with the situation in Bangkok, who requested anonymity due to fear of reprisals from Thai authorities, said 43 Uyghurs are being detained at the Suan Phlu Immigration Detention Center in Bangkok. Additionally, five Uyghurs who attempted to escape immigration detention and were later arrested are imprisoned in Thailand.

"At least five to six people live in a room measuring four meters wide and eight meters long," the activist said. "There are around 25 rooms on each floor of the five-story detention building, with one toilet and shower in each room," and the detainees sleep on the floor.

The activist said when the Uyghurs first crossed the border into Thailand 10 years ago, there were more than 350 of them.

"Initially, with humanitarian assistance from Turkey, over 170 women and children were taken to Turkey and settled in the city of Kayseri in 2015," the activist told VOA. "Subsequently, Thai authorities handed 109 mostly male Uyghur refugees to China weeks later," leaving more than 50 Uyghurs still awaiting their fate in Thai detention.

"After Thai authorities deported 109 Uyghurs to China, Uyghurs in Turkey protested and stormed the Thai consulate in Istanbul, which made Thai authorities very uncomfortable with the Uyghur issue," he said. "Since then, Thailand has been reluctant to deal with the rest of the Uyghur refugees."

At the time of publication, Thai officials had not responded to numerous requests for comment from VOA.

Last year, Human Rights Watch reported that two Uyghur refugees in their 40s died while in Thai immigration detention and called on Thailand to "end the indefinite detention" of Uyghur asylum seekers from China.

According to a February letter to Thai authorities from a group of United Nations special rapporteurs, the deaths of two Uyghur refugees last year brought the total number of Uyghur deaths in Thai immigration detention centers to five, including two minors.

"We would like to bring to the attention of your Excellency's Government information we have received concerning the detention conditions of 43 Uyghur migrant individuals that may amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or even torture," the letter said.

'Significant' Volume of Xinjiang Cotton Mislabeled as US or Brazilian

10 May, 2024, Sourcing Journal, Jasmin Malik Chua

A recent report reveals that a significant amount of cotton from Xinjiang is being falsely labeled as American or Brazilian. Despite bans on Xinjiang cotton due to forced labor concerns, 19% of more than 820 tested samples in the United States contained Xinjiang cotton, highlighting ongoing struggles to combat forced labor in global supply chains. The study, conducted by Applied DNA Sciences, used isotopic testing to identify the mislabeled cotton. Concerns persist about Xinjiang cotton's presence in global trade, prompting calls for increased testing and collaboration to address human rights and regulatory issues.

Jailed Uyghur official highlights Chinese-Uyghur land disputes

10 May, 2024, RFA

A former Uyghur government official in Xinjiang, China, received a 10-year prison sentence for siding with local farmers who refused to surrender their farms to Chinese developers without adequate compensation, Radio Free Asia recently reported. RFA said this case reflects broader disputes over land rights amid allegations of coercion by Chinese developers.

INTERVIEW: Lawyer debunks China's historical narrative of control over Xinjiang

08 May, 2024, RFA, Alim Seytoff

In an interview with Radio Free Asia, international lawyer and inner Asia expert Michael van Walt disputed China's claim over Xinjiang, using history as proof. He said Xinjiang, which Uyghurs call East Turkistan, has not been continuously under Chinese rule for 2,000 years, rejecting China's unified state narrative. Van Walt described Beijing's territorial claims as colonialism.

Dozens of Uyghur refugees who fled China 10 years ago remain detained in Thailand and face uncertain futures amid conflicting explanations from Thai authorities and the U.N. refugee agency, UNHCR. One activist told VOA about dire living conditions and deaths in detention, urging an end to indefinite incarceration and swift international action. Rights organizations accuse Beijing of repressive policies against Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities, which China has repeatedly denied.

1 in 26 Uyghurs jailed, accounting 1/3 of China's prison population: Uyghur Human Rights Project report

04 May 2024, ANI

An annual report by a Uyghur advocacy group revealed ongoing persecution in China's far-western Xinjiang province, with an estimated 1 in 26 Uyghurs jailed, accounting for a third of China's prison population, 3.5 times the world's highest rate of imprisonment.

A new Uyghur Human Rights Project (UHRP) report indicates that Uyghurs, Turkic and other non-Han peoples in the Uyghur Region account for more than a third (34 per cent) of China's estimated prison population, despite making up only one per cent of China's overall population. When accounting for the total regional population, the Uyghur region has the highest prison rate in the world at an estimated 2,234 per 100,000.

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

A UHRP Insights column by Ben Carrdus, UHRP Senior Researcher, and Peter Irwin, UHRP Associate Director for Research & Advocacy suggests that Uyghurs, Turkic and other non-Han peoples in the region are imprisoned at a rate of 3,814 people per 100,000.

In comparison, Han people throughout China are estimated to be imprisoned at a rate of 80 per 100,000. In other words, Uyghurs and other non-Han people in the Uyghur Region are estimated to be imprisoned at just over 47 times the rate of Han people.

"The actual situation in Xinjiang may even be worse," said UHRP senior researcher Ben Carrdus, who wrote the report.

The findings are based on information from Xinjiang High People's Procuratorate annual reports, which prosecutes criminal defendants, as well as data from the website of China's Ministry of Justice. The report estimates that a total of 578,500 Uyghurs or other Turkic people were in jail as of 2022.

The report indicates that Uyghurs experience higher death rates in prison than other ethnic groups in China, though death penalty figures are not publicly available because they are considered a state secret. The UHRP believes Uyghurs receive severe sentences, such as at least 10 years in prison for minor actions like studying the Quran or teaching it to children, so that the rate of death sentences among them may be higher.

The situation of Uyghur persecution in China is deeply concerning and has drawn international attention. The Uyghurs are a predominantly Muslim ethnic minority group primarily located in the Xinjiang region of China. Reports and testimonies from various sources, including human rights organisations, indicate widespread human rights abuses and repression targeting the Uyghur population.

These abuses include arbitrary detention in internment camps, forced labour, cultural and religious suppression, mass surveillance, and torture. The Chinese government has consistently denied allegations of mistreatment, instead portraying its actions as counter-terrorism measures aimed at maintaining stability and security in the region.

The international community has called for an independent investigation into the situation in Xinjiang, however, the issue remains complex due to China's geopolitical influence. (ANI)

China: Phone Search Program Tramples Uyghur Rights

04 May, 2024, Human Rights Watch

Police in the Xinjiang region of China rely on a master list of 50,000 multimedia files they deem “violent and terrorist” to flag Uyghur and other Turkic Muslim residents for interrogation, Human Rights Watch said today. A Human Rights Watch forensic investigation into the metadata of this list found that during 9 months from 2017 to 2018, police conducted nearly 11 million searches of a total of 1.2 million mobile phones in Urumqi, Xinjiang’s capital city of 3.5 million residents. Xinjiang’s automated police mass surveillance systems enabled this phone search.

“The Chinese government’s abusive use of surveillance technology in Xinjiang means that Uyghurs who simply store the Quran on their phone may trigger a police interrogation,” said Maya Wang, acting China director at Human Rights Watch. “Concerned governments should identify the technology companies involved in this mass surveillance and social control industry and take appropriate action to end their involvement.”

Human Rights Watch has repeatedly raised concerns about China’s approach to countering acts it calls “terrorism” and “extremism.” China’s counterterrorism law defines “terrorism” and “extremism” in an overly broad and vague manner that facilitates prosecutions, deprivation of liberty, and other restrictions for acts that do not intend to cause death or serious physical harm for political, religious, or ideological aims.

The Human Rights Watch searches found a total over 1,000 unique files on about 1,400 Urumqi residents’ phones that matched those on the police master list. The analysis of these matched files revealed that over half of them – 57 percent – appear to be common Islamic religious materials, including readings of every surah (chapter) of the Quran, the central religious text of Islam.

The list is part of a large database (52GB) of over 1,600 data tables from the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region leaked to the United States media organization the Intercept in 2019. The Intercept reported that Urumqi police conducted surveillance and arrests from 2015 to 2019 based on texts of police reports that were part of this database.

The master list of multimedia files that Human Rights Watch examined is located in a different part of the same database and has not been previously reported on or analyzed. Some of the numbers in this reporting have been rounded up so that the authorities cannot identify the source of the leak.

The analysis of the metadata of this master list reveals photo, audio, and video files that contain violent content, but also other material that has no evident connection to violence. The media files contain materials that:

- Are violent or gruesome, including content depicting beheadings or forms of torture that appear to have been carried out by armed groups such as Mexican and other drug cartels, Chechen fighters, or the Islamic State (ISIS);

- Involve foreign organizations, including the East Turkistan Independence Movement, which the Chinese government labels a separatist group; the World Uyghur Congress, a group run by Uyghur exiles; and a Uyghur-language broadcasts by Radio Free Asia, a US government-funded media outlet;
- Contain pro-democracy audiovisual content such as the “Gate of Heavenly Peace,” a documentary about the Chinese government’s Tiananmen Square massacre of student-led protests in 1989;
- Mention the names of cities in Syria, including documentaries about Syrian history and two 2015 episodes of a popular Chinese-language travel show, “On the Road” (侣行), that include references to the Syrian conflict; Human Rights Watch also found another related list in the database that has the same MD5 hashes – the unique signature of these files. This list apparently contains the search result of the Jingwang Weishi app, a surveillance application. The search results spanned 9 months between 2017 and 2018. This data shows the app surreptitiously conducted nearly 11 million searches involving a total of 1.2 million phones and found a cumulative total of 11,000 matches of over 1,000 different files on 1,400 phones.
- The Human Rights Watch analysis of the file names and the police’s own labeling, or coding, of the approximately 1,000 files found that:
  - 57 percent of the 1,000 files are common religious materials, including readings of every chapter (surah) of the Quran.
  - Nearly 9 percent of the matched files include violent content, including crimes committed by members of the Islamic State (ISIS);
  - 4 percent of the matched files include calls for violence, for example by urging “jihad;”
  - 28 percent of the matched files cannot be identified based on the available information alone (for example, the file name and police labels).

Human Rights Watch further analyzed those 1,400 phones that were flagged by police:

- Nearly 42 percent of phones contained violent or gruesome material;
- 12 percent of phones contained common Islamic religious material;
- 6 percent of phones contained files that are overtly political, such as an anthem to “East

Turkistan” – the name some Turkic Muslims use to refer to the region that the Chinese government calls “Xinjiang” – videos about the Syrian war, and pro-democracy protests in Hong Kong;

- 4 percent of phones contained files that call for violence, such as “jihad;”
- 48 percent of phones contained files that Human Rights Watch could not identify.

International law obligates governments to define criminal offenses precisely and to respect the rights to freedom of expression and thought, including holding views considered offensive. Criminalizing mere possession of material deemed extremist even if the accused has no intent to use it to cause harm to others is a particularly severe threat to freedom of belief, privacy, and expression. These rights are guaranteed under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which China has signed but not ratified.

The United Nations Human Rights Council should urgently establish an independent, international investigation into grave rights violations and the suppression of fundamental freedoms in Xinjiang by the Chinese government against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims, Human Rights Watch said. An unprecedented number of UN independent human rights experts and hundreds of nongovernmental organizations from around the world have recommended such action.

“The Chinese government outrageously yet dangerously conflates Islam with violent extremism to justify its abhorrent abuses against Turkic Muslims in Xinjiang,” Wang said. “The UN Human Rights Council should take long overdue action by investigating Chinese government abuses in Xinjiang and beyond.”

For additional details about the situation and findings, please see below.

Abuses in Xinjiang and the Role of Mass Surveillance

The Chinese government’s Counterterrorism Law does not comport with international human rights standards and has been frequently abused.

In May 2014, the Chinese government began the “Strike Hard Campaign against Violent Terrorism” (严厉打击暴力恐怖活动专项行动) in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims. Since 2017, this abusive campaign, which conflates the peaceful religious and cultural expressions of Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims with terrorism, has significantly escalated.

During this period, Human Rights Watch has documented mass arbitrary detention, pervasive surveillance, and attempts at cultural and religious erasure that amount to crimes against humanity across the region. A groundbreaking 2022 report by the UN human rights office similarly found that these crimes “may constitute ... crimes against humanity.”

What is central to these crimes is the use of new technologies, including the mass collection of biometric data from Turkic Muslims, artificial intelligence, policing apps, and big-data systems to monitor the entire population. These systems flag people as potentially “untrustworthy” using broad and arbitrary criteria, such as using too much electricity, and send their names to the police. The police then interrogate and often detain them in so-called political education camps or sentence them to prison terms following perfunctory, closed trials without access to lawyers. As of September 2022, an estimated half-million people remained in prison following the crackdown. Since 2017, Human Rights Watch and other organizations have uncovered many of these systems, but the precise relationships among them remain unclear. This database is part of a police surveillance system named iTap, built for the Urumqi Police Department by the Chinese surveillance tech company Landasoft (蓝灯), according to the Intercept. Landasoft’s chief executive officer claimed that the company wanted to be the “Chinese version of Palantir,” the US company that is providing profiling and analytic capabilities to law enforcement and intelligence agencies globally.

With massive amounts of information on each individual, and the integration of their contacts, location, vehicle information, financial accounts and internet accounts – all without their consent – the software allows the police to monitor every resident of Urumqi, including uncovering people’s hidden relationships through network analysis.

This research has shown for the first time that iTap is receiving data from the Jingwang Weishi and Fengcai apps. Human Rights Watch wrote to Landasoft on April 4 about this database but has not received a response.

Various media have increasingly reported that police are conducting abusive checks on people’s phones throughout China, such as to find out who carried out the December 2022 “white paper” protests – where individuals used blank signs to signal opposition to the government’s strict Covid-19 measures or the Chinese Communist Party’s authoritarian rule. The government has also conducted such checks in Tibetan areas to pursue the government’s aggressive assimilationist policies. In these cases, though, it appears that the police are conducting manual checks, swiping through people’s phones.

The Chinese government has also increasingly required people throughout China to install various government and Communist Party apps purportedly for fighting online fraud, controlling the Covid pandemic, and spreading its ideology. Many of these apps collect copious amounts of personal data, including location information, health data, and other identifying information such as national ID numbers, with little transparency on how the data is used and stored.

At the same time, Chinese authorities have also made app stores remove apps they dislike, such as censorship circumvention apps, encryption apps, and religious apps, including a prominent Quran app used by millions of people around the world.

Methodology: Authenticating the Leaked Database

The master list that Human Rights Watch found in the leaked database contains a list of about 50,000 rows as of March 2018, with each entry containing metadata such as filename, size, filename extension (such as mp3) and the file's MD5 hash – a unique signature of the file the police use to identify files on residents' phones.

Human Rights Watch has found that the MD5 hashes in this list match those in lists previously reported by two other organizations, which separately conducted investigations into two of Xinjiang's policing apps that the authorities used during crackdowns:

- In February 2018, the US-based organization Open Technology Fund (OTF) reverse engineered Jingwang Weishi (净网卫士), an app that Urumqi police forced local residents to install. The Open Technology Fund found that in addition to extracting the phone's various identifying information such as its brand and model, IMEI (International Mobile Equipment Identity), IMSI (International Mobile Subscriber Identity), and MAC (Media Access Control) address and phone number, the app also searches the target's phone against a list of MD5 hashes and automatically reports any files deemed "dangerous" to the authorities.
- In July 2019, the New York Times reverse engineering efforts revealed another list of MD5 hashes extracted from another app named Fengcai, which the Xinjiang police routinely installed on travelers' phones at border crossings. This list contained 73,314 unique MD5 hashes. The vast majority of the hashes that Human Rights Watch examined can also be found in this list, which suggests that in the span of one year, between 2018 and 2019, Xinjiang police had added over 21,000 items to the list of "violent and terrorist" multimedia files. Only 29 files in the Human Rights Watch list were not in the list that the New York Times analyzed.

The fact that this same list of 50,000 files is included in two distinct Xinjiang-specific policing apps, as well as in this leaked database, suggests that the Xinjiang authorities use this same list as a master list to determine whether a resident has what they deemed to be "violent and terrorist files" on their device.

In regards to the related list in the leaked database that has the same MD5 hashes as the master list, Human Rights Watch determined that it contains the search results of the Jingwang Weishi app based on the fact that its format perfectly matched the output format described in Open Tech Fund's reverse engineering of that app. The search results contain the unique identifying information – IMEI, IMSI, MAC addresses – of every phone searched and, if found, a record of the name, size and file type of the "violent and terrorist" file.

Punishing the Possession of 'Extremist' Material

Many of the people arbitrarily detained and imprisoned in Xinjiang were rounded up for possessing "violent" or "terrorist" multimedia materials, according to information in leaked official lists of such individual and previous Human Rights Watch interviews with family members and former detainees.

A leaked list of over 2,000 detainees held in a political education camp from Aksu prefecture that Human Rights Watch obtained in 2018 showed that about 10 percent (over 200) of the people on the list were being held for "terrorism" or "extremism" because they had downloaded or shared such "violent and terrorist" multimedia content, or for being related to someone who had downloaded or shared such content.

In 2018, a Uyghur interviewee told Human Rights Watch that one of his fellow detainees held in a police detention center cell during the crackdowns was a 60-year-old man who had sent an audio of an Islamic religious teaching to his daughter, who passed it to a friend. The father and daughter received six-year and three-year prison sentences, respectively, and alleged that detainees in these facilities were tortured.

Uyghurs have highest rate of imprisonment in world: report

02 May 2024, RFA, Irade

An estimated 1 in 26 Uyghurs have been jailed, accounting for a third of China's prison population.

An estimated one in 26 Uyghurs in China's far-western Xinjiang region are behind bars, the world's highest rate of incarceration, according to a report by a Uyghur advocacy group.

Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples there are imprisoned at an estimated rate of 3,814 per 100,000 people – 47 times higher than China's overall rate of 80 per 100,000, the group said.

That's also more than three times higher than in El Salvador, which has the world's highest known incarceration rate at 1,086 per 100,000 people, according to the April 25 report by the Uyghur Human Right Project, or UHRP.

All told, 578,500 Uyghurs or other Turkic people were in jail as of 2022, the group estimates. That's just over one-third of China's total prison population, even though they comprise only 1% of China's overall population. That figure is likely the same or higher today, the group says.

A prominent imprisoned Uyghur is Rahile Dawut, a Uyghur folklore expert and ethnographer convicted in December 2018 for "splittism" and sentenced to life in prison.

Another example is Gulshan Abbas, a retired Uyghur doctor and the sister of Rushan Abbas, a former Radio Free Asia employee and current executive director of Campaign for Uyghurs. She was sentenced to a lengthy prison term on "terrorism" charges after she disappeared along with another relative in September 2018.

The U.S. State Department has said that Dawut and other Uyghur intellectuals have been unfairly imprisoned for their work to protect and preserve Uyghur culture and traditions.

The report's findings are based on data from annual reports from the Xinjiang High People's Procuratorate — which prosecutes criminal defendants — and information published on the website of China's Ministry of Justice, covering the period 2017-2022. During that period, one in every 26 Uyghurs or members of other Turkic ethnicities in Xinjiang was incarcerated.

Many of those imprisoned have been convicted of crimes related to practicing Islam, such as studying the Quran when they were young or teaching it to others.

Reality may be worse

The actual situation in Xinjiang may even be worse, said UHRP senior researcher Ben Carrdus, who wrote the report.

"These are just people who have been put in prison. It doesn't include people who might still be in internment camps," he told Radio Free Asia, referring to the estimated 1.8 million Uyghurs and others arbitrarily detained in what the Chinese government said were vocational training centers.

The camps were, in fact, places where Uyghurs were subjected to political indoctrination and severe human rights abuses, including torture, the forced sterilization of woman and forced labor.

China claims that the camps have been closed.

When China says it's ruled by law, it actually means that the law is whatever the Chinese Communist Party wants it to be, Carrdus said.

"Using laws doesn't mean they are using justice. What they've done is use the instruments against the Uyghur people," he said. "Thousands and thousands of people have been sentenced to prison mostly through the courts where China has used very unjust rules."

The report indicates that Uyghurs experience higher death rates in prison than other ethnic groups in China, though death penalty figures are not publicly available because they are considered a state secret.

The UHRP believes Uyghurs receive severe sentences, such as at least 10 years in prison for minor actions like studying the Quran or teaching it to children, so that the rate of death sentences among them may be higher.

John Kamm, executive director of the U.S.-based human rights group The Dui Hua Foundation, emphasized the importance of highlighting the number of Uyghurs in prison to attract the attention of international media and governments in hope that they will push for their release.

Carrdus urged the international community not to forget the Uyghurs.

"I can say that with 100% confidence, things are not getting better," he said, adding that although authorities in Xinjiang have been closing down the internment camps, they've been sending Uyghurs to prisons instead.

US labor official calls on companies to exit China's Xinjiang

01 May 2024, Reuters

WASHINGTON, April 30 (Reuters) - International companies cannot responsibly operate in Xinjiang and should leave the western Chinese region due to forced labor concerns, a U.S. Labor Department official said on Tuesday.

The U.S. government says Chinese officials continue to commit genocide and crimes against humanity against Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities in Xinjiang, and rights groups have pressured Western companies there to audit their operations over forced labor concerns.

China's government vehemently denies allegations of abuses.

Thea Lee, deputy undersecretary for international affairs at the Labor Department, told a U.S. congressional hearing that Beijing had made it "essentially illegal" to conduct independent human rights audits in Xinjiang.

"If it is impossible to do that, then the only responsible thing to do is not to operate in that atmosphere," Lee told the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, without naming individual companies.

China's embassy in Washington said in an emailed statement that the allegations of forced labor were "nothing but a lie concocted by the U.S. side in an attempt to wantonly suppress Chinese enterprises."

Chinese officials have acknowledged "vocational training centers," in Xinjiang, but say were intended to curb terrorism, separatism and religious radicalism. They have also said the "Sinicisation" of Islam in the country is inevitable.

On Feb. 9, German chemicals giant BASF (BASFn.DE), opens new tab said it would sell its stakes in two joint ventures in Xinjiang, after rights groups documented abuses including forced labor in detention camps.

Volkswagen (VOWG_p.DE), opens new tab too has said it was in talks with its joint venture partner in China over the future direction of its business activities in the region.

Beijing in 2017 launched a harsh security crackdown in Xinjiang. Some experts say alleged mass internment of Uyghurs peaked in 2018, but that abuses have continued with labor transfers becoming more prominent.

Still, China's government has sought to make Xinjiang a heavy industry hub, and it is important for the processing of aluminum and for producing auto parts, solar components and other goods that make their way into global supply chains.

The U.S. Congress has passed laws to pressure China over its Xinjiang policies, including the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act that bars imports from the region. The Department of Labor does not set rules on how U.S. companies can operate in China.

Lee said China's transfer of Uyghur laborers to other parts of the country had been growing, but that it was difficult to verify the extent of the program.

"I have not seen an effective way to address the challenges of monitoring the labor transfer program of workers outside of Xinjiang," Lee said.

She said data on Chinese websites is periodically removed, and that there is no free access to workplaces to assess workers' origins.

UN expert states Xinjiang and Tibet situations are components of Chinese Colonisation process

19 April 2024, MyInd

The Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, in partnership with the World Uyghur Congress and Uyghur Human Rights Project, convened a conference in New York titled 'Beyond Concentration Camps: Forced Assimilation and China's Colonial Boarding Schools' to discuss the cultural assimilation of the Uyghur community in East Turkestan.

Social activists, human rights advocates, representatives, and delegates from the World Uyghur Congress, as well as the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, a US-based social organisation, were among the speakers at the conference.

During the press conference, Fernand De Varennes, former UN Special Rapporteur on Minority Issues, highlighted China's strategic efforts to systematically dismantle Uyghur civilisation and culture through its implementation of residential schools.

In his statement, De Varennes remarked that the situation in China, including Xinjiang and Tibet, extends beyond mere human rights violations to encompass a systematic process of colonisation, erasure, and elimination of cultures and peoples.

He suggested that Han nationalism drives this process, leading to significant breaches of international human rights standards, particularly affecting Tibetans, Uyghurs, and potentially other minorities.

While emphasising the UN's actions concerning cultural destruction, the former UN Special Rapporteur noted that several independent experts, including the former United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, have published numerous reports, communications, and responses addressing allegations of extensive violations. Many individuals within the UN community express deep concern regarding the magnitude and severity of the human rights abuses occurring.

He mentioned the huge internment of between one and two million Uyghurs and other minorities in large arbitrary detentions. This is possibly the largest detention of civilians since the Second World War. It affected around 10 to 20 percent of the adult population in Xinjiang at the time.

De Varennes highlighted that Chinese authorities in Tibet and Xinjiang have implemented systems subjecting Tibetans and Uyghurs to forced labour, potentially amounting to a modern form of slavery. He expressed shock at the scale of this phenomenon, citing the work of Tomoya Obokata, a Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery.

The UN Special Rapporteur highlighted China's state-run boarding school system in Xinjiang, which fails to educate children in their mother tongue and separates a large number of mainly Uyghur children from their families. He finds this practice surprising, shocking, and unacceptable, resembling a modern form of systematic cultural genocide.

According to the former UN Rapporteur, what's happening in Xinjiang and Tibet is not just massive human rights violations, but intentional colonisation. Allegations include sterilisation of Uyghur and minority women, the banning certain Muslim names, and restricting Islamic teachings. Books on Uyghur culture and literature are banned, even poetry books in Uyghur.

Destruction of mosques, historical sites, and cemeteries is part of erasing the people's presence systematically. This is deliberate, aiming to erase civilisation, people, and their history from the territory.

China bans Uyghurs from using social media apps

Authorities in Xinjiang have banned Uyghurs from using social media apps including Chinese-owned TikTok and tools to circumvent censorship, according to a video released from Chinese police, in what experts say could be the beginning of another major crackdown on the region's 11 million mostly Muslim Uyghurs.

A video notice about the ban was released April 8 by the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, a state-run economic and paramilitary organization also known as Bingtuan that has played a key role in suppressing the Uyghurs.

Violators face arrest, a fine of 15,000 yuan, or US$2,100, and a 40-point deduction under China's social credit system, which affects people's access to credit and business opportunities, according to the video.

In addition to TikTok, people are forbidden from downloading and using X, formerly Twitter, and YouTube, and buying and selling on the cryptocurrency platform Bitcoin, it said.

The announcement "suggests a significant likelihood of another round of mass oppression by China," said Ilshat Hassan Kokbore, vice chairman of the executive committee of the World Uyghur Congress.

Bingtuan police also warned against using virtual private networks, or VPNs, or server accelerator cards, which get around China's "Great Firewall" of government internet censorship.

Authorities are also broadcasting the warning against using foreign websites and apps across radio stations, televisions and social media platforms in Xinjiang, said a foreign businessman who works in the region, but declined to be named for fear of retribution.

Chinese police are conducting impromptu checks of phones in Uyghur homes and hotels, leading to abductions, he said.

Pivotal role in oppression

Bingtuan police and armed security forces participated in the mass arrests and detentions of Uyghurs and other Turkic minorities in internment camps and prisons that began around 2017, which the United States and some Western parliaments have labeled a genocide.

A December 2023 report by the Uyghur Human Rights Project on the police surveillance structure in Xinjiang identifies the People's Armed Police and the Bingtuan as the primary perpetrators of the Chinese Communist Party's genocide against the Uyghurs.

The latest ban came after a special meeting recently convened by Xinjiang's Communist Party Committee, which stressed the need for "strictly maintaining secrecy related to Xinjiang."

Sophie Richardson, former director of China affairs at Human Rights Watch, said the new ban could indicate the failure of Chinese policies in Xinjiang.

"If the Chinese government really thought its policies were working well in the region, these kinds of threats and constraints simply wouldn't exist," she said.

Surveillance apps

The new cyber restrictions are nothing new in Xinjiang.

By 2016, Chinese police had forced people in the region to install government surveillance apps on their cellphones and computers.

The following year, the Chinese government began a large-scale arrest operation based on WeChat activity records of Uyghurs and other Muslim ethnic groups.

According to news reports, China has amassed comprehensive information on Uyghurs in a large database and can monitor and track them around the clock.

Geoffrey Cain, a senior research fellow and policy director of the Tech Integrity Project and author of the book "The Perfect Police State," said crackdowns always "start with apps," but he added that the CCP itself has mastered the use of apps to collect data on China's entire population.

"They learned to do it with the use of concentration camps, and to put people in those concentration camps they used mass data gathering from their apps," he told RFA.

Chinese public security authorities have required Uyghurs with personal computers and smartphones to install "anti-fraud" spyware on devices.

Now if someone tries to download foreign social media apps such as X or to use a VPN, the software immediately alerts police, who have the authority to freeze users' bank accounts and terminate their phone service, Cain said.

Forcing people in Xinjiang and the rest of China to install spy apps shows that Chinese authorities are worried about political stability and they want to create a total security state by seeing "every person's thinking, every person's ideology," he said.

Denying the Uyghur genocide

Kokbore pointed out that Chinese government officials widely use social media platforms such as TikTok, X and Facebook to deny the Uyghur genocide.

"China is putting efforts to conceal the ethnic genocide in the Uyghur region by tightly controlling information and punishing Uyghurs arbitrarily," he said.

Kokbore also noted the presence of X accounts with Uyghur profile photos that promote the Chinese government's narrative of Uyghurs living happy lives under Chinese policies. Chinese reporters then use such platforms to conceal the atrocities.

Some U.S. lawmakers and government officials have determined that TikTok, a subsidiary of Chinese company ByteDance, poses a threat to U.S. national security.

The U.S. House of Representatives on March 13 passed legislation that will ban TikTok in the United States unless its parent company can find a buyer for it. To become law, the bill must clear the Senate, where other efforts to ban the short-video app have stalled.

C House Reps urge crack down on companies benefiting from Chinese forced labor

17 April 2024, AXIOS

Two House members urged the State Department Wednesday to step up its diplomatic efforts to ensure companies that benefit from the forced labor of Uyghurs in China can't access global markets.

Why it matters: The U.S. has sought to crack down on companies believed to be complicit in the Chinese government's human rights abuses towards Uyghur Muslims and other minorities in Xinjiang province.

Now, the leaders of the House Select Committee on the Chinese Communist Party are calling for the U.S. to get allies on board as well.

The big picture: Last month, the European Council and European Parliament struck a provisional deal to ban products made with forced labor from being imported into the EU market.

Yet the select committee has learned that certain EU members are considering voting against the ban, committee chair Mike Gallagher (R-Wisc.) and ranking member Raja Krishnamoorthi (D-Ill.) wrote in a letter to Secretary of State Antony Blinken Wednesday.

Failing to pass the ban would mean products made by Chinese "state-sponsored forced labor programs will continue to have unfettered access to European markets."

They will also have a higher likelihood of entering the U.S. via Europe, they added.

State of play: "We therefore urge the State Department to intensify and elevate its global diplomatic efforts to address PRC state-sponsored forced labor programs," the two lawmakers wrote.

Initial efforts should "prioritize engagement" with EU partners, including Germany and Italy, ahead of a prospective vote on the import ban.

The lawmakers gave the State Department until April 30 to answer a series of questions regarding their efforts to engage allies on the topic.

Zoom out: The U.S. passed the Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act (UFLPA) in Dec. 2021, banning all imports from Xinjiang unless companies can prove with "clear and convincing evidence" that the products are not made with forced labor.

A bipartisan group of lawmakers last year raised calls for increased transparency around the enforcement of UFLPA, following reports that products from Xinjiang were still coming into the U.S. The Trump administration in Jan. 2021 declared China's campaign of mass internment, forced labor and forced sterilization of Uyghurs and other minorities in Xinjiang to be a genocide.

Chris Smith, (R-NJ), Elfidar Iltebir, president of the Uyghur American Association, Rushan Abbas, executive director of the Campaign for Uyghurs, Rep. Tom Suozzi (D-NY), Omer Kanat, executive director of the Uyghur Human Rights Project, Dolkun Isa, president of the World Uyghur Congress, and Ablikim Idris, executive director of the Center for Uyghur Studies.

The Congressional Uyghur Caucus is back.

Though the caucus never disbanded, the activities of the bipartisan group of U.S. lawmakers slowed to a trickle after its chair, Rep. Tom Suozzi, a Democrat from New York, retired from his district, which Republican Rep. George Santos then won in the 2022 midterms.

Shortly after his shock win, Santos' personal biography was proved to be a series of lies by a New York Times report. He was then expelled from the House of Representatives in December, less than a year after taking his seat, which paved the way for Suozzi to return.

The former attorney said he was pleased to be back at work.

"We just do not hear about the Uyghurs enough, and I am excited to come back to Congress to work with you to make sure that we let more people know what is happening," he said at an event Tuesday on Capitol Hill relaunching the Congressional Uyghur Caucus.

The most pressing priority of the revamped caucus, Suozzi said, would be to more widely spread awareness of the plight of Uyghurs in China's far-west, whom the U.S. government says are subject to an ongoing genocide and are often detained in forced-labor camps.

Beijing, though, says the Muslim minority were only taken to vocational training centers, most of which it says are now shuttered.

"We have to figure out how, as a team, can we make this part of the national conversation, and the global conversation?" Suozzi said on Tuesday. "There's no question of the abuse. There's no question about how horrific it is. There's no question that it's being done."

"There's no question it would rise to the level of the things that would most offend most people – if they were educated about it," he added. "but we can't get it to be part of everyday conversation."

'Looking askance'

Rep. Chris Smith, a Republican from New Jersey who chairs the Congressional-Executive Commission on China and will be a co-chair for the Congressional Uyghur Caucus, said the caucus had a lot of work left over from when it was last working at full steam.

"To think that, as we meet," Smith said, "there's a genocide going on this very minute."

He accused both the White House and the State Department of "looking askance" at the genocide when it served their diplomatic ends, such as the current warming of ties with Beijing.

"That's usually both parties: Once they get the White House, human rights become an asterisk on a bunch of talking points when they meet with foreign leaders like [Chinese President] Xi Jinping," he said. "It's brought up, but it's not brought up in a way that is meaningful."

Smith said he wanted to see the caucus push the passage of the Uyghur Policy Act, which would force the U.S. State Department to place a Uyghur speaker in every American consulate in China and include Uyghurs in outreach programs in Muslim countries.

He also said the Senate should take up a bill that passed the House in a 414-2 vote last year that would place sanctions on Chinese officials involved in forced organ harvesting, which Uyghur activists say is rife in far-western Xinjiang region where most of the minority live.

"The Uyghurs are suffering from this in a horrible way," Smith said. "We've got to get it done. I'm almost at a point of outrage."

He added the bill was now "sitting idly languishing, collecting dust over in the U.S. Senate," and that he did not believe organ harvesting "gets raised" properly by diplomats in meetings with Chinese officials.

Also attending the event was Rep. Jennifer Wexton, a Democrat from Virginia whose district in the state's north is home to many Uyghurs.

Wexton, who was previously one of the most outspoken members of the caucus, is now set to retire at the end of the current congressional term after being debilitated by progressive supra-nuclear palsy, a disease she described as "like Parkinson's [disease] on steroids."

Using an assisted speaking app on her phone, Wexton said she hoped the revamped caucus was able to pass legislation that would help end the "gut-wrenching" situation taking place in the Xinjiang region.

"We have made great strides in this fight," she said. "But as all of you know, it is far from over. While I may not be serving in Congress for much longer, I want you to know that I will not give up this fight."

China finds foreign support for Xinjiang policies as region seeks to boost economic ties

- Envoys from 49 countries attend event hosted by Xinjiang officials, with many saying they hope to strengthen cooperation under belt and road strategy
- Xinjiang aims to expand its international influence as it faces allegations of human rights abuses and forced labour – accusations Beijing has denied

Ambassadors from more than 20 countries showed support for China's policies in Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region and vowed to develop closer economic ties with the far western area as it seeks to expand its international influence amid human rights abuse allegations.

While attending a reception in Beijing on Wednesday, the ambassadors from South Africa, Pakistan, Kazakhstan, Iran, Syria and Turkey told Xinjiang authorities that they hoped to strengthen economic ties with the region.

More than 50 diplomats from 49 countries, including 21 ambassadors, attended the reception. It was the largest of several similar events organised by Xinjiang officials in recent years.

The most senior Chinese official present was Xinjiang Communist Party chief Ma Xingrui, who is also a member of the Politburo, the party's elite decision-making body.

The event coincided with Eid ul-Fitr, the Muslim festival that marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan.

Xinjiang is home to 25.85 million people, 14.93 million of whom are members of ethnic minority groups, including the Muslim Uygurs and Kazakhs.

Beijing has been accused of human rights violations and forced labour in Xinjiang – accusations it has denied. The Xinjiang government has become more proactive in recent years in promoting the region's economic development, especially its status as a core area of China's Belt and Road Initiative, in the hopes of improving its international image.

Turkish ambassador to China Ismail Hakki Musa said that Xinjiang, as a core part of the belt and road strategy, could play a role in the Middle Corridor, also called the Trans-Caspian International Transport Route (TITR), an Ankara-backed Eurasian trade route.

China's Uygurs, who speak a Turkic language, share cultural and linguistic ties with Turkish Muslims. Relations between Beijing and Ankara were once strained over Xinjiang but have eased in recent years as a result of closer economic relations.

Kazakhstan's ambassador to China, Shakhmat Nuryshv, said Xinjiang had a "special place" in his country's ties with Beijing. Around 1.6 million ethnic Kazakhs live in Xinjiang.

Central Asian countries are a priority for Xinjiang authorities in developing external relations.

These countries, most of which became independent in the early 1990s with the collapse of the Soviet Union, were once blamed as the source of separatist sentiments in Xinjiang because of their shared cultural similarities with ethnic minority groups there.

However, China's ties with Central Asia have warmed over the past decade as Xinjiang's security situation has improved and countries in the region have played a growing role in the belt and road – Beijing's ambitious plan to build global trade and infrastructure links.

