Alongside, talks of decoupling, interrupted capital flows, increasing threat posed to the digital space, and uneven distribution of income are adding to the mounting challenges of global economic integration. As societies become more digitally-enabled and technology-driven, there are also heightened concerns about cyber-security, trade wars, surveillance, and sabotage of infrastructural capacities. This gains further traction in light of increasing Chinese footprints in artificial intelligence (AI), procuring critical raw minerals, securing energy sources, strengthening its maritime presence in the South China Sea and, subsequently, aiming to acquire global supremacy. Further, conflicts breaking out across the globe, be it Ukraine or the Gaza Strip, has resulted in stringent economic sanctions by several powers including the United States (US) and the European Union (EU) on Russia and also China. Being one of the largest development providers in the world, the EU is known for its top-notch standards, good regulatory mechanisms, and administrative practices.

Moreover, official development assistance (ODA) equally forms a critical component in supporting the development trajectories of several low-income and other developing economies. Yet, actual on-ground implications of development cooperation continue to be fuzzy. Against this backdrop, geopolitical contestations, such as the intensifying Sino-US rivalry, are now reaching the brink of extreme polarisation in the international landscape. Naturally, the EU is unnerved and finds itself in a sticky spot. Being one of the largest development providers in the world, the EU is known for its top-notch standards, good regulatory mechanisms, and administrative practices. But even after two decades of inking its strategic partnership with India, the true potential of this partnerships remains untapped. On the other hand, the EU's relationship with China has weathered several phases from a 'competitor' and a 'systemic rival', to 'decoupling' and finally 'derisking'. Ambiguous as it seems, it lacks a comprehensive and long-term strategy of tackling China's growing power in multiple domains.

India & China: Two different tales of development

As the international development architecture witnesses an evolution of sorts, the rise of the global South like India and China is pertinent. Attempting to ably shoulder the responsibility of providing technical and humanitarian support towards establishing cooperative frameworks is their way of constructing their own development narrative. However, clubbing New Delhi and Beijing together as like-minded drivers of South-South cooperation (SSC) may not be correct. With different perspectives and praxis, China's development cooperation model is based on a market imperialist strategy aiming to expand its geographic outreach and establish its economic linkages by creating debts and dependencies. Although, post the COVID-19 pandemic, Beijing is attempting to refurbish its global image by stepping into softer sectors like humanitarian development cooperation, sustainable development, climate change, poverty reduction, and creating resilient food supply chains. But its foundational development modality remains the same. In this sense, the recently concluded 24th EU-China Summit in December 2023 yet again failed to bear any constructive results between the two.

With different perspectives and praxis, China's development cooperation model is based on a market imperialist strategy aiming to expand its geographic outreach and establish its economic linkages by creating debts and dependencies.

India's stance to put forth the concerns and voices of the Global South has been acknowledged as a welcome step by the advanced economies, including the EU. By raising issues of food, fuel and fertiliser, India has not only spoken for itself but also on behalf of the diverse set of developing economies who do not find the platform or space to voice their concerns. Also, in the recently concluded 3rd Voice of the Global South Summit, India's shared vision of establishing a four-fold 'global development compact' for realising the SDGs is a significant step. Further, New Delhi's development partnerships have come to occupy a pivotal portion of its development diplomacy in recent years. With an explicit recognition for diversifying sources, avenues and alternatives models of development, India is trying to put its best foot forward towards pushing the sustainability narrative. However, relations between India and China have remained unsteady and tumultuous over the years. Also, India's trade dependence on both China and the EU has increased significantly. According to UNCTAD, India's trade reliance on China and EU has increased by 1.2 per cent each in 2023 and it is expected to rise further i.e., by 2 per cent in the first quarter of 2024.

A baffled Brussels

With such perceptible reliance in terms of trade in goods and services, the EU, India and China are obviously quite dependent on each other. However, for EU to overlook either one of them is difficult and not recommended. Representing two primary engines of the Southern economies and enjoying high levels of demography, India and China are, in fact, the pivotal cogs in the development wheel. The EU certainly cannot afford to ignore either India or China if it has to sustain its presence and relevance in today's geostrategic and geoeconomics world. At the same time, it needs to choose its partners wisely. Given India's philosophy of "Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam" or One Earth, One Family, One Future, and its attempts to create a shared vision for charting the development journey of the Global South, Brussels must be receptive of such positive engagements. At the same time, there is an alarming need for the EU to reassess and reconfigure its China position, which can potentially balance its security ambitions with its economic aspirations. With tensions breaking out at the drop of the hat in contemporary times, formulating a robust, comprehensive, clear and long-term China strategy should be high on the EU's to-do list. It is not to say that a strategy will always safeguard Brussels from any further mistrust or hostilities, but it will certainly provide a sense of direction to its global leadership.

China and India in the multipolar global order

09 September 2024, The Express Tribune, Shahih Javed Burki

There is a growing fear of China among the administrations that have come to power in Washington since the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. It was in 1991 that the USSR broke into several geographic pieces. While the states in Eastern Europe and Central Asia parted company with Moscow, China began to grow its economy and increase its military strength. In the early 1980s while working in the World Bank I had coined the term "a multipolar world". I was mocked by several commentators for using the term. I was reminded that in English language there were only two poles, north and south. Multipolar world did not make any grammatical sense.

While that may have been the case, there is no denying the fact that there are now several centres of economic activity around the globe. Most of these have their spheres of influence. Often these overlap, which gives rise to conflict. This is the case in Eastern Europe, East Asia and the Middle East. These involve in some way or the other the United States. Washington is helping Ukraine in Eastern Europe to push back Russia which invaded its neighbouring country to recreate what was once Greater Russia. In the Middle East, Washington is aiding Israel to put down the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. In East Asia, Washington is partnering with several states to check the rise of China. It is also working with India to develop a counter power to China. Today I will discuss whether India is able to counter the growing influence of China.

If global presence is measured in terms of the size of the population, India has overtaken China and is now the world's most populous country. It also has a higher rate of population growth than China. Beijing now must deal with the problem that has resulted in rapidly aging people and decline in the rate of increase in population. These demographic challenges have severe economic consequences. Countries need, if not growing than at least steady population size, to maintain reasonable rates of economic growth. With aging comes pressure on public funds. It means diverting public resources from investment in economic development and social improvement to take care of the old.

As India grows and diversifies its economy, it has become more dependent on China rather than develop independently and compete with the Asian economic giant. The subject of growing Indian dependence on China was covered in an in-depth analysis by Karishma Mehrotra in an article written for The Washington Post. The analysis was published under the title 'India's growing reliance on China poses challenge for U.S. trade strategy'. He wrote: "American businesses looking to reduce their reliance on China have been eyeing India in the past few years as a new manufacturing hub - and as a hedge against potential disruptions in Chinese supply chains by rising geopolitical tensions or another pandemic. But as India has amped its production of goods like smartphones, solar panels and medicine, the Indian economy itself has become dependent on Chinese imports, in particular for the components that go into these products. This dynamic serves as a reality check for U.S. policymakers who have been urgently promoting efforts to diversify supply chains away from Chinese factories and 'de-risk' the commercial relationship with China."

Will the Western companies - especially those based in the United States - be successful in linking with the enterprises in India, bypassing China. The answer is no, since India is heavily dependent on China for parts and components it needs for its finished products. "Unless China stops being the third party from where components come in and we just assemble, that de-risking is not going to happen for any country producing in India," said Sriparna Pathak, an associate professor at Jindal University focusing on India-China relations. According to Global Traded Research Institute, GTRI, an Indian think tank, imports from China include finished products as well as intermediate goods. Imports from China have been growing twice as fast as those overall and now make up a third of Indian imports. India's domestic industry is deeply dependent on the parts and components that are imported from China and go into final products. Nearly two-thirds of the Indian imports of electronic components such as circuit boards and batteries now come from China, says the Confederation of Indian Industry. According to the data released by GTRI, the volume of such Chinese imports has tripled during the past five years.

India has a well-developed pharmaceutical industry. The world's reliance on Indian medicines and vaccines became clear during the Covid-19 pandemic. However, even in this industry, India relies on ingredients from China. According to GTRI, imports from China of intermediate drug products increased by more than one-half during the buildup related to the pandemic.

American reliance on solar power to meet what it saw as its obligation to reduce the emission of greenhouse houses to reduce the impact on global warming was fed by imports of solar panels from China. However, when reducing the reliance on imports from China became a priority, the United States sought inputs from India. As the switch occurred, it was revealed that India sourced between half of its solar components - such as modules, cells, wafers solar glass - from China between 2021 and 2023.

According to senior America officials who spoke to Mehrotra, "We have taken a more practical view that in order to effectively diversify, the first step is to get a foothold in the parts of this supply chain where you can diversify today. And then from there you can go upstream." That is where India enters the American strategy to delink as much as possible from China. But as already discussed, India's reliance on China is increasing even in the industries in which it has had traditional advantage. To support the manufacture of Indian textiles and garments, manufacturers in the country have been ramping up imports of yarn and fabric from China. Even in the fast-growing automobile industry, India has been increasing its imports from vehicle parts and accessories from China. This is the case in particular in the electric vehicles sector. For instance, India has been successful in switching the important passenger-carrying rickshaws from using diesel to being powered by electricity.

Third plenum inspires renewed vitality into China's modernization drive

08 September 2024, Global Times, Wang Changlin

The resolution adopted by the third plenary session of the 20th CPC Central Committee underscores a strong commitment to comprehensively deepening reforms to further advance Chinese modernization. The global community is closely watching China's ongoing efforts to promote high-quality economic development and high-standard opening-up, and the potential impacts on the world economy. The Global Times invited Wang Changlin, vice president of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, to share his insights.

The 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC) adopted a resolution on further deepening reform comprehensively to advance Chinese modernization at its third plenary session held from July 15 to 18 in Beijing. The resolution emphasized the need to further deepen reform comprehensively with a view to advancing Chinese modernization.

Modernization is a comprehensive and profound transformation of economic and social development, as well as a profound transformation of the system and mechanism.

Modernization refers to the profound transformation of social production methods and human lifestyles, triggered by the rapid rise in productivity since the industrial revolution. It is a historical process of rapid increase in social material wealth, promoting the profound transformation of traditional society into modern society.

Its main features include highly developed productivity, leading technological innovation capabilities, effective national governance, urban-rural integrated society structure, high-level public services, safe and beautiful ecological environment, and high levels of civic literacy.

The practice of global modernization fully proves that science and industrial revolution are the fundamental driving forces for modernization. For a country or region to achieve modernization, it must seize the opportunities of technological revolution and vigorously develop advanced productive forces. Meanwhile, institutional and cultural innovation is the guarantee for the development of modernization. The modernization of national governance system and governance capacity is not only an important part of comprehensive and complete modernization, but also a key factor and necessary condition for a country to walk a smooth path toward modernization.

Advancing Chinese modernization

Chinese modernization is continuously advancing and will open broad prospects in the process of reform and opening-up.

Reform and opening-up is the crucial policies for China to move with the times in great strides. Over the past 40 years, reform and opening-up have emerged as the defining symbol, the most widely accepted consensus, and the most remarkable spirit of contemporary China.

Since the 18th National Congress of the CPC, historic achievements and progress have been made in the cause of the Party and the country, relying on reform and opening-up.

China has promoted high-quality economic development with supply-side structural reform at its center, resolutely expanded high-level opening-up, decisively eliminated a range of systemic and institutional drawbacks, and achieved the transformation from partial exploration and breakthrough to systemic integration and comprehensive deepening in reform.

The basic institutional framework in various fields has been basically established, many areas have undergone historic progresses, systemic reshaping, and overall reconstruction.

The level of modernization of the national governance system and governance capacity has been further improved, providing a strong institutional guarantee for the comprehensive construction of a moderately prosperous society, promoting China's economy to embark on the path of high-quality development, and continuously enhancing the sense of gain, happiness, and security of the people. China has embarked on a new journey to comprehensively build a socialist modernized country.

On this new journey, China must continue to create new opportunities in building Chinese modernization, with a strong reliance on reform and opening-up. Currently, China faces a crucial period of promoting the construction of a strong country and national rejuvenation through the comprehensive advancement of Chinese modernization.

China needs to start from its own national conditions, follow the general laws of modernization, strive to explore an institutional system suitable for the development of Chinese modernization, continuously promote better adaptation between production relations and productive forces, national governance, and social development, and stimulate vitality and add momentum to Chinese modernization.

Opening broader prospects

To further deepen reform comprehensively, it is essential to focus closely on advancing the theme of Chinese modernization. It is essential to closely focus on the overall goal of upholding and improving the system of socialism with Chinese characteristics and modernizing China's system and capacity for governance and further promote comprehensive deepening of reform.

China needs to focus on building a high-level socialist market economy system. A high-level socialist market economy system is an important guarantee for Chinese modernization.

Since the reform and opening-up, a key factor in the great success of China's economic development has been the establishment of a socialist market economy system. In the new journey of promoting Chinese modernization, China needs to prioritize the construction of a high-level socialist market economy system, further stimulate the internal driving force and innovation vitality across the whole of society.

Only by working unswervingly both to consolidate and develop the public sector and to encourage, support and guide development of the non-public sector, building a unified national market, improving basic market economy institutions such as property rights protection, market access, fair competition, and social credit, can China better play the role of market mechanisms, optimize resource allocation efficiency and maximize benefits, accelerate the construction of a new development pattern, and promote high-quality development.

Prioritizing the improvement of people's quality of life is essential. A higher quality of life encompasses stable employment, greater satisfaction with income, reliable social security, and improved basic public services. These elements serve as both the foundation and the driving force behind economic development, playing a crucial role in fostering a high-quality economic cycle.

To advance Chinese modernization, it is crucial for China to align reforms in both the economic and social sectors.

This includes improving the income distribution system, strengthening the social security framework, and ensuring that basic public services are balanced and accessible to all. By doing so, China can achieve meaningful progress in the comprehensive development of individuals and promote the common prosperity of its citizens.

India's commitment to Tibetan cause continues

08 September 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Khedroob Thondup

India's support has been instrumental in preserving Tibetan culture and identity.

The Government of India's decision to grant asylum to the Dalai Lama and thousands of Tibetan exiles in 1959 stands as a monumental act of compassion and political foresight. This gesture not only provided a safe haven for those fleeing persecution but also laid the foundation for a unique cultural and spiritual bond between India and the Tibetan community.

A SANCTUARY FOR THE DALAI LAMA AND TIBETAN EXILES

When the Dalai Lama fled Tibet following the Chinese invasion, India welcomed him with open arms. This act of amnesty was not merely a political manoeuvre but a profound humanitarian gesture. It underscored India's commitment to upholding human rights and protecting those in dire need. The Dalai Lama's presence in India has since become a symbol of resilience and hope for Tibetans worldwide.

PRESERVATION OF TIBETAN CULTURE AND IDENTITY

India's support has been instrumental in preserving Tibetan culture and identity. The establishment of Tibetan settlements across India, particularly in Dharamshala, has allowed the Tibetan community to thrive. These settlements have become centres of cultural preservation, where traditional Tibetan arts, crafts, and religious practices continue to flourish. The Central Tibetan Administration, based in Dharamshala, operates as a government-in-exile, working tirelessly to keep the Tibetan cause alive on the global stage.

EDUCATIONAL AND ECONOMIC EMPOWERMENT
India has also played a crucial role in the educational and economic empowerment of Tibetan exiles. Numerous schools and institutions have been established to provide quality education to Tibetan children, ensuring that they grow up with a strong sense of their heritage while being well-equipped to navigate the modern world.

Additionally, vocational training programs and economic initiatives have helped many Tibetans achieve self-sufficiency and contribute positively to Indian society.

A BEACON OF HOPE

India's unwavering support for the Tibetan cause has not gone unnoticed. It has inspired other nations to recognize the plight of the Tibetan people and advocate for their rights. The Dalai Lama's teachings of peace, compassion, and non-violence have resonated globally, further highlighting the significance of India's role in his journey.

CONCLUSION

The Government of India's decision to grant asylum to the Dalai Lama and Tibetan exiles was a defining moment in modern history. It showcased India's commitment to humanitarian values and its willingness to stand up for justice and freedom. As the Tibetan community continues to thrive in India, this enduring partnership serves as a testament to the power of compassion and the enduring spirit of the Tibetan people.

How Chinese J-20 fighters in Xinjiang and Tibet are a concern for India

08 September 2024, Firstpost, Air Marshal Anil Chopra

Through the deployment of fifth-generation stealth J-20 fighter aircraft, China wants to increase its airpower along the Line of Actual Control. India, though well off to handle the threat, must be prepared.

India-China relations have been at lows since the Galwan skirmish four years ago. There is an uneasy calm at present and an attempt to re-engage, but a range of divergences persist between the two Asian giants. China is aggressively building infrastructure in Tibet and Xinjiang along the Line of Actual Control (LAC). The Chinese want to add air power to the conflict.

China's People's Liberation Army Air Force (PLAAF) recently deployed fifth-generation stealth fighters J-20 at Shigatse Air Base around 300 kilometres north of the Indian Air Force's (IAF) Rafale air base at Hasimara and just 150 km from the LAC in Sikkim. J-20s have operated at Hotan Airbase in Xinjiang, 350 km north of Pangong Tso Lake. And just 120 km from India's claim line in Aksai Chin. It is important to understand the PLAAF resources and capabilities at these two operationally important airbases.

Shigatse (Xigaze) Air Base

Shigatse (Xigaze) is the second largest city in Tibet Autonomous Region. Shigatse Airbase, also called the Shigatse Peace Airport, is a dual-use airfield in Tibet, around 180 kilometres west of Lhasa. Construction began in 1968 and was completed in 1973. PLAAF started operating there in 1973, and civil operations began in 2010. The airport is at an elevation of 3,782 m / 12,408 ft above mean sea level (AMSL) and is one of the highest airports in the world. It has two concrete runways, 09/27 with 5,000 m (16,404 ft) length, and the second, 07/25 with 3,000 m (9,843 ft) length. It has the longest public runway in the world; the only other with the same length is Ulyanovsk Vostochny Airport in south-west Russia.

The airport sees over 2,000 movements a year and around 200,000 passengers. Significant cargo is also transported by air. The second (shorter) runway was constructed in 2017, and Guizhou WZ-7 "Soaring Dragon" UAVs were seen operating from here.

In May 2024, six J-20 stealth fighters were seen operating from the airbase. Also, at least eight J-10 aircraft and one KJ-500 Airborne Early Warning and Control (AEW&C) aircraft were seen parked at the airbase. The runway at Shigatse is very large, and therefore it will be able to partially neutralise the disadvantage of weight carriage during high-altitude airfield operations.

The Chengdu J-20 'Mighty Dragon'

The Chengdu J-20 is the Chinese twinjet stealth fifth-generation fighter aircraft. The aircraft has three variants: the initial production model J-20A, the thrust-vectoring J-20B, and the twin-seat aircraft teaming capable J-20S. The aircraft made its first flight in January 2011, and the first J-20 combat unit was formed in February 2018, making China the second country in the world and the first in Asia to field an operational stealth aircraft. Nearly 250 have been built as of date. J-20 squadrons have been allotted to all the theatre commands.

The aircraft has the Type 1475 (KLJ-5) active electronically scanned array (AESA) radar. Six electro-optic sensors provide omnidirectional IR coverage, which is fused with the radar picture for better situational awareness.

The aircraft is powered by a Chinese WS-10Cs engine with thrust of 142-147 kN and has serrated afterburner nozzles for enhanced rear-aspect stealth. The finally intended powerplant is the Shenyang WS-15 with a thrust of 180 kN.

The main weapon bay is capable of housing both long-range air-to-air missiles (PL-12, PL-15, PL-21) and precision-guided munitions. The two smaller lateral weapon bays can carry short-range AAMs (PL-10).

The estimated production rate was 40 to 50 airframes per year in 2022 and 100 to 120 airframes per year in 2023. PLA Air Force (PLAAF) currently has around 240 aircraft. The J-20 fleet could reach 1,000 aircraft by the early 2030s.

J-20S will be a twin-seat variant. The second operator to coordinate attack and reconnaissance missions and manage unmanned combat aerial vehicles (UCAVs) as "loyal wingmen" such as the AVIC Dark Sword and stealth Hongdu GJ-11 UCAV.

Significance of Deployment at Shigatse

Shigatse is rather close to LAC near Sikkim (150 km) and IAF's Hasimara air base (300 km). Hasimara air base is in the Siliguri corridor, known as the Chicken's Neck. It is a stretch of land, 20-22 kilometres at the narrowest section. This geopolitical and geoeconomic corridor connects the seven northeastern states to the rest of India. The airbase is very significant as it houses one of the only two squadrons of the top-end IAF aircraft, the Rafale. If this base was to be neutralised even for short periods, it would have implications for India.

If an unfriendly regime takes charge in Bangladesh, the complexity of the narrow Siliguri corridor increases. But then India has lived with much more hostile East Pakistan. Today, India is a much more powerful country, but so is China.

J-20 vs Rafale

The Indian Rafale is a 4.5-generation aircraft with front-hemisphere stealth. It is much better than J-20 in terms of weapons, electronic warfare, and aero-engine reliability. The J-20 has yet to leave its shores, even for an airshow. It has no combat experience. It has yet to exercise with any foreign air force. Rafale has been combat-proven for 20 years in Iraq, Afghanistan, Mali, Libya, and Syria. IAF regularly exercises them with the top air forces of the world, most recently in "Red Flag" (USA) and the ongoing exercise "Tarang Shakti" in India.

IAF Options Against Shigatse

Even though Hashimara is the home base for Rafale, the aircraft will be in hardened shelters. Also, all the aircraft don't remain at home bases and move to operational detachments at other bases. Like China may attempt to neutralise IAF bases, India would do the same against Shigatse using fighter and missile strikes. India has much more air base options for aircraft dispersal and deployment, whereas Shigatse is a sole base in the region. Indian air bases are at much lower altitude and will allow a higher weapon and fuel load and therefore reach targets without refuelling.

The IAF has a significant number of Su-30 MKI squadrons in the eastern air bases (Tezpur and Chabua) with very significant air strike capabilities, including the deadly BrahMos missiles, among others. Clearly, IAF can launch many more missions than PLAAF. IAF will also deploy significant air defence systems, including the S-400.

Hotan Air Base

The Hotan airfield in the Xinjiang autonomous region was built in 1957, around the time China began building the contested Aksai Chin Highway (G219) through Indian Ladakh. The airfield elevation is 4,672 feet (1,424 m) AMSL. It has two parallel concrete runways (11/29) with a wide parallel taxiway 3,200 m (10,499 ft) long. The civil airport has a capacity of around 1.5 million passengers annually.

Hotan is just 130 km north of India's claim line and 270 km north-east of Karakoram Pass. It is 380 km north-east of Leh. These distances are not large for airborne platforms.

The Hotan airbase plays a critical role in Chinese military operations in the Ladakh area. Both runways at Hotan are now active. The second runway is longer than the original and is about 3,700 meters long. A number of military buildings and aprons have also come up along with the new runway. The new runway would enable more sortie rates.

China is constantly upgrading its military preparedness since the standoff with India began in eastern Ladakh in 2020. Hotan is one of the seven strategic dual-use airports that have been upgraded since 2017. The Chinese air force has built an underground command and control centre at Hotan Airbase. There are hardened shelters and secure ammunition and fuel storage areas. There are PLA Rocket Forces (PLARF) dugout positions. Besides Hotan, Chinese have also carried out extensive upgrades at their airports in Ngari Gunsa.

Kashgar is another airbase a little further north in Xinjiang province. Nearly 300 km north of the Indian claim line and 600 kilometres from Leh. Elevation is 4,529 ft (1,380 m) AMSL, and it has a 10,499 ft long runway. There is significant PLAAF presence here with sunshelters and hardened blast pens. Fighter aircraft can be seen in satellite pictures.

Hotan had seen between 70 and 100 aircraft during the Galwan crisis. These included cruise-missile carrying and nuclear-capable H-6K bombers, J-11, J-10, UAVs, AEW&C, and EW platforms. The then still operationally greenhorn J-20s were also briefly seen at Hotan in 2020, during Galwan perhaps making show of flag missions, in the hope of intimidating. In June 2022, PLAAF once again stationed around two dozen frontline fighters, including the J-20, J-11, and J-10 at Hotan.

The Y-20 strategic transport aircraft has also been observed at the airbase. These would facilitate faster and larger entry of troops and equipment. AEW&C KJ-500 deployments have also been seen. One can see the UAV apron and hangars, and CH-5 UAV have been observed. There are SatCom antennas and vehicles.

IAF Response to J-20s in Hotan

The Rafale base is at Ambala. Most IAF fighters can operate from Leh. The MiG-29s were deployed in Thoise. A sizable number of Su-30 MKI can cover the Ladakh region. Immediately after the Galwan skirmish, IAF fighters began making significant day and night flights in the region. IAF Mirage-2000 and MiG-29s have been upgraded. A few more are being acquired. Meanwhile, India is building a full-fledged airbase in Nyoma, just 35 kilometres from the LAC.

Summary

India has been significantly upgrading the IAF airfields facing China. Also, the road-rail network, bridges, and tunnels are coming up at high speed. India has a significant inventory of surface and aerial strike weapons with significant range.

India has nearly 28 airfields overlooking the LAC, and most are at much lower altitudes vis-à-vis China, which are much fewer in numbers and at altitudes above 10,000 feet. Nearly 118 ongoing projects of India's Border Roads Organisation (BRO) involve construction of airfields, bridges, and roads near the LAC.

IAF has seen much more combat, and its aircrew are exposed and trained for better employment tactics and concepts of operation, and most importantly, skill sets, experience, and combat readiness status. IAF has fought a war at Himalayan heights in Kargil. IAF is engaged in logistic support operations at the highest battleground in Siachen and elsewhere in Ladakh and north-east throughout the year.

Many Indian analysts behave like sceptics, painting doomsday scenarios relative to China. Actually, India is fairly well off, and IAF will be able to launch many more missions. Of course India must quickly build its fighter squadron numbers, more so because Pakistan could take an advantage and create a two-front threat situation.

India's own fifth-generation fighter, the Advanced Medium Combat Aircraft (AMCA), is still under initial development and will take another 10-15 years to be operationally deployed with the IAF. While India must accelerate the Light Combat Aircraft and AMCA programs, which are currently facing delays, there is an urgent need to acquire the 114 Multi-Role Fighter Aircraft (MRFA) gap to bolster the 4.5-generation inventory.

India must increase its satellite- and aircraft-based intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) capability. It must increase the number of AEW&C and FRA quickly. Atmanirbharta in aerospace has to be accelerated. Time to act is now, lest we get left too far behind.

17th Karmapa Ogyen Trinley Dorje to return to India After Exile?

08 September 2024, Tibet Rights Collective

Ogyen Trinley Dorje, the 17th Karmapa and one of Tibet's most prominent religious figures, may soon return to India after living in exile since December 1999. The Tibetan spiritual leader's recent meeting with His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Zurich, Switzerland, on August 25, has renewed hopes among his followers that he may be allowed to re-enter India soon. This meeting, the first in seven years, took place against a backdrop of growing anticipation regarding the Karmapa's return.

A Historical Background of Exile

The Karmapa is the head of the Karma Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, one of the oldest lineages of reincarnations in Tibet. He fled Tibet at the age of 14 in December 1999, citing a lack of religious freedom under Chinese rule. Seeking refuge in India, the Karmapa primarily resided at the Gyuto Monastery in Sidhbari, near Dharamsala, where he was treated as an "honoured guest" by the Indian government. For many years, the Karmapa became an important religious figure for Tibetan exiles and for Indian followers, particularly in the northeastern state of Sikkim.

In May 2017, the Karmapa left India on a three-month visa for Europe. During his extended stay overseas, he acquired Dominican citizenship, which complicated his return to India.

Efforts to Bring the Karmapa Back

Sikkim, a state with a significant Buddhist population, has long been lobbying for the Karmapa's return. The Rumtek Monastery, located in the capital Gangtok, is his seat-in-exile. Recently, Sikkim Chief Minister Prem Singh Tamang reached out to the Indian government to discuss the possibility of bringing the 17th Karmapa back to India and, specifically, to Sikkim. Tamang met with Union Minister for Parliamentary Affairs and Minority Affairs, Kiren Rijiju, in Delhi to push forward the matter.

While the meeting between the Karmapa and the Dalai Lama raised hopes, the exact details of their discussions remain undisclosed.

Visa Complications and the Road Ahead

The Karmapa's acquisition of Dominican citizenship means that he no longer qualifies for the Residential Certificate (RC) that India issues to Tibetan refugees. This legal complication prevents him from returning to India without obtaining a visa, which he must apply for at an Indian consulate or mission abroad.

The path to his return is further complicated by the fact that his case involves both religious and political sensitivities. Nevertheless, the efforts by Sikkim's leadership, as well as his meeting with the Dalai Lama, offer hope to the Karmapa's many followers in India.

As discussions continue, the possibility of the 17th Karmapa's return to India remains a topic of interest, particularly for the Tibetan Buddhist community in Sikkim and beyond. His return would not only be a significant religious event but also a step towards resolving the complex political and legal issues surrounding his exile.

Conclusion

The 17th Karmapa, Ogyen Trinley Dorje, remains an influential figure both in Tibet and among the Tibetan diaspora in India. His return to India after years of exile has yet to be confirmed, but recent developments have given his followers new hope. The situation is being closely monitored by both religious and political leaders, with the prospect of the Karmapa's return continuing to resonate across India's spiritual landscape.

17th Karmapa Ogyen Trinley Dorje: Hopes of Returning to India After Exile

Ogyen Trinley Dorje, the 17th Karmapa and one of Tibet's most prominent religious figures, may soon return to India after living in exile since December 1999. The Tibetan spiritual leader's recent meeting with His Holiness the Dalai Lama in Zurich, Switzerland, on August 25, has renewed hopes among his followers that he may be allowed to re-enter India soon. This meeting, the first in seven years, took place against a backdrop of growing anticipation regarding the Karmapa's return.

A Historical Background of Exile

The Karmapa is the head of the Karma Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, one of the oldest lineages of reincarnations in Tibet. He fled Tibet at the age of 14 in December 1999, citing a lack of religious freedom under Chinese rule. Seeking refuge in India, the Karmapa primarily resided at the Gyuto Monastery in Sidhbari, near Dharamsala, where he was treated as an "honoured guest" by the Indian government. For many years, the Karmapa became an important religious figure for Tibetan exiles and for Indian followers, particularly in the northeastern state of Sikkim.

Efforts to Bring the Karmapa Back

Sikkim, a state with a significant Buddhist population, has long been lobbying for the Karmapa's return. The Rumtek Monastery, located in the capital Gangtok, is his seat-in-exile. Recently, Sikkim Chief Minister Prem Singh Tamang reached out to the Indian government to discuss the possibility of bringing the 17th Karmapa back to India and, specifically, to Sikkim. Tamang met with Union Minister for Parliamentary Affairs and Minority Affairs, Kiren Rijiju, in Delhi to push forward the matter.

While the meeting between the Karmapa and the Dalai Lama raised hopes, the exact details of their discussions remain undisclosed.

Visa Complications and the Road Ahead

The Karmapa's acquisition of Dominican citizenship means that he no longer qualifies for the Residential Certificate (RC) that India issues to Tibetan refugees. This legal complication prevents him from returning to India without obtaining a visa, which he must apply for at an Indian consulate or mission abroad.

The path to his return is further complicated by the fact that his case involves both religious and political sensitivities. Nevertheless, the efforts by Sikkim's leadership, as well as his meeting with the Dalai Lama, offer hope to the Karmapa's many followers in India.

As discussions continue, the possibility of the 17th Karmapa's return to India remains a topic of interest, particularly for the Tibetan Buddhist community in Sikkim and beyond. His return would not only be a significant religious event but also a step towards resolving the complex political and legal issues surrounding his exile.

Conclusion

The 17th Karmapa, Ogyen Trinley Dorje, remains an influential figure both in Tibet and among the Tibetan diaspora in India. His return to India after years of exile has yet to be confirmed, but recent developments have given his followers new hope. The situation is being closely monitored by both religious and political leaders, with the prospect of the Karmapa's return continuing to resonate across India's spiritual landscape.

Why Planes Avoid Flying Over the Tibetan Plateau

07 September 2024, Pune Pulse

Extreme altitude, unpredictable weather, and rugged terrain make the “Roof of the World” hazardous for commercial aviation.

The Tibetan Plateau, often called the “Roof of the World,” poses formidable challenges for aircraft, leading airlines to avoid flying over this area whenever possible. Despite modern advancements in aviation, the unique conditions of this elevated region, combined with geopolitical complexities, make it one of the most dangerous zones for flying.

The Tibetan Plateau is renowned for its high elevation, averaging over 4,500 meters (14,800 feet). This altitude reduces air density, which is crucial for the proper functioning of jet engines. Thinner air affects engine performance, requiring aircraft to work harder and potentially reducing efficiency. In emergencies, planes need to descend quickly to lower altitudes where oxygen levels are higher. However, over the plateau, there is little space to drop to a safe altitude due to the surrounding mountain peaks.

Harsh Weather Conditions

The weather over the plateau is notoriously harsh and unpredictable. Severe winds, thunderstorms, and turbulence are common, making navigation risky. Sudden changes in weather can lead to dangerous flying conditions, while storms pose further threats, particularly in areas with limited emergency landing options.

Rugged Terrain

The mountainous terrain adds another layer of danger. The plateau is home to peaks that exceed 7,000 meters (22,965 feet), including Mount Everest, the tallest mountain in the world. If a plane encounters mechanical trouble, the rugged landscape offers few places for safe emergency landings. The region’s geography leaves little room for error.

Limited Infrastructure

The Tibetan Plateau’s sparse population means there is limited aviation infrastructure. Fewer airports, air traffic control facilities, and navigational aids make it difficult for pilots to receive timely information or assistance during emergencies. Navigating the region without sufficient ground support increases the risk for aircraft.

Geopolitical Tensions

Geopolitics further complicate flight routes over the plateau. The area lies at the heart of territorial disputes involving China, India and neighboring countries. Airspace restrictions and regulatory issues make it challenging for airlines to plan routes, often requiring them to detour around the region.

Several incidents underscore the risks of flying over the Tibetan Plateau. For example, in 1992, China Airlines Flight 358 experienced severe turbulence over the region, injuring passengers and crew. In 2002, a helicopter crash in the area claimed 19 lives. While aviation technology has improved, and planes are now better equipped to handle high altitudes and weather challenges, the risks of flying over the plateau remain high.

The combination of extreme altitude, unpredictable weather, treacherous terrain and limited infrastructure makes the Tibetan Plateau a particularly dangerous region for commercial aviation. Airlines prioritize the safety of passengers and crew and avoiding this hazardous area is often the safest and most practical option.

Diplomacy Beyond the Elections: How China Is Preparing for a Post-Biden America

07 September 2024, The Diplomat, Seong-Hyon Lee

China is not just managing tensions but setting the stage to influence the next U.S. administration and push its long-term ambitions forward.

U.S. President Joe Biden’s national security adviser, Jake Sullivan, recently made a high-profile visit to China, which he described as aimed at the “responsible management” of China-U.S. relations. Sullivan’s meeting with Chinese leader Xi Jinping was the first by a U.S. national security adviser in eight years, highlighting its diplomatic significance. While it is tempting to label the visit a success, especially given its timing during the height of the U.S. presidential election race, its practical purpose went beyond managing tensions. It also served as a warning to China not to interfere with the U.S. election.

However, a pressing question remains: Why did China treat Sullivan with surprising cordiality, especially given that Biden himself will soon step down, granting Sullivan a face-to-face meeting with Chinese leader Xi Jinping?

Just before the national security adviser’s visit, the United States imposed a massive new tranche of sanctions on 42 Chinese firms for supporting Russia’s war efforts in Ukraine. Yet, this didn’t deter Xi from meeting Sullivan.

Some interpret it as a “goodwill gesture” toward the outgoing Biden administration. However, Beijing’s sudden softer tone, evidenced by Xi’s amicable photo-op with Sullivan, warrants deeper analysis. Xi is well-versed in the art of photo-op diplomacy, using such moments to convey his emotions. For example, during his meeting with the late Japanese Prime Minister Abe Shinzo in 2014, Xi adopted a famously solemn expression, avoiding eye contact. When Abe attempted to speak, Xi pointedly turned away, facing the cameras instead.

According to official Chinese Foreign Ministry reports about the visit, Sullivan appeared to have offered a list of assurances that aligned with China's interests. Sullivan told Xi that "the United States does not seek a new Cold War, does not aim to change China's system, and does not support Taiwan independence."

In his meeting with Wang Yi, China's top diplomat, Sullivan provided a more comprehensive reiteration on Taiwan that raised eyebrows. He stated that the United States does not support "Taiwan independence," "two Chinas," or "one China, one Taiwan." This is known as the "Three Nos" policy regarding Taiwan.

While elements of this policy had been expressed separately or partially by various U.S. administrations, the last time all three elements were explicitly stated together in an official setting in China was, over 20 years ago, by President Bill Clinton in 1998. In response to Clinton's "Three Nos," concerned lawmakers in both the Senate and the House nearly unanimously passed resolutions reaffirming the U.S. commitment to Taiwan.

After Clinton's statement, subsequent administrations generally refrained from repeating the full "Three Nos" formulation, often focusing mainly on the non-support for Taiwan independence, until Sullivan did so on this occasion.

Moreover, Sullivan requested and was granted a meeting with General Zhang Youxia, marking the first time a U.S. national security adviser has met with a vice chairman of China's Central Military Commission (CMC) since 2016. Sullivan described this opportunity as "rare." Zhang, the second-highest military decision-maker in China, used the occasion to emphasize that Taiwan is "the core of China's core interests" and the "first unbreachable red line in China-U.S. relations."

Based on these official statements, it is evident that China successfully secured key reiterations from the United States that align with its interests, while also clearly articulating its own demands.

Notably, the Chinese account of the meeting was more detailed and explicit than the U.S. version. For example, in the English readout Wang outlined five key points in over 950 words, emphasizing that China's sovereignty, territorial integrity, political system, development path, and the legitimate rights of its people must be respected. Wang further urged the United States to adopt a "correct perception" of China and to cease its economic, trade, and technological suppression.

In the broader context, the meeting appears to be a follow-up to the Biden-Xi summit held in San Francisco last November, during which both leaders committed to reducing tensions, albeit for different reasons. Washington aims to focus on the upcoming presidential election without disruption from China, while China seeks to buy time in the Sino-U.S. competition in order to revitalize its struggling economy.

Xi's emphasis on seeking "peaceful coexistence" and maintaining "stability in China-U.S. relations" reflects a desire for a stable external environment to address these internal issues. This approach aligns with China's current focus on economic recovery and its need to navigate domestic challenges without external pressures exacerbating the situation.

From the U.S. perspective, the goal is to prevent China from provoking geopolitical tensions in sensitive regions such as the South China Sea, Taiwan, and the Philippines. The United States also seeks to dissuade China from supporting Russia's war against Ukraine or forming a trilateral alliance with North Korea and Russia. In contrast, China is keen to avoid further economic and technological pressure as it focuses on economic recovery in a stable external environment.

The fact that Xi agreed to meet with Sullivan supports the interpretation that Sullivan's talks with senior officials, including Wang and Zhang, were productive. China often leaves the possibility of a meeting with Xi uncertain until the last moment, keeping visiting delegations in suspense. Xi's decision to meet with Sullivan suggests that he was pleased with the progress made during their discussions.

China's broader strategy seems to be the creation of a relational blueprint that secures its interests, particularly as the U.S. political landscape shifts. By positioning itself now, Beijing can potentially influence the next U.S. administration, using these agreements as a foundation for future China-U.S. relations that align with its long-term goals.

This reaffirmation of bilateral principles favorable to China could serve as leverage for Beijing in dealing with the next U.S. administration, particularly if Vice President Kamala Harris, who has limited foreign policy experience, succeeds Biden. Given Harris' likely adherence to Biden's foreign policy approach, Beijing may strategically use Sullivan's visit to ensure that, if she assumes office, the agreements forged between Biden and Xi are maintained.

With less than six months remaining in Biden's term, both nations are preparing for the transition. Washington appears focused on maintaining stability during the election season, while Beijing is balancing its immediate need for economic stability with its long-term strategic ambitions. The disparity between China's comprehensive readouts and the relatively brief summaries from the United States underscores the differences in their respective approaches.

Ultimately, China's long-term strategy is clear: It is looking beyond the current administration to shape U.S. perceptions of China, convincing Washington that its rise does not pose a threat and creating a more favorable environment for advancing its ambitions.

Taiwan must tighten the lid on China's misinformation campaigns

07 September 2024, East Asia Forum, Mark Manantan

In response to Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te's inauguration, the Chinese People's Liberation Army conducted a joint military drill and simulation of an invasion of Taiwan, demonstrating Beijing's firepower and displeasure at perceived threats to the One China principle. China also expanded its influence operations and AI-generated disinformation campaigns during Taiwan's 2024 election. The overwhelming torrent of disinformation has overwhelmed traditional fact-checking methods in Taiwan, causing distrust in Taiwan's electoral systems and amplifying narratives underscoring the binary choice of peace or war in the Taiwan Strait.

In the days leading up to Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te's inauguration on 20 May 2024, the People's Liberation Army (PLA) was relatively quiet. But the silence did not last long. On 23 May, the PLA's Eastern Theatre Command embarked on Joint Sword-2024A – a joint-military drill involving the Army, Navy, Airforce and rocket force that surrounded Taiwan and showcased Beijing's firepower.

The main purpose of the military exercise is retribution. It represents Beijing's displeasure towards President Lai's inauguration ceremony, which undermined China's long-held 'One China' principle. Compared to his predecessor President Tsai Ing-wen, who adopted more ambiguous terms like 'mainland' or the 'other side of the Strait', Lai is far more assertive and has explicitly referred to China as China. In response, China's Taiwan Affairs Office called President Lai a dangerous separatist, condemning his hardline tendencies that will only bring 'war and destruction to the island'.

But Beijing's wrath did not end there. Completing its repertoire of grey zone tactics, the PLA has released a dramatic video that simulates an all-out-invasion of Taiwan. Complete with special effects, the video not only amplifies the intended coercive effects of its joint military exercises, but also highlights the vital role of influence operations in Beijing's efforts to achieve reunification.

If the developments surrounding Lai's inauguration are an indicator of the trajectory of cross-strait relations, it only points to the continued normalisation of Beijing's escalatory and coercive actions against the self-governed island. Influence operations will also become even more central to China's mission to legitimise its jurisdiction over Taiwan. By co-opting and penetrating the psyche of its domestic population, Beijing aims to ultimately undermine public trust in Taiwan towards its political institutions.

Fortunately, Taiwan has strong stamina when it comes to countering China-sponsored influence operations. After years of experiencing China's disinformation and misinformation campaigns, the island is home to a vibrant network of traditional media and civil society groups.

But the aftermath of Taiwan's January 2024 election offers fresh lessons that underscore the enormity and sophistication of China's evolving influence operations.

Generative artificial intelligence (AI) took centre stage during Taiwan's election season. A smear campaign that used generative AI videos to target former president Tsai-Ing Wen circulated on TikTok and Instagram. According to Taiwan AI Labs, 3.5 per cent of the top 200 videos reshared on Facebook in 2023 were found to be automatically generated using text-to-speech and AI.

Conventional fact-checking techniques employed by Taiwanese media organisations and civil society groups could hardly keep up with all the AI-fabricated audio and video content. The mass production and proliferation of AI-generated audio, video and text have overwhelmed fact-checkers, while new malicious content propagates instantaneously.

Troll groups were also highly active and coordinated. Before the election, more than 14,000 troll accounts were actively propelling narratives like the binary choice of peace and war in the Taiwan Strait and the unreliability of US support for Taiwan. TikTok, and its Chinese version Douyin, were suspected of manipulating their algorithms to promote video and audio content that targeted specific candidates or political parties or highlighted controversial topics such as asymmetry in the Taiwan-US relationship.

Several high-profile influencers were also posting false information that sought to tamper with the integrity of the election process. Such malicious content has led to a high degree of distrust in Taiwan's electoral systems and procedures.

Given the prevalence of China's coercive tactics against Taiwan and the rapid explosion of generative AI and algorithmic bias, combined with the unpredictable headwinds in today's geopolitics, Taiwan needs to reboot its counter-influence operations toolkit.

Taiwan should encourage its leading tech companies to increase participation in global technical standards setting through formal and informal channels. It should also mobilise civil society groups to proactively participate in multi-stakeholder consultations on emerging technologies like generative AI. For instance, the International Telecommunications Union is currently exploring the development of standards and frameworks to detect deepfakes and other forms of malicious AI-generated media. Taiwanese start-ups and civil society groups can share best practices and lessons learned in fighting state-sponsored influence operations.

Because most of the Chinese-linked influence operations propagate faster on social media platforms before being amplified in mainstream media, Taiwan must explore more stringent options to regulate digital platforms to enhance transparency, especially during elections.

It would be strategic for Taiwan to reframe the prevailing narratives that it is a mere pawn of the US-China rivalry or that there is only a binary choice of having peace or war in the Taiwan Strait. In highlighting its role as a major economic and semiconductor powerhouse, Taiwan can strengthen its democratic identity and its right to engage and participate in international debates on pertinent issues like regulating AI, reducing carbon emissions and even fighting election-related influence operations.

By rebooting its narrative beyond the binaries, Taiwan may help reduce tensions across the Strait and sustain or even open new avenues for regional cooperation.

EXPLAINED: The (worrying) popularity of caterpillar fungus

07 September 2024, RFA, Lobsang Gelek

The parasite is an important income source for rural Tibetans, but imposters are crowding the market.

Local residents search for caterpillar fungus, a traditional Tibetan medicine, on the Laji mountains of Guide county, west China's Qinghai province May 12, 2007

By now the army of scavengers has retreated from the high hillsides of the eastern Tibetan plateau, their bounty in hand. Harvest season for yartsa gunbu (དྭངས་རྩ་དུག་ལྗང་), or caterpillar fungus, typically runs from May to July, when winter snows have receded and thousands of rural, ethnic Tibetans can prospect for what's also known as "soft gold."

It's hard to overstate the importance these few weeks hold for the people who climb the steep slopes. Collecting caterpillar fungus — which is used to treat a variety of ailments — can account for as much as 90% of a rural family's annual income.

But high demand has spurred overharvesting, making it harder to find the fungus in its natural environment. Climate change poses another challenge. Warmer temperatures on the high plateau are reducing the length of winter, a critical time for yartsa gunbu.

Now a new threat is emerging, sources inside China say: artificial varieties designed to fill the gaps between supply and demand, in the form of either cultivated fungi or fake products altogether. Although Chinese authorities have tried to regulate the sale of cultivated fungus, interviews with Tibetans and online videos that attract tens of thousands of viewers say imposters have infiltrated the market.

"It will definitely jeopardize the lives of thousands of Tibetan herders and farmers whose income depend on the wild yartsa," said Lobsang Yeshe, who has practiced traditional Tibetan medicine at Men-Tsee-Khang in Dharamshala, India, for the past 20 years. What is caterpillar fungus and where does it come from?

Yartsa gunbu translates to "summer grass, winter bug." The Ophiocordyceps sinensis — its scientific name — releases spores that sink underground and infect the larvae of ghost moths, so called for the white color of males. The yartsa gunbu takes over, commandeering the caterpillar's nervous system, consuming its organs and finally, in spring, emerging from its head as a brown stoma at altitudes of greater than 13,000 feet (4,000 meters). Its methods have drawn comparisons to the fungus that stars in the HBO hit zombie series, "The Last of Us." Harvested intact, it's about the length of a little finger and shaped like a caterpillar with a stem attached.

Yartsa gunbu is found primarily in the Himalaya mountains and the Tibetan plateau. The Yushu Tibetan Autonomous prefecture in Qinghai province, east of the Tibetan Autonomous Region, is a particularly good place to look. Thousands of its residents set up makeshift camps from which they hike into the thin air.

The annual harvest is reportedly around 300 million fungi that can cost $7 a pop or more, leaving a multi-billion dollar market.

What is caterpillar fungus used for?

Yartsa gunbu has been used in Tibetan and Chinese traditional medicine to treat heart, liver and lung ailments. More recently, it acquired a reputation for improving sexual stamina in men and women. ("Himalayan Viagra" is another moniker.) Studies have shown possible benefits, though scientists say more clinical research is needed.

Users consume yartsa gunbu by brewing it with hot water similar to how tea or herbal infusions are prepared, or chewing it as it comes. Some put it in soups and other recipes. Lesser specimens are ground into powders.

Why are people growing a fungus ?

Pluckers like to pick the fungus before it releases spores, limiting its ability to reproduce and leading to its population decline. China has encouraged the development of cultivated yartsa gunbu, and one company has reportedly solved the puzzle, synthetically growing the O. sinensis fungus found in the wild.

But some individuals are trying to cultivate fungus varieties on their own. That, fungus traders say, has undercut prices and, because the buyers remain suspicious of its medicinal properties, consumer confidence, several sources told RFA.

In Guangzhou, a major market, "there is a hesitancy of customers in buying because of too much artificial fungus in the market," one trader said. A Tibetan living in Qinghai province said prices have dropped nearly 20% this year.

In New York, a retailer said he can still sell a single piece of wild fungus for $14, but "there are a lot of fake and cultivated yartsa" undercutting the business, he said. "Nowadays, people are selling thousands of artificial yartsa online per day, as well as in shops, jeopardizing the original yartsa business," he said.

Studies have shown that cultivated fungus can replicate the chemical compounds of natural varieties, though there are differences.

What is China doing to protect the market?

Chinese authorities seem to be aware of the financial risks to some of their poorest populations.

In April, the Chinese government in Qinghai, tried to control the artificial plantation of yartsa gunbu. But a trader in Nagchu, Tibet Autonomous Region, an area that historically has been among the best for finding wild yartsa gunbu, said enforcement has been lax.

"Chinese authorities have come out with a lot of rules saying that the artificial fungus is banned," the trader said. "But the on-ground reality is that the Chinese authorities are not strictly monitoring or stopping the sale of artificial fungus. And this is making it tough for us to sell the real fungus."

Tibetan Villages Driven to Poverty by China's Forced Relocation Program

07 September 2024, Japan Forward, Professor Pema Gyalpo

Beijing has been uprooting entire Tibetan villages, stripping them of economic self-sufficiency and eroding their culture under the guise of modernization.

China's government has been systematically uprooting hundreds of Tibetan villages and nomads from their ancestral lands. It has been forcibly relocating them to centralized settlements under the guise of "poverty alleviation" and environmental protection.

This mass relocation campaign has accelerated dramatically since 2016. It is eroding Tibetan culture, disrupting traditional livelihoods, and leaving many relocated families impoverished and dependent on government subsidies.

Mass Systematic Relocation

According to a recent report by Human Rights Watch, over 930,000 rural Tibetans have been relocated since 2000. A staggering 76% of these relocations occurred just since 2016. The Chinese government frames these relocations as voluntary poverty reduction efforts. However, evidence suggests they are often coercive and driven by Beijing's political agenda to assimilate Tibetans and tighten control over the region.

Many of these relocations involve moving entire villages hundreds of kilometers from their original homes. Authorities refer to the relocated Tibetans as "border guardians," essentially turning them into civilian sentries along China's contested frontiers with India, Nepal, and Bhutan.

Satellite imagery shows that China has strategically placed new settlements near virtually every accessible Himalayan pass along these borders. While officially civilian in nature, these border villages provide infrastructure that could support rapid military deployments if needed.

More insidiously, they serve as a form of "demographic engineering," permanently altering the population of contested areas to strengthen China's territorial claims.

Loss of Economic Self-Sufficiency

But for the Tibetans themselves, these relocations often lead to economic hardships and cultural dislocation. Traditional nomadic herders are forced to sell their livestock and abandon their grasslands. Farmers are moved from their ancestral fields. In their new homes, many struggle to find work or make ends meet.

A local government document reviewed by The New York Times indicated some villagers may receive around 20,000 yuan (less than $3,000 USD) per year for relocation. A few earn extra income from border patrol work. But for many, the relocations mean a complete loss of economic self-sufficiency.

China's relocation policies appear not just to control Tibetan populations, but to fundamentally reshape Tibetan society and culture. Religious life is noticeably absent from the new settlements. There are no Buddhist monasteries or temples to be found. Instead, the villages are dominated by symbols of the Chinese state — national flags and portraits of President Xi Jinping adorn walls and light poles throughout.

This cultural erasure is no accident. The relocation program serves as propaganda, a display of Chinese strength and superiority in the region. It is social engineering aimed at assimilating Tibetans into mainstream Chinese society.

Erasing Tibetan Culture

The mass relocations are just one component of China's broader efforts to reshape Tibet. Increased surveillance, restrictions on religious practices, and Mandarin-language education policies all serve to undermine Tibetan identity and autonomy.

The forced relocations, however, are particularly devastating in their scope and impact on traditional ways of life. A Human Rights Watch report highlights how Chinese authorities use coercive tactics to overcome Tibetans' reluctance to relocate. Officials make repeated home visits, threaten with punishments, and warn that essential services will be cut off for those who refuse to move. Higher-level authorities pressure local officials to meet relocation quotas, framing the program as a non-negotiable policy for Beijing.

Even when relocations are framed as "voluntary," Tibetan families are often misled about the economic prospects of their new homes. Surveys by Chinese scholars found that many relocated Tibetans "cannot find suitable jobs to support their families" and report low satisfaction with their new circumstances.

Entire Villages Relocated

The scale of these relocations is staggering. Beyond the 140,000 rural Tibetans moved through "whole-village relocation," another 567,000 may have been relocated through "individual household" programs since 2016. In total, Human Rights Watch estimates that various relocation and "sedentarization" programs have affected most of Tibet's 4.55 million rural inhabitants.

China's approach to ethnic minorities, particularly in Tibet, reveals a deeply manipulative strategy aimed at erasing distinct cultural identities. Under the guise of poverty alleviation and modernization, the Chinese government systematically undermines minority cultures. This is achieved through forced relocations, language policies favoring Mandarin, and strict controls on religious practices.

Destroying Diversity

These tactics are not merely about economic development or national security. They reflect a concerted effort to homogenize diverse populations into a singular state-approved Chinese identity. By uprooting communities from their ancestral lands, severing ties to traditional livelihoods, and flooding minority areas with Han Chinese settlers, Beijing seeks to dilute and eventually erase unique ethnic identities.

The government's heavy-handed approach demonstrates a fundamental disregard for the value of cultural diversity. It undermines the rights of minority populations to maintain distinct ways of life. This cultural erasure, masked as progress, is a form of soft ethnic cleansing that threatens to permanently alter the rich tapestry of ethnicities within China's borders.

International law prohibits forced evictions, making China's coercive relocation program a clear violation of human rights. The mass displacement of Tibetan communities threatens to irreparably damage Tibetan culture and identity. That way, Tibetan identity is in the hands of the Chinese party-state and is eradicated under different policy directives.

Beijing's Expansionist Nightmare Continues

The evidence paints a clear picture of a systematic campaign to reshape Tibet's demographics, consolidate state control, and erode Tibetan cultural identity.

Far from alleviating poverty, these forced relocations are creating a class of displaced impoverished Tibetans. They have been made dependent on state subsidies and cut off from their traditional livelihoods and cultural roots.

As China continues to tighten its grip on Tibet, the international community must speak out against these forced relocations and other policies that threaten Tibetan culture and autonomy. Without intervention, China's campaign of demographic engineering and cultural erasure in Tibet will only accelerate. It will potentially destroy one of the world's most unique and vibrant cultures.

"The unique Chinese style of imperialism and colonialism" as Beijing might like to call it if it succeeds, sees Tibet as its first prey and victim. However, the big, ambitious Chinese dream of expansion doesn't stop there. You can see what is happening in Southern Mongolia and Eastern Turkistan (aka the Uyghur Autonomous Region). Every neighboring people and nation of Communist China could face the same destiny unless the world is consciously watchful.

World merrily forgets Uyghur cause as China mobilises mega-propaganda machine

06 September 2024, Firstpost, Mahesh Ranjan Debata

While China has become largely successful in influencing international opinion to favour its narrative on Xinjiang, the world community has failed miserably to set Beijing right for its follies

A report titled “The Assessment of Human Rights Concerns in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region, People’s Republic of China”, which was published under the auspices of the Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights (OHCHR), completed two years on August 31, 2024. The OHCHR had spent a lot of time (almost five years since late 2017), money, and energy on fact-finding investigations and rigorous deliberations over the reports, documents, and pieces of evidence provided by various governments, civil society organisations, individual researchers, think tanks, media, etc, to publish this report.

The organisation analysed thoroughly the testimonies of some Uyghurs who were released or had escaped from the detention centres in Xinjiang after having harrowing experiences for years. While highlighting “serious human rights violations” in Xinjiang in the garb of the Chinese Central government’s so-called “counter-terrorism and counter-extremism” strategies, the 48-page report rapped China left and right in addition to prescribing a long list of recommendations for China to adhere to.

The horrors of hundreds of detention camps inside Xinjiang, which Chinese authorities romanticise as re-education camps, came to light in 2016. China has reportedly incarcerated over a million Uyghurs in these camps. Several governments, human rights organisations, Uyghur diaspora organisations, academics, think tanks, freelancers, and activists have prepared and published many online and offline reports on this issue.

One of the eye-opening reports on the situation in Xinjiang is by the Human Rights Watch, which describes the Chinese excesses against Uyghurs as “crimes against humanity”. Similarly, the US government passed the “Uyghur Human Rights Policy Act” in 2020, which “imposes sanctions on foreign individuals and entities” responsible for human rights violations in Xinjiang.

However, Beijing has categorically denied and outrightly rejected the reports described above. It does not pay any heed to the global community’s concern for Uyghurs imprisoned in Xinjiang. It has yet to follow nor implement the OHCHR recommendations. Instead, China has reactivated its propaganda machine to disseminate the message worldwide that the situation in Xinjiang is stable and peaceful, and the Uyghurs are leading a prosperous life. Accordingly, it has strategised methodically and honed its diplomatic efficacy to counter the international community’s concerns about the Uyghurs.

The Chinese government has circulated several counter reports, White Papers, etc, to mobilise international opinions against the Uyghurs and those who extended them continuous moral and material support. As part of its propaganda drive, the State Council Information Office of China has published (between 2019 and 2021) six White Papers on overall human rights developments in the country and eight White Papers on the situation in Xinjiang. As the latest countermeasure, the Standing Committee of the 14th Xinjiang Regional People’s Congress passed a resolution last month (August 2024) opposing a series of American sanctions related to Xinjiang since 2022 under the ambit of the Uyghur Force Labour Prevention Act.

Besides, China has exhibited its sheer power of money and diplomacy to silence critics all across the globe. The Chinese government has built a strong rapport with the leadership in Islamic nations so that they do not show solidarity with their brethren in Xinjiang. Chinese government strategy includes visits by foreign dignitaries (politicians, diplomats, media people, scholars, activists, etc) from like-minded friendly countries for state-sponsored guided tours in Xinjiang.

The Chinese authorities also facilitate visits by YouTubers from different parts of the globe to showcase the marvels China has done in Xinjiang without showing anything about the Uyghurs’ woes. China ensures that these dignitaries give positive feedback about Xinjiang and share their experiences in all news media while parroting the Chinese lines.

Early this year, several political leaders from Arab countries and journalists from Pakistan visited various cities in Xinjiang and enjoyed seven-star Chinese hospitality. In lieu of this Chinese largesse, the visiting dignitaries eulogised Chinese policies towards the Uyghurs. Earlier, this author had highlighted in a couple of publications how the Uzbek Premier and Turkish Foreign Minister had yielded to Chinese pressure during their visits to Xinjiang and subsequently subscribed to the Chinese narrative on Uyghurs. Last year (2023), as many as 30 Islamic scholars from over a dozen countries in Asia, Europe, and Africa not only visited Xinjiang but also heaped full praise on the Chinese policies towards Muslims in the country in general and Uyghurs in particular.

At present, the condition of Uyghurs in Xinjiang beggars description. Nobody has any clue about what is happening inside the detention camps and with the Uyghurs. The Chinese government has made all-out efforts to muzzle international media, including social media, and to thwart academics and activists who oppose the Chinese move against Uyghurs and support the human rights and freedom of the Uyghurs. Because of the surveillance in the region, it is difficult for anyone to pass on news from Xinjiang to the outside world.

It is a worldwide fact that everything in Xinjiang is on the Chinese government's radar. The state security apparatus persecutes anyone who holds an anti-government or anti-China stand. In recent years, the Chinese strategy has been to disclose only information about Xinjiang, which does not harm its position in the region. It means China has effectively made the world believe what it says about Xinjiang and the Uyghurs.

Keeping in view the endeavours made by the international community to persuade or pressurise China for the grave mistake it has committed in Xinjiang, it is imperative to deduce that while China has become largely successful in influencing international opinion to favour its narrative on Xinjiang, the world community has failed miserably to set China right for its follies.

Beijing has been daring enough to ignore the OHCHR findings and the sanctions by the Western countries, especially the US, and thereby keep on continuing its campaign against Uyghurs. The US Department of State has expressed disappointment over the Chinese not complying with the global body's report. It is high time the world understood the gravity of the problem and clamped down stricter measures to cut the arrogant and aggressive China to size. All conscientious nations and their leaders should make a combined endeavour to compel the Chinese government to stop excesses against the minorities in the country, especially Uyghurs, and to provide them with fundamental freedom.

Why a China-US thaw may not be in India's economic interests

05 September 2024, Deccan Herald, Anushka Saxena

India now finds itself in a unique position, with the ability to leverage its relationship with the US to seek concessions.

For anyone observing the simmering tensions in United States-China relations, the recent meeting between US National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi would have gone exactly as expected.

The readouts published by both sides suggest that the meeting was merely a reiteration of the red lines each side must not cross. To an international audience closely following the development, these readouts confirm that US-China competition is here to stay, with little chance of a thaw. But, as the White House readout suggests, the two sides can still attempt to "manage the relationship responsibly."

An emerging feature of this competition has been the steady elevation of India's position in the US strategy to counter China. In fact, just before his visit to Beijing, Sullivan also hosted Indian defence minister Rajnath Singh in the US for a series of discussions on strengthening India-US ties, especially in the fields of defence and critical technologies.

Their mutual competition with China has hence opened doors for collaboration in economic, military, and technological domains. In this regard, a thaw in US-China relations may not be in India's economic interests.

As the two largest economic powers of the world, the US and China are expected to manage differences in a manner that does not destabilise the security of global value chains.

However, as evident from the discussions at the Wang-Sullivan meeting, the two sides continue to compete in the trade and critical technologies domains. As Sullivan reiterated, the US has adopted a firm stance on limiting the export of American critical technological talent, investments, and materials to China, while China has responded by calling such restrictions unfair.

China is also making grand investments in indigenous technological capabilities and has no intention to give up its export dominance in vital domains such as solar photovoltaic cells, strategic electronic components, and New Electric Vehicles (NEVs), all of which are facing heavy import tariffs in Western markets due to the Chinese State's market- and price-distorting subsidies.

Countries around the world are hence attempting to build cadence with the US' secondary sanction and tariff regimes, balancing such attempts with the low cost advantages imports from China offer. And even US allies are not exempt—the Netherlands-based firm ASML, for example, had to agree not to renew licences to service equipment or provide spare parts to China for semiconductor production, despite the fact that China accounted for nearly half of the firm's revenues in Q2 of 2024.

The growing sentiment in the West to de-risk certain value chains from China has created opportunities for countries like India, which has the potential to compete with China in production costs, standards, and backward supply chain linkages. In this strategy, commonly referred to as 'China+1', India has frequently emerged as an alternative destination and has sought to position itself as the US' new hub for production and investment.

But this effort has its challenges. Strict regulatory restrictions, a lack of openness to business, and robust tariff and non-tariff barriers have led India to lose out in certain sectors to Vietnam, Thailand, and Mexico. Nonetheless, there is optimism about India's potential to emerge as a viable 'China+1' alternative, especially as a recent report by Rhodium Group ranks India fifth among the top 10 countries with the highest diversification attractiveness.

India's Choices

India now finds itself in a unique position, with the ability to leverage its relationship with the US to seek concessions. Recently, the US, Canada, and the EU imposed import tariffs of 30-100 per cent on imports of electric vehicles made in China. This includes EVs manufactured by the Texas-headquartered Tesla, shipped from its factory in Shanghai (the EU, however, has granted a 9 per cent concession on tariffs to Tesla in August).

This highlights the discontent surrounding the supply glut created by Chinese overcapacity, which has even led Western firms to face the wrath of their governments for producing in or supplying to China, significantly undercutting their cost and revenue advantages.

In this regard, India has a significant opportunity to take a nuanced and clear-eyed approach to four crucial factors: inviting private sector investment from US firms, opening up to imports of critical components, implementing regulatory changes to create an uncomplicated business environment, and conducting economic diplomacy with the US.

The goal of these efforts should be for India to emerge as a whitelisted destination of imports for US and other Western markets, even if Chinese components are involved in its production processes. To achieve this, India must not only clear restrictions on imports from China to develop robust supply linkages in the assembly process but also negotiate with the US to ease potential rules of origin-related restrictions on imports from India based on mutual interests and friendly relations.

Though not exactly similar in nature, there exists some precedent to the extension of such goodwill. In June 2023, for example, following continued bilateral exchanges to strengthen the India-US trade relationship, India agreed to roll back its retaliatory import tariffs against the US and terminate six WTO disputes with it.

If India can successfully make the case that Tesla can similarly produce in and export from India without facing import tariffs from the US, not only will India witness some progress in its China+1 ambitions, but also create room for Western economies to seek the right alternative without hampering business sentiment.

Till such a time as India can find its own alternatives for imports of strategic components, however, it must rely on cost effective methods of procurement, even if they involve China.

Tourist boom threatens to swamp Indian mountain town where Dalai Lama took refuge

05 September 2024, The Guardian, Prasannata Patwa

McLeod Ganj is a magnet for domestic holidaymakers fleeing scorching temperatures. But their cars choke the streets and new hotels stretch scarce water supplies

UVs and saloon cars pass slowly along McLeod Ganj's narrow one-way Jogiwara Road, blaring horns at pedestrians and scooter riders and playing loud music. The powerful vehicles soon get stuck in the traffic near Kalachakra temple, the place of worship of the 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso.

"You can be stuck in this traffic easily for two hours," says a frustrated local taxi driver, not keen to share his name.

McLeod Ganj, a Himalayan town famed for its temples, meditation courses and ashrams, is witnessing an influx of domestic tourists seeking refuge from rising temperatures in dry and tropical states across India. Many come to enjoy cricket matches with the view of the mighty Dhauladhar mountain range overlooking the stadium, which has become a magnet for India's sports fans.

Once monks in burgundy red robes dominated the colour palette of McLeod Ganj's main market. The town was where thousands of Tibetans fled after the 1959 uprising against the Chinese in Tibet sent the Dalai Lama into exile here.

It became a refuge not just for Tibetans but for foreign hippy travellers and others seeking a quiet and contemplative environment. But now vehicles and clusters of Indian tourists crowd these lanes, filming videos and clicking selfies. More than 150 new hotels have been built or opened in the past four years.

McLeod Ganj's Tibetan community has been migrating out of the hill station in search of better work opportunities for several years. But now the impact of the climate crisis and overtourism is pushing others to contemplate leaving. The population has dramatically shrunk, say local people.

"This is not the quiet and peaceful McLeod Ganj any more. The only reason we are staying here is because we want to stay close to our spiritual leader Dalai Lama," says Kunsang, owner of Cafe Hope.

The tourist season of May to July has disappeared, with visitors now coming all year round, he says.

"Now people come here to party for some days and leave, rather than staying here for some length of time."

The Dalai Lama, who turned 89 last month, has been crucial in building a new home for Tibetans in India and is a symbol of hope for the scattered diaspora, says Dr Latika Gupta at the faculty of education in the University of Delhi.

Surrounded by snow-capped mountains and cedarwood forests, the city of Dharamshala is 1,457 metres above sea level, keeping the temperature cool. The weather conditions being similar to Tibet made Dharamshala a perfect new home for the Dalai Lama, and the Tibetan refugees who followed him into exile.

But this year's heatwaves across India have pushed up temperatures in Dharamshala, and its suburbs of McLeod Ganj and Dharamkot, regularly hitting 40C, previously a rare occurrence for the region.

"You should keep onion skin in your pocket to defend against this heat," says Dorjee, a Tibetan man in his late 80s, playing chess in the square.

India's capital, New Delhi, touched 49.1C on 29 May. Temperatures in states near Dharamshala such as Rajasthan, Haryana, Uttar Pradesh and Punjab also reached close to 50C in the May heatwave, according to India Meteorological Department.

It sent middle-class and better-off Indian families to the hills and many to McLeod Ganj, a worldwide attraction since the Dalai Lama and his followers arrived in the 60s, attracting visitors including the Beatles.

"This place used to be filled with foreigners. Their visiting purpose was to study about Tibet and its culture, Buddhism, or participate in yoga or meditation retreats. This would make them stay here for many months," says Jempa, a Tibetan man in his early 80s, who as a boy followed the Dalai Lama to India with his parents.

"I used to have international travellers who would stay for six months, a year or two years. Now that time is gone," says Neeraj Rajput, manager of Misty Woods, a hotel in McLeod Ganj.

Local bed and breakfasts, hotels and eateries are also facing competition from the rapid increase in luxury hotel chains and homestays, according to more than half a dozen local business owners.

"Since the cricket stadium has opened up, a lot more three- and five-star properties have been built in areas that we didn't even know existed. The entire Dharamshala is probably covered now," adds Rajput, who has been managing Misty Woods for close to a decade.

The former visitors here, those from abroad, would not bring cars but use local taxis to get about. But domestic tourists bring their air-conditioned cars, leading to traffic jams, and less income for taxi drivers.

"There is not much difference in my earnings during tourist season or off season. In peak season, I am usually able to complete only a couple of rides and also get stuck in traffic for hours," says another taxi driver, also requesting anonymity. "In off season, even though there are less people, I am able to make more trips, most likely with less traffic."

As the debate around Tibet's freedom has faded from the global stage, many new visitors, especially from younger generations, are unaware of the links to the Dalai Lama and Tibet's history, seeing instead an exotic place with monasteries, prayer flags and waterfalls.

The climate crisis is having its impact here. Triund, which is one of McLeod Ganj's main water sources, dried up during summer this year, according to those who frequent the popular trekking route.

"It was completely dry up there. We didn't even have water to wash our hands," says Amandeep Kaur, a college professor, who took a dozen of her students on a trekking trip in June.

The monsoon season is proving more extreme too, with landslides and cloudbursts common in Himachal Pradesh state. A red alert was issued for Dharamshala's Kangra valley on 1 August, after cloudbursts across the state, including in the capital city, Simla, left 50 people missing and five dead.

Dorjee is among those local people who blame construction work associated with tourism for exacerbating the situation. "If you keep drilling holes in the mountains, what do you think is going to happen?" he says. "I am not an engineer or an architect but my mother used to earn wages by building roads in these mountains. I have helped in building [the Dalai Lama's] temple here. Things should be built on the mountain instead of breaking it," he says.

Chinese Premier Visit To Pakistan: A Milestone For Strengthening Bilateral Ties – OpEd

05 September 2024, Eurasia Review, Asad Ali

Chinese Premier Li Qiang is scheduled to visit Pakistan next, marking a significant moment in the history of Sino-Pak relations, as this will be the first visit by a Chinese Premier to Pakistan in 11 years. This visit, planned ahead of SCO summit on October 15-16, offers both countries an opportunity to enhance their longstanding partnership, explore new avenues for cooperation, and navigate the evolving geopolitical landscape.

Premier Li Qiang's visit, coming at a time when both nations are facing economic challenges and shifting global dynamics, is expected to be more than just a routine diplomatic engagement. It symbolizes the renewal of commitment to deepening cooperation in a wide range of areas, including trade, investment, infrastructure, and regional security.

One of the most anticipated outcomes of this visit will be a renewed focus on economic cooperation, particularly within the framework of CPEC. Since its inception, CPEC has been the cornerstone of Pakistan's economic ties with China, leading to billions of dollars in Chinese investment in energy, infrastructure, and industrial projects. However, CPEC has faced challenges, including delays in project implementation, security concerns, and economic difficulties in Pakistan.

Pakistan and China share common concerns about regional security, particularly in the context of Afghanistan and the broader South Asian region. Premier Li Qiang's visit is likely to see discussions on enhancing security cooperation to address challenges such as terrorism, cross-border insurgencies, and the evolving situation in Afghanistan.

China has played an active role in promoting regional stability, especially after US withdrawal from Afghanistan. Both China and Pakistan have a shared interest in preventing Afghanistan from becoming a hub of terrorism and instability. Their cooperation in security matters, particularly in intelligence sharing and counterterrorism efforts, is expected to be high on the agenda during Li Qiang's visit.

Moreover, as both nations are members of SCO, this visit presents an opportunity for Pakistan and China to coordinate their positions ahead of the SCO summit. The SCO, which focuses on regional security, economic cooperation, and counterterrorism, is an important platform for both countries to align their strategies on issues of mutual concern, particularly in the context of Central Asia and Afghanistan.

While CPEC remains a focal point of China-Pakistan relations, there is a growing recognition on both sides that the relationship must expand beyond this corridor. Premier Li Qiang's visit offers a chance to explore new avenues of collaboration in emerging sectors such as digital economy, science and technology, and green energy.

China has made significant strides in technology and innovation, and Pakistan is eager to benefit from Chinese expertise in areas such as artificial intelligence, telecommunications, and e-commerce. Li Qiang's visit could lead to agreements that promote greater collaboration in these sectors, thus opening new opportunities for Pakistani entrepreneurs and tech professionals.

In addition, Pakistan, like many other countries, is facing the pressing challenge of climate change. China's leadership in renewable energy, particularly in solar and wind power, offers a valuable opportunity for Pakistan to enhance its green energy capacity. Cooperation in this area would not only contribute to Pakistan's energy security but also align with global efforts to combat climate change.

Premier Li Qiang's visit also comes at a time of significant geopolitical shifts in the region. The growing strategic competition between China and the United States, as well as India's increasing alignment with the West, adds complexity to China-Pakistan relations. While both countries have historically maintained a strong partnership, they now face new challenges and opportunities in a rapidly changing world order.

For Pakistan, deepening ties with China remains crucial, particularly as it seeks to navigate its relationship with other major powers. China's support has been vital for Pakistan in forums such as the United Nations, where it has backed Pakistan on key issues such as Kashmir. At the same time, Pakistan must balance its relations with China, the United States, and other regional powers, particularly India.

Li Qiang's visit will reaffirm China's continued support for Pakistan on the international stage, particularly in multilateral organizations like the United Nations and SCO. It also underscores the importance of the Pakistan-China partnership in maintaining regional peace and stability, especially as the two countries seek to counterbalance the influence of other major powers in South Asia.

Premier Li Qiang's visit to Pakistan in October 2024 marks a critical juncture in the history of Sino-Pak relations. This visit offers a unique opportunity for both countries to reinvigorate their strategic partnership, strengthen economic ties, and enhance cooperation in emerging sectors such as technology and green energy. Moreover, it provides a platform for Pakistan and China to align their positions on regional security ahead of the SCO summit.

As the two countries look towards the future, the visit highlights the enduring strength of the China-Pakistan relationship, which has weathered challenges and continues to evolve in response to changing global dynamics. By expanding cooperation beyond traditional sectors and addressing shared challenges, Premier Li Qiang's visit will further cement the bond between the two nations, ensuring that this "iron brotherhood" remains a cornerstone of regional peace, stability, and prosperity.

How China's Boarding Schools in Xinjiang (East Turkistan) Are Erasing a People's Identity: A Uyghur View

05 September 2024, Bitter Winter, Abdulhakim Idris

The Chinese regime is perpetrating the cultural genocide of a generation by weaponizing education. The state of the matter after ten years of persecution. This year marks the 10th anniversary of the active Uyghur genocide, consisting of President Xi Jinping's "People's War on Terror," and there is no sign of it stopping in the near future. The Chinese government has detained over one million Uyghurs (a quite conservative evaluation) in re-education camps, but the horrors extend beyond the camps, to the children left behind. These children are being forcibly assimilated into Han Chinese culture through a vast network of state-run boarding schools. This essay delves into how these institutions serve as tools of cultural genocide, stripping Uyghur children of their language, religion, and identity.

The plight of the Uyghur and Kazakh people is not a sudden eruption but a consequence of a long history of oppression and marginalization. Uyghurs, predominantly Muslim Turkic people, have historically faced systematic assimilation and genocide in their homeland, East Turkistan, which the Chinese regime calls Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (XUAR). Their struggle for cultural and religious autonomy has been met with relentless suppression by the racist, nationalistic Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

In 2014, this simmering tension took a drastic turn. Under the guise of combating "religious extremism," the People's Republic of China (PRC) initiated an intensified crackdown in East Turkistan. The region, rich in cultural diversity, was subjected to an increasingly pervasive and intrusive surveillance system. This campaign, ostensibly targeting terrorism, was in reality a thinly veiled attempt to control and assimilate the Uyghur population.

The Uyghur region is not only a cultural and religious battleground but also a territory of significant economic interest. It is rich in natural resources, including oil, gas, and minerals, making it a strategic asset for the PRC's "Belt and Road Initiative." Beijing has heavily invested in infrastructure projects in the region, but these developments have disproportionately benefited the Han Chinese population while further marginalizing the Uyghurs.

A policy of assimilation

The economic exploitation extends to forced labor. Many Uyghurs who are not detained in camps are subjected to forced labor in factories across the PRC. These factories are often linked to global supply chains, implicating international corporations in the human rights abuses occurring in East Turkistan. The Chinese government justifies this as part of its "poverty alleviation" program, but in reality, it is a form of modern-day slavery designed to further control and assimilate the Uyghur population.

In this calculated strategy of cultural genocide, the Chinese state has weaponized education. The Chinese government's assimilation process starts with detaining parents under arbitrary claims, placing them in detainment camps and leaving children defenseless and vulnerable. Children whose parents are detained, in prison, or undergoing re-education or "training," are classified into a special needs category, making them eligible for state care, which typically means placement in orphanages or boarding schools.

At the epicenter of the PRC's brutal repression of Uyghurs lies a particularly insidious tactic: the systematic separation of Uyghur children from their families. This abhorrent practice serves as a cornerstone of China's campaign to erase Uyghur cultural identity and enforce a homogeneous Han Chinese ideology.

Since 2017, the CCP has intensified its crackdown on the Uyghurs. Under the guise of combating extremism, the Chinese government has implemented a series of draconian measures aimed at eradicating Uyghur culture. These measures include mass detentions, forced labor, and sterilizations. The United States and several other countries have labeled these actions as genocide, while the United Nations has indicated they can amount to crimes against humanity.

As the Chinese government detains Uyghur adults, their children are sent to state-run boarding schools. These institutions are designed to sever the children from their cultural roots and indoctrinate them into Han Chinese culture. According to reports, more than half a million Uyghur children have been placed in these schools, where they are taught to speak Mandarin exclusively and are subjected to a curriculum that glorifies the Chinese state while denigrating their native culture.

The Kuchar brothers

Aysu and Lütfullah Kuchar, two Uyghur children, were forced to spend nearly twenty months in a state boarding school. They were forcibly separated from their family and subjected to physical and emotional abuse. Their heads were shaved, and they were frequently beaten and locked in dark rooms as punishment. By the time they returned home, they had forgotten how to speak Uyghur, their mother tongue. "That was the heaviest moment in my life. Standing in front of my two Chinese-speaking children, I felt as if they had killed me," their father lamented. By the time they were able to return to their parents to Türkiye in December 2019, they had become malnourished and traumatized.

Another victim, Mihrigul Tursun, a Uyghur woman who survived the concentration camps, tearfully recounted the torture she endured. Her children were taken from her and placed in a boarding school.

When she was finally allowed to reconnect with them, she found that one of her children had died due to an operation performed without her consent.

NPR, or National Public Radio in the US, published the Kuchars' story and was able to identify the school Lütfullah was sent to. It had been previously called the Urumqi Folk Art School and is located in the densely populated, predominantly Uyghur neighborhood of Sandunbei in the region's capital, Urumqi. The school is among at least 1,300 boarding schools set up across the Uyghur region, according to the Ministry for Education documents. XUAR local governments have been scrubbing their websites of all references to the boarding schools, but an official education report from 2017—the year before the Kuchar children were sent to the school—says nearly half a million children had already been enrolled by the start of that year.

In these boarding schools, the use of the Uyghur language is strictly prohibited. Classroom instruction is conducted almost exclusively in Mandarin, and teachers can be punished for using Uyghur outside specific language classes. This policy aims to erode the children's fluency in their native language, thereby severing their connection to their cultural and religious identities.

Reports have documented numerous instances of physical and emotional abuse in these schools. Children are often beaten, locked in dark rooms, and forced to hold stress positions for extended periods. These punitive measures are designed to break the children's spirit and make them more pliable to assimilation efforts.

The systematic separation of Uyghur children from their families and their forced assimilation into Han Chinese culture constitutes a form of cultural genocide. By eradicating the Uyghur language, religion, and customs, the CCP aims to eliminate any sense of Uyghur identity. This policy not only affects the current generation but also ensures that future generations will grow up devoid of their cultural heritage.

The psychological toll on these children is immense. Separated from their families and subjected to constant abuse and indoctrination, many of these children suffer from severe trauma. They grow up feeling alienated from their cultural roots and are often unable to communicate with their parents and grandparents, who remain fluent in Uyghur.

The boarding schools in East Turkistan are not merely educational institutions; they are tools of cultural genocide. By forcibly assimilating Uyghur children into Han Chinese culture, the Chinese government aims to erase the Uyghur identity from the face of the earth. The stories of Aysu, Lütfullah, and Mihrigul are harrowing reminders of the human cost of this genocidal campaign. As the world watches, it is imperative to continue documenting these atrocities and advocating for the rights of the Uyghur people.

A systematic campaign

According to expert Adrian Zenz and BBC, children of detained parents in boarding schools were penalized for failing to speak Mandarin Chinese and prevented from practicing their religion. In a paper published in the "Journal of Political Risk," Zenz calls the effort a "systematic campaign of social re-engineering and cultural genocide." Human Rights Watch said that the children detained at child welfare facilities and boarding schools were held without parental consent or access. "The New York Times" reported that approximately 497,800 elementary and junior high school students were enrolled in these boarding schools. These sources also reported that students are only allowed to see family members once every two weeks and that they are forbidden from speaking the Uyghur language.

Furthermore, UN experts expressed grave concern over allegations of a significant expansion of the state-run boarding school system, which fails to provide education in the children's mother tongue and forcibly separates Uyghur and other minority Muslim children from their families and communities, leading to their forced assimilation. "We are deeply concerned that boarding schools in Xinjiang are teaching almost exclusively in the official language with little or no use of Uyghur as medium of instruction and that the separation of mainly Uyghur and other minority children from their families could lead to their forced assimilation into the majority Mandarin language and the adoption of Han cultural practices," the UN experts said. They stressed the discriminatory nature of the policy and the violation of minorities' right to an education without discrimination, to family life, and to cultural rights.

The experts received information about large-scale removal of children, mainly Uyghur, from their families, including very young children whose parents are in exile or "interned"/detained. These children are treated as "orphans" by State authorities and placed in full-time boarding schools, pre-schools, or orphanages where the language used is almost exclusively Mandarin, the standard official Chinese language, or "Putonghua."

"Uyghur and other minority children in highly regulated and controlled boarding institutions may have little interaction with their parents, extended family or communities for much of their youth," the experts said. "This will inevitably lead to a loss of connection with their families and communities and undermine their ties to their cultural, religious and linguistic identities," they added.

The UN experts were also informed of the exponential increase in the number of boarding schools for Uyghur, Kazakh, and other Turkic Muslim children in recent years, and the closure of local schools where education through the medium of Uyghur and other ethnic groups languages could be provided. "The massive scale of the allegations raises extremely serious concerns of violations of basic human rights," they said. Experts note this is part of Chinese authorities' efforts to mold minority children into speaking and acting like the country's dominant Han ethnic group.

"This ideological impulse of trying to assimilate non-Han people corresponded with this punitive approach of putting adults in camps, and therefore lots of young children ended up in boarding kindergartens and boarding schools or orphanages," says James Millward, a professor at Georgetown University who studies Chinese and Central Asian history. "It really is an effort to try to make everyone Chinese and see themselves as Chinese and have a single cultural background."

China rejects the widespread accusations of wrongful discrimination against Uyghurs and other minorities in the region—but Uyghurs, rights advocates, and reporters have documented numerous accounts of systematic abuse.

China claims it is expanding the number of boarding schools allegedly to improve educational access, especially in remote rural communities. But Uyghur families say such schools are also institutions where children with both parents detained or imprisoned are sent, against family wishes. "My relatives would rather take care of the children themselves, but they are forced to send the kids to boarding schools," says Mukerrem Mahmud, a Uyghur student in Türkiye.

Nepal between India and China

05 September 2024, Modern Diplomacy, Sounak Ghosh and Dr. Karamala Areesh Kumar

Nepal is a miniature state nestled in a strategic position between China and India, two of the emerging powers of the contemporary world.

Nepal is a miniature state nestled in a strategic position between China and India, two of the emerging powers of the contemporary world. Due to its geographical location, Nepal is an important buffer state and gives China and India equal opportunity to influence the region. In terms of national strength, Nepal's relations with China and India are asymmetrical. The primary interest of China's intervention is to prevent Tibetans from using Nepal's territory as a base for its movement for autonomy. The Chinese government has made significant attempts to build its economic presence in Nepal since 1950, and simultaneously bilateral relations strengthened between both countries.

Along with its geographical location, vast river systems, sustained by glaciers and monsoon rains, make Nepal an ideal location for hydroelectric power generation. The country is among the richest in the world in terms of water resources per square kilometre, with an estimated 83,000 MW of hydro potential. As an aspiring power, China considers Nepal's water resources as an alternative to meet its energy demand and needs in the southwest region. Under the bilateral cooperation, China expressed its interest in initiating a joint hydropower project, which can help both states.

Given the current circumstances, Nepal has chosen to maintain a non-alignment approach while hedging with both India and China. To address geopolitical obstacles, Nepal hopes to use Beijing's economic and infrastructure development initiatives, such as the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). India, on the other hand, sees China's increasing influence in Nepal as posing a serious threat to its interests. The gap and lack of trust between India and Nepal increased China's presence in Nepal. From 1975 onwards, Sino-Nepalese relations have been tight and have grown significantly. China's investments in Nepal have increased dramatically over the decades. In terms of total investments made in Nepal, China surpassed India for the first time. Between 2014 and 2021, Nepal's exports to China amounted to $196 million, while its purchases from China reached $12.4 billion. In comparison, Nepal brought in $49.9 billion from India and exported $5.37 billion to that country (OEC 2021). China overtook India for the first time in 2015–16, accounting for 42% of all foreign direct investment (FDI). With China securing project contracts worth $10.74 billion in Nepal during the following five years, till 2022, Chinese companies emerged as the main players in Nepali projects.

2016 saw the signing of the Trade and Transit Agreement (TTA) and Nepal's inclusion as one of the original members of China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), among other major accords during Prime Minister K.P. Sharma Oli's visit to Beijing. Positive changes in infrastructure, economy, and military cooperation were evident during this time in Nepal-China relations (Mainali 2022). From 2017 forward, Nepal has made an effort to improve ties with China by welcoming more Chinese business and investment. This move away from India's long-standing dominance in Nepali foreign policy was welcomed by the leftist parties, especially the Communist Party of Nepal-Maoist Centre and the Communist Party of Nepal-Unified Marxist Leninist (CPN-UML).

China accounted for 14.5% of foreign direct investment in Nepal in 2021, while India accounted for 33.3% (Nepal Central Bank Report 2022). Over the previous 27 years, Chinese exports to Nepal have increased at an annual rate of 13.9%, from $53.4 million in 1995 to $1.78 billion in 2022. China became a significant player in Nepali infrastructure projects in 2022, and Nepal's imports from China reached $1.78 billion. China's growing sway aside, India continued to be the primary recipient of foreign direct investment and kept a careful eye on the shifting dynamics. During fiscal year 2022-2023, India purchased items worth USD 839.62 million from Nepal, while its total exports to Nepal came to USD 8015.99 million. To traverse challenging geopolitical environments and take advantage of chances for economic and infrastructural growth, Nepal has balanced its relations with both China and India.

If Nepal changes its allegiance and accrues debt to China, it could affect India's dominance in the region. If Nepal's financial problems lead it to ask for more aid, that might affect India's commercial relations. If tensions along the border rise due to Nepalese instability, India might have security worries. Additionally, it could lead to a wave of refugees into India, straining its already limited resources. Concerns have been raised about China's financial support to Nepal. It's called "debt-trap" diplomacy by critics. Beijing disputes this, but the concern endures. Nepal needs to exercise caution and look for grants and soft loans rather than commercial loans that can trap the country in debt. The major concern lies in the attempted Chinese debt trap, following a similar pattern seen in Sri Lanka. India advises Nepal to be cautious and prioritise sustainable financing options.

Nepal drifting from India could have strategic consequences. India's immediate neighbours hold immense importance for regional stability. A weakened alliance with Nepal may impact India's security interests, trade routes, and influence in the Himalayan region.

Despite India's worries about Nepal's growing commitment to China, it is important to recognize that Nepal's relationship with China presents a unique combination of opportunities and problems. Although India may view Nepal's stronger connections with China as a challenge to its hegemony in the region, Nepal's efforts to build its infrastructure and economy with China could benefit both parties and promote stability in the area. Concern still lies in how Nepal will tackle the wrath of China which they can't foresee, and how it affects India's relation with Nepal.

Rural bookstore shares story of Tibetan culture

04 September 2024, Asia News Network

Architect Zhao Yang, who designed the renovation plan, believes the bookstore should be an outgrowth of the vast land on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, helping people connect with the soil and experience its authenticity.

About seven years ago, 33-year-old Tsering Dondrub, a business owner in Shangri-La county, Diqing Tibetan autonomous prefecture in Southwest China's Yunnan province, purchased three traditional Tibetan houses in Wugong village, Xiaozhongdian town of the county, a half-hour drive from downtown area.

The three freestanding houses built nearly half a century ago had been unused for five years and would maintain this status for another three years until a bookstore brand moved in for its new branch.

Shangri-La was a key staging post in the Yunnan-Xizang branch of the Ancient Tea-Horse Caravan Route, a trade route that started in the Tang Dynasty (618-907) and prospered in the Ming and Qing dynasties (1368-1911) connecting Pu'er in Yunnan with Lhasa in today's Xizang autonomous region.

It continues to be an important point along the north-south National Highway 214, which starts from Qinghai province, runs through Xizang and Yunnan's Shangri-La, Lijiang and Dali, and ends in Pu'er. There are 26 ethnic groups in Shangri-La and about 33 percent of the population are of the Tibetan ethnic group.

Wugong sits just beside the highway. Villagers used to live by growing highland barley and raising yaks and sheep. About 20 years ago, there were 67 people and 10 households, which has expanded to 139 people and 31 households.

Born into a family of blacksmiths, Tsering Dondrub and his father kept refining their skills in making machetes and tableware in their spare time.

With the national highway, a high-speed railway and an airport, Shangri-La, the mysterious region described in the novel Lost Horizon by James Hilton published in 1933, has become easier to access in recent years.

Tourism has boomed, bringing visitors from home and abroad to the outlying village, who have showed a strong interest in traditional Tibetan culture.

Having been often invited to craft Tibetan knives and containers by tourists, Tsering Dondrub and his father opened a workshop beside the highway, which soon became lucrative.

Since 2009, under the trademark Kasa Dao (Kasa Knife), Tsering Dondrub has been running the business of making and selling traditional Tibetan products both online and in shops. By 2021, with integrated businesses, including rural tourism, iron products and ethnic cultural products, he has seen revenues exceed 7 million yuan ($985,125).

He bought the three old houses seven years ago, not far from a reservoir, with plans to renovate them into hostels. However, by 2020, Tsering Dondrub had still not found a partner who was willing to renovate the three houses, which otherwise would be torn down.

In May 2020, Chinese bookstore brand Librairie Avant-Garde, headquartered in Nanjing, Jiangsu province, opened its new branch in a village in Shaxi ancient town of Dali Bai autonomous prefecture, Yunnan. Its founder Qian Xiaohua and rotating chairman Zhang Ruifeng soon started looking for other opportunities in the province.

They came to Shangri-La at the invitation of the local government because, since 2014, their bookstores renovated from derelict old houses in rural areas have successfully brought vitality back to those hollowed-out villages, setting good examples for rural vitalization in China.

They were taken to the commercial areas in Dukezong ancient town and other places, but Qian always prefers a venue with a good view that has not yet been touched by commerce.

"We always want to create a place to realize our idealism about bookstores, rather than simply for business," Zhang says.

When Tsering Dondrub first showed them the three ramshackle Tibetan houses, they were quite impressed, but there were dozens of such houses nearby. A year later, when they viewed the houses again, Qian decided to rent them. Otherwise, they were very likely to be torn down like other deserted houses.

They invited architect Zhao Yang to design the renovation plan.

Zhao, a graduate of Tsinghua University and Harvard University, is now based in Dali. For years, he has been trying to put his architectural idealism into practice – to talk to nature with an open mind.

"A good house is like a tree. If a tree grows well, it's because it grows in the right place – it can adapt to the local water, soil and sunlight conditions," he was quoted in a previous interview. "What I have learned from building houses in rural areas is that there are no definite rules about design, which changes according to local conditions."

Before the bookstore, Zhao already completed two works in the places lived in by Tibetans. One is the Nyangchu River tourist center, which was completed in 2009 and is located in Nyingchi county in Xizang along National Highway 318.

Another is the Sunyata Hotel in Yunnan's Dechen county, which opened at the end of 2018 and sits across the holy Tibetan Meili Snow Mountain. Its predecessor was the renowned Migratory Bird Inn.

In 2022, when Zhao first saw the three rundown Tibetan houses standing in the field, he says he felt this place fits the bookstore's brand ethos.

Typical of traditional Tibetan houses in Shangri-La, the three houses represented the architectural system established by people who had lived there for hundreds of years.

"Their architectural form, the slope of the roof, the way it handles rainfall, and the choice of materials all blend harmoniously with the surrounding environment," Zhao says. "So, we need first to understand and appreciate them before considering whether we can add something new."

Zhao and his team carefully entered the houses, closely observed them and found people like Tsering Dondrub to tell stories about the village.

Zhao was surprised to find that the wooden structure of the three houses is different from those of the houses of the Han people in their building logic.

In the wooden structure of a Han house, the pillars on the first and second floors are often a single piece of wood. However, the pillars on the first floor of a Tibetan house were shorter, more slender and simpler than those on the second floor. The first floor was inhabited by livestock and the second floor by people.

"That is fascinating for an architect like me, who grew up with a modern architectural education. I see it as a precious anthropological legacy that we should carefully preserve," he says.

What also fascinates Zhao is the textured surface of the pillars on the first floor that reveals how they were made – possibly with just an axe – and a painting featuring the eight auspicious symbols every Tibetan household has, along with other anthropological information, which he managed to keep.

With an altitude of more than 3,400 meters, Shangri-La sees its temperature drop to about – 20 C in winter and people would open small windows on the thick rammed-earth walls for insulation and security, making the rooms so dark that during the days, people needed artificial lighting indoors.

In summer, Shangri-La enjoys abundant sunshine, but rich rainfall causes problems for people living under roofs made of wooden tiles, which they regularly need to replace.

Zhao found that the wooden structures were well-preserved, but the roofs had fallen into disrepair.

Considering that a modern bookstore needs proper lighting, Zhao supplanted them with roofs made of translucent polycarbonate panels and galvanized steel roof trusses, inspired by the sunrooms widely used in Shangri-La.

The three houses were renovated for different purposes – books, coffee and creative cultural products.

"We tried our best to preserve all the wooden structures in the original space," Zhao says.

"We made the smallest changes to the inner structure, so the second floor of the cafe is like a museum of the traditional residences in Shangri-La. We lifted the roof to let light in and brighten the residence."

Another fascinating point is that each house had a granary. Builders left a square opening on the rammed-earth facade and covered it with wooden slats for ventilation.

"Since we don't need granaries in a bookstore, we removed them. We transformed the openings into doors and built concrete walkways that connect the three houses and with the land, which is an important part of my design," Zhao says.

Zhao believes that the bookstore should be an outgrowth of the vast land on the Qinghai-Tibet Plateau, helping people connect with the soil and experience its authenticity. He created the walkways to encourage people to go out and stroll through the fields, mountains, rivers and clouds.

The building process was by no means easy.

The construction team coming from outside knew that they needed to delegate part of the work to the villagers according to local customs. After the harvest in September, villagers were free so the team hired them to tear down broken walls to increase their incomes while building good relations with them.

However, the villagers lacked the required skills, so the construction team had to carefully instruct them.

Another problem was rebuilding the rammed-earth walls to enclose the yards. Having no idea what to do, the team members turned to the villagers. To their surprise, though this type of wall had almost been abandoned in Shangri-La, elderly villagers still retained memories of building houses with their fathers.

"I was so frustrated that I thought we should abandon the plan of building rammed-earth walls. However, with the help of the local people, we continued. Nothing is more 'site-specified' than this. Looking back, it is such a gift from the land to our project," writes the on-site architect Liao Fuhong in his construction notes.

Offering a view of the Haba Snow Mountain across the Jinsha River, the upper stream of the Yangtze River, the bookstore houses 15,000 books on humanities and social sciences and 100 types of creative cultural products with local elements. Readers can also find books about local cultures, geography, languages and history.

"It's great that there are so many books about Tibetans and Shangri-La at the bookstore. These books can connect different cultures," Tsering Dondrub says.

In the house for creative cultural products, people can find refrigerator magnets inspired by natural and cultural landmarks, such as the Ganden Sumtseling Monastery, an important Tibetan Buddhism site in Yunnan, the Haba Snow Mountain, prayer wheels, bookmarks inspired by Tibetan scripts and brooches inspired by Tibetan Opera masks.

At the cafe, visitors can have a highland barley-flavored latte or yak butter latte.

"The bookstore showcases how distinctive the old houses in Shangri-La are innovatively revitalized and imbued with new content and new appearances with more possibilities for the future," Zhang says.

The Shangri-La branch is the sixth rural bookstore of Librairie Avant-Garde since its first one in Bishan, Anhui province, in 2014.

"We have rural bookstores in the Bai, She and Yi ethnic areas – and now the Tibetan ethnic area," he says.

In Lost Horizon, Hilton describes a library in Shangri-La that has a large collection of books, ancient and modern, domestic and foreign.

"Zhongdian was renamed Shangri-La (based on the introductions in Hilton's work) in 2001, so it must have an idealistic bookstore," Zhang says.

However, building a bookstore in such a remote place is not only symbolic. In the short term, the bookstore, like its many precursors, can boost tourism, the economy and culture.

"Every place has its unique history. What we can do is feature the local forte through our platform so that tourists can see traditional local architecture or learn about the local culture, history and geography through the books we present," Zhang says.

Since its opening, the revenue reached 270,000 yuan in the first month, which "is better than expected", Zhang says, adding that "maybe it's because summer is the peak season for Shangri-La tourism".

In other seasons, especially winter, "business might be sluggish because the altitude naturally prevents many people from visiting, but we will keep going", he says.

In the long run, the bookstore will exert a seminal influence on the residents with books and various cultural events, he says.

"We cannot turn people into book lovers within six months. But over five years, or one or two decades, the residents will see so many people reading and caring about their history and culture, which will not only help increase their incomes but also encourage them to cherish, protect and pass on their culture and be proud of it," Zhang says.

In September, Librairie Avant-Garde will open a Lisu ethnic bookstore in the Grand Canyon of the Nujiang River, on the Gaoligong Mountain bordering Myanmar, duplicating its previous experiences.

Chinese poet Yu Jian, 70, a guest attending the bookstore's opening ceremony, said that he was surprised to see a bookstore in such a "remote" place.

"The bookstore is great but I am wondering how they will survive because there aren't many readers of Mandarin books since most Tibetan people don't understand Mandarin," Yu says.

"However, the bookstore transcends traditional models. It's not about making money. It's more like a 'temple' inspiring people's respect for books and bookstores."

Celebrating Tibet, Challenging China's Narrative, Understanding India's Concerns

04 September 2024, StratNews Global, Resham

A three-day event titled "Spirit of Tibet: Celebrating Culture and Compassion" at the India International Centre in Delhi, was an opportunity to mix Tibet's rich cultural heritage and historical significance with some issues of strategic salience.

There were Tibetan cultural performances and discussions on politics and spirituality. These were showcased in the context of Tibet's historical journey, with exhibits and artefacts, followed by screening of documentaries and films. Those of a different bent can sample Tibetan medicines or explore Tibetan astrology.

Inaugural Session: "Relevance of Tibet to India"

But a discussion featuring Penpa Tsering, head of the Central Tibetan Administration, former diplomat Dilip Sinha whose recent book Imperial Games in Tibet is garnering appreciation and acclaim, also celebrated Tibetologist Claude Arpi and Lt Gen Viinod Bhatia, ex-DG Military Operations, drew a packed house.

With the focus on the Relevance of Tibet to India, Penpa Tsering confirmed an ongoing collaboration with the US to challenge China's spurious claims to Tibet. "We intend to convince more countries to challenge Beijing's narrative," said Tsering.

Ambassador Sinha highlighted the strategic shift along the India-Tibet border, saying, "There was a time when the India-Tibet border was considered the most secure, but now that it is the India-China border, it has become a security nightmare for us."

The "Six Wars" China May Fight

Gen Bhatia underscored an important point: while younger generations may have forgotten the 1962 India-China border war, the Galwan clash has revived memories of that tragic conflict, shaping a view of China which is watchful and wary

He referenced a theory predicting that China could engage in six major conflicts over the next several decades to restore what it perceives as its historical glory. These potential conflicts reflect China's aggressive approach to territorial expansion:

- Unification of Taiwan (2020–2025): China considers Taiwan's unification non-negotiable and reserves the right to use war to realise its aims
- Recovery of South China Sea Islands (2025–2030): After a possible victory in Taiwan, China may shift focus to asserting control over the disputed South China Sea islands, even though those claims are not tenable under the UN Laws of the Seas.
- Reconquest of Southern Tibet (2035–2040): Arunachal Pradesh, which China calls Southern Tibet, remains a contested area. The long-standing McMahon Line border dispute between India and China makes this region a focal point for China's aggression.
- Conquering Diaoyu and Ryukyu Islands (2040–2045): China aims to reclaim these Japanese-controlled islands, citing historical ties. The islands are currently under Japanese control.
- Invasion of Mongolia (2045–2050): China views "Outer Mongolia" as part of its historical territory and may seek to assert control over it, following similar patterns seen in its territorial disputes elsewhere.
- Reclaiming Land from Russia (2055–2060): China may eventually focus on regaining land lost to Russia, seeking to Siberia it believes was historically part of China.

China's Long-Term Strategic Approach

Bhatia summarised China's expansionist strategy with the formula: "claim, occupy, legitimise, impose, exploit, and integrate." He stressed that China operates with a long-term vision, aiming to solidify and legitimise its territorial claims over time. In contrast, he suggested, India sometimes overlooks the deeper historical context.

He also explored the evolution of terminology around the India-China border, noting how the Indo-Tibet border was gradually rebranded into what is now called the Line of Actual Control (LAC). He emphasised that this rebranding, particularly the shift from the 1970s onwards, reflects China's strategic influence on regional perceptions.

The "Line of Perceptions" and the Complexity of the LAC

Bhatia offered an interpretation of the LAC, describing it as more than just a physical border. He described it as a "Line of Perceptions," comprising four distinct lines:

- India's Perception of the LAC: How India defines the boundary.
- China's Perception of the LAC: How China views the boundary.

- India's Perception Based on China's View: India's understanding of the boundary, influenced by China's positioning and claims.
- Combined Perception: A mix of both Indian and Chinese interpretations of the LAC.

"The LAC, if I may put it as Line of Perceptions. It is not one line, it is not two lines, it is not three lines but four lines," he explained, underscoring the complex nature of this dispute.

How Deng Xiaoping's 'one country, two systems' dates back to 1957 in Tibet

04 September 2024, SCMP, Chow Chung-yan

With hindsight, the one country, two systems framework bears a certain resemblance to a Qianlong policy Deng and others studied in 1957

Some 25 years before Deng Xiaoping first proposed "one country, two systems" as a creative political solution to facilitate Taiwan, Hong Kong and Macau's return to China, Mao Zedong tasked him with finding an answer to the Tibet issue.

It was 1957, six years after Beijing and Lhasa signed the Seventeen-Point Agreement that confirmed Tibet as part of the People's Republic of China and its autonomous status.

Tensions started to flare between the two sides shortly afterwards. The central leadership blamed this partly on some Communist officials' radical move to change Tibet's social and political systems.

Mao sent Deng, one of his most capable lieutenants, to take charge of the situation and find a long-term solution. Between February and March 1957, Deng held rounds of meetings with other senior officials. Xi Zhongxun, father of the future president, Xi Jinping, was among the attendees.

Deng and his colleagues studied ancient documents for inspiration. The most important one was the Twenty-Nine Article Ordinance for the More Effective Governance of Tibet, an imperial decree issued by the Qianlong emperor of the Qing dynasty in 1793. For centuries, Tibet was China's Gordian knot. Its extreme climate, high altitude and unique sociopolitical conditions made administration arduous. Yet, it is critical to China's stability and security.

Various emperors tried to adopt the so-called patron-priest approach, providing material and military support to Lhasa in exchange for its loyalty and religious influence. However, at the turn of the 18th century, continuous internal strife in the region and the threat of Nepalese invasions forced Beijing's hand.

The Qianlong emperor ordered a reorganisation of the Tibetan administration and codified it into the imperial decree. It formalised the selection of top lamas like the Dalai and the Panchen through a lottery in a golden urn under the supervision of Qing officials. This was a symbolic gesture to position Beijing as the final arbiter of power succession in Tibet.

The ordinance also elevated ambans – equivalent to the central government's liaison office directors today – to the same level of political authority as the Dalai Lama. Beijing would control Tibet's foreign and military affairs but otherwise allow the region to maintain its unique social, religious and political systems. It required Tibet to reform its systems gradually without stipulating deadlines. Tibet was not absorbed into China as another province, but it was also not a simple tributary state like Vietnam.

The Seventeen-Point Agreement Mao offered the 14th Dalai Lama is essentially a modern version of the Twenty-Nine Article Ordinance. Even at the height of the Communist Party's triumph, Mao and Deng were mindful of the vast differences between Tibet and inner China. While they were adamant that Tibet must be part of China, they were also willing to be flexible and patient with its peculiar systems.

On September 4, 1956, Beijing decided to pause socialist reforms in Tibet for "six years". However, similar programmes continued in other Tibetan-populated regions in Sichuan, Yunnan and Qinghai. Deng argued that conditions on the ground were not ripe for introducing radical changes. Even though the priest-god political system and the social reality of serfdom in Tibet were an affront to the Communists' atheist doctrines, Mao and Deng were willing to wait.

The meeting minutes of the secretariat of the Chinese Communist Party at the time showed that the leaders had even discussed letting Tibet keep its systems unchanged for "50 years".

At the Politburo meeting on May 14, 1957, vice-chairman Liu Shaoqi signalled that Beijing was ready to take a "long-term" view of Tibet's reforms but also warned that it would not be afraid to resort to force if war was forced on China. Considering that China was then at the zenith of its revolutionary fever – the Great Leap Forward would be launched a year later – the restraint shown by the leadership over Tibet was remarkable.

Yet, the Tibetan elite rejected the olive branch and decided that time was not on their side. Tensions escalated and culminated in an armed revolt in Lhasa in 1959. Suspecting involvement from the United States, Chinese leaders quickly set aside their waiting strategy and responded with swift military action, resulting in the exile of the 14th Dalai Lama till this day.

No documents show how that experience might have influenced Deng when he entered negotiations with the British 25 years later for the peaceful return of Hong Kong. But with hindsight, the one country, two systems framework bears a certain resemblance to the Twenty-Nine Article Ordinance.

Both underscore a political tradition running from imperial to modern China. Chinese rulers place great importance on national unity and security, from which they derive their governing mandate and legitimacy. The ambition to acquire more territory or wealth is rare and often frowned upon. A good sovereign power is the ultimate guarantor of law and order, upholding national unity and promoting Chinese culture.

As long as the bottom line is not challenged, the Chinese leadership can be extremely pragmatic and flexible. Throughout China's long history, major wars triggered by religious or ideological differences have been rare – unlike in the West.

China never launched any crusade or witnessed anything like the brutal religious struggles in Europe during the Reformation and the Counter-Reformation in the 16th and 17th centuries.

A rare exception was the 10 years of anarchy during the Cultural Revolution that marred Mao's legacy and almost wrecked Deng's career. When Deng returned to politics at the end of the turmoil, he was more determined than ever to stick to pragmatism, setting aside ideological debates in favour of achieving results.

It was against such a background that the idea of "one country, two systems" was hatched. Today, China is trying to reconnect with its historical past more than ever. In Xi's speeches, he cites ancient political philosophers like Xunzi, Guan Zhong or Han Fei extensively.

For people from the English-speaking world, it is tempting to view other countries purely from a Western-centric perspective. We tend to forget that many modern concepts, such as narrowly defined territorial sovereignty, statehood or self-determination, came into existence only after the Treaty of Westphalia at the end of the Thirty Years' War in 1648.

There is a tendency to force everything into the Procrustean bed of the Western narrative, while ignoring the political traditions, priorities and philosophies of other civilisations. This Western-centric perspective, combined with crusading zeal, is often the root cause of conflict in today's increasingly multipolar world.

The Significance of China's Reforms for Pakistan

04 September 2024, Modern Diplomacy, Sahibzada M. Usman

The 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China recently convened its third plenary session, marking a pivotal moment in China's journey toward comprehensive reform and modernization.

The 20th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China (CPC) recently convened its third plenary session in Beijing, marking a pivotal moment in China's journey toward comprehensive reform and modernization. This meeting outlined a clear path for China to establish a high-quality socialist market economy by 2025 and laid the groundwork for becoming a great socialist country by mid-century. The ambitious goals set during this session underscore China's commitment to deepening reforms and enhancing governance capacity, all while maintaining its distinctive Chinese style of socialism.

During the session, more than 360 reform measures were introduced, which will be implemented in a phased manner until 2029. These measures are designed to advance comprehensive economic reforms, establish democratic governance, promote a vibrant socialist culture, and improve the economic conditions of the Chinese people. The scope of these reforms is global, emphasizing the need to create a seamless connection between the real and digital economies. The meeting highlighted the importance of the service sector, infrastructure development, and the security and sustainability of industrial and supply chains. These initiatives are seen as vital for China to refine its socialist system and achieve general modernization.

One of the key areas of focus during the session was green growth. The CPC emphasized the need for carbon reduction, pollution control, and improved environmental management systems to achieve a zero-carbon footprint by 2060. This commitment to environmental sustainability is part of a broader effort to ensure that China's modernization is both inclusive and environmentally responsible. By reducing carbon emissions and promoting green growth, China aims to position itself as a global leader in the transition to a green economy.

On the foreign policy front, the session reiterated China's commitment to peaceful development and its dedication to promoting international cooperation through initiatives like the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI). The declaration from the meeting emphasized China's role in advancing global development, security, and civilization. It called for an equitable and orderly multipolar world and a form of economic globalization that benefits all nations. China's modernization, as outlined in this session, is not just about national development but also about contributing to global stability and prosperity.

Chinese modernization is crucial for nation-building and development. With a population of over 1.4 billion—larger than the total population of developed countries—China’s approach to modernization is designed to promote common prosperity. This means meeting the rising expectations of the Chinese people for a better life, while also ensuring equity, justice, and social development. The goal is to balance material and cultural development with harmony between humanity and nature, responding to climate change, and ensuring sustainable development.

China’s commitment to peaceful, high-quality economic and cultural development, coupled with its focus on creating a secure environment and improving governance, offers valuable lessons for other developing nations. China’s approach to modernization provides an alternative model for countries in the Global South, offering insights into achieving sustainable development, shared security, and shared prosperity. The strong political leadership, governance experience, and social cohesion that underpin China’s success can be leveraged by other nations in their own modernization efforts.

The outcomes of the CPC’s third plenary session have significant implications for Pakistan-China relations. As China’s all-weather strategic cooperative partner and a key player in South Asia, Pakistan stands to benefit immensely from China’s modernization initiatives. The Belt and Road Initiative, particularly the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), has already transformed Pakistan’s energy and infrastructure sectors. As the second phase of CPEC begins, bilateral cooperation is expected to expand into areas like agricultural modernization, industrial development, mining, and information technology. This cooperation will further accelerate Pakistan’s socio-economic development.

Moreover, the Global Development Initiative, highlighted during the CPC session, promises to enhance Chinese cooperation in Pakistan’s poverty alleviation efforts, capacity building, and green economy. Both China and Pakistan share a commitment to achieving the United Nations 2030 Sustainable Development Goals. The Global Security Initiative, another focus of the meeting, underscores the need for common, comprehensive, cooperative, and sustainable security. This initiative is particularly relevant to Pakistan, as it seeks to maintain political stability and combat terrorism. China’s continued support in these areas will be crucial for Pakistan’s long-term stability and security.

The meeting also highlighted the importance of advancing cooperation in technology and space research, extending the scope of Pakistan-China relations from land, sea, and air to the frontier of space. The Global Civilization Initiative, which promotes cultural exchange and mutual respect, will also strengthen ties between the two countries. More Pakistani students are expected to study in China, gaining advanced knowledge in agriculture, IT, and AI, further enriching the bilateral relationship.

Conclusively, the third session of the CPC’s 20th Central Committee has laid the foundation for a new era of reform and modernization in China. The comprehensive reforms and initiatives introduced during this meeting will not only shape China’s future but also have far-reaching implications for its partners, particularly Pakistan. The deep historical ties, strategic partnership, and unbreakable brotherhood between China and Pakistan will grow even stronger, yielding more fruitful results in the years to come. The task now is to translate these ambitious plans into action and ensure that the benefits of modernization are realized for both nations.

US Supports Strengthening India-Tibet Relations

04 September 2024, Sri Lanka Guardian, Ashok K Mehta

The recent visit of a bipartisan delegation of U.S. lawmakers to New Delhi and Dharamshala marks a significant moment in U.S. diplomacy in the region.

A Tibet festival began on 3 September at the India International Centre, New Delhi, to celebrate its rich Buddhist heritage, culture, and identity. The Sikyong (head) of the Central Tibetan Administration, Penpa Tshering, will preside over various activities to highlight Tibet’s geo-strategic, spiritual, and cultural importance for India.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama, at 89, is receiving medical treatment in a New York hospital but is reported to be in good health. U.S. Special Coordinator on Tibet, Uzra Jeya, met him, which elicited an “immediate (solemn) protest from China.” Foreign Affairs spokesperson Mao Ning stated, “We don’t allow the Dalai Lama to engage in political activities in the U.S.” Backchannel talks between the Dalai Lama’s envoy and China have been ongoing for an undisclosed period, though Beijing does not confirm them. These talks are driven by the U.S. House Resolution Resolve Tibet Act of July 2024, which calls for the restoration of Tibet’s full autonomy. India needs to add its voice for Tibet’s autonomy, both internally and externally, as part of a broader coalition. India’s recognition of full Chinese sovereignty over Tibet was based on Beijing granting and implementing Tibet’s autonomy. Instead, China has quashed Tibet’s autonomy and trade treaties, opening the door for India to adopt a more nuanced position.

Two issues require the Government of India's prompt attention: the Dalai Lama's succession and the border issue, including the restoration of peace and tranquillity and full disengagement in East Ladakh. The visit of a bipartisan U.S. delegation of lawmakers to Dharamasala and Delhi, received by both the Dalai Lama and Prime Minister Narendra Modi, was significant. China critic Nancy Pelosi made comments about President Xi Jinping that drew Chinese ire. On the ground, the sinicization process of Xijiang (Tibet) began in the mid-1960s. The method of injecting 7.5 million Han Chinese into Tibet, along with neutralizing Tibetan Buddhism by deploying Chinese monks in Tibetan monasteries, was designed to change the heart and soul of Tibet. Militarization and infrastructure construction soon followed, adversely impacting the environment. USD 5.8 billion was spent on the Sichuan-Tibet railway system, which is being extended to borders with India, Nepal, and Bhutan.

A new border law has led to the construction of 628 well-off border villages close to or encroaching into neighboring countries. In 1965, convenience police stations were established as a key security measure: Big Brother is Watching. By 2011, Tibet Autonomous Region advertised for 2,500 police stations, with 458 designated for Lhasa alone. By 2016, this grid-style social management of Tibet had recruited thousands of Han Chinese and some Tibetan policemen.

A Chinese Communist Party (CCP) political secretary has always maintained close surveillance over Tibet, which is governed by the CCP from Beijing. Internal policing has fostered a sense of 'otherness' through the surveillance drive. Reports indicate attempts to recruit Tibetans into the PLA, including some forcible intake.

The day may come when some Nepalese might choose to join the PLA outside of the South West Theatre Command in Tibet. This could result from the ill-conceived Agniveer policy. The Chinese Renaming Campaign has led to what the Forum for Non-Violent Alternatives (FNVA) calls 'Thread of Beads: an analysis of renaming 62 locations in India's Arunachal Pradesh since 2017.' China claims that 90 percent of Zangnan (Arunachal Pradesh) is illegally occupied by India. Assam Chief Minister Himanta Biswa Sarma has suggested renaming 62 locations in Tibet. This is unlikely to provoke a strong reaction from the Chinese. The Chinese renaming drive occurred in four phases: 2017, 2021, 2023, and 2024.

This campaign has been supplemented by encroachments into Nepal and Bhutan, with the construction of Xiakong villages (well-off) in contested areas to bolster their claims. While Nepal and Bhutan are pretending this is not happening, India is building approximately 600 vibrant villages, with funds already released. Numerous encroachments have also occurred in India. The strategic importance of Tibet for India cannot be overstated.

The root of the border problem and the Tibet issue lies in India's failure to understand its significance in time and act. In the Eastern Command, Lt Gen Sir Francis Tucker foresaw in 1946 that India must prevent China from occupying Tibet and be prepared to occupy it. This did not happen, for which we are now paying the price. The priority now is to coordinate with the Dalai Lama to address his succession. The Dalai Lama has been silent on this issue recently but has spoken and written about it in the past.

The Chinese are likely to appoint their own Dalai Lama, as they did with the Panchen Lama (second to Dalai Lama), Gyaltzen Norbu. This must be preempted. The CTA is preparing a new map of Tibet with the help of cartographic experts from Princeton University in the U.S.

The issue of the map and India announcing the contours of its Tibet policy, including the border and full disengagement of the PLA from its intrusions in East Ladakh, must be coordinated with the CTA. A succession policy should also be outlined. With Tibetans migrating to the U.S. and soon becoming the majority of Tibetans residing there, the Tibet issue may diminish, leaving Delhi with reduced leverage against Beijing.

Top French museums have succumbed to China's soft power on Tibet etc?

04 September 2024, Tibetan Review

Some top museums in France have succumbed to China by going along with the latter's propaganda distortion of history and silencing of the cultures of minority groups, including those concerning Tibet, reported decoditien.com, citing a collective of experts. The development has sparked a heated debate about the implications of such actions on historical accuracy and cultural preservation, the report said.

In particular, the Musée du quai Branly and the Musée Guimet, two renowned institutions in France, have come under scrutiny for having complied with Chinese demands to rewrite history and erase the identities of non-Han peoples who have been assimilated or annexed by the PRC. This disturbing trend has raised concerns about the preservation of diverse cultural narratives and the autonomy of historical representation in museum settings, the report said.

Citing one “glaring example”, the report said that “this erasure” of culture can be seen in the Musée du quai Branly, where the term “Tibet” has been replaced with the Chinese designation “autonomous region of Xizang” in the catalogue of Tibetan artifacts.

This alteration reflects the enforcement of a law passed in 2023 by the PRC, which aims to eliminate any mention of Tibet as a distinct entity with its own history and heritage. By succumbing to Chinese pressure, the museum has effectively whitewashed the Tibetan identity and obscured the painful realities of occupation and colonization that have defined its past, the report said.

Likewise, the report continued, the Musée Guimet has opted to use the term “Himalayan world” instead of “Tibet” in its exhibition spaces dedicated to the region.

“This subtle yet significant change echoes the broader narrative dictated by Beijing, which seeks to downplay the unique cultural heritage of Tibetans and subsume it within a homogeneous Chinese identity,” the report said.

The report sees these as a general trend in France in which certain French institutions, including universities hosting Confucius Institutes, have become unwitting conduits for Chinese propaganda and censorship. These institutes, funded by the Chinese government, promote a sanitized version of Chinese history and culture that aligns with the narrative endorsed by Beijing. By collaborating with these entities, museums risk perpetuating a distorted view of history that prioritizes the interests of the PRC over academic integrity and cultural diversity, the report said.

Museums are forced to navigate between appeasing Chinese authorities and preserving the integrity of their collections in a situation where China exerts increasing influence on the global stage, leading to institutions prioritizing the maintaining of diplomatic relations and securing access to Chinese resources over upholding ethical standards and historical accuracy.

The report calls on museums to uphold their role as custodians of knowledge and champions of cultural heritage by resisting external pressures to distort historical narratives and erase marginalized voices. This is imperative for French museums to reaffirm their commitment to intellectual freedom and cultural diversity.

The report also called on stakeholders in the cultural sector to engage in meaningful dialogue and advocacy to ensure that museums remain spaces of education, reflection, and empowerment for all communities.

The report said the recent controversies, to which a collective of researchers had brought attention concerning French museums’ compliance with Chinese demands, highlight the urgent need to safeguard the integrity of historical representation and cultural preservation.

By confronting external pressures and asserting their autonomy, museums can reaffirm their dedication to truth, diversity, and inclusivity in the face of mounting challenges. It is crucial for all stakeholders to stand united in defence of intellectual freedom and cultural integrity, ensuring that museums continue to serve as beacons of knowledge and understanding in an increasingly complex world, the report said.

‘China distorting Tibetan history, destroying architectural buildings’

03 September 2024, Hindustan Times, Dar Ovais

“As part of this policy to eradicate anything Tibetan, the Chinese authorities are distorting Tibetan history, erasing national identity, and forcibly changing the way of life, and destroying architectural buildings, designs and artwork with Tibetan characteristics,” said Penpa Tsering.

Sikyong (president) of Tibetan government-in-exile Penpa Tsering on Monday alleged that the government of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) is implementing hardline policies aimed at eradicating the distinct Tibetan identity in Tibet.

As the exiled Tibetans and Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in Dharamshala celebrated the sixty-fourth anniversary of the Tibetan Democracy Day on Monday, Tsering while reading the statement of Kashag (cabinet) said that the PRC government is forcefully implementing an assimilationist policy called “forging a strong sense of community for the Chinese nation” through a three-pronged process termed as “to facilitate ethnic exchanges, communication and integration”, aimed at eradicating the Tibetan people’s identity through indoctrination programmes and Sinicisation campaigns in the religious, political and social programmes.

An Estonian parliamentary delegation led by MP Juku-Kalle Raid, the Chair of Tibet Support Group in Estonian Parliament, attended the commemoration ceremony at Tsuglagkhang temple in McLeodGanj.

"As part of this policy to eradicate anything Tibetan, the Chinese authorities are distorting Tibetan history, erasing national identity, and forcibly changing the way of life, and destroying architectural buildings, designs and artwork with Tibetan characteristics," said Penpa Tsering

Sikyong said, "Over a million Tibetan children are forced into state-run colonial boarding schools to learn Chinese language and ideology without access to their families. Books related to Tibetan nationality, religion, and histories are being forcibly removed from the libraries of these schools. And pictures and statues of historical figures such as Thonmi Sambhota, who created the Tibetan script and other ancient and modern scholars in the school campuses, are being wiped out. Such alarming reports continue to emerge from Tibet."

The Tibetan parliament-in-exile, in its statement, said, "Regarding our fellow Tibetans living under Chinese occupation, it is evident that they are completely deprived of any democratic political system. Instead, the brutality of the Communist Party of China's hardline policies, under which they continue to suffer as if in a living hell, becomes increasingly evident with each passing day. With the goal of eradicating the Tibetan race and language, the Chinese government has forcibly relocated over one million young Tibetan children to separate boarding schools, where they are subjected to policies designed to Sinicize them."

"Additionally, for many years, China has pursued a policy of Sinicizing Tibetan religion and culture by destroying existing centers dedicated to their practice and preservation. On July 12, 2024, the Chinese government issued a coercive order to immediately shut down the Golog Ragya Gangjong Sherig Norbu Lobling, an academy established in 1994 with all necessary permissions from various Chinese authorities," the Tibetan parliament-in-exile said, adding that this abrupt shutdown has deeply saddened the Tibetan people both in Tibet and in exile, as well as those worldwide who value Tibetan culture.

Bursts of Sympathy, Teetering Commitment: U.S. Policy on Tibet

03 September 2024, ORF, Sujana R. Chinoy

Introduction

Two recent events involving the United States (US) have refocused the spotlight on the issue of Tibetan sovereignty. Even as China urged US President Joe Biden not to sign the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act',[1] a bipartisan US Congressional delegation led by former Speaker Nancy Pelosi visited Dharamsala in June 2024 to meet the Dalai Lama and express solidarity with the Tibetan people.[a],[2] In July, President Biden signed the Act into law.[3]

It would be instructive to examine how this Act differs from earlier legislation in the US on Tibet and its impact on the future of the Tibetan people.

Previous US Legislation

The US first appointed a Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues in 1997.[4] The Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 laid the foundation for renewed activism through further legislative measures to preserve the heritage of the Tibetan people.[5] The Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act of 2018[6] and the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020[7] put further pressure on China, with the latter categorically rejecting any interference by China in the selection of the Dalai Lama.

The Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 focused on the protection of Tibet's distinct historical, religious, cultural, and linguistic identity and sought accountability for human rights violations. Unsurprisingly, the task assigned to the Secretary of State to establish a branch office in Lhasa of the US Consulate General in Chengdu to monitor political, economic, and cultural developments in Tibet remained unrealised, even as the emphasis on Voice of America and Radio Free Asia Tibetan language broadcasts continued.[8] The US also failed to establish contact with the 11th Panchen Lama, Gedun Choekyi Nyima, who was taken from his home in 1995 and has since been replaced by a China-appointed lama, Gyaltzen Norbu.[9] The 2002 Act also upheld the UN General Assembly resolutions of 1959, 1961, and 1965, calling on the People's Republic of China to cease practices that deny the Tibetan people their right to self-determination.

Many of the earlier positions of 2002 were incorporated into the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020 which, under then President Donald Trump, emphasised the need to protect Tibet's unique identity and human rights and called for the establishment of a consulate in Lhasa. The 2020 Act, perhaps reflecting a certain modus vivendi, did not refer to the right to self-determination for the Tibetan people. However, the Act opposed any effort by China to interfere in the matter of reincarnation and succession, including the manifestation of the Dalai Lama in the future.[b] The applicability of the Global Magnitsky Human Rights Accountability Act to Chinese officials who violate human rights in Tibet and the protection of the environment and water resources of the Tibetan Plateau were other notable features of the law.

New Elements in the New Law: Tibet and Self-Determination

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act directly refers to a “dispute” between Tibet and China, implying that they are two distinct geographical and political entities. This is different from the relatively restrained language used in the 2002, 2018, and 2020 Acts. Additionally, the latest legislation focuses on exerting pressure on China to have a meaningful dialogue with the representatives of the Dalai Lama without the usual preconditions imposed by China, such as acceptance by the Dalai Lama that Tibet has always been a part of China. Meanwhile, the Dalai Lama has been ready to reconcile to the fact that Tibet is (today) part of China. He has also declared that he is not seeking independence for Tibet and that he is committed to arriving at a negotiated settlement.[10] The Dalai Lama has not accepted the additional Chinese demand that he declare Tibet as always having been a part of China.[11]

Clause 5 of Section 2 [Findings of US Congress] of the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act states that the “US government has never taken the position that Tibet was a part of China since ancient times.”[12] However, this reaffirmation does nothing to question the US position, shared by the global community, that Tibet is today part of China. The protection of human rights in Tibet and its right to self-determination have been revived in the new Act. It also introduces policy measures to counter efforts by the Chinese government and the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to spread disinformation about Tibet. The Act, like its predecessors, covers not just the Tibet Autonomous Region but also the areas of Greater Tibet, which have long since been carved and merged with neighbouring Chinese provinces such as Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan, and Yunnan.

The Evolution of US Policy

The US displayed scant interest in Tibet’s independence or autonomy in the years leading to the formation of the People’s Republic of China in 1949 and its military takeover of Tibet in 1950. [13] Indeed, in 1908, William Woodville Rockhill, a US diplomat who served in the US embassy in China, described the Dalai Lama as a “vassal prince”. [14] With its Tibet policy outsourced to Great Britain, the US was inclined to reflect British positions in the early 1940s. However, the US, unlike Britain, could not distinguish between the implications of the term “sovereignty” as against “suzerainty”.

Chinese suzerainty over Tibet was crafted by the British in the late 19th and early 20th centuries to ascribe conditional legitimacy to its nebulous claims over the Outer Tibet provinces of western Kham and Ü-Tsang and to encourage China to not limit itself to the Inner Tibet provinces of Amdo and eastern Kham. This was part of the Great Game, which aimed to prevent Imperial Russia from making inroads into High Tartary.[15] The British were loath to stretch themselves and contented themselves with the fig leaf of Chinese claims. At the same time, in the context of the Simla Convention of 1914 between Great Britain, China, and Tibet, the British, while recognising Chinese suzerainty over Tibet, recognised the autonomy of Outer Tibet. Article 2 of the Convention also committed Great Britain and China to abstain from interference in the administration of Outer Tibet (including the selection and installation of the Dalai Lama), which was to remain with the Tibetan government at Lhasa.[16]

For a brief period during the Second World War, US President Franklin Roosevelt also directly reached out to the Dalai Lama’s administration in Lhasa to gain access to Tibet’s territory to aid the war effort, [17] although this was episodic. In the 1940s, the Communists gained ground in the civil war and became increasingly determined to consolidate territory across Tibet. Chinese officials and soldiers had left Tibet after the collapse of the Qing dynasty; between 1912 and 1950, China had no presence in Outer Tibet, though the Kuomintang government had attempted to re-establish presence following the death of the 13th Dalai Lama by dispatching a “condolence mission” to Lhasa, headed by General Huang Musong.

As China’s ally during the Second World War, the US supported Chiang Kai-shek’s position.[c],[d] This support led to cautious US policy towards Tibet leading up to 1949. The Chinese Nationalist government had claimed “suzerainty” over Tibet, whereas the Chinese constitution identified Tibet as an integral part of the Republic of China.[18]

It is no surprise then that the US was circumspect in dealing with the Tibetan government in Lhasa.[e] This was when the Dalai Lama, the Regent, and the Kashag had written to the president of the US expressing a desire to establish good relations between the two governments. There was a proposal to send a Tibetan Trade Mission to India, China, the United Kingdom (UK), and the US later in 1947; [19] the mission, led by the Tsepon Shakabpa, a Tibetan nobleman, eventually travelled in 1948, [20] on passports issued by the Tibetan government in Lhasa.[21] Tsepon Shakabpa’s Tibetan passport bears the immigration stamps of India, US, UK, France, Italy, Switzerland, Iraq, Pakistan, and Hong Kong but not China, though the trade mission did visit Shanghai, Nanjing, and Hangzhou as part of its itinerary.[22] This may indicate the Republic of China’s unwillingness to countenance any suggestion of independence although Tibet enjoyed independent status at the time.

The policy circumspection of the US is also evident in a 1 August 1947 letter to the Secretary of State, in which the US envoy in Delhi took the position that "in view of the Department [of State]'s desire to avoid any action which may reflect on the Chinese claim to sovereignty over Tibet, the Embassy has addressed its reply to the letter from the "Foreign Office" [of the Tibetan Government] to the "Foreign Bureau". [23] The distinction made by the US was perhaps that "Foreign Office" was the equivalent of the foreign ministry of a sovereign state, whereas the "Foreign Bureau" in China denoted the provincial foreign affairs bureau of the central government. The wording indicated the US's unwillingness to dilute its recognition of China's claimed sovereignty over Tibet; additionally, the US did not hesitate to reject any suggestion by the Tibetan government's "Foreign Office" that it represented the equivalent of an independent state's foreign ministry.

As outlined by then Assistant Secretary of State James Graham Parsons to the Secretary of State in a memo dated 14 October 1959, US policy towards Tibet began to evolve in the 1950s, following the takeover by the Communists.[24] Amid growing tensions, including in the Taiwan Strait, the US adopted the approach that the Tibetans had the same "inherent right" to self-determination as any other people. It further acknowledged that, if developments warranted, the recognition of Tibet as an independent state should be considered. However, the US did not move to formulate a definitive legal position on Tibet at the time. According to Parsons, the US considered it adequate "for present purposes" to state that it recognised "the de facto autonomy that Tibet has exercised since the fall of the Manchu Dynasty, and particularly since the Simla Conference (of 1914)."[25]

Reflecting on US policy since 1950, Parsons stated that the US acknowledged that "arguments against recognition of Tibetan independence under the conditions prevailing in 1959 were stronger than those in favour." [26] Evidently, Chiang Kai-shek, by then restricted to running the Republic of China from Taiwan, continued to influence and moderate the US's position.

Then Acting Secretary of State C. Douglas Dillon's Memorandum No. 381 of 16 June 1959 to President Eisenhower mentioned the Dalai Lama's letter of appeal to the US President and the Secretary of State, in which he insisted that Tibet "be granted full independence as a prerequisite for Communist China's entry into the United Nations." [27] This came immediately after the Dalai Lama had fled to India in March 1959 and when he was seeking full independence for Tibet on the plea that earlier efforts to secure genuine autonomy within the People's Republic of China had failed. On crossing into India, he had repudiated the 17-Point Agreement.[28] The US had assessed that then Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru was "strongly opposed to any independence for Tibet, favouring rather the Dalai Lama's publicly committing himself to working for the reestablishment of Tibetan autonomy." [29] Today, it is a matter of conjecture how much of the lack of enthusiasm for Tibet's independence, including in the US, had its roots in India's policy at the time.[f]

Memorandum No. 383 dated 5 August 1959 from the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Parsons) and the Acting Assistant Secretary for International Organization Affairs (Walter Walmsley) to Secretary of State Christian Herter on Developments with Respect to United Nations Action on Tibetan Issue highlights interesting details. [30] After his flight to India in March 1959, the Dalai Lama had reached out to the US government to seek support for his intention to take the Tibet issue to the UN General Assembly and possibly make a public appeal for UN action. The Dalai Lama "had also asked the US government whether [it] would be willing to propose to some other government, preferably in Asia, that it extend recognition to his government-in-exile." [31]

The US embassy in Delhi was clear in its assessment that, "while the GOI would consider that raising the Tibetan issue in the United Nations would serve no useful purpose, it would concede that the Dalai Lama has the right to appeal and to be heard if the United Nations wishes." [32] The Embassy's assessment was that "an appeal by the Dalai Lama and his appearance at the United Nations would probably not jeopardize his return to India so long as he avoided insisting on the concept of Tibetan independence." [33] Additionally, the US was keen on his return to India.

Chiang Kai-shek's Government of the Republic of China (GRC) was at that time not only a UN Member State but also a permanent member of the UN Security Council. In the US embassy's assessment, the Republic of China "would not itself raise the Tibetan issue at the General Assembly but would strongly support any other country which might bring up the problem...The GRC delegation would participate in any UN debate that might take place, castigating Chinese Communist actions in Tibet and reiterating President Chiang's statement of March 26, 1959 promising the Tibetan people the right of self-determination following the overthrow" of the communist regime in Beijing.[34]

On 20 February 1960, then Secretary of State Herter stated, "It is the belief of the U.S. Government that this principle [of self-determination] should apply to the people of Tibet and that they should have their voice in their own political destiny." [35] According to Guangqiu Xu, "on January 17, 1962, in a letter to the Dalai Lama, Secretary of State Dean Rusk repeated the U.S. position that the principle of self-determination should apply to the people of Tibet." [36] Guangqiu Xu further stated that "successive U.S. administrations of that period strongly condemned Chinese human rights practices and supported all three U.N. General Assembly resolutions [of 1959, 1961, and 1965] that urged China to withdraw from Tibet." [37]

It is clear that the US played safe and paid no heed to Tibet's pleas to the United Nations for assistance. Both the US and the UK wanted India to take the lead, which did not materialise. It was El Salvador that moved a resolution in the UN General Assembly when the Chinese PLA rolled into Tibet in 1950, [38] but the debate proved inconclusive and was postponed due to the uncertainty among the big powers. The question of Tibet was raised again in a resolution in the UN General Assembly in 1959, when the unrest in Tibet led to the Dalai Lama's flight to India. Yet again, smaller powers—Ireland and Malaya—pushed for a resolution on the "Question of Tibet". [39]

Between 1959 and 1964, three reports of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) gave a boost to the Tibet issue, with prima facie evidence of violation of human rights and attempts by China to destroy the Tibetan nation and the Buddhist religion.

The history of US support [g] to the Khampa guerrilla outfit Chushi Gangdruk (four rivers, six ranges that define the Kham region) that was fighting the Chinese PLA is well-documented. [40] The low-intensity covert operations carried out by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) in the 1950s involved training the Tibetan resistance units in Colorado as well as the "Mustang Army" of rebels operating from Nepal's border region with Tibet. US assistance had begun to ebb around the time that the PRC established the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) in 1965 and conclusively ended in the aftermath of the Sino-US rapprochement in 1971. After that, Tibet was relegated in US foreign policy, with all remaining support for the Tibetan guerrillas coming to a halt. [41] Even the latest Tibet-China Dispute Act acknowledges that it "does not change longstanding bipartisan United States policy to recognize the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan areas of China as part of the People's Republic of China." [42] In the wake of the Sino-US rapprochement, then President Richard Nixon and his successors eased up on the issue of Tibet; it is well known that President Jimmy Carter was reluctant to meet the Dalai Lama. [43] The finality of this expedient position was clear from Secretary of State James Baker's statement of 5 February 1992, during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing, that "U.S. policy accepts the Chinese position that Tibet is part of China." [44] That position has endured till the present day.

US policy remains key to the future of Tibet. However, the history of US policy on Tibet suggests inconsistencies in commitment, interspersed with occasional bursts of sympathy and activism. Cautious references to self-determination in the 1950s and a focus on human rights violations in the 1960s segued into the appeasement of Beijing for larger trade, economic, and strategic interests against common concerns vis-à-vis the Soviet Union.

Post-Tiananmen

The unrest in Tibet during 1987-1989 coincided with the Tiananmen protests and the military crackdown of June 1989. When Bill Clinton assumed office as US president in 1992, his country's focus was on human rights violations, trade friction, proliferation concerns, and tensions across the Taiwan Strait. Clinton received the Dalai Lama four times, in 1993, 1997, 1998, [45] and 2000. [h], [46] Then Vice President Al Gore and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright were present at the 1997 and 1998 meetings; similarly, at the 1993 meeting, Gore and Secretary of State Warren Christopher were present, along with Speaker Thomas Foley. This also set the stage for future meetings of the Dalai Lama with US Presidents George W. Bush in 2001 and 2003, [47] and Barack Obama in 2010. [48]

The unipolar decade presided over by Clinton gave the US a chance to push harder for a fair deal for Tibet, but this period also coincided with the Clinton administration gradually de-linking human rights issues from the question of granting China Most Favoured Nation (MFN) status. This clearly suggested that human rights violations in Tibet were being relegated to the back-burner.

Before creating the Office of the Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues in 1997, a Bill to establish the position of United States Special Envoy for Tibet had been introduced in the 103rd Congress. A provision to create the position was also introduced as part of the foreign relations authorisations bills in the 104th and 105th Congress sessions. [49] The proposed legislation had called for the Special Envoy to be accorded the rank of ambassador to ensure that an important issue in bilateral relations with China maintained centrality in senior-level policy discourse. [50] The Clinton administration finally settled for a compromise when Secretary of State Albright designated the Director of Policy Planning in the Department of State, Gregory Craig, as the Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues. [51]

China-Dalai Lama Talks and the US

US support for direct talks between the Dalai Lama's representatives and the Chinese government has long been a key feature of US policy. Direct talks had shown some promise under Deng Xiaoping.

[i] Thereafter, fact-finding missions were mounted by the Dalai Lama's representatives, without any outcome. The Dalai Lama's address to the European Parliament in 1988 brought his "Strasbourg Proposal" for a negotiated settlement into salience but the Chinese backed off soon thereafter. Between 2002 and 2010, nine rounds of talks were held between the Tibetans and the Chinese, all in China except for one round in Berne in Switzerland in 2005.[52] The talks were inconclusive. In his statement at the 50th anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising Day, the Dalai Lama stated, "The Chinese insistence that we accept Tibet as having been a part of China since ancient times is not only inaccurate, but also unreasonable. We cannot change the past no matter whether it was good or bad. Distorting history for political purposes is incorrect." He added, "We Tibetans are looking for a legitimate and meaningful autonomy, an arrangement that would enable Tibetans to live within the framework of the People's Republic of China." [53] There has been no direct dialogue since 2010, although the Dalai Lama's representatives have acknowledged the existence of informal channels of communication.[54]

President Clinton had pressed Chinese President Jiang Zemin in 1997-1998 to open a dialogue with the Dalai Lama. President Bush also urged the Chinese government to engage in substantive dialogue with the Dalai Lama or his representatives, stating that the Dalai Lama's call for "genuine autonomy was sincere", [55] and to respect the unique cultural, linguistic, and religious heritage of the Tibetan people. Bush expressed his support in his meeting with the Dalai Lama in 2003 and also raised the Tibet issue with Chinese President Jiang Zemin during his two visits to China in 2001, besides raising it with visiting Vice President Hu Jintao in 2002 and Premier Wen Jiabao in 2003.[56]

In 2011, Obama met the Dalai Lama in the White House. According to the White House statement issued on the occasion, "The President commended the Dalai Lama's commitment to nonviolence and dialogue with China and his pursuit of the 'Middle Way' approach." The statement also mentioned that President Obama "stressed that he encourages direct dialogue to resolve long-standing differences and that a dialogue that produces results would be positive for China and Tibetans." [57]

Conclusion

The renewed reference in the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act to the right of the Tibetan people to self-determination in the current context could prove to be more sensitive than it first appears. Notably, no country in the world has recognised Tibet as an independent state.

The US has not taken concrete steps to promote self-determination for Tibet in multilateral forums. While being a permanent member of the UN Security Council accords the US a position to trigger discussions on the issues covered by the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, it has refrained from doing so. Moreover, even as the US has held consultations with its allies on the situation in the Taiwan Strait, it does not appear to have given the same priority to the Tibet issue. A key mandate of the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues is to engage Tibetans. Naturally, such a remit involves the sizeable number of Tibetan refugees in India, which could create friction between India and China. Additionally, India has long rejected UN resolutions that call for self-determination; [i] its position on self-determination for the Tibetan people is unlikely to be different.

Today, China treats US legislation and sanctions with growing disdain.[58] China has absorbed Tibet and consolidated its integration through demographic changes as well as cultural and educational resets, backed by indoctrination, surveillance, and punitive measures. Enhanced rail, road, and air connectivity has further consolidated Beijing's hold on Tibet. The Dalai Lama has stated that he does not seek independence for Tibet, only genuine autonomy. [59] Though there is sympathy for the Tibetan people, few concrete steps have been taken that can result in meaningful change. There is scant international appetite or scope for Tibet realising self-determination, the US legislation notwithstanding.

With the forthcoming US elections, it would be instructive to recall that, after Sarah Sewall's term as Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights and concurrent term as the Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues ended on 20 January 2017,[60] the Trump administration had kept the post vacant for three years and seven months, until Assistant Secretary Robert A. Destro of the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor was appointed in October 2020.[61] Given the flux in the US political landscape, there is little guarantee that the current US line will be maintained, especially if Trump returns to office.

China's Preference as the next US President: Kamala Harris?

03 September 2024, ORF, Atul Kumar

At a time when China urgently needs a stable economic environment, Trump's return to power would be akin to a bull in a china shop

In her 41-minute acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention on 22 August 2024, Vice President Kamala Harris mentioned

China only once, in a passing comment, and entirely avoided topics like Taiwan, Tibet, the South China Sea, and the Uyghurs. This omission was deliberate. Harris's future political agenda focuses primarily on the economy, a theme she emphasised three times during her speech. Her predominant focus on domestic issues aligns with China's preference for the next United States (US) President.

Chinese President Xi Jinping and his associates in Beijing prefer Harris over the temperamental and unpredictable Republican nominee, former President Donald Trump. Harris's inward focus and tendency to prioritise social values may present China with a rare post-COVID-19 opportunity to recalibrate its US policies and revive cooperative engagement with the US, which is crucial for China's continued economic growth. This article examines Chinese concerns regarding Trump and explores their reasons for favouring Harris in the current political landscape.

Harris's inward focus and tendency to prioritise social values may present China with a rare post-COVID-19 opportunity to recalibrate its US policies and revive cooperative engagement with the US, which is crucial for China's continued economic growth.

China's apprehension of Trump

The Trump administration from 2017 to 2021 likely marked one of the most challenging periods in US-China relations since their rapprochement in 1971. Characterised by uncertainty, unpredictability, and hostility towards China, Trump rapidly strove to dismantle the foundations of the US-China economic relationship. Even before assuming office, he sparked tensions by directly interacting with Taiwanese President Tsai Ing-wen and rejecting adherence to the 'One China Policy'. His subsequent decisions led bilateral relations into uncharted territory.

Trump halted negotiations for a Bilateral Investment Treaty, forcefully condemned Chinese actions in the South China Sea and against Japan, imposed substantial tariffs on Chinese steel and aluminium imports, and resolutely pursued policies against China's large trade imbalance with the US. He also targeted China's non-tariff barriers against American exports, and the pressure on US companies to transfer technologies to their Chinese partners in joint ventures.

Moreover, Trump renamed the US Pacific Command to the Indo-Pacific Command, heightening China's apprehension and refocusing American strategic priorities on China. Additionally, he condemned China's economic espionage, repeatedly emphasised its central role in the spread of COVID-19, at times referring to it as the 'China Virus' and frequently sanctioned Chinese companies, particularly by restricting Huawei's access to semiconductor chips and promoting technological decoupling. The Trump administration and its officials viewed China as an adversary, dismissing any illusions of cooperative engagement.

Trump renamed the US Pacific Command to the Indo-Pacific Command, heightening China's apprehension and refocusing American strategic priorities on China.

This approach nearly derailed China's economic and diplomatic trajectory. Therefore, even after Trump left office, China imposed sanctions on former senior officials, including Mike Pompeo, Alex Azar, Kelly Craft, and 25 others, for their roles in severely damaging China-US relations. China continues to feel the impact of the Trump administration's actions.

China and the Democratic Party since 2021

Since 2021, the Biden administration has maintained a firm stance on China, continuing several of Trump's policy measures. It has kept pressure on Chinese officials regarding trade imbalances, economic espionage, technological decoupling, and regional security. Additionally, the Biden administration has elevated the importance of issues like Tibet, Taiwan, and other contentious matters, while providing stronger support and attention to US allies in their stance against China. However, the current US economic policy is less hostile, offering a significant respite for President Xi. This has allowed him to focus more on consolidating his domestic political power and shifting the blame for economic challenges, such as rising unemployment and slowing manufacturing, onto his junior politicians and finance officials. This reprieve is further reinforced by Biden's recent efforts to engage with China through high-level visits and backchannel diplomacy. Herein lies China's opportunity and inclination.

Kamala Harris's emphasis on issues such as the cost of living, housing, reproductive rights, border control, and a focus on the economy is more favourable for China. China anticipates that officials currently causing friction, like Anthony Blinken and Jake Sullivan, might not continue in a Harris administration, hoping instead for milder representatives who prioritise US-China economic relations. Harris's running mate's positive history with China further enhances Xi's hope for renewed cooperative engagement.

China cannot predict the trajectory of US policies under Trump and is concerned that his future team could include notably anti-China policymakers like Matt Galagher and Robert Lighthizer.

In contrast, Trump, in any capacity, poses a significant threat to China's regional and international political and economic ambitions. China cannot predict the trajectory of US policies under Trump and is concerned that his future team could include notably anti-China policymakers like Matt Galagher and Robert Lighthizer. These officials would increase China's difficulty at a time of economic crisis. Already, Trump has threatened to impose a 60 per cent tariff on Chinese goods if he comes to power.

The Democratic Party's utility

In the upcoming US elections, a Democratic victory would keep the administration's focus on the crises in Ukraine and the Gaza Strip. Democratic politicians are deeply involved in the Russia-Ukraine war and are grappling with the unpredictable and opportunistic Israeli Prime Minister, Benjamin Netanyahu. Netanyahu's strategy of perpetuating conflict with Hamas to maintain his hold on power puts Democrats in a difficult position, particularly with their domestic left-liberal base, which remains hostile to any perceived American support for Israel. Even during Harris's acceptance speech, a significant pro-Palestinian group protested against her balanced approach.

With the majority of Democrats preoccupied with these two critical crises, they would have little capacity to concentrate on China and East Asia. The current US-China quiet diplomacy is influenced by these complexities, as the US shows little willingness to confront a crisis in East Asia. However, Trump has already announced his intention to withdraw from the Russia-Ukraine war and avoid entanglement in the Israel-Palestine conflict, which makes China apprehensive.

The current US-China quiet diplomacy is influenced by these complexities, as the US shows little willingness to confront a crisis in East Asia.

The second issue concerns China's approach to international organisations and multilateral institutions. Over the past few decades, China has invested significant effort in engaging with various UN agencies, seeking to gain influence and leadership positions. China views these agencies as vital to becoming an international superpower. As a result, it has increased its influence wherever possible and, where it has faced resistance, established alternative multilateral organisations, such as new financial institutions to compete with the Bretton Woods system.

A potential Trump presidency threatens to undermine much of China's progress in these multilateral efforts. Trump's disdain for the UN-led political structure, the World Trade Organization (WTO), and its various agreements and financial frameworks jeopardises China's efforts over the past decades. At a time when China urgently needs a stable economic environment, Trump's return to power would be akin to a bull in a china shop.

For China's national rejuvenation and financial dominance, Beijing prefers a controlled and gradual decline of the US. A disorderly decline, potentially caused by Trump's isolationist policies, would harm the Chinese economy. Additionally, US isolation could destabilise the international security environment, which China has leveraged for trade and economic gains. A chaotic world poses risks to China's business interests, and its struggling economy cannot afford such instability.

An isolationist US military stance could drive East Asian countries, such as Japan and South Korea, to develop nuclear capabilities, which would pose long-term security threats to China.

Additionally, there are potential risks for China regarding regional security. Trump is harsh on adversaries but brutal with allies, particularly those who underspend on defence and intend to free ride on US military presence. An isolationist US military stance could drive East Asian countries, such as Japan and South Korea, to develop nuclear capabilities, which would pose long-term security threats to China. A potential coalition among these nations to deter China would be far more challenging to manage.

Therefore, Harris's victory is necessary for China to recalibrate its policies with the US administration and re-embark on economic growth and dominance. As expected, China prefers the Democrats in the coming elections and remains apprehensive of Trump's return.

India's special China problem

03 September 2024, The Pioneer

S Jaishankar has highlighted India's 'Special China problem,' one that is deeply rooted in the unresolved border disputes

India-China relations have long been fraught with challenges, but recent remarks by India's External Affairs Minister (EAM) S Jaishankar have brought the depth of these issues into sharper focus. Jaishankar has said that India has a "special China problem," which he emphasized is distinct from the more general concerns that the rest of the world, including Europe and the United States, has with China. Jaishankar's comments come at a time when countries globally are grappling with what he termed the "general China problem." This problem, characterised by economic and national security debates, is not unique to India. Across Europe and the United States, policymakers are increasingly preoccupied with China's growing influence and the challenges it poses. From trade imbalances to concerns about Chinese technology in critical infrastructure, these issues have sparked widespread scrutiny of China's global role. However, India's situation is further complicated by its unique geopolitical and economic circumstances. India shares a long and contested border with China, which has been the site of several military standoffs over the years, the most recent and severe of which began in May 2020 in eastern Ladakh.

India's "special China problem" goes beyond the broader concerns of the international community. It is rooted in the unresolved border dispute between the two nations, which has led to a prolonged military standoff along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh. The ongoing border tensions have necessitated the deployment of approximately 50,000-60,000 troops by both sides, creating a volatile situation that has yet to see a lasting resolution. Diplomatic efforts to resolve these issues continue, with the 31st meeting of the Working Mechanism for Consultation & Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) taking place on August 29 in Beijing. However what is interesting is that despite tensions and border skirmishes India China trade has flourished and many importer in India make regular rounds to source stuff from China to sell in the Indian market. But Jaishankar's remark could mean a shift in the official policy vis a vis China. If Govt changes its policy, Chinese goods and investments may have to face more barriers dissuading the Chinese investors. Jaishankar also highlighted the economic dimensions of India's relationship with China, pointing out that the trade deficit and the nature of Chinese investments are areas of significant concern. Indeed security is non negotiable and must be implemented in letter and spirit. But at the same time the commerce should not be thought of as an impediment. If one thing that can improve the relations between two countries, it is trade. However, India could restrict Chinese investment in security-sensitive areas such as telecommunications and digital cyber space.

Tibet, the Dalai Lama and the Power Struggle with China

02 September 2024, Daily Watch

The 14th Dalai Lama is 89 years old. The question of who will succeed him has sparked a power struggle between India and China.

Beijing wants to be solely in charge of choosing the next Tibetan spiritual leader. In its eyes, Tibet belongs to China.

The Dalai Lama has been living in exile in India since 1959. The older he gets, the more important the question of his succession becomes – not only for the future of Tibet, but also for global geopolitics. India, the United States and the European Union support Tibet, which has demanded autonomy since its annexation by China in 1950. China, meanwhile, does not recognize the Dalai Lama's government in exile.

Beijing is now determined to take sole responsibility for appointing the next Dalai Lama, raising fears that the debate could have serious political consequences. Tensions between China and India have been exacerbated by a conflict over a disputed border, which has been smoldering since 1962.

When Mao Tse-tung's People's Liberation Army invaded Tibet, India lost the Buddhist neighbor that lay between it and Communist China. With the Tibetan people forced to assimilate, India granted asylum to the 14th Dalai Lama and numerous other refugees, much to Mao Tse-tung's displeasure. Since then, conflict has simmered, especially in the disputed Himalayan border region.

By taking power in Tibet, China was also able to secure valuable mineral resources such as chromium, copper, borax, uranium and lithium. It also gained control over the sources of Asia's largest rivers – something India sees as a threat to its supplies of fresh water.

Tibetans themselves are caught in a standoff between the two most populous nations in the world, which are also major economic powers. It is not easy for them to make their voices heard, despite the best efforts of their spiritual leader.

China's Crackdown on Tibetan Voices of Freedom: The Silencing of a Culture on Social Media

02 September 2024, The Earth News

The situation in Tibet is complicated and has been a source of concern for many years. The People's Republic of China has been accused of suppressing Tibetan voices calling for more autonomy and human rights in the region. The Chinese government's actions in Tibet have been criticized for infringing fundamental human rights such as freedom of expression, assembly, and religion. Many Tibetans have been detained, imprisoned, or forced to flee their homes in search of safety.

China has increased its crackdown on the use of the Tibetan language, particularly on social media platforms such as Douyin, China's version of TikTok, in a concerted effort to undermine Tibetan cultural identity and pro-freedom voices. This move is part of a broader strategy to assimilate Tibetans into the dominant Han Chinese culture, eroding their unique linguistic and cultural heritage.

The Tibetan language prohibition on platforms such as Douyin is more than just censorship; it is a purposeful attempt to reduce Tibetan culture's visibility and influence in the digital age. By prohibiting the use of Tibetan in internet areas, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) attempts to muzzle criticism and squelch any expression of Tibetan identity that threatens its narrative. For many Tibetans, social media had become an essential instrument for keeping cultural links, sharing traditions, and expressing their desire for freedom. The crackdown has made these practices more dangerous.

China's crackdown on Tibetan voices advocating for freedom has escalated, with authorities employing extensive repressive tactics to suppress dissent. Tibetan activists, religious leaders, and ordinary citizens are under constant monitoring, with advanced technologies used to track and control their movements, communications, and activities.

The Chinese government's intensified crackdown aims to erase Tibetan cultural identity and suppress any aspirations for independence. Harsh penalties are imposed on those expressing pro-Tibetan sentiments, reflecting a broader effort to control and assimilate the region. This suppression showcasing the ongoing struggle for Tibetans to preserve their cultural and national identity.

This tyranny goes beyond mere linguistic limits. Tibetan activists, writers, and even regular residents who utilize their own language online or espouse Tibetan liberation face harsh consequences such as surveillance, harassment, and jail. The CCP's measures are part of a larger attempt to silence Tibetan voices and remove Tibet's unique cultural identity from public consciousness.

The world community cannot turn a blind eye to this digital persecution. Global human rights organizations, governments, and technology businesses must put pressure on China to respect Tibetans' linguistic and cultural rights. The censoring of Tibetan voices on social media is a grave injustice that highlights Tibet's ongoing struggle for cultural survival and freedom—a struggle that requires immediate international attention and support.

How China's internet police went from targeting bloggers to their followers

02 September 2024, The Guardian, Amy Hawkins

In recent months, followers of influential liberal bloggers have been interviewed by police as China widens its net of online surveillance.

Late last year, Duan*, a university student in China, used a virtual private network to jump over China's great firewall of internet censorship and download social media platform Discord.

Overnight he entered a community in which thousands of members with diverse views debated political ideas and staged mock elections. People could join the chat to discuss ideas such as democracy, anarchism and communism. "After all, it's hard for us to do politics in reality, so we have to do it in a group chat," Yang Minghao, a popular vlogger, said in a video on YouTube.

Duan's interest in the community was piqued while watching one of Yang's videos online. Yang, who vlogs under the nickname MHYYYY, was talking about the chat on Discord, which like YouTube is blocked in China, and said that he "would like to see where this group will go, as far as possible without intervention".

The answer to Yang's question came after less than a year. In July, Duan and several other members of the Discord group, in cities thousands of miles apart, were called in for questioning by the police.

Duan says that he was detained for 24 hours and interrogated about his relationship to Yang, his use of a VPN and comments that he'd made on Discord. He was released without charge after 24 hours, but he – and other followers of Yang – remain concerned about the welfare of the vlogger, who hasn't posted online since late July.

The incident is just one sign of the growing severity of China's censorship regime, under which even private followers of unfavourable accounts can get into trouble.

"I don't think I've seen followers of influencers being questioned to this extent in the past," said Maya Wang, the associate China director at Human Rights Watch.

China's ministry of public security and the local public security bureau handling Duan's case could not be reached for comment, but both he and his fellow online idealists fell foul of one of the foundational principles of China's internet: don't form a community, especially not one related to politics, even in private.

Being punished for comments made online is common in China, where the internet is tightly regulated. As well as a digital firewall that blocks the majority of internet users from accessing foreign websites like Google, Facebook and WhatsApp, people who publish content on topics deemed sensitive or critical of the government often find themselves banned from websites, or worse.

Last year, a man called Ning Bin was sentenced to more than two years in prison for posting "inappropriate remarks" and "false information" on X and Pincong, a Chinese-language forum.

Even ardent nationalists are not immune. In recent weeks, the influential, pro-government commentator, Hu Xijin, appears to have been banned from social media after making comments about China's political trajectory that didn't align with Beijing's view.

Duan said that the call from the police was not entirely unexpected. Still, he says, the intensity of the interrogation caught him by surprise. "Just complaining in a group chat on overseas software is not allowed".

The net of online surveillance widens

In February, Li Ying, who runs a popular Chinese-language X account, posted an “urgent notice” saying that his followers in China were being called in to “drink tea” with the police, a euphemism for interrogations. He urged people to unfollow him and take care to make sure that their X accounts didn’t reveal their personal information.

Li, who is based in Italy, runs an account called “Teacher Li is not your teacher”, which posts a stream of unfiltered news about protests and repression in China, the likes of which would never be published in China’s domestic media.

“The police began to call all users who had registered with Chinese mobile phone numbers and asked them to unfollow me,” Li said. People living overseas had their relatives in China contacted by the police, Li said. They were put pressure on to persuade the person overseas to unfollow Li’s account.

Two other popular Chinese bloggers, including Wang Zhi’an, a Chinese journalist based in Japan, also said that their followers were questioned by police this year.

“Part of this has to do with deepening repression – police have gone from harassing activists and people ‘out there’ active in physical spaces to harassing those online because much of activism and dissent is now more deeply hidden,” says Wang.

In December, Li Tong, an official at the ministry of public security’s cybersecurity bureau said that the government had designated 2024 as “the year of a special campaign to combat and rectify online rumours”. Local authorities have taken on this mantle with gusto: in July, Guangdong province said that it had dealt with more than 1,000 cases of “online rumours” and “online trolls” this year.

William Farris, a lawyer who studies state prosecutions of speech in China, said that internet cleaning campaigns are “an annual, or semi-annual, tradition”. Similar campaigns have been announced every year dating back to at least 2013. He noted that in several judgements against people who had been punished for their online activity, the authorities also paid attention to who the people followed. In 2019, a man called Jiang Kun was sentenced to eight months in jail for posts on X, with the court noting that “he followed certain anti-Chinese forces” on the platform.

Still, Wang said that the ongoing cat and mouse game between the authorities and those who think differently from them indicated “an emerging set of shared values that cut across China’s borders. Despite the fact that the authorities have always sought to stamp out these ‘universal values’, they have nonetheless persisted among significant portions of people in and from China.”

The Discord crackdown has been widely discussed online, in forums blocked by China’s firewall. On Reddit, one user wrote: “I sincerely hope that all those who have lost contact can return to life safely. We will meet again, in a place where there is no darkness!”

High time the Chinese leadership resolved the longstanding Sino-Tibet conflict: Tenzin Lekshay

01 September 2024, The Telegraph

‘Under the benevolent leadership of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Tibetans at large, particularly the Central Tibetan Administration, are consistently pursuing the Middle Way Policy to resolve the longstanding Sino-Tibet conflict through meaningful dialogue, whereby both Tibetans and the Chinese will be mutually benefitted’

Q What is the idea of home for the exiled Tibetan community?

Tibetans in exile are living in different homes away from home. Though many Tibetans in exile have not seen or lived in Tibet, we still believe that Tibet is our home where our heart belongs.

Q Usually, a duality complicates the emigrant experience of home. There is the original home and the home – in this case, India – that the new generation is born into. How do young Tibetans confront this dichotomy?

Like any other refugee community, we faced many challenges. Due to the visionary leadership of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the older generations, and with the continued support of and assistance from the Indian government and the people, we have been able to build a home away from home where we remain as the voice for the voiceless Tibetans in Tibet.

Q Do Tibet’s spiritual/textual traditions assist in easing the anxiety of rootlessness?

Certainly. Tibetan Buddhist culture helps us cope with statelessness as it teaches the nature of interdependency and impermanence. It also instills hope not just within yourself but in your counterpart as well through compassion and positive changes.

Q Being homeless can also be a liberating experience since it widens horizons and dissolves borders. His Holiness, for instance, is a truly global citizen. How does the exiled Tibetan community view the tension and the ties between the Home and the World?

We can call it a blessing in disguise as it allows us to explore and understand the world and contribute to world peace. However, Tibetans inside Tibet are living a life in hell under the Chinese communist regime. Tibetan culture has been assimilated and Tibet economically marginalised and ecologically destroyed. Yet, the Sino-Tibet conflict remains unresolved. It is high time the Chinese leadership resolves this longstanding conflict through dialogue.

Q His Holiness has often spoken of changing the way of seeing or of looking at a problem from multiple dimensions to resolve conflict. Is multiplicity then the key to world peace?

Under the benevolent leadership of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Tibetans at large, particularly the Central Tibetan Administration, are consistently pursuing the Middle Way Policy to resolve the longstanding Sino-Tibet conflict through meaningful dialogue, whereby both Tibetans and the Chinese will be mutually benefitted. The whole concept of the Middle Way Policy is based on trust, friendship and reconciliation for the sake of the entire humanity.

Q Not just politics, religion too seems to be narrowing given its insistence on homogeneity – Hindutva in India, militant Islam in Africa and Asia or aggressive Buddhism in Sri Lanka are examples. Why is this happening?

It is crucial to recognise that diversity is a reality and consider the different histories, cultures, geographies, livelihoods and faiths, among other factors. Therefore, insisting on homogeneity contradicts the essence of being human. China's efforts to homogenise all nationalities in China are destined to fail.

Q Another major crisis for all our homes is climate change. Why is the global leadership not doing enough? How can Buddhism help?

Climate change is the real thing that everybody is facing. It is a universal challenge. Global leadership may amplify the need for sustainable development and ecology, but very little is being done on the ground. Look at China, the frontrunner for the global environmental leadership. Every year, about two million people die of air pollution. Eighty one per cent of China's coastal regions are heavily polluted with plastic debris. The craze for natural resources (minerals and water) drives China to heavily exploit Tibet. In 1987, in his Five Point Peace Plan for Tibet, His Holiness the Dalai Lama had proposed "restoration of and protection of Tibet's natural environment and abandonment of China's use of Tibet for the production of nuclear weapons and dumping of nuclear waste".

Q Pico Iyer, the author who has worked with His Holiness, wrote in The Open Road that the Dalai Lama believes in incremental, invisible change. So should change, whether at home or elsewhere, be incremental or revolutionary?

Change is a permanent thing. For a good change to happen, it is important to have the conviction that problems and changes are bound to happen. But what determines change is action. As Shantideva said, "If there is a remedy, then what is the use of frustration? If there is no remedy, then what is the use of frustration?" As for the Tibetan people, we hope that the Sino-Tibet conflict will be resolved. We remain resilient in our freedom movement with that conviction.

August

Ethnic unity in China or cultural genocide in Tibet?

31 August 2024, Actual News Magazine

On August 14, amid almost general indifference, 100 Tibetan academics sent a petition to the United Nations High Commissioner to denounce the policies of cultural assimilation still taking place in Tibet, an autonomous territory controlled by China.

According to them, the Chinese government continues its policies of suppression of the Tibetan language and culture, including through the closure of schools or through indoctrination and propaganda in school curricula.

The private Tibetan-oriented school Gangiong Sherig Norbu Lobling was reportedly closed last July. According to the Tibet Action Institute, this is a continuation of Chinese President Xi Jinping's policy of "ethnic unity", which promotes the culture of the Han majority in the country's minority territories.

China claims that Tibet has been an inseparable part of its territory for centuries, while control of the Himalayan region (of which Tibet is a part) was only completed after the Communist Party came to power in 1949.

Cultural genocide can occur without violence or loss of life. It is the intentional destruction of a people's culture through the elimination of cultural practices, cultural objects or artifacts, language (written and oral), and ancestral traditions. The concept was developed by Polish jurist Raphael Lemkin in his 1944 book, which also defined the term "genocide." According to a June report by the NGO Human Rights Watch, China continues to coercively relocate Tibetans from rural areas to cities in the name of "poverty reduction."

Assimilation

This forced urbanization would be a way to assimilate the population more quickly and to eliminate cultural practices that are more alive in the countryside than in the city. The aim would also be to eliminate the nomadic lifestyle of about 3 million Tibetans who live from yak herding and agriculture.

According to the New York-based human rights group, such forced displacements cause permanent damage to Tibetan culture and way of life, particularly when farmers and herders are no longer able to ply their trades and are forced to work as wage laborers in non-agricultural industries.

Of course, Chinese authorities call the relocations "voluntary," but Human Rights Watch has reviewed more than 1,000 reports from state media and government publications that contradict these claims. Visits by government officials or threats to cut off all services to homes are reportedly frequently used to force Tibetans to leave their villages.

According to official figures, by the end of 2025, more than 930,000 Tibetans will have been displaced, sometimes in entire villages. Although these policies date back to the early 2000s, 76% of these interventions are said to have been carried out after 2016. While the repression in Tibet is no longer in the headlines, there is apparently an acceleration of assimilation policies.

India is not doing much better. According to an independent report, in June it planned to rename 30 Tibetan sites with Indian names. This is likely retaliation by New Delhi, as in March China unilaterally assigned Chinese toponyms to 30 already named places in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh in order to strengthen its territorial claims over the region.

India has historically accepted China's hold over Tibet, in the face of Beijing's de facto control over the region. However, India's recent actions suggest a change in policy by Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

Answers

Anti-government protests in the region in 2008 led to a massive military crackdown by China, and foreigners wishing to visit Tibet now need a special visa. Journalists have great difficulty getting there, except for those from Chinese state media.

The repression suffered by the Tibetan people is nevertheless recognized by the international community. At least three motions on this subject were adopted at the UN, in 1959, 1961 and 1965, but they did not bring about any major change in Chinese policy.

A recent U.S. State Department report notes that Chinese authorities have intimidated, surveilled, and harassed Americans in Tibet and have barred many diplomats and journalists from entering. Americans of Tibetan descent also reportedly face additional scrutiny when applying for Chinese visas.

The Canadian House of Commons unanimously adopted a motion last June affirming its willingness to defend Tibet's right to self-determination and its right to exist as a distinct nation.

The motion, brought forward by Bloc Québécois MP Alexis Brunelle-Duceppe, recognizes that the Chinese government is pursuing a generalized policy of cultural assimilation of Tibetans and specifies that China should not interfere in the selection of the next Dalai Lama.

The historic Tibet region, about 2,500,000 km<sup>2</sup> was an autonomous country from 1912 to 1951, before officially becoming a Chinese province after its annexation by the communist government, then an "autonomous region" of China in 1965.

Its official name is Xizang Autonomous Region. The official religion is Tibetan Buddhism, and the spiritual leader is the Dalai Lama. According to 2022 figures, at least 160 monks, religious figures, and ordinary Tibetans have self-immolated in protest against Chinese policies.

Analysis: Elders stay faithful to Deng over 'reformer Xi Jinping'

29 August 2024, Nikkei Asia

Katsuji Nakazawa is a Tokyo-based senior staff and editorial writer at Nikkei. He spent seven years in China as a correspondent and later as China bureau chief. He was the 2014 recipient of the Vaughn-Ueda International Journalist prize.

What can be called a "revolt against reformer Xi Jinping" took place behind closed doors this summer, dealing a setback to the supreme leader and his allies. The highly unusual political drama played out during the third plenary session of the Chinese Communist Party's current 20th Central Committee. The plenum was held in Beijing from July 15-18.

Around that time, international attention was focusing on what medium- and long-term economic policies party chief Xi and his team would unveil during the key meeting.

The political focus in China, however, was zeroing in on something else entirely, how "reform and opening-up" – the policy that led to China building the world's second-largest economy – came to be adopted. More specifically, the focus was on what role Xi and his late father, Xi Zhongxun, who once served as vice premier, played in forming the policy widely credited to Deng Xiaoping.

The state-run Xinhua News Agency on July 15 published a lengthy commentary, "Xi Jinping the reformer," to coincide with the plenum's opening. The piece praised Xi as an outstanding reformer and appeared designed to reinforce Xi's authority at the big meeting.

But behind the scenes the essay came under an immediate barrage of attacks from political forces not close to Xi. Some within the party called the article strange and factually incorrect, while others said it was not in line with official party history and asked who greenlighted its publication.

Observers said the backlash hit like an unexpected tsunami. It fed off particularly vociferous criticism from retired party elders and "second-generation reds," or children of revolutionary-era party leaders, and proved impossible to contain. Many others within the party used the reverberations as an opportunity to vent their pent-up frustrations with China's dire economic situation.

The controversial article focused on the history of "reform" under Xi, thereby daring to trivialize the history and results of Deng's "reform and opening-up." The piece also partially used the terms "reform" and "reform and opening-up" interchangeably, deliberately sowing confusion among readers.

Descriptions of the 1970s, including an assertion that reform was a "family tradition" for Xi, came in for particularly intense criticism.

In 1978, when Deng put his policy into motion, Xi's father was sent to southern China. According to the commentary, Xi Zhongxun led politics in Guangdong province and established special economic zones in Shenzhen and other places.

The article also said that in 1978, the elder Xi commissioned the younger Xi, who was studying at Tsinghua University in Beijing, to go to Anhui province in eastern China to conduct a field study on the household responsibility system. The younger Xi took copious notes while in Anhui and has kept the notebook for over 40 years, the article said.

The household responsibility system, also known as the contract responsibility system, was introduced as an agricultural reform measure to incentivize farmers. It allows farming households that meet their production quotas to freely sell any surpluses.

The Xinhua commentary gave the impression that father and son Xi, not Deng, led China's reform drive by virtue of the father's work in the south and the son's notetaking in Anhui.

As for Xi's role in Anhui, it was actually Wan Li who at the time promoted the household responsibility system in that province. Wan, a staunch supporter of Deng's reform and opening-up policy, later served as vice premier and then as chairman of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, China's parliament.

Furthermore, Xi's current economic policy seems to significantly differ from Deng's reform and opening-up.

Party elders critical of the Xinhua commentary might have felt that Xi was taking credit for Deng's great achievement.

The article's description of Xi as an outstanding "reformer" also became the specific target of behind-the-scenes criticism. While Deng has been dubbed "the general architect of reform and opening-up," the commentary emphasized that Xi, not Deng, is now the highest authority on reform in the party's history. When the backlash reared, Xi should have realized the seriousness of the situation. He had no choice but to effectively order relevant departments to completely withdraw the article. It did not go on to run in a print edition of the People's Daily, a party mouthpiece, and was completely scrubbed from China's internet before the last day of the third plenum.

This is how "reformer Xi Jinping" was toppled.

It is not hard to imagine the atmosphere at the third plenum after the downfall of "reformer Xi Jinping." The harsh political climate that the commentary triggered could have made it difficult for any meaningful decisions or personnel changes to be made.

Xinhua is under the direct control of the State Council, which belongs to China's central government, and is under the supervision of the Publicity Department of the Communist Party, a propaganda unit. In addition, any important articles like the commentary cannot be published without approval from the General Office of the Communist Party, which manages clerical work in Beijing's Zhongnanhai area, where Xi and other leaders have their offices. At any rate, the commentary's sudden erasure was highly unusual. Blame the debacle on an error in judgment by Xi's close aides.

Those aides miscalculated, partly because they failed to fully consider what this year means in terms of party history: It is the 120th anniversary of Deng's birth.

Deng's birthday, Aug. 22, this year came at a politically sensitive time, shortly after the party's Beidaihe meeting, which is held annually at the seaside resort of the same name in Hebei province, where party leaders and retired elders informally discuss important issues.

It was a decade ago when Xi, shortly after that year's tense Beidaihe meeting, presided over an event to commemorate the 110th anniversary of Deng's birth. Back in 2014, the elders focused their Beidaihe discussions on Xi's fierce anti-corruption campaign.

Their discontent was strong, even that of former President Jiang Zemin, as the elders' former subordinates and the military officers who were close to them were being targeted by Xi's anticorruption team.

But Xi simply shrugged off their discontent as he went about steadily consolidating his power under the banner of fighting corruption. The elders eventually had no choice but to pledge solidarity with Xi.

So what was the mood like at this year's Beidaihe meeting? The discussions remain shrouded in secrecy, even as August is nearing its end. It isn't even known whether Xi traveled to the seaside resort to join the conclave. The lid on information is being held down tighter than ever.

In place of accurate information from the meeting – and touched off by Xi's disappearance from public view – various rumors concerning Xi swirled from the end of July to the middle of August.

Amid the confusion one certainty has emerged, and it stems from another disappearance, that of the Xinhua commentary. Chinese politics has been altered to some extent, and the situation is developing. What is less certain is whether this turn of events will give rise to another behind-the-scenes battle in the months to come.

CPEC 2.0: Transforming Pakistan-China Relations – OpEd

29 August 2024, Eurasia Review, Manahil Jaffer

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), a flagship project under China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), has been a cornerstone of the Pakistan-China relationship since its inception in 2013. With the introduction of CPEC 2.0, this partnership has entered a new phase, bringing both opportunities and challenges that could reshape Pakistan's economic landscape and its strategic ties with China.

CPEC 1.0: A Brief Overview

CPEC 1.0 focused on infrastructure development, energy projects, and establishing Special Economic Zones (SEZs). The $62 billion initiative addressed Pakistan's energy deficit, modernized its transportation network, and stimulated industrial growth. By 2021, several projects were completed, including the Gwadar Port, various power plants, and road networks that enhanced connectivity between China and Pakistan.

These projects have brought tangible benefits, such as alleviating Pakistan's energy crisis and improving transportation infrastructure. However, they also generated concerns about debt sustainability, environmental impact, and the uneven distribution of benefits across different regions of Pakistan. Despite these challenges, CPEC has remained a symbol of the strong bilateral relationship between Pakistan and China.

The Evolution to CPEC 2.0

CPEC 2.0 represents a strategic shift from infrastructure development to industrialization, agriculture, socio-economic development, and digital connectivity. The focus is now on enhancing Pakistan's industrial capacity, improving its agricultural output, and integrating its economy more deeply with China's. This phase is particularly important for Pakistan, as it seeks to address its economic challenges, including a balance of payments crisis, low industrial productivity, and a stagnant agricultural sector. By leveraging Chinese expertise and investment, Pakistan hopes to transform its economy, increase exports, and reduce its dependence on external borrowing.

One of the key components of CPEC 2.0 is the development of Special Economic Zones (SEZs) aimed at attracting foreign investment and promoting industrialization. The Rashakai SEZ in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Allama Iqbal SEZ in Punjab, and Dhabeji SEZ in Sindh are among the priority projects. These zones are expected to create thousands of jobs, enhance technology transfer, and boost Pakistan's manufacturing sector.

Another significant aspect of CPEC 2.0 is agricultural cooperation. Pakistan's agriculture sector, which employs nearly 40% of the workforce, has struggled with low productivity and outdated practices. Under CPEC 2.0, China has committed to sharing its expertise in modern farming techniques, water management, and agricultural technology. This collaboration could significantly improve Pakistan's food security and export potential.

Economic Implications for Pakistan

CPEC 2.0 offers Pakistan a pathway to economic revitalization, but it also comes with challenges that need to be carefully managed. The success of this phase will largely depend on Pakistan's ability to implement reforms, enhance governance, and ensure that the benefits of CPEC are equitably distributed.

One of the main concerns is the growing debt burden associated with CPEC projects. While Chinese loans have been instrumental in financing key infrastructure projects, they have also added to Pakistan's external debt, raising concerns about debt sustainability. To address this issue, Pakistan will need to ensure that CPEC investments generate sufficient economic returns to service the debt.

Another challenge is the need for improved governance and transparency in the implementation of CPEC projects. Corruption, bureaucratic inefficiencies, and political instability have previously hindered the progress of several initiatives. To fully realize the potential of CPEC 2.0, Pakistan must strengthen its institutions, streamline project approval processes, and enhance coordination between federal and provincial governments.

Moreover, the environmental impact of CPEC projects remains a critical concern. The expansion of infrastructure, industrial zones, and agricultural activities under CPEC 2.0 could exacerbate environmental degradation if not properly managed. Pakistan needs to adopt sustainable practices and implement strict environmental regulations to mitigate these risks.

Strategic Implications for the Pakistan-China Relationship

The evolution of CPEC into its second phase underscores the deepening strategic partnership between Pakistan and China. This relationship, often described as “all-weather,” has become increasingly important for both countries in the context of regional and global dynamics.

For Pakistan, China remains a crucial ally in its quest for economic development and security. The CPEC initiative has solidified China’s role as Pakistan’s largest trading partner and investor. Furthermore, China’s support in international forums, particularly on issues like Kashmir, has further strengthened the bilateral relationship.

For China, Pakistan is a key partner in its broader Belt and Road Initiative. CPEC not only provides China with access to the Arabian Sea through the Gwadar Port but also serves as a counterbalance to India’s influence in South Asia. The strategic location of Pakistan makes it a vital component of China’s efforts to secure its energy supply routes and expand its geopolitical influence.

However, the deepening Pakistan-China relationship has also raised concerns among other regional and global powers, particularly India and the United States. India perceives CPEC as a threat to its sovereignty, especially since the corridor passes through the disputed territory of Gilgit-Baltistan. The United States, under its Indo-Pacific strategy, has also expressed reservations about CPEC, viewing it as part of China’s broader ambitions to expand its influence in South Asia and beyond.

The Way Forward

As Pakistan and China move forward with CPEC 2.0, the focus should be on maximizing the economic benefits while addressing the associated challenges. This will require a collaborative approach, with both countries working together to ensure the successful implementation of projects, adherence to environmental standards, and equitable distribution of benefits.

For Pakistan, CPEC 2.0 represents an opportunity to achieve long-term economic growth and stability. However, this will only be possible if the government remains committed to reforms, improves governance, and ensures that the interests of all stakeholders are taken into account. For China, the success of CPEC 2.0 will reinforce its strategic partnership with Pakistan and demonstrate the viability of its Belt and Road Initiative in other regions. By continuing to invest in Pakistan’s development, China can further solidify its position as a key player in the global economy and a major influence in South Asia.

CPEC 2.0 marks a significant evolution in the Pakistan- China relationship, with the potential to reshape the economic and strategic landscape of the region. Both countries stand to benefit from this partnership, but success will depend on careful planning, effective implementation, and a shared commitment to sustainable development.

Opinion: Dr. Doom’s origin in Tibet- Disney should not whitewash and kowtow to Communist China

The Marvel Cinematic Universe and its parent company Disney have the stage set and have the opportunity to bring a big change in the film industry and that is by tackling the issue of ‘whitewashing’ in its upcoming Dr. Doom movies and cast Tibetans to play the roles of Monks of Dooms and even Mahatma Doom if he is to be part of the upcoming Marvel projects.

On 28th July at this year’s San Diego Comic-Con, Marvel Studios announced that the Russo brothers will return to direct the 2 upcoming Avengers movies: Avengers: Domsday and Avengers: Secret Wars. But what took everyone back was when it was announced on stage that Robert Downey Jr. (who revealed himself) would return to play as Dr. Victor Van Doom popularly known as Dr. Doom. This character is the next biggest villain in Marvel’s upcoming phase but one thing that caught many fans and Tibetans in particular is how the origin of this very popular Marvel character like Dr. Strange is tied to Tibet, where the art of mysticism is closely associated with popularly.

The Marvel Universe is a goliath in the Hollywood and movie industry largely due to the fandom and the content they have been bringing out to the public. However, one has repeatedly seen how business and economics take the front stage even if it means straying away from the original story.

When the Marvel movie Dr. Strange was released, it was called out for its practice of Whitewashing, in particular the character of the Ancient One. Whitewashing in films is described as the casting of white Caucasian actors and actresses in roles originally meant to be characters of color, whereby it does not only dismiss the original characters but also their story and place of origin.

Marvel Comics has a long-standing practice of attaching the lore of its characters to Tibet especially when it comes to two prominent Doctor-themed characters Dr. Strange and Dr. Doom. In the Marvel comics, the mentors or Lama (as we call it in Tibetan) of both these Marvel characters are Tibetans and of Tibet origin with popular Marvel Fandom making it clear for us all as well. Dr. Strange's mentor, the Ancient One, and Dr. Doom's attendant, the Monks of Dooms were from Tibet and Tibetan in origin. The original writers described them clearly as from Tibet and Tibetans rather than Chinese.

Based on the original comic from which the storyline and the movie of Dr. Doom will blossom, it is visibly clear that the Monks of Dooms (a group of Tibetans monks residing in the Himalayans Mountains in Tibet) forged Dr. Doom's iconic Armour in the Great Furnace of the Tibetan monastery and was also here he learned his mystic arts and skills from. This is a critical component of Dr. Doom's origin story and is sure to receive much screen time similar to how the creation of Stormbreaker (Thor's weapon to substitute Mjolnir) in the movie Avengers: The Infinity War was portrayed. But the question lies in whether Marvel will be bold enough to confront its inner demons here and stay true to its source materials.

In the past, against all the backlashes of Marvel Universe's whitewashing practices, they still decided to Whitewash the Ancient One in Dr. Strange's movies with Caucasian Actress Tilda Swinton. The practices of whitewashing Tibetans and Asians off the big screen have far greater repercussions than simply denial of representation. The decision to remove and ignore Tibetans off the big screen is undoubtedly for profit over principle and further aid and abet CCP's efforts to erode Tibetans and its unique identity. It's an act of appeasement towards the CCP and being able to access their market, at what cost though? Rather than casting Tibetans and keeping the distinct originality of the films intact they till now have viewed it as a risky move that would affront or antagonize the People's Republic of China. Marvel Studio to date has decided to remove Tibetans and its ties to Tibet entirely.

Doctor Strange's writer when speaking on why Tibetans were cast off from the movies, admitted to placating PRC stating that the Ancient one "originates from Tibet, so if you acknowledge that

Tibet is a place and that he's Tibetan, you risk alienating one billion people who think that that's bullsh*t and risk the Chinese government going, 'Hey, you know one of the biggest film-watching countries in the world? We're not going to show your movie because you decided to get political.'

It is unfortunate to witness such a big body kowtowing to Chinese demands and aiding them in spreading disinformation about Tibet. An agenda that was mentioned in the recently passed US law now titled 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act' popularly known as the 'Resolve Tibet Act.' With Marvel Studios being based in the USA, they would directly be violating this law if they were to act with Beijing's consciousness. The Chinese Communist party-led government has used Hollywood and other big business entities including the NBA to spread their narrative with notable incidents being Tibet Supporter Richard Gere permanently being banned from China, the 'Seven Years in Tibet' and 'Kundun' movies, the career of NBA player Enes Kanter and more recently removing chunks of the famous cult movie 'The Fight Club' and US Congressmen Jim McGovern being sanctioned for supporting Tibet. Tibet an illegally occupied country by China continues to face severe repression, it has been named the least country according to Freedom House Report, 2024.

We the Tibetans, ethnic minorities, Asian communities, and Marvel comic book fans around the world demand Marvel Universe and Disney not whitewash Tibetan characters off from the upcoming Dr. Doom movies and cast Tibetans for the role of monks of Doom and Mahatma Doom. Moreover, erasing the representation of Tibetans within the Marvel Universe just to appease China is not art and directly contradicts what Walt Disney stood for.

Why China must recall history before replacing Tibet with 'Xizang'

29 August 2024, First Post, Claude Arpi

Chinese officials should read their own reports and history on how Tibet, which was clearly not theirs, was first 'liberated' and then brutally 'pacified' One can argue that the Chinese are history lovers; they have a recorded history for several millennia (which is not the case of India, where history was usually transmitted in the guru-shishya parampara form); however, since the advent of the Communist Dynasty in 1949, the Mandarins in Beijing seem to have lost this sense of history. There is a simple reason for this: the Communist ideology has to prevail over history.

The Middle Kingdom's relation with Tibet is an example of the Chinese amnesia about the recent past.

From immemorial times (to use Chinese terminology), the Tibetans have turned to India for their religion, culture, trade, and civilisation in general; Tibetan Buddhism is still today synonymous with the Nalanda tradition. Similarly, Tibetan script has evolved from the Brahmi script, which can't be included in the Chinese knowledge system.

One could multiply such examples; even politically, Tibet was an independent nation till it was invaded by Mao's Army in 1950-51.

The fact that Tibet, India, and China sat on an equal footing for six months at the conference table in Simla in 1913-14 is the best proof that the Nationalist regime could not deny Lhasa the right to negotiate a treaty (even if, at the end, it was not ratified by China for unrelated reasons).

Official Erroneous Interpretation

On the first day of her arrival in the Chinese embassy in Delhi, a Chinese official tweeted a threatening message, attacking the Indian media, which did not follow, according to her, the line of the Communist Party: "Recently, we noticed some comments on Xizang-related affairs in some Indian media. Xizang has been part of China since ancient times. Xizang-related affairs are purely China's internal affairs that brook no foreign interference," she wrote.

What is this 'Xizang'?

It is the name given by Beijing to Tibet. As any colonial power has done in the past, the names of places (and persons) are changed. For Beijing, the name 'Tibet' needed to be erased and replaced by a Chinese one. Advertisement

Then the official tried to make us believe that Communist China has great expertise about the return on earth of the spirit of advanced masters: "Reincarnation of Living Buddhas comes with a set range of rituals and conventions, which has been in existence for several hundred years. The Chinese government pursues policies of freedom of religious belief, including respecting and protecting the reincarnation of Living Buddhas, an institution of succession in Tibetan Buddhism. For the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama, the Panchen Erdeni, and other grand Living Buddhas, a complete set of methods and procedures have been established over the centuries, and the religious rituals and historical conventions as well as the Chinese laws need to be complied with in this process."

'Living Buddhas' is again a Communist invention; reincarnated lamas are generally known as tulkus or Rinpoches (an honorific title meaning 'precious') or yantsi, a term literally meaning 'being born again' or 'repeat of existence'; a master takes birth again in the cycle of existence, purportedly to continue his spiritual work started in his previous life.

The Chinese official concluded that "reincarnation of Living Buddhas including the Dalai Lama, must comply with Chinese laws and regulations and follow religious rituals and historical conventions. It is hoped that the media respect China's core interests and do not provide any platforms for anti-China separatist activities."

In Tibet, the system of reincarnation was not rigidly codified; it was left to each monastery, college, or school of Tibetan Buddhism to discover their own masters, then enthrone and groom them.

The Panchen Lama is also mentioned in a renamed form, 'Panchen Erdeni' by the official. The Panchen Lama is considered the second most important spiritual leader in the Yellow (Gelug) School of Tibetan Buddhism.

The case of the Panchen Lama is interesting as it shows how far Beijing is ready to go to control the 'reincarnation' system.

Following the death of the 10th Panchen Lama in 1989, in 1995, the 14th Dalai Lama recognised a young boy, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, as the true incarnation of the 10th incarnation. Three days later, Beijing abducted Gedhun and his family. A few months later, after setting up its own search committee, Beijing selected Gyaltsen Norbu as the 'real' Panchen Lama. For the purpose, they used a lottery system known as the Golden Urn, which was extremely rarely used in Tibet...because it is easier to manipulate.

Since 1995, the whereabouts of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima and his family are unknown. Is he still alive? Who knows?

The message of the official of the embassy, however, indicates that China is preparing to select its own 15th Dalai Lama, even against the will of the present one. For this, the Communist leadership will send Gyaltsen Norbu to Lhamo Latso, the holy Lake of Vision; Norbu will have a vision of a boy born in Tibet, and Xinhua will announce the good news.

How the Chinese Communist 15th Dalai Lama will be accepted by the Tibetans and the world is another story.

Just look at the 14th Dalai Lama; he was recently in New York, where 17,000 people gathered in a stadium to offer long-life prayers. Following a knee replacement surgery in June, it was his first major public appearance.

People gathered in the sports arena to fervently pray for the long life of the 89-year-old Buddhist leader, who told them, "I have done my best to benefit others and the Tibetan people."

Two days later, he had a stopover in Switzerland. In Zurich, he went on the stage at the Hallenstadion, where he sat on a throne before large Thangka paintings. The stadium was booked to full its capacity of 15,000.

Thinley Chökyi, Representative of the Office of Tibet, Geneva, said in her opening remarks: "May you yet be able to return to Tibet, take your seat on the Lion Throne in the Potala Palace, and offer teachings from there once more." Watching the videos, the fervour of the Tibetans offering long-life prayers was truly moving.

Around the same time, Gyaltsen Norbu, the Chinese selected Panchen Lama, was travelling in Nagchu City (prefecture) 'in China's Xizang Autonomous Region' (note, 'China's Xizang' in case one forgets where Tibet is).

Before returning to Lhasa, Norbu visited several Tibetan Buddhist monasteries: "he participated in religious services and performed head-touching rituals for monks and believers."

Xinhua asserted that "he also attended a series of Buddhist and social activities in various localities, including a horse racing festival and a symposium of representatives of the religious circle."

The point is that everywhere the crowds were minimal, like it has been when he visited some areas of Central Tibet and border areas during the past years, never more than 50 people.

It so happens that during this time, I was working on the role of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) Air Force in Tibet; what is striking is that ever since the invasion (called 'liberation' by China) of the Roof of the World, the Tibetans have never felt part of the Middle Kingdom, quite on the contrary.

When they started rebelling against the Communist rule, which wanted to impose 'reforms' on them (a few years later the Red Guards introduced similar reforms in the Mainland), they had to be 'pacified'; at that time, many Tibetans were trying to take refuge in the northern districts.

In August 1958, the Central Military Commission ordered the PLA to systematically attack the fleeing Tibetans from the air. By then, the pilots had a very simple way of identifying 'rebel bandits': after spotting hundreds of white sheep, "we neared the sheep herds; we'd discover yaks alongside them, as well as scattered tents, and then we could basically conclude that they were rebel bandits," said a Chinese record quoted by Jianglin Li, a Chinese author based in the United States. Jianglin quoted an Air Force 25th Division pilot who took part in the bombing: "One time, a buildup of thousands of rebel bandits [read the Tibetans] was surrounded by our troops on the top of Maqin [Amnye Machen] Mountain. At first the army launched a powerful attack on the mountain from four directions, but because the enemy occupied a commanding position and the mountain slopes were precipitous, the attack was not successful, and our troops suffered substantial casualties. The Rebellion Pacification Command Post ordered an immediate deployment of bomber planes to bomb the rebel bandits on Maqin Mountain."

The Tibetan rebel 'bandits' tried to fire on the aircraft with guns, but they experienced "the iron fist of the People's Air Force. ... In one stroke, we annihilated this band of stubbornly resisting rebel bandits." The PLA Air Force unit is said to have dropped nine 100-kilo bombs on Amnye Machen Mountain, and all of them hit their target."

Jianglin and some other authors give a number of examples.

One can only suggest that all Chinese officials should read their own reports and history on how Tibet, which was clearly not theirs, was first 'liberated' and then brutally 'pacified'.

Beijing's Sovereign Claims for Tibet

28 August 2024, AIER

Even a cursory knowledge about modern China reveals the contradictory conditions of increased economic freedoms with continued repression of civil and political liberty. For example, forming political parties is viewed as an unacceptable challenge to the inviolable "dictatorship of the proletariat" overseen by China's Communist Party.

However, Beijing uses heavy-handed methods to suppress non-political groups, including an "iron fist" approach to Falun Gong, a sect known for breathing exercises. It has also halted prayer meetings and closed Christian churches, while administering some "rough handling" of the Uighur minority.

As it is, China's communist leaders have proven themselves to be adept masters of diplomatic maneuvering. They deflect external criticisms against internal repression of dissent or religious freedom by asserting sovereign rights to conduct domestic affairs and that foreigners have no right to comment or pass judgments.

Meanwhile, Beijing raises warning flags or sends diplomatic missiles to countries even if there are only rumors of a visit or interactions with politicians from Taiwan. Despite its persistent and harsh interference with religious and cultural freedoms against Tibetan Buddhists, after Taiwan, complaints or comments about this will invite very prickly responses from the Communist leadership.

As the 14th Dalai Lama celebrates the ninth decade of his mortal life, he and other Tibetan Buddhists worry about the identification of his reincarnate and that of the Panchen Lama, the top figures in Tibetan Buddhism. For its part, China's State Administration for Religious Affairs (SARA) declared that all reincarnations of living Buddhas of Tibetan Buddhism will be considered “illegal or invalid” unless they have government approval.

Dalai Lamas, acting as spiritual and administrative leaders of Tibet since 1391, are considered manifestations of Avalokiteshvara, the patron saint of Tibet. When Lhamo Dhondup was two years old, (born as Tenzin Gyatso in 1935), he was recognized as the reincarnation of the preceding Lama.

A Living Buddha, known as tülku, is a reincarnated Tibetan Buddhist lama that consciously decides to be reborn many times to continue his religious pursuits. Among the most powerful tülku lineages are the Dalai Lamas and Panchen Lamas.

Regardless of Beijing’s preferences, the Dalai Lama is the undisputed spiritual leader of millions of Tibetans, including those forced into exile or living under the shadow of the People’s Liberation Army. In considering whether to accede to China’s demands, it might be useful to consider the basis of its claims over Tibet.

Considering history and communist ideology, one of the persistent demands and great triumphs of the twentieth century was ending imperial dominance of unwilling populations. It has become fatuous and disingenuous to make territorial claims and insist upon adherence to treaties imposed by defunct imperialists. It is remarkable for an atheistic regime with ideological disdain of imperialism to pass judgment on religious affairs in a territory that it claims to rule based on an imperial past. As it is, Chinese law and political claims for “unity” are being allowed to trump Tibetan autonomy in pursuing a unique religious culture and heritage.

China’s insistence on sovereignty over Tibet or other areas of previous control is dubious on numerous grounds since this logic renders moot all its territorial disputes with India that was unified long before China in 321 BCE. While India’s centrally-controlled State included Afghanistan and controlled the entire Indian Subcontinent, it refrains from asserting claims on this line of historical reasoning.

China’s claims over Tibet are based upon imperial treaties or conquests, including the marriage of Tang Princess Wencheng to Tibetan king Songtsen Gambo in the seventh century. Chinese scholars ignore the fact that the Chinese emperor initially rebuffed Songtsen Gambo who then used military prowess to force his will in the matter.

While no indigenous Chinese force was able to subdue Tibet in ancient times, the great Mongol chieftains did conquer Tibet. A claim to Tibet based upon treaties with Genghis Khan and his great-grandson Kublai Khan, founder of the Yuan dynasty, involved agreements that included anyone of Han-Chinese origin.

In all events, political allegiance and religious blessings were exchanged for protection by the Mongols. Later, it was an administrative region under the Yuan Empire (1279 -1368), and then the Qing Dynasty (1644-1911) recognized the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama.

Eventually, Lhasa broke away from the Yuan emperor and regained independence from the Mongols. While the Han-Chinese Ming dynasty ruled China from 1368 to 1644, it had few ties to and no authority over Tibet, and then Tibet was largely free from foreign influences until the eighteenth century.

Interaction with the Manchus and the Qing dynasty began in the seventeenth century with its tight embrace of Tibetan Buddhism. But imperial troops sent to Tibet were for the protection of the Dalai Lama from foreign invasion or internal unrest rather than making it part of the Manchu empire or incorporating it into the territory of China.

Several pacts during the twentieth century relating to Tibet and European imperial powers were overseen by the Chinese imperial court. While Great Britain acknowledged Chinese suzerainty in Tibet with the 1904 Lhasa Treaty (Anglo-Tibetan Convention), it exacted financial indemnity and trade concessions in Tibet and Sikkim, but such a treaty has no moral authority.

In 1906, an Anglo-Chinese Convention signed in Beijing reversed the right of Britain and Tibet to conduct direct negotiations as conducted earlier in Lhasa. But again, it was a matter between two outside imperial powers that decided that the Chinese government was the administrative master of Tibet. Later, the imperial powers of Britain and Russia signed the Anglo-Russian Convention (1907) agreeing that future negotiations over Tibet would be conducted through the Chinese government. During the times of imperial domination, Tibetans were not consulted about the resulting conventions as most such treaties ignored local interests.

Apologists for Beijing’s dominance often suggest that the Chinese have helped preserve Tibetan ways. While it is claimed that China has more practitioners of Tibetan Buddhism, most are in a former Tibetan province (Amdo) that was incorporated into the Middle Kingdom and renamed Qinghai province in the 18th century.

It is also pointed out that the YongHe Gong Lamasery in Beijing has been the site of worship for nearly almost three centuries. Even so, Chinese forces have razed many of Tibet’s monasteries and temples, either as retaliation against resistance to Beijing’s rule or to dilute their influence.

In all events, Chinese physical presence or cultural influences in modern Tibet were negligible until after the Cultural Revolution. Indeed, it was only in the past 25 years or so that significant numbers of Han Chinese were resettled in Tibet.

Beijing has applied several new tactics to secure its control over Tibet. One of these was its "Go West" campaign that involved enlisting the support of businesses to develop the western region of China, including the so-called Tibet Autonomous Region and Qinghai province.

There was also an attempt to bring in the World Bank to extend a loan for $160 million to resettle about 60,000 farmers in traditional Tibetan lands as part of the China Western Poverty Reduction Project. This resettlement of farmers would involve several ethnic groups, notably the majority Han Chinese. Groups supporting preservation of Tibetan culture have denounced the moves by China to be tantamount to "cultural genocide".

If according to legal custom, possession is nine-tenths of the law, China can use such logic to rationalize its continued occupation of Tibet. Whatever merit this dictum might reflect, judicial procedure and reasoning are normally applied to determine whether the basis for possession was reasonable or just. A dispassionate view of the matter indicates that China's assertions for suzerainty over Tibet teeter on a weak and unconvincing foundation.

Considerable evidence indicates many Tibetans feel they would be better off without Beijing's choking embrace, as there have been periodic uprisings during the five decades under Communist Party rule. Their expressions of discord were met with harsh retaliation by Chinese soldiers and police, leading to the death of thousands of Tibetans.

After the Dalai Lama fled Tibet for India in 1959 after a failed uprising against the Chinese invasion, authorities in Beijing have persistently demonized him. Even so, Tibetan Buddhists remain strongly loyal to him as their spiritual leader.

Of course, such meddling in religious affairs is not confined to Tibetan Buddhists. Uighur Muslims, Daoists, Falun Gong, "unregistered" Protestants and Vatican-loyal Catholics must bend their faith to fit the Procrustean demands of China's secular law.

In 1982, the CCP Central Committee issued, "Concerning Our Country's Basic Standpoint and Policy on Religious Questions During the Socialist Period" imposed "proper control" over religious affairs. As such, "patriotic" religious associations were to sacrifice the interests of their religious communities to promote the objectives of the Communist state.

Only a Beijing bureaucrat could see no humor in the requirements that reincarnation applications must be submitted in quadruplicate forms to secular authorities. Among the bodies tasked to "institutionalize management on reincarnation of living Buddhas" are the religious affairs department of the provincial-level government, the provincial-level government, SARA, and the State Council with approval granted according to the fame and influence of the living Buddhas.

SARA officials insist that selection of reincarnates must preserve national unity and solidarity of all ethnic groups. And they insist that this precludes the influence in the selection process by any group or individual from outside the country.

As it is, administrating religious affairs based on interests of the Chinese state or "public interest" interferes with Tibet's internal religious affairs. While regulations guarantee "normal religious activities" of Tibetan Buddhism and protect the religious belief of Tibetan Buddhism, temples that recognized reincarnation of a living Buddha must be legally registered.

It is easy to see why Beijing considers it necessary to keep them under tight control. Reincarnated lamas have considerable influence over life of native Tibetans since they lead religious communities and oversee training of monks.

And so it was that the eleventh incarnation of the Panchen Lama, identified as a six-year-old Tibetan Buddhist Gedhun Choekyi Nyima in 1995, was spirited away to Beijing. In turn, he was replaced with Gyaltzen Norbu by religious affairs officials in Beijing.

As it is, most Tibetans never felt the need to be "liberated" by an alien, outside power. For their part, they wish to preserve the dignity of indigenous people that wish to be free to choose their own destiny within their own culture.

But Chinese policy ignores the reality that Tibetans care more about their own distinctive culture, history, and identity than they care about expressing loyalty to Beijing. Perhaps this is what is most galling to China's leaders.

Beijing's insistence upon its beneficence in dealing with the local people is no more convincing than Japan's rationale for "liberating" the rest of Asia from European domination during the 1930s and 1940s under the guise of a "Greater East Asia Co-prosperity Sphere." Although the scale may be less, the degree of brutality used has not been much different than the Japanese during the Rape of Nanking.

In all events, the issue for Tibetans is more about preserving cultural and religious identity rather than geography or borders. While geographic territory is an important element of sovereignty for modern nation-states, it should not be used as an unconditional reason to overwhelm the aspiration of humans that engage in conflict with their governments.

For their part, political systems that aspire to peace should provide methods to resolve tensions relating to rights of self-determination so individual citizens or groups can undertake continuous expressions of their will. As the motivating force behind anti-colonial movements, collective self-determination allows diverse groups and individuals within political borders to act to shape their cultural and value systems.

But Chinese law and Beijing's political claims for geographic "unity" are seen to override Tibetan's desire for self-determination and to maintain their unique religious culture and heritage. While control of Tibet's religious heritage has been usurped by an atheistic regime with ideological contempt for imperialism, it insists on controlling religious affairs based on territorial claims based on imperial treaties. One cannot ignore the irony and hypocrisy behind Beijing's insistence for recovering Hong Kong was the rejection of the legality of titles based on force and unequal treaties. Since neither military invasion nor continuing occupation change the legal basis of Tibetan sovereignty, it must be viewed to be an independent state under illegal occupation.

Dalai Lama — thorn in China's side

28 August 2024, Taipei Times

The Chinese government's sensitivity toward the Dalai Lama is a complex issue rooted in historical, political and cultural factors. Understanding this sensitivity requires delving into the intricate relationship between China and Tibet, as well as the broader implications of the Dalai Lama's influence.

The Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, fled Tibet in 1959 following a failed uprising against Chinese rule. Since then, he has lived in exile in India, continuing to advocate for the rights and autonomy of the Tibetan people.

Despite his public stance of seeking genuine autonomy rather than full independence for Tibet, the Chinese government views him as a significant political threat. His influence and the support he garners for Tibetan autonomy challenge China's sovereignty over Tibet, a region it considers an integral part of its territory.

One of the most unique aspects of the Dalai Lama's role is the process of reincarnation. The Chinese government has expressed a strong desire to control the selection of the next Dalai Lama, ensuring that the successor aligns with their political interests.

This move is part of a broader strategy to maintain control over Tibetan Buddhism and prevent any separatist movements. By controlling the reincarnation process, China aims to diminish the Dalai Lama's influence and integrate Tibetan Buddhism more closely with the state.

The Dalai Lama's global recognition as a symbol of peace and human rights often leads to diplomatic tensions between China and other countries. His meetings with foreign leaders and his international advocacy for Tibetan rights are perceived by China as attempts to undermine its sovereignty and territorial integrity. These interactions can strain China's diplomatic relations, leading to strong reactions from the Chinese government whenever the Dalai Lama is given a platform on the global stage.

The Dalai Lama holds immense cultural and religious significance for Tibetans and Buddhists worldwide. His teachings and leadership are deeply revered, making him a powerful figure beyond the political realm.

The Chinese government's efforts to control religious practices and institutions in Tibet are part of a broader campaign to assimilate Tibetan culture into the dominant Han Chinese culture. The Dalai Lama's influence represents a challenge to these efforts, as he embodies the preservation of Tibetan identity and religious freedom.

The Chinese government's sensitivity toward the Dalai Lama is driven by a combination of historical grievances, political calculations and cultural considerations. The Dalai Lama's enduring influence and his advocacy for Tibetan rights continue to pose a challenge to China's authority over Tibet.

As long as the Dalai Lama remains a prominent figure on the global stage, the Chinese government's sensitivity toward his activities is likely to persist.

Understanding these dynamics is crucial to comprehending the broader geopolitical landscape and the ongoing struggle for Tibetan autonomy and cultural preservation.

Don't Ever Invade China: Xi Jinping Prioritizes Border, Coastal, and Air Defense

You don't want yourself An incident

Mark Knopfler, Don't Crash the Ambulance (2004)

Just as the U.S. National Defense Strategy lists homeland defense as the first priority of the Department of Defense, China's national defense policy states that the top mission of China's armed forces is to "safeguard national territorial sovereignty (领土主权) and maritime rights and interests (海洋权益)." Other "major security domains" have been added to China's National Defense Law — specifically space, the electromagnetic spectrum, and cyberspace in 2020 — but protecting the borders of the homeland has always been the prime directive.

Chinese leader Xi Jinping underscored mainland defense on July 30 with a speech to the Chinese Communist Party's politburo standing committee group study session on China's border, coastal, and air defense (边海空防). This meeting addressed the duties of a significant portion of the active-duty People's Liberation Army, the People's Armed Police, and the reserves and militia, which operate on the frontlines with neighboring militaries and civilian entities. Xi praised their efforts as central to China's national security and strategic interests since he took power in 2012. The study session became the banner front page article of the Aug. 1 edition of the Chinese-language Liberation Army Daily newspaper. Xi's speech gained symbolic heft by coming on the date celebrated for the 97th anniversary of the founding of People's Liberation Army.

What does Beijing's carefully crafted, high-profile political signaling tell us? First, the timing of this session suggests the Chinese leadership seeks to deter the United States, its allies, and partners (including Taiwan) by highlighting its commitment to defending China's sovereignty and territorial claims. Though no foreign military might actually be contemplating action against the Chinese mainland in the near term, Mark Knopfler's musical warning resonates with the paranoia of Chinese leaders. Fear of invasion goes back long before the founding of the People's Republic of China to the foreign occupation extending through the war with Japan in the 1930s. In the 1950s, China was threatened with nuclear weapons during the Korean War and the Taiwan Straits crisis. Beginning in 1964, a tremendously expensive program known as the Third Line (三线 or Third Front) moved strategic industries deep into the interior for protection from attack. A decade later, the military and militia practiced the "three attacks, three defenses" (三打三防, "attack tanks, aircraft, and airborne troops, defend against air, chemical, and nuclear attack"). In the 1990s, a "new" was added before the three attacks, three defenses and to keep up with technology, the targets were changed to "attacking enemy stealth, cruise missiles, and helicopters and defending against precision strikes, electronic warfare, and reconnaissance."

The threat to China's sovereignty was further highlighted by the mistaken bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade in 1999. Despite U.S. explanations and apologies, many Chinese leaders and people still consider the action a deliberate strike. We may never know for certain, but it is plausible that the Chinese Communist Party worries about another "October surprise" during the fall 2024 election season or early in a new U.S. administration. This is amplified by increasing friction in the South China Sea and across the Taiwan Strait.

As of summer 2024, Chinese government continues to assess that a "certain major power [the U.S.] has resorted to power politics and bullying, and willful containment and suppression of emerging forces." And Xi's "explainer" for the recently concluded Third Plenum continued to warn against the dangers of "black swans" and "gray rhinos" – both are Chinese codewords for unforeseen risks and uncertainties, foreign and domestic.

Second, prioritizing China's border, coastal, and air defense reflects Xi's continuing belief in "People's War," China's "magic weapon" (法宝), in its strategic deterrence posture and "integrated national strategic systems and capabilities" (一体化国家战略体系和能力). He is determined to mobilize manpower, resources, and technical know-how embedded in Chinese society and civilian sectors to advance the Chinese Communist Party's security interests first at home and gradually beyond China's borders.

Third, Xi's statement raises the possibility of more "major" Chinese activities along the country's land borders (e.g., India, Burma) and coastal regions (e.g., Taiwan Strait, South and East China seas), potentially employing new and innovative measures. The fact that the Central Military Commission Joint Staff Department provided the briefer for the study session may portend a significant change in the responsibilities of the Chinese military chain of command regarding border operations. Expect the unexpected.

Who's Leading the State Border and Coastal Defense Commission? Unclear.

China's border, coastal, and air defense system is roughly equivalent to the U.S. homeland defense functions. It coordinates the enforcement of the country's claimed territorial boundaries and integrates the party, government, military, law enforcement, and civilian assets (党政军警民) under a unified central authority. Its leaders will play a central role in any potential crisis along China's land or sea borders. Chinese homeland defense is led by the Party Central Committee and Central Military Commission, with responsibilities shared among the armed forces, civilian law enforcement, and local governments. But who exactly is in charge seems to be in flux.

The 2006 defense white paper reported that the State Border and Coastal Defense Commission (国家边海防委员会), created in 1994, was composed of "the relevant departments of the State Council and the [People's Liberation Army]." Many of its responsibilities include infrastructure development projects to improve the transportation and communications in border regions and to upgrade the standard of living for military personnel. However, the 2020 National Defense Law removed the State Council from that commission, implying changes to come.

Today, it is unclear who leads the State Border and Coastal Defense Commission. Previously, the minister of national defense held the position. The deputy director of the Party Central Foreign Affairs Leading Small Group (changed into a commission in 2018) has served as one of the deputy directors of the commission. Current Defense Minister Admiral Dong Jun, however, has not been associated with the commission, nor has he become a member of the Central Military Commission or a state councilor. We don't know who oversees the commission's foreign affairs portfolio, either.

The director of the Central Military Commission National Defense Mobilization Department (军委国防动员部) has served as deputy director of the State Border and Coastal Defense Commission since the military reform started in 2016. Within that department is a Border Defense Bureau (边防局), which coordinates with smaller border and coastal defense bureaus/divisions in the five theater armies' joint staff departments (战区陆军参谋部边海防处) and in the army staff department (陆军参谋部边海防局). So far, we have found no similar staff organizations in the navy or air force, although those services contribute units to conduct missions along China's borders. Chinese Armed Forces Units Responsible for Border, Coastal, and Air Defense

The People's Liberation Army's Army, Navy, and Air Force all provide units and personnel to conduct daily border, coastal, and air defense operations (but not Rocket Force units except in their general nuclear and conventional deterrence role). These units are supported by elements of the People's Armed Police, particularly the China Coast Guard, and reserve and militia units. The newly formed Military Aerospace Force, Cyberspace Force, and Information Support Force provide capabilities with global reach to China's strategic deterrence posture in support of the four services and five theaters.

The army contributes the largest force dedicated to this mission. Though the army may participate in a few exercises outside of China with foreign militaries each year and provides about 2,000 personnel annually to United Nations Peacekeeping Operations, the vast majority of its troops have never left the country.

Army units, in general, are categorized into three groups. "Maneuver operation (机动作战部队)" units are organized mostly into 13 group armies and a handful of divisions that may move from one part of the country to another as required. "Garrison forces (警卫警备部队)" comprise the system of provincial military districts, military subdistricts, and people's armed forces departments that provide mobilization support, perform conscription functions, and command militia units.

The army's "border and coastal defense (边海防部队)" units were mostly reorganized after 2015 into brigades (except for the western theater, where the former structure of regiments was retained). The International Institute for Strategic Studies Military Balance counts about 50 border and coastal defense brigades and regiments, which we estimate could number well over 100,000 personnel. The forces are widely dispersed in small units across the country. They primarily are responsible for patrolling and monitoring the borders for military activity. These units have been equipped with some new weapons and equipment, but remain in a defensive posture. In hot spots, the border defense units are reinforced by "maneuver operation" combat units. For instance, the line of actual control with India has been reinforced as part of the 506 Special Mission for nearly a decade. This mission has been amplified in the years since the 2020 skirmishes in the Galwan Valley. Along the east coast, in August 2022, new army modular long-range multiple rocket launcher systems were employed in the large joint exercise in response to U.S. Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi's visit to Taiwan.

The navy is in a period of transition, moving from "defense on the near seas (近海防御) to protection missions on the far seas (远海防卫)." The Military Balance counts more than 100 patrol craft and corvettes that are optimized for operations along China's coast, along with many of its conventionally powered submarines. Meanwhile, roughly the same number of carriers, cruisers, destroyers, frigates, and nuclear subs can perform operations within the first island chain as well as in distant waters. The navy's land-based coastal defense force (岸防部队) maintains multiple anti-ship cruise missile regiments and air defense, electronic countermeasures, and radar brigades, plus a significant land-based aviation force.

The air force, meantime, is "accelerating the transition of its tasks from territorial air defense (国土防空) to both offensive and defensive operations (攻防兼备)." It has "one of the largest forces of advanced long-range [surface-to-air] missile systems in the world" augmented by a large fleet of fighter aircraft to provide integrated air defense of the mainland and adjacent seas.

The "air defense" Xi referred to in his speech actually applies to civil or people's air defense (人民防空, or 人防) and not active-duty air defenses (防空). China Civil Air Defense offices are found in local civilian governments to manage construction of facilities, such as bomb shelters and command posts, and cooperate with other government agencies in emergency management.

The China Coast Guard has “over 150 regional and oceangoing patrol vessels,” including over 20 former navy corvettes modified for coast guard operations. In May 2024, several coast guard vessels participated in the Joint Sword-2024A exercise after Taiwan’s presidential election. In addition, hundreds of maritime militia vessels operate daily in the South China Sea alone and will complicate foreign operations in time of crisis or war.

Finally, People’s Liberation Army reserve units, currently being restructured, also contribute to border and coastal defense operations, particularly in air defense and support tasks. Militia units also have been assigned air defense, rescue and recovery, and other technical and logistics tasks including operating multiple types of unmanned vehicles.

Conclusion

Prioritizing border, coastal, and air defense aligns with the party’s resolution to “strengthen traditional combat forces” in Xi’s speech to the recent party Third Plenum (see section XIV). In Chinese military parlance, “traditional combat forces” refer to conscript-heavy units that make up the border and coastal defense forces and other ground combat units. Xi’s emphasis on homeland defense will almost certainly help elevate the stature of such (mainly) army elements. To give them higher profile in society, border troops have a webpage dedicated to their stories for internal consumption on the Chinese-language China military website.

Inside China, local officials and bureaucrats may read something else into Xi’s speech: that central funding is available for dual-use infrastructure construction in border regions for projects that contribute to defense readiness. This may encourage local leaders to volunteer to participate in this development as part of nationwide “military-civilian integration/fusion” (军民融合) activities. A likely example of this thinking is demonstrated in the construction of over 50 new villages and expansion of 100 others in remote regions along China’s periphery since 2016.

Xi’s speech noted that it is “important to foster neighborly relations and pragmatic cooperation with neighboring countries to create a favorable surrounding environment.” Military relations with several adjacent southeast Asian countries seem relatively stable. However, given the friction caused by China’s actions over disputed ocean territories, any call to foster neighborly relations with its offshore neighbors appears mostly empty. But maybe Xi’s emphasis of “pragmatic cooperation” signals

Beijing’s willingness to adopt a more flexible approach in the coming years.

Finally, Xi stressed the need to “optimize the leadership management system.” Xi may be considering placing border operations under the Central Military Commission’s Joint Staff Department. Such a move would take it away from the National Defense Mobilization Department Border Defense Bureau and might ripple down to the theater commands’ Joint Staff Departments. Perhaps the navy and air force may create border operations staff offices. Such changes could lead to greater integration of operations along China’s periphery. In the long run, more unified control of front-line units could also reduce miscommunications and accidental encounters with foreign military and civilian entities operating in proximity to Chinese borders.

The dark side of China’s Tibet strategy

27 August 2024, Daily Mirror

China’s Tibet policy has been one of the most controversial aspects of the Chinese Communist Party’s (CCP) seventy-five-year rule. While the CCP has claimed to develop Tibet as a global center, the reality is much grimmer than Beijing projects.

Tibet, rich in cultural heritage and historical significance, remains one of the most underdeveloped regions in China. Despite its vast natural resources and strategic importance, Tibet lags behind in nearly all development metrics, including literacy rates, healthcare access, and infrastructure. This raises the question: Why does the CCP, which has promoted rapid development elsewhere in China, allow such disparities in Tibet?

The answer is straightforward: Tibet is punished for its adherence to a faith the CCP views as revolutionary and anti-CCP. The Party aims not only to eradicate Tibetan Buddhism but also to transform the region into a Han-majority area, ultimately erasing Tibetan culture.

China’s policies in Tibet have focused on limiting foreign contact and stifling economic development. The state has also sought to alter the local demography, disrupting the ethnic and cultural balance to assert its dominance. China’s Tibetan policy is notoriously brutal, as evidenced by its violation of the Seventeen Point Agreement, the dismantling of Tibetan traditions, and the forced exile of the Dalai Lama.

Under-development as a Strategy of stifling the culture of Tibet

The literacy rate in Tibet is among the lowest in China, contrasting sharply with the rapid educational advancements in other regions. Tibetan schools are often underfunded, and the curriculum prioritizes Mandarin over the Tibetan language, reinforcing cultural erosion. This suppression of education is not an oversight but a calculated strategy by the CCP to control the Tibetan population by keeping them undereducated and less informed about their rights and the outside world.

Furthermore, the CCP's policies in Tibet suppress not only economic development but also the social and cultural identity of the Tibetan people. By limiting development, the CCP ensures that Tibet remains economically dependent on Beijing, curbing any potential for resistance. A well-developed, educated population with strong cultural ties threatens the CCP's narrative of a unified China under its rule. Thus, by maintaining low development parameters, the CCP can more easily impose its will on the Tibetan people, minimizing dissent and preserving its control over the region.

This systematic suppression of development is a deliberate attempt to weaken Tibet's ability to assert its identity and autonomy. The world must recognize this as part of the broader strategy of the CCP, which uses underdevelopment as a tool of oppression. It is crucial to bring international attention to this issue and advocate for the Tibetan people's rights to education, economic opportunities, and the preservation of their unique cultural heritage.

For decades, the Tibetan population has been subjected to severe and violent Chinese policies designed to instill fear and suppress resistance. Discriminatory practices prevent the use of local culture and language, with communities banned from mentioning the Dalai Lama's name or writings. The authorities' fear of the Dalai Lama's influence is so intense that they worry his teachings could spark a mass revolt among Tibetans. To prevent this, the state suppresses both communities and news outlets.

Over the past thirty years, hundreds of young Tibetans have self-immolated to draw attention to the oppressive nature of the Chinese regime. This has led the CCP to extend its policies beyond overt repression; the party now directs local governments to report all political activities, monitor personal communications, and profile the DNA of individuals deemed suspicious, all without accountability. These strategies raise serious questions about human rights violations undertaken by the CCP in Tibet.

The failing logic of the CCP's official response to Tibet The justification for such cruel measures often comes in the form of claims about stability, economic development, and overall progress in a volatile region. The Party's repeated human rights violations have not only attracted global scrutiny but have also hindered Chinese plans in Tibet.

The CCP's sole objective in Tibet is to reshape Tibetan history. The Party describes these tactics as part of its "strategy to achieve long-term social stability." While the official narrative is cloaked in the motive of achieving lasting peace, it is clear that Tibet is part of a larger CCP plan to dominate disputed regions.

The well-being of millions of Tibetans rests on disrupting Chinese strategies. The world should be concerned about Chinese intentions in disputed regions, as the Party will not stop at Tibet if it successfully achieves its strategic objectives there.

Modi 3.0 Faces the Dragon

Is greater economic engagement with China feasible at a time when New Delhi is moving closer to Beijing's red lines on Taiwan, Tibet and South China Sea?

In the jumble of statistics contained in the government's Economic Survey 2023-24, there was a tantalising proposition of greater economic engagement with China. The document suggested that inviting Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) from Chinese companies could help India improve its participation in international supply chains through exports. It held out two propositions: one in which we continue trading with China that results in an ever-widening trade deficit. The other is getting the optimal ratio between commerce with Beijing and Chinese investment, with the hope that India could address the trade deficit, leveraging the geopolitical trend of the West shifting away from its erstwhile partner. The Survey cited the case study of East Asian economies like South Korea and Vietnam that have received a double bonanza of the US redirecting manufacturing from China, and these nations also getting large FDI flows from Beijing. However, the government was quick to reject speculation that there was an intent to loosen Chinese capital inflows, with Union Commerce and Industries Minister Piyush Goyal stating that there was no review of India's stance on Chinese investments into the country. It has been four years that Indian and Chinese armies have been locked in a tense standoff, which has had a bearing on their larger relationship. The Indian government assesses that China's bid to repeatedly change the status quo along the border through the use of force has "violated the basis" of relations between the two nations. Foreign Minister S Jaishankar termed the India-China relationship as "abnormal". Thus, the government has pointed to the centrality of resolving the border impasse over economic and cultural engagement.

In the run-up to the 2024 Indian General Election, there seemed to be a sliver of a thaw. Amidst the electioneering, China named Xu Feihong as its new ambassador in Delhi after a long hiatus, which gave rise to speculation that there could be a resolution to the standoff. In an interview to Newsweek, Prime Minister Narendra Modi stated that there was a need to resolve the pro-longed situation along the borders.

China's foreign ministry's reaction to the prime minister's statement was that India would work with China to keep building trust. However, words have not been matched by deeds, and China has used military coercion to send a signal to India ahead of the election. Reports have surfaced that China has deployed its state-of-the-art Chengdu J-20 stealth aircraft in Tibet, and reportedly conducted military exercises near eastern Ladakh in March 2024, less than a month before the first phase of voting. When the election results showed that Modi would form a government in a coalition, strategists began to debate the contours of Modi 3.0's foreign policy, especially with respect to China. The concern was that domestic issues would consume Modi 3.0's bandwidth, leaving less space for the robust foreign policy dealings witnessed in his previous two terms. But proving naysayers wrong, S Jaishankar is back in the saddle at the foreign office, and India's resolve to combat China does not seem to have flagged. India is striding close to China's red lines on Taiwan, Tibet, and the South China Sea.

In fact, early on, Modi responded to Taiwan President Lai Ching Te's congratulatory message upon his election win and even pledged to deepen economic and technology cooperation. China, which sees Taiwan as a break-away province, saw red and urged India to adhere to its commitment towards One China. This development comes at a time when China is seeking to isolate Taiwan; soon after Lai won the election, Nauru switched diplomatic recognition to the People's Republic, cutting off ties with Taiwan. But undaunted, India-Taiwan dynamics are seeing an uptick. Under an agreement for labour mobility, the first set of Indian labourers will join the workforce in Taiwan by next year. The Tata Group and Taiwan's Power-chip Semiconductor Manufacturing Corporation's plan to set up a plant will commence production of chips by 2026. India bestowing the third-highest civilian award this year to Taiwan tech major Foxconn's Young Liu is testimony to the growing Indian-Taiwan technology cooperation.

Chinese President Xi Jinping visits a Tibetan Buddhist temple in Xining, Qinghai province, June 20, 2024

India is backing efforts by the US to put the world's focus back on Tibet by greenlighting the trip of a bipartisan US Congressional delegation to meet the Dalai Lama. The venue of the interaction was Dharamshala, which is considered to be the seat of the Tibetan government-in-exile. Dispelling doubts that this was merely an outreach by US lawmakers, the Indian foreign ministry reaffirmed support for the Tibetan religious leader, stating that he was free to conduct his spiritual activities. The Biden administration's stance on Tibet follows the US passing new legislation that directed Beijing to re-engage with the Dalai Lama and elected Tibet-an nominees to resolve the standoff over Tibet's future. The new law mandates that the US government coordinate multilateral efforts to effect a settlement on Tibet. The legislation also stipulates that the US should allocate funds for countering disinformation spread by the Communist Party of China regarding Tibetan culture, and religious institutions like the Dalai Lama.

The Indian position on Tibet has also undergone a change in the last decade. During Modi's first inauguration in 2014, the political head of the Tibetan government-in-exile was in-vided along with heads of state from South Asian nations. The Dalai Lama was hosted at the Rashtrapati Bhavan by then-President Pranab Mukherjee in 2016. India has also deployed the Special Frontier Force, a unit comprising predominantly of Tibetans, in military operations against the People's Liberation Army in 2020. For some time, there was a perception that China was waging a psychological war to get the upper hand as evidenced by its renaming places in Arunachal Pradesh, and releasing a map depicting Indian territory within its territorial limits. Now, as a response to China's map-fare strategy, Assam Chief Minister Himanta Biswa Sarma has advocated that Modi 3.0, too, rename places in Tibet. Modi 3.0 has also sought to make common cause with nations that have been at the receiving end of Chinese belligerence. India has backed the Philippines following the recent confrontation between Chinese and Filipino maritime security personnel in the South China Sea. Here, words are being fortified by deeds. India's delivery of the BrahMos missiles to the Philippines sends a signal to China that its bid to change the status quo—along the Line of Actual Control or the South China Sea—will not go unchallenged.

Delhi's strategic community has cautioned that India is ceding ground to the US on Tibet. Some commentators have advocated dialogue at the executive level with China, considering its large economy and superior military capabilities. On the contrary, India-US cooperation on Tibet can serve to keep Beijing on tenterhooks as it has been unable to completely erase the Dalai Lama's standing in the region. It stokes the Communist Party of China's anxieties of a forgotten conflict in the late 1950s waged on the roof of the world when US intelligence trained Tibetans to operate behind enemy lines. This is also being reinforced by India deploying the Special Frontier Force against the People's Liberation Army during the standoff that started in 2020. As for restarting political dialogue, interactions at the executive level froze post-Galwan in 2020. Any opening to China will be viewed by it as a sign of weakness post the electoral verdict of 2024. Between 2014 and 2019, Modi has had 18 interactions with Chinese President Xi Jinping. In 2019, Modi hosted Xi in Tamil Nadu and desired to augment economic cooperation, but even before the ink dried, India's peace moves were met with China trying to change the status quo unilaterally in Galwan, which resulted in the deaths of Indian soldiers. The question is whether Modi 3.0's treading closer to what Beijing defines as its core interests—Tibet, Taiwan, and the South China Sea—is bearing fruit. While it is too early to tell, there may be some visible strains. First, China's anxiety regarding Tibet springs from its inability to completely obliterate the Dalai Lama's influence on the region. There have been efforts by China to exert greater control on organised religion across China, particularly in Tibet. The Communist Party of China has sought to create a "politically reliable" religious class who bears affection for their nation and religion. Curiously around the Congressional delegation's tour of Dharamshala, Xi Jinping visited a Tibetan Buddhist shrine in Xining, Qinghai's provincial capital, where he reiterated his point about "creating a sense of community for the Chinese nation", and "promotion of national unity". Second, the Indian and Chinese governments are discussing ways to resolve the border standoff.

Jaishankar has met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi twice in July—most recently, at the sidelines of the East Asia Summit, and previously, at the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation summit—in which the border issue was discussed. On July 31, the 30th sitting of the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination (WMCC) on India-China Border Affairs took place with a delegation from Beijing visiting Delhi. The remit of top diplomats from both sides was to arrive at a solution to the pending friction points along the border and restore peace and tranquility. Lastly, when dealing with the Chinese, we must factor in their mindset. When asked about the impact of the French Revolution, then Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai retorted that it was too early to tell. In this way, India must avoid the affliction of short-term gains, and think long term in its ambition to take on the China challenge.

China's urban-rural gap is a threat to growth. Is the divide too wide to fix?

27 August 2024, SCMP, Yuanyue Dang

Researchers report waning optimism about social mobility among rural Chinese as education disparities create obstacles for economy

Zheng Yajun, a mainland-born PhD graduate of the University of Hong Kong, knows from personal experience how difficult it is to break through China's urban-rural divide.

Raised and educated in a remote small town in the northwestern province of Gansu, Zheng sat for the national college entrance examination twice before she was admitted to Shanghai's prestigious Fudan University in 2009.

Zheng did not find life easy at Fudan, where she struggled to understand her instructors and fellow classmates from big cities. Many of her classmates from less developed regions had a similar experience, she said.

"In my first year of university, I couldn't understand why – although I had worked hard since childhood and never wasted a day – I still looked so bad compared to other students [from big cities]," she said in a widely circulated interview last year. She managed to survive the fierce competition. After her graduation from Fudan, she expanded her master's thesis on the gap between urban and rural students at top universities in China, and her findings were published early last year. Zheng's book, which discusses class differences from a sociological perspective, is one of the most prominent of several works on similar topics published in recent years in China, sparking widespread media coverage and public debate.

These discussions all point to the same question: are class divisions and the rural-urban divide irreparable in today's China?

The Communist Party leadership is aware that if the urban-rural divide continues to widen, China's sustainable growth could be jeopardised.

At a key plenary session in 2013, party leaders pointed out that "the dual structure of urban and rural areas is the main obstacle to the integration of urban and rural development".

Six years later, at another plenum, party leadership proposed to "continue to promote the integrated development of compulsory education in urban and rural areas".

The problem was again discussed among top leaders of the Communist Party last month, when they called for actions to narrow the gap during the third plenary session of the decision-making Central Committee.

Observers said while Beijing was aware of its gravity, resolving the problem was no easy task, especially in education.

In China, all children are required to complete nine years of compulsory education, including primary and junior high school.

But scholars have pointed out that the deficiencies in China's rural education start when students are very young, and if the rural-urban divide persists, the world's second-biggest economy, which is already slumping, will face a serious human capital crisis.

Scott Rozelle, faculty co-director of the Stanford Centre on China's Economy and Institutions, said that low- and middle-income labour in rural areas "could be a major long-term obstacle to China's sustainable economic growth".

This is because a lack of skills has made it difficult for rural workers to compete in the urban labour market. "Children attending rural schools have difficulty acquiring the academic skills needed for highly skilled jobs," Rozelle said.

According to research by Rozelle, 40 to 50 per cent of rural children have delays in cognitive development, which can lead to difficulties in learning maths, science and languages.

"The average level of education of the entire workforce in China (aged 18 to 65) is slightly lower by international standards, almost entirely due to the lower level of education of the rural population. A significant proportion of rural workers do not have a high school diploma," Rozelle said.

He added that if Chinese workers find it difficult to move from low-skilled to high-skilled jobs, "it could hinder China's transition to a high-income, high-skilled economy".

Beijing announced in 2021 that it had achieved success in eliminating extreme poverty, and President Xi Jinping hailed the lifting of 850 million people out of poverty as an "unprecedented achievement" unmatched by any country in modern history.

But Rozelle said China's "policy focus needs to shift to addressing the challenges faced by hundreds of millions of low-income rural Chinese".

According to the 2021 national census, the population living in rural areas stood at 509.79 million, accounting for 36.11 per cent of China's total population.

Following the conclusion of the third plenum last month, party leaders announced an action plan for the next five years to support rural development in agriculture, housing and for migrant workers.

The plenum's decisions hinted that some policies seen as contributing to the rural-urban divide might ease, including the much-criticised household registration system, or hukou, which restricts the movement of people from rural to urban areas where a residency often means better social welfare, medical care and education for children.

Zheng Linyi, a researcher with the China Academy for Rural Development at Zhejiang University, said some measures included in the action plan would create conditions for residents to move more freely between rural and urban areas and promote the "integrated development" of cities and the countryside.

He said the income gap between urban and rural areas in China had narrowed in the past decade, but it would be more difficult to achieve the reform goal "if there are still huge gaps in public services and infrastructure because of the imbalance of urban and rural development".

Zheng said the education gap was a key manifestation of the urban-rural divide.

He added that if China's population declines in the coming decades, as most demographers have predicted, mergers of some rural schools would become inevitable, and this means more rural students would have to travel longer distances for school, creating "an increased burden on farmers".

Yuan Changgeng, an anthropologist at Yunnan University, warned that public awareness was still lacking in the discussion of the rural-urban divide.

Public discussions in recent years about the disadvantages of rural students have been dominated by “middle-class and intellectual circles”, Yuan said. “This kind of social discussion is still small-scale,” Yuan said, adding that people from small towns or rural areas do not have enough of a voice.

Settling in the city, becoming a member of the middle class and enjoying a better life are long-held aspirations of many people from less-developed regions, especially rural areas. These aspirations have been strongly supported by nearly four decades of rapid economic growth in China.

For many decades, and especially after the reform and opening process kicked off by Deng Xiaoping, Chinese society has encouraged individual endeavours, and many people believe that hard work can lead to social mobility. The highly competitive university entrance exam system, known as the gaokao, is at the heart of this belief.

But HKU’s Zheng said things have changed. For many students from less developed regions, especially rural areas, it has become increasingly difficult to enter the middle class despite individual efforts.

She interviewed 62 students from Beijing’s Tsinghua University and Shanghai’s Fudan University and found that the differences in their life choices at university and after graduation were greatly affected by their background.

Students from big cities have a better understanding of how to survive at elite universities and are able to plan their careers in advance, and it is easier for them to find an “elite” job after graduation. Students from rural areas, however, are at a disadvantage in this game.

The elite university students interviewed by Zheng are already at the top of the rural student pyramid, while the situation seems even more acute for the vast number of students at the bottom, who are largely invisible.

According to her research, rural graduates from top universities still achieved social mobility compared to their parents, but they fell behind their urban counterparts after graduation.

Yuan, who has long studied social issues in China, said the belief that success in the gaokao could lead to social mobility might have been shaken.

Yuan grew up in a county in the eastern province of Shandong. He said that when he was in high school more than 20 years ago, most of his classmates were hard-working rural students and “their efforts were rewarded compared to the living conditions of their parents’ generation”.

But Yuan said that now some of his students are convinced they will have limited achievements, reflecting social attitudes that are different from those of their parents who came of age in the 1980s, after the gaokao had been restored following the end of the Cultural Revolution and at a time when people were generally optimistic about the future.

According to Yuan, another problem was that many people “refused to question the fairness of the gaokao”.

“As long as you have a basic understanding of China’s education system, you know that it is not the final examination that determines the results, but the years of preparations,” he said, adding that the huge rural-urban divide had made these preparations “not a fair game”.

Big Data China, a collaboration between the Washington-based think tank Centre for Strategic and International Studies and Stanford University, published an analysis last month showing how Chinese people’s beliefs about personal effort and inequality had changed based on surveys conducted over the past 20 years.

Drawing on work by Rozelle and Martin Whyte, a professor emeritus of sociology at Harvard, the report found that between 2004 and 2014, respondents believed that “lack of ability”, “low education” and “lack of effort” were the three most important factors explaining poverty in China.

But by 2023, “unequal opportunity” had become the top reason respondents cited for why people were poor, while “an unfair economic system” ranked third, with only “low education” remaining in the top three. Similarly, when asked why people became rich in China, the top three factors chosen in 2009 were “ability and talent”, “hard work” and “good education”. But as of last year, the top three factors were “having good connections”, “grew up in a rich family” and “better opportunities”.

In addition, the share of people who agreed with the statement “in our country, effort is always rewarded” fell from 62 to 28 per cent over the past two decades. The researchers said while these changes were “shaped by the excessively strict policies implemented to control the spread of the Covid-19 virus over the course of 2022”, they actually echoed sentiments that had already been trending in Chinese society in previous years.

The idea of “lying flat” or tangping – doing the bare minimum to get through hard times, and doing nothing except what is absolutely necessary to survive – has become popular among young people. This means that some people have become reluctant to study hard, join the brutal competition for jobs, buy a house or start a family.

In 2021, the official censors removed much of the online discussion around lying flat after realising that the idea, if it became widespread, could affect economic development.

The Big Data China authors said the trends “point to an overall challenge for the Chinese government in the coming years, as it works to rebuild confidence in the economy’s ability to provide opportunities for all and develop a revised social contract acceptable to the populace”.

They added that if the government introduced “the right kind of policies” to promote economic growth, “it could generate a reduction in perceptions of inequity and unfairness and greater popular optimism about the future”.

India-Tibet Ties Higher Than Himalayas: Need Stronger Bond Amid Chinese Sinicization

27 August 2024, Bharat Shakti

It has often been the approach of more powerful nations to overwhelm the cultural past and historical linkages of weaker nations. The Chinese efforts to Sinicize Tibet and curtail the religious freedom of its people is an example of this. However, these efforts are bound to fail. Renaming certain places to establish Tibet’s Chinese linkages is bound to fail, as the civilizational relationship between India and Tibet disproves any false Chinese connections that Beijing would like to promote. The resilience of Tibetan culture is a testament to this. Tibet which China now calls “Xizang”, also known as the “Water Tower” of Asia and the “Roof Top of the World,” has once again become the centre of geopolitical manoeuvring between two leading powers of the world. On July 12, 2024, US President Joe Biden signed the “Resolve Tibet Act,” which means that China must peacefully resolve the Tibet-China Issue in accordance with international laws and not through subjugation. China’s claim that “Tibet has always been a part of China” has no basis whatsoever. Both spoken and written Tibetan languages have no relation with the Chinese language and are derived from the Indo-Aryan tradition. The traditional boundary between Tibet and China was demarcated by the “Peace Treaty of 1821,” which stated that the two countries should never interfere in each other’s affairs. However, everything changed when the Communist Party took over the reins of China in 1949 and annexed the “Sovereign Land of Tibet” in 1951.

Tibet’s origin is shrouded in mystery, but archaeological and historical evidence suggests it was inhabited as early as the Neolithic period, around 8000 BCE. The first recorded kingdom of Tibet was the Yarlung Dynasty, which ruled from the 5th to the 9th century CE. From the pre-modern period until the annexation of Tibet by Communist China in 1951, Tibet had a unique history and distinct culture and tradition. India significantly influenced Tibetan traditions and culture due to the deep bond Tibet shared with India as the birthplace of Buddhism. Over the past several hundred years, Tibetan monks travelled to India to study Buddhism, and Indian scholars and teachers travelled to Tibet to spread their teachings.

This exchange of knowledge and ideas helped shape Tibetan culture and played a key role in the growth of Tibetan Buddhism.

During a series of exchanges, the Northern Indian States signed several treaties with the Tibetan Rulers to facilitate trade and the movement of scholars across the Himalayan ranges. The first treaty of friendship, known as the “Tibet – Bushahr Treaty”, was signed in 1674 between Raja Kehri Singh of Bushahr (Himachal Pradesh) and the Gaden Phodrang government of Tibet. This treaty ensured no taxes were imposed on Tibetan and Bushahri merchants and established trade in Tibetan towns such as Purang, Ruthog, Dawa, Tsaparang, and Gartok. Subsequently, another treaty was signed in 1684 called the “Treaty of Tingmosgang” between Ladakh and the Tibetan government under the regency of Desi Sangye Gyatso.

Another treaty of friendship that Tibet made with Ladakh was the “Treaty of Chushul” after the Dogra-Tibetan War of 1841-42. Raja Gulab Singh of the Sikh Empire sent his general Zorawar Singh to conquer Tibet’s western Ngari region in order to control the trade routes into Ladakh. Zorawar Singh reached Minsar but was later killed in action. His tomb remains at Minsar.

Subsequently, an agreement known as the “Agreement of 1852 between Ladakh and Tibet” was signed by the Garpons (provisional governors) of the Gaden Phodrang Government of Tibet, with Thanadar Sahib Bastiram representing the Maharaja of Kashmir. It’s important to note that all agreements were signed by representatives of India and Tibet, with China not being involved. The borders that India and Tibet shared remained peaceful for centuries until China occupied Tibet.

India and Tibet have deep cultural, religious, and historical connections. For Hindus, Tibet is a sacred land where they can cultivate higher spiritual consciousness. The regions of Burang and Minsar are considered the territory of Kuber (God of wealth) and the treasurer of Devtas (Gods).

Many important Vedic cultural sites, such as Mansarovar Lake and Kailash Parvat (Mount Kailash), as well as many other religious sites, are located there. Mount Kailash is one of the most sacred mountains and has become an important pilgrim site for four faiths: Buddhists, Jains, Hindus, and the Tibetan religion of Bon.

Burang County is in Tibet and shares a border with Uttarakhand state in India. This border is significant as it serves as a key entry point for Buddhist, Hindu, and Jain pilgrims travelling to the sacred sites of Lake Manasarovar and Mount Kailash.

These religious sites hold great importance for their respective followers. The region surrounding Burang originates from major rivers such as the Indus, Ganges, Yarlung Tsangpo/Brahmaputra, and Karnali/Ghaghra. In historical context, General Zorawar Singh captured Burang and Zanda County to establish a land border with the Kingdom of Nepal during the Dogra-Tibetan War.

On the journey from Burang to Mount Kailash, there is a holy Jain shrine named Ashtapad ("eight steps"). It is located in Darchen village, just opposite Mount Kailash, and serves as the starting point for any pilgrimage in the region. Ashtapad holds great religious significance for Hindus as it is believed to be the abode of Lord Shiva.

Jains also hold this mountain in reverence as it is considered to be the place where Rishabhadev, the Tirthankara of Jainism, attained nirvana.

The final destination of this pilgrimage is the sacred Kailash Parvat, also referenced in the Tibetan-English dictionary. The mountain is known as Gang Rinpoche in Tibetan, meaning 'precious one', and in Chinese, it is called Gang ren bo qi feng (冈仁波齐峰).

Mount Kailash is near Manasarovar and Rakshastal lakes and is revered in Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism, and Bon religions. People from India, Nepal, Tibet, China, and other countries embark on pilgrimages to the mountain.

The village of Minsar, also known as Moincer, is in Gar County, just south of Kailash and west of Manasarovar. Minsar was under the governance of Ladakh for 160 years and later under the Sikh Empire. Even after India gained control, Minsar continued to send revenue.

In 1947, when India gained independence, the village of Minsar was considered part of India. Despite being surrounded by Tibetan territories, the inhabitants of Minsar had historically paid taxes to the Kingdom of Ladakh and later to the State of Jammu and Kashmir (J&K) for centuries.

The last official to visit the region was Rigzen Ghagil Kalon, a special officer of the Government of J&K, who visited the village in 1950. His report was then forwarded to the Government of India in New Delhi. During the India-China Boundary talks, the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) report in 1960 also demanded India's claim over Minsar.

Despite Chinese efforts to "Sinicize Tibet" and restrict religious freedom in the region, Buddhism continues to grow in China. The historical ties between India and Tibet are deep and intertwined, particularly through the Nalanda-Lhasa connection of past centuries.

Despite 74 years of harsh occupation by the Han Chinese and the Communist Party of China, Buddhism is flourishing in Tibet, with Sanskrit-based sutras being chanted across the India-Tibetan plateau.

India does not need to rename places in Tibet to emphasize its historical relationship, which is often described as 'Higher than the Himalayas.' This connection is echoed in daily mantras in the highlands and temples. It's imperative for India to assert and strengthen its historical ties and ancient traditions with Tibet to solidify its bonds with the region.

China's quest to replace 'Tibet' with 'Xizang' is destined to fail

26 August 2024, Tribune India

THE term 'South Tibet' frequently pops up in Indian media, uncritically disseminating misinformation from Chinese news outlets. A recent report claimed that China has renamed 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh, which Beijing asserts are part of 'South Tibet'. In common parlance, Tibetans may refer to the eastern, western, central or northeastern regions of Tibet, but there is no term 'South Tibet' as a geographic proper noun in the Tibetan lexicon – a fact easily verified by consulting any Tibetan dictionary or encyclopaedia. This term is an entirely new Chinese construct.

Beijing truly deserves recognition for its exceptional mastery in the politics of names. Their prowess in manipulating names – whether of people, places or concepts – as strategic political tools to assert power, control narratives, shape identities and influence public perception is a masterclass in propaganda.

A classic example of China's dominance in shaping the narrative on the Sino-Tibetan conflict is evident from their definition of 'Tibet' itself. The 'Tibet' referred to by China is geographically distinct from the Tibet that exists in the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people. The People's Republic of China, established in 1949, considers only the 'Tibet Autonomous Region' (TAR), created in 1965, as Tibet — an ancient nation with a rich history spanning thousands of years! Traditionally, Tibet consisted of three regions: U-tsang, Kham and Amdo. When Tibetans speak of 'Tibet', they mean all three regions, encompassing approximately 2.5 million square km.

In line with the classic colonial divide-and-rule policy, the so-called TAR includes only U-tsang and parts of Kham, with the remaining areas fragmented as autonomous prefectures and counties, and incorporated into the neighbouring Chinese provinces of Qinghai, Sichuan, Yunnan and Gansu. Qinghai, for example, is composed entirely of the traditional Amdo and parts of Kham.

The composition of the current democratically elected leadership of the exile Tibetan polity highlights the stark incongruity of China's definition of Tibet. For example, both the current and former Sikyong (President) of the Central Tibetan Administration belong to areas outside the so-called TAR. The current Sikyong, Penpa Tsering, belongs to Amdo Chentsa, now part of Qinghai province, while former Sikyong Lobsang Sangay belongs to Kham Lithang, which is currently within Sichuan province.

In previous Sino-Tibetan talks, a key demand from the Tibetan side was the establishment of a single autonomous Tibetan administration encompassing all Tibetan autonomous areas. This is crucial for the genuine implementation of China's constitutional provisions regarding national regional autonomy.

Between 2002 and 2010, nine rounds of formal talks took place between representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Chinese Government.

Beijing, however, rejected our entire proposal, including our request for a single Tibetan administrative unit. They claimed that the proposed autonomous region would be too large and that Tibetans have historically never been governed under a single administration. This claim is a clear distortion of historical facts. I quote an excerpt from a speech by former Kalon Tripa, Prof Samdhong Rinpoche: "Tibetans were under one administration until the mid-ninth century. Later, Tibetans were again re-integrated into one administration in 1260 under Drogon Choegyal Phakpa. This was offered to him by emperor Kublai Khan and this offering explicitly refers to the three Cholkas with a clear demarcation of its borders. Such unified administration remained until the 1730s." China further distorted the definition of 'Tibet' by introducing the notion of 'Greater Tibet'. While Tibetans, like people from any other nation, proudly refer to their homeland as great, Beijing has very deftly rephrased this as 'Greater Tibet'. This is a vicious distortion of Tibetan territorial identity. For Tibetans, there is no concept of 'Greater' and 'Smaller' Tibet; there is simply Tibet, as understood in our collective consciousness.

Beijing has now gone a step too far by attempting to supplant the term 'Tibet' with 'Xizang'. It is important to note that Beijing's definition of even 'Xizang' differed both before and after the invasion of Tibet in 1949-50.

In ancient times, such as in the Sino-Tibetan treaty of 821-822, the terms 'Great Tibet' and 'Great China' were used. Before 1949, the Republic of China employed the terms 'Inner Tibet' and 'Outer Tibet' to differentiate regions within Tibet, similar to the use of 'Inner Mongolia' and 'Outer Mongolia' for Mongolia. 'Inner Tibet' referred to the areas under Chinese control at that time, while 'Outer Tibet' denoted independent Tibet. These terms also appeared in the Simla Convention (1913-14), which involved Great Britain, China and Tibet. China's gradual military conquest of eastern territories of Tibet was swiftly followed by the renaming of the newly annexed places. For example, Ziling was renamed Xining, Dhartsedo became Kanding, Bathang (my homeland) was changed to Ba an, and Chamdo was renamed Changdu. China then developed and promoted its own narrative, claiming that only the territories under the effective control of the Government of Tibet at that time constituted Xizang. They believe that by renaming places annexed through military conquests and forging new identities and historical narratives, they can gradually root out and erase the deep, centuries-old bond between the people of these areas and historic Tibet. The current reality, however, is quite the opposite. Since the disintegration of the mighty Tibetan Empire in the ninth century and the eventual inception of the Dalai Lama's Gaden Phodrang Government in Tibet in 1642, what is ubiquitous across the Tibetan plateau today is a strong, deep sense of common territorial and national identity.

Beijing's quest to replace 'Tibet' with 'Xizang' is, therefore, destined to fail. If history is any guide, the imposition of Chinese identity through the distortion of historical and cultural narratives will only further alienate the Tibetan people and strengthen their sense of distinct national identity.

How to secure the China front

25 August 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Lt Gen
Harinder Singh (Retd)

A view of the mountains in the eastern part of Ladakh, 3 km from the Line of actual Control between India and China, on 1 August 2024. ANI India will have to make it clear to China that it opposes any unilateral military action. Any Chinese attempt to alter the status quo will be met with stiff resistance, and if necessary, with counter action.

China's growing military might and its assertive posture along the Himalayas pose a tough challenge to India. It is incumbent upon India to craft a border guarding strategy that not only safeguards its rightful territorial claims, but deters China from undertaking any unilateral military action. Until a mutually acceptable boundary solution is found, India has no option but to build its capacity to deter China from altering the status quo.

Building India's capacity would imply acquiring and deploying assets for strategic intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance (ISR), augmenting border infrastructure and troop habitat, fielding the right mix of weapon-platforms, creating an asymmetric edge, stockpiling strategic reserves of war material and restructuring the current force to provide high levels of military readiness and response action. But deterring the Chinese military is not simply a matter of restructuring, equipping and reorienting the border guarding force; it is also about signalling a strong military intent and willingness to use force.

The more powerful an adversary, the more important and difficult it is to deter the adversary. India will have to make it clear to China that it opposes any unilateral military action. Any Chinese attempt to alter the status quo will be met with stiff resistance, and if necessary, with counter action. India will also have to assure China that it does not seek any territorial aggrandisement. Improvements in border infrastructure are India's legitimate needs, and should not be construed as inimical to Chinese interests. So, how does India demonstrate its military resolve to deter China, without exacerbating an unintended escalation, are among the issues that befuddle policymakers and practitioners.

TERRITORIALITY AND CONFLICT

Two scholars, Paul D. Senese and John A. Vasquez, in their book, The Steps to War, explain how wars arise from a series of steps that states take to deal with real or imagined grievances that bedevil their relationship. One such factor is territory and disputes arising out of it. When states are unable to draw a compromise in a territorial dispute and disagreements persist, they tend to resort to the use of force. If such disputes recur and militarise over time, they lead to a deep sense of rivalry that becomes very hard-line and prone to war. Understandably, India's festering territorial disputes with China have acquired such a military character.

As the likelihood to give up respective territorial claims diminishes over time, the probability of using force will only increase. This could lead to inadvertent military escalation. In this context, two aspects are important: First, the role and salience of territorial contiguity in increasing the probability of war. Second, whether the presence of a border dispute is real or imagined, how do the two states handle their disputes is significant in bringing about or averting war. Hence, it is not territory per se, but territorial contiguity and lack of geographical clarity that explain the occurrence of border disputes and the probability of war.

Our border disagreements and disputes with China are borne out of this territorial contiguity. Complicated and intricate colonial treaties, unclear boundary lines, imprecise border tri-junctions, illegality of ceded territory and manning difficulties in unreachable sectors of super high-altitude—all add up to a contentious border. This lack of clear border demarcation has bred intense mutual suspicion, and in turn grievances over control of territory. The recurring nature of these disputes indicates the acuity of prevailing mistrust. Once an escalatory threshold is crossed, the probability to miscalculate increases and it can trigger a wider military escalation. The question then is, how China and India will manage such risks of territorial contiguity, in absence of its geographical clarity, so that recurring disputes do not escalate into war.

Broadly speaking, the presence of norms and mechanisms to manage disputes can give a set of actors' ways and means for handling disputes, without an inadvertent escalation. While four such agreements and protocols (1993, 1996, 2005 and 2013) exist, and they lay out a set of norms and protocols, these are not adequate to address the current nature of border disagreements. These protocols have worked well until the late 2010s, but post that, with frequent stone-walling from the other side, there has been a marked decline in their effectiveness to mutually defuse border tensions. A reset in the norms and protocols is therefore necessary in the Sino-Indian context.

RITUALISING BORDER-CONTACT

During the Cold War, the US and Soviet Union demonstrated that ritualisation of the mutual relationship could help dampen prospects for war. The probability of war tends to increase if territorial disputes militarise and recur, but one can expect the likelihood of war to reduce if the handling of disputes is ritualised. When there are no mutually accepted norms or mechanisms to handle border disputes, military escalation becomes strident. Even if norms and protocols do exist, but these are not very precise, the parties to the dispute tend to exploit the loopholes. Therefore, how disputes are handled holds the key to ushering in peace and tranquillity, not merely the presence of norms or protocols.

There can be only two ways of handling disputes. Either by use of force, or by demonstrating restraint. The tendency to over-compensate for perceived threats, by way of military build-up and arms-racing can increase the risk of war. Furthermore, militarised border disputes tend to generate domestic narratives that pre-disposes governments to pursue hard-line policies. However, if states were to resolve their disputes through restraint and dialogue, they can expect long periods of peace and prosperity. In other words, the policy practices of a state act as a dampener or cause of war.

The ritualisation of border-contact can help avert inadvertent escalation. The ongoing military-level talks in Eastern Ladakh must be seen in this light. Besides managing the disputes at hand, these talks assist in resolving other minor infractions arising out of routine border-contact. It would make eminent sense if these high-level talks are extended to other sectors. The need to ritualise contact also highlights the necessity to increase existing channels of military communication, in terms of additional border hotlines, alternate media connectivity for fail-safe communications and border meeting points. These act as useful tools and mechanisms to avoid or manage inadvertent escalation.

POLICY CHOICES

While much political and military capital is being expended on managing the current border disputes, there is little effort spent on addressing the long-term risks of territorial contiguity. A political settlement alone can help build durable peace. Once the borders are settled, other disagreements arising out of an absent boundary would cease to exist. However, China might not have any incentives to seek an early resolution to the boundary question. In that case, as an interim measure, stabilisation of the borders, by re- visiting the existing border agreements and protocols, could be pursued.

A few aspects are important. First, a new agreement, which comprehensively addresses the current infirmities in existing border agreements and protocols, is the need of the hour. A comprehensive one-piece peace and tranquillity agreement would avert the need to connect the dots over four different agreements (1993, 1996, 2005 and 2013) to interpret the field-level responses in a crisis situation. At the tactical level, this is a critical requirement for better understanding and response action.

Second, an all-inclusive border agreement can help draw clarity on a few extant clauses that are misleading and contentious. For instance, Article-II under BPTA 1993, which lays out the principle of mutual and equal security, is woefully vague and prone to conflicting interpretations. A few other clauses pertaining to use of certain category of armaments and weapon platforms, or permissible force levels in a sector, or modalities that guide mutual reduction of forces remain obscure and unclear.

And third, a revised agreement could help address the current gaps and new nuances in border management. For instance, heightened risk-taking behaviour of troops, skirmish-prone stand-offs, use of intrusive or disruptive technologies such as drones, sonic booms, dazzlers and tazers, provocative deployment of large- calibre area weapons in the forward zone, or coordinated separation of entangled forces, all of which impact border management at the tactical level. In the wider context, it might also be prudent to consider the principles that might guide a future border settlement. And how we can draw clarity and consensus on it. The answers to these questions would require resumption of a political dialogue with China, to re-build trust and confidence. China with its political structure has an edge. India would have to work hard to build domestic consensus, lest our internal contradictions limit own options to negotiate. Many experts might argue that making peace would signal weakness and invite renewed Chinese aggression. On the contrary, this approach might afford us the time and opportunity to bridge the power gap and, in turn, the material resources to strengthen our efforts to build a credible military deterrent.

China-Xizang Himalayan Forum: The cynical 'sinicisation' of Tibet

25 August 2024, Deccan Herald, Srikanth Kondapalli

The delegates invited, the agenda unveiled, and the larger context, indicate China's efforts to convert Tibet (renamed recently as Xizang) into the fulcrum of sub- regional initiatives as well as to expand China's influence in the neighbourhood.

With a forum for the trans-Himalayan region – the 'China-Xizang Himalayan Forum' – Beijing is firstly sending a signal of consolidating and dominating the "roof of the world" in a post-Dalai Lama scenario, secondly encircling India in a multi-dimensional way by following one of its 36 ancient stratagems of "hexiao kongda" (cooperate with the small to counter the big) by providing incentives to South Asian countries to cumulatively exert pressure on New Delhi, and thirdly, obfuscating the impending environmental disaster through its modernisation efforts.

Pointedly, the China-Xizang Himalayan Forum was initiated at Nyingchi prefecture in Tibet, opposite Arunachal Pradesh, in 2018. Its fourth meeting was held in early July this year. The delegates invited, the agenda unveiled, and the larger context, indicate China's efforts to convert Tibet (renamed recently as Xizang) into the fulcrum of sub-regional initiatives as well as to expand China's influence in the neighbourhood.

The first forum meeting in September 2018 was attended by representatives from Nepal, Pakistan and other countries, with the agenda focused on economy and tourism. The next three meetings had a focus on environmental issues, one of the weakest issues for China in view of its exploitation of Tibet's resources. At the third meeting last October, China's Foreign Minister Wang Yi made five points, some of them repetitive, some even contradictory to the current Chinese practice in Tibet. Wang called for upholding mutual respect and mutual trust and building a "trans-Himalaya region into a family of solidarity". He also called for building an "ecological civilisation" and a "trans-Himalaya region of green development and cooperation", as well as for regional integration through connectivity and enhancing people-to-people exchange.

The fourth meeting, also held at Lulang town of Nyingchi prefecture on July 5 this year, was attended by nearly 20 countries, including representatives from Nepal, Myanmar, Mongolia, Bhutan, Afghanistan, and Pakistan but also countries like Sri Lanka, Chile, Bolivia, and South Korea. The inclusion of countries not connected in any way to the Himalayas suggests that China is trying to drum up support for its policies in Tibet.

While China entered Tibet in 1951 through military intervention, in recent times, it has intensified not only its control but also its "modernisation" efforts. In August 2020, a few months after the Galwan border incident with India, the decisive Tibet Forum Meeting, attended by the Communist Party's politburo members, including President Xi Jinping, declared the goal of ushering in "sinicisation of Tibet" – meaning, to intensify the long ongoing effort to strip Tibet of its own characteristics and identity and infuse Han Chinese body and soul into it.

Subsequently, Xi visited Nyingchi prefecture in July 2021 to oversee the progress in infrastructure projects, such as the $5.8 billion Sichuan-Tibet railway line. His visit to Tibet was also to convey a message of resolve to fully integrate the region into China.

As a result, over a period of time, 7.5 million Han Chinese have come into Tibet, drastically altering the demographics of the region and making Tibetans a minority in their own land. China introduced "strike hard" policies of repression and banned the Dalai Lama's photos or any activity seen as "splittism". Beijing has sought to take control of the Dalai Lama's succession by insisting on a "golden urn" process to select the next Dalai Lama. It has also passed the Land Border Law and built 628 "well-off society" villages across Tibet's borders with the rest of South Asia. These "well-off society" military/paramilitary "watch posts" are expected to consolidate China's control over the peripheral areas of Tibet and adjoining regions in South Asia. In the event of any political uncertainty in the region, these are expected to trigger military consolidation efforts by China.

China's modernisation drive saw a flurry of infrastructure projects in Tibet, with the current 14th Five-Year Plan allocating $22 billion in funding for railways, roads, energy pipelines, fibre optics, telecommunications, hydro-electricity dams, and reconstituting Tibetan nomads into ghettos for effective surveillance and control.

While the infrastructure projects attracted an estimated 55 million domestic and foreign tourists to Tibet last year, the world's "third pole" is under stress due to China's economic policies. China began exploiting 100 minerals in Tibet, as well as diverting water and electricity from it to the rest of China. As a result, Tibetan glaciers have melted over 15% in the past decades, threatening the fragile environment. However, China wants to convince the participants in the China-Xizang Trans-Himalayan Forum that all is well with the Tibetan ecology.

By including countries like Pakistan, Afghanistan, Nepal, Bhutan and Myanmar in such meetings, China is trying to counter India. To counter China's intrusions, India needs to comprehensively review its policies, build an international Buddhist circuit in Arunachal Pradesh, promote eco-tourism in the region, and prepare for Trans-Himalayan turbulence in the coming years.

Diaries of Mao's secretary at the center of a legal battle over the history of modern China

25 August 2024, NBC News

The diaries of a top Chinese official and prominent critic of Beijing are at the center of a U.S. legal battle, raising questions about who will write the history of modern China.

Li Rui, who died in 2019 at the age of 101, held a number of important positions within the ruling Chinese Communist Party, including personal secretary to longtime leader Mao Zedong. In detailed handwritten diaries he kept from 1946 to 2018, Li recorded his experiences and observations during seven tumultuous decades of Communist Party rule – a version of events that might conflict with the official party line.

As a high-ranking official, Li was an authoritative witness to parts of history that the party would rather not highlight – from internal disputes and policy missteps to the deadly Tiananmen Square crackdown — because they challenge its narrative of uninterrupted prosperity and political unity as China rose from a poor and isolated nation to become the world's second-largest economy.

A trial that began in California on Monday will decide whether Li's diaries should remain at Stanford University's Hoover Institution, where his daughter donated them, or be returned to his elderly widow, who has been accused of acting as a front for Chinese authorities who would most likely censor them.

"We've never had something like this before," said Joseph Torigian, a research fellow at the Hoover Institution.

"These are diaries and personal papers that run to dozens and dozens of boxes that talk about everything from the early years of the revolution to Li Rui's work as a secretary to very powerful individuals, including Chairman Mao."

Few top Chinese Communist Party officials have kept such detailed diaries, especially after the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s and 1970s, when they were used as evidence for political persecution.

"It is very hard to study the People's Republic of China because it is an authoritarian regime that believes that different narratives about its past are very dangerous for regime security, which means that they run a tight ship," said Torigian, who is also an assistant professor at the School of International Service at American University.

In his diary, Chinese official Li Rui referred to the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown as "Black Weekend." Hoover Institution Stanford says Li had directed his daughter, Li Nanyang, to donate the materials to the Hoover Institution, which is known for its large archive of historical materials on modern China, for fear they might otherwise be destroyed by Chinese authorities as part of a crackdown on dissent he saw growing worse under President Xi Jinping.

Li Nanyang, a vocal critic of the Chinese Communist Party who lives in the United States, carried most of the diaries out of China in 2017. She made the donation to the Hoover Institution official days before her father's death in 2019, once she felt he was safe from possible reprisal.

Shortly after that, Li's second wife, Zhang Yuzhen, sued for the return of the original diaries, which she says are rightfully hers. Her lawyers argue that they contain deeply personal information about her relationship with Li, and that the violation of her privacy has caused her emotional distress.

A Beijing court found in favor of Zhang, a ruling Stanford says cannot be enforced because it was denied the opportunity to appear in court and defend itself. The university has sued Zhang in California in return.

Lawyers for both sides say their claims are buttressed by comments Li made in his diaries and in interviews about what he wanted to happen to his writings and who should represent him.

But given that Zhang is now in her 90s, questions have been raised about whether the lawsuit was her idea. "She will not be capable of making money or contributing money for a lawsuit or to pursue the return of the diary," said Feng Chongyi, an associate professor of China studies at the University of Technology Sydney, who met regularly with Li.

Only the Chinese Communist Party, he said, has "the resources, the money and the political will to do that." Zhang's lawyers have said that she is acting alone. The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Friday.

Feng and others worry that Chinese authorities would severely restrict access to any diaries by Li, a longtime critic of the party's leaders and policies, whose writings were banned in China in 2006.

Li joined the Chinese Communist Party in 1937 at the age of 20, rising through the ranks as it defeated the existing government in a civil war to gain power in 1949. By 1958, Li had become Mao's personal secretary.

But he was expelled from the party the following year over his criticism of the Great Leap Forward, an industrialization program championed by Mao that led an estimated 30 million to 40 million people to die of starvation in three years. During his 20 years in exile, Li was imprisoned in a labor camp and spent eight years in solitary confinement.

He was reinstated to the senior party ranks in 1979, three years after Mao died. In the 1980s, Li worked in the party's powerful Organization Department, which is responsible for the appointment and promotion of high-ranking officials.

Li was also highly critical of the Chinese government's deadly crackdown on pro-democracy protests in 1989. From the balcony of his apartment in Beijing, he could see soldiers firing on protesters in and around Tiananmen Square in what he described in English as "Black Weekend."

His diaries, Torigian said, reveal "his thinking as well as a lot of other very senior revolutionary elders during that crisis," public discussion of which is suppressed in China.

In his later years, Li was a leader of a group of pro-reform elder intellectuals in Beijing, "and there are details about his interactions with that circle as well," Torigian said.

"So the breadth and the detail are really something that are quite unprecedented for the study of politics and the Chinese Communist Party," he said.

Though the Hoover Institution has scanned copies of the diaries, archivists and historians say it's important to retain the original materials as well, both for research purposes and to reinforce the authenticity of the scans.

"The Communist Party of China has a history of altering materials in order to fit what it wants the version of history to be," said Perry Link, a Sinologist and emeritus professor of East Asian studies at Princeton who testified at the trial last week.

If scholars publish research based on the Hoover copies but the originals are in Beijing, "the government in China can say, 'No, your conclusions are wrong, you worked from the wrong materials. We have the originals, and that's not what they say,'" said Link, who is also a professor at the University of California, Riverside.

With the originals in their possession, party elites could release them selectively to support their preferred narratives "and might even change what's in the diaries," he said. "They've done this before."

The Dalai Lama Divides China And The US

24 August 2024, Patheos, Alice H. Murray

China and the US don't only disagree on trade, Taiwan, and use of the South China Sea. There's also the issue of the successor to Tibet's Dalai Lama. The elderly religious leader's recent presence in the US for medical treatment has provided reason for more tension between the two superpowers. One thing everything can agree on is that the Dalai Lama divides China and the US.

Who Is The Dalai Lama?

The current Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, is the 89-year-old spiritual leader of Tibet, an area which embraces Tibetan Buddhism. He is the 14th Dalai Lama in a line stretching back to the late 1300s. Tibetan Buddhists believe the Dalai Lama is the manifestation of the Bodhisattva (one who works to lead all beings to the state of enlightenment) of Compassion and the patron saint of Tibet.

Prior to 1951, Tibet had a theocratic form of government of which the Dalai Lama was the head. He also served as supreme religious leader. Communist forces began occupying the country in 1950, and in 1959 China annexed Tibet. After an unsuccessful revolt by Tibetans against Chinese rule, the Dalai Lama fled to India in 1959. He has remained there in exile for many years.

Work During Exile

After arriving in India, the Dalai Lama set up a government-in-exile in the Himalayan Mountains there. He stepped down as the head of the Tibetan government-in-exile in 2011.

While in India, the Dalai Lama has pursued a nonviolent campaign to end Chinese domination of Tibet. He is seeking real autonomy for Tibet with protections provided for its religion, language and culture. The Dalai Lama's work led to his being awarded the 1989 Nobel Peace Prize. This religious leader has become one of the most recognizable and highly respected individuals in the world. Nevertheless, China views the Dalai Lama as a dangerous separatist seeking independence for Tibet, a claim the Dalai Lama has denied.

About Tibet

Tibet, known as the "rooftop of the world," sits on a vast area of mountains and plateaus in Central Asia. This area includes the world's highest mountain, Mount Everest. Historically an autonomous region of China, as of 2020 Tibet provided a home to more than 3.5 million people over 471,700 square miles.

Because Tibet sits on a high plateau surrounded by enormous mountain masses, the country was relatively isolated prior to 1950. It had its own language and religion, Tibetan Buddhism.

Interference By China

In 1950 China began to incorporate Tibet into the People's Republic of China. This action was highly controversial in both Tibet and worldwide, and the issue remains highly charged even today. Tibetans deemed China's move as an invasion of their sovereign country which continues as occupation by a foreign power. Although it is officially an autonomous region of China, in reality, China's Communist Party strictly controls Tibet.

In particular, Communist party leaders in Beijing want to control the selection of the successor Dalai Lama. They insist the succession process must comply with Chinese law. The current Dalai Lama had suggested he could name his successor rather than relying on the traditional means of selecting the individual deemed his reincarnation. The Chinese government rejected his suggestion. This impasse raises the fear rival Dalai Lamas could result—one approved by Beijing and another supported by the current Dalai Lama and his Tibetan followers.

US Support For The Dalai Lama

In June US officials met with the Dalai Lama in India. They conveyed the message that the US did not intend to allow the choice of his successor to be influenced by China. Going even further, the Americans indicated their country would pressure China to begin talks again with Tibetan leaders, a process that has been stalled since 2010.

The Dalai Lama's time in the US this summer has increased tensions between China and the US. The spiritual leader came to New York for knee replacement surgery conducted on June 28th. Following that surgery, he spent time recuperating in upstate New York for six weeks. This past Wednesday, senior US officials met with the Dalai Lama in a show of support for him and to bring greetings from Pres. Biden. Additionally, they expressed staunch support for the Tibetan community. Dalai Lama Divides China And The US China, anxious about the religious leader's successor, reacted angrily to news of this meeting. It lodged serious protests with the American government, noting the Dalai Lama was "a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion." US officials face attempting to strike a balance between managing already tense relations with China and showing support for a religious leader and Nobel Peace Prize winner respected worldwide. Clearly, the Dalai Lama divides China and the US, but it is only one facet of the two countries strained relationship.

Whether the divide between China and the US over the Dalai Lama can be bridged is questionable. China wants one process and the US-backed current Dalai Lama desires another to determine his successor. But with an 89-year-old religious leader, the issue will have to be addressed sooner rather than later. Given the Dalai Lama's Nobel Peace Prize, hopefully he will adhere to his track record of advocating for nonviolent change and find a way to keep the peace between all involved.

Taiwan and China must negotiate a new political agreement to avoid war

24 August 2024, East Asia Forum, Philip Hou

Efforts to fortify Taiwan against decapitation assaults and amphibious invasions can only do so much to prevent conflict with China in the long run.

Taipei and Beijing have pushed political boundaries closer to their respective red lines. To prevent conflict, Taiwan and China need to negotiate a new mutually acceptable political framework that clarifies, strengthens and respects each other's red lines and political concerns.

Taiwan can reassure China's concerns about 'independence' by formally recognising relations as region-to-region, government-to-government, non-state-to-state or a combination thereof. Unlike the 1992 Consensus, such frameworks shift the emphasis from sovereignty disagreements toward defining cross-strait relations while preserving the assumptions of 'One Country' included in the 1992 Consensus.

In return, China should recognise domestic pressure in Taiwan against such political agreements by acknowledging cross-strait relations as a non-hierarchical relationship between two equal political entities. China could also recognise and reassure the autonomy of Taiwan's democratically elected government to govern the 'Taiwan region' and participate in international organisations.

Under such a political framework, Taiwan can still assert that it is an independent, sovereign country. China would also maintain space to express its commitment to peaceful reunification.

Taiwan's Lai administration has faced criticism from the opposition party, Kuomintang (KMT), over its ambiguous position on cross-strait relations. Facing domestic pressure, Lai's administration could be more open to new cross-strait political frameworks. While Beijing demands the 1992 Consensus as a prerequisite, it could be receptive to renegotiating an agreement that implicitly recognises the consensus. Current US policy responding to rising cross-strait tensions and China's military build-up has centred around the 'porcupine strategy' of arming Taiwan to deter invasion. While stronger US-Taiwan defence capabilities may affect China's calculus, relying solely on military means for a political problem would be misguided.

It is a long-standing US policy to support 'cross-strait dialogue' and the status quo. Obligations to ensure Taiwan has sufficient defence capabilities do not relieve the United States of its responsibility to support the peaceful settlement of conflict between Taiwan and China. The United States should actively encourage cross-strait dialogue and oppose unilateral changes to the status quo.

Defence-oriented policies place Taiwan under a state of chronic pressure. A war over Taiwan would upend global security through the militarisation of the Asia Pacific, regardless of whether China succeeds or is defeated.

If China successfully 'unifies' Taiwan, neighbouring countries and the United States may engage in a rapid military build-up, form a treaty alliance system similar to NATO, pursue total economic decoupling and allow for regional nuclear arms proliferation. China could also face armed insurgency and an uncooperative population.

If Taiwan and the United States repel a Chinese invasion, China could resort to launching long-term, around-the-clock airstrikes against Taiwan and US military assets. A war in the Taiwan Strait is unequivocally a no-win situation.

The military dimension of conflict between Taiwan and China is only peripheral to the underpinning political drivers and is a tool for achieving political objectives. From China's perspective, Taiwan's 'reunification' is an essential milestone for party legitimacy and continued rule. China's enduring view that Taiwan is an inseparable part of its territory compels the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to maintain recognition of the 'One China Principle' and prevent official Taiwan independence.

Taiwan, governed by the Republic of China (ROC) government, views the People's Republic of China (PRC) as a threat to its autonomy. Taiwan, under the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), has asserted the ROC as a sovereign independent country, non-subordinate to the PRC.

China cut off contact with Taiwan under former president Tsai Ing-wen's administration due to the DPP's rejection of the 1992 Consensus. Under the 1992 Consensus, the KMT and CCP agreed that both Taiwan and mainland China belong to 'China' while refraining from delineating China's sovereignty as belonging to either the PRC or ROC. Both Taipei and Beijing considered the status of their relations as region-to-region rather than country-to-country.

This agreement addressed China's top concern of preventing official Taiwan independence. Yet, the consensus neglected Taiwan's core interest of maintaining its autonomy.

Under the DPP, Taiwan has blurred its position on the nature of relations with the PRC. Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te has refused to accept the 1992 Consensus under the premise that recognising the consensus equates to accepting China's 'One Country Two Systems' model for unification.

Taiwan, under the DPP, has also pushed for greater recognition of its autonomy. Taiwan has asserted that the PRC has never ruled Taiwan and that the ROC and PRC are not subordinate to each other. China perceives these assertions as Taiwan salami-slicing towards independence because these stances avoid specifying Taiwan's relationship with 'China'.

Peace and stability in the Taiwan Strait are in the strategic interest of Taiwan, China and the United States. Yet, with the collapse of trust, an arms race seems like the safest bet to secure national security and achieve political agendas.

Taiwan and China are trapped in an illusion that military power alone will prevent encroachment on their red lines and secure their political goals. The United States also mistakenly believes that defeating an invasion of Taiwan guarantees a foreign policy triumph. Before marching toward catastrophe, Taipei and Beijing should attempt strategic negotiations.

The Rise, Decline, and Possible Resurrection of China's Confucius Institutes

24 August 2024, The Diplomat

CIs grew rapidly in the early years, thanks to a favorable geopolitical environment toward China. Can they rebrand and rise again under very different circumstances? This year marks the 20th anniversary of the Confucius Institute – established by the Chinese government to promote the Chinese language, culture, and a positive image of China globally. Confucius Institutes rapidly expanded to more than 500 centers across 160 countries in little over a decade, becoming a central component of China's international language and culture promotion (ILCP) strategy.

Yet their development has not been unchallenged. Over the past decade, Confucius Institutes have faced setbacks, most notably in the United States, where at least 100 have closed. These closures led to a major overhaul of the management structure of Confucius Institutes in June 2020, when the Chinese International Education Foundation (CIEF) was established as the effective brand holder, while the former headquarters was dissolved and replaced by the Centre for Language Education and Cooperation (CLEC). These changes marked a shift toward decentralization.

The initial rapid growth of Confucius Institutes was attributable to the favorable geopolitical environment toward China during the early years of the initiative. Under President Hu Jintao, China adopted a diplomatic philosophy of "tao guang yang hui" (hiding capabilities and keeping a low profile), emphasizing soft power as a means for its peaceful rise.

Confucius Institutes were intended as a bridge to reinforce friendship and cooperation between China and the world, with the project benefiting from substantial financial and human resources provided by the Chinese government. Its joint venture model – which involved partnerships between Chinese universities and host universities – allowed Confucius Institutes to be integrated within local academic institutions, utilizing their existing facilities and resources while attracting substantial funding from China. This model facilitated the rapid establishment of Confucius Institutes, particularly in Western countries, where China sought to improve relations and foster cooperation despite differing political ideologies.

Internationally, the rise of China and its growing influence created a demand for knowledge about China and the Chinese language. This was particularly evident in the United States in the early 2000s, when the two countries enjoyed relatively good relations. The rapid expansion of Confucius Institutes was widely seen as a reflection of China's growing soft power during this period, with the initiative providing an avenue for promoting Chinese culture and language and offering institutions a chance to partner with Chinese universities.

Partly because of this dramatic expansion, however, Confucius Institutes faced increasing scrutiny and criticism, particularly in the U.S. Some critics argued that the project served as a tool for Chinese propaganda, raising concerns over academic freedom and the potential for political influence. This occurred as China's rise had begun to shift the power balance between China and the West, resulting in an increasingly hardline approach toward China in Washington.

Under the Obama administration (2009-2017), the U.S. strategic "pivot" to Asia aimed at balancing against or containing China, and marked the beginning of a more critical stance toward Confucius Institutes. In 2012, for example, a U.S. Department of State directive led to the temporary expulsion of Chinese teachers in Confucius Institutes over visa issues, signaling growing unease within the administration about Confucius Institutes in U.S. universities.

Under the Trump administration (2017-2021), this scrutiny dramatically intensified, resulting in a wave of Confucius Institute closures across the United States. The mechanism that the Trump administration used to shut down Confucius Institutes was principally the threat of withdrawal of federal funding from universities. For example, a Confucius Institute's former oversight committee member at one U.S. university explained to the authors how the passing of an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) in 2019 forced U.S. universities to make a choice between substantial federal funding and China's smaller Confucius Institute funding.

The committee member explained that in order to receive U.S. federal funding, "the University would need a waiver to prove that no federal funding would support Chinese language instruction, but this was challenging because funding is often fungible." The committee member added, "Government grants typically cover the overhead of entire university. Separating the funding to ensure that none of it benefited the CI [Confucius Institute] posed difficulties."

The committee member further explained how "there was no established process for waivers, which could take years to resolve. Consequently, [funding agencies] decided to stop accepting grant applications from any institutions with a CI until new procedures were established."

The outcome was often the closure of the Confucius Institute. The committee member stated, "... Considering the University's significant stake in such grants, compared with the much smaller Chinese funding for the CI, this price was deemed too high. Therefore, the committee agreed to close down the CI. Even though the focus seemed limited to the language itself, the objective was to ultimately shut down the CIs."

Under the Biden administration, similar policies on Confucius Institutes have continued to be enforced, including under the NDAA (2021), the Innovation and Competition Act (2021), and the Confucius Act (2021). Clearly, for higher education institutions in the United States that hosted a Confucius Institute, closing the institute was often an easier solution than lengthy rule-checking or applying for waivers. Following on from the U.S. lead, countries such as Australia, Germany, India, Japan, and the U.K. have all launched reviews or imposed pressure on Confucius Institutes. Meanwhile, Confucius Institutes in the developing world, India aside, have continued to develop robustly during the period of China's rise. In response to the growing challenge to Confucius Institutes, particularly in the United States, China has undertaken a major overhaul of its ILCP strategy since mid-2020, signaling a shift toward decentralization in three aspects.

Administratively, the CIEF, the CLEC, and other similar initiatives such as ChinesePlus and the China Center for International People-to-People Exchange (CCPIPE), have been established to share the former responsibilities of the Confucius Institute headquarters.

Politically, there has been an effort to disassociate the new management system of the Confucius Institute from the Chinese central government, resulting in the diminished official political status of the new ILCP initiatives. Financially, compared to the centralized fiscal role assigned to the former Confucius Institute headquarters in China's previous ILCP strategy, at least five decentralized sources of funding for revamped Confucius Institutes can be identified: the CIEF, a Chinese partner, a local partner, the CLEC, and income from individual Confucius Institutes.

The outcome of this new strategy, however, remains uncertain. It has, so far, not significantly altered critics' perception of Confucius Institutes. It has also caused confusion and resistance within the Confucius Institute administrative system, while additionally complicating funding arrangements and casting doubts on the funding capability of the CIEF.

While decentralization may have reduced the scrutiny and criticism previously directed at Confucius Institutes, it has not fully resolved the broader issues of trust and suspicion that have emerged between China and the West, particularly in the United States. The evolving story of Confucius Institutes from a positive global symbol of China's soft power to a contested initiative highlights the challenges of promoting cultural diplomacy in a complex, ever-changing, and sometimes hostile international environment. The future success of the Confucius Institute and China's revised ILCP strategy will depend on broader geopolitical dynamics and the ability of China to rebuild trust and cooperation with the United States.

In this sense, the decades-long involvement with China by Democratic vice-presidential candidate Tim Walz – since he taught in China in the late 1980s – raises the possibility that the outlook could still alter somewhat. A victory for the Harris-Walz campaign in the U.S. election in November might begin to change the China narrative in ways that could help in the rebuilding of the United States' more than 100 lost Confucius Institutes.

The Future of Leadership: What Lies Ahead for the Senior Military Leadership in the Chinese Army?

23 August 2024, Politics DZ

Over the past twenty years, only a handful of studies have examined the leadership of the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA). These studies typically covered only specific sectors of leadership, and most were completed before the structural reform of the PLA that began at the end of 2015. In this context, the Institute for National Strategic Studies published a report in September 2022 by Joel Wuthnow, a senior fellow at the U.S. National Defense University, titled "The Gray Dragon: Assessing Senior Military Leadership in China." The report provides a comprehensive assessment of the senior leadership of the PLA in 2021, analyzing more than 300 biographies of senior Chinese military officers from 2015 to 2021 to evaluate the structure, demographic composition, career patterns of PLA leadership, as well as their political qualifications and promotion determinants. Ultimately, the report assesses China's military effectiveness and the future of leadership within the army.

Army Structure

The report focuses on the structure of senior leadership within the PLA and analyzes the major changes that have occurred under the structural reforms implemented by Chinese President Xi Jinping in 2015, as follows:

Presence of Elite Officers in Senior Leadership:

According to the report, the senior leadership of the PLA consists of the top 100 to 200 officers in the army, who sit at the peak of an officer corps made up of hundreds of thousands. The number of senior leaders in 2021 was approximately 155 officers.

They are similar in importance to the three- and four-star officers in the United States, according to the report. Clear Division of Specialties in Senior Leadership: The report notes that before reaching senior leadership, these officers systematically progress through lower ranks. Upon commissioning, they are categorized into five specialties: military affairs, political affairs, logistics, equipment, and technical specialists.

Periodic Structural Reforms in the Army:

According to the report, the senior leadership was not immune to the structural reforms undertaken by President Xi within the army. In 2015, the number of senior leaders was 182 officers, but by 2021, the number had decreased to 155. This 13% decrease aligns with the overall reduction in army personnel during the same period from 2.3 million to 2 million individuals. The reductions in leadership also included the Central Military Commission itself; when Xi became chairman of the commission in 2012, it included 10 officers, but after the 19th Party Congress in October 2017, this number dropped to six officers. According to the report, the cornerstone of the PLA reforms under Xi was the development of a joint command structure in which theater commanders have peacetime authority over land, naval, and air forces. This model was better aligned with the army's focus on preparing for high-intensity joint operations compared to the pre-reform system, where military region commanders lacked peacetime operational control over non-military units. The Chinese military has also expanded joint training in recent years, allowing officers to hone their planning and command skills in a "realistic combat" environment.

Dominance of Air and Naval Forces in Positions:

The report highlights that the share of ground force officers in senior positions has decreased by more than 20% under recent structural reforms, after having dominated most key positions in general departments and military regions. This shift favors the development of the Chinese military's future operations in the maritime and aerial domains. The biggest winner from these reforms, according to the report, was the "Rocket Force," which saw its share double (from 4% to 8%). Additionally, naval and air force officers became military theater commanders for the first time in 2017.

Increase in Leadership at Military Service Headquarters:

According to the report, the share of officers appointed to service headquarters doubled from 16% to 32%. This reflects the creation of new military headquarters, such as the Strategic Support Force (SSF) and the Joint Logistics Support Force (JLSF). Under the new system, officers appointed to army, navy, and air force headquarters are primarily responsible for building forces in terms of training and equipping them. The report suggests that having a larger share of senior officers in service headquarters may have implications for competition among upper echelons in the future.

Leadership Characteristics

According to the report, the group of senior military leaders in 2021 has formative and professional experiences different from their predecessors, but they are demographically similar, as follows:

Possession of Similar Professional Experiences: The report indicates that the current leadership was the first to join the PLA during the “Reform and Opening-Up” era (1979 to the present). Their careers were shaped by the changing military strategy of China before and after the end of the Cold War. Most began their careers preparing for a large-scale conflict against the Soviet Union, which was China’s main adversary in the late Cold War. These officers were also in service during the 1980s, when the Chinese military engaged in significant military cooperation with the United States. However, they also witnessed the deterioration in Sino-U.S. relations after the Tiananmen Square protests in 1989.

Similar Ages Among Senior Leaders: Only 18 out of 155 senior officers in 2021 joined the military during the era of President Mao (1949–1976); they are now in their mid-sixties to early seventies and will soon retire. Most senior officers joined in the late 1970s and early 1980s, with the youngest joining in the mid-1980s. According to the report, Chinese military officers rotate every two to three years and are exposed, to some extent, to different responsibilities, but less so than in the U.S. system, where four-star officers typically change positions every 18 months or so.

Similar Gender and Ethnic Composition: The report states that male Han Chinese dominate the senior leadership of the PLA. There were no women among the senior military officers in 2015 or 2021. The military also follows preferential policies against ethnic minorities, though it has sometimes appointed Uyghur and Tibetan officers to senior levels in the Xinjiang and Tibet military regions, according to the report.

Limited International Experience: According to the report, senior Chinese military leaders often move across the country but have limited international experience, aside from what they may have gained through military diplomacy on short tours earlier in their careers. The report also suggests that there may be limited awareness of other functional skills; for example, operational commanders tend not to have backgrounds in logistics or acquisition.

Promotion Determinants

All PLA officers must be in good standing with the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), but candidates for promotion to the highest ranks are subject to further scrutiny due to the sensitivity of their positions. Below are the key qualifications and determinants for promotion in the Chinese military:

Loyalty to the Chinese President: Senior leaders need to possess political acumen; they must have not only social capital but also successfully navigate elite internal struggles. Some have already been purged in anti-corruption campaigns that Xi used to remove political opponents after taking power. The report emphasizes that those who survived the purges were those who avoided association with Xi’s rivals and were also careful to show loyalty to him by supporting his agenda for military reform.

Competence and Diverse Experiences: There is a misconception that senior PLA officers are disproportionately selected from the Nanjing Military Region, where Xi Jinping served from 1985 to 2007. It is also known as the “cradle of generals” due to its importance in preparing for the anticipated Taiwan conflict. However, only about a third of the senior leaders in 2015 had served in the Nanjing Military Region in the past decade. Instead of favoring officers with a specific geographical background, Xi focuses on high performers and ensuring that leadership includes a diverse range of experiences.

In conclusion, the report suggests that the stringent duties within the PLA and the extreme centralization of decision-making may reduce China’s effectiveness in future conflicts, especially those requiring a high level of cooperation and adaptability, such as the war Russia waged against Ukraine in 2022. This is particularly true if Chinese military leaders lack the ability to think in new ways beyond their service and specialty.

Therefore, there are signs of change in the senior leadership, most notably by providing emerging leaders with greater experiences and giving the new generations the opportunity to participate in senior leadership. This could create a future generation that is quick to grasp modern operations and technology. The report also suggests that producing a completely different type of senior PLA officer would require changes in service traditions and organizational culture, which has proven to be difficult even for the United States after more than three decades of the Defense Reorganization Act passed on October 4, 1986.

Claude Arpi | China’s ‘salami’ warfare big danger to Himalayas Columnists

23 August 2024, Deccan Chronicle, Claude Arpi

The planet is being churned; and wherever one looks, one sees natural and unnatural (mostly man-made) disasters. It is not only the multiple landslides that occurred in six villages of Wayanad district of Kerala on July 30, but the entire Himalayan belt is disturbed. In Wayanad, heavy rains triggered the collapse of hillsides, resulting in torrents of mud, water and boulders cascading down into the valley. Similarly in the Himalayas, particularly in Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand or Arunachal Pradesh, tragic incidents such as these are taking place.

In most of the cases, wild development activities have resulted in these mishaps. For example, in Himachal Pradesh, some environmental activists told the Down To Earth magazine that "most incidents of natural disasters that occurred in Himachal Pradesh during the last one year happened around some power (dams) or national highway project". In Uttarakhand, wild construction, not taking into account the capacity of the mountains to sustain new roads, new hotels and millions of tourists, has been one of the factors triggering one tragedy after another.

One basic fact has been forgotten: that mountains are fragile. Flying over the Himalayan range, one has the impression that the snow-covered ranges and high peaks are massive and seemingly-impenetrable mountains; however, on the ground, the Himalayas are in grave danger. For millennia the Himalayan passes have been criss-crossed by adventurers, pilgrims, traders, monks or holy men looking for a mythic paradise upon earth, or simply good business; however, through all that time the environment was not disturbed.

Another factor has to be taken into consideration is the militarisation of the Himalayan range, and for this India cannot be held responsible. The finger must be pointed clearly at our northern neighbour. For centuries, life went on as usual, but in 1950 the troops of China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) marched into Tibet. The military balance of the peaceful plateau as well as the ecological equilibrium quickly started to change.

Another factor has to be taken into consideration is the militarisation of the Himalayan range, and for this India cannot be held responsible. The finger must be pointed clearly at our northern neighbour. For centuries, life went on as usual, but in 1950 the troops of China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) marched into Tibet. The military balance of the peaceful plateau as well as the ecological equilibrium quickly started to change.

During the following years, thousands of Tibetans managed to escape their colonised land and take refuge to India; it included the Dalai Lama, Tibet's religious and temporal leader, who arrived in India in 1959. Then came October 1962, when Chinese troops attacked India on the Himalayan slopes; from the arid Ladakh region in the west to the dense forests in the north-west, the PLA marched into Indian territory. The conflict was short, just one month, but violent. More than 60 years after the event, it is still deeply engraved in the Indian psyche. It had incalculable consequences for the mountains and though the passes were closed, trade and pilgrimage routes stopped and communications were cut between northern India and the Tibetan plateau. India now had a bully instead of a friend as a neighbour. At the beginning, very few worried about the environment and even less about climate change. But the Chinese occupation slowly started to have disastrous consequences for the Himalayan ecology. Today, it is not only India who is under threat of the Chinese "salami tactics" (taking over a few kilometres of territory at a time). On August 23, 2023, China released a new "standard map". The map included Taiwan and parts of the maritime zones of the Philippines, Vietnam, Brunei, Indonesia, and Malaysia. It added the tenth dash to its existing nine-dash line claim in the South China Sea... and of course Arunachal Pradesh and the Aksai Chin area. Interestingly, the map included the small Bolshoy Ussuriysky island, though in 2005, Russia and China had agreed that the island would be split in half and the border would run in its centre. On May 17, 2024, the South China Morning Post in an opinion piece said that "China must act fast to reclaim 'lost territories' from Russia". A hundred years ago, a treaty between the then USSR and China had abolished the so-called Czarist unequal treaties, it noted, and said: "Now, with Russian President Vladimir Putin bogged down in the Ukraine war, it may be the best time for Beijing." Another recent example of Chinese aggressiveness, from August 2 to 4, some Japanese fighter planes had to scramble to cope with an intrusion into Japanese airspace over the Sea of Okhotsk, the Sea of Japan, the East China Sea and the Pacific Ocean. Examples could be multiplied. India, like several other countries, has no alternative but to defend itself. As a result, the Himalayas have become one of the most militarised regions in the world. Despite several bilateral agreements between India and China, in May 2020, China started practicing "salami" slicing in five different areas of Ladakh, the high plateau in north-western India. Why open new fronts in that arid mountain desert? Many believe that one general, in search of promotion, had suggested some "small" operation to President Xi Jinping. These few kilometres here and there would give strategic depth to the PLA. India reacted swiftly, at the cost of spending four winters at 15,000 feet, often with temperatures at minus 40 degrees Celsius. Each army has today between 60,000 and 70,000 troops posted at the Line of Actual Control (LAC). China and India then began to frenetically develop the infrastructure on their respective sides. The immediate collateral damage was to the environment; this is compounded by climate change and wild tourism development. On July 25, India's external affairs minister S. Jaishankar met China's foreign minister

Wang Yi. Mr Jaishankar underlined the need for “full respect” of the LAC; ultimately, both sides agreed on giving “strong guidance for disengagement”. It is, however, doubtful that it will translate in troops reduction on the ground. The degradation of the Himalayan environment is obviously due to several other factors too, but the militarisation triggered by China’s hegemonic tendencies has brought incalculable harm to the fragile eco-system. A solution had been proposed by the Dalai Lama in 1989 in his Five-Point Peace Plan: the whole of Tibet, including the eastern provinces of Kham and Amdo, should be transformed into a zone of “Ahimsa”, meaning a state of peace and non-violence. Unfortunately, this dream seems much more distant today than 35 years ago; when the Dalai Lama had explained: “The establishment of a peace zone in Tibet would require the withdrawal of Chinese troops and military installations from the country, which would enable India also to withdraw troops and military installations from the Himalayan regions bordering Tibet.” A “Zone of Ahimsa” would be a great boon for the Himalayan environment, but for the time being, it may remain a dream.

The Climate Crisis in Tibet: The Dalai Lama’s Warning

22 August 2024, National Interest

Earlier this year, at the ninth International Conference of Tibet Support Groups (TSGs) held in Brussels, the Dalai Lama addressed 140 representatives from 40 countries. His speech highlighted Tibet’s environmental concerns as a global problem. This is not the first time the revered Tibetan leader has tackled the issues of climate change and the effects of ecological degradation due to wanton human activities.

Over the years, be it his speech at the “Endangered Tibet” conference in 1996 or his remarks at the 2021 United Nations Climate Change Conference (COP26), to name a few, the Dalai Lama has not only cautioned about the global ramifications of “ecological neglect” in the “Third Pole” of the Himalayas and Tibetan Plateau but also emphasized the importance of the “spirit of solidarity and cooperation” to counter transnational challenges. But if the world at large has thus far remained relatively unmindful of the Buddhist leader’s words, what is the relevance of the Dalai Lama’s climate advocacy today? First, there is a direct correlation between his teachings on the interdependence of species on each other and nature and the impact of human-driven environmental changes, including severe water shortages.

Second, the significance of the Dalai Lama’s advocacy for climate action is related to China’s repression of the Tibetan people and culture. This repression, in part, takes the form of accelerating Tibet’s climate crisis through myriad infrastructure developments (from mega-dams to over-mining). In this context, the Dalai Lama has not shied away from calling out China for not only neglecting the ecological devastation in the Tibetan Plateau but actively participating in the overexploitation of natural resources “without proper environmental safeguards.”

The third reason is the current highly divided political landscape where the democratic states, and not just in the West, are increasingly recognizing the imperative of countering China’s militaristic aims, including in Tibet. China’s financial and diplomatic support of several authoritarian regimes like Russia, North Korea, and Iran have also created greater concerns about the dangers to the liberal order. Thus, today, there is potential for greater receptivity of Tibetan concerns than ever.

What is the extent of Chinese activities on the Tibetan and Himalayan ecology? What specific measures must the West and partners like India take to address the ecological balance in the Himalayas?

The Climate Crisis in the Third Pole

The Tibetan Plateau and its surrounding mountainous areas are commonly considered the “Third Pole” because they are home to the largest reservoir of glaciers and ice sheets on earth after the Arctic and Antarctica polar regions. In effect, several major rivers such as the Mekong, Salween, Yellow, Yangtze, Yarlung Tsampo (Brahmaputra in India), Indus, Irrawaddy, Ganges, Sutlej, and Karnali fountain from the Plateau. Thus, it serves as the “Water Tower of Asia,” providing fresh water and vital sources of livelihood to billions of people not just in Tibet but across South and Southeast Asia.

Moreover, the Plateau is not only one of the most biodiverse regions in the world but also rich in minerals, including rare earth reserves. Additionally, it is surrounded by four biodiversity hotspots—biologically diverse but threatened areas—namely the Himalayas, Mountains of Southwest China, Mountains of Central Asia, and Indo Burma. These hotspots are not immune to the repercussions of climate change, including glacial melting and extreme weather events like flash floods. This is exacerbated by increased human activities—from unbridled infrastructure development to increased hostilities in the Himalayas. In such a scenario, it is time that the world and its leaders champion an ethical approach to climate-change solutions, including proper and widespread dissemination of information among the general populace, something the Dalai Lama has always underscored. However, the challenges are far from over. The rise in decibel levels from the U.S.-China great power competition and Russia's Ukraine invasion means that the Chinese will stake a claim over Tibetan resources more aggressively than ever. China's Infrastructure Spree: Unlikely to Slow Down? China has been systematically undertaking infrastructure development in Tibet and Xinjiang over the last twenty years. This has had devastating results for the fragile Himalayan ecology, and lowland areas have witnessed increased flooding. The intensive infrastructure buildup has led to habitat fragmentation and increased air and noise pollution. In 2006, after the Golmud-Lhasa railway line became operational, there was a massive boom in mining operations on the Tibetan plateau. Mining exploration revealed that there were deposits of over 110 types of minerals across 3,000 sites, with a value of more than $125 billion. This included large deposits of copper, chromium, gold, and lithium, as well as oil and gas reserves. The heightened mining activity led to protests by Tibetan nomads, citing poisoned drinking water and the deaths of herd animals. Moreover, there are reports of the forced resettlement of Tibetan nomads to make way for mining and hydropower projects. Between 2021 and 2025, China has planned to spend approximately $30 billion on infrastructure projects in Tibet under the Fourteenth Five-Year Plan: "By 2025, the total mileage of highways in Tibet will exceed 120,000 km, and that of expressways will exceed 1,300 km." This development plan includes roads, railways, airfields, border villages, telecommunication facilities, and hydroelectric projects. Moreover, China's construction of hydroelectric projects on the river Yarlung Tsangpo (Brahmaputra) in the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR), such as the sixty-gigawatt mega-dam, is concerning for downstream states like India and Bangladesh. It will impinge on the availability of water in downstream nations and create opportunities for coercion and conflict. It is important to note that in Chinese president Xi Jinping's security-obsessed worldview, water is not a global common but a source of leverage to solidify regional domination. As a result, the vision of a Sino-centric order as a "community with a shared future for mankind" is hogwash intended to mislead the international community from investigating China's repressive policies in Tibet (and elsewhere) that have accelerated climate change via increased mining of valuable minerals, building "dual-use" infrastructure, and "whole-village" relocation of Tibetan nomads, who are essential to maintaining the ecosystem of the plateau.

The consequence of all this activity is the rapid degradation of delicate environs and habitats, such as wetlands, alpine meadows, and forests. Several endangered species, including the snow leopard and Tibetan antelope, which reside here, are thus further vulnerable. Not only is wildlife threatened, but a recent study indicated that if the prevailing temperature trends continued, the Himalayan glaciers might disappear entirely, "having a significant impact on regional water supplies, hydrological processes, ecosystem services, and transboundary water sharing." Studies show the Tibetan Plateau is warming three times faster than other parts of the world, leading to retreating glaciers. Thus, the international community needs to act fast not only to counter China's policies but also to spur climate action.

India & the West Must Join Forces

Clearly, Europe and the West must include the Himalayan region in their environmental strategies since the climate crisis in the Third Pole will soon escalate into a global emergency. Concurrently, China's recent militarization efforts in the Tibetan Plateau that have transformed villages into resettlement zones, including dual-use infrastructure such as helipads, highways, oil pipelines, road and rail networks, and dams, must be countered together. India faces even more onerous direct challenges due to its Himalayan territory coming under threat from climate change. In addition, India's decades-long border dispute with China and the risks associated with China's growing eco-hegemony, including unrestricted access to Tibet's critical water resources, are also no less a threat.

Against this scenario, the fast-changing conditions at the Third Pole have not received much attention compared to the northern and southern polar ice caps. Often, the mainstream media, in particular, has focused excessively on the disputed borders rather than the region's environment, which is relevant to global well-being. This needs to change, and a concerted approach to increase public awareness should be one of the main targets.

More importantly, reliable, informed, up-to-date scientific knowledge is essential to tackle this crisis. That being said, Europe and the West must collaborate with India and other "like-minded" nations to develop scientific programs for environmental and climate change monitoring, including both ground-based and satellite-based monitoring.

Moreover, as the partnerships within the still-emerging U.S.-led Indo-Pacific economic and security architecture continue to take shape, it is important to include the Himalayan climate and geopolitical concerns into the mix. Naturally, bilateral, minilateral, and multilateral cooperation that earnestly works at climate change solutions is all equally vital.

In this regard, the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue (Quad)'s Climate Change Adaptation and Mitigation Package (Q-CHAMP) is a welcome initiative. While it recognizes the need for "integrating resilience" into policies from investments to governance, the Quad must look into including the Third Pole specifically in this ambit. Similarly, the G7's push to address the tripartite crisis of climate change, biodiversity loss, and pollution is admirable.

As the group of 198 countries that have ratified the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change get ready to meet for the COP29 held in Baku later this year, new frameworks and partnerships will be needed to scale up climate cooperation, particularly for the three polar regions. This is all the more pertinent as the COP29 Presidency's plan is based on two mutually reinforcing parallel pillars. The first is to get all parties to commit via national action plans, and the second is to ensure the availability of finance to enable action, thereby reducing emissions, adjusting societies to the effects of climate change, and addressing damages. COP29 must integrate the mountain region's challenges into the negotiation tracks.

Hopefully, the debates this year will focus beyond energy transition and into the ways to control extensive damage caused by human actions and greed for more resources and power, particularly in politically and ecologically sensitive regions like the Tibetan Plateau. The international community, including decision-makers and the private and public sectors, needs to be involved in regional cooperation ventures in the Himalayas to ensure accountability, maintain transparency, and take responsibility.

Last but not least, the world's leaders will do well to remember what the Dalai Lama cautioned nearly thirty years ago about developing a "greater sense of universal responsibility" for global well-being and solving environmental problems—words to live by.

The international community needs to hold China to account for its environmental degradation of the critical Tibetan Plateau.

Realism, strategic interests should dictate India-China ties

21 August 2024, Tribune India

A realistic assessment of the current state of India-China relations is necessary amid the apparent orchestrated pleas urging India to ease travel and import restrictions on Chinese personnel and goods. Since its military adventure in Ladakh in April 2020, Beijing has consistently sought normalisation of relations, especially economic, setting aside the situation on the border. Over the past couple of months, various business sectors, reinforced by arguments advanced by some economists and media reports, have echoed China's demands.

There is a negligible prospect of an improvement in India-China relations in the near future. The absence of communication for over four years at the highest level and China's recent protest against economic assistance to projects in Arunachal Pradesh and other border regions – on the specious pretext that they are disputed – are brazen examples. On the contrary, they point to China expanding the areas of pressure on India.

The bilateral relationship has been subjected to considerable strain ever since Beijing decided that it will attempt to forcibly take the territories it claims and compel India to acquiesce to China being the leading power in the region. China has simultaneously redoubled efforts to establish dominance over Asia. These developments have coincided with the view in the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) leadership that India has drawn uncomfortably close to the US. Additionally, Beijing sees India as adopting a tougher, unyielding stance, which includes building defences along the border as well as initiating steps to close off the burgeoning Indian market to China. Beijing views these as unwelcome steps, but considers that India does not yet pose a serious challenge. The situation on the border has also not changed; 60,000-70,000 troops remain deployed on the front lines. The Chinese have built additional accommodation to billet reinforcements and new advanced weaponry and military units continue to be inducted. Border defence infrastructure is being built at a frenetic pace with plans to build 35 military or dual-use airports and major arterial railways and roads along the border in Tibet. Chinese President Xi Jinping's attitude towards India, signalled on the opening day of the 20th Party Congress in October 2022, with the screening of a video of the fateful Galwan clash of June 2020, has not altered.

In a cosmetic attempt to show that China wants to improve ties but it's India that is playing spoilsport, Beijing claimed that it had sent Ambassador Xu Feihong, who arrived in India almost 20 months after his predecessor Sun Weidong departed, to enhance communication and improve bilateral ties. This has been echoed by many Indian journalists, academics and others. Since his arrival, Xu Feihong has virtually been holding court, meeting Indian politicians, former diplomats, businessmen and others. China is keen on maintaining commercial and economic access to India's market but has no intention of taking substantive steps to ease tensions on the border. At the same time, it is determined to keep India under protracted and sustained pressure. There are other signs of China's attitude and intentions. Xi has not initiated direct contact or meeting with Prime Minister Modi since April 2020, or even observed basic diplomatic niceties and congratulated him on his re-election. Chinese Premier Li Qiang did send a routine message of congratulations, but only after Modi's swearing-in. China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs explained that it would have been 'premature' to convey greetings prior to the swearing-in. There was, however, no such hesitation in inviting Indonesia's President-elect on an official visit prior to his swearing-in! Whether this presages an effort to restrict China-India interaction at the level of the Chinese Premier is to be seen.

Xi also skipped the G-20 Summit and Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) meetings. A senior CCP cadre had divulged a couple of months prior to the G20 Summit that Xi would not attend the event and it would, therefore, be a failure. However, Xi's absence ensured there would be no distractions, the G20 communique was unanimously approved, and, importantly, India brought the Global South within the G20 fold.

Another instance was China's prickly objection to Taiwan President Lai Ching-te's congratulations to Prime Minister Modi.

China's real attitude towards India is now more clear. The Chinese foreign ministry's remark on July 10 that "South Tibet is China's territory," and India's development activities in the area are "illegal and invalid" underscore its approach on border issues. The same day, Foreign Minister Wang Yi, who is also China's Special Representative for border talks, congratulated Ajit Doval on his reappointment as National Security Adviser and Special Representative observing he is ready to "properly handle" issues related to the situation on the ground in border areas. The use of the phrase "properly handle" indicates that discussions would be in accordance with China's stated position on the border since April 2020.

Beijing's attitude towards India will undoubtedly colour its position on border and other negotiations. It will explore additional avenues for applying pressure on India, including through international financial organisations. India needs to take cognisance of this while examining proposals by Beijing and also consider whether to give China a free pass on issues like human rights, Tibet, Xinjiang, etc. Beijing will, meanwhile, continue to activate Indian businessmen and others to exert pressure on the government to facilitate the inflow of Chinese personnel and goods. Any travel and trade concessions would be at the cost of the public exchequer, further increasing the galloping trade deficit and with long-term deleterious effects severely undermining the 'Make in India' initiative.

China isn't mocking India as usual. It's praising Modi's Russia-West balancing act instead

21 August 2024, The Print, Sana Hashmi

One Chinese commentator suggested Modi's visit coincides with a period of Ukrainian passivity, potentially allowing India to make the most of the situation.

When Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi visited Russia in July 2024, it sparked extensive discussion in China regarding India's strategic positioning between the United States and Russia. Chinese commentators were divided; some expressed frustration over what they saw as the West's perceived leniency towards India, while others admired Modi's adept balancing act. As Modi prepares for a landmark visit to Ukraine later this week, these debates are resurfacing with renewed intensity.

Modi's visits to Poland and Ukraine mark significant milestones. The trip to Poland is the first by an Indian Prime Minister in 45 years, underscoring India's growing engagement with Europe and its intent to bolster bilateral relations and extend its influence in the region. More notably, Modi's visit to Ukraine will be the first by an Indian Prime Minister since the establishment of diplomatic ties between New Delhi and Kyiv in 1993. It's another sign of India's careful strategy of balancing its ties with both Russia and Ukraine amid the ongoing conflict.

It reinforces India's commitment to a diplomatic solution to the conflict and positions the country as a potential mediator. Modi was the only world leader to condemn Russia's attack on a civilian hospital—by stating that "loss of life leads to despair, especially when children are killed"—in front of Russian President Vladimir Putin. Now, he's set to visit Ukraine. Modi's actions are aligned with his prior assertion that 'this is not an era of war', a perspective also echoed in the G20 communique. It reflects India's broader objective of fostering peace and stability. At the same time, China, which brokered a peace deal between Iran and Saudi Arabia, positions itself as a global peace broker. It's why China is closely observing India's visit and its potential role as a mediator in the conflict.

Will Modi bring lasting peace?

Chinese reactions to Modi's visit to Ukraine reflect a range of perspectives. Many commentators agree that lasting peace in the region will ultimately depend on direct negotiations between Russia and Ukraine, and view Modi's visit as part of India's broader effort to facilitate this process.

One analysis provided three key reasons for Modi's Ukraine visit. First, it suggests that Modi's visit aligns with a utilitarian approach to diplomacy: while Russia offers valuable resources and technology to India, the West provides markets and investment opportunities. Thus, Modi's trip can be seen as part of a strategic effort to balance these interests.

Second, by engaging directly with Ukraine and trying to mediate the conflict, Modi aims to bolster his image as a prominent global leader, enhancing India's stature on the world stage.

Third, the visit is viewed through the lens of competition with China. The commentary highlighted that India's desire to match China's diplomatic moves is evident, especially following Beijing's recent invitation to Ukrainian Foreign Minister Dmytro Kuleba. Modi's visit, announced shortly after Kuleba's departure from China on 26 July, seems strategically timed to capitalise on this competitive dynamic.

Another perspective highlights the significance of Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelenskyy's meeting with Modi in the broader context of regional peace efforts. Ukraine has been actively seeking support from countries in the so-called Global South, including India. Despite these efforts, India, along with several other nations, did not sign a joint statement at the Ukraine peace summit in Switzerland in June, reflecting differing strategic interests.

But as one commentator pointed out Ukraine views India through a commercial lens as well: state-owned enterprise Zorya-Mashproekt has been negotiating with Indian enterprises for joint production of gas turbines. Additionally, discussions are ongoing regarding the production of aircraft and aircraft engines in India.

Yet another commentator suggested Modi's visit coincides with a period of Ukrainian passivity, potentially allowing India to make the most of the situation. They note that recent Ukrainian losses in Kursk have weakened Kyiv's military capacity, making Modi's visit strategically timed. With the possibility of a Donald Trump re-election in the US limiting Kyiv's conflict sustainability, New Delhi might find new opportunities to augment its influence.

Less mockery, more appreciation

On Chinese social media, particularly Weibo, there is a range of narratives. One user suggested that Modi's visit to Ukraine is damage control, following his controversial trip to Russia. Another user noted Modi's seemingly favourable reputation, observing that his visit to Ukraine follows closely after his visit to Russia. Some commentators have supported Modi's policy on Russia, arguing that purchasing Russian oil does not necessarily equate supporting Russia's actions. A commentator argued that if global energy production had not increased and Russian oil and gas had been removed from the market, energy prices would have surged, leading to higher transportation costs, global price increases, and potential shortages in poorer nations. The commentator contended that the best approach is to keep Russian energy resources in the market, while preventing it from directly funding the war. Europe and the US have imposed a price cap on Russian crude oil rather than excluding it, allowing oil once sold to India to be redirected to Europe and maintaining stability in the international energy market.

Overall, discussions in Chinese media and social media about Modi's visit to Ukraine and India's potential role in mediating the conflict reflect a shift from the usual mockery India faces. There is considerable appreciation for Modi's adept handling of India's relations with the West and Russia—an area where China has faced challenges. Modi's recent visits to Russia, and now Poland and Ukraine highlight India's strategic agility in an ever-complex geopolitical landscape.

Bhutan: A Frontier Against China's Expansion in the Himalayan Region

20 August 2024, Japan Forward, Dr. Monika Chansoria

Beijing's policy toward Bhutan is limited for now, but history shows why the latter remains wary of China's ultimate strategic aims in the Himalayan region.

China's geostrategic bid to exert influence in South Asia finds Bhutan as its last standing border barrier apart from India. Clashed between India and China, this landlocked mountain kingdom was long isolated by frosty Himalayan peaks. It is known for its geographical, cultural, and religious proximity to Tibet.

China has held no relations with Bhutan since 1947. Historians and analysts attributing this to the 1910 treaty between British India and Bhutan and the 1949 treaty between India and Bhutan.

'Five Fingers of Tibet'

Two successive political developments, namely the communist revolution in China in 1949 and its annexation of Tibet in 1950, further underlined Bhutan's political and strategic vitality.

Following its victory in the 1949 communist revolution, China, led by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), described Bhutan as one of the "five fingers" of its "Tibetan palm." The treaty that the Republic of India signed with Bhutan in 1949 is largely said to be a continuation of the treaty of 1910.

Following the 1949 treaty, China tacitly recognized the special treaty relationship between India and Bhutan. However, it held grave reservations, particularly regarding Article 2, which empowered the government of India to guide Bhutan's external affairs upon the latter's request.

Bhutan's border with India remains clearly identified and demarcated. While signing the 1949 treaty, India returned about 32 square miles (about 83 sq km) of land territory in the area known as Dewangiri to Bhutan to accommodate its claims.

Particularly after 1959, China began reasserting its supposed claims over Bhutan. Maps were published in Beijing in which Bhutan was shown inside the domain of China.

There have been instances where the Bhutanese elite softened their attitude towards China. Nevertheless, the latter's policy in Tibet continues to arouse hostility in traditional Bhutanese society, which remains culturally woven to Tibet. Meanwhile, Bhutan's policy towards China is circumscribed by numerous political and economic considerations. Moreover, Bhutan's apprehensions over the ultimate politico-strategic objectives of Chinese policy in the Himalayan region have not disappeared.

Bhutan and Tibet at the Borders

When activity in Tibet gained momentum in 1958-1959, Chinese maps began showing almost the entire eastern district of Tashigong and pockets of northeastern and northwestern Bhutan as parts of China. All normal travel and trade between Bhutan and Tibet came to an end in 1959 when China suppressed the Tibetan uprising. At that time, the 14th Dalai Lama and his followers fled Lhasa and sought refuge in India.

The following year, 1960, Bhutan sealed its borders with Tibet. This closed the traditional trade routes northward to Shigatse and Lhasa from Paro, Punakha, and Tashigong as well as the brisk trade route via Yatung in the Chumbi Valley to the west. The Royal Government of Bhutan adopted a cautious policy towards Tibet and offered asylum to hundreds of Tibetan refugees in 1959-1960. However, it later asked them to accept Bhutanese citizenship or leave the country.

Historically, Bhutan maintained checkpoints all along its boundary with Tibet and exercised effective administrative jurisdiction up to this boundary. The Bhutanese officials conducted official tours and collected taxes from the land areas extending up to it. Moreover, Bhutanese citizens regularly utilized the lands up to their border. And local Tibetan officials in areas adjacent to the border respected this boundary. The discrepancy existing in this area was confirmed when the Chinese side handed over the coordinates of the most strategic southeast corner of Bhutan to India. The latter viewed that the coordinates were being incorrectly shown in Chinese unofficial and official maps.

China's Strategic Objectives

Surveying the political history and geographic location of Bhutan provides a strong rationale for studying the consequences of its relationship with Beijing. The forward element of China's foreign and defense policy has remained visible in its policy of extending its sway and influence over the peoples and territories of peripheral regions. These include Mongolia, Tibet, Nepal, Bhutan, parts of India's northern and northeast frontiers, and to an extent, even Burma.

Beijing's strategy of prolonging border-related negotiations to extract maximum strategic concessions is a well-demonstrated tactic across Asia. As for Bhutan, its China policy has limited objectives, at least in the short term. Securing a comprehensive agreement on the boundary question will remain Bhutan's priority. However, its bilateral and regional initiatives have been driven by fear and apprehension regarding its sovereignty, territorial integrity, and independence.

Since the Sino-Indian border war of 1962, the Bhutanese have nursed anxieties of a Chinese military intervention in the region. The long-feared communist threat still looms large in Himalayan Asia.

Is China winning the Global South?

19 August 2024, The Week, Joel Mathis

China is "forging ties in the Global South," said The Washington Post, making inroads with countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America whose leaders increasingly seek an "alternative to Western hegemony" led by America and Europe. Beijing has increased its joint military drills with countries like Tanzania and Mozambique, and has sought to expand the U.N. Security Council to include the developing world. It's all part of China's attempt to achieve "greater legitimacy on the global stage." Those efforts are boosting China's standing. "In a lot of the capitals around the world," Stanford University's Oriana Skylar Mastro told the Post, "they're now thinking first of Beijing, and then of Washington." "This isn't about authoritarianism versus democracy," David P. Goldman said at The Asia Times. It's about commerce and influence. Beijing has "doubled exports to the Global South" since the beginning of the COVID pandemic, and those exports are going to democracies like India. The goal? "To make the world dependent on Chinese technology and supply chains." What did the commentators say?

Chinese firms are expanding to the Global South "with startling speed," said The Economist. Those businesses are "building factories in countries from Malaysia to Morocco," and they're also pursuing the

"5 billion consumers who live in the rest of the developing world." That growth offers "uncomfortable lessons" for the West, which has increasingly raised trade barriers to Chinese goods. China is now "reaping the rewards" of sticking with globalization. "As the West has turned inward, China and the rest of the emerging world have drawn closer."

"The Chinese charm offensive is working," Gabriele Manca said at The Diplomat, helped along by a combination of "economic influence, soft power, political pressure, and diplomatic initiatives." That work is also forward-thinking: By 2100, "eight out of 10 people will live in Asia or Africa." That shift in population will inevitably "reshape the global economic and political order." New York is the "quintessential city of the current era of globalization" that has been shaped by Western countries. Now China is offering a way forward to those "left out of today's globalization benefits."

What next?

There is a class element to all of this. A survey of 35 countries found that most residents of "middle-income countries" — like those found in the Global South — see China favorably, said Pew Research Center. (The favorable views were highest in Thailand, Kenya and Bangladesh.) In high-income countries, however, the vast majority of respondents see China unfavorably. Those views are more divided, though, in the Asia-Pacific where China has simmering territorial disputes with its neighbors.

American leaders acknowledge that China has "outpaced" the U.S. in the Global South, said The Washington Post. "We need to do more," Deputy Secretary of State Kurt Campbell told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The goal for U.S. officials is to make sure the planetary playing field doesn't go uncontested. "We want to help ensure that [countries in the Global South] have a choice," another State Department official said to The Atlantic Council in February, "and that they can make their decisions free from coercion."

19 August 2024, Hindustan Times

Only around 10 to 15 Tibetans trickle into Dharamshala annually now, down massively from nearly 3,000 a decade ago

Once abuzz with Tibetans arriving in India from their native land after crossing the Himalayas, the Tibetan Reception Center at Khanyara, Dharamshala, has seen a sharp decline in arrivals in recent years. Only a handful Tibetans trickle in now, a shift that most Tibetan government-in-exile officials attribute to stricter border control imposed by the Chinese government.

Originally built as a transit point for over 2,500 Tibetans who annually made the clandestine journey from Tibet into Nepal and then to Dharamshala — home to the Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama, since his escape from Tibet — the facility has seen significantly reduced activity now.

The officials at Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), based in Dharamshala, say surveillance around the border and mountain passes was amped up by the Chinese in 2008 following a major demonstration in Tibet.

According to CTA officials, in 2021, only four Tibetans arrived in Dharamshala while five had arrived a year ago. The numbers did not improve much, with 10 arrivals in 2022 and 15 in 2023.

The same figure stood around 2,500 to 3,000 around the 1990s or the early 2000s. CTA officials said the number of arrivals has gone up in the last couple of years, but is nowhere close to what it was a decade or two ago.

CTA spokesperson Tenzin Lekshay says, "The situation has changed dramatically after the massive Tibetan uprising in 2008. In response, China took measures to prevent information about the situation in Tibet from reaching the outside world. They tightened border controls to restrict movement and stop people from leaving Tibet. China aimed to obscure the reality of conditions in Tibet, promoting a positive image that contradicts the actual situation."

He adds that China has also been restricting access to Tibet for outsiders, "Visiting Tibet is not like travelling to China; foreigners need special permits to enter. This tight control suggests that there are aspects of Tibet that China wants to keep hidden."

The CTA operates three Reception Centers in Nepal, Delhi, and Dharamshala. New arrivals first enter Nepal, then transit through Delhi, before ultimately arriving in Dharamshala.

Namkyi, a former political prisoner who recently arrived from Tibet, had testified her experiences before she decided to leave Tibet for Dharamshala. She and her sister, who had participated in a march calling for "Free Tibet" in October 2015 were detained by police. "In November 2016, after our detention period had lasted for 13 month, the court of Trochu County called us to the courtroom and we were put on trial. We were sentenced to three years each on trumped-up charges of undertaking 'separatist acts against the nation' and supporting 'the Dalai clique,'" Namkyi, who speaks in Tibetan, said in her testimony published by CTA.

After their release in October 2018, the family was put on a blacklist. "Our expressions and movement were severely restricted, putting anyone we were in contact with at risk," Namkyi, who began her journey to India with her aunt Tsering Kyi in May 2023, says.

Tenzin Tsundue, Tibetan writer and activist based in Dharamshala, said the Tibetan uprising during the 2008 Beijing Olympics that rocked Chinese control was found to be inspired by Tibetans who returned from India.

"So, the Chinese border guards tightened the Tibet-Nepal borders and started to pay Nepalese border guards to stop Tibetans escaping Tibet. Since 2010, the number of Tibetans escaping Tibet drastically fell from 3,500 a year before the uprising to just 20 to 30," he said, adding that Tibetans now have to report departure and arrival every time they travel from one district to another.

"Many passports have been revoked, ID cards, including ration cards, mobile numbers, and bank accounts, are rolled into one number with DNA personal details. With such a sophisticated mechanism of control, China has turned Tibet into a police state," he added.

Tsundue says China now also uses paid western YouTubers to create a false image of Tibet as a tourist destination, but in reality is very strict in giving visas to foreigners. He adds that visas are not being given to Indians since the 2020 Galwan valley clash.

Opinion: More Painful Than the Agony of Death

19 August 2024, Phayul, Palden Sonam

On July 12, a video clip from Tibet was going viral on the Tibetan cyber world, which, at first glance, appeared like a funeral ceremony. Everyone in the video looked visibly distraught with their heads down and many crying.

However, it turned out to be a scene from the final day of Ragya Sherig Norbu Lobling –a prominent private-run Tibetan school in Amdo region of Tibet as teachers and students paid their last respect to their beloved school after the Chinese government forced it to close.

In a normal situation, a school would be shut down if it failed to serve the primary goal of giving education to its students. In today's occupied Tibet, however, a school can be forced to close simply because it is able to give great education to its students.

Ragya School was established in 1994 by Jigme Gyaltsen, a Tibetan monk educator in Golok, (Ch: Guoluo Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai). Golok is largely a remote nomadic area and this school has played a pivotal role in providing quality education to hundreds of Tibetan students. As its popularity spreads, students from different parts of Tibet have sought admission into it. Many of its students are orphans.

This school, in addition to providing both traditional and modern education –including Tibetan traditional medicine and handicrafts, computer and international languages like Chinese and English –has adopted the centuries-old techniques of Nalanda's analytical debate to teach contemporary subjects. This teaching method proved to be a great success in the learning experience of the students. Some Chinese scholars have been so much impressed by the academic brilliance of the school's students that they visited the school to observe it.

In fact, Ragya school and its founder won many official recognitions from Chinese government including Excellent Service Award (2003), China Charity Worker award (2005), National People's Education award (2010) and Innovative School Award (2012) for its contribution to education and society.

Nevertheless, the aggressive assimilationist campaign, Chinese president Xi Jinping launched as the key feature of his repressive policy toward Tibetans and other colonized people like the Uyghurs, has drastically reduced their already limited space to teach and study and practice their language, culture and religion.

This policy is implemented on an aggressive scale – shutting down village-level schools, banning private Tibetan classes, displacing Tibetan as medium of instruction and putting thousands of children in colonial boarding schools. In May this year, China closed another Tibetan-run school, Taksang Lhamo Tibetan Culture School in Amdo Ngaba (Sichuan). This school founded in 1986 played a key role in providing education to the local Tibetan children.

For Tibetans, this entho-nationalist war, on their language and culture, is not only an issue of language and cultural rights and repression, but also human rights violation and a crime against humanity. The most cruel and heinous aspect of this cultural war is that it targets children by putting them in colonial boarding schools –even children as young as 4 years old, too little and too vulnerable to be in a boarding school. Today these boarding schools house roughly one million children between ages 6 to 18. China kept another 100,000 children aged between four to six years old in boarding pre-schools. They have not only been subject to cultural assimilation but also ideological indoctrination as a strategy to manufacture a generation of model colonial subjects –rootless in their culture and toothless in their language.

This systematic policy of separating children from their families and subjecting them to cultural assimilation and ideological indoctrination is nothing but Cultural Genocide. Under this policy, Beijing is not only tearing families apart but also forcing vulnerable children to become strangers to their own culture by severing their spiritual, linguistic, and cultural ties to their home and community.

This has to be understood, not merely as an issue of taking away defenceless children from their families and brainwashing them, but in a more psychological and physiological sense of brutalizing children's mind and body for political ends. And the traumatic experiences, they have to suffer, and the social and emotional tolls they will have on the people of Tibet in the future is not an uneasy thing to guess.

An absurdity, stretched beyond its limit, is Beijing's justification for running the colonial boarding school system on the grounds that there are not enough schools in rural and remote Tibetan areas. However, the reality is that it is the same regime in Beijing that closed existing village-level as well as the few private schools in Tibet –leaving no alternatives for Tibetan students except the boarding schools.

Therefore, the real problem with Ragya School, in China's eyes, is not that it does not have fancy buildings or expensive grounds. Instead, it stood in Beijing's way of cultural and linguistic elimination in Tibet. This school has produced many modern educated students with strong roots in their culture and skilled in their mother tongue –making a positive impact in their respective field as educators, artists, intellectuals, writers, civil servants and entrepreneurs. In the ultimate analysis, this forced closure of Tibetan medium schools is to terminate, not just an alternative school for the Tibetans but the very idea that it is not only possible, but also pedagogically more conducive for Tibetan students to excel academically if the medium of instruction is their own language.

Colonial system, whether yesterday or today, is intrinsically disempowering when it comes to the true interests and aspirations of the occupied people. In the case of Tibet, this has never been clearer than now. It is manifested in the form of political repression, economic marginalization and cultural suppression. The forced closure of Tibetan medium schools is another bomb China dropped on the soul of Tibetan people and civilization.

Tibetans, especially in Tibet, felt the crushing blow of this repression against their culture and language. The mournful scene from the last day of the school is, indeed a funeral rite –for an acclaimed school and the idea of such an alternative. Despite the enormous personal risks including the arrest and torture, many in Tibet expressed their sense of loss, sadness and helplessness after the school was shut down.

A line from the social media post of a Tibetan encapsulates the general mood in Tibet during that time --“Even the agony of death may not be as excruciating as today's event.”

India-China relations: The ball is in the Chinese court

19 August 2024, ORF, Manoj Joshi

India is open to re-configuring relations with China but a resolution of the border issue in eastern Ladakh is essential for progress.

For some time now, there have been signs that India wants a reset of its relations with China, however, no concrete steps are visible as of now. The formal Indian position, articulated repeatedly by the External Affairs Minister Dr S Jaishankar, is that there can be no forward movement till there is a final resolution of the border issue in eastern Ladakh.

Last month, the Ministry of Finance in its annual Economic Survey, called for increased Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) flows from China to increase India's participation in the global supply chain and its exports. This was a surprise because in 2020, as a fallout of the eastern Ladakh tensions, India had placed stringent restraints on FDI from China.

The Survey noted that if India were to take advantage of the prevailing “China plus one” strategy, it needed to either integrate into Chinese supply chains or use FDI from China “for boosting India's exports to the US,” in the same way other East Asian economies had done in the past. It added that “It is more effective to have Chinese companies invest in India and then export the products to these markets rather than importing from China, adding minimal value”.

Both sides continue to hold fast to their respective positions—India insisting that the status quo ante be restored in eastern Ladakh to normalise relations, while China insists that there is no real problem there and India should set aside issues relating to the border and forge good relations with China.

Whether these views of the Ministry of Finance have an impact on current policy remains to be seen, on the surface, however, there is little change. Both sides continue to hold fast to their respective positions— India insisting that the status quo ante be restored in eastern Ladakh to normalise relations, while China insists that there is no real problem there and India should set aside issues relating to the border and forge good relations with China.

In early July, S Jaishankar met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi at the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO). Jaishankar noted on X that he and his counterpart “discussed early resolution of remaining issues in border areas.” And that they had agreed to “redouble efforts through diplomatic and military channels to that end”, adding that “respecting the LAC and ensuring peace and tranquility in the border areas is essential.” The key to good relations, he said, was the “three mutuals”— “mutual respect, mutual sensitivity, and mutual interest”.

A press release by the Ministry of External Affairs noted that the two ministers agreed “that the prolongation of the current situation on the border is not in the interest of either side.” It noted that Jaishankar emphasised “the importance of fully abiding by relevant bilateral agreements, protocols and understandings reached between the two Governments in the past.”

Three weeks later, the two met again in Vientiane, Laos; the official MEA press release noted that their discussions focused on the need to find “an early resolution of the remaining issues along the Line of Actual Control to stabilise and rebuild bilateral relations.” It reiterated the importance of the “three mutuals.”

Just how much of a gap there remained between the Indian and Chinese positions was evident from the Chinese press release of the meeting which ignored the border issue and noted that “the two sides should take a rational approach to rise above differences and frictions to promote the improvement as well as stable and sustainable development of China-India relations.”

The release cited Jaishankar as saying that the two sides had “broad converging interests” and had to “face the shadow brought by the situation in the border areas”. But the Indian side was ready “to take a historic, strategic, and open perspective to find solutions to the differences.”

At the apex level, Prime Minister Modi in April 2024 had given an interview to Newsweek magazine where he mentioned that in his view the relationship with China was “important and significant.” He went on to add that it was his “belief that we need to urgently address the prolonged situation on our borders so that the abnormality in our bilateral interactions can be put behind us.” He said that he hoped and believed that “through positive and constructive bilateral engagement at the diplomatic and military levels, we will be able to restore and sustain peace and tranquillity in our borders.”

In eastern Ladakh, through their military and diplomatic talks, the two sides have been able to create “no patrol zones” in three of the six areas which the Chinese had blockaded in 2020 and prevented Indian forces from patrolling—the Kugrang river valley, Gogra, and Pangong Tso. As part of the settlement, Indian troops vacated the Kailash heights overlooking Spanggur Tso.

As of now both sides also continue to maintain substantial additional forces on either side of the LAC. But Chinese blockades in two important areas remain—the Depsang bulge in the north and the Charding-Ninglung Nala area in the south. As of now both sides also continue to maintain substantial additional forces on either side of the LAC. Only with complete disengagement will the two sides de-escalate in eastern Ladakh.

The 21st round of Corps Commanders level meetings to discuss the issue took place at the Chushul-Moldo border meeting point in 2024. And parallel to this, the 29th meeting of officials under the rubric of the Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination (WMCC) took place on 27 March in Beijing. There have been no further institutional meetings aimed at resolving the border issue, though Wang and Jaishankar expressed hope in Astana that a meeting of the WMCC would take place soon.

Even today, the goal of the surprise Chinese action in 2020 remains a mystery. In 2019, Xi Jinping met Prime Minister Modi for their second informal summit in Chennai, an event that presaged good relations in the coming period. 2019 was also the year in which Chinese investments into India peaked in terms of the number of transactions (527). The peak year for investments, US$859 million was 2015.

But then, they conducted a sudden mobilisation, violative of the 1996 Military Confidence Building Agreement, and established blockades at several points in eastern Ladakh to prevent Indian troops from patrolling parts of the LAC. They did not attack any Indian post as such and the Galwan events that led to the loss of 20 Indian soldiers were more by way of a situation gone out of control than any planned action. The Indian reaction was quick and tough. Besides banning hundreds of Chinese apps, the India issued Press Note 3 which placed restrictions on investments from countries sharing a land border with India. Though ostensibly aimed at preventing “opportunistic takeovers/acquisitions of Indian companies due to the COVID 19 pandemic”, its real effect was palpable on FDI flows from China which had coincidentally undertaken the eastern Ladakh incursions at that time. A parliamentary question in March 2022 revealed that 347 applications had been received in the previous two years and of these 66 were approved and 193 rejected.

Besides banning hundreds of Chinese apps, the India issued Press Note 3 which placed restrictions on investments from countries sharing a land border with India.

Despite all this, India-China trade continued to grow, and in 2023-24, it has reached US$ 118.4, making China India’s largest trading partner ahead of the United States. There was a huge imbalance in this with India exporting just US$16.67 billion worth of goods and importing US$101.7 billion. India remain heavily reliant on China for critical products like telecom parts, pharmaceutical ingredients, and advanced technology components.

The Economic Survey's call for seeking enhanced FDI from China was also an admission by the government that the Production Linked Investment (PLI) scheme that it had launched in 2020 to strengthen India's manufacturing industries and make them more globally competitive was not performing as well as expected.

As of now in terms of relations with India, the ball is in the Chinese court. India has made it clear that it is not willing to normalise ties till issues are settled in eastern Ladakh. China continues to ignore that demand while calling for better ties. Meanwhile, both sides continue to maintain additional forces along the LAC as well as their build-up on either side of the border.

‘Monument to history’ battle between US and China over future of Mao’s secretary’s diary

18 August 2024, The Guardian, Amy Hawkins

Beijing is believed to be behind court bid to secure account of life inside Communist HQ.

In the early hours of 4 June 1989, Li Rui, a veteran of the Chinese Communist party (CCP), was standing on the balcony of his apartment on Chang'an Boulevard in central Beijing. He could see tanks rolling towards Tiananmen Square.

For weeks, up to a million protesters had been gathering peacefully in Beijing's plaza, demanding political reform. But they failed. Instead, as Li observed from his unique vantage point, troops opened fire, killing an estimated several thousands of civilians. It was the worst massacre in recent Chinese history. “Soldiers firing randomly with their machine guns, sometimes shooting the ground and sometimes shooting toward the sky,” Li wrote in his diary. A “black weekend”.

The first-hand account of an event that the Chinese government has systematically tried to distort and erase from the historical record is one of thousands of observations noted in Li's diaries, which he kept meticulously between 1946 and 2018. Few people, especially not of Li's stature, have kept such detailed records of this tumultuous era in Chinese history. Now those diaries are the subject of a hotly disputed lawsuit, the trial of which begins on Monday.

Born in 1917, Li joined the Communist party as a young idealist. After the communists seized power in 1949, he rose through the ranks to become Mao's personal secretary in 1958. But it wasn't to last. In 1959, Li publicly criticised Mao and was sent to a penal camp as punishment. His persecution continued through the Cultural Revolution, including more than eight years in solitary confinement. It wasn't until after Mao died in 1976 that Li returned to the senior party ranks. He went on to become one of the most outspoken members of the liberal, reformist faction, observing from the inside the silencing of dissent that has intensified under the rule of his personal acquaintance Xi Jinping.

Li's papers are, therefore, thus a crucial archive. “It's hard to overstate their significance,” says Joseph Torigian, a research fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. But on Monday, a court in California, not China, will begin hearing a trial about the fate of those diaries, the culmination of five years of legal wrangling that have complicated Li's legacy since he died in February 2019, at the age of 101.

For several years before his death, Li's daughter Li Nanyang, who lives in the US, had been scanning, transcribing and cataloguing her father's papers, and ultimately transferred them to the Hoover Institution, the leading archive for CCP history in the US. Li Nanyang and Stanford claim that this was in line with Li's wishes. On 30 January 2017, for example, he recorded a meeting with his wife, Zhang Yuzhen, to talk about "the issue of my diaries". Zhang "agreed with my decision ... having Hoover retain the diaries", he wrote.

But on 21 March 2019, a lawyer for Li's widow wrote to Stanford, asserting her ownership of the diaries and seeking their return. The 89-year-old soon filed a lawsuit in Beijing, arguing that she was the rightful heir to Li's estate. In May that year, Stanford filed a countersuit in California to eliminate Zhang's claims to the materials. And so began a legal battle between one of the world's top universities and an ageing widow – who, Stanford argues, is a front for the Chinese government.

Why would Zhang, who is now well into her 90s, spend several years and millions of dollars fighting over a collection of diaries?

Lawyers for Zhang, who did not respond to interview requests, say it is about privacy. The materials reflect "deeply personal" affairs, including "intimate correspondence", her lawyers argue. The "ongoing violations" of her privacy have caused "severe emotional distress".

But others are sceptical. "By all indications ... the PRC [People's Republic of China] is running this litigation behind the scenes," lawyers for Stanford have argued. "To put it simply, Ms Zhang lacks the financial ability to pay the attorneys' fees being incurred on her behalf." Zhang's lawyers deny there has been any interference from the Chinese government.

"It's simply about control," says Ian Johnson, author of a book about China's unofficial historians, such as Li. Under Xi Jinping, China's leader, the party has made it clear that it "can't allow competing narratives of what happened in the past".

In many countries, the diaries of a political leader would be housed in an archive, available to researchers or the public. In China, the opposite is true. In 2013, Xi warned against "historical nihilism". For historians, that has meant that, after a period of relative openness, archive after archive has been shuttered. In 2012, the archives of the foreign ministry abruptly closed, reopening the following year with 90% of the materials redacted.

That makes Li's diaries particularly valuable to researchers. "The detail is mind-boggling," says Frank Dikötter, a historian. Insights into elite politics are buried among notes about how many laps he swam in the pool, and how many times he got up to use the bathroom at night. Domestic details notwithstanding, Dikötter says it's unimaginable that his diaries could be displayed in today's China. "When you have a monopoly over power, you develop an obsession with secrecy."

Li was keenly aware of this trend. In 2013, he said in an interview: "There are classified materials of the party about the Cultural Revolution ... I heard it was all burned." Such tidbits have been marshalled by Stanford to argue that Li wanted his papers preserved at Hoover. But Zhang's lawyers have found their own bits of evidence in Li's voluminous writings and interviews. In 2014, he said, "Li Nanyang is Li Nanyang, and I am myself. My thoughts and opinions are well known and expressed in my books and articles. Li Nanyang is my daughter, but she can't represent me, and I don't allow her to represent me."

Li Nanyang, a fierce CCP critic herself, doesn't dispute the fact that she and her father didn't always see eye to eye. "He wanted to save the party. That's not my idea ... This is not something that demonstrates that my father won't work with me [to donate] his historical materials."

Zhang denies that there is a plot to hide the Li Rui diaries from the public. Her legal filings note that she is only seeking the return of his original handwritten diaries, not the full collection of papers at Hoover, and that Hoover is free to make copies for researchers.

But historians say that original manuscripts are vital, especially when history is contested. It's "crucial that you have the handwritten ones," says Dikötter. "Because, ultimately, that's what the whole thing relies on. The credibility relies on that."

Li "would have known how difficult it would have been for [the diaries] to see the light of day [in China]," says Johnson. "I think very much that he wanted to donate them to Hoover."

Li died without a will. His daughter says that this is because if he had made his intention public, including getting a will formally notarised, he would have faced trouble from the government. Zhang's lawyers have quoted from a draft will, in which Li stated that his children "must not participate in the publication of my diaries". Stanford says it has never seen evidence of this draft.

A court in Beijing long ago ruled in Zhang's favour. A second lawsuit filed in Beijing by Li Nanyang's sister, seeking the return of the papers relating to their mother, Li Rui's first wife, also resulted in a judgment that the materials should be returned. But the 40 boxes full of pages and pages of Li's dense scrawl, documenting the dramatic and often darkening developments of China in the 20th century, for now remain at Stanford. Some legal experts have pointed out that this week's trial could simply be a question of whether a US court should respect a ruling made in a foreign jurisdiction. But for scholars, the stakes are higher. The diaries are "a monument to history", says Dikötter.

This article was amended on 22 August 2024. An earlier version referred to Li Rui having kept diaries between 1938 and 2018; in fact the dates are 1946 to 2018. It has also been clarified that Li was sent to a penal camp in 1959, before the Cultural Revolution started in 1966.

Tibetan Travails: China's Stranglehold on Movement

18 August 2024, Devdiscourse

China's stringent travel restrictions are severely impacting ethnic Tibetans' freedom of movement. Increased surveillance, checkpoints, and passport hindrances create significant barriers, affecting their ability to seek exile or practice their cultural identity. The Tibetan community in Dharamshala sees dwindling arrivals amidst heightened security since 2008.

China's stringent travel restrictions are disproportionately affecting ethnic Tibetans, creating significant barriers to their freedom of movement. The obstacles include troop deployments, checkpoints, roadblocks, required bureaucratic approvals, and passport restrictions, which impede travel both within Tibetan areas and externally.

Restrictions have intensified, particularly near international borders in the south, making it harder for Tibetans to seek exile in India and other countries. The Tibetan Reception Center in Dharamshala remains largely vacant, with dwindling student numbers at the Lower Tibetan Children's Village (TCV) school. Experts attribute this decline to increased strictness on movement following the 2008 protests in Tibet.

According to Central Tibetan Administration sources, only five Tibetans arrived in Dharamshala in 2020, four in 2021, ten in 2022, and 15 in 2023. This contrasts starkly with over 2000 annual arrivals during the 1990s and early 2000s. Tenzin Passang, executive director of Students for a Free Tibet-India, remarked, "Fleeing Tibet has always been perilous, but Tibetans pursue it to preserve their cultural identity and religious freedom."

Passport acquisition for foreign travel remains nearly impossible for Tibetans, with over 2,000 inspectors manning 700 discipline committees across rural Tibet. These measures have severely curtailed the number of Tibetans escaping post-2008 due to Beijing's heightened security to prevent protests and international scrutiny. Passang noted, "China aims to prevent escapes as Tibetans can provide firsthand accounts of human rights abuses."

Previous incidents involve Chinese authorities confiscating passports and imposing travel restrictions to Lhasa. Tibetan-origin foreign nationals also face major hurdles in obtaining visas to visit Tibet, often resulting in denials after prolonged waits. Highlighting these issues, Passang added, "Our culture and way of life face aggressive suppression by the CCP."

China's extreme restrictions on freedom of movement affecting ethnic Tibetans

18 August 2024, ANI

China's extreme restrictions on freedom of movement are disproportionately affecting ethnic Tibetans. Obstacles including troop deployments, checkpoints, roadblocks, required bureaucratic approvals and passport restrictions impede freedom of movement both within Tibetan areas and between those areas and the outside world. China has tightened travel restrictions, with Tibetans needing permits to enter certain areas, particularly near international borders in the south. These constraints on freedom of movement also hinder Tibetans from seeking exile in India and other countries.

The Tibetan Reception Center in Dharamshala is lying vacant. Moreover, the number of students in the Lower Tibetan Children's Village (TCV) school in Dharamshala is also decreasing.

Experts say that after the protests in Tibet in 2008, China has increased strictness on the movement of Tibetans.

According to Central Tibetan Administration sources only five Tibetans had arrived in Dharamshala in 2020, four in 2021, ten in 2022 and 15 arrivals have been reported in 2023. However, in the 1990s or the early 2000s, the annual arrivals were over 2000. Speaking to ANI, the executive director of Students for a Free Tibet- India, Tenzin Passang said, "Fleeing Tibet has always been a dangerous journey but Tibetans still believe that it works because they cannot practice their religion freely or speak their language and express their cultural identity so they realise that they have a better chance for maintaining this unique Tibetan identity in-exile so they choose to flee." Tibetans face nearly insurmountable hurdles in obtaining a passport for foreign travel. Also, more than 2,000 "inspectors" that staff around 700 "discipline committees" set up in rural Tibetan communities have tightened travel restrictions in recent years. "After 2008 the number of people escaping from Tibet decreased drastically because China specifically raised their security and surveillance across Tibet to ensure that there is no repeat of the mass demonstrations that happened in 2008 which also received global media attention and China faced international criticism so they have a strong interest in preventing Tibetans from escaping because the Tibetans can provide the first-hand information about the human rights abuses in Tibet," Passang added.

Further, she also highlighted the previous cases in which the Chinese authorities have confiscated the passports of Tibetans and restricted travel to Lhasa. Foreign nationals of Tibetan origin face enormous challenges when seeking a visa to visit Tibet, often waiting for years only for their request to be denied. "There were also cases where they confiscated the passports of Tibetans living at the borders and they imposed strict restrictions to travel across Lhasa. Even in our own country, the CCP has raised a war against our culture and our way of life," she said.

Dalai Lama, the US and diplomacy

18 August 2024, Taipei Times, Khedroob Thondup

During his 2020 presidential campaign, US President Joe Biden made a promise that resonated deeply with advocates of human rights and religious freedom: He pledged to meet the Dalai Lama and invite him to the White House if elected.

This commitment was seen as a significant gesture toward supporting the Tibetan cause and standing up to China's oppressive policies in Tibet.

However, as Biden's four-year tenure draws to a close, this promise remains unfulfilled, raising questions about the administration's diplomatic priorities and its stance on human rights.

Despite his campaign pledge, Biden has not met with the Dalai Lama during his presidency. This absence is notable, especially considering that some former US presidents, including George H.W. Bush, Bill Clinton, George W. Bush and Barack Obama, have met with the Tibetan spiritual leader.

The Dalai Lama, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, symbolizes the struggle for Tibetan autonomy and the broader fight for human rights and religious freedom. One of the primary reasons for this unfulfilled promise appears to be the Biden administration's concern over offending China. The US-China relationship is complex and fraught with tension over issues ranging from trade to human rights to military presence in the South China Sea. Meeting with the Dalai Lama, who Beijing views as a separatist, could exacerbate these tensions and potentially derail diplomatic efforts on other fronts.

By not meeting with the Dalai Lama, Biden has missed an opportunity to reaffirm the US' commitment to human rights and religious freedom. Such a meeting would have sent a powerful message to the world about Washington's stance on these critical issues. It would have also provided a platform to highlight the ongoing human rights abuses in Tibet and to support the Tibetan people's struggle for autonomy.

While the Biden administration has taken steps to address the Tibet issue, such as signing the Resolve Tibet Act, which pressures China to resume negotiations with Tibetan leaders, the symbolic power of a presidential meeting with the Dalai Lama cannot be overstated. Symbolic gestures in diplomacy often carry significant weight, influencing public perception and international relations.

Biden's decision not to meet with the Dalai Lama during his tenure reflects the delicate balance of international diplomacy.

However, it also underscores a missed opportunity to stand firmly for human rights and religious freedom. As the world watches, it is crucial for leaders to not only make promises but also to follow through on them, especially when they pertain to fundamental values and principles.

Nancy Pelosi has consistently called out China's oppressive policies

18 August 2024, The Week, Khedroob Thondup

Pelosi has advocated the rights of the Tibetan people.

NANCY PELOSI, a name synonymous with resilience and unwavering commitment to human rights, has long been a formidable figure in American politics. Her relationship with His Holiness the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan people is a testament to her dedication to justice and freedom. As someone who has consistently stood up to China, Pelosi has an admirable legacy of courage and tenacity.

Pelosi's history of challenging China dates back to 1991, when she unfurled a pro-democracy banner in Tiananmen Square, commemorating the victims of the 1989 massacre. This act of defiance was a clear message to Beijing that the US would not turn a blind eye to human rights abuses. Over the years, Pelosi has consistently criticised China's record on human rights, from the treatment of Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang to the suppression of freedoms in Hong Kong and Tibet. Pelosi's connection with the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan cause dates back to the early years of her political career. In 1989, she was one of the first American politicians to meet with the Dalai Lama after he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. This meeting marked the beginning of a long-standing friendship and a shared commitment to the Tibetan struggle for autonomy and human rights. One of the most poignant moments in Pelosi's advocacy for Tibet came in 2008, during the Beijing Olympics. Despite the potential diplomatic fallout, she led a congressional delegation to Dharamsala, the seat of the Tibetan government-in-exile. There, she met with the Dalai Lama and expressed her solidarity with the Tibetan people. Her visit was a bold statement against China's human rights abuses and a clear message that the world was watching.

She has consistently used her platform to call out China's oppressive policies and to advocate the rights of the Tibetan people. In 2007, she played a crucial role in the passage of the Tibetan Policy Act, which aimed to support the preservation of Tibet's unique religious, cultural and linguistic heritage. During a visit to Tibet in 2015, she and her delegation were closely monitored by Chinese authorities. Despite the restrictions, Pelosi managed to meet with local Tibetans and hear their stories of resilience.

Pelosi's role in world affairs extends beyond her advocacy for Tibet. As the first woman to serve as Speaker of the US House of Representatives, she has been a trailblazer for women in politics. Her leadership during critical moments, such as the passage of the Affordable Care Act and the impeachment proceedings against President Donald Trump, has cemented her reputation as a formidable and principled leader.

Her stance on China has been particularly noteworthy. Pelosi has been a vocal critic of China's human rights record, its aggressive territorial claims and its influence on global affairs. She has consistently called for a tougher stance on China, advocating policies that promote human rights and democratic values.

Pelosi's visit to Taiwan in August 2022 was a significant moment in her career and in US-China relations. Despite warnings from Beijing and even caution from the Biden administration, Pelosi proceeded with her trip, emphasising the US's unwavering support for Taiwan's democracy. Her visit was met with strong condemnation from China, which conducted large-scale military exercises in response. This move was seen by many as a bold statement against China's increasing assertiveness in the region.

Pelosi's achievements in a male-dominated field are even more remarkable as she has consistently stood up to powerful adversaries. She has shattered glass ceilings and paved the way for future generations of women leaders. Her ability to navigate the complexities of international politics while maintaining her commitment to human rights and justice has made her a significant figure in world affairs.

President Biden's Missed Opportunity: He should have met the Dalai Lama

Tibetan people deserve their dignity — and their rights

17 August 2024, Boston Globe, Jim McGovern

Our visit was to India — not Tibet — because the Dalai Lama has lived in exile there for the past 65 years, forced to flee after his native homeland was brutally taken over and occupied by China.

Earlier this summer, I was part of a bipartisan congressional delegation that traveled to Dharamshala, India, to meet with the Dalai Lama.

Our visit was to India — not Tibet — because the Dalai Lama has lived in exile there for the past 65 years, forced to flee after his native homeland was brutally taken over and occupied by the People's Republic of China.

For decades, the United States has played a complicated role in the resulting dispute — pledging support for the people of Tibet while also accepting China's sovereignty over the region. In recent years, and rightfully so, the Chinese government has come under increasing scrutiny for violating the rights of the Tibetan people and attempting to erase their language, culture, religion, and way of life. For America to help right these wrongs, we must demand that China start treating the people of Tibet with dignity and respect. We have more tools in the toolbox — now is the time to use them.

Visiting with His Holiness was an incredibly powerful and moving experience. As the world's best-known Tibetan leader, he has inspired millions with his belief in the oneness of all humanity and the importance of human dignity. I have been guided by his commitment to nonviolence and his dedication to preserving the one planet we all share. In a world consumed by turmoil, his leadership is as relevant and as necessary today as ever.

Our visit to Dharamshala was a vivid reminder of these two realities. The Tibetans we met in India are there because of Chinese repression. The thriving community and solid institutions they have built — including the democratically self-governing Central Tibetan Administration — are evidence of their strength and resilience as a people. But the underlying dispute over the Tibetan right to self-determination is unresolved.

The week before our bipartisan delegation departed for India, the House voted overwhelmingly to pass the Promoting a Peaceful Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, a bill I authored. This legislation affirms America's support for Tibetan self-determination and requires the State Department to counter false information about Tibet — such as the PRC claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times. Correcting the historical record is one step the United States can take to support the Tibetan people.

China has criticized this new legislation with the tired accusation that it constitutes interference in China's internal affairs. In fact, the PRC sanctioned me for my role in calling out their horrific human rights record — an action that only serves to highlight how afraid their leadership is of free and open debate, and how they seek to punish and silence those who disagree with them.

I will wear their sanctions as a badge of honor, and I will continue to call on the Chinese government to honor its existing obligations under international human rights law. As a state party to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, China has accepted that “all peoples have the right to self-determination.” Self-determination can take many forms; the Dalai Lama's Middle Way Approach, which seeks genuine autonomy for Tibetans in China, is one example.

The United States must continue to pressure Chinese officials to stop their efforts to erase Tibetan culture. Tibetans must be able to speak their language, practice their religion, educate their children, and preserve their history as they see fit. Tibetan political prisoners should be released. And the Dalai Lama's successor, the Panchen Lama — forcibly disappeared by the Chinese government in 1995 — should be allowed to live his life in freedom. The Dalai Lama should be allowed to return to Tibet if he wants and meet with his people.

The United States must also urge the Chinese government to negotiate in good faith with the Dalai Lama, the Central Tibetan Administration, or whoever Tibetans decide, to ensure a future in which Tibetans preserve their dignity and all of their rights. There is no obstacle to negotiation on the Tibetan side. It is past time for the PRC to return to the table. If they were to take these steps, the international community would respond positively.

Finally, America must uplift the voices of Tibetans in the diaspora and support their initiatives to preserve their culture and memory. At the end of the day, this comes back to the Tibetan children who greeted us upon our arrival in Dharamshala. We seek a better future for their sake.

Despite our differences, China and the United States must learn to peacefully coexist. But peaceful coexistence doesn't mean staying silent when we disagree – we have different principles and values, and those values compel the United States to stand up until the human rights of the Tibetan people are respected.

America must stand in solidarity with the people of Tibet for as long as that takes.

India lagging behind the West on Tibet stance?

17 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Given the recent US adoption of the 'Resolve Tibet Act' and the passing of significant resolutions on Tibet by the parliaments of the EU, Canada, and Australia in recent times, Tenzin Sherab* quotes US House Speaker Emeritus Nancy Pelosi that "Now things have changed" to argue that India too should adopt a more robust policy on Tibet in keeping with its historical ties with the Chinese occupied Himalayan territory and its current geopolitical concerns.

Two recent Tibet related events have made Tibetans jubilant and Xi worried. Seventy-year-old conflict between Tibet and China has now surfaced prominently through media and on various social platforms.

In his recent speech at upper Indian Parliament (Rajya Sabha), a member from Sikkim State, Shri Dorjee Tshering Lepcha made a pragmatic demand to the Government of India to refer the border of 1,400 km stretching from Ladakh to Arunachal Pradesh as "Tibet border" rather than China border. Since 1962, India and China have held 30 border meetings, the latest one in July 2024 in New Delhi, which yielded no tangible result for both sides. Historically, there never existed borders between India and China. MP Mr. Lepcha urged the Indian Government to issue a directive to its agencies to officially rename the border as "Tibet border" as it affected India's national identity and territorial integrity.

And another significant event was the recent passage of the 'Resolve Tibet Act' by the US Congress, which is a legislative milestone and unprecedented bipartisan support for the Tibetan cause. This important bill is to end an impasse in negotiation with Beijing which has stalled since 2010. The US delegation who met with His Holiness the Dalai Lama and their subsequent statement refuting the Chinese claim of "Tibet being a part of China", rattled the communist regime.

A delegation of seven influential US lawmakers led by Republican Congressman Michael McCaul, former Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi, and long-time Tibet supporter and human rights champion and Democrat Congressman Jim McGovern, made headlines across the globe on June 19, 2024. They brought the issue of Tibet to the forefront. The law not only underscores renewed US support for Tibet but also challenges the core issue of the "One China Policy" which many countries have adhered to over the years.

However, the immediate counter-reactions from the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to the "Resolve Tibet Act" included shutting down the renowned private Tibetan School in Golog Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture in Qinghai Province and surveil and suppress every movement of Tibetans. Unless the Joe Biden administration steps up to implement the Act in letter and spirit, Tibetans inside Tibet will continually be put in inconceivable harm's way and their lives and identity would be seriously jeopardized.

Catastrophic Miscalculation

A look back at the international playbook of politics and diplomacy reminds us Tibetans, who have been perennial and hapless victims of oppression and misinformation, how the CCP had twisted the credibility of even acclaimed leaders such as Britain's Tony Blair, David Miliband and the Clintons, to name a few stalwarts. China misguided them to the extent that they gave in to the CCP's narrative of the "One China Policy". In doing so, they looked the other way to decades of China's iron-grip control of Tibet. Even former US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton during her visit to Beijing in 2009 hushed up severe rights violations in Tibet that occurred in the aftermath of widespread protests in Tibet against Chinese rule and in the run-up to the 2008 Olympics in Beijing. Her widely reported press statement in Beijing, saying human rights violations in China can't interfere with or take precedence over other economic issues, was unnerving and totally distressing. Her stoic silence on human rights issues caused extensive damage and distress to the Tibetan struggle and to other minorities who were suffering under the regime. The catastrophic miscalculations of such Western leaders that China will become liberal after it is brought into the WTO fell flat in the face of a more belligerent and assertive China. Instead, the Chinese regime – not its citizens who are hardworking and freedom loving – became a more aggressive and existential threat to peace-loving peoples and rule-based international democratic systems.

And so, the radical change in the legislative US policy towards Tibet gives Tibetans a huge sigh of relief and hope. It also aligns well with what India might have perceived lately to counter the Chinese cartographic warfare concerning the Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh and China's growing influence in the region. The Significant Bond Pundits in Delhi, I believe, are aware of how profound cultural and spiritual affinity between India and Tibet evolved over the centuries. It is not just Buddhism that binds the two nations together. The Tibetan language, with its letters originally based on Brahmi Gupta scripts, is the foundational basis of mastering the Tibetan language, and the Buddhist sutras and tantras. More than two hundred volumes of the Buddha's teachings, a few hundred years ago, were translated into Tibetan by Indian and Tibetan scholars.

The 38th Tibetan Emperor Trisong Detsen (8th century AD) invited Indian masters such as Padmasambhava, Acharya Shanta Rakshita, etc, to Tibet. Buddhism, therefore, took a firm root and flourished. Worship of deities such as Tara Devi, Saraswati, Vajrapani, Bhairava, Hayagriva, etc, have been an integral part of Tibetan practices and way of life. Mount Kailash and Lake Mansarovar are not only considered sacred, they are a significant bond between the Indian and Tibetan civilizations. However, peace, calm, and tranquillity that historically prevailed between the two sides on the border were rudely disrupted by the forceful Chinese annexation of Tibet in 1951. There were hardly any soldiers patrolling the India-Tibet border until then. In fact, it was Tibet's independence which ensured India's security. More than 1.2 million Tibetans died as a result of Chinese occupation, and many are still languishing in prison for as simple a reason as displaying a picture of H. H the Dalai Lama.

It is time for India to initiate a more significant and robust Tibet policy, to strike while the iron is hot, as old saying goes. As a great admirer of the visionary trio (Prime Minister Modi-ji, Mr. Doval & Dr. Jaishankar), I, for one, appeal to them to meet with His Holiness the Dalai Lama at least in his capacity as religious and spiritual leader of the Tibetans and millions of his followers worldwide.

USA aside, Canada, the EU, and Australia have also pledged their support for Tibet in a manner no one has ever imagined a decade ago. As per Asian News Network, Japan will hold its first ever International Conference next year in support of Tibetans. In short, it is fair to say that what matters to the leaders depends entirely on the self-serving interest of their concerned nation when it comes to chalking a policy direction. It only needs to be understood that the Tibet issue is not only for Tibetans, rather, it involves long-term geopolitical interest of the global community as well.

As Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi rightly said, "Now things have changed." So does the law of impermanence, as per Buddhist belief, is inevitable, and only time will tell what fate lies ahead for Tibet.

What 'Tibet' means for China's water security

16 August 2024, Tibetan Review

Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), the western half of Tibet proper which China calls Xizang (or Xizang Autonomous Region), is home to 41% of China's total glaciers, 16.5% of its water resources, 30% of its grasslands, 18.3% of its wetlands and 40% of its lake area, reported China's official Xinhua news agency Aug 16.

These percentages will rise enormously if the other historically Tibetan areas that are under Chinese rule are also taken into consideration, especially Qinghai, made up of the bulk of Tibet's historical Amdo (or Domey) province and a section of Kham (or Dotoe) province.

The report gave these details in the context of the coming into force on Oct 1, 2024, of a regulation on the protection of the glaciers in the region, citing a press release issued by the Standing Committee of the People's Congress of TAR on Aug 15.

The report noted that the regulation came after China's law on ecological conservation on the Tibetan Plateau was enacted in Sep 2023, the first state-level legislation specialized in regulating ecological conservation on the plateau.

The regulation is stated to provide specific guidelines for governments and relevant departments in glacier areas, introduce a responsibility system and performance evaluation mechanism for glacier protection goals, and establish punitive measures for violations.

The regulation will effectively protect glacier resources, ensure the ecological safety of the Tibetan Plateau, and contribute to the preservation of the plateau's flora, fauna and landscapes, Zhao Guiying, deputy director of the Legislative Affairs Commission of the Standing Committee of the People's Congress of the TAR has said.

Surrounded by the flames

16 August 2024, ORF, Harsh V. Pant

With multiple fires burning around India, what is astounding is not India's seeming inability to manage those fires but its remarkable success in insulating itself from those flames

Events in Bangladesh continue to reverberate across the region. But their consequences would take a long time to reveal themselves. Even before the collapse of the Sheikh Hasina Wazed government, the region was reeling under a host of challenges. It appears that the political and the economic turmoil in most of the region's nations, except India, are taking a toll.

Pakistan has been in a state of flux for quite some time now. Afghanistan under the Taliban has had no success in getting rid of its pariah status despite a lot of effort. The seemingly never-ending political transition in Nepal has resulted in a sense of fatigue. Myanmar continues to drift towards being a failed State as the military junta has ceded space to a plethora of non-State actors that have found it difficult to coordinate their actions on the ground. And the effects of Sri Lanka's economic crisis continue to shape its political trajectory with no clear sense of purpose.

Bangladesh under Wazed was giving everyone a false sense of stability even as the ground beneath her had begun to shift. As the people of Bangladesh and the entire region come to terms with a post-Wazed political and social landscape, there has been a sense of despondency about the future in popular and intellectual discourses. This specifically relates to India's supposed failure in the region at a time when Indian policymakers have talked about their nation as a leading global player with a rising profile on the international stage.

Bangladesh under Wazed was giving everyone a false sense of stability even as the ground beneath her had begun to shift.

There are three aspects to this debate that need highlighting. First, changes in global balance of power have ensured that there is no such thing as 'South Asia' anymore. South Asia might have been a mental map for geopolitical articulations at some point in time but today that kind of strategic mapping no longer makes sense. India and its surroundings are now part of a wider Indo-Pacific, a geography that is as much a function of China's spectacular rise as it is of India's rise and New Delhi's need to develop critical linkages with East and Southeast Asia as well as the wider Pacific. The shift from an India-Pakistan binary to a Sino-Indian one is a reality that New Delhi will have to contend with along with all its attendant costs and opportunities. China's partnerships with India's neighbours and its growing presence in the Indian Ocean region are manifestations of this dynamic. There is no going back to South Asia anymore. Consequently, as geopolitical contestations among major powers get sharpened, they will impact India's periphery. Some of that was evident in the downfall of Wazed as well. Second, New Delhi's centrality in its backyard is declining. But there was never a golden age of Indian hegemony in its backyard. Right from Independence, India's perceived hegemony was challenged by its neighbours, with Pakistan taking it to extremes. While Islamabad's morbid fascination with ensuring equality with India ensured its downfall, India's other neighbours also did their best to balance Indian preponderance in the region. There were times New Delhi used military or economic coercion to get its way but it almost always turned out to India's disadvantage. It is easy to forget how dire India's ties with Bangladesh were before Wazed assumed power 15 years back. Even under her, China was Bangladesh's most important defence partner. The agency of Indian neighbours should never be underestimated and New Delhi's ability to manage the region should never be overestimated.

The final aspect pertains to India's own regional profile. With multiple fires burning around India, what is astounding is not India's seeming inability to manage those fires but its remarkable success in insulating itself from those flames. New Delhi has shown that despite the challenges in its neighbourhood, Indian foreign policy and its corresponding global profile have only grown. That's a tribute to Indian resilience and a cause for celebration on India's 78th Independence Day.

Xi balances between professionalism and political control of the PLA

15 August 2024, East Asia Forum, Yoram Evron

Chinese President Xi Jinping's relationship with the People's Liberation Army (PLA) is marked by frequent purges, recurring organisational reforms and deep-seated distrust, despite continued military modernisation efforts. Xi's strategy of assertive rhetoric and limited military use aims to cultivate China's (and his own) powerful image and placate the PLA, without engaging in full-scale warfare, but ongoing political interferences, purges, and reforms raise questions about the PLA's actual strength and ability to control escalation dynamics.

The tumultuous relationship between Chinese President Xi Jinping and the People's Liberation Army (PLA) is marked by frequent purges, recurring reforms and persistent expressions of distrust. Simultaneously, Xi advances military modernisation and assigns the military a role in foreign policy not seen for decades. This dual approach intensifies the tension between military professionalism and political loyalty, reaching levels not seen since the Mao era.

But Xi's lack of trust in the PLA raises concerns about its effectiveness in crisis. Launching a war would also give PLA leaders greater political influence, a situation Xi might be reluctant to accept. What does this indicate about China's military modernisation and recent assertiveness?

A possible explanation is that China's recent incendiary rhetoric and frequent yet limited use of the PLA does not necessarily signal a reckless use of force. Rather, it may reflect a strategy to deter adversaries without engaging in full-scale warfare, while concurrently placating the PLA.

Xi's complex relationship with the military has been especially chaotic throughout 2023–24. In March 2023, former defence minister Wei Fenghe, who previously commanded the Rocket Force, vanished from public view. A few months later, the defence minister at the time, Li Shangfu, who had headed the Central Military Commission's Equipment Development Department, also disappeared, only to be officially removed in October. Both were expelled from the Chinese Communist Party in June 2024.

In December 2023, nine generals were ousted from the top legislature, including General Ju Qiansheng, commander of the PLA's Strategic Support Force, and three aerospace executives from China's military-industrial complex who were purged. They are not alone – more senior cadres, many linked to the PLA's pivotal Rocket Force and the military-industrial complex, had also been purged during this period.

In addition, organisational reforms initiated by Xi just eight years earlier have been partially revised.

The replacement of established bodies has altered the PLA's command structure and its lines of subordination to the Central Military Commission and Xi himself. Notably, the Strategic Support Force, formed in December 2015 to oversee aerospace and cyber units, was dissolved in early 2024.

Any belief that these moves stabilised the Party's relationship with the military was disproven by the June 2024 Military Political Work Conference that was held for the first time in a decade. Symbolically, it was held in Yan'an, the historic revolutionary base. Expressing deep dissatisfaction with the PLA's conduct, Xi emphasised the need for a strong, loyal, corruption-free and capable military under Party guidelines and supervision. He stressed ideological transformation, strict anti-corruption measures and the revitalisation of the PLA's commissar system. Xi also underscored the importance of learning from historical roots, urging PLA commanders to visit the PLA's Civil War-era headquarters.

These measures collectively reflect Xi's distrust of the PLA, both politically and operationally, despite its impressive progress over the last two decades. Since the 1980s, and especially in the past 25 years, the PLA's budget has skyrocketed. This has enabled extensive modernisation in nearly every area, including weaponry, command and control, doctrine and training. Recent purges may further advance the PLA's modernisation by removing unprofessional and corrupt officers.

But the PLA is likely not as formidable as China would like others to believe. Xi's rule of fear, extensive political activities within PLA units, and pervasive corruption across the armed forces and the defence industry offset much of the positive impact of modernisation measures. The revival of dual leadership with political commissars further diminishes any benefits.

These factors create widespread paralysis, inefficiency, the promotion of unqualified commanders, insufficient training and other maladies reminiscent of the Mao era, which reforms since the late 1970s have attempted to address. The Ukraine War provides a pertinent context for understanding these sources of weakness. Observing the conflict, Xi might recognise the risks and costs associated with large-scale military operations.

Unwilling to compromise on China's – and his own – image of strength, Xi aims to cultivate such a reputation without engaging in significant military conflicts that could expose weaknesses and result in substantial losses. Instead of outright military action, he emphasises deterrence, particularly regarding Taiwan. By sounding the drumbeats of war and emphasising military readiness, Xi seeks to deter any adversary from challenging China's red lines.

This approach not only strengthens China's assertive posture but also mitigates the risks associated with full-scale warfare. Simultaneously, it provides the PLA with a sense of purpose and mission, ideally minimising the risk of political interference. The crucial question remains whether Xi's China can maintain control over these escalation dynamics.

COMMENT: Sino-Indian relations warm, but Delhi sticking to a neutral middle path

15 August 2024, Intellinews, Ben Aris

Recent signs of improved relations between India and China, such as progress in border dispute talks and a more open stance toward Chinese investment, suggest a tactical shift rather than a fundamental realignment in India's geopolitical strategy, Capital Economics said in a note.

The changing relations between the world's two most populous countries underscores a broader trend among emerging markets (EMs) that are increasingly courting Chinese investment to strengthen their positions in the evolving global economy, even as they continue to lean towards the West.

Unlike the Cold War era, where the world was divided into two ideological camps of socialism and capitalism, since the start of the 1990s everyone is a capitalist. However, as the leading emerging markets have developed over the last three decades they have started to flex their geopolitical muscles, which has led to tensions. Capital Economics earlier described this as a fractured world where countries have coalesced into two groups centred on the US and the Sino-Russia alliance.

In this new world India has historically sought "strategic autonomy" and strives to keep a neutral non-aligned position, but in the current geopolitical landscape, it is increasingly aligning with the West, driven by both security concerns and economic opportunities, Shilan Shah argues, the deputy chief emerging markets economist at Capital Economics.

The long-standing border dispute in the Himalayas with China, particularly the tensions that escalated in 2020, has reinforced India's wariness of its northern neighbour. Additionally, the US offers significant friendshoring opportunities as global supply chains shift, particularly in sectors like mobile phone and semiconductor manufacturing, where India has seen a surge in its global market share.

But more recently India has warmed to both Russia and China in defiance of international pressure to make Moscow a pariah. Modi was in Moscow in July, where he was warmly greeted by Russian President Vladimir Putin and negotiated for long-term oil and fertiliser supply deals. Modi shrugged off the muted criticism from the West for his Moscow visit, highlighting that he would act in what he saw as India's best interests, irrespective of how that is perceived in the West.

Likewise, Indian policymakers appear to be warming to the idea of more Chinese investment to fuel the rapid development of India's economy, which is also leading to better relations with Beijing.

Another consequence of Russia's war in Ukraine and the resulting extreme sanctions regime has been to push the Global South countries closer together as they seek safety in numbers in the face of increasing aggression by the world's leading powers. This change was manifest in both of last year's G20 summit and the expanding BRICS+ group, but not limited to these two. Both China and India have indicated a willingness to resolve their border issues, with the creation of five "buffer zones" where troops have been withdrawn and patrols ceased, marking a rare moment of cooperation.

And Delhi has reversed its hesitance to host major Chinese industrial investments. A year ago, it blocked BYD's attempt to establish an electric vehicle factory in India. India's flagship Annual Economic Survey noted that "developing countries will have to figure out a way of... boosting domestic manufacturing capabilities, sometimes with the collaboration of Chinese investment and technology" – a sentiment that was recently repeated by Finance Minister Nirmala Sitharaman.

"Some have suggested that these developments indicate a shift in India's geopolitical alignment. This isn't unheard of: over the past couple of years, a number of EMs including Saudi Arabia and South Africa have moved towards China's sphere of influence with their own strategic interests in mind," says Shah. While some observers suggest these moves could indicate a shift in India's geopolitical alignment, this interpretation seems premature, says Shah. The border negotiations remain fragile, and any miscalculation could reignite tensions. India remains deeply concerned about China's military presence in the Indian Ocean and its alliance with Pakistan. At the same time, India is equally annoyed with the US, which also maintains cordial relations with Pakistan, and incensed Delhi by agreeing to a deal to supply Islamabad with advanced F-16 jet fighter planes last year, which has only reinforced its strategic autonomy policy.

And India is hedging its bets with China too. Part of the talks between Modi and Putin covered an order for Russia's advanced S-400 missile system that India has already paid for, but yet to receive, which it intends to install all along its border with China. Likewise, China has been building dozens of "border guardian" settlements in the Himalayas at the end of any traversable valley and paying people to go and live there, partly as a regional development programme, but also as a passive early warning network to protect against invading forces. The settlements have also been built on the borders with Bhutan and Nepal, according to a recent The New York Times (NYT) investigation.

Moreover, India's membership of the Quad – a security dialogue that includes the US, Japan and Australia – along with its stringent policies against Chinese smartphone apps, reaffirms India's ongoing mistrust of Beijing.

The slight warming in Sino-Indian ties does not negate the advantages of aligning with the US, particularly in capturing the benefits of friendshoring. For example, India's global share of mobile phone and semiconductor exports continues to grow, underscoring the economic benefits of this alignment. However, India's engagement with China reflects a broader strategy seen in several EMs, which are balancing relations with both China and the West to maximise economic benefits. This approach, exemplified by India's potential acceptance of Chinese investment in infrastructure, aims to enhance its appeal as a manufacturing hub while carefully managing geopolitical risks, says Shah.

Elsewhere, countries like Morocco and Hungary are also benefiting from Chinese investment, particularly in green technology and electric vehicles, while maintaining strong economic ties with Europe and the US. Hungary, for instance, has seen a surge in Chinese foreign direct investment (FDI), making it one of the top recipients globally, despite its alignment with the US bloc.

In Central Asia, the five 'Stans, squeezed between Russia and China, have been a lot more cautious to keep China at arms-length and will search for other investors and creditors first to diversify their exposure, only accepting Chinese investment if no other viable alternative can be found.

As China's domestic growth slows, its firms are likely to continue investing overseas, driven by the need for higher returns and the desire to bypass Western protectionist measures. For some EMs, this presents an opportunity not just for capital inflows but also for the transfer of technological and managerial expertise. However, the balancing act could become more challenging if the US, China rivalry intensifies. "Courting both sides could become harder for EMs if the US and China become more aggressive in pushing to exclude each other's inputs from their supply chains. For example, if the US were to prevent goods containing certain Chinese components from being sold domestically, then firms anywhere hoping to sell to the US would have to exclude them too," says Shah. There are some signs that this is already happening. For example, Indonesia is attempting to reduce Chinese investment in new nickel mining projects in order to qualify for tax breaks in the US. The US has also introduced smart sanctions on Russia in December, where Office of Foreign Assets Control (OFAC) is increasingly targeting third countries supplying Russia with "priority goods" and threatening their companies with secondary sanctions. "Only time will tell if this is the direction that fracturing will take. But for some EMs, greater Chinese investment now could prove fruitful, not only in terms of higher capital spending but through the transfer of technological and managerial know-how," concludes Shah.

Coercive annexation of Taiwan by the People's Republic of China would unleash globally destructive consequences, Rice Baker Institute report says

15 August 2024, Rice University

A new paper from Rice University's Baker Institute for Public Policy argues that an annexation of Taiwan by the People's Republic of China (PRC) would trigger economic shocks and diminish the quality of life for populations across Asia and beyond, as well as have devastating impacts on American interests and Americans' well-being.

Gabe Collins, Baker Botts Fellow in Energy and Environmental Regulatory Affairs at the Baker Institute, and his coauthor Andrew Erickson, professor of strategy at the U.S. Naval War College, say an annexation of Taiwan would be one of the most dangerous, consequential flashpoints on the planet. The paper aims to address the economic, military and geopolitical impacts of coercive annexation, with particular focus on semiconductors, weapons systems, allies and partners.

"At stake are crucial interests such as the semiconductors that power today's big data world and the national security of U.S. allies and partners," the paper reads. "Neighboring states' responses to PRC expansion could also result in the erosion of American military advantages as well as the destabilization of democracy and the international order."

As a global commodity, microchips are as important as oil, Collins and Erickson argue. There are currently only two places in the world that produce the latest generation of silicon chips – in Taiwan by Taiwan

Semiconductor Manufacturing Company Limited and in South Korea by Samsung.

"If China could capture Taiwan with minimal direct use of military force, it could potentially obtain a near-monopoly over one of the 21st century's most critical economic inputs," the authors wrote. "That could help to catapult Beijing into a position of global preeminence and, in turn, might allow China to dominate the world economy even in the face of sanctions."

Semiconductors are essential to the modern economy with approximately $600 billion worth produced globally each year, according to the report. The semiconductors are added into physical items collectively worth multiple trillions of dollars, and the services delivered by these devices – such as smartphones, data centers or cars – amount to tens of trillions of dollars annually.

Collins and Erickson argue that coercive annexation brings the possibility of major disruption of Taiwan-origin semiconductor supplies that could temporarily halt technological progress and could slow global economic growth for years thereafter.

The authors argue that American policymakers must act urgently to deter PRC aggression and maximize U.S. capabilities to prevent China from coercively annexing Taiwan and creating long-term economic strife.

Imposing on questions of faith will get China nowhere

15 August 2024, Hindustan Times, Dhundup Gyalpo

It is high time for other countries to step up and clarify their stance on whether the Tibetan people have the right to religious belief and the freedom to choose their own religious leaders, thereby helping prevent China from creating an embarrassing situation for itself.

These days, one often hears that China may choose the next Dalai Lama. Alarming as it may sound to many around the globe, my answer is invariably and emphatically: It does not matter. For the Tibetan people, it does not matter if China chooses its own Dalai Lama. Just as with the Chinese-appointed Panchen Lama, a Chinese-appointed Dalai Lama will only cause embarrassment for China. Despite Beijing's all-out efforts to promote their Panchen Lama as an authentic spiritual leader, the Tibetan people have firmly and wholeheartedly refused to offer him even a modicum of obeisance.

Unlike the Panchen Lama's case, where the real Panchen Lama along with his entire family have "disappeared", when that critical time eventually dawns upon us, the world will have another Dalai Lama, born in a free country, recognised in accordance with Tibetan religious traditions and customs, and chosen as per the clear instructions left behind by the current Dalai Lama.

Despite China's complete occupation of Tibet since the Dalai Lama's escape into exile in 1959, it still lacks legitimacy for its rule over Tibet. It, therefore, continuously insists that other countries recognise Tibet as a part of China. Since the Dalai Lama has been historically the supreme temporal and spiritual head of Tibet, if China can somehow arrogate to itself the right to recognise and choose the next Dalai Lama, selecting a docile one, it would help legitimise its rule over Tibet. This is inherently flawed.

Tibetans revere the Dalai Lama as the emanation of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of compassion and the patron saint of Tibet. He is the ultimate symbol of Tibet as a nation and its people. The process of search and recognition of a reincarnation may seem complex and intricate to outsiders, it's important to note that since 1391, the Dalai Lama has been reincarnated 13 times. The institution of the Dalai Lama, in stark contrast to the People's Republic of China established only in 1949, is ancient and experienced enough to manage all potential future scenarios.