In a speech at the reception, Syrian ambassador to China Muhammad Hassanein Khalil Khaddam decried the "lies of some Western countries", referring to allegations of human rights abuses in Xinjiang.

Syria has increased its cooperation with China in the face of Western sanctions as Beijing has strengthened ties with Moscow, an ally of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. Assad travelled to China in September – his first visit since the Syrian civil war broke out in 2011.

Mohsen Bakhtiyar, Iran's ambassador to China, said his country "links China and the West through Xinjiang", adding that there were great opportunities for cooperation between Iran and Xinjiang in areas such as energy and minerals.

Pakistan's ambassador to China, Khalil-ur-Rahman Hashmi, said Islamabad hoped to deepen cooperation with Xinjiang in trade, investment and other areas. In recent years, China and Pakistan have also strengthened their cooperation in counterterrorism.

The ambassador from South Africa also made a speech and envoys from Cuba, Saudi Arabia, Azerbaijan, Dominica, Georgia, Qatar and Serbia attended the event.

Xinjiang has sent multiple official delegations abroad in the past two years, and the region has frequently hosted foreign envoys, religious representatives and media figures.

In 2021, Xinjiang hosted more than 40 envoys from over 30 African countries in the regional capital of Urumqi.

In late January, Xinjiang for the first time invited foreign diplomats to attend the annual sessions of the region's legislature and political consultative conference in Urumqi – its most important political event of the year. The diplomats who attended were mainly from countries that belong to the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation, a China-led regional security and economic grouping.

Wednesday's reception was also attended by several senior Chinese officials responsible for Xinjiang, religious and foreign affairs as well as officials from Xinjiang in charge of ideology and foreign affairs.

Erkin Tuniyaz, Xinjiang's regional government chairman and one of the officials sanctioned by the US for alleged human rights abuses, said the region had protected religious freedom, particularly the "healthy and orderly development" of Islam.

Chen Xiaodong, China's vice-minister of foreign affairs, said Beijing would "actively promote" Xinjiang's opening to the outside world. He added that he hoped the envoys would promote Xinjiang to the world and resist "lies about forced labour".

With feasts and patrols, China tries to keep Uyghurs from fasting

05 April 2024, Shohret Hoshur, RFA

Uyghurs and other members of the faithful pray during services at the Id Kah Mosque in Kashgar in northwestern China's Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, as seen during a government organized visit for foreign journalists, April 19, 2021.

During Ramadan, Chinese authorities have been using a mix of festivals and surveillance to keep the mostly Muslim Uyghurs in the far western region of Xinjiang from fasting, praying and observing the Muslim holy month that ends next week.

In the city of Atush, officials told Radio Free Asia that they organized arts events and outdoor feasts and distributed free food during the month. They also held communal meetings in the early evenings to coincide with sundown, when Muslim families typically gather to eat after the daylong fast in a practice called iftar.

Police in the northwestern city of Ghulja conducted street patrols and home inspections to see if residents were fasting. They also banned residents from gathering on the streets to prevent them from meeting for dinner together.

"It is prohibited to do iftar together and prayer together," a police officer in Ghulja told RFA. "We tell them fasting is not allowed. We also pay attention [to see] if they are visiting their relatives during iftar."

In the regional capital Urumqi, a traffic police officer said designated officers had been tasked with monitoring taxi drivers to ensure they were not fasting or praying during the month.

A flurry of social media videos coming out of Xinjiang this month showed Uyghurs singing Chinese songs and gathered around outdoor tables with beer bottles on top. RFA could not independently verify when the videos had been taken or who had shot them, but their intent seemed to be to promote eating, dancing and entertaining – not prayer and fasting.

Squelching Islam

Due to Chinese censorship and severe restrictions placed on Xinjiang residents talking with journalists, it is nearly impossible to obtain candid comments from Uyghurs on the ground about these events.

But Uyghur advocates and experts outside China say that for years Beijing has been trying to restrict and discourage Uyghurs and other Turkic minorities in the region from observing Ramadan and practicing Islam in general – all in the name of fighting religious extremism and terrorism.

Chinese authorities began banning Muslims in Xinjiang from fasting during Ramadan in 2017, when they began arbitrarily detaining an estimated 1.7 million Uyghurs in "re-education" camps amid larger efforts to diminish their culture, language and religion.

The restriction was partially relaxed in 2021 and 2022, allowing people over 65 to fast, and police reduced the number of home searches and street patrol activities. But in 2023, authorities ordered all Muslims in Xinjiang to not fast and even used spies to report on those who did.

"The Chinese Communist Party has been aggressively carrying out its campaign of eliminating the religious beliefs of the Uyghur people during the holy month of Ramadan," said Ablikim Idris, executive director of the Washington-based Center for Uyghur Studies.

"During this month of prayer and fasting, Chinese authorities have been organizing political indoctrination sessions, singing and dancing, as well as other entertainment for Uyghurs in order to eradicate their faith in Islam from their hearts," he said.

"Their goal is to trample on the millennial-long faith of Uyghurs and turn them into a people without God and religion."

Evening gatherings about social order

A police officer in Atush contacted by RFA Uyghur said authorities have been tasked with coordinating various activities and events – some overseeing security, while others perform surveillance or organize art shows.

We "have been working tirelessly, without any breaks, operating 24 hours a day," she said.

The security director of a village in Upper Atush told Radio Free Asia that since the beginning of Ramadan, residents have had to gather at the village meeting hall in the early evenings.

"We have been advertising legal rules and holding weekly study events for the community," he said.

During events attended by city and political officials, there were no explicit speeches banning Ramadan or fasting. Instead, lectures were delivered on maintaining social order and stability and eating meals regularly to maintain one's health, some officials said.

Officials also gave farmers agricultural training until about 7 p.m., as well as offered health advice and explained the importance of loyalty to China and how stability contributes to its prosperity, he said.

When RFA asked officials and police about whether distributing free food during Ramadan had prompted discontent among Uyghurs, they said that community "awareness" had increased, thereby negating any dissatisfaction.

They attributed this "progress" to the significant role played by the Chinese Communist Party and the government in shaping public sentiment.

"I didn't observe any disagreement over the food distribution," said a village security chief.

"I believe there are no longer people with outdated ideologies," she said. "Everyone has embraced progressive ideals, thanks to the efforts of our party and nation. People accept modernity and embrace advanced ideologies."

Uyghur publisher jailed for books on Uyghur independence, identity

23 March 2024, RFA

Erkin Emet was arrested in July 2018 during a crackdown on writers and publishers.

Erkin Emet was arrested and jailed for publishing 'Altun Kesh,' or 'Golden Shoes,' (R) by Halide Israel and marketing Zordun Sabir's 'Ana Yurt,' or 'Motherland.'

A prominent Uyghur who published books about Uyghur cultural identity and China's persecution of the Uyghurs has been sentenced to prison, according to a Norway-based foundation and officials in Xinjiang.

Erkin Emet, 65, on a list of detained intellectuals in Xinjiang compiled by Uyghur Hjelp Foundation based in Norway, was taken into custody in July 2018, according to the organization's founder, Abduweli Ayup.

Emet's family said authorities accused him of inciting ethnic separatism and that he is serving a prison term, according to a source in Kashgar, asking not to be identified for security reasons.

However, his whereabouts and the length of his sentence are unknown, the source said.

Through confidential channels, Ayup discovered that Emet was most likely arrested for his involvement in the publication or dissemination of two books in particular.

The first was the novel "Altun Kesh," or "Golden Shoes," by Halide Israel, about the persecution of Uyghurs during China's 1966-76 Cultural Revolution and the importance of holding onto Uyghur identity. Emet also sold copies of Zordun Sabir's "Ana Yurt," or "Motherland," which chronicles the Uyghur victory over Chinese nationalist forces in the early 1940s and the establishment of the second East Turkestan Republic, in existence from 1944 to 1949.

Crackdown on intellectuals

Emet was arrested during a crackdown known as "Hui Tou Kan," or "Looking Back," a police officer who works near the Xinjiang's Health Publishing House in Urumqi, where Emet used to work, told Radio Free Asia.

At that time, Chinese authorities were detaining Uyghur intellectuals, including writers and publishers, in internment camps or prisons for producing works viewed as harboring separatist tendencies.

Material written or published by prominent Uyghurs was scrutinized, even though it had previously received government approval.

"During Hui Tou Kan, they investigated all previously published books," said an official at Xinjiang's Political Law Office in Urumqi, the region's capital.

The most problematic book related to his arrest was "Altun Kesh," he said.

Another source said that his involvement in the sale of "Ana Yurt" was also behind his arrest.

Bookstore manager

Emet, who has two children and several grandchildren, first served as deputy director of the Kashgar branch of Xinhua Bookstore in the 1990s, according to Ayup, whose group is also known as Uyghuryar.

Emet was the first bookstore manager to order 5,000 copies of "Ana Yurt," which sold out quickly, he said. "He opened multiple large bookstores in different counties of Kashgar, expanded the Kashgar Xinhua Bookstore, and diversified its offers with different categories, which proved to be successful," Ayup told RFA.

Emet was appointed director of the Kashgar Uyghur Publishing House at the end of 2010.

There he published notable works, including Hojamuhemmed Muhammad's eight volumes of poetry collections and was instrumental in getting Halide Israel's "Kechmish," or "Tales of the Past," and "Altun Kesh" published, Ayup said.

In May 2018, Emet moved to Urumqi to become director of Xinjiang's Health Publishing House, where he worked with Qurban Mamut, a renowned retired Uyghur editor at the Uyghur Civilization Journal, according to Ayup.

Two months later, Emet was arrested.

Mamut, father of RFA journalist Bahram Sintash, was arrested later and sentenced to 15 years in prison, Ayup said.

Human rights activist exposes Chinese oppression of Uyghurs in Xinjiang at UNHRC

22 March 2024, ANI

Social and human rights activist Shunichi Fujiki in his intervention during the 38th meeting of the 55th General Session of the United Nations Human Rights Council, shed light on the barbarity faced by the Uyghur community in Xinjiang due to Mainland China's actions.

During his intervention, Fujiki expressed grave concern about the ongoing systematic human rights abuses against Uyghurs in Xinjiang.

He highlighted China's refusal to grant access to the region, hindering independent verification of reports on systemic discrimination, mass arbitrary detention, and forced labour.

Despite these challenges, a growing body of evidence, including extensive research by NGOs, journalists, and academics, reveals a disturbing pattern of systematic human rights violations.

In his intervention Fujiki outlined China's efforts to erase the unique Uyghur identity and culture, citing mass detentions in "vocational training centers" that serve as de facto internment camps.

These facilities subject individuals to political indoctrination forced labor, and attempts at cultural assimilation.

He referenced a 2023 report by the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, which raised concerns about mass surveillance, restrictions on religious practices, and forced sterilizations.

Shunichi also Fujiki urged the UNHRC to take immediate action. He called for free access to Xinjiang for observers, including UN human rights experts, the release of arbitrarily detained individuals, and a comprehensive investigation into allegations of torture, forced labour, and cultural assimilation.

Additionally, Fujiki appealed to member states to enact legislation banning the import of goods produced with forced labor in Xinjiang. He emphasized the urgent need for decisive actions, as the Uyghur community continues to suffer under oppressive conditions. (ANI)

So-called 'forced labor' in Xinjiang is one of the most notorious laws of the 21st century, aiming to destabilize Xinjiang: FM

15 March 2024, Global Times

The US' so-called Uyghur Forced Labor Prevention Act (UFLPA) is one of the most notorious laws of the 21st century. It is essentially a tool used by US politicians to destabilize Xinjiang and curb China's development, a Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson said on Friday, responding to US suspension of garment imports from the Philippines on suspicion that cotton used is involved in "forced labor" in Xinjiang.

So-called "forced labor" in Xinjiang is the lie of the century concocted by anti-China forces to create forced unemployment and poverty in Northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, Wang Wenbin, spokesperson for the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said on Friday during a routine press conference.

"Such a lie is a tool used by US politicians to destabilize Xinjiang and curb China's development," said Wang.

Wang shared several examples during the press conference, which clearly showed that what the US has done on Xinjiang violated human rights under the banner of "human rights protection."

One example was a private clothing company in Xinjiang, which employed more than 2,200 people as of the end of 2018, with ethnic minority employees accounting for more than 95 percent. However, due to the impact of the US and Western sanctions, the main partners of the company have cancelled all orders in 2019, resulting in direct losses of over 10 million yuan ($1.4 million) and a reduction in employees to less than 500 people. At present, most of the factory and equipment owned by the enterprise remains idle, and it is barely able to maintain its operation through domestic orders.

Another example is a Xinjiang hair ornament production enterprise which saw its order volume decrease by 40 percent in 2023 compared to the previous year, after being sanctioned by the US. The company's production and operations have continued to deteriorate.

While it used to produce 50 million hair ornament products annually, with an annual export volume reaching $30 million in 2022, it also made a great contribution to solving local employment.

Wang also cited a villager living in Xinjiang's Kashi, who found a job in a wholly foreign-funded enterprise doing trade in Central China's Hunan in September 2019, with a monthly salary of 5,000 yuan. In 2020, due to the impact of the US sanctions, the enterprise canceled the labor contract with the villager, which forced the villager to return to his/her hometown to make a living, and the monthly income was greatly reduced.

In addition, for the sake of so-called compliance, some US companies have unilaterally terminated the supply of medical products purchased from Xinjiang, seriously affecting the right to life and health of the Xinjiang people, Wang noted.

"Facts have proved that the so-called UFLPA is in essence a tool used by US politicians to destabilize Xinjiang and curb China's development. It not only seriously infringes on the human rights of the people in Xinjiang, but also seriously disrupts the stability of the global industrial and supply chain, and seriously undermines international economic and trade rules. It is one of the most notorious evil laws of the 21st century," the spokesperson said.

Wang also called on the international community to firmly resist the wrongful actions of the US, which smears other countries, interferes in their internal affairs, oppresses their enterprises and stifles their development under the pretext of "human rights." China will continue to firmly safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of Chinese enterprises.

China pushes 'Sinicization of Islam' in Xinjiang as Ramadan arrives

12 March 2024, RFA

Xinjiang's Communist Party secretary says it is an 'inevitable trend.'

While global leaders from U.S. President Joe Biden to U.N. Secretary-General António Guterres to Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan issued well wishes to the more than 1.8 billion Muslims worldwide at the start of Ramadan this week, China's president remained silent.

Xi Jinping failed to acknowledge Ramadan, one of the most sacred times for Muslims, despite the 11 million-strong mostly Muslim Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples who live in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, as well as the roughly 7 million other Muslims in China.

Chinese authorities have cracked down on Uyghurs in Xinjiang for decades, claiming they are prone to religious extremism and separatism. The Chinese government says it wants to make Islam "compatible" with Chinese culture by ensuring it aligns with traditional Chinese values defined by Beijing.

Ramadan began less than a week after Ma Xingrui, China's Communist Party secretary in Xinjiang, discussed the "inevitability" of the Sinicization of Islam, with Uyghur rights organizations expressing concern about possible crackdowns on Muslims during Ramadan, which runs from the evening of March 10 to April 9.

"Everyone knows the need for Sinicization of Islam in Xinjiang," he said at the National People's Congress in Beijing on March 7, according to a VOA report. "This is an inevitable trend."

Since 2017, China has restricted or banned religious rituals among the Uyghurs in an effort to eliminate "religious extremism" amid a larger crackdown on Muslims that resulted in the mass detention of nearly 2 million of them. Authorities have also demolished mosques and committed severe rights violations in Xinjiang, amounting to genocide and crimes against humanity, according to the U.S. government and others.

In 2023, authorities banned Uyghurs in many parts of the region from praying in mosques and their homes during Eid al-Fitr, the holiday marking the end of Ramadan. Only senior citizens were allowed to pray in mosques under heavy police surveillance.

The previous Ramadan, authorities in Kashgar paid Muslim Uyghur men to dance outside Xinjiang's most famous mosque to celebrate the end of the holy month. The performance was filmed and released by state media ahead of an anticipated visit by the U.N. human rights chief.

"To the Uyghurs enduring the ongoing genocide, Ramadan is synonymous with extreme suffering, pervasive surveillance and unyielding oppression," Rushan Abbas, executive director of Campaign for Uyghurs, told Radio Free Asia.

"This year, the situation is further inflamed by Ma Xingrui's audacious remarks about the inevitability of the Sinicization of Islam in East Turkistan," she said, using the Uyghurs' preferred name for Xinjiang.

Religions must adapt

The concept of the Sinicization of Islam was first introduced by Xi Jinping during the National Religious Work Conference in April 2016, when he emphasized the need for religions to adapt to a socialist society and advocated for the integration of religious beliefs with Chinese culture, Xinhua News agency reported.

In 2017, the Chinese government began detaining Uyghurs and other Muslim en masse in large "re-education" camps and prisons, in part to eradicate "religious extremism."

During the National Religious Work Conference in 2021, Xi made "adhering to the Sinicization of religions" a main objective. He emphasized the need for training more personnel with Marxist views on religion and collecting believers around the Chinese Communist Party, according to Xinhua News Agency. American political analyst Anders Corr said Ma Xingrui's comments indicate little change in Beijing's goal of bringing Islam and other religions under the control of the Chinese Communist Party, or CCP.

During an August 2023 visit to Xinjiang, Xi Jinping urged government officials to enhance the Sinicization of Islam in Xinjiang and to suppress illegal religious activities. He also emphasized the importance of maintaining stability through efforts directed against terrorism and separatism, according to media reports.

Turghunjan Alawidin, a member of the East Turkistan Scholars Union, said the Sinicization of Islam will completely transform the religion in China.

"The statement that the Sinicization of Islam is an unavoidable trend essentially implies the eradication of Islam," he told RFA.

"China has a history of hostility towards Islam and has targeted the religious beliefs of Uyghurs," he said. "Chinese authorities seem to acknowledge that erasing Uyghur religious beliefs is necessary to gain compliance; thus, they are actively suppressing Islam."

Hu Ping, a U.S.-based China analyst and former chief editor of the pro-democracy journal "Beijing Spring," said that the Sinicization of Islam implies the CCP's systematic alteration and control of the religion.

Historical precedent

Ma Ju, an ethnic Hui scholar based in the U.S., said China's efforts to Sinicize Islam has historical precedent, noting a failed attempt during the transition from the Ming Dynasty (1368-1644) to the Qing Dynasty (1644-1911).

Now, Xi Jinping is treating the issue as one of Chinese nationalism, he said.

"The primary objective of Sinicizing Islam is the complete eradication of the Muslims in China," he said. "Ma Xingrui's recent visit to Beijing and his public declaration that the Sinicization of Islam is inevitable sends signals to the world that China intends to persist in ethnic and cultural genocide in the Uyghur region."

Ma Xingrui's concern about the "three forces" — a political phrase referring to ethnic separatism, religious extremism and violent terrorism in Xinjiang — is "self-defeating and undermines the effectiveness of past anti-terrorism efforts," Ma Ju said.

But Anders Corr said that the Chinese government uses the phrase as justification for its oppression of the Uyghurs.

"Beijing is still using the excuse of terrorism to bring Islam under its control and commit genocide against Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims," he said. "There is little to no recent evidence of extremism in Xinjiang."

EU reaches deal on forced labour ban, with China's Xinjiang in its sights

05 March 2024, South China Morning Post

The European Union reached a provisional agreement on Tuesday to ban goods made using forced labour, advancing legislation that was broadly written with China in mind.

The ban, which still needs to be approved by the European Parliament and the Council — made up of EU member states — will target specific economic sectors in places where state-imposed forced labour exists, based on a database drawn up by the European Commission.

China is not named in the documentation, given the need to comply with World Trade Organization rules. But the initial proposal was driven by widespread allegations of state-sponsored forced labour in the Chinese region of Xinjiang, which Beijing denies.

Nonetheless, unlike a US ban which specifically targets goods made in Xinjiang, it will apply to products from all over the world, including the EU.

Negotiators clashed over who would administer the ban, with its global remit expected to be a drain on resources. Commission sources on Tuesday said member states would need to afford them more staff to enforce the ban, "otherwise this is just headlines". As part of an early-morning deal reached by lawmakers from the parliament and council diplomats, the commission will investigate companies' supply chains if suspicions are flagged outside the EU. Individual member states will investigate instances within the union.

"It is appalling that in the 21st century slavery and forced labour still exist in the world," said Pierre-Yves Dermagne, the deputy prime minister of Belgium, which holds the rotating EU presidency, prioritised the ban.

"This hideous crime must be eradicated and the first step to achieve this consists in breaking the business model of companies that exploit workers."

If an investigation finds that forced labour is present in a supply chain, authorities can demand the goods be withdrawn from sale and confiscated at the borders. Goods considered critically important will not be destroyed, but detained until the forced labour is traced to be eradicated.

As well as drawing up a list of suspected regions, the commission will identify products in which forced labour is considered a higher risk. In these instances, importers and exporters will have to submit extra details to EU customs, for example related to the manufacturer and supplier.

Samira Rafaela, a lawmaker who led negotiations on the deal, said it was “groundbreaking in the field of human rights”.

“It will prevent forced labour products from entering our market. And it has several references to remediation. It is a step forward in achieving fair trade and cleaning up supply chains, while prioritising human rights.”

However recent history suggests its passage is not guaranteed: last week, EU member states, including Germany and Italy, torpedoed a piece of legislation that would have required companies to provide forensic audits of the human rights records of their suppliers, including in China.

The dramatic collapse of the corporate sustainability due diligence directive came at the same stage of the legislative flow, after EU members had preliminarily approved it. The Belgian government is now scrambling to salvage the law before the EU elections in June.

Since a UN Human Rights Office report on Xinjiang in 2022 found the Chinese government may have committed crimes against humanity in the region, the EU has been under pressure to enact legislation on forced labour.

Campaigners demanded that like the US, the EU place the burden of proof on importers who would be responsible for ensuring there is no forced labour in their supply chains – something the proposed risk-based legislation does not do.

Adrian Zenz, a German researcher at the Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation, whose work on Xinjiang has been widely-cited by Western legislators, said it would be better to have “no legislation” than what the EU has proposed.

“In the Xinjiang case, it would be better to have no legislation, because then there would be no illusion that the EU has done something. It’d be better to not have anything ... if you can’t do something that’s properly effective, it’s better to not have it at all,” he said.

The issue of human rights in China hit headlines in Europe recently when the German chemicals giant BASF announced it would prematurely divest from joint ventures in Xinjiang following reports that its business partners were involved in abuses.

Pressure is mounting on German car company Volkswagen to follow suit, after a German newspaper last month reported what it said was evidence of the carmaker’s involvement in forced labour in the region.

China’s foreign ministry brings in new press official from Xinjiang

15 March 2024, South China Morning Post

China’s foreign ministry has appointed a new senior press official whose previous role was in Xinjiang – a flashpoint in ties with the West – as Beijing steps up efforts to push its own narrative to the world.

Career diplomat Lin Jian has been named as deputy director general of the ministry’s press unit, which releases information on diplomatic events and foreign policy.

The announcement was made on the ministry’s website on Friday, with Lin now holding the same administrative title as foreign ministry spokespeople Wang Wenbin and Mao Ning.

Lin has just finished a stint in the far western region of Xinjiang, where for several years he was Communist Party chief at the foreign office of state-run paramilitary organisation the Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps.

During his time at XPCC, some of its top leaders were sanctioned by the United States and other Western nations in 2020 and 2021 over alleged human rights abuses against Uygurs and other Muslim ethnic minorities in the region.

Lin was not among those sanctioned, but the list included XPCC party secretary Wang Junzheng, who is now the party chief of Tibet.

The European Union also imposed sanctions on XPCC’s public security bureau, accusing it of running detention centres and violating the human rights of Muslim ethnic minority groups.

Lin, who is from Wuhan in Hubei, started his career in Europe. After graduating with a major in English from Beijing Foreign Studies University, he was sent by the foreign ministry to study in Denmark, according to Chinese media reports. He went on to work at the Chinese embassy in Copenhagen.

Lin, who is from Wuhan in Hubei, started his career in Europe. After graduating with a major in English from Beijing Foreign Studies University, he was sent by the foreign ministry to study in Denmark, according to Chinese media reports. He went on to work at the Chinese embassy in Copenhagen.

He took up the post in Xinjiang after that, in late 2020. During his time at XPCC, Lin took part in talks seeking to boost exchanges in trade and tourism between Xinjiang and Hong Kong, according to a 2022 report on the website of the Hong Kong government’s Beijing office.

Beijing’s treatment of ethnic minority groups in Xinjiang has drawn mounting criticism from the West, with allegations it detained a million Uygurs and members of other Muslim minorities in re-education camps and forced them into labour.

Those claims have been strongly denied by Beijing, which says its security measures in the region are intended to counter terrorism and extremism.

BASF to speed up exit from Xinjiang ventures after Uyghur abuse reports

10 February 2024, Hong Kong Free Press

German chemicals giant BASF said Friday it would accelerate its exit from two joint ventures in China's Xinjiang region after allegations that its local partner violated the rights of the Uyghur minority.

Staff from Markor, with which BASF was working in the region, were alleged to have been involved in rights abuses of the members of the mostly Muslim group, broadcaster ZDF and news outlet Der Spiegel reported last week.

BASF had already announced at the end of last year plans to exit the joint ventures, which manufacture the chemical butanediol, due to commercial and environmental concerns.

But it said in a statement that it would speed up its exit following recent reports that "contain serious allegations that indicate activities inconsistent with BASF's values".

"BASF will accelerate the ongoing process to divest its shares in the two joint ventures in Korla" a town in the northwestern region, it said.

BASF said it had no indication that employees of the joint ventures were involved in rights violations, only staff of its local partner.

According to last week's reports, Markor staff had taken part in visits to homes of Uyghur families in order to spy on them.

Reports about the visits were sent to Chinese authorities in 2018 and 2019, which led to the incarceration of many Uyghurs, they said.

BASF said that the situation in Xinjiang had always been part of its assessment when looking at the joint ventures, but that regular audits had not found any evidence of human rights violations.

Rights groups have long accused Beijing of a widespread crackdown on minorities in Xinjiang, including forced labour and detention camps.

Beijing denies allegations of abuse and insists its actions in Xinjiang have helped to combat extremism and enhance development.

BASF has been ramping up its presence in China in recent years, and is building a 10-billion-euro ($10.8-billion) chemical complex in the southern province of Guangdong.

It has fiercely defended its investments there, with chief executive Martin Brudermueller in 2022 warning against "China-bashing" over Germany's business ties to the world's number two economy.

Xinjiang is home to numerous factories that supply multinational companies, including big-name Western brands.

Another German company, Volkswagen, faced accusations of using forced labour at its factory in Xinjiang. But the automaker said in December that an audit it had commissioned found no evidence.

China tests new ethnic assimilation policy on Uyghurs

26 January 2024, RFA

The measure aims to further replace Uyghur culture with that of Han Chinese, experts say.

Northwest China's Xinjiang region is the first area to implement a government policy promoting integration among ethnic groups to achieve President Xi Jinping's goal of establishing a unified national identity, Chinese media reported.

The regulation calls for the creation of mixed housing, themed venues and cultural parks, and sports and cultural activities that highlight characteristics of Chinese culture and promote zhonghua minzu – a single Chinese nationality that transcends ethnic divisions.

The policy has raised concern among China watchers and scholars, who say its goal is to further erase the cultural identity of Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples and subsume them into the dominant Han Chinese culture.

The measure, known as the "Regulation for Promoting Interaction, Communication, and Integration Between Ethnic Groups," went into effect on Jan. 1 in the Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture, a nearly 270,000-square-kilometer (104,000-square-mile) multiethnic area that borders Kazakhstan, Mongolia and Russia, according to a Jan. 16 report by China's People's Daily.

A mix of Han Chinese, Kazakhs, Uyghurs, Kyrgyz and other ethnicities live there.

Ili is serving as a test for the policy before the Chinese government rolls it out in other parts of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, experts say.

'Ethnic genocide'

The policy implemented in the prefecture's capital Ghulja "aims to dismantle the Uyghur mentality, submerging them within the Chinese population and ultimately eradicating their existence," said Ilshat Hesen Kokbore, vice chairman of the executive committee of the World Uyghur Congress.

"It serves as a continuation of ethnic genocide, systematically dismantling Uyghur culture through this approach," he said. "I fear that similar measures will soon be applied in Kashgar, Aksu, Kucha, Korla and numerous other locations."

Adrian Zenz, director of China Studies at the Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation in Washington, said the regulation aims to “formalize a policy of assimilation and population dilution” for national security reasons.

“Many of the outlined regulations are not entirely new, but they formalize a policy of assimilation and population dilution, which makes this new initiative very significant,” said Zenz who has spent years documenting China’s human rights abuses against Uyghurs and has written about Beijing’s measures to dilute the ethnic Uyghur population in Xinjiang.

Leo Maillet, a doctoral student in the Faculty of Oriental Studies at the University of Geneva, expressed concern that Uyghur historical neighborhoods, traditions and culture could disappear at an even faster rate.

This policy “comes with not only symbolic, but also physical violence of replacing Uyghur spaces by Chinese spaces,” he said, as it implies that Chinese traditional architecture and cultural centers will replace Uyghur traditional teahouses, mosques and marketplaces – a destruction of both architectural forms and social forums.

“And in this sense, I think it does not only fit the definitions of genocide, but also the definitions of ecocide in the way that it is not only distracting Uyghurs as a group, but also the Uyghur region,” Maillet said.

The policy was approved by the Standing Committee of the People's Congress of Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture on Aug. 25, 2023. It received approval from the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress of the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region on Nov. 23.

Niyaz Hashim, known as Niyazi Asim in Chinese, director of the Standing Committee of the People's Congress of Ili Prefecture, told state-run People's Daily that the regulation was a result of President Xi's instructions on “consolidating the sense of community among the Chinese nation,” stemming from his several visits to Xinjiang since he was elected general secretary of the Communist Party in November 2012. “The regulation is primarily designed to create unity among the Han Chinese ethnicity and various ethnic groups,” he was quoted as saying.

Symbolic location

Ili prefecture's capital Ghulja, called Yining in Chinese, has deep symbolic significance for Uyghurs as the site where the East Turkistan Republic was founded.

On Nov. 7, 1944, Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples rebelled against Chinese rule in Ghulja and declared independence as a separate republic five days later. The rebellion was crushed by the Chinese Communists, but Uyghurs still prefer to call their homeland East Turkistan.

Ilshat Hasan Kokbore said he believes that the integration regulation signals that Beijing's genocidal policy against Uyghurs and other Muslims has entered a new stage.

The Chinese government selected Ili prefecture given its role in expressing and preserving Uyghur nationalism, history, nationality, culture and religion, and now wants to eradicate Uyghur identity and aspirations for independence, he said.

“Instead, they seek to impose the zhonghua ideology,” he told RFA. “The ultimate goal of China is uniting not only the Uyghurs, but all ethnic groups, into a single nation.”

To this end, local government authorities in Xinjiang already have doubled the Han Chinese population in Xinjiang, arbitrarily detained Uyghurs and other Turkic peoples, destroyed religious structures and historical records, and forced Uyghurs to speak Chinese.

The regulation in Ili prefecture took effect weeks before China's Universal Periodic Review – a comprehensive review of its human rights record – at the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva, Switzerland. During the review, Chinese government representatives on Jan. 22 defended Beijing's policies in Xinjiang, while the U.S. representative to the United Nations condemned its ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity there.

Despite China's denial of rights violations and assertions of normalization and development in Xinjiang, Western states continue to raise alarms about continuing repression, arbitrary detentions and enforced disappearances of Uyghurs and others.

China's Xinjiang posts robust foreign trade growth in 2023

25 January 2024, Xinhua

URUMQI, Jan. 25 (Xinhua) – The foreign trade of northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region saw a yearly increase of 45.9 percent in 2023, local customs authorities said Thursday.

The region's total imports and exports last year surpassed a historic 357 billion yuan (about 50.25 billion U.S. dollars), according to Urumqi Customs.

In 2023, the import and export between Xinjiang and the five Central Asian countries, namely Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, increased by 50 percent year on year, accounting for 79.4 percent of Xinjiang's total foreign trade.

The region engaged in trade with 192 countries and regions worldwide last year. Its trade with Malaysia, South Africa, Qatar and Algeria also posted robust growth.

Private enterprises in Xinjiang showed a strong performance in foreign trade during the same period, with their trade value soaring 48.4 percent year on year, accounting for 93.2 percent of the region's total.

The region has seen growing competitiveness in the export of labor-intensive products and electromechanical products.

Xinjiang is located at the heart of the Eurasian continent and serves as an important transportation hub in the core region of the Silk Road Economic Belt.

"Xinjiang's opening up faces significant opportunities in 2024," said Li Qinghua, deputy director of the Urumqi Customs.

Leveraging on the development of the Xinjiang Pilot Free Trade Zone and other favorable policies, the potential of Xinjiang's foreign trade field is being further activated, Li added.

About 1,000 Tourists Trapped in China's Xinjiang After Avalanches

17 January 2024, NTD

BEIJING—Around 1,000 tourists remain stranded in a remote holiday village after avalanches hit China's northwestern Xinjiang region with meters-high snow, state TV reported on Tuesday.

Road access to Hemu village, a scenic destination near the borders of Kazakhstan, Russia, and Mongolia where the tourists were trapped, has been cut off by avalanches for several days now. The village is situated in Xinjiang's Altay Prefecture where continuous snowfall in some areas has lasted 10 days, it said.

The heavy snowfall triggered dozens of avalanches along large sections of highways in the Altay mountains leading to the Kanas scenic area, Chinese state media outlets reported over the weekend.

Snow brought by the avalanches reached as high as seven meters in some parts and in many, was higher than snow clearing equipment, CCTV said.

Experts denounce trips to Xinjiang as 'genocide tourism'

12 January 2024, RFA

The Chinese government has thrown open the door for tourists to Xinjiang. Or at least those it deems worthy of an invite.

While officials previously let in diplomats, journalists and those considered "friends of China," they are now presenting the restive far-western region as a tourist destination of sorts in a bid to remove some of the tarnish from China's image as a human rights violator in the far-western region in the eyes of the international community.

Nearly 400 delegations and groups consisting of more than 4,300 people from various countries and international organizations visited the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region in 2023, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin said at a press conference on Jan. 5.

Visitors included government officials, diplomats, religious figures, experts, scholars, and journalists as well as ordinary travelers, he said. Unlike travel in the rest of China, however, visits remain by invitation only and visitors are led on government-sponsored tours.

These include trips to mosques and heritage sites "to see how Xinjiang's traditional culture is protected," Wang said. "They went to local factories, businesses and farms to learn about Xinjiang's production and development, and visited ordinary households where they saw the happy life of people of various ethnic groups."

"Seeing is believing," he said. "People are not blind to the truth. For certain countries, they are comfortable telling lies about genocide and forced labor in Xinjiang.... Xinjiang will keep its door open to the world."

The move comes as China gets ready for its fourth Universal Periodic Review, or UPR — a Human Rights Council mechanism that calls for each U.N. member state to undergo a peer review of its human rights records every 4.5 years. The review is scheduled to be held in Geneva, Switzerland, on Jan. 23.

Authorities have tightly controlled who enters Xinjiang, where harsh repression of Uyghurs and other Muslims in recent years has amounted to genocide and crimes against humanity, according to the United States, the United Nations, the parliaments of other Western countries and human rights groups.

Authorities in Xinjiang have detained an estimated 1.8 million Uyghurs and other Turkic Muslims, destroyed thousands of mosques and banned the Uyghur language in schools and government offices. China has said that the "re-education camps" have been closed and has denied any policy to erase Uyghur culture.

A recent CBS documentary on China's "rebranding" effort shows surveillance cameras and facial recognition devices monitoring Uyghurs. The name of the ancient town of Kashgar appears in Chinese as "Kashi" on signs and billboards, while the 15th-century Id Kah Mosque – closed to local Muslims since 2016 – has been transformed into a tourist attraction.

Through the scripted travel junkets, the Chinese government is spreading a narrative that Uyghurs live happy lives to cover up Beijing's severe human rights violations in Xinjiang, experts on the region said. Foreign visitors, in turn, have perpetuated the narrative through photos and posts on their social media accounts.

Criticism from rights groups

The dissemination of propaganda and China's efforts to enhance the image of Xinjiang have sparked criticism from human rights groups.

Claudia Bennett, a legal and program officer at Human Rights Foundation, said the orchestrated visits conceal the harsh realities of forced family separations, arbitrary detentions of millions in concentration or forced labor camps, and thousands of Uyghurs living in exile and forcibly rendered stateless.

"In a strategic effort to legitimize its colonization of the Uyghur region, the Chinese Communist Party carefully organizes propagandist visits for diplomats, journalists and religious scholars," she told Radio Free Asia. "These tours are designed to whitewash the CCP's gross human rights violations."

The U.S.-based Uyghur Human Rights Foundation, or UHRF, called the visits "genocide tourism" in a report issued last Aug. 30, saying that they help China conceal genocide and crimes against humanity occurring in Xinjiang.

Dolkun Isa, president of the World Uyghur Congress, took the criticism of the junkets a step further.

"Collaborating with China's propaganda equates to complicity in genocide – a grave crime," he said. "Humanity will not forget, and the Uyghur nation will not forget. Those involved will be held accountable before history."

Travel and excursion propaganda to portray life in Xinjiang as normal is part of "Beijing's current strategy," explained Adrian Zenz, an expert on China's policies in Xinjiang.

"They are showing Uyghurs and Uyghur culture, but not real and free people or culture, but a hollowed out version, a mummified version, like a CCP museum," said Zenz, director of China studies at the U.S.-based Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation.

With the U.N.'s UPR session on the horizon, there can be little doubt that Beijing is touting the visits as a way to counter criticism of its policies in Xinjiang, said Sophie Richardson, former China director at Human Rights Watch.

The main problem with the UPR, however, is that there are no penalties for failing to comply or to correct abuses, Richardson added.