Let me briefly set the basics straight on the issue of reincarnation. The following excerpt from the present Dalai Lama's interview to TIME in 2004 should offer some insight: "The institution of the Dalai Lama, and whether it should continue or not, is up to the Tibetan people. If they feel it is not relevant, then it will cease and there will be no 15th Dalai Lama. But if I die today, I think they will want another Dalai Lama. The purpose of reincarnation is to fulfill the previous [incarnation's] life task. My life is outside Tibet, therefore, my reincarnation will logically be found outside. But then, the next question: Will the Chinese accept this or not? China will not accept. The Chinese government most probably will appoint another Dalai Lama, as it did with the Panchen Lama. Then there will be two Dalai Lamas: one, the Dalai Lama of the Tibetan heart, and one that is officially appointed."

The mind-boggling conundrum such a situation presents for Beijing was highlighted back in 2013 by a professor at the Party School of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party in Beijing. In an interview with Asia Weekly, professor Jin Wei noted that treating the Dalai Lama as an "enemy" alienated all six million Tibetans who revere him as "the living Buddha." She said, "The Dalai Lama is the key to the issue of Tibet," and recommended that China should resume its stalled dialogue with him. According to Jin Wei, China's ultimate goal should be to avoid an embarrassing situation that throws up two Dalai Lamas. She believed that if China could control the selection of the next Dalai Lama's reincarnation, the party would gain the goodwill of all Tibetans and weaken the Tibetan independence forces working outside the country. Unfortunately, both then and now, good sense has yet to prevail in China.

The system of reincarnation, unique to Tibetan Buddhism, is a purely religious matter rooted entirely in people's faith. No force can impose faith upon people. And in matters of faith, there is no room for compromise, flexibility, or doubt: Either people believe someone is the reincarnation, or they don't; there are no maybes.

The United States, through various legislative acts concerning Tibet, has sent a clear and strong message to China that it stands firmly in solidarity with the Tibetan people. It is high time for other countries to step up and clarify their stance on whether the Tibetan people have the right to religious belief and the freedom to choose their own religious leaders, thereby helping prevent China from creating an embarrassing situation for itself.

Beijing intensifies gray tactics against Taiwan

14 August 2024, GIS, Junhua Zhang

Newly elected Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te is struggling to counter the creative use of pressure coming from China.

Three months after President Lai Ching-te took office in Taiwan, Beijing continues to seek ways to make life difficult for the new leader. At the beginning, despite Mr. Lai's measured rhetoric (from his perspective) at his May 20 inauguration, the reaction in China was extreme displeasure. The Chinese State Council's Taiwan Affairs Office slammed Mr. Lai for "stubbornly adhering to the 'Taiwan independence' position," while Foreign Minister Wang Yi accused him of "betraying the nation and his ancestors in a disgraceful way."

Beijing's response was largely triggered by President Lai's refusal to deliver his inaugural speech in accordance with Chinese expectations. Officials described the address as even more pro-independence than those of previous Taiwanese leaders, and as a point of no return. Since then, Beijing has given clear signals as to the implications of this perception, with consequences for cross-strait relations over the next four years.

The approach of Lai Ching-te

Mr. Lai did not mention a single word about Taiwanese "independence" in his speech. But unlike his scholarly predecessor, Tsai Ing-wen (2016-2024), the current leader's governance style is seen as more "manly" and unafraid of conflict, while lacking a degree of sophistication. Compared to his predecessors, he comes closer to what Beijing considers the red line around the issue of Taiwanese independence.

For example, the "two-state theory" drafted by former President Lee Teng-hui (1988-2000) has gone through a 25-year-long evolution from ambiguity to clarity. In his first address, Lai Ching-te was more forceful in elaborating on the cross-strait issue, avoiding mention of the Cross-Strait Act, which implies that the two sides of the Taiwan Strait belong to the same China. He also used the term "China" throughout the speech, instead of "the other side of the Taiwan Strait" or "Beijing," terms purposely used in Ms. Tsai's inaugural speeches of 2016 and 2020 to avoid anger from mainland China.

While Ms. Tsai's "one-China" hopes seemed to persist, however obscured, in the eyes of Beijing, Mr. Lai's positioning on cross-strait relations has transformed strategic ambiguity into strategic clarity. In a June interview, President Lai emphasized "dignity and reciprocity" in his dealings with China, and invited Chinese President Xi Jinping to share with Taiwan the responsibility for peace and stability in the region and to create prosperity. It has become clear that this line of messaging has had no effect on the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) attitude.

China's response

Facing President Lai's "iron fist in a velvet glove," Beijing quickly adopted various measures – both soft and hard, internal and external – with the clear intention of trying to hinder Mr. Lai's government.

Beijing's intimidation began with military power. Just three days after the inauguration, China began a two-day, large-scale military drill. It is worth comparing this to a previous episode. When former United States Speaker of the House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi led a delegation to Taiwan in August 2022, the People's Liberation Army (PLA) also conducted a military drill and organized live-fire exercises in six sea and air areas surrounding the island.

This time, despite the lack of live-fire operations, the "pockets" were tightened – in other words, the scope and degree of deterrence were significantly greater than following Ms. Pelosi's visit. At the same time, Beijing continued to use various military aircraft to fly over the center line of the Taiwan Strait. Soon, it even appeared that civilian aircraft were being used to fly over Taiwan-controlled Kinmen.

Along with military signals, Beijing has stepped up its information war against Taiwan, spreading a great deal of disinformation in Taiwanese media. It has also taken economic measures, such as suspending tariff concessions for some products under the Cross-Strait Economic Cooperation Framework Agreement and erecting trade barriers to more Taiwanese products on antidumping grounds. Diplomatically, Beijing has increased efforts to isolate Taiwan and intimidate its allies.

Tactical adjustments

At the same time, the Chinese government under President Xi has changed its approach this year. This is reflected in two ways. On the one hand, prior to President Lai's inauguration, the Kuomintang (KMT) party in Taiwan had positive interactions with the government in Beijing. The culmination was an April 10 meeting between former KMT Taiwanese President Ma Ying-jeou (2008-2016) and Mr. Xi. By meeting with an outgoing president who is no longer in the political arena, and scheduling the meeting one month before Taiwan's new president was sworn in, Mr. Xi aimed to convey the message that, given the choice, Beijing would still prefer "peaceful reunification" with Taiwan over a costly reincorporation by force. According to sources familiar with the matter, Mr. Ma even submitted a report to the Chinese side on specific issues such as the country's proposed name after a future cross-strait reunification.

Although China has not reported these developments, Beijing has a high opinion of these positive interactions with the KMT. It gave Beijing good reason to believe that there is still enough room to further exploit the position of KMT, as well as the Taiwan People's Party (TPP), to the point of discrediting and paralyzing Mr. Lai's government. This led to a chain of events in which the KMT and the TPP, which have a majority in the Executive Yuan, turned on Mr. Lai's Democratic Progressive Party after his inauguration, with the outcome still uncertain.

Beijing will generally not use force until it has exhausted its gray tactics and other means of creating divisions in Taiwan.

The other area of China's change in strategy was diplomacy. Beijing has decided to take every measure to reduce U.S. pressure in East Asia. The military cooperation between Japan, South Korea and the U.S. established by the administration of President Joe Biden is a major threat to China's incorporation of Taiwan by force. To this end, in May, Beijing restarted a meeting of the leaders of China, Japan and South Korea after over four years of hiatus. Chinese Premier Li Qiang called for greater contributions to regional prosperity and stability, seeking to use the bait of new cooperation to pick apart the U.S.-Japan-South Korea alliance.

It is important to realize that China is Japan's largest trading partner, export destination and import source, with bilateral trade totaling $317 billion in 2023. China is also South Korea's largest trading partner, largest export market and largest import source, with their trade amounting to $310 billion last year. This economic dependence is a card in Beijing's hand.

Xi's Taiwan timeline

Although the CCP has never disclosed (and will never disclose) a timeline for the "liberation" of Taiwan, President Xi's unwillingness to leave the issue unresolved during his third or fourth five-year term in office is obvious to all. While Mr. Xi made a point of recently telling European Commission President Ursula Von der Leyen, in an effort to win European sympathy, that Washington was trying to "goad Beijing into attacking Taiwan" (as if China itself had no intention of doing so), there are increasingly hints that the timetable is changing.

Zhang Weiwei, a professor at Fudan University and a favorite of the Chinese propaganda ministry, claimed publicly that Taiwan's recent election might be its last. He Lei, a former PLA official, also recently said that the complete reunification of the motherland was growing nearer. What Beijing fears is that if President Lai Ching-te stays in his position for eight years, the mindset of "Taiwan independence" will be even more deeply embedded in the minds of the island's younger generation, and it will be difficult to eradicate it even with a change of political parties. The time pressure is thus increasing.

The Lai tenure so far

Fully matching the new president's character, Taiwan under Mr. Lai appears set to be more determined to pursue high-end military hardware, such as submarines and fighter jets, and focus on military training to defend against a Chinese invasion. But all of this will do little to stop China's gradual imposition of coercive control through law enforcement and other nonlethal, "gray" tactics. Taiwan is trying to take steps to counter the mainland's salami slicing.

Taiwan's previous administration clearly disappointed and confused many young people during its eight-year tenure on social issues, especially housing and employment. And that legacy is now being borne by President Lai Ching-te. He leads a minority government without a majority in the Legislative Yuan, which would already have made it difficult for him to govern, not to mention that the opposition party in the legislature is trying to reduce the scope of the president's power.

In polls after Mr. Lai's inaugural speech, 53 percent of those who watched were satisfied with his May 20 inaugural address, 28 percent were dissatisfied, and 19 percent had no opinion. Some 47 percent of respondents said they trusted Mr. Lai, compared to 34 percent who did not trust him and 20 percent with no opinion.

Nearly a month later, a poll by the Taiwan Public Opinion Foundation found that the number of people approving of President Lai's handling of the country's affairs has decreased by 9.8 percent, suggesting that he has lost support from nearly 2 million people since taking office. Arguably, China's combination of soft and hard means – and the use of Taiwan's internal contradictions to stoke polarization – has so far achieved certain results for Beijing.

The role of the U.S.

Washington has long pursued a policy of strategic ambiguity toward Taiwan, meaning it does not indicate exactly how it would respond if Beijing were to attack Taiwan. Facing the upcoming November election, both the Democrats and former President Donald Trump are competing to sound tough on Taiwan.

President Biden has made it clear that the U.S. will not stand idly by should Beijing attack Taiwan. Admiral Samuel Paparo, the new commander of the U.S. Indo-Pacific Command, outlined during the Shangri-La Dialogue in Singapore a "hellscape" response scenario by the U.S. military in the event of an invasion of Taiwan by the PLA. Although there have sometimes been harsh voices, the Biden administration has generally preferred to stick to strategic ambiguity, with a continued arming of Taiwan becoming the White House's preferred option. The Pentagon recently established the Taiwan Advanced Integration Team to help Taipei get the weapons and military assistance it needs more quickly. So far, President Biden has implemented 15 arms sales to Taiwan since 2021 to strengthen its defenses.

At the same time, the U.S. government is also clearly putting pressure on Mr. Lai to avoid excessive expressions of "Taiwanese independence." As U.S. House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul has warned, Beijing's one-China policy has "certain red lines" that should not be crossed, even if U.S. policy does not recognize Chinese sovereignty over Taiwan.

Scenarios

Beijing will generally not use force until it has exhausted its gray tactics and other means of creating divisions in Taiwan. Of course, these methods are backed by military power. Neither Taiwan nor the U.S. seem to have effective countermeasures to China's approach. The biggest challenge for President Lai is to adjust his relationship with Taiwanese opposition parties to deal with the mainland's tactics. Assuming that Beijing will persist in using such gray methods against the Lai government over the next several years, three scenarios are relevant.

More likely: KMT triumph

One is that President Lai allows the pro-China factions among the KMT and the TPP to grow in power in the Legislative Yuan to the point where the function of the Executive Yuan is objectively paralyzed. In this scenario, the KMT wins the next round of elections and will secure governing power.

More likely: Domestic compromise

In a second scenario, Mr. Lai quickly learns to deal with the opposition parties and manages to compromise. At the same time, he effectively solves domestic problems (such as in housing and energy) and, in doing so, eases the relationship with China, allowing Taiwan to buy time.

Less likely: Tensions exacerbate within the next four years

A third outcome would see China start to impose sanctions on the so-called "Taiwan Independents" and use the pro-China fraction of the KMT to further polarize Taiwanese society, which also suffers from the KMT's own incompetence. As a result, cross-strait relations become extremely tense, leading to military action.

Pakistan's Role In Protecting Chinese Interests In CPEC – OpEd

14 August 2024, Eurasia Review, Dr. Sahibzada Muhammad Usman

The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) is hailed as a milestone in the strategic partnership between China and Pakistan. This ambitious project, a key component of China's "Belt and Road Initiative," aims to enhance connectivity and cooperation through an extensive network of roads, railways, and pipelines. The CPEC project, with an investment of $62 billion, is poised to transform Pakistan's economy by creating employment opportunities, improving infrastructure, and promoting regional integration. However, despite these promising prospects, the security of Chinese workers and engineers involved in CPEC projects has emerged as a significant concern, threatening the very foundation of this crucial partnership.

The safety and security of Chinese nationals working on CPEC projects in Pakistan have become a serious issue due to the persistent threat of terrorist attacks by Baloch separatists and their affiliated militant groups, particularly the Tehreek-e-Taliban Pakistan (TTP). These groups, driven by various motives, have targeted Chinese citizens, viewing them as symbols of the CPEC initiative that they oppose. The most high-profile attacks have occurred from Karachi to Gwadar, exposing the vulnerabilities in the security arrangements promised by Pakistani authorities to their Chinese counterparts.

The Baloch Liberation Army (BLA), a separatist group, has been at the forefront of these attacks, demanding that China cease its involvement in CPEC and withdraw from Baluchistan. The BLA has repeatedly warned Beijing against signing new CPEC deals with Islamabad, condemning China's role in the Gwadar port project. These threats have not only endangered Chinese lives but also shaken the confidence of Chinese investors, who now demand foolproof security measures from Pakistan.

Security analysts have noted that the increasing frequency of attacks on Chinese interests in Pakistan has damaged the perception of invulnerability that Pakistani authorities had sought to project. Beijing, as the largest foreign investor in Pakistan, now faces significant security concerns that could potentially affect its future investments in the country. While Pakistan has blamed "foreign elements" for these attacks, arguing that their primary goal is to sabotage Pakistan-China relations and the CPEC project, the damage to the confidence of Chinese stakeholders is undeniable.

These terrorist attacks have claimed precious lives and strained the relations between the two nations. The hesitancy of China to pursue new CPEC projects, as indicated by reports of limited progress during recent high-level visits, reflects the growing apprehensions within Chinese leadership. Although official statements from both countries have maintained a positive tone, the underlying concerns are palpable. During a meeting with Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif, Chinese President Xi Jinping expressed hope that Pakistan would create a "safe and stable business environment" to guarantee the safety of Chinese personnel and projects.

The Pakistani government has assured the Chinese leadership that it is taking all necessary measures to address the security challenges posed by these terrorist groups. According to Pakistani security officials, stringent measures are being implemented under a comprehensive policy aimed at eliminating the terrorists involved in attacks against Chinese citizens. Intelligence sharing between Pakistani and Chinese authorities is ongoing, reflecting the seriousness with which both nations are addressing these threats.

The complex nature of the security challenges faced by Chinese workers in Pakistan is further complicated by the involvement of various militant groups. Beyond the Baloch militants and the TTP, the East Turkestan Islamic Movement (ETIM), a group seeking to establish a separate state in China's Muslim-majority Xinjiang province, has also been implicated in these attacks. Many ETIM militants had settled in North Waziristan in the late 1990s, where they developed close ties with Taliban elements. These relationships have persisted, enabling coordinated attacks on Chinese residents working on CPEC projects.

Pakistan's efforts to counter these threats have included the arrest and extradition of numerous ETIM militants to China. However, despite these efforts, the attacks on Chinese citizens in Pakistan have not ceased, underscoring the need for more vigorous and comprehensive measures to dismantle the networks of terrorists involved. The persistent nature of these threats demands a sustained and multi-faceted approach that goes beyond immediate security responses.

The success of the CPEC project and, by extension, the stability of Pakistan-China relations hinges on the ability of Pakistan to address these security concerns effectively. The continuation of terrorist attacks not only jeopardizes the lives of Chinese citizens but also threatens to derail the broader objectives of CPEC. A failure to provide a secure environment for Chinese investments could lead to a decline in Chinese enthusiasm for future projects, which would have far-reaching consequences for Pakistan's economic development and regional integration goals.

The race to choose the next Dalai Lama China and India disagree over reincarnation

14 August 2024, UnHerd, Christopher Harding

This time next year, the world may find the arcana of Tibetan Buddhist reincarnation taking centre stage in global politics. For the 14th Dalai Lama, who celebrated his 89th birthday a few weeks ago, has long promised to reveal his succession plans when he turns

90. In the past, he has suggested that his reincarnation might take place in India or somewhere in the West. This will be a moment fraught with danger for Tibet and Tibetans in exile, but also for relations between two of the most powerful countries on earth: China and India.

Tibet and China go back a long way together, and theirs has rarely been a happy history. At the height of its power in the eighth century, the Tibetan kingdom's armies fought their way into the great capital of Tang China, Chang'an, and occupied it. The Tibetan Empire would later fragment after the last king of Tibet was murdered in 842, and Buddhist teachers known as lamas would eventually come to rule in his place. They helped the Mongols to govern Tibet in the 13th century. Then, in 1279, Kublai Khan established the Yuan Dynasty, the Mongol-led dynasty of China, and Tibet became nominally part of his empire.

The degree of authority over Tibetan affairs exercised by Chinese emperors of the Yuan, Ming and Qing dynasties fluctuated a great deal over time, but in general they preferred indirect influence to outright control. Crucial to these arrangements was the maintaining of good relations with Tibet's Buddhist leaders and in particular its tulkus. These were lineages of men and sometimes women who were regarded as manifestations of a particular bodhisattva: an enlightened being who puts off their entry into paradise in order to help others. By controlling the intermediate realm between death and rebirth, they were able to choose specific human incarnations, again and again, in order to continue their lineage and fulfil their salvific purpose in the world. Among the best-known Tibetan lineages are the Karmapas and the Panchen and Dalai Lamas.

The lineage of the Dalai Lama goes back to the turn of the 15th century, peaking with the "Great 5th" Dalai Lama who united Tibet under his rule in 1642. Subsequent Dalai Lamas enjoyed both spiritual and political authority but found themselves embroiled in struggles for power between neighbouring Mongols and Chinese. In 1720, the Kangxi Emperor of the Qing Dynasty won a decisive victory over a Mongol rival and managed to install his favoured candidate as the 7th Dalai Lama. From then on, China's Qing dynasty regarded Tibet as a protectorate of sorts and the question of a Dalai Lama's reincarnation as very much their business.

Yet the mysteries of reincarnation were often hard to control. Traditionally, an elderly Dalai Lama might leave written information about where he intended to be reincarnated or drop hints during the last weeks of his life. The direction in which the smoke drifted at his cremation might be watched for clues. Senior lamas would weigh these things alongside dreams or intuitions of their own before paying a visit to the homes of children who appeared to be likely candidates. There they might lay in front of the child some of the predecessor's possessions, alongside unrelated objects, to see whether the child recognised the correct items as his own.

Concerned about the political quarrels and corruption that sometimes accompanied this process, and worried more broadly about Tibetans dabbling in divination when this was supposed to be the prerogative of the imperial court, the Qianlong Emperor sought to exert some control over Tibetan reincarnations. In a move that may well have important repercussions next year, the Emperor decided in 1792 to intervene in the process of identifying reincarnations within tulku lineages. Personally doubting the Buddhist doctrine of reincarnation but resigned to managing the people of Tibet on their own terms, the Emperor had a golden urn made and sent to Lhasa. When it came time to identify a reincarnation, candidates identified in the usual way would have their names placed inside the urn. After prayers were said, a single name would be drawn by a Qing official.

This wasn't about luck or having China's preferred candidate fortuitously selected, though it did rather usefully allow for the latter. The Golden Urn method was based on a form of divination already used in branches of China's imperial administration and was intended as a means of avoiding human corruption and allowing fate to take its course. Qing efforts to make the method acceptable to Tibet's elites were helped by the fact that the chosen children frequently came from wealthy and influential families. The Golden Urn method ended up being used, over the decades that followed, to finalise a number of reincarnations. Precisely how many is debated, but they may have included the 10th, 11th and 12th Dalai Lamas.

After the Qing dynasty fell and a Republic of China was proclaimed in 1912, the 13th Dalai Lama sought independence for Tibet. But both the Republic and then, after 1949, the People's Republic continued to regard Tibet as belonging to China. After the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet for India in 1959, China moved steadily to consolidate its control over Tibetan affairs. This included the use in 1995 of the Golden Urn to identify the 11th Panchen Lama. It was an important moment: the Dalai Lama's favoured candidate was rejected and both the candidate and his family were disappeared into "protective" custody. The People's Republic has since gone further still, creating a register of all those who are permitted to reincarnate after death. The state can revoke that permission at any time. It also claims authority over when the search for a new reincarnation may begin.

Much of this appears to be designed to ensure that the 15th Dalai Lama will be a person with whom the Chinese Communist Party can do business. The current Dalai Lama, alongside Tibet's government-in-exile in Dharamsala, India, rejects the idea of using the Golden Urn to identify the next Dalai Lama and insists that no candidate who is effectively chosen by the People's Republic will be acceptable. It is highly likely as a result that within a few years we will have two people both claiming to be the 15th Dalai Lama: one in China selected using the Golden Urn, and another elsewhere chosen in the traditional way. Assuming that both are children – likely, but not inevitable – they will probably have regents speaking and acting on their behalf.

Why would the CCP go to all this trouble? More than a decade ago, the current Dalai Lama relinquished his political authority in favour of a prime minister, or sikyong, elected by Tibetans in exile. But although the Dalai Lama no longer holds political power, over the course of a long life he has become synonymous with Tibet's spirit and its hopes of independence – the question of who succeeds him is therefore enormously important. The United States made clear its position in 2015: Chinese government interference in the Tibetan reincarnation process would go against the internationally recognised right to religious freedom. The Tibetan government has been working hard, of late, to persuade European countries to follow suit, but much will depend on how willing those countries are to risk antagonising China. Standing up to China over Tibet in the Sixties was a relatively cost-free exercise for Westerners. That is no longer true in 2024.

"Standing up to China over Tibet in the Sixties was a relatively cost-free exercise for Westerners. That is no longer true in 2024."

India, meanwhile, will face a particularly difficult decision. Prime Minister Narendra Modi has recently warmed to the Dalai Lama, sending him birthday greetings and attending a Global Buddhist Summit alongside him in 2023. It is all part of an effort to deploy Buddhism as part of India's soft power, especially with countries such as Japan, Vietnam, Sri Lanka and South Korea, in whose cultures Buddhism runs deep. Modi has spoken of India's "Buddhist cousin nations" around the world and of his desire to develop Bodhi Gaya – the place where the Buddha is said to have attained enlightenment – as the "spiritual capital" of Buddhism. In April 2023, India's Ministry of Information and Broadcasting produced "Lessons from Lord Buddha": a compendium of speeches by Modi that emphasise his spiritual debt to Buddhism. India's Prime Minister is, the introduction assures readers, "a huge admirer and follower of Lord Buddha".

India cannot, however, afford to ignore its relationship with China. India recognises China's sovereignty in Tibet and has to tread carefully when it comes to disputed border areas in the Himalayas – many of which are home to significant Buddhist populations. China's leadership has already shown its displeasure, on a number of occasions, with Modi's wooing of the "anti-China" Dalai Lama. It also hopes that a "Buddhism with Chinese characteristics" will be capable of enhancing relations with its neighbours. Both Modi and Xi Jinping, it seems, regard Buddhism as key to their attempts to win friends and influence people in Asia. Modi may also need to worry about how the search for the next Dalai Lama could cause divisions within Tibet's exile community in India. Without the current Dalai Lama there to act as a unifying figure, older rivalries may once again come to the fore. Meanwhile, it is no longer sensible to assume that Beijing's candidate for the 15th Dalai Lama will be uniformly rejected or ignored by Tibetan Buddhist leaders living in Tibet and China. Some of these have made converts among Han Chinese who find the drama of Tibet's landscape and esoteric religious traditions a refreshing – perhaps even a countercultural – alternative to urban Chinese life. For Tibetan monks and lamas ministering to these Han Chinese Buddhists, the backing – or at least the tacit permission – of the Chinese state is essential in going about their work. The countdown, then, is on. A Hindu leader in India, an atheist one in China and their Christian and secular counterparts around the world must soon decide how to respond to what a nonagenarian Tibetan Buddhist will say about his forthcoming reincarnation. Perhaps this strange moment will be the last of its kind. The next Dalai Lama may well lack their predecessor's charisma, gift for communication and international status. The lineage may fall into semi-obscurity as geopolitics moves on. China's leaders may well be hoping for just such a turn of events. For Tibetans in exile, it would be a disaster: their greatest spiritual and diplomatic asset gone, with no-one to take his place. Lacking a homeland and having lost a powerfully symbolic leader, the challenge will be daunting of retaining – perhaps remaking – Tibetan identity.

America's gambit: Putting Tibet in the legal spotlight

13 August 2024, ORF, Udayvir Ahuja

The recently enacted Resolve Tibet Act marks another chapter in America's engagement with the Tibet issue, potentially reinvigorating international attention on the region

Tibet captured global attention following World War II when the People's Republic of China annexed it in 1950. However, in the past two decades, Tibet's struggle for autonomy has largely faded from the forefront of international consciousness, becoming a footnote among the freedom movements of the 21st century.

Tibet captured global attention following World War II when the People's Republic of China annexed it in 1950.

Aside from Nepal and India, which are home to the majority of the Buddhist Tibetan refugees, it is the United States (US), which has arguably played a more significant role in keeping the Tibetan movement alive in the international arena. Most recently, on 12 July 2024, US President Joe Biden signed the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act', also dubbed as the Resolve Tibet Act.

Background

Since the invasion of Tibet by China in October 1950, the region of Tibet has been under Chinese control. For a brief period, a settlement was reached between the Tibetan and Chinese governments, through the Seventeen-Point Agreement, which was signed in 1951. However, due to significant violations of multiple undertakings of the agreement as well as forced reforms in addition to propaganda campaigns against Tibetan culture and history, the Tibetan government legally repudiated the agreement in March 1959. During the same period, there was a short-lived armed revolt by the Tibetan population, in the aftermath of which the 14th and current Dalai Lama fled from Lhasa and took shelter in Dharamshala, India.

Since the invasion of Tibet by China in October 1950, the region of Tibet has been under Chinese control.

Today, Tibet is governed as an autonomous region of China through the administration of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and 12 Tibetan autonomous prefectures or counties in the nearby provinces of Sichuan, Qinghai, Gansu, and Yunnan.

US and Tibet

Historically, the US's policy towards Tibet has fluctuated drastically depending on its relations with China and its geopolitical outlook. In the 1950s and 60s, it provided military and financial aid to Tibetan guerrilla forces. In the 70s and 80s, however, we witnessed a switch where the US had almost zero contact with the Tibetan government in exile as it was trying to strengthen its relations with China. However, from 2000 onwards, it began to refocus its attention on Tibet with the Tibet Policy Act (TPA) of 2002, a core legislation which still acts as a guiding US policy towards Tibet, which states 'It is the policy of the United States to support economic development, cultural preservation, health care, and education and environmental sustainability for Tibetans inside Tibet'. The enactment further went on to establish the position of Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues in the US State Department, talk about the establishment of a US Branch Office in Lhasa and encourage dialogue between China and the Dalai Lama, among other things. Fast-forward to 2018, the US came out with the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act 2018, which directed the Department of State to report to Congress regarding the level of access Chinese authorities granted U.S. tourists, journalists and diplomats to Tibetan areas in China. The 2020 Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TSPA) stipulated that the question of the succession of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, including the Dalai Lama, be decided within the Tibetan Buddhist community, without any interference from the Chinese government. The 2020 Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TSPA) stipulated that the question of the succession of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, including the Dalai Lama, be decided within the Tibetan Buddhist community, without any interference from the Chinese government. The TSPA also imposes sanctions against Chinese officials who engage in said interferences. Resolve Tibet ActThe Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act was introduced as a bipartisan bill by US Senators Jeff Merkley and Todd Young. The Act promotes an unconditional dialogue between the Dalai Lama and the People's Republic of China (PRC) to seek a settlement and further enhance the US's overall support for Tibet.

Key enactments:

1. The definition of Tibet: While the Act does not necessarily change Washington's policy of viewing Tibet as a part of China, it lays down a statutory definition of Tibet that encompasses not only the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) but also Tibetan areas within the Chinese provinces of Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan. Unlike the Chinese government's typical reference to Tibet, which is limited to the TAR, this broader definition aligns with the regions traditionally recognised as Tibet.

2. Self-determination: Section 2 of the Act underlines the 'Right of Self-Determination' of the Tibetan people as laid down in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The right to self-determination is a core principle of international law which provides that every person has the right to self-determination. By the said right, people can freely determine their own political status and freely pursue their economic, social, and cultural development. This has been reinforced by the International Court of Justice in the Wall case (2004), in which it states 'the principle of self-determination of peoples has been enshrined in the United Nations Charter and reaffirmed by the General Assembly in resolution 2625 (XXV), under which "Every State has the duty to refrain from any forcible action which deprives peoples referred to [in that resolution] ... of their right to self-determination". The Act may serve as a catalyst which brings Tibet back into the attention and purview of international law.

3. Tackling Chinese disinformation: The Act amends the TPA by expanding the duties of the Office of the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues to tackle Chinese disinformation about Tibet's history, culture, people, and institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama. This comes amidst a global narrative push by the Chinese government Tibet has "always" been a part of China. A possible reason behind this is to construct a narrative that gives them a right to be in Tibet and that justifies China's record since its takeover in the 1950s. Thus, delegitimise Tibetan nationalism and any question of independence within the international framework. Impact

The Resolve Tibet Act, enacted following a high-level US delegation's meeting with the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala in June 2024, marks another chapter in America's engagement with the Tibet issue, potentially reinvigorating international attention on the region. By emphasising the right to self-determination and challenging China's narrative, the Act raises intriguing questions about Tibet's status in international law. This legislation could serve as a catalyst for bringing Tibet's case before international legal forums, opening new avenues for discourse. However, the practical impact remains uncertain, given China's firm stance and global influence. The Act's effectiveness in opening doors for Tibet in international law will depend on diplomatic manoeuvring, support from other nations, and the complex dynamics of US-China relations. As Tibet remains caught between shifting geopolitical priorities of nations, as with any geopolitical dispute, it is crucial to remember the ongoing toll on the Tibetan Buddhist population since the 1950s.

China's third plenum shows its reform era has entered a new phase

13 August 2024, SCMP, Yang Yao

The Communist Party's long-awaited third plenum seems to not have grabbed the expected amount of attention, both inside and outside China. One of the explanations is that the plenum failed to meet expectations for significant reforms. In particular, there were no announcements of any concrete measures to boost China's low domestic consumption levels – widely acknowledged as a major problem for the country's economy.

However, the third plenum is not oriented towards solving short-term problems. The third plenums of past party congresses put forward long-term strategies. This most recent third plenum was no exception. One of its significant achievements is that it lays out a plan for China in 2035 regarding its economic system. The key is the new goal of implementing a "high-level socialist market economy". Several aspects of this goal are particularly significant for China's policy agenda.

First of all, it implies that the primary stage of socialism, a concept formally proposed in 1987 to describe China's early stage of development, is reaching its endpoint. As that stage comes to a close, so are the institutional arrangements that characterised the first part of China's reform era.

China's economic system is founded on the reforms carried out in the 1990s. With the unification of dual exchange rates in 1994, markets became the main tool to set prices. Many state-owned enterprises were either privatised or went bankrupt. Since then, privately managed businesses have consistently gained ground.

The conventional formula to describe the role of private businesses now is the so-called 56789: the private sector contributes 50 per cent of tax revenue, 60 per cent of gross domestic product, 70 per cent of innovations, 80 per cent of urban employment, and 90 per cent of registered businesses. The Chinese economy is no longer one that is dominated by state-owned enterprises but one that features a mixture of private and public ownership.

Other reforms were no less important, such as policies that replenished China's financial system by successfully removing its non-performing loans. The tax reform of 1994 created a fiscal federal system that is believed to be one of the secrets for China's economic success as it gave local officials strong incentives to grow local economies.

The government reform got rid of a third of the ministries in the central government and downsized civil servants across the board. Finally, accession to the World Trade Organization lifted China's economic opening to new heights, paving the way for its phenomenal growth in exports.

However, the Communist Party's theoretical foundation has not fully reflected these reforms, despite their level of success. Thus, one of the main tasks of the third plenum was to theoretically cement those reforms, with the purpose of creating a high-level socialist market economy. As a mixed economy of both public and private businesses, China will continue to open to the rest of the world and will rely on the market to determine the allocation and pricing of resources.

However, the Communist Party's theoretical foundation has not fully reflected these reforms, despite their level of success. As a mixed economy of both public and private businesses, China will continue to open to the rest of the world and will rely on the market to determine the allocation and pricing of resources.

About 20 per cent of the Chinese population live in places where they do not have local hukou and thus have no access to local benefits. For more than a decade now, the central government and various provinces have initiated hukou reforms, though results have substantially varied. This time, the central government will take an even larger role and authorities are determined to overhaul the hukou system within five years.

Another significant reform that came out of the third plenum addresses local government budgets. The plenum pledges to hand over collection of consumption taxes to local governments to strengthen local budgets. In the meantime, it also proposes that all income (as well as debt) raised by government resources be included in the government budget. One implication of this is local governments' commercial debt will be included in local governments' budgets. This move will hopefully make local debts transparent and thus easier for the public as well as the central government to monitor. Just like the overhaul of the hukou system, the tax reforms are expected to be finished in five years. It will become the ultimate tool to control local debts.

In conclusion, the Communist Party's third plenum laid out a grand plan for China. The proposal to build a high-level socialist market economy system is an affirmation of the reforms carried out in past decades, cementing their results into the party's theoretical framework. With this goal and the other policy initiatives, it will surely be remembered as one of the most important meetings in the Communist Party's history.

Opinion: India's policy on Tibet remains steadfast

13 August 2024, The Week, Dhundup Gyalpo

India may fine-tune its rhetoric on Tibet but will never adopt an anti-Tibet position

In today's tumultuous global geopolitical landscape, there is growing curiosity on whether the Government of India should revisit its Tibet policy. As a Tibetan, I believe it is essential to contextualise this question accurately.

Changing dynamics in the region have often contributed to heightened media speculation on New Delhi resetting ties with Beijing. I vividly recall a brief period of reports of exaggerated bonhomie between India and China, especially following the Wuhan Summit in April 2018 and leading up to the Mamallapuram Summit in October 2019.

During this period, numerous bilateral meetings between Prime Minister Modi and President Xi Jinping suggested a potential reset in Sino-Indian relations. The media also fervently highlighted their personal rapport, showcasing their informal interactions such as tea ceremonies and walks.

At that time, some of our well-wishers expressed concern about whether the Government of India might alter its Tibet policy due to the improving ties with China. I was frequently asked whether there had been any noticeable change in India's policy towards Tibet.

However, following the Galwan Valley clash, relations between the two countries taking a hit dominated media reports.

There is keen interest in deepening India's strategic partnership with the United States, particularly in the military and defence spheres. The U.S. now views India as a key ally in countering China's influence in the Indo-Pacific region. Moreover, the recent passage of the Resolve Tibet Act, signed into law by U.S. President Joe Biden, which refutes Beijing's claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times, has again intensified calls for a reassessment of India's Tibet policy.

Given that the current policy was framed in an entirely different geopolitical era, and considering China's growing belligerence on all fronts, it is quite understandable why the so-called Tibet card is being invoked in discussion every now and then.

Thus, the question arises again: Will the Government of India change its Tibet policy? My answer—then and now—has invariably remained the same. When it comes to core issues, India's stance on Tibet has always been steadfast.

Reflecting the prevailing global geopolitical climate and ongoing border tensions, the Government of India may fine-tune its rhetoric on Tibet, sometimes being vocal and at other times subdued. But I firmly believe that the Indian government will never adopt a position that is anti-Tibet or anti-Tibetan people.

I am confident that my response will remain the same in the future.

What China's Strategists Think About China-US Relations

13 August 2024, The Diplomat, Shannon Tiezzi

Yu Jie, a senior research fellow on China in the Asia-Pacific Program at Chatham House, analyzes Chinese elites' perceptions of the bilateral relationship.

Over the past decade, tensions in the China-U.S. relationship have mounted to the point that many now speak of a "new cold war" between Beijing and Washington. U.S. policymakers have leaned into this dynamic, explicitly framing China as a "strategic competitor" and "America's pacing threat."

How do Chinese elites view the relationship?

That's the question Dr. Yu Jie set out to answer in her new report, "China 'under siege': How the US's hardening China policy is seen in Beijing." Yu Jie, a senior research fellow on China in the Asia-Pacific Program at Chatham House, analyzed publications, officials remarks, and private conversations with top Chinese strategists to understand how elites in China are thinking about the China-U.S. relationship.

In this email interview with The Diplomat, Yu Jie explains common trends in China's thinking about the United States as well as hotspot issues like Taiwan and the war in Ukraine. Overall, she says, "Beijing's strategic community does not expect any significant improvement in the Sino-U.S. relationship before and after the U.S. elections in November 2024."

In 2015, veteran China scholar David Lampton famously warned of a "tipping point" in China-U.S. relations, as American perceptions of China changed dramatically. Your paper traces a similar shift in Chinese perceptions of the U.S. – and hardening of official rhetoric – in the early 2020s. What explains the delay between U.S. and Chinese re-evaluations of the basic state of their relationship?

There are three main reasons of this delay in adjusting their bilateral ties: Firstly, the Chinese political elites didn't consider the erratic Trump administration would last beyond 2020. They hoped that the election of U.S. President Joe Biden in 2020 might herald a softening of the confrontational China policy of his predecessor. However, these hopes have been dashed as President Biden has pursued a similarly tough China policy, executed in a more sophisticated, coordinated, and substantive manner. Beijing sees clear evidence of a containment strategy in Washington.

Secondly, Chinese leaders have deprioritized the typical buffers and stabilizers of the China-U.S. relationship such as trade and investment. The tangible benefits of the China-U.S. relationship in the past, namely trade and investment, have rapidly diminished due to increased commercial competitiveness and Beijing's decisive pivot from low-end, export-led growth to a high-end manufacturing growth model.

And lastly, the thorniest and most risk-laden issues in China-U.S. relations, such as Taiwan and South China Sea, continue to add mistrust and upset the current status quo. Beijing considers stronger deterrence actions should be absolutely necessary to send warnings to Washington and its Indo-Pacific allies.

If most Chinese strategists believe that the deterioration of China-U.S. relations is now more or less permanent, then what is Beijing's goal regarding China-U.S. interactions? The Biden administration has repeatedly stressed the need for "guardrails" and conflict management. Is that China's hope as well? China's ultimate goal is to ensure that the further erosion of China-U.S. relations does not hinder domestic economic growth, which is key to giving the ruling regime legitimacy. The overall strategy for Beijing to deal with the U.S. is to minimize damage from Washington by maximizing China's economic and political influence in the rest of the world, most notably with large parts of the Global South. Such a move might well buy time for China to speed up its own economic resilience and technology development.

As for the phrase "guardrails," it was hugely dismissed by the Chinese political elites. The guardrails implies someone set the rules and others to follow. However, Beijing does not only want to become the follower of rules set by the U.S. in this bilateral relationship. It asks for a significant equity in deciding the rules.

You note a strong pessimism among Chinese experts about the potential of "peaceful reunification," with many experts arguing that Taiwan's government would not agree to unification with the mainland absent strong coercion. Is there any introspection about why the DPP has adopted a hardline stance on China – and been re-elected to the presidency three times in a row by Taiwan's people?

A noticeable feature from Beijing is the growing sense of urgency to deter pro-independence supporters and the sharp criticism of "separatists" inside Taiwan, as President Xi and his lieutenants have made several official comments on various occasions – particularly after Nancy Pelosi, at the time speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, visited Taipei. Both changes reflect Xi's own belief that there has been a serious deterioration of the Sino-U.S. relationship. Related to this shift, Chinese leaders and official media use coded vocabulary, such as "external forces," to criticize U.S. interference in matters related to Taiwan under both the Trump and Biden administrations.

Despite no formal changes of wording in Beijing's political blueprints on Taiwan, on balance Chinese political elites and influential scholars consider the current situation to be precarious with the pro-independence DPP government in Taiwan, which is likely to result in more active Chinese deterrents to confront the Taiwanese government as well as the incoming U.S. president, irrespective of who that is. After Russia's invasion of Ukraine, there's a strong sense among European analysts that China has "lost" Europe due to its support for Russia. Do Chinese strategists agree? And if so, how important is this factor for China's national interests?

The Chinese strategic community has intensely debated the three challenges related to the war in Ukraine. The subject has raised many questions that have proven difficult to answer, including: to what extent can China support Russia and maintain stable ties with both the U.S. and Europe, while not facing secondary sanctions from the collective West? When and how will the war end? Should China play a more active mediation role between Russia and Ukraine given the current stalemate on the battlefield?

In fact, Chinese experts opinions are divided on the fundamental questions of whether China should align with Russia and what the likely repercussions would be for China's ties with the U.S. and Europe. However, there is also a strong view among many Chinese international affairs specialists that even if Beijing sided with Europe, Europeans would not have responded in kind; and the transatlantic alliance countering China would not be weakened by China's stances to this war. One can confirm that Beijing's damage limitation efforts have not been well received in some European capitals.

China's strong inclination to sustain its ties with Russia goes well beyond the Kremlin's military adventure. Its return on investments is still framed by its response to the United States' pursuit of a China containment strategy. Beijing believes its relations with Moscow might well bring a necessary (if imperfect) solution in dealing with U.S. policy in both economic and diplomatic terms.

How does China view the upcoming U.S. election? Is there a clear preference for either Donald Trump or Kamala Harris?

With the U.S. presidential candidates likely to compete with one another to sound tough on China, Beijing's strategic community does not expect any significant improvement in the Sino-U.S. relationship before or after the U.S. elections in November 2024.

With the possible return of Donald Trump, Chinese leaders will likely reinforce the narrative that the U.S.

is the single and most disruptive source of global instability, while portraying China as a responsible and confident world power able to stand up to the U.S. hegemony. For Beijing, the return of Donald Trump might well be a rare opportunity to recalibrate its bilateral relationship with the U.S., as he is often willing to make deals outside traditional political parameters. However, his leadership style will cause further anxiety for Chinese leaders as Trump tends to focus on his own interests regardless of the consequences, as was illustrated by the Trump administration ignoring the well-established approach of generations of U.S. and Chinese leaders to Taiwan. On Harris, Beijing naturally considers she will continue to carry forward the Biden administration's China policy and strengthen the United States' influence in the Indo-Pacific. As a result, there is not a clear preference for Harris or Trump.

Aside from Nepal and India, which are home to the majority of the Buddhist Tibetan refugees, it is the United States (US), which has arguably played a more significant role in keeping the Tibetan movement alive in the international arena. Most recently, on 12 July 2024, US President Joe Biden signed the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act', also dubbed as the Resolve Tibet Act.

Background

Since the invasion of Tibet by China in October 1950, the region of Tibet has been under Chinese control. For a brief period, a settlement was reached between the Tibetan and Chinese governments, through the Seventeen-Point Agreement, which was signed in 1951. However, due to significant violations of multiple undertakings of the agreement as well as forced reforms in addition to propaganda campaigns against Tibetan culture and history, the Tibetan government legally repudiated the agreement in March 1959. During the same period, there was a short-lived armed revolt by the Tibetan population, in the aftermath of which the 14th and current Dalai Lama fled from Lhasa and took shelter in Dharamshala, India.

Since the invasion of Tibet by China in October 1950, the region of Tibet has been under Chinese control.

Today, Tibet is governed as an autonomous region of China through the administration of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and 12 Tibetan autonomous prefectures or counties in the nearby provinces of Sichuan, Qinghai, Gansu, and Yunnan.

US and Tibet

Historically, the US's policy towards Tibet has fluctuated drastically depending on its relations with China and its geopolitical outlook. In the 1950s and 60s, it provided military and financial aid to Tibetan guerrilla forces. In the 70s and 80s, however, we witnessed a switch where the US had almost zero contact with the Tibetan government in exile as it was trying to strengthen its relations with China. However, from 2000 onwards, it began to refocus its attention on Tibet with the Tibet Policy Act (TPA) of 2002, a core legislation which still acts as a guiding US policy towards Tibet, which states 'It is the policy of the United States to support economic development, cultural preservation, health care, and education and environmental sustainability for Tibetans inside Tibet'. The enactment further went on to establish the position of Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues in the US State Department, talk about the establishment of a US Branch Office in Lhasa and encourage dialogue between China and the Dalai Lama, among other things.

Fast-forward to 2018, the US came out with the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act 2018, which directed the Department of State to report to Congress regarding the level of access Chinese authorities granted U.S. tourists, journalists and diplomats to Tibetan areas in China.

The 2020 Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TSPA) stipulated that the question of the succession of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, including the Dalai Lama, be decided within the Tibetan Buddhist community, without any interference from the Chinese government.

The 2020 Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TSPA) stipulated that the question of the succession of Tibetan Buddhist leaders, including the Dalai Lama, be decided within the Tibetan Buddhist community, without any interference from the Chinese government. The TSPA also imposes sanctions against Chinese officials who engage in said interferences.

Resolve Tibet Act

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act was introduced as a bipartisan bill by US Senators Jeff Merkley and Todd Young. The Act promotes an unconditional dialogue between the Dalai Lama and the People's Republic of China (PRC) to seek a settlement and further enhance the US's overall support for Tibet.

Key enactments:

1. The definition of Tibet: While the Act does not necessarily change Washington's policy of viewing Tibet as a part of China, it lays down a statutory definition of Tibet that encompasses not only the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) but also Tibetan areas within the Chinese provinces of Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan. Unlike the Chinese government's typical reference to Tibet, which is limited to the TAR, this broader definition aligns with the regions traditionally recognised as Tibet.

2. Self-determination: Section 2 of the Act underlines the 'Right of Self-Determination' of the Tibetan people as laid down in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The right to self-determination is a core principle of international law which provides that every person has the right to self-determination. By the said right, people can freely determine their own political status and freely pursue their economic, social, and cultural development. This has been reinforced by the International Court of Justice in the Wall case (2004), in which it states 'the principle of self-determination of peoples has been enshrined in the United Nations Charter and reaffirmed by the General Assembly in resolution 2625 (XXV), under which "Every State has the duty to refrain from any forcible action which deprives peoples referred to [in that resolution] ... of their right to self-determination". The Act may serve as a catalyst which brings Tibet back into the attention and purview of international law.

3. Tackling Chinese disinformation: The Act amends the TPA by expanding the duties of the Office of the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues to tackle Chinese disinformation about Tibet's history, culture, people, and institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama. This comes amidst a global narrative push by the Chinese government Tibet has "always" been a part of China. A possible reason behind this is to construct a narrative that gives them a Impact right to be in Tibet and that justifies China's record since its takeover in the 1950s. Thus, delegitimise Tibetan nationalism and any question of independence within the international framework.

Impact

The Resolve Tibet Act, enacted following a high-level US delegation's meeting with the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala in June 2024, marks another chapter in America's engagement with the Tibet issue, potentially reinvigorating international attention on the region. By emphasising the right to self-determination and challenging China's narrative, the Act raises intriguing questions about Tibet's status in international law. This legislation could serve as a catalyst for bringing Tibet's case before international legal forums, opening new avenues for discourse. However, the practical impact remains uncertain, given China's firm stance and global influence. The Act's effectiveness in opening doors for Tibet in international law will depend on diplomatic manoeuvring, support from other nations, and the complex dynamics of US-China relations. As Tibet remains caught between shifting geopolitical priorities of nations, as with any geopolitical dispute, it is crucial to remember the ongoing toll on the Tibetan Buddhist population since the 1950s.

India Needs To Reset Its Ties with China Instead Of Relying On America

13 August 2024, Almayadeen, Rabi Sankar Bosu

It is hoped that India and China should work to normalize their derailed ties by increasing economic, political, and strategic cooperation as well as people-to-people exchange.

The official diplomatic journey of India and China, the two big neighbouring countries and ancient civilizations in Asia started on April 1, 1950, when India being the first non-socialist country recognized the newly-born People's Republic of China as a sovereign country. During their remarkable journey spanning over seven decades, these two countries have maintained a cordial and close friendship through state-level visits while a burgeoning trade and economic partnership as well as people-to-people and cultural ties have contributed to further blossoming their bilateral bonding.

But no one can dispute that the unfortunate bloodshed in the 2020 Galwan Valley clash between the Indian and Chinese border troops at the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the Ladakh region decimated the India-China relationship. Since then, India has reiterated that the border situation will determine the status of its relations with its northern neighbour until normalcy is restored along the LAC. Address the longstanding issue of cross-border terrorism." Jaishankar's comments clearly indicate that India will take a seemingly hard line against China to resolve the border dispute with China. There is no disputing that the Doklam (Donglang) standoff in 2017 and the Galwan Valley standoff in 2020 led to a sharp decline in India-China relations and significantly affected the socio-economic conditions of over 2.7 billion people residing on either side of the Himalayas. Aftermath of the Galwan Valley Clash:

It's really unfortunate that despite a plethora of bilateral agreements on border-related issues, the two countries have not yet reached a complete agreement on the disengagement of troops from all friction points at the disputed LAC in Ladakh. After rounds of talks between military commanders and diplomatic meetings between India and China failed to produce any dramatic breakthroughs, questions continue to haunt Indian and Chinese people alike: How can the two countries manage to improve their ties? Will the sour political and diplomatic relations become the normal state between the two countries? More importantly, what does the Galwan Valley clash signify for the future of Sino-Indian relations?

Right after the Galwan Valley clash, Indian policy towards China entered a dangerous phase when the Narendra Modi-led Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) government adopted punitive measures such as imposing a range of economic measures against Chinese firms and banning a set of mobile apps linked to China. The Indian political leadership has accelerated its strategic tilt toward the United States and echoing the words of US President Joe Biden, painted China as an "expansionist." On June 21, 2020, India introduced new "Rules of Engagement" for the border areas that give its commanders "complete freedom of action" along the LAC. India's sedulous courtship of the United States, resuscitation of the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue (Quad), and cancellation of public contracts with Chinese firms do not promote healthy and stable development of its relations with China. Rather, such a trend could derail India's dream of becoming a "US$5 trillion economy".

The Quad Keeps Eye on China:

It should be mentioned here that the dialogue of the four Quad foreign ministers from Australia, India, Japan, and the United States and the joint statement of the Quad meeting in Tokyo, Japan on July 29, 2024, have clearly shown that it is directed against China to contain the country's rise in the Indo-Pacific region, currently the most active region in the global geopolitical landscape under the leadership of President Biden. The Quad foreign ministers expressed serious concerns over China's intimidating actions in the South China Sea and pledged to enhance maritime security and stability in the region. Since becoming Indian Prime Minister in 2014, Modi has been working closely with the United States under former U.S. President Donald Trump and current President Biden to check Chinese adventurism and militarization in the frame of Indo-Pacific strategy, including the South China Sea. In terms of security issues, India is more concerned about China's presence in the Indian Ocean and the defense cooperation between China and Pakistan. The Narendra Modi-led government believes that an alliance with America is in its best interests.

However, on July 29, Chinese Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Lin Jian condemned the joint statement of the Quad Foreign Ministers' Meeting for chanting "a free & open Indo-Pacific" by stating that "Some countries outside the region have frequently sent advanced military aircraft and vessels to the South China Sea to flex their muscles and create tension, and have formed various groupings and incited division and confrontation in the region, all of which make them the biggest threat and challenge to regional peace and stability." He also condemned the Quad as an exclusive group that incites antagonism and confrontation and hinders the development of other countries.

It is indeed surprising that India, despite being a member of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) and BRICS, is irritating China by joining a part of the U.S.-led security alliance against China. Notably, India is going to host the Quad Leaders' Summit later this year. India should not be overly fascinated by the U.S.'s strategic approach to China. India's foreign policy cannot be dictated by the U.S.

Returning India-China Relations to Normal:

Amid continuing border standoff between the two countries, Indian Foreign Minister S Jaishankar met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi on July 25, on the sidelines of the ASEAN Foreign Ministers' Meeting in Vientiane, the capital of Laos, and discussed various aspects of bilateral collaboration, including resolving the border disputes as soon as possible. After the meeting with Wang, the Indian foreign minister said in a post on X: "The state of the border will necessarily be reflected in the state of our ties."

On the other hand, emphasizing the daunting global challenges, the Chinese foreign minister stressed that the two countries should increase understanding and mutual trust for mutually beneficial cooperation. It is to be noted that the two foreign ministers earlier met on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) meeting in Astana, Kazakhstan on July 4 and agreed to work to defuse the border tensions. On both occasions, Wang emphasized that China values its friendship with India and will work to manage its differences with its neighbour.

Obviously, the two ministers exhibited both hope and confidence in relations between Asia's two biggest countries. More importantly, Jaishankar insisted that India was "not looking to other countries to sort out" the ongoing border dispute with China during the Quad Foreign Ministers' Meeting on July 25 in Japan. Indian foreign minister is right. India is an independent major country. Its normal relations with China should not be a target for external interference from a third party.

India needs China, China needs India:

The Economic Survey 2024, authored by India's Chief Economic Adviser V Anantha Nageswaran,

outlined that it is inevitable for India to plug itself into the global supply chain without increasing imports from China and also said that allowing foreign direct investment (FDI) from China could help boost India's exports to the western nations, according to a report published by The Hindu Businessline on July 23, 2024. The Survey said, "India's economy is still a fraction of China's".

India cannot punish China economically or politically because of its fragile economy. Despite the political frostiness and prolonged border faceoffs, the good news is that India's trade with China is grown fast in recent years. China has emerged as the largest trading partner of India with $118.4 billion two-way commerce in 2023-24, overtaking the U.S., according to various news reports in India. India's exports to China rose by 8.7 percent to $16.67 billion in the last fiscal.

On the other hand, China needs to invest more in improving its relationship with India even if the returns aren't immediate. China can take advantage of India's emerging and buoyant consumer market, in particular, the electronics, pharmaceutical, and telecom markets. Judging India's trade figures with China, it can be said that India needs China more than China needs India. Pushing Forward Bilateral Relations:

Mahatma Gandhi, "Father of the Indian nation", once said, "I must not serve a distant neighbour at the expense of the nearest." India and China are two close neighbours and represent the world's biggest emerging economies. The importance of India-China relations has been increasing to the two countries themselves, to Asia, and to the world. Considering the strength and development of India-China bilateral ties as well as the two countries' respective roles in international issues, Sino-Indian relations cannot be a "zero-sum game" in the era of globalization. It is hoped that India and China should work to normalize their derailed ties by increasing economic, political, and strategic cooperation as well as people-to-people exchange, which are all equally important for the region and for global peace, stability, and prosperity.

US attempt to cause a rift between China and India over border issue deserves vigilance

13 August 2024, Global Times, Su Lun

Amid signs signaling a thaw in China-India relations, the Voice of America (VOA) reported on Tuesday about India's recently released Project Zorawar light tank. The report claimed that the weapon is a direct response to "China's expanding military influence," highlighting the tank as new evidence of the extensive competition between China and India. It portrayed the tank as a clear signal of India's intention to prevent China gaining from advantages in the border crisis. This coverage attempts to use media influence to cause a rift in China-India relations, particularly to heighten border tensions between China and India and give the US a pretext to strengthen its strategy in the Asia-Pacific region.

Despite Indian media reporting in July that the Zorawar tank is "expected to be ready for induction into the army by 2027," VOA presented the Zorawar as a "game-changer for high-altitude warfare" without objectively assessing its potential deployment timeline or feasibility.

"The Zorawar tank will not significantly alter the balance of power on the China-India border," Long Xingchun, a professor from the School of International Relations at Sichuan International Studies University, told the Global Times, noting that the real factor affecting the border situation is the two countries' respective national strength. "The report by US media aims to sow discord in China-India relations, making it easier for the US to pull India into an anti-China circle," Long added.

Media manipulation, in which the significance of India's Zorawar light tank was magnified, has been used to stir up misunderstandings and tensions between China and India. This strategy aims to deepen divisions and conflicts, thereby sustaining US influence on India and in the Asia-Pacific region.

Over the past three years, China and India have maintained communication and coordination through military and diplomatic channels over the border issue. The foreign ministers of China and India held two meetings in July 2024, where they emphasized the need to step up talks to resolve disputes along their borders. This positive development has not only de-escalated tensions in the border region, improved bilateral relations, but also contributed to greater stability in the region.

However, the momentum has clearly rendered the US on tenterhooks.

The improvement in China-India relations is clearly detrimental to the implantation of the US global strategy. Washington is concerned that the easing of tensions between China and India could weaken US influence and strategic advantage in the Asia-Pacific.

Additionally, India's recent statements dismissing the need for third-party interference in the China-India border issue may also give the US a sense of urgency about losing control in the region.

The US has never been a true friend to India. Its relationship with India has always been based on utilitarian exploitation, with the hope of turning India into a pawn to contain China. However, cooperation and improved relations align more closely with the mutual interests of China and India as representative powers of the Global South.

The recent emergence of positive momentum for the improvement of bilateral ties between China and India should be preserved and strengthened. And both sides must be vigilant against interference from other forces with ulterior motives.

The improvement in China-India relations could serve as a crucial driver of regional peace, and the US attempts at provocation and manipulation of public opinion reveal its hypocritical strategy. In the face of such interference, China and India should resolve differences through dialogue and cooperation and promote the stable development of bilateral relations. Only based on cooperation, can the two countries jointly meet future challenges and achieve a win-win outcome.

The Resolve Tibet Act, a Timely Impetus for Foreign Policy Review

13 August 2024, Japan Forward, Tsewang Gyalo Arya

The "Resolve Tibet Act" defines US policy on Tibet, challenges Chinese claims, and promotes global action for Tibet's rights and international resolution.

July 2024 marks an important milestone in defining the United States' policy on the Tibet issue and its resolutions. US President Joe Biden signed the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act," and the Act became law on July 12. This legislation delineates and will govern the US policy toward Tibet and the Tibetan struggle for freedom and justice.

The Act has six sections:

1. Short title
2. Findings
3. Statement of policy
4. Sense of Congress
5. Modifications to the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002
6. Availability of amounts to counter disinformation about Tibet

The Act is popularly known in its abridged form as the "Resolve Tibet Act." Both its long and abridged forms succinctly convey the purpose and necessity of the legislation. It aims to settle the ongoing dispute between Tibet and the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) regime. This is crucial due to China's ongoing aggressive efforts to distort and erase the true nature of the issue through disinformation.

Historical Truth vs Diplomatic Deadlock

Section 2 of the Act has 12 clauses explaining how negotiations between 2002 and 2010 failed and why they were impossible. This was due to China's insistence on the illogical precondition that the Dalai Lama recognize Tibet as having been a part of China since ancient times. Clause 5 of the section states, "The United States Government has never taken a position that Tibet was a part of China since ancient times."

Tibet has been an independent country with a long cultural, religious, and political history. Since the Chinese occupation of Tibet in 1950, China has consistently tried every means to justify its presence in Tibet, including distortion of Tibetan history. Washington reiterated that Tibet has never been a part of China since ancient times. Free and democratic nations around the world should uphold and recognize this historical truth.

This will awaken China from its condescending big bully stupor and arm-twisting maneuver. It will force China to accept the reality that its military occupation of Tibet was brutal, illegal, and against the United Nations Charter.

Recognition, Rights, and Countering Disinformation
Section 3 of the Act, which includes five clauses, states the policy of the US government. It recognizes the Tibetan people as having distinct religious, cultural, linguistic, and historical identities. Moreover, it emphasizes that the Tibet issue must be resolved by international law, including the UN Charter, through peaceful means and dialogue without preconditions. Clauses in Section 2 further refer to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights. These covenants establish the right to self-determination. By virtue of that right, Tibetans can "freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social, and cultural development."

Distorting Tibetan History

Section 4 of the Act rejects the Chinese claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times as "historically inaccurate." It also states that US public diplomacy efforts will "counter disinformation about Tibet from the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party." This includes addressing disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, Tibetan institutions, and the Dalai Lama.

This is a clear message from the US government to China to stop distorting Tibetan history and religious culture. Additionally, it calls on China to refrain from interfering in the selection of Tibetan spiritual leaders, including the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama.

Challenging China's Claims

The Act also defines Tibet's geographical area and composition. It has pointed out all the Tibetan regions under the traditional three provinces of U-Tsang, Amdo, and Kham as Tibet. This is a considerable blow to the CCP's policy of limiting Tibet to China's so-called "Tibet Autonomous Region." Furthermore, it also challenges Beijing's efforts to erase the nomenclature "Tibet" and replace it with "Xizang." Washington's Resolve Tibet Act is about the US policy to resolve the Tibet-China dispute according to International law and the UN Charter through peaceful dialogue. It states that the Chinese occupation of Tibet is illegal, and the Tibet issue is still an unresolved international issue. Significantly, it also states that UN members have an obligation to resolve it.

Disinformation and Militarization

Elsewhere, the Act refers to the UN resolution on Tibet, which China has neglected. The Act also warns China to stop spreading disinformation about Tibet and Tibetans. China uses such disinformation to justify its illegal occupation of Tibet and interference in Tibetan religious matters.

Beijing's militarization of the Tibetan plateau and the volatile situation that we see at the borders of India, Nepal, and Bhutan are concerning. China's heavy military presence in the Indo-Pacific regions and Southeast China Sea raises further alarms. There is also the constant Chinese threat to Taiwan and the Senkaku Islands. None of this bodes well for peace and stability in Asia and the world.

A Call for Global Action

If the international community seeks a world free of violence, injustice, and repression, it must take action. Allowing a destructive authoritative regime like China to continue its arm-twisting hegemonic maneuvering in neighboring regions is unacceptable. It is high time to tame and control the authoritative regimes posing obstacles to world peace and stability. Free and democratic nations must take this US initiative to revise their national policy toward China.

"An evil man will burn his own nation to the ground to rule over the ashes." If what Sun Tzu, the legendary Chinese military philosopher, said is true, it's an alarm bell for all of us. India, Japan, and the European Union should take the lead in Europe and Asia to change their respective policies on Tibet and harness the fiery dragon bent on burning itself and the world.

Did climate change kill the ancient Tibetan empire?

12 August 2024, Tibetan Review

The general narrative on the demise of the Tibetan empire, which pervaded across Central Asia and beyond during the period of 7th to 9th centuries AD, even sacking China's Tang dynasty capital Chang'an — modern day Xian—in 763, is pretty straightforward: It followed the assassination of its Yarlung dynasty King Langdarma and the disintegration of the empire due to the absence of a central authority. However, scientists are said to see the explanation for the collapse of the Tibetan empire lying elsewhere, namely climate change.

The period of its heyday fell on 618-877 AD. However, then it began to fade, and then completely disappeared. For a long time, scientists could not understand what exactly led to the death of the state, noted newsyou.info Aug 12.

In order to finally solve the mystery of the collapse of an ancient civilization, scientists from the Tibetan Highlands Research Institute turned to the geological data of lake sediments. As a result, they came to the conclusion that the fading occurred due to changed natural conditions, the report said, citing a vsviti.com.ua report.

Warm and humid weather trends were strong during the heyday of the Tibetan empire. This contributed to the development of agriculture and cattle breeding. But later, despite everything, there was a severe drought that coincided with the collapse of the state, the authors of the work were stated to have noted.

The researchers have based their opinion on the remains of microscopic unicellular algae found in one of the lakes of Tibet. They drew attention to clear signs of the transition from planktonic species (drifting inside the lake, closer to the surface) to benthic forms (living near the bottom of the reservoir). This means that its level was once much higher. That is, later the lake partially dried up.

During the analysis of other reservoirs in the region, the authors of the work were stated to have come to the conclusion that climatic changes affected the entire highlands, and were not limited to the place under study.

The drought probably lasted for 60-70 years. This would have caused crop failures, and food shortages in those days often led to social unrest, as well as religious and political problems, the researchers were stated to have concluded.

China's Anti-Religious-Freedom Policy: A Threat to World Peace and Stability

12 August 2024, Bitter Winter, Tsewang Gyalpo Arya

An analysis of the brutal repression of religion in Tibet and beyond, based on the author's panel speech at the July 22 Tokyo's International Religious Freedom Summit Asia.

Why is religion important and why do we need it?

H.H. the Dalai Lama, a Tibetan spiritual leader and 1989 Nobel Peace Laureate, has said that all religious teachings carry important messages of love, compassion, forgiveness, and non-violence. All the major religions in this world have a great potential to generate and contribute peace and harmony at all levels: of the individual, the family, societal, national, and international. To have a peaceful world, we first need peace within ourselves at a personal level. This will have a ripple effect. For this, we need religion and moral ethics to guide us properly to find this peace within and outside ourselves. It is this important sacred potential of religions that we must uphold and promote for a better and peaceful world. In a free and democratic nation, this religious freedom is respected and it complements social and national harmony. But a dictatorial and authoritarian regime, which wants to have complete control over people's minds and bodies, sees religion as a threat to its authority, hence the religious repression. The very fact that they are against the religious teachings that are based on love, compassion, forgiveness, and non-violence, shows the evil and dangerous nature of such a regime.

Tibet's experience past and present

It's more than 70 years since China occupied Tibet militarily. Despite their propaganda and claims of emancipation, prosperity, development, and socialist paradise, Tibetans are still suffering under the repressive brutal communist regime. The violation of human rights, religious freedom, repression, and destruction of Tibetan identity, which has been going on since the early occupation in the 1950s, has now reached the climax. Today, the situation in Tibet is described by sentences such as "total information blackout," "Tibet has become a police state," "Tibetan plateau militarized," and so on. The US Freedom House survey has described Tibet as the most repressed and inaccessible country in several consecutive annual reports.

When China failed to gain legitimacy to rule Tibet even after 70 years of occupation and indoctrination, the communist regime decided to eliminate the root of the Tibetan identity, i.e., Tibetan language, culture, and religion.

More than 6,000 monasteries and nunneries were destroyed and thousands of monks and nuns were forced to disrobe in the early years of occupation. But the situation has become worse since the coming of Xi Jinping in 2012. Today, monasteries, religious statues and artifacts, and schools are destroyed in broad daylight before the eyes of the public, and information on these atrocities comes out only after the destruction and despite of cover-up measures.

Tsewang Gyalpo Arya at the Tokyo Summit with Ambassador Sam Brownback, former U.S. Ambassador-at-large for International Religious Freedom.

CCP's propaganda and misinformation on "separatism"

China insists that the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan Administration in Exile are separatists and anti-China. But the truth is different. It is the Chinese communist leadership that is separatist and anti-China. Many Tibetans and Chinese lived and studied peacefully and harmoniously together in two large monastic complexes of Larung-gar and Yachen-gar in the Kham region in Eastern Tibet. There were students from South Korea, Taiwan, and other countries too. However, Chinese authorities saw this good relationship between Tibetans and Chinese along with others studying Buddhism together as dangerous.

They started destroying the two monasteries in 2001 and sent the Chinese and the Tibetan students to their respective places. Tibetan monks were not allowed to teach Buddhism to Chinese, and Chinese people were banned from receiving teachings from Tibetan masters. So, who is the real separatist? It is the CCP regime with its "divide and rule" policy that is the real separatist.

Many protested peacefully. Three nuns, Rinzin Dolma, Tsering Dolma, and Semgha committed suicide to protest the destructions and evictions. It was reported that monks and nuns were arrested and forced into indoctrination classes where they were coerced to wear Chinese military outfits, dance, and sing songs praising the Chinese Communist Party (CCP).

Emboldened China and broad daylight repression
The silence of the international community has emboldened China to commit these religious atrocities in broad daylight.

In December 2021, China dismantled a 99-foot Buddha statue and a 30-foot Maitreya statue and destroyed 45 large prayer wheels and a monastic school in the Drago region in the Kham province of Tibet. They dismantled a 45-foot statue of Guru Padmasambhava, an Indian saint who introduced Buddhism and was revered as the second Buddha in Tibet, in Nyimo Township.

But very little news or information comes out because of the communication restrictions, strict surveillance, and threat of torture. The world thinks Tibet is safe and at peace because there is no news on Tibet. But the truth is the opposite.

Making laws to justify religious repression

The CCP, although it does not believe in and respect religions, knows the power of religion. To have total control over the people in China and the occupied territories, the CCP is trying to make religion its handy tool. When repressions, indoctrination, and destruction of monasteries, churches, and mosques failed to destroy people's faith in religions, the CCP leadership came up with laws, rules, and regulations to control religions and the religious understanding of the people.

Last year, China came up with Religious Order No.19, the Administrative Measures for Religious Activity Venues, to administer the places of worship in China and in its occupied regions. Through this regulation, China is trying to justify the CCP's interference in religious matters with the people and to stop the international community's criticism by saying that they are acting within the law.

Article 3 of the Order states, "Places of religious activity shall uphold the leadership of the CCP and the socialist system, and thoroughly implement Xi Jinping's ideology of Socialism with Chinese characteristics for the New Era."

Here China has openly made it clear that under this regulation all religious bodies must adopt "Xi Jinping's ideology of Socialism with Chinese Characteristics" in their religious teachings and practices. This is ridiculous and unacceptable! Communist ideology and Xi Jinping do not respect and believe in religion. So it is preposterous and sacrilegious on the part of the CCP leadership to dilute and profane the religious teachings for their political agenda.

China also announced a law on patriotic education last year. Articles 3 and 6 of the law say, "Patriotic education shall hold the great banner of socialism with Chinese characteristics, persist in using Marxism, Leninism, Mao Zedong Thought, Deng Xiaoping Theory, the important thought of the 'Three Represents', the Scientific Outlook on Development, and Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for the New Era as guidance..."

From this, it is very clear that the CCP's patriotic education is nothing more than indoctrinating and forcing the obsolete communist ideology on the masses and making it a mandatory part of education and social life. By idolizing Mao and Deng, the law also tries to erase the dark memories and records of all the deaths and sufferings that Mao's Cultural Revolution, the Great Leap Forward, and Deng's Tiananmen Square massacre brought to China.

Forced and repeated use of "Xi Jinping Thought" here and there is aimed at imposing the worship and deification of the Chinese President. This is evident from the fact that Tibetans are forced to make offerings and do prostrations before pictures of Xi Jinping.

Control of religious leaders

As religious leaders are respected and revered, the CCP tries to exert its authority over the selection and appointment of religious leaders and teachers. China Buddhist Association (CBA), the highest religious body theoretically looking after the teachings of Buddha in the country, is strictly controlled by the CCP. Through this body, the CCP is trying to control the Buddhists not only in China but around the world. Arjia Rinpoche, a prominent Tibetan-Mongolian reincarnate lama, when he came to know that he was going to be appointed the head of the CBA, as he writes in his book "Surviving the Dragon", "could no longer ignore the conflict between government interests and my own religious vows. Rather than betray my faith, I chose to leave my hometown, my friends, and my beloved monks at Kumbum Monastery. I chose the path of exile." He fled Tibet in 1998. His book has now become a testament to the atrocities the CCP has perpetrated and is perpetrating in Tibet since its occupation in 1950.

Buddhism is very popular in China and around the world and Tibetan reincarnated lamas and teachers are highly revered in the Buddhist world. The CCP through their Religious Order No.5 in 2007 has asserted its power to select and control the reincarnation of Tibetan Buddhist masters. China is now aggressively spreading disinformation that it has historical and political rights to select the next Dalai Lama. This is wrong and completely false. The policy behind this is to produce religious leaders under the guise of reincarnation who will parrot the CCP's dictates. The Chinese-selected 11th Panchen Lama is a typical example of this policy.

Of course, the same is happening with Christian, Muslim, and Taoist communities. The churches, mosques, and temples are all controlled by CCP cadres and the official heads of these religions are all selected and groomed to stick to the CCP version of religion and Xi Jinping's ideology of Socialism with Chinese Characteristics. This is very dangerous, and we must not let it continue.

With US keen on military base and China eyeing deep sea port, India must engage with Bangladesh smartly

11 August 2024, First Post, Air Marshal Anil Chopra

If Bangladesh remains unfriendly to India, Pakistan could also take advantage, including in connivance with China

As Bangladesh comes to grips with the violent protests after the resignation and exit of former Bangladesh Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, international power play is unfolding. Hasina has been ruling the strategically located South Asian nation since 2009 and secured a fifth overall term in the one-sided election in January, which was boycotted by the main opposition Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP).

China is heavily invested in infrastructure and military hardware in Bangladesh. The US is trying to secure a military base in Bangladesh. India has its longest land border with Bangladesh (4,096 kilometres) that covers its three sides, the fourth being the Bay of Bengal (BoB).

US Favoured a Regime Change

For a long time, the US administration has expressed support for regime change in Bangladesh. They were not very happy with Hasina being pro-India or taking support from China. Various strategies have been tried to get her out of power. Opposition activists had been supported to create a revolt. The US ambassador has been meeting the opposition party, BNP. During the elections, Hasina faced constant criticism from the US over what they called unfair polls.

The US 2023 NDAA Burma Act

Sheikh Hasina recently indicated about a plot by a third country (purportedly the US) that could lead to the division of Bangladesh on religious lines and the creation of a non-Muslim majority country like East Timor. Kuki-Chin rebels are fighting with the Myanmar army to help and promote Christian rebels. The incorporation of the Burma Act into the US 2023 NDAA had raised strong public opinion in Myanmar that substantial US support would come for the resistance movement in Myanmar. Kuki Chin Province of Myanmar, Chattogram hill tracts of Bangladesh, and Mizoram of India may be the demarcation.

More than one million Chin live in Myanmar, one million Mizo live in Mizoram, half a million Kuki live in Manipur, and tens of thousands of Kuki live in Bangladesh. In addition, due to the ongoing fighting between the Myanmar army and the Chin people, hundreds of thousands of Chin have fled overseas, including 80,000 in the United States". Hasina felt that it was a wakeup call for the sub-region.

Naval and Airbase at Saint Martin's Island

The 3 sq km St Martin Island is in the north-eastern part of the BoB, about 9 km south of the tip of Cox's Bazar-Teknaf peninsula, and is the southernmost part of the country.

The US had reportedly suggested that Bangladesh join the Quad alliance, and there were reports suggesting that they proposed leasing Saint Martin Island for building an air and naval base. The US does maintain military ties with Bangladesh, with both forces engaging in regular visits and joint exercises. Since China is also trying to get closer to Bangladesh, such a US base meant to contain China was not acceptable to them. Some others have suggested that the US actually wants to make Bangladesh a playground to 'dominate' India.

However, during a press conference, Matthew Miller, spokesperson for the US Department of State, asserted that the United States has never engaged in any discussions regarding taking control of St Martin's Island or has any intention to do so.

China-Bangladesh Defence Cooperation

Bangladesh has emerged as an important player in China's political expansion strategy. Military cooperation between the two in the form of arms supply and construction of military infrastructure has increased in the past few years. During the 1971 liberation of Bangladesh, China had supported Pakistan. But today, Bangladesh considers China a trusted ally.

In 2002, China and Bangladesh signed a "Defence Cooperation Agreement", which covers military training and defence production. By 2006, Dhaka had emerged as a major buyer of Chinese-made weapons. China praised Bangladesh Hasina for her decision to deny permission for a foreign military base, commending it as a reflection of the Bangladeshi people's strong national spirit and commitment to independence. Any strategic partnership with Dhaka gives Beijing added leverage to reduce Indian influence and checkmate its forces.

China has emerged as Bangladesh's highest trading partner, with over $25 billion invested in various projects. After Pakistan, Bangladesh is the second-highest Chinese investment recipient in the South Asian region. China has played a significant role in building bridges, roads, railway tracks, airports, and power plants in Bangladesh. The Padma Bridge Rail Link Project is one of the flagship projects undertaken by China, which connects Dhaka with Jessore through the Padma Bridge. Importantly, a broad array of products from Bangladesh enjoys zero tariffs in China. China has also continuously enhanced defence ties with Bangladesh and supplies military equipment, which includes fighter jets, battle tanks, and naval frigates, submarines, and missile boats. Bangladesh sources nearly 86 per cent of military hardware from China.

China sold 65 large-calibre artillery systems in 2006. In 2008, Bangladesh set up an anti-missile launch pad near Chittagong Port with Chinese support. In 2014, the two sides signed four military agreements related to setting up military training facilities. In 2016, two Chinese-built 1,350 ton Type 056 corvettes joined the Bangladesh Navy. In the 2018 deal, China agreed to deliver 23 Hongdu K-8 intermediate jet trainers for the Bangladesh Air Force (BAF). Bangladesh imported 36 F-7BGI aircraft from China in 2021. China has played a pivotal role in the development of Bangladesh's military, naval, and airbases. China is also the main supplier of portable air defence systems (MANPADS) and small arms and ammunition.

A deal was signed in 2017 for two submarines that included training and help to let Bangladesh construct its first submarine base. In 2023, PM Hasina inaugurated a $1.21 billion, six-slot submarine base, built by China at Cox's Bazar off the Bay of Bengal coast, which will provide safe jetty facilities to submarines and warships.

Bangladesh and China conduct their first-ever joint military exercise codenamed 'China-Bangladesh Golden Friendship 2024' in early May 2024. It was to test out United Nations peacekeeping anti-terrorism operations such as the rescue of hostages on buses and the clean-up of terrorist camps. It will deepen bilateral defence cooperation. Although Bangladesh and India have held 11 military drills between 2009 and 2023, China's entry has future implications. Could Bangladesh be drawn into some kind of cold war between India and China?

Substandard Chinese Defence Supplies

In 2022, the Bangladesh Army expressed dissatisfaction with military supplies from Beijing. There have been rejections of tank ammunition supply. Also, there have been issues about spare parts for tank repair and maintenance. The HQ-7 short-range SAMs supplied by China were found to have defects. The two Ming-type submarines procured at a discounted rate also failed to meet operational expectations.

Sonadia Island – Deep Sea Port

Sonadia Island is a small 9 square kilometres size, offshore of Cox's Bazar coast in Chittagong Division, Bangladesh. It is 15 km north-west of Cox's Bazar District Headquarters. China had been eyeing a naval base in BoB and had offered to initially develop the Sonadia Islands as a deep sea port for Bangladesh, which could have later turned out to be another Gwadar-type headache for Indian defence establishments. The island could have provided a new bead for the 'string of pearls' and could have affected India's clear strategic advantage in the BoB. Luckily, in 2020, Bangladesh finally buried the project. It is hoped that the new government does not reopen the subject.

The Chinese government still wants to extend funds for the design, construction, and operation of the deep-sea port in Bangladesh on a build-own-operate-transfer basis. Chittagong or Sonadia could give China direct access to the BoB and, in extension, to the Indian Ocean.

Payra Port

Bangladesh's third largest seaport, Payra port, now the deepest port in the country, was originally planned as China's bid for another deep seaport in its String of Pearls strategy. The construction of the port, which was being financed on a public-private partnership (PPP) platform, was initially granted to a Chinese company. India, Japan, and the United States opposed the plan. The Payra Port Authority (PPA) then signed a deal with Belgium-based dredging company Jan De Nul (JDN) for capital and maintenance dredging of the 75-kilometre-long main channel of the under-construction Payra seaport. In March 2023, JDN completed capital dredging.

Adani Group Interest in Bangladesh Ports

Adani Group intends to venture into the port sector in Bangladesh through a private partnership. The company is deliberating to invest in Chittagong Port's planned Bay Terminal, a deep terminal proposed to come up near the port. China and India are both vying to invest in the development and modernisation of Bangladesh's Mongla port. Since 2017, Adani Power has supplied 1,496 MW of net capacity under a 25-year contract via a 400 kV dedicated transmission line connected to the Bangladesh grid from its Jharkhand plant.

China-Myanmar Dynamics

Generally, China has maintained positive relationships with both military and elected governments in Myanmar. Bilateral relations between China and Myanmar have faced difficulties due to alleged Chinese backing of rebels in Myanmar's territories. Also due to ongoing clashes between ethnic Chinese rebels and the Myanmar military near the China- Myanmar border. Beijing's recent warm-up with the Army Junta was driven by self-interest and reactionary hedging to America's Burma Act.

China assisted in constructing a naval base in Sittwe, a strategically important sea port close to India's Kolkata port. Beijing also funded road construction to Yangon and Sittwe, providing the shortest route to the Indian Ocean from southern China. Earlier, Myanmar allowed China to establish monitoring and surveillance facilities at the Coco Islands, just 45 kilometres north of the Andaman Islands. It allows tracking India's missile launches off the Balasore test range in Odisha as well as strategic assets stationed off the eastern seaboard at Visakhapatnam.

Bangladesh-China Closeness: Implications for India India remains an important factor in the China-Bangladesh relationship. China acts as a counterbalance against large neighbour India. India is conscious that Bangladesh is strategically important for India's connection with its northeast and for its look and act east policy. India had to increase its ties with Myanmar, which is a competitor of Bangladesh, in the wake of growing Sino-Bangladesh ties. But during Hasina's years in power, Bangladesh had carefully balanced the two relationships.

The Citizenship Amendment Act (CAA) and the National Register of Citizens (NRC) have seen uninformed negative reactions in Bangladesh. This became a potential for friction. The other points of contention include long-standing bilateral river water disputes, significant trade imbalance in favour of India, and illegal entry of Bangladeshi citizens into Assam and West Bengal.

Complexity will increase if the military or BNP remain in power. Also, the Teesta water management project that involves building a reservoir in Bangladesh, if funded by China, will move Dhaka further closer to Beijing.

Bangladesh remains crucial to the emerging BoB geopolitics. Although the military assets provided by China to Bangladesh don't present any military threat to India, increasing defence ties will put pressure on India's Indo-Pacific strategy. If Bangladesh remains unfriendly to India, Pakistan could also take advantage, including in connivance with China.

Way Ahead India

China's South Asian policy has strategic designs that may harm India's interests in the region. By positioning itself as a protector of Bangladeshi sovereignty, China aims to mitigate American influence, thereby creating indispensability. As China inches closer to Bangladesh and its military, it becomes a reason for India's concerns.

The timing of China's support, amidst Bangladesh's election cycle and tiffs with the US, is a deliberate strategy with its own dynamics. It is best for India to let post-Hasina chaos settle down. Continue its generous approach. Find better consultative ways for development assistance and infrastructure building. Also, the continued presence of Hasina in India could remain an irritant. Her early move to an acceptable country must be hastened.

Bangladesh was born with India's support but gradually leaned towards aggressive and expansionist China. A hostile Bangladesh is bad for India in view of the narrow Siliguri corridor between China and Bangladesh that connects India's North East. Yet, Bangladesh and India have signalled concerns over Chinese plans to dam and divert water from the Brahmaputra River in Tibet.

The huge trade deficit with China is also a concern for Bangladesh, as it can possibly push Bangladesh into a debt trap. At one stage, China was also keen to build Bangladesh's nuclear plants. Finally, the contract for the Rooppur nuclear power plant was given to the Russian Rosatom State Atomic Energy Corporation.

China's long-term plan is to cultivate South Asian countries through arms deals and deceptive trade models, which will entangle them in debt traps and misunderstandings. India must keep cautioning Bangladesh. India must continue military engagement by offering more training courses. India's $500 million credit line to Bangladesh has been operational since 2022. India can offer maintenance contracts for Russian-origin equipment such as Mi-17-1V helicopters, Antonov An-32 aircraft, and MiG 29 jets, which India uses. India is also now in a position to offer defence equipment, including all-terrain special-purpose vehicles, helicopters, BrahMos missiles, radars, arms, and ammunition, at competitive rates. Efforts must be continued to improve regional connectivity projects and the integration of Bangladesh's economy and its military strategy into India's Bharat Mala and Sagar Mala projects. The two must work on the Look East Act East projects more vigorously under the broad contours of IORA (Indian Ocean Rim Association) and BIMSTEC (Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multi-Sectoral Technical and Economic Cooperation). India must exploit the shift in Myanmar's foreign policy to avoid excessive dependence on China. India must also keep good relations with Thailand, the other player in the BoB. Hasina's Bangladesh had been engaging with China, keeping Indian sensibilities in mind. The same may not happen in the immediate future. India has a Maldives-like situation to handle with maturity. India must remember that Bangladesh needs India no less than the other way around. Strategically, BoB is important for India's second strike capability. India has to keep it secured and dominate it.

By wanting to set up a military base in Bangladesh, the US is perhaps trying to reduce/neutralise Chinese influence. But it is not in India's interest that the US comes in here. They already have bases in Diego Garcia and have access to Australia's Cocos Keeling Island base. The US' global interests keep changing. As a Quad member, it is best if it trusts India to dominate the BoB.

It is time for Indian security analysts to stop painting "doomsday scenarios" in their writings and on TV debates. There are geostrategic ups and downs, but the world carries on and adjusts to changes. Bangladesh would also have to be part of global realpolitik.

Book Review | When India let Tibet down Books and Art

10 August 2024, Deccan Chronicle, Indranil Banerjee
Time and again history has shown that great powers tend to shape the world according to their interests and rarely on the basis of moral precepts. This, as former diplomat and author Dilip Sinha proves in his book, is precisely what is responsible for the tragedy of Tibet, a nation invaded by a powerful neighbour and abandoned by the world community. Even Tibet's traditional friend, India, badly let down the Tibetans when they most needed assistance and a voice to tell the wider world of their calamity.

Mr Sinha describes how each of the great powers involved in Asia through history treated Tibet, China and India as well as the other related kingdoms of East Turkestan and Mongolia. Put very simply, Britain found itself incapable of fully assimilating or controlling Tibet the way it did India. China too was a distant and vast kingdom that required more power to rule than Britain could expend. Britain which constantly worried about Russian ingress into every part of Asia, including India and China, felt it was best to prop up Beijing's authority over these two regions and thereby pre-empt any Russian creep into India's neighbourhood. The court at Beijing which traditionally had only limited authority over Tibet and enjoyed a special priest-monarchical relationship was thus thrust into the role of protector and suzerain of Tibet and Xinjiang. The Communists led by Chairman Mao who took control of China after the Second World War believed that any region in the past, no matter how distant, that had once paid tribute to China's imperial court was now an integral part of their country. Tibet had no hope of remaining independent.

India was the first country Tibet turned to for help, before and after the Chinese invasion. But India's Prime Minister Nehru in his wisdom would have nothing to do with it. He even refused to raise the matter in the UN General Assembly after the invasion. "There was internal disagreement over India's policy", writes Sinha. Nehru's foreign secretary Girija Shankar Bajpai "was unhappy with Nehru's decision believing it was not in accordance with India's earlier decision to support Tibet...and even contemplated resigning." Ultimately, it was tiny El Salvador that came to the rescue of the Tibetans in the United Nations, pointing out "the peaceful nation of Tibet had been invaded without provocation" and "called for the formation of a General Assembly committee to recommend measures".

India came to the support of Tibet only in 1965. This time in the UN, "India voted in favour, with its representative accusing China of genocide and violating the seventeen-article agreement of 1951. This change became possible because China had invaded India three years earlier, and there was a new leadership in India: Jawaharlal Nehru had died the previous year and Lal Bahadur Shastri had succeeded him." By then of course it was too late.

India's foreign policy misalignment

10 August 2024, The Kathmandu Post, Ajaya Bhadra Khanal

The dramatic turn of events in Bangladesh has shocked many people. But the story, for the Nepalis, is all too familiar. Nepali political leaders, including former monarchs, have not differed from the deposed Bangladeshi Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. All of them have blurred the thin line between democracy and autocracy and between good governance and misrule. What is even more striking is the role of India and questions about its foreign policy.

India's "pragmatic" foreign policy was, to a large extent, responsible for emboldening Hasina's autocratic tendencies, making her impervious to the demands of democracy and the growing aspirations of the new generation.

Given Bangladesh's location and strategic importance, India had multiple overriding concerns and security imperatives.

Hasina became India's trusted ally. Given her historical and personal relations with India, it was easier for her to sympathise with them. India's support for Hasina and the Awami League (AL) appears logical, given the fact that her party has served India's strategic and economic interests.

However, in the last round of elections, Bangladeshi people perceived that India had openly sided with the AL. India tried to convince the opposition Bangladesh Nationalist Party to take part in the elections but without success. India then supported AL's attempt to hold the elections against the wishes of the larger civil society in Bangladesh. As a result, the voter turnout was very low and widespread irregularities were reported.

Despite Western countries like the US expressing concerns about the legitimacy of the elections, India was instrumental in facilitating legitimacy to the sham election results. Growing disenchantment with Hasina gave a fillip to anti-India sentiments among the people.

India's foreign policy, in the last decade, has tried to recast itself in terms of pragmatism and flexibility, focused solely on India's strategic interests. In his book, The India Way, India's Minister of External Affairs, S Jaishankar, explains the idea of "Krishna's Choice" as being undeterred by the collateral consequences. This means focusing on the self-defined "righteous" goals rather than on the righteousness of the means.

Adopting such a foreign policy disregards the pervasiveness of anti-India sentiments in South Asia. As per Jaishankar's philosophy, India does not need to be popular, it just needs to secure its interests.

Such thinking is reasonable. Despite a significant level of anti-India sentiment in South Asia, India's power and presence remain substantial. It has learnt to secure its interests, in spite of hostile governments. However, if India wants to claim leadership as a regional power in South Asia and beyond, stand up to global norms, and maintain stability in the region, it must adopt democracy as a pillar of its foreign policy. India's foreign policy goals must align with the neighbourhood's broader interests, particularly democracy and economic development.

Without aligning with democracy, "pragmatism" in its foreign policy can only deliver short-term tactical gains that may quickly be overturned. On the other hand, prioritising democratic values and putting the interests of the people rather than the governments can become a long-term evolutionarily stable strategy.

Perspectives from Nepal may offer some insights into India's growing role in the region and how people from Nepal view India's foreign policy.

From a Nepali perspective, India's foreign policy, in its current state, is problematic. For example, in recent years, India has not hesitated to empower Nepali politics and politicians that have hampered democratic values, promoted inequality and harmed people's interests.

India has been conducting its foreign policy in Nepal in three prominent ways. The first is by engaging with the government, whatever the propensity of the ruling regime and using all available leverages and powers to ensure that the party in power remains "friendly." This strategy has often hampered the efforts of the Nepali people to democratise the parties and the country. India's emphasis on this method has given rise to anti-Indianism as a political platform and as a feature of public psychology.

There is also a more sinister Cold War era style of engagement. In engaging with Nepal's political parties and ruling regimes, India has frequently resorted to its intelligence wings, whose brash and open interventions have amplified anti-India sentiments and spread them to the grassroots level.

Every new government in Nepal seeks India's support to ensure its longevity. In a recent closed-door conversation, senior party leaders told us that during state visits, Nepali prime ministers are under tremendous pressure to demonstrate that India supports them and that their visit is a success. They fear that without India's support no government can expect to be durable.

Another way India has cashed in is by supporting political movements. This has also had mixed results. When India sided with Nepal's democratic forces against the King in 1989-90 as well as in 2005, it enraged the monarchist and nationalist forces. Similarly, in 2015, when it sided with the Madhesh movement, it angered the hill people and hill-centric parties, propelling them closer to China.

The third way India has conducted its bilateral relations is through connectivity and development diplomacy. India has gradually achieved "irreversible" bilateral relations with Nepal through the strategy of improved connectivity, trade and economic integration.

For example, in recent years, India and Nepal have worked on Integrated Check Posts (ICPs), hydro-power projects, petroleum pipelines, payment gateways and transmission lines. These forms of connectivity are gradually making it more difficult for Nepal to swing between India and China as in the past.

In order to sustain its gains, India must demonstrate that its values align with the interests of democracy and the aspirations of the younger generation in the neighbourhood. Such values extend to economic equality, human rights, justice, identity politics and secularism. Unfortunately, the impact of the Indian government's association with the Hindutva movement has spilled over borders; it has alienated Muslim populations in the neighbourhood, including in Nepal and Bangladesh.

The case of Bangladesh also shows that if Hasina had strengthened democratic values and institutions, the social order in Bangladesh would not have come under strain even now.

Another major factor why India must emphasise democracy and align itself to people's interests in South Asia is the presence of China.

China is waiting on the sidelines, biding its time, ready to pounce on the opportunities missed by India.

Experts and policymakers in India do not believe China can gain access to the Indian market, given the current state of Sino-India relations and border disputes. But China is not fazed. It is confident that it has secured its interest in Tibet vis-à-vis Nepal. Now, it has its eyes on the Indian market. China's persistence in investing in border infrastructure in Tibet, as well as in the Trans-Himalayan Multi-Dimensional Connectivity Network, shows its long-term strategy and confidence in its ability to gain access to South Asia.

China's Great Wall of Villages

10 August 2024, The New York Times, Muye Xiao and Agnes Chang

China has moved thousands of people to new settlements on its frontiers. It calls them "border guardians."

Qionglin New Village sits deep in the Himalayas, just three miles from a region where a heavy military buildup and confrontations between Chinese and Indian troops have brought fears of a border war.

The land was once an empty valley, more than 10,000 feet above the sea, traversed only by local hunters. Then Chinese officials built Qionglin, a village of cookie-cutter homes and finely paved roads, and paid people to move there from other settlements.

China's leader, Xi Jinping, calls such people "border guardians." Qionglin's villagers are essentially sentries on the front line of China's claim to Arunachal Pradesh, India's easternmost state, which Beijing insists is part of Chinese-ruled Tibet.

Many villages like Qionglin have sprung up. In China's west, they give its sovereignty a new, undeniable permanence along boundaries contested by India, Bhutan and Nepal. In its north, the settlements bolster security and promote trade with Central Asia. In the south, they guard against the flow of drugs and crime from Southeast Asia.

The buildup is the clearest sign that Mr. Xi is using civilian settlements to quietly solidify China's control in far-flung frontiers, just as he has with fishing militias and islands in the disputed South China Sea.

The New York Times mapped and analyzed settlements along China's border to create the first detailed visual representation of how the country has reshaped its frontiers with strategic civilian outposts, in just eight years.

Working with the artificial intelligence company RAIC Labs, which scanned satellite images of China's entire land border captured by Planet Labs, The Times identified the locations of new villages and checked them against historical images, state media, social media posts and public records.

The mapping reveals that China has put at least one village near every accessible Himalayan pass that borders India, as well as on most of the passes bordering Bhutan and Nepal, according to Matthew Akester, an independent researcher on Tibet, and Robert Barnett, a professor from SOAS University of London. Mr. Akester and Mr. Barnett, who have studied Tibet's border villages for years, reviewed The Times's findings.

The outposts are civilian in nature, but they also provide China's military with roads, access to the internet and power, should it want to move troops quickly to the border. Villagers serve as eyes and ears in remote areas, discouraging intruders or runaways.

"China does not want outsiders to be able to walk across the border for any distance without being challenged by its security personnel or citizens," Mr. Akester said.

The buildup of settlements fuels anxiety in the region about Beijing's ambitions. The threat of conflict is ever present: Deadly clashes have broken out along the border between troops from India and China since 2020, and tens of thousands of soldiers from both sides remain on a war footing.

China's Eyes and Ears

The first signs of Mr. Xi's ambitions emerged in 2017, when state media told the story of a letter he wrote to two Tibetan sisters in the remote village of Yume, in a region near Arunachal Pradesh that is blanketed by deep snow for more than half the year.

He praised their family for having protected the area for China for decades, despite the inhospitable terrain: "I hope you continue your spirit as a patriot and border guardian."

Over the next few years, workers built dozens of new homes in Yume, and officials moved over 200 people there.

Yume, also known as Yumai in Chinese, is among at least 90 new villages and expanded settlements that have sprung up in Tibet since 2016, when China began outlining its border village plan in the region, The Times found. In neighboring Xinjiang and Yunnan, The Times identified six new and 59 expanded border villages. (China says there are hundreds of villages like them, but few details are available and many appear to be mere upgrades of existing villages.)

Of the new villages The Times identified in Tibet, one is on land claimed by India, though within China's de facto border; 11 other settlements are in areas contested by Bhutan. Some of those 11 villages are near the Doklam region, the site of a standoff between troops from India and China in 2017 over Chinese attempts to extend a road.

China makes clear that the villages are there for security. In 2020, a leader of a Tibetan border county told state media that he was relocating more than 3,000 people to frontier areas that were “weakly controlled, disputed or empty.”

Brahma Chellaney, a strategic affairs analyst based in New Delhi, said that in quietly building militarized villages in disputed borderlands, China is replicating on land an expansionist approach that it has used successfully in the South China Sea.

“What stands out is the speed and stealth with which China is redrawing facts on the ground, with little regard for the geopolitical fallout,” Mr. Chellaney said. “China has been planting settlers in whole new stretches of the Himalayan frontier with India and making them its first line of defense.”

In a written response to The Times, Liu Pengyu, a spokesman for the Chinese Embassy in Washington, said that in dealing with border issues with its neighbors, “China always strives to find fair and reasonable solutions through peaceful and friendly consultations.”

India and Bhutan did not respond to requests for comment about the buildup. Indian officials have previously noted “infrastructure construction activity” by China along the border. Local leaders in Arunachal Pradesh and Ladakh have complained to The Times that China was slowly cutting away small pieces of Indian territory.

India has responded with what it calls “Vibrant Villages,” a campaign that aims to revive hundreds of villages along the border.

But China is outbuilding India, says Brian Hart, an analyst for the China Power Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, or C.S.I.S., who recently co-authored a report on border villages in Tibet.

Among other findings, the C.S.I.S. report identified what appeared to be a militarized facility in one such village, known as Migyitun, or Zhari in Chinese, an indication of the settlements’ dual-use nature. The Times studied satellite images of the same village and identified military trucks and tents, as well as what appeared to be a shooting range nearby.

The villages also serve as propaganda: a display of Chinese strength and superiority in the region, said

Jing Qian, co-founder of the Center for China Analysis at the Asia Society.

“They want the Indians, Central Asians and others to see and think that Chinese villages are so good, that the China model is working very well.”

Uncertain Future, Unforgiving Terrain

The slice of the Himalayas where many Chinese villages have sprung up has been largely uninhabited for good reason. Its rocky, icy terrain is particularly forbidding in winter, with roads buried many months of the year by deep snow. The air is thin and cold. The land is barren, making farming difficult.

To persuade residents to move there, Chinese Communist Party officials promised them their new homes would be cheap. They would receive annual subsidies and get paid extra if they took part in border patrols. Chinese propaganda outlets said the government would provide jobs and help promote local businesses and tourism. The villages would come with paved roads, internet connections, schools and clinics.

A local government document reviewed by The Times indicated that some villagers may be receiving around 20,000 Chinese yuan a year for relocation, less than $3,000. One resident reached by phone said he earned an extra $250 a month by patrolling the border.

But it is unclear whether the villages make economic sense.

The residents become dependent on the subsidies because there are few other ways to make a living, according to Mr. Akester, the independent expert.

China’s relocation policy is also a form of social engineering, designed to assimilate minority groups like the Tibetans into the mainstream. Tibetans, who are largely Buddhist, have historically resisted the Communist Party’s intrusive controls on their religion and way of life.

Images from the villages suggest that religious life is largely absent. Buddhist monasteries and temples are seemingly nowhere to be found. Instead, national flags and portraits of Mr. Xi are everywhere, on light poles, living room walls and balcony railings.

“They want to transform the landscape and the population,” Mr. Akester said.

Over the years, the government has pushed many nomadic Tibetans to sell their yaks and sheep, leave the grasslands and move into houses, but often without clear ways for them to survive. Instead of herding, residents have to work for wages.

Interviews suggest that many nomads who have moved to the new villages are reluctant to adapt. Some herd yaks for half the year in the mountains; others return to their old homes to live for months at a time.

Residents are often not told about the challenges that moving can entail, Mr. Barnett said, including having to spend more to travel to towns and on electricity, water, food and other essentials.

"The major problem is they are moving them from one lifestyle to another," he said. "They end up with no capital, no usable skills, no sellable skills and no cultural familiarity."

When money isn't enough, Chinese officials have applied pressure on residents to relocate, an approach that was evident even in state propaganda reports.

A documentary aired by the state broadcaster, CCTV, showed how a Chinese official went to Dokha, a village in Tibet, to persuade residents to move to a new village called Duolonggang, 10 miles from Arunachal Pradesh.

He encountered some resistance. Tenzin, a lay Buddhist practitioner, insisted that Dokha's land was fertile, producing oranges and other fruit. "We can feed ourselves without government subsidies," he said.

The official criticized Tenzin for "using his age and religious status to obstruct relocation," according to a state media article cited by Human Rights Watch in a report.

In the end, all 143 residents of Dokha moved to the new settlement.

How we identified the villages

The Times first compiled a list of the locations of 10 border villages in China that had been in earlier news reports and shared their coordinates with RAIC Labs. RAIC Labs used artificial intelligence to scan satellite images of China's land borders, provided by Planet Labs, to look for settlements that had similar features. The area that was scanned extended roughly three miles beyond China's border and 25 miles within the border.

We manually checked the results from RAIC Labs' scan to determine whether each site it had detected was a village. Features in satellite images that pointed to civilian settlements included yards, roofs of homes, cars and sports grounds like running tracks and basketball courts. Where possible, using coordinates identified by RAIC Labs, we looked up village names and searched for social media posts and Chinese media reports about the sites. We categorized the sites based on how much had been built around 2016, when China began planning its border village program. We categorized a village as new if no more than 10 structures had existed before 2016. A village was categorized as having expanded if it had more than 10 structures before 2016 but had grown in the years since. We also treated a settlement as a new village if the Chinese government designated it as such, regardless of how many structures it had before 2016. We found a small number of villages that the algorithm had missed. Our findings still might not be comprehensive. Matthew Akester and Robert Barnett reviewed our analysis and contributed three additional village sites that had not previously been reported.

Stories of Tibet

11 August 2024, Tricycle, Tenzin D. Tsaogang

A collection of fiction from the innovative Tibetan filmmaker Pema Tsenden (1969–2023)

In "The Doctor," the final and perhaps most experimental short story of the late Pema Tsenden's collection, Enticement: Stories of Tibet, Man A and Woman A face an apocalyptic contagion. Discussing the absurdity of life, Woman A says: "When one thinks about it, human life is totally absurd." Man A responds with a heavy sigh: "It is completely absurd." Woman A also sighs: "The world and samsara are utterly meaningless."

Like a chorus, they echo each other's words, as though by mere repetition, truth itself emerges.

The narrator doesn't disclose their names or their relationship. Are they husband and wife? Brother and sister? Two strangers who just met? Descriptions of the setting, like stage directions of a play, are bare. There is a riverbank. It is spring. The leaves of a recently planted tree are beginning to grow.

The man and woman are in a double bind: To escape the contagion, they can either traverse the dangerous river or wait for a doctor to arrive with a cure. Both options threaten death; they choose to wait. As time passes, events occur and recur in an endless loop. The seasons change. They age and wrinkle. Others trying to escape appear and disappear. Some die crossing the river. Prospects of the doctor's arrival appear increasingly bleak. To buffer themselves against the absurdity of their new reality and the inevitability of their suffering, the man and woman repeatedly invoke and insist on their faith in the three jewels.

Characters in the rest of Tsenden's sprawling and experimental anthology—his first in English—also confront and cycle through a samsara of suffering. They brush against the alienating forces of the state or the whims of nature, faith, and their bare human desires. Few emerge with their innocence and morality intact, their sense of the world irreparably ruptured.

If stories by exiled Tibetan writers begin with the separation from and fixation on the homeland they knew, writings from inside Tibet are about witnessing and chronicling its changing landscape.

Born during the turbulent years of the Cultural Revolution in a nomadic region in Trika County in Qinghai Province, Tsenden grew up in a family of herders and farmers. At an early age, he cultivated an appreciation for Tibetan language and culture from his grandfather, who would make the school-aged Tseden copy Buddhist scriptures by hand.

Before earning a reputation as a pioneer and auteur of Tibetan New Wave cinema, Tseden was first a writer and a translator. In the 1980s, as Tibetan and Chinese literature emerged from the twilight of the Cultural Revolution, Tseden attended Northwest University for Nationalities in Lanzhou, where he wrote and translated stories.

If exiled writers read like caricatures as they “shout, trying to underscore our exile,” as the writer-translator-editor Tenzin Dickie writes in her introduction to The Penguin Book of Modern Tibetan Essays, writings from Tibet are like code that must be deciphered. “There is so much they can’t say,” writes Dickie, “so little that can be said.”

In the more realist and contemporary stories of Enticement, Tseden’s critique of the Chinese colonial state can be decoded in his focus on the quiet absurdity and alienation of modern Tibetan life. In “Tharlo,” the titular protagonist, a shepherd-orphan affectionately known by local villagers as “Little Braid,” travels to the city to obtain a new government-issued identity card. On his journey, Tharlo meets several people: the district police chief behind the local campaign to register villagers for IDs; a photographer who tells him his hair is too messy; and a young, attractive hairdresser. They gently mock Tharlo’s small braid, and when he recites the number of sheep he owns or a speech from Mao, they express surprise at his excellent memory. Mostly, they find his pastoral innocence and guilelessness amusing, as though he has just emerged from a cave.

As he spends more time in the city, Tharlo starts drinking. He falls for the hairdresser who persuades him to sell his sheep, the main source of his livelihood. In one heartbreaking scene, he cuts off his braid, lopping off a part of his old self.

In an ironic and absurd twist, when Tharlo visits the police station to collect his identity card, the chief tells him he now looks different from his photograph, and orders him to make a new one. So Tharlo ends up right where we encounter him at the beginning of the story, off to the city to take a new photo. But this time, his innocence is irrevocably lost. The temptations of city life, his carnal desires, and the interests of the state prove to be forces too powerful for Tharlo to overcome.

Despite the decades-long trend of Han Chinese migration into the Tibetan plateau, Chinese characters are noticeably absent from Tseden’s depiction of contemporary Tibetan life. If they appear, it is only in marginal roles, like the Chinese tourist in “Tharlo,” who, upon seeing the wild-haired Tharlo smoking a cigarette, exoticizes him and tells him he looks like an artist. By erasing or minimizing Chinese presence from the worlds he has built, Tseden’s stories are radical exercises in fantasy, underscoring that his concerns as an artist are foremost of Tibetans.

The lives of his characters are of those undeniably touched by the colonial state.

Nonetheless, the lives of his characters are of those undeniably touched by the colonial state. In “Eight Sheep,” a young shepherd grieves the loss of his mother and grassland that has been in “disarray” since the government decided to enclose it with a fence. Or in “Gang,” a magical-realist tale about two siblings named Gang with translucent bodies that shimmer in the light. After snowstorms and failed crops beset their village, the male Gang decides to exhibit his body to the public to help generate economic prosperity.

But to the dismay of the foreign researchers who want to study their glowing bodies, the journalists who flock to the town for a good story, and the desperate villagers who hope to profit from the tourism, the siblings refuse to be photographed together.

By removing Chinese perspectives, Tseden also avoids making his stories about the pure, innocent Tibetan pitted against the bad-faith Chinese actor. Instead, his work shows how Tibetans—the women who try to civilize Tharlo or the desperate villagers in “Gang”—are also complicit in feeding systems of exploitation and profit. Each is caught in complex calculations of what it means to be a modern Tibetan subject.

It is nearly impossible for the characters in Tseden’s stories to retain moral purity. Only the siblings in “Gang” manage to. But they can do so only by abandoning society and its totalizing and cannibalistic urges.

To confine Tseden’s literary concerns to a primarily political project, however, would be a disservice to his range as a writer. Tseden’s satirical and humorous treatment of Tibetan life also extends to Buddhism and the seemingly irrational nature of faith.

The delightful and charming “Orgyan’s Teeth” begins with the death of the narrator’s childhood friend Orgyan, a reincarnate lama, who many believe has “passed into nirvana.” But the narrator is skeptical. The story occurs mostly in flashbacks, as the narrator, like a detective, exhumes old memories of Orgyan, searching for any evidence that he was or wasn’t a holy being.

He remembers how Orgyan, who wasn’t an especially bright student, struggled with math and often copied his homework. But there’s an equal impulse in the narrator to believe that his friend is special. He recalls one memory of Orgyan resuscitating a fish back to life, or the times when Orgyan, despite his special religious status, treated him as an equal. The story, told through memories in which the narrator seesaws between belief and disbelief, reads like a catalog of faith. The narrator never arrives at a clear answer. But it's his attempt that matters.

While "Orgyan's Teeth" is about one man's ambivalence toward faith, "Enticement," the collection's centerpiece, is about the extreme, even violent, measures one can take in the name of devotion. In this dreamlike story, a young man is transfixed by a silkbound book of scriptures that sends him into violent, uncontrollable fits that he can't remember.

In the meta-narrative "A Golden Corpse Tale: Gun," Tseden's twist on a Tibetan folktale, a man named Dega, to repent for his sins of killing, must bring a golden, talking corpse out of the grave to his master. He cannot speak to the corpse, or else he'll lose possession of it. But the corpse is cunning. To trick Dega into speaking, he tells him a tragic story about two generations of a family stuck in a loop of suffering. Like the people in the story, Dega keeps repeating his error. He remains stuck in transit with the corpse, never reaching his goal—and never atoning for his sins.

In one of the first scenes of "Tharlo," when asked by the police chief why he never bothered to make a government-issued card, Tharlo poignantly responds, "Isn't it enough that I know myself?" Of the stories in Tseden's anthology, this statement feels like his most pointed rebuke of the Chinese state, its insistence that only by being absorbed into its bureaucratic machine and control do people like Tharlo and Tibetans across the plateau matter. Tseden's stories can thus be interpreted as an intervention against the fate that befalls people like Tharlo, who, in the face of sweeping political and economic changes, become unrecognizable.

Yet to earmark modernity as specifically Chinese and tradition as Tibetan is too facile. It's a tragedy that Tseden, who passed away just a year ago at the age of 53, is no longer here to contend with this conundrum imposed by colonialism. His work—the ten stories in this collection and his extensive and celebrated filmography—also does not provide an easy fix. But it does give Tibetans a template to interrogate and better know themselves, so they don't, as Tharlo does, completely self-obliterate in the face of larger structural changes.

In Enticement, just as Chinese characters are notably missing from Tseden's stories, so are contextualizing landmarks. There is a village, a town, a river, but they remain unnamed. There are no mentions of Tibet's traditional regions—like Amdo (where Tseden was from), Kham, and U-Tsang. There is no mention of dialects. But there are vivid descriptions of the grasslands, the mountains, the snow—topographies synonymous with Tibet.

In the introduction to her anthology of Tibetan essays, Dickie writes, "To speak as Tibetans, and to write as Tibetans, is to continually recreate the nation." By creating specific but unspecified landscapes, Tseden extends to his Tibetan readers a wide and generous terrain where they can map their own stories; he offers a Tibet they can recognize and claim as their own.

Journey to Tibet

11 August 2024, Tricycle, Judith Hertog

Retracing the footsteps of the French adventurer Alexandra David-Néel

"Our passage in Londres was as inconspicuous as we could have wished. Not one of the villagers whom we met appeared to take any particular notice of us." This is how Alexandra David-Néel, a French Tibetologist and explorer, described the beginning of her journey in Tibet in the fall of 1923. She recounts how she and her adopted son, a young Tibetan named Yongden, made their way through the village under the cover of night, trying to find the trail toward a mountain pass that would allow them to slip across the border into Tibet and reach the city of Lhasa.

The village at the foot of the Himalayas—on English maps of the time transliterated as "Londres"—is now called Yongzhi, a Tibetan farming community at the northern tip of the Chinese province of Yunnan, part of the Tibetan Kham region. The village lies right outside the border of what is officially designated as the "Tibet Autonomous Region." It is perched on the slopes of a fertile, green valley rich with pomegranates, walnuts, and grapes, its vineyards laden with fruit waiting to be picked for the fall harvest. Many of the villagers also work on the side as trekking guides and drivers for tourists visiting the region.

Yongzhi lies in the special Shangri-La tourism zone, which in recent years has become a busy travel destination. The village of Yongzhi is just outside the tourist circuit, but the nearby town of Degen hosts countless Chinese tour groups who like to spend a night in one of its luxury hotels to photograph the sunrise over the Kawa Karpo, a holy Buddhist mountain on an ancient Tibetan pilgrimage route.

It was this route that Alexandra David-Néel used to slip unnoticed into Tibet, dressed as a pilgrim, her hair and face darkened to hide her European complexion. At the time, the Tibetan government did not allow foreigners to enter the country and stationed troops along the border to arrest unauthorized travelers. I visited the village exactly a hundred years later wanting to see the place Alexandra David-Néel describes in the opening of her book My Journey to Lhasa, which inspired my own obsession with Tibet when I first read it as a teenager.

Together with Yongden, Alexandra set out to be the first Western woman to reach Lhasa. She was 55 years old and had been drawn to Tibet and Buddhism since the time she was a teenager, when she encountered Theosophy, a spiritual movement that purported to come from Tibetan sources.

For Alexandra, Buddhism was an alternative to the suffocating restrictions of the 19th-century bourgeois society in which she was raised. Born in 1868 as the only child of wealthy French-Belgian parents, Alexandra had a deep disdain for ordinariness and the submissiveness expected of women. She longed for freedom and adventure. In her 20s and early 30s she associated with anarchists in Paris and studied Eastern philosophy while earning a living as an opera singer. She stubbornly resisted marriage, which at the time spelled the end of a woman's freedom. But eventually she wedded a lover, Philippe Néel, a well-to-do railroad engineer based in Tunisia with whom she lived on and off for only the first seven years of their almost forty years of marriage. In 1911, at the age of 42, Alexandra set off for Asia to deepen her study of Buddhism. She spent most of the next thirty-five years there, supported by her husband, who, from afar, sent her money orders and letters.

Alexandra must have infected me with her dreams of adventure. I too wanted to become an explorer venturing into the unknown, free from the humdrum of regular life.

After Alexandra and Yongden set out from Yongzhi, they walked for more than three months in the middle of winter across the mountains of eastern Tibet, a journey of over a thousand miles. They reached Lhasa in February 1924.

This was not Alexandra's first attempt to penetrate the "forbidden" land. Alexandra had already spent more than twelve years in Asia, approaching Tibet from all directions. From 1914 to 1916, she lived in Sikkim, where she studied with a hermit lama in the Himalayan mountains near the Tibetan border. But she was expelled from Sikkim after making an illegal trip into Tibet to meet the Panchen Lama, one of Tibet's highest-ranking incarnate Lamas, who lived just across the border in the town of Shigatse.

After her expulsion from Sikkim, she eventually moved to China in 1917, where she spent the next six years traveling in Tibetan border regions. For two years, she studied at the famous Kumbum Monastery in the northeastern Tibetan Amdo region. Twice she joined caravans to Lhasa but was turned back at the border. If there was anything that provoked Alexandra's anarchism, it was to be told something was forbidden. "[A]ny honest traveler has the right to walk as he chooses, all over that globe which is his," she asserted in the preface to My Journey to Lhasa.

As the first Western woman to reach the capital of Tibet, where she lived incognito for more than two months, Alexandra instantly became a celebrity in Europe and America. She spent a few years publishing and touring before returning to Asia for another decade of travel.

In 1946, at the age of 77, she finally returned permanently to Europe to settle down in southern France, where she continued writing books that explained the mysteries of Tibetan Buddhism. Alexandra was a master at presenting herself as a no-nonsense narrator who had seemingly rational explanations for the most fantastical supernatural phenomena. Her many books on Tibetan Buddhism allowed readers to believe that there is a place in the world where magic exists, where sorcerers can revive dead bodies, and where meditating monks have to weigh themselves down with chains so they won't float away in levitation. In the 1960s, when Alexandra was in her 90s, she became an idol to hippies who flocked to her house to meet the aged adventurer and Buddhist authority.

That must be how I encountered her, growing up in bohemian Amsterdam in the 1970s. I remember first reading one of Alexandra's books, left at our house by one of my mother's friends, when I was 12. Like so many other readers, I was immediately drawn to the descriptions of the wild landscapes of Tibet and the accounts of magical and spiritual attainment. Alexandra must have infected me with her dreams of adventure. I too wanted to become an explorer venturing into the unknown, free from the humdrum of regular life.

The first time I traveled in Tibet I was right out of college. My boyfriend and I had impulsively gotten married in Hong Kong, and for our "honeymoon" we snuck without a travel permit into Tibet, took a bus to Lhasa, and then hitchhiked from Shigatse to Mount Kailash and into Xinjiang. We could have died when, hungry and sick, we got stuck without transportation in the sparsely populated Tibetan highlands. I felt exhilarated nonetheless.

"I have homesickness for a country that isn't mine," Alexandra wrote in a letter to her husband. "The steppes, the solitudes, the eternal snows and the big skies up there [in the Himalayas] haunt me." Like her, once I had experienced the landscape of Tibet, I kept wanting to return.

Shortly after that first trip, I did the math and discovered that I was born a little over nine months after Alexandra died, just before her 101st birthday.

I like to muse that the coincidence of my birth gives me some kind of cosmic connection with Alexandra, and that in my life I have been retracing her travels. I returned several times to Tibet. In the fall and winter of 1999–2000, I lived for five months in Lhasa as an English teacher. I visited Lhasa again in 2019. But after getting to know the city that had been Alexandra’s destination, this time I wanted to see the place from where she had begun her adventure. When I arrived in Shangri-La, I happened to meet a farmer from Yongzhi who in his spare time freelanced as a guide and driver. He offered to let me stay with his family for a few days. It felt like a magical feat to arrive in the place I had read about so breathlessly as a teenager in Amsterdam. Only, everything was different now.

The village seemed to be doing well. Instead of the dirt roads on which Alexandra traveled, the area is now connected by highways, with tunnels drilled through the mountains. Next to the stupa that adorned the highest ridge above the village stood a large cell tower that provided 5G coverage. My hosts had furnished one of the rooms in their farm with extra beds, hoping to earn some cash by lodging tourists. Although foreign tourism has almost dried up, Tibet is now a popular destination for Chinese urbanites, and the government has invested billions of dollars to promote tourism in this northern tip of Yunnan. To boost exotic appeal, the county was officially renamed Shangri-La, after a fictional Tibetan paradise in the 1933 best-selling novel Lost Horizon by the English writer James Hilton. I could imagine Alexandra’s fury at this turn of events. She resented the success of Lost Horizon, and would have been piqued that this region, which she knew so well, would be named after an invention by an author who had never been to Tibet and who very likely had read her books for inspiration.

For several days, I became part of village life, in one of those houses Alexandra had been so carefully trying to avoid. I sat with the father of my host when he milked the cows, helped shuck corn, practiced

English with my host’s son, and hiked in the mountains. On the second day, we visited the village chapel, where a lama from the nearby monastery gave a teaching. The chapel was filled with villagers, all sitting cross-legged on the wooden floor beneath the lama’s throne, like a scene in one of Alexandra’s stories. Except that some of the attendees held smartphones in their lap to record the sermon.

What we think of as our “self” is shaped by our time, our culture, and our circumstances.

I was lucky to have arrived just in time for the annual cham dance at the local monastery where my host’s brother was a monk. Alexandra called this performance of monks dressed up as spirits and deities “the ceremony of the demons.” I may have channeled Alexandra when the crowd parted and ushered me to sit on the temple steps so that I could have a front-row view of the ceremony. This was the kind of treatment Alexandra always seemed to receive. She had supreme self-confidence and considered it normal that everyone would grant her special favors. She never doubted that even the most influential Buddhist masters would regard her with the greatest deference.

When Alexandra met the Thirteenth Dalai Lama in India in 1912, shortly after she had arrived there, she was convinced she impressed him with her superior knowledge of Buddhism. She recounts that the Dalai Lama inquired which Buddhist master had initiated her, assuming she had studied with a Tibetan lama. “It was not easy to convince him that the Tibetan text of one of the most esteemed Buddhist books had been translated into French before I was born,” she writes, and describes how she eventually persuaded the Dalai Lama to personally compose written answers to her questions about Tibetan Buddhist philosophy.

It felt strange to be staying in the village of Yongzhi. Looking out of the window, all dimensions seemed jumbled up, as if I could spy on Alexandra and Yongden across time. I imagined them hiding in the vineyard on the slope below the house. They had arrived in the village pretending to be on a botanical expedition, but at night they changed into their pilgrim disguises and sneaked off into the mountains toward the pilgrim’s path.

In preparation for my trip, I had spent hours reading Alexandra’s account for clues and had zoomed in on Google Earth trying to determine the exact location of that path. I examined every mountain around the village, trying to discern details in the forested slopes, snowy mountain summits and in the shadows of rocky crevices captured in satellite images.

But, of course, a digital map on a computer screen is nothing like actually walking through a landscape. A loudspeaker on the roof of the village’s town hall filled the valley with the sound of prerecorded government announcements that were played several times a day, stones dislodged by my footsteps bounced off the mountainside toward the Mekong River in the valley far below, and I was sweating in my long-sleeved shirt that trapped the October heat. I had pictured myself hiking up the nearby Dokar Pass, which Alexandra describes in her account. But once we reached the turn to the main trail, high up in the mountains above the village, my host didn't want to go any farther. "It's impossible," he said. The other side of the pass was officially the Tibet Autonomous Region, where the Chinese government restricts foreign travel because of the tensions between Tibetans who resist Beijing's control and the Chinese military stationed in Tibet to suppress dissent. I would need to arrange for a government-approved tour guide and apply for special travel and hiking permits.

When Alexandra stood at the head of this trail in the fall of 1923, the situation had been reversed: Back then, it was the independent Tibetan government that jealously guarded its borders. At the behest of conservative Buddhist clerics who feared foreign influences, the Thirteenth Dalai Lama had banned foreign travelers from entering Tibet.

During my earliest visits to Tibet, it hadn't been so difficult to sneak in without a permit, but in recent years the surveillance has increased. The last time I was in Lhasa, in 2019, I found police checkpoints throughout the city, monitoring everyone's comings and goings. New high-rise suburbs had been constructed to entice more Han Chinese to move to the city, and flashy shopping malls heralded wealth and modernity. The old city center around the ancient Jokhang temple still throbbed with activity, but now the Tibetan pilgrims were outnumbered by Chinese tourists posing for photographs.

On the map, the places along Alexandra's route had looked immutable and permanent: names with set coordinates. But even the names of the villages that she passed through have been lost. The Chinese government has Sinicized all the Tibetan place names, and the 19th-century English transliterations of old Tibetan names that Alexandra used are often no longer traceable. The landscape of a hundred years ago has changed as well: Creeks and rivers have been dammed, temples have been destroyed and rebuilt, forests have been harvested for timber, and new roads and tunnels are reshaping the mountain slopes. Nothing is permanent. Kawa Karpo's white peak still rises over the landscape, but even the glacier at its bottom is melting due to climate change.

Culture too has changed. When I look back at Alexandra, a revolutionary in her time, she now seems elitist and orientalist. She presumed herself to understand Buddhism better than most Tibetan monks and haughtily educated Tibetan masters about "true" Buddhism while dismissing their traditional customs as "superstitions."

Of course, what we think of as our "self" is shaped by our time, our culture, and our circumstances. Alexandra David-Néel was a 19th-century upper-class European woman, steeped in European prejudices.

Just as I have been shaped by my own background, and by Alexandra's tales, which have inspired my own romantic vision of Tibet.

Standing there at the head of the pilgrim's trail, I considered giving my host the slip and just walking into the mountains. But in these few days he had treated me like a family member. He was hosting me without a permit, and I didn't want to get him in trouble. Besides, there are no longer any anonymous crowds of pilgrims to hide amongst. The cell towers on the mountain ridges would ping my phone and record my location, like everyone else's, all of us little dots on a digital surveillance map.

In the evening, as we drank homemade wine with our dinner, I told my host and his wife about Alexandra and her connection to their village. It almost felt like a betrayal, as if I were exposing her secret plan. I had discovered that My Journey to Lhasa had just been translated into Chinese, and I had found a Chinese website with a short documentary about Alexandra. My host's wife pulled up the video on her phone. "That's here!" she exclaimed when the pilgrimage route around the Kawa Karpo was mentioned. I could see an idea forming in her mind: Each village in the area was looking for ways to cash in on the tourist industry. Perhaps she thought this could be a business opportunity.

A few weeks later, she posted on her social media feed pictures of a group of villagers she had organized to fix a bridge on the old pilgrimage route. They were replacing wooden beams that had rotted away after maybe a hundred years of neglect. I expect Alexandra would be pleased if the villagers enshrined her name in local lore. In My Journey to Lhasa, she recounts, with her characteristic lack of modesty, the extraordinary impression she must have made on the people she encountered and concludes: [My acts] will probably live long in the memory of those who witnessed them. Maybe a legend will arise out of it all; and who knows if, in the future, a learned student of folklore will not offer some interesting commentary on the story, being far from suspecting the truth of it.

Alexandra was as imperfect a human being as any of us: She could be arrogant, stubborn, and prejudiced. But she definitely became a legend.

China has turned inward to sell Xinjiang cotton after a trade ban. Will it be enough?

11 August 2024, SCMP, Kingling Lo

The US' ban on cotton from China's Xinjiang has forced a shift to the domestic market for the textile industry – and created a gaping shortfall.

After Hong Yongcheng's American customers began to shy away from renewing their orders – a change the towel factory owner attributed to heightened restrictions on Chinese imports – he responded in unexpected fashion.

Rather than try to win back those skittish buyers from overseas, he started a new production line in the Xinjiang Uygur autonomous region – an area of China where exports to the US are all but forbidden.

"I don't see much hope in getting American orders back, so producing from Xinjiang does not matter any more, as most customers are domestic," Hong said. "At least we can cut costs."

Hong's new line in Xinjiang made him a perfect fit for the China-Eurasia Expo in the regional capital Urumqi last June, where authorities invited him to display his home-grown wares and help promote the local economy.

In the two years since a sweeping ban on US exports hit the region, however, most of China's textile and apparel makers are struggling to fill the resultant vacuum in demand.

Global retailers have been under pressure to sever their supply chains from Xinjiang – China's largest cotton-growing region – after allegations over the use of forced labour began to surface in the US and European Union as early as 2019.

International clothing brands – most notably Nike and H&M – responded to those concerns in 2020 with statements disavowing any links to the region. The next year, when legislation began to work its way through Western legislatures, those statements resurfaced and sent Chinese internet users into a furore.

Outraged netizens called for a boycott, using the hashtag "I support Xinjiang cotton" to push consumers to avoid products from foreign firms in question and buy local as a form of patriotism.

But even with its considerable size, Hong said, the domestic market does not fill the void created by the departure of foreign customers.

"It is true that we are seeing our costs halved in Xinjiang, but our overall profits are nothing like before," he said. "The orders just don't make up."

'We needed a way out'

Xinjiang, a region in China's far west with a surface area about three times the size of France, supplies one-fifth of the global cotton supply and 90 per cent of China's own stocks. It has made international headlines as governments and media outlets – mostly in the US and Europe – alleged regional authorities have detained an estimated one million members of Muslim ethnic minority groups and subjected many to forced labour.

While Beijing has denied these allegations, the Uygur Forced Labour Prevention Act – a ban of all imports from Xinjiang unless a "rebuttable presumption" of forced labour can be successfully disputed – passed the US Congress in late 2021 and was enacted in June 2022.

We were losing one-third of our business just from Americans cutting orders

- Hong Yongcheng, towel factory owner

Beijing responded forcefully, saying in a Foreign Ministry briefing companies that stopped using the "best cotton in the world" would only be harming themselves. But for authorities and businesses in Xinjiang, the ban – set to last eight years according to the legislation's sunset clause, though the likelihood of indefinite renewal is high – has put immense strain on the local economy, which had one of the country's lowest nominal GDPs even before the ban.

While there is little public data available to gauge the full impact the act had on Xinjiang's economy, the region has seen a 54.6 per cent drop in foreign direct investment, with only US$50.14 million invested throughout 2021 according to the local government. In terms of trade, Xinjiang's total exports to the US in 2023 were valued at around US$373 million – a 92 per cent drop from 2020, according to Urumqi customs figures.

Xinjiang has historically relied on help from other regions and the central government to support its economic development. Since 2015, the local authorities have rolled out a multitude of investment incentives, attempting to grow the textile and apparel industry through tax rebates and subsidies for electricity and transport.

Hong and his partners – who have been running their towel business from export-heavy Jiangsu province for over a decade – only considered a move to the faraway arid region last year, when conditions were particularly bleak.

"We needed to find a way out," Hong said. "We were losing one-third of our business just from Americans cutting orders. We were not even using Xinjiang cotton in our production, we imported it from Pakistan." Hong said the drop-off began in 2020 among his customer base, mostly buyers for international hotel brands. "They faced pressure to drop Chinese suppliers."

Revenues went down 60 per cent. In response, the company has moved the lion's share of its exports to a mix of closer markets, including South Korea, Japan and several countries in Southeast Asia.

"Before the sanctions, 70 per cent of our business was exporting overseas, half to the US," Hong said. "Now it's the complete opposite. Seventy per cent are local orders."

Hong said his company decided to open a production line in Xinjiang after being offered a rent-free factory by the local government, 10 times the size of their 2,000-square-metre (21,528-square-foot) facility in Jiangsu.

"Electricity and labour costs are half of what we pay in Jiangsu. We just needed to buy our own equipment and use cotton from Xinjiang in production," Hong said.

Thanks to heavy government subsidies like these, Xinjiang's textile and apparel industry has grown considerably. By October 2023, there were 3,725 companies registered for the fabrics business in Xinjiang, almost six times the count from 2014. More than one-third came about via investments from elsewhere in the country, official figures revealed.

The region has also ramped up trade with its five Central Asian neighbours – Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan – which were the recipients of 66.9 per cent of Xinjiang's exports during the first six months of 2024.

Customs data showed the value of these shipments totalled 147.6 billion yuan (US$20.7 billion), a 23.9 per cent increase compared to the same period last year. Apparel and footwear now represent 60.7 per cent of China's total export value to the five countries, with electronics coming in at 30 per cent, according to 2023 customs figures.

Interwoven with exports

But the surge in trade with Central Asia has only made up for some of the shortfall in China's textile exports, a problem exacerbated by lethargy in the broader economy.

Manufacturers in the field exported US$67.2 billion of goods in the first quarter, a year-on-year slump of 6.9 per cent according to Chinese customs data. Shipments to the US, EU and Japan shrunk by 18.4 per cent, 24.7 per cent and 8.7 per cent respectively during the period.

The trend is unlikely to be reversed any time soon, as the US has continued to strictly scrutinise the region's textile trade and update the scope of its legislation accordingly. The state-owned Xinjiang Tianshan Wool Tex Stock, one of Xinjiang's largest garment companies, was added to the act's list of proscribed firms in September 2023 along with two other enterprises. Five metals and chemical companies were added to the list on Thursday, according to Reuters.

A person with direct knowledge of the company's operations said it exported 20,000 fewer pieces of clothing in 2023 compared to 2022. There is no public information on how many pieces of clothing the company produces each year.

"Orders from the US are now virtually zero. The US and France used to be our biggest customers, but during the Covid period, France started cutting orders, too. Fortunately, Germany's orders have remained stable," the person said, adding other export destinations are unlikely to account for the loss of business.

China's textile sector reported an export value of US$293.6 billion last year, an 8.1 per cent drop in export value compared to 2022. Fabrics and clothing contributed 8.6 per cent to the total value of China's 2023 exports – a figure that also fell on a year-on-year basis, but only by 4.6 per cent. Sheng Lu, a professor of fashion and apparel studies at the University of Delaware, said while China's sector will "undoubtedly remain one of the world's most competitive" given its manufacturing capabilities, geopolitics will continue to be a drag on exports. "Due to deteriorating relations, sourcing from China is regarded as high-risk for US fashion companies," Lu said. "This pushes [these] companies to reduce their 'China exposure' and move orders elsewhere. For Chinese manufacturers that heavily rely on exports, the worst may be yet to come."

China reported weaker than expected economic growth in the second quarter of 2024, with a 4.7 per cent expansion year on year falling short of the government's annual target of "around 5 per cent". A slackening of demand appears correlative, as retail sales rose 2 per cent in June, year on year – a noteworthy slide compared with the 3.7 per cent growth seen in May, and the slowest rate of increase since China lifted its coronavirus restrictions at the end of 2022.

Clothing sales were hit particularly hard during that month, with a drop of 1.9 per cent reported despite growth of 1.3 per cent in the first half of the year. Of the discretionary items that Chinese consumers said they would cut back on when "uncertain about their financial prospects", clothing ranked near the top. These results were published on July 9 in the 2024 McKinsey China Consumer Report, after a survey of nearly 12,000 respondents was conducted last year. All these are worrying signs for Chinese policymakers, who have repeatedly stressed the importance of shifting the primary source of economic growth from manufacturing to consumption.

Hong, meanwhile, has been dealing with numerous challenges. On top of receiving smaller orders from hotels and restaurants for his towels this year, fierce competition from domestic players – bordering on "price-slashing", he said – has led him to expect another 30 per cent drop in sales by December. Chen Li, an analyst from Chinese think tank Anbound, said weak foreign and domestic demand, along with geopolitics-induced shifts in supply chains, would mean more undercutting among clothing manufacturers.

"Low prices lead to a decline in companies' profit margins. In the long run, it will hinder corporate growth because companies are unable to invest more resources in brand-building, product innovation, and marketing," Chen said. "Small and medium-sized enterprises will become extremely fragile, and likely to be eliminated in the market, thus having a major impact on the economy in the long run."

A way out, a way forward

With manufacturers duking it out over a shrinking pool of domestic demand, Zhang Zhiwei, president and chief economist at Pinpoint Asset Management, said many will look to move production out of the country. Now most of our buyers are Chinese ... This has pushed our prices down further - Li Qingrong, Sichuan Firstlady Textile "Those with access to the international market [will] seek to expand overseas," Zhang said. "It is a trend I expect to continue for the coming years." Sun Ruizhe, president of the China National Textile and Apparel Council, named "Arabic, Southeast Asian, Central Asian and African countries" as top destinations for Chinese businesses in a July speech to members. With the broader economic picture still hazy, however, some companies are content to stay put.

Li Qingrong, general manager of Sichuan Firstlady Textile - another company promoting its wares at the China-Eurasia Expo in Urumqi - said business went down by one-third since Japanese clothing brand Uniqlo cancelled its orders over cotton sourced from Xinjiang.

"Now most of our buyers are Chinese," she said. "They know how things work and exactly how much production costs, unlike foreign buyers who usually buy at a higher price. This has pushed our prices down further." She expects another 20 per cent drop in sales by the end of the year.

"We don't have particular plans, the economy is not looking great for everyone," she said, adding that her family-owned business has nearly 300 employees.

Hong, still adjusting to running a factory in Xinjiang, said he has started to plan for the future despite this year's gloomy outlook.

"We have to change our business model, from customising for other brands to creating our own brand for domestic customers," Hong said.

"These things take time. We need to produce our products to a higher quality so even if we sell fewer, we can sell it at a higher price," he said. "I think labelling products as 'made with Xinjiang cotton' would still do well in China."

Can democracy in South Asia withstand US-China rivalry?

10 August 2024, SCMP, Sagina Walyat

From rising authoritarianism to political instability, unrest throughout the region has intensified alongside shifting alliances.

Recent developments in South Asia, particularly the uprising in Bangladesh, are transforming regional dynamics with potentially global impacts. Home to 1.94 billion people, South Asia is grappling with rising extremism, democratic backsliding and political instability. As a key player in the Indo-Pacific, the region's turmoil - particularly given Bangladesh's strategic position in the Bay of Bengal - holds profound significance.

The chaotic US withdrawal from Afghanistan and the Taliban's 2021 resurgence, regarded by many as a US foreign policy failure, sparked a refugee crisis and additional security issues involving Pakistan. US sanctions and international isolation worsened the suffering of the Afghan people, especially women and children. The 2021 military coup in Myanmar has added to regional migration pressures.

In 2022, Sri Lanka faced its worst economic crisis since it gained independence, marked by 55 per cent inflation and a debilitating debt crisis, leading to crowds eventually storming the president's official residence. By 2023, Pakistan had sunk further into political and economic turmoil, with foreign reserves falling to US$3.1 billion and civil unrest erupting after former prime minister Imran Khan was arrested. In April this year, massive protests gripped Nepal, with demands for the restoration of the monarchy. Amid the unrest, political parties were able to form a coalition government as the country balanced ties between India and China. And now Bangladesh, South Asia's second-largest economy, has experienced bloody regime change sparked by student protests over job quotas that escalated with extremist involvement.

Overall, the outlook for democracy in South Asia appears grim, with ongoing shifts towards authoritarianism and mobocracy showing little sign of reversal. The impact on stability in the region as well as global geopolitics will continue to unfold, as major powers navigate this complex and volatile landscape. South Asia has become entangled in US-China geopolitical rivalry, with significant implications for India. Projected to be the world's third-largest economy by 2028, India has attracted US interest when it comes to countering China. However, New Delhi remains committed to strategic autonomy. Meanwhile, China's growing regional influence poses challenges for India's foreign policy interests.

Recently, Bangladesh has become a victim of great power struggles. Under Sheikh Hasina's administration, Bangladesh's independent foreign policy and tilt toward Beijing have upset Washington. Bangladesh has been reluctant to join the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue – a platform comprising Australia, India, Japan and the US – and is a part of China's Belt and Road Initiative.

Bangladeshi politicians have alleged that the US wants to lease Saint Martin's, an island in the Bay of Bengal – the US has denied this. Hasina has said she rejected an offer from "a white man" for a foreign country to establish an airbase in Bangladesh. In June, Hasina said she wouldn't agree to leasing Saint Martin's although doing so would make it easier for her to stay in power. She has also said that there are conspiracies afoot to carve a Christian state out of Bangladesh and Myanmar.

Meanwhile, over the past decade, China's influence in South Asia has grown through the Belt and Road Initiative, which South Asian nations such as Sri Lanka and the Maldives have joined. Infrastructure projects and cultural exchanges have shifted public perception, advancing China's interests. This growing influence troubles New Delhi, as it affects India's soft power and relationships with neighbouring countries. Interestingly, China, mirroring the US, has started to play a role in shaping the future direction of these countries. A rumoured diplomatic snub during Hasina's recent visit to China could be one indicator of shifting regional dynamics. As prime minister, she allowed India access to the strategically crucial Mongla and Chittagong ports and favoured India over China for the Teesta River project.

The US, a seasoned player in South Asia, has established a robust strategic nexus with Pakistan, exerted significant influence in Nepalese politics and maintained warm informal relations with Bhutan. The US has aligned with India through the Quad, defence cooperation and joint military exercises in the Indian Ocean. Its reported attempts to gain influence in Bangladesh, freezing of Afghanistan's assets and strategic positioning in Sri Lanka and near the Strait of Malacca serve to maintain its hegemony in the region. The US is engaged in a strategic chess game, with its foreign policy increasingly focused on countering China's growing influence in the region. The India- Middle East-Europe Economic Corridor is also one such move to counter China's Belt and Road Initiative in South Asia.

On the other hand, China has effectively utilised its economic power and diplomacy. It has strengthened its all-weather friendships with Pakistan and Nepal. The Maldives, a partner in the Indian Ocean, supports Beijing's ambition for its Maritime Silk Route.

Beijing's diplomatic act in the region has served its interests in Myanmar, while balancing relations with Nepal and managing ties with Sri Lanka in spite of earlier setbacks. The recent developments in Bangladesh could present an opportunity for China to expand its influence, given its good relations with the Bangladesh Nationalist Party. Notably, China has become South Asia's primary trade partner, with trade reaching US$197.4 billion in 2022 and growing at an average rate of 8.3 per cent.

Furthermore, the evolving regional landscape may lead India to become more conciliatory towards Beijing over time, though it will maintain its position on the border dispute with China. The onus is on China to act maturely and seize the opportunity to amicably settle the border dispute in a way that benefits both sides.

The competing interests of major powers are reshaping South Asia's dynamics, presenting both challenges and opportunities that will have significant global repercussions.

Fighting for Tibet must be a Team Effort

10 August 2024, Tibetan Review, Robert Vanwey

Back in June, Professor Tenzin Dorjee made an impassioned argument for why Tibet matters. [<https://www.tibetanreview.net/why-tibet-matters/>] He identified several factors that illustrate that the "Tibetan problem" is in fact a global one. As the "Roof of the World," "the Water Tower of Asia," and the "Third Pole," Tibet sits within one of the most environmentally critical places on earth. Saving it means saving the world, as Professor Dorjee eloquently articulated. The human rights situation in Tibet is a repugnant stain on the international community. Religious practice is restricted. The Tibetan language is oppressed, and eroding through forced attrition. The combined assaults on Tibetans' religious practice and use of their own language are the means of eradicating the entire Tibetan culture that has spanned at least a millennium. Relatedly, these forces threaten Tibetan Buddhism, the most potent expression of Buddhism globally.

Given the profundity of each of these matters highlighted by Professor Dorjee, their resolution cannot belong to Tibetans alone. No people should be left to fade away in the dustbin of history as a result of the apathy of those who perceive themselves as not directly affected. For humanity to prosper, it is incumbent upon everyone to contribute to its diversity, robustness, and valor. Team efforts reign supreme over individualized endeavors by virtue of the assortment of expertise. Tibetans most assuredly would benefit from compounded energy applied to the preservation of their culture.

One thing I've learned from my experience working in the Himalayas is this: a sustained response to environmental catastrophes profits most from stakeholder participation. It is the people who live upon a land, those who derive their livelihood from it over generations, that are the people who tend to know best how to sustain it. Swiftly evolving conditions invite new challenges, even for those with generations-long local knowledge. Such local knowledge nevertheless provides an important supplement to scientists seeking practical ways to mitigate the devastating global effects from climate change. But this is only part of the picture.

Public advocacy for suppression of human rights in Tibet depends upon education. We need experts who can operate effectively within the halls of power – skilled diplomats, politicians, and attorneys—who are educated in the historical details that have produced the current Tibetan situation. Without question, accurate knowledge of current, localized conditions is critical. On the larger scale, false arguments put forth to ‘justify’ the atrocious policies destroying Tibetan culture are couched within ahistorical narratives that few non-Tibetan public figures have the background to refute. To oppose this many-leveled attack on Tibetan culture, public advocacy needs to be empowered by education in fair renditions of history, not history derived only from Chinese sources, but also from Tibetan, Mongolian, Hindi, Nepali, and even Russian ones. Resisting the degradation of Tibetan Buddhism seems, in some ways, easier than these other challenges because the Western world has vigorously embraced it. The Tibetan literary tradition grounded in the canon translated from Sanskrit is enormous. Yet only a small portion of Tibetan texts on Buddhism have been translated into western languages. Just as Tibetans worked with Sanskrit scholars for hundreds of years, western translators require guidance by Tibetans fully educated in their tradition. Without fully-educated Tibetans our western translations will be incomplete and Buddhism will suffer for it.

All of this boils down to a simple point. Preservation of one of the world’s most exquisite jewels demands a multidisciplinary approach. It is for this reason that I am working to expand an organization comprised of experts of several fields, one that may seem rather eclectic to some. We are led by two of the most accomplished translators of Tibetan Buddhist works. Two of our members are technology experts, a critical skill in this 21st century, particularly for reaching a wider audience. I, myself, have extensive experience in the world of environmental studies in the Himalayas, and am a trained historian of Tibet. I am also educated as a lawyer, and another of our specialists was a practicing lawyer before shedding that day job to commit more time to the highest levels of translation. We bring this wide array of experience into our curriculum of Tibetan studies.

What any of us can do, regardless of our expertise, is to spread the word about organizations like mine and plenty of others. To capitalize on the contributions of skillful advocates, we need to help provide them the resources to do their work. In a world where the news cycle lives by the minute, the Tibetan issue barely treads water. This is not because it is any less relevant or important; it is simply an artifact of the current way the world functions. People who worry for the future of Tibet, Tibetan culture, and Tibetan Buddhism have an obligation to come together and support the entire community. Perhaps we cannot change the tides of history, but we can diminish their most insidious effects.

09 August 2024, ANI

The Stockholm Centre for South Asian and Indo-Pacific Affairs (SCSA-IPA) brought together scholars and experts from Europe, the US, and South Asia to examine China's strategic investments and influence in the Himalayan region.

The webinar titled "China's Himalayan Hustle Part I: Can China Achieve Infrastructural Hegemony?" was moderated by Dr Jagannath Panda, Head of SCSA-IPA. It explored China's multifaceted approach to the Himalayas, focusing on its economic investments, military involvement, and diplomatic strategies. Panda emphasised the need for more in-depth discussions about China's Himalayan strategy, noting a gap in Western and European discourse on the issue. The webinar addressed key questions concerning China's current infrastructural development plans in the Himalayan region, the implications of the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), and the country's long-term goals in this geopolitically sensitive area.

Panda highlighted the strategic importance of understanding China's actions in the Himalayas, particularly in the context of unresolved territorial disputes with neighbouring countries like India and Bhutan.

Matej Simalcik, Executive Director of the Central European Institute of Asian Studies, discussed China's infrastructure projects in the Himalayan region, linking them to the broader context of the Tibet issue and China's border strategy. He pointed out the significance of these projects in influencing regional stability and governance, particularly in countries like Nepal, which has received substantial Chinese investment.

"China's approach to the region is not based merely on territorial disputes, but also on military and economic matters. This is especially evident in Nepal, a country that since 2019 has received investment for many infrastructure projects, including, for example, the trans Himalayan railway network," said Simalcik. Jeffrey Payne, a professor at the Near East South Asia (NESA) Centre for Strategic Studies, elaborated on China's Himalayan policy as an extension of its broader domestic and foreign policy objectives. He drew parallels between China's approach in the Himalayas and its actions in the South and East China Seas, suggesting that China's tactics are aimed at asserting control over disputed territories. "A parallel can be made with China's approach in the South and East China Seas and the Himalayan region— in both disputed areas, the Chinese action is to make the world notice that they can control these regions, and as a result, these territories are by default theirs," said Payne.

Thomas Eder, a senior researcher on China, highlighted China's neighbourhood policy, emphasising the importance of security partnerships with countries like Pakistan. He noted that China's investments in Pakistan, particularly through the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, are a crucial part of its competition with the U.S. and efforts to secure its periphery.

Antonina Luszczkiewicz-Mendis, a former Fulbright senior scholar at Indiana University-Bloomington in the United States, discussed India's concerns regarding China's infrastructure projects, especially those related to water sharing and transboundary rivers like the Brahmaputra. She pointed out that China's activities in these areas could exacerbate tensions, given the existing border disputes and water rights issues.

Dr. Saroj Kumar Aryal, a researcher at the Faculty of Political Science and International Studies at the University of Warsaw, provided insights from Nepal's perspective, highlighting the growing influence of China in Nepal's internal politics and the challenges posed by China's infrastructure projects near the India-Nepal border. He also noted Nepal's limited capacity to monitor Chinese activities in the northern Himalayas.

The webinar concluded with a call for greater cooperation between the West, India, and other regional players to counter China's infrastructural ambitions in the Himalayas. (ANI)

The geopolitics in 'Tibet border' reference

09 August 2024, Deccan Herald, Jabin T Jacob

Dorjee Tshering Lepcha's speech underlines that India's development policies for its border areas and its policy towards China are connected, and that both are equally important.

Rajya Sabha member Dorjee Tshering Lepcha from Sikkim hit the headlines last week for his call to the Union government to instruct the Indian Army and other agencies working in border areas to start referring to the 'China border' as the 'Tibet border'. However, all of Lepcha's speech — his response to the Union Budget for 2024-2025 — deserves attention.

The parliamentarian from Sikkim made other direct and indirect references to Tibet. For instance, Lepcha called for restarting border trade through Nathu La and the Kailash Mansarovar pilgrimage. He pointed out that the route through Nathu La to Kailash Mansarovar was the best of the three overland routes currently available — the other two are through Nepal and Uttarakhand.

Lepcha also briefly made a reference to Ogyen Trinley Dorje as the 17th Karmapa and called for bringing him to Sikkim. Dorje is only one of the claimants to the title of the 17th Karmapa and leadership of the Karma Kagyu sect of Buddhists, albeit one who has been accepted by both the Dalai Lama and the Chinese government. The young Buddhist religious figure later escaped from Tibet to Nepal in 1999, moving to India the following year. However, he left India in 2017, and has not been back since. The Rumtek monastery in Sikkim is a major seat of the Karma Kagyu school, and hence, Lepcha's call.

The Member of Parliament surely realises that any official Indian government action either switching to 'Tibet border' or on the Karmapa would only draw protests from Beijing, and make restoration of border trade and the Kailash Mansarovar pilgrimage that much harder.

The speech by Sikkim's lone member in the upper house of Parliament — the state will mark 50 years of its accession to the Indian Union in 2025 — must, therefore, be understood in a larger context. The reference to the 'Tibet border' was possibly an attempt to draw attention to arguably more important issues that the speech raises. It highlights the linkages between the Union government's China policy and questions of politics and development in India's border states.

Lepcha started his roughly 10-minute-long intervention with a reference to the problem of unemployment among the educated youth in his state. While he sought to portray this as part of a global phenomenon, it was clear that this was an issue that was uppermost in the minds of ordinary Sikkimese, and one whose solution he made clear needed a non-partisan approach. He framed his request for the Union government's intervention to promote skill development and improve the employability of the state's job-seekers with a reference to atmanirbharta. It is also in this context of lack of jobs and need for government support that his call to promote organic farming and his demand for the inclusion of 12 more communities in the Scheduled Tribe (ST) list must be seen.

The Sikkimese Member of Parliament then identified problems with the state's infrastructure including the poor state of the section between Sevoke and Rangpo on National Highway No 10 – which he called the “lifeline” of the state – and problems with operations at Sikkim's only airport at Pakyong. Both are issues that Lepcha has raised repeatedly in Parliament but received only somewhat unsatisfactory answers for. One direct question, for example, on a demand from the Government of Sikkim to transfer the Sevoke- Rangpo stretch from the West Bengal Public Works Department to the National Highways and Infrastructure Development Corporation Ltd. elicited a non-committal response from Minister of Road Transport and Highways, Nitin Gadkari.

Economic logic also dominates the Tibet references in the parliamentarian's speech as should be clear from his highlighting of trade and pilgrimage through Nathu La. He further pointed out that while the Chinese were constructing villages all along the Line of Actual Control, India by contrast had kept people from accessing border areas through the notification of these areas as reserved forests and wildlife sanctuaries. This is not an anti-environment complaint but a reference to the fact that the Union government's environment policies are often neither sensitive to local conditions nor acknowledge local knowledge and contributions to conservation and sustainability. Policies that cut off local populations from border areas, forest lands, and traditional grazing pastures whether for national security considerations or environmental ones have implications for local culture, development, and livelihood, as well as for national security, itself.

Lepcha's speech underlines the fact that India's development policies for its border areas and its policy towards China are connected and that both are equally important – one cannot take priority over the other.

To return to the headline of calling India's northern border the ‘Tibet border’, this could be seen as a response to China's renaming of various places in Arunachal Pradesh, the third instance of which took place in March. However, the question then arises why a government response has been lacking since 2017 when China first renamed places in the northeast Indian state. In fact, it was widely reported in June that the government was planning to rename 30 locations in Tibet according to their names in Indian languages. Nothing has been heard of this idea since.

Renaming the border is probably easy to do and it might even be argued is a necessary reminder of historical facts. But neither the existence of the Indo-

Tibetan Border Police nor India's hosting the Dalai Lama for decades has led to any great expertise on Tibet outside of select pockets in India's government and society. Or to sustained political and economic attention to India's border areas or, indeed, to formulating cogent policy towards China. The problem then lies elsewhere.

Dealing with the challenges China poses to Indian interests must not be an episodic affair led by headlines or limited to rhetoric. It demands urgent, sustained action in India's border states in terms of investments in human resources, improving Centre-State policy co-ordination, and ensuring accountability.

Taiwan should step up transparency amid Chinese 'gray zone' tactics: Expert

08 August 2024, Focus Taiwan

Taiwan should step up efforts to boost transparency about China's "gray zone" activities to drum up international support and pressure Beijing into not escalating tensions, a maritime transparency project director at Stanford University said Thursday.

To engage the public at home and the international community, the Taiwanese government should release footage and images of China's "gray zone" maneuvers around Taiwan, including standoffs between Taiwanese and Chinese coast guard ships around the Kinmen Islands, Ray Powell, director of Seelight at Stanford's Gordian Knot Center, told a press event held by Forward Alliance in Taipei.

Gray zone activities refer to actions that fall between traditional notions of war and peace. These activities typically involve ambiguous or nontraditional methods that aim to achieve strategic objectives without overtly crossing the threshold into open conflict.

Taiwan's Defense Ministry currently relies mostly on flight maps and press releases of Chinese warplane incursions into its air defense identification zone, however, to get the public and lawmakers on board with projects and items the country is funding with defense spending, Taiwan needs to "show the public what these things look like," he said.

Using China's gray zone maneuvers against the Philippines in the South China Sea as an example, he said that after the Philippine government around February 2023 started to task its coast guard vessels with capturing videos and pictures of blocking and swarming maneuvers employed by the Chinese coast guard against Philippine vessels.

Back then, China had tried to harass Philippine vessels on resupply missions to the Second Thomas Shoal, Powell said.

Manila's response to the Chinese gray zone activities, which garnered international support for the Philippines, influenced the United State's decision in late July to provide the Philippines with US$500 million to shore up its defense amid ongoing friction with China in the South China Sea, Powell argued.

Over the past 18 months, the international media reported extensively on tensions in the contested waters, garnering wide attention of the international community, which was helped by a keynote speech by Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos Jr. at the Shangri-la Dialogue in May, he said. Manila's tactic was accompanied by a robust embedded reporters' program, which spotlighted the issue locally after six years of opacity surrounding such incidents under former Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte and also in the international community, Powell said.

Although Beijing initially responded by stepping up its "patrols" near the Second Thomas Shoal, Manila's strategy prompted the two countries to each read out its version of an "agreement" on how each side would approach resupply missions undertaken by the Philippines, which went uncontested by China, he said. "People need to see how Chinese ships and Chinese aircraft are maneuvering in an unsafe manner. Words are important, but images are much more effective,"

Forward Alliance Director Enoch Wu (吳怡農) said.

"People need to see how Chinese coast guards are forcibly boarding sovereign countries' civilian vessels. Our public needs to see that and the world needs to see that," he said.

India-China: A frozen relationship

07 August 2024, Modern Diplomacy, Pritam Sarbabidya

The India-China border disputes date lower back to the early twentieth century whilst the British colonial rulers drew the McMahon Line as the boundary among India and Tibet.

The India-China border disputes date lower back to the early twentieth century whilst the British colonial rulers drew the McMahon Line as the boundary among India and Tibet. However, China never accepted this boundary and claims vast swathes of territory in the eastern sector of the border, including Arunachal Pradesh. On the western front, there may be the Aksai Chin vicinity, which is claimed through India but occupied by means of China. Despite a couple of rounds of negotiations and agreements, including the 1996 Agreement at the Maintenance of Peace and Tranquillity alongside the LAC, the border disputes stay unresolved and continue to be a source of hysteria among the two giants.

The latest escalation in tensions started out in the Covid year of 2020 when Indian and Chinese troops clashed within the Galwan Valley in Ladakh. The violent clashes led to casualties on each facet and brought about a major escalation when the whole world was busy with the first wave of the deadly virus. Since then, both sides have deployed hundreds of troops along the LAC, leading to an anxious and volatile scenario inside the vicinity.

The implications of the border disputes and the current trends on India's foreign coverage are a ways-reaching. India has historically pursued a policy of "non-alignment" and "strategic autonomy", with all most important powers at the same time as safeguarding its country wide pastimes.

The India-China border disputes have additionally highlighted the strategic importance of the Himalayan location and the need for India to strengthen its army abilities and infrastructure along the border. In reaction to China's developing assertiveness in the place, India has stepped up its border infrastructure improvement and army deployments in Ladakh and other touchy regions alongside the LAC. For instance in terms of building roads, India's Border Road Organisation (BRO) has completed 330 projects at a cost of ₹8,737 crore in the last three years.

Maintaining the channel of communication, both side hold numerous rounds of commander level meetings, the latest one was 21st round taken place on 19th February 2024 at Chushul-Moldo border meeting point, concluded with a hope and statement "committed to maintain peace and tranquillity on the ground" and wanted "mutually accepted resolutions of remaining issue". But one major question appears at this point – "Is "mutual" solution really possible, when China "unilaterally" violated all the norms?" We have also seen China's move of unilaterally changing the names of places that belongs to India, objecting Indian PM Narendra Modi's visit to Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh.

Although the two countries trying to balance out their strategies and counter strategies, its for India to look situations from different perspective. In May, 2024 we came across a report which highlighted the Chinese strategy of building a road in "Shaksgam Valley". This Chinese physical occupation could potentially threaten Indian defences in Siachen Glaciers. If China has the access there then twin threats on "Siachen" in South "state in mess" Pakistan and in the North "the dragon". Recently, another media report informed that "China has completed the construction of a 400-metre bridge, connecting the northern and southern banks of the Pangong Tso." Which can be seen as a concern for the India side as these actions enhance communication channels.

The recent standoff has also underscored the significance of enhancing security cooperation with nations like Japan, Australia, and Vietnam, which percentage India's concerns about China's rising strength and assertiveness in the vicinity. At the same time India's focus in strengthening the idea of "free, open and prosperous Indo-Pacific" with the groupings like QUAD.

Despite the border disputes and periodic tensions, India and China have additionally sought to deepen their financial and change ties through the years. China is now India's biggest trading companion, with $118.4 billion in two-way trade. But there are areas of concerns in economics as well, the trade imbalance the two countries. For the record, in 2024 India has the highest trade deficit with China. India's export to China in 2023-24 stood at $16.65 billion, while import stood at $101.75 billion. As a result, the trade deficit is over $85 billion.

However, the monetary courting has been marred with the aid of change imbalances, market get entry to issues, and worries about Chinese investments in crucial sectors of the Indian economy. To counter that in recent years, India has sought to diversify its financial and strategic partnerships to reduce its dependence on China and enhance its strategic autonomy. The authorities' 'Make in India' initiative or its new updated version of "Atma-Nirbhar Bharat" to draw overseas investments in key sectors like defence, infrastructure, and era are aimed at decreasing reliance on Chinese imports and promoting self-reliance in important sectors of the economic system. India has additionally bolstered its partnerships with nations like Japan, Australia, and the USA, via tasks like the Quad and the Indo-Pacific strategy, to mitigate China's developing impact within the region.

The manner forward in resolving the India-China border disputes lies in a complete and sustained speak system that addresses the middle issues of contention and builds mutual consider and self-assurance among the two countries. Both aspects need to stick to current agreements and protocols, which include the 1996 Agreement on the Maintenance of Peace and Tranquillity along the LAC and the 2005 Agreement on Political Parameters and Guiding Principles for the Settlement of the India-China Boundary Question, to save you similarly escalation of tensions and preserve peace and balance along the border, at the same time safeguarding India's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

As India continues to rise a major global player resolving the border dispute with China will be pivotal in defining its trajectory in the 21st century.

Explainer: Tim Walz's long track record in China

07 August 2024, VOA, William Yang

From teaching at a high school in China to his experience serving on a key congressional committee that focuses on relations between Beijing and Washington, Democratic vice-presidential nominee Tim Walz has a decades-long connection with China dating back to the pro-democracy protests in Tiananmen Square in 1989.

As an educator, Walz taught American History, culture, and English to Chinese students at the Foshan No.1 High School in the southern Chinese province of Guangdong in 1989, the year that saw hundreds of thousands of Chinese students protesting against the ruling Chinese Communist Party in Tiananmen Square. "China was coming, and that's the reason that I went," Walz said in a 2007 interview with The Hill, a Washington D.C.-based news website. During his one-year teaching stint in China, Walz was nicknamed "Fields of China" by his students due to his kindness. His time in China had an impact on his perspectives of Chinese people's lives under the ruling Communist Party.

"If they had the proper leadership, there are no limits on what they could accomplish," he said in an interview with the Star Herald in 1990, describing teaching in China as "one of the best things" he has ever done.

His interest in China didn't stop there. Upon returning to the United States, Walz and his wife set up a company named "Educational Travel Adventures" to coordinate summer trips to China for American high school students.

Five years after the Tiananmen Square protests and the Chinese government's violent crackdown, Walz returned to China with his wife for their honeymoon and they brought along two American high school tour groups. Walz continued running the summer exchange program to China for American students with his wife until 2003.

Advocating human rights in China

After becoming a member of Congress in 2007, Walz continued to focus on issues related to China. During his time in Congress, Walz served on the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, which focuses exclusively on human rights issues in the country.

Walz quickly established himself as a vocal critic of the Chinese government, holding regular meetings with high-profile activists from China and Hong Kong, including prominent Hong Kong activist Joshua Wong and Tibet's spiritual leader Dalai Lama.

In an interview with VOA in 2014, Walz recounted his impression of witnessing the student-led protest in Tiananmen Square unfold. "I remembered waking up and seeing the news on June Fourth that the unthinkable had happened,” he said.

While most Americans at the time decided to leave China due to security concerns following the Tiananmen Square protests in 1989, Walz said he felt it was “more important than ever to go” to China because he wanted to ensure that “the story was told” and let the Chinese people know that the outside world was with them.

In addition to engaging with activists from China and Hong Kong, Walz also co-sponsored several resolutions on key human rights issues in China, including demanding the release of Chinese Nobel laureate Liu Xiaobo and Chinese activist Huang Qi, as well as co-signing the Hong Kong Human Rights and Democracy Act in 2017.

In one of his congressional remarks in 2016, Walz highlighted the importance of having “constructive dialogues” with Beijing to ensure “the preservation of traditional Tibetan culture and Tibet’s fragile ecology.” “The U.S. was founded on the ideas of universal freedom, and I believe that we must continue to urge the Chinese government to provide less regulated religious freedom to the Tibetans,” he said at the time. Foreign policy boost

In addition to being a vocal critique of China’s human rights record, Walz also expressed concerns about

China’s attempt to expand its presence in the South China Sea in 2016, citing Beijing’s efforts to build artificial islands in the disputed water as the reason to oppose Washington’s attempt to reduce military spending.

Despite his strong stance on China’s human rights record and military posture, Walz continued to stress the importance of maintaining cooperation with China. “I don’t fall into the category that China necessarily needs to be an adversarial relationship,” he said in a video interview with Agri-Pulse Communications.

“I think we need to stand firm on what they are doing in the South China Sea, but there [are] many areas of cooperation that we can work on,” Walz added.

Some analysts say Walz’s deep connections to China and track record in U.S.-China diplomacy could potentially help the Democratic presidential pair make more informed decisions on foreign policy, especially on issues related to China.

“I think [his emergence as Democratic vice-presidential nominee] is going to put a lot of people who care a lot about American foreign policy in this part of the world at ease, knowing that there is someone on the ticket who is informed, has spent time in the region, and is not starting from square one when it comes to learning about American foreign policy in East Asia,” said Lev Nachman, a political scientist at National Taiwan University.

He said since Walz has expressed many humanistic views of the Chinese people, Tibetan people, and Hong Kongers, the Minnesota governor could add more nuance to the policy debate related to China in the United States.

“He may be able to articulate the need to push back against China’s authoritarianism and human rights violations in different parts of the world in a way that doesn’t vilify Chinese citizens or doesn’t lean antagonistically in this overtly scare tactic rhetoric that I think a lot of U.S.-China discourse has turned into in the U.S.,” Nachman told VOA by phone.

The Annexation Of Taiwan In Xi Jinping’s Timeline – OpEd

06 August 2024, Eurasia Review, Sarah Neumann

The conflict between China and Taiwan regarding independence or annexation has persisted since the end of World War II. However, since the mid-2000s, this issue has escalated significantly, largely due to the intensifying global competition in economic, political, and geopolitical spheres between the United States and China, which has become a defining element of the new world order. Additionally, Taiwan’s transformation into a major hub for semiconductor production—crucial to modern industrial, technological, financial, and logistical advancements—has heightened tensions among Beijing, Taipei, and Washington.

Taiwan’s strategic geographical location further underscores its importance. China is encircled by archipelagos hosting U.S. military bases and allied nations. For the United States, Taiwan serves as a critical pressure point on China’s access routes, whereas for China, it represents the “first island chain.” By integrating Taiwan and artificial islands under construction, China aims to complete its Anti-access/Area denial (A2/AD) strategy in the Western Pacific, thereby disrupting the U.S. containment efforts.

In 1972, Mao Zedong told Richard Nixon that Beijing could wait a century to reclaim Taiwan. However, Xi Jinping appears far less patient. According to U.S. intelligence, Xi has instructed the People’s Liberation Army to be ready for an operation to annex Taiwan by 2027. Various factors, however, could accelerate this timeline, potentially prompting a forcible annexation sooner.

Taiwan seeks independence and requires the support of a major power to counter China, making the United States its best ally. Taiwan leverages its semiconductor production capabilities to gain this support. It manufactures over 60% of the world’s advanced digital, analog, and mixed-signal chips, serving as a primary supplier to U.S. tech companies and defense contractors. Moreover, Taiwan fully cooperates with U.S. sanctions against China, especially regarding the use of integrated circuits made by Taiwanese companies like TSMC, thereby intensifying China's determination to pursue Taiwan's annexation more seriously.

China urgently needs specialized microelectronics, currently produced in Taiwan, to develop its military technologies and AI-related industries. To achieve this, China faces two options: either integrate its domestic production with the latest global technology—a challenging task due to Western sanctions preventing companies like ASML from selling chip-making machines to China—or annex Taiwan to utilize its top-tier manufacturing capabilities.

The potential transformation of Taiwan into a strategic military base for U.S. and NATO forces could prompt China to act preemptively. Under the pretext of aiding Taipei against an imminent Chinese attack, the U.S. aims to bolster its military presence on the island, solidifying its foothold near China's borders. Presently, China is surrounded by U.S. and allied forces: to the northeast by Japan, South Korea, and Okinawa; to the south by Australia and New Zealand; and to the east by the Marshall Islands, Mariana Islands, and Guam, home to active U.S. military personnel. Given this encirclement and the placement of nuclear submarines and unmanned underwater vehicles (UUA), ballistic missiles (IRBM, ICBM, SLBM), B2 bombers in the Andersen Guam base, as well as the deployment of the navy's 7th in the region, China views Taiwan as crucial to connecting with other recently constructed artificial islands to effectively implement its A2/AD strategy.

Considering the geographical positioning of U.S. forces in the Western Pacific, the capabilities of A2/AD systems will be crucial upon the first shot being fired. Advanced weaponry like hypersonic missiles, unless integrated with reliable A2/AD monitoring systems, will be ineffective in detecting, locating, and tracking enemy ships and aircraft. In such a scenario, Taiwan would serve as both the first and last line of defense for both sides. Should Beijing perceive Taiwan as becoming such a strategic position for the Western alliance, it would promptly initiate an early operation against Taiwan.

Another factor potentially accelerating China's 2027 timeline is the U.S. presidential election. If Kamala Harris wins the election, NATO's Indo-Pacific policy and the vision of NATO 2030 will likely continue, intensifying the military presence of the Atlantic alliance in East Asia and the Pacific. Taiwan's geographical significance in this context will be more pronounced than ever. Conversely, if Donald Trump wins, the situation could differ. Trump's non-interventionist rhetoric, aimed at reducing financial and human costs for American soldiers, could create an environment more conducive to China's ambitions. Beijing would exploit the isolationist policies of a new administration to further its goal of reclaiming Taiwan. Currently, China is disinclined to engage in a conflict over Taiwan, which could lead to a direct confrontation with the U.S. and its regional allies, as the economic and financial repercussions would be severe. Instead, China continues to make implicit threats and conduct military drills around Taiwan, such as the "Joint Sword A-2024" exercise, to maintain a constant threat over Taiwan and potential Western actions. However, if conditions change and certain factors emerge, China might act against Taiwan sooner than the end of this decade or 2027. If Western sanctions on Chinese technology intensify and the U.S. significantly widens its technological and military lead, Beijing will take decisive action to annex Taiwan, a key to 21st-century advancements. Should Washington expand the Indo-Pacific NATO idea and integrate Taiwan as a critical military outpost, it would be akin to chaining the wings of the Chinese dragon. In such a scenario, the People's Liberation Army would launch a swift, decisive, and surprise operation to seize Taiwan.

If Trump enters the White House, his anti-NATO, non-interventionist, and anti-coalition policies would offer a glimmer of hope for Beijing. This would embolden Chinese leaders to pursue the annexation of Taiwan. If Beijing realizes that the U.S. is unwilling to bear the substantial costs of protecting Taipei's political aspirations, it will seize the opportunity to annex the island.

China's Iron Grip on Tibet: A Scathing Indictment of Religious Repression

05 August 2024, Khabarhub, Manoj Ghimire

The United States State Department's 2023 Report on International Religious Freedom, released on June 26, 2024, offers a damning assessment of China's ongoing suppression of religious freedom in Tibet.

This comprehensive review serves as a stark reminder of the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) relentless efforts to control and manipulate every aspect of Tibetan Buddhism, effectively strangling the spiritual and cultural life of the Tibetan people.

At the heart of China's oppressive policy lies an insidious campaign of "Sinicization" – a euphemism for the systematic erasure of Tibetan identity and the forced assimilation of Tibetan Buddhism into a CCP-approved version of Chinese culture.

This is not merely cultural imperialism; it is a calculated strategy to neutralize what Beijing perceives as a threat to its authority and to remake Tibetan Buddhism in its own image.

The State Department report highlights the CCP's 2019-2023 five-year plan to Sinicize Buddhism in China, with a particular focus on Tibetan Buddhism. The requirement for monasteries to obtain official permission for large-scale religious events or gatherings further restricts the free practice of religion.

This plan, far from being a benign cultural initiative, is a blueprint for ideological control.

It demands loyalty to the CCP and the state above all else, effectively attempting to replace spiritual devotion with political allegiance.

The involvement of the state-run Buddhist Association of China (BAC) in this process only underscores the extent to which the Chinese government is willing to co-opt religious institutions to serve its political agenda.

Perhaps most alarming is the CCP's brazen interference in the most sacred aspects of Tibetan Buddhist tradition.

The report details how the United Front Work Department (UFWD), an arm of the CCP, has arrogated to itself the power to control the selection of Tibetan religious leaders, including the recognition of reincarnated lamas.

This is not merely administrative overreach; it is a fundamental violation of religious freedom and an attempt to control the very spiritual lineage of Tibetan Buddhism.

The regulations stipulating that reincarnate lamas must be born within China and that no foreign organization or individual may interfere in their selection are particularly egregious.

These rules are transparently designed to prevent the current Dalai Lama, who lives in exile, from having any say in the recognition of his successor.

It is a calculated move to sever the spiritual connection between Tibetans inside Tibet and their exiled religious leader, and to ensure that future religious leaders are compliant with CCP dictates.

The ongoing disappearance of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized as the 11th Panchen Lama by the Dalai Lama and most Tibetan Buddhists, stands as a chilling testament to the lengths the Chinese government will go to control Tibetan Buddhism.

Abducted at the age of six in 1995, his whereabouts remain unknown nearly three decades later.

This act of state-sponsored kidnapping not only violates basic human rights but also represents a direct assault on the religious traditions of Tibetan Buddhism.

The report also sheds light on the Chinese government's efforts to erase the Tibetan language and culture.

Monasteries are being forced to translate texts from Tibetan to Mandarin, a move that observers rightly identify as an attempt to undermine the Tibetan language.

The forced replacement of images of the Dalai Lama and other revered lamas with portraits of CCP leaders in both monasteries and private homes is a particularly cruel form of cultural violence, striking at the heart of Tibetan spiritual practice.

The ban on images of the Dalai Lama, with harsh repercussions for those who dare to own or display them, is a clear violation of religious freedom and personal expression.

It speaks volumes about the CCP's fear of the Dalai Lama's influence and its determination to eradicate any trace of loyalty to him among the Tibetan people. The report also highlights the intensification of repression around politically sensitive events, religious anniversaries, and cultural events with religious components.

The cancellation or curtailment of lay attendance at religious events, even those that had received official approval, demonstrates the capricious nature of CCP control and the constant state of uncertainty under which Tibetan Buddhists must practice their faith.

The role of the United Front Work Department in managing religious affairs through the State Administration of Religious Affairs (SARA) reveals the extent to which religion in Tibet is viewed as a political matter rather than a spiritual one.

The systematic attempt to control, manipulate, and ultimately reshape Tibetan Buddhism to serve the political interests of the CCP is nothing short of cultural genocide.

The UFWD's claim to have the right to deny recognition of reincarnations of high lamas of "especially great influence" is a clear indication of the CCP's fear of charismatic religious leaders who might challenge its authority.

The regulations that allow citizens to take part only in officially approved religious practices are a direct assault on religious freedom. By asserting CCP control over all aspects of religious activity, including the management of religious venues, groups, personnel, and schools, the Chinese government is effectively trying to remake Tibetan Buddhism into a state-controlled entity devoid of its spiritual essence.

This comprehensive control extends to the minutiae of daily religious life. The CCP maintains a registry of officially recognized reincarnate lamas, effectively bureaucratizing a deeply spiritual process. Local governments in Tibetan areas are given control over the registration of monasteries, nunneries, and other Buddhist religious centers, subjecting these sacred spaces to constant scrutiny and potential interference. The requirement for monasteries to obtain official permission for large-scale religious events or gatherings further restricts the free practice of religion.

This micromanagement of religious activities not only stifles spontaneous expressions of faith but also allows the CCP to monitor and control the gathering of Tibetan Buddhists, likely out of fear that such assemblies could foster dissent or opposition to Chinese rule.

The International Campaign for Tibet's president, Tencho Gyatso, rightly points out that the suppression of religious freedom in Tibet, including the efforts to control the succession of the Dalai Lama, are core issues for the survival of Tibetan civilization and its future.

The spotlight put on Tibet in this year's State Department religious freedom report is indeed needed more than ever.

As the world watches, China's policies in Tibet continue to flagrantly violate international norms of religious freedom and human rights.

Only through sustained pressure and advocacy can there be hope for preserving the unique religious and cultural heritage of the Tibetan people in the face of such systematic repression.

The systematic attempt to control, manipulate, and ultimately reshape Tibetan Buddhism to serve the political interests of the CCP is nothing short of cultural genocide.

It is a campaign that strikes at the very heart of Tibetan identity and spirituality. China's policies in Tibet are not just a matter of domestic concern; they represent a challenge to the universal principles of religious freedom and human rights.

The CCP's actions in Tibet reveal a government deeply insecure about its legitimacy, resorting to heavy-handed tactics to suppress a peaceful religious tradition that it views as a threat to its power.

The Sinicization of Tibetan Buddhism is not merely a policy of cultural assimilation; it is an attempt to fundamentally alter the nature of Tibetan spiritual practice to serve the state's interests.

By insisting that Tibetan Buddhism "follow the path of socialism with Chinese characteristics" and "correctly handle the relationship between national law and canon," the CCP is effectively demanding that religious doctrine be subordinated to party ideology. This approach not only violates the basic tenets of religious freedom but also demonstrates a profound misunderstanding of the nature of spiritual belief.

Religion, particularly one as deeply rooted in tradition and philosophy as Tibetan Buddhism, cannot simply be rewritten to suit political objectives without losing its essential character and meaning.

As long as Tibet remains under the iron grip of CCP control, with every aspect of religious life subject to state scrutiny and manipulation, the rich spiritual traditions of Tibetan Buddhism – and indeed, the very survival of Tibetan culture – remain in grave peril.

The international community must continue to shine a light on these abuses and hold China accountable for its actions in Tibet.

Only through sustained pressure and advocacy can there be hope for preserving the unique religious and cultural heritage of the Tibetan people in the face of such systematic repression.

China's War on the Dalai Lama Stokes Tension with India and Russia

05 August 2024, Providence, Antonio Graceffo

On July 6th, the 89th birthday of His Holiness the Dalai Lama was celebrated in Dharamshala, India and observed by the Tibetan diaspora and supporters worldwide. Beyond marking a milestone for the leader of the Tibetan Buddhist faith, this event carries significant political implications for China amid great power competition. Ironically, the one place his birthday was not celebrated was in his native Tibet, where the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) forbids citizens from having any contact with their spiritual leader, who has lived in exile since 1959. Each year, as his birthday approaches, the repression in Tibet intensifies. This year, under the revised espionage law, police have been conducting random cellphone checks to ensure Tibetans have not downloaded his photo to pray for him.

The celebration underscores India's support for Tibetan Buddhism over the wishes of the CCP. Despite India's membership in BRICS and the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO), the Dalai Lama remains a major point of tension. The Indian ambassador even attended the first large-scale public celebration of the Dalai Lama's birthday in Mongolia, where Tibetan Buddhism is the national religion. Since Mongolia won its independence from the Qing dynasty in 1921, China has tried to control the fiercely independent nation, and the Dalai Lama has been a sticking point. When the Dalai Lama visited Mongolia in November 2016, China responded with economic sanctions. Although Mongolia has avoided inviting His Holiness back to prevent reprisals, this celebration clearly demonstrates Mongolia's refusal to submit to Chinese suzerainty.

In another blow to the CCP, representatives from China's closest ally, Russia, also attended the celebration in Ulaanbaatar. This is because the Mongolic republics within the Russian Federation, including Buryatia, Kalmykia, and Tuva, follow Tibetan Buddhism. While the CCP can exert significant influence over economically dependent states, religion remains a point of resistance.

As the Dalai Lama ages, succession issues become critical, with the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) aiming to select the reincarnated monks who will replace key figures in Tibetan Buddhism, particularly the Dalai Lama. The CCP seeks to control not only earthly religious practices but also extends its reach into the next life through harsh laws, ironically referred to by critics as “rebirth control.”

Through the state-controlled Buddhist Association of China (BAC), the CCP has long sought to control the reincarnation of prominent Tibetan Buddhist monks in order to suppress Tibetan cultural identity. Violating CCP regulations on recognizing reincarnations carries stiff penalties. In 2022, when 86-year-old lama (lama being a generic term like “guru”) Tulku Dawa died in Lhasa, the CCP attempted to keep it secret. He had been arrested in 2010 for seeking guidance from the exiled Dalai Lama in selecting the reincarnation of the Rongpo Chöje, the chief lama of the Shag Rongbo monastery. He was sentenced to seven years in prison, while the monastery underwent a stringent reeducation program, resulting in one suicide and the expulsion of numerous monks. The Chinese government mouthpiece, Global Times, justified the CCP’s control over reincarnations, stating, “Living Buddhas can be a peaceful power, but also a ‘weapon of mass destruction’ if used by evil or splittist forces.” A living Buddha is someone recognized as the reincarnation of a great monk such as the Dalai Lama. By “splittist forces,” Beijing refers to His Holiness, the Dalai Lama, whom the CCP views as a separatist and has even labeled a terrorist, despite his consistent advocacy for non-violence and genuine autonomy rather than independence. The Dalai Lama has maintained that while the CCP could handle Tibet’s external affairs, he seeks true autonomy, including freedom of religion, culture, and language, within China’s framework.

The Global Times article stated, “Some Living Buddhas affirmed by the 14th Dalai Lama, the highest lama of Tibetan Buddhism, have been behind riots or self-immolations that aim to further the cause of Tibetan independence.” This quote was from Zhou Quan, a columnist at m4.cn, a Beijing-based political commentary website dedicated to “helping young Chinese build healthy, constructive, and progressive minds.” In the CCP’s estimation, building a healthy mind includes rejecting religion. Under Chinese law, children under 18 are barred from any religious affiliation. The CCP also believes that for young people to have healthy, progressive minds, they must reject traditional cultures that are not Han Chinese. This particularly applies to Uyghur culture in Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (XUAR), as well as Mongolian culture in Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region (IMAR), and Tibetan culture in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR).

In 1995, the Dalai Lama recognized six-year-old Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the 11th Panchen Lama, a Buddhist leader whose role includes identifying the next Dalai Lama. In response, the CCP detained the boy and appointed their own candidate, Gyaincain Norbu. To this day, Gedhun Choekyi Nyima has not been seen. The CCP claims he is alive, well, and uninterested in religion or interviews.

In 2016, a similar conflict arose in Mongolia when senior Tibetan Buddhist leaders, endorsed by the Dalai Lama, recognized a U.S.-born boy of Mongolian descent as the 10th Jebtsundamba Khutuktu, the spiritual head of Mongolian Buddhism. The CCP protested, claiming the right to identify reincarnated lamas not only within China but in other countries as well. Despite China’s protests, Mongolian authorities recognized the boy chosen by His Holiness. However, they did not invite the Dalai Lama to return to Mongolia. Instead, in 2023, the boy was formally introduced by the Dalai Lama in a ceremony in Dharamsala, India.

Beijing even attempts to prevent Western governments from meeting with the Dalai Lama in India. The CCP recently lodged complaints when a delegation of U.S. lawmakers, including former Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, went to India and met with His Holiness, the Dalai Lama. This move followed President Biden signing the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act” into law, aimed at “advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage.” He reiterated that the United States had not changed its stance on Tibet being part of the People’s Republic of China (PRC) but urged Beijing to open negotiations with the Dalai Lama to find a fair resolution to the dispute.

China warned the US over Pelosi’s visit and rebuked the signing of the Tibet Act, viewing it as a violation of China’s sovereignty. It appears that China’s repression of Tibetan Buddhism, both inside and outside its borders, will continue and likely intensify unless the CCP falls, which currently does not seem imminent.

India cannot afford to lose plot while chasing Chinese investment

04 August 2024, SCMP, Natasha Agarwal

Chinese investment in India’s economy would be helpful, but the economic logic behind India’s pursuit must be refined and made more coherent.

Of the many strategies to deepen India’s integration into the global value chain, the Indian Economic Survey 2023-24 says “it is inevitable that India plugs itself into China's supply chain". To do so, it argues that India must make a choice between relying solely on imported goods from China or attracting Chinese foreign direct investment (FDI).

The report, produced annually by India's Ministry of Finance, favours the latter. Chinese FDI would help India kill two birds with one stone. It would help India address the growing bilateral trade deficit with China while at the same time enabling India to capitalise on the "China plus one" strategy, a strategy being effectively used by other developing economies.

However, the reasons India is seeking Chinese FDI are haphazard and show a lack of coherent economic reasoning. The Economic Survey suggests they stem from being economically submerged in the bilateral relationship with China while missing out on the benefits of "China plus one". Indian policymakers seem to think they have no choice but to pursue Chinese FDI while leaving development of domestic technological capabilities as an afterthought.

India needs to redefine its objectives. Improving the country's technological capabilities should be the focus of India's FDI policies. Accordingly, its strategy towards China should rest on technological transfers and diffusion from Chinese FDI.

A paucity of data means there is little to no evidence to indicate whether wholly owned Chinese subsidiaries are better than joint ventures with Indian firms. Drawing from global studies on the impact of firm ownership on technological transfers in host countries, policies could be directed to encourage joint ventures between Indian and Chinese firms with technological transfers as the fulcrum of such partnerships.

Transfers can be direct through means such as technological handovers, with know-how shared with little restrictions in study groups or corporate joint ventures. Alternatively, transfers can also be indirect wherein the very presence of Chinese firms within India's borders could initiate the process of technological transfers.

The idea is that the technological capabilities and management techniques of Chinese multinationals gradually leak out of Chinese firms and become common knowledge in the domestic Indian market. In other words, Indian firms could enjoy technological spillover benefits from incorporating foreign knowledge into their production processes without having to acquire it via a transaction.

Such technological spillovers can play a critical role. However, the magnitude of the spillover largely depends on a country's ability to absorb and assimilate available knowledge, which in turn relates to the skills of its workforce, the state of its infrastructure, its institutional framework and openness to structural reforms.

For example, the presence and activities of Chinese firms in India could facilitate technological spillovers through imitation, whereby domestic Indian firms could reverse engineer technologies embodied in Chinese FDI. This could close the technological gap, putting domestic laggards onto an innovation trajectory. However, reverse engineering is only possible if the Indian workforce has the necessary skill set to make it happen.

Thus, India must invest time, money and effort in structural and institutional reforms. These reforms need to start delivering high-quality development rather than just ticking government boxes. For example, given India's aspirational growth trajectory, it comes as no surprise that the country is witnessing an infrastructure boom.

In its budget for the coming year, Prime Minister Narendra Modi's government maintains that infrastructure will continue to receive "strong fiscal support". However, upgrading the country's infrastructure needs to go beyond improving India's position in assessments such as the World Bank's Logistics Performance Index or delving into aspirational projects such as building the country's largest sea bridge or biggest port.

Instead, the focus in infrastructure development should be to deliver seamless, effective and efficient connectivity across the length and breadth of India. This connectivity must go beyond national highways and include local roads that connect the country's interior, leaving no Indian behind. Replacing crumbling infrastructure and ensuring pothole-free roads, especially during wet seasons, could be one ambition at the start of this journey.

India also needs to tap into the role that governments at the state and local levels can play in bringing along the development of the country's infrastructure. While financial transfers and budgetary autonomy are indispensable factors, decentralisation that endorses adaptive governance is also important to promoting good development outcomes.

Much like other multinational firms, Chinese multinationals would do a cost-benefit analysis before entering India. The presumption that Chinese firms are waiting with anticipation for India to open up needs a reality check, especially given India's stringent attitude towards Chinese businesses to suit the government's rhetoric over the border dispute with China.

India's short-sighted approach to Chinese FDI needs to go beyond extending a cautionary welcome. It needs to actively bargain for a higher share in Chinese multinationals' portfolios. The bargaining chip here is a robust and resilient domestic ecosystem, which also helps multinationals in managing their international risk exposure.

A country's absorptive capacity can not only facilitate FDI spillovers within a country but also act as a determining factor for FDI inflows in the country. Essential reforms such as on visas can help ease labour shortages in the domestic economy as well as encourage FDI spillovers. Whichever path India chooses going forward, it will need a holistic approach to FDI policies with policy intervention on all fronts of economic development, domestically and internationally.

Why time is ripe to shun 'One-China policy'

04 August 2024, FirstPost, Maj Gen Ashok Kumar

The passage of the 'Resolve Tibet Act' by the US and the initiation of a large number of other measures from the American side favouring Tibetan struggle are naturally aligned with Indian interests

The recent signing of the 'Resolve Tibet Act' by the US has renewed the focus on Tibet and Tibetan issues concerning China. While the US has extended its support for 'One China Policy' earlier, which literally means recognising all erstwhile countries captured by China that Beijing annexed as part of its expansionist agenda, new contours of this policy are emerging lately.

On one hand, the US is supporting Taiwan being claimed by China as part of one China policy, and at the same time, the US is also supporting Tibet by multiple means. As of now, the public stance taken by the US on Taiwan relates to 'non use of force' by China to occupy Taiwan, but it is OK if the Taiwanese people wish to unify with mainland China of their own free will. In a similar manner, it is advocating the negotiated settlement to resolve the Tibet issue. Though the US has not clearly denounced its 'One China Policy', its actions on Taiwan and Tibet clearly indicate the weaning support for 'One China Policy'. This is therefore prudent to have a look at the evolution of Tibet as a sovereign state. A sovereign state as per international norms needs to have a permanent population, defined territory, a government of its own that is not under another government authority, and the capacity to interact with other states on its own free will. Tibet had all these four ingredients of a sovereign state—population, territory, government, and sovereignty—from as early as the seventh century AD, when the Emperor Songtsen Gampo created the unified state of Tibet.

In fact, China and Nepal married their princess to him due to his powerful stature. Tibet captured part of China, which was followed by the boundary settlement of 783 AD and then later in 821 AD, clearly establishing Tibet as a sovereign state since then.

Even thereafter, while Tibet has been able to maintain cordial relations with almost all neighbours, including Mongol Emperors (1240–1350), Ming Emperors (368–1644), and the Quing Dynasty (639–1911), with a primary focus on the priest-patron relationship wherein Tibetans have been ruling their land independently.

A historic connection to Tibet exists not only in the form of the British India-Tibet relationship but both prior to this and after this as well. It is essential to understand this, as this India-Tibet relationship of equilibrium was comprehensively disrupted by the current Chinese regime, which forcibly occupied Tibetan land in 1950-51 and continues to occupy the same till date. In the process, the tranquil borders between India and Tibet have been converted into a Line of Actual Control (LAC) between India and China. The Quing Dynasty has been one of the most powerful dynasties occupying China. Even though they entered Tibet three times in their regime, but only after being asked for help in 1728 AD, 1752 AD, and 1792 AD in response to the priest-patron relationship. It was for the first time in 1908 AD that Manchus (Quing Dynasty) attacked Tibet to checkmate the increasing British influence. This resulted in the 13th Dalai Lama fleeing from Tibet and taking refuge in India, wherein he stayed in Darjeeling and Kalimpong. He also terminated the priest-patron relationship with the Quing Dynasty, as the patron itself had attacked the state of priest. With the Quing Dynasty collapsing in 1912, the 13th Dalai Lama proclaimed independence on 14 February 1913, which continued till 1950-51 when Tibet was forcibly occupied by the current regime of China.

Therefore, it clearly emerges that Tibet has never been part of China, and the current status indicates the forced occupation of a sovereign state by China. Not only has China occupied Tibet, it is expanding the areas under its occupation on a regular basis, while India has gone all out to support China since it came into being on October 1, 1949. India's signing of the Panchsheel agreement, responding to the slogan to Hindi-Chini bhai-bhai, and many other actions are testimony to this support.

As against this, China not only betrayed India in 1962, capturing large tracts in Indian areas of Aksai Chin and smaller tracts in other border areas. Indians' effort to establish peaceful relations through bilateral agreements and confidence-building measures failed comprehensively when China transgressed at a number of locations on the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in eastern Ladakh in 2020.

The current situation requires a new approach, as it affects India for its own security concerns. In case there is further delay to checkmate the expansionist agenda of China, it will become a serious security challenge in the future.

With the US and West understanding the Chinese design and its agenda, they have already initiated a host of measures to check the unhindered rise of China, which appears to be attempting to dislodge the US from its pole position. The passage of the 'Resolve Tibet Act' by the US and the initiation of a large number of other measures are naturally aligned with Indian interests. India needs to take some or all of the following actions:

- Sign a boundary agreement with the Tibetan Government in Exile aligned to its own claim line.
- Mount diplomatic offensive to get 'Free Tibet Act' passed by the US as a UN resolution.
- Support all governments in exile, like East Turkestan, etc., that have been captured by China going beyond its real extent. Engage with the US and West to take the lead.
- Establish diplomatic relations with Taiwan.
- Raise voices for a unified geographical entity of Tibet to include Tibet Autonomous Region, Amdo, and Kham.
- All communications should mention and use the term India-Tibet border as against India- China Border/LAC.
- Do away with 'One China Policy' unless our claim lines are restored and Pakistan- occupied Jammu and Kashmir and Shaksgam Valley are vacated by Chinese from all kinds of its presence.
- Rename all places with Indian names in claimed areas and with Tibetan names beyond that.
- Publish maps as per the claim lines of India and ensure that all countries having diplomatic relations adhere to this. It needs to be done deliberately in a targeted manner.

- Don't allow visitors of those regions, which have been captured by China, to travel to India on a Chinese visa.
- Focus on infrastructure growth in border areas.
- Reinforce forces and resources in the border areas.
- Enhance support for vibrant villages in the border areas.

The above are some of the measures, and there could be many more. These have to be pragmatically adopted in the national interest. It has to be realised that by supporting Tibet, in a real sense, India will be ensuring its own national security.

Does a deal over 2 fishermen mean Taiwan and mainland China are ready to restart talks?

04 August 2024, SCMP, Lawrence Chung

A five-month crisis over the deaths of two men near Quemoy has ended but one critical obstacle remains, observers say.

It took five months and more than a dozen rounds of talks but officials from Taiwan and mainland China finally hatched a deal for the return of the remains of two mainland fishermen this week.

The fishermen died in waters near the Taiwan-controlled island of Quemoy – also known as Kinmen – on February 14 after their boat capsized during a pursuit by Taiwanese coastguard boats.

The incident set off a barrage of accusations from both sides of the Taiwan Strait but ended in an agreement that raised hopes for the reopening of a dialogue channel between the two.

But analysts remain cautious, saying neither is willing to compromise on the most critical issue.

Under the agreement reached on Tuesday, Taiwan agreed to compensate the victims' families, apologise, and repatriate the bodies of the two men. Chen Yu-jen, a legislator from the Quemoy constituency and a member of the main opposition party the Kuomintang (KMT), said the settlement marked a good start for mending fences between both sides of the Taiwan Strait.

"This will allow our two sides to accumulate more goodwill, which is advantageous for improving relations," said Chen, who has promoted better communication between the island and the mainland. Her KMT legislative colleague Hsu Yu-chen agreed, saying the incident could pave the way for further dialogue.

"Though the incident created a crisis, its resolution can serve as a stepping stone for re-establishing a cross-strait dialogue channel based on this format," she said, adding: "This would help ease cross-strait tension." Communication was suspended in 2016 when Tsai Ing-wen of the independence-leaning Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) was elected the island's leader and declined to recognise the 1992 consensus, an understanding that Beijing sees as the foundation for any talks.

The consensus is a verbal understanding reached by Beijing and the KMT in Hong Kong in 1992, allowing the two sides to continue talks under the premise that there is only one China, but each side can have its own interpretation of what that China stands for.

Tsai's successor, William Lai Ching-te, has also avoided the consensus, much to Beijing's ire. Lai, who was elected in January, was inaugurated on May 20 and declared that Taiwan and the mainland "are not subordinate to each other", a declaration that Beijing branded as proof of his "obstinate separatist" intentions.

In a statement on Wednesday, the DPP welcomed the agreement on the Quemoy incident, saying it "indicates that even with differing cross-strait positions, and regardless of political preconditions or labels, communication and problem-solving can occur based on equality and mutual respect”.

It said the government “is open to dialogue with the Chinese government without preconditions” and “will manage cross-strait affairs with a rational and pragmatic attitude”.

Analysts noted that both sides had softened their position on the February 14 incident, which would help enable cross-strait communication.

“The incident finally came to an end after both sides stopped stubbornly holding onto their positions and were willing to make concessions,” said Chang Wu-ueh, a professor of mainland China studies at Tamkang University in New Taipei.

“Cross-strait ties have remained tense and confrontational since May 20. The satisfactory resolution of this issue is a good sign as it could pave the way for normal personnel exchanges between the two sides.”

Chang said he thought there could also be a positive outcome in the case of a Taiwanese soldier held by the mainland since March, as well as that of the five crew members of a Taiwanese fishing boat that violated the mainland’s fishing ban by operating in waters near Quanzhou last month.

The soldier was detained after his boat drifted near Quanzhou in foggy weather during a fishing trip with a civilian friend. While the friend was released, the soldier from Quemoy remains in custody, accused of “intentionally” concealing his occupation.

Chen Yu-jen, who also helped communicate with the mainland for the soldier’s release, expressed confidence that Beijing would return the man on August 7.

But analysts said it was highly unlikely that the mainland would accept the latest settlement as a new basis for resuming cross-strait talks and improving relations more broadly.

“It would be too optimistic to assume that the resolution could lead to reopening the long-suspended official talks between the two sides, given their thorny political differences,” said Max Lo, executive director of the Taiwan International Strategic Study Society, a think tank in Taipei.

Like Tsai, Lai “is unlikely to accept the ‘1992 consensus’ and will adhere to his hardline counter-China-and- protect-Taiwan stance”, Lo said, adding that the hardcore pro-independence camp also would not allow him to appear to give ground to Beijing.

Bao Chengke, deputy director of the Institute for East Asian Studies in Shanghai, said the February 14 incident was treated as a humanitarian concern and handled as “a special case, a singular, isolated event”. “I do not believe this is a routine way to solve cross- strait issues. The routine solution should still be based on the 1992 consensus, with the recognition that both sides belong to one China,” he said.

Bao said the incident had dragged on and a settlement was necessary to address public concerns and help the bereaved families.

Chen Binhua, a spokesman for the mainland’s Taiwan Affairs Office, echoed that position on Wednesday, saying the talks in Quemoy “had nothing to do with cross-strait negotiations.”

“The reason for the suspension of institutionalised cross-strait negotiation mechanisms is well known, and only by returning to the political foundation of the ‘1992 consensus’ can cross-strait negotiations be resumed,” he said.

Taiwan’s Mainland Affairs Council, which charts cross- strait policy, also said the incident was a “singular and isolated accidental event”, whose settlement was achieved through “persistent communication and efforts” by “various sectors of society”.

China’s, US’ Indo-Pacific strategies

04 August 2024, Taipei Times, Antonio Graceffo

In January, Beijing re-established formal diplomatic relations with Nauru, following the Pacific island nation’s shift in diplomatic recognition from Taiwan. Chinese President Xi Jinping (習近平) hosted Nauru’s president in Beijing, welcoming the nation into the Belt and Road Initiative and promising to expand bilateral trade and investment.

Such moves are part of China’s broader strategy to diplomatically isolate Taiwan while expanding its presence and influence across the Indo-Pacific region.

The US and China are locked in a strategic contest of diplomacy, economics and military buildup in this vital area.

The Indo-Pacific region includes South Asia, Southeast Asia, East Asia – which includes China, Japan, South Korea and Taiwan – Oceania and Pacific island nations, as well as the Pacific Rim, which includes the western coastlines of North and South America.

It is home to more than half of the world’s population, including 58 percent of the world’s young people, and accounts for 60 percent of global GDP and two-thirds of global economic growth.

Geographically, it encompasses 65 percent of the world’s oceans and 25 percent of its land.

It is also home to several of the world’s largest and most powerful militaries.

China’s Blue Dragon Strategy seeks to expand its influence across key bodies of water and land in the region, threatening regional security and freedom of navigation.

China has built and militarized artificial islands in the South China Sea, reinforcing territorial claims covering 90 percent of the area.

Taiwan and Sri Lanka are strategic anchors. Controlling Taiwan would give China dominion over the Taiwan Strait, a crucial route for 80 percent of the world's largest container ships. Sri Lanka, which is in the Bay of Bengal, is ideal for naval bases, enhancing China's influence in the Indian Ocean.

The Chinese People's Liberation Army Navy conducts drills off Taiwan and near Sri Lanka, maintaining a dedicated fleet that can include two aircraft carriers. The Blue Dragon Strategy targets Japan's Senkaku Islands — known in Taiwan as the Diaoyutais (釣魚台) — and control of inland areas of rivers such as the Brahmaputra and the Mekong, giving China geopolitical leverage over downstream countries. This strategy heightens territorial disputes with India, particularly in Aksai Chin and Arunachal Pradesh. Projects such as the Belt and Road Initiative and the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor dovetail with the Blue Dragon Strategy, leveraging China's strengths to expand its influence.

More US military personnel are stationed in the Indo-Pacific region than anywhere else outside the US. China's aggression, including economic pressure on Australia, border conflicts with India, threats toward Taiwan and intimidation in the East and South China seas, has put the US and China on a collision course. In 2022, the US launched its Indo-Pacific Strategy to counter China. The same year, the Solomon Islands signed a security agreement with China, allowing Chinese naval vessels to dock and replenish at its ports, potentially leading to a Chinese military base in the region. This could extend China's military reach in the South Pacific.

In response, the US increased its engagement with the Solomons and reopened its embassy in Honiara, which had been closed since 1993.

China also tried to convince the Federated States of Micronesia, Palau and the Marshall Islands to break their compacts of free association with the US. However, the US successfully negotiated to keep them aligned. The compacts provide the US with strategic military positioning in the Pacific, while offering financial assistance and other benefits to the other nations.

Two years into its Indo-Pacific policy, the US released an assessment. During this time, the US Department of State increased regional investment, and humanitarian and military aid. The US Navy upholds international maritime law as outlined in the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea and the US government publishes detailed studies on maritime claims in the "Limits in the Seas" series. The US and its allies condemned China's repeated harassment of vessels exercising high-seas freedom of navigation and its refusal to comply with a 2016 arbitral award, which rejected China's expansive claims to the South China Sea under the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea. The US supports the ruling, recognizing it as final and binding.

Last year, the US cohosted the Indo-Pacific Business Forum with Japan, launched the US-Taiwan Initiative on 21st-Century Trade to boost economic ties and reaffirmed its commitment to helping Taiwan defend itself against a Chinese invasion. Additionally, the US signed defense cooperation agreements with Indonesia and Papua New Guinea, held US-Pacific Islands Summits in 2022 and last year, upgraded its relationship with ASEAN to a comprehensive strategic partnership and recognized the Cook Islands and Niue as sovereign nations, establishing diplomatic relations.

Last month, the US opened an embassy in Port Vila, Vanuatu, and plans to open one in Kiribati this year, where China recently signed an expanded fishing agreement.

The US also opened a new embassy in Nuku'alofa, Tonga, to strengthen diplomatic ties. Other achievements of the Indo-Pacific strategy include successfully hosting last year's APEC Ministerial Meeting in San Francisco and advancing the Indo-Pacific Economic Framework.

The US has also strengthened ties and defense agreements with regional allies. In June 2022, Australia, Japan, New Zealand, the UK and the US established the Partners in the Blue Pacific to support Pacific priorities. Through this initiative, the US has facilitated cooperation between Europe and the Pacific, including NATO and the G7. Canada, Germany, and South Korea have joined as partners, and the EU has joined as an observer.

The US and the Philippines established bilateral defense guidelines, reaffirming and strengthening the 1951 Mutual Defense Treaty. The US also established trilateral cooperation with Japan and the Philippines in defense and security to maintain a free and open maritime order.

Trilateral military talks were held between the US, Japan and South Korea. Already bound by a mutual defense agreement, the US and Japan are now establishing a military command in Japan to oversee stationed forces and coordinate more closely with regional allies to better counter China.

Cooperation with Quad partners Australia, India and Japan continues, focusing on investment and maritime security. Bilateral relationships with Vietnam and Indonesia have been upgraded to comprehensive strategic partnerships. Additionally, there have been high-level visits and increased cooperation with India, along with greater participation in the Indian Ocean Rim Association.

Overall, the competing Indo-Pacific strategies of China and the US are reshaping the region's geopolitical landscape. China aims to increase its control, while the US focuses on maintaining a free and open region, striving to avoid triggering a conflict with China.

Xi's Hong Kong letter a gesture to shore up confidence in the private sector

03 August 2024, SCMP

The president's reply to a letter from Hong Kong business leaders with Ningbo ancestry also sends a message that the city has always been a top source of investment for the mainland over the past 40 years and remains an important bridge between the nation and the world.

There was more than gratitude expressed when Hong Kong's business leaders with Ningbo ancestry received a rare letter from President Xi Jinping in recognition of their contribution to the country's development. It was also seen as yet another politically symbolic gesture by the Chinese leader to shore up confidence in the private sector amid daunting challenges ahead. The timing and choice of the receiver are arguably more significant than what is in the letter. Xi rarely shows this kind of close personal relations with private businesses.

Xinhua news agency reported that a group of businesspeople with familial ties in the mainland port city of Ningbo had earlier written to the president renewing their commitment to serving the country. Responding in a letter, Xi, who was party secretary of Zhejiang province from 2002 to 2007, acknowledged and thanked the group's support in innovation, entrepreneurship, philanthropy and education.

He added that the building of a strong country and rejuvenating it through modernisation required all Chinese to unite and work together.

This is the second time in a decade that Xi has written to the business sector. Such a move is by no means random.

Beijing has been working hard to rebuild confidence in the private sector, which is critical to China's growth and development. The previous crackdowns were targeting individual players that were damaging the market or breaching rules, not the industry per se or the private sector as a whole.

The letter also sent a message to businesses on the mainland and overseas. Hong Kong has always been a top source of investment for the mainland over the past 40 years and remains an important bridge between the nation and the world.

Foreign investors, who admire Hongkongers' business acumen, also take trends and movements in the city as the cue to follow. Restoring confidence among local businesses is therefore also an important step to shore up overseas confidence in China.

The first generation of Hong Kong patriotic tycoons was keen to contribute to China's development rather than seeking profits. Such selflessness and love for the nation was deeply appreciated and has continued, with many standing ready to do their duty should the need arise.

Unlike the early years when foreign capital was in need, the emphasis today is more on the fact that China remains open to the outside world. Xi's reply coincides with the 40th anniversary of late Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping's 1984 call to mobilise the "Ningbo group" to build the home city.

The letter shows Xi's appreciation of Deng's legacy and clear determination to continue the reforms.

As China, India ramp up naval rivalry, is the Indian Ocean at a maritime crossroads?

03 August 2024, SCMP, Biman Mukerji and Amy Sood

China's ports and ship deployments in India's backyard raise concerns of control and influence in Indian Ocean as next possible flashpoint.

Dangerous squabbles in remote Himalayan borderlands between China and India may, at least for now, have been soothed by a recent meeting between the two nations' top diplomats.

But the Indian Ocean looms as the next potential flashpoint, security analysts say, as New Delhi flashes increasingly anxious eyes at Beijing's ports and ship deployments across a vast expanse of water in India's backyard – but crucial to China's supply of oil.

In July, on the sidelines of an Asean (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) meeting in Laos, S.

Jaishankar and Wang Yi, the respective foreign ministers of India and China, agreed to thrash out differences that have resulted in mobilisation of troops along their shared Himalayan border.

The diplomats agreed "to work with purpose and urgency to achieve complete disengagement at the earliest", according to a statement by India's Ministry of External Affairs.

The meeting – which followed a visit by Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi to Russia – left hints that their common friend Moscow may have played a role in nudging the two Asian giants towards calming tensions along a border, which flared into war in 1962 and have since seen sometimes deadly skirmishes between rival militaries, the worst in 2020 leaving 20 Indian and four Chinese troops dead.

Russia probably "urged both countries to put aside [their] differences", said Christopher Blackburn, a British political and security analyst. "It looks like they have listened."

With the mountain border spat simmering down, analysts say control and influence in the Indian Ocean presents a new and formidable challenge.

China, which relies on free passage of the ocean for 80 per cent of its crude oil imports, has steadily accumulated strategic ports and related infrastructure in a zone which stretches from the Arabian Sea to the Strait of Malacca, sharply aware of its vulnerability to blockades in vast, open waters in the event of a major conflict.

Yet its investment has raised alarm bells in Delhi which views the Indian Ocean as its home turf yet is playing catch up with its own investments.

"The sea route from the Middle East to the coastal cities of China is running through the Malacca Strait, which is a location that the US and India can blockade," said Satoru Nagao, a non-resident fellow at the Hudson Institute focusing on US-Japan-India security cooperation.

The scenario is dubbed by analysts as the "Malacca Dilemma", in which naval forces of rival powers such as the United States or India could disrupt Beijing's vital supply route.

The Indian Ocean region has thus far been relatively unscathed by the disruptions roiling global shipping routes thanks to the Israel-Gaza and Russia-Ukraine wars.

Indian policymakers are looking to China's frequent run-ins with Southeast Asian neighbours in the South China Sea as a guide to how China's strategic imprints can over time become painful pinch points between nations.

From port projects in Sri Lanka and Sudan, Kenya and Pakistan, China has built a network of assets referred to as a "string of pearls" that is perceived by Delhi and others to have encircled India.

Beijing's Belt and Road Initiative – which has enrolled Bangladesh, the Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka – has further fuelled concerns in India, which lags behind in economic might, diplomatic currency with fractious neighbours, as well as in the capacity to deliver its own state-backed mega-projects, including ports in the remote Andaman and Nicobar Islands and Sittwe in Myanmar.

Wider competition is setting the tone of relations between the world's two most populous nations.

While the Indian economy is largely pegged to the service sector, Modi's government has been vying for a slice of China's global manufacturing pie by doling out incentives and slashing India's notorious red tape to access a large, cheap labour pool.

Meanwhile, Modi and China's leader Xi Jinping have rarely met face to face since the Himalayan stand-off. "Relations with China are not doing very well," said Jaishankar, referring to the still unresolved border issues between the two countries, at a news conference in Tokyo on the sidelines of a Quad meeting this week.

"For India the primary question in the Indian Ocean region is security," said Aditya Gowdara Shivamurthy, associate fellow with the Delhi-based Observer Research Foundation. "For China, it is crucial to win in the Indian Ocean because it cements its position as the Asian power."

'Suspect behaviour'

At the same time as financing and building ports, China's naval presence is growing. The presence of its ships in the Indian Ocean has stirred suspicion from Delhi that so-called "research vessels" deployed by Beijing are in fact spy ships.

Earlier this year, two Chinese research vessels were spotted near India's coast. In March, one was spotted near the Bay of Bengal region, which followed the docking of another vessel at a Maldivian Port.

Beijing says its vessels are simply carrying out ocean-bed surveys for scientific reasons. But Indian officials allege such vessels have a habit of "going dark" or turning off the vessels' automatic identification system transponders.

Shivamurthy says these ships are believed to be manned by the People's Liberation Army "and we don't know much about their use".

A January report by the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies alleged that 80 per cent of Chinese civilian research vessels had "demonstrated suspect behaviour or possess organisational links", suggesting that their work was connected to military objectives.

Suspensions intensified last October when Beijing docked a vessel – Shi Yan 6 – at Sri Lanka's main port of Colombo.

It was virtually a replay of another Chinese research vessel, Yuan Wang 5, which docked at Hambantota Port in August 2022. The port is under a 99-year lease to the Chinese-state owned company that built it after Colombo failed to service a US$1.4 billion loan to pay for the project.

"India protested but could not succeed in getting the Yuan Wang 5 out of Hambantota," said Srikanth Kondapalli, the dean of the School of International Studies and a professor of China studies at Jawaharlal Nehru University (JNU) in India.

"This incident indicated that China has more rights and say on Hambantota than the Sri Lankans themselves," he added, noting that there was an opportunity for Beijing to move "military-related assets" to such ports in the future.

In January, Sri Lanka declared a moratorium on foreign research ships entering its waters for a year, in a move observers say was linked to pressure from Delhi.

But last month Sri Lankan Foreign Minister Ali Sabry told Japanese state media NHK that it would resume permitting calls from foreign research vessels at its ports from next year as the government "cannot only block China".

Japan – along with India and France – is a co-chair of Sri Lanka's Official Creditors' Committee that in June firmed up a debt treatment deal with Sri Lanka. China's expanding activities in the Indian Ocean region are viewed as a "big threat" by India, according to Nagao from the Hudson Institute.

No base for conflict

Despite China's accumulation of infrastructure assets in the Indian Ocean region, analysts say most are for commercial and not military purposes. Moreover, without a naval base, Chinese vessels will be dangerously exposed in the event of a violent flashpoint.

"The Chinese navy and the Indian navy can never be in a situation of confrontation unless China has a base in the Indian Ocean," Shivamurthy said. "China might have economic and military leverage but India has geopolitical leverage."

The Pentagon's 2023 China Military Power Report published in October says China's navy has about 370 warships, which is expected to grow to 435 ships by 2030.

The US fleet is smaller, with about 280 vessels and expected to reach only 300 in the early 2030s. In comparison, India possesses around 130 warships that is expected to grow to 160 by 2030.

"India has the advantage of geography because China is a far-off country," said Manoj Joshi, a security expert at the Observer Research Foundation, adding without naval bases in the Indian Ocean any ambitions by China will be limited.

"But China sees itself as competing with the US rather than India."

India could easily defend itself even with a smaller naval fleet size, he said, adding that the chances of a conflict was likely to arise only if Delhi decided to take a strong stance against Beijing in the event of a future conflict, such as siding with Taiwan.

Beijing sees the island as part of China and has never ruled out the use of force to take it back. Most countries, including the US, do not see Taiwan as an independent state, but are opposed to a change of status quo by force.

In the event of a full-scale war over Taiwan, Chinese oil tankers traversing the Indian Ocean could be sunk or captured, draining their capacity to engage in a sustained conflict, analysts say.

The Pentagon report listed 11 potential Chinese bases in the Indian Ocean, including in Sri Lanka, Pakistan and Tanzania. These locations align with Beijing's diplomatic and commercial initiatives under its belt and road programme but have not materialised into military assets.

The report noted that China has "little power projection capability" in the Indian Ocean.

Experts also note that China does not have "tactical air support" for any naval deployments into the Indian Ocean.

"The Chinese may bring the aircraft carriers into the Indian Ocean, but they are sitting ducks," shyam said. Meanwhile, Nagao argues that the Indian navy alone will not be able to deal with China.

"However, China is alone, and India is not ... the number of political partners has been a decisive factor in geopolitical struggles," he added.

Delhi and friends

As Delhi is spooked by China's growing footprint, India may need to tug harder on its partnerships with other countries including co-members of the "Quad" group – the US, Japan and Australia.

"The challenge is bound to get more pronounced," said Harsh Pant, a professor of international relations at King's College London, noting the risk of further Chinese expansion especially if the US-China rivalry again comes to boiling point in coming months.

Donald Trump, the front runner in the US presidential election, adopted a hardline stance towards China in his previous term, lumping blanket tariffs on Chinese goods and talking tough on their rivalry. President Joe Biden has extended the trade war, determined to tuck back in the rise of Chinese tech.

"If US-China rivalry escalates, China is going to push for these [port] projects across the world. India will also have to recalibrate its responses accordingly," Pant said.

Delhi's option to stave off any metastasising presence in its neighbourhood will be to leverage its partnerships with the European Union, Japan and the US and build more strategic assets across nations craving investment but lacking in cash.

"China has more money but we [India] bring different capabilities. We bring partners like the EU, US and Japan," Pant said, adding that it was vital for India to build outposts.

In October, India will hold naval exercises in the Bay of Bengal region with its Quad group members, manoeuvres which cannot fail to catch Beijing's attention.

At the same time, to avoid onerous state spending and the risk of bungled delivery, the South Asian country may also support private enterprises to build new infrastructure in countries with major needs from Sri Lanka and Bangladesh to the Maldives.

Last December, India's Adani group, controlled by one of Asia's richest people Gautam Adani, launched a project to develop the Colombo West International Terminal project in Sri Lanka's capital, backed by more than US$500 million in funding from a US government agency.

From energy generation to telecommunications, a slew of other private firms are eyeing projects across the region, industry officials say, a potential to outbox Chinese investment in a crucial region.

Last year, Adani's companies faced a major stock rout following accusations from short-seller Hindenburg Research, which alleged widespread fraud and stock market manipulation by the conglomerate. But the group has bounced back on infrastructure bets, with shares of Adani ports jumping to record highs in June. There have also been reports the billionaire shares close ties to Modi, implying his business plans align with Modi's economic growth strategy for India.

China too has marked its presence with projects such as the China-Maldives Friendship Bridge in the Maldives, the first cross-sea bridge built on the Indian Ocean.

Ties between India and the Maldives came under strain after President Mohamed Muizzu was elected on an anti-India campaign late last year. But since then the island country has sought to mend fences with rounds of diplomatic visits and invites by Indian policymakers.

"China's economic footprint will continue to expand in the global South and Central Asia as the US and perhaps Europe become increasingly hostile," said Einar Tangen, a senior fellow at the Taihe Institute think tank in Beijing.

Now there are guide ropes for de-escalation in the Himalayas, experts say China, the world's second-ranked economy, may next have to take the lead in defusing tensions or suspicions over its plans in the Indian Ocean region.

"If China can show a willingness to engage with its neighbours and lower its aggression and expansive policies, then ... I don't see a potential conflict in the Indian Ocean. But the onus is on China to stop being so aggressive," Blackburn said.

"Can it deliver on its promises to India? We shall see."

What Does China's Plenum Mean For The West?

03 August 2024, Forbes, Mike O'Sullivan

If I uttered the word plenum, you might think I was a surgeon or arcane barrister, and not a casual observer of Chinese politics. The 'Plenum' is held seven times during the five yearly policy making cycle that aims to set the long-term direction of the development of China by the Communist Party.

Amidst the generalised chaos of Western politics in recent weeks, China held its most recent plenum (July 15-19), and this was the third plenum of this policy cycle, which typically focuses on economic policy.

Though the outcome appeared to have been something of a damp squib, it is worth reflecting on. To many international observers (note that China is becoming much less transparent in its policy process and in the availability of detailed macro data), there are three recurring threads.

The first is to 'make China more like Denmark' (my words not the CCP's), in other words to deepen its social welfare net and to limit inequalities. This has long been a goal of the CCP. In 2018, in the last chapter of the Levelling we wrote that 'Another approach is to develop social infrastructure that encompasses many of the elements of intangible infrastructure, such as health-care spending, education, pension plans, and broader financial services. ....Motivation for building social infrastructure in China may come from stress points uncovered during China's next recession. As such, it would be a logical chapter in China's path to development, and not at all unlike Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal. The New Deal was a watershed in the United States in many respects, one of which was that it marked the full evolution of the United States from an emerging to a developed nation.

The building out of a social infrastructure in China remains a significant project, as does the flattening out of Chinese society. Granted that I wrote the above paragraph in 2017/18, it is striking that a number of basic reforms are still missing – there is very little reform of the hukou system (household registration system that allows internal migrants to work in cities) and children of migrant workers to cities do not receive the same social benefits and education as children of city parents do. In addition, little accommodation has been made for the fact that the ageing of the population will strain the social safety network. In that regard China looks a little like France! So, like the US under Roosevelt, the creation of a formal 'new deal' type social infrastructure, if it happens, could be a (positive) turning point for China. The second challenge is to make China more like Silicon Valley. The plenum underlined the importance of maintaining a laser-like focus on 'high quality development', which translates as the need to make China the leader in new, strategic technologies. In this respect it is conceptually like the EU's idea of strategic autonomy, but far far more serious in implementation. In addition, the wording of the plenum drafts references 'fierce international competition', which ultimately points to intense competition with European car manufacturers, and in the telecoms and AI sectors. In recent years the number of directives from the CCP on topics that fall under the 'Strategic Innovation' umbrella, has multiplied and state aid for sectors like AI and semiconductors is now burgeoning into the trillions of dollars.

The third element that bears flagging is the ongoing focus on 'reform', and to my limited experience there is a 'lost in translation' element where quite harsh Chinese policies end up being translated as positive, innocuous Western ones. As an example, I recall in the 2010's a very senior Chinese trade diplomat explaining that 'rule of law' did not equate to a Western sense of adherence to established laws, but rather the imposition of the rule of the CCP on business, politics and society. In that context, the idea of 'reform' means the fitting of Chinese society to the will of CCP, and specifically Xi Jinping 'thought'.

My interpretation of all of this is that Xi is shaping China in the form of a more closed state (which again to the tone of my recent note on globalization, makes for a less open world), that curbs the will of those inside, adopts a singularly selfish approach to those outside, and relies on several great strides in technological industrialisation for the prolongation of the 'China Dream'.

The contradiction here, and specifically between the three strands to emerge from the plenum, is that in its policy making (social infrastructure) and economy (high quality development) China needs innovation but is creating a socio-political system that smothers it. This is the fallacy of authoritarian systems.

In this respect, the third plenum missed a trick in not outlining a Keynesian style stimulus for the economy (or even longer-run structural one). The property market is slowing, entrepreneurs are very cautious and the risks associated with local government debt are rising.

I am beginning to wonder if, in the carefully choreography world of Chinese policy making, they need to plan for an 'emergency plenum'.

Taiwan is readying citizens for a Chinese invasion. It's not going well.

03 August 2024, The Washington Post, Christian Shephard and Vic Chiang

The government extended mandatory military service and revamped reservist training in an effort to make Beijing think twice. But it's already falling short.

In the imagined blockade of "Zero Day," a Taiwanese television drama that will be released next year but is already causing a stir, the Chinese military has encircled Taiwan, cutting it off from the world and plunging the island democracy of 23 million into crisis. In a 17-minute trailer released last week, the public responds to China's blockade with a mixture of terror and resignation. Young couples ride bikes past tank convoys on empty streets. Criminal gangs stir up chaos on behalf of Beijing and its territorial claims over Taiwan.

Taiwanese shouldn't fight and couldn't win anyway, an influencer tells her followers in the series. "Those who want us to enter the battlefield — they really don't care about our suffering," she says.

It may be fiction, but the show's bleak assessment of Taiwanese readiness to fight touches upon a very real problem facing President Lai Ching-te, who took office in May and whom Beijing considers a dangerous separatist.

The threat from Beijing has intensified as Chinese leader Xi Jinping has declared China's "reunification" with Taiwan inevitable. He has underscored his willingness to use force to achieve that goal by sending rising numbers of warplanes and navy ships to probe the island's defenses.

Taiwan's government has been trying to improve its defenses by extending mandatory military service and revamping ongoing training for reservists as part of a broader shift in defense strategy designed to make Xi think twice before taking a gamble on using force.

But young Taiwanese are not answering the call, and Defense Minister Wellington Koo recently acknowledged that a lack of equipment and instructors has slowed attempts to professionalize reservist training. "I must honestly say that we need to quickly strengthen [training] as there is still a lot of room for improvement," he told the legislature in June.

Such admissions may concern Donald Trump, who has signaled a more transactional approach to American support for Taiwanese defense if he wins a second term as president in November.

Taipei wants to create a professional backup force to support 155,000 active-duty soldiers. All Taiwanese men born in or after 2005 are required to enlist for a year of service, while about 2 million former soldiers are supposed to complete refresher training every two years.

But officials have acknowledged being behind schedule with plans to teach reservists and draftees how to supplement front-line troops in the event of a war. Only 6 percent of eligible conscripts — 6,936 people — took part in the newly implemented 12-month program this year. Most deferred military service to first attend university, meaning the 2005-born intake cohort won't be fully trained until 2027. Those doing military service this year are not undergoing the anticipated training. A select group of one-year conscripts were supposed to be learning to use drones, Kestrel antitank rockets and surface-to-air Stinger missiles, but there were not enough of them this year to begin the training, according to a Defense Ministry officer.

Taiwan's slow progress on boosting training concerns military experts in Washington and Taipei, who are urging authorities to move faster to deter Xi and prevent a war.

"The last thing that Taiwan wants is for Xi Jinping, as the key decision-maker in China, and for the United States, as the key ally of Taiwan, to doubt Taiwan's commitments to its own defense," said Matt Pottinger, who was U.S. deputy national security adviser in the Trump administration and is now a visiting fellow at the Hoover Institution.

Pottinger said Taiwan needs the political will and foresight to dedicate some of its best military officers to recruitment and instruction. "I'm really hoping that Taiwan makes these sacrifices," he said.

China's military, the largest standing army in the world, has 2 million active personnel and recruits about 400,000 conscripts every year. Its defense budget of $230 billion was 13 times as large as Taiwan's in 2023, and its military regularly trains to take the island in a sudden overwhelming assault.

The United States is required by law to help Taiwan strengthen its own defenses, including through arms sales, but it isn't formally committed to intervening against a Chinese attack, a policy known as "strategic ambiguity."

While President Biden has repeatedly said he would send the U.S. military to defend Taiwan, Trump has made no such promises. Asked what he would do in an interview last month, Trump said that Taiwan was "9,500 miles away" and should pay for American defense.

Taiwan must be "mentally prepared" for a Trump victory in November — and the scrutiny that will come with that, said Mei Fu-hsing, director of the Taiwan Security Analysis Center, a New York-based research center.

Trump would "certainly demand Taiwan to significantly increase its own defense spending and be more proactive in preparing for war," Mei said.

Improved training is a key way for Taiwan to show it is taking military readiness seriously, analysts say. But new programs have continued to face shortages of funding, instructors and equipment, leading to regular complaints from attendees about the quality of instruction, according to reservists as well as official statements acknowledging setbacks.

"It was a complete waste of time," said Vincent Tsao, a 30-year-old scuba diving instructor who spent most of his five days of reservist training last week sitting idly inside, being taught by retired soldiers who openly acknowledged they weren't prepared to lead the program.

Taiwanese men who completed mandatory service within the past 12 years are theoretically called back for refresher training every second year, although in practice many attend far less frequently. Only a fifth of the reservists who went through refresher training last year completed the newly extended two-week course, with the majority doing only five or seven days.

Preparing 2 million reservists for "immediate combat readiness" as a second line of defense is "very important for defending Taiwan," said Han Gang-ming, former director of Taiwan's All-out Defense Mobilization Office, which oversees reservists.

"Since the reserve force is not the primary combat unit, we are always placed last whenever budgets are allocated," Han said.

Fighting a 'defeatist' attitude

Since taking office in May, Lai has vowed to press ahead with his predecessor's reforms that will improve readiness and has warned the military to guard against a "defeatist" attitude, telling troops they cannot presume "the first battle will be the last battle" if China attacks.

But the new administration has not announced major changes to training beyond scrapping ceremonial bayonet and goose-stepping drills.

Lai also faces fierce pushback from the Beijing-friendly Kuomintang, which controls the legislature and has accused the ruling Democratic Progressive Party of trying to turn Taiwan into a "powder keg."

China, which wants to undermine Lai, has claimed that he wants to turn ordinary people into "cannon fodder." But analysts say Taiwan must prepare for the new realities of an increasingly aggressive China. Taiwan's military strategy has long focused on stopping China before its troops cross the 110-mile strait that separates them, but a growing number of defense analysts in Taipei and Washington say Taiwan must prepare for the worst possible scenario: a protracted battle on the island itself.

"Taiwan's reservists are going to be mobilizing where the fight is happening, when the fight is happening," said Michael Hunzeker, a retired Marine who studies military reform at George Mason University.

The island is patently not ready for that, according to people who have completed military training recently. Cony Hsieh, 31, who previously enlisted and served as a soldier for six years, signed up for reservist training as soon as women were allowed to join last year. She returned for a second round in May.

While there were minor improvements, the military was moving too slowly to gain public trust and make training more than a formality, she said. "I don't even know what I'm supposed to do in my position if a war breaks out," Hsieh, who is now working on a master's degree, said in an interview.

Rising public concern about a conflict has left many in Taiwan asking themselves what they would do in a “Zero Day” scenario and how far they should allow China’s invasion threat to infringe on daily life.

Surveys show a majority of Taiwanese support the decision to lengthen mandatory service, but that doesn’t mean they think training is a good use of time or public funds.

“Everyone has their own lives and families. My wife would have to work and take care of the child by herself when I was away,” said Hsieh Yu-hsiang, a 30-year-old salesman at an insurance company who attended 14 days of training in early July.

Even so, he supports government plans to strengthen reservist training. “As the threat increases,” Hsieh said, “it’s inevitable that we need measures in place to respond.”

China needs to pick a side, and it just might pick the west

02 August 2024, The Conversation

For the Kremlin, its “partner of no limits”, China, isn’t doing enough to aid Russia’s war against Ukraine. So, Russia has signed a peace treaty with North Korea, hoping to pressure China into backing Moscow’s war effort further.

Meanwhile, the west sees China as far too helpful to Russia. The sentiment in the west was best captured on July 10, 2024, during a summit in Washington DC. Heads of state and government of Nato countries jointly proclaimed that China is a “decisive enabler” of Russia’s war against Ukraine, and also called on China “to cease all material and political support to Russia’s war effort”.

To the west, China’s aid, though short of actual weapons supply, is more than enough to fuel Russia’s war machine. This in turn poses a security threat to Europe.

But Nato’s message and Russia’s implicit code to China seem to indicate one thing: Beijing’s fence sitting days are numbered, and it needs to choose a side. Unfortunately for Russia, China may be forced to pick the west.

Signs that China is already pivoting to the west have started to appear. Speculation was rife in late 2023 that China’s panda diplomacy (where it gifts the lease of the bears to foreign zoos) was on the way out amid worsening ties with the west.

But in mid-2024, Beijing sent more pandas to Spain and Vienna, as well as the US tech centre of California. President Xi Jinping also went on state visits to the US, Europe, Australia and New Zealand to mend ties with the west.

Beijing’s Russian headache

China knows that the war has had catastrophic consequences for both Russia and Ukraine. Estimates indicate that Putin’s conflict in Ukraine could cost Russia US$1.3 trillion (£1.0 trillion) and at least 315,000 in troop casualties. So, win or lose, the post-war damage to Russia would be immense.

This is bad news for China. Not only will it have a weakened ally, but the west could then have a free hand to consolidate its resources in dealing with the “Chinese threat”. This concern isn’t unfounded. After all, a substantial portion of Americans view China as the greatest enemy of the US, and China is sometimes characterised as a member of an “axis of evil” alongside Russia, Iran and North Korea.

So, the Chinese government needs to hedge itself against becoming the “target of all arrows” (众矢之的), as the famous Chinese saying goes, resulting from Russia losing the war in Ukraine. Reviving panda diplomacy and sending China’s leaders on state visits then become tools to mend ties with the west, and serve as insurance policies.

But Nato’s criticism of China in July 2024, which echoes a similar statement by US secretary of state Anthony Blinken in late April 2024, suggest that these soft power initiatives are insufficient to appease the west.

China needs to press Russia to sue for peace with Ukraine. With this, Russia gets to preserve its national strength, while China could concentrate efforts on being the world leader in AI, and healing its ailing economy.

Economic performance

For months, China has been reeling from a real estate crisis, a volatile stock market, a massive 288% debt-to-GDP ratio, as well as high youth unemployment. And recently, Chinese government bond prices soared from increasing demand, suggesting that investors are seeking safer investment alternatives as confidence in the Chinese economy remains low.

But a battered economy isn’t the only problem the Chinese government faces. It has traditionally employed economic performance to legitimise its rule. So given the poor economic climate, Beijing needs to jump-start its ailing economy to maintain power.

However, there is one major flaw with Beijing’s economic growth strategy: it centres around exports, which relies heavily on western demand. While China has increased its exports to various regions across the world, almost 30% of its exports in 2023 were meant for the US and the EU.

As it stands, cracks are surfacing in Beijing’s export plans. In May 2024, the US raised tariffs on Chinese electric vehicles (EV) to 100%. The European Union followed suit by raising its own Chinese electric vehicle tariff from 17.4% to 37.6%, which comes on top of an existing 10% duty imposed on all Chinese electric vehicles coming into Europe.

But things may get worse for China's economy depending on what it does with Russia. A day after Nato's proclamation, US president Joe Biden announced that China's continuous support of Russia will bear dire economic consequences for the Asian superpower. He added that "some of our European friends are going to be curtailing their investment in China", alluding to what China might face if its support for Russia continues.

For its own sake, China is hoping that the war ends with a peace settlement that favours Russia. Failing this, China's sense of self-preservation will put its partnership of no limits with the Kremlin to the test. After all, as the quote widely attributed to the 19th century British prime minister Lord Palmerston goes, "There are no permanent enemies, and no permanent friends, only permanent interests."

In Xi's China, Politics Eventually Catches Up With Everyone

02 August 2024, The New York Times, Li Yuan

In 1996, when Peter Hessler taught at a small college in Sichuan Province, 90 percent of his students came from villages. Mr. Hessler, 5 feet 9 inches, towered over them by about half a head. They often had just one outfit to wear: a blue suit jacket, or maybe a knockoff Chicago Bulls jersey. One student told him decades later that he could afford only one meal a day. Mr. Hessler returned to China in 2019 to teach at Sichuan University-Pittsburgh Institute. This time, all his nonfiction writing students came from cities, and some of the women in his class were even taller than him. A couple of students wore retro Air Jordans that cost hundreds of dollars.

The changes he observed reflected how, in a generation, China had transformed. The country's population flipped from 70 percent villagers to two-thirds city dwellers. Economic output per person rose twentyfold, according to the World Bank. A 2020 study in The Lancet, a medical journal, reported that, out of 200 countries, boys in China had the largest increase in height from 1985 to 2019, while Chinese girls had the third largest.

But the political system that defined society had not changed one bit, Mr. Hessler writes in his new book, "Other Rivers: A Chinese Education."

"I still taught next door to the College of Marxism, and the university still hosted old-school Communist rallies," he writes. "How could a country experience so much social, economic and educational change, while the politics remained stagnant or even regressive?" That question also puzzles many Chinese people, foreign policymakers, academics and journalists, including me.

In "Other Rivers," Mr. Hessler calls his students from the mid-1990s the "reform generation." They believed in competition and were largely rewarded for their hard work. He calls his students from the 2020s the "Xi generation," after Xi Jinping, the leader who has tightened the leash on all areas of Chinese society. They are willing to work hard, just like the students before them, but have few illusions about the system or their own future.

The Xi generation is risk-averse. Its members are more unhappy about their government, but are unwilling to resist. Mr. Hessler assigned "Animal Farm," by George Orwell, to his students. The two characters they most identified with were the donkey, who is skeptical of the new farm but keeps his thoughts to himself, and the horse, who is hardworking but blindly loyal.

In "Other Rivers," Mr. Hessler doesn't provide a resounding answer to his question. But he believes that now, more than any other time in his nearly three decades writing about China, something fundamental about the country's political system must change. Young people are increasingly dissatisfied, he said, but they are not ready to try to initiate a change. They know the price people pay for defying the system, and the payoff for going along — even as the payoffs are becoming harder to come by.

In addition to two teaching stints in Sichuan, in southwest China, Mr. Hessler worked as the Beijing correspondent for The New Yorker in the 2000s. He has written five books about China, three of which have been translated into Chinese. "Other Rivers" has little prospect of being published in China because of its criticism of the government, and Mr. Hessler said his previous books would not be published in China now.

Nevertheless, "Other Rivers" is one of the most anticipated new books in the country.

Mr. Hessler, practically a celebrity in China, is known for his perceptive observations and empathetic portrayal of ordinary people, whom he describes as diligent, tough, pragmatic and, for the most part, apolitical. "Compassion" is a word Chinese readers use to talk about his work. His writing "transcends the binary of yes or no, like or dislike," a well-known Chinese writer commented on his debut book, "River Town." That book, published in 2001, recounted his experience teaching English in small-town China as a Peace Corps volunteer.

But in an increasingly polarized world, Mr. Hessler and his writing face more criticism inside and outside China. He is labeled both pro-China and anti-China, for being too political and for dancing around politics.

Some nationalistic Chinese, known as "little pinks," said he was reflexively critical in an article he wrote for The New Yorker about the Covid-19 pandemic in March 2020. When he published another report five months later, about China's effective control of the outbreak, some fellow Western journalists and China specialists branded him an apologist for the Chinese government.

Mr. Hessler and his family moved back to the United States in 2021 after his teaching contract was not renewed. He didn't experience the brutal "zero Covid" restrictions that the Chinese government imposed in 2022: frequent testing, lockdowns, quarantines, food shortages and denial of medical treatment.

In an article on the website ChinaFile late last month, he responded to criticism, writing that he was unfairly judged, especially by other China experts who had left the country. After many American journalists were expelled in March 2020, he became part of a smaller press corps. He felt that he was still in the game, he told me in an interview on my podcast last month, "while the rest of the former players became sports commentators, nit-picking."

Some of Mr. Hessler's Chinese critics said his meticulous descriptions of average citizens in "River Town" and other early works faithfully reflected the pulse of that time, when China was more open and people were trying to adapt to fast-paced changes. But in the Xi era, they said, they wished he would address politics more directly. In China today, politics has caught up with nearly everyone.

That's not how Mr. Hessler sees his role. Trained as a fiction writer, he told me, he was more interested in the people and places than in the issues. "The politics is part of it," he said. "But I almost never start with an issue."

I wondered if his approach in "Other Rivers" might have been different if he had stayed in China until the winter of 2022. Protesters came out in Chinese cities, including in Chengdu, where he had lived, to demand that the government stop its "zero Covid" policy. Some angry demonstrators called for Mr. Xi to step down.

In "Other Rivers," Mr. Hessler writes that his young students, whom he kept up with through email and surveys, were angry about the lockdowns, which they often described as having fundamentally altered their perspectives.

A young man wrote to him from Europe: "Most significantly, it has changed my opinions about 'revolt' and 'demonstration.' I think Chinese should more often seek their rights through demonstrations, even though demonstrations in China have been equated with 'revolt.'"

Most of his younger former students were focused on personal concerns like job opportunities, not politics or climate change, Mr. Hessler reports in "Other Rivers."

"You often hear that a lot of people say: 'We don't need to have democracy. We just need to have a little more space and not so much pressure.' But maybe it doesn't work like that," he told me. "Once you break that and you don't know what's coming next, or when it's going to come, then you're going to create instability."

The Jaishankar-Wang Meeting and the Future of China-India Ties

01 August 2024, The Diplomat, Ali Yawar M.

Even if New Delhi and Beijing decide to collaborate on the economic front, it might not be enough to shift the needle on their relationship.

On July 25, in Vientiane, Laos, Indian External Affairs Minister Dr. Subrahmanyam Jaishankar met his Chinese counterpart Wang Yi on the sidelines of ASEAN-related meetings. This was the second such meeting in the last month; they met earlier in Astana on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization Heads of State summit. The meetings have brought the spotlight back onto the strained relationship between India and China.

In a post on the social media platform X after the Vientiane meeting, Jaishankar said:

The state of the border will necessarily be reflected on the state of our ties. Agreed on the need to give strong guidance to complete the disengagement process. Must ensure full respect for the LAC and past agreements. It is in our mutual interest to stabilize our ties. We should approach the immediate issues with a sense of purpose and urgency.

Meanwhile, Wang Yi reiterated that it is in "the interests of both sides to get China-India relations back on track."

Although many see this as little more than a routine interaction, which can only lead to marginal progress, if any, this meeting comes at a time when both nations are dealing with complex domestic and international pressures that necessitate a re-evaluation of their bilateral ties.

Although such diplomatic interactions between the two countries have become more frequent, the India-China relationship in the recent past has been characterized by a fragile balance between cooperation and competition. The border disputes between the two Asian giants, particularly in the Ladakh region, have been a persistent thorn in the side of bilateral relations. Despite multiple rounds of talks and agreements aimed at maintaining peace and tranquility along the Line of Actual Control (LAC), skirmishes and standoffs have continued to occur, the most significant flashpoint being the Galwan Valley clash in June 2020.

In this climate of mutual distrust, it is difficult to be optimistic about the China-India relationship. However, despite the geopolitical tensions, economic realities present a compelling case for cooperation. Both countries are slowly coming to terms with the fact that cooperation is the only way forward.

India is finding that it has little choice but to allow Chinese investment in its manufacturing sector. India's "Make in India" effort, which aims to transform India into a global manufacturing hub, has failed to pick up the desired steam despite multiple high-profile projects. While India doesn't lack the potential to realize such an ambition, aggregate performance indicators have not been very encouraging. Early reports indicate that "Make in India" has been off to a slow start. The share of manufacturing in the gross value added (GVA) by the economy, for example, showed no improvement after the launch of the Make in India initiative. FDI figures tell a similar tale. A goal this ambitious requires significant capital, technology, and expertise, areas where China excels. Moreover, Chinese investments in sectors such as telecommunications, infrastructure, and consumer goods have played an important role in India's economic growth over the years. Despite restrictions on Chinese businesses, India's imports from China exceeded $100 billion last year.

All is not well in Beijing either. China is finding it increasingly difficult to operate in Western markets. The China-U.S. trade war, coupled with growing protectionist policies in Europe, has limited China's access to its traditional export markets. Additionally, China's own economic transition toward higher-value manufacturing and the rise in labor costs have made cheap manufacturing increasingly unviable. China seeks new markets and investment opportunities, and India can be an attractive partner.

Thus, the economic alignment between India and China suggests a pragmatic basis for engagement. The statements by both the ministers reveal an understanding of these mutual interests. Both sides have held multiple rounds of talks to de-escalate tensions and establish protocols to prevent future conflicts. There has been little progress, but the recent disengagement in certain friction points along the LAC is a positive development. However, this process has been slow and punctuated by setbacks. Trust remains a significant issue, exacerbated by the Galwan Valley clash.

China's incremental territorial advances, often referred to as "salami slicing," are a source of constant concern for India. These tactics involve small, non-confrontational moves to incrementally change the status quo along the border. For India, these moves are not just about territorial encroachment but also about the strategic signaling of China's intentions. In response, India has been enhancing its border infrastructure, increasing its military presence, and forging strategic partnerships with other nations to counterbalance China's influence.

While Jaishankar's emphasis on the importance of three mutuals – "mutual respect, mutual interests, and mutual sensitivity" – during this meeting indicates India's expectations from China, it's clear that India's strategic positioning extends far beyond its immediate neighborhood. The presence of Indian National Security Advisor Ajit Doval at Nguyen Phu Trong's funeral in Vietnam alongside representatives from China, South Korea, and Japan, and Prime Minister Narendra Modi's planned visit to Ukraine, underscore India's intent to engage with a broad spectrum of global players. By fostering such diverse relationships, India aims to enhance its geopolitical leverage, including with China.

Thus, India's approach to China can be seen as an indicator of a broader strategy to assert its influence in global affairs. A prolonged border dispute with China can exhaust India's resources and focus. Moreover, a strained relationship with China might hurt India's economy. To rally, the Indian economy needs all the resources it can marshal. However, the responsiveness of China and the willingness of Chinese companies to invest in India remain uncertain. Concerns about future restrictions and geopolitical tensions may deter Chinese businesses from fully committing to the Indian market.

Despite the geopolitical tensions, it's clear that economic cooperation remains a potential area of mutual benefit. Sectors such as technology, infrastructure, and renewable energy present significant opportunities for collaboration. China's expertise in large-scale infrastructure projects can complement India's developmental needs. Similarly, India's burgeoning technology sector can offer innovative solutions and market opportunities for Chinese firms.

However, economic cooperation is not without challenges. The Indian government has imposed stricter regulations on Chinese investments following the Galwan clash, citing national security concerns. Chinese companies face increased scrutiny and regulatory hurdles, impacting their willingness to invest. Moreover, the broader geopolitical context, including China's assertive policies in the Indo-Pacific region, influences the economic relationship. Both nations need to navigate these complexities to realize the full potential of economic collaboration.

However, even if New Delhi and Beijing decide to collaborate on the economic front, it might still result in a "close but no cigar" situation. The fact remains that in international politics, economic interests aren't everything. The rehabilitation of China-India ties is a complex and multifaceted process. Economic necessities, historical grievances, and geopolitical strategies will all play a role.

While there is a pragmatic basis for cooperation, significant hurdles remain. An uneasy peace, characterized by cautious engagement and selective collaboration, is likely to define the relationship in the near future. Both nations will need to navigate this intricate landscape with a long-term perspective, balancing immediate economic benefits against broader strategic interests.

Ultimately, the future of China-India relations will depend on the ability of both nations to manage their differences while capitalizing on areas of mutual benefit. It will require a delicate balance of competition and cooperation, guided by a realistic and levelheaded understanding of each other's strategic imperatives. For now, an uneasy peace seems the most realistic outcome, but with sustained efforts and mutual trust-building, a more stable and cooperative relationship may emerge over time.

Put simply, will mutual collaboration benefit both New Delhi and Beijing? Yes. Will shared interests lead to a thaw in relations? That remains to be seen.

Tibetans hail new US legislation

01 August 2024, Taipei Times, Tenzing Dhamdul

US President Joe Biden signed the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, into law on July 12.

However, he made sure to note in his signed statement that the US recognizes Tibet (as referenced in the act) as part of the People's Republic of China (PRC).

Tibetans throughout the world welcomed the act and celebrated it. On Thursday last week, Penpa Tsering, sikyong of the Central Tibetan Administration, also known as the Tibetan government in exile, attended a reception in Washington to thank members of the US Congress for making the act law.

The act includes major modifications to the US' Tibetan Policy Act of 2002, all of which strengthens Tibet's hand and position against the PRC, which was only established in 1949.

With the passage of the law, the US government officially recognizes that Tibet is not only comprised of the so-called Tibetan Autonomous Region, which was only established in 1965 by the PRC, but now includes areas that Beijing designated as part of the Tibetan Autonomous Region in 2018. This more or less states what Tibetans have been saying when it comes to Tibet territorially, which is that Tibet is a country that includes the three provinces of Amdo, Kham and U-Tsang.

They view the claims made by the PRC that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times as historically inaccurate, with the people of Tibet having the right to self-determination as they have a distinct culture and identity.

The law says that the Tibet-China dispute is unresolved and promotes substantive dialogue between the PRC, the Dalai Lama and their representative, which would also include the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community, which in many ways recognizes the Tibetan government in exile based in Dharamshala, India.

The law also requires the US government to combat the propagation of disinformation by the PRC about Tibet, its history, its people, its institutions and the Dalai Lama, and says that the designated US special coordinator to Tibet must work with US Department of State bureaus to implement this.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs denounced the US for its backing of Tibet even before the Resolve Tibet Act was signed into law.

Specifically, during the mid-June visit of US representatives Michael McCaul and Nancy Pelosi to India, the US congressional delegation met with Tibetan and Indian leaders at Dharamshala, including His Holiness the Dalai Lama and Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi. India displayed and demonstrated its critical role in resolving the Tibet-China dispute.

In all of its criticisms of this law, Beijing maintains that Tibet is a domestic matter. In actuality, the Tibet-China conflict is a global problem with implications for the world's sanctity, as well as the entirety of Asia. It remains Asia's water tower and is the third pole.

The US law on Tibet comes at a time when there are growing ties between the Tibetans and Taiwan. Major developments appear to be visible on the horizon when it comes to the Tibet-China conflict. With this chess piece being moved forward, it is now up to Beijing to respond.

Is the growth rate of Uyghurs in Xinjiang higher than that of the Han?

01 August 2024, RFA, Shen Ke Verdict: False

Chinese officials claimed that the Uyghur population in China's autonomous territory Xinjiang increased at a "significantly higher rate" than the Han population since the first national census in 1953.

But the claim is false. Multiple official sources reviewed by AFCL show that the Han Chinese population growth rate in Xinjiang outstripped Uyghurs both over the decades since 1953 and most recently between 2010 and 2020.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mao Ning said on July 1 that China's census data showed that the Uyghur population in Xinjiang had grown from "3.6076 million to 11.6243 million" between 1953 to 2020, adding that the growth rate for the Uyghur population was "significantly higher" than the increase of the Han population in the region.

Mao made the remarks in response to a question from a journalist from Japan's public broadcaster NHK regarding the International Religious Freedom Report released in June by the U.S. State Department that criticized the Chinese government for continuing “genocidal practices” in Xinjiang.

Xinjiang, officially the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, is an autonomous region in northwest China at the crossroads of Central Asia and East Asia.

The Uyghurs are an ethnic Turkic people originating from, and culturally affiliated with, the general region of Central Asia and the broader Muslim world. They are recognized as the titular nationality of Xinjiang.

The Han Chinese, or the Han people, are an East Asian ethnic group native to Greater China. They represent more than 90% of the population of mainland China. There have been disputes in Xinjiang between Uyghurs and Han Chinese over cultural, religious, and political issues.

Many Uyghurs claim that the Chinese government has engaged in systematic discrimination and ethnic repression in Xinjiang, while Beijing claims that the region needs strict oversight following several attacks carried out by Uyghurs who it terms terrorists and extremists.

In 2009, for instance, rioting in Xinjiang’s capital, Ürümqi, broke out as mostly Uyghur demonstrators protested against state-incentivized Han Chinese migration to the region and widespread economic and cultural discrimination.

But Mao’s claim about the Uyghur population growth is false.

Chinese official census

A review of China’s official census figures cited by Mao shows that the rate of growth of the Han Chinese community in Xinjiang exceeded that of the Uyghurs. Chinese census data is based on the number of “permanent residents” of an area, defined as both people born there and long-term migrants settled in a given province or region for more than six months who may or may not decide to settle there permanently. Although China conducted seven national censuses from 1953 to 2020, AFCL could only find detailed data on the Uyghur and Han populations in Xinjiang from the third census in 1982 to the seventh in 2020.

Over the 38 years between the third and seventh censuses, Xinjiang’s Uyghur population increased from 5,955,900 to 11,624,300 with a net growth rate of 95.17%. During the same period, the Han population in the region grew from 5,286,500 to 10,920,100, resulting in a net growth rate of 106.57%.

A closer look at the population changes between individual census years reveals that Uyghur growth rates significantly exceeded those of the Han Chinese in the 1980s and slightly in the 2000s. However, during the 1990s, the Han population increased at more than double the rate of the Uyghurs and also significantly outpaced them in the 2010s.

When asked to clarify Mao’s remarks, a representative from China’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs declined to answer directly, referring the AFCL to the Chinese Embassy in the United States.

The embassy has not responded to AFCL’s inquiries as of this writing.

Trends in official statistics

In order to obtain data on demographic changes within Xinjiang in the years before 1982, AFCL consulted the book 1949-2009: A Report on the Development of Ethnic Minorities in Xinjiang, a monograph published by the Xinjiang People’s Publishing House in 2009.

Written by Wu Fuhuan, the former president of the Xinjiang Academy of Social Sciences and a leading expert on Xinjiang history, the book has been recommended by official publications such as Studies on the History of the Chinese Communist Party.

The report contains year-by-year statistics on the population growth for ethnic groups within Xinjiang from 1949 to 2007, citing the Xinjiang Statistical Yearbook as its source of demographic data.

The report’s findings summarized in the below chart show a Han growth rate significantly higher than that of the Uyghurs between 1949 and 2009.

The report shows that between 1949 and 2007, the Uyghur population in Xinjiang nearly tripled, growing from 3,291,100 to 9,650,600. In contrast, the Han population increased over 28-fold during the same period, rising from 291,000 to 8,239,300.

Academic study

The shift in Xinjiang’s ethnic demographics has also been a focus of academic study, such as a 2013 paper by Agnieszka Joniak-Lüthi, a professor at the University of Freiburg in Germany.

Joniak-Lüth explained how several waves of Han migrants were brought to Xinjiang following various historical events in the decades following the establishment of the People’s Republic of China in 1949.

She noted that in 1949, Han Chinese made up just over 6% of Xinjiang’s total population, while Uyghurs comprised nearly 75%.

But in the 1950s, China established the state-owned Xinjiang Production and Construction Corps, recruiting large numbers of Han migrant workers, especially from the People’s Liberation Army.

This internal migration was further fueled by nationwide famine in the early 1960s, which brought another influx of Han refugees from eastern China to Xinjiang.

Additionally, during the Cultural Revolution from the mid-1960s to mid-1970s, hundreds of thousands of young Han intellectuals were sent to live and work in Xinjiang.

Han growth rates in Xinjiang saw a noticeable decline in the decade following major Chinese economic reforms in the late 1970s and early 1980s. However, they once again significantly outpaced Uyghur growth rates in the 1990s.

Joniak-Lüthi described post-1980s Han migration to Xinjiang as being “driven by the search for economic profit,” largely organized by individuals and mostly voluntary.

She also noted that due to these waves of Han migrants, Uyghurs likely became a minority in Xinjiang by the mid-2000s.

While China’s official statistics currently show the Uyghur population in Xinjiang as larger than the Han population, some scholars suggest that the actual number of official Han residents is considerably higher, as many Han attempt to delay registering their households in the region for a considerable time after migrating there.

Meanwhile, China’s state-run outlets such as The Global Times, China News and Tianshan Network reported that the Han population in Xinjiang grew by 24.86% over the previous decade, while the Uyghur population increased by only 16.2%, following the release of data for China’s seventh national census in 2021.

Census data used in this fact check was taken from the following sources:

Unmasking the Truth: China's Campaign of Disinformation on Tibet

01 August 2024, Chennai Centre For China Studies, Tenzing Dhamdul

Through the advancement of technology, the dissemination of information has reached unprecedented levels. The popular phrase “at the tip of one’s fingertips” aptly describes the easy availability of unfiltered information. Many countries, especially hegemony, have used this to spread their own narratives, including the British Empire, Hitler’s Third Reich, the USA, and, more recently, the People’s Republic of China (PRC).

The PRC was established in 1949 after the Communist Party of China (CPC), led by Mao Zedong, won the civil war against the Nationalist Party (Kuomintang) led by Chiang Kai-shek. Mao Zedong announced the PRC’s territorial claims, which included Tibet, East Turkestan, and Southern Mongolia, during his famous “The Chinese People Have Stood Up” address on September 21 at the 1st Plenary Session of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference. This showcased a meticulous plan for occupying these independent nations and territories through the tactful usage of information warfare.

In 1950, Beijing among other things used the 10th Panchen Lama’s scripted cry for help to invade Tibet, which includes the three traditional provinces of Amdo, Kham, and U-Tsang. And finally, in 1951, Tibetans signed the 17th Point Agreement with the PRC under duress, leading to its occupation. The day of the signing of this agreement has been declared by the PRC as the day it officially “liberated” Tibet, when in fact it symbolizes the day Tibet was occupied by the PRC. These early actions of the PRC under the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) regime, which had established the United Front Work Department to spread its influence and narrative beyond Chinese soil, demonstrates its modus operandi to promote its agenda. When it comes to Tibet, the situation is no different. In this context, I present certain themes and subjects regarding Tibet that the PRC has misrepresented through false narratives.

1. Tibet: A Rich History Misrepresented as Just a Part of China

The PRC, led by the United Front Work Department (UFW), various state-run media outlets, recent YouTube influencers, and even leaders of nations (including the Taliban leaders promoting and praising Chinese state-run colonial boarding schools), have utilized a plethora of disinformation to build the narrative that Tibet is part of its territory and has not been an independent nation throughout history.

This claim is false, as Tibet was historically an independent nation and even conquered large swathes of territory, of what is now Chinese territory during the period of the Tibetan Empire, which flourished under King Songtsen Gampo from the 7th century onward. This clearly dispels the PRC’s notion that Tibet was not a nation but part of China throughout history.

Furthermore, to adapt to and embrace the modern concept of Westphalian nation-states, Tibet reaffirmed its independence in 1913 under the leadership of the 13th Dalai Lama, Thupten Gyatso. This illustrates that Tibet not only constituted a Westphalian nation-state, meeting the essential criteria of 1. a shared national identity, 2. physical borders, and 3. a single government, but was also a nation-state even before the PRC was established in 1949.

The recent US 'Resolve Tibet Act' further debunks the PRC's claims, with extensive research from Chinese sources by Prof. Hon-Shiang Lau showing that Tibet was never part of the PRC or previous Chinese entities.

2. Is Tibet Truly Liberated from Serfdom, or Is It a Myth?

Another major campaign that the PRC promotes for its political legitimacy over Tibet is the notion of Tibet's liberation, emphasizing the eradication of serfdom following its arrival in the region. This campaign is so entrenched that the now-repudiated 17 Point Agreement, signed under duress by Tibetan officials on May 23, 1951, is still celebrated as the so-called "Peaceful Liberation of Tibet." This agreement marked the first time in history that Tibet officially recognized itself as a province of China.

Each year, this day is celebrated with much pomp by the CCP leadership in occupied Tibet, showcasing how they have "liberated" Tibet from serfdom. This concept is deeply entrenched in communism and Marxism, first articulated by Karl Marx when he researched the political economy of the Western world of his time. However, one misses how Beijing presents only one narrative, using synecdoche to vilify the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan government by claiming they had "slaves," when in fact these so-called slaves were workers compensated for their services. If there was any form of serfdom in Tibet's history, it is the current system—where Tibetans are heavily oppressed by the very communist leaders who control them—that resembles serfdom, with Tibetans entirely under Beijing's control.

This notion of serfdom and liberation has become a tool used by the "50 Cent Army" (internet commentators paid by the PRC to spread their narrative) to disseminate information on public platforms. This influence is now more visible than ever. Whole white papers on Tibet repeatedly mention the so-called liberation of Tibet from serfdom while failing to address the atrocities of the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution in Tibet. If Tibetans were truly liberated, why do they continue to engage in the ultimate form of non-violent protest: self-immolation?

3. Divided Lands: The Fragmentation of Tibetan Territories

This action has been one of the most successful policies by the PRC in diminishing Tibet's status as an independent nation-state in the minds of the broader public and governmental policymakers.

In 1965, the PRC officially established the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR), which is only a portion of Tibet that the Tibetans claim and where they lived and flourished prior to the PRC's illegal occupation by the People's Liberation Army (PLA). For Beijing, this region is considered Tibet, and it continues to remain so officially, despite contradicting the legitimate claims of Tibetans living in the traditional provinces of Amdo and Kham. The TAR largely encompasses the entire U-Tsang province, with some parts of Kham included as well. The current 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, was born in Taktser, Amdo, which is not part of the TAR. Additionally, Andrug Gompo Tashi, the leader of the Tibetan resistance force Chushi Gangdruk and the National Volunteer Defense Army (NVDA), was born in Lithang, Kham, which is also outside the TAR.

Hence, the intended plan to remove and erase Tibetan territories from official maps by labelling them as Tibetan Autonomous Prefectures—despite lying within the official borders of Tibet and China—is a tactical masterclass that many nations have unfortunately accepted. The 2003 India-China joint communiqué stated that "the Indian side recognizes that the Tibet Autonomous Region is part of the territory of the People's Republic of China," reflecting a similar stance taken by other nations, including the USA, which viewed Tibet primarily in terms of the TAR then.

However, there is pushback from the international community, including the USA, which explicitly mentioned in the recent "Resolve Tibet Act" that Tibet as a territory is not limited to the TAR but includes areas designated as Tibetan Autonomous by the PRC as of 2018. And also from India with its Prime Minister Narendra Modi openly wishing the Dalai Lama on his birthday, with many even speculating a possible public official meeting between the two leaders. This marks the first time that a government officially refers to Tibet as encompassing the three traditional provinces, using Beijing's own narrative against them regarding Tibetan territory.

4. From Borders to Schools: The Hidden Costs of Colonial Aggression

If the PRC had legitimacy over Tibet as a sovereign entity, why does it treat the region differently? More importantly, why does it suppress the Tibetan people through severe surveillance, transnational aggressions, and colonial boarding schools? All of these factors contribute to a dystopian world reminiscent of the one George Orwell envisioned in his famous book, 1984.

Firstly, internal suppression is well-documented, and several protests continue to take place in Tibet despite the heavy restrictions imposed since the PRC's illegal occupation. Notable examples include the 1956 Eastern Tibetan Rebellion, the 1959 Tibetan Mass Uprising, the 1987 Tibet Protest, and the 2008 Tibet Protest. Recent testimony from Tibetan political prisoner Namkyi illustrates the situation in Tibet, where individuals cannot hold a picture of the Dalai Lama without facing imprisonment—often unjustly and for no reason at all.

Secondly, we see a rise in transnational aggression as Beijing uses Tibetan family members in Tibet as a tool to pressure and threaten Tibetans living abroad—whether as exiles, refugees, part of the larger Tibetan diaspora, or even citizens of free countries. In February 2024, the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) released a report titled "Chinese Transnational Repression of Tibetan Diaspora Communities," highlighting this very tactic that Beijing continues to employ. This approach has been used not only against Tibetans but also against those under their governance, including Han Chinese.

Thirdly, the issue of colonial boarding schools has been exposed by the Tibet Action Institute. One of the main whistleblowers, Dr. Gyal Lo, emphasizes how Beijing, after implementing various tactics to gain legitimacy in Tibet, is now targeting Tibetan children. In these schools, Tibetan parents are forced to send their children, who are not being taught Tibetan; when Tibetan is taught, the syllabus is structured in such a way that little essence of Tibet remains. One example given by Dr. Gyal Lo is that textbooks in these schools teach Tibetan children that the Japanese are their enemies, despite the fact that Tibet and Japan never had any major conflicts in the past. In fact, a Japanese general, under the guidance and vision of the 13th Dalai Lama, established the first modern Tibetan army in the early 20th century.

Hence, through these actions, we can understand how Beijing, knowing that it does not have clear legitimacy among the Tibetan people, is pursuing such repressive policies to control and gain legitimacy by force, even if it means harming Tibetans.

5. Spiritual Suppression: The Fight Over the Dalai Lama's Lineage:

The PRC was established in 1949 and it continues to be led by the CCP. The CCP does not believe in religion, with Mao Zedong famously stating that "Religion is Poison," to the Dalai Lama, echoing the Marxist adage that "Religion is the opium of the masses." He and his party followed this up by destroying religion, including the Tibetan tradition of Buddhism on a grand scale during the Cultural Revolution, an event unparalleled in history.

Tsering Woeser's book "Forbidden Memory: Tibet during the Cultural Revolution" employs powerful images, detailed interviews, and critical analysis to illuminate what actually occurred during that period and how thousands of monasteries and religious sites in Tibet were ravaged to the ground.

In 2007, Beijing issued Order Number 5 and subsequent orders to control the Tibetan reincarnated lamas, whom they call "living Buddhas." This policy has forced reincarnated lamas - who hold significant respect and reverence among Tibetans - to seek permission from CCP leaders, who officially do not believe in religion or Buddhism, for their status. The centuries-old tradition of reincarnation has now been reduced to a bureaucratic process, with many using this system to bribe Chinese officials and declare their own reincarnated lamas. Consequently, the number of recognized reincarnated lamas has drastically increased since the inception of this order. Amidst such conditions, they seek to recognize and claim sole authority over the succession of the Dalai Lama. This irony would make Shakespeare himself proud, provoking laughter from the audience. However, it is widely known that Beijing plans to install their own Dalai Lama, with the reincarnation of the Panchen Lama already setting a precedent for this. It is crucial to recognize and support the traditional process of reincarnation, as the Dalai Lama himself frequently states that if he were to reincarnate, he would be born in a free country - implicitly marking/cancelling occupied Tibet (under current system unless it becomes free), which continues to hold the unfortunate title of being one of the least free countries in the world.

Conclusion:

The signing of the 'Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act' into law by US President Joe Biden on July 12th is a significant step for towards Tibetans right of Self-Determination, with the USA once again taking a stand on Tibet's status while competing with China. A particular section of this law mentions how the US will work towards combating disinformation campaigns by the PRC on Tibet.

The recent visit of a US Congressional delegation to Dharamshala, where they met the Dalai Lama and leaders of the Tibetan Government in Exile, followed by a meeting with the Indian Prime Minister, suggests visible progress is being made in the Tibetan freedom movement. With former Indian Ambassador Dilip Sinha stating "India should continue to support the Tibetan cause and bury China's narrative on Tibet."

It has been more than six decades since Tibetans, including their leader the Dalai Lama, were forced to flee their own country. The majority of Tibetans continue to live under Chinese occupation, but as the world gradually awakens to this issue, the experiences of Tibetans become invaluable for understanding Beijing and navigating the challenges ahead, including the tactics and information warfare strategies it has employed and continues to use against Tibet. As the saying goes, to understand the People's Republic of China, one must understand Tibet.

After a population exodus, Hong Kong looks to mainland China for new residents

01 August 2024, ABC News, Kathleen Calderwood and Marty Smiley

Real estate agent Jeffrey Wai is showing me what $3 million buys in the notoriously expensive Hong Kong real estate market. We're touring a two-bedroom, two-bathroom apartment with stunning views over Kowloon Bay, one of 1,200 new homes in a high-rise development called Miami Quay.

"This is a good price in this moment," he assures me, noting that similar-sized apartments can fetch well over $5 million.

The towering residential complex we're touring sits on a thin, 3km strip of reclaimed land that was once the site of Kai Tak airport, for decades Hong Kong's gateway to the world. It was a famously treacherous landing. Passengers steeled themselves for a white-knuckle ride skirting mountains and high-rise buildings, before touching down in the heart of the city.

These days the redeveloped Kai Tak district is welcoming a very specific kind of new arrival – buyers from mainland China snapping up real estate. "Three out of four buyers in Kai Tak district were buyers from the mainland," says Mr Wai.

In the past couple of years, more than 100,000 people have moved to Hong Kong, and the majority have come from mainland China. It's not by accident. Hong Kong's Beijing-controlled government is offering a raft of incentives to lure people to the city, after an exodus of skilled workers in the wake of the COVID pandemic and China's ruthless crackdown on political dissent following the 2019 pro-democracy protests.

Mostly, it's mainland Chinese responding to the call. Mr Wai has seen the influx of buyers from across the border in his burgeoning real estate sales figures. Earlier this year, after the government lifted stamp duty on property purchases for non-Hongkongers to boost the struggling real estate market, sales in the Kai Tak district skyrocketed.

"There were around 10,500 for the whole year in 2023, but there were 4,200 transactions in March 2024 alone," he says. "I believe that the past few months were the best months in my life, [in terms of] my performance and achievements."

Mainlanders "like Hong Kong very much," he adds, "because Hong Kong is a very international city."

The new face of Hong Kong

On a ferry heading for Cheung Chau island, about an hour from Hong Kong's CBD, Eliana Cheung is admiring the city she now calls home. The 29-year-old is from Guangdong, in southern China, but has been living in Hong Kong for just over two years

now. In that time, she's fallen "deeply in love with the place."

"Hong Kong culture has influenced me ever since I was a kid," she says. Growing up in China, she remembers watching Chungking Express, a 1994 film set in the city. The Hong Kong she met on screen captured her imagination even then. "It's portrayed as a very glorious yet retro and nostalgic place," she says, "and that people here are friendly and loyal." Eliana first came to Hong Kong to complete a Master's degree but was able to stay on after finishing her studies thanks to a scheme called "Immigration Arrangements for Non-Local Graduates".

Government data shows migrants from mainland China dominate the list of approved applicants. In 2023, the number of permits issued under the scheme more than doubled to 26,089. Of those, 24,650 were for applicants from the mainland.

Eliana is now working in human resources and eyeing a future for herself long-term in Hong Kong.

"Mainland buyers like Hong Kong very much, because Hong Kong is a very international city."

Other programs are having a similar effect.

In late 2022, Hong Kong's government launched the "Top Talent Scheme" to entice candidates who had either graduated from one of the world's top 100 universities, or earned more than $HK2.5 million ($489,000), to move to the city.

Nearly 70,000 applications have been approved since it began, more than 90 per cent of which were for candidates from mainland China.

Eliana's friend Xing Xing, who comes from Guizhou in China's south-west, can understand why people from the mainland want to migrate here. "I think there are more opportunities in Hong Kong, not much pressure and I think everyone accepts me," Xing Xing says. "As long as I want to work, I will be able to get a job." Fleeing China's crackdown

The government's eagerness to attract new residents to Hong Kong has its roots in the aftermath of the 2019 anti-government protests, when millions poured into the streets to oppose a bill that would allow Hongkongers to be extradited to mainland China.

For months the city was engulfed in chaos, as clashes between protesters and police grew increasingly violent. Beijing eventually cracked down hard to quell the unrest, bypassing the city's legislature to introduce a draconian "National Security Law" criminalising secession, subversion, terrorism and collusion with external forces, in some cases with a maximum sentence of life in prison.

Earlier this year, Hong Kong's Legislative Council passed its own local security law, known as Article 23. Both laws have been criticised by international governments and human rights groups concerned about the chilling effect on the city's freedom of speech, assembly and press.

"The freedoms that we enjoy are sort of evaporating fast," says Emily Lau, a veteran of the city's pro-democracy movement and one of the few activists left in Hong Kong still brave enough to speak out.

I ask her whether she thinks protests like in 2019 could happen again today. "Oh, of course not," she scoffs. "Any protests? Not possible. No protests allowed. It's very sad."

Instead, she senses a climate of fear has gripped the city.

Around 300 arrests have been made under the security laws and a pre-existing colonial-era sedition law that was revived after the protests. But the Hong Kong Democracy Council estimates there are around 1,000 political prisoners in total in the city on a variety of charges. Many have been languishing for years awaiting trials or sentencing.

Regina Ip, a senior member of the Hong Kong legislature, argues that Hong Kong has had to make sacrifices to restore the city's security. "(The police) can't take any chances for the sparks of protest to rekindle the mass upheaval that we saw in 2019," she says. The restrictions are "proportional" and ensure "the overall stability and national security of our city will be maintained," she says. "That's all."

In recent years, mounting concerns over the uncertain security environment, combined with the pandemic, have seen an exodus of residents from the city. How many have left is hard to say, but at least 135,000 people have taken advantage of a scheme offered by the UK government in the wake of the National Security Law giving them a route to citizenship.

In 2022, the city's leader, chief executive John Lee, acknowledged that the city had lost 140,000 workers over the previous two years.

A refuge for the exiles

Some who fled found refuge in nearby Taiwan.

In the capital Taipei's trendy Xinyi district, former Hong Kong journalist Shirley Leung meets me in an underground bar called Revolution Now. She says it's become her "secret haven" because it always reminds her of home. The owners are a warm, welcoming couple from Hong Kong, who often sit late into the night playing Cantonese songs and talking about music and politics with the regulars.

"Whenever you miss your home, you come to the bar," says Shirley. "With people speaking your own language, share the same culture, share the same history or memories. I think it's very important emotionally."

Shirley once worked at Apple Daily, a boldly pro-democracy newspaper that drew the ire of authorities for its criticism of Beijing. Its owner, media mogul Jimmy Lai, and several senior staff were arrested under the National Security Law. Eventually, the paper shut down.

Shirley decided she needed to leave Hong Kong if she wanted to keep working as a journalist. "The whole society is so afraid to talk about anything," she says of Hong Kong today. "And for me, it's so suffocating." She now reports on Hong Kong from Taipei, running her own news outlet Photon Media. Even here, she has to take special precautions to ensure her staff's safety. All her reporters work anonymously, and the location of their newsroom is kept secret.

Shirley doesn't believe it's safe for her to return home but refuses to give up hope that the city could still change and its freedoms might be restored. "I'm so hopeful, because if I'm pessimistic, it's so difficult to continue working like this."

Her former boss's son, Sebastien Lai, has also found sanctuary in Taiwan. He happened to be in Taipei on the day of his father's arrest and hasn't been able to go home to Hong Kong since. His 76-year-old father Jimmy Lai has been in jail for more than three-and-a-half years and his national security trial has been underway since late last year.

The trial was recently adjourned until November. If convicted, his father could face life in prison.

"It's a show trial," says Sebastien. "It's three government-appointed judges, there's no jury. From my understanding, he's held in the maximum-security prison and at 76 he's the oldest political prisoner. You fear the worst."

Hong Kong's economy takes a hit

The loss of skilled workers delivered a body blow to Hong Kong's economy, which has long built its success on its reputation as an international financial hub. At one point, the stock market plunged more than 40 per cent lower than in 2019.

Vera Yuen, an economist at Hong Kong University, says concerns over transparency are driving foreign investors away. "For investors, you would need transparency of what the company is actually doing in order to evaluate the assets," she says. "But if now we are into more Chinese business, you don't know which one is connected to the government, which one is not."

"The whole society is so afraid to talk about anything ... it's so suffocating."

And there are other problems too.

On a busy street in Kowloon's Mong Kok district, she points to shuttered shops and vacant commercial premises as visible signs that the city is mired in the economic doldrums. "I see more brick-and-mortar shops closing and there have been fewer people on the streets," she says. "Tourists from foreign countries, they are not very interested in coming to Hong Kong." Dr Yuen believes Hong Kong is still one of the most capitalist cities in the world, but it's facing challenges returning to pre-2019 levels of economic growth. "It will gradually," she says. "I think Hong Kong's economic growth slows down but we still have some growth every year."

Hong Kong authorities' efforts to entice new residents, from the Top Talent Scheme to tax cuts, to holding major events, are all designed to plug the gaps in the economy. Regina Ip, a senior member of the Hong Kong legislature, admits the city has been in a downward cycle, but is confident it will bounce back as it has "many times" before.

"You cannot judge the performance of Hong Kong as a financial centre purely on the basis of the stock market, because we do a lot of other things," she says. "The National Security Law actually affects very few people, so we just have to keep explaining to the business community that life hasn't changed for them at all."

'I feel very free'

Five years on from the protests, Hong Kong is a city being remade.

Back at Miami Quay, the change is visible. The gleaming apartments seem a world away from the heaving, humid old neighbourhoods of Kowloon, just to the west. "Mainland buyers prefer brand new units," says real estate agent Jeffrey Wai.

Already the complex is decked out with pools, elaborate gardens and even a communal mahjong room. Soon it will include more facilities to entice buyers, including "a sports centre next door, a cruise terminal and lots of different shopping malls," he says. "To me, the reason why I want to live in Hong Kong is because it's such a diverse place," says human resources worker Eliana Cheung.

Like generations before her, she came here seeking opportunity and a connection to the world beyond the mainland. But whereas last century's migrants were escaping the People's Republic of China and its communist government, many today are coming under the direct encouragement of Beijing.

These days a high-speed rail line connects the city with Shenzhen, just 20 minutes away over the border. Most weekends, Eliana makes the trip with her friend Xing Xing to visit family and friends, and shop where the prices are far cheaper.

Eliana's plan now is to live in Hong Kong long enough to get a local passport, so that she can travel more freely and have more opportunities for her family in the future. "I want my child to be born in Hong Kong and have a Hong Kong ID like I do, so they will have more options in their education," she says.

For her friend Xing Xing, Hong Kong has provided an escape from the pressure she felt in her hometown. "People [in Hong Kong] wouldn't question you about your age, they wouldn't ask you to start planning for marriage and having children," she says. "After working in Hong Kong for half a year, I feel very free."

July

A Shift in the China-Tibetan Dispute

July 2024, Robert Barnett

Since the late 1970s, the Dalai Lama of Tibet and his supporters have been trying to persuade China to agree to give his former country some degree of meaningful autonomy. Their method has generally been based on strident criticisms of China's human rights record in Tibet. This has not worked. The Chinese have not agreed to formal talks for 14 years, have said that they will never discuss the question of autonomy, and have embarked on policies in Tibet and other ethnic areas that are all but indistinguishable from assimilation. Given the rise of China as a global power, and the increasing failure of Western governments regarding their own claimed values, the prospects of success for a values-based approach to diplomacy with Beijing are vanishingly small.

In recent months, however, there have been signs of a new approach within the exile Tibetan leadership that replaces moral critique with a more considered calculus – one that exploits emerging contradictions in China's Tibet policies. In particular, Beijing's stated aims regarding the Dalai Lama's succession and China's historical claims to Tibet are starting to look hard to realise absent the imprimatur of the Dalai Lama. Seen from this perspective, China has boxed itself into a strategic cul-de-sac from which it cannot easily extricate itself without reaching a deal with the Tibetans.

Signs of this new approach underlay the visit by Nancy Pelosi and six other US congressional representatives to India to meet the Dalai Lama in mid-June. The speeches of the US visitors were filled with the usual claims of ideological combat and moral superiority, but the delegation carried with them the text of a bill just passed by Congress that pointed to the basic parameters of the exiles' new approach. Currently awaiting presidential assent, the "Resolve Tibet Act" repeats the exiles' demand that China hold unconditional negotiations with the Dalai Lama about his call for cultural autonomy in Tibet. But the real purpose of the bill is not to do with culture, human rights, or abuses in Tibet. As the Chinese media immediately realised, it is to remind China that its claim to sovereignty in Tibet is weak. If China continues to impose preconditions on talks with the Dalai Lama, the bill implies, the US Congress will push the US government to recognise that the legal status of Tibet "remains to be determined."

Sovereignty and Succession

Unlike human rights criticism, that threat addresses a core sensitivity for China. Its primary objective on the Tibet issue in the last 40 years had nothing to do with rebutting criticisms of its record on human rights. Those were never more than background noise for Beijing. Instead, China's primary objective has always been to get all governments to state that Tibet is part of China. It took China just short of a century to achieve that goal – it was only in October 2008 that the British government renounced its 1914 treaty-based recognition of Tibet as a distinct political entity, making it the final nation in the world to recognise Chinese sovereignty over Tibet. The Resolve Tibet Act suggests that the US Congress could put that achievement in doubt if China fails to hold unconditional talks with the Dalai Lama.

On one level, this is just another instance of US interference in China's affairs and a threat to its security. But it reflects a conceptual shift on the part of the Tibetan exile leadership. That shift, associated with the current Tibetan prime minister, Penpa Tsering, no longer sees Tibetans as desperate to get China to hold talks with the Dalai Lama, now 89 years old and in declining health. Instead, the new approach assumes that it is the Chinese, not the exiles, who urgently need talks to start. If so, it is China that is running out of time to get that deal.

On the succession issue, for example, China has said that its major target regarding Tibet is to have sole control over the selection of the next Dalai Lama. It did not need to claim that power – there are myriad other ways to defang a so far unknown person who might or might not emerge as the leader of the minute community in exile in the distant future. But for China to appoint its own candidate as the 15th Dalai Lama is an extraordinarily difficult goal for it to achieve (in the past, even Tibetans have found it hard to do without major internal disputes and controversy). The opposition of the US government on this issue will surely not deter China on this issue, but support by the majority of Tibetans in Tibet will be crucial. And China has never succeeded with appointing proxy figureheads as religious leaders in Tibet in the past.

It set up the former 10th Panchen Lama as the leader of Tibet in 1959, but he ended up under house arrest or in prison for much of the next two decades after criticizing China's policies in 1962; before his death in 1989, he again made major criticisms of China's role in Tibet. In 1992, China tried to establish another leading lama, the Karmapa, as its proxy in Tibet, only for him to flee abroad seven years later. Beijing has been trying since 1995 to get Tibetans to accept a Beijing appointee as the 11th Panchen

Lama, but there are no signs that Tibetans freely revere him – video footage of him visiting Tibet this week show a noticeably tepid response from the public. That suggests that the only way for China to install a credible successor would be to get endorsement from the current Dalai Lama for its right to appoint one. Reports circulating within the exile community in India say that China is already trying to wrest such a concession from the Dalai Lama today.

This is why the surprise announcement by the exiles in April this year that China has been involved in back-channel talks with them for over a year differs from such reports in the past. Under the new exile leader, Penpa Tsering, the talks process is seen as necessary, but without any presumption of a productive outcome. As he put it, "we have no immediate expectations". This change in Tibetan views is a consequence of Beijing's own strategy over the last four decades of never giving Tibetans any gain from previous talks, despite major concessions given by the Tibetan side. Beijing continues that approach, saying recently that it will only talk about terms on which the current Dalai Lama and his circle could return. That can be seen as another own goal by Beijing, repeatedly reducing incentives for Tibetans to give yet more concessions. But more significant was Penpa Tsering's comment about which side initiated the new contacts: "They [the Chinese] are reaching out to us, it's not us reaching out to them." This claim presents China as under pressure to cut a deal with the Dalai Lama, rather than the other way around.

Shifting Dates

The second emerging vulnerability in China's Tibet policies concerns China's legitimacy for its presence in Tibet. China never obtained a referendum or mandate from the Tibetan people for its absorption of their country into China. It therefore rests its claim to sovereignty solely on a historical claim according to which Tibet became part of China in the past. This claim is problematic – Tibet was certainly part of empires in the past that were centered in China, but it was never part of a country called China, was not directly ruled by Beijing until the 1950s, and never became a Chinese province. But the critical weakness in China's historical claim – and this is the main point of the "Resolve Tibet Act" delivered by the US delegation to India last month – is much more serious: China keeps changing the date when its sovereignty over Tibet is said to have begun.

Before the 1950s, many Chinese scholars said Tibet came under Chinese (they meant the Manchu Qing) rule in the 18th century. Since the late 1950s, however, Beijing has said that Tibet was formally incorporated into China in the 13th century. But in 2011, Beijing declared that what had happened to Tibet in the 13th century was only the "formal incorporation" of Tibet within China. Tibet, China now said, had already been part of China "since ancient times". This referred, it said, to cultural and genetic ties, not to any form of Chinese administration in Tibet. In April 2015, it changed that view again: a government White Paper announced that "since ancient times" meant that Tibet had become "a local government of ancient China" in the 7th century. This was an unprecedented claim for which Beijing has produced little argument or evidence.

This revisionism is central to the negotiation issue. China's primary pre-condition for talks with the Dalai Lama was always that he must declare that Tibet is part of China. The Dalai Lama assented to that demand shortly after it was made in 1979 and gave up calls for independence. Behind the scenes, Beijing then quietly changed the terms of this precondition. It began requiring that the Dalai Lama must also say that Tibet was part of China in the past. He has declined to change his views on Tibetan history, saying that historical questions should be left aside and not be part of any talks (ironically, Beijing insisted on the same position in talks with the Tibetans in the 1980s). Now, even if he had agreed in the past to say that Tibet became part of China in the 13th century, he would have to revise that date to at least six centuries earlier.

The Tibetans' new stance towards negotiations appears to see this goalpost-shifting by Beijing as a political opportunity. The Resolve Tibet Act thus accepts China's sovereignty in Tibet (as does the Dalai Lama), but only as a consequence of its "effective control" there since the 1950s, not because of a pre-existing historical claim. Instead, the Act notes that the US has never recognised China's claim that Tibet has been part of China "since ancient times" – it could hardly have done so, since that claim has only just been made. Hence, the Act implies, it would not be hard to get Western governments to confirm that they have not endorsed China's claim to ownership of Tibet "since ancient times".

Unforced Errors

There are two other factors implied by the new Tibetan strategy. These too are unforced errors by Beijing, and unlike the other issues, in these cases we know there were voices in Beijing that long ago warned China's leaders to avoid them. The first of these errors is the most obvious, and for the same reason, has almost never been noticed abroad: the Chinese government never needed to switch to a policy of personally insulting the Dalai Lama. Beijing made this decision at a policy meeting in July 1994, against the advice of many of its own Chinese experts on Tibet. Popular resentment among Tibetans against that decision already led to major protests across the Tibet plateau in 2008. It is likely to lead to greater resentment when the Dalai Lama dies, unless China has brokered a reasonable agreement with him before that time. China appears concerned about a risk of serious unrest at that time, judging from the fact that it has sent 20,000 cadres in teams of four or more to live in every village in Tibet, apparently to prepare for such an outcome. A last-minute deal with the Dalai Lama would remove that risk.

China's second unforced error is brinksmanship. Between 2002 and 2010, China's leaders delegated the talks process to an agency called the United Front, whose officials basically stalled the talks process by impugning the intentions of the Tibetan side (they are still doing so), irrespective of concessions by the Tibetans. It became hard not to conclude that China's strategy was to wait for the Dalai Lama to be at his weakest and oldest in order to maximise the concessions that it could get from him. But now, as the Tibetan leadership sees it, the window of opportunity for China is closing, and it is China, as much as the exile leadership, that is under pressure to start talks.

Prompting Reassessment

This display of political jujitsu by the Tibetan exiles is a major conceptual adjustment, but it is not a shift in political realities or power. China still holds all the cards, and even if the US government became openly involved, it could not force China to yield on this issue and would probably have the reverse effect (more significant will be India's role, which in turn will depend on whether it resolves its current disputes with China). The significance of this shift in approach is not that it might lead to visible change in China's negotiating stance, but that behind the scenes, it might strengthen those advisers within Beijing who warned their leaders 30 years ago that a policy of insulting the Dalai Lama, and of delaying talks until just before he dies, would damage China's own interests.

Already, China's former Party Secretary in Tibet is under investigation, allegedly for corruption, an unprecedented development in the Tibetan context. The likely cause for the investigation is not corruption but some form of factional debate or struggle, rumored to relate to China's Tibet policy. If such debates could be stimulated by the Tibetan exiles' shift in approach. That may not in itself lead to change in China's policies, let alone concessions. But, by focusing on China's objectives and their contradictions rather than on values or ideology, the new approach to the dispute could prompt reassessment by both sides of their strategic options before the final opportunity for a negotiated resolution is lost.

Empowered Together: Our Journey at ITYF 2024

31 July 2024, FNVA, Tenzin Lhatso and Rinzin Namgyal

Within a year of its launch in 2023, the International Tibet Youth Forum has become a “must-go” event for advocates of the Tibetan movement for freedom. We consider the forum as a carnival of Tibetan advocacy and a marketplace of ideas where we can delve deeper into, deliberate and discuss the Tibet movement for freedom. The widespread and in-depth advocacy of the Tibetan movement among the global community is the major vision and hallmark of the 16th Kashag, led by Hon. Sikyong Penpa Tsering, who has prioritised the inclusiveness of all sections of our community in the Tibetan freedom struggle.

We were honoured to receive an invitation to the second International Tibet Youth Forum 2024, held in Dharamsala from 3rd to 5th July, followed by the celebration of His Holiness’s birthday. The conference brought together over 100 Tibetan youth from more than 13 countries, representing diverse educational and professional backgrounds. This prestigious forum aimed to provide a platform for Tibetan youth to exchange ideas, express their concerns, and collaboratively discuss the way forward. It also aims to nurture the already widespread and fragmented Tibetan advocacy efforts throughout the world into a well-coordinated movement. It seeks to connect advocates from different places, cultures, languages, and geographies, and unify them with the vision of Tibet advocacy.

Attending the ITYF 2024 was a transformative experience for us. The forum, which began with an enlightening CTA Tour, offered us an invaluable perspective on the governance and administrative efforts of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile. This tour was particularly captivating as it provided a unique insight into the workings of a government we had long heard about but never had the opportunity to explore deeply. We are extremely grateful to the Department of Information and International Relations (DIIR) of the Tibetan Government-in-Exile for organising this conference and providing us with a platform.

America’s Resolve Tibet Act and India as Third Polarity in Sino-Tibetan Negotiations

29 July 2024, CTA

If negotiations take place, Tibetans should add India as a third polarity as in every case, India will remain Tibet’s neighbour

-by Claude Arpi for Firstpost

It was an interesting coincidence that the book—Imperial Games in Tibet—of former ambassador, Dilip Sinha, appeared on the market at the time the bipartisan Resolve Tibet Bill, titled Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, was signed into an Act by the US President.

Dilip Sinha served earlier as the head of the United Nations delegation at a time when India had a seat in the Security Council; he was also posted as Ambassador to the UN in Geneva, where he was elected Vice President of the Human Rights Council and Vice Chairman of the South Centre.

Though never posted in China, his diplomatic experience gave him the background to study the ‘Great Game’ over Tibet, as he soon realised the deep injustice inflicted on the Dalai Lama and his people, especially after the Lhasa government took Tibet’s plight to the UN in November 1950.

After going deeper into the old records, Sinha concluded: “Tibet’s current plight is the result of a combination of miscalculation and misfortune. Its misfortune was that Britain and Russia left it in the Chinese empire, refusing to support its bid for independence even after the collapse of the Manchu dynasty. Had either of them annexed it at that time or earlier, Tibet would be a free country today. Instead, neither supported Tibet’s appeal to the UN, leaving it to India and the US. The absence of international support left Tibet at China’s mercy.”

The Resolve Tibet Bill

On February 15, 2024, the US House of Representatives overwhelmingly voted for the bipartisan Resolve Tibet Bill. The House’s approval of the bill seemed a major achievement for Tibetans, as it demonstrated strong bipartisan support for Tibet and the Tibetan cause. Among other things, the bill reaffirmed the US policy of supporting direct dialogue between the People’s Republic of China and representatives of His Holiness the Dalai Lama without any preconditions.

Under the present repressive regime in Beijing, it is a doubtful proposal, though it is a reminder to Beijing that the world has not forgotten the Land of Snows.

And as noted in an earlier column, the Act mentioned that the “claims made by officials of the People’s Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times are historically inaccurate”. The Act rightly asserts that officials of the People’s Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party “are historically inaccurate in claiming that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times”. This is exactly what Ambassador Sinha has demonstrated in his well-researched book.

Dilip Sinha’s argument is important because it analyses, in scholarly language, the ‘Great Game(s)’ which cost Tibet its independence in the 1950s; it has serious implications for the today-disputed Indo-Tibet border. Click here to read more.

Xi's economic, political headaches

28 July 2024, Deccan Herald, Srikanth Kondapalli

Yet, Xi's hold over the party will become increasingly tenuous if he does not address China's mounting economic problems. It is not without reason that Xi has had the names of his predecessors Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao erased from the party document. This has been recent practice, one intended to ensure that Xi, and Xi alone, is glorified. The just-concluded Third Plenum of the Communist Party of China was viewed as a "landmark event" by the party, with China's media depicting it as "pivotal" and "epoch-making". But others depicted it as a damp squib as the pressing problems of the Chinese people were not addressed.

The Third Plenum, held July 15-18 at Beijing, was attended by 364 Communist Party Central Committee and alternate members. The meeting deliberated on the report of party General Secretary Xi Jinping and an "Outline" and a "Resolution" were released at the end of the session that identified 300 reform measures to be undertaken. A new ambitious target of completing these reforms has been set for 2029, the 80th anniversary of the People's Republic and two years after the next party congress in 2027.

The main task of the Plenum was "further deepening reform comprehensively to advance Chinese modernisation". This has become urgent due to sagging economic growth, the real estate crisis, the stock exchange meltdown that wiped out $6 trillion, mounting local debt, ageing of the society, stagnant domestic consumption, widespread domestic political protests, geopolitical pressures through US and European Union sanctions and ongoing technological disruptions.

China's economic growth rate has been falling, especially after the debilitating lockdowns during the Covid pandemic and restrictive policies on the private sector. While China maintained impressive growth rates averaging about 9% after the reform programme began in 1978, in recent years, the country has been losing steam with 3-5% growth rates mentioned officially. However, the Rhodium Group estimates that China is actually growing at about 1.5%.

If China does not lift its sagging economic outlook, the first consequence is that it will be stuck in the "middle income trap", besides popular discontent and ensuing instability. Last year, China stated that its per capita income reached more than $12,000, approaching the World Bank figure of $13,845 to become a "developed" country. It could get stuck below the latter figure, a fate that has befallen many other economies.

China intends to make the steep climb it confronts by "promoting high-quality development", by increasing total factor productivity, stressing efficiency and utilising "new quality productive forces" like automation, AI, IoT, new energy, aerospace, new materials, quantum computing and others. The current total factor productivity of China is just above 1% and it needs to scale this up for higher growth rates by bringing in "revolutionary breakthroughs in technology" and "innovation in key generic technologies, cutting-edge technologies, modern engineering technologies, and disruptive technologies", revamping the market mechanism and enhancing educational standards. China wants to complete this arduous task by 2029.

The 2029 deadline is interesting as the 21st party congress is due in 2027, which is likely to be politically stormy for Xi Jinping not only because of the economic problems but also because of political headwinds. At the 20th party congress in 2022, Xi decimated rival political factions, including the formidable Communist Youth League, whose leader Hu Jintao was shown the door. Other factions like the military have been contained through Xi's anti-corruption drive.

Yet, Xi's hold over the party will become increasingly tenuous if he does not address China's mounting economic problems. It is not without reason that Xi has had the names of his predecessors Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao erased from the party document. This has been recent practice, one intended to ensure that Xi, and Xi alone, is glorified.

While the Third Plenum meetings since the 11th party congress (1978) stressed on economic issues, the current plenum on the other hand mentioned prominently external balancing, with a focus on national security and foreign policy as well. In the light of the speculations about China's plans to increase the nuclear stockpile, nuclear warheads and ballistic missiles, the following direction that "we will speed up the development of strategic deterrence forces and strive to develop new-domain forces with new combat capabilities" is alarming.

The most amusing passage in the Plenum's resolution, though, is the one invoking a Lincolnian phrase, saying that China's Communist Party intends to "make our reform measures highly responsive to the call of the people, so as to ensure that reform is for the people and by the people". With hundreds of thousands of Chinese people participating in "mass incidents" every year and popular discontent spreading, one wonders how the 98 million-strong Communist Party could control 1.4 billion people without effective democratisation. On the other hand, the Plenum's resolution that it wants to pursue “progress while ensuring stability” indicates that more draconian measures are due.

REPORT: Pro-Han bias, tension at India-borders hamper China’s new economic development policy in Tibet

28 July 2024, Tibetan Review

The focus of China’s new development plans in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), which includes the establishment of New Economic and Technology Development Zones (ETDZs), are on pockets of the Han populated areas. Already, the Tibetan economy is largely under Han control (except for in the agriculture and livestock sectors), and Han people constitute the majority group in many of Tibet’s urban centres, noted a jamestown.org report Jul 26. Besides, the potential for exports, a major thrust of the development plans, cannot be realised due to the continuing border tension with India, the report added.

The zones have been set up by the TAR government to import practices from elsewhere in the People’s Republic of China (PRC) and shift the region’s economy away from traditional sectors and toward export-oriented industries, construction, and even high-tech manufacturing.

In June, TAR’s Party Secretary Wang Junzheng, made an inspection tour of the Lhasa ETDZ in the regional capital’s Doilungdêqên (Tibetan: Toelung Dechen) District. While there, he instructed officials to improve various aspects of the zone to help boost businesses such as cross-border e-commerce and support Tibetan products to “go out,” creating a new source of growth for the region’s foreign trade, the report said, citing Lhasa Daily, Jun 13. The readout of Wang’s visit reflects a concerted focus on ETDZs and expanding overseas trade as local growth drivers.

The report noted that although the region has registered growth rates above the national average since the 1990s, this has largely been fuelled by massive subsidies and transfer payments by the central government.

Since 2008, the government has focused on developing the tourism, mining, and construction industries, but their potential to help shift to indigenous growth remains limited. Provincial policymakers therefore have launched an array of initiatives that broadly replicate the growth model of inland provinces, hence the establishment of the ETDZs to attract investments, promote exports, and incubate industries as a key feature of the emerging strategy.

The policy of setting up ETDZs has been articulated and endorsed politically at higher levels, underscoring their significance in overall economic planning, the report noted. The provincial-level ETDZs have been established in Chamdo City in 2013, Lhokha in 2018, and Shigatse near the border with Nepal, and Nyingchi (Tibetan: Nyingtri) near the border with India in 2019. Before these, China’s State Council established an ETDZ in Lhasa in 2001.

The new ETDZs seek to promote industrialization, help reduce the urban-rural gap, and pursue other policy objectives through encouraging urbanization, export-oriented industries, commercialization of agro-pastoral products, and tourism.

ETDZs are designed to create functional linkages with local industrial parks and rural commercial enterprises like farmers and herders’ cooperatives. Both industrial parks and ETDZs aim at incubating more “non-public economic organizations” to increase local tax revenue.

In the long run, the flourishing of such enterprises is also intended to incentivize Han private entrepreneurs to invest in the region, the report noted.

Industrial parks are a portion of the city that are specifically reserved for industrial use. These zones are not for the use of commercial or residential needs. They generally include ports, oil refineries, distribution centres, warehouses, and factories.

The TAR has 74 industrial parks, three-quarters of which are based in Lhasa city, followed by Nyingchi, Shigatse, and Lhokha. Besides, Nagqu (Nagchu), Chamdo, and Ngari each have one industrial park. This geographic distribution reflects the economic focus of the government on the “central economic zone”, a term used in previous regional planning documents.

TAR has also launched a related set of initiatives under the umbrella of “Five Cities and Three Hours Economic Belt”, centering on Lhasa and Lhokha prefecture-cities and creating linkages with Shigatse in the west and Chamdo in the east. This regional integration plan, begun in 2018 and set to complete its second phase of implementation in 2025, will improve railway connectivity by completing the Lhasa-Nyingchi line of the Qinghai-Tibet railway, as well as road and air transport infrastructure.

At the regional planning level, these interrelated projects and initiatives are crucial for creating local sources of revenue and growth. Lhasa and Lhokha, whose combined populations equate to 41% of the TAR’s total, contribute 48% of the region’s GDP and 58.8% of total revenue. This population has grown significantly since 2016 due to the massive relocation of farmers and herders from Nagqu to Lhasa, Nyingchi, and Lhokha, the report said, citing Human Rights Watch, May 21.

The report cites the development of strategic border towns facing Nepal, India and Bhutan as another important policy, as referenced in the Thirteenth Five-

Year Plan for the TAR. These include Shiquanhe (Sengge Khabab) and Burang (Purang) town in Ngari Prefecture, Yadong (Yatung or Dromo) in Shigatse city-prefecture, Longzi (Lhuntse) Town in Lhokha city-prefecture and Mainling in Nyingtri city-prefecture, among others. As part of this urbanization push, the government has upgraded several county-level administrative units to city (urban) status since 2013 to facilitate further devolution of resources and administrative power to local governments.

Currently, the PRC has five land border ports in this Tibetan region, namely Zhangmu (Dram) in Nyalam County, Gyirong (Kyirong) in Gyirong County, Riwu (Ra'og) in Dinggye (Tingkye) County in Shigatse on the Nepal border, Burang in Ngari on the Indian border, and Yadong in Shigatse on the India-Bhutan border.

Being an extension to the TAR of key pillars of the PRC's economic strategy that began in coastal regions in 1978, the provincial leadership has pursued central directives in attempting to develop the region's foreign trade profile over the last decade.

However, the report cites the heavy subsidization, Han control of the Tibetan economy (except for in the agriculture and livestock sectors), and the marginalization of ethnic Tibetans as potential causes of problems for both the local economy's prospects. And the government's more recent initiatives could simply exacerbate the problems, particularly as the new parks and zones are focused on pockets of the rising Han population.

Ma Rong, a sociologist of population in Tibet, has noted that the TAR's Han population has increased overall but especially in certain pockets. Gar County in Ngari had a Han population ranging from 10% to 30%, Nyalam and Yadong in Shigatse had between 5 and 10% of total population from the 1990s up to the early 2000s.

However, these estimates, at best, underestimate the Han population by excluding or undercounting the "floating population" of Han temporary migrants and small businesses. The latest official socio-economic survey statistics suggest that Han people now constitute a majority or close to a majority of the population in specific urban centres like Bayi District in Nyingchi (around 39%) and Gar County in Ngari (around 57%), the report said.

ETDZs are designed in part to support exports, but the TAR's external trade is currently limited to Nepal, due to ongoing border tensions with India. Meanwhile, infrastructural challenges hampering the development of the Sichuan-Tibet railway or national highways connecting the TAR with other provinces suggest that further integration with the rest of the PRC remains some way off, the report concluded.

Amitabh Mathur on the Tibetan Struggle, Post-Dalai Lama Scenario, and the 'Tibet Card'

27 July 2024, The Diplomat, Sudha Ramachandran

"There is nothing like the Tibet card. And it would be deeply offensive to the Tibetans to think they are mere pawns on the diplomatic chessboard."

When a delegation of U.S. Congressmen met the 14th Dalai Lama at Dharamshala in India in June 2024, it triggered speculation over whether the Indian government was signaling a new tough position on the Tibetan question vis-à-vis China. The meeting comes at a time when Sino-Indian and Sino-U.S. relations have frayed significantly. Days later, the Dalai Lama underwent knee surgery and on July 6, he turned 89, underscoring the Tibetan spiritual leader's declining health and advancing age, and that the Tibetan movement is nearing enormous changes and challenges when he passes on.

In an interview with The Diplomat's South Asia Editor Sudha Ramachandran, Amitabh Mathur, co-founder of DeepStrat, a think tank in New Delhi, shares his insights into the complex processes involved in finding the successor to the 14th Dalai Lama. Following his retirement in October 2014 as special secretary of the Research & Analysis Wing (India's external intelligence agency), Mathur was appointed adviser on Tibetan Affairs in the federal Ministry of Home Affairs (September 2015-September 2018). In this role, he forged a close relationship with the Dalai Lama, the Tibetan government-in-exile and Tibetan religious and political leaders.

The democratic leadership of the Tibetans in exile should be supported, he said, and not for any geopolitical aims: "India's support to the Tibetans... is in the nature of its policy to help sustain and nurture the unique Tibetan culture and practice of Tibetan Buddhism, which China is trying to obliterate."

A delegation of U.S. Congressmen met the Dalai Lama at Dharamshala recently. Why did the Indian government allow them, especially when India's relations with China are tense?

The short answer to the question would be, as stated by the spokesman of India's Ministry of External Affairs (MEA), that His Holiness the Dalai Lama (HHDL) is a revered religious leader, an honored guest who has the complete liberty to meet anyone he wishes to. Visits by U.S. State Department officials, senators, congressmen and other notables from various countries have been taking place unimpeded for many years, often facilitated by the government of India. Different U.S. State Department Coordinators for Tibetan issues over the years have met the Dalai Lama at least six times in Dharamshala – the last being in May 2022, when Uzra Zeya called on him.

It does seem, however, that the visit of the bipartisan delegation of U.S. members of the Congress to meet His Holiness and elected leaders of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in Dharamshala is a departure from routine visits of the past. The visit took place at a time when both U.S.-China relations and India-China relations are at a low point. Not only was the delegation officially hosted, but subsequent meetings with Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi, External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar, and National Security Advisor Ajit Doval suggested a nod to the message the delegation came to convey. Some interpreted it as going beyond India's positions on matters pertaining to the Tibet issue.

The purpose of the delegation was to apprise the Dalai Lama of the "Promoting a Resolution of the Tibet-China Dispute Act," which had been passed with bipartisan support both in the Senate and House. Commonly referred to as the "Resolve Tibet Act," it was subsequently signed into law by [U.S.] President Biden on July 12.

Features of the act question Beijing's claim that Tibet was always a part of China and enjoin U.S. government public diplomacy to counter China's misinformation to this effect. It calls upon China to initiate a dialogue, unconditionally, with the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community for a negotiated agreement on Tibet. The Act further endeavors to collaborate with other nations to achieve the negotiated settlement.

The visit seems to have been carefully choreographed. The composition of the bipartisan delegation was interesting. Led by Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Mike McCaul, it included among others, co-author of the act Congressman Jim McGovern and Nancy Pelosi, former speaker and a longstanding Tibet supporter and China biter.

The delegation could easily have saved itself the bother of flying across to Dharamshala to meet the Dalai Lama and instead met him in the U.S. as he was in any case scheduled to reach New York in a few days for knee surgery. The impact perhaps then would have been much less than made by its highly publicized meetings and statements made in Dharamshala, the exile capital of Tibet.

Though a public platform was provided to the U.S. delegation, official statements on the meetings with Indian leaders merely referred to "discussions on bilateral strategic partnership." Nevertheless, India is seen to have signaled its loss of patience with China's intransigence in efforts to end the standoff along the Line of Actual Control as the disputed Sino-Indian border is known, following its unprovoked military incursion in 2020 into the Ladakh sector, and other pinpricks in Arunachal. The signal to Beijing seems to be that we will not respect your sensibilities if you do not respect ours.

Considering the stand taken of late by the Indian government on relations with Taiwan and the South China Sea dispute, it does seem to point to a more aggressive posture towards China and a more proactive stance on Tibet. The Tibetans seem to have interpreted it like that. Whether this indicates Indo-U.S. convergence on moves regarding Tibet remains to be seen.

Is India using the Tibet card? Has it worked?

To my mind, there is nothing like the Tibet card. And it would be deeply offensive to the Tibetans to think they are mere pawns on the diplomatic chessboard.

India's support to the Tibetans or the occasional public expression of it is in the nature of its policy to help sustain and nurture the unique Tibetan culture and practice of Tibetan Buddhism, which China is trying to obliterate. Right from the beginning, in the early 1960s, India's first Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru recognized that the Tibetan struggle was a civilizational one and made available all facilities and assistance to the Dalai Lama in preserving it.

India does not believe in any such card and thus the question of using it does not arise.

Why has PM Modi not met the Dalai Lama?

It is not entirely correct to say there has been no meeting between Modi and the Dalai Lama. In an interview in July 2019 with the Indian magazine The Week, the Dalai Lama disclosed he had met the PM in 2014 itself. He went on to say he had written to congratulate Modi on his victory in the 2019 Lok Sabha polls and received a “very good reply.”

Campaigning during the recent general elections, Modi revealed he frequently engages in discussions with His Holiness, who he describes as a “stalwart of our rich heritage.” Given his public greetings to the Dalai Lama on his birthdays and most recently to wish him a speedy recovery from his knee surgery, one can say the Indian Prime Minister has not shied away from his contacts with the Dalai Lama.

It also needs to be known that there is constant communication between the government of India at the highest official levels with not only the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) but also with His Holiness and his key aides.

Central ministers and chief ministers especially of the northeastern states, who are also practicing Buddhists, meet the Dalai Lama and frequently engage with the CTA. In the Indian Parliament, there is an inter-party parliamentary group that engages with CTA and members of the Tibetan parliament in exile.

However, I do agree that there could be more public meetings between the Dalai Lama and top Indian political leaders. Honoring and respecting religious leaders is part of our cultural tradition. It would also send the right signal to those Tibetans, very few to my mind, who from time to time need reassurance that there has been no dilution of India’s support to their cause.

Who will succeed the 14th Dalai Lama is a very important matter that will determine the future of the Tibetan movement. Yet there is no clarity on the selection process. Why? What process is the Dalai Lama and the CTA considering?

The single most important question in every Tibetan’s mind is what will happen after the 14th Dalai Lama is no more. The Dalai Lama was historically both the spiritual and the political head of Tibet. Although he gave up his temporal responsibilities in 2011 to a democratically elected government, he is still perceived by the rest of the world to be its leader, and indeed the embodiment of the Tibetan government. As such, he continues to be the driving force for the Tibetan government, both in India and in the wider world.

All hopes and aspirations of the Tibetans in Tibet and in exile are centered around the exceptional personality of the Dalai Lama. Devotion and loyalty to him is because of the Tibetans’ deep faith in the institution of reincarnation, unique to Tibetan Buddhism, and the religious preeminence of the Dalai Lama. Naturally, there is anxiety as to what will happen to the institution, the future of the Tibetan community in India and the Tibetan struggle. The anxiety is further compounded by China’s declaration that it will select the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama.

The Dalai Lama is yet to clear the air on the subject of his succession or reincarnation. He has spoken of various possibilities, from discontinuing the “feudal anachronism,” to reincarnating in a free country, to being reborn as a woman, or opting for emanation (manifesting in another body) in his lifetime, rather than reincarnation.

Dalai Lama’s most authoritative statement remains the one made in 2011 when he warned China against meddling in the subject of his reincarnation. He declared that at the age of 90 (he has just completed 89) he would consult with High Lamas of Tibetan Buddhism, the Tibetan public, and other concerned people who follow Tibetan Buddhism. More importantly, the Dalai Lama said that if it is decided that the institution must continue and there should be reincarnation, it would be the responsibility of the Gaden Phodrang Trust to follow his written instructions and carry out the search and recognition, which should be as per tradition.

It is not in the public domain whether the Dalai Lama has given such instructions on the search process and related matters. Given the fact that China will anoint its own protege in the Potala Palace, it is important that the processes are formalized in a manner to withstand manipulation and interference by the Chinese government and others with vested interests. In 2019, Ogyen Trinley Dorje, the 17th Karmapa and head of the Karma Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, wrote an open letter saying the Chinese policy on the Dalai Lama’s reincarnation and its repercussions must be investigated. He expressed worry about attempts being made from within and outside Tibet to arbitrarily recognize the reincarnation of Lamas without any regard for traditional Tibetan systems and adopting dubious means.

Interestingly, however, the process of consultation that the Dalai Lama has spoken about seems to have been done in 2019. There were separate meetings of (a) past and present CTA officials, (b) representatives of Tibet’s support groups and (c) religious leaders of all four schools of Tibetan Buddhism, important lineages including the Bön. All unanimously resolved the Dalai Lama must reincarnate.

What do you foresee happening after the passing of the current Dalai Lama?

China is waiting for the Dalai Lama to die. It seems to have a strategy in place to deal with his death, both inside and outside Tibet. It will use the occasion to assert its right to choose the next Dalai Lama through a lottery using the Golden Urn as prescribed by Chinese emperors, thereby affirming its claim that Tibet has always been under China. The method was introduced after Nepal invaded Tibet in 1791, and Tibetans sought help from the Chinese emperor to drive them out.

The Chinese claim is dubious, as barring the case of the 11th Dalai Lama, in all other cases, the choice was made through traditional religious methods. In any case, it is solely the decision of a person to decide when and where he will be reborn. This cannot be decided by atheist communists who do not even believe in the unique concept of reincarnation. Having selected its candidate, China can be expected to have him recognized by its own Panchen Lama, and ensconce him in an elaborate ceremony on the throne in the Potala Palace. To sow division amongst Tibetans, the choice will in all likelihood be endorsed by some Gelugpas, the Dalai Lama's school of Tibetan Buddhism, who worship the Dorje Shugden deity, a practice that the Dalai Lama has disallowed. Of the many important monks in this group is the reincarnation of Trijang Rinpoche, the junior tutor of the Dalai Lama, who actively supports the activities of the Shugden Group.

China also expects, in the absence of the towering personality of the Dalai Lama, the head of the CTA will not be able to draw the same international support or even unite the Tibetans in exile. It anticipates, in the changed circumstances with drying up moral, political, and financial support, the CTA will become ineffective, and should it become so, it will turn into a liability for the Government of India.

Thus, it is important to have a strategy for strengthening the democratically elected political leadership.

Despite some shortcomings, the CTA has established itself as the political representative of the Tibetans the world over. It has also successfully coordinated with Tibet advocacy groups in recent years to engage with the world. Credit for the enactment of the Resolve Tibet Act can rightly be given to the synergy between the International Campaign for Tibet and the CTA. The more difficult challenge before it would be to keep the Tibetans united and pursue an agreed political line. At the moment, however, it looks unlikely the Chinese government will agree to engage with it.

Via its Tibet Support and Policy Act 2019, the U.S. has declared that the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama is his business and that of the Tibetan religious leadership. Anyone interfering in the process would be sanctioned. All eyes are now expectantly looking to New Delhi to make a similar statement.

The other important aspect to be remembered is that there is likely to be a substantial gap between the death of the current Dalai Lama and the installation of the next, who will even then only be a child. And the gap will become longer by the time he comes of age. He will need the support of all heads of the four major schools of Tibetan Buddhism and high-ranking lineage holders. In the vacuum that will follow it is imperative that the heads of such lineages are united and on board. In this, crucial will be the role of the 41st Sakya Trizin, a revered religious leader, and Ogyen Trinley Dorje, the 17th Karmapa.

The young Karmapa, who fled to India from Tibet in January 2000, left India in 2017, unhappy at the way he was treated. Unlike prominent young tulkus born in exile, he was born in Tibet, recognized by the Chinese and the Dalai Lama, and enthroned in his traditional seat in Tsurphu, Tibet. Unlike others, he has also lived in Tibet. The 17th Karmapa is loyal to the Dalai Lama, is charismatic, and his popularity cuts across sectarian lines. His presence in India would be of great advantage to all concerned and all efforts should be made to convince him to return to India.

Tibet and Xinjiang: The US increases pressure on China

26 July 2024, The Times of Israel

While this week will be known for China gathering 14 Palestinian groups in Beijing to unite terrorists under a "Beijing declaration" and trying to get Palestinian groups such as the Palestinian Islamic Jihad and Hamas into the PLO, the last weeks were about the US administration trying to increase pressure on China on Tibet and Xinjiang.

US President Joe Biden's administration said it would impose sanctions on more Chinese officials for an "ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity", capping off a week of sharp rebukes over Beijing's alleged human-rights abuses and support for Russia's war against Ukraine. This came around the time that President Biden signed into law the Tibet Resolve Act. Less noticed but equally important was the judgement by Argentina's Federal Court reviving a complaint that alleged that China had committed genocide and crimes against humanity and the Uyghur people.

Meanwhile, one finds that the US State Department has also announced that it intended to impose visa restrictions on Chinese officials for their repression of religious and ethnic minorities, meaning thereby the Uyghur and Tibetans. The US has long stood by the Tibetans through bipartisan legislations, it is time for Washington to stand up for the Uyghur peoples also.

Turning to the Tibet Bill which US President Joe Biden signed into law (12 July) it must be said that it was had been anticipated and in reality, not a new bill, but improves upon the Tibet Policy Act of 2002. Titled rather ambitiously, "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act" this Act gives a fillip to America's Tibet policy through further amendments to the Act of 2002 and seeks to facilitate the resolution of the longstanding conflict between Tibet and China. Coincidentally, a few days earlier, Tibet and China held secret back-channel talks. Sikyong Penpa Tshering while announcing the holding of talks said the Tibetan people did not expect anything from President Xi Jinping adding that the long-term view being taken was for the day after Xi! These talks are part of the ongoing episodic conversation that takes place between Tibet and China, but without any concrete results. It remains to be seen if the US Bill will bring any pressure on China to actually 'talk' to the Dalai Lama. The act rightly asserts that People's Republic of China (PRC) government and the Communist Party of China (CPC) wrongly claim historically Tibet as a part of China. It is for this reason that the act specifies that public diplomacy initiatives should actively combat disinformation propagated by China concerning Tibet, including disinformation and propaganda about the history of Tibet, its people, and the Dalai Lama. This point is significant as the Chinese narrative about Tibet (called Xizang by China today) is completely skewed. Declaring the US administration's stand, President Joe Biden said, "...I share the Congress's bipartisan commitment to advancing the human rights of Tibetans and supporting efforts to preserve their distinct linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage. My administration will continue to call on the People's Republic of China to resume direct dialogue, without preconditions, with the Dalai Lama, or his representatives, to seek a settlement that resolves differences and leads to a negotiated agreement on Tibet." Notably, the Act looks at both sides doing things to improve the prospects for dialogue that could lead to a negotiated agreement on Tibet.

It is in this context that one should see the US State Department's announcement it was "taking steps to impose visa restrictions on PRC officials for their involvement in repression of marginalized religious and ethnic communities". Basically, America has said that China has not lived up to its commitments to respect and protect human rights, as demonstrated by the ongoing genocide and crimes against humanity in Xinjiang and the persistence of human rights violations in Tibet.

However, the State Department does not restrict itself to Tibet and Xinjiang, it speaks of the erosion of fundamental freedoms in Hong Kong and raises the bar by talking of Chinese "transnational repression around the world". Interesting turn of phrase for it echoes the Chinese repression of ethnic minority and Chinese citizens living overseas.

A step back shows that in 2022, the US Treasury Department had frozen the US assets of and blocked transactions of two top Tibetan officials. The first was Wu Yingjie, TAR Communist Party Secretary from 2016 to 2021, while the other is Zhang Hongbo, the Tibetan region's police chief since 2018. In 2023, the State Department imposed visa sanctions on Chinese officials pursuing "forced assimilation" of children in Tibet. The latest announcement adds to the pressure that the US continues to put on China through legislation and other legal measures. Tibet and its people is the only region where US lawmakers have made an issue of.

They have also passed laws like the Uyghur Forced Labour Prevention Act. The State Department had earlier criticized Hong Kong for passage of its new national security law, claiming that the vague language in its provisions created uncertainty in the minds of the residents. A State Department report of April 2024 accused China of continuing to "dismantle" Hong Kong's political freedoms and autonomy. The enforcement of the national security law along with its retrospective application as well as the denial of bail to activists was cited by the US State Department as being central to China's disinterest in keeping Hong Kong's democratic system in place.

At the end of this analysis, it is necessary to understand the importance of the recent judgement of the Argentinian Court of Cassation. It recently ruled that the Court of Appeal of Buenos Aires' decision to shelve the original complaint filed by several international organizations supporting the Uyghur cause, lacked sufficient justification. It noted that the appealed ruling did not provide legal and political reasons for restricting the victims' rights and refusing to exercise universal jurisdiction. Notably, the judgement stated that Argentina's judicial system possessed the necessary resources to ensure victims of international crimes could access jurisdiction for their cause. Consequently, the court ordered the prosecutor to open an investigation, mandating that the judge to commence investigatory stage of proceedings. On 16 August 2022, a criminal complaint had been filed in Buenos Aires under Section 118 of the Constitution of Argentina, which permits the prosecution of international crimes regardless of where they occur. The legal campaign in Argentina was launched by the World Uyghur Congress and the Uyghur Human Rights Project in the courts of Argentina in relation to the international crimes of genocide being committed against the Uyghur.

The foregoing narrative shows the wide net cast by the US against China. This includes legislative action and imposition of sanctions. Thus, different wings of the US government act to send out a strong signal on the need to protect the rights and identity of ethnic minorities in China. The pivotal Tibet Act 2024 strengthens America's policy following other such significant acts, like the Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2019 and the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act of 2018. On the 65th Tibetan Uprising Day in March 2024, a resolution was introduced in the US Congress reaffirming support for the Tibetan people. Other countries can take a leaf from the US handling of Tibet and Xinjiang which serves to put pressure on the PRC. It could be argued that some of these Acts do not go far enough, but the fact that they are in place and in force serve to send a signal, which by itself carries a lot of weight.

As China's economy spirals, the Communist Party tightens its grip

26 July 2024, The Hill

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has just concluded the Third Plenary Session of its 20th Central Committee, emphasizing continued reform and opening up.

Phrases like "reform will not pause, and opening up will not stop," and "the market plays a decisive role in resource allocation," suggest a commitment to these principles. However, Xi Jinping's definition of reform diverges significantly from the Western interpretation rooted in Deng Xiaoping's era, which leaned towards a market economy and some political liberalization.

Under Xi, the term "reform" has been redefined. Xi has clarified that moving towards Western "universal values" and political systems is a misinterpretation. The Third Plenary Session reaffirmed that reforms must maintain the CCP's leadership, adherence to Marxism, socialism with Chinese characteristics and the people's democratic dictatorship.

This version of reform, according to Xi, "will neither take the old closed and rigid path nor the erroneous path of changing flags and altering banners."

Under this premise, the party must constantly "reform," or in other words, adapt to the times, adjusting policies for governing the country and managing the economy to best serve the ultimate goal of maintaining and strengthening party rule.

Reform is not an adjustment made for special circumstances or in a specific direction but a routine action for governing the country. In fact, the "reform" that the CCP discusses in the economic sphere today is another way of saying "planned economy" at the highest level.

That said, Xi Jinping's planned economy is different from Mao Zedong's. Mao's planned economy had no "opening up" and no market mechanism. In Xi Jinping's planned economy, opening up and a partial market economy are allowed, provided that they need to be under the supervision and control of the party.

In "An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," Adam Smith coined the term "invisible hand" to describe the unseen forces that move the free market economy. That hand in China's controlled market economy is the Communist Party, and it is visible, although it has started showing signs of dysfunction recently.

Developments in China's economic landscape suggest that the Chinese economy may be slipping out of Xi Jinping's control. After unsuccessful attempts to revive the economy, the signs are that Xi is pivoting towards a deeper planned economy to solve these problems.

On June 3, the State Council prohibited central government-owned enterprises in non-financial sectors from holding shares in financial institutions to mitigate financial risks. This "withdrawal from financial sector order" signals anticipated financial turmoil.

In July, the Chinese central bank, the People's Bank of China (PBOC), began borrowing national bonds and planned on selling them in the secondary market. While this action can increase bond yields and stabilize the RMB exchange rate, it can also have severe consequences.

The Ministry of Finance, which issues bonds, and the central bank, which prints money, are controlled by the CCP. This allows the Ministry of Finance to issue unlimited bonds. If it can't repay them upon maturity, the central bank will print more money. The central bank's borrowing of national bonds will also lead to unanchored money printing, causing significant inflation.

Two weeks later, the PBOC unexpectedly lowered interest rates again to further increase liquidity, despite inflation risks. These moves reflect China's dire financial situation: a severe lack of liquidity and nobody has money. Similar issues are evident in other economic areas under Xi's administration, as significant stimulus efforts in electric vehicles (EVs), real estate, and the stock market in the first half of the year have all been ineffective.

China's EV sector, a key focus for Xi, faces setbacks with high U.S. and European Union tariffs, limiting market access. The Chinese stock market remains unstable. The government has used measures such as reducing the stamp duty and investing significant funds to prop up the stock market.

While the index briefly rose above 3,000 points, it primarily benefited state-owned enterprises. Private small and medium-sized enterprises continued to decline. The real estate market is in a slump, with developers and consumers refusing to invest due to China's gloomy economic future, financial difficulties and population decline.

Overall, Xi Jinping's economic rescue attempts have failed. In response, he appears to be shifting towards a deeper planned economy to address these issues and mitigate the CCP's authority crisis.

This is exemplified by the new Law of the People's Republic of China on Rural Collective Economic Organizations. This law reaffirms that all rural land belongs to the country and that the use and management rights of land and other rural resources are centralized under party organizations at various levels. This reverses the rural reforms in the late 1970s, which rendered the farmers great autonomy in managing lands and receiving profits accordingly. This Third Plenary Session also pledged to strengthen, optimize and expand state-owned capital and enterprises – another indication of a shift towards deeper planning in economic matters. Transitioning to a deeper planned economy aims to consolidate CCP rule and will impact foreign policy, especially regarding Taiwan. The dire economic situation may limit China's ability to take Taiwan.

However, if Xi is determined to take Taiwan, a deeper planned economy could be advantageous. By focusing on internal circulation, such an economy would reduce the impact of sanctions on China.

Why Chinese TikTok is being accused of deleting Tibetan content

26 July 2024, The Observers, Thais Chaigne

It's not new for the Chinese Communist Party to censor any social media content about Tibet that has a political bent. However, in recent weeks, Tibetan users of Douyin, China's TikTok equivalent, have said that any and all content in the Tibetan language is being censored, whether it is political or not. We spoke to a Tibetan woman in exile who also works for an NGO fighting to defend the human rights of Tibetans.

"Aren't all ethnic groups supposed to be equal? Why, then, is the use of our language, Tibetan, being restricted?" asks a TikTok user who goes by Youga Ga in a video in Mandarin published on the Douyin video platform. The video quickly disappeared from the platform before being republished on other social media sites not censored by the Chinese Communist Party and accessible from abroad.

The Chinese Communist Party has a long history of censoring any political content about Tibetans and other ethnic and religious minorities. At the same time, the Party encourages what might be called cultural content about tourist-friendly things like music, dance and cuisine.

"They were using Douyin for non-political purposes"

However, in recent weeks, Youga Ga is far from the only person to complain about Douyin's so-called "ban" on content in the Tibetan language. But like Youga Ga's video, these posts were quickly removed by the platform.

Douyin hasn't made a public declaration about banning the Tibetan language, but many posts in Tibetan have been deleted – as have posts about Tibetan culture, according to the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD), an NGO based in Dharamsala, India, the seat of the Tibetan government in exile. Tenzin Dawa, the executive president of the TCHRD, spoke to the Observers about what is happening online:

A huge number of Tibetans active on Douyin have expressed their frustration that they suddenly cannot use Douyin the way they used to. Some of them make a living from the platform, and are now facing sudden restrictions.

Many of them spoke about things that were strictly non-political. It's just that they were using the Tibetan language. Doctors, entrepreneurs, monks, or content creators, they were using Douyin for non-political purposes - for example, to teach Tibetan to non-Tibetans. Or in the case of doctors, to communicate with people in areas such as remote villages where they only speak Tibetan.

It's a huge platform. In most cases, the posts are not removed immediately, but a few days after they are published. But any live-streamers speaking in Tibetan get banned and removed within minutes.

Douyin isn't the first platform to ban Tibetan. Talkmate, a language-learning application, deleted its content in Tibetan, as did the video streaming platform Bilibili. In 2022, a video sharing app called Kuaishou, which is very similar to Douyin, started deleting videos in Tibetan.

A "folkloric" image of Tibet

The links between ByteDance, the company that owns the video platform Douyin, and the Chinese Communist Party are widely documented (such as in this report by an investigative committee of the French Senate). And like all social media platforms in China, Douyin is supervised by Party censors. In the past few years, for example, Douyin has been censoring content linked to the Uighur Muslim minority. The only content about the Uighurs that remains online is cultural in nature and paints a picturesque portrait to bring in tourists.

Videos in Mandarin that promote Tibetan culture have also met certain success in China, like those made by Tenzin Tsondu. The young shepherd reached near-celebrity status after a video of him wearing traditional garments went viral on Douyin in 2020. Historically, the Chinese Communist Party tends to like this kind of cultural content, and the Tourism Board of Litang recruited Tsondu as an “ambassador”.

“The Communist Party sees the culture of ethnic minorities as a threat”

What looks like a concerted effort to remove the Tibetan language from social media would be aligned with the political drive for cultural assimilation. Since Xi Jinping came to power in 2013, his government has pushed for minorities to assimilate to the Han ethnic majority. Historically, these assimilation measures have targeted the most autonomous ethnic groups like the Uighurs, the Mongols and the Tibetans. Even just speaking Tibetan can be seen as an act of defiance, says our Observer:

The Communist Party often talks about “ethnic harmony” and “ethnic unity”. In China, there are 56 ethnic minorities. “Ethnic unity” is used as a euphemism to assimilate other groups that are not ethnically Chinese to one Chinese nation, by which they mean one language, one nation. The Party sees the culture of ethnic minorities as a threat, as a form of subversion.

The aim is to eradicate other languages, cultures and religions. One of the reasons is because in Tibet we had widespread peaceful protests in 2008, which got a lot of international attention. In order to avoid a repeat of that, the Party is trying to erase our language and culture, and assimilate the younger generation of Tibetans so there is no criticism from inside.

A number of dissidents reported that the government goes after people who try to protect Tibetan culture and that some young Tibetans are pushed to go to boarding schools to learn Mandarin.

Opinion: Hopes and Dangers of new Tibet-China dialogue- A friendly warning

26 July 2024, Phayul, Vijay Kranti

Beijing’s record of conducting dialogue and establishing contacts with others throughout its history has never been happy for the other side. Skeptics point out that whenever Beijing showed interest in a ‘dialogue’ with Dharamshala, the Chinese leaders used it only to buy time for further fortifying their grip on Tibet or to cool down the growing international pressure on matters related to Tibet – or both. Now sudden interest shown by President Xi Jinping’s China in starting a fresh dialogue with Dharamshala calls for a deep clinical scrutiny of what prompted President Xi Jinping to restart these negotiations?

Repeated claims by the senior most Tibetan exile leadership about ‘back channel’ talks being in progress with Beijing are an indication of a new round of Dharamshala-Beijing dialogue taking shape to settle the seven decade old conflict between the two sides. In his recent media statements Penpa Tsering, the ‘Sikyong’ (Tibetan title for the elected ‘President’ of the exiled Tibetan diaspora) has revealed that some behind the scene talks are being held with the Chinese leaders with the help of a third country. It’s understandable that the Sikyong refused to divulge either the name of the ‘third country’ or the identity of officials involved from either side. But his claim that these talks started with the initiative of the Chinese side deserves serious attention and calls for a deep clinical scrutiny of what prompted President Xi Jinping to restart these negotiations after having rejected every single point on which the Dalai Lama side has been resting its case for settlement of the Tibetan issue with Beijing.

Since the last official contact between Dharamshala and Beijing ended abruptly in 2010, Dalai Lama’s establishment in Dharamshala has been calling upon world governments to push Beijing to restart the dialogue – a demand which the Chinese side has been brushing aside with full contempt all these 14 years. Although the ruling elite among the ‘Central Tibetan Administration’ (CTA), also known as the ‘Tibetan Government-in-Exile’, looks enthusiastic over this new development about a fresh dialogue, many independent thinkers among the diaspora and the skeptical section among Tibet supporters are smelling a rat in this sudden change of mind on the part of Chinese leadership. The latter point out that China has never been sincere in its dealings and contacts with the Dalai Lama since Mao assimilated Tibet into China in 1951 through a forcibly signed ‘17-Point Agreement.’ China had signed this controversial ‘Agreement’ in Beijing with a visiting Tibetan delegation who, according to the erstwhile Dalai Lama establishment in Lhasa, was never authorized to sign any treaty or agreement on his behalf with Beijing. To the annoyance of the 16 year old Dalai Lama the signing of this ‘Agreement’ led to assimilation of Tibet into China without the knowledge or approval of his Lhasa government. Citing history of all subsequent contacts between Dharamshala and Beijing the skeptics claim that whenever Beijing showed interest in a ‘dialogue’ with Dharamshala, the Chinese leaders used it only to buy time for further fortifying their grip on Tibet or to cool down the growing international pressure on matters related to Tibet – or both.

Another historic example of this Chinese art of deception in the name of holding ‘dialogue’, though unrelated to Tibet, was late Chairman Mao’s invitation to a wide set of Uyghur leaders of East Turkistan who were violently resisting China's takeover of their country in 1949. After most of these leaders agreed to go to Beijing in an airplane, specially arranged by Mao, the plane mysteriously exploded in the midair and the entire Uyghur resistance leadership was wiped out to pave way for converting a free 'Republic of East Turkistan' into China's new colony 'Xinjiang'.

The last 2002-2010 dialogue too, which Beijing started with a big bang, unfortunately proved to be just a Chinese façade and ended up into a whimper. The Chinese leaders dragged it on for eight long years without moving an inch in any direction in spite of Dharamshala's high hopes on it. It is worth noting that before this dialogue started in 2002 the Chinese side had consistently remained indifferent for decades to Dalai Lama's appeals and offers for a dialogue. It was only because of the rising international pressure that Beijing finally agreed to talk to Dharamshala. In its resolution on Tibet on 6th July 2000 (text-0326) the European Parliament had put a three-year embargo on the Chinese government and had asked the EU governments to "give serious consideration to the possibility of recognizing the Tibetan Government in exile as the legitimate representative of the Tibetan people if, within three years, the Beijing authorities and the Tibetan government in exile have not, through negotiations organised under the aegis of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, signed an agreement on a new Statute for Tibet....".

Similarly the US Congress' decision to add the famous 'Tibet Policy Act of 2002' (TPA-2002) to its agenda too had shaken the Beijing leaders. As the EU Parliament embargo date started approaching and the US Congress started discussing TPA-2002, Beijing started its so called 'Dialogue' in 2002 and an over enthusiastic Dalai Lama's side joined it without involving the UN Secretary General or any other independent international agency. True to the Chinese nature, the dialogue remained a non-starter till its last day in 2010.

Behind the walls of 'Dialogue'

It took Dharamshala eight years to realize that while it was confident about some big breakthrough and was busy in bragging about the dialogue as its great achievement, the Chinese side was busy using these crucial years to fill up all such major gaps which stood in their way of foisting its final colonial grip over Tibet. To name a few: by agreeing to sit with the Tibetans for a 'dialogue' the Beijing leaders successfully deflated the growing European, American and most of other international anger over the non-resolution of Tibetan issue and the ever worsening human rights situation inside Tibet. On the material side, some major critical successes of Beijing during these years included completing the strategic target of spreading the Chinese infrastructure like roads and military network to the farthest corners of Tibet; developing a vast chain of new and modern cities and towns across Tibet to facilitate migration of millions of new Han settlers with the aim of reducing the Tibetans into a nearly meaningless minority in their own homeland. And, more than everything else, the Chinese government used this period to achieve the most unthinkable and technologically difficult target of connecting Tibetan capital Lhasa and the other major city Shigatse to China through its bullet train. This train has proved to be the final tool for making Tibet hospitable for the new Han settlers and a fast and reliable transportation mode for the People's Liberation Army (PLA) to transport hundreds of its tanks, armored vehicles and any number of military personnel to Tibet on any day of the year.

How China manipulated the Dalai Lama

Besides these achievements inside Tibet, the Beijing leaders also proved smarter than Dharamshala outside Tibet where Dalai Lama had laboriously developed a massive international network of Tibet supporters and Tibet Support Groups (TSG) across almost all continents over his five decades of his exile. It goes to the credit of Beijing leaders that they could successfully use the dialogue bonhomie to manipulate Dalai Lama and his CTA establishment to defuse the Tibet support movement across the world. The Chinese side also succeeded in creating deep friction and divisions among the Tibetan diaspora which already stood fragmented following Dalai Lama's decision to scale down his demand for 'Independence' of Tibet from the Chinese colonial rule to just 'genuine autonomy' for Tibet.

As the massive network of Tibet support groups across the world started making international news headlines by stopping or disrupting the Olympic-Torch's journey towards Beijing for the forthcoming Beijing-Olympics-2008, the Chinese leadership proved smart enough to convince the Dalai Lama to use his influence and charm to stop his supporters from their anti-China demonstrations in order to let the Beijing Olympics happen successfully. The anti-China sentiments among the Tibetan people living inside Chinese controlled Tibet too were so high at that time that anti-China demonstrations and riots erupted inside Tibet, months before the Beijing Olympics-2008 started. World was surprised to note that these Tibetan demonstrations spread to more than 54 cities and towns of Tibet. Interestingly, 52 of these 54 places belonged to those areas of original Kham and Amdo provinces of Tibet which China does not recognize as 'Tibet'. After occupying Tibet in 1951 Beijing had scooped out these areas out of original Tibet and had assimilated them into adjoining Chinese provinces of Yunnan, Sichuan, Gansu and Qinghai through a reorganization of Tibet in 1965.

A great Tibetan blunder

What came as a shock to many Tibetans and Tibet supporters was that in his enthusiasm to win the Chinese leaders' smiles and success for his ongoing dialogue with China, the Dalai Lama personally appealed to the Tibetan people inside Tibet as well as Tibet supporters across the world and persuaded them to stop their anti-China demonstrations. It was during this anti Beijing Olympics-2008 movement that the international Tibet support movement had recorded its highest popularity and efficacy by forcing the International Olympic Committee to abandon its traditional practice of carrying the Olympic Torch from Greece to the host country in an open international marathon. But in the checkered history of Tibet support movement the Tibetan leadership's over enthusiasm to please their Chinese dialogue partners also proved to be the watershed point when the movement started losing its steam and went on a path of demoralization and decline following the 2008 Beijing Olympics .

China's U-turn

And here comes the anti-climax. As soon as the Beijing Olympics ended successfully, the Beijing leaders were back in their original colours. They suddenly put a full stop at the ongoing Tibet-China dialogue and asked the delegation of Dalai Lama's representative to come back with a written statement of their expectations from Beijing in this dialogue. The community of Tibet watchers and sympathizers was shocked to realize that over first six years of the 'dialogue' the Chinese had not let the Tibetan side to even tell them what were their expectations from this 'dialogue'.

The 'dialogue' finally crashed with a loud thud two years later in 2010 when the Tibetan delegation was invited to Beijing to present its memorandum. The Chinese delegation took only a few minutes to reject the memorandum out rightly and closed the dialogue saying that the Tibetan memorandum was unacceptable because it is nothing but asking for separation of Tibet from China. Since the sudden death of this dialogue Dharamshala has been desperately trying to restart the dialogue despite Chinese rejections.

However, it is not also true that the Dalai Lama and Dharamshala have been always on the losing side in their direct dealings with Beijing. In late 1970s and early 1980s when late Deng Xiaoping was busy opening China to the outer world and gave impression that he was serious about settling the Tibetan issue with Dalai Lama but without the idea of 'Tibetan independence'. It was at that time that Dalai Lama succeeded in convincing the Chinese leaders to allow his representatives to freely visit Tibet to have a first-hand assessment of the situation. But the process was abruptly stopped by China and sent back Dharamshala's fifth delegation in the middle of its visit. The Beijing masters of Tibet were shocked to see Tibetan peoples' overwhelming welcome and support for Dalai Lama's representatives. While this experience gave a big impetus to the Dalai Lama's hopes about Tibet, it gave a good reason to the Chinese side to revise their strategy for taming its Tibetan subjects. Massive international propaganda generated by Dharamshala on the basis of these visits also further infuriated Beijing and made it highly skeptical about further links with Dalai Lama.

Is it a 'change of heart' in Beijing?

If Sikyong Penpa Tsering's claims about a 'back channel' contact and Beijing's own initiative for this new edition of dialogue are correct, then it is worth analyzing why Xi Jinping and his communist establishment are suddenly getting so keen about fresh negotiations with the Dalai Lama? There is no shortage of people among functionaries of CTA and those from the personal establishment of Dalai Lama who must be looking at this 'change of heart' on President Xi's part as his vulnerability to the American and European pressure on Tibet just like what happened in 2002. But knowing the present state of power balance between China and its Western foes, this euphoria has hardly any base to sustain itself. Today's ground reality is that power equations between China and the entire western block put together are just opposite of the conditions prevailing in 2002. In 2002 Beijing was still a rising power; was vulnerable to international opinion and pressures on issues like Tibet and; its grip over Tibet was still less than complete . In sharp contrast to the 2002 situation Dharamshala will now have to deal with an aggressive, arrogant and an all mighty Xi who is at the helm of a new China which is armed with an unprecedented financial, military and international clout. The vice like control of China on today's Tibet through its PLA; the Gestapo like Public Security Bureau (PSB) and; a massive network of digital and electronic surveillance system which controls every moving sentient thing, including poor Tibetan people inside today's Tibet, would leave hardly any meaningful elbow room for the Dalai Lama side in its negotiations on the dialogue table.

Hopes of the Dalai Lama

In my personal meetings with the two supreme Tibetan leaders during initial days of the 2002 dialogue His Holiness the Dalai Lama himself and Prof. Samdhong Rinpoche, who happened to be the most popular elected 'Kalon Tripa' (Prime Minister) of present day Tibet, both looked confident of positive results from the Dharamshala-Beijing dialogue. In my separate meetings, both of them told me more than once that their minimum expectation from this fresh contact with Chinese leadership was that the Chinese leadership will stop the ongoing process of destruction of Tibetan identity and that this new bonhomie between the two sides, aided by the international support for the Tibetan people, will force the Chinese leaders to ease the suffocating human rights situation being faced by the Tibetan people inside Tibet. But unfortunately, the ground situation on both counts went in just opposite direction and life of ordinary Tibetans inside Tibet went from bad to worse throughout the fateful eight years of the dialogue. Things look far worse today when President Xi has declared an open war against the Tibetan identity of Tibet and the people of Tibet living under his colonial control.

Dharamshala's appeals to Tibetan people inside Tibet and Tibet supporters on the international forums to stop their 'anti-China' demonstrations, especially against the visiting Chinese Presidents and other senior leaders have finally proved to be a serious diplomatic mistake. In my personal discussions with some very senior functionaries of the CTA I was told that a common complaint of the Chinese side during the dialogue process was that Dharamshala was playing double game by talking to the Chinese on one side and supporting the anti-China demonstrations by Tibetan people inside Tibet and the Tibet supporters outside Tibet on the other. The Chinese side refused the Tibetan argument that as people's democratic rights in India and other countries the Tibet support movement was self-initiated and was out of Dharamshala's command area. I was told that in response to this logic of Dharamshala the Chinese side told the delegation that it simply meant that the CTA was not the sole representative of the Tibetans and hence there was no point in talking to Dharamshala about whole of Tibet. As one of these senior leaders told me, Dharamshala's stand against such anti-China movement, especially its appeals to the TSGs to stop such demonstrations, was aimed at meeting this Chinese demand in order to keep the dialogue going.

Ever since President Xi took over control of China and Tibet the Dalai Lama and the 'Sikyong' (elected President) of CTA have been publicly expressing fears about imminent total destruction of Tibetan identity inside Tibet. Xi's open call to the communist cadres in Tibet for establishing 'Tibetan Buddhism with socialist character' has started a replay of Mao's same dreaded 'Cultural Revolution' which had led to destruction of every single Buddhist symbol from the public and private life of Tibetan citizens. Destruction of Buddhist statues across Tibet by the communist administrators today has revived the memories of the notorious 'Bamyan Act' of the Taliban in Afghanistan. China's new law which makes it mandatory to have written and paper-stamped approval of the local Chinese Communist Party office for every new incarnate Lama; Xi's draconian decision to snatch every Tibetan child, above age of 4, from their families and lodging them into jail like secluded Communist Party schools for communist brainwashing and pure Han upbringing and; rules like seven-year jail for possessing a photo of Dalai Lama in today's Tibet will hardly encourage any Tibetan or Tibet supporter to share hopes and enthusiasm of the pro-dialogue lobby of Dharamshala.

Dharamshala's shrinking elbow room

Even outside Tibet too, China's ever spreading tentacles over the Tibetan diaspora and his influence over international institutions is successively reducing the scope for the Tibetans and their supporters to force Xi to settle for an agreement which meets at least minimum expectations of Dalai Lama and the people of Tibet. For example, Tibetans, escaping from China controlled Tibet and joining the Dalai Lama establishment in exile as new refugees used to be the biggest source of a committed, dedicated and united human source to keep the Tibetan movement going. Since Dalai Lama escaped from the Chinese grip in Tibet in 1959 over 120 thousand Tibetans managed to escape from Tibet. In past decades somewhat around 2000 to 3000 Tibetans used to escape each year from Tibet via Nepal to reach India. A gentleman's agreement between the Nepal government, Indian government and the United Nation's High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) worked smoothly for decades to help the Tibetan escapees reaching India after scrutiny and debriefing by the Indian embassy in Kathmandu. But China's ever increasing influence over the Nepal government, especially during past few decades, has encouraged the Nepalese army, police and bureaucracy in the border areas to oblige their China friends by catching the escaping Tibetans and handing them back to the Chinese army.

As a result of change in Nepal's approach on this issue the annual outflow of Tibetans has now drastically reduced from a few thousands to just single digits for over a decade now. This has almost completely dried the lifeline of Dalai Lama's exile establishment. Akin to bleeding a human body to near white, this refugee drought has severely affected the Tibetan diaspora, especially the CTA in Dharamshala. This change is now more than visible in the functioning of the vast network of Tibetan schools and monasteries across India. The situation is so serious that even national ranking Tibetan monasteries like Drepung, Sera and Ganden at Karnataka in southern India are now forced to cater mainly to monks and students from Indian Himalayan states of Ladakh, Himachal and Arunachal Pradesh and Buddhist countries like Mongolia, Sri Lanka and Vietnam. The craze among the younger Tibetan refugees to migrate to greener pastures like USA, Canada and Europe has further added to the problems of CTA which is now feeling new challenge of attracting new youths among the diaspora and difficulty in holding on to its talented staff.

To make things worse for the Tibetan diaspora, Xi's communist establishment has found a good strategic use for the database the previous Beijing governments have been building up on the exile Tibetans. In past decades when the Dharamshala-Beijing contacts made things easier for the Tibetan refugees to visit their families back home, the Chinese authorities have been diligently building up a database of the refugee's family links inside Today's Tibet. There have been hundreds of instances when activist Tibetan exiles have complained about the Chinese authorities threatening and using their family members to force them return to Tibet or to stop their anti-China activities in exile. During my three yearlong series of international webinars on Tibet and China I personally had to deal with situations when some brilliant Tibetan activist or a scholar would express his or her inability to join the public discussion in the webinar for fears of safety of their family members inside Tibet.

Keeping in mind all these advantages in the hands of Xi's China it is imperative to see why Xi has suddenly become interested in talking to Dalai Lama? Also, what makes the CTA leaders so enthusiastic about the back door contacts and what results they are hopeful about the new edition of the Dharamshala-Beijing dialogue? As far as Dharamshala is concerned the Dalai Lama side has good reasons to be elated by the recent unanimous (almost) passage of Tibet related Acts in the US Congress in 2020 and 2024 which were also promptly signed into new laws respectively by President Trump and President Biden. While both of these laws call upon Beijing to settle the disputes with Dalai Lama through a dialogue they also categorically support and underline all those vital assertions of the Dalai Lama side which China has been rejecting outright and even broke the dialogue citing its objection to these points. For ordinary Tibetans too these new American laws have come as a great moral booster. To name some of these major points:

- Tibet is an 'occupied country' and Tibet is an 'unsettled' issue;
- China should settle the Tibetan dispute through negotiations with Dalai Lama, his representatives and the elected Tibetan leaders;
- Tibet was never a part of China in history;
- 'Tibet' means TAR plus all those areas of Tibet which have been assimilated in adjoining Chinese provinces of Yunnan, Sichuan, Gansu and Qinghai— and not just 'TAR' as claimed by China;

- The selection and appointment of Dalai Lama's reincarnation is exclusively the right of Dalai Lama himself and the people of Tibet and that China has no role to play in this. If any Chinese officials is found to indulge into this process then the new US laws oblige the President of USA and other concerned agencies to take action against them;

- China must respect religious values of Tibet and human rights of Tibetan people inside Tibet;

- All US governments must ensure that the projects funded by US agencies inside Tibet must not damage Tibetan environment and must not work against Tibetan people's human rights; and

- Unless the Chinese government agrees to the establishment of the USA Consulate in Lhasa no new Chinese Consulate offices in USA can be permitted.

No wonder these new US laws have come as a fresh shot in the arm of Dharamshala, especially after having seen China rejecting each of these points over past many decades. But one also wonders how susceptible or vulnerable Xi's China is actually going to prove against these assertions or claims of America and other friends of Dharamshala? After all, it is one thing for the US Congress or other pro-Tibet forums like the EU Parliament to pass any resolution on Tibet and China within their own four walls and an altogether different game to make China dance on these musical notes.

Dialogue "doomed to fail"- Jimmy Carter's prediction In real terms, the Chinese vulnerabilities look much farther from what is visible to the eye today because Dharamshala today holds practically no new card in its hands to play on the dialogue table. In his 'Five-Point Peace Plan' of 1988 the Dalai Lama has already made the offer to accept Tibet as a part of China under the Chinese constitution in return for 'genuine autonomy' for Tibet. Since then this has remained the 'bottom-line' of his approach on dialogue with China. True to his great diplomatic skills (Late) Lodi Gyaltzen Gyari, one of my best and lifelong friends among Tibetans, who was Dalai Lama's Special Envoy and the head of his negotiator team during the 2002-2010 Tibet-China dialogue, has described this vulnerability of Dharamshala through an interesting anecdote in his monumental book "THE DALAI LAMA'S SPECIAL ENVOY — Memoirs of a Lifetime in Pursuit of a Reunited Tibet" (Columbia University Press).

Lodi Gyari has given details of his meetings with former US President Jimmy Carter to seek his advice on the draft of Dalai Lama's 'Strasbourg Proposal' (more famous as Dalai Lama's 'five-Point Peace Plan'). In his typically diplomatic and respectable style President Carter pronounced Dalai Lama's approach as impractical and prone to failure unless it was suitably revised. Giving details of this meeting Lodi writes:

".....Finally he (Carter) put the document down and asked what the Dalai Lama's "bottom line" was. I responded: "Mr. President, this is His Holiness's bottom line." President Carter then replied that if that were true, we should begin by asking for something more. I explained to him that many of us felt the same way, but His Holiness remained adamant, declaring that he wasn't a politician but a Buddhist monk, and bargaining is not in his nature. His Holiness wanted to be straight forward and clear about what he was asking for. After listening carefully to my explanation, President Carter admiringly observed that if His Holiness's approach succeeded, it could revolutionize the field of negotiations....."

Time to be alert

Knowing China's history of handling negotiations with its foes and, more than that, keeping in view the aggressive and bullying style of President Xi's functioning, friends of Tibet like me would feel compelled to advise Dharamshala leaders to seriously look for and probe the reasons which make Xi interested in starting fresh dialogue after rejecting it so many times in the past. More so, because, unfortunately, most of things concerning today's Tibet don't appear to be stacked in favour of Dharamshala and its ageing leader, the Dalai Lama. Frankly speaking there are not enough signs on the Tibetan horizon which can assure one that Dharamshala has enough of skills, tools and advantages to squeeze out any meaningful favours or concessions from Xi's China?

Xi's design on the Dalai Lama

Dharamshala leaders today cannot afford to ignore the fact that unlike Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao in whose time the previous dialogue was initiated in 2002, President Xi today heads a China that is too powerful and influential to care for even an iota of international niceties or rule of law. After having succeeded in putting entire occupied Tibet under his iron vice the last goal of President Xi now is to mollify the ageing Dalai Lama and lure him to the Chinese umbrella. Once the Dalai Lama side accepts Chinese assurances it would remove the last hurdles in his way of imposing the next incarnation of Dalai Lama of CCP's choice on Tibet. In such a situation the chapter of Tibet for the international community is bound to be closed for ever.

And to achieve this goal on the dialogue table we can expect Xi to promise and offer anything to the Tibetan side – even the moon and the sun. The living generation of the world community, including the Tibetans in Dharamshala and Lhasa, has already witnessed the levels of sincerity of China and its communist leaders about their own promises and assurances on Hong Kong. Unfortunately the world has already experienced the levels of courage and guts (or lack of both?) on the part of world powers and the rest of world when none could dare ask Beijing leaders to deliver on their promises they had made to the people of Hong Kong while taking over the colony from the British. After firsthand experience of how China has manipulated and mutilated its own promises on 'n' number of occasions since the Tibetan delegation signed on the '17-Point Agreement' with China in 1951, the latest example of Hong Kong should have been enough to make Dharamshala and its pro-dialogue advisors to understand the level of sincerity of Chinese leaders.

Friends or Enemies?

One word of caution which every friend and well-wisher of Tibet would like to share with policy makers in Dharamshala is that they must remain cautious about such individuals, governments and groups who might be hunting for big personal gains by offering the present Dalai Lama to Xi's China on a platter. Such an unfortunate situation will, no doubt, solve China's Tibet problem for ever, but it will also push Tibet into an irretrievable situation for all times in its future history. Unfortunately, this warning is not without a base because Tibet has witnessed many such cases in its recent history when a Tibetan minister like (late) Nagapo Ngawang Jigme, rather than helping Tibet, preferred to trade off Tibet's interests in return for personal comforts and worldly gains.

There is also no shortage of governments, individuals and institutions which appeared to be strong supporters and friends of Tibet on their face, but took no time in shifting their priorities to winning favours from Beijing. The most glaring example has been of a prominent German foundation which spent tons of money on organizing series of international Tibet support conferences across the world. Once it established its credentials as a well-wisher of Tibetan diaspora, it took on itself a gigantic campaign of training Tibetan youth leaders on issues like 'autonomy' and 'democracy' through a long series of five-star residential seminars and conferences. It was already too late for the Tibetan community before they realized that the entire campaign was aimed at brainwashing an entire generation of Tibetan youth leaders and weaning them away from their national agenda of 'independence' from China. But before the Tibetan diaspora could understand the real game of this organization it publicly shifted its loyalties to the government of China leaving Tibet and the Tibetans high and dry. The worst impact of this brainwashing campaign was that hitherto a highly united Tibetan diaspora got deeply fractured and divided between the 'Autonomy' (Umay Lam) and the 'Independence' (Rangzen) camps who could have otherwise coexisted without such a friction. It is also not a coincidence that this brainwashing campaign on Tibetan youth leaders severely damaged the Tibetan society's resolve to fight together for their country.

No hope from the international community

Tibetans cannot forget that the world community in general and the world powers in particular have remained so fearful of China's anger that ever since Mao sent his PLA first time in 1949 to invade Tibet they hardly went ahead beyond offering some verbal generosity to the suffering people of Tibet. Tibetans must also be wary of the fact that today when most countries, including the super powers, feel threatened by a far more powerful China and the danger of a world war is looming large over the world then it is all the more in the interest of international community to see a closure of the Tibetan issue on whatever terms – suitable to Tibetans or not. A publicly advertised settlement between Xi and Dalai Lama with a glaring photo-op ceremony might get front page coverage across the world media next day. But it will also seal the fate of Tibet and Tibetan people permanently. Once the photo-op is over and front page news headlines shift to other world issues then any complaints of Tibetans after that day are bound to be brushed off by the world community as a 'petty internal matter' of China.

The Tibetan Struggle at 70: Challenges and Opportunities

26 July 2024, Australian Outlook, Dr. Sonika Gupta

On 6 July, the 14th Dalai Lama turned 89, having lived for the last 65 years in exile in India. The Dalai Lama is the physical embodiment of the Tibetan nation and his advancing age brings forth urgent questions for the future of the Tibetan struggle.

In 1959, His Holiness had to flee Lhasa under Chinese persecution and has never returned to Tibet. Since 1959, thousands of Tibetans have followed His Holiness into exile. This exiled population is estimated to be around 130,000, a fraction of Tibet's current population, and has a crucial role in amplifying and keeping the Tibetan struggle alive.

With the help of the Indian government and other international donors, there exists an extensive infrastructure of 40 Tibetan settlements in India that comprise monasteries, Tibetan schools, Tibetan medicine hospitals and dispensaries, cultural institutions for performing arts, handicrafts, and literary production. These settlements are sustained by agriculture, handicrafts, small businesses, and overseas remuneration of Tibetans resettled in western nations such as Australia, US, Canada, Switzerland, France, Japan, and others. In the settlements, Tibetans in exile have consistently strived to keep alive Tibetan Buddhism, language, and its cultural traditions under very challenging conditions. These settlements are governed by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) in Dharamshala, a democratically elected Tibetan-Parliament-in-Exile, representing all Tibetans. The trajectory of Tibetan democratisation in exile, though faced with many challenges, speaks to Tibetan people's democratic aspirations and provides a stark contrast to Chinese authoritarianism.

However, the Tibetan cause has suffered from a lack of international political support in addressing the issue of the Chinese occupation of Tibet. A 2023 Freedom House report identified Tibet as the "least free country in the world." Chinese religious and political repression and ethnic discrimination in Tibet is well documented, though has yet to produce a commensurate global political response. Since the 1990s, Tibet's political fate has been held hostage to China's increasing economic and political accommodation in the international system. Consequently, since the 1990s, Tibet has largely been framed as a human rights issue or more recently as one of cultural genocide. While this brings attention to the increasing religious repression in Tibet, it skirts the question of Tibetan self-determination. As voiced by the Dalai Lama, as well as CTA, there is a persistent quest for "genuine autonomy" for all Tibetan people in all Tibetan areas under Chinese rule. At the same time, there are Tibetans all over the world who aspire to total independence of Tibet from China. A decision on either of these choices has to be made solely by the Tibetan people. The Chinese state at the moment offers no avenues of discussion on any possibility for resolution of the Tibet issue, claiming Tibet as an integral part of China and denying any repression. Since the Covid-19 pandemic, a window has opened with the US incrementally stepping up its support for Tibet. There have been a number of significant developments on the issue in the US with the potential to lay the groundwork for more robust international support for Tibet. One such development is the issue of the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama. It is certain that the 14th Dalai Lama's eventual succession will become a battle between China and the Tibetans for political and religious legitimacy, with long term implications for the future of the Tibetan struggle. Recognising this, in 2020, the US passed the Tibet Policy Support Act, unequivocally declaring that the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama is a religious issue, solely to be decided by the Tibetan people, brooking no involvement of the Chinese government. This Act goes beyond the US position of recognising human rights abuses in Tibet and acknowledges the religious agency of the Tibetans to decide their own affairs.

Historically, the lineages of Tibetan lamas have played an integral role in shaping the geo-politics of Tibet, Mongolia, and China. This is likely to be repeated on a much larger stage when the 14th Dalai Lama passes away. The 15th reincarnation will have an unprecedented political context far beyond the borders of China and Tibet, and will have foreign policy implications for US, India, Japan, Mongolia, Taiwan, Russia, Bhutan, Nepal.

The Dalai Lama has declared that he will not “reincarnate” in occupied Tibet. This leaves open the possibility of the 15th reincarnation in other areas where significant populations of Tibetan Buddhists reside. This includes Mongolia, Bhutan, Nepal, and the entire Indian Himalayan belt from Ladakh to Sikkim to Arunachal Pradesh. It is certain that the China will declare their own candidate for the Dalai Lama, as they did for the 11th Panchen Lama. In 1995, the Dalai Lama recognised six year old Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as the 11th reincarnation of the Panchen Lama. Within 72 hours of being identified, the Chinese authorities had kidnapped the boy and his family. China then introduced Gyaltsen Norbu as their choice for the Panchen Lama who continues to occupy the lineage.

Norbu is a member of the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference that advises China’s United Front Work Department tasked with intelligence gathering, influence operations, and co-opting elites in Tibet, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Xinjiang to neutralise political opposition to the Communist Party of China. The Chinese Panchen Lama enjoys little legitimacy among Tibetans. However, over the last three decades, China has worked systematically to tighten its grip on the system by passing multiple decrees stipulating that any “reincarnation” must be approved by the state. In this context, the 2020 Tibet Policy Support Act and the subsequent 2024 Tibet Resolve Act have become significant in shaping the US and possibly a global response to the next reincarnation.

The Resolve Tibet Act, signed into law by President Joe Biden on 12 July 2024 with overwhelming bipartisan support, promises enhanced US support for the Tibetan cause. The Resolve Act has three significant provisions worth noting. Firstly, it provides a statutory definition of Tibet to include Tibetan areas outside of the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) of China and in Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan provinces. This aligns with the CTA’s long-standing demand of recognising these areas as part of Tibet in any solution to the Tibetan issue. TAR was formed in 1965 by separating Central Tibet from Tibetan areas of present Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan provinces. The Dalai Lama and the CTA have consistently rejected this fragmentation of Tibet by China. The Resolve Act territorially maps contemporary Tibet to its cultural and historic space in a substantive recognition of the Dalai Lama’s position.

Secondly, the Resolve Act also acknowledges China’s active disinformation campaign concerning Tibetan history, presenting Tibet as a part of China since ancient times. Recognising this, the Act tasks the US Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues to counter this narrative. Finally, the Resolve Act intends to build international opinion on Tibet towards a negotiated settlement and demands that China resume dialogue with the Dalai Lama that was suspended in 2010.

While it would be too ambitious to imagine that the Tibet issue may become a core issue in any future US-China diplomatic effort, the political support for Tibet in Congress can definitely be leveraged to create more institutional checks on China’s repressive policies in Tibet, and greater international concert on support for the Tibetan community, both inside Tibet and globally can leverage this support for the crucial upcoming issue of reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama.

In the next few years, the Tibetan movement is poised for a transformative change as it negotiates the traditionally destabilising process of reincarnation. Global support recognising sole Tibetan agency in recognising the next Dalai Lama would be crucial to the future of the Tibetan movement and the Tibetan nation.

Inaction, or complicity? Chinese authorities turn a blind eye towards restrictions on Tibetan language

24 July 2024, International Campaign For Tibet

Tibetans inside Tibet are circulating videos objecting to the fact that Douyin, one of the most important streaming and social media platforms in China, is blocking Tibetan-language broadcasts. Chinese authorities have not responded to these objections, revealing a new aspect of the PRC’s efforts to undermine the use of Tibetan and replace it with Mandarin.

Livestreaming has become the most popular online retail sales avenue in the People’s Republic of China, but Tibetans are facing discrimination from platforms which, like Douyin, restrict the usage of Tibetan. The list of these platforms includes major Chinese sites such as Kuaishou, Bilibili, and Talkmate.

Restrictions on spoken Tibetan

Tibetans use Chinese platforms that provide facilities for messaging, reels posting, playing music, ecommerce and livestreaming for discussion on topics that are seen not “sensitive” to the authorities; many of the major social media and streaming sites used in other countries are blocked in China. Younger Tibetan entrepreneurs have embraced livestreaming retail sales to capture the Tibetan market, selling items such as Tibetan garments, Dzi beads, and religious artifacts. Visitors who have traveled to Tibet recently reported that online business has been very lucrative for some of these Tibetan businesspeople.

Recently, however, videos have emerged on Tibetan-language social media in which Tibetans complain about Douyin preventing them from livestreaming in Tibetan. One such livestreamer is heard saying in an undated video, which has been subsequently posted on Youtube:

"Today, I have to mention that I am forced to speak out. Today, I want to ask whether our Douyin company holds more power or is it the nation, or whether Douyin company is more powerful than the legal system? Or does Douyin company have more power or does the government? What is it? For example, my question is, to give an example, our country's very good policies give protection for a nationality's cultural preservation and promotion of a nationality's language. The state really supports these, as does the legal system, and the government, too, supports them. Therefore, why is Douyin company blocking (the livestreaming) in our language when we speak in Tibetan? I want to ask this here. It will not do [for me] not to ask this. Now, the state is saying we must promote a nationality's language, so how can our nationality's language be promoted? Where should we go, residing in our villages and speaking our language?"

The Dharamsala-based Tibetan Centre for Human Rights & Democracy also mentions the plight of Tibetan medical practitioners who are unable to use Tibetan in their online consultations. A doctor who was forced to shut down online consultation is quoted as saying:

"I may be a small-time Tibetan doctor, but my medical expertise has never been in question. I encounter numerous patients who self-medicate for headaches and other illnesses with painkillers without seeking medical advice. Many seriously ill individuals and those with health issues seek my guidance. With the prohibition on using the Tibetan language, I am forced to use Chinese, and since my patients are Tibetan, especially the elderly and illiterate youth, including farmers and nomads, they struggle to understand me when I speak in Chinese. What purpose does speaking Chinese serve if they cannot comprehend it? As a result, I have stopped my online broadcasts."

In 2022, RFA Tibetan reported that multilingual learning app Talkmate and video streaming app Bilibili removed postings in Tibetan from their platforms. TCHRD also reported that Kuaishou imposed restrictions in Tibetan.

Sources inside Tibet were not able to confirm whether these videos circulating on social media outside of Tibet are recent or whether they are old postings, as the restrictions on the usage of Tibetan on online Chinese platforms have been in place for years.

Restrictions on written Tibetan

Beyond the restrictions on Tibetan-language streaming, Tibetan netizens have noticed restrictions on comments written in Tibetan as well.

In a comment in Chinese posted on the popular platform "WeChat public accounts" (公众号; "gongzhong hao"), one netizen (PiaoBoDZ) had written, "Although many comments are written in the mother tongue [meaning Tibetan], it is like throwing stone into the ocean."

A message by "PiaoBoDZ" on a WeChat post complaining about not being able to post in Tibetan.

In March 2021, one Tibetan netizen posted a message on the Chinese platform Douban stating that Douyin had rejected an image as being "not suitable for the public". The image was a picture of a Tibetan-language inscription of a popular poem by the sixth Dalai Lama, Tsangyang Gyatso (b. 1683).

Screenshot of the image rejected by Douyin.

Tibetans have noted that even nicknames in Tibetan are not being approved by Douyin. In what seems to be a clarification from the platform in May 2024, in response to a question about why the platform rejects usernames with Tibetan characters Douyin says, "Our technical team worked day and night, and after a lot of research and practice, we finally found the central solution for processing Tibetan. The new review strategy no longer regards Tibetan as sensitive information."

Official inaction over abuse of Tibetan language rights

Tibetan netizens, even while objecting to the online platforms, are differentiating between the action of Douyin and other online platforms and the policies of the Chinese government, expressing hope that the authorities will intercede on their behalf because of their "good policies." This rhetorical position may be necessary to protect them from being seen as critical of the Chinese government.

The regulation governing livestreaming is the one issued by the Chinese State Administration of Radio and Television on June 8, 2022, in which Article 12 of this Code of Conduct for Online Presenters says, "Online presenters shall use the nation's common spoken and written language in accordance with standardized writing methods and meanings."

However, Chinese officials have said that online presenters can use any language they want. At a press conference in Beijing on achievements and measures on ethnic unity and progress in the new era on August 29, 2022, Zhao Yong, then deputy director of the National Ethnic Affairs Commission, defended the Chinese policy of promoting Mandarin maintaining that it does not impact the promotion of non-Chinese languages. In response to a question on China "promoting the use of Mandarin in ethnic minority areas such as Xinjiang and Tibet" might be "detrimental to the development of ethnic minority languages and cultures," Zhao said, "while popularizing Mandarin in accordance with the law, the Chinese government fully respects and protects the freedom of ethnic minorities to use their own languages, creating conditions for them to learn and use their own languages."

He further said, "And as for how to protect the languages and cultures of ethnic minorities, I think supporting their use is the best method of protection" adding, "In short, there is absolutely no obstacle for ethnic minorities in learning and using their own languages in their work and lives."

If this indeed is the official policy, then there is no implementation when it comes to the Tibetans. The authorities have been turning a deaf ear to the appeals being made by the Tibetan online presenters.

Livestreaming platforms fulfilling CCP's political agenda

One reason for the Chinese government not protecting the rights of the Tibetans to use their own language on such online platforms is because these restrictions fulfill the Chinese government's political agenda of undermining the study of Tibetan while making Mandarin the dominating language even among Tibetans.

Indicating the anguish that Tibetans feel about the erosion of the Tibetan language and the mainstreaming of Chinese, several self-immolators have, in their last words or statements, referred to the importance of protecting their language. As he lay dying following his self-immolation in 2012, monk Ngawang Norphel said: "Every nationality needs freedom, language and tradition. Without language, what would be our nationality? [Should we then] call ourselves Chinese or Tibetan?"

The case of Tibetan language rights advocate Tashi Wangchuk having to undergo five years of imprisonment and even now continuing to face denial of his freedom, even after formal release is another example of denial of language rights. He is among a younger generation in Tibet who have prioritized protection of the Tibetan language.

Wangchuk was arrested in early 2016, two months after he was featured in a New York Times video and article in 2015 criticizing Chinese cultural and educational policies on Tibetans. He stood trial in January 2018, and was subsequently given a five-year sentence. In the New York Times video posted in November 2015, Wangchuk complained that Chinese "government authorities actively block the teaching and studying of the Tibetan language." He stressed the importance of Tibetans having access to education in the Tibetan language and his intention to file a lawsuit against the authorities for not enabling this. He further amplifies the thinking of the Tibetan self-immolators telling the New York Times, "They didn't just set themselves on fire because of some family issues or something. I believe they also saw culture disappearing and other cultural problems. But we don't have ways to solve these problems. I want to try to use the People's Republic of China's laws to solve the problem."

In its 2024 report, Freedom in the World, Freedom House reported, "The online censorship and monitoring systems in place across China are applied more stringently in Tibet, while censorship of Tibet-related keywords on apps like WeChat has become more sophisticated. The use of Tibetan language is banned on a range of social media apps, particularly ones that use streaming and live communication services."

Douyin is China's domestic version of the controversial TikTok, and both are owned by the Bytedance. In April 2024 Congress passed a legislation banning TikTok in the United States if Bytedance doesn't sell its stake by January of 2025. Earlier, in 2022, Senate had passed a bill that prohibits certain individuals from downloading or using TikTok on any device issued by the United States or a government corporation. TikTok is suspected of being a tool in the Chinese Communist Party's long arm of authoritarianism. TikTok reportedly "instructs its moderators to censor videos that mention Tiananmen Square, Tibetan independence," according to a 2019 report in The Guardian quoting leaked documents detailing the site's moderation guidelines. In one instance of TikTok being used to harass Tibetans in diaspora, a young Tibetan American student received a series of derogatory comments within hours of posting a video of herself in Tibetan clothes on TikTok. The posts ranged from standardized CCP propaganda to slurs, and more.

Echoes from the Tibetan Youth Convention: A growing experience

24 July 2024, FNVA, Tenzing Dhamdul

I recall checking my inbox and receiving an email from the National Democratic Institute (NDI) to attend the Tibetan Youth Convention in Dharamshala, as I had previously attended several of their events, including the Tibet Youth Day event last year. I was originally hesitant to join because I had already cancelled my participation at the International Tibet Youth Forum 2024 a few weeks ago because I had previously attended the forum in 2023, and on top of that, I had several commitments at Foundations for Non-violent Alternatives (FNVA) to fulfil. However, when I discussed this invitation with my trustees at the Foundation for Nonviolent Alternatives (FNVA). They insisted on my participation because two of our research interns, both V-TAGgers, were also scheduled to attend the International Tibet Youth Forum in Dharamshala and saw this as an opportunity where I would learn and grow. I was curious to learn more about the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), also known as the Tibetan Government in Exile, which was one of the main topics of the youth conference.

Can the US 'Resolve Tibet Act' Make a Difference?

24 July 2024, The Diplomat, Marie Miller and Tenzin Lhadon

The act takes a landmark step in challenging the CCP's historical revisionism. But the U.S. should be prepared to offer concrete support to the Tibetan community, which is already beginning to feel the CCP's retaliation.

It's a narrative that's all too familiar: Nationalist world leaders claiming historical sovereignty over territory, weaponizing revised history to justify invasion.

In 1950, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) acted upon its self-declared inheritance over Tibet, imposing a treaty that officially annexed the region. Following the 1959 Tibetan uprising against the CCP, and the escape of the Dalai Lama to Dharamshala, India, the iron fist only tightened. The Tibetan government-in-exile estimates that in the 20 years following the uprising, 1.2 million Tibetans died as a result of China's policies, while still many more languished in prison.

Historic revisionism is the basis for the same predatory rhetoric Xi Jinping's government uses today as it builds entire villages in Bhutan, claims ownership over northern India's Arunachal Pradesh as "South Tibet," and threatens Taiwan with militaristic drills and mock missile strikes. Revisionist history is laden with propagandistic undertones – and it's a threat to self-determination, culture, and human life.

Today, with the ink of President Joe Biden's signature drying on the Resolve Tibet Act of 2024, the United States has an opportunity to explicitly – and officially – set the narrative straight. His signature marks a testy politicization of the Tibetan cause by the executive branch. As this law is implemented, however, the U.S. should be prepared to offer concrete support to the Tibetan community, which is already beginning to feel the CCP's retaliatory crackdown.

The CCP portrays an image of China as diverse-yet-"blended," contained by borders it claims are inherited from "ancient times." By 1950, however, the Tibetan government had enjoyed 37 years of declared independence from Qing rule. Floundering for territorial security and fearing the same fissured fate of the Soviet Union, the CCP implemented assimilationist policies in claimed territories. This included the shuttering of local Tibetan schools and the rise of monolingualistic state-run residential education for Tibetan children as young as four, the destruction of monasteries, and mass arrests of those – including monks – who protested environmentally damaging policies. Authorities took aim not only at ideological dissidents but at the very ethnic and religious identities of the Tibetan community.

Undoing the methodical rewriting of history is no easy feat, especially as U.S. policy on Tibet has been historically arrhythmic: Since the 1960s, when Tibetan lamas first won the hearts of the American public as counselors to counterculture protesters, the executive branch frequently criticized congressional support for the Tibetan cause.

In spite of then-President George W. Bush's assertion that his administration had the right not to implement multiple provisions of the law, the Tibetan Policy Act of 2002 was eventually included in appropriations law. Amid the COVID-ridden tension of China-U.S. relations, the Tibet Policy Act of 2020 promised to slap Magnitsky sanctions on all officials of the Chinese government meddling in the selection of the next Dalai Lama. Both landmark policies called for dialogue between the CCP and the Dalai Lama, yet the meat of the legislation lay in specific funding programs for the Tibetan communities-in-exile, including support for uncensored news outlets and scholarships for cultural preservation.

Until now, China's territorial claims have officially been left unchallenged by the United States, for fear of risking increased tension between Washington and Beijing. Marking a quiet transition from the previous precedent of unspoken acquiescence to CCP-defined borders, however, the State Department's 2023 human rights report has dropped previous affirmations that Tibet is part of China.

Congress now seeks a definitive political re-write. Bolder than its predecessors, the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act – also known as the “Resolve Tibet Act” – makes it official U.S. policy that the CCP's claim to Tibetan territory as “part of China since ancient times” is “historically inaccurate.”

One scholar noted the political weight of U.S. leadership in affirming self-determination – it could encourage India to speak up against the CCP's territorial claims to Tibet. In the wake of the bill's passage, former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Representative Michael McCaul traveled to India to meet with the 14th Dalai Lama, followed by engagements with a newly re-elected Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

This visit was met with strong condemnation by the Chinese Foreign Ministry, which declared that China will take “resolute measures” to protect its sovereignty. In response to the passing of a truly “strong policy supporting Tibet,” first promised during Biden's 2020 campaign, Chinese authorities have intensified their crackdown: As Biden signed the Resolve Tibet Act into law, CCP authorities responded by ordering the closure of Jigme Gyaltsen Vocational High School, for “undisclosed reasons.” This school, reputed for its specialized Tibetan language studies, maintained a rich repository of Tibetan literature.

When the U.S. politicizes human rights, it will not always feel the repercussions. However, the imprisoned community will. The Resolve Tibet Act must take their fate into consideration as well. For example, concerned voices of the Tibet Policy Institute pointed to the bill's lack of substantive policy response to urgent issues such as the dramatic increase of forced relocation of rural Tibetans.

The CCP relies on the distortion of history to infringe upon Tibetan self-determination and justify its ethnonationalist project. An act of political affirmation is necessary to challenge a historical narrative that justifies a predatory status quo. Yet challenging is only the first step – as China begins to enact its “resolute measures,” the U.S. must be prepared to take responsibility for the reactions it is stirring, offering substantive support to the Tibetan community it is inadvertently putting in harm's way.

China's Leaders Just Held a Third Plenum. So What?

23 July 2024, Foreign Policy

On July 18, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) concluded the Third Plenum of its 20th Party Congress. Held in a secured military conference hotel on the western outskirts of Beijing, proceedings closed with a ritual appearance by top leader Xi Jinping. Third Plenums, so called because they're the third meeting of the party's five-year cycles, cover economic policy; outcomes are scrutinized by cadres and global businesses alike.

This Third Plenum duly addressed the economy but also broke from precedent: When the conclave wasn't scheduled during the accustomed time last fall, speculation swirled around delays due to party purges and economic headwinds. With the session finally finished, we can now parse speeches and documents for insights into Beijing's economic thinking—and gauge how CCP institutions have fared under Xi's norm-bending rule.

One recurring catchphrase this session has been “reform and opening up”—a term with a rich history but invoked today in circumstances starkly different from the time of its original coinage. In 1978, paramount leader Deng Xiaoping was picking up the pieces after Mao Zedong's chaotic rule. Deng sought to create stable conditions for economic growth. He sidelined Maoist cadres advocating “class struggle” and promoted reformers keen on economic experimentation. The 1978 Third Plenum keynote speech was Deng's victory lap. In his clipped Sichuanese accent, speaking at the same military hotel, Deng called for China to open itself to foreign capitalists and overseas manufacturing firms. This new “reform and opening up” policy drove decades of growth, lifting the masses from poverty and integrating the People's Republic with the global economy.

While official meetings were erratic under Mao, Deng sought a steadier rhythm. The terrors of the Cultural Revolution were subsiding; cadres found a certain solace in bureaucratic rituals. The headline event of the party calendar is the National Congress; in the pattern set after Mao's death, it is held usually in October of years ending with 2 and 7. (Xi, for instance, ascended as CCP general secretary in 2012, gained a second term in 2017, and an unprecedented third in 2022.) At a full Congress, thousands of delegates convene in Beijing to ratify decisions about leadership and ideology, while 99 million party members look on.

After the Congress concludes, subsidiary plenums are called over the ensuing five-year span until the next full session. These intermediate meetings typically convene a few hundred CCP bigwigs and selected experts and have historically been held five to nine times (most commonly seven) before the following Congress half a decade later. Plenums typically cover party appointments (First Plenum), government personnel (Second), economic reform (Third), party-building activities (Fourth), fixing a new Five-Year Plan (Fifth), management of culture and history (Sixth), and a closing summation (Seventh) before the next Congress. Each meeting also disposes of sensitive party business arising in the interim. Since the Second Plenum in early 2023, several members of Xi's top team—including ministers of defense and foreign affairs—have vanished into the CCP's disciplinary apparatus, snared in graft and other indiscretions. At this plenum, their fates were finalized. Some offenders, stripped of party membership, now face criminal trial. Others got off more leniently: Last week, former Foreign Minister Qin Gang, who was disappeared for a year, formally lost membership of the elite Central Committee. But in an official document, he kept the appellation "comrade"—demotion without total disgrace. Such individual intrigues ultimately matter less than the overall tone: the "party line" and "main melody" of propaganda. In earlier eras, plenum themes reflected a more collective leadership. Today, that agenda closely follows the will of Xi himself.

Ever since Deng's 1978 breakthrough set the template, observers have eagerly watched Third Plenums for portents of change. Results have always varied. Over the 1980s, one Third Plenum widened economic reforms from the countryside to the cities, but, with inflation rising, the next Third Plenum tightened statist wage controls and commodity price caps. After the Tiananmen Square crackdown in June 1989 froze political reforms, the 1993 Third Plenum signaled that economic reforms would continue: The communiqué made rhetorical room for capitalism by advocating a "socialist market economy." This turn of phrase translated into epochal change: the dismantling of many state-owned enterprises and the end of "iron rice bowl" welfare security for more than 20 million people. The Third Plenums in 2003 and 2008 were, in hindsight, milquetoast: missed opportunities to update China's growth model and rectify an unruly (and sometimes greedy) party apparatus.

When Xi took over in 2012, he had a mandate from his colleagues to secure the CCP's future by taming corruption and enacting structural reforms. Xi's first Third Plenum as leader—in November 2013—was met with high expectations. The conclave announced big changes: a plan to end the one-child policy and a determination to let market forces take a "decisive" role in the economy. Outside observers, squinting to see China's economic modernization tracking toward convergence with the West, hailed the plenum as a masterstroke and Xi as a bold "reformer."

The one-child policy was duly scrapped after several years. But the CCP soured on market mechanisms after Chinese stocks swooned in 2015, threatening the stability of the broader economy. The state responded with heavy-handed measures: strong-arming equity sales and detaining financial reporters. Meanwhile, party institutions grew more visible in everyday life and acted more assertively toward private businesses. Crackdowns snared rights lawyers and journalists; government regulators humbled China's booming tech sector. Politics took priority—and command—over economics. By 2018, Xi had decided to abolish term limits for the presidency of the People's Republic, a post held concurrently with the more important role of CCP general secretary. Though the position is a state title—technically outside the party bureaucracy and calendar—this move seemingly disturbed the regular rhythms of party politics. The Third Plenum in 2018 fell early, landing in February rather than the fall. Unusually, that meeting focused on personnel rather than economic issues.

Today, a look back on Xi's inaugural Third Plenum in 2013 shows the limitations of prognosticating based on that or any other party meeting. Some plans were implemented. In other cases, unexpected events may have overtaken the best intentions. But whatever the rhetoric, more than a decade later, the reality is trending toward more government intervention in the economy rather than less. A reformer Xi has been—but rarely in the direction Western observers might have hoped. Since Xi took power and held his inaugural Third Plenum at the expected time, two subsequent Third Plenums have fallen outside their usual season. Xi is now in power indefinitely, having amassed more formal titles and personal influence than any leader since Mao.

At the recently concluded Third Plenum, Xi and his comrades affirmed the expected themes with range of slogans, with some—such as "reform and opening up" and "Chinese-style modernization"—reflecting Deng's legacy. Documents highlighted security and control while also calling for "high-quality development" in key sectors, such as green tech and semiconductors, believed to be crucial to future growth. Some perennial problems have resurfaced again after being mentioned in past Third Plenums but never faced.

In 2003 and 2013, communiqués suggested a property tax to raise local government revenue for health and welfare spending, but no comprehensive policy resulted. Now, a crumbling real estate sector threatens to tip into crises in local government debt and the economy at large. In 2024, the CCP sounds more tepid today toward market forces than in 2013, reprising the 1993 slogan of a “socialist market economy” while calling for “market order” and making scant mention of the private sector.

Even in 1978, the important politicking actually happened behind the scenes before Deng’s inaugural Third Plenum. In Deng’s keynote speech ending the session, even as he exhorted his comrades to “liberate [their] thinking” and “look forward,” he made no mention of the phrase “reform and opening up,” instead quoting from Lenin and praising Mao. Deng framed his new initiatives through Mao’s language, saying that to pursue true Marxism, cadres must “seek truth from facts.” Deng’s call for a foreign investment law came last in a list of draft legislation covering routine topics such as forestry, factories, and labor. The radical impact of Deng’s reforms only became apparent over time, through actions rather than words.

So it may have been with the Third Plenum in 2013, when Xi framed his ambitions in the language of his immediate predecessors. Whatever is said at the dais, Chinese policymaking ultimately depends as much—or more—on personalities, and the pressure of events, as on showpiece meetings of party or state.

This year’s arrhythmic Third Plenum has, so far, yielded a 5,000-word communiqué and a “decision” document, along with a profusion of records, commentary, and clarifications to elucidate the CCP’s will. These hail Xi’s “comprehensively deepening reforms” but have offered few specifics so far. Whatever the future of China’s politics and economy, Xi’s continuing central role in guiding both appears ensured.

When Tibet Sought China’s Help Against “Napoleon of India” – The Incredible “Twist In Tale” From Today’s Scenario

22 July 2024, The EurAsian Times, Shubhangi Palve

India recently showcased the ‘Zorawar’ light battle tank, designed for high-altitude warfare. Jointly developed by the DRDO and Larsen & Toubro (L&T) Limited, Zorawar is tailored to meet the Indian Army’s needs in the eastern Ladakh sector, addressing Chinese deployments across the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

This is India’s first indigenously designed and developed light tank, intended to counter China at high altitudes. In both mobility and firepower accuracy, it is expected to surpass the Chinese Type 15 tanks deployed along the Ladakh border.

The name ‘Zorawar’ translates to ‘strong and powerful,’ embodying the essence of formidable strength and resilience.

The Threat Of China & Project Zorawar

The clashes between India and China on the Line of Actual Control in Galwan in June 2020, which resulted in the deaths of 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese soldiers, significantly strained relations between the two nations.

During this period, the Indian Army encountered challenges with the rapid deployment of tanks. The existing tanks were too heavy, complicating their airlift to the frontline.

Additionally, these tanks were not suited for the high-altitude terrain of Ladakh. Compounding the problem, the Chinese People’s Liberation Army (PLA) had deployed numerous advanced lightweight tanks in the region, putting Indian forces at a disadvantage.

To address these issues, the Indian Army required a tank weighing no more than 25 tonnes, capable of being easily airlifted to forward positions in Ladakh, and well-suited for the challenging conditions. Consequently, the Indian government approved ‘Project Zorawar’ in March 2022.

Drawing from the lessons of the Indo-China standoff in Galwan, the tank was named “Zorawar” to honor the 19th-century Dogra warrior and military strategist General Zorawar Singh Kahluria.

Revered as the “Napoleon of India” and the “Conqueror of Ladakh,” General Zorawar led numerous successful campaigns in Ladakh and Balistan.

General Zorawar Singh Kahluria

General Zorawar Singh Kahluria, often revered as a valiant warrior and military leader, played a significant role in the history of the Dogra region, particularly in the early 19th century.

Born in 1784 (though some sources claim 1786) in the Kahlur region, present-day Bilaspur district in Himachal Pradesh, India, Zorawar Singh belonged to the Kahluria clan of Rajputs.

Zorawar Singh began his military career in the service of Raja Sansar Chand II of the princely state of Jammu and Kashmir. His bravery, strategic acumen, and leadership skills quickly propelled him through the ranks. One of his most notable achievements was his extensive military campaigns to expand the borders of the Sikh Empire under Maharaja Ranjit Singh, the founder of the Sikh Empire.