"Beijing has proven just how easy it is to manipulate the process to keep independent civil society, both inside and outside China, out of the process ... and to submit a national report that is breathtakingly dishonest in its claims to upholding human rights."

CCP Pilots Ethnic Interpenetration Policy in Xinjiang

10 January 2024, ChinaScope

The Xinjiang Daily reported on December 14, 2023 that the Ili Kazakh Autonomous Prefecture in Xinjiang has enacted "Regulations on Promoting Interaction, Communication, and Integration among Various Ethnic Groups." Consisting of 19 articles, the legislation aims to commingle diverse ethnic groups together. This would serve as a pilot implementation of the "ethnic interpenetration" policy endorsed by the Chinese Communist Party in 2014.

Critics pointed out that forcing various ethnic groups to live and mix together plays to the CCP's policy of eliminating minority ethnic cultures and implementing more complete control populations living in China. For example, when members of the Han ethnic group (the majority population in China) are imported to Xinjiang and mixed with the Uyghur ethnic group, the Han people's acceptance of CCP culture will naturally manifest itself in daily life and thereby reduce the religious and cultural cohesion of the Uyghur people.

Per the CCP's ideology, forcible mixing of different ethnicities and cultures is used to foment conflicts between those cultural and ethnic groups. This aids the CCP in "inciting struggle among the people," e.g. provoking conflicts between the Han and Uyghur ethnicities. The resulting instability and incohesion makes it easier for the CCP to implement control. Such ethnic interpenetration policies also enable the CCP to more conveniently organize intelligence operations and strengthen surveillance over minority ethnic groups.

China's Xinjiang region says all new religious buildings must 'reflect Chinese characteristics'

05 January 2024, South China Morning Post

China's Xinjiang region has announced a new set of religious rules that say all new places of worship must reflect "Chinese characteristics and style".

The far-western region is home to large numbers of the mainly Muslim Uyghur majority, and the regulations say specifically that any mosque renovations that would change the existing layout or functions must be approved by the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region authorities.

The revised version of the region's regulations on the management of religious affairs was announced on Thursday by the official Xinjiang Daily newspaper. The changes will come into force in February. The rules state: "Newly built, renovated, expanded or rebuilt religious venues should reflect Chinese characteristics and culture in aspects such as architecture, sculpture, paintings [and] decorations." They also say for the first time that interpretations of religious doctrine must "meet the requirements of contemporary China's development and China's outstanding traditional culture".

The new rules also contain fewer references to "extremism" and "terrorism" compared with the previous version issued in 2014, but still emphasise the need to combat "separatism".

China has been accused of systemic human rights violations against the region's minorities, including the extensive use of re-education camps and forced labour, as well as tearing down large mosques and other Muslim sites.

The accusations have prompted a series of sanctions from the United States and other Western countries, while the United Nations said in a report that its actions "may constitute international crimes, in particular crimes against humanity".

China has denied human rights abuses in the region and says its policies are designed to counter extremism and terrorism. It has also said that Xinjiang has experienced "huge economic development" and "significant achievements on human rights" in the past decade.

It has also faced claims that it has ordered mosques around the country to remove features such as Arabic-style domes and minarets and replace them with traditional Chinese features.

A spokesman for the Xinjiang regional government told reporters in 2021 that some mosques in the region had been renovated or moved to ensure they are "safer" and "more reasonably located".

The central government in Beijing has rarely commented about alterations to mosques, but in June 2022 a prime-time news report by the state broadcaster CCTV hailed the removal of a mosque's domes in Xining in Qinghai province as a successful example of "protecting traditional heritage".

China has long-standing policies to control religious activities, with Xinjiang facing some of the tightest controls.

In recent years there has been a push to "Sinicise" religion, while President Xi Jinping has also repeatedly stressed the importance of fostering a sense of Chinese identity among the country's minority groups.

Xinjiang's new rules also impose new controls on large-scale religious gatherings, which will require approval from the local government at least one month in advance.

Meanwhile, religious content posted online must be screened by the regional government, and religious bodies and institutions must also report changes in significant personnel to the local authorities.

However, the new rules do ease some restrictions, including a ban on any donations from individuals or overseas groups to religious groups in Xinjiang.

They now say that donations of more than 10,000 yuan (US$1,400) of this kind must be reported to the authorities.

Xinjiang issues revised regulations on religious affairs

04 January 2024, Global Times

Northwest China's Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region on Thursday issued revised regulations on religious affairs management, adding in a number of new clauses and a new chapter regarding the management of religious schools. The regulations emphasize the freedom of religious belief, noting that no organization or individual shall induce or coerce locals to believe or not believe in any religion.

Experts said the regulations truly reflect the freedom to believe or not believe in any religion and take into account a series of recent issues that the region has encountered by being more detailed and accurate. What's more, it clearly bans violent extremist forces from using religion as a pretext to forcibly convert people to a particular faith, which essentially prevents these forces from luring the public into engaging in acts of terrorism.

The regulations were passed by the Standing Committee of the People's Congress of Xinjiang on December 22, 2023, and will come into effect on February 1. The total nine chapters and 78 clauses include the management of religious organizations, religious venues, religious activities, and religious properties, reported Tianshannet, the region's largest media outlet, on Thursday.

The newly revised regulation stated that no organization or individual shall use religion to engage in activities that divide the country, spread religious extremism, incite ethnic hatred, carry out terrorism, undermine national unity, disrupt social order, or harm the physical and mental health of citizens, nor shall anyone use religion to obstruct the implementation of state administration, judiciary, education, and other systems.

If anyone discovers illegal religious organizations, preachers and activities, they should promptly report to the local township governments, subdistrict offices, or relevant departments of religious affairs, according to the regulations.

According to the Constitution, China is a country that upholds religious freedom, ensuring that individuals have the right to choose whether or not to have religious beliefs, Wang Jiang, deputy director of the Institute of China's Borderland Studies, Zhejiang Normal University, told the Global Times on Thursday. Under the framework of the Chinese Constitution and the laws and regulations related to religions, the Xinjiang region has further refined the legal framework regarding this sector, Wang said. Xinjiang has witnessed the presence of violent terrorism that uses religion as a tool. These groups falsely claim to enforce religious beliefs, but their true intention is to coerce individuals into participating in terrorist activities. They manipulate the sincere religious sentiments of ordinary people and misguide them. It is crucial to establish relevant regulations to address the issue in this context, according to Wang.

The new version of the regulations specifies that newly constructed or renovated or expanded religious venues should reflect Chinese characteristics and style in terms of architecture, sculpture, painting, decoration and other aspects.

It also stipulates that religious schools should follow the path of Chinese characteristics in their educational approach, operate in accordance with the law, and improve the quality of education.

Religious schools should be established by religious organizations of the autonomous region, the regulation said. The schools should cultivate patriotic religious personnel, correctly interpret religious doctrines, and train in-service religious clergy.

Global Times reporters recently paid a visit to the Xinjiang Islamic Institute in Urumqi together with 15 representatives from Pakistani media and think tanks. Established in June 1987, the institute currently has a student body of around 1,000 people and is the only religious higher education institution in Xinjiang with eight branch campuses.

"Everyone has heard so many of the propaganda stories against Xinjiang," Moiz Farooq, an executive editor of Daily Ittehad Media Group, told the Global Times. "Now finally we have seen the truth, and it is great to say that seeing is believing."

"It is very happy for me to see the Muslims in Xinjiang are enjoying all the freedom," he said. "They have freedom to practice religion over here, with the best facilities in the institute." Xinjiang residents who practice Islam and wish to go on a pilgrimage abroad shall follow the relevant regulations of the country and the region, and the China Islamic Association will organize pilgrimage activities, according to the regulations.

The foreign delegates expressed their appreciation for China's efforts in preserving the region's traditional culture, creating a harmonious and prosperous life for local people of different ethnic groups and those with religious belief, and fighting against terrorism and extremism, the Global Times has learned.

As of 2023, more than 100 foreign delegations have visited Xinjiang to experience the unique charm of this beautiful region, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin said while refuting Western smears, noting that those who have actually visited the region highly praised its significant achievements in economic and social development, and appreciated the Chinese government's great efforts in protecting the multi-ethnic culture of the Xinjiang region and ensuring people's freedom of religious belief.

China says 456,000 Uyghurs newly hired this year in Xinjiang

02 January 2024, RFA

China says that 456,000 people were newly employed during the first 10 months of the year in its far-western Xinjiang region, evidence it said showed that Beijing was successfully promoting economic development to create a "happy and harmonious" Uyghur society.

Authorities are seeking "full employment" in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, or XUAR, as a key economic strategy to alleviate poverty, the Chinese-controlled Tengritagh Network said on Dec. 25.

"Employment signifies a stable source of income, and a stable source of income paves the way for the desire to consume," said the report, which said 456,000 people had been added to the workforce.

But Uyghur experts and activists said many of the jobs amounted to forced labor of people who had been detained – or were still detained – in a vast network of "re-education" camps where their human rights were routinely abused.

Authorities are relying on the forced labor to maintain surveillance of these people, said Ilshat Hesën Kokbore, vice chairman of the executive committee of the World Uyghur Congress.

"This involves ensuring that they are not idle, but engaged in various sectors," he told RFA.

"The primary objective of such arrangements is to subject them to Chinese surveillance and control throughout their workday, ultimately aiming at eradicating the Uyghur nation," Kokbore said.

Individuals compelled to work in factories in Xinjiang or in Chinese provinces are not voluntary participants, he said. Instead, local authorities are using coercive measures, and many receive only a fraction of regular wages – which is internationally recognized as forced labor, he said.

China desperately needs Uyghurs to fill these jobs, which lack technical complexity and are less favored by Chinese workers, experts said.

"We consistently organize farmers and herdsmen for employment based on enterprise needs," said the head of Pichan county's public employment service center, responsible for employing 100 farmers from Lamjin village.

Adrian Zenz, director of China Studies at the U.S.-based Victims of Communism Memorial Foundation and an expert on the Xinjiang region, highlighted the presence of two crucial factors when discussing the origins of this type of forced labor in the Uyghur region.

First, Uyghurs and other Muslims detained in vocational internment camps have been shifted to forced labor either in factories on the camp compound or to plants in nearby locations, he said. They eventually will be moved to other work locations and up in the other labor transfer scheme.

The second scheme, related to China's poverty alleviation policy, places Uyghur rural surplus laborers in labor transfer programs that are not directly linked to internment camps.

This course of recruitment, coercive military-style training in closed facilities, is not always consistent, because the training takes place in different forms and shapes, with the goal being to place them in low skilled, labor-intensive manufacturing, Zenz said.

"They could end up working in the same factory as internment camp workers," he said.

The Chinese government promotes forced labor in Xinjiang to try to eradicate absolute poverty and maintain social stability, Zenz said.

"It's to keep [ethnic] minorities busy, and factories more easily controlled rather than scattered factories," he said. "They are also a place of indoctrination and mandatory ongoing training, often times with family separation."

Instead, the CCP becomes the family becomes the main locus of control in society, he said.

"People are also taken out of their communities," Zenz said. "They're uprooted from communities and live on secure factory compounds, so there's a lot of government intrusion going on here in this scheme."

Explained: 6 Hong Kong activists against whom arrest warrants have been issued

24 December 2024, The Indian Express

A reward of $1 million Hong Kong dollars (around $130,000) has also been announced for information leading to arrests of activists based in the UK and Canada.

As part of its larger crackdown on activists in recent years, Hong Kong's Deputy Commissioner of Police (National Security) announced on Tuesday (December 22) that wanted notices were issued against "six anti-China disruptors who have fled overseas."

The National Security Department of the police force also said $1 million Hong Kong dollars (around $130,000) will be awarded for information leading to their arrests. Several national security offences, such as secession, subversion and collusion with foreign forces, have been cited as grounds for the warrants.

Such notices have been issued in the past as well, following protests in 2019-20 against the increasing control of mainland China's government on the political system of Hong Kong. The six people named in the latest warrants range from political activists based overseas for the last few decades, to young students.

Tony Chung, 23

Chung was the former leader of the now-defunct pro-independence group Studentlocalism.

In 2021, he was sentenced under Hong Kong's national security law of 2020, which criminalised calls for the city's secession from China. At the time, he was the youngest person to be sentenced under it for a term of around three years. Following his release in 2023, he fled Hong Kong to seek asylum in the UK, going against the supervision order imposed on him.

He later told the BBC that he was thrown into a situation that was "an even bigger and more dangerous prison" than the one he had left. The police also reportedly asked him to report the whereabouts of other pro-democracy activists in Hong Kong.

Carmen Lau, 29

Lau is a former district councillor and current activist with the US-based Hong Kong Democracy Council in the UK.

She told Radio Free Asia in an interview this year that she fled the city in 2021 amid a “crackdown on political opposition and dissent”.

Over time, she said, “We are seeing so many Hong Kong communities and organizations springing up in the U.K., and everyone is finding their role, finding different things to work on.”

Notably, the UK held control of Hong Kong for 99 years until 1997. Under the terms of the Sino-British Joint Declaration of 1984, it handed over the city to China on the condition that for the next 50 years (from 1997 to 2047) its economic and political autonomy should be retained. These historical ties have led many in Hong Kong to turn to the UK for asylum and immigration.

Chloe Cheung, 19

Cheung is a Communications and Media Assistant at the Committee for Freedom in Hong Kong, which is based in the UK. The organisation recently amplified a post on X, which was critical of the recent warrants.

It said Chloe left Hong Kong at the age of 15. “Instead of attending university after graduation, she dedicated her youth to the movement” and campaigned for political prisoners in Hong Kong, it added. Cheung has also been involved in forming activist groups in Leeds, UK.

Dr Chung Kim-wah, 62

Chung was previously a senior member of the independent polling organisation Hong Kong Public Opinion Research Institute.

A short profile from the University of Oxford notes: “Dr Kim Wah Chung is a retired academic who has been teaching and doing research in Hong Kong for more than 30 years before his retirement in 2020. He then became the Deputy CEO for the Hong Kong Public Opinion Research Institute for two years before he moved to UK, in ‘exile’ as some would say, in late April 2022. He has extensive knowledge of public administration, social policies, social welfare and social development of Hong Kong and China.” He delivered a talk at the university in 2024. According to the South China Morning Post, Chung was accused of having “repeatedly advocated the city’s independence between May and June on a social media platform and called for sanctions against Beijing and Hong Kong between 2020 and 2023.”

Joseph Tay, 62

Tay is a co-founder of the Canada-based NGO HongKonger Station.

According to his LinkedIn profile, since 2021 his radio show has also been broadcast daily nationwide “to a total of 81,680 people identified “Hong Konger” as their ethnic origin, while 213,855 people listed their place of birth as Hong Kong.” He is currently campaigning to be a candidate in the upcoming Canadian elections from the Conservative Party.

SCMP reported he was “charged with inciting secession and collusion with foreign forces after he allegedly posted videos calling for international sanctions on social media platforms via his channel between July 2020 and June this year.”

Victor Ho, 69

Ho is a YouTuber and was earlier a journalist and has been based in Canada for the last few years. He came under the radar of Hong Kong authorities when he, along with some activists, announced elections to a “Hong Kong Parliament”.

According to Canadian media organisation Global News, Ho said the goal was to establish a parliament that “can truly reflect the will of Hong Kongers”, criticising China’s influence in Hong Kong’s electoral process.

In 2014, students led protests in Hong Kong against China’s attempt to change the voting system in elections. Authorities said they would first screen the candidates who could contest in the polls. Ultimately, the proposal did not come into force.

US report says Hong Kong becoming ‘nearly indistinguishable’ from Chinese cities, as Beijing condemns ‘arrogance’

23 December 2024, HKFP

“The façade of an alternative system of political governance that was promised to last 50 years... has withered away as Hong Kong becomes nearly indistinguishable from any other neon-lit city on the Chinese mainland,” the report read.

A US report which alleged that Hong Kong’s unique system had been “withered away,” leaving it “nearly indistinguishable” from mainland cities, has been condemned by the local government and Beijing.

The Congressional-Executive Commission on China (CECC) – a US government body monitoring human rights conditions in China – published its annual report on Friday. It said violations of human rights are “most brutally implemented in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, Tibet, and Hong Kong.”

“The façade of an alternative system of political governance that was promised to last 50 years... has withered away as Hong Kong becomes nearly indistinguishable from any other neon-lit city on the Chinese mainland,” the report read. “Indeed, Hong Kong officials may now be more zealous than their mainland counterparts in enforcing national security laws.”

In response, the Commissioner’s Office of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Hong Kong said in a Chinese-language statement on Saturday that the “so-called report” was a tactic which “grossly interferes” in the internal affairs of mainland China and Hong Kong.

The Office said the report “fully exposed the ignorance, prejudice, and arrogance of certain U.S. politicians.”

“No matter how many such reports the U.S. side throws out, they cannot shake the prosperous and stable situation in Hong Kong...” the statement has read.

Separately, in a Saturday statement, the Hong Kong government said the report “smack[s] of despicable political manipulation with ill intentions.” It warned the US side against “interfering” in Hong Kong affairs.

Rights abuses

The CECC report pointed to “the arbitrary application of national security laws” and an “ongoing criminal prosecution” against Hong Kong pro-democracy activists based on national security and sedition laws.

The report named pro-democracy media tycoon Jimmy Lai, former chief editor of defunct media outlet Stand News Chung Pui-kuen, human rights lawyer and activist Chow Hang-tung and student activist Joshua Wong as figures who had been prosecuted after they “peacefully exercised their rights.”

Lai is still on trial for two counts of taking part in a “conspiracy to collude with foreign forces” under Beijing’s security legislation. Wong – last month – was sentenced to 56 months in jail under the same legislation along with 44 democrats. Chow, meanwhile, is awaiting her national security trial.

In late September, Chung Pui-kuen was jailed for one year and nine months under the sedition law, the first such conviction of journalists since the former British colony returned to Chinese rule in 1997.

Separately, the CECC also raised concerns that some foreign judges had resigned from Hong Kong’s highest court this year, and that Hong Kong police issued warrants for at least 13 overseas-based Hong Kong activists.

The report also highlighted that a Hong Kong court had granted a government application to demand social media platforms to take down a protest song. And US tech giant Google’s YouTube blocked access to more than 30 videos of Glory to Hong Kong for viewers in Hong Kong.

The fact that annual vigils in Victoria Park commemorating the 1989 Tiananmen crackdown were no longer held was also another example of a human rights concern listed by the CECC.

In response, the Hong Kong government said the report “ignores the severe national security threats posed by the riots and the Hong Kong version of [a]

‘color revolution’ in 2019,” adding that all national security laws in Hong Kong were established to “safeguard national sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity.”

“The laws also better safeguard the fundamental rights and freedoms of the residents of the HKSAR and other people, including those doing business, in the city,” the statement read. It added: “The relevant laws have set out clear definitions and criminal elements which will not affect regular exchanges between Hong Kong residents and people here for business with foreign countries.”

Xi Jinping tells Hong Kong’s John Lee country has ‘very high expectations’

19 December 2024, SCMP, Natalie Wong and Emily Hung

Chinese President Xi Jinping has met Hong Kong’s leader for the second time in a week, telling him the country has “very high expectations” of the city and urging officials to go “all out” to boost the economy. The pair spoke at a closed-door meeting on Thursday afternoon in Macau, as Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu joined Xi on the second day of his visit to the casino hub for celebrations marking the 25th anniversary of the city’s return to Chinese administration.

“The country has very high expectations of Hong Kong. [I] hope Lee and the administration will govern firmly and steadily, make all-out efforts to boost the economy and strive for development and create a brighter future for Hong Kong,” Xi said, according to the Xinhua News Agency.

Xi also reportedly told Lee that Hong Kong and Macau should “learn from each other” and “strengthen exchanges and cooperation”, as the implementation of the “one country, two systems” governing principle entered a new stage.

Lee voiced his gratitude to Xi and stressed his determination to lead Hong Kong’s economic advancement, improve livelihoods and integrate the city further into the Greater Bay Area.

The president’s chief of staff, Cai Qi, and Hong Kong and Macau Affairs Office director Xia Baolong also attended the meeting.

Lau Siu-kai, a consultant with the semi-official Chinese Association of Hong Kong and Macau Studies think tank, said the brief meeting – the second in a week between Xi and Lee – underscored Beijing’s expectations of Hong Kong.

“Lee must attach great importance to President Xi’s requirements, implement the central government’s instructions and guidance and do a better job in order to gain the trust and confidence of the central government,” Lau said.

Lee made a four-day duty visit to the capital last week, briefing Xi and Premier Li Qiang about Hong Kong's economic and political situation on Friday.

The city leader was urged to actively seek reforms and generate fresh economic momentum through innovation, after Xi endorsed Lee's efforts to safeguard national security and bolster Hong Kong's international influence.

On Thursday evening, Lee, Financial Secretary Paul Chan Mo-po and Secretary for Justice Paul Lam Ting-kwok joined the president at a gala dinner held at the East Asian Games Dome in Taipa. Lee spoke briefly with incoming Macau leader Sam Hou-fai.

The Hong Kong leader also greeted former Macau chiefs Edmund Ho Hau-wah and Fernando Chui Sai-on.

Lee has likened the relationship between Macau and Hong Kong to that of brotherhood, saying the two cities could seek greater collaboration, adding there would be plenty of opportunities to discuss the relationship with Sam in the future.

China Customs seizes Hong Kong geography textbook said to wrongly depict Chinese borders

17 December 2024, HKFP, Irene Chan

China Customs said the books "are suspected of endangering China's national unity, sovereignty, and territorial integrity."

A thousand copies of a geography textbook which was said to have incorrectly depicted China's borders have been seized by China Customs before they were exported to Hong Kong.

The Chinese authority said on its official WeChat account on Friday that the publications were seized at the Huanggang checkpoint, which is on the border of Hong Kong and Shenzhen, after customs personnel found the books inaccurately showed China's boundaries.

According to the authority, the maps shown in the textbook did not accurately draw the borders near the Aksai Chin area, those near the South Tibet area, and did not include the Diaoyu Islands, including Chiwei Yu, islands in the South China Sea, and a U-shaped boundary line which consist of 10 dashes showing waters claimed by Beijing in the South China Sea.

Both Aksai Chin and South Tibet lie on China's border with India, and are also claimed by New Delhi, while the disputed Diaoyu Islands are claimed by Taiwan and controlled by Japan, where they are known as the Senkaku Islands. Additionally, Beijing's claims to much of the economically important South China Sea are also subject to competing claims from neighbouring countries and have been ruled to have no legal basis by an international court.

China Customs said the books "are suspected of endangering China's national unity, sovereignty, and territorial integrity."

It added: "Maps are the primary representation of a country's territorial boundaries, reflecting the scope of national sovereignty... Any printed materials and publications that do not comply with China's regulations on the content of publicly available maps are strictly prohibited from entering or leaving the country."

The statement also published the map from the textbook, highlighting the areas that were said to inaccurately depict China's borders.

Ming Pao reported that the textbook was titled HKDSE Exam Series Getting 5** in 9 Weeks: Geography, which was first published in 2018 by the Hong Kong Educational Publishing Company.

The textbook was not on the Education Bureau's recommended textbook list and therefore had not been assessed by the authority.

In response to HKFP, the bureau said it had asked all local schools to get the Chinese standard map from the Chinese government website if they need to produce maps for teaching purposes.

"If schools find that teaching resources involve serious crimes, unethical conduct, have the potential to be illegal, or contain information and content that pose risks to or are detrimental to national security, they should immediately remove or cease using them," the authority said in a Chinese written response.

It added that publishers should "continuously review national maps and related text" in textbooks and should immediately revise them if the information was not up to date.

HKFP has also reached out to the publisher for comment.

Updated Chinese standard Map

In March, China Customs tore a page from a Hong Kong history textbook being carried by a student as they exited Hong Kong, saying the page contained a map inaccurately showing Chinese borders, HK01 reported.

The map in the history book was said to have presented Diaoyu Dao as Diaoyu Tai, a name used by Taiwanese authorities, and had not includes the U-shaped 10-dash line.

Citing the publisher, HK01 reported that the book had been printed before Chinese authorities updated the Chinese Standard Map in August 2023, and therefore it had not had enough time to revise the textbook, get it reviewed by the Education Bureau and reprint it.

Hong Kong officials learn neighborhood surveillance from China

05 December 2024, RFA, Wei Sze and Dawn Yu

Hong Kong is sending district councilors and other local officials to mainland China to learn how the ruling Chinese Communist Party uses local networks of volunteers to monitor the population and target potential unrest before it happens.

China's "red armband" brigade of state-sanctioned busybodies have been dubbed the biggest intelligence network on the planet by social media users, and have supplied information that has also led police to crack major organized crime, according to state media.

Neighborhood committees in China have long been tasked with monitoring the activities of ordinary people in urban areas, while its grid management system turbo-charges the capacity of officials even in rural areas to monitor what local people are doing, saying and thinking.

These local forms of surveillance and social control are known in Chinese political jargon as the "Fengqiao Experience."

Now, it looks as if Hong Kong will be adopting similar measures, according to the city's Secretary for Home and Youth Affairs, Alice Mak, who confirmed that 18 local officials had already been to the eastern province of Zhejiang to study the system. "Through classroom study and on-the-spot understanding of the practical methods of the Fengqiao Experience ... district councilors understand that regional governance requires strengthening communication with citizens, understanding their emergencies, difficulties and worries, as well as the early detection and resolution of citizens' problems," Mak told the Legislative Council on Wednesday.

She said the Fengqiao Experience will be implemented in Hong Kong by newly introduced "care teams," and that further training is in the pipeline.

In July 2021, China empowered local officials at township, village and neighborhood level to enforce the law, as well as operating a vastly extended "grid management" system of social control in rural and urban areas alike.

According to directives sent out in 2018, the grid system carves up neighborhoods into a grid pattern with 15-20 households per square, with each grid given a dedicated monitor who reports back on residents' affairs to local committees.

Hong Kong's care teams are also expected to help the authorities inform the public, as well as reporting the views of the public to the government, according to a 2022 document announcing their deployment.

Detecting grievances

Current affairs commentator Johnny Lau said the ongoing crackdown on public dissent under two national security laws isn't enough for the authorities, who want to nip any signs of potential unrest in the bud.

"The authorities are taking the big-picture view that there will be a lot of public grievances given the current economic problems," Lau told RFA Cantonese in a recent interview. "It's clear that more grassroots work will have to be done to prevent any outbreak of such grievances."

He said the District Councils, which now contain only members judged "patriotic" following recent changes in the electoral system, will be the mainstay of the new approach, with the care teams staying in touch with local residents in neighborhoods.

But he said there are also plenty of technological options for keeping an eye on what people are up to.

Former pro-democracy District Councilor Cheung Man-lung said the care teams won't necessarily be effective if people don't trust them, however.

"Community work is always based on public trust in those in positions of responsibility," Cheung said. "If people don't trust them, then there'll be a lot of problems [with this approach]."

Cheung said he hasn't seen much of his local care team, despite the bursting of a water main in his neighborhood recently.

Chief Executive John Lee, who was "elected" unopposed following changes to the electoral rules in 2022, first announced the establishment of care teams in his October policy address of that year, saying they would “take part in community-building” across Hong Kong’s 18 districts.

The government would carve up districts into sub-districts, and seek to engage local organizations and groups, including young people and ethnic minorities to take part in community building, he said.

The first care teams, chosen for their patriotism and willingness to follow the government’s lead, were deployed in Tsuen Wan and Southern districts in 2023.

The government changed the rules governing District Council election after the 2019 poll resulted in a landslide victory for pro-democracy candidates that was widely seen as a ringing public endorsement for the pro-democracy movement despite months of disruption and clashes.

China resumes multiple-entry visas for Shenzhen travellers to Hong Kong

29 November 2024, Reuters

China has eased visa restrictions for Shenzhen residents visiting Hong Kong, allowing multiple entries into Hong Kong per year beginning from Dec. 1, Xinhua reported on Friday.

Each stay is for up to seven days, the official news agency said, with the multiple-entry visas valid for one year at a time.

The announcement reinstates a multiple-entry policy from 2009 that was tightened in 2015 when China began allowing Shenzhen residents to go Hong Kong only once a week.

The stricter policy was aimed at quelling anger in Hong Kong over traders making trips up to several times a day to take advantage of lower taxes by buying goods for resale in the mainland.

Hong Kong said the resumption of the more lenient entry policy is expected to benefit a number of tourism-related industries such as retail and catering.

Hong Kong leader John Lee had proposed further enhancements to Beijing on mainland residents’ tourism visits to Hong Kong in a policy address last month pledging measures to boost the city’s economy.

Visa rules for residents in Zhuhai, another city in southern Guangdong province, were also eased, allowing once-a-week entry to Macao for trips of not more than seven days. This would take effect on Jan. 1, Xinhua said.

Zhuhai residents were previously allowed entry to Macao once every two months.

Hong Kong’s AI efforts connect China and rest of the world amid geopolitical tensions

27 November 2024, SCMP

Chief technology officer at Hong Kong Productivity Council says city remains an important launching pad for international AI firms

Hong Kong plays a major role in the artificial intelligence (AI) industry in terms of connecting mainland China and the rest of the world amid geopolitical headwinds, according to a senior executive at the Hong Kong Productivity Council (HKPC).

“At the moment, we are artificially creating a barrier between the US and mainland China, and that will stifle the development of technology,” Lawrence Cheung Chi-chong, HKPC’s chief technology officer, said in an interview on the sidelines of an AI conference organised by the council on Tuesday.

“A lot of times for us, we don’t know whether we should reach out to our Western counterparts to work with them,” Cheung told the South China Morning Post. “Because even if they have interest to work with us ... they may not have the freedom to [do so]. And that is sad in a way.”

“So from a scientist’s point of view, it has been difficult over the past few years, particularly in the AI area,” he said.

Cheung’s comments reflect how Hong Kong, in recent years, has been caught in the crossfire of trade tensions and escalating tech rivalry between the US and China.

Washington in August last year announced plans to restrict US firms from investing in Chinese companies, including those in Hong Kong and Macau, in three areas: semiconductors, quantum computing technologies and certain AI systems.

Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu last month said that Washington’s plan to clamp down on outbound investments in China would also harm US businesses and residents, citing the US$271.5 billion the country had earned through trade with the city over the past decade.

Lee warned that the US will ultimately “reap what it sows”.

Nvidia, the world’s leading supplier of AI processors, has already been barred by Washington from selling its most advanced chips to China, which has left many domestic tech firms scrambling to find alternative products.

From July 9, ChatGPT creator OpenAI had developers on the mainland and in Hong Kong blocked from accessing its services.

Still, Cheung pointed out that Hong Kong remains an important launching pad for international AI firms looking to access the Chinese market and for mainland companies that aim to expand overseas. HKPC – a statutory body under Hong Kong's Innovation, Technology and Industry Bureau – has also been pushing for AI to be adopted across local industries such as manufacturing and logistics, according to Cheung.

He said HKPC is currently developing an AI model named Industrial GPT, which aims to incorporate "sufficient industrial data", making it useful for small-to medium-sized manufacturers in Hong Kong. Industrial GPT, which is expected to be ready in one to two years, will be trained at the AI Supercomputing Centre at Cyberport.

"At the moment, I think we will be using both [Chinese and Western computing solutions to build Industrial GPT]," Cheung said. "But we'll see how the current geopolitical situation will develop and pan out."

The Centre for Artificial Intelligence and Robotics, a Hong Kong-based AI research centre under the Chinese Academy of Sciences, said last week that it has advanced the development of its medical AI models by using Huawei Technologies' Ascend processors, as access to Nvidia's high-end chips remains restricted.

From VOA Mandarin: Beijing redefines 'Hong Kong people governing Hong Kong'

27 November, VOA Mandarin

A senior Chinese official has reinterpreted the principle of "Hong Kong people governing Hong Kong," a cornerstone of the "one country, two systems" framework established during the 1997 handover. Zhang Yong, deputy director of the Legal Affairs Committee of the National People's Congress of China, said Tuesday that Hong Kong's governance involves not only its residents but also the Central Government in Beijing.

Anti-China separatists in HK sentenced, sending clear message to West's interference

22 November 2024, Global Times, Lawrence Ma

The sentencing of the 45 separatists sends a very clear and unequivocal message to those 2019 rioters and their supporters that national security should be taken seriously, and I am sure they will be deterred. I am confident that these former participants will certainly think twice in the future when they are tempted by financial reward or enticed by a foreign power to endanger national security.

Hong Kong democracy activist Jimmy Lai denies inciting hatred towards China in trial

21 November 2024, Hindustan Times

Pro-democracy activist Jimmy Lai said on Thursday he was against violence and had not sought to incite hatred against China and Hong Kong authorities by calling for protests to defend basic rights, speaking in his second day of testimony in a landmark national security trial.

Lai, 76, a British and Hong Kong citizen and a founder of the now-shuttered pro-democracy newspaper Apple Daily, is considered one of the most high-profile prisoners under a national security law imposed by China in June 2020.

Lai is testifying in the same week a Hong Kong court sentenced 45 leading democracy activists to jail terms of up to 10 years under the same law.

Under questioning, Lai was asked about three articles, including one he wrote in 2019 in which he warned that if an extradition law was passed, another "June 4th massacre" could happen in Hong Kong referring to the killings by Chinese soldiers of demonstrators in and around Beijing's Tiananmen Square in 1989.

Lai told the court he had feared Hong Kong's rule of law would be compromised if a proposed law allowing extraditions to mainland China were enacted, and so called on people to come out and protest.

Lai denied seeking to incite hatred against the Chinese government.

"I just convinced them to come out and demonstrate," he told the court. "No, I didn't ask them to, you know, there's no hate here, no hatred here."

Earlier, Lai sought to counter allegations that he colluded with foreign forces chiefly the United States "to impose sanctions or blockade, or engage in other hostile activities" against the Hong Kong and Chinese governments.

Lai has pleaded not guilty to two charges of conspiracy to collude with foreign forces and a charge of conspiracy to publish seditious material. If convicted, he could face up to life imprisonment under the national security law.

He has been detained in solitary confinement since December 2020.

Lai was also asked on Thursday about a series of WhatsApp messages he wrote in 2020 in the run-up to the national security law. The messages regarded an executive order by then U.S. President Donald Trump to eliminate special treatment for Hong Kong given moves by authorities to smother the city's autonomy.

Lai admitted sending to his colleague and friends via WhatsApp a copy of the executive order.

At the time, Trump also said he would impose sanctions on people behind the crack-down.

Lai denied asking Apple Daily's ex-associate publisher Chan Pui-man to compile a "shitlist" of Hong Kong officials who should be sanctioned.

"That would be ridiculous," he told the court, when asked whether he asked former Democratic Party chairman Lee Wing-tat to make such list.

On the first day of his testimony, Lai denied seeking to use his international connections to influence the policies of other governments, including the U.S., towards China and Hong Kong.

Lai also told the court that while he supported peaceful protests, he was against violence of any kind.

He also said he went into the newspaper business given his belief in the core values of Hong Kong, namely the rule of law and desire for freedom.

"The more information you have, the more you are in the know, the more you are free," he said.

The U.S. government has condemned Lai's prosecution and called for his release, with his case shaping up as a possible point of friction between the United States and China when Trump returns to office in January.

China's vice premier vows to boost Hong Kong competitiveness, says stimulus push has 'benefited' the city

19 November 2024, CNBC Africa

Chinese Vice Premier He Lifeng on Tuesday vowed to boost Hong Kong's competitiveness by investing in the city's innovation and delivering supportive financial policies.

Speaking at the third Global Financial Leaders Investment Summit, hosted by the Hong Kong Monetary Authority, He reiterated Beijing's commitment to "explore and implement" measures aimed at building Hong Kong as an "international financial center." That's according to CNBC's translation of his spoken Mandarin.

Beijing's stimulus measures have already "benefited" Hong Kong, said He, who oversees a key economic and financial policymaking body. "The upward trajectory of the economy is more certain."

To strengthen its financial industry, Hong Kong needs to leverage measures from mainland China as well as its global connections, Li Yunze, minister of China's National Financial Regulatory Administration, said in a panel following He's speech.

Almost 80% of mainland businesses that seek an offshore listing would go to Hong Kong, Li said, stressing the city's future "has always been intertwined with" China.

During the same panel, Wu Qing, head of China's securities regulator, said that Hong Kong will continue pursuing policies that attract more foreign investment.

Some of the world's largest banks have moved to scale back operations and cut jobs in Hong Kong and mainland China amid a prolonged dearth in listing and deal-making activities.

An exodus of capital made the city's Hang Seng the worst-performing major index last year, marking fourth straight years of decline. And Hong Kong's stock market saw proceeds from initial public listings (IPOs) and follow-on share sales shrink 16% in the first six months this year, compared to a year ago, according to LSEG data.

Still, operators of Hong Kong's stock exchange have pointed to signs of pickup in the third quarter as Beijing unveiled a raft of stimulus measures to bolster its flagging economy.

Vice premier He, a close confidant of President Xi Jinping, has been tasked with tackling China's government debt crisis and protracted property downturn, which have strained the regions financial stability and stunted economic growth momentum.

Earlier this month, Chinese authorities took further steps to attract foreign investment, including lowering the capital threshold for foreign investors holding a non-controlling stake in an enterprise. Under the new regulations, foreign individuals are now allowed to invest in publicly-listed companies.

PBOC governor Pan Gongsheng also said in a meeting on Nov. 7 that that China would continue to implement accommodative monetary policy and bolster ties between domestic and foreign financial markets. Representatives from 11 foreign institutions including HSBC, Standard Chartered and Citigroup attended that meeting, according to a statement.

Chinese Vice-Premier He Lifeng urges Hong Kong to be 'self-assertive' on 3 paths to reform

19 November 2024, SCMP, Cannix Yau and Fiona Sun

State leader says city should deepen financial reforms, expand cooperation and opening up and dovetail with national developments

Chinese Vice-Premier He Lifeng has pledged Beijing's backing for Hong Kong to strengthen its standing as an international financial centre, urging the city to be self-assertive amid geopolitical uncertainties and to press on with reforms as he set out three directions to unleash its full potential.

Opening the three-day Global Financial Leaders' Investment Summit on Tuesday, the state leader spelled out three areas of focus for Hong Kong's financial sector. First, it should deepen reforms and innovate to boost competitiveness; second, expand cooperation and opening up; and third, dovetail its plans with national developments to further strengthen the foundation of Hong Kong's future financial development.

"The unprecedented changes in the world are accelerating. Global political and economic landscapes are undergoing profound adjustments. There are more and more variants and uncertainties," he said.

"Regardless of how the external environment changes, we will focus on ourselves. We [will] respond to external uncertainties with self-assertiveness.

"It is hoped that Hong Kong will make use of this critical period, understand changes accurately, respond to them scientifically, and seek them out proactively."

He added that Hong Kong should embrace and uphold the "Lion Rock Spirit", a reference to a well-known symbol of the city's resilience.

"Be enterprising, work hard for continuous enhancement in financial development, and continue to consolidate and enhance [the city's] status as an international financial centre," he said at the landmark industry summit for the world's top financial leaders.

Speaking at the summit too, a panel of top mainland financial officials highlighted Hong Kong's key role in the opening up and development of the mainland, stressing much more could be done to boost its standing.

Among them, Wu Qing, the chairman of the China Securities Regulatory Commission, revealed that commodities might be added to stocks, bonds, options and wealth management products currently tradeable on the Connect scheme, a mechanism that allows global investors and mainland players to tap into each other's markets via Hong Kong.

Discussions at the summit, organised by the city's de facto central bank, the Hong Kong Monetary Authority, were set against the backdrop of growing uncertainties about the global economy and Sino-US ties with Donald Trump as the next president. Another key underlying concern centred on Hong Kong's attempts to overhaul its economy and restore investor confidence after sluggish growth was revised downwards to 2.5 per cent for this year.

With several top Chinese regulatory officials attending the summit, investors were also watching for signs of Beijing's next moves to re-energise the country's economy, after an announcement earlier this month discussed a massive stimulus package to tackle local debt and property woes.

The vice-premier began by setting out all that the mainland was doing to boost Hong Kong's financial sector, from improving the policy environment to supporting more quality enterprises to list in Hong Kong.

It would also expand mutual market access for stocks, bonds, financial management and interest rate swaps and consolidate its position as a global offshore renminbi centre and improve the mechanism for regular issuance of treasury bonds, among a host of measures, he said.

"To accelerate the development of our country into a financial powerhouse requires Hong Kong to become an even stronger international financial centre," he said.

On reform and innovation, He said Hong Kong was already known for being innovative and stressed that being "steadfast on the path" was "the only way to make further progress".

He emphasised the central government's support for Hong Kong in its effort to strengthen the banking sector, promote inclusiveness and attractiveness of the capital market, expand the bond market and enrich offshore renminbi offerings.

It also supported the city's efforts to deepen its international asset management centre and wealth management centre capabilities and go bigger on new industries such as green finance, fintech and data finance and family office business.

On expanding cooperation and opening up, the state leader pointed out that internationalisation was a distinctive advantage of Hong Kong under the "one country, two systems" model of governance and its common law system, adding that the city must attract talent to its shores.

"We have to draw on the experience of financial reform and the city remains at the forefront of financial development," He said.

The vice-premier also highlighted Hong Kong's prominent links with the rest of the world and its strategic advantages, advising the city to leverage its unique ability when it came to opening up and attracting foreign capital.

"Hong Kong has our support in its bid to keep its characteristics, give full play to its strengths, develop more exchanges with the world, expand international financial cooperation, leverage on emerging markets, and attract more international capital, first-class organisations and talent to come."

On dovetailing with national developments, the vice-premier assured that central authorities would strengthen the foundation of Hong Kong's financial development as the city linked the rest of the country to the outside world, and again emphasised its prominent strategic position.

He pointed out that central authorities had supported Hong Kong's enhancement of its role as an international investment and financial platform for the Belt and Road Initiative and as a key node in terms of capital flows.

The state leader called on Hong Kong to make good use of the Greater Bay Area to enhance and expand its financial services. The bay area refers to Beijing's ambitious initiative to turn Hong Kong, Macau and nine mainland cities into an economic powerhouse. In their speeches, the state leader and top mainland financial officials were upbeat about Hong Kong's prospects, offering messages to bolster its standing and coming a few months after Beijing adopted a milestone resolution at its third plenary session in July to further deepen reform and advance Chinese modernisation.

Li Yunze, the minister of the National Financial Regulatory Administration, said: "We will do our job as the regulator as we faithfully implement policies and measures to support Hong Kong's long term prosperity and stability."

He added that the administration would encourage more mainland banks and insurers to set up their headquarters in Hong Kong.

"[Stimulus measures] are paying off," said Zhu Hexin, the deputy governor of the People's Bank of China, adding that authorities would continue to create a favourable business environment for foreign investors and business leaders coming to the country. Among those in the audience was Qi Bin, the former vice-president of China's sovereign wealth fund, who has been newly appointed as a deputy director of the central government's liaison office in Hong Kong. Commenting on his Facebook page, Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu, who was en route home from the Apec meeting in Peru, welcomed He's remarks, saying they reflected Beijing's support for Hong Kong as an international financial centre.

"The government will use this summit to tell Hong Kong's story to international financial leaders, and will continue to reform the financial sector, consolidate and enhance Hong Kong's status as an international financial centre, and give full play to Hong Kong's unique advantages of being backed by the motherland and connected to the world," he wrote.

At the summit, Financial Secretary Paul Chan Mo-po said Hong Kong was seeking opportunities everywhere, including by joining hands with sister cities in the bay area.

"We're building on strong foundations. Hong Kong is blessed with world-class scientific research capabilities, a vibrant start-up network and growing technological collaborations in the Greater Bay Area," he said.

Chan also sought to dispel misconceptions about the outflow of funds, saying bank deposits in the city had risen by more than 13 per cent, or US$250 billion, since the beginning of 2022 until September this year while investors from overseas accounted for more than half of its total assets under management. He later pledged on his Facebook page that he would continue to spearhead financial regulators and relevant government departments to fully implement He's three suggestions with a view to actively contributing to the nation's financial development.

Analysts said the vice-premier's remarks showed the central government's firm support in strengthening the city's status as a global financial hub and restoring investors' confidence.

Regina Ip Lau Suk-yee, convenor of the Executive Council, the government's key decision-making body, said Hong Kong should get on with reform because the speed of development was slow and the cost was still too high.

"We can't rely on just one old trick – mass tourism. We must upgrade and enhance Hong Kong's own attractions," she said.

Ip said Hong Kong was still a long way behind New York in terms of the "breadth and depth" of its financial market. "We need to do more work to promote the vitality of our stock markets and connectivity with global capital markets," she said.

Lawmaker Johnny Ng Kit-chong said He had a clear upbeat message, urging Hong Kong to consolidate its status as an international financial centre.

"He emphasises the importance of Hong Kong to Beijing, which is beneficial to restoring foreign investment and investors' confidence."

After long legal battle, Hong Kong's 47 democrats brace for sentencing

18 November 2024, Reuters, James Pomfret and Jessie Pang

A Hong Kong court will this week sentence 45 democratic campaigners in a major national security trial, with potentially heavy jail terms poised to further damage the financial hub's once lively pro-democracy movement, critics say.

In May, 14 of the 47 democrats were found guilty of the charge of conspiracy to commit subversion, and two were acquitted. Earlier, 31 had pleaded guilty, hoping for reduced sentences.

The U.S. has described the trial and its guilty verdicts as "politically motivated", opens new tab, while demanding the defendants be released.

Hong Kong authorities say the legal process has been impartial, while condemning critical comments from Western democracies as baseless and "malicious smearing".

On Tuesday, three national security judges hand-picked by the government for this trial will conclude the legal saga that began with the democrats' arrests in January 2021. Jail terms are expected to range from several years for participants to possible life imprisonment for principal offenders.

The charges of conspiracy to commit subversion followed unofficial primary elections held in July 2020 to maximise the democrats' chances of winning a majority in an upcoming legislative council election. The convictions have silenced some of the most popular and determined pro-democratic voices, according to an examination of social media posts and interviews with lawyers and relatives of half a dozen defendants.

"This case has swept away the entire pro-democracy camp in Hong Kong," said Emilia Wong, the girlfriend of one of the defendants, Ventus Lau.

Prior to the trial, the democrats had existed in the space promised when Hong Kong returned from British to Chinese rule in 1997 under a "one country, two systems" formula granting the city wide-ranging freedoms denied to those in mainland China.

But critics say this model suffered with China's imposition of a national security law in July 2020 after pro-democracy protests swept the city a year earlier.

Hong Kong leader updates Xi Jinping on city's progress at Apec summit in Peru

17 November 2024, SCMP, Edith Lin

Hong Kong's John Lee met Chinese president on at least four occasions during visit to South America for Apec summit

Hong Kong's leader took the opportunity to update Chinese President Xi Jinping on the city's economy and development as they met several times during the Apec summit in Peru, with Xi offering his encouragement, the chief executive has said.

Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu also said on Saturday (local time) that Xi used the event in Lima to discuss China's agricultural development, Peru's culture and agricultural resources, and highlight the potential of the Beijing-funded Chancay Port in the South American country.

"President Xi has always been caring about Hong Kong. I have reported to him [Hong Kong's] situation regarding [the] economy and development. He is well-versed [in] our development and has given me encouragement," he said.

"We also talked about the role and contribution of the construction and the operation of the port of Chancay in Peru because it is a new development that will facilitate trade in goods, logistics and also the shipping industry. It will also help [the] supply chain."

The port is one of the Belt and Road Initiative's signature projects in Latin America. The initiative, endorsed by Xi in late 2013, aims to improve trade and economic integration spanning economies around the world.

Lee said he was "very much impressed and inspired" by his discussions with Xi and expressed gratitude for his continuous care and guidance.

Lee met Xi on at least four occasions during the Hong Kong leader's stay in Lima, where the city leader oversaw the signing of a free-trade deal with Peru and attended the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (Apec) summit. The pair entered the conference venue in the Lima Convention Centre together to attend the Apec Economic Leaders' Retreat with representatives from other economies.

Before the meeting started, Xi and Lee were seen smiling and chatting. They also sat next to each other at a round table discussion.

As Vietnamese President Luong Cuong greeted Xi for about a minute, Lee stood to the side, listened and shook hands with the Southeast Asian leader.

Xi and Lee also flanked Peruvian President Dina Boluarte in the first row for a group photo of leaders and representatives from 21 economies. The trio had brief exchanges before the photo shoot.

During the gala dinner for Apec leaders at the Peruvian Presidential Palace on Friday night (local time), Xi engaged in several exchanges with Lee as they watched cultural performances.

Lee also welcomed Xi upon his arrival at Jorge Chavez International Airport on Thursday (local time). The pair shook hands and had a brief exchange.

It is understood that Lee did not have separate meetings with Xi on the summit's sidelines, which is not unusual.

Financial Secretary Paul Chan Mo-po, who represented the US-sanctioned city leader at the Apec summit in San Francisco last year, chatted with Xi twice for several minutes.

Lee did not meet Xi separately during the Apec summit in Thailand in 2022, which was the Hong Kong leader's first overseas trip since taking office.

Lee told the press at the time that he had briefed Xi about Hong Kong's situation and understood that leaders had tight schedules.

In 2016, Xi met then city leader Leung Chun-ying on the sidelines of the Apec summit, also held in Peru, to warn that Hong Kong had no room for independence under the "one country, two systems" governing principle.

Mainland further eases travel to Hong Kong and Macao

15 November 2024, China Daily

China has taken another step to expedite residents' trips between the Chinese mainland and the Hong Kong and Macao special administrative regions by introducing "certificate free" clearance for travelers.

The National Immigration Administration said in a statement on Friday it has chosen the Shenzhen Bay Port and the Gongbei Port, both in Guangdong province, to exercise the new approach.

From Wednesday, residents in the mainland aged 14 years and above, who hold a valid travel document to Hong Kong and Macao, as well as an endorsement for multiple-entry to Hong Kong or Macao, will be able to pass the two ports without showing the paperwork.

Instead, they need to undergo fingerprint and facial checks for clearance, the administration said.

The case is the same for Hong Kong and Macao residents aged 14 and above, who hold a valid mainland travel permit, including non-Chinese residents.

The measures are introduced to further facilitate travel between the mainland and Hong Kong and Macao, the administration said, adding that the measures do not apply to mainland residents who hold a permit for exit and entry for public affairs.

China hawk Rubio likely to take hard line on Hong Kong but Beijing well prepared: experts

14 November 2024, SCMP, Natalie Wong and Willa Wu

Donald Trump's pick for US secretary of state previously had a key role in getting bills against Hong Kong passed

Marco Rubio, picked by US President-elect Donald Trump to be the country's top diplomat, is expected to amplify Washington's hawkish policies toward Hong Kong even as Beijing is better prepared to mitigate the potential impacts, analysts and officials in the city have said.

The 53-year-old Florida senator, named by Trump on Wednesday as his choice for secretary of state, was previously sanctioned by Beijing and is banned from entering the country. He is one of China's harshest critics in the US and was behind bills to sanction Hong Kong officials and close the city's trade offices on American soil.

With another China hawk joining the incoming administration, political observers and officials said they expected that Trump's top picks would lead Washington to step up confrontations with Beijing in a variety of areas.

Rubio, also an outspoken politician on Hong Kong affairs, is likely to adopt a tough stance in potential talks with the Chinese government regarding jailed former media tycoon Jimmy Lai Chee-ying.

"Rubio will be a key executor of foreign policies of Trump, who sees China as a major rival in semiconductors and other technologies," said Wilson Chan Wai-shun, co-founder and director of policy research at the Pagoda Institute think tank.

"He is likely to amplify certain policies, for example sanctions and restrictions, to cover Hong Kong and maximise the impacts [to contain China]."

Rubio paying attention to Hong Kong issues was widely known since 2014, when he supported protesters in the Occupy movement calling for greater democracy. The movement paralysed parts of the city for 79 days.

The Republican senator had called on the Obama administration to "make clear to China that it must abide by its international commitments regarding Hong Kong's status".

At the height of the 2019 anti-government protests in Hong Kong, Rubio wrote an op-ed published in The Washington Post, saying the US should not "watch from the sidelines" and had "more than just a 'nuclear option' of ending Hong Kong's special status under US law".

Rubio also played a key role in steering the Hong Kong Human Rights and Democracy Act through Congress in 2019, passed via a fast-tracked process with bipartisan support. The bill reviewed the city's special trade relationship with the United States and allowed for the sanctioning of mainland Chinese and Hong Kong officials deemed to have undermined human rights.

The senator was in turn sanctioned twice by China in 2020. The first instance was in retaliation for US measures against senior mainland officials over the treatment of the Uyghur ethnic minority group. The second was after mainland and Hong Kong officials were sanctioned following Beijing's imposition of the national security law in Hong Kong.

Chan, an international relations expert, said China's sanctions against Rubio would prompt him to adopt a tougher stance during possible appeals to Beijing regarding the high-profile cases of Lai and the 47 activists accused of violating the national security law.

Forty-five of the 47 opposition figures have been found guilty of taking part in a conspiracy to commit subversion in relation to their roles in an unofficial primary election four years ago, and will be sentenced on Tuesday.

Lai is expected to take the witness box the next day to defend himself against foreign collusion and sedition charges in a separate case.

"As a top China hawk familiar with Hong Kong's advocacy in the Senate, Rubio must be a key person to be involved in any potential high-level talks. Already sanctioned by Beijing, he will have no reservations in pushing his agenda," Chan said.

Before he was elected, Trump had vowed that he would "100 per cent" get Lai, the imprisoned founder of the defunct Apple Daily newspaper, out of the country.

Chan said he also expected that Rubio would help Trump in plugging the trade "loophole" of Hong Kong, seen as a key port to bypass US sanctions against authoritarian regimes.

He added that Rubio would put more Hong Kong companies on the US' trade restriction list, known as the Entity List, for violations against regulations that prevent dual-use technologies from reaching Russia. Lawmaker Rock Chen Chung-nin predicted that Hong Kong would experience some "spillover effects" from the new US administration's policies targeting China. "Possible attacks from the US on Hong Kong might include undermining the city's status as an international financial centre and placing more restrictions on Hong Kong businesses to invest in their market," he said.

But Chen said the outlook for Hong Kong was not all gloom and doom as the country was well-prepared for possible anti-China tactics from Trump's return to office.

Apart from restrictions on trade, Rubio was also behind several other bipartisan bills relating to Hong Kong, including one that facilitated Hongkongers securing refugee status in the US in response to the national security law, and another that could lead to the closure of Hong Kong's three economic and trade offices in the country.

The bipartisan Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office (HKETO) Certification Act, which passed the House in September, must now clear the full Senate, Congress' upper chamber, before it can be sent to Trump to be signed into law.

Regina Ip Lau Suk-yee, convenor of the government's key decision-making Executive Council, said Rubio's views were based on "fundamental misunderstandings" about Hong Kong and its high degree of autonomy as enshrined in the Basic Law, the city's mini-constitution.

She urged Rubio to visit Hong Kong after he was appointed to lead the US State Department, to see the true situation in the city rather than relying on the views of a small minority of Hongkongers who had a "twisted" view of the "one country, two systems" governing principle.

Ip, also a lawmaker and chairwoman of the New People's Party, earlier said she was planning a visit to Washington next year and hoped to meet local officials and US Congress members.

Hong Kong inmate denied early release under security law 'treated unfairly', court told

22 October 2024, SCMP, Brian Wong

Adam Ma's lawyers argue in court that Correctional Services Department failed to provide timely reasons in support of decision

A Hong Kong man convicted of inciting secession has complained of procedural unfairness over the prison service's refusal to grant him early release under the domestic national security law.

Adam Ma Chun-man's lawyers said on Tuesday that the Correctional Services Department had failed to provide timely reasons in support of a decision on March 23 this year to deny him a good behaviour reduction on his five-year sentence.

They told a High Court hearing their client was only given a day to consider whether he would make any "representation" over the decision made by the commissioner of correctional services under the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance.

It was only after Ma filed a written statement on March 25 that he received a prison committee's "summary of consideration" in relation to the refusal, the court heard.

Ma, a former food delivery worker, has lodged an application for judicial review asking the court to order his immediate release from Tong Fuk Correctional Institution on Lantau Island.

The prison service has denied Ma early discharge on the grounds that a contrary decision would not be in the nation's interests.

As a general rule, a prisoner's sentence can be cut by a third for good conduct while in custody.

But the ordinance, mandated under Article 23 of the Basic Law, the city's mini-constitution, stipulates that a prisoner convicted of national security offences "must not be granted remission" unless the commissioner is satisfied the move will not compromise national security.

A prison committee tasked with assessing inmates convicted of a national security offence concluded that "no information shows that if remission is granted to Mr Ma, he will not be detrimental to national security".

It said it had considered Ma's behaviour in jail, rehabilitation progress and psychological assessment. It noted that he "was not enthusiastic in participating in rehabilitation programmes" and "would not reveal his genuine feelings".

The department's Superintendent Lo Ho-kuen, who was called to testify in court over the circumstances of Ma's complaint, said an English summary of the committee's explanation was available as early as March 23, the day the ordinance took effect.

Lo acknowledged that he made no attempt to ask his supervisor for a copy for Ma's reference and opted to deliver the decision to the inmate verbally the same day.

"I did not ask [my supervisor] in that way, as it was not required of me," Lo said.

He said Ma appeared emotionally disturbed by being denied early release, and the department decided to send him to hospital fearing “something might happen that night”.

But the superintendent maintained the prisoner was still capable of filing a complaint against the decision despite a lack of any reference material.

Steven Kwan Man-wai, for Ma, argued the decision was in breach of his client’s legitimate expectations for early release, as he was told verbally as early as February he could leave jail on March 25.

Kwan also highlighted the department’s “practice” of granting one-third remission to prisoners in general unless disciplinary offences were committed while behind bars.

That contention failed to convince Mr Justice Alex Lee Wan-tang, who is among the few jurists hand-picked by the city leader to adjudicate national security cases.

Lee pointed to a lack of evidence suggesting the department routinely reduced prisoners’ sentences without thorough consideration.

He noted the commissioner “simply had no power” to refer a national security offender’s case to a statutory supervision board under the Security Bureau for consideration of early release if the required threshold was not met.

The judge also stressed he could not substitute himself for the commissioner in making decisions on national security threats.

The hearing continues on Wednesday.

Ma, known as the “second-generation Captain America” for dressing as the Marvel character in anti-government protests, was convicted and jailed for promoting Hong Kong independence through the chanting of slogans in public and in media interviews.

The act is banned by the national security law imposed by Beijing in June 2020, which also criminalises subversion, terrorism and collusion with foreign forces.

Beijing urges HSBC to keep backing mainland China and Hong Kong’s development push

19 October 2024, SCMP, Jeffie Lam

Xia Baolong, Beijing’s point man on Hong Kong affairs, issues call in meeting with HSBC group chairman Mark Tucker

Beijing’s point man on Hong Kong affairs has called on HSBC to continue contributing to both the country’s development and the financial hub’s economy in a meeting with group chairman Mark Tucker in the nation’s capital.

Xia Baolong, director of the Hong Kong and Macau Affairs Office (HKMAO), praised the financial services giant for its optimism towards the development of the country in the Friday meeting. He also underscored Beijing’s support for maintaining Hong Kong’s “unique status and strengths”.

Britain’s foreign secretary, David Lammy, started his two-day visit to the country on the same day, calling for dialogue to fully resume between London and Beijing.

In the Friday discussion, which was also attended by HKMAO executive deputy director Zhou Ji, Xia called on HSBC to continue to play to its strengths, actively participate in the country’s high-quality development and opening-up, and contribute to Hong Kong’s prosperity.

“Xia emphasised it is China’s long-standing national policy to ensure the comprehensive, accurate and unswerving implementation of the ‘one country, two systems’ governing principle,” the office said.

“The central government will always fully support Hong Kong in maintaining its unique status and strengths, maintain a free, open and regularised business environment and create better conditions for enterprises from different countries and regions to develop in Hong Kong.”

Peter Wong Tung-shun, non-executive chairman of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, and David Liao, co-chief executive of HSBC Asia-Pacific, were among those in the delegation led by Tucker.

Lau Siu-kai, a consultant at Beijing’s semi-official think tank, the Chinese Association of Hong Kong and Macau Studies, said the meeting was part of the central government’s bid to help attract and retain foreign companies that do business in the city amid heightened geopolitical tensions.

“The United States and some European countries have been calling on Western companies not to invest in Hong Kong,” Lau said. “Beijing wants to send a strong message that Hong Kong remains a good place for business and that the political changes over the past few years should not be a deterrent.”

He added that the timing reinforced Xia’s message as the meeting coincided with the visit by Lammy, who said engagement with China was “pragmatic and necessary”.

Last November, Xia also met British-owned conglomerate Swire Group in Shenzhen, praising it for its long-term presence in Hong Kong and its support for one country, two systems.

He similarly urged the company to contribute to the country’s development.

Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu at the time lauded Xia’s meeting with Swire, saying it would help improve understanding regarding policy directions and help to encourage investment.

China heightens surveillance in Hong Kong; critics and citizens on alert

10 October 2024, ANI

Hong Kong city's police have started a campaign under which the authorities would install thousands of cameras in the city to elevate their surveillance capabilities.

Despite consistently being ranked among the world's safest big cities, police in Hong Kong have cited crime as the reason for deeper penetration of CCTVs in the city which critics believe have the possibility of being equipped with powerful facial recognition and artificial intelligence tools, CNN reported.

Hong Kong police had previously set a target of installing 2,000 new surveillance cameras this year, and eventually increasing the number over the years. CNN noted that the police in Hong Kong aim to eventually introduce facial recognition to these cameras, security chief Chris Tang told local media in July - adding that police could use AI in the future to track down suspects.

In a statement to CNN, the Hong Kong Police Force said it was studying how police in other countries use surveillance cameras, including how they use AI. But it's not clear how many of the new cameras may have facial recognition capabilities, or whether there's a timeline for when the tech will be introduced.

Hong Kong held disruptive protests in 2019 to complain about the Chinese mainland government interfering with the freedoms of the city and tightening measures under the garb of national security. The new laws brought in place have been used to jail activists, journalists and political opponents, and target civil society groups and outspoken media outlets.

Fears of mainland-style surveillance and policing caused notable angst during the 2019 protests, which broadened to encompass many Hong Kongers' fears that the central Chinese government would encroach on the city's limited autonomy.

Justifying the attempt to increase surveillance in Hong Kong, the local newspapers said that Hong Kong saw 3 per cent increase in crime in the country. In their statement, police told CNN the new cameras would only monitor public places and delete footage after 31 days. They will follow existing personal data privacy laws, as well as "comprehensive and robust internal guidelines," police said, without elaborating on what those guidelines entailed.

Chinese government is known for its surveillance actions that have often been used to disrupt critics of the Chinese Communist Party.

Despite the CCP routinely assuring that technology will not be misused, it has been time and again seen to be used in more repressive ways, with

Xinjiang, a Muslim-majority Uyghur population area of China being routinely surveyed with invasive technologies. (ANI)

Hong Kong and mainland China broaden trade agreement to support local firms' expansion across border

10 October 2024, HKPF, Hillary Leung

The expansion of a trade services deal under the Mainland and Hong Kong Closer Economic Partnership Arrangement (CEPA) will benefit Hong Kong's role as an international finance and commercial centre, said the New People's Party.

Hong Kong has broadened a trade agreement with China, a move that will help local firms in sectors such as tourism and banking expand into the mainland market.

Financial Secretary Paul Chan and China's Ministry of Commerce representative Li Yongjie signed an agreement on Wednesday to expand a trade services deal under the Mainland and Hong Kong Closer Economic Partnership Arrangement (CEPA).

The expansion introduces "new liberalisation measures" such as relaxing qualification requirements for Hong Kong professionals, as well as easing restrictions on the export of services to the mainland Chinese market.

The measures cover around half a dozen sectors including financial services, telecommunications, television and tourism, and come as Hong Kong's economy continues to lag behind the pre-pandemic era.

"The further liberalisation measures under the CEPA Amendment Agreement will enable Hong Kong firms and professional sectors to go into the mainland market a lot easier," Chan told reporters after the signing ceremony.

Businesses are keen to expand into the mainland, Chan said, adding that the agreement would create a "very positive impact on Hong Kong."

Under the expanded arrangement, which will come into effect next March, television dramas produced in Hong Kong can be broadcast during prime time in mainland China upon approval. In the financial services sector, Hong Kong financial institutions will no longer have to meet the asset requirement of US$2 billion before investing in shares of insurance companies across the border.

'Breakthroughs'

Signed in 2003, free trade deal CEPA aimed at promoting joint economic prosperity in Hong Kong and mainland China through strengthening trade cooperation across industries. An agreement on the trading of services was made in 2016.

Under CEPA, Hong Kong and mainland China do not apply tariffs to each other's exports of services. They also encourage mutual recognition of professional qualifications and promote the exchange of talent.

Before the latest amendment, the most recent modifications were made in 2019, when authorities on both sides agreed to liberalisation measures in sectors such as financial services, legal services and film.

Wednesday's announcement on the further expansion was welcomed by industry groups and political parties, who said it would give Hong Kong firms greater access to the mainland market.

"The amendment not only provides greater development opportunity for Hong Kong's strategic service industries but also further integrates the Greater Bay Area," the Federation of Hong Kong Industries' chairperson Steve Chuang said in a statement.

Regina Ip, the chairperson of the pro-Beijing New People's Party, said there were several "breakthroughs" in the amendment. She highlighted the scrapping of a rule requiring companies to have at least three years of experience to qualify for benefits under CEPA, as well as the lifting of restrictions for Hong Kong firms.

The new amendment will significantly benefit Hong Kong's role as a financial, commercial and professional services centre, the party's statement read.

Hong Kong plans to install thousands of surveillance cameras. Critics say it's more proof the city is moving closer to China

05 October 2024, CNN, Jessie Yeung

Glance up while strolling through parts of downtown Hong Kong and, chances are, you'll notice the glassy black lens of a surveillance camera trained on the city's crowded streets.

And that sight will become more common in the coming years, as the city's police pursue an ambitious campaign to install thousands of cameras to elevate their surveillance capabilities.

Though it consistently ranks among the world's safest big cities, police in the Asian financial hub say the new cameras are needed to fight crime – and have raised the possibility of equipping them with powerful facial recognition and artificial intelligence tools.

That's sparked alarm among some experts who see it as taking Hong Kong one step closer to the pervasive surveillance systems of mainland China, warning of the technology's repressive potential.

Hong Kong police had previously set a target of installing 2,000 new surveillance cameras this year, and potentially more than that each subsequent year.

The force plans to eventually introduce facial recognition to these cameras, security chief Chris Tang told local media in July – adding that police could use AI in the future to track down suspects.

In a statement to CNN, the Hong Kong Police Force said it was studying how police in other countries use surveillance cameras, including how they use AI. But it's not clear how many of the new cameras may have facial recognition capabilities, or whether there's a timeline for when the tech will be introduced.

Tang and the Hong Kong police have repeatedly pointed to other jurisdictions, including Western democracies, that also make wide use of surveillance cameras for law enforcement. For instance, Singapore has 90,000 cameras and the United Kingdom has more than seven million, Tang told local newspaper Sing Tao Daily in June.

While some of those places, like the UK, have started using facial recognition cameras, experts say these early experiments have highlighted the need for careful regulation and privacy protections. Hong Kong police told CNN they would "comply with relevant laws" and follow strong internal guidelines – but haven't elaborated in depth on what that would look like.

And, some critics say, what sets Hong Kong apart from other places is its political environment – which has seen an ongoing crackdown on political dissent, as it draws closer to authoritarian mainland China.

Following unprecedented and often violent anti-government protests that rocked the city in 2019, local and central authorities imposed sweeping national security laws that have been used to jail activists, journalists and political opponents, and target civil society groups and outspoken media outlets.

Hong Kong's leaders have said the laws are needed to restore stability after the protests in the nominally semi-autonomous city, and argue their legislation is similar to other national security laws around the world.

"The difference is how the technology is being used," said Samantha Hoffman, a nonresident fellow at the National Bureau of Asian Research who has studied China's use of technology for security and propaganda.

Places like the United States and the UK may have problems with how they implement that technology, too – but "this is fundamentally different... It has to do specifically with the system of government, as well as the way that the party state... uses the law to maintain its own power," said Hoffman.

What this means for Hong Kong

Hong Kong has more than 54,500 public CCTV cameras used by government bodies – about seven cameras per 1,000 people, according to an estimate by Comparitech, a UK-based technology research firm.

That puts it about on par with New York City and still far behind London (13 per 1,000 people), but nowhere near mainland Chinese cities, which average about 440 cameras per 1,000 people.

Fears of mainland-style surveillance and policing caused notable angst during the 2019 protests, which broadened to encompass many Hong Kongers' fears that the central Chinese government would encroach on the city's limited autonomy.

Protesters on the streets covered their faces with masks and goggles to prevent identification, at times smashing or covering security cameras. At one point, they tore down a "smart" lamp post, even though Hong Kong authorities said it was only meant to collect data on traffic, weather and pollution.

At the time, activist and student leader Joshua Wong – who is now in prison on charges related to his activism and national security – said, "Can the Hong Kong government ensure that they will never install facial recognition tactics into the smart lamp post? ... They can't promise it and they won't because of the pressure from Beijing."

Across the border, the model of surveillance that protesters feared is ubiquitous – with China often celebrating the various achievements of its real-time facial recognition algorithms, and exporting surveillance technology to countries around the world.

According to an analysis by Comparitech, eight of the top 10 most surveilled cities in the world per capita are in China, where facial recognition is an inescapable part of daily life – from the facial scans required to register a new phone number, to facial recognition gates in some subway stations.

During the Covid-19 pandemic, the government mandated a QR "health code" to track people's health status, which in some places required facial scans.

But the technology has also been used in more repressive ways.

In the far-western region of Xinjiang, Beijing has used cameras to monitor members of the Muslim-majority Uyghur population. And when unprecedented nationwide protests broke out in late 2022 against the government's strict Covid policies, police used facial recognition along with other sophisticated surveillance tools to track down protesters, The New York Times found.

"(China's) public security surveillance systems ... tend to track lists of particular people, maybe people with a history of mental illness or participation in protests, and make a note of people who are marked as being troublesome in some way," Hoffman said.

The systems then "track those specific people across the city and across its surveillance network."

"I think it's fair to anticipate that the use of CCTV and facial recognition technology in Hong Kong will begin to look a lot like those in mainland China over time," she said.

Hong Kong police have argued the cameras help fight crime, pointing to a pilot program earlier this year of 15 cameras installed in one district. Already, those cameras have provided evidence and clues for at least six crimes, Tang told Sing Tao Daily – and police will prioritize high-risk or high-crime areas for the remaining cameras.

The first five months of this year saw 3% more crimes than the same period last year, Sing Tao reported.

In their statement, police told CNN the new cameras would only monitor public places and delete footage after 31 days. They will follow existing personal data privacy laws, as well as "comprehensive and robust internal guidelines," police said, without elaborating on what those guidelines entailed.

When considering AI-equipped cameras, "the police will definitely comply with relevant laws," the force added.

But several experts interviewed by CNN cast doubt on whether those existing laws, written decades ago with broad exemptions for police, will be enough.

Steve Tsang, director of the SOAS China Institute at the University of London, warned that the new cameras could be "used for political repression" if they are employed under the "draconian" national security law.

Unless authorities assure the public that the cameras won't be used for that purpose, "this is likely to be a further step in making Hong Kong law enforcement closer to how it is done on the Chinese mainland," he said.

How to regulate facial recognition

Other experts argued it's far too soon to say what the impact will be in Hong Kong, since authorities have not laid out in detail how they would use the technology.

"Hong Kong law doesn't, in all measures, mirror what happens in mainland China," said Normann Witzleb, an associate professor in data protection and privacy at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, But that's why it's all the more important for authorities to address a raft of yet-unanswered questions, he said.

For instance, it remains unclear whether Hong Kong will deploy live facial recognition that constantly scans the environment, or whether the tech will only be applied to past footage when certain crimes occur or when legal authorization is granted.

Witzleb also raised the question of who would have the power to authorize the use of facial recognition, and what situations may warrant it. Would it be used to prosecute crime and locate suspects, for example – or for other public safety measures like identifying missing people?

And, Witzleb added, will police run the technology through their existing image databases, or use it more broadly with images held by other public authorities, or even publicly available imagery of anyone?

"It's important to design guidelines for those systems that take proper recognition of the potential benefits that they have, but that also acknowledge they're not foolproof, and that they have the potential to interfere with (people's) rights in serious ways," Witzleb said.

Regardless of how facial recognition might be used, both Hoffman and Witzleb said the presence of that technology and the increased number of security cameras may make Hong Kongers feel less free under the ever-watchful eye of the police.

"When you feel like you're being monitored, that affects your behavior and your feelings of freedom as well," Hoffman said. "I think that there's an element of state coercion that doesn't need to have to do with the effectiveness of the technology itself."

Amnesty International recognizes three activists as prisoners of conscience

02 October 2024, Amnesty International

Amnesty International today designated three prominent human rights defenders from Hong Kong and mainland China as prisoners of conscience.

Human rights lawyers Chow Hang-tung and Ding Jiaxi, along with the free media advocate Jimmy Lai, are all currently imprisoned solely because of their peaceful human rights activism. Amnesty International has called for their immediate release.

"As the Chinese government touts progress on its measures to promote human rights, the stories of these three human rights defenders demonstrate a starkly different reality inside the country," said Sarah Brooks, Amnesty International's China Director.

"Meeting with diplomats; discussing politics; complaining about unfair treatment in police custody; talking with friends over dinner: these are all things that can get you jailed in today's China.

"The ongoing detentions of Chow, Ding and Lai demonstrate the continuing failure of the authorities in China to uphold their international obligations, and their prosecution lays bare the cowardice of state officials who cannot accept criticism, whether from international experts or from their own citizens."

Jimmy Lai and Chow Hang-tung have both been targeted amidst a broader dismantling of human rights and civic space in Hong Kong since the introduction of a Beijing-imposed National Security Law (NSL) in 2020. Ding Jiaxi, as with many human rights defenders in mainland China, is the direct victim of the authorities' overly broad and vague 'national security-related' laws that justify convictions in secret trials and lengthy jail sentences.

Amnesty International considers a prisoner of conscience to be any person imprisoned solely because of their political, religious or other conscientiously held beliefs, their ethnic origin, sex, colour, language, national or social origin, socio-economic status, birth, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, or other status, and who has not used violence or advocated violence or hatred in the circumstances leading to their detention.

Jimmy Lai

Nearly 200 police raided Lai's Apple Daily newspaper shortly after the NSL was enacted. He was arrested along with several newspaper executives, and eventually charged with "colluding with foreign forces" under the NSL, and with sedition. Apple Daily closed in June 2021 following another police raid and the freezing of its assets, in what Amnesty International called a "flagrant attack on press freedom".

Lai faces a maximum sentence of life imprisonment in his ongoing national security trial. Hong Kong courts have already convicted Lai on four separate cases involving "unauthorized assemblies", for his engagement in peaceful protest – including attending a Tiananmen Square vigil. He has also been prosecuted for alleged "fraud"; as a result, Lai is already serving combined prison sentences which will see him spend nearly seven years unjustly behind bars.

Lai, who will turn 77 in December, has reportedly been held in solitary confinement, and there are serious concerns about his health, especially following the cancellation of his appearance in court in early June 2024. Those concerns are exacerbated by the lengthy delays in his NSL trial; begun in December 2023. After a long adjournment, it is currently expected to continue in November 2024.