Conquest Of Ladakh & Western Tibet

Zorawar Singh is renowned for his bold expeditions into Ladakh, then part of the Tibetan Empire. In 1834, he led a campaign to conquer Ladakh on behalf of Maharaja Gulab Singh of Jammu and Kashmir. Over the following years, he carried out multiple campaigns in the region, successfully capturing crucial towns and fortresses.

In 1834, the Raja of Timbus sought Raja Gulab Singh’s help against the Ladakhi King. Seizing the opportunity, Raja Gulab Singh ordered his capable commander, Zorawar Singh, to march into Ladakh.

As the General of Jammu, Zorawar Singh launched Trans-Himalayan campaigns starting in April 1834 with an army of 5,000 men. Within eight years, he conquered Ladakh, Gilgit-Baltistan, and Western Tibet.

Zorawar's campaigns faced numerous challenges due to the harsh terrain, extreme weather conditions, and resistance from local rulers. Despite these obstacles, he displayed exceptional leadership and determination.

In the spring of 1835, he defeated an army of 22,000 troops led by General Kahlon and marched his victorious forces to Leh. The panic-stricken King sued for peace.

According to the agreement, he was retained as King, with Ladakh becoming a vassal state of the Dogra Kingdom. Shortly after the peace agreement, the Chief of Sod rose in arms against the Dogras. General Zorawar Singh swiftly suppressed the revolt and triumphantly returned to Jammu at the end of 1835. This is considered one of General Zorawar Singh's greatest victories.

Tibet Sought China's Help

Having consolidated his reign in Gilgit-Baltistan, Raja Gulab Singh revived an ancient Ladakhi claim over Western Tibet. In May 1841, he dispatched General Zorawar Singh to enter the highlands of Tibet with 5,000 men. Leading a diverse army of Dogras, Ladakhis, and Baltis, Zorawar swept across the roof of the world.

Sweeping aside all resistance along the way, Zorawar Singh passed Mansarovar Lake and converged at Gartok. The Tibetan commander fled to Taklakot, and Zorawar Singh stormed Taklakot Fort in September 1841, capturing the strategic city.

Envoys from Tibet and Nepal met the General at Taklakot to negotiate peace. Unexpectedly, in November, a composite army of 10,000 Chinese and Tibetans marched to Taklakot to drive the Dogras from Tibet.

This turned out to be Zorawar Singh's final expedition into Tibet in 1841. Unfortunately, during this campaign, Zorawar, who was 57 years old at the time, encountered severe hardships, including shortages of supplies and extreme weather conditions. He was unable to receive reinforcements from Leh or elsewhere due to heavy snow blocking all the passes.

Temperatures had fallen to minus 50 degrees Celsius due to sweeping blizzards. Despite these conditions, the Dogras put up a tough fight. However, in December 1841, Zorawar Singh was fatally wounded in the Battle of Toyo by the combined forces of Tibetans and Chinese.

The death of their commander decided the outcome of the battle. Living up to their bravery, the Dogras executed the enemy General to avenge their commander's martyrdom.

Although this great conqueror fell during the campaign, his efforts were not in vain. In September 1842, a treaty was signed between representatives of the Chinese and Lhasa governments on one side and the Khalsa Darbar and Gulab Singh on the other. This treaty extended the Sikh, and subsequently Indian, frontiers to their current international boundary, thereby incorporating all of Ladakh into Indian territory.

A Legend That Endures

Today, Zorawar Singh's memory lives on in ways both grand and unexpected. In Tibet, a memorial stands where pregnant women pray for sons as brave as the Indian general.

In his book Kailash – Jewel of the Snows, Rajinder Arora describes the Kailash Yatra and highlights that Zorawar Singh's Samadhi remains at the site of his death. Remarkably, even today, Chinese soldiers are acquainted with his name.

And now, a tank bears his name, ready to defend the very lands he once conquered. The "Zorawar" light tank, nimble yet powerful, stands as a modern incarnation of the warrior's spirit – a testament to India's resolve to protect its Himalayan frontier.

From the 19th-century battlefields to the 21st-century arms race, the legacy of 'Zorawar' continues to shape the destiny of nations atop the world's highest battlefield.

Golog, Qinghai: After 30 Years, a Prestigious Tibetan School Is Liquidated

22 July 2024, Bitter Winter, Lobsang Gurung

The Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational High School was praised even by Communist authorities. But that it preserved Tibetan culture could not be tolerated.

The Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational High School in Golog (also spelled Golok) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai province, has been liquidated by the Chinese authorities on July 12. More than 90% of the inhabitants of Golog Prefecture are Tibetans and the area is part of historical Tibet, even if China assigned it to Qinghai province.

Jigme Gyaltsen was not any school. It was established in 1994 by a famous Tibetan teacher, Ragya Jigme Gyaltsen, and went on to win awards from the Chinese administration itself. It grew from the original 86 of 1994 to more than 1,000 students. Of the 2,559 students who graduated there in thirty years, 742 went on to college and 13 became tenured university professors. Alumni of Jigme Gyaltsen published more than 300 books and hundreds of articles in peer-reviewed journals. The school was featured as a model educational institution in several Chinese TV shows.

However, in the eye of the Chinese authorities Jigme Gyaltsen had an original sin. While proud of its courses in computer science, engineering, and medicine, the school taught pupils in both Tibetan and Chinese language, offered courses in Tibetan culture, had monks as teachers, and counted among its alumni distinguished monastic administrators. It thus became a victim of the Chinese effort to eradicate Tibetan culture from Qinghai.

It all started with the legal prosecution of the founder and principal, Ragya Jigme Gyaltsen, on trumped up charges of taking bribes, and of some students accused to use the symbols of Tibet's national flag, which are banned in China. Earlier this year, the principal was found not guilty, yet he was excluded from the Tibetan Nationalities Council, of which he was a member. An investigation was launched to determine whether among pupils there were monks and nuns who had taken their monastic vows before turning 18, which is illegal under Chinese law.

Although investigations were inconclusive, on July 12 the authorities announced that the school had been liquidated, just days after what turned out to have been the last graduation ceremony, held on July 8.

In a social media post dated July 14, Ragya Jigme Gyaltsen captured the general mood of sadness, and what the institution was all about: "To Jigme Gyaltsen Nationalities Vocational School of Golok: even if you are only thirty, you are still young and healthy, so what a pity. But what is impermanent is never permanent. It is the inevitable law of impermanence that things change from moment to moment. We believe in rebirth and that education through a series of lives is the most important thing. Why not pray for education in future lives? If death cannot be revived, what is the use of wailing? Therefore, it is best to pray for a perfect body in future lives. Please do not be sad but take responsibility for your future."

China's controversial boarding school policy for Tibetans explained

21 July 2024, RFA, Lobsang Gelek

Officials say the system is the best way to educate a scattered population. Critics call it forced assimilation.

The Gangjong Sherig Norbu School has long been a source of pride for ethnic Tibetans in China's Qinghai province. Known for its rigorous curriculum, the school counted leading Tibetan scholars as members of its faculty; its graduates have gone on to excel in fields like engineering, education, medicine and religion.

"It was there that I truly understood the significance of Tibetan language and identity," Tenzin Woesser, a Tibetan songwriter who attended the school in the 1990s, told RFA.

So it was with tears in their eyes that students marked the last graduation Gangjong Sherig would ever hold after Chinese authorities closed the school in July, making it one of a growing list of Tibetan educational institutions that have shut. Subsequently, RFA learned two more Tibetan Buddhist institutions – the Ngaba Kirti and the Lhamo Kirti monasteries in Sichuan province – were also closed this summer.

Chances are that most of the students at these schools will now be sent to a Chinese-run boarding school that minimizes instruction in Tibetan in favor of a Mandarin-heavy curriculum that promotes party loyalty. The story of how Tibetans are educated has attracted international concern and reflects a tension between cultural preservation and national integration.

What is China's education policy?

Tibetan students in the first half of the century were typically educated at home or in the hundreds of monasteries that dominated Tibetan culture and traditions. Some Tibetan children still attend schools where the medium of instruction is Tibetan.

But the vast majority are thought to now go to schools where the lessons are in Mandarin, with Tibetan courses limited to a single language class.

The Gangjong Sherig Norbu School and the two Sichuan monastery schools are among dozens of Tibetan institutions that have closed in recent years. Others include the Sengdruk Taktse School in Amdo Golog, Qinghai province, and the Drago Monastery in Kham Karze, Sichuan province. According to a Human Rights Watch report, the number of non-Tibetan-speaking teachers jumped in areas with ethnic Tibetan students. One goal, according to the report, appears to be to quiet restive regions through assimilation with the majority Han culture.

Visitors say young children who attend Chinese boarding schools are unable to easily communicate with older relatives who grew up studying Tibetan, creating a generational rift and worries about the loss of a unique Tibetan identity.

What do other governments think about China's boarding schools?

China has come under increasing international criticism for its educational policies both in the Tibetan Autonomous Region and in Tibetan areas in the Chinese provinces of Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu and Yunnan.

A panel of experts advising the United Nations human rights office said as many as 1 million Tibetan students now attend boarding schools and risk an “erosion of their identity.”

U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken said in August 2023 that China’s “coercive policies seek to eliminate Tibet’s distinct linguistic, cultural and religious traditions among younger generations of Tibetans.”

What’s China’s response to the criticism?

China bristles at the complaints. Officials note that much of the Tibetan population remains scattered, leaving boarding schools as the only effective way of ensuring students have access to quality teachers and educational resources.

Beijing says Tibetans aren’t forced to attend and many also include instruction in Tibetan language and history.

Officials also point to figures that show the number of Tibetans who can read and write (in Mandarin or another language) has increased dramatically, although official statistics are hard to verify and other surveys show varying literacy rates.

What are the concerns about Chinese-run boarding schools for Tibetans?

Gyal Lo, a Tibetan activist and sociologist who studied the boarding school system in China before fleeing into exile in Canada, told RFA that the schools serve to sinicize Tibetans, including children as young as 4-years-old.

At that age, it’s easy to overwhelm the Tibetan language the students use at home with the Mandarin instruction they are bombarded with every day in school. Attendance is compulsory in everything but name, as families that don’t send their children to the schools may be cut off from government benefits or job opportunities, he has said.

“The Chinese government has repeatedly tried to convert Tibetans into Chinese by eliminating the Tibetan way of life and identity. Now they are educating the youngest members of society to eradicate Tibetan identity,” Gyal Lo said. “This is the most dangerous policy.”

The Vibrant Villages Programme: A Response to PLA’s Salami Slicing through Xiaokang (小康) villages

19 July 2024, ORF, Atul Kumar

The VVP’s effective implementation will help these Indian villages connect to the national mainstream, participate in India’s growing economy and, in return, enhance security for the state

On 12 July 2024, the Rural Development and Migration Prevention Commission of India’s Uttarakhand State reported that 11 villages along the India-Tibet border in the Chamoli, Pithoragarh, and Uttarkashi districts had been abandoned. The Commission’s survey of 137 villages in the previous year revealed that three villages in Chamoli, six in Pithoragarh, and two in Uttarkashi were deserted. This finding underscores the significance of the Indian government’s Vibrant Villages Programme (VVP), launched in July 2023, aimed at preventing such occurrences. The VVP seeks to provide essential services, including social goods, livelihood opportunities, healthcare, infrastructure, and communication facilities to encourage the repopulation of these border villages.

This initiative is particularly crucial in light of China’s establishment of Xiaokang villages near the Indian border. The settlement of entirely new villages close to the border, often within contested territory, surpasses the People’s Liberation Army’s (PLA’s) previous forward patrolling and road-building activities. This action violates multiple treaties that China has signed with its neighbours, disregards decades of border negotiations, and mirrors the tactics China used in the South China Sea to seize smaller islands and construct new ones.

Importance of Xiaokang

Xiaokang (小康) is an ancient Chinese social concept first mentioned in the “Shi Jing” (Book of Poems) nearly 2,000 years ago. It signifies China’s national aspiration to develop into a society characterised by “modest happiness and comfort” for the common people. Over the years, the term evolved, and China’s paramount leader, Deng Xiaoping, described Xiaokang as a stage of economic development marked by a per capita income of US$ 800. China achieved this target in 1997, and by 2024, its per capita income has risen to approximately US$ 13,136.

In 2017, Chinese President Xi Jinping invoked the Xiaokang concept to address poverty and measure the quality of life in villages, ensuring that no one would be left behind in the pursuit of development. He emphasised the importance of health, infrastructure, and cultural and environmental progress, alongside income equality, to signify the attainment of a modestly prosperous village. This policy shift led to increased efforts to develop border villages, aiming to enhance the living standards of border populations and improve border management and security.

In 2017, Chinese President Xi Jinping invoked the Xiaokang concept to address poverty and measure the quality of life in villages, ensuring that no one would be left behind in the pursuit of development. Therefore, as part of the Xiaokang village construction programme in 2017, China began developing 628 villages, primarily near its borders, with some even in disputed territories. Gyalaphug, deep within Bhutan's Beyul region, is an example. In May 2023, news reports further highlighted China's construction of Xiaokang villages near Uttarakhand State's Barahoti region, just 11 kilometres from the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the Middle Sector. These villages have been established to support strategic road networks and sustain China's military outposts in rugged, mountainous areas. Chinese authorities encourage their residents in these villages to see themselves as "soldiers without uniforms," turning each village into a fortress and each household into a watch post, primarily to guard China's borders.

Situation Inside Xiaokangs

The actual population of these villages is often higher than reported in official figures. This includes mostly temporary residents, primarily Chinese and occasionally Tibetan, such as construction workers, technical advisors, and security agents, who reside there for a year or more. A special unit of the border police is also stationed in or around the village, with the primary task of intercepting Tibetans attempting to flee to India or Nepal. Village residents are required to form a joint defence team with the border security police to patrol the neighbouring mountains. Consequently, PLA border patrols, which previously occurred once every three months or seasonally, now arrive approximately every fifteen days due to the presence and development of these villages.

Additionally, a village-based cadre work team resides here, with its members rotated every year or more. This team guides the village committee and the local Communist Party branch, providing political education to villagers and assisting with practical needs such as greenhouse building and management, and mushroom growing techniques. These various regulatory agencies ensure that the residents of these villages remain under strict surveillance and control.

This team guides the village committee and the local Communist Party branch, providing political education to villagers and assisting with practical needs such as greenhouse building and management, and mushroom growing techniques.

The Xiaokang villages represent a sophisticated strategy for extending de facto and de jure control over borders. The PLA enhances its security infrastructure and support system, following its often-professed philosophy of civil-military collaboration in logistical supply. Furthermore, these villages have become popular tourist destinations, contributing to the region's financial development and strengthening Chinese control over the frontier.

Additionally, the establishment of village political units, along with the introduction of postal networks, broadband connections, and permanent administrative apparatus, helps China bolster its legal claims to these areas in the international arena. Since bilateral territorial negotiations typically avoid disturbing settled populations in disputed territories, these Xiaokang villages have become a quasi-legal instrument for the Chinese state. India and Bhutan, in particular, have been adversely affected by these incremental Chinese advances.

The Indian context: Vibrant Villages Programme

India must devise countermeasures to address China's salami-slicing (Can Shi 蚕食) tactics in territorial acquisition. One countermeasure is to define and announce red lines, then defend them with a serious commitment to deter the adversary. Another is to cultivate a reputation for unpredictability or occasional overreaction; irregular aggressive responses can shape adversary behaviour and maintain deterrence. The third countermeasure is the "swallowing as a whale" (Jing Tun 鲸吞) strategy, where small territorial nibbles by the adversary are countered with significant territorial gains, negating their efforts and creating space for negotiation.

India must devise countermeasures to address China's salami-slicing (Can Shi 蚕食) tactics in territorial acquisition. One countermeasure is to define and announce red lines, then defend them with a serious commitment to deter the adversary.

The most robust response to these Chinese villages is an equally effective, focused, and determined border development strategy that India's Vibrant Villages Programme (VVP) intends to achieve. This development initiative aims to repopulate frontier regions, expand state presence, and attract tourists, thereby bolstering India's territorial claims.

The Indian government must maintain its commitment to the VVP, ensuring it does not succumb to bureaucratic inefficiencies. Often, ineffective monitoring and lack of accountability lead to fund diversion and consequent slow or lack of progress in development schemes in far-flung regions. Even in 2024, some villages along the India-Tibet border still require days of travel on foot or by pony to reach. Therefore, the VVP's effective implementation will help these Indian villages connect to the national mainstream, participate in India's growing economy and, in return, enhance security for the state. Repopulated villages along the border can become the most important sustainment factor for Indian troops deployed along harsh mountainous terrain.

Finally, there are crucial differences between Indian border villages and Chinese Xiaokang villages. In India, border populations abandon their villages due to a lack of facilities and livelihood opportunities, therefore, providing basic amenities would likely encourage them to return and reinhabit their homes. In contrast, Xiaokang villages are forcibly established, with the local border population compelled to remain and support the Chinese state and its agencies. This distinction can be a significant advantage for India. Proper planning, adequate support, and effective monitoring are crucial to leverage this advantage.

Tibetan Buddhist Nuns: An Overlooked Pillar of the Four-fold Sangha

19 July 2024, BDG, Ani Wangmo Tenzin

Scriptures state that the Buddhadharma will exist as long as the fourfold sangha exists, meaning bhikshus, bhikshunis, upasakas and upasikas (ordained monks, ordained nuns, laymen, and laywomen). The Buddha ordained the sangha at the beginning of his teaching journey and didn't pass into parinirvana until the fourfold sangha was firmly established and flourishing.

For the Dharma to flourish, we need the balance of the four parts of the sangha. The Buddha taught monks, nuns, laymen and laywomen alike how to study and practice, yet, after passing to parinirvana, Buddhist teachers focused mostly on monks; their approach wasn't balanced. This resulted in a weakening of the female monastic community. Consequently, when an extremist Muslim invasion destroyed the monastic community in northern India, laypeople did not know how to study and practice and so became Hindus or Muslims.

Fortunately, the Buddhadharma was preserved in other Asian countries, such as China, Thailand, and Tibet.

Today, we face an imbalance in the fourfold sangha once again. If we focus on Vajrayana Buddhism, we can see that in Western countries and non-Himalayan regions in general, the Dharma is focused mostly on lay practitioners: Dharma centers are led by laypeople to serve the needs of mostly lay practitioners. This is good and benefits many people—except that in this framework, monasticism is often deemed unnecessary. For the first time in the history of Buddhism, much of the ordained sangha is not supported by laypeople, who are encouraged to send money abroad, to support the various projects, monasteries, and activities of the famous, often very well-off head lama. This results in a large majority of lay support being sent overseas—either to Bhutan, Nepal, India, or Tibet, while many practitioners' own sanghas remain overlooked.

Donors often think that Tibetans are in dire need of support, and in some cases this may be true. But generally speaking, they are one of the best-situated refugees, while at the same time, many the non-Himalayan nuns are alarmingly unsupported. According to several estimations, about 80 per cent of non-Himalayan monastics disrobe in a few years due to lack of different forms of support, from financial to social, spiritual, educational, psychological, medical, and so on.

Of the fourfold sangha required for the survival of the Dharma, nuns are the least supported, in particular non-Himalayan nuns. They are often left with no choice but to disrobe and join the workforce to support their lives, despite their strong desire to live as monastics. Within the fourfold sangha, they are the endangered species that most needs your attention.

Decades ago, when Jetsunma Tenzin Palmo came from the cave and began to advocate for Himalayan nuns, people were surprised: "Oh, nuns! We never hear about the nuns. We know the male teachers and their monasteries, but where are the nuns?"

It took some time and several people to raise awareness, but by the power of her clear vision and the dedicated, diligent work of many people, today Tibetan Buddhist nunneries are thriving and nuns are excelling in education and meditation alike.

What looks impossible becomes possible when we engage in skillful action.

Jetsunma Tenzin Palmo, together with Geshema Kelsang Wangmo and Tsunma Tenzin Sangmo who founded Thosamling nunnery, established the Alliance of Non-Himalayan Nuns (ANHN) to support nuns from non-Himalayan regions. Recognized as a US-based non-profit organization earlier in 2024, the Alliance of Non-Himalayan Nuns, Inc. is governed by its board of directors, which includes representatives from all four major traditions: Kagyu, Gelug, Nyingma, and Sakya. Its supporters include also other luminaries, such as Bhikshuni Karma Lekshe Tsomo, Bhikshuni Thubten Chodron, and Venerable Robina Courtin, to name a few.

In March 2024, 38 nuns from 17 countries and five continents congregated in Thosamling Nunnery in Dharamsala, India, at the first ANHN Gathering to meet, to learn from renowned teachers and each other, to practice together, and to simply enjoy each other's company, seeing that they are not alone.

Tibetan Buddhist nuns from non-traditional Tibetan Buddhist cultures have a unique set of skills and encounter a unique set of challenges in upholding their vows and robes. These skills are a great advantage if they are noticed. While Himalayan monastics enter monasteries at a young age and have almost no experience of the world outside the monastery, non-Himalayan nuns are often highly educated, accomplished in different careers, such as healthcare, education, finance, the arts, and mental health. They have led companies, acquired soft skills, worked in demanding environments, and have been mothers raising children.

Small children entering a monastery cannot renounce much; often they are just sent there. Meanwhile, these non-Himalayan nuns have often seen worldly success, yet renounced it all to pursue the Dharma and benefit others in a deeper, more far-reaching way. Nonetheless, they remain without the support that the Himalayan monastics receive.

This is shortsighted, since they can significantly benefit Buddhist communities, not only through the sincerity of their practice, but also through the various skillsets they bring from their lives before ordination. This is so often overlooked. They know the world outside the temples and their skills can be utilized for the Dharma to flourish. Many nuns show great resilience and a deep dedication to the Dharma, and continue to serve despite the difficulties they are facing. Without greater support, this is not sustainable.

ANHNN was established to support non-Himalayan nuns and at the first gathering discussed above, the nuns have started to organize themselves in mutual support. Even so, we will need a collaborative effort on the part of all four parts of the sangha to tackle the challenges that non-Himalayan nuns face: not being a part of a monastic sangha, staying alone and isolated, and not receiving enough support from the lay community and, sometimes, also from teachers. There needs to be a conscious effort to reframe this situation as a unique opportunity for the Dharma to manifest in non-traditional cultures. It is essential that laypeople are informed about how they can provide greater support.

At the same time, several teachers have expressed their support, among them: His Holiness the Dalai Lama; Mingyur Rinpoche; Khamtrul Rinpoche; Serkong Rinpoche; Geshe Dorji Damdul from Tibet House; and Geshe Ngawang Tenzin, the abbot of Dolma Ling nunnery; together with its leading geshemas. At the recent gathering, there were also heartwarming meetings with fellow nuns from Dolma Ling and Dongyu Gatsal Ling nunneries, and a genuine sisterhood has started to form among the NHNs, inviting more and more nuns to join.

Pema Tseden's Other Legacy

18 July 2024, Sixth Tone, Cai Xin

The Tibetan filmmaker was also a prolific writer of short stories.

Last May, the author, translator, and filmmaker Pema Tseden died of a sudden heart attack in Lhasa. While the news came as a shock to all who knew him, myself included, the events of the past year prove that he has not been forgotten. His last film, "Snow Leopard," released posthumously, won the Grand Prix at the 36th Tokyo International Film Festival last November before premiering in cinemas on the Chinese mainland in April.

But Pema Tseden's films are only one part of his legacy — he was also a prolific writer who produced 46 short stories in both Tibetan and Chinese.

The last two of these — the fiction collection "Fresh Scent of Pine Wood" and a compendium of translated folklore "Tales of the Golden Corpse: Tibetan Folk Tales" — finally hit stores this May, on the one-year anniversary of his death. Their publication was something of a pet project of mine: my way of paying tribute to a great, if sometimes overlooked, literary talent.

Pema Tseden's career defies easy categorization. An auteur who wrote and directed his own scripts, he was equally at home writing screenplays and novels. And he did so in two languages — Tibetan and Chinese — often translating his own work from one to the other.

Although Pema Tseden grew up in a Chinese-speaking environment and was in third grade by the time his region revived education in minority languages and scripts, Tibetan was his mother tongue. His grandfather, a monk in the Nyingma sect of Tibetan Buddhism, raised and educated him, taught him Tibetan, and helped him recite the scriptures. Their loving relationship would prove the foundation of Pema Tseden's creative life.

After graduating from junior high, Pema Tseden was admitted into a high school in the northwestern province of Qinghai. It was there that he met the famous Tibetan poet and writer Dondrub Gyal, and under his guidance began his literary journey. Highly influential to the generation of Tibetans who came of age in the 1980s, Dondrub Gyal was the quintessential bad boy poet: Eschewing custom, he wore his hair long, donned sunglasses and a long trench coat, and smoked in class. He could recite epics like the “Ramayana” and spoke endlessly about poetry.

But Pema Tseden didn’t just draw influence from Tibetan literature: In addition to Tibetan classics like “The Life of Milarepa,” he immersed himself in work like the 17th-century classic “Dream of the Red Chamber,” Russian literature, and popular romances. He also read many of the realist noels and avant-garde writers who emerged in China in the late 1980s, including Yu Hua, Yan Lianke, Ge Fei, Su Tong, and Can Xue.

Their influence can be seen in his first published story, “Men and Dog,” which came out in the Tibet Literature magazine in 1992, when he was just a freshman in college. The narrative is simple: A dog lives on a mountain inhabited by three households of shepherds. One night, one of the households witnesses a marriage, another has a member who falls ill, and in the third, a child is born. A wolf arrives, and the dog vigilantly guards the herds of sheep, barking and shrieking. The people, feeling ill at ease about the sound, beat the dog to death with a staff. The next morning, they realize that the strange sounds they heard the night before were from a fight between the dog and a wolf.

“It was my debut piece, and it basically set the tone for all my other work,” Pema Tseden later told his biographer. “What remains is really only one emotion, a slight pessimism.”

In 1991, after four years spent as a primary school teacher, Pema Tseden was admitted into the Tibetan Language and Literature major at Northwest Minzu

University in Gansu province; he would eventually receive a master’s degree in Tibetan-Chinese Literary Translation from the school. As part of his degree, he needed to translate a text from Tibetan to Chinese; he picked the “Tales of the Golden Corpse,” a compendium of classic folktales from the region.

“I needed to get some practice translating, so I translated the ‘Tales of the Golden Corpse,’ which greatly influenced me when I was young,” he recalled. “The narratives and dialogues in those stories were very simple, but they inspired me.”

Indeed, both his short stories and scripts were greatly influenced by folk literature and Tibetan literary traditions. Pema Tseden listened to many folktales growing up, and later on he would retell these stories to others, giving him an ear for concise language and structure. In 2009, he published a full Chinese translation of the “Tales of the Golden Corpse,” affixing “Tibetan Folk Tales” to the title. That same year, he completed work on his first feature film, “Soul Searching,” part of his graduate thesis at the Beijing Film Academy. It would go on to win the Jury Grand Prix at the 12th Shanghai International Film Festival.

But Pema Tseden believed that writing fiction allowed for more self-expression than filmmaking, and the pleasure and satisfaction he derived from writing was greater than that for the films he made. When he wrote short stories, he tried to work quickly, going from inspiration into text in a single bound. He would liken writing to dreaming. A common trope in Tibetan literature is for the storyteller to abruptly enter different states: When reciting “The Epic of King Gesar,” for example, the storyteller must channel completely different voices. They themselves might be illiterate, but through the story, their language can become beautiful and sophisticated. If uninterrupted, these recitations could last for several hours. Pema Tseden always hoped that his own works could mimic such a state — dreamlike, trancelike.

“Searching, but ultimately not finding — the theme of loss runs through all my writing,” Pema Tseden said. He used stories to reconstruct his own understanding of the Tibetan world he grew up in, even as that world changed and grew more distant.

His posthumously released short story collection, which I had the privilege of working on, was compiled by his son, himself a filmmaker, Jigme Trinley. The pieces are presented in backward chronological order, from his last novel to his debut. In addition to “Fresh Scent of Pine Wood,” the last story he completed before his death and the one that gives the book its name, it includes some of his other most representative works, such as “Men and Dog,” the novel from which “Soul Searching” is based off. One standout is “A Red Cloth,” which tells the story of two people’s experiences across a single day.

One is blindfolded and ends the day unchanged; the other goes through an entire lifetime, aging, falling ill, and eventually dying.

It's a curious fable — the orphaned legacy of an artist gone far too soon.

Tibetan exiles are on the move again

18 July 2024, Prospect, Pippa Crawford

They first fled their homeland in the fifties. Now a new generation of Tibetans is emigrating thousands of miles away

Above the lakeside city of Pokhara, Nepal, there stands a small settlement of houses, brightly painted in pastel yellow, brick red and blue. This is Tashiling, one of the oldest camps for Tibetan refugees in the country. Behind Tashiling rises the double summit of Machapuchare, or "Fishtail", a Himalayan peak that has never been climbed. Beyond Fishtail is the border with China, over which thousands of Tibetans have fled since their homeland was occupied by Chinese forces in 1959.

The first refugees who settled here in 1962 hoped Tashiling would be a temporary shelter. Just over 60 years later, there are shops, a school, a carpet workshop, a Buddhist monastery and a population of 476. Nepal took in more Tibetans than any other country except India; the country was home to 20,000 at the peak of Tibetan immigration.

Yet times are changing for this fragile community. Local industries that employ Tibetans are struggling. Nepal has stopped issuing new refugee cards to Tibetans, blocking anyone born after 1990 from getting a passport, or opening a bank account in the country. Beijing is tightening its grip on Kathmandu, with recent aid packages from China to much poorer Nepal coming with the understanding that the government will increase its surveillance of Tibetans.

In April, I took a taxi from Pokhara to Tashiling camp, and asked residents about their lives there. Most were cautious about talking, but on the condition that I change her name, one woman pulled me up a stool beside her shop.

Lhamo* is part of the generation who has never seen Tibet. "I was born here, in the camp, in 1975," she told me. "My parents came in 1965." Lhamo has brought up her two daughters in Tashiling, and earns a living making and selling traditional souvenirs: jewellery, statues, and silver cymbals used in prayer.

The designs are Tibetan, passed down between generations, but Lhamo explained that it is no longer possible to bring the raw materials into Nepal from Chinese-occupied Tibet. "We had to find new routes," she said. "Peddlers bring us silver and turquoise from Burma and Afghanistan."

I asked if the changes were connected to the recent crackdown by the Chinese government. Lhamo pressed a finger to her lips. "I can't say openly. But yes, things have been difficult... with China, and with the rules and regulations of Nepal. Last year we wanted to celebrate Uprising Day [the anniversary of the Tibet rebellion]—we were going to march in Pokhara town and shout: Free Tibet! But we weren't allowed. We marked the day at the camp instead, with praying and singing."

"We are in touch with people back home," she whispered, "But it's getting harder. They listen to phones."

Tibetans who can speak more freely have similar stories. As Lobsang Lungtok, a Tibetan community leader now based in Australia, has written: "the Chinese government taps the phone conversations of Tibetans who have family members in exile; the only way for us to stay in contact is by avoiding topics on politics and the Dalai Lama. Phone and internet connections are cut when a protest breaks out."

Lhamo explained that Tibetan children are taught separately at the camp. Though their parents encourage them to play with Nepali children, the community is guarded and protective. "We want them to be like brothers and sisters...but we hope that they will choose Tibetan husbands and wives. We have to stick together."

Politics aside, Tibetans and Nepalis coexist peacefully. Tibetan Buddhists are free to practise their religion in Hindu-majority Nepal, where it's not uncommon to see temples with elements of both Buddhism and Hinduism.

A 10-hour bus ride from Pokhara, in Nepal's capital, Kathmandu, is Utse, the district's oldest Tibetan restaurant and hotel. A chalkboard gives the day's specials: peanut masala; egg-drop soup, tea with yak butter. There are framed portraits of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's 89-year old religious leader, who is exiled in India. A successor has yet to be chosen; some in the diaspora fear they will lose protection after the Dalai Lama's death.

Utse is run by three generations of the same family. When I arrived, Rinchen*, the matriarch, was standing in the lobby in slippers and an embroidered dress, checking in a large party of Belgian mountaineers. "Yes, this is my place," she told me, "I opened it after we lost our country. It was 1971. I was a young woman then, I'm 77 now! I wanted it to be for everyone, not just Tibetans."

Is it still for everyone? Rinchen glances over her shoulder. "Yes. People come from all countries." I ask about China, and Rinchen makes the same gesture as Lhamo, a single finger pressed to the lips.

"Yes, yes, we have many visitors from China. Business is business. But we feel all the time that they are watching us."

China denies that repression is taking place against Tibetans, at home or abroad. "Since Tibet's peaceful liberation and democratic reform in the 1950s, the southwestern autonomous region has made great strides in preserving and developing Tibetan culture, with the government investing heavily in education and cultural preservation," reads a recent article on the state-run news site Tibet.cn.

Available data indicates a second wave of emigration of young Tibetans to Australia—overwhelmingly from the generation born after 1990 and no longer eligible for refugee cards in Nepal—though data is scarce. Most Tibetans do not have passports, and others have falsified their ages in order to enter another country. It's also difficult to pinpoint the diaspora population; the Australian census, for example, asks "which country were you born in?" rather than "with which nationality do you identify" meaning that second and third-generation immigrants can slip through the net.

In 1990, the US began accepting 1,000 Tibetan refugees a year following the introduction of a Diversity Immigrant Visa that prioritised educated migrants from countries that didn't already have large immigrant communities in America. Language data from the US census shows a steady rise in the Tibetan languages, from 188,000 residents speaking these languages at home in 2000, to over 300,000 in 2020. Australia and Canada also launched their Tibetan quotas in the nineties.

Diana Hewitt, a researcher at Williams College, argues that the decline of the carpet industry—which employed 1.2m Tibetans and Nepalīs in Nepal at its peak—drove the descendants of the first settlers overseas. "It used to be [Nepal's] largest earner of foreign currency, but there just isn't the demand for these kinds of carpets anymore. The younger generation can't rely on the income anymore," she said in a phone call.

The balancing act of Nepali government policy is another factor, with the partial rights granted to Tibetan settlers affecting some generations more than others. "Tibetan children can go to school in Nepal, and be educated to degree level. But any job in Nepal that requires a university education also requires citizenship, which most Tibetans still don't have. So they have to go abroad, and send money home to their families," Hewitt added.

While it is also common for young Nepalīs to emigrate to find better jobs abroad, Tibetans cannot always follow the same routes. Hundreds of thousands of Nepalīs head to Saudi Arabia or the UAE for work every year, but this requires documents which Tibetans don't have. Thus, they are travelling further, to Australia, the US and Canada, to countries that will accept them. Geopolitical factors are at play here too; as China courts Nepal and India, with visa-free travel and joint military drills, the west is opening doors for those who ran from China—and are still running.

Dee Why near Sydney is home to a community of at least 800 Tibetans. Last year, the demand for Tibetan books was so high that Dee Why library opened a Tibetan section, the first of its kind in Australia. A spokesperson for the mayor of the Northern Beaches council told me the library has loaned out 780 books since launching, and has just started a bi-weekly Tibetan storytime session for children.

Australia's Gold Coast is as distinct from Himalayas as can be imagined—and the new landscape brings new challenges. Many Tibetans born and raised in landlocked Nepal have never learned to swim, or even seen the ocean. There is now a swimming club especially for the Dee Why Tibetans.

Western help for the Tibetan émigrés may be part of a wider political strategy, but the communities that have sprung from it are growing year on year. In the foothills of Machapuchare, Lhamo is looking to the future. "Life here in the camp is neither good, nor bad," she said. "All I hope for is a happier life for my children and grandchildren."

India sees US 'Resolve Tibet Act' as driven by great power rivalry?

18 July 2024, Tibetan Review

As focus grows on it to take a political stand on the issue of Tibet in consonance with Sino-Tibetan ties before the 1950's, India's former national security adviser (NSA) Shivshankar Menon has claimed that the primary driver for the recent US adoption of 'Resolve Tibet Act' was its "rivalry with China", not any concern for Tibet, reported the economictimes.com Jul 17.

On the other hand, US House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul, who played a leading role in the Act's passage, said in a statement Jul 17 that the legislation was meant to help the Tibetan people against China's undermining and erasing of their culture and the stripping of their right to self-determination. The Act also dismisses as false China's claim that Tibet has been part of it since ancient times.

Speaking at the launch of former diplomat Dilip Sinha's book 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty' on Jul 16, Menon has argued that there were “clear limits” to America’s commitment to Tibet and they were waving the flag of Tibet today in its own interest.

Justifying the lack of any move in India’s policy on the political issue of Tibet, Menon has said: “I would be very careful to say ‘Oh! the world is changed, they (the US) have passed an act’. I think you need to look at the basic correlation of forces and the balance of forces, and the actual strength of the people and what is the interest of the great powers and how they see it at this time.”

Menon, who has served as India’s foreign secretary from 2006-09, has also noted: “Today, the Americans see it as in their interest to at least wave the flag of Tibet but this doesn’t extend to recognising Tibet... It is driven not by the concern for Tibet, the primary driver here is the rivalry with China.”

Though clear that Tibet cannot rely on great power rivalry to solve their problems, Menon, 75, has lauded India’s effort in ensuring that the Tibetan culture, civilization and identity “stays strong”. He has said Tibetans, too, like Armenians, could have been another “lost people” otherwise.

“They are not lost. Part of it because of His Holiness, his personality and what he has done. But also because I think of what India provided, and that we shouldn’t forget and should never give up on,” he has added.

Menon has praised Sinha’s book as an “honest account” of what happened – be it the great power rivalry, how it affected Tibet or how it affected India. The book claims to offer a thorough exploration of Tibet’s historical and contemporary geopolitical significance. It critically examines the ongoing impact of Chinese suzerainty over Tibet – whatever that may mean – amidst persistent citizen protests and global calls for freedom.

The discussion at the launch event has covered various topics from the book, including a brief history of Tibet, its complex geopolitical entanglements, the rise of Tibetan Buddhism, and its annexation by China in 1950. Apart from Menon and Sinha, well-known Tibet-China expert Claude Arpi has also taken part.

Significantly, at the book’s launch event, Sinha, a former Indian ambassador, said China has not been able to assimilate or absorb Tibet and it has not been able to win the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people, noted the ANI news service Jul 17.

Biden’s Tibet Stance Draws Criticism Despite Signing Landmark Act

18 July 2024, The Tibet Express, Tsering Choephel

The New York and New Jersey Chapter of the Tibetan National Congress has written to US

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

President Joe Biden in protest of his reiterating the US policy that recognises Tibet as part of China while announcing the passage of the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act” on 12 July. Expressing disappointment, the letter reads: “We appreciate your signing of S. 138, the Promoting a Resolution Act. However, we were disheartened by your subsequent statement. Although you expressed support for freedom, democracy, and human rights for Tibetans, your recognition of Tibet as part of China contradicts these values. Tibet has never been a part of China, and we continue to struggle for our freedom from communist China.”

The Resolve Tibet Act, now a law, is a milestone victory for years of advocacy efforts led by the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), the International Campaign for Tibet, and other organisations. While Tibetans celebrate Biden’s signature, which embeds the bill into US law, his subsequent statements stating that “The Act does not change longstanding bipartisan United States policy to recognise the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan areas of China as part of the People’s Republic of China” have aroused disappointment and discussions among Tibetans.

CTA held a ceremony on Wednesday in the Sikyong Hall at Gangchen Kyishong to celebrate the US government’s adoption of the bill into law. As multiple online posts and reports on Tibet.net show, Tibetan communities in various parts of India, including Shimla, Gangtok, and Varanasi, among others, also held celebratory functions at their locations.

A Tibetan netizen said in an Instagram post, “I don’t know how to greet or celebrate this development,” in an apparent disappointment as the bill was lauded as a game-changer before it went to the President’s desk to be signed into law.

Another Tibetan netizen declared it a great achievement and, in a post on Facebook, thanked all the individuals and organisations for working tirelessly, as well as the bipartisan support from the US Congress. However, he called out President Biden for “his unnecessary comments in the press statement, seemingly to appease China,” saying it “unfortunately discredited the new law.”

Tibetan Exile President Ups Ante In Nomenclature War – OpEd

18 July 2024, Eurasia Review

The Tibetan exile government says it will “strongly counter” Beijing, which has been renaming Tibetan places with Chinese names.

Penpa Tsering, Sikyong or President of the Central Tibetan Administration (Tibetan Parliament in Exile) or CTA, told Indian media that the “Sinification of Tibet must stop.”

“We will create a map of Tibet that will carry names of all places in Tibet in Tibet language. Chinese official position on Tibet underplays Tibet’s own rich and distinct history as it projects Tibet as part of China since the ancient era. We have to put an end to it,” Tsering said.

“Chinese renaming of Tibetan places will not erase Tibet’s unique culture and identity, because we have been an independent entity for much of our history. China forcibly occupied Tibet by sending its army and that historical fact is acknowledged by the world,” Tsering said.

He said China calls Tibet as Xizang.

“But now we are researching every name in Tibet and we will have a map of Tibet that will show all the original Tibetan names of all the places in Tibet,” he said.

Recently, the information warfare division of Indian Army released a list of 30 places in Tibet with traditional names. Tibet experts in the Calcutta-based Asiatic Society helped prepare the list. Experts say this might be a tit-for-tat move to counter China’s naming many places in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh with Chinese names. China challenges Indian control over Arunachal Pradesh and says it is South Tibet, an extension of the Chinese province of Tibet.

Penpa Tsering asserted that the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama will be determined by the Dalai Lama and the Tibetans, saying, “It is the reincarnation of His Holiness Dalai Lama and not reincarnation of Xi Jinping.” That will surely irk Beijing.

Tsering arrived in Delhi from the hill town of Dharamsala on his way to USA, almost immediately after the enactment of the Resolve Tibet Act in the US Congress.

Tsering arrived in Delhi from the hill town of Dharamsala on his way to USA, almost immediately after the enactment of the Resolve Tibet Act in the US Congress.

The Resolve Tibet Act has also raised the issue of self-determination for Tibetans declaring, “All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right, they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.” Sikyong Tsering interpreted the “self-determination” as the right to hold plebiscite in Tibet and added, “Self-determination means plebiscite. The question is whether China will allow plebiscite in Tibet.” Mr. Tsering expressed gratitude to all stakeholders in the U.S. for ensuring the passage of the Resolve Tibet Act and said he will likely meet all sides, including the Republican party’s leading members as the election season is heating up in the U.S.

Tsering also that CTA was “having back-channel negotiations with the Chinese side.” He insisted that the talks were started with initiative from Chinese side.

“We do not have any expectation from these talks but we have to keep the engagements going as these are part of our long term plans. We met in the first week of this month and the talks are being held with the help of a third country,” said Penpa Tsering.

But he did not name the “third country” that got the talks going or the level of Chinese officials involved in the talks.

China has been silent on the “back channel talks” with the Tibetan exile government. India, where the CTA is based, is also tight lipped on the issue.

Tsering came to Delhi from Dharamshala before leaving for Washington DC where he will meet with U.S. politicians of different parties as the Resolve Tibet Act received bipartisan support.

President Biden signed the text of the Resolve Tibet Act on July 12 that is aimed at initiating “meaningful dialogue” between the People’s Republic of China and the Dalai Lama or “his representatives,” which prompted the Central Tibetan Administration to welcome the move.

Sikyong Tsering described the Tibetan issue as a “conflict” saying that terms like “Tibetan issue” or “dispute” do not convey the substance of the problem.

“Tibet continues to be an unresolved conflict and its resolution has to be based on international law,” said Mr. Tsering. The Resolve Tibet Act has used “dispute” to describe the Tibetan issue, but Mr. Tsering said, “Tibetan conflict is the term to give it a proper status as the real issue is the Chinese occupation of Tibet.” He pointed out that while countries of Europe and the West often talk about violation of human rights and religious rights in Tibet these fails to convey the real problem.

He further pointed out the new act promulgated by the U.S. Congress will help in countering Chinese official position on Tibet that he characterised as a “misinformation campaign”. Chinese official position on Tibet, said Mr. Tsering, often underplays Tibet’s own rich history as it projects Tibet as part of China since the ancient era. He also took a strong stand on the renaming of various places of Tibet saying that renaming will not erase Tibet’s unique culture and identity.

“Nowadays Beijing has started calling Tibet as Xizang but now we are researching every name in Tibet and we will have a map of Tibet that will show all the original Tibetan names of all the places in Tibet,” said Mr. Tsering.

He also said that the reincarnation of the Dalai Lama will be determined by the Dalai Lama and the Tibetans, saying, “It is the reincarnation of His Holiness Dalai Lama and not reincarnation of Xi Jinping."

The Resolve Tibet Act has raised the issue of self-determination for Tibetans declaring, "All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right, they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development."

Penpa Tsering said, "self-determination" for Tibetans would mean the right to hold plebiscite in Tibet but doubted whether China will ever allow that to happen.

Tsering expressed gratitude to all stakeholders in the U.S. for ensuring the passage of the Resolve Tibet Act and said he will likely meet all sides, including top Republicans in the US election season.

US' rivalry with China primary driver for 'Resolve Tibet Act': Former NSA Shivshankar Menon

17 July 2024, The Economic Times, Shivshankar Menon

The primary driver for the US recently passing the 'Resolve Tibet Act' is its "rivalry with China", not any concern for Tibet, claimed former national security adviser (NSA) Shivshankar Menon. Speaking at the launch of former diplomat Dilip Sinha's book "Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty" on Tuesday, Menon argued that there are "clear limits" to America's commitment to Tibet and they are waving the flag of Tibet today in its own interest.

"I would be very careful to say 'Oh! the world is changed, they (the US) have passed an act'. I think you need to look at the basic correlation of forces and the balance of forces, and the actual strength of the people and what is the interest of the great powers and how they see it at this time.

"Today, the Americans see it as in their interest to at least wave the flag of Tibet but this doesn't extend to recognising Tibet... It is driven not by the concern for Tibet, the primary driver here is the rivalry with China," said Menon, who has also served as the foreign secretary from 2006-09.

US President Joe Biden has recently signed into law a bill that enhances American support for Tibet and promotes dialogue between China and the Dalai Lama towards a peaceful resolution of the dispute over the status and governance of the remote Himalayan region.

China, on the other hand, had opposed the 'Resolve Tibet Act', describing it as a "destabilising" Act. The Act enhances US support for Tibet - empowering State Department officials to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government.

Though clear that Tibet cannot rely on great power rivalry to solve their problems, Menon, 75, lauded India's effort in ensuring that the Tibetan culture, civilization and identity "stays strong".

He said the Tibetans, too, like Armenians, could have been another "lost people".

"They are not lost. Part of it because of His Holiness, his personality and what he has done. But also because I think of what India provided, and that we shouldn't forget and should never give up on," he added.

After a failed anti-Chinese uprising in 1959, the 14th Dalai Lama fled Tibet and came to India where he set up the government-in-exile at Dharamshala in Himachal Pradesh.

From 2002 to 2010, the Dalai Lama's representatives and the Chinese government held nine rounds of dialogue that did not produce any concrete outcome. Praising the book, Menon said it is an "honest account" of what happened – be it the great power rivalry, how it affected Tibet or how it affected India. "The nice thing in the book is that this is not a partisan historical account. It is a straightforward account based on what actually happened," he added.

"Imperial Games in Tibet" claims to offer a thorough exploration of Tibet's historical and contemporary geopolitical significance.

It also sheds light on the 14th Dalai Lama's escape to India and the resultant Sino-Indian tensions, critically examining the ongoing impact of Chinese suzerainty over Tibet amidst persistent citizen protests and global calls for freedom.

The book, published by Pan Macmillan India and priced at Rs 599, is currently available for purchase across online and offline stores.

China Calls the US Resolve Tibet Act a "Sinister Farce"

17 July 2024, Bitter Winter, Lopsang Gurung

It took only 24 hours to mobilize China's pro-CCP establishment, including its Three-Self and Catholic branches, to repeat the usual anti-Tibetan lies.

On July 12, President Joe Biden signed into law the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act," known as the Resolve Tibet Act. The historical law explicitly states that CCP's claims that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times are false and calls for the US diplomacy to counter Chinese disinformation and propaganda. It also states that the problem of Tibet should be solved through international dialogue from which China cannot exclude the Dalai Lama and his representatives.

It took only twenty-four hours for the CCP to answer and quickly assemble a symposium condemning the Resolve Tibet Act.

On July 13, the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC) held a symposium "strongly condemning" the Act. It was chaired by Zhang Yijiong, the Director of the Nationalities and Religious Affairs Committee of the CPPCC National Committee, and attended by Deputy Directors Jiang Jianguo, Bian Bazaxi, Li Shan, Li Guangfu, Yang Faming, Xu Xiaohong, Yan Jue and more than twenty CPPCC National Committee members, sixteen members of the Ethnic and Religious Affairs Committee, representatives of the ethnic minority communities. The leaders of the government-controlled Buddhist, Taoist, Islamic, Catholic, and Protestant groups also spoke.

In short, the CCP mobilized against the Resolve Tibet Act the whole pro-Party religious establishment. Those in the West who maintain a "dialogue" with the Three-Self Church, the Patriotic Catholic Church, and the other pro-CCP religious bodies should reflect on the fact that these organizations are willing to endorse immediately even the most obnoxious CCP claims.

The speakers called the Act "sinister," "a farce," and an interference in China's internal affairs. The final press release insisted that "Tibet has been an inseparable part of China since ancient times, and the Tibetan people are members of the Chinese nation. This has long been determined by history, supported by the people, and recognized by the world. This will never change and cannot change at any time... The US and the Dalai Lama group have willfully distorted history and openly denied the objective fact that Tibet's sovereignty belongs to China, which has greatly hurt the feelings of all Chinese people, including the Tibetan people. This is a typical American bullying behavior."

No doubt, "useful idiots" and "fellow travelers" will start being mobilized abroad too against the Act, parroting the same Chinese propaganda lies against the Tibetans and the Dalai Lama. The reaction, on the other hand, shows that this time the CCP has been hit where it hurts.

China's Grip on Tibet: Struggles and Sovereignty Explored

17 July 2024, Devdiscourse

Dilip Sinha's book 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty' discusses China's inability to assimilate Tibet, underscoring the region's geopolitical significance. The book's launch saw discussions with prominent figures, highlighting Tibet's history, China's tactics, and India's stance.

China has not successfully assimilated or absorbed Tibet, nor has it won over the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people, former Indian ambassador Dilip Sinha remarked at the launch of his book 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty'. The book was unveiled at the India International Centre in New Delhi on Tuesday.

Sinha's work underscores Tibet's role as a battleground for global geopolitical ambitions and speculates on the future of the region's pursuit of statehood. He highlighted China's reliance on force to control Tibet, a method he argues is rejected by the Tibetan populace, leading to ongoing resistance against Chinese rule.

The event featured a panel discussion including former Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon and Tibetologist Claude Arpi. They explored Tibet's complex history, its geopolitical conflicts, the influence of Tibetan Buddhism, and China's annexation in 1950. Menon praised the book for its honest recounting of Tibet's past and its impact on India, while Arpi criticized China's involvement in the Dalai Lama's reincarnation process, contrasting it with India's non-interventionist stance.

Hope of Returning Home Springs Eternal in the Breasts of Tibetan Exiles in Dharmshala

17 July 2024, Politics Today, Karen Dabrowska

China is like a tiger in a zoo. When it comes out of its territory, it does not know how to hunt.

he atrocity of silence is worse than the atrocity itself". This statement by the makers of the BBC documentary Murder in the Snow, which shows the shooting of Tibetan refugees as they attempted to flee across the Himalayas into Nepal, captures the feelings of Tibetans in the north Indian state of Himachal Pradesh about the plight of their country, which has been occupied by China since 1950.

The 2006 documentary, the first recorded footage of Tibetan refugees trying to cross the border, was screened at the Hope and Stories Café in McLeodganj, home to the Dalai Lama, Tibet's spiritual leader, and the Tibetan government-in-exile. The town of 11,000 – many of them saffron-robed monks and refugees – is a mini Tibet with the large Tsuglagkhang complex. At its heart lies Namgyal Monastery, the personal retreat of the Dalai Lama. It is a magnificent structure that houses a community of dedicated monks. The melodious chants and rhythmic sounds of ceremonial instruments that echo through its walls offer a glimpse of the deep spiritual practices that have flourished here for centuries.

Kundang Tenzin, a Tibetan photographer who founded the Hope Café in 2017, is a man with a mission: to preserve and promote Tibetan culture and to record, document and expose the oppression of the Tibetan people by the Chinese government. He calls his café Hope because he came to India with the hope of returning to Tibet.

"I still have that hope," the soft-spoken, gentle man with an engaging smile told Politics Today. "We always talk about harmony, humility, peace, love and compassion. Our cause [freedom from Chinese oppression and respect for the human rights of the Tibetan people] is based on these ideals".

The Dalai Lama was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989 for promoting peaceful solutions based on tolerance and mutual respect to preserve the historical and cultural heritage of the Tibetan people. "The nonviolent movement works," said Tenzin with confidence and pride. It is not just a fairy tale. Most of the news is about war, terrorist attacks, robbery and rape. The younger generation may think that violence works, but the awarding of the Peace Prize to the Dalai Lama shows that non-violence works.

Following China's communist revolution in 1948, it invaded Tibet in 1950. Overwhelmed, Tibet was forced to surrender its independence. After a failed uprising against Chinese rule in 1959, the 14th Dalai Lama – Tibet's political and spiritual leader – fled into exile in Dharamshala, India, followed by tens of thousands of Tibetans. Since 1959, the Chinese government has exercised total political control over Tibet, using all means of repression, including forced abortion and sterilization, to deter and punish Tibetan resistance.

When asked, "Just because you don't eat a tiger doesn't mean the tiger won't eat you," Tenzin replied: "Non-carnivores can live with the tiger. Tibetans are all over the world. China is like a tiger in a zoo. When it comes out of its territory, it does not know how to hunt.

The Hope Café, which started life as an office, is located on the long, narrow, winding main street of Mcleodganj, where pedestrians, bicycles, motorcycles, rickshaws, cars and four-wheel-drives compete for space. The walls are tastefully decorated with Tenzin's paintings, which speak a thousand words about the suffering of his countrymen, books, Tibetan handicrafts, including the famous and most widely used peace mantra, om mani padme hum.

In the Tibetan Buddhist tradition, it is revered as a powerful tool for spiritual transformation. The mantra is sung, written and engraved on prayer wheels, prayer flags and even mountainsides, symbolizing the desire to spread compassion and peace throughout the world. There are also prayer flags. Tibetans believe that the wind will carry the prayers and mantras around the world to benefit all beings.

Tenzin's dog, the café's mascot, enjoys pride of place on a bean bag. The café has donation boxes for charities, including the street dogs that roam the streets of Mcleodganj uncared for and hungry.

In this haven of peace, a tireless, dedicated team of five run a weekly program. Monday is the day for sharing stories. Niyma Samdup described his hometown of Meto Junga, near Lhasa in Tibet. "It was where the mountains touched the sky. I lived there with my two sisters and my parents. My father had a small bicycle and he went to Lhasa to look for work to feed the family. He did some cleaning, but there was no steady work, so we decided to flee with a kettle, a blanket and some clothes. I was five years old. It took us six months to walk to Nepal.

On Wednesdays, visitors to the café can spend a day living as a Tibetan. Each morning, Nyima Samdup leads a fascinating walk through Tibetan culture, starting with donning a traditional costume and visiting the Dalai Lama's monastery, where the 89-year-old leader gives public lectures. Near the monastery is a chilling photo exhibition of Tibetans who have set themselves on fire in protest at the Chinese occupation. According to the Free Tibet Campaign, more than 150 people have set themselves on fire inside Tibet since March 2009. The number dropped in 2012 when the Dalai Lama said he did not condone the practice but praised the courage of those who had made the ultimate sacrifice for Tibet.

Friday is the day of documentaries and discussion. Tenzin and his colleagues are handing out leaflets about the event in Mcleodganj and have a personal message for those who come to the café in support of Tibet. Murder in the Snow tells the story of more than 70 young people who travelled for three nights in the back of a lorry as it climbed into the mountains. The refugees then walked for another 10 nights, with inadequate clothing and limited food and water, to the foot of the infamous 6000m Nangpa Pass, an ancient trade route to Nepal. As they made their way up the snow-covered pass, a group of mountaineers from a nearby camp watched in horror as Chinese border police opened fire on the refugees. The story went global when American mountain guide Luis Benitez emailed his account of the shooting to a popular climbing website. In 2006, about 100 Tibetans a month were fleeing their country. Today, only about ten a year are able to make the treacherous journey, as the Chinese have stepped up surveillance following demonstrations against their rule in Tibet in 2008.

Like the flight over the mountains, preserving Tibetan culture is an uphill struggle against seemingly insurmountable odds, but Tenzin is undeterred. "Good things are difficult to achieve," he says philosophically, stressing that preserving the Tibetan language is essential to keeping the culture alive.

In August last year, US Secretary of State Antony Blinken, citing a recent UN report on the 'forced assimilation' of one million Tibetan children forced into Mandarin-speaking state boarding schools far from their homes and families, called on China to stop trying to erase Tibet's distinct identity. In December, the European Parliament adopted a resolution calling on China to immediately abolish the boarding schools.

According to reports in various Tibetan-language news media monitored by ChinaAid, an international human rights organization working to promote religious freedom in China, students in Tibetan regions will be required to take full Mandarin Chinese classes from March 2023.

In his first address to the US Congress, Penpa Tsering, the head of Tibet's government-in-exile based in India, known as the Sikyong of the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA), said his country was dying a 'slow death' under Chinese rule. "We are often asked why we don't hear about Tibet anymore," Tsering said.

He blamed this silence on China's "Orwellian gridlock system, using all means of artificial intelligence to monitor people, control the flow of information and close Tibet to the outside world".

The Chinese government continues to spread disinformation about Tibet through official statements and propaganda, paid online commentators and even fake social media accounts.

The United Nations has repeatedly challenged China over human rights abuses in Tibet, including finding that Tibet is the worst area in China for child malnutrition. In 2023, the watchdog group Freedom House again ranked Tibet as the least free country in the world, tied with South Sudan and Syria. It was the third year in a row that Tibet was at the bottom of Freedom House's rankings, with an overall global freedom score of 1 out of 100.

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom's 2024 Annual Report, released on May 1, highlights the deterioration of religious freedom in Tibet due to the Chinese government's intensified repression and "Sinicization" of Tibetan Buddhism – a policy aimed at bringing Tibetan Buddhism under the control of the Chinese Communist Party.

The Chinese government has consistently objected to the Dalai Lama's visits to other countries, particularly his trips to Arunachal Pradesh, a north-eastern Indian state over which China claims territorial sovereignty. Countries that host the Dalai Lama often face repercussions from China. When he visited Mongolia in 2016, Beijing responded by imposing an economic blockade on the landlocked country. It also unsuccessfully pressured Sri Lanka not to invite the Dalai Lama in April this year.

Although King Charles held an informal meeting with the Dalai Lama during his European tour in June 2012, the Dalai Lama did not attend the coronation. In light of this, senior Conservative MPs have described the presence of China's Vice President as 'outrageous'.

From chanting 'Tibet needs freedom' in the streets to participating in protests and political lobbying, Tibetans around the world are resisting China's policies despite 70 years of occupation. The voice of the Tibetan people is carried to the outside world by a number of vocal pressure groups such as the Free Tibet Campaign.

Every morning at Hope Café, Nyima Samdup writes a thought for the day on the blackboard. On day 23 of the year 2024, he wrote "If there is no enemy inside, the enemies outside cannot hurt you."

Tenzin sees independence for Tibet or genuine autonomy as two lines of thought. "If we can live our lives in freedom and our human rights are respected, both are acceptable." But he admits that his dream of returning to Tibet has little chance of coming true unless there is a regime change in China.

"We want the Chinese government to see what we are doing [in Dhamarshala]," says Tenzin. "The Tibetan government in exile provides education and health care. Parents make sure their children speak Tibetan. We will always stand up for Tibet."

Hope has an address. The Hope Café on Joigwara Road in Mcleodganj.

Can Modi 3.0 end tensions with China? What Experts say

17 July 2024, India Today, Shashank Mattoo

India's biggest threat has advocated for a fresh start between the two countries. As the Modi government rings in a new term, will the Modi government finally put an end to clashes or will it stand on ground? India's relationship with China has been both stagnant and pivotal in the past decade.

The General elections 2024 confirmed a comeback for prime minister Narendra Modi's government, infamously known as Modi 3.0. The new government, despite winning for a third consecutive term, has not had it easy.

With growing tensions at the border and across the country, the centre of attention is the government's foreign policy, amid a new closeness between Russia and China.

Prime Minister Narendra Modi's policy on China has swung between talking and fighting for a decade. During his first term in 2014, Modi tried making peace with China but the relationship now stands tattered, as territorial and diplomatic clashes between the two countries, combined with the deadly Galwan Valley clashes that killed 20 soldiers, have only increased in the past decade.

A decade of tensions

In 2020, Chinese troops began the most brazen border violation by China in decades as they coordinated a campaign to move into disputed territories across the Line of Control that divides India and China. The troops began to occupy territories across the northern sector of the LAC that India had claimed and were soon in a standoff with the Indian Army. This lasted for two months, concluding with the deadly Galwan clashes that claimed the lives of 20 Indian jawans. The Galwan clashes effectively broke India's relationship with China.

It did not take long for the territorial tensions to take an economic turn.

India took several measures to cut its economic exposure to China. It aimed at creating everything China provided, locally. A series of bans happened, including Chinese companies and apps, most notably social media platform TikTok. The movement also barred Chinese companies from investing in some Indian firms, stopped them from bidding for road projects, and blocked a $3 billion import of power equipment.

The Present

In 2024, not much has changed. While the border crisis has eased in several hotspots, tens of thousands of troops remain deployed there. India has embarked on a major campaign to improve its infrastructure on the border with China. The country has been making serious decisions regarding tensions with China and the country has remained unpopular within the nation. Political dialogue has also been stalled since India has made it clear that China has to solve the border crisis before things can improve on our end.

A steady future?

Interestingly, there are signals that India may be considering a change in its approach to China. In an interview in April, Prime Minister Narendra Modi said India's relations with China were "important and significant." Indian Defence Minister Rajnath Singh also called for good relations with neighbours and stated that border talks with China were going well.

There have been diplomatic developments on China's end too, as China finally appointed an ambassador to India.

A number of experts also argue that reducing tensions and engaging with China might actually be a good idea as China has also repeatedly called for improvement in ties with India. However, China's proposal to fix relations isn't all in good taste, as China wants India to focus on other issues like economic and climate change instead of persisting over the border issue.

On the economic front, despite several attempts to reduce dependence on China, trade with China has bloomed. In 2022, India-China trade crossed USD 136 billion, which made Beijing India's second-largest trade partner. Trade in electronics, pharmaceutical ingredients, textiles and chemicals has continued to bloom as India's economy still isn't full self-reliant on China. China is also the top supplier of goods to India's most important industrial sectors. The Modi government's efforts to block some of these imports have been met by protests from Indian businesses that need Chinese products.

Meanwhile, India's electronics sector has pushed the government to allow more Chinese investment and joint ventures with Chinese firms. The industry has even asked for easier visa norms to allow Chinese technicians to help Indian electronics companies. They argue that if India is to become a developed country by 2047, its major industries will need investment and know-how from China.

And from a diplomatic perspective, India is not alone in having tensions with China. The countries, however, have not isolated China. Clearly, India is not gaining much from being the only power that has isolated China. Both President Joe Biden of America and PM Albanese of Australia have met China's Xi Jinping.

Experts Say

On resolving issues with China, many of India's best experts have a nuanced answer. While they say that India has done well in holding its ground against China, it has also made clear again and again that China cannot break the rules and get away without consequences. Thus, these experts believe India's policy of holding back a full normalisation of relations until China behaves itself on the border is a sound strategy.

China has a policy of undermining India in South Asia and has good relations with Indian rivals like Pakistan. Considering this, the experts also believe that India-China rivalry isn't going anywhere, despite more engagement or cooperation.

'China fails to win hearts and minds of Tibetan people': Former envoy

17 July 2024, ANI

China has not been able to assimilate or absorb Tibet and it has not been able to win the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people, former Indian ambassador Dilip Sinha said during the launch of his book titled 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty'.

The book 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty' authored by Sinha was unveiled at the India International Centre in the national capital on Tuesday.

Sinha, in his book titled 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty', highlighted how Tibet became the playground for global geopolitical ambitions and what the future may hold for this region fighting for statehood.

Dilip Sinha, the author of the book, stressed that China is doing what they do best, which is to try and control them by force.

"China has not been able to assimilate or absorb Tibet and the Tibetan people; it has not been able to win the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people. So China is doing what it does best, which is to try and control them by force, and that is not acceptable to the Tibetan people, which is why we have a movement. But the very fact that China has to impose all kinds of restrictions shows that there is a lot of resentment against Chinese rule," Sinha told ANI.

The book is a deep dive into Tibet's past and future, based on several documented events, international records, archives, and documents.

It provides the reader with an analysis of how Tibet became the playground for global geopolitical ambitions and what the future may hold for this region fighting for statehood.

The event also featured a brief panel discussion between Dilip Sinha, India's former Foreign Secretary, Shivshankar Menon, and Claude Arpi, a renowned author and Tibetologist.

The discussion covered various topics from the book, including the brief history of Tibet, its complex geopolitical entanglements, the rise of Tibetan Buddhism, and its annexation by China in 1950.

Shivshankar Menon, calling the book 'an honest account' of Tibet's history, said, "The strength of the book is that it is an honest account of what happened—the Great Power Rivalry, how it affected Tibet and how it affected us (India). And it is not only about the great powers, as the Tibetans also had a say, they had agency in their future."

He further said that it is a straightforward account based on the accounts of what happened in the region.

"It is not partisan historiography; it is a straightforward account based on the accounts of what had happened. It shows you how these things work and how they have worked in the past and it triggers fresh thinking about how you approach the question (Tibet)," Menon said.

While speaking to ANI, Claude Arpi shed light on China's tactics for Tibet's cultural assimilation.

Referring to China's intervention in the Dalai Lama's reincarnation, Arpi said, "It is very strange, as they are a communist nation and what do they know about the reincarnation! And China as a state should not intervene in such matters. Moreover, it's a private decision of His Holiness Dalai Lama to reincarnate or emanate, whatever he decides," Arpi said.

Praising India as it has never intervened in the matter, he said, "And in this matter, India is much wiser, as Delhi has always said that it will not intervene, and if the 15th Dalai Lama comes to India, he will be welcomed, just like the 14th Dalai Lama had been welcomed."

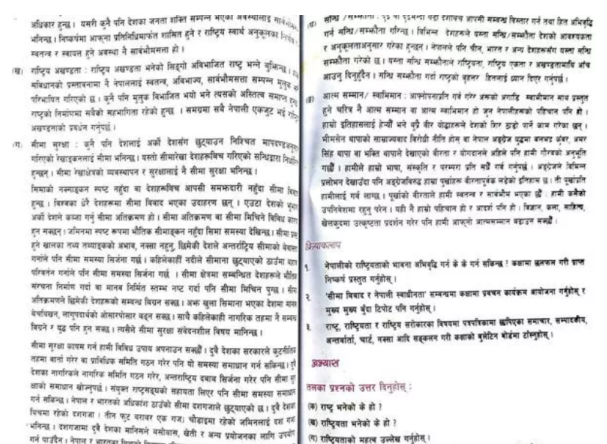

During the discussion, when Claude Arpi was asked about how Tibet has its own identity, the Tibetologist said that Tibet was indeed independent as it had its own currency, passport, flag and representatives.

"Tibet had its currency, its passport, its representatives, and their flag. So Tibet was indeed independent. But I see something else also in the tragedy of the Tibetan people, His Holiness, but it is also a tragedy for the Indian border," he said. (ANI)

Textbook case of bad textbooks

17 July 2024, Nepali Times, Chandra Kishore

Grade 9 Social Studies textbooks present a toxic interpretation of the open Nepal-India border

A chapter on 'Nation and Nationalism' in Grade 9 Social Studies has the following lines: "An open border opens up the possibility of increased human trafficking and drug smuggling. In fact, an open border can poison relations between people and even lead to war."

As the well-known adage goes: you can choose your friends but not your neighbours. There is no alternative to learning to live together.

Relations between neighbours in a housing estate or nation states is (or should be) dependent on long term bilateral interest, not instantaneous calculations. Nowhere is relations between nations become more of an everyday issue than in the borderlands. And how multidimensional relations between countries are managed and nurtured should be the message in school textbooks.

Afterall, the foundations of knowledge and values are laid in school and in the books used to teach them. In most countries the content of textbooks is determined by the state, in fact it is an official document reflecting a country's position on various facets of citizenship. Textbooks determine a person's views on a cross border state.

I have recently been leafing through the Social Studies textbooks for Grades 9 (pictured, below) and 10 published by the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology's Curriculum Development Board at Sano Thimi.

Imagine my astonishment when in the Grade 9 chapter on 'Nation and Nationalism' was this sentence in the section titled Border Security (translated from Nepali): 'An open border opens up the possibility of increased human trafficking and drug smuggling. In fact, an open border can poison relations between people and even lead to war.'

Similarly, a section titled 'Nepal's Friends and Agencies' talks about Nepal being a landlocked country situated between India and China, without indicating that these two neighbours of Nepal are global economic heavyweights.

Whatever the text book may say about the dangers of an open border, all national frontiers should be as open as the one between India and Nepal. Nepal has had a similar open border with Tibet for centuries.

Officially, a country's relation with its neighbour is marked by when diplomatic relations were established. But there is no such date with which we can pinpoint how long Nepal's relations with India and Tibet (now an autonomous region of China) has existed.

Nepal's school textbooks fail to impart on students the importance of the country's relations with these two vast and powerful neighbours. Instead of establishing a narrative that an open border is the ultimate symbol of strong and close ties between countries, Nepali textbooks give it an unhelpful negative connotation.

By contract, Nepal's trans-Himalayan border with China is limited and controlled. Citizens of both countries need passports and visas to enter the other.

From time to time, some Tibetans do enter Nepal bypassing official checkpoints.

The Nepal-India border on the other hand is open because of mutual agreement, friendship, good neighbourliness, religious and cultural diversity, social cohesion, family relations, and common geographical features on both sides.

These economic, cultural, political and historical aspects of the open border should have been incorporated into Nepal's text books. On the other hand, the books should also have explained the reason why the Nepal-China border has not been open since the annexation of Tibet 65 years ago.

The content of the Social Studies text book reflects state neglect. A border is not the result of the wishes of a country on one side, it is the common meeting point of nations.

Because the examination system requires students to memorise and regurgitate content of textbooks, a teacher cannot deviate from what it says even if it is incorrect. A secondary school teacher regards the textbook as the curriculum.

A text book's content therefore does not just impact the point of view of students, but also teachers. More than disinformation on social media, it is the half-truths and false notions in text books that are more dangerous.

In fact, textbooks read like the declaration of the political party in power. This is a result of the curriculum drafters not being inclusive and representative of Nepal's diversity.

This can bring about a tectonic shift in the thought process of young Nepalis, evoke a sense of animosity towards neighbours and 'others'. In a country where political polarisation, ideological divide is already wide, such assertiveness by the dominant community can be sensitive.

Textbooks cannot be propaganda, they cannot be a vehicle to establish a political narrative. They should heal and unite.

Students need to learn and understand Nepal's fragile geopolitical circumstance, and not be exhorted to rock the boat. There is a common socio-cultural milieu that is transboundary because of our shared history and politics.

Nepal's youth need to have a moderate and balanced view of the history, geography and cultural links of the borderlands so they can contribute to cooperation and coexistence.

Global Watch | China's Weaponisation of Water Resources is a Grave Threat to South Asia

17 July 2024, News18, Arun Anand

As a non-signatory of transboundary water treaties, Beijing operates without accountability, leveraging its upstream position to control rivers vital to downstream nations. This disregard for international norms risks catastrophic environmental and humanitarian consequences.

Since the annexation of Tibet in 1950, China has been exploiting Tibet's rich natural resources, especially water, along with violating the human rights of the Tibetan population. Known as Asia's Water Tower, Tibet is the world's largest freshwater reserve outside the polar regions. Tibetan plateau and the Himalayas are also the primary sources of some of the major river basins in South and Southeast Asia such as the Ganges, Brahmaputra, Meghna, Indus and Mekong. Most of these rivers are transboundary in nature and flow through many South and Southeast Asian nations. This inevitably makes these low-riparian nations dependent on transboundary rivers.

To give a clearer picture, Bangladesh has over 57 transboundary rivers, while it shares 54 of them with India. These river basins, thus, are vital not only for meeting the economic needs, but also for the preservation of the ecosystem and biodiversity of the lower riparian nations.

With Tibet under Chinese control, water resources have emerged as China's new weapon to achieve hydro-hegemony. Pertinently, China has undertaken substantial hydroelectricity projects as hydroelectricity is Tibet's second largest energy source for China, after coal. China's hydro-hegemonic ambitions, however, are coming in the way of lower riparian countries' reliance on transboundary rivers flowing through these countries and their increasing demand for water in the face of rapid climate change. China's hydro hegemonic ambitions are reflected in its big dam construction projects, aimed at water diversion and the use of artificial rain projects to regulate rainfall in barren areas of the Tibetan plateau.

China's mega dam construction projects are rooted in its motive of meeting the country's large energy demands, accounting for about 31 per cent of global hydropower as per 2022 data. The development of hydropower based on the Yarlung Tsangpo River finds mention as a 'priority' in China's current 14th Five-Year Plan (2021-25). Because of its dominant position as an upper riparian nation and in order to cater to its increasing hydro-energy demands, the development of China's infrastructure on upper riparian rivers has had a significant impact on water flow, adversely affecting the Mekong and Yarlung Tsangpo rivers.

Meeting energy demands, however, is not China's only interest here. Beijing's control of water flow and river diversion through the operationalisation of mega dams aims to have influence and exert dominance over its neighbouring lower riparian nations. In order to understand this game, it is important to see the flow of upper riparian rivers in China; the Yarlung Tsangpo and Mekong, are both known to be major transboundary rivers. Yarlung Tsangpo River, the world's highest river, originates in the Manasarovar Lake in Tibet that eventually flows through the Indian states of Arunachal Pradesh (as Siang River) and Assam (as Brahmaputra) and bordering country Bangladesh before draining into the Bay of Bengal. The Mekong River, which also originates in the Tibetan plateau of the upper Mekong Basin, flows through six nations in Southeast Asia before flowing out to the South China Sea. This makes Mekong Southeast Asia's largest river basin.

The announcement of China's plan to build the world's biggest hydropower dam (50-metre high with a capacity of 60 GW power production) on the lowest reaches of the Yarlung Tsangpo (Brahmaputra) river, in Medong country bordering India's Arunachal Pradesh, is a case in point. Believed to be three times the size of China's Three Gorges Dam, the world's largest dam presently, the "Super Dam" on the Brahmaputra River is claimed to strengthen China's water security and meet its clean energy goals. However, the location of this new mega-dam construction has raised suspicion for its neighbouring countries.

Accounting for 30 per cent of India's freshwater resource, Brahmaputra River is significant not only for India, but is equally important for Bangladesh. Around 70 per cent of the Bangladeshi population reside in the Brahmaputra River basin. China's opaque approach in its river diversion plan, through this new mega-dam construction, thus risks affecting both countries.

With India, China is already engaged in disputes along the borders and on infrastructure projects. The relationship, in this context, has witnessed further deterioration since 2020. Once constructed, the "Super Dam" is likely to trigger floods in India's Northeast regions during monsoons and cause severe water shortages during the winter season. Moreover, the construction of dams on the Brahmaputra River would also lead to the consolidation of China's baseless territorial claims over the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

The satellite images revealed last year that China has been implementing a dam construction project since 2021 that is close to the Line of Actual Control (LAC). China had also withheld hydrological data during the Doklam Standoff in 2017, violating legally binding accords. This also added to New Delhi's difficulties in managing annual floods affecting its Northeastern states. It is a reflection of how China has been weaponising water resources. Another similar case was witnessed in 2019 when China regulated the water flow of the Mekong River through its 11 large hydropower dams operational along the river basin. The Chinese actions had led to the worst drought witnessed in decades by lower Mekong countries; Myanmar, Laos, Cambodia, Thailand and Vietnam the following year. It had adversely affected millions of people in these countries whose source of livelihood and food were dependent on the Mekong River.

Last year, Bangladesh's Daily Asian Age had reported that China's approach toward water resources, reflected in its rampant dam construction projects, had adversely impacted environmental conditions, and caused large displacement of people and huge debt to low riparian countries in South and Southeast Asia.

China is not only exploiting its neighbours by leveraging its upper riparian status but also using it as an excuse to consolidate its claim over Tibet. The weather modification programme to induce artificial rain over barren plateau is one such example, causing disastrous effects on the climatic conditions of the Tibetan plateau. China's major artificial rain experiment, the Sky High or Tianhe Project plan (2018), aims to boost extra rainfall over the plateau region through the process of fuel-burning chambers that will induce artificial rain. More than 500 of these fuel-burning chambers were reported to be installed across Tibetan mountains in 2018 itself.

The $19 million project witnessed further expansion in 2020, covering an area of over 5.5 million square kilometres (to be developed by 2025). In 2022, drones and rockets launched for the purpose of cloud seeding were seen over China's Sichuan province. This was done to induce rainfall over more than 600 square kilometres of land witnessing extreme heatwaves and drought. Interestingly, now these areas have been witnessing their worst flood conditions for the past two years after the experiment.

The artificial alteration of weather through use of cloud seeding technology is controversial for many reasons, as it directly affects the ecosystem. The Tianhe Project, covering such an expansive area, not only endangers Tibet's environment, but also China's neighbouring countries, especially India. China, through its dam construction projects and weather modification programmes, seem to be weaponising water for its geostrategic interest.

China's recent unilateral decision to donate 3,000 tonnes (1,500 tonnes donated in March and 1,500 tonnes in May) of potable glacial water from Tibet to Maldives, at the latter's request, is the latest example of China's exploitation of Tibet's water resources for geopolitical gains. However, this act of Chinese benevolence had also raised concerns among the Tibetans in Tibet. Apparently, China's water conservation regulations that set the limit on water usage in the Tibetan region were unveiled barely a week prior to the first consignment of water being dispatched to Maldives in March 2024.

Reportedly, Tibetans themselves are facing water shortage in Tibet due to decades of water management and conservation campaigns run by China for the exploitation of Tibetan water resources throughout the plateau. This, along with the dam construction projects, has paved the way for frequent displacement, including, the forced displacement of Tibetans from their ancestral land. Not to mention, Chinese water exploitation has been endangering the climate, flora and fauna of the Tibetan plateau as well.

Being a non-signatory of any transboundary water treaty, China seems to be exploiting Tibetan transboundary water sources as its own sovereign resources, demonstrated by its unilateral and belligerent actions. By leveraging its upper riparian status, China is using water as a weapon, raising environmental and livelihood concerns not only for its neighbouring countries, but also for the Tibetan plateau itself, the source of this "water weapon".

China's border dispute with India

17 July 2024, Taipei Times, Khedroob Thondup

The Sino-Indian border dispute remains one of the most complex and enduring border issues in the world. Unlike China's borders with Russia and Vietnam, which have seen conflicts, but eventually led to settled agreements, the border with India, particularly the region of Arunachal Pradesh, remains a point of contention. This op-ed explores the historical and geopolitical nuances that contribute to this unresolved border dispute.

The crux of the Sino-Indian border dispute lies in the differing interpretations of historical boundaries. The McMahon Line, established by the 1914 Simla Convention, was accepted by British India and Tibet, but never recognized by China, which argues that Tibet was not a sovereign state capable of entering into international agreements. This line demarcates what India considers the boundary of Arunachal Pradesh, a region China refers to as South Tibet.

China has historically shown a willingness to engage in warfare to resolve border disputes, as evidenced by the Sino-Soviet border conflict of 1969 and the Sino-Vietnamese War of 1979.

These conflicts, although violent, eventually led to negotiations and settled borders. The resolution with Russia was finalized in 2003, and with Vietnam, despite ongoing tensions, there has been a formal demarcation of the border.

In contrast, the Sino-Indian border remains unsettled. Several factors contribute to this impasse:

The region holds significant strategic importance for both nations. It serves as a buffer zone and is crucial for the security of India's northeastern states and China's sensitive Tibetan region.

Both countries view the control of the disputed area as a matter of national pride and territorial integrity. China's claim over Arunachal Pradesh as South Tibet is rooted in its assertion of sovereignty over the historical region of Tibet. Both nations have been competing to build infrastructure along the border, which exacerbates tensions and leads to frequent standoffs.

The stalemate persists due to a combination of historical grievances, nationalistic sentiments and geopolitical strategies. Unlike its settled borders with Russia and Vietnam, where pragmatic diplomacy eventually prevailed, the Sino-Indian border is mired in a complex interplay of history and politics. The lack of a mutually recognized legal framework, such as the McMahon Line for India, and China's insistence on historical claims complicate the dispute. For a resolution to be reached, it will require sustained diplomatic engagement, mutual respect for each other's concerns and a willingness to compromise. The resolution of the Tibet issue, as suggested by the Tibetan government-in-exile, could potentially pave the way for a broader settlement of the border dispute. However, this would necessitate a significant shift in China's stance on Tibet, which seems unlikely in the near future.

The Sino-Indian border dispute over Arunachal Pradesh stands out as an unresolved issue in China's border history due to its unique historical, cultural and geopolitical complexities. While China has settled its border disputes with other nations through war and subsequent diplomacy, the path to resolution with India remains fraught with challenges that go beyond the mere demarcation of a boundary line.

Researcher explains how Uighurs are exploited in Xinjiang forced labor regime

16 July 2024, Eurasianet, Erkin Damolla

Western companies benefit from opaque system.

Uighur activists and human rights defenders often contend that major Western electronics and apparel manufacturers profit from the use of slave-like and coerced labor in China, including work done by Uighurs confined in camps in western Xinjiang Province. Mediazona Central Asia discussed the various forms of involuntary labor in Xinjiang with Rune Steenberg, an anthropologist and researcher at the University of Olomouc in the Czech Republic who has long studied the Uighur population in Xinjiang.

He and his colleagues rely on an approach they call "remote ethnography" to form a picture of what is transpiring in Xinjiang. This method relies on anecdotal evidence from those who have direct experience in Xinjiang, as well as close analysis of written accounts and economic data, to compensate for the lack of access for foreign experts to the region.

MZ: How did you collect information about forced labor in Xinjiang?

Steenberg: I worked with German journalists on issues of forced labor, cotton picking, and clothing production in Xinjiang, and also interviewed people who were in a "re-education" camp and forced to work there. So, I have an insider idea of how the system works. I also know a little about labor transfer programs in Xinjiang.

MZ: Please tell us more about the involuntary/coerced labor regime in Xinjiang.

Steenberg: There are three different types of forced or involuntary labor in Xinjiang, each having different degrees of coercion. The most forced and difficult labor occurs in prisons. In Xinjiang prisons, prisoners can be forced to work for decades. Often it is very hard work, physically difficult work in terrible conditions, and no pay, nothing.

Then we have a situation where people are forced to work in the camps, or are transferred from a camp to closed factories, which also operate according to the principles of the camps, where they sew clothes, produce food and various other things. They aren't paid for this either, but the conditions are not as harsh as in prison.

There are also those who have been interned in a camp but are given an opportunity to move from the camp to a factory. This can be described as "liberation." All this camp forced labor, as well as prison "slave" labor, takes place in Xinjiang itself, next to the camps and prisons. People who have had a chance to be released from the camp to work in factories are sometimes transferred to inland China. There, they are given a contract, they sign an agreement, and they are paid some kind of salary, albeit a very low one. Moreover, they work in conditions that are not as bad as those in camps or prisons. I don't know exactly how many people have gone through all this.

A fourth category is the so-called labor transfer programs. This involves people who have not been arrested or detained. They are directly "recruited" to work in various factories, fields, etc. Some people are sort of forced into it because in their village – or wherever they are – they are told that they need to bring so many people to a certain place, for example, to pick cotton.

This practice is not new. It is, in fact, a form of forced labor as well. If someone refuses, there are consequences. But many also sign up for these labor transfer programs voluntarily, to receive a salary, although not very high, and with certain conditions that they can also leave if they want. The reason why many of them sign up for these programs is because they have no alternative, otherwise they will not be able to find a job. Getting a job in Xinjiang is now very difficult, especially for Uighurs who lack education. Many Chinese companies simply do not hire Uighurs, considering that officials say they are terrorists, suspicious, problematic.

Also, as I found out, when many men are detained in “re-education” camps, their wives, sisters and daughters can be sent to factories in so-called new special economic zones in Kashgar and Ghulja. I’ve heard stories of people who were directly involved, who worked in these newly opened factories. For their work they received a modest salary, but the government, at its own expense, arranged for transport to and from villages. It wasn’t entirely voluntary either – if you didn’t show up or didn’t agree to participate, you could get in trouble.

MZ: An important part of the modern Uyghur discourse in the West is to talk about how the forced labor of Uighurs not only benefits Chinese companies, but also some Western firms. How do we know about this?

Steenberg: Of course, it [forced labor] is not used directly by these companies, but by someone in their supply chains. Because of the way the capitalist system is structured, supply chains, as you can imagine, are very long and opaque. So, it’s very difficult to understand where the raw products actually come from. Many of these companies hide behind the fact that they don’t know anything, they just get ready-made products. But the reason why they do this, the benefit they get from it, is that they simply, through forced labor, get very, I repeat, very cheap products. Many of these companies operate factories and supply chains where there is no certainty that they are “clean” and where there is a high probability that forced labor is used. Besides cotton there is also polysilicon for solar cells, which is used by many large companies.

China is not just a market economy, but a state-controlled market economy. Therefore, many of these [Western] companies may have been involved in these labor transfer programs. Some of them may even have directly benefited from forced labor in prisons or camps, or have connections to factories where people were brought either after being in a camp, or which has workers who are wives of prisoners. Until companies and factories open up to transparent inspections, we will be forced to suspect that similar forms of forced labor exist throughout the region.

MZ: You have conducted research on cotton from Xinjiang? Can you discuss your research methods?

Steenberg: It was about a year and a half ago. We interviewed people who worked in the Xinjiang cotton industry, and they told us about the use of forced labor during harvesting and early processing. That is, to extract the seeds from cotton, as well as to clean it, extracting the oil from it, before it can be turned into threads, from which they will then sew fabric, and from it – clothes. So, we researched companies that could source cotton from Xinjiang, bought clothes from them, and tested them in a laboratory. As a result, based on the isotopic analysis of the clothing, we were able to say with a very high degree of confidence that these clothes contained cotton from Xinjiang. Where exactly this cotton was harvested, what kind of cotton, in what field, and so on, of course, is difficult to determine in this way, but this is at least something that we can say for sure.

We also analyzed satellite images of cotton fields, which show the speed of harvest. The Chinese government says that most of the cotton is picked by machines, but if you pick it by machines, they pick it all at once. If you collect it manually, it takes longer. Therefore, satellite images show how quickly a photograph of a field turns from white to dark. This is an indicator of how much of the crop is harvested by machine and how much by hand. Moreover, harvesting is not the only place where forced labor is used. At cotton gins, raw cotton is treated with chemicals, and this is quite hard and in many ways dangerous work, the voluntariness of which we also cannot measure.

Our understanding of forced labor needs clarification. Our ideas about it do not quite correspond to the situation in Xinjiang. As I already said, many people there have contracts, they sign up for work, they are paid a salary, but they are under political pressure to go and do the work, and they have no alternative. Therefore, I believe that this could still qualify as forced labor, and maybe even coercion. So, we need to think more deeply about the terms we use and how we define them, as well as the legal framework that surrounds them. The Xinjiang case can help us take a closer look at this and, I hope, create better tools for analyzing these types of labor.

Chinese soldiers gear up for winter warfare

16 July 2024, The Strategist, Anushka Saxena

China is putting great effort into developing its soldiers’ ability to operate in high-altitude and cold environments, increasing its military capacity relative to India. Skills as simple as shovelling snow have become part of combat training exercises.

Equipment, facilities and procedures are being improved in what appears to be a highly systematic approach to mitigating the challenges of moving and fighting in the Himalayas and adjacent areas.

Since 2015–16, under the leadership of Chinese President Xi Jinping, the People's Liberation Army has undergone significant reforms. Those reforms have concentrated on enhancing combat readiness in the information age, transforming the PLA into a joint, network-centric fighting force by integrating its services, arms and systems. The PLA Western Theatre Command (WTC) has been particularly active in adapting to what the PLA calls 'informatisation' and 'intelligentisation', focusing on securing China's southern and southwestern borders, preparing for both conventional and unconventional warfare and training its soldiers to operate in the challenging terrains and high altitudes of Xinjiang and Tibet.

Terrain and altitude training is a central pillar of the WTC's jointness capabilities, as the ability to achieve interconnected goals in complex environments would shape the results of conflict. Moreover, given that it is the largest theatre command by area and covers both the arid northwestern deserts of Xinjiang and the high-altitude areas of Tibet, along the border with India, adaptation to terrain and altitudes determines the ability of soldiers to fight protracted conflict and conceal postures without disrupting the sustainable flow of everyday resources to combat bases.

Further, because the Indian border is one of the principal operational directions assigned to the WTC, the outcome of any contest between the Chinese and Indian militaries will be determined not just by the quality of weapons systems and combat doctrines, but also by the logistical superiority and adaptation tactics of the soldiers on both sides. In this regard, the WTC's focus on terrain and altitude training is an attempt to gain advantage over the Indian soldier's adaption to fighting in the Himalayas.

WTC's terrain training work includes combat and non-combat tasks. Radar stations in the WTC, for example, are experimenting with ways to ensure a continued supply of tap water, since the detachments of trucks that supply water to base units are often irregular or snowed in. The new measures require investment of intensive resources. Soldiers in the WTC are laying water pipelines and ensuring replenishment of water tanks. A successful case study is that of a radar station under a WTC air force brigade based on a snow-covered plateau in Tibet, which, in February last year connected soldiers' dormitories with running-water supply.

Similarly, shovelling snow in the Tibetan mountains or in the high-altitude desert areas of Xinjiang is a core non-combat task required of WTC personnel. While it is a non-combat task, it has significant applications in combat work. For example, a CCTV report from January 2023 highlighted the significance of practising snow-shovelling for a Xinjiang border detachment. The detachment, based at the foot of the Barluk Mountains, faced 200 days of gale-force winds in the new year period that led to snow accumulation, estimated to be as high as 2–2.5 metres and extending as far as 60 metres from the detachment's base. So, when members of the detachment undertook a border observation patrol and encountered severe snow accumulation, they demonstrated snow-shovelling skills. Then they had to reach the final patrol point on foot.

Combat tasks are also designed to account for challenging terrain and high-altitude conditions. For instance, earlier this year, an army brigade from the WTC engaged in snowfield training to improve combat readiness in cold, high-altitude and low-oxygen environments. This approach aligns with the PLA's standard of effective training, in which combat scenarios are accurately simulated and tasks are assigned to test various components of joint and integrated operations.

Further, WTC soldiers posted along the Kunlun Mountains (extending into Xinjiang and Tibet) have begun building army command posts concealed near snowlines at altitudes of over 4000 metres. The goal has been to continuously lead troops to conduct effective on-site research, planning and training in high-altitude zones. Officers in the command posts formulate measures for high-altitude training and preparedness and conduct concealment tests for soldiers, vehicles and tents, sometimes changing locations every few months. Then, soldiers are required to pursue other combat-preparedness tasks, such as testing of marching speed over several hundred kilometres, as well as practising live-fire shooting to determine ballistic performance of artillery at various altitudes. From the Indian perspective, this is significant because, over time, some of those concealed positions and tactical arrangements have come to restrict Indian forces' access to key patrolling points along the de facto border, the Line of Actual Control.

Finally, since August 2022, border defence companies in Xinjiang have been testing a new 'integrated individual system', which includes a new-type helmet, multifunction night-vision goggles, a portable computer, an individual load carrier and an assault rucksack. The challenge will be to integrate adaptation to hypoxic conditions with the ability to carry heavy loads that come with this new integrated system. (The material load seems to be about 30kg). This indicates that the next step in combat altitude training in the WTC is for individual soldiers to become more independent and resilient.

Overall, as Indian and Chinese soldiers gear up for long winters along the border, India has much to look out for in relation to the WTC's efforts in terrain and altitude training. At the same time, the challenges that personnel of the WTC encounter while operating in hypoxic conditions are intense and may require intensive investment in training and resource management to overcome.

Anti-Cult Propaganda in Ulugqat County, Xinjiang —Where There Are No “Cults”

15 July 2024, Bitter Winter, Zeng Liqin

For thirteen years a “horseback anti-cult police squad” has visited herders who have never met a “cult.” Why?

Ulugqat County, Xinjiang, is one of the two westernmost counties in China. It is also one of the most impervious, with inhabitable mountains and deserts accounting for more than 99% of its surface. 88% of the scarce population (around 60,000) is made out of ethnic Kyrgyz, many of them herders living at altitudes of 3,000 or 4,000 meters who have never left their pastoral area in their lives.

It looks like an unlikely region to be targeted by the xie jiao, a Chinese word translated in English by the CCP itself as “cults” but in fact indicating since Imperial times organizations spreading “heterodox” teachings. It is thus with some surprise that “Bitter Winter” has learned that one Jiakupuwali Baikeyaoli, deputy director of the Bostanterak Police Station of the Wuqia County Public Security Bureau, is being promoted in Chinese media as one of the best anti-xie-jiao fighters in the country. The police officer reported that he and his “horseback anti-xie-jiao police squad” have visited remote villages bringing there anti-xie-jiao propaganda for thirteen years.

What makes the story as told by Chinese TV networks and media unique is that, admittedly, in all these years the Bostanterak police officers have found in their area no xie jiao at all. This is confirmed by the herders who appear in the propaganda videos and articles to thank Jiakupuwali for his good work. “Although I have never come into direct contact with a xie jiao, I have always heard of cases of harm caused by xie jiao,” one herder said. The herder lives in a grazing site at an altitude of 4,000 meters and at 200 kilometers from the nearest township. He has never visited a large city and has rarely met people from outside his pastoral area in his life, except the police officers and other government bureaucrats who periodically visit the site.

The question the propaganda does not discuss, thus, is why exactly thirteen years of anti-xie-jiao propaganda were needed in a remote area where there are no xie jiao. By examining the propaganda carefully, one can find some answers. While ostensibly the propaganda targeted the religious groups banned as xie jiao, in fact the brochures distributed and the talks given by the police officers warned more broadly against “illegal” religion, “superstition,” and “anti-scientific and anti-government ideas.”

The fight against the xie jiao is a pretext to promote materialism, atheism—and loyalty to the Communist Party. Prominent in the propaganda about the “horseback anti-xie-jiao police squad” is a herder introduced as “Uncle Mamtsulaiman Jiakifu, a 30-year-old party member of the Kyrgyz ethnic group.” He reported on the effect on him of the indoctrination against the xie jiao: “I want to play the vanguard and exemplary role of a Communist Party member and tell my family, relatives and fellow villagers that for resisting the xie jiao you should always follow the Party and listen to the Party,” he said. The old herder has never seen a xie jiao—but he perfectly understands what the propaganda is all about.

Bhuchung D Sonam - “Human experience is as deep as it is vast”

15 July 2024, Hindustan Times, Chintan Girish Modi

Dharamsala-based Tibetan poet, translator and publisher Bhuchung D Sonam talks about the role of literature in the Tibetan freedom struggle and about editing Under the Blue Skies: A Tibetan Reader, an anthology of fiction, poetry and non-fiction. How do you view the role of literature in the Tibetan freedom struggle?

Acts of storytelling are crucial for a small exiled community such as ours because we are fighting against Chinese colonial power that has a humongous state propaganda machinery continuously churning out untruths. Literature also deepens our sense of identity and connection since Tibetan refugees are scattered around the world.

Your book Under the Blue Skies: A Tibetan Reader aims to offer “a fresh and an alternative window to the individual and collective Tibetan psyche”. What kind of stereotypical or jaded representations are you looking to challenge? Whom do you hold responsible for the way in which Tibetans have been represented in literature?

For many centuries Tibet and the Tibetan people have been written about by outsiders. Although Tibet has a very rich repository of Buddhist literature, we did not invest much in producing secular literature based on human experience. There are a lot of misperceptions about us which are a consequence of writings done by others, primarily Western travellers, missionaries, diplomats and fantasy-seekers.

Since we were forced into exile in the aftermath of China's occupation of Tibet, Tibetans have started to write in English and other languages. Today, there is a new generation of Tibetans who have linguistic skills to articulate their deepest thoughts and opinions. As a result, non-Tibetans have access to Tibetan writing, which is based on lived experience and hence free of stereotypes.

Tell us about the fresh and alternative voices and perspectives that you have chosen to highlight. What sets them apart from earlier writing? How did you find them?

My own writing, and in fact writings of most contemporary Tibetan writers, are based on our first-hand experience as people who are forced into the space of others. We write about loss, anger, frustration, loneliness as well as hope that things will change for the better. A new generation of Tibetan writers like Lekey S Leidecker, Kaysang, Tenphun and others have unique voices reflecting their realities. There is a generation of Tibetans attuned to the tenet that, as Kaysang writes, "Living does not mean not dying" and, as Tenphun writes, "Tibetans who have a small store of Hindi vocabulary siphoned off from barmaids, taxi drivers and barbers". Their lives are, as Kalsang Yangzom writes, "an intersection of many selves, pilgrimage to an ancestral home, India or Tibet?"

The Own Voices movement in literature draws attention to the importance of authentic representation and marginalised people taking control of their narratives but also gets criticised for limiting the scope of literature by telling writers that they should stick to writing about their lived experience and not appropriate other people's stories. What do you think?

I think human experience is as deep as it is vast. With any writer from any community, particularly those who are/have been historically marginalised, exploring his/her own innermost thoughts, wisdom and silence, the story is bound to be unique to his/her own self/community. When a person honestly articulates his or her deepest emotions, they will echo universal human sentiments.

The question of appropriation arises when people I call "story-hunting tricksters" travel to remote places spawning exotic tales spiced up with mysticism and their own preconceived ideas, and then sell these tales as original stories or accounts of a people and a culture they didn't even try to understand. This has happened to many marginalised communities, including Tibetans.

The book has three sections: fiction, poetry and non-fiction. What made you decide on this structure instead of grouping writers based on the subjects they write about?

Although we have been writing and producing works of literature for several decades in exile, there hasn't been an anthology containing all three categories in one title. I thought it would be both useful and interesting for outsiders to have Tibetan fiction, poetry and non-fiction in a single edition – a kind of an entryway to the world of Tibetan literature. The other, and perhaps more important, reason was that Under the Blue Skies was to be a supplementary textbook in Tibetan refugee schools, where the students have always been taught Indian and foreign literature in English. How wonderful it would be if Tibetan children are introduced to and taught Tibetan writing in English!

Given the stature and the popularity of the Dalai Lama, several non-Tibetans assume that most Tibetans are Buddhist and the diversity is often overlooked. In the process of putting together Under the Blue Skies, did you seek out Muslim, Christian, atheist and agnostic voices from the Tibetan community? What were the challenges that you faced?

It was the Fifth Dalai Lama in the seventeenth century who granted a site in Tibet's capital city for the Muslims, who were mostly a merchant community, to build the first mosque. There is also a small number of Tibetan Christians in eastern Tibet. As far as I know, there has never been interreligious disharmony in Tibet although we had witnessed disputes within the various schools of Tibetan Buddhism. In exile, the Dalai Lama has played a crucial role in the survival of the Tibetan struggle as well as continuation of its culture and spiritual traditions. His charisma and visionary leadership are recognised throughout the world, and consequently Tibet is viewed through this lens.

I am not aware of Tibetan Muslim or Christian writers who produce secular literature, which was what I was looking for in Under the Blue Skies. Tibet and its people have been typecast, by and large, through a Buddhist perspective, which is not an entirely accurate representation of Tibet. The country has many different shades, some of them are subtle and yet important. Therefore, I wanted the anthology to be free from religious didactics and prevalent stereotypes.

The book is published by Blackneck Books, an imprint of TibetWrites. How does your publishing model work? Is it based on grant funding or does it depend entirely on book sales?

We have an advisory group of prominent Tibetan writers, who read sample chapters of our proposed titles. Based on their advice and feedback, we make our publication decisions. TibetWrites operates entirely on a voluntary basis. None of us get paid for what we do. Our primary goal is to promote secular creative Tibetan writing. We do get some funding for our publication projects from The Tibet Fund.

What similarities and differences do you notice between creative writing among the Tibetan diaspora living in India, Bhutan, Nepal, USA, Canada, and other countries?

I am neither a scholar nor have I done any research or studied literature for that matter, and therefore I am not in a firm position to comment on this. But some common themes displayed in their writings are exile, loss, hope and an uncertain sense of identity as they are forced to negotiate two or sometimes even more social, political and cultural realities in their daily lives.

Tenphun, who was born in Tibet and grew up in exile, writes: "I forgot my roots / I wish, I only wish to go back to my childhood sailing paper boat". Lekey Leidecker, born and raised in the West, writes: "in a long history of using / brown people at convenience / I recite Tibetan phrases / foreign to my English-immersed tongue as theirs, / At a local Quaker meeting". Tenzing Rigdol, born in Nepal, grew up in India and living in USA, writes: "When I wake up, / May I find all my past to be / Just a dream - / A poetic error, A bad handwriting / A terrible comedy". Their writings are as different as their backgrounds, and yet a deep sense of dislocation and out-of-placeness bind them.

Being an editor of an anthology is an entirely different experience from being a poet. What do you love most about both these roles?

I like to read and write. Editing is working with words, and writing is playing with words. Editing maybe a little more logical and writing more emotional, but both are fundamentally the same vocation.

Tell us about the other projects that you are working on.

Blackneck Books published four titles last year, a novel in Tibetan called Murder of Tenzin, a non-fiction book called The Tragedy of the Modom House and two volumes of poetry – Carrying Memories and Learning Tibetan. We have two titles to be published in 2024 – a memoir and a book of poems. We have offers for a Hindi anthology of Tibetan poetry and a Spanish one too. We will have to see how they go. Otherwise, we receive proposals for individual poems that people want to translate into other languages. These are mainly for online publications and sometimes for magazines as well.

Interview with Rinzin Namgyal on Life, Tibet and the Dalai Lama

14 July 2024, Ij- Reportika

Can you share your/family's journey of moving to India and how it has influenced your professional and personal life?

I am Rinzin Namgyal, born and raised in the Phuntsokling Tibetan refugee settlement in Odisha. Our settlement comprises five camps, and both our professional and private lives are significantly influenced by societal factors rather than merely family factors, as we live in a Tibetan-concentrated refugee settlement. However, in my case, my family has played a crucial role.

My grandparents fled Tibet and entered Indian territory through Bomdila (Arunachal Pradesh border), working as road construction workers in the Kullu-Manali region. Like many early Tibetan refugees, they toiled in such jobs for their livelihood. This instilled in me a profound understanding of the hardships they endured, as the Tibetan community started from the ashes. Their resilience remains a source of pride and inspiration for me. Additionally, my father served in the Indian Army's Special Frontier Force, a Tibetan guerrilla force established to counter the Chinese in the high Himalayan mountains. His dedication to Tibet, despite residing in India and dreaming of returning one day, has been a tremendous catalyst for me. It inspired me to pursue studies related to China, driven by a desire to contribute to my own identity and honour His Holiness the Great 14th Dalai Lama, who is the sole leader responsible of what we are today.

How has your experience living in India shaped your views on Tibet and its geopolitical significance?

For many Tibetans entering Indian universities, identity issues often arise due to the differences from native Indian students. My perspective on Tibet has recently evolved, prompting questions such as: What if His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama were not with us tomorrow? What if the Indian government revoked our refugee status? Where would we go? Is the current Central Tibetan Administration truly self-reliant? These questions instill a sense of urgency for having our own land.

For many Tibetan students, the geopolitical significance of Tibet has recently shifted. Chinese aggression at the Indian border, environmental crises, and the consequences of irresponsible Chinese development across the Tibetan plateau—known as the world's third pole—highlight Tibet's strategic importance. This has helped forge an understanding of Tibet's geopolitical significance, positioned at the centre of South and Central Asia, serving as a vital bridge.

EDUCATION

What motivated you to pursue an MA in East Asian Studies at Delhi University?

Since childhood, I have felt a strong sense of duty to repay what His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama has given us. Privately, I have always had a keen interest in History, Politics, and International Relations. Consequently, I pursued a Bachelor's degree in History, delving into Chinese history. As I progressed to my Master's, I realised that this course (M.A EAST ASIAN STUDIES) would most appropriately serve my identity, interests, and aspirations. I also plan to pursue a PhD in China Studies in the near future.

How has your education helped you in your current roles at All India Radio and the Foundation for Non-violent Alternatives?

As a research intern at the Foundation of Non-Violent Alternatives, a public policy organisation focused on the objective study of Tibet, Tibetan affairs, and their security implications for India, I find my work both convenient and motivating. I cover topics related to Tibet, China, and Xinjiang, including recent developments in these areas since this area is also my Master's level study. FNVA provides an excellent environment for learning and growth, with colleagues who have extensive experience and insight into these fields. Moreover, I work as a Tibetan translator and announcer for All India Radio, which kept me informed about daily developments in Tibet. Overall, my work and education align perfectly, allowing me to broaden my understanding, deepen my knowledge, and continually improve.

Tibet

What are your thoughts on the current situation in Tibet, especially in light of recent developments vis a vis China-Philippines tussle in South China Sea, Taiwan issue and India-China standoffs?

The question itself implies an answer. The issues mentioned are recent developments that have come into the spotlight, yet the situation in Tibet stands in stark contrast. Since the Chinese occupation of Tibet in 1959, Tibet has faced a serious existential threat and is on the brink of a complete genocide of Tibetan identity through Beijing's programmes, such as colonial boarding schools, aimed at assimilating Tibetan younger generations into mainstream Han culture. However, the China-Philippines tussle, the Taiwan issue, and the India-China standoffs provide a perfect example of what Tibetans have been warning about for the past seven decades: do not feed the dragon (China) through trade. China's plan is one of expansionism and establishing a Beijing rule-based international order. The situation in Tibet is fundamentally a civilisational, sovereignty, and human dignity issue, rather than merely a human rights issue. Given these standoffs with major Asian economies, it seems unlikely that the situation in Tibet will improve in the foreseeable future, as it clearly indicates Beijing's prioritisation of national security and expansionism.

Second International Tibet Youth Forum 3-5 July, Dharamshala

How do you see the role of international advocacy groups and policies, such as the US Resolve Tibet Act, in shaping the future of Tibet?

This is an intriguing question, as the current 16th Kashag Sikyong (President) Penpa Tsering of the Central Tibetan Administration places significant emphasis on raising awareness and forming advocacy groups. As a member of Delhi V-TAG (Volunteer Tibet Advocacy Group), we strive to raise awareness about the challenging situation in Tibet. Recently, we hosted our second International Tibet Youth Forum, aimed at educating V-TAG members worldwide on effective campaigning, lobbying, and global awareness strategies. I view such advocacy groups as the genesis of the Tibetan freedom movement, given that they consist largely of educated young people exposed to diverse cultures. Historically, such advocacy groups have played a tremendous role in enacting legislation like the Tibet Policy and Support Act 2020 and the US Resolve Tibet Act 2024 in the United States through relentless lobbying with Congressmen. However, in Europe and India, while we continue our efforts, the level of response is lower than in the United States. These advocacy groups not only advocate but also educate on the Tibet issue, which is crucial for Tibet's future. I consider the US Resolve Tibet Act a milestone in our struggle. Firstly, it explicitly states that Tibet and China are distinct entities, reaffirms that the Tibet issue remains unresolved, and recognizes Tibet's historical regions like Gansu, Yunnan, Qinghai, and Sichuan as integral parts of Tibet. This stands as a direct challenge to the One China Policy. Such legislation has placed the Tibetan issue on a completely different platform, allowing us to advocate for both complete independence and genuine autonomy, which is our official stance. The Act has been immensely helpful in advancing our movement.

Geopolitics

What are your thoughts on the broader geopolitical dynamics involving China, Tibet, and other ethnic regions like East Turkestan?

The Chinese occupation of Tibet and East Turkestan holds significant geopolitical implications. As early as the 1950s, Indian intellectuals and statesmen like Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and V.D. Savarkar warned about the profound geopolitical shifts and consequences for India. Firstly, Tibet is rich in natural resources, including critical minerals like lithium and freshwater. The Sanjiangyuan National Park in the Amdo region of Tibet (Qinghai Province) is known as the "water tower of China."

Secondly, in terms of trade, East Turkestan serves as a gateway to Central Asian countries and thereby to Europe. Beijing's strategic maneuvers through initiatives like the Belt and Road Initiative underscore the geopolitical significance of this region.

Thirdly, within China, there is a belief that safeguarding the peripheries (Tibet and East Turkestan) ensures the security of the core (Mainland China). Losing control over these regions would be a substantial setback for China.

How do you foresee the future of Tibet-Sino and Indo-China relations evolving in the coming years?

I firmly believe that Beijing's approach and the root of unrest in Tibet hinge solely on two factors: INTENTION AND METHOD. Their aim is to assimilate us and turn us into robots of the CCP, which is utterly incompatible with our centuries-old culture. Their intention is to impose uniformity rather than celebrate diversity, and their method involves harsh assimilation through the sinicisation of Tibetan population, neglecting the rights guaranteed by both the Chinese Constitution and laws on ethnic autonomy.

Our future security depends on aligning intentions and methods to reflect mutual aspirations for diversity and genuine respect. In my view, the future of Tibet-China relations rests on the CCP's intentions and methods. Correcting these can lead to the Great Unity described in Chinese classics.

The ongoing Indo-China issue is largely rooted in Tibet, as China has employed salami-slicing tactics and border aggression towards India. This situation underscores two key points: Firstly, the current border standoff reveals that historically, Tibet was an independent country, and thus, India and China did not traditionally share a border. Consequently, Chinese claims over territories stem from a lack of historical territorial understanding.

Secondly, this issue is alarming for India, prompting a reevaluation towards supporting Tibet's independence based on historical truths. Without a permanent resolution to the Tibet issue, there can be no lasting solution to India's and Bhutan's border concerns with China.

The Dalai Lama

What are your thoughts on the future of the Dalai Lama's institution, particularly concerning the selection of the next Dalai Lama?

Firstly, there is currently a span of more than 15 years since His Holiness the 14th Dalai Lama himself stated, "I will live for 113 years." Additionally, many great Tibetan scholars and yogis prophesied that the 14th Dalai Lama would have the longest lifespan among all Dalai Lamas.

The continuity of the Dalai Lama institution in the future hinges entirely on the Tibetan people's desire for a 15th Dalai Lama, a sentiment frequently expressed by His Holiness himself, who is regarded as the manifestation of Tibet's patron saint, Avalokiteshvara.

Regarding the selection of the 15th Dalai Lama, it presents both a challenging and straightforward situation. Firstly, China's State Religious Affairs Bureau Order No. 5 (July 2007) stipulates that the CCP holds the responsibility for selecting the next Dalai Lama, despite the Communist Party's atheist stance. This issue is of significant concern as it threatens the sanctity of the Dalai Lama lineage.

However, it is also straightforward because His Holiness himself stated, "If I pass away in exile (India), I will definitely be reborn in the free world (outside of Chinese-controlled territory)," emphasizing that the sole authority rests with the Dalai Lama's wishes and the Tibetan people. Next year, as His Holiness, the supreme holder of the Shakya lineage, turns 90, it has long been anticipated that he will convene a conference involving high-level Tibetan Buddhist masters and bureaucrats. During this event, there will be a declaration on the next 15th Dalai Lama, accompanied by clear instructions and protocols signed by the current 14th Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso.

Regarding the reincarnation process, there are two systems: one where the successor is born before the current Dalai Lama's passing (Med-Dey Tulku), and another where they are born afterward. Given the current situation in Tibet, I believe the 15th Dalai Lama will follow the Med-Dey Tulku system to ensure continuity during the regency period.

However, US legislative acts, including those concerning the 15th Dalai Lama, are a positive step in preserving the sanctity of the Dalai Lama lineage and other democratic countries should follow.

Bilateral diplomacy is a never-ending tightrope walk for India and China

14 July 2024, The Week, Satarupa Bhattacharjya

Observers say Beijing and New Delhi barely talk these days.

DIPLOMACY

Sino-Indian diplomacy has seen good and bad days over the past seven decades. The bilateral relationship had experienced an intense freeze for 15 years, following the 1962 war. It plunged to a new low after Indian and Chinese soldiers were killed in a clash in the Galwan river valley in June 2020. More skirmishes, though nonfatal, have taken place since then, amid a troops build-up, in their thousands, and partial pullback. Despite a series of military meetings, the standoff in certain parts of the border continues, with major implications for foreign policy.

Diplomacy is struggling. The lack of direct flights, suspended four years ago, is an indication. Indian observers of Sino-Indian relations said Beijing and New Delhi barely talked these days. Chinese analysts said back channels of communication should be opened.

In his message to Prime Minister Narendra Modi on June 11 to congratulate him on his election victory, Chinese Premier Li Qiang said, "China is willing to work with India to push forward bilateral relations in the right direction." India wants to talk about "border issues" with China, External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar told the media after the new government was formed.

Diplomacy is struggling. The lack of direct flights, suspended four years ago, is an indication. Indian observers said Beijing and New Delhi barely talked these days.

China views the decades-long dispute as a "leftover problem" of British colonialism and wants to go about business as usual in other areas such as trade, where it exports a lot more than it imports (India's trade deficit was nearly $85 billion in 2023-24). India wants a return to status quo—as things were before mid-2020—along the Line of Actual Control. China's new ambassador to India, Xu Feihong, arrived in April. The 18-month delay in his appointment was the longest for the post since relations were normalised after the war.

"The boundary question won't be settled overnight. We need to talk, but China needs to undo its attempt to change facts on the ground," said Ashok Kantha, who was India's ambassador to China from 2014 to 2016. Ma Jiali, director of the Centre for Strategic Studies at China Reform Forum, a Beijing think tank, said boundary was not the only issue, and that China and India could discuss economic cooperation, cultural exchanges, and finding common ground on international issues, such as energy security, climate change and regional peace. "Disengagement or deployment depends on the ground situation, but also on political relations."

India's concerns include the very uneven economic relationship. Trade deficit aside, a reliance on Chinese imports and the limited market access for Indian companies in China are other concerns. Post-pandemic, the global supply chain issues have shown that "you can't be too dependent on one country", said Kantha. Added to that are current concerns about the Chinese economy and geopolitics.

India has been working on the securitisation of its economic interests. The government changed India's foreign direct investment policy in April 2020. Now, prior approval for foreign investments from countries sharing a land border with India is mandatory. While India shares land borders with several countries, the measure impacts China the most. Chinese investment in India has declined in recent years alongside the government crackdown on businesses. Chinese smartphone companies were sponsoring cricket in India not so long ago.

Andy Mok, senior research fellow at the Beijing-based Centre for China and Globalisation, said trade was a bright spot, despite the challenges. "Tackling market access barriers and ensuring fair regulations can cultivate a better trade relationship."

A 'Leading Small Group' is a body of the Communist Party of China that directs foreign policy. Such groups tasked with policy recommendations have become prominent during President Xi Jinping's tenure. The ministry of foreign affairs follows the guidelines in managing policy. In India, the parliamentary standing committee on foreign affairs, with MPs from different political parties, has a substantial say in foreign policy, while the ministry of external affairs runs the show in coordination with the prime minister's office.

"Unlike India, the Chinese system is opaque in terms of the implementation of foreign policy," said Srikanth Kondapalli, professor of China studies at Jawaharlal Nehru University, Delhi. Revelations seldom come even years later if Chinese leaders publish their memoirs. They rarely share personal anecdotes from their time on the job or opinion on policy.

China's foreign policy at the moment is defined by expansive territorial claims that it is pushing hard to secure, said Ian Chong, who teaches Chinese politics at the National University of Singapore. China and India are major geopolitical actors. "To the extent that their interests diverge, there will be friction, as indeed we have seen over disputed parts of their border," said Chong.

The foreign policy objectives for both, as with many other countries, are dealing with the effects of de-globalisation, tensions in US-China relations and the conflicts in Ukraine and Gaza. "India and China are trying to keep their moorings intact, while putting their national interests in the forefront," said Alka Acharya, professor of East Asian studies at JNU. China has criticised the Quad, or the quadrilateral security grouping of the US, Japan, Australia and India, as a bloc aimed to contain its rise. For India, China's power assertions in South Asia and its closeness with Pakistan have been hard to ignore.

Beijing and New Delhi want the relationship to stabilise, but they must talk and negotiate, said Qian Feng, director of research at the National Strategy Institute, Tsinghua University, Beijing. "Chinese decision-makers definitely see India as a power." The growth of the Indian economy is not the only reason. Singapore, for instance, has been economically strong for long, but it is a city state and enjoys good relations with China, said Qian. India is a country of 1.4 billion people and its foreign policy is perceived to be autonomous.

Kantha said Quad was not an Asian version of NATO. Besides, India is a major player in groupings with China, such as BRICS and the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation. "China is not supportive of India's rise," he said. A permanent member of the UN Security Council, China has been scuttling India's bid for a seat at the table. The other four—the US, France, Britain and Russia—have offered India their support.

Both a common and a complex factor in India-China relations is Russia. China and Russia share what they call a "limitless partnership", more pronounced since the Russian annexation of Crimea in 2014 and cemented further following western sanctions against Russia for invading Ukraine in 2022. "This is the new international model," Qian said of Sino-Russian relations.

India-Russia relations go back in history. India has diversified its defence imports over the years, yet trade with Russia has continued in other sectors. China and India have emerged as the biggest importers of Russian oil. India, which has a smaller trade deficit with Russia, is wary of at least one aspect of the China-Russia relationship. "India is against the transfer of strategic technology from Russia to China. It could be passed on to Pakistan," Kondapalli said. These include the S-400 air defence system, which is among the world's most advanced technologies.

Russia supplies weapons to India, China and some other countries. China is Pakistan's main supplier. At its peak in 2005, China accounted for 60 per cent of all Russian deliveries of major weapons. But that share has fallen to 10 per cent since 2010. After difficult negotiations, Russia and China moved to a new level of arms trade in 2015, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute that tracks defence export and import around the world. "We have concerns about Russia-China relations and the sale of arms to Pakistan. China is aware of our concerns," Kantha said.

Sino-Russian relations have come a long way since the Sino-Soviet split, but are not without questions. China has given an old Chinese name to the Russian far eastern city of Vladivostok, and other Chinese names to seven Russian locations near its border, in its official documents. "President Vladimir Putin doesn't protest because he needs Xi's blessings," Kondapalli said. Chinese presence has also increased in the vast resource-rich Russian region of Siberia.

In the early 1990s, China and Russia began to demilitarise their shared border and resolved the disputes within the next decade. "Emulating the China-Russia model of overcoming historical tensions could be similarly advantageous for India," said Mok. "But it requires pragmatism."

It's time for India to revise its voice on Tibet

14 July 2024, Tibetan Review

This is a quick rebut of the article 'It's time for India to reclaim its voice on Tibet' by Suhasini Haidar published in The Hindu on June 27, 2024. For the unenlightened, the article was a polemic on the US delegation that arrived at Dharamsala on Jun 18. Given that it was written after a lapse of some days of the event, the piece sure is a well-meditated one. However, one could not, try as hard as one may, fail to go away with the feeling that the structuring of the arguments and articulation of the narrative is dilettantish. The following scrutiny of selected arguments put forward in the article would prove it so.

The US taking centre stage in India on the issue of Tibet is not a reflection of weakness on India's part. If at all, it shows the strength of India in allowing the US to do it. And as for the US, coming to Dharamsala is the only path to take. They cannot go to Tibet for obvious reasons and Dharamsala is where the instrumentalities of the exiled Tibetan political system are located. As for the 'carefully calibrated foreign policy narrative on Tibet', the author is missing the wood for the tree. It is easy to see that the whole exercise is laid out to spin the narrative out of control while still retaining control. What is more surprising is that a seemingly seasoned political commentator is choosing to equate humanitarian aid with political aid. Indeed, there is no other country in this world more gracious and grandfatherly to the Tibetan people than India. However, India has been tone-deaf when it comes to countless pleas for political support as is known to all and sundry.

As for the claim by the author that India has formulated its stand on the Tibet issue informed by its sensitivities on sovereignty and territorial integrity, India never had any compulsion to condone the Chinese invasion of Tibet in the first place. On the contrary, it had all the strategic reasons to not allow a Chinese advance on Tibet. It is one of the greatest mysteries of modern geo-politics as to why India looked the other way while its small neighbour was ravaged. Even worse, after recognising Tibet as a part of China subsequently, India unwittingly ceded or at least created grounds for ceding the erstwhile sphere of influence of political Tibet to China. The claims on parts of Arunachal Pradesh and some areas in Ladakh by China are on behalf of Tibet. China never had any border with India throughout history until the Faustian bargain was made.

And the fear that India is being relegated to the backseat in the Tibet issue is unfounded. When you are either not in a condition or inclined to drive the car, having a good driver take over is not such a bad idea. The obtained geo-political stands and standings necessitate such a manoeuvring. As a political commentator, the author should have known this unless she has chosen not to. As for the charge of superfluosity of the event, the delegates have come to interface with the elected leaders of the exile government, meeting His Holiness is a courtesy call in an official capacity and spiritual quest in the personal capacity of the members of the delegates.

Lastly, the argument that India is getting 'bigfooted' by the US because the US is being readily accommodative and obliging to Tibetan people is disingenuous at so many levels. The 17th Karmapa was left with no option but to move to the US in the aftermath of the currency notes episode. As for the succession issue, this is an issue that His Holiness and the Tibetan people would tackle when they get to that bridge. The best that the rest of the world can do is cheerlead the process. Moreover, the larger US-China contestation would be at the forefront of global geopolitics for the foreseeable future. There is hardly anything to be gained by being envious of it.

Last-gasp bid to use Dalai Lama to destabilize China

14 July 2024, China Daily, Yan Yongshan

On Friday local time, US President Joe Biden signed a controversial bill related to Xizang, continuing the United States' practice of using domestic legislation to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. This new legislation, however, goes further than previous efforts by introducing the claim that Xizang's sovereignty is unresolved, denying the historical fact that Xizang has been part of China since ancient times. This move raises serious questions about the US' commitment to the rules-based international order it claims to uphold. Why has the US, disregarding historical facts and international consensus, decided to flagrantly violate its own longstanding position on Xizang?

First, the US aims to use this unresolved sovereignty narrative as a strategic tool to revitalize its failing strategy of using Xizang to pressure China. Historically, Western powers like the United Kingdom and the US have manipulated issues like Xizang to serve their colonial interests. The so-called Xizang issue emerged from this colonial context. Even today, the West clings to the illusion of separating Xizang from China, using it as a tactic to tarnish, accuse and destabilize China. As China's peaceful development continues, the traditional US strategy of using Xizang against China is proving increasingly ineffective. Hence, in a desperate move, the US has unveiled this new narrative, directing its administrative bodies to promote it, revealing its ambition to intensify pressure on China and coerce other nations to join its stance.

Second, the US is seeking to extract the last remnants of value from the Dalai Lama and his followers. As the Dalai Lama ages and his clique's influence wanes due to internal divisions and the increasing fragmentation of the "Tibetan independence activists", the push for "Tibet independence" is weakening. Both the West and the Dalai Lama's clique see this as a last-ditch effort. Biden's timing of signing the bill during the Dalai Lama's visit to the US for medical treatment underscores this is the final pitch to use the Dalai Lama to serve US interests.

Third, the US is hoping to use this narrative to undermine China's unity and stability. The malign nature of the unresolved sovereignty claim lies in its intention to deconstruct the historical reality of China. The West avoids acknowledging its own history of coveting, instigating division, and even militarily invading Tibet, instead fabricating various falsehoods about its historical status as part of China. These falsehoods are intended to sow confusion and division. This strategy of inciting regional secession was previously used to destabilize the Soviet Union and is now being attempted against China.

The facts are clear: the West talks about the “Tibet issue”, but they have never genuinely cared about the Tibetan people.

Xizang has been a part of China since ancient times, a fact that is supported by the historical evidence. The US disregards these facts to serve its own agenda. But history cannot be rewritten, and the truth is more powerful than repeated lies. Xizang’s historical status as part of China is undeniable and cannot be negated by any country’s legislation.

The integrated development of the Chinese nation demonstrates that Xizang’s historical status as part of China is irrefutable. China’s historical records clearly delineate its territorial integrity. The close genetic, archaeological and linguistic ties between the Tibetan and Han peoples further affirm this. Historical documents, such as the inscriptions at Jokhang Temple, vividly capture the longstanding unity between Xizang and other provinces in China. These historical facts are unassailable.

The historical relationship between successive central governments and Tibet’s local authorities underscores its unquestionable legal status as part of China. From the Yuan Dynasty (1271-1368) onwards, various central governments have exerted effective administration over Tibet in different ways. Historical documents, in both Tibetan and Chinese records, provide unequivocal evidence of this relationship.

The continuous interactions and integrations among the various ethnic groups within China have formed an inseparable national community. Throughout history, the Tibetan people have stood alongside other Chinese ethnic groups, showcasing unity and resilience against foreign invasions and contributing to the nation’s collective strength. This unity cannot be invalidated by any foreign legislation.

In conclusion, the recent US legislation related with Xizang is not only a blatant interference in China’s internal affairs but also a misguided attempt to rewrite history and destabilize China. But the historical and factual reality of Xizang as an integral part of China stands firm, beyond the reach of any external political maneuvering.

The Resolve Tibet Act and Its Implications for Tibet-China Relation

13 July 2024, Tibet Rights Collective

In a significant development enhancing U.S. support for Tibet, President Joe Biden signed into law the “Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act” (S. 138), commonly known as the “Resolve Tibet Act,” shortly after Nancy Pelosi’s visit to Dharamsala. This legislative move underscores the United States’ commitment to advocating for human rights and preserving the distinct linguistic, cultural, and religious heritage of Tibetans, amidst longstanding geopolitical tensions with China.

Background and Legislative Journey

The Resolve Tibet Act represents a bipartisan effort to address the Tibet-China dispute. Passed by the House of Representatives in February and clearing the Senate in May, the Act signals a robust legislative response to the Tibetan plight. Despite China’s vehement opposition and its characterization of the Act as destabilizing, the U.S. has proceeded with this significant policy shift.

Key Provisions and Strategic Implications

The Act does not alter the established U.S. policy recognizing the Tibet Autonomous Region and other Tibetan areas as part of the People’s Republic of China (PRC). However, it substantially enhances U.S. support for Tibet by empowering State Department officials to actively counter Chinese disinformation about Tibet. The legislation unequivocally rejects the Chinese narrative that Tibet has been an integral part of China since ancient times. Instead, it advocates for direct, unconditional negotiations between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives, emphasizing the need for a peaceful resolution.

Historical Context and Diplomatic Efforts

The Dalai Lama, who fled Tibet in 1959 and established a government-in-exile in Dharamshala, India, has long been at the center of the Tibet-China dialogue. Between 2002 and 2010, his representatives engaged in nine rounds of dialogue with the Chinese government, which failed to yield any concrete outcomes. The Act’s provision for renewed dialogue aims to rekindle these efforts and foster a negotiated settlement.

China’s Stance and International Response

China’s reaction to the Act has been predictably hostile. Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Lin Jian warned against destabilizing actions and reaffirmed China’s resolve to defend its sovereignty. Concurrently, the U.S. State Department imposed visa restrictions on several Chinese officials implicated in the repression of marginalized religious and ethnic communities, citing ongoing human rights abuses in Xinjiang, Hong Kong, and Tibet.

State Department spokesperson Matthew Miller emphasized that the PRC has not upheld its commitments to respect human rights, as evidenced by documented abuses in these regions. The U.S. continues to call for China to adhere to the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to unconditionally release arbitrarily detained individuals.

Conclusion

The Resolve Tibet Act represents a pivotal moment in U.S. foreign policy towards Tibet. By reinforcing support for Tibetan rights and calling for renewed dialogue, the Act seeks to address a long-standing geopolitical conflict through peaceful means. This legislative measure not only enhances the U.S.'s strategic posture but also aligns with broader international human rights advocacy, positioning the United States as a key player in the quest for a just and negotiated resolution to the Tibet-China dispute.

Will Tibet Be Independent One Day?

11 July 2024, The Citizen, K.P. Fabian

China moved its troops into Tibet in October 1950

The author conceived 'Imperial Games In Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty' eight years ago and delivered it over a period of five years, as I learnt from him during a morning walk. He is blessed with lucidity of style and brevity, a rather rare combination these days.

I read the book practically non-stop despite the names of places and persons in China, rather difficult for many non-Chinese readers to recall easily.

The central thesis is that Tibet deserved independence as a state and lost it because of the imperial games played by China, Britain, and Russia-Czarist Russia and the Soviet Union. The role played by independent India also comes under scrutiny. The introduction is followed by 12 chapters, with the last termed appropriately an epilogue. The historical overview in the introduction recounts briefly the genesis of "The Great Game" between Russia and Britain played out in Iran, Afghanistan, and Tibet.

As far as Tibet was concerned London wanted to prevent Russia from gaining any undue influence there. Therefore, London invented 'suzerainty' of China over Tibet and later asserted that China had sovereignty over Tibet. Lord Curzon as Viceroy had a different approach, but London practically overruled him.

The author narrates the rather complex history of Tibet in chapter 1 titled "Tibet: Monastic Heights". In Tibet they call their country "Bod". The word 'Tibet' comes from 'Tubbat', a term used "by Tibet's neighbors -the Turks, Iranians, and Arabs", possibly derived from 'To Bo' which can be translated as Upper Tibet.

The Chinese call it 'Tufan' and Indians call it 'Tibbat'. The reader would appreciate the meticulous approach of the author. The Tibetan calendar starts from 127 BCE, the date of accession of the first king- Nyatri Tsem-po. Buddhism was introduced by King Songtsen Gampo who attacked northern India and defeated King Arjuna of Kannauj. Arjuna had succeeded Harshavardhana, a famous patron of Buddhism. During Harshavardhana's reign the famous Chinese Buddhist scholar Xuanzang, known in India as Hiuen Tsang, had come as a pilgrim to India.

Arjuna was antipathetic to Buddhism and during his reign Wang Hiuen-Tse, a Buddhist scholar sent by the Chinese Emperor and a 31-member team were killed. That was the provocation for King Songtsen Gampo's attack. We conclude that Buddhism reached Tibet in the 7th Century CE. Tibet's contact with China also occurred in the 7th Century CE by way of a matrimonial alliance. While Tibetans acknowledge that Buddhism came from India, we should note that the Chinese claim that it was a princess from China married into the Tibetan royal family who brought it to Tibet. China claims to have had contacts with Tibet from time immemorial, even though proper evidence is lacking. Chapter 7 "Britain and Tibet: Forcing Trade" starts with the skirmishes between British India and Bhutan, after the 1757 Battle of Plassey. Tibet claimed that Bhutan was its tributary state. Thus started the interface between British India and Tibet.

Governor General Warren Hastings sent his Scottish private secretary George Bogle to Tibet primarily to explore trade possibilities. He met the Panchen Lama who promised to transmit the proposal for trade to the emperor in Beijing as China had forbidden Tibet from dealing directly with foreign powers. Panchen Lama went to meet the emperor, caught smallpox, and died in China. We do not know whether he got permission to do trade with British India. Chapter 9 "An Independent Tibet" gives an in depth account of the 1913-1914 Simla Conference that begat the McMahon line, named after Lt. Col Henry McMahon who as foreign secretary led the delegation of British India. The reader would note that despite Tibet's determined efforts neither Britain nor China took seriously Tibet's claim to Independence. If recognition by peers is an essential ingredient of Independence, Tibet was not independent even though the Chinese had been expelled in 1912 following the fall of the Manchu dynasty.

The most interesting part of the book is how independent India addressed the crisis in Tibet following the attack by the People's Republic of China. There is a general impression that Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru could have done more to help Tibet retain its independence. The author does not fully support that impression. China moved its troops into Tibet in October 1950. The author draws attention to the internal discussions in Delhi and the famous letter dated 7th November 1950 from Deputy Prime Minister Patel to Nehru. Patel described China's action as "little short of perfidy" and pointed out that India had let down Tibet. Nehru wanted to sit down and discuss the matter with Patel. Unfortunately, Patel breathed his last on 15th December 1950 before they could meet. Much has been made of this letter in the literature on India's foreign policy in the Nehru years. The gist of the criticism of Nehru's policy has been that he was a starry-eyed idealist whereas Patel was a sturdy realist with a firm grip on the ground realities. Let us listen to Foreign Secretary Maharajakrishna Rasgotra who joined the Indian Foreign Service in 1949. He was present at the creation of the service. In his book, A Life in Diplomacy, he says that a good deal of what Nehru did about Tibet had to be kept secret, not even put on file, and if Patel had known all that Nehru was doing, "perhaps the latter's famous letter" would not have been written. Rasgotra believes that the letter was drafted by Sir Girija Shanker Bajpai, Secretary General of the Ministry of External Affairs. This reviewer was personally told by Sir Girija's son, Ambassador Katyayani Shanker Bajpai, that his father drafted the letter. It is well known that India did not support Tibet's application to join the United Nations as a member-state. What is not generally known is that, as Rasgotra points out, Nehru had sent two special envoys to Tibet, the first immediately after India became independent, to persuade the members of the Kashag- the ruling council- to apply for United Nations membership. The envoys spent weeks in Lhasa, to no avail. Nehru did not take into confidence India's representative in Lhasa, an Englishman. The key question is: What could India have done to save Tibet from China's aggression? Ambassador Vinod C. Khanna says in commenting on this book, "Debates will continue about the manner in which Nehru handled the problem but the question remains: Would any other decision by him have prevented the takeover of Tibet by the very determined and powerful China?" We all know that the Indian army defending Jammu & Kashmir was in no position to take on the People's Liberation Army. There is a record somewhere, I cannot recall right now, that when asked by Jawaharlal Nehru, General Cariappa, the Army chief, made it clear that he could not spare more than two battalions. Ambassador Sinha has made an irrefutably strong case for Tibet's right to Independence. Let us hope that this book will be read in China and that at least in the republic of letters there will be a consensus for Tibet to regain full autonomy, if not Independence. The imperial games at the cost of human rights and the right to self-determination of a people must be curbed. Who knows, one day Tibet might be independent.

Tibet And Its Position In The India-China-US Geopolitical Triangle

11 July 2024, OWP, Sapna Suresh

On June 19, 2024, a bipartisan Congressional delegation went to India and met the Dalai Lama. The members of Congress included republican Michael McChaul and democrat speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi. When addressing a crowd at the monastery the members insisted that their visit was part of the Resolve Tibet Act. Passed by Congress the week before, this act aims to promote dialogue between Tibet and Beijing for a peaceful resolution to the conflict.

In response, the Chinese government criticized this visit and Lin Jian, the spokesperson for the Chinese foreign ministry, said that the President must not sign the bill into law. He instead insisted that "it's known by all that the 14th Dalai Lama is not a purely religious figure, but a political exile engaged in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion."

Tibet is a Buddhist-majority region, known as the "roof of the world" due to the region's high mountain peaks. China argues that Tibet has been an "inalienable" part of China since the 13th century when the Yuan Dynasty was in power. Crucially, the KMT (Chiang Kai Shek's party) shares the CCP's position on Tibet. Hence, it is worth asking that in the event the CCP is ousted from power and replaced with the non-communists (as many in Washington desire,) Xinjiang and many issues related to territorial integrity and sovereignty would change.

However, by contrast, the Tibetans insist that during that time, China was under a Mongol dynasty (Yuan) or a Manchu dynasty (Qing), rather than a (Han) Chinese Empire, and that Tibet was merely a protectorate in which it was allowed considerable autonomy. In 1913, after the Qing state ended, Tibet declared independence and became a de facto independent state.

In 1949, Mao Zedong established the People's Republic of China (PRC) and in 1950, the PRC asserted its claims on Tibet. A year later, the Tibetans signed the Seventeen Point Agreement with Beijing, in which it said that the Chinese government would respect local Tibetan religion and customs, but in exchange, China would have a military base in Lhasa – the capital of Tibet.

Nevertheless, despite the treaty, tensions have persisted between Tibet and Beijing and many Tibetans report experiencing severe cultural repression, with some deeming it a genocide akin to the Uyghurs. Consequently, the "Free Tibet Movement," a non-state civil society organization, has played a role internationally by criticizing China's human rights abuses, demanding more autonomy, and pressuring China by boycotting Chinese goods. This was the group that organized protests when Xi Jinping visited France in May 2024. Perhaps most importantly, Tibet has played a critical role in shaping China's relations with India and the US.

In 1952, the Indians recognized Tibet as a part of China. In 1954, India and China signed an agreement which restricted India's relations with Tibet which ceased trading and travelling without a visa. Since, Indian maps illustrate Tibet as a Chinese territory, reflective of a time when India sought to have cordial relations with Beijing during the early 1950s. However, in 1959, a rebellion arose in Tibet known as the Lhasa Rebellion. New Delhi gave asylum to the Dalai Lamas along with other Tibetan refugees. This move created a suspicion in Beijing that India had a role in the uprising and wanted to destabilize China.

Also during this time, the C.I.A. funnelled money into the Dalai Lama to support activities against Beijing. The logic behind aiding Tibet was to gain access to developments inside China, reminiscent of how the U.S. spied on the Soviet Union by entering through Central Asia. Consequently, the Chinese accused the Indians of aiding the Americans in funding anti-Chinese activities in Tibet, and the Dalai Lama's fleeing to India only added to China's paranoia. Hence, many scholars and historians argue that Tibet was one of the many factors that led to the 1962 Sino-Indian War.

While most scholars agree that India was aware of this program, they differ on whether India actively aided the US. However, according to Bruce Riedel's (a nonresident senior fellow at The Brookings Institution) book, JFK's Forgotten Crisis: Tibet, the CIA, and the Sino-Indian War, it was Pakistan that provided support to the Americans. While aware that such a program existed, India did not provide any support to the Americans itself.

Nevertheless, despite the covert or overt support Washington and New Delhi gave to Lhasa, the priority for India and the U.S. has been to advance their interests, not the interests of Tibet.

In 1972, after the U.S. and China pursued normalization, the U.S. ended its support to the Tibetans and gradually, the U.S. reframed the Tibet issue as an issue of human rights abuses, rather than a demand for Tibetan independence. Additionally, in 2009, to maintain cordial relations with Beijing, Valerie Jarrett, a senior advisor for President Obama, went to China and emphasized that they wouldn't invite the Dalai Lama to the White House in Obama's first year. When he ultimately visited, he was given a downgraded treatment.

Later, during the Trump administration, an American official visited Tibet. However, this visit was less about the concern for the Tibetans (considering Trump's aversion to advancing "human rights") but rather, a politicization of the Tibetan issue at a time when US-China relations were fraught due to disagreement on trade issues. Likewise, despite the recent bill and the Congressional visit, the Tibet issue will eventually be sidelined when US-China relations stabilize.

This approach to Tibet is reminiscent of Washington's position towards the Iraqi Kurds. During the 1960s, the Americans (along with the Israelis and Iranians) gave secret support to the Iraqi Kurds to fight against Saddam Hussein's government. However, by 1975, as the Iranians eased tensions with the Iraqis, support ceased. Hence, as with the Tibetans, the U.S. has used the Kurdish issue to advance its geopolitical interests in the Middle East.

Likewise, Tibet has also been sidelined when New Delhi wants to reduce tensions with Beijing. In 2018, the Modi government issued a warning against any participation. This was to commemorate 60 years of the Dalai Lama's exile, a "sensitive time" in India-China relations. Two months later, Modi met Xi Jinping in Wuhan at a time when the BJP government sought to reduce tensions with China.

Recently, the Indian government publicly announced plans to rename approximately 30 sites in Tibet in retaliation to China renaming 62 locations in Arunachal Pradesh (or as China calls it "South Tibet.") According to an unnamed Indian analyst, this move had more to do with placating the public to look "tough" on China, rather than a substantive policy change.

Importantly, even with the recent Congressional visit, the Indian government reaffirmed its position that the Dalai Lama isn't a political figure but a "revered religious figure." Interestingly, while the Chinese criticized the Americans, there wasn't any criticism of New Delhi, perhaps fearing further Indian cooperation with the Americans.

Going forward, the way to aid Tibetans is not to rely on the governments of Washington, New Delhi, or any other state official of another country. Rather, the best way to aid Tibetans is to increase people-to-people contact and to treat them as a human issue, rather than a (geo)political problem.

The Dalai Lama's revenge: the high fertility of Tibetans in China

11 July 2024, Mercator, William Huang

The Tibetan struggle is one of the best-known resistance movements in the West, largely thanks to the fame of the Dalai Lama, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate.

Ever since the Dalai Lama fled from Lhasa to India after the 1959 uprising, China has faced worldwide criticism of its myriad human rights abuses and colonising practices in Tibet. One of the most serious is allegations of ethnic cleansing, as ethnic Han migrants enter Tibetan majority regions and the demographic makeup changes.

However, one of the most important factors in demographic change, fertility, is seldom highlighted by outside observers of the Tibetan question.

In this article, using data obtained from the 2020 Chinese census and reported nowhere else, we look at how Tibetans are faring in the age of ultra-low fertility across China and East Asia, and why their relatively higher fertility levels may offer a rare light of hope in the region.

The TAR

Tibetans live in a large, sparsely populated area spanning millions of square kilometres in five provincial-level administrations of China. The core area, namely the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), or Xizang in Mandarin, only contains around half of the ethnic Tibetan population in China.

The other half of the seven million Tibetans currently residing in China are scattered in four other provinces: Yunnan, Gansu, Sichuan, and Qinghai.

When we look at fertility levels in this article, we will only examine the TAR as the writer has managed to obtain detailed statistics of the region's 2020 census results, and also because in the modern Chinese political sense, "Tibet" only refers to the autonomous region itself, not the other Tibetan majority areas.

Let us examine the Tibet Autonomous Region's data. According to the National Bureau of Statistics of China's 2020 census data, Tibetans make up 86 percent of the autonomous region's total population of 3.648 million. Han Chinese only make up around 12.2 percent and are heavily concentrated in a few major urban centres of the TAR, especially the capital, Lhasa, where half of all Han Chinese in Tibet reside.

This means that the rural fertility rate in Tibet would directly correlate with the rural ethnic Tibetan fertility rate, and the urban fertility rate of Tibetans would only be higher than the urban TFR of the region, since Han Chinese migrants are known to have lower TFR than the Tibetans.

Stark contrast

So, what is the fertility rate of the Tibetans? In 2020, the Tibet Autonomous Region had a total fertility rate of 1.926, which is the third highest in the nation after two other provinces with large ethnic minority populations, Guangxi and Guizhou. This is quite close to the replacement level of 2.1 and, by Chinese standards, is extremely high.

If we further break this down to rural Tibet, the 2020 census statistics indicate that rural Tibetans have a total fertility rate of 2.363. This should be regarded as a largely accurate reflection of ethnic Tibetan fertility, as they make up more than 95 percent of the rural TAR population. This high TFR level is in stark contrast to the TFR rate in urban areas of the TAR (largely dominated by Lhasa) of only 0.87 and the TFR in peri-urban/suburban town areas, which is 1.63.

In the TAR, 64 percent of the population still live in rural areas, therefore the rural fertility rate remains the key factor in deciding the TFR of the whole region. However, urbanisation is continuing in the TAR at a rapid pace, with the rural population percentage plummeting from 77 percent in 2010 to less than two-thirds in 2020. This urbanisation trend is largely encouraged by the Chinese government, and also spells trouble for the ethnic Tibetan fertility rate as rural Tibetans become urbanised and more assimilated, leading to further fertility declines.

We can further break down the Tibetan fertility statistics by the seven main prefectures of Tibet. As the capital, Lhasa is only 70 percent Tibetan and 27 percent Han Chinese, with more and more Han Chinese migrants arriving and diluting the ever-decreasing Tibetan majority. Since these Han Chinese migrants generally have much lower fertility, this means that Lhasa's fertility, at 1.06, is also the lowest in the whole of the TAR. Chengguan district, the Han Chinese-dominated central urban area of Lhasa, only registered a TFR of 0.772, which is on par with South Korea.

However, most of the other prefectures in Tibet have large ethnic Tibetan supermajorities, with Nagqu being 96.9 percent Tibetan, Shigatse 95 percent Tibetan and Changdu 93 percent Tibetan. These prefectures have double, if not triple, the TFR of Lhasa.

In Shigatse, which by population is the second largest prefecture in the TAR, the TFR is 2.42, with several counties within Shigatse bordering Nepal, such as Bainang and Tingri, having TFRs above 3. Nagqu's TFR is 2.59, with Lhari County, the birthplace of both candidates to the current Panchen Lama throne, registering an ultra-high TFR of 3.5. Lhari County also has an extraordinary feat – the rural parts of this county have a TFR of 4.15, which is undoubtedly a record in present-day East Asia (and even South Asia).

This is unheard of in China and is presumably the highest TFR in the entire country. Changdu has a TFR of 2.3 and also has counties with TFRs above 3 or approaching 3.

Final bastion

What about the other Tibetan prefectures with smaller Tibetan majorities? Again, it is very noticeable how the Han Chinese migration and urbanisation affect and lower fertility.

Nyingchi, in Tibet's east and bordering India's Arunachal Pradesh, an area also claimed by China, has become heavily settled with Han Chinese migrants, as the Han Chinese percentage jumped from 17.3 percent ten years ago to 24.7 percent in 2020. Nyingchi had a TFR of 1.89, still very high by Chinese standards, but lower than the TAR average and also much lower than the Tibetan supermajority areas.

Based on these above statistics, it is clear that ethnic Tibetans, especially rural Tibetans, have some of the highest fertility and natural growth rates in the entire country. These rural people still form the majority of both the ethnic Tibetan and TAR populations and will become vital lifeblood to the demographic health and future of the Tibetans.

Moreover, as ethnic Tibetan refugee populations in India and Nepal continue to dwindle due to much lower fertility rates and high emigration rates to Western countries, ethnic Tibetans living in the motherland will form the last bastion of hope for the continuity of the Tibetan population. Currently they still maintain a fertility advantage double to triple that of the Han settlers, and this will continue for the foreseeable future. This is vital to ensuring that the TAR will continue to retain a Tibetan majority.

Ethnic Tibetans in the TAR are also performing much better than their cultural and religious brethren in neighbouring Bhutan, Sikkim and Ladakh. Bhutan, a country known for its happiness and mysteriousness, shares a cultural and religious heritage with Tibet. Its TFR has dropped to around 1.86 in 2023 and is now a major source of concern to its royal family.

Sikkim and Ladakh are faring far worse – in Ladakh for 2019-2021, the TFR is only 1.3, whilst Sikkim had a pathetic 1.1, and the government there is desperately trying to boost birth rates.

Despite all odds, ethnic Tibetans, especially the 2.5 million rural Tibetans in the TAR, continue to have above replacement rate TFRs and, in some cases, ultra-high fertility rates. This is a very fortunate fact, and hopefully, the Tibetan people can continue to maintain this demographic advantage, which will help them greatly in their decades-long fight for freedom.

How a US act revived Sino-Indian confrontation over Tibet

10 July 2024, The Daily Star, M Sakhawat Hussain

On June 12, 2024, both houses of US Congress passed a bipartisan bill called "Promoting a Resolution to Tibet-China Dispute Act," better known as "Resolve Tibet Act." The act calls on China to find a "peaceful settlement" to the 65-year-old Tibet issue through dialogue with the Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, who is in exile in Dharamshala, India. The Dalai Lama was rescued from Lhasa to India in March 1959, when Chinese troops were about to take over the Tibetan capital. He still heads a "Tibetan Government in Exile," based in the Indian state of Himachal Pradesh, despite strong Chinese disapproval.

Almost six decades after the Sino-Indian war over the Tibetan border issue and the Dalai Lama's ambivalent stand on Tibet's sovereignty, the US'

Resolve Tibet Act would certainly bring the issue out of historical obscurity. The issue was thought to have been frozen after the China-US rapprochement and the US' acceptance of the One-China policy in 1972, while India is also said to have reconciled with the claim that Tibet is an integral part of China.

The issue was settled to an extent when China reconciled with India's takeover of Sikkim, considered one of the five fingers of Tibet, during the visit of India's late Foreign Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee in 1979. But China never gave up its claim over outer Tibet including Aksai Chin, Tawang and Arunachal Pradesh—declared as one of the five fingers of Tibet by Mao Zedong—in the northeast.

Since its creation in 1949, the People's Republic of China (PRC) has denied the outcome of the Shimla Convention of 1914, which was attended by representatives of autonomous Tibet and the Republic of China (ROC). Though the ROC attended the meeting, it refused to endorse the border agreement, claiming that the entire Tibet had historically belonged to China and would always remain an integral part of it.

The India-China dispute particularly centred on the western border in Eastern Ladakh, involving Aksai Chin—with there being controversy over the acceptance of the Macartney-MacDonald Line versus the Johnson Line. PRC claimed the Karakoram watershed line to be the correct dividing line, rejecting India's claim based on the Johnson Line further to the east. During his official visit to India in 1960, Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai refused to adjust the border along the Karakoram Range in exchange for recognition of the McMahon Line in Arunachal Pradesh. This refusal, despite efforts by then Indian Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, regarding the Tibet and Dalai Lama issue, dashed hopes for a peaceful settlement between the two governments.

The complex relationship soured not only over the border dispute but was compounded by the involvement of CIA, India and Pakistan in the Tibet uprising and the extrication of the Dalai Lama, primarily facilitated by India, which provided him refuge. As a result, what began as an exemplary third-world relationship between China and India soon turned bitter.

These issues were central to the 1962 Sino-Indian war, in which India suffered defeat in both Aksai Chin in the west and Arunachal Pradesh in the east. The events of the war remain ingrained in the Indian psyche and continue to influence its military strategy and geopolitics. China unilaterally withdrew from Arunachal Pradesh but retained control over Aksai Chin. And the Chinese claim over outer Tibet in Arunachal Pradesh remains a contentious issue.

During that war, India faced significant supply and troop deployment issues on the northeast through the Siliguri Corridor, also known as the Chicken's Neck. East Pakistan at that time stood in the way of any alternative supply route to the Chicken's Neck. And it's worth noting that China was increasing its presence at Nathula Pass in Sikkim and the Namka Chu Pass in Tawang region, posing a threat to the Siliguri Corridor between Tetulia, Bangladesh, and Nepal.

India learned an important lesson about its strategic handicap, vis-à-vis Arunachal Pradesh, which could be a flashpoint in any Sino-Indian conflict. But things have changed drastically since 1962, and both countries are now nuclear powers. And yet, reports indicate that both have heavily militarised along the McMahon Line, especially after the Sino-Indian Doklam standoff on the Sikkim-Bhutan border.

Chinese presence in Doklam makes it easier to threaten the corridor in the event of a wider conflict. Therefore, India's strategic pursuit of alternatives, such as the Kaladan route, is insufficient due to its longer and more perilous journey. And so, the other obvious alternative being talked about in many leading Indian newspapers is through Bangladesh.

While the US was in the process of enacting the Resolve Tibet Act, China issued a new official map showing the entire Arunachal Pradesh as being a part of Tibet, changing its name to Xizang. What is interesting is that, within a week of the Act passing on June 18, a bipartisan seven member US Congressional delegation visited Dharamshala and met with the Dalai Lama.

Moreover, the act says that, "claims made by officials of the People's Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times are historically inaccurate." And that, "United States public diplomacy efforts should counter disinformation about Tibet from the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party, including disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama." It further calls on China to negotiate with the Dalai Lama's government in exile.

After meeting the Dalai Lama, the US delegation also visited India's Prime Minister Narendra Modi. The fact that the Indian PM decided to meet with the US delegation sends a clear message to China as regards to India's position. Predictably, the delegation's visit drew angry responses from the Chinese authorities, who view the act as interfering with China's internal matters.

Given these circumstances, it's important to ask where Bangladesh stands in regards to the geostrategic tensions between China and India. Bangladesh also needs to seriously think about the implications of allowing Indian logistical routes to bypass the critical Chicken's Neck for potential military-logistical buildup, perhaps against China in the future. Thus, it is essential to clarify whether India is seeking transshipment, transit, or a corridor through Bangladesh—which India has been trying to get since the time of Bangabandhu's government.

As Violence Surges, Can Pakistan Protect Its Chinese Projects?

10 July 2024, The New York Times, Zia ur-Rehman and Christina Goldbaum

In a busy port city along Pakistan's southwestern coast, a newly built security barrier and hundreds of new checkpoints safeguard Chinese workers.

Farther down the Arabian Sea coast, in Pakistan's largest city, Karachi, officials added hundreds of police officers to a special unit charged with protecting Chinese-funded development projects. And in the capital, Islamabad, officials created a new police force specifically to protect Chinese nationals. Across Pakistan, authorities are hurrying to bolster security for Chinese workers after a surge in militant violence targeting Chinese-funded megaprojects. The attacks have threatened infrastructure, energy and trade projects that have kept Pakistan's economy afloat through a dire economic crisis.

That investment in Pakistan, which began in 2015 as part of China's Belt and Road Initiative, involves around $60 billion of planned projects. Tens of thousands of Chinese workers are thought to be in Pakistan, though estimates vary widely. Chinese investment has proved critical since support from the United States tapered off after the war in neighboring Afghanistan ended in 2021.

The Chinese-funded projects struggled with security challenges from the start. But over the past three years, as militant groups have resurged across Pakistan and the number of terrorist attacks has soared, Chinese investments — or even just projects perceived to have some connection to China — have become increasingly vulnerable.

A series of attacks this spring highlighted that threat. In late March, armed fighters targeted the Chinese-built and operated port in Gwadar along the southwestern coast of the Arabian Sea, killing two Pakistani security officers. Days later, militants attacked the country's second-largest air base, citing opposition to Chinese investment to extract the region's resources.

The day after the air base attack, five Chinese workers died after a suicide bomber rammed an explosive-laden truck into their vehicle. The next month, five Japanese workers were the object of a suicide attack in Karachi after being mistaken for Chinese workers, according to the police. (The Japanese escaped unharmed, but a bystander, who was not a foreigner, was killed.)

"The bottom line is that one of Pakistan's closest allies and most important donors is now the foreign entity that is the most vulnerable to terrorism in Pakistan," said Michael Kugelman, the director of the Wilson Center's South Asia Institute.

"Pakistan's economy is in a very precarious state," he added. "Islamabad can't afford to have one of its most critical donors feel that level of vulnerability. The stakes are very high."

Already, the security situation appears to have dampened Beijing's confidence in investing in Pakistan. Last month, Pakistan's prime minister, Shehbaz Sharif, visited Beijing and met with China's leader, Xi Jinping, in an effort to secure an additional $17 billion in funding for energy and infrastructure projects. But the visit ended with no firm pledge for future investments from Beijing.

There was a "vague promise to enhance economic cooperation, but these outcomes fell short of the substantial agreements Pakistan had hoped for," said Filippo Boni, an academic specializing in China-Pakistan relations at the Open University in Britain.

Since the start in 2013 of China's Belt and Road Initiative — $1 trillion of infrastructure development programs in roughly 70 countries — Pakistan has been the program's flagship site. Beijing has planned billions of dollars in megaprojects in the so-called China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, and it has started on several, including the deepwater port in Gwadar.

Along the way, China has also lent more and more to Pakistan as the country has faced a major economic downturn, with inflation hitting double digits and joblessness soaring.

For years, the megaprojects have faced security threats from militant groups operating in Pakistan, including the Islamic State affiliate in the region; armed separatists; and the Pakistani Taliban, an ideological twin and ally of the Taliban in Afghanistan.

Many harbor grievances against China, experts say. The Islamic State and Pakistani Taliban seek revenge for Beijing's repression of Uyghur Muslims in Xinjiang. In recent years, both groups have begun collaborating with the East Turkestan Islamic Movement, a Uyghur organization that China has long accused of inciting unrest in Xinjiang, according to a United Nations Security Council report released in January.

Others, like the Baluch Liberation Army, an armed separatist group in Baluchistan Province, oppose outsiders — including Pakistan's central government and China — benefiting from the province's natural resources.

"They view Chinese development efforts as reinforcing Pakistan's central government, which they perceive as oppressive," said Iftikhar Firdous, an expert on armed groups with The Khorasan Diary, an Islamabad-based research platform.

Over the past three years, violence from those groups has surged, an increase that many experts attribute to the Taliban seizing power in Afghanistan. Pakistani officials have accused the Taliban government of offering safe haven to some groups, like the Pakistani Taliban, which they say has allowed violence to flourish.

The Afghan government has denied those claims, and it has cracked down on other terrorist groups within the country, including the Islamic State. But one result of that was to push militant fighters into Pakistan, experts say.

As violence has rebounded across Pakistan, so, too, have attacks on Chinese workers and projects.

Seeking to rebuild Beijing's confidence, in recent months Pakistani authorities have bolstered the ranks of a dedicated security division within the police and military established in 2015 to safeguard Chinese Belt and Road Initiative projects. They have discussed additional fencing around the port in Gwadar, the centerpiece of the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor. But the country's law enforcement is already overstretched, officials say. Police and army officers are ill-equipped to confront militants, many of whom are armed with American-made weapons procured from Afghanistan after U.S. troops withdrew. More focus on protecting Chinese nationals could come at the expense of protecting Pakistanis, they warn.

Chinese officials have urged Pakistan to let private Chinese security contractors protect its projects in the country, an idea Pakistani authorities have rejected.

The countries have also been at odds about other approaches to coping with the threat from the Pakistani Taliban, also known as Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan, or T.T.P., said Asfandiyar Mir, a senior expert at the United States Institute of Peace.

Pakistani officials have sought to pressure the Afghan government to act against T.T.P. fighters. At times Pakistan has directly attacked them, officials say, firing airstrikes into Afghanistan and expelling Afghan refugees.

China has taken a more collaborative approach, Mr. Mir said, effectively offering to normalize relations with Afghanistan in the hopes of persuading Taliban officials to negotiate with the T.T.P. on Beijing's behalf.

Pakistani officials have faced resistance from their own citizens over the recent increase in security measures for Chinese workers.

In Gwadar, hundreds of residents have poured into the streets in recent months to protest the government's digging a trench to separate the compound where the Chinese live from the rest of the city.

The trench was the latest security measure. Checkpoints line major roads, where every few miles police and army personnel scan identification cards and search vehicles. Hundreds of police and army officers roam the streets. There has been talk of walling off the Chinese-built portion of the city entirely with a new fence.

"Living in Gwadar already feels like living in a security zone," said Mumtaz Hout, 29, a university student. "Now these new trenches, and the talk of future fencing, are further restricting our movement and violating our basic rights."

Tibetan Dilemma: Uncertain Future Without The Dalai Lama

10 July 2024, The Times of India

The Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhism, turned 89 this year, a milestone celebrated by hundreds of exiled Tibetans in Dharamshala, India. Since fleeing Tibet in 1959 following a failed uprising against Chinese rule, the Dalai Lama has resided in this hillside town, making it the center of the Tibetan government-in-exile. The celebrations were marked by traditional dances, songs, and the cutting of a three-tiered cake, but the Dalai Lama himself was absent, recovering from knee surgery in the United States.

The Dalai Lama's advanced age and ongoing health issues have intensified concerns among Tibetan exiles about the future of their movement and leadership. China has stated its intent to control the selection of his successor, further complicating matters. This scenario has raised significant questions about the political and cultural fate of Tibetans in exile and in their homeland.

Why are Tibetans concerned about their future without the Dalai Lama?

The Dalai Lama has been a unifying figure for Tibetans, advocating for substantial autonomy and the preservation of Tibetan culture. His absence raises fears about the continuity of these efforts. As Penpa Tsering, president of the Tibetan government-in-exile, stated, "Post-fourteenth Dalai Lama we don't know what will happen."

What is the significance of the Dalai Lama's birthday celebrations?

The birthday celebrations in Dharamshala are not only a tribute to the Dalai Lama's leadership but also an expression of cultural and spiritual solidarity among exiled Tibetans. They serve as a reminder of their ongoing struggle for autonomy and the preservation of their heritage.

What are the concerns regarding the succession of the Dalai Lama?

Beijing's claim that it will appoint the next Dalai Lama has caused significant concern among Tibetans.

Historically, the Dalai Lama is believed to reincarnate, and the current Dalai Lama has hinted he will clarify succession matters around his 90th birthday. The fear is that China will install a rival leader to assert control over Tibet, undermining the legitimacy of the Tibetan Buddhist tradition.

How has the international community responded to the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan issue?

Recently, a group of US lawmakers, including former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, met with the Dalai Lama, reiterating support for Tibetan autonomy. This meeting, along with a bill passed by the US Congress urging China to resume talks with Tibetan leaders, has been viewed as a significant step. Pelosi emphasized, "This bill says to the Chinese government: things have changed now, get ready for that."

What is the "Middle Way" approach advocated by the Dalai Lama?

The "Middle Way" approach seeks genuine autonomy for Tibet within the framework of the Chinese constitution. It aims to preserve Tibetan culture, religion, and identity while acknowledging China's sovereignty. This approach has been a cornerstone of the Dalai Lama's advocacy, but its future is uncertain without his guiding presence.

How does India factor into the Tibetan dilemma?

India has been a host to the Dalai Lama and Tibetan exiles since 1959. While it recognizes Tibet as part of China, India remains a critical support base for the Tibetan cause. Observers suggest that India's role could become more prominent post-Dalai Lama, especially in balancing its diplomatic relations with China.

What are the potential scenarios for Tibetans after the Dalai Lama?

There is a concern that the movement could lose momentum or become more radical. The Tibetan Youth Congress, for example, has voiced aspirations for full independence, contrasting with the Dalai Lama's Middle Way. Penpa Tsering mentioned, "If every country keeps saying that Tibet is part of the People's Republic of China, then where is the reason for China to come and talk to us?"

The future without the Dalai Lama is fraught with uncertainty for Tibetans. The spiritual leader's advanced age and China's assertive stance on his succession have amplified fears of a leadership vacuum. Nonetheless, the global Tibetan community remains steadfast in their cultural and political aspirations, drawing strength from the Dalai Lama's enduring legacy.

Could Taiwan's 'separatists' face death penalty in China?

09 July 2024, Deutsche Welle, Yuchen Li

Beijing has unveiled new guidelines against what it says is "a very small number" of "diehard" advocates for Taiwanese independence — but others say these laws could apply to nearly everyone in Taiwan.

Some of the legal changes, however, are not easily dismissed. Beijing courts can now pass sentences, including life imprisonment or the death penalty, to "Taiwan independence" supporters who are convicted of conducting or inciting secession.

China says its new guidelines are targeting a "very small number of diehard 'Taiwan independence' separatists."

What are the guidelines?

This might include politicians like Chen, or other outspoken independence leaders such as Taiwan's current Vice President Hsiao Bi-khim and former Foreign Minister Joseph Wu.

But the 22 guidelines seem to intentionally employ vague language, with analysts describing them as legally ambiguous.

They list five "accurate identification of crimes," which include "attempting to alter Taiwan's legal status as part of China" and "advocating for Taiwan's participation in international organizations limited to sovereign states," but the last item on the list simply described the offense as "other acts aimed at separating Taiwan from China."

Penalties for "splitting the state" may include capital punishment if the crime causes "particularly grave harm" to the state and the people or "if the circumstances are particularly serious."

The guidelines also allow Chinese courts to hold trials in absentia for suspects not available in the country.

People who are already listed as Taiwanese separatists might not face immediate risk of arrest, Taiwanese legal scholar and consultant to the Taipei-based Straits Exchange Foundation, Wu Se-chih, told DW. However, they could be tried in absentia and have bounties imposed against them.

Most Taiwanese could be at risk

Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te, whom Beijing has publicly disliked and called "a dangerous separatist," reacted by saying that "China has no right to pursue cross-border prosecution of Taiwanese people."

Wu told DW that, given the broad definition of the crimes, around 90% of Taiwan's population could potentially be criminalized — a figure Lai also reportedly shared with his party's central committee during a meeting.

"Before the 22 measures, the target for [people advocating] Taiwan independence was broad. Now it's even broader," Wu said.

Wu warned that retired members of the Taiwanese military, its government personnel, employees of sensitive high-tech companies as well as educators are all among the high-risk groups, based on new laws and previous cases.

Such cases include Beijing charging Taiwanese activist and vice chairman of the Taiwanese National Party with "secession" last year after the official was detained in China for nearly eight months.

China dismisses travel concerns

Taiwanese authorities responded to the new laws by raising the alert level for travel to China. At the same time, foreign companies in China are considering relocating Taiwanese employees, according to the Reuters news agency.

In response to the travel alert, Beijing accused Taiwan's Lai administration of "maliciously smearing judicial documents" and issued a statement reassuring that most Taiwanese had no reason for concern and could visit China "in high spirits."

Will Beijing go after Taiwanese 'separatists'?

Beijing was already capable of punishing "Taiwan independence" advocates with the existing laws, according to Chao Chien-min, director of the Graduate Institute for National Development and Mainland China Studies at the Chinese Culture University in Taiwan.

However, Beijing chose to unveil new measures one month after Lai took office — which indicated its intention of targeting "more radical pro-independence individuals in the new government" rather than ordinary citizens, Chao said.

In addition, according to Article 17 in the guidelines, defendants or suspects abroad are to be handled by national and public security units instead of China's Foreign Ministry. Chao said this showed that Beijing was unwilling to "escalate the matter to an international level."

"Forcibly extraditing [suspects] to mainland China for trial would cause a huge international shock," Chao added. "I think given China's current international situation and diplomatic status, they probably haven't considered going that far."

Lessons from Hong Kong

In recent years, the Chinese government has passed or amended a series of national security-related laws, including an anti-espionage law and a law on guarding state secrets. The 22 guidelines are considered part of Beijing's efforts to expand its "legal toolbox."

Wu Se-chih believes that the latest move is a clear attempt to "make Taiwanese people feel a certain degree of self-restraint in their speech and political expressions," hoping to replicate the suppression methods used in Hong Kong.

Beijing imposed a national security law on the former British colony in 2020. A large number of pro-democracy figures, dissidents and journalists have been arrested since then.

"Hong Kong is almost completely in a state of self-censorship over the past four years," Wu said.

Chen, the Taiwanese politician sanctioned by Beijing, said that what China did to Hong Kong was "a very tyrannical approach."

"I think Taiwanese people will feel more aversion [towards Beijing]," if the same methods are applied to Taiwan, she said.

Why the Panchen Lama Matters

09 July 2024, The Diplomat, Antonio Terrone

The Panchen Lamas and Dalai Lamas consider themselves "spiritual friends," but the relationship between the two figures and their communities has hardly been smooth.

The 11th Panchen Lama of Tibet, Chokyi Gyalpo, has been called many names in and outside China, including "fake," a "Chinese puppet," "Jiang Zemin's Panchen" and a "Chinese Panchen."

Many claim that his influence in Tibetan affairs is negligible. The reasons for these negative conceptions go back to the controversial way in which the People's Republic of China (PRC) selected him after disqualifying another boy that the 14th Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatso had already recognized as the 11th Panchen Lama, Gendun Chokyi Nyima, because the process lacked the authority of the Chinese government.

The whereabouts of Gendun Chokyi Nyima have remained unknown since 1992.

Even so, dismissing the PRC-appointed 11th Panchen Lama Chokyi Gyalpo can be detrimental to the future of Tibetans in China and to the safeguarding of Tibetan cultural heritage. The wellbeing and interests of the Tibetan people in China depend not on forces and powers outside their land, but on those inside.

The two highest-ranking Tibetan lamas affiliated with the Geluk School of Tibetan Buddhism, which ruled Tibet prior to the invasion of the PRC, were the Dalai Lama and the Panchen Lama. For at least the past three generations, there have been tensions between them over jurisdiction, territory, and taxation. At the same time, these two lamas have maintained a tradition of recognizing each other's reincarnation. It is not hard to see, then, why the current Panchen Lama, Chokyi Gyalpo, is so important right now — Chokyi Gyalpo is 34 years old and the Dalai Lama will turn 90 on July 6, 2025.

If the 14th Dalai Lama officially recognizes the PRC-appointed 11th Panchen Lama Chokyi Gyalpo, this could break the nearly 75-year-old Sino-Tibetan standoff and could even pave the way for his return to Tibet. A rapprochement between the current Panchen Lama and Dalai Lama could soften the Chinese government's hand in Tibetan areas, pacify restive movements among the Tibetan population in China, and offer some closure to long-standing traumatic events of the past decades. The Dalai Lama could follow the model set by Vietnamese monk Thich Nhat Hanh and return to his Communist-controlled homeland to live out his final days.

A Tibetan Buddhist Leader in China

Jetsun Lobsang Jamba Lhundup Chokyi Gyalpo Pelsangpo, or simply Chokyi Gyalpo (Ch. Queji Jiebu), was born Gyaltsen Norbu in Lhari County in the northern areas of the now Tibetan Autonomous Region in 1990 to parents from the pastoral region of Nakchu. His parents are members of the Chinese Communist Party and first met at a local test-prep school in 1986.

After the Chinese government decision to disqualify the Dalai Lama's recognition of Gendun Chokyi Nyima as the 11th Panchen Lama, a government-approved Tibetan delegation led by a senior Gelugpa monk, Sengchen Chokyi Gyaltsen (1936-1998) searched for potential candidates. In 1990, in the presence of the Tibetan Autonomous Region Government Chairman Gyaltsen Norbu, State Councilor Luo Gan, and Ye Xiaowen, head of the State Council National Religion Affairs Bureau, Sengchen Chokyi Gyaltsen extracted the name of Chokyi Gyalpo from a short list of finalist candidates contained in a Golden Urn officially proclaiming him the 11th Panchen Lama of Tibet. The Chinese government bestowed upon Chokyi Gyalpo the responsibility of representing his fellow Tibetans and the Chinese government's interests in the betterment of Sino-Tibetan relations.

Since his early years, Chokyi Gyalpo has lived in Beijing, where he received a religious education in accordance with the Gelugpa tradition as well as a secular education, which included Mandarin Chinese, Chinese history, and Marxist-Leninism theory. Most of his studies were carried out at the Tibetan Advanced Buddhist Academy of China, which his predecessor the 10th Panchen Lama Chokyi Gyaltsen established in Beijing in 1987.

Presently, Chokyi Gyalpo enjoys the highest Tibetan Buddhist clergy leadership rank in the People's Republic of China. He has direct access to Xi Jinping, the president of the People's Republic of China, and benefits from warm relationships with the Chinese Government and the large Chinese Buddhist community.

Just like his immediate predecessor, the current Panchen Lama is fluent in Mandarin Chinese, knowledgeable about Chinese politics and world affairs, and highly erudite in Buddhist doctrine and philosophy. Additionally, his cooperation with Chinese authorities is in line with his predecessor's regarding policies to prioritize education among Tibetans, Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism, protect Chinese territorial integrity, support the Chinese Communist Party, and deter separatist activities that disrupt interethnic harmony.

Nowadays, in his capacity to represent the interests of Tibetans and following the footsteps of his two predecessors, the young Panchen Lama is allowed to join high profile meetings and participate in national political conferences, thus gaining familiarity with state affairs and diplomacy firsthand. In 2010, he personally welcomed Singapore Foreign Minister George Yeo to the PRC. On June 10, 2015, Xi held a formal audience with the 11th Panchen Lama of Tibet in Zhongnanhai, the palace that serves as the headquarters of both the Chinese Communist Party and central government of China. Chokyi Gyalpo travels domestically and internationally (he visited Bangkok, Thailand, in 2019) to give speeches and offer spiritual teachings to Buddhist devotees. According to Tibetan Buddhist customs, he bestows blessings to devotees, grants audiences, offers teachings, and performs various rituals for both monastic and lay communities. He frequently gives political talks, addressing the necessity for Tibetans to accept a Sinicized form of Buddhism in Tibet in line with Socialist values, the Chinese legal system, and the core principles of a modern society.

A History of Rivalry

Although criticized by many in the world, the close relationship that exists between the Panchen Lama and the Chinese government should not be a surprise. Both previous Panchen Lamas, the 9th and 10th, were close allies of China under the Nationalist government (1911-1949) as well as the Communist government after 1949. They also had a controversial relationship with their respective Dalai Lamas, they lived and operated from China, had Chinese followings, and worked for the Chinese government. Just like his predecessor, the 10th Panchen Lama, Chokyi Gyalpo is a member of the Standing Committee of the National Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference and vice president of the Buddhist Association of China, which is the top governmental organization in charge of handling Buddhist affairs in accordance with the Chinese law.

The two previous Panchen Lamas had interests incompatible with those of the previous Dalai Lamas, especially regarding the Panchen Lamas' control and management of their vast lands, taxation, and monastic administration in Central Tibet. They had a progressive agenda to modernize Tibet and welcomed political assistance and protection from China. They also lived out the end of their lives in Chinese cities, where they supported various religious and political initiatives and commanded Chinese followings.

The Panchen Lamas and Dalai Lamas consider themselves "spiritual friends," but the relationship between the two figures and their communities of followers and supporters have hardly been smooth. Their rapport has been characterized by turbulence and rivalry for much of the past century. Just like the 11th Panchen Lama, the 10th Panchen Lama was not recognized by the 14th Dalai Lama right away. The nomination of Gampo Tseten, the boy who later became the 10th Panchen Lama, was supported by the 9th Panchen Lama's monastery search committee and the Chinese Nationalist government of the Republic of China, but not by the Dalai Lama, who had another candidate in mind. Although the young Gampo Tseten was officially enthroned as the 10th Panchen Lama at Kumbum monastery in the summer of 1949, the Dalai Lama reluctantly conceded his recognition only several years later.

Reconciliation and Cooperation

As the Dalai Lama ages, journalists and analysts around the world speculate about the future of the institution of the Dalai Lama and the fate of Tibetans. In 2010, the Tibetan delegation paused its work with the Chinese government and talks have not reopened since.

For his part, the 11th Panchen Lama continues to build confidence among the Tibetan population in China to increase their welfare and prosperity. His influence could be substantially improved with the Dalai Lama's official support on his side, and his recognition as the legitimate Panchen Lama. If the Dalai Lama succeeded in opening a dialogue with the Panchen Lama to understand his vision and acknowledge his leadership in China, the Dalai Lama may have the chance to improve Sino-Tibetan relations, Tibetans' quality of life, and the safeguarding of the Tibetan language and culture. This could also help curtail the possibility of violent reactions to the future news of the passing of the Dalai Lama.

The traditional role of the Panchen Lama as a key figure in recognizing the incarnation of the Dalai Lama is well known among Tibetans and the Chinese officials alike. The 14th Dalai Lama and the administration in exile could opt to continue the tradition of finding the next incarnation. However, it is extremely improbable that the Chinese government will allow the next incarnation of the Dalai Lama to be found within Tibetan areas of the PRC without the authority of the Chinese government. It is also very likely that the Chinese government and the Tibetan leadership within China will decide to select and recognize the Dalai Lama's successor in accordance with their own standards and laws, and with the participation of the current 11th Panchen Lama.

A Path Ahead?

The Dalai Lama has tried for decades to cultivate dialogues with Beijing, with limited success. However, there are a few final options he could pursue. The Dalai Lama could offer to formally accept and confirm Chokyi Gyalpo as the legitimate reincarnation of the 10th Panchen Lama. He could offer to cooperate with Beijing in the selection of his successor as the 15th Dalai Lama, if such a path is agreed upon. If these actions were to succeed, they would have considerable power to bring benefit to both parties. The Dalai Lama would be appreciated for acting responsibly and peacefully, while Beijing would have to seriously consider accommodating some of the Dalai Lama's wishes to improve the wellbeing and safeguard the cultural heritage of Tibetans in China. The Dalai Lama could even garner some leverage with Beijing to disclose information about and negotiate the release of Gendun Chokyi Nyima and his family. By recognizing the 11th Panchen Lama, the Dalai Lama would send a message to all Tibetans that it is time to move on, accept the situation, and welcome the 11th Panchen Lama as a legitimate leader acting in the interests of Tibetans.

Finally, the Dalai Lama could consider negotiating with Beijing for a possible return to Tibet to live his last years there, as Thich Nhat Hanh did in Vietnam. Considering the profound influence Hanh's Buddhist-inspired peace activism has had on him, the 14th Dalai Lama could model his final act on that of the Vietnamese Buddhist teacher, who passed away at Tu Hieu Temple in Vietnam at the age of 95 in 2022. The socially and politically active Hanh campaigned extensively in the 60s both in his country and abroad for a peaceful solution of the war in Vietnam. He reluctantly opted to live a life in exile in 1966, the year he publicly announced his "Five Point Proposal to End the War," fearing reprisals and incarceration or even worse murder upon his return to his country. Despite that fear, however, toward the very end of his life he returned to Vietnam in 2019, ending his exile and fulfilling his wish to be in his homeland. If the Dalai Lama followed Hanh's lead and returned to live out his final days in Tibet, he too would be able to rest in the land of his people and bring closure to his long exile. Tibet is now part of the PRC, but it is still Tibetans' ancestral land, and it could be spiritually supervised by a Panchen Lama under the blessing of his "spiritual friend" the Dalai Lama.

Tibet embodies larger issues of religious freedom in Asia

09 July 2024, UCA News, Ben Joseph

The silence of world religious leaders on Tibetan Buddhism needs to end

Xi Jinping was a toddler when the 14th Dalai Lama was received by Chinese Chairman Mao Zedong in Beijing in 1954. The Dalai Lama had a special love for Jinping's father Xi Zhongxun, a politburo member of the Chinese Communist Party, and gifted him a Rolex watch.

The Tibetan spiritual head, now 89, gives sleepless nights to the 71-year-old Communist Party supremo, holding on to the theory of incarnation followed by ritualistic Tibetan Buddhism, a branch of the world's first proselytizing religion.

Tibetan Buddhists believe the Dalai Lama, at the moment of his death, will pass his spirit on to another human body, and that person will be reincarnated as the next Dalai Lama.

The Chinese Communist Party is looking to control the next Dalai Lama, the highest spiritual head under Tibetan Buddhism, to legitimize its 1950 occupation of Tibet, a remote land in the world's largest and highest plateau far removed from the banes and boons of tech-powered modernity then.

The Chinese Communist Party hijacked the whole process of finding a successor to the Dalai Lama by handpicking the Panchhen Lama, the second highest authority in Tibetan Buddhism after the Dalai Lama. The Panchhen Lama plays a significant role in naming the next Dalai Lama.

The current Dalai Lama recognized Gedhun Choekyi Nyima as Panchen Lama in May 1995. But three days later the Chinese government kidnapped the six-year-old boy and took his family into custody. The Chinese government also named Gyaincain Norbu as the Panchen Lama.

Most Tibetan Buddhists have rejected Norbu, but Nyima has never been seen publicly after he went missing in 1995.

The previous Panchen Lama (Lobsang Trinley Lhundrup Choekyi Gyaltsen) spoke out against Chinese rule in the 1960s. He died in suspicious circumstances in 1989 after spending more than eight years in jail.

China has already claimed the right to handpick the successor to the current Dalai Lama, whose birthday falls on July 6, and even enshrined this right into Chinese law.

To win over pastoral Tibetans, the Communist Party has pushed modern development activities. Reports show that tremendous changes have occurred in infrastructure due to the introduction of modern communications and information technology.

Under the ongoing 14th Five-Year Plan (2021-25), China will invest US$30 billion to expand big-ticket infrastructure on the ecologically sensitive Tibetan Plateau.

For over a decade, the Dalai Lama, currently based in Dharamshala in India, kept a low profile and an impossible peace with the Communist Party. This ensured that nations worldwide developed a more negative attitude toward the Dalai Lama and his government-in-exile.

By 2010, Western nations had almost abandoned the Tibetan cause after China began to make great strides in the global economy. Hollywood celebrities who once made a beeline to meet the Dalai Lama deserted one by one, citing a lucrative Chinese market.

China has reiterated that the next Dalai Lama must be reborn in Tibet and his successor must be approved by the Communist Party, which has raised many eyebrows in the US, which has passed three pieces of legislation on Tibet to seek a resolution to the China-Tibet dispute.

Though the US put the Tibetan issue on the backburner, the Biden administration revived it with the Resolve Tibet Act passed by Congress on June 12.

It authorizes the use of funds to counter Chinese disinformation about the Dalai Lama and urges China to engage in talks with him or his representatives.

The Resolve Tibet Act succeeds two acts that preceded it. After the Act was passed, the Dalai Lama underwent knee surgery in the US.

On June 18, a high-level bipartisan US congressional delegation, led by Foreign Affairs Committee chairman Michael McCaul, visited the Tibetan government-in-exile. The delegation included Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi, known for her controversial visit to Taiwan.

Will the international communities, their systems and world religions come to the rescue of Buddhism, the mother of all religions in the world?

Whoever becomes the next Dalai Lama is crucial for the existence of Tibetan Buddhism because that would decide the measure of people's freedom to practice their traditional religion in Tibet.

After the Dalai Lama dies, a search will begin based on signs such as the direction he was looking in when he died, the flow of the smoke when he is cremated, and visions seen on Lhamo Latso, the oracle lake in Tibet. While most Dalai Lamas trace their roots to Tibet, one was born in Mongolia and another in India.

Will the Dalai Lama name a successor, abolishing the centuries-old incarnation theory, to hoodwink China? That is likely to lead to a situation of two Dalai Lamas vying for legitimacy — one nominated by the Dalai Lama and the one anointed by the Chinese Communist Party.

Even if the current Dalai Lama dies without nominating a successor, the situation is unlikely to change — there could be two Dalai Lamas — one selected based on the systems of the ancient religion (sans Panchen Lama) and one chosen by the communists.

The silence of world religious leaders on Tibetan Buddhism needs to end. The Communists Party's attack on Tibetan Buddhism is only a precursor to the future of other religions in China and other nations that could come under Chinese influence, particularly in Asia.

Jaishankar-Wang Meeting: Why normalcy in India-China ties is likely to stay elusive

08 July 2024, The Indian Express, Manoj Kewalramani and Vanshika Saraf

Complete disengagement and de-escalation in Eastern Ladakh can provide a starting point for steps to be taken in other domains. Achieving this requires sustained and often frustrating dialogue at multiple levels to devise a roadmap of action

On July 4, India's External Affairs Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar met with Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi on the sidelines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) meeting in Astana, Kazakhstan. The post-meeting readouts from both sides demonstrate the distance between their respective positions and why normalcy in bilateral ties is likely to remain elusive.

The MEA's readout is a restatement of India's established position that "complete disengagement from the remaining areas in Eastern Ladakh" and restoration of border peace and tranquillity are prerequisites to the restoration of normalcy in ties. In addition, the statement talks about respecting the LAC, abiding by relevant bilateral agreements, protocols, and understandings, and maintaining peace and tranquillity in the border areas. What it does not mention as a goal is the restoration of the pre-May 2020 status quo.

In contrast, the Chinese readout stresses on "properly handling and controlling the situation in the border areas" while simultaneously "actively restoring and expanding normal exchanges." On the surface, this doesn't appear to be particularly different from earlier messages from Beijing. However, it is worth noting that Wang did not stress that the border issue should be put in an "appropriate position" in bilateral relations and not define overall ties. What was also different was Wang's comment that China was willing to "explore the correct way for two major neighbouring countries to coexist," entailing the need to "respect, understand, trust, and accommodate each other, and help each other succeed.” This is a different formulation from the earlier, oft-repeated one around the two sides not being threats to each other but opportunities for each other’s development.

Words are important. But actions are what truly matter. One must, thus, wait and watch whether Wang’s rhetoric materialises into tangible changes in Chinese policy, particularly around disengagement and de-escalation in Eastern Ladakh. That will be key to developing stability and predictability in the relationship, which is critical for both countries’ strategic ambitions. Unfortunately, without changes in Chinese policy, it would be strategically imprudent and politically difficult for the Indian administration to return to the normal track in ties.

India’s frustration with China is encapsulated in the framework of the three mutuals – mutual respect, mutual sensitivity and mutual interests – which Delhi wants Beijing to adhere to. The primary expression of this has been in the context of Chinese military posture along the LAC. But there are also concerns around China’s deepening engagement in the Indian subcontinent and lack of appreciation for India’s expanding interests and stake across East Asia and the Global South and within multilateral institutions. Xi Jinping’s decision to skip the G20 summit in New Delhi in 2023 was an example of this.

Meanwhile, from Beijing’s perspective, there is growing annoyance with a spectrum of Indian policies. For instance, India continues to resist the resumption of direct flights between the two nations despite Chinese calls for normalcy. The visa approval process for Chinese scholars, travellers and talents continues to be rather challenging, despite it, on occasion, adversely impacting Indian industry. Delhi has also taken a series of steps cracking down on Chinese imports and alleged illegal activities by Chinese companies. Late last month, India’s Directorate General of Trade Remedies initiated an anti-dumping probe on glass fibre imports from China, Bahrain and Thailand after complaints from domestic manufacturers. Delhi has also been cautious and selective when it comes to approving Chinese investments.

On the foreign policy front, China remains particularly wary of India’s growing proximity with the US. In fact, the Chinese readout of the Jaishankar-Wang meeting reflects this persistent anxiety, with the Chinese minister calling on his Indian counterpart to work together to “oppose unilateral bullying, resist camp confrontation, safeguard the common interests of developing countries, and make due contributions to regional and world peace, stability, and development.”

Beijing would have certainly noted, with some consternation, the recent comments by prominent RSS leader Ram Madhav stressing that the rise of China calls for “greater understanding and coordinated action between the US and India,” the MEA’s remarks criticising the PLA’s actions in the South China Sea and the US Congressional delegation’s visit to Dharamshala.

Chinese officials, however, have chosen not to hype up any of these developments and lash out at India. Instead, the new Chinese ambassador, Xu Feihong, has been engaged in quiet diplomacy, meeting with key stakeholders, including Foreign Minister Jaishankar and former ambassadors. His statement condoling the deaths in the recent stampede in Hathras is also an example of softer public diplomacy from the Chinese side.

In sum, while the relationship between India and China will likely remain strained for the foreseeable future, there appears to be a faint crack in the door for some sort of a tactical adjustment. This will require meaningful actions by Beijing, and will not be easy given the political changes following the elections in India. Moreover, the underlying, structural issues are not likely to be easily addressed. Nevertheless, complete disengagement and de-escalation in Eastern Ladakh can provide a starting point for steps to be taken in other domains. Achieving this requires sustained and often frustrating dialogue at multiple levels to devise a roadmap of action. While continuing to prioritise its concerns on the border, India must not eschew such engagement.

Tibet back under the spotlight

08 July 2024, ORF, Harsh V. Pant and Kalpit A Mankikar

The issue of Tibet is back onto the international centre-stage with the visit of a seven-member US Congressional delegation to Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh, this month to meet the Dalai Lama and members of the Tibetan government-in-exile. During the visit, former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi lashed out at Chinese President Xi Jinping saying that the Dalai Lama’s contribution will live on in perpetuity while Xi Jinping will fade into obscurity. Pelosi had earlier made a trip to Taiwan, which China claims is a breakaway province, following which Beijing launched military drills around the island.

The American activism on Tibet comes close on the heels of the US clearing new legislation that pushes Beijing to re-engage with the Dalai Lama and elected representatives to resolve the standoff over Tibet’s future. The new law directs the US government to coordinate multilateral initiatives to bring about a negotiated settlement on Tibet. Importantly, it also stipulates funding by the US for the purpose of countering disinformation spread by the Communist Party of China on Tibetan history and traditional institutions like the Dalai Lama.

The new law directs the US government to coordinate multilateral initiatives to bring about a negotiated settlement on Tibet.

India has also begun to recalibrate its policy on Tibet, albeit slowly, over the past decade. For his swearing-in ceremony in 2014, Prime Minister Narendra Modi invited the political head of the Tibetan government-in-exile, Lobsang Sangay, along with heads of state from neighbouring countries in South Asia.

The June 2020 clashes in Galwan were an important inflection point in relations between India and China, following which a tense standoff continues between the two armies along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) to this date. The ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) sent a senior representative to attend the funeral of a soldier from the Special Frontier Force (a clandestine unit comprising mostly Tibetans) who was martyred during military operations against the People's Liberation Army along Pangong Tso in August 2020. This was followed by Modi tweeting birthday greetings to the Dalai Lama in 2021.

In the current instance, the fact that the US delegation met Prime Minister Modi and foreign minister S. Jaishankar after the interaction with the Tibetan spiritual leader demonstrates that this was not a personal outreach by US lawmakers. The Indian foreign ministry also stated that the Dalai Lama was a religious figure and was at liberty to conduct his spiritual activities, while countering China's outburst over the Dharamshala interaction. This foray shows that there is close coordination between New Delhi and Washington on the issue of Tibet, thanks largely to convergent interests.

The 1951 Chinese annexation of Tibet led to the Dalai Lama seeking refuge in India. Over the years, China consolidated its hold over Tibet, resulting in the suppression of religious freedom there, and several Tibetans came to India as refugees, drawn by cultural affinity. The Indian government's Tibetan Rehabilitation Policy (2014) document puts the number of Tibetan refugees living in 45 settlements across the country at over 100,000 (as on 2009). Moreover, the government acknowledges that many Tibetans live outside these official settlements too. The Dalai Lama is revered by Tibetans and has acquired international stature. Given that the Dalai Lama is an octogenarian, the issue of succession looms large in the strategic calculus. As a large Tibetan population resides in India, there are apprehensions over how the community would be influenced in the future. Chinese propaganda has tried to smear the institution of the Dalai Lama, dubbing the current spiritual head a separatist. China will seek to assert itself on the question of succession. There is significant global awareness of China's designs. The US Tibetan Policy and Support Act of 2020, cleared by the Donald Trump administration, stipulates that only those adhering to the Tibetan Buddhist faith must decide on the Dalai Lama's successor. Media reports suggest that the Indian government discussed the succession issue at the highest levels in 2021.

Chinese propaganda has tried to smear the institution of the Dalai Lama, dubbing the current spiritual head a separatist. China will seek to assert itself on the question of succession.