Chow Hang-tung

Chow was charged in 2020 for participating in a peaceful vigil commemorating protesters killed in the 1989 Tiananmen crackdown, and charged again in 2021 after she asked people on social media to light candles in memory of the victims. She was jailed for 22 months for daring to commemorate their lives.

Chow also faces a potential 10-year prison sentence for "inciting subversion" under the NSL over her role as former leader of the Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Patriotic Democratic Movements of China, which organized the city's annual Tiananmen candlelight vigil for 30 years.

By designating Chow, Lai and Ding as prisoners of conscience, we stand with all those unjustly detained for saying out loud what they believe to be true.

Sarah Brooks

Despite her imprisonment, Chow has continued to use her legal knowledge to defend rights, including in 2022 to secure the lifting of reporting restrictions on bail hearings. Most recently, Chow mounted a legal challenge to rules that require women – but not men – to wear long trousers year-round in Hong Kong prisons, where temperatures regularly exceed 30 degrees Celsius in summer. In the past, Chow has suffered retaliation for such advocacy, including repeated periods of solitary confinement.

"Amnesty International and many others have highlighted the dangerous human rights flaws in the Hong Kong's National Security Law. But rather than taking steps to repeal the law, the Hong Kong government has instead doubled down by ramming through an equally-repressive local national security legislation (referred to as 'Article 23') in March of this year – increasing jail times for peaceful activism, even if it happens outside Hong Kong or mainland China," Sarah Brooks said.

Ding Jiayi

Ding was sentenced to 12 years in prison for "subverting state power" in April 2023. He is one of dozens of lawyers and activists targeted after attending an informal gathering held in the city of Xiamen in 2019, at which they discussed current affairs in China. Activist and legal scholar Xu Zhiyong, who had also attended the meeting, was sentenced to 14 years by the same court on the same charges.

Ding was held incommunicado, including in "residential surveillance at a designated location", for more than a year after being taken away on 26 December 2019. He was subjected to torture and other ill-treatment during detention, including long hours of interrogation and being bound to an iron "tiger-chair" with his limbs contorted for more than 10 hours per day for many days. For nearly four years, from his initial detention until his transfer to prison following his sentencing, Ding was not allowed access to pen and paper.

He reportedly faces serious restrictions in prison, including the withdrawal of "yard time". His right to communication is strictly limited to letters from direct family members, telephone calls are prohibited and he has limited access to reading materials.

"As part of its strategy to avoid scrutiny, the Chinese government routinely justifies ruthless repression – and rebuts efforts to hold authorities accountable for it – by describing it merely as 'internal affairs'. This is why the stories of Jimmy Lai, Chow Hang-tung and Ding Jiayi are so important. Theirs are the 'internal affairs' the Chinese authorities tell us don't deserve attention, dignity or justice," Sarah Brooks said.

"By designating Chow, Lai and Ding as prisoners of conscience, we stand with all those unjustly detained for saying out loud what they believe to be true. All three – along with the many others imprisoned in Hong Kong and mainland China solely for their beliefs – must be immediately and unconditionally released."

Prison sentences to Hong Kong journalists highlight China's suppression of opinion

27 September 2024, ANI

China continues to suppress the people who raise views critical of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). In the latest attempt at suppressing freedom of expression, China gave a jail sentence to journalists on sedition charges.

Two journalists belonging to a closed Hong Kong news site were sentenced to prison on Thursday for sedition charges. These journalists were former Stand News journalists Chung Pui-Kuen and Patrick Lam who were found guilty and fined last month for conspiring to publish and reproduce seditious articles VOA News reported.

The sentenced journalists had received sentences of 21 and 11 months respectively. However, Lam among the two had been immediately released due to medical reasons. Chung, Stand's former editor-in-chief, and Lam, the outlet's former acting editor-in-chief, both have denied all charges against them since their offices were first raided in 2021.

The same news report claimed that Chung aged 54, and Lam aged 36, had already spent more than 300 days in pretrial detentions. However, employees of the news website run by the sentenced journalists and the journalism fraternity claim that the news organization was a liberal one and followed long-standing principles and ethics of journalism.

According to the VOA News report Ronson Chan, a former editor at Stand News, said "I'm happy that Patrick Lam could be released at once, with the judge giving the sentence for the appropriate period, but I still feel sorry Chung needed to go back to jail for 10 months. He created a very good and liberal platform for us, journalists, and the staff of Stand News. We enjoyed a very good freedom of news and freedom of press. We had our own view to make what we thought was valuable to do. It seems Mr. Chung is the only person to pay for our liberalism and freedom."

Additionally, the Hong Kong Journalists Association said that the sentences given to these journalists expose the "real risks" for journalism in the region. A statement released by the organization over the matter stated

"The two men's convictions and sentences reflect the ongoing decline of press freedom in Hong Kong and the real dangers media workers in the territory are facing while performing their duties."

The VOA report added the statement of Aleksandra Bielakowska member of the Paris-based organization Reporters Without Borders stated that the sentences constitute "Yet another nail in the coffin for press freedom in Hong Kong, dangerously laying another red line for journalists in the city. Deliberately targeting independent media and its journalists has left a huge void in Hong Kong's media landscape that will be very difficult to rebuild. There are still a few independent media that try to keep up operations, but they are already tremendously afraid for their safety. This verdict is only underlining the reality that judges and courts are not fulfilling [their] duty of protecting residents but have become a political tool, used to threaten those who dare to speak independently, including journalists."

The VOA News report claimed that organizations like Stand News are among Hong Kong's last remaining media outlets which openly criticize the government. Organisations like these were aggressively attacked by the Beijing-backed political crackdown on pro-democracy protests in 2019.

After 2019, Beijing had imposed a National Security Law which had provisions of banning any secession, subversion and foreign interference. This law has resulted in arrests of at least 28 journalists and press freedom advocates out of which 10 still remain jailed. Moreover, this crackdown has forced shut shutdown of more than a dozen media outlets.

"There is nothing wrong with safeguarding national security, but allowing journalists to speak out and enabling society to speak freely is necessary to maintain Hong Kong's prosperity and stability and is also an important part of promoting the city's international image. Officials may insist that Hong Kong's press freedom is unhampered, but the public knows the truth." Hong Kong Journalists Association (HKJA) said in a statement.

As a result of suppression acts like these Hong Kong's international press freedom ranking has nosedived in recent years, to the 135th place in the Reporters Without Borders rankings for 2024 which once ranked at 18 in 2002, according to the group. (ANI)

China calls on Hong Kong tycoons to help kickstart national economy

27 September 2024, RFA, Ng Chi Ping

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

But the city's business families, many from Shanghai and Ningbo, have scant trust for the Chinese Communist Party.

The ruling Chinese Communist Party has called on Hong Kong's leader to mobilize the city's wealthiest families into kick-starting economic growth, although signs that any are answering the call have been thin on the ground.

Xia Baolong, who heads the ruling party's Hong Kong and Macao Work Office, "expressed the hope that all sectors of Hong Kong society, especially the business community and entrepreneurs, will unite as one and seize the opportunity to strive for economic development," the city's Chief Executive John Lee told reporters following a Sept. 20 meeting with Xia, as he attended an investment cooperation conference in Beijing.

Hong Kong's business community should "transform their love for their country and for Hong Kong into concrete and practical action, and work together to promote Hong Kong's ... prosperity," Xia told Lee during the meeting.

Xia's call to action echoes recent policy moves from Beijing to find a role for the private sector in boosting flagging economic growth, under Chinese President Xi Jinping's concept of "public-private partnerships," which analysts have warned could be a disguised asset grab by the government.

It also comes after Xi wrote to the descendants of the "Ningbo Gang" – wealthy Hong Kong families with roots in the eastern port city of Ningbo – in July, calling on them to "contribute to the dream of the rejuvenation of the Chinese nation," state media reported.

They included Anna Pao, eldest daughter of the late shipping magnate Sir Pao Yue-kong, and Ronald Chao, eldest son of the late industrialist Chao Kuang-piu, families whose business operations formed the backbone of much of Hong Kong's growth under British colonial rule.

Lee said the private sector in Hong Kong "are not bystanders, but participants, contributors and beneficiaries" of the city's economic rewards.

'Serve the country'

But commentators said there hasn't exactly been a big rush to respond to Beijing's call for investments on the part of Hong Kong's entrepreneurs.

The city's richest man, Li Ka-shing, has instead been stepping up his investments in the United Kingdom, with his CK Infrastructure Holdings acquiring a wind farm portfolio in from Aviva Investors for £350 million (US$450 million) in August, renewable power generator UU Solar for £90.8 million (US$122 million) in May, and natural gas distributor Phoenix Energy in April.

Exiled Hong Kong businessman Elmer Yuen, whose family hails from Ningbo, said Beijing has repeatedly called on Hong Kong's tycoons to "serve the country."

But he said there is unlikely to be much response, given that few business families from Ningbo and Shanghai trust the Chinese Communist Party.

"You can lump all of us together, us Shanghainese, most of whom are from Ningbo, and say that we have absolutely zero trust in the Chinese Communist Party," Yuen said.

"Maybe a small number of people will invest, but the rest already know who they're dealing with."

According to Xia Ming, professor of political science at the City University of New York, Lee is being tasked by Beijing to step up integration with neighboring Guangdong province and Macau, and provide a much-needed shot in the arm for the sluggish Chinese economy.

"Policy in today's Hong Kong is clearly about how to perfectly integrate Hong Kong into what Xi Jinping calls the China rejuvenation strategy, which is basically about controlling the economy," Xia told RFA Cantonese in a recent interview. "[Lee's aim] is to more perfectly integrate Hong Kong into China's accelerated regression."

Xia said the overall aim is to integrate Hong Kong into the mainland Chinese economy and "ultimately sell Hong Kong off to Beijing and to Xi Jinping."

"The goal of Xi Jinping's reforms is not that mainland China will become more like Hong Kong, but that Hong Kong will become more like Yan'an," he said in a reference to the revolutionary wartime base of Mao Zedong's communists.

Stimulus measures

The call for investments came as Chinese leaders announced a slew of stimulus measures to boost demand for real estate, including lower mortgage rates, fewer restrictions on buyers and tax cuts as part of "a new model" for real estate development.

On Tuesday, China's central bank, top securities regulator and financial regulator announced a raft of monetary stimulus, property market support and capital market strengthening measures to boost "high-quality economic development," state news agency Xinhua reported.

The top economic meeting, attended by Xi, also called on officials to "foster a favorable environment for the development of the non-public sector," with efforts made to boost consumption among low- and middle-income groups.

China has also extended a helping hand to Hong Kong in the form of pandas, with a ceremony at the Hong Kong International Airport on Thursday to welcome An An and Ke Ke, described by Lee as "just entering adulthood and full of energy" and likely to be a successful draw for tourists.

The giant pandas will live in a newly refurbished suite at the Ocean Park theme park complete with climbing frames and more plants.

"Citizens will join in welcoming the two giant pandas to Hong Kong, and the whole city is looking forward to it," Lee told reporters on Tuesday, adding that images of the pandas will be added to the Oct. 1 National Day drone and light show over Victoria Harbour.

Hong Kong is expecting an influx of up to 1.2 million mainland Chinese tourists to mark the 75th anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China, Lee said.

"We hope that everyone can celebrate the 75th anniversary of National Day together, and also bring in many business activities to increase business and tourism revenues," he said.

Hong Kong man jailed 14 months under new security law for 'seditious' online statements

21 September 2024, HongKong PF, James Lee

Au Kin-wai, 58, on Friday became the third person to be sentenced under Article 23 after pleading guilty to one count of "knowingly publishing publications that had a seditious intention" over statements he made online.

A Hong Kong court has convicted a third person under a new security law, sentencing him to one year and two months in prison for sedition over statements made on social media platforms.

Au Kin-wai, 58, appeared before Chief Magistrate Victor So at the West Kowloon Magistrates' Courts on Friday, where he pleaded guilty to one count of "knowingly publishing publications that had a seditious intention" over statements he made online. He was charged on June 21 over posts on social media platforms Facebook, X, and YouTube calling for the dissolution of the Chinese Communist Party, and for Chinese president Xi Jinping and Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee – both of whom he dubbed "dictators" – to step down.

He also invoked a Cultural Revolution-era slogan: "Revolution is no crime, to rebel is justified."

Au was charged under the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, known locally as Article 23. Separate to a national security law imposed by Beijing in 2020, the new legislation came into effect on March 23 after it was fast-tracked by the city's opposition-free legislature. An early attempt to pass Article 23 in 2003 ended in failure after mass protests.

Au's lawyer Steven Kwan said on Friday that he would withdraw a constitutional challenge on the law's limitations on free speech, after the city's top court last month allowed a similar challenge but not on the grounds that the sedition law imposed a disproportionate restriction on free speech.

Limited effect

Kwan on Friday contended that the court had to consider the minimal impact of Au's actions, saying that most of Au's 200-odd posts were repetitive, and that he only had about 20 followers on all four of his social media accounts. The counsel asked the court not to give too much weight to the protection of society as a sentencing factor, considering the defendant's limited reach.

However, So ruled that the court had the power to consider public safety in sentencing, as the concept fell within the scope of national security. The fact that Au made the posts with accounts under his real name was an indication that he had no regard for the law, So ruled.

"The element of deterrence in sentencing aims to prevent others from copying the crime... which is a general sentencing principle long established," So said.

So set the starting sentence at 18 months and added three months for further deterrence, having taken into account Au's prior conviction for sedition last December. Au was afforded a one-third sentence discount – the maximum given to a defendant for a timely guilty plea – bringing his sentence down to 14 months.

Third Article 23 conviction

Au is the third person to be sentenced for sedition under Article 23. On Thursday, Chung Man-kit was jailed for 10 months after pleading guilty over "seditious" bus graffiti, and Chu Kai-pong was sentenced to 14 months for sedition over wearing a T-shirt with 2019 protest slogan.

Under Article 23, sedition carries a maximum penalty of seven years in jail, or 10 years if the offender is found to have colluded with an "external force." The offence was previously punishable by up to two years in prison for a first offence, and up to three years for re-offenders.

The new legislation also raised the threshold for the early release of those imprisoned for offences endangering national security. Typically, prisoners can trim a third off their sentence for good behaviour.

The law has been criticised by rights NGOs, Western states and the UN as vague, broad and "regressive." Authorities, however, cited perceived foreign interference and a constitutional duty to "close loopholes" after the 2019 protests and unrest.

US lawmakers call on China to free Hong Kong Catholic, democracy advocate Jimmy Lai

20 September 2024, NCR Online

Abipartisan, bicameral group of lawmakers gathered Sept. 18 to call for the immediate release from prison of prominent Hong Kong Catholic, philanthropist and media mogul Jimmy Lai, who is facing a trial on what they called bogus charges.

Lai, who founded the now-defunct pro-democracy newspaper Apple Daily, protested in favor of democratic freedoms – such as freedom of the press and expression – in Hong Kong, which was designated a Special Administrative Region of China in 1997, when British rule of that region ended after more than 150 years. Following pro-democracy protests in 2019, China implemented a purported national security law the next year, which critics have said has been used to silence the Chinese Communist Party's critics.

Under that law, Lai was arrested in August 2020 and has been imprisoned since December 2020. He pleaded not guilty to the charges and faces life in prison.

U.S. lawmakers have called those charges trumped up and evidence the Chinese Communist Party is seeking to silence dissent.

Sen. Ben Cardin, D-Md., chair of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said lawmakers were seeking to draw attention to Lai ahead of the first day of the U.N. General Assembly's high-level general debate Sept. 24. The 79th session of the General Assembly opened Sept. 10.

"We've got all a lot of world leaders in New York, they're there in one place," he said. "Jimmy Lai's story needs to be told."

Lai's son, Sebastien Lai, who was in Washington at the lawmakers' event, said his father faces indignities in prison including solitary confinement.

"For his strong Catholic faith, he is denied Communion," the younger Lai said of his father.

The event featured several Catholic lawmakers who have been critical of the Chinese government including former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who still represents her state's 11th Congressional District, which includes most of San Francisco, and Reps. Chris Smith, R-N.J., and Jim McGovern, D-Mass.

Acknowledging Smith in the audience, Pelosi said, "What's beautiful about this issue is that it has always been strongly, unequivocally bipartisan in the House and in the Senate."

"The freedom of speech is the biggest, biggest defender of democracy, because it sheds light on what is happening, and that's why Jimmy, to me, was ... so courageous to do it, because he knew what the consequences could be, because they knew how powerful his voice has been, is and will continue to be in the future," Pelosi said. "So it's an honor for me to be with each and every one of you and others who have been working on this issue."

Smith thanked Pelosi for her efforts toward Lai's release and Hong Kong's freedom. He argued, "Injustice need not be forever."

"The time will come and I hope, will come soon, if we are resolute, if we use every lever at our disposal, every way of trying to influence Xi Jinping and his really murderous Chinese Communist Party" that Lai's release could be secured, Smith said.

McGovern issued a similar message, arguing Hong Kong's story "is still being written."

"For the government of the People's Republic of China and its newest puppet, the Hong Kong government, criminalizing the exercise of human rights is a sign of weakness," McGovern said. "It is a sign of fear. It means you don't think you can win the battles of ideas, the battle for the hearts and minds of your people. It means you are elevating power over the well-being of your people."

On its website, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, a bipartisan religious freedom watchdog, said Lai's imprisonment "inhibits religious freedom advocacy."

Hong Kong man sentenced to 14 months in jail for 'seditious' T-shirt

19 September 2024, Aljazeera

Chu Kai-pong is the first person to be convicted under Article 23, the China-ruled city's tough new national security law.

A Hong Kong man has been sentenced to 14 months in jail for wearing a T-shirt and a mask with protest slogans deemed "seditious", the first person to be convicted under the city's tough new national security law.

Chu Kai-pong, 27, was sentenced on Thursday at the West Kowloon Magistrates' Courts, having pleaded guilty earlier in the week to one count of "doing acts with seditious intention", an offence carrying a maximum penalty of 10 years in jail under the new legislation, known as Article 23.

Chu was arrested for wearing a T-shirt reading "Liberate Hong Kong, revolution of our times" and a yellow mask printed with "FDNOL" – shorthand for another pro-democracy slogan, "five demands, not one less" – on June 12, a date marking the fifth anniversary of the city's huge pro-democracy protests in 2019.

The 2019 protest movement was the most concerted challenge to the Hong Kong government since the former British colony returned to Chinese rule in 1997. It waned because of widespread arrests, the exile of democracy activists, the COVID-19 pandemic and China's imposition of an earlier security law in 2020.

Referring to the 2019 protests, Chief Magistrate Victor So – a judge handpicked by the government to hear national security cases – said on Thursday that Chu "took advantage of a symbolic day with the intention to reignite the ideas behind the unrest".

In January, the judge had sentenced Chu to three months in jail for wearing a similar T-shirt at the airport and possessing publications deemed seditious. He noted that Chu's "subsequent act" showed the "deterrent effect of his previous sentence was insufficient".

Quelling dissent

The sedition offence was created under British colonial rule, which ended in 1997, but was seldom used until Hong Kong authorities revived it in 2020 after the protests.

With the protests quashed, China imposed a national security law on the city in mid-2020 to quell further dissent.

The new national security law – the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, also known as Article 23 – came into force in March.

The revised law augments the offence of sedition to include inciting hatred against China's communist leadership, upping its jail sentence to a maximum penalty of 10 years if the sedition is conducted in collusion with an "external force".

Critics, including Western nations such as the United States, say Article 23 will further erode freedoms and silence dissent in Hong Kong – a finance hub once considered one of the freest territories in China. As of this month, 303 people have been arrested under the two security laws, with 176 prosecuted and 160 convicted.

Hong Kong man jailed for 10 months under new security law over 'seditious' graffiti left on back of bus seats

19 September 2024, Hong Kong FP, James Lee

Chung Man-kit pleaded guilty to three counts of "doing with a seditious intention an act or acts that had a seditious intention" over messages written on the back of bus seats in March and April.

A Hong Kong man charged under Hong Kong's new security law has been sentenced to 10 months in jail after pleading guilty over writing "seditious" graffiti on bus seats.

Chung Man-kit appeared before Chief Magistrate Victor So at the West Kowloon Magistrates' Courts on Thursday, where he entered a guilty plea for three counts of "doing with a seditious intention an act or acts that had a seditious intention." He was then sentenced to 10 months in jail.

The 29-year-old also faced two property damage charges, which were dropped on Thursday.

Chung was arrested on June 23 on suspicion of "writing words with seditious intention on multiple occasions on the back of bus seats on different public buses in March and April" in contravention of the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance.

The offending phrases, written between March 23 and April 21, included the 2019 protest slogan "Liberate Hong Kong, revolution of our times," and others advocating independence, including "Hong Kong independence, the only way out." The former was ruled capable of inciting secession during the city's first trial under a Beijing-imposed security law in 2021.

The court on Thursday heard that Chung admitted to writing the slogans under police caution. In a recorded interview, he said that he was aware that the slogans he wrote were widely used during protests five years ago.

Chung also said that he had written the slogans as he believed he had the right to criticise the government and to exercise his right to free speech, even though he knew there was a risk that he would be prosecuted for endangering national security.

So ruled that Chung had written statements endangering national security and advocating Hong Kong independence on multiple occasions. He added that although the slogans were written on seats towards the back of the bus, they were still visible to the public. Society would "fall into chaos" if he was not stopped, So ruled.

So handed down a partial concurrent sentence for the three offences starting at 15 months, then discounted to 10 months after taking into consideration Chung's guilty plea.

Homegrown security law

Article 23 targets treason, insurrection, sabotage, external interference, sedition, theft of state secrets and espionage. It was fast-tracked through the city's opposition-free legislature earlier this year and enacted on March 23, two decades after an attempt to pass similar legislation failed after mass protests in 2003.

The legislation was criticised by rights NGOs, Western states and the UN as vague, broad and "regressive." Authorities, however, cited perceived foreign interference and a constitutional duty to "close loopholes" after the 2019 protests and unrest. Under Article 23, sedition carries a maximum penalty of seven years in jail, or 10 years if the offender is found to have colluded with an "external force." The offence was previously punishable by up to two years in prison for a first offence, and up to three years for re-offenders.

Musical "Patriotic Education" in Hong Kong

12 September 2024, Bitter Winter

"Patriotic Education" is the name of the most massive campaign of domestic propaganda in the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) recent history. Hong Kong is regarded as being particularly in need of this medicine, which is at the same time reluctant to take.

A "Working Group on Patriotic Education" has been established, with pro-CCP legislator Lee Wai-king (Starry) as its leader. The Working Group has both "official members" and "non-official members." However, the "non-official members" are officially listed in its official web page as well.

One of the "non-official members" is veteran singer Kwong Mei-wan (Cally), another well-known CCP loyalist.

It seems that the CCP believes in music as a tool of "Patriotic Education" in Hong Kong. With great fanfare, a song by Cally Kwong has been launched both in a regular and a karaoke version. The song, called "Our Home," was introduced at a press conference of the Working Group on Patriotic Education on September 3, to coincide with the the 79th anniversary of the Victory Day of the Chinese People's War of Resistance Against Japanese Aggression. The lyrics hail the unity of all Chinese around the Beijing government and its leaders.

Last month, the Working Group on Patriotic Education inaugurated a new thematic gallery at the Hong Kong Museum of History, presenting the necessity and alleged benefits of the repressive National Security Law.

The National Security Gallery also teaches children through cartoons to become "young guardians of National Security." For example, a video shows a beetle who violates the National Security rules and ventures away from the Butterfly Garden (China), ending up in a hostile land (the West, or a mental locus where Western ideas prevail). There, the beetle is about to be eaten by a huge spider (Western imperialism). Happily, armed with the National Security Law, the young Guardians of National Security from the Butterfly Garden come and save it. The beetle cries profusely and promises that it will always respect National Security Law in the future. A good lesson for young Hongkongers...

China's central government will 'expand' Hong Kong's role in Belt and Road Initiative

11 September 2024, SCMP, Kahon Chan and Edith Lin

Officials at Belt and Road Summit throw support behind city, while Vietnam's deputy prime minister calls for more two-way exchanges with Hong Kong.

The central government has pledged that Hong Kong will play a bigger part in the Belt and Road Initiative, with mainland Chinese officials throwing their weight behind the city's "irreplaceable" role in financial and professional services at a high-level conference.

Beijing made the assurance at the opening of the Belt and Road Summit at the Hong Kong Convention and Exhibition Centre on Wednesday, where the newly appointed deputy prime minister of Vietnam, Nguyen Hoa Binh, also called on city authorities to promote two-way tourism and business links with his country.

Li Yongjie, China's deputy international trade representative, said in opening remarks that the Ministry of Commerce would further "expand the space" for Hong Kong to participate in joint developments in the Belt and Road Initiative, Beijing's push to link economies across Asia, Europe, Africa and South America into a China-centred trade network.

"We will jointly promote practical cooperation projects to further elevate Hong Kong's participation in the Belt and Road Initiative and continue to support mainland and Hong Kong businesses to strengthen information exchanges and deepen cooperation on belt and road projects," she said.

Listing the areas in which Beijing would support Hong Kong in expanding into overseas markets, Li said: "We will continue to guide Hong Kong businesses to leverage their international advantages in service industries such as finance, the legal sector, shipping and accounting, and provide high-level professional services for overseas economic and trade cooperation zones, foreign investment and contracting projects."

She added that Hong Kong would also receive support from Beijing to secure more free trade and investment protection agreements with other jurisdictions, and to enter the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP) "as soon as possible".

Nguyen, who also delivered a keynote speech at the opening session, said Vietnam had consistently and actively participated in key international cooperation frameworks, including the belt and road plan, noting his country shared many characteristics with Hong Kong in innovation, sustainable development strategies and effective use of scientific advancement. "Building on this important foundation, we look forward to Hong Kong's more active and greater contribution to connecting the 'two corridors, one belt' framework [of Vietnam] with the Belt and Road Initiative [of China]. Hong Kong can leverage its role as a gateway to enhance connectivity and cooperation between Vietnam and the Guangdong-Hong Kong-Macau Greater Bay Area," he said.

The two corridors, one belt strategy was first mooted by Vietnam in 2004 to cover infrastructure projects supported by China.

Nguyen, who was appointed Vietnam's deputy prime minister in late August, also listed five priorities for collaboration between his country and Hong Kong: cooperation in financial services, promotion of bilateral trade, high tech investment, infrastructure connectivity and people-to-people exchanges.

"I appreciate Hong Kong's support for skilled Vietnamese workers and hope that the Hong Kong government will further facilitate links between the people and businesses of both sides, [including] promote two-way tourism," Nguyen added.

The ninth edition of the two-day summit drew about 6,000 participants from around 70 countries and regions, according to Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu.

The city chief underscored Hong Kong's strengths as a global hub for financial and professional services, and pointed to the potential of emerging economies covered by the Belt and Road Initiative.

"Between 2013 and 2023, Hong Kong's external trade with belt and road economies other than the mainland surged by almost 60 per cent, 3.8 times the growth rate of our trade with all economies," he said.

"Last year, belt and road economies accounted for more than 43 per cent of Hong Kong's external trade with the rest of the world, other than the mainland. That value was less than a third in 2013. These figures reflect the enormous potential and promise of the Belt and Road Initiative."

Also present at the summit was a 300-strong delegation representing 38 of China's state-owned enterprises, led by Gou Ping, vice-chairman of the State-owned Assets Supervision and Administration Commission.

Gou said Hong Kong "effectively served" the country's needs as an important "partner and bridge" for state enterprises to participate in belt and road developments, and played an "irreplaceable" role in Chinese firms' international project investments and financing, as well as the offshore yuan business, professional services support, and economic and trade exchanges.

"[Hong Kong's] network of friends has further expanded and the areas of cooperation have continued to grow and deepen. The momentum for cooperation has become more robust, forming a new pattern of high-quality external exchanges. We believe that in the new golden decade of the Belt and Road Initiative, Hong Kong will play a greater role in connecting the world," Gou said.

Elsewhere at the summit's policy dialogue session, senior officials from other Southeast Asian nations expressed interest in collaborating with Hong Kong.

Lim Lork Piseth, Cambodia's secretary of state of commerce, said Hong Kong would contribute significantly upon joining RCEP, the world's largest free-trade pact, noting his country could work with the city to develop standards and protocols in customs clearance.

Rachmat Kaimuddin, Indonesia's deputy coordinating minister for maritime and investment affairs, echoed city leader John Lee's previous remarks, saying Hong Kong could play a big role as a "superconnector" in helping his country seek foreign investment and support.

Stand News Editors Convicted of Sedition by Hong Kong Court, Marking Setback for Freedom of Press in Hong Kong

09 September 2024, China Scope

During the 2019 "Anti-Extradition" protests in Hong Kong, local media outlet Stand News featured extensive coverage of the events. On August 29 the Hong Kong District Court found the former and acting editors of the media outlet guilty of "conspiracy to publish seditious publications." The judge delivered the verdict but postponed sentencing to September 26, allowing the defendants to be temporarily released on bail. This case marks the first time that senior members of a news organization in Hong Kong have been convicted of "sedition" since the city's handover to China.

The Hong Kong Journalists Association condemned the ruling, stating that it represents a serious setback for freedom of the press.

In December 2021, Hong Kong's National Security Department froze Stand News' assets, worth HKD 60 million (US$ 7.7 million), forcing the media outlet to cease operations.

German Activist For Tibet Issues Says Denied Entry To Hong Kong

08 September 2024, Barron's

A German working on Tibet rights issues was denied entry into Hong Kong this weekend, he said, after he tried to fly into the city from Beijing – at least the second activist turned back this year.

David Missal, of the Berlin-based advocacy group Tibet Initiative, posted on social media platform X Sunday that he was grilled for hours by officials before being denied entry.

"After 13 sleepless hours under immigration examination... I was told that I could not enter the city and was eventually allowed to take a plane to Vietnam," Missal, the group's vice executive director, wrote.

"I was able to travel to China within the visa-free policy, but not to (Hong Kong)," Missal said, adding that his luggage was also searched.

China last year granted visa-free entry to Germans and a few other European passport holders, allowing them to transit through the mainland for up to 15 days.

Earlier this year, international media watchdog Reporters Without Borders (RSF) said one of its representatives was stopped and questioned when she tried to enter Hong Kong, before being deported.

Missal told AFP some colleagues – including him – had their visa applications to mainland China rejected in the past, but that he had studied in Hong Kong in 2018 and 2019.

He added that his trip – initially planned for China, then Hong Kong and Vietnam – was "not work-related" as he was on vacation.

Hong Kong's immigration department said it "does not comment on individual cases".

The department "acts in accordance with the laws and policies in handling each immigration case", it said.

The former British colony was once considered one of the freest territories within China.

After massive and at times violent democracy protests in Hong Kong in 2019, Beijing imposed a sweeping security law to quash dissent.

Earlier this year, Hong Kong authorities enacted a second law to punish more security crimes – drawing condemnation from Western nations including the United States about the curbing of freedoms in the city.

August

Hong Kong has 'irreplaceable' role in country's reform efforts: senior Beijing officials

26 August 2024, SCMP, Kahon Chan and Natalie Wong

Commerce minister Wang Wentao and key legal official Shen Chunyao brief political elites on third plenum resolution in Hong Kong session.

Beijing has affirmed Hong Kong's "irreplaceable" role in furthering the country's reforms and opening up as the nation strives to become a modern socialist state, urging the city to contribute by refining its strengths and bolstering its international connectivity. Commerce minister Wang Wentao on Monday also pledged measures to elevate Hong Kong's status as a global financial hub amid fierce regional competition as he briefed hundreds of officials, lawmakers and business leaders for 2½ hours on the spirit of the third plenary session of the 20th Central Committee. He was joined by Shen Chunyao, chairman of the Legislative Affairs Commission of the National People's Congress Standing Committee.

It was the first time senior Beijing officials had held a large session in Hong Kong, broadcast live to the public, about the country's five-yearly top-level Chinese Communist Party meeting, when state leaders decide blueprints to guide development.

In his speech, the commerce minister said President Xi Jinping had stressed that only an open China would become a modern China, and one of the resolution's focuses was to "improve the high-level opening-up system and mechanism" of the country, which would offer Hong Kong greater opportunities.

Pointing to a letter sent by Xi earlier this month to Hong Kong entrepreneurs with roots in Ningbo, Wang also said the city had enjoyed a role in the country's reform and opening up "in the past, present and future".

"Hong Kong's position in the process of nationwide reform and opening up, as well as modernisation, is unique," Wang said at the Convention and Exhibition Centre in Wan Chai.

"The contributions made by Hong Kong compatriots are significant and their role is irreplaceable."

Hong Kong should strengthen its unique status and advantages by becoming a part of the country's drive for reform, while "proactively" aligning with national strategies, such as the Greater Bay Area blueprint and the coming 15th five-year plan, which is due to start in 2026, he said.

But Wang also pointed to areas where Hong Kong was falling short. The city still needed certain "reforms" to overcome restrictions in rolling out the Southbound

Travel for Guangdong Vehicles scheme to further unleash the potential of the Hong Kong-Zhuhai-Macau Bridge, he said, noting its traffic was dwarfed by that of the Shenzhen-Zhongshan link that opened in June. "Especially in the face of major changes unprecedented in a century, Hong Kong's strategic position has become increasingly prominent, and it must serve as a superconnector and super value-adder connecting the world with the support of the motherland," he added.

Noting Hong Kong's many "shiny golden brands", such as its free economy and legal system boasting the highest standards, Wang stressed the city remained the country's most important investment channel, noting 60 per cent of mainland China's accumulated foreign investment had originated or gone through the city as of the end of 2023.

Shen, who also chairs the Hong Kong Basic Law Committee, told the political elites gathered in the venue that one of the central ideas of the third plenum resolution was achieving "Chinese modernisation" through high-quality development and further reform and opening up.

He said that during his two days in Hong Kong he saw first-hand the enthusiasm of residents in grasping the country's major policy plans.

"I have a feeling that Hong Kong compatriots in all aspects are very concerned about ... the major deployments and the great spirit of the central authorities and the country, eager to find out what are Hong Kong's statuses and roles in them," he said. "This is one very encouraging phenomenon."

Businessman Iron Sze Wing-wai asked Wang and Shen about Beijing's plans to elevate Hong Kong's role as an international financial hub.

The commerce minister said that in addition to further reform measures from Beijing, "national power and strength are the greatest support for Hong Kong's financial industry".

Wang pledged to support the city in leveraging its strength in three aspects. The first was helping more Hong Kong companies join trade fairs and help mainland products find markets overseas.

The second was strengthening the city's connections with countries under the Belt and Road Initiative and supporting Hong Kong's accession to the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership, a trade pact that covers a third of world's population.

The third was offering further support by Beijing for Hong Kong's deepened participation in the digitalisation of trade in the bay area and green economy by tapping its strengths in supply chain and asset management.

The bay area is Beijing's plan to link Hong Kong, Macau and nine other southern Chinese cities into an economic powerhouse, while the Belt and Road Initiative aims to create a China-centred trade network that spans more than 100 countries.

The push to turn Hong Kong into a global talent hub was another focus of the resolution, which also called on the city to bolster its standing as an international finance, maritime and trade centre.

In response to the remarks by the Beijing officials, Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu said Hong Kong must reform itself through innovative measures to seize development opportunities, especially amid a complicated international landscape.

Lau Siu-kai, a consultant for the semi-official Beijing think tank, the Chinese Association of Hong Kong and Macau Studies, said the central government expected Hong Kong's financial system to contribute to the internationalism of the renminbi and connect more mainland businesses with overseas ones.

"Hong Kong now plays an even more pivotal role in helping Chinese firms expand overseas – less towards the West and more towards a diversified network of nations," he told the Post.

He added that innovative reforms within Hong Kong's system proved it had an "irreplaceable" role as they would guide the country's broader reform efforts.

In Hong Kong, Xi has completed where Deng left off

23 August 2024, SCMP, Alex Lo

The city's destiny was always about unification and integration, not democratisation or meeting Western expectations.

It's the 120th anniversary of Deng Xiaoping's birth, and people are, again, arguing whether Xi Jinping has betrayed the legacy of the great reformer (mostly the Western narrative) or is really his true heir (the official Chinese version).

Let me add my two cents about the two paramount leaders with respect to the political development of Hong Kong up till now.

To save you from the suspense, let me lay my cards on the table. I think Deng inadvertently created the democratic opposition movement in Hong Kong, which was not necessarily a good thing in the long run, and which Xi has now neutralised, which is not necessarily a bad thing, also in the long run.

Consider this statement from the first of a series of articles in this newspaper.

Referring to Deng, it said, "The 'chief architect' of the greatest economic liberation programme in history was also the man who demanded that the Communist Party 'unwaveringly uphold the dictatorship of the proletariat', nipping the country's democracy movement in its bud."

That's true as far as it goes.

The most controversial act of Deng's extraordinary career was his political decision made in 1989 to end the Tiananmen protests.

In the lead-up to the crackdown on June 4, the student and worker protesters formed bonds and connections with their counterparts from Hong Kong who subsequently helped many of the mainland student leaders escape from mainland China to overseas destinations via the so-called Operation Yellow Bird. Tiananmen would turn many in Hong Kong into political activists; not a few would end up forming the Democratic Party (originally the United Democrats) and the Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Patriotic Democratic Movements of China. The alliance was the chief organiser of the annual Tiananmen vigil in Hong Kong until it was banned in recent years.

The colonial government turned a blind eye to Yellow Bird even though technically it was human smuggling. That activism laid the foundation of the Hong Kong indigenous opposition, a movement that was moderate for a time. Subsequently, though, from the 2010s, it became more radical, anti-China and anti-Chinese, in a movement sometimes called localism. Its most extreme expression was to claim independence for Hong Kong from the rest of China. That was never going to end well for the city.