To conclude, Xi's rise and consolidation within China has led to the nation stoking territorial disputes with neighbours like India, Japan and Taiwan. However, China may not be left unscathed by its project to redraw borders. India okaying the US delegation's meeting with the Dalai Lama also bursts the notion that a reduced majority in the Lok Sabha may lead to greater caution in Modi's foreign-policy dealings. On the contrary, by replying to the greetings of Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te with respect to Modi 3.0, and reaffirming support to the Tibetan cause, India is pushing the envelope on China's red lines. Modi's decision not to attend the SCO summit this year in Astana was also aimed at avoiding a direct meeting with the Chinese leader.

The message from New Delhi seems to be categorical: If China does not respect India's sensitivities with respect to its core interests, India too should not be expected to be mindful of Beijing's red lines. And unless Beijing addresses India's core concerns on border clarity and national security, New Delhi is in no hurry to mend fences.

Tibet, not LAC, is the real issue

07 July 2024, Deccan Herald, Seshadri Chari

America's Tibet policy under several presidents has been ridden with flip-flops. Trade and commerce with Beijing dominated the decision-making process, which was at the cost of security perils for countries in China's proximity, especially India.

The official US State Department X/Twitter account of the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs put out a tweet wishing His Holiness The Dalai Lama, "Happy 85th birthday to His Holiness @DalaiLama, who has inspired the world through his peace & kindness, and as a symbol of the struggle for Tibetans and their heritage. We thank India for hosting His Holiness and Tibetans in freedom since 1959 & wish His Holiness happiness", it read. In Beijing, officials were crowding over the tweet and discussing ways of damage control. The Xi Jinping dispensation has every reason to be worried.

America's Tibet policy under several presidents has been ridden with flip-flops. Trade and commerce with Beijing dominated the decision-making process, which was at the cost of security perils for countries in China's proximity, especially India. The human rights violations, mass killings of Tibetan Buddhist monks, self-immolations by senior monks and wanton destruction of holy relics and other historical records did not seem to draw the attention of the White House resident at crucial times. But in recent times, pro-Tibet voices and organisations have succeeded in highlighting the plight of Tibetans living in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and other areas annexed by China using brute force since the late 1940s.

Former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi met with Dalai Lama in Dharamshala and strongly reaffirmed congressional support for the people of Tibet and spoke out against the China's oppressive human rights record. Her comment aimed at Xi Jinping – "Dalai Lama's legacy will live, you'll be gone" – has drawn sharp criticism from Beijing.

China's occupation of Tibet has not only made it our immediate neighbour but has seriously impacted our security on the western border, too, with Pakistan having gifted a big chunk of occupied land to China, thus severing our link with Central Asia. It is strategically imperative for New Delhi to not only regain Pakistan-Occupied Kashmir but also to re-establish our ancient trade route through Central Asia.

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar has outlined his government's priorities in the region and emphasised resolving the vexed India-China 'border issue' through dialogue and diplomacy. But seven decades of dialogue and diplomatic engagements have not made any difference to the hegemonic objectives and actions of Beijing. It is time to face this reality and amplify efforts to add ourselves as a force multiplier in the dynamics of regional geopolitics. That Prime Minister Narendra Modi skipped the SCO summit in Astana not only signals a downgrading of the forum in India's calculus, but also his proposed visit to Moscow adds a new dimension to India's policies and strategy for regional stability.

External Affairs Ministry officials would be well aware of a new Tibet-related bill introduced by prominent Republican and Democratic lawmakers and passed recently by the US House of Representatives. The 'Resolve Tibet Act', awaiting presidential assent, calls for enhancing US support for Tibet and "pushing for negotiations without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community." Besides empowering State Department officials to counter Beijing's disinformation on Tibet, the US will work with likeminded governments and multilateral efforts to reject false claims of Tibet being a part of China since "ancient times".

The real issue between India and China is not the so-called Line of Actual Control and the settlement of the border dispute as much as it is about Tibet's freedom and its sovereignty. A large section of people in India would like to have a friendly relationship with China and conduct trade under normal conditions. But this can be best done with an independent Tibet as a buffer between the two countries. Beijing is not serious about resolving any of the several issues with India, perhaps because resolving them would then bring the Tibet issue between them front and centre. New Delhi should impress upon the international community that a free and independent Tibet is the only solution to many of the global and regional China-induced flashpoints that could emerge as major conflict zones.

World Tibet Day Special | Tibetan struggle is on an upward swing despite its ups and downs: Amb Dilip Sinha

06 July 2024, First Post, Vimal Harsh

The struggle has received a shot in the arm with the visit of the bipartisan US Congressional delegation to Dharamshala, their meeting with PM Modi, and the Dalai Lama's US visit, says the author of 'Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty'

The issue of Tibet has been undeniable in the matrix of India-China relations and remains a textbook example of Red imperialism. Ever since communist China invaded the country of monks – beginning with the invasion of Chamdo, when the Chinese People Liberation Army crossed the Jinsha River on October 6-7, 1950, to the El Salvador-sponsored draft resolution requesting global support against Tibet's invasion in November 1950, to the 17-point agreement on May 23, 1951 – Lhasa appeared abandoned by all the major powers.

Historically, Tibet had a 'patron-priest' relationship with China and strong intellectual linkages with India. But nowhere in its history has Tibet lost its autonomous identity. And after the Xinhai Revolution and the fall of Qing, a Manchu-led imperial dynasty, Lhasa was a de facto sovereign polity.

With the rise of China, as an economic as well as geostrategic power, the West, which once accepted the 'one-China' policy merrily to meet its Cold War demands, has now started raising the issue of Taiwan and Tibet. As any objective analysis of history would second, Tibet has been the focus of 'Great Games', whether it might be the rivalry of British and Russian empires in the 19th century, the Cold War in the 20th century, or emerging US-China bipolarity.

Exploring these issues, a new book on Tibet has just come. Imperial Games in Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood and Sovereignty by former ambassador Dilip Sinha is an 'authoritative', 'lucid', 'rich', and 'impressive' analysis of the global geopolitical ambitions that have practically left the spiritual bastion to the mercy of the Chinese Red aristocracy. As we observe World Tibet Day on June 6, Amb Sinha answers some of the questions his book deals with.

Excerpts:

Q. Many people wonder if the Tibetan struggle for statehood and sovereignty is dying a slow death. Is this the case?

The Tibetan struggle has had its ups and downs, but far from dying, it is on an upward swing. It has received a shot in the arm with the visit of the bipartisan US Congressional delegation to Dharamsala, the meeting of the delegation with the Indian prime minister and the Dalai Lama's visit to the US.

Within Tibet, the struggle continues to be brutally repressed by China, but this itself is an indication of China's inability to win the hearts and minds of the Tibetan people. Currently, a million Tibetan children have been taken away from their homes and are being groomed in residential schools as Han Chinese, shorn of their own language, culture and religion. But the Tibetan people continue to resist their occupiers peacefully and stoically.

Q. The detailed analysis provided by the book helps readers gain a lot of information about China and Tibet. Don't you think the world, particularly Indians, should know more about them and their history, when these Asian giants have a disturbed frontier stretching for about 3,500 kilometres?

Yes. Indians need to know more about their largest and friendliest neighbour, Tibet, with whom they have very close historical ties. Tibet had long been an independent country. It was conquered by China in the eighteenth century, around the time Britain started its conquest of India. Early in the twentieth century, when Britain and Russia divided Central Asia between them, they agreed to keep Tibet as a part of the Chinese Empire, because neither wanted the other to seize it. Even when China's Qing dynasty collapsed in 1912, Britain and Russia refused to recognise Tibet's declaration of independence. When China invaded Tibet in 1950, Russia supported China and Britain stayed aloof, advising the US to do the same. This put the onus on newly independent India which was still struggling with the aftermath of the partition. India should have taken up Tibet's cause, at least diplomatically, and refused to recognise the annexation. But it didn't, and is now faced with a security nightmare on its northern border.

Q. Where do you think Tibet's case was lost, if it has been lost yet?

The cause is certainly not lost and will not be as long as the Tibetan people continue to resist Chinese rule. The refusal of the big powers to condemn China's invasion in 1950 was a serious setback for Tibet. But countries all over the world, led by India, have given shelter to Tibetans fleeing Chinese repression. Their support and the resistance of the Tibetan people will keep the cause alive.

Q. The book deals well with the kind of political ties Tibet historically had with China, but despite that, the passages show the strong ideational relationship that India and Tibet have shared in the past. Any comments from your side?

Tibet's ties with India have always been much closer than with any other country. It goes back even before Buddhism travelled to Tibet from India. Tibetans regard Nyatri Tsenpo as their first king. They believe that he belonged to a royal family related to the Buddha. Buddhism arrived in Tibet a few centuries later from India and its religious texts were translated from Sanskrit and Pali. India's ties became weak during the long period of Muslim rule in northern India. When the Nalanda university library was burnt by the invaders, its teachers and students rescued several books and took them to Tibet. There is thus a strong relationship of trust between the people of the two countries to come to each other's help.

Q. The book depicts Tibet as a victim of major powers; does that include India as well?

That is unfortunately true. Britain and Russia accepted Tibet as a part of China because they did not want the other to occupy it. The US helped Tibetans in the 1950s as part of its war against communism, but after the Sino-Soviet split it befriended China and ignored Tibet. Now that US-China relations are once again sour, the US is promoting the Tibetan struggle to weaken China.

India too attached greater importance to its relations with China than Tibet. In 1950, it wanted to lead, jointly with China, Asia's resurgence against European imperialism. It also felt that good relations with China would help in moderating Mao's aggressiveness and avert another world war.

Q. You have quoted BN Rau, India's then permanent representative to the United Nations, as saying that had Communist China been made a UN member, it would not have invaded Tibet. Now that the PRC is a member of the UN, do you think that this will act as an inhibitor to the Chinese designs in Ladakh, Arunachal Pradesh, or even Taiwan, for that matter? India was naïve in believing that if Communist China was allowed to take the China seat in the UN (held by the Kuomintang party, which had lost in the civil war and withdrawn to Taiwan) it would start behaving responsibly and abandon its plans of attacking Tibet, Taiwan, Korea and other countries it claimed. Communist China did eventually become a member of the UN and a permanent member of the Security Council in 1971. Its first act was to veto Bangladesh's membership application to please Pakistan. Its aggressive policies abroad and repression at home continue unabated. Far from becoming more responsible, it has used its power to threaten its neighbours, repress its own people and support other dictatorial regimes.

Why the Himalayan Region Is Integral to a Rules-Based Order in the Indo-Pacific

06 July 2024, The Diplomat, Jagannath Panda, Ryohei Kasai and Eerishika Pankaj

Chinese militarization and expansionism in the Himalayas remains a perennial concern not just for India, but for the United States – and its Indo-Pacific allies and partners.

In June 2024, former U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi minced no words in criticizing the Chinese government and President Xi Jinping for the persecution of Tibetans, including attempts to erase their culture. Pelosi was part of a U.S. delegation that met with the 14th Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, India, where he has been living in exile since he was forced to flee Tibet in 1959 after an uprising against China's repressive rule was brutally suppressed. China considers the Dalai Lama a dangerous separatist, and seeks to prevent all diplomatic contact with him.

Pelosi's acrimony went beyond empty rhetoric. Building on the U.S. Congress' "Resolve Tibet Act," passed only days before her visit to Dharamshala, she heralded stronger U.S. support for the Himalayan region, which China is trying to rebrand as "Xizang," the Mandarin term for Tibet. Her remarks have yet again brought to the forefront the fact that Chinese militarization in Tibet remains a perennial concern not just for India, but for the United States – and its Indo-Pacific allies and partners.

For China, Tibet is perhaps the most critical, but not the only, aspect of its growing Himalayan troubles. Most notably, China has a long-standing border dispute with India, which has kept getting more hostile since Xi Jinping came into power – recall the 2017 Doklam stand-off, the defining 2020 Galwan Clash, and the 2022 Tawang skirmish, to name but a few prominent contentions along the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

Concurrently, China has been pursuing its "salami tactics" strategy with the neighboring states, including the small land-locked nation of Bhutan. Then there is the question of China's increasingly unsustainable, "debt-trap"-inducing Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), which has already cast a dark shadow over economically weaker Himalayan states like Nepal and Pakistan. Most importantly, China's massive hydro-infrastructure constructions and upper-riparian-derived unilateral control of South Asian rivers that begin in Tibet have raised serious questions about the impact on Himalayan ecology and control of resources.

Against such an overall bleak scenario, will the latest Pelosi visit engender greater geopolitical awareness and considered responses, beyond the human rights questions, in the West about China's tactics? Importantly, can the Himalayas as a whole be featured as a primary focus of the Indo-Pacific strategies, not just as a byline to specific conflicts be it vis-à-vis India or Tibet?

Time to Talk About a Himalayan Liberal Rules-Based Order

Pelosi's remarks and meeting with the Tibetan Government in Exile evoke memories of her controversial 2022 visit to Taiwan, which intensified China's military maneuvers against the democratic island and precipitated the so-called Fourth Taiwan Crisis. Not just Taiwan, but most countries in the Indo-Pacific, including South Korea – where President Yoon Suk-yeol opted not to meet the then-U.S. House speaker – worried about the repercussions on the region's already fractious relations.

Yet that trip brought unprecedented global attention to Taiwan, whose democratic credentials weighed heavy against China's autocratic, disruptive rule, and the surrounding region, too. Such a tactic, in turn, has proved consequential for globally publicizing the Indo-Pacific's maritime concerns, including the South China Sea disputes. Greater awareness in the international media about the repercussions of Chinese interference in the Taiwan Strait or the South China Sea has further popularized the Indo-Pacific construct.

Yet much of the narrative has automatically assumed that a rules-based order in the Indo-Pacific is primarily (and perhaps only) maritime in nature. This assertion is aided by the reality that the maritime trade routes would be directly affected by China's actions, in turn impacting European/Western security and prosperity.

Yet, were China to become the "Himalayan hegemon," the consequences would be dire. The interdependent nature of the security dilemmas means that a rules-based order in the Himalayan region is imperative for the stability, security, and prosperity of the Indian Ocean, South China Sea, East China Sea, and the Taiwan Strait.

A key reason why this connection has not yet been made as clearly is that the focus by the West on Tibet has remained limited to the human rights aspect, highlighting it as the central cause of concern in the Himalayas. Without taking away from the criticality of the human rights question, it is important to also connect the human rights violations to China's broader geopolitical agendas in the Tibetan plateau, which need to be closely examined.

Such a lens is critical for trans-Himalayan and Tibetan studies, wherein geopolitics has often come second to human rights and environmental debates, often missing the connection between these issues as grander security narratives. For instance, with respect to the succession of the 14th Dalai Lama, few studies have looked at the geopolitics associated with succession politics, which will directly impact the bilateral relationship of countries across the world with China. This has meant that nations remain unprepared to deal with the strategic realities of such a question – a fact China relies on to work in its favor. More widely, issues of militarization and securitization in Tibet and adjoining areas, as well as weaponization of natural resources, need to be discussed in tandem with climate/ecological degradation and human security aspects in the Himalayas to preserve the Indo-Pacific's rules-based order.

Due to the interconnected nature of regional stability and security, the Himalayas are a critical strategic region influencing major geopolitical dynamics. Tensions here can spill over, impacting maritime and territorial disputes in the Indo-Pacific. A liberal rules-based order in the Himalayas ensures consistent principles of international law, mutual respect for sovereignty, and conflict resolution mechanisms. Without this, the broader rules-based order in the Indo-Pacific remains fragile and susceptible to power imbalances and regional conflicts. Therefore, integrating Himalayan security within the Indo-Pacific framework fosters comprehensive regional stability, enhancing the credibility and effectiveness of a rules-based international order.

Securitization of the Restive Himalayas

In the 2000s, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) launched its Western Development Strategy to offset the lack of economic growth in the western provinces, including the Buddhist-dominated Tibet and the Muslim-dominated Xinjiang, compared to the stupendous high-quality development in the eastern zones and the southern coast. Under this "Go West" policy, the Chinese government aimed its own funds, as well as foreign investment and development assistance in implementing the development of both coastal and inland areas, to replace perceived backwardness with modernization, including new infrastructure. Under Xi Jinping, large-scale development went on to incorporate eco-environmental protection ideals to further these aims "to achieve common prosperity for all the ethnic groups of the western region" – but more specifically the goal was to consolidate the frontier regions, often at the expense of the ecological needs of the region despite environment protection promises. For instance, China's extensive modern-day mega-dam building that began with the construction of the Three Gorges Dam has already disrupted biodiversity, as well as caused droughts, floods, earthquakes, and massive displacement of people.

In the more than two decades since the launch of the "Go West" campaign, the Chinese government has doubled down its pursuit of these aims, which remain laced with empty rhetoric. The main intent is to exploit the region's abundant natural resources while building hard infrastructure to make civil-military logistics easier.

To securitize and militarize the areas, China has implemented unsavory measures such as resettlements, intrusive laws, internment camps, forceful induction into the People's Liberation Army (PLA), increased surveillance, and accelerated assimilation. Such tactics will not only help China's government repress separatist tendencies among minority groups and neutralize their own respective languages and cultures but also help fortify the regions around the Himalayas with infrastructure that can be utilized to expand territory.

Similarly, the unabated infrastructure development, including airports/helipads, highways, oil pipelines, rail networks, and reservoirs, aimed at improving land-sea linkages is mainly a tool to expand "dual-use" of infrastructure – that is, national security interests – in the garb of socioeconomic growth. For example, China's increase in railway construction in Tibet and "leapfrog development in general aviation" look to facilitate better access not just to neighboring provinces but also to land ports along the border areas for military purposes.

Already, the increase in stationed PLA troops and even nuclear weapons have raised concerns about the impact of hyper-militarization on the fragile Himalayan region. China has in the past been accused of "conducting nuclear-weapons research on the Tibetan plateau and dumping radioactive waste" and also of building an "immense military bastion with tactical missiles and intercontinental ballistic missiles."

Another vital geopolitical aim is to enable this region's active participation in the BRI, via initiatives such as the "Western Region Land-Sea Corridor" development announced in 2019. This would improve connectivity and integration between China's poorer, restive regions with both the well-to-do eastern and southern provinces and countries in Eurasia, Central Asia, and South Asia, as connected by the expansive BRI. Through avenues like the “Himalayan Quad” China has sought to establish with South Asian countries Nepal, Pakistan, and Afghanistan, where Beijing has immense economic clout, it has sought to further the geopolitically motivated aspects of BRI into greater intent.

Similarly, China’s use of its position as the “upstream water hegemon” – with six major Asian rivers originating in the Tibetan Plateau flowing into nearly 18 downstream countries – has aimed at controlling access and prioritizing its own “water sovereignty.” China has a history of weaponizing water to achieve its national interests as seen, during Doklam clash of 2017 with India.

Furthermore, China has been indulging in rewriting Himalayan territorial borders, e.g., by issuing “standard maps” (e.g., showing India’s Arunachal Pradesh and the disputed Aksai Chin plateau as Chinese territory) and by expanding into Bhutanese territories. These moves call into question Xi’s stated aim of building a “community of shared future among neighboring countries.”

Aiming Beyond Rhetoric

Optimistically, one can hope that the latest round of support for Tibet in the U.S. Congress and the U.S. delegation’s visit to the Tibetan Government in Exile would usher in a new wave of international action and attention, including more foreign delegations, as happened with Taiwan in 2022. But more importantly, it should initiate a multiplicity of debates questioning not just China’s long-standing repressive actions – from unfettered territorial expansion and instability to overexploitation and access to natural resources – but also the international community’s tacit silence regarding Himalayan issues. For instance, the EU, which despite its focus on human rights in Tibet is only starting to recognize Chinese coercion globally, may also facilitate discussions in the European Parliament around the aforementioned Himalayan concerns with broader implications.

It is important to note that none of the major concerns regarding China in the Himalayas are new. For example, China has used Tibet and Xinjiang for nuclear bases since before 1964; the Tibetans have hence long worried about the militarization of the region. Old reports dating back to the 1980s highlighted how it is not just the Indian cities and industrial centers that are possibly within the range of China’s nuclear strikes, but also “all the major cities of Central Asia,” highlighting the interconnectedness of security debates.

Undoubtedly, in era of Chinese military modernization under Xi, the threat has only accelerated. For instance, satellite imagery in Bhutanese territory has confirmed China’s aggressive push to change the status quo in the Himalayas.

If the United States and democracies in Asia and Europe such as the EU states, India, and Japan, are serious about the intent to preserve a rules-based order, then they must acknowledge that the threat from China is not limited to its so-called autonomous regions in the Himalayas or the neighboring states, but covers China’s multidirectional expansionism, which has been going on for years. Given the current sliding geopolitical landscape and Xi’s focus on achieving his “China Dream” goals, including national rejuvenation and integration, the Indo-Pacific democracies have no choice but to put impetus into examining and upending China’s attempts at sinicizing the Himalayan (dis)order.

India mum on environmental losses due to China’s Tibet policies: Academic

05 July 2024, Deccan Herald

Anand Kumar pointed to China’s efforts to alter the courses of rivers originating in Tibet, seven of which flow through countries in South and Southeast Asia, under the guise of development. These actions pose significant environmental challenges for countries sharing natural resources with Tibet, he said.

Bengaluru: India, despite being the world’s largest democracy and a champion of anti-colonial struggles, has not responded strongly to Tibet’s environmental losses caused by Chinese encroachments, Anand Kumar, a sociologist and former professor at Jawaharlal Nehru University, said here on Thursday.

Kumar made these remarks while delivering a talk on Indo-Tibet Relations, Tibetan Plateau, and India’s Climate Security at an event organised by Mount Carmel College in collaboration with the Central Tibetan Administration, South Zone, Bengaluru.

He pointed to China’s efforts to alter the courses of rivers originating in Tibet, seven of which flow through countries in South and Southeast Asia, under the guise of development. These actions pose significant environmental challenges for countries sharing natural resources with Tibet, he added.

Environmental activist Soumyadeep Datta also addressed the lack of substantial regional language resources on Tibet’s history of struggles, contrasting it with the vast resources in English. He called for including the histories of neighbouring countries in Indian curricula to underscore the impact of global warming, particularly on regions like Tibet.

Datta further said vast stretches of India’s northeastern states are grappling with environmental degradation.

The discussions were part of the celebrations marking the 89th birthday of the Dalai Lama and included traditional prayers by Buddhist monks from Mundgod and a cultural dance performance by Gangjong Doegar, a troupe from Kalimpong, West Bengal.

Sino-Indian Conflict Is The Centerpiece Of India's Foreign Policy – Analysis

04 July 2024, Eurasia Review, P.K. Balachandran

Jaishankar-Wang Yi agree to resume dialogue over border peace on the side lines of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization Summit in Astana, Kazakhstan on July 4

The relationship between India and China has been fraught from the time of India's independence in 1947 and the birth of the Peoples' Republic of China (PRC) in 1949. But it was not the centre piece of India's foreign policy until much later.

Today, it is the main concern in policy making circles in New Delhi. Besides it is impacting countries in India's neighbourhood and causing resentment there. The conflict also shapes India's relations with world powers.

Recent moves in India's foreign relations stem from the antagonistic Sino-Indian relationship: Within days of assuming office as Prime Minister for a third time, Narendra Modi flew off to Italy to fraternize with the leaders of the anti-Chinese Western bloc at the G7 summit.

On June 19, to China's chagrin, India facilitated a meeting between a US Congressional delegation and the dissident Tibetan leader, the Dalai Lama, in Dharamshala.

Modi chose to be absent himself from the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) summit in Kazakhstan on July 4. China happens to be one of the founders of the SCO. In all likelihood, Modi will stay out of the BRICS summit in Kazan (Russia) on October 22 also. China is a founder-member of BRICS and a leading player there.

India has made a number of anti-Chinese moves both in the Indian economy and India's neighbourhood. In the domestic sphere, it banned Chinese apps accusing them of snooping on Indians. It imposed high tariffs on imports from China. Chinese companies were banned from participating in highways, micro, small and medium industrial sector projects.

Applications for investments in the e-commerce and financial services sectors were viewed with suspicion. Steps were taken against money laundering and tax evasion. All this led to US$ 6 billion in potential Chinese FDI being held up in 2022.

In India's neighbourhood, steps were taken to dissuade governments from giving projects to the Chinese, in some cases successfully. Neighbouring countries felt uncomfortable about being a venue for Sino-Indian tussles. International forums also saw India and China battling it out on one issue or the other.

China's Provocations

On February 4, 2022, government told parliament that China was in illegal occupation of about 38,000 sq.km of in Ladakh for the last six decades. Chinese troops killed 20 unarmed Indian soldiers at Galwan in Ladakh in June 2020.

China claims sovereignty over the entire Indian State of Arunachal Pradesh and gave new names to places in that State irritating India.

Chinese President Xi Jinping did not attend the G20 summit in India in September 2023, although it was Indian Prime Minister Modi's prestige project.

In 2008, China blocked India's entry into the Nuclear Suppliers Group (NSG). It also blocked its entry into the UN Security Council as a permanent member. China has blocked India's bid to sanction terrorists at the UN. In short, China is loath to give India quarter in the multilateral sphere.

Relevance of Sino-US Relations

Writing for the Carnegie Endowment website, Former Indian Foreign Secretary and Ambassador to China, Vijay Gokhale, says that China judges India's actions from the stand point of its relations with the US.

From the 1940s, the Chinese have never seen India as an independent country with a foreign policy independent of the West. India has no independent status in China's policy landscape. India matters to China only to the extent that it has a role in the Sino-US conflict.

According to the Chinese, the signing of foundational agreements between the Indian and US armed forces in 2023 meant that India and the US were moving towards an alliance, disturbing the balance of power between China and the US.

Gokhale quotes Ye Hailin of the National Institute of International Strategy in the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences to say that China is convinced that India would lean to the US to derive benefits and that China would inevitably be the target of a joint Indo-US "China containment plan."

Line of Actual Control Issues

According to Gokhale, the escalating tension on the Line of Actual Control (LAC) on the Sino-Indian border since 2013 has to be seen from the Chinese perspective to understand why China is troubling India so frequently.

According to a recent study by Ms Ketian Zhang, Assistant Professor at George Mason University, China uses mild coercion on the LAC to warn India not to go for an all-out war with China.

Ms. Zhang submits that India's cooperation with the US has not yet reached a level that can compel the US to support India in case of a war with China, and that China's current strength and level of coercive actions along the LAC are adequate to unsettle India without provoking a serious backlash or full scale war.

In Gokhale's understanding, China regards India as being "unequal" to it, and therefore "unworthy" of being looked at as a stand-alone or independent power.

India becomes relevant to China primarily in the context of great power relationships, especially US-China relationship.

China expects India to treat China's concerns as "global" and therefore requiring immediate attention. It wants India to regard its own concerns vis-a-vis China as "localized problems" that should be managed bilaterally. In other words, India should be satisfied that China is not making these problems worse!

According to Gokhale, China's leaders believe that the nature of India's polity as well as the asymmetry of power between the two countries do not require China to reshape its policy in a way that meaningfully accommodates Indian interests.

However, paradoxically, the Chinese think that India will never formally become a US ally. They also think that the US will not get directly involved militarily in a India-China war because this will be an intolerable burden.

There is also the view in China that India is hesitant to play the role of a junior ally of the US because it has a long tradition of pursuing a non-aligned foreign policy.

According to Ms. Zhang, even QUAD has not changed China's view that the US and India will not form a military alliance. She therefore says that the probability of a geopolitical backlash to the continuance of the current level of coercion on the LAC, or even some increase in it, will be low.

China Underestimates India

In Gokhale's view, China is under-estimating India's potential. India is also building up its economy and its military power and is sticking to its stand on the border issue and normalization of relations.

China wants the border issue to be put on the backburner and the two countries to work on trade, economic cooperation at the bilateral and multilateral levels. But India insists that there can be normal bilateral relations until the situation on the border returns to normal, which means going back to the positions and the agreed conditions of engagement as of 1993. But China does not want to go back to the 1993 agreements.

War Unlikely

However, both sides seem to rule out an all-out war of the 1962 kind. In a TV interview, Indian Foreign Minister S. Jaishankar ruled out war saying it would be difficult to take on a country whose economy is five times that of the Indian economy.

War or even a big increase in Sino-Indian tension will result in China losing the big Indian market for its telecom, machinery and electronic goods sectors.

China's share here in this is 30%, according to the Global Trade Research Initiative (GTRI). Bilateral trade is now US$ 118 billion

Jaishankar-Wang Yi meeting in SCO Summit

The Foreign Ministers of India and China, S. Jaishankar and Wang Yi, met on the side lines of the SCO summit at Astana in Kazakhstan on July 4 and agreed that "the prolongation of the current situation in the border areas is not in the interest of either side."

Jaishankar highlighted the need to redouble efforts to achieve complete disengagement from the remaining areas in Eastern Ladakh and restore border peace and tranquillity in order to remove obstacles towards return of normalcy in bilateral relations.

He reaffirmed the importance of fully abiding by relevant bilateral agreements, protocols, and understandings reached between the two Governments in the past.

The Line of Actual Control must be respected and peace and tranquillity in the border areas always enforced, Jaishankar told Wang Yi.

Wang Yi's response is not mentioned in the Indian read out.

However, both ministers agreed to continue and step up meetings of the diplomatic and military officials of the two sides to take forward their discussions to resolve the remaining issues at the earliest.

To that end, they agreed that the Working Mechanism on Consultation and Coordination on India-China Border Affairs (WMCC) should hold an early meeting.

Is integration of Tibetan schools in exile the way forward?

03 July 2024, Phayul, Tsering Dhundup

Since the Chinese occupation of Tibet in 1959 and the subsequent flight of Tibetan refugees to India, Nepal, and Bhutan, the provision of shelter and education for Tibetan children has been a pressing concern for the Tibetan government in exile. In these circumstances, schools emerge as pivotal institutions, serving as the bedrock for the preservation of Tibetan culture and language, the cultivation of knowledge, and more importantly, nurturing resilience within the community.

Over the next six decades, the Tibetan education setup saw four school institutions rise. The Central Tibetan Schools Administration (CTSA) established in 1961, which is now dissolved and part of the Sambhota Tibetan School Societies, Tibetan Children's Village (TCV) established in 1960, Sambhota Tibetan Schools Administrations (STSS) established in 1999, and Tibetan Homes Foundations (THF) established in 1963. These autonomous bodies took up the mantle of educating Tibetan youth, collaborating closely with the Department of Education of the Tibetan government in exile, known officially as the Central Tibetan Administration.

However, present challenges cast a shadow over the future. It's an open secret that Tibetan schools are grappling with a dwindling Tibetan student population. Once vibrant hubs of learning, these institutions now find themselves at a crossroad, contending with declining enrollment and the resultant strain on resources.

Decline of Tibetan students in exile schools

The primary hurdle facing Tibetan schools today is the dwindling number of Tibetan students. The President of the CTA Penpa Tsering reiterated in multiple speeches the challenge of diminishing demography of Tibetan students faced by all the Tibetan schools, citing factors such as the declining influx of Tibetans from Tibet, the low annual birth rate in exile, and increasing migration to the West.

As of April 2024, enrollment figures in various Tibetan schools paint a concerning picture. In North India, STS Shimla, once boasting hundreds of Tibetan refugee students, has a total enrollment of 290 students, with only 32 Tibetans, 42 Himalayan students and 216 Indian students. For the year 2024 admission, only two Tibetan students were enrolled in the school. Sambhota Tibetan School in Mussoorie accommodates 382 students, among whom only 42 are Tibetan, 62 are of Himalayan descent and the rest are Indian students. STS Herbertpur has only 116 Tibetan students and the rest are Indian students out of 310 students in total. In East India, STS Kalimpong has 133 Tibetan students out of 365 students. STS Darjeeling has 119 Tibetan students out of 232 students.

Tibetan Homes School Gohrimafi in Rishikesh has seen a decrease in enrollment, with only 66 students compared to its previous count of 150. Gopalpur School in the Tibetan Children's Village has also experienced a significant decline in student numbers, dropping from 902 in 2020 to 629 in 2023. STS Dalhousie which used to be a senior secondary school has to close down because of fewer students. Currently, STS Dalhousie operates as a kindergarten and houses only 6 children.

The decline in the number of Tibetan students in North India is also concerning, with an average attendance hovering around a mere 10 per cent of the total strength. This downward trend is pronounced in north-Eastern Tibetan schools also, where the presence of Tibetan students dwindles to only 40 to 50 per cent of the total school students on average.

However, there is a stark difference in South and Central India, where Tibetan schools are experiencing a robust presence due to the cluster Tibetan communities there. STS Mundgod has 80 Tibetan students out of 82. All of STS Mainpat's total strength of 46 students are Tibetans. STS Bylakuppe has 96 Tibetan students out of 112 students.

The diminishing number of students poses challenges to the functioning of these educational institutions. Several schools have already closed, including STS Poanta Sahib in 2021, STS Dalhousie and recently Lower TCV school in Dharamshala. Some are on the verge of closing like THF Gohrimafi in Rishikesh.

The number of Tibetan students enrolled in CTA-affiliated schools in India and Nepal has declined significantly, especially since 2008. From 2000 to 2023, enrollment fell by 39 per cent, from approximately 25,700 to 15,700. Additionally, from 2016 to 2023, the number of schools directly or indirectly affiliated with the CTA contracted from 71 to 66. To stabilise the student population, Tibetan educational institutions have admitted thousands of non-Tibetans from Himalayan communities that share the Tibetan Buddhist cultural heritage.

Sikyong Penpa Tsering while speaking to Tibetan Youth convention participants on July , 2024 in Dharamshala stated that "The Himalayan regions are developing rapidly, and soon they will establish quality schools within their communities. Once these schools are in place, families are likely to send their children there rather than to Tibetan schools".

Tsewang Rigzin, former Deputy Director of the Tibet Fund and co-author of the recently published article titled "South Asia's Tibetan Refugee Community Is Shrinking, Imperiling Its Long-Term Future," told Phayul that "In my opinion, the most pressing issue facing the Tibetan exile community today is the dwindling enrollment of Tibetan children in Tibetan schools, whether they fall under the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) or operate independently. This is a significant cause for concern, as the prosperity of the Tibetan exile community hinges on the strength and vitality of its institutions, such as the CTA and various other bodies. The primary workforce that sustains these institutions comprises the children who emerge from these schools".

Kashag's vision to streamline the exile educational institutions

The 16th Kashag's decision to streamline educational institutions reflects a multifaceted approach aimed at enhancing efficiency, coordination, and service delivery within the Tibetan education system. At the core of this vision is the decision to appoint Education Kalon as the Chairman for prominent institutions like Tibetan Children's Village (TCV), Tibetan Homes Foundation (THF), and Sambhota Tibetan Schools Society (STSS). This decision has sparked both commendation and controversy, highlighting the complexities and challenges involved in restructuring educational governance.

Proponents of the decision argue that establishing uniformity in governance structures across these institutions will increase efficiency and coordination. By standardizing the appointment of the Chairman, the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA) aims to create a more cohesive educational system. Additionally, the emphasis on aligning departmental roles and leadership underscores a commitment to addressing systemic inefficiencies within the education system.

However, critics raise concerns that centralizing the appointment of the Chairman under the Education Kalon may compromise the autonomy and independence historically enjoyed by these educational institutions. These institutions have operated with a degree of autonomy, allowing them to cater to the unique needs of their student populations. Consolidating power in the hands of the Education Kalon raises the risk of stifling innovation and local decision-making processes that have contributed to the success of these institutions in the past.

Speaking to Phayul, Sikyong Penpa Tsering justified the decision to centralize the chairmanship of prominent educational institutions, framing it as a necessary structural change aimed at improving service delivery within the Tibetan education system. "This is not necessarily a consolidation, it's more of structural change that we are trying to make to the institution....., when the structure is not right then the system becomes faulty. Traditionally the role of the education minister is to take care of all the autonomous institutions".

Tsering highlights the disparate arrangements within the governance of institutions such as Tibetan Children's Village (TCV), Tibetan Homes Foundation (THF), and Sambhota Tibetan Schools Society (STSS) as evidence of the need for reform. He points out that while the Education Kalon chaired the board of TCV, the chairmanship of THF was held by the Sikyong.

Meanwhile, STSS exhibited further complexity with two distinct boards; one chaired by the Education Kalon for schools directly managed by Sambhota and another chaired by the bureau representative in Delhi for schools formerly under the Central Tibetan Schools Administration.

This diversity in governance structures, according to Tsering, led to inefficiencies and inconsistencies in decision-making processes, hindering the effective delivery of educational services. By consolidating the chairmanship under the Education Kalon for all these institutions, Tsering claims to have established homogeneity in the governance structure, thereby simplifying decision-making processes and promoting greater coordination and coherence across the educational system. However, it's crucial to critically assess whether centralization under the Education Kalon truly addresses the underlying challenges faced by these institutions.

While uniformity in governance structure may streamline administrative processes, it also raises concerns over the concentration of power and potential loss of institutional autonomy and issues arising due to consolidation of authority. Moreover, the extent to which this structural change translates into tangible improvements in service delivery remains uncertain and necessitates evaluation based on concrete grassroots assessment.

The idea of integration of schools

During an interview with phayul, Sikyong Penpa Tsering emphasized the need to integrate Tibetan schools to ensure their long-term sustainability aiming to streamline administration, enhance facilities, and optimize resources for students. Tsering acknowledged the complexity of school integration, highlighting concerns such as the dismantling of staff structures or the necessity of providing alternative employment if schools are closed down. He stated "In terms of integration of schools, there are lots of questions on how we have to do it, one of the ideas that I floated was can we do it zone-wise, starting from northeast because northeast doesn't have Homes schools and TCV school, it's all Sambhota sets of schools. We have to see how do we integrate the schools for sustenance of these institutions over the long run and then in Central North including District Sirmour with Tibetan Homes Foundations. In Himachal Pradesh, most of the schools are TCV schools and Ladakh is also TCV. So we have to resolve the issue by talking with each other about how to integrate the schools because integration is not an easy job, there is lots of detachment and if we close down one school the whole staff structure has to be dismantled or provide alternative employment of a golden handshake, the idea is to reduce the administrative cost and increase the facilities to the students."

Tsering further emphasized the importance of considering statistical data, particularly regarding the declining birth rates and subsequent implications for school enrollment. He stressed the need for strategic planning to address the evolving educational landscape, including the provision of adequate facilities for both students and teachers. "We have to keep the statistics in mind, there are only about 500 new births in a year, in the years to come we are looking at only about 6000 tibetan children from grade 1 to 12 if we look at the average. Considering these numbers, in the next 5 years who do we manage? How do we organise ourselves? How many higher secondary schools do we need to be able to provide the right education with the right facilities even increasing the facilities for teachers if possible”.

He pointed out that schools like TCV face challenges such as administrative costs rising while student numbers decline. He urged proactive measures, warning of the increasing financial burden associated with delayed integration efforts. Sikyong Tsering advocated for the development of a comprehensive blueprint to guide the integration process over the next five to ten years. “TCV is seeing a huge challenge with so many schools, the administrative cost is going up and numbers of students are going down, they will have to strategize on how they want to do it or follow a complete structure that the education department and Kashag guides them to do it. The longer it takes to consolidate the schools, it’s going to be more miserable, it’ll cost a lot more drain on the finances. So before that happens, if we can develop a blueprint as to how things might change and what steps we need to take in the next 5 to 10 years for the complete integration of schools.”

Having the same concern as the Sikyong, Tsewang Rigzin, told Phayul “The consolidation of Tibetan schools is a necessary step due to the declining number of Tibetan students. Maintaining a larger number of schools is costly and inefficient if the student population is decreasing. This consolidation is more of a compulsion rather than a choice. In the early days, these schools had to look after and educate a large number of students, which was a challenging task. Nowadays, with fewer students, the focus should shift to improving the quality of education.

“Recent CBSE exam results have shown that Tibetan schools are performing well, but it’s important to remember that passing an exam requires only 33 per cent. If a student aspires to attend a good college, they need to achieve high marks. Therefore, focusing on the quality of education rather than the quantity of students is crucial”.

However, Tsering’s proposal to integrate schools zone-wise encountered technical hurdles, as highlighted by Tsering Dhondup, Director of the Sambhota Tibetan Schools Administration. Dhondup, told Phayul, citing concerns regarding the potential impact on funding: “If schools that are transferred from the Central Tibetan Schools Administration (CTSA) to Sambhota Tibetan Schools Societies, like STS Mussoorie and STS Herbertpur, were transferred to autonomous institutions like the Tibetan Homes Foundation (THF). Such transfers might jeopardize funding from the Indian government, which currently supports these schools. If schools in Himachal were to be looked after by TCV, there would be ramifications for schools like STS Shimla, which currently receives funding from the Indian government”.

Dhondup also shared concerns about whether autonomous institutions would be willing to assume the responsibility of administering these schools. These technical and logistical hurdles underscore the complexity of implementing Tsering’s proposal. He further stated that “there have been two meetings between Sikyong and key stakeholders, including TCV, THF, and STSS, and no substantial decisions have been reached regarding school integration”. The meetings have brought to light the complexity of the issue and the need for careful consideration of technical, administrative, and financial implications.

What lies ahead

In light of the myriad challenges and transformations facing the Tibetan schools in exile, it stands at a pivotal crossroads, demanding thoughtful strategies and decisive actions for its continued existence and sustenance. The journey from the aftermath of the Chinese occupation to the present scenario, characterized by declining enrollment numbers and institutional restructuring, underscores the resilience and adaptability of the Tibetan community in exile.

The dwindling enrollment figures in Tibetan schools, particularly in the northern regions of India, raise urgent concerns about the sustainability of these institutions. Factors such as demographic shifts, migration patterns, and changing birth rates contribute to this complex issue, necessitating comprehensive interventions to reverse the downward trend. The closure of some schools and the impending risk faced by others underscore the gravity of the situation and the imperative for immediate action.

Amidst these challenges, Kashag’s vision to streamline educational institutions represents a bold step towards enhancing efficiency and coordination within the system. The decision to centralize the appointment of Chairpersons under the Education Kalon reflects an ambitious effort to standardize governance structures and promote coherence across educational institutions. While this move holds promise for administrative efficiency, it also sparks debates regarding the potential erosion of institutional autonomy and responsiveness to local needs.

Furthermore, the proposal to integrate schools zone-wise highlights the complexities inherent in such endeavours, ranging from logistical hurdles to financial implications. Despite the recognition of the need for strategic planning and proactive measures, the path forward remains fraught with uncertainties and technical challenges.

In navigating these complexities, it is imperative to adopt a holistic approach that balances the imperatives of standardization with the imperative of preserving the unique identities and needs of individual institutions. Any structural changes must be accompanied by rigorous evaluation and consultation with stakeholders to ensure that they align with the overarching goal of providing quality education to Tibetan children in the exile set up.

India playing Tibet card to prick China

03 July 2024, O Heraldo

In a rare visit, a delegation of American lawmakers visited Himachal Pradesh's Dharamshala this week to meet the Tibetan leader the Dalai Lama.

In a well-orchestrated convergence of mutual interests, the United States, the Tibetans in exile, and Indians with their nod to the visit came together to send a message to China. The message found its mark.

Shortly after the US delegation, comprising House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul and Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi, began their engagements with Tibet's Government-in-Exile, the Embassy of China in India warned the United States to not "send the wrong signal".

Beijing's reaction highlights the sensitive nature of the Tibet issue in China-US relations.

The American lawmakers' visit to India was part of a broader effort to support Tibetan rights. They met the Dalai Lama, Tenzin Gyatso, in Dharamshala. The visit aligns with Washington's long-standing support for Tibetans and their cultural and religious practices, which have faced repression in China.

The US House of Representatives recently passed the Resolve Tibet Act, which aims to pressure China into resuming dialogue with Tibetan leaders. This dialogue has been stalled since 2010. The bill seeks a negotiated agreement on Tibet's future, addressing aspirations related to its historical, cultural, religious and linguistic identity.

China considers the Dalai Lama a separatist. The Dalai Lama, however, seeks genuine autonomy for Tibet rather than independence. Beijing insists on approving the Dalai Lama's successor to strengthen its control over Tibet.

The question that comes to one's mind is about what makes US diplomats for this sudden visit to India, meeting Dalai Lama at this point of time? At the same time, India must carefully analyse the repercussions of such sudden move.

The present meeting directly involves three countries: US, Tibet and India. While physically US is very far from the epicenter, Tibet is a part of China's main contenders; therefore, any physical clash will be between China and India. Sino-Indian border dispute is an ongoing territorial dispute over the sovereignty of two relatively large, and several smaller, separated pieces of territory between China and India which are being claimed and counter claimed. Besides India being vulnerable in the India-China Northern border, threat from the eastern border through Myanmar and the Indian Ocean cannot be ignored. At the same time, India has to broadly see the issues of Tibet, Taiwan, Xinjiang, Hong Kong - from their perspectives - that combine the kind of broader view that India has to take.

Besides, direct dispute between China and India on the Tibet issue will call for direct conflict, whereas US has no physical stake but only a political one.

While it is also difficult to fathom at what level the US-China relationship will get ignited in case of Tibet issue, conflict with Taiwan is going to be a major issue in worsening the US-China relationship. In case of US getting directly involved in the China-Tibet issue, it is likely to compound Sino-China issues too.

India has also initiated a strategic response to China's renaming of places in Arunachal Pradesh by planning to rename over two dozen places in Tibet. This move comes as part of a broader effort to counteract China's territorial claims and assert India's own historical and geographical narratives. India aims to assert its own narratives and strengthen its position on the global stage.

It is a warning shot for China and its president Xi Jinping. India is essentially signaling to China that play-time is over. The scare of falling out of line vis-à-vis the 'One China Policy' is over. One-sided bullying will no longer be allowed being the norm. China can no longer rename Indian villages and expect New Delhi to sit by idly. The rules of engagement have changed.

It was about time India let China know that it too can press some of Beijing's raw nerves. While caution is advisable, it is refreshing to see India demonstrate the ability to play the game as an equal power. Bullying tolerated beyond a point is as good as submission. As a side note, it is surprising to watch the US takes up the issue of Tibet's autonomy so aggressively.

By allowing the US delegation to not just visit Dharamshala but also meet the Dalai Lama, the Indian government has made it clear it can also play the Tibet and Taiwan cards at a time and place of its choosing.

However, to achieve such a balancing act, India must strengthen its economy and the defence sector very powerfully. After immense provocation, if China responds with aggression, India should be able to ward off the threat.

03 July 2024, Lt General M K Das

"His Holiness Dalai Lama, with his message of knowledge, tradition, compassion, purity of soul and love, will live a long time and his legacy will live forever. But you, the President of China, you'll be gone and nobody will give you credit for anything."
–Nancy Pelosi, former US House Speaker

A 7-member US Congressional delegation, led by House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul, which also included Nancy Pelosi, former US House of Representatives Speaker visited Dharamshala (HP) and New Delhi from June 16 to 20, 2024. The visit of the delegation to Dharamshala, the home of His Holiness Dalai Lama on June 18-19 assumes significance from the foreign policy perspective on Tibet. The powerful delegation from the US called on HH Dalai Lama on June 19. The visit comes after the US Congress recently passed the Resolve Tibet Act. It would become a law once the US President Joe Biden formally signs and approves it. The visit was a clear message for China after China strongly objected to the visit of the US delegation by urging the US to "fully recognise the anti-China and separatist nature of Dalai clique and refrain from any contact with it." We need to understand the background of this important issue which also has serious implications on Indo-China relations. Tibet is often called the "roof of the world" and it is a high-altitude plateau and mountain region with an average height of 14,000 feet.

Located to the south-west of China, this massive area of 25,00,000 square km is bordered by Nepal, India and Bhutan to its south. Before 1950, it was a remote area and it was an autonomous region. China gained Independence on October 1, 1949 and immediately staked its claim over Tibet citing ancient linkage with the region. China forcefully annexed Tibet in 1951 and since then it has been under the administration of People's Republic of China (PRC). After the Tibetan uprising in 1959, the spiritual leader of Tibetans had to flee to India and HH Dalai Lama established a Tibetan government in exile in Mussoorie on April 29, 1959 and thereafter it shifted to Dharamshala in 1960. Though India recognised Tibet to be part of China in 1954 itself, the existence of Government in exile in India has not been taken kindly by it. The One China Principle of China maintains that PRC and the ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has sole legitimacy over Tibet, Hongkong and Taiwan. On the other hand, One China Policy of US accepts Tibet and Hongkong to be under the PRC and the US officially has no diplomatic relations with Taiwan. But the US has supported the call for genuine autonomy for the Tibetans from the autocratic China. In pursuance of this stated policy, the US Congress passed the Resolve Tibet Act in June 2024 to enhance US support for Tibet and promote dialogue between China and Dalai Lama.

As expected, China has reacted very strongly and has asked the US to shelve the bill. US and China share a tumultuous relationship when it comes to democratic and just rights of the Tibetans. But the timing of the act is interesting. Modi 3.0 Government has assumed power on June 9, 2024. The elections for the US presidency are due in November this year and championing the cause of democracy in Tibet does benefit President Biden in his reelection bid. Another way of looking it may be US reshape the One China Policy and leverage more from China in the next term. The US can afford to annoy China below the threshold of diplomatic tolerance at least till the formation of the new Government. The US delegation also met Prime Minister Modi and officially the meet was to congratulate Mr. Modi on winning the third term in office as also further strengthening Indo-US relations. India also reaffirmed its support to HH Dalai Lama in his position as the spiritual leader of the Tibetans to conduct "his religious and spiritual activities." Though this has been the public position of India, the timing of the visit of the US delegation would have China thinking. Compared to the US, these developments pose much serious Tibetan dilemma to Indian foreign policy mandarins. With the situation in and opposite Eastern Ladakh not having changed much after the Galwan crisis of June 2020 in the last four years, any further aggravation of the situation elsewhere is something we can ill afford as of now.

Therefore, our response has to be carefully calibrated in tune with the ground realities. Given the advanced age of HH Dalai Lama (89 years) and his failing health, the key issue would be his 15th successor to the Tibetan heritage. China certainly would like to have a successor attuned to their thought process. The US has said that it would not accept a Beijing-appointed Dalai Lama. India would have to tread carefully here. One thing is sure. China is going to react very strongly if they fail to appoint the successor and may be President Xi Jinping would try to prove Nancy Pelosi wrong. The critical decision from the foreign policy perspective would be India's stance on continuing with the Tibetan government in exile functioning from India. While we may continue to support the just rights of the around 70,000 Tibetans living in India, the US should be offering the Tibetans a government in exile on their soil. That would give some seriousness to the much touted Reshape Tibet Bill/Act. Based on how the 15th Dalai Lama is enshrined, India's foreign policy must have the options ready. One obvious option is to settle border dispute with China and their claim over Arunachal Pradesh. Militarily, while we improve our strategic relations with the USA, in a conflict with China in the immediate or mid-term, the Americans won't be of much help. With a majorly Russian origin military hardware with Indian Armed Forces, it would take decades and a huge dollar bill to have compatible arsenal. The only option is to quickly become 'Aatmnirbhar' and our defence industry has to match up to this challenge. The defence infrastructure projects have also to be pushed further. Modi 3.0 Government may have to confront the Tibetan dilemma in its third term. While we should continue to support the Tibetan cause as inherited, the future beckons a more pragmatic response, not necessarily bound with the existing moral dilemma.

Boycotting Xinjiang cotton: What does it mean for environmental and labor justice in Central Asia?

03 July 2024, Global Voices, Shahida Yakub

In recent years, the international community has boycotted cotton sourced from Xinjiang, a vast region in northwestern China, due to concerns over human rights violations. Under the leadership of Chinese President Xi Jinping, Beijing has subjected Xinjiang's Muslim minorities to arbitrary detention and forced labor. Some global cotton buyers, in response, have turned to other regions to fulfill cotton demands.

The boycotting of Xinjiang cotton has created something of a ripple effect in other parts of the world, where cotton harvesting is associated with environmental challenges and human rights abuses. One of the most glaring examples of this is Uzbekistan, where cotton production contributed to one of the biggest environmental catastrophes in the world, the drying out of the Aral Sea, as well as decades of forced labor practices.

The Xinjiang cotton industry under scrutiny

Situated in northwestern China and bordering Central Asia, Xinjiang is home to approximately 12 million Uyghurs, a Turkic-speaking ethnic group that is predominantly Muslim. The region began to see large-scale cotton production in the 1950s when the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) placed its economy under the control of a paramilitary institution known as the Production and Construction Corps (or bingtuan 兵).

Researchers and human rights organizations have found that the Bingtuan forced members of local communities and prisoners – potentially more than half a million people – to work in mining, construction, manufacturing, and cotton harvesting under harsh conditions. Today, Xinjiang is pivotal in China's cotton production, accounting for over 85 percent of the country's output and 20 percent of the global supply. The Bingtuan is still responsible for around one-third of Xinjiang's cotton production.

The cotton industry in Xinjiang has historically relied on manual picking. Despite the Chinese government's claims of significant progress in machine harvesting, 60 percent of cotton harvesting in southern Xinjiang, remains a manual effort, according to Chinese state media and government statistics. In recent years, human rights organizations and international news media have uncovered evidence of systematic forced labor programs that coerced Uyghurs and other Muslim minorities to work in cotton fields and factories.

According to Chinese state media, the cotton textile industry in Xinjiang employs close to a million workers, although Beijing denies allegations of forced labor. These labor programs are part of Beijing's broader strategy to maintain political stability in Xinjiang, international organizations say. The US government first banned Xinjiang cotton imports before subsequently passing a law to ban nearly all imports from the region in 2021. Brands like Nike, H&M, and Burberry have also publicly severed ties with Xinjiang cotton suppliers – moves that drew condemnation and boycotts from Chinese consumers.

This widespread international backlash has not only affected Xinjiang but also led to scrutiny of the cotton supply chain worldwide, as nations and companies reevaluated their dependencies on China.

Shifting tides of cotton sourcing

In recent years, many industries including textile and clothing have shifted operations from China to countries like Vietnam, Bangladesh, and Turkey, in order to avoid increased labor costs in China and the West's heightened regulatory scrutiny for Chinese products. However, paradoxically, in some cases, this increased demand for a more just cotton supply chain is exacerbating local environmental issues and worsening labor rights conditions.

Cotton is one of the most resource and labor-intensive agricultural commodities in land, water, and labor. In developing countries and regions, the cotton industry has long grappled with labor abuses and environmental issues, such as the depletion of water, soil contamination, and overuse of pesticides.

In Uzbekistan, Central Asia's top cotton producer, an estimated 60 percent of agricultural water is wasted yearly due to mismanagement and obsolete technologies. The country is also known for labor exploitation in cotton production. Since 2011 Uzbekistan's cotton products faced global boycotts because of the use of child and forced labor. Over 330 international brands and retailers supported this boycott. International pressure forced the Uzbek government to commit to agricultural reforms and eradicating forced child labor during the cotton harvest, which resulted in the lifting of the boycott in 2022.

However, experts believe that the labor risks are still very high. In an interview with Global Voices, Umida Niyazova, director of Uzbek Forum for Human Rights, a non-governmental organization based in Germany said:

Uzbekistan is still not willing to change its anti-market rules of regulation of its cotton industry. The central government and local authorities are still operating on a quota basis, whereas every region of the country has to produce a certain amount of cotton and assigns land to farmers specifically to grow only cotton.

The persistence of this quota system and the associated administrative pressures became evident during a video conference wherein the Deputy Advisor to the President of Uzbekistan Shukhrat Ganiev directly threatened farmers: "I don't care what you do but you must deliver 11 thousand tons of cotton. Don't play with it, don't play – otherwise, it will end very badly for you and for the regional governor."

The lifting of the boycott on Uzbek cotton in 2022 coincided with sanctions being imposed on cotton from Xinjiang. Uzbek officials looked to take advantage of this situation, even as many textile brands were wary of partnering with Uzbekistan in light of its unresolved environmental and human rights violations. Brands' hesitation to move their production chain from Xinjiang to Uzbekistan didn't stop the Uzbek president from announcing his ambitious plans to turn his country into a textile hub and increase the production of yarn up to 100 percent by 2027. In order to stimulate this strategy, the Uzbek government intends to create textile production zones and release them from taxation until 2027.

Due to a combination of political, geographic, and social factors, Uzbekistan is especially vulnerable to the climate crisis, with environmental watchdogs ranking it 96th out of 181 countries in 2020 for climate risk. To mitigate this, Uzbekistan signed the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) and the Paris Agreement in 2015, as well as the United Nation's Europe Protocol on Water and Health, which aims to protect human health and well-being through better water management. However, despite the pledges made by the Uzbek government, the lack of progress in agricultural reforms and tight control over farmers makes experts skeptical about the progress.

China was and still remains one of the key foreign investors in Uzbekistan. Since 2017, the scale of China's investments in the country increased fivefold and amounts to USD 11.1 billion, according to Uzbek Minister for Trade and Investments, Laziz Kudratov. One of the key areas of China's investment is textiles and agriculture. Though partnership with China is hailed by the Uzbek government, human rights defenders are concerned about transparency in observing labor rights and care for the environment. In an interview with Global Voices, Umida Niyazova, director of the Uzbek Forum for Human Rights said.

When we talk about Chinese-owned textile factories or cotton clusters, we need to forget about any sort of advocacy. When we carried out our campaign to boycott Uzbek cotton, Western companies were signing up for this, but Chinese companies didn't care. They continued to buy Uzbek cotton and they didn't care about human rights violations or environmental justice. It would be much better if Western companies came to Uzbekistan, because they follow very strict regulations when it comes to labor or environment. We don't see this happening with Chinese companies.

Relocation Of Chinese Industries To Pakistan: Strategic Move For Economic Growth – OpEd

03 July 2024, Eurasia Review, Sehr Rushmeen

In a significant development reflecting the strengthening ties between Pakistan and China, Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif has approved the relocation of Chinese industries to Pakistan as part of joint ventures between companies from both nations. This decision marks a strategic effort to bolster Pakistan's economy through enhanced foreign investment and industrial collaboration. The move is set to pave the way for increased economic activity, job creation, and technological transfer, positioning Pakistan as an attractive destination for global investors.

Chairing a meeting to discuss matters related to the Board of Investment (BoI), Prime Minister Sharif emphasized that promoting both local and foreign investment is a top priority for his government. He underscored the importance of creating a business-friendly environment to attract traders and investors. This initiative is seen as a step towards realizing the government's commitment to fostering economic growth and stability.

The prime minister directed relevant authorities to submit a comprehensive report on the follow-up of memorandums of understanding (MoUs) signed between Pakistani and Chinese companies in Shenzhen during his recent visit to China. This directive highlights the government's proactive approach in ensuring that agreements translate into tangible economic benefits.

In light of developments from his visit to China, Prime Minister Sharif called for a review of the draft law for the Special Economic Zones One-Stop Shop. The aim is to streamline processes and make it easier for businesses to operate within these zones. Special Economic Zones (SEZs) are critical in attracting foreign investment, and the government's focus on improving the regulatory framework reflects its commitment to providing a conducive environment for industrial growth.

The relocation of Chinese industries to Pakistan is expected to cover sectors such as textile, leather, and footwear, among others. The prime minister highlighted the potential benefits of this relocation, noting ongoing efforts to facilitate the process. By attracting these industries, Pakistan aims to boost its manufacturing capabilities, create employment opportunities, and increase exports.

Plans were also revealed to enlist Chinese experts to establish a Business Facilitation Centre in Islamabad. This center will play a pivotal role in assisting foreign investors, ensuring smooth operations, and addressing any challenges they might face. The draft of the 'Easy Business Act' will be forwarded to the Cabinet Committee for Legislative Cases, further emphasizing the government's resolve to simplify business regulations.

In a separate meeting focused on petroleum and Thar coal, Prime Minister Sharif stressed the importance of promoting alternative energy sources, particularly solar energy. Pakistan, despite having a minimal carbon footprint, ranks among the top five countries vulnerable to climate change. Therefore, the government is taking measures to mitigate the impact of climate change by promoting products based on alternative energy.

During the briefing, it was highlighted that a strategy for Thar coal gasification is being developed. This initiative aims to leverage the country's coal reserves for cleaner energy production, thereby reducing reliance on imported fuels and enhancing energy security.

A comprehensive strategy to enhance the production of tight gas and the installation of smart meters to curb gas and oil theft was also discussed. These measures are part of a broader effort to improve efficiency and reduce losses in the energy sector. Additionally, a policy is being formulated to promote electric bikes, vehicles, and domestic electric appliances. These steps are in line with global trends towards sustainable energy solutions and reducing carbon emissions.

Proposals for deregulating the petroleum sector and digitizing petrol and gas exploration are underway. The Petroleum Division is taking steps to enhance competitiveness in the sector, promote bio-fuels, and increase local production of oil and gas. These initiatives are expected to attract investment, foster innovation, and improve the overall efficiency of the energy sector.

The meetings chaired by Prime Minister Sharif reflect a multi-faceted approach to economic revival. By fostering industrial relocation, promoting alternative energy, and enhancing competitiveness in the energy sector, the government aims to create a robust economic framework that supports sustainable growth.

The relocation of Chinese industries to Pakistan is particularly significant. It not only strengthens the bilateral relationship between Pakistan and China but also positions Pakistan as a key player in the regional industrial landscape. The anticipated influx of Chinese investment and expertise is expected to boost the local economy, create jobs, and facilitate technology transfer.

Moreover, the government's focus on creating a business-friendly environment and simplifying regulatory processes underscores its commitment to making Pakistan an attractive destination for global investors. The establishment of the Business Facilitation Centre and the introduction of the Easy Business Act are steps in the right direction, aimed at providing seamless support to businesses operating in Pakistan.

The emphasis on alternative energy sources and climate change mitigation highlights the government's forward-thinking approach. By promoting solar energy and developing strategies for coal gasification, Pakistan is taking significant steps towards energy security and environmental sustainability. These efforts are crucial in addressing the long-term challenges posed by climate change and reducing the country's carbon footprint.

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's recent initiatives, including the relocation of Chinese industries and the promotion of alternative energy sources, reflect a strategic vision for Pakistan's economic future. By fostering industrial collaboration, simplifying business regulations, and addressing energy challenges, the government aims to create a robust and sustainable economic framework. These efforts are expected to position Pakistan as a key player in the regional and global economic landscape, paving the way for long-term growth and prosperity.

As Pakistan continues to navigate its economic challenges, the proactive steps taken by the government provide a promising outlook. The collaboration with China, in particular, offers significant opportunities for industrial and economic development, marking a new chapter in Pakistan's journey towards economic revitalization.

Is there going to be an India-China deal?

02 July 2024, Brookings, Tanvi Madan

Four years ago, a fatal military crisis at the India-China border took their relationship to a new low where it has largely remained. In recent months, however, there has been a debate in India about the desirability of a Sino-Indian reset, i.e., whether New Delhi should make a concerted effort to resume political dialogue or resolve differences with Beijing. Given the potential impact on India's willingness to cooperate with countries to balance China, the possibility of such a change has been a subject of interest for India's partners.

There are reasons why the Modi government might seek to stabilize ties with China, or at least set a floor for the India-China relationship. These include conflict prevention, geopolitical uncertainty, partners' parleys with Beijing, and economic drivers. However, a tactical thaw is more likely than any structural shift away from Sino-Indian rivalry.

This is because there has already been a reset in Sino-Indian ties—to a more competitive level. And, even if there is some reengagement, the relationship will remain there due to the range of divergences that persist between India and China.

The potential for a tactical thaw

Speculation about a shift in India's approach got a fillip from Prime Minister Narendra Modi's comments in April that relations with China were "important and significant." Indian Defense Minister Rajnath Singh subsequently stated that India wanted "good relations with all our neighbors." He also remarked that border talks with Beijing were "progressive and satisfactory," and "no fresh tension" had arisen. Moreover, fiery rhetoric against China was largely absent on the campaign trail.

The new Chinese ambassador's arrival in India after 18 months only further fueled speculation, as did the relatively mild Chinese condemnation of Modi's post-election tweet acknowledging Taiwanese leader William Lai's congratulations. Beijing also did not publicly criticize India for hosting a U.S. congressional delegation that lambasted Beijing while visiting the Dalai Lama in India. There has also been an uptick in think tank exchanges, with Beijing touting its facilitation of Indians' travel to China.

Both Singh and Indian External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar have denied that India's approach has changed. But there are several reasons why it won't be surprising if a third-term Modi government seeks to put relations with China on a more stable footing. For one, New Delhi does not want another escalation at the border, where the four-year-old military standoff continues. Conflict could disrupt India's economic growth and other objectives and would have an uncertain outcome given the Sino-Indian capabilities gap.

Second, geopolitical uncertainty. Indian policymakers have already been grappling with the fallout of several global and regional crises, including the COVID-19 pandemic, the border clash with China, the U.S. withdrawal from Afghanistan, the Russian invasion of Ukraine, and the Israel-Gaza conflict. Then there are the tensions in the South China Sea and the Taiwan Strait.

These crises will shape New Delhi's thinking about a potential escalation with China. They have absorbed India's and its partners' bandwidth and resources which are needed to balance Beijing. These partners include the United States, which provided India with fast-tracked or leased military supplies, intelligence, and diplomatic support during the 2020 Sino-Indian crisis.

Meanwhile, the Russia-Ukraine war has disrupted India's defense imports and led to greater Russian dependence on China—not ideal for an India that still deploys considerable Soviet/Russian-origin equipment on its frontline with China. On the maritime front, piracy and Houthi attacks have absorbed the Indian Navy's attention.

The U.S. elections add another element of uncertainty—specifically, the prospect of another Trump administration. One way it might shape Indian calculations is the impact on India's own options. New Delhi appreciated the Trump administration's competitive approach to China. But there was some uncertainty around President Donald Trump's praise of Xi Jinping. Candidate Trump's shift on a TikTok ban will have raised similar questions about the consistency of his view of China. India might also assess that Beijing's own concern about a second Trump term could result in a Chinese tactical rethink on India (as it seemed to in fall 2017 when China sought to stabilize ties with India and Japan).

A third reason New Delhi might consider selective engagement is concern that its partners' recent China dialogues and deals leave India vulnerable to Chinese pressure. Given historical concerns about a "G2"—a Washington-Beijing condominium—U.S.-China interactions have received particular attention. A former foreign secretary even linked the postponement of the Quad summit earlier this year to Washington's desire for stability with Beijing. Indians would have also warily watched high-level Australia-China visits, European leaders' engagements with Xi, and the revival of China-Japan-South Korea talks.

While these interactions would concern India, they could simultaneously suggest to New Delhi that Beijing might be ready for a rethink too—since the United States rather than India is China's primary rival. The Modi government might want to test whether Beijing, under pressure from Washington and facing economic headwinds, could seek to ease tensions on its India front and stall the deepening of India's ties with China's rivals.

A fourth reason might be the desire in some quarters in India for economic reengagement with China. The debate within government on this between the security-firsters and the economy-firsters is not new. Yet a new element in it is the assessment that India will need certain imports from China as it seeks to become a manufacturing hub—and part of global supply chains or China-plus-one/diversification strategies. Some constituencies outside government have also advocated for easing imports and investment restrictions. And some Indian corporations are keen to strike deals with Chinese companies in the telecommunications, retail, and electric vehicle spaces.

Finally, some officials and analysts might press for a China rethink due to their skepticism of the United States and concern about New Delhi getting too close to Washington. They might believe that a better equation with China would alleviate the need for alignment with the United States and other Western partners. A milder version of this motive would be outreach to China serving to remind India's Western friends that the Modi government has options and should not be taken for granted.

The improbability of a strategic shift

The extent and outcome of such an Indian exploration with China is uncertain. There was similar speculation in spring-summer 2023 about a breakthrough, but it did not materialize.

Even a tactical thaw wouldn't be easy, as one or both sides would need to budge from their existing, conflicting positions. India's stance has been "border before broader," i.e., broader ties could not return to normal if the border remained "abnormal." China's stance has been "broader before border"—as reflected in the new Chinese ambassador's insistence that "the boundary question is not the entirety of the relationship."

A thaw could also be perilous for New Delhi. Any asks from Beijing that curb India's balancing efforts—building its domestic capacities and foreign partnerships—would be strategically risky. They could advantage China, which has greater capabilities, with no guarantee that Beijing will respect any commitments it makes.

There is also some political risk. The Modi government has dismissed opposition accusations that it has accepted Chinese gains and a new normal at the border. But domestic critics will continue to scrutinize any claims of a "return to peace and tranquility" (the government's stated metric) and whether concessions are made in the search for stability. There might also be some backlash from labor and/or sections of Indian business from any easing of economic restrictions on China, given concerns about Chinese overcapacity among other issues.

If there is movement despite these obstacles, possible outcomes could involve increased engagement between more senior officials or ministers, including perhaps at the forthcoming Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit. They could involve tactical adjustments at the border, discussions about updating the border agreements, reviving the idea of border delimitation, or selective economic reengagement and renewed civil society interactions.

What they are unlikely to involve, however, is a grand bargain or, at least for now, a leader-level summit. Modi probably feels twice bitten because his previous summits with Xi in September 2014 and April 2018–October 2019 did not preclude border crises.

Even if new agreements are negotiated, New Delhi is likely to take a "don't trust, verify" attitude given the lack of faith in China respecting them. There might be further disengagement at the border, but de-escalation of the much-more-militarized border areas or dismantling of dual-purpose infrastructure will be harder to pull off. If anything, reports indicate that China and India are continuing to take steps to bolster their territorial claims and military capabilities.

Moreover, even beyond the border, India has a range of differences with China. These include asymmetry in economic ties and technological exposure, giving rise to a sense of vulnerability; China's deep ties with India's other rival, Pakistan; its expanding strategic footprint in almost all of India's neighbors and in the Indian Ocean; its desire to set the terms in Asia as the dominant power; and its efforts to hinder India's role and interests in the global order. And these have only been intensifying.

Thus, India is unlikely to ease its efforts to compete with and deter China, especially by strengthening its capabilities and partnerships. Moreover, Modi will not want Beijing to believe that he is weaker after the Indian election.

So, could there be an Indian effort to see whether a more stable dynamic with China is possible? Yes. Modi could try—as he did in 2014, 2018 and 2019. But his government is bound to embark on any such outreach while keeping in mind the limits of those previous initiatives, and with the understanding that there has been little let up in Sino-Indian competition across several domains.

Forced Relocation in Tibet: The Downside of China's Poverty Reduction Strategy

02 July 2024, IARI, Ilaria Manganiello

As a result of China's relocation programs, Tibetans' cultural identity is at risk, but according to the Chinese government, these programs are imperative to eradicating poverty. PCC's strategy, however, should be cautious if Xi wants to prevent a "quarrel" with his neighbors.

Over the past 40 years, the Chinese government has carried out several programs to reduce and eliminate extreme poverty in the Country. On 25 February 2021, the National media announced that extreme poverty had been almost eliminated in China. There were, however, many issues that came up along the way.

The road so far

From 1949 to 1976, under Mao's leadership, the Chinese government defined poverty as an ideological, more than an economic problem. The poverty issue was addressed by eliminating private ownership of the means of production and redistributing land from landlords to peasants. Redistribution policies were supported by agricultural and educational reforms, together with policies of involuntary mass relocation, mainly for urban construction. By the end of the 1970s, China's government launched the Reform and Opening Up policy. In the first years, the agricultural sector was the main driver of economic growth and, consequently, of poverty reduction in rural areas.

At the beginning of the 1980s, the government began to develop a second mode of relocation as a strategy for poverty alleviation in areas where geographical conditions were considered unable to sustain farming or other forms of livelihood. This mode of relocation was called "ecological migration". The Chinese government moved over three million villagers to areas where the geographical conditions were more suitable for agriculture. Based on increases in rural income among the relocatees and other factors, the government declared this program a success.

Since then, the Chinese government has constantly renewed its poverty alleviation programs focusing more and more on the poorest areas of the country. In 2001 the "ecological migration" strategy was expanded to other areas, which included Xinjiang, Inner Mongolia, and Tibet. In 2013, the Party launched a new strategy specifically for these areas, called the "Targeted poverty alleviation" program.

Targeted poverty alleviation program

The Targeted Poverty Alleviation (TPA) program was officially implemented in 2015, it was structured to follow the whole process: from poverty identification to poverty exit. Within the TPA, China has introduced the use of five indicators to identify who needs to be lifted out of poverty, referred to by the slogan "one income, two assurances, and three guarantees". So, the first indicator is income; the two assurances are food and clothing, and the three guarantees are basic medical services, safe housing with drinking water and electricity, and free and compulsory education.

After the first identification phase, TPA developed five core methods to lift the poor out of poverty: industry, relocation, ecological compensation, education, and social assistance. Despite its innovative approach to eradicating extreme poverty, TPA methods have some harsh side effects, especially for ethnic minorities.

Relocation and human rights

As said previously, the relocation strategy is not new to the Chinese government. However, after launching the TPA, it was mainly directed toward regions where most people belong to China's ethnic minorities. Tibet is one of the regions where the mass relocation programs are more controversial, mainly because of the numerous human rights violations perpetrated by China's government against Tibetans since the creation of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) in 1951.

Indeed, mass relocations in Tibet should be set in the region's political and historical context. The presence of PCC's cadres in Tibet is overwhelming and Tibetans are placed under intense pressure to demonstrate their "loyalty" to the Party, which sees Tibet, along with Xinjiang, as politically suspect and a security threat.

To respond to this security need, the PRC is carrying out a "Sinicization" campaign whose objective is to eradicate any trace of Tibetans' autonomy's desire. Mass relocation programs are part of this strategy, even if the government maintains that it is the most effective strategy to reduce poverty and, at the same time, to stop environmental degradation. In the case of Tibetans, however, there is no clear and detailed evidence that these areas cannot support human life, and many of the Tibetan households relocated as part of the relocation programs are not even registered as poor.

The last report of Human Rights Watch focuses on the relocation of Tibetans and its consequences. One of the aspects that the report highlights is that Tibetans are moved to locations where they cannot continue their former livelihoods or lifestyles. Often, for example, herders are moved to farming areas and farmers are moved to urban areas where they will be entering the labor market without the experience to do so. Part of the TPA indeed is to provide relocated people with initial subsidies and social assistance to facilitate their adjustment to new lifestyles, but for what concerns Tibetan herders, this kind of assistance is not enough.

Secondly, the report maintains that if villagers do not agree to relocate, PCC's cadres are allowed to exert different forms of pressure that range from intrusive home visits to implicit threats. After the relocation, the Chinese government takes extreme measures to prevent people from returning to their homes: it requires them to demolish their former homes once they have been relocated. Depriving relocatees of the possibility of returning to their homes if relocation proves unsatisfactory is allowed by the National Regulations but contravenes international standards. Indeed, the UN Basic Principles and Guidelines on Development-based Evictions and Displacement provides that states should, when circumstances allow, prioritize the rights of restitution and return.

Of course, this is not China's first time being accused of human rights violations and it is simple to imagine what kind of reaction China could have: it could either invoke the principle of non-interference or justify its actions as a countermeasure against terrorists, secessionists, or any other political threats. The Chinese government has plenty of data showing how effective its forced relocation programs have been in reducing extreme poverty in Tibet, so other countries or NGOs have little chance of stopping them.

In the future, however, the downsides of the relocation programs will be heavier since Vietnam, Thailand, and other countries are replacing China in the GVCs and China's economic system is not prepared to welcome new waves of rural migration. Thus, the labor market is becoming stricter and more competitive, and relocated Tibetans will have more difficulties finding a job or resolving work-related problems.

Relocation as a means to control the borders with China's neighbors

In recent years, the relocation of Tibetans has been accurately directed towards villages along the contested territories between China and its neighbors. In July 2017, the TAR issued the "Plan for the Construction of Well-off Villages in the Border Area of the Tibet Autonomous Region". It involved building 628 border villages called "well-off border defense villages" which were selected for their remote location, very sparse population, and poor conditions. For China's government, these villages have multiple objectives: reduce the poverty rate in the country, and keep an eye on the movements of populations and activities across the border. Moreover, the location of these villages, and the development of bridges and railway lines in the same regions, should be viewed as a way to gain leverage in its border disputes with its neighbors.

China is particularly concerned about one of its neighbors: India. Although trade between the two nuclear powers surpassed $136 billion in 2023, relations between Beijing and New Delhi remain tense. China reclaims large parts of Indian territory, including the entire state of Arunachal Pradesh which was recently renamed "Southern Tibet" by China's government. The response of the newly elected National Democratic Alliance (NDA) government, led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi, was the renaming of 30 places in Tibet, signaling its willingness to confront China, at least theoretically. Indian and Chinese troops stationed along the border regularly engage in conflict, sometimes resulting in casualties.

As China focuses more on border defense and security in Tibet, the situation between India and China at the borders is likely to escalate and possibly result in more clashes. China is investing heavily and strategically in border-related infrastructure and in relocating and re-educating residents. The Indian Government may follow suit and bolster its borders by investing more, securing them, and ensuring their safety.

For India, the Himalayan problem is a bilateral affair, but recently Modi seems more willing to let China know that he is looking for new allies. Modi thanked Lai Ching-te, the newly elected President of Taiwan, for his message of congratulations after being re-elected. Nevertheless, the Taiwan-India relationship remains unofficial, and their political connections seem to be directed at deepening economic cooperation.

It is possible that Modi's third term could widen the rift between the two members of BRICS, signaling the beginning of India's shift toward an even more anti-China sentiment. However, the Chinese and Indian governments are keen to avoid any other conflagration that could cause casualties like the episode that happened in 2020 in the Galwan Valley. In light of these scenarios, India's relationship with China will likely become increasingly complex and sensitive.

A new dawn in Tibetan diplomacy

02 July 2024, The Pioneer, Prafull Goradia

A seven-member American delegation led by US House Representatives met with the Dalai Lama, indicating a shift in the US stance on Tibet

A seven-member American delegation led by Michael McCaul, and Nancy Pelosi, both leading lights of the US House of Representatives, recently met the Dalai Lama at Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh; this is a particularly significant event. They delivered a clear message that the USA no longer accepts Tibet as a part of China; and the US Congress will be soon passing an Act to be made into a law, called the "Resolve Tibet-China Act". The delegation told the Tibetan spiritual leader that "things have changed now". This American message has unmistakably resisted in Chinese ears. This US delegation first called on His Holiness at Dharmashala, indicating they were calling on the Tibetan government-in-exile, calling on Prime Minister Narendra Modi only thereafter. The Government of India has not hesitated to welcome the delegation. Xi Jinping may have forgotten that Mao Zedong's regime had first claimed 'suzerainty' over Tibet. Before long, it asserted that Tibet was a Chinese province, before attempting to erase Tibet's culture, heritage and language. These events have their roots in what happened towards the end of World War II. By allowing Stalin's Red Army to enter Berlin first and occupy it, the US made the Russians believe that they were the prime victors of WWII. In 1949, the Soviet Communist regime, by hook or crook, acquired the atom bomb. This made them believe even more they were now a superpower. Economically though, the Soviet Union was no 'super' but only a Eurasian power, as it had historically been. Similarly, the US overestimated the Communist Chinese as well. Compared to Chiang Kai Shek and his Kuomintang (KMT) on the mainland, the Maoists were much more committed. That, however, was no reason to dump the KMT as well as Formosa, now Taiwan from the UN as an official member. In fact, India should have been the correct replacement, but the Nehru government was insistent on giving the right of way to Red China, believe it or not. The USA, or at least its State Department continued to believe for years that the Soviets and the Chinese were a single communist bloc. The extent of the animosity between the two was fully realized only after the Sino-Soviet clash along the Ussuri River in 1969.

It was only thereafter that President Nixon decided to call on Chinese Premier Mao Zedong in 1972, which brought a great deal of prestige to Dr. Henry Kissinger. The ultimate beneficiary of this resumption of relations was China, when Deng Xiao Ping introduced economic reforms, emphasizing manufacturing and exports. The surplus of trillions of dollars accumulated by China came largely through exports to America. The course of these events explains why the State Department of the USA until now ignored the treatment of the hapless Tibetans by successive Chinese regimes over the last seven decades, beginning in 1959. The question is: is this because of repeated provocations over Taiwan, or could there be some larger reason unknown to us? The intentions should become clearer with the unfolding of time. India's stand has also been important. Unfortunately, the Leftists and communists in the country had clamoured for the (then) newly formed Red Chinese regime, which had requested its recognition within a few days of its winning the civil war. Deputy Prime Minister Sardar Patel, on the other hand, was of the clear view that there was no hurry to recognize the new Chinese regime. In November 1949, Patel invited the American charge d'affaires Donovan to verify if there was an urgency in the recognition of Red China.

Knowing the Sardar through his long correspondence with Jawaharlal Nehru on the subject of China, uppermost in his mind must have been the concern that the Sino-Indian border should be mutually recognized. But Jawaharlal Nehru was in a hurry and without consulting the Sardar, informed the Chinese of India's decision to recognize their regime in the December of that year itself.

While expressing its delight at Nehru's message, China also laid down a few preconditions. India would pass on to the new regime all properties and assets of China. Secondly, India would not recognize any members of the KMT. Thirdly, India should support the expulsion of Nationalist China from the UNO, as well as its replacement by the communist regime. China's perfidious intentions can be gauged from the fact that its communist regime announced the 'liberation' of Tibet as the People's Liberation Army's (PLA) task just one day before the founding of the People's Republic of China. The Tibetans had expelled the Chinese Amban, although he had been a Kuomintang government appointee.

The Chinese blamed India for it, abusing Nehru as "a lackey of British imperialism" and complicit in the British humiliation of China, which Mao sought to reverse. The People's Daily of China in an editorial denounced the concept of suzerainty as feudal and oppressive—the very thing China demanded over Tibet. It even called on the UNO to examine India's relationship with Bhutan. The reality, which the Nehru government chose to ignore despite even Ambassador K.M. Pannikar's warnings was that China was eyeing Nepal, Sikkim and Bhutan too. But India's first prime minister, a votary of international peace and brotherhood was oblivious to this. The sufferers were from Tibet and India.

Tibet In The Spotlight – OpEd

02 July 2024, Eurasia Review, Ahmad Ali Haral

A bipartisan delegation of seven US lawmakers, led by Rep. Michael McCaul and former House Speaker Rep. Nancy Pelosi, travelled to India to meet with the Dalai Lama, the Tibetan leader in exile. This meeting took place just weeks after the US Senate unanimously passed a bill urging the Chinese government to engage in dialogue with the Tibetan leaders to resolve the longstanding China-Tibet dispute.

The Tibet-China Dispute Act, while lacking concrete measures, holds significant symbolic value. Its passage underscores the US support for Tibet and signals China that the issue remains a priority for American policymakers. This move is symbolic of the multifaceted approach the US is taking in its rivalry with China. In addition to trade tensions and support for Taiwan, American initiatives concerning Tibet add another layer to the complex geopolitical chessboard. Washington's support for Taiwan and initiatives regarding Tibet can be viewed as part of a strategy to counterbalance China's growing assertiveness in the region.

These developments raise questions about the consistency of the US' adherence to the One-China policy, which has been a cornerstone of Sino-American relations. The One-China policy recognizes Beijing's claim over Taiwan and Tibet, yet recent actions by the US suggest a more nuanced and, at times, contradictory stance.

In response to the recent developments, Chinese government vowed to take "resolute measures" if Washington fails to honour its commitment to recognize Tibet as part of China. This rhetoric is consistent with Beijing's longstanding position that any foreign involvement in Tibet is a violation of China's sovereignty. The Chinese government views the Dalai Lama not just as a religious leader but as a separatist figure who threatens national integrity.

This incident highlights the managing act that the US must perform in its foreign policy. On one hand, it seeks to uphold human rights and democratic values by supporting figures like the Dalai Lama and endorsing Taiwan's self-governance, on the other hand, it needs to navigate the diplomatic tightrope of maintaining stable relations with China, an economic powerhouse and crucial player in global affairs. The symbolic gestures of support for Tibet and Taiwan are thus dilemma: they reaffirm US commitment to certain principles while simultaneously risking further escalation of tensions with China.

Furthermore, this development should be analysed within the context of the broader US strategy in the Asia-Pacific. The US has been strengthening alliances and partnerships across the region, from the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue (Quad) to increased military presence and defence cooperation agreements. These moves are aimed at countering China's expanding footprint in the region. The Tibet issue, though historically contentious, is being re-contextualized as part of this larger strategic framework.

In conclusion, the recent meeting between US lawmakers and the Dalai Lama is more than a mere diplomatic formality; it is a calculated manoeuvre within the intricate and high-stakes game of international relations. As the US continues to assert its influence in the face of China's rise, the interplay between symbolic gestures and concrete policy actions are critical in shaping the future dynamics of US-China relations. The implications of such meetings extend beyond the immediate diplomatic fallout, potentially influencing the strategic landscape of the Asia-Pacific.

Pinching the dragon's tail on future of Tibet

02 July 2024, Hindustan Times, Dilip Sinha

The recent visit of a bipartisan US Congressional delegation to Dharamshala raises the question – how far will India go with the US?

The recent visit of the United States (US) Congressional delegation to Dharamshala and the Dalai Lama's visit to New York have catapulted Tibet to newspaper headlines. The seven-member US Congressional delegation led by representative Michael McCaul was remarkable in several respects. A bipartisan delegation at a time of sharp polarisation in American politics, it included Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi and chose to visit Dharamshala even though the Dalai Lama was due to leave for the US in a few days. The visit coincided with the US Congress passing a bill, "Promoting a Resolution of the Tibet-China Conflict Act", or the Resolve Tibet Act, which has since gone to the president for his assent. On its return to New Delhi, the delegation was received by Prime Minister (PM) Narendra Modi, signalling that the Indian government is not uncomfortable with the US choosing Indian soil to pinch the dragon's tail.

In the past, the US generally followed the old British line of recognising Chinese suzerainty over Tibet. It provided training and assistance to the Khampa rebels in the 1950s, but in the years of the grand camaraderie of President Nixon and Henry Kissinger with Mao Zedong, Tibet was largely forgotten. The downswing in their relations started in the Trump presidency. Trade disputes, technology theft, China's aggressive build-up in the South China Sea, threats to Taiwan and now the military assistance to Russia in the Ukraine War have soured relations and ushered in a new cold war. Tibet was an issue waiting to be reopened by the US.

The first US Tibet Policy Act of 2002 had been a mild articulation of the need to protect Tibet's water security and its environment, promised assistance to Tibetan refugees and urged China to engage with the Dalai Lama. The next act, in 2020, defined the US government's stand on the Dalai Lama's succession, calling it a purely religious matter to be decided by his followers and threatening any Chinese official interfering in the process with sanctions. It also declared that China would not be permitted to open another consulate in the US unless it allowed one in Lhasa.

The new US Tibet bill is a quantum jump from the two earlier acts. It defines the territory and international status of Tibet, marking a qualitative change in US policy. It states that the territory of Tibet extends beyond the Tibetan Autonomous Region and includes Tibetan areas in Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan and Yunnan provinces; that the conflict between China and Tibet is unresolved and Tibet's legal status is to be determined according to international law. It calls upon the US government to counter Chinese disinformation about Tibet's history and institutions, such as China's outlandish claim that Tibet has been a part of it since ancient times. McCaul told the media that the bill reaffirms America's support for Tibet's right of self-determination.

Little wonder that China is rattled by the visit and has launched a vitriolic tirade against the "separatist Dalai Lama clique" as it calls it, accusing him of indulging in anti-China separatist activities under the cloak of religion and warning the US not to play the Tibet card in violation of the one-China policy. A foreign office spokesperson urged the US not to sign the bill into law or support Tibet's independence and warned that China would take resolute measures.

How does all this affect India? China's repression in Tibet and escalating claims on Indian territory have belied the expectations on which India had framed its stand in the 1950s. China has never missed an opportunity to counsel India on Kashmir. Despite such provocations, hostile actions and broken promises, India has clung to its policy of recognising Tibet as a part of China.

India has paid a heavy price for giving asylum to the Dalai Lama and the thousands of Tibetan refugees who run the Central Tibetan Administration, the putative government-in-exile. Tibet is a sensitive issue for China since it claims it as its imperial legacy and now exploits its water and other natural resources. India contends that the presence of the Tibetan government-in-exile should not annoy China and that Tibet is not an issue in India-China relations. But with the US raising matters of concern to the Tibetan people, India faces a dilemma. Should it let the international discourse on important questions concerning Tibet slip into America's hands? One of these is the ageing Dalai Lama's succession, on which the US has taken a very strong stand. It is time for India to give some sage counsel to China and recover the initiative on Tibet.

There will be no dearth of Indians questioning the advisability of India taking the cue from the US to change its Tibet policy. America's unreliability is well known, as are the risks of provoking China. But Tibet accounts for a considerable length of India's border with China and who rules it will always remain critical to India's well-being and security. The current US-China confrontation is an opportunity for India to assert its interests and develop its Tibet policy in its logical progression.

India's relations with China have been cold since Galwan and there is little chance of a thaw in the immediate future. By not going to the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) summit and receiving the US delegation in New Delhi, PM Modi has made his leanings explicit. The external affairs ministry rejected China's protest, reiterating India's stand on the Dalai Lama being an honoured guest who is free to conduct his religious activities in India. It remains to be seen if India will now take the next logical step of telling China not to interfere in the process of the Dalai Lama's succession. This would be a good beginning towards a more assertive Tibet policy.

The Past (and Future) of the Territorial Swap Offer in the China-India Border Dispute

01 July 2024, The Diplomat, Ameya Pratap Singh

Twice, China and India had chances to settle their disputed border through a "package deal," but domestic politics got in the way. Is such a solution still possible?

Disputes over territory are perhaps the largest contributors to interstate conflict, as the recent examples of the Israel-Palestine and Russia-Ukraine conflicts have evidenced. The most insurmountable entry in this category, at least in terms of the length of the disputed boundary, is the 2,100-mile long disputed Sino-Indian border.

But boundary disputes of such magnitude are not set in stone, either. Just as the ebbs and flows of the China-India rivalry over the years have proffered moments of tension and war, they have also created opportunities for political entrepreneurs to craft détentes – and occasionally, even consider the possibility of a settlement.

The use of territorial swaps to settle boundary disputes is assumed to be taboo, owing to the immutable properties of a state's territorial holdings. Domestic publics generally view any compromise of a state's territory as a surrender of national prestige, ideology, and even the nation's raison d'être. However, in certain moments, such concessions are proposed and seriously deliberated upon. Two such moments took place in Sino-Indian relations in the Nehru-Zhou and Rajiv-Deng periods.

This is unsurprising if one considers the larger historical register. Despite a significant number of outstanding territorial claims, China has also resolved boundary disputes with neighboring countries such as Myanmar, Nepal, and Pakistan. India too has resolved its share of boundary disputes, most notably through the exchange of enclaves with Bangladesh in 2015.

The two Himalayan rivals came close to a "package deal" on the Sino-Indian border too (twice!), but the proposals did not materialize. Do these failed attempts offer hope for an eventual resolution or portend the inevitably ruinous future of diplomatic attempts to solve the issue?

In 1960, Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai, accompanied by Foreign Minister Chen Yi and a 31-member Chinese delegation, arrived in Delhi to negotiate a final settlement of the disputed Sino-Indian boundary with his Indian counterpart, Jawaharlal Nehru. The boundary was a vestige of British colonial rule, and had been in dispute for longer than the existence of the Republic of India as well as the People's Republic of China.

The British Empire had purposefully maintained Tibet as a "buffer state." This allowed them to claim territorial largesse when the need arose, while continuing to deny Britain's great power competitors a foothold in the region. The British Empire could countenance such an expedient arrangement with the Chiang Kai-shek-led Nationalist China. But this would only hold aspirational value for an independent India faced with Communist China on its northeastern border. The Indians were mere spectators as the Chinese annexed Tibet in 1949, making the two postcolonial states neighbors on a historically contested and undemarcated border.

Both the Indians and the Chinese knew of the disputed nature of the border but neither side wanted to raise alarm until they had militarily secured their status and legitimacy in border areas. When the "Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence" were chronicled through a bilateral trade treaty on India's commercial rights in Tibet in 1954, Indian and Chinese interlocutors deliberately and carefully avoided mentioning any disputed parts as trade posts.

Isolated stand-offs in feeding pastures along the Himalayan border had also begun to creep up as early as 1954 in areas in the Central Sector such as Bara Hoti. Historically, these boundaries were highly fluid and had been used by agrarians on both sides. However, the imposition of nation-statehood now demanded territorial exclusivity. Despite this, both India and China did not choose to directly address the boundary issue, opting instead to build a stronger negotiating position before showing their hand.

However, their position was forced when the Tibetan Revolution broke out in 1957. People's Liberation Army (PLA) forces from China, chasing Tibetan rebels, entered disputed border areas, often provoking confrontations with Indian border patrols. Since there was no formal demarcation of the boundary, the armed forces of both sides found themselves in a highly unenviable situation.

In 1959, in the Western Sector (Aksai Chin Region), a clash at Kongka Pass led to the death of nine Indian soldiers – the first casualties of the Sino-Indian boundary dispute. This forced Nehru and Zhou's hand. Leaving the boundary ambiguous was no longer tenable.

Meanwhile, Chinese conduct was being heavily criticized by Soviet Union. In a meeting on October

2, 1959, Nikita Khrushchev unequivocally asked Mao Zedong and Zhou to settle the dispute in order not to alienate India from the Communist bloc. Begrudgingly, the latter committed that they would respect the "McMahon Line" in the Eastern sector and soon bring the issue to an end.

In a nutshell, this was the "package deal" – a status quo solution. The Chinese would accept India's claims in the Eastern Sector, which was more critical for the security of India's Northeast, in exchange for Indian acceptance of Chinese sovereignty in the Western Sector of Aksai Chin, which was the region that housed the arterial road that connected Chinese forces to the Tibetan plateau via Xinjiang.

For his part, Nehru too had been preparing the grounds for this "package deal." In Parliament, he repeatedly mentioned Aksai Chin as inhospitable terrain. This provided some defense for India's inability to prevent Chinese encroachments. The Indian side had long been willing to trade Chinese presence in the Aksai Chin region for China's formal recognition of the McMahon Line in the Eastern Sector.

However, public opinion in India would not countenance such a deal in 1960. The Chinese could navigate the pitfalls of public diplomacy over a complex border issue much better than the Indians. Once the death of Indian soldiers on the border, and the scale of Chinese territorial claims, became public knowledge, Nehru's room for maneuver had diminished significantly. Accepting the status quo meant the vindication of Chinese aggression on India's borders, and was thus considered intolerable.

Despite the Chinese being the militarily stronger power, they proposed the "package deal." And despite this arrangement being acceptable to India's political leadership earlier, it was declined as this simply could not be justified to the Indian people or Parliament. This is why the talks between Nehru and Zhou failed in 1960.

The "package deal" was revived in 1979, when Deng Xiaoping proposed it to then-Indian Minister of External Affairs Atal Bihari Vajpayee during his China tour. Once again, the proposal was rejected by the Indian side, as they continued to insist on a detailed historical study to resolve the border in each sector.

In 1986-87, the intractability of border talks eventually led to a military stand-off in the Sumdorong Chu Valley in the Eastern Sector. A weak coalition government led by Morarji Desai, which only lasted in office for two years, did not have the ability to push through such a settlement. The deal was offered to Desai's successor and Nehru's daughter, Indira Gandhi, in 1984. But her assassination curtailed any serious consideration.

The deal was offered once again by Deng to Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in 1988. Deng wanted India to make minor territorial concessions to the Chinese on the Eastern Sector for Beijing's acceptance of the McMahon Line (which was to be renamed). Similarly, minor Chinese territorial concessions to India in the Western Sector would be offered for India's acceptance of Chinese sovereignty in the Aksai Chin region.

Chinese Diplomat Yang Wenchang recounts the exchange as follows:

As a diplomat in late 1980s, I witnessed a chance to solve the problem with Prime Minister Rajiv and Deng, who was also a strong man. We do some compromise on west wing, you do some on the east wing, then we can have a new border. We offered, but Prime Minister Gandhi didn't have a response. After that I felt very sad we lost the chance.

Rajiv Gandhi had the parliamentary mandate required to formalize a "package deal." But he too chose not to jeopardize his political future, settling instead for confidence building measures on the border to ensure "peace and tranquility."

Twice, political compulsions and domestic weaknesses have compelled Chinese leaders to offer a "package deal" to their Indian counterparts to settle the border once and for all. But in both cases, the pulls and pushes of parliamentary democracy in India have made "managing the dispute" more palatable than its resolution.

Now, the scales have changed significantly. At least since 2017, in light of China's sustained economic growth and newfound military strength, especially relative to the Indian side, the Chinese no longer want a "package deal" solution based on the status quo. Instead, they have proposed a new "package deal" that disproportionately demands concessions from India in the Eastern Sector, particularly in the populated region of Tawang. While Deng's proposal in the 1980s too required a concession in the Eastern Sector, this was relatively minor and was to be reciprocated by Chinese concessions in the Western Sector. If a much more favorable "package deal" couldn't pass muster in the past, Xi Jinping's new proposal is highly unlikely to do so.

But ultimately, it is in the interest of both states to achieve a final settlement of the border and some variation of the "package deal" is most likely to prove fruitful in this respect. Unlike Taiwan for China or Kashmir for India, the Sino-Indian boundary dispute does not concern key pillars of national identity. Neither do the concerned border territories offer any particular advantage in terms of natural resources or larger strategic advantages beyond the rivalry. Therefore, the revival of a package deal would be favorable to India's growth prospects as well China's global ambitions.

Until the conditions for such a solution are arrived at, China and India should find ways and means of enhancing other important aspects of their relationship and managing conflagrations at the border. More so than the South China Sea, it is the resolution of the Sino-Indian boundary dispute that will determine if “Asia” will be a term that geopolitical experts will use as a reference of power, or to signify an arena of unending conflict and violence in the emerging world order.

Modi 3.0: How India is setting the course for relations with China

01 July 2024, Organiser, Ameya Kulkarni

As India embarks on a new governmental term under Prime Minister Narendra Modi's leadership, the complex and evolving relationship with China remains a paramount concern.

A strange paradox plagues the status of India-China ties. For such a consequential relationship that may make or mar India's rise, the debates around it are largely myopic, set across the political and ideological faultlines. India certainly cannot afford not to constantly evaluate and debate threadbare the terms of the relationship, more so as a new government in New Delhi begins another innings with a fresh mandate.

Since 2020, dealing with China has been the most debated topic of Indian foreign policy. That the old bilateral framework has irretrievably fractured because China violated a basic principle – non-use of force in resolving disputes – is not in doubt. The debate is about the way forward in building a new relationship based on the current realities.

The new framework will be built in circumstances that are very different from 1990. Then, the economies of India and China were comparable, and their respective military capacities were fairly balanced. Now, China's GDP is more than four times ours, and the two militaries are not evenly matched on paper. Nor is it likely, even by optimistic growth projections, for India to significantly reduce this gap in the next 10 years. And the common challenges are outweighed by geopolitical differences that are unlikely to subside as China expands its global footprint.

Will the third iteration of Narendra Modi government prefer continuity, or a new approach? Given that bilateral ties have hit a deadlock in the backdrop of an ominous military buildup across the ill-defined Himalayan borders, creating a dangerous flashpoint between two of the world's most powerful armies, the urgent question is the current state of the bilateral framework.

It is clear that the terms of the framework that were drawn up in the 1990s have collapsed. Owing chiefly to the power imbalance, an inordinately more powerful China now wants to redraw the provisos of the relationship in its own terms, and that involves creating new realities along the 3,440km-long LAC. So far, all of India's efforts at persuading China not to use force to unilaterally change the status quo at the LAC have failed, and New Delhi has also been unsuccessful in coaxing China to revert to pre-2020 status quo, even at the cost of considerable bloodshed.

Even more worryingly, both militaries – armed to the teeth – are locked in a confrontationist posture at the LAC. Failure to achieve a détente could lead to an eventual catastrophic conflict, led by miscalculation even, if not intent. The question of a new bilateral framework that may prevent such an eventuality gains added significance but with China adopting a maximalist position, leaving India with an onerous choice between acceptance or aggression, the roadmap to a new framework isn't clear.

To get a shot at a new framework, therefore, the deadlock needs to be broken. There must be sufficient incentives for both sides to engage with an earnest intention of breaking the deadlock. So far, 21 rounds of military-level talks have achieved some progress. But it has not been enough. The onus lies on India, unlike China that wants the “boundary issue” to be boxed in “an appropriate place” for resumption of normalcy because “China-India ties should not be defined by any single issue or area”. In other words, China is not interested in resolving the crisis.

New Delhi, in response, is creating deterrence to discourage China from further deployment of grey-zone tactics. The Modi government is furiously building and upgrading critical infrastructure at the border to improve its logistics capabilities. It is also exploring the option of external balancing by gravitating closer to the US and its regional allies.

None of it, however, has given India the requisite leverage to force China to climb down from the cliff, ‘manage’ the crisis and reduce the risk of violent escalation. Some voices are urging a resumption of political-level dialogue.

It is important to posit the question as to whether the ‘break’ in the political dialogue since 2020 has addressed Indian concerns over the steady militarisation of LAC by the Chinese. By various accounts, this may not be the case. China appears to have augmented its military capacity, including air-power, along the entire front. It remains obdurate on reeling back its forward posture in two areas in eastern Ladakh. Despite more than 20 rounds of talks between the two militaries, the status quo still prevails.

Commendable work is being done in building deterrence against adventurism. Aside from the augmentation in men and materiel, the idea of strategic risk is being re-defined. Deployment patterns are being altered to send the clear signal that there is no tolerance for grey-zone warfare tactics by PLA. The breach of trust triggered by the Chinese behaviour in Galwan requires clear and tangible counter-displays of goodwill, and remedial action by China along LAC, before trust can be rebuilt.

But is deterrence in itself an adequate policy response? At the height of the Cold War, the two superpowers never halted political dialogue. Mechanisms were built to prevent nuclear war, and mutual understandings were reached on managing competition and limiting the prospect of accidental conflict. An important lesson from the Cold War was that dialogue and deterrence were not mutually exclusive.

In the past four years, there has been no direct bilateral engagement between the executive heads of Indian and Chinese govts (aside from fleeting conversations in Bali and Johannesburg), and a single bilateral meeting between the foreign ministers when Wang Yi visited India in March 2022. Nor have the defence ministers or national security advisers of both sides visited each other.

A few 'pull-asides' or 'meetings in the margins' at multilateral conferences may not allow for the sort of discussion that is required when a new framework for the relationship needs to be built.

Writing in The Times of India, author and former Indian foreign secretary Vijay Gokhale observes, "What objectives might a resumption of the political dialogue serve? To begin with, it might allow for an in-depth understanding at a political level of each other's positions. Such dialogue might, hopefully, permit both sides to find some common ground to start building a new framework. It might benefit risk management, not simply in terms of minimising unintended conflict, but also in terms of modernising the 1993 and 1996 agreements in order to make them relevant to contemporary needs."

While the restarting of dialogue process at the highest political level may help in breaking the deadlock, it is worth noting that Chinese incursions have occurred even when two leaders have met. Xi Jinping's visit to India from 17-10 September, 2014, was marked by a standoff between Indian soldiers and the PLA in the Chumar and Demchok region of Ladakh.

While political dialogue has its usefulness, it isn't clear how dialogue will help when China is using power disparity between two nations to redraw the modus vivendi. In March 2023, when India's external affairs minister S Jaishankar had met then Chinese foreign minister Qin Gang on the sidelines of the G20 FMs' summit, the Chinese interpretation of the meeting indicated the widening gulf between the two sides.

S. Jaishankar, India's external affairs minister, has emphasized the potential to strengthen India's relationship with Taiwan in the technology sector, specifically in the important semiconductor sector, which is a growing focus of global competition. Taiwan is a major power in this domain, accounting for over 90 % of advanced chip production. Meetings between Indian and Taiwan government officials, as well as industry leaders such as Foxconn Technology Co. and others, exemplify the potential for and developing the technology partnership that both India and Taiwan have openly discussed, much to China's censure.

Amid strained and deteriorating cross-strait relations, Taiwan has continued apace with its economic and technological engagement with India, and vice versa. While their interactions and lucrative pursuits have already had a negative impact on China-India relations, expansion in this direction will present both opportunities and challenges. Still, Modi has moved beyond mere gestures, explicitly saying that India will pursue the opportunities further.

Nevertheless, the Taiwan-India relationship remains unofficial, and their political connections continue to play a major role in deepening economic cooperation, despite numerous advancements. Taiwan's Indo-Pacific strategy is an important area in which both have prioritised mutual interests, even when clashing with China's.

The India-China-Taiwan relationship triangle also converges with India and China's space ambitions, their geostrategic rivalry, and the crucial semiconductor and technology sector, in which Taiwan plays a key role and is arguably a survival guarantor. Semiconductor technologies play a crucial role in the exploration of space, enabling spacecraft, satellites, and space instruments to operate.

While both India and China are Global South leaders and powers, they have a shared identity as rising space powers. Space power is an essential part of geopolitical competition, but being a space power requires satellites and communication to support military, security, and economic goals, as well as to dominate the battlefield. For example, Beijing's advancing space activities and capabilities enable it to maintain regular surveillance of India's military positions and operations along LAC without violating Indian territory. India, reportedly, has had to receive intelligence assistance from the United States to keep apprised of China's movements Scholar Antara Ghosal Singh of ORF, who pores over Chinese media commentary and analyses for reaction, writes of the Chinese perspective that "the mainstream Chinese discourse post the meeting was that 'China needs to prepare for the worst at the LAC'. From a Chinese perspective, India did not show a positive attitude during the meeting and did not reciprocate China's so-called 'goodwill gestures' such as it seeking to explore common grounds between the two countries beyond the border dispute or participating in defence exchanges and cooperation with India under the framework of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, etc. It was argued that the meeting only lasted for 45 minutes, in which Jaishankar made 'a big fuss' about the border issue."

While India holds that ties may improve only if there's disengagement at the border and that overall relations cannot be separated from the military standoff, China insists that India cannot bring any conditionality to the table during talks. In this game of one-upmanship, Chinese and Indian leverages for peaceful resolution have cancelled each other out for an enduring stalemate, leaving China, the superior military and economic power, in a state of advantage.

China has used the situation deftly, indulging in a series of cartographic and nomenclature aggression to buttress its overarching territorial aggrandizement, and is doing everything from building dual-use facilities and villages along the LAC, expanding infrastructure and is even beefing up offensive air force capabilities by deploying advanced stealth fighters along the border.

What could be India's response? Modi 3.0 has given a few indications. Some notable developments show an attempt by New Delhi to create more leverage.

The Diplomat reported that India plans to 'rename' 30-plus places in Tibet, "reclaiming from historical records their ancient names in Indian languages."

The magazine claims to have witnessed a list of the places to be "renamed", and quotes Indian army officers involved in the exercise, as saying that media trips are being organized to disputed border areas "to speak to locals who fiercely oppose Chinese claims and say they were always part of India" with an aim to "push through the Indian counter-narrative on the disputed border through regional and global media."

If renaming of places, a move that is yet to materialize, is 'playing the Tibet card', the message got louder with India hosting a bipartisan US Congressional delegation that had just passed a bill, Resolve Tibet Act, that empowers the US "to actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government, rejecting false claims that Tibet has been part of China since 'ancient times,' pushing for negotiations without preconditions between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community, and affirming the State Department's responsibility to coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts toward the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet."

The American lawmakers (both Republicans and Democrats) who passed the bill that pushes for 'free Tibet', landed in New Delhi, met the Dalai Lama, and issued a scathing attack on Xi. Former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who was part of the delegation, stated that while "His Holiness Dalai Lama, with his message of knowledge, tradition, compassion, purity of soul and love, will live a long time and his legacy will live forever. But you, the President of China, you'll be gone and nobody will give you credit for anything."

And then the delegation met Prime Minister Modi the next day, having been hosted by Jaishankar the previous night. Interestingly, the Tibetan spiritual leader has left for the US for medical treatment, so the meeting could well have been held on American soil. The fact that India played host to the American lawmakers who had an explicit agenda on Tibet, and the prime minister granted them an audience the next day says all that is to be said about India's messaging.

Modi's move came right after the newly elected prime minister, in his third consecutive stint, had responded warmly to a congratulatory message from Taiwanese leader William Lai Ching-te and vowed to build "closer ties as we work towards mutually beneficial economic and technological partnership". The deliberate nature of the public response that triggered an acerbic reaction from China, left little space for doubt that this is part of a calibrated pushback, aimed at leveraging the partnerships. That Modi is using the US and its allies in sending across messages won't be lost on Beijing.

New Delhi is also refusing to resume direct civilian flight service between India and China, that has remained suspended for the last four years since the outbreak of the pandemic, despite several requests from Beijing – tying it with restoration of normalcy at the border.

Modi has also decided not to visit the upcoming SCO summit at Astana, Kazakhstan. The official excuse is ongoing Parliament session that ends on July 3, but it is hard to ignore the impression that avoiding running into Xi has been an equally strong motivation. Any Russian displeasure at Modi's absence will be taken care of by the prime minister's quick dash to Moscow for a standalone visit for the India-Russia summit on July 8.

Faced with a fait accompli at the border, Modi's attempts are focused on creating leverage by expanding the horizons. The overarching goal remains stability in relationship while breaking the deadlock and forcing Xi into a meaningful engagement. India has been forced into this balancing act because China is unwilling to reverse the new 'facts on the ground' or make any more concessions.

To China, India has no real clout or ability to alter the new reality and no option but to accept it. From this vantage point, China calls India's earnest efforts to tie normalisation of relations with the resolution of border crisis "arrogance" and "sky-high price".

Chinese scholar and strategist Hu Shisheng – the director of Institute for South Asian Studies at CICIR, an influential Chinese think tank on foreign policy and security affairs that comes under the direct supervision of CCP's Ministry of State Security (MSS) and whose research influences and represents the mainstream voice of the Chinese party-state system, in a recent piece on Indian foreign policy, calls the diplomacy of Modi government "dynamic" and "tension-filled".

Hu's essay, reproduced in Sinification (machine translation), observes that though Indian diplomacy has "flourished" under Modi due to "indulgence from the West", and even though India-US ties despite "latent mistrust" are "set to deepen", "in recent years, the Biden administration has focused much of its efforts on the Western Pacific region, promoting minilateral security cooperation mechanisms with its allies. This indicates that the US has lowered its expectations of India in its strategy to contain and blockade China."

Hu also observes that "considering the significant disparity in power between China and India, New Delhi will neither want to break relations with China completely nor will it be willing to serve as 'cannon fodder' for the West's containment of China. In future, Sino-Indian relations may continue to be characterised by "cold hostility" [冷暴力] or "non-violent, non-cooperative" coexistence."

To the extent that Hu's views represent the prevalent Chinese thinking, it appears that Beijing has come to a conclusion that India's options in getting China to do its bid are becoming increasingly more constricted. China remains aware of the significant power discrepancy between the two nations, and this awareness is making China more adventurous, imbuing it with a greater appetite for risk-taking including implementation of force to achieve its objectives – secure in the belief that India, as a lesser power, will ultimately be forced to back down.

This is not to suggest that Beijing is spoiling for a violent escalation, but it seeks to use force, or threat of force as a leverage to demand obeisance from India, and it wants New Delhi to accept Beijing's primacy and admit its secondary status in Asia.

From our perspective, it might provide political platforms to express our concerns, as well as to find solutions, over unfair Chinese trade practices.

Dialogue is also a logical step in building multi-alignment diplomacy.

Only government can ultimately decide what is the right policy. But a healthy debate on the question is now needed more than ever because public participation in foreign policy is an important requisite for citizens who aspire to make India into a global powerhouse.

In this context, PM Modi's recent moves assume greater significance. A battle of nerves lies ahead. External balancing and a fast-growing economy are India's best options, but in the short term, a lot may depend on the outcome of US presidential polls.

Building Bridges: Impact Of PM Shehbaz Sharif's Historic Visit To China – OpEd

01 July 2024, Eurasia Review, Hammad Baloch

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's recent five-day visit to China stands out as a landmark event, underscoring the robust and dynamic nature of Pakistan-China relations. This visit has not only cemented existing ties but also opened new avenues for cooperation across various sectors. The outcomes, including the signing of 23 Memoranda of Understanding (MoUs), signify a comprehensive and forward-looking partnership that promises to deliver significant benefits to both nations.

The visit featured high-level interactions, most notably an extensive three and a quarter hour meeting between Prime Minister Sharif and President Xi Jinping. This lengthy discussion emphasized upgrading the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), highlighting the strategic importance both countries place on this initiative. The Prime Minister made it a point to advocate for the Karachi Circular Railway (KCR) in all his meetings, receiving encouraging responses from Chinese officials. Furthermore, a dedicated committee has been set up to advance the Main Line One project, alongside the signing of 32 business-to-business agreements, marking a significant step forward in bilateral cooperation.

Economic Milestones and Future Opportunities

One of the most notable achievements of this visit was the signing of 23 MoUs spanning multiple sectors, including transport infrastructure, industry, energy, agriculture, media, health, water, and socioeconomic development. These agreements are poised to enhance Pakistan's economic landscape, creating new trade and investment opportunities. The Pakistan-China Business Conference, attended by 500 business personalities, underscored the economic potential of this partnership. China's commitment to training 200,000 Pakistani youth in IT is particularly noteworthy, as it is expected to significantly boost Pakistan's IT exports. Federal Information Minister Attaullah Tarar highlighted the positive economic indicators emerging from this visit, such as increased IT exports, a reduced current account deficit, rising foreign exchange reserves, and a stable currency. These developments suggest a promising trajectory for Pakistan's economy, driven by strategic partnerships and international cooperation.

Addressing Security Challenges

Security concerns have been a critical aspect of the Pakistan-China relationship, especially following recent attacks on Chinese nationals in Pakistan. Prime Minister Sharif's visit, accompanied by the army chief, Gen. Asim Munir, underscored Pakistan's serious commitment to addressing these security issues. The Prime Minister assured the Chinese leadership of enhanced security measures to protect Chinese nationals working in Pakistan. Both sides agreed on the importance of combating terrorism, particularly preventing militants from using Afghan territory for attacks against Chinese interests.

Overcoming Criticisms and Challenges

Despite the positive outcomes, the visit has faced some criticisms and highlighted challenges. Observers note that improving the economic partnership with China is hampered by Pakistan's economic policies. The country owes over $7.5 billion in project debt to power plants established under CPEC and nearly $2 billion in circular debt to Chinese power producers. Managing this debt burden requires careful financial planning and strategic economic management. Economist Ali Hasanain criticized Pakistan's approach to CPEC projects, arguing that the obligations in foreign currencies conflict with the country's domestic-oriented exchange rate and industrial policies. This misalignment has gradually narrowed Pakistan's fiscal space, leading to a debt crisis where new loans are sought to pay off previous debts. The much-delayed Mainline-1 (ML-1) project, costing approximately $6.8 billion, exemplifies these financial strains, struggling to attract Chinese investment due to anticipated financial stress.

Strategic Vision and Future Prospects

Despite these criticisms, a strategic vision for the future of Pakistan-China relations is emerging. The renewed focus on CPEC 2.0 aims to optimize existing infrastructure and attract Chinese energy-intensive industries to Pakistan, utilizing surplus power and enhancing economic productivity. This phase emphasizes industrial cooperation, mining and exploration, and leveraging Pakistan's strategic location for economic growth. The joint statement issued at the end of the visit highlighted China's encouragement for companies to invest in Pakistan based on market and commercial principles. This cautious yet optimistic approach signals a pathway for sustainable and mutually beneficial investments in the future.

Conclusion

Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif's visit to China has indeed been a historic and successful endeavor, reinforcing the enduring and exemplary friendship between Pakistan and China. The economic, strategic, and security agreements forged during this visit lay a solid foundation for future cooperation. While challenges remain, particularly in managing debt and aligning economic policies, the visit has demonstrated a strong commitment from both sides to overcome these hurdles and work towards a prosperous and secure future. The benefits of this visit are expected to reach the Pakistani public, enhancing economic opportunities, job creation, and overall socioeconomic development. The positive trajectory of Pakistan-China relations, as evidenced by this visit, reaffirms the enduring partnership between the two nations and sets a promising course for the future. The strategic vision and collaborative efforts displayed during this visit highlight the potential for continued growth and cooperation, ensuring that the Pakistan-China partnership remains robust and resilient.

30 June 2024, StratNews Global, Amitabh P. Revi

A conversation on China occupied Tibet: past, present and future with Ambassador Dilip Sinha. His latest book is 'Imperial Games In Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood And Sovereignty'

China Occupied Tibet

"India's position at that time (China's invasion of Tibet in 1950) was that the invasion was wrong. The matter should be settled peacefully. And Tibet has internal autonomy. Now, all this has been violated by China. So China has violated the basis on which India and others formulated their policies. It is time to revisit the issue." On 'The Gist', Ambassador Dilip Sinha speaks to StratNews Global Associate Editor Amitabh P. Revi. Ambassador Sinha is the author of the book 'Imperial Games In Tibet: The Struggle for Statehood And Sovereignty'. You can find it in bookstores and online. Above all, it will officially launch in July. Ambassador Sinha has served as India's Envoy to the UN in Geneva, was the Former Head of the UN Division and Ex-Head of the PAI(Pakistan, Afghanistan, Iran) Division in the Ministry of External Affairs.

"China Claims Everything

"In his book, Ambassador Sinha demolishes the CCP (Chinese Communist Party) attempt to rewrite history by claiming Tibet was always part of China. "China now claims that even Chinggis Khan was Chinese. So they claim everything. But, the Mongols were the first to rule over Tibet. Thereafter Tibet became independent. The Manchus conquered China in 1721. When the Manchu dynasty collapsed in 1912, Tibet declared independence. Tibet was independent until 1950 when Communist China invaded." Infact in history there were times when Tibetan rulers invaded China and captured the then capital.

Ambassador Dilip Sinha discusses:

- The recent U.S. bipartisan lawmakers' visit to the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala.
- Prime Minister Narendra Modi, NSA Ajit Doval and EAM Dr S. Jaishankar meeting the delegation subsequently.
- The latest Tibet Act passed by both Houses in the U.S.
- Whether the U.S. is firing off India's shoulders India's Tibet and China policy post-independence to the present.
- The Great Game over Tibet. China's renaming of locations in Tibet, Xinjiang and Arunachal Pradesh.
- Debunking Chinese imperialism which is now presented as a CCP narrative of the so-called century of humiliation.
- The criticality of the Dalai Lama's succession.
- China crushing religion on one hand and usurping religious authority on the other.
- Whether Xi Jinping fears religion.
- What it will take for Tibet to be independent again.
- And how India and Tibet helped preserve each others customs, traditions and manuscripts during invasions.

The shift in US policy toward Tibet

29 June 2024, Taipei Times, Sumit Kumar

Delegation-level visits between the two countries have become an integral part of transformed relations between India and the US. Therefore, the visit by a bipartisan group of seven US lawmakers, led by US House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs Chairman Michael McCaul to India from June 16 to Thursday last week would have largely gone unnoticed in India and abroad. However, the US delegation's four-day visit to India assumed huge importance this time, because of the meeting between the US lawmakers and the Dalai Lama.

- This in turn brings us to the focal question: How and to what extent has the meeting between the US lawmakers and the Dalai Lama underlined a change in the US policy toward Tibet, and how would the shift in US policy impact China's claim over Tibet?

Historically, US policy toward Tibet has been inconsistent and unpredictable.

For example, while the US has consistently accepted that Tibet is part of China, Washington provided financial and military assistance to Tibetan guerrillas in the 1950s and 1960s. Subsequently, Washington's policy toward Tibet witnessed a dramatic change in the backdrop of a rapprochement between China and the US in the 1970s. More to the point, Tibet became almost a non-issue for the US.

However, Tibetans succeeded in drawing the attention of the US administration to the issues of human rights violations, suppression of freedom of expression and others through their pro-Tibet international campaign.

Then-US president Ronald Reagan signed into law the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1988 and 1989, which specifically asked the US to urge China to actively reciprocate the Dalai Lama's efforts to establish a constructive dialogue on the future of Tibet. It also asked China to respect internationally recognized human rights and end violations of Tibetans' human rights.

The emergence of the US as the sole superpower in the post-Cold War era positively impacted Washington's approach toward Tibet.

More importantly, then US-president George H. W. Bush declared the Dalai Lama and the government-in-exile as "Tibet's true representative."

The rise of China among other developments in the 21st century has further forced Washington to double down on its policies supporting the cause of Tibetans. More to the point, China has aggressively pursued the policy of dismantling the historically important legacies of Tibet by destroying several monasteries and imposing Chinese culture, rules and regulations on Tibetans. Moreover, Chinese atrocities against Tibetans have also increased over the years.

Consequently, it has become obligatory for the US to take strong measures in support of Tibet as a part of its foreign policy objective to promote freedom, human rights and democracy across the world.

The US administration has been agitated by Chinese President Xi Jinping's (习近平) efforts to challenge US dominance by challenging the existing liberal international order.

Beijing has adopted an assertive posture against its neighbors in east, southeast and south Asia. More importantly, the rise in China's military activities against Taiwan has alarmed the US. Thus, there is an increasing realization among the strategic community in Washington that the US should boost global support for Tibet to challenge China's dominance over Tibet.

Another aspect of the US' renewed Tibet policy is to ensure that the identification and installation of Tibetan Buddhist religious leaders, including any future Dalai Lama, is determined solely by those within the Tibetan Buddhist faith community, in accordance with internationally recognized rights to religious freedom.

In this context, a new US bill – Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute – that awaits US President Joe Biden's assent is seen as a paradigm shift in US policy toward Tibet and China. For example, the bill says: "The United States Government has never taken the position that Tibet was a part of China since ancient times."

It also states that claims made by officials of the People's Republic of China and the Chinese Communist Party that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times are historically inaccurate.

In other words, departing from its previous position, the US now considers Tibet a sovereign state, rather than a part of China. Consequently, the bill talks about Tibetans' right to self-determination.

The bill also asks China to cease its propagation of disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama. At the same time, it expects the US to take public diplomacy efforts to counter disinformation about Tibet from China and the Chinese Communist Party.

Of course, transformed ties between New Delhi and Washington, and turbulent relations between Beijing and New Delhi, are another factor for the US to utilize the Tibet issue to prove its utility for India.

After all, the shift in the US' Tibet policy would greatly help India to allow more freedom to the Tibetan government-in-exile on its soil.

The new US bill on Tibet extends legitimacy to India's decision to provide asylum to Tibetans and allow the operation of the government of Tibet to function.

On the other hand, the credibility of the US would also be enhanced among its allies, partners and friends in the Indo-Pacific region. Moreover, the Biden administration's policy toward Tibet strongly reciprocates Modi's approach to Tibet.

Thus, while it is not unusual for the Indian government to allow a meeting between the bipartisan group of seven US lawmakers and the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala, the shift in US foreign policy has certainly squeezed China's political space on the Tibet issue.

Resolve Tibet Act: An Opportune Time To Revisit India's Tibet Policy

29 June 2024, Kashmir Observer, Anuraag Khaund

Tibet once again came to the fore-front of news headlines past few days because of two momentous actions by US and India. On 12 June, the US House of Representatives passed the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet- China Act (also known as the Resolve Tibet Act) which for the first time clearly stated the Washington's position on Tibet not constituting 'a part of China since ancient times'. The Act also called for the dispute between Tibet and the People's Republic of China (PRC) to be 'resolved in accordance with international law, including the UN Charter, by peaceful means, through dialogue, without pre-conditions' while enhancing bipartisan US support to the Tibetan issue. The above Act can be termed historic in the sense that the wording clearly posits Tibet and PRC as two separate entities locked in a long-standing dispute of international dispute (reference to international law) instead of the former being a part of the latter's territory and hence the dispute being 'internal.' Also noteworthy is the fact that the Act stipulates the US government to counter Beijing's disinformation of Chinese historical claims over the Tibetan plateau including not just the current Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) but also the provinces of Sichuan, Qinghai, Gansu and Yunnan.

In India, the new Modi 3.0 government has given the green signal to rename 30 places in Tibet in a tit-for-tat move aimed at Chinese action of renaming places in Arunachal Pradesh, which Beijing refers to as 'Zagnan' or Southern Tibet on March 2024. This, and other events such as Taiwan President Lai Ching-te's congratulatory message to PM Modi and the latter's reciprocation of the same with wishes of closer New Delhi- Taipei ties have led to the speculation that Sino- Indian ties are bound to remain rocky like in the previous years since 2020. Moreover, Xi Jinping's act of not personally congratulating the new Indian PM on his assumption of office and the blatant Chinese pessimism on social media regarding the new government can be seen as an indication of the continuation of the current situation described as 'armed coexistence'.

Both the above instances involving India and US, two prominent democracies and global players have resulted in the re-emergence of the question of Tibet which have often remained on the backburner in an attempt not to stir up trouble with China. For India, the passage of the Resolve Tibet Act and the US clarity of position on Tibet is an opportune time to revisit and re-examine its own Tibet policy which is still weighed down by history.

Criticism of India's policy towards Tibet can be traced back to Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel's prescient letter in 1950 about nefarious Chinese designs on Tibet and its negative implications upon the security of then newly independent India. His premonitions were proved true by the 1962 war despite Nehru's acknowledgment of Chinese control over Tibet under the Panchsheel or the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence in 1954. Since then, over the years, corresponding to ebb and flow in Sino- Indian ties, there have been calls to revisit the over-cautious Indian approach to respecting Chinese sensibilities with no substantive reciprocation from the other side. This was reflected in the comments made by the Indian Parliamentary Committee on External Affairs in 2017 which stated that while New Delhi 'is overly cautious with China about China's sensitivities while dealing with Taiwan and Tibet, China does not exhibit the same deference while dealing with India's sovereignty concerns, be it Arunachal Pradesh or that of China-Pakistan Economic Corridor in Pakistan-Occupied Kashmir'. Hence, the Committee called for adopting a 'flexible approach' in dealing with Beijing which include Taiwan. And should include Tibet as well.

Calls for revision of India's Tibet strategy have become stronger in the backdrop of the continuing military standoff in Ladakh since 2020. This was reflected in action such as the PM's conveying birthday wishes to the 14th Dalai Lama and the attendance of then Sikyong (President) of the Tibetan Government in Exile (TGIE) Dr Lobsang Sangay during Modi's first swearing ceremony in 2014. The re-naming of places in Tibet mentioned above has led to the opinion that the latter action is 'tantamount to India re-opening the Tibetan question'. And it was about time that the Tibetan question be brought up for discussion and recalibrated in tune with India's changing geopolitical and strategic equation with China. While the above tit-for-tat renaming is a good start, yet as scholar Claude Arpi opines New Delhi will have to be more proactive in formulating a new comprehensive strategy vis-à-vis Tibet.

A first step, as mentioned earlier, is the re-discovery and highlighting of the age old historical links between Tibet and India especially the Indian imprint in Tibetan culture, religion, medicine and language. Like in the renaming initiative, meticulous research must be directed towards the links between Tibetan and Sanskrit languages, Buddhist Gurus and monks from Indian subcontinent who preached in Tibet, and the cross-cultural exchange between Tibetan Vajrayana Buddhism and Hindu Tantric tradition visible in deities such as Palden Lhamo (similar features with Hindu Goddess Kali). To this end, the Government of India should provide active support and funds to institutions such as the Library of Tibetan Works and Archives, Norbulingka Institute, Men-Tsee-Khang (Tibetan traditional medicine) and the Tibet Museum in Dharamshala, Himachal Pradesh. The highlighting of the above linkages would put a strong dent to Chinese claims of control over Tibet since time immemorial. In this regard, New Delhi could also cooperate with the US as countering Chinese disinformation constitutes one of the objects of the Resolve Tibet Act.

The Sino- Indian rivalry over Buddhism constitutes another crucial area tied to New Delhi's Tibet policy. China has made significant inroads into the world of Buddhism by increasing its influence in platforms such as World Fellowship of Buddhists, the International Council of Day of Vesak (ICDV) as well as promoting the development of Buddhist sites such as Lumbini in Nepal- the birthplace of Gautama Buddha. Such increasing influence over the Buddhist world is utilised by Beijing to push the narrative of China, rather than India, being the historical centre of Buddhism while discrediting the Dalai Lama using rival sects as proxies. In the near future, the above influence could also be used to prop up support and legitimacy for the Chinese appointed 15th Dalai Lama after the passing away of the current one. Hence, India needs to urgently step up its game in the battle for influence by actively supporting bodies such as the International Buddhist Confederation (IBC) under the Union Ministry of Culture and organising the Global Buddhist Summit (GBS) annually. The recent inauguration of the Nalanda University in Rajgir, Bihar on 19 June near the site of the historic ancient seat of Buddhism 34 years after the idea was first deliberated in Parliament in 2010, is a welcome move which arrived late but nonetheless would bolster New Delhi's soft power capabilities given it is utilised properly.

The most important pillar buttressing the Indian link with Buddhism and Tibet is the 14th Dalai Lama himself who on many occasions have underlined the umbilical connection between India (Guru/ Mentor) and Tibet (Chela/ Disciple). Moreover, the proclamations of the Dalai Lama himself regarding his re-incarnation such as stressing his exclusive right to choose his own way of re-birth/ re-incarnation and his (legitimate) successor hailing from a free country (possibly India) puts New Delhi in an advantageous position vis-a-vis China. Hence, India should strongly back the appointed successor or any reincarnation born on Indian soil while also actively supporting and coordinating with the Gaden Phodrang Foundation- the body deputed by His Holiness with the responsibility to recognize the latter's reincarnation. In this regard, Washington's support could also be sought within the Tibetan Policy and Support Act (TPSA) 2020 which among other things, clearly stipulates the Tibetan Buddhist communities' sole right to appoint the 15th Dalai Lama without external (Chinese) influence. At the same time, Buddhist countries such as Japan and Vietnam to extend support to any future India born reincarnation- countries having strained ties with China currently. The 15th Dalai Lama born and raised in India and receiving the support of Buddhist population worldwide would be an asset to New Delhi in maintaining and consolidating its position among the Tibetan communities in exile all over the world and in the leadership of Buddhism over China. As a response to the mention of Kashmir in joint China- Pakistan statements, India should release an official statement supporting the Resolve Tibet Act and especially its emphasis on the resolution of the dispute between the two parties through dialogue. At the same time, both New Delhi and Washington should include Tibet and the Dalai Lama during summit level and high-level bilateral talks and release joint statements on the same thereby highlighting the disputed nature of Chinese occupation of the Tibetan plateau. Similar statements could also be generated bilaterally as well as multilaterally with countries like Japan and Vietnam since the Act also stipulates the US 'to coordinate with other countries.... towards the goal of a negotiated agreement on Tibet.'

The recent visit of a US high level delegation to India whose itinerary includes a meeting with the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala is a step which should be made frequent and actively emulated by high ranking Indian ministers having audiences with the Tibetan leader. Important commemorations of Tibetan history such as Tibetan Independence Day (13 February) and Uprising Day (March 10) should include high level Indo- US participation as well as promotion of the events brushed under the carpet by Chinese narrative. Moreover, both New Delhi and Washington should bring up the gross human rights violations happening in Tibet on UN and other related forums. The UN's focus should be brought upon the Tibetan self immolations and escaped political activists seeking asylum in India and elsewhere including allowing the latter to present testimonies in international fora. These would dent Chinese claims of peace and development in Tibet while also countering Beijing's unnecessary meddling with Kashmir at the UN.

Finally, New Delhi should synergise its increasing ties with Taiwan with its Tibet policy. Despite the historical uneasiness between the both, India could devote efforts at bringing them closer and even support TGIE's efforts to re-establish the Taiwanese parliamentary group for Tibet in the Legislative Yuan (Taiwanese parliament). In addition, Taiwan's Buddhist connection could lead Taipei to support the Dalai Lama's chosen re-incarnation candidate. In this, the US could be roped in given the latter's status as the most important ally of Taiwan.

Mao Tse Dong in 1950 had justified Tibet's annexation in terms of the latter being the 'palm' to 'five fingers' (Nepal, Bhutan, Sikkim, Ladakh and Arunachal Pradesh). It is time India weakened the iron grip over the palm for the sake of the fingers crucial to our security and integrity.

PLA reorganisation has implications for China's neighbours

27 June 2024, The Tribune, Jayadeva Ranade

As the conflicts in Ukraine and West Asia have shown, the battle of perception has become very important in present-day warfare to win popular support.

APPARENTLY undeterred by the turbulence in the People's Liberation Army (PLA), sparked by the disappearance of China's then Defence Minister Gen Li Shangfu and the 'removal' soon thereafter of the Commander and Political Commissar of the PLA Rocket Force and at least 11 other Generals, Chinese President Xi Jinping has effected the largest reorganisation of the PLA since 2016. It demonstrated his grip on the PLA. It showed that the PLA officers have imbibed lessons from their close study of the wars in Ukraine and Gaza. One major lesson has been the importance of propaganda and the ability to craft and shape popular perceptions. In Gaza, for example, Israel found that it lost global popular support, which had suddenly and overwhelmingly shifted in favour of Palestine. This was one backdrop that possibly precipitated the dissolution of the PLA Strategic Support Force (SSF) and the establishment of the PLA Information Support Force (ISF).

On April 19, Xi announced the formation of the PLA ISF. He simultaneously announced the establishment of the PLA Aerospace Support Force and the PLA Cyberspace Support Force and the dissolution of the PLA SSF. The order of precedence for the new services, important for the hierarchy-conscious PLA, was indicated as thus: the PLA Aerospace Support Force, PLA Cyberspace Support Force, PLA ISF and the Joint Logistics Support Force. Each of these is now an independent entity at the Deputy Theatre Commander-level, reporting directly to the Central Military Commission (CMC). They have single missions and are focused on one aspect of warfare, which would be intended to make command and control, as well as their performance, more effective. Among the reasons for the reorganisation would be that the capital-intensive PLA SSF encompassed a range of varied aspects of modern hi-technology warfare capabilities, probably making it difficult for the PLA SSF Commander to pay adequate attention to the individual specialised forces under his command. At a time of rapid advances in technology and battlefield tactics evolving on the battlegrounds in Ukraine and West Asia, which the PLA leadership has been studying and analysing very carefully, this would be an impediment to the PLA becoming a world-class military capable of fighting and winning wars.

As the conflicts in Ukraine and West Asia have also shown, the battle of perception has become very important in present-day warfare to win popular support and influence outcomes. Information warfare and shaping scenarios has been noticeably prominent and successful in both these conflict zones. Reorganisation of the SSF will ensure focused attention and better utilisation of funds for each force. Since all forces are specialised, they will establish separate training establishments so that professionally competent personnel are available.

The main functions of the PLA ISF, as presently discernible, includes communications, including satellite communications, analysis of battlefield environment and target data, and maintenance, disruption and monitoring of cyber and communications channels. Many of the entities integrated into the ISF are from the SSF.

Available information shows that the agencies integrated into the PLA ISF include the headquarters of the now-disbanded SSF, the Information and Communication Base, and the Information and Communication Brigades of the Xinjiang and Tibet Military Districts. Additionally, it encompasses the Target Data Battalion, Battlefield Environment Battalion, Communications Support Battalion, Spectrum Control Battalion, and the Intelligence Analysis Centre of the Joint Staff Department of the CMC. Certain functions and capabilities from the Battlefield Situation and Strategic Early Warning Sub-Centres of the Joint Operations Command Centre of the CMC, as well as the Battlefield Situation Battalion, Information Service Battalion, and Command Operations and Maintenance Battalion of the Theatre Command Joint Operations Centres, have also been integrated. Furthermore, some forces from the 35th Base and the Satellite Communications Centre of the former SSF, along with the Battlefield Environment Research Institute and the Network Information Research Institute of the Systems Engineering Research Academy of the Academy of Military Sciences, are now part of the ISF.

Most personnel of these formations and units would have been retained and moved to the ISF with their original units. The leadership elements would largely have been left undisturbed. The Commander and Political Commissar of the Aerospace Force and Cyberspace Force could similarly have been left in place.

Earlier, speaking at the National People's Congress on March 7, Xi had focussed on the building of strategic capabilities in emerging fields, the need to understand developments in emerging fields, and efficient integration of new productive forces and new combat forces.

Xi also underscored the importance of innovation and deepening reform of the national defence science and technology industry system. He stressed the importance of "integrating preparation for maritime military warfare, safeguarding of maritime rights and development of the maritime economy". He simultaneously highlighted the importance of a network space defence system and enhanced safeguards for national network security.

The reorganisation has implications for China's neighbours. Creation of the ISF implies increased attention to signals and electronic monitoring, interception and disruption capabilities. It will probably be responsible for disinformation campaigns and will enhance its cyber warfare capabilities. The ISF will be under pressure to show results, and cyberattacks and disinformation campaigns against targets – Indian, South Asian, South East Asian, etc. – can be expected to increase. The Dalai Lama's establishment would equally be a target. An important area of focus for the new force will be the maritime domain and particularly the Taiwan Strait and South China Sea.

Why Do India and China Keep Fighting Over This Desolate Terrain?

27 June 2024, New York Times, Yudhijit Bhattacharjee

The 2,100-mile border separating India and China passes through some of the world's most inhospitable terrain. In the west, it runs along India's Ladakh region, at an altitude of 13,000 to 20,000 feet. During the months when the area isn't covered in snow, the ground resembles a moonscape. The earth is sandy, strewn with rocks and pebbles; not a blade of grass grows anywhere; there are no visible signs of animal life. In winter, temperatures can drop to – 40 degrees. The bleak conditions and barren vistas can induce despair in those who set foot on the land. "I've been to those places," a former Indian diplomat who now works for an international Buddhist organization in Delhi told me. "When you visit, you tend to think, Who the hell even wants this area?"

But that's not how nation-states view territory, no matter how desolate it is. That is why India and China have their armies deployed on these heights along an unmarked and, in many places, contested boundary between the two countries. In the absence of any fencing or barbed wire to demarcate territory, soldiers from each nation contend with considerable ambiguity when conducting patrols along what's known as the Line of Actual Control. Vinod Bhatia, who served as director general of military operations for the Indian Army and is now retired, describes it as a line of perceptions.

"It's four lines, actually," he told me when I visited Delhi last year. "One is the Indian perception of the Line of Actual Control. Another is the Chinese perception of the Line of Actual Control. Third is the Indian perception of the Chinese perception of the Line of Actual Control — because we have a perception based on their line of patrolling. And the fourth is, of course, the Chinese perception of the Indian perception of the Line of Actual Control."

This lack of clarity means that there are several places along the border that are effectively a no-man's land, where both Indian and Chinese troops carry out patrols. Soldiers from each side routinely leave empty cigarette packets and beer cans behind as marks of territorial claim. At the same time, soldiers on each side are legally bound to exercise restraint during patrols, according to a 1996 agreement between the two countries that prohibits the use of firearms and munitions at the border.

When units from the two sides run into one another, they follow a mutually agreed upon protocol to avoid confrontation. "We pull out a banner that says in English and in Chinese: 'You are in our territory. Please go back,'" Bhatia told me. "And they hold up a banner of their own that says in Hindi and in English: 'You are in our territory. You go back.'"

Historically, such face-offs have been resolved peacefully. In recent years, however, confrontations have sometimes spiraled into skirmishes. One night in early December 2022, for instance, hundreds of Chinese troops attempted to breach, in four spots, a stone wall along a border ridgeline in the Yangtze plateau, located on an eastern stretch of the border in India's easternmost state, Arunachal Pradesh, which China claims is a part of Tibet. According to Indian press reports — the Indian Army has not provided a public account — the Chinese troops were armed with nail-studded clubs, monkey fists (knotted-up portions of rope used as a weapon) and stun guns. The Indian soldiers, using crude weapons of their own, eventually forced the Chinese troops to retreat.

Though there were no fatalities, the engagement was violent, making it the most severe skirmish since a June 2020 clash in the Galwan Valley, which proved fatal for 20 Indian soldiers and at least four Chinese soldiers.

Episodes like those in Galwan and Yangtze reflect an era of increased hostility between the two countries, which have generally maintained a peaceable, if strained, relationship in the decades since they fought a war in 1962. Today, India and China have each stationed an estimated 60,000 soldiers along the Line of Actual Control.

Jayadeva Ranade worked for many years with India's Research and Analysis Wing, the country's main foreign intelligence agency; he now serves on India's National Security Advisory Board. In his view, skirmishes along the border are likely to be regular occurrences for the foreseeable future. "This conflict isn't going to go away in a hurry," he told me. And in large part, the matter is about more than just gaining territory; it's also about a broader geopolitical rivalry. "The bigger issue is they don't want India to rise," Ranade says, referring to China. "Because they see themselves as the only power in the Indo-Pacific region."

The two countries are increasingly jockeying for global influence as well. A strong nationalist leader rules each country: President Xi Jinping in China and, in India, Prime Minister Narendra Modi, who just won a third term in office, despite his party's electoral setbacks that will make him dependent on allies in Parliament. Xi, in his address to the 19th Congress of the Chinese Communist Party in 2017, declared that China "has stood up, grown rich and is becoming strong" and could offer "Chinese wisdom and a Chinese approach to solving the problems facing mankind."

More recently, Modi has been emboldened by India's growth. The country's population surpassed China's last year, and its economy, while still much smaller than China's, is expected to grow faster in the coming years. Like Xi, Modi has spoken of India's ambition to reclaim its ancient glory and return to its status as Vishwaguru, a Sanskrit phrase that means "teacher to the world." India now acts with an assertiveness it lacked even a decade ago.

Harsh V. Pant, a professor of international relations at King's College London, characterizes Modi's government, compared with previous governments, as "much more robust in articulating India's national-security priorities and making the case that New Delhi will stand up for those interests." In 2019, that stance was demonstrated when India conducted airstrikes against what it claimed were terrorist training camps in Balakot, Pakistan. "Balakot was a signal that we are willing to use the instrumentality of the military to achieve certain outcomes and test how far we can go," Pant told me. Last year, India rebuffed criticism from the European Union over its continuing imports of Russian oil, which was seen as helping Russia in its war against Ukraine.

New Delhi's assertiveness was again on display in a diplomatic crisis last year, when Canada announced that it suspected Indian intelligence of having been involved in the killing of a Sikh separatist leader on Canadian soil. The Indian government denied the charge and demanded to see evidence of that claim. It also accused Canada of sheltering Sikh terrorists. Canada had to withdraw 41 of its 62 diplomats from India in October, after the Indian government said it would revoke their diplomatic immunity. As further retribution, visas for Canadians were suspended for more than a month.

In May, after Canadian police arrested and charged three Indian citizens based in Edmonton for last year's murder, India's foreign minister suggested that the killing was related to gang violence and chided Canadian authorities for having allowed "organized crime from India, specifically from Punjab, to operate in Canada."

It isn't uncommon to detect a degree of belligerence in how Indian officials talk about these matters. When I visited Delhi last fall, the mood in the capital over Canada's allegations was one of defiance. Pankaj Saran, who served as India's deputy national-security adviser from 2018 to 2021 and now runs NatStrat, which researches security issues, contrasts India's self-assuredness on the international stage today with its diffident foreign policy of the 1980s. "Back then, we were literally riding the coattails of the Soviet Union," he told me. But as the world's fifth-largest economy, India no longer has any reason to be timid. "Today," he says, "we have a government that believes we've been taking the hit for far too long."

The Indo-China war of 1962 was precipitated by a series of border clashes not too different from those of recent years. The earlier ones were about more than territorial disagreements, though. China was smarting from India's embrace of the Dalai Lama, who had fled Tibet in 1959 and established a government in exile in Dharamshala, India. At this point, the two countries were still young in their modern incarnations; neither had an impressive military. But the People's Liberation Army of China was stronger, and Indian troops suffered a humiliating defeat, which impelled India to increase military spending. A month after the war began, around the same time that India requested that the United States intervene with air support, China declared a unilateral cease-fire, effectively ending the conflict. India had to accept that Aksai Chin, an area of 15,000 square miles that it claimed as its own, would remain under Chinese control.

An uneasy truce held for the next several decades, except for a confrontation in 1986-87 on the eastern stretch of the border, in a valley bordering the hilly and verdant Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. Indian officials say that the status quo began to change in 2013, right after Xi Jinping became China's president. In April of that year, weeks before the newly anointed Chinese premier Li Keqiang was scheduled to visit Delhi, Chinese troops entered the Depsang Plains in Aksai Chin and set up an encampment just 20 miles south of an Indian military base. Alarmed by the incursion, the Indo-Tibetan Border Police pitched its own tents about 300 yards away. The standoff continued for about three weeks before it was resolved through talks, and both sides removed their encampments.

Less than a year and a half later, days before Xi's state visit to India in 2014, Chinese troops entered Chumar, in eastern Ladakh. "This time it was deeper into our territory and on a broader swath," Ranade told me when we met for coffee in Delhi last summer. Modi reportedly raised the matter with Xi during a dinner in Ahmedabad, and weeks later the troops withdrew from the area.

Some Indian officials back then were of the view that Depsang and Chumar were one-off incidents, attributable solely to People's Liberation Army commanders on the ground locally, but Ranade was certain that Beijing had to be involved. In those days, he prepared a regular report on China for a think tank, based on his analysis of Chinese materials. He learned a few things that were troubling: The P.L.A. was conducting more exercises in Tibet (and using more weapons in them) than ever. "Then they began having paratrooper exercises there, and they had some kind of aircraft coming in there, which was again unusual," Ranade told me. The increased military preparedness signaled an aggressive posture. "I said: 'Look, there's something brewing. I can't tell you what it is, but it doesn't look good to me.'"

The next notable confrontation unfolded in Doklam, a plateau roughly 800 miles to Ladakh's east, close to where the borders of Bhutan, China and India meet. China claims Doklam as its territory, while India and Bhutan maintain that the area is a part of Bhutan. Bhutan has historically relied on India's help to defend its borders, so when China started to build a road into Doklam in June 2017, Indian troops entered the area to stop that construction, and the two sides formed human walls that faced off against each other.

Srikant Kondapalli, a professor of China studies at Jawaharlal Nehru University, recounted to me what he had learned from an Indian brigadier about how Indian forces attempted to gain a psychological advantage in the conflict. "They put together some 40 to 50 especially tall Indian soldiers, all above six-and-a-half feet, and pitched them against the Chinese, who were a lot shorter," Kondapalli says. He believes the intimidation tactic helped India as the troops went eyeball to eyeball. Scuffles broke out intermittently. The face-off lasted 73 days. India was able to shut down the road project, which would have put the Chinese military within striking range of the Siliguri corridor – a strategically vital sliver of land that connects India’s northeastern states to the rest of the country.

‘If this was not premeditated, how come the Chinese had iron clubs with spikes and barbed wire?’

Then came the clash in the Galwan Valley, during a June night in 2020. The valley is along the Galwan River, just southwest of Aksai Chin. Tensions had been simmering there since April, when Chinese troops pitched tents in the valley. The Indian military saw this as yet another incursion across the Line of Actual Control by the P.L.A. According to Indian officials, China agreed to withdraw from these areas, including from the valley.

The violence in mid-June began when Col. Bikkumalla Santosh Babu, who commanded an Indian Army unit tasked with monitoring the Chinese withdrawal from Galwan, reportedly got into a heated exchange with Chinese soldiers who were supposed to have left by then. Although the Indian Army hasn’t released details, I gathered the broad outlines of the incident from Indian security and intelligence sources, including Jayadeva Ranade, whose own understanding of the incident comes from a careful reading of media reports. He told me that Babu, who was accompanied by two men when he walked over to the Chinese camp, was attacked. “One of the men came back and told the others in his unit,” Ranade said, “and they went over and there was a showdown.”

The Chinese soldiers were apparently armed with metal clubs studded with spikes and wrapped in barbed wire. The fighting, which continued late into the night and involved dozens of men on each side, might have been less bloody if the soldiers had used their firearms. In all, 20 Indian soldiers, including Babu, were killed. State media in China later reported four deaths on the Chinese side, although Indian officials claim the number was significantly higher.

The brutal fighting in Galwan didn’t strike Ranade as entirely unexpected. He saw it not as a fracas that spiraled out of control but rather an attack planned by the Chinese – the kind of thing he had been warning his colleagues about. As he put it to me, “If this was not premeditated, how come the Chinese had iron clubs with spikes and barbed wire?” Ranade said he had come across calls put out by P.L.A. units inviting bids to supply similar weapons as recently as March 2023, which indicated continued hostile intent. “So obviously, they are preparing.”

In 2017, Xi Jinping wrote a letter to two sisters from a yak-herding family in Lhunze County, in southern Tibet, adjacent to Arunachal Pradesh, thanking them for their efforts in safeguarding the border.

According to Chinese state media, the two Tibetan women and their father had been the sole inhabitants of their town Yumai for a period of years until the mid-1990s; its population has since risen to more than 200. In his letter, which was widely publicized in China, Xi expressed hope that the family would inspire other herders to put down roots in the area like “galsang flowers” and become guardians of Chinese territory.

Since taking over as president, Xi has repeatedly talked about being uncompromising in protecting the country’s “core interests” – a term that is understood to include China’s territorial and sovereignty claims. Under Xi, the country has converted coral reefs and sand piles dredged up from the seabed in the South China Sea, which it maintains belongs almost entirely to China, into artificial islands that are now heavily militarized with missiles and air strips. Xi has also emphasized China’s commitment to realizing its long-held dream of “reunification” with Taiwan, which split from mainland China in 1949. A similar priority is the consolidation of Chinese control over Tibet by squashing a decades-long Tibetan independence movement. China’s aggressive stance along the border with India, Kondapalli told me, is being driven by the same overarching goal of asserting sovereignty over disputed areas.

A senior Indian intelligence official I met with in Delhi last year explained that China’s hostility along the Line of Actual Control had two strategic objectives: diminishing India’s impact in its own backyard and tying down India’s military in order to weaken India’s broader geopolitical influence. “We are the big brother in our region: Bangladesh, Nepal, Sri Lanka – everyone looks to India when they have a problem,” he said. “China wants to dent us by saying, ‘How is India going to be your net security provider when they can’t handle their own risk?’” He attributed Chinese cyberattacks directed at India to the same motive: a desire to reduce India’s standing. China’s hostility, he said, was aimed at diluting India’s participation in strategic alliances that have emerged to counter Chinese threats.

One such example is the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue, or Quad, a group made up of India, the United States, Australia and Japan, which share the goal of preventing China from dominating the Indo-Pacific. The Chinese, according to the intelligence official, “don’t want India to be the long arm of the United States in this region or to be an active part of things like the Quad, which brings you back to the border issue. They want to keep us pinned down on the land borders because the future of geopolitics is maritime. They don’t want us to lift our heads.”

China’s economic muscle has helped expand its influence in the region in ways that India hasn’t been able to match, the official told me. As part of its Belt and Road Initiative, which Xi began in 2013, China has invested in infrastructure projects in every one of India's neighbors. "We call them strategic projects because they are going into them with no consideration of what they'll get back in business terms," he said. What China was gaining from these investments was "massive leverage." Not only was India unable to compete in terms of resources, he added, India was also not allowed to operate as he claimed the Chinese do. "They literally come with bags of cash," he said. "We have to have parliamentary approval, this approval, that approval."

At the Tibetan border, this approach has taken a more physical form, as China has built more than 620 new "xiaokang" — or "moderately well-off" — villages all along the Tibetan border. Billions of yuan have been spent on roads, power stations, schools and health care facilities to support these villages. Each settlement consists of about 100 homes equipped with modern amenities like heating and internet connectivity. A mix of Tibetans and Han Chinese — many of whom are ex-military men — have moved into the villages, Kondapalli says, effectively changing the demographics of the area and enhancing Beijing's ability to crush Tibetan resistance.

"These settlements are de facto intelligence outposts," Kondapalli says. In contrast to the xiaokang villages, which are right next to the Line of Actual Control, the settlements on India's side are 20 to 30 miles inside Indian territory. That gives the settlers in these villages an opening to encroach upon land that belongs to India, Kondapalli says.

Indian authorities see the establishment of these border villages as buttressing a strategy of gradual encroachment — or "salami slicing," as it's known among security strategists — that China has practiced over the years in the South China Sea and is now attempting to replicate along the Line of Actual Control. The high-ranking Indian intelligence official I spoke with in Delhi explained to me how the Chinese military had been operating on the border. "It's very simple, but very clear," he told me over breakfast on the patio of a Delhi hotel. "It starts with their yaks coming into pastures that are common grazing grounds at the border. After a few weeks of the yaks hanging around, the herdsman will come. Then, they start making trails for the herders. And then, because there are herders and yaks there, the P.L.A. will come, saying, 'These are our nationals — we're just checking on them.'"

The official went on: "Once the troops start coming in for patrols, then they'll pitch tents, saying, 'Our troops need to rest.' The next thing they'll do is, 'The trails are not good enough, let's start making roads.' Then they'll prevent our patrols from coming into that area. Once the roads are properly made, the tents will become cemented structures. So, in about eight to nine steps, they will create new facts on the ground and say, 'This is ours.'" Effectively, winning a war without firing a shot.

That's what the P.L.A. appears to have been aiming for, not just in the Galwan Valley but also in several areas along the border in eastern Ladakh that Chinese troops moved into in the spring of 2020. The clash at Galwan was followed by a withdrawal from that site by both sides, but Chinese soldiers continued to occupy other areas, including those on the banks of Pangong Lake, whose westernmost edge lies 50 miles to the south of the Galwan Valley.

India fought back. On the evening of Aug. 29, 2020, troops from a secretive Indian guerrilla force, together with soldiers from the Indian Army, began ascending the slopes of a mountain in eastern Ladakh. The mountains are part of the Kailash Range, a chain of rugged peaks, the tallest of which reach 22,000 feet, beginning near Pangong's southern bank and extending southeast for some 500 miles. Because of the difficult terrain, the heights along the range were left unoccupied by both India and China after the 1962 war. But now, nearly six decades later, Indian Army commanders hoped to take control of several of these hilltops.

As Lt. Gen. Y.K. Joshi, the top commander in charge of the operation, later disclosed in media interviews, the operation, called Snow Leopard, had been planned as a response to the P.L.A.'s incursions. By the night of Aug. 29, Indian troops were in possession of a strategic peak. The following morning, Indian tanks rolled up a mountainside several miles southeast on the range, enabling the Indian Army to occupy a high mountain pass known as Rezang La, a strategic location overlooking a Chinese garrison stationed at Moldo on the other side of the range. By the time the P.L.A. could bring its equipment and troops up the slopes on their side, Indian troops already had the advantage.

The action was "well planned, well thought out and executed, achieving total surprise," Joshi said in a video interview with Nitin Gokhale, a veteran Indian military journalist who runs a foreign-affairs website called Stratnews Global. (The Indian Army has not officially released any information about the operation, but I got a summary description of it from Gokhale.) The Indians suffered one casualty: 53-year-old Nyima Tenzing of the guerrilla Special Frontier Force, which was established 60 years ago to conduct covert operations against China. Tenzing, like other troops who make up the S.F.F., was of Tibetan origin and died from a land mine left behind after the 1962 war.

As Joshi explained to Stratnews, India's goal in taking the Kailash heights was to compel China to withdraw from the areas occupied by the P.L.A. after their incursions earlier that month. The strategy gave India leverage in negotiating with China, and ultimately led to success: In February 2021, the P.L.A. dismantled its structures and pulled its soldiers back from those sites in exchange for Indian troops vacating the hilltops.

That doesn't mean, however, that the Chinese have given up. In fact, the P.L.A.'s military presence in the broader area north of Pangong Lake has increased significantly since 2021. According to an analysis by the Center for Strategic and International Studies of satellite images taken on Oct. 4, 2022, the Chinese have built a new P.L.A. divisional headquarters just north of Pangong, just three and a half miles from the Line of Actual Control. Its support buildings are, the C.S.I.S. reports, "flanked by a bevy of trenches and revetments for storing and securing equipment."

At the end of last August, China's Ministry of Natural Resources released a new map that rendered Aksai Chin and Arunachal Pradesh as Chinese territory. China has published such maps before. But the timing of the new release — less than two weeks before India was to host the G20 summit in Delhi — suggested that it was a calculated jab intended to undermine India precisely when the country hoped to showcase its rising influence. A government spokesman said such actions by China served only to "complicate the resolution of the boundary question."

India sees China employing similar tactics to try to pressure India on Arunachal Pradesh, which the Chinese government calls Zangnan. In April, China's Ministry of Civil Affairs announced that it was renaming 30 places in the region — the fourth such move since 2017. In March of last year, China chose not to send its delegate to a G20 event hosted by India in Itanagar, the capital of Arunachal Pradesh, as a reminder that it considers India's rule there illegitimate. "When there's a delegation of Indian bureaucrats traveling to China, the Chinese embassy here in Delhi will not issue a stamped visa to the delegate who belongs to Arunachal Pradesh," says the former diplomat now at the nonprofit Buddhist organization. Instead, embassy officials permit entry by stapling an unstamped piece of paper to the passport. "They say the individual is welcome because his land is a part of China." The result, the former diplomat told me, is that the Indian government then can't send that delegate because doing so would register approval of China's position. India has its own anxieties about Indians living near the border: It worries that they might shift their allegiance to China.

One reason for China's interest in Arunachal Pradesh, especially its district of Tawang, is the existence of Buddhist holy sites in the state, including the Tawang monastery. Founded in the late 17th century, it is the world's second largest Buddhist monastery, after the Drepung monastery in Lhasa, Tibet. The Tawang monastery was the Dalai Lama's first refuge in India when he fled Tibet in 1959, crossing over into Arunachal Pradesh after an arduous trek through the mountains. Derek Grossman, of the RAND Corporation, explains that China wants Tawang because it believes that control over what is currently the most important center of Tibetan Buddhism outside Tibet will help consolidate its hold over the Tibetan population. "They have some fears that because India continues to give safe refuge to the Dalai Lama, at some point the Dalai Lama could return to Tawang and use it as leverage to galvanize the Tibetan people to try and declare independence from China," Grossman says.

India's government has its own anxieties about Indians living close to the border: It worries that they might shift their allegiance to China. Arunachal Pradesh, like much of India's northeast, is less developed than other parts of the country; many rural communities in remote areas live in relative isolation. Yeshe Phuntsok, a retired government employee who lives in Tawang, told me that even 20 years ago, many people in the village where he grew up were not fully aware that they were Indians. "They didn't know there was a country called India or that there was a country called China," he says. Over the years, outreach efforts by Indian authorities have helped change that, he says: "Now, they understand that India is their country."

This fledgling, still-forming sense of Indian identity in parts of the border population is another reason the xiaokang villages built by China are a source of concern for the Indian government. "Their thinking is that when they publicize the development of their villages, people on our side of the border will look at that and say, 'Oh, we are so badly off,'" the Indian intelligence official I had breakfast with told me. "And the Tibetans will see that Arunachal is so poor by comparison."

Better cellular connectivity in China's border villages is a source of envy across the Line of Actual Control, where citizens in some areas are able to receive signals from Chinese cellphone towers. Phones can automatically switch to the Chinese network near the border, Phuntsok told me. Earlier on the day we spoke, he had visited an area close to the Line of Actual Control. "Right after I got there, I noticed that my phone was showing 3:30 p.m.," he said. For a little while, Phuntsok puzzled over how the time could have passed so quickly. He then realized the phone was showing Chinese time, which is two hours and 30 minutes ahead of Indian time there.

Ngawang Tashi, a Buddhist monk from Arunachal Pradesh, told me that China's attempts to woo India's predominantly Buddhist border population is part of a larger effort to “sinify” Buddhism – that is, dilute its Tibetan identity and make it more Chinese. He said he had heard about the Chinese government offering houses and financial benefits to Indian yak herders to get them to settle in some of the newly built villages. “Most people here are loyal to India and followers of His Holiness the Dalai Lama,” he told me. But after the current Dalai Lama is gone, that could change, he added. “They can be swayed when there is money being offered.”

Belatedly, the Indian government has responded to China’s xiaokang villages with a “vibrant villages” program, announced in April last year. Over the next decade, the government says, it plans to invest $600 million in the development of about 3,000 villages that are already settled along the Line of Actual Control, from Ladakh to Arunachal Pradesh. By building roads, dams, schools and hospitals, and by improving telecom services throughout this stretch, authorities hope to give people in border communities a reason to stay where they are and stay loyal to India.

The skirmishes of the past few years have had a silver lining, says Claude Arpi, a longtime scholar of Tibet and Indo-China relations who is currently a distinguished fellow at the Center of Excellence for Himalayan Studies at Shiv Nadar University. It has forced the two sides to come to formal agreements about the border at certain places in Ladakh. “In fact, this is the first time that a map for the L.A.C. exists for this area,” Arpi told me.

Disagreements about the boundary persist elsewhere, however, including Demchok and Depsang. It’s unclear if those will be resolved anytime soon, even though Modi and Xi Jinping agreed at a summit in South Africa last August to expedite “disengagement and de-escalation” on the border, according to an Indian government spokesman. Despite his party’s loss of its majority in the recent election, Modi’s decision-making power on nationalistic issues like border disputes with China is unlikely to diminish in his third term, which in turn means India’s assertiveness along the Line of Actual Control is likely to continue. “Today, after what happened in Galwan, there is no question that China can come more than a few hundred meters inside India’s territory,” Arpi says. “India has responded very strongly for once.”

Straight Talk | India’s Himalayan Powerplay: China Caught Off Guard As India, US Play the Tibet Card

26 June 2024, News18, Sanbeer Singh Rathore

For now, India has made it abundantly clear to China that unless it course-corrects, New Delhi’s activism for both Taiwan and Tibet will only rise

The new Indian government was sworn in on June 4. Within days, a bipartisan American delegation led by the US House Committee on Foreign Affairs chair Michael McCaul was in town. The town in question was Dharamshala – the seat of the Tibetan government in exile and where the Dalai Lama has been living ever since he fled Tibet. Despite China’s warnings to Washington against the said visit, the American delegation met Prime Minister Narendra Modi in Delhi after their talks with the Tibetan government and the Dalai Lama. That Nancy Pelosi is a personality deeply embedded in the American establishment is a well-known fact. As such, her visit had to have the sanction of the top echelons of both the Biden administration and the Modi government. Her visit to Dharamshala was, for all practical purposes, as significant as her trip to Taiwan in 2022, if not more.

Naturally, this has made many in India and around the world sit up and take notice. After all, Washington and New Delhi’s Tibet push has come out of the blue. On expected lines, the intention of the visit has come under scrutiny. China is flummoxed, while many in India appear to be apprehensive of the Americans using New Delhi as a shoulder to fire from. However, this is certainly not a haphazard decision by India, much less one taken under pressure. It is a warning shot for China and its president, Xi Jinping. India is essentially signalling to China that play-time is over. The scare of falling out of line vis-à-vis the “One China Policy” is over. One-sided bullying will no longer allowed to be the norm. China can no longer rename Indian villages and expect New Delhi to sit by idly. The rules of engagement have changed.

It was about time India let China know that it too can press some of Beijing’s raw nerves. While caution is advisable, it is refreshing to see India demonstrate the ability to play the game as an equal power. Bullying tolerated beyond a point is as good as submission. As a side note, it is surprising to watch the US take up the issue of Tibet’s autonomy so aggressively. The US appears to be trying to gain leverage over Beijing in the run-up to it making a move on Taiwan. The invasion of Taiwan looks inevitable, and is only a question of “when” and not “if”. Joe Biden also has good reason to push the Tibet card now, at the fag end of his Presidency, given how American foreign policy since 2020 has been an unmitigated disaster. If this indeed turns out to be the first and last Biden presidency, he would like to end it on a high note and be seen as a President who brought Tibet back on the table.

For India, China's growing appetite for expansionism is quite concerning. Beijing has been upping the rhetoric on "South Tibet", renaming Indian villages and refusing to disengage from crucial areas in Ladakh. It is also expanding its outreach in the Indian Ocean Region (IOR) and attempting to lure traditional India-friendly countries under its umbrella. For India, the worry in a post Taiwan-invasion scenario will be where China turns its eyes next. Chances are, Beijing's focus will turn to Arunachal Pradesh and Ladakh even as it steps up activities in the IOR.

India does not want to be taken by surprise and left devising a strategy when the crisis strikes. By allowing the US delegation to not just visit Dharmshala but also meet the Dalai Lama, the Indian government has made it clear it can also play the Tibet and Taiwan cards at a time and place of its choosing.

That the same has happened at the very outset of Modi's third term in power is quite telling as well. It is a sign from the Indian government that China will be taken head on over the next five years.

The US has orchestrated a big show of strength alongside India in order to publicise the bipartisan Tibet policy bill. After all, the visit came in the backdrop of Biden preparing to sign the Tibet policy bill adopted by both the US Senate and the House of Representatives. The bill seeks to counter China's narrative about its control over Tibet and promote dialogue between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama.

The Tibet Policy Bill refutes China's claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times. That, in Beijing's mind, is a direct affront to the "One China Policy" – something which India is now party of.

WHAT PROMPTED THE CHANGE IN INDIA'S STRATEGY?

There are a couple of factors playing on India's mind. First, China and India are both engaged in an active standoff in Eastern Ladakh. Beijing wants India to accept the new status quo in Ladakh and allow the bilateral relationship to remain unaffected. However, New Delhi is willing to have none of it and insists that absent a resolution in Ladakh, the bilateral relationship will remain in the cold storage.

For far too long, India has had a headless and incoherent policy of dealing with China. Finally, one can witness signs of New Delhi getting its act together and a much more strong-headed and mature China policy taking shape – one which will become even more apparent and concrete in the months to come. Moves relating to Taiwan and Tibet appear to be part of the same strategy, which India is now using to gain leverage over China.

China's recent gesture of gifting water to the Maldives from Tibetan glaciers, while hypocritically promoting water conservation campaigns, has not gone unnoticed. In response, New Delhi is preparing to rename 30 villages in Tibet, as a form of diplomatic retaliation. The message for China could not be any clearer.

China claims Arunachal as its territory by referring to it as 'Zangnan' or southern Tibet. It has renamed 30 locations in Arunachal Pradesh with Chinese and Tibetan names. This appears to have been the last straw for India. Not only is China refusing to expeditiously resolve the standoff in Eastern Ladakh, but is also consistently pushing its own narrative on Arunachal Pradesh by calling it "South Tibet".

Besides, only months prior to India hosting the G20 leader's summit in New Delhi last September, Beijing had released a new map that asserted territorial claim over Arunachal and Aksai Chin in Ladakh. In the 2023 edition of China's 'standard map', uploaded by its ministry of natural resources on the website of its standard map service website, Aksai Chin and Arunachal are among the south and south-east Asian territories marked within the Chinese borders. Add to it China's growing eye in the Indian Ocean Region, and India believes the time to take concrete action is now.

India has finally realised that China is not a country that can be ignored. Beijing's expansionist tendencies know no bound. There will not suddenly come a day when China forgets all about its fictitious claims on Ladakh, Arunachal Pradesh and other sovereign Indian areas. For now, India has made it abundantly clear to China that unless it course-corrects, New Delhi's activism for both Taiwan and Tibet will only rise. In the times to come, one can expect more facets of this Himalayan powerplay to unfold.

Centring 'Tibetan' in Tibetan and Himalayan Studies in India

25 June 2024, SNU, Swati Chawla

Although prompted by tensions with China, the recently renewed administrative and scholarly interest in the Himalayan regions of India bordering Bhutan, Nepal, and Tibet is nevertheless an opportunity to correct broader historical amnesia about the long histories of interconnectedness in the area. It is vital here to acknowledge the contribution of the six-decade-long exile of the Dalai Lama— both the institution and the person—and of the Tibetan community in exile in preserving Himalayan traditions and histories and in shepherding the institutions that enabled their revival in postcolonial India. This article makes a case for centring Tibet and Tibetan exiles in Tibetan and Himalayan studies in India.

Keywords: Tibetology, Tibetan exile, Himalayan studies

It had been a huge discovery for me— the Himalayas are not part of Indian history.

— Aniket Alam, 2020i

My pet peeve is that you can't have a China policy without a Tibet policy, and you can't have a Tibet policy ... without a Himalayan policy — a 'Himalayan policy' that encompasses both 'domestic Himalaya' and 'inter-state Himalaya.'

— Siddiq Wahid, 2020ii

Introduction

In June 2023, following a chintan shivir (brainstorming session) chaired by Home Minister Amit Shah, the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) asked personnel of the Central Armed Police Forces (CAPF) to collect histories of the border villages manned by them “extending up to the past 2,000 years” (Manral 2023). Some understood the move was connected to the government's plans to improve infrastructure in the border region. The 'Vibrant Villages Programme,' for example, aims to develop and create employment opportunities and promote local products in the border areas, which, the Home Minister stressed, could “eventually stop migration” out of these villages. He added that “contact and communication with every border village and its residents is very important for the security of the borders” (Manral 2023).

The Vibrant Villages Programme, a scheme sponsored by the Union Government for the financial years 2022-23 to 2025-26, has earmarked 2,967 villages along India's northern and eastern borders with Tibet/China, situated across 19 districts in the states of Arunachal Pradesh, Sikkim, Uttarakhand, Himachal Pradesh, and Ladakh (Union Territory). The Programme has also authorised the establishment of several units of the Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP), enhancing their infrastructure and inducting over 9,000 troops (The Indian Express 2023).iii

This recognition of the need to better document and understand the histories of India's vast border regions, stem depopulation, and bridge the disconnect between the locals and the officers of the Indian state is a reminder of the cartographic anxiety that continues to plague the Indian republic three-quarters of a century after decolonisation.iv The 2,000-year village histories collected by CAPF personnel—which would subsequently be added to their training module (Manral 2023) would undoubtedly reveal the older provenance for this anxiety and its relation to processes of border-making and nation-building. Most importantly for this article, these histories also remind us of the region's embeddedness within the Tibetan Buddhist cultural world— age- old relations of trade, intermarriage, seasonal migration, and monastic patronage among Tibet and parts of Himalayan India— and the impact of the six-decade-long Tibetan exile on Himalayan peoples.

Regrettably, though, amidst laudable suggestions such as the promotion of traditional knowledge practices, showcasing local culture and heritage, and promoting social entrepreneurship—all of which, it is hoped, would encourage locals to stay in their native villages and perform a more significant role in safeguarding the borders (Manral 2023; The Indian Express 2023)—there is scant acknowledgement of this wider context and shared history, or of the debt of gratitude India owes to organisations and initiatives established by Tibetans in exile, which have been long performing some of the very tasks outlined by the MHA (Chawla 2023).

Two years before the chintan shivir mentioned above, on 28 January 2021, as Indian and Chinese troops faced off in Ladakh in the western Himalaya, The Times of India reported about the Indian Army's proposal for its officers to study Tibetology in order to “counter the propaganda and spread of influence by China.” As scholars of Tibet and the Himalaya, many of us welcome the so-called “Tibetology proposal” to understand “Tibetan history, culture, and language on both sides of the Line of Actual Control” (Pandit 2021). The government is right to emphasise the importance of building expertise on Tibet to understand the history and contemporary challenges in India's relationship with China.

India-China relations cannot be approached through a strictly bilateral prism that excludes Tibet and the Himalaya. Equally, however, Tibetology cannot be confined within the bounds of state interests and territorial conflicts on either side of the Tibetan plateau. And it cannot disregard the Tibetan community in exile (Chawla and Balasubramaniam 2021).

Forgotten friends?

The Indian Army's instrumental and strategic employment of Tibetology is not very different from how Tibet and the Himalaya have been approached in most scholarship. The production and codification of knowledge about Tibet had served European imperial interests from the earliest missionary writings to the travelogues and the histories written by diplomats.<sup>v</sup> Linguistic competency was part of colonial officers' training; they learned the Central Tibetan dialect and were often tutored by monks from Sikkim, Ladakh, and Darjeeling who had spent time in Tibet (McKay 1997). This interest and expertise in Tibet declined in the postcolonial period. Officers were not posted in the frontier regions long enough to produce a cadre that knew the region and the language or could conduct original research. According to historian Tsering Shakya, Indian diplomatic scholarship about Tibet after Independence mostly regurgitated colonial writing.<sup>vi</sup> When I began scouring the archival record for my doctoral work, I realised that the exiled nuns and monks I had met in Dharamsala, who (or whose parents) had migrated after 1959, were far from blazing a trail. In fact, they had followed in the footsteps of their kinsmen and traders, monks and laypeople, who had, for generations, been crisscrossing what later became firm national borders. Furthermore, while looking for "Tibet" in archival catalogues and indices, I kept running into correspondence routed through Sikkim and Bhutan. My knowledge of Tibetan exile and of South Asian history thus far had not alerted me to these longer histories and interconnections.

I realised, too, that my own ignorance was not unique. As Indrani Chatterjee pointed out in her aptly titled monograph Forgotten Friends, postcolonial historians of modern India have "mastered a particular kind of forgetfulness about their trans-regional, trans-sectarian, and trans-national precolonial histories" (Chatterjee 2013, 20). A series of personal interviews on the state of the field of Tibetan studies with scholars of Tibet and the Himalaya from South Asia in late 2020 revealed that, like me, many of them had first discovered these interconnections in the archives that had been omitted from our history books (see the first epigraph by historian Aniket Alam).<sup>vii</sup> Their research and teaching, like mine, have since sought to transcend regional and disciplinary boundaries in contemporary South Asia. In Chatterjee's words, an "insistent mapping of a relational universe" is "the starting point of the journey out of a fragmented landscape," through which postcolonial historians are attempting to revive "a modicum of the friendships that have been valued in and among Buddhist communities" (Chatterjee 2013, 20, added emphases).

A reciprocal debt

Thus, 60 years into the Dalai Lama's exile, his unifying role is widely recognised among the Buddhist communities in the region, as is the grassroots work of lay and monastic educational organisations under the Central Tibetan Administration (Wahid 2014; Chawla 2022a; Palsang 2009). The recent courses in Tibetology are a nod to this storied history of institution building.

Let us take the institutes identified by the Indian Army Training Command (ARTRAC) for their officers could enrol for training in Tibetology. Two of these— the School of Buddhist Philosophy in Leh, Ladakh (now known as the Central Institute of Buddhist Studies) and the Central Institute for Higher Tibetan Studies (CIHTS) in Sarnath<sup>viii</sup>— were established in the early years after Independence, and focused on the study of Buddhism. Nehru had suggested to Foreign Secretary Subimal Dutt (1955-61) that CIHTS at Sarnath be run almost entirely by the Tibetan monks who had followed the Fourteenth Dalai Lama into exile.<sup>ix</sup> The Tibetan exile community has since shepherded this institution. A third, the Namgyal Institute of Tibetology in Sikkim, was inaugurated by India's first Prime Minister in 1958; the Dalai Lama had laid its foundation the previous year on his way back from India for the 2,500th Buddha Jayanti celebrations. Also on the list is the Dalai Lama Institute for Higher Education in Bengaluru, which was established for Tibetans in exile as part of the Tibetan Children's Village (TCV) under the exile administration.

Indeed, monastic scholars from Tibet have long performed the yeoman's service of shepherding the discipline of Tibetan and Himalayan studies in India. Its foundation in the modern period was arguably laid by Rabindranath Tagore when he envisioned Santiniketan—which features on the ARTRAC list— as a meeting place for the languages and cultures of India. Tagore's invitation to the French Indologist

Sylvian Levi (1863-1935) to Santiniketan in 1921 “may be termed as the starting of scientific studies on Indo-Tibetan Studies at Visva-Bharati” (Loseries 2010, 58–59). In 1954, the Department of Indo-Tibetan Studies was established to “promote research on age-long cultural relations between India and Tibet.” From its establishment through the 1980s, the Department invited Tibetan Buddhist monks, many of whom had come into exile in the 1950s, to collaborate with Indian scholars (Dash, Narendra [2000] 2017b; [2000] 2017a; Loseries 2010).

Among the Tibetan lamas who served at the Department was Chimed Rigzin Rinpoche (1922-2002), popularly known as C.R. Lama, a non-celibate Tantric master in the Nyingma tradition, who served as the first head of the Department (1954-1987) and helped build its manuscript and xylograph collection, with manuscripts he had brought out of Tibet forming its foundation (Yachin and Fischman 2022; Dash, Narendra [2000] 2017b). Lama was the first Tibetan to hold such a position in an Indian university and was part of the delegation that met Zhou Enlai at Visva-Bharati during the latter’s visit to India in 1956, where Nehru himself accompanied him.

Another illustrious Tibetan scholar who served at Santiniketan was Lama Chimpa (1923-2011), who was born in Inner Mongolia and received his basic education there before moving for further monastic studies to Beijing and subsequently to two important Geluk monasteries in Tibet— Kumbum and Drepung. (Sera, Drepung, and Ganden are the “great three” Geluk monastic universities of Central Tibet.) Lama Chimpa came to India in 1951. He worked at the International Academy of Indian Culture in Nagpur and Delhi (1952-61) and taught at the Department of Buddhist Studies—also on the ARTRAC list— at the University of Delhi.<sup>x</sup> He subsequently taught Tibetan language and literature at Visva Bharati from 1962 till his retirement in 1993 (Gerke, Barbara 2000; Das, Ritiman 2022; Kravchenko and Zaitsev 2003; Tan 1999).

Another Tibetan lama, Tulku Thondup Rinpoche, was born and studied in Golok in Amdo. Following the political upheaval in Tibet, he came to Sikkim in 1957 and moved to India in 1958. He taught at Lucknow University (1967-76) and Visva Bharati (1976-80) before moving to the United States in 1980 (Snow Lion Publications 1986).

Conclusion

Thanks in large part to the work of Tibetans in exile and the support from successive Indian governments, there is no location more advantageous than India for studying Tibet and the Himalaya. Indian institutions — national- and state archives, and private collections in libraries and individual families — house the richest material for this research. Linguistic and field expertise abound, as do opportunities for learning the Tibetan language.

In the end, the Himalaya is not, and never was, an insurmountable “natural barrier”—a sentry as Indian school children sing in sare jahaan se achchaxi— that separated India from its neighbours in the north and the east. It behoves us then, as Indian scholars, policymakers, and administrators, to approach our border regions, not as foreign and mythologised others, nor as sterile but strategically vital spaces, but as hosts to interconnected yet internally diverse ecologies, societies, and politics that crisscross many contemporary borders, and are often ensconced in a Tibetan and Buddhist cultural sensibility.

Let us broaden the mandate for Tibetology and write more of India into the story. Let us ask of it lessons about our shared histories, and not just about how best to counter an ‘other’ beyond the mountains.

The world ignores threats from China, promotes the cause of self-determination of Tibetan people

25 June 2024, Mizzima, Sun Lee

Ignoring Chinese threats, a high-level bipartisan U.S. delegation has visited Dharamsala in India to meet Tibetan spiritual leader the Dalai Lama and asserted that the Tibetans have the right to self-determination and should be allowed to practice their religion. Their visit came shortly after the U.S. House passed the Resolve Tibet Bill that recognizes the rights of the Tibetan people and calls for resolving the dispute between Tibet and China peacefully and in accordance with international law, through dialogue. To the chagrin of China, the delegation of the U.S. House of Representatives had among its members Nancy Pelosi, the former Speaker of the U.S. House. In 2022, ignoring threats from China, she visited Taiwan. Nancy Pelosi is a well-known disciple of the Dalai Lama and it is unlikely that threats from China will deter her from visiting the Buddhist spiritual leader.

Ignoring the ire of China, Prime Minister of India Narendra Modi has met members of the bipartisan group of American lawmakers after their meeting with the Dalai. At about the same time, the Canadian House of Commons unanimously passed a resolution supporting the right of self-determination of Tibet; asserting that the Tibetans, as a people and a nation, possess this fundamental right.

With all these developments coming within the span of about 10 days, Beijing has now realized to its dismay that the world will not succumb to its pressure and bullying tactic; nor will it accept the Chinese propaganda about the legitimacy of Chinese occupation of Tibet. Beijing has now been reduced to appealing to U. S. President Joe Biden not to sign the Tibet Support Bill which is now on the latter's table and is waiting to be signed into law. In a climb down from its earlier stubborn position of refusing to talk to the Dalai Lama, China has called upon the latter to "to have complete reflection on and thoroughly correct its political propositions," without offering any explanation what these mean.

Beijing even had the audacity to threaten the U.S. lawmakers not to meet the Dalai Lama. "Our delegation received a letter from the Chinese Communist Party warning us not to come here. They repeated their false claim that Tibet is part of China since the 13th Century but we did not let the CCP intimidate us and we are here today," leader of the delegation U.S. House Foreign Affairs Committee chair Michael McCaul has disclosed in a news conference in Dharamsala held under the aegis of the Tibetan government-in-exile which China dismisses as a mere political clique.

"The Tibetan people possess a distinct religion, culture and historic identity and they should have a say in their own future. They should be able to freely practice your religion and that is why we are here in defiance of the CCP warning," he said.

"They repeated their false claim that Tibet is part of China since the 13th Century but we did not let the CCP intimidate us," McCaul said. Thus the U.S. lawmakers who represent the people of America have upheld the historical reality that China had never been in full political control of Tibet, that the degree of this control has been a loose suzerainty which is far from sovereign rights, that on several occasions in the past Tibet has been independent of any Chinese control and that between 1912 and 1950 Tibet was an independent country. Thus, the Chinese annexation of Tibet in 1950 was illegal.

The Resolve Tibet Bill was passed in the U.S. House by an overwhelming majority of 391 to 26; with all the Democrats and most of the Republicans voting in its favour and only 26 Republicans voting against.

"The United States has never accepted that Tibet was part of China since ancient times as the CCP falsely claims," McCaul, who was one of the movers of the Bill, said. "This legislation clarified U.S. policy and highlights the unique language, religion and culture of the Tibetan people. It directs U.S. diplomacy to push back against Chinese propaganda, ensures Tibetans have a say in their own future and stresses on the need for dialogue between the CCP and other democratically elected leaders of Tibet. Any resolution must include the wishes and voices of the Tibetan people."

The motion adopted in the Canadian House of Commons has opposed China's systematic cultural assimilation of Tibetans and affirmed the rights of Tibetan people to freely choose their economic, social, cultural and religious policies without interference from external powers; including the selection of the reincarnation of the 14th Dalai Lama. The text of the motion in the Canadian House asserts that "China is carrying out a policy of systematic cultural assimilation against Tibetans," that "Tibetans, as a people and a nation, can claim the right to self-determination, they are empowered to freely choose their economic, social, cultural and religious policies without interference from any external power" and that "this empowerment prohibits China from interfering in the choice of the next Tibetan spiritual leader, the eventual successor of the 14th Dalai Lama."

Thus the Canadian resolution is in tune with the present stand of the Dalai Lama of real autonomy for the Tibetan people; though the assertion of the right to self-determination implies political freedom as well. In this context, the meeting between Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi and the delegation of the U.S. lawmakers carries a significant message of Indian support for the cause of the Tibetan people, say observers.

Indian support is most important for the world to advance the cause of the Tibetan people; India being the closest neighbour of Tibet and offering shelter to the largest number of Tibetan refugees in the world; nearly 100,000 of them. The Dalai Lama has been a guest of honour of India since 1959, with 'head of the state' status.

A strategic partnership between the U.S. and India is important to defeat the Chinese designs in the Tibet plateau, they say. "Together we can send a powerful message of deterrence to the Chinese Communist Party because when the world's two largest democracies stand together, freedom and liberty win over tyranny and oppression," McCaul said in a statement after the meeting.

Cyberthreats sponsored by Chinese Communist Party

24 June 2024, The Washington Times, Sen. Marsha Blackburn and Rep. Bob Latta

Tens of millions of families and small businesses across the country use wireless routers as their primary access point to the internet. Many of these routers are susceptible to infiltration by foreign actors, including China, jeopardizing our national security and exposing our country to serious danger. Just last year, U.S. and Japanese officials revealed that BlackTech, a hacker group connected to the Chinese Communist Party, targeted routers at government agencies and corporations in the two countries to steal intellectual property, including from the defense, technology and electronics sectors.

In January, the Justice Department also reported that Chinese-sponsored hackers infected routers in the U.S. with malware to target critical water, energy and transportation infrastructure – an attack that FBI Director Christopher Wray called a “pre-positioning to cause real-world harm to American citizens and communities in the event of conflict” between America and China.

The threat of cyberattacks is even greater with routers developed by Chinese companies. Because of strict laws in China that require companies to collaborate with the Communist Party, including by sharing users’ sensitive data, Chinese-developed routers are especially vulnerable to infiltration by state-backed hackers. This past January, China-linked hackers in Europe targeted home routers developed by the Chinese company TP-Link, whose products U.S. cybersecurity experts have repeatedly warned are susceptible to cyberattacks.

Despite these vulnerabilities, several federal agencies, including the Defense Department, have purchased TP-Link routers.

After years of complacency in Washington about China’s threat to our nation’s information networks, the Trump administration and Congress took bold action in 2020 to protect the American people with the passage of the Secure and Trusted Communications Networks Act.

As a result of this crucial legislation, the Federal Communications Commission ultimately banned the sale and import of equipment from Chinese-owned telecommunications companies such as Huawei and ZTE, which U.S. law enforcement and intelligence agencies deem national security threats. As we speak, U.S. companies continue to rip and replace Chinese-made software and communications equipment.

While these efforts delivered real results to protect Americans, our nation continues to face threats of Chinese espionage and cyberattacks – and there are few larger potential vulnerabilities, if exploited, than wireless routers.

Make no mistake: Wireless routers with security vulnerabilities, especially those developed by Chinese companies, threaten the safety of every American.

Thankfully, momentum is growing in Congress to address this issue.

As the ranking member on the Senate Subcommittee on Consumer Protection, Product Safety and Data Security and the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Communications and Technology, we are spearheading the bipartisan Removing Our Unsecure Technologies to Ensure Reliability and Security Act, known as the ROUTERS Act.

This crucial legislation would require the Commerce Department to review the national security threat posed by any router that is designed, developed, manufactured or supplied by a company under the jurisdiction of China, as well as U.S. adversaries Russia, Iran, North Korea, Cuba and Venezuela.

Depending on the study’s outcome, Congress could take further action to require the Commerce Department to designate dangerous routers as national security threats, allowing the FCC to halt their sale in America under the Trump-era Secure and Trusted Communications Networks Act.

Given the grave threats to our national security, it should be no surprise that the House Energy and Commerce Committee recently approved the ROUTERS Act in a unanimous and bipartisan 43-0 vote.

As China works to undermine U.S. global leadership, it is essential that we protect our intellectual property, critical infrastructure and American citizens from the Chinese Communist Party’s malicious cyberattacks. With the ROUTERS Act, Congress has an incredible opportunity to help make that happen.

China must not choose the next Dalai Lama

24 June 2024, The Japan Times, Brahma Chellaney

The U.S. and India should stop Beijing from hijacking the selection

As the Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibet, visits the United States to receive medical treatment on his knees, concerns over who will succeed him have become acute. While Tibetans around the world pray that the 88-year-old Tenzin Gyatso, the 14th Dalai Lama, still has plenty of life ahead of him, China is eagerly awaiting his demise so that it can install a puppet successor.

Tibetans regard the Dalai Lama as the living incarnation of Buddha, with a total of 13 reincarnations since 1391. When one Dalai Lama dies, the search for the next one begins, with a council of senior disciples taking responsibility for identifying the figure based on signs and visions. But in recent years, the Chinese government has insisted that only it has the right to identify the next Dalai Lama.

This would not be the first time China selected a leader of Tibetan Buddhism. In 1995, it anointed its own Panchen Lama, whose spiritual authority is second only to that of the Dalai Lama, after abducting the actual Panchen Lama – a 6-year-old boy who had already been confirmed by the Dalai Lama. Almost three decades later, the real Panchen Lama is among the world’s longest-serving political prisoners.

China also appointed the Karmapa, Tibetan Buddhism’s third most important spiritual leader and the head of the Karma Kagyu sect. But in 1999, its appointee, Ogyen Trinley Dorje, fled to India. The ease with which the 14-year-old Karmapa escaped China raised suspicions among Indians about his loyalties.

After imposing travel restrictions on him, India decided in 2018 to no longer recognize the China-anointed Karmapa as the legitimate head of his sect. Now, he and his rival Karmapa, Trinley Thaye Dorje, have issued a joint statement pledging to cooperatively resolve the leadership split in the Karma Kagyu sect.

But the Dalai Lama is China's white whale. The incumbent — who was identified as the Dalai Lama in 1937, at age 2 — has been a thorn in the side of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) since Beijing's 1951 annexation of Tibet. With his relentless espousal of nonviolence, the Dalai Lama, who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989, embodies Tibetan resistance to the Chinese occupation. (Had Tibet remained self-governing like Taiwan, it would be the world's tenth-largest country by area.)

In his past incarnations, the Dalai Lama was not only Tibet's spiritual leader, but also its political leader, making him a kind of cross between a pope and a president. But the Dalai Lama ceded his political role in 2011 to a Tibetan government-in-exile, which is democratically elected every five years by Tibetan refugees living in India and elsewhere.

Moreover, the Dalai Lama has declared that he might choose not to be reborn — a decision that would undermine the legitimacy of any Chinese-anointed successor. He knows that, for China, a Dalai Lama devoted to the CCP is much more useful than no Dalai Lama at all. He also knows that, while he has retained his mental acuity, his body is weakening. In 2016, he underwent radiation therapy for prostate cancer. He says he was "completely cured," but continues to struggle with his knees. Given his advanced age, more health problems are to be expected.

The Dalai Lama's frailty is one reason why his travel schedule has slowed considerably. But it is not the only one: Bowing to Chinese pressure, most countries — including European democracies and Asia's Buddhist states (except Japan) — are unwilling to grant him entry.

Fortunately, some countries have retained their backbones. The U.S. is hosting the Dalai Lama for knee treatment and India has been his home for more than 65 years. India has officially designated the Dalai Lama its "most esteemed and honored guest," while the Tibetan leader describes himself as a "son of India."

In fact, India is home to the vast majority of Tibetan exiles and has played a central role in helping to preserve Tibetan culture, including by supporting Tibetan-language schools. By contrast, China has been working actively to destroy Tibetan culture and identity, especially since Chinese leader Xi Jinping has been in charge.

Meanwhile, China's appropriation of Tibetan natural resources has gone into overdrive, with consequences that extend far beyond the Tibetan Plateau. Resource-rich Tibet is a source of fresh water for more than one-fifth of the world's population and a global biodiversity hotspot. The plateau influences Asia's weather and monsoonal patterns, as well as the Northern Hemisphere's "atmospheric general circulation" — the system of winds that helps transport warm air from the equator toward higher latitudes, creating different climate zones.

It is imperative that the U.S. and India work together to foil China's plan to handpick the next Dalai Lama. Already, America's Tibetan Policy and Support Act, which took effect in 2020, says that "the wishes of the 14th Dalai Lama, including any written instructions, should play a determinative role in the selection, education, and veneration of a future 15th Dalai Lama." And it calls for sanctions on Chinese officials who interfere with Tibetan Buddhist succession practices.