Back then, Deng believed if he did not suppress the Tiananmen protests, it would lead to the collapse of the Communist Party's leadership, and, in the worst-case scenario, even civil war. But once suppressed, the mainland's democratic struggle was exported to Hong Kong. Paradoxically, Deng inadvertently recreated what he faced on the mainland in an anxious city awaiting reunification with the motherland.

Tiananmen triggered the democratic opposition movement, and the electoral reforms deliberately introduced by the last colonial governor, Chris Patten, gave it institutional support to bargain with Beijing. But it was ultimately the "one country, two systems" governing principle, Deng's brainchild, that made it possible for the opposition to grow and flourish in Hong Kong, despite his obvious intention that "one country" itself should never be compromised.

That was mostly thanks to the constitutional guarantee of 50 years of no change and eventual full electoral franchise. Because of the severe post-Tiananmen crackdown, confidence in post-1997 handover Hong Kong was at an all-time low.

Both the British and the Chinese had every incentive to make sure the power transition worked out – for very different reasons.

To restore and maintain public confidence, for the next quarter of a century, the opposition was given a free hand in such extraordinary circumstances, at least until 2020, to operate in ways that even democratic countries were unlikely to tolerate. These included lobbying foreign Western governments to punish

Hong Kong and mainland Chinese officials and to introduce trade policies that would hurt the local economy.

One country, two systems and its 50-year guarantee were supposed to prepare the city to integrate fully, over time, with the rest of the country, while maintaining Hong Kong's unique capitalist features. Instead, Hong Kong eventually drifted away from the "one country" part.

The opposition was acceptable to Beijing as long as it accepted a gradualist approach to expanding the franchise and stayed patriotic, meaning the acknowledgement of “one China”, hardly a tough demand. But from the early 2010s, both independence and/or an immediate transition to full universal franchise emerged to take over the once more moderate opposition movement by a post-1997 group of youngsters.

As a result, in 2015, following the Occupy protests of the previous year, the opposition rejected Beijing’s offer of a version of universal suffrage. All the while, separatism and antagonism – against mainlanders, not just the communist Chinese state – were growing. It all came to a head in the riots of 2019, arguably the worst in local history.

It was always understood that once the red line – when Hong Kong became ungovernable – was crossed, the central government would crack down. From the time Xi first took office, he has been firm about it. The die was cast after 2019.

And so, it eventually led to Beijing’s imposition of the national security law to put an end to the protest chaos and an overhaul of Hong Kong’s political system to ensure that only those deemed “patriots” would be elected or appointed to public office, which effectively neutralised the opposition.

In the past quarter of a century, both China and the West wanted to preserve one country, two systems in toto, for very different reasons, of course. But their political demands and economic imperatives proved incompatible after 2019.

It is therefore inevitable that Hong Kong today is caught up in the great power rivalry, if not a second cold war.

But that’s a price Beijing and Xi are all too ready to pay, and a fight they have certainly won. With minimal suppression, the integration of Hong Kong with the mainland has been sped up by a quarter of a century. Despite Western media demonisation, the response of local authorities was no worse than that of the US government to the Capitol “insurrection” in January 2021 or in Britain during widespread city riots earlier this month.

In fact, when compared with the British crackdown on “hate” speech, which now seems to include anti-government messages online, Hong Kong has been pretty lenient.

Hongkongers now spend their weekends shopping and dining on the mainland, even to the detriment of local businesses!

The arc of Hong Kong’s modern political history can be traced either through its failed democratisation in the style dictated by the West, or through its reunification with the nation after more than a century and a half of Western imperialism and reintegration through a tumultuous time in the 21st century.

The latter is the Chinese story that both Deng and Xi had worked to complete. That crucial chapter is now nearly finished.

A History Museum Shows How China Wants to Remake Hong Kong

23 August 2024, The New York Times, Tiffany May

A new exhibit calls for the city’s residents to be patriotic, loyal to the Chinese Communist Party and ever vigilant to supposed threats to the state.

The Hong Kong Museum of History was the place to go to understand the city’s transformation from fishing village to a glittering metropolis. It housed a life-size replica of a traditional fishing boat and a recreation of a 19th-century street lined with shops. That exhibit, known as “The Hong Kong Story,” is being revamped. People have instead been lining up for a splashy new permanent gallery in the museum that tells a different, more ominous story about the city – that Hong Kong is constantly at risk of being subverted by hostile foreign forces. The exhibit features displays about spies being everywhere and footage of antigovernment street protests in the city that were described as instigated by the West.

As he kicked off the exhibition this month, John Lee, the Beijing-backed leader of Hong Kong, made clear that its overarching purpose was to be a warning to the city. “Safeguarding national security is always a continuous effort. There is no completion,” he said. The gallery, which is managed by Hong Kong’s top national security body, opened to the public on Aug. 7. The exhibit points to a new aspect of the Hong Kong government’s crackdown on the city after antigovernment protests in 2019 posed the greatest challenge to Beijing’s rule in decades. The authorities have introduced security laws to quash dissent in the years since. They are now pushing to control how people will remember the recent political turmoil.

In the government’s telling, the protests were not organic expressions of the residents’ democratic aspirations, as the city’s opposition activists have said, but part of an ongoing plot by Western forces to destabilize China.

The national security exhibit opens with a short video highlighting the unfair treaties of the 19th century that forced China to cede Hong Kong to the British, as well as the Japanese occupation of the city during World War II. Describing the protests in 2019, the video highlighted footage of protesters hurling Molotov cocktails. “Law and order vanished,” the narrator said. Then it credited new national security laws imposed by Beijing in the crackdown that followed, for turning the tide “from chaos to order.”

The exhibit displayed the battered shields, helmets and boots used by the riot police who quashed protests. It listed the casualties and damage purportedly inflicted by the protesters: 629 police officers injured and more than 5,000 Molotov cocktails thrown by violent protesters.

There was no mention of the tear gas, rubber bullets, beanbag rounds and pepper spray deployed by the police. The display did not mention the attack on protesters at a subway station by a mob armed with sticks and poles, and the police's slow response to that violence.

"One point of this exhibit is to stoke fears of social 'turmoil' and 'chaos' so as to persuade Hong Kongers to embrace the social stability that the Chinese Communist Party purports to offer," said Kirk Denton, an emeritus professor at Ohio State University and author of a book about the politics of history museums in modern China.

Winnie Lu, 61, a Hong Kong resident who works in sales and who was visiting the museum on a recent weekday, said that the exhibit reminded her of how hard it was for her to get to work during the protests, when demonstrators blocked roads and paralyzed the subway. "Without national security, how can ordinary people live a good life?" she said.

In many ways, the national security exhibit appeared to take a page out of the Chinese government's playbook after the Chinese military's brutal suppression of the 1989 Tiananmen Square pro-democracy movement left widespread disillusionment. In the months and years that followed, the authorities pushed an intensive patriotic education campaign in mainland China that cast Japan as an enemy of the Chinese people and the Communist Party as the sole engine of progress in Chinese history.

Rowena He, a senior research fellow at University of Texas, Austin, and a historian of the Tiananmen massacre who used to teach in Hong Kong, said that the new exhibit about national security was part of a broader "history manipulation" campaign by Beijing after the Tiananmen crackdown. The Chinese leadership wants to imprint the "official account of history into national memory, emphasizing China's victimhood at the hands of the West and Japan," she said.

In the name of patriotic education, the government in Hong Kong is also turning the Museum of Coastal Defense, a military museum that has historically centered on semi-ruined British fortifications, into a memorial to China's war with Japan in World War II. It will rename it the Hong Kong Museum of the War of Resistance and Coastal Defense, referring to the war by the phrasing China uses: "The Chinese People's War of Resistance Against Japanese Aggression." The government also plans to build a museum focused on Chinese achievements, the history of the Communist Party and the founding of the People's Republic.

The new national security exhibit adds to broader concerns about a chilling effect imposed by China's crackdown on the opposition, which has led to the arrests of dozens of veteran democracy activists under national security charges. Public libraries have pulled books associated with local pro-democracy figures or movements. Gatherings to remember the victims of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre in Beijing have been banned, and a sculpture that was a memorial of it was removed. Academics have also come under pressure; Ms. He, a Canadian citizen, was recently denied a visa to return to her job as an associate professor at the Chinese University of Hong Kong.

Some Hong Kongers have been concerned about what they see as the government's efforts to rewrite the past. When the Museum of History's permanent exhibit, "The Hong Kong Story," closed for renovations in 2020, visitors filled the gallery, fearing that the authorities would use the planned revamp to erase the city's colonial history and its references to the annual candlelight vigils commemorating Tiananmen victims, now deemed sensitive.

Experts said that the exhibit at the history museum sought to bind Hong Kong ever more closely to Chinese history. The authorities have also organized patriotic study tours to mainland China and revamped the curriculum in schools to counter a rising local identity distinct from the mainland.

Some of the new displays at the national security exhibit closely resemble that which would be found in similarly themed museum exhibits on the mainland. A floor-to-ceiling Chinese flag hung on crimson walls. Next to it was a 13-foot long replica of an oil painting depicting Mao Zedong as he proclaimed the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949 at Tiananmen Square.

Conference on promoting China's peaceful reunification held in Hong Kong

21 August 2024, Xinhua

The 2024 Overseas Chinese World Conference for Promoting Peaceful Reunification of China was held Tuesday in Hong Kong.

Wang Huning, a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of China (CPC) Central Committee and chairman of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, sent a congratulatory letter to the conference.

Wang said in the letter that compatriots in Hong Kong, Macao and Taiwan as well as overseas

Chinese have long been opposing "independence" and promoting reunification. They have contributed to fostering exchanges across the Taiwan Strait in various fields, deepening the international community's commitment to the one-China principle and working toward China's peaceful reunification.

Wang encouraged compatriots in Hong Kong, Macao and Taiwan as well as overseas Chinese to keep pace with the trends of history, safeguard the overall interests of the Chinese nation and join hands in opposing "Taiwan independence" and promoting reunification.

Shi Taifeng, a member of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee and head of the United Front Work Department of the CPC Central Committee, attended the event, stressing that the conference, gathering compatriots at home and abroad, will help advance the cause of opposing "independence" and promoting reunification.

Themed "Unswervingly promoting China's peaceful reunification and striving to achieve the great rejuvenation of the Chinese nation," the conference was hosted by the Hong Kong Association for Promotion of Peaceful Reunification of China and attended by over 1,200 representatives.

The conference adopted the 2024 Hong Kong Declaration.

Beijing admits Hong Kong-flagged ship destroyed key Baltic gas pipeline 'by accident'

12 August 2024, SCMP

Beijing has admitted that a Chinese-owned ship damaged a critical Baltic Sea gas pipeline running between Estonia and Finland last October, but says it was an accident.

The South China Morning Post understands that the Chinese authorities conducted an internal investigation and recently communicated the results to governments in the European countries.

The Chinese-language report said the accident was the result of a strong storm.

Both countries are still carrying out a joint criminal inquiry centred on the NewNew Polar Bear, a container ship that was flying the Hong Kong flag at the time of the event. Its registered owner is the Chinese mainland firm NewNew Shipping Line.

While it is understood that the report is circulating in various ministries, it is not submissible as official evidence in the investigations. Authorities in both capitals urged Beijing to respond to their urgent requests for information on the ship.

A spokeswoman for the Estonian prosecutor said the document had not been sent to that office and that it "can't be used as evidence in an Estonian criminal investigation" in any case.

"We submitted a legal aid request to the Chinese authorities to gather evidence from the vessel and its crew," said Kairi Kungas, its head of public relations.

"In order to execute the legal aid request, the Chinese authorities can carry out the investigative operations by themselves or involve Estonian investigators, although all activities conducted on Chinese territory must conform to local legislation.

"The Chinese authorities have not provided a response on executing the legal aid request as of yet."

A spokeswoman for the Finnish National Bureau of Investigation (NBI) declined to confirm whether it had received a document, but said its own inquiry was ongoing.

"During the investigation, co-operation with the Chinese authorities has been done and among others NBI has submitted a request for legal assistance to the competent Chinese authorities," said Anna Zareff, NBI's head of communications, in a written statement. "It must be stated that the investigation is still ongoing and final conclusions, what was behind these incidents (technical failure-negligence/poor seamanship- deliberate act), can be made only after all necessary investigative measures have been finalised and this will still take some time," her statement said.

The Chinese foreign ministry did not respond to a request for comment.

Speaking to Estonian media on Monday, the country's foreign minister Elina Valtonen said: "We constantly cooperate with China and exchange information, but we do not go into details, because the investigation is still in progress."

Authorities in the two EU member states have said that the ship dragged its anchor along the seabed, slicing through a crucial gas cable and also damaging two telecoms cables running between the two countries on the night of October 7 or morning of October 8.

Statements from Finnish investigators at the time described a "1.5 to 4 metre-wide [5-13ft] dragging trail" leading to the "point of damage in the gas pipeline".

"In the distance of a few metres from the gas pipeline damage point, there was an anchor which is believed to have caused the wide dragging trail and the damage itself," the October 24 statement said. It added that once the anchor was lifted, there were "traces in it which indicate it had been in contact with the gas pipeline".

The 77km (48-mile) Balticconnector pipeline is a key source of energy for Finland.

Sources said the Chinese-language report claimed to have been conducted in line with International Maritime Organization rules.

The Chinese Ministry of Justice has yet to respond to detailed queries from Estonia and Finland. It is understood there has been willingness voiced to comply with the European probes at a later date.

That assurance came in response to comments by Estonia's state prosecutor Triinu Olev in May that Beijing had yet to provide any information.

"We need to collect additional evidence to determine whether the damage was caused intentionally or by accident," Olev said at the time.

After the incident, the NewNew Polar Bear sailed to St Petersburg, and was subsequently photographed in the Arkhangelsk region of Russia, before eventually docking in Tianjin.

Last November, the Finnish authorities said Beijing had pledged to fully cooperate with the investigation and in January then-president Sauli Niinisto held what Helsinki described as "constructive" talks with Chinese leader Xi Jinping about the damaged pipeline.

The October incident came at a time of heightened suspicion among Baltic states towards China, largely due to its close ties with Russia in the wake of the invasion of Ukraine. This closeness towards Moscow has also caused a more general deterioration in relations with the European Union.

The damage to the pipeline also raised further alarm about the vulnerability of undersea infrastructure.

It followed the destruction of the Nord Stream 1 and 2 gas pipelines connecting Russia and Germany in September 2022 in a series of explosions that have yet to be explained.

Exclusive | Hong Kong should work with mainland China to host 'Belt and Road Games', Regina Ip says

09 August 2024, SCMP, Connor Mycroft, Jeffie Lam and Edith Lin

Top government adviser says city must also reposition itself in new geopolitical landscape and tap emerging markets such as Middle East.

Hong Kong should work with neighbouring mainland Chinese cities to host an inaugural "Belt and Road Games" to help strengthen ties among more than 100 countries in the China-centred trade network, a top government adviser has said.

Regina Ip Lau Suk-yee, convenor of the government's key decision-making Executive Council, said on Friday that the city should also tap emerging markets such as the Middle East while repositioning itself in a new geopolitical landscape by helping the country find common ground globally.

Delivering a keynote address at the Post's Redefining Hong Kong conference, lawmaker Ip said the Belt and Road Initiative gave the city a "convenient entry point" to other markets and that she had urged the government to help host a sporting competition bringing together member countries.

"I have recommended to the chief executive that Hong Kong should work in conjunction with other cities in the Guangdong-Hong Kong-Macau Greater Bay Area to host the first Belt and Road Games, [which can be] just like the Commonwealth Games," said Ip, who is also the chairwoman of the New People's Party. "Riding on its stunning achievements in the Paris Olympics, Hong Kong should take the lead in using mega events in sports to build friendships, strengthen connectivity, spur innovation and stimulate growth." The Commonwealth Games, established in 1930 as the British Empire Games, are open to 74 nations and territories and have been staged in Australia, Canada, England, India, Jamaica, Malaysia, New Zealand, Scotland and Wales.

Speaking to the Post after the conference, Ip said Hong Kong would have to team up with other cities in the Greater Bay Area to leverage existing and coming sporting facilities such as Kai Tak Sports Park. "When it comes to hosting these large-scale sports Games, the first thing you need to build are the facilities, but we already have that," she said.

The Kai Tak project, expected to open early next year, is the city's largest ever sports infrastructure scheme. It includes a 50,000-seat main stadium with a retractable roof, a 10,000-seat indoor sports centre, a 5,000-seat public sports ground and 14 hectares of landscaped open space.

The bay area is the central government's scheme to link Hong Kong, Macau and nine cities in neighbouring Guangdong province, including Guangzhou and Shenzhen, into an economic powerhouse.

In Guangzhou, the Guangdong Olympic Stadium is one of the mainland's largest sports facilities by capacity, with seating for more than 80,000 people. It is undergoing renovations ahead of next year's 15th National Games, which will be jointly hosted by Guangdong, Hong Kong and Macau.

The Shenzhen Universiade Sports Centre, which hosted the 2011 edition of what is now known as the FISU World University Games, has a capacity of more than 60,000.

Ip acknowledged that the government would first need to get Beijing's approval before the proposal could move forward, but she said he believed that hosting such an event would help to create a "new sports industry" in Hong Kong.

"So I think it is very good for Hong Kong and our region, whether economically, culturally, and from the point of view of connecting hearts and minds," she said.

Lobo Louie Hung-tak, senior lecturer of health and physical education at the Education University of Hong Kong, said a "Belt and Road Games" would be good for cultural exchanges but the government had to consider the capacity of local sports facilities and many other factors.

He said Hong Kong would have an edge for hosting events such as sailing and windsurfing because of its coast, as well as for organising football and rugby matches at Hong Kong Stadium and Kai Tak Sports Park.

"It involves logistics arrangements and a huge amount of resources. It also depends on the number of sports events and the time needed," Louie said.

"A city cannot host Games for too long as people have to go to work and they may complain.

"As the city is co-hosting the National Games next year, it will serve as a good opportunity to check if Hong Kong has the ability to hold Belt and Road Games." He said the government also had to consider the views of Hong Kong residents, who might have little interest in sports events that were popular in the Middle East and Western Asia, such as wrestling.

In her keynote speech, Ip also said Hong Kong should readjust its role and positioning in a new geopolitical landscape, and be fearless amid hostility from some in the West.

"Despite geopolitical tensions, Hong Kong should strengthen its separate systems' characteristics, both in substance and in message, and mobilise its vast resources in and outside government to reach out to its traditional developed world partners in North America, Europe, Asia and Australia," she said.

"The constant drumbeat of sanctions and the twisted narrative on Hong Kong should not deter us from engagement. Through fearless engagement, discussing, debating and arguing face to face, the real Hong Kong story will be told."

Conceding it might not be easy to "move the mountain of Sino phobia", she argued the city should make the most of its knowledge of Western culture, values and norms as well as its extensive network to "help China build common ground with Western countries and reduce misunderstandings".

But Ip said the city should also look beyond the English-speaking world, with which it had previously prioritised business ties.

"It is high time for Hong Kong to reorient itself to the diverse and multicultural, non-English-speaking sphere, whether in the Middle East, eastern Europe or elsewhere," she said.

"It should start by broadening its language skills and cultural mindsets, so that it can dive deep into building meaningful relationships with people and businesses from different parts of the world."

She said the city was an inalienable, but different, part of China.

Hong Kong could use its common law system and protection of fundamental rights and freedoms to contribute to the nation by "being different", she said, adding the city could show the world the success of the "one country, two systems" governing principle.

Hong Kong secondary students may soon be schooled in 'Xi Jinping Thought'

08 August 2024, Global Voices

Curriculum guidelines recommend teaching Xi Jinping thought in a new subject

The political ideology of China's leader Xi Jinping could soon be taught to Hong Kong secondary school students, according to curriculum guidelines for new subject Citizenship, Economics and Society.

The new subject, which will be introduced to first-year secondary students when the school year starts next month, highlights the teaching of national security and national identity. On Wednesday, the Education Bureau issued curriculum guidelines for the subject, stating that it should include content related to patriotic education. The document reads:

[Patriotic Education] helps students understand the development of our country and the importance of the close relationship between the Mainland and Hong Kong to the development of our society, thereby cultivating students' sense of nationhood, affection for our country and sense of national identity.

Citing China's patriotic education law, which came into effect on January 1 and covers Hong Kong and Macau as well as mainland China, the guidelines provide five "examples" of topics for students to learn as part of patriotic education. Among them were: Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, broadly known as Xi Jinping Thought; socialism with Chinese characteristics; and national security and national defence.

Xi Jinping Thought is recommended for third-year secondary students as part of a module called "Our Country's Political Structure and Its Participation in International Affairs."

The push for patriotic education has been part of Xi's ideological campaign, as he has sought to unify and educate members of the Communist Party of China according to his doctrine.

When asked how much students should learn about Xi Jinping Thought, Ranny Yau, the principle of TWGHs Kap Yan Directors' College and chairman of a committee responsible for reviewing the new subject, told Ming Pao on Thursday that junior secondary school students were expected to know more about China.

"It is unnecessary to single out and highlight some content that may worry teachers," Yau said in Cantonese.

Xi Jinping Thought was added to the curriculum from primary schools to graduate programmes in mainland China from 2021.

The government announced it would replace Life and Society with a new subject named Citizenship, Economics and Society in 2022.

A document about the Citizenship, Economics and Society subject handed out by the Education Bureau in October 2022 lacked a learning objective including in the Life and Society curriculum: "to understand, appreciate, respect and reflect on the values and attitudes that underpin the local society, including rights and responsibilities, freedom, rule of law, social justice, democracy."

Xi Jinping sends rare letter urging Hong Kong entrepreneurs to play major role in China's reform

01 August 2024, SCMP, Willa Wu

Chinese president thanked city's business leaders with Ningbo ancestry for their support after they wrote to him about their contributions.

President Xi Jinping has taken a rare step to engage the business community as he urged Hong Kong entrepreneurs with familial ties in a mainland port city to make greater contributions to the nation's modernisation, a move experts see as a way to show confidence in the faltering private sector.

Xi's remarks on Tuesday were in a letter written in response to Hong Kong business leaders who are descendants of pioneering Ningbo-born entrepreneurs of the city.

They include Anna Pao Pui-hing, eldest daughter of the late shipping magnate Sir Pao Yue-kong, and Ronald Chao Kee-young, eldest son of the late industrialist Chao Kuang-piu.

Xi expressed gratitude to the businesspeople for their continued support of their hometown and country, including establishing businesses and schools, while asking them to leverage their respective strengths and actively take part in the country's reform and opening up.

The president's reply coincides with the 40th anniversary of late Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping's 1984 call to mobilise the global "Ningbo bang" – usually formed by merchants – to develop Ningbo. In Chinese, bang means a cluster of people who are bonded together by the same goals and ideals.

Ningbo, a city in Zhejiang province, where Xi served as party secretary from 2002 to 2007, is known as an important port and an industrial hub in China.

The Ningbo merchants have earned their name as "Ningbo bang" after helping establish China's first modern bank, stock exchange, insurance company, post office, fashion school and various speciality factories spanning cosmetics and food additives to matches and soap.

The "Ningbo bang" in Hong Kong, which includes shipping magnate Pao and late entertainment magnate Run Run Shaw, has long been hailed a pioneer in advancing China's reform and opening up in the 1980s.

The late Pao and Chao Kuang-piu, father of Ronald Chao, had also been received by Deng over various investment and economic activities on the mainland. In his letter, Xi noted that for many years, the Hong Kong entrepreneurs with Ningbo ancestry had a "homeland affinity" and patriotic spirit passed on from "generation to generation".

He also acknowledged the group's active engagement in innovation, entrepreneurship as well as philanthropy and education.

Xi said that the building of a strong country and rejuvenating it through modernisation required all Chinese to unite and work together.

"[I] hope you will continue to leverage your respective strengths, proactively integrate into China's reform and opening up, make new contributions to Chinese modernisation, and contribute to the realisation of the Chinese dream of great national rejuvenation," he wrote.

In response, Ronald Chao thanked Xi for his encouragement to the next generation with Ningbo ancestry, adding his father only made the contribution that every Chinese should have made in his life.

Chao said Hong Kong was presented with both opportunities and challenges as it entered a new stage.

"We will continue to inherit the spirit of loving the country and Hong Kong from the past generation, work hard in our own fields, serve and contribute to the needs of Hong Kong and the country, and better integrate into the overall development of the country," he said in a statement.

Xi's open letter was issued at a critical time when more Hong Kong entrepreneurs were losing confidence in the city's economic prospects, said Simon Zhao, the associate dean of the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences at Beijing Normal University & Hong Kong Baptist University United International College.

Zhao added that Hong Kong's momentum in attracting foreign investment, both on its own and as a bridge to help the mainland attract foreign investment, was also weakening.

"Xi's letter sends a signal of reassurance and encouragement that the central government cares about them and needs them to be confident enough to stay in Hong Kong for development and sustained investment," he said.

Peng Peng, executive chairman of the Guangdong Society of Reform think tank, said Xi had shown his commitment to prioritising economic development in the second half of the year.

Peng also cited how the report by state-owned news agency Xinhua about the letter had mentioned Deng Xiaoping, a subtle yet significant sign of Xi's determination to continue the reforms Deng had embarked on.

Later this month, on August 22, is also the 120th birthday of the late paramount leader.

China's economy has slowed down in recent years from double-digit growth in 2010 to around 5 per cent currently. Over 95 per cent of Chinese business entities are from the private sector, making it the major growth driver.

Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu said Xi's letter showed the leader's "affirmation and sincere encouragement" for Ningbo-linked merchants in the city to redouble their patriotic acts and contributions to the country's development.

"The inspiring letter has instilled a steadfast confidence in not only the mentioned businessmen, but also Hong Kong entrepreneurs in different places of the country, to continue leveraging their strength to contribute to the country," Lee said in a statement issued on Thursday night.

The Hong Kong leader also pledged to unite all business and civil forces to integrate into the nation's development, contributing to a stronger country and its rejuvenation.

William Lee Tak-lun, president of the International Ningbo Merchant Association and one of the entrepreneurs penning the letter, told the Post that they sent it to Xi about two weeks ago.

According to him, their letter was a report of what they did in the past twenty years in terms of boosting Hong Kong's economy and people's livelihood, as well as their commitment to serve the city and the country. "We are surprised that he replied to us so soon, which is a big encouragement to us," Lee said, adding most of the entrepreneurs are the second and third generation of Ningbo businessmen.

"The president has asked us to do more. We will as always," Lee said.

Since the mainland's reform and opening up in the 1980s, the Ningbo group in Hong Kong donated over 6 billion yuan (US$830 million) to support the mainland's scientific, educational, cultural, health and public welfare undertakings.

They have also contributed to the economy and society by attracting investments and driving the opening up of the country.

The last time Xi wrote to individual business leaders was a decade ago when he replied to 30 Fujian entrepreneurs to mark the 30th anniversary of the province's leaders' appeal to decentralise enterprises. Xi used a Hokkien metaphor "hard work equals victory" in the letter to encourage them.

In his previous letters to Hong Kong, Xi had engaged with students from Pui Kui Middle School in July 2023, calling on them to build a stronger nation.

He also responded to 24 of Hong Kong's leading scientists and university professors who wrote to him in 2017 to "express their pressing hope to make a contribution to the motherland".

Hong Kong probes scandal of fake degree certificates from China

11 July 2024, RFA, Alice Yam and Ha Syut

Educational recruitment agencies are able to produce fake documents exactly like the real thing, an official says.

Authorities in Hong Kong are probing allegations that mainland Chinese students are using fake academic credentials to enroll in a prestigious MBA program, sparking fears of falling standards in the city, whose officials are keen to attract migrants from mainland China in the wake of a mass wave of emigration.

As many as 30 applicants to the University of Hong Kong Business School have been found to have used fake documents supplied by a higher education agency, some of them for American universities, Business School Dean Cai Hongbin told the financial news site Caixin in a recent interview.

The revelations come amid growing concern that official willingness to encourage inward migration from mainland China to boost the city's economy could be having a negative impact on the reputation of its colleges and universities, which has already been hit by a compulsory patriotic education program.

"As fraudulent academic qualifications seriously affect student admission by local higher education institutions and Hong Kong's hard-earned international reputation, the [government] and all sectors of the Hong Kong community deeply resent such acts and have zero tolerance towards the matter," Hong Kong's Secretary for Education Christine Choi told the city's legislature in a recent statement.

While police arrested a man and a woman on June 26 and July 3 on suspicion of using fake documents, the university is now asking students to resubmit their academic qualifications, as HKU Business School Dean Cai warned that the fake degrees were mostly found in applications that used a "guaranteed admission" service from an academic agency.

At least 30 students are believed to have used fake documents as part of the "guaranteed admission" service that costs applicants 500,000 yuan apiece, Cai told Caixin.

"Their ability to make fake academic qualifications is astonishing," the July 4 article quoted Cai as saying. "The University of Hong Kong has carried out spot checks as part of this review of academic qualifications."

Cai said many of the fake documents weren't distinguishable from the genuine article, right down to letterhead, envelope, paper quality and other details.

An online search for the keyword "guaranteed admission" in Chinese found several companies offering such services, including a website called Gabroad, which offers "Guaranteed admissions to Top 20 schools" including Harvard, claiming a 100% success rate.

The same site also offers such services for universities in Hong Kong, including the University of Hong Kong and the Chinese University of Hong Kong.

Full refunds are offered to anyone who isn't offered a place, regardless of grades and test scores.

Falsifying or supplying fraudulent academic qualifications carries a maximum jail term of 14 years in Hong Kong.

Any violations will result in "decisive disciplinary action" against the students concerned, including expulsion, while offenders will also likely be prosecuted, Choi said in a June 26 written reply to the Legislative Council.

Education and immigration

The HKU Business School is a highly competitive school, receiving more than 24,000 for taught postgraduate programs in 2023, and only awarding places to 2,600 of them, according to Caixin.

All masters students at the school are now being required to resubmit undergraduate degree certificates, transcripts and other materials, the article said.

Year-long taught masters are particularly sought after by mainland students, because they are a quick way to secure the right to remain in the city for at least a year and look for work, offering a pathway to permanent residency.

Hong Kong's Chuhai College of Higher Education, which once struggled to recruit enough bachelor's degree students to balance the books, had more than 1,500 students in September 2023 after launching a range of taught, one-year masters courses and promoting them aggressively on mainland social media platforms like Xiaohongshu, according to an investigation by RFA Cantonese.

"Chuhai College in Hong Kong is known as a master's mill, because a lot of middle-class people from mainland China come here to take a one-year master's ... during which they can get a Hong Kong ID card for their kids," according to one video circulating on Xiaohongshu in recent weeks.

"A lot of influencers and agents promote the college as a one-stop shop for education and immigration," the video says.

While Chuhai College once had close ties with the government of Taiwan, it has recently repackaged itself as a "red" school, setting up a research institute to study ruling Chinese Communist Party leader Xi Jinping's influence and infrastructure program known as the Belt and Road.

Taiwanese national security researcher Shih Chien-yu said he once worked as a lecturer at Chuhai College for many years, and confirmed that it has a reputation for not being too picky about who gets admitted.

"Chuhai College doesn't check very carefully whether applicants meet admission criteria," Shih told RFA Cantonese in a recent interview. "There is strict training and guidelines regarding assessment of student performance, but I don't think it gets implemented in accordance with those standards."

Chuhai College is now on track to upgrade to university status, if it can attract similar numbers of students next academic year.

The College hadn't responded to inquiries about its strategy or admissions policies by the time of writing. However, a statement on its website says the school "has always followed the principles of fair selection, transparent procedures and merit-based admissions when recruiting for both undergraduate and master's courses."

Rich Chinese return to Hong Kong as Singapore steps up scrutiny

09 July 2024, The Business Times

HONG Kong is winning back wealthy Chinese by rolling out the red carpet for the rich while rival Singapore scrutinises foreign money.

The Chinese territory is expected to welcome about 200 high-net-worth individuals this year after five years of millionaires skipping town, according to data provided by intelligence firm New World Wealth and immigration consultancy Henley & Partners, thanks to initiatives including family office tax concessions and visa and residency programmes. At the same time, the fallout from a blockbuster S$3 billion money laundering case has put the city's family offices and wealthy immigrants under the microscope.

It's a shift from the pandemic years when Hong Kong's strict quarantine and political upheaval led to mainland Chinese flocking to Singapore. Now, private bankers, service providers and insurers are saying Hong Kong business is picking up, while Singapore's stepped-up money laundering rules are putting some customers off.

Hong Kong's assets under management grew 2.1 per cent to HK$31 trillion (S$5.4 trillion) in 2023. Driven by a strong performance of private banking and wealth management, net fund inflows jumped more than three times to nearly HK$390 billion last year, Financial Secretary Paul Chan wrote in his blog this month. In 2022, private banking and wealth fund inflows slumped about 80 per cent.

Private bankers and service providers who spoke to Bloomberg News requested not to be named because the information discussed was private.

Under a microscope

In Singapore, the fallout from the money-laundering case means some banks are re-doing their know-your-customer process, and rich Chinese in Singapore are under a microscope, according to two private bankers. Their clients are frustrated with the process and the questions being asked, they said.

The Monetary Authority of Singapore in April introduced a digital platform to share customer information to combat money laundering. Since then, a service provider in Hong Kong said it received more than 15 inquiries from wealthy Chinese seeking to move or set up family offices in the city. Half those inquiries already resulted in actual business, they said.

"For many of the mainland billionaires, because they don't like the arbitrary government interventions or government checks or threats to their personal wealth, that's why they wanted to move money out of China," said Zhiwu Chen, professor of finance at the University of Hong Kong. "If Singapore would do as many checks and tighter regulations as the mainland, then why would they want to go there?" Chen said he knows billionaires who have "warmed up" to basing more of their family office business in Hong Kong as their enthusiasm for Singapore has waned.

In Hong Kong, business at the China desks of private banks has picked up while the pace of growth at the same groups in Singapore has slowed, meaning less money is moving to Singapore, according to two senior private bankers.

Pull, capital

Hong Kong has benefited from the reopening of its borders in 2023. The city has efficient connections to Shenzhen and the surrounding Greater Bay Area via its high-speed rail line. That's attractive for wealthy Chinese who want to be able to closely monitor onshore businesses.

"Despite the political changes in Hong Kong and a number of challenges associated with that, there remain meaningful reasons for wealth and business owners to develop and maintain connections to Hong Kong," said Philip Marcovici, who consults with global families and financial institutions on wealth and taxation.

The city's introduction of the top talent visa programme targeting high-income earners and university graduates is paying off, with more than 68,000 applications approved since its introduction in 2022. 95 per cent of those are from mainland China, according to government data.

One of the recipients is Wang, a tech worker from Chongqing in southwest China. Having a Hong Kong identity card allows him to travel more easily to the US and other places for work, he said.

Many of his friends were worried about the future direction of Chinese government policy during Covid and sought residence elsewhere, looking for more neutral ground amid rising geopolitical tensions. While there's a narrative that Hong Kong is becoming more like China, he said it remains more open, particularly for capital flows.

"Hong Kong is still a good place for business people," he said, particularly "if you want to travel a lot or move your money freely."

Pick up

According to the two senior private bankers, revenue in Hong Kong already grew by double digits this year, driven by Chinese clients. Most clients have assets of US$5 million to US$10 million and are not in the ultra-rich category, another private banker said.

It's still difficult for Chinese nationals to move money offshore and billionaire wealth creation is hampered by a sluggish market for initial public offerings in Hong Kong.

But Chinese money that was going to Singapore is now headed to Hong Kong, another senior banker said. That's supported by data including sales of insurance products popular with wealthy Chinese from the mainland, which jumped 63 per cent to HK$15.6 billion in the first quarter compared to the same period in 2023.

In June 2021, the government set up the Family Office Hong Kong team to encourage the growth of the city's wealth management industry. Since then, about 64 family offices have been established or expanded their business, with 49 coming from the mainland, according to government data.

Money laundering

Still, revelations from Singapore's money laundering scandal are also triggering concerns in Hong Kong that some of the new arrivals have something to hide.

A plan that offers residency to people who invest HK$30 million in Hong Kong has attracted over 250 applications since its March launch through May month-end. According to official data, nearly 200 are from from Guinea-Bissau and Vanuatu, countries where cash for residency programmes have been used by financial criminals.

Chinese nationals holding passports from Vanuatu, Saint Kitts and Nevis and Turkey were among those convicted in Singapore's money laundering scandal. "It creates doubts about money laundering," said Alicia Garcia Herrero, chief economist for Asia-Pacific at Natixis.

Hong Kong's financial secretary Chan wrote in his blog in July that more than 340 applications have been received for the residency plan since launch and if approved, they are likely to bring more than HK$10 billion to Hong Kong.

Migrations

To be sure, Singapore remains a popular destination for migrating millionaires. It is forecast to welcome a net 3,500 millionaires this year, the third most globally, according to Henley & Partners.

But Hong Kong's population of millionaires is finally forecast to rebound after losing about 500 to migration in 2023, according to Andrew Amoils, head of research at New World Wealth, Henley's research partner.

"Despite a tough past decade, Hong Kong is still one of the world's top millionaire hubs," said Amoils. There is "definitely a turnaround there", he said.

China grants 5-year travel visa for Hong Kong, Macau residents; all details here

01 July 2024, Times of India

Non-Chinese permanent residents of Macau and Hong Kong will soon be able to apply for five-year travel permits to enter mainland China starting from July 10, as announced by Beijing.

This move is expected to encourage foreign companies and talent to settle in these cities. The National Immigration Administration stated on Monday that permit holders would be able to use self-service clearance at control points after completing procedures such as fingerprinting.

These multi-entry permits will allow entry into the mainland for short-term purposes including investment, tourism, visiting relatives, seminars, business, and exchanges. Permit holders can stay for up to 90 days per visit, though they are not permitted to work, study, or engage in news gathering activities.

As per the reports, applications are open to all eligible residents, regardless of nationality or occupation, through China Travel Service (Holdings) in Hong Kong and Macau. Successful applications will result in permits being issued within 20 working days.

The application fee is HK$260 (US$34), while renewals or replacements on the mainland will cost 230 yuan (US$32). The central government aims to facilitate people-to-people exchanges between Macau, Hong Kong, and the mainland, thereby supporting the integration of both cities into the broader national development framework.

Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu emphasised that this new policy, announced on the 27th anniversary of Hong Kong's return to Chinese rule, showcases the country's support for Hong Kong. Lee highlighted that many non-Chinese permanent residents have deep roots in Hong Kong and are eager to take advantage of the opportunities presented by China's rapid development.

Lee expressed confidence that this permit would provide significant convenience for international talent working in Hong Kong, allowing easier northbound travel. He noted that the lack of restrictions on nationality or occupation shows Hong Kong's unique status under the 'one country, two systems' principle and enhances its international character and diversity. This, in turn, is expected to attract companies and talent from around the world. This new travel permit is part of a series of more liberal visa measures granted by Beijing to Hong Kong since early 2023. Other measures include launching and expanding the Greater Bay Area exit endorsement for talent in Beijing and Shanghai, extending business visit durations in Hong Kong from seven to 14 days, and introducing multiple-entry 'northbound' visas for foreign employees in the city.

Man charged under new Hong Kong security law over 'seditious' social media posts remanded in custody

21 June 2024, Hong Kong Free Press, James Lee

Social media posts said to be made by Au Kin-wai allegedly involved the words "Revolution is no crime, to rebel is justified," a slogan dating back to China's Cultural Revolution.

A man has been charged under Hong Kong's new security legislation over the publication of "seditious" statements on social media.

Au Kin-wai, 58, did not apply for bail and was taken into custody after he appeared before Magistrate Don So at the West Kowloon Magistrates' Courts on Friday morning.

The social media posts allegedly involved the words "Revolution is no crime, to rebel is justified," a slogan dating back to China's Cultural Revolution, the court heard.

Au, who faces one count of "knowingly publishing publications that had a seditious intention," was not required to enter a plea.

So, handpicked by the government to preside over national security court cases, adjourned the hearing to August 7 to allow the police to look through two phones, a desktop computer, and three laptops seized from Au's home, The Witness reported.

Social media posts

According to a charge sheet provided by the Judiciary, Au had allegedly published seditious statements and images on social media platforms including YouTube, Facebook, and X between March 23 and June 19.

He allegedly made those posts to incite "hatred, contempt or disaffection against the "fundamental system of the state established by the Constitution of the People's Republic of China" as well as Hong Kong's executive, legislative, or judicial authority, and its constitutional order.

It was also alleged that Au intended to "incite any other person to do an act that does not comply with the law of [Hong Kong] or that does not obey an order issued under the law of [Hong Kong]."

Separate to the 2020 Beijing-imposed law, the passage of the Safeguarding National Security Ordinance, known locally as Article 23, was fast-tracked by the city's opposition-free legislature earlier this year after legislation failed in 2003. It came into effect on March 23.

The law has been criticised by rights NGOs, Western states and the UN as vague, broad and "regressive." But authorities have cited perceived foreign interference and a constitutional duty to "close loopholes" after the 2019 protests and unrest.

A 27-year-old man last Friday became the first person to be charged under Article 23. He was denied bail over wearing a t-shirt with a banned protest slogan and a yellow mask printed with statements allegedly intended to incite hatred, contempt or disaffection against the "fundamental system of the state established by the Constitution of the People's Republic of China."

Hong Kongers embrace politics in UK, but some still fear Beijing

21 June 2024, Reuters, Alun John

For Richard Wong, 25, who moved to Britain from Hong Kong two years ago, it "feels strange" taking part in a free election, exercising exactly those rights that he once fought for, knowing that his friends back home no longer can.

"Back in Hong Kong we tried so hard to get democracy and then lost it. And I moved here, and we are actually practicing democracy, but in a very different context," said Wong, who has been knocking on doors as a volunteer for an opposition Labour party candidate in next month's UK general election.

"I still have friends spending their time in prison and I'm ... doing this at the other end of the world."

Since 2021, more than 180,000 Hong Kongers have moved to Britain under a special visa programme set up in response to a crackdown on dissent in their homeland, a former British colony handed back to Beijing in 1997.

China says the crackdown was necessary to restore stability after months of sometimes violent protests in 2019.

When Britain left Hong Kong it offered a limited form of British nationality to residents, which means the Hong Kongers, unlike many newcomers from elsewhere, arrive with the right to vote in the UK.

Britain's national election next month is the first chance they will have to participate in the central ritual of democracy in their adopted home. Many are passionate about the opportunity.

"I know the power of votes. I think if we have that power we should utilise it," said Carmen Lau, a campaign coordinator for Vote for Hong Kong 2024, a group rallying Hong Kongers in the UK to participate in the British election.

Before she moved to Britain, Lau was elected a Hong Kong district councillor in 2019, but later disqualified for refusing to take an oath of loyalty to the territory's mini constitution.

With relations between Britain and China at a low ebb, amid accusations from London that Beijing had intimidated a foreign national on British soil and counter claims of spying activities, some Hong Kongers are still fearful China's reach.

Lau said at cultural events many attendees wore masks and avoided cameras because they were afraid their family back in Hong Kong would be harassed.

"The right to vote is precious, and more Hong Kong people are moving to the UK and we're concerned about China's control and spies, so there is a need to speak out," said one Hong Konger in the UK, Kate, 33, who declined to give her full name as she was fearful of reprisals.

China's intelligence agency says trial of Hong Kong 47 a 'major test' of national security, rule of law

19 June 2024, Hong Kong Free Press, Hans Tse

The Ministry of State Security said the verdict in the trial of the 16 defendants who pleaded not guilty to conspiring to commit subversion was a deterrent to "anti-China forces and foreign forces."

China's intelligence agency has called the landmark case involving 47 Hong Kong pro-democracy figures a "major test" of national security and rule of law.

The Ministry of State Security on Tuesday also said the verdict in the trial of the 16 defendants who pleaded not guilty to conspiring to commit subversion was a deterrent to "anti-China forces and foreign forces."

"Those who dare to challenge the bottom line of China's national security will be severely punished by the law," the ministry said in a Chinese-language post on WeChat.

Thirty-one defendants had earlier pleaded guilty to taking part in the conspiracy over their roles in an unofficial primary election in 2020. The High Court last month found 14 others guilty and acquitted two after a trial that lasted 118 days.

Tuesday's remarks marked the first time the ministry, which is in charge of the country's intelligence activities, weighed in on the city's largest national security case to date. The court is set to hear mitigation pleas from the 45 defendants convicted under the Beijing-imposed security law from June 25.

"Among the 45 people that were convicted, there were instigators of 'black-clad violence,' participants of the illegal 'Occupy Central' campaign, and leaders of anti-Hong Kong organisations," the ministry said, referring to the 2014 civil disobedience campaign also known as the Umbrella Movement and the protests and unrest in 2019.

"A criminal and wicked idea brought them together and led them on a path of no return," it added.

The ministry singled out former law professor Benny Tai, the key organiser of the primary election, as the "chief culprit" of the scheme that it said was directed at sabotaging the functioning of the city government and overthrowing state power. Tai was among those who pleaded guilty.

"The anti-China forces led by Benny Tai... through illegally trying to obtain a majority in the Legislative Council and vetoing the government budget indiscriminately, would create a crisis in governance," the ministry said.

Although a key argument of the defence was that the power to veto the government budget is written into Hong Kong's mini-constitution the Basic Law, the three judges presiding over the case ruled that the abuse of such power would create a "constitutional crisis" and therefore would be illegal.

The ministry praised the lengthy trial as it "balanced the need to safeguard national security and to protect the rights and freedoms of the defendants." Most of the 47 democrats have been detained since being taken into police custody on February 28, 2021, ahead of a marathon bail hearing.

The judgement had set out clear rulings of major legal disputes under the security law, the ministry said. "The court's rulings clarified the definition and regulation of 'subversion'... It would serve as an important reference to future [national security] cases and have far-reaching implications," it added.

Western governments including the UK, the EU, and Australia condemned the verdict. The US had already imposed sanctions on six Chinese and Hong Kong officials in response to the arrests in 2021, with a congressional committee urging further sanctions to be imposed following the verdict.

The ministry said such calls amounted to interfering in China's internal affairs and were "serious violations of international laws and common principles governing international relations."

They would only make people aware of foreign forces' "despicable scheme of leveraging Hong Kong to suppress China," it added.

The defendants are expected to receive sentencing after their mitigation hearings, which could carry up to life behind bars.

Last week, the Department of Justice said it had filed an appeal against the acquittal of barrister Lawrence Lau, but not that of social worker Lee Yue-shun. Both Lau and Lee are former district councillors.

Beijing inserted national security legislation directly into Hong Kong's mini-constitution in June 2020 following a year of pro-democracy protests and unrest. It criminalised subversion, secession, collusion with foreign forces and terrorist acts – broadly defined to include disruption to transport and other infrastructure. The move gave police sweeping new powers and led to hundreds of arrests amid new legal precedents, while dozens of civil society groups disappeared. The authorities say it restored stability and peace to the city, rejecting criticism from trade partners, the UN and NGOs.

Since then, 128 people had been convicted under the security law, according to the security bureau.

17 people jailed up to 5 years, 10 months over attempted escape from besieged Hong Kong campus during 2019 protests

18 June 2024, Hong Kong Free Press, Kelly Ho

Seventeen people have received jail sentences ranging from one year and eight months to five years and 10 months after they were convicted over dramatic rope escapes from a besieged Hong Kong university during the 2019 protests.

District Judge Lily Wong on Tuesday meted out prison terms to 17 people who were involved in daring attempts to flee the Hong Kong Polytechnic University (PolyU) in mid-November 2019.

Dozens of protesters shimmied down ropes from a footbridge to flee the campus in Hung Hom, which was surrounded by the police amid violent clashes between protesters and officers. Some people drove cars and motorcycles to pick up the protesters, and many vehicles were intercepted by police as they tried to leave the scene.

Lin Bin, Chan Chun-fung, Mak To and Lee Man-hei, who pleaded guilty to rioting before the trial began, were each jailed for three years and eight months. A charge of perverting the course of justice earlier levelled against them was put on court file and was not pursued by the prosecution.

The remaining defendants were convicted of intending to pervert the course of justice after trial.

Ng Wai-nam, Leung Cheuk-fung, Leung Wing-yan, Lau Shuk-wa, Tom Wong, Lam Yam-to, Cheok Yuen-yi and Lai Ching-yin were also found guilty of rioting. All but Cheok were sentenced to 70 months behind bars. Cheok's jail term was reduced to 60 months because she was a minor at the time of the offence.

Ho Ying-kit, Sin Wang-chun, Lam Sze-nga and Cheung Chung-hee, who only faced the perverting justice offence, were each jailed for 20 months.

Chan Chun-yeung, who pleaded guilty to an additional charge of dangerous driving, was given a two-year prison term.

The case originally involved two more defendants, who were earlier sentenced to a training centre.

In jailing the defendants, Wong said the authorities had issued daily warnings urging the public not to go to PolyU. The defendants had been "stubborn" and ignored such warnings, the judge said, concluding that they must have been on the side of the "black-clad" protesters.

"They agreed with the violence," Wong said in Cantonese, adding that some defendants who had been PolyU students were responsible for "destroying their school campus."

The judge went to say that the defendants had tried to evade arrest with their escape attempt, which "seriously undermined the administration of judicial justice."

Under Hong Kong laws, rioting is punishable by up to ten years in prison, although jail terms meted out by the District Court are capped at seven years.

Tuesday's sentencing was held in the court's largest courtroom, designed to hold up to 50 defendants and in which the view of the dock is partially restricted. Those sitting in the seats on the right-hand side of the courtroom must rely on a video livestream to get a clear view of the judge and the defendants.

As a result, family members and friends of the defendants had to stand up from their seat or swarm to the back of the counsels' desk to wave at their loved ones. Some also made a heart gesture with their hands.

Protests erupted in June 2019 over a since-axed extradition bill. They escalated into sometimes violent displays of dissent against police behaviour, amid calls for democracy and anger over Beijing's encroachment.

Demonstrators demanded an independent probe into police conduct, amnesty for those arrested and a halt to the characterisation of protests as "riots."

Three arrested in Hong Kong for 'insulting' Chinese anthem at World Cup qualifier

07 June 2024, The Guardian

Police say spectators 'turned their backs toward the pitch and did not stand for the playing of the national anthem'

Three people have been arrested for turning their backs and remaining seated when China's national anthem was played prior to Hong Kong's home World Cup qualifier against Iran, police have said.

Football spectators in Hong Kong used to boo the Chinese anthem as a show of political discontent, but the government banned the practice in 2020 as part of a wider crackdown after huge democracy protests in the city.

At Hong Kong Stadium on Thursday, police said, two men and a woman were arrested because they “turned their backs toward the pitch and did not stand for the playing of the national anthem”.

“Police stressed that anyone who publicly and intentionally insults the national anthem in any way commits a crime,” a police statement said.

The three arrested were between the ages of 18 and 31. If convicted they face up to three years in jail and a fine of HK$50,000 (£5,000/US$6,400).

Hong Kong’s hopes of reaching the next stage of qualifying for the 2026 World Cup were already over and they went on to lose the game to Iran 4-2.

Hong Kong is a special administrative region of China but competes in its own name in many international sports, including football.

During the politically tumultuous 2010s, the Hong Kong team became a vessel for civic pride and occasionally anti-government sentiment.

At the time, the Chinese national anthem was routinely drowned out by boos before Hong Kong matches, enraging local and mainland officials.

Soon after Beijing imposed a sweeping national security law on Hong Kong in 2020, the finance hub passed a separate local law criminalising insults towards the anthem.

Heavy security in China and Hong Kong on 35th anniversary of Tiananmen crackdown

04 June 2024, NPR

Checkpoints and rows of police vehicles lined a major road leading to Beijing's Tiananmen Square on Tuesday as China heightened security on the 35th anniversary of a bloody crackdown on pro-democracy protests.

China has long quashed any memory of the killings, when the Chinese government ordered in the army to end the months-long protests and uphold Communist rule. An estimated 180,000 troops and armed police rolled in with tanks and armored vehicles, and fired into crowds as they pushed toward Tiananmen Square.

The death toll remains unknown to this day. Hundreds, if not thousands are believed to have been killed in an operation that started the night before and ended on the morning of June 4, 1989.

The crackdown became a turning point in modern Chinese history, ending a crisis in favor of Communist Party hardliners who advocated for control instead of political reforms.

The economy boomed in the ensuing decades, turning a once impoverished country into the world's second largest economy, but societal controls have been tightened since party leader Xi Jinping came to power in 2012.

Across China, the event remains a sensitive and taboo subject that is heavily censored, and any mention or reference on social media is erased.

It was just another day in the Chinese capital, with hundreds of tourists lining the streets leading to gates to enter Tiananmen Square and the Forbidden City, the former imperial palace that sits across from the north side of the square. Those who lost family members in the crackdown are generally prevented from gathering or grieving in public.

Asked by a foreign journalist for comment on the 35th anniversary during a daily foreign ministry briefing on Monday, spokesperson Mao Ning shrugged off the event.

“The Chinese government has long since come to a clear conclusion on the political disturbance that took place in the late 1980s,” she said, without elaborating.

Tiananmen Mothers, a group formed by families of the victims, made an online appeal to the Chinese government to publish the names and numbers of those who died, grant compensation to the victims and their relatives and pursue the legal responsibility of those responsible.

“The June 4 tragedy is a historical tragedy that the Chinese government must face and explain to its people, and some people in the Government at that time should be held legally responsible for the indiscriminate killing of innocents,” the group said in a letter signed by 114 family members and published on its website, which is blocked in China.

Tiananmen memorials have also been scrubbed out in Hong Kong – for years the only place in China where they could take place. On Tuesday, a carnival organized by pro-Beijing groups was held in a park that for decades was the site of a huge candlelight vigil marking the anniversary.

Police used a new national security law to arrest eight people over the past week for social media posts commemorating the crackdown, including Chow Hang-tung, a former organizer of the vigil. Several pro-democracy activists told The Associated Press that police had inquired about their plans for Tuesday.

Officers were out in force in Causeway Bay, a bustling shopping district close to the park where the vigil was held. Police briefly detained a performance artist the previous evening in the same neighborhood.

Some Hong Kong residents remembered the event privately, running 6.4 kilometers (4 miles) on Monday – a reference to the June 4 date – and sharing Tiananmen-related content on social media. The British consulate posted a photo on the social media platform X showing a smartphone's flashlight turned on with "VIIV," the Roman numerals for 6/4, printed on it.

An independent bookstore, which displayed "35/5" on its window – a roundabout reference to the date of the crackdown as May 35th – wrote on Instagram that police officers were stationed outside the shop for an hour on Sunday, during which they recorded the identity details of customers.

Hong Kong's leader John Lee did not answer directly when asked Tuesday whether residents could still publicly mourn the crackdown. He urged residents not to let down their guard against any attempts to cause trouble.

"The threat to national security is real," Lee said at a weekly briefing. "Such activities can happen all of a sudden and different people may use different excuses to hide their intention."

Commemorative events have grown overseas in response to the silencing of voices in Hong Kong. Vigils were planned in Washington, D.C., London, Brisbane and Taipei among other cities this year, as well as a growing number of talks, rallies, exhibitions and plays.

China and Hong Kong reportedly detain dissidents before Tiananmen Square anniversary

03 June 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidson

Events marking 35 years since troops ended peaceful protest with deadly violence are banned in China and Hong Kong

Chinese and Hong Kong authorities have arrested or put under surveillance several dissidents before the anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre this week, according to human rights groups.

On 4 June it will be 35 years since Chinese soldiers shut down a weeks-long peaceful protest with violence, killing anything from several hundred to several thousand people.

Commemorative events are planned in cities around the world, including Tokyo, London, Taipei and New York – where a museum dedicated to the massacre was opened last year – but not in the country where it occurred.

The event has been banned from public acknowledgment in China, prompting those who want to commemorate or discuss it to find creative ways to get around censors to avoid persecution.

Human Rights Watch said several individuals connected to the 4 June remembrance had been put under surveillance or temporarily moved from their homes by authorities. Among them were Zhan Xianling, a founding member of the Tiananmen Mothers group of victims' relatives, the human rights lawyer Pu Zhiqiang, and the Guizhou student leader Ji Feng.

Mentions of the anniversary are largely impossible on China's strictly controlled internet and media. Even obscure references in photos, words and dates are often blocked from social media posts.

Famous photographs, such as that of the "tank man", are banned, but so too are images or mentions of yellow rubber ducks after the toy became a popular replacement image. In 2022, one of China's most popular shopping influencers was abruptly taken off air after a cake shaped like a tank was briefly shown on his live stream.

In the lead-up to the anniversary, some platforms and institutions appeared to be removing any opportunity for memorial posts. On its Weibo account on Friday, World of Warcraft said its website would be undergoing maintenance from 3-5 June, and users would be unable to log in or leave messages. On Saturday, a secondary school in Shanxi issued a notice to staff telling them not to post on social media until notified, and that assembly and religious activities were banned on 4 June, according to "Teacher Li", who runs an information-sharing and activism-monitoring account on X.

For three decades, the largest Tiananmen memorial event was held in Hong Kong, but under a tightening crackdown by the city's government against the pro-democracy movement, that too has been banned. Attempts to organise candlelit vigils across the city and in homes have resulted in arrests.

Last week, Hong Kong police used a new national security law to arrest seven people, accusing them of publishing messages with seditious intent ahead of an "upcoming sensitive date".

The police searched homes and seized electronic devices. "Those who intend to endanger national security should not imagine that they can avoid police pursuit anonymously online," the police said.

One of the women arrested was already in prison. Local media identified her as Chow Hang-tung, a prominent barrister and human rights activist who has been jailed on other charges.

Chow's case is the subject of a documentary that will be screened at a 4 June event in Japan on Tuesday. She had been an organiser of Hong Kong's Tiananmen Vigils, with the since-disbanded Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Patriotic Democratic Movements of China. However, in December 2022, she and others were charged with "inciting others to take part in an unauthorised assembly". Chow was acquitted, but that was then overturned by the court of appeal in January.

"The Chinese government is seeking to erase memory of the Tiananmen massacre throughout China and in Hong Kong," said Maya Wang, the acting China director at Human Rights Watch. "But 35 years on, the government has been unable to extinguish the flames of remembrance for those risking all to promote respect for democracy and human rights in China."

The introduction of two new national security laws since 2020 have driven a climate of fear and self-censorship in Hong Kong, where activists, media, and others say it is not clear where the red lines are for authorities.

In its most recent issue, Hong Kong's Christian Times newspaper published mostly blank space on its front page. It also did not publish it online as usual, saying it could not do so because of "circumstances".

In an editorial, the paper, which in the past has often published articles about the Tiananmen anniversary, said society had become "restrictive", and it could only "respond to the current situation by turning paragraphs into blank squares and white space".

"Even a prayer that originates from historical memories may arouse 'concern'," it said.

"Facing history honestly is not to perpetuate grievances, nor to smear and incite, but to give future repentance and reconciliation a solid foundation."

'Hong Kong 47' trial: 14 activists found guilty of conspiracy to commit subversion

30 May 2024, The Guardian, Helen Davidson

Western governments condemn verdict in biggest case since introduction of national security law

Fourteen people have been found guilty of subversion by a court in Hong Kong in the biggest case against pro-democracy campaigners – against a group known as the "Hong Kong 47" – since China imposed a national security law to crush dissent.

A panel of judges handpicked by Hong Kong's government found that the convicted people – one organiser and 13 candidates, almost all of them former politicians – had committed the national security offence of "conspiracy to subvert state power" by holding unofficial election primaries in 2020.

The 10-month trial finished in December, more than 1,000 days after the cohort were first arrested. Among the guilty are former lawmakers and activists including the politician Helena Wong, the veteran campaigner Leung "Long Hair" Kwok-hung, the journalist Gwyneth Ho, and the Hong Kong-Australian dual national Gordon Ng.

Condemnation from rights groups and western governments was swift. Human Rights Watch's acting China director, Maya Wang, said the convictions showed "utter contempt for both democratic political processes and the rule of law. All Hong Kong wanted was a chance to freely elect their government. Democracy is not a crime, regardless of what the Chinese government and its handpicked Hong Kong court may say."

Australia's foreign minister, Penny Wong, said Canberra was "deeply concerned" by the verdicts and maintained "strong objections" to the broad application of national security legislation to target opposition and civil society.

The UK's minister for the Indo-Pacific, Anne-Marie Trevelyan, said: "Today's verdict will only further tarnish Hong Kong's international reputation. It sends a message that Hongkongers can no longer safely and meaningfully participate in peaceful political debate."

Two defendants, Lawrence Lau Wai-chung, a former district councillor, and Lee Yue-shun, a former social worker, were acquitted. The pair had run as candidates in the primaries and theirs are the first acquittals to be granted after a prosecution under the 2020 national security law (NSL). The justice secretary's legal team said he would appeal against the acquittals, and the judges agreed to extend most of the pair's stringent bail conditions in the meantime.

The 16 people were the only ones to plead not guilty from a group of 47 charged in early 2021 after mass dawn raids on their homes and offices by national security police. Most of the group have been in jail ever since. The 31 who pleaded guilty, including four who testified for the prosecution, are still awaiting the outcome of their cases. The judges had decided to complete the trial of the others before moving on to sentencing.

The 45 convicted campaigners face sentences of up to life in prison.

On Thursday morning all 16 defendants sat in the docks behind a glass panel as the three-judge panel announced the verdict.

Outside court the acquitted men thanked their supporters and urged people to maintain their concern over the other defendants. Lau, a barrister, also urged people to pay close attention to the "reasoning, logic, [and] perspectives of our judges" shown by the verdict.

The judgment, published online, said the cohort's plan to gain a majority in Hong Kong's legislative council – in order to block budgetary bills and force the resignation of the chief executive if she did not agree to the pro-democracy movement's demands – was a violation of Hong Kong's mini-constitution, the Basic Law.

Any act that would "seriously interfere in, disrupt or undermine the performance duties and functions of the government was clearly an act which would endanger national security in Hong Kong", it said. It also set a significant precedent in finding that non-violent acts, like the primaries, could be considered subversion under the wording of the NSL.

The pre-election primaries were held on 11 and 12 July 2020, organised by Benny Tai, a legal scholar and activist who was also an organiser of the 2014 "umbrella movement" protests, for which he served four months of a 16-month prison sentence.

They were not the first primaries to be held in Hong Kong, including by pro-establishment camps, but they occurred less than a fortnight after the introduction of the NSL, imposed by Beijing to help Hong Kong's authorities crush the remaining pro-democracy movement after mass protests in 2019.

In the days prior, the Hong Kong minister Erick Tsang warned in an interview that the primaries could violate the NSL. But organisers went ahead, and more than 600,000 Hong Kong residents took part, in what was widely interpreted as an act of protest against the government crackdown.

The election that the primaries were preparing for was later postponed by the government, ostensibly because of the pandemic. By the time it was rescheduled, the government had overhauled the electoral system to ensure that only pro-Beijing "patriots" could run.

Thursday's guilty verdicts had been largely expected, but outside the court, supporters wept. Hundreds had attended the hearing, some lining up overnight to secure a seat. Grandma Wong, a well-known activist, waved a Hong Kong flag outside and shouted in protest.

One supporter had arrived at 4am. "I want to go inside to show my support [for the defendants]," she said. "This is a case about the election and I think the government is putting some unreasonable charges against them, and it's not acceptable."

She declined to give her name for fear of being identified, but said she was not worried about attending court in support of the pro-democracy figures. "It's our right to have an open court and to go inside and listen."

The case has been widely criticised by human rights and legal groups and foreign governments. It has been accused of being politically motivated, and of denying procedural fairness with a judge-only trial that stretched out over the course of months with repeated delays.

The Hong Kong government crackdown has left the city with essentially no active political opposition. Scores of people have been arrested or jailed, others scared into silence. Many have fled overseas, including some who were facing charges. The Hong Kong government has issued large bounties for several "fugitives", leading several countries hosting exiled Hongkongers to tear up their bilateral extradition agreements.

Hong Kong trade offices 'keep an eye' on 'anti-China' activities

21 May 2024, RFA, Kit Sung and Kwong Wing

A top adviser in the Hong Kong cabinet appears to confirm that the offices are engaged in political espionage.

The role of Hong Kong's overseas Economic and Trade Offices has changed, and should include "keeping an eye" on 'anti-China' activities, a top government adviser has said, appearing to confirm claims that the offices have been targeting pro-democracy activists on foreign soil.

Regina Ip, a former secretary for security who is currently convenor of the city's Executive Council, or cabinet, made the comments after British Police three men with spying for the Hong Kong authorities, accusing them of running surveillance and other operations targeting exiled democracy activists on U.K. soil.

Pro-democracy demonstrators, seen wearing masks depicting former British consulate worker Simon Cheng, gather outside the British Consulate-General building in Hong Kong on Nov. 29, 2019.

Hong Kong and Chinese officials typically refer to pro-democracy activists at home and overseas as "anti-China" forces, accusing them of trying to undermine the government with the help of foreign powers.

Ip appeared to refer to those activists in an interview with Hong Kong's Now News on May 18.

"A group of anti-China members in [the U.K. Parliament] and some Hong Kong exiles are causing trouble there, often introducing bills against the city and even calling for sanctions," she said.

"The [trade office] must pay attention, probably by gathering intelligence," she said in comments reported by the English-language South China Morning Post newspaper. "Such so-called gathering of intelligence means merely paying attention to these developments."

Ip's comments came as Bill Yuen, an office manager at the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office in London who holds dual Chinese and British nationality, prepares to appear at the Old Bailey on May 24 charged with "assisting a foreign intelligence service" and "foreign interference" under the National Security Act 2023.

Yuen's co-defendants, Peter Wai, 38 and Matthew Trickett, 37, face similar charges, and the trio stand accused of forcing and entering a property in the U.K. and of targeting exiled Hong Kong activists on British soil, according to the Metropolitan Police.

The accusations come amid growing concerns over Chinese Communist Party infiltration of all aspects of British life, and warnings from Hong Kongers in exile over growing acts of violence by Beijing supporters and officials alike.

More than economic activities

Political commentator Benson Wong said Ip's comments will likely damage the reputation of the trade offices.

"Regina Ip's comments ... seem to confirm that some staff working in the London office aren't engaged in economic and cultural activities," Wong said.

"It's still unclear whether the Economic and Trade Office will be required to abide by certain commitments, or even have some of its privileges canceled," he said.

U.S.-based exiled activist Anna Kwok, who heads the U.S.-based Hong Kong Democracy Council, said the Hong Kong offices have long spied on overseas activists wherever they are located.

"We've always had good reason to believe that the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Offices are carrying out a lot of activities including monitoring Hong Kongers, not just in the U.K., but in the United States as well," she said.

"We've heard in the past few years of Economic and Trade Offices monitoring Hong Kongers in the United States," said Kwok, who has an arrest warrant and a bounty on her head issued by Hong Kong's national security police.

"The simplest example is that when we go to a demonstration, people we suspect are employees of the Economic and Trade Offices take photos of everyone there to identify them."

"One person told us that he was asked about the Hong Kong Democracy Council at a very ordinary dinner by a member of staff at the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Office, including personal information about the Council's members," Kwok said.

Kwok said the Hong Kong Democracy Council will step up its campaign for a bill banning the offices to be introduced to Congress.

Gathering intelligence

Meanwhile, Regina Ip said foreign consulates in Hong Kong likely also engage in such activities.

"I believe that each of the consulates based in Hong Kong is gathering intelligence. Some of the intelligence is publicly available, [such as] TV programmes, media and online information," she said.

"If our personnel are making similar collection efforts at the [trade offices], why would it be against the law? I really do not understand," Ip said.

U.K.-based Hong Kong activist Simon Cheng, who has reported being followed on April 9 in central London by unidentified people speaking Mandarin, said Ip should know the difference between a consulate and Hong Kong's trade offices, which aren't regulated by the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations.

"Some countries allow the Hong Kong Economic and Trade Offices a quasi-diplomatic status, but that's up to the host country to allow them that courtesy," Cheng said. "Some countries may do this according to agreements signed with the Hong Kong government, but such agreements aren't regulated by the Vienna Convention either."

"Such diplomatic courtesies can easily be revoked unilaterally," he said.

Cheng, a former trade representative for Scotland based at the British consulate in Hong Kong who was detained and tortured by Chinese state security police during the 2019 protest movement, said consulates have teams of staff dedicated to gathering news and information about their host country or city, but such newsgathering is part of legitimate attempts to understand the places they are posted to, and to get a feel for public opinion there.

China's ambassador to the United Kingdom Zheng Zeguang expressed "serious concerns" to the British government about the spying accusations on May 15, saying the case had been "fabricated" to "smear and attack" the Hong Kong government.

"All those accusations are groundless and slanderous," Zheng said in comments posted to the embassy website, accusing the British police of "wantonly harassing, arresting and detaining" Chinese citizens in the U.K.

Eleven people including Yuen, Wai and Trickett were arrested in a nationwide operation but eight were later released without charge, the Metropolitan Police said on May 13.

"This constitutes a grave provocation against China and severely contravenes basic norms of international relations. It is totally unacceptable," Zheng said.

YouTube agrees to remove videos of banned Hong Kong protest song

15 May 2024, VOA

YouTube says it will block access in Hong Kong to videos of performances of a banned protest song.

Hong Kong's Court of Appeal ruled last week that "Glory to Hong Kong," which emerged as an anthem for protesters during the massive anti-government protests in 2019, is illegal to sing or play in the city. The ruling said the song's composer intended for the song to be used as a "weapon."

There was no immediate comment from the government in Hong Kong.

The ban covers anyone who either broadcasts or distributes the song with the intention of promoting Hong Kong's independence or misrepresents it as the city's official anthem. Hong Kong is a semi-autonomous city.

YouTube said in a statement Wednesday that it will block access in the Chinese city to 32 videos of the song, which the court deemed was "prohibited content."

"We are disappointed by the Court's decision but are complying with its removal order," the online video sharing service said. The company said it shared concerns with human rights organizations about the chilling effect the ban would have on free speech online, and that it is considering options to file an appeal.

A search for the 32 videos in Hong Kong resulted in a message saying they were "not available on this country domain due to a court order."

The song has mistakenly been played at sporting events as the official anthem of Hong Kong. The city does not have its own anthem, instead using mainland China's official anthem "March of the Volunteers."

The appeal court's ruling overturned a previous decision issued last year by the High Court, which cited free speech concerns. The government went to court last year to have the song banned after Google and other internet service providers refused to remove it from their search results.

YouTube and Google are owned by California-based Alphabet.

The ban is the latest action taken by the government to silence dissenting voices since Beijing passed a sweeping security law for Hong Kong in 2020 in response to the protests. The law punishes anyone believed to be carrying out terrorism, separatism, subversion of state power or collusion with foreign forces.

Since the law took effect, hundreds of pro-democracy advocates have been arrested, tried and jailed, and the city's once-vibrant civil society has been stifled.

George Chen, the co-chair of digital practice at the Washington-based business and policy consultancy Asia Group, said the ban could hurt Hong Kong's reputation as a global financial hub if officials pressure online platforms on a daily basis to remove content, as it could raise questions about its willingness to allow the free flow of information.

Beijing adds 8 mainland Chinese cities to Hong Kong solo traveller scheme, with residents in parts of Inner Mongolia, Xinjiang and Tibet to benefit

11 May 2024, SCMP, Cannix Yau and Jeffie Lam

People from eight mainland Chinese cities in remote regions such as Inner Mongolia, Xinjiang and Tibet will be able to visit Hong Kong without the need to join group tours after Beijing announced it would further expand a solo traveller scheme to boost the tourism sector.

The National Immigration Administration said on Saturday residents in the cities would be able to apply to visit from May 27.

The eight cities are all provincial and regional capitals: Taiyuan in Shanxi; Hohhot in Inner Mongolia; Harbin in Heilongjiang; Lhasa in Tibet; Lanzhou in Gansu; Xining in Qinghai; Yinchuan in Ningxia; and Urumqi in Xinjiang.

Under the Individual Visit Scheme, tourists can apply for a visa which allows them to stay in Hong Kong or Macau for up to seven days at a time. They can choose from single-entry or double-entry visas valid for three months or a year.

Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu expressed gratitude to Beijing for further expanding the scheme, which brought the number of cities covered to 59.

"I thank the central government for its keen concern for Hong Kong and its full support ... The central government once again actively responded to the Hong Kong government's suggestions," he said.

Lee said at the end of last month that he would urge Beijing to expand the scheme.

"[The expanded scheme] covers all provincial capital cities across the country, carrying great significance for boosting Hong Kong's tourism industry and overall economic development, and promoting people-to-people ties between mainland and Hong Kong residents," he said on Saturday.

Lee noted the eight newly added cities all had large populations, high levels of consumption and had recorded rapid economic growth.

He added the move would bring in a huge amount of tourism dollars.

"Further expansion of the individual travel scheme will effectively boost the economic activities of Hong Kong's tourism, retail, catering, hotel and related industries, bringing a large amount of revenue, and at the same time promoting two-way travel between Hong Kong and different provincial capital cities," he said.

Tourism minister Kevin Yeung Yun-hung also pledged to strengthen coordination and maintain communication with relevant agencies and the industry.

"We'll strive to establish and enhance direct flight capacity between Hong Kong and the eight cities, while ensuring the smooth operation of border control points, tourist facilities, hotels and public transport networks to welcome tourists," he said.

Authorities announced the move just two days after Xia Baolong, the director of the Hong Kong and Macau Affairs Office, told Yeung that the local administration must revitalise its offerings amid "profound changes" in the market and treat every corner of the city as a potential spot to lure visitors.

The sector has been struggling to recover, with the number of trips to the city over the Labour Day "golden week" holiday earlier this month hitting just two-thirds of pre-pandemic levels.

The growing trends of mainland visitors making only day trips to the city or choosing to spend their nights in cheaper hotels across the border have also added to the pressure.

Beijing expanded the scheme in February to add tourists from Xian and Qingdao, although the move generated a lukewarm response.

Some residents in the two cities said the arrangements did not change much, suggesting individual travellers who held group tour visas had made independent trips to Hong Kong for years. Travel agents also said there had been no jump in bookings.

Pang Yiu-kai, chairman of the Hong Kong Tourism Board, called the latest expansion a "gift" for the sector, saying Beijing's decision to update the scheme twice in three months reflected its "full support and confidence" in the city.

He said the eight newly added cities had a combined population of more than 33 million.

"With the new measures facilitating visitor arrivals to Hong Kong, the city will be able to tap into a broader range of source cities and explore new sources of visitors," Pang said.

The Tourism Board said it would immediately step up promotional activities in these cities, including partnering with mainland social media platforms, the travel trade and airlines to promote the latest offerings.

Hong Kong Tourism Association executive director Timothy Chui Ting-pong also hailed the move as a "big gift" from Beijing and said it would provide a great boost to the industry, which was a key driver for the city's economic recovery.

"They are all wealthy cities with good spending power. In the past there might not be many chances for them to travel outside. Hong Kong may be their first cross-border destination in recent years," he said.

"These groups of additional mainland tourists will definitely stay overnight in Hong Kong, with many expected to use up the seven days allowed under the visa."

Chui also described the expanded scheme as a "strategic move" as it would prove helpful for the city's role as an aviation hub and a gateway for new groups of mainland tourists to travel to the rest of the world for business purposes.

"It will prompt local airlines to strengthen their capacity and extend their aviation network to provide more direct flights between Hong Kong and these mainland destinations," he said. "This will definitely enhance Hong Kong's role as an international aviation hub."

The Airport Authority said it currently had direct flights with four of the eight additional cities, adding that airlines were planning to start scheduled flights to and from Harbin and add more flights to and from Urumqi next month.