But more must be done. For starters, U.S. President Joe Biden should take the opportunity presented by the Dalai Lama's knee treatment to fulfill a 2020 campaign promise to meet with the spiritual leader. More broadly, Washington should work together with India to devise a multilateral strategy to counter Xi's plan to capture the more than 600-year-old institution of the Dalai Lama.

This must include efforts to persuade the Dalai Lama to spell out, once and for all, the rules that must be followed to identify his successor.

Chinese military developments and national security challenges for India

23 June 2024, Financial Express, Bhartendu Kumar Singh

The LAC that was 'relatively peaceful' until a decade ago, has metamorphosed into an active front with looming war threats.

A major national security challenge that the government would face in this tenure is the momentous developments in Chinese military preparedness affecting the Line of Actual Control (LAC) and the Indo-Pacific area. While China's military modernisation has been an ongoing process for the last few decades (and so has been India's defensive response), its pace has accelerated in recent times. The LAC that was 'relatively peaceful' until a decade ago, has metamorphosed into an active front with looming war threats. Unless deftly handled, the bilateral military power balance would soon become too asymmetrical and may critically imperil the LAC sanctity.

Much of the current modernisation goals for the PLA were finalised in the 20th Party Congress of the Chinese Communist Party in October 2022. The military dimension of the Report to the Congress focused on 'intensifying and accelerating the PLA's modernisation goals'. Accordingly, by 2027, the Chinese Peoples' Liberation Army (PLA) is to aim towards finishing its first phase of modernisation process. This is the time when the PLA would have completed 100 years of its foundation. The second phase of military modernisation would complete by 2035. By 2049, China aims to metamorphose its PLA into a world-class armed force capable of out rightly taking on the US military muscle in the Indo-Pacific region.

Even while 2027 is still a couple of years ahead, we can already see many visible and demonstrative changes in countless aspects of the PLA's force modernisation. For instance, China has successfully completed the reorganisation of its PLA into integrated theater commands since 2016 and is running with an eight-year advantage. The Western Theater Command, headquartered at Chengdu, has been quite active through construction of roads, rails and new settlement colonies near the LAC. One only has to visit the Chinese Ministry of Defence website to get a first-hand glimpse of the day-to-day developments on military logistics and advancements, whether in Western Theater Command or elsewhere. While there are many sources of information on Chinese military developments, probably the most accurate reporting about Chinese military developments on an updated basis is published by the US Department of Defence. Called the Annual Report to the Congress on 'Military and security developments involving the People's Republic of China', the 2023 version brings out some major policy and logistics developments related to the PLA not covered succinctly elsewhere. For example, the report adequately exposes the offensive aspects of China's so-called 'active defence' policy. Similarly, since 2022, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) appears to have been increasingly using the term 'integrated national strategic systems and capabilities'. On the weapons front, China has moved quite ahead with deployment of hypersonic weapons. By 2027, China would have achieved substantial progress in the field of mechanisation, informatisation, and intelligentisation of its armed forces. China is also making commendable progress in many other areas that are going to affect its military modernization in the coming days. For instance, the Chinese realise that military innovation is the key to maintain an edge in military modernisation and dominate neighbouring rivals.

President Xi Jinping has launched an innovation-driven defence development strategy (IDDS). China is resorting less to 'reverse engineering' of foreign weapons as was the case in the past and has invested heavily in high tech weapons. Techno-nationalism has played a key role in the expansion and consolidation of its domestic military industrial complex (MIC). Similarly, China's progress in artificial intelligence and robotics is much better than many countries. It is gainfully deploying robots in mundane soldiering duties and counter-terrorism operations.

Apart from the conventional build-up of forces, China has also resorted to, in recent times, what Fiona S Cunningham of University of Pennsylvania calls as 'strategic substitution'. China is using information-age weapons such as cyber operations to enhance its strategic leverage and coercive powers. While China is using this as 'an increasingly capable instrument of state craft' against the US, India is not immune to Chinese subtle adventures. For example, it is said that Chinese cyber-attacks were behind the Mumbai power grid failure of March 2021. In February 2024, the Washington Post reported that Chinese intelligence and cyber-surveillance accessed 95.2 gigabytes of Indian immigration data. These are just representative examples. The actual quantum of attacks from the Chinese cyber hackers spans across different sectors, including financial markets.

In the coming days, the LAC itself would witness increased activities on the Chinese side. The Chinese PLA may increase the frequency and intensity of coercive and risky operations near the LAC. There could be more military exercises and force mobilisation in a teasing manner. Concurrently, China would try to wean away Bhutan through border agreement without involving India. It would also bring Nepal closer through project finalisation and financing of railways extension from the Tibet side to Kathmandu. Finally, we may see more espionage activities from the Chinese side into Indian territories!

The LAC would, therefore, remain an area of utmost national security concern to India. Unfortunately, strategic experts and military planners in India remain caught in a binary about national security challenges emanating from China. Against the long, real and perpetuating threat from the Chinese aggressive posturing on the LAC, we are often told about a larger threat emanating from China's increasing footsteps in the Bay of Bengal and the wider Indian Ocean region. While there is no doubt that the Chinese are making increasing maritime forays near India's southern waters, we are perhaps making the mistake of treating both the threats on the same level-playing platform. Outright confrontation with China on the oceanic front will only mean more diversion of scarce defence logistics and resources. Fortunately, at the policy level, India's defensive preparations against Chinese military development near the LAC has been calibrated, thoughtful and on the right trajectory. The border infrastructure has improved with new roads and more are in offing! Realising that technology is the key to rise in great power status along with robust defence preparedness, India has been investing in military technology and innovation. However, getting inputs about China's military developments from western sources may not sub-serve our knowledge requirements. The focus of the Pentagon annual report on Chinese military developments, for example, is on the PLA's force mobilisation along the Taiwan Straits. These reports do not focus on LAC and touch them only tangentially. Thus, we may be certainly missing out on many important military developments across the LAC.

Tibet is back on the table

23 June 2024, The New Indian Express, TK Vineeth

The Tibet issue was back in the headlines after the US Congress passed a bill that supports the Tibetan cause. The legislation, which calls for Beijing's re-engagement with Tibet's spiritual leader Dalai Lama to address the concerns of Tibetans, also authorises use of funds to counter China's 'disinformation campaign' on issues related to Tibet such as the region's history, demography, culture and customs, and high institutions including that of the Dalai Lama. The bipartisan bill, passed by the Congress early this month, is now on US President Joe Biden's table awaiting his signature to ratify it into law.

What's in the bill

The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, also known as the Resolve Tibet Act, is the third such piece of legislation on Tibet passed by the US Congress after the Tibetan Policy Act (TPA) of 2002, and the Tibetan Policy & Support Act (TPSA) of 2020. It unambiguously questions China's territorial claims over Tibet and seeks to redress the region's unresolved status. It notes that talks between Beijing and the Dalai Lama have been stalled since 2010 after the Chinese side imposed unreasonable conditions.

In its talks with China between 2002 and 2010, the Tibetan side only sought genuine autonomy in line with the middle path approached proposed by the Dalai Lama. However, the talks never reached their logical conclusion as China was not ready to give up its tight grip over the annexed region.

What sets the latest US legislation apart is that it underlines Tibetans' right to 'self determination' and identifies the large swathes of geographical areas that were historically part of Tibet but were cut into pieces and merged with neighbouring Chinese provinces such as Sichuan and Yunnan after China's military invasion of the plateau in 1950. New Chinese provinces such as Qinghai were also created with the bulk of Tibet's land. Recognising the historical geography of Tibet is the most notable feature of the new bill as it precisely identifies the Chinese designs to disfigure the historical Tibet and seeks to highlight that by referring to the original geography of the region.

US paradigm shift

The US has for decades turned a blind on the Tibet issue so as not to offend China. The TPA of 2002, for example, termed Tibet a part of China. "The United States recognizes the Tibet Autonomous Region – hereinafter referred to as "Tibet" – to be part of the People's Republic of China. This long-standing policy is consistent with the view of the international community... Because we do not recognize Tibet as an independent state, the United States does not conduct official diplomatic relations with the Tibetan 'government-in-exile' in Dharamsala," the Act said. The ruse for this line was that the Dalai Lama wanted greater autonomy for Tibetans and not independence for Tibet. The bill didn't go beyond requesting China to have talks with the Tibetan side and listen to their concerns.

But with the dramatic shift in geopolitical dynamics, Washington woke up to the potential of the Tibet issue to keep an aggressive China on the defensive. The TPSA of 2020 authorised funds for NGOs working to help the Tibetan communities. More importantly, it sought a US consulate in Tibetan capital Lhasa. "The Department of State may not authorize any new Chinese consulates in the United States until a U.S. consulate has been established in Lhasa, Tibet," it said.

The bill also underscored Tibetans' right to select and venerate their own religious leaders. This was in response to China's diktat that the next Dalai Lama can't be chosen without its permission. With this, the TPSA opened the doors for the US to issue economic and visa sanctions against any Chinese officials who interfere with the succession of the Dalai Lama.

The 2024 bill is much stronger in terms of what it seeks to achieve. It calls for establishing a statutory definition of Tibet and clearly states that it will include areas in Chinese provinces outside the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) – a limited area which China established in 1965 to be treated as Tibet. "This bill defines Tibet to include the TAR and the Tibetan areas of the Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan provinces," it says. The bill also states that it is US policy that the conflict between Tibet and China is unresolved and that Tibet's legal status remains to be determined in accordance with international law.

To drive home the point, a bipartisan US Congressional delegation visited Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama at Dharamsala in Himachal Pradesh last week and pledged support to the Tibetan cause. This is a huge departure from the 2002 legislation that said the US won't interact with the Tibetan government-in-exile.

During the visit, the US team, headed by House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul and including former US House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Paul, said China's claims over Tibet are untenable. To the chagrin of Beijing, both McCaul and Pelosi stated that Biden would soon sign the Resolve Tibet Act.

China's hard stand

China claims Tibet has been its part since ancient times, a proposition that doesn't have many takers. It invaded the plateau in 1950 with military power and formalised the annexation through an agreement signed between Lhasa and Beijing on May 23, 1951 under duress. According to L L Mehrotra, former secretary, Ministry of External Affairs, the Dalai Lama himself came to know of it four days after it was 'signed' when Radio Peking broadcast it on May 27, 1951. They did not even know its contents until then. "With PLA guns pointed at the Tibetans in Lhasa, an agreement was imposed on them on May 23, 1951—the infamous 17 Point Agreement under which the Tibetans were made to accept Tibet as a region of China and not only Chinese suzerainty over it but absolute control," Mehrotra says in his book 'India's Tibet Policy – An appraisal and options'.

China's stand on Tibet has only hardened over time. Earlier this year, Beijing said it could hold talks with the representatives of the Dalai Lama but not of the 'illegitimate' Tibetan government-in-exile based in India. However, the offer for talks was a non-starter because China outright ruled out any dialogue on the Dalai Lama's main demand – autonomy for Tibet. Beijing treats the Dalai Lama as a separatist, though the spiritual leader has clarified that his objective is not to seek political independence but autonomy and freedom in religious affairs that lie at the core of Tibet's identity.

Last week's US delegation visit to Dharamsala and the new legislation on Tibet evoked angry reaction from Beijing, which is nervous about rising international attention. Warning Biden against signing the latest piece of legislation, Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Lin Jian said it would provoke counter measures.

India's nuanced position

For India, Tibet is a sensitive issue as it has to balance its delicate relationship with China with which it has long-pending border disputes. India welcomed the Dalai Lama and a sizable Tibetan refugee population with open arms in 1959 when they fled their homeland after a failed uprising against China. While India has historically supported the Tibetan cause, New Delhi's official position since Jawaharlal Nehru's time has been to accept Tibet as part of China.

India first accepted Tibet as a Chinese region in April 1954 when then PM Nehru signed the Panchsheel agreement with Chinese premier Zhou Enlai. The stand was further confirmed in December 1988 when then prime minister Rajiv Gandhi visited China and "reiterated that Tibet is an autonomous region of China". He also gave an undertaking to the Chinese that Tibetan refugees in India would not be allowed to "engage in political activities against China".

The Chinese got India to reinforce the two points again in June 2003 during the then PM Atal Bihari Vajpayee's Beijing trip. In what was seen as an oversight by the Indian side, Vajpayee's joint statement with the then Chinese premier Wen Jiabao used the legal term 'recognize' to describe India's position on Tibet.

"The Indian side recognizes that the Tibet Autonomous Region is part of the territory of the People's Republic of China and reiterates that it does not allow Tibetans to engage in anti-China political activities in India," the joint statement read. China used this statement to claim Tibet is a done deal.

While India hasn't sought to reverse its policy, New Delhi seems to have relaxed the curbs on the freedom of expression of Tibetans in India. When Chinese President Xi Jinping visited India in September 2014 to meet PM Narendra Modi, the Indian government allowed Tibetan exiles to stage protests on New Delhi's streets. Some activists even managed to make it to the vicinity of the summit site, sending alarm bells in Beijing.

A settlement in favour of the people of Tibet could work in India's favour as it will negate China's outlandish claims on Arunachal Pradesh, which Beijing refers to as South Tibet. It may also address China's disregard for the McMahon Line, the boundary between Tibet and India settled as part of the Simla Accord of 1914 signed by British India, Tibet and China, to some extent.

There are concerns if India openly supports the 'Free Tibet' movement, China can raise the Kashmir issue. In that sense, the American move on Tibet puts India in an unenviable position.

Lack of education helps Xi to stay in power

23 June 2024, The Sunday Guardian, Wang dan

When Xi Jinping visited France, he again made a book list. He gave a bunch of books to French President and Mrs Macron, including Chinese translations of French authors such as Flaubert's Madame Bovary, Alexandre Dumas' The Three

Musketeers and The Lady of the Camellias, Victor Hugo's Ninety Three, Stendhal's The Red and the Black, Honoré de Balzac's Le Père Goriot etc. This is of course a way to bring the two countries closer together, and also shows Xi's love and understanding of French culture. Mrs Peng Liyuan, the wife of Xi Jinping, also said during the trip that she and Xi Jinping "read these books when we were young." When he was young Xi Jinping was sent to the countryside for labour reform during the Cultural Revolution (1966-1976), and he was a member of the "five black categories"—Chairman Mao's political classifications during the Cultural Revolution that ordained people in these groups class enemies: Landlords, Rich Farmers, Counter-revolutionaries, Bad Elements and Rightists. It is doubtful whether he had the time and energy to read so many masterpieces of world literature when he had to "carry 100 kilograms of wheat on his shoulders and walk 10 kilometers up the mountain," but we do not have any evidence to say that he did not, so let us leave it open to doubt for the moment. However, it is a fact that after he came to power, he liked to draw up book lists and talk about his extensive knowledge of books. I am also a reader, and I believe that most people in the world who like to read agree with my judgment: those who really like to read do not go around making lists of books and bragging to others about how many books they have read. If this is really the case, then the books have actually been read in vain. Therefore, those who go around making out book lists to show that they are knowledgeable are usually those who are less knowledgeable or even uneducated. The conclusion is: Xi Jinping is in fact a "poorly educated" person. I do not mean to look down on those who are less educated. My point is that being less educated is one of the reasons why Xi Jinping was chosen to be the successor of the ruling group of the Communist Party of China. I am afraid that outsiders do not quite understand this point, or they may find it inconceivable. But if you know the history of the Communist Party, you will know that this is a fact. Chen Boda was Mao Zedong's wordsmith, and the theoretical authority of the Communist Party of China, and his understanding of Mao Zedong was unrivaled in the Party. His son, Chen Xiaonong, published a book entitled "Chen Boda's Last Oral Memories" in Hong Kong in 2005, in which it was mentioned that Mao Zedong had made an internal speech about his successor before the outbreak of the Cultural Revolution, and when it came to the criteria for selecting his successor, he explicitly said, "He should be young, less educated, and politically conservative" (page 264). Of course, it is understandable that they should be young and politically conservative: the successor cannot be someone who is old and does not stand up for the prevailing interests of the Communist Party. But the criterion of "someone who is less educated" is quite intriguing.

The reason he emphasized the need to be "less educated" illustrates his mistrust of and vigilance against "the educated." An educated person usually has the ability to think independently. Such an "educated person" may not only break the monopoly of totalitarian ideology, but also challenge official public opinions and propaganda, and it is certainly not an insurance policy for an authoritarian regime to have such a person as the successor to Communist Party leadership. It cannot be denied that Mao Zedong, who read omnivorously on the ancient art of emperors and kings, had his own unique way of selecting his successor.

The successors that Mao Zedong began to painstakingly groom after overthrowing his first chosen successors Liu Shaoqi, Lin Biao and other founding fathers, be it Wang Hongwen, who was directly promoted from factory worker to vice-chairman of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, or Hua Guofeng, who was a mediocre and incompetent hack, all on close examination fit the characteristics of "young age, little education and politically conservative." The Communist Party superficially summed up the lessons of the Cultural Revolution, but at heart it still adheres to Mao Zedong's way of doing things. Chairman Mao's long-time secretary Li Rui once said, "the Chairman Mao problem remains unchanged."

Deng Xiaoping's chosen successors, Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang, had some education, or at least had a lot of "educated" people around them, but they were all overthrown in the end. Jiang Zemin, although he likes to show off his knowledge of foreign languages and arts and culture, is far from being "educated." And Hu Jintao is famously uneducated, and reportedly only has story books from the former Soviet Union on his bookshelf. Obviously, although Mao Zedong is no longer with us, it is still a tradition within the Chinese Communist Party to make "little education" one of the criteria for selecting a successor. The reasoning behind this continuity is the same as that of Chairman Mao's thinking, that an educated person is not so reliable. Let us take a look at Xi Jinping. When he was selected as successor, did he fulfill the criteria of "young age, little education, and politically conservative"? All of them! Obviously, Xi Jinping was able to rise to the top and maintain his power until today because he truly meets the criteria set by Mao Zedong for the Communist Party's successor. The legitimacy of his rule within the Communist Party derives from this.

It is only with this understanding that we can see why Xi Jinping, with such a low level of knowledge and education, can sit firmly on the throne as the highest leader. Only by truly understanding the past history of the Chinese Communist Party can we understand the reality of the Communist Party today.

Effects Of Indo-China Political Tension In Global Framework – OpEd

23 June 2024, Eurasia Review, Ambassador Kazi Anwarul Masud

Mayuri Banerjee a Research Analyst with the East Asia Centre at the Manohar Parrikar Institute for Defense Studies and Analyses (MP-IDSA), New Delhi. Her research focus is on India-China relations. She primarily looks at the role of memory and trust in India-China relations after the 1962 war and Indian media's perception of China. In an article she traced the history of the Sino-Indian border dispute has a long and complex history. If one were to look for some key points one could mention: Aksai Chin: One of the disputed territories is Aksai Chin, which is administered by China but claimed by India. It lies at the intersection of Kashmir, Tibet, and Xinjiang. Aksai Chin is mostly uninhabited high-altitude wasteland, but it has significant pasture lands at the margins. McMahon Line: The other disputed territory is south of the McMahon Line, in an area formerly known as the North-East Frontier Agency (now Arunachal Pradesh). The McMahon Line was signed between British India and Tibet as part of the 1914 Simla Convention, but China disowns this agreement, stating that Tibet was not independent when it signed the Simla Convention.

1962 Sino-Indian War: The conflict escalated in 1962 when Chinese troops attacked Indian border posts in Ladakh in the west and crossed the McMahon Line in the east. The war resulted in significant casualties. There were border clashes in 1967 in the region of Sikkim, despite an agreed border. In 1987 and 2013, potential conflicts over the Line of Actual Control (LAC) were successfully de-escalated. Recent Tensions: Multiple skirmishes broke out in 2020, leading to dozens of deaths in June. Agreements signed in 1993 and 1996 aimed to address the boundary question, including confidence-building measures and defining the LAC. Various dispute resolutions have been established over the years. In summary, the India-China border dispute remains ongoing, with historical roots and periodic tensions. Diplomatic efforts continue to find a resolution to this complex issue. Assessing the success of Border Dispute Management Talks and Confidence-Building Measures. The success of the bilateral dialogue mechanisms and confidence-building measures described above needs to be assessed according to three aspects; management of border conflict, addressing the bilateral trust deficit, and resolution of the border dispute. A cursory review of the state of affairs indicates that, in all three aspects, both countries have achieved minimal success. For instance, in the matter of border conflict management, the maintenance of peace and tranquility along the LAC has been one of the most important stated objectives. Although China and India have been able to avert a major 1962-style confrontation, the number of military incursions by China has risen sharply, from 334 in 2014 to 606 in 2019.

The Galwan Valley military standoff led to severe military clashes; and the stalemate continues. Simultaneously, local feuds between the armies have inclined toward more violence, that is from fist fights and throwing stones, the armies of the two sides have resorted to more violent measures including the use of clubs studded with nails or wrapped with metal barbed wire. These instances point toward a lack of local-level communication and understanding, which persists amid the backdrop of diplomatic proclamations of friendship and cooperation. Likewise, despite high level political and diplomatic exchanges and frequent meetings of the top leadership, the trust deficit between the two countries has only widened. There exists the perception of a considerable security threat on both sides as India and China have moved rapidly to upgrade their border infrastructure and military capabilities along the disputed border on the sidelines of the Special Representative Talks and Joint Working Group meetings. In recent years, a vigorous border infrastructure race has developed between the two countries, wherein both sides have engaged in building extensive road and railway connections on their respective sides of the border, upgrading military facilities, and increasing overall troop deployments for quick mobilization. This in turn has aggravated insecurities in both countries and is considered one of the primary reasons for the frequent border skirmishes along the LAC. In particular, the Doklam (2017) and Galwan Valley (2020) clashes were triggered by road-building activities undertaken by China and India, respectively. Apart from upgrading military infrastructure along the border, both sides have also invested heavily in modernizing their conventional and non-conventional combat forces as an indication of battle preparedness to the other. In view of increasing military capabilities, assertive behavior and intense distrust, the notion of peace along the LAC seems dependent on the political wisdom of their respective governments. Even after fifteen rounds of Joint Working Group meetings and eighteen rounds of Special Representative Dialogues, the border dispute is far from being resolved. Even though the negotiation process follows a generous principle of package settlement through a sectoral approach, the two countries have failed to go beyond routine delegation meetings and joint declarations.

The ascent to power of Xi Jinping in China and Narendra Modi in India, known for their strong leadership and corporate style of politics, had raised hopes for a final settlement of the border dispute, but domestic political considerations and strategic threat perceptions continue to severely constrain the ability of these political leaders to undertake sweeping decisions to resolve the dispute. The border dispute undeniably remains one of the major issues impinging on Sino-Indian bilateral ties. Experts contend that there are multiple factors today which sustain the border dispute. The first is the geographical constitution of the disputed areas: The rugged, featureless terrain and extreme weather conditions make determination of the precise alignment challenging. Subsequently, implementation of border agreements on the ground also remains elusive. Second, there is asymmetry in the level of urgency for the settlement of the border dispute. In contrast to New Delhi's endeavors seeking a quick settlement, Beijing has staunchly resisted any fast-tracking of the resolution process, arguing that the border dispute is a complicated question and should be negotiated only when conditions are favorable.

The primary reason for this difference in approaches is that the disputed border does not pose a security threat to China, and therefore Beijing is willing to wait for a more beneficial resolution. In contrast, New Delhi sees the border dispute as source of instability and worries and that China would use the unresolved border to bully India. The third factor inhibiting the resolution of the border dispute is intense nationalism in both countries. For China, the border dispute is intrinsically linked to Tibet and the Dalai Lama, and since the CCP has always projected the Tibetan government-in-exile in a negative light, territorial concessions involving Tawang will not only endanger China's own rule in Tibet but will also be seen domestically as sign of weakness; a terrifying prospect for the Chinese leadership. As for India, no political party would be able to propose a territorial exchange with China without seriously jeopardizing its electoral prospects, as the memories of 1962 war continue to haunt the Indian national psyche. Lastly, along with the boundary dispute, new issues have begun to stir trouble in Sino-Indian bilateral ties. India's concerns regarding China's diversion of the Yarlung-Tsangpo/Brahmaputra river water, the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, and China's growing influence in South Asia have emerged as new irritants for Indian policy makers.

Similarly, Beijing too is annoyed by India's increasing proximity with Southeast Asian countries and its diplomatic-military exchanges with the United States, Japan, and Australia. These issues further erode political will in both countries and in this context territorial exchange by swap or political settlement appears a daunting task. As evinced by the recent Galwan Valley clashes, managing the border dispute is both a political and an economic exigency for India and China because any major confrontation between the two countries will not only hurt the long-term prospects for development of both, but will also have significant repercussions on Asian stability and prosperity. Therefore, the policy-making elites of both countries need to frame innovative solutions like creating soft borders through civilian, cultural, and economic exchanges, and involving local communities in managing the border. Such an approach can help reduce the number of military encounters between the two countries and create an enduring peace in the border region.

The two countries should also aim toward building strategic trust through open dialogue, exchange of information, and verification mechanisms along the disputed border. Enhancing military-to-military communication, technological collaboration and engagement on multilateral platforms remain indispensable toward building trust. Public perception is another key area that needs to be urgently addressed through civilian exchanges. This would go a long way toward dispelling stereotypes and negative perceptions. Track-II dialogue involving strategic-affairs experts and academics from the two countries could also be organized to identify new areas for cooperation. For the foreseeable future, the border dispute will remain a pressing challenge in Sino-Indian ties, however, it is in the national interest of both countries to prioritize their larger bilateral relationship, while at the same time erecting confidence-building measures and dialogue mechanisms to better preserve the benefits accruing from the relationship. The border dispute undeniably remains one of the major issues impinging on Sino-Indian bilateral ties.

Experts contend that there are multiple factors today which sustain the border dispute. The first is the geographical constitution of the disputed areas: The rugged, featureless terrain and extreme weather conditions make determination of the precise alignment challenging. Subsequently, implementation of border agreements on the ground also remains elusive. Second, there is asymmetry in the level of urgency for the settlement of the border dispute. In contrast to New Delhi's endeavors seeking a quick settlement, Beijing has staunchly resisted any fast-tracking of the resolution process, arguing that the border dispute is a complicated question and should be negotiated only when conditions are favorable. The primary reason for this difference in approaches is that the disputed border does not pose a security threat to China, and therefore Beijing is willing to wait for a more beneficial resolution. India's concerns regarding China's diversion of the Yarlung-Tsangpo/Brahmaputra river water, the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor, and China's growing influence in South Asia have emerged as new irritants for Indian policy makers. Similarly, Beijing too is annoyed by India's increasing proximity with Southeast Asian countries and its diplomatic-military exchanges with the United States, Japan, and Australia.

The famous newspaper The Diplomat in a report on the US containment of the Sino-Indian relations has reported that The United States and India have just completed a ministerial dialogue between the U.S. secretaries of state and defense, Antony Blinken and Lloyd Austin, and their Indian counterparts, Minister of External Affairs Dr. Subrahmanyam Jaishankar and Minister of Defense Rajnath Singh. This "2+2 Dialogue" was preceded by a video conference between U.S. President Joe Biden and Prime Minister Narendra Modi, and both leaders said they looked forward to meeting again shortly in Tokyo. Although the "2+2" was nominally focused on international security and was the first to occur since the Russian invasion of Ukraine, the world's two largest democracies paid relatively little attention to the largest international assault on democratic values since World War II and what Russia's assault means for international peace and security. In a Joint Statement remarkable for its 13-page length and the breadth of its coverage, only a short paragraph dealt with the situation in Ukraine. There was mention of a humanitarian crisis, a condemnation of civilian deaths, a call for the cessation of hostilities, and lip service to the principles of the United Nations Charter, but nothing more.

India's hesitancy to work as a full partner of the U.S. in furthering international peace and security on the basis of India's own democratic values when it comes to Russia and Ukraine. This hesitancy can be more fully understood by examining Jaishankar's framework for U.S.-India relations. Jaishankar's views are of tremendous importance to the Modi government and to Modi himself. Not only has Jaishankar been the minister of external affairs since the start of Modi's second term, but he became foreign secretary soon after Modi began his first term as prime minister, an office to which Modi arose without extensive experience in international security matters. A thumbnail and easily accessible statement of Jaishankar's international framework can be found in his talk to the Atlantic Council on October 1, 2019. This framework is important not only because of the office held by Jaishankar, but also because it is largely a distillation of the views of many Indians, particularly those of India's traditional academic and governmental elites. Jaishankar holds a Ph.D. from Jawaharlal Nehru University and is personally and professionally connected to prominent Indian governmental circles. The Jaishankar doctrine is grounded firmly in history and in two analytic divides: East vs. West and India's political vs. non-political interests. As expressed in the Atlantic Council talk, the bedrock of his East vs. West analysis is "two centuries of national humiliation" during which "the West" extracted some "$45 trillion" in value from India (as well as subjecting China to a single century of national humiliation). In this formulation, the U.S. is definitely a part of "the West" and India a part of the "the East." Thus, the U.S. presumably bears some responsibility for the two centuries of national humiliation experienced by India at the hands of the British Empire. This analysis leaves aside the fact that the U.S., like India, was a colony of the British Empire and fought two wars against the British for its independence. It had nothing to do with the "$45 trillion" extracted by the British Empire from India, and yet this Indian colonial experience is somehow relevant to U.S.-India relations.

Unspoken is the concept that Russia and the Soviet Union were not and are not now part of "the West," but, like India, are part of "the East" and outside any responsibility for India's historic "two centuries of national humiliation." Make no mistake that Jaishankar's concept of "the West" is now centered on the United States. This concept evidently derives from U.S. leadership of a network of treaty obligations that were designed to constrain the Soviet Union and international communism. At one point in his talk, Jaishankar references Japan and South Korea, and even all the OECD countries, as part of "the West." In this analysis, "the West" has become not a geographic designation but a political concept apparently growing out of the Cold War. Again, India is not a part of "the West." Adding to the historic estrangement caused by colonialism, the U.S., as the leader of "the West," has imposed on India a "Goldilocks" policy of both supporting India and suppressing India. According to Jaishankar, this is to ensure that India is neither too weak nor too strong but, like the porridge in the Goldilocks story, somewhere in between. Prime historical examples of this, according to Jaishankar, are the 1962 invasion by China, where the U.S. supported India, and the 1971 war for the independence of Bangladesh where the U.S. was not supportive. This historical interpretation of East vs. West fits snugly with the other major dichotomy of the Jaishankar doctrine, namely the political vs. non-political aspects of the East-West relationship.

A strength of the Jaishankar doctrine is that it allows for a full range of cooperation on "non-political" aspects of the U.S.-India relationship. There is a recognition that the United States has had a policy of strengthening India from an economic developmental perspective and has been a fount of growth for world development generally. Now that India has largely dismantled its top-down economic model, or "license raj," the way is open for full cooperation on all "non-political" fronts. However, when it comes to "political" endeavors, i.e. those having to do with international security and strategic matters, the aforementioned East vs. West analytic dichotomy requires that the relationship must be more circumscribed. The Cold War ended badly for India in the sense that the USSR and Russia were no longer the strong sources of support they had been up until the collapse of the Soviet Union. Still the political nature of the India-Russia relationship seems to require that India maintain a distance from the United States and the West where Russia is involved. This distancing is often referred to by Indian commentators as "strategic autonomy." A key component of this strategic autonomy seems to be resistance to outside requests, comments, or even questions concerning India's strategic or political choices. Apparently still influenced by what Jaishankar formulates as the two hundred years of national humiliation by the West, such entreaties may be viewed as infringements on strategic autonomy if not national sovereignty. To achieve full and equal partnership between the world's two largest democracies, the U.S. needs to do more in working with India to satisfy India's needs for arms and energy without bending to Russia. The 2+2 made continued progress on the arms front. Greater oil, gas, atomic, and renewable energy support also seem to be making progress.

A full U.S.-India partnership requires that India adjust the analytic approach which contributes to India standing aside when it comes to opposing the Russian invasion of Ukraine. The old "East vs. West" dichotomy no longer applies to U.S.-India relations, if it ever did. Certainly, India and the U.S. are different, but these two great democracies have far more in common than India has with the traditional pillars of "the East" – Russia and China. This is particularly true when it comes to the fundamental value and rule of the post-World War II era: that nations must refrain from the use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state. Some may seek to justify the Russian invasion of Ukraine on the basis of U.S. transgressions of the past. This is simply a reiteration of the schoolboy amoral justification of "he did it too." Two wrongs still do not make a right and the rule of law requires that each situation be judged on its own merits. In the case of the Russian invasion of Ukraine, the use of force is singular in its breach of the rules that have kept the planet from another world war over the past seventy years. The dichotomy between political and non-political interests is also in need of adjustment. India is no longer a new republic struggling to throw off the remnants of British colonialism and rightly sensitive to perceived restraints on its sovereignty. India is a great power. The U.S. needs to treat India like a great power, and India needs to act like one. Great powers do not take umbrage at requests or criticisms simply because they are from foreigners. Rather they evaluate such entreaties and make judgments as to what is in their interests in the present and the future. Great powers work with others to strengthen their own security even where it involves binding commitments. Reality is not divided into political and non-political spheres. In today's world some issues traditionally viewed as "non-political" are as important to national security as any traditionally "political" issues. The internet of things and the hacking of systems comes to mind. The opposite is also true. Numerous "political" issues from defense procurement to immigration have enormous "non-political" consequences.

The essential point is that strategic decisions should be premised on present and future interests, including fundamental values. The U.S. and India must make decisions based on present realities and future needs, not premised on an analysis of the superseded past. These decisions should not be bound by historical conceptions of East vs. West or political vs. non-political. The U.S. and India should recognize that present decisions are setting precedents. If the Russian use of death and destruction and nuclear threats in regard to Ukraine are successful, the use of these tactics by authoritarian regimes such as China is sure to follow. This is a manifestation of the violent approach to international affairs that has plagued mankind throughout history and now again faces the U.S., India, and the world.

India Reiterates Tibet Position After US Delegation Visit – OpEd

23 June 2024, Eurasia Review, Subir Bhaumik

Immediately after a visiting US delegation upped the ante on Tibet, India reiterated its stance on His Holiness' Dalai Lama, emphasising his "revered" status and the respect accorded to him by the Indian people.

"The Government of India's position on His Holiness the Dalai Lama is clear and consistent. He is a revered religious leader and is deeply respected by the people of India. His Holiness is accorded due courtesies and freedom to conduct his religious and spiritual activities," the Ministry of External Affairs official spokesperson Randhir Jaiswal told a press briefing.

Jaiswal's comments follow the visit of a seven-member US Congressional delegation which asserted that President Joe Biden will soon sign a bill on Tibet that has upset China. Jaiswal however refrained from commenting on the succession of the Dalai Lama, but highlighted the spiritual leader's significant role in India's cultural fabric.

"A seven-member US Congress delegation paid a visit to India from 16-20 June 2024. The bi-partisan delegation was led by Rep. Michael McCaul, Chairman of House Foreign Affairs Committee. They visited Dharamshala on 18-19 June," the MEA spokesperson said.

He said the delegation also called on Prime Minister Narendra Modi and interacted with External Affairs minister S Jaishankar and Commerce & Industry minister Piyush Goyal.

"As regards the statements by the US delegation, I would refer you to the US side and it is for them to answer," he said.

In a strongly-worded statement on Chinese President Xi Jinping, former US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi – who is part of a US Congressional delegation – said on Wednesday that while the legacy of the Dalai Lama will live forever for compassion and tradition, the Chinese President will be gone and nobody will give him any credit.

Pelosi made these comments after meeting the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala. The US Congressional delegation is led by US House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul and has members including Pelosi, who is now Speaker Emerita, and prominent US Congressional members – Mariannette Miller, Gregory Meeks, Nicole Malliotakis, Jim McGovern, and Ami Bera.

While the Dalai Lama meets foreign diplomats and visitors, this delegation is one of the most high-powered delegations from the US in recent years. Pelosi has been at the forefront of challenging Beijing, as she had visited Taiwan in August 2022.

The delegation's visit comes after the US Congress last week passed a bill urging Beijing to re-engage with the Dalai Lama and other Tibetan leaders to peacefully resolve their dispute over the status and governance of Tibet.

Pelosi and McCaul told journalists in India that the government of President Joe Biden will surely implement the Tibet bill.

India recently hit back at China by renaming more than 30 places in Tibet. This was a riposte to Beijing which has named 60 places in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh with Chinese names in an attempt to back its claim on the Indian province China calls "Southern Tibet."

The Indian renaming of Tibetan places in effect as reopening the Tibet question because India has so far recognised Tibet as part of China.

Opening up the Tibet front?

23 June 2024, Deccan Chronicle, Srikanth Kondapalli

China's recent aggression in every direction in its neighbourhood is leading to a storm building up for itself. Its massive and intrusive military build-up and exercises across the Taiwan Straits, South China Sea and on the borders with India are not only unnerving for the countries involved but are also causing them to push back.

The non-resolution of the border stand-off since 2020 has created an armed stalemate on India's borders. Another front, albeit a politico-diplomatic one, is opening on the Tibet issue with the US congressional delegation's visit to Dharamshala.

China upped the ante following the visit of Nancy Pelosi to Taiwan in August 2022 when she was Speaker of the US House of Representatives. China's military crossed the median line that separates it from Taiwan, and has kept up its intimidatory tactics ever since.

On April 8 this year, it conducted "combat readiness patrols" in response to US House Speaker Kevin McCarthy's visit to Taiwan. These Chinese intrusions have intensified after Taiwan's presidential elections earlier this year. Yet, it seems, Beijing's two-pronged approach – applying military pressure from outside and running influence operations inside Taiwan – are not working isolate Taipei, or foment internal political struggles in Taiwan have raised concerns about potential miscalculation and accidents leading to an escalation in the Taiwan Straits.

Another potential conflict is emerging in the South China Sea between China and the Philippines at the Second Thomas Shoal. China claims 80 per cent of the whole region, despite The Hague tribunal quashing its claims in July 2016. On June 17, China's coastguard vessels rammed into a Filipino military boat, armed with a domestic legislation to seize any foreign personnel in the disputed seas.

The ensuing skirmish left a Filipino soldier with a severed finger and two vessels destroyed. The incident came close to what Philippine President Marcos has declared as a red line – any Filipino casualty. The US invoked the 1951 Mutual Defence Treaty with the Philippines, but tensions did not subside. Closer home, China has not accepted the olive branch extended by Prime Minister Narendra Modi in his remarks to Newsweek last month. On the other hand, it has been exerting military pressure on the borders and in India's neighbourhood, specifically in Maldives, Sri Lanka and Nepal. Despite 21 meetings at the military level for “disengagement and de-escalation” on the borders, three areas still remain contentious.

China is opening another front in Tibet. In August 2020, China's Communist Party began “sinicising Tibetan Buddhism” and enhanced Han Chinese intrusions. China built more than 600 “well-off society” villages on the borders with India, Nepal, Bhutan and was even preparing to do so in Pakistan-Occupied Kashmir. Nearly one-third of these built-up structures came up on the path that the Dalai Lama took in 1959 while fleeing to India. It is an indication that Beijing is preparing to effect a transition to the 15th Dalai Lama. Beijing has announced that it will exercise a “golden urn” process of selecting the 15th Dalai Lama, a bid to cause schisms among Tibetans.

The bipartisan US congressional delegation's visit to Dharamshala on June 18-19 came in the light of these developments and was meant to apprise the Dalai Lama of the Resolve Tibet Act that the Biden administration is considering signing into law.

Among other things, the delegation suggested resumption of the stalled dialogue between China and Tibetan representatives, stopping Chinese disinformation about Tibetan history and culture and, intriguingly, “self-determination” for Tibet.

While US delegation visits to Dharamshala are not exactly new, considerable interest and publicity was generated both due to the “self-determination” comment and the delegation's meetings with PM Modi and External Affairs Minister Jaishankar. Since the Roosevelt administration in the early 1940s, the US has considered Tibet a part of China (under the then Chinese leader Chiang Kai-shek). The US continued to follow this policy even after China came under Communist rule, only raising human rights issues from time to time.

The Obama administration in its ‘G2’ phase with China downgraded the Tibet factor, signalled by Obama meeting the Dalai Lama in the Maple Room of the White House, meant for spiritual leaders, rather than in the Oval Room. Such obsequiousness toward China began to change with Obama's ‘Pivot to Asia’, a change that accelerated under the Trump and Biden administrations. While India is cautious of the vagaries of US policy toward Beijing, the pounding pressure that China is exerting on Delhi may yet be a factor in how the Modi government views the Tibet issue going forward.

Why India's ‘Tibet card’ against China is stronger and working like never before

22 June 2024, First Post, Madhur Sharma

China is averse to any country's official engagement with the Dalai Lama, whom it calls a separatist over his demand for real autonomy for Tibet

In a rare visit, a delegation of American lawmakers visited Himachal Pradesh's Dharamshala this week to meet the Tibetan leader the Dalai Lama.

In a well-orchestrated convergence of mutual interests, the United States, the Tibetans in exile, and Indians with their nod to the visit came together to send a message to China. The message found its mark.

Shortly after the US delegation comprising House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul and Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi began their engagements with Tibet's Government-in-Exile, the Embassy of China in India warned the United States to not “send the wrong signal”.

“We urge the US side to fully recognise the anti-China separatist nature of the Dalai group, honour the commitments the US has made to China on issues related to Xizang, stop sending the wrong signal to the world,” said the Chinese mission in a post on X (formerly Twitter).

The post used the Beijing-imposed name Xizang for Tibet as part of its practice of renaming minority-populated regions in China to undermine their history identity and culture.

The Dalai Lama arrived in India in 1959 along with a large number of his followers. He had fled for his life from Tibet's capital Lhasa following the failure of an uprising against the Chinese repression in the region. The Communist Party of China's (CPC) forces had invaded and captured Tibet in 1949-50. Since the Dalai Lama's arrival, China has denounced his presence and has consistently sought to undermine the movement he and his fellow exiles have waged.

Following the engagements in Dharamshala, the US delegation led by McCaul met Prime Minister Narendra Modi, Minister of External Affairs S Jaishankar, and National Security Advisor (NSA) Ajit Doval on Thursday. It rested all doubts as to whether the visit had New Delhi's approval.

The convergence of India and the United States is part of the message to China that if you do not respect our sensibilities, we would not respect yours. It is not sudden but in the making since 2020 when China inexplicably plunged the bilateral relationship to its lowest since 1962 with a confrontation in Ladakh. For a long time before that, sections in the government and outside tracking China had questioned the rationale of respecting China's red lines with no reciprocity.

The India-China relationship has lacked mutual respect from the onset, says Tej Pratap Singh, a scholar of China at the Banaras Hindu University (BHU).

"In 1954, India and China signed the Panchsheel treaty. China still attacked India in 1962. Then, India unilaterally revived the relationship in 1976 by restoring ambassador-level ties and then Rajiv Gandhi made a historic visit to China in 1988. In 2003, Atal Bihari Vajpayee formalised the acceptance of the One China Policy. In all these years, China never offered any reciprocity despite all the concessions from India. China neither settled the border nor acknowledged historical agreements. Instead, it opened a new front in Sikkim and waded into the Kashmir issue," says Singh, Professor, Department of Political Science, BHU.

Ladakh stand-off a watershed moment for India-China ties

Despite the then-External Affairs Minister Sushma Swaraj telling her Chinese counterpart Wang Yi in 2014 that just as India accepted the One China Policy, India expected China to go by a One India Policy, the Modi government accommodated Chinese concerns for years.

Until 2020, Modi invested heavily in managing ties with China. India did not overtly engage with Taiwan or Tibetans. Modi's meeting with the Dalai Lama in 2014 was very low-profile and Tibetans' events were shifted from New Delhi to Dharamshala in 2018-19 as Modi reached out to Xi repeatedly. Two summits were held in China's Wuhan and Mamallapuram in Tamil Nadu – 'Wuhan Spirit' was the buzzword.

Even as India continued to try to accommodate China, there was no reciprocity. When Chinese President Xi Jinping first visited India in 2014, the visit overlapped with a Chinese military incursion in Ladakh. Then, in 2017, China waged a stand-off in Doklam at the India-China-Bhutan trijunction. China also opened a fresh flashpoint at the Sikkim border that was otherwise considered settled.

Even that did not make India turn too hawkish. The shift only came in 2020 when China mounted incursions after incursions in Ladakh and Sikkim. The paradigm shift was cemented on June 15, 2020, when the Chinese killed at least 20 Indian soldiers in a clash in Galwan Valley in Ladakh's east.

Following the Ladakh stand-off, the Modi government blocked Chinese telecommunication firms like Huawei from the roll-out of the 5G network in the country. It blocked Chinese investments, mergers, and acquisitions, and clamped down on the Chinese companies operating in the country – Chinese apps were banned, loan apps were brought under the scanner, and companies like Vivo and Oppo were pushed to sell majority stakes of India units to Indian companies.

For the first time, India acknowledged the existence of the Special Frontier Force (SFF), one of the shadowiest Indian special forces rooted in the India-China conflict and staffed by Tibetans in exile in large numbers. The official engagement with the Tibetans also increased following the Ladakh stand-off.

In 2021, Modi publicly wished the Dalai Lama for the first time in many years and has continued to do so every year since. In the years since, the Indian military has facilitated the Dalai Lama's visit to Ladakh and flown him into the region –claimed by China bordering his homeland of Tibet– in military helicopters. Top officials like governors and chief ministers have met him and the Indian leaders have increasingly referred to the border with China as the India-Tibet border –which it actually is– instead of the India-China border.

During the Ladakh stand-off, videos were also released of Tibetans tying the 'khata' –the sacred white Tibetan sash– on vehicles of Indian Army and SFF that were carrying troops for deployment to the frontlines.

While the engagement with the Tibetans picked up pace, India also ramped up cautious engagement with Taiwan as China also became aggressive by the day regarding the self-ruled island and increased military provocations there.

Since 2020, there has been a recognition of the reality that India does have some levers that it can pull regarding China to signal that respect for sensibilities cannot be a one-way street, says Manoj Kewalramani, a China scholar at the Takshashila Institution and author of the book Smokeless War: China's Quest for Global Primacy.

"Since 2020, India has been telling China that we can indeed pull some levers on issues that concern you. The idea is that if you do not accept our concerns, we will not accept yours. The US delegation's meeting with the Dalai Lama is also part of the signalling to China that if you worsen the relationship by ratcheting up disputes, we can also rake up stuff that you may otherwise consider settled. This may include giving foreign governments a platform to engage with the Tibetan 'separatist' movement," says Kewalramani.

While the post-2020 approach to China is indeed a paradigm shift, there is also an element of continuity. Even though India formally accepts the One China Policy, India has not iterated that since 2009. The idea is that One China will be only iterated if the other side iterates One India, as Swaraj told Yi in 2014.

Is India playing the 'Tibet Card' – again?

The commentary on Tibet ranges from it being a non-issue to it being one of the central issues in the India-China relationship. Kewalramani says it's a knob for New Delhi that it can turn up or down as per the situation.

"The real question is not if India is playing the Tibet card or not. The question is what's the endgame from turning up the knob now. Does New Delhi feel the Tibet issue gives it enough leverage? That does not seem likely. But turning up the knob now can definitely lead to annoyance and friction for China and undermining the Chinese narrative. That way, the moves regarding the Tibetans can be meaningful," says Kewalramani, a Chinese Studies Fellow and the Chairperson of the Indo-Pacific Studies Programme at the Takshashila Institution.

This time, India is not playing the card alone. It is joined by the United States. Even though the American interest in Tibet may look sudden and sceptics of the US foreign policy may flinch at the India-US convergence, neither of them is new.

Since the 1950s, the United States and India have been engaged on the issue of Tibet. Initially, the United States tried to rope in India to mount a united response to the Tibet question. The United States also supported Tibetan guerillas against the Communist regime of Beijing and, following the India-China War of 1962, helped India enlist Tibetans in the SFF and supported India militarily.

In her book Fateful Triangle: How China Shaped U.S.-India Relations During the Cold War, Tanvi Madan noted that while the United States was willing to address the Tibet issue in early 1950s, it was not willing to do it without India and was wary of spillovers.

"But, while Washington was willing to encourage Tibet's leaders and its autonomy in spirit, it was unwilling to act alone to provide military or financial assistance or appoint official representatives to Tibet. Acheson [US Secretary of State] maintained that India had the primary responsibility to help Tibet... Furthermore, like Britain and India, the US was concerned about any spillover impact on the Korean situation – the reason why it would not promise a specific response to a potential Tibetan appeal to the UN," noted Madan, a Senior Fellow at the Center for Asia Policy Studies of the Brookings Institution.

The book also quoted the US Department of State saying at the time: "Tibet as a weapon for alerting GOI [Government of India] to the danger of attempting to appease any Communist Govt and, specifically, for manoeuvring GOI into a position where it will voluntarily adopt a policy of firmly resisting Chinese Communist pressure in south and east Asia."

As was the case in 1950-60s, the US outreach to India over Tibet is part of a broader geopolitical contest. While the contest was with the global Communism in the Cold War, the United States is now in competition with China – some see it as one of democracy versus autocracies.

"For the past few years, the United States has witnessed an increased focus on Tibet about real autonomy for the region. There is also a sense in the United States of an existential clash with China. This is what's leading to the increased India-US convergence on China and the moves regarding Tibet are part of the bigger response to rising and aggressive China," says Kewalramani.

Even as India and the United States appear to be playing the Tibet Card jointly, some critics question the utility and even the existence of such a card. Former Indian diplomat Phunchok Stobdan has argued that there has never been a Tibet card as India and the United States both accept the One China Policy, Tibet itself has accepted Chinese sovereignty, and the Dalai Lama's establishment is also eager to make a deal with China than waging an overt conflict.

In his book The Great Game in Buddhist Himalayas: India and China's Quest for Strategic Dominance, Stobdan further flagged that the US involvement brings harm instead of benefits. He wrote, "The Dalai Lama and the 'Tibet Card' are Cold War-era relics. The issue has been kept alive for almost six decades, mainly due to the games being played, some at the behest of Western powers. The Dalai Lama and Tibet 'cards' have not served any deterrent purposes for India; rather, they have prolonged mutual suspicion and hostility with China."

While the extent of the leverage the Tibet Card gives India is up for debate, Kewalramani tells Firstpost that the idea is to keep the wound open.

"If you keep the wound open, the Tibet question in this case, then who knows where it leads someday? Maybe, nothing may happen today, but who knows what the card might yield in the future? So, you don't put a lid on the issue," says Kewalramani.

India has upped the ante with China

When Modi and Jaishankar met the US Congressional delegation, the gloves came off. The speculation by some on social media that the delegation had gone rogue with their statements was settled and New Delhi's approval of the visit was for all to see.

Kewalramani says that India is playing a high-risk game now considering China too holds levers against India.

"Even as India has been shifting its policies regarding China since 2020, it has done so very carefully. India does not speak about Xinjiang. India is very cautious about Taiwan and has issued very cautious and few statements in recent years. So, India's actions with China are very calculated. These moves regarding Tibet with the United States, however, mark a shift to a high-risk approach," says Kewalramani.

Even as the United States is on the same page for now with India on Tibet, there are doubts in some quarters whether that's going to last. Singh, the China scholar at BHU, highlights that the United States backed India on China and Tibet in 1950-60s but it petered out by 1970 and the United States was on the other side entirely in 1970s.

"The US policy on Tibet has been patchy, but now that China is the main US adversary, which is also the case with India, the two countries may have much more lasting convergence than in the 1950-60s on Tibet as the Tibet Card can be part of the broader efforts to contain China," says Singh.

As far as the policy shift's risks are considered, Singh tells Firstpost that being risk-averse has not paid India over the years. He argues that the more anyone accommodates China, the more belligerent China becomes. Citing the case of the failed Western bet on bringing China into the World Trade Organization (WTO) and legitimising it internationally with the hope that it would liberalise the country, Singh says softness with China has never paid off.

"India has always been reactive with China. It has never been proactive. Even as there has been a shift in the past few years, India is still not properly proactive. But there is at least much more sharpness in the reactions now. The hope is that this will evolve into a proactive policy. As for the risks, you need to take risks. Otherwise, you don't even have a chance at making gains," says Singh.

Awakening for Tibet

22 June 2024, Sri Lanka Guardian, N.S. Venkataraman

Let Not the World Conscience Remain Silent Anymore on The Plight of Tibetans.

Around 60 years ago, China forcibly entered Tibet and occupied the region. Until then, Tibet was a peaceful country where Tibetans lived according to high-value systems and Buddhist philosophy, with goodwill towards all. Tibet had no substantial army, and when China carried out the aggression and its troops entered Tibet, all Tibetans could do was peacefully protest. The merciless Chinese troops massacred thousands of Tibetans who were protesting. In this grim situation, the respected spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, had no choice but to leave Tibet and enter India with around 85,000 Tibetan followers.

During this period of stress, Tibet was largely abandoned to suffer by the rest of the world. The government of neighboring India should have protested against the Chinese invasion, but instead recognized the occupation of Tibet by China. At that time, many voices in India urged the government to protest, but it did not. All that the Government of India did was allow the Dalai Lama and his followers to stay in India as refugees. Over the last sixty years, the third generation of Tibetans mostly live as refugees in India.

Over the last sixty years, China has systematically plundered Tibet's mineral wealth, such as lithium, and water resources. The Chinese government has been sending native Chinese to settle in Tibet, aiming to destroy Tibetan culture and traditions. Several monasteries in Tibet have been destroyed.

This injustice against Tibet by China continues today. In the last six decades, China has shown its territorial greed by entering into war with India and occupying thousands of kilometers of Indian territory. The occupation of Tibet by China was clearly the first step in achieving this territorial expansion. China continues this practice of claiming the territories of other countries to this day, seemingly with impunity. In this context, it is heartening that the U.S. House of Representatives has passed the "Resolve Tibet Act," which calls on the Chinese government to engage with the Dalai Lama to restore Tibet's independence to Tibetans.

Subsequently, an influential group of U.S. lawmakers met with the Dalai Lama in Himachal Pradesh, India, exchanged views, and offered support to the Tibetan cause. They have also clearly warned the Chinese government that they will take steps to safeguard Tibet's sovereignty in the future.

As expected, the Chinese government has protested against these observations by U.S. lawmakers, claiming that Tibet is an internal matter for China.

What will happen next?

While U.S. lawmakers have taken steps to support the Tibetan cause, albeit after many decades, it is better late than never. The question now is whether other countries in the world, particularly Western democracies and thoughtful individuals in these regions, will voice their support for the initiative taken by U.S. lawmakers.

The ball is now clearly in the court of the Government of India to take the initiative forward and support the Tibetan cause. The question remains whether the Government of India will fulfill its responsibility towards an independent Tibet. It is notable that Indian Prime Minister Mr. Modi has not met with the Dalai Lama even once during his ten-year tenure as Prime Minister.

Recently, China has acted against India's interests in several international forums, clearly viewing India as a primary adversary.

Possibly, the Indian government does not want to antagonize the Chinese government to avoid military confrontation. If this is India's stance, it reflects a defeatist attitude lacking in courage and conviction. Millions of Indians sympathize with the Tibetan cause and want the Indian government to advocate for Tibet in international forums.

Many Tibetans have become refugees in various countries, later becoming citizens. They are primarily occupied with making a living and are unable to substantially contribute to their homeland's cause.

The initiative of U.S. lawmakers should gain momentum, and India can play a crucial role in advocating and strengthening the Tibetan cause, urging the world conscience, which has been largely silent regarding the plight of Tibetans, to speak out." This version maintains the essence of your message while enhancing readability and clarity.

What's behind India's hardening posture against China?

22 June 2024, The Economic Times

There is a small but stark shift in India's approach to China in the past few weeks which indicates the Modi government in its third term might harden its posture against the neighbour with which relations have been hostage to heightened border disputes ever since skirmishes between Indian and Chinese forces along the border in 2020.

PM Modi is likely to attend the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) in Kazakhstan in the first week of July where he might run into China's President Xi Jinping. Shortly before a possible meeting between the two leaders, India seems to be hardening its posture against China. The two meetings between Modi and Xi after the Galwan clashes at the G20 Summit at Bali in 2022 and the BRICS Summit in South Africa a year later failed to yield any positive results. Thousands of troops remain deployed on either side of the Sino-india border .

India's 'no' to 'business as usual'

China is pressing India to restart direct passenger flights after a four-year halt, but New Delhi is resisting as a border dispute continues to weigh on ties between the two countries, Reuters has reported recently. Several times over the past year or so, China's government and airlines have asked India's civil aviation authorities to re-establish direct air links, two people with direct knowledge of the matter told Reuters, with one saying China considers this a "big issue".

"We hope the Indian side will work with China in the same direction for the early resumption of direct flights," China's Foreign Ministry told Reuters in a statement, adding that resuming flights would be in both countries' interests. But a senior Indian official familiar with India-China bilateral developments said of Beijing's desire to resume flights: "Unless there is peace and tranquility on the border, the rest of the relationship cannot move forward."

India is refusing to let the ties normalise with China without a resolution of the border disputes. Direct flights between India and China were halted four months after the pandemic broke out. Except for a smattering of covid repatriation flights, they have not resumed even though India lifted covid restrictions on international air routes a year later and China lifted all covid travel measures in early 2023.

Modi's Taiwan move

After results of the 2024 Lok Sabha elections were announced, Taiwanese President Lai Ching-te congratulated Modi on his third consecutive victory in the general elections and said he looks forward to expanding the "fast-growing" ties between the two nations. He further stressed expanding India-Taiwan collaboration on trade, technology and other sectors to contribute to peace and prosperity in the Indo-Pacific.

"My sincere congratulations to Prime Minister @narendramodi on his election victory. We look forward to enhancing the fast-growing Taiwan-India partnership, expanding our collaboration on trade, technology & other sectors to contribute to peace & prosperity in the IndoPacific," President Lai posted on X. Modi replied: "Thank you @ChingteLai for your warm message. I look forward to closer ties as we work towards mutually beneficial economic and technological partnership."

This formal exchange between the two leaders angered China which lodged a protest with India for Modi's acknowledgement of Taiwanese president's congratulatory message. The Chinese foreign ministry urged India to resist Taiwan's "political calculations" and not do anything to violate the "one-China principle".

Under its "One China Policy", China opposes all forms of official interactions between Taiwan authorities and other countries, saying Taiwan is an inalienable part of Chinese territory. Like other countries which have diplomatic ties with China, India too follows the "One China Policy" even though there has been no public articulation of it since 2010. For China, PM Modi had crossed a red line by talking to the new Taiwanese president whom China views as a dangerous rebel.

The tit-for-tat Tibet gameplay

Nearly two weeks ago, there were reports of India planning to do something which can outrage China. India is planning to rename over two dozen places in China's Tibet Autonomous Region in a tit-for-tat move against China renaming places in Arunachal Pradesh, according to a report in the Diplomat.

The list of places to be renamed has been finalised by the Army's information warfare division and will be released soon, said the report. The new names are backed by extensive historical research and widely held opinions of the local residents, many of whom fiercely oppose the Chinese names.

The renaming campaign aims to push through an Indian counter-narrative on the border through regional and global media, anchored on both solid historical research and local residents' voices.

In the past, China has changed names of places in Arunachal Pradesh. In March, it renamed 30 places along the Line of Actual Control in the state, including 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass, and a piece of land. It was the fourth time that China unilaterally renamed places in the state. India has repeatedly rejected China's move to rename places in Arunachal Pradesh, asserting that the state is an integral part of the country and that assigning "invented" names does not alter this reality.

A few days ago, India allowed a high-level US congressional delegation, including former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, to meet the Dalai Lama at his Indian home, a visit that was condemned in advance by China's government, which considers the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader a separatist. At the same time, US National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan was in India discussing security and technological cooperation.

The visit by the US congressional delegation came right after a bipartisan bill was passed by the US House of Representatives, seeking to push Beijing to hold dialogue with Tibetan leaders that has been stalled since 2010.

In what China would see as a further provocation, PM Modi met with the US Congressional delegation following their meeting with the Dalai Lama

What's behind India's aggressive posture?

While India's aggressive posturing against China, especially with regard to Tibet, points at an increasing coordination with the US, it also indicates India's move could reopen the Tibet issue. India's Taiwan and Tibet moves clearly show India's push against the "One China Policy". So far, India had restrained from openly challenging the policy but now it could be sending the message that if China is not mindful of India's territorial concerns, India too would no longer acknowledge China's sensitivities.

"India has once again indicated that it is willing to gradually ramp up pressure on issues like Tibet and Taiwan," Harsh Pant, an international relations professor at King's College London, has told Hong Kong-based daily South China Morning Post. He said that New Delhi had made it clear that unless Beijing recognized "India's concerns and sensitivities and respects Indian interests", it was not moving from that posture.

Michael Kugelman, director of the Wilson Centre's South Asia Institute, told SCMP that it seemed as though India was "trying to signal that it can use its relationship with the US as leverage". "It can show China that there are ways that it can push back," he added.

"India appears more risk tolerant now when it comes to how far it's willing to go with pushing the Tibet issue," Kugelman said.

Many think a less-than-expected mandate for PM Modi in the Lok Sabha elections will make his government averse to accommodating Chinese concerns because it could be seen as a sign of weakness by his voters.

China's name change spree in Xinjiang and Tibet continues unabated

22 June 2024, First Post, Mahesh Rajan Debata

The sinister design by the Chinese authorities to change the names of places, cities, and townships is not limited to its provinces or territory alone; rather, it goes beyond the borders.

The Chinese Central government has not only been devising but also religiously implementing the policy to change the names of streets, villages, places, and townships in the country, especially in the minority-dominated areas in its western part. The Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (XUAR) have borne the maximum brunt in this process.

For example, in Chinese academic parlance, Tibet has been described as Xijiang since 2023. This Chinese trick has two mottoes: firstly, China deliberately attempts to dilute the culture of the minority people, or perhaps aims at stamping out ethno-religious or ethno-cultural identities of the minorities, particularly the Uyghurs and Tibetans; and secondly, it wants to expand the process of sinification by dint of imposing the overarching Chinese communist ideology on the minority people. In a joint report published recently by Human Rights Watch (HRW) and a Norway-based Uyghur organisation (Uyghur Help), the Chinese atrocities on Uyghur culture and identity have come to light time and again. According to the report, the Chinese Central Government has been "systematically changing hundreds of village names" bearing historical, religious, and cultural meanings for Uyghurs into new names that faithfully reflect the ideology of the Communist Party of China (CCP).

It is important to note herewith that the name-changing spree in Tibet and Xinjiang by the Chinese can be traced back to the end of the 2000s, particularly after the Tibet unrest in March 2008 and the Urumqi riots (5 July 2009) in XUAR. Along with the stern policy of "Strike Hard, Maximum Pressure" in both Tibet and Xinjiang, it led to massive securitisation and surveillance in both the restive regions in the later period.

The Chinese authorities have meted out excesses against Tibetans and Uyghurs. They slyly began one of the government-sponsored measures of "cultural erasure" of the Uyghurs and Tibetans as part of their sinification design. It has been an uphill task for these hapless minorities to maintain their centuries-old unique culture against 75 years of Chinese onslaught.

The HRW Report gives detailed information, elaborating that as many as 3,600 of a total of 25,000 villages in Xinjiang (almost 15 per cent of the total villages) have witnessed name change in the last one and a half decades (from 2009 to 2023). In 630 villages (nearly one-fifth of the total of 3,600 villages), the names bearing the religion, culture, and history of Uyghurs have witnessed change.

The popular Uyghur names, such as Mazar (shrine), Hoja (Sufi teacher), Meschit (mosque), Haniqa (Sufi meeting place), Gumbaz (dome), Orda (palace), Xelpe (Khalifa), Wap (Islamic Foundation), Hajj (pilgrimage to Mecca), Dutar (an Uyghur music instrument) and Sultan (Emir), are now replaced with pejorative Chinese names such as Hongxing (Red Star), Qianjin (Forward), Hongqi (Red Flag), Youyi (Friendship), Guangming (Light), Bostan (Oasis), Hexie (harmony), Tuanjie (unity) and Xingfu (happiness).

It is found to be a classic case of sinification that Chinese authorities have been imposing on minority nationalities, especially against Uyghurs and Tibetans, since Qing rule. The process of sinification has taken on a new tone and tenor since the communist takeover of Xinjiang in 1949. However, what is not reported in the media is the renaming of some famous streets in the capital, Urumqi, and Kashgar, as confirmed news reports are awaited.

Earlier, seven years ago, two reports were published. One was by Human Rights Watch—"China bans many Muslim baby names in Xinjiang" (April 24, 2017)—and the other was by Radio Free Asia—"Xinjiang's 'List of Forbidden Names' forces Uyghurs to change the names of children under 16"—which described how Chinese authorities at the local political committee in Tohula township of Karakash county in Khotan prefecture banned several Muslim names like Arafat, Saddam, Medina, Husein, Seypidin, Seypulla, Nesrulla, Shemsidin, and Mujahit (for boys under the age 16) and Muslime, Muhlise, Ayshe, Fatima, and Hediche (for girls under the age 16).

This measure was commensurate with the Chinese government's "Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region Regulation on De-extremification" that was adopted unanimously at the 28th meeting of the Standing Committee of the Twelfth People's Congress for the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region on March 29, 2017.

In addition, the authorities gave an ultimatum of 72 hours to change the names and issued a diktat not to provide the Uyghur children bearing any of the banned names the much-needed hukou (household registration), which is a necessary condition to enrol tiny tots in public school and other social services in the minority areas. It is a brazen display of Chinese indifference towards the minority culture of a multicultural society like China. Besides, it perhaps spells out the spread of fear of the Chinese among the young and impressionable minds so that they will not raise their voice against the government in the future.

It is imperative to highlight here that this sinister design by the Chinese authorities to change the names of places, cities, and townships is not limited to its provinces or territory alone; rather, it goes beyond the borders. For instance, the Chinese government exhibited the audacity to rename as many as 62 villages in the Indian province of Arunachal Pradesh in four phases in the last half a dozen years. The People's Republic of China not only brazenly, forcefully, and aggressively claims the Indian province of Arunachal Pradesh as its integral part but has also renamed it Zangnan (South Tibet). The Indian news media and foreign media have aired the attempt by the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs to change the names of six places in Arunachal Pradesh in 2017, 15 in 2021, 11 in 2023, and 30 in 2024, respectively. It exposes the mens rea of an alien, arrogant, and aggressive China against its immediate neighbour (India), with whom it fought a war in 1962 and was involved in intimidation, intrusion, and internecine conflict all along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in the last six decades.

Resolve Tibet

22 June 2024, The Statesman

The visit by US lawmakers to meet the Dalai Lama in India marks a significant moment in the on-going Tibet-China dispute.

The visit by US lawmakers to meet the Dalai Lama in India marks a significant moment in the on-going Tibet-China dispute. This gesture, coupled with the "Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Bill" ~ passed by the US Congress ~ signals a shift in US policy that could have profound implications for Sino-American relations and the future of Tibetan autonomy. For decades, the Dalai Lama has been a symbol of peaceful resistance and spiritual resilience. His exile from Tibet in 1959 and his subsequent life in India have highlighted the struggles of the Tibetan people under Chinese rule.

The meeting between the Dalai Lama and influential US lawmakers, including Mr Michael McCaul and Ms Nancy Pelosi, underscores a renewed commitment from Washington to support Tibetan rights and challenge Beijing's heavy-handed policies in the region. China's insistence on controlling the succession of the Dalai Lama illustrates its broader strategy of exerting influence over Tibetan Buddhism and suppressing any form of dissent. Beijing's stance that its atheist leaders should approve the Dalai Lama's successor is not only an affront to Tibetan spiritual traditions but also a clear attempt to legitimise its rule over Tibet. The Dalai Lama's suggestion that his successor might be found in India further complicates China's narrative and asserts Tibetan agency in spiritual matters.

The Resolve Tibet Bill is a legislative milestone that sends a clear message to Beijing that the international community, led by the United States, is no longer willing to passively accept China's dominance over Tibet. If President Joe Biden signs this bill into law, it would represent a significant departure from the longstanding US policy of recognising Tibet as part of China. Such a move would undoubtedly escalate tensions between the two superpowers, but it would also reaffirm America's commitment to human rights and self-determination. India's role in this geopolitical drama is also noteworthy. As the host country of the Dalai Lama and home to a substantial Tibetan exile community, India has a vested interest in the outcome of the Tibet-China dispute.

The strained relationship between India and China, particularly following the 2020 border clashes, adds another layer of complexity. Strengthening ties with the US and supporting the Tibetan cause aligns with India's strategic interests and its efforts to counterbalance China's growing influence in the region. This renewed focus on Tibet by US lawmakers could set a precedent for other countries to adopt similar policies, creating a broader coalition advocating for Tibetan rights. The global community's increased attention on Tibet might pressure Beijing to reconsider its hard-line approach and engage in meaningful negotiations with Tibetan leaders. However, it is crucial to recognise that the Dalai Lama has consistently advocated for genuine autonomy rather than outright independence for Tibet. This "middle way" approach seeks to preserve Tibet's cultural and religious identity while remaining within the framework of the Chinese state.

China-US-India 'situationship' over Dalai Lama: Will reincarnation have geopolitical implications?

22 June 2024, News One, Deebashree Mohanty

The former Sikyong (political leader) of the Central Tibetan Administration Dr Lobsang Sangay said on Thursday that the reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama will impact geopolitics to a great extent, he also said that China will not have any role to play in the process of reincarnation, search and even training of the next Dalai Lama. So, what is the plan, and what is going to be India's role in it?

There is a lot of noise around the Dalai Lama these days. Apart from the fact that he will mark his 89th birthday on July 1, and that he has an impending trip to the US during the same time, there are murmurs that a reincarnation for the new Dalai Lama maybe on the anvil. Is this the real reason why the high-level US delegation led by former US Congress Speaker Nancy Pelosi visited the Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama in Dharamshala, resulting in some tensions in China? To top all these curious events, former Sikyong (political leader) of the Central Tibetan Administration, Dr Lobsang Sangay, sparked a controversy when he endorsed India as Tibet's closest ally and also mentioned the reincarnation of the new Dalai Lama and what would be China's role in this rebirth.

Who is the chosen one, and what geopolitical ramifications will this rebirth have? Sangay said we will get a clearer picture soon, but there will be no role of China in the process of rebirth, selection of the Lama and training. This is not a new development as the 14th Dalai Lama (whom China sees as a "dangerous separatist,") had in 2023, made an announcement in this regard saying that the new head of Tibetan Buddhism will be in Mongolia, a position for which China wanted Mongolia to seek its consent. However, Chinese representatives have been quiet on the matter till so long.

What this announcement did was reiterate that China will have no role whatsoever in the process of the rebirth of the latest Dalai Lama. "The next Dalai Lama will not be born in China. His Holiness, the 14th Dalai Lama has already declared that. In response, the Chinese government launched a major campaign to counter that position. But it is clear that Beijing does not have any role to play in the reincarnation of the next Dalai Lama," he said, making an elaborate presentation on the idea of reincarnation and why it could have a major geopolitical implication.

The new Dalai Lama; endless possibilities

Why is China's interference a matter of concern for Tibet, Sangay pointed out that there are many Buddhist dominated countries in Asia and beyond and all these countries could end up being affected if the Chinese interfere with the process of finding a successor to the present Dalai Lama.

Earlier in June, the present Dalai Lama who resides in McLeodganj, met with the US lawmakers and discussed the process of reincarnation when McCaul in his remarks before the Tibetan community in Dharamshala declared that China is trying to interfere into the "succession" of the present Dalai Lama. Who is going to be the successor to the 14th Dalai Lama is a question that begs some explanation, although political activists have said it depends on whether Tibet opts for reincarnation or emanation. The 14th Dalai Lama, who has lived in exile, has floated the possibility of a non-traditional succession. He already ended the post's political powers in 2011 in favour of an elected Tibetan government-in-exile and has been keeping Beijing on its toes with his grand plans for the succession. He has alternatively suggested that his reincarnation could be a girl for the first time, or that he might be the last Dalai Lama. There is also the intriguing possibility of "emanation before death" in which case, Tibetans believe the Dalai Lama's spirit could transfer to an adult successor. With all these endless possibilities, it is anyone's guess who is going to take over from the present Dalai Lama but what the globe awaits is a lot of political upheaval during the process of such an eventuality.

China's stance on the new Dalai Lama: China has insisted that the successor to the present Dalai Lama will require its approval and that the successor will have to be found "within the country". They had cited historical reasons behind this claim. A point that was quickly dispensed with by Sangay who reminded that the fourth Dalai Lama Yonten Gyatso was born in 1589 in Mongolia and that the sixth Dalai Lama was born in Tawang in 1683, indicating that there are historical precedents that the Dalai Lama was reincarnated on occasions outside of China.

US's support for Tibetan ideology: US lawmakers have time and again re-affirmed the support of the US for the Tibetan spiritual leader and his advocacy for Tibetan autonomy. The latest visit also reflected the interest of the US in human rights issues related to Tibet and the broader geopolitical context involving China. The US government has frequently criticized China's human rights record in Tibet, highlighting issues such as religious repression, cultural assimilation, and restrictions on freedom of speech and assembly. The Congress has passed several resolutions supporting the rights of the Tibetan people and recognising the Dalai Lama's leadership. Notably, the Tibet Policy Act of 2002 mandated support for Tibetan cultural preservation and established the position of a Special Coordinator for Tibetan Issues within the US State Department.

India's stance on the reincarnation: India's interest in Dalai Lama stretches much beyond just border politics with its neighbour, China. We have spiritual and philosophically vested interests as well. The Dalai Lama is not only the tallest Buddhist leader in the world, for Buddhists, he is the personification of the Avalokitesvara and his reincarnation (or not) will determine whether the world can save Tibetan Buddhism from the Chinese Communist Party. India is home to the largest cohort of Tibetan refugees in the world. Hence Indian politicians sense that a post-Dalai Lama scenario should be guided by India, so as to reduce the possibility of extremism in the Tibetan ranks.

Since giving asylum to Dalai Lama, India has also revitalised its own Buddhist heritage – with over 200 monasteries and thousands of monks and a concerted attention to Buddhist conferences to provide platform for evolving Buddhist thought. It is imperative that India doesn't leave the future of Buddhism to either China or chance. Politically too, it's in India's interest to participate actively in the reincarnation. In fact, as India fights to stabilise the border conflict with China, its stand and actions on Tibet will be very important. Tibet is not Taiwan. It has rapidly been elevated – for geopolitical, cultural and ecological reasons – as one of India's more important interests. They all run through the Dalai Lama.

Is it going to be easy for all the three parties – China, US and India to reach a common consensus? That is a distant reality according to political pundits. But because China considers Dalai Lama's reincarnation as something very important not because they care about the Dalai Lama but about subduing Tibet, the real question (and challenge) is can India or the US stop China in its tracks?

The Tibet Play

21 June 2024, Times of India

A bipartisan US delegation meeting the Dalai Lama in Dharamshala has brought back the Tibet issue to the front burner. Of course, China has objected to the visit. The delegation included former US House speaker Nancy Pelosi, who had also visited Taiwan in 2022 despite Beijing's protests. Biden is going to soon sign the Resolve Tibet Act, which calls on Beijing to negotiate with the Dalai Lama or his representatives. This puts India, the host country of the Tibetan govt-in-exile, in a decision spot.

Question of future | Given the Dalai Lama's advanced age, the matter of his inevitable succession assumes salience. The US delegation affirmed that Washington would not allow Beijing to interfere with Dalai Lama's succession. Meaning, it will not accept a Beijing-appointed Dalai Lama. India, however, has remained relatively quiet on the matter. But its opinion will matter for the future of the Tibetan movement. It must start thinking now.

Moral imperative | India is expected to continue its support to the Tibetan govt-in-exile and the more than 70,000 Tibetan refugees in the country even after this Dalai Lama. Tibetan refugees also constitute one of the most successful examples of rehabilitation in modern history. At a time China has even stopped referring to Tibet by name – using the Chinese term 'Xizang' instead – it's India that has emerged as the cultural home of Tibetans.

Strategic imperative | Plus, India-China relations are at a major low. China has repeatedly intruded into and occupied Indian territory. Both armies are eyeball-to-eyeball in the higher Himalayas. India has stopped referring to the 'One China' policy for years. And since China doesn't see India as an equal and treats the border dispute as a convenient political tool, New Delhi should have no hesitation in backing the Tibetan cause. India needs leverage. And the Tibet issue is a big one.

What is the Resolve Tibet Act?

21 June 2024, CTA, Anagha Jayakumar

The Resolve Tibet Act passed by Congress on June 12 is a bold successor to the two acts preceding it. We explain.

The United States Congress on June 12 passed the Promoting a Resolution to Tibet-China Dispute Act, better known as the Resolve Tibet Act. The bipartisan legislation now awaits assent from President Joe Biden following which it will be ratified into law.

This act is the third notable piece of legislation that the US has taken regarding Tibet, following the Tibetan Policy Act or TPA (2002), and the Tibetan Policy & Support Act or the TPSA (2020). What are the provisions of the Resolve Tibet Act? How is it different from the previous laws passed by Congress? Key provisions

The Resolve Tibet Act authorises the use of funds to counter Chinese disinformation about Tibet "including disinformation about the history of Tibet, the Tibetan people, and Tibetan institutions, including that of the Dalai Lama."

The act also challenges the Chinese contention that Tibet has been a part of China since ancient times. It urges China to engage in meaningful and direct dialogue with the Dalai Lama or his representatives, as well as democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community "without preconditions, to seek a settlement that resolves differences." Underlining the right of the Tibetan people to self-determination and human rights, the act makes a note of China's duty as a signatory of two covenants – the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights – that advocate the same.

The Resolve Tibet Act seeks to recognise and address the multi-faceted socio-cultural identity of the Tibetan people, in particular their "distinct historical, cultural, religious, and linguistic identity." Finally, it amends the TPA to define the exact geographical areas part of the Tibetan Autonomous Region.

Different from previous legislation

The Resolve Tibet Act is a bold successor to the two acts which preceded it.

The TPA, the first of its kind explicitly concerning Tibet, took a cautious stance in defining American policy on Tibet. While it flagged the ill-treatment of Tibetans, unlike the 2024 act, it recognised China's claim that Tibet was an integral part of China.

The 2002 act encouraged the Chinese government to pursue dialogue with the Dalai Lama as a "constructive partner," but reiterated his lack of intent in pursuing sovereignty or independence for Tibet, stressing instead on his desire for greater autonomy for Tibetans in China. The TPA even clarified that the US government did not maintain any official relations with the Tibetan government-in-exile, led until 2011 by the Dalai Lama himself, and would only meet him in his capacity as a spiritual leader, and Nobel Laureate. The TPSA of 2020 pushed for constructive dialogue between the PRC and the Dalai Lama or his representatives, or democratically elected leaders of Tibet resulting in a "negotiated agreement", encouraging international support towards the same. The Resolve Tibet Act underlines the need for such talks to be pursued without “preconditions” on the terms to seek a settlement that resolves differences.

The TPSA also stated that the matter of succession of the Dalai Lama was not of China’s concern and would best be left to Tibetan Buddhists.

Why Tibet Matters?

21 June 2024, Tibetan Review

Tenzin Dorjee* argues that Tibet matters not just to the Tibetan people for the preservation of their national identity and for upholding the integrity of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights, but also because it occupies a globally critical position as the ‘Roof of the World,’ ‘the Water Tower of Asia,’ and the ‘Third Pole,’ besides being the inheritors of the complete teachings of the Buddha, all of which China has set out to destroy.

Tibet is the “Roof of the World,” “the Water Tower of Asia,” and the “Third Pole.” Despite these facts, Tibet does not garner the same attention and concerns as Ukraine and the Middle East Crisis in today’s news. Understandably, the Ukraine and the Middle East Crisis are houses on fire, and Tibet is apparently not. However, while the world is duly concerned about and attending to the houses on fire, Red China tries to erase even the name ‘Tibet’. It now calls Tibet by its Chinese name ‘Xizang,’ with Tibet as such being no more. China forcibly expects the world to accept the Sinicized name for Tibet – ‘Xizang.’

Nevertheless, the fact remains that Tibet matters geopolitically and Tibet belongs to Tibetans, not Chinese. Arguably, Tibet matters from a social-ecological perspective. This article reflects on why Tibet matters, albeit the world may become apathetic and complacent. Tibet is the “Third Pole” with the world’s largest ice reserves besides the Arctic Circle and Antarctica; Tibet’s ice caps are melting faster than elsewhere. If global warming is of concern for survival reasons, Tibet certainly matters more than that reflected by our current state of thinking. Red China has systematically and forcibly uprooted Tibetan nomads from their pasturelands and mined Tibet’s minerals, including gold, uranium, copper, and other metals. These and innumerable other projects that solely benefits China – ‘the Great Motherland’ – have ravaged the ecology of Tibet. The victims are not only Tibet, Tibetans and Tibetan animals and birds, but also the world at large. Satellite images show the Tibetan mountains, including Mt. Kailash – my birthplace – holy to the Bon, Tibetan Buddhism, and Hindu faiths, are bare and unsightly as global temperatures keep swelling. Tibet is the Roof of the World; if the roof caves in, the world, too, will cave in. Saving Tibet is saving the world.

Air and water are essential for the survival and thriving of the human civilization. Tibet is the “Water Tower of Asia” – lifeline for almost 2 billion people living in the downstream countries, including China, India, Bangladesh, Vietnam, and Cambodia. Water, not oil, is the most basic necessity of life. The major rivers of Asia, including the Indus, Brahmaputra, Sutlej, Mekong, and Yangtze, originate in Tibet. China has built mega dams to harness Tibet’s waters and in times of war, it can cut off the water lifeline for India and other downstream countries. A prominent geostrategist, Brahma Chellaney, argues that water wars are waged among riparian neighbours in many parts of the world in his book Water, Peace, and War: Confronting the Global Water Crisis (2013) and China controls the major water sources of Asia in Tibet.

Recently, China donated 1,500 tonnes of Tibet’s Glacier Water to the Maldives while the downstream countries face draught issues. China is known for toxic loan diplomacy, pressuring loan-recipient countries to support its global expansion policies to unseat the U.S. global leadership. Now, China has started water-gifting diplomacy with Maldives which is expected to accept Chinese name “Xizang” instead of the established English name Tibet. Global warming and water crisis are likely to trigger the next geopolitical war in Asia. Our world cannot afford a Third or another global war, especially between the two giants in Asia – India and Red China. Tibet matters in saving Asia and the world at large.

Also, as long as faith and human rights matter, Tibet matters. Human rights are universal rights enshrined in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. These rights include the freedom of faith or religious belief, freedom of speech, and freedom to speak one’s mother tongue. China has enslaved the Tibetans, as is evident in the latest report of the Freedom of House (2024). The House rated Tibet -2/40 on political rights and 2/60 on civil rights, yielding an overall score of 0/100. Tibet is China’s North Korea regarding human rights and freedom.

According to Tibetan sociologist Dr. Gyal Lo, who has testified at various hearings, China has forcibly removed over 1 million Tibetan children from their homes and segregated them into Colonial Boarding Schools, where they have restricted the teaching of Tibetan language and forced the Chinese language on them instead. The National Endowment for Democracy (NED) in Washington, D.C., awarded a 2024 Medal to the Tibet Action Institute’s Lhadon Tethong and Dr. Gyal Lo for documenting China’s assimilation policies and ruthless colonial boarding school system in Tibet. This is only a recent manifestation of China’s systematic plan and action to erase Tibetan linguistic and cultural identity. NED also honoured Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the political leader of Tibetans, with a 2024 medal for his service to sustaining and promoting Tibetan democracy in exile. The European Parliament has called on China to address this issue but dismissed its call. China feels the importance of being assertive and listens to no one but themselves.

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom (USCIRF) and the State Department of the United States annually rated China as a Country of Particular Concern for systematically, continuously, and egregiously violating its citizens' freedom of religion and belief. China has persecuted Christians, Uyghurs, Buddhists, Falun Gong, and other Sinicized religions to serve the Communist Ideology and Power Control.

In Tibet, according to a new report, China has mandated the Buddhist Association of China (BAC) to implement President Xi's thoughts and strategies to Sinify or Sinicize Tibetan Buddhism. The Chinese leadership believes that Sinicizing Tibetan Buddhism will erase the Tibetan identity that is rooted in Buddhism. As a significant part of it, they formulated laws and policies to control the unique Tibetan reincarnation system. China has installed Gyaltsan Norbu as the 11th Panchen Lama, completely disappearing the real Panchen Lama Gedhun Choekyi Nyima, recognized by His Holiness the Dalai Lama, for over thirty years. They feel so assured of their control of Panchen Lama's reincarnation that they intend to do the same with the next reincarnation of His Holiness, the Dalai Lama. But their plan will be a fiasco as His Holiness the Dalai Lama lives in India, and he will reincarnate in a free country if the Tibet-China conflict persists.

The United States has passed and implemented several laws, such as the Tibet Policy and Support Act and the Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act, to counteract China's plans and actions. A high-level U.S. Congressional delegation, including Speaker Emerita Nancy Pelosi, led by the US House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Michael McCaul, has met with His Holiness the Dalai Lama, presented a copy of the recently passed Promoting Resolution to Tibet-China Dispute bill to him. It also met with the Tibetan Political Leader Sikyong Penpa Tsering and the Tibetan Parliament Speaker, Deputy Speaker, and members in Dharamsala, India, the seat of the Central Tibetan Administration. Along with everyone else, I urge President Biden to sign the bill as soon as possible and implement it earnestly. Notably, this would-be law requires the United States to counteract China's misinformation about the historically independent status of Tibet and to reject any installation by China of the next Dalai Lama, as Tibetans have the sole right to decide on their reincarnation system.

Last but not the least, Tibet matters because Tibetan Buddhism matters globally and locally. Tibet had remained isolated for centuries and preserved the Nalanda Tradition of Buddhism intact in the Tibetan language. It is now being restricted and sought to be erased in Tibet by Red China. India is the Guru and the Tibet is Chela or Disciple. Tibetan Buddhism traces its origin and lineage to the ancient Nalanda Monastic University in India. Undisputedly, the largest and complete collection of Buddhism now exists in the Tibetan language (which is invented, based on the Devanagari script of India): It includes 108 volumes of Sutras (Words of Buddha), over 200 volumes of Shastras (Indian Commentaries), and thousands of other volumes authored by Tibetan masters over the centuries. Guru-Chela relationship is the most sacred and ultimate relationship of all and India has graciously hosted Tibetan refugees for decades.

China aggressively claims Arunachal Pradesh as South Tibet and has named various locations with Sinicized Tibetan names. In a tit-for-tat response, India is going to decide to rename many places in Tibet proper. I urge India that now is the time to firmly and actively support resolving the Sino-Tibetan issues via peaceful negotiation (Ahimsa) between His Holiness the Dalai Lama or Tibetan political leadership and China. The United States will firmly stand with India on such actions.

Tibetans have re-established in exile in India many of their monastic universities, such as Sera, Drepung, Gaden, and Tashi Lhunpo, where monks systematically pursue Buddhism in the Nalanda Tradition, leading to the Geshe Lharampa Degree (Ph.D. equivalent) after twenty-five years of study and debate. The native Bon religion and the four major traditions of Tibetan Buddhism thrive in diaspora in India with their respective monasteries and study centres. Tibetan Buddhism and culture pervade the Himalayan regions of Ladakh, Spiti, and Kinnaur, Mongolia, and it has now spread to different parts of the world. Sinicizing Tibetan Buddhism will not work in the long run as Tibetan Buddhism has already spread far and wide and is not confined to the China-controlled Tibet.

Tibet matters globally and locally so long as the above reasons matter. Saving Tibet is saving Asia and the world at large.

South China Sea tensions force US and Beijing to talk more

21 June 2024, BBC, Laura Bicker

Washington and Beijing are talking more regularly to avoid a conflict in the South China Sea despite their "contentious and competitive" relationship, the United States ambassador to China has told the BBC.

"Our militaries are operating in very close proximity to one another in the South China Sea and in the Taiwan Strait. You don't want to send the wrong signal," Nicholas Burns said in an interview in Beijing earlier this week.

The South China Sea has become a dangerous flashpoint, where Beijing's claims are ratcheting up tensions with Taiwan and Philippines, as well as their most powerful ally, the US.

Chinese and Philippine vessels have been playing a dicey cat-and-mouse game in the contested waters in recent months - the latest altercation this week allegedly involved Chinese coastguard personnel boarding a Philippine boat and attacking soldiers with swords and knives.

The US, which has stitched together military alliances from Manila to Tokyo, has repeatedly vowed to defend its allies' rights in the South China Sea.

This has further strained ties with China - the relationship was already reeling from Russia's invasion of Ukraine, Chinese claims over self-governed Taiwan and a trade war.

Mr Burns said these were flashpoints that still "completely divided" the two sides, but it was important to try to "get people together" where possible.

"The Chinese have agreed to increase our military-to-military communications and that's really critical for us. You want to have communication because the last thing we want is an accident, a misunderstanding that leads to conflict," said the 68-year-old diplomat. While tensions have eased, the upcoming US presidential election has the potential to disrupt the relationship again.

"We've warned the Chinese not to involve themselves in our election in any way, shape or form," Mr Burns said, adding that the US was "very concerned" about the possibility.

Earlier this year FBI officials said China would likely continue its efforts to sow divisions and could help spread disinformation online.

The ambassador said the FBI also had evidence of "cyber aggression by Chinese authorities" against the US. Beijing has always denied accusations of state-sponsored cyber warfare and says it too is a victim of this type of crime.

Both Joe Biden and Donald Trump are vying to be tough on Beijing, a strategy they see as a vote-winner. In May, President Biden announced a raft of new tariffs on Chinese-made electric cars, solar panels and other goods. Few electric cars reach US shores, but Ambassador Burns denied that domestic politics had played a part in this decision.

He said this was an "economic move" designed to safeguard American jobs. Meanwhile, China has warned it may retaliate with tariffs of its own.

But there are some bright spots despite the rivalry.

Before sitting down for our interview, Mr Burns had a meeting with China's climate envoy as the world's two biggest polluters try to find ways to reduce harmful emissions.

Washington and Beijing are also holding what are described as "high-level talks" to prevent the drug fentanyl reaching US shores, which Mr Burns described as "critical".

Most of his meetings are at a ministerial level and audiences with President Xi are reserved for when senior US officials, such as Secretary of State Antony Blinken, visit.

Both sides have also vowed to work towards more "people-to-people" exchanges. This comes as the number of US students studying in China has fallen from around 15,000 in 2011 to 800.

Mr Xi hopes to open the door for 50,000 American students to come to China in the next five years. He said on a visit to San Francisco last November that it was the "ultimate wish of our two peoples for exchanges and cooperation".

But Ambassador Burns accused parts of the Chinese government of not taking these warm words seriously: "Since the San Francisco summit, there have been 61 separate incidents when the security forces or a government ministry have prevented Chinese citizens from participating in public diplomacy programmes at this house, at our embassy or they have prevented people from travelling to the US to participate in joint trips - so it has been very difficult for us to bring people together."

On the other side, Chinese students and academics have reported being unfairly targeted by US border officials. Beijing's embassy in Washington lodged a formal protest and accused US authorities of "unwarrantedly" interrogating, harassing, cancelling the visas of and even deporting several students from China with valid travel permits upon their arrival in the US.

China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs also described the allegation as "groundless".

"The US has been using national security as excuse for a long time, interfering normal people-to-people communications and exchanges between the countries, ongoing unwarranted harassment, questioning and repatriation of Chinese students and scholars to the U.S.. This has created a serious chilling effect," a spokesperson told the BBC.

Washington has also placed a "level 3" travel advisory on China urging visitors to "reconsider" their travel. Mr Burns denied this alert was contradictory to a US plea to "bring people together," but was rather a precaution.

"There are Americans imprisoned here who we believe are wrongfully detained, wrongfully prosecuted, I've been visiting these prisoners and we want them released." He said several Americans had been subjected to “exit bans” by China and had their passports taken at the airport and could not leave.

China, in turn, has left the US off a list of countries that are exempt from visas for up to 15 days of travel - Australia is on the list after Beijing recently mended ties with Canberra.

That “people-to-people” contact – a relatively easy goal in an otherwise thorny relationship – is proving to be so difficult is perhaps a sign of the continuing lack of trust on both sides.

But the biggest fault line for now may well be the war in Ukraine.

The US seems to believe China could hold the key to halting Russia’s progress on the battlefield. And Ambassador Burns reiterated Washington’s message that Beijing’s support for Moscow’s invasion will not be tolerated.

“China is not neutral in this war,” he said. “China is showing its true colours. It’s supporting Russia, supporting Putin as he unleashes this barbaric war on Ukrainian civilians. We know what is being shipped by Chinese companies and we know the impact it is having on Russia’s ability to conduct this war.”

He said there were “tens of thousands” of Chinese companies supporting Moscow. “We have sanctioned a great number and we are prepared to do more if the government here does not pull back.”

His statements echo those made by the G7 in Italy last week, which claimed China’s support for Russia was “enabling” the war in Ukraine. They also threatened more sanctions to punish Chinese entities that they say are helping Russia circumvent Western embargoes.

Beijing has dismissed these warnings as “full of arrogance, prejudice and lies”.

Still, some would call this an improvement from 2022. Following then-Democratic House Speaker Nancy Pelosi’s visit to Taiwan, an infuriated Beijing shut down all cabinet-level communication in Washington. Relations again nose-dived in early 2023 on the eve of a visit from Mr Blinken. He cancelled his trip after the US shot down a high-altitude Chinese balloon which flew across North American airspace.

Ties finally stabilised only in November last year when Mr Biden and Mr Xi met in San Francisco.

Mr Burns said his first two years in post were tough – there was little communication with Chinese officials. Now, he adds, relations are “relatively better” but he sees a tough road ahead: “This very difficult rivalry is going to be present for some time to come.”

Exiled Tibet Leader Calls on World to Press China Into Talks

20 June 2024, Bloomberg, Sudhi Ranjan Sen and Dan Strumof

The head of Tibet’s government-in-exile encouraged countries to join the US in pressuring China to resume direct negotiations with Tibetan officials, calling recently passed legislation strengthening American support for overseas leaders of the region an important new tool.

Penpa Tsering, the prime minister of the government-in-exile, said back-channel discussions with the Chinese government have taken place since January of last year, but nothing concrete has emerged. Beijing and Tibetan officials held nine rounds of talks between 2002 and 2010 with no clear outcome. No formal discussions have been held since then.

“First thing would be to establish – reestablish contact,” he said during an interview with Bloomberg TV in the northern Indian town of Dharamshala, where his government has been based since 1960.

“We know that China respects only strength, not weakness, so we ask people or countries to stand up for the values of freedom and human dignity and democracy,” he added.

His comments follow a visit by a high-level US congressional delegation to Dharamshala led by House Foreign Affairs Chairman Michael McCaul and including former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. The bipartisan group of lawmakers arrived on Tuesday, holding talks with officials from the Central Tibetan Administration and meeting with the Dalai Lama, Tibet’s spiritual leader.

“The so-called Tibetan government-in-exile is an out and out separatist political group and an illegal organization in total violation of China’s constitution and laws,” Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Lin Jian said Thursday at a regular press briefing in Beijing. “The 14th Dalai Lama must thoroughly reflect on and completely correct his political propositions.” Earlier this month, the US Congress passed the Resolve Tibet Act, which strengthens Washington’s support for Tibet’s exiled leaders, including the Dalai Lama, and pushes for Beijing to negotiate with them. President Joe Biden is expected to sign the bill into law.

The Chinese government has condemned the act and the lawmakers’ visit. Beijing considers the Dalai Lama a separatist for his commitment to limited autonomy for the region of Tibet, which China annexed in the 1950s. The Dalai Lama and other monks later fled to India as refugees and set up a government-in-exile.

“We urge the US to clearly see the sensitivity and importance of Xizang-related issues, earnestly respect China’s core interests, honor its commitment on Xizang, refrain from having any forms of engagement with the Dalai group and stop sending out to the world wrong signals," said Lin, using another word for the Tibetan region.

The issue remains a diplomatic sensitivity between India and China, which has at times accused New Delhi of conspiring with the US to undermine Beijing's authority in Tibet. Relations between the two soured after a 2020 border clash that left over 20 Indian soldiers dead. New Delhi and Washington have grown closer in the aftermath of that incident, with the congressional delegation's visit to Dharamashala coinciding with one from US National Security Advisor Jake Sullivan to New Delhi for high-level talks.

The Chinese government has said the Dalai Lama can return only if he gives up any pretensions for an independent Tibet. The Dalai Lama and his supporters say they don't seek independence but instead greater autonomy within China's system, including an elected legislature and independent judicial system. Beijing rejects the claim as insincere.

A Chinese foreign ministry spokesman on Tuesday urged the US to "see the anti-China separatism nature" of the Dalai Lama and his followers.

In his comments to Bloomberg TV, Tsering called the Resolve Tibet Act "a new tool in our hands to reach out to other governments and see whether they can take similar positions." Tsering said recent back-channel communications with Beijing have taken place through interlocutors, and said re-establishment of official contact was a key next step.

He also addressed the question of who might follow the current Dalai Lama, saying that succession would be "purely religious and traditional."

No successor to the 88-year-old spiritual leader has been designated yet, but Beijing has started laying out the case for why it should appoint the next Dalai Lama instead of his exiled supporters in northern India.

That has heightened fears among followers of the Dalai Lama that, after his passing, there will be two claimants to the position: one selected by them and another by the Chinese government. Questions of who will replace the Dalai Lama are sensitive, pitting China against nations like the US, which has warned Beijing against interfering with the process.

On Monday, the monk told a small group of reporters in Dharamshala that he isn't yet thinking about his reincarnation.

What is the Tibet-China Dispute Act passed by US Congress last week?

19 June 2024, Business Standard, Bhaswar Kumar

A Bill that aims to counter China's position that it has controlled Tibet since 'ancient times' and to promote dialogue between Beijing and exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, was passed by US lawmakers and went to President Joe Biden's desk last week.

The House of Representatives, the lower chamber of the US Congress, voted 391-26 on June 12 to approve the Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act, which had passed the Senate, the upper chamber, last month.

A press release on the website of Jeff Merkley, the Democratic senator from the US state of Oregon who had introduced the Bill in the Senate, said that the US Congress had passed the "bipartisan Bill to enhance US support for Tibet and promote dialogue between the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the Dalai Lama towards a peaceful resolution of the long-standing dispute between Tibet and China".

The release added, "The Promoting a Resolution to the Tibet-China Dispute Act now goes to President Biden, who is expected to sign it into law."

What does the Bill aim to do?

In essence, the Bill aims to harden Washington's position on Tibet and pressure Beijing into resuming negotiations with the Dalai Lama.

No formal dialogue between Chinese and Tibetan authorities has happened since 2010.

The Bill aims to direct funds to counter what it describes as "disinformation" from China about Tibet's history, people and institutions.

The Bill also refutes Beijing's claim that Tibet has been part of China since ancient times. And, going a step further, it would make it official US policy that the dispute over Tibet's status is unresolved.

It would also make it policy that Tibet refers not only to the Tibet autonomous region, as defined by Beijing, but also Tibetan areas of the Chinese provinces of Qinghai, Gansu, Yunnan, and Sichuan. The Act aims to enhance US support for Tibet. It would empower US State Department officials to "actively and directly counter disinformation about Tibet from the Chinese government, rejecting false claims that Tibet has been part of China since 'ancient times'," said the release from Merkley's website.

The Act will also push for negotiations "without preconditions" between the Chinese government and the Dalai Lama or his representatives or the democratically elected leaders of the Tibetan community.

Finally, it will also make it the US State Department's responsibility to "coordinate with other governments in multilateral efforts" towards the goal of "a negotiated agreement on Tibet".

CCP's status quo in Tibet 'not acceptable'

"The people of Tibet deserve to be in charge of their own future, and, today, Congress has voted to stand with Tibetans in their struggle for freedom and self-determination," said Merkley, co-chair of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, according to the release.

Merkley added that the Act would help "counter misinformation from the Chinese government about Tibet" and would push for "negotiations between the PRC and Tibet to end this longstanding dispute".

"I look forward to President Biden swiftly signing this Bill into law... the people of Tibet cannot wait any longer," said Merkley.

"Our bipartisan Bill will refresh US policy towards Tibet and push for negotiations that advance freedom for the Tibetan people and a peaceful resolution to the CCP's conflict with the Dalai Lama," said Indiana's Republican Senator Todd Young.

Young added that Congressional passage of the Bill "further demonstrates America's resolve that the CCP's status quo – both in Tibet and elsewhere – is not acceptable".

"Let the overwhelming passage of our strong, bipartisan Bill be a clear message to the Tibetan people: America stands with you on the side of human dignity, and we support you in your quest to secure the basic rights to which you are entitled under international law," said Democratic US Representative Jim McGovern, who is also a member of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China. "The PRC has systematically denied Tibetans the right to self-determination and continues to deliberately erase Tibetan religion, culture, and language. The ongoing oppression of the Tibetan people is a grave tragedy, and our Bill provides further tools that empower both America and the international community to stand up for justice and peace," added McGovern.

What is China's position on Tibet?

China claims that Tibet has been under central Chinese rule for over 700 years.

However, Tibetan activists have argued that the region was self-governed for extended periods.

While the Dalai Lama has not recognised Beijing's historical claim over Tibet, he has also said that he does not seek political independence for the region.

In April, the Chinese foreign ministry said that any talks with the Dalai Lama would not address the question of Tibetan autonomy. Instead, any such talks would only concern his "personal future" or that of his close associates.

At present, the US State Department considers the Tibet autonomous region and other Tibetan areas to be a part of China.

However, Washington has not explicitly taken the position that Beijing's occupation of Tibet in the 1950s was in accordance with international law.

The forced assimilation of Tibet

18 June 2024, Taipei Times, Khedroob Thondup

The situation in Tibet is complex and sensitive, with reports saying the Chinese government is attempting to assimilate Tibetan culture into the Han culture.

China's approach to education in Tibet has raised significant concerns regarding the forced assimilation of Tibetan children. About 1 million have reportedly been separated from their families and placed into government-run boarding schools.

The educational content of the schools revolve around the Han culture, with Mandarin as the medium of instruction. The system is seen as a large-scale program intended to assimilate Tibetans into Han culture.

The focus on Mandarin and Han cultural norms has resulted in Tibetan children losing proficiency in their native language and, consequently, the ability to communicate effectively with their elders, contributing to the erosion of their Tibetan identity.

The increase in boarding students is partly due to the closure of rural schools, which have been replaced by township or county-level institutions which primarily use Mandarin for teaching and communication, often requiring children to board.

The measures are part of what some experts describe as a policy of forced assimilation, which runs contrary to international human rights standards for education, linguistic and cultural rights, and freedom of religion or belief.

China's constitution states that citizens "enjoy freedom of religious belief," but limits protections to "normal religious activities" without defining what "normal" is. Regulations stipulate religious activity must not harm national security and control all aspects of Tibetan Buddhism.

The Chinese Communist Party promotes "Sinicization" policies which aim to interpret religious ideas in accordance with its ideologies, and emphasize loyalty to the party and the state.

There have been reports of disappearances, arrests, torture, physical abuse and prolonged detentions without trials due to their religious practices. People have also reportedly died in custody or as a result of long-term illnesses and injuries sustained following beatings and mistreatment during incarceration.

The government has undertaken a large-scale campaign of "re-education" or "vocational training" in military-style camps to conduct forced political indoctrination, and to transform farmers and herders into laborers in other industries.

Authorities have also arrested writers, singers and artists for promoting Tibetan language and culture. Supporters of the Dalai Lama and other religious leaders could be arrested under China's anti-organized crime program.

These are challenges faced by Tibetans practicing their religion and maintaining their cultural identity. They reflect concerns raised by human rights organizations and independent experts regarding the preservation of Tibetan culture and identity.

China's massive attack against India: A looming possibility

17 June 2024, ORF, Kartik Bommakanti

India might be deceiving itself by believing China will limit itself to "grey-zone operations" along the Sino-Indian border, avoiding all-out war. This assumption, while comforting, could be dangerous.

Now that the dust has settled with the conclusion of the 2024 parliamentary elections, it is time to take stock of India's ongoing boundary confrontation with the People's Republic of China (PRC). Notwithstanding Prime Minister Narendra Modi's conciliatory statement that India and China must restore peace and tranquillity on their contested boundary, all adversarial relationships, especially involving territorial disputes, hold the distinct possibility of culminating into a full-fledged war and the India-China relationship is no exception. The wider strategic community believes that a massive attack by the PRC against India will never happen. In fact, one former Indian envoy to the PRC observed recently: "So there is a pattern of aggressive behaviour [from China], of trying to change status quo [against India and in the South China Sea (SCS)] through salami slicing, incremental steps by staying short of an all-out military conflict and changing ground realities." This statement by itself is not wrong, but salami slicing and incremental gains, which the PRC has already made against India, are among a menu of possibilities, which includes a massive attack and full-scale war. The difficulty with worst-case assumptions about the prospect of menacing adversary behaviour is that they mandate economic sacrifices that civilians do not want to make.

Unfortunately, the worst is possible, and India experienced this with the outbreak of the Sino-Indian War in 1962. After all, as Krishna Menon who was Defence Minister during the 1962 war ruefully observed: "...I make no secret of the fact that we were not prepared for a war [massive attack] against China...We expected negotiation and diplomacy to play their part [not war]." The run-up to the war also sowed civil-military tensions especially under the Indian Army Chief General Thimmaya to the extent that the latter, who was "acutely" aware of the China threat warned that the Nehru-led leadership was not paying attention to China's robust military strength and the distinct possibility that Beijing could attack massively. At most, the Nehru government saw only a "limited attack" as a possibility that India could counter with the defences it was preparing. History is instructive in the present challenge that China poses India. The ongoing confrontation between India and China is similar, but not identical to the one faced by Nehru's India in the run-up to the 1962 War. Before the onset of the 1962 conflict, Nehru was wedded to his own assumptions that the superpowers would restrain the Chinese which would be adequate to head off a Sino-Indian War. At best limited military measures both in capabilities and logistics from India's end would suffice, Nehru concluded. The leadership was also convinced that China would not want war with India because it would trigger a world war, which in turn rested on the assumption that India was too critical to the balance of power for the two Cold War superpowers—namely the United States (US) and the erstwhile Soviet Union. They believed that the Soviets would restrain the Chinese. A critical corollary reinforcing these assumptions for the Nehru-led Indian government was that the series of skirmishes along the Sino-Indian boundary such as the violent, yet limited clashes in geographic scope and force that occurred in Longju and Kongka Pass would be the shape of Chinese conduct obviating the need for India to robustly build-up its defences against a massive Chinese attack. It turned out to be a fatal error because the Nehru-led leadership fell victim to Chinese deception as it inferred too much from skirmishes in that it provided confirmation bias to Nehru's existing belief that China cannot want war along the contested Sino-Indian boundary and rested on the assumption that these limited clashes would be the enduring pattern of Chinese military conduct along the disputed frontier.

Unfortunately, the worst is possible, and India experienced this with the outbreak of the Sino-Indian War in 1962.

These were the deeply held beliefs until the Chinese shattered them in October of 1962. In the Eastern sector of the boundary during the 1962 War or formerly called the Northeast Frontier Agency (NEFA), the People's Liberation Army (PLA) overran Indian Army defences to the point that they almost reached the outskirts of Guwahati. They also killed thousands of Indian soldiers and took several thousand Prisoners of War (POW). What saved the day for India in the Eastern sector or the erstwhile North East Frontier Agency (NEFA) and what is now called Arunachal Pradesh was the Chinese decision to withdraw their forces behind the McMahon Line unilaterally. In the Western sector of the boundary, the Indian Army performed better, because its defences and logistics capabilities were better built. These were the only two consolatory outcomes for India from that humiliating war. Otherwise, poor leadership at the national level, low spending on defence capabilities, poor command, low force morale among Indian troops and weak logistics combined to produce a disastrous military outcome, especially in the NEFA.

In the Eastern sector of the boundary during the 1962 War or formerly called the Northeast Frontier Agency (NEFA), the People's Liberation Army (PLA) overran Indian Army defences to the point that they almost reached the outskirts of Guwahati.

While India has improved significantly over the years in terms of logistics, airfields, a greater number of all-weather roads and capabilities for the IA, China's capabilities in the form of air defences, air bases, heliports and logistics along the Sino-Indian boundary and the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) has also improved considerably. There is a widespread consensus in India that a massive attack will not be executed by the PRC with the latter confining itself to the seizure of territory in Eastern Ladakh as what happened in April-May of 2020, the bloody Galwan clash that ensued the following month and the attempted seizure of Yangtse by the PLA in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary in December 2022. It rests on the rather quaint assumption that China has already made the territorial gains it intended to make against India in 2020 and at best a limited attack of some sort is likely, but not a massive attack—a view held by a wide swathe of Indian strategic establishment. It is entirely plausible that India might be falling prey to the same level of deception as before that China in contemporary parlance would restrict itself to “grey-zone operations” or the odd skirmish and intrusion throughout the Sino-Indian boundary and will not pursue an all-out war or a substantial attack. This assumption may be psychologically comforting but potentially damaging. There is a widespread consensus in India that a massive attack will not be executed by the PRC with the latter confining itself to the seizure of territory in Eastern Ladakh as what happened in April-May of 2020, the bloody Galwan clash that ensued the following month and the attempted seizure of Yangtse by the PLA in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary in December 2022.

Spending on defence as the Interim Budget tabled before the Parliament vividly shows is simply inadequate to meet the shortfall in capabilities the Indian Armed Forces currently face. Constraints on military spending have been further exacerbated by supply bottlenecks due to the ongoing Russia-Ukraine war with the IAF unable to spend the allocations made to the service in last year's full budget. In any potential Sino-Indian boundary war, the IAF will have a pivotal role to play and if the service is inadequately equipped due to military supply constraints, New Delhi will need to move away from reliance on Russian military hardware or weapons and spares. If anything, it lends more urgency to India's need to diversify away from Russia, because China could see an opportunity to launch a massive attack against India, due to India's dependence on Moscow for military supplies. Tacit or even explicit collusion between Beijing and Moscow could also crystallise if the former launched a massive attack against India as what happened in the 1962 Sino-Indian boundary war. India's dependence on Russian military hardware only compounds India's Russia supply problem. Even worse, there is still a presumption in India that an outright war triggered or caused by China will catalyse US to intervene on India's behalf. This is highly conditional. Again, history is instructive. Lest we forget, Washington intervened and extended military aid on behalf of India only after the Nehru-led government sought it in late October 1962. In the event of a Sino-Indian War today, it may happen if India solicits American military assistance or may not happen even after India seeks aid from the US. There is neither automaticity nor inevitability to the extension of American military aid to India because Washington retains the choice not to do so and may be compelled to demur due to its commitments to Israel, Ukraine and its East Asian allies in the Indo-Pacific. This will leave India confronting a militarily hostile and aggressive PRC entirely on its own making it imperative to augment India's conventional military strength. Therefore, taking American support for granted will, at a minimum be risky and at a maximum dangerous, for New Delhi. The costs of leaving things to chance are prohibitive for New Delhi.

History provides illuminative value for the realities India confronts today against China. Now that the Modi government has been re-elected to a third term, it is time to prioritise defence spending, especially capital acquisitions, and for a broader defence roadmap to tackle the China challenge on the military front.

View: India must revive its Tibetan Buddhist links to show a mirror to China

15 June 2024, Hindustan Times, Shishir Gupta

The Modi government has no intentions of renaming places in Tibet as a tit for tat to China. India has umbilical links with Tibet.

New Delhi: Four years ago on this day, the Gallant 20 led by brave 16 Bihar Commanding Officer Colonel B Santosh Babu repelled a PLA attack near Patrolling Point 14 in Galwan in East Ladakh, resulting in death of 20 Indian soldiers and an unspecified number of PLA personnel.

While many Indian soldiers lost their lives due to drowning in frozen Galwan river, the brief skirmish was a game changer as the Indian Army, shedding the 1962 loss, took on the aggressive PLA and ensured that Chinese did not disturb the status quo in Galwan by erecting a new post.

Apart from the PLA aggression in East Ladakh in May 2020, the Xi Jinping regime has launched full-fledged information warfare against India by renaming geographical entities in Arunachal Pradesh. In 2017, the Chinese released Mandarin version of six places in Arunachal Pradesh, 15 places in 2021 in second list, 11 more places in third list in 2021 and in March 2024, another 30 places were renamed by Xi Jinping regime as if to earmark their claims on the Indian border state.

While there were media reports of India planning to rename some 30 places in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) as a riposte to the Chinese exercise in Arunachal Pradesh, the Ministry of External Affairs is not aware of any such exercise.

Fact is that India does not need to do any renaming in Tibet to make its point to the Communist Party of China as the Indo-Tibetan plateau of Lamas has ancient links with India through Buddhism. Mount Kailash and Mansarovar Lake in Tibet are revered by both the Hindus and the Tibetan Buddhist alike with Hindus making pilgrimage to the abode of Lord Shiva for centuries.

Despite Chinese communists trying to impose atheism on the Tibetan and Chinese people at large,

Tibet Digest December - January 2024

Buddhism is growing in China by leaps and bounds. Fabulous Buddhist temples are being built all over China especially in Tibet so much so that priests and followers of the religion have given up on meat eating and turned vegetarians. Since Buddhism spread to Tibet through teachers in Nalanda in Bihar, all the major sutras are based in Sanskrit and hence chanted as such including ubiquitous "Om Mani Padme Hum." Hindu female deity 'Saraswati' resembles Manjushri, a Bodhisattva representing transcendent wisdom in Mahayana Buddhism. The list goes on and on. Suffice to say that India-Tibet links are civilizational and intertwined through the Nalanda-Lhasa link of the past centuries. After all, it was the Nalanda masters who taught Buddhism to their Tibetan counterparts, a fact acknowledged time and again by the 14th Dalai Lama.

Despite 74 years of brutal occupation by the Han Chinese, the Communist Party of China, much to its chagrin, finds Buddhism flourishing in Tibet and the chants of Sanskrit based sutras pervading the Indo-Tibetan plateau. India does not need to rename places in Tibet to emphasize on its historical relationship with the four sects of Tibetan Buddhism, it is reverberated in the mantras daily in the highlands and in the temples. It is time that India recognizes its past linkages and ancient tradition with Tibet. This alone will give jitters to the Xi Jinping regime.

Before signing bipartisan-Tibet-Bill, PrezBiden ought to know it is merely a token exercise. By Hem Raj Jain

14 June 2024, Pakistan Christian Post

Tibet Bill is classic example of "Muddai Sust Gavah Chust" (Petitioner is lazy / disinterested but witnesses are serious / alert / interested) (2)- Prez Biden before signing Tibet Bill should demand (i)- proofs of Tibetan's STRUGGLE for freedom and self-determination (ii)- categorical statements of TGE / Dalai Lama declaring independence of Tibet (iii)- Expected role of the USA & Tibet-bordering-India in militarily helping this 'struggle' (3)- If the USA is really interested in independence of Tibet then it should commission US-Tibetan-Buddhism for this mission (4)- The USA will have to clarify Pakistan policy also because part of Tibet (in Ladakh) is with Pakistan.

The US Congress (in the present global scenario of Cold War-II where the USA is trying to contain & discipline China) may be thinking that the USA has unsettled China and has put it on defensive by passing bipartisan Tibet Bill which is waiting for the signatures of Prez Biden to become law (as reported at <https://mcgovern.house.gov/news/> documentsingle.aspx?DocumentID=400111) but the USA is living in its make believe world if it thinks so (about unsettling China and putting it on defensive by this Tibet Bill) for the reasons explained below:-

(1)- The commentary by Jim McGovern on Tibet Bill says that "The people of Tibet deserve to be in charge of their own future, and, today, Congress has voted to stand with Tibetans in their struggle for freedom and self-determination" but this is not supported by facts on ground. Rather, "Tibet Bill is classic example of "Muddai Sust Gavah Chust" (Petitioner is lazy / disinterested but witnesses are serious / alert / interested) because there is no armed struggle (which only matter in any independence struggle) by Tibetans for their independence.

2)- Hence Prez Biden before signing Tibet Bill should demand from the US-Congress (i)- The proofs of Tibetan's STRUGGLE for freedom and self-determination (ii)- The categorical statements of Tibet Government in Exile (the TGE at Dharamshala) / Dalai Lama declaring independence of Tibet especially given the fact that Dalai Lama in the past has been equivocal about independence of Tibet and has been saying that he is not for separation of Tibet from China (as mentioned in <https://www.pakistanchristianpost.com/opinion-details/4376> about <https://www.hudson.org/human-rights/the-dalai-lama-is-an-anti-separatist-element> ) and (iii)- The expected role of the USA & Tibet bordering-India in militarily helping this 'struggle' (3)- If the USA is really interested in independence of Tibet then it should commission US-Tibetan-Buddhism for this mission as mentioned at <https://www.pakistanchristianpost.com/opinion-details/4376> otherwise this Tibet Bill is merely a token exercise or maximum a trial balloon to see how China reacts to it and will create more problems / confusion for Tibetans and for the larger world community.

(4)- The USA will have to clarify Pakistan policy also because part of Tibet ( Ladakh) is with Pakistan and India is already talking about recovering PoK militarily back from Pakistan.

Therefore Prez Biden should be objective before signing the said bipartisan-Tibet-Bill and should sign it only when Tibetans show any interest (worth the name on ground) in their independence.

Why China takes young Tibetans from their families

13 June 2024, The Economist

Visiting a Tibetan region where children must attend Chinese-language boarding schools

An air of quiet piety hangs over Rongwo Monastery in the western province of Qinghai. The streets near this ancient complex draw pilgrims and Tibetan Buddhist monks in dark red robes. Local believers make circuits around the monastery's yellow walls, turning a line of wooden prayer-wheels as they walk. On a recent Monday afternoon, though, chattering schoolchildren thronged this sacred neighbourhood in the heart of Tongren, a small mountain city known to Tibetans as Rebkong. Youngsters in red scarves and uniform tracksuits bought fruit and snacks from market stalls, most without a parent in sight. Teenage high-schoolers and pupils half their age hauled small suitcases or sat in weary groups beside piles of schoolbags, bringing the bustle of a railway station to streets around the monastery.

Government policy explains the hundreds of unaccompanied minors filling Tongren's historic centre. This particular Monday was a public holiday for pupils across China, as the country marked the Dragon Boat Festival with a long weekend. But these youngsters were overwhelmingly ethnic Tibetans. As a result, on an overcast holiday afternoon they had already bid their families goodbye and were now heading back to one of Tongren's dozen or so boarding schools, in time for classes the next morning.

An ever-larger majority of Tibetan youths attend state-run boarding schools at the primary and secondary level, and in extreme cases pre-schools. That is true whether they live in the harshly policed Tibet Autonomous Region, or in the parts of historical Tibet that the Communist Party carved off and handed to the neighbouring provinces of Gansu, Qinghai, Sichuan and Yunnan (these are run as "Tibetan autonomous prefectures"). At least 78% of Tibetan pupils board, according to official data collected by the Tibet Action Institute, an overseas campaign group.

Lessons in these schools marginalise Tibetan culture. Over the past few years Mandarin Chinese has replaced Tibetan as the medium of instruction, with Tibetan taught only as a language, alongside English. All pre-schools, including in ethnic areas, have used Mandarin since 2021, to "seize the key period of language learning in early childhood", as the education ministry puts it.

Authorities call boarding schools "very convenient" for Tibetan farmers' and herders' children who would otherwise face "long and arduous journeys to school". Officials insist that parents freely choose whether children board. In Qinghai, a rugged place with Han Chinese, Tibetan, Hui Muslim and Mongolian populations, the provincial government declared in 2018 that "in principle" children should board only when necessary, that they should not board until the fourth grade (ie, age 11), and that in remote pastoral areas school policies should follow “the wishes of the masses”.

Tibetan exiles and activists challenge this narrative. They cite state-media reports boasting of motherly care given to four- and five-year-olds in Tibetan boarding schools. They describe parents being threatened with fines or with a denial of schooling later on if they do not send children to board. Many Tibetan families see Mandarin as a path to employment. But as recently as the early 2000s Qinghai officials pursued that goal in more humane ways. To reduce drop-out rates and raise exam scores they expanded bilingual education, hired Tibetan teachers and accredited schools run by monks. Not now. Private Tibetan schools have been closed and teachers sacked for teaching Tibetan beyond the curriculum. This has sparked parent protests, including near Tongren in 2020.

Chaguan travelled to Tongren to weigh claims that coercive assimilation is now the norm. While in Qinghai he was followed by up to five unmarked cars. Tibetan-speaking officers (one of whom flashed a police badge) filmed and eavesdropped on conversations. In Huangnaihui, a hilltop village near Tongren, an officer’s curt intervention silenced a school headmaster who had been asked how Tibetan parents view Chinese-language schooling.

Despite the officers’ efforts, holes appeared in the official narrative. Start with those pupils in Tongren. Though some stepped off long-distance buses, others turned out to be locals, undermining claims that Tibetan boarding-school construction is solely explained by the need to spare herders’ children from long journeys. Then consider two boarding schools in a river valley below Rongwo Monastery that serve Hui Muslim and Tibetan pupils, respectively. Hui pupils who live in Tongren do not have to board, but rules are different for Tibetan pupils, your columnist was told.

Building schools to forge souls

In a Tongren suburb stands the Nianduhu Township Boarding Primary School. Its gates are flanked by murals showing pupils saluting the national flag, the Great Wall of China and the slogans: “I will become a great Chinese person” and “The motherland in my heart”. The Tibetan-majority school is building dormitories. From the autumn 400 students will live in them, a local education official said. Asked about first- and second-graders, aged eight and nine, he replied that county authorities still need to decide whether those youngest pupils will board, but “the other students will all be boarding.” That includes children with families nearby.

Such policies reflect an assimilationist logic. In 2015 the State Council (China’s cabinet) called for faster boarding-school construction to fulfil “the goal that students of all ethnic minorities will study in a school, live in a school and grow up in a school”. That serves a larger ambition: to “forge a strong sense of the community of the Chinese nation”. That is party-speak for promoting a single national identity to defend social stability and national security. Though clunky, the phrase is enshrined in the party constitution as a guide to ethnic work in the Xi Jinping era. If Tongren residents forget the slogan they need only look up. It is spelled out in big red characters on the hill opposite Rongwo Monastery.

China’s Ambitious ‘5G-A’ Plans in Tibet: Strategic Implications for India

13 June 2024, The Diplomat, Tenzin Younten

China’s expansion of the “low-altitude economy” with cutting-edge tech has deep implications for its surveillance capabilities along the disputed border.

On May 21, China achieved significant progress toward the establishment of a “low-altitude economy” in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR), with the successful functional verification of its first ever 5G-Advanced (5.5G) synaesthesia integrated base station in Lhoka (Shannan) Prefecture bordering the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. The 5G-A synaesthesia integrated base stations have been described by Huawei as a new revolutionary technology, along with passive IoT and endogenous intelligence, spurred by the 5G-A era.

China has developed the new 5G-A base stations to overcome the longstanding challenges faced by its traditional radars and cameras in terms of detecting and identifying small-sized drones operating within low-altitude airspace. These 5G-A base stations are equipped with comprehensive sensing capabilities that enable identification, real-time positioning, speed detection, and tracking of low-altitude unmanned aerial vehicles, ground vehicles, and other illegally intrusive targets. Following the completion of the first station, the China Mobile Tibet Company announced that its 5G-A base station has detection capabilities surpassing traditional radars. According to the company, the goal of these base stations in Tibet’s border areas is to build low-altitude sensing networks, thereby fostering the development of drone inspection and early warning systems.

On April 29, Huawei and China Tibet Mobile Company completed construction of another 5G-A base station on Mount Everest near the Indian border.

At the heart of Beijing’s broader strategic vision of establishing a “low-altitude economy” lies the construction of 5G-A synaesthesia integrated base stations, enhancing the network infrastructure and connectivity within low-altitude airspace. The use of 5G-A is a recent development in China, with 2024 being marked as the starting year for its commercialization. On June 6, over 35 Chinese cities including Beijing, Changchun, Harbin, Chengdu, and Tianjin, promoted the upgrade and evolution of existing 5G networks to 5G-A, while launching the "Joining Hands to Open a New Era of 5G-A" initiative.

The low-altitude economy refers to various economic activities occurring within the vertical airspace that extends from 1,000 to 4,000 meters above the ground where civil-manned and unmanned aircraft vehicles operate and promote the integrated development of related fields.

China's strategic vision for a "low-altitude economy" is enshrined in the "Implementation Plan for Innovative Application of General Aviation Equipment (2024-2030)" published on March 27 of this year. It describes China's overarching goal of achieving safe and efficient operation of low-altitude production and operation networks by 2030, setting a target for the low-altitude economy to be worth 1 trillion yuan that same year.

More significantly, the plan has also particularly placed 5G-A synaesthesia integrated technology as the cornerstone of the development of the low-altitude economy industry.

5G-A Synaesthesia Integrated Bases as the Backbone of the Low-Altitude Economy

The innovation of synaesthesia integrated technology in 5G-A has garnered great attention in China recently. 5G-A synaesthesia integrated technology combines multiple capabilities such as communications, imaging, and computing power, turning a regular communication network into a supercharged "radar," with high-precision and resolution perception capabilities.

The 5G-A synaesthesia integrated base stations are the fulcrum of the "low-altitude economy," as popularized with news headlines such as "5G-A enables the low-altitude economy to take off" by China National Radio (CNR) on May 22. CNR paraphrased Cao Lei, deputy director of the Wireless and Terminal Technology Research Institute of the China Academy of Mobile Communications, as saying that "based on 5G-A technology, a new low-altitude intelligent network infrastructure can be created that integrates 'communication, detection, navigation, and control,' providing businesses with low-altitude network information transmission, supplementary safety controls, and other services, enabling the vigorous development of the low-altitude economy."

China's Northeast Securities Co. also reiterated that "5G-A (5.5G) introduced integration sensing technology is expected to become the core communication technology for low-altitude economic air traffic control systems."

The 5G-A technology is not only superior to the 5G technology in terms of a tenfold increase in connectivity, speeds, and coverage but also provides a critical boost to managing unmanned aerial vehicles, thus revolutionizing industries focused on the low-altitude space. Tang Xue, vice president of ZTE, aptly articulated that 5G-A "isn't about faster internet; it represents a paradigm shift in the way we live, work, and play."

Therefore, these new 5G-A synaesthesia integrated bases in Tibet will be the catalyst to the establishment of a low-altitude network system, which will enhance communication, sensing, and computing services for drones operating in the low-altitude air spaces near the border areas.

Strategic Implications for the China-India border dispute

Yin Hao, an academician of the China Academy of Science, emphasized the need for a comprehensive monitoring service system for unmanned vehicles and drones during the "Wireless Sensory Integration Forum" on April 16. While speaking on the innovative directions of 5G-A, Yin highlighted the fact that cellular information networks can assist large-scale deployment of base stations with wireless sensing functions, enabling ubiquitous and continuous monitoring and tracking of low-altitude aerial vehicles.

The primary objective of the "low-altitude economy" is the commercialization of low-altitude airspace, which mainly includes drone delivery services, winged taxis for daily commutes, and drones or helicopters for tourism purposes. However, this emerging strategic industry also caters to the diverse needs of military players in the commercial, industrial, and civil sectors.

Notably, the world's first 5G-A 128TR synaesthesia base station equipped with maritime monitoring technology was just completed in March in Zhejiang province, showcasing its use for maritime security. Similarly, the construction of 5G-A base stations in Tibet's border areas holds major strategic benefits for China. The technology bolsters infrastructure and network systems surrounding drone operations for both civilian and military purposes. The 5G-A synaesthesia integrated base stations in Tibet are presumed to support China's border operations and management.

On April 16, a 5G-A base station in China's southwestern province of Yunnan was built for border monitoring. Afterward, Yunnan Mobile announced that this base caters to the needs of the Public Security Bureau, enhancing their border inspection and supervision tasks.

These bases can be used for military and security applications in border areas in multiple scenarios. First, these 5G-A base stations possess many functions that could directly benefit the Chinese border defense forces or police including their capabilities for detection and monitoring, classification or identification, locating and tracking, alerting, drone support, reconnaissance, communication, and others. With these critical functions, the 5G-A synaesthesia integrated bases will significantly strengthen the management and monitoring capabilities of drones along the border.

Second, these base stations can bolster the PLA's anti-drone defense system and serve as an early warning system against drone intrusion in its border areas, as remarked by the China Tibet telecom company in Shannan prefecture.

Third, the roll-out of 5G-A enhances China's Smart Border Defense capabilities across the TAR's border areas, defined as using modern scientific and technological methods to conduct real-time, comprehensive, and accurate monitoring and control of national borders.

Thus, China's "low-altitude economy" is not only a major economic boost but also a significant push to form a long-term mechanism to ensure national security and stability in border areas. Moreover, the construction of 5G-A bases and the development of the low-altitude economy aligns with Beijing's broader goal of strengthening border defense by revitalizing and developing the border area.

Conclusion

Amid heightened border tensions between India and China, the construction and operationalization of the 5G-A synaesthesia integrated base under the broader "low-altitude economy" vision are directly linked to Beijing's strategic interest in bolstering border defense and security. These represent the latest developments in the ongoing drone race between India and China in the Himalayas.

China has already built 11,719 5G base stations in the TAR. A recent official announcement during the High-Quality Development Mobile Communications Forum indicated that the 5G network across China will be upgraded to 5G-A network. It implies that more 5G-A synaesthesia integrated base stations will be constructed in TAR. The 5G-A base stations and the development of the "low-altitude economy" have the potential to revolutionize the PLA's drone warfare and anti-drone defense systems in Tibet's border areas.

On the other side, the Indian military has also strengthened its defense against drone attacks and intrusions along its Himalayan border with the recent induction of laser-based Integrated Drone Detection and Interdiction Systems, capable of both "soft" and "hard" kills, including jamming and laser-based interception.

The TAR constitutes a portion of the historical geography of Tibet, with the traditional areas of Tibet comprising almost the entirety of the Tibetan Plateau. Since the People's Republic of China's occupation of Tibet in the 1950s, China's economic policies in Tibet have always been closely tied to its strategic and military visions, encompassing infrastructure development, rural and urban construction projects, energy infrastructure projects, dams, and many more. The establishment of the "low-altitude economy" in the TAR represents Beijing's latest attempt to transform the region into a highly militarized zone and strengthen its preparedness for potential conflicts with adversaries. It is imperative to understand that 5G-A synaesthesia integrated bases in China are still in the developmental and testing stage. Some critics doubt the feasibility of such a grand vision of establishing a "low-altitude economy" in the Tibet Autonomous Region. In fact, there are many uncertainties and operational challenges facing China's plan in the harsh and rugged terrains and atmosphere of the Tibetan plateau. However, concerns regarding the expansion of the "low-altitude economy" in Tibet's border areas and its strategic ramification demand serious consideration and continuous monitoring.

Chinese armed forces have been upgrading. India must keep up

12 June 2024, The Indian Express, Anushka Saxena

The Information Age is enabling revolution in military affairs, and the PLA is adapting to new modes and methods of warfighting. Integrating these is key for India as well.

As part of the reforms in the People's Liberation Army (PLA) since 2015, China has focussed on preparing for combat keeping conditions of the "Information Age" in mind. It is doing so by integrating its services, arms and systems into a joint, network-centric fighting force. The PLA Western Theater Command (WTC) has played a proactive role in securing China's southern and southwestern borders, preparing for conventional and non-conventional warfighting, and acclimatising its personnel to the rough terrains and harsh altitudes of Xinjiang and Tibet. India is one of the principal operational directions in which the WTC is mandated to act. India needs to assess the WTC's operational structure, training mandates and warfighting priorities, especially the theatre's "multi-domain integrated joint operations" (MDIJO) efforts.

The WTC has focussed on three key factors. These include conducting combat training and preparedness exercises, getting acquainted with WTC's harsh terrain bordering India; and building air superiority and transportation capabilities.

The WTC invests significantly in combat training and simulation. Accounts of such exercises feature both its successes and failures. In August 2018, an anti-aircraft artillery unit of Xinjiang Military District (MD) conducted a live-fire exercise in the Tian Shan mountains to refine the troops' integrated combat capabilities. This was a test of the interplay between Command and Control (C2) and ground-based air defence units. The evaluation stage which assessed damage revealed that many anti-aircraft positions were in flames – indicating a failure on the surprise attack test. An assessment like this may give the Indian security apparatus clues as to the WTC's weaknesses and what it should focus on.

Given the tough terrains and complex environments, aerial dominance is central to the theatre's capabilities – and its biggest challenge. When pitted against India, an assessment of the ORBAT (order of battle) formulated by the Belfer Center indicates that as of 2020, the ground forces deployed on both sides are similar in numbers (over 2,05,000 troops), while Indian fighter jets outnumber Chinese – a 250 to 157 balance.

On ground-based air defence, four air defence brigades are attached each to the Xinjiang and Tibet Military Districts and the WTC 76th and 77th Group Armies. At the same time, the WTC air forces have their long-range surface-to-air missile installations. The WTC is enabling PLA ground and air forces to combine air defence systems. In light of this, India is investing in its own indigenous Very Short-Range Air Defence Systems (VSHORADS) and Man-Portable Air Defence Systems (MANPADS) to expand Army Air Defence (AAD) capabilities.

Over the years, anti-aircraft artillery units along with ground-to-air missile units, have become the backbone of the WTC's air defence capabilities. In May 2021, the Xinjiang MD engaged in six rounds of weapons acquisition. At the time, India and China were still recovering from the deadly Galwan Valley clashes of June 2020. The fifth and sixth rounds of acquisition focussed solely on aerial superiority, through the induction of the PHL-11 122 mm calibre self-propelled multiple rocket launcher system and the HQ-17A field air defence missile system.

The challenge of transportation is central to training in these terrains too. Given the "last-mile delivery requirements" of high-altitude zones specifically in the WTC, unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) are adopted for transporting food and essentials to active personnel. This is in addition to the induction of the Xi'an Y-20 "Kunpeng" heavy-transport aircraft, which can fly winter gear to border troops stationed along the LAC in seven hours.

Evidence for the use of UAVs comes from a November 2020 drill conducted by the logistics departments of the PLA army and the Tibet MD, where a drone delivery unit was required to transfer hot food, water, medicine and other urgent aid to personnel located at a base in the mountains, assuming that the manned mobile ground transportation unit was "blocked by enemy fire." According to the report, the success of the drone delivery unit was determined by how decisive drone operators were in making a comprehensive judgement on terrain, wind speed, temperature and other factors to ensure the unit's safe landing at the predetermined destination. The report promises that the PLA army logistics department is preparing to expand drone delivery to armament and ammunition supplies to active last-mile locations.

In an era where the Information Age is enabling revolution in military affairs (RMA), the PLA is adapting to new modes and methods of warfighting. Integrating these is key to the PLA's goal of becoming a "world-class force" by 2049. Over the next few years, it is only likely that the WTC will double down on such measures, creating a joint force capable of conducting successful combat operations. India, then, must continue to observe developments in the WTC and direct its efforts towards countering them.

With Rajnath Singh's re-appointment as India's defence minister, one of the priorities on his military modernisation agenda would be the creation of integrated theatre commands (ITCs) in the Indian armed forces. Even though there is no intended timeline for this yet, Singh has argued that in some countries, theaterisation has taken more than two decades to materialise. This is true in China's case if one considers the MR model a rung in the evolutionary ladder of theaterisation in the PLA. Now, as the point person for India's theaterisation, Chief of Defence Staff General Anil Chauhan has positioned the reform as India's response to jointness efforts in the PLA. Given that ITCs are intended to promote a joint culture and not a service-specific culture, Chauhan has expressed the belief that the reform will catapult India into a new era of combat preparedness. However, with the Chinese PLA many steps ahead of the Indian armed forces in this regard, a concrete delivery timeline and a larger, non-lapsable modernisation fund will be critical.

New Delhi's Tibet-Taiwan move: How India-China relations will fare under Modi 3.0

12 June 2024, FirstPost, Sriparna Pathak

The tone China has set to the relationship through its actions, be it at the border, through grey zone warfare, or its support for Pakistan-sponsored terrorism, the bilateral ties between two Asian giants under Modi 3.0 will continue to be a rocky one, if not rockier.

As the dust settles on the Indian general elections and the world watches polls in other parts of the world, questions continue to emerge on what sort of India would emerge further under the third term of Prime Minister Narendra Modi. The oath-taking ceremony of the new cabinet saw the retention of several ministers from Modi 2.0, including External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar. This signals continuity in India's foreign policy under Modi 3.0.

Even before the ministries had been announced, events affecting India's foreign policy, particularly with regards to China, had been taking place. Taiwan's President Lai Ching-te congratulated PM Modi on X, and PM Modi reciprocated the wishes, stating that he looks forward to closer ties as India and Taiwan work towards a mutually beneficial economic and technological partnership.

China flared up, and the spokesperson of the Chinese Embassy in India wrote on X that Taiwan is an inalienable part of China and that it is an "undeniable fact, a universal consensus of the international community, and a basic norm in international relations". The interesting part to note is that while world leaders took to X to wish PM Modi, China's President Xi Jinping did not send a personal note of congratulations, and the Chinese foreign ministry instead congratulated him, the BJP, and the National Democratic Alliance, adding that China looks forward to a "stable and healthy China-India relationship". China, along with the US, was among the last countries to wish PM Modi.

A few days earlier in May, when elections were ongoing, China released an old video of the Galwan Valley clash of 2020 at Pangong Tso finger 4. The clash is four years old, but the timing of the release raises suspicions about influencing the Indian electorate's choices regarding voting for a government that could not stand up to the Chinese People's Liberation Army, as portrayed in the video. Before the last phase of elections in India, Meta released its threat adversarial report, in which it stated that they had removed 37 Facebook accounts, 13 pages, five groups, and nine Instagram accounts for violating its policy against "coordinated inauthentic behaviour". The network originated in China and was running what has been called "Operation K", targeting the global Sikh community, including Australia, Canada, India, New Zealand, Pakistan, the UK, and Nigeria. The purpose was to divide the Indian electorate and interfere in India's elections.

In April of this year, China released a list renaming 30 more places in Arunachal Pradesh. China also lodged a diplomatic protest with India over Prime Minister Modi's visit to Arunachal Pradesh, where he dedicated the Sela Tunnel to the nation, which is to be built at an altitude of 13,000 feet. All this happened while India was either gearing up for elections or was in the thick of it.

Reportedly, India is set to rename 30 places in occupied Tibet, which China claims is called 'Xizang' and is currently a special administrative zone in China. China's behaviour in 2024 alone set the tone of the bilateral relationship. With its posturing, usage of disinformation during elections, and diplomatic flare-up immediately after elections, China has given a clear-cut message as to which direction it wants the relationship to flow in.

On June 8, on Chinese social media, another video with the narrative that the Chinese People's Liberation Army had thrashed the Indian Army was circulating in large numbers. However, neither country's government has reported any clashes so far in 2024. Grey zone warfare, which operates in the absence of hot conflict, is an integral aspect of China's three warfare strategies, which need to be factored in while analysing Sino-Indian relations and China's posturing towards India.

In June this year, think tanks from India and Taiwan held military simulations that focused on scenarios about the Taiwan Strait and the India-China border in 2035. This is also not something that Beijing would view with kindness. However, while India adheres to China's One China policy, it has active economic, technological, and civil society partnerships with Taiwan.

On the day of the swearing-in ceremony of the new cabinet, there was a terror attack in Reasi, in Jammu and Kashmir, in which nine victims on the bus carrying pilgrims succumbed to gunshot wounds. The Pakistan-supported The Resistance Front (TRF) has claimed responsibility for the terror attack. China has often blocked India's attempts at the United Nations to blacklist Pakistan-sponsored terrorists. In March this year, India stated that blocking evidence-based proposals in the UN Security Council to blacklist global terrorists without justification smacks of "double speak" in dealing with the scourge, which was a veiled reference to China that has put holds on multiple bids by India to sanction Pakistan-based terrorists. Given that India has yet again suffered Pakistan-sponsored terrorism, Modi 3.0 will further double down on Pakistan-based terrorism while facing fresh hurdles from China.

On June 11, India's EAM Jaishankar stated that the focus will be to resolve remaining issues along the India-China border and cross-border terror solutions with Pakistan. This is exactly in line with the party's election manifesto, which mentioned strengthening border defences.

Defence Minister Rajnath Singh, who retains his role in Modi 3.0, reaffirmed India's commitment to safeguarding its borders and strengthening defence manufacturing and exports. He emphasised the priority of protecting India's integrity and sovereignty during Modi 3.0. The focus is clearly on China.

Given the events that have unfolded so far in the bilateral relationship and the tone China has set to the relationship through its actions, be it at the border, through its grey zone warfare, or through its support for Pakistan-sponsored terrorism, the relationship between India and China under Modi 3.0 will continue to be a rocky one, if not rockier. New Delhi needs to be prepared for fresh surprises from Beijing and prepare accordingly.

Why India Needs To Act Against China's Renaming Of Arunachal Spots: Intel Sources Explain | Exclusive

11 June 2024, News18, Manoj Gupta

Amid the Centre's plan to rename 30 places in Tibet, top intelligence sources said: "If allowed to continue, it poses serious implications for the region...It will have a major impact in the next 20 years if we don't act and prove the facts."

China's bid to rename locations encircling the state of Arunachal Pradesh is a deliberate attempt to show territorial dominance and poses serious implications for the region, said top intelligence sources, amid the Centre's plan to rename 30 places in Tibet. China has changed the names of 126 villages since 2017.

India has been rejecting China's renaming of places in Arunachal, asserting that the state is an integral part of the country and assigning "invented" names does not alter this reality. Earlier in the day, CNN-News18 reported how the newly elected NDA government, led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi, has approved the renaming of 30 places in Tibet, in response to China's nomenclature aggression.

"While renaming by China won't change the reality, it suggests aggression plans. This is 'thread of beads' strategy, whereby it encircles the entire region, much like what has already happened in the Indo-Pacific where people use the term 'string of pearls'. Continuing with this can cause major tension in the region. If allowed to continue, it poses serious implications for the region...India's aim in changing names of spots in Tibet signals that Tibet, too, is a part of India. Even the locals there refer to the equation as Indo-Tibet relationship, not Indo-China," said sources.

"China's actions can alter history and future generations will have the same identity. This encroachment is in the mind space and in social media, which will majorly attack future generations. This is a deliberate attempt to show territorial dominance. It will have a major impact in the next 20 years if we don't act and prove the facts," they added.

Speaking at the South Gujarat Chamber of Commerce, Jaishankar had in April said, "If today I change the name of your house, will it become mine? Arunachal Pradesh was, is and will always be a state of India. Changing names does not have an effect. Our army is deployed there (Line of Actual Control)."

In April, the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs released the fourth list of standardised geographical names in Zangnan, the Chinese name for Arunachal Pradesh which Beijing claims as part of south Tibet. According to state-run Global Times, the Chinese government posted 30 additional names for the region. The Chinese Civil Affairs Ministry released the first list of the standardised names of six places in Zangnan was released in 2017, while the second list of 15 places was issued in 2021, followed by another list with names for 11 places in 2023.

The Dalai Lama Is Landing in the Middle of the 2024 Election

11 June 2024, MSN

In early September of 2020, Joe Biden, then the Democratic nominee for president, promised to put values—values held in contempt, he argued, by the man he would go on to defeat—at the center of American foreign policy. To act on his promise, he said, he would do something Donald Trump had neglected to do. "I'll meet with His Holiness the Dalai Lama," Biden said.

For American presidents, meeting the 14th Dalai Lama can bring tension and discord, because Communist Party leaders in Beijing consider Tibet to be a part of China. They consider any recognition of the Dalai Lama—a Mandela-level icon, a symbol of Tibet's will to survive, and also (by the way) a living Buddha, a bodhisattva, to his millions of followers—a terrible insult to Chinese sensitivities. (To be fair, Chinese leaders are omnidirectionally offended, by supporters of Taiwanese independence and Hong Kong democracy; by Christians and Uyghurs and Mongols; and by anyone else who threatens their Middle Kingdom sense of imperial entitlement.)

More than three years into his term, Biden has not made good on his promise, though he has a plausible excuse: The Dalai Lama is 88 years old and in declining health, and he seldom leaves his home in exile in Dharamsala, in the Himalayan foothills of India. But the Dalai Lama's age now provides a path for Biden to keep his promise: The bodhisattva has bad knees and has decided, after much procrastination, to come to New York this summer to investigate the possibility of replacement.

A visit by Biden to the Dalai Lama's hospital—or an after-surgery invitation to the White House—would signal continuing American concern over the oppression of Tibet and Tibetans, as well as support for one of the most heroic and pacific humanitarian leaders of our age. Such a visit would also have the benefit of signaling to the Chinese government that a U.S. president makes decisions independent of Chinese Communist feelings. (American CEOs are particularly feeble at signaling such independence.) A call on the Dalai Lama couldn't possibly hurt Biden's standing among voters, especially considering the Dalai Lama's previous lack of interest in meeting with Trump when he was president. Five years ago, when I visited the Dalai Lama at his monastery in Manali, he told me that he did not look favorably on Trump's jingoistic "America First" rhetoric. "Everyone first," he said, laughing. "A much better idea."

The exact timing of his trip to the United States—his first in seven years—has not yet been decided, but it will follow another event of some significance: a visit later this month to Dharamsala by Representative Nancy Pelosi, the former speaker of the House, and a congressional delegation. Pelosi has championed the Tibetan cause for decades, and, to her credit, she is loathed by Beijing for her comprehensive criticism of China's human-rights record. In one of Pelosi's earliest meetings with the Dalai Lama, she was so ferocious in her criticism of China's human-rights abuses that the Dalai Lama said, impishly, "Now let us all pray so that we could rid Nancy of her negative attitudes." (Pelosi's trip has not yet been announced, and her spokesperson declined to comment, citing security concerns; news of the Dalai Lama's proposed visit this summer was confirmed to me by sources involved in planning the trip.)

The reemergence of the Dalai Lama into American politics in the months preceding the 2024 presidential election is good news for the unfortunate Tibetan cause, constantly steamrollered as it is by the raw deployment of Chinese power. In Dharamsala, the seat of the Tibetan government in exile, fear is ever present that the Dalai Lama's eventual demise will make even more marginal the cause of Tibetan cultural and political independence. (As is implied by his status as the 14th Dalai Lama, the discovery of a 15th Dalai Lama is likely, though he will be reincarnated, according to Tibetan Buddhist tradition, as a small child, not as someone ready for international diplomacy. And the Chinese government has its own plan to identify and elevate a quisling lama.)

Two months ago, I visited Dharamsala with, among others, Arthur Brooks, the Atlantic columnist and frequent writing collaborator of the Dalai Lama's. We both experienced a religious leader who, though hobbled by knee pain and slowed by age, was still lucid and eloquent on the great subjects of freedom and happiness. I called Arthur today to ask him what he makes of this news.

"In a contentious election year, it's good to remind Americans of our core values as a people, and among those values are religious freedom and standing up for the dignity of all people around the world," he said. "His Holiness the Dalai Lama, as we saw in Dharamsala in April, still has the ability to remind people around the world of what is good and true. For a Tibetan monk, he has an uncanny gift for bringing out the best of what it means to be a person and an American. This is an opportunity that President Biden cannot and should not miss."

After Nepal, will China reopen Covid-closed Tibet-India border trade points?

11 June 2024, Tibetan Review

After China reopened 14 border trade points between its occupied Tibet and Nepal on May 25 after a prolonged Covid-19 closure, those on the Indian side of the border in Pithoragarh district of Uttarakhand state are feeling left out and have asked New Delhi to take up the issue with Beijing.

Indian traders in the area had been travelling to Tibet through the Lipulekh pass since 1992. The trade route was closed rather suddenly after the outbreak of the Covid-19 pandemic in 2019, forcing Indian traders to return from the Taklakot mart in Tibet, leaving behind their woollen merchandise, reported economictimes.com Jun 10.

Five years have passed but the route has not been opened, the report cited an organisation of Indian border traders in the district's Dharchula town as saying.

The report said the traders who belong to the Bhotia tribe started to raise their demand for reopening of the trade route through Lipulekh after China recently opened all 14 trade passes with Nepal.

"We have so far sent 22 applications to the government of India requesting it to take up with the Chinese authorities the reopening of the trade route through Lipulekh pass but have received no response so far," Jeewan Singh Rongkali, president of Bharat Tibetan Simant Vyapar Samiti, Dharchula, has said.

He has said Indian tribal traders from Dharchula alone had left trading items worth Rs 15 lakh in Taklakot Mart in Tibet at the time of the closure of border trade in 2019.

He has said over 450 Indian traders used to supply essential goods to residents of over 45 villages of western Tibet through this trade route since 1992.

"Out of over 1.5 crore trade annually, we have paid lakhs of rupees towards customs duty and other taxes to the government of India," Rongkali has said. He has expressed fears that the mart made for Indian traders in Gakkhu town of Taklakot could be handed over to Nepalese traders, given the fact that China has not given permission to open passes along the India-China border.

Why China should introspect and stop seeing India through Western lens

08 June 2024, First Post, Ambuj Sahu

The Chinese strategic worldview is most receptive to how the US thinks and acts. Thus, it has also seen India in the same light in the last three decades

On May 27, 2024, Global Times published an article on India-China cultural exchanges written by Liu Zongyi, a senior scholar on the Indian subcontinent at the Shanghai Institute of International Studies. Liu Lǎoshī (teacher in Chinese) argues that people-to-people exchanges between India and China have suffered due to the deteriorating state of bilateral ties. He also believes that India sees US-China rivalry as a strategic opportunity to “rise as a great power” and seeks to “please the US at the expense of China-India relations.”

According to him, “the regrettable situation in [bilateral ties], especially in terms of cultural and humanistic exchanges, is closely related to changes in India’s domestic politics [and] the rise of Hindu nationalism”. He goes one step further to criticise India’s civilisational worldview as a vishwaguru and accuses it of lacking “a tradition of real historical research and serious historical records”.

India’s critique, as per Liu Lǎoshī’s analysis, lies at three levels. Geopolitically, he dismisses India as a strategic appendage of the United States, unable to act in its own national interest. In domestic politics, he attributes right-wing populism and PM Modi’s Hindu nationalism to the pursuit of aggressive foreign policy. Civilisationally, he narrowly interprets the concept of vishwaguru as ‘world teacher’ and falls into the trap of buying Western narratives of Indian civilisation.

Though he calls China “open and inclusive” and “good at learning from other civilisations”, he forgets that India has been a shruti-smriti (listening-remembering) civilisation. His accusation of India’s lack of written historical research is surprising and reflects China’s civilisational closeness to seeing others in the image of self. However, he is not alone. Many Chinese academics in the last five years have taken similar lines in their analysis of India-China relations, especially since the border standoff in April 2020. Instead of blanket labelling them as propagandists of the CCP, it is important to point out that they risk groupthink in their own strategic analysis of India. They must realise that it is detrimental to India-China ties and the interests of both countries.

Watching India with American Lens

After the Cold War, the dominance of the US was the single most significant factor in shaping China’s foreign policy. Strategists like Michael Pillsbury and Rush Doshi have provided detailed insights based on personal experiences and primary sources to show how China, after the 1990s, has sought to replace the US as the leading player in Asia. The Chinese strategic worldview is most receptive to how the US thinks and acts. Thus, it has also seen India in the same light in the last three decades.

Despite PM Vajpayee naming China as the reason behind India’s nuclearisation in 1998, China did not destabilise the Himalayan borders because it was still recovering from the Third Taiwan Straits Crisis and preparing the ground for the US-China Relations Act of 2000.

There were no strong objections from China to the India-US Civil Nuclear Deal (2008) because it could not risk antagonising the US amidst President Hu Jintao’s ‘Peaceful Rise’ narrative. Today, their Foreign Ministry Spokesperson reacts adversely to the smallest developments in the India-US relationship.

China’s aggressive inroads in the Indian subcontinent and the Belt and Road Initiative came only in the mid-2010s, when the Obama Administration had already decided to ‘Pivot to Asia.’ Significant border transgressions, such as Doklam (2017), coincide with President Trump’s disruptive approach to China, and the recent border standoffs occurred when US-China relations were in their worst phase. Contrary to the conventional logic of accommodating one adversary when competing with the other, China becomes hostile to the US and India simultaneously. It is a strong indication that China wears an American lens when dealing with India and sees it as a colluder with the US.

China is most hypocritical in its perceptions of India’s domestic policy and civilisational worldview. Responding to the West’s allegation of authoritarianism and human rights, Chinese leaders have echoed many times that countries have a right to decide their form of governance as per the needs of the people. China’s socialist system is a punching bag for the West and is often called oppressive and totalitarian. Until PM Modi suffered a setback in the 2024 general elections, India’s legitimate and democratically-elected government was also being undermined every other day by the Western media. It is duplicitous to see China extend similar treatment to India, a fellow non-Western country.

Under the Modi government, the Vishwaguru jibe is often used as a sarcastic dismissal of India’s global aspirations and quest for status. How can a mere $2,500 per capita GDP have anything to teach and offer the world? Irrespective of India's capacity to be a vishwaguru, the Chinese would find that one need not be a teacher in the orthodox sense to guide and learn only if they could remember their own heritage. Confucius once said, "If I am walking with two other men, each of them will serve as my teacher".

Like Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara delayed his own nirvana to help the other earthbound fellows attain the knowledge, India supplied COVID-19 vaccines to 101 countries at the cost of delaying the inoculation of its own masses. This vishwa bandhu zeal is not new. China should remember how even a colonised India sent a medical unit under Dwarkanath Kotnis to help the People's Liberation Army in the Second Sino-Japanese War of 1938. However, the Chinese civilisation is still traumatised by the Century of Humiliation and seeks retribution from the West, particularly the US.

The 'Three Shoulds' and One 'Must'

India's global aspirations are the international manifestation of Swami Vivekananda's words, "Strength is goodness, weakness is sin", because, in world politics, only material strength and diplomatic boldness are respected. No one should understand this better than China.

China should know that it has to live and co-exist with India, even if it drives the US away from Asia. Ancient civilisations thought not in years but in decades and centuries, so the following Three Should's would help China stabilise its relationship with India and attain a peaceful co-existence.

First, China should see its ties with India and the US separately. India is an autonomous power that does not subscribe to the ally-adversary dichotomy. It should also have the same regard for India's strategic space in the subcontinent as it expects the West to do so in Taiwan and East Asia.

Second, China should realise that, like all rising powers, India's recourse to nationalism reflects its global aspirations, fuelled by its economic prospects and aspirational youth. As it adopted Soviet-style Communism with Chinese characteristics, India would also infuse liberal democracy with its millennia-old values.

Third, as one of the two surviving ancient civilisations, China should see the Indian worldview to ensure its knowledge vacuum is not filled by superficial narratives advanced by vested interests in the West. It would only lead to strategic miscalculations and push India further away from China.

Before these 'Three Shoulds', there is 'One Must' that China needs to acknowledge if it genuinely seeks a rapprochement with India. China must realise that cultural and economic exchanges can only take place when countries do not threaten each other's security and political stability. Therefore, maintaining peace and tranquillity at the borders is fundamental for any normalisation of India-China relations.

Mainstream media turns blind eye as UN visits Xinjiang, criticises US

08 June 2024, Pearls and Irritations, Jerry Grey

Human Rights are big news again. There are murders in Gaza, there are restrictions in Ukraine, there are allegations of abuses in Iran and any other place that the US sees as an adversary but, one thing that isn't big news is that the United Nations has recently visited Xinjiang. So far, 100% of our mainstream media have ignored this news.

The UN Special Rapporteur, Dr Alena Douhan didn't find human rights abuses by Chinese authorities on Chinese minorities, what she found instead were abuses by the USA against Uyghurs, caused by illegal and unilateral sanctions. But that's a different story.

It isn't just in China where the US could be accused of committing crimes against humanity. It's in their own streets, cities and especially their prisons. In fact, the situation is so bad that, across the political spectrum, 71% of all Americans feel their country is headed in the wrong direction.

When we look closer, we see they are right. US poverty, according to their own census in January 2024 increased to 11.5% and that means 37.9 million people are living below the poverty line in the world's richest country. This reflects in perceptions about safety too. While the FBI and the Bureau of Justice both report that crime, particularly violent crime has fallen, they both also report that the perception of safety from those crimes has also fallen – what this means is that, even though the numbers show crime is down, the reality is that people don't believe it. And this is borne out by the fact that only 41% of violent crimes were even reported.

Crime in the USA, according to both the FBI and Department of Justice (DoJ) is down but according to Gallop and Pew Research, it's up. It's just not being reported anymore. The FBI and the DoJ both report that solving crime is down too yet prison populations are increasing. If crime and clear up rates are decreasing but convictions are increasing – something is wrong with the statistics; in 2022 the number of inmates rose by 2%.

Perhaps it's related to the slave labour they accuse China of, the USA has legally mandated forced labour in prisons through the 13th Amendment and now prison labour constitutes a huge contribution to the manufacturing of everything from breakfast cereals to the bombs dropping on Gaza.

Gun deaths are definitely not decreasing, the Gun Violence Archive reports 181 mass shootings in the USA up to 30th May, that's more than one a day with 44 deaths a day on average.

The Rand Organisation reported that forced labour and human trafficking into the USA, are both increasing. The number, they think, is up to 17,500 people a year. But that's not the worst of it, there are apparently 10.4 million people working illegally in the USA as undocumented labourers and since Biden took office, there have been over 2 million new workers arriving illegally every year. All the evidence suggests that many of these workers are underpaid. This is a form of human rights abuse not just for the illegal and undocumented workers but for the people who live in the region and are forced to accept lower incomes.

In four states, Colorado, Georgia, New Hampshire and Wisconsin, the minimum working age is 12, kids who ought to be in school can get out and get a job. There is only state, New Jersey, with a minimum working age of 16 and for all the rest the age is 14. Principle 5 of the 10 Principles of the United Nations Global Compact states that developed nations, and the US is one, should have no child under 13 in work at all and no child under 15 in anything other than "light work". Hazardous work should not be commenced until the child reaches 18. The US laws put them in breach of UN standards.

For a microcosm of what's wrong with income inequality in the USA, look no further than the Walmart organisation. They are the USA's largest employer and the owners, the Walton family are the USA's richest family with a combined wealth greater than Bezos or Musk. Yet when Bernie Sanders commissioned a report, it found that Walmart and Amazon contribute to the same problem. These massively rich individuals employ people who don't earn enough to live and need social security, Medicaid or food stamps to survive.

In other words, US taxpayers support people employed by the country's richest people. The Federal minimum wage has remained at $7:25 since 2009. If that's not a human rights abuse, we need a new definition – but even this gets even worse – there are still 20 states that can pay as low as $2:13 if the employee collects tips.

The Prindle Institute reports that failure to act on poverty is a human rights abuse, but when the UN went to the USA to check, they were ignored. Failure to act on gun control is a human rights abuse and this is a can that has been kicked along the road by the Biden Administration. They have increased background checks but not reduced the number of guns on the streets. Failure to offer due process and a fair trial with the presumption of innocence is a human rights abuse which has been ignored by mandatory minimum sentencing standards introduced under Trump and continued under Biden. Failure to provide a safe environment for people to live and work, to commune in their neighbourhoods is a human rights abuse that the world can see just by switching on social media and taking a look at their tent cities and the drug addled streets.

While the US government points fingers, the UN points right back at them. The world is misinformed by US controlled or influenced media. US citizens are misled into believing their country is the arbiter of freedom and democracy. 71% of them have realised that their government is, in fact, the perpetrators of misery both at home and abroad.

CHINA-JAPAN-SOUTH KOREA TRILATERAL SUMMIT: WHY WAS THE CHANCE TO ADVOCATE FOR XINJIANG AND TIBET NOT TAKEN?

07 June 2024, Anna Pepe, IARI

The China-Japan-South Korea trilateral summit was put on hold for four years. This year, the summit was finally convened, and the representatives of the three East Asian States met in Seoul on the 26th and the 27th of May. The highly anticipated summit took place in a surely competitive climate, as well as two weeks after Xi Jinping's tour of Europe and the Uyghurs and Tibetans' protests that accompanied it. This temporal proximity may have left observers to wonder whether the PRC controversial Xinjiang and Tibet policies would be among the themes of this year's summit, and who would take the chance to advocate for change. They were not, and no State did. Why?

In September 2023, after the ASEAN Plus Three (ASEAN Plus 3) summit in Jakarta, South Korean Foreign Minister Cho Tae-yul stated that the Republic of Korea (ROK), Japan and the People's Republic of China (PRC)'s senior diplomats had agreed to resume trilateral dialogues at the "earliest convenient time". As reported by Japanese broadcaster TBS, ROK had suggested convening the China-Japan-South Korea trilateral summit already in December; however, the dates remained under discussion. The news attracted attention from both the regional and the international audience. The three States had not held the summit since its 2019 edition in Chengdu, China, due to restrictions to contain the spread of the Coronavirus disease (COVID-19), and to the deterioration of ROK-Japanese relations.

In the last two months, new articles on the finalisation of plans for the two-days summit emerged, after Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida's ritual offering at the controversial Yasukuni Shrine and PRC's response to Kishida's statements during his visit to the U.S. had foreshadowed a turnaround. According to NikkeiAsia, Chinese Premier Li Qiang, Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida and South Korean President Yoon Suk Yeol were to attend it in South Korea (chair of this edition), presumably on the 26th and the 27th of May. Moreover, as stated by the Japanese Foreign Ministry, Tokyo had been arranging bilateral summits on the fringes of the China-Japan-South Korea trilateral summit.

RPC President Xi Jinping meanwhile returned from his week-long tour of Europe, five years after his last visit in 2019. Although the public's attention has been directed to understand whether Xi Jinping succeeded in restrengthening EU-PRC relations ahead of the EU Parliament elections (and to annihilate the threat of tariffs imposition on Chinese imports), there has been a second important effect of Xi Jinping's tour worth of mention: Uyghurs and Tibetans' protests in France and Hungary.

As French President Macron welcomed Xi Jinping on May 5, Uyghurs protested carrying placards against the Chinese crimes against their community. The protest, organised by the European Uyghur Institute, was partially sabotaged by a shouting group with Chinese flags. The French International News reported of Tibetans protesting Xi Jinping's visit as well, unfurling a large, white banner saying "Free Tibet. Dictator Xi Jinping, your time is up!" on a bridge as the President's motorcade passed, and then gathering in the afternoon in Republic Square and chanting "Long Live Tibet".

Tibetan protesters' plan to unroll a second banner, together with the Tibetan flag, on the Elisabeth Bridge in Budapest on May 6 was sabotaged by Chinese activists. The Tibetans protesters said the nearby Hungarian police did not intervene. Before Xi's arrival, Tibetans had already gathered to protest his visit to Hungary and to demand the cessation of human rights violations in Tibet; however, Xi's motorcade had avoided the protesting crowd by taking a secondary route.

The temporal proximity between Xi's tour and the China-Japan-South Korea trilateral summit may have left observers to wonder whether the PRC controversial Xinjiang and Tibet policies would have been among the themes of this year's summit. The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Volker Türk readdressed the issue two months ago, on the 55th session of the Human Rights Council, demanding to the Chinese government to implement the recommendations made by his Office and other human rights bodies in relation to "laws, policies and practises that violate fundamental rights, including in the Xinjiang and Tibet regions".

Among the summit participants, and at least in theoretical terms, Japan is the one that could have addressed the matter. We should indeed remember that it was Japan that championed the acceptance of the controversial concept of "human security" by governments in the East Asian region, thanks to a promotional campaign to which Japanese leaders devoted considerable financial and human resources. The Japanese government has offered many assistance programs in human security name as part of the Overseas Development Assistance (ODA). It is worth mentioning the establishment of the United Nations Trust Fund for Human Security (TFHS) at the initiative of Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi in March 1999 as well. Certainly, acting as promoter of human security – albeit revisited – has enabled Japan to acquire a more prominent role on the international stage, independently of the U.S., and yet without jeopardising the friendship with the now decades-old ally or violating the 1947 Constitution. Moreover, we should remember at least four other, most recent events.

Soon after his election in February 2021, Japanese Prime Minister Fumio Kishida said that Japan would not hesitate to criticise China's human rights record, and appointed Erkin Said, a high-ranking official, as his human rights advisor. In October 2022, Japan voted at the United Nations Human Rights Council in favour of a resolution calling for a debate on an August report from Michelle Bachelet, then U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights, which detailed possible crimes against humanity targeting Uyghurs and other Turkic minorities. That effort fell short by only two votes.

In November, Kishida reiterated Japan's stance on human rights amidst a bilateral meeting with Chinese President Xi Jinping; without however directly mentioning the Uyghurs or the Tibetans. In December 2022, Japan's upper house of Parliament, the House of Councillors, adopted a resolution to strengthen the Japanese government's commitment to the cause by monitoring the situation and implementing new relief policies. Shortly after, the PRC Foreign Ministry stated the resolution "ignores the facts, maliciously slanders China's human rights situation, seriously violates international law and basic norms governing international relations, grossly interferes in China's internal affairs, and is extremely egregious in nature".

Although the resolution does not explicitly condemn the PRC nor mention it by name, Uyghur activists warmly welcomed its adoption. Ahmatjan Litip, Secretary-General of the Japanese Uyghur Association, emphasised how the resolution constituted an important precedent in Japanese legislative tradition: "in its first such resolution which has just passed, and the word 'Uyghur' is in the title (...)". Moreover, on December 24, Japan announced it would not send its high-ranking officials to the Beijing Winter Games. The announcement came after the U.S. decision to launch a diplomatic boycott of the Games citing “genocide and crimes against humanity” in Xinjiang; however, the government spokesman Hirokazu Matsuno affirmed Japan had defined its action plan on its own. Japan never labelled its decision a “diplomatic boycott”; as acknowledged by The New York Times journalist Victor Mather, this aligned the country “with the United States while avoiding an official snub of China, Japan’s largest trade partner.”

However, in practical terms, there are factors that need to be considered.

Over the past few years, the PRC has surely grown its presence in the South China Sea and the East China Sea, and Kishida and Yoon might have therefore thought that addressing such a sensitive theme would stir already turbulent waters. Moreover, Japan and ROK seized this summit to back the case for addressing the implications of the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea (DPRK)’s nuclear and missile development program. The PRC has been the DPRK’s top benefactor and, therefore, the most appropriate actor to (at least attempt to) persuade Kim Jong Un to desist from dangerous practices. Before the summit, Joseph DeTrani (U.S. special envoy for six-party denuclearization talks with North Korea from 2003 to 2006) said Seoul and Tokyo would “try to get China to convince North Korea to cease providing arms to Russia for its war in Ukraine” and “to use its leverage to halt ballistic missile launches.”

Lü Chao, an expert on the Korean peninsula issue at the Liaoning Academy of Social Sciences, correctly predicted the meeting would have promoted cooperation in diplomatic coordination, information communication, climate change, and logistics connectivity as well – perfectly in line with the leitmotif the founders of the CJK trilateralism wished for it to have. As remembered by Victor D. Cha and Marie Dumond, “the early roots of CJK trilateralism fell under the auspices of the ASEAN Plus Three (APT) format. Proposed by Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi, the leaders of the “plus three” countries held an informal breakfast meeting on the sidelines of the APT. Discussions revolved around various ways to promote collaboration across different sectors including trade, commerce, environment, and agriculture through joint research. Sensitive political and security issues remained off the table, although security cooperation did appear on the agenda on occasion.”

According to diplomatic observers, the PRC’s eagerness to participate in the trilateral summit was due to the need to protect its interests from the U.S.-led bloc. The PRC has already articulated its concerns about Japan and ROK’s renewed security cooperation with the United States. The summit followed the August 2023 US-ROK-Japan summit at Camp David, where they agreed to strengthen their deterrence against DPRK threats and to defend a free and open Indo-Pacific against Chinese aggressions. DeTrani believed “China will ask that the ROK and Japan not to align with the U.S. against China, an issue that wasn’t on the table in 2019.” Therefore, any mention of the latest protests of PRC Xinjiang and Tibet policies, among others, might have been seen by China as a further sign of Japan’s alignment with the U.S., and sabotaged the summit and Japan and ROK’s plan to discuss higher-ranking issues on their common agenda.

Finally, matters-ranking aside, it is important to note that although Japan has shown interest in Xinjiang and Tibet situations, as we have seen its policies have never showed the necessary assertiveness to persuade observers it would have explicitly addressed the matter at the summit.

What do India’s neighbours expect from the new government?

07 June 2024, Frontline

A break down of India’s most important regional ties and how they will likely evolve under a new coalition government.

India’s general election has delivered a surprise setback for Prime Minister Narendra Modi’s Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), which failed to win an outright majority and now needs the backing of its coalition partners to remain in power.

Over the past decade, Modi and the BJP have enjoyed authority and dominance over national politics. His third term as prime minister, however, will likely not be as smooth sailing as it was during the past decade, given the challenges of coalition politics. On foreign policy, though, the election outcome will not have much impact, experts have said.

Since Modi came to power in 2014, New Delhi has adopted “Neighborhood First” as a core component of India’s foreign policy, focusing on repairing and bolstering its ties with countries in the region.

Pakistan tensions remain

India’s most tense relationship is with its arch-rival and neighbour to the west, Pakistan. Many Pakistanis closely followed the Indian elections. “We are quite happy” to see Modi’s party lose its outright majority in parliament, Mushahid Hussain, a Pakistani senator and expert in foreign affairs said. “It will be a more chastened and somewhat weakened Modi now sitting in the PM office in Delhi,” he said, adding that Pakistan hopes to see “a more subdued Indian approach to Pakistan in terms of tone and rhetoric.”

Modi’s government has refused to engage with Pakistan over the past few years since accusing

Islamabad of cross-border terrorism. India and Pakistan have fought three wars and many skirmishes since both were carved out into two independent states in 1947, as British colonial rule of the subcontinent came to an end. Both claim the disputed Himalayan region of Kashmir in full, but rule it in part. Relations between the two nuclear-armed neighbours have remained tense over the past few years." From Pakistan's perspective, one question will be whether Modi, who engaged in anti-Pakistan rhetoric in the election campaign, doubles down on it or backs away from it," said Madiha Afzal, a foreign policy expert at the Brookings Institution.

Maleeha Lodhi, Pakistan's former representative to the United Nations said that it's not a "favourable climate" for India-Pakistan re-engagement. "Pakistan expects little change, if any, from Modi's third term in power. Prospects for any normalisation of ties between India and Pakistan are at best uncertain," she said, adding that Islamabad "will adopt a wait-and-see policy."

China looms in the background

As Islamabad strengthens its friendship with Beijing, which in turn is pumping billions of dollars of Chinese money into Pakistan to build key infrastructure such as roads and ports, India remains wary of China's growing footprint and influence there. After the announcement of the election results, China congratulated Modi on his victory and called for "healthy and stable" bilateral relations.

Deep-seated mutual distrust has long characterised Sino-Indian relations, plagued by unresolved border disputes. Tensions remain high, with tens of thousands of Indian and Chinese soldiers massed on their disputed border since 2020, when a clash left 20 Indian troops and four Chinese soldiers dead.

Sana Hashmi, a China expert who previously worked as a consultant in India's Foreign Ministry, said there won't be any major improvement in India-China ties in the coming years. Without any Chinese concessions on the border issue, she said, New Delhi is unlikely to "turn mellow on its China policy".

Sri Lanka invited to Modi's swearing-in

The swearing-in ceremony for Modi's third term is expected to take place on June 8. New Delhi has invited the leaders of some of India's neighbours, including Bangladeshi Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and Sri Lankan President Ranil Wickremesinghe, to the event, according to local media reports. Both Hasina and Wickremesinghe have said they will be in attendance, a leading daily reported on June 6.

In recent years, Sri Lanka has become an arena of geopolitical rivalry and maritime competition between India and China. The country is strategically located at the crossroads of busy shipping routes. India and Sri Lanka share not only close trade relations, but also ethnic and religious ties.

But Chinese attempts to gain sway in Colombo over the past decade have caused concern in New Delhi. "Even while colonial legacies have historically bound India and Sri Lanka together, current events highlight complex dynamics," said Anandhi Sasidharan, a former Sri Lankan minister, pointing to Sri Lanka's acute economic crisis, debt problems, and the related geopolitical implications.

Under Wickremesinghe, however, relations between Sri Lanka and India appear to have strengthened over the past couple of years. The outcome of the Indian elections won't have a major impact on ties with Sri Lanka, according to experts. "While Modi's party may lack a clear majority, signalling potential constraints on policy implementation, India's longstanding assistance to Sri Lanka remains steadfast," said Shihar Aneez, a journalist based in Colombo.

Building on strength with Bangladesh

India's relations with its eastern neighbour, Bangladesh, which have strengthened substantially over the past decade, will likely remain steady, said Bangladeshi officials and observers after the election results became clear. "Our deep friendly ties will continue," Bangladeshi Foreign Minister Hasan Mahmud told journalists, adding that bilateral ties reached new heights under Modi and his Bangladeshi counterpart, Hasina.

The relationship between New Delhi and Dhaka is deeply entrenched and both share security and economic interests. "There won't be any significant policy changes regarding Bangladesh," said Touhid Hossain, a former Bangladeshi foreign secretary.

Ali Riaz, an expert on Bangladesh and professor at Illinois State University, echoed this view. "Nothing will deter Modi to continue his foreign policy objectives as the Indian establishment will continue supporting his government," he said. "There isn't much disagreement between the BJP and opposition parties on projecting India as an emerging global power."

Tibetan Participation in India's Elections: Past, Present, and Future

07 June 2024, The Diplomat, Kalyani Yeola and Tenzing Dhamdul

Historically, Tibetans have been reluctant to claim Indian citizenship (and their right to vote) over fears of losing their distinct identity. That is changing.

India, the world's largest democracy, recently concluded its general elections, forming a new government once again led by the victorious Bharatiya Janata Party. Amid this democratic exercise, a significant development has emerged involving the Tibetan population that has sought asylum in India since the occupation of their homeland by China.

In the latest general elections, a notable number of Tibetans participated in the seventh phase of voting in Himachal Pradesh on June 1, 2024. In this election, for the first time, a Tibetan settlement officer formally presented a list of pressing issues to the chief minister of Himachal Pradesh, Sukhvinder Singh Sukhu, who visited Dharamshala to appeal to the exiled Tibetans to exercise their right to vote in India.

Furthermore, the two main national political parties of India, the BJP and the Indian National Congress (INC), had town hall meetings with Tibetans in Dharamshala in the lead up to the elections.

Historically, Tibetans have participated in Indian general elections primarily in the border regions adjacent to Tibet, including Arunachal Pradesh, Sikkim, and West Bengal. However, recent years have witnessed a rise in Tibetan voter participation across India. This increase can be attributed to a landmark decision and subsequent directives issued by the Election Commission of India. In 2014, the Election Commission's chief instructed all Indian states to include Tibetans and their descendants born in India in the electoral rolls. This directive aligned with the 2013 court order that granted Indian citizenship to Tibetan refugees born in India between January 26, 1950, and July 1, 1987.

However, in implementing the 2014 directive, the government of India effectively decoupled the right to vote from citizenship for Tibetans residing in India. The government mandated that Tibetans must legally apply for citizenship rather than claim it as a birthright. This policy highlights the complexity of the relationship between citizenship and voting rights for Tibetans in India.

Elections and Tibet

Since the establishment of the Tibetan government-in-exile (officially known as the Central Tibetan Administration) in Dharamshala on April 29, 1959 Tibetans have developed their own system of governance outside of their homeland. Following the 2001 reforms, Tibetans began directly electing their political leader, the Kalon Tripa (later known as Sikyong), thereby exercising their right to vote in exile.

Since then, Tibetans have held elections for their government-in-exile, achieving the unique accomplishment of having Tibetan voters from over 20 different countries participate in these elections. This form of democratic exercise is fundamentally distinct from the political system in occupied Tibet, which is currently governed by the Chinese Communist Party.

This history demonstrates that Tibetans in the diaspora, particularly those residing in India, are well-acquainted with the electoral process and are not novices when it comes to participating in elections.

Despite their experience, there is concern within the Tibetan community regarding participation in India's voting exercises. Fears about losing their identity and culture are paramount among Tibetans, particularly since voting rights are largely tied to obtaining Indian citizenship, which would necessitate forfeiting their Residential Certificate (RC). The RC is a legal document provided to Tibetans by the government of India. Once Tibetans procure citizenship and a voter card, the RC becomes null and void and must be returned to the government.

Nevertheless, there has been a clear increase in the number of Tibetans participating in Indian general elections from 2014 to 2019 and the current 2024 elections. There are two major reasons for this trend. First, Tibetans migrating to other countries have begun acquiring citizenship in those nations (which, unlike India, do not provide an RC). Previously, there was a taboo against Tibetans in India procuring Indian citizenship, even if legally applicable. However, this has changed as Tibetans see their family members gaining more legal access, including political rights, in other countries they reside in by acquiring citizenship.

One Tibetan voter remarked to Phayul Media: "When prices of essentials increase and policy changes occur in India, we Tibetans living in India are also impacted. Hence, it is our right as well as duty to elect the right individual who will bring change and alleviate the problems we face."

Second, although India has provided Tibetans with several rights to sustain and rehabilitate themselves, there are limitations. These include restrictions on buying property and the ease of traveling abroad, especially using the Identity Certificate provided by the government of India to Tibetans in India for travel abroad (which even Indian immigration officers often do not recognize). Traveling to Nepal, the home of another large Tibetan community, by flight is only possible for Tibetans with citizenship or a voter card; even travel by bus and other means becomes problematic with security checks where they do not accept Identity Certificate.

A Tibetan who participated in the recently concluded general election stated, "I have relatives in Nepal and meeting them becomes a problem if I do not have proper travel documentation. This is where the voter card becomes crucial, as Nepal recognizes it, unlike our Identity Certificate, making travel hassle-free."

These issues have become more pressing as Tibetans have moved from merely sustaining themselves to prospering, necessitating the ability to travel abroad and buy property.

Significance of Tibetan Participation in India's General Elections

Since being forced into exile in 1949, Tibetans have moved to different regions of the world and made significant contributions to their respective nations. Many have even started taking active political and administrative roles. Notable examples include Bhutla Karpoche, a member of the provincial parliament of Ontario (Canada); Aftab Karma Singh Pureval, the current mayor of Cincinnati (U.S.); and Namgyal Gangshontsang, the mayor of Oetwil am See (Switzerland), to name a few.

Furthermore, even if Tibetans are not able to be directly elected and involved in decision-making, their votes in countries like the United States have enabled them to effectively lobby legislatures to pass concrete bills and acts that support Tibet and the Tibetan people. Most recently, the Europe for Tibet campaign – led by various offices for Tibet, Tibet support groups, friends of Tibet, and Tibetans – in line with the ongoing European Union (EU) Parliament elections has been able to lobby and garner the support of more than 100 contesting candidates for Tibet.

Many Tibetans and observers believe that it is high time for Tibetans in India to legally claim their vote and push for their political, social, cultural, and educational rights. Although they do not possess the right to hold dual citizenship in India, they can participate in both the Tibetan government-in-exile (TGiE) elections and the Indian general elections. By making good use of this opportunity, Tibetans can lobby for their rights in India.

Conversely, India might contemplate instituting provisions for representing individuals of Tibetan origin within the Indian Parliament, drawing inspiration from the historical allocation of two reserved seats for the Anglo-Indian community. Considering the long-standing presence and contributions of Tibetans in India both before and after its independence, such a measure would be appropriate and just.

Conclusion

Since the COVID-19 pandemic and the Galwan Valley clash between India and China, fewer Tibetans have been able to escape occupied Tibet and come to India, where the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan government-in-exile are based. Migration is a phenomenon that has impacted everyone and, supplemented by legal and other constraints, Tibetans in India are also migrating to many developed countries. However, there has been an increase in Tibetans obtaining legal documents in India, including citizenship, and they have gradually become more vocal about their rights and duties. It is likely that Tibetan participation in subsequent general elections will continue to increase.

The Dalai Lama, whom many wish to see conferred the Bharat Ratna, and other Tibetans who have received Padma Shri and other awards, including for gallantry in defending the nation, have been integral to India's growth since its independence in 1947. Tibetans who have settled in India and many born here represent a national asset with their unique culture, heritage, and identity that must be preserved and allowed to flourish. These elements are vital for India to realize its vision of a "Viksit Bharat" (Developed India) by 2047 and to showcase to the world the principle of "Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam" (The World Is One Family).

'Short of war,' China's gray zone strategy on Taiwan is gathering in intensity

06 June 2024, The Washington Post, Kevin Rudd

The West must strongly deter – without foreclosing a future reconciliation between Taipei and Beijing.

Kevin Rudd is Australia's ambassador to the United States and was previously prime minister and foreign minister. This is an edited extract of a speech delivered Thursday at the Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies in Honolulu. The speech is a personal reflection in his capacity as a China scholar and not as an official representative of the Australian government.

The central question for our time, if we are to avoid war across the Taiwan Strait, is to understand how Chinese President Xi Jinping actually interprets the deterrence strategies of the United States, Taiwan itself, and U.S. allies and strategic partners.

What strategy is China now embarking upon, short of preparation for an actual invasion, to achieve its political objectives in relation to Taiwan? And what is the role of deterrence in responding to such a strategy?

The key to understanding Beijing's red line on Taiwan's political status is China's fear that Taiwan will become an independent state, and be recognized by the international community as such, thereby destroying the possibility of unification with the mainland.

This, in turn, is based on Beijing's insistence that any political dialogue between Taiwan and the mainland must be based on the "1992 Consensus" – an ambiguous arrangement broadly based on the principle of "one China," albeit with differing interpretations of what that means to each side.

Taiwan's Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), in government since 2016, has opposed the "one China" element within the 1992 Consensus. As a result, Beijing has rejected all official dialogue with Taiwanese administrations since the party came to power. The DPP has argued that Taiwan was already independent and so had no need formally to declare it. Tsai Ing-wen, Taiwan's president from 2016 to 2024, took this concept further – continuing to reject the 1992 Consensus, while refining the Democratic Progressive Party's position on Taiwan's political status as one committed to "maintaining the status quo." This position has been reiterated by the new DPP president, William Lai, who took office last month.

But Beijing is increasingly making it plain to foreign interlocutors that this stance is not sufficient. Far from being relieved that the DPP has stepped back from the brink of any formal declaration of independence, Beijing is signaling loud and clear that its political objective remains forcing Taiwan into negotiations on its preferred "one country, two systems" model, which it has used for Hong Kong.

Beijing might well be in the process of concluding that Taiwan thinking of itself as de facto autonomous, with the international community on much the same page, will become further entrenched – and irreversible. As time begins to run out (from China's perspective), we will begin to see a change in Chinese strategy toward the "Taiwan problem." Indeed, we are already seeing it, with China increasingly availing itself of a multidimensional "gray zone" strategy over the past 18 months or so, a strategy aimed at applying new forms of pressure on Taiwanese and international public opinion to force Taipei to the negotiating table.

Prominent analysts have described the gray zone strategy as seeking "economic, military, diplomatic, or political gains without eliciting a costly and direct response from an opponent." Others have described it as a "short of war" approach – a combination of political, military, diplomatic, economic and cyber measures whose objective is to achieve a psychological, attitudinal and then behavioral change on the part of Taiwanese public and political opinion.

Story continues below advertisement

These measures include intensifying political assaults by Beijing to delegitimize Taiwanese political leaders opposed to unification. They also involve military assets: naval, air, coast guard and other intrusions across the median line, across Taiwan's 24-mile contiguous zone and in and around Taiwan's offshore islands, are meant to show the Taiwanese that their administration is incapable of defending Taipei's claims to sovereignty. They also entail punitive economic measures (well short of a blockade) aimed at impeding Taiwanese trade, investment and other national income, to demonstrate to apolitical Taiwanese voters Taipei's vulnerability.

During her tenure, Tsai pointed to mounting cyber intrusions into Taiwan's economic and communications infrastructure, again with the intention of demonstrating to the Taiwanese people the acute vulnerability of their systems to an integrated cyberattack.

For China watchers, there are some similarities in Beijing's "short of war" strategies that have already been tried in the South and East China Seas, and those being tried on Taiwan. Japan has seen this with the intensity of People's Liberation Army Air Force sorties around Senkaku-Diaoyu Dao. We have also seen China assert nonlethal coercive actions in relation to the Second Thomas Shoal and the Philippines.

With Taiwan, however, there appears to be a growing intensity across the full range of gray zone activities. And those are likely to increase as the DPP settles in for another term and as Beijing's preferred political partner on Taiwan (Kuomintang, or KMT) looks at the prospect of a cumulative 12 years in opposition.

An embrace of gray zone agitation does not mean China has suspended its efforts to build the military capabilities necessary to take Taiwan by overwhelming military force. Those efforts continue.

And there is no inconsistency in China pursuing these two approaches in tandem. China's political strategy for unification with Taiwan has always had a fundamental military component. Indeed, these two approaches are entirely compatible if their cumulative effect is to reduce Taipei's deterrence and war-fighting capabilities, as well as its political, social and economic resilience.

Deterring China from launching military action against Taiwan is the cornerstone of a U.S. and allied strategy for preserving the status quo and the wider geostrategic stability of the Indo-Pacific region. The question that arises for all of us, however, is how to also deter China's emerging menu of measures that remain "short of war" and "short of invasion" but that share the same political objective, which is to force Taipei to capitulate.

Governments across the region and the world will increasingly be required to draw a clear linkage between identifiable gray zone actions on the one hand and a series of calibrated policy responses on the other. The alternative is no response at all – which presumably is Beijing's current expectation.

In the future, the Taiwanese might choose to engage in a fresh round of negotiations with Beijing on easing cross-strait tensions, new forms of economic cooperation and new approaches to the political relationship between them.

Story continues below advertisement

Indeed, all our interests would be served by breaking the 1992 Consensus impasse so that effective dialogue can recommence after nearly a decade of silence. Silence accentuates tension; talking can reduce it. As Winston Churchill famously reminded us, it's always better to "jaw-jaw than war-war."

But there is a difference between a voluntary, agreed approach to negotiations and a coerced one.

For Beijing, reassurance that Taipei and its international partners will sustain the status quo on Taiwan's future political status is essential for strategic stability. But with Xi's evident frustration at Taiwan's continuing autonomy, reassurance alone will not be sufficient.

It needs to be part of a much wider equation of integrated deterrence that will command all our efforts for the decade ahead if we are to successfully preserve the peace.

India to rename two dozen places in Tibet region under China as retaliation

06 June 2024, The Northlines, Girish Linganna

India has initiated a retaliatory effort against China's renaming of locations in India's Arunachal Pradesh state. The Indian government intends to rename over two dozen places in China's Tibet Autonomous Region as a response.

According to The Diplomat, a media organization, they have obtained a comprehensive list of the places that will be renamed in China's Tibet Autonomous Region. Indian military sources have provided this list, and it is anticipated that the official release will take place once the new government assumes power in Delhi, following the formation of the new government.

Starting on June 8, Modi will serve his third term as Prime Minister with a smaller majority, necessitating reliance on coalition partners for governing. However, this reduced political space is unlikely to significantly affect foreign policy, as there is broad support across multiple political parties for Modi's objective of enhancing India's global influence and power.

New Delhi suspects that China's renaming of places in Arunachal Pradesh is an attempt to bolster Beijing's territorial claim on this large province in northeastern India, which China refers to as Zangnan or "southern Tibet." This move is seen as an effort to assert control over the region and consolidate China's influence.

According to The Diplomat, the Indian Army's information warfare division is believed to be responsible for the renaming of Tibetan places in Arunachal Pradesh. Additionally, with the support of renowned research institutes such as the Asiatic Society in Kolkata, the Indian Army has been actively disproving the legitimacy of the Chinese names by conducting thorough research. Their efforts aim to counter China's narrative and provide accurate information regarding the region.

Under its logo, the Indian Army has shared detailed tweets that challenge China's renaming of seven places in Arunachal Pradesh. Furthermore, they are actively working to counter the renaming of all the other 30 or so places that the Chinese government has renamed. The tweets aim to provide accurate information and refute China's attempts to assert control over these regions.

India's military has recently compiled a list of over 30 places in Tibet that are set to be renamed. The objective behind this is to reclaim their ancient names in Indian languages, which are derived from historical records. This initiative aims to restore and recognize the historical significance of these places based on authentic sources.

According to sources, this list of renamed places in Tibet will soon be made public through various media platforms. This is part of a larger global campaign aimed at presenting a compelling counter-narrative to China's claims on India's Arunachal Pradesh state and other disputed border regions. The intention is to showcase India's perspective and challenge China's assertions by providing alternative viewpoints and historical evidence.

Military officials, who wished to remain anonymous, have stated that the new names given to these places are supported by thorough historical research. This signifies that considerable efforts have been made to ensure the accuracy and legitimacy of the chosen names.

According to an Ex IB officer, if India proceeds with the renaming campaign, it would essentially reopen the issue of Tibet. Although India has recognized Tibet as part of China following its forcible occupation by Beijing, the current Modi government shows a willingness to change its stance in order to counter China's aggressive actions. This shift in approach reflects India's efforts to challenge China's territorial claims and renaming initiatives, as reported by The Diplomat.

In recent weeks, the Indian Army has arranged numerous media trips to the contested border regions. During these visits, journalists were given the opportunity to interact with local residents who strongly dispute China's claims and assert that their allegiance has always been to India. These efforts aim to showcase the perspective of the locals and highlight their unwavering support for India's sovereignty over these areas.

An officer involved in the campaign, who preferred to remain anonymous, stated that the primary objective is to promote India's counter-narrative regarding the disputed border. This would be achieved by leveraging regional and global media platforms and emphasizing both comprehensive historical research and the opinions of local residents. The aim is to establish a strong and credible narrative that supports India's perspective on the border issue.

In an apparent attempt to reinforce its territorial claim over Arunachal Pradesh, China renamed 30 locations along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) in India's northeastern state in March. The Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs, responsible for naming administrative divisions, issued a list of "standardized" geographical names in Arunachal Pradesh, known as Zangnan in Beijing's terminology. This move by China was reported by the South China Morning Post, a Hong Kong-based newspaper.

China's renaming of locations in Arunachal Pradesh comprises a list that consists of 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass, and a parcel of land. These new names are recorded in Chinese characters, Tibetan language, and pinyin, which is the Roman alphabet-based representation of Mandarin Chinese.

Quoting the Chinese Ministry of Civil Affairs, the South China Morning Post reported that the renaming of geographical names in Zangnan (Arunachal Pradesh) was carried out in accordance with regulations defined by China's cabinet, the State Council. The ministry, in collaboration with other relevant departments, stated that they standardized certain geographical names in the region based on these provisions.