But Simon Lee Siu-po, an honorary fellow at the Asia-Pacific Institute of Business at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, took a less optimistic view of the scheme's expansion, saying the new initiative would not bring tremendous benefits.

"There will be some positive effects. But the mainland economy continues to be sluggish with shrinking purchasing power," he said. "It may not produce an immediate result and the impact will only be short term."

Lee said Hong Kong should avoid relying on mainland authorities for more sweeteners under the solo travel scheme, adding it should focus on strengthening its competitiveness and attraction to overseas tourists.

Hong Kong court ban on pro-democracy anthem 'Glory to Hong Kong' sparks new fears over heightened censorship in Hong Kong

08 May 2024, HongKong Watch

Today a Hong Kong appeals court approved the Hong Kong government's application to ban the pro-democracy anthem 'Glory to Hong Kong', overturning a lower court ruling in July 2023 that rejected the government's bid due to free speech concerns. The judgement comes in the wake of the enactment of the Safeguarding National Security Bill, known as "Article 23 legislation", in Hong Kong, which will further criminalise internationally-guaranteed rights and freedoms in the city.

Three Court of Appeal judges ruled that the government's injunction was "necessary" to remove "problematic videos" from online platforms. This follows numerous incidents at international sporting events in which 'Glory to Hong Kong', popularised during the 2019 protests, has been mixed up with the People's Republic of China's anthem 'March of the Volunteers'.

The injunction will prohibit anyone from "[b]roadcasting, performing, printing, publishing, selling, offering for sale, distributing, disseminating, displaying or reproducing in any way" the song and its lyrics "with the intent of...inciting others to commit secession," "with a seditious intention," or "in such a way...as to be likely to be mistaken as the national anthem" of Hong Kong, "suggest that the [Hong Kong Special Administrative Region] is an independent state... with intent to insult the national anthem." The injunction will apply to "any internet-based platform or medium" and their global operations.

When the Hong Kong government first bid to ban 'Glory to Hong Kong' last year, Hong Kong Watch led more than 24 civil society organisations in writing a joint letter to Daniel Ek, CEO of Spotify, Tim Cook, CEO of Apple Inc, Sundar Pichai, CEO of Alphabet Inc and Google LLC, Linda Yaccarino, CEO of Twitter Inc, and Mark Zuckerberg, CEO and Chairperson of Meta Platforms Inc., urging them to oppose the injunction that will effectively ban intermediaries from broadcasting or distributing online, including on YouTube, the 2019 protest song. The letter emphasised how the injunction will have a disastrous impact on the rights to freedom of expression and access to information not only in Hong Kong, but also globally.

Benedict Rogers, co-founder and Chief Executive Officer of Hong Kong Watch, said:

"It is profoundly disturbing and revealing that the Hong Kong authorities find a song a threat to their security. Hong Kong Watch remains gravely concerned about the implications of this injunction that will be used to censor 'Glory to Hong Kong' in Hong Kong and around the world. This case has dire implications for internet freedoms and the operation of internet service providers and technology firms such as Google and Apple.

We urge the international community to respond to this act of censorship by calling out the dangers of the city's national security laws that do not defend national security, but safeguard the authorities' increasing repression of the rights and freedoms of individuals. Business is not as usual in Hong Kong."

China says Hong Kong must 'tightly hold' national security line to safeguard development

15 April 2024, Reuters

China's top official on Hong Kong affairs said the city should "tightly hold" onto the bottom line of national security to safeguard development, in a speech coming weeks after the enactment of sweeping new security laws.

"To move towards governance and prosperity, we need to tightly hold onto the bottom line of national security in order to safeguard the high quality development of Hong Kong," said the director of Beijing's Hong Kong and Macau Affairs Office, Xia Baolong, in a speech to mark an annual national security day.

Hong Kong in March enacted a new national security law, also known as article 23, that updates or introduces new laws to prohibit treason, sabotage, sedition, the theft of state secrets and espionage, with jail terms of up to life imprisonment.

Xia, however, sought to emphasise that the law posed no threat to investors, at a time when the city has faced Western criticism of a protracted crackdown on dissent, and has struggled economically and financially.

"For the general public of Hong Kong and foreign investors, this law is the protector of their rights, freedoms, property and investment," Xia said.

"Investors from all over the world can come to Hong Kong to invest in new businesses bravely and without concerns," he added. "Hong Kong remains the best place in the world to do business and make money and achieve your dreams."

Some foreign governments including the United States and Britain, however, have criticised the new law as fresh tool for authorities to clamp down on dissent. The legislation adds to another national security law China directly imposed on Hong Kong in 2020 in response to mass pro-democracy protests.

Beijing, however, says the laws are necessary to safeguard the city's stability and prosperity.

The U.S. Consulate General in Hong Kong said on Saturday that visitors to the city should "exercise increased caution" with the State Department updating its travel advisory recently, saying people needed to "exercise a high degree of caution in Hong Kong due to the risk of arbitrary enforcement of local laws".

The security laws have so far been used to jail scores of leading Hong Kong democrats including Joshua Wong, while liberal media outlets and civil society groups have been shut down.

More than 290 people have been arrested under the Beijing imposed national security law so far. Of these, 174 people and five companies have been charged, including prominent China critic and businessman Jimmy Lai – who is currently on trial and could face life imprisonment.

Article 23: China hits back at criticism of Hong Kong's hardline new security law

21 March 2024, The Guardian

China has accused western governments and the United Nations of slander after they criticised Hong Kong's new national security law, which was rushed through the city's pro-Beijing parliament this week.

The law, known as Article 23, covers newly defined acts of treason, espionage, theft of state secrets, sedition and foreign interference. Critics said it was ushering in a "new era of authoritarianism", would further erode the rights and freedoms of residents, and would scare off international business and investment.

US state department deputy spokesperson Vedant Patel said on Tuesday the US believes the law has the potential to accelerate the closing of a once open society. Patel said the crimes outlined in the legislation are poorly defined and that Washington was analysing the potential risks to US citizens and American interests.

The UK, Australia, Japan, Canada and the UN also lodged concerns, while the EU said in a statement the new law had the potential to "significantly" affect the work of its office in the city, as well other organisations and companies.

But the criticisms were dismissed by Beijing's diplomats. Liu Pengyu, spokesperson for the Chinese embassy in the US, said the new law was "legitimate, lawful and beyond reproach".

Liu said it was aimed only at "a tiny minority of individuals that are involved in offences seriously jeopardising national security".

"Foreign institutions, enterprises and personnel's normal activities will be fully protected," he said, saying the US criticism was unfair because it too has many domestic national security laws.

At a regular ministry of foreign affairs press briefing on Wednesday, spokesperson Lin Jian said China's leadership "strongly deplore and firmly oppose individual countries and organisations' slandering and smears against the safeguarding national security bill of Hong Kong".

Lin said the law "upholds the fundamental principle of respecting and protecting human rights and protects in accordance with the law the rights and freedoms which the residents of Hong Kong enjoy".

The law was passed unanimously in Hong Kong's opposition-free parliament on Tuesday, after an unusually short 12-day legislative process and a limited public consultation period of just one month. Hong Kong's chief executive, John Lee, had called for the law to be processed "at full speed".

Authorities said the vast majority of responses from the public were positive, and dismissed many of the negative submissions as coming from "overseas anti-China organisations" or fugitives.

Emily Lau, a veteran pro-democracy politician and former legislator, told the Guardian on Thursday she felt the low number of negative responses were likely due to "self-censorship" in the city, after a years-long crackdown on opposition. "My feeling is there are people who have other views but dare not speak out," she said.

Jeffrey Wasserstrom, a professor of Chinese history at the University of California, said the new law seemed to be the government adding "more levers" to their crackdown.

China Tightens Grip On Hong Kong, Issues New National Security Law Bill

09 March 2024, Business World

Hong Kong on Friday published its draft of a new national security law, a document some lawyers said broadened what could be considered sedition and state secrets, with tougher penalties for anyone convicted of those crimes and several others.

The draft, which includes new laws encompassing treason, espionage and external interference, is being closely watched by foreign diplomats and businesses who fear it could further dent freedoms in the financial hub, which has already been subjected to a China-led crackdown on dissent that has sent many pro-democracy politicians and activists into jail or exile.

The Legislative Council started debating the bill on Friday amid tight security and several members of the largely pro-Beijing body said they expected it to be passed into law before mid-April.

Hong Kong leader John Lee had earlier urged lawmakers to pass the bill "at full speed".

"The geopolitics have become increasingly complex, and national security risks remain imminent," a government statement said.

Some lawyers analysing the draft said that at first glance, elements of the revised sentences for some listed offences are similar to Western ones but some provisions, such as those for sedition and state secrets, are broader and potentially tougher. The bill includes sentences of up to life imprisonment for treason, insurrection and sabotage, 20 years for espionage and 10 years for crimes linked to state secrets and sedition.

The European Union, in a statement to Reuters, said it had made clear in a diplomatic note its "grave concerns" over the far-reaching provisions in the bill on "external interference" and the law's extra-territorial reach.

A spokesperson for the US State Department said the United States is closely monitoring the development of the so-called Article 23 legislation, "and its implications for US citizens and companies operating in Hong Kong."

"We have serious concerns that if authorities rush forward with enacting proposed Article 23 legislation without adequate public consultation or incorporating checks and balances, the law will be used to continue suppressing dissent and erode the human rights and fundamental freedoms for people in Hong Kong," the official said.

The draft bill noted some rights provisions.

"Human rights are to be respected and protected, the rights and freedoms, including the freedoms of speech, of the press and publication, the freedoms of association ... are to be protected," the bill read.

Some investors said the desire to fast-track the bill was concerning.

"The fact they are rushing through Article 23 shows concern about public opposition. The business community is going to be unhappy unless there are guardrails protecting individual rights," Andrew Collier, managing director at Hong Kong-based Orient Capital Research, told Reuters.

Simon Young, a law professor at the University of Hong Kong, also said the broad definitions of crimes, especially those linked to foreign interference and collusion, could prove challenging to firms.

"It may well be that businesses or groups that have some connection with foreign governments might fall under the radar as an 'external force'", Young said.

China removes Hong Kong affairs veteran Zhang Xiaoming from senior role at top advisory body

02 March 2024, South China Morning Post

Zhang Xiaoming, Beijing's former top official on Hong Kong and Macau affairs, has been removed as deputy secretary general of China's top political advisory body.

The decision was endorsed on Saturday at the close of a two-day meeting of the Standing Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), state broadcaster CCTV reported.

The CCTV report was brief and did not give the reason for the removal but did refer to him as "comrade", a title reserved for Communist Party members.

He remains a member of the CPPCC and the party, a source told the South China Morning Post.

China's 'two sessions' 2024: Hong Kong delegates to raise ways to keep city unique, help mainland companies go global

02 March 2024, South China Morning Post

Hundreds of Hong Kong politicians and tycoons are heading to Beijing on Sunday for China's biggest annual political gatherings and will meet top officials and policymakers face to face with few Covid-19 curbs in place for the first time in four years.

This year's meetings of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) and National People's Congress (NPC) will see the country's elites moving around freely without masks after four years of strict Covid-19 pandemic arrangements, although everyone must still do a pre-event nasal swab test.

Chief Executive John Lee Ka-chiu will leave for Beijing on Monday to attend the opening meeting of the NPC, the national legislature, the following day and will also call on central ministries to enhance cooperation and exchange, according to the government.

Lee will also witness the signing of cooperation documents between the Hong Kong Jockey Club and the National Health Commission and the Health Bureau, respectively, on strengthening the training of healthcare talent and commencing projects on prevention and response against local communicable diseases.

He would be joined on the trip by financial services chief Christopher Hui Ching-yu and health minister Lo Chung-mau, a government spokesman said on Saturday.

Known as the "two sessions" meetings, or lianghui, the gatherings come at a time when mainland China and Hong Kong are grappling with sluggish economies and need fresh moves to reinvigorate growth in the face of domestic and external challenges.

The Hong Kong delegates have prepared hundreds of proposals to raise at the meetings, many centred on ideas to attract more mainland tourists, strengthen cross-border integration, and how the city can help mainland companies go global.

Proposals on Hong Kong competitiveness

"The keyword is unique," said CPPCC Standing Committee member Henry Tang Ying-yen, who is chairman of the West Kowloon Cultural District Authority and a former chief secretary.

"If Hong Kong became another Shanghai, Hong Kong would no longer be unique and would become a burden to the central government. We must not be a burden to the central government,” he told the Post. Tang came up with seven proposals to boost the city’s competitiveness, building on its strong financial and legal systems and market, and complementing the country’s pursuit of high-quality development.

To attract more visitors, he will propose raising the duty-free shopping limit for mainlanders from the current 5,000 yuan to 30,000 yuan. He said the idea had the support of two-thirds of the 200 Hong Kong CPPCC members.

The city’s largest pro-Beijing party, the Democratic Alliance for the Betterment and Progress of Hong Kong, has 30 proposals for the central government, including one to “streamline the vetting process” of the stock exchange to encourage more quality mainland companies to list in the city.

The Liberal Party’s Nick Chan Hiu-fung, a delegate to the NPC, said Chinese firms had been affected by historically high inflation rates in Europe due partly to soaring energy prices and some “irresponsible self-serving yet inflation-exporting monetary policies” in the West.

He wants Beijing to promote Hong Kong’s professional services, especially in dispute resolution and the insurance and marine sectors, among mainland businesses.

He said mainland firms might not be aware that they did not need to rely only on “the Western club” for services related to foreign trade and going global.

“Why not think about Hong Kong’s better and cheaper services?” he asked.

Delegates from the Business and Professionals Alliance will be seeking Beijing’s support to promote Hong Kong as a “one-stop professional service platform” for the Belt and Road Initiative, a national development blueprint aiming to link China with the rest of Asia, Europe and Africa.

What to watch for in meetings

Political analysts said there were some things to look out for when the meetings started. The CPPCC, China’s top political advisory body, has its opening session on Monday.

China is still facing multiple headwinds particularly after property investment fell by 9.6 per cent last year. This was despite last year’s economic growth of 5.2 per cent meeting the target of “around 5 per cent”.

The country’s growth targets and government work reports to be unveiled next week will be seen as the first report card for Premier Li Qiang and other state leaders who took up their new roles a year ago.

These announcements, together with the state leaders’ closed-door exchanges with Hong Kong delegates, will also provide clues to Beijing’s strategies and priorities for the city in the coming year.

Lau Siu-kai, a consultant from the semi-official Chinese Association of Hong Kong and Macau Studies think tank, said some key issues expected to surface during the two sessions meetings were linked to Hong Kong: the mainland’s downturn in the real estate market, stagnant domestic consumption and the lack of foreign investment.

“These are not purely economic problems,” he said. “They were aggravated by suppression and smears by US-led foreign powers. Beijing has to ensure Hong Kong, as an externally oriented economy, will not be susceptible to undesirable influence by foreign forces.”

He said he expected that national security would continue to be a priority in the central government’s consideration of Hong Kong-related policies, even though the city had been calm since Beijing imposed the national security law in 2020.

National security and Hong Kong’s role

The year ahead is expected to be pivotal for the US-China relationship, and observers of the two sessions will be looking for signals from Beijing on this front.

Last year saw a series of high-level bilateral meetings, yet long-standing tensions continue to pose risks.

Washington’s export controls on high-end semiconductors and chipmaking tools to China have no sign of easing.

The latest crossfire occurred on Friday, over Hong Kong’s draft national security legislation, a requirement under Article 23 of the Basic Law, the city’s mini-constitution.

After a US State Department spokesman declared that the proposed legislation would weaken the rights and freedoms of Hong Kong people, Chinese foreign ministry spokeswoman Mao Ning shot back that Washington’s view was “completely naked political manipulation”.

But veteran China watcher Johnny Lau Yui-siu said he did not expect the Article 23 legislation to be raised at any group discussions attended by Hong Kong delegates, possibly reflecting Beijing’s preference that mainlanders not pay attention to the draft law.

He said he felt it was more urgent for top leaders to discuss how to make use of Hong Kong to boost foreign direct investment into the country, after reports suggested that last year’s total was 82 per cent lower than in 2022 and the lowest since 1993.

“Maintaining Hong Kong’s position as an international financial centre is becoming more important than ever to attract overseas investors amid the ongoing geopolitical challenges,” he said.

“But this could be tougher than ever, especially if Beijing continues to emphasise national security in the city.”

China urges U.S. to stop interfering in Hong Kong affairs

01 March 2024, Xinhua

China urges the United States to respect China's sovereignty and immediately stop interfering in Hong Kong affairs, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson said on Friday.

In a press statement, the spokesperson of U.S. Department of State said that the United States is closely monitoring the implications of Hong Kong's national security legislation under Article 23 of the Basic Law for U.S. citizens, investments, and companies operating in Hong Kong and is concerned by the definitions of "state secrets" and "external interference" and the extraterritorial reach of Article 23, alleging that Article 23 would undermine the "one country, two systems" framework.

In response, spokesperson Mao Ning told a daily news briefing that China strongly deplores and firmly opposes the U.S. statement.

Mao noted that completing the legislation on Article 23 of the Basic Law and plugging loopholes to safeguard national security is the constitutional responsibility of the government of Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR) and what must be done for the lasting stability and security in HKSAR and the sound implementation of One Country, Two Systems in the long run.

The just concluded public consultation has shown that the Hong Kong society has reached strong consensus to complete the legislation, Mao added.

The legislation on Article 23 targets a handful of criminals gravely endangering the national security and protects in accordance with law the rights and freedoms which the residents of Hong Kong enjoy under the Basic Law and the provisions of relevant international covenants as applied to Hong Kong, according to the spokesperson.

"Foreign citizens, investments, and companies operating in Hong Kong will also be protected in accordance with law," Mao said.

The extraterritorial effect of Article 23 is in strict compliance with international law and the common practices of all countries and regions, Mao said, adding that "state secrets" and "external interference" are defined with full consideration given to HKSAR's realities and the common practices of all countries. "The legislation is legitimate, lawful and beyond reproach."

The past three years since the Law of the PRC on Safeguarding National Security in the HKSAR was formulated and came into force are a period when Hong Kong has restored order and is set to thrive again, and when the international community cast a vote of confidence in Hong Kong's prospects, Mao said, adding that after the Article 23 legislation is completed, Hong Kong's high-quality development and high-standard opening up will be better guaranteed and Hong Kong residents and international investors will benefit from it.

"The United States has issued troves of laws safeguarding its own national security but thrown dirt on and labeled the legislation on Article 23 of the Basic Law. This is out-and-out political manipulation and hypocritical double standards," Mao said.

Hong Kong is China's Hong Kong and Hong Kong affairs are purely China's internal affairs, which no country is in any position to point fingers at or interfere in, she stressed.

"We urge the United States to respect China's sovereignty, observe the principles guiding international law and the basic norms governing international relations, and immediately stop interfering in Hong Kong affairs which are China's internal affairs," Mao said.

Hong Kong is now over, says China's former good friend

13 February 2024, RFA

Once seen as a good friend of China's and former chairman of Morgan Stanley in Asia, Stephen Roach has said Hong Kong is over, attributing the city's "demise" to its domestic politics, China's structural problems and global developments namely worsening U.S.-China tensions.

"It pains me to admit it, but Hong Kong is now over," Roach wrote in a commentary in the Financial Times on Monday.

"Since the handover to China in 1997, the Hang Seng index has been basically flat, up only about 5%. Over that same period, the S&P 500 has surged more than fourfold; even mainland China's underperforming Shanghai Composite has far outdistanced the Hong Kong bourse."

Roach said the turning point for Hong Kong's decline was when former Chief Executive Carrie Lam introduced the extradition bill that triggered large-scale democratic demonstrations in 2019. Beijing's subsequent imposition of the national security law in 2020 "shredded any remaining semblance of local political autonomy," and cut the 50-year transition period to full Chinese takeover by half, he pointed out.

With the political change came an economic downturn on the back of waning confidence in the business and investment environment, as well as the legal framework, as reflected by foreigners, firms and even locals leaving the city.

According to Roach, Hong Kong's decline was due to a confluence of three factors. The first being local politics. A relatively stable environment was shaken by the 2019-2020 protests, which resulted in the Beijing-centric national security law.

Second was China's economic structural problems. While the Hong Kong stock market has always played a leveraging role in the mainland economy, the Chinese economy has recently "hit a wall". Structural problems, especially with high debt, deflation and an aging population, compounded by the impact of the COVID-19 epidemic and the real estate crisis, have weighed on the Hong Kong market.

Global developments are also not helping, primarily the worsening U.S.-China rivalry since 2018. In addition, the United States' "friendshoring" campaign has put pressure on Hong Kong's Asian allies to choose sides between the U.S. and China, driving a wedge between the city and its trading neighbors.

A "shock bomb"

Financial commentator Ngan Po Kong described the commentary as a "shock bomb" which could prompt others to re-evaluate the political risks of doing business in Hong Kong, given Roach wasn't just an investment banker, but holds sway in economic, political and business circles.

"Roach has been a 'great friend' of China's for many years. He is basically optimistic about China's economic reform and opening up, whether it is political or financial market performance. You can say he is a representative of the mainstream voice on Wall Street, an important voice that represents investment banks and financial institutions," Ngan said in a Radio Free Asia Cantonese talk show.

Separately, the American law firm Latham & Watkins LLP, is cutting off access to its international database for its Hong Kong lawyers this month, according to a separate FT report, citing unnamed sources familiar with the matter

The report said the move underscores the growing difficulties for multinational companies operating in Hong Kong, which made its name as an international financial hub, and comes after Beijing imposed anti-espionage and data laws restricting information flows out of China. The law firm is also separating the Hong Kong database from the rest of Asia to create a new database shared with the Beijing office, the report said.

Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee has vowed to complete legislation of Article 23 of the Basic Law – Hong Kong's mini constitution – with laws to prohibit acts of treason, secession, sedition and subversion against Beijing. Public consultation for the draft law ends this month.

China says Messi's absence in Hong Kong match beyond 'realm of sports' as fury builds

08 February 2024, Reuters

HONG KONG, Feb 8 (Reuters) - Chinese state media, Hong Kong politicians and some fans swiftly condemned Argentine player Lionel Messi's participation in a match in Japan on Wednesday after staying on the bench just days earlier in a highly anticipated game in Hong Kong.

Many in the financial hub were dismayed on Sunday when the 36-year-old did not come onto the field during a much hyped Inter Miami match in front of a sell-out crowd, with fans demanding answers and a refund.

Miami head coach Gerardo "Tata" Martino said Messi was deemed unfit to play in Sunday's friendly in Hong Kong, but he came on as a 60th minute substitute against Vissel Kobe on Wednesday.

China's state-controlled Global Times said Messi's absence posed many questions on the differential treatment for Hong Kong.

"The match in Hong Kong became the only one in Messi's six pre-season friendly matches on this trip where he was absent. The situation ... has magnified these doubts and suspicions on the integrity of Inter Miami and Messi himself."

Some mainland fans travelled 12 hours from Xinjiang to Hong Kong to see Messi, the Global Times wrote, with the disappointment of the government and fans "entirely understandable. The impact of this incident has far exceeded the realm of sports."

Messi apologised to his Chinese fans on Weibo, a Chinese platform similar to X, just ahead of the game on Wednesday, saying it was a real shame he was not able to play in Hong Kong due to an injury.

Hong Kong's Culture, Sports and Tourism Bureau said in a statement that, like the fans, it was very disappointed that Messi could not play in Hong Kong due to injury.

"However three days later, Messi was able to play actively and freely in Japan ... the government hopes the organisers and teams can provide reasonable explanations."

Sports lawmaker Kenneth Fok said the incident "sprinkled salt wounds" on Hong Kong fans, while senior government advisor Regina Ip wrote on X that "Hong Kong people hate Messi, Inter-Miami and the black hand behind them, for the deliberate and calculate snub to Hong Kong."

Scott Wong, a 26-year-old cadet pilot, said that if Messi comes back to play in Hong Kong he would think twice before getting tickets, in case he is injured again. "All the backlash Inter Miami got, plus Messi, I think he feels like he needs to make up for it. That's why he promised to come back and play the game again."

China's Xi Jinping hails progress in integrating Hong Kong and Macau in speech ahead of Lunar New Year

08 February 2024, South China Morning Post

Beijing has succeeded in further supporting the integration of Hong Kong and Macau with the mainland over the past year, Chinese President Xi Jinping said ahead of Lunar New Year.

Xi made the remarks at a state Lunar New Year gathering in Beijing on Thursday morning, according to official news agency Xinhua.

The annual gathering was hosted by Premier Li Qiang and attended by many serving and retired senior officials and generals, as well as a number of prominent scholars.

As he did in previous years, Xi mentioned Hong Kong and Macau, as well as Taiwan, in his speech.

"We have actively supported the better integration of Hong Kong and Macau into the overall development of the country," Xi said.

On Taiwan, he said Beijing had "strongly opposed separatist acts of Taiwan independence and interference by foreign forces, and resolutely defended the country's sovereignty, security and development interests".

William Lai Ching-te of Taiwan's independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party was elected the island's president last month, angering Beijing.

Domestically, he said the task of reform, development and maintaining stability in 2023 was "difficult and heavy".

Beijing regards Taiwan as part of its territory, to be reunified with the mainland by force if necessary. Most countries, including the United States, do not recognise Taiwan as an independent state, but Washington opposes any attempt to take the self-ruled island by force and is committed to supplying it with weapons.

In his speech, Xi described the international environment as "extraordinarily complicated", but he praised China's diplomacy in 2023, saying it had "brought certainty and positive energy to a world of change and chaos".

He said a "good political ecology" had been consolidated over the past year by deepening the struggle against corruption.

An earlier tally by the Post showed that China's anti-corruption watchdog launched investigations into a record 45 senior officials last year, the most since Xi launched his anti-graft campaign in 2013.

Xi also said Beijing had "resolutely implemented" a shift in Covid-19 control measures and promoted "economic recovery and development".

China lifted most of its Covid-19 restrictions in late 2022 and reopened its borders in early 2023. But its recovery lacked momentum as the economy was weighed down by a sluggish stock and property market and massive local debt.

Looking ahead to 2024, Xi said Beijing would "strengthen economic vitality, prevent and reduce risks, and enhance public expectations, so as to consolidate and strengthen the trend of economic recovery and improvement".

China and Hong Kong broaden investment and financing links

24 January 2024, Business Times

HONG Kong announced several measures to deepen financial links with China – including facilitating real estate purchases and expanding the Wealth Connect programme – to further integrate the city with the mainland.

Financial Secretary Paul Chan and other Hong Kong officials outlined six new measures on Wednesday (Jan 24), including opening China's onshore repo market and allowing bonds issued by the Chinese state as well as its policy banks as qualified collateral for the Hong Kong Monetary Authority's (HKMA) Renminbi Liquidity Facility.

Regulators also agreed to allow greater sharing of creditor information to facilitate cross border financing and to deepen the programme for the digital yuan, according to joint statements.

"These policies will further support Hong Kong's role as a key offshore RMB centre and a further rise of foreign holding of China onshore bonds," said Becky Liu, a strategist at Standard Chartered, in a note.

Authorities are stepping up to further financially integrate Hong Kong to the mainland after the city has struggled to regain momentum following years of strict Covid policies and the imposition of a national security law in 2020 that caused thousands to emigrate.

Starting from Feb 26, about 50 financial institutions will be eligible to pledge yuan-denominated onshore bonds as collateral with the HKMA. The de facto central bank said it will continue to explore more usage of onshore bonds.

From the same date, Wealth Connect will allow individual investments to be raised to 3 million yuan (S$563,197) from 1 million yuan, and more funds will become eligible. Chinese and Hong Kong brokers will also be able to pair up to sell wealth management products for the first time, and financial institutions will be allowed to advise clients rather than just execute their trades.

The expansion is coming amid turmoil in both the mainland and Hong Kong markets as China's economy struggles. Chinese and Hong Kong stocks had lost more than US$6 trillion in market value since a 2021 peak, but have rallied this week as Chinese officials signalled they would cut reserve rates and more forcefully support the market.

Hong Kong has been expanding its financial links with China over the past years, including setting up Stock and Bond Connects to allow cross-border investments. Wealth Connect, launched in 2021, allows for investments in the Greater Bay Area, a region of 70 million people that includes Hong Kong and megacities in the southern mainland such as Shenzhen and Guangzhou.

Hong Kong should allow mainland Chinese travellers from more cities to visit on individual trips, industry figures say

15 January 2024, South China Morning Post

Hong Kong should allow visitors from more mainland Chinese cities to come on individual trips to increase the number of tourists staying overnight and strengthen the sector, industry representatives have said.

Alan Chan Chung-yee, the chief operations officer of the Miramar Group, which runs two hotels locally, on Monday noted that daily flights and train services operated between Hong Kong and 26 mainland cities yet they were not covered by an official scheme for individual visitors.

"They comprise 17 cities that can be reached via the high-speed rail link and nine other cities that have direct flights to Hong Kong," he told a radio programme. "If we do not expand the coverage of the scheme, we are wasting these services."

The Individual Visit Scheme, introduced in 2003, allows residents from 49 mainland cities to visit Hong Kong in an individual capacity instead of with tour groups.

Expansions to the scheme have been debated over the years, with past officials citing concerns over sufficient infrastructure and potential disturbances to Hongkongers' daily lives because of an uptick in visitors. The scheme has not added any new cities since 2007.

"It has been 16 years since we last expanded the scheme, and the population of the cities that are currently covered only accounts for 30.1 per cent of the country's overall population," Chan said. "We have not tapped into the individual travel market yet."

The 26 cities serviced by daily flights and trains would add an extra 10.6 per cent of the country's population to the scheme, he said.

Separately, lawmaker Edward Lau Kwok-fan agreed the individual travel scheme should be expanded to more major cities such as Harbin, as its further distance meant visitors were likely to spend more days in Hong Kong if they came.

"Visitors from the mainland remain our main source of tourists," he said at a Democratic Alliance for the Betterment and Progress of Hong Kong (DAB) press conference on Monday.

"Whether they choose to stay overnight or leave the same day, we believe they still have spending power. We should take advantage of that and continue to improve our connectivity with the mainland," he said. He added now was the "right time" to reintroduce the multiple-entry visa scheme for Shenzhen residents, which was halted in 2015 due to overcrowding and parallel trading issues, with the goal of eventually expanding it to the rest of the Greater Bay Area and Guangdong province.

Hong Kong welcomed 34 million visitors last year, with the figure from the Tourism Board for December reaching 65 per cent of the pre-pandemic level.

Economist Andy Kwan Cheuk-chiu said he did not foresee parallel trading problems, which were observed in previous years when the visa was still in place, returning.

"The spending habits of mainland tourists have changed and shopping here is not as attractive," he said. "If it was still a problem, we would have seen hints of it by now."

Chinese University economist Terence Chong Tai-leung agreed, saying: "That was nearly 10 years ago. They can easily find duty-free shopping in other places like Hainan Island [now]."

Both welcomed expanding the individual travel scheme to more cities as well, noting the city's slower-than-expected tourism recovery.

Other economists had previously poured cold water on the schemes in terms of their economic benefits, saying social conflicts could return along with more tourists.

Hong Kong Tourism Board executive director Dane Cheng Ting-yat said recently that it would be unrealistic to expect the number of tourists to reach a record 65 million recorded in 2018, which would "affect tourism experience and push up prices".

The city's largest source of tourists in 2023 was still the mainland, which accounted for more than 26.7 million. The fastest recovering markets were in Southeast Asia.

The number of travellers from the Philippines and Thailand in December were at 116 per cent and 106 per cent of pre-pandemic levels, respectively.

Half of all visitors last year chose to stay overnight, which was higher than before the pandemic.

Chan said the city had enough hotel rooms and border checkpoints to handle a larger number of individual visitors from the mainland.

"Sixteen years ago, there were not enough hotel rooms," he said. "We have 92,000 hotel rooms now and more than 100,000 rooms including guest houses. Last year, there were an average of 17,000 unoccupied hotel rooms per day, which is enough to handle more mainland cities.

"We have also opened many checkpoints in the past 16 years, such as Shenzhen Bay and Liantang-Heung Yuen Wai."

Tourism sector lawmaker Perry Yiu Pak-leung also said hotels could cope with more visitors staying overnight.

"During the New Year's countdown, not all hotels were full, except for those that offered a close view to the fireworks, which were almost full," he said.

"We hope to attract more overnight visitors so that our hotel and service industries can continue to develop in a more stable manner,"

He added that the city should host more events to attract tourists during non-peak seasons and organise more cultural tours to encourage visitors to stay the night.

Yiu said last year's visitor figure had exceeded his expectations, which showed that the industry was recovering. But the average occupancy rate at hotels stood at about 80 per cent as the industry was still facing a staff shortage, he noted.

At the DAB press conference, lawmaker Holden Chow Ho-ding said city authorities should also look into expanding its tourism pool by looking to untapped international markets such as the Middle East.

Lawmaker Vincent Cheng Wing-shun said the government should take better advantage of mega events to attract visitors, such as football superstar Lionel Messi's visit to Hong Kong next month with Inter Miami CF.

"The streets should be filled with football promotions right now, but I don't see it," he said.

Hong Kong crackdown turns Taiwan against China doctrine

15 January 2024, Times of India

TAIPEI: The fate of Hong Kong loomed over this weekend's Taiwan election, with Beijing's clampdown on freedoms in the finance hub turning voters firmly against China's doctrine of "one country, two systems".

Massive city-wide protests kicked off in Hong Kong in 2019, bringing hundreds of thousands of people to the streets demanding greater autonomy from China. Riot police suppressed the at times violent protests, and Beijing enacted a draconian national security law the following year to quell dissent – effectively silencing opposition voices in Hong Kong's once- raucous civil society.

A one-hour flight away in democratic Taiwan, voters watched the news in horror and overwhelmingly cast their ballots for President Tsai Ing-wen in the 2020 election.

Her campaign frequently invoked Hong Kong as a warning of what might lie ahead should China take control of Taiwan, as Beijing claims the island as its territory and has consistently vowed "unification".

Four years on, Hong Kong's current state – quietened with much of civil society slashed and many democracy activists and lawmakers fled abroad – has cemented Taiwanese opinions on China's doctrine governing the former British colony.

"Hong Kong is a case example of the failure of 'one country, two systems' for Taiwanese," Ivy Kwek of the International Crisis Group told AFP.

"A lot of Taiwanese look at Hong Kong and they really see that this is not the kind of (system) they would ever be able to accept."

You Sian-ming, a former police officer and now a travel agency manager, was firm as he declared his opposition to the Chinese doctrine.

"'One country, two systems' is just a lie told by the Chinese Communist Party when they wanted to take Hong Kong back," You told AFP, referring to Hong Kong's handover to China from Britain in 1997.

"It's a play of words to cover up their actual intention."

- Three parties reject -

China has never ruled out the use of force to seize Taiwan, and Chinese President Xi Jinping has in recent years upped the rhetoric of "unification".

But it remains deeply unpopular in democratic Taiwan, which for decades has had its own government, military, flag, and – as more than 90 percent of Taiwanese see it – identity.

The Chinese doctrine of "one country, two systems" permeated the political conversation in the lead-up to Saturday's poll – with all three presidential candidates firmly voicing their opposition to it.

Even the opposition Kuomintang – regarded as having the friendliest ties to Beijing and which campaigned on the platform of fostering closer cooperation with the mainland – resoundingly rejected it.

Kuomintang supporter You said he doesn't like the ruling Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), whose candidate Lai Ching-te comfortably won the top seat Saturday.

But he scoffed at being part of "one country" with China.

"Taiwan is Taiwan. We have our own land, our own government and our own army. I am loyal to only one country and it's called the Republic of China, Taiwan," the 58-year-old told AFP.

Rita Lo, a service industry worker in her 50s, said she cannot accept Taiwan becoming part of communist China in any manner.

"I don't like rule by force. If we become part of China, we won't be able to keep our democracy and our way of life," she said, adding: "Look how miserable Hong Kong has become".

'Not one country' -

The election saw many Hong Kong tourists visiting Taiwan to see the election, with some attending rallies and listening to Taiwanese argue over the different candidates.

"It feels like Hong Kong in 2019 when many people would come out for what they believed," said Gor Gor, 24, who attended DPP's final rally.

She added that whoever the Taiwanese chose, it should be a candidate that would not "let Taiwan morph into another Hong Kong".

Nearly 90 percent of Taiwanese support maintaining the status quo, in which the island neither declares formal independence – as it would enrage China – nor gets enfolded into the mainland.

"I just want to maintain the status quo, meaning not getting any worse but at the same time I am not eager to improve the relationship," said construction worker Mike, 28.

And if China wants "one country, two systems"?

"We are not in, because we are not one country," he said.

Hong Kong, mainland China in talks over bringing back multiple-entry visas for Shenzhen residents before Lunar New Year: government source

11 January 2024, South China Morning Post

Talks are under way between Hong Kong and mainland China to resume a multiple-entry visa scheme for Shenzhen residents before Lunar New Year, a government source has said, with the retail sector praising the potential move as a boost for the economy.

But the insider on Thursday also said a final decision had not been made yet, as many cross-border measures required further discussion with mainland officials.

"It's possible [to resume the scheme before Lunar New Year]," the source said. "The government remains open to any measures that can help promote the city's tourism industry."

The talks were held as the director of Beijing's liaison office in Hong Kong, Zheng Yanxiong, went to Guangzhou to meet Guangdong party secretary Huang Kunming and the province's governor, Wang Weizhong, to exchange views on ways to enhance cooperation and boost development of the Greater Bay Area.

Huang said he hoped the liaison office would continue to guide and support Guangdong in collaborating with Hong Kong to promote construction of the bay area, according to a statement from the office.

He added efforts should be made to strengthen the "hard connectivity" of infrastructure and the "soft connectivity" of systems and rules, accelerate the integration of the bay area market, deepen industrial and technological cooperation, and join hands in building a high-level talent hub in the region.