China's decision to rename places in Arunachal Pradesh is not new, as this marks the fourth instance of such a unilateral action by Beijing. In 2017, the first list of six standardized names for locations in Arunachal Pradesh was released, followed by a second list in 2021 featuring 15 place names. In 2023, a third list was published, containing names for 11 places. However, the most recent fourth list is particularly significant, as it introduces nearly the same number of new place names as the previous three lists combined.

India has consistently dismissed China's attempts to rename places in Arunachal Pradesh, affirming that the state is an intrinsic component of the nation. India maintains that the act of assigning "invented" names does not change the underlying reality of Arunachal Pradesh's status as an integral part of the country.

In 2023, the former spokesperson of India's External Affairs Ministry, Arindam Bagchi, expressed the country's response to the reports of China's renaming efforts. He straightforwardly rejected China's attempt, emphasizing that this was not the first time such actions were taken by China. India's outright rejection asserts its stance on the matter, asserting that it does not accept the validity or legitimacy of China's renaming endeavors.

Furthermore, in response to China's latest round of efforts to assert its claims on Arunachal Pradesh, India's Prime Minister Narendra Modi visited the region in March 2024. During his visit, he inaugurated the Sela Tunnel constructed at an elevation of 13,000 feet. Beijing responded by filing a diplomatic protest with India.

Addressing China's persistent claims on Arunachal Pradesh, India's External Affairs Minister S. Jaishankar described them as "ludicrous" on March 23. He emphasized that the state was an inherent and natural part of India, firmly rejecting China's assertions.

Regarding the issue of Arunachal Pradesh, India's External Affairs Minister responded that it is not a new matter. He highlighted that China's claims and attempts to expand those claims are baseless and continue to be deemed as ludicrous. He made these remarks while addressing a question on the Arunachal issue during a lecture at the esteemed Institute of South Asian Studies at the National University of Singapore. The minister emphasized India's steadfast position regarding the region's status.

In addition, the External Affairs Minister reiterated India's clear and unwavering stance on the matter, noting that it has remained consistent over time. He acknowledged that the issue of Arunachal Pradesh would be an integral part of the ongoing boundary discussions between the two countries. This statement reflects India's commitment to address the matter within the context of bilateral dialogues. (IPA Service).

China 'Heats-Up' Indian Border With Civil-Military Fusion, Dual Use Villages To Assert Claims Near Disputed LAC

05 June 2024, The Eurasian Times, Ritu Sharma

India's China problem has been festering for some time now. The new Indian government will have a task cut out for it to arrest the downward spiral of ties with China as Beijing has already begun upgrading its "xiaokang" (villages) along the 3,500-kilometer-long border with India. Experts see it as a "gray zone" tool from China's playbook to assert claims on disputed areas.

These villages have "military and dual-use infrastructure," and many are clustered along the eastern sector that borders Arunachal Pradesh, an Indian state that China covets and claims to be "South Tibet."

A no-patrol buffer zone was created around Patrolling Point-14 in Galwan Valley three weeks after the violent clash in which 20 Indian soldiers and an unspecified number of Chinese troops were killed on June 15, 2020. China, however, has recently completed construction of a road from the north of Samzungling to the Galwan Valley, providing the PLA with a 15 km shorter alternate axis to rapidly build up troops in the area.

China has also tried to offset its air combat disadvantage at high altitudes by deploying its J-20 and J-10 fighters closer to the border.

The infrastructure building is indicative of China's efforts "to use gray zone tactics to advance its strategic and security interests in disputed areas while staying below the threshold of armed conflict."

"By building civilian villages, China can increase the population of remote border areas, adding legitimacy to its territorial claims. This simultaneously creates the necessary infrastructure to better support military and police forces, which, in turn, helps to protect local civilians from perceived threats across the border," an analysis by the Centre for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) contends.

The analysis, done under the China Power Project, elucidates how these villages are located as close as just seven kilometers from the Line of Actual Control (LAC). The border village of Zhuangnan (庄南) has seen significant additions to military or paramilitary infrastructure in recent years.

Previously, satellite images showed a walled complex with at least eleven buildings in 2019. By 2020, some buildings will be demolished to pave for new ones. In 2022, barracks-like structures appeared along with a large building and a radome or communication tower. An image from December 31, 2023, showed the construction of new infrastructure for monitoring or logistics support purposes.

"The barracks, perimeter walls, and radome/communications tower located at these complexes indicate the likely presence of China's military, the People's Liberation Army (PLA). It is also possible these facilities are operated by the paramilitary People's Armed Police (PAP). Under China's Land Borders Law, these two forces share responsibility for defending China's borders from armed attacks or other encroachments," the commentary reads.

The location of these villages so close to the border indicates that it gives the Chinese Army and Para Military forces a "vantage point" for monitoring activities along the border.

Indian experts have been raising concerns over the massive infrastructure building on the Chinese side of the border.

Former Indian Army Chief General MM Naravane (retired) told the EurAsian Times: "China has been investing in creating infrastructure, especially roads and railways in border areas ostensibly for the benefit of local people. However, in the absence of any sizable local population to justify such investment, it is apparent that such developments are for military purposes."

Another village, Majiduncan, less than 10 km northwest of the disputed border, has seen many infrastructure additions over the past two years. Earlier, it had few buildings and a helipad, but by November 2023, images show that a huge building complex had emerged alongside two helipads and a paved network of roads.

"Given the region's mountainous terrain, helipads play a key role in facilitating the swift movement of people, equipment, and supplies in the area, especially during emergencies," the CSIS commentary reads.

Civil-Military Fusion To Assert Claims

The dual-use facilities align with China's Land Borders Law, which embeds border defense into the responsibilities of border area governments. The border villages are meant to strengthen the construction of defense infrastructure to maintain border security.

"This emphasis on leveraging civilian villages to support the military bears the hallmarks of China's "military-civil fusion" strategy, which aims to fuse China's economic and military development to support overall national objectives," the report reads.

China has also been constructing a new highway, G216, along the Ladakh region of India, which will allow the rapid mobilization of Chinese troops during a similar confrontation between the two countries on the LAC.

So far, China has only one highway, G219, in Ladakh. Earlier, the treacherous terrain in the region thwarted Beijing's plan for infrastructure development. But not anymore. The sole highway has been vulnerable to the Indian military. And now, China is close to eliminating its vulnerability by completing an alternate route known as the G216.

The CSIS analysis covers just four villages. In recent years, China has expanded and upgraded its civilian and military infrastructure in the area.

The Pentagon's 2023 Annual Report to Congress: Military and Security Developments Involving the People's Republic of China said that Beijing continued to develop military infrastructure along the LAC. "These improvements include underground storage facilities near Doklam, new roads in all three sectors of the LAC, new villages in disputed areas in neighboring Bhutan, a second bridge over Pangong Lake, a dual-purpose airport near the center sector, and multiple helipads," the report said.

With the adversarial ties between India and China showing signs of improvement, New Delhi has also started building strategic infrastructure on the border. India has been building tunnels, roads, and bridges on its side of the border for quick deployment of troops and weapons.

However, beyond infrastructure development, the new Indian government will need to focus on defense acquisition for its military to continue combating parity with China.

Decoding the role of Chinese Military Companies operating with the PLA Information Support Force (ISF): A Comprehensive Analysis of the Major Military Companies

05 June 2024, Usanas Foundation, Tenzin Younten and Tenzin Sherap

The establishment of the PLA's Information Support Force (ISF) has significantly reshaped China's military-industrial complex, driving major Chinese military companies to the forefront of military informatization and Information Warfare. This paper delves into the critical roles of these companies within the PLA ISF's operational framework and their contributions to the development of an advanced, integrated military information network system capable of supporting China's strategic objectives in future warfare.

On April 19, the historic establishment of the PLA's Information Support Force (ISF) marked a new era in China's military Modernization, Informatization, and Intelligentization efforts.

The move, part of a broader military reform aimed at the rapid development of a highly informatized force, had an immediate and massive impact on Chinese military companies. These companies, key players in coordinating the construction and application of the military network information system, have seen a significant surge in their stock prices, reflecting their integral role in the nation's defense industrial base.

More than a month has passed since the PLA's last reform. The newly formed PLA ISF is poised to streamline and integrate key companies in the Military communication and information technology sectors, fostering enhanced coordination and a unified approach to military informatization and information warfare. Notably, there were four major impacts of the PLA ISF's establishment on China's Military Industrial complex:

1. The pivotal role of the Chinese military companies in the formation and operationalization of PLA ISF.
2. The Chinese companies engaged with the PLA ISF are poised to play a greater role in advancing the military informatization and building of the PLA's network information system.
3. PLA ISF is expected to drive rapid growth in military companies, particularly those within the information and technology sectors.

4. Creation of new employment opportunities for Chinese youths in the Military.

As published on the China Energy Network on May 21, 2024, Minsheng Securities released a research report on the computer industry, which pointed out that the military industry is facing a major turning point in military informatization and resonates with the four major impacts.

On May 22, Yuncaijing (云财经网), a leading financial trading research platform in China, reported a significant stock rise of industries within the military sector especially in the information and technology sectors following the PLA ISF's formation. The stocks of China's military industry giant including Jian Hi-Tech (300845), Guanxiang Technology (301213), Gaoling Information (688175), Guangha Communications (300711), Gaomeng New Materials (300200), Shipbuilding Emergency (300527) among many others all rose by a 20 percent. Simultaneously, many other industry giants such as Beijing Andawell Technology Co., Ltd, T(300581), Tianhe Defense (300397), Torch Electronic (603678), and Andaville(300719) stock experienced a 10 percent increase.

Other significant military companies recording stock rise include Zhongbing Red Arrow Co., Ltd. (000519), Fenghuo Electronics (000561), Aerospace Changfeng (600855), and Tianjin 712 Communication & Broadcasting Co Ltd (603712). This stock increase highlights investor confidence in the strategic importance and future profitability of companies aligned with the PLA ISF. By China's 7.2 percent increased defense budget announced this year, Zhiyan Consulting's forecast stated that China's expenditure for military information network-related companies is expected to exceed 250 billion yuan in 2025, and its total market size will exceed 160 billion yuan by 2027.

This document offers a comprehensive analysis of more than 70 prominent Chinese defense companies believed to be operating in cooperation with or under the PLA's Information Support Force. It outlines their involvement in information procurement, processing, transmission, and security, as well as their role in the production of military electronic components and simulation technologies. The paper is structured into two sections, covering the profiles of Chinese defense companies operating alongside the PLA's Information Support Force and the potential for substantial job creation in the military information technology sector for Chinese youth in the upcoming years.

Broadly, the recent establishment of the PLA's three new independent arms under a new force structure was a strategic requirement to achieve a fully modernized national defense and military force by 2035 and to become a world-class military by 2049.

The founding of the PLA's Information Support Force and integration of military companies within it adheres to the 2027 benchmark goal of integrated development of the Chinese military through mechanization, informatization, and intelligentization and fielding a combat-ready force with improved strategic capabilities to defend national sovereignty, security, and development interests. (Guangming Daily, 2020)

Chinese Military Companies' alignment with PLA's Information Support Force drives Military Informatization"

With the significant stock rise of key Military industries across China, the Chinese information and technological companies are steadfast to play a major role in the newly formed PLA ISF.

The wave of mergers and alignment of Chinese military industries with the PLA ISF is evident by their role in the construction and development of the military information network system and their subsequent contributions to the PLA ISF's operational framework. Some companies like Zhimingda (智明达), and Fenghuo Electronics (烽火电子) have made such connections more noticeable. On May 17, Zhimingda (688636.SH) stated on an investor platform, "The information support force is a relatively new military branch, and equipment in this field is being planned, and the company will actively participate in it". Similarly, On May 16, Fenghuo Electronics shared "the establishment of the information support force provides the company with opportunities to participate in the informatization construction of the army. The company will continue to promote business development and contribute more to the informatization of the army".

In recent years, under Xi's Central Military Commission and the Central Commission for Military-Civilian Fusion Development, China has systematically reorganized its science and technology enterprises to ensure that new innovations simultaneously advance economic and military development. With the recent strategic overhaul of PLA, the Chinese Military or Civilian companies in the domain of information and technology will operate directly or indirectly under the Chinese Information Support Force (ISF), making significant strides towards creating a world-class Informatized Military. Chinese President Xi Jinping called for the PLA to create a highly informatized force capable of dominating all networks and expanding the country's security and development interests. It is increasingly clear that Chinese military companies are leading the charge toward creating the PLA's Information Network System, also known as the "operational system of systems", enabling the PLA to acquire, transmit, process, and use information during a conflict to conduct integrated joint military operations across the ground, maritime, air, space, cyberspace, and electromagnetic spectrum domains.

According to the People's Liberation Army Daily, Military Informatization refers to the continuous development process of widespread use of information technology in all fields of military construction based on mechanization. This includes building information networks and information systems, extensive acquisition, in-depth development and sharing of information resources, and promoting the overall transformation of the military.

Breakdown of major Chinese military companies operating within the PLA ISF's operational framework On the founding day of PLA ISF, President Xi Jinping underscored the significance of this new strategic branch of the military as a key pillar in coordinating the construction and application of the network information system.

As PLA ISF accelerates the process of military informatization and integration of all PLA four Service Branches and four independent Arms through the network information system to meet the needs to win future wars. China continues to prioritize C4I modernization (Command, Control, Communications, Computers, and Intelligence) that emphasizes the importance of rapid information collection, processing, and sharing and accelerated decision-making. Unlike the shadowy Strategic Support Force, PLA ISF aims to foster more effective coordination with its aligned industries by providing a clear and concise operational framework that is geared towards expediting the military informatization process and fortifying China's Information Warfare and Multi-Domain Precision Warfare (MDPW: 多域精确战) capabilities anchored in C4ISR.

In essence, the core objective of the newly formed PLA ISF is to construct the PLA's network information system sometimes called the "operational system of systems" through rapid military informatizations efforts. On May 4, PLA daily news commenting on the PLA ISF characterized Modern warfare as a confrontation or contest between systems, emphasizing the criticality of information warfare capabilities. The extensive lists of more than 70 military companies (not conclusive) supporting the core operations of the PLA Information Support Forces and the development of an integrated Military Network System across 6 different domains included:

1. Information Acquisition : 29 Major Military Companies working in this domain are manufacturers of Sonar, Infrared radiation, Radar, and Satellite, which are vital to the PLA ISF's information acquisition operations. These products have military applications spanning military detection, defense, attacks, navigation, command and control system, and more.

2. Information Transmission: 15 major military companies support military information transmission, specializing in wireless communication, Broadband communication, and Quantum communication technologies.
3. Information Processing: 11 military companies support the information processing operations of the PLA's Information Support Force, encompassing Command and dispatch, data storage, and data management systems, forming the backbone for integrated joint military operations.
4. Information Security: 7 major companies contribute largely to the information security operations, specializing in quantum cryptography, software development, and Electronic pairing to protect military information and communication assets.
5. Military Electronic Components: 6 major military companies listed below are manufacturers of the Multilayer Chip Ceramic Capacitors, Tantalum capacitors, and other critical components used in electronic equipment and systems of the PLA ISF and the military.
6. Military Simulation: In 2020, the market size of China's military simulation industry was approximately 11.852 billion yuan, and it is expected that the industry market size will exceed 20 billion yuan by 2027. The three military companies listed are core providers of military simulation technologies, crucial to the military informatization operations undertaken by the PLA ISF.

In alignment with their increasing importance to the PLA ISF, the list of 72 major military companies under the PLA ISF has recorded a massive boost in investment and stock value in varying degrees.

Creation of new job opportunities for Chinese youths in the Military

After the People's Liberation Army (PLA) implemented its latest reform on April 19, one of the predominant topics of public discussion in China was the potential for significant job opportunities for Chinese youths in the forthcoming years. The focus of these opportunities is expected to center around education and employment in the fields of cybersecurity, information technology, and aerospace.

The establishment of new independent arms such as the Information Support Force (PLA ISF), Military Aerospace Force (PLA MAF), and Cyber Force (PLACF) within a new force structure has led to the creation of more positions in PLA for the civilian to join as a military servicemen or either as civilian personnel. A major change in the PLA's civilian recruitment is inevitable. A Chinese news article on 28th April mentioned that "in the 2025 civilian recruitment positions to be released in October this year, we will also see a large number of new or expanded positions in the three types of units: military aerospace forces, cyberspace forces, and information support forces". Similarly, another News article in China reiterated that 2025 military civilian recruitment is expected to be the year with the largest number of recruitments and positions in recent years.

Conclusion

The Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) has a history of relying on both Military and Civilian companies in the information and technology sectors, in particular, their use in C4I (Command, Control, Communications, Computers, and Intelligence) operations and building joint combat capabilities. The alignment of over 70 major military companies within the PLA ISF's operational framework underscores their critical role in constructing and application of an integrated, highly informatized military network information system.

The Chinese military companies operating under the control of the People's Liberation Army's Informationization Support Force (PLA ISF) are a fundamental element of China's plan to attain a fully modernized military by 2035 and a globally competitive military by 2049. The ongoing advancement and assimilation of cutting-edge information technologies will play a critical role in achieving these strategic objectives, ensuring that China maintains a leading position in the realm of "information warfare".

China is Erasing the Memory of the Tiananmen Massacre. We Can't Let Them.

04 June 2024, US News, Sophie Richardson

It's long past time to hold Beijing accountable for human rights violations.

The woman's voice cracks as she calls for the souls of the dead to rest in peace. More than three decades since their loved ones were killed by Chinese security forces in the Tiananmen Square massacre of June 4,

1989, family members vowed in a recording last week to press on “until the day of justice arrives.”

On the 35th anniversary of the fatal crackdown on unarmed protesters, Chinese president and Communist Party leader Xi Jinping has silenced discussion in China of what happened in 1989. We can’t let him silence us too.

We must remember the students, workers, journalists and others who gathered peacefully in Beijing at a moment of political fluidity in April 1989, demanding free speech, economic reform, greater liberties and an end to corruption. As the protests grew, the government imposed martial law the following month. When protesters didn’t disperse, authorities killed hundreds or perhaps thousands of unarmed citizens in Beijing and other cities. We don’t know exact numbers because China suppressed them, hiding the death toll and scope of the nationwide crackdown.

Chinese leaders have had 35 years to face up to the past. Yet they steadfastly refuse to do so, presumably fearing that truth and accountability for Tiananmen – and for so many other violations of Chinese citizens’ basic human rights – will threaten their iron grip on power.

Unfortunately, democratic nations – including the United States – have allowed China’s economic and strategic importance on the world stage to take precedence, enabling impunity for the crimes of Tiananmen by failing to impose meaningful consequences on the Chinese government.

Issuing statements commemorating the crackdown, as the U.S. and others have done in the past, is a symbolic but insufficient gesture. China’s leaders have committed even worse human rights violations in the years since Tiananmen, including genocide against the minority Uighurs in western China, in part because they face few to no domestic or international consequences for doing so. Democracies need to demand the release of those wrongfully detained in China, and accountability for China’s crimes against humanity. One option would be establishing international tribunals to investigate these crimes.

There are 27 Chinese citizens serving sentences or under detention in mainland China and Hong Kong for their involvement in the protests or commemoration of 1989, according to the global Network of Chinese Human Rights Defenders; three other Tiananmen veterans were “persecuted to death” by authorities, including 2010 Nobel Peace laureate Liu Xiaobo.

In Hong Kong, once an island of free expression, 1 million people gathered in Victoria Park 35 years ago to protest the crackdown. For decades, tens of thousands to hundreds of thousands of Hongkongers marked the event in an annual candlelight vigil at Victoria Park – until those events were banned in 2020.

Xi’s efforts to control past, current and future critiques of the government aren’t limited to June 4, or confined to the country’s borders. When years of China’s draconian “zero-COVID” controls prompted peaceful protests in China, authorities squashed dissent. Peng Lifa, who hung a banner on a bridge in Beijing calling for an end to the lockdown and for democracy, was taken by police in October 2022 and hasn’t been heard from since. Other protesters held up blank pieces of paper across China in November 2022, but they too were persecuted and references to their efforts were censored.

Increasingly, commemorations of June 4 and other Chinese government assaults on human rights take place outside China. People will gather this year from Toronto to Tokyo. In Hong Kong, courageous individuals have attempted private remembrances or public acts, including publishing a newspaper with a blank front page ahead of June 4. As Beijing increasingly seeks to silence Chinese overseas, those who join these gatherings must be wary of state surveillance. At a Tiananmen commemoration in California last week, organizers obscured some participants’ identities, fearful of reprisals against those people and their family members still in China.

Even as Xi increases repression domestically and internationally, the Tiananmen Mothers have called for transparency and accountability regarding June 4, and for Chinese authorities to respect the rule of law.

The mothers’ photos of their children who died in 1989 are now faded, but they reflect the spirit of people inside and outside China bravely demanding respect for their human rights. Their actions should galvanize leaders of democracies into action. Even one more year of impunity for the Chinese Communist Party will have devastating consequences for human rights.

#9 Unlocking Tibet: In-Depth Mapping of Transport Infrastructure Through Geo-Spatial Analysis

04 June 2024, Takshashila Geospatial Bulletin, Dr. Nithiyanandam Yogeswaran

The Backstory

China's ongoing efforts to overcome the significant barriers that impede movement between the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and other Chinese provinces are part of larger strategic goals. These barriers, including surging rivers, rugged mountain terrain, fragile ecosystems, and extreme climatic conditions, have been a part of Tibet's landscape for centuries. The year 1959 marked a significant shift when the transportation of supplies from provinces like Yunnan, Sichuan, and Qinghai heavily relied on humans and livestock. Since then, Tibet's transport infrastructure has seen substantial growth. The total road network in TAR, which was 7,300 km in 1959, expanded to 120,000 km by 2021, a growth of 1543%. This development includes major highways that connect cities, towns, and rural areas within TAR. The integration of Tibet into the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) in 2016, a global infrastructure development strategy, has further accelerated this infrastructure growth, profoundly transforming TAR's social and economic landscape.

Despite its sparsely populated mountainous terrain, constructing rail lines in Tibet has been a strategic imperative for China. The inauguration of Tibet's first rail line, the Qinghai-Tibet Railway, in 2006 was a significant milestone. This strategic vision is evident in that by 2020, Tibet will have only about 800 km of railway, a length comparable to that of Shanghai, despite Tibet being approximately 200 times larger in land area. However, this scenario is beginning to change. In 2021, China launched Tibet's first high-speed rail line, connecting the regional capital Lhasa with Nyingchi. This line significantly enhances the capability to transport civilians swiftly, as well as PLA troops and equipment, across the eastern part of Tibet, thereby bolstering China's logistical capabilities. The implications of these developments are underscored by notable railroads such as Qinghai-Tibet (2000 km) and Sichuan-Tibet Railway, which connects Tibet externally; meanwhile, Lhasa-Shigatse (253 km) and Lhasa-Nyingchi (435 km) are the major rail projects that network internally within Tibet, underscoring the importance of Tibet's transport infrastructure.

As per literature, in recent years, air infrastructure has been significantly enhanced alongside the expansion of road and rail networks. Between 2017 and 2022, five airports were upgraded, and four new airports were established. Additionally, nine heliports became operational, further strengthening the region's air connectivity.

Why it is essential to understand transport infrastructure?

Studying the expansion of roads and other transportation networks in Tibet is essential for India. Firstly, enhanced connectivity in TAR can significantly impact regional trade dynamics, facilitating faster and more efficient movement of goods between China and South Asia. The development of robust transport infrastructure in Tibet enhances China's logistical capabilities, affecting the strategic balance in the region. Improved roads and railways mean quicker mobilisation of military assets, a critical consideration for India given the long-standing border disputes with China. Moreover, the environmental impacts of such infrastructure projects are significant. The fragile ecosystem of the Tibetan plateau, with its unique biodiversity and delicate balance, is susceptible to disturbances from large-scale construction activities. Understanding the environmental repercussions of these developments is vital for India, particularly concerning transboundary river systems originating in Tibet, which are lifelines for millions in South Asia. Lastly, the socio-economic transformation of Tibet, driven by improved infrastructure, can lead to demographic shifts and altered socio-political dynamics in the region, influencing Tibet's stability and potentially affecting neighbouring areas, including India. Therefore, a comprehensive study of the transportation network expansion in Tibet offers valuable insights into the broader implications for trade, security, environmental sustainability, and regional stability, all of which are paramount to India.

Road Infrastructure of Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR)

It is well-established that road infrastructure is crucial for various aspects, including a region's economic development. Figures 2 and 3 clearly illustrate that road networks have significantly expanded. When comparing maps from the pre-independence era to those of the present day, it is evident that the networks have rapidly extended both in length and breadth. This article will further explore whether this growth has primarily been in significant roads or if there has been a more extensive development of minor networks in the region.

Refer to Figure 2, which illustrates both minor and major roads. Specifically, the various categories of roads are detailed, with trunk and other significant roads depicted by blue lines. These trunk roads connect significant towns and critical areas along the border. Additionally, the figure shows minor roads, including tertiary and secondary roads extending across small villages and remote posts situated in regions closer to the border, remote villages in the valley, and rugged mountains.

While minor roads are crucial for last-mile connectivity, developing major roads is essential for significant progress. Let's delve into this topic through the maps (Figure 4 & 5). The maps illustrate the network of substantial roads established over the past few years. The total length of highways in Tibet spans close to 18,000 km. Among these, the G318, the longest highway in Tibet, connects Shanghai to Tibet. Other significant highways include G109, G219, G214, and the Sino-Nepal Friendship Highway (also part of G318). The connectivity of these highways is detailed in Figure 4.

In addition to the major trunk roads, the trunk link roads play a crucial role in connecting the primary arteries with various regions. These can be considered secondary roads within the area, collectively spanning close to 14,000 kilometres across some of the most challenging terrains in the world. Different forms of minor roads extend further from these secondary roads, reaching villages and remote areas. Refer to Figure 5, which illustrates the significant and primary highway links. The types of roads are asphalt, concrete, gravel, paved, unpaved, and dirt.

Rail Network Infrastructure in Tibet

In late 1999, while other engineers were still figuring out how to make it work, Zhang Luxin, a renowned engineer with extensive experience in railway construction, proposed a new plan. His idea involved following the plateaus that stretch for hundreds of miles. Although the plateau is flat, it is situated at a high altitude and subjected to harsh weather and melting permafrost, making it a challenging route. Zhang argued that it is the best route because it has been used for other purposes. Since the 1970s, this path has been used for an oil pipeline and the route of the Qinghai-Tibet Highway. Many doubted Zhang's plan, believing workers could not survive the high altitudes. More than 644 kilometres of the railway would be built on permafrost, which remains frozen throughout the year. Some considered the technology for building on permafrost too new and risky. However, Zhang persuaded them that it was feasible. Officials approved the route from Golmud to Lhasa, and construction began. This project became one of the most challenging railway lines ever built, high up in the mountains. Today, we see numerous high-speed railways and long tunnels constructed with cutting-edge technology.

The Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) includes several projects in Tibet that are also aimed at enhancing connectivity between China, Nepal, and Bhutan. Central to this effort is the development of the Trans-Himalayan Multi-Dimensional Connectivity Network. This network includes infrastructure projects such as the railway extension towards the Nepalese border at Gyirong, which aims to connect with the planned Kathmandu-Kerung railway. These rail and road links are expected to facilitate trade and transit between Tibet and Nepal, promoting economic integration and regional cooperation. Additionally, there are discussions about extending road connectivity from Tibet to Bhutan, which would further enhance regional connectivity under the BRI framework. These projects are part of China's broader strategy to strengthen economic ties and enhance logistical links in South Asia through Tibet.

The Tibet railway network, notably the Qinghai-Tibet Railway and its extensions, is both a challenging and impressive feat due to several unique factors. The railway traverses some of the world's highest and most inhospitable terrains, with sections reaching over 5,000 metres, presenting significant engineering and human health challenges, such as altitude sickness and extreme weather conditions, including sub-zero temperatures and strong winds. Much of the railway is built on permafrost, requiring innovative engineering solutions to ensure stability, such as laying tracks on thick layers of rock and concrete to prevent the permafrost from melting and destabilising the tracks. Constructing the railway in a fragile ecosystem requires careful planning to minimise environmental impact. This includes building bridges over animal migration paths and using unique materials to reduce soil erosion. Transporting materials and machinery to such remote and high-altitude locations posed significant logistical challenges, and the workforce had to endure difficult living conditions. Ensuring a continuous supply of necessary materials was complex.

Despite these challenges, the Qinghai-Tibet Railway, completed in 2006, is a remarkable engineering achievement. It includes the Tanggula Pass, the world's highest railway pass at 5,072 metres, and the Fenghuoshan Tunnel, the highest railway tunnel in the world. Advanced technologies were employed to address the challenges of building on permafrost and high altitudes, such as cooling pipes and insulation layers to stabilise the ground and pressurised train cabins to ensure passenger comfort at high altitudes. The railway has significantly boosted the economy of Tibet, facilitating the transport of goods and people, improving access to remote areas, promoting tourism, and providing better connectivity for local populations. The extension of the railway network towards Nepal and potentially Bhutan demonstrates China's commitment to regional connectivity under the Belt and Road Initiative, aiming to enhance trade and economic integration between China and its South Asian neighbours.

Air Infrastructure of Tibet Autonomous Region

Air infrastructure is vital in Tibet, overcoming significant geographical and topographical challenges, including high altitudes, mountainous terrain, and harsh weather conditions that make ground transportation difficult. It provides a reliable alternative for moving people and goods efficiently, boosting tourism and facilitating trade. Strategically, air connectivity allows for the rapid deployment of troops and supplies, which is essential for border security. It also enhances accessibility to remote areas, ensuring the delivery of essential services and promoting cultural exchange and integration. Key airports like Lhasa Gonggar and investments from initiatives like the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) are central to these efforts, highlighting air travel's crucial role in Tibet's economic and social development.

The air infrastructure in Tibet has significantly improved over the years. Several old airports have been renewed, and new airstrips are being constructed. Additionally, many shorter airstrips and heliports have been strengthened.

In our previous research, we covered some of these developments. However, in this edition, we have found that the infrastructure has grown even more. For instance, the number of airstrips has increased from 9 to 13 in the last two years. Existing literature on the topic identified nine airstrips till 2022. Meanwhile, our current study has identified 13. The number of functional and non-functional helipads identified through open-source intelligence is significantly higher than previous research in the public domain.

As stated in earlier research, most airports and airstrips in the Region serve dual purposes, catering to tourism and civilian movement within the country and acting as military bases for the PLA's Air Force. Although the capacity for military operations at these airstrips is unclear, Tibet has several functional civilian airports, with Lhasa Gonggar International Airport being the largest and most important. Lhasa Gonggar Airport has a significant capacity to handle 9 million passengers annually. The airport's Terminal 3, which opened in 2021, contributes significantly to this capacity with 21 additional boarding gates and extensive facilities designed to accommodate high passenger volumes. Other notable airports in Tibet include Nyingchi Mainling Airport, Shigatse Peace Airport, Ngari Gunsa Airport, and Qamdo Bangda Airport. These airports form a network facilitating domestic and limited international travel, primarily connecting to major Chinese cities and Kathmandu in Nepal.

Overall connectivity: transportation nexus

Integrating Tibet's Road, air, and rail infrastructure creates a transformative nexus that significantly impacts tourism, economic activities, and military logistics. This comprehensive transportation network facilitates greater accessibility, enabling a surge in tourism by connecting remote areas with significant cities and international destinations. For instance, the Qinghai-Tibet Railway and newly expanded air routes have improved connectivity, boosted the number of tourists and contributed to the local economy.

Furthermore, the development of these infrastructures supports large-scale economic projects and civilian activities by enhancing the flow of goods and services, which is vital for Tibet's economic growth. The railways and highways, such as the Qinghai-Tibet and Sichuan-Tibet Highways, play a critical role in the movement of both civilian and military personnel, underscoring their importance.

Overall, the enhanced transportation infrastructure in Tibet fosters regional economic development and tourism and strengthens the military's logistical capabilities, contributing to the area's stability and significance.

Nexus between Transportation network and PLA presence

Figures 10 and 11 illustrate the strategic distribution and connectivity of major PLA bases in Tibet. Figure 12 depicts the locations of these bases across the region, while Figure 13 highlights the comprehensive network of road, railway, and air infrastructures connecting them. This map underscores how transport infrastructures are designed with dual purposes, serving both civilian needs and military operations.

Settlement infrastructure and road connectivity

Figure 12 shows the distribution of major cities, small and medium towns, and villages within the Tibetan region. Some of these settlements are close to the borders shared with India and Bhutan.

Figure 13 highlights the connectivity of these settlements to major roads. This visualisation specifically showcases the significant roads, indicating a well-established network. It is important to note that this network includes paved and unpaved minor roads, serving multiple purposes. These minor roads provide crucial last-mile connectivity, linking remote posts and villages to the broader transportation system.

The complexity of the terrain

Tibet's terrain is complex, with vast plateaus, towering mountain ranges, and dramatic altitude variations, posing challenges for infrastructure development. The 3D map of Tibet Autonomous Region and other vital prefectures follows:

The maps (1414-18) show how challenging it is to find flat land for development in Tibet due to its rugged terrain. Few flat areas are suitable for construction, making land availability a significant challenge. Despite these obstacles, essential infrastructure projects, especially transportation, have been successfully established in the region. The images illustrate how even the most minor pieces of land are creatively used for various purposes, highlighting the region's resourcefulness in overcoming geographical constraints to develop essential infrastructure. This reflects the difficulties and achievements in adapting to Tibet's unique environment.

Tunnels and culverts in the complex terrain

In our study, we have mapped the locations of over 400 culverts and more than 600 spatial segments of tunnels in the region. The culverts are built primarily to allow water and debris passage over canals, rivers, streams, and ditches. On the other hand, the tunnels are designed specifically for road and railway systems, forming integral components of transportation networks. Tunnels and culverts are essential for ensuring the efficient use of transportation infrastructure under all weather conditions. Additionally, the tunnels reduce travel times and improve access to strategically important areas, offering economic or military advantages.

Culverts play a critical role in maintaining transportation routes' structural integrity and functionality by preventing water accumulation and erosion, thereby mitigating potential damage to the infrastructure. Meanwhile, tunnels facilitate seamless traffic flow through challenging terrains, such as mountains and hills, enhancing connectivity and accessibility. This improved connectivity supports economic activities by providing quicker routes for transporting goods and services. It enhances the mobility of military forces, ensuring rapid deployment and logistical support in critical areas. Integrating these infrastructural elements demonstrates a sophisticated approach to overcoming geographical challenges and optimising the transportation network for multifaceted benefits.

Parting shot

The insights shared in this edition aim to provide foundational spatial information about the transport infrastructure of the Tibet Autonomous Region, showcasing its readiness for economic expansion, resource utilisation, and military fortification compared to neighbouring areas. The focus has been mapping the various types of existing infrastructure and the inherent complexities of Tibet's unique and challenging terrain.

This analysis highlights the significant progress made in constructing roads, railways, and air links in one of the world's most challenging regions. The vast plateaus and towering mountain ranges necessitate specialised construction techniques and meticulous planning. Developing such infrastructure is a technical achievement and a necessity, enhancing connectivity and fulfilling civilian and military needs.

Our research extends beyond this initial study. We are delving deeper into the remote sensing of infrastructure and the engineering methods employed in Tibet's transport systems. Understanding the composition and resilience of the materials used is crucial for assessing these constructions' long-term sustainability and durability in harsh environmental conditions.

Moreover, future editions will comprehensively analyse key transport hubs and their evolution. This will include detailed studies of major highways, railway lines, and airports, examining how their development has impacted regional growth and security dynamics. By mapping these elements, we aim to provide a holistic view of how transport infrastructure supports broader socio-economic and strategic goals.

INSTIGATION OF REBELLIONS IN TIBET

03 June 2024, Geopolitika, Shane Quinn

The land area called Tibet, in south-western China, is a vast and strategically important part of the Chinese nation, resting on the borders of India, Nepal, Bhutan and Myanmar. The size of Tibet, if including most of the sparsely inhabited Tibetan Plateau as part of its territory, amounts to 970,000 square miles which is almost 4 times bigger than France.

The Chinese authorities, however, recognise the part of Tibet located on the western side of the plateau, and in 1965 the area was formally established as the Tibet Autonomous Region by Beijing. The Tibet Autonomous Region consists of 472,000 square miles which is still much larger than nearly every European country.

Tibet is the highest region on earth with an average altitude above sea level of nearly 4,400 metres. The overall temperature in winter remains below freezing. In the winter of 2018/2019, the coldest in Tibet for two decades, the average temperature was minus 4.3 degrees Celsius which was almost half a degree lower than in usual years.

Many Tibetans live outside of cities and towns. Sixty-nine percent of inhabitants in the central part of the Tibet Autonomous Region were living in rural areas by 2017. There they have farmed yaks and sheep on the high altitude, semi-arid grasslands and valleys, while they grow crops such as barley.

With the introduction by Beijing of healthcare programmes in Tibet since 1951, the average life expectancy of Tibetan residents has grown significantly. At the start of 2020 the typical life expectancy in Tibet was 70.6 years, whereas in 1950 it had only been 35.5 years. Because of its elevation and challenging land, the population of the Tibet Autonomous Region in 2022 consisted of a still modest 3.64 million people; but this is a population increase of around 15 percent since 2012.

Asia's biggest rivers can be traced to Tibet such as the Yangtze, the Mekong, and the Yellow, which are a vital water source for many people living in nations like China, India, Pakistan and Thailand.

In modern history Tibet was reintegrated to China just over 300 years ago. The Qing dynasty of China assumed control over the region in 1720, when Chinese soldiers that year defeated and expelled the Mongol forces of the Dzungar Khanate from Tibet. Yet the history of Tibet as being part of China dates much further back, to the mid-13th century, when the region was incorporated to China under the Yuan dynasty. China's authorities have strongly argued that Tibet continued to be a Chinese territory during the Ming dynasty which lasted until 1644.

Over elapsing centuries one of the greatest challenges to China's control over Tibet occurred during the 1950s and 1960s, in the immediate years after the successful culmination of the Chinese revolution in 1949. The revolution re-established China's independence after many years of meddling in the country by the Western powers, such as from the United States.

After 1948 the US had "lost China to communism" and policies were undertaken in Washington to reinstate their authority over China, with territories like Tibet identified as target areas. The CIA and to a lesser extent the US military helped to instigate anti-Chinese insurrections in Tibet, such as occurred from 1956 in the Kham and Amdo areas in the eastern part of the Tibetan Plateau.

The CIA directly intervened in Tibet and following 1956 went so far as to fly hundreds of Tibetan militants to the US, where they underwent training by CIA personnel at a facility in the state of Colorado. This military training centre, called Camp Hale, was built for US mountain troops in 1942 and was positioned high up the Rocky Mountains. In the latter stages of World War II, some Wehrmacht troops captured by the US Army in North Africa were sent to Camp Hale where they were kept prisoner.

After completion of training at Camp Hale the "Tibetan freedom fighters" were flown in planes belonging to a CIA airline, called the Intermountain Aviation and Intermountain Airways, and also by the US Air Force, to a secret base for operations against China constructed in the town of Aspen, a Colorado skiing hotspot.

The failed 1959 rebellion in Tibet against Beijing's authority was most heavily encouraged by Washington. As early as May 1957 armed Tibetan groups were created with CIA support. The following year (June 1958) an anti-Chinese guerrilla army, the Chushi Gangdruk Volunteer Defense Force, was established and its members were subsequently armed and trained by the Americans. The 1959 rebellion was supported not only by the CIA but by intelligence agents from India and Nepal, countries that were staunch US allies at the time.

The 14th Dalai Lama, an influential religious leader who is alive today, managed to evade Chinese government troops in March 1959 during the insurrection. Through wearing a disguise, on 17 March he fled Tibet southwards to India having been escorted to the border by CIA-trained Tibetan militants. Beijing's soldiers were understandably enraged when they discovered the Dalai Lama was nowhere to be seen.

The Dalai Lama's older brother, Gyalo Thondup, also still living, had a leading role in the 1959 revolt.

Thondup was in contact with the Americans for years. He had visited Washington in 1951 and provided intelligence details and local knowledge about Tibet to senior American officials.

Thondup insisted the Dalai Lama was not told about CIA assistance to the Tibetans which is obviously untrue. US State Department documents, released in August 1998, outlined that the Dalai Lama himself received from the CIA $180,000 every year from the late 1950s to 1974. This means the Dalai Lama was already being furnished with large amounts of American money at the time of the 1959 rebellion. The sum of $180,000 in 1959 is currently worth almost $2 million.

The Dalai Lama was previously receiving a financial allowance from the CIA dating to at least the early 1950s, and maybe as far back as 1949, at the end of the revolution. The CIA budget, relating to Tibet, was multiple times larger than the funds that were allocated for the British and US-led coup against the Iranian government of Mohammad Mossadegh in 1953.

The Dalai Lama has backed the unification of separatist groups in Tibet, Xinjiang and Inner Mongolia, with the ultimate aim of these Chinese regions seceding altogether from China. The Dalai Lama said, "Geography, history and currently Chinese occupation is connecting our three peoples. I remain optimistic that the true aspirations of the peoples of East Turkestan [Xinjiang], Inner Mongolia and Tibet will be fulfilled in a not too distant future".

American media later acknowledged the covert CIA training of Tibetan militants in Colorado. The CIA was also involved in funding "Tibet Houses" in cities like New York and Geneva, while the CIA's budget extended to providing "educational opportunities" to Tibetans at Cornell University in New York, and supplying the insurgents with military equipment.

On 6 January 1960 for example, unmarked CIA aircraft flying over Tibet dropped to the militants below 650 pallets containing weapons, medical supplies, and food. In the weeks before that, CIA planes had dropped military hardware such as hundreds of American M1 Garand rifles, grenades, mortars, and machine guns.

Two more CIA air drops consisted of a further 1,170 M1 Garand rifles, 200 cases of ammunition for the rifles, and 20 cases of grenades. The M1 Garand was the firearm most commonly used by the US Army in World War II and the Korean War, but by 1957 the rifle was considered obsolete by the Americans.

Another CIA air drop in early 1960 amounting to 430 pallets, which contained weapons and other supplies, was sent to 4,000 Tibetan insurgents below. Their position was identified by China's military pilots and heavily bombed. Occasionally, Chinese warplanes dropped leaflets ordering the militants to surrender and to ignore the Americans.

The Chinese aircraft often attacked enemy positions in the morning, at about noon, and then at around 3 pm or 4 pm. Fifteen warplanes would arrive in groups of five with each carrying between 15 to 20 bombs. Once the enemy forces were located, it was not a hard task for China's pilots to execute their combat mission. Across the Tibetan Plateau there is scarcely any cover in which to conceal men and equipment. For the Chinese airmen the most difficult job was finding the enemy due to the vastness of the land.

According to a retired CIA officer living in the eastern United States, the Americans wanted to inflict injury on the Chinese in Tibet, and were aware they would be unlikely to drive Beijing's divisions out of the area.

Tibetan guerrilla forces, with logistical support provided by the US, attacked China's lengthy supply lines in Tibet and attempted to tie down Chinese soldiers and make life difficult for them. These attacks, although they inflicted damage, could not succeed over time because of the greater size of China's military; and the fact that, compared to the enemy, Beijing's troops were also better equipped and had advanced weapons like the Chinese Type 56 assault rifle, which was first produced in 1956.

Control over the Tibetan Plateau is crucial for China. Robert Barnett, an author who focuses on Tibet, wrote that the Tibetan Plateau from a military viewpoint is important because it is made up of the high ground and central, south and east Asia converge around it.

From the late 1950s CIA training camps were set up in Nepal including close to Pokhara, Nepal's second biggest city, and in the district of Mustang, where Tibetan insurgents were trained by CIA operatives. There were at least 15 camps being used which were spread over Nepal, India, and inside China itself in Tibet.

By using Nepal and India as bases, the Americans were involving those two countries in the conflict against China. In the year 1964, the CIA spent $500,000 (worth $5 million today) on the guerrillas in Nepal; $400,000 ($4 million today) for the training of Tibetans in Colorado; $225,000 ($2.2 million today) on equipment, transportation and expenses; $185,000 ($1.8 million today) for flying to India the Tibetans trained in Colorado; $125,000 ($1.2 million today) for expenses, equipment and supplies to Tibetan reconnaissance teams, and on the storage of supplies, aircraft refuelling, agents' salaries, and formulation of traineeships for the network of agents in Tibet.

Moreover, the CIA in 1964 spent $75,000 ($744,000 today) on maintaining the Tibet Houses in

New York, Geneva, and other cities; $45,000 ($446,000 today) on "educational programmes" for 20 Tibetan youths; and the Dalai Lama of course received his annual $180,000. The Dalai Lama's entourage stressed that he never spent any of the money on himself.

A security guard for the Dalai Lama, Lobsang Tsultrim, said that he was hired by the CIA in 1964 and had no qualms about it. The insurgents could be naive and were often unable to comprehend that the Americans were using them for their own strategic purposes. The Dalai Lama, regardless, admitted that the US military aid was "entirely political" in nature.

At the end of 1962 the Americans were granted access to an airfield beside New Delhi, India's capital city. From this airfield the Tibetan militants were flown to Colorado in groups of 40 or 50 men.

Upon finishing their training in the US they were returned to India by aircraft, and shortly thereafter north to Tibet where they jumped out of the planes and deployed their parachutes. Hundreds of other Tibetan insurgents were flown to the American-held islands of Okinawa and Guam where they received training in guerrilla warfare, and they were then sent back to Tibet to fight against the Chinese forces.

A joint CIA-Indian command centre was set up in New Delhi in the early 1960s, as relations between India and China continued to worsen during this period. The Dalai Lama's brother, Thondup, was forefront in directing US military aid through India's northern region of Darjeeling across the Indian-Chinese border into Tibet.

India-China Nomenclature War Intensifies In The Himalayas – OpEd

03 June 2024, Eurasia Review, Subir Bhaumik and Pratyusha Mukherjee

India has intensified with China "a silent war" focussed on challenging China's renaming of places in India's Arunachal Pradesh state to strengthen its territorial claim on it.

The Indian Army's information warfare division, backed by celebrated research institutes like the British-era Asiatic Society based in Kolkata, have swung into action to counter the Chinese nomenclature offensive.

Already tweets by the Army have challenged the Chinese renaming of the seven places in Arunachal and efforts are on to put out counter each of 30 odd places renamed by the Chinese.

After a new government takes charge in Delhi, India may rename nearly 30 places in Tibet Autonomous Region of China, military officials said.

The new names will be backed by extensive historical research, they said.

These writers are in possession of the entire list of Tibetan places that India will rename.

"As and when that happens, it will be tantamount to India reopening the Tibetan question. So long India has accepted Tibet as part of China since it was forcibly occupied by Beijing, but now the Modi government seems prepared to change course to deflate the Chinese cartographical and nomenclature aggression," says former Intelligence Bureau officer Benu Ghosh, who served on the LAC for long years and pursued his mountaineering interests simultaneously.

The Indian Army has in recent weeks organised lots of media trips to these disputed border areas and got them to speak to locals who fiercely oppose Chinese claims and say they were always part of India.

"The ultimate target is to push through the Indian counter-narrative on the disputed border through regional and global media, anchored on both solid historical research and local residents voxpops," says an officer involved in the campaign, but did not wish to be identified.

In what is seen as a bid to assert its claim on Arunachal Pradesh, China renamed 30 places along the line of actual control (LAC) in India's northeastern state. The Chinese ministry of civil affairs, responsible for the establishment and naming of administrative divisions, released the fourth list of "standardised" geographical names in Arunachal Pradesh recently, which Beijing calls Zangnan, according to a Hong Kong-based daily.

This is the fourth time China has unilaterally renamed places in Arunachal Pradesh, having done it previously in 2017, 2021 and 2023.

The list of places renamed by China includes 11 residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass and a piece of land. The names have Chinese characters, Tibetan and pinyin, the Roman alphabet version of Mandarin Chinese.

"In accordance with the relevant provisions of the State Council [China's cabinet] on the management of geographical names, we in conjunction with the relevant departments have standardised some of the geographical names in Zangnan of China," South China Morning Post quoted the ministry as saying.

Beijing released the first list of the so-called standardised names of six places in Arunachal Pradesh in 2017, the second list of 15 places in 2021 followed by another list with names for 11 places in 2023.

India has repeatedly rejected China's move to rename places in Arunachal Pradesh, asserting that the state is an integral part of the country and assigning "invented" names does not alter this reality.

In 2023, then external affairs ministry spokesperson Arindam Bagchi said: "We have seen such reports. This is not the first time China has made such an attempt. We reject this outright."

He added, "Arunachal Pradesh is, has been, and will always be an integral and inalienable part of India. Attempts to assign invented names will not alter this reality."

The recent statements by China to reassert its claims over the state started with Beijing lodging a diplomatic protest with India over Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to Arunachal Pradesh, where he dedicated to the nation the Sela Tunnel built at an altitude of 13,000 feet in Arunachal Pradesh.

External Affairs Minister S Jaishankar on March 23 dismissed China's repeated claims on Arunachal Pradesh as "ludicrous" and that the frontier state was a "natural part of India".

"This is not a new issue. I mean, China has laid claim, it has expanded its claim. The claims are ludicrous to begin with and remain ludicrous today," he said in response to a question on the Arunachal issue after delivering a lecture at the prestigious Institute of South Asian Studies (ISAS) of the National University of Singapore (NUS).

"So, I think we've been very clear, very consistent on this. And I think you know that is something which will be part of the boundary discussions which are taking place," he said.

Six decades later, scholar locates site of secret CIA-Tibet training camp

03 June 2024, University of Colorado Boulder, Clint Taibott

Carole McGranahan, a CU Boulder anthropology professor who has long studied the Tibetan perspective of China's invasion and occupation of Tibet, joins the Tibetan community to commemorate the location on June 9 at Camp Hale, Colorado.

For decades, the CIA's training of Tibetan soldiers to fight Chinese invaders was a state secret, but even after the U.S. government formally acknowledged the CIA-Tibet effort, the exact location of the Tibetan camp remained a mystery.

With the dogged research of anthropologist Carole McGranahan, the precise location is now known. McGranahan, a University of Colorado Boulder anthropology professor who's been studying the Tibetan perspective on the resistance to China for more than three decades, will soon join Tibetans from Colorado and beyond to commemorate the camp, six decades after it was closed.

The memorial gathering, which is titled "Dumra/The Secret Garden-Commemorating the CIA-Tibet Program at Camp Hale," will take place at noon on June 9 at Camp Hale National Monument.

Members of the Tibetan community from around the world and several members of parliament of the Dalai Lama's exile government in India are scheduled to attend, as is one of his cabinet ministers.

McGranahan said finding the training camp's actual location now is meaningful for two reasons. "One is that most of the veterans and retired (CIA) agents have passed," and the other is that the history of the operation had been suppressed and concealed for decades—a condition McGranahan calls "arrested history."

Tibetans, for instance, have been unable to "celebrate and honor these soldiers in a way that they deserved," she said. "This service, not just to Tibet but to the Dalai Lama, was the defining moment of their lives."

For the Tibetan community to know the actual location, she added, "is meaningful in a way that even as a scholar I hadn't fully appreciated."

Fraught history

McGranahan's work adds detail to the history of Tibet and China, which has long been fraught.

In 1949, Mao Zedong won the civil war in China, defeating Chiang Kai-shek. Mao, the first leader of the People's Republic of China, promised to "liberate" Tibet, which was then an independent country headed by the Dalai Lama, the country's political and spiritual leader.

Within a year, the Chinese army invaded Tibet and marched on the capital, Lhasa. For the next decade, the Dalai Lama and Tibet's government sought to negotiate—under military duress—with China. Meanwhile, Tibetan citizens facing Chinese invaders from the east began fighting back.

Initially, they fought with whatever they had from wherever they were. Later, the Tibetans formed a citizens' army called Chushi Gangdrug, whose mission was to defend the Dalai Lama, Tibet and Buddhism.

The Tibetans' resistance caught the attention of the United States. "This is during the Cold War, so this was roughly 1956, and the Tibetans were on their own, fighting communists," McGranahan noted.

The U.S. Department of State got involved, as did, secretly, the CIA, which launched a program to train Tibetan soldiers. That program landed in Colorado in 1958 at Camp Hale, near Vail, Colorado, the widely known training ground of the 10th Mountain Division fighters who served in World War II.

About 300 Tibetan soldiers were trained at Camp Hale from 1959-64. The CIA kept a tight lid on information about the program, and closely guarded entrance to and from the site. The camp closed in 1964, but the CIA continued to support the Tibetan resistance until 1973.

McGranahan began researching the Tibetan resistance in 1993, when she was working on her PhD in history and anthropology at the University of Michigan.

"One of the things I wanted to do was to understand and tell the story of the Tibetan resistance to China from the Tibetan perspective, because in the English language, it had been told almost exclusively as a story about the CIA," McGranahan noted recently. That approach clearly left out the Tibetan perspective, which, "frankly, to me, was more interesting and needed to be told," she said.

In her doctoral research, McGranahan interviewed more than 100 Tibetan veterans, including many who had trained at Camp Hale. She noted that the 300 Tibetans who were trained in Colorado were a small portion of the thousands of fighters in the Tibetan Chushi Gangdrug army.

Though she focused on the Tibetan perspective, she also interviewed about 10 retired CIA officers who had been stationed at Camp Hale. At the time, the CIA operation was still top secret. "Protocol didn't acknowledge the operation," she said. "There was nothing public about it."

That changed on Sept. 10, 2010, when the U.S. government installed a plaque at Camp Hale formally acknowledging that the CIA had trained Tibetan officers there.

One day prior, on Sept. 9, 2010, Duke University Press released McGranahan's book, Arrested Histories: Tibet, the CIA, and Memories of a Forgotten War.

The public announcement stemmed from the efforts of Ken Knaus, a retired CIA agent, who enlisted the help of former U.S. Sen. Mark Udall, D-Colo. Together with Roger McCarthy, Knaus had been in charge of the CIA-Tibet operation, and it had been the lifelong mission of both men to tell the story of the operation and to install a plaque at Camp Hale.

Searching for the garden

McGranahan, who describes herself as the group's "resident scholar," joined the dedication ceremony in 2010. After the ceremony, the Tibetan veterans and the CIA officers wanted to find the site of the CIA camp, which CIA officers called "The Ranch" and Tibetans called "Dumra," meaning garden.

But the group's desire to see the Dumra location was thwarted by the fact that the CIA had demolished and obscured any trace of the facilities. "The site was made to look as if nothing had been there," McGranahan observed.

"And to the dismay of the veterans on both sides, they could not find the camp," she added. "The very camp they had lived in, they couldn't find. This was very distressing to everyone."

It's also understandable. Camp Hale encompasses 53,804 acres, and landmarks that were clearly seen six decades ago could easily be obscured.

Last fall, McGranahan contacted a CU alumnus, Tracy Walters, who lives in the Vail Valley and who does a lot of hiking, camping and bike-riding through Camp Hale. She told him the story of the lost CIA training site, and he offered to help.

Using photos of the CIA site from the early 1960s and comparing them with satellite images, Walters determined where he thought the location was.

She and Walters visited the site in February, strapped on snowshoes to navigate the four feet of snow there, "and we snowshoed out, trying to match up the photographs of the camp with the current landscape, basically 60 years later," she said.

McGranahan emailed the photographs of the site, new and old, to the one still-living CIA officer, Bruce Walker, who had been stationed at the camp. "He wrote back immediately, 'Yes, that is the site, and I am the one who took those photographs you're holding up in the picture.'"

It turns out that U.S. Highway 24, which is near the CIA training site, was not heavily used in the early 60s, and the site couldn't be seen from the highway. Also, the CIA agents and Tibetan soldiers entered from Colorado Highway 91, near the Climax molybdenum mine at Fremont Pass.

Having found the location, McGranahan contacted members of Chushi Gangdrug or their descendants, who said, "We need to do a ceremony there." Former agent Walker, now 91, also plans to attend June 9.

McGranahan underscores the significance of identifying the precise location of this chapter of history:

"You can feel the resonance, the poignancy of it, of what it means to be on the place where there was a hope, there was a camaraderie, there was a commitment. Certain aspects of that did come to fruition, certainly the camaraderie, and there's a hope that remains."

China still controls Tibet, but the two groups—CIA agents and Tibetan fighters—remain committed to each other.

The June 9 ceremony is organized by the CU Department of Anthropology and Tibet Himalaya Initiative together with the Colorado Chushi Gangdrug and Vail Symposium. Co-sponsors for the event are the CU Boulder College of Arts and Sciences, the Departments of Communication, Ethnic Studies, Geography, History, Linguistics, Religious Studies and Sociology, the Center for the American West, the Center for Asian Studies, the Institute for Behavioral Science and the Museum of Natural History. It is also co-sponsored by Nova Guides, Polar Star Properties and 10th Mountain Whiskey

Additionally, on June 7 at the Vail Symposium, McGranahan, India-based filmmakers Tenzing Sonam and Ritu Sarin, and retired CIA officer Bruce Walker will present a research talk "Dumra at Camp Hale: The CIA's Tibetan Resistance Program" about the secret CIA training camp for Tibetan resistance soldiers at Camp Hale that operated from 1958-1964.

This presentation is the basis for a book they are co-authoring about Camp Hale's Tibetan history. Their presentation will be live-streamed.

With China willing to discuss 'Dalai Lama's future', Tibetan fate hangs in balance

02 June 2024, FirstPost, Claude Arpi

Beijing has not called Dalai Lama a 'separatist' leader; instead, it has shown interest in discussing his 'personal future'

On May 24, Prime Minister Narendra Modi addressed a public meeting in Mandi to support Bollywood actress and BJP candidate Kangana Ranaut. In the course of his speech, he mentioned Tibet, something he rarely does. According to a press release from the PMO, Modi asserted: "The Congress government was so timid that it was afraid to even mention the name of Dalai Lama Ji. I frequently engage in discussions with Dalai Lama Ji. He is a stalwart of our rich heritage. India is the land of Buddha, and the Modi government has been actively promoting this heritage."

The 'frequent discussions' are not in the public domain; we only know that from time to time, a phone call is made from Delhi to Dharamsala on the Dalai Lama's birthday.

This statement, however, raises the issue of Tibet, which seems to have been dormant for years.

The political head of Tibet's government-in-exile, Penpa Tsering, recently visited the United States and Canada. Everywhere, the Sikyong conveyed the urgent situation in Tibet "highlighting China's efforts to eradicate Tibet's distinct culture and identity and assimilate the Tibetan people".

During an encounter with the Tibetan Diaspora, Penpa Tsering noted that the priorities and policies of his government were to enhance the stability and efficiency of departments within the Central Tibetan Administration and implement the Dalai Lama's Middle Way policy.

He admitted that he was in contact with Beijing; according to Firstpost, the Sikyong stated: "We have had back-channel engagement since last year. But we have no immediate expectations from it. It has to be a long-term one." Penpa Tsering, however, insisted that the talks were "very informal".

PTI quoted him, saying, "I have my interlocutor who deals with people in Beijing. Then there are other elements also trying to reach out to us."

Beijing was quick to retort: "[We] will talk only with the representatives of the Dalai Lama and not the officials of the Tibetan government-in-exile."

The positive side was that Beijing did not call the Dalai Lama a separatist and instead said it was ready to discuss his "personal future".

This has been Beijing's position for the past four decades: the discussions can only be about the Dalai Lama's future.

The Future

This, however, raises the issue of the future of Tibet and the Tibetan people.

In the early 1980s, the Dalai Lama envisaged a Middle Path approach, probably based on the "One Country, Two Systems" slogan coined by Deng Xiaoping at the end of the 1970s.

The Tibetan leader elaborated his vision for the future in two documents, a Five-Point Peace Plan in 1987 in Washington, DC, and his Strasbourg Proposal in 1988.

The first of the five points was "transformation of the whole of Tibet into a zone of peace", a concept certainly appealing for India; another point was "respect for the Tibetan people's fundamental human rights and democratic freedoms".

The 'Zone of Peace' would soon be dropped, and the riots in Lhasa in 1989 and the subsequent imposition of martial law demonstrated the limits of the second. In his Strasbourg Proposal, the Dalai Lama spoke of "the whole of Tibet known as Cholkasum (U-Tsang, Kham and Amdo) should become a self-governing democratic political entity founded on law by agreement of the people for the common good and the protection of themselves and their environment, in association with the People's Republic of China".

This was before the events of Tiananmen Square; before June 1989, there were probably chances that China could join the concert of democratic nations and be a normal state.

Ten rounds of negotiations took place between the Dalai Lama's representatives (the CTA's representatives have always been banned in Beijing) between 2002 and 2010. This led nowhere.

China, a Great Power

Things have changed since then; China has become the second most important economic player in the world, while the situation within the Middle Kingdom has grimly deteriorated since 2012, at least in terms of individual liberty.

Today, after the recent events in Hong Kong and the military threats against the 'renegade island' (Taiwan), 'One Country, Two Systems' cannot be envisioned anymore. This makes the situation in Tibet

(and in Xinjiang, the other Chinese colony) more precarious than ever.

Taiwan

In February, a Chinese writer living in exile, Yuan Hongbing, revealed that China planned to use the Kuomintang's (KMT's) influence in Taiwan's legislature to boost its United Front strategy. Yuan said that the information came from a "princeling" (son of a Chinese revolutionary leader) whom Xi Jinping does not dare to challenge. According to Chinascope, a US website carrying information on the Mainland, "the CCP is not just using military intimidation to destabilise Taiwan; it is also using propaganda, the deployment of agents, and the expansion of the KMT's legislative power to override the Taiwanese administration."

Last week, Chinese military spokesperson senior Colonel Wu Qian told a press conference that China's reunification is an irreversible trend in history and that the People's Liberation Army (PLA) is ready to take resolute actions to counter any "Taiwan independence".

Soon after Lai Ching-te took charge as Taiwan's president on May 20, the Chinese military warned Taiwan that "independence" would mean "war" and Beijing would thwart any foreign interference in support of "separatist activities" in the democratic-ruled island.

The recent military drills that followed were more to 'scare the chicken' than a rehearsal, as an 'influence' takeover will certainly be less costly and risky for Beijing. Yuan added that "the CCP's Taiwan policy has shifted from coercion and enticement to psychological warfare, aiming to demoralise Taiwanese."

Deterioration in Hong Kong

Around the same time, the BBC reported that a court in Hong Kong "found 14 pro-democracy activists guilty of subversion in the largest use yet of a China-imposed National Security Law. They included former lawmakers Leung Kwok-hung and Helena Wong, journalist-turned-campaigner Gwyneth Ho, and ordinary Hong Kongers who joined the mass protests of 2019, such as nurse Winnie Yu".

Hong Kong Chief Executive John Lee took Beijing's side and declared that his government will do its "utmost to prevent, suppress, and impose punishment" for any activities "endangering national security".

Situation in Tibet

In Tibet, the situation is also rapidly deteriorating. A report by Human Rights Watch (HRW) noted, "Since 2016, the Chinese government has dramatically accelerated the relocation of rural villagers and herders in Tibet. The government says that these relocations—often to areas hundreds of kilometres away—are voluntary." The Chinese rationale was to “improve people’s livelihoods and protect the ecological environment”.

Using over 1,000 official Chinese media articles between 2016 and 2023, as well as government publications and academic field studies, HRW said that China’s own media reports showed that participation in “whole-village relocation” programmes in Tibet is in fact compulsory. “In one case, 200 households out of 262 in the village did not initially want to relocate to a new location, which was nearly 1,000 kilometres away. In another village scheduled for relocation, all the residents except for a Chinese Communist Party activist initially disagreed with the plan to move the village,” said the report. HRW could not find a single case where a village scheduled for relocation was able to avoid being moved.

What is left of the ‘genuine autonomy’ the Dalai Lama was dreaming of in the 1980s? Probably not much today.

Another Report

The Washington-based International Campaign for Tibet reported in May that the Buddhist Association of China (BAC), a non-political organisation, “is becoming a key instrument in the Chinese Communist Party’s strategy to assimilate and transform Tibetan Buddhism, particularly in relation to the search for and recognition of reincarnate lamas”.

When it speaks of the ‘sinification of Buddhism’, Beijing is obviously thinking of the succession of the Dalai Lama.

Since President Xi Jinping’s announcement of his intent to sinify all the religions in China, the BAC has been “mandated as the tool to implement campaigns that will contribute to its fruition, particularly in connection with Tibetan Buddhism”.

Founded in 1953, the BAC’s charter was amended in 2020 to include “Sinification of Buddhism in China”, one of its objectives in order to “support the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the socialist system, study and implement Xi Jinping’s Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era, and adhere to the direction of the Sinification of Buddhism in China”. During the recent Two Sessions held in Beijing in March 2024, Wang Huning, the Party’s chief ideologue, mentioned that the BAC “carried out 10 research and inspections in Tibet, Xinjiang, and Tibet-related counties in Sichuan Province on promoting the sinification of Tibetan Buddhism”.

In the present circumstances, hopes for a better tomorrow are presently limited.

One can only hope that when the Indian prime minister calls the Dalai Lama on July 6 to wish him on his 89th birthday, the Tibetan leader will be able to convince PM Modi that the fates of Tibet and India are intimately linked, in particular as far as the boundary between them is concerned.

May

Modi Mentions Dalai Lama: Anticipation Builds for Possible Meeting

31 May 2024, FNVA, Tenzing Dhamdul

On 1st June 2024, a total of eight states, including the Indian state of Himachal Pradesh, will go to the polls as part of the final phase (phase 7) in India’s General Elections. Amidst this, on 24th May, the incumbent Prime Minister of India, Narendra Modi, joined the Bharatiya Janata Party’s (BJP) campaign in Himachal Pradesh, taking part in a mega rally at Mandi.

In this rally, Narendra Modi stated, “I frequently talk with the Dalai Lama; the Dalai Lama is the being who guides our entire universe,” which, according to some, is an indication that Narendra Modi, may have some positive plans to Tibet with a meeting with His Holiness Dalai Lama seemingly in line. With several exit polls indicating that the BJP and its NDA alliance will once again form the government, some even go as far as mentioning that the incumbent Prime Minister would invite the Dalai Lama for his oath to office ceremony. Tibetans in the past have been invited, with the then Sikyong (President) and Kalon (Minister) of the Tibetan Government in Exile Lobsang Sangay la and Gyari Dolma la both attending the oath to office ceremony of 2014.

Narendra Modi has already met the Dalai Lama when he was the Chief Minister of Gujarat; however, he has yet to meet him since assuming the role of Prime Minister.

Since the BJP’s formation as a separate political party in the 1980s, it has had two Prime Ministers: Atal Bihari Vajpayee and Narendra Modi. The former frequently met with the Dalai Lama even during his tenure as Prime Minister of India. The Dalai Lama stated, “His eloquent support of the Tibetan people began in the late 1950s. Since then, he regularly took Indian governments to task in parliament, prompting them to take a stronger stand on Tibet,” highlighting the firm support that Atal Bihari Vajpayee had towards Tibet and the Tibetan people.

There are various movements and instances indicating that a possible meeting between Narendra Modi and the Dalai Lama is on the cards:

1. Narendra Modi and the Dalai Lama attended the same event last year; the Global Buddhist Summit organised by the International Buddhist Confederation (IBC), with the former being the Chief Guest on the 1st Day and the latter being the Chief Guest on the 2nd Day. They were so close yet did not meet, most likely due to pressure from Beijing in my opinion. However, with India advancing and taking great strides forward, including positioning itself towards achieving Viksit Bharat by 2047, there will come a time when Beijing will not be able to pressure New Delhi anymore.

2. Furthermore, Narendra Modi has frequently been publicly wishing the Dalai Lama on his birthday through his social media handles in the last few years.
3. In December 2021, the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), with its Sarsanghchalak Mohan Bhagwat and National Executive Indresh Kumar (founder of Bharat Tibbat Sahyog Manch), met the Dalai Lama at his residence in Dharamshala. Considering the strong and firm linkages between RSS and BJP, there is a high possibility of the BJP leadership including Narendra Modi also meeting the Dalai Lama.

The Indian National Congress (INC) the other national political party of India that has formed the government several time, has had its leaders including its Prime Ministers, meeting with the Dalai Lama. One can refer to FNVA's recent policy brief '2024 Election: Tibet in INC's Election Manifesto' for more detail on this.

With the Indian state of Himachal Pradesh going to the polls several notable Indian political leaders have arrived to Dharamshala and met the Dalai Lama recently. Many of them also had events with the Tibetan publics, where both the BJP and INC (from the NDA and India Alliance respectively) engaged with the Tibetans in Dharmshala in the lead up to the election.

Growing Repression in Tibet: A CECC Report Confirms

29 May 2024, FNVA, Tenzin Tsultrim

The US Congressional-Executive Commission on China's (CECC) 2023 Annual Report highlights escalating repressions in Tibet, emphasising religious persecution, mass biometric surveillance, transnational repression and linguistic suppression. The report reveals intensified restrictions on Tibetan Buddhism, with severe measures to enforce the Sinicization of religious practices. Additionally, the collection of DNA samples from Tibetans, including monks, has augmented the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) surveillance capabilities. It also underscores the forced assimilation of Tibetan children into Han Chinese culture through state-run colonial style boarding schools. Furthermore, the CCP's transnational repression efforts aim to silence Tibetan activism abroad, posing a threat to democratic values globally. Read more here.

From Tibet to Xizang: China's strategic moves

26 May 2024, Deccan Herald, Gyanendra Keshri

Changes in education and infrastructure in Tibet are indicative of the Chinese government's strategies to solidify its position in the region

At No 8 Middle School in Lhasa, a 13-year-old girl, along with other students, is learning about the use of artificial intelligence (AI) in the manufacturing of electronic devices. She speaks broken English, along with Tibetan and Mandarin.

"Our main focus is on skilling. Nearly half the time, students practice using different tools," says Caiyang Zhuoma, principal of the school. While more than a dozen distinct local dialects are spoken in the high plateau region, the focus at the boarding schools is on teaching Mandarin and English.

The transformation of education and infrastructure development is among the key strategies of the President Xi Jinping-led Chinese government to solidify its position in the Tibetan issue.

The name 'Tibet' has been dropped in official references. In all official communications, the region is now referred to in the Mandarin name, 'Xizang'.

It started with the release of a white paper in November 2023. The paper, titled 'CPC (Communist Party of China) Policies on the Governance of Xizang in the New Era: Approach and Achievements', outlines development in the region since President Jinping came to power in 2012. Now in all official communications, the region is referred to as 'Xizang Autonomous Region'.

While the Lobsang Sangay-led Tibetan government-in-exile has termed the move as "Sinicisation of Tibetan Buddhism", as per Chinese authorities, the name change is intended to strengthen national identity in the ethnic minority region.

Ren Wei, the Executive Vice Chairman of the People's Government of Xizang Autonomous Region, says the government fully guarantees the freedom of religious belief.

Wei points out that China is a multiethnic country, having 56 ethnic groups. Han is the largest ethnic group, accounting for around 92 per cent of the country's population. The remaining 55 ethnic groups, including Tibetan Buddhists and Muslims, are categorised as ethnic minorities.

As per China's national census data from 2020, Tibetans account for 86 per cent of the Xizang region's total population of 3.65 million. However, between 2010 and 2020, the share of Tibetans in the population declined from 90.5 per cent to 86 per cent.

Reports suggest that there are concerted efforts from the Chinese government to encourage its majority Han population to work and live in the Tibet region. Consequently, there has been a sharp jump in the Han Chinese population in the region. As per official data, the share of Hans in the total population of the Xizang Autonomous Region jumped to 12.2 per cent in 2020 from 8.2 per cent in 2010.

The region hosts around 1,700 sites for Tibetan Buddhism activities, with nearly 46,000 Buddhist monks and nuns, as per data provided in the white paper.

Han Chinese are more urban, educated and mobile. Luxury cars and high-rise apartments in the capital city of Lhasa and Shigatse, the second-largest city in the region, demonstrate the changing demographics. High-rise apartments have come up on the outskirts of Lhasa city, especially along the Kyichu river, which is also known as the Lhasa river. "My dream is to have a house in any of these apartments," said a Tibetan, pointing to the high-rise apartments developed along the Kyichu river.

Those who opt to work in the Xizang Autonomous Region are paid substantially higher salaries when compared with other parts of China. In most cases, it is almost double. This acts as a major incentive for the Han Chinese population to relocate to the region, where oxygen level is only about 60 per cent of that at sea level.

A Chinese government employee, who did not want to be named, said the government pays higher salaries to those working in the Xizang Autonomous Region because the living conditions are tough. Low oxygen levels pose serious health concerns. The Tibetan plateau has an elevation of over 4,500 meters (14,800 ft) above sea level.

Belt and Road Initiative

Tibet acts as China's bridge to South Asia under the Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), President Xi Jinping's most ambitious foreign policy programme. Under this initiative, China has financed or proposes to finance billions of dollars of investment in roads, railways and other infrastructure in several countries in Asia, Africa and Europe. This includes India's neighbours Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Nepal and Bangladesh.

Tibet borders India, Nepal, Bhutan and Myanmar in the Himalayas. The world's highest peak Mount Everest, which rises to 8,850 metres (29,035 feet) is on the Nepal-Tibet border. This makes Tibet immensely important from China's strategic point of view.

Due to its harsh and rugged terrain, Tibet is sparsely populated. In terms of area, Tibet is around two-thirds the size of India, while its population is just around a quarter of Bengaluru's population. A majority of the population lives in cities like Lhasa and Shigatse. Historically, there have been very few people in Tibet living close to its border with India, Nepal and Bhutan. However, in recent years, China has built hundreds of villages in Tibet, close to the India and Bhutan borders.

Officially, such villages have been developed to provide better living conditions and alleviate poverty, but the location and population mix indicate that the main focus is strategic and military in nature. Reports suggest that some villages have been built on the disputed boundary with Bhutan. The population in such villages is a mix of Chinese troops and locals.

Border infrastructure

China has invested heavily in the development of roads, railways and other infrastructure along Tibet's border near Nepal, Bhutan and India. Gyirong Port on the Nepal-Tibet border is one of the key land routes to connect the northern and southern regions of the Himalayas. The Nepali side of the border is called Rasuwagadhi, which is around 160 km from the capital city, Kathmandu. From the Tibetan capital of Lhasa, the border is around 820 km. While on the Nepali side, the condition of the road is bad, to say the least, the Tibetan side has four to six-lane highways. There is a stark difference.

China plans to develop railways between Kathmandu and Shigatse, which is the seat of the Panchen Lama. Shigatse is already connected through high-speed trains with Lhasa. China's move is seen as a counter to India's projects to connect with Kathmandu through a cross-border railway via Raxaul in Bihar.

Nyingchi, which is on the Tibetan border close to Arunachal Pradesh, was recently connected to Lhasa by high-speed bullet train. Nyingchi airport, located along the Brahmaputra river is very close to the Indian border.

China has significantly ramped up its airport infrastructure in the Tibet region. It has an international airport named Lhasa Gonggar Airport, which is located around 60 km from Lhasa city. China aims to develop 30 airports in the Tibet region.

Village relocation

A large number of Tibetans living in rural areas have been moved to new settlements. The village resettlement process has been accelerated since 2016.

As per a white paper released by the Chinese government, since 2021, Xizang has built a total of 300 "beautiful and livable" villages and created and certified 505 "demonstration villages".

As per Chinese authorities, the relocation is voluntary and the main objective is poverty alleviation and raising the standard of living. However, a report by New York-based Human Rights Watch shows that Chinese authorities have been using coercive tactics to mass relocate Tibetan villagers and herders in order to assimilate them into the majority Han Chinese society.

The report notes that most rural Tibetans have been impacted by Chinese government relocation or rehousing policies in the past two decades.

While such mass relocations of residents have been occurring elsewhere in poor rural areas in China, these drives risk causing a devastating impact on Tibetan communities.

Together with current Chinese government programmes to assimilate Tibetan schooling, culture and religion into those of the “Chinese nation,” these relocations of rural communities erode or cause major damage to Tibetan culture and ways of life, the report said.

Gen Sundarji gave a China strategy 4 decades ago. India failed to execute it at LAC in 2020

23 May 2024, The Print, Lt Gen H S Panag (Retd)

It has been 25 years since General Krishnaswamy “Sundarji” Sundararajan faded away to Valhalla. He had a chequered and tumultuous tenure as the 13th Chief of the Army Staff and left behind a fiercely disputed and controversial legacy. He conceptualised, planned, and began the transformation of the Army to fight the wars envisaged for the next 15-20 years. Simultaneously, on all fronts, he was engaged in war-like confrontations with China in the north, Pakistan in the west and our own little Vietnam in Sri Lanka in the south.

Even his worst critics agree that no other General of the Indian Army possessed his intellectual depth, strategic perspective, and the will to transform. In his two years and four months’ tenure, he dragged the Army by its bootstraps into the 21st century.

Soon after taking over, General Sundarji wrote a vision paper with a 15-year perspective—Indian Army Perspective Plan 2000—virtually spelling out the contours of national security strategy, defence policy, and military strategy. He personally signed the document—the first, and so far, the last time by any service Chief. The paper unambiguously laid down the military strategy to cater to the threat from both Pakistan and China and the framework of the Army’s transformation required to execute it.

Perspective Plan 2000

The strategy against Pakistan was to create and maintain an “offensive deterrence” to destroy its military potential and seize large swathes of territory to impose political will. Against China, the strategy was to maintain a “dissuasive deterrence” due to the qualitative, quantitative, terrain and communications disadvantages. “Dissuasive deterrence” meant that the Army will move from a depth defensive posture, followed since 1963, to a forward defensive posture on dominant terrain close to the LAC to safeguard our territory and give the Chinese a bloody nose. Tactical offensive was built into this strategy.

The government, without formal approval, supported Perspective Plan 2000 as far as Pakistan was concerned, but remained apprehensive about disturbing the status quo on the northern borders. Both by design and due to strategic circumstances, General Sundarji got a chance to test his military strategy simultaneously on both the fronts.

A major mechanised forces predominant exercise—Brasstacks (November 1986-March 1987)—to test the “offensive deterrence” against Pakistan was converted into a quasi war-like situation in the form of Operation Trident due to an apprehensive Pakistan’s counter moves and allegedly due to perception management by the Chief of Army Staff (COAS). In Operation Trident, objectives ranged from capturing Skardu, destroying mechanised forces, and capturing a large swathe of territory in the desert/semi-desert terrain of South Punjab bounded by rivers Indus and Sutlej apart from limited territorial gains all along the front.

On the northern front, near simultaneously with Brasstacks/Operation Trident, a minor intrusion by China in Sumdorong Chu river valley in June 1986 gave General Sundarji the opportunity to post haste adopt the forward posture and force a stalemate on China in the ensuing confrontation that lasted until mid-1987.

Execution of “dissuasive deterrence” strategy

Since 1962, our main defences were well in the depth on dominant terrain with a very large un-held buffer zone patrolled by the ITBP and Assam Rifles with effect from 1980. Little or no effort had been made to develop the roads in the buffer zone due to the fear of annoying the Chinese. The deployment of the PLA followed a similar pattern across the LAC, but with good communications for rapid deployment. The plan until 1986 was to delay the enemy in the extended forward zone and fight the main battle from well-prepared defensive positions up to which roads had been constructed. In 1983, the Cabinet Committee on Security had taken a decision to defend Tawang, but the same could not be fully executed due to tardy development of roads.

India had established an observation post in the Sumdorong Chu valley manned by the Special Service Bureau, in 1984. The post was vacated in the winter. The PLA claimed that it was on their side of the McMahon Line/LAC and preempted its occupation in June 1986. Despite India’s protests, the Chinese continued to deploy more troops and built permanent defences.

On the face of it, it seemed to be a localised incident with the Chinese seeking to reimpose their version of the ML/LAC. In reality, there was a bigger motive. India and China had been engaged in border negotiations since 1981. In the first four rounds of talks, from 1981 to 1983, the discussions focussed on evolving a framework for concrete negotiations wherein China wanted to swap its gains in Aksai Chin and Eastern Ladakh for giving up claims in the Northeast by accepting the McMahon Line as was its stand since 1959. India wanted a sector by sector approach to which China agreed in the fifth round in 1984.

However, in the sixth round in 1985, China took a U-turn and sought substantial concessions in the Northeast, which subsequently included the whole of then-North East Frontier Agency (NEFA) and now Arunachal Pradesh. With our defences in depth, it would have been a cakewalk for China to seize the entire Tawang Sector without a fight.

Keeping these factors in mind, General Sundarji seized the opportunity to implement the “dissuasive deterrence” strategy to occupy a forward posture in the whole of Tawang Sector. In September-October 1986, he ordered mobilisation and lifted a brigade by helicopters to Zimithang and quickly occupied the dominating Hathung La and Langrola Ridges, making the Chinese intrusion untenable if hostilities began. Precautionary deployment was carried out all along the front including Eastern Ladakh.

China was taken by surprise by India’s operational strategy and it mobilised 53 and 13 Army Groups (equivalent of a Corps each). Deng Xiaoping twice issued a warning to “teach India a lesson” in October 1986 and March 1987. The Indian government was alarmed by the bold operational strategy, which could have led to war. However, General Sundarji stood firm, reminding the government of its own 1983 CCS decision and the consequence of not adopting a forward posture to safeguard our territory. As a result, the dissuasive deterrence strategy got whole-hearted political support. Arunachal Pradesh was created in December 1986.

The confrontation continued throughout the winter and until May 1987 when the visit of the Indian foreign minister paved the way for disengagement, but final de-escalation took place only in 1995. General Sundarji gave the final shape to the “dissuasive deterrence” strategy and forward posture in 1987 by conducting Exercise Chequerboard apart from the ongoing Operation Falcon, for which 10 divisions were mobilised.

On the eve of his retirement in April 1988, he moved a combat group of mechanised forces to both Eastern Ladakh and North Sikkim, and left a blueprint for additional induction as the resources became available to not only strengthen the dissuasive deterrence strategy but also take the battle to the Tibetan Plateau.

Did the ‘dissuasive deterrence’ fail in 2020?

A question often asked is, why did the dissuasive deterrence fail in 2020, resulting in the loss of 1,000 square km of territory and China re-securing the 1959 Claim Line for the first time since 1962? Unlike the Northeast, where the forward posture was on ridge lines dominating the ML/LAC, in Eastern Ladakh, vast frontage and disadvantageous terrain configuration of the LAC precluded deployment along the LAC and the forward posture per force had to be in relative depth on dominating terrain.

The key to the execution of the dissuasive deterrence was to keep the forward zone under fail safe surveillance and domination with mechanised forces predominant covering troops. Based on surveillance, contingency plans were required to preempt the PLA by securing areas on/across the LAC. The author had the privilege to induct and command the first combat group into Ladakh in July 1988 and conceptualise the employment of mechanised forces. All that happened in April-May 2020 was foreseen and planned for 32 years ago. For example, Sirijap, east of Finger 8, was a preemptive task for my Combat Group through an amphibious operation across the Pangong Tso lake. Also, there was a need to reorganise the forces in Ladakh into combined arms grouping in the form of Integrated Battle Groups with additional induction of mechanised forces.

What happened in 2020 was not a failure of the “dissuasive deterrence” strategy, rather it was the execution that failed. We started constructing roads in sensitive areas without precautionary forward deployment of combined arms units. Our surveillance and reconnaissance failed and allowed the PLA to achieve absolute surprise. Consequently, contingency plans could not be executed. The formations were not reorganised as combined arms groupings and the available mechanised forces were inadequate.

Even after the Galwan clash, when adequate forces were available, the riposte in form of a quid pro quo on/across the LAC was timid. Rather than secure the entire Kailash Range from Helmet to Changla Pass in the Indus Valley, it was restricted to a 30 km belt up to Rechin La.

The “dissuasive deterrence” strategy has withstood the test of time and remains our best bet to stalemate China albeit with necessary modifications.

Global Watch | Seventeen-Point Agreement: A Story That Traces Origin of China's Betrayal of Tibet

22 May 2024, News18, Arun Anand

The Tibetan issue still remains alive with the support of the international Tibetan community. Their struggle against Chinese imperialism shows that China's goal of forceful assimilation of Tibet has yet not materialised fully.

Around 73 years ago, on 23 May, the 'Seventeen-Point Agreement' was signed between the People's Republic of China (PRC) and the Tibetan government headed by His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Claimed by China as the "Measures for the Peaceful Liberation of Tibet", this agreement officially established Chinese legitimacy over Tibet. However, the 1951 Seventeen-Point Agreement and the developments in its aftermath soon attracted controversy, exposing the Chinese government's imperialist intent and the start of what is currently known as the decades-old Tibetan issue, reflected in Tibetans' prolonged fight of protecting their identity and territorial autonomy.

China's annexation of Tibet has continued to trigger protests from Tibetans since the 1959 uprising. (Image: Reuters)

The Tibetan issue is essentially a conflict over history, for the Chinese and Tibetans have had contention regarding Tibet's sovereignty prior to the 1951 agreement. While the Chinese believe that Tibet did not possess any sovereignty when the Qing dynasty fell in 1912, the Tibetans are of the opinion that Tibet has always been a sovereign nation, with occasional suzerainty over it exercised by the Mongolian, Nepalese, Chinese and the British at different periods of time.

Notwithstanding the contention, the fact remains that the Seventeen-Point Agreement is the only agreement that the Chinese government has signed with any non-Han ethnic group. Which brings to the question, why did China enter into an agreement in 1951, if Tibet was already a sovereign part of China?

Traditionally, Tibet comprised three provinces – central Tibet (called Chamdo), Kham (in the south) and Amdo (in the northeast). The first attack on Tibetan sovereignty by the CCP took place in 1950, what came to be known as the Battle of Chamdo.

However, fearing Tibetan resistance, the Chinese quickly opted for negotiations to subjugate the entire Tibet under the garb of peaceful agreement. This resulted in the CCP-drafted Seventeen-Point Agreement in 1951, with Ngabo Ngawang Jigme, former Chamdo's governor-general, representing the Tibetan delegation.

These were salient points of the agreement: The agreement recognised Tibet as part of China (Point 1), with China being responsible for Tibet's external affairs (Point 14). Moreover, with the Tibetan government's assistance, the Chinese military was to enter Tibet and consolidate its national defences (Point 2). At the same time, Tibet's right to exercise autonomy was also recognised (Point 3). The CCP also guaranteed that the existing political system, functions, and powers of the Dalai Lama and Panchen Lama would remain unaltered (Point 4), while the religious beliefs and customs of the Tibetan people would be respected and protected (Point 7). Internal reforms were to be implemented only after consultation with the Tibetan leaders (Point 11).

Thus, the Seventeen-Point Agreement states the liberation of Tibet from internal and external enemies, under the impression of a "one country, two systems". Negotiations and the final signing of the agreement took place in Beijing under the strict watch of the CCP, whereby the Tibetan delegation was not allowed to have any contact or discussion outside Beijing. The Chinese thus were able to push through their agendas by arm-twisting the Tibetan delegation. However, the façade of the Seventeen-Point agreement was short-lived and soon actions of the Chinese in Tibet brought forward a reality far from the one promised in the agreement.

CCP soon violated the terms of the agreement in an attempt to establish quick and complete control over the Tibetan region. The land reforms were introduced by the CCP in Tibet without consulting the Tibetan government, marginalising Tibetans in their own country. It included attacks on Tibetan culture and language, gave Chinese control over economic and natural resources and favoured Han Chinese immigration.

In 1956, the Preparatory Committee for the Tibet Autonomous Region (PCTAR) was established by the CCP to make way for political authority to be transferred from the Tibetan government to a Chinese-created and controlled administration, thus violating the Seventeen-Point Agreement. These measures paved the way for growing discontent among Tibetans, leading to the rise of Tibetan armed rebels.

It is recorded that between 1952-58, the Chinese Army crushed 966 such rebellions and killed about 10,000 Tibetans in Kanlho's northeastern region. By 1956, the rebellion against the Chinese began to gain full momentum in Kham and Amdo and further spread to U-Tsang and Lhasa. Despite the rebellion, the CCP went on to implement democratic reforms in eastern Tibet, gaining legal rights over Tibetan property. Another reform under the Commune System gave the Chinese direct access over Tibetan agricultural resources.

All these measures were a gross violation of the Seventeen-Point Agreement which ultimately led to the Tibetan Uprising of 1959 against Chinese occupation. To cull down the uprising, the Chinese undertook major military intervention, which forced the Dalai Lama to flee Tibet anticipating arrest by Chinese forces, and sought refuge in India. In India, the Dalai Lama repudiated the Seventeen-Point Agreement, claiming it to be signed by the Tibetan delegation under duress, without the knowledge of the Tibetan government.

Meanwhile, the Chinese annexation of Tibet was completed after the violent suppression of the 1959 Tibetan Uprising by the Chinese military. In China's White Paper on Tibet, it is claimed that it is in 1959, that "90 per cent of Tibetans were freed from serfdom." In 1965, the Tibetan Autonomous Region (TAR) was established by Beijing, replacing the former Tibetan administration, marking the death of the Seventeen-Point Agreement. Thus began China's assimilationist policy in Tibet, endangering Tibetan autonomy guaranteed (by China) in the Seventeen-Point Agreement (Points 3,4,7 and 11).

Championed by Mao Zedong, the Cultural Revolution (1966-76) unleashed further brutality of the Chinese government, proving to be a disaster for Tibetan culture. During this time, Tibet became Beijing's test ground to implement Mao's calling to crush the four olds (thoughts, customs, habits and culture). Tibetan religious texts, flags and even photographs of the Dalai Lama were burned and Tibetan schools were shut down, essentially targeting Tibetan identity and traditions. Jokhang Temple's (Tibetan Buddhist's most sacred site) teaching courtyard was converted as a venue for "Struggle Sessions", a practice during the Cultural Revolution whereby people accused of being political rivals were subjected to public humiliation, abuse and torture.

Most people subjected to struggle sessions in Jokhang Temple were Tibetan monks, businessmen, landowners and those associated with the former Tibetan government. It is believed that at least 92,000 Tibetans subjected to China's "struggle sessions" died or were driven to commit suicide, while 173,000 Tibetans died in various labour camp prisons. Moreover, the Tibetan monasteries were plundered and desecrated by the Red Guards. It is estimated that by the end of the Cultural Revolution in 1976, more than 6,000 monasteries in Tibet were destroyed. This remained as one of the early attempts by the Chinese government to eradicate Tibetan identity and culture, in its efforts to assimilate Tibetan identity into majoritarian Han culture.

China's annexation of Tibet has continued to trigger protests from Tibetans since the 1959 uprising. The Tibetans are relentlessly raising their voice for their independence that was unjustly snatched by the Chinese communist rule. This was reflected in the 1987 protests, the 2008 protest and the self-immolation protests witnessed from 2009-2012. At the same time, China continued with its draconian measures to suppress the Tibetan voice, reflected in its bilingual education policy aimed at erasing Tibetan identity, imposition of martial laws in 1989, strike hard campaign in 2009, or Sinicisation of Tibet policy in 2021.

However, the Tibetan issue still remains alive with the support of the international Tibetan community. Their struggle against Chinese imperialism shows that China's goal of forceful assimilation of Tibet has yet not materialised fully.

'Thread of Beads': China's Cartographic Aggression Against India

21 May 2024, Domino Theory, Tenzing Dhamdul

China is renaming locations in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, as part of its strategic encroachment into Indian territory through occupied Tibet.

The wind caught me differently and the people were all welcoming wherever I went. They spoke Hindi rather than Mandarin and proudly identified themselves as Indians. This was Tawang,<sup>1</sup> a majestic district in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, bordering not only Tibet (occupied now by China) but also Bhutan. My visit to this region and China's recent actions, particularly the renaming of 30 locations in the region on March 30, 2024,<sup>2</sup> reignited my focus on Arunachal Pradesh, prompting me to collaborate with my friends Tenzin Sherap and Tenzin Younten on an issue brief to delve deeper into the matter.

Our research, published under the title "Thread of Beads: An analysis of China's renaming of 62 locations in the India state of Arunachal Pradesh since 2017,"<sup>3</sup> sheds light on the broader narrative and objectives underlying China's actions. By contesting and encroaching upon sovereign Indian territory, China seeks to advance its “Chinese Dream,”<sup>4</sup> which it wants to fulfil by 2049, directly impinging upon “Viksit Bharat,”<sup>5</sup> India’s vision of becoming a developed nation by 2047. The timing of these actions, notably coinciding with India’s general and state elections, including elections in Arunachal Pradesh, raises suspicions regarding China’s motives, which have been highlighted by many China observers and researchers in India.<sup>6</sup>

The response from the Indian government,<sup>7</sup> the Indian media and other stakeholders has predominantly been dismissive and reactionary. While such responses are warranted, it is imperative to recognize the significance of these frequent and concerted actions, particularly in the context of China’s utilization of the “Three Warfares”<sup>8</sup> strategic framework, which was adopted around 2003. Despite India’s response, there is a palpable concern that China may be gaining ground in this form of engagement.

The Three Warfares are public opinion/media warfare, psychological warfare and legal warfare, also known as “lawfare.”

Our analysis has revealed China’s calculated efforts in weaving what we termed the “Thread of Beads” across the Northern Himalayan front of India. Analogous to the “String of Pearls”<sup>9</sup> strategic initiative in the Indo-Pacific region, China’s actions along its border with India are methodically conditioning the area for potential annexation. Of particular concern is the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, which our study has focused on. China claims Arunachal Pradesh as part of “South Tibet”<sup>10</sup> (Zangnan, 藏南), as seen in official Chinese maps. South Tibet spans over 90,000 km<sup>2</sup>, as per official Chinese documents, news outlets, social media platforms and other agencies,<sup>11</sup> all of which possess a wider reach than their Indian counterparts.

China’s territorial claims over regions in Arunachal Pradesh derive from its historical occupation of Tibet and Tibet’s erstwhile legitimate claims to certain regions of northern Arunachal Pradesh, including Tawang. However, Tibet’s claims were addressed through the 1914 Shimla Convention,<sup>12</sup> where the “McMahon Line”<sup>13</sup> was delineated and mutually agreed upon by then-independent Tibet and British India. Despite China’s participation in the convention, it refrained from signing the eventual agreement. Tibetans even now see Arunachal Pradesh as an inalienable part of India’s sovereign territory. In our issue brief we have proven this by the 2001 Tibet and Adjacent Areas under Communist China’s Occupation Map by Amnye Machen Institute: Tibetan Centre for Advanced Studies,<sup>14</sup> which clearly shows Arunachal Pradesh as part of India, aligning with Indian official records, the Tibetan government in exile and widely cited by scholars in the field of Tibetan Studies.

Among the 62 locations recently renamed by China in Arunachal Pradesh, two sites hold major significant historical ties to the Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of Tibet:

1. Ugyenling (Wujianling, 烏間嶺)<sup>15</sup>: Designated as the birthplace of the sixth Dalai Lama, Tsyang Gyatso, this location holds profound spiritual and cultural importance in Tibetan Buddhism. The inclusion of Ugyenling in China’s official mapping efforts raises questions regarding China’s intentions and motivations in asserting control over areas with historical ties to Tibetan religious figures. Ugyenling was renamed Wujianling on April 13, 2017.
2. Hathung-La (Hadong Shankou, 哈東山口): This strategic ridge near Khinzemane Village holds particular significance due to its association with the Dalai Lama’s escape from Tibet in 1959. The village served as a pivotal point in the Dalai Lama’s journey to seek asylum in India, marking a momentous event in Tibetan history. The anecdote of the Dalai Lama planting his walking stick,<sup>16</sup> which later grew into the Holy Tree at Khinzemane, further adds to the site’s cultural and spiritual significance. It is noteworthy that China did not assert claims over this territory as part of its proclaimed “South Tibet” during the Dalai Lama’s escape in 1959.<sup>17</sup> Hathung-La was renamed Hadong Shankou on March 30, 2024.

Since 2017, China, under the Ministry of Civil Affairs, has been assigning standardized names to a total of 62 locations, along with the release of official maps depicting these locations. Our research indicates that these 62 locations are strategically positioned and can be categorized according to their geography or the district in which they are located:

1. Geographically:
  - The 62 locations cover the geographic terrains of mountains, bodies of water, residential areas and land segments (地片).
  - Mountains and residential areas are associated with 25 locations each, totaling 50 out of the 62 locations. The targeting of mountains and residential areas is perhaps not surprising, given both would be crucial variables in an actual hot war.
2. District-wise:
  - There are 26 districts in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh. The 62 renamed locations are located in 17 of these districts.
  - The majority of the renamed locations are in six districts: Papum Pare (the district inside which the capital city Itanagar is located, with Itanagar also having the special status of being a separate district); Tawang; Dibang Valley (the largest district in size and sharing some of the longest borders with Tibet); Upper Siang (borders Tibet); Upper Subansiri (borders Tibet); West Kameng (formerly Tawang was part of this district); and East Siang. More than six renamed locations are located in each of these districts. Seven renamed locations are in West Kameng and East Siang each.

China's modus operandi in its territorial expansionist agenda often begins with a standardized naming and mapping exercise, as evidenced by its past actions in Tibet and Bhutan. Through the gradual establishment of legitimacy over sovereign territories among its populace, China proceeds to illegally annex these areas. A striking example is the case of the Kula Kangri Peak area,<sup>18</sup> where China's persistent pressure, starting with standardized mapping and naming, eventually led to Bhutan conceding to Chinese claims.<sup>19</sup> This process underscores the significance of understanding China's tactics in territorial disputes and their broader implications.

In Tibet, China, first under the Nationalist government, initiated its territorial assertions through the standardization of maps and names, laying the groundwork for subsequent illegal annexation. Through establishing a sense of legitimacy over Tibetan territories among its populace, China gradually expanded its control, with the Communist government ultimately invading Tibet in 1950.<sup>20</sup> The case of Tibet serves as a blueprint for China's approach to territorial expansion, highlighting the importance of standardized mapping exercises in advancing its geopolitical objectives.

The precedent set by China's actions in Tibet and Bhutan carries significant implications regarding the standardization of maps and names, which serves as a precursor to illegal annexation, highlighting the need for vigilant monitoring of China's territorial assertions. Moreover, the willingness of neighboring countries to concede to Chinese claims underscores the asymmetric power dynamics at play and the challenges faced by smaller nations in resisting Chinese influence.

However, India is certainly not Bhutan, or Tibet for that matter (the latter being officially part of China, with China only recognizing a portion of its territory based on the Shimla Convention, which it uses as per its convenience). India's heightened security measures and development of infrastructure in Arunachal Pradesh show it is taking China's cartographic aggression seriously. The recent inauguration of the Sela Pass tunnel<sup>21</sup> sparked strong condemnation from China. To give an idea of the scope of the strategic infrastructural development that has taken place on India's side of the border, on a previous visit, I found it hard to get a 4G signal. Now one can conduct entire video call sessions without issue. This, despite India's continued geographical challenges in the mountainous regions on its side of the border, which is less of an issue for China, as Tibet is largely a plateau.<sup>22</sup>

There is a clear push here from China, and with the exercises carried out in Tibet, we should remain cognisant of how effective China's Three Warfares framework and other policies have been, especially when it comes to renaming locations. Many identify Tibet and its major cities by "Standardized" Chinese names now, and China last year replaced the use of Tibet with Xizang on official documents.<sup>23</sup>

This may be the fate of locations in the Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh, if India does not adopt a multifaceted approach that encompasses diplomatic, strategic and narrative countermeasures to safeguard its territorial integrity, national interests and the livelihoods of its people in the regions China covets.

History, culture are foundations for understanding China's politics: renowned Spanish expert

20 May 2024, Global Times, Xie Wenting and Bai Yunyi

Xulio Rios Photo: Xie Wenting/Global Times

GT: In your opinion, what are the differences between Chinese modernization and Western modernization?

Rios: This is a complex comparison. In my view, the trajectory of modernization in China and the West has significant differences. The modernization of developed Western countries is largely built on the conquest and exploitation of other countries, while China's modernization is built on its own social and economic development.

There are also important differences in development models. China's economic model combines both market and planning elements. However, in many Western countries, we do not see this kind of integration. I believe that this both market-oriented and government-planned economic model has achieved positive results and remains effective.

One of the most important characteristics of the Chinese path to modernization is that it preserves true sovereignty. China makes decisions based on its own interests, and sets its own pace and model, rather than accepting externally imposed decisions. This is a completely different experience and produces different results.

GT: You have said in previous interviews that China has achieved its goals through its own development path and approach, and that many of China's experiences will undoubtedly be worth learning from. In which areas do you think China's experiences are worth learning from for other countries?

Rios: One of the most important lessons from the Chinese path to modernization for other countries is to think for themselves, make their own judgments on issues, and determine policies based on their overall interests rather than external evaluations or waiting for external guidance. I think this is a key point.

Besides, I believe it is necessary for many countries to deeply analyze China's policies in various aspects, which may be applicable to some countries and not to others. I have noticed that some developing countries have established economic zones like China, some of which have been successful and some not so successful, due to differences in education levels, labor force, and capabilities in the public and private sectors.

However, undoubtedly, China's model can serve as a reference for many countries, which can then adjust according to their own circumstances.

Just as China has said, it cannot copy the models of other countries, nor does it want to impose its own model on other countries. Copying is not a good solution, but Chinese experiences such as strengthening the capacity of the public sector and re-examining collectivist values can serve as reference points for other countries.

GT: In your opinion, what has been the biggest misunderstanding about China by the West in recent years?

Rios: I think the biggest misunderstanding about China by the West in recent years is about China's strategic intentions. Some Westerners believe that China wants to revive its past glory, weaken the West, and put the West in a difficult situation.

Therefore, there is a great deal of disagreement about China's rise, with some believing that they must protect themselves from the threat of a powerful China. But for another part of the Western population, China represents an opportunity. They want to engage in dialogue and understand China's policies.

We cannot expect China, with highly developed productivity and technology, to exist in Asia in isolation. As its strength grows, it is logical for China's position on the global stage to rise. However, it will take more time for (Western countries) to adapt to this process and adjust their responses accordingly. But one thing is very clear: We cannot push China aside to manage this world.

India needs to counter China's united front tactics

19 May 2024, Sunday Guardian, Khedroob Thondup

United front tactics involve the mobilization of various groups to serve a singular strategic interest.

In the complex geopolitical landscape of the 21st century, the art of statecraft has evolved beyond traditional diplomacy and military engagements. One of the most nuanced forms of this evolution is the concept of "united front" tactics—a strategy that China has been increasingly employing in its interactions with India.

At its core, united front tactics involve the mobilization of various groups to serve a singular strategic interest. For China, this translates into a multifaceted approach towards India, aiming to influence its political decisions, economic policies, and public opinion to align with Chinese interests. One of the most covert aspects of China's united front tactics is cyber warfare. Reports of cyberattacks on India's critical infrastructure, such as the power grid, have raised alarms about the silent invasion that could cripple a nation without a single soldier crossing its borders. These digital strikes are not just about immediate disruption; they are a psychological tool, instilling a sense of vulnerability within the Indian state.

China's strategy extends to influence operations that target the very fabric of Indian society. By cultivating relationships with influential individuals, think-tanks, and cultural organizations, China seeks to create a narrative conducive to its worldview. The Confucius Institutes, for example, have been at the centre of controversy, with allegations of them being a front for espionage and propaganda.

The battleground has shifted from physical territories to the cognitive realm. Disinformation campaigns and the manipulation of media narratives are part of China's arsenal to destabilize and confuse. The aim is to create a parallel reality where facts are malleable, and truth is what the Party deems it to be. China's united front work also includes soft power initiatives. Cultural exchange programs and outreach to the Indian diaspora are designed to foster a positive image of China, countering the negative press it often receives. These efforts are subtle yet powerful, as they shape perceptions over the long term.

The Doklam standoff and the clashes in the Galwan Valley are stark reminders of the military dimension of China's united front tactics. These confrontations serve a dual purpose: demonstrating China's military might and testing India's resolve. They are a physical manifestation of the psychological and political pressure exerted through other united front activities. India stands at a crossroads, facing a neighbour that wields united front tactics with strategic finesse. The challenge for India is to recognize these manoeuvres and counter them with a united front of its own—a coalition of democratic nations, robust cybersecurity measures, and a resilient civil society that can withstand the allure and assault of China's strategic chessboard.

As we navigate this era of new-age warfare, it is imperative for India and like-minded nations to develop a comprehensive understanding of united front tactics and devise counter-strategies that uphold their sovereignty and democratic values.

The importance of being Tibet's 14th Dalai Lama

19 May 2024, Deccan Chronicle, Mohan Guruswamy

The 14th Dalai Lama (spiritual name: Jetsun Jamphel Ngawang Lobsang Yeshe Tenzin Gyatso), who was born on July 6, 1935, has been resident in India since 1959, and is the highest spiritual leader and most revered head of Tibetan Buddhism. When I had visited Tibet, it was common to see ordinary Tibetans discreetly wearing his medallion. It was also very common to see his pictures in most Tibetan-owned shops in Tibet, Yunnan and Qinghai. The Dalai Lama's ecclesiastical influence extends into India's border areas such as Arunachal Pradesh, Sikkim and Ladakh. Despite a historical political identity entwined with China, Tibet has traditionally looked towards India for moral and spiritual sustenance. Tibet has had a long history of struggle with China and the present Dalai Lama is not the first one to seek refuge in India. The British had an active policy to create a buffer against China in the form of an independent Tibet. The Chinese Amban (plenipotentiary) in Lhasa watched the Younghusband expedition's exertions in Tibet passively and one immediate consequence of this was an assertion of Tibet's independence. After the establishment of the Republic of China with Sun Yat Sen as President on January 1, 1912, in April that year the 13th Dalai Lama declared the end of Tibet's relationship with China and expelled the Amban and all Chinese troops. Almost immediately after their civil war triumph in 1949, the Chinese Communists reasserted control over Tibet, which had by then enjoyed over four decades of independence. Since then, India has tried to head off the Tibet problem by accepting its annexation into the People's Republic of China. In the years since, the Chinese Communists tried to solve the Tibet problem by attempting to wipe out Tibetan nationalism and Buddhism with Mao's Communism. It didn't succeed. This policy has now been replaced by the creeping "Hanisation" and massive doses of economic development. These too have worked only partially for the Chinese, but they seemed to do better with this than with the Maoist iron hand.

Though Tibet is now relatively passive, it still remains a dry tinderbox and the Chinese dread the likelihood of any spark that may set off a fire. For India too, the policy has worked partially. Over 150,000 Tibetan refugees now live in India, and India has willy-nilly become the fulcrum of a worldwide struggle by the Tibetans to regain their nation. In short, the Tibet issue, though dormant now, is still very much alive and whether India likes it or not, it is being played out in its front yard. Central to this sustained struggle has been the international stature of the Dalai Lama, who has become the symbol of many ideals and images. The mix of new age spiritualism, ethics, ecological values and politics has won for the Dalai Lama many influential and wealthy Western adherents to Tibetan Buddhism and supporters of Tibet's cause. Today, the tiny enclave of McLeodganj, a suburb of Dharamsala in Himachal Pradesh, is a magnet that draws large numbers of young Westerners seeking a new meaning to and purpose in life. It draws top political personalities like Nancy Pelosi, former Speaker of the US House of Representatives, and top Hollywood actors like Richard Gere and Uma Thurman. Both China and India must worry about a post-Dalai Lama period. Tibetans believe the Dalai Lama to be a living God. But he is also human and must die like all humans. He is now 88 years old, and time is certainly not on his side. As long as he is alive, he keeps the embers of Tibetan nationalism from conflagrating with the blanket of the new age Buddhism that he has woven. When this Dalai Lama is gone, the embers might just combust. The chosen leadership of the exiles will not go unchallenged. The Chinese Communists will almost certainly try to foist their own incarnation and will try to legitimise it with all the power available to them. It is unlikely that they will succeed, but it will certainly obfuscate the situation and preclude any future compromise on the issue of the spiritual leadership of the Tibetan Buddhists. While the spiritual leadership may be contested, it is almost inevitable that a new generation of Tibetan exiles will stake a claim for the temporal leadership of the Tibetan nationalist movement. If this is contested by the regency around the India-based incarnation, then we will almost certainly see a competition for the hearts and minds of young Tibetans and this will inevitably lead to more assertive postures as the different factions jockey for power. Such internal struggles often result in greater militancy, with India has its base. On the other hand, we may see a duality of leadership emerging among the Tibetan exiles, a spiritual leadership that tends to the soul and a militant leadership that leads the struggle for attainment of political goals. It is due to the Dalai Lama's foresight and sagacity that the contours of such a dual leadership is now emerging, with the second tallest Buddhist ecclesiastical figure, Ugen Thinley, the Karmapa (now in Germany), and the Sikyong (president) of the government-in-exile, Tempa Tshering. Both now enjoy much stature among émigré Tibetan groups and within Tibet. From the Indian perspective, the rise of an alternate religious leader in the interim would well prevent the splintering of the Tibetan Buddhist movement. The young Karmapa might well provide this. Geographically and ethnically, much of Ladakh is an extension of the Tibetan Changthang, and the main language spoken is a Tibetan dialect. The Tawang tract in the other end was, till it was annexed by India in the early 1950s, under the temporal control of the Dalai Lama in Lhasa. We must not forget that the border dispute with China is in reality a border dispute with Tibet. It is another matter that if Tibet was truly independent, it would have been unable to assert its claims in the way that the Chinese did. The Chinese claims to "Tawang and surrounding areas" is largely based on a claim made by the present Dalai Lama in the late 1940s, when he wrote a letter to the government of newly independent India laying formal claim to it. Two decades from now, China will be an aging nation and hence it feels that it must make the best of the present opportunity. Its periodic aggressiveness with India has more to do with this, than any parcels of land. The transition of Tibetan leadership is a major consideration.

Onus on India to exert pressure on China over Tibet

18 May 2024, Tribune India, Gen. Ashok Mehta

Takeover: The most worrying aspect of recent developments in Tibet is the depth and scale of Sinicisation of the region. istock

AFTER needling China for its unilateral breach of protocols and attempts to alter the status quo in eastern Ladakh, India went on to call China a bully and expressed hope – for the first time since 1962 – that the US would come to its aid against the Dragon (going by Defence Secretary Giridhar Aramane's statement at the India-US Defence Summit in February). A few weeks ago, India reached out to the Philippines with a pledge to stand by it in its dispute with China in the South China Sea and sold it BrahMos missiles.

All this is quite something, but New Delhi has stopped short of talking about Tibet, even though Beijing has continued to rename in Mandarin several places in 'south Tibet' (parts of Arunachal Pradesh). The last time New Delhi upped the ante over Tibet was in 2010, when it stopped talking about the One China policy during parleys with Beijing. Of late, former Chief of Army Staff Gen MM Naravane has spoken at public forums on Tibet's annexation and its demand for autonomy. The Forum for Non-Violent Alternatives (FNVA), an NGO, is espousing the Tibetan cause. It has several former government officials and veterans supporting it. Since 2008, it has issued policy papers, with the most recent in 2022: Resetting India's Tibet Policy. Prior to Independence, Gen Sir Francis Tuker, in his paper, Defence of India, had highlighted the strategic salience of Tibet and advised early occupation to pre-empt the Chinese People's Liberation Army (PLA) from doing so. The rest is history.

On April 25 in Dharamsala, Sikyong Penpa Tsering, the political leader of the Central Tibetan Administration, repeated its longstanding demand for the return of the 11th Panchen Lama at a function to celebrate his 35th birthday. Panchen Lama, who was abducted by the Chinese government, has been missing for the past 29 years. Tsering informed journalists at the ceremony that the Tibetan government in exile had been engaged in back channel talks with Beijing since last year; dialogue being resumed after nine rounds ended in 2010. Tibetans are pitching for greater autonomy in sync with the Dalai Lama's Middle Way policy.

Promptly, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Wang Wenbin, without refuting the back channel claim, reacted: "China does not legitimise government in exile at Dharamsala; the so-called Xizang (Chinese for Tibet) government in exile is totally against the Chinese constitution and laws and is illegal. No country has recognised it". He clarified that talks had been held with representatives of the Dalai Lama and not with the envoys of the government in exile. In February, the US House of Representatives had passed a Bill that would push China to resolve the outstanding Tibet-China dispute through talks with the Dalai Lama's envoys.

In response to the BJP seeking public suggestions for its election manifesto, the FNVA sent recommendations to the saffron party and the RSS — re-establishing India's diplomatic mission in Lhasa as a quid pro quo for additional Chinese missions/offices in India; no foreign interference in the succession of the 14th Dalai Lama; preservation of Tibetan Buddhism; and creating a joint India-China commission on the Brahmaputra river, similar to the one in the Indus Water Treaty Commission with Pakistan. Other recommendations were the restoration of pilgrimage routes to Kailash Mansarovar through Nathu La, commencing one from Demchok and reviving the routes via Nepal; and encouraging China to continue with an outcome-related dialogue with the Dalai Lama's representatives for early resolution of the Tibet-China dispute.

The ruling party has not bitten the bullet, though in the 1970s, the Bharatiya Jana Sangh had sought autonomy for Tibet in its manifesto.

The most worrying aspect of recent developments in Tibet is the depth and scale of Sinicisation of the region. Since President Xi Jinping took charge in 2013, China has been trying to erase Tibet's cultural identity of Tibetan Buddhism. A white paper issued in November 2022 titled CPC Policies on the Governance of Xizang in the New Era: Approach and Achievements is silent on the colonial boarding school system and massive relocation programme to diminish Tibetan culture. Around 8,00,000 children/youngsters in the age group of six to 18 years are being educated in Chinese in a highly politicised curriculum. Tibetans are forced to send their children to these schools in cities. If parents refuse, they are blacklisted, their welfare benefits are stopped and kids can't go to school ever. Their political indoctrination is systematic. Inter-marriage with Hans yields a reward of 20,000 yuan.

The military buildup is spectacular: six-lane highways, double-line railway to Shigatse from Lhasa and from Lhasa to Gormu. Of the seven million Tibetans, only around 8,000 have joined the PLA, but that will change with military conscription being ordered in the mainland. Reports suggest that over 2.3 lakh Han Chinese were settled in Tibet till 2020. The Tibetan population in Dharamsala is diminishing as Tibetans are unable to flee Tibet since Nepal has clamped down on free passage. A decade ago, 2,000 youth used to escape from Tibet every year. Now, it is just a trickle of six to eight persons. Last year, two women — Namkyi and Tsering Kyi — escaped from Tibet via Nepal and reached Dharamsala to narrate the grave human rights violations in their homeland.

At this rate, the Tibetan population in US could overtake the 66,000 Tibetans left in Dharamsala, and the government in exile might consider shifting there. The Central Tibetan Administration is frustrated with India for its silence on Tibet but extremely grateful for the sanctuary and hospitality. It is time for India to take a call on Tibet as Beijing digs deeper into Arunachal Pradesh and continues with Sinicisation of Tibet. China's latest warning was on the construction of the Sela tunnel and the planned deployment of an additional 10,000 troops opposite central Tibet. As China ratchets up its claim to south Tibet, India needs to gently open the Tibet front by urging Beijing to settle the Tibet-China differences and follow up with reopening its mission at Lhasa. After a hiatus of 18 months, China has sent an ambassador, Xu Feihong, who arrived in New Delhi recently. And with the election results next month, the new normal is going to change.

China's 'virtual invasion' of India and the cultural genocide of Tibet

18 May, 2024, RFA, Marco Respinti and Aaron Rhodes

There is no border between India and the People's Republic of China (PRC). In the northwest and northeast, India adjoins Tibet. It is not necessary for your Indian interlocutor to be a die-hard nationalist to think this way.

As a matter of fact, this is what a large number of Indians have believed since 1949, when the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) took power in Beijing. Their reasoning is that Tibet is a sovereign political entity occupied by the People's Republic of China, and that it should regain independence within its historical borders.

On the other hand, the CCP claims that Tibet has always been a part of China.

Powered by this claim, one of the weapons of the PRC's foreign offensive are geographical maps where boundary disputes are used as tools for sinicization of Tibet. In this pursuit, the CCP is indefatigable.

On March 30, the Ministry of Civil Affairs of the PRC committed its latest misappropriation of Indian toponyms, changing 30 placenames in the northeastern Indian state of Arunachal Pradesh.

Eleven residential areas, 12 mountains, four rivers, one lake, one mountain pass and a piece of land were given new Chinese names in simplified Chinese ideograms, Tibetan script and pinyin rendering as well as in the Roman alphabet.

Chinese names

For each of those places, geographical coordinates are also duly furnished as well as a high-resolution map. The CCP ceremoniously celebrated the event with all the technicalities needed to make it seem an important and legitimate operation..

The sinicization of toponyms in Arunachal Pradesh is only the latest offensive in an ongoing campaign that Beijing has launched in recent years.

The inaugural step of the campaign took place on April 13, 2017, when the ministry officialized the change of six place names. The second move was made official on Dec. 29, 2021, and it included the change of 15 toponyms. The third came on April 2, 2023, when 11 place names were sinicized as well.

It is noteworthy that the official announcement of the first change explicitly defines it as the "first batch," implying there was more to come. However, nowhere is it written that the new March 2024 fourth batch in this series should be constructed as being the last one.

It is a bit like playing a board game. None of the newly renamed real places in Arunachal Pradesh came under the PRC's sovereignty as a result of the contrived Chinese maps, and the occupation of sovereign Indian territory that the new toponyms seem to indicate has not happened.

Chinese logic

But the CCP's move is consciously aiming to achieve a clear psychological effect – achieved by presenting the change of names as the direct consequence of a specific logic.

The territory that India calls Arunachal Pradesh doesn't exist as such, the CCP asserts. It is just a portion of the PRC's sovereign territory, it maintains. So, it concludes, place names can't be Indian and must be Chinese, and new maps must show this to the entire world.

The CCP's claim that Arunachal Pradesh doesn't exist is based on the view that the Indian state by that name is simply a part of Tibet, which, the CCP underlines, has always been an integral part of China.

According to CCP propaganda, that part of "China's Tibet" that Delhi Indianizes under the "fake" name of Arunachal Pradesh is simply a portion of Southern Tibet, or "Zangnan," as the Chinese regime calls it.

This assertion has been continuously perpetrated by the PRC since 1950, with the annexation and then military occupation of Tibet, which was in fact, a different, independent country.

Cultural genocide

The Chinese invasion of Tibet, completed with the Battle of Lhasa in 1959 and its suppression of Tibetan identity, harsh religious persecution and other serious encroachments on liberty amount to a cultural genocide, as Tibetan leaders in exile have repeatedly asserted.

Playing chess with the lives of millions of people has always been the policy of the Chinese regime in Tibet. This war of maps is rooted in the disputed border lines that separate India and PRC, where de facto, agreed-upon, and legal borders have not coincided since the time of British India.

This dispute was complicated by the emergence of a highly ideological and aggressive regime in China in 1949. The game of maps that the CCP plays is quite sophisticated: It alternates its claim that some Indian territories are Tibetan – therefore belonging to China – with the dismemberment of "ethnic Tibet."

Thus, the sinicizing of Arunachal Pradesh is a cynical attempt to legitimize the permanent subjugation of an entire people as a fait accompli confirmed by an international border.

This curtailment and disrespect of India's sovereignty shows that what the PRC wants, the PRC gets – even if it comes at the price of culturally and politically attacking a foreign nation.

For its part, India rebukes this aggression, repeating that any boundary dispute regarding Arunachal Pradesh or other bordering lines, these must be discussed with Tibet, not the PRC – because Tibet is not the PRC, and will never be.

Totalitarian arrogance may pretend to change history and reality. It devastates societies, traditions and individual freedom, but it will ultimately fail.

Will China Succeed in Creating an Asian Security Order?

18 May 2024, The Diplomat, Richard Ghiasy and Jagannath Panda

China's vision for the Asian security order has a strong emphasis on cooperative security, but Beijing, despite new initiatives, is not quite sure how to make it happen. From April 18-23 2024, Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi made a three-nation tour of Cambodia, Indonesia, and Papua New Guinea. The trip is part of a packed diplomatic agenda that's been in motion since the start of the year which looks to consolidate China's status in Asia as the prime geoeconomic and geopolitical influencer.

Visits by leaders and other high-level officials, including from Russia, the Global South and rich European states like Germany, to China and by China's President Xi Jinping and high-level Chinese officials to various parts of the world, particularly in the Asia-Pacific, will test the waters for China's three world order-building projects: namely the Global Development Initiative (GDI), Global Security Initiative (GSI), and Global Civilization Initiative (GCI).

Diplomatically, politically, and economically, China has already leapfrogged ahead of other regional giants, taking its place among the global superpowers. Yet, thus far, China has been lagging in building an effective Asian security order, one naturally centered on Chinese interests. Importantly, China appears to be very aware of the complexity of promoting and developing an Asian security order: that is to say, the institutions and principles that guide security relations between states.

Could the three new initiatives be the solution for an Asian security order?

A Pan-Asian "Processual" Chinese Vision?

To a degree, China has a vision for Asia's security order through its emergent GSI. Still, it is primarily processual, i.e., the process and principles of multilaterally achieving a (as-yet undetermined) security order rather than a set-in-stone vision for an Asian security order. This processual vision is pan-Asian, but China's rhetoric changes by region, reflecting regional realities.

There is, of course, no single Asian security order or architecture. Nor is there unanimity on the number of security orders in Asia, their scope, and their specifics. Therefore, one way to "dissect" the Asian security order is regional – even if these do not operate in silos. The five Asian regions – West (the Middle East), Central, South, Southeast, and East Asia – have dissimilar and varying degrees of security order.

China's geographic position in Asia grants it a unique (dis)advantage: China is positioned amid these five regions. If we include Afghanistan in West Asia, China is contiguous to all five Asian regions – the only Asian nation to which this applies. This gives China a stake and role in all of Asia's security orders, from landlocked Central Asia to the other four with their strong maritime dimensions.

How do these five regions figure in China's security ordering priorities?

Ranking Asia's Regions in China's Security Order

Distant as it sits from China, the West Asian security disorder does not amply affect China's security, and its substantial fossil fuel imports have seen little impact from regional armed conflict. Rather, Central Asia and its periphery have historically been a significant threat to China's security. Today that is no longer the case. Russia, the Central Asian states, and China have found a calm, predictable modus vivendi in a region with a wide range of mostly Russian-dominated security-ordering institutions.

Like West and Central Asia, Southeast Asia, too, lacks a resident great power. The Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) is a "soft-edged," non-threatening supranational body that touts its centrality and normative value, i.e., inclusive, cooperative, and multilateral security ordering norms. It is no threat to China. Yet, the geographic crux of the U.S.-led Indo-Pacific strategy sits right at Southeast Asia and its waters, and it is in this theater that China-U.S. contestation arguably plays out the strongest.

Unlike Southeast Asia, South Asia has a minimal security order, primarily due to the geopolitical rift at the heart of the region between the most prominent players, India and Pakistan. To thwart India's rise and to establish a more permanent role in the region and the Indian Ocean –the site of crucial supply lines – China is quite actively engaged in the security ordering process in South Asia.

China is also unnerved by India's growing high-tech-oriented cooperation with the United States, as well as India's newly found resonance within the Quadrilateral Security Dialogue (the Quad, comprising Australia, India, Japan, and the U.S.). China is especially averse to the Quad and looks at it as a Cold War-era relic (an "Asia-Pacific NATO").

Notwithstanding the diverse regions of interest, it is in East Asia, where the United States with its treaty alliances with Japan and South Korea has been holding strong, that China – the region's foremost resident leader – will be looking to reconfigure the Asian security order. Yet, it is also the most complex region in which to do so.

China's East Asian Paradox

Of the five regions, China has the most paradoxical relationship with the U.S.-led East Asian security order. When the U.S.-led West welcomed China to the Western liberal order in the 1970s, China acquiesced to U.S. security hegemony in the Asia-Pacific. As a result, China has been a significant beneficiary, perhaps the largest in Asia, of the primarily U.S.-led and sustained liberal international order.

Economically, this order powered the globalization that has driven much of China's modernization, and the increasingly more networked U.S.-led hub-and-spokes alliance system in the Asia-Pacific has helped keep the peace in China's maritime periphery so that it could prosper.

However, this is the flank from which the most consequential security threats emanate for China's core interests, increasingly driven by expanding Indo-Pacific strategies and actions, because China's primary urban and industrial centers lie at or near its eastern and southeastern shores. China, thus, has significant issues with the U.S. alliance system, which functions as security architecture through its firm mutual defense commitments.

However, these issues have been around since long before China (re)gained great power status. China already called for revisions in 1997 when, in a joint declaration with Russia, it called for greater multipolarity in the international order, touted Westphalian sovereignty and territorial integrity, spoke of a "new era," and opposed (U.S.-led) security alliances. China thus questioned the U.S. security role and collective security principles long before it had the capabilities to supplant Washington.

Changing Security Concepts: Will the GSI Gain Traction?

Importantly, it was also in 1997 that China proposed a "new" interpretation of security, "the New Security Concept." This vision promoted "common security," in later concepts also referred to as "universal security" and increasingly as "indivisible and cooperative security" (the prior is a concept also endorsed by Russia but with 1970s European origins). The New Security Concept promoted the centrality of the United Nations and U.N. Charter, emphasizing multipolarity, multilateral security cooperation, dialogue, and diplomatic and economic cooperation over regional military blocs and military alliances (i.e. "collective security").

However, under Xi Jinping, China has increasingly promoted geographically more ambitious and marginally more specific security visions. These include the "New Asian Security Concept for New Progress in Security Cooperation" in 2014 and the 2017 "Asia-Pacific Security Cooperation" white paper, culminating in the broad-principles anchor concept of the GSI in 2022, and the updated 2023 version that calls for global input.

The GSI, an operational work in progress, delegitimizes the United States' collective and highly material security approach. Unlike the U.S. security order, the GSI links security with development and emphasizes non-traditional security issues. The GSI may shape perceptions and principles across Asia and the globe, particularly among those disillusioned with the U.S.-dominated international security order and those who want to avoid a destabilizing Sino-U.S. showdown. It may gain traction in Central and West Asia and parts of South and Southeast Asia, undermining the United States' role and vision for an Asian security order.

The Realities Behind China's Security Vision

Zooming out from the regional to the continental, in a sense, China is forced to adhere to an open-ended multilateralist vision for Asia's security order, for reasons of scope and geography, civilizational diversity, geopolitics, power balancing, and legitimacy. From a security lens, China needs to consider the role of 14 diverse land neighbors and a range of maritime neighbors.

These neighbors include three great/major powers (Russia, India, and Japan), four nuclear-armed states (Russia, India, Pakistan, and North Korea), a "recalcitrant" North Korea, a rising Vietnam, two great technological powers (Japan and South Korea), and the increasingly more-networked U.S. alliance system. From a maritime perspective, contrary to the United States, Europe, and India, China is "boxed in"

I security allies and partners.

Moreover, unlike Europe and the U.S. in their respective continents, China must deal with the wardens of four civilizations with distinct characteristics and aspirations: Hindu, Islamic, Orthodox, and Western through the U.S. presence and influence – all spread over a gigantic terrestrial and maritime expanse.

In addition to the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, there are regional flashpoints and territorial disputes, arms races, intense regional and extra-regional geopolitical rivalry, and an increasing range of non-traditional security threats. Furthermore, many actors, such as India and ASEAN, seek to absorb and dilute Chinese centrality in Asian security order-building through multilateralism.

China's Global South-Oriented Non-Western Forum Outreach: A Game Changer?

Operating in such a challenging environment, China creatively seeks to create a new Asian security order. One vital way has been to financially and geopolitically influence the Global South countries via outreach through non-Western-led forums such as the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB), Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO), and BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa), as well as through its widespread Belt and Road Initiative (BRI) – not just an infrastructure project but a geopolitical tool to undermine the U.S.-led order. Then there is the Conference on Interaction and Confidence Building Measures in Asia (CICA), the pan-Asian security forum with the largest number of Asian participants, which China is looking to transform into a security-oriented multilateral platform. Notably, both CICA and the SCO have greater resonance in continental Asia.

These forums have indeed become the fulcrum of China's Global South wooing. The expansion of the SCO and BRICS, as well as the growing interest in being included in these forums (Argentina's rejection of the BRICS membership notwithstanding), is being heralded in the Chinese media as a sign of "political autonomy" for the developing world.

In the era of the receding multilateralism and resurgence of dormant wars (in Eastern Europe and West Asia, to name two), as well as the increasing importance of middle/smaller states to major powers, the argument is compelling enough. Moreover, China projects itself as a developing country – something Xi emphasized at the 2023 BRICS summit. To capitalize on the developmental aspects with continuous stress on building a "shared future for mankind" through solidifying bilateral relations is a part of this Chinese narrative. This was on display in Xi's recent visit to Europe, particularly to Serbia and Hungary, if not France.

There is a bit of a contradiction here, as Beijing's self-identification with the marginalized Global South is somewhat at odds with China's financial clout, which is what makes it an attractive partner. Nevertheless, could such a collaboration lead to an Asian security order?

It's unlikely, given Asia's sheer geographic size and the multitude of actors, large and small, including extra-regional actors such as the U.S., the EU, and the U.K. For example, throughout maritime Asia, China operates in a gray area between complicity with and resistance to the U.S.-led security order. The latter's perceived legitimacy by regional countries is robust going by the "exceptional durability" of the U.S. alliances/partnerships and its track record in sustaining a safe Asian maritime environment since the end of World War II.

Now, as the U.S. security architecture seeks to balance China, Beijing has struggled to undermine this legitimacy. Given China's claims over most of the South China Sea (now demarcated by a 10-dash line), incursions into disputed waters, and lack of experience in providing public security goods or security guarantees to other states, why would Asian states unreservedly give up a long-time security guarantor, the United States, for an untested China? As a result, China needs a sound strategic alternative to the status quo. Even then, China must accept a multipolar maritime Asia that includes the United States and other major powers, including Russia, India, and ASEAN. Beijing's open-ended and processual-oriented security visions reflect pragmatic awareness and acceptance of this reality. However, a plural Asia where external actors, such as the United States, play a limited role would be Xi's (and the Chinese Communist Party's) strongly preferred outcome.

In sum, even as China progressively enhances the institutional capacity and membership of preferred and near-exclusively Asian security platforms such as CICA and the SCO and conceptualizes newer forms of security initiatives and principles such as common security, it is to be seen to what degree its GSI reverberates among Asia's political and security elites. Xi's "Asia for Asians" call at CICA 2014 mostly fell on deaf ears, but we shouldn't automatically expect the same from the GSI.

China's Supposed "Change" in Policy Towards Chinese Overseas: Nothing to See Here

17 May, 2024, Fulcrum, Leo Suryadinata

For decades, China sought to blur the distinction between foreign nationals of Chinese descent (huaren) and Chinese nationals living outside China (huaqiao). This was understandable, given Beijing's desire to tap on the former to pursue China's national interests. Recently, a senior Chinese official appeared to indicate, at least theoretically, that Beijing has had a change of heart. But there is more than meets the eye.

Liu Jianchao's remarks received a lot of mainstream Chinese media coverage that raised expectations of a change in China's overall policy towards Chinese overseas. Liu, the Minister of the International Department of the Chinese Communist Party of China and a prospective foreign minister, touched on the topic during a Future China dialogue chaired by Lee Huay Leng, the Editor-in-Chief of the Chinese Media Group (which is owned by SPH Media).

At the dialogue, Lee enquired if China recognised that Southeast Asian Chinese regarded cultural identity (wenhua rentong) and political identity (zhengzhi rentong) differently. Liu answered that China understands that Southeast Asians of Chinese descent (often called huaren or huayi) possess separate identifications. Their political identification lies with the Southeast Asian country where they have acquired citizenship. Hence, the Southeast Asian country is their "fatherland" (zuguo). However, they possess some cultural identification with China as the country is their ancestral land (zujiguo). He stated that China views political loyalty as separated from cultural links. However, Liu noted that these ethnic Chinese can serve as a bridge between China and Southeast Asia. He added that there are Chinese nationals living overseas (huaqiao). These huaqiao possess both political and cultural loyalty to China. He noted that huaqiao should abide by the laws of the country they reside in and that their legal rights will be duly protected by China.

The discussion about the loyalty of Southeast Asian Chinese is significant due to the recent case of businessman Philip Chan, a Singapore citizen of 30 years who was classified as a "Politically Significant Person" because he was assessed by Singapore authorities to have shown susceptibility to being influenced by foreign actors, and willingness to advance their interests. In 2023, Chan was a "representative of overseas Chinese" at China's National People's Congress and had remarked to the Chinese media after the Congress that it is the responsibility of Chinese overseas "to tell China's story well" and serve the interests of China because their futures are linked to China. As a "Politically Significant Person", Chan would need to report the political donations he receives and explain his association with a foreign country. Indeed, with the rise of China, some huaren have identified with Beijing, forgetting their political loyalty to their adopted country.

Chan could be, as defined by Liu, playing the role of a bridge (qiaoliang). But it is not easy to be a bridge between a Southeast Asian state and China. Citizens of a Southeast Asian state can (and should) only serve the national interests of the country that they belong to. This national interest includes national security, territorial integrity, economic benefits and welfare of the people, and national values or ideology. While the national interests of China and some Southeast Asian states can sometimes converge, they can also be in conflict at times. In the case of the latter, huaren should defend the interests of their Southeast Asian country.

"... under Xi, there appears to be a stronger momentum to appeal to Chinese overseas to support China. This is evidenced by the OCAO being placed under the United Front Work Department since 2018, the practice of inviting huaqiao and huaren to Chinese business association conventions, and the annual invitations to huaqiao and huaren as representative of overseas Chinese at China's Two Sessions parliamentary meetings."

Liu's reference to loyalty to citizenship-country – the country that huaren have adopted the nationality of – appears to differ from the policy introduced when Hu Jintao came to power. Hu sought to blur the distinction between huaren and huaqiao. Subsequently, the administration of Xi Jinping appealed to Chinese overseas in Southeast Asia and beyond to assist China economically and serve the national interests of China. To both Hu and Xi, Chinese overseas, regardless of their citizenship, are regarded as a part of the Chinese nation. This indicated that Beijing sought to blur the distinction between huaqiao and huaren.

There are many instances of such appeals. They can be found in this author's The Rise of China and the Chinese Overseas. In April 2012, Li Yinze, the chairman of the Beijing Branch Overseas Chinese Affairs Office (OCAO, or Qiaoban) delivered a speech at the Indonesian Chinese Chamber of Commerce in Jakarta, appealing to young Chinese Indonesians to learn Mandarin "to strengthen their identification with the Chinese Nation". He also noted that Chinese Indonesians should not be afraid as there is a strong China backing them. In September 2014, Qiu Yangping, the chairperson of OCAO, made a speech at the Indonesians of Chinese Descent Association (INTI) conveying a similar message. In June 2014, President Xi talked about a "Big Chinese Family" (zhonghua da jiating), thus including foreign citizens of Chinese descent (huaren) at the 7th Conference of World Federation of Huaqiao Huaren Associations.

While Mr Liu might appear to be taking a different line from Hu and Xi, Beijing's policy of blurring the distinction between huaqiao and huaren remains unchanged. In fact, under Xi, there appears to be a stronger momentum to appeal to Chinese overseas to support China. This is evidenced by the OCAO being placed under the United Front Work Department since 2018, the practice of inviting huaqiao and huaren to Chinese business association conventions, and the annual invitations to huaqiao and huaren as representatives of overseas Chinese at China's Two Sessions parliamentary meetings. Most recently, the 2024 “Chinese New Year Gala Performance” (“四海同春”全球华侨华人春节大联欢) constituted an event that was specifically directed at huaqiao and huaren globally. In view of the above, Liu’s remarks should be seen in context. It does not constitute a change in China’s policy towards Chinese overseas. In fact, he was merely responding to a question with a politically correct answer.

Editor’s Note: The term “overseas Chinese”, according to Professor Wang Gungwu, is the direct translation of huaqiao, referring to Chinese nationals who live outside China. Prof Wang suggests that “Chinese overseas” be used to refer to “all Chinese living abroad, both Chinese nationals and ethnic Chinese” (i.e. huaqiao and huaren, or foreign nationals of Chinese descent).

Xi Jinping’s strongman politics is China’s ‘new normal’

17 May 2024, The Hill, Joshua Eisenman and Thomas S. Sexton

After Xi Jinping took power in China in 2012, he promptly began a series of purges and ideological crackdowns that have set the tone for his rule.

To some experts, this is only a temporary problem. According to them, Xi Jinping’s strongman politics represent a deviation from China’s long-term path of reform and opening up, a reference to the relatively liberal economic and political policies begun under Deng Xiaoping more than four decades ago. In this optimistic view it is possible, perhaps even likely, that the next Chinese leader will revert back to this policy. Because Xi cannot rule forever, they argue, more liberal-minded Chinese and foreigners can simply wait him out.

For instance, long-time China-watchers David Lampton and Thomas Finger maintain that Chinese politics has two distinct governance traditions: one that prioritizes “national and regime security over economic growth” and the other that prioritizes “the gains to be made through interdependence and openness.” In their telling, Xi Jinping “embraces the first,” while a future Chinese leader might well opt for the second.

The University of Hong Kong’s Jiwei Ci agrees that “there is no reason to believe that political affairs will not resume their ordinary course in a post-Xi China.” So does Robert Daly, the Kissinger Chair at the Wilson Center. He argues that Xi “represents a major strand in the Chinese braid — the nationalist, isolationist, paranoid, totalitarian strand. But there are other strands — including that of liberal internationalists — that are equally thick. They are just not in the ascendancy right now.” He makes the case that “Chinese progressives have not gone away” and that “the pendulum will swing again.”

But the hope that Xi Jinping’s increasingly totalitarian China is likely to “swing” back toward liberalization after his eventual passing is almost certainly fool’s gold.

This is because what some see as different “strands” of governance are not as distinct as they might appear. It is worth remembering that party cadres overwhelmingly blessed Xi Jinping’s accession, not because they hoped he would liberalize the country, but because they wanted a strong leader to clean up their system.

Back in 2011 and 2012, corruption and rent-seeking were endemic, eating away at party legitimacy. As a result, a consensus emerged both within the Chinese Communist Party and among the populace that it was necessary to crack down on malfeasance, enhance party cohesion, reinvigorate ideology and reassert control over the economic sphere.

“The swift shift from collective leadership to strongman rule during Xi Jinping’s early years in office...was the result of a widely shared consensus among China’s ruling elite that the regime was facing a severe crisis that necessitated a return to such rule,” explains Nimrod Baranovitch. Indeed, as Yu Zeyuan of Singapore’s Lianhe Zaobao newspaper observes: “Xi seized on the people’s abhorrence of corruption, and with unprecedented boldness. This struck fear among the corrupt as well as his opponents within the party, and won him widespread praise.”

Simply put, the selection of a strongman was very much part of the plan, not a deviation from it.

It has also become a common refrain that Xi Jinping’s authoritarian governance is a departure from that of predecessors Deng Xiaoping, Jiang Zemin and Hu Jintao, who instead sought to balance power among competing voices. This argument presumes that China’s past leaders would not have preferred to have the type of unitary control that Xi now exercises. In fact, all three struggled with rancorous factional politics and power-sharing arrangements that obliged them to make concessions to rivals.

Throughout the 1980s, Deng Xiaoping’s cycles of economic and political openness and tightening were the result not of his preference for collaboration and compromise, but rather the necessity to navigate competing pressures from the rivalrous conservative and liberal members of his coalition. Hu Jintao was also compelled to balance between his “Youth League Faction” and Jiang Zemin’s powerful “Shanghai Faction.”

Indeed, these competing elements within the party did constrain executive decision making. But in Beijing, these limitations were widely seen as hurdles to, rather than aspects of, effective governance. There was also a profound sense of disappointment in China's leader at the time, Hu Jintao, who was regularly criticized for his "inaction." "China is nothing close to harmonious," Zhang Ming of Renmin University lamented as Hu was stepping down in 2012. Conflicts and contradictions have become worse. In fact it is reaching a crisis point."

16 May, 2024, Taipei Times

Seen in this light, it is not Xi Jinping's desire to consolidate decision-making in his own hands that distinguishes him from his predecessors, but rather his success in exerting his authority over his unwieldy comrades.

Furthermore, the foundations of China's extensive internet controls — which Xi Jinping has built upon — were created in the early 2000s under Hu.

"Hu's regime...showed little tolerance towards political opposition, rounding up the most vocal dissidents and social activists, putting them in prison, under house arrest or making them disappear for weeks," as CNN reported back in 2012.

Under Hu, the party also kept traditional media outlets on a leash while expanding its supervision over the hundreds of millions of bloggers who were forced to register using their real names. Xi has invested in the social surveillance and control mechanisms established by his predecessors, who were hardly supporters of free expression.

Indeed, perhaps the most important reason to resist the siren song of unfounded optimism about China's future political trajectory is the unprecedented power and scale of the country's AI-driven techno-totalitarianism. China now has hundreds of millions of cameras linked to supercomputers that can identify persons of interest to the state in real time. These systems are now fully institutionalized and deeply integrated with the security state at every level.

It is hard to imagine how even the most liberal-minded future Chinese leader could uproot such a system. Rather, with each passing day, China's high-tech surveillance systems (from payment systems to ride hailing to shopping and food delivery) will collect ever more amounts and types of personal data. And if China remains a techno-totalitarian state, it cannot, by definition, become a more free and open society.

Rather than go "back to the future" after Xi (who may yet rule for decades), China is unlikely to liberalize. In the absence of a succession plan, the reins of power are most likely to end up in the hands of a Chinese version of Vladimir Putin — some currently anonymous apparatchik within the security state apparatus who understands how to wield power in the system.

Chinese President Xi Jinping (习近平) is attempting to create an alternative international world order to the US-dominated model. China has benefited hugely from the current order since former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping (邓小平) opened up its economy five decades ago.

Countries can be categorized as continental or maritime, and to a great degree this determines their optimum foreign policy. China is continental, as is Russia. The US initially followed a continental foreign policy, before it settled on a maritime model. The British empire was so successful because a tiny island kingdom built a formidable naval presence.

The US-dominated world order, stabilized by its maritime policy of ensuring unobstructed trade and shipping passage and therefore wealth creation, helped the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) achieve its impressive feat of lifting millions of Chinese out of poverty. Xi now appears to believe he can now move on in creating a new order he believes would benefit China in ways that the current model does not. This is one framework in which one can understand the apparently self-destructive approach that the CCP has taken under Xi.

Xi has just returned from a five-day trip to Europe, where he visited France, Serbia and Hungary, countries relatively friendly to China.

French President Emmanuel Macron's emphasis on European "strategic autonomy" coheres with Xi's vision of a multipolar world; Serbian President Aleksandar Vucic, and Hungarian President Tamas Sulyok and Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban rolled out the red carpet. One could say the trip was successful, but there is a sense in which Xi was in damage limitation mode, mitigating the foreign policy missteps of the past few years that continue to alienate China from many European countries.

Xi has sought to achieve a network of trade connections and allies with his audacious Belt and Road Initiative. This has been successful to a degree, but has also created complications and cannot compete with the free flow of trade in the international order he seeks to replace.

Closer to home, Xi seems to be building a navy not to protect a maritime order, but to consolidate an extension of his continental holdings. Many believe his ambitions go beyond the annexation of Taiwan and control of the near coastal waters, and regional powers are on tenterhooks.

US academic Sarah Paine predicted six years ago in a speech to the Hudson Institute that this "territory grab" would lead to the formation of an opposing alliance system that would present the US with a perfect opportunity to consolidate its own influence in the area.

Paine also said that no continental power in its right mind would consider opening up two fronts of conflict, and yet Xi has angered India to the west and allowed a US-affiliated opposing alliance to form in maritime neighbors to China's east.

The joint US-Philippines exercises that took place between April 22 and Wednesday last week is an indicator of such an alliance. France and Australia also took part in the exercises, but the list of 14 observers, including Brunei, Canada, Germany, the UK, India, Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia, New Zealand, South Korea, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam, would have been considering how they would deal with a crisis in the West Philippine Sea, which could easily spill into the Taiwan Strait.

Many of these countries would be expected to help the US and Philippines out due to the web of security alliances between them. Taiwan, too, would be expected to offer assistance, just as it would hope that the web of alliances would kick in should China attack Taiwan.

Xi seems to be willing to make things difficult for himself just to prove a point.

Himalaya in Dilemma

16 May, 2024, Khabarhub, Binoj Basnyat

Just a month after India and the US concluded the 18th edition of their joint military exercise 'Yudh Abhyas' in the eastern Himalayas, held in Auli, Uttarakhand from November 16th to December 2nd, 2022, another clash occurred between Chinese and Indian forces in Tawang, Arunachal Pradesh, in the western Himalayas on December 9th, 2022.

This event once again underscores the significant strategic and geostrategic consequences for prominent world powers and the South Asian region. It reiterates Beijing and New Delhi's appeals and claims regarding borders, as well as the diplomatic stance of smaller nations on such occurrences, which steer long-term political, economic collaboration, and political-security cooperation.

The Himalayan region, covering a disputed border of 3,379 kilometers (2,100 miles) between China and India, constitutes the largest disputed border in the world.

China controls 38,000 sq km of territory that New Delhi also claims in the west, while to the east, India holds 90,000 sq km that Beijing claims as its own.

However, the far western Himalayan region bordering Afghanistan and Pakistan, as well as the far eastern Himalayan region with Myanmar, remain relatively silent but not peaceful.

Power competition persists in the far west with China-Iran-Russia and in the eastern Himalayas with China-India spheres of influence.

The central sub-region bordering Bhutan and Nepal also experiences disputes, though they are not publicly acknowledged.

Interestingly, while political tensions simmer in Sino-Indo relations, economic ties have transcended, with China becoming India's top trading partner in FY2024 with USD 118.4 billion in two-way commerce, according to the Global Trade Research Initiative.

India's exports to China rose by 8.7 percent to USD 16.67 billion, while imports increased by 3.24 percent to USD 101.7 billion.

Conversely, exports to the US dipped slightly by 1.32 percent to USD 77.5 billion, and imports decreased by about 20 percent to USD 40.8 billion, whereas Washington was the top trading partner during 2022-23. In December 2022, the US Embassy in New Delhi tweeted that the joint military exercise reinforces commitment to the Indo-Pacific Region, improves interoperability, and takes the US-India partnership to new heights.

The Indian Army also mentioned the synergy between both armies.

Yudh Abhyas is conducted annually with the aim of exchanging best practices, tactics, techniques, and procedures between the armies.

The October 2021 exercise was conducted at Joint Base Elmendorf Richardson, Alaska.

South Asia, with almost two billion people, emerging powers, important shipping routes, and sensitive autonomous regions, is in a geopolitically imperative position in both maritime and continental realms.

It has expanding economic-political-security strategic paradigms, leading the region into the Indo-Pacific as a sub-region of disputation flanked by small and big powers.

The rivalry between Asia's biggest powers, China and India, reveals itself in many spheres, despite both being rising powers, nuclear-armed, with large populations and political ambitions as global players. New Normal in the Himalayas

End of the colonial period in South Asia in the mid-1940s, the annexation of Tibet in 1950 by China, India and Pakistan's long-running disputes over Jammu and Kashmir, and cross-border terrorism with a number of wars, ongoing conflicts, and military standoffs.

The 1962 war between China and India, in addition to the aspirations of China and India in shaping the imminent geostrategic environment, has been the basis for border disputes that could garner attention for domestic nationalist politics and external trepidations.

The mutually acceptable 2003 Agreement on the political parameters guiding principles for the settlement of India-China Boundary questions was signed on 11 April 2005 after five meetings of the Special Representatives, which were initiated in 1981.

Border incidents resurfaced in 2013, such as the Depsang incursion or Daulat Beg Oldi incident near the Line of Actual Control (LAC).

The 2014 standoff in the LAC, later withdrawn to pre-September positions after three weeks, even while President Xi Jinping was on a State visit to India, signed 12 bilateral agreements.

The year 2014 was declared as the Year of China-India Friendly Exchanges, issuing a Joint Statement on Building an Even Closer Partnership for Development.

In 2015, both were locked in confrontation in the Burtse area of the Depsang plains of Ladakh, where Indian troops destroyed a Chinese surveillance tower.

Though skirmishes were evident, four occurrences of strategic significance were evident that have plunged the Sino-Indian relationship.

In June 2017, a 73-day Doklam standoff of territory claimed by both Bhutan, an Indian ally, and China ended in August with the commitment of 1949 and replaced the 2007 "New Friendship Treaty" between Bhutan and India.

The 1959 Tibetan uprising and the 14th Dalai Lama's arrival in India inscribe the significance of the Bhutan-China border. Donglong, Doklam, is an area disputed between Bhutan and China located near the tri-junction with India.

Bhutan's border with Tibet has never been officially recognized nor demarcated. Bhutan withdrew its representative from Lhasa with the 17-point agreement between the Tibetan Government and the central government of the People's Republic of China.

China claims Doklam based on the 1890 "convention of Calcutta between Britain and China with acceptance from former Indian Prime Minister (PM) Jawaharlal Nehru and showing large parts of Bhutanese territory as part of China in the maps of 1958.

Bhutan stresses that it was neither a party nor was consulted before signing, though the boundary talks began in 1984 with an agreement reached in 1988 and 1998 to discourage the use of force and encourage adherence to peaceful means.

Xi Jinping and PM Modi reiterated on the sidelines that having a good relationship was in the interest of both nations with a 'forward-looking' approach and closer communication between defense and security personnel being a necessity during the 9th Brazil-

Russia-India-China-South Africa (BRICS) summit in September 2017.

Second, the eastern Ladakh border standoff erupted in May 2020 in the Pangong Lake area followed by a clash in the Galwan Valley in June 2020.

In December 2022, the Tawang Sector in northeastern Arunachal Pradesh on the Line of Actual Control witnessed another clash between the Chinese and the Indian military, evidence of a serious military conflict between the two sides after four and a half decades.

Lastly, a 'new' map was brought to light by China in August 2023 claiming northeastern Arunachal Pradesh as well as the disputed Aksai Chin Plateau, which was dismissed by Indian Foreign Minister Subrahmanyam Jaishankar.

Nepal has urged China to use Nepal's official map, in addition to revising the map that places Lipulekh, Kalapani, and Limpiyadhura as part of Indian territory.

The decision to print a new NRS 100 currency note with a map showing the territories of Lipulekh, Limpiyadhura, and Kalapani comes barely a few months after ruling Maoist Centre Chairman Pushpa Kamal Dahal forged a leftist alliance with the Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist Leninist), along with a few other fringe parties, in the federal parliament.

India's Foreign Minister Jaishankar expressed dissatisfaction, labeling Nepal's move as unilateral.

He said, "Our position is clear, even if the map changes, the reality on the ground does not change."

The new normal is manifested with 'No War' and 'No Peace,' stressing the 'Five Fingers of Tibet,' attributed to Mao Zedong in his 1940 speech, as relevant to Chinese 21st-century foreign policy.

The founding chairman of the Chinese Communist Party, Mao, termed Bhutan and Nepal as China's tributary states on November 15, 1939.

Tibet is considered China's right-hand palm, with five fingers on its periphery: Ladakh, Nepal, Sikkim, Bhutan, and the North-East Frontier Agency or Arunachal Pradesh.

Bhutan, Nepal, and Sikkim were claimed as suzerainty and asserted by the Chinese amban in Tibet in 1908, who wrote to the Nepalese authorities that Nepal and Tibet, "being united like brothers under the auspices of China, should work in harmony for mutual good," in the face of British opposition.

China's Strategic Opening Out

From 1950 to 1959 to 2013, a series of strategic proceedings occurred, ranging from annexation to attempts by the Government of Tibet to gain international recognition, efforts to modernize the military, military conflicts in the Chamdo area of western Kham, the Seventeen Point Agreement by the government of Tibet under Chinese pressure, to the Tibet uprising and the announcement of the Belt and Road Initiative.

These demonstrate political aspirations to the south, west, and along the Himalayas, especially in Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Cambodia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Laos, Maldives, Mongolia, Myanmar, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Tajikistan. With the foundation of the CCP and the 1978 economic reform, along with accessible geography, China has managed to transform into a new economic, military, and political power. A joint research report by a five-country think tank team, including the Chongyang Institute for Financial Studies at Renmin University of China, released that China's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) is estimated to surpass that of the US, with the country becoming the world's largest economy by around 2035. With the growth of its economy, China has emerged as a global actor.

South Asia has two strategic gateways, through the land, maritime, or both. Maldives and Sri Lanka are in the maritime region, while Afghanistan, Bhutan, Nepal, Bangladesh, Pakistan, and Myanmar are in the continental region, and Bangladesh, Pakistan, and Myanmar have both maritime and land routes. Geostrategic measures involve bilateral, trilateral, quadrilateral, multilateral, and global initiatives.

China provides economic assistance as a key creditor and in the form of grants. According to the World Bank's international debt report, developing countries owe about USD 180 billion.

Chinese loans to Pakistan rose from USD 7.6 billion in 2016 to USD 26.5 billion in 2022, accounting for 72 percent of the total external debt and 57 percent of debt repayment revenue.

Sri Lanka defaulted on its foreign loans, triggering massive turmoil, and bankruptcy rose from USD 4.6 billion in 2016 to USD 8.8 billion in 2022, accounting for 57 percent of the total external debt and 54 percent of debt repayment revenue.

Bangladesh's loan is USD 6 billion, Maldives' is USD 1.2 billion, and Nepal's is USD 0.26 billion.

Though small in figure, it accounts for 24 percent, 68 percent, and 27 percent of foreign liabilities, respectively.

Nepal's PM Pushpa Kamal Dahal (Prachanda) has said that the process has been initiated to ask China to convert the Pokhara International Airport loan into a grant to ease the financial burden of the USD 215 million loan, out of the USD 305 million with 2-3 percent interest from the Export-Import Bank, with repayment in 25 years, while other international monetary institutions provide loans with interest rates ranging from 0.25-0.75 percent.

The Asian Development Bank and the 12-member Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries

(OPEC) for International Development contributed USD 37 million and USD 11 million, respectively.

An example is the arrival of Chinese experts in Kathmandu for a feasibility study of the China-Nepal cross-border railway in December 2022.

Conclusion

Landlocked, sea-locked, and all countries in South Asia have choices with vulnerability and invincibility, while the two Asian giants' regional strategic interests are politically competing, economically cooperating, and militarily confronting in the Himalayas.

Deepening cooperation between India and the West, particularly the US, in addition to the US-led West with the rest, has made China feel on edge, and the risk of new outbreaks of fighting perseveres.

China's economic strength, political conviction, and military engagement have expanded in India's neighborhood with an all-weather relationship with Pakistan and regime-centered relationships with other South Asians, externally balancing India.

Xi's continuation for more years or decades after the removal of the two-term limit on the presidency, endorsed by the annual sitting of the National People's Congress in 2018, and the likelihood of Modi 3.0 with the elections taking place, will present a sterner test than the last decade, with heightened nationalism and geopolitical tensions.

Both Beijing and New Delhi appeal to Eastern governments of their preference in South Asia.

A political success will, in fact, serve to divide and fragment South Asian nations domestically.

This will function for the goodwill of the favoring power rather than addressing their strategic necessities and falling into the strategic trap.

Together with resuming dialogue and reopening communications between Xi and Modi and through existing mechanisms like the 1996 "mutual and Equal security" to reaffirm de-escalations in the Himalayan borders.

It is arduous when Beijing depicts the border situation as normal and New Delhi apprehensive.

At the same time, the small states in South Asia should strengthen state institutions, assemble a strong civil society that is besieged to contend with implication, create experts to match implications of geopolitical activism to policy, and augment local awareness of the extent of 'privileged detained' political status.

Nepal, as a vulnerable country facing special challenges as a buffer between the opening and the potency of big power politicking on one side and, on the other, domestic capacity to manage and palliate political-economic-diplomatic-security risks.

With vulnerability, Nepal should also engage in infrastructure development, connectivity in international relations with minilateral and multilateral environments.

Bilateral undertakings will assist neutrality and will avoid being part of the upcoming global bipolarity between China, a communist nation, and the US, a democracy, and the risks that rivalry can pose.

This will navigate from plunging into the strategic trap in addition to strategic outreach and policy recommendations that manifest domestic political and economic reality as big powers' competition prevails in South Asia, questioning national credibility.

Nepal must build on with the traditional and customary practices, analyzing the domestic implication with India and other South Asian neighbors and at the same time secure opportunities with China and other donor nations, particularly the US-led West, in its strides to addressing the people's aspirations and national obligations with no compromise on national interest or falling into the geopolitical long game.

China removes the PLASSF and establishes ISF: Implications for India

15 May, 2024, ORF, Kartik Bommakanti

The People's Liberation Army Strategic Support (PLASSF) has been disbanded. In late 2015, the People's Republic of China (PRC) under President Xi Jinping announced the creation of the PLASSF along with Peoples Liberation Army Rocket Force (PLARF), which were two new services. The PLARF which was the erstwhile Second Artillery Force (SAF), in the latest shake-up, has not been dissolved and still retains command authority. In addition to these two new services, with now only the PLARF surviving, five Theatre Commands (TCs) were also set up in 2015-16. The PLASSF was a unified service that integrated the Chinese military's space, cyber, electronic, and psychological warfare capabilities and its replacement is the Information Support Force (ISF). Xi said that the new force would be "...a brand-new strategic arm of the PLA and a key underpinning of coordinated development and application of the network information system", which he added would help the People's Liberation Army (PLA) "...fight and win in modern warfare."

What brought about the dissolution of the PLASSF and its replacement—the Information Support Force (ISF)? Three general explanations are proffered. First is that the PLASSF was a strategic force that needed to be brought under greater oversight and control of the Central Military Control (CMC)—the top political and military decision-making body in the PRC led by President Xi Jinping. A second factor and a corollary to this bureaucratic impediment was the inherent rigidity of the PLASSF to the extent that Theatre Commands (TCs) had to secure its approval for resources or assets which the PLASSF could block or delay because it enjoyed co-equal command status and authority with the TCs. In a nutshell, the shift is also due to the need for limiting excessive control. A third and final reason is the experience of the ongoing war between Russia and Ukraine, which has visibly demonstrated to the Chinese that flexibility in the release and the use of cyber-, electronic-, and space-borne resources more efficiently was a necessity, acting as compelling drivers behind the change for operational effectiveness in the battlespace.

The People's Liberation Army Cyberspace Force and Aerospace Force have been created, bringing the number of forces to four, which includes the People's Liberation Army Logistics Support Force (PLALSF) whose establishment predates the current transformation.

Whatever the ostensible reasons for the PLASSF's axing, the constituent elements of the newly established ISF are network information systems and communications support supplemented by potential network defence. ISF is primarily geared toward protecting and defending Chinese networks against external intrusions and attacks. Additionally, the People's Liberation Army Cyberspace Force and Aerospace Force have been created, bringing the number of forces to four, which includes the People's Liberation Army Logistics Support Force (PLALSF) whose establishment predates the current transformation. Now the TCs, which are crucial for the defence of Chinese territory and offensive operations including overseas missions, can avail the services of each of the arms more smoothly and efficiently. What is not evident is whether additional divisions have been instituted such as the separation of Cyber Warfare and Electronic Warfare (EW) and presumably the Cyber Force will be the new arm that oversees and pursues integrated CW-EW missions and whose resources the TCs can avail. The combined applications of CW-EW are likely to be more pronounced, especially in the context of what the Chinese call "intelligicised warfare" which will involve greater use of Artificial Intelligence (AI) and automation in warfare.

Implications for India

The changes that we see today relate mostly to Command and Control (C2), and the TCs' easier access to the capabilities and resources which the erstwhile PLASSF controlled. If anything, the reshuffle is an effort to leverage cyber, EW, Space and counterspace capabilities for their effective application in multi-domain operations. Even prior to the latest rejig, the Chinese invested heavily in cyber and space capabilities as the 2024 Chinese defence budget demonstrates, which witnessed an increase of 7.2 percent despite low Chinese economic growth. India should now be even more alert and prepared simply because the capabilities of the Chinese relevant to cyber weapons, EW, space and counterspace systems have received a significant amount of investment for the pursuit of joint operations and the dissolution of the PLASSF has nothing to do with Chinese capabilities in the space, cyber, and EW areas per se. They are not just geared for an invasion of Taiwan, the PRC's cyber, EW, space and counterspace capabilities can be used in a military contingency against India. Indeed, the Chinese quest to match and redress the gaps in their cyber and space capabilities against the Americans for a Taiwan invasion can easily be shifted to service the People's Liberation Army's Western Theatre Command (WTC) military operations for offensive and defensive missions vis-à-vis India, due to the "fungibility" of cyber, EW, space and counterspace assets. China's aim to match or even surpass the United States (US) has opened up a significant gap between China and India in the space and cyber domains.

India defeated the intrusion, but the lack of adequate Indian space assets was evident and it was able to defeat it because the US extended its superior space surveillance assets.

One of the most visible manifestations of this was the American assistance to India when Chinese forces attacked Yangtse in the Tawang sector of Arunachal Pradesh in December 2022. India defeated the intrusion, but the lack of adequate Indian space assets was evident and it was able to defeat it because the US extended its superior space surveillance assets. In the space domain, at a minimum, the space power differential is significant between India and China and reveals the extent to which Chinese space military assets are substitutable. The establishment of the ISF as well as a separate Cyber and Space force has other implications for India in that the TCs, especially the WTC, which is responsible for ground and air operations along the Sino-Indian boundary, can now access the newly established ISF, Cyber force and Aerospace force's resources more easily. To be sure, the WTC would have some organic cyber and EW assets, but the erstwhile PLASSF was too rigid in extending assistance to the TCs, which was one of the primary precipitants for the recent reorganisation. A further implication of the PRC's decision to subdivide the former PLASSF into separate forces is that it provides greater flexibility, demonstrating to Indian military planners that they need to consider how they deploy discrete assets connected to space, cyber, EW and psychological operations; where they overlap; and where they serve as enablers and force multipliers for conventional military operations.

The Xi-led leadership's decision to disband the PLASSF should not be considered definitive, it could revive itself in another guise with possibly some of its functions amalgamated into a new service in the future.

AI is another area where India will need to pay greater attention given the Chinese commitment to "intelligicised warfare". AI can augment and render Chinese intelligence collection and cyberwarfare capabilities more effective. Last but not least, the Xi-led leadership's decision to disband the PLASSF should not be considered definitive, it could revive itself in another guise with possibly some of its functions amalgamated into a new service in the future. What is and should be instructive for Indian military planners and strategists in regard to the organisational changes implemented by the Chinese leadership is that it underlines the importance of experimentation, flexibility, and even adaptation, given what the PRC has witnessed through the recent military experience of others such as the Russians and Ukrainians in their ongoing war.

China doesn't need to invade to achieve Taiwanese unification

13 May, 2024, The Hill, Dan Blumenthal and Fred Kagan

The U.S. faces the most challenging international security environment since the end of World War II.

The war in Ukraine rages even as war continues and threatens to expand in the Middle East. Meanwhile, the People's Republic of China continues to harass and intimidate its neighbors, and Washington is more acutely aware of the threat of a Chinese attack against Taiwan.

More attention to Taiwan's security is welcome, but the current public discourse remains too focused on the threat of a Chinese invasion of the island. Beijing still has other options to force unification short of invasion, including an escalation of its ongoing hybrid warfare campaign against Taiwan. U.S. policy is not well designed to deter or defeat such a strategy.

China is more likely to pursue a "short of war coercion campaign," as we call it, centered on political and economic warfare accompanied by limited kinetic action than an invasion of Taiwan for three main reasons:

First, annexing Taiwan by means short of war significantly limits possible damage to other Chinese grand strategic objectives. The People's Republic of China's long-term strategic goals are to continue to build-up what it calls its comprehensive national power and become the world's leading power. It then aims to decisively reshape international politics and place itself at the center. Although Chinese leader Xi Jinping clearly believes that unifying Taiwan with the mainland is a key component of this grand strategy, he may be loath to risk China's march to geopolitical dominance by starting a full scale and likely global war.

Second, a short of war strategy centered on political warfare and limited kinetic action could be successful. Taiwan's most recent elections highlighted deep domestic political divisions, coinciding with a rise in skepticism of America's support. These sentiments are further reinforced by the fact that Taiwan remains internationally isolated. Taiwan status is sui generis in international affairs: it is a fully functioning nation-state not recognized by the international powers. This creates an opening for China's manipulation of Taiwan's understandable fears of abandonment.

Third, strategies short of war are consistent with Chinese strategic thinking and previous behavior. A number of Chinese warfighting concepts reference the utility of fighting wars using means beyond traditional applications of kinetic force. These concepts have been employed regularly in Chinese "gray zone operations" in the South and East China Seas and Taiwan Strait. Given their general success, China will likely intensify their employment in a campaign to annex Taiwan.

Our new report demonstrates that Beijing can realistically accomplish such a strategy. By adopting the mindset of Chinese strategic planners, we devised a plausible short of war coercion campaign that would let China establish political control over Taiwan without an invasion or overt military blockade.

The campaign we modeled ran for four years, from the inauguration of a new Taiwanese president through his first term. During this period, China would break the U.S.-Taiwan relationship, degrade the Taiwanese government's ability to govern, and significantly undermine the Taiwanese will to resist and U.S. desire to aid Taiwan.

We found that four years of constant Chinese air and naval incursions, a quasi-blockade, political warfare and manipulation, extensive cyber and physical sabotage of Taiwan's critical infrastructure, and deadly force on offshore islands would generate "cognitive overload" within the Taiwanese government and a sense of chaos throughout Taiwan's populace.

During the course of such a campaign, the U.S. would be inundated with Chinese information warfare and become convinced that Taiwan is not "worth" going to war over, especially following new economic deals with China. Those who are skeptical of China's ability to paralyze U.S. responses have not been paying attention to Russia's political warfare against the U.S. since 2015, which almost led to a rupture with NATO over Ukraine. In particular, if China's campaign to inflict pain does not trigger any of the indicators and warnings of the invasion the U.S. is preparing for, the U.S. might well stay out of a Chinese coercive campaign.

In our notional campaign, after Taiwan is thrown into chaos and seemingly abandoned by its strongest ally. China then seizes the opportunity to offer "peace," promising to halt the coercion campaign and guarantee a level of autonomy in exchange for cooperation following guidelines dictated by Beijing. The Taiwanese government, despite having no desire to become part of China, chooses to end its people's suffering, agreeing to a plan that would eventually lead to the unification China desires.

The scenario outlined in our report does not represent our assessment of what we think will necessarily happen. Rather, it seeks to demonstrate that a short of war coercion scenario is realistic and highly dangerous.

There are several steps that the U.S., Taiwan, and regional allies can take to head off such a strategy. These governments must begin by clearly articulating Taiwan's sovereign rights under international law, thus combating Chinese lawfare campaigns justifying blockades and shipping inspections regimes as "internal matters."

The Taiwanese and U.S. governments should also cooperate to improve Taiwan's counter-influence and anti-subversion legal authorities and capabilities. This cooperation should extend to broader efforts to better prepare Taiwan to withstand blockades and blockade-like economic activities.

Finally, a U.S.-led coalition should impose political and economic costs to deter Chinese military intimidation efforts. For example, the answer to China's current air incursions over the Taiwan Strait should be both greater civil aviation cooperation between Taiwan and the international community and the integration of Taiwan into a regional air defense architecture. Beijing has many ways to successfully gain control of Taiwan, including intensifying its ongoing "gray zone" operations. China may seek to exploit Taiwanese vulnerabilities, primarily Taiwan's international isolation and lack of alliance relations, in a coordinated short of war coercion campaign that inflicts massive pain on Taiwanese society and prevents U.S. intervention.

By focusing on the means by which China is likely to intensify its coercion efforts, the U.S. can overcome them.

China's sinicisation campaign puts Islamic expression on the line

13 May 2024, East Asia Forum, Hannah Theaker

China has been pursuing a 'sinicisation' policy to make Islam in China more 'Chinese', leading to transformations such as the removal of 'foreign' architectural features from mosques and the introduction of Chinese-language equivalents for Arabic 'halal' signs in restaurants. The gradual 'sinicisation' campaign led by President Xi Jinping is aimed at reducing foreign influence, by fostering an 'appropriately Chinese' formation of Islam and ensuring adherence to a state-defined level of 'Chineseness', with the ultimate goal of strengthening the supremacy of the Chinese Communist Party. The first images of Chinese mosques with their domes torn off began circulating in 2018. Soon, other news reports highlighted rare, isolated instances of public protest, in which Hui Muslims came out onto the streets to resist demolitions or forced renovations of their mosques.

Under a drive to remove aesthetic signs of the so-called 'three changes' – Arabisation, Saudization and pan-halalification – 'Arabic'-style mosques across the country have had their minarets shortened and domes removed, replaced with often incongruous pagoda-style roofs. Muslim restaurants have been required to remove their Arabic-language 'halal' signs and replace them with a Chinese-language equivalent. In early 2024, reporting by the Financial Times and a groundbreaking report by Human Rights Watch, have laid bare the nationwide scale of these renovations.

Such renovations are the most visible aspects of an unfolding campaign to secure the 'sinicisation' of Islam, a campaign intended to remove signs of foreign influence and ensure that Islam in China is appropriately 'Chinese in orientation'. The term 'sinicisation of religion' was first used by Xi Jinping in 2015, not long after the inauguration of the 2014 'Strike Hard Against Violent Terrorism' campaign in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region.

Following the country's ethnonational turn under President Xi Jinping, non-Han identities have been increasingly perceived as a potential threat to national stability and ethnic minorities and religious groups are policed for their adherence to a state-defined standard of 'Chineseness'.

The concept of 'sinicisation' and the idea that the 'sinicisation' of a particular group marks a level of civilisation has a long history in Chinese-language political discourse. But Xi's redeployment of the term needs to be understood in the context of recent state campaigns that have sought to explicitly link loyalty to the Party with being Chinese and a sharp move toward assimilationist policies directed at non-Han ethnic and religious minorities.

In the rhetoric of the current campaign, Islam is implicitly a foreign religion. To be made safe, Islam must adapt to Chinese circumstances.

State narratives around the sinicisation of Islam suggest that an appropriately Chinese form of Islam had evolved over the long history of Islam in China. But in recent years, the infiltration of 'foreign forms of Islam' has caused an unacceptable deviation away from this old and appropriately sinicised Islam. The current campaign is justified as a course correction, necessary to safeguard the Chinese nation and the proper path of development, and to ensure that extremist tendencies are pre-emptively nipped in the bud.

The sinicisation of Islam is underpinned by similar logic to the mass repression and detention of Uyghurs and other Islamic minorities in Xinjiang, though the campaign has been less overtly coercive in its implementation. With the state definition of violent incidents in Xinjiang as acts of Islamic extremism and routine acts of Islamic observance by Uyghurs and other minorities seen as potential indicators of extremist tendencies, work to rectify Islamic observance across China has acquired a particular urgency.

Surveillance and detention of Muslims across Xinjiang has meant increased attention to Islamic communities elsewhere in China. It remains important to acknowledge that there have been no mass arrests to date and communities beyond Xinjiang retain some scope to practise their faith in a way that is impossible inside Xinjiang.

The scale and transformative intent underpinning the sinicisation campaign has been slow to emerge, partly as the policy has been implemented at different timelines in different regions.

The forced renovations of mosques have been accompanied by a series of interventions into the lives of mosque communities. This has ranged from measures to ensure that religious education is in line with 'socialism with Chinese characteristics', to bringing 'excellent traditional Chinese culture' into mosques and to revising translations of religious texts into Chinese. It has also entailed restrictions on teaching Arabic, controlling the appointments of religious professionals and tightened governance of mosques and the China Islamic Association.

While much less visible to the wider public, these changes have deep significance for affected communities – dictating how homes should look, how Islam should be taught and how believers should worship. Of particular concern to many are the restrictions on teaching children about Islam, which remains tightly intertwined with Hui heritage – a potentially existential threat to cultural transmission.

The nature of these interventions reveal that sincisation is about ensuring the supremacy of the Chinese Communist Party, Party ideology and a Party-backed vision of 'Chineseness'. It is about control, and, in pursuit of control, has gone far beyond the initial campaigns to remove aesthetic markers perceived as 'foreign'. The quiet closure of large numbers of mosques across Ningxia, justified in the name of reducing 'burden' on the communities supporting them, suggests that ultimately there is little place for religion or cultural plurality in Xi's vision for a modern Chinese community.

China Threatens India's Hold Over Siachen, Kashmir As Beijing 'Creeps Into' Shaksgam Valley Using CPEC

13 May, 2024, Eurasian Times, Karan Sharma

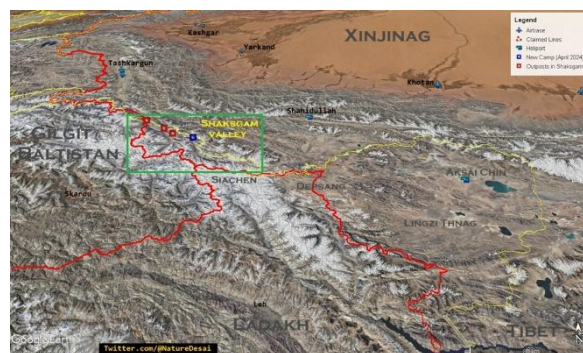

China's recent construction of a road in the Shaksgam Valley, a disputed region along the borders of the Chinese province of Xinjiang and Pakistan-occupied Kashmir (PoK), has reignited tensions in the already volatile region.

The latest reports suggest that the Indian army is analyzing the strategic impact of the new road, which enters the lower Shaksgam valley from the Aghil Pass. The road infrastructure has been under development since June 2023, with construction efforts resuming in the summer of 2024.

Currently, its endpoint is a mere 30 miles from the Indian position over the Siachen Glacier. The Shaksgam Valley, part of the larger Trans-Karakoram tract, has been a contentious issue since its transfer by Pakistan to the People's Republic of China (PRC) under the 1963 Sino-Pakistan Agreement. This transfer, regarded by India as illegal, has fueled longstanding territorial disputes in the northern areas of PoK and Ladakh.

Today, the Trans-Karakoram tract has become a focal point of geopolitical significance, mainly due to the China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC).

The CPEC, a flagship project under China's Belt and Road Initiative (BRI), aims to connect China's Xinjiang province to Pakistan's Gwadar Port through a network of energy, logistics, and transportation-related infrastructure projects.

However, the corridor passes through disputed territories of PoK, particularly Gilgit-Baltistan, which makes the Chinese-funded project unacceptable to India. This latest road construction in the lower Shaksgam Valley through the Aghil Pass has added another layer to the complex web of territorial disputes in Northern Ladakh.

The new road extending closer to the Siachen Glacier, a region of strategic importance for India due to its high altitude, which provides a dominant military position, directly challenges India's security interests in the India-Pakistan-China trisection near Siachen.

India has consistently opposed Chinese infrastructure projects in PoK, viewing them as a violation of its territorial integrity. The emergence of a second Chinese road intersection in the Karakoram, this time through the Aghil Pass in the Shaksgam Valley, represents a significant development; the pre-existing route in the PoK, i.e., National Highway 35/G-314 through the Khunjerab Pass, serves as a vital link of the CPEC, now constructing an alternative route through the Shaksgam Valley introduces a new dynamic.

There can be multiple potential objectives behind China's actions in Shaksgam, each carrying significant implications for India. One plausible objective behind China's activity in the Shaksgam Valley is to reduce its reliance on the Khunjerab Pass for the CPEC.

The existing route through the Khunjerab Pass, particularly the Karakoram Highway, is vulnerable to disruption during times of conflict, primarily due to the threat of an Indian aerial offensive.

By constructing an alternative route through the Shaksgam Valley, China aims to mitigate this vulnerability and ensure uninterrupted connectivity with Pakistan, thereby safeguarding its strategic interests.

Secondly, China's actions in the Shaksgam Valley can be interpreted as a move to assert its permanent claim over the territory. India has long contested the transfer of the Shaksgam Valley from Pakistan to China in 1963; the recent infrastructure development in the region serves to solidify China's presence and signals to India that the transfer of the Shaksgam Valley was not merely symbolic.

Thirdly, China's activities in the Shaksgam Valley may also be aimed at neutralizing India's strategic advantage in the Karakoram and Trans-Karakoram tract, particularly due to the uninterrupted Indian presence over the Siachen Glacier since the Kargil conflict of 1999.

India's military presence in Siachen, occupying high-ground positions, has historically provided it with a strategic advantage in the Karakoram sector. By establishing infrastructure in the Shaksgam Valley, China seeks to counterbalance India's advantage and potentially pose challenges to its military posture in the area.

This reflects China's strategic calculus to recalibrate the balance of power along the disputed border regions, particularly in Northern Ladakh.

The implications of this development are concerning for India, as it brings twin threats in close proximity to the Siachen Glacier. With China now asserting its presence in the north of the valley and Pakistan maintaining its military presence to the west and south, India faces a complex security challenge that requires careful navigation and strategic planning.

While the current road is located in the lower Shaksgam Valley, further construction in the Upper Shaksgam Valley could bring Chinese posts and road infrastructure within 10 to 15 km of Siachen, posing a direct threat to India's position.

The situation is compounded by the ongoing conflict between India and China in the Depsang plains sector just to the East of Siachen, which has witnessed unprecedented mobilization by both sides since the Galwan conflict in June 2020.

As the conflict enters its fifth year, the potential for further escalation remains a cause for concern. In response to China's provocative actions in the Shaksgam Valley, the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA) spokesperson, Randhir Jaiswal, has announced that India has lodged a formal protest with China.

Infrastructure construction in the Shaksgam Valley is not an isolated incident but part of a broader pattern of Chinese expansionism along the Line of Actual Control (LAC) and its borders with neighboring countries.

Similar developments have been observed in regions such as Doklam near the India-Bhutan-China trijunction, Aksai Chin, and the Namka Chu Valley in Upper Tawang along the border of Arunachal Pradesh.

Indian strategist Brahma Chellaney has aptly characterized China's strategy as "salami-slicing," wherein it incrementally gains strategic advantages in contested areas without escalating conflicts into overt battles. This gradual but persistent approach allows China to expand its influence and alter the ground situation in its favor while avoiding significant pushback.

Moreover, recent comments by retiring Admiral John Aquilino, the former US Pacific commander, shed light on China's broader strategy of aggressive expansionism.

Admiral Aquilino has likened China's tactics to a "boiling frog" strategy, wherein it gradually raises the threshold of aggression until other nations fail to realize the critical point in a conflict. This strategy has been evident in the South China Sea, where China has incrementally militarized disputed islands and reefs, leading to heightened tensions with neighboring countries and the United States.

The situation in the Himalayan theater is no exception, as Chinese expansionist activities along the LAC demonstrate. The gradual but persistent development of military infrastructure poses a significant challenge to regional stability and security. India must remain vigilant and proactive in countering these threats, both diplomatically and militarily, to safeguard its interests and prevent further encroachments on its territory. In conclusion, China's actions in the Shaksgam Valley are part of a broader pattern of expansionism and strategic maneuvering in the region.

India's response must be robust and multifaceted, incorporating diplomatic protests, enhanced military preparedness, and closer engagement with regional partners to address the challenges of Chinese assertiveness effectively.

India must bolster its border security measures to prevent further Chinese encroachments and incursions. This may involve deploying additional troops and enhancing surveillance capabilities to deter any further attempts by China to alter the status quo.

India recently sent an additional 10,000 troops to the middle LAC sector of Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand in March, just before the commencement of the national elections; this extra strength is over and above the 50,000 troops deployed in 2021.

India can also explore applying sanctions targeting Chinese companies involved in infrastructure projects in disputed territories. By imposing economic costs on China, India can send a strong message that unilateral actions will not be tolerated.

Collaborative efforts with countries such as the United States, Japan, Australia, members of the QUAD and AUKUS can provide India with additional diplomatic leverage and intelligence support in countering Chinese aggression.

Reports of crucial American intelligence during the Galwan conflict with China strengthen the case for increased intelligence sharing and developing India's own intelligence infrastructure along the LAC and Tibet.

By adopting a comprehensive and proactive approach, India can effectively respond to Chinese transgressions in the border areas and safeguard its territorial integrity and national security interests. It is essential to send a clear message to China that any attempts to alter the status quo will be met with a robust and resolute response from India.

Chinese Foreign Agent was Behind New York Parade with Eric

12 May, 2024, Newsweek, Didi Kirsten Tatlow

What has become an annual parade in mid-town Manhattan for Asian Americans was set up with the blessing of Mayor Eric Adams by the CEO of a company that is a registered foreign agent of China, according to documents obtained exclusively by Newsweek.

The findings raise new questions over Chinese influence operations in the United States, and particularly in New York, where Adams and some other top politicians have previously received campaign donations from members of groups linked to China's ruling Communist Party. Newsweek has reported on the extensive network of such groups in the U.S.

The annual Asian-American parade began in 2022 and will next take place on Manhattan's Sixth Avenue on May 19 as part of the city's "Asian-American and Pacific Islander (AAPI) Heritage Month".

The parade says it welcomes all Asian-Americans, but documents obtained by Newsweek show that organisers exclude groups they deem to be politically and religiously controversial – and critics of China's rulers believe that means them.

Tibetans, Taiwanese, Hong Kongers and others at odds with the Beijing leadership of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) questioned how representative the parade was of the Asian-American community. They had not been invited to take part, were not successful in applying, or didn't want to join as they felt unsafe, they said.

Among them was Frances Hui, founder of a community group called We The Hongkongers. She said that two weeks after applying all she had received was requests for more information, to which she had responded.

"It is obvious to me that they are trying to stall our application until they can find a way to reject us from participating," said Hui.

Hundreds of pages of emails obtained by Newsweek under a freedom of information request show the parade was set up in 2022 by Robin Mui, CEO of the Chinese-language media Sing Tao US, which was ordered by the Department of Justice to register under the Foreign Agents Registration Act in 2021. Working with Mui was Better Chinatown USA, a community organisation led by Steven Tin, the organizer of Lunar New Year events in Manhattan's Chinatown.

The parade was organized in conjunction with Adams, his Asian Affairs advisor Winnie Greco, an AAPI advisory team in the mayor's office, and other city officials.

Unravelling of Chinese spies' dirty work in Europe

12 May 2024, Monitor

What you need to know:

Those who have closely watched activities of China's intelligence agents, say their key focus remains in acquiring information related to internal security, foreign and national security policymaking, scientific research, and technology.

After Sweden recently expelled a Chinese journalist on the charge of threatening the Nordic country's national security, Germany and the United Kingdom last week announced arresting six people on suspicion of spying for China. With such developments, a major question lying uppermost on everyone's mind is: Whether China is emerging as a spying superpower with Europe becoming a major hub of its espionage-related activities?

2. According to the Institute for Strategic Research, a Paris-based military think tank, China has a vast network of organisations, which include the Ministry of Public Security (MPS) and the Ministry of State Security (MSS) to carry out spying activities.

3. The French military's think tank said China's Ministry of Public Security's intelligence branch alone employs between 80,000 and 100,000 people, while the Ministry of State Security employs around 200,000 agents. However, the exact figure of agents hired by these Chinese ministries could be very high, Paul Charon, a China specialist at the Institute for Strategic Research was quoted by The Japan Times as saying.

4. In 2020, investigations carried out by journalists Die Welt and La Stampa, based on sources from the European External Action Service (EEAS), uncovered the existence of an extensive network of Chinese intelligence agents in Brussels. At that time, there were as many as 250 Chinese intelligence officials in Brussels, making the city which hosts NATO headquarters and several European Union institutions, the capital of Chinese spies, said journalists Die Welt and La Stampa in their report in Bloomberg.

5. Those who have closely watched activities of China's intelligence agents, say their key focus remains in acquiring information related to internal security, foreign and national security policymaking, scientific research, and technology. To achieve their objective and purpose, these Chinese spies, as per experts, use various methods which include human intelligence, honey trapping, kompromat, signals intelligence and co-option of ethnic Chinese diaspora communities and associations.

6. Chinese spies' modus operandi is also different in comparison to intelligence agents from the US, Britain, Israel, and others. For example, Chinese intelligence agents recruit local officials, politicians, businessmen, academics, journalists, activists, and ethnic Chinese communities to seek information, influence policies or sabotage activities that are unfavourable to China.

7. This could be clearly seen in the case of Germany as one of the three people arrested by authorities last week for working as spies for China, belongs to the Alternative for Germany (AfD), a far-right party which is contesting elections for the European Parliament, scheduled for June this year. He has been identified as Jian G, a German national who, as per media reports, is working as an assistant for the AfD's candidate for the European Parliament elections, Maximilian Krah.

8. German prosecutors said Jian G, 43, who had dual German and Chinese citizenship passed on information about the European Parliament to Chinese intelligence. He is believed to have passed on information about negotiations and decisions made in the European parliament in January 2024. He is also suspected of spying on Chinese opposition leaders in Germany. Though details of his espionage activity are under the probe, the incident has rattled Germans. They fear he could have passed on several sensitive information to his handlers from China as he was working with Maximilian Krah since 2019, a BBC report said.

9. In 2023, Germany's security service, BfV issued an unusual warning, stating: "In recent years, China's state and party leadership has significantly stepped up its efforts to obtain high-quality political information and to influence decision-making processes abroad." BfV has been warning publicly about the risk of trusting China since 2022, The New York Times said.

10. Arrest of German nationals for their spying activities, has proved such warnings by BfV true. Close on the heels of Jian G's arrest, two men and a woman were also detained in Germany on suspicion of their involvement in gaining information about the country's military technology.

11. However, of these three suspects, Thomas R worked as an agent for an employee of the MSS, the Chinese secret service, DW said. He allegedly obtained information about innovative technologies which could be used for military purposes, the German news outlet said. While the two others, both married couples, were arrested by German authorities as they worked very smartly to get information on the country's research on combat vessels.

12. The couple, Herwig F and Ina F, opened a front office in a German town called Dusseldorf and through it, contacted people working in the field of science and research. This way, the couple first completed a project on the operation of high-performance marine engines for use on combat ships. At the time of their arrest, as per DW, the suspects were in negotiations on other projects that could be of use for the PLA Navy.

13. These arrests took place a week after Olaf Scholz visited China. It was his second such visit since he became German Chancellor in 2021. In the West, Scholz's China visit received a fair amount of criticism as it occurred when the 27-member European Union was chalking out a comprehensive and consistent long-term "China strategy." It is all about the reduction of risks from economic dependencies on China. Germany has itself launched its China strategy in 2023.

14. But then experts give varied opinions on China's hyper intelligence gathering activities across Europe. Some say China's recent espionage activities in Germany, the UK, Netherlands, and Norway have shown that the East Asian country tries to penetrate deep into political sphere, technology companies and universities of the continent in order to manipulate its political processes through its leaders and electorate to bend them to a new world order that it has been working diligently to create.

15. Two British nationals who were arrested in March 2023 and formally charged last week with spying for China, included a former researcher for a prominent UK parliamentarian of the ruling Conservative Party. As per The Sunday Times, researcher Christopher Cash had access to several Conservative lawmakers.

16. The British Sunday newspaper report also said that the researcher had access to Security Minister Tom Tugendhat and Foreign Affairs Committee Chairwoman Alicia Kearns among others.

17. In March, as per Reuters, the British government summoned the Charge D' Affairs of the Chinese embassy in London after accusing Chinese hackers of stealing data from Britain's elections watchdog and carrying out a surveillance operation against lawmakers. But despite such clear-cut involvement of China in political manipulations in Britain and Germany, Beijing has denied any wrongdoing on its part. "As for the so-called Chinese spy cases, we have stressed multiple times that the so-called threat of Chinese spies is purely baseless. We firmly oppose groundless accusations and vilification against China," Wang Wenbin, China's Foreign Ministry Spokesperson, said.

18. This denial, however, cannot obfuscate the fact that Beijing has made Europe a hub of its espionage activities. On April 18, the Dutch military intelligence agency, MIVD said in its annual report that Chinese spies had targeted the Dutch semiconductor, aerospace and maritime industries. While the British Intelligence Chief recently maintained that in the UK alone, Chinese spies had approached more than 20,000 people for providing information through networking platforms such as LinkedIn. Similarly, Norway's intelligence service earlier in this year said Chinese spies operate all over the continent and are involved in political and industrial espionage. Recent arrests in Germany and the UK point to this fact.

How China's latest government overhaul is shaping up, and what it says about the Communist Party's priorities

12 May, 2024, SCMP, William Zheng

- New bodies dedicated to issues such as financial risk and social stability are being established at a central and local level
- Shake-up is seen by some analysts as part of wider moves to strengthen the party's control over key policy areas and organs of government

Since taking the helm of the Communist Party in 2012, President Xi Jinping has constantly been overhauling China's massive system of state and party organs to reflect Beijing's shifting priorities.

In the latest restructuring plan, rolled out in the spring of 2023, Beijing moved to assert more direct party control over a wide range of key policy areas, including science and technology, the financial sector and social stability.

A year later, the nature and scale of the restructuring is starting to take shape as new agencies covering these areas have been set up by central and local governments.

Looking closely at their operations provides an opportunity not just to see how they operate in practice, but also helps shed more light on Beijing's policy priorities and the challenges it faces.

For example, the establishment of new financial regulatory bodies by both central and provincial governments highlights the sense of urgency around tackling financial risk, while the newly established National Data Administration will play a key role in China's plans to develop artificial intelligence by managing data resources.

The top Hong Kong and Macau policy office will also report directly to the party's Central Committee, rather than the State Council, the country's cabinet, to improve coordination with other branches of government as Beijing seeks to tighten its control over the city.

The overhaul is an "important part of the ruling Communist Party's effort to channel nationwide resource-to-technology self-reliance, while strengthening the party's control over financial and social risks", as it faces an increasingly hostile West, according to Alfred Wu, an associate professor with the National University of Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy.

"In China's party and state-led governance model, setting up party commissions or government bureaus are usually the best way to influence the resource allocation on priorities as it is trying to shift the key economic growth engine from property to technology," he said.

"It is a painful and long process. China hopes to use the party-led finance model to pump more money into research and development, while keeping an eye on social stability because of higher unemployment."

The efforts to ensure stability extend all the way down to the grass roots, where social work departments – which have to handle petitions and grievances from the public – are being established at county level, the only new bodies to operate at such a low level.

While departments supervising economic matters only make sense on a larger scale, the opposite is true for social stability, according to Xie Maosong, a senior researcher at the National Institute of Strategic Studies at Tsinghua University.

"It has to reach the grass roots level to know what is wrong on the ground and take immediate action," said Xie.

At the central level, Beijing appointed Wu Hansheng, a veteran party administrator, as head of the Social Work Department in July 2023.
